HERMOGENES

HERMOGENES

HERMOGENES (1), a teacher of heretical doctrine towards the close of the 2nd century, the chief error ascribed to him being the doctrine that God had formed the world, not out of nothing, but out of previously existing uncreated matter. Tertullian wrote two tracts in answer to him, one of which is lost; but the other is extant, and is our chief source of information about Hermogenes. The minuteness with which his arguments are considered and answered indicates that Tertullian is replying to a published work of Hermogenes, and to all appearance that work was written in Latin. Another piece of doctrine of Hermogenes had been preserved by Clement of Alexandria (Eclog. ex Script. Proph. 56, p. 1002), which being unlike anything told of him by Tertullian, had been supposed by Mosheim (de Rebus Christ. ante Const. p. 435), to have emanated from some different Hermogenes. But this suspicion has been set at rest by the since recovered treatise on heresies by Hippolytus, who combines in his account of Hermogenes (viii. 17, p. 273), the doctrines attributed to him by Clement and by Tertullian. It is likely enough that Clement and Hippolytus drew from a common source, namely, the work "against the heresy of Hermogenes," which we are told by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 24) was written by Theophilus of Antioch. This work of Theophilus is mentioned also by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 19), and from it he probably also drew the account which he gives of Hermogenes in the passage referred to, in which he clearly employs some authority different from the tenth book, or summary, of Hippolytus, of which he makes large use elsewhere. Theodoret adds that Hermogenes was also answered by Origen, on which the supposition arises that he may intend under this name to refer to the summary which we now ascribe to Hippolytus; but there is an absence of evidence that Theodoret regarded this work as Origen's, see Volkmar (Hippolytus und die römischen Zeitgenossen, p. 54),* so that we must suppose some lost work of Origen's is intended. The passages cited make up our list of primary authorities about Hermogenes, if we add some statements of Philastrius, which we shall discuss afterwards.

A considerable distance of time and place separates the notices of Hermogenes by Theophilus and Tertullian. Theophilus survived the accession of Commodus in 180, but probably not more than a couple of years; in fact, his death is placed by Eusebius in his Chronicle under the reign of Marcus Aurelius. We cannot then well assign a later date than 180 to the teaching of Hermogenes, which drew forth an answer from Theophilus; and it may have been earlier. We may probably infer that Hermogenes had disciples at Antioch, and therefore must have been teaching either there or at no great distance; and we may be certain that any writing of his which was answered by Theophilus must have been written in Greek. Tertullian's tract against Hermogenes is assigned by Uhlhorn (Fundamenta Chron. Tert. p. 60) to the year 206 or 207. In this tract Hermogenes is spoken of as still living (ad hodiernum homo in saeculo); he is also coupled with one Nigidius in the work on Prescription, c. 30, as among the heretics "who still walk perverting the ways of God." There are indications that the work to which Tertullian replies was written in Latin; and we have every reason to think that Hermogenes (though probably, as his name indicates, of Greek descent), was at the time living in Carthage, for in the controversy Tertullian assails his private character, entering into details in a way which would not be intelligible unless both were inhabitants of the same city. The same inference may be drawn from the frequency of Tertullian's references to Hermogenes in works of which his errors are not the subject (de Monog. 16; de Praescrip. 30, 33; adv. Valent. 16; de Animâ, 1, 11, 21, 22, 24), for we are led to think that it was proximity which gave this heretic an importance in his eyes greater than his general celebrity warranted. Tertullian describes him as a turbulent man, who took loquacity for eloquence, and impudence for firmness. But two things in particular are shocking to his then Montanist principles, that Hermogenes was a painter, and that he had married more than once. Neander and others have contended that we are not to infer from such phrases as "pingit illicite," that Tertullian condemned the painter's art as altogether unlawful, provided it were not employed in the service of idolatry, and have supposed that the offence of Hermogenes in his eyes was that he painted mythological subjects. But there is no trace of this limitation in the treatise itself, which shews all through a dislike of the pictorial art, and it appears to us that Tertullian considered that the representation of the human form was forbidden by the second commandment. But it is probably not of much practical difference how we decide the question, for art not having been at the time enlisted in the service of the Christian church, a painter's customers would be almost exclusively heathen, and their tastes would regulate his choice of subjects. As for the charge of frequent marriages, if Hermogenes, who must in 207 have been advanced in life, was then married to a third wife, it would be occasion enough, to a writer so fond of rhetorical exaggeration as Tertullian, to describe him as one who had formed a practice of marrying (nubit assiduè), or who had "married more women than he had painted." Tertullian's language would lead us to think that Hermogenes had not only remarried, but had endeavoured to prove from Scripture that a second marriage was not unlawful.

To speak now more particularly of the doctrines of Hermogenes, the language of Hippolytus might lead us to suppose that he denied the physical possibility of creation from nothing; but in the representation of Tertullian no stress is laid on the philosophic maxim, "Nihil ex nihilo," and the eternal existence of matter seems to be assumed only in order to account for the origin of evil. The argument of Hermogenes was, either God made the world out of His own substance, or out of nothing, or out of previously existing matter. The first or emanation hypothesis is to be rejected, since He who is indivisible and immutable could not separate Himself into parts, or make Himself other than He had ever been. The second supposition is disproved by the existence of evil, for if God had made all things out of nothing unrestrained by any condition, His work would have been all good and perfect like Himself. It remains, therefore, that God must have formed the world out of previously existent matter, through the fault of which all the evil of which we have experience is to be accounted for. Further, God must have been always God and Lord, therefore there must always have existed something of which he was God and Lord. To this last argument Tertullian replies that God was always God but not always Lord, and appeals to the commencement of Genesis, where the title God is given to the Creator from the first, but the title Lord not till after the creation of man. Concerning Tertullian's assertion on this occasion that God was not always Father, see Bull, Def. Fid. Nic. iii. 10. From the assertion of Hermogenes that God was always Lord of matter, Neander infers that he must have held that God was always exercising His lordship; consequently that he denied any creation in time, but held that God had been from eternity operating in a formative manner on matter. Tertullian does not appear to have drawn this consequence, and (c. 44) assumes it as a point undisputed between him and his opponent that there had been some definite epoch of creation. But the account of Hippolytus shews Neander to have been in the right. With regard to the general argument, Tertullian shews that the hypothesis of the eternity of matter relieves none of the difficulties of reconciling the existence of evil with the attributes of God. If God exercised lordship over matter, why did He not clear it of evil before He employed it in the work of creation? If He could not do that, why did He employ in His work that which He knew to be evil? It would really, he says, be more honourable to God to make Him the free and voluntary author of evil than to make him the slave of matter, compelled to use it in His work, though knowing it to be evil. He contends that the hypothesis of Hermogenes amounts to Ditheism, for that though he does not give to matter the name of that God, he ascribes to it God's essential attribute of eternity. He asks on this hypothesis what just claim of lordship could God have over matter which was as eternal as Himself; nay, which might claim to be the superior of the two; for matter could do without God, but God, it would seem, could not carry out His work without coming to matter for assistance. In the discussion every word in the Mosaic account of creation receives minute examination, and there is a good deal of strained verbal interpretation on both sides. But it is plain that the authority and, to all appearance, the canon of Scripture were subjects on which both the disputants were agreed. Nay, Tertullian counts the Scripture so exclusive a ground of authority that its mere silence is decisive in his favour, and since it makes no mention of pre-existent matter, he holds that those who assert its existence incur the woe denounced against those who add to that which is written.

Though the word "materialist" is first heard of in this controversy, the views of Hermogenes were very unlike those which in modern times go by that name, and it may be doubted whether our word matter exactly corresponds to the hyle of Hermogenes. The latter word seems to have included the ideas of shapelessness and disorderly motion, so that though in our modern language all the sensible world may be described as material, it was not so in the language of this discussion. That which became κόσμος ceased to be hyle, and, in fact, Tertullian does not admit the existence of matter in the sense of Hermogenes. Hermogenes held matter to be infinite, and refuses to apply to it any predicate. It is without form, and the difficulty of conceiving any quiescent object without attributing to it some outline, is got over by describing matter as in a perpetual state of turbulent restless motion, like water boiling in a pot. It need not be called good, else it would not have needed the Deity to fashion it, nor bad, else would not have been capable of being reduced to order. It is not to be called corporeal, because motion, which is one of its essential attributes is incorporeal, nor incorporeal because out of bodies are made. Hermogenes repudiated t stoic notion that God pervades matter, or is in it like honey in a honeycomb; his idea was that the Deity, without intermixing with matter, operated on it by His mere approach and by shewing Himself, just as beauty affects the mind by the mere sight of it (an illustration very appropriate for a painter to use), or as a magnet causes motion without any actual contact and merely on being brought near. By this approach part of matter was reduced to order, and became the κόσμος, but part always remains unsubdued; and this it is to be supposed was in the theory of Hermogenes the source of evil.

Tertullian acutely remarks that this language about God's drawing near to matter as well as the use of the words above and below with reference to the relative position of God and matter cannot be reconciled with the doctrine of Hermogenes as to the infinity of matter.

The lost tract of Tertullian against Hermogenes discussed the origin of the soul, which Hermogenes ascribed to matter, Tertullian to the breath of life inspired by God at the formation of man (Gen. ii. 7). Tertullian accuses his opponent of mistranslation of this passage in substituting the word Spirit for breath, his supposed object in substituting the higher word apparently being to exclude the possibility of interpreting this part of the verse with reference to the communication of the soul, since the Divine Spirit could not be supposed capable of falling into sin. This passage gives one of the indications that the tract to which Tertullian replies was written in Latin; and it is not surprising if Hermogenes, as a Greek by birth, did not use the current Latin translation of the Bible, but rendered for himself.

We have said that Tertullian has not mentioned an opinion of Hermogenes recorded by Clement, Hippolytus, and Theodoret. This is that our Lord on His ascension left His body in the sun, and Himself ascended to the Father, a doctrine which he derived or confirmed from the words of the 19th Psalm, "He hath placed his tabernacle in the sun." Theodoret adds that Hermogenes taught that the devil and the demons would be resolved into hyle. This last doctrine agrees very well with the doctrine that the soul derived its origin from matter. With regard to the former, it is a common point of Gnostic doctrine that our Lord's nature was after the Passion resolved into its elements, and that only the purely spiritual part ascended to the Father. But on no other point does Hermogenes approach to Gnostic teaching; in his theory of creation, he recognises neither emanation from God nor anything intervening between God and matter; his general doctrine was confessedly orthodox, and it would seem that he had no wish to separate from the church, and that he did not consider himself as transgressing the limits of Christian philosophic speculation.

It remains to notice Philaster's confused account of Hermogenes. It would not cause much difficulty that (Hæc. 53) he counts the Hermogenians but as a school of Sabellians, called after Hermogenes in the same way as the Praxeani after Praxeas. Though the silence of Tertullian gives us every reason to believe that Hermogenes himself was orthodox on this point, his followers may very possibly have allied themselves with those of Praxeas against their common opponent. But in the next section Philaster tells of Galatian heretics, Selencus and Hermias, and attributes to them the very doctrines of Hermogenes that matter was co-eternal with God, that man's soul was from matter, and that our Lord deposited His body in the sun in accordance with the words of the Psalm already quoted. It is beyond all probability that such a combination of doctrines could have been taught independently by two heretics, and it is not very likely that Hermogenes had disciples in Galatia; we may therefore reasonably believe that Philaster's Hermias is Hermogenes. Philaster however attributes to his heretics other doctrines which we have no reason to think were held by Hermogenes: that evil proceeded sometimes from God, sometimes from matter; that there was no visible Paradise; that water baptism was not to be used, seeing that souls had been formed from wind and fire, and that the Baptist had said that Christ should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire; that angels, not Christ, had created men's souls; that this world was the only "infernum," and that the only resurrection is that resurrection of the human race which daily takes place in the procreation of children. Philaster may have read tracts which have not come down to us, in which Tertullian made mention of Hermogenes, and possibly if we had the lost tract De Paradiso it might throw light on Philaster's statements. But we are safe in rejecting his account as untrustworthy, even though it be not possible for us now to trace the origin of his confusion.

The tract against Hermogenes has been analysed by writers on Tertullian; e.g. Neander, Antignosticus, p. 448, Bohn's translation; Kaye, Tertullian, p. 532; Hauck, Tertullian, p. 240. The reader may also consult the articles on Hermogenes in Tillemont, iii. and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. i. 576. [G. S.]

HERMOGENES (2), ST. In the Mart. Hieronym. May 3, mention is made of Hermogenes of Liminata, which should be probably emended to Anineta in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, of which see he is accounted the first bishop. (Gams, Series Episc. 444; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 709.) He is conjecturally identified with the person mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. i. 15). [L. D.]

HERMOGENES (3)—Dec. 10. Martyr at Alexandria under Maximin with Menas and Eupaphus. (Bas. Men.; Mart. Molani.) [G. T. S.]

HERMOGENES (4), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, predecessor of Dianius. The one act by which he is known to us is his ordination of Eustathius of Sebaste (after deposition by Eulalius), on his production of a confession of faith so strictly orthodox as to set at rest all previous suspicions. His death must be placed before A.D. 341. (Basil. Ep. 244 [82], § 9; 263 [74], § 3; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 371.) [E. V.]

HERMOGENES (5), a Novatian bishop who assisted at the episcopal consecration of the presbyter Sabbatius at Constantinople, causing a division in that sect between 391 and 407 on the paschal question. Hermogenes had been previously denounced by Sabbatius himself on account of his blasphemous writings. (Socr. H. E. vii. 12.) [SABBATIUS.] [G. T. S.]

HERMOGENES (6), apparently one of several deacons of Macedonia in the year 414. (Innoc. Pap. ep. 17, in Patr. Lat. xx. 526.) [C. H.]

HERMOGENES (7), bishop of Rhinocorura (Farma), on the frontier of Egypt and Palestine. He took part in the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, vi. 874), where he sided with Cyril's party, and was subsequently sent to Rome to gain over pope Coelestinus. He did not, however, arrive until the death of Coelestinus, but his successor Xystus mentions the envoy in his epistle to Cyril (Patrol. Lat. l. 583). Isidore of Pelusium addressed several epistles to Hermogenes. (Patrol. Graec. lxxviii. lib. i. 419, et seq.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 542.) [J. de S.]

HERMOGENES (8), bishop of Cassandria (the ancient Potidaea) in Macedonia, present at the "Latrocinium Ephesinum," A.D. 449; he also attended the council of Chalcedon. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 77; Mansi, vi. 847, 930.) [L. D.]

HERMOGENES (9)—April 17. Martyr at Antioch with a deacon named Peter, probably the same as Hermes martyr at Salona, noted on April 18 in Wright's Syr. Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 426. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMOGENES (10)—April 19. Martyr with Gaius, Expeditus, Aristonicus, and Rufus at Melitene in Armenia, probably the same as Hermogenes, martyr with Elpidius at the same place and commemorated on May 3 in Wright's Syr. Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 426. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMOGENES (11)—April 25. Martyr at Syracuse with Evodius. (Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMOGENES (12), martyr with Donatus and twenty-two others; commemorated on Dec. 12. (Usuard.) [C. H.]

HERMOGENES (13), eleventh bishop of Agrigentum, cir. 800, the next known subsequently to GEORGIUS (22), commemorated on Nov. 24. After him the succession in this see was interrupted by the Saracen conquest. (Pirro, Sic. Sac. i. 695; Cajetan, Vit. SS. Sic. ii. 32.) [C. H.]

HERMOGENIANUS (1), placed by the Sammarthani fifth bishop of Limoges, between Atticus and Adelphius, cir. 210-247, and imagined by some to have been reckoned as metropolitan of Aquitaine before the honour was, by a new division of Gaul, transferred to Bourges. (Gall. Christ. ii. 501.) [C. H.]

HERMOGENIANUS (2), a friend of St. Augustine, concerning whose treatise contra Academicos he expressed a judgment which Augustine considered too favourable. Augustine wrote to ask his further opinion about some passages in the third part of the same treatise. (Ang. Ep. i. [H. W. P.]

HERMOGENIANUS (3), praetorian prefect. [EUGENIUS (46).]

HERMOGRATES (Mart. Usuard. July 27), martyr. [HERMIPPUS.] [G. T. S.]

HERMOLAUS (1) (Harmolaus, Mart. Rom. Vet.)—July 26, Bas. Men.; July 27, Usuard. Martyr at Nicomedia under Maximin. He converted St. Pantaleon. [HERMIPPUS.] (Acta SS. Boll. Jul. vi. 427-429; Mart. Adon., Wandalbert.) [G. T. S.]

HERMOLAUS (2), bishop of Attyda in Phrygia Pacatiana. He signed the protest against opening the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, before the arrival of John of Antioch, but joined the council when it was opened. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 825; Mansi, v. 768, 589.) [L. D.]

HERMOLAUS (3), bishop of Carpasia in the island of Cyprus; Olympius of Constantia added his name to the subscription to the definition of the faith read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. By Carteriopolis here Le Quien believes Carpasia is intended. (Mansi, vii. 165 n.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1068.) [L. D.]

HERMON (1), bishop of Jerusalem; succeeding Zabdus, or Zebadiah, 302, and succeeded by Macarius A.D. 311 (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32; Epiphanius, Haer. lxxi. § 20). The Greek Menaea commemorate him on March 7, and state that he sent out bishops to preach the Gospel among the heathen, especially in Tauric Scythia (the Crimea). The chronicle of Eusebius does not make Macarius's episcopate begin till A.D. 313, but it is much confused at this period. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. iii. 154.) [E. V.]

HERMON (2), bishop of Bubastus (Basta), in the province of Augustamnica Secunda. He lived c. A.D. 340, as we infer from a mention of his name in a letter of Ammonius addressed to Theophilus of Alexandria (§ 23), which is to be found in the AA. SS. 14 Mai. iii. 356. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 561.) [J. de S.]

HERMOPHILUS (1), apparently a heretic of the school of ARTEMON, mentioned in company with Theodotus, Asclepiades, and Apollonides of Apollonius in a writing against the Artemonites, composed at the beginning of the 3rd century, of which fragments are preserved by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28), and which is said by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. ii. 5) to have been entitled The Little Labyrinth [HIPPOLYTUS, p. 98]. The writer's object is to shew that what professed to be the "corrected" copies of the Scriptures in use by these several heretics did not agree together. [G. S.]

HERMOPHILUS (2), bishop of Diocaesarea in Isauria, on the river Calycadnus. He signed the synodical letter of the Isaurian province to the emperor Leo, in reference to the murder of Proterius, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 774; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1022.) [J. de S.]

HERMYLUS—Jan. 13. Martyr with Stratonicus at Belgrade (Singidunum) under Licinius. They were drowned in the Danube. (Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i. 769.) [G. T. S.]

HERNANUS, HERNIANUS. [ERNAN (8).]

HERNEUS, abbat of Le Mans. [ERNEUS.]

HERNICIUS (ERNICIUS), a disciple of St. Patrick, when he was at Kill-garadh, co. Galway. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 136, c. 50, 177 n. 99) there is mention of three brothers, Bernicius, Hibernicius, Ernicius; they were Franks, and received places of retirement from St. Patrick, but the only place named is Baslick, co. Roscommon. Tirechan (Annotations in the Book of Armagh) calls the three Inaeptus, Bernicius, and HERNICIUS. (Petrie, Round Towers, 165-6.) [J. G.]

HERO (1) (HEROS, "Ἡρώων, "Ἡρώς), successor of St. Ignatius as third bishop of Antioch. Neale calls him "friend and deacon" of Ignatius. He is said to have occupied the see twenty years, A.D. 116-136. He is stated to have closed his course by martyrdom (Euseb. H. E. iii. 36, ad fin., iv. 20). He was commemorated on Oct. 17 (Mart. Usuard., Adon.). One of the spurious Ignatian Epistles is addressed to him. A supposititious address of Hero to Ignatius is given from a Vatican MS. by Baronius (ad ann. 110, § 7). [E. V.]

HERO (2) ("Ἡρώων. HEROS, Usuard.)—June 28, disciple in the school of Origen; the fourth of that school who suffered martyrdom for the faith. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 4; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker.) [G. T. S.]

HERO (4) ("Ἡρώων), bishop of Diospolis (Thebae or Hou), in Thebais Secunda, c. 362. He publicly apostatized at Antioch, probably during the visit paid by the emperor Julian to that city, and, as it is said, without any compulsion. Not long afterwards he was reduced to great poverty, and being equally despised by heathen and Christian, he died miserably and in the streets. (Philostorg. H. E. vii. 13; Theophanes, Chron. s. a. 355, Migne, Patr. Gr. cviii. 162; Chron. Pasch. s. a. 363, Migne, u. s. xcii. 745.) This cannot have been the Hero [HERO (7)] mentioned by Jerome (cf. Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 611). [T. W. D.]

HERO (5), a native of Alexandria and monk of Tabenne in Egypt, under St. Theodorus. He died on Easter Eve, A.D. 367, and Theodorus, while soothing his last moments, foretold his own death, which followed shortly afterwards. (Vit. Pachomii, cap. xii. § 94 in Acta SS. Boll. 14 Mai. iii. 333 a.) [I. G. S.]

HERO (6) ("Ἡρώων), a philosopher, on whom Gregory Nazianzen composed an eulogistic discourse (Orat. 23 al. 25). He is supposed to be the same with the cynic Maximus. [MAXIMUS.] [E. V.]

HERO (7), bishop of Lemnadius, in Egypt, mentioned in the paschal letter (§ 26) of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, for the year 402, as having died, and been succeeded by Naseas. The letter was translated by Jerome, and forms his ep. 98, ed. Vall. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 639.)

[W. H. F.]

HERO (8), bishop of Thennesus in Egypt, to the north of Tanis. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where he protested against the condemnation of Dioscorus. (Mansi, vi. 572; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 549.) [J. de S.]

HERODES (1). (Euseb. E. H. iv. 15.) [POLYCARPUS.]

HERODES (2), proconsul of Africa, to whom application was made for the expulsion of the Donatist bishops who had consecrated Maximian. This took place in pursuance of the decree of the council of Bagaia, A.D. 394, and before the expiration of that year. Herodes appears to have pronounced sentence against the Maximianists, but it appears also that it was not immediately or formally carried out. (Aug. En. in Ps. lvii. 15; c. Cresc. iii. 56-62; iv. 4, 5, Tillemont; 69, vol. vi. 170, 171.) [FELICIANUS (4).]

A question has been raised as to the identity of Herodes with Seranus, whose sentence against the Maximianists is on record (Aug. c. Cresc. iv. 48, 58, vol. vi. p. 570). But this seems to be unlikely, for the following reasons: (a) Augustine says that the case was brought before three or four proconsuls, of whom he names the first and the last, viz. Herodes and Theodorus. (b) This being the case, it is unlikely that in the same treatise, though not in the same part of it, and in a formal description of what took place, he should call the same person by two different names, which are never used in conjunction with each other. (c) The first application was directed chiefly against Felicianus and Praetextatus, but that of Seranus against Salvius of Membresa. (d) In his account of these last proceedings Augustine insinuates that the proconsul was influenced either by partiality or by respect for the council of Bagaia, but no suggestion of this kind appears in reference to Herodes (Tillemont, vi. note 38, p. 725).

HERODIANUS, apparently one of the deacons of Macedonia addressed by Innocent, A.D. 414. (Dionys. Exig. Collect. Decr. num. 50; Innoc. Pap. ep. 17 in Patr. Lat. xx. 526.)

[C. H.]

HERODION, reputed to have been one of the seventy disciples and bishop of Novae Patrae (Patras). He was murdered in a riot of the heathen at the instigation of the Jews. (Bas. Menol.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 123.) He was commemorated March 28 and April 8. (Boll. Acta SS. 8 Ap. i. 741.) [G. T. S.]

HERON; see generally HERO. For Heron II. of Antioch see EROS.

HERONIUS, a friend at Lyons to whom Sidonius Apollinaris wrote from Rome, giving an account of his journey and illness. (Sidon. Apoll. i. 5, Epp. i. 5, 9. Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 452, 462.) [S. A. B.]

HEROS. [HERO (2), EROS.]

HEROS (1) ("Ἡρώς), reputed first bishop of Hierapolis, originally a pagan of Hierapolis, who received Philip the apostle into his house when the people threatened to stone him, and being converted was consecrated by Philip bishop of Hierapolis. (Nicetas Paphlago, Oratio ix., on St. Philip, in Patr. Gr. cv. 192; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 833.) [L. D.]

HEROS (2) (EROS), metropolitan of Arles. If we may credit the Chronicle ascribed to Dexter, he was bishop of Derthosa, Dertosa, Tortosa, in Spain. (Dext. Chron. s. a. 400, n. Biviar.) It is not improbable that Heros allied himself with the cause of the rebel Constantine during its brief triumph in Spain, and that when the revolt of Gerontius took place he was compelled to flee into Gaul. He was certainly intruded into Arles ("plebe cleroque contradicente"), and it would appear by Constantine, who may have appointed him to the see as a reward for his loyalty in Spain. (Zosim. Ep. Aurel. et Univ. Ep. per Afric. Migne, Patrol. xx. 649, 654; Mansi, iv. 353, A.D. 417; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. Rom. 27.) Lazarus bishop of Aix and his friend Heros were both denounced by Zosimus as "unknown men, and aliens who had obtained their sees in Gaul by unworthy means" (Ep. Aurel. Mansi, iv. 350). During the siege which Constantine sustained at Arles, A.D. 411, Heros ordained him to the presbyterate; but if this was designed for his protection in the event of capture, it proved of no avail, as he was put to death shortly after his surrender (Sozomen, H. E. ix. 15). The year following, A.D. 412, Heros was driven out from Arles by the people of the city, and Patroclus, a friend of Constantius, by whom Constantine had been defeated, was elected to the vacant see (Prosper. Chron. s. a.; Gallia Christ. i. 578). Heros fled to Palestine in company with his friend Lazarus, who had also resigned the see of Aix. There they both took a leading part in opposition to Pelagius. A libellus of theirs accusing him of heresy was presented to the council of Diospolis, Dec. 415. (Garnier, Diss. ii. ad. pt. i. Marii Merc. in Migne, Patrol. xlviii. 327; Augustine, de Gest. Palaest. 1, 2, 5, 12, 23, 29, 30, 43, 58, 62; Photius, cod. liv. He calls Heros Néropos.) Neither of them was present on that occasion, however: they excused themselves on the plea that one of them was ill (Garnier, u. s.; Aug. u. s.). For this they were afterwards severely reprimanded by Zosimus (Ep. Sept. 21, u. s.). They also sent letters about Pelagius to the African bishops by Orosius, which were read at the councils of Carthage and Milevis, A.D. 416 (Garnier, Diss. u. s. 331, 333). When Zosimus bishop of Rome wrote his second letter to the African bishops on the subject of Pelagianism (u. s.), the libellus which Heros and Lazarus had presented at Diospolis had also been forwarded to Rome from Palestine, and it is noticed by him accordingly (u. s.). In Oct. A.D. 417, another council in the matter of Pelagius was held at Antioch, and Heros and Lazarus also presented a libellus against him and his followers to that assembly. (Mar. Mercator, Commonitor. iii. 5 in Migne, Patrol. xlviii. 100; Garnier, Diss. u. s. 344.) Nothing is known of either Heros or Lazarus after this.

There is great discrepancy between the character assigned to Heros by Prosper, who speaks of him as "vir sanctus et beati Martini discipulus" (Chron. s. a. 412), and that which is assigned to him by Zosimus, who calls him "Tyranus, patronus caedis" (Sept. 21, u. s.). Cardinal Noris explains this by the supposition that Prosper was so ardent a supporter of the party which still adhered to Heros after his expulsion that he was blind to his ill-deserts, while Zosimus, who was well informed as to the real character of the intruder, espoused the cause of Patroclus. (Noris, Corrig. et Add. ad Hist. Pelag. Opera. iv. 743; Zosimus, Ep. Univ. Episc. per Gall. March 22, 417; Mansi, iv. 359; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 27.)

Mabillon tells us that he had seen an ancient Arlate diptych with the name "Erotis Episcopi," but without the + prefixed to it. In the diptych the name is the fifteenth in the succession of bishops of the see. (Vet. Analect. 220; Hist. Litt. de France, ii. 147.) [T. W. D.]

HEROTES, the bearer of a message to St. Augustine from Honoratus, a Donatist (Aug. Ep. 49). [HONORATUS (7).] [H. W. P.]

HERRED, a Mercian priest, who attests the act of bishop Deneberht of Worcester, by which he grants land for life to a priest named Balthun, between 798 and 822 (Kemble, C. D. 181). [S.]

HERTGENOBERTUS, twenty-first bishop of Limoges between Rusticens and Caesarius, in the latter half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. ii. 505.) [S. A. B.]

HERUMBERTUS (HERCUMBERTUS, HERIMBERTUS, ERKANBERTUS), ST., first bishop of Minden in Westphalia. If this see was founded in 780, as the verses and certain chronicles quoted by the Bollandists assert, it could only have been as an outlying mission, since the progress of Charles the Great's campaigns against the Saxons could not have admitted of a more permanent establishment at that time (cf. Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 446). The chronology which places Herumbert's life in the early years of the 9th century is more credible (803-813). Little is known of him, but we learn from the Traditiones et Antiquitates Fuldenses, edited by Dronke, that he had a sister named Burscuint (c. iv. No. 9, p. 16), and possibly another called Lutburc, a nun (c. xli. p. 96), and that he was possessed of considerable wealth, as his gifts to the monastery of Fulda comprised 253 slaves, twenty-three farms, and 170 hides of land (p. 96). He is said to have sprung from a noble Saxon family, and to have been educated at Würzburg, where he was ordained priest. He is commemorated July 9, and was succeeded in the see by Hadowart. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 727-8; Gams, Series Episc. 294; Rettberg, ii. 446-7; Eckhart, Francon. Orient. i. 782-3; ii. 25.) [S. A. B.]

HERUS, al. IEC. HEROS (Hieron. Chron. ann. Chr. 143), bishop of Antioch. [EROS.] [C. H.]

HERVAEUS (HUVARNUS), ST., abbat in Brittany in the 6th century. He was the son of Huvarnion, an accomplished and pious noble, who, after visiting king Childebert on his accession in A.D. 515, stayed four years at court, and then, returning to Brittany, married Rivanone, a maiden assigned to him for a wife in a dream.

Their son Hervaëus was born blind, and Huvanion died soon afterwards, leaving the boy to the guardianship of his mother, by whom he was carefully educated. He shewed extraordinary ability, and notwithstanding his blindness surpassed all his fellows in learning. Desirous of a monastic life, he stayed seven years with the monk Martinianus, learning the necessary rules and services, and then passed under the care of his uncle, St. Vulphroëdus. Upon the death of this uncle and of his mother he became the first abbat of a monastery which he built upon some land given him by Clovignonus of the town of Launedrec in Cornubia Gallica. There are extant many legends of his good works and miracles.

On his death, in extreme old age, he was buried in a stone sarcophagus in his oratory, over which was erected the church of Land Houarne. He is commemorated on June 17. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 366, Life written by Albertus Magnus.) [I. G. S.]

HERVAEUS (HARIFEUS, HERMES), thirty-sixth archbishop of Besançon, succeeding Aurulcus or Anilcus, and followed by St. Gedeon, in the latter half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xv. 19.) [S. A. B.]

HESECHIUS, HESICHIUS. [HESYCHIUS.]

HESIODUS (1), imaginary bishop of Corinth, according to "Praedestinatus" (i. 49) a man who is said to have raised the dead, who was the first adversary of the Arians, and in answer to whose prayers the death of Arius took place. [G. S.]

HESIODUS (2), enumerated by "Praedestinatus" in his title and also Haer. 83, with Epiphanius, Polycrates, and Africanus as a writer in Greek against heresies. There is no reason to believe in his existence. [G. S.]

HESPERIUS, martyr. [EXUPERIUS.]

HESPERIUS (1), martyr at Antioch with Glycerius and Sosistratus; commemorated on June 8. They are described in Wright's Syrian Martyrology as of "the number of the ancients" (Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 427). [G. T. S.]

HESPERIUS (2), bishop of Pitane, in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, present at the council of Chalcedon, 451. In the sixth session he was employed by Stephen bishop of Ephesus to subscribe the names of the suffragans of Ephesus who were absent. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 705.) [L. D.]

HESPERIUS (3), correspondent of Sidonius Apollinaris, addressed in the tenth letter of his second book of Epistles. He appears to have been devoted to literature, and had asked Sidonius to send him any verse he had written since their parting. The Hesperius eulogised in the twenty-second letter of the fourth book to Leo, is no doubt the same. He is there spoken of as "vir magnificus, gemma amicorum litterarumque." St. Ruricius also corresponded with him. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 486, 526; Ruricius, Epist. 3, 4, 5, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 70-73; Ceillier, Hist. gén. des Auteurs sacrés, x. 384; Hist. Litt. de la France, ii. 656-658.) [S. A. B.]

HESPERIUS (4) (SPERIUS, SPERUS), twenty-third bishop of Metz, succeeding Agatimber, and followed by St. Villicus, said to have been consecrated A.D. 525. He was present at the council of Clermont in 535, and subscribed the letter addressed by the assembled bishops to king Theodebert. He is said to have died Aug. 23, A.D. 542, after an episcopate of seventeen years. He was buried in the church of St. Clement, at Metz. (Mansi, viii. 863-4; Gall. Christ. xiii. 687.) [S. A. B.]

HESPERUS—May 2. He and his wife Zoe were slaves of one Catulus, by whom they were put to death at Attalia in Pamphylia for refusing to partake of a heathen banquet. They suffered under Hadrian. There was a church consecrated to St. Zoe at Constantinople. (Bas. Men.; Procop. i. i. c. 3; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. i. 178.) [G. T. S.]

HESYCHAS, hermit. [HESYCHIUS (19).]

HESYCHASTAE (Ἠσυχασταί). Solitaries, who retired to the desert, and there spent their lives in quiet meditation and worship (Nil. Epp. lib. iv. epp. 17, 54, in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxix. 558, 575; Theod. Studit. Orat. xi. § 44 in Migne, u. s. xcix. 847). The emperor Justinian granted them especial exemptions (Norell. V. iii. 2, A.D. 535). [T. W. D.]

HESYCHIUS (1) (ISICIUS), one of the seven apostolic men sent to Spain from Rome by the apostles, according to ancient Spanish tradition. He is supposed to have been bishop of Carcesa (? Cazoria). (Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 193.) [CAECILIUS (4).] [M. A. W.]

HESYCHIUS (2), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, placed in the episcopal lists of that see next to Symphorianus, and in the time of Hadrian. It is uncertain whether there was but one bishop of the name at this time or an Hesychius II. following Hesychius I. There was a later Hesychius (No. 6) of some importance. (Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. i. 545.) [J. de S.]

HESYCHIUS (3) (HESECHIUS), bishop of an Egyptian see, is mentioned as the author, with Phileas, Theodorus, and Pachumius, of a letter to Meletius, schismatic bishop of Lycopolis in Egypt. The letter is given in a Latin version in Gallandius, Bibl. Patrum, iv. 67, and was written about A.D. 296. It is a remonstrance to Meletius on the irregular ordinations which he held in other dioceses, and was written at the time the authors were in prison, and in the lifetime of Peter of Alexandria. The martyrdom of Hesychius under Galerius, with Phileas, Pachumius, and Theodorus, is recorded in Eus. Hist. Eccl. viii. 13. The martyr Hesychius has been ordinarily identified with the reviser of the text of the Septuagint, and of the New Testament, or at least of the Gospels, which obtained extensive currency in Egypt. Though there is nothing to prove it there are no grounds for questioning the truth of this identification. This Hesychian recension is mentioned more than once by Jerome, who states that it was generally accepted in Egypt, as that of his fellow-martyr, Lucian of Antioch, was in Asia Minor and the East, "Alexandria et Aegyptus in LXX suis Hesychium laudat auctorem; Constantinopolis usque Antiochiam Luciani exemplaria probat." (Hieron. Praef. in Paralipom. ad Chromat. Ep. 107. The same words occur in the Apologia II. adv. Rufin. vol. i. p. 763, Paris, 1609.) Jerome also refers to this recension as "exemplaria Alexandrina" (in Esai. lviii. 11). We know little or nothing more of Hesychius's edition of the LXX. It was doubtless an attempt, like that of Lucian, which is more often mentioned, to purify the text of the LXX in use in the churches of Egypt, by the collation of various manuscripts, and by recourse to other means of assistance at hand. Jerome speaks with some degree of contempt of his labours in the field of Old Testament recension, and still more of his and Lucian's recension of the Gospels. If we are to interpret his words strictly, Hesychius, as well as Lucian, added so much to the text as to lay them open to the charge of falsifying the Gospels and rendering their work "apocryphal." He writes: "Praetermitto eos codices quos, a Luciano et Hesychio nuncupatos, paucorum hominum asserit perversa contentio, quibus nec in Veteri Testamento post LXX interpretes emendare quod licuit, nec in novo profuit emendasse, cum multarum gentium linguis Scriptura antea translata doceat falsa esse quae addita sunt" (Hieron. Praef. in Evang. ad Damasum). The words of the famous Decretal of Gelasius (c. A.D. 500) "On ecclesiastical books," which are, however, regarded by Credner (Zur Gesch. d. K. p. 216) as additions to the original decree "made at the time it was republished in Spain under the name of Hormisdas, c. A.D. 700-800" (Westcott, Hist. of Can. p. 448, note 1) are equally condemnatory. "Evangelia quae falsavit Lucianus—Apocrypha," "Evangelia quae falsavit Isicius (Hesychius)—Apocrypha" (Labbe, Concil. iv. 126). Dr. Westcott pronounces the speculations of Hug as to the influence of this recension, "of which nothing is certainly known," "as quite unsatisfactory" (ibid.). Bleek states that "before Hug, Semler, and after him Eichhorn, attribute both to Hesychius and Lucian, and their editions of the sacred text a far more weighty part in the criticism of the New Testament than they deserve (Bleek, Introd. to New Test. vol. ii. p. 382, Clark's trans. 12), (Hody, de Biblior. Text. Orig. p. 303; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 547, ed. Harles, lib. v. c. 1, § 12; cf. also lib. iii. c. 13, § 14, lib. iv. c. 35). Fabricius is inclined to identify this Hesychius with the author of the celebrated Greek lexicon (Bibl. Graec. lib. iv. c. 35, § 4, 5). This, however, is very unlikely. The lexicographer has been shewn, by the investigations of Alberti and Welcker (Rhein. Mus. pp. 269 ff. 411 ff.), to have been almost certainly a pagan living towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian era. The Christian glosses and references to Christian writers are now regarded as interpolations by a later hand. [E. V.]

who attended the council of Nicaea in 325, viz., of—Alexandria minor (Alexandretta, Scandaret, Iskenderun) in Cilicia. (Mansi, ii. 694; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 903.) He also attended the dedication council at Antioch, in 341. (Mansi, ii. 1308.)

Amastris (Sesamus), in Paphlagonia (Mansi, ii. 694; Le Quien, i. 561), other readings of the bishop's name being Eutyichius, Eupsychius, Euphronius.

Isauria, chorepiscopus in. (Mansi, ii. 696.) Neapolis in Pisidia. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, i. 1047.)

Prusa in Bithynia. (Mansi, ii. 696; not in Le Quien, i. 615.) [L. D.]

HESYCHIUS (5), the name of two bishops at the council of Constantinople in 381, viz. of— Comana in Pamphylia (Mansi, iii. 570), which Le Quien (i. 1009) seems to read Cotena.

Epiphania in Cilicia (Mansi, iii. 569; Le Quien, ii. 897). [J. de S.]

HESYCHIUS (6), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, not, as has been supposed, an African bishop. He succeeded John IV. in 405 and died cir. 429 (Farlati, Illyr. Sac. ii. 64-90). A letter to him from St. Chrysostom is extant, thanking him for his sympathy, and requesting him to use his best exertions on behalf of the afflicted Eastern church, A.D. 406 (Chrys. Ep. 183, vol. vii. p. 848, ed. Gaume). Hesychius was strongly opposed to excessive rapidity in conferring the several degrees of the ministry, and wrote on this subject to pope Zosimus, who warmly supported his view, A.D. 418 (Zosimus, Ep. i. ap. Labbe, Conc. ii. 1556; Ceillier, vii. 536). He also wrote to St. Augustine to ask his opinion about the true interpretation of Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks. This letter, which was sent by a presbyter named Cornutus or Coronatus, is not extant, but its purport may be gathered from the reply of Augustine, which he sent by the same messenger. In this he refers Hesychius to the explanation given by St. Jerome, of which he sends a transcript, and reminds him of our Lord's express denial of any exact knowledge as to the day of His own coming, apart from that which is reserved to Himself by the Eternal Father (Matt. xxiv. 36). Any notion about permission to form a general idea of the time, provided the particular one be excluded, is overthrown by our Lord's words χρόνους ἢ καιρούς, Acts i. 7, which exclude both general and also particular definitions. One sign of its approach is undoubtedly definite, viz. the universal extension of the Gospel (Matt. xxiv. 14), which however is very far from fulfilment, even to the most sanguine expectation. These remarks, says Augustine, have been drawn forth by an expression of opinion on the part of a presbyter already condemned by Jerome as a rash one, viz. that the prophecy of Daniel was still unfulfilled. The presbyter here mentioned appears to have been Apollinaris of Laodicea (Hieron. in Dan. ix. Opp. vol. v. p. 548 (689); Aug. Ep. 197).

To this letter Hesychius replies, agreeing with Augustine as to the general terms of our Lord's description, viz. that no one can know the day or hour of His coming, but he nevertheless thinks (1) that the apostles must not be cited as authorities, for they were witnesses not of these times and seasons, but of the Lord's death and resurrection; (2) that the general signs of the coming must be and are intelligible; (3) that the criticism of Augustine as to the phrase, χρόνους και καιρούς, is met by the LXX version of Dan. vii. 2, χρόνους και καιρούς, which must mean a definite time;* (4) that though the special period, whose days will be shortened for the elect's sake (Matt. xxiv. 27), is doubtless concealed from human knowledge, yet the general one may be inferred from outward signs, of which many have been described by our Lord, some fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem, and some seem to be manifested at this very time;<sup>b</sup> (5) The sign of universal evangelization appears to be met by such passages as Rom. x. 18; Col. i. 5, 6, and by the fact of the great extension of the Gospel since the profession of Christianity by the Roman emperors. He concludes with an expression of diffidence as to the value of his own opinion in the face of such interpreters as Jerome, but confesses himself unable to understand how his interpretation that the weeks are concluded with the Passion of our Lord can agree with that part of the prophecy which speaks of the cessation not only of the "sacrifice and oblation," i.e. the Jewish worship "in the midst of the week, but also of the desolation caused by the "abomination of desolation," which our Lord distinctly foretold as a sign to come hereafter<sup>c</sup> (Dan. ix. 27; Matt. xxiv. 15).

To this letter Augustine replies at great length in one which he mentions in the treatise De Civitate Dei, as expressing his mature conviction on the subject, under the title of "de fine sæculi" (Aug. Civ. D. xx. 4).

In speaking of the evident signs of the coming Hesychius had quoted 2 Thess. ii. 5, 8, but had not condescended to explain the meaning of that obscure passage any more than the apostle himself had done, nor how the prophecy of Dan. vii. 13, which he had also quoted, bears upon the question. Bearing in mind St. Paul's words (2 Thess. ii. 2), the true attitude of expectation is one of careful vigilance. But Hesychius had said that though the precise day and hour cannot be known, yet that the time may be conjectured within certain limits. If so, he would be glad if Hesychius would point them out. True, that the "last days" of the apostles may be at hand, though St. Peter spoke of them as being so just after the Ascension (Acts ii. 1-17). But what are the limits? have they any reference to the 1000 years of Rev. xx. 2, 4? It is now many years since St. John spoke of the "last time" (1 John ii. 18), so many indeed that reckoning one day as = 1000 years, some think he meant 500 years. But all this is mere conjecture, founded on no trustworthy evidence.

To conclude, Augustine says there is a mistake in thinking that we know more than we have liberty to know. Putting aside the case of the evil servant who refused to prepare for his master's return, we may take three cases: (1) that of one who thinks He will come soon; (2) that of one who thinks He will come late; (3) the case of one who, confessing his own ignorance, endeavours to be ready whenever He comes. All will agree in saying "watch and pray," but the state of the mind of 1 is attended by the danger of disappointment, a danger which does not touch the case of 2, and still less that of 3. Augustine confesses himself to belong to this last class, and requests Hesychius not to think meanly of him on that account, though he would be rejoiced to think that his friend's view is the true one, inasmuch as it involves a consummation earnestly to be desired by all good Christians.

Though St. Augustine's reasoning is sometimes obscure, his letters are interesting, both as specimens of his power in quiet and courteous, though unfavourable, criticism, not unmixed with gentle satire, and also as revealing the thoughts and ideas entertained at this period by Christians, and the view which some of them took of the passing events of the age, and their relation to the prophecies both of the Old and New Testament (Aug. Ep. 199). Some of the works which pass under the name of Hesychius of Jerusalem and are found only in Latin have been ascribed to the bishop of Salona. He has also been regarded as the translator of those works; but on no sufficient grounds, there being absolutely no evidence confirmatory of the supposition beyond a title added in some MSS by a blundering copyist. (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 396; Ceillier, Auteurs Eccl. tom. vii. p. 135; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. tom. vii. p. 552.) [H. W. P.]

HESYCHIUS (7), bishop of Parium on the Asiatic coast of the Propontis, one of the delegates sent to Asia to inquire into the criminal charge against Antoninus of Ephesus by the synod assembled at Constantinople by Chrysostom, A.D. 400. When the delegates arrived at Smyrna Hesychius, who was a friend of Antoninus, pretended sickness in order to avoid acting in the matter. (Palladius, Vit. Chrys. c. xiv.; Mansi, iii. 995.) He attended the oecumenical council of Ephesus thirty years later, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1124; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 787.)

