

TRANSFORMATION

The Breakthrough

COMMUNION
was just the beginning...

TRANSFORMATION

THE BREAKTHROUGH

WHITLEY STRIEBER

On February 10, 1987, one of the most startling and controversial books of our time was published: Whitley Strieber's Communion. In Communion, Whitley Strieber described the shattering effects of an assault from the unknown—what seemed to be an encounter with intelligent nonhuman beings.

Transformation is the chronicle of his effort to form a relationship with the unknown reality he has come to call "the visitors."

After writing Communion, Whitley Strieber firmly expected that his encounters with the "visitors" would end. They did not.

At first he was desperate and terrified. He struggled frantically to push the visitors out of his life, to prove to himself that they were figments of his imagination, that they were anything but a reality separate from himself.

He was finally forced to admit, because of their persistence and the undeniably intelligent structure of their encounters with him, that they had to be a genuine mystery, an intelligence of unknown nature and origin.

Whitley began to challenge his fear of the visitors, to try to confront them with objectivity, in an effort to gain real insight into their impact on our lives. The more he did this, he found, the deeper and richer his experience became.

Do the visitors represent a force that has been with mankind throughout history? Has it played an absolutely central role in altering human culture? Has a conscious force

(continued on back flap)

TRANSFORMATION

By Whitley Strieber

*As Author: Transformation
Communion
Wolf of Shadows
Catmagic
The Night Church
Black Magic
The Hunger
The Wolfen*

As Co-Author: Nature's End Warday

Whitley Strieber

TRANSFORMATION

The Breakthrough

BIB

BEECH TREE BOOKS

WILLIAM MORROW

New York

Copyright © 1988 by Wilson & Neff, Inc.

Grateful acknowledgment is made to Insel Verlag for permission to reprint lines from the "Second Elegy," from Duino Elegies by Rainer Maria Rilke.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the Publisher. Inquiries should be addressed to Permissions Department, Beech Tree Books, William Morrow and Company, Inc., 105 Madison Ave., New York, N.Y. 10016

Printed in the United States of America

BOOK DESIGN BY JAYE ZIMET

The word "book" is said to derive from boka, or beech.
The beech tree has been the patron tree of writers since ancient times and represents the flowering of literature and knowledge.

Transformation is dedicated to those who have had the courage to be named in this book as witnesses to my experience.

Barbara Clagman, Ed Conroy, Denise Daniels, Selena Fox, Lanette Glasscock, Annie Gottlieb, Bruce Lee, Roy Leonard, Barry Maddock, Philippe Mora, David Nigrelle, Dora Ruffner, Jacques Sandulescu, Martin Sharp, Patricia Simpson, Richard Strieber, Gilda Strutz, Mary Sue and Patrick Weathers, Yensoon Tfai, and in memory of Jo Sharp.

I would also like to thank Dr. John Gliedman, whose open mind and resolute skepticism have led to so many essential insights.

Beth Andreasson, Raymond Cowley, Stanton Friedman, Leonard Keave, Bruce Maccabee, Dr. Jesse Marcel, Dr. Jacques Vallee, and William Moore lent me counsel and advice, which was much needed and appreciated.

Most of all I would like to thank Anne Strieber, whose objectivity and courage have sustained me, and Andrew Strieber, whose calm acceptance has been an inspiration to me.

Contents

INTRODUCTION	9
PART ONE Secret Journeys	13
ONE The Lost Boy	15
TWO The Golden City	27
THREE Extreme Strangeness	33
FOUR The Storm Gathers	43
FIVE Lightning	52
SIX The White Angel	70
SEVEN Transfigured Night	78
EIGHT Long-Ago Summers	90
PART TWO Life in the Dark	105
NINE The Lost Land	107
TEN Secret Knowledge	115
ELEVEN The Terror of the Real	123
TWELVE Fire of the Question	134
THIRTEEN The Jolt of the True	141

FOURTEEN Distant Witness 147

PART THREE Beyond the Dark 155

FIFTEEN The Woods 157

SIXTEEN Passage into Death 163

SEVENTEEN Fury 175

EIGHTEEN A Soul's Journey 186

NINETEEN December 23, 1986 203

TWENTY The Razor's Edge 212

TWENTY-ONE The Visitors Emerge 221

TWENTY-TWO Beyond Nightmare 239

APPENDIX ONE Health 245

APPENDIX TWO Truth 249

APPENDIX THREE Gaelic 251

AFTERWORD 253

Introduction

I have been deep into the dark and found extraordinary things there.

The visitors did not go away when I finished Communion. On the contrary, they came rushing into my life and would not stop. My experience has come to include too many witnesses for me to consider that it is internal to my mind.

I believe that the vivid and startling nature of a number of the witnesses' experiences, and the credibility of the witnesses, all but proves my contention that the visitors are a genuine unknown and not an outcome of hallucination or mental illness. Even the most skeptical and vociferous of my critics has publicly admitted that I am not lying. Short of actual, physical evidence, I think that I have gone as far as possible to demonstrate the reality of the visitors. If they represent some sort of essentially nonphysical form that we do not yet understand, then physical proof may never come. This does not mean that they should be ignored. They are already having a staggering but largely hidden impact on our society, and their presence should be taken with the utmost seriousness.

I do not think that we are dealing with something as straightforward as the arrival of a scientific team from another planet that is here to study us. Neither are we dealing with hallucinations. This is a subtle, complex group of phenomena, causing experience at the very limits of perception and understanding. It suggests to me that there may be quite a real world that exists between thing and thought, moving easily from one to the other—emerging one moment as a full-scale physical reality and slipping the next into the shadows.

The visitors have caused me to slough off my old view of the world like the dismal skin that it was and seek a completely new vision of this magnificent, mysterious, and fiercely alive universe.

There is some evidence that the visitors have been here for a long time, perhaps for all of history. Involvement with them may be an ancient human experience.

Abduction by nonhuman beings is a part of much folklore. Whether the abductors are called demons, gods, fairies, or aliens, the experience is always devastating to its victims. Because we have refused to study the subject, we remain ignorant, and the experience is as hard now as it was a thousand years ago.

I believe that this can change.

Like their earlier counterparts, a few of the modern abductees have been driven mad, died, or disappeared. The great majority have simply borne their difficult, incomprehensible, and socially unacceptable memories in silence.

Because it is so stressful, an encounter with the visitors can either be destructive or it can be used as a golden door to inner understanding. But it has a dark side too. People who cannot make use of their encounters are often shattered. At its best the experience shocks minds to openness. It creates in its victims a hunger to develop and enrich their spirits.

It is not a "special" experience, reserved for a lucky few. There is no certain way to know how many people are being affected, but the numbers are very large and they are growing.

I am reporting on my perceptions of what the visitors have done to me and my own personal responses. I am not claiming that my observations are perfect reflections of exactly what happened, or even that they fit the visitors' motives.

I will defend the fact that I have described my experiences with all the clarity I could achieve, and with complete candor. They are honest descriptions of one man's behavior when confronted by an unknown intelligence.

Thousands and thousands of people are waking up to the realization that the strange creatures and lighted objects that mankind has been encountering are not some trick of the mind but a genuine enigma.

Precognition, apparent telepathy, out-of-the-body perceptions, and even physical levitation are commonplace side effects of contact with the visitors. I find this absolutely astonishing, but I cannot deny it. Thousands of letters and personal interviews with people who have encountered them—with many of them reporting one or more of these effects—convince me that they are a real outcome of contact.

Even so, I would still hesitate to report them, simply because they are so bizarre. But some of them have happened to me as well.

The difficulty of the visitor experience does not make it a certain evil: The most critical development of the mind comes from the most intense effort. Fear confuses us and holds us back. It is our primary obstacle. Successful confrontation with it is the breakthrough that leads to understanding.

Whether by accident or design, the visitors took me on a fabulous and terrible journey through my fears. Whatever my worst imagining, actual experience intensified it a hundred times. They took me into the red terror of death; they made me face even my most suppressed dread. They also compelled me to face my guilts, my rages, my sorrows, all that I have buried in myself. Whatever sin was hidden, it ended up lying wet and wriggling in my hands. Whatever dread was suppressed, it came snarling forth demanding to be confronted.

The visitors are sweeping up from where we buried them under layers of denial and false assurance to deliver what is truly a message from the beyond: There is something more to us and our universe, and it is rich with the potential of the unknown.

It will be incredibly hard for us to achieve real relationship with the visitors. But also, I can tell you from experience that there will be wonder.

There will be great wonder.

*“There was a child went forth every day,
And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became
And that object became part of him for the day or a certain part of the day,
Or for many years or stretching cycles of years.”*

—WALT WHITMAN, “There Was a Child Went Forth”

SECRET JOURNEYS

Part One

ONE

The Lost Boy

The night of April 2, 1986, was cool and damp in the corner of upstate New York where we have our cabin. My son was on spring break and he, my wife, Anne, and I were spending an uneasy week there. It had been bought as a place of peace and relaxation, but had turned out to be something very different.

Beginning in October of the previous year, we'd had a series of devastating nighttime encounters with what appeared to be aliens. I had been the direct victim of most of these encounters, and they had all but shattered me.

But they had also fascinated me. Were we really in touch with nonhuman beings of some sort? That certainly appeared to be the case. I'd undergone an exhaustive series of medical and psychological tests that had proved me healthy and sane. I was not the victim of any disease that might cause hallucinations. What's more, there had been a few witnesses. On the night of October 4, 1985, two friends, Annie Gottlieb and Jacques Sandulescu, had been disturbed by some extremely strange lights, sounds, and sensations while I was under virtual attack from the visitors. In March 1986 a friend of my son's had seen a small flying disk move past our living-room window while we were eating dinner. She was a seven-year-old girl and totally unaware of the UFO phenomenon. That night I had a spectacular direct encounter with the visitors.

We were terrified, and we were having a very hard time staying in our cabin.

The beings I was encountering weren't the wise and benevolent creatures that films like Close Encounters might have led one to expect.

They were absolutely devastating, and they kept coming back.

My wife and I had seriously considered abandoning the cabin. But the more we became convinced that the experience might possibly be real, the more we became determined not to run from it. What if they were aliens? If they were real, we could not in conscience turn away from them. They were terrifying. But we were very curious.

Despite our fear we kept going back, but I did not sleep peacefully there. I would wake up in the night shaking with terror.

We had told our son, Andrew, very little about what was happening. Our worst horror was that he would get dragged into the business. Were we wrong to take him back to the cabin? We didn't know. Society offered us little support or help. Most people didn't believe that an experience like ours was real, let alone worth worrying about.

We were on our own, we and the aliens—if that's what they were.

We did what we thought was right.

And then, on the night of April 2, our very worst fears came true.

In the middle of the night I was disturbed by what felt like somebody giving me a sharp jab to my left shoulder. I woke up instantly and I was angry with myself. Would this never stop? Something had happened just the night before! Was I never to be left in peace?

When I woke up on the night of April 1, I was already with two of the visitors. We were in a gray, curving corridor. This time, though, I was in bed and there was nobody around. I decided that this awakening must have been self-caused, a side effect of my nervousness.

Because of what I had been going through, I had learned a great deal about psychological states. I assumed that I was having an experience well known to mental-health professionals. The "night visitor" phenomenon—a so-called hypnopompic state or waking dream—sometimes begins with a similar sensation to what I was feeling.

I was not, however, in a hypnopompic trance. There were no night visitors, and no dream images persisted after I opened my eyes. I was not experiencing the paralysis so characteristic of this condition. A typical night-visitor episode begins with a sudden awakening such as I had just experienced. The victim opens his eyes and usually sees entities standing around the bed. The victim cannot move at first, but the moment the paralysis breaks, the entities disappear.

The usual experience involving night visitors described in scientific literature and the experience I had on April 2, 1986, are as different from one another as a bubbling creek is from a black coughing cataract.

I sat up on the side of the bed. I checked my state carefully. There was no persistence of dream, no trance of a hallucinatory condition. I was simply a tired, perplexed man in the middle of the night.

It was one of those magic hours of early spring, after the squeaky young frogs have gone to sleep and the breeze has stopped. A thrall hung over everything. While a few new houses had been built in our area in recent months, our cabin was still isolated because it hugged a vast tract of state land—empty, rough, beautiful land that I had learned to love very much.

I got out of bed, thinking that I would go down and check on my son, and perhaps walk outside for a few minutes. The air was quite chilly, so I put on some rubber-soled slippers and a thick terry-cloth robe.

I walked downstairs into the most appalling experience of my life.

The house was perfectly normal in every way. As I descended, the stairs creaked softly. Our big clock ticked its loud, reassuring tick. It was three-fifteen in the morning. I crossed the kitchen and looked into my boy's bedroom. All was obviously well, judging from the comfortable lump of bedclothes in the middle of the bed. I went in to rearrange the covers and gaze on my sleeping child.

The room was warm and there was a perfectly normal sense of human presence. I could even hear my son breathing, or I thought I could.

However, the bedclothes were empty.

At first I dug down, thinking that maybe he had squirmed to the bottom of the bed. Then I felt around, finally pulling the sheets and quilt to the floor.

The bed was a stark, white emptiness. I looked under it, beside it. A flash of hope went through me as I rushed into the bathroom. But he wasn't there either.

I knew with a parent's awful certainty that he wasn't in the house. Still, I thought maybe he had been sleepwalking. I searched the basement. I was just sure that he was here somewhere, he had to be.

But I could not find him. I felt cold and breathless. I did not wish to consider the idea that this had to do with what I was beginning to call "the visitors." At first I had called them "aliens," but there were too many things about them that suggested—if they were aliens—they knew us very well. I did not like the sound of the word alien. It conjured up an image of something so strange, so apart from us, that we would never come to understand its true nature, or to achieve a relationship with it.

And I was desperate for understanding, desperate for relationship.

As I raced through the house I was also furious at myself. I'd contracted the visitor hysteria and somehow infected my child with my terror. God knew where he was, curled up under the car or something, terrified in the night because of his father's overwrought imagination.

My impulse was to cry out, to call his name, but I kept quiet in hope of finding him asleep. Then I could carry him gently back to bed and all would be forgotten in the morning.

A few minutes later I'd searched every closet and room.

I had to face the fact that my seven-year-old was not in the house at three-twenty in the morning. There was no possibility that this was a hallucination. My little boy was gone, really gone. Incredibly and inexplicably the burglar alarm was off. I thought to wake Anne and call the sheriff.

I was going upstairs to get her when I seized on a last, faint hope and decided to look outside.

The previous summer we'd bought Andrew a tent from Sears. It was set up in the woods not far from the house. Maybe he had gone out there.

But leaving the house in the dark and going through the woods to the tent was literally the last thing I could imagine him doing. Even though he'd been told little about the visitors, he'd had his own possible encounters, and he was very nervous after dark, the poor kid. I ran out the front door, so great was my hope of finding him.

I hadn't grabbed a flashlight and it was very dark. I went to the end of the porch, thinking to walk near the road where the trees were thinner and there was more light. That way I could see, and I'd get to the tent without risking a fall.

I jumped down off the end of the porch and started toward the road. Above me there was quite a broad expanse of sky, and as I hurried along I noticed something moving there.

I stopped and looked up, confused by this suggestion of motion where there shouldn't be any. What I saw was absolutely stunning. A cold shock went through my body and my heart started running in my chest. In that instant I was swept from the real world and back into the fearsome strangeness that had been assaulting us.

What I saw in the sky, apparently no more than a few hundred feet above treetop level, was a gigantic blackness. It covered easily a third of the firmament, blotting out the stars. It was simply immense, a featureless void. It showed no lights, it didn't glow—it was a black place in the sky. It could as easily have been a hole in the real as a disk hanging silently in the air. The movement I had detected was the prick of stars winking in and out as the border of the thing moved.

I thought it was a cloud. Its wide, curving edge was very sheer, but surely that could be accounted for by some wind phenomenon. The cloud moved as I moved, so exactly in synchronization with me that it seemed oddly connected to me. It was as if this entire, huge object were linked to my motions. Of course the moon will do that behind the trees. But I was seeing the object not against nearer trees but against the more distant stars. Thus the movement either was actual or was violating a law of perspective.

I didn't much care which it was; I was going to turn and walk away from it, then into the woods toward the tent.

Suddenly I heard a voice, clear in the silence: "Can you go back upstairs by yourself or do you want us to help you?"

It wasn't overly loud, but it shattered the quiet. I stopped, frightened, not sure where it had come from. On the far side of the road I saw three dark shapes hanging above the brush. They were blocky and small, as if covered by black or dark-blue sheets.

That voice had been so final, so absolutely authoritative, and so implacable. Suddenly I realized what was happening: That was a gigantic unknown object up there, and my son must be in it. I had interrupted the visitors in the middle of one of their abductions.

A fearful shuddering passed through me from head to toe. My whole body shook. I was losing control. A band of pain went around my chest; I could hear the blood pounding in my head. I'd never felt anything like it. I thought I was having a heart attack or some kind of seizure. I writhed. It was as if something deep within me were literally trying to escape from my skin.

I was filled with an inexpressible sadness. I wanted just to stand there and scream. I stumbled a few more steps toward the object.

Then I stopped, noticing that the stars were coming out all around it. It seemed to be shrinking.

This observation relieved me. Maybe I was, after all, dealing with a waking dream. Of course, that's what it was. It must be that: a horrible, insane waking dream. Then the object—which had now disappeared completely—suddenly reappeared as a flat, yellow disk about half the size of a dime. Its glow took on a faint pink tint and it darted off to the north, streaking like a meteor.

I understood that it hadn't been shrinking at all. It had been going up very quickly and in absolute silence.

I have never felt so helpless or so lonely as I did at that moment. I knew what I had suffered in the past at the hands of these bizarre visitors. Images of my little boy going through the same things tormented me.

They repeated their question and I think that they may have floated a little closer to me. I was furious and totally impotent. I did not think that I would ever see my son again. And how in God's name would I explain what had happened to him to his mother or to the sheriff, or to anybody?

There are levels of agony that are hard to describe, even when you have lived them. I thought to myself that I had two options: I could either turn around and walk back to the house, retaining some shred of human dignity, or do what I felt like doing and just fall down right there on the ground.

If I did that, though, I had no doubt that I would simply find myself back in bed in the morning. And I would wake up to that empty house, empty life, our lives destroyed, our boy God knew where.

I walked back. It was like ascending a gallows. My legs were heavy and shaky and strange. I couldn't see, and the ground was uneven. Sweat and tears were blinding me and it was a dark night. A sapling whipped at me, a stone made me reel. Something that is deep, that is fundamental to me, made me keep walking straight. I did not want to show the fear that I felt. Perhaps my son was in the hands of something exalted, but that was not how my instincts responded.

I reacted as if he had been captured by wild animals.

All I knew was that I didn't want to anger them and possibly place my son in even greater jeopardy.

I went back to the house. I remember how it looked, dark and foreboding, a little bit as if it belonged to another world. The faint glow of Andrew's night-light illuminated the windows of his room. The house was still and silent.

This familiar place now seemed strange and other-worldly. What had just happened was so weird that it had shattered my assumptions about the world around me. My own living room was an alien chamber full of bizarre artifacts. I looked around, as if from the other side of the world—and all I saw was my familiar chair, the table and lamp beside it, the TV and videotape recorder, the magazine stand, the small bookshelf beside the stairs.

Was this real? And what about what had just taken place outside—was that also real?

I do not think that I can express how lost I was at that moment, or how angry and bitter and cheated I felt. How did conventional science explain that big, black thing in the sky? That thing wasn't supposed to be real.

Then where in hell was my child?

I had done everything possible to fend off the visitors—installed a burglar alarm and movement-sensitive lights, told the scientific community, appealed to the Church.

Half a dozen solidly educated scientists and medical people had offered me professional support. Because of their work I could be certain that I suffered from no known disease or deformity. And their counsel had been brilliant, supportive, and useful: Learn to live at a high level of uncertainty. Keep the question open.

I also took the visitor experience to the Church, to a priest whose heart is full of love.

I know that there are priests who would have thrown me out of their rectories, and priests who would have proclaimed me the victim of demons. But I did not meet such priests. The priest I talked to said, "No matter what they are, they can only increase the glory of God."

There was no scientist with me on April 2, 1986. There was no priest. And before the great power of the visitors, what would their counsel have gained me? I was alone with this and at that moment I was in hell.

Remembering what they had wanted me to do, I marched upstairs like a soldier. I was perishing inside. I went over to the bed and sat down on it.

I sensed that they were in the bedroom with me, but that didn't seem to matter. I might as well have been paralyzed for all the control I had over myself. This was a subtle thing, though. On the surface I felt normal. It was just that I was walking across a room, going to bed, when alarms were screaming in my mind that something had happened to my child. It was as if somebody else were controlling my body. And yet, I did not feel as though I were struggling.

I threw off my robe and slippers, lay down in bed, and felt the most wonderful sensation of warmth spread over my body. Helplessly, I was swept off into a dreamless, black sleep.

When I woke up it was light outside. I opened my eyes. Birds were singing, and I could see the hazy green of new growth on the trees near the windows.

At first I had the feeling that one gets upon waking from a nightmare and realizing that all is well. The morning seemed fresh and good and full of promise.

But that lasted for only a few seconds. The night came flooding back, and with it the memories. I felt sure I was about to go downstairs to an empty house.

I couldn't move a muscle. Beside me Anne was breathing softly. I felt so terrible for bringing her and our son back this house at the edge of hell.

A small sound came up from downstairs. At first I couldn't believe my ears, then I heard the pad pad pad of my son's footsteps. He was coming to our bed, just like he had every morning since he could escape from his crib!

Was this true? Was it possible?

He burst through the door with his stuffed dog Puppy under his arm and a wide grin on his face.

I couldn't talk, I couldn't move. The tears were pouring down my face. But he didn't notice that. He dove into the bed and snuggled down between us and he was warm and real and I hugged him hard.

Over the next few hours my old arrogance reasserted itself. It had to. I could not otherwise live with the total power of the visitors.

They could do anything they wanted to me and my family. That was so unbearable that I just tuned it out.

I was eager to tell the scientists who were working with me about this new experience: a waking hypnopompic state with extensive hallucinatory involvement. I was undoubtedly awake when I went out and saw the device in the sky. But the device was a dream-thing, as were the visitors who had spoken to me. And as for my son's not being in bed—well, we'd deal with that one later.

All morning he was vibrant. He was full of laughter and jokes and fun. He always is, actually, but his glow on this morning was memorable.

By the time breakfast was over, I had decided that the events of the night before weren't even worth reporting. They'd been nothing more than a nightmare brought on by the state of disquiet I was in.

It was a warm day and Anne and I took folding chairs out onto the deck that afternoon. We both began reading novels and enjoying the sun. Andrew was playing nearby with his toy trucks when I noticed that things were changing in an odd way. As I listened, I realized that the birds had stopped, the insects had stopped, even a chain saw roaring in the distance had been shut down. I turned to Anne and said, "Listen. It's so quiet." She was staring at her book with a curious expression on her face, almost as if her eyes were seeing nothing. She did not reply. My son had also stopped moving. He was crouching over his toy trucks and not making a sound.

The quiet was a wonderful thing. There was a sense of what I can only describe as something very sacred nearby.

This marvelous sensation persisted for a moment, then another, then seemed at once to end and to stretch into cycles of eternity. A shadow passed, darkening the sun.

Then, as softly as it had departed, the life of the world returned. First one bird started cheeping, and then the whole ragged April chorus followed. The insects began. In the intimate, swampy places behind the house the spring peepers started up again. The chain saw began to chatter and a moth fluttered past as if dancing.

My boy made a sound like a train whistle, a long, high tone that seemed to reach right to the center of my heart.

He grew tired of his game and came to me.

“Whatcha reading?”

“A book about America in the nineteenth century called Dream West.”

“Dream West?”

“Yes.”

“Y’know, I’ve been thinking. Reality is God’s dream.”

I looked at him. I was a little surprised, not so much at the statement but at the quiet force in his voice. Reality is God’s dream?

“What happens if God wakes up?”

He stared at me for a moment with an almost quizzical expression on his face—then burst out laughing.

The afternoon passed uneventfully. We drove into town for some groceries.

Later Andrew said, “The unconscious mind is like the universe out beyond the quasars. It’s a place we want to go to find out what’s there.”

There came into my mind as the shadows of the day grew long the thought that my little boy could not have said that. I was embarrassed at myself for underestimating him: He did say it.

We were out on the deck together just after sunset. Andrew looked toward the woods. "Y'know, I had a funny dream last night. I dreamed I was floating in the woods and this huge eye was looking down at me. It was funny. It was like it was real but it was a dream." He looked at the shadows, some of them already deep. "Wasn't it a dream, Dad?"

"What do you want to think?"

"I want to think—a dream."

"That sounds good to me, then." Like so many of us, he had chosen to protect himself from the reality of the visitors by calling them a dream. So be it.

Inside, I wanted to cry. And yet, and yet . . . his thoughts were so beautiful, and hearing them from the lips of a child was one of the most ineffable experiences I have ever had.

Reality is God's dream. And what lies beyond the quasars, what indeed? I stood with my little boy, and it was as if I could feel the old earth rolling toward night. Our woods, our sky, were dropping their disguise of light. The first stars were steady, hard points.

I wondered what it was like at this moment beyond the quasars. What is there? What is really there?

Perhaps that far place is actually close to the depths of the mind. Maybe at its innermost and outermost borders, the universe meets. The message of the visitors, then, expressed through the mind of a little boy, is that all is unified by a common mystery. Who are we? What is this vast production of sky? Where along the deep paths of mind and night will we finally encounter the truth?

The Golden City

I was extremely worried about my little boy. The idea that what had happened to him on the night of April 2 might have been completely real was frightful to contemplate. I took him to a psychologist who interviewed him carefully and concluded that he was happy, healthy, and well adjusted. Anne and I continued our policy of keeping him strictly isolated from talk about the visitors.

I wondered if this was the right approach. If the visitors were really taking him in the night, I obviously should talk to him about it, offer him what support I could. But if this was something else, something to do with the mind that we didn't yet understand, then such talk would only worsen his confusion.

I was left feeling that he was as vulnerable as I was, and that there was nothing whatsoever I could do about it.

I felt such loneliness in those spring days. For the first time in my life I had begun to feel real contempt for other human beings. I saw amazing arrogance everywhere in the scientific community. Among people in the humanities, liberals and intellectuals I had admired, there was disdain for the whole phenomenon. These supposed champions of the common man dismissed it with contempt because it was part of the "folk culture."

The universe is a mystery, and our theories about its nature—and our own—are really nothing more than illustrations of our ignorance.

I was turning away from man and day, and toward nature and the night.

I was simultaneously drawn to the dark and repelled by it. I read other accounts of visitor experience, talked with other people who'd had it, struggled with the issues while writing Communion. And I watched the shadows like a frightened animal.

During the daylight hours I felt confident that I was the only member of the family infected by the visitor disease, and that I could somehow survive it. But at night I sweated.

I sensed that the visitors were coming closer to me and my family. Sometimes I could almost hear their whispering voices, and in my mind's eye see the grand lights of their ships . . . and the grim, drab rooms within. Above all I could see their staring eyes. Reflected in those eyes I could remember seeing a twisted, grimacing caricature of a human face. It looked like a thing in terror, that face.

It was me.

Those were black, black times for me. I was poised between sanity and madness, teetering back and forth. I was desperate. Writing Communion was my anchor, my task, my reality. I clung to the work, sitting at my desk by day, totally absorbed in it.

But the terrible times always came, the worst hours at the bottom of the night. Even in New York City it was hard. Even there a man can hear in the cool rustle of the wind the painful truth—that we are so small and the world is so vast.

It was at such an hour that there came to me an image of remarkable power and beauty. It seemed a little thing at the time, but the memory of it has ever since provided me with a source of strength and comfort.

The image of the golden city came only once, and then it was fleeting.

It happened at our apartment in Manhattan, in the second week of April.

One morning just before dawn the whole world seemed to get bright. My eyes opened, hollow and exhausted. I did not see a fire or the approach of some great light. I saw instead an ordinary bedroom. Anne was asleep beside me, and dawn was just creeping in around the blinds. The clock showed a few minutes past six.

I closed my eyes again, hoping for another hour of sleep. Again the light came, a great, golden magnificence that seemed to fill me, to absorb me and shine through me. Suddenly I was flying in the light, and I saw huge towers pouring great fountains of pure white light into the relentless dark.

And then I saw that I was flying over a city, a huge and complex city with streets and buildings and intimate street corners . . . and not a living, moving soul. The silence was absolute. The streets I glided over were empty. I crossed hundreds, thousands of streets, I saw buildings by the thousands, none very tall, some long and low, others squat and square, others more complex. I saw dark windows and doors standing open, and huge stadiums every few miles. When I would get near one of these I would fly low, so I couldn't see over the rims into the interiors. They were lit so brightly by gigantic banks of lights that the glare was almost unendurable.

I crossed miles more of buildings, then passed another of these strange stadiums. I rose up higher and saw others farther off, and the city stretched around me from horizon to horizon, endlessly. There was ringing in my heart an emotion of overwhelming power. It was as if a great magnet had pulled me there, and was drawing me across the incredibly vivid landscape, rich with the details of an unknown life.

I opened my eyes. Anne sighed. I heard the gentle purr of a car passing in the street. Morning was breaking softly, another new day, ordinary day . . .

Then I closed my eyes again and the image of the golden city sprang back into the full light of vision. I wondered at it, how any mental image could be so endlessly varied and detailed, so huge. I crossed more streets. I could see down into some windows, gray earth floors, gray walls. But the city was empty, an eerie mass of structures.

And then I saw a building that immediately arrested my attention.

I relived the loneliness of late childhood, those stabbing moments when one realizes that something is ending, the immaculate season, and rain is sweeping the path ahead.

Here nothing was obscure and yet nothing was revealed. I sailed on and on over this hidden city, coming always closer to that building.

One moment I would be high aloft and see it standing in the distance. The next I would find myself swooping down so close to a street that I could almost count the golden stones that formed it, fitted together with the cunning of Inca work, each glowing as if with the very light of the mind. Then I would rise again, passing doors and windows and cornices and slated roofs until I soared dizzily a few hundred feet in the air. Before me would be that building, gold and tan, long, a construction so simple and severe and perfect that its lines made my heart ache toward some lost balance or genius of the soul.

I remembered the days of my late childhood, the paradox of a little boy awake and alone after midnight, wondering . . . and the raw emotions of loss that surfaced on the night I was taken by the visitors, December 26, 1985, when I saw my own happy life slipping away behind me . . .

The building stood closer now, as exotic and bright as a notorious jewel. Beneath the windows on the top story was a thick, red line. The windows themselves were obscured by black horizontal louvers.

It seemed to me that this building was directly connected with us, with mankind, that it was a place where the truth about us was known.

As I went closer I began to resonate with the phrase "a place where the truth is known." I almost wanted to cry, looking at that building. One of our great tragedies is that we do not know the truth about ourselves. Is there somebody, somewhere, who does?

I passed closer and closer to the windows of the building. Could there be figures inside? Movement? I was in a torment of curiosity, trying to see in. I caught a glimpse of a shadow behind the dark louvers, saw dust in a column of light, felt an emptiness in my heart as I glimpsed an empty corner of a room.

I drew closer. A place where the truth is known! Closer and closer I went, until I felt I could reach out and touch one of the black louvers that covered the windows.

Helplessly, like a blowing leaf, I rose up. The building receded, and then I could see the city, the great reefs of structure, the standing towers of light, the long, cold streets, the strange stadiums. Now that I was above them they proved to be so filled with light that I couldn't make out what was happening inside. Had I been able to penetrate that glare with my eyes, what would I have seen? Our lives, perhaps, being lived out on the soul's stage.

Wider and wider spread the golden city, until it lay below me as a sea of light without limit. The little building with the red stripe on it was lost in the ocean of buildings.

Then, quite suddenly, there was an angry buzzing noise. The scene resolved itself. I was in bed. It was morning. Anne was just turning off the alarm clock.

The day had begun and it was time to dress and get Andrew off to school. I got up as Anne raised the blinds onto a more humble morning in a more humble place, New York City by the light of the sun.

The day came and went, and another night. I waited like a man for his lover, but the image of the golden city did not recur, not on that night or on any other. Never since have I had such a vivid impression of reality in my mind. It was as if I were soaring over a real place; in some sense perhaps I was.

I have longed for the golden city, have waited and hoped to see it again, but I have never returned. I have thought that perhaps a thing of such beauty is not meant for living eyes.

Even though I suspect that I will not in this life return, I will never leave the golden city, never in my heart. It stands within me as an answer to the rage and the helplessness and the confusion of the visitor experience and of my life.

Somewhere there is a place where the truth is known.

THREE

Extreme Strangeness

Once I saw a black man sitting at a bus stop in an exclusive part of my hometown of San Antonio with silent tears pouring down his cheeks. That image has haunted me all my life, in childhood because it was so stark, and now because it seems to contain in itself a wordless something that is essential and true about us, but which we cannot see quite clearly enough.

The golden city was a place of deliverance, where no man is the wrong color or the wrong race or the wrong religion, and every soul is overflowing with all its rich potential.

We have always had among us legends of lost cities, of golden cities, of the city of God, of the mansions of heaven.

The longing that leads to visions of heaven is the same longing that has drawn some of us close to the visitors.

In April 1986 I was halfway convinced that the visitors' appearance in my life was some sort of self-generated attempt to escape from the pressure of living in this hard world. But that was changing. Unless mental states are infectious in ways that are not understood, Andrew's involvement could not be explained in that way. He was a happy child; the world was not pressuring him. And he had hardly been exposed to the notion of the visitors at all. So why was he involved . . . or was he? I was literally desperate to understand, and I couldn't.

At night I would go to sleep remembering the golden city, and in the morning wake up feeling as if something beautiful had been taken from me, and that would make me angry.

I did not want this anger. I had seen other people who had become involved in the visitor experience consumed by anger, and not only at the visitors. They were also filled with rage at society's contempt for their plight and indifference to their suffering.

It struck me as a hopeless trap. What possible use could be made of an experience if one allowed it to invoke only rage?

I wanted very badly to make use of the presence of the visitors. What prevented me most was the feeling that they might be rising up from my own unconscious, coming like a poisonous, odorless gas to destroy my mind.

But something had transpired on April 1 that seemed to have been entirely real.

I had pushed it aside because it was also strange beyond words. Although it had been vividly real in every detail, I decided that it had to have come out of my imagination. Because of all the reading and research I was doing, I had developed a set of expectations about the visitors. What had happened on April 1 didn't fit those expectations, not at all. I even entertained the notion that my unconscious had played some sort of April Fool's joke on me.

Later, however, something happened that cast the whole event in a very new light. If any jokes were played on that night, they were played by the visitors themselves.

I discovered a small but telling piece of corroboration that forced me to reassess my assumptions about that event. I could no longer be certain that any part of the bizarre story I will tell emerged out of my own imagination.

Maybe, in a way, its extreme strangeness is an indication that these events really are the output of nonhuman beings. What happened on the night of April 1, 1986, was logical, sensible, and consistent. It delivered an important message that entirely revised my understanding of what was happening. The whole thing was also profoundly askew, totally different from the way a human mind would have delivered the same information.

But it worked.

Facing the fact that this was not a dream was very hard. Scientists who have speculated about what it would be like to interact with visitors have said that it would be strange beyond belief. Certainly this experience qualifies.

In late March I had been indulging myself in a fantasy that the visitors were going to impose a sort of benevolent empire in human affairs and gently lead us to a cleaner, happier, more just society. These fantasies had become quite elaborate.

On April 1 the visitors reacted.

What happened was wise and full of humor and teaching. But it was also frightening and I did not want to be frightened by the visitor experience. I wanted it to work—whatever it was. But there was this awful, creepy feeling I could not shake that it was just plain terrible.

I remembered waking up while walking along a curving corridor. I want to stress, to make it absolutely clear, that I did not “wake up” into some sort of dream. I woke up into an absolutely vivid, living, and physical moment—in a world as real as this, but far more strange than any dream.

It is important that I describe my physical sensation exactly. I did not feel the way I feel sitting in a chair or walking down a street. My body was tingling, as if some sort of energy were running through it. It was a marvelous sensation, and is one I still feel during some encounters. Pleasant as it is, though, when it is over I always have a sense of relief.

Nevertheless, I stumbled as I came to consciousness, because one does not expect to wake up out of a dead sleep in mid-stride. I found myself being led along by two dark-blue beings about three and a half to four feet tall. Each of them held one of my forefingers in his cool hand. They were noticeably strong, rather round or pudgy-looking, and wearing dark-blue coveralls that seemed to have lots of flaps and pockets on them. I was not dressed in the pajamas I had gone to sleep in, but rather in a flowing garment of what was obviously soft, white paper. It stood out from my body as though it carried a heavy charge of static electricity.

My condition at this point did not seem to approximate a dream at all. I was simply there, in the real world, and the real world was the curving corridor and the two dark-blue beings that were leading me along. They were really very, very blue. The color was doubly startling because it was a living hue, as rich with subtle complexity as the color of any flesh. I blurted out the first thought that popped into my mind: "You're blue!"

One of them looked back over his shoulder when I spoke. He had a broad, flat face that almost seemed to grimace at me, so wide was the mouth. He fluttered the heavy lids on his deep, shining eyes and said, "We used to be like your blacks but we decided this was better."

That face was as sinister as anything I had ever seen, and yet the feeling of twinkling good humor was so strong that I almost wanted to laugh.

I felt ridiculous. I've never thought of myself as a racist, but that comment brought into sharp focus my own unacknowledged attitudes about the differences between white and black people.

I had marched in the civil rights movement and have not from my earliest days been able to bear racism. But here I was in the presence of a statement so innocent and so powerful that, even as I stumbled along, it shocked me with all its guileless force. At that moment the reality of my unconscious racism surfaced. I felt it as acute embarrassment: In my secret mind even the two beings leading me along were less than me.

The one who had spoken turned again and groaned ruefully. The feeling I got when he did that made me terribly uneasy. My inner thoughts had communicated to them so quickly that they seemed almost to be participating in my mind. But they were completely separate from me, very much themselves.

When events become strange enough, the mind has no context, no terminology, in which to place them. Thought stops. One becomes inwardly silent, recording without comment.

When the Spanish conquistador Pizarro stood in the great Inca city of Cuzco before the assembled crowd of its citizens, the sophisticated and civilized Incas were similarly struck dumb. I suspect that they, also, were victims of strangeness too extreme for their minds to grasp.

I remember what I saw and did, though. I remember it exactly.

The corridor we were in was a neutral gray-tan in color and curved gracefully upward and around to the left. Along the inner wall were large drawers outlined in dark brown, with a round knob in the middle of each. These drawers were each about four feet long and perhaps eighteen inches high. Above them was a shelf a foot or so deep. At its highest point, right above my head, the arched ceiling was perhaps seven feet from the floor.

The most interesting thing about this rather austere corridor was that strong feelings seemed to be connected with it. I have not described a beautiful place, but that is only because it is hard to put into words how it affected me. There was something absolutely marvelous about the interplay of angles. The perfection of shape and line seemed to fulfill an obscure but intense inner hunger. It was as if not only the two beings but also their place were in some way conscious.

I was confused. The place seemed conscious? Was I actually inside some kind of creature?

I wonder if there could be a conscious machine?

During the same month—April 1986—another man had come face-to-face with a gigantic pulsating light in a woods near Pound Ridge, New York, which is within fifty miles of my cabin. At one point, he commented, “it seemed alive.” There has been much speculation that UFOs may in some way be living creatures. At that moment I would not have doubted it.

We turned and went through an arched door into a large room. This room was round and had louvered windows. It looked something like a round version of a regimental dining room from the days of the British Raj in India. All that was missing were ceiling fans with mahogany blades and turbaned servants carrying gin and tonics on heavy silver trays.

The room was instead filled with beings who were very far from black—or blue. They were, as a matter of fact, absolutely white, as white as sheets. Their skin had the milky translucency one associates with termites. They were all sitting at round tables, wearing uniforms whose design reminded me a little bit of British whites.

This was the first time I had seen the white beings. Later I would come to regard them with greatest awe, as the very engineers of transformation. Because I had never seen them mentioned before either in folklore or in UFO literature, I worried that they might be nothing more than the production of distorted perception.

On the night of March 3, 1988, I attended a meeting in Los Angeles of people who have had the visitor experience. To my surprise, one member of the group mentioned that the beings she had encountered were “translucent white” and powerfully transformative in impact. Like me, she also had trouble remembering their eyes. A few of the people who corresponded with me about Communion also described such beings, so I am not isolated in my perception of them.

As I approached them they radiated an overwhelming atmosphere of absolutely rigid formality—so strong that I involuntarily returned to my old military-school days and snapped to attention.

One of these white creatures took me by the hand. Some others, I noticed, were sitting disconsolately with squares of gauze over their eyes and chins. Only their mouths and the tips of their vestigial noses showed, and they seemed to be in pain.

Were they demonstrating what would happen to them if they tried to impose an empire on us?

I found myself led to the center of the room, where there was a small tan circle in the floor. I stood in this circle, where I was briefly addressed by what I took to be the leader of the group. His air was extremely formal, even more so than that of the others around me. He seemed full of anger and contempt. He also seemed made to rule.

He proceeded to ask me, in clipped tones, to explain why the British Empire had collapsed!

Despite my surprise I wanted to talk. I found that I had an enormous amount of information at my fingertips.

I talked. More, I lectured, my voice booming out in this almost preternaturally quiet place. I went through the various expansions and contractions of the empire, finally contending that by 1900 it had ceased to have even the appearance of an economic alliance and had become a system by which one race exploited many others. It was founded in assumptions of racial superiority which, while they may have been innocent, were so profound as to guarantee that intense separation pressure would follow any general improvement in the educational level and standard of living of its subject peoples.

They listened to this explanation with what seemed to me to be too much interest. They were so faultlessly attentive that I became embarrassed. But I ran on and on, spewing names and dates until I was feeling horribly awkward about the whole thing. My ego seemed enormous, and my eagerness to display my false erudition seemed the farcical posturing of a fool. Finally I could say no more and lapsed into silence. There was a moment of quiet, and then the room seemed to fill with excited thoughts. "Isn't he wonderful!" "How full of facts!" "How learned!" There was an ugly edge of irony to these thoughts—which I felt rather than heard—that was cold and hard and true. I stood there writhing inwardly. At last the two blue ones started beckoning from the doorway. My audience had ceased to display excessive enthusiasm and now communicated an atmosphere of cold indifference.