HESYCHIUS (8), bishop of Castabala, in the province of Cilicia Secunda. He was censured in 431 by the council of Ephesus, in company with John of Antioch, John of Damascus, and other prelates for opposition to Cyril. (Baluze, Nova Collectio, p. 507.) The protest which he and other Nestorian bishops signed in favour of waiting for the arrival of John of Antioch is given in Baluze, p. 696. The letter which they subscribed and sent to the church of Hierapolis, exhorting their friends there to pay no attention to the decisions of the Cyrillian party at Ephesus, occurs in the same collection, p. 704. Another letter they wrote to John of Antioch and seven others of their number, who had returned home, assuring them of their fidelity, and begging them to bring matters to a crisis as winter was approaching (ibid. p. 724). With two other bishops, Hesychius joined Alexander of Hierapolis, and separated from the communion of John of Antioch. John wrote a letter to Hesychius and to the other bishops of the two Cilicias. Hesychius and his friends assembled to read it, and finding in it nothing but good, they restored their communion to John. The little council thereupon wrote a reply to John's letter, excusing themselves for their former action. Meletius of Mopsuestia, who had been unwilling to be present, was curious to know what happened at the council. Hesychius wrote him a note, with a copy of the council and letter to John. He begged him at the same time to act according to the principles which he had learnt from Theodore of Mopsuestia with regard to the duty of keeping the church whole without rents. (Baluze, Concil. Nov. Collect. p. 856; Ceillier, viii. 386.)

HESYCHIUS (9) (ISICHIUS), bishop of Tanagra in Boeotia, signed the synodal letter of the province of Corinth to the emperor Leo, concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 612.)

HESYCHIUS, bishop of Vienne. [ISICHIUS.]

HESYCHIUS (10), bishop of Salona, elected A.D. 515; died 527. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. ii. 154-158.)

[J. de S.]

HESYCHIUS (11) I. (ESITIUS, ISITIUS), 11th bishop of Grenoble, succeeding Siagrius, was present at the fourth council of Paris in 573, the first of Mâcon in 581, the third of Lyons in 583, that of Valence in 584, where he subscribed himself Isitius, and the second of Mâcon in 585, where his subscription is Esitius. He was one of the bishops who signed the rescript to the letter of Gundegesilus, archbishop of Bordeaux, with reference to the disturbances excited by Chrodieldis, at the monastery of the Holy Cross, at Poitiers. [CHRODIELDIS.] The date of his death is unknown, but he is conjectured to have been alive as late as 601. The next name in the list of the bishops of this see is that of Clarus, who was present at the council of Châlons held in 650, so that one or more names would seem to have been lost. (Mansi, ix. 868, 936, 943, 945, 958; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 41; Gall. Christ. xvi. 221.)

[S. A. B.]

HESYCHIUS (12) (ISACIUS), patriarch of Jerusalem, succeeding Amos A.D. 600 or 601. The only fact known of him is that on his succession he wrote to Gregory the Great announcing it. To this Gregory replied in a letter still extant, which affords a melancholy picture of the corrupt state of the church of Jerusalem, and generally in the East. Gregory commences by acknowledging the identity of their faith, and proceeds with an earnest exhortation to eradicate simony. He has heard that no one in the East attains a high place in the church except by bribes. He has been much pained by the reports of the strifes and dissensions in the church of Jerusalem. He begs Hesychius therefore quietly and gently to correct all he can, and to bear with calmness what he is unable to correct, and so to restore peace to Jerusalem. His death is placed by the Chron. Alexand. p. 874, ed. Rader, in the penultimate year of Phocas, A.D. 609. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. Ep. 46, lib. ix. Ep. 40; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. iii. p. 248; Ceillier, xi. 523.)

HESYCHIUS (13) II., fifteenth bishop of Grenoble, succeeding Boso and followed by Austrobertus, in the latter half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 222.)

[S. A. B.]

HESYCHIUS (14)—July 7. Martyr in reign of Trajan. He was drowned in the Adriatic by Agricolaus, a president. He suffered with two others, Saturnilus and Germanus. (Bas. Menol.)

[G. T. S.]

HESYCHIUS (15), (ESYCHIUS)—Nov. 18 Usuard., May 10 Bas. Men.; a palace official at Antioch, who refused to sacrifice, and was therefore drowned in the Orontes during the Diocletian persecution, probably about A.D. 297, when Diocletian was at Antioch and commanded all the officials to sacrifice. He may probably be identified with Hesychius martyr at Antioch, May 29, in Wright's Syrian Mart. (Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 427). [HABIBUS.] (Mart. Vet. Rom. Adon., Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

HESYCHIUS (16)—Nov. 7. Martyr with Hiero Nicander, and thirty others at Melitene in Armenia during the Diocletian persecution. (Bas. Menol.)

HESYCHIUS (17), martyr at Byzantium commemorated on May 19. (Wright's Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 427.)

[G. T. S.]

HESYCHIUS (18) (HESICHIUS, SUSOCIO), father of St. Simeon Stylites. At his death he left his property to be divided between his two sons, as Simeon had not yet become a monk. (Asseman. Mart. Or. et Oc. ii. 399; Ceillier, x. 581.)

[I. G. S.]

HESYCHIUS (19) (HESYCAS, SOZ. H. E. vi. 32), the most renowned of all the disciples of Hilarion, the celebrated solitary of Palestine, by whom he was regarded with extreme affection. He was included in the proscription obtained by the Pagans of Gaza against his master, and with him remained in concealment till Julian's death (Hieron. Vit. S. Hilarion, p. 249; Soz. H. E. iii. 14, v. 10). He was bound to his venerable master by strong ties of reverence and affection; "miro amore venerationi senis deditus erat" are Jerome's words, and he accompanied him on his various wanderings from Egypt to Sicily and Dalmatia, and finally, in A.D. 365, to Cyprus. On his return from Palestine in 366, whither he had been despatched by Hilarion to visit his brother anchorites, he succeeded in persuading the aged solitary to remain in that island, where he paid him frequent visits. He was not with him at his death. Hilarion bequeathed him all his wealth, i.e. his copy of the Gospels and his monk's attire. Hesychius, who was then in Palestine, on hearing of his decease, instantly returned to Cyprus, and taking up his abode in his master's cell, secretly disinterred the corpse, which he surreptitiously transported to Majuma, and thence to Hilarion's own monastery, where it was interred, and where Hesychius passed the rest of his days in high repute for his ascetic virtues (Hieron. u. s. pp. 247-252; Soz. H. E. iii. 14, vi. 32). He is commemorated as a saint by the church of Rome on Oct. 3. [E. V.]

HESYCHIUS (20), addressed by Basil, cir. 371, as an old acquaintance, united to him by a common love of letters and their ancient friendship with the admirable Terentius; but since Elpidius, a brother and valued friend of Basil, has spoken of the virtues of Hesychius, Basil invites Hesychius to his house that they may become more intimate (Basil. ep. 64, p. 157). In another letter (ep. 72, p. 166) Basil requests his assistance in appeasing the justly offended Callisthenes involved in a quarrel with Eustochius (Patr. Gr. xixii. 419, 439). [C. H.]

HESYCHIUS (21), a person evidently residing not very far from Cucusus, for whom Chrysostom felt an affection of very peculiar warmth, manifested in three letters from Cucusus, A.D. 404, in which he expresses his earnest desire to see, embrace, and kiss him, and if the dangers of the way, the fear of the Isaurian banditti, the season of the year, and his own weak health forbid this, he begs that he will afford him the pleasure of frequent letters. (Chrys. Epist. 24, 74, 176.) [E. V.]

HESYCHIUS (22), a friend to whom Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus in 404, expressing surprise at his long continued silence, and begging him to lay aside all diffidence, and feel perfect confidence in all letters from him being welcome. (Chrys. Epist. 198, 223.) [E. V.]

HESYCHIUS (23), a deacon who acted as clerk of the court at the council of Ephesus. (Labbe, iii. 635.) [E. V.]

HESYCHIUS (24), FLAVIUS, a senator of Philadelphia, a Quartodeciman, in 430, prevailed upon by Jacobus a Nestorian bishop to abjure his heresy and subscribe a symbolum. He also subscribed the symbolum for Rudius and Polychronius, who also had been Quartodecimans. [CHARISIUS (1).] [T. W. D.]

HESYCHIUS (25), presbyter of Jerusalem in the first half of the 5th century, a copious and learned writer, whose comments on Holy Scripture and other works gained considerable repute in their day. Hesychius was a common name, and considerable confusion exists as to the authorship of several of the treatises ascribed to him; a confusion which, from the absence of sufficient data and the various opinions of those who have investigated the subject, it is hopeless entirely to remove. It is possible that some of the works only existing in Latin under the name of Hesychius or one of its varieties—Esytius, Isysius, Isacius, &c.—were written by the bishop of Salona, the correspondent of Augustine (see No. 6), or, as Cave holds with less probability, translated into Latin by him. It is altogether a mistake to speak of Hesychius as bishop of Jerusalem. The only prelate of that name appearing in the catalogue of patriarchs is the correspondent of Gregory the Great (see No. 12). According to the Greek Menology, March 28, Hesychius was born and educated at Jerusalem, where "by meditating on the Scriptures he obtained a deep acquaintance with divine things." On arriving at man's estate he left his home and, devoting himself to a solitary life, plunged into the desert, where he "with bee-like industry gathered the flowers of virtue from the holy fathers there." He was ordained presbyter against his will by the patriarch of Jerusalem, and spent the rest of his life in the holy city, or the other sacred places. The statement of Trithemius (de Script. Eccles. No. lxxxii.) and Sixtus Senensis (Bibl. Sancta, lib. iv. 245) that he was a disciple of Gregory Nazianzen, who died A.D. 390, is manifestly improbable. A story is told by Moschus of his cutting out and burning two treatises of Nestorius, contained in a volume he had lent in ignorance of its contents to his brother solitary, Cyriacus abbat of Calamon, which had been revealed to the latter by vision (Prat. Spirit. c. xlvi.). Hesychius the presbyter is mentioned more than once by Theophanes. He first (p. 71) records his advancement, προβολή (ordination?), A.D. 412, where he speaks of him as "the presbyter of Jerusalem," and in the following year, A.D. 413, records his celebrity for theological learning (ἤνθει τὰς διδασκαλίας). We find him mentioned in the Life of St. Euthymius by Cyril of Scythopolis (Coteler. Ecl. Græc. Monum. tom. ii. p. 233, § 42), where he is spoken of as accompanying Juvenal, patriarch of Jerusalem, to the consecration of the church of the "Laura" of St. Euthymius, A.D. 428 or 429, and was received with much honour (τὸν βέλτορ) by the abbat. He is said by Allatius (Diatriba de Simeonibus, p. 100) to have filled the office of Chartophylax or Keeper of the Records of the church of the Anastasis at Jerusalem. The data given by Theophanes for fixing his death are, as Tillemont has shewn, at variance with one another, and it can only be placed approximately about A.D. 438. The fact that this chronicler should have recorded the birth and death of one who never rose above the rank of a simple presbyter is evidence of the celebrity he had attained in the church. This is also confirmed by the title ὁ Θεολόγος appended to his name in the Codex Regius (Combes, Bibl. Concionat. tom. i. p. 17). He is twice mentioned by Photius, who however shares to some extent in the confusion relating to the Hesychii, and assigns him no date. In Cod. 275 he quotes a rhetorical passage from a sermon on James the Lord's brother and David (θεοπάτωρ), evidently delivered at Jerusalem. He compares Bethlehem and Sion, to the great advantage of the latter, and in a manner very natural in a presbyter of Jerusalem, elevates the authority of St. James as superior to that of St. Peter in the council of Jerusalem—Πέτρος δημιουργεῖ ἀλλ' Ἰάκωβος νομοθετεῖ—and speaks of him as "the monthpiece of the Most High, from whose judgment there was no appeal." In another place (Cod. 269) he also quotes a panegyric on St. Andrew erroneously entitled "An Eucommium on St. Thomas."

The following is a catalogue of the numerous works attributed to this author. Of several of them all we can say is that they bear the name of Hesychius in one of its forms, but whether they are actually the composition of the presbyter of Jerusalem, or of some other writer having the same name, it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine. Tillemont feels no insuperable difficulty in assigning them all to the same author, but he confesses that fuller light might lead to a different conclusion.

(1) In Leviticum Libri VII. Explanationum Allegoricarum sive Commentarius, dedicated to the deacon Eutygianus. This is the most extensive work which has come down to us under the name of Hesychius. Unfortunately it exists only in a Latin translation. This is certainly ancient, but subsequent to the general reception of the Latin Vulgate, which is ordinarily quoted. The translator has dealt very freely with the work, adding and altering, and sometimes in his own person commenting upon the Greek and Latin renderings of the same passage. This has led to the erroneous conclusion that the original author was not a Greek but a Latin-speaking man. (See for examples Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 271.) As to the authorship, Cave says "quot homines tot sententiae." He is inclined to identify him with Hesychius, or more properly Isaacus, patriarch of Jerusalem, the correspondent of Gregory the Great. But Fabricius is certainly more correct in attributing the Commentary to Hesychius presbyter of Jerusalem, "Versus Latine ab interprete nescio quo" (Bibl. Graec. tom. vii. p. 550). Cave's notion that the translator was Hesychius of Salona is entirely wanting in foundation. The supposed reference to the heretical views of Eutyches, which has been thought to militate against Hesychius presbyter of Jerusalem being the author, would be more worthy of consideration if the date of Hesychius's death was certain, which is far from being the case. Besides Tillemont may probably be right in supposing that the tenets denounced were not those of Eutyches, but the nearly similar doctrines of Apollinarius and his followers. The Commentary is continuous from chap. 1 to the end of the book. Dupin, who strongly asserts a Latin origin, says that "the Commentary is clear and plain. The writer gives the literal sense of the passage; adding now and then some allegorical or moral reflections." The work has frequently been printed. The earliest editions are those of Basle, 1527, fol. and Paris, 1581, 8vo. It is to be found in the various Bibliothecae Patrum, as that of Lyons, tom. xii. p. 52, and the Vet. Patr. Bibl. of Galland, tom. xi.

(2) Commentaries on the Psalms. Harles and Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 549, speak of many portions of this work existing in manuscript, especially one in the University Library of Cambridge containing Ps. lxxvii.—cvii. The only portions printed are the Fragmenta in Psalmos, extracted from the Greek Catena in Psalmos, with a Latin translation by Balthazar Corderius. These are very sensible and useful, and lead us to wish for the publication of the whole.

(3) Συγρηθὸν sive κεφάλαια in XII. Prophetas et Esaiam, an epitome of the twelve Minor Prophets and of Isaiah, section by section.

(4) Fragments of Commentaries on Ezekiel, Daniel, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of James, 1 Peter and Jude.

(5) Difficultatum et Solutionum Collectio. A collection of sixty-one discrepant passages in the Gospel history, with their reconciliation. These are generally characterized by sound common sense and a reluctance to force passages into an unreal agreement.

(6) Eight Sermons, or Fragments of Sermons: (1) On the Nativity. (2) On the Hour of the Crucifixion. (3) On the Resurrection of Our Lord; falsely ascribed to Gregory Nyssen, and published among his works as the Second Homily on Easter. (4) On the Virgin Mary. (5) The same. (6) On the Hypapante or Presentation in the Temple (first printed by Mai in his Class. Auct. x. 577). (7) A Fragment on St. Andrew, erroneously entitled Encomium in Beatum Thomam. (8) A Fragment on James the Lord's Brother and David the Lord's Father (both these last are given by Photius, vide supra).

(7) Ἀντιρρητικά καὶ Εὐκτικά. Two Centuries of Moral Maxims on Temperance and Virtue and Instructions on Prayer, addressed to one Theodotus. Many of these are taken verbatim from the Ascetica of Marcus, which, according to Photius (Cod. 198), stood at the end of the Lives of the Saints contemporary with St. Anthony.

(8) The Martyrdom of Longinus the Centurion, which the author, who calls himself Hesychius, presbyter of Jerusalem, states he had extracted from a MS. in the Library of the Anastasis at Jerusalem. The author, according to Fabricius, was not the same who wrote the works previously enumerated, but belonged to a much later period.

(9) An Ecclesiastical History, of which a fragment is given in the acts of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 353, Collat. Quinta, condemnatory of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

HESYCHIUS (26), a presbyter of Constantinople, who, according to Photius, wrote a cumbersome work in four books, on the Brazen Serpent. Photius speaks very unfavourably of this book, which he describes as full of verbose rhetorical speeches put into the mouth of Moses and the Israelites, and even of the Deity Himself, but he allows that it is perfectly orthodox. The work has perished, and it is evident that our loss is not great. Photius gives no hint as to the date of this Hesychius. Fabricius is inclined to identify him with the presbyter of Constantinople mentioned by Philostorgius (H. E. vi. 1), who, when a complaint was laid before Eudoxius of the heretical teaching of Eunomius by the clergy and laity of Cyzicus, roused the popular feeling against him by the violence of his language. (Phot. Cod. 51; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 551; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 547; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. 417.)

HESYCHIUS (27) ILLUSTRIS, a copious historical and biographical writer early in the 6th century. He was the son of an advocate of the same name and his wife Sophia, and was born at Miletus. The distinctive name ("Illustris," Ἰλλούστριος) by which he is known, though sometimes erroneously regarded as a proper name, is no more than the official title conferred by Constantine the Great on the highest rank of state officers (the subordinate titles being Clarissimus and Spectabilis), such as prefects of the praetorians, prefects of the city, quaestors, and masters of the troops (Cod. Theod. vi. 6; see Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Infim. Graecit. sub voc.). Nothing whatever is known of Hesychius beyond the fact that he lived in the reigns of Anastasius, Justin, and Justinian, and that his literary labours were cut short by his grief at the premature death of a son named John. A question has been raised as to whether he was a Christian or not. Suidas doubts it on the somewhat precarious ground of his omitting all mention of ecclesiastical writers in his work on men of learning. But very substantial reasons have been produced on the other side by Cave (Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 518), and accepted by Fabricius. His chief work was a Universal History, divided into six books, called by Photius "sections" (τμήματα), but by the author himself "divisions" (διαστήματα), containing the history of the world in a synoptical form through a period of 1920 years, reaching from Belus, the reputed founder of the Assyrian empire, to the death of Anastasius I., A.D. 518. The divisions, according to Photius (Cod. 49), were as follows: (1) From Belus to the Trojan war; (2) from the fall of Troy to the foundation of Rome; (3) from the foundation of Rome to the first creation of consuls; (4) from the establishment of the consular power to the sole rule of Julius Caesar; (5) from Julius Caesar to the foundation of Constantinople; (6) from the foundation of Constantinople to the death of Anastasius, A.D. 518. Photius, who had read the work, passes a very favourable opinion upon the author, as concise and elegant in style, vivid and clear in language, painstaking in the construction of sentences, and careful in the selection of words; conferring a graphic power on his narrative by the appropriate use of figurative language, and, above all, strict in the investigation of truth. The whole of this historical synopsis has perished with the exception of the initial portion of the sixth book, which has been several times printed under the title of ἱστορία Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ("Constantinopolis Origines, or Antiquitates"). It was published by George Donsa, and ascribed to Georgius Codinus (Heidelberg, 1596), and subsequently by Meursius, under the name of its real author, appended to his de Viris Claris (Lugd. Bat. 1613). Hesychius's great historical work was followed by a supplement, recording the transactions of the reign of Justin, and of the early years of Justinian. This as the work of a contemporary, whose official position gave him the opportunity of obtaining accurate information, must have been of great historical value, and its loss is very much to be regretted. Hesychius was also the author of a series of biographical notices of learned men, περὶ τῶν ἐν παιδείᾳ λαμπάντων, or, according to Suidas, πῶς τῶν ἐν παιδείᾳ ὀνομαστῶν. This, which goes over very much the same ground as the work of Diogenes Laertius, has been supposed by some to be an epitome of the Vitae Philosophorum. A comparison of the two will shew that though Hesychius made copious use of the work of his predecessor, even extending to the adoption of the same words, the differences are too great to admit this idea. This work has been several times printed, first by Adrian Junius, with his own and Henry Stephen's notes (Paris, 1593), and subsequently by Meursius (Lugd. Bat. 1613). Without any sufficient grounds Hesychius Illustris has been identified with the lexicographer of Alexandria (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 518; Suidas, sub voc. Ἡσύχιος; Photius, Cod. 69; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. tom. vii. p. 544; Thorschmidius, de Hesychio Illustri, apud Orellium Hesychii Opera). [E. V.]

HETTO, bishop. [ETTO.]

HETTO (HATTO, HAIDO, HAITO, AHYTO, HEITO, OTHO), seventh bishop of Basle, born A.D. 763, was said to have belonged to the noble family of the counts of Sulgow. At five years of age he was placed in the monastery of Reichenau (Augia) to be educated. Here, when he grew up, he embraced the monastic life, and devoted himself especially to the monastery school, which under his care seems to have attained to a high state of efficiency. His fame came to the ears of Charles the Great, who, about A.D. 805, drew him "de carcere charo," and appointed him to the see of Basle, where he succeeded Waldo. In the following year he was also made abbat of Reichenau. In 811 he was one of the prelates who subscribed Charles's will. (Einhard, Vita Kar. Mag.; Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 463.) The same year he was sent with others on an embassy to Constantinople, to conclude a treaty of peace with the emperor Nicephorus, who, however, died not long after their arrival. His successor, Michael, ratified the negotiations which had been commenced. On the voyage he suffered shipwreck, but escaped safely with his company. The story of his discourteous reception by the emperor, and subsequent revenge upon the Eastern ambassadors sent to Charles's court is admitted to be fabulous (Monachi Sangall. Gesta Kar. ii. 6, Pertz, ii. 750). In 816 he built the church of St. Mary at Reichenau. In 822, or 823, a severe illness warned him to think of spending his remaining years in retirement and penitence. Accordingly he resigned his see and abbacy, and withdrew to his old monastery as a simple monk, placing himself under the government of Erlebaldu, as abbat, a former disciple. His successor at Basle was Udalricus. He died in 836. Walafrid, in his eulogium, characterised him as learned, generous, honourable, loving, just and sagacious.

Hetto was the author of several works. He wrote a Hodoeporicum, or history of his embassy to Constantinople (Hermann's Chronicon, an. 811, Bouquet, v. 366; Anon. Mellicensis, de Scriptor. Eccles. c. xliii., Migne, Patr. Lat. ccxiii. 974), but this has been lost, or, at any rate, has never been published. He also wrote a body of rules, or statuta, for the guidance of those having spiritual charge in his diocese. The work is divided into twenty-five little chapters, and throws an instructive light upon the practice and ceremonies of the German church (Migne, Patr. Lat. cv. 763, and again cv. 11). About 823 he wrote an account of the Vision of the monk of Reichenau, Wetinus, who three days before his death was taken in spirit to the other world, and in some respects curiously anticipated Dante (ibid. col. 771; Maill. Acta SS. O. S. B. iv. i. 265, Paris, 1668-1701). This vision made a great impression at the time (Hermannus Contractus, Chron. an. 824; Bouquet, vi. 225), and Hetto's narrative was afterwards versified by Walafridus Strabo (Patr. Lat. cxiv. 1063; Maill. ut supr. p. 272). For an account of Hetto's writings, see Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 95; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xii. 336, 337, and the Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 523.

There are also extant a letter of Theganus, the historian, to Hetto, in which he curiously addresses him as duke and consul, probably on account of his having been employed as imperial ambassador (Martene et Durand, Ampliss. Collectio, i. 84), and a mutilated remnant of a letter from Frotharius, bishop of Toul (Bouquet, vi. 398; Patr. Lat. cvi. 882). A charter of Louis the Pious in his favour as abbat of Reichenau has also survived (Patr. Lat. cv. 767). For his history, in addition to the references above given, see the Annales in Pertz, Scriptores, i. 49, 68, 198, 355, ii. 38; Bouquet, v. 356, vi. 224, 225; Walafridus Strabo, Migne, Patr. HEUNNA, the wife of the comes Aldfrid, said to have been cured by St. Cuthbert of a disease when she seemed to be at the point of death. She lived in a district called Henitis. "Count Aldfrid" is probably Aldfrith, who was afterwards king of Northumbria, and died in A.D. 705. (Vita Anonym. S. Cuth., ed. Stevenson, p. 276.) [J. R.]

HEUTERIUS, first bishop of Lectoure, "in the time of St. Hyginus," who may possibly have been the pope of that name in the middle of the 2nd century. (Gall. Christ. i. 1073; Gams, Ser. Episc. 561.) [R. T. S.]

HEVIN, HEVNIN. [HYWYN.]

HEWALD, the name of two missionary priests, of English birth, who having spent some years in pious study in Ireland, went to preach to the old Saxons of Germany, about the year 690. They were called the Black Hewald and the White Hewald, the former being the more learned, but both of equal sanctity. On their arrival in the country of their destination they made their way to the house of a local magistrate (villicus=tungerefa), and obtained from him a promise to introduce them to the "satrapa" or "ealdorman" of the tribe. The country people, in dread of innovation, before they obtained this introduction, seized and murdered them; the Black Hewald was tortured and torn in pieces, the White Hewald dispatched with the sword. The bodies were thrown into the Rhine. The day of their death was recorded as Oct. 3. The provincial ruler avenged their death by destroying the village. A miraculous light attended their bodies; they were carried, against the stream, up the Rhine as far as the place where the headquarters of the mission had been fixed. Their arrival was made known in a dream to Tilmou, one of their companions, and he buried them; but Pipin, then duke of Austrasia, had them translated to Cologne. A spring broke forth at the place where they suffered, which, according to the Gallican martyrology, was in Westphalia. (Bede, H. E. v. 10; Alcuin, de Pontiff. Ebor. ap. Gale, pp. 721, 722; Opp. ed. Froben, ii. 252, 253; A.A. SS. Boll. Oct. ii. 205-207; and on the locality of the martyrdom see v. Steinen, Westfal. Gesch. pt. 12, p. 736.) [S.]

HEWNIN, HEWYN. [HYWYN.]

HEXAPLA, THE (τὰ ἑξαπλᾶ, τὸ ἑξαπλοῦν, τὸ ἑξασέλιδον), or sixfold Bible of Origen, consisted in the main of six columns, severally containing the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, the same in Greek characters, and the four Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the LXX, and Theodotus. It contained also in parts a fifth and a sixth, or even a seventh, Greek version of unknown authorship, and with reference to those parts which contained the fifth and sixth versions it went by the name of the Octapla. The Tetrapla was a separate work, consisting of the four versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the LXX, and Theodotus. See Epiphanius (de Mens. et Pond. § 19), and compare the statement of Jerome in his commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to Titus (iii. 9, vol. vii. 734, 735),* where he affirms that he had seen the original Hexapla at Caesarea: "Unde et nobis curae fuit omnes veteris legis libros, quos vir doctus Adamantius in Hexapla digesserat, de Caesariensi bibliotheca descriptos ex ipsis authenticis emendare; in quibus et ipsa Hebraea propriis sunt characteribus verba descripta et Graecis literis tramite expressa vicino; Aquila etiam et Symmachus, LXX quoque et Theodotus, suum ordinem tenent. Nonnulli vero libri, et maxime hi qui apud Hebraeos versus compositi sunt, tres alias editiones additas habent, quam Quintam et Sextam et Septimam translationem vocant, auctoritatem sine nominibus interpretum consecutas." It has indeed been maintained that the Hexapla was so called from its containing six versions, and this is thought to be proved by the following important passage of Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 16), where, having spoken of the six versions, he concludes:—"Ἐν γὰρ μὴν τοῖς ἑξαπλοῖς τῶν ψαλμῶν μετὰ τὰς ἐπισήμους τέσσαρας ἐκδόσεις οὐ μόνον πέμπτην ἀλλὰ καὶ ἕκτην καὶ ἑβδόμην παραβέβηκε ἑρμηνείαν ἐπὶ μιᾷ αὐτῆς σεσημειώται ὡς ἐν Ἱερειχοῦ εὐρημένης ἐν πίθῳ, κατὰ τοὺς χρόνους Ἀντωνίνου τοῦ υἱοῦ Σεβηροῦ. Ταῦτα δὲ ἀπάντας ἐπὶ ταῦτον συναγαγὼν διεκλῶν τε πρὸς κῶλον καὶ ἀντιπαραβέβηκε ἀλλήλαις μετὰ καὶ αὐτῆς τῆς Ἑβραίων σημεῖωσης τὰ τῶν λεγομένων Ἑξαπλῶν ἡμῖν ἀντίγραφα καταέλειπεν ἰδίως τὴν Ἀκύλου καὶ Συμμάχου καὶ Θεοδοτίωνος ἐκδοσιν ἅμα τῇ τῶν ἑβδομηκόντα ἐν τοῖς τετραπλοῖς ἘΠΙΚΑΤΑΣΚΕΤΑΣΑΣ. But the term Hexapla may very well have been used somewhat laxly to denote the complete work, the columns after the sixth being regarded as additamenta. The Tetrapla, as we may infer from the above expression ἐπι-κατασκευασίας, was a later work of Origen, formed by excerpting the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth columns from the Hexapla. We proceed to give some account of the contents and composition of the Hexapla, referring the reader for fuller information to the recent Oxford edition of its extant fragments,<sup>b</sup> in the Prolegomena to which the various questions relating thereto are very completely discussed.

1. THE HEBREW TEXT.—The text of the Old Testament as it stood in the first and second columns of the Hexapla, in Hebrew and Greek characters respectively, was followed by the versions which most closely adhered to it, viz. those of Aquila and Symmachus, the Septuagint and the cognate version of Theodotion came next in order, and the anonymous incomplete versions were naturally placed last. Epiphanius corrects the error of some who inferred from this arrangement that the versions of Aquila and Symmachus were older than the LXX, the position of which in the Hexapla he accounts for upon the principle in medio veritas, thus:—“Ἄλλ' Ὀριγένης πυθόμενος τὴν τῶν ἐβδομηκονταδύο ἔκδοσιν ἀκριβῆ εἶναι μέσσην ταύτην συνέθηκεν, ὥπως τὰς ἐντεῦθεν καὶ ἐντεῦθεν ἔργμυελας διελέγχη” (De Mens. et Pond. § 19); nevertheless he has himself fallen into the error of supposing Symmachus to have preceded Theodotion—the true chronological order, after the LXX, being Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus. The character of Origen's Hebrew text may be presumed, from the extant fragments of the versions which accompanied it, and especially from those of Aquila and Symmachus, to have been in close agreement with the received Hebrew text of the present day, whatever may have been the condition of the text at the much earlier period at which the version of the LXX was made. Here and there indeed one or more of the later versions also contain renderings which, if strictly accurate, would imply a various reading in the original; but the evidence is seldom sufficient to make it probable that their text was really different from our own. The following examples will serve as illustrations. In Num. xxiv. 7, וירם מאנני מלכו, “And his king shall be higher than Agag,” the versions read not Ἀγάγ but Γάγ. The versions of Ps. cxviii. 119 suggest the reading השבת (στέμψυλα διελογίσω, κ.τ.λ.) for השבת. In 1 Kings ii. 5, Aquila's rendering συνετριβήσαν implies a reading נשברו, instead of נשברו. In ver. 18 of the same chapter בך נשור is rendered ἐπένδυμα ἐξαιρέτου (Aq.), ἐφόδ λινού (Sym.), ἐφόδ βάρ (Theod.), where the ἐξαιρέτου of Aquila stands for בך, implying a variation of the text, which is remarked upon by Jerome in his commentaries (Zach. xii. 10, vol. vi. 903):—“Et vestitus, inquit, erat Samuel EPHOD BAD, id est, indumento lineo; BAD enim linum appellatur, unde et BADDIM lina dicuntur. Pro quo Hebraico Latinoque sermone male quidam legunt EPHOD BAR; siquidem BAR aut filius appellatur, aut frumenti manipulus, aut electus, aut οὖλος, id est, crispus.” The same commentator, himself apparently reading תירא למען תירא, for תירא in Ps. cxxix. 4, remarks upon the passage, towards the end of his epistle Ad Sunniam et Fretelam

(vol. i. 674, 675): “Dicitis vos in Graeco invenisse, Propter nomen tuum; et nos confitemur plura exemplaria sic reperiri. Sed quia veritati studemus, quid in Hebraeo sit simpliciter debemus dicere. Pro nomine, sive lege, apud eos legitur THIRA, quod Aquila interpretatus est φόβον, timorem; Symmachus et Theodotus νόμον, id est, legem, putantes THORA, propter litterarum similitudinem Jod et Vau, quae tantum magnitudine distinguuntur. Quinta editio terrorem interpretata est, Sexta, verbum.” In Ps. lxxxix. 10, וַיִּי נִי בִי, Aquila seems to have read, στὶ διεπέλασεν ἀνήρ (וִיִּי), but apparently only in his first “editio,” since Jerome ascribes to him a rendering which is in accordance with the received text. In Jud. v. 21, נחל קדומים is rendered ἀγίων φάραγξ (Sym.), and . . . καθησίου (Theod.); but Aquila supports the present text (except perhaps as regards the y) by his rendering καυσάνων, which (cf. Job xv. 2) must represent the plural of קרים, curus. In Jud. ix. 13, “Should I leave my wine, which cheereth GOD AND man?” Symmachus reads defectively, τὴν εὐφροσύνην τῶν ἀνθρώπων, not because he had a different text before him, but for dogmatic reasons, as will appear the more plainly when the general character of his version is taken into consideration. Thus in one way or another the few apparent deviations from the present text can generally be accounted for; and we may conclude that the latter is in the closest agreement with the text of the 2nd century, so far as its consonants are concerned. We have next to consider its vocalisation, or the mode of reading the text which then prevailed.

2. ITS VOCALISATION.—Very little of the second column of the Hexapla, which contained the Hebrew text transliterated into Greek, τὸ Ἑβραϊκὸν Ἑλληνικοῖς γράμμασι, has been preserved; but the few fragments that remain, of which two specimens, compared with the Masoretic text, are given below, seem to prove, when every allowance has been made for the inherent difficulty of transliteration, that the present system of vocalisation differs appreciably from the system in use at the time of the composition of the Hexapla.

PSALM cix. 3.

μηρεμ μεσσααρ	מִרְהַם מִשְׁהָר
λακταλ ιελεθεβex	לָךְ טַל יִלְחַתֶּךָ

HOSEA xi. 1.

חי נער ישראל	כִּי נֶעַר יִשְׂרָאֵל
ουεάβηδου	וְאֶהְבֶּהוּ
ουμμεμισραμ	וְיִמְצְאוּרִים
καραθι λαβανι	קָרָאתִי לְבָנִי

In the above specimens we observe that the dissyllables מִרְהַם and נֶעַר are read as monosyllables (the gutturals ה and ע being as is frequently the case unrepresented), in a way that reminds us of the spoken Arabic. In like manner אֶרֶץ becomes aps, as in Ps. xi. 7, Βααλλλ Adaps for בעליל לְאֶרֶץ; and Ps. lxxv. 10, ἀνιη aps σέλ, for עָנִי אֶרֶץ סֶלָה, where even Selah becomes a monosyllable (cf.  $\xi\mu$  for הַיִּה in Ps. ix. 7). The same form  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\varsigma$  is given by Theodotion for הַהֲרִשׁ (Is. xvii. 9), whereupon Jerome remarks: "Solut Theodotio Hebraicum verbum posuit, ARS et emir, quod apud eos emendatius legitur, HORES et amir, id est, vomeres et acervi segetum" (vol. iv. 196). Other examples are  $\beta\acute{\alpha}\lambda$  for בַּעַל (4 Kings i. 2);  $\delta\lambda\delta$  for הַלֵּךְ (Ps. xlviii. 2);  $\nu\acute{\epsilon}\beta\lambda$  for נָבֵל, and  $\beta\acute{\alpha}\rho$  for בַּעַר (Ps. xci. 4, 7);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\delta\mu\upsilon\rho$  σεωριμ οὐλῆθξ σεωριμ for וְלִתְּךָ ... וְהוֹמֵר (Hos. iii. 2);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\lambda\alpha\kappa\acute{\epsilon}\theta$  for וְלִקְחָת (Mal. ii. 13). Cf. Job xlii. 14, where Aquila and Symmachus have Καρναφούκ for הַפּוֹךְ; and notice the abbreviated form of the names of the Hebrew letters, as  $\acute{\alpha}\lambda\phi$ ,  $\delta\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\theta$ ,  $\lambda\acute{\alpha}\beta\delta$ ,  $\acute{\sigma}\acute{\alpha}\mu\chi$ , given by Eusebius, in Praep. Evang. lib. x. cap. 5.

Again, the consonant in the pronominal affix  $\eta$ : has no vowel in the Hexapla, but it is preceded by  $\alpha$  (or  $\epsilon$ ), as  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\alpha\theta\acute{\epsilon}\tau$  ἀσουρευοῦ μεν ὑραχ ( $\acute{\alpha}\rho\acute{\alpha}\chi$ ) for אֶרְחָךְ ... (Ps. xliiii. 19);  $\eta\chi\alpha\lambda\acute{\alpha}\chi$  for הַיִּכְלָךְ (Ps. xlvii. 10), where Jerome likewise has ECHALACH (Ep. ad Sunniam et Fretelem, § 28, vol. i. 652);  $\chi\iota\beta\acute{\alpha}\chi$  for כִּי בָךְ (Is. xxvi. 3), to which add the two examples which occur above in Ps. cix. 3. Initial Shva was sometimes unrepresented, as in  $\beta\eta\rho\sigma\theta$  (Gen. i. 1);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\beta\alpha\rho\sigma\theta\acute{\upsilon}$  μὰτ μηλωείμ (Ps. viii. 6);  $\beta\alpha\rho\acute{\upsilon}\chi$   $\acute{\alpha}\beta\beta\acute{\alpha}$   $\beta\sigma\alpha\iota\mu$  ἀδωναλ (Ps. cxvii. 26); or it was represented by  $\epsilon$  or  $\alpha$ , or was assimilated to the following vowel, as  $\sigma\alpha\beta\alpha\acute{\omega}\theta$ , λαμσάλ (Ps. xlviii. 5),  $\mu\omega\kappa\acute{\omega}\rho$  (Ps. xxxv. 10). For chirik we sometimes find  $\epsilon$ , as in  $\acute{\epsilon}\sigma\sigma\acute{\alpha}$  for אֶשֶׁת (Gen. ii. 23); but more frequently  $\alpha$ , as  $\mu\alpha\lambda\alpha\mu\acute{\alpha}$  for מְלֻחָמָה (Ps. lxxv. 4);  $\mu\alpha\sigma\beta\eta\eta$  for מְוִבְהָה (Mal. ii. 13);  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\sigma\acute{\upsilon}$  (אַרְסִי) ἀγ βααβεθθίμ (Ps. cxvii. 27). This may partly explain the resolution of מְכַתֵּם (Ps. xv. 1) into two words  $\mu\acute{\alpha}\chi$   $\theta\acute{\alpha}\mu$  by Aquila and Symmachus; and for the rendering of צִדְקָנִי as an imperative piel in Jer. xxiii. 6, "... Domina justitia nostra. Hoc enim significat ADONAI SADECENU; pro quo Symmachus vertit, Domine, justifica nos" (Jerome, in loc. vol. iv. 998). Single letters were occasionally doubled, but more frequently letters which now have dagesh forte were represented as single, e.g. (Is. xxvi. 2),  $\gamma\omega\lambda$  σαδικ (יָדִי) σωμῆρ ἔμμουνείμ (אַמְוִנִים). The conjunction  $\imath$  was regularly represented by  $\sigma\upsilon$ , as  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\zeta\acute{\omega}\lambda$  (Mal. ii. 13);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\mu\alpha\lambda\alpha\mu\acute{\alpha}$  (Ps. lxxv. 4);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\mu\kappa\rho\acute{\alpha}$  for אֶקְרָא (Lev. i. 1);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\alpha\gamma\lambda\theta$  for וְהִגִּית (Ps. xlviii. 4);  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\alpha\theta\acute{\epsilon}\tau$  for וְהָט (Ps. xliiii. 19); and was doubtless pronounced more uniformly than at present, as must have been the case also with the letters  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\zeta$ ,  $\eta$ ,  $\theta$ ,  $\iota$ ,  $\kappa$ ,  $\lambda$ ,  $\mu$ ,  $\nu$ , which were represented without regard to their position in the syllable by  $\beta$  (exc. Gen. xxxiv. 2),  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\phi$ ,  $\theta$ . We learn from a statement of Jerome on Dan. xi. 45 (vol. v. 724), that the Hebrew alphabet (like the Arabic) had no equivalent for the letter P: "Notandum autem quod P litteram Hebraeus sermo non habet, sed pro ipsa utatur PHE, cujus vim Graecum  $\phi$  sonat; in isto tantum loco apud Hebraeos scribatur quidem PHE sed legatur P" (Απειδῶν, al.

Ἐφαδανῶ). The same writer commenting upon the Epistle to Titus (iii. 9, vol. vii. 734), speaks of the difficulty of acquiring the niceties of the Hebrew accent; of representing the gutturals  $\Gamma$  and  $\Psi$ ; and of distinguishing between the sibilants  $\Delta$ ,  $\Sigma$ ,  $\Psi$ :—"Nam nos et Graeci unam tantum litteram S habemus; ille vero tres, samech, sade, et sin, quae diversos sonos possident. Isaac et Sion per SADE scribitur; Israel per SIN, et tamen non sonat hoc quod scribitur. Seon, rex Amorrhaeorum, per SAMECH litteram et pronunciatur et scribitur." The Greek alphabet did not accurately correspond to the Hebrew, and therefore—at least without some system of diacritic points specially devised for the purpose—it could not sufficiently distinguish between the consonants of the latter, to say nothing of the five long and five short vowels, with Chateph Pathach, Chateph Segol, Chateph Kamets, and Shva. Nevertheless, when due allowance has been made for this, we must still conclude that the mode of reading the text which prevailed when the Hexapla was compiled was not precisely the same as that which is prescribed by the system of vowel points now in use. Cognate sounds had not been so completely differentiated, nor were the different classes of vowels always accurately distinguished. Even in the time of Jerome some licence seems to have been permitted, as may be gathered from his remark in his epistle, ad Evangelium de Melchisedech:—"Nec refert utrum SALEM (Gen. xiv. 18) an SALIM (Joh. iii. 23) nominetur, cum vocalibus in medio litteris perraro utantur Hebraei, et pro voluntate lectorum ac varietate regionum eadem verba diversis sonis atque accentibus proferantur" (vol. i. 445). The modern vocalisation and pointing probably arose by development from some less elaborate system. For the bibliography of the controversy upon the antiquity of the Massoretic vowel points in the 16th and 17th centuries see Hody, de Bibliorum Textibus, &c. lib. iii. (2), cap. 16, § 8.

The following are some further extracts from the second column of the Hexapla. Ps. xci. 4, 7,  $\acute{\alpha}\lambda\acute{\epsilon}$  ἀσῶρ οὐαῆ  $\nu\acute{\epsilon}\beta\lambda$  ἀλοὶ εἰῶν βχενῶρ . . .  $\imath\varsigma$   $\beta\acute{\alpha}\rho$  (בַּעַר) οὐλὰ ἰαδαῆ οὐχσῶλ λωιαβιν ἔθ ζῶθ. Ps. xi. 9:  $\chi\acute{\alpha}\rho\mu$  ζολλῶ (?) λεβηῖ ἀδάμ. Is. xxvi. 2-4,  $\phi\theta\sigma\acute{\upsilon}$  σααρεῖμ οὐιαβῶ γαλ σαδικ σωμῆρ ἔμμουνεῖμ. ἰεσρῶ σμοῶχ θεσῶρ σαλῶμ σαλῶμ χιβῶχ βατόυ. βετοῦ βαδωνῶ ἀδδῶδ χιβαῖδ ἀδωνῶ σῶρ ὠλεμεῖμ. Mal. ii. 13,  $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}\zeta\omega\theta$  σρηθ θεσου χεσσοθ δεμα εθμασβηη ΠΠΠ βεχι ονανακα μῆην ὠδ φεννωθ ελ αμμανα ουλακεθ ρασων μειδηχεμ.

Lastly, we may notice that the above principles of transliteration fully justify the latest interpretation (Schiller-Szinessy, Journal of Philology, vol. iii. p. 113) of the strange word ARSARETH, or Arzareth, in 4 Esdr. xiii. 45, which had given rise to a variety of conjectures. It is simply אַרְרֵי אֶרֶץ, "ANOTHER LAND," with reference to Deut. xxix. 27; for we have seen that  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\varsigma$  stands for אֶרֶץ (Ps. xi. 7, lxxv. 10); and, in accordance with the analogy of  $\kappa\acute{\epsilon}\theta$ ,  $\nu\acute{\epsilon}\rho$ ,  $\rho\acute{\epsilon}\mu$ ,  $\beta\acute{\alpha}\lambda$ ,  $\beta\acute{\alpha}\rho$ , the word אֶרֶץ might be represented by  $\acute{\alpha}\rho$  (Ezr. ii. 31, LXX), and consequently its feminine by  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\epsilon\theta$ ; and the two words would then combine in ARSARETH, precisely as, in the verse last mentioned, אֶרֶץ אֶרֶץ are represented by Ἡλαμῶρ.

3. AQUILA.—Of the post-Christian versions that of Aquila is the first in order of time, and it is in the closest agreement with the letter of the Hebrew text. The traditions relating to Ἀκύλας, in Christian and Jewish writings, are so far in agreement that they may be assumed to refer to one and the same person. By Euphrasianus he is described (De Mens. et Pond. §§ 13–15) as of Sinope in Pontus,<sup>c</sup> and as πενθεριδης of the emperor Hadrian, in whose twelfth year and 430 years after the LXX he flourished, and by whom he was commissioned to superintend the rebuilding of Jerusalem. Seeing the faith and miracles of the disciples of the apostles he is led to embrace Christianity, but still clings to his faith in the vain ἀστρονομία, and is in consequence excommunicated; filled with resentment he becomes a pervert to Judaism, and is thenceforth known as Aquila the Proselyte; he devotes himself to the Jewish learning, and renders the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, οὐκ ὀρθῶ λογιμῶ χρησάμενος, ἀλλ' ὅπως διαστρέψῃ τινα τῶν ῥητῶν ἐν σκῆψας τῆ τῶν ἐββομηκονταδύο ἐρμηνεία, ἵνα τὰ περὶ Χριστοῦ ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς μεταρτυρημένα ἄλλως ἐκδώσει, δι' ἣν εἶχεν αἰδῶ, εἰς ἄλονον αὐτοῦ ἀπολογία. Jerome records the Jewish tradition that he was a disciple of R. Akiba: “Duas domus Nazaraei (qui ita Christum recipiunt ut observationes legis veteris non omittant) duas familias interpretantur, Sammai et Hellel, ex quibus orti sunt Scribae et Pharisaei, quorum suscepti scholam Akibaes, quem magistrum Aquilae proselyti autumant” (Comm. on Isaiah, viii. 14, vol. iv. 122, 123).

The Ἀκύλας (אָקילאַס, אַקילאַס) of the Jewish authorities was a convert to Judaism, sc. from heathenism (nothing being said of his conversion to Christianity), and went by the name of הַנֶּגֶר, the Proselyte; he was the owner of slaves in Pontus (Sifra, נ' פ' בַּהַר, on Levit. xxv. 7); was a contemporary of and sister's son to Hadrian (Talm. Jerus. Chagigah ii. 1; and (?) Tanchuma, מ' ש' פ' כ"ט); he translated the law into Greek, according to one account (Jerns. Kiddushin i. 1) under R. Akiba, who was regarded as a model of precision, and is said to have been a learner for twenty-two years of the peculiar significance of the particles, as נָם, הָא, רַק, אֵן, wherever they occurred in Scripture (Talm. Babil. Chagigah 12 a; cf. Pesach. 22 b); or, according to another account, under RR. Eliezer and Joshua, who signified their approval of his work by applying to him the words of Ps. xlv. 3, כֹּרֵךְ יִפְתָּהּ כֹּרֵךְ, “Thou art fairer than the children of men,” with an implied allusion to the verse

(Gen. ix. 27) יִפְתָּהּ אֱלֹהִים לִיפַת כֹּרֵךְ, “God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem,” which Bar Kappara turns into a prophecy that the words of the Law should be spoken in the Greek tongue in the tents of Shem (Bereshith Rabbah, xxxvi. cf. Jerome, Quaest. Hebr. in Gen. vol. iii. 317). Add to this that Ὀλίγκη is the authority referred to by the Talmudists for the renderings of particular passages into Greek, and we may conclude that he is identical with the Aquila of the Hexapla, whom Origen himself describes (Ep. ad Africanum,

§ 2) as φιλοτιμότερον πιστευμένος παρὰ Ἰουδαίοις ἡρμηνευκέναι τὴν γραφήν, although the interpretations actually attributed to him in the Rabbinic writings would be of themselves wholly insufficient to establish the identification.

Twelve or thirteen citations of Ὀλίγκη (Gen. xvii. 1; Lev. xxiii. 40; Is. iii.; 20 Ezek. xvi. 10, xxiii. 43; Ps. xlviii. 15; Prov. xvii. 21; Esth. i. 6; Dan. v. 5; Lev. xix. 20; Dan. viii. 13; Prov. xxv. 11; Is. v. 6) for renderings into Greek or interpretations of particular passages are discussed by Rudolph Anger in the former of his two prelections, De Onkelo,<sup>d</sup> and if at least half of these citations must be admitted to be spurious we have the more reason to conclude that the person to whom they are indiscriminately referred must have been regarded as a typical authority by those who made a too free use of his name. Aquila appears also to be the true original of “ONKELOS the Proselyte,” to whom the Targum Onkelos, which is in reality of unknown authorship, is commonly ascribed.

In accordance with the above traditions it may be assumed that Aquila's version was made after the first quarter of the 2nd century A.D., and on the other hand it must have preceded the third book of Irenaeus adversus Haereses—written before A.D. 190—since Aquila is there expressly quoted (cap. 21, cited by Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 8), for the rendering of הַמַּלְאָכִים in Is. vii. 14: Ἄλλ' οὐκ ὡς ἐνίοι φασι τῶν νῦν τολμῶντων μεθερμηνεύειν τὴν γραφήν, Ἰδοὺ ἡ νεανίς ἐν γαστρὶ ἔξει καὶ τέξεται υἱόν, ὡς Θεοδοσίῳν ἡρμηνεύσειν ὁ Ἐφῆσιος καὶ Ἀκύλας ὁ Ποντικός. We learn from Jerome that there was also a secunda editio of Aquila's version: “Aquilae vero SECUNDA EDITIO, quam Hebraei κατὰ ἀκριβείαν nominant, transtulit ἡρεμάζων” (Comment. on Ezekiel, iii. 15, s. v. מ' ש' פ' כ"ט, vol. v. 32); which perhaps only implies that his version underwent a careful revision, although some have inferred that he issued two versions constructed upon different principles, the former somewhat freer and more in accordance with the sense of the original than the latter.

Aquila as a translator aimed at an extreme literal exactness, for which he is on the whole fairly praised as ὁ κυριώτατος ἐρμηνεύειν φιλοτιμούμενος Ἀκύλας (Origen, Comment. on Genesis, i. 16), and on the other hand in places censured as δουλεύων τῇ Ἑβραϊκῇ λέξει (Origen ad Africanum, § 2). His method is at times the reductio ad absurdum of a literal rendering; and yet where he is most useless as an exegete he may be an important witness on questions as to the form of the Hebrew text which lay before him. The opening words of his version are strikingly characteristic: Ἐν κεφαλῶν ἐκτίσεν ὁ θεὸς σὺν τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ σὺν τῇ γῆν where, as in Gen. xlix. 3, and elsewhere, κεφάλαιον stands for ראשית simply because ראשית means κεφαλῆ, and was not specially chosen for its context, sc. to denote that the creation was effected, “in brevi et in exiguo momento”; and where the untranslatable particle אֵן, a mere mark of the objective case, is for the sake of completeness and uniformity identified with the preposition אֵן and rendered σὺν, as also in σὺν σκώληκος τὸ διάφορον, for את תולעת השני (Ex. xxviii. 5) and passim. Jerome, in his Epistle to Pammachius (§ 11, vol. i. 316), comparing Aquila with the LXX, writes as follows: "Aquila autem proselytus et contentiosus interpres, qui non solum verba sed ETYMOLOGIAS quoque verborum transferre conatus est, jure proicitur a nobis. Quis enim pro frumento et vino et oleo possit vel legere vel intelligere χεῖμα, ὄπωρισμὸν, στιλπνότητα, quod nos possumus dicere, fusionem, romationemque, et splendentiam? Aut quia Hebraei non solum habent ἄρθρα sed et πρόαρθρα ille κακοήλως et SYLLABAS interpretatur et litteras, dicitque σὺν τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ σὺν τὴν γῆν, quod Graeca et Latina lingua non recipit." But elsewhere he compares him favourably with the LXX, describing him as a translator who "non contentiosus, ut quidam putant, sed studiosius verbum interpretatur ad verbum" (Ep. ad Damasum, § 12, vol. i. 167). The former passage aptly indicates the two leading principles of Aquila, which were to give a Greek or quasi-Greek equivalent for every fragment of the original, and to maintain a rigid consistency by rendering each root with its real or apparent derivatives by one and the same root in Greek; new forms being freely coined as the occasion demanded, and the Greek idiom being sacrificed to the Hebrew. The peculiar etymological rendering of רֶן, in Ex. xxxiv. 29, which, through the Vulgate, gave rise to the popular representation of Moses with horns on his forehead, is found to have originated with Aquila: "Unde et in Exodo juxta Hebraicum et Aquilae editionem legitur, Et Moyses nesciebat quia CORNUTA ERAT species vultus ejus, qui vere dicere poterat, In te inimicos meos cornu ventilo" (Jerome, Comment. on Amos, vi. 13, vol. vi. 321). On the same principle Aquila rendered the difficult word צָהַר, in Gen. vi. 17, by μεσημβριὸν, to shew that it was somehow related to צהרים, midday; and מִכְרֵתִיהָ, in Gen. xlix. 5, by ἀνασκαφαλᾶν. From ἀφή, נָנַע, leprosy, a form ἀφηνόμενος is coined to represent נָנַע in Is. liii. 4; ἐκλεκτώθητε is given for הִבְרִי (Is. lii. 11), from בר, which is rendered by ἐκλεκτῶς in the passage בָּר נִשְׁקוּ (Ps. ii. 11), and by ἐκλεκτὸν in Ps. lxiv. 14, where it means corn; in Deut. xxxii. 17, ἐτριχίων αὐτούς* is given for לֹא שֵׁעָרוּ; μη ἀγνοηματίσης με for אֵל תִּשְׁנִי in Ps. cxviii. 10; δυνάσται Βασάν διεδηματίσαντό με,<sup>f</sup> for אֲבִירֵי אֲבִירֵי, in Ps. xxi. 13, which is literally interpreted by Eusebius in loc., ὁ στέφανον ἐξ ἀκανθῶν πλεξάντες ἀντὶ διαδήματος ἐπέθηκαν αὐτῷ (vol. v. col. 208).

He scrupulously preserves Hebrew idioms and solecisms alike, as καὶ ἐκάλεσεν ὁ θεὸς τῷ φωτὶ (ΛΑῶρ) ἡμέρα κ.τ.λ. (Gen. i. 5); ἐννακόσια ἔτος καὶ τριάκοντα ἔτος, for שָׁנָה מֵאוֹת שָׁנָה וְשִׁלְשִׁים שָׁנָה (Gen. v. 5), and ἡ προσβόλωσις στόματα, for הַפְּצִיחָה פִּימ (1 Kings xiii. 21). He combines Greek prepositions after the Hebrew fashion; renders בְּמֶרְדֵם by ἀπὸ ἀρχῆθεν (Gen. ii. 8); קָדְמוּ by ἀρχῆθενδε (Ezek. viii. 16); and even לְמִן by eis ἀπένωιον (Ps. cxxviii. 20), where the preformative ו is represented by ἀπὸ (= מן), according to the analogy of σὺν τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ σὺν τὴν γῆν. In a few cases he disintegrates single words, as מִכְתָּם, which he renders ταπεινὸν τελείον, with which compare Talm. Babli, Sotah 10 b, הִיָּה דֶרֶךְ מִכְתָּם שִׁינָה מִכְתָּם כִּי וְתָם. Many curiosities of grammar and lexicography must have perished with the missing portions of Aquila's version; but his version as a whole would doubtless have appeared less singular than the fragments of it which have survived, owing in a measure to their very singularity, or to the obscurity of Hebrew expressions to which they correspond. For renderings by him of a succession of verses see 3 Kings xiv. 1–20; xxii. 47–5; Jerem. x. 6–10.

We have seen that Epiphanius charged Aquila with misrendering τὰ περὶ Χριστοῦ ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς μεμαρτυρημένα, and that Jerome testifies to the prevalence of the same impression in his epistle to Damasus. Compare also his remarks in an epistle to Marcella (vol. i. 152): "Jampridem cum voluminibus Hebraeorum editionem Aquilae consero, ne quid forsitan propter odium Christi synagoga mutaverit; et, ut amicae menti fatear, quae ad nostram fidem pertinent roborandam plura reperio." The rendering of הַעֲלָמָה, in Is. vii. 14, by ἡ νεάνις, which was common to Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, gave great offence; and it is probable that Aquila adopted it for controversial reasons, as an alternative not so much to ἡ παρθένος (LXX) as to ἡ ἀπόκρυφος, which, in accordance with his peculiar etymological method, he should have written in Is. vii. 14, as he actually did in Gen. xxiv. 43. From Justin Martyr's reference to the rendering of the word in question by νεάνις (Dialog. c. Tryph. § 67) it has been assumed that Aquila's version was then in existence, but on inadequate grounds, since the rendering νεάνις (cf. Ps. lxvii. 26, LXX) is not sufficiently distinctive, and may have been used previously in controversies upon the particular passage in question. He uses ἀλείφω and its derivatives in preference to χρίω, as ὅτι ἀφόρισμα ἔλαιον ἀλείψματος θεοῦ αὐτοῦ ἐπ' αὐτῷ (Lev. xxi. 12), and κατὰ τοῦ ἠλειμμένου αὐτοῦ (Ps. ii. 2), where he has again been accused of Judaizing. Cf. 1 Kings ii. 35; Ps. lxxxviii. 39; Dan. ix. 26, ἐξολοθρευθήσεται ἠλειμμένος καὶ οὐκ ἔσται αὐτῷ. On the other hand, in Hab. iii. 13: "Rem incredibilem dicturus sum, sed tamen veram: isti semichristiani Judaice transtulerunt, et Judaeus Aquila interpretatus est ut Christianus" (Jerome in loc. vol. vi. 656), ἐξῆλθες εἰς σωτηρίαν λαοῦ σου, εἰς σωτηρίαν σὺν χριστῷ σου, where his rendering of אֵל by σὺν for once turns to his praise. He is condemned by Theodoret for rendering נָכוֹר אֵל, in Is. ix. 5, by ισχυρὸς δυνατός, as in mere consistency he must have done; and some other renderings (as in Gen. ii. 18; Ps. xxvi. 6; Ps. xc. 9; Is. xlix. 5) have been objected to on various grounds.

4. SYMMACHUS.—Eusebius relates that Symmachus was an Ebionite, and that in certain of his writings which were still extant, he alleged arguments from St. Matthew's gospel in support of his heresy: Καὶ ὑπομήματα δὲ τοῦ Συμμάχου εἰσέτι νῦν φέρεται ἐν οἷς δοκεῖ πρὸς τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον ἀποτεινόμενος εὐαγγέλιον τὴν δεδηλωμένην ἀρεσιν κρατύνειν· ταῦτα δὲ δ' Ὀριγένης μετὰ καὶ ἄλλων εἰς τὰς γραφὰς ἑρμηνειῶν τοῦ Συμμάχου σημαίνει παρὰ Ἰουλιανῆς τινος εἰληφέναι, ἣν καὶ φησι παρ' αὐτοῦ Συμμάχου τὰς βίβλους διαδέξασθαι (Hist. Eccl. vi. 17). Jerome likewise, in his commentary on Habacuc (iii. 13, vol. vi. 656), describes Symmachus and Theodotus as Ebionites: "Theodotus autem, vere quasi pauper et Ebionita, sed et Symmachus ejusdem dogmatis, pauperem sensum secuti Judaice transtulerunt;" and in his preface to Job he speaks of them as "judaizantes haeretici, qui multa mysteria Salvatoris subdola interpretatione celarunt, et tamen in Ἐξαρλοῖς habentur apud ecclesias et explanantur ab ecclesiasticis viris" (vol. ix. col. 1142). "Epiphanius," writes Montfaucon, "conspicuo Hexaplorum ordine, ubi Symmachus ante Theodotionem positus secundum locum in Graecis editionibus occupabat, putavit Symmachum prius Theodotione editionem suam concinnasse;" he assigns the version of Symmachus, perhaps rightly, to the reign of Severus (A.D. 193–211)—the Chronicon Paschale specifies the ninth year of this reign—but his account of the author is at variance with the statements of Eusebius and Jerome. Symmachus (he tells us) was a Samaritan, τῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς σοφῶν, who from disappointed ambition, μὴ τιμηθεὶς ὑπὸ τοῦ οἰκείου ἔθνους, νοσήσας φιλαρχίαν, καὶ ἀγανακτήσας κατὰ τῆς ἰδίας φυλῆς, became a proselyte to Judaism, and set to work to compose his Greek version of the Scriptures with a specific anti-Samaritan bias, πρὸς διαστροφὴν τῶν παρὰ Σαμαρείταις ἑρμηνειῶν ἑρμηνεύσας (De Mens. et Pond. § 16). Symmachus uses the word χριστὸς where Aquila avoids it, as ἐκκοπήσεται χριστὸς καὶ οὐκ ὑπάρξει αὐτῷ (Dan. ix. 26), which has been thought to favour the view that he was a christian, or "semi-christianus;" but Geiger boldly claims Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotus as "sämmtlich Juden," and sets aside the patristic traditions which connect them with Christianity as prompted by the desire "diese Männer deren Uebersetzungen in Ansehn standen als ihrem Kreise angehörig zu betrachten." Symmachus, like Aquila, is said to have issued a second "editio," referred to on Jer. xxxii. 30, etc.

The version of Symmachus was distinguished by the purity of its Greek and its freedom from Hebraisms. Jerome (following Eusebius) several times remarks: "Symmachus more suo apertius," or "manifestus;" and he praises him as an interpreter, "qui non solet verborum κακοζηλίαν sed intelligentiae ordinem sequi" (Comment. on Amos, iii. 11, vol. vi. 258). In his preface to lib. ii. of the Chronic. Euseb. (vol. viii. 223–4) he writes: "Quamobrem Aquila et Symmachus et Theodotus incitati diversum paene opus in eodem opere prouiderunt; alio nitente verbum de verbo exprimere, alio sensum potius sequi, tertio non multum a veteribus discrepare." Jerome not only commends Symmachus as above, but frequently adopts his renderings, as may be shewn by a comparison of their versions; and it is probable that he has done this to a greater extent than can be demonstrated from the remaining fragments of the Hexapla, as Geiger well suggests in his article on Symmachus (p. 60), which will again be referred to below: "Und so mag sich noch manches verborgene Gut des Symm. in den Speichern des Hieron. und der Vulgata befinden."

The following are specimens of the idiomatic renderings of Symmachus, contrasted with other versions in which the Hebrew constructions are preserved. Ex. v. 7, ἀπερχόμενοι καλαμάσθωσαν ἑαυτοῖς ἄχυρα (al. πορευέσθωσαν καὶ συναγαγέτωσαν, κ.τ.λ.). Ps. xxvii. 1, μὴ ἡσυχάσονται σου ἀποθὲν μου δμοιωθῶ τοῖς καταβαίνουσιν εἰς λάκκον (al. μήποτε σιγήσης ἐξ ἑμοῦ καὶ παραβλήθῃσομαι μετὰ καταβαινόντων, κ.τ.λ.). Job xix. 7, ἐὰν κραγῶσιν ἀδικούμενοι οὐκ εἰσακουσθήσομαι (al. ἰδοὺ βοήσω ἐπ' ἐμὲ ἀδικία καὶ οὐκ ἔπακουσθήσομαι). Job xxxiv. 29, αὐτοῦ δὲ ἡρεμῶν δίδοντας τίς κατακρνεῖ (al. καὶ αὐτὸς ἡσυχῶν παρέξει καὶ τίς καταδικάζεται;) Gen. iv. 2, πάλιν ἔτεκεν (al. προσέθηκε τεκεῖν).

He shews his command over the Greek language by his use of compounds, where the Hebrew can only represent the same ideas by a combination of separate words; and no less by his free use of particles to bring out subtle distinctions of relation which the Hebrew cannot adequately express. Compare ὄπλοφόρος, for נשׂוֹן כליים (1 Kings xvi. 21); ἀκρογωνιαίος, for שׂוֹן פנה (Ps. cxvii. 22); ἀλόγως, for דבר ללא מומה (Amos vi. 13); ἐνοχλῶς ἀδυνατός, for בל וינלו (Ps. xx. 12); ὀφθαλμοφανῶς γὰρ ὕψονται, for כי עין בעין יראו (Is. lii. 8); δ δὲ εὐθυμῶν, for וטוב לב (Prov. xv. 15); εὐδιανοτός . . . κακογνώμων, for טובת שכל כו' (1 Kings xxv. 3); ἀνόητος, for לבו חסר (Eccl. x. 3); περιειργάσαντο πολυπραγμοσύνην, for בקשו וישׂונו (Eccl. vii. 30); and, as regards particles, notice his use of μέν . . . δέ, as in Ex. xiv. 20 (καὶ ἦν ἡ νεφέλη σκότος μὲν ἐκείθεν φαινοῦσα δὲ ἐντεῦθεν); his rendering of ἦν, not uniformly by ὄντων, ὄντως, ἴσως, ἴσως οὖν, ἀλλ' ὄμως, &c.; of οὐδ' by ἀλλὰ καίγε, μέντοιγε, καὶ ἔτι, &c.; of οὐλοῖν by ἐπέτιοιγε and ἀλλὰ μὴν. Metaphorical and other characteristically Hebrew expressions frequently disappear in the course of translation, or they are toned down by the insertion of a quasi.

For θήεις αὐτοῦς ὤμων he reads τάεις αὐτοῦς ἀποστρέφους (Ps. xx. 13); ἐν ὄμοιῳ τρέπε, for ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ κοιλίᾳ (Job xxxi. 15); μὴ μεριμνήσης (?), for μὴ θῆς τὴν καρδίαν σου αὐταῖς (1 Kings ix. 20); συνόδῳ παμμεγέθων (Ps. lxxvii. 31), for ταύρων (שׂוֹן) — he himself reads ταῦροι in Ps. xxi. 13; ὅτι ἐκύκλωσάν με θηραταὶ (for κύνες), and (?) ὡς ζητούντες δῆσαι χεῖράς μου καὶ πόδας μου (Ps. xxi. 17); ἡ γλῶσσά μου ὡς γραφεῖον, and περίθωός με μάχαράν σου (Ps. xlv. 2, 4); ὥσπερ ἄγγειον ἔχει σόματος, for στόμα εἰς στόμα (4 Kings xxi. 16). Notice his rendering, αὐτὴ κληθήσεται ἀνδρὶς ὅτι ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς ἐλήφθη αὐτῇ (Gen. ii. 23). In like manner his rendering of the name of Eve by Ζωογόνος preserves the word-play in Gen. iii. 20; but other names are less happily rendered, as τοῖς εὐφραϊνομένοις ἐν τῷ τείχει τῷ ὀστρακίνῳ φθέγγασθε, for לאשישי קיר הרשת תהנו (Is. xvi. 7). "In regionum nominibus ponendis tres interpretres pro 'Aparāt (Gen. viii. 4) 'Armenia ediderunt; sed solus Symmachus pro 'Ελλάσαρ, 'Ελλάμ, et ἐθῶν (Gen. xiv. 1) Πόντου, Σκυθῶν, et Παμφυλλας vereor ne curiosius quam verius suffecerit" (Field).

Another marked characteristic of Symmachus is his tendency to adopt more or less paraphrastic and inaccurate renderings under the influence of dogmatic prepossessions, as will sufficiently appear from the following examples.<sup>b</sup> In Gen. i. 27 he has καὶ ἔκτισεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐν εἰκόνι διαφόρῃ, ὄρθιον ὁ θεὸς ἔκτισεν αὐτόν, for יבִרָא אֱלֹהִים אֶת הָאָדָם בְּצַלְמוֹ בְּצַלְמֵוּ

אתו אלהים ברא אתו where, to avoid attributing a form to God, the affix in בְּצַלְמוֹ (as Geiger explains) is referred to man—"in his own image," in one peculiar to himself, distinct from and superior to that of the beasts; whilst in the next clause בְּצַלְמֵוּ is taken absolutely as in Ps. xxxviii. 7 (ἐν εἰκόνι διαπορεύεται ἄνθρωπος) so that Elohim becomes the subject of בְּרָא, thus, "Elohim created him ἐν εἰκόνι," which is paraphrased by ὄρθιον. Compare the saying of R. Akiba in Pirke Aboth, iii. (21). "Beloved is man that he was created in imagine;" where, however, most copies now naturally adopt the simpler reading, in imagine DEI; but one of the older commentaries notices the briefer reading, remarking that some targumise in Gen. i. 27,

"God made man בְּצַלְמֵוּ." Abarbanel attributes this reading to Onkelos; but see Targum Jonathan. In the preceding verse Symmachus renders approximatively, ποιήσωμεν ἄνθρωπον ὡς εἰκόνα ἡμῶν. In Gen. iii. 23, he reads ἴδε, ὁ Ἄδὰμ γέγονεν ὁμοῦ ἄφ' ἐαυτοῦ (for ὡς εἰς ἐξ ἡμῶν) γνώσκων καλὸν καὶ πονηρὸν, agreeing with the rendering of the Targumist, "Man has become unique in the world, of himself to know good and evil." Gen. vi. 2, καὶ ἰδόντες οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν δυναστεύοντων (for θεοῦ, or θεῶν) κ.τ.λ., agreeing with the Targum, בְּנֵי רַבְרַבִּיָּא; and so in Ex. xv. 11, οὕτε ἐν δυναστείας οὕτε ἐν ἀγασμῶ ἐξισωθῆναι τις δυναστείας, to avoid the appearance of polytheism in τίς ὁμοῖός σοι ἐν θεοῖς; Ex. xxiv. 10 is qualified by the insertion of ὄραματι, thus καὶ εἶδον ὄραματι τὸν θεὸν Ἰσραήλ. In Jud. ix. 13, "Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man," he omits θεον altogether, and reads τὴν εὐφροσύνην τῶν ἀνθρώπων. In Ps. xliii. 24, ἰνατὶ ὀνόματι κύριε is modified into ἰνατὶ ὡς ὀνόματι εἰ (Targ. כְּנִבְרַח דְּמִיָּן). ("The strength of my head," and "my washpot" (Ps. lix. 9, 10), become . . . τῆς ἀρχῆς μου . . . λέβητος ἀμεριμνίας μου. Ps. xvii. 11, πετομένους (as an epithet of χερσὸν β), to avoid saying, καὶ ἐπετάσθη, עָנָן) (sc. ὁ θεός). In Ps. lxxiii. 2, he reads καὶ ἡγάγες (שָׁנַנְתָּ) εἰς τὸ Σιών κ.τ.λ., instead of ὁ κατεσκήνωσας ἐν αὐτῷ (שָׁנַנְתָּ זֶה בָּנוּ), whereas in Ps. lxxvii. 60 he paraphrases in accordance with the present pointing,

דָּרַם לְהָאָהָל שִׁבְּן בְּאָדָם, καὶ τὴν σκηνῶσιν τὴν ἰδουθεῖσαν ἐν ἀνθρώποις, where the LXX and Theodotion have (rightly as Geiger thinks) οὗ κατεσκήνωσεν (שִׁבְּן) ἐν ἀνθρώποις. God must not be said to tempt men, and accordingly נִסָּה is turned into ἐδόξασεν (Gen. xxii. 1). The hardening of the people's heart (Is. vi. 10) is ascribed to themselves, and not to the divine command. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. xviii. 25), is diluted by Symmachus into ὁ πάντα ἄνθρωπον ἀπαιτῶν δικαιοπραγεῖν ἀκρίτως μὴ ποιήσῃς τοῦτο. He takes occasion to bring out the doctrine of a future life and retribution, thus, ἀλλὰ πανσάμενος τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ ζῶν εἰς αἰῶνα διατελεσεῖ (Ps. xlviii. 9, 10); εἰς μισθοποδοσίαν αἰῶνιον (Ps. cxviii. 112); in Is. xxvi. 14 (ἀποθνήσκοντες οὐ μὴ ζήσωσιν), "Symmachus more suo manifestus, Mortui non VIVIFICABUNT, gigantes non SUSCITABUNT." (Jerome in loc. vol. iv. 352.)

In several cases in which the renderings of Symmachus are in one way or other remarkable they are found to be in accordance with current Jewish interpretations. Thus Lamech is made to say of Cain, ὅτι ἑβδομήμιος ἐκέκχησιν δώσει (Gen. iv. 24), according to the tradition (Bere-shith Rabbah xxiii.) that he was respited

רַבִּין לִשְׁבַע דְּרַבִּין (Targ. Onk.), till the seventh generation, when Lamech killed him (cf. Jerome, Ep. to Damasus, vol. i. 163). In Ex. ii. 21, his peculiar rendering of וַיֹּאמֶר כֹּן by ἔρρισε δὲ Μωυσῆν ὥστε οἰκέιν has its parallel in the Mechilta (Jethro, i.), where it is said that Jethro on giving Moses his daughter to wife required him to swear that he would devote his first-born to idolatry. The famous passage

כִּי קָלַת אֱלֹהִים תְּלִי (Deut. xxi. 23) is interpreted by Symmachus: "quia propter blasphemiam Dei suspensus est" (Jerome, Comm. on Gal. iii. 13, vol. vii. 436), in accordance with the Mishnah (Sanhedrin vi. 4). Geiger, referring to St. Paul's application of the passage, remarks: "Es mag wohl sein dass die Juden, gerade im Widerstreite gegen diese Anwendung, von der früheren Erklärung abgingen und die Worte dahin deuteten, dass wer Gott fluche gehängt werde." The qualifying ὡς inserted in 1 Kings xiii. 1: υἱὸς ὡς ἐνιαυστὸς Σαουλ ἐν τῷ βασιλεῦν αὐτῶν, agrees with the interpretation (Talm. Bab. Yoma 22 b, and Targ.) that Saul was as innocent as a child of a year old. Jer. li.

לָב קָמִי is transliterated instead of being translated, to indicate that it is a cipher writing for כְּשָׂרִים (Χαλδαίους, LXX) by the method athbash in which letters equidistant from the centre of the alphabet are interchanged. It may be concluded that Symmachus was well versed in the Jewish modes of interpretation; but sufficient reason has not been shewn by Geiger for identifying him with Symmachus ben Joseph, the renowned disciple of R. Meir, who was always ready to give eight and forty reasons for his decisions (Talm. Bab. Erubin, 13 b), for although this Symmachus may have been acquainted with Greek (Nazir 8 b), he is not, like Aquila, cited as a translator of the Scriptures.

5. THE SEPTUAGINT.—The fifth column of

the Hexapla contained a special recension of the Septuagint, in which errors were corrected, defects supplied, the order of the Hebrew was restored (as for example in the book of Jeremiah), and asterisks and obeli were inserted to indicate the redundancies, hiatuses, and transpositions of the original versions. Jerome, in his Preface to the Book of Chronicles (vol. ix. col. 1392, 1393), remarks upon the various editions of the LXX current in his time: "Alexandria et Aegyptus in Septuaginta suis Hesygium laudat auctorem: Constantinopolis usque Antiochiam Luciai martyris exemplaria probat. Mediae inter has provinciae Palaestinos codices legunt, quos ab Origene elaboratos Eusebius et Pamphilus vulgaverunt; totusque orbis hac inter se trifaria varietate compugnat;" and he goes on to explain that Origen was not content to place the four versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the LXX, and Theodotion side by side, so that they might be compared in detail, but further, "quod majoris audaciae est, in editione Septuaginta Theodotionis editionem miscuit, asteriscis designans quae minus antea fuerant, et virgulis quae ex superfluo videbantur apposita." It is estimated that about a sixth part of the book of JOB was omitted by the LXX; and the missing passages were supplied by Origen chiefly from the version of Theodotion. Compare Jerome's translation of the book, in which the additions are marked by asterisks. The same writer has an important passage in his Preface to the Book of DANIEL, which is in itself not altogether free from ambiguity, and has consequently been misinterpreted: "Illud quoque lectorem admoneo, Danielem non juxta LXX interpretes sed juxta Theodotionem Ecclesias legere, qui utique post adventum Christi incredulus fuit; licet eum quidam dicant Ebionitam, qui altero genere Judaens est. Sed et Origenes de Theodotionis opere in editione vulgata asteriscos posuit, docens defuisse quae addita sunt et rursus quosdam versus obelis praenotavit, superflua quaeque designans. Cumque omnes Christi Ecclesiae tam Graecorum quam Latinorum Syrorumque et Aegyptiorum hanc sub asteriscis et obelis editionem legant, ignoscant invidi labori meo qui volui habere nostros quod Graeci in Aquilae et Theodotionis ac Symmachi editionibus lectitant" (vol. v. 620, 621). The "editio vulgata" here refers to the LXX as a whole (which was revised by Origen and placed in the Hexapla with asterisks and obeli), and not to the book of Daniel only; but although the recension as a whole was read in the churches, the version of Daniel was condemned "judicio magistrorum Ecclesiae," and Theodotion's translation of that book was read in its place. The discarded version was long thought to have perished, but a MS. of it was at length discovered, and was published at Rome in the year 1772, under the title: Δανιὴλ κατὰ τοὺς Ὁ' ἐκ τῶν τετραπλῶν Ὁριγένους. Daniel secundum LXX. ex Tetraplis Origenis nunc primum editus e singulari Chisiano codice annorum supra DCCC. Romae, typis Propagandae Fidei, MDCCLXXII. An edition of the same version was published (with a collation of the Syro-Hexaplar) by H. A. Hahn, in 1845; and it was also embodied in Tischendorf's Editio Altera of the LXX in 1856, where in Sect. xviii. of his Prolegomena he doubtfully propounds the theory that Origen himself excluded the LXX version of Daniel from the HEXAPLA (in favour of Theodotion's) but admitted it into the TETRAPLA. Montfaucon endeavoured to shew that the Hexapla was compiled subsequently to the Tetrapla, and that it contained a different and more correct text of the LXX. "Sed quid in talibus moramur, cum in Libris Jobi, Danielis, et XII Prophetarum ipse textus tetraplaris, obelis et asteriscis distinctus, et quantum sciamus ad hexaplarem prorsus conformatus in versione Pauli Telenis Syriaca oculis nostris subjiciatur?" (Field, Prolegom. in Hexapl. pp. xii. xiii).

It is uncertain when and where<sup>1</sup> the Hexapla was compiled; but Jerome, on Titus iii. 9 (supra), informs us that the MSS. were preserved in the library of Caesarea in Palestine, whither Origen retired on his banishment from Alexandria, in the tenth year of the reign of Alexander Severus (A.D. 232). The whole work was too massive for multiplication; but many copies of its fifth column alone were issued from Caesarea under the direction of Pamphilus the martyr and Eusebius, and this recension of the LXX came into common use. Some of the copies issued contained also marginal scholia, which gave inter alia a selection of readings from the remaining versions in the Hexapla. The oldest extant MS. of this recension is the Leiden Codex Sarravianus, of the 4th or 5th century. This, which contains a fragmentary text only, and no marginal apparatus, was edited in fac simile type by Tischendorf in the third volume of (pp. 1-262) Monumenta Sacra inedita (LIPS. 1860).

THE SYRO-HEXAPLAR or Syriac translation of the Hexaplar recension of the Septuagint, was made by Paul, bishop of Tella, as Gregory bar Hebraeus informs us in the preface to his Horreum Mysteriorum. The date of this translation (about A.D. 617) is given, together with the name of its author, in a Paris MS. of the fourth book of Kings; and in other MSS. it is repeated without the name of the author. The celebrated Codex of the Syro-Hexaplar (containing Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Minor Prophets, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Daniel, Ezekiel, Isaiah,<sup>2</sup> and some apocryphal books), which at the beginning of the 17th century found its way into the Ambrosian Library at Milan from the Nitrian Desert, after having been more or less completely described or edited by the successive labours of Branca, Björnsthål, de Rossi, Norberg, Bugati, Middeldorpf, &c., was eventually issued in photolithograph as vol. vii. of Monumenta Sacra et Profana ex codicibus praesertim Bibliothecae Ambrosianae, with an introduction and notes by "ANT. MAR. CERIANI, Praefecto Collegii doctorum Bibliothecae Ambrosianae" (MEDIOLANI, 1874). Amongst the Syriac MSS. which came to the British Museum<sup>3</sup> from the above mentioned Nitrian Desert, are copies of the Syro-Hexaplar of Exodus and Ruth, and more or less of other books; so that on the whole the only books of which no portions are known to have been preserved are Leviticus, Samuel, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. Judges and Ruth have been edited (Copenhagen, 1861) by Rördam: Genesis and part of Exodus by Ceriani.

6. THEODOTION.—The sixth and last column of the Hexapla, properly so called, contained the version of Theodotio or Theodotion. We have seen that Irenaeus refers to Aquila and Theodotion alone, without mentioning Symmachus; for the rendering, ἰδοὺ ἡ νεάνις ἐν γαστρὶ ἔξει (Is. vii. 14), thus: ὡς Θεοδοσιῶν ἠρμήνευσε δ' Ἐφέσιος καὶ Ἀκύλας ὁ Ποντικὸς (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 8); which is most simply accounted for on the hypothesis that the version of Symmachus was not yet in existence, or had not come into notice. Epiphanius indeed reverses this order and places Symmachus chronologically before Theodotion (misled, as some think, by the order of the versions in the Hexapla); but in so doing he falls into a palpable error, placing him in the reign of an imaginary second Commodus, whom he supposes to have reigned subsequently to Severus. The Chronicon Paschale however places his version in the sixth year of the actual Commodus, and in the two hundred and forty-first Olympiad; and the version of Symmachus in the ninth year of Severus, in the two hundred and forty-fifth Olympiad; alleging the authority of Epiphanius himself for its statements about the three translators: Ταῦτα Ἐπιφάνιος ὁ Κύπριος περὶ τῶν τριῶν ἐρμηνευτῶν Ἀκύλλα Συμμάχου καὶ Θεοδοσιῶνος ἔθηκε. Epiphanius further relates that Theodotion was a Marcionite, and of Pontus, and that, like Aquila and Symmachus, he became a proselyte to Judaism: . . . Θεοδοσιῶν τις Ποντικὸς ἀπὸ τῆς διαδοχῆς Μαρκίωνος τοῦ αἰρεσιάρχου τοῦ Σινωπίτου, μνηστὴν καὶ αὐτὸς τῆ αὐτοῦ αἰρέσει καὶ εἰς Ἰουδαισμόν ἀποκλίνας καὶ περιτριψθεὶς καὶ τὴν τῶν Ἑβραίων φωνὴν καὶ τὰ αὐτῶν στοιχεῖα παιδευθεὶς ἰδίως αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε (De Mens. et Pond. § 17). Jerome, as we have seen, writes of Theodotion: "qui utique post adventum Christi incredulus fuit, licet eum quidam dicant Ebionitam, qui altero genere Judaeus est"; but elsewhere he seems to adopt the tradition of his Ebionism. Montfaucon argues from his rendering of Dan. ix. 26 that he was a Jew. His aim as a translator being (again in the words of Jerome) "non multum a veteribus discrepare," not so much to make a new translation as to revise the old, correcting its errors and supplying its defects, it not unnaturally came to pass that Origen made free use of his version in constructing the Hexaplar recension of the LXX; and that, in the case of the book of Daniel, even the recension of Origen (as noticed above) was popularly discarded in favour of Theodotion's version in its entirety. His style does not present such marked peculiarities as those of Aquila and Symmachus. Suffice it to notice that he is more addicted to transliteration than they or the LXX; and that, on account of the number of the words which he thus leaves untranslated, he has been regarded as an ignorant interpreter. The charge however cannot be sustained, at any rate on such grounds; for, if the argument were valid, we should have to assume, from his rendering of ובעל בת אל נכר (Mal. ii. 11) by καὶ ἔλαβε τὴν θυγατέρα ἧλ (Aq. Sym. θεοῦ) ξένου, that he was unacquainted with so ordinary a word as לֵן. But, if so, could he have produced a version at all? Doubtless he had his reasons for not translating לֵן, as Symmachus had his reasons for omitting דִּי הָלָן in Jud. ix. 13. In other cases he may have desired to retain the actual word used in Hebrew, or may have been unable to find what commended itself to him as a precise Greek equivalent for the original. Compare our own transliterations of behemoth and leviathan, and the proposal, which finds favour with some, to reproduce the αἰώνιος of the New Testament in the form aeonian.

7. THE ANONYMOUS VERSIONS.—Little is preserved and little known of the anonymous Greek versions referred to as the fifth, sixth, and seventh "editions." Eusebius relates (supra) that one of them was marked in the Hexapla as found ἐν Ἱερικοῖ ἐν πύθῳ in the reign of Antoninus, the son and successor of Severus; having previously remarked, upon the πέμπτη and ἕκτη, that Origen described the one as found in Nicopolis near Actium, and the other elsewhere: αὐτὸ τοῦτο μόνον ἐπεσημῆματο, ὡς ἔρα τὴν μὲν εὐροὴν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ἀκτίῳ Νικοπόλει, τὴν δὲ ἐν ἑτέρῳ τόπῳ τοιῷδε (Hist. Eccl. vi. 16). Jerome, in the prologue to his translation of Origen's homilies on the Song of Songs, describes the Quinta editio as the one which "in Actio litore invenisse se scribit" (vol. iii. 499, 450), but Epiphanius writes that it was found in Jericho, and in the seventh year of Antoninus Caracalla (de Mens. et Pond. § 18). It was written in idiomatic Greek, and is quoted on the Psalms, Proverbs, Song of Songs, Minor Prophets, 4 Kings, &c. The Sexta is quoted on the Psalms, Song of Songs, Habacuc, and in a few other places. Their authors are classed by Jerome with Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, as Jewish or Judaizing, "Judaicos translators;" although the rendering (Hab. iii. 13) of the Sexta, ἐξήλθες τοῦ σώσαι τὸν λαόν σου διὰ Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χριστόν σου, suggests that this at any rate was a Christian version. Dr. Field has happily restored a noteworthy rendering of the Sexta, ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη μαλαβάρου, for בתר הרי על, in Cant. ii. 17. Of the Septima no absolutely clear and undisputed trace remains.

8. EDITIONS.—From a letter of PETRUS MORINUS to Silvius Antonianus, dated 1595,<sup>1</sup> we learn that in the year 1578, upon the suggestion of the future pope Sixtus V. to Gregory XIII., an annotated edition of the Old Testament in Greek was projected, and Morinus himself was deputed to collect and embody in the form of annotations, "varias lectiones variasque interpretationes AQUILAE, SYMMACHI, THEODOTIONIS, QUINTAE praeterea ac SEXTAE editionis." His scholia appeared anonymously in the Sixtine Greek Bible of 1587; and they were embodied in the Latin edition of 1588, which was described as "Flaminii Nobilii viri utriusque linguae peritia multiplicique eruditione excellentis notationibus

illustrata." In the Graeco-Latin Paris edition of 1628 which contained the preface of JOANNES MORINUS—upon the authority of the LXX, with some account of Aquila, Symmachus, &c.—the original scholia are placed separately, and followed by the notes of Nobilius founded upon them. We may notice also the edition of LAMBERTUS BOS (Franequerae, 1709). The posthumous work of JOANNES DRUSIUS<sup>m</sup> contained the fragments of the Hexapla with a Commentary upon them, and two introductory epistles, the one on Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and the other on the fifth and sixth versions. But the standard edition of the fragments of the Hexapla from the time of its publication until it was at length superseded by Dr. Field's edition, itself founded upon it, was that of BERNARDUS DE MONTFAUCON, Monachus Benedictinus e Congregatione S. Mauri (Paris, 1713), which contained the fragments, with prolegomena and glossaries. Much valuable matter relating to the Hexapla and the authors of its versions may also be found in Hody's erudite work, De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus. Versionibus Graecis, et Latina Vulgata, libri iv. (Oxon. 1705). To pass over C. F. Bahrdt's abbreviated edition (1769-70), Dr. Field's great work (Oxon. 1875) may be described as a completely revised edition of Montfaucou's with important additions mainly due to following out the line of research indicated by J. G. Eichhorn, who designated the MSS of the LXX and the SYRO-HEXAPLAR as the sources from which the chief accessions were to be expected. The work last mentioned is executed throughout in a scholarly way, and is superior in accuracy to its predecessor. Its prolegomena and notes are a fund of information on matters relating to the history and criticism of the Versions; and if a complete glossary and concordance to the Hexapla is still a desideratum, Dr. Field has at least prepared the way for the lexicographer, and provided an abundance of trustworthy materials out of which such a work might be constructed. HEYUA (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 284), a nun. [HEIU.] [C. H.]

HIA, ST. (HYA, YE, IA, IIA, IIES, ITA, ITHA, IVA), a disciple of St. Barricus, the companion of St. Patrick, and one of the devotees who accompanied St. Breaca from Ireland in the 5th century, and landed in the Hayle estuary on the north coast of Cornwall. A Life of Hia was extant in Leland's time. It stated that Dinan, a Cornish chief, built a church at her request on Pendas—i.e. the promontory of the present town of St. Ives. The name "St. Ives" is quite modern, the old name having been assimilated to that of the other St. Ives; but the old form still survives in the manor of Porth-ia and Dinas-ia. The present church is not on Pendas, and was originally a mere chapel to the neighbouring church of Lelant (by a bull of Alexander V. in 1410), of which Ia's brother Uni is the patron saint. The present church was dedicated Feb. 3, 1434, and hence the parish feast is now on the Sunday nearest to Feb. 3: the feast of Lelant is on the nearest Sunday to Feb. 1, but the old day of St. Ia was

Oct. 27 (Acta Sanctorum, October, xii. 293). Colgan says that Ia went to Conetonia. There used to be a chapel of St. Ia (Ye) at Camborne, a neighbouring parish. See William of Worc. Itin. 106; Leland, Itin. iii. 11, 21; Whitaker, Cornwall, ii. pp. 1 and 4; Lanigan's Ireland, i. 297, 301. St. Ivo in the eastern part of the county is perhaps named from Ivon, one of the sons of Brychan of Brecknock (Whitaker's Cornwall, ii. 94), but the Persian St. Ivo has much influenced these similar names. William of Worcester, 375, gives a St. Ivo for May 19, and a hymn on St. Ivo of Brittany is given in Clichtoveus' Eucidatarium, 1556. p. 214. [C. W. B.]

HIBERNICIUS, disciple of St. Patrick. [HERNICIUS.]

HIBERNIUS, a person said to have been present at the council of Arles, A.D. 314. But the name is doubtful (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 201, ed. Oberthür). [H. W. P.]

HICCILA, bishop of Salamanca from about 632 to about 640, was present at the fourth (A.D. 633) and sixth (638) councils of Toledo. (Aguirre Catalani, iii. 385, 413; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 274.) [LEUTHERIUS.] [M. A. W.]

HICETAE (Ἰκέται). A sect of orthodox ascetics who lived in monasteries and spent their time in singing hymns, accompanied with dancing, as they alleged, after the example of Moses and Miriam, Exod. xv. 1, 20, 21 (Io. Damasc. de Haeres. cap. iv. § 87, p. 108, in Patr. Gr. xciv. 756, where see note). They are said to have arisen after the time of the emperor Marcian, and before Heraclius (ib. 738, 762). [T. W. D.]

HICONIUS (OECONIUS; ECONIUS), 2nd bishop of Maurienne, between Felmasius and Leporius. He was present at the first council of Mâcon in 581, and the second in 585, and is mentioned by Fredegarius (Chronicon, xxii.) as the finder of the body of St. Victor, one of the Thebaean legion at Soleure, in A.D. 602. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 616; Mansi, ix. 937, 958; Aimoin. H. F. iii. 90, in Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 756.) [S. A. B.]

HIDBURGA, one of the virgins to whom Aldhelm dedicated his treatise De Laudibus Virginitatis (q. v. § 1). [C. H.]