To say that I slunk out would not be accurate. One cannot slink in a long garment without getting tangled up in it. If I'd been normally dressed I think I might have crawled. That's how ashamed of myself I felt. My "empire" fantasies were worse than a joke; they represented dangerously weak thinking.

I was forced by my clothing to move like an arrogant prince—which made me feel even more like a toad. Carrying myself as best as I was able, I left the room. We were going down the curving corridor again when one of the blue beings looked up at me with his wide face. I saw it clearly this time, and it was really startlingly horrible. Awful! The eyes glittered as if they were shiny black membranes, with something moving behind them that made lumps and pits as it seethed within the eyeball. He smiled, showing the tips of his gray, spongy-looking teeth. His companion pulled open one of the drawers.

In that drawer were stacks of bodies like their own, all encased in what looked like cellophane. Their eyes were open, their mouths wide as if with surprise. I did not know what to make of it. The oddest thing was the way the drawer was opened with a prideful flourish. I was being shown something the two of them clearly thought was wonderful.

It was not until much later that I came to understand that they were beginning the long process of freeing me from fear of death. I think that they must normally exist in some other state of being and that they use bodies to enter our reality as we use scuba gear to penetrate the depths of the sea.

I suspect that we, also, are like this, but that we have somehow lost touch with our fundamental reality and become almost glued to the physical.

After seeing into the drawers my mind went black. I have no further memories from that night.

When I woke up the next morning, though, I remembered everything up to that point clearly—especially that white-paper garment I was wearing. I recalled vividly how it rustled as I moved, how it seemed to be full of some sort of static electricity that made it flare out around me as if I were whirling in a dance.

One afternoon I was reading E. S. Hartland's The Science of Fairy Tales when I was amazed to come across the following story.

A Welsh child, known as Little Gitto, disappeared for two full years. "One morning when his mother, who had long and bitterly mourned for him as dead, opened the door whom should she see sitting on the threshold but Gitto with a bundle under his arm. He was dressed and looked exactly as when she last saw him, for he had not grown a bit. 'Where have you been all this time?' asked his mother. 'Why it was only yesterday I went away,' he replied; and opening the bundle he showed her a garment the little children, as he called them, had given him for dancing with them. The garment was of white paper without seam. With maternal caution she put it into the fire."

I read that story a number of times, my perplexity and awe growing each time I did so.

A white-paper garment?

Is the dance of the fairy a grand production of thought, a state that can actually lift the participant out of time? Where had I really gone on that night? What had I really done? I would be the first to agree that my perceptions may not reflect the objective reality of the experience. Strangeness is a great distorter of perception, and these events were very strange indeed. I was beginning to suspect strongly that I went somewhere real and had been dressed just as I remembered being dressed. Information was transmitted to me that told me two things: first, that the visitors considered my ideas of a sort of interstellar empire silly and possibly dangerous; second, that their relationship to their bodies is not the same as ours.

The first piece of information enabled me to abandon a wasteful and ridiculous line of speculation. The second directed me for the first time toward a new idea, one that has proved to be of critical importance to the whole future of my work with the visitors.

In a very real and astonishing way they may have freed themselves from bondage to their bodies, and the rule of death.

And so could we.

If there was a chance that going deeper into my relationship with the visitors would also take me closer to understanding this, then there was no question about what I would do.

No matter the danger, no matter the fear that something might be working with infinite care and cunning to entice me, to steal me away from my own life, I would go.

FOUR

The Storm Gathers

On Saturday, April 5, 1987, we returned to the city. Outwardly I was normal, but inside myself I was tumbling through absolute darkness. I remembered those empty faces staring up at me as the small man pulled open the drawer.

What was going on? What did it mean?

I twisted and turned on the hook of ignorance. One day I would be full of courage and eagerness, and the next quivering in fear again. Because I was in such turmoil, I could never pause in that magic spot between the darkness and the light, the razor's edge of balance that would have brought me to terms with my experience.

It is one thing to leave a question open and another thing entirely to put the heart to rest.

I value my roles as father and husband more than any other aspect of myself. What I had seen happening to Andrew still worried me a lot. A psychologist had reassured us that he was fine, but one cannot know what is going on in another person's mind . . . or in his nights.

Above all, I did not want my little boy to be exposed to the spectacular suffering I had endured. I found myself awakening suddenly in the middle of the night and rushing into his bedroom. I would hold him in my arms and glare out at the sky as our ancestors must have glared into the dark from the old caves. I would hold my warm, limp, sleeping little boy and rage that I could not prevent the visitors from invading him. I cursed myself for infecting him and for bringing this grim level of uncertainty into Anne's life as well.

His child's nonchalance and her incredible bravery and good humor were much-needed examples to me. She was so graceful and calm and full of assurance. Despite the strangeness of it all, she seemed to know exactly what she was about. If ever a person has seemed to be prepared for something, it appeared to me that Anne was prepared to meet this experience. And Andrew was so innocent of it.

Denying the presence of the visitors, I thought, might be as foolish as jumping to conclusions about them. But how could one keep something so powerful and provocative in question? How could I stand before a conscious, living reality like this and say, "I don't know?"

A question can tear you apart. The hardest thing I have ever done is to keep the visitor experience in question. I have burned to throw myself on the mercy of blind science or belief, to lie to myself, to deny it all, to try to ignore it.

But I cannot; I am not good at lying to myself. In those hard days, I thought that the question would drive me mad.

In my worst moments I have always prayed, and I began to do that now.

Not only did I pray, I increased using the practices I had learned from the works of P. D. Ouspensky, most especially his book In Search of the Miraculous. Ouspensky argues that man is without real will because his attention is controlled not by his inner self but by the world around him. However, attention can be strengthened.

Ouspensky's ideas offered a hint of possible power from within, and I had worked with them for so long—almost half of my life—that they seemed the very thing with which to meet the incredible force of the visitors.

I redoubled my efforts, emptying my mind and feeling the substance of myself as a part of the wider world, working on keeping my attention divided between outer life and deep inner sensation.

Any power I might have over the visitor experience seemed to me to depend upon the strength of my attention, and the control I could exert over it.

Increasingly I felt as if I were entering a struggle that might be even more than life-or-death. It might be a struggle for my soul, my essence, or whatever part of me might have reference to the eternal.

There are worse things than death, I suspected. And I was beginning to get the distinct impression that one of them had taken an interest in me.

So far the word demon had never been spoken among the scientists and doctors who were working with me. And why should it have been? We were beyond such things. We were a group of atheists and agnostics, far too sophisticated to be concerned with such archaic ideas as demons and angels.

Alone at night I worried about the legendary cunning of demons. Why was my family so sanguine?

At the very least, I was going stark, raving mad. But neither of them worried. I would watch them, alert for some sign of trouble. At night I would listen for the slightest sound—of visitor or of nightmare.

Also in the night I wondered about the motives that might have brought the visitors here, and the discipline that keeps them to a secret plan of which we sense only the broadest outline.

What I could not really grasp was the true strangeness of what was happening to me. It had a very definite structure, but in April 1986 all was still in confusion for me. I was working under the assumption that the visitors were recent arrivals from another planet. But my exchanges with them didn't make sense in the context of this idea. Fortunately I came across Jacques Vallee's book Passport to Magonia, which provided me with the idea that the core visitor experience has been taking place at least for many hundreds of years and possibly throughout history.

Anne brought an idea at this point that has seemed to me to be fundamentally clarifying. She began talking of the subjective nature of the experience, and how it appears to flow from an objective reality, but is changed by the filter of our perceptions. Our ability to see and understand is literally distorted by the expectations that our cultures impose on us. More than that, the visitors appeared to her to be using our distorted perceptions as a vehicle through which they could transmit messages of importance to the inner growth of the individual participant.

It may well be that modern concepts about the nature of the visitors—when they are finally and completely formed—will be closer to reality than those of the past. But we must not allow the question to escape us, since there may always be much that we don't understand.

At the moment, there is a great deal that is very enigmatic indeed. For example, one researcher, Leonard Keane, may have decoded the "star language" sometimes uttered under hypnosis by people who have had encounters. He has written a strikingly original and as yet unpublished manuscript—Keltic Factor Red—on the large number of visitor encounters reported by people of Celtic background.

He found that the alien words repeated under hypnosis by a famous participant, Betty Andreasson, were probably Gaelic. Far from being a language from the beyond, Gaelic is the tongue of ancient Ireland. It is still spoken by a few people in that country, but there is no evidence that Betty has ever been exposed to it. She is of Finnish/English origin.

The speaking of an unknown language under hypnosis is called xenoglossy and can usually be attributed to unconscious learning of that language sometime in the speaker's past. Gaelic, however, is a singularly unlikely choice of language for Betty, and the question of how it came into her mind remains unanswered.

At one point during her hypnosis about her extraordinary encounter with a visitor she called Quazga, she was repeating word-for-word statements she was hearing from the visitors while the session was taking place—a channeling experience, except that the channel sounded to her like a radio in her head. Suddenly there was an interruption, and she heard a repeated statement in English along the lines of "base 32—base 32—signal base 32." There followed a couple of statements in the strange alien language. Mr. Keane has tentatively translated these as “sound of a foolish talker,” and “unfruitful projection.” He also discovered that the hypnosis session was taking place next door to a bus depot that had a powerful radio transmitter. He speculates that radio actually was in use, and that transmissions from the bus dispatcher were interrupting intrusions into Mrs. Andreasson’s mind—which themselves were nothing more than sophisticated radio transmissions.

Before the interruption, Mrs. Andreasson had repeated about a paragraph in the star language. Mr. Keane found that a phonetic rendering of her words corresponded almost exactly to their Gaelic equivalent. Reading the text and listening to the tape, it is very hard to conclude that the language is anything other than Gaelic. And the translation is haunting. “The living descendants of the Northern peoples are groping in universal darkness. Their mother mourns. A dark occasion forebodes when weakness in high places will revive a high cost of living; an interval of mistakes in high places; an interval fit for distressing events.”

The phonetic parallels between Mrs. Andreasson’s words and their Gaelic equivalents are too close to dismiss. There is a virtual one-for-one correspondence. This is clearly demonstrated in the appendix on Gaelic at the end of this book. Additionally, Mr. Keane discovered that not only the name of the visitor who became involved with Mrs. Andreasson but the names given to many other participants by the visitors were translatable Gaelic.

Quaazga, the name of the being Mrs. Andreasson encountered, corresponds phonetically to the Gaelic Caesadh, which means “of the cross.” This could be a reference to the patron saint of the Scots, St. Andrew, whose X-shaped cross is a very ancient symbol of man and is now the national symbol of Scotland. It could also refer, of course, to Christ. Betty is a deeply Christian person, and her encounter with the visitors contained much striking imagery that seems related to the Christian idea of rebirth. The fact that a visitor approaching a Christian and providing a deeply Christian experience to that person would have a name translatable from an obscure language as "of the cross" is nothing less than astonishing to me.

Another name with a Gaelic equivalent is Linn-Erri, which was claimed by a beautiful blond woman who allegedly communicated with an amateur radio operator in 1961. This name renders to Lionmhaireacht, which is pronounced "lin-errich." It means "abundance."

Another name heard by a participant, Korendor, may translate to Cor-Endor, which means "castle," "circle," or "mound of Endor," which was a place of oracle.

An entity named Aura Rhanes appeared to a participant in 1952. This name becomes Aerach Reann in Gaelic and translates roughly as "heavenly body of air."

Even the highly controversial George Adamski case has a strange Gaelic connection. One of the beings Adamski allegedly met was named FirKon. Fir or fear when used as a prefix means "man," and Conn, meaning "Head," is the name of a seventh-century Irish king whose son, tradition tells us, was abducted by a beautiful lady in a flying craft. FirKon means, in Gaelic, "man of Conn."

One day, as Conn and his son stood on the heights of Usna, a strangely dressed young woman came toward them. She said, "I come from the Plains of the Ever Living, where there is neither death nor sin." The father was astonished because he couldn't see or hear anybody. She then spoke to him directly, and he did hear. She told him that she was in love with the boy and wanted to take him away to Moy Mell, the Plain of Pleasure. After a month of waiting and a bit of ineffectual hanky-panky on the part of the king's resident Druid, the young man was taken, sailing off above the sea in a "crystal curragh." He was never seen again . . . until, apparently, he returned a thousand years later and announced himself to a man who knew nothing whatsoever of Gaelic or of the possible origin of the name Fir Kon!

Mr. Keane's findings about Gaelic imply that there is something going on here that we plainly do not understand. It almost begins to seem as if what we are witnessing now is the discovery of an age-old relationship between ourselves and something that has always been completely misunderstood.

I would not deny the likelihood that extraterrestrials are involved in the phenomenon, but I think it has dimensions that are just beginning to be recognized, that resonate through all human cultures and have been expressed in folklore in many different ways.

A particularly frightening aspect of the problem uncovered by abduction researchers within the UFO community is that the visitors appear to be carrying out long-term genetic manipulation of humankind.

According to the theory, the visitors often steal semen from men and ova from women, and have been known to display misshapen offspring to the horrified mothers after the infants have matured. Miscarriages at the end of the first trimester seem also sometimes to happen in the context of visitor contact.

Someone close to me might have endured this very experience, so I cannot discount it. In any case, the witness reports are too extensive to ignore.

Lest we sneer at this scenario, assuming it to be the inevitable outcome of fearful UFO researchers imposing a narrative on witnesses they have hypnotized, I would add that the stealing of infants by the "wee folk" and copulation with incubi and succubi are constant features of fairy lore from all over the world.

I recently received a letter from a witness who reported that her two-year-old had recognized the face on the cover of Communion and announced, "He's bad!" The child said that the "man" took his toys and never gave them back. In addition to other visitor experiences, this correspondent reported that "there have been many missing toys in this house!"

One wonders why the visitors would steal human toys, if the idea that they are engaged in human-related breeding activities is so far-fetched.

That this particular aspect of the experience reflects the whole truth, however, is unlikely. There is far more to this experience than meets the eye.

I had a doctor construct a hypothetical abduction. Among his most interesting findings was that, using present medical technology, we could abduct our victims, extract blood, genetic material, semen, or practically anything else that is reported as being taken, and return the individual to his bed without leaving a single noticeable injury or painful wound. And we could do this with the person so profoundly drugged that he or she would have no memory of it at all, not even under hypnosis.

What's more, only a few thousand individuals would be needed to obtain a detailed statistical portrait of, for example, the entire United States population.

We could do this using small four-and five-man ships for the close approach. They would be unlit, radar-invisible, and nearly silent, emerging from motherships that would be left far out in space.

The whole operation could be accomplished in at most a few months, and would include a detailed reading of the local culture into the bargain, via interception of radio and television communications and photography of the whole planet, with the images resolved to the square centimeter.

All we really lack to accomplish this sort of study is the secret of quick and easy space travel.

The visitors have not carried out a scientific study, not as we understand it, though they seem to have involved hundreds of thousands of people in the United States alone. They have appeared at times in craft thousands of feet in diameter, lit up like Mardi Gras floats. Their instruments of "examination" tend to be huge and obtrusive, and the examinations themselves to be—as was true in my case—so outrageous that they are not only easy to remember, they are impossible to forget. And when fear buries them in amnesia, they can easily be accessed through hypnosis.

Despite their apparent desire for the experiences to be remembered, the visitors speak in riddles or use ancient human languages which, when translated, make their origins and purposes seem, if anything, even more obscure.

The things that had happened on April 1 and 2 left me facing this dilemma. I knew that something was being done to me and my boy—but what? I had to know! I couldn't live in ignorance like this.

I thought to myself, At least this can't get any worse.

Then came a visit to Boulder, Colorado, and an experience of shocking power. It left me feeling that the whole human family, not only Whitley and Anne and Andrew, was embarked upon a journey in a frail vessel in rough waters in the dead of the night, and the wind was beginning to rise.

FIVE

Lightning

On April 6, 1986, I flew to the World Affairs Conference at the University of Colorado in Boulder.

As I sat alone in the plane, I reflected on recent events. I realized that I was really very deeply afraid. I just couldn't help it. I was so at sea, had so few answers, and yet something was pushing me to keep challenging the visitors. I no longer wanted them to go away. Far from it, I wanted a confrontation.

I was beginning to act and think as if they were entirely real. This seemed sensible to me. If one suspects that there may be a panther in the woods, one does not act as if all were well. Just to be prudent, one accepts the possibility of the panther. More than that, I was going on the assumption that they might not be all bad or all good. If they were real, I could not help but think that they just might be at least as complex as human beings. I tried to avoid letting myself be influenced by science-fictional notions of aliens—good or bad.

The journey to Boulder was important for me. I intended for the first time to attempt to expose my stories of the visitors to respected scientists and members of the academic community.

I also intended to begin a more intensive period of inner work with an old friend, Dora Ruffner, who had for years shared my interest in the ideas of P. D. Ouspensky and Georges Gurdjieff. We had been involved with the Gurdjieff Foundation in New York, and had both left at the same time. She had also continued her quest for greater consciousness, searching in some fascinating directions. Her understanding of the ancient nature religions and shamanism held new interest for me.

There was a specific reason for this. I have many fragmentary memories of the visitors. One of them involved my sitting at a table and solving an anagram. This seems to have happened when I was a child. The anagram made the statement "We work by ancient laws." Anne was especially taken with this. She felt, if it was true, it was potentially the most revealing piece of information we had acquired.

I have for years had the feeling that the abandonment of the ideas behind our early nature religions was the outcome of the loss of a clear, unified, and true understanding of the universe. I think that ancient man, living closer to both the beauty and the brutality of nature, was in some ways better equipped to see reality. All that is left of his knowledge are the shattered remains of the old religions.

An example of this is Halloween. Nowadays we celebrate this ancient festival by letting mayhem loose in the streets and gorging our children on candy. Nobody remembers that the lost and denied world of the spirit once drew close to us in this season, fluttering the bonfires of the night and reminding us of both our mortality and our greatness.

I wondered if the shamanic language of symbol and myth would offer a better insight into the visitors' motives. Dora was conversant in this language on a deep, almost visceral level and I was eager to hear her ideas.

As I drove into Boulder from the Denver airport for the first time, I was struck by how the compact little city clings to the foothills of the Rockies, a tiny human incursion into that wild upsurging of the earth. Our lights and buzzing machines were trivialized by the tall silence of the mountains and the sky.

For me the World Affairs Conference was a week of radically new impressions and experiences. It annually brings together hundreds of academics, authors, artists, journalists, and scientists in rough concert, the whole affair concocted by a spectacular Rocky Mountain iconoclast named Howard Higman, who smiles over his gaggle like a mordacious old moon.

The World Affairs Conference is the kind of institution that could only have been developed in the United States, and specifically in the West. It is open, hospitable, informal—and fierce. I could understand that it would be a congenial place for the co-author of Warday and Nature's End, but would it welcome a writer who had endured experiences as spectacularly odd as those I had to relate?

The Condon Report, which successfully discredited UFO research in established scientific circles, had been created at the University of Colorado. It remained one of the high fortresses of scientific conservatism, or so I imagined.

I was extremely uneasy about going to a conference at a place that was a virtual shrine to belief in the established order of things. I visualized professors in three-piece suits poking me in the chest with long, bony fingers and accusing me of degrading the intellectual content of the culture.

The conference, however, was not like that. Had I dared to talk, it would have opened its mind to me—which it did the next year, after the publication of Communion had spilled my secret.

The World Affairs Conference is a rarity in that it cherishes openness of mind and has a flair for drama. It is certainly among the best intellectual conferences in the world, unique for its eclecticism and singular freedom from prejudice.

So frightened was I that the conference would spit me out if I mentioned the visitors, that I just couldn't bring myself to do it.

I did experiment a little. I opened the subject with an astronaut who was in attendance. He managed to be polite, but I realized that he was in a hopeless position. He could not possibly maintain his credibility with the planetary-sciences community if he showed a whisper of interest in what happened to me, even if such a whisper was there.

Author Mark Kramer, who is a very careful and rigorous intellectual and a true gentleman, listened with interest. When he began to perceive that what I was telling him suggested that revision of our fundamental understanding of the world would be in order were the visitors found to be external to us, he began to feel strongly that my perceptions had to be seated in the mind. He remained concerned and friendly, although there were people at the conference who were more comfortable with the problems my story presented.

Dr. John Gliedman's training as a psychologist enabled him to view my recitation of experiences with detachment and good humor.

National Public Radio reporter Margot Adler initially found the darker implications of my story deeply disturbing, which created a strain in our friendship. Hers was the first reaction I encountered that proceeded from the notion that some psychic influences might be good and others just plain evil. It would not be the last.

I found it almost impossible to deal with this notion. The impact of the visitors was so strong in my life that the idea that they might be evil was too much for me to bear. And yet, when I thought of the way they looked and what they had done, I could not dismiss it. I was frightened that they might be nothing more than the ugly, cold, inhumane monsters they seemed.

My responses to the visitors were always visceral. I would wake up and glare into the night like an uneasy animal. I would vacillate between dread and longing . . . usually longing for them during the day and dreading them at night.

Never, in those bleak April days, could I have imagined the subtlety of the plan that they were carrying out. Nor could I have seen the magnificent brilliance of the mind behind it.

My instinct to seek out Dora Ruffner proved useful, for it was she who pointed out that what was happening to me could be taken to be initiatory in nature, a journey into the darkness where the secrets of the spirit are kept. This journey is among the most ancient of human spiritual traditions. Whether or not taking me on it was a motive of the visitors,

I could still make use of what they were doing to explore the depths of my own soul.

I sweated in Boulder, facing the conferees during the day and thoughts of the visitors when darkness came.

On the night of April 9, Dora and I meditated together for about an hour, and the experience was a very powerful one for me. I had a most vivid impression of her as a living, acutely conscious mind.

Earlier that evening John Gliedman, Mark Kramer, and I—who had been having a lot of fun spooking ourselves with wild visitor theories—had left a party to find that the sky seemed to be glowing with a sort of magenta iridescence. We were quite taken by this phenomenon, as it seemed auroral in origin but was emanating from the south.

We were also uneasy and laughing much too hard about everything.

Thus, after the long conversations about mind control and visitors capable of lodging themselves in the unconscious, the strange lights in the sky, and the powerful meditation with Dora, I could certainly be forgiven a spectacular dream.

If what happened was indeed a dream, then it was a dramatic departure from every other dreaming experience I have ever had. I do not even want to call it a dream but a vision, a radical grasping of light. And that, still, feels less than true. What seems true is that some immense thing drew close to me and somehow placed thoughts in my mind via the medium of huge lights shining down from the sky.

That is what seems true. I wish that I could assert it, offer some final proof. But I cannot. I must thus present my experience in the crippled context of dream, though I do not believe that is what it was.

I went to sleep at the Boulderado Hotel at about midnight. At two-thirty I was awakened by a glow in the room. I opened my eyes and to my amazement saw huge search-light beams playing down across the small view from my window.

I started to go to the window, but before I reached it there was a terrific crack of thunder. That explained it: I'd been awakened by a thunderstorm. My sleep-heavy mind had transformed lightning flashes into searchlight beams probing from some eerie vessel of heaven.

I stood in the middle of the room watching and listening, wishing that I could get up the nerve to go to the window. One of the beams swept past right outside, bathing everything in blue light. It came back again, and for a moment the light itself seemed like a living, conscious thing. I had the sensation that it was using my eyes to gain entrance to my mind.

The next moment I felt a powerful need to lie down. Storm or not, I fell back on the bed and sank instantly into a state of apparent sleep. And a drama began to play itself out in my mind.

I was aware that what I was observing had a very unusual texture. It was not as steady as life, but seemed more real. Colors, sounds, all were heightened. It is hard to describe the effect, except to say that by comparison my ordinary waking perception seemed like clouded water.

The experience transported me to a marshy place that had a large, wide, flat complex of buildings associated with it. I was aware that these buildings were some sort of nuclear installation. I came closer to a large, flat building. There were thick masses of pipes running along the wall. My vision was so restricted that I couldn't tell where I was, whether indoors or out.

Suddenly a big pipe fell apart and a great deal of water gushed out. Moments later the whole place started to explode.

"Stop," I screamed. "Somebody, make it stop!" Smoke burst out of the burning building and began to rise in a stately, dangerous column. There were screams and moans. A tall, blond man explained things to me that I could barely hear, then jumped into an ancient black sedan and went roaring off toward the burning plant.

The next thing I knew I appeared to be in my own cabin in upstate New York. I had just been awakened by a loud crashing. I sat up in bed, confused. What was that noise? It came again, a great, cracking report from down in the woods.

This was followed by silence. I looked out the window.

It was a peaceful, moonlit night. For a moment I thought that everything was all right. Then there was a flash, followed by a huge crash and the swish of a falling tree. I looked up at the sky and saw gigantic boulders sailing in perfect silence off the edge of the moon. A realization came over me: The moon is exploding. Then I thought, Oh, this is the end of the world.

It was so shocking and unexpected that it would come this way—not by atomic war or environmental collapse or any of the things I had feared, but rather in this distant, mechanical manner. We were not to be victims of ourselves or even of some earthly catastrophe, but rather of a secret imbalance of the spheres.

In my dream I took Anne and Andrew to a certain place I know in the forest. We hugged each other as the crashes got louder and the flashes of moon-generated meteors got brighter, and I sang the Malvina Reynolds song “Morningtown Ride.” For us this was how the world ended. And so did the vision.

The next morning I woke up to streets silvered by rain and air cleaned to glass by a predawn thunderstorm. At first I wanted to believe that the thunderstorm had simply touched off a vivid nightmare.

But that wasn’t the answer, and I knew it perfectly well. I remembered what I had seen.

I went through the day of conference activities like a zombie, participating but not really there. Again and again I saw those enormous boulders sailing over the rim of the moon, flickering as they tumbled through space. To have been seen, they would have been huge—miles across. A rain of such things would cause incredible damage. The explosion of the moon would end the world, no question about it.

And that was only the second part of the experience. The first part seemed to involve an exploding nuclear plant of some kind. There was no familiar concrete reactor containment, though. Maybe it was a government bomb facility, I thought. There is a large and notorious federal facility at Rocky Flats, but pictures of the buildings there looked nothing like the ones in my dream.

The vision was so intense and had shaken me so badly that I related it in detail to Dr. Gliedman that same day, April 10.

I could not imagine what the first part of it meant, and finally decided that it must have to do with my fear of another nuclear catastrophe along the lines of Three-Mile Island.

As for the second part of the episode, I was less confused. I presumed that what had happened was that my mind had decided that the visitor experience amounted to an inner change so drastic as to be a sort of apocalypse.

Contact with the visitors is almost universally associated with catastrophic predictions. People are told of impending wars, of earthquakes, of meteors directed toward the earth, of polar shifts and the coming of new ages of ice or heat. I myself had been shown graphic depictions of the death of the atmosphere, not to mention the entire planet simply exploding.

Whenever a fundamental change of mind takes place—and I think that this is happening now—there is a great increase in catastrophic fear. The world of ancient Rome was filled with portents of the end. As people became exposed to the revolutionary ideas of Christianity, they began to feel that the end of their social order was near. This translated into fear that the world was physically coming to an end. Early Christians, like some modern UFO cultists, expected the end of the world momentarily.

The Roman world did end, but it was not destroyed by a natural catastrophe. What overthrew Rome was a catastrophe of mind. The rise of Christianity so altered the Roman spirit that the classical world collapsed. Roman government and science were buried, and it took the West a thousand years to reconstruct what was lost.

It is possible that many of our catastrophic fears are related to one of two levels of deep change that we already sense on an instinctive level. The first level is the reality of the visitors themselves. The appearance of a nonhuman intelligence would potentially be even more devastating to established world views than Christianity was to Rome. The second level is the message that the visitors could be bringing.

Thus there really is very little possibility that “nothing” is happening. Something is—something great. And one of the ways the human mind has of announcing this is with an array of warnings about disasters in the physical world.

Most of these predictions undoubtedly reflect the inner apocalypse related to our current change of mind. But is that true of all of them? Are there any apocalyptic prophecies that make sense?

While there is no way to verify or even speculate about most of them, there are a few that deserve closer consideration. It is obvious that the warnings I reported in Communion about the atmosphere are a serious business. But I should point out that the problem was known to science and to me—at least in general terms—before I had the visitor experience, so its mention in Communion cannot be classed as a pure prediction. Nevertheless, it is indisputable that I realized the seriousness of the ozone crisis long before most others. As I reported in Communion, my realization was based on a strange image that had entered my mind of a tremendously complicated map of the earth’s atmosphere. While I did not fully understand it, its mere presence in my mind suggested dire things to me. Like the image of the golden city, it was vividly real. I have not been able to find any reference in medical literature to a similar state, except perhaps as a description of photographic, or eidetic, memory. But what was I remembering? I had never seen such a map before, with layers and layers of colors moving and bleeding into one another. I could not imagine how a mind could sustain something so complex and so detailed for days and days.

Because of the map, I have followed the story of the deterioration of our atmosphere with great care. On January 1, 1988, The New York Times reported that the thinning of the ozone layer worldwide was far greater than expected. When the declines will let in enough ultraviolet light to cause destruction of crops on a wide scale and suppression of animal and human immune systems is unknown, but both of these effects are associated with ultraviolet overdose.

Another surprisingly credible prediction came to me from a very unexpected source. Some months after the Boulder conference, I was given, by an individual associated with the hierarchy of the Catholic Church, the alleged contents of a letter opened by Pope John XXIII in 1960 that contained a final prediction from Our Lady of Fatima. The world has speculated for years about that letter. When it was opened the intention was to make the contents public. But cardinals were seen leaving the pope's office with "stricken" expressions on their faces afterward, and the wording of the letter has remained a closely guarded secret. The Church has recently denied that the letter existed!

The Lady, believed by Catholics to be the Blessed Virgin, appeared in 1917 in Fatima, Portugal, to three children. Over a period of months this developed into the best-documented miraculous apparition in history, its spectacular culmination being witnessed by thousands of people, and causing strange auroral effects over a wide area. These effects were seen even by people who were not in the crowd that perceived the main event, which was the appearance of a massive disk that was taken to be the sun dancing in the sky.

The Fatima events were extensively witnessed and documented, and their reality cannot be denied except by an irrational refusal to face the unknown. The cause of those events is, however, a mystery. The Church concluded that the vision of a lady seen by the three children was the Blessed Virgin Mary.

She never called herself the Blessed Virgin, but she described herself as coming "from Heaven." One is reminded of the beautiful maiden who came to the son of the ancient Irish Conn and said that she was from "the Plains of Pleasure." Like that apparition, the Lady of Fatima could only be seen by the witnesses to whom she directed her attention.

But other witnesses saw many manifestations surrounding her appearance. On September 13 thousands of people observed a globe of light coming down the valley to the place of the apparition, the Cova de Ira. As had been seen a month earlier, a white cloud formed and white "petals" began to fall from the sky. They evaporated as they reached the ground.

On October 13 seventy thousand people witnessed a brilliant silver disk appearing out of the sun, turning on its own axis and casting beams of colored light in every direction. Shafts of red light colored the clouds, the earth, the trees, and the people. Then there were shafts of violet, yellow, and other colors. These shafts appeared to be sectored, as though the disk were revolving. The disk rushed toward the crowd in a zigzag motion that is typical of modern UFOs. Auroral effects were seen as far as thirty miles from the site of the miracle, even by skeptics and outright scoffers, so it would be very hard to maintain that the manifestations did not have some sort of objective source. Two witnesses who observed the disk through binoculars reported seeing a ladder with beings on it.

According to my information, the last of the Fatima predictions involves, among other things, an inundation of coastal areas of the earth, taking place between 1994 and 1997. This is actually a much more serious contender than most of the catastrophic predictions, and it is additionally backed by the fact that another Fatima prediction was confirmed.

On July 13, 1917, the Lady said, "When you shall see a night illuminated by an unknown light, know that it is the great sign that God gives you that He is going to punish the world for its crimes by means of war. . . ." This remark was first revealed in 1927.

On January 25, 1938 (according to The New York Times of the next morning), there was indeed a peculiar auroral effect over most of Europe, sufficiently strange to cause considerable comment in the press at the time. The Times reported that "the people of London watched two magnificent arcs rising in the east and west, from which radiated pulsating beams like searchlights in dark red, greenish blue and purple." According to scientists, a similarly intense auroral effect had not been seen in Europe since 1709. And the 1938 event was and remains unique for its colors and the general structure of the display. There is no doubt that it was an auroral phenomenon, however, since a large explosion had been recorded on the sun some days earlier and there was a magnetic storm in progress at the time.

Three months later Germany annexed Austria, beginning the direct series of events that led to World War II.

It is a matter of scientific fact that the oceans are rising. This is because a long-term atmospheric warming trend is causing less ice to form, and causing polar ice to decline generally. About twenty thousand cubic miles of polar ice have melted in the past forty years, according to scientists, although there remain questions about whether this is directly related to the buildup of atmospheric gases from the burning of coal and oil.

It should be remembered that the earth has spent more than 80 percent of its total geologic history without polar caps. Geologically, it is a warmer planet than it has been during the entire history of mankind. Man's pouring of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere has intensified a warming trend that was probably already present in nature.

Could it be that the warming trend will proceed so dramatically that there will be a disastrous polar melt before the end of the century? I couldn't find a single scientist who thought that this was even remotely possible. The consensus was, "Give us another couple of hundred years before you need a canoe to navigate lower Manhattan."

However, I wonder if such confidence may not be misplaced.

In November 1987 an iceberg twice the size of Rhode Island broke off the Ross Ice Shelf, suggesting that it is indeed far more unstable than scientific observers understand. This was only one of a series of events in what The Times on February 9, 1988, called "an extraordinary two years of glacial breakup." Should this continue, it will not be long before substantial imbalances in the ice pack could result.

In July 1987 the Caribbean Sea heated up to as much as two degrees above normal, causing extensive bleaching of corals. The corals were not killed, but the heating was very, very unusual and cannot be explained as a normal natural phenomenon.

While there are no statistics on overall ocean temperatures, the combination of the appearance of such huge icebergs in the Antarctic and the heating of the Caribbean suggests that general heating may be under way, and that neither its mechanism nor its overall strength is known. Science was surprised by both events.

If one of the Antarctic ice shelves were to slip into the sea, a substantial problem would be created, and inundations could certainly be one result. Three things are clear: First, some unpredicted and unexpected warming events are taking place; second, nobody knows their consequences; third, science is not prepared to deal with them, given the present state of knowledge.

If the deeply Catholic children who transmitted her message understood it correctly, the Lady of Fatima counseled prayer as the antidote to the disasters she foretold.

On April 25, 1986, Chernobyl exploded. At once I related this disaster to the first part of my April 9 dream. I called Dr. Gliedman and discussed it with him again. Either the dream was a coincidence or it was indeed precognitive. What was most worrisome was that if it was precognitive, then what about the second part? Did the Chernobyl disaster mean my dream was also predicting that the moon was going to explode?

Was this the one "true" catastrophe? Or were we about to enter a whole era of upheaval?

I was relieved when I saw the first television footage of Chernobyl: It looked nothing like the plant I had dreamed about. Then I found that those early pictures had been of another, similarly designed nuclear-power plant in Italy. When I saw Chernobyl I realized that I had indeed had a precognitive vision.

I became frightened by what was transpiring. If the first part of the vision was true, then what of the second?

I have read enough about the geology of the moon to know that it is almost totally lacking in volcanic potential. The moon is exactly what it seems to be—a cold hunk of stone. There have been sporadic reports of very low-scale activity at the bottoms of a few craters, nothing more than flashes of light related to discharges of gas. But there is absolutely no indication that even the remotest possibility exists that the moon might experience a volcanic eruption, let alone an explosion so violent that it would cause debris to impact the earth.

I asked some planetologists what would happen if the moon did explode. The general feeling was that it would be a terminal catastrophe. Not only would the earth be showered with debris, its orbit would also be altered—not a lot, but enough to cause severe shifts in climate. The absence of the moon would have a multitude of effects, ranging from a reduction in air circulation to the confusion of tides and ocean currents. Marine life, weather, growing patterns of plants, all would be affected negatively by the destruction of the moon. According to an article in the Journal of Petroleum Geology, it is possible that the moon is responsible for the creation of the earth's magnetic field, which it generates by causing tidal friction within the core of the earth. If the magnetic field should disappear, life on earth would then be exposed to substantially greater solar radiation. Earthly life may be dependent on the gentle tug from her sister planet.

To blow up the moon, however, would take enormous force. It would take ten thousand million hundred megaton bombs just to deflect it from its orbit. This is an almost inconceivable amount of energy, certainly more than mankind possesses, ever has possessed, or will possess in the foreseeable future. Unless somebody unpleasant has a really big bomb or there is something about the moon we've overlooked, it isn't going to explode.

So the second part of my dream was yet another apocalyptic fear, to be added to the "earth-exploding" image that came to me during hypnosis concerning my visitor experience of October 4, 1985. In that scenario I saw the earth explode violently, for no apparent reason. I will never forget the great columns of smoke spurting out from the planet, as if it were extending claws into space.

Still, there could be a physical event behind these visions. Taken together, the two of them could predict a very different sort of catastrophe, but one with similar effects. They could, for example, be a reflection of the destruction caused to both the earth and the moon by the impact of a cloud of debris or even a large asteroid.

It should be noted that on August 16, 1987, Reuters ran a wire-service story that was not generally picked up by news media. It is worth repeating here. Soviet scientist Alexander Voytsekhovskiy said that the asteroid known as 1983TV, discovered in 1983, would collide with the earth in 2115, 127 years from now. The only way that the planet will survive such a blow would be for us to deflect the asteroid or demolish it.

The Russian scientist attributed the discovery of the problem to British scientists, but I was unable to identify them, and my letter to the Russian was not answered. I cannot confirm the accuracy of this story. For all I know, it may even have been a hoax perpetrated on the occasion of the 1987 Harmonic Convergence, which took place on August 16.

There are many other possible meanings that attach to the idea of the moon exploding. In some systems of thought, such as that of G. I. Gurdjieff, the moon is a symbol of the farthest end of creation. Sleeping souls are described as being "food for the moon," meaning that their fate will be to go the way of nature rather than springing free at death from its cycles. The moon is also a symbol of dreaming and hypnosis, of the force of confusion that holds men in bondage. The moon has been associated with sleep, dreaming, and unconsciousness.

My vision of an explosion of the moon then becomes an expression of a revolutionary new potential. It could suggest that the destruction of the "moon" within us will enable us at last to see reality clearly.

Older ideas of the moon place her as the Mother Goddess. It is not known how completely life depends upon tidal forces, but it has been speculated that life as we know it could not exist without lunar influence. This would indeed make the moon a sort of cosmic "mother." The Egyptians identified the moon with Thoth, the awakener of sleeping minds, and it is the face of Thoth that has given the West the notion of the "man in the moon." Plutarch wrote a fascinating essay, "On the Face of the Moon," in which the Good are supposed to inhabit the realm of the moon, but to present a terrifying appearance to all who approach them, lest searchers see the real beauty of the place and be tempted to suicide in order to reach heaven more quickly.

It is impossible to conclude even from all this that the visitors are warning about the fate and future of the earth. I do think, however, that the warnings I have received about the atmosphere and the possible prediction of inundation should be heeded, if only because they appear to be coming true.

It could be that my vision of the moon exploding was about a change of being so profound that it will at once wake man up from his ages-long hypnosis and at the same time eject him from the mothering womb of the earth-moon planetary system.

The coming of cosmic visitors would be such an event.

The World Affairs Conference ended and I flew back to New York. After a couple of days in the city I returned gratefully home to our cabin. I would sit on the deck watching the old moon rolling through the sky. I could understand the Elizabethan idea of the music of the spheres, the melody of nights and days.

I thought of classical Rome ending and reflected that our world, also, is ending. The moment that the first atomic bomb sailed down the air toward the teeming streets of Hiroshima, the world view of modern man began to disintegrate. We cannot have faith in societies and institutions that threaten us with species suicide.

We are silent, unconscious rebels. The mind-set that unleashed that bomb is about to be replaced by something new, a warmer, more intuitive, more free mind, one that will soar as the eagle soars above the fears of our days, escaping at last from the ashes of the careworn past.

But will it soar over real ashes, also?

Mankind suffers from low self-esteem. We tend to think of ourselves as failures. Sometimes doomsaying is done with such relish that one senses the Jeremiahs of apocalypse are hoping the end will come.

I cannot accept such notions. There persists in me the hope and expectation that we will prevail, and that one day a healthy human species will live in balance with the world that created us.

But it is likely to be a near thing.

The White Angel

Spring passed swiftly, growing toward the long, warm summer of 1986. Communion had been rejected by my current publisher and was being sent from house to house, gaining in the process a number of absolutely contemptuous rejections. I was feeling pretty low, beginning to think I'd written a worthwhile book that was too heretical to be published.

In the last week of May, Anne went to Dallas to see some friends. Andrew and I would be bachelors for seven days.

On Friday, May 30, we felt compelled to go to the cabin even though we'd planned to stay in the city for the weekend. When he got home from school Andrew told me that he was desperate to go upstate but he didn't know why. I wanted to say no, because I knew already that the visitors could induce people to come to isolated spots. There were cases of whole groups of people being drawn to certain roadsides or even out into fields at night.

But I kept seeing an image of the cabin in my mind, kept imagining its peace and the fun of renting an old movie and watching it while we shared a bowl of popcorn.

I didn't want to risk a repeat of April 2, when the visitors may have taken my boy. But we both wanted badly to go to the cabin.

We set out—only to find that the traffic was close to impossible. An hour after we left the house we were still in Greenwich Village, and there seemed almost no hope of even reaching the Lincoln Tunnel.

We decided to turn back and spend the weekend going to museums and movies. We were on our way back to the garage when we looked at one another—and turned around once again. This was no benign desire. We had to get to that cabin. It took us from four-thirty until ten that night to accomplish what was normally a shorter drive, but we made it.

When we arrived we turned on the lights to cheer the place up, but we'd had supper on the road and we were exhausted. We soon went to bed.