HIDDI, the name of a priest attached as witness to the charter of bishop Leutherius to Malmesbury (spurious), dated Aug. 26, 675. (Kemble, C. D. 11; Mon. Angl. i. 257.) [S.]

HIDDILA, a priest, to whom Wilfrid committed the spiritual charge of that portion of the Isle of Wight which Caedwalla had given him. He was attached to the household of Bernuini, Wilfrid's nephew, to whom he had entrusted his estate there. (Bede, H. E. iv. 16.) [J. R.]

HIDDO, thirty-second bishop of Antun, succeeding Gairo, and followed by Reginaldus, is said to be omitted from all the catalogues of the bishops of this diocese, but his signature, with the see appended, to the Placitum of Attigny, in A.D.

765, seems to prove that the catalogues are here imperfect. (Mansi, xii. 675; Gall. Christ. iv. 359.) [S. A. B.]

HIDELBALD, archbishop. [HILDEBALD.]

HIDOLPHUS, HIDULFUS, HIDULPHUS, bishop of Treves. [HILDULFUS.]

HIDULPHUS (1) (HYLDULFUS), bishop of Rouen between Melantius and Romanus, succeeded cir. A.D. 601 and ruled twenty-eight years. (Orderic. Vital. H. E. v. 9; Gall. Chr. xi. 12.) [C. H.]

HIDULFUS (2) (HILDULFUS), ST., a noble of Hainault, of the court of Pippin of Heristal, and husband of St. Aya. According to the Life of St. Waldetrudis, to whom he was related through his wife, he built for her the monastery of Castrilocus (St. Vaudru at Mons) (Vit. Waldetrud. cap. 2 in Boll. Acta SS. Apr. i. 839). He and his wife having resolved to separate and embrace the monastic life, he entered the monastery of Lobbes, which, together with three others, he had assisted St. Landelinus (June 15) to found, and where St. Ursmarus was then abbat. He was never abbat or bishop of Lobbes, as has been asserted. The foundation of St Vaudru is placed about 670, and Hidulfus's death in 707. He was commemorated June 23. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iv. 582.) [S. A. B.]

HIERACAS (HIERAX), an Egyptian teacher, from whom the sect of Hieracitae took their name. Our knowledge of him is almost entirely derived from the account of him in Epiphanius (Haer. 67, p. 709), who states that he was contemporary with the Egyptian bishop Meletius, and with Peter of Alexandria, and that he lived under the Diocletian persecution. This agrees very well with the notice of him by Arius (vid. infr.), so that he may be placed at the very beginning of the 4th century. Epiphanius treats him with more respect than he usually grants to the founders of heretical sects, and is willing to believe that he practised asceticism bonâ fide, which, in the case of his followers, he counts but as hypocrisy. According to Epiphanius, Hieracas lived at Leontopolis, in Egypt, abstaining from animal food and from wine; and by the severity of his manner of life, and by the weight of his personal character, did much to gain reception for his doctrines, especially among the other Egyptian ascetics. He was a man of great ability and learning, well-trained both in Greek and Egyptian literature and science, and was the author of several works in both languages. Epiphanius speaks of him as well skilled in medicine, and with more hesitation ascribes to him a knowledge also of astronomy and of magic. He practised the art of calligraphy, and is said to have lived to the age of ninety, and to have retained his eyesight so perfectly as to be able to continue the practice of his art up to the time of his death. Besides being the composer of hymns, he wrote several expository works on Scripture, of which one on the Hexaemeron is particularly mentioned. It was, doubtless, in this work that he put forward one of his doctrines censured by Epiphanius, viz. the denial of a material Paradise (see PARADISE). Mosheim connects this doctrine with his reprobation of marriage, imagining that he was led to it by the necessity of making a reply to the objection that marriage was a state ordained by God in Paradise. Neander, with more probability, conceives that the notion of the essential evil of matter was at the bottom of this as well as of other doctrines of Hieracas. This notion would lead him to allegorize the Paradise of the book of Genesis, interpreting it of that higher spiritual world from which the heavenly spirit fell by an inclination to earthly matter. And this notion would account for a second doctrine, which, according to Epiphanius, he held in common with Origen, viz., that the future resurrection would be of the soul only, not of the material<sup>a</sup> body; for all who counted it a gain to the soul to be liberated by death from the bonds of matter, found it hard to believe that it could be again imprisoned in a body at the resurrection. The same notion would explain the prominence which the mortification of the body held in his practical teaching; so that, according to this view, Hieracas would be referred to the class of Gnostic ENCRATITES.

The most salient point in the practical teaching of Hieracas was, that he absolutely condemned marriage, holding that though it had been permitted under the old dispensation, yet since the coming of Christ no married person could inherit the kingdom of heaven. He asked what else the Only-begotten Word had come to teach. The doctrine of the fear of God, the condemnation of envy, covetousness, injustice, &c., had all been sufficiently taught in the Old Testament. The one new thing Christ had come to teach was the inculcation of absolute chastity. This chastity was the "holiness, without which none could see God." In the parable, some of the ten might be wise, some foolish, but they were all virgins. If it was objected to him that the apostle had said, "marriage is honourable in all," he appeals to what the same apostle had said a little further on (1 Cor. vii.), where he says that he wished all to be as himself, and only tolerates marriage "because of fornication," that is to say, as the least of two evils. Thus it not only appears that Hieracas believed in the Pauline origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, but also his language seems to indicate that in his sacred volume that epistle preceded that to the Corinthians. He received also the pastoral epistles of St. Paul, though we are not told how he attempted to reconcile with his system such passages as 1 Tim. iv. 2, v. 11. But he appeals to 1 Tim. ii. 11 in support of another of his doctrines, viz., that children dying before the use of reason cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven; and asks if he who strives cannot be crowned unless he strive lawfully, how can he be crowned who has never striven at all? Neander cannot believe that Hieracas meant to exclude married persons and children altogether from salvation, and supposes that by the "kingdom of heaven" which is denied to them the very highest degree of blessedness is intended. Neander refuses to class Hieracas among heretics, considering that his doctrines did not transgress what in his own time were accounted the limits of orthodoxy, and that he was only pronounced heretical by those who judged him according to the standards of a later generation. But it seems to us more likely that he was in his own lifetime formally out of communion with the church. His doctrine concerning marriage would alone suffice to make a separation. We are told that his sect admitted amongst its members only virgins, monks, continent persons, and widows. Arius, in his letter to Alexander in defence of his views concerning our Lord's Person (Epiph. Haer. 69, 7, p. 732; Athan. de Syn. i. 583; Hilar. de Trin. vi. 5, 12) contrasts his own doctrine with that of Valentinus, of Manichaeus, of Sabellius, of Hieracas; and it is natural to think that all these teachers, by rejection of whom he hopes to conciliate favour for his own orthodoxy, were reputed in the church as heretics. Hieracas, according to Arius, illustrated the relation between the first two Persons of the Godhead, by the comparison of a light kindled from another, or of a torch divided into two, or, as Hilary understands it, of a lamp with two wicks burning in the same oil. There is no evidence that Hilary knew anything of the teaching of Hieracas, except through this report of Arius, and therefore we cannot tell whether that teaching included the errors which Hilary regarded as implied in the use of the illustrations just quoted. No more may have been intended than, for instance, in Tertullian (Apol. 21); and Epiphanius, who had direct knowledge of the writings of Hieracas, pronounces him orthodox as to the relation of the Son to the Father.

His doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit is more questionable. He was influenced by the book of the Ascension of ISAIAH, which he received as authoritative. In this book Isaiah is represented as seeing in the seventh Heaven, on the right and on the left hand of God respectively, two Beings like each other, one of these being the Son, the other the angel of the Holy Spirit who spake by the prophets. Hieracas inferred that the latter Being, who makes priestly intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered, must be the same as Melchisedek, who also was "made like unto the Son of God," and "who remaineth a priest for ever." [MELCHISEDEK.]

These are the tenets ascribed to Hieracas by Epiphanius, whose account is abridged by Augustine (Haer. 47) by Joannes Damascenus (66), and by "Praedestinatus" (47), who adds an invention of his own as to a confutation of this heretic by an imaginary Hellepontine bishop, Aphrodisius. The continued existence of the sect is assumed in a story told by Rufinus (Hist. Mon. 28, p. 196) of Macarius, how, when he had failed to confute the cunning arguments of a Hieracite heretic to the satisfaction of his hearers, he vanquished the heretic by successfully challenging him to a contest, which of the two could raise a dead body to life. Rufinus does not make anything in the story turn on the fact that Hierax denied the resurrection of the flesh. Photius (adv. recent. Manich. in Galland. Bib. Vet. Pat. xiii. 609), or rather Petrus Siculus<sup>b</sup> (De la Bigne, Max. Bib. V. P.

xvi. 758), enumerates twelve disciples of Manes, among whom he counts Hierax; and so Beausobre and others set him down as a Manichaeon. [See APHTHONIUS.] But this 9th century evidence is of no weight against the silence of earlier authorities, in particular of Epiphanius, who, though he was in the habit of trying to trace some connexion between the heresies which are next one another in his list, yet does not think of asserting any relation between Hierax and the next preceding heresy, that of the Manichees. It was, no doubt, from the passage just cited that the name of Hierax passed into the "Formula receptionis Manichaeorum," printed by Tollius (Insig. Itin. Ital. p. 144). Another untrustworthy notice of the Hieracites is found in a passage of Joannes Carpathius, copied by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x. 738) from the appendix to Du Cange's Greek Glossary. In it these heretics are said to have denied that our Lord assumed a human body, or that our body should be raised again; and to have asserted that there were three principles—God, matter, and evil. [G. S.]

HIERACES, bishop of Aphnaeum, to the east of Pelusium, in the province of Augustanica Prima. He was present at the third and fourth general councils, A.D. 431 and 451, and on the latter occasion joined in the protest against the condemnation of Dioscorus. (Mansi, iv. 1128; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 548.) [J. de S.]

HIERACHITAE. [HERACLITAE.]

HIERACITAE. [HIERACAS.]

HIERAX, heresiarch. [HIERACAS.]

HIERAX (1), according to the acts of Justin Martyr, a Christian who suffered at the same time with Justin. He seems to have been a slave and a native of Iconium. It does not seem any sufficient reason for impeaching the genuineness of these acts that they say Iconium in Phrygia, or, according to one copy, in Pisidia, instead of Lycaonia. [G. S.]

HIERAX (2), bishop of some part of Egypt, addressed by St. Dionysius of Alexandria in a paschal letter of the year 262, of which fragments remain. (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 21; Tillemont, iv. 276.) [J. W. S.]

HIERAX (3) (IERCUS), a confessor at Alexandria with Philip and ten youths; commemorated on June 15. (Wright's Syr. Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 428.) [G. T. S.]

HIERAX (4), a teacher of grammar at Alexandria, and attached to St. Cyril. He was attacked in the theatre by the Jews in the riots which caused the expulsion of the latter from the city by St. Cyril, A.D. 414-415. Orestes, the governor of the city, being in the theatre to transact some public business, many of the people came to hear him. Hierax was one of these, and from his connexion with St. Cyril was soon picked out by the Jews, who exclaimed that he came there only to cause troubles (ἵνα στάσιν τῷ δήμῳ ἐμβάλλοι). Orestes, jealous of the increasing power of the Alexandrian bishop (Cyril), causes Hierax to be arrested and beaten on the spot. St.

Cyril afterwards severely reproached the leaders of the Jews for the conduct of their people. This led to reprisals on the part of the Jews against the Christians, and ultimately to the expulsion of the former from the city. (Socr. H. E. vii. 13; Tillemont, xiv. p. 271; Neale, Patriarchate of Alexandria, i. p. 227.) [J. W. S.]

HIERAX (5), a man of title (λαμπρότατος, clarissimus), who ridiculed the honours paid by Christians to the relics of martyrs. Isidore of Pelusium addresses him in their defence. (Isidor. Relus. Epp. i. 55, in Patr. Gr. lxxviii. 218.) [C. H.]

HIEREMIAS (1)—June 7. Martyr at Cordova with Peter a presbyter and four others. (Mart. Usuard.; Eulogius, Memorial. SS. lib. ii. cap. 4.) [G. T. S.]

HIEREMIAS (2)—Sept. 17. Martyr at Cordova with Emilianus, a deacon. (Mart. Usuard.; S. Eulog. Memorial. lib. ii. cap. 12.) [G. T. S.]

HIEREMIAS (3)—Feb. 16. A eunuch belonging to the household of Maximian. The emperor finding him to be a Christian beheaded him. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

HIERIUS, presbyter [PIERIUS].

HIERIUS (1), governor of Cappadocia, to whom Gregory Nyssen dedicated the treatise on infant salvation, de Infantibus qui premature abripuntur, written at his request. (Greg. Nyss. tom. iii. p. 317.) [E. V.]

HIERIUS (2), an orator at Rome contemporary with Augustine, who dedicated to him a treatise he had composed, De Apto et Pulchro. Augustine was not then personally acquainted with him, but had conceived a warm regard for him from what he had heard of his character. Hierius was a Syrian, who, after excelling in Greek eloquence, became an admirable speaker in the Latin tongue. (August. Confess. lib. iv. cap. 14.) [C. H.]

HIERIUS (3), bishop of Panemotichus in the second Pamphylia, signed the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, and the death of Proterius, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 576; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 1033.) [L. D.]

HIERLATH, HIERLATIUS, bishop of Armagh. [IARLATH.]

HIERO (1)—Nov. 7. Martyr at Melitene in Armenia. [HESYCHIUS.] [G. T. S.]

HIERO (2), bishop of Anastasiopolis in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the fifth general council A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 824; Mansi, ix. 393.) [L. D.]

HIEROCLES (1), a native of a small town in Caria, where he must have been born at latest some time about A.D. 275. He was a Neoplatonic philosopher, and is to be carefully distinguished from the philosopher of the same name in the 5th century [HIEROCLES (2)]. By some he is supposed to have been in early life a Christian, as he displayed in his writings such an intimate knowledge of the Scriptures and Christian teaching in general as could only have been gained by one within the church. Such instances of apostasy were not unknown in his time, as the cases of Theotecnus and the Egyptian bishop Hero prove. It possibly may have been the case with Hierocles, as Lactantius suggests. He must have been an active and able administrator, as he seems to have risen rapidly by his own exertions. In an inscription found at Palmyra (Corp. Inscript. Lat. t. iii. num. 133), we find his name as ruler of that city under Diocletian and Maximian, Galerius and Constantius being Caesars. Here Hierocles probably came in contact with Galerius, and impressed the Caesar with a respect for his abilities on his famous Persian expedition, when the first seeds of the persecution were sown, 297–302. The expression reiterated by Lactantius, that he was the “author and adviser of the persecution,” lends support to this view. From Palmyra Hierocles was translated as prefect to Bithynia after the persecution broke out. There, in 304 or 305, he succeeded Flaccinian, who began the bloody work (Lact. de Mort. Pers. c. 16), and thence in 305 or 306 was promoted to the government of Alexandria, as is proved by the fact that Eusebius records the martyrdom of Aedesius at Alexandria as occurring by his orders a short time after that of Apphianus, which he fixes with the greatest precision for April 2, 306 (cf. Euseb. Mart. Palaest. c. iv. v.; Epiphanius, Haer. lxxviii.; Assem. Mart. Orient. ii. 195). He seems to have there displayed the same bloodthirsty cruelty as marked another philosophic persecutor, Theotecnus. Eusebius (l. c.) speaks of him as “condemning the Christians at Alexandria and rioting beyond all bounds, sometimes insulting grave and decent men in various ways, sometimes consigning females of the greatest modesty, and virgins who had devoted themselves to the duties of religion, to panders, to endure every kind of abuse and obscenity.” According to the Menaea Graeca, this sight so enraged the martyr Aedesius that he drew near and struck the prefect (Valesius, notes on Euseb. H. E. in l. c.). Hierocles wrote a book against Christianity, the title of which was Λόγος φιλαλήθης πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς, in which he brought forward various scriptural difficulties and alleged contradictions, and also instituted comparisons between the life and miracles of Jesus Christ and those of Apollonius of Tyana. To this work Eusebius replied in a treatise yet extant, Liber contra Hieroclem, wherein he passes over the scriptural difficulties as matters which Origen in his controversy with Celsus had sufficiently treated. He then enters at large upon the contrast drawn between Christ and Apollonius, and shews that the latter was “so far from being comparable to Jesus Christ that he did not deserve to be ranked among the philosophers” (Du Pin, Hist. Eccles. i. 155, art. “Eusebius,” EUSEBIUS (23), Vol. II. p. 328). Duchesne, in an acute treatise on the lately discovered works of Macarius Magnes (Paris, Klinksieck, 1877), suggests that the work of Hierocles embodied the objections drawn by Porphyry from Holy Scripture, and that the work of Macarius was intended as a reply to them. He also throws out the suggestion that Hierocles wrote his book while ruling at Palmyra, before the persecution began. Coming from a man in his position, it would carry great weight in the region of the Euphrates. Macarius therefore, as a dweller in that neighbourhood (Duchesne, p. 11), and Eusebius replied. (Fleury, H. E. t. ii. l. viii. s. 30; Till. Mém. xiii. 333; Hist. des Emp. iv. 307; Neander, H. E. t. i. pp. 201, 240, ed. Bohu; Macar. Mag. ed. Blondel; Mason, Dioclet. Persecution, pp. 58, 108; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. art. "Hierocles.") Dr. Gaisford, of Oxford, published together in 1852 the two treatises of Eusebius against Hierocles and against Marcellus. (Euseb. Pamph. Cont. Hieroc. et Marcell. ed. Gaisford, Oxon. 1852.)

[G. T. S.]

HIEROCLES (2), a philosopher, generally classed among the Neoplatonists, who lived at Alexandria in the first half of the 5th century A.D., and delivered lectures of considerable merit. His character is spoken of by Damascius (quoted by Suidas) in high terms. On the occasion of his sojourn at Constantinople he is said to have come into collision with the government (or, as Kuster interprets it, with the Christian authorities), and to have been severely beaten in the court of justice; possibly (as Zeller conjectures) on account of his adherence to the old religion. He was then banished, and retired to Alexandria. His teacher in philosophy was Plutarch the Neoplatonist; Theosebius is mentioned as his disciple. It is to be noted that Hierocles is not to be confounded with the prefect of Bithynia of the same name. [HIEROCLES (1).] The identification is made by bishop Pearson, but is conclusively disproved by Needham in his edition of the philosopher.

The principal extant work of Hierocles is his commentary on the Golden Verses attributed to Pythagoras. He also wrote an extensive work on Providence and Fate (περί προνοίας και εἰμαρμένης), of which some extracts are preserved in Photius; and fragments of another work, on ethics, are found in Stobaeus. His entire remains have been edited by bishop Pearson; this edition was enlarged and improved by P. Needham (Cambridge, 1709). The latest editions are by Gaisford (in 1850) and Mullah (in 1853). See the last volume of Zeller's Greek Philosophy, pp. 681-687.

Hierocles is a philosopher who will well repay study. His style is the reverse of that generally attributed to the Neoplatonists. He is indeed somewhat too diffuse, and is not free from repetitions; and it is needless to say that he has not the daring and brilliance which marked the great Greek philosophers down to the time of Aristotle. But he is eminently precise, practical, entirely free from baseless theories of his own, and but slightly marred by those which the traditional influence of his school imposed upon him. The moral sentiment of his writings is of a uniform excellence, rarely equalled in the ancient classics; their intellectual acuteness is not small.

It is apparent, indeed, that the real position of Hierocles was that of a reconciler between the old and the new. Doubtless he was a sincere adherent of the heathen religion; but its distinctive features melt away in his hands, and the substance that remains has a soft and tender tone which recalls the accents of Christian piety. Take, for instance, the following passages from his commentary on the Golden Verses.

"No proper cause is assignable for God to have created the world but His essential goodness. He is good by nature; and the good envies none in anything." (Ib. p. 20, ed. Needham.) "What offering can you make to God, out of material things, that shall be likened unto or suitable to Him? . . . For, as the Pythagoreans say, God has no place in the world more fitted for Him than a pure soul." (Ib. p. 24.) "Strength dwells near necessity." Our author adds this to shew that we must not measure our ability to tolerate our friend by mere choice, but by our real strength, which is discovered only by actual necessity. We have all in time of need more strength than we commonly think." (Ib. p. 52.) "We must love the unworthy for the sake of their partnership in the same nature with us." (Ib. p. 56.) "We must be gentle to those who speak falsely, knowing from what evils we ourselves have been cleansed . . . And gentleness is much aided by the confidence which comes from real knowledge." (Ib. p. 110.) "Let us unite prayer with work. We must pray for the end for which we work, and work for the end for which we pray; to teach us this our author says, 'Go to your work, having prayed the gods to accomplish it.'" (Ib. p. 172.)

The reasons adduced by Hierocles for belief in a future state are worth referring to. They are strictly moral, and quite remote from subtlety.

"Except," says he, "some part of us subsists after death, capable of receiving the ornaments of truth and goodness (and the rational soul has beyond doubt this capability), there cannot exist in us the pure desire for honourable actions. The suspicion that we may suffer annihilation destroys our concern for such matters." (Ib. p. 76.)

Not less noteworthy are the views of Hierocles respecting Providence. God, he says, is the sole eternal author of all things; those Platonists who say that God could only make the universe by the aid of eternal matter are in error. (Ib. p. 246, from the treatise περί προνοίας.) Man has freewill; but since the thoughts of man vacillate and sometimes forget God, man is liable to sin: what we call fate is the just and necessary retribution made by God, or by those powers who do God's will, to men for their actions, whether for merit or demerit. (Ib. p. 256; cf. p. 92.) Hence comes the inequality in the lots of men. Pain is the result of antecedent sin; those who know this have the remedy for pain in their hands, for they will henceforward especially fly from wrongdoing, and will not accuse God as if He were the essential cause of their suffering (pp. 92, 94).

Even when, leaving these moral and religious precepts, we come to those views of Hierocles which bear a stronger stamp of Neoplatonism, they are yet put by him in such a way as to remind us in no small degree of Christian philosophy as expounded by such a writer as Dante. God, he says, has created three orders of immortal beings: first, those who may be called Immortal Gods (though inferior to the Supreme Being), who have the contemplation of God or the Highest Law constantly and immutably before them; next, the Heroes or Angelic powers (he calls them variously ἥρωες, ἄγγελοι, αἰθέριοι, who always contemplate God, but yet not quite immutably or without variation; lastly, men, who sometimes have God in their contemplation, and sometimes not. Below these three orders come the brutes, who have no contemplation of God, who are essentially mortal, and whose actions are directed by chance. In a certain sense he seems to deny that this unintelligent brute nature is due to God; though it is impossible to suppose that he excluded it from his conception of creation.

The approximation of heathen philosophy to Christianity is the most interesting point to be noticed in connexion with Hierocles. (He never, in his extant works, directly mentions Christianity; what degree of tacit opposition to it is implied in his philosophy is a question difficult to decide.) Points more specially characteristic of Platonism and Neoplatonism are, however, found in him; the most remarkable is his belief in the pre-existence of man, and in the transmigration of souls. With Porphyry and Jamblichus, however, he denied that the souls of men could migrate into the bodies of animals. The passage on the Pythagorean Quaternary (p. 166, ed. Needham) is the only one of baseless mysticism to be found in Hierocles. It is observable, as a mark of the conciliatory bias of the mind of Hierocles, that he pointedly set to work to reconcile Plato and Aristotle, and reproved those who called these philosophers discordant.

We will conclude our notice of Hierocles by quoting a passage from his Fragments, on Marriage; a passage worthy of note both for its beauty and also as shewing the singularly modern and Christian type of his mind.

“Marriage is expedient, first, because it produces a truly divine fruit, namely children, our helpers alike when we are young and strong, and when we are old and worn . . . But even apart from this, wedded life is a happy lot. A wife by her tender offices refreshes those who are wearied with external toil; she makes her husband forget those troubles which are never so active and aggressive as in the midst of a solitary and unfriended life; sometimes questioning him on his business pursuits, or referring some domestic matter to his judgment, and taking counsel with him upon it: giving a savour and pleasure to life by her unstrained cheerfulness and alacrity. Then again in the united exercise of religious sacrifice, in her conduct as mistress of the house in the absence of her husband, when the family has to be held in order not without a certain ruling spirit, in her care for her servants, in her careful tending of the sick, in these and other things too many to be recounted, her influence is notable. . . . Splendid dwellings, marbles and precious stones and myrtle groves are but poor ornaments to a family. But the heaven-blessed union of a husband and wife, who have all, even their bodies and souls in common, who rule their house and bring up their children well, is a more noble and excellent ornament; as indeed Homer said. . . . Nothing is so burdensome but that a husband and wife can easily bear it when they are in harmony together, and willing to give their common strength to the task.”

We have somewhat abridged the description of Hierocles; for to say the truth, he is not a terse writer. But the above is a passage which it would be difficult to parallel for its substance in the whole series of classical writers.

[J. R. M.]

HIEROLOGUS, bishop. [IARLUGH.]

HIERONYMUS (1), an early Christian writer, of whose works nothing now survives. He is mentioned in the Canon Paschalis of Anatolius Alexandrinus, bishop of Laodicea in Syria (flor. A. D. 280, Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 791). The Canon Paschalis is printed in Bucher's Doctrina Temporum, Antwerp, 1634 (where see p. 439), and in Galland, Bibl. Pat. iii. 545. The passage mentioning Hieronymus is quoted entire by Ceillier (i. 538). It is to the effect that Isidorus, Hieronymus, and Clemens, whom Anatolius calls “majores nostri,” were highly skilled in the Hebrew and Greek languages and agreed in their calculation as to the day and month on which the festival of our Lord's Resurrection should be celebrated. Ceillier thinks that the Clemens must be the famous Clement of Alexandria, and he remarks that Isidorus and Hieronymus, being named before him, probably belonged to the period of Victor, bishop of Rome, when the Paschal controversy engaged so much attention. (See also Tillem. iii. 102.) [C. H.]

HIERONYMUS (2), a son of Charles Martel, who in 754 was deputed with Fulradus, abbat of St. Denys, and others, to escort pope Stephen II. back to Rome, after Pippin's victorious campaign against his persecutor, Astolphus king of the Lombards (Ann. Franc. Fuld. an. 754; Hermanii Chron. an. 754; Anastasius Vita Stephani II.; Bouquet, v. 326, 363, 438). By his father's gift he became lay abbat of the monastery of St. Quentin in the diocese of Noyon, where he was succeeded by his son Fulradus. (Theodulfus, Carmina, Bouquet, ib. p. 416; Gall. Christ. xi. 1041.) [S. A. B.]

HIERONYMUS (3), distinguished from others of the name as “Theologus Graecus,” of uncertain date, about the 4th century. His extant works are two theological treatises. (1) On the Trinity; (2) On the Effect of Baptism and the Notes of a Christian. John of Damascus has also preserved a fragment on the habit of venerating the cross, which may have belonged to the first dialogue. But the tone of thought is certainly different and John of Damascus calls the writer a presbyter of Jerusalem, a title not usually given to this author. The arguments on the Trinity are not very solid. A list of illustrations may be quoted: root, branch, leaves; eye, pupil, and light of the eye; sun, heat, force; soul, reason, body; nail, bone, flesh; spring, stream, and current; fore-arm, lower-arm, hand; speech, fire, and Deity in the bush of Moses; song, flame, and dew in the furnace of the three children; gold, image, and superscription in a coin. The Jew is vehemently abused. The Christian relies on the texts Ps. cix. 3, Ps. ii. 7, Joel ii. 28, Is. xlv. 3, Gen. i. 26, Gen. iii. 22, Gen. i. 27, Gen. xix. 24, Ps. cix. 1, Is. ix. 6, Ps. lxxvi. 6. The Institute useful for a Christian Man, or Treatise on the Effect of Baptism and the Notes of a Christian is directed to prove the spiritual nature of the rite. One of the interlocutors is asked, supposing he had been cast on the roadside by his parents, how he could discover in later years whether he had been really baptized? The appeal in reply is entirely to the unseen effects of faith and love in the heart, the presence of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. The earliest mention of Hieronymus, if we believe that the author of the fragment on the cross is the same writer, is by John of Damascus. (De Imag. Oratio 3, tom. i. Oper. p. 385.) He is called Presbyter of Jerusalem by John and by a MS. of the Bibliotheca Coisliana cited by Montfaucon. Cave thinks that he was the presbyter and monk Jerome, a Dalmatian, who, according to a MS. of the Bibliotheca Colbertina, wrote a history of the monks of Egypt. Galland considers this possibly not far from the truth, and therefore puts him under Theodosius the Great. (Biblioth. Vet. Patr. vii. Proleg. p. 18.) His first editor was Frederick Morel. He took the MS. from the library of Lindenbrogius, and published the work on baptism in 1598, that on the Trinity in 1612, both octavo, at Paris. At Paris also, and in the same form, Daum published in 1677 the work on the Trinity, in 1680 that on baptism. In 1763 and 1769, at Helmstadt, Carpov published the two works in the same order as that of Daum, quarto, with a new version and notes, in 1772 the two together, octavo. Migne (Patrol. Graec. xl. 844) reproduces Galland, with the fragment from John of Damascus. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 282; Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, vol. viii.; Ceillier, vi. 333.) [W. M. S.]

HIERONYMUS (4) (JEROME), ST. The full name is Eusebius Hieronymus, to which we sometimes find added the name Sophronius; but this appears to be a mistake, arising from the fact that Jerome's friend Sophronius translated some of his works into Greek, and thus the two names became blended.

Sources.—The best and most recent accounts of St. Jerome are the following:—Saint Jérôme, la Société chrétienne à Rome et l'Émigration romaine en Terre Sainte, par M. Amédée Thierry (Paris, 1867), and Hieronymus sein Leben und Werke von Dr. Otto Zöckler (Gotha, 1865); the former gives a vivid, artistic, and, on the whole, accurate picture of the Life, with large extracts in the original from the writings, the latter a critical and comprehensive view of both. These contain all that is best in previous biographers, such as the Benedictine Martianay (Paris, 1706), Sebastian Dolci (Ancona, 1750), Engelstoft (Copenhagen, 1797); to which may be added notices of Jerome in the Acta Sanctorum, Biblia Sacra, Du Pin's and Ceillier's Histories of Ecclesiastical Writers, Tillemont, Bähr's Geschichte der römischen Literatur, the excellent article in Ersch and Grüber's Encyclopädie, and that in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, the lives of Jerome prefixed to the chief editions of his works, especially that of Vallarsi, which has a singular value from its succinct narrative and careful investigation of dates.

There are very few notices of Jerome in the writings of his contemporaries. St. Augustine, besides the letters which he actually addressed to him, alludes to him in several of his works (Ep. 261, ad Oceanum, cont. Julianum I.; De Civitate Dei, xviii. 42; De Doct. Christ. &c.), but only cursorily. Sulpicius Severus, who had stayed with him six months at Bethlehem, records his impression shortly in Dial. i. 7, 8, 9.

Palladius (Hist. Laus. 78–80) also has a few words, of a disparaging kind, which he had heard from the hermit Posidonius. Jerome was not a principal actor in any of the chief events of his time, and does not fall necessarily, like Chrysostom and others, under the eye of the ordinary historian. On the other hand, his own writings, from the marked individuality which they display, and the extremely personal character of many of them, especially his defence of himself against Rufinus, coupled with Rufinus's attack upon him, enable the student to build up his history with all but perfect accuracy.

Editions.—The letters and some of the treatises were published in Rome in 1468 by Massimo. But the first edition, comprising all the works then known, was that of Erasmus (Basel, 1516–1520); the next, that of Mariannus Victorius (Rome, 1565). Then followed the edition of Tribbechovius (Leipzig, 1684), the Benedictine by Martianay (Paris, 1693), and lastly that of Vallarsi (Verona, 1734–42). This last is so good both in its arrangement and completeness, and also in its assimilation of the results of the labours of his predecessors, that subsequent editors have done no more than reprint it. In the most accessible reprint, that of Migne (Patrologiae Cursus Completus, Paris, 1845, tom. xxiii.–xxxiii.), Vallarsi's pages are marked in the text. To Vallarsi's edition alone, therefore, the references in this article are made. But since some writers, as Thierry, continue to quote from other editions, students may be referred to a very useful table preceding the general index of Vallarsi's edition, which, besides being a complete table of contents, gives in parallel columns the corresponding position of each work in the Benedictine and the preceding editions.

Birth and Early Years.—Jerome was born about the year 346. The statement in Prosper's Chronicon, that he was ninety years old in 420, when he died, is contradicted by his own statement (Ep. 52 ad Nepotianum) that he was little more than a boy, in 374, when he wrote to Heliodorus (Ep. 14), and by the fact that he wrote nothing before 370, from which time his literary activity was incessant.

His birthplace was Stridon, a town near Aquileia, but belonging to Pannonia, possibly near Oemona (now Lembac), as is inferred from his familiarity with those living there (Ep. 11 and 12). The town was partially destroyed by the Goths in their invasion in 377 (De Vir. Ill. 132); there remained enough of it twenty years later to make it worth while for Jerome to send his brother to sell their property (semirutas villas, Ep. lvi. 14). But it afterwards disappeared completely.

His parents were Catholic Christians (Pref. to Job), but, according to the custom then common, did not have their son baptized in infancy. The father's name was Eusebius (de Vir. Ill. 132), the mother's name is unknown. They were not very wealthy, but were possessors of houses (Ep. lvi. 4) and slaves (Cont. Ruf. i. c. 30); and they lived in the closest intimacy with the richer family of Bonosus, who was Jerome's foster brother (Ep. iii. 5). They were living in 373, when Jerome first went to the East (Ep. xxii. 30), but, since he never mentions them in later years, it is probable that they died in the Gothic invasion (377), when Stridon was destroyed. He had a brother, Paulinian, some twenty years younger than himself (Ep. lxxii. 8), who from 385 onwards lived constantly with him; a sister who, after Jerome's departure for the East, fell into sin, but was reclaimed by his friend Julianus, and embraced the ascetic life (Ep. 6 and 7); and an aunt, Castorina, to whom he wrote in 375 (Ep. 13) begging for a reconciliation after some estrangement which had occurred between them.

He was brought up in comfort, if not in luxury (Ep. xxiii. 30), and received a good education. He speaks of himself, indeed, as having been an idle boy (Cont. Ruf. i. 30), and as having preferred the company of his father's servants to that of his teachers. On the other hand, he says that he had grown up almost from his cradle among grammarians and rhetoricians. He was in a grammar school when the death of the emperor Julian (363) was announced (Comm. on Habakkuk, b. i. c. 10), and though it is possible that the school may have been at his native place, it is more probable that it was at Rome. If so, he must have left his home when about seventeen years old. Certainly it was not much later than this that he was sent to complete his education at Rome.

Rome—Baptism.—He went there with his friend Bonosus; and, since they left Rome together, and were living in the same house when Rufinus first knew them, it is probable that they lived together in Rome. The chief study of those days was rhetoric, and the chief teacher of it at Rome was Victorinus (q. v.). But Jerome's teacher was Aelius Donatus (Cont. Ruf. i. 16; Comm. in Eccles. c. i. p. 390), whom he speaks of with great respect. Jerome applied himself to this study diligently, not only practising rhetorical declamations (Cont. Ruf. i. 30), and following the studies bearing upon it (Ep. l. 1), but attending the law courts and hearing the best pleaders (Comm. on Gal. ii. 13). In the early part of his stay at Rome, he lived irregularly and fell into sin (Ep. vi. 4, xiv. 6, xlviii. 20). But he was drawn back, and finally cast in his lot with the Christian church. He describes how on the Sundays he was accustomed, with other young men of like age and mind with himself, to visit the tombs of the martyrs in the Catacombs (Comm. in Ezek. c. 40, p. 468); and this we may regard as indicating a serious bent, which culminated in his baptism, which he received in Rome while Liberius was pope, that is before the year 366. (See, however, Ep. iii. 5, which speaks of his true Christian life as beginning after his Roman studies.) It is probable that this serious bent and his baptism only intensified his pursuit of knowledge. Rufinus reminds him (Ruf. Apol. ii. 9) that before his conversion he was entirely ignorant of Greek. Yet we find him studying logic in the works of Porphyry (Ep. l. 1), and he was certainly in later life conversant with a large range of classical Greek authors (Ep. ix. 5), though he professed to have left off reading the works of heathen writers after the year 374 (Ep. xxii.). He also while in Rome acquired a considerable library (Ep. xxii. 30), which he afterwards carried with him wherever he went.

Gaul.—On the termination of his studies in Rome he determined to go with Bonosus into Gaul, though with what purpose is unknown. Before doing so it is probable that they returned home, and also that they lived together for a time in Aquileia, or some other town in the north of Italy. Certainly they at this time made the acquaintance of Rufinus (Ep. iii. 3), and that friendship began between him and Jerome which afterwards turned out so disastrously to both (see Augustine to Jerome, Ep. cx.). Hearing that they were going into Gaul, the country of Hilary, Rufinus begged Jerome to obtain and copy for him the commentary of that renowned bishop on the Psalms and his book upon the Councils (Ep. v. 2); and this among other things may have contributed to give Jerome his tendency towards ecclesiastical literature, which was henceforward the main pursuit of his life. This vocation declared itself during his stay in Gaul. He went with his friend to several parts of Gaul, but stayed longest at Treves, then the seat of government. He relates long afterwards how he saw various strange tribes of Germany and Britain; how also he heard of the fame of Delphidius, the poet and orator (Ep. cxx.). But his mind was occupied with scriptural studies. Besides the work he had promised to do for Rufinus, he made his first attempt at a commentary. It was on the book of the prophet Obadiah, which it interpreted in a mystical sense. It has not come down to us. Jerome himself, indeed, relates how, when he afterwards took that book in hand, he felt ashamed of the ignorance displayed in this early work (Pref. to Comm. on Obadiah).

Aquileia, 370-373.—The friends returned to Italy, passing probably through Liguria, and there, at Vercellae, hearing the story which forms the subject of Jerome's first letter, that of the woman who, after an unjust condemnation, was struck seven times by the axe and yet lived. Eusebius, the bishop of Vercellae, had a few years before returned from his banishment in the East, bringing with him Evagrius, a presbyter (afterwards bishop) of Antioch, who during his stay in Italy had played a considerable part in church affairs (Ep. i. 15). He had access to the emperor Valentinian, and by his entreaties had, as Jerome relates, saved the woman whose life had been wonderfully preserved from a final execution. He seems to have had a great influence over Jerome at this period of his life; and either with him or about the same time with him to have settled at Aquileia. On their way thither, in all probability, they stopped at Concordia, which was the birthplace of Rufinus (Ep. v. 2), and there made acquaintance with the old man, Paulus, a student of Scripture and of ecclesiastical books, who had stories of Cyprian and Tertullian to tell them (Ep. 10; De Vir. III. 53). Jerome and Bonosus, no doubt, returned to Stridon; but for the next few years of Jerome's life the chief scene of interest is at Aquileia. There was gathered there a company of young men, all of them devoted to sacred studies and to the ascetic life. It comprised the presbyter Chromatius (afterwards bishop of Aquileia), and his brother Eusebius, with Jovinus the archdeacon; Rufinus, Bonosus, Heliodorus (afterwards bishop of Altinum), the monk Chrysogonus, and the subdeacon Niceas, and Hylas, the freedman of the wealthy Roman lady Melania; all of whom we meet with later in this history. They were knit together by the closest friendship and by their common pursuits; and the presence of Evagrius, with his accounts of the holy places and hermitages of the East, gave a special direction to their ascetic tendencies. Jerome found little sympathy for these tendencies in his own city. He complains (Ep. vii. 5) that the people were immersed in worldliness; and that the bishop, Lupicinus, took part against him (Ep. vi. 4); and this probably led to his living constantly at Aquileia. There for a time all went well. The baptism of Rufinus took place at this time (Ruf. Apol. i. 4). Jerome, at the request of his friend Innocentius, made his first attempt at descriptive writing in the narrative of the woman seven times struck with an axe (Ep. i.), the style of which already shews great excellence, though it is marked by the credulity which is also characteristic of his writings. But the company of friends was suddenly broken up. It was Jerome's fortune to become, wherever he lived, the object of great affection, but also of great animosity. Whatever may have been the cause of the trouble which he speaks of as "subitus turbo, impia avulsio" (Ep. iii. 3), it was the means of dispersing the society at Aquileia. It is possible that this was an instance of the dislike of the secular clergy to the monastic tendency (Thierry), or that Jerome's letter to Innocentius, which represents the consular of the province in an unjust and bloodthirsty character, may have aroused the anger of the holder of that office (Zöckler, p. 40), who, however, at this moment was none other than the good and just Ambrose (made bishop in 374). See in connexion with this Jerome's expressions of dislike of Ambrose, in Pref. to Trans. of Origen on Luke, vol. vii. 245; Pref. to Did. de Sp. S. vol. ii. 106, quoted by Ruf. Apol. ii. 22-29.

Antioch, 374.—The friends who had lived together went (probably early in 373) in different directions. Bonosus retired to an island in the Adriatic, and lived the life of a hermit (Ep. vii. 3). Rufinus went to the East, in the train of Melania. Jerome, with Heliodorus, Innocentius, and Hylas, accompanied Evagrius to Palestine. Leaving his parents, his sister, his relations, his home comforts (Ep. xxii. 30), but taking with him his library, he travelled through Thrace, Pontus, Bithynia, Galatia, Cappadocia and Cilicia, to Antioch. The journey was exhausting, and Antioch appeared to him like a haven of rest (Ep. iii. 3). But they were not to enjoy it long. Jerome had a long period of ill-health, culminating in a fever. Innocentius and Hylas were attacked by the same fever and died. Heliodorus went to Jerusalem, where he was the guest of Florentius (Ep. iv.), and on his return (about Easter, 374) found Jerome alone with Evagrius (Ep. iii. 3), slowly regaining his strength. During his illness, of which a description is given in his celebrated letter to Eustochium (Ep. xxii. 30), Jerome had had his bent towards scriptural studies and the ascetic life confirmed. While his friends stood by his bed expecting his death, he felt himself, in a trance, carried before the throne of God, and condemned as being no Christian but a Ciceronian, who preferred worldly literature to Christ. On the intercession of the saints around the throne a respite was given him, but he was beaten with many stripes, which he felt as though they were real for many days; and he made a vow that he would study profane literature no more. This vow was not literally observed. Jerome read the classics both at Rome and Bethlehem, and spoke of his vow as having no more force than any other fancy of a dream. Yet at one time he declared that for fifteen years he had never taken up a classical book. It must be admitted that his language on this point is open to the charge of equivocation, which his enemies converted into absolute perjury. (Compare Ep. xxi. 13, with Pref. to Comm. on Gal. b. iii.; and the facts stated by Rufinus, Apol. ii. 8, p. 363, with Jerome's faint excuses, Apol. i. 30, 31, ii. 32.) From this time, though he continued to quote the classics profusely, his literary interest was wholly with the Bible and church writings. Evagrius had a property at Maronia, thirty miles from Antioch, and while staying there, probably for the recovery of his health, he met the hermit Malchus (q.v.), whose strange history afterwards recounted by Jerome (Vita Malchi, vol. ii. 41) confirmed his desire for the solitary life. He wrote to Rufinus, who was then expected at Jerusalem (Ep. iii. iv.), but received no answer. It is possible that he made some beginning of serious studies, and that this is the time at which he was a pupil of Apollinaris (Ep. lxxxiv. 4). But it seems more likely that, as soon as his health was restored, he determined to embrace the solitary life. He wrote to Theodosius (Ep. ii.), who seems to have been a kind of chief of the hermits in the desert of Chalcis, asking to be received among them, and he endeavoured to persuade Heliodorus to accompany him. But Heliodorus felt a vocation to the pastoral rather than the solitary life, and his widowed sister and her son Nepotianus were left to his care; he determined, therefore, to return to Aquileia, and Jerome went alone into the desert, about the autumn of 374.

Desert, 374-379.—He was now about twenty-eight years old. The desert of Chalcis, where he now lived for some four or five years, was in the country of the Saracens, in the east of Syria (Ep. v.). It was peopled by hermits, who, though they lived mainly in solitude, had frequent intercourse among themselves, and some little with the world. They were under some kind of rule or discipline, under the authority of a ruling presbyter named Marcus (Ep. xvii.), as the monks of Nitria, afterwards visited by Jerome and Paula, were under their bishop Isidore. Jerome lived in a cell, and gained his own living (Ep. xvii. 3); probably, according to the recommendation he gives at a later time to Rusticus (Ep. cxxv.), cultivating a garden, and employed in manual occupations like the making of baskets of rushes, or, more congenially, in copying books. He describes his life in his letter to Eustochium (Ep. xxii. 7), written nine or ten years later, as one of spiritual struggles. "I sat alone; I was filled with bitterness: my limbs were uncemely and rough with sackcloth, and my squalid skin became as black as an Ethiopian's. Every day I was in tears and groans; and, if ever the sleep which hung upon my eyelids overcame my resistance, I knocked against the ground my bare bones, which scarce clung together. I say nothing of my meat and drink, since the monks even when sick use cold water, and it is thought a luxury if they ever partake of cooked food. Through fear of hell, I had condemned myself to prison; I had scorpions and wild beasts for my only companions,

... My face was white with fasting, my body was cold; the man, within his own flesh, was dead before his time." He describes in the same letter his mental conflicts, the sinful pleasures which crowded upon his imagination, his prayers for deliverance, his spiritual ecstasies. But his literary talent was by no means idle during this period. He wrote several letters to his friends in Italy, and to Florentius at Jerusalem (Ep. v. to xvii.), including that to Heliodorus (xiv.) on the Praises of the Desert, in which he chides his friend for not having embraced the perfect life of solitude. He composed the life of Paulus the first hermit (vol. ii. 1.), and sent it to the namesake of the hermit, his old friend Paulus at Concordia (Ep. 10.); he had his library with him, and some young men about him who could copy manuscripts (Ep. v. 2.); his letters to Florentius shew that he was eagerly pursuing his studies; he found a Jew who had become a Christian, and took him for his instructor in Hebrew (Ep. xviii. 10.), and he obtained from some member of the sect of the Nazarenes at Beroea the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which he copied, and afterwards translated into Greek and Latin (De Vir. Ill. 2, 3.) He was frequently visited by Evagrius (Ep. vii. 1.), who also acted as the intermediary of his communication with his friends in Aquileia, and, later, with Damasus at Rome (Ep. xv. 5.)