The next morning I woke up feeling a sense of oppression. There had been a disturbance in the night, but when I tried to think about it, all I saw was a sort of red haze in my mind.

A red haze? What in the world was this? In recent months my mind had been full of a number of things, but never a red haze. When I stopped trying to remember the previous night, the haze would vanish.

Why did I even "think" a haze? It was really like a sort of sign in my mind, an alarm. It kept me returning to that night again and again. I wanted to get that strange redness out of my head. How could such a thing be there?

The next day I felt the same kind of exhausted upset that had followed earlier visitor encounters, but I dismissed it as imagination. That was, of course, a double error. First, it proceeded from the assumption that the imagination is a trivial part of mind, when in fact it is probably at its core. Second, I was supposing that imagination and intellect were opposed, when in fact they are as intertwined as the double helix.

I did not try to break through the red haze with hypnosis. Instead I simply lived my life as always and hoped for the best. I wished that Anne were with me. She had become absolutely essential to my ability to cope with the visitors. Her objectivity, her careful and intelligent skepticism, her insight, were critical to me.

More than anyone, she insisted that the question remain open. And she did this without for a moment doubting the validity of my experiences. Thus she helped me to find perspective when it otherwise would certainly have eluded me.

But I didn't have her help now. The feeling that something was being actively imposed on my mind by an outside hand was terribly distressing. The redness was so strange. Why did it appear every time I thought about that night? What had happened to me?

For me, Anne's week in Dallas crept by. From what she said on the phone it was obvious that she was having a lot of fun, but I missed her and wanted her with me. Andrew and I drove back to the city on Sunday. On Monday I needed her worse than ever. On Tuesday I was desperate. By Thursday I thought I was going to lose my mind.

The red haze assaulted me every time I tried to think about the previous Friday night. I really became quite desperate because it felt like my mind was being controlled and I couldn't do anything about it. The haze wasn't like something from my imagination. Rather, it seemed like the kind of thing that might result from a posthypnotic suggestion.

Finally Friday came. Soon there would be somebody to talk to, somebody who cared and could listen with calm objectivity.

About fifteen minutes before she walked in the door, something incredible happened. The red haze lifted and vivid memories poured into my mind.

I began to recall what had happened on the night of May 30. The first thing that came back to mind was a voice, soft and hypnotic, saying to me, "You're not gonna remember any of this until Anne gets back." And then the bedroom light was flipped on and a small being dressed in white came walking quickly across the room.

The clothing was featureless except for a dark belt of some kind. I remember nothing at all of the size or facial features of this person, being, visitor, or whatever it was. All I do remember is an impression of unusual whiteness and light-blue eyes. What shape these eyes were I do not know. The cover illustration on this book is only a guess.

This being sat down on the bedside. She seemed almost angelic to me, so pure and so full of knowledge. As she bent close to me I felt all the tension go out of my muscles. The sensation was exactly as if they had turned into oatmeal. My breathing did not stop, but it seemed to become distant, as if I were observing the breathing of a body that was not my own, rather than feeling something.

The being looked directly into my eyes and said, "I want to talk to you about your death." When we made eye contact I saw only blueness—the blue of heaven. It was like entering another world.

What happened to me next is hard to describe. An explosion went through my body. And then there was the dread. It was as cold as steel around my throat. I wanted to jump away, to run, to scream, to do anything to get away from that terrible, beautiful blue and those terrible words.

The being obviously sensed this. The blueness sort of snapped and I could see again. The being moved its arm slightly, a gesture that I recall with absolute vividness because of the impact it had on me.

I will never forget the next moment. Superficially it didn't seem like much: The edge of the white sleeve touched the middle and forefingers of my left hand, which had been lying along the outside of the quilt. This touch was so incredibly soft that it filled me with a peace unlike any I had ever felt before. In that instant it seemed to me that all the rich hours of childhood, the afternoons dreaming in the tops of trees, the joy of a thousand perfect mornings combined together to offer me a kind of sustenance that I did not know I needed, but once felt seemed essential.

That sleeve was like an edge of heaven.

I have wondered whether angels and demons might be the same beings in different costumes, or, said in a more "modern" manner, negative and positive manifestations of the same essential energy of the universe.

The being then said, "Your metabolism has been altered. If you continue to eat sweets, you cannot hope to live long, and if you eat chocolate you will die."

I remembered that these words had been delivered like whips, lashing into my mind. But they were about eating sweets, which I could not take too seriously.

The next statement had more consequence.

“In three months’ time you will take one of two journeys on behalf of your mother. If you take one journey, you will die. If you take the other, you will live.”

I described this encounter to Anne, but omitted the part about sweets because I didn’t really intend to stop eating them, and I didn’t want her to put any pressure on me about the matter.

Little did I know what would come from the being’s remarks.

I called my mother. She was fine. In late April my grandmother had died, but she’d suffered from a long illness and the death was almost a blessing. Mother had passed that milestone in her life with grace. She was physically well and happy enough.

I carefully marked the date on our calendar when the visitor’s prediction would be tested. The prediction had taken place on Friday, May 30. So Saturday, August 30, was the crucial day. All right. I would remember that warning.

Saturday, June 7, we again went to the country. Nothing unusual happened at all. But Sunday morning when we woke up Anne gave me such a strange look that I asked her if anything was wrong.

“I had a nightmare last night. It was incredibly vivid. I dreamed that you were eating a chocolate bar, and you just dropped dead. There was no warning at all. All of a sudden you were dead.”

What was this? I hadn’t mentioned the warning about sweets to Anne. So how was it that she had come up with such a dream?

I did not want to be controlled by the visitors. I didn’t want to take orders from them. But this dream—where had it come from? I asked her more about it.

“It was weird. Extremely vivid. I just saw your face, like you were on television. You unwrapped a chocolate bar and bit into it. And you dropped like a wet rag. I remember your eyes. They were dead.”

This was very puzzling to me. I was upset and nervous. The visitor experience was so powerful and yet so very, very strange. I could not fathom why sweets, of all things, would suddenly become an issue.

I remembered that on the night of December 26, 1985, when I was taken by the visitors, I had been made to take a white substance that was very bitter. That could have changed me, for all I knew. Or perhaps it did no more than what it seemed to me it was intended to do, which was to make me forget.

Having somebody come into my home in the night, take me, and change my metabolism so that I couldn't eat sweets anymore was outrageous. Lunatic.

I found myself afraid to eat chocolate, and I was furious. How dare they do this to me. I suspected that it was just another mind game, another way of imposing themselves on me.

Angrily and regretfully, I stopped eating chocolate. I discovered to my consternation that I was addicted to it. I really had a lot of trouble. I sweated, I paced the floors. I was in the ridiculous position of dreaming of candy bars.

I did not care to take instructions from anybody whose origin in the unknown might tempt me to give up responsibility for myself. My free will was too valuable to me to let some wiser other, whether imagined or real, take it from me.

When I began to struggle with this demand—with the issue—of sacrifice, my relationship with the visitors changed again. It deepened, but I didn't know that. The very idea of relationship was still tentative with me. Mostly, they terrified me. One does not want to develop a relationship with a hungry panther.

Perhaps because I just didn't think of the visitors as a particularly helpful influence in my life, my interest in following their advice about sweets didn't last long. Finally, one afternoon at an especially good coffee shop, I saw a magnificent, fresh Sacher torte being cut. I ordered a slice and defiantly ate it and absolutely nothing happened to me. I did not drop dead. I didn't even get sick. In fact, I left the place feeling marvelous.

As the days passed and my forty-first birthday came closer, I found that the warning of the white angel haunted me. "I want to talk to you about your death." The words had been said almost with melody, as though a child were singing them. One imagines the angel of death as great and dark. What if instead she comes as a creature of innocence so profound that she does not and cannot know the fear that fills the hearts of those she visits?

But she did know. That was why she moved her arm, allowing me to come into contact with the edge of her garment, which in this world of ours was the very flesh of ecstasy. It was the first time the visitors had ever reassured me about anything.

What I felt when I was touching that sleeve was not merely the softness of some spectacularly cunning weave of cloth or paper, but rather the way the soul feels within itself, where death was defeated long ago and there is no fear.

Had the angel of death visited me? Or was this my way of grafting a meaningful structure on an otherwise incomprehensible experience?

Confrontation with death, the demand for sacrifice—these were ancient tools of initiation into the old mystery religions. It seemed that Dora Ruffner had been right on this point—at least as far as my experience was concerned. She had suggested that the visitor experience was initiatory in nature—a journey into the underworld.

In three months' time I would supposedly have an initiatory experience of overwhelming power. Like the shamanic aspirants of old, I would be forced to confront death. I would take one of two journeys on behalf of my mother. I would survive only one of the journeys.

As far as the other was concerned—well, I didn't want to think about that.

What I did think about, long and hard, was the question of what was happening to me. The issue was not only whether the visitors were real but just how well their predictive powers worked.

People would tell me that I was experiencing paranormal phenomena, or they would tell me that it was all in my mind. It wasn't all self-generated, and the very word paranormal is meaningless to me. There is only a continuum of phenomena expressing manifestations in the physical world. Some unknown phenomenon or group of phenomena was causing the perceptions that I was having.

I refused to accept the idea that the visitor phenomenon was "paranormal"—which is to say, inaccessible to understanding.

I thought of the gods of old, all the visitations and apparitions that have, taken together, formed almost the whole of our religious experience. They have taught us everything we believe, in virtually every religious tradition.

That being in white sitting on the edge of my bed and talking to me about death might have been a representative of the most powerful of all the forces that have shaped us.

An angel in my bedroom.

Transfigured Night

On my birthday, June 13, there was a small party; Anne and Andrew and I were present, and John Gliedman and Margot Adler came over for dinner. Andrew gave me an antique radio, a 1937 RCA. We turned it on during the party and played WNEW, which is a New York radio station that broadcasts swing-era music.

By now I was thinking in terms of relationship with the visitors. Rejecting them or further denying their presence in my life just wasn't sufficient. I kept thinking of the wisdom and the humor that I had encountered on April 1, and of what my boy had said after his apparent experience, and I could not turn away from them anymore.

It was during June 1986 that I made the inner commitment to try to meet them halfway instead of being totally passive.

Little did I know how hard—how incredibly hard—that was going to be.

Our little party concluded with a cake. Andrew went to bed afterward, and discussion turned to the visitor experience.

To say that John and Margot were concerned about Communion would be putting it mildly. As a psychologist, John was fascinated and rather excited by the window into a very unusual aspect of human behavior that it provided. Margot wanted to dismiss it, and would have had she not sensed that I wasn't lying.

She and John had read the book to try to help me avoid falling into the trap of assuming that I was dealing with visitors from another planet. If I was going to go ahead with the mad scheme of publishing Communion, they were both, like Anne, eager to see that I left things in question.

As the conversation continued, I noticed that a physical change was coming over me. There was a pronounced tingling. It felt pleasant and I was not at all concerned about it. Vaguely, I was aware that I'd felt it before. I did not think about it enough to realize what I later remembered: This sensation was most strongly present when I was with the visitors. As I passed near the old radio, however, something strange happened. The lighted dial flared brightly and the sound suddenly went up to high volume. Then the radio turned itself off. It did not simply become silent; the knob clicked off.

John Gliedman was close enough to me to observe most of this. He shouted with amazement, and we all then laughed, assuming that this had been a classic example of the very sort of misunderstood natural phenomenon that we had just been discussing around the table.

When we took the radio for repair, we found that the switch had broken, preventing it from being turned off and on. The failure was not electronic but physical. The knob had indeed turned itself off—so hard that the mechanism of the switch snapped.

My tingling continued after the party was over, but there were no further strange manifestations until later that night. I usually stay up quite late, and on this night, as I had nothing to read, I decided to look for an old film on television. I turned on the set with the remote control and began shifting through the channels. Suddenly I noticed something strange on a public-access cable channel. I watched the contorted bodies for a moment, unsure of what I was seeing. Then it dawned on me that I was looking at a gruesome act of sexual perversity involving torture.

I think I heard someone speak aloud in my right ear, words to the effect of "We don't like that!" Then I felt what I can only describe as a sort of soft, quick inner convulsion and the television went off.

It did not just turn itself off via the remote control; it went completely off and could only be turned on again by resetting the main switch. In order for the set to go off in this way either it had to have been unplugged or the switch physically turned. There was no power failure involved, as the lights in the room didn't even flicker. The set had never done this before, and hasn't done it since.

Unlike the radio, the television was not broken.

If a haunted television set was a mystery, it was nothing compared to what would take place in a few weeks.

On July 5 we were again at the cabin. There were a number of guests present for the Fourth of July weekend. Andrew had just been taken to camp that morning.

In the middle of the night I was awakened by a warbling, whirring sound that passed directly over the house and came to rest in the front yard. I then heard a soft, mournful cry from the yard. It came from just outside Andrew's room.

There followed a period of disorientation that resulted from my attempt to look out the window and see what had caused the sound. Rather than looking out the front window as I had intended, I found myself walking to a side window. I saw two large wolves with glowing eyes standing in the garden. They looked at me with suspicion and fear in their faces, and moved off into the shadowy woods on the far side of the road. I had the odd thought that they had been "let out." During the night I dreamed about them ranging the deep woods.

Instead of becoming excited about them while I was awake I had gone off to bed again, forgetting the noise in the front yard. I remember being vaguely happy that there were wolves in the Catskills again.

The next morning, though, I realized that there are no wolves within five hundred miles of my cabin.

Wolves matter to me, and seeing wolves in a range where they have been extinct for hundreds of years certainly drew my attention away from events in the front yard.

What had happened? It is possible to suggest that a visitor craft had landed and that a clever form of mind control playing on my interest in wolves was used to prevent me from looking at it.

But is that the only possible conclusion? By no means. On January 26, 1988, I received a letter from a reader detailing childhood encounters with a small man who had a large head and leathery skin and “wore blue overalls.” This was, of course, familiar to me from many of my own observations. As a child the woman also had a nightmare of “a large white owl” at her window. In addition, she dreamed about “a pack of white wolves that glowed in the dark.” She presented both these dreams in the context of visitor experience. She could not have known about my wolf vision, as nothing about it had yet been published or even much discussed. As she had read Communion, she was aware that owl imagery is associated with the visitors.

Amazingly, she confronted this familiar array of images in a house not ten miles from my cabin. I have not received another letter describing wolf imagery, nor have I ever heard of it occurring in other cases. I thought that it was my own personal perception. Now I find somebody else sharing it, also in the context of apparent visitor experience. And at the time the dreams took place she was living in the immediate vicinity of my present home.

To dismiss this as mere coincidence strikes me as an unfortunate failure of curiosity.

One is tempted to speculate that there may be a parallel reality that sometimes bleeds over into this one, or even that its inhabitants may possess a technology that enables them to shift between the worlds—and presumably to bring their animals with them . . . unless what she and I saw were the lost wolves of the Catskills, roaming yet their beloved hills.

The next morning one of my houseguests, who had awakened apparently in response to my movements in the room above him, told me he had seen a distinct pink light coming in through the closed bedroom shades. He had thought that this light was strange, but before he could check further he had suddenly lapsed into deep sleep.

I suspect that something very real came to the house, made its mournful cry for reasons not understood, did whatever it wished to do, and left.

Then came the night of July 18. Because Andrew was away it had been a quiet time at the house, which was usually filled with the sounds of children. During the day I'd had the strong and disturbing feeling that I was about to be taken away. This feeling was so strong, it possessed my thoughts for the whole day. I could practically feel the visitors around me. I went so far as to write Anne a note telling her not to worry if she found me absent when she got up in the morning.

That evening we went to a movie, Roman Polanski's Pirates. Afterward we went home and to bed without incident.

Anne fell asleep after a few minutes of reading a book. I was absorbed in Joseph Campbell's Occidental Mythology and stayed awake for some time longer. At about eleven-thirty I turned off my light, pulled up the covers, and closed my eyes.

Almost at once I became aware of a rustling sound around me. It was a small sound, as if the sheets were still settling. When the sound didn't stop I thought maybe a mouse had gotten in and was crawling on the bed, so I opened my eyes. At that point I had not been asleep, I do not think, even for a moment.

I was disoriented by what I saw. The first thing I was aware of was that I could see my hands straight out in front of me, as if they were pointed up at the ceiling. The arms of my pajamas were still extended to my wrists.

The ceiling had changed remarkably. It is a raw pine ceiling, slightly angled toward its peak, following the cant of the roof. Now, however, it appeared flat. The boards were no longer one-by-fours; they were at least eight inches wide. And there was what looked like a huge, rectangular appliance hanging from it.

I was completely confused. One moment I had been lying in bed. I'd heard a rustling noise, opened my eyes, and found myself in a situation so totally different from what I had expected that I was simply silenced.

I lay there staring blankly at the scene before me. After a moment I realized that the big rectangular object had a woman stuck to it. I had the horrible feeling that the whole thing, woman and all, was about to come off the ceiling and fall on me.

Then I realized that there was a quilt on it, and sheets. Our quilt, our sheets. Beside the woman there was an empty place.

The scene resolved itself. It was our bed; the woman was Anne. Beside the bed was a table, and on the table were my lamp, radio, and book.

I understood that I was no longer in bed. But what in heaven's name had happened? Was the bed now on the ceiling? Or—

Suddenly I comprehended that I was on the ceiling. I had somehow been pulled up against the ceiling.

Immediately I started trying to call Anne, to wake her up. But all I could manage was a sort of whisper. My vocal cords wouldn't work. I hissed and gasped, but she is a heavy sleeper and she just lay there like a stone.

Then I began to be lifted higher. I would rise up, seemingly right into the ceiling, and a light of appalling brightness would come down into the periphery of my vision.

Once I went up, twice, a third time. Each time it was as if the wood around me became like a sort of warm wind, and this overwhelmingly bright light would seem almost to come down and consume me from behind and above.

The light seemed thick, the density of water. But it was so incredibly bright. It felt like the truth must feel in the heart, an overwhelming, wonderful, painful brilliance.

I also had an impression that there were people near me, but I could not see them. I was struggling, but I seemed to be restrained in some manner. I couldn't move my arms, legs, or torso. The only motor control I had was over my face, and that was limited.

A short time later I went spiraling down to the bed, moving through the air quickly and landing softly. As always seemed to be the case with these experiences, instead of waking my wife and telling her excitedly what was happening, I fell asleep instantly. I recall a normal night's sleep, uninterrupted.

I had not been unconscious when this took place. I had not been asleep. There was no amnesia and no confusion. I was aware of the fact that I had risen up to the ceiling, remained there for a period of time, and then floated back down to the bed. But surely that was impossible. Things like that don't happen. I am certainly not going to make an argument that they do happen. What I can say for certain is that I have reported exactly what I perceived.

Even the next morning I did not feel normally heavy. The mere act of walking fast produced in me the impression that I might just take off again.

When I told Anne about it, I found that it had yet another dimension. We discovered that when she asked me questions, I would hear a voice, very distinct, beside my right ear, which would give answers.

I will reproduce the initial dialogue, as I remember it.

Anne: "Why did you come here?"

Voice: "We saw a glow."

Anne: "Why are you doing this to Whitley?"

Voice: "It is time."

Anne: "Where are you from?"

Voice: "Everywhere."

Anne: "What is the earth?"

Voice: "It's a school."

After this the voice changed dramatically. No longer was it a distinct sound, heard as if it were coming from a small speaker just to the right of my head. It became much more thoughtlike. I suspect that it was very much like what some people hear when they channel.

It has been about seventeen hundred years since channeled voices were a commonplace experience in our civilization. During the whole classical period they were an accepted part of life. The oracles at Delphi and many other places in the ancient world were channels answering questions in trance.

Among intellectuals of the classical era, contact with the Logos was eagerly sought, as this voice was believed to embody truth in its absolute form. It was through contact with the Logos that the classical world developed the philosophical underpinnings that animated it and gave it meaning. And the Logos was often quite literally a voice that one heard in one's head.

With the rise of Christianity the voice died, to be resuscitated occasionally in the form of miracles, such as the voices heard by Joan of Arc, and the voice of Mary at Lourdes and Fatima. Other, more private guides, such as Philemon, to whom C. G. Jung turned during his meditations, have played a role in modern culture.

So the voice I was hearing, as also the voices heard by modern channels, was possessed by an ancient and lofty human heritage.

I point this out to stress the fact that even at this apogee of perceptual strangeness, I was still well within the tradition of human experience.

As far as the levitation itself is concerned, that also has a long history among human beings. Recently, physical levitation has been associated with a number of UFO contact cases, most notably that of the anonymous French physician "Dr. X," a well-known medical official in southern France. Dr. X encountered two UFOs on the night of November 1, 1968, at his home. He experienced the healing of two injuries, had a triangular rash appear on his abdomen, as did his eighteen-month-old son, and afterward had numerous experiences of telepathy, instances of affecting clocks and—like me—electrical circuits, and at least one episode of levitation. To this day Dr. X periodically experiences an eruption of the triangular rash. It has been thoroughly examined by dermatologists and its origin remains unknown.

Except for the rash, his symptoms and mine were virtually identical.

In January 1988 I met another person who has had the visitor experience and lives in my neighborhood in Manhattan. We talked over lunch about our experiences. When she finally felt comfortable with me, she told me the thing she considers strangest about her encounters. "I levitated," she said with a defiant expression. "I'm sure I did."

Two months later, a woman had a levitation experience strikingly similar to mine. She, also, was not asleep when it started. She was lifted up to the ceiling of her bedroom and turned until her feet were facing out the window. She then experienced a blank hour. When she regained consciousness she was returning to the bed. She frantically tried to wake up her spouse but could not do so. Her next clear memory is of the morning. About a week before this happened her husband and I had had dinner together. I had been struck by the combination of fascination and fear that he exhibited toward the visitors. Somehow I was not surprised when he and his wife became involved. And I had learned not to reject testimony of levitation.

The visitors may represent a force of great power, operating at a level of scientific knowledge well beyond our own understanding.

I also found that instances of levitation were not confined to people who have remembered visitor encounters. A very pious young man, St. Joseph of Cupertino (1603–1660), had a habit of levitating, especially during mass. He was a religious extremist, given in his adolescence to the wearing of hair shirts and self-flagellation. In 1625 he became a Franciscan and soon started to fly.

Once he drifted over the altar during mass, and was set afire as he glided through the candles. So distressing was this event to his superiors, it was thirty-five years before they dared let him appear at a public mass again. His later encounters with altar candles were less traumatic: After that first disaster they no longer set him afire even though he sometimes drifted through their flames. He once flew up into an olive tree and had to be rescued, as he could not fly down again.

His levitations were witnessed by many people, among them Pope Urban VIII. He died quietly at an advanced age. The Church has thoughtfully made him the patron saint of airline travelers.

St. Teresa of Ávila was also a levitator. She described her experience as “a great force” lifting her up. She did not care for levitation and used to ask her fellow nuns to hold her down during the attacks . . . but as often as not she ascended before anybody could get to her.

In all, more than a hundred Catholic saints have been associated with levitation reports. From my experience it would seem that sinners can also rise on occasion.

During the nineteenth century a controversial medium, Daniel Douglas Home, astonished many men of science with his remarkable feats of levitation, even at one point drifting out one window and in through another in full view of many witnesses—but none of them saw him while he was outside the window. Maybe he “levitated” his way along a ledge. His levitations produced an absolute storm of controversy. The British satirical magazine Punch lampooned them. Some scientists suggested that they were hallucinations, others that they were fakes. It should be noted that Mr. Home levitated before the emperor and empress of France, but insisted on doing so in total darkness. The imperial couple was convinced by the fact that the empress reached up and felt Mr. Home’s shoe about a foot above her head. Mr. Home would have had to take further steps to convince me.

My levitation seemed totally real to me. It was real. It had to be real. And yet, it was levitation. How could it have been real?

I suspect that whatever happened to me on that night, I was once again in the presence of this amazing and confounding force that has produced every unexplained apparition from the visions of Apollo that haunted the woods around Delphi to the massive UFO that was seen by Japan Air Lines pilot Kenjyu Terauchi and his crew near Anchorage on the night of November 17, 1986.

This force levitated me in order to continue its work of shattering my belief in the accepted paradigm of reality. And it succeeded very well.

Something was done to me—something that was caused by a very real natural force, be it the higher technology of visitors or some other cause. As such, mine was not a “paranormal” experience but simply an unusual one, proceeding as all experience must from the continuum of possibilities that define our world.

The morning after my levitation I had a strong feeling of the presence of the visitors. While the “radiolike” voice was answering Anne’s questions, it really felt as though they were in the same room with us. Even after the voice stopped, Anne continued to ask questions. The answers now came sort of like wind whispering in my mind, a soft, breathy whisper.

We went for a drive into town to get some groceries. All the way there and back Anne questioned me. As I drove through that sparkling summer morning a whole, hidden life unfolded in my mind. I vividly remembered being part of a “children’s circle” where I would go frequently. I visualized it as meeting in a round, underground room. Often I brought tremendous feelings of guilt to the circle, because I had ensnared the other children. But they invariably comforted me.

I can remember the sharp, darting faces of the visitors as they spoke word after word, observing my emotional response to each one. I had been somehow altered for the purpose of the “experiment,” so that all of the resonance of each word expressed itself fully in my heart when I heard it spoken. Thus the word love rang with longing thoughts of my mother and father and sister, of my grandparents and my friends, of my dog Candy and our cats, and of the smells and sights of our house. And the word fire conjured terrible images of being burned, of being trapped in burning rooms, of hearth fires and death fires, on and on . . .

I thought that perhaps a record had been made of me during those sessions. Looking back on them, they seem like a remarkably effective test of my personality and responses. They also married me in a deep way to words. To me words have always been potent talismans, not just bland carriers of information. Maybe my awe for words stems from this experience. Maybe also, my writing career stems from it—and thus the books I have written about the visitors.

We returned to the house in the afternoon and put our groceries away. I felt a mixture of elation and relief. For the first time, really, I'd had some clear and extensive memories from childhood. I'd imagined that I might have had a few brief episodes of contact, but it was now beginning to seem as if I'd lived a virtual double life.

I wondered if what I was remembering was something special, exclusive to me and a few others, or if it was my way of understanding a much more universal human experience.

We ate dinner on the deck beside the pool, and lay on the warm boards watching the first stars come out.

I reflected that I had been given the liberty to imagine things I'd thought beyond imagination, to think in entirely new ways about the nature of our lives and our world.

The night of stars and shadows had been transfigured. No longer did I see constellations and planets in their serene orbits. I saw mind sailing free, and thought perhaps that the human brain has not generated its mind-stuff at all, but captured it as Prometheus did the fire from some higher source.

Perhaps the visitors are that source.

If so, then we can assume that they know more, by far, than we do. They know, for example, one thing that we cannot know, not just yet: the true nature of the plan they are unfolding in our lives.

EIGHT

Long-Ago Summers

As the days passed, I remembered a few more things about my past. When I was being hypnotized by Dr. Donald Klein on March 5, 1986, I had spontaneously regressed from a memory of being with the visitors on December 26, 1985, to being with identical creatures in the summer of 1957. The doctor told me that victims of child abuse sometimes spontaneously shift from one memory of an assault to another, earlier one committed by the same individual and long forgotten. The trigger appears to be that the same abuser is involved both times.

I knew nothing whatsoever about this effect when I regressed. I was as surprised by my sudden shift to that long-ago summer as was the doctor. It took place because the being I had encountered on December 26, 1985, and the one I saw twenty-eight years earlier were identical.

What had my past been like? What had really happened?

I began to try to answer these questions, but it wasn't easy. It has been a quarter of a century and more since those young summers, and I never expected to want to recapture them by days and hours.

After that hypnosis session I tried to put the past back together, and thought that I had been relatively successful. I reported on the results in Communion.

I could not know or imagine what had really happened. At that time it was simply beyond my capacity to understand the depth or extent of my involvement with the visitors. The memory of the children's circle, which clarified itself after Communion was finished, hinted that there was more than I had realized. It was no more than the briefest of recollections, but it was as distinct and clear as any other real memory.

I sat in a circle of ten or twelve children during these gatherings. We met in a round room. I would usually feel very guilty and apologetic to the other kids. Some of them were very, very frightened.

Maddeningly, I could remember nothing else about the circle. Not a word that might have been spoken. Not a gesture. I didn't recall the presence of visitors.

The exercise of trying to remember was incredibly frustrating. My mind was filled with a mixture of real memories of ordinary life, fragmentary memories of the visitors, and screen memories that masked frightening experiences. It would have helped to be able to tell the difference between the real memories and the false ones, but I had no standard by which to judge.

Memory is a strange and poorly understood phenomenon. The mind seems to load conscious memories on top of one another. As they get older, some of them sink deep into the dark formative matter of self and others disappear altogether. During certain types of brain surgery, incredibly vivid memories from a person's distant past can be evoked, implying that at some level the whole of life is captured as if in amber.

The memory can play spectacular tricks. I once read of a woman who under hypnosis related vividly detailed past-life memories which were eventually traced to an obscure historical novel. This novel had been in her aunt's library when she was a child. She had done no more than page through it years before the hypnosis—and somehow captured its contents at a powerfully absorptive unconscious level of memory.

The mind is also good at covering traumatic or incomprehensible memories with amnesia. Victims of rape and abuse must often be hypnotized to enable their minds to release memories too fearful for them to address voluntarily. Sometimes, when a traumatic event is repeated many times or is of such a long duration that amnesia will not cover it adequately, the mind will resort to imposing a false “memory” over the real one. This is what I have called a screen memory. It is a familiar problem to those who investigate cases of child abuse.

I suspected that I had a lot of screen memories, but I had no way to tell the difference between what was real and what was not. What was the flavor of a screen memory? How would the feel of such a memory differ from a real one? Or would they be indistinguishable?

I searched and searched for some bit of memory, some witness statement, some fragment of knowledge, that would put my past into focus.

Was my whole life a screen memory? I halfway believed that I had been with the visitors nightly for years. That was certainly how I felt.

But there was one incident that could determine for me the way a screen memory differed from a real one.

In Communion I reported, contrary to my earlier assumptions, that I had not been present on the campus of the University of Texas on August 1, 1966, when mass-murderer Charles Whitman opened fire and killed fourteen students from the Library Tower. For years I’d remembered being there but hadn’t been able to find witnesses who could place me. At the time I was writing Communion I concluded that this must be another screen memory.

Since it was my intention to be as honest as possible in Communion, I carefully reported that I hadn’t been there even though the memory was so realistic that I had actually given interviews describing the event in detail. I could have simply hidden the discrepancy, but I felt that candor was absolutely essential to Communion.

The fact that my memories of the Whitman incident were so vivid interested and concerned me. If screen memories could be this vivid, then I was lost. I would never be able to understand my past.

I became obsessed with finding out where I was during the Whitman incident. If I hadn't been on campus, then where had I been?

I carried out an extensive investigation. I found that I was not registered in summer school on the Austin campus of the University of Texas, where the incident had taken place. Since I lived in San Antonio at the time, I needed a motive to place myself in Austin. Had I gone up to see friends? To take a test? That was possible; I was enrolled in a couple of courses by mail.

I discovered a reason for going to Austin on August 1. It was the hundredth anniversary of Sholtz's, a popular UT gathering place. Like hundreds of other students, I could have been up for the centenary celebration.

If so, though, I thought that I would have been seen by somebody. I couldn't find a soul who could place me on the campus. However, I remembered seeing one friend, James Bryce, standing in the doorway of the student union during the sniper attack. He stepped back just as I ran forward and threw myself down beside a low wall. I asked Jim where he had been during the incident. He reported that he was in the student union and had spent a short time in the doorway. He hadn't seen me.

But I had managed to remember the exact location of another person who was there. Thus I must have myself been present. It is not surprising that others who were there did not remember me, in view of what I did right after the police brought Whitman's body out of the Library Tower.

Nobody could place me on the campus because I hadn't been there long enough to encounter friends. I'd driven up, parked, and was walking past the student union when the attack started. The experience was terribly traumatic to me. I'd seen people go down, heard the wounded shrieking, seen others get shot when they tried to help. It was a nightmare. After the incident was over I left in a state of shock. I went back to where my car was parked, got in it, and drove all the way back to San Antonio. I remember hanging my head out the window of the car at seventy miles an hour and screaming myself hoarse. Later I sat on the enclosed porch at my grandmother's house and stared at news reports of the incident.

Not until I really struggled with my memories did I recall all these details.

The actual events of the shooting have always been extremely clear. They were never cloaked by amnesia or covered by a screen memory. My recollections were and are vivid. I could be sure that this was a real event, accurately recalled.

I had other memories, though, that were not nearly as vivid. In fact, some of them were full of bizarre contradictions. With the Whitman incident as a benchmark in reality, I hoped to be able to differentiate between the true and the false ones.

My first suspicious recollection dates from the summer of 1947, when I was two.

I had been on the porch at my grandparents' country home north of San Antonio. This was a large house on a hill, with a huge porch that faced east into a broad and peaceful view. It was built in 1906 by my great-grandmother, who had designed its enormous rooms and tall windows and sited it so that it nearly always enjoyed a breeze, even in the fierce Texas summers. It was truly a place of peace, although at the age of two I doubt that I was aware of it on that level.

My memories of the incident I am about to relate are spotty. There is no sense of narrative or continuity. My mother, however, also remembered it in part and I used her recollections to fill narrative gaps.

It was late afternoon, about five-thirty or six. The family was on the porch. My grandparents and parents were having drinks, and my sister and I were playing on the floor in front of them. The porch was wooden, and ended in an unprotected three-and-a-half-foot drop to the front yard.

I remember that they all suddenly got up and filed into the house, leaving me alone on the porch.

I was afraid and felt lonely. But then somebody called to me and I looked across the front yard and saw what I perceived to be a group of big gray monkeys coming up over the brow of the hill. There was a huge disk in the afternoon sky that looked to me like the moon.

The next thing I remember is seeing my grandfather standing motionless in the window with his head bowed as if in concentration. My mother said that they went in to listen to the news. I have confirmed that they could have picked up a broadcast from any one of a number of San Antonio radio stations.

But why would they all suddenly go inside, taking my four-year-old sister but leaving me to the risk of falling off the porch? My parents were conscientious people. It is very, very strange that they did that.

I ran down the porch, trying desperately to get my mother's attention. Then it is black.

My mother says that they all came back outside to find me sitting in my grandfather's chair saying that I had seen the moon come up over the valley. She reports that there was no moon. My grandfather's highball glass was empty, and they assumed that I had drunk it. But my mother did not remember my subsequent behavior. Had I seemed drunk? Slept, perhaps, until the next morning?

My grandfather made his drinks with a shot and a half of bourbon. I consulted a pediatrician about what this much alcohol would do to a two-year-old. His conclusion was that the child would be "frankly inebriated," displaying erratic behavior, an inability to walk, probable nausea, and a definite tendency to sleep. He also felt that such a large quantity of alcohol could pose a health hazard for the child. Mother did not report any dramatic aftereffects.

It is strange that the sequence of memory would include both gray figures and a disk. Could it be that this was an early visitor experience? I had no way of knowing. It was incredibly frustrating to attempt to grapple with a memory like that, not knowing what it actually meant.

If I'd been having these encounters throughout my life, then what had I become? Why were my visitors so secretive, hiding themselves behind my consciousness? I could only conclude that they were using me and did not want me to know why.

Frankly, I found this idea deeply disturbing. What were the visitors' motives? Communion had become a number-one best-seller. What if they were dangerous? Then I was terribly dangerous because I was playing a role in acclimatizing people to them. And if they were benevolent? Then the agonizingly difficult task of bearing witness to their reality would turn out to be worthwhile.

My desperation increased as I searched across the years of my past, seeking answers.

I did not use hypnosis because Dr. Klein and I both thought that it had, for me, become an unreliable tool. I could no longer tell whether my mind was filling in the blanks in memory with imagination. The mind fights to preserve amnesia around things it doesn't want to remember. The early hypnosis sessions, when everything was fresh, were probably accurate. Now, though, I just couldn't be sure.

I returned in my mind to the children's circle. What had it been? Where had it taken place? My first thoughts about it came from the fall of 1951. I remember that distinctly, because in October I contacted a mysterious disease that rendered me susceptible to every conceivable form of cold and flu. I was out of school for three months, and it was during those months that thoughts of the children's circle began to recur in my mind.

I was tested for everything from mononucleosis to a gamma globulin deficiency. This last test had to be performed at the army's Brooke General Hospital because none of the local civilian hospitals were equipped to do it.

An immune-system deficiency was found, but it faded as inexplicably as it had come. I was eventually returned to school and the episode was forgotten.

I could remember convincing certain children to come to the circle and then seeing them in extreme terror. I remember a boy screaming and screaming. But there were no details—no times, no places, no dates. I do remember a few specific people who were in the circle, but so far none of them have come forward. I feel conscience-bound not to approach them in any way lest I prejudice their memories. If they do remember, I hope that they will one day make their experiences known.

A woman approached Canadian documentarist David Cherniack in June 1987 with a story of being in a children's circle. I spoke to her, but could never be entirely certain that our memories coincided. According to her story, she had seen me while she was in the company of a number of other young children. I would have been about seventeen when this happened, and she around five. She remembered holding my hand and looking up at me. I do have a fragmentary memory from sometime in my late teens of helping a group of children in a gray, vaulted room. One of them was a little girl and she did hold my hand, but I cannot confirm that this woman was that child, or even that my memory is related to the visitor experience.

In addition to the memories I reported in Communion, I have recalled a number of other strange incidents.

In the early summer of 1955 I was walking home at night when I saw a huge light come down out of the sky. It dropped down to a point just above the kitchen porch of our old house on Elizabeth Road in San Antonio. I was standing a few feet away, struck with awe and fear. It hurt my eyes. At the time I thought that it was something alive, a being of fire. I remember every detail of that experience—the June bugs pounding on the screen door, my chest heaving from the scary run I had just made from a neighbor's house, the light rushing like a living thing into my eyes.

I remember it all so well. But what happened next? There is only another blank.

In the summer of 1956 my father, my sister, and I went to Port Aransas, Texas, to spend a few days at the beach.

My mother did not care for the coast and remained in San Antonio. I believe we stayed at the Tarpon Inn.

One day my father chartered a boat and had the captain take us out into the gulf. I suppose that my father intended to fish. I remember getting on the boat and eating peaches from a bag Dad had brought. A storm suddenly blew up. There were terrific waves. Then I remember being back in the hotel. I have no intervening memories at all. My sister also remembered the incident, and wrote me as follows:

“I don’t recall much happening on the actual fishing trip, except a sudden storm, with wind and high, rough waves. I don’t recall any rain with the storm, nor do I recall our having to shelter from it, so I am inclined to think that there was no rain associated with that storm. What I find even stranger is that I can see myself, Dad and the boat captain on the boat and on the dock but I don’t see you anywhere. After the boat was docked an emotion seemed to pass between Dad and the boat captain, an emotion that said to me, ‘This will never be spoken of by either of us.’ For that reason,” she continued, “I knew that I could never ask Dad anything about what had happened.”

So, where was I? How is it that I disappeared from a boat in the middle of a storm miles out to sea but didn’t drown?

San Antonio reporter Ed Conroy began an exhaustive investigation of my past in 1987. He interviewed dozens of people who had known me when I was a little boy back in the fifties. Among them was a neighbor who had been one of my closest friends. He remembered what I had been like after returning from a train trip to Madison, Wisconsin, in the summer of 1957. During hypnosis on March 5, 1986, I had spontaneously recalled this trip. On it I’d had a spectacular visitor experience that involved seeing a room full of American soldiers in battle dress, all lying on tables and being touched by a tall, thin being with huge black eyes and a copper rod in her hand. This was reported in detail in Communion.

In a taped interview my childhood friend told Mr. Conroy that I had talked excitedly about “seeing soldiers” after my trip. My friend had not read Communion at the time of making that statement.

He and I had been together in my front yard in the summer of 1956 when we had seen a huge fireball shoot across the sky. A moment later an old black sedan went racing down the street in the direction that the fireball had fallen.

Mine is not the only case involving fireballs or black sedans. They are both common to many visitor experiences.

A classic example of this phenomenon was related by Mary Sue Weathers, the mother of Patrick Weathers, who has had a number of visitor experiences. When Patrick was a child in 1957 or 1958, Mary Sue was driving him along a road near Meridian, Mississippi, when a fireball suddenly came down out of the sky and nearly hit the windshield of the car. They were engulfed in a flash of light, and then, as Patrick relates, “The thing went back up into the sky.” Mrs. Weathers reported the encounter to the police, and was told that it must have been a meteor, even though the incident took place in daylight and the object didn’t behave like a meteor.

My sister encountered a huge moving light on a summer night in 1967. She was driving home from a dance near Comfort, Texas, when she saw something she described as “a swiftly moving light” that looked to her “like a very large meteorite.” She continued, “It went in an arc from right to left across the road, into some trees. It was quite a distance off the road, but close enough for me to feel that I should have heard something hit the ground. I had the car window down and I slowed almost to a stop, however I heard and saw nothing more. A short distance down the road, an owl flew across and into the car lights. Interestingly enough, it also came from the right to the left.”

Like deer and other large-eyed animals, owls seem to be a familiar motif in repressed visitor experiences.

Right after New Year’s Day in January 1987 my nearest neighbors in upstate New York heard a strange howling sound and saw a light hanging over our house. They went outside and observed this for a short time. Then the light went out and the howling stopped. Inside the house we noticed nothing, but I was having powerful visitor experiences during the ten-day period before and after this took place.

A few weeks later some other neighbors saw a huge fireball pass over their house and dip down into a meadow overlooked by their large living-room window. The fireball went to the center of the meadow and disappeared. My house lies just behind the woods that border this meadow. One of these same neighbors saw a bright light hanging over the woods on December 20, 1987, at two o'clock in the morning. As she watched, it darted away to the north.

Fireballs and strange lights haunt people who have the visitor experience.

The more I studied my past, the more I became convinced that the visitors had always been a part of my life.

Another old acquaintance, David Nigrelle, also remembered what I was like when I returned from Madison. At the time I told him something that he describes as being "beyond science fiction." It disturbed him so much, he pretty well broke off the friendship. He remembered me saying something about "a being."

Mr. Conroy also interviewed Lanette Glasscock, the mother of one of my childhood friends.