But, as we have observed, it was Jerome's fortune, due chiefly to his vehement feelings and expressions, to make enemies. As it had been at Aquileia, as it was afterwards at Rome and at Bethlehem, so it was in the desert. He was driven away by the ill-will of his brother-monks. At first, as we see from his letter to Heliodorus (14), he was satisfied with his condition; but his last years in the desert were embittered by theological strife, from which he was at last glad to escape. The strife related to the conflicts in the church at Antioch. There the episcopal throne was contested by three bishops, Vitalis the Arian, Meletius, who, though he had received consecration from the Arians, was acknowledged by Basil and the orthodox bishops of the East (Basil, Ep. 156., to Evagrius), and Paulinus, who was supported by pope Damasus and the stronger anti-Arian party of Rome. Between Meletius and Paulinus the dispute was mainly verbal, but it was not the less bitter. The Meletians spoke of three substances and one essence, the Paulinians of three persons and one substance. Jerome complains that the Meletians were not content with his holding the truth, but treated him as a heretic if he did not do so in their words (Ep. xv. 3.) He appealed to Damasus, both about the doctrinal question and about the dispute between the bishops at Antioch, with strong protestations of his submission to the see of Rome (Ep. 15, 16.) But finding his position more and more difficult, he wrote to Marcus, the chief presbyter of the monks (Ep. 17.), in the winter of 378, professing his soundness in the faith, declaring that since he had become a subject of discord, he was ready, but for illness, to depart, and begging that the hospitality of the desert might be extended to him till the winter was past.

Antioch, 379.—Accordingly, in the spring of 379 he returned to Antioch, and stayed there till the next year. There he definitely united himself to the party of Paulinus, and was by him ordained presbyter. The ordination was against his will, and he never consecrated the sacrament or officiated as a presbyter, as appears from many passages in his works, especially from the whole controversy relating to his brother, Paulinianns, who was ordained on account of the unwillingness of Jerome to officiate (Contra Joan. Jerus. 41 and Epiphanius's letter, among Jerome's, li.). It was probably at this time that he studied under Apollinarius of Laodicea, guarding himself, however, against what he calls his contentious dogmatism (Ep. lxxxiv. 4.) No letters of this year have come down to us, and the only extant work of the period is the dialogue of an orthodox man with a Luciferian. Lucifer of Cagliari having taken part in the appointment of Paulinus, a corrective was needed for the more extreme among the Western party at Antioch; and this was given in Jerome's dialogue, which is clear, moderate, and free from the violence of his later controversial works. It also exhibits a considerable knowledge of church history, and contains the account of the council of Ariminum, with the famous words (c. 19.): "Ingeniuit totus orbis est Arianum se esse miratus est."

Constantinople, 380, 381.—In 380 Jerome went to Constantinople, and remained there till the end of the following year. He placed himself under the instruction of Gregory Nazianzen, who had taken charge of the orthodox church in the capital in 379, and from the frequent allusions to him in his works seems to have profited greatly from his master's mode of interpreting Scripture. He calls him "præceptor meus" (De Vir. Ill. 117.), and appeals to his authority in his commentaries and letters (Comm. on Ephes. v. 3.; ep. l. 1, lii. 8, &c.). He was also acquainted with Gregory of Nyssa (De Vir. Ill. 128.) He was attacked, while at Constantinople, with a complaint in the eyes, arising from overwork, which caused him to dictate the works which he now wrote. This practice afterwards became habitual to him (Pref. to Comm. on Gal. b. iii.), though he did not wholly give up writing with his own hand; and he contrasts the imperfections of the works which he dictated with the greater elaboration which he was able to give when he himself wrote, and was able frequently to turn the stylus. He wrote no letters during this period; but his literary activity was great. He translated the Chronicle of Eusebius, a large work, which embraces the chronology from the creation of the world to the year A.D. 330. To this Jerome added the events of the 50 years, 330-380. He also translated the Homilies of Origen on Jeremiah and Ezekiel, possibly also those in Isaiah, and wrote a short treatise for Damasus on the interpretations of the Seraphim in Is. vi., which is improperly placed among the letters (18). These works mark the epoch at which he began to feel the importance of Origen as a church-writer, though daring even then to differ from him in doctrine, and also to realise the imperfections of the existing versions of the Scriptures. In the treatise on the Seraphim, and again in the preface to the Chronicle, we find him comparing and contrasting the various Greek versions of the Old Testament in the manner which eventually forced on him the necessity of a translation direct from the Hebrew. The Chronicle was dedicated to Vincentius and Gallienus. Of Gallienus we know nothing more, though he was dear to Jerome, who calls him "pars animae meae." But Vincentius became his companion, the sharer of his journeys to Rome and to the East, and of his residence at Bethlehem. What his relations were to the council of Constantinople in 381 we do not know. He never mentions it in his writings, unless the doubtful words, "Quum Orientis atque Occidentis synodicis consultationibus responderem" (Ep. cxliii. 10) can be taken as alluding to it; but these tell us nothing. Illness, or study, or his relation to Apollinarius, sealed his lips as to an assembly in which the president and the accused were his teachers, and his bishop's cause was at issue. It is certain, however, that the pope Damasus desired his presence in Rome (Ep. cxvii. 7, cxliii. 10) at the council of 382, which reviewed the acts of the council of Constantinople, and that he went there with Vincentius in the train of the bishops Paulinus of Antioch and Epiphanius of Constantia (Salamis) in Cyprus (Ep. cxvii. 7).

Rome, 381-385.—Bible-Work.—His stay in Rome, from the spring of 382 to August 385, was a very eventful and decisive period in his life. He made many friends and many enemies; his knowledge and reputation as a scholar greatly increased; and his experience of Rome determined him to give himself irrevocably and exclusively to the life of monasticism and of sacred study. Some writers, indeed, have supposed that he was appointed secretary to Damasus, and also that his position in the Roman hierarchy was such as to make him the destined successor of the pope. But his expression, "Quum in chartis ecclesiasticis juvarem Damasum" (Ep. cxliii. 10), relates rather to learned studies, and though he says (Ep. xlv.) that at one time the regards of the whole city were fixed on him, this does not imply that he had to do with the ecclesiastical administration. He was, however, present at the council, as appears from the story of the MS. of Athanasius which he relates (Cont. Ruf. ii. 20). He had produced it to shew that certain words were used by Athanasius in a particular sense. During the night one of his opponents, having gained access to the MS., scratched out the words, and then rewrote them, so that it might appear that they were not the original words of Athanasius. With this exception we hear nothing of Jerome's action in the council, although the affairs of the Syrian churches, with which he was most connected, occupied so much of his attention. He was preoccupied with the two great objects of his life, scriptural study and the promotion of asceticism. In the first of these departments, he undertook, at the request of Damasus, a revision of the version of the Psalms (vol. x. col. 121). He translated from the Septuagint; and his new version was used in the Roman church from that time till the Pontificate of Pius V. He then, also at the request of Damasus, revised the New Testament, of which the old Versio Italica was very defective. The preface addressed to Damasus (vol. x. col. 557) is a good critical document, pointing out that the old version was changed at the will of transcribers, and asking, "If any one has the right version, which is it?" It was intended as a preface to the Gospels only; but from the record of his works given in the list of ecclesiastical writers (De Vir. Ill. 135), which states that he had restored the New Testament according to the original Greek, as well as from other passages (e.g. Ep. xxvii. 3), it is natural to infer that the whole version was completed (see Vallarsi's preface to vol. i.; also Smith's DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, art. VULGATE). He also, at the request of Damasus and others, wrote many short exegetical treatises, which are included among his letters (on Hosanna, 19, 20; on the Prodigal Son, 21; on the Old Testament Names of God, 25; on Halleluia and Amen, 26; on Sela and Diapsalma, 28; on Ephod and Seraphim, 29; on the Alphabetical Psalms, 30; on "The Bread of Carefulness," 34). He began also his studies on the original of the Old Testament by collating the Greek versions of Aquila and the LXX with the Hebrew (Ep. 32, and xxxvi. 12), and was further confirmed by this process in the convictions which led to the Vulgate version. He translated for Damasus the Commentary of Origen on the Song of Songs (vol. i. p. 500), and began the translation of the work of Didymus, the blind Origenistic teacher of Alexandria, on the Holy Spirit. This last work he did not complete till after his settlement at Bethlehem. It was broken off from a cause which probably prevented his continuing the translation of Origen's Commentaries, begun at Constantinople, namely, the increasing suspicious and enmity of the clergy and people, whom he speaks of as the senate of the Pharisees, against all that had any connexion with Origen (Pref. to Didymus on the Holy Spirit, vol. ii. 105). Jerome's relation to Origen will be dwelt upon afterwards; but it should be mentioned that at this time he was his vehement champion, and the contemptuous opponent of his impugners. "The city of Rome," he says, "consents to his condemnation, . . . not because of the novelty of his doctrines, not because of heresy, as the dogs who are mad against him now pretend; but because they could not bear the glory of his eloquence and his knowledge, and because, when he spoke, they all were thought to be dumb" (Ep. xxxiii. 4).

Asceticism.—The other chief object of Jerome's life, the promotion of asceticism, increased this enmity, although, like the study of Scripture, it made great advances during his stay at Rome. It was nearly fifty years since Athanasius (334) had, during his banishment at Rome, sown the seeds of asceticism by bringing with him the monk Peter, and by the accounts given by him and his companion of the monasteries of Nitria and the Thebaid. The declining state of the empire in these fifty years had predisposed men to the twin, though opposite, growths of despair, selfish luxury and monasticism. Epiphanius, with whom Jerome now came to Rome, had been trained by the hermits Hilarion and Hesychas (qq. v.); he was, with Paulinus, the guest of the wealthy and noble lady, Paula (Ep. cviii. 5), the heiress of the Aemilian race; and thus Jerome was introduced to this lady, who became the friend of his life and his chief support in his labours. She had three daughters, Blesilla, whose death, after a short and austere widowhood, was so eventful to Jerome himself; Julia Eustochium, who first among the Roman nobility took the virgin's vow, and Paulina, who married Jerome's friend Ippamachus. These formed part of a circle of ladies, who gradually drew more closely round the ascetic teacher of scriptural lore. Among these were

Marcella (q. v.), whose house on the Aventine was their meeting-place, with her young friend Principia (Ep. 127); her sister, the recluse Asella, the confidant of Jerome's complaints on leaving Rome (Ep. 45); Lea, who was already the head of a kind of convent, and whose sudden death was announced whilst the friends were reading the Psalms (Ep. 23); Furia (q. v.), the descendant of Camillus, sister-in-law to Blesilla, and her mother Titiana; Marcellina and Felicitas, to whom Jerome's last adieus were sent on leaving Rome (Ep. 45); perhaps also, though she is not named till later, the enthusiastic Fabiola, less steady, but more eager than the rest (Ep. 77). These noble ladies, all of the highest patrician families, were already disposed to the ascetic life. The contact of the Eastern bishops added to this a special interest in Palestine; and the presence of Jerome confirmed both these tendencies. He became the centre of a band of friends, who, withdrawn from the political and social life which they regarded as hopelessly corrupt, gave themselves to the study of Scripture and to works of charity. They knew Greek, and they learned Hebrew that they might sing the Psalms in their original language; they learned by heart the writings of their teacher (Ep. lxxvii. 9); they held daily meetings in which he expounded to them the Scriptures (Ep. xxiii. 1); and he wrote for them many of his exegetical treatises above-mentioned. The principles which Jerome instilled into their minds are to be seen in many of his letters written at this time, which, as soon as they issued from his pen, were copied and caught up both by friends and enemies. The letter (23) which contrasts the death of Lea with that of the virtuous pagan consul, Vettius Agorius Praetextatus, the one receiving a crown, the other being undoubtedly in Tartarus; the letter (24) which praises Asella's resolution, persevered in for twelve years, in favour of the single and recluse life; the letters on the sickness (38) and death (39) of Blesilla; those to Marcella on Montanism (41) and Novatianism (42); the letters of thanks to Eustochium (31) and to Marcella (44) for presents; the letters to Paula (33) in praise of Origen and to Marcella (27 and 40) in defence of his scriptural studies and other writings, exhibit, even in their titles, his relation to this circle of friends and the direction of his influence. But the treatise which above all others serves to characterize his teaching at this time, is that addressed to Eustochium on the Preservation of Virginité (22). In this treatise, Jerome's own experience in the desert, his anti-Ciceronian dream at Antioch, his knowledge of the monks of the desert, of whom he gives a valuable description, are turned to account in favour of the virgin and ascetic life; the extreme fear of impurity contrasts strangely with the gross suggestions which every page contains, the over-praise of virginité leads to such a depreciation of the married state, the vexations of which ("uteri tumentes, infantium vagitus") are only relieved by vulgar and selfish luxury, that almost the only advantage allowed to it is that it is the means whereby virgins are brought into the world; and finally, the vivid descriptions of Roman life, the pretended virgins, the avaricious and self-indulgent matrons, the dainty, luxurious, and rapacious clergy, forcible as they are, lose something of their value by their appearance of caricature. Another treatise written during this period, that against the layman Helvidius, the pupil of Auxentius of Milan, on the perpetual virginité of Mary, though its main points are well argued, exhibits the same fanatical aversion to the institution of marriage, combined with a supercilious disregard of his opponent, which was habitual to Jerome. [HELVIDIUS; ANTIDICO-MARIANITÆ.]

Jerome compelled to leave Rome, 385.—A crisis in Jerome's fortunes came with the end of the year 384. Damasus, who had been pope for nearly twenty years, was dying, and amongst his possible successors the name of Jerome could not escape mention, if only to be put decisively aside. He had, as he tells us, on his first coming to Rome, been pointed out as the future pope. (Ep. xlv. 3. "Totius in me urbis studia consonabant, omnium paene judicio dignum summo sacerdotio judicabar.") But he was entirely unfitted in his character and habit of mind for an office which has always required the talents of the statesman and man of the world, rather than those of the student. And he had offended every part of the community. The clergy took to themselves the vivid and undiscriminating satire of the "Treatise on the Keeping of Virginité." The ignorant were suspicious of his literary work, and though his version of the Psalms was used in every church, and his revision of the New Testament was making its way, looked on him, with the prejudices of the ignorant against new learning, as the partisan of Origen, whom the Roman church condemned (Ep. 33). To this were added vile slanders as to his relations with ladies, of whom he declares that he had never so much as been present at their meals; slanders, however, which he did not hesitate to retort upon his opponents (Ep. 50). And the general lay feeling was still strongly opposed to asceticism (Ep. xxvii. 2). At the funeral of Blesilla (Ep. xxxix. 4), the rumour was spread that she had been killed by the excessive austerities enjoined upon her; the violent grief of her mother was taken as a reproach to the ascetic system, and the cry was heard, "The monks to the Tiber!" Jerome, though cautioned by his friends to moderate his language (Ep. xxvii. 2), continued to use the most insulting expressions towards all who opposed him, such as those above quoted from the letter in defence of Origen (xxiii. 4). The only letter which in a single passage shews a certain consciousness of this intemperance of language, says of his opponents in the next paragraph, "I return to these two-legged asses." And the letter which describes the death of Blesilla is followed by that (40) concerning Onasus (an opponent, whose name is connected by Jerome with "Ovos and Nasus"), which shews of what scurrility this great man could be capable. It is not surprising that the judgment of the Roman church should have set him aside as unfitted to be its head, and that Jerome himself should, in his calmer reflections have felt that Rome was ill-suited to him, and that in attempting, with his temper and habits to carry out his conception of Christianity in Rome, he had been vainly trying "to sing the Lord's song in a strange land" (Ep. xlv. 6). Siricius, the successor of Damasus, had no sympathy with Jerome either then or afterward when the Origenistic controversy came on. Th party of friends on the Aventine was broken up. Jerome counsels Marcella (Ep. 44) to leave Rome, and seek some religious seclusion in the country. Paula and Eustochium preferred to go with their teacher to Palestine; and in August, 385, Jerome himself embarked, with all that was dearest to him, at Portus, and in his touching and instructive letter to Asella (45) bade a final farewell to Rome.

Emigration to Palestine.—Jerome was accompanied in his voyage by his brother Paulinian, and his friend Vincentius (Cont. Ruf. iii. 22), and sailed direct to Antioch. Paula and Eustochium (Ep. 108, where all these incidents are narrated), leaving Paulina, then of marriageable age, and her young brother Toxotius, to a world which they were deserting, embarked at the same time, but visited Epiphanius in Cyprus on their way. The friends were reunited at Antioch, as winter was setting in. Paula would brook no delay, and, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season, they started at once for Palestine. They visited Sarepta, Acre, Caesarea, Joppa, Lydda, and Emmaus, and arrived at Jerusalem early in 386. The city was moved at the coming of the noble Roman ladies, and the Proconsul prepared a splendid reception for them in the Praetorium; but they only stayed to see the holy places, and, after visiting the spots of special interest in the south of Palestine, continued their journey into Egypt. There the time was divided between the two great objects of Jerome's life, the study of Scripture and the promotion of asceticism. At Alexandria, he sat, though already grey-haired (Ep. lxxxiv. 3), at the feet of Didymus, the great Origenistic teacher, whom, in contrast to his blindness, Jerome delights to speak of as "the seer." (See in his praises the preface to the commentary on Ephesians.) Jerome had already, as we have seen, translated in part his book on the Holy Spirit; and now, at the request of his distinguished pupil, Didymus composed his Commentary on Hosea and Zechariah (Jerome, Pref. to Hosea, and De Vir. Ill. 109). They were at Alexandria only thirty days, as Rufinus declared (Apol. ii. 12), but Jerome had the faculty of turning to excellent account the short periods of intercourse with his great teachers, such as Apollinaris, Gregory, and Didymus. Suspending for a time their scriptural studies, the friends turned to the monasteries of Nitria, where they were received with great honour. The bishop, Isidore, came out to meet them. They heard all the strange tales of the monks; assisted at all their services; ate their hard fare, and lay in their hard cubicles; their admiration was in no way abated by the fact that these monks were Origenists, though Jerome, in his later anti-Origenistic fervour, declared that he had perceived the serpent lurking among them (Cont. Ruf. iii. 22). Indeed, they at one time were almost persuaded to take up their abode in the Egyptian desert. But the superior attractions of the holy places of Palestine prevailed; and the travellers, sailing from Alexandria to Majoma, the city of Hilarion, the Christian port of the heathen Gaza [HILARION, ITALICUS], settled at Bethlehem, in the autumn of 386. There Jerome lived the remaining thirty-four years of his life, pursuing unremittingly and with the utmost success the two great objects to which he was devoted.

Bethlehem, 386–420.—Jerome's life at Bethlehem may be divided into three parts. The first of these comprises the first six years, 386–392, the time of settlement, and of successful study, uninterrupted by controversy, and ending with his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical writers (De Vir. Ill.), which gives a list of his writings up to this date. The second, from 392 to 404, is the time of strenuous and brilliant energy, including the publication of the Vulgate edition of the Old Testament, and the three great controversies against Jovinian, John of Jerusalem, and Rufinus. The last is the period from 404 to 420, the period of old age, which includes the letters to Augustine, and the commentaries on the greater prophets, the death of his dearest friends, and the sack of Rome by Alaric; a period of comparative repose to Jerome himself, but which closes with the Pelagian controversy, and his last illness and death.

Bethlehem, First Period, 386–392. Monasteries.—The first work of the pilgrims was to establish themselves at Bethlehem. A monastery was built, of which Jerome became the head, and a convent over which Paula presided (Ep. cviii. 14, 19). There was a church in which they met on Sundays, and perhaps oftener (Ep. 147); and a hospice for pilgrims, of which a vast number came from all parts of the world to visit the holy places (Ep. xlvi., lxvi.; Cont. Vigilantium, 13, 14). These institutions were mainly supported by Paula, though, towards the end of her life, when she by her profusion had become poor, their support fell to Jerome, who, for this purpose, sold his estate in Pannonia (Ep. lxvi.). Jerome lived in a cell (Ep. 105, and Cont. Joan. Jerus.), in or close to the monastery, surrounded by his library, to which he made numerous additions, as is shewn by his constant reference to a great variety of authors, sacred and profane, and also by his account of his obtaining a copy of the Hexapla from the library at Caesarea (Comm. on Titus, c. 3, p. 734). He describes himself as living very moderately on bread and vegetables (Ep. lxxxix. 4); he was not, like many monks, neglectful of his person, but recommended a moderate neatness of dress (Ep. liii. 9, lx. 10). We do not read of any special austerities that he imposed upon himself, beyond the fact of his seclusion from the world, which he speaks of as a living in the fields and in solitude, that he might mourn for his sins, and gain Christ's mercy (Cont. Joan. Jerus. 41). He did not officiate in the services, but his time was greatly absorbed by the cares (Ep. cxiv. 1) and discipline (Ep. cxlvii.) of the monastery, and by the crowds of monks and pilgrims who flocked to the hospice (lxvi. 14; Adv. Ruf. i. 31). In the later part of his sojourn, he was charged, if we believe Sulpicius Severus who spent six months with him, with the parish of Bethlehem (Sulp. Sev. Dial. i. 8). But this must have been a nominal charge, the actual duties being performed by others under a very general superintendence from him. Some of those under him had pastoral work of certain kinds even in the earlier years, as is seen from the fact that in the year 393 they had forty persons prepared for baptism (Cont. Joan. Jerus. 42); but Jerome knew that his true vocation did not lie in practical administration, as he shews plainly in the contrast which he draws between his own work and that of a bishop, in his letter to Augustine (112). He expounded the Scriptures daily to the brethren in the monastery, using the version he had made from the LXX as better known and easier, in preference to his later work from the Hebrew (Pref. to Chron. vol. ix. col. 1394; see also Pref. to Hebrew Names, vol. iii. p. 1). He at one time, as is affirmed without contradiction by Rufinus (Apol. ii. 8), had a class of boys or young men, to whom he taught the classics; and it is hardly possible to believe that all the allusions which he makes to classical authors, up to the very close of his life, are from memory, unrefreshed by reading, notwithstanding his assertion that after his anti-Ciceronian dream in 374 he had read the classics no more (Pref. to Comm. on Gall. B. 3). But undoubtedly sacred studies were his main pursuit, and the end of any others, if such there were; and his diligence in these is almost incredible. "He is wholly absorbed in reading," says Sulpicius; "he takes no rest by day or by night; he is ever reading or writing something." He wrote, or rather dictated, with great rapidity. He was believed at times to have composed 1000 lines of his commentaries in a day (Pref. to b. ii. of Comm. on Ephes. in vol. vii. col. 507); certainly he translated the book of Tobit from the Chaldee in a single day (Pref. to Tobit). In times of ill-health he lay on a couch, taking down one volume after another, and dictating to an amanuensis (Ep. lxxiv. 6). He wrote almost daily to Paula and Eustochium (De V. Ill. 135); and, though many of his letters were mere messages, yet he had become so celebrated that almost everything that he wrote was at once caught up and published (Ep. xlix. 2), either by friends or enemies. And this immense literary activity was carried on amidst many interruptions. Besides the ordinary pilgrims, whose numbers, as observed already, were excessive, persons came to him from all parts, whom it was necessary to entertain with special care. Fabiola and Oceanus came to him from Rome (Ep. lxxvii.), Eusebius from Cremona (Pref. to Com. on Matt. vol. vii. 9), Exsuperantius from some unknown place (Ep. cxlv. with note), Orosius from Africa (Oros. de Lib. Arb.), the messengers and scribes of Lucinius from Spain (Ep. lxxi.). Paulinus (Ep. lviii.) and Castrutius (Ep. lxxviii.), the one from Rome, the other from Pannonia, were only hindered, the one by being made a bishop, the other by old age, from coming to reside at Bethlehem. In the case of Fabiola, he records how he had to employ himself in seeking a residence worthy of so great a lady (Ep. lxxvii. 8). And messengers arrived with letters from all parts of the world, which often required long answers, as those to Julianus in Dalmatia (118), to Ctesiphon in Africa (133), to Hebidia in Armorica (133), to Minucius and Alexander in Narbonne (113), to Sunnius and Fretela in Getica (106). He was subject also to more serious interruptions. For a whole year (398) he was ill (Ep. lxxiv. 6, cxiv. 1); and he suffered from a wound in the hand, which prevented him from writing (ibid.). The agitated state of the empire also was felt in the hermitage of Bethlehem. The successive invasions of the Huns (Ep. lxxvii. 8) and the Isaurians (114) created a panic in Palestine, so that in the year 395 ships had to be provided at Joppa to carry away the virgins of Bethlehem, who hurried to the coast, and were ready to embark when the danger passed away. These invasions caused a great lack of means at Bethlehem (Ep. cxiv. 1), so that Jerome and his friends had to sell all that they had to continue the work. Amidst such interruptions the great literary works of the author of the Vulgate were accomplished.

Hebrew Studies.—Immediately on settling at Bethlehem, Jerome set to work to perfect his knowledge of Hebrew. He had the aid of a Jew named Bar Anina (Barabbas he was called by Jerome's adversaries, who conceived that through his Jewish teacher his version of the Bible was tainted with Judaism; see Ruf. Apol. ii. 12). Their interviews took place at night (Ep. lxxxiv.), each being afraid of the suspicions which their intercourse might cause. He also learned the Chaldee, but less thoroughly (Pref. to Daniel, vol. ix. col. 1358). When any unusual difficulty occurred in translation or exposition, he obtained further aid. For the book of Job he paid a teacher to come to him from Lydda (Pref. to Job, vol. ix. col. 1140); for the Chaldee of Tobit he had a Rabbi from Tiberias (Pref. to Tobit, vol. x.). The Chronicles he went over word by word with a doctor of law from Tiberias (Pref. to Chron. in vol. ix.). The great expense of this method of work was no doubt in part defrayed by Paula. At a later time, when his resources failed, Chromatius of Aquileia, and Heliodorus of Altinum, supported the scribes who assisted him (Pref. to Esther, addressed to Chrom. and Hel.).

Bible Work.—The results of his first six years' labours may be thus summed up. The commentary on Ecclesiastes and the translation of the work of Didymus on the Holy Spirit were completed; and commentaries were written on the Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians, Titus and Philemon. The version of the New Testament begun in Rome was revised; a treatise on Psalms x. to xvi. was written; and translations were made of Origen's Commentaries on the Gospel of St. Luke and on the Psalms. Jerome, who had long before felt the great importance for scriptural studies of a knowledge of the localities (Pref. to Chron. vol. x. 423), had turned to account his travels in Palestine in his work on the Names of Hebrew places, mainly translated from Eusebius, and had given to the world what may be called in modern phrase "Chips from his Workshop," in the book on Hebrew proper names, and the Hebrew Questions on Genesis, a work which he seems to have intended to carry on in the other books as a pendant to his translations. And, further, as a preparatory work to the Vulgate, he had revised the Latin version of the Old Testament then current (which was imperfectly made from the LXX), by a comparison of Origen's Hexapla (Pref. to Joshua, vol. ix. 356; Pref. to Chron. vol. ix. col. 1394; Pref. to Job, vol. ix. col. 1142; Ep. 71, ad Lucinium). This work, though not mentioned in the Catalogue (De V. Ill. 135), certainly existed. Jerome used it in his familiar expositions each day (Cont. Ruf. ii. 24). Augustine had heard of it, and asked to see it (Ep. 134, end), but it had, through fraud or neglect, been lost; and all that remains of it is the Book of Job, the Psalms, and the Preface to the Books of Solomon (vol. x.). The Vulgate itself was in preparation, as we find from the Catalogue; but it is evident, from its not being produced for some years afterwards, that what had been done thus far was only a preliminary and imperfect work.

Monkish Writings.—Besides these works on the Scriptures, Jerome had designed a vast scheme of church history, from the beginning to his own time, giving the lives of all the most eminent men; and as a preliminary work to this, and in furtherance of the cause of asceticism, he wrote the two lives of Malchus and Hilarion (qq. v.), the first of whom he had seen at Maronia, near Antioch, and the second had been celebrated throughout Palestine some twenty years before (died 371). The minuteness of detail in these works must have made a church history on such a scale impossible; and the credulity which they shew throws a great doubt on Jerome's capacity for such a work. These lives of the hermits must be regarded not as church history, but as incentives to the ascetic life.

Ascetic Enthusiasm.—In the promotion of this ascetic life he was enthusiastically engaged. It was inseparable with him and his friends from his scriptural studies. The monks and nuns around him made these studies a chief object of their life, and fancied themselves nearer to heaven from being able to read the Scriptures and sing the Psalms in the country where they were written. The letter which Jerome wrote in the name of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella at Rome (Ep. 46), which is the only letter preserved from these first six years, expresses this enthusiastic view of their situation. The crowds who came from all parts seem to them to be so many choirs, engaged in services of praise, each in their own tongue, in whom envy and arrogance are held in abeyance, and asceticism is tempered by kindness of judgment. The very ploughmen chant Hallelujahs. Far from the Babylon of Rome, they associate with the saints of Scripture times, and find in the holy places the gate of heaven. This view of Palestine is always present to Jerome, however much he may have to confess the secularisation of the actual Jerusalem (Ep. lviii. 4); and it makes his biblical work not merely one of learning but of piety.

Catalogue.—A far more important work for the purposes of the church historian than the lives of the hermits just mentioned is the book which is variously called the "Catalogue of Church Writers," the "Book on Illustrious Men," or the "Epitaphion" (though it includes men then living). Some portions of it are taken from Eusebius, but both the design and the greater part of the details are original. It includes the writers of the New Testament, and the church teachers of the East and West up to Jerome's own time. It includes also men who were accounted heretics, and even non-Christians, whose works were of importance to the progress of human thought, like Seneca. For this great liberality it is blamed by Augustine (Jerome, Ep. 112). This work is important also for the student of the life of Jerome, as giving an account of his works up to the year 392, and thus fitly closes the first period of his stay at Bethlehem.

Second Period, 393 to 404. Letters.—The account of our second period, 393 to 404, will be best begun by touching upon some of the more private letters of Jerome, which abound during this period, and which shew us his personal history. The most important of these are the letter (52) addressed to Nepotianus, nephew of his old friend Heliodorus (now bishop of Altinum) on the duties of the clergy and of monks, which, together with the letter to Heliodorus (60) on his nephew's death, gives an interesting view of the pastoral work of the clergy of this period; the letters to Paulinus (53, 58) the Roman senator, afterwards bishop of Nola, deprecating his proposal to come to Palestine, but urging him to give himself to the monastic life, praising his panegyric upon Theodosius, and giving rules for the study of Scripture; the letter of consolation and of exhortation to the maintenance and consecration of widowhood, addressed to Furia (54), one of his former friends in Rome; a letter with a similar purpose to Theodora (75), the widow of the learned Spaniard Lucinius, with which we may connect the letter written a short time before (71) to Lucinius himself, in answer to questions as to the religious life, and to his request that the writers sent by him should be allowed to copy Jerome's works; and that to Abigaus (76), the blind Spanish presbyter, who was closely connected with Salvina, the relation of the emperor Theodosius, to whom Jerome also writes (79), exhorting her to persevere in the estate of widowhood, and shewing how a Christian life may be lived among princes; the letter to Amandus (55), a presbyter either of Rome or of Gaul, which contained a difficult case of conscience, supposed by Thierry to have been left at Bethlehem by Fabiola (q. v.), in 395, but more probably (see Vall. Preface, in Ep. 55) in the year before; the letter to Oceanus (69), defending the ordination of a Spanish bishop, who had been twice married, once before and once after his baptism; the letter to Principia (65), the friend of Marcella and Asella, defending his constant dealings with women; and the letter to Castrutius (68), an old and blind fellow countryman from Pannonia, who had offered to come and see him, but was stopped on the way. To these we must add the letter to Oceanus (77), which records the remarkable life of Fabiola, the letter to Laeta (107), the wife of Toxotius, brother of Eustochium, on the education of her daughter, the younger Paula, who afterwards came to live with her aunt at Bethlehem; and finally, the letter to Eustochium (108), written in 404, immediately after the death of Paula, and giving an account of her saintly life. The remainder of the letters of this period belong to the great controversies which are treated of farther on.

External Difficulties.—To this period belong also several of those disturbing events which have been mentioned above. The invasion of the Huns in 395 created a panic at Bethlehem (Ep. 78). The monasteries were broken up. Jerome hurried with his friends, and with Oceanus and Fabiola, who were then staying with him, to the sea at Joppa, being fearful for the safety of the virgins of Bethlehem; ships were hired, and they were about to embark; when it was suddenly announced that the Huns had changed their course, and, instead of crossing the Lebanon, had turned westward. Jerome finished his letter to Fabiola, who did not return to Bethlehem (64, on the garments of the high priest), while the ropes of the ship were being loosened, and the sailors shouting for the voyage. The health of Jerome at times also broke down. During almost the whole of the year 398 he was ill, and again in 404-5 (Ep. lxxiv. 6, cxiv. 1).

He was disturbed also at this time by the controversy or schism between the monks of Bethlehem and the bishop of Jerusalem; and an injury to his hand prevented his writing. Poverty was also overtaking him. Paula had spent her fortune in a lavish charity, and Jerome, in order to support the monasteries, was forced to send his brother Paulinianus to their former home to sell the remains of the property (Ep. lxxi. 14). The sad episode of the quarrel between Jerome and Rufinus, which began in 394, must be related under the head of the controversies which occupied so much of this period. But before dealing with these, we must recount the more fruitful bible-work of these years.

Commentaries.—Jerome began his commentaries on the Minor Prophets in 391 (De Vir. Ill. 135); they form four books, and were published at long intervals up to 406. In 397 he wrote his commentary on Matthew, the last of those on the New Testament, which was finished as he was recovering from an illness, with great haste and eagerness (Ep. 73, § 10) in Lent 398. Then followed after a long interval the commentary on Isaiah, and from this time he wrote upon the Great Prophets alone. We may add to these commentaries the explanations of particular passages, usually in the form of questions and answers, some of which are, in the older editions, placed with the commentaries, but by Vallarsi among the letters; namely to Amandus (Ep. 55) on the last verse of Matt. vi.; to Marcella (59) in answer to questions on scriptural passages relating to the judgment and the heavenly state; to Fabiola (64) on the dress of the high priest; to Principia (65) on Ps. xlv.; to Vitalis (72) on the difficulties of the chronology of some of the Jewish kings; to Evangelus (73) on Melchizedek; to Rufinus, not of Aquileia (74), on the judgment of Solomon; the treatise (78) written at the request of Fabiola, and sent to Oceanus, after she had died, with the memoir of her life, expounding the halting-places of the Israelites in the desert, as a kind of allegory of the Christian's journey through the world to Paradise; and lastly, the elaborate letter (106) to Sunnias and Fretela, two presbyters in the country of the Getae, in answer to their questions on the text of Scripture in which the reasons are plainly given which induced him to leave the LXX and to translate direct from the Hebrew. We may add to these the letter to Pammachius (57) on the best method of translating, which, though its primary object was to defend a somewhat loose translation of a controversial document (Ep. 51) may be taken as giving the principles which guided him in his great work of the Vulgate translation of the Old Testament.

The Vulgate.—That which we now call the Vulgate, and which is in the main the work of Jerome, was, during his life, the Bible of the learned, and only by degrees won its way to general acceptance. The editio vulgata in use up to his time was a loose translation from the LXX, of which almost every copy varied from the other. At a very early period Jerome had begun to read the Old Testament in the Greek. But here the same difficulty met him. The LXX version was confronted, in Origen's Hexapla, with those of Theodotion, Aquila, and Symmachus, and with two others, called Quinta and Sexta. Where they differed who was to decide? This question is asked by Jerome as early as the preface to the Chronicle of Eusebius (381), and was constantly repeated in defence of his translation, as for instance in the letter just quoted to Lucinius and Fretela. He seems to have distinctly contemplated this work from the moment of his settlement at Bethlehem, and a great deal of the labour of his first years there may be regarded as preliminary to it. It was begun within the first few years. But, in so elaborate a work, it was impossible that the first copies should be perfect. The author, besides his own sense of its importance, had to satisfy both friends and adversaries, who, for different reasons, were critical and exacting. Accordingly, though he states in the catalogue of his works (De Vir. Ill. 135) that he had translated the Old Testament after the Hebrew original, we read of no publication before that time. In the next year (393) he speaks to Pammachius (Ep. 49) of his having sent some portions to Marcella, and says that the rest were kept in his closet (clausa armario), awaiting the judgment that might be pronounced on the sample submitted to his friends. It is probable, therefore, that the whole, or larger part, was gone through at an early date, and that it was given to his friends or to the public after a more mature revision, according as his health or his courage allowed. He distinctly purposed, however, to publish it from the first. In the preface to the first published books, those of Samuel and the Kings, he intimates that he is sending forth the first instalment of a complete work. "Hic Prologus Scripturarum quasi galeatum principium omnibus libris quos de Hebraeo in Latinum vertimus convenire potest." Yet the actual publication of it was made in a fragmentary and hesitating manner. At times he speaks of portions as extorted from him by the earnest requests of his friends (Pref. to Gen. vol. ix. &c.) Some parts of the work he represents as done in extreme haste; the books of Solomon he calls in the preface to them the work of three days (Pref. in vol. ix. col. 1307). Tobit and Judith were each of them the work of a single day. He shews himself in these prefaces extremely sensitive to the attacks to which the work was subject, and speaks of it often as an ungrateful task. In one case (Pref. to Ezra, vol. ix. ed. 1472), he begs his friends to read the work privately and not to publish it. He speaks (Pref. to Joshua, vol. ix. 506) of his wish to get it off his hands, so that he may return to his commentary on the Prophets. In the preface to the last translated book, that of Esther (vol. ix. ed. 1504), he makes no allusion to the fact that he was completing the great work of his life. Of the Apocrypha he translated only parts, and these, as has been shewn above, very cursorily (Pref. to Tobit, vol. x.); but this is due no doubt to his comparative indifference to the Apocrypha, his opinion of which is quoted in Article vi. of the Church of England, from the preface to the Books of Solomon (vol. ix. ed. 1308). But the work was, nevertheless, carried through to completion. The Books of Samuel and the Kings were published first, then Job and the Prophets, then Ezra and Nehemiah, and the Book of Genesis. All these were finished in or before the year 393; but here occurred a break, owing in part, no doubt, to the unsettlement and panic consequent on the invasion of the Huns in 395.

In 396 the work was resumed at the entreaty of Chromatius and Heliodorus, who sent him money for the support of the necessary helpers (notarios et librarios nostros sustentatos, Pref. to Books of Solomon). The Books of Solomon were then completed (398), and the preface indicates an intention to continue the work more systematically. But the ill-feeling excited by his translation made him unwilling to continue it, and his long illness in 398 intervened. He at that date tells Lucinius that he had given his servants the whole except the Octotuch to copy (Ep. xlix. 4). But, from whatever cause, the work was not resumed till the year 403. In this and the ensuing year, the remainder was completed, namely, the four last books of Moses, Joshua and Judges, Ruth and Esther. His friends collected the translations into one volume, and the title of Vulgate, which had hitherto applied to the version before in use (Pref. to Ezek. vol. ix. col. 995, Pref. to Esther, vol. ix. 1503) in time came to belong to an edition which is in the main the work of Jerome.

Controversies.—We now turn to the great controversial works of this period, which occupied a share of Jerome's energies out of all proportion to their importance.

Jovinian.—The first of these was the polemical writing against Jovinian (q. v.). Jovinian was a Roman monk, who had originally been distinguished by his extreme strictness and asceticism, but had worked his way into freer opinions. He put off the monastic dress, and lived like other men. He refused to marry, though maintaining his right to do so, saying that he wished to be free. Whether this was meant, as his adversaries declared, as a selfish freedom or a freedom for devotion to Christian work does not appear. There is no ground, apparently, for the assertion of Jerome and others that he lived for mere luxury, or their insinuations of his encouragement of immorality; but his style of writing in the passage quoted by Jerome (Cont. Jov. i. 2, &c.) is suggestive of vanity and even absurdity. He issued in Rome the work which Jerome combated. It seems to have had some success; and it is said that some who had made vows of virginity were induced by it to marry; but he was condemned by the pope Siricius, and afterwards, going to Milan, was further condemned by Ambrose. Augustine also wrote two letters against him, in which he spoke of other tenets of his than those with which Jerome deals. The book of Jovinian was sent to Jerome about the end of the year 393, and he at once answered it in the two books Contra Jovinianum. Jovinian asserted that virgins, wives, and widows, if faithful, were equal in God's sight, and that eating and fasting were indifferent if accompanied by a thankful spirit; but with these he coupled propositions of a more doubtful, though speculative, character, the indefectibility of those who receive baptism aright, and the final equality of all the saved. As to these last propositions Jerome argued calmly and well, though with something of contempt, of which Jovinian's style was provocative. But with the anti-ascetic propositions he has no patience or moderation. "These," he says, "are the hissings of the old serpent; by these the dragon expelled man from Paradise." He shews no capacity for appreciating the position maintained by Jovinian as to virginity, which was expressed in the words, "Thou art a virgin; be it so; be not puffed up;" but speaks of him as a renegade, and as a dog who has returned to his vomit. The impression made by this violence on the minds of his friends, and on certain bishops to whom the work was shewn (Ep. l. 4) at Rome, was so unfavourable that Pammachius and Domnio wrote to him begging that the work might be modified before publication, and they withheld the copies in their hands till his answer arrived. Jerome wrote two letters to Pammachius and one to Domnio. He argues the whole question, supporting his opinion in his usual manner; he somewhat resents their interposition, and tells them that, as to withholding the books from publication, they might have saved themselves the pains, since they were already published in Palestine. He scoffs at the imputation made against him that his arguments went so far as to throw contempt upon marriage, and says, "If he who criticizes me wishes to know my opinion, tell him that I think that all should have wives who are afraid to sleep alone." This spirit he continued to justify to the last, and when, ten years later, he found opinions similar to those of Jovinian maintained by Vigilantius, he says of the former: "This man, after being condemned by the authority of the Roman church, amidst his feasts of pheasants' and of swine's flesh, I will not say gave up, but belched out his life."

Origenism.—The second great controversy in which Jerome was engaged at this time was that which arose about Origenism, which embraces in its wide sweep Epiphanius, bishop of Cyprus, John, bishop of Jerusalem, Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, St. John Chrysostom, the pope Anastasius, and above all Jerome's former friend, Rufinus; and by which the churches both of the East and the West were long and deeply agitated. It divides itself, as far as Jerome is concerned, into two distinct parts; the first represented by his writing against John of Jerusalem, and extending from 494 to 499, when peace was made between them; the second represented by the three books directed against Rufinus, the first two of which were written in 401, the third in 402.

Jerome's own relation to Origen is not difficult to understand, though it laid him open to the charge of inconsistency. He had become acquainted with his works in the time of his first enthusiasm for Greek ecclesiastical learning, and had recognised him as the greatest name in Christian literature, worthy to compare with the greatest names of classical times (see esp. Ep. 33). The literary interest was to Jerome, then as at all times, more than the dogmatic; he felt himself thoroughly mastered by the genius and learning of the great Alexandrine; and his praise, like his subsequent blame, was without reason or moderation. He spoke with entire commendation not only of his commentaries, but of that section of his writings called the Τόμοι, or Chapters, which included the book περὶ Ἀρχῶν (which may be translated either on first Principles or on the Powers), on which the chief controversy afterwards turned. "In this work," he says (Pref. to trans. of Origen on Jerem. vol. v. col. 611), "he gave all the sails of his genius to the free breath of the winds, and receding from the shore, went forth into the open sea." But it was not the peculiarities of his dogmatic system, but the boldness of his genius that struck the mind of Jerome. From the first he shewed a certain independence; he differs from Origen in the first of his writings which is derived from him (Ep. xviii. de Seraphim et Calculo), when he rejects Origen's interpretation of the seraphim as the second and third persons of the Trinity. Nor did he ever give his adherence to Origen's peculiar system. He quoted without blame in his commentaries even such statements as that about the possible restoration of Satan; but he never gave his personal assent to them. And even when, afterwards, he became a violent opponent of Origenism, he shewed himself capable of discrimination. Not only did he continue to use Origen's commentaries, but in some points of doctrine he commended his exposition. At the very height of the controversy he refers Paulinus (Ep. lxxv.) to the περὶ Ἀρχῶν. His deliberate judgment may best be seen in his letter to Tranquillinus (lxii.), in which he says it is impossible to be wholly his friend or wholly his enemy, and finally bids his friend "to prove all things, and hold fast that which is good;" and in that to Avitus (cxxiv.), which contains a lucid exposition of the impugned parts of the περὶ Ἀρχῶν, adding the warning that those who go into such questions must expect to reach the kingdom of heaven "calciatis pedibus" (ad fin.). It must be allowed, however, that Jerome, with his vehement language, appears in the earlier times as a violent partisan of Origen, and in the later as an equally violent opponent. It must also be allowed that the change has the appearance of being the result, not so much of a great conviction, as of a fear of the suspicion of heresy.

John, Bishop of Jerusalem.—The dispute arose in Origen's own city of Alexandria. A large party of the clergy, and of the monks of Nitria, had a strong bias towards the anti-materialist views of Origen, while the Athanasian party, allied with Rome, tended to bare realism and anthropomorphism. Among the former John (the bishop of Jerusalem) had lived as a monk, while Epiphanius of Cyprus had been connected with Antony and Pachomius, whose influence coincided with the latter of these tendencies. Both Jerome and Rufinus had been, in their ascetic pursuits, allied to the Origenistic party; Rufinus had even shared with them the persecution which the orthodox had endured from the Arian Valens (Ruf. Eccl. Hist. ii. 3), while Jerome had at a later time (386) sat at the feet of the Origenistic teacher Didymus. Theophilus, the bishop of Alexandria, had been originally of the same tendency, but eventually became its violent opponent, and attempted to uproot it by persecution, not only at Alexandria but at Jerusalem, Rome, and Constantinople. During the first year of Jerome's stay at Bethlehem, he was on good terms with both John the bishop and Rufinus, who had been established, with Melania, on the Mount of Olives since 377. John, who was made bishop in succession to Cyril, a few months before the arrival of Jerome and Paula in 386, was on familiar terms with Rufinus whom he ordained, and there is no sign that he was otherwise disposed towards Jerome. Jerome certainly still enjoyed for several years the friendship of Rufinus (Cont. Ruf. iii. 33); and Rufinus entered into Jerome's literary pursuits, and was in communication with the monasteries of Bethlehem; nor is there any sign of a breach between them unless it be found in the fact that Jerome who (A.D. 381) had spoken of Rufinus in his Chronicle as known to the world in the year 380, as "in-signis monachus," did not include him in his catalogue of church writers (A.D. 392). The origin of troubles was the visit to Jerusalem of a certain Aterbius, a vehement anti-Origenist, of whom nothing more is known (Cont. Ruf. iii. 33). He scattered accusations of Origenistic heresy among the foremost persons at Jerusalem, and joining Jerome with Rufinus on account of their friendship, charged them both with heresy. Jerome did not scruple to make a confession of his faith, which satisfied this self-appointed inquisitor; but Rufinus refused to see him, and with threats bade him begone. This seems to have been in 393. In the next year Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, who in his book on the heresies had formally included the doctrines of Origen, visited Jerusalem, and on his visit the strife broke out. [JOANNES OF JERUSALEM.] Jerome recounts in a long letter to Pammachius, written four or five years later (Cont. Joan. Jerus.), the scenes in the Church of the Resurrection, in which Epiphanius's pointed sermon against Origenism was taken as reflecting so directly upon John that the bishop sent his arch-deacon to remonstrate and to stop him; and John on his side, after he had delivered a long sermon against Anthropomorphism, was requested by Epiphanius amidst the ironical applause of the people, to condemn Origenism with the same earnestness; and again, Epiphanius on the breaking up of the assembly came to the monastery at Bethlehem declaring that John was a heretic, and, after a further attempt the same evening to elicit some anti-Origenistic confession from the bishop, finally left his house where he had been entertained, and came out at night to Bethlehem to take up his abode in the monastery. After these scenes, Epiphanius, convinced that John was on the very verge of heresy, advised Jerome and his friends to separate themselves from their bishop; and, that they should not be deprived of the ministrations of the church, provided for them by the ordination of Jerome's brother Paulinian. Paulinian was then somewhat under thirty years old, which was considered the proper age; and he did not wish to be ordained; but Epiphanius, taking him to the monastery of Ad, which he had founded in the diocese of Eleutheropolis, ordained him against his will, even using force to overcome his opposition (Ep. li. 1). Epiphanius, indeed, wrote a letter to John (in Jerome's letters, 51) to explain and defend his action; but this letter was the cause of further mischief. Its tone was not such as to produce reconciliation, since, though kind in its expressions, it seemed to imply that John was at least in some danger of heresy. And Jerome's dealings with it unintentionally increased the evil. He translated it for the benefit of his friend Eusebius of Cremona, who was then staying at Bethlehem, and the translation one day disappeared. Jerome believed that this was done by some one in the pay of Rufinus, and declared (Apol. iii. 4, Ep. lvii.) that Rufinus had justified the fraud. But it is not necessary to believe that such things were done in bad faith, since Jerome says that friends and enemies alike made public whatever he wrote (Ep. xlix. 2). The distinction between private letters and those intended for publication was far slighter than with us (see Cont. Ruf. iii. 38). Rufinus, who had been closely associated with John throughout the visit of Epiphanius, and had received a warning in the letter of Epiphanius (Ep. li. 6), appears, on the same authority, to have circulated the letter at Jerusalem with adverse comments (Ep. lvii.), and thence to have sent it to Rome. Jerome defended his translation, which had been impugned as wrong and disingenuous, and in his letter (57) to Pammachius "on the best method of translating," gave an explanation of his method which is of great importance in estimating his translation of Scripture. He confesses that he had translated Epiphanius's letter somewhat loosely, but upholds the method which gives the actual sense rather than that of a servile literalism; and he gives as an example of his method the words in the letter:—"Ἐδεῖ ἡμᾶς, ἀγαπητέ, μὴ τῇ σῆσει τῶν κλήρων φέρεσθαι, which he had translated, "Oportet nos, dilectissime, clericatus honore non abuti in superbiam." When we find that a serious accusation was made to rest on so slight a ground, we may rightly be sceptical in receiving the charges of mistranslation and falsification which were afterwards levelled against each other by Jerome and Rufinus.

John now appealed against Jerome and his friends as schismatics, to Alexandria and to Rome, and Theophilus of Alexandria at once took his side. He is said by Palladius (Vit. Chrys. c. 16) to have written to Siricius of Rome complaining of Epiphanius as an Anthropomorphite. He certainly sent his trusted and confidential emissary, Isidore, whom he afterwards treated as his bitterest enemy, to attempt to heal the dispute. But the mission was without effect. It appears that Jerome had been in communication with Theophilus (Ep. lxiii. 1), and, though Theophilus did not reply (ibid.), he was probably already meditating the change which made him within a few years the implacable enemy of Origenism. At all events, Isidore had no credentials to shew at Jerusalem; and a letter which he wrote to John, which shewed that he was coming as a mere partisan to take his side, was brought by mistake to Vincentius, Jerome's friend, and kept by him (Cont. Jo. Jer. 37). Jerome, therefore, while receiving Isidore with all civility, disregarded his authority, and the dispute or schism continued for about four years. Rufinus, indeed, being about to return to Italy in the company of Melania, made peace with his old friend before starting. We may take this to have been a sincere reconciliation, though it did not stand the test of later misunderstanding. As a pledge of their friendship they received the sacrament together in the Church of the Resurrection, and Jerome accompanied his friend some distance on his journey (Cont. Ruf. iii. 33). But there was as yet no sign of agreement between Jerome and the bishop of Jerusalem. The count Archelaus, then the governor of Palestine, attempted to heal the discord, and asked them to an interview; but though Jerome and a large number of monks assembled on the appointed day, John declared himself unable to come (Cont. J. Jerus. 39). The alienation reached such a point that John forbade the monks of Bethlehem all access to the holy places, and even refused baptism to their catechumens and burial to their dead (Cont. J. J. 43). Jerome records that at the Easter of 398 as many as forty persons who had been prepared for baptism by his monks had to go to Diospolis to receive that Sacrament (Cont. J. J. 42). He also declares that John had threatened with excommunication any one who should say that the ordination of Paulinian was valid. He also affirms that John sought, by inciting against him the prefect Rufinus (potentissimam illam feram totius orbis cervicibus imminuentem) to procure the banishment of Jerome (Cont. J. J. 43, Ep. lxxxii. 10). Yet there was no complete excommunication. Jerome states plainly that presbyters of the diocese of Jerusalem still came to the monastery, and that through them he still communicated with the bishop (Ep. lxxxii. 11, ad Theoph.); and this was very nearly at the close of the dispute, which passed away as suddenly as it arose. Theophilus, who had now undergone his great change, opened communication with Jerome, of which Jerome gladly availed himself, excusing himself for having received one Paulus, who had been expelled from his bishopric by Theophilus (Cont. Ruf. iii. 17), and feeling himself able to stand his ground against John, whom he still speaks of somewhat angrily (Ep. 82). Theophilus put an end to the dispute, wishing, no doubt, to have the aid of Jerome in his anti-Origenistic campaign. The letter of Jerome against John of Jerusalem was abruptly broken off, and appears never to have been published; it was certainly unknown to Rufinus when, some years later, he wrote against Jerome. Paulinian, who had gone to Epiphanius in Cyprus (Cont. J. J. 44), returned to Bethlehem; and from this time forward there was peace. Soon after (Ep. lxxxvi.) we find Jerome commending a pastoral of Theophilus, and even interceding with him for his bishop, who, by receiving one expelled by Theophilus, had incurred some of that wrath which fell so heavily on Chrysostom. Jerome was from this time the minister of Theophilus in his communication with the West in the war against Origen. The series of letters (86 to 96) shew the progress of the movement. Jerome writes to encourage Theophilus; Theophilus writes to inform him that he has condemned the heresy. Jerome translates the pastoral letters of Theophilus to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus, and their replies, which affirm his condemnation of Origen; and the series closes with the letter of the new pope, Anastasius, who had been brought by Jerome's friends to condemn Origenism, to Simplicianus, the bishop of Milan, in which he states that he has been led to take this course by the passages of Origen pointed out to him by Jerome's friend Eusebius of Cremona. Later on we find Jerome so completely one with Theophilus as to allow himself to translate the diatribe of that prelate against Chrysostom (see Ep. 113, 114, and the fragments of Theophilus's letter in Facundus Herimianensis, lib. vi. c. 5, Migne's Patr. lxvii. 676). So completely did he give himself into the hands of the anti-Origenistic party.

Rufinus.—Meanwhile another controversy was being prepared, the parties to which were never reconciled. Rufinus, when he arrived in Rome with Melania in 397, found the interest in Origenism at its height. The pope Siricius, who had been elected when Jerome left Rome, was not disposed to condemn Origen. Jerome even complains that he had been cajoled by some of the Origenistic party (Ep. 127), and men's minds were in uncertainty. Their ignorance on the subject was so great that Anastasius, who succeeded Siricius, even though he was induced to condemn Origen, yet plainly admitted in his letter to John of Jerusalem (Jerome, ii. 677, Vallarsi's Rufinus, [Migne's Patr. xxi.] 408) that he knew neither who he was nor what he had written. The more serious minds, therefore, welcomed gladly any one who from his knowledge of Greek could enlighten them as to this great but mysterious personage, who was in all men's mouths, but whom no one knew. Rufinus was asked by a pious man named Macarius to give an exposition of Origen's tenets, and to satisfy this requirement he made the translation of the περὶ Ἀρχῶν, which is now published in Origen's works, and is the only extant version. This translation was from the moment of its publication, and even before its publication, the subject of dispute. Rufinus declared that Jerome's friend, Eusebius of Cremona, with whom he was then on terms of familiarity, surreptitiously gained possession of a copy of it, and subjected it to unfavourable criticism (Cont. Ruf. iii. 4). Jerome's friends, on the other hand complained that Rufinus had given a version of his author which was falsely favourable to him. He himself declares that he had only used the just freedom of a critic and translator in omitting passages which had been interpolated by heretics, with a view to make Origen speak their views, and in translating Eastern thoughts into Western idioms. Jerome could not rightly complain of a freedom of translation; he had himself used similar methods, and had even commended Ambrose's translation of the Hexameron, as having been so put together that he appeared rather to have followed the opinions of Hippolytus and of Basil (Ep. lxxxiv. 7). But the real complaint against Rufinus rested on personal grounds. He had prefixed to his translation a preface, in which he had called to mind that a great teacher had already translated many of Origen's works, and had praised him highly, and thus he seemed to associate Jerome with his work, and to shield himself under his authority. Jerome and his friends, being extremely sensitive of the least reproach of heresy, and having already taken a strong part against Origen, trembled for his reputation. Rufinus's preface was sent to him by Pammachius and Oceanus, with the request (Ep. lxxxii.) that he would point out the truth, and would translate the περὶ Ἀρχῶν as Origen had written it. Jerome yielded to their request, and accompanied his new translation with a long letter (84) to his two friends. This letter, though making too little of his former admiration for Origen, yet in the main states the case fairly, and without any asperity towards Rufinus. And the same may be said of his letter (81) to Rufinus himself, possibly in answer to one written to him by Rufinus (diu te Romae moratum sermo proprius indicavit), which speaks of their reconciliation, and remonstrates, as a friend with a friend, against the mention Rufinus had made of him. "There are not many," he says in conclusion, "who can be pleased with feigned praise" (fictis laudibus). This letter, unfortunately, did not reach Rufinus. He had gone to Aquileia with the ordinary commendation (literae formatae) from the pope. Siricius had died; his successor, Anastasius, was in the hands of Pammachius and Marcella (Ep. 127), who were moving him to condemn Origen. Anastasius, though entirely ignorant on the whole subject, was struck with the passages shewn to him by Eusebius in Jerome's translation of the περὶ Ἀρχῶν, which had been given him by Marcella (Ruf. Apol. II.), and proceeded to a condemnation of Origen. He also was persuaded to write to Rufinus [Rufinus (Migne's Patrologia, xxi.) 403], demanding that he should come to Rome and make a confession of his faith; and to John of Jerusalem, expressing his fear as to Rufinus's intentions and his faith (see the letter in Jerome's works, ii. 677, Rufinus, 408). Jerome's friends went further. They kept the letter he had written to Rufinus in their own hands, so that he was prevented from learning Jerome's actual dispositions towards him. He only knew that Jerome's friends were in some way involving him in the condemnation which they had procured against Origen, and which the emperors themselves had now ratified (Anastasius to John, as above). To Anastasius therefore he replied in a short letter, in which he excuses himself from coming to Rome, but gives an explicit declaration of his faith. But from Jerome his mind was wholly alienated. He met Eusebius of Cremona at Milan, in the presence of the new bishop, Venerius, whom, as the successor of Simplicianus, the pope had requested to coincide in the condemnation of Origen; and when Eusebius read to the bishop the passages condemned in Jerome's version of the περὶ Ἀρχῶν, which he had received from Marcella, he exclaimed, and closed his ears against the misrepresentation and the judgment founded upon it. (Compare the scene in Ruf. Apol. i. 19, with the statement in Jer. Apol. iii.) His friend, Apronianus, at Rome having sent him the letter of Jerome to Pammachius and Oceanus, he replied in the document which is called his Apology, in which all his bitter feelings against his former friend broke out. He did not scruple to use against him the facts known to him through their former intimacy, such as the vows made in consequence of his anti-Ciceronian dream, which he declared Jerome to have broken, and he allowed himself to join in the narrow and carping spirit in which Jerome's enemies spoke against his translation of the Scriptures. This document was privately circulated among Rufinus's friends at Rome. It became partly known to Pammachius and Marcella, who, not being able to obtain a copy, sent him the description they had gathered of its contents, with such quotations as they could procure. Jerome at once composed the two first books of his Apology in the form of a letter to his Roman friends. The tone of this work is that of one not quite willing to break through an old and reconciled friendship, but strong in its language, and at times contemptuous. Its chief value consists in the numerous personal details which it contains. In the first book Jerome defends himself against the charge of having adopted those tenets of Origen which had now been condemned throughout the world, and also against the charge of having returned to the study of the classics after swearing to give them up. He declares that even in such passages as that in his Commentary on Eph. iv. 16 (vol.

v. 620), where he gives as an instance of the restitution which may be expected, "Ut angelus refuga id incipiat esse quod creatus est," he did not intend to adopt Origen's views as his own; and that, when he quoted the classics, it was entirely from memory. Yet he gives no denial to Rufinus's assertion that he taught the classics to boys at Bethlehem. In the second book he criticizes Rufinus's mode of expression, and also his confession of faith made to Anastasius; he deals with the supposed falsifications of Origen, which he believes to have occurred not by the insertion of spurious passages by heretics, but by the omission of genuine passages by Rufinus; and he rebuts the charge of having falsified the text of Scripture by reference to the prefaces prefixed to his translations. A letter which was said to have been circulated in Africa in his name, stating that he repented of his faults in mistranslating the Scriptures from the Hebrew, he declares to be spurious, and insinuates that it was written by Rufinus himself.

The Apology of Jerome was brought to Rufinus at Aquileia by a merchant who was returning in two days. Rufinus answered in a letter which was meant for Jerome's eyes alone, and has not come down to us, except from the notice of it in Jerome's reply. It was sharp and bitter, and declared that he was able to produce facts which if known to the world would blast Jerome's character for ever; but it ended with a hope that Jerome desired peace. Chromatius at the same time wrote to Jerome, desiring that he would not continue the controversy (Jer. Apol. iii. 2). But Jerome was now thoroughly estranged. He had before seen only extracts from Rufinus's Apology. Now Rufinus himself sent him a true copy of it, and it stung him to the quick. He also treated as a threat Rufinus's declaration that he could produce facts against him which would destroy him. He sat down at once to reply. It was a matter of life and death to him, he said, and he could not keep silence. This third book of the Apology bears the traces of his haste and anger. It is written without any plan, and goes over the same ground as the former books. He declares that the copy of the  $\pi\epsilon\rho\iota$  'Αρχῶν on which he had commented so severely, was not stolen and falsified by his friends, but the genuine work of Rufinus. He defends himself against the charge of perfidy in having feigned to be reconciled to Rufinus at Jerusalem. He dares Rufinus to bring out before the world the crimes which he pretended that Jerome had confessed to him in the privacy of friendship. At times he rises to a higher tone (c. 9). "We are both of us growing old. Why should we scandalize the churches by our strife? Let us confess that we were both of us wrong in our youthful ardour for Origen, and let us now agree in condemning him." But he soon returns to insinuations and retorts of the ordinary controversial kind, such as preclude all hope of reconciliation. The result was a final rupture. Rufinus made no reply, acting probably on the advice of Chromatius. Augustine, to whom Jerome sent the book, writes (Jerome, Ep. cx. 6) with the utmost sorrow at the scandal which it excited; he declares that he was struck to the ground with the thought that "persons so dear and so familiar, united by a chain of friendship which had been known to all the church," should now, in the face of the whole world, be tearing each other to pieces. The letter which Jerome supposed to have been circulated in Africa he had never heard of. And he writes in the tone of one who has an equal esteem for both the combatants, and only desires that they should be at peace. But peace never came. We have no further mention of Jerome, indeed, in the writings of Rufinus. But Jerome's ill-feeling endured to the grave, and beyond the grave. He never ceased to speak of his former friend with passionate condemnation and contempt. When Rufinus died in Sicily in 410 he alludes to the event in these words: "The scorpion lies underground between Enceladus and Porphyron, and the hydra of many heads has at last ceased to hiss against me" (Pref. to Comm. on Ezekiel). Even in later years the spirit of Rufinus haunted him. He sees it revived in Pelagius (Pref. to Comm. on Jeremiah, bk. i.), and even in his letters of edification he cannot refrain from bitter remarks on his memory (Ep. cxv. 18, cxxxiii. 3).

Vigilantius.—A fourth controversy in which Jerome was involved was that with Vigilantius (Cont. Vig. liber unus), a Spanish monk, into whom, as Jerome says, the soul of his former opponent, Jovinian, had passed—a controversy which was further embittered by mutual accusations of Origenism, and in which Jerome's violence and contemptuousness passes all bounds. Vigilantius had stayed at the monastery at Bethlehem in 396, having been introduced to Jerome by Paulinus. He is accused by Jerome of having abused his friendship by taking away manuscripts from Bethlehem (perhaps to Rufinus at the Mount of Olives), and then of spreading at Rome reports of Jerome's Origenistic tendencies (Ad. Vig. Ep. lxi.) He was afterwards, Jerome believed, instigated by Rufinus to write against him (Cont. Ruf. iii. 19). In the letter written to Vigilantius in 396, Jerome explains in an abrupt manner their relations, and makes insinuations against Vigilantius of blasphemous interpretations of Scripture derived from Origen. He treats him as nothing short of a vulgar fool, without the least claim to the repute of knowledge or of letters. He applies to him the proverb "Ὀνφ λύρα, and turns his name to Dormitantius, and ends by saying he hopes he may find pardon when, as Origen holds, the devil will find it. Vigilantius is said by Gennadius (de Scr. Eccl. 35) to have been an ignorant man, though polished in words. But he was as far in advance of Jerome in his views of the Christian life as he was behind him in literary power. His book, written in 404, was sent to Jerome by Riparius, and Jerome wrote a reply (Ep. 109), in which he dismissed the matter with contempt. But afterwards, probably finding that the opinions of Vigilantius were making way, he, at the request of certain presbyters, wrote his treatise against him. It forms a single short book, and was dictated, he states, unius noctis lucubratione, his friend Sisinnius, who was to take it, being greatly hurried. Vigilantius maintained that the honour paid to the martyrs' tombs was excessive, that watching in their basilicas was to be deprecated, and that the alleged miracles done there were false; and, further, that the money collected for the "poor saints at Jerusalem" had better be kept at home; and, again that the hermit life was cowardice; and, lastly, that it would be well that presbyters should be married before ordination. Jerome speaks of these accusations as being in themselves so openly blasphemous as to require neither argument nor the production of testimonies against them, but rather the expression of the writer's indignation. He does not even admit that there is a grain of truth lurking in them. "If you do not honour the tombs of the martyrs," he says, "you assert that they were not wrong in burning the martyrs." He himself believes the miracles, and values the intercession of the saints. He thinks Vigilantius's objection to long vigils and fasts comes from the associations of his former calling, which he states to have been that of an innkeeper. As to the collections for the poor saints, Jerome shews no sense of the tendency of such collections to breed poverty and dishonesty, but thinks the matter fully settled by quoting the words of St. Paul. He admits that the hermit life is cowardice, but he says it is better to run away than to fight with a chance of being beaten. This is certainly the treatise in which Jerome felt most sure that he was in the right, and it is the only one in which he was wholly in the wrong. With this closes our second period of Jerome's stay at Bethlehem, the period of his highest energy, and of his most violent controversies.

Augustine.—We turn gladly from these unworthy outbursts and lack of wisdom to the exchange of letters between Jerome and Augustine, which, though begun with something of controversial asperity, ended in edification and in mutual honour. Though the first part of these letters belongs to the second period, the time in which these two great men acted together in friendly co-operation belongs to that on which we now enter, from 404 to 420. Jerome had begun to hear of Augustine soon after his conversion (386); and Augustine, who was eight years his junior, had a great respect (which, however, did not prevent criticism) for Jerome and his work. Augustine's friend, Alypius, had stayed with Jerome in 393, and Jerome had heard with satisfaction of the great African's zeal for the study of Scripture and his rising fame, and had hoped that he might be his successor in his sacred studies. It seems that a few letters or messages of a courteous kind had passed between them, of which the letter of Jerome introducing Præsidius (103), though placed at a later date, may be taken as a specimen. In the year 394, Augustine, then coadjutor of the bishop of Hippo (whom he succeeded in the following year), having had his attention no doubt called to Jerome's works by Alypius, wrote the letter (among Jerome's, 56) which originated the controversy. It related to the interpretation of the passage in Galatians ii., which records the dispute of St. Paul and St. Peter at Antioch. The letter is written in a grave tone, but perhaps with something of assumption, considering the great position of Jerome. He commends him for translating Greek commentaries into Latin, and wishes that in his translations of the Old Testament he would note very carefully the places in which he diverges from the LXX. He then enters upon the point of controversy. Jerome, in his Commentary on the Galatians, had maintained that the dispute between the apostles was merely feigned, that Peter had pretended to act in such a way as to incur Paul's rebuke, in order to set before the church the incongruity and blameableness of a Christian continuing to keep the Mosaic law. This appeared to Augustine to amount to nothing less than to impute to the apostles an acted lie, and he shews what evil consequences would ensue if it were supposed that any teaching of the apostles could be taken as merely feigned, especially (as he says, apparently, in allusion to some of Jerome's writings) if in the passages in which St. Paul praises marriage he could be supposed to be merely doing so in order to please those who were not willing to adopt the true form of Christian self-denial. This letter, the tone of which would in any case have tried the temper of one so sensitive as Jerome, remained without an answer for nine years. It was subjected to accidents which, but for the magnanimity of Augustine and a certain placableness which Jerome hardly shewed in any other case, might have made it the cause of a controversy hardly less bitter than that with Rufinus. It was committed, together with other works of Augustine, on which he desired to have Jerome's opinion, to Profuturus, a presbyter, who being, before he sailed, elected to a bishopric in North Africa, turned back, and soon after died. He neither transmitted the letter to Jerome nor returned it to Augustine; but it was seen by others and copied, so that the attack on Jerome was widely known in the West, while it was entirely unknown to Jerome at Bethlehem. Meanwhile Jerome had replied to a short note of introduction given by Augustine to a friend by another note which, to Augustine's surprise, contained no allusion to the large and important letter of 394. Augustine, discovering that his first letter had not reached Jerome, wrote a second, (among Jerome's, 67) in which, besides asking questions as to Jerome's work on the ecclesiastical writers and on Origen, he enters into the question about St. Peter at Antioch, and asks Jerome to confess his error and, after the manner of Stesichorus, who was struck blind for defaming Helen, to sing a Palinode for the injury he had done to Christian truth. Paulus, to whom the letter was committed, proved untrustworthy. He alleged that he was afraid of the sea, and let the letter be circulated without being transmitted to Jerome. It was seen by a deacon named Sysinnius, bound up with others of Augustine's works, in an island of the Adriatic; and he, coming to Bethlehem some five years afterwards, either brought a copy of the letter or described its contents to Jerome. The letter could hardly fail to arouse the suspicions of Jerome. His friends suggested to him that Augustine was dealing treacherously, and wished to gain glory by attacking a celebrated man, and by seeming, through his silence, to gain an easy victory over him. He made no reply, wishing, as he says, if possible to believe that there had been some error before making any counter-attack. Meanwhile Augustine heard, through pilgrims returning from Palestine, of the state of the facts, and the feelings which had been aroused by them. He wrote a short letter to excuse himself (among Jerome's, 101) pointing out that what he had written was not as seemed to be supposed, a look for publication, but a personal letter intended to express to a friend a difference of opinion on the interpretation of Scripture. He begged him to point out, in a similar way, any points of his writings which he might think wrong; and he concluded with an earnest wish that he could have some personal converse with the great teacher of Bethlehem. To this Jerome replies in a letter (102) in which friendship struggles with suspicion and resentment. His unwillingness to take a hostile step had combined with the death of Paula in postponing his reply; even now he hesitates to write till he is assured by Augustine himself that the letter he has received is really from him. He sends some of his works, including those last written, against Rufinus. As to Augustine's works, he says he knows little of them, but he intimates that he might have much to say in criticism of them. He insinuates that Augustine might be seeking honour by attacking him, but warns him by the comparison of the old Entellus in Virgil striking down the young Dares, that if he is to strike he can strike hard. To this Augustine replied in his letter (among Jerome's, 104), introducing the deacon Cyprian—a letter written with demonstrations of profound respect, but in which, after explaining how his first letter had miscarried, he again enters into questions of biblical literature. He commends Jerome's new translations of the New Testament, but begs him not to translate the Old Testament from the Hebrew, and enforces his wish by the story of a parish in Africa being scandalized and almost broken up by its bishop reading the prophet Jonah in Jerome's new version. In this version as then read the word Ivy was substituted for Gourd in the last chapter. When the bishop read the word "Ivy" the people rose and cried out "Gourd," and the bishop was at length obliged to resort to the received version, lest he should be left without any followers. Augustine recommends Jerome to translate from the LXX, with notes where his version deviates from the received text. Jerome again answers that he has never received Augustine's original letter, but has only seen what purports to be a copy. "Send me," he says, "your letter signed by yourself, or else cease from attacking me. As to your writings, which you put forward so much, I have only read the Soliloquies and the Commentary on the Psalms, and will only say that in this last there are things disagreeing with the best Greek commentaries. Let me beg you in future," he adds, "if you write to me, to take care that I am the first whom your letter reaches." Augustine now at last (in 404) sent by a presbyter, Praesidius, authentic copies of his two original letters (written nine or ten years before), accompanied by a letter, in which he begged that the matter may be treated as between friends, and might not, through the physical and other obstacles which had interposed ten years between his letter and the answer to it, grow into a feud like that of Jerome and Rufinus, which he deeply lamented. On the receipt of this, Jerome at once, though having only three days before Cyprian returned, wrote (Ep. 104) a full answer to Augustine's principal letters (in Jerome, 56, 67, 104, 110). He touched on all the points raised; and, on the question of St. Peter at Antioch, appealed to the great Eastern expositors of Scripture to bear him out. Augustine replied in a long letter (in Jerome, 116) on the chief question between them, to which he added many expressions tending to satisfy Jerome as to their personal relations. Jerome appears to have been more than satisfied; perhaps even to have been convinced. The only allusions in his later writings to the subjects of this controversy seem to favour Augustine's view. Augustine wrote two letters to him a few years later on the origin of souls (131), and on the meaning of the words, "He that offends in one point is guilty of all" (132). Jerome's reply (134) is one wholly of friendship. He refers to a request in one of Augustine's former letters (104) for translations from the LXX, by saying that these had been stolen from him. He excuses himself for not entering into the subject of the letter, partly by the troubled times through which he was passing, partly also by saying, "Each of us has his gift; there is nothing in your letters but what I admire; and I wish to be understood as assenting to all you say, for we must be united in order to withstand Pelagianism." On the other hand, Augustine shewed a remarkable deference to Jerome's opinion on the origin of souls, as to which he still hesitated (Jerome, Ep. 144) after five years to give a definite answer to his friend Optatus because he had not received an answer from Jerome; and he sent Orosius, probably with reference to this very question, to sit, as Orosius himself says, at the feet of Jerome (Oros. de Lib. Arb. 3). The remaining letters shew a constant increase of friendship. Alypius, who had been their first link to one another, is joined with Augustine in Jerome's last letter to him (143); the younger Paula, whom Jerome speaks of as Augustine's granddaughter, and Pinianus and the younger Melania, who were well known to Augustine, were with Jerome at Bethlehem. The two great teachers, though from somewhat different points of view, laboured together in combating Pelagianism; and those who had been to each other for a while almost as heretics stand justly side by side as the canonized doctors of Latin Christianity.

Last Period, 405 to 420. Age and Troubles.—This last period of Jerome's life, from 405 to 420, during which he enjoyed the friendship of Augustine, was full of external dangers, and towards its close again agitated by controversy. In 405 the Isaurians devastated the north of Palestine, the monasteries of Bethlehem were beset with fugitives, and Jerome and his friends were brought into great straits for the means of living. The winter was extremely cold, and Jerome (like Chrysostom in his Armenian banishment in this very year) was laid low by a severe illness in Lent, 406 (Ep. 114), which left him weak for a long time. In the next year the barbarian invasions began to pass on to the centres of the Roman world, and reached successively Greece, Spain, Italy, and Africa, with the intervening countries, including Jerome's native Dalmatia and Pannonia, till they culminated in the sack of Rome by Alaric in 410. In this last calamity, which seemed to be ushering in the end of the world (Ep. 123), Pammachius and Marcella died. A new emigration from Italy to the safer countries of Africa and Syria set in, and the more religious among the fugitives flocked to Jerusalem and to Bethlehem (Pref. to Books iii. and vii. of Comm. on Ezek.) Jerome also was not quite unaffected by the evil political influences of the time. He represents himself as watched by enemies, who made it dangerous for him even to express his sense of the miseries of the empire. In his Commentary on the Monarchies in Daniel he made some reflections on the low state to which the Roman empire had fallen, and its need of support from the hands of barbarians; and these words were taken as reflecting on Stilicho, the great half-Vandal general, the father-in-law and minister of Honorius, and the real ruler of the empire. Stilicho, whom Jerome afterwards speaks of (Ep. cxxiii. 17) as "the half-barbarian traitor who armed the enemy against us with our own resources," appears to have heard of Jerome's expressions in his commentary, and to have taken great offence, and Jerome believed that he was meditating some revenge against him when he was put to death (Dei judicio, Pref. to b. xi. of Comm. on Isaiah) by order of his imperial relative.

Amidst these troubles the last decade of Jerome's life began. In the year following the sack of Rome Palestine itself suffered from an incursion of barbarians, and other heathen tribes, from which Jerome barely escaped (Ep. cxxvi. 2). He was very poor (Pref. to Comm. in Ezek. b. viii.), but made no complaint of this. His best friends had passed away. Paula had died in 403, Pammachius and Marcella in 410 (Pref. to Comm. in Ezek. b. i.). Of his Roman friends, Oceanus, Principia, and the younger Fabiola, alone remained (Ep. 120, 127), Eustochium had very possibly (as Thierry supposes) less authority than her mother in the management of the convent, and this left room for irregularities like those related in Jerome's letter (147) to Sabinius (q. v.). Eustochium herself also died in 418) (Pref. to Comm. on Jerem. b. i.). Jerome's days were taken up by the business of the monastery and the hospice (Pref. to Comm. in Ezek. b. viii.), and could only dictate his commentaries at night; he was even glad when the winter came, and gave him longer nights for this purpose (ibid.). But he was growing weak with age, and had frequent illnesses, and his eyesight, which had originally failed nearly forty years before (Constantinople, 380), was so weak that he could hardly decipher the Hebrew letters at night (ibid.). Controversy also arose again with Pelagius (Pref. to Comm. in Jerem. b. i., ii., iii., iv.), and his relations with the bishop of Jerusalem can hardly have been smooth (Ep. 137). On the other hand, his brother Paulinian was still with him; the younger Paula, daughter of Toxotius and Laeta (Ep. 107, 134), survived him, and took the place of her aunt Eustochium in the management of the monasteries. Albina, and the younger Melania, with her husband Pinianus (Ep. 144), came to live with him; he had kindly relations with persons in many countries; and the only leading man of the Western church was his friend. Amidst all discouragements, he continued his Biblical studies and writings with no sign of weakness to the end.

Pelagianism.—The Pelagian controversy was forced upon his notice. As in the case of Origenism, he had not of himself antecedently formed any strong opinion on the points of the controversy; and, as in that case also, he had been connected in early life with some of the leading supporters of Pelagius (Pref. to Comm. on Jerem. b. iv.). But he was so well known that no great question could arise in the church which did not cause an appeal to him, and his correspondence necessarily embraced the subject of Pelagianism (Ep. 133, 138). Orosius, also, the friend of Augustine, came to reside at Bethlehem in 414, full of the council of Carthage, and of the thoughts and doings of his teacher; and when in 415 Pelagius himself, with Caelestius, came to Palestine, Jerome was in the very centre of the controversy. A synod was held under John of Jerusalem (q. v.) in July 415, which led to no result; and at another synod at Diospolis in the next year Pelagius was acquitted, partly, it was believed, from the Eastern bishops not being able to see their way in matters of Western theology, and in judging of Latin expressions. But the mind of the church generally was against him, and Jerome was called upon to give expression to this general sentiment. Ctesiphon from Rome wrote to him directly on the subject, and drew from him a long reply (Ep. 133). Augustine addressed to him two letters on points bearing upon the subject (131, 132), and in his letter on the origin of souls insinuated that Jerome's creationism might identify him with Pelagius' denial of the transmission of Adam's sin (Ep. cxxx. 6). Pelagius in his writings sometimes quoted Jerome as agreeing with him (Pref. to Comm. on Jerem. b. i.), sometimes attacked passages in his commentaries (id. b. iv.), and depreciated his translation of the Scriptures (Pref. to Dial. against Pelag.). Orosius also, who withstood Pelagius in the synod of Jerusalem, but with little success, appealed in his book (De Libero Arbitrio contra Pelagium) to Jerome as a champion of the faith. Thus it became a matter of personal as well as of general interest to Jerome that the new heresy should be suppressed. He wrote, therefore, the dialogue against the Pelagians, an amplification of his letter to Ctesiphon, in which Atticus (the Augustinian) and Critobulus (the Pelagian) maintain the argument. The Dialogue is divided into three books. It turns upon the question whether a man can be without sin if he so wills. Its tone is much milder than that of Jerome's other controversial writings, with the single exception of the other dialogue (against the Luciferians), which stands first, as this stands last, of his longer treatises. But still he is dealing with a heretic, and heresy is under the ban of the church and of heaven. This terrible doom contrasts somewhat sharply with the balanced argument, in which it cannot fail to appear that Jerome is not like Augustine, a thorough-going predestinarian, but a "synergist," maintaining the coexistence of free will, and that he reduces predestination to God's foreknowledge of human determination (see the Dialogue, especially i. 5, ii. 6, iii. 18). Nevertheless, the partisans of Pelagius were irritated by this work, and pushed to bitterness and violence. The monasteries of Bethlehem were attacked by a crowd of Pelagian monks, some of their inmates were slaughtered, the buildings were partly thrown down and partly burned, and Jerome himself only escaped by taking refuge in a tower which was stronger than the rest. This violence, however, was their last effort. A strong letter from the pope Innocentius (137) to John of Jerusalem (who died soon after, 418) admonished him that he would be held accountable for any future violence, and Jerome received at the same time a letter (136) from the pope assuring him of protection. Jerome's letters to Riparius (138), to Apronius (139), and to Augustine (141, 143), speak of the cause of Augustine as triumphant, and of Pelagius, who is compared to Catiline, leaving Palestine, though Jerusalem is still held by some powerful adversary, who is compared to Nebuchadnezzar (Ep. 144). It must, however, be admitted that in the East there was no strong feeling against Pelagius. Indeed his cause was upheld by Theodore of Mopsuestia, who in a work, of which parts have come down to us (see these in Jerome, vol. ii. pp. 807-814), argues against Augustine and Jerome (whom he designates by the name of Aram), as "those who say that men sin by nature and not by will." In the West also a work was written in reply to him by Anianus, a deacon of Celeda, of which a copy was sent to Jerome (Ep. cxliii. 2) by Eusebius of Cremona, but to which he was never able to reply.

Letters.—The letters of this last period of Jerome's life are mostly letters of counsel in reply to those who asked his advice. Among these may be mentioned the letter to a mother and daughter (117) living in Gaul, which is an attempt to reconcile the members of a family who were estranged from one another; the letter (118) to Julianus in Pannonia to comfort him for his losses, and exhort him to a strenuous life of self-sacrifice; the letter to Rusticus (122), whose wife was with Jerome at Jerusalem; the letter to another Rusticus (125), giving practical advice as to a monastic life; to Ageruchia (123), exhorting her to persevere in her estate as a widow, and giving as deterrents from a second marriage some touches of Roman manners, and a remarkable account of the sack of Rome, and to the virgin Demetrias (130), who had escaped from the burning of Rome, and had fallen into the hands of the count Heraclian in Africa; to Marcellinus and Anapsychias (128) of Augustine's diocese, introducing them to Fabiola and Oceanus at Rome; to Gandentius (128) on the education of his daughter Pacatula; to Exsuperantius (145), a soldier whom Jerome persuaded to come to Bethlehem; and the letter, from which a whole romance of monastic life might be constructed, to Sabirianus (147), the lapsed deacon, who had brought disorder into the monasteries. Jerome wrote also the Memoir of Marcella (127), who died from her ill-treatment in the sack of Rome, addressing his letter to her friend Principia; but he was too much dejected, and too infirm, to write the Epitaphium of Eustochium, who died two years before him (418). The other letters of this period relate to scriptural studies; 119, to Minucius and Alexander, two learned presbyters of the diocese of Toulouse, on the interpretation of the words, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed"; 120, to Hebidia, a lady of a remarkable family, whose father and grandfather were orators, poets and professors, and priests of Apollo Belen at Bayeux, on scriptural questions which she had sent to him; 121, to Algasia, another lady of Gaul; 140, to the presbyter Cyprian, an exposition of Ps. 90; 124, to Arivus, on the περὶ Ἀρχῶν; 129, on the question, "How can Palestine be called the Promised Land?" and 146, to Evangelus an African presbyter, containing the well-known theory of Jerome on the relative positions of bishops, priests, and deacons.

Commentaries on Greater Prophets.—These letters shew us the general scope of Jerome's work and influence in his later years. Of Bible work we have only the Commentaries on the Prophets. The Minor Prophets having been finished in 406, Jerome at once began his commentaries on the Greater Prophets. That on Daniel came first in 407, then that on Isaiah in sixteen books, written in the intervals of business and of illness, and issued at various times in the years 408 to 410; Ezekiel was taken in the years from 410 to 414, and Jeremiah in the following years. This last was cut short at ch. xxxii. by Jerome's last illness. The prefaces to these commentaries are very remarkable documents, and, as will have been observed from the constant references to them already given, are very serviceable for the chronology of Jerome's life. Those on Ezekiel record the sack of Rome, the death of Rufinus (B. i.), the immigration from Rome (B. iii. and vii.), the rise of Pelagianism (B. vi.); and B. ix. of the commentary itself speaks of the invasion of Rome by the count Heraclian. Though the Comm. on Ezekiel was finished in the year 415, Jerome was prevented from taking up that upon Jeremiah till after the death of Eustochium (418), and thus his last work was written in the year 419 which intervened between Eustochium's death and his own. Yet not only is the work full of vigour, but the prefaces shew a renewal of the old controversial ardour directed against Pelagius, whom he speaks of as "Scotorum pulvis prægravatus" (b. I. and iii.). This controversy, and the business of the pilgrims (b. iv.), shortened the time which he was able to give to this commentary (b. iii.), which, though he intended it to be short (B. i.), required his excuses in the last preface, that to b. vi., for its growing length.

Death.—It is generally believed that a long sickness preceded the death of Jerome, and that after the year 419 he was unable to work at all; that he was attended in his last illness by the younger Paula and Melania; that he died, according to the Chronicle of Prosper of Aquitania, on Sept. 20, 420; and that he was buried by the side of Paula and Eustochium near to the grotto of the Saviour's birth. His body was believed to have been carried at a subsequent period to Rome, and placed in the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore on the Esquiline. The legends which grew up around his memory, such as that, immortalized by the etching of Albert Dürer, of the lion who constantly attended him, and the miracles supposed to have been wrought at his grave, are innumerable. But since the best known account of them is to be found in letters purporting to have passed between Augustine (made bishop of Hippo 393) and Cyril of Jerusalem, who died in 386, they may be left to the professed collectors of legends. It will be more consonant to the aim of this work to close this article with a summary of his writings, and an attempt shortly to estimate his character as a writer and as a man and his influence on the life of the church.

REVIEW OF JEROME'S WORKS.

List of Writings.—This review may properly begin with a list of Jerome's works now extant. There is in the end of Vallarsi's edition, immediately before the general index, a complete table of contents, which may be usefully consulted. The list now to be given takes first the translations of the Bible, then the commentaries, then the miscellaneous works, and ends with the letters. The date of time and place at which each was composed, and the volume in Vallarsi's edition, is added.

I. BIBLE TRANSLATIONS:—

(1) From the Hebrew.—The vulgate of the Old Testament, written at Bethlehem, begun 391, finished 404, vol. ix.

(2) From the Septuagint.—The Psalms as used at Rome, written in Rome 383; and the Psalms as used in Gaul, written at Bethlehem about 388. These two are in parallel columns in vol. x. The Gallican Psalter is collated with the Hebrew, and shews by obeli (÷) the parts which are in the LXX, and not in the Hebrew, and by asterisks (*), the parts which are in the Hebrew and not in the Greek.

The book of Job, forming a part of the translation of the LXX made between 386 and 392 at Bethlehem, the rest of which was lost (Ep. 134), vol. x.

(3) From the Chaldee.—The books of Tobit and Judith, Bethlehem, 398.

(4) From the Greek.—The vulgate version of the New Testament, made at Rome between 382 and 385. The preface is only to the Gospels, but Jerome speaks of, and quotes from, his version of the other parts also (De Vir. III. 135, Ep. 71 and 27).

II. COMMENTARIES:—

(1) Original.—Ecclesiastes, vol. iii., Bethlehem, 388; Isaiah, vol. iv. Bethlehem, 410; Jeremiah, i.-xxxii. 41, vol. iv. Bethlehem, 419; Ezekiel, vol. v. Bethlehem, 410-414; Daniel, vol. v. Bethlehem, 407; the Minor Prophets, vol. vi. Bethlehem, at various times between 391 and 406; Matthew, vol. vii. Bethlehem, 387; Galatians, Ephesians, Titus, Philemon, vol. vii. Bethlehem, 388.

(2) Translated from Origen.—Homilies on Jeremiah and Ezekiel, vol. v. Bethlehem, date doubtful; on Luke, vol. vii. Bethlehem, 389; Canticles, vol. iii. Rome and Bethlehem, 385-7.

There is also a commentary on Job, and a specimen of one on the Psalms, attributed to Jerome, vol. vii. And the translation of Origen's Homilies on Isaiah, also attributed to him, vol. iv.

III. BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF SCRIPTURE:—

(1) Book of Hebrew Names, or Glossary of Proper Names in the Old Testament; Bethlehem, 388. Vol. iii. 1.

(2) Book of Questions on Genesis, Bethlehem, 388. Vol. iii. 301.

(3) A translation of Eusebius's book on the sites and names of Hebrew places; Bethlehem, 388. Vol. iii. 121.

(4) Translation of Didymus on the Holy Spirit, Rome and Bethlehem, 385-7. Vol. ii. 105.

IV. BOOKS ON CHURCH HISTORY AND CONTROVERSY (all in vol. ii.):—

(1) Book of Illustrious Men, or Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, Bethlehem, 392.

(2) Dialogue with a Luciferian, Antioch, 379.

(3) Lives of the Hermits: Paulus, Desert, 374; Malchus and Hilarion, Bethlehem, 390.

(4) Translation of the rule of Pachomius, Bethlehem, 404.

(5) Books of ascetic controversy, against Helvidius, Rome, 383; against Jovinian, Bethlehem 393; against Vigilantius, Bethlehem, 406.

(6) Books of personal controversy, against John, bishop of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, 398 or 399; against Rufinus, i. and ii. 402, iii. 404.

(7) Dialogue with a Pelagian, Bethlehem, 416.

V. GENERAL HISTORY:—Translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius, with Jerome's additions, vol. viii., Constantinople, 382.

VI. PERSONAL:—The series of letters, vol. i. Ep. i. Aquileia, 371; 2-4, Antioch, 374; 5-17, Desert, 474-9; 18, Constantinople, 381; 19-45, Rome, 382-5; 46-148, Bethlehem, 386-418.

The works attributed to Jerome, but not genuine, which are given in Vallarsi's edition, are: A Breviary, Commentary, and preface on the Psalms, vol. vii.; some Greek fragments, and a lexicon of Hebrew names, the names of places in the Acts, the ten names of God, the Benedictions of the Patriarchs, the ten temptations in the Desert, a Commentary on the song of Deborah, Hebrew questions in Kings and Chronicles, an Exposition of Job, vol. iii., three letters in vol. i., and fifty-one in vol. xi., together with several miscellaneous writings in vol. xi., most of which are by Pelagius.

Criticism.—In touching critically upon the character of Jerome's writings, the order of the enumeration given above may be followed.