Lanette remembered that I had often talked about being kidnapped by spacemen, and that this had so frightened me, on occasion she'd had to take me home from sleepovers.

It took me some time, but I finally recalled one such sleepover. What had frightened me was the clock in Lanette's son's room. It was in the shape of an owl or a cat and it had big eyes that moved back and forth. I remember looking at that face, and thinking how it looked like something else—what, I did not know. I got sick with terror and demanded to be taken home. I know now that the visitors have large, staring eyes. Is that why the clock scared me so much? Apparently I told Lanette that I wanted to go home because I was afraid of spacemen.

My fear of being taken by spacemen also predates by a number of years any mention of such a possibility in media that would have been available to me. In the mid-fifties I had access to ordinary newsmagazines, newspapers, and, at school, Our Little Messenger.

The classic case of the abduction of Betty and Barney Hill did not appear in Look magazine until 1966, by which time I had already suppressed and largely forgotten my own fears, so much so that I do not remember even noticing the article. I have since discovered that it was prominently featured in the October 4 and 18, 1966, issues. By that time I was twenty-one and I did not remember a thing about the "spacemen" of my childhood, nor was I interested enough in such things even to read a prominently featured magazine article about them.

I journeyed back into the past, seeking out old friends, trying with increasing desperation to understand what had happened.

Friends wrote or answered telephone queries with statements like, "You were really a little scary. You talked about aliens all the time." One wrote that his mother remembered me as "a strange child" full of peculiar ideas about spacemen.

He continued "I want to suggest that you have—either intentionally or not—misperceived your past." He went on to say, "I remember that you were always fascinated with the unusual and 'unreal.' One of my most dramatic memories of you was your recounting a set of experiences which I believe you attributed to your uncle. You reported that your uncle was driving near Lubbock when a large flying machine of some sort descended onto the highway in front of him, causing his car's engine to stall." He added, "My mother remembers you as a very odd kid who was always into strange things and talking about strange and obscure stuff. . . ."

He also wrote, "Perhaps a lot of us in those days were beginning to pick up on science fiction images as the potent conveyors of mythic intuition." He sometimes imagined himself a space alien, other times a religious mystic. Far from being rare among the children in my neighborhood, I was participating in what appears to have been a general pattern of "alien" mythologizing.

Did it come from exposure to science fiction, or was it real? Perhaps there was an entirely real experience of a quite incomprehensible kind taking place, which we were interpreting through the science-fiction mythology that was available to us. Had we lived a few hundred years earlier, would we have been frightened of gnomes and fairy mounds instead of aliens and spaceships?

I discovered that the "uncle" that my friend remembered as driving near Lubbock was not an uncle but the late Leon Glasscock. His son and I had, with Mr. Glasscock's help, gone so far as to write to an organization called the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena in 1957 or 1958 seeking to report the incident.

There also returns a series of dreams that I've had since I was about twelve. I have a name for these dreams: I call them "the dark neighborhood." They are all the same, and they go like this: It is the late fifties. I wake up in the middle of the night. My body is filled with tingling energy, and I get out of bed, throw on some jeans and a T-shirt, and go downstairs. The house is dark, full of the thrill of the night. I go out to the storeroom, get my bike, and ride out into the darkness of Elizabeth Road.

The streets are empty, the houses dark and silent. I ride with almost preternatural speed up Elizabeth and across Eldon, then down Terrell Road to Broadway. As I go down the hill I am sailing beneath the blinking stoplights like a ghost, until I am again in the darkness of the side streets, pumping along Patterson Avenue until I reach a certain spot, a curve in the road. There I stop and take my bike onto a path.

This path leads into a substantial wilderness area in the center of north San Antonio called the Olmos Basin. Most of the basin is a flood plain. It is totally uninhabited, a place abandoned at that hour of the night.

I ride down the path. My front wheel bounces on stones. Suddenly I am surrounded by total, absolute blackness.

I generally wake up from the dream of the dark neighborhood in a sweat. I cannot remember anything about what goes on in the dark part, except that it frightens me terribly.

Back in my adolescence I was drawn to the basin for another reason. I remembered a specific spot on a creek where there was an oak tree and the ruin of an old mill . . . it was a spot that I identified with the greatest peace and tranquillity I have ever known.

I used to try to take girls to that spot, but I could never find it. On discussing the place with others, I discovered that my brother remembered it too, and with the same associations, but he could not find it either.

In the fall of 1987 a man who also had some memories of the past in San Antonio wrote me a letter saying that he had some interesting things to discuss.

Upon talking to him in the company of Ed Conroy I discovered that he'd seen an unidentified object flying over the Cambridge Elementary School in Alamo Heights, which is a bedroom suburb bordering Terrell Hills, where I lived. He had seen this object in 1957. His impression was that it was heading toward the Olmos Basin.

As it passed overhead making a sound and looking as if it were rocket-powered, he "heard" three thoughts. The first one was: "We are being observed." The second followed at once: "We must not be seen." And then a third came: "We must leave." The device sped away.

There was a large UFO observed over north San Antonio on November 7, 1957, according to the San Antonio Express of November 8. The reporters who observed it were adamant that it was no ordinary device, neither a plane nor a balloon.

For a subtle reason, the account offered by my correspondent was given added credibility. He was unaware that the dialogue he repeated had a tripartite structure familiar to me from my own experience and study of the visitors. It was sometimes as if they actually spoke according to the ancient law of three forces. According to this law the universe is fundamentally divided into a positive and a negative force, and the reconciliation of these forces expresses change into the world. This simple law is a truth of nature. It is friction between opposing forces that causes the light and heat upon which all life is dependent.

I doubt that the witness was aware of the hidden structure in the dialogue he reported. It is not likely that he would have happened to invent it in just that way. The first statement, "We are being observed," was a positive expression of a fact. The next, "We must not be seen," expressed its negative implications. The third, "We must leave," reconciled the two into a creative action.

He also went on to say that he'd had the feeling in those days that there was something going on in the Olmos Basin, perhaps even something alien living there. He also remembered the spot with the creek and the ruined mill. Unlike me and my brother, he was able to find it and took Ed Conroy to see it.

My correspondent's testimony made me wonder about the dream of the dark neighborhood. Perhaps there had been nights when I actually rode that sleeping neighborhood, racing along real streets on a very real bicycle—toward a rendezvous in the Olmos Basin with the visitors . . . and, just maybe, with the other members of the children's circle.

Throughout all of Western folklore there are stories of people flying to meetings with supernatural beings. The experience was a commonplace of witchcraft, and was believed among the ancients to involve the journey to a meeting with the god Dionysus.

Does it really happen?

Is there someone waiting for us in the night and forest?

“Every angel is terrible...

If the dangerous archangel took one step now down toward us

*from behind the stars
our heartbeats rising like thunder would kill us.”*

—RAINER MARIA RILKE
“Second Elegy”

LIFE IN THE DARK

Part Two

NINE

The Lost Land

While it was easy to find people from my childhood who remembered me talking about aliens, by the time I was in college I spoke about such things only infrequently. I had some discussions with friends about the possibility of extra-terrestrial life, but nobody remembered me talking about being taken by visitors.

A number of unusual events occurred, especially in 1967, but I was by then very far from blaming spacemen.

By 1968, when I was living in London, even talk of outer space had ceased. I have reviewed my unpublished writings, dating from about 1964 onward, and there isn't in the whole body of work—which consists of eight full-length novels, forty or fifty short stories, and hundreds of poems—a single direct mention of UFOs. Because of the existence of this material and the witness testimony from earlier in my life, it is possible to conclude that my childhood was full of alien-abduction fears, but that these had receded so completely by the age of twenty that they didn't provide the theme for any of my creative output. They were, however, present in a deeply symbolized form. Indeed, these fears are as implicit in much of my unpublished work as they are overt in books like The Wolfen, The Hunger, and Catmagic, which all contain references to intelligent and predatory nonhuman beings.

The first real narrative I was able to construct from my adulthood came from an incident that took place in 1968. I described the events that led up to it in Communion. Throughout 1986 and into 1987 my memories of this incident gradually increased until I was able to fill in a good bit more detail. The memories were startling.

In 1968 I was living in London. During the summer I spent between two and six weeks on the Continent, and have been unable to account for most of that time. As reported in Communion, I crossed to the continent on a ferry and took the train south to Italy. On the trip I met a young woman. I remember her name and her nationality but I have not been able to trace her. We went first to Florence and then to Rome. In Rome something happened that terrified me. My screen memory is that I got lost in the catacombs under the Vatican.

Whatever happened, I literally rushed back to my pensione and threw my things into my suitcase. Something I saw in the room horrified me. I have tried to recall what it was, but all I have been able to find out for certain is that I told a friend at the time that I had seen “a dried owl” somewhere in the room. If that is indeed what I saw, I am not surprised that I ran!

I made an unsuccessful attempt to extract more of this memory via hypnosis, but my feeling is that the material that emerged was not correct.

I know now that owl imagery is persistently connected to the visitor experience. Seeing an owl is a characteristic screen memory, reported by many people. My sister and I have both seen owls in unexpected contexts, and there was a period of time in my childhood when we were haunted by a very weird owl. More recently, a man had a frightening confrontation with an owl-like apparition in a house near mine in upstate New York, a confrontation that I will record on later in this book. I commented on the long magical history of the owl in Communion, recalling that it was both connected with wisdom and was the symbol of the goddess Athena, and of the “eye goddesses” of the Middle East who preceeded her. It was especially important to the ancient mother-city of Mari.

I rushed off to Rome’s Termini station, where I jumped on the next train out. As it happened it was going north, and I stayed aboard as far as Strasbourg. There I left it and hopped another train, again choosing it because it was just starting to leave the station. This one took me all the way across southern France to Port Bou, where I got a Spanish train bound for Barcelona. I remained there in a back room in a hotel on the Ramblas. I only went out at night.

In Communion I reported that the rest of this memory was “a jumbled mess.” After much thought I believe that I can now reconstruct it in some detail.

I was hiding in my little back room one night when a woman arrived with what she described as a ticket on Egyptair. This was not as impossible as it sounds; in 1968 Nasser had organized an enormous number of student flights, and Egyptair had many European destinations on its schedules. These usually turned out to be almost total fiction, as most of the flights weren’t actually running.

I took the ticket, but I have no memory of going to the airport. My next clear memory is of the interior of the plane, which I had entered through a door in the floor. During the flight I became nauseated. Someone I perceived to be a nurse or stewardess dropped three drops of a clear liquid out of an eyedropper onto my tongue.

The air in the plane smelled nasty, and there was a continuous bone-rattling hum and a great deal of sharp jolting around. I can remember a large blond man in a white uniform sitting beside me. He described himself as my “coach” and he read aloud from what looked like a book made of limp cloth.

I left the plane through the hatch in the floor and was taken out across a broad expanse of concrete by four men in dark-blue uniforms. They were small, considerably shorter than me. At the time this did not seem at all unusual. In appearance they were identical to the men I encountered on April 1, 1986, and who carried me from my room on December 26, 1985. I now know that they have also been seen by many other participants, and are in fact one of the most commonly encountered types. They are usually much more friendly than the beings with the large, slanted eyes, and they sometimes display a considerable sense of humor.

In retrospect, I wonder how I ever could have just dismissed these memories as “a jumbled mess.” They are absolutely fantastic, and now that I have looked at them clearly and calmly they do not seem to be jumbled at all.

Who was the “coach”? What stewardesses give you drops on your tongue, and what plane smells like a sulfurous privy? And since when do passengers enter and leave a plane by a hatch in the floor?

I returned to London sometime later. It could have been days or weeks. I wound up standing in front of the St. James hotel at dawn, absolutely exhausted. I have no really clear idea about how I got there.

Friends who knew me during that period reported only that I was gone for a good stretch of the summer. There aren't any records, so I can't be sure how much time passed.

In 1972 a number of vivid thoughts surfaced that I now realize were connected to that summer. They involved a journey to a great desert. This desert had a tan sky that was so bright it was difficult to look at. It never really got dark there.

The little men took me into an oasislike setting that was bordered by tall, very thin trees and crossed by a narrow lane. Over this lane there stood an enormously high arch. One of the men with me—who seemed very jolly and gay—said that the arch was to commemorate “the achievements of the scholars.” Ahead I saw a completely tumbledown building. It was on a cliff at the edge of the oasis and was so old that it seemed almost to have blended with the stones themselves. Beyond and below it I could see the tremendous desert.

I was told that the building was a university “a million years old.” I was really very excited to go inside. We approached the building and I said, “Is it in ruins?” The reply was, “No, but the scholars aren't much good at maintenance.” There was an imposing entrance, but I was taken around to a side door that was reached by clambering over sharp volcanic rocks. These stones were fearsome, and for years afterward I had a recurring dream of climbing through them and trying very hard not to cut myself.

As we approached the door we encountered two taller, thin men with gigantic, black, almond-shaped eyes. They were not nearly as friendly as the small men in blue. In fact, when they stared at me I felt naked. It was hard to be in their presence. One of them said, "He isn't ready yet." This deflated me. Things had been going so well; I'd felt very much approved. Now there was a sense of desperation. Why wasn't I ready? I wanted to go in.

The two tall beings left. One of my guides announced, "They said you weren't ready, but now they're gone." So in we went. I found an absolutely featureless corridor made of what seemed to be dark-green stone. The floors were dusty and felt like packed earth. There were doorways, and light shone across the floor from each. I was taken into the first room. Its floor was etched with a circle, and there was a large window looking out over the desert.

When I went into the circle I wanted at once to dance. There was no music, but when I danced I felt a sensation that I cannot describe. The best way to characterize it would be to call it a movement that led at once to great loneliness and great excitement. When I danced I found myself for moments inside other people and other lives. I was walking up a narrow, curved road. A portly redheaded man was running toward me. He was wearing a white toga, and my impression was that I was seeing something happening in ancient Rome.

The dance took on great passion and intensity. Round and round I went, sailing through armies of lives, places familiar and unfamiliar. It was as if my soul had hungered for this. I sailed round and round and round, going faster and faster. I don't know how long I danced, but it was glorious.

Reluctantly, I left the university and was taken to another building. This building was a three-story adobe structure down the lane from the university. In it there was a room for me to live in. It was unfurnished. I slept on the floor. Once I woke up to hear somebody talking loudly in English. Two men appeared, both of them normal-looking. They were wearing khaki clothes that looked military. I had the impression that they were Americans. One of them had a Bell & Howell movie camera, which he pointed at me. They were standing outside the door to the room behind a white tape. The one without the camera said, "Why are they keeping you outside of the enclosure?" I replied that I didn't know, and he looked absolutely furious.

Next I was with a woman who was so pale that even her lips were without color. She handed me a piece of fruit that looked like a giant fig. She told me to eat it. I said that I didn't care to eat it. She replied that I had to.

Feeling very dubious, I bit into it. At once there was a terrible bitterness, and it seemed like my head was going to split open.

I was aware of a group of people, some with tears in their eyes, watching me from behind the line of white tape as I went off on my own. I found that the grass was very soft and fine, and I sat in it for a time. Then I started to return to the university, but one of the tall beings who'd said I wasn't ready was there. He waved me away and I thought it better not to go. I went instead to an area of shacks made of what looked like adobe and dried tree branches. They were very rough and simple. In them I would find things like a single wooden bowl, or a discarded blue uniform. Some of the small men were there, and I was so surprised at the simplicity of their dwellings that they laughed aloud at me.

There isn't any more than that.

Among my masses of old poems I found one that seemed strangely related to this memory. It was written in the summer of 1968, shortly after I returned to London from the strange trip. It was entitled "Barcelona." In part it reads:

*We seem to see so many things,
The ships that never were,
The fairies at their ebat . . .*

Once upon a midnight we danced in circles beneath the waning moon, the blood-red moon of the Mediterranean . . .

*We flew when we danced—
We danced a long time ago . . .*

I remember so well dancing that lost wild dance, a journey across the essence of time. It feels as if the best of my life has been lived in secret, and is lost somewhere down a labyrinth. All I have left are confused memories, flickers and flashes, and a few snatches of verse to suggest the wonderful journeys I have taken and the magical things I have seen. I hope and pray that it will one day be given to me to remember.

I have, however, discovered a few most interesting things about the 1968 memories. In December 1987 I was given proofs of Jacques Vallee's new book, Dimensions: A Casebook of Alien Contact, in order to write a foreword. I was fascinated to see that the traditional journey to Magonia, or "the land of the fairy," often started with three drops of liquid being placed on the traveler's head or face. Vallee mentions that a young woman who was taken had her right eye soaked in "a green dew," whereupon she could see many wonderful things. Another had "three drops of precious dew" dripped on her left eyelid before making such a journey.

The "nurse" gave me drops on my tongue. I have always known that. The screen memory was that she was a stewardess and I was on an airplane. A stewardess would have given an airsick passenger a Dramamine tablet, if anything. It would also have been the only time I have ever been airsick in a passenger plane.

In addition, the journey back from the world of the dead has in many traditions, such as the Greek, been preceded by the eating or drinking of a bitter substance that induces amnesia—the ancient Greeks called it “the milk of forgetfulness.”

I was made to eat a bitter fruit just before leaving that strange, lost land. Before I returned home during my abduction of December 26, 1985, I was forced to swallow a milky substance that left a horrid taste in my mouth. On May 20, 1950, a French woman was abducted. Shortly before being returned she experienced a “sickening, metallic, bitter taste . . .”

Were these drugs that made us forget? And if so, then what is the drug that induces the voyage to Magonia? Is it a powerful hallucinogen, or something that acclimatizes the body so that it can slip across space-time to another world?

I had to live with the fire of the question inside me. My mind drifted back to that tumbledown university on a desert cliff so far away. Across many summer nights my mind retreated, to the light of other skies. I will never forget the moment I entered that door and saw the glow of that distant sun falling across the floor. I remember the dust rising from my footfalls in that sacred and mysterious place. Was I in an annex to the golden city, some ancient corner where the very light shines with truth?

Was it really so far away, or is that place part of the memory and heart of every human being?

Secret Knowledge

I recognized that I was going to have to face an unpleasant reality. No matter how hard I tried, I was never going to be able to sort out my past. It seemed as if I had indeed led a double life. But I could never know the details.

What is hideous about this is that I have always thought I had a very reliable memory. It has been one of my most useful tools. Books like Warday are based on detailed and meticulous research committed to memory and then woven into the fictional narrative. I have always felt profoundly in control of my understanding of who I am and where I come from.

I am not the only mystery walking this earth. Every one of us is a mystery. We do not really know who we are, not one of us. Every past is full of contradictions. Still, I was avid with curiosity, and I kept feeling that there must be some small, perfect breakthrough that would open the fortress of remembrance. But the breakthrough did not come.

I returned to the present, sadly conceding yesterday to its own devices. In any case, there was another important field of endeavor, that of the memories that began with October 1985. I had them well organized. In January 1986, when I realized that what was happening could be important, I began to keep a detailed daily journal.

Ironically, just when I had given up on the past, the present proceeded to give me a fascinating possible insight into the events of 1968.

In early August 1986 an unusual houseguest arrived at our cabin. Unfortunately, I was asked to disguise this person's identity. This noted documentary filmmaker came to visit us in the company of a mutual friend. We had a small houseparty: the filmmaker and his friend; Dr. John Gliedman, and our family.

The filmmaker had been in the area, heard from the friend of my experiences, and wanted to meet to compare notes. At his request, he remains anonymous.

In the early eighties the filmmaker had a very unusual encounter with a man who identified himself as a member of the air force. Their meeting was held at an air-force base in connection with a documentary the filmmaker was preparing. He was allowed to read a briefing paper concerning crashed disks and retrieval of the bodies of nonhuman beings. The filmmaker was specifically informed that he was being shown this paper at the direction of superior officers.

The document and the agent's statements had naturally been of great interest to the filmmaker. The whole experience had left him with a lot of unsatisfied curiosity.

The typed pages which he had read were titled "Briefing Paper for the President of the United States." There was no specific president mentioned, and he didn't remember a specific date. He was not allowed to take notes on the spot, but he recorded his recollections later in detail. The controversial document surfaced in 1987, and the filmmaker's memory proved to be accurate.

The paper described a series of crashed UFO disks at Aztec and Roswell, New Mexico, at Kingman, Arizona, and a crash in Mexico. Nonhuman bodies had allegedly been taken from the craft and had been examined in laboratories. The creatures were described as about four feet tall, gray-skinned, and hairless, and having large heads compared to their smaller, thin bodies. Their faces were flat without ears or nose, and had a slit for a mouth. They had large eyes. Because of their skin color they were referred to as "grays."

The paper also described direct contact between government officials and a survivor of one of these crashes. This being was called Ebe, an acronym for "extraterrestrial biological entity." The officials were told that the gray beings had carried out a long-term intervention in human affairs, manipulating mankind's biological, sociocultural, and religious evolution. The being had eventually died of unknown causes.

The paper outlined the government's efforts since the 1940s to ascertain the origin, nature, and motives of the beings, and, presumably, to gain some sort of control over the situation, or at least some insight into it.

The agent told the filmmaker that he was being shown the document and given the information because the government intended to release to him several thousand feet of film taken between 1947 and 1964 showing crashed disks and extraterrestrial bodies as historic footage to be placed in his documentary.

He never received the footage. Had he been shown a real document, or was he the victim of some sort of complicated disinformation scheme? When the promised footage didn't materialize, the company he was working for became disillusioned and dropped its plans for the documentary, which he believes was the real outcome desired by the air force.

Over the years he did more investigation. He came to my house to find out if there were correlations between what I knew about the visitors from personal experience and what he had read in the alleged briefing paper and been told by the agent and other sources.

When I first started grappling with the visitor experience, I would have dismissed a story like this out of hand. Crashed disks? Government cover-up? Plain nonsense. But I have run across some information that strongly suggests otherwise. In Communion I reported that a prominent scientist and defense consultant, Dr. Robert Sauerbacher, had written a letter to a UFO researcher that said, among other things, "materials reported to have come from flying saucer crashes were extremely light and very tough." He went on to say, "I still do not know why the high order of classification has been given. . . ." Dr. Sauerbacher died in 1986 after a long and distinguished career. He was the author of a dictionary of electronics and engineering that is considered a fundamental contribution to science; a consultant for the navy, the air force and the Defense Department; the former dean of the graduate school of the Georgia Institute of Technology; and a director of the General Sciences Corporation.

The filmmaker had also heard this story, and knew some of the people who had met Dr. Sauerbacher. One of these was Stanton Friedman, a noted UFO researcher. I got in touch with Mr. Friedman in the fall of 1987.

He directed me to some extraordinary information collected by himself and researcher William Moore about an event that seems to have taken place in Roswell, New Mexico, on July 2, 1947. The air force originally announced that a flying disk had crashed on a ranch near that town, and that it had been collected by a Major Jesse Marcel, a crack intelligence officer attached at that time to the 509th Bomber Group, the world's only atomic bomber wing.

Major Marcel had in 1979 contributed a videotaped statement to a documentary entitled Flying Saucers Are Real. In his statement, the major was absolutely unequivocal. "One thing I was certain of," he said, "being familiar with all air activities, was that it was not a weather balloon, not an aircraft, or a missile. . . . A lot of the little members had little symbols which we were calling hieroglyphics because they couldn't be read. . . . It [the metal] was not any thicker than the tinfoil in a pack of cigarettes, yet when I tried to bend it, it would not bend. . . ." Major Marcel added, "The reason that this story has remained hidden from the public for over thirty years is that General Rainey released a cover story at that point." (The general claimed that the debris had been identified as coming from a crashed weather balloon.) The major's statement was made after he had retired from the air force with an honorable discharge a few years before he died.

Also through Mr. Friedman I met Major Marcel's son, Dr. Jesse Marcel. He has a successful medical practice in a western state. Dr. Marcel remembered the crashed-disk incident vividly. He was eleven years old at the time. One day his father brought home some unusual little I-shaped objects. They were very light and were covered with strange violet symbols. Major Marcel explained to his son that they were from a flying disk.

Friedman and Moore have documented interviews with dozens of people connected with the incident that took place at Roswell. Many of these people were direct firsthand witnesses. The two researchers have all but proved their case, and yet the press remains highly skeptical.

I believe that I discovered why this is. The New York Times reported on February 28, 1960, that Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter, the former director of Central Intelligence, had said, "Through official secrecy and ridicule, many citizens are led to believe that the unknown flying objects are nonsense." He continued, "To hide the facts, the Air Force has silenced its personnel."

Given "official secrecy and ridicule," the press has been put in a hopeless position. Who are they to believe, ordinary citizens with wild stories or government officials and highly educated scientists?

More than that, I suspect that the government itself may be in a position at least as difficult. CIA Director Hillenkoetter actually joined a UFO organization, the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP). He resigned from this committee in 1962, saying that he believed the air force had done all it could and the only alternative was to "wait for some action by the UFOs."

Whether or not the visitors somehow compelled the United States government to keep their secret, the fact remains that they themselves could easily make their presence known at a moment's notice. But they remain hidden.

This means that the individual citizen is left alone, ignorant and entirely helpless when they appear in his home. It also means that he can, if he is able and inclined, rise to the challenge, and acquire in the process knowledge and strength that will be deeply his own, and his to keep. No ordinary social institution, no matter how well intentioned, can make such an offer.

It would seem to me that CIA Director Hillenkoetter's UFOs are taking action. And that action—fantastically—is to come into contact with us not as a society but as single individuals, and not in our ordinary state of mind but in a profoundly different state where we are at once more vulnerable and perhaps on a deep level more capable of understanding.

Both the filmmaker and I felt that the briefing paper had been some sort of trick to confuse his attempt to get at the truth, that it had been a clever mix of fact and fiction. By comparing his recollection of its contents with my own memories, we hoped to separate the truth from the lies.

He and I spent about eight hours talking together, comparing notes. Some of his information coincided with things I remembered.

He described what he had been told about the “planet” of the grays: a desert, with a glowing tan sky and adobelike buildings. This was startlingly familiar to me. My experience in 1968 had involved a place of tan skies and adobe structures. Outside the immediate area of the buildings it was a harsh, ugly desert as well. I also remembered that it never really got dark there. Because the planet of the grays was orbiting a binary star system, it also was said to be perpetually light.

I could not believe that I had actually been to another planet orbiting some unimaginably distant star and returned in a single summer. I could easily think, however, that I had been taken on a very realistic simulation of such a journey using a combination of hallucinogenic drugs and hypnosis. After all, my trip really began when the mysterious “nurses” placed three drops of liquid on my tongue.

We also found that some of the beings I had seen in my various experiences and the ones described in the paper were quite similar. Since Communion had not yet been published, the filmmaker had no idea of what I had seen. And yet he described the small, gray beings and their home perfectly, using his data from the briefing paper and other research. In late 1987 the briefing paper itself emerged, released by researchers William Moore and Stanton Friedman. Its contents were very much as the filmmaker recalled them. The paper was declared a fraud by a number of authorities. One who took the trouble to research its authenticity was Dr. Roger W. Wescott, a recognized expert in linguistics with a very high reputation indeed. In a letter dated April 7, 1988, concerning the paper and some other documents allegedly authored by Admiral Hillenkoetter, Dr. Wescott commented: "There is no telling reason to regard any of these documents as fraudulent or to believe that they were written by anyone other than Hillenkoetter himself." He added: "This statement holds for the controversial Presidential Briefing Paper of November 18, 1952." Coming from a forensic expert in linguistics and style of Dr. Wescott's stature, this is stunning support for the authenticity of this incredible document.

According to the filmmaker's information there are two basic types of visitor. In addition to the small beings with large, black eyes there are taller ones, fair-complected and more humanoid, who generally do not induce the same sort of fear in people that the grays elicit.

I had seen these two types of visitor as well as others, including the small men in the blue uniforms I have previously discussed and the white beings who have had such a powerful transformative effect on me.

The best description of the gray beings came to me from a correspondent whose experience was unusual in that it started during the day. Although she ended up with hours of lost time, when she first saw the beings it was broad daylight and she was fully conscious.

"Two of these beings," she wrote, "looked the same and one was taller and thinner. The two short fat ones were about four to four and a half feet tall with broad faces and black enormous eyes but only a hint of where a mouth and nose might have been, almost like a pencil drawing. . . . I instinctively knew these were workers and were male. The other one was female and about five feet tall. She . . . had a very elongated face. Dark piercing huge eyes and once again just a hint of where a nose and mouth may have been.”

After our long conversation, the filmmaker and I felt frustrated. We had, we felt, made some progress, but it was only in the direction of informed conjecture. The description above, however, is very exact, and other things about my correspondent’s experience suggest strongly that it was entirely real and has been accurately reported.

As evening fell the filmmaker and I finished our conversation and went down to dinner. Since early morning it had been rainy and dense with clouds, and it was now drizzling quietly.

I was disappointed because I had wanted our guests to see the magnificent night sky at the cabin.

After dinner we were going to watch an old movie on the tape machine when I suddenly heard a voice quite clearly, like a radio near my left ear. It said, “Go outside.”

I went out on the deck, and beheld a beautiful and awesome sight.

The clouds were leaving the sky, opening like the door of a great observatory. I called the others, and together we watched as the whole cloud mass slid from north to south as if being pushed by a giant ruler. This was literally like a door opening. The line of clouds was perfectly straight.

We stood there watching the stars. Later we went into the hot tub. John Gliedman, who is an amateur astronomer, observed a dim star make some odd maneuvers. It came in from the west and stopped in the constellation Lyra. After remaining for a considerable period of time near Vega it suddenly vanished. To him this was completely inexplicable.

An hour later the clouds came back. The next morning the houseguests left.

Things got very quiet at the cabin. My eagerness to learn about the visitors faded into uneasy fear. I was alone again. The visitors seemed more real to me than they ever had before.

I felt totally vulnerable.

The Terror of the Real

Two days after the guests left I decided to take action on my own behalf. There was only one logical thing to do: confront my fear.

I knew how to go about it. I just didn't want to contemplate what I had to do!

When night fell in the country the woods seemed to rise up around the house and clutch it with avid fingers. There was often a powerful feeling of presence. People would hear footsteps on our decks or porch, see lights shining in the windows, hear strange whistling noises in the sky above the cabin.

The one thing I could not imagine doing—the worst thing—was going outdoors at night. I could barely stand to go near the windows, let alone leave the house. I sweated out each night behind a wall of security devices.

I could not dispel my fear. I'd already determined that not one human soul knows a single certain thing about the visitors. Nobody. And the more knowledge an individual claimed, the more inwardly afraid he would usually turn out to be.

I couldn't get any reassurance from the visitors. I couldn't get even the breath of a promise—let alone a guarantee—that they wouldn't hurt me.

What I had to do was to challenge the whole situation—my fear and the visitors themselves. I could deliver my challenge by the simple process of going out into the woods alone in the dead of the night.

On the night of Friday, August 22, 1986, I attempted to walk out alone.

It was ten-thirty. I had purposely waited until Anne and Andrew were asleep. I went to the side door. It opens onto the deck that overlooks our pool. The water was gleaming softly with light reflected from the house. Beyond there is a low hill, and behind that the woods.

The trees were silent. The quiet that settles over that place at night is amazing in winter, but this was summer and I was somewhat reassured by the singing of the cicadas and the crickets.

I looked toward the dark path that leads into the woods. Dimly I remembered being carried down that very path, struggling, trying to shout.

Slowly, I walked along the deck. I could barely manage to move. My mind was whirling with images of them, faces and hands and whispery, gabbling voices.

The part of my mind that needs to understand soon became full of questions and fear.

The visitors were goblins. Soul-eaters. And I was going into the dark to tempt them.

I stopped at the gate that leads from the deck into the backyard. My hand pulled, but not hard enough. I didn't open it.

And I wasn't going to. The truth was that I couldn't go into my own yard at night, let alone along the path to the woods.

I stood there for a long time, staring into the night. To be frank, the intensity of my fear was greater than I had imagined possible. My throat was cracking dry. I was queasy. I was shaking so hard I almost couldn't control myself.

I'd never witnessed such terror in myself. My mind was frightened, but some other, deeper part of me was literally beside itself. The visitors brought terror to the blood and muscle of me, to the reptile that crouches at the bottom of every human being.

Why? Did my unconscious know something about them that my conscious mind was just beginning to admit?

Finally I turned around and went back into the house.

So much for a walk in the woods. I hadn't even made it off the deck!

The next night came, and again I got stuck at the gate, unable to make myself go through it. The eyes of the visitors were so startlingly, amazingly conscious. No wonder I dreaded facing them.

As the days passed I told some of the scientists I was working with of my attempts to go out at night. It was interesting that not one of these men, not even the most skeptical, thought this was a good idea. My most brutal critic said, "My God. That's the most terrifying thing I've ever heard in my life." Another one added, "If you're walking in those woods and you see something that looks like the Wolfen—no matter how ephemeral it is—get the hell out of there."

So much for scientific objectivity. Understand, these were men who claimed to be sure that there was a prosaic explanation for what was happening to me.

If the mind is not afraid, then the heart is afraid, and if the heart gains courage, then the blood is afraid. In my case, everything was afraid.

And I had good reasons. All of the what if's connected with the visitors arrayed themselves against me. If I made the least gesture of assent, I worried that they would come and steal me away. Or perhaps they would kill me and eat my soul.

I wondered what my scientist friend had really meant when he cautioned me against my own Wolfen.

I reviewed my writings. Except for Communion and one recent short story there is nothing that relates directly to the UFO phenomenon. But the whole corpus of my work seems to reflect some sort of attempt to cope with an enormous, hidden, and frightful reality.

My early poetry is full of references to being lost in time and dancing by night, to a very different view of life than fits convention: "God is wild; I am tame. . . . Night falls and an age ends. . . . We call and are answered through the thick foliage, by voices too strange to be our own. . . .”

The Wolfen were gray, hid in the cracks of life, and used their immense intelligence to hunt down human beings as their natural and proper prey.

Then there was Miriam Blaylock, the vampire in The Hunger. She drank blood, and extracted from it the stuff of souls. They were the source of her immortality. And when her human consorts died, their souls remained forever trapped in their bodies, for all eternity. Like the Wolfen, a part of nature, Miriam describes herself as belonging to “the justice of the earth.”

Black Magic is a novel about secret psychic research and mind control.

And Night Church: Again the issue was a force that could consume the soul.

Was the force I had written about again and again my mind’s way of dealing with suppressed horror of very real visitors? Only in Catmagic had the force emerged in anything like a positive light, and in that book the “fairy” had been responsible for manipulating and controlling human society in such a way that the flowering of souls would be the outcome.

I gave up my attempt to walk in the woods—and I hadn’t even left the deck.

The next morning, of course, I had no trouble at all. I walked freely in the sun. Blue bachelor’s buttons danced along the sunny paths. The deeper woods were fragrant with pine. Tall hickory and maple trees hung over the little brook that borders my property. I could see fingerling trout lurking under stones. The water sounded happy and young and confident.

All of a sudden I felt exhausted. Abruptly I sat down in the middle of the path. I was ready to cry but I did not. I watched a bumblebee amid some clover.

And then I got up and I told myself that I would go into the woods that night. I would do it without fail.

At eleven, I once again went outside. I was in a state of preternatural awareness. Slowly, like a nervous rabbit, I crossed the deck.

I thought to myself that I was being a real fool. You don't tempt a tiger.

I kept on, though. I concentrated on putting one foot in front of the other.

I reached the gate.

I could smell the grass, hear the rustling summer leaves. My legs felt like pillars of stone. I was freezing cold. My heart was thundering; I could hardly breathe.

To help myself I did what I had learned in my years of meditation and inner work. I took my attention and placed it firmly in my center of gravity, just below the navel.

Then I walked down the steps and out into the yard. Every puff of breeze, every crack of twig, set me to vibrating in an ecstasy of dread. I barely managed a circuit around the edge of the grass.

Going into the woods was again impossible.

When I returned to the house I poured myself a brandy. I needed it to calm down, and I felt as though just venturing beyond the gate called for celebration.

The night I slept pretty well, better than I had in some weeks.

The next day was one of quiet and contemplation for me. Again I walked through the sunlit woods, thinking about the difference between dark and light. During the day there was no question of fear. It was at night that I grew afraid.

The mind peoples the shadows of the night with demons.

At about eleven on the night of August 27, I again went outside. It was as hard as it had been before.

I had once again waited until Anne had gone to bed. She and I had discussed these midnight walks, and she had agreed that I had to face them, even if there was an element of danger. She understood my need to confront what frightened me.

I tried to walk up the low hill that leads into the woods. When I got to the top of the hill and stared down into that darkness I was almost paralyzed. I could hear the little brook running, and the faint rustle of an occasional falling leaf. I could not walk into the shadows, not even down the same path I had walked a few hours before in sunlight.

Once more I went around the edge of the yard. At its far end the land drops off into a tangle of brush, and when I got to that point I looked back at the house. The lights were warm, the line of the roof lonely and stark. The cool stars swam above. A meteor streaked across the heavens. I assumed it was part of the Perseid meteor shower, which comes annually in August.

I returned to the house, took a shower, and then went downstairs to do some reading. Dr. Gliedman had given me his essay "Quantum Entanglements: On Atomic Physics and the Nature of Reality," and I had been reading it. I sat in a chair by a window and picked up the manuscript. A glow came around the house, but it was so brief that I ignored it.

It became very quiet. I was awake and alert, perfectly normal in every way. Anne and Andrew were asleep. My cats were sitting on the couch nearby.

The cats both got restless. The Burmese sat up. The Siamese began pacing along the back of the couch.

In his book Catwatching, Desmond Morris reports that research has shown that cats are sensitive to earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and severe electrical storms. It is not known if they are sensitive to vibrations or to a buildup of static electricity. It has also been demonstrated that they are extraordinarily sensitive to the earth's magnetic field.

The Burmese was crouched, staring up at the back wall of the room. The Siamese was walking slowly along with his entire tail stiff and puffed up like the tail of a raccoon.

I called to him and he looked at me with fear in his eyes. It was quite uncharacteristic of this bold, friendly cat.

The cats' fear didn't make sense to me at all. I decided that there must be some animal outside, perhaps a deer. I returned to Dr. Gliedman's essay.

I read the following sentence: "The mind is not the playwright of reality."

At that moment there came a knocking on the side of the house. This was a substantial noise, very regular and sharp. The knocks were so exactly spaced that they sounded like they were being produced by a machine. Both cats were riveted with terror. They stared at the wall. The knocks went on, nine of them in three groups of three, followed by a tenth lighter double-knock that communicated an impression of finality.

These knocks were coming from just below the line of the roof, at a spot approximately eighteen feet above the gravel driveway. Below the point of origin of the knocks were two open windows. Had anybody been out on the driveway with a ladder I would certainly have heard their movements on the gravel.

In addition, to get a ladder to that point they would have activated the movement-sensitive lights. But it was dark beyond the windows.

It would be next to impossible to stand on the sharply angled roof that covers the living room of the cabin. While the angle of the roof above the upstairs bedroom is almost flat, this roof is extremely steep. What's more, I would certainly have heard anybody crawling around on the roof. There would have been creaks and groans from the boards, and there is no question but that I would have noticed the sounds, given the profound silence of the country night.

I am absolutely dead certain about the reality of the knocks. They were not made by the house settling. Nothing but an intentional act could have produced such loud, evenly spaced sounds. They were not a prank being played by neighbors. In the summer of 1986 I had not yet told my neighbors about the visitors. What's more, the prank explanation was hopelessly impractical.

To reach the place from which I heard the knocks it would have taken at least a twelve-foot ladder and a long stick. A ladder that size weighs a lot, even an aluminum one. The people carrying it would have had to go down my driveway without turning on the motion-sensitive lights, and they would have had to place the ladder in gravel without being heard by a man sitting a few feet away from an open window. I ascertained by experiment later that this was not possible.

I cannot emphasize enough that there was and is no way to explain the knocks, except as something done by the visitors. They were not like the vague tappings associated with spiritualism. These were hard and strong and totally real, and their spacing, in three groups of three followed by the lighter double-knock, was precise and regular.

The cats were beside themselves with fear. The Siamese was walking stiff-legged on the dining-room table. The Burmese was staring at the wall, her eyes wide.

Then they both darted away. The Siamese went to my son's room. The Burmese hid on a shelf of linen in the bathroom. When we got up the next morning she was still hiding there. She did not even come out for water until nine-twenty the next night, when she suddenly rushed out and into the cat box.

The moment the knocks ended I had glanced at the clock on the videotape recorder. It read 11:35. The cat remained in hiding for nearly twenty-two hours after hearing the sound.

There was something about the sound that had a significance for her that it did for me. There must have been. Unlike Coe, the Siamese, Sadie is not a fearless cat, but she had never hidden like that before.

To me, the knocks were an absolutely clear indication that something entirely and physically real was present and that it was taking an interest in me.

This is exactly what people who are afraid of the idea of visitors don't want to hear. But I am not lying, I am not confused, I am not mentally ill, and I do not have organic brain disease. In any case, a manifestation like the knocks cannot be put down to disease. Such a thing is not a symptom. My cats would not have reacted to something happening in my mind. I am reporting a true event. It was the first definite, physical indication I had while in a state of completely normal consciousness that the visitors were part of this world.

They were responding to my attempts to develop the relationship and accept my fear by making their physical reality more plain.

The stunning event of August 27, 1986, strengthened my wavering resolve to keep the matter where it belongs, which is in question. It is an awfully serious business, and it cannot be removed from question except as we learn more facts. Should we decide to believe something about this that is not true, we will ruin it for ourselves. We will form yet another mythology around the visitors, as I suspect we have been doing throughout our history.

The moment after the nine knocks I thought to go outside. I also thought, You're not ready yet. You just go up to bed.

The next morning I thought that was exactly what I had done. But there was something wrong. While the knocks were taking place I was unquestionably in a normal state of mind. As soon as I began to move from the chair, though, I feel that I may have entered another state.

Unfortunately, I did not remember that something may have happened after the knocks until weeks later. On the morning after, my immediate thought was that I had failed miserably. The visitors had come, had knocked—and I'd just sat there, too scared even to open the door!

I therefore don't know whether I concocted the subsequent memories to make myself feel better, or if they were hidden by a more prosaic screen memory.

One day I glanced at the clock on our videotape machine and suddenly remembered seeing it when it said 2:18 A.M. An instant later I recalled that I'd seen it reading that time as I went upstairs on the night of the nine knocks. But they had come at 11:35. I thought I'd gone upstairs a few minutes later.

Had I lost nearly three hours of time on that night?

It seemed to me that I had two completely different sets of memories superimposed on one another, both covering the same time period. I could remember sitting in the chair for a moment, putting down the essay, and then going up to bed thinking that I wasn't ready yet to see the visitors face-to-face.

I also vividly recalled going to the door, struggling to open it, and finally getting it open.

I went out onto the deck and looked around. There was nothing. I started to look up but noticed movement beside my right leg and looked down instead. There was something gleaming at waist level: three sets of large, black eyes barely visible in the dim light.

The next thing that happened was that my deck and pool dissolved into a magnificent vision. In this vision I was standing before a field of yellow flowers that rose up a low hill. The sky was black and full of stars so large and bright that it seemed as if I could reach up and touch them.

Even though the sky was dark the flowers were bathed in bright sunlight. As I watched I felt a wind blowing around me from behind. Suddenly children of all ages and sizes were running past me and out into the field, running and laughing through the sunlit flowers and up the low hill. They ran in a dense column, laughing and waving, and I felt an anguish to join them.

They ran up the hill and right into the sky, a glowing column of children, and when they reached the top of the sky they exploded into new stars.

A voice said to me, "This is the field where the sins of the world are buried." I wanted to go out to it but I could not, and that was painful, but I was filled with joy just to know that it was there.

Both the memory of going upstairs and the one of this vision covered the same time period. Frankly, the second memory sequence seemed more real, although it was far more extraordinary than the first.

Later I told my brother about this experience, and he said “The odd thing is that I’ve had a private fantasy of a field of yellow flowers all of my life. When I’m relaxing I often imagine that field.”

The following spring we were to make a lovely discovery at the house. After an absence of three or four weeks we returned to find that there actually was a field of yellow flowers where I had seen one the previous August.

It turned out that the landscape architect had planted the area with bulbs in October—without, of course, knowing of my vision. I had not even known that she had done the planting, let alone what kind of bulbs she had used.

By coincidence she had chosen yellow daffodils.

TWELVE

Fire of the Question

In the days after I heard the nine knocks I was shattered, overwhelmed. I remembered their eerie precision—three groups of three perfectly measured, exactly spaced sounds, each precisely as loud as the one previous. And then there had been a soft double-knock, completely different in tone from the others. It had communicated a distinct sense of finality, and seemed by its lightness of tone not to be a part of the group. The nine knocks were a sort of communication. The tenth was punctuation.

I tried everything to duplicate those knocks. We tossed stones at the house from a distance. I clambered up on the roof and tried to lie down and do it with a stick. In those days there wasn't even a gutter in which to brace one's foot. I tested the sensitivity limits of the automatic lights. There was no way to get to the windows without turning them on. I had people creep up to the house with ladders. No matter how quiet they were, I heard them easily. And once they did get up to the spot where the knocks had come from, nobody could even begin to duplicate what I can only describe as the terrible accuracy of those sounds.

I had people tap from different locations on the wall, thinking that perhaps I had misread taps that had actually been produced from lower down. But it was easy to tell where the knocks had come from. I even called the Audubon Society to find out if there was any species of bird that might peck the side of a house at night. No woodpecker makes sounds like that. What about squirrels, rats, mice, coons? All as unlikely as an insomniac woodpecker, because of the extraordinary precision of the sounds.

I also experimented a little with the cats. At exactly 11:35 a few nights later, using a ladder that I had placed in the afternoon, I went up and repeated the knocks as best I could. Sadie hardly glanced up. Coe didn't notice at all. My knocks were as loud as the ones the visitors had made. But the cats remained indifferent.

I finally sat myself down and told myself to face facts. The knocks had been real, physical events. They had been made by something that was part of the physical world. Whatever it was must have been observing me carefully, watching me try to overcome my fears. It had responded to my struggle.

This went beyond everything I had imagined or anticipated. If only I hadn't hesitated in the moment after the knocks, would I have met the visitors in full and normal consciousness? What would have happened if I'd gotten up and gone outside at once?

Thoughts like that tormented me.

The nine knocks made me struggle even harder to understand. And I did not understand. But I had a few ideas.

It was as if I had discovered an unknown world that has always been around us, that may be an even greater reality. I remembered that in the golden city there had been all of those strange stadiums, lit with amazingly bright lights. I'd had the impression that they were jammed with observers, that the streets and buildings were empty because the inhabitants were all in them. But there had been no sound and I had been unable to rise high enough to see within. When I finally rose above the city, the light in the stadiums was so bright I still couldn't see.

What was happening down inside them? Had I been able to look, would I have seen our lives there, our struggles being enacted before silent angelic audiences?

During this time the nature of my fear changed. Previously it had contained an element of the abstract about it. Somewhere inside myself I had been assuming that I would be able to wake up even from the worst, most fearful visitor experience.

I realized that they must have been aware of my attempts to walk in the woods. I felt more than watched; I felt entered and observed from within.

The fear of kidnapping resurfaced. I twisted and turned on the horns of the dilemma. How could I protect my family? What would I do if they actually took Andrew—or me, or Anne, or all of us?

The sense of helplessness was appalling. Who could I call? The police, the FBI? Like this whole society, these organizations are victims of the process of denial and ridicule described by CIA Director Hillenkoetter. Officially they ignore the visitors. Unofficially, they laugh.

There was no hope of help at all. Even the most well meaning of our friends and supporters could not really understand the situation we were in.

I and my family were facing the hardest, most terrifying and remarkable thing, and we were facing it by ourselves. Or, more accurately, I was facing it. My wife and son were insulated from the full impact of the thing, because it wasn't happening to them directly.

It would have been beyond my ability to endure this had there not been something about the nine knocks that offered me the promise of new understanding.

I will not lie and say that I overcame my fear. I did not overcome my fear. They were physically real. This meant that all of my clever speculation went by the boards. What was I to do? Where was I to turn? The strength of religion, the power of intellect, sheer physical courage, all blew away like so much dust.

During the seconds that the knocks were taking place I had not been particularly afraid. More shocked and amazed. The fear reasserted itself afterward, and it was still very much with me.

Every time I thought that I might not have gotten up and walked out of that house on my own I agonized. Why was I so fearful? Why couldn't I overcome the primitive parts of myself and show a little courage?

I was suffering with such thoughts when I suddenly realized that the nine knocks had a very special and wonderful meaning for me.

Back in the early seventies a man whose intelligence and commitment to spiritual development I respected very much had given me a set questions to ask when I was really at sea about something.

There were nine questions. Just as the knocks had been, they were divided into three groups of three.

The nine questions are as follows:

GROUP 1

- What is the nature of the substance or problem?
- What is its origin?
- What is its composition?

GROUP 2

- What is its function?
- Who possesses, controls or causes it?
- What is my opinion of it?

GROUP 3

- What is my relationship to it?
- What are my expectations of it?
- What is its destiny?

Perhaps the nine knocks were organized into three groups of three for reasons I knew nothing about. But they had jogged my memory, and I could use the nine questions to clarify things for myself.

I understood that the only thing now standing between me and helpless panic was my ability to ask questions.

The trick would be, though, not to jump on definite, final answers. Simple answers close doors. And I did not want to close them, I wanted to open them wider!

I sat down and began to work with the nine questions. I worked with the desperation of the possessed. At last I had a tool. The questions could put borders around things, define limits, perhaps suggest new directions for me to take.

From my journal:

“What is their nature? I am thrilled by their power. Also, frightened. Curiously I want them with me, to care about me. At the same time, I’m so darned scared. Why? Control is the issue. I don’t want to give up control, but they are very controlling. They feel like something that is both deep inside me and far away.

“Their origin? Oh, people say this and that. Some that they are from Zeta Reticuli. Others that they are from another star system, or even from Mars. If they are from another planet, it does not seem to me that they just got here. Are there cities somewhere, swarming with them, street corners where they are commonplace? Do they have libraries and restaurants and names? Why do they all dress alike? Why don’t they laugh? Is there anyplace I know they are from? I know they are from the night.

“Composition? That’s impossible! I can’t even begin to answer that. Skin, flesh, blood, bones? What would it be like to kiss them? Are they warm? Why do I think of their hands? Cool. Yes, and I remember they have a smell, pungent, organic. I want them to touch me. I want them near me. But they act like predators.

“Function—not as far as they are concerned, as far as I am concerned. They are not only functioning in my life to terrify me. They have another function. They are forcing me to grow. Stressing me so much that my mind is evolving. Rats—there were tests of rats in the seventies. Stress tests. Rats were stressed with electrocution. Day after day they were made to suffer for long periods of time. They grew stronger, their brains got larger, they became better rats. . . . I think this is mentioned by Joseph Chilton Pearce in Magical Child. Dora Ruffner told me about the book.

“And suddenly a voice—a tired, young voice says as clear as day: ‘Thank you.’ Them. Their function is in some way to make us evolve. And now at last I know a little something.

“Who is in control? Obviously, them. But no, that isn’t true at all. Who walked out into the night? I did. Who wants them to come back? I do. And that is the truth.

“How about my opinion? So unsure. Maybe they are the best friends I could ever have. Friends with the courage to be hard on me in order to help me grow. But they are so terrifying. They come across as very negative. But the whole universe exists because of friction between negative and positive. Atomic friction causes the heat and light of the stars. Positive and negative forces battle perpetually. This is simple, physical reality. Does that make negative forces evil? No, essential!

“Words of Jesus, from Matthew: ‘But I say to you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you. . . .’ Oh, Jesus, you knew, didn’t you? You knew how to work with a force like this.

“Relationship. Yes, a big relationship! I actually have a real relationship with you, and you are real! Have you been our demons all along, tempting us, tormenting us, laboring through the ages on behalf of our growth? Is that why you sound so tired? What promise there is in this relationship, a new world!

“Expectations? Do I have them? I’ll say I do! Thousands of them! Now that I am beginning to work on these questions, I expect to grow. Still, though, I sense deep inside a raw, primitive terror that doesn’t even have access to words.

“Destiny—a word full of the wind and the night. When I think of destiny I think of huge fleets sailing off the edge of the world. Destiny is a child laughing suddenly in the middle of the night. It is the hardest hour, when dawn is just coming and I lie unable to sleep, feeling the lives of those I love like sand in my fingers. It is toxic wind overspreading the earth, dioxin on a summer breeze. It is the smiling old sun. It is the peace that we all are seeking, that is perhaps the deep, true reason that life emerged in the first place.”

The nine questions helped me enormously. In reminding me of them the visitors gave me a marvelous tool. Suddenly I was no longer the victim. Armed with good questions, I was a partner in my experience, and possibly its master.

Before the nine questions, the visitors seemed to be in total control. They were terrible, implacable predators.

Now I knew a truth: I loved them, wanted them, needed them, chose them, and called them.

I was responsible for the visitor experience becoming a part of my life. I was not being randomly oppressed by them.

I saw us on our little blue planet hanging in the dark, and suddenly I felt loved and cherished by something huge and warm and incredibly terrible.

We and the visitors were together seeking our truth and our destiny. Pressing us from every side was the night.

The golden city floated into my thoughts. I knew now the meaning of the towers of white light that blazed there: In the golden city night has no end. But neither does that light, for it is the eternal fire of truth, and also the light of any ordinary human heart.

THIRTEEN

The Jolt of the True

I was changed by those nine knocks, but the people around me weren't. It seemed to me that nobody could really grasp that they meant the visitors were a physical reality. The reason, of course, was that I had been the only person who had heard them. To me this pointed out the fact that people had to participate personally in the visitor experience if they were to feel its full impact. No amount of description, no level of sincerity, no proof, could equal the awesome jolt of the real thing.

In August I had sent the manuscript of Communion to my brother, Richard.

Like my sister, he'd had a very complicated reaction to the book. Both of them had certain memories that were hard to explain in normal terms, my sister more than my brother. Was the visitor experience, then, the explanation for things that had happened to all three of us?

Richard tended to take an uncommitted view of the matter. He felt certain that something had happened to me. But he was not comfortable with either the psychological explanation or the conventional UFO explanation.

Back in the mid-seventies, he and his friend Ann Cotton had been traveling in West Texas when they had seen some unusual lights beside the road. They were in an isolated area, and had just passed through a town. A short time later they found themselves passing through the same town again, going in the same direction. At the time it happened Richard mentioned this incident to me. Neither of us thought of it in terms of a visitor experience.

He was concerned that my manuscript implied too strongly that the visitors were a physical reality. When I told him about the nine knocks he listened with interest, but the story seemed to have little real impact on him.

He decided to come up to the cabin over the weekend of September 12–14. He'd never been there before and he was eager to see the location of the story, and to discuss it with me in more depth.

The day before he arrived, a small but important incident took place in New York City. My wife saw, in the middle of a clear afternoon, a silver disk move from south to north across the city. It was going fast, and we decided that it must have been some sort of helicopter, because we could not imagine such a thing passing through city skies unnoticed.

Much later, in January 1987, I discovered how open the city skies really are to the visitors. Some friends saw an object over the city at night. They observed it hovering for about half an hour, and even saw a helicopter take evasive action. One of these people is a star marksman, and he was able to describe the object with such care that I could not doubt that it had been one of the large boomerang-shaped UFOs that have been reported so often in the Hudson Valley region north of New York. As an experiment I called the relevant police precinct to report it. When he heard "UFO," the duty officer said, "Let 'em come," and hung up the phone.

The visitors are certainly capable of penetrating to the center of cities. Our society has so completely dismissed them that they have free reign here. Because of all the debunking and denial they can come and go as they please and do what they want, and be confident that they will be ignored. It is ironic that those who deny the existence of the visitors are actually doing their work for them.

I noted Anne's sighting in my journal and did no more about it. At the time it seemed a small but interesting fact, nothing more than that.

On Friday, September 12, we picked up Richard at the airport and drove up to the country. In addition to myself and Anne and Andrew, Richard and a family friend, Denise Daniels, were with us. Saturday was a beautiful day. At about eight in the evening we all went for a walk to the meadow that lies beyond our woods. As we moved through the woods I was feeling quite proud of my place and of the best sellers like Warday that had enabled me to buy it. Perhaps I was doing a little too much prideful explaining to my younger brother.

Suddenly I heard a loud, very old, and low voice say, "Arrogance! I can do what I wish to you."

I practically jumped out of my skin. The others had gotten ahead of me on the path. Their total lack of reaction told me that they hadn't heard a thing.

When we reached the meadow we could see the moon coming up over the line of trees on an easterly ridge. There was a beautiful star beside the moon that I assumed was Jupiter, which would have been rising that night in that approximate position.

A few moments later Richard said, "That star is moving." All five of us observed this phenomenon clearly.

The bright star proceeded to move toward the moon, disappear as it crossed its face, then reappear on the other side. Gathering speed, it curved around under the moon and dropped lower. It seemed to get larger and come closer to us. Then it stopped. After a moment it moved off, gathering speed again. For a moment it disappeared, seeming to flash off. When it reappeared again it was moving really fast, speeding. Then it disappeared again, this time for good.

The next moment it seemed to me that there was a light fog around us in the meadow. I had the impression that three people were coming out of the woods toward us. I called to my son, momentarily confused as to his whereabouts even though he was standing right beside me. My brother stared fixedly at the woods.

Later he said that he'd also felt the impression that there were three people standing where I had been looking, and had fought an almost overwhelming desire to walk toward them into the woods.

We had all seen the strange moving star. There was no question about that. It did not have a disk shape. In all respects it appeared to be a star. It wasn't a plane or a meteor because it had remained stationary for too long beside the moon. Even if it had been coming directly toward us, it wouldn't have appeared to be motionless for so long. It couldn't have been a satellite because of its odd maneuvers. It wasn't Jupiter because it flew off. And its speed was too high to be explained in any ordinary way.

We returned to the house, feeling rather shaken. I reported the voice I'd heard, and as night fell my brother wondered if we were going to have a peaceful sleep.

Despite the event, though, we all slept well and were not disturbed in any way.

Both Richard and Denise were changed by what they saw. No rational person could attribute the sighting to a known source. Now my brother listened to me with new interest. Denise went from believing the standard debunking scenario to realizing that there was actually something quite astonishing taking place.

As we drove them to the airport on Sunday afternoon they both commented on their change of perspective. I reflected on how much this had depended on the visitors themselves. Reading Communion had not changed them. Hearing my experiences had not done it. But seeing a light in the sky, completely impossible to explain as anything but a UFO, had done it.

No doubt that is one explanation for all the brightly lighted objects that are seen, the visitations that take place, the constant sense of intrusion into our lives. Rather than approach us through the medium of our social institutions, the visitors have chosen to come into contact with us on an individual basis, reaching us soul by soul.

After Richard was gone I began to wonder about the voice. Nobody else had heard it, but it had come to me only minutes before we saw the strange light in the sky. Was I stretching things to think that the two might be related? As usual, there was no final way to answer the question.

It had been so loud and so real—and so incredibly stern. “Arrogance! I can do what I wish to you.” Was I getting too arrogant? I didn’t feel particularly prideful. One doesn’t, I suppose, when one is.

The previous Friday I had made a large transfer of funds from one bank to another. This represented, as a matter of fact, all the cash I had. Without it I would not have been able to meet my obligations and would have been forced into bankruptcy.

Late Monday afternoon my accountant called to tell me that the money had disappeared. My agent told me it was a computer error of some kind. Nobody could understand what had happened. I was frantic. Beside myself. But before I could get a fuller explanation the banks all closed for the day.

I sweated through Monday night in a state of terrific upset. I possessed only what was in my wallet. If that money wasn’t found, we were going out into the streets. On Tuesday morning it developed that an inexplicable computer error had caused the money literally to evaporate into electronic oblivion. Sufficient paper records were eventually found, so that the sum was recovered. Nobody at the banks had ever seen anything like it.

As I put down the phone after being told this good news, Anne came into my office. She’d seen another disk, going in the same direction as the first, at just the moment that the call had come through.

It was like a period at the end of a sentence.

My frame of mind was such that I became convinced that the visitors had just made a show of strength. It was like a lesson in humility, expertly designed and managed, and incredibly effective. After seeing all that money evaporate before my eyes, I was a chastened man.

Whether the visitors caused these events to come into my life I will never know. I think that there was a relationship, mainly because of the theatrical nature of the lesson. I was learning that demonstration and theater were the primary means the visitors were using to communicate with me. Compared to the demonstrations, the voice communications were minor.

In the past three weeks, because of these demonstrations, I'd seen my experience enter a new level of realism. I had heard them at my house when I was wide awake. And now I might well have had a taste of what they could do to me unless I admitted my arrogance and made an effort to change.

September passed, the summer lingering and softening into fall. Late in the month we moved back to the city. I was still struggling in a desultory way with sweets, but the visitors seemed to have become silent about the issue, and then to have retreated from the center of my life. I was beginning to think that I could at last forget.

FOURTEEN

Distant Witness

As summer turned to fall, they entered my life again.

The last weekend in September was mild. We were in the city and were having a lot of fun enjoying the Saturday afternoon crowds and the shops along Bleecker Street. We'd taken Andrew to a comics shop where he'd hit the jackpot, finding four favorites that he hadn't read. Anne and I had gotten some books and records we'd been wanting.

The world seemed incredibly real to me, and yet also distant, as if it were all reflected in pools of new rain.

This was an afternoon far from the visitors. The sky was blue, the air was warm, and I was entirely surrounded by other people. Safe. I walked along licking an ice cream cone.

All of a sudden a young voice cried out to me, "Can you stop eating that!" I turned, expecting to see a child, but there was nobody beside me. It sounded exactly as if a child of about eight had shouted in my ear.

I remembered the visitors' admonition about sweets and decided, experimentally, to toss away the cone. The moment I discarded it, three young voices shouted in unison, "He threw away ice cream for us!"

This sounded totally real, but so close to my ear that it couldn't have been generated by somebody, say, hanging out of an apartment window or standing across the street. I had never heard disembodied voices before the visitor experience started.

They made me uneasy, because they are a classic symptom of schizophrenia. I could not claim that these voices were not of the type that schizophrenics hear; I'd read extensively in the literature of the disease and knew that schizophrenics hear every imaginable sort of voice.

However, this was my only symptom. Some paranoids hear voices, and often these voices give them commands, but what I was hearing lacked a quality of grandiosity that seemed to me to be associated with paranoid imaginings. There was something very ordinary about these voices. They sounded like people, and they weren't commanding me in grandiloquent terms.

They were also incredibly spontaneous. Nowhere, not even far back in my mind, was there the feeling that I was manufacturing them. If somebody had put a small radio in my ear, the voices would have sounded exactly as these did. There was even the slightly tinny quality that one associates with small speakers.

What was more important to me, though, was the total absence of other symptoms that would be associated with psychological disease.

In subsequent weeks I got a number of similar messages, some of them about sweets and some about other foods. I ended up eating a more-or-less vegetarian diet, drinking no caffeine, and really struggling with the sweets.

I struggled so much and the voices were so persistent that I finally asked them, in thought, why I should stop eating sweets. The reply was immediate: "We will show you."

Thus began the first of a series of theatrical communications that were extremely revealing of how the visitors chose to transmit information.

What they did was breathtaking.

I was sitting quietly in my apartment office on the afternoon of October 1 when I asked the question, and the quickness of the reply suggested to me that I should wait right there.

I waited an hour but nothing happened. Then I got annoyed, went out to the kitchen, and got a Dove Bar from the freezer and ate it with relish.

On Tuesday, October 2, I lunched with Australian film director Philippe Mora. He had renewed the acquaintance we'd had in London in 1968 by inviting me to a screening of his new film, Death of a Soldier. Afterward we ate together and I told him a little bit about the visitor experience. He listened with a certain amount of interest, but the conversation went no further. As we parted, he mentioned that he was going to Australia to work on another project.

It was now October 7 (October 8 in Sydney). I was in my office when the phone rang. It was Philippe, phoning from Sydney. What follows is a close rendering of the conversation.

Philippe said, "Do you remember Martin Sharp from London days?"

I hadn't seen him in nearly twenty years, but I remembered Martin well enough. I'd been to his flat, the Pheasantry, on the King's Road in Chelsea during my year there. "I remember Martin."

"Something odd's happened to his mother. I thought you might be able to shed some light on it."

"What happened?"

"Well, last night she woke up and found something very odd. There were half a dozen little men in her room; men wearing broad-brimmed hats like Asian farmers' hats."

"Little men?"

"Yes. I thought you might be able to give us some idea of what happened, in view of that story you told me. They lifted her up to the ceiling, Whitley, and then put her down again. They didn't hurt her, but she's upset."

"I can understand that. Does she believe in fairies, ghosts, anything like that?"

"No."

"Does she take an interest in UFOs?"

"Mrs. Sharp is very conservative. I doubt if she's ever even thought about them. What do you think happened to her?"

"I'm not sure. Is there anything at all that's unusual about her?"

"Well, she's quite ill. Probably dying. She's bedridden."

"With what?"

“One thing I know she has is an uncontrollable form of diabetes. Very bad.”

A shock went through me. The visitors had been telling me not to eat sweets. I asked them why and they said that they would show me. A few days later here was this call: A woman indirectly acquainted with me had been raised to the ceiling by “little men” and she was severely diabetic.

Mrs. Sharp passed away in late 1986, dying of liver cancer and diabetes. Martin and Yensoon Tfai, a close family friend who had been with her the morning after the incident, wrote me about it in 1987. Yensoon, who is a very traditional Chinese, offered a transcript of the notes she had written for her diary shortly after the incident. The notes were taken from Mrs. Sharp’s description of what happened. Yensoon interprets Mrs. Sharp’s experience in entirely Chinese terms, thus offering a fascinating insight into the way cultural background controls our perceptions of the visitor experience—as it probably has throughout the ages.

Yensoon wrote:

“In the evening of the 7th of October, 1986, Mrs. Sharp partook of a bowl of Chinese herbs.” (Note: The herbs involved would not have induced hallucinations even a short time after consumption, let alone eight to ten hours later.) “She was wide awake the following morning at 4 A.M. Looking up at the ceiling with her right arm raised in the air, she suddenly saw seven little Chinese men appear and descend from the ceiling. They were three feet tall, all of them wearing Chinese coolie hats with a round brim. Their bodies were round, each of them wearing a different color, red, green, blue and yellow. The yellow little man seemed to be the leader. He gave Mrs. Sharp a stern and icy cold look. As if a hole was bored into her heart and she shuddered. His subordinates were much more genial to her. They smiled at her and the blue little man touched her hand, murmuring words of comfort. She found that he had a slimy and soft body. The ‘leader’ motioned his subordinates to lift Mrs. Sharp up to the ceiling and then put her down onto the floor. She protested and ordered them to put her back to bed, but to no avail. In a trice, she found herself in a verdant park. The sun was setting. Although the surroundings were a joy to her eyes, no living things were visible, only the wind was sighing amidst the trees. It struck a note of desolation to her. She felt a sense of despair. The little blue man presented her with a blue silk flowing robe, which she happily put on because it was her favorite color. The moment she put it on the sun suddenly sank beyond the horizon and they lifted her up in the darkness, at which time she lost consciousness. Upon regaining consciousness she found herself to be in her own bed. After this episode, Mrs. Sharp's condition declined rapidly."

Yensoon also described the little men as being "like Chinese mushrooms," referring both to their shape and to the texture of their skin. Many people who have been close to the visitors have noted this skin quality. To my mind, this is a very exact description of one type of visitor. Their skin is clammy and they are small, round, and quite strong—very much in contrast to the taller ones, such as the being I depicted on the cover of Communion, who seem frail by comparison.

Yensoon also pointed out that the deceased wears a blue silk robe in a Chinese funeral. To me the appearance of this robe was another example of the way the experience alters itself to fit the cultural references of the people it is affecting. There was thus a message not only for Jo Sharp and me but also for Yensoon. It cannot be forgotten, however, that Mrs. Sharp was physically touched by the beings, and vividly described exactly the way this felt. It is all too easy to retreat from the idea that the visitors are physically real—at least at times. They effortlessly translated her from the physical world into another reality, one that seemed to be a sort of archetypal place of death.

Upon reading this account, I remembered my hypnosis session covering events that occurred on the night of October 4, 1985. During that session I had seen my son in a beautiful but strangely desolate park. I had thought him dead and had experienced emotional devastation.

Could there be an actual place somewhere, in some parallel reality, where the dead linger in sighing gardens?

If the soul exists, then it must in some way be a part of nature and so subject both to its laws and to the application of appropriate science. Perhaps Jo Sharp's soul was extracted from her body and she was given a vividly symbolized demonstration of what awaited her. One can imagine the strange, empty park, the wind sighing in the trees, the sun setting . . . the images of death abound, gentle and strange.

My own contact with the visitors was full of vivid demonstrations and symbols. The rich theatrics reported by Jo Sharp seem to me to be characteristic of one form of close communion with them.

Martin Sharp added in a letter, "Jo (my mother) was not a person to hallucinate . . . and though highly imaginative she was not a vocally spiritual person. Indeed, she would say, 'The only thing "up there" are possums in the roof.' (Which there were.)"

Later, when her death was approaching and she would lapse into a hypoglycemic coma, the doctors would feed her barley sugar to bring her out of it. During this period there were a number of episodes that Martin found upsetting. While she was in coma she would talk, taking on two different personalities. One of them seemed almost cheerful to him, and was cooperative. The other was duplicitous and strange, and resisted taking the sugar. "The other manifestation was positively sinister. She would appear totally collapsed . . . unconscious almost. . . . She, or rather 'it' would watch my every move through half-closed eyes. The 'unconsciousness' seemed a ploy because she appeared possessed by an alien, hateful intelligence—cruel, arrogant, despising help, strong. I would say physically strong. (My mother was very frail.) Palpably evil. The whole atmosphere of her room would change. It was most upsetting. Her doctor would sidestep the issue when I tried to talk about it. This entity would not take barley sugar, or would manage to hold the barley sugar in the mouth and not suck on it, spit it out, do almost anything to avoid the return of consciousness which the barley sugar would effect." He went on to say, "Jo would have no memory of these experiences when the 'invader' retreated after the sugar solution had its effect. I thought it was very important to discuss but no doctor would. If I'd known more about exorcism I think I would have attempted to do it."

Martin's interpretation of all this was that she had somehow been possessed by the spirit or essence of her disease. He wrote, "I believe that the spirit which possessed my dear mother in these times was using her as a window."

Even before I received Martin's and Yensoon's written descriptions of the events, I was aware that Mrs. Sharp's initial experience had been intimately connected with death. The beings had lifted her up as if in demonstration, and then shifted her—or her soul—into a symbolized representation of death. The message for me was crystal clear: If I continued to eat sweets, I too would end up there.

The visitors had somehow sifted through the grains of my life and found the mother of a man I hadn't seen in twenty years, determined that she was diabetic, and done something to her that would get back to me through Philippe. It suggested extraordinary powers of observation, at the very least. They obviously had the ability to examine lives in detail, and then to find the most useful person to serve as the object of their demonstration.

This event led me to the thought that the visitors may have a far more sophisticated ability to enter our lives than we have even begun to suspect. More important, it was becoming clear to me, based not only on my own experience but on that of Mrs. Sharp and others, that they appeared to be involved with what happens to man after death.

I was having a lot of trouble grappling with that concept, largely because it made me feel so helpless. I began to want very badly to understand more about the soul. At the time I was, like the great majority of people, very unsure about whether or not it even existed. I resolved to begin research into it. But at the moment it seemed to me that I was faced with an urgent mandate. Fulfilling it would be simple enough.

All I had to do was stop eating sweets. Again I tried, more seriously this time. I found that it was amazingly difficult. I ended up in the ridiculous position of pacing the floor over the fact that there was a box of Oreos in the cupboard.

I had thought of myself as being mildly addicted to sweets. But when I really tried to stop, my “mild addiction” became a devil!

My earlier thoughts about the meaning of sacrifice returned to mind. I had to admit to myself that I understood the principle of it. I understood very well. I just didn’t want to do it.

In the early days of Christendom people used to go into the desert to emulate Christ with fasting and prayer. They would spend months, years, a lifetime, struggling to reach Christ through self-denial and privation.

I managed to go four days without ice cream, and then I bought a pint of Häagen-Dazs vanilla and ate half of it.

I realized that I wasn’t strong enough to deny myself. My consumption of sweets went back to my normal moderate level. I decided that this was a more sane way to live. I wasn’t really interested in trying to copy even a small part of the life-style of crazed third-century hermits.

The visitors did not respond at once. Instead they moved slowly and carefully to the point of anger. Their restraint amounted, I suppose, to a kind of tolerance of my weakness.

But their tolerance had its limits.

“Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:

The Soul that rises with us, our life’s Star,

Hath had elsewhere its setting,

And cometh from afar . . .”

—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, “Ode:

Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood”

BEYOND THE DARK

Part Three

The Woods

Sooner or later I was going to have to go down into those woods. My relationship with the visitors was beginning to demonstrate to me that burying fear and coping with it were two different things. I had to face it, to taste it, to take its measure—and that was only possible when it was making my legs wobble and my mouth go dry.

I extended our time in the city. The lights seemed so reassuring.

I was now fully aware that I was in a relationship with physical visitors. I was consciously trying to deepen and enrich it even though I did not know if they were dangerous.

The more I challenged my fears, the more involved with me they became.

The cabin waited for my return. The woods waited.

I strongly suspected that they could have walked into my house and dispelled my terror of them in a moment. That they did not was probably an ethical act. By leaving me in the dark they were granting me the chance to surmount my fears on my own.

Time after time the fact of the relationship would hit me anew. I would be walking down a street, sitting in a movie theater, reading to my boy, eating breakfast, when suddenly the thought would come again, They're real.

I still didn't know who or even what they were. But those things didn't matter now. I would leave the solution to those problems to the future, or to the visitors themselves. They are clearly in complete control of the situation. It is probable that they could come forward publicly if they wished. But they don't. I doubt if anything we can do would change the plan by which they are revealing themselves to us. The point, for me, was not to worry about who they were but to make use of what they had to offer.

Instead of harming me, the visitors seemed to be daring me to transcend my weaknesses. I began to see an elegant and objective ethic behind their frightening manifestations and weird demands. If I could bear their presence in my life, if I could surmount my fears and my weaknesses, I was going to learn some extraordinary things.

At any rate, with the lights of the city around me, that's how I rationalized things. Why I considered the city such a safe haven I don't know. I suppose it just felt safe, because of all the activity and the people.

We went back to the cabin on September 26, 1986, arriving at about five. After dinner we watched an old movie on the tape machine.

When it was over I put Andrew to bed with a story and returned to the living room to read. At ten Anne went upstairs.

I waited until about midnight. I sat reading in the same chair where I had heard the nine knocks.

I would rather have gone out earlier, when my neighbors were still awake, but the sense of vulnerability and isolation that the late night brings seemed essential to a full experience.

There was absolutely no question in my mind about one thing: Whatever the visitors were, they could become physical. How deeply they could penetrate our reality—if they did not originate in it—I did not know.

Finally the clock struck twelve times. I got up, took a deep breath. As the chimes died away, absolute silence enveloped me.

I went over to the side door, opened it, and stepped out onto the deck. Everything was familiar. We had closed the pool and its dark-green cover loomed like a great shadow at my feet. I listened to the cicadas crying and the occasional thump of a bullfrog down in the slow water behind the house.

I was scared, of course, but I would not have been there if that was all the situation had to offer me. There was also the tremendous, growing wonder. The visitors were real. This was prime experience.

I felt that my previous attempts to challenge my fear had drawn them closer to me. Would this attempt cause a meeting?

I crossed the deck. My hands were shaking, but I opened the gate into the yard without too much difficulty. It swung out with a creak. I looked up into the dark sky.

Then I took the three steps down to the backyard. I kept having the feeling that something was going to drop out of the sky and grab me.

I walked up the low hill that leads into the woods. I looked down into the dark, then turned around and looked back at my little cabin. There was only one lighted window. I imagined Anne and Andrew asleep in their beds. We are so small and new and confused, we human beings. And yet, a man can go into the woods at midnight.

As I descended into the blackness under the trees, I had to turn on the small flashlight I had brought. I could have taken a powerful torch, but I wanted only enough light to enable me to keep to the path.

Slowly, hesitantly, I went down the way a few steps. The woods seemed as still as a leopard waiting for me to come near.

I remembered racing home from the neighbors when I was a boy, my steps echoing in the empty street, the shadows lurching and twisting around me. I had been scared to look up at the sky for fear that I would see great eyes staring down at me.

Sweat was blinding me. I was shaking and nauseated. I decided that I wasn't going to make it. The path was too dark and the woods were too big and, God help me, the visitors were too real.

At that moment I thought to myself, You can turn around and go back to the house and give up.

But I didn't want to give up. I refused, absolutely, to turn back. I remembered being taken into these woods on the night of December 26, 1985.

My mind screamed at me, Go back! Don't do this!

Something slithered on the path. The cicadas stopped. The crickets stopped. In the menacing silence that followed, I heard what sounded like the whisper of leaves against soft cloth. It was coming up the path, this sound.

My breath began to choke me. My heart was laboring. I thought to myself that a man could die of fright. The Reverend Robert Kirk, who wrote The Secret Common-Wealth, an early and brilliant treatise on the hidden life of the fairy, died of an apoplectic fit while walking on a fairy mound where beings had been seen a few days before. Ambrose Bierce, a great and very enigmatic horror writer who was deeply involved in occult work, simply disappeared.

The sound grew more and more distinct. I didn't know whether to run. You don't run from a menacing animal. But this?

The movements stopped. Now the path was like a bristling, hostile wall. I peered into the deeper darkness.

You go back, my inner voice said to me. You don't have to do this. Go back, go to bed.

But that was a lie. I did have to do this. It had fallen to me to do it.

No matter what, I was walking out into those woods.

Even though I wasn't sad, tears poured down my face. The inner man was crying. I felt like somebody was standing in front of me in the path, but there wasn't anybody there. There was no way for me to tell if I was really being menaced or if my imagination was running away with me. As a professional writer I use my imagination as a tool. I know it well. Still, in a situation as extreme as this I could not be sure if it was tricking me or not.

I put one foot out. Then the other. I reached ahead into the black, waved my arms. There was a hissing, sighing noise—blowing leaves, or them?

Pine needles crunched beneath my feet; the trees seemed so large, the path so narrow. My light was inadequate and I was soon struggling in confusion through the undergrowth. Then I found the way again and went on, down deeper and deeper into the darkness, toward the meadow beyond the woods.

I felt as if somebody was going to reach out and touch me. This sensation almost drove me mad with terror, it was so strong. My movements became jerky and uncontrolled. I was at the edge of blind panic.

It seemed an infinity of time before I came to the end of the tree-clad path. Then, quite suddenly, I was there. Before me stood the night meadow, a grand expanse in the darkness.

I remember how wide the sky seemed to become as I left the woods, and how the night was spread with the stuff of magic. I stood there for a short time, then faced the woods again.

As I walked I imagined a voice whispering eagerly, "He's coming this way." I stopped. At this point the path forks. One fork leads toward the house by an old road. The other takes a more roundabout way through the deeper woods.

There was a lot of fear, but there was also a thrill involved in this. The night woods were absolutely sensuous. The silence was a marvel.

I took the long way. I might as well have been in a cave, it was so dark. As I walked I kept turning around, listening, stopping. But I saw and heard nothing.

Once I got out of the deep woods I saw the house again. It looked so sweet and warm that I almost wept as I walked up to it. And then I was inside. It was over. I had finally done it.

I half expected to confront the visitors that night, but I did not. I learned something from that walk that I did not want to forget, not ever: Where the incoherent animal lives at the foundation of my being, I was literally sick with dread over the visitors.

That was where I had to do my work. I had to go down in there and shine some light. Change at that primitive core level was what I needed.

Change. Could there ever be real change in the heart of a human being? Truly, that would be an application of grace in this world.

I wanted so badly for the visitors to be benevolent that there was a possibility I would fool myself about them. The more deeply I explored myself, the more intense was the fear I found. I had the sense that I got closer to the visitors as I went deeper into myself.

On the surface I wanted very badly to love them and to believe that they were trying to help me. But down in the primitive parts of my mind, I was literally wild with terror. Stepping outside at night I became almost like an animal, listening, peering around, sniffing the air, feeling as if every shadow concealed some terrible being with great, black eyes.

I remembered how frightened the cats had been on the night of the nine knocks.

It was with a cold feeling that I asked myself if the animal within me might be the part that really knew the truth. I could look at what was happening to me either as a very genuine attempt to enable me to contact and cope with my fears on my own or as an extremely subtle effort to lure a free and decent human being into some kind of unholy trap.

I did not know which it was. I could not find out. There were no precedents, there was nowhere to turn. I had lost my assurance that this had happened to anybody else before. I don't think it has—not to anybody who returned to record the experience.

I wondered if my time was running out.

SIXTEEN

Passage into Death

A few days after my walk in the woods we went back to the city. It had been a hellish effort, and I was already looking forward to another period of relief. No sooner had we gotten back, though, than I received a shocking call from my brother, Richard. He had some disturbing and totally unexpected news.

Our mother was feeling a new loneliness connected with the death of her own mother the previous April. She needed me.

I was thunderstruck. "In three months' time you will take one of two journeys on behalf of your mother. On one of them you will die. . . ."

The visitors weren't quite on time: It was nearly four months since that statement had been made. But I had told nobody about it. And suddenly I was taking just such a journey as they had described.

I could not say no. Of course not. Mother needed me and I had to go. Richard suggested that I fly down to Texas the next day, and I agreed.

I made my airline reservations. I never dreamed, not for a moment, that a prediction made by a strange being sitting on my bedside in May would actually come true. In May there had been absolutely no reason to suspect that my mother would need this kind of family support months later. She is a strong, self-sufficient, and very intelligent woman. She had accepted the death of her mother. Now she was feeling grief, months later, and there was no question at all about my delaying. I had to be there.

I did not—could not—tell anybody in the family the secret of the two journeys. It was unthinkable to tell Anne.

She certainly had no reason to suffer this with me. And as for telling Mother—that was obviously out of the question.

I had to get on that airplane not knowing which of the two journeys I was taking. Would it be the one that would end in my death, or the one that I would survive? Or did the fact that more than three months had passed mean that there was nothing to worry about?

On the morning of the flight I woke up wondering if it was to be my last day alive.

What did death mean to me? Was it oblivion? A new level of being? Heaven or hell?

I wanted so badly to know, riding out to the airport in the still, silent predawn.

My hunger for life was intense. I had paused on the way out of the house to look at my sleeping child. Was I cheating him by even going on this journey? What was I to do? Mother needed me. Andrew had a right to his father, Anne to her husband.

And in the middle of it all there was this distance, and this airplane, and this hard journey. I wanted to live.

My boy's face floated into my mind's eye. I heard his cheerful, confident voice calling me, "Dad!" And then this or that triumph reported.

My life belonged to him more than it did to me, to Anne, even to Mother. And yet here I was accepting this insane risk. I didn't doubt for a moment that the risk was real. It felt darned real.

The flight was to leave at about 7:30, and the terminal at La Guardia Airport was not crowded when I arrived at 6:45. My feet echoed on the floors. There was a softness to the morning that I had not noticed in a long time. The faint smell of coffee in the hallways, the voices of the early travelers, a man trudging along with a briefcase, a woman rolling a stroller . . . and outside the windows the long, clean forms of airplanes.

The world around me seemed so unexpectedly sweet. I thought to myself as people passed me that we human beings close ourselves off from each other not because of fear but out of an excess of love. We cannot open our hearts to our real feelings about each other because we are afraid it would hurt too much.

I went through the inspection point and down to an airline club where I spent about fifteen minutes drinking orange juice and staring blankly out at the life of the airport, planes moving, men driving big baggage trucks, a catering van loading breakfast onto a plane.

I remembered how I used to take business trips with my father when I was a boy, going out to the airport in the hour before dawn and walking onto the field where a Trans Texas Airways DC-3 would be waiting. The romance, the wonder of sailing off into the dawn, had given way to the emptiness of jet travel, so far above everything that it became an eventless waiting between moments of life.