1. As a translator, Jerome deserves the highest place for his clear conviction of the importance of his task, and the perseverance against great obstacles which he displayed. This is shewn especially in his prefaces, which are of great value as shewing his system. For the most part he took very great pains, but not with all alike. The Chronicles, for instance, he went over word by word with his Hebrew teacher; Tobit he translated in a single day. His method was first, never to swerve needlessly from the original; second, to avoid solecisms; third, at all risks, even that of introducing solecisms, to give the true sense. These principles are not always consistently carried through. There is sometimes undue laxity, which is defended in the treatise De Optimo Genere Interpretandi; sometimes there is an unnecessary literalism, which arises from a notion that some hidden sense lies behind the words, but really deprives the words of sense. His versions were during his lifetime both highly prized and greatly condemned. His friend Sophronius translated a great part of them into Greek, and they were read in many of the Eastern churches in Jerome's lifetime. After his death his versions gradually won their way to universal acceptance in the West, and were finally, with some alterations (mostly for the worse), stamped with the authority of the Roman church at the council of Trent. [See Vallarsi's Preface to vol. ix., and Zöckler, part II. ii. Hieronymus als Bibel Uebersetzer.

2. As an expositor, Jerome lacks originality. His Commentaries are mostly compilations from others; and he gives their views at times without any opinion of his own. This, however, gives these works a special value as the record of the thoughts of distinguished men, such as Origen. His derivations are puerile. His interpretation of prophecy is the merest literal application of it to events in the church. He is often inconsistent, and at times seems to veil his own opinion under that of another. His allusions to the events of his own time as illustrations of Scripture are often of great interest. He wrote in great haste (Pref. to b. ii. of Comm. on Eph. and Pref. to b. iii. of Comm. on Gal.), and from this reason, as well as from his frequently weak health and weak eyes, and also from his great self-confidence, he trusted to his memory too much. His strength and his weakness may be seen in his correspondence with Augustine. He is strong in all that relates to the necessity of translating from the Hebrew, in verbal criticism, and in the quotation of the Greek commentators, but weak in the more philosophical and historical faculty required for the interpretation of such a passage as Gal. ii., which formed the chief subject of controversy between them.

3. The books on Hebrew names, Questions on Genesis, and the site and names of Hebrew places shew a wide range of interest, and are useful contributions to Biblical knowledge, especially the latter, which is often appealed to in the present day. But even here Jerome was too ready to take in the tales of the Jews rather than to exercise an independent judgment.

In theology, properly so called, he is weak. His first letter to Damasus on the Trinitarian controversies at Antioch, while it shews a clear perception of what the church taught, shews also a shrinking from dogmatic questions and a servile submission to episcopal authority. He accepted without question the damnation of all the heathen. His dealings with Origen shew his weakness; he surrendered his impartial judgment as soon as Origen's works were condemned. In the Pelagian controversy the slight sense shewn by him of the importance of the questions at issue contrast markedly with the deep conviction expressed in the writings of Augustine. In some matters, which had not been dealt with by church authority, he held his own; as in the question of the origin of souls, as to which he is decided as a creationist. He puts aside purgatory and scoffs at millenarianism. His views on the Apocrypha and on the orders of the Christian ministry have become classical.

4. For church history he had some considerable faculty, as is shewn by the dialogue with a Luciferian. His knowledge was great, and his sympathies large, when there was no question of church condemnations. His book De Viris Illustribus is especially valuable, and his defence of it against Augustine's criticism shews him a man of wider culture and greater knowledge than his opponent. But the lives of the hermits shew a credulity which would incorporate legend into history. In matters of controversy his ordinary method is to take as absolute truth the decisions of bishops and even the popular feeling in the church, and to use all his powers in enforcing these. His own life and the documents in which its details are imbedded are his best contributions to church history.

5. His knowledge of and sympathy with human history generally was very much like that of the monks of later times. He had much curiosity and considerable knowledge. His translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius shews his interest in history; but it is very uncritical. The mistakes of Eusebius are not corrected but aggravated by the translator; and his own additions shew that his critical faculty was not such as to guard against the admission of considerable errors; and his credulity constantly reveals itself. There is nothing in his writings which shews even the rudiments of a philosophy of history. He knew both the events of his time and facts lying beyond the usual range. He was acquainted, for instance, with the routes to India, and mentions the Brahmans (Ep. xxii. lxx. &c.) and Buddha (Adv. Jov. i. 42). Events like the fall of Rome made a deep impression upon him; but he deals with these very much as the monks of the Middle Ages dealt with the events of their time. He is a recluse; he has nothing of political sagacity, and no sense of human progress.

6. His letters are the most interesting part of his writings, and will always continue to be read with interest. They are very various; they are vivid in their expression of feeling and graphic in their pictures of life. The letters to Heliodorus (14) on the praise of hermit life; to Eustochium (22) on the preservation of virginity in the mixed life of the Roman church and world; to Asella (45) on his departure from Rome; to Nepotian (52) on the duties of the presbyters and monks of his day; to Marcella from Paula and Eustochium (46), giving the enthusiastic description of monastic life among the holy places of Palestine; to Laeta (107) on the education of a child whose grandfather was a heathen priest, whose parents were Christians, and who was herself to be a nun; to Rusticus (125), giving rules which shew the character of the monastic life in those days; all these are literary gems; and the Epitaphia of Blesilla (39), Fabiola (77), Nepotianus (60), Paula (108), and Marcella (127) form a hagiography of the best and most attractive kind.

Style.—His style is excellent, and he was rightly praised as the Christian Cicero by Erasmus, who contrasts his writings with the monkish and scholastic literature. It is vivid, full of illustrations, with happy turns, such as "lucus a non lucendo," "Ὁρῶ λύρα, "fac de necessitate virtutem," "Ingenuit totus orbis et Arianum se esse miratus est." The scriptural quotations and allusions are often overdone and forced; but there is no unreality or cant in this; and he never loses his dignity except in the case of controversial personalities.

Character.—A few words must be added on Jerome's character and influence. He was vain, and unable to bear rivals; extremely sensitive as to the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries, and especially by the bishops; passionate and resentful; but at times becoming suddenly placable; scornful and violent in controversy; kind to the weak and the poor; respectful in his dealings with women; entirely without avarice; extraordinarily diligent in work, and nobly tenacious of the main objects to which he devoted his life. There was, however, something of monkish cowardice in his asceticism, and his influence was not felt by the strong.

Influence.—His influence grew through his life and increased after his death. If we may use a scriptural phrase which has sometimes been applied to such influence, "He lived and reigned for a thousand years." His writings contain the whole spirit of the church of the middle ages, its monasticism, its contrast of sacred things with profane, its credulity and superstition, its subjection to hierarchical authority, its dread of heresy, its passion for pilgrimages. To the society which was thus in a great measure formed by him, his Bible was the greatest boon which could have been given. But he founded no school and had no inspiring power; there was no courage or width of view in his spiritual legacy which could break through the fatal circle of bondage to received authority which was closing round mankind. As Thierry says in the last words of his work on St. Jerome, "There is no continuation of his work; a few more letters of Augustine and Paulinns, and night falls over the West." [W. H. F.]

HIERONYMUS (5), monk and disciple of St. Benedict probably. His life was written cir. 612 by his contemporary Sebastianus, monk and disciple of St. Benedict. It was intended for church lectures, and dilates on the pious childhood, youth, and old age of Hieronymus. It has been surmised that this work may be the biography known to have been written, teeming with errors, of the great Jerome; but Sebastian's Hieronymus presents no correspondence with this father to bear out the conjecture. (Petrus Diaconus Cassinensis, de Vir. Illust. Cassinens. cap. 4, in Migne, Patr. Lat. clxxiii. 1013, and note by Marus; Baron. A. E. ann. 420, xlix.; Ceill. xi. 634.) [C. H.]

HIERONYMUS (6), bishop of Parma, c. 775. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 97.)

[A. H. D. A.]

HIERONYMUS (7), bishop of Pavia 778 to 787. For the story of his election see Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xii. 405. [A. H. D. A.]

HIERONYMUS (8), doubtful bishop of Tortona, c. 786. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiii. 672.)

[A. H. D. A.]

HIERONYMUS (9), ST., twenty-second bishop of Nevers, succeeding Waldo, or Galdo, and followed by Jonas. Although there is a legend which makes him contemporary with Charles the Bald, he really lived in the reign of Charles the Great. This is shewn by the charters in Gall. Christ. xii. Instr. 297-300, from which it appears that the latter monarch restored to the church of Nevers property which had been taken from it in the disturbances of the time, and that Charles the Bald confirmed this restitution. Hieronymus, besides restoring the churches given back to him by Charles, built the oratory of St. Stephen at Salviniacum, as appears from a deed of gift dated in 817, after his death (Gall. Christ. xii. Instr. 297). He is said to have died Feb. 5, and was buried in the church of St. Martin, at Nevers. His day of commemoration is given by the older authorities as Oct. 8, but the Bollandists and the more recent martyrologies place it on the 5th. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 167; Coquille, Hist. du Nivernois, pp. 39-40, and sub fin. Paris, 1612; Gall. Christ. xii. 167.) [S. A. B.]

HIEROPHILUS, bishop of Plotinopolis in Eastern Thracia, on the Hebrus, translated to this see from that of Trapezopolis in Phrygia according to Socrates, Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. cap. 36. The date does not appear from the passage (Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 809, 1185). He is the first known bishop of Trapezopolis, and sat before the council of Ephesus, A. D. 431. He is also the first known bishop of Plotinopolis, his only known successor there being Georgius [GEORGIUS (37)]. [J. de S.]

HIEROTHEUS, a writer whose works are quoted by the Pseudo-Dionysius, who styles him his teacher. Two long extracts are preserved in the De Divinis Nominibus of the Pseudo-Dionysius (cap. 2, §§ 9, 10; cap. 4, §§ 15-17), and there are incidental references to Hierotheus in other places. In the first extract (cap. 2, § 9 fin.) his Theological Institutes (θεολογικαὶ στοιχειώσεις) are cited, and in the second his Amatory Hymns (ἔρωτικὸν ὕμνοι). The writings of Hierotheus are due most probably to the school of Edessa, and should be dated about the middle or end of the 5th century. In confirmation of this view Dr. Westcott has noted a statement in Assemani (Biblioth. Orient. ii. 290, 291) that Stephen Bar-Sudailli, abbat of a monastery at Edessa, published a book under the name of Hierotheus, by the help of which he supported his own mystic doctrines. Assemani informs us that this abbat held the doctrine of final restoration as taught by Origen, and was abused for it by Xenaïas and by James of Sargn bishop of Batnae (Bibl. Or. i. 303, ii. 30-33; Ceillier, x. 641; Westcott on Dionys. Areop. in Contemporary Rev. May, 1867). The mystical views put forward in the works both of Hierotheus and Dionysius easily lend themselves to the support of that theory. According to the statement in Assemani (ii. 291), Bar-Sudailli wrote under the name of Hierotheus in order to prove "finem poenarum aliquando futurum, nec impios in saeculum saeculorum puniendos fore, sed per ignem purgandos; atque ita et malos daemones misericordiam consequuturos esse, et cuncta in divinam naturam transmutanda, juxta illud Pauli, ut sit Deus omnia in omnibus." In Mai's Spicilegium Romanum (iii. 704-707) will be found other fragments of this writer, translated from some Arabic MSS. Their theology savours much more however of the 4th and 5th centuries than of the first. Hierotheus, according to the legend which makes him the teacher of Dionysius the Areopagite, was born during the reign of Augustus, of a distinguished family at Athens. He was a Platonic philosopher and a member of the council of nine who composed the Areopagite senate. In common with the other members he had been initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries. Upon his conversion to Christianity he was appointed by St. Paul to be bishop of Athens. He subsequently left his see in order to preach the gospel to the heathen, and was present with James bishop of Jerusalem and St. Peter at the death-bed of the holy Virgin in St. John's house at Jerusalem (Dionys. Divin. Nom.

cap. 3, § 2 in Migne, Patr. Gr. iii. 690, and the explanation of this passage offered in the article DIONYSIUS, Vol. I. p. 846). At that scene, no one but the apostles surpassed Hierotheus in the inspired hymns to which he gave utterance. Thence he went into Spain, where he died after acting as bishop of Segovia. His commemoration was on Oct. 4 (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Bas. Menol.; AA. SS. Boll. Oct. ii. 325, iv. 775; Halloix, Vit. Script. Orient. Eccles. i. 600).

[G. T. S.]

HIERUNTIUS (GERONTIUS), bishop of Camerinum (Camerino) c. A.D. 465. He was present in that year at the council held at Rome by Hilarius. (Mansi, vii. 967, where the reading is Gerontius; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 549; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 233.) [R. S. G.]

HIGBALD (HIGBALDUS, HYGBALDUS), bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 780–802. For some time Higbald was coadjutor to Cynewulf, and it was only on his death, in A.D. 783, that he became, de jure, bishop of Lindisfarne. He was consecrated at a place called Soccabyrig, perhaps Sockburne in Durham, or Sockbridge in Westmoreland. (S. C. ed. Thorpe, 95; Flor. Wigorn. 59; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. 85.)

The chief occurrence in Higbald's episcopate was the devastation of Lindisfarne by the Danes on the 7th of June, A.D. 793. The church was sacked and desecrated, the brethren were slain, drowned, or carried off into captivity. Higbald, with some others, made his escape, and on his return was delighted to find Cuthbert's body untouched, which he had been unable to remove. The onslaught seems to have been sudden and unexpected, and little preparation was made either for escape or resistance. This was the first Danish inroad in the north, and caused the utmost dismay. Soon after the disaster Alcuin, in two interesting letters, expressed his eager sympathy with Higbald and his brethren, bidding them be of good courage, and set an example of faith and endurance. He promised also to ask Charlemagne to assist in the restoration of the captives (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 190–4). In a third epistle he addresses Cudrad, a priest of Lindisfarne, who had been fortunate enough to escape from the destroyers, urging him to adopt a stricter and more ascetic life (id. 194–5). Alcuin's sorrow relieved itself also in a long poem, in which he condoles with the brethren of Lindisfarne and their bishop (Opp. ed. Froben. 1777, ii. 238–40).

Alcuin was also a correspondent of Higbald's on less painful subjects. He writes to him about a person of the name of Candidus, a common friend, whom he had kept with him for a year, probably to educate (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 146–7). On another occasion (in A.D. 797) he sends him a long letter full of advice, in the course of which he alludes to the death of Egfrid king of Mercia (id. 353–8). This is addressed, not to Higbald, but to a bishop of the name of Speratus, about whom Jaffé observes: "Higbaldus idem sonat quod 'spe alacer.'" There is another letter in which both names are conjoined (id. 689–90).

[J. R.]

HIGBERT (HYGBERT), the fourteenth bishop of Lichfield, and the single archbishop of that see (M. H. B. 623). He was appointed to the bishopric in the year 779 in succession to

Berthun, and appears in that year as witness to a grant made by Offa to his thegn Dudda, at Hartleford (Kemble, C. D. 137), and dated. He no doubt received consecration from archbishop Jaenberht. He was present at the council of Brentford in 781, and attested other charters of that year (Kemble, C. D. 141, 142, 143). In 787 he was at the legate council, in which, probably, the elevation of the see of Lichfield to archiepiscopal rank was discussed and determined on. He signs the acts as still a simple bishop; the pall which Offa had demanded for him had not yet arrived, and the first grant in which he appears as archbishop is one of 788 (K. C. D. 152). In this and the following years his attestation is made to follow archbishop Jaenberht's (ib. 153, 154, 155, 156, 157). After Jaenberht's death and Ethelheard's appointment, Higberht occasionally takes precedence as the senior archbishop, as, for example, in Offa's grants at Clovesho in 794 to Worcester (ib. 164, 167). After the death of Offa, Ethelheard subscribes first, except in a document drawn up at Tamworth in 799, in which Higberht again takes precedence (K. C. D. 1020; see also a questionable act of 801, ib. 1023). Higberht's history, in connexion with the struggle for the archbishopric, will be found under JAENBERHT, ETHELHEARD, KENULF, and OFFA. Alcuin speaks of him as a pious father, and begged of Ethelheard that he might not, so long as he lived, be stripped of his pall (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 520); but if the Higberht, who, at the council of Clovesho in 803, signed among the Lichfield clergy as abbat, be the ex-archbishop, he was not spared this humiliation (ib. 546), and had already seen Aldulf consecrated as a simple suffragan bishop to succeed him. Higberht was then the only archbishop of Lichfield, and did not share the dignity with Aldulf, as William of Malmesbury supposed, and as even the learned Henry Wharton (Ang. Sac. i. 430) believed; nor with Humberht, who appears as archbishop in the Vitae duorum Offanorum, ed. Wats. p. 26. These writers have caused a vast number of errors to be accepted as authentic history. The truth is well stated by Baron in his notes on Johnson's Canons, i. p. 287. [S.]

HIGELRICUS, nineteenth bishop of Le Puy, succeeding Dulcidius and followed by Torpio in the first years of the 8th century. Le Cointe places the commencement of his episcopate in A.D. 705, and believes that he was still surviving in 732, but nothing is known of him. (Ann. Eccl. Franc. 705, xxi.; 732, lxxvii. tom. iv. pp. 442, 816; Gall. Christ. ii. 691.)

HILADUS (HELLADIUS, HILARUS), March 12, martyr at Nicomedia with eight others. (Wright, Syriac Martyrol. in Jour. Sac. Lit. 1866, 425.) [G. T. S.]

HILARIA (1), martyr of Augsburg, c. 304, mother of the martyr St. Afra. Aided by three servants, Digna, Eunomia (or Eumenia), and Eutropia (or Euprepia), she rescued her daughter's body and conveyed it by night to the family tomb two miles from the city. The judge Gaius, being apprized of this, sent a body of soldiers who, according to their orders, seized the party and, on their refusal to sacrifice, shut them up in the tomb and burnt them. They were commemorated Aug. 12. (Usuard; Ado; Tillem. Mén. v. 273; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. iii. 30; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 456; Velsler. Conversio et Passio SS. Mart. Afrae, Hilariae, &c., 1591; Assem. Mart. Or. et Occid. ii. 225.)

HILARIA (2)—Dec. 3. Martyr at Rome with her husband Claudius a tribune, their sons Jason and Maurus, and seventy soldiers, under the emperor Numerian. They were all converted by the preaching of the martyr Chrysanthus. [CHRYSANTHUS.] [G. T. S.]

HILARIANUS (1), QUINTUS JULIUS (HILARION), a Latin Chiliasit writer, cir. 397, author of two extant treatises, both written at the instance of friends, the first about the time of keeping Easter, the second on the duration of the world. The first treatise, Expositum de Die Paschae et Mensis, disappeared for several centuries. Then in the year 1712 Christopher Pfäffius had it printed at Paris in octavo by Jean Baptiste de Lespine, at the end of the epitome of the Divine Institutions of Lactantius. Pfäffius had found the MS. in the library of Turin. He has prefaced it by a dissertation to prove that it was written in A.D. 397, under the consulate of Caesarius and Atticus. Hilarian himself dates his second work in this year, and says that before publishing the first he had got together his materials for the second. At the time when the first was written the controversy seems still to have been lively. Hilarian supports the Latins against the Greeks, in agreement with pope Victor and the council of Nicaea.

The second treatise, Chronologia sive Libellus de Mundi Duratione, is founded on a dispute about the beginning of the end of the world. It was first edited by Pierre Pithou at Paris in 1586. The author counts 5530 years from the Creation to the Passion; gives the world 6000; and would therefore end it about A.D. 498. He makes Daniel's weeks extend to the destruction of Jerusalem, and agrees with the Millenarians about the 1000 years of the Apocalypse.

The following is a sketch of his chronology:

From the Creation to the Deluge . . . . .	2237 years.
„ „ Deluge „ „ Cail of Abraham . . . . .	1012 „
„ thence „ „ Exodus . . . . .	430 „
„ „ „ Samuel . . . . .	450 „
„ „ „ Zedekiah . . . . .	514 „
The Captivity lasted . . . . .	70 „
Thence to the Passion . . . . .	857 „

He brings his chronology to the consulate of Caesarius and Atticus, in which year he says he revised his treatise. He believes that after the close of the apocalyptic thousand years will come the loosing of Satan, the seducing of the nations Gog and Magog, the descent of fire from heaven upon their armies; then the second resurrection, the judgment, the passing away of the old things, and the bringing in of the new heavens and the new earth; “impii in ambustione aeterna; justi autem cum Deo in vita aeterna” (c. 19). His style is barbarous. La Bigne doubted at first about admitting him into his Bibliotheca. The edition and the account given by Migne are taken from Galland, Biblioth. Patr. viii. (La Bigne, Biblioth. Vet. Patr. 1609, tom. vii.; 1618, tom. v. pt. i.; 1654, tom. vii.; 1677, tom. vii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. col. 1094-1114; Cave, i. 252; Ceillier, vi. 288.)

HILARIANUS (2), bishop of Hilita, a place in proconsular Africa, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 420, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

HILARIANUS (3), bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, present at the synod held at Constantinople A.D. 536 under Mennas. (Mansi, viii. 877, 928 where the Latin is Hilarius, 938, 950 where the Latin is Julianus, 977; Le Quien, O. C. i. 1015.) [L. D.]

HILARIANUS (4) (HILARION)—Feb. 12. A boy martyr at Abitina in Africa, with his father Saturninus a priest, and many others. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 382, 390.) [G. T. S.]

HILARINUS (1) (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Adon.), HILARIUS (Usuard.)—July 16. A monk and martyr, under Julian at Ostia. (Mart. Rom. Vet.) [G. T. S.]

HILARINUS (2), chief physician of Hippo Regius, and either then or at some other time holder of a municipal office (municipalis), commended by Alypius and Augustine to Aurelius (Aug. Ep. 41). He was perhaps the same person as the one to whom, as well as to Felix, Augustine wrote concerning Boniface, a presbyter, unjustly accused of misconduct, but there is no evidence to support this identity (Aug. Ep. 71.) [H. W. P.]

HILARINUS (3), bishop of Trofinianum, an unknown town in the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric 484. (Vict. Vit. Notit. p. 57; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 330.) [C. H.]

HILARION, Arian bishop of Jerusalem. [HILARIUS (4).]

HILARION (1), a hermit of Palestine in the 4th century (died 371). Jerome wrote his life in 390, quoting Epiphanius, who was Hilarion's disciple. Jerome certainly considered his Lives of the Hermits as historical (Vit. Malchi, i.); but the marvels of the Life of Hilarion have induced some to believe it to be a mere romance (Israel in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1880, p. 128, but see Zöckler's Jerome, 179). No attempt is made in this article to separate fact from fiction. The Life of Hilarion in any case shews the ideal on which monasticism was nourished in the 4th century.

Hilarion was born at Thabatha, five miles south of Gaza, about the year 300. His parents were heathen, and they sent him for his education to Alexandria. There he shewed great talents, and proficiency in rhetoric, which at that time comprehended nearly the whole of a liberal education. He was also of a disposition which made him beloved by all. He became a Christian, and, turning from the frivolous pleasures of the circus and the theatre, he spent all his leisure in frequenting the assemblies of the church. Hearing of the monastic retreat of Antony, he became his disciple for a time; but he found that the multitude of people who resorted to the celebrated father of monasticism made life with him a city life rather than one of retirement. Though as yet but fifteen years old, he determined to become a hermit. He returned to Palestine, where he found his parents dead. He gave away his goods to his brothers and the poor, and went to live in a desert place seven miles from the Christian city of Majoma, near Gaza (which was afterwards called Constantia by Julian, in order to restore to it imperial instead of Christian associations). The boy hermit was clad in a sackcloth shirt, which he never changed till it was worn out, and a cloak of skins which Antony had given him, and a blanket such as was worn by the peasants. His daily sustenance was fifteen carices (a sort of figs), which he never ate till after sundown; and even these he denied himself, so as to curb the flesh, as often as youthful desire came upon him. He cultivated a little plot of ground, and made baskets of rushes, so as not to be idle. His disordered fancy summoned up a thousand temptations of Satan, demons of lust and feasting, terrors of wild beasts, visions of being driven by the devil as a beast is driven by its rider; but he overcame them all by calling on the name of Christ. He dwelt for twelve years in a little cabin made by himself of woven reeds and rushes; after that in a hut only five feet high, which was still shewn when Jerome was in Palestine, and was more like a sepulchre than a house. His austerities and abstinence, instead of diminishing, increased with advancing age. When robbers came to him, they found nothing worth taking; and, when threatened with death, he told them that that was what he most desired.

The fame of his sanctity spread rapidly, to which was added the reputation of a worker of miracles, and exorcist. To a barren woman he promised children, and in a year he saw her with her new-born child. Aristaenete, the wife of Elpidius, afterwards praetorian praefect, obtained through his aid the restoration to life of her three children, who had died of fever. A woman blind from her tenth year received sight through his imitation of our Lord's act in spitting upon her eyes. Incantations practised by those who had familiar spirits were counteracted by his prayers. A girl who had been bound by a love-spell imported from Egypt, was restored, and preserved in virginity. Men of all ranks (whose names and abodes are circumstantially recorded) suffering from hysterical affections, then attributed to demons, were healed. An officer of the Christian town of Majoma, whose duty it was to rear horses for the Circensian games, and who found himself always beaten through a spell laid upon his chariot by the votaries of Marnas, the idol of Gaza, won the race as soon as the saint had poured water upon his chariot wheels. Hilarion anticipated the feeling of Francis of Assisi for dumb animals; he affirmed that they suffered for the sins of men, and cast out from them the devils by which he believed them to be possessed. In his ministry of exorcism he believed himself capable of discovering by the sense of smell the particular demons and particular vices from which men were suffering. He had many disciples, whom he formed into societies, and went on circuits to visit them; and many stories were told of the shrewdness and penetration with which he rebuked their weaknesses.

But the crowds who flocked about him made him feel that he was no longer a hermit; and in his sixty-third year, the year of the death of Antony (which was miraculously made known to him), he resolved to set out on his wanderings. Men crowded round him to the number of 10,000, beseeching him not to depart. There was a cessation of business all through Palestine, the minds of men being wholly occupied with hopes and fears about his departure; but he left them, and, with a few monks as his companions, whose seem soon to have fallen off from him, he went his way, never to return to Palestine. He first turned his face towards Babylon, and there became the comforter of the bishops who had been exiled by Constantius; then to Egypt, where he slept in Antony's cell on the anniversary of the saint's departure, and called down rain after a long drought. He desired to be hid, but it was impossible. He fled to the Oasis, where it was revealed to him that the heathen city of Gaza had prevailed on Julian to set a reward upon his head; when suddenly his disciple Hadrian came to him with the news that Julian was dead, and that he could safely return to Palestine. But the motives of Hadrian were wrong; he desired only the glory of bringing back the saint, who, looking upon himself as an outlaw and a fugitive, took ship with but one companion, and sailed for Sicily. There he lay hid for a time; but a demoniac who had sought him out made him known, and his disciple Hesychius, who had searched through the world after him, at last discovered him. Being now made known, he again set forth in search of solitude; but, wherever he went, his miracles betrayed him. A boa constrictor at Epidaurus, in Dalmatia, came forth at his word to a pyre prepared for it, and was consumed. A volcanic inundation of the sea subsided at his command. The people came flocking round him, and he fled by sea. After a miraculous escape from pirates, he at length arrived in Cyprus, the home of his friend Epiphanius. There he found a solitary place, so inaccessible that he was no more beset with visitors; and in this place, which is still called by his name, he lived the last three years of his life, being often in the company of Hesychius and Epiphanius. Amidst all his austerities, he acknowledged the supremacy of charity. Being once pressed by Epiphanius to partake of a fowl which was on the table, he said that, since he had taken the habit of a monk, he had made it a law never to eat of anything which had life. "And I," said Epiphanius, "since I have worn the same habit, have made it a rule never to lie down to sleep without first taking care that I was at peace with all men." "Your rule," said Hilarion, "is better than mine." On his death, his body was buried in the grounds of a lady named Constantia. But Hesychius disinterred it, and carried it to Majoma, in Palestine. Constantia died of grief, but the translation of the relics caused joy throughout Palestine, where the anniversary of the event was observed as a festival. We have thus an Eastern example of that rapacity in the search for relics and the annual observance of their translation, which became afterwards so common in the West. (Vita S. Hilarionis, in Jerome's Works, vol. ii. 13-40, ed. Vall.; Sozomen, iii. 14; vi. 32; Vit. Patrum, lib. v. c. 4, § 15, p. 568, in Migne's Patrologia, vol. 73. His name occurs in the Byzantine Calendar, Oct. 21, as "Our Father Hilarion the Great." [W. H. F.]

HILARION (2), abbat of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome founded by Gregory the Great in his own house. Gregory was trained in monastic rules in this monastery, first by Hilarion and afterwards by Maximianus. (Joann. Diac. Vit. Greg. Mag. lib. i. cap. 6, in Patr. Lat. lxxv. 65 b.) [C. H.]

HILARION (3), a presbyter, who with another named Eustratius proposed certain difficulties either to Nicephorus patriarch of Constantinople (806–815), or to Theodorus Studita (ob. 826). Cotelier believed it was the former (Monum. Eccl. Graec. t. iii. 453, from the Codex Regius, n. 1770). The latter seems to be proved by the MS. Coisl. of the Royal Library, as well as another seen by Sirmond. Migne follows Sirmond in making the letter the 215th of Theodorus Studita (Patr. Graec. xcix. 1645–1664). Of the questions, seventeen in all, the following are specimens: might they communicate, pray, and eat with presbyters ordained at Rome, Naples, and in Lombardy who were ἀκήρυκτοι and ἀπολευμένοι? Should they admit presbyters ordained in Sicily, beyond the bounds of their province? Might they enter churches to pray and chant, where the bishops had communicated with heretics? Might they enter cemeteries to pray beside the tombs of the saints, when they were possessed by heretical presbyters? How should they treat monks ordained by heretics? What was to be done with a presbyter ordained by a deposed bishop after his deposition? Could orthodox presbyters and monks impose penance? (Migne, Patr. Graec. xcix. 1645; Ceillier, xii. 287.) [W. M. S.]

HILARIUS (1) (HELARUS), bishop of Aquileia, commemorated on March 16. He is said to have been a native of Pannonia, to have acceded A.D. 276, and suffered martyrdom by order of the prefect Beronius under the emperor Numerianus, cir. 283. He was succeeded by Chrysgonus of Byzantium. (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. ii. 418; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 27; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 23.) [R. S. G.]

HILARIUS (2), 6th bishop of Besançon, reported to have been sent by pope Sylvester to that place, which had been visited and richly gifted by Helena, the mother of Constantine. Hilarion built the cathedral, which was dedicated at first to St. Stephen and St. John; afterwards to St. John alone. There is a very doubtful tradition, that Macarius, patriarch of Jerusalem, sent a pall to Hilarion. But Besançon's metropolitan position was probably settled before that time, the general question having been treated at Nicaea (Gall. Ch. xv. 6.) [R. T. S.]

HILARIUS (3), second or fifth bishop of Mainz, in the untrustworthy lists of the early bishops of that see. Trithemius (Vit. S. Maximi Mogunt. in Surius, Nov. 18) calls him saint and martyr. (Gall. Ch. v. 433; Potthast, Biblioth. suppl. p. 353; Gams, Ser. Ep. 288.) [R. T. S.]

salem, intruded by Arian influence after the expulsion of Cyril. The succession at this period is very confused, and the name of Hilarion does not appear in some of the authorities. But he is given by Jerome (Chron. sub ann. 352), as well as by Socrates (H. E. ii. 45), Sozomen (iii. 13, iv. 30), and Theophanes (p. 39); and Epiphanius distinctly states that, at the time he was writing on the Manichaean heresy (c. 376) Hilarion, a favourer of Arian tenets, was occupying the see (Epiphanius. Haeres. lxvi. 20). (Cf. on this point, Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. vol. viii. "S. Cyrille de Jérus." note iv.) Le Quien (Or. Chr. iii. 157, 161 a) places him in 376 or 377; Clinton (F. R. i. 413, ii. 536) in 376. [E. V.]

HILARIUS (5), seventeenth bishop of Pavia, 358–376. Ughelli refers to Jerome Bossius, an historian of the bishops of Pavia in the 16th century, as stating that Hilarion held a synod against the Arians. The Bollandists under May 16 give a short account of him (Acta SS. Mai. iii. 577; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1078). Ceillier is inclined to identify him with the subject of the next article (Ceill. v. 510). [C. H.]

HILARIUS (6), the author, according to St. Augustine, who calls him "sanctus Hilarion" (Aug. Cont. Duas Epist. Pelag. lib. iv. cap. 4, § 7, sub fin.), of Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (Amb. Opp. tom. iv. p. 54, in Patr. Lat. xvii. 92 c). On the attempts to identify him see AMBROSIASER. [C. H.]

HILARIUS (7) PICTAVIENSIS, ST. (HILARY OF POICTIERS; ὁ Πικτιάβων ἐπίσκοπος, Socrates, H. E. iii. 9), a celebrated bishop and theologian of the 4th century. Died in A.D. 368.

8. Acts of certain Arian or semi-Arian councils, and certain orthodox ones, of which the records, being for the most part very imperfect, are mainly gathered from the writings of the ecclesiastical historians Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, with the aid of comments by St. Athanasius, St. Jerome, St. Basil, and fragments of lost works composed by Hilary. These councils are the following:—Council of Arles (Arrelatense), A.D. 353. [Arian.] Council of Milan (Mediolanense), A.D. 355. [Arian.] Council of Béziers, then Biterra (Biterrense), A.D. 356. First council of Sirmium, now Szerem in Sclavonia (Conc. Sirmiense), A.D. 357; summoned against Photinus. [Its claim to be orthodox is admitted, though not always unreservedly, by many authorities, ancient and modern.] Council of Ancyra, in Galatia (Conc. Ancyratum), A.D. 358. [Semi-Arian.] An assembly (conventus) at Sirmium in or about A.D. 358. [Semi-Arian.] A council held somewhere in Gaul in A.D. 359. [Orthodox, censuring the transactions at Sirmium.] Council of Rimini (Ariminense), also in A.D. 359. [The famous gathering, in which the orthodox were duped into subtle concessions to Arianism, referred to in the well-known sentence of St. Jerome, Ingenuit totus orbis et Arrianum se esse miratus est.] Council at Nice, in Thrace, during the same year, rescinding whatever good resolutions had been passed at Rimini. Council of Seleucia (Seleucianum), also in A.D. 359. [Semi-Arian; but condemns the Aetians, or, as they were often called, Acacians.] Council of Paris (Parisiense), in A.D. 360, or, according to some, 362. [Orthodox. Condemns the subtrefuges of Rimini, sends to the bishops of the East a letter re-stating the Catholic faith, and deposes the Arian bishop Saturninus from the see of Arles.] Letter of the bishops of Italy to their brethren, the faithful generally, in Illyria, A.D. 366. [Orthodox.] Council of Sigidia (Singiduense), in Hungary, A.D. 367. [Arian. An attempt to win over the semi-Arians.] These gatherings are all given in Labbe's Concilia (Paris, 1715), tom. i. pp. 697-747.

Life.—Hilary is believed to have been born, as observed above, actually in Poitiers. St. Jerome (in Galat.) distinctly asserts this, but some authorities prefer to name more vaguely the province of Aquitaine, rather than the capital. The apparent lack of any large middle class at this period inclines us to accept it as probable that those not humbly born may have been highly born, and Hilary is always considered to have sprung from an illustrious stock. He enjoyed the benefit of a good education in the Latin classics, and evidently cherished a special fondness for the writings of Quintilian.

About A.D. 350, Hilary being then a married man, but, it would seem, still tolerably young, appears to have renounced the errors of paganism, and to have become a Christian. It is true that his language on this subject, in the first book of his treatise De Trinitate, is not absolutely incompatible with the view suggested by the Benedictine editor, Dom Coutant, that he may possibly have been a careless and indifferent Christian, who at this date underwent a process of conversion, in the sense of turning earnestly to God. But it is a far more natural and obvious interpretation of Hilary's account of himself to understand, with the great majority of authorities, that he is describing a real and by no means a hasty change from actual heathenism. He depicts himself as gradually rising in the first place above the attractions to those mere enjoyments of ease and plenty which man has in common with the brutes; then aiming at knowledge of truth and the practice of virtue, in which he included the passive merits of patience, gentleness, and the like graces, as well as the active energies. A life to come, with at least equal or greater happiness, seemed to him the natural sequence of a career of goodness upon earth. But this reward must be the gift of God, a sole and supreme Being; for polytheism was, in his judgment, a system replete with absurdities. The books of Moses and the Psalms gave him abundant help in his desire to know God. But his consciousness of weakness, both of the body and the spirit, made him fear. Here the writings of apostles and evangelists came to his succour, more especially the Gospel of St. John, with its clear and emphatic teaching on the incarnation of the co-eternal Son. That there was a Christian atmosphere of thought around Hilary seems almost certain from the tone of his ethics and theology, while he was yet a heathen. But great as may have been the advantage thence accruing to him, his conversion, like that of many others in the early church—it is enough to name St. Justin Martyr and St. Augustine—was essentially due to the study of Holy Scripture.

After his baptism Hilary became an edifying example of a good Christian layman. He encouraged others also to hold firmly and to carry out in practice the faith which he had himself embraced. In social intercourse he at first literally obeyed that stern rule of severance from Jews and heretics which certain portions of apostolic teaching appeared to him to inculcate (2 St. John 10, 11; Titus iii. 10; 1 Cor. v. 11), but in later life he relaxed this severity, and formed his conduct upon that other part of St. Paul's example of becoming all things to all men that he might save some (1 Cor. ix. 19-23). He must have remained a layman for some few years. His wife's name is unknown, but a daughter, his only child, was called Abra (al. Apra seu Afra).

About A.D. 353 the see of Poitiers became vacant by the death of its occupant, believed by some to have been Maxentius, a brother of St. Maximin of Treves. As in the case of St. Ambrose and others, the popular voice fixed upon a devout layman as the new bishop, and Hilary was raised per saltum to the episcopate. He amply justified the choice. It is asserted in many modern biographies of Hilary that, from the time he became bishop, he lived an ascetic life, and was virtually, though not formally, separated from his wife. For this statement, no particle of direct evidence has been produced. All that can be said is that it is not impossible; that it did become a common practice, on elevation to the episcopate, especially in Egypt, at Rome, and in the East, a generation after the decease of Hilary,* but that earlier examples did occur, and that Hilary may have been one of them.

* St. Jerome's language (Lib. adv. Vigilantium and Lib. i. adv. Jovinianum) is constantly cited, as by Cellier and Alban Butler. But the repetition of such passages is a proof that no more direct evidence respecting Hilary is adducible. It is singular that these two biographers, and others who simply follow their lead, entirely ignore the statement of the case given by the historian Socrates; a statement made, not like that of Jerome in the course of a fiery controversy, but as part of a calm statement of the varieties of church dis-

Two years after his consecration a visit from St. Martin [MARTINUS], which was regarded as a compliment to the orthodoxy and zeal of Hilary, proved a prelude to an active struggle against the Arian party in Gaul, at that time headed by Ursacius, Valens, and Saturninus. Of these three, Saturninus occupies, in the writings of the orthodox, an evil pre-eminence, being represented as immoral, violent, and apt to seek the aid of the civil power against the defenders of the creed of Nicaea. That the spirit of controversy may have darkened the shades of his character is, of course, quite conceivable. But the Arians do seem, both in Gaul and elsewhere, to have taken the initiative in the appeal to the civil power; and the fact that Hilary unites with Sulpicius Severus in censuring Saturninus to a degree not extended to his comrades renders it unlikely that such charges are without foundation. The course, however, pursued by Ursacius and Valens, though less violent, was extremely fitful and uncertain. Their acquittal and subsequent re-condemnation of St. Athanasius, at the council of Milan in 355, naturally alarmed the faithful; and a majority of the bishops of Gaul, led by Hilary, formally separated themselves from the communion of these three. Many even among those who had leant towards Arianism now threw their lot with Hilary. The terms made with such were provisional, the condition being that they should be accepted and approved of by the confessors then suffering exile for the faith.

A council was held at Béziers, in Languedoc, at which Saturninus probably presided. Hilary (with some other orthodox bishops) was present, but declares that he was refused a hearing. The emperor Constantius received from Saturninus an account of this gathering, and at once resolved to banish Hilary to Phrygia, and with him one of his allies, St. Rhodanus, bishop of Toulouse. Hilary believed that the accusation laid against him before the emperor involved a charge of gross impropriety of conduct. As this event occurred soon after the council of Beziers, and before that of Seleucia, its date is assigned to the middle of the year 356.

This exile lasted somewhat more than three years. During this period Hilary enjoyed a good deal of liberty, and had much enforced leisure. The liberty he employed in examining the condition of religion in Asia Minor. His impression was exceedingly unfavourable, especially as regarded its episcopate. His leisure he devoted partly to composition and partly to discipline in different countries. "As the clergy in the East all abstain on principle (γνώμη) and even the bishops if they desire it, but they do not however act thus by compulsion of law (οὐ μὴν ἀνάγκη νόμου τοῦτο ποιεῖν). For many of them during the period of their episcopate have begotten sons in lawful matrimony." (H. E. lib. vi. cap. 22.) Döllinger, with characteristic fairness, does allude to this passage (Ch. Hist. period ii. chap. v. § viii.), and illustrates it by the well-known case of St. Gregory Nazianzen, who was born after his father had been for some time a bishop; but he maintains that Socrates is only speaking of the patriarchate of Constantinople. It is right to add that Ceillier gives the substance of the above extract in his article on Socrates. But he ought to have remembered it in his account of Hilary.

an attempt to remove misunderstandings, especially between the bishops of the East and those of Gaul; for the Gallicans imagined all in Asia to be sheer Arians, while the Orientals supposed their brethren in Gaul to be lapsing into Sabellianism. Hilary's treatise De Synodis belongs to this period, having been written in 358 or 359, as does also his great work, De Trinitate.

The year 359, the fourth of Hilary's exile, witnessed the council of Rimini in the West, and that of Seleucia in the East. It appears to have been the intention of the emperor that the decisions of these two assemblies, if accordant, should conjointly be regarded as the decrees of one oecumenical council.<sup>b</sup> Hilary was compelled by the secular authorities to attend that of Seleucia, Constantius himself having convoked it. He found there three sections—namely, the orthodox, the semi-Arian, and the ultra-Arian or Anomaeon. Although his presence was of great service in explaining the true state of things in Gaul, the language of the Acacians so shocked him that he retired from the assembly. These Anomaeans were nevertheless condemned there.

From Seleucia, Hilary betook himself to Constantinople, and was permitted to have an interview with the emperor. Here the Arians, having joined the Anomaeans, were in great force, and, having gathered another council in the Eastern capital, tried to reverse their failure at Seleucia. A challenge on the part of Hilary to discuss the questions at issue publicly, in presence of the emperor, on the evidence of Holy Scripture was, as he informs us, declined, and Constantius sent his prisoner back to Gaul without, however, formally annulling the sentence of banishment, or allowing him perfect liberty.

Speaking in a somewhat rough and general way, we may say that the energies of Hilary in Gaul were chiefly concerned with the Arians, but that his acts (though by no means all his writings) in Phrygia were more occupied with the semi-Arians. His attitude towards these two forms of error was, however, by no means identical. Arianism he regarded as a deadly heresy, with which anything like compromise was impossible. But with semi-Arianism or at any rate with certain leading semi-Arians he thought it quite possible to come to an understanding; and it will be seen in the account of his works how earnestly he strove to act as a peacemaker between them and the supporters of St. Athanasius and of the creed of Nicaea.

The three succeeding years (A.D. 360–362 inclusive) were partly occupied by Hilary in his journey homeward, which seems to have been rather dilatory, and, after his return, by efforts which, though of a conciliatory character, all aimed at the restoration of the faith as set forth at Nice. His joy at regaining Poitiers (where he was warmly welcomed) and at finding in health his wife, his daughter, and his disciple St. Martin, was dashed by the scenes he had witnessed during his progress. Constantius had banished from their sees all bishops who had refused to accept the formula promulgated at Rimini (Socrates, H. E. lib. ii. 37; confirmed by Sozomen, iv. 19, and by St. Jerome in his treatise adv. Luciferianos). Hilary was not prepared, with the more ardent of his friends, at once to refuse communion to all who had been betrayed into accepting the Riminian decrees. He preferred the plan of gathering together in different parts of Gaul assemblies of bishops, with the view of mutual explanation. This course of proceeding was adopted, and appears to have been attended with great success. Hilary's former opponent, Saturninus, bishop of Arles, in vain attempted to thwart the effects thus produced. The tide of feeling and of conviction turned completely against Saturninus, and in a short time he found himself deserted, and practically, perhaps even formally, excommunicated by the Gallican episcopate.

Satisfied with the condition of matters in Gaul, Hilary ventured, despite the unrepealed sentence of banishment, to make a journey into northern Italy and Illyria, that he might bring these provinces into spiritual conformity with his native land. He arrived in Italy A.D. 362 and was greatly encouraged and assisted by St. Eusebius of Vercelli. [EUSEBIUS (93) VERCELLENSIS.] That these two friends created a considerable impression, especially in remote districts, into which a fair statement of the points at issue had not penetrated, seems undoubted. But their efforts did not attain the measure of success which had been won by Hilary in Gaul. It is possible that Lucifer of Cagliari proved an obstacle. That this ardent and ultra-Athanasian supporter of orthodoxy [LUCIFER CALARITANUS] disapproved of one of the conciliatory manifestos put forth by Hilary will be seen below; and as on another ground he had broken with Eusebius,* and was opposed to all communion with any who had accepted the decrees of Rimini, he could not have viewed their career with satisfaction.

Hilary, nevertheless, remained in Italy during part of the year 362, the whole of 363, and into the late autumn of 364. Valentinian, who became emperor in Feb. 364, found Hilary at Milan in the November of that year. A serious altercation between Hilary and the bishop of Milan, Auxentius, attracted the attention of the new emperor. The generally charitable tone adopted by Hilary towards his ecclesiastical opponents gives warrant for accepting his unfavourable report of the conduct of Auxentius. According to Hilary, the profession of the creed of Nicaea made by Auxentius in the course of this controversy was thoroughly insincere. But Auxentius persuaded Valentinian that he was acting in good faith; and, as a natural result, Hilary was commanded to return to Gaul. Hilary at once obeyed, but he addressed the rulers and the flocks of the church at large in a work setting forth his own convictions respecting the real character of the bishop of Milan.