I was a nervous flyer. In the past I had gone through periods of absolute terror in the air, until I recognized that my real fear did not involve the reliability of the planes and crews but the idea of giving up control to others. To cure myself of this I imagined what the flight would be like if I were in the cockpit. I soon began to feel more comfortable realizing that my life was in the hands of people who knew what they were doing.

When the time came I went to the gate. I phoned Anne and Andrew and told them good-bye. I was as cheerful as I could manage, and they suspected nothing of my true feelings. Then the boarding call came over the loudspeaker and I went to the plane.

As we rolled along the runway I reviewed my life and my relationship with my mother. I have always tried to be good to her—I love her very much—and I couldn't think of anything I had done that might have led me into the death journey.

Then again, we do not know what death is. Maybe not taking the death journey would be the real punishment. Perhaps this life is a sort of sentence, to be endured until the day and hour of completion and then to end in anguish and terror. Only afterward do we find out how foolish our fears were.

Or perhaps we go from a hard place into an even harder one, into some sort of oblivion that is worse than physical death. I thought perhaps we have a potentially immortal soul, but one that can be killed even after the body dies.

We took off, the plane roaring and shuddering its way into the sky as they always do. Modern jets do not float off like old planes did; they do not fly, but rather are thrust into the air by the sheer brute strength of their engines.

Neither can they glide. Should the engines fail, they drop like projectiles.

The engines are very reliable.

I listened to the plane, to the grinding sound of the landing gear coming up, to the rising scream of the wind as our speed increased. Far below I saw Manhattan dwindle into the morning. Another plane shot past like a leaf a few miles away. I imagined how it would be if we collided with another airliner, a glancing blow and then the long fall. Not too many months before a 747 had crashed slowly in Japan and some of the passengers had written last notes to their families. "The plane is twirling faster now. . . ."

We flew on into the vacant world between places. A woman across the aisle, I noticed, was weeping quietly to herself. Behind me two children were traveling with their mother and they were full of excitement and wonder. The stewardess handed me my breakfast with a crisply professional smile. The plane roared along uneventfully. Everything was absolutely, totally, and completely normal.

I read The New York Times and waited to die.

Staring at the paper didn't help. Eating an omelette and drinking orange juice didn't help either. The ground was far, far away. Every little sound the plane made spoke peril. A stewardess frowned. Had she heard a funny noise? Was this the beginning of the end? The captain came on the intercom to tell us how nicely everything was going. Was it hubris? Would the plane burst into flames in another second?

A woman dashed toward the bathroom and I practically jumped out of my skin. My hands were shaking so much that I couldn't see the paper, let alone read it.

I felt faint. The plane was like the inside of a sealed tomb. I fought a sudden impulse to rush to the door. Descriptions of air disasters paraded in memory. A DC-8 that had caught fire and crashed in the Rockies—and one passenger had leaped out of an emergency exit just as the plane slid into a mountainside . . . the Japanese 747, twisting and turning in the sky with its terrified mass of passengers . . . the sad expression I had once seen on the face of a dead man on a street corner . . . graves, funerals, tombs, children at gravesides.

Down I went, into the black places where we face death, where we cry out in the silence. There was nothing there, nothing! I thought of all the insects I have killed, of the cat I once ran into, of the snakes I killed when I was a boy in Texas, of the death of my grandfather, of the death of my father, of the death of my grandmother, of age and wisdom, and of the sudden, surprising silence that follows the death of a beloved.

The hours passed. I imagined Andrew in school, doing his reading at his little desk in the room festooned with drawings; and I thought of Anne working on her book, learning by slow degrees to be a writer, and of her hopes, her love, the simplicity of companionship.

I thought also of the visitors sailing the skies and the mind, so strange, so alien, and yet so very close. How could I ever have imagined that they were not part of me? Of course they were part of me—they were part of us all; to some extent they must have leaped out of us like butterflies out of the winter chrysalis . . . and who knew if the shadow of the butterfly did not terrify the poor caterpillar as much as did that of the bird.

We managed to land in Dallas and take off again without incident.

I was so surprised when the plane landed in San Antonio that I practically kissed the elderly gentleman in the seat beside me.

Then we were leaving the plane. It was over.

I drove through the familiar streets of the north side of San Antonio remembering the old places, the ended days. Down Broadway I went past Pat's Drugstore, where I had gone to buy comic books on my bike, and Winn's, where we had gotten cap guns and kites, and St. Peter's Church, where I had had my first great battles with the question of the soul, and the Broadway Theatre, where I had spent many a summer Saturday in dreams of darkness while the Texas sun blasted down . . . and then walked home beneath the big trees of the old neighborhood with the lazy cicadas screaming.

And what else, what else? Why did I have such a powerful sense that so much of my life had been lost to me? Where did it go? What did those strange flashes of memory mean? What in the world were all those fireballs doing in my life, and who had come knocking on my door?

Then I was at Mother's place, and the door opened, and there she stood, and suddenly she was small and sad and I felt the unknown that surrounds the little light of our lives.

I hugged her and we went inside together and talked of the old days. We did not speak much about Granny's death, but rather the way it had been for us in San Antonio in the fifties. It was a much smaller city then, dreaming in the Texas sun. We spoke of hours we had spent together discussing the proofs we had sought for God and for our own immortality, of the summer nights and books we'd loved, of our obsessions with history and literature, and of the long conversations with Father Patrick Palmer over the sense of papal infallibility and the future of the Church.

Always the Church would return to the center of our conversations, what it meant to us and where we expected it to go in the future. We were then still involved in such things as not eating meat on Fridays and we believed that it was a mortal sin to miss mass on Sunday. The ritual of the mass was of enormous importance to us. We believed, if not in the sense of the words, then in the mysterium, the moment of hoc est corpus whispered over the pale bread, and felt the presence of Christ within us when we partook of the Host.

How far we had come since then. Neither of us attended mass as often as we had. We were filled with doubts about the new pope, torn between a need for direction and the inescapable thought that some sort of failure had taken place to bring Catholics to the point of disaffection that so many of us had reached.

Mother needed to be cherished now and I lived far from home. I felt guilty about living in New York. But I could not imagine leaving now, or taking my boy out of the school that was serving him so well, or removing myself and Anne from the lives we had made.

Mother seemed so small. Had she always been this tiny? We talked of nights at my grandparents' country home, of watching the sun set across the valley, of listening to the cowbells clanging as evening overspread the farms in the valley below. We remembered our evening walks on the road and the time I'd almost stepped on a seven-foot rattlesnake. And our dogs, Prissy and Sidney and Candy and Carnahan, a succession of passionate beasts.

Where does death take us?

Mother had become as pale and soft as a moth, she who had carried me. I felt her vulnerability, her desperation. Now that her mother and her husband were gone it was her turn on the frontier of the night. I was still well back in the light, still warm, but the wind was blowing her and she wasn't young and strong anymore.

We talked and talked. We went out to lunch together. Decisions were made that we hoped favored the future happiness of the family.

My few days in San Antonio ended, and I prepared to return to New York.

It hit me on the way to the airport that the trip back was also part of this difficult journey.

How miserable that the confrontation with mortality would have to happen all over again.

I am not in the habit of contemplating my own death. And our culture supports me. We think of death as a disaster. Our entire concept of medicine is built around staving off death. When it comes it is a defeat for doctor and patient and a source of grief for all concerned.

We don't really grieve for the dead; the living grieve for themselves. For the dead, the suffering, the waiting, the losses, all have ended and they have passed into a state about which we know nothing.

It seemed only an hour and my three-day visit was over. Mother was feeling better and I had a lot of work to do in New York.

I have never liked it that my family was so spread out, and it always hurts to leave her. She stood at her door waving. I will never really understand the relationship between mother and son. I will never part easily from her.

The streets were quiet. I drove slowly back to the airport. My mind turned to the being on the bedside. Was this to be the fatal flight? I remembered the softness of the white cloth against my fingers.

I felt so vulnerable and ignorant. How could such a thing as this be happening?

The flight back was on a new plane, a Boeing 757. We took off into a beautiful sky and the short hop to Dallas was easy. While on the ground there we were told that there would be a delay because of bad weather between Dallas and New York. I sat in the airport thinking of the storms that stood like a wall between us and the distant runway where we were supposed to land.

At last we took off. Seated beside me was a pilot returning to his home base. He had his wife and two small children on the plane as well. I was reassured; if anything did start to go wrong, this pilot would know instantly. If he didn't react to some rumble or screech, I wouldn't either.

The flight was very hard. Lightning flashed outside the windows and there was a great deal of bouncing around. I could hear the wind roaring around the plane and see by the lightning flashes that the tops of the clouds were higher than we were. Jets fly at great height, so this meant that these were really tremendous storms.

I peered out into the reefs and canyons of cloud, into the anger of a great storm system. The pilot in the seat beside me was looking at it too. The dim cabin of the plane became heavy with humidity. Despite all the air conditioning, the storm was seeping in.

We were rocked and tossed about. I saw gigantic fingers of lightning off the wing tips, and the miserable flicker of the plane's strobe lights against passing mountains of cloud.

Suddenly the PA system came on and the captain announced that we were moving to a different airway because "New York Control" was unable to get flights through the weather ahead. The pilot sitting beside had been getting quieter and quieter. Now he suddenly blurted out, "That means they've lost it." He laughed nervously. "I hate it when these new controllers start jockeying us between airways. They don't know what's going on up here. They can't handle it when we have storms."

This was the death journey. We were going to collide with another plane, or we were going to be broken to pieces by the storm or struck by lightning or blown off the runway when we tried to land.

Behind us the pilot's two kids were sleeping peacefully in their mother's arms. She was leaning against the window with a pillow behind her head, her own eyes closed. I thought of the other people on the plane.

I felt the most acute agony of longing to be with my wife and son. Who would put Andrew to bed, read to him, sing to him? He was only seven. And what of Anne? I remembered the recording of her voice, taken while she was being hypnotized for Communion: "He goes . . . and it's lonely, it's so lonely." She was alone a lot in her childhood, and she has so enjoyed the warmth and closeness of our relationship.

The sensation of being in a trap made me frantic. In my imagination I saw the visitors come dropping like bats through the ceiling of the plane, heard the people screaming, saw the wings collapse, felt the explosion—and felt my soul being carried away by a triumphant spiritual predator. . . .

I wondered if I might not be in the grip of demons, if they were not making me suffer for their own purposes, or simply for their enjoyment.

Suffer, though? The man beside me was upset too, and he had his whole family in this plane.

Wives lose their husbands, children lose their fathers, essential people die all the time. But the world does not stop; life keeps drifting toward its unimaginable fate.

If I died on this night Anne would weep and then pick herself up and go on. And my little boy would nest his father in the pearls of his memory, and also go on.

This was the truth. What I had to do here was accept that their fate belonged to them and contemplate instead my own.

I had a lot to think about. Throughout all of human history we have had methods for dying. Every religion from Egyptian to Christian has offered a way to the soul after death, a system by which it would go toward its judgment and find its place.

In a reality made of energy, thoughts may literally be things. I suspect that in such reality a person who dies without a way is lost, unable to surmount the confusion that his own soul is creating around him.

What would be my way of death? What if in another moment there was a great roar and I found myself disembodied but still alive, hanging in the air of another sky? Where would my judges be, where my guardian angels? I would wander as helplessly as a cloud. I would drift, waiting for something to happen. But what if it was intended that we create our own realities after death? A man who dies with no expectations would be in danger of oblivion.

Maybe a lot of us die that way now, in terror and confusion, and perhaps the visitors are beginning to peek out from behind the curtain to see what is going wrong that we no longer require them as keepers of the gates of heaven. What if the modern plague of spiritual emptiness is really a symptom of the death of souls?

I could not invent a new cosmology for myself while waiting to die in a storm-tossed airplane.

The thing shuddered and wallowed and groaned. My throat choked up, my hands shook, my breath got short—and suddenly I changed.

I just changed. One moment I was a miserable, terrified little man, and the next there was this wonderful sense of freedom. It was simple and animal and real. All of a sudden I was like a colt in the morning, like a little boy seeing the ocean for the first time.

Death seemed a very different experience. Gone was my dread. Now there was a preciseness to death, a sense of absolute correctness about it. It did not belong to the dark at all. I belonged to the dark. Death was a part of the grace of nature.

My fear was gone. I accepted my situation. I was ready.

And then I saw through the clouds the warm lights of New York and the stewardess was telling us to put our seat backs in the upright position and fasten our seatbelts in preparation for landing.

The plane rocked as it touched down and then we were rolling, then coasting, then crawling along the runway. Before I knew it we had reached the gate.

A changed man, a profoundly changed man, left that airplane. I had been brought face-to-face with death.

I had been so scared and wanted so badly to live. But the peace I touched was so incredibly, transcendently great that I also now loved death a little, or at least I accepted the truth and presence of it in my own life.

On that night I was freed from something that haunts us all: How will death feel? What will I do? How will I be as I die?

I know how I will be. I have already died a little. The visitors have had the courage and wisdom to give me this gift, this singular liberty.

Love at its most true is not afraid to be hard.

SEVENTEEN

Fury

Life exploded around me in flowers of thought and talk. People seemed luminous, possessed of a sweetness and beauty I had never before noticed. Hard people appeared as innocent as children.

The streets of New York were suddenly full of magical beings, and the most ordinary of us now appeared charged with light.

In every single glance, though, there was also fear. We are all terrified of death, and not until that terror is lost can it be seen in others. Generally we ignore death, but in reality every one of us is facing it every moment. We are afraid all the time. The fear is even there in the startling seriousness of sleeping faces.

What a mystery people became, rich, strange, their faces etched by some dire and wonderful hand to a vividness that I almost could not bear.

The light falling across the breakfast table in the morning, the voices coming in through the windows of our city apartment, the roar of trucks, the angry, sullen cries, the laughter of kids down at the bus stop, all reemerged as part of something beautiful and quite inadmissible to language. I could not name it, but I could know it with a knowing that was so simple and so frankly true than not even the most subtle word could express it.

The least look from any eye seemed to contain the very essence of truth. I saw the laughable absurdity of the egotism that afflicts so many of us as our proud old civilization teeters toward its evening. We are all the same, literally so, innocent or experienced, foolish or wise. We are all little particles of something we cannot name, fiercely intelligent and full of overwhelming passion that emerges from the mystery that made us and lives within us—and is us.

I will not call it soul or God or Paraclete or essence or Christ-consciousness. It is old, I know that, but I will not diminish its potential by naming it before it consumes me into itself. I may die without giving it a name, but at least I will have surrendered to it enough to let it turn me toward the direction of its light.

When I would turn my thoughts to death I was like a child amazed by a field of daffodils.

Then I thought, What happens afterward, and I realized that I was by no means free from fear. The visitors had given me a great gift, but I had gone through hell to get it. And now that I had it, there was always the possibility that it would turn out to be an illusion.

I could not shake the idea of the soul predator. I took my midnight walks regularly now, and every time I reached the darkest part of the woods the thought would come whispering back.

I had no evidence that it was true. I just couldn't rid myself of the notion that there was something predatory about the visitors. I had terrifying fragmentary memories of them—memories of leering visitor faces, of long, four-fingered hands, of recoiling at their touch.

Those moments remain as if sealed behind smoky glass. I couldn't tell where the memories came from. There were dozens, maybe hundreds of them.

Where were these images from? Reality? Imagination? Were they nothing more than my own frightened apotheosis of the visitors? Unfortunately, I could not know an answer to these questions.

Thus I was unable to put this particular fear to rest. But I was also unwilling to demean a relationship that was beginning to bear such marvelous fruit.

I decided not only to live with my fear but to plunge deeper, if I could, into the relationship. That seemed to me to be the only way to learn.

I asked them in my mind to do whatever I needed the most. I sat in my office at our apartment and whispered my request, repeating it over and over, feeling it from the center of my bones. "Do what I need the most. Do it!"

I set no conditions. I did not even try to think what I might need.

The next day I began to hear the voice yet again urging me to stop eating sweets. I was annoyed and disappointed. This was what I needed the most? What about the growth of consciousness? What about understanding the true nature of our relationship?

No, it was none of that. Instead I began to hear choking noises inside my chest every time I ate a Fig Newton or an Oreo.

I really tried hard to stop this time. I was amazed at the results. I all but sweated blood over cookies and ice cream! It was unbelievable, ridiculous, that I could hunger so much for something so trivial.

I just couldn't stop. I didn't have the strength. Two days after quitting them I was having dreams about cookies. What infuriated me was that this was such an innocent pleasure and it seemed so unnecessary to deny myself.

I understood the importance of what the great hermits like St. Anthony of Alexandria did. In turning away from the pleasures of the world they offered themselves to that which lay within. It was this act that freed them from the blindness of life and enabled them to see the very light of the soul.

When the visitors warned me about sweets they may have been attempting to lead me into an understanding of just how profoundly addicted I was to external life. Previous to this battle over sweets I had thought of myself as a person without addictions. I didn't smoke, drink much alcohol or caffeine, take drugs, or do any of the other things that are associated with addiction. But as soon as I attempted to deny myself a cookie I found out that I was just as addicted as the next person.

I discovered this intellectually, but it did not occur to me that it might also be literally true on the physical level. I did not really believe that there might be some sort of actual, physical state that the visitors wanted me to enter, one that could not be accessed without giving up sugar.

I did see that making this sacrifice would symbolize my surrender to the needs of the soul. But I didn't want to surrender. I wanted to enjoy the pleasures of being alive—sweets included.

In early November we returned to the cabin for a week or so. Over the course of the fall we had been back and forth many times and there had been no sign of the visitors. At about eleven that night I went walking in the woods. For the first time I was completely unafraid. I had accepted even the soul-eater possibility. If that was our fate, then so be it. I wasn't being harmed right now. That was reality. That was what I knew.

It had not been easy to participate in the visitors' little theatricals—like those airplane flights—but the benefits to me were so enormous, I could not consider that they flowed from anything except a very considerable love.

I walked along in the night woods, my feet shuffling the new-fallen leaves.

As it was cloudy, the woods were very dark. I had to rely totally on my flashlight. I went down among the tall trees to the meadow beyond, reflecting as I walked on the beauty of the night and on how small these woods actually were. The real forest was a mile in the opposite direction. This place where I had been so afraid was only a congenial little woodland peopled by a few deer and coons. There was nothing to harm me here.

As I walked out into the meadow I saw something streak across the sky. It looked like a spark. As it was clearly visible under the cloud cover, it could not have been a meteor. But what kind of spark? Certainly it wasn't from a chimney; this particular spark had been moving against a rather stiff wind.

Then I heard a voice speak, the voice of a child: "Go to the middle of the meadow and look up.”

I went a short distance and looked up. I saw nothing. The voice returned, telling me to move a little back, then a little to one side or the other.

When I looked up again I saw a round, dark shadow about the size of a quarter. It was absolutely stationary behind the rushing clouds. The stillness of the thing made it seem unreal. One is used to seeing movement in the sky, never stillness. Even a hovering helicopter moves. This was as still as a stone.

I watched it very carefully, observing that it was black and absolutely featureless. I also noticed that if I moved my head even slightly the object instantly disappeared! It was as if I were seeing it through a crack in a wall. I asked the voice to speak again. I listened. I waited. I started to get cold. Then the disk disappeared completely and did not come back.

Finally I returned to the house.

The next day, a Saturday, was cloudy and quiet. Autumn was giving way to winter and we spent the day reading and lounging around the fire. In the evening we listened to A Prairie Home Companion on National Public Radio and then to a lovely local folk-music program from nearby Albany, Hudson River Sampler.

At ten I put Andrew to bed and at ten-thirty Anne and I went out to the hot tub together. The sky was now full of broken clouds, with an occasional star peeking out through one of the rushing gaps.

We had been in the tub for no more than five minutes when I saw a very peculiar light appear just above the tree line across the deck from the house. This object consisted of a bright central light with a noticeably rounded bottom that was glowing pink. Clustered close to it on one side was a brilliant blue light. On the other side was a white light strobing furiously, its intensity far greater than any aircraft strobe.

By this time I had not only become familiar with dozens of aircraft illumination configurations, I also knew all the various airways that could be seen from our house.

Thus I knew at once that if this was an airplane, it was displaying a radically nonstandard lighting configuration and must be a private plane as it was nowhere near a route an airliner would be using.

It was below the ceiling, which I later estimated at about eight hundred feet. A call the next morning to the nearest airport, which is thirty miles away, established their ceiling at eleven hundred feet at the hour of the observation. Allowing for our slightly higher elevation, I believe my eight-hundred-foot estimate for the bottom of the cloud cover was reasonable.

This meant that the lighted object was below eight hundred feet and probably no more than a thousand lateral feet from us. And yet there was absolutely no trace of a sound. A helicopter at that distance would have been clearly audible. An ultralight aircraft would have been easy to hear. A small private plane would have had to move faster than this object, which came forward very slowly.

I recognized that the object fitted no common pattern. My next thought was that I alone might be seeing it. I approached the matter obliquely with Anne. I did not even want to ask her if she could see something in the sky. That might be suggestion enough. Instead I said how beautiful the line of trees was against the moving clouds.

She looked up and said, "What's that?"

So my question was answered. She could see it too. I replied, "I think it's them."

As soon as I said that the object stopped and moved back down below the tree line as if trying to keep itself hidden. A few moments later I saw it flickering past some trees in front of the house, so low at this point that it must have been coming up a draw behind the ridge we are on. It was perhaps two hundred feet from the ground.

The next thing I knew, a flash of blue-white light hit me in the face. Simultaneously Anne saw a brilliant bar of light suspended above the house.

A wave of exhaustion swept over me. I felt that I had to get out of the hot tub at once or risk drowning. I was about to lose consciousness.

We both got out of the tub and went in to bed. There was no question of my doing anything about the fact that I knew the visitors were here. It was all I could do to climb the stairs to the bedroom.

Although she said nothing about it later, we must have both been affected because I don't think we were awake for another five minutes.

In the wee hours of the night I abruptly woke up. There was somebody quite close to the bed, but the room seemed so unnaturally dark that I couldn't see much at all. I caught a glimpse of someone crouching just behind my bedside table. I could see by the huge, dark eyes who it was.

I felt an absolutely indescribable sense of menace. It was hell on earth to be there, and yet I couldn't move, couldn't cry out, couldn't get away. I lay as still as death, suffering inner agonies. Whatever was there seemed so monstrously ugly, so filthy and dark and sinister. Of course they were demons. They had to be. And they were here and I couldn't get away. I couldn't save my poor family.

I still remember that thing crouching there, so terribly ugly, its arms and legs like the limbs of a great insect, its eyes glaring at me.

And there was also the love. I felt mothered. Caressed. Then the terrible insect rose up beside the bed like some huge, predatory spider. The eyes glittered as it tilted its head from side to side.

Every muscle in my body was stiff to the point of breaking. I ached. My stomach felt as if it had been stuffed with molten lead. I could hardly breathe.

The next thing I knew, something had been laid against my forehead. I felt it there, a light electric pressure vibrating softly between my eyes.

Instantly I seemed to be transported to another place, a stone floor with a low stone table in the middle of it. The table was a bit more than waist high and on it there was a set of iron shackles. A man was led down some steps and attached to these shackles. He was right in front of my face, not two feet from me, looking directly at me with eyes so sad that I almost couldn't bear it.

He was a perfectly ordinary-looking human being. He had curly brown hair and he was naked. His body was muscular and normally formed in every respect. Behind him was a taller person wearing black. I was not able to see this individual clearly, as he was moving very quickly and the shadows were deep.

The next thing I knew, this person was beating the poor man with a terrible whip. Before my eyes this man was being almost torn to pieces by the fury of the beating.

I was shocked to my core when it started. I remember how the surprise undid me. The man's face collapsed into agony and he began straining at the cuffs around his wrists.

Somebody behind me said, "He failed to get you to obey him and now he must bear the consequences."

The horror went on and on. The man was getting desperate. His head would loll for a moment, then another terrible blow would bring him to his senses. Another voice, the old voice, the one I identified with the feminine being I had seen during the Communion experience, began to intone, "It isn't real, Whitty, it isn't real."

That didn't make me feel much better. My heart was sick for the poor man in front of me. I knew perfectly well that this whole business had to do with the eating of sweets, as stupid as that sounds.

Even as this little psychodrama proceeded, I felt myself getting furious with the visitors. The beating went on and on and the voice kept saying, "It isn't real, Whitty, it isn't real. . . ." But I experienced it as if it were all quite real.

I went through hell watching that poor man suffer for me. I have never felt such raw humiliation and guilt. I would have done anything to trade places with him. But they beat him until he was a slumped, broken ruin.

And then I was back in bed again. The visitor was now standing beside the bed. I could see her face quite clearly. There was a sardonic expression there that I will never forget.

Andrew started screaming. The shock that went through me this time was absolutely explosive. I tried to get out of bed but I felt as though I were tied down around my shoulders and waist and ankles. I couldn't move.

She said, "He is being punished for your transgression." His screaming filled my ears, my soul. Listening to it, I wanted to die. I tried to call out to him, to arouse Anne, to do anything at all to somehow regain some control over the situation.

I thought I was going to suffocate. My throat was closed, my eyes were swimming with tears. The sense of being infested was powerful and awful. It was as if the whole house were full of filthy, stinking insects the size of tigers.

Then it was over. He was silent. There was nobody in my room. The sense of menace was gone. I started to get up and go to my son. Somebody hit me. It was as if I had been slapped across the face. I fell back into the bed and I don't remember another thing until morning.

The instant I woke up I jumped out of bed and went straight to Andrew. He was sleeping with all of the covers off the bed. He looked cold. As I covered him he woke up. He seemed perfectly normal. Anne seemed perfectly normal.

I said to her, "They came last night." She answered, "I know." I asked her if she remembered anything. "Just the thing in the sky. And then we went to sleep."

Feeling like a zombie, I dressed and went to get the Sunday papers. A few minutes later I almost ran my car into a ditch. I was going much too fast for our narrow road.

I slowed down, stopped, pulled my car over. My eyes were streaming with tears. My hands were shaking so badly that I couldn't steer. My mind was thick with the visitors. They were so terrible, so ugly, so fierce, and I was so small and helpless. I could smell that odor of theirs like greasy smoke hanging in my nostrils.

Again, though, I felt love. Despite all the ugliness and the terrible things that had been done, I found myself longing for them, missing them! How was this possible? I wanted them to come back to me!

I was crying not only because I was scared but also because I was lonely. I felt as if I belonged more to the other world I had glimpsed last night than I did to this one. It seemed greater and more intensely real and far closer to the truth.

I regretted the contempt I had shown for its needs and its laws and felt a desperate desire to make amends.

I had tempted their rage, and now I knew what it meant.

There was something worse, though. I remembered a glimpse, no more than that, of another level of their being, and it was very, very distressing to recall. When that voice had been intoning "It isn't real, Whitty," I had felt a pain greater than the pain of punishment. It was the pain of their love. They had given up something for me, and I suspected that it was access to the full joy of a thing that I could not even name. I had the sense that they had on my behalf turned away from perfect love, and that they had done this to help me.

If they are an element of the divine, to come into our world would be like penetrating deepest darkness. I realized that I was isolated in myself, turned away from the light that surrounds us.

I suspected that the ugliness I had seen last night was not them, but me. I was so ashamed of myself that I almost retched.

When I got back with the papers I made some pancakes, going about my work like an automaton. As I worked, I kept hearing Andrew's voice howling down the night.

But he was happily reading the funnies.

Obviously they hadn't hurt him, but they had served notice that he was vulnerable. He was never going to suffer for my weaknesses, not as far as I was concerned.

For the first time in my life, I refrained at that breakfast from putting syrup on my pancakes. I felt like an idiot for doing it, but I was damned if I was going to allow what had happened a few hours earlier to escalate. God only knew what the visitors might do next if I continued my experiment in defiance.

I stopped eating sweets on that day. I discovered how strong one must be to change a single innocuous habit. My renunciation has been far from perfect. I am a sugar addict and I will always be a sugar addict. Sometimes I fail. But then I begin the struggle again. And that seems to be the point of the whole exercise, to engage in the struggle.

It is a small, humble thing. But I am a small being, so I suppose a humble struggle is appropriate.

By defying the visitors, I had learned a great deal more than I would have any other way. They did not often answer my requests unless they themselves had a need to fulfill.

When I defied them I found the limit of their tolerance of me. They waited for six months for me to do what they were asking, and then they expressed rage. So they can be frustrated and angered, and they can react in anger, although—at least in this case—with the restraint of reassuring me that it was all an illusion.

I sat eating my unsweetened pancakes and wondering if they realized just how hard this was going to be for me. And at once I felt like an idiot. Obviously that must be perfectly clear to them. That was the whole damned point, wasn't it?

Andrew had finished his breakfast and was now playing happily.

The suggestion that he had been drawn into my punishment must have been intended as a reminder to me that the stakes were very high.

They were indeed. I could never have imagined how high. Nothing that had come before could compare to what now awaited me, now that I had faced the fury of the visitors and thus surrendered myself to whatever wisdom they possessed.

EIGHTEEN

A Soul's Journey

I was lying down at about four o'clock in the afternoon of November 15 when something odd happened. We were at the cabin. I wasn't napping, but I had my eyes closed and was carefully moving my attention from place to place in my body in order to strengthen my sensory awareness. This was something I had been doing for many years, and I certainly didn't expect any unusual side effects. Suddenly, however, I heard a familiar group of young voices say in unison, "Oh, good. Now we'll show you something."

An instant later I appeared to be in two places at once. I was still lying on the bed, but a quite conscious and sensually alive "other" me was also standing beside what was quite clearly a new Cadillac. I put my hands on the roof and felt it. There were people I recognized but could not quite name standing around admiring the car. Then the peculiar sensation ended. I was confused. I am not likely to dream about cars. My interest in them goes no farther than taking care of the one I own.

The next day I was surprised to find that some acquaintances had bought a Cadillac. It had been delivered the day before, at about four o'clock. At that hour they had been showing it to some neighbors . . . me included, apparently! As far as I could tell—and I wasn't about to ask them if they'd "sensed" my presence—they had no idea that I'd been around.

Was I really there? If not, then how did I know about the car? These people were not friends but acquaintances. I hadn't been in contact with them in a couple of months. The fact that they had gotten a new car was mentioned the next day by a mutual friend, apparently by pure chance.

After that I started asking other people who'd had visitors encounters if they'd ever had out-of-body experiences. It turned out to be a very common perception.

One of them recommended that I read Robert Monroe's book Journeys Out of the Body. I did so and was fascinated but not convinced. It seemed to me that what Mr. Monroe was describing was a dream state.

I read this book toward the end of November 1986. I began to try the methods for getting out of one's body that were described in the book. Almost immediately I discovered that a certain sensation reported by Mr. Monroe was readily available to me. He wrote of feeling a sort of pulsation traveling through his body when he was lying down and preparing for a journey. I found that this sensation would come so reliably that I was able to ask other people to observe me while it was taking place. Anne could detect no difference in my physical appearance when it was happening and it did not lead to any out-of-the-body travel.

On the night of November 27, however, I had an absolutely remarkable dream. It was the most awesome and beautiful dream I can remember. Its intensity was startling. Unlike the appalling perceptions I'd had of the moon exploding and the Chernobyl accident the previous April in Boulder, or the vision of the golden city, it was clearly a normal dream.

In it I found myself standing on the beach of a green sea. Little waves were sifting up the strand, and I had the impression that they represented human beings on their journeys through experience. Each tiny lapping movement was dense with wordless emotional impact, as if the whole transit of a life had been contained within it.

Above me there was a sky of clear blue so perfect that it made my heart ache to see it. And hanging in this sky was a large object that seemed to be made of clay. It was round on one side and square on the other, and was rotating slowly.

Even though it seemed old and was worn and cracked, it appeared to me as something of great beauty, a perfect object floating in a radiant sky.

Voices began to speak around me. I was aware that a group of children were approaching, and I told them to look up into the sky. Then the object changed in its rotation. The square and round parts separated and began circling one another. This motion was incredibly satisfying. It seemed to represent a reconciliation of opposite forces, a sort of "squaring the circle."

A very large emotion filled me as the children came closer. They were dressed in green and yellow and tan clothing, loose-fitting. Some of them said that they were Moslem and others that they were Christian.

This did not disturb me, but on the contrary seemed extraordinarily fortunate, because it meant that there would be friction, and out of the friction would come balance.

I began to feel a sense of inner balance. I walked a little way into the water, my feet touching the cool stones beneath the waves. On the far horizon there was a beautiful star, a huge white-blue radiance. It seemed like a living thing and I wanted to call to it. I found myself producing a sound from deep within that seemed to carry far into the silence.

As the star faded I felt a long, long way from home.

Just a dream, but for me a deeply moving one.

I was interested to see that children were again involved. They were emerging as a subtle but important motif of my experience. I remembered the children's circle from my boyhood, the children running past me into the field of yellow flowers, the voices of children, and now this dream about holy children. It was also true that the visitors' admonition not to eat sweets was the sort of thing that one told a child. Both my response to it and their reaction were childlike as well.

I wondered if mind in its disembodied form is not wise and old but wise and young. Perhaps we grow old and die quickly, but there is a superconscious level of being that matures much more slowly. Maybe, on this level, there is something very ancient that is also very young.

On the afternoon of November 28 we returned to the cabin after a short absence. As we left the highway and passed through the toll plaza we noticed that one of the cars beside us had quite an unusual-looking cat in it. It must have been a Siamese. It had a long, rather simian face and two glaring, black eyes. Andrew noticed how strange it looked and pointed it out to me and Anne.

As I glanced at it I saw something really startling in the backseat of the car. The cat in front was bizarre-looking, but there was another one in the back that was impossible to believe. All I could see of it was the top of its head and two gigantic, pointed ears. These ears were easily bigger than a human hand. The animal was gray and looked a bit out of focus. Just at that moment Andrew said, "Dad! Look at that thing in the backseat." I had already seen it. I looked more closely. The car was a BMW about five years old. The driver was male, and he appeared to be in his mid-forties, normal in every way. The Siamese beside him was odd-looking, but not completely unacceptable.

The animal in the backseat was another matter. It still hadn't raised its head enough for us to see its eyes. I stared at it. The head must have been three feet across. Andrew said, "Where's the rest of it?"

I had no idea how to explain what we were seeing. Something with such a huge head could not possibly fit into the backseat of a BMW unless there was no floor. I told Anne to look at it.

"At what?" she asked.

"The giant cat in the BMW."

"You guys are kidding me."

When I looked again the backseat was empty. Andrew and I were perplexed. We had both seen the thing, and there hadn't been a word spoken about it between us beforehand. We'd both seen it at virtually the same moment.

It was one of those experiences that we used to ignore before we became aware that such things often had a larger significance. Instead of ignoring it, I told myself the truth about it: Both Andrew and I—independently and with no verbal communication between us—had seen a completely impossible animal in the backseat of a nearby car.

Could it have been a reflection on the window? Possibly, but it certainly appeared to have a form and substance of its own, and to be very definitely inside the car despite the fact that it was not noticed by either the driver or the other cat.

As we entered the tollbooth I was able to see down inside the car. The backseat was empty.

I recount this story not because I know what happened or why, but because it had a peculiar sequel a few hours later during one of the most fascinating experiences of my life.

That evening I saw two figures in the front yard. I only saw them for a moment and I could not make out any particular shape except that they appeared to be entirely human, moving through the yard. I recall that they were tall and wearing white uniforms. Although I went outside and looked around carefully, I saw nobody.

Later that evening there was a power failure lasting four minutes. It was confined only to our immediate area, as I called friends in the town and down the road and they were unaffected.

At about eleven-thirty I went walking in the woods, but found nothing unusual about my experience. I was quite nervous and practically jumped out of my skin when some deer snorted at me.

I went to bed with no inkling of what was to happen next. Until four-thirty I slept easily. I awoke as I often do at that hour, got up and took a drink of water. I then went to the window and looked out into the predawn stillness. After a time I lay back on the bed. The thought crossed my mind that I would like to try having an out-of-the-body episode. Robert Monroe had counseled in his book that this experience was most likely to be available when one was in a “mind awake/body asleep” state, and I thought that this might be a good time to try for such a state.

My many years of meditation made it a familiar condition for me. I began attempting to roll out of my body.

An instant later I saw a strange image as if on a television screen about a foot from my face. It was the image of the long, gray hand of a visitor pointing at a box about two feet square on a gray floor. The hand was extremely long and thin, with four fingers. They had black, clawlike nails on them. The longest one was pointing down at the box.

For some reason this image had the effect of causing an explosive sexual reaction in me. My whole body was jolted by what I can only describe as a blast of pure sexual feeling. I have never known anything like it before or since. It was especially odd because the image was so completely asexual. In fact, the hand was actually repulsive-looking, and one could hardly consider a plain gray box an object of sexual interest. The effect only lasted an instant, but it had an amazing effect on me, quite beyond anything that one would have thought.

What happened was that the blast of sexual energy seemed to loosen connections inside me. I rolled out of my body. It felt as if I had come unstuck from myself. The experience was strange in the extreme—almost beyond description.

For an instant, I was very confused and disoriented because the sheet I was lying on had just slid past my field of vision. Then I found myself in the air above my body. I was hanging there, floating effortlessly. I saw my face down below, the eyes partly opened, the lips parted. It did not look like me, not quite. Later I think I understood why: I had never before seen myself except in mirror-image.

I was not asleep. I had not had a chance even to enter a meditative state. On the contrary, I felt alert. Thus I was able to examine my situation carefully and to experiment with such things as observing my shape and moving about.

I was calm and collected and not at all afraid.

I looked around me. The first thing I noticed was that I could see the entire room at once. It was the same dimly lit bedroom it had been a moment before. Anne was sleeping in the bed, very much alive. By contrast, my body was still as a stone.

Between us on the blanket there lay a cat. This amazed me since our cats were in the city. The animal was aware of my presence, and looked up at me. It was a familiar face: It looked like Sadie, our Burmese. I would almost say it was Sadie, except that I knew for certain she was not there. The cat stood up and jumped off the bed. She slipped slowly and gracefully to the floor as if she were no heavier than the wings of a butterfly. Then she began walking around, completely unconcerned with me.

I found that I could move about quite freely. I wanted to go to the foot of the bed and glided there easily. Parallel with the foot of our bed is a double set of windows. Outside one of these windows I could see the face of a being like the one on the cover of Communion. It was however, a uniform gray color. Its large, almond-shaped eyes were much less alive than I could remember seeing them before. I would almost have been willing to believe that this was a mask or picture of some sort. In any case, I took it as a warning not to go out that window.

There was no way, though, that I was going to cover in a bedroom considering the remarkable state in which I found myself. I moved toward the empty window.

Would I be able to open a window? Did I even have hands? I examined myself. I appeared to be a roughly spherical field. I had rather dulled sensation. I was neither breathing nor feeling a need to breathe. I tried closing my eyes, which was possible, but it felt more like I was willing myself not to see than like I had dropped my eyelids. There were absolutely no body sounds at all. The slight tinnitus or ringing that I have in my left ear was gone.

I moved toward the window and touched the sash—a light touch that felt normal in every way. But when I tried to raise it, my hand simply went through it. As a matter of fact, what I was calling a hand wasn't a hand at all, but a sort of gray, hazy probe that would move out from the center of my body when I wanted to touch something. The end of it was about as formed as a mitten.

I found that I could push through the glass of the window and the screen beyond. There is a hemlock right outside the window and I thought I would try to grab some of its needles and bring them inside with me. This would tell me if I was having real access to the physical world in this state.

As I passed through the glass and the screen, I could feel a slight difference in density, exactly as if I were moving through cool smoke. Once outside I could see that the world around me was very much the same as it had always been.

There was one striking exception. I noticed that the power lines coming into the house appeared fat because of a sort of gray, hairy substance that was adhering to them. The phone line was like this also, but the substance was much more sparse. It looked exactly like hair that has been raised by a static charge. I think that I may have been seeing the electromagnetic field around the wires.

I touched the tree and took some of the needles between my "fingers." Although I could see the needles I had taken, I could also see that there were still needles on the tree. It was as if I had taken a sort of coating off the needles, something that paralleled their form but was made of another, more subtle substance.

When I attempted to return to the bedroom, I found myself impeded by the screen. For a moment I thought that I was not going to be able to get back inside. I thought to myself that I had died a really strange death . . . unless death is always like this.

Then the screen seemed to give way and I popped through into the bedroom.

I tried to make a sound to arouse Anne. Although I found that I could sing and possibly even talk, she remained totally unaware of me.

I wondered, if she was awake and I had spoken in her ear, would my voice have sounded like a small radio? Had I just entered the state in which the visitors ordinarily live?

I looked around for the cat, but did not see it. Then I saw myself lying in the bed. I was so still. I looked dead.

Was I dead?

I felt no sense of uneasiness, but rather a quite calm and rational desire to see if I could get back into my body. I had read in Monroe's book that there is a connection between the physical body and the second body when one is in this state, but I couldn't see or perceive anything at all.

Looking at my body was eerie. It was as still as a stone. I thought I could see a little breathing, but it was hardly detectable. Anne, by contrast, pulsed with life. Her breast heaved, her face seemed full of a living presence.

My body appeared coarse. Going down into it again didn't appeal to me very much. I had the feeling that I could leave and never come back. Then I looked at Anne and there was no real question about where I belonged.

When I dropped down into myself, my body seemed to have an invisible opening in it that I went through. But I was terribly loose inside and found myself coming out again. I drifted like a leaf to the floor.

Suddenly my situation changed dramatically. I was no longer in the bedroom at all, but at our old house in San Antonio. Characteristically, my father was up at the crack of dawn mowing the lawn, a chore I was planning to do later. I was watching him from the front window of my bedroom. He glanced up at me and asked, "When are you going to come help me?"

Not soon, it seemed, because I shot back into my body like a frightened rabbit and this time I clung there. I had the feeling I'd touched death just then. A moment later I felt entirely normal. I sat up in bed. There was no sensation of having been asleep, or of any discontinuity of consciousness. I did not feel I had just awakened from a dream.

I also noticed that my body was quite cold. I felt chilled to the bone and yet the bed was comfortable and warm. My arms and legs were stiff, as if they hadn't moved for a long time. According to the clock, only about ten minutes had passed.

I moved my arms and legs. It was like manipulating a puppet. My own body seemed strange and unfamiliar. I stood up and walked around the room, examining the window, looking outside to see the hemlock. It was familiar, but also possessed of the mystery that I had sensed before from time to time, the mystery that I now feel is at the very core of life. I put on my slippers and robe and went downstairs.

The house was perfectly quiet. My son was asleep in his bed, the covers pulled up around him. How peaceful was his sleep.

I went out onto the deck. It was cold and extremely quiet. I had no fear at all. The woods seemed to bear great secrets in their silence, as if the trees knew all that had passed beneath them.

The coolness of the night crept in past my robe. I felt then the depth of the question that confronted me: What had just happened? Had I really gone out of my body?

Certainly it wasn't a conventional dream. It may have been a hallucinatory experience, but I did not believe that. The "answers" rang hollow. What I could say with conviction was what was true: Something wonderful and mysterious had happened. Not even in the literature of out-of-the-body travel have I often read of an experience so conscious or so completely grounded in the physical world.

I found some stories, though. While my experience was unusual, I certainly wasn't alone. The noted psychiatrist Dr. George Ritchie had a famous experience of this type while he was in the military in World War II. Dr. Ritchie died of pneumonia and his body was placed in the morgue at Camp Barkeley, Texas. Pneumonia is a disease that devastates the body, leaving it full of toxins.

Dr. Ritchie, however, came back to life after nine minutes of apparent complete death, where he was without respiration or any other vital sign. Dr. Donald G. Francy, chief medical officer at Camp Barkeley, described it as "the most amazing medical case I have ever encountered." Among other things, he signed a notarized statement that reads in part, "Private Ritchie's virtual call from death and return to vigorous health has to be explained in terms of other than natural means."

Dr. Ritchie came back with vivid memories of what had happened to him after he died. In his book Return from Tomorrow he described in detail how he left his body, flew toward Richmond, Virginia, seeing the countryside below him, eventually going down into a city and attempting to get directions from a man who could neither see nor hear him! His book is eminently worth reading, because it may provide a very real glimpse into the initial stages of life after death.

What it offered me was the realization that I was not the only person to leave his body in a state of total consciousness. There was plenty of precedent, in this case in the experience of a prominent medical doctor.

With the exception of Robert Monroe, most of the other cases of separation taking place in an ordinary state of consciousness came from the literature of the near-death experience. I had not been ejected from my body by death. Rather, it was the strange vision of the box that had triggered my experience.

My ordinary dream life is hardly filled with images of dull gray boxes that produce explosive sexual excitement. I am not the only person with visitor experience to have been shown such a box, though. I've dreamed about boxes, and one of my most upsetting fragmentary memories is of the hand of one of the visitors sliding a box into its place in a stack. This memory is out of context, but I cannot evoke it without a shudder. Back in the early sixties I wrote a poem called "My Box."

I will go when I must to the sentence of my box where I will seek the love behind life's black truth.

Does it refer to a place of painful and ecstatic contemplation, where the soul is left to cook after death in the juices of conscience? Is the real reason we fear death that we know we must then face the truth of our lives?

But I felt such extraordinary physical excitement when I saw that box. Is death really a secret ecstasy? Certainly the vision of the box drew me so powerfully that I literally left my body.

I could not prove that I had been out of my body, except to myself. In my own mind it wasn't—and isn't—possible for me to think otherwise. The experience was too overwhelmingly real in every detail to have been anything other than what it seemed . . . or so I would have myself believe.

Out-of-the-body travel has been extensively documented. Many of the people who have experienced it, like Dr. Ritchie, have impeccable credentials and almost indisputable stories to tell. And yet our society persists in viewing the state as something strange and startling. In scientific circles it is generally assumed to be a dream or hallucinatory condition.

Why? Not because we lack proof that it is real. Not even because it flies in the face of accepted knowledge. Something with as much supporting evidence as this has would long since have become the subject of serious study unless some other factor were operating.

I think that we are afraid to face out-of-the-body experience for the same reason we are afraid to explore the idea of reincarnation. Both of these notions suggest that the soul has an independent existence.

This is what I believe we are having such a hard time facing. I think that the prospect of a postmortem review of life so frightens us, we would rather simply deny that the soul exists.

Our denial is not rational, in view of the implications of some of the scientific work that has been done in this area—and ignored. Dr. Ian Stevenson, Carlson Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Virginia Medical School, has published five volumes of case histories, mostly of children under the age of four who have detailed memories of past lives. Some of them even describe the process of dying and being reincarnated. The vivid detail of the best cases, all verified by Dr. Stevenson and his assistants, suggests strongly that reincarnation is a real process—and therefore, by implication, that the soul is real.

I cannot forget my memory of the visitors' claim, "We recycle souls." It had also been said to other participants. I thought of Jo Sharp's experience, of the whole tone of what was happening to me. It was becoming clear to me that the visitors were concerned with the life of the soul as well as the body.

Could it be that the soul is not only real, but the flux of souls between life and death is a process directed by consciousness and supported by artistry and technology?

Human cultural history is rich with references to the "second body," or soul. The Greeks called it eidolon, the Romans umbra. Similar references appear in every culture.

In 1972, Dr. Harold Burr published Blueprint for Immortality: The Electric Patterns of Life. In this book, which was the outcome of many years of research, he demonstrated that each life form has an electric body which is present from birth to death, which does not change as the body grows, and which is different for each species.

I remembered the way the needles of the hemlock outside my window felt when I touched them while I was in my “electric body,” separated from the physical. I could feel a sort of substance surrounding the needle, seeming to coat it, which fell away under my electric touch. Is this how it feels to touch one electric body with another?

We ignore the reality of the soul not because there is reason to do so, but because we just don’t want to find out about it. I suspect that it can be detected, understood, and even affected by the proper instruments.

I also read more of Robert Monroe’s work, a book entitled Far Journeys, and found it to be as interesting as the first volume. I spent a week at the Monroe Institute in West Virginia, where I learned the methods Monroe has developed for entering the “mind awake/body asleep” state that is most conducive to the out-of-the-body experience. Monroe himself was a delightful and brilliant man, and I found his techniques to be highly effective in taking me into a state of mind where I did access experiences that are very definitely not ordinarily available.

The point of the Institute is not to enable people to induce out-of-the-body travel so much as it is to teach them to reach a state that is open to contact with more energetic levels of being.

When I had my experience in November, I was not in an altered state of mind at all, or at least I couldn’t perceive it. I retained not only my ordinary consciousness but also my perceptions of the world around me when I left my body.

I wondered about that cat, though. Was she a dream within a dream? Or was it that cats can also travel about in their plasmic state? Maybe that was why the Egyptians were so obsessed with mummifying cats as well as human beings. Maybe they knew something about cats that we have forgotten.

During my experience I had a definite but slight weight and a sense of the limits of my “body.” I could move by simply wishing to do so. When I wished to touch something, a part of me extended out of my body and I was able to feel just as I normally feel, except that too hard a push would cause my “finger” to go through the object I was touching.

When I tried to get back into my body but slipped out, I fell like a leaf or a feather as I floated down beside the bed. Then I saw my dead father. He was in a completely different place, sunlit and landscaped. While my bedroom was dim, this place was as bright as midday.

I know that my experience will be dismissed by many as nothing but a dream. Such a dismissal must arise in part from a failure to entertain the large body of evidence that such states are not dreams, and in part from fear of the implications of the soul.

Those implications are remarkable. First, there appears to me to be some part of ourselves that can live outside the body. Judging from my own movements and behavior in that state I would suggest that it must be some sort of plasma. It would seem that a being can exist in an energetic form that is in no direct way sustained by the brain/body system.

Does this mean that souls are all around us, able to see and hear everything? Dr. Ritchie reported that he saw souls tied to their sensual desires, wandering everywhere in the world. Suicides who have been resuscitated have reported following desperately those they had left behind. Dr. Ritchie himself observed that he could see the physical world clearly, but he could in no way affect it.

I had exactly the same impression.

But I also slipped into a very different reality, where I encountered my father reliving a moment that was the essence of the friction in our relationship. Can souls migrate back and forth to richer, more radiant worlds that lie in the same space as this one but bear a different connection to reality?

If this is all true, it means that we are not alone within ourselves, and that all our secrets are available for this other world to see. That we know this instinctively might be why we deny it consciously. For most of us it would be very hard to bear.

The Neoplatonist philosopher Plotinus speaks of the “light” of souls as being their primary reality. Perhaps when the visitors said that they had come here because they “saw a glow,” it was not the glow of our cities that they were referring to but the glow of our souls.

In any case, I count that experience on a morning in November as another one that caused fundamental personal change. I began to try as never before to understand the wonderful mystery that had come into my life.

I thought again of the admonitions of the Virgin in her many appearances, always to pray, to seek guidance within, to give oneself to the good. And as well I contemplated the implications of my contact with the great feminine image of Communion: to deepen my inner search and also to take personal responsibility for the condition of my soul.

Our culture has gone about the denial of the soul with vicious eagerness. But I think it’s all an illusion, a way we have of pretending to ourselves that we are not responsible and accountable for our lives.

I suspect that every instant of life literally freezes in memory, ready to play its part later in a rigorous self-examination that follows death.

The fire of hell may be kindled by seeing oneself as one really is. And heaven’s balm emerges if there is reconciliation.

Of course, one can take the comfortable road and say that I am lying, that the descriptions in this book are hyperbole or hallucination. But they are not. I am telling the truth of what happened to me, and the implications are there for anybody to see. Not only are we not alone, we have a life in another form—and it is on that level of reality that the visitors are primarily present.

I call them visitors, but now I am beginning to think that is a misnomer. I have had the impression that they think of themselves as family, and perhaps that is exactly what they are.

I had the notion, standing in the perfect predawn silence of that morning in November, that I had been allowed a glimpse between the worlds of the living and the dead.

Our civilization is addicted to its sins. We despoil the earth and corrupt the lives of millions of people without a qualm. We do not take responsibility for anything we do. Calumnies, lies, public character assassinations, theft, murder, and self-abuse of all kinds are routine among us. Every sin is glorified and committed until we choke ourselves with it. Because we have deluded ourselves into ignoring the reality of the soul, we imagine everything we do to be some kind of secret.

I suspect that we do not have any secrets at all. I may now understand those strange places of drama in the golden city. Under the ruthless lights the human world squirms in its folly.

Who watches us? It is a question that was once answered by the richness of mythology and faith. We have abandoned the mythology and lost the faith. The question must be addressed afresh, I suspect, if we are ever to understand our own true nature.

Should we ever do this, I suspect that we will also find the secret of the visitors.

NINETEEN

December 23, 1986

We had been in New York for a time, and returned to the country for Christmas on December 23. I spent the evening hiding in the bedroom attempting to assemble Christmas toys. We went to bed at about ten-thirty. Earlier in the evening I had seen a flash of light on the abandoned road behind our house. It was sufficiently bright to induce me to go down and investigate, thinking maybe somebody had come in with a snowmobile.

Everything was normal. At five-fifteen I had been talking on the phone when I saw what looked like a very bright star move across the sky outside the window. It was too slow to be a meteor, and seemingly too bright and close to be a plane.

We went to bed that night quite normally. At 3:30 A.M. by the clock I woke up and went to the bathroom. When I lay back down in the bed a strange thing began to happen. I began to feel a tingling, pulsating energy running up and down my body. I shuddered. Then I had the feeling that somebody had just come into the room, somebody moving with graceful, quick strides.

A feeling came over me of being watched. It was so strong that it fascinated me. I'd felt it once or twice before. I would characterize it as a sensation of having another consciousness inside my mind. It was like being watched from the inside.

An instant later I must have blacked out, because the next thing I knew somebody was slapping me on the shoulder.

I woke up and saw one of the visitors beside the bed. Under normal circumstances it is easy to see in the dark in our bedroom because the burglar alarm is lit by a number of bright diodes and functions as a night-light.

At first I could hardly bear to look. I wanted it to be an ordinary person there. But my sense of recognition was so strong that I feel it must have been the one I remembered from December 26, 1985. She still seemed feminine, even though I was now aware that I couldn't possibly tell the sex, if there was any, of someone so differently constructed.

Then she darted her head toward me with the jerking suddenness of an insect. I was just plain horrified. But her other motions, gracefully gesturing at me to get up, made me want to touch her, to cherish her.

Even so, there was a tremendously powerful feeling of what I can only describe as pure menace coming from her. Could it be that they are also afraid? Is coming into contact with us frightening to them?

Were we both frightened, she and I?

I had been waiting a year for this moment. I was fully prepared—or so I thought. On the bedside table there was a totally automatic camera fully loaded with film. Even though my body felt distinctly strange, I was able to sit up quite normally. I reached toward the camera.

I then saw my hands move away from it, entirely on their own! I didn't move them. I had nothing to do with it. Their motion was completely normal. However, it did not originate in my mind. I was telling my hands to pick up the camera. They were moving elsewhere without my participation.

Next I found myself standing up. I loomed over the visitor, but not as much as I'd imagined I would. She was actually about five feet tall, not nearly as short as I'd thought.

Seeing her move in her smooth and then sudden manner, I could hardly believe that she was not some sort of a machine. But she was also totally alive. There was consciousness there, all right. I knew it well. She was now radiating what I can only describe as sardonic humor.

She was clearly visible to me. As I had not activated it, the lights on our burglar alarm were all shining green instead of red. And there was a light on in the bathroom downstairs as well as I could see clearly. Why hadn't I turned on the burglar alarm? I'd completely forgotten, which I suspect was their doing.

She went around behind me. Suddenly I found myself moving toward the bedroom door. I made a grab for a tape recorder that was on the desk near my bed, but I missed that as well.

If I walked, everything was normal. But if I stopped, I began to float along. I could feel her pushing me from behind, her hands against my buttocks. In addition to pressure, her touch produced a mild sort of electrical tingling in my body.

I had no control at all over my direction. I was not moving, I was being moved.

In view of the fact that I had been prevented from taking the camera and tape recorder, I was really desperate for something that would test the reality of this experience. As before, it seemed like something that was happening in the physical world. But, if so, why was I doing this dreamlike floating whenever I stopped trying to walk? My body appeared to be functioning normally. I could see and hear. I could feel myself moving. I was passing through a normal and completely real version of my own house.

As a matter of fact, I was now passing behind the living-room couch. We had brought the cats up during Christmas vacation because it was too cold for them to beg to go outside, where they would be threatened by dogs or coons. The Burmese cat, Sadie, was on the back of the couch, crouching as if ready to jump and run.

I grabbed her and took her with me. My reasoning was that I knew how she looked and acted, and if she continued to appear normal I could assume that my other perceptions weren't being distorted either.

We approached the door to the deck, which was standing open.

The visitor paused and we both stopped. I turned around and saw that she was working back the little washer that keeps the screen door from closing automatically. She carefully pushed it closed.

We moved again, and this time I entered a profoundly different situation. No longer could I see normally. There was a glittering blackness before me. I could still feel Sadie in my arms, and I was very glad for her companionship.

The next thing I knew I was standing in a room. It was an ordinary room. I was in front of a big, plainly designed desk. Behind it was a wall of bookcases stacked with books. There was a volume of Bruce Catton's work on the Civil War, a biography of Madame de Staël, a number of vaguely familiar novels of forties and fifties vintage, a volume of Kafka, some books on mathematics, and, pulled partway out of a shelf as if to draw attention to it, Thomas Wolfe's You Can't Go Home Again.

In this room with me were four other beings. The visitor who had come to get me was standing behind me. Sitting behind the desk was what looked to me like a man with a very, very long face, round, black eyes, and a ridiculous excuse for a curly black toupee on his head. He was wearing a green plaid flannel shirt and leaning so far back in his chair that I could see he had on baggy khaki pants and a wide belt. He looked like something from another world wearing the clothes of the forties.

Standing to my left was a tall man in a tan jumpsuit with many pockets and flaps on it. He was very blond and had a rather flat face. He was easily six feet six and might have been taller. Behind him was an ordinary wooden door. I got the impression that it was not intended that I go through that door. I do not wish to suggest that there was anything menacing about this man. On the contrary, when our eyes met his expression was gentle and touching and full of pity. He reminded me of a son looking with forlorn love at his senile parent. I have since had other encounters with similar tall, fair beings.

Immediately to my right there was a woman. She appeared to be entirely normal, about five feet five, and she was wearing a blue jumpsuit under a white body-length apron. She had a small black case in her left hand. Her hair was brown and pulled back into a bun behind her head. I was no more than a foot from her. When I turned to her we were face-to-face. I looked directly into her eyes and saw there concern, a little pity, and considerable wariness. I was also aware of the presence of what it seems best to describe as an acute sense of attention or concentration. Something about this young woman communicated a startling consciousness. She had fair skin and regular features. Overall, she was conventionally pleasant-looking. I could easily recognize her today if I saw her in the street.

The being behind me thrust a stool under me and I sat down rather abruptly.

The one at the desk asked, speaking in normal English, "Why did you bring the cat?"

Sadie, in my arms, was looking around. Her eyes were wide.

"I'm reality-testing," I replied.

There followed a scene of the most frank and total confusion that I have ever witnessed. They literally looked at each other as if I were completely crazy. At this point I noticed a change in the ambience of the room. It was like a sort of mental pressure being exerted on me. It became very powerful. It seemed to be something that would compel me to speak the truth. I suddenly felt a need to really explain that cat!

"I've made the cats a part of the family," I heard myself saying. It felt like this was a deep, deep truth. "They have to be taken when we're taken. They have to participate in the life of the family. It's their right."

The one behind the desk glared at me. "We'll have to put the cat to sleep."

Now I felt a sense of being a co-conspirator, and I was aware that I had felt this way with the visitors before, but I had no idea when this might have been. I replied, "We can't do that. It's my son's cat. How will I explain it to him?"

There was a short silence. Finally the one behind the desk said, "No, put to sleep for now."

At that the young woman beside me stepped forward, removing from her case a small object made of what looked like two triangular pieces of brass with rounded edges. She placed a flat side of this against Sadie's thigh and the cat at once sank into unconsciousness. Her breast heaved twice and then she was more than asleep, she was as still as death.

I understood perfectly well that they could bring her back to life. At that moment I remembered having seen this done to people many dozens of times.

The one who seemed to be doing all the talking asked me, "What can we do to help you?"

The sensation of my mind being under pressure got stronger. It was as if I had been entered by an overwhelmingly powerful force that would not allow me to say anything except the absolute, deepest truth. It felt like an actual, physical pressure, as if some disembodied awareness had gone inside me and there acquired mass, form, and force.

I could have asked for some physical proof of the visitors' existence. I could have asked them to enter my world with me instead of hanging back in this half-reality. But I did not care about those things, not down deep. At the deepest level of myself I knew at that moment exactly what I wanted and needed. If a coherent and useful relationship was ever to develop between me and the visitors, I had to reduce my fear.

I replied, "You could help me fear you less."

There was a long, silent moment. Then an answer seemed to emerge from all of them. "We will try, but it will be very hard,"

After that the young woman stepped behind me and applied her little brass device to my neck for a moment. The next morning there was a small raised knot with a red spot where she had touched me. The next thing I knew I was being taken by the being who had come to get me in the first place to a small, dark room. As she maneuvered me along, again pushing me from behind, I could sense that she took an almost proprietary interest in me. I'd had the feeling earlier that she was rather pleased about something. I'd glimpsed a sort of crooked smile on her face as I sat down in the chair.

She suddenly seemed little and vulnerable and old and I felt a cherishing feeling toward her. No longer did she seem all-powerful. I could imagine carrying her in my arms.

From behind me there was what I can only describe as a sardonic snort full of power and derision. I was with a proud old warrior.

I recalled that Robert Monroe had said in his book that one could ask spirits for things. One could demand that only what was most needed be given. One could insist that no harm be done.

My mind went back to the extraordinary dream I'd had a few weeks before, of the beautiful star approaching the strange, mystic sea.

At that moment we arrived back at the house and I had a glimpse of it twirling around below me, looking like a toy in the night, and then we were suddenly on the deck, the two of us and Sadie in my arms.

Something happened to me at that point, but all I can remember is a jumble of disconnected images.

I have thought that my difficulty in determining where we went might have had to do with the fact that I was not taken to some craft in the sky or a hidden base of some kind, but to a perfectly ordinary building, a place I could have returned had I known where it was.

Then we went back into the house. I still had Sadie. We went into Andrew's room, where he was sleeping normally. The other cat, Coe, went scabbling wildly away, making a strange noise. I thought he would wake Andrew, but he didn't. Then I put Sadie in the bed. She was as limp as a sodden leaf.

I realized that I had only a few more moments with the visitor. Again my dream came to mind. I asked, mentally, to be taken to the place where I had seen that star.

The answer was another burst of sardonic contempt.

The next thing I knew I was being pushed somewhere. I ended up in a strange wooden room. I couldn't understand it. Was this the place where I had seen the star? I saw a bed with a very vulnerable-looking woman asleep on it. I thought to myself, How can that woman sleep when these people are here?

Then I was absolutely thunderstruck to realize that I knew the woman. It was Anne. And the room was familiar too. It was our bedroom.

All sense of otherness then left my body. I felt perfectly normal. I turned around and saw the visitor standing in the doorway. When I took a step toward her, she did something that made me no longer want to walk toward her. Was it a gesture, a sound, a mental image? I cannot remember.

Then she turned and stepped into the shadows beyond the door. I felt extraordinarily tired—a sensation that I was expecting from the previous experiences. For a moment or two I fought it, but there was no hope. I collapsed onto the bed. I managed to shake Anne and tell her, "I was just with the visitors." She murmured, "Andrew?" I said he was fine. As I was dozing off I heard people moving noisily around in the house. A low voice may have laughed softly. That was the last thing I remembered until morning.

The moment I woke up I went to check Sadie, for fear that she might actually be dead. I did not want Andrew to wake up and find her like that.

She was sleeping on the pillow beside his head, curled up in a ball. She remained like that until after supper. When she woke up she drank an enormous amount of water. Until the next morning she seemed to have a stiff thigh where the brass object had been applied, but I couldn't find a mark. A month later when we were back in the city, people were still noticing that she was not herself. She would sit staring for hours and she appeared uneasy. I would work all day with her sitting in my lap. A friend, Canadian filmmaker David Cherniack, commented five weeks after the incident that she seemed like “a shocked cat.” Eventually she got over it and has returned to her usual open, curious self. But I will never take her with me again, because it was obviously very hard on her.

When he got up that morning, Andrew was full of questions about the visitors. I was unaware of anything happening to him during the night, but Anne’s sleepy question made me wonder if she was not subliminally aware that he had also been involved.

We never discuss them with him unless he brings them up, and it was unusual for him to do so. He complained about them, saying, “They’re strict with me.” He never volunteered what was meant by that, and we didn’t ask him. I did ask him if he thought the visitors were real. “They can be,” he said, and went on eating his breakfast.

I thought that was a healthy response and took it no further.

The Razor's Edge

The visitors almost immediately set about making good on their promise to help me deal with my fear of them. They did not do this by giving me a reassuring pat on the back. Rather, they created conditions that would force me to have a direct taste of my fear so that I could see it and know it. What I did with this knowledge they left up to me.

Unless they are simply by nature terrifying to us, it must have taken a lot of determination to do what was done, so much so that there must have been love behind it.

On December 27 and 28, Anne and I saw a number of magnificent owls around the house during daylight hours. I observed a great gray owl and we both saw another owl, but it flew away too quickly for us to identify it.

At that time I was already aware of the association of owls as an apparent screen memory for the visitors. But these owls were not screen memories. They were simply ordinary owls, though their presence during daylight hours was unusual.

On the morning of December 29 our closest neighbors called to say that a beautiful owl had just flown off into the woods toward our place. We looked out and saw it in a tree a few feet from the window. I was astonished; it looked to me like a hawk owl, which would be a very unusual sighting in our area. My neighbor thought that it was a great gray.

It left the tree and attacked what I assumed was a field mouse on the ground and began to feed. Again, this was a classic hawk-owl feeding pattern. At that moment I could not help but think of how apt the image was of the silent, all-seeing creature of the night swooping down upon the helpless surface dweller to feed off his blood and bones.

Observing nature, one soon learns that there is much to the prey-predator relationship that we have forgotten. There are levels of love that we barely touch in our lives. When one observes the whole violence of the attack, the high drama of the death, the strangely humdrum quality of feeding, one sees that there is a deep mystery there, a wild, urgent love that seems to contain the whole relationship.

And one wonders how the survivors feel—the moose that has denied the wolf, the mouse that has reached the bracken before the owl's talons could rend him. Because they threaten life, the wolf and the owl also reveal its sweetness.

I thought to myself that a relationship with the visitors could be dangerous and sweet at the same time.

Later that day we were driving through a nearby town when a voice told me to stop at the house of a friend, glass artist Gilda Strutz. Another car, driven by a tall and imposing bearded man of about thirty, pulled up at the same time. We all went in to see Gilda together. The man turned out to be another friend of hers, Barry Maddock. Communion hadn't been published and neither of them knew anything at all about it.

We chatted for a while and I soon found myself talking about the owls we had been seeing.

Barry was surprised to hear this because he had had a very unusual dream the night before about an owl. He proceeded to describe what sounded to me like a screen memory for a visitor experience. He had been asleep in a house where he was house-sitting until the new owners moved in. Suddenly he was awakened by what sounded like somebody kicking a baseboard heater. He got up because the house was new and he'd helped build it. He knew that the heating system shouldn't be doing that.

He walked into the living room. The first thing he saw was a pair of huge, dark eyes. When he later saw the cover of Communion he was amazed by the similarity. At the time, he had the bizarre impression that an enormous gray owl with big, black eyes was in the room. The owl took him into a large, vaulted chamber that reminded him of the Sydney Opera House. There it turned into a bird of paradise.

He remembered sitting beside a small man who seemed to him like a gnome or a gremlin. His impression was that this man was good-natured. He didn't remember anything about the man's appearance, except that he was "dark."

The next morning Barry had what he said was an extremely strange feeling. He seemed "loose" in his body. He was also suffering from "missing time" in that he could remember getting up and going into the living room, then having the vivid dream. The trouble was, he could not recall going back to bed before he had the dream. The sort of confusion that Barry described fitted very well with my own initial conscious reactions to the visitors. He also noticed a small raised mark on his neck. He didn't think to mention it at the time, and I didn't see it, but his description, given later, suggested that it was similar to the one I had found on my own neck on the morning of December 24.

The dream had frightened him badly.

I resolved to get to know him better to find out if anything more would emerge from his mind. On the morning of December 30 we went hiking together deep into the woods and we talked. He turned out to be one of the most fearless people I had ever met. He was well traveled and had had some remarkable confrontations in his life. He'd been stalked by a jaguar at night in the jungles of Central America—and could tell that as an "interesting" story!

The more he spoke about his dream, however, the more he revealed deep fear. It seemed to me that he was aching to say he thought the dream was real, but dared not do so because of its content.

I found that the house at which he was sitting was quite near my own place. It belonged to a couple that was just moving in. I introduced myself to them a few weeks later, and it turned out that the woman had seen a strange light outside the kitchen window a couple of nights before I arrived. She was quite curious about it because she did not understand what it could have been. The house is on a bluff and the kitchen window is a considerable distance from the ground.

In January 1988—a year later—I discovered by chance that a local resident had seen a huge lighted object hanging a few hundred feet above a road about two miles from our houses. This sighting took place at approximately five o'clock on the morning of January 1, 1987. It was not on the exact night that I'd had my experience or Barry his dream, but it suggested a presence during that same week. Similarly, I have received a letter from a Communion reader saying that he and his family saw a huge object over their town on the night of December 26, 1985, when I had my first consciously remembered visitor experience. What my correspondent did not know was that his town was only a few miles from my house. Another correspondent wrote of a series of dreams of a female being who spoke to him of an "age of sisterhood" long ago and looked very much like the being on the cover of Communion. His dreams, which he had in the 1970s, took place on a very specific road. Unknown to him, it is the road to my house from his town.

But Barry's case was special to me, because he seemed to have experienced some sort of face-to-face interaction that could be connected to my situation.

To me, the lesson of his encounter was clear. If as fearless a man as Barry could be afraid over a dream that appeared connected to the visitors, then I could accept my own fear. I did not need to think of it as a weakness. The content of Barry's dream suggested that the visitors might be revealing, in the transformation from a predatory owl into a bird of paradise, an aspect of their nature that I had suspected but had been unable to prove to myself.

It was a valuable lesson, but it would take me nearly a year to assimilate it. I was more interested then in quelling my fear. It had not yet occurred to me to simply accept it for what it was, a very natural reaction to the unknown.

The events of the past few days, starting with the incredible experience of December 23, had caused all the fear I had stifled to come back, and to get even worse.

My memory of the night of December 23 was vivid. It was totally real. Those people had been there. That being with those huge eyes and that fearsome and sardonic attitude had touched me, controlled me, taken me through the night. My relationship with the visitors was now more than close. It was intimate.

I kept thinking that they were going to lash out at me, kill me, steal me, do something to my family. This wasn't rational. It was because they seemed so furious and had so much control.

Facing the woods became hard again—even harder than before.

I tried unsuccessfully on the night of January 2. The following night I tried again. I was desperate with fear. When I went outside there was such an atmosphere of menace that I almost couldn't bear it. I took a few steps but found that the darkness was profound. Then I noticed that the lights in the house seemed unnaturally bright, almost as if the air were somehow darker than it should be. But there was no fog, no smoke. Light just didn't work as well as it should.

In all the times I had taken this walk before, things had never looked like this. The woods were as dark as a cave. I went back inside, deciding that I must be spooking myself.

The visitors had said that they would “help me” work with my fear. Had what happened to Barry been induced by the visitors in such a way that it impacted me as well? Had they somehow drawn all those owls to my place, thus ensuring that Barry and I would start talking about them when we met?

Or was I so frightened that I was beginning to invent connections where none existed? I did not think so, any more than I thought that what had happened to Jo Sharp was a coincidence. Calling these events accidents was just another way of denying the fact that there was a controlling intelligence behind them—powerful, incredibly observant, and concerned with the fate of human beings.

The night of January 3 I challenged the woods again.

As I left the house I carefully made sure that the door that opens onto the deck was unlocked. Anne had gone up to have her shower and I didn't want to be locked out. I crossed the deck and headed for the woods, determined this time to walk no matter what happened.

What happened was that I heard the most terrible howling that I have ever heard in my life come out of the woods. I know a good deal about North American birds and mammals, and there isn't anything that can howl like that. I'm not even sure that a human being could produce such a sound.

It rose up like the shriek of a banshee, hideously savage. It echoed amid the trees . . . and it began moving. Whatever was doing that was coming swiftly closer—above the woods.

Then it stopped. I thought it must be an owl. Must be. But every dog up and down the valley was absolutely screaming with terror. The desperate, wailing barks filled the air. And then the howling came back, this time farther down in the woods.

Later I researched bird sounds very thoroughly, and I satisfied myself that the terrible noise I had heard was no common thing.

I realized that there was no way on earth I was going to take my walk.

Right there on the spot I started going blind. It got darker and darker and darker. I looked down and could not see my own feet. Frantically I turned toward the house. The howling started up again, rapidly coming closer. In the distance the dogs were now beside themselves.

Paradoxically, the lights in the house seemed a thousand times brighter than normal. And I saw, in one of the windows, a visitor. It was standing there in the full light staring at me. But before I could get more than a glimpse, it jumped out of sight.

The howling had come down out of the sky and was now moving toward me on the path. I found myself with the howling behind me in the woods and the visitors in my house with my wife and son. And I was three-quarters blind.

I stumbled across the deck and pulled at the door. To my horror it was locked!

Then I heard the shower start. I pounded on the door but Anne couldn't hear me. I wanted to give up, to sink down and just scream, but I couldn't do that. My little boy was in there and he might wake up and he mustn't see his dad like this.

I ran around the house and found the basement door open. I rushed in, took the stairs three at a time—only to discover that the door at the top of the stairs had been locked as well.

There was no doubt at all in my mind now. The visitors were inside the house with my family and they had locked me out with the howling.

I thought about running to a neighbor's house, but I was afraid that there wouldn't be enough time and I was still having trouble seeing. Terrible fears raced through me: They were predators and they were going to eat our souls; they were demons and they were going to drag me off to hell; they were vicious aliens and they were going to steal us all for some kind of experiment; they were crazy and to amuse themselves they had unleashed some kind of preternatural monster in my woods.

I went to the side of the house. I could hear the shower running in the upstairs bathroom. I had an idea. I would throw stones at the window. Anne would hear and let me in and at least we'd be together.

I threw a couple of stones and they hit the wall. I heard Anne say, "All right, very funny." I threw one at the window and the next thing I knew she was screaming too. "God help me," she cried. "Whitley, please come home! Whitley!"

"I'm here," I shouted. "I'm here."

Finally she heard me. She put a towel around her and came down and let me in and we hugged each other. It was over. The howling was gone. I could see again. The night was normal.

It developed that she'd thought I was knocking on the door when I was throwing the stones against the wall. When they started hitting the window she thought the visitors were coming in and she panicked. "I felt them all around me while I was in the shower," she said. "It was like they were right there."

I then told her that I had seen one of them in the house. For the first time, Anne that night acknowledged that she was afraid of the visitors. And now that she had touched her fear it was less. The next day Andrew said to me, "Guess what. I'm not scared of the visitors anymore, at least not much." He had no memory of the disturbances we had experienced.

The next night I challenged the woods again.

I really had to sweat blood to get myself to go out there. It was like walking into the enormous, dark body of some dire phantom.

As I went down the path, deeper and deeper into the darkness, I remembered the howling. A predator, something that would tear my soul out of my body and steal it away. I felt small and alone.

I realized at that moment that I could not bear to go on like this. I could not live with this fear, and I did not know how to live without it unless I lied to myself and arbitrarily decided on my own to believe that the visitors were benevolent.

I absolutely refused to, in effect, make them my religion. Instead I just kept walking, not knowing what I was moving toward. I was crying, I couldn't help it.

Then I found that there was something else in me, something besides the fear. It was not a false belief. Rather it was acceptance, the same kind of acceptance I had felt on that airplane when I thought it was crashing.

I could balance my feelings. On the one hand was the desperate fear of a man alone in the dark with an unknown menace. On the other hand was this enormous, silent, and beautiful thing, the peace that lives deep within.

I help my peace in one hand, my fear in the other. Believing in nothing but the strength of my own two hands, I walked out of the woods into the silent, frozen meadow.

The ancient light of the stars was shining on every icy limb and strand of grass.

I looked around me. I had entered a garden of snows. I raised my face to the radiant abyss.

I remained there, balancing between the light and the dark. Slow shadows approached, hung like smoke at the edge of my vision.

My fear came crackling up in me, a thing of bones. Beside it there was the acceptance: I was me, I was here, I was not going to run.

The shadows started to move closer. I took deep, calm breaths, preparing myself as best I could.

Then some deer walked out into the starlight, four does behind a fine young buck. He stopped and turned toward me, his antlers glittering with frost.

Eye to eye we regarded one another. The moment extended, deepened. We were impossibly close, each of us as still as the laden trees. He seemed like a friend, a fellow sufferer of sorts, this wary, nervous creature.

Then, with a soft snort and a flick of his tail, the buck led his family past me, to a sapling whose bark they had been eating before my approach had disturbed the ordinary course of their night.

The Visitors Emerge

Absolutely incredible things began to happen after I published Communion. The first of these took place in late January 1987 in a bookstore on Manhattan's Upper East Side. Morrow senior editor Bruce Lee and his wife walked into this store on a cold, windy Saturday afternoon. Mr. Lee showed his wife the display for my book, which was facing toward the front of the shop in the fifth or sixth rack behind the store's entrance. They commented on the good display and separated, moving to different parts of the store. Mr. Lee was reading the flap copy of a book of fiction when he noticed two people enter the store and move without hesitation directly to the display of Communion. He was fascinated. The book had barely appeared in the stores and this couple went right to it, which suggested that people were beginning to hear about the book very early in its career.

Mr. Lee moved closer to the couple. They were both short, perhaps five feet tall, and were wearing scarves pulled up to cover their chins, large dark glasses, and winter hats pulled low over their foreheads. They were paging through the book and making such comments as, "Oh, he's got that wrong!" and, "It wasn't like that." There was gentleness and humor in their demeanor—at least for the moment. Mr. Lee also noticed that they were turning—and apparently speed-reading—the pages at a remarkable rate. He went up to the couple, introduced himself as being associated with the publisher, and asked them what they found wrong with the book. The couple looked up at him and said nothing. It was then that Mr. Lee noticed that behind their dark glasses both the man and the woman had large, black, almond-shaped eyes. "You know the look you get from a dog when it's going to bite?" Mr. Lee told me. "That was the feeling I got from their eyes. I didn't want to get bitten, so I moved away."

It was not the usual response Mr. Lee would have had in a more normal situation. A former reporter and correspondent for Newsweek and Reader's Digest, he had covered the White House, the Hill, the Pentagon, and the State Department. He was used to confronting tough people. But in this instance he felt decidedly uneasy, deeply shocked. He went over to his wife, pointed out the couple while mentioning the similarity of their eyes to those on the Communion jacket, and urged her to leave the store.

Nobody, least of all myself and the Lees, knows what to make of this experience. Was it an example of the visitors' odd sense of humor? By simultaneously confirming their existence by appearing to a man of high credibility and reputation but also saying that Communion was full of perceptual errors (a revelation that certainly didn't surprise me), they proved me right and wrong at the same time.

I must say that I wondered about the small, fierce woman Bruce had encountered. Was it she? And how did he determine the sex of the two beings? "They seemed to be man and woman" was his only explanation.

The two visitors had obviously been almost mad with fear themselves, to have communicated such a powerful impression to Mr. Lee.

This appearance was, I believe, as close to public and physical confirmation of their existence as the visitors have yet come.

A telling detail was Mr. Lee's description of the two visitors as wearing mufflers that concealed their chins. I recalled that the correspondent who had provided such an accurate description of the visitors who entered her home in the middle of the day had described the tallest one as having "an elongated face." Mr. Lee and my correspondent do not know one another; in fact they live in different countries. The concurrence of subtle details such as these is strongly suggestive that something real was seen by both people.

Certainly there will be those who will dismiss Mr. Lee's testimony because of his association with my publishing company. But others will be able to see that the man is not lying. The event happened. Because I feared that his testimony would seem self-serving, I did not mention it while promoting Communion, except in one minor case where I more or less tripped up. Now, though, with public interest already so well established, the argument that Mr. Lee is merely serving the interest of his employer is thin. Morrow does not need his testimony to sell books, and Mr. Lee feels that the event has brought him nothing but unwelcome exposure.

In any case, the next event did not concern my publisher. In fact, the witness hadn't even heard of Communion when it took place.

Two months after Bruce Lee's encounter, a completely unrelated but oddly similar event took place in Chicago. In this case a well-established psychoanalyst, Dr. Lee Zahner-Roloff, was walking through a bookstore when a very strange thing happened to him.

He wrote me, "While wandering in the aisles, I passed a tall woman in a beige suit; I cannot recall her face. This interesting fact emerged only after I was describing to a fellow analyst how I came to purchase the book. The beige-suited woman was carrying Communion cradled in her arms, the cover picture forward. In passing her I was overwhelmed with a sudden urge to pick up that book. Why would I pick up that book, about which I knew nothing, and seemed to have a loss of control regarding the purchase of? This is most unusual behavior for me, I assure you." In a postscript Dr. Roloff added, "I must repeat that I lost personal volition completely."

He continued, "That night I began reading the book, became drowsy, fell off to sleep. Never have I had such a tumultuous night of dreaming. I recall nothing of the dreams. Repeat for the next night, save that the dreams were more chaotic. The following morning I told one of my colleagues that she must read this book and even at one point advised all of my colleagues to read it. When I was asked what it was about I experienced the most terrifying stares of rebuke and doubt. . . . After the meeting I took my one sympathetic colleague to the bookstore and bought her the book and asked her to begin it that evening, please! The next morning my first analysand brought a dream about being invaded by aliens, the first such dream in my personal analytical career. My colleague met me for lunch and reported, excitedly, that two analysands had brought outer space dreams, invasion dreams. What did I think? Two days before I had been a naïf; now I was studying three alien dreams. . . .

“Every once in a while I think about that tall woman in the beige suit carrying your book face forward through the aisles. One not easily subjected to an impulse purchase of a book, let alone one that I never encountered in any publication and, especially, one that deals with the subject of abductions. I smiled at my colleague over lunch and asked her what she thought of the woman in beige. Incredible, was the response. I concur.”

The experiences of Mr. Lee and Dr. Roloff were extraordinary. What neither man could have known was that the filmmaker I mentioned earlier who was my houseguest at the cabin the previous August had stated that the briefing paper he had read told of small gray beings with large eyes not too dissimilar from what Bruce Lee had seen, and that he had been told about tall blond beings such as the one encountered by Dr. Roloff.

In addition to this, I had seen a tall blond man in a beige jumpsuit on the night of December 23, 1986. He was well over six feet and clearly very much a part of the group in that room. My impression was that he was guarding the door, presumably to prevent me from making a run for it.

What's more, the grays were thought to be an essentially negative force in conflict with the blond beings. The two that Mr. Lee encountered exuded the same sort of “mad dog” energy that I have observed in them, and were in part negative about Communion—although their negativity communicated priceless knowledge to me at the same time. It told me that they were physically real and capable of entering the human environment. It also told me that some parts of Communion are wrong. To me, this also means that some parts of it are right. Typically, they did not mention which parts were which, but it was still extremely valuable information.

By contrast, the blond woman literally forced Dr. Zahner-Roloff to buy the book.

It would be an oversimplification, however, to conclude that the gray beings were therefore evil and the blond ones benevolent. People have had hair-raising encounters with the blond beings and pleasant ones with the grays, so the picture is mixed.

What is clear to me, however, is the way I react to the two different types of being. The gray ones almost make me jump out of my skin. I don’t think I will ever completely lose my fear of them. My reaction to the others is exactly the opposite. They seem much more reassuring. Maybe it’s only because of the way they look.

Their looks, by the way, were quite a surprise to me. I never would have believed that anything looking that human could be extraterrestrial in origin. It reminded me forcefully that the true nature of the visitor experience remains very much an unknown.

All of these beings—“grays” and “blonds” alike—fit the ancient notions of demons, angels, and “little people.” I reflected that the greater part of my knowledge had come from the gray beings. The word demon is derived from the Greek daimon, which is roughly synonymous with soul. The daimon was the part of a person that could gain knowledge and become transformed. Traditionally, the daimon transformed would return to earth to give knowledge to others. In the Middle Ages knowledge and evil became synonymous and the daimon became the demon, the servant of darkness. In ancient esoteric thought, knowledge was considered an outcome of negative energy because its acquisition came only at the penalty of growing old and dying.

This led me back to something else I had noticed about the visitor experience. From the experiences of people like Mrs. Sharp and from dozens of the letters that were pouring in, it was clear that the soul was very much at issue. People experienced feeling as if their souls were being dragged from their bodies. I'd had an incident of total separation of soul and body. More than one person had seen the visitors in the context of a near-death experience.

"We recycle souls," they had said.

I no longer doubted the existence of the soul. I couldn't; I had been outside my body in a state of total and complete consciousness. This brief but so very clear experience of the soul had inspired me to an intense effort to achieve a conscious connection with it that would last more than a few minutes. I wanted to feel my soul, to participate in its life.

I practiced by constantly trying to leave my body and go to people I knew in such a way that they would be able to perceive me. My method was to use the technique I had learned at the Monroe Institute to reach the "mind awake/body asleep" state, then attempt to leave my body and reach the target individual. Among the people I attempted to reach in this way were Dora Ruffner, John Gliedman, and a friend in Denver.

I never managed to reach Dora or John.

In February 1987, the friend in Denver called me to report an odd experience. She had awakened and seen the outline of my face across the room from her. Later she wrote me, "What I saw exactly was the impression of your face wearing the glasses you wear amid the leaves of a plant hanging near the door of my bedroom for about 3 seconds in the dark. I turned on the light and nothing was there."

I cannot say that I was trying to reach her on the night that she saw me, because we could not establish the exact date. But her experience took place during the period when I was making the attempt.

I probably would not have mentioned the incident had it not kept happening.

Chicago radio personality Roy Leonard—who does not know any of the other people involved and had heard nothing whatsoever of the episode I just described—awakened on the night of June 7, 1987, to find my presence in his bedroom. He reported that he could “almost” see me. On the same night that this took place—perhaps even at the same hour—I was in a small town near Madison, Wisconsin, having a very unusual experience along with Dora Ruffner and Selena Fox, a leader of Circle Sanctuary, as witnesses and participants.

Circle is the primary networking organization of the Wiccan religion. Wicca is also known as Witchcraft, but it has no relationship to Satanism and other such perversions. It is recognized by the United States government as a legitimate religion, and many of its ministers, such as Ms. Fox, can perform marriages and carry out all the other legally recognized functions of the clergy. Dora and Anne and I were interested in Wicca because, when all the superstitious nonsense that surrounds it is cleared away, it emerges as an ancient Western expression of shamanism, which is the oldest of all human religious traditions. In this it is very similar to Native American and African religions. Like the other ancient nature religions, it has an important lesson to teach us about love for the earth.

The Circle Sanctuary is located in beautiful, rolling Wisconsin land. Dora and I took our families there to meet the members of the group and learn more about the traditions they were trying to preserve. We arrived on a warm June afternoon with both of our families—four adults and three children—for a weekend at Circle.

We learned a great deal over that weekend, about Circle’s work and its problems communicating its ideas to the many people who are confused about the real nature and goals of Wicca.

Sunday night was windy and moonlit. Selena, Dora, and I went out through a meadow of chest-high grass and flowers, up the side of a hill to Selena's ceremonial stone circle, which is located in a grove of ancient oaks. The wind was tossing the trees, making wild blue shadows on the ground. It was a beautiful moment.

The three of us entered the circle and stood facing one another at its center. Selena was about to begin the ceremony when we heard the footsteps of a fourth person approaching. These footsteps came close to the north point of the circle and stopped for a moment. I was disturbed, because they came right into a patch of moonlight and I couldn't see anyone. Assuming that it must be another person, we called out a greeting, all three of us. Selena walked to the spot where the sounds had come from. She saw nobody, but sensed a very definite presence.

I began to become uneasy. Circle Sanctuary is the object of harassment by the local town board, county zoning officials, and a pressure group of local citizens. Local fundamentalist churches had shown a film about Satanism and falsely claimed that it described Wicca and the practices of Circle Sanctuary. Legal maneuvers were under way to prevent Wiccan religious activities from taking place on Circle Sanctuary land. The American Civil Liberties Union had become involved on the Sanctuary's behalf.

I was afraid that we were about to be attacked by superstitious townspeople. The darkness was now silent. I felt exposed and helpless.

Then the footsteps resumed, this time walking off into the underbrush and apparently over a cliff! We waited, but there was no crash below. Two other people had seen odd manifestations earlier that evening, one a lighted disk sailing along beneath cloud cover, the other a ball of fire bouncing through a meadow.

Selena began the ritual. Despite my fears that either a posse or the visitors were about to come marching out of the dark, I managed to stay throughout the ritual. There were stealthy footfalls all around us, even inside the circle. I heard some a couple of feet away from me, but saw nothing at all. As the three of us meditated on behalf of planetary healing, the sounds subsided.

That night I had an extremely strange dream of moving like a ghost through an endless, dark woods and entering a little room that was so dark I couldn't see a thing. How Roy Leonard ended up on the receiving end of that dream I do not presently understand. For him it was only a minor event, but I found it very hard to understand.

A month later I tried consciously to project myself to somebody else. I chose a man I have known for years. At the time, he was going through a number of life changes, and I wanted very much to help him. I lay down on my bed in the city at about ten at night. I waited, conscious of him. Suddenly I saw him. He was sitting with a group of people. He was wearing white clothes. A strange, gray fog seemed to rush out of him and into me. Then the experience ended.

The next morning he called me. I receive perhaps three calls a year from him, so this was a rare occasion. His girlfriend had insisted that he call because she'd had a powerful dream about me the night before. I asked him what he'd been doing at ten, and what he was wearing. "We'd just finished dinner, and we were with friends. I was wearing white jeans and a white shirt." He went on to say that he felt like a fog had lifted from his mind that night, and he was beginning another attempt to reconstruct his life.

In the ensuing months I became better at projecting myself or doing whatever it was that I was doing. I began to be able to intentionally take these journeys from time to time. I will not report on any that did not result in conscious awareness on the part of the individual I visited, because such a journey is considered so extremely improbable in our culture that the narrative of those experiences would serve no useful purpose.

Usually the approach is not noticed by the object individual. Sometimes they appear entirely aware of my presence, but in later conversation they never mention it. Since it would defeat my purpose to bring it up myself, I remain in the dark about whether people I have visited in this manner thought they were dreaming or simply remembered nothing. I have been unable even to approach anybody on an unconscious level when they were awake during the day. In ordinary consciousness people seem literally to be functioning like robots. It is as if they are running on automatic pilot. The effect is astonishing, weird, frightening. One is left with the feeling that human society is a giant machine, and we are all just cogs in it, capable of arousal into higher consciousness only from a state of physical sleep, when the habits of personality do not have us in their snare.

On the night of March 14, 1988, I was talking to writer Barbara Clayman when I realized that she could give a certain man a type of information that he appeared to me to need very badly. I realized that I had to go to Barbara on the nonphysical level in order to prepare her for her encounter with this individual. I told her nothing of my thoughts, and concluded our conversation lest I even subliminally reveal my plan to her.

At four-thirty in the morning I found myself at her bedside. She lives about a thousand miles from New York. I saw her lying there, saw her husband beside her, and felt the enormous tenderness, the anguish of love, that I always experience on such journeys. I feel this even when I am with people who despise me. I suspect that many of us—maybe all of us—make such trips, but that we cannot consciously remember what we do. It takes a long time to be able to allow oneself to feel really consuming, ecstatic love for others. I feel that the visitors have enabled me to see this level of reality by reducing my fear. I am not afraid of overwhelmingly powerful feelings.

I projected my voice into Barbara's ear. I do not hear myself when I do this. It is a form of thought. My experience is that it sounds to the listener like a small speaker or radio in his or her ear. I said, "It's me, Whitley. Barbara, it's Whitley." Her eyes flew open. A flush of fear went through her and she appeared to me to start yelling. This startled me and I told her rather frantically to quiet down. I am a leaf in the wind at moments like that, and if her husband woke up, I would not be able to maintain my presence.

Barbara then became silent and I felt myself give her the material that she needed about the man, who is involved in making a policy decision of fundamental importance. My next memory is of being deep in soft air, in a blue morning sky.

The next evening Barbara called. She left a message that it was "important." I did not allow myself even to hope that she had remembered our meeting.

To my everlasting delight, when I returned her call I found her full of amazement. She had remembered our encounter vividly and in detail, right down to the words I had "said" to her. Like the woman in Denver, she recalled seeing my face hanging before her, also complete with the little wire-framed glasses. Lest it be assumed that the touch of the glasses is accidental or even incidental, I would refer readers to the tradition of magical spectacles, which were in olden times thought to enable the wearer to see that which ordinarily remains unseen. In the sixteenth century, Labyrinth of the World spectacles were described that possessed the power to reveal an unseen world.

I suspect that experiences such as those reported in this chapter are the outcomes of a fundamental shift of mind. They are what happens when people begin to abandon the old, false belief that each of us is isolated and trapped in our body, that the soul is an abstraction of no real consequence, and that such questions as those posed by the visitors are unworthy of serious consideration. The ability to migrate out of the body may well be a right possessed by all but almost universally ignored.

During the summer of 1987 a number of people who came to our cabin had visitor experiences. Some of these seemed quite genuine. The most extraordinary one happened to Philippe Mora, who was to be the director of the Communion film. Since the lunch we'd had the previous year he and I had redeveloped our friendship of twenty years before. It seemed natural and right that he direct Communion, especially in view of the beautiful work he'd done with such films as Mad Dog Morgan and Death of a Soldier.

He came up to get the flavor of the location, walk the woods, see the cabin.

He stayed in the same guest room where Jacques Sandulescu and Annie Gottlieb had encountered the visitors in October 1985.

On the evening of Philippe's visit there had been a spectacular display in the sky. At one point there were three simultaneous meteors and four apparent satellites sailing around. One of the satellites was pulsating. A star left the center of the sky and shot off to the south. The darkness where it had been flickered twice. I made careful note of the time, 9:40.

The following night I went out at the same time and observed the sky for half an hour. While it was similarly clear, it remained quiet. The "satellites" did not reappear, nor have they done so subsequently.

After the heavenly display, Philippe and I walked the woods together. Later he and Anne and I chatted for a while and then we all went to bed. Anne and I went upstairs and he closed himself up in the small guest room on the first floor. I heard the door lock. Futile, I thought.

When we were in bed Anne said, "They're coming tonight." She's usually right in her assessments of the visitors, I've found. Her increasing sensitivity was beginning to combine with her practical good sense and steadfast insistence on reporting only and exactly what she herself saw, heard, and felt to give her words great impact for me.

I did not tell Philippe what she had said. As a matter of fact, I went to sleep only with difficulty and slept lightly, expecting that the family was again to confront them.

At one A.M. I was still just dozing. I remember hearing the clock strike. But I must have been more deeply asleep later, because the next few hours are a blank.

Sometime between two and five I half awoke when I heard a woman downstairs say, "Don't scream or you'll wake up Andrew." Instead of jumping out of bed upon hearing a stranger say such a thing in my home in the middle of the night, I just went back to sleep! I slept like a log until morning. When I got up I had no sense at all that the visitors had been near me. Anne was fine. Interestingly, when I asked her if she thought they'd come, she looked at me and sort of laughed.

Philippe was rather distant at breakfast. He spent a good deal of time staring off into space. Finally he said, "Look, I think something happened last night. I woke up and there were lights shining in the window of my room. I was scared. Then I got up and the next thing I knew I found myself in the kitchen. Anne said to me 'Don't scream or you'll wake up Andrew.' "

Anne told him that she hadn't been downstairs. Later she insisted to me that this was true. I must admit that the voice I heard didn't sound familiar to me. It was a young, pleasant female voice, average in tone and timbre. It sounded calm and gentle.

Philippe went on to describe seeing a huge object outside hanging over the pool, and lights swarming past all the windows of the house. Later he remembered seeing "a face trying to smile that didn't look like it was made to smile." He also saw a thin being standing and moving its hands as though it were signaling. And somebody showed him little tubs with what appeared to be strange, nonhuman arms and legs growing out of them.

What happened to him? A vivid dream because of where he was sleeping? I wouldn't deny the possibility. But I would also think it foolish to consider that the only possibility.

It could also be that he was literally visited by beings who showed him how they looked and even attempted to indicate their friendliness with an inept smile. If they emerge from a reality sufficiently different from our own, their halting and confused contact with Philippe might actually turn out to have been the outcome of many years of effort at learning to communicate with us.

On August 16, 1987, we elected to celebrate the Harmonic Convergence at our home. We did this not because we were certain of the accuracy of the calendrical predictions that led to the observance, but because it represented a coming together of many people throughout the world for a good purpose and because it recognized the validity and—above all—the intellectual potency of Native American thought as expressed in the Mayan calendar.

At our celebration were Dora Ruffner, her friend Peter Frohe, psychologists John Gliedman, Kenneth Ring, and Barbara Sanders, Omega Foundation director Alise Agar, and two people who have had the visitor experience. On the morning of August 16, both I and one of these two people had visitor experiences. Just before dawn this woman was taken from her room down to a meditation circle I'd built the month before. She remembered being talked to by somebody she described as "a man" who held a wand in his hand.

She was exhausted and disturbed by this, and I was concerned for her. A wand was used in October 1985 to strike three blows against my forehead, which forced me to begin the process of encounter.

She spent the rest of the day in bed and had the peculiar experience of forgetting where she had been when she went home on the train later that afternoon. By the time she got to Grand Central Station she could not remember where she had come from. It took her some time to reconstruct her day. It was as if she'd experienced a traumatic amnesia that included her entire visit to our cabin.

Just before dawn I was sitting in the living room waiting for the others to go down to the circle when a voice spoke quite clearly to me from across the room. It said, simply, "Whitley." It was an authoritative but immensely sad male voice. There followed an idea that something was about to happen, and that I should be calm so that I could see it.

The voice prepared me very well for what happened a short time later. A group of us went down to the circle. We sat together, quietly speaking about our reasons for being there—our hope that man will persist in the world and that our insults to the environment will not lead to our destruction but to the awakening of new respect for the needs of the earth.

I expressed my hope that the world would come to see Native Americans, Australians, Africans, and other ancient peoples as the precious and threatened sources of wisdom and guidance that they really are. We offer our wise old peoples the same indifference that we give our wise old parents.

Then we began to look into each other's eyes from around the circle. I had shared this sort of moment with Dora many times before. Suddenly the circle was literally filled with light. I could see Dora through a golden haze. This continued for as long as a minute, and then faded like the fading of bells, leaving me filled with explosive energy and an almost overwhelming desire to get on with my work.

After we left the circle, I asked each person individually what their experience had been. Ken Ring noticed nothing. John Gliedman got a fierce headache. When the light came into the circle, I saw him frown and then seem to inwardly turn away, and I wondered if the headache was not an outcome of an effort to ignore what he had seen. Dora had seen the golden light as clearly as I had. Anne had seen it too.

She said, "It was like the sunlight had become incredibly beautiful and clear." The others had not perceived it.

All three of us, especially Anne, date fundamental changes in ourselves from that moment.

Whatever the visitors are, I suspect that they have been responsible for much paranormal phenomena, ranging from the appearance of gods, angels, fairies, ghosts, and miraculous beings to the landing of UFOs in the backyards of America. It may be that what happened to Mohammed in his cave and to Christ in Egypt, to Buddha in his youth and to all of our great prophets and seers, was an exalted version of the same humble experience that causes a flying saucer to traverse the sky or a visitor to appear in a bedroom or light to fill a circle of friends.

It should not be forgotten that the visitors—if I am right about them—represent the most powerful of all forces acting in human culture. They may be extraterrestrials managing the evolution of the human mind. Or they may represent the presence of mind on another level of being. Perhaps our fate is eventually to leave the physical world altogether and join them in that strange hyper-reality from which they seem to emerge.

What is interesting to me now is how to develop effective techniques to call them into one's life and make use of what they have to offer. I have described gross versions of such techniques, such as developing real questions and being willing to be taken on a journey through one's fears. The most effective technique seems to be simply to open oneself, asking for what one needs the most without placing any conditions at all on what that might be.

I hope that my book is fair warning of just how hard this journey can be. The few simple techniques I have found are only a beginning. If we choose to deepen our relationship with the visitors, I have no doubt that much more fruitful interaction can be accomplished. This would represent a complete change in man's relationship with this enigma. We would no longer be passive participants. Rather, we would be to some small degree in co-equal control of the relationship.

There can be only one reason that the nature of the visitor experience is changing. They seem more realistic, more possible, than ever before. Conceived of as extraterrestrials, they become almost understandable. Perhaps the prevalence of this concept is our way of admitting to ourselves that we can now begin to understand.

The "visitor experience" is old. Two hundred years ago a farmer might have come in from his plowing and said, "I saw fairies dancing in the glen." A thousand years ago he might have seen angels flying. Two thousand years ago it would have been Dionysus leaping in the fields. Four thousand years ago he might have seen the goddess Earth herself walking those old hills, her starry robe sparkling with the pure light of magic.

That we could even conceive of having an objective relationship with this force is what is new about the visitor experience in modern times.

Always we have been passive. We have knelt before the gods, been abducted by the fairies and the UFO occupants. But we have never, ever tried to explore a real relationship. This is why we know nothing about them. In a relationship, both partners seek to know and serve the other. So far all we have done, in all of our history, is to be submissive to this force, or try like the fearful, debunkers of today to ignore it. More even than repression of sex, repression of relationship with this level of reality is characteristic of what is most inhumane about modern culture. It is ironic that the West, with its relentless interest in the physical world, would fail to see that the soul also has reference to physical reality, emerges from it, depends on it, indeed is at once its progeny and its source.

Thankfully, the very way we think and perceive our universe may be changing. We may be in the process of achieving a more sane and objective view of something that has been a source of confusion since the beginning of time.

The temptation not to question, or to say, “I have the answer,” is enormous. I agonized over it. I longed to decide that the visitors were part of my mind. As an intellectual I felt terribly threatened by the idea of extraterrestrial or “other” intelligence. I did not like it and I did not want it to be true.

One of the most difficult things I’ve had to face is the frank prospect that it is true.

We hide from the visitors. We hide in beliefs. They’re the gods. They’re gentry, dwarfs, elves. They’re demons or angels. Aliens. The unconscious. The oversoul. Hallucinations. Mass hysteria. Lies. You name it. But what they never are, what we never allow ourselves to face, is the truth.

We can face the reality of the visitors. The first step is to admit that they exist but that we do not know what they are. We can then make a tentative beginning, seeking to understand what they may mean to us.

We can do this by developing our side of the relationship with calmness, objectivity, and determination, seeking to find what we can extract from their presence, and what we might be able to give in return. To continue to refuse to entertain the possibility of relationship would be tragic.

If we do that we will deny ourselves the flowering of understanding that seems now to lie just within our grasp.

We have been denying this terrifying, provocative reality for a long time, because to acknowledge it is to face what is smallest and weakest in ourselves.

But to look at it squarely, to accept that it is all one great, big, glorious question about something that is very real—that is at last to raise one’s eyes and encounter the sky.

Beyond Nightmare

I hope that I have made a case for more general acceptance of the reality of the visitor phenomenon as something external to the minds of those perceiving it, and communicated what I feel is the critical importance of keeping it in question.

Because of the effort to dismiss the phenomenon, which has been carried out by government and echoed throughout the scientific and intellectual communities, we remain in ignorance about it.

I believe that the visitors themselves have compelled this ignorance. I have three reasons for my opinion.

First, when he resigned from NICAP, CIA Director Hillenkoetter remarked that the air force had done all it could and that further disclosures were up to the visitors. Second, they keep themselves secret when they obviously could do otherwise. Third, in my personal experience, they have defeated my every effort to photograph them and have continued to come to me only late at night or in the predawn hours, when there is the smallest likelihood of detection by others.

The effect of the secrecy has been to keep us ignorant, and thus to deliver us into their hands in a completely helpless state. From my own experience, I see the wisdom of this policy. Had they not surprised me and shattered all of my preconceptions in the process, I would never have learned anything really new from my encounters.

I feel that it is up to each one of us to seek our own contact, develop it if it occurs, and challenge ourselves to use it for intellectual, emotional, and spiritual growth instead of letting our fears overwhelm us.

To do this, we must learn to live with the question.

I know from experience how hard this is. But if we are ever to develop meaningful insight, we must do just that. Dr. Donald Klein's advice to me when we concluded our work together was of absolutely fundamental importance: Learn to live at a high level of uncertainty. Only by doing this will we begin to gain the rigorously clear and objective outlook we need to perceive what is happening correctly.

I will not assert anything final about the visitors. But I will say—indeed, am clearly obligated to say—what I suspect may be true. I have learned a number of important things from my experience.

1. The visitors are physically real. They also function on a nonphysical level, and this may be their primary reality.

2. They have either been here a long time or they are trying to create this impression. So far, our perceptions of them have been conditioned by our own cultural background. They are an objective reality that is almost always perceived in a highly subjective manner.

3. They have the ability to enter the mind and affect thought, and can accomplish amazing feats with this skill.

4. They have taught me by demonstration that I have a soul separate from my body. My own observations while detached from my body suggest that the soul is some form of conscious energy, possibly electromagnetic in nature.

5. They can affect the soul, even draw it out of the body, with technology that may possibly involve the use of high-intensity magnetic fields.

6. They used few words to communicate with me. Their primary method was a sort of theatrical demonstration, richly endowed with symbolic meaning.

7. When I challenged my own fear of them they responded by taking me on a journey deep into my unconscious terrors. From this I learned that suppressing and denying fear are useless. I discovered how to accept my fear and not be surprised by it.

I suspect that the visitors may have been here for a long time. It has even crossed my mind, given their apparent interest in human genetics, that they may have had something to do with our evolution.

I cannot speculate why we are beginning to see them as a demythologized reality—if indeed we are. It is possible, though, that we are in the process of evolving past the level of superstition and confusion that has in the past blocked us from perceiving the visitors correctly.

The small gray beings that I encountered carried a tremendous load of negativity. In his letter to me describing his encounter in the bookstore, Bruce Lee added the following personal comment: “I was brought up on a farm. I know what it is to look into the eyes of a mad dog. I have had to kill rabid dogs and foxes. That mad-dog look was there. . . .”

But, like so many things about the visitors, there is more to all this than meets the eye. It may be that we are also encountering our own secret savagery when we face them.

I think that the most terrible thing I have ever seen was my face reflected in the eyes of a visitor. I looked like a mad dog.

To the degree that I learned to use their fearsome onslaught as a means of gaining insight into my own fears, I acquired an effective coping tool: The more frightening they got, the stronger I became.

At first they assaulted me without regard to my strengths and weaknesses. My reaction, once I had recovered from my initial panic, was to try to face them. I did this because I got tired of running away; and my wife and I also found the possibility that they might be real tremendously exciting and interesting, though I cannot deny that they may also be dangerous.

I feel that the potential for gain outweighs the risks of contact.

As our relationship developed, the visitors began to tune it very carefully, leading me step by step through my fears. They always seemed ready with the hardest challenge I could manage. They never sought to destroy me with an assault beyond my strength. Thus they can hardly be called evil. Based on the actual outcome of what they did to me, they must be counted the allies of our growth.

I have emerged from my experience a thousand times stronger than I had ever been before it. I am not at all afraid, not even of death. Rather it has become another rich potential in my life, a challenge to be met with a peaceful heart and an interested mind.

I have been in my soul separate from my body. My own experience thus tells me that the soul has a separate life, and the work of people like Dr. Ian Stevenson suggests that it persists beyond death, and that reincarnation is apparently a very real possibility.

The visitors have said, "We recycle souls," and—of the earth—that "this is a school." It may be exactly that—a place where souls are growing and evolving toward some form that we can scarcely begin to imagine. I can conceive that the fate of souls may be one of the great universal questions. It may be that we have emerged as a means of at once creating and answering this question.

My own struggle has made me realize that our lives are, at least potentially, a place of reconciliation between positive and negative energies. My encounters with the visitors were at their most satisfactory when I was actively struggling against my fears and hungers. It was friction that gave me strength.

I do not now find the small, gray beings terrible. I find them useful, as work with them is an efficient way to assault the dark battlements of fear and acquire the wisdom beyond.

Throughout our history we have rejected the negative and sought the positive. There is another way, I feel, that involves balancing between the two. It is up to us to forge in the deepest heart of mankind the place of reconciliation. We must learn to walk the razor's edge between fear and ecstasy—in other words, to begin finally to seek the full flowering and potential of our humanity.

I have learned much about the value and sense of communion with the visitors. The whole point of it seems to me to involve strengthening the soul. Certainly this has been central to my relationship with them.

They made me face death, face them, face my weaknesses and my buried terrors. At the same time, they kept demonstrating to me that I was more than a body, and even that my body could enter extraordinary states such as physical levitation.

In order to transform the visitor experience into something that is useful to us, we must, each of us, face the fact that they evoke fear—and realize that we possess a peace within ourselves that cannot be assailed even by the most powerful negative force.

Really facing the visitors means accepting that one may also endure great fear . . . and become free of all fear.

I have been in anguish many, many times, immersed in the fury of their malevolence, feeling them as a kind of tremendous, overwhelming superconsciousness that saps all sense of self-control.

If we can strike an effective inner pose of balance instead of confronting the visitors with the irrationality of cornered animals, I feel that we will begin to extract a measure of value from our exposure to them.

Should we seek to expand the relationship, we will have to face some very, very difficult things. The journey will be almost inconceivably hard, but also rich with marvels and full of hope. We will walk a narrow way between dangers. To our left there will be a sick planet and all the social discord and economic misery that must accompany its suffering. To our right there will be the rigorous, demanding, and wise unknown that is the visitors.

We will discover truths about ourselves, truths that will change each of us—and all of us—forever. We will pierce the fog that has for so many long years obscured our vision.

At last, we will see.

APPENDIX ONE

Health

It is very important to me that I not participate in the creation of a false unknown. I have thus been eager to explore all possible prosaic answers to the question of what happened to me.

There are a number of diseases of the brain and disorders of the mind that can lead to hallucinations. The most prominent disease is temporal lobe epilepsy, which is a transient disturbance to the temporal lobe of the brain. It causes vivid hallucinations that are often associated with powerful odors. Less frequently, sounds can be mixed with visions and smells in this disease. People with temporal lobe epilepsy tend to be verbal and philosophical and to lack a sense of humor.

Paranoia and schizophrenia are also associated with delusional states and hallucinations.

How my having such a disease could have caused total strangers like Bruce Lee, Dr. Zahner-Roloff, and so many others to encounter the visitors in so many different ways I do not know. Certainly these encounters cannot be dismissed as hysteria. Dr. Zahner-Roloff had never heard of me and my book; nor had Jo Sharp or Barry Maddock. In addition, the great majority of my encounters used to occur in a specific place, my cabin. None of these diseases is recorded as being in the least geographically specific. We have also had the water tested for all manner of pollutants, including pesticides and metals, and nothing unusual was found. The air in the basement of the cabin was tested for gas content, and nothing unusual was detected. Nevertheless, a vapor detector was installed. Our water-purification system uses chlorine, a filter to remove metals, and activated charcoal to remove pollutants. There are no gases or substances in the water that might distort perception.

I was tested for temporal lobe epilepsy on December 6, 1986, and no abnormalities were found. This test was conducted by Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Associates. It included the use of nasopharyngeal leads and induced sleep and is the most sensitive test for this disease that is available. The conclusion of the examining physician was: "This EEG, which includes nasopharyngeal leads, is normal with the patient awake and asleep."

TLE, however, is an elusive disease, and I have continued to have myself tested for it.

I undertook another test series beginning on March 14, 1988. An EEG (without nasopharyngeal leads but with sleep), a CAT scan of my brain, and an MRI (a supersensitive brain scan) were performed by a different facility (New York University Hospital) from the one that did the TLE exam. They were evaluated by a different neurologist. Either the MRI (Magnetic Resonance Imaging) or the CAT (Computer Axial Tomography) scan would have located epileptic areas in the brain of an adult with longstanding (two years or more) disease. No such areas were observed.

There was an interesting finding from the MRI scan. This is a new type of brain scan, providing a far more detailed image than the CAT scan. It works by placing the brain in a high-intensity magnetic field and allowing a computer to generate patterns from protons emitted by affected molecules in the tissue being examined. The image that it provides is remarkably fine, showing even very small details.

The findings were described by the examining physician as follows: "The ventricles and sulci are normal. There are no masses, shifts or displacements. Occasional punctate foci of high signal intensity are located in the cerebral white matter of the frontal lobes bilaterally as well as the left temporo-parietal region." The neurologist explained to me that these extra structures were so-called "unknown bright objects" that are occasionally seen with this test in normal brains.

Such objects are associated with multiple sclerosis, trauma, microvascular disease, and, very rarely, healed scars from an unusual parasitic disease. I do not have MS and have never had any episodes of weakness or any other symptom that would suggest this disease. Even if I did have it, it does not cause hallucinations; nor do any of the other diseases that might be associated with unknown bright objects found in the brain areas where they were located in me. I have never had any trauma to the head worth mentioning, certainly no parasitic disease, and, as the parts of the vascular system of my brain that were visible were in exceptionally good shape, microvascular disease is unlikely.

I do recall, as I reported in Communion, a number of occasions when needles appeared to be inserted into my head by the visitors. One such intrusion took place on December 26, 1985, behind my right ear, and another in March 1986, up my left nostril. Are the unknown objects in my brain an outcome of such intrusions? There is presently no way to determine this, but if a test sensitive enough to reveal them in even greater detail is ever devised, I will certainly take it. In the meantime, I have no intention of attempting to have them excised, nor can I imagine that any reputable neurosurgeon would perform such an operation, given that the objects are of no neurologic consequence and similar structures have occasionally been observed in other normal brains.

However, I do think it would be most interesting if other people who recall similar intrusions to the cranium taking place during visitor experiences also undertake the MRI. It is an easy test. Unlike the CAT scan, it does not require the infusion of iodine into the blood, and it does not introduce radiation into the brain. Should a substantial number of such people display similar objects in their brains, it would be suggestive that the recalled intrusions could be leaving a physical trace that we can now detect.

I have also taken a number of psychological tests. Among these was the MMPI, a standard test designed to detect personality abnormalities. I have also taken the Bender Gestalt test, the WAIS-R adult intelligence test, the House-Tree-

Person test, the Rorschach test, the Thematic Apperception test, and the Human Figure Drawing test. When I took this test group on March 7, 1986, I appeared to the testing psychologist to be “under a good deal of stress,” and to suffer from “fatigue” and “inner turmoil.” The overall finding was that I suffered from a great deal of fear, which was consistent with my state at that time. The tests were taken during the time when I was most terrified of the visitors.

I have also been interviewed at great length by a number of psychiatrists and neurologists, and none of them has ever discovered the least sign that I am anything except what I appear to be: a normally integrated man of above-average intelligence, with highly developed verbal skills.

At the moment that is the status of my case.

Should any psychophysical condition be discovered to have caused my experiences, I will certainly make it known. I have not the least intention of creating or in any way supporting a false unknown. Indeed, I would be the first to suggest that any and all of our present interpretations of the visitor experience may be wrong.

Most of the physicians involved in my case have requested confidentiality. I will not release their names. What I have done instead is to turn over all of their findings to Dr. John Gliedman, and I have given them all permission to discuss my case fully with him. While also respecting their confidentiality, he has agreed to correspond with licensed medical and mental-health professionals and concerned scientists about my case. We will not respond to “investigators” without scientific, medical, or mental-health credentials, or to “debunkers” intent on twisting the facts to serve their own emotional needs, and not to get at the truth.

I do believe, and strongly, that behind all the strange experiences and perceptions, behind the lights in the sky and the beings in the bedroom, there lies a very important, valuable, and genuine unknown. My hope is that we will eventually face the fact that it is there, and begin a calm, objective, and intellectually sound effort to understand it.

APPENDIX TWO

Truth

In Communion I reported the results of a lie-detector test performed on me before publishing the book. I passed this test. I have always tried to tell the truth about my perceptions. Even Philip J. Klass, a vociferous and skeptical UFO researcher, has written me a letter permitting me to state publicly that he doesn't think I am lying. On December 17, 1987, he wrote me, "I believe that Whitley Strieber honestly believes he experienced the weird encounters described in his book Communion and that he is not knowingly, intentionally falsifying same." He added that he thought a "prosaic" explanation would be found for my encounters and has asserted elsewhere that he believes me to be a temporal lobe epileptic. In view of the fact that no evidence of this disease—or any other intrusive abnormality—has been found, even with extensive testing, that is a theory that is now very hard to maintain.

On May 18, 1987 I was given another lie-detector test. It was administered by Polygraph Security Services of London at the request of the British Broadcasting Corporation, and paid for by the BBC. I also passed this test. Among the questions asked were:

Are the visitors about whom you write in your book Communion a physical reality?

Whilst in the presence of your visitors, have you actually felt them touch you?

I answered these questions in the affirmative and was found to be telling the truth.

I was also asked if I had invented them for personal gain. My denial was evaluated as true.

I was retested at my own request for Transformation. The polygraphist (Nat Laurendi, who originally tested me for Communion) was extremely skeptical, but I once again passed the test. It is worth noting that on questions where I was directed to lie, my blood pressure and rate of sweating increased, allowing the tester to determine easily that I had lied. The fact that these two automatic functions were what changed when I lied suggests that I am not a person who could defeat a lie-detector test easily, if at all.

Among the questions asked in this test were the following:

Do you honestly believe that Transformation is a true account of your encounters with the visitors between April 1986 and March 1988?

Are the witnesses named and unnamed in the book real people?

Do you honestly believe that the visitors are physically real?

Have you encountered the visitors at least four times while totally and fully conscious?

I answered yes to all these questions, and my answers were evaluated as true.

I have now been tested three times by polygraph experts, and asked direct, plain questions.

It must be concluded that I am neither insane nor a liar. There is truth in my strange story. Indeed, it may be that its very strangeness is its strongest proof.

On March 31, 1988, Bruce Lee of William Morrow and Company was also polygraphed by Mr. Laurendi. He was asked if he thought the two beings he saw in the bookstore were visitors, and if he spoke to them. He replied "yes" to both questions and his answers were evaluated to be true. He was asked if I had offered him anything of value to tell his story. He answered "no" and this answer was evaluated as true.

APPENDIX THREE

Gaelic

One of the most interesting and unusual findings in Transformation is Leonard Keane's discovery that the star language spoken by Betty Andreasson Luca when she was under hypnosis might have been Gaelic. This is especially remarkable as Mrs. Luca is the daughter of a French immigrant and a native New Englander. Mrs. Luca's experience is reported in detail in Raymond Fowler's excellent book on the subject, The Andreasson Affair. This book stands as a classic account of visitor experience, and is especially noteworthy for its candid revelation of the stunning mystical and religious overtones of Mrs. Luca's experience.

After reading Mr. Keane's translation of her Gaelic words, Mrs. Luca wrote me as follows: "I must tell you when I read the first two lines of Mr. Keane's translation, uncontrollable tears washed down my face for at least five minutes. . . . Finally someone is bringing out the truth of the messages."

With Mr. Keane's permission, I record here his glossary of the "star language." All phonetic renderings are taken from The Andreasson Affair and were created by Mr. Fowler. I have listened to the original tapes and found that he did a careful and accurate job of transcription.

Star Language	Gaelic Equivalent	English Translation
oh-tookurah	ua-tuaisceartach	descendants of Northern peoples
bohututahmaw	beo t-utamail	living groping

Star Language	Gaelic Equivalent	English Translation
hulah	uile	all
duh	dubh	darkness
duwa	dubhach	mournful
maher	mathair	mother
Duh	Dubh	Dark
okaht	ocaid	occasion
turaht	tuartha	forebode
nuwrlahah	nuair lagachar	when weakness
tutrah	t-uachtarach	in high places
aw hoe-hoe	athbheoite	revives
marikoto	maireachtala- costas	cost of living tutrah	t-uachtarach	high
etrah	eatramh	interval
meeohtutrah	meancog t-uach- tarach	mistakes in high places
etro	eatramh	interval
indra ukreeahlah	indeacrachlach	fit for distressing

The translation therefore reads:

“The living descendants of the Northern peoples are groping in universal darkness. Their (My) mother mourns. A dark occasion forebodes when weakness in high places will revive a high cost of living; an interval of mistakes in high places; an interval fit for distressing events.”

Afterword

There is a great question about why the visitors are suddenly emerging in what may be something like their true form. I think that I have a partial answer. I would like to direct the reader's attention to the fact that I predicted in Communion that the ozone layer is in serious trouble, but that it would get better just before getting far, far worse. Its decline could also cause a more rapid than anticipated increase in the greenhouse effect, leading to the major disruptions discussed earlier in this book.

When I made the prediction that the decline in the ozone layer would lessen before getting worse, all of the scientific evidence pointed to a steady deterioration. In March 1988 it was discovered that the sun was becoming much more active than anticipated for the beginning of a solar maximum, or cycle of increased solar activity. On March 16, 1988 The New York Times reported that the decline in the ozone shield was worse than anticipated, but that "a cyclical increase in solar radiation, which stimulates the production of ozone in the atmosphere" is going to offset ozone losses for a time. The intensity of the increase was completely unanticipated.

I wish to remind my readers that I knew nothing of this effect—or of the unexpected intensity of the present solar cycle—two years ago when I was writing Communion. I wish to repeat that the warnings I have received about the decline of our atmosphere are absolutely urgent and must be acted upon with the greatest vigor even though the ozone layer will appear to improve over the next few years. The survival of mankind is very certainly at issue, and the emergence of the visitors appears to me to be in part a supportive response to our desperate plight.

But a response from whom? From where?

The visitors appear to be extraterrestrials, and this may be what they are. But we know that their appearance depends more on the understanding of reality through which a given culture perceives them than on any objective insight into their true nature. With this in mind, it seems to me almost inevitable that we would, at this point in our technological and cultural development, see them as space-faring aliens.

What has happened to me has been so terribly strange and yet so intelligently conceived that it does suggest the operation of a nonhuman intelligence. It has also been incredibly useful, and I suspect that we can all gain a great deal from the visitors once we bring our side of the relationship into focus.

But we cannot focus ourselves on fear. For this reason I have withdrawn from contact with UFO researchers who have no professional credentials and seem to mix fear and ignorance in equal amounts. Many of these people are hypnotizing distraught human beings, in effect operating as untrained and unlicensed counselors and therapists, and innocently imposing their own beliefs on their victims.

I feel strongly that the people who report visitor experience should have access to mental-health professionals who approach the issue with an open mind and are aware that many normal, well integrated people confront the visitors, and that they can be helped without the use of drugs or other aggressive therapies.

I feel that the present fad of hypnotizing "abductees," which is being engaged in by untrained investigators, will inevitably lead to suffering, breakdown, and possibly even suicide. These investigators usually make the devastating error of assuming that they understand this immense mystery.

They apply nineteenth-century scientific materialism and mechanistic thinking to a problem that actually stretches the limits of the most sophisticated modern thought. These untrained, often poorly educated and unskilled people are spreading a plague of confusion and fear.

Many of them feel, as Budd Hopkins has written, that the visitors are—at least at present—“immensely destructive.”

I cannot agree with this. Certainly it is clear that our response to an encounter is often one of fear and terror. Our perceptions are distorted by panic at the high level of strangeness we observe.

But it is premature to assume that our experiences are actually negative in content. Primitive people, on taking their first airplane rides, have often been frightened almost into a catatonic state. Many African and Native American people once felt that cameras were stealing their souls, and considered having their picture taken a personal disaster from which they would never recover.

Mr. Hopkins, again expressing the views of a segment of the UFO community, has also written that the “UFO occupants” have either failed to grasp the negative psychological impact of “abduction,” or—if they have grasped it—are an “amoral race” interested only in fulfilling its own “scientific needs.”

These sentiments proceed from the assumption that the “UFO occupants” are approaching us with technological means and scientific aims similar enough to our own to at least be somewhat comprehensible to us.

I wish to make it crystal clear that I do not support this view. To me, the beings appear to be physically real, at least at times, and that is as far as it goes.

I do not think that we have even begun to comprehend the visitors. I suspect that we are a lot farther from understanding them than we are from understanding, say, the songs of the whales. And despite years of study, we know as yet almost nothing about those complex and remarkable productions.

To approach any meaningful answers to such questions as why the visitor experience is often so hard and what it ultimately means is going to take a substantial effort by better minds, quite frankly, than those that cluster in flying-saucer study groups.

Good scientists and laymen in the UFO field do effective and highly professional work. But researchers are proceeding from rigid and simplistic assumptions. If this work is to succeed, it must begin with the most powerful tool that we have: an open, inquiring, and educated mind, free from prejudices and preconceptions, and, above all, free from fear.

Persons wishing to communicate with the author should direct their correspondence to:

Whitley Strieber
188
496 LaGuardia Place
New York, N.Y. 10012

Scientists and medical professionals desiring to correspond with Dr. John Gliedman should write to him care of the author.

(continued from front flap)

emerged from the unknown as the single most powerful instrument of change in history?

Transformation is a journey from the secret depths of the mind to the secret depths of the universe, a story of fear and courage and the final, triumphant breakthrough that may lead at last to real understanding. Communion was only the beginning.

Photograph copyright © 1988 by Timothy Greenfield-Sanders

Whitley Strieber is the author of Communion: A True Story, and such novels as The Wolfen, The Hunger, and the award-winning children's book Wolf of Shadows. He is co-author of the best-selling Warday and of Nature's End. Mr. Strieber was born and raised in Texas and has made his home in New York for the past twenty years.

Jacket illustration copyright © 1988 by Ted Jacobs

Jacket design by Cheryl Asherman

We will discover truths about ourselves, truths that will change each of us — and all of us — forever.

—WHATLEY SIMMONS