Hilary spent more than three years at Poitiers after his return from Italy. These later years, more especially the last two, were comparatively untroubled ones. He died calmly on Jan. 13, A.D. 368, though in the Roman service-books his day is marked as Jan. 14, that it may not interfere with the octave of the Epiphany. Before attempting to form an estimate of his character and of his services to the Christian faith, it is necessary to give some account of his writings.

Writings.—The writings of Hilary naturally fall into three classes, namely, I. Exegetical; II. Dogmatical; III. Controversial. One or two minor compositions must be treated separately, but the above divisions will be found to embrace the whole of his most important contributions to theology. It will be found more convenient to consider them under these heads than in a strictly chronological order. But the letters of the alphabet prefixed to each will serve to indicate what appears to be their sequence in respect of date.

I. EXEGETICAL.—1. (H) Exposition of the Psalms (Commentarii in Psalmos).—It is probable that Hilary at least intended to compose a complete commentary upon the Psalms. Whether he ever succeeded in carrying out this intention seems very doubtful. In any case only a portion is now extant, as the comments merely embrace (inclusively) the following Psalms:—i., ii.; ix.—xiii. (and perhaps xiv.); li.—lxix.; xc.—cl. (These numbers must be referred to the Vulgate reckoning, e.g. li. is lii., and lxix. is lxx. in the A.V.) The treatment is not critical. Origen and Jerome stand almost alone during the first five centuries of the Christian church as masters of Hebrew. But Jerome's translation was yet to come when Hilary wrote. As was natural, he leant mainly and somewhat too confidently upon the Septuagint. But he took full advantage of the comments of Origen; not indeed as actually interpreting them into Latin, but as availing himself of their tone and suggestions. Hilary tries to adopt a via media between urging on his readers the literal sense, and that reference of everything to Christ which marks the works of some later commentators, both patristic and mediæval. But although it cannot claim the position of a critical commentary, it is impossible to open it without finding oneself in communion with a deeply sincere and high-toned spirit; and Cave and Alban Butler are thoroughly justified in asserting for it the stamp of a truly devotional temper. We can only give—and we take it almost at random—a single, but it is believed a fair, specimen of its manner. Hilary is commenting upon the words, "I said unto the Lord, Thou art my God" (cxl. 6 in A. V.; cxxxix. in Sept. and Vulgate). "Non levis atque exiguae fiduciae est Domino dixisse, Deus meus es Tu. Loqui istud mens libidinoso, avara, insolens, ebria non potest. Renuntiandum his omnibus, et à servitute eorum ac famulatu desinendum est, ut ab his desinentes dicere audeamus, Dixi Domino, Deus meus es tu." He proceeds to shew that we are authorised to make these words our own, but that Christ could use them in a very special manner, as He virtually did on many occasions, such as the raising of Lazarus, the multiplication of the bread and fish, and before drinking His cup of woe at night in Gethsemane. A remark on Ps. lviii. 3 (lviii. A. V.) shews that

* This other ground was the trouble at Antioch, for which the reader is referred to the articles EVAGRIUS (5) ANTIOCHENSIS and PAULINUS ANTIOCHENSIS. Eusebius of Vercelli did not agree with Lucifer in approving of the consecration of Paulinus as bishop of Antioch.

Hilary would have shrunk from pressing to extremes what in the succeeding century would have been called Augustinian tenets. A curious ethnological statement occurs on Ps. cxix. (cxx.) 5, where he observes of those who "dwell in the tents of Kedar": "Hi sunt nunc Saraceni nuncupati." In after ages, from the days of Peter the Hermit, in A.D. 1099, to the death of the latest Crusader St. Louis in 1270, the inhabitants of Gaul were destined to become only too familiar with the name of these Saraceni, while they in turn were destined to pay an unconscious compliment to Gaul, in designating Europeans generally by the name of Franks.

2. Commentarii in Matthaeum (B).—This is the earliest commentary on one of the Gospels which the Western church produced; all previous ones being either, like that of Origen, in Greek, or, if in Latin, only partial, as some tractates of St. Cyprian. In the next century the work of Hilary was somewhat overshadowed by the commentaries produced by the genius of St. Augustine and the learning of St. Jerome in the West, and by the eloquence of St. Chrysostom in the East. But the honour due to Hilary must not on that account be withheld from him. Although, as in his comments on the Psalms, he may have made some use of the writings of Origen, there is much that is curious and sometimes acute as well as devout that seems to be really his own. Jerome and Augustine frequently quote it, as well as Vincent of Lerins and Hincmar, and some excerpts are woven from it by the most famous of schoolmen, Aquinas, into his well-known Cutena Aurea of commentaries on the Gospels. Its date cannot be fixed with certainty, but it was probably composed in the earlier years of the author's episcopate, before his banishment to Phrygia in A.D. 356.

The following are some of the more curious features of this commentary. On the difficult expressions recorded by St. Matthew concerning divorce (v. 31, 32), Hilary seems to lean to the interpretation which regards Christian marriage as absolutely indissoluble. He would consequently forbid re-marriage even to the innocent party in the case of separation à mensa et thoro. On St. Matthew xiv. 19, Hilary refers to the holy Eucharist as "the heavenly food of eternal life" (vitae aeternae cibum coelestem). Of the multiplication of the loaves (xv. 36, 37), he writes in striking language, "Crescit deinde materies, nescio utrum in mensarum loco, an in manibus sumentium, an in ore edentium. Mundi auctor hoc facto innotescit." (Cf. Trench on The Miracles.) His interpretation of the blessing given to St. Peter (xvi. 17-19) must be spoken of farther on. Of Hilary's endeavours to solve difficulties, such as e.g. that of the genealogies of our Lord, it may be affirmed that they indicate a real willingness to face them, and are not devoid of some measure of acuteness. But the solution offered is occasionally such as no opponent could be expected to accept, e.g. the assertion that fourteen rather than thirteen is the correct number of the generations between Jehonias and Joseph, because there are two generations in Jesus Christ, the temporal and the eternal. On "the brethren of the Lord," Hilary, like Dr. Mill and others in our own day, uses the powerful argument, that Christ would not have committed the Virgin Mother to the care of St.

John, if she had had children of her own. But he adopts the questionable view, usually connected with the name of Epiphanius, that they were children of Joseph by a former wife.

The following passage seems worthy of citation. On arriving in his commentary to the Lord's Prayer (vi. 9-13), Hilary writes: "De orationis antem sacramento necessitate nos commentandi Cyprianus, vir sanctae memoriae, liberavit. Quamquam et Tertullianus hinc volumine optimum scripsit; sed consequens error hominis detraxit scriptis probabilibus auctoritatem." The assumption that his readers would either know, or might easily procure the writings of St. Cyprian shews how much circulation such works were procuring among Christians. Nor is his brief reference to the merits and the errors of Tertullian less remarkable. The career of Tertullian is evidently assumed as known.

3. Since the publication of the Benedictine edition in 1693, an additional fragment on Psalm cxlviii. has been published by Cardinal Mai in his Bibliotheca Nova Patrum (Rome, 1852, tom. i. p. 471), also two short tractates (ib. p. 477), treating respectively of the genealogies of our Lord, of the Gospel according to St. John, and part of a sermon on The Paralytic, with two other brief fragments. An epitome of the two former is given by the editor of the new edition of Dom Ceillier (Hist. Auteurs sacrés, tom. iv. pp. 30-32).

Dom Pitra has also given in the Spicilegium Solesmense (tom. i. pp. 49-159, Paris, 1862) some commentaries which he assigns to Hilary, on St. Paul's Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Timothy, and Titus. All, excepting that on the Galatians, are brief and fragmentary. That Hilary did write comments on all the Pauline epistles seems tolerably certain, but that these are the missing commentaries can hardly be considered as proven. Dom Pitra has given the ground of his decision in his preface (pp. xxvi-xxxv), and certainly what Hallam calls "the Benedictine spirit of mildness and veracity" demands respect, especially in a question of this nature. But the arguments of Dom Pitra do not seem to the present writer very cogent, and Mr. Swete in his recent edition of Theodore of Mopsuestia appears to have proved that the commentaries are the work of that author. A better case is made for the heads of a commentary on the 1st chapter of Genesis (ib. 159-165). It is more metaphysical than the general strain of Hilary's compositions; but not more so perhaps than some of the discussions—those on the soul for instance—in his De Trinitate.

Before we leave the subject of Hilary's exegetical writings, it is necessary to say a word on the ignorance ascribed to him by Jerome, not merely of Hebrew but of Greek. Hilary's friend Heliodorus [HELIODORUS (13)] is said by Jerome to have rendered Hilary assistance in the interpretation of difficult passages of Origen. Erasmus (followed by Cave) refuses to believe this assertion. Ceillier is perplexed, and considers Jerome inconsistent with himself. That Jerome can at moments make ill-natured overstatements is undeniable; and his language in the case before us is probably, to say the least, exaggerated. But Ceillier's editor may be justified in denying any positive inconsistency on Jerome's part, when he ascribes to Hilary an imitation of Greek ornaments of style despite the appeals to Heliodorus. Such an appeal need not have involved more than an occasional discussion on the exact bearing of this or that observation of Origen. It may be observed that Hilary, though fond of allegory, begins with the literal sense, and does not, like Origen, seem to thrust it on one side.

Jerome's compliment to Hilary as "the Rhone of eloquence" (Rhodanus eloquentiæ) is of course quite compatible with the complaint that his periods are too lengthy, and consequently sometimes unintelligible to any but learned readers. But Erasmus justly observes that the severity of style which we admire in the Latin authors of the highest rank was a charm seldom seized by any but those who were either natives of Rome, or else had breathed the air of the capital from an early age.

Hilary's somewhat excessive respect for the Septuagint probably led him to embrace, without due examination, the Alexandrian rather than the Palæstinian canon of the Old Testament. But although he occasionally cites some portions of the Apocrypha (as Judith, Wisdom, and the Books of Maccabees) as Scripture, it may be doubted whether he has anywhere founded an argument for doctrine upon them. He is earnest in urging on his readers the study of those Scriptures, which had been the means of his own conversion to the faith. At the same time he lays much stress on the need of humility and reverence on the part of those who would fain read them with profit. Both the Word and the Sacraments become spiritual food for the soul.

II. DOGMATICAL.—Libri XII de Trinitate (D).—For the words De Trinitate in this title some copies give Contra Arianos, others De Fide, and others some slight varieties of a like kind. But the title De Trinitate appears on the whole to be the most suitable; and it is remarkable that, as Hilary's commentary on St. Matthew is the most ancient extant exposition of the first gospel by a Latin father, so is the De Trinitate the first great contribution, in the Latin tongue, to the discussion of this great dogma of the Christian faith. The idea of twelve books is said by Jerome to have arisen, rather strangely, from the fact that Quintilian (to whose writings Hilary, as has been observed, was very partial) had divided into the same number his Institutionis Oratoriae Libri. The following is a brief epitome of Hilary's great contribution to dogmatic theology.

Book i. treats of natural religion, and the way in which it leads men up to revelation.

Book ii. especially discusses the baptismal formula (St. Matth. xxviii. 19). Book iii. treats of the union of the two natures in Christ.

Book iv. shews that this co-existence of two natures does not derogate from the unity of his Divine Person. Book v. urges, as against heretics, the testimony adducible in favour of the propositions stated in the preceding book from the teaching of the prophets (ex auctoritatibus prophetis). Book vi. is mainly occupied with refutations of the erroneous doctrines taught by Sabellians and by Manichæans. Book vii. shews how the errors of Ebionites, Arians, and Sabellians mutually overthrow each other, thus expanding in detail a general principle asserted by the author in book i. § 26: "Lis eorum est fides nostra." Book viii. contains a demonstration of the unity of God, and shews that it is nowise affected by the Sonship of Christ: "Non auferens filio Dei nativitatem, sed neque per eam duum deorum divinitatem introducens." Book ix. replies to the Arians in respect of certain texts to which they were in the habit of appealing, such as St. Mark xiv. 32, St. Luke xviii. 19, St. John v. 19, xiv. 28, xvii. 3. Books x. and xi. continue this line of argument, and discuss such passages as St. Matth. xxvi. 38, 39, 46, St. Luke xxiii. 46, St. John xx. 17, and 1 Cor. xv. 27, 28. Book xii. is also expressly written against Arianism. It contains inter aliâ a passage of much beauty, which bears a slight resemblance to the devout and eloquent pleading contained in the 9th chapter of the Book of Wisdom. Hilary's aspiration begins as follows: "Auxilii et misericordiae tuæ munus orandum est, ut extensa tibi fidei nostræ confessionisque vela flatu Spiritus tui impleas, nosque in cursum prædicationis initea propellas."

It can hardly be doubted but that such a work, coming from the pen of one, whose life was so consistent with his writings, and who was at once bold and yet charitable, must have produced a very considerable effect. The number of Christians in the West who could read treatises in Greek, such as those of Athanasius, was comparatively small. Hence the importance of a magnum opus of this nature. The enforced leisure of Hilary enabled him indeed to produce in this work a longer, more methodical, and more consecutive anti-Arian argument than Athanasius himself had found time to indite.

Viewed intellectually, it must perhaps be ranked above the author's commentary on Scripture. Its recognition of the rights of reason as well as of faith, combined with its sense of human ignorance, and of our need of humility, its explanation of many of the difficulties of the subject and of the meaning of the terms employed; the endeavour (though not always successful) to adapt to his subject the imperfect instrument of the Latin language; the mode of his appeals to Holy Scripture—all form very striking features of this work. It contains moreover many felicitous descriptions, not only of the temper in which we ought to approach the study of these mysteries, but also of the spirit in which we ought not to approach it. The following dicta may give some idea of Hilary's sentiments on our degree of knowledge of the Almighty:—"Perfecta scientia est sic Deum scire, ut, licet non ignorabilem, tamen inerrabilem scias; credendus est, intelligendus est, adorandus est, et his officiis eloquendus" (lib. ii. cap. 7). This, again, is his description of those who rather patronise than really accept the faith:—"Multi enim sunt qui simulantes fidem non subditi sunt fidei, sibi fidem ipsi potius constituunt quam accipiunt sensu humane inanitatis inflati" (iii. 26). He had before (i. 18) warned his readers to try to win the truth from Scripture rather than impose their sense upon it:—"Optimum enim lector est, qui dictorum intelligentiam expectet ex dictis potius quam imponat, et rettulerit magis quam attulerit." The book evidently produced a great impression. A high compliment to its merits is paid by the historian Socrates when he speaks of the joint labours of Hilary and of Eusebius of Vercelli:—"Both nobly contended side by side for the faith. And Hilary, who was an eloquent man, set forth in his book the dogmas of the Homöusion in the Latin tongue . . . and powerfully confuted the Arian dogmas." (Ἀμφω μὲν οὖν γενναίως τῇ πίστει συνηγωνίσαντο. Ἰαρίως τε καὶ ἐλλόγημος ὢν βιβλίοις τῇ Ῥωμαίων γλώττῃ τὰ τοῦ ὁμοουσίου παρέδωκε δόγματα . . . δυνατῶς δὲ καὶ τῶν Ἀρειανῶν δογματῶν καθήψατο.)—H. E. iii. 10.

Its indirect influence must also be taken into account. Many a teacher, who lacked the learning and the intellectual power to produce such a treatise, would be perfectly capable of availing himself of its stores in the composition of small tractates and homilies. Its very existence may be said to mark an epoch in the history of dogmatic theology in the Western church.

But its influence, however great during the lifetime of Hilary and the generation which immediately succeeded, was destined to suffer some measure of abatement in the next century and throughout both the earlier and the later middle age. About A.D. 416, some fifty-six years after the publication of the work of Hilary, appeared the fifteen books De Trinitate of the great bishop of Hippo. St. Augustine became so completely the doctor par excellence of the West, that the labours of Hilary, most effective at the time of their appearance, and probably a necessary condition of subsequent efforts in the same direction, became somewhat neglected and obscured. And not only is there impressed upon all the productions of Augustine that stamp of genius which must ever mark him among the few select masters of thought, but there also existed in relation to this particular work an advantage on the side of the later author. The errors of Pelagianism, perhaps some anticipations of Nestorianism, had certainly by the time of Augustine tended to bring out into clearer relief some particular phases and elements of Christian doctrine. The admission of developments in this sense is fully recognised by the Lutheran Dörner and by the Anglican Professor Hussey. Nor can it be called a novel theory. "By the very events," writes the historian Evagrius, "by which the members of the church have been rent asunder have the true and faultless dogmas (τὰ ὀρθὰ καὶ ἀμόμητα δόγματα) been the more fully polished and set forth, and the Catholic and apostolic church of God hath gone on to increase and to a heavenward ascent" (H. E. lib. i. cap. 11). "Many things," says Augustine himself, "pertaining to the Catholic faith, while in course of agitation by the hot restlessness of heretics, are, with a view to defence against them, weighed more carefully, understood more clearly, and preached more earnestly; and the question mooted by the adversary hath become an occasion of our learning."<sup>4</sup> The intentions of

It seems right to remark that Dean Hook, in his University Sermons preached before 1838, called attention to this as a favourite opinion of St. Augustine's. Bishop Moberly, in his Discourses on the Great Forty Days (preface and discourse iv.) has shewn the difference between this view and the modern Roman theory of development.

Hilary were so thoroughly good, that both his studies of Holy Scripture and the influence of the three later oecumenical councils would in a human likelihood have saved him from some serious mistakes, if he had lived to hear of the decisions. It is true, as the Benedictine editor points out, that Hilary's language in his comment upon Psalm liii. 8 condemns not only Apollinaris, but (by anticipation) Nestorius and Eutyches as well. Nevertheless, such mistakes as Hilary did make are all connected with the subject, which has been summed up in a masterly manner by Hooker (E. P. bk. chaps. lii.-liv., especially § 10 of liv.), namely the union of the two natures in the one divine personality of Christ. The chief of these mistakes are as follows:—

In the 10th book of his De Trinitate, Hilary seems to approach to a denial of the truth proclaimed in the Athanasian Creed (cp. the second of the Anglican 39 articles and the cognate documents of other communions), that the Incarnate Lord took man's nature from His Virgin Mother, of her substance. This is probably only an incautious over-statement of that other article of the creed, that "He was conceived of the Holy Ghost." For the language of Hilary in other passages of this very book and of Psalms cxxxviii. and lxxv. implies a complete acceptance of the Homo ex substantiâ Matris.

There also appears to be some laxity of usage on the part of Hilary in regard to the terms Verbum and Spiritus. Certainly it would seem that the former word ought to be substituted for the latter in the following excerpt from the same book:—"Spiritus sanctus desuper veniens naturæ se humanæ carne immiscuit." Nevertheless, Dom Coutant is able to appeal to similar confusion of language in the writings not only of Tertullian and Lactantius, but even in those of St. Irenæus and St. Cyprian. St. Gregory and St. Athanasius seem inclined to palliate. Again, one of Hilary's chief assailants, Erasmus accuses him (in lib. viii. De Trin.) of exaggerating the closeness of our union with the Father as the Son. But this language, though rash, is probably excusable. It might be, no doubt, pressed into pantheism. But this is hardly an error likely to have found sympathy from one who so earnestly defended the Homöusion of the Nicene Creed. That term marks off the nature of the union between the Son and the Father as one to which the creature, however favoured and blest, can never attain. Hilary may have only meant to dwell strongly on the union vouchsafed to Christ's people through the incarnation and the sacraments.

A more serious error is Hilary's apparent want of grasp of the truth of our Lord's humanity in all things, sin alone excepted. At times he seems to speak of our Lord's nature as if endued with impassibility (indolentia) and of His soul as if not obnoxious to the human affections of fear, grief, and the like. Attention was directed to this grave mistake in the succeeding century by Claudianus Mamertus in the 2nd book of his De Statu Animæ, in the middle age by a scholastic writer named John, a provost of some community, and later by Scultetus, and (with some severity) by Erasmus. The Protestants Dailé and Rivet take the same side. The other mistakes of Hilary are more or less galliated by Lanfranc, by the two great schoolmen, Peter Lombard and Aquinas, and by Bonaventure. Hilary also meets with indulgence from Natalis Alexander (ubi supra); and, above all, is defended by his Benedictine editor, Dom Coutant, who, as Cave justly remarks, "naevos explicare, emollire et vindicare satagit." A sort of tradition was handed down to Bonaventure by a schoolman, William of Paris, that Hilary had made a formal retraction of his error concerning the indolentia, which he had ascribed to our Lord. This seems very doubtful; nevertheless, the language of his later books, as that on the Psalms, appears to recognise the reality of both the mental and bodily sufferings of Christ.

It may be asked, not unnaturally, how it was that these mistakes did not attract more attention during Hilary's lifetime, or at the hands of his immediate successors. The reason appears to be that the public mind, whether in politics or in religion, is frequently so much occupied with some one or two prominent questions that others, not less important in themselves, are left comparatively unnoticed. Hilary's sojourn in Gaul was, as we have remarked, almost solely occupied with Arianism, of which he was an uncompromising opponent; while the period of his residence in Phrygia was almost equally engrossed with the cause of semi-Arianism, with which he tried to come to an understanding. His utterances on the problems subsequently raised by the heresies of Nestorius and of Eutyches look rather like the obiter dicta of a judge, who, being mainly occupied with the case before him, only gives a comparatively transient attention to incidental questions not immediately bearing upon the main points at issue. Only in this way can we understand the often cited words of Jerome concerning Hilary, as one whose writings "inoffenso decurri pedi"; as numbered among those "in quorum libris pietas Fidei non racillet"; and the consentient testimony of Augustine, who styles him "Ecclesie Catholice adversus Haereticos acerrimum defensorem"; and, again, "non mediocri auctoritatis in tractatione Scripturarum ad assertionem Fidei virum."

These are among the passages noted under the section Authorities. The present writer is strengthened in his trust, that the above explanation of a difficulty is fairly correct, by observing the treatment which Hilary receives from Möhler, whose account of the De Trinitate he had not read when the above paragraph was penned. Few divines of this century would be less likely to think lightly of Docetic or Nestorian or Eutychian heresy than Möhler. Yet so completely is this eminent thinker engrossed for the moment with the subject of Arianism in his Athanasius der Grosse, that his highly appreciative account of the De Trinitate (which occurs towards the end of the 5th book of that work) does not so much as allude to Hilary's mistakes. Hilary has, however, found in this 19th century a still more enthusiastic defender than Möhler in that eminent Lutheran divine, the learned and philosophic Dörner. In his great work on the Person of Christ (first period, third epoch) Dörner devotes more than twenty pages to a consideration of the teaching of Hilary on the Incarnation. In opposition to Baur of Tübingen, who was certainly inclined in pejus interpretari the writings of the bishop of Poitiers, Dörner puts the very best possible interpretation on every word and phrase of Hilary. In Dörner's estimation Hilary has not "met with the consideration which he deserves;" is "one of the most original and profound of the Fathers;" and has set forth "a view of Christology, which is one of

III. POLEMICAL. — 1. Ad Constantium Augustum Liber Primus.—This address, which is probably the earliest extant composition of Hilary, is a petition to the emperor for toleration [SONS OF CONSTANTINE; CONSTANTIUS II.]. It was evidently written before his exile, either at the close of the year 355 or early in 356. The copies which have reached us do not appear to be quite perfect. The concluding part is wanting, and a reference to something that he has said betrays the existence of some lacuna in the middle. But its general drift is clear enough. It is a petition for toleration for the orthodox in Gaul against the persecution of Arian bishops and Arian laymen. These assaults, unless Hilary is not to be believed, must have been in some respects of a coarse as well as cruel character. Hilary names some of the supporters of Arianism, both in the East and in Gaul. Among the latter, Ursacius and Valens occupy a painful prominence. Even on political grounds it is a mistake for the emperor to allow of such proceedings. Among his Catholic subjects will be found the best defenders of the realm against internal sedition or barbarian invasion from without. The excellent tone of this address is admitted on all sides. Both admirers and assailants of Hilary are struck with the expression of some of the pleas on behalf of toleration in cap. 6:—"Deus cognitionem sui docuit potius quam exigit. . . Deus universitatis est Dominus; non requirit coactam confessionem. Nostrâ potius, non suâ causâ venerandus est. . . Simplicitate quaerendus est, confessione discendus est, caritate amandus est, timore venerandus est, voluntatis probitate retinendus est." Whether this petition produced any effect is a matter on which we have no distinct evidence. Baronius considers that a law of Constantius (given in the Theodosian code, lib. xvi. tit. 2), which exempts the cases of bishops from secular tribunals, and refers them to their episcopal brethren, may have been a result of Hilary's address. But the date of this law (Sept. 23, A.D. 355) militates against such an inference.

2. Ad Constantium Augustum Liber Secundus.—This second address is subsequent to its author's exile, having been presented to the emperor in A.D. 360. In it he protests his innocence of all charges brought against him. He is still in effect a bishop in Gaul, ministering to his flock through the clergy. He would gladly meet the man whom he regards as the author of his exile, Saturninus, bishop of Arles. He is also anxious to plead for the faith in the council now about to be summoned. He will argue from Holy Scripture, but he warns the emperor that the most interesting in the whole of Christian antiquity." Although it is possible that Dörner has allowed himself to be too much carried away by affection for Hilary, his treatment of the subject deserves the fullest consideration. In declaring that by his appreciation of the divine and human elements in our Lord, Hilary "evinced himself to be, in the true sense, a teacher of the Church," Dörner was, singularly enough, anticipating pope Pius IX., who a few years since pronounced Hilary "to be a doctor of the Church." How much is implied in a title thus given, we must leave to our Roman Catholic fellow-Christians to settle among themselves. They appear, at present, to agree on this point as much as about the Vatican decrees. The title may signify a great deal or exceedingly little.

every heretic maintains that his creed is agreeable to Scripture. He is deeply conscious of the injury wrought to Christianity in the sight of the outer world by the distractions of so many rival councils and professions of faith. His description of the chaos thus produced seems to have much delighted two writers, of whom one at least has no sympathy with his earnestness and devotion, Locke and Gibbon. The passage (cap. 4 of this tractate) is too important to be omitted:—"It is a thing equally deplorable and dangerous that there are as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as there are faults among us, because we make creeds arbitrarily and explain them arbitrarily. The Homöusion is rejected, and received, and explained away by successive synods. The partial or total resemblance of the Father and of the Son is a subject of dispute for these unhappy times. Every year, nay every moon, we make new creeds to describe invisible mysteries. We repent of what we have done, we defend those who repent, we anathematize those whom we defended. We condemn either the doctrine of others in ourselves or our own in that of others; and reciprocally tearing one another to pieces, we have been the cause of each other's ruin." These sad dissensions are connected with the list of councils given at the beginning of this article, in many of which Hilary took part, though he was only actually present at some of them.<sup>f</sup>

3. Contra Constantium Augustum Liber.—This book is addressed to the bishops of Gaul. There can be little doubt but that Jerome is mistaken in asserting its composition to be later than the death of Constantius. Internal evidence sufficiently confutes the idea. It is, however, very probable that its existence did not become widely known until after the death of that emperor in A.D. 361. Concerning the tone of the previous addresses, there is no question. "It would be unjust to Hilary," says Milman, "not to acknowledge the beautiful and Christian sentiments scattered through his two former addresses to Constantius, which are firm but respectful; and if rigidly, yet sincerely, dogmatic. His plea for toleration, if not consistently maintained, is expressed with great force and simplicity." (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. chap. v. note.)

But in this third production, Hilary's tone is utterly changed. He has given up all hope of exercising any influence on the mind of Constantius. The emperor too, on his side, has altered the traditional line of policy against opponents. It seems to have occurred to him, as from time to time will often happen, that the day for harsh measures has gone by; that it is most undesirable to inflict any punishments which will enlist public sentiment on the side of those whom he desires to thwart, and that the resources of a palace must now be brought to bear in an utterly different way. Constantius is here charged, not with the employment of anything like persecution, but with the enticements of bribes, of good dinners, of flatteries and invitations to court.

It is possible that these blandishments did affect some minds, which would have been proof against imprisonment or death. Hilary is found to be excited by it to a degree nowhere else observable throughout his varied and elaborated compositions. For once he will appear to many to have laid aside his usual self-restraint, perhaps to have lost his temper, and to have forgotten his usual respectfulness and charity of language. Constantius has become, in his eyes, an Antichrist, who would fain make a present of the world to Satan. He appeals to former evidences of his sincerity and moderation towards opponents, but this is no occasion for such gentleness. Much does he long for the days when the little-horse, and the stocks, and all the other instruments of torture, were plied against the truth. They nerved men to resist, and, if need were, to die. "At nunc pergamus contra persecutorem fallentem, contra hostem blandientem, contra Constantium antichristum; qui non terga caedit, sed ventrem palpat; non proscribit ad vitam, sed ditat in mortem; non trudit carcere ad libertatem, sed intra palatium honorat ad servitum" * (§ 5).

On no subject is there larger room for unfairness and for self-deceit, than on the judgments which we form concerning sarcasm and invective. If they are employed on behalf of a cause which is dear to us, the irony is a lawful weapon, and we point to the use and the defence of it by Pascal, or appeal for sanction to the withering sarcasms of an Elijah against the worshippers of Baal. In like manner the invective is a holy anger, a righteous severity—

"Si natura negat, facti indignatio versum."

It is not merely the scourge wielded by a heathen Juvenal or Tacitus, it is the natural language on fitting occasions of God's prophets of all time; and it receives its loftiest sanction in that solemn, though most pathetic, outburst which preceded the departure of the Prophet of prophets from the doomed temple in Jerusalem. But when they are being launched against us, the irony is apt to become in our eyes the most obvious token of mere irreverence, and the denunciation, instead of challenging respect, is of itself an absolute demonstration of the violence and weakness of our adversaries.

Before we accept, then, the judgment of historians upon Hilary, or upon any other champion of a cause who has allowed himself to be hurried away into the language of vehemence or scorn,

* That we may not seem to conceal anything, we subjoin a few more of Hilary's most violent expressions:—"Cesset itaque maledictorum opinio et mendacii suspicio. Veritatis enim ministros decet vera proferre Si falsa dicimus, infamias sit sermo maledictus (§ 6) . . . Proclamo tibi, Constanti, quod Neroni locuturus fuissem quod ex me Decius et Maximianus audissent. Contra Deum pugnas, contra ecclesiam sævis, sanctos persequeris, prædicatores Christi odisti, religionem tollis tyrannus non jam humanorum, sed divinorum es . . . Christianum te mentiris, Christi novus hospes es, Antichristum prævenis, et arcanorum mysteria ejus operaris" (§ 7).

it is only fair to ask whether his critics do or do not hold for truth the principle for which the writer was contending. It does not follow, indeed, in the instance before us, that the tone of Hilary's letter is defensible. But it is only simple justice to bear in mind that to Hilary, as to his contemporary and fellow-labourer, Athanasius, the question came in this form: "Is, or is not, the Christian religion worth preserving?" That the faith of Nicaea did involve the very kernel of Christianity is no mere conviction of theirs. It is, in our own day, the admission of many bystanders and even of opponents of Christianity. "La religion chrétienne," writes one, "c'est-à-dire, la rédemption des hommes par un Dieu fait homme." "The essence of the belief," writes another, "lies in the divinity of Christ." "It is," says a third most justly, "the main principle of the Christian religion." As a rule, however, the severest censure of Hilary seems to proceed, not from avowed adversaries of the faith—for they can at least conceive that what moves them so strongly in the way of opposition may influence others as keenly in the way of defence—but from the sceptics, who have no religious convictions of their own, and are unable to imagine that such convictions can be cherished by others. Moreover, some of them imply that, if they, like Hilary, had been exiled for three years upon false charges, they would never have lost their temper, or forgotten the proprieties of language. On this point it may be permissible to have doubts. It is right also to bear in mind that, among the charges brought against the emperor by Hilary, are those of having condemned orthodox presbyters to work in the mines, and of having caused the death of the saintly bishop of Treves, Paulinus, by banishing him to heretical districts, where he had been compelled to beg his bread. The entire letter shews that Hilary had lost all hope of any aid to the faith being granted by Constantius, and it is at least just to give its due weight to the remark of Möhler, that, "if we drive men to despair, we ought to be prepared to hear them speak the language of despair."

As regards Constantius, he seldom obtains a good word from any authorities, whether heathen or Christian, ancient or modern. "The vain and feeble mind of the emperor"<sup>h</sup> did, however, at least in his later days, shew itself in its best light in the presence of fierce re-primations. It is probable that Constantius would have tolerated the invectives of Hilary with the same equanimity as those addressed to him by Lucifer of Cagliari. But Constantius died before any copy had reached him.

Before quitting these letters to Constantius, it is necessary to refer to one other point of considerable importance. In the second letter the emperor is praised by Hilary for his anxiety that his faith should be scriptural. But this is precisely what the bishop of Poitiers maintains that he is teaching. "Fidem, Imperator, quaeris: audi eam non de novis chartulis, sed de Dei libris." But Constantius must remember that the heretics make precisely the same claim. Marcellus, Photinus, Sabellius (all of whom the emperor's allies resisted and denounced), maintained that their tenets were scriptural. Nay, even Montanus, by the ministry of his mad women, defends from this source his doctrine of another paraclete, "Omnes Scripturas sine Scripturae sensu loquuntur, et fidem sine fide praetendunt." Constantius, however, in demanding that the teaching of the church shall be in accordance with Scripture (secundum ea quae scripta sunt) is understood by many to have meant that all creeds (possibly even all preaching) should be limited to terms expressly used in Scripture. This demand was not unfrequently made by the semi-Arians. But it will not bear examination. To have granted it would have caused no cessation of controversy, because the very point at issue was, what was the meaning of the terms employed in Scripture. No religious community has found it possible, in any age, to draw up its formularies under such a limitation. Moreover, it came with a bad grace from semi-Arians, whose own watchword, the Homoeousion, was certainly not to be found in Scripture, and with a still worse grace from Arians, who had quite a list of terms—those, namely, condemned in the first form of the Nicene Creed—which were wholly extraneous to Scripture. Both schools probably lay open to the complaint made by Kant against those religionists of his own age and country who, according to him, said, "Do not take your belief from man, but go straight to the Bible, the Word of God"; but who always practically added, "But mind, you must not find anything there that we do not find, because, if you do, you are wrong."<sup>1</sup>

4. De Synodis (C).—This may be considered as what lawyers would call "the short title," by which is commonly designated Hilary's tractate De Synodis Fidei Catholicae contra Arianos et praevaricatores Arianis acquiescentes. It is also occasionally referred to as De Fide Orientalium; and sometimes, though less frequently, as De Synodis Graeciae, or even simply as Epistola. Internal evidence furnishes a satisfactory approximation to the date of its composition. Hilary alludes to coming councils to be held, by order of Constantius, at Ancyra and at Rimini. Now, the emperor made a partial change in this arrangement, and for Ancyra substituted Seleucia. (Nicomedia had at one time been proposed, but the terrible earthquake of Aug. 24, in A.D. 358, overthrew the city.) Consequently Hilary's manifesto, which displays entire ignorance of this change,<sup>1</sup> must have been written in 358 or very early in 359.

The De Synodis is a letter from Hilary, an exile in Phrygia, to his brother bishops in Gaul. They had asked him for an explanation of the numerous professions of faith which the Orientals seemed to be putting forth. Hilary, <sup>1</sup> For the convenience of considering in one whole the three works addressed to Constantius, we have placed out of its order the De Synodis, which chronologically should come between the Liber Primus and the Liber Secundus ad Constantium. On like grounds, in order to keep together the polemical writings of Hilary, we discuss the epistle to his daughter after that against Auxentius and the Fragmenta, instead of before them, which it was in point of date.

although (as we have seen from his subsequent second letter to Constantius) deeply conscious of the harm being wrought by these proceedings, wrote back in this case a thorough Irenicon; for such must the De Synodis among all his writings especially be considered. Praising his Gallic brethren for their firmness in opposing Saturninus, and for their just condemnation of the second formula proposed at Sirmium, he desires that both they and their brethren in Britain (provinciarum Britanniarum episcopi) should come to Ancyra or to Rimini in a conciliatory frame of mind. Just as the orthodox Homöusion may be twisted into Sabellianism, even so may the unorthodox Homoëusion be found patient of a good interpretation. It may be shewn to those who are well disposed that, rightly understood, in asserting complete similarity it in reality involves identity. The faith professed at Sardica was, he maintains, substantially sound. It asserted the external origin of the Son from the substance of the Father, and condemned the heresy of Photinus, "quæ initium Dei filii ex partu Virginis mentiebatur." Hilary in turn appeals to the more peace-loving among the semi-Arian bishops to accept both terms in their true sense. "Date veniam, Fratres, quam frequenter poposci. Ariani non estis; cur negando homöusion censemini Ariani?" (§ 88.) And here comes in that remarkable statement, that for his own part he had never, before his exile, heard the Nicene Creed, but had made it out for himself from the Gospels and other books of the new Testament. "Regeneratus pridem, et in episcopatu aliquantisper manens, fidem Nicaenam nunquam, nisi exsulaturus, audivi: sed mihi homöusii et homoëusii intelligentiam Evangelia et Apostoli intimaerunt. Pium est quod volumus. Ne damnemus patres, ne animemus hæreticos, ne dum hæresin appellimus, hæresin nutriamus."

This proposal does not seem to go much beyond the well-known words of Hilary's fellow-labourer in the same cause, the great St. Athanasius himself.<sup>k</sup> But a peace-maker is often suspected on one side, sometimes upon both. His first letter to Constantius, his commentary on St. Matthew, his confessorship as shewn in the fact of his exile, did not save Hilary from suspicion. In some quarters he was held to have conceded too much to the semi-Arians, and this sentiment found a spokesman in the well-known Lucifer of Cagliari<sup>l</sup> [LUCIFER CALARITANUS], the earnest but somewhat harsh-minded representative of that extreme wing of the supporters of the faith of Nicaea which might be called more Athanasian than Athanasius. Some apologetic notes, couched in a tone of much courtesy and gentleness, appended by Hilary to a copy sent to Lucifer, were published for the first time in the Benedictine edition of Hilary (Paris, 1693).

5. Liber contra Auxentium (G).—This book was written in A.D. 365, under Valentinian, who had become emperor in the preceding year. Hilary, as has been remarked, was convinced that the profession of orthodoxy made by Auxentius was thoroughly insincere. The emperor, looking at the matter from a point of view not, it must be allowed, unnatural for a statesman, declined to entertain this question. He accepted the position avowed by Auxentius, entered into communion with him, and ordered Hilary to leave Milan. Hilary, as we have already stated, obeyed the imperial order at once, but, as the sole resource left him, published this address to the members of the church at large. Hence the other titles by which it is known, namely, Contra Arianos vel Auxentium Mediolanensem, and Epistola ad Catholicos et Auxentium.

<sup>k</sup> We refer to the well-known passage (De Syn. 41) in which Athanasius is prepared to treat as brothera those who receive everything resolved at Nicaea except the homöusion. He was convinced that they would in time perceive its value and accept it.

<sup>l</sup> That we are justified in this identification seems clear from the facts—(1) that only one person named Lucifer is mentioned in the writings of Hilary; (2) that he is in one passage termed episcopus Sardiniae. This is just as if a bishop of Valetta were called bishop of Malta.

This treatise forms a curious commentary upon church history, bringing out, as it does, into vivid relief the utterly changed character of the temptations to which the Christians of this age were now exposed as compared with those of the ante-Nicene period. Hilary's view must be considered as a rather one-sided one. He sees clearly the evils of his own day, but hardly realises what must have been the trials to ordinary Christians of the times of a Nero, a Decius, a Galerius. The concluding part makes out a strong case against Auxentius. It is difficult to believe but that he must have been an Arian at heart. Hilary, like some of his contemporaries, declares in this work that the ears of the people have become purer than the heart of the bishops. He begs those who shrink from breaking off communion with Auxentius, whom he calls an angel of Satan, not to let their love of mere walls and buildings seduce them into a false peace. Antichrist may seat himself within a church; the forests and the mountains, the lakes and the prisons, are safer. It must be remembered, in palliation of Hilary's strong language respecting the bishop of Milan, that he regarded him not as an open foe, but as a betrayer of truth by false pretences. Rufinus, who speaks of Hilary as a "confessor fidei Catholicae," entitles this work "librum instructionis plenissimæ."<sup>m</sup>

6. Fragmenta Hilarii.—These fragments were first published in 1598 by Nicolaus Faber, who got them from the library of Father Pithou. That they possess considerable value in the elucidation of the history of the period embraced by Hilary's episcopate may be gathered from the frequent references made to them in all the best modern histories of the church. (A glance, for instance, at the works of Canons Robertson and Bright would serve to shew thus much.) It is claimed for them that they are the remnants of a book by Hilary mentioned by Rufinus, and described by Jerome as Liber contra Valentem et Ursacium, which contained a history of the councils of Rimini and Selencia. On this book Hilary expended much labour, having begun it in the year 360 and completed in 366. The fifteen fragments collected together occupy some eighty folio pages. They are, with one exception, recognised as genuine by Tillemont and by Ceillier.

Whether, however, all the other documents cited in these fragments can be depended upon has become a matter of controversy. Now, respecting the genuineness of the commentaries given by Dom Pitra, which we have already noticed, opinions may fairly differ; and happily there is in that case no disturbing influence at work. But the question respecting these fragments stands in a very different position. If, with Tillemont and Ceillier, we accept them as all but entirely authentic, then the case against Liberius [LIBERIUS] is certainly darkened. But this is precisely the conclusion which certain modern critics (such as e.g. the anonymous editor of Dom Ceillier) are for very obvious reasons most anxious to avoid. We are bound at least to consider their criticisms.

It must be conceded that the genuineness of the fragment marked as fourth among the fifteen contained in the collection has long been questioned. This may be seen from the notes appended to it in the Benedictine edition. It claims to be a letter from the pen of Liberius. Dom Coutant is inclined to consider it facta et adulterina, and to regard it as what Ceillier openly terms it, "une lettre que les Ariens publièrent sous le nom du pape Libère." How far this conclusion is influenced by the wish to discover flaws in the evidence for a letter by a bishop of Rome, which, to say the very least, leans towards Arianism, may be difficult to decide. To the present writer it does seem as if sufficient doubt has been created respecting it to render it unsafe to trust as a weapon of controversy. The same may be perhaps said, though with more hesitation, of the first of three letters also attributed to Liberius, in fragment the sixth.

Now the appearance of even one or two questionable documents does undoubtedly tend to throw some shade of discredit upon the collection in which they are found. But the arguments adduced against the rest of the documents do not seem forcible, or sufficient to disturb the respect which has heretofore been paid to them.*

7. Epistola ad Abram Filium suum. (About A.D. 358).—Hilary's daughter, Abra, had written to her father during his exile. Either from her letter, which has not come down to us, or from other source, Hilary had learnt that there was some prospect of Abra, though only in her thirteenth year, being sought in marriage. He draws a mystic portrait of the heavenly bridegroom, which is evidently intended to suggest the superiority of a religious celibacy. But he leaves the matter entirely to her free choice, only desiring that the decision should be really her own. He encloses a morning and an evening hymn. On any difficulties found in the letter or in the hymns, Abra is to consult her mother. The Hymnus matutinus, a very brief one, is still extant. That for the evening, Hymnus vespertinus, is more disputed, but Cardinal Mai makes a fair case for it, though it does not satisfy the judgment of Dom Coutant and Dom Ceillier. Two other hymns by Hilary, commencing respectively, "Hymnum dicat turba fratrum" (a hymn on the life of our Lord) and "Jesus refulsit omnium" (on the Epiphany) are given by Thomassy in his Hymnarium. Dom Pitra, ubi supra, also gives some verses of considerable beauty on our Lord's childhood, which seem to be Hilary's.

It is right to say that the letter to Abra is considered doubtful by some critics, and rejected by Cave. Possibly there may be room for some degree of prejudice both for and against its genuineness and authenticity, as it may be thought to favour, however slightly, the views of those who maintain that Hilary, after his elevation to the episcopate, led an ascetic life. A second objection, that it is less dignified in style than its author's other writings, does not deserve much consideration. A parent writing to a daughter of twelve years of age can hardly be expected to address her in the same terms as he would employ towards a synod of his episcopal brethren. The present writer does not see sufficient evidence for the rejection of the letter from the works of Hilary.*

It remains to speak of works by Hilary which have been lost, and of others which have been erroneously ascribed to him. Among the lost works is a Commentarius (seu Homiliae) in Jobum. These comments on Job were mainly borrowed, and apparently in some cases directly translated, from the writings of Origen. They were extant in the generation immediately succeeding that of Hilary, as they are more than once mentioned by Jerome (as in his Epist. ad Marcellinum), and a remark is quoted from them by Augustine, and another by his adversary Pelagius. 2. Hymnorum Liber. Hymns in praise of apostles and martyrs, mentioned with honour by Isidore of Seville in his De Officio Ecclesiastico. 3. Liber mysteriorum, mentioned (as are also the books preceding and following) by Jerome. 4. Ad praefectum Sallustium sive contra Dioscorum Liber. Jerome's reference to this book (Epist. 83 ad Magnum), which was perhaps of an apologetic nature, is complimentary as regards its literary as well as other merits. A Commentarius in Cantica Canticozum was attributed to Hilary; but if he really composed such a commentary, it had disappeared even in the time of Jerome. As might be expected, when we consider the circumstances of his life, many epistles of Hilary have evidently been lost.

Among books erroneously assigned to Hilary may be named the following:—Libri de Patris et Filii unitate; Liber de Essentiâ Patris et Filii; * Fortunatus declares that a maiden of rank in Phrygia, by name Florentia, was suddenly converted during Hilary's sojourn in Phrygia; that she induced her parents to become Christians and to allow her to act towards Hilary as his adopted daughter during his exile. This story lacks confirmation, but it may nevertheless be true.

Confessio de Trinitate. Trombelli has published as Hilary's a little pastoral address and a sermon De Dedicazione Ecclesiae. But they are not generally accepted as genuine, and have been decidedly rejected by Schönemann. For the Carmen in Genesim, ascribed by some to the bishop of Poitiers, see HILARIUS (17) OF ARLES.

The best edition of Hilary is the Benedictine one by Dom Coutant (Paris, 1693), to which such frequent reference has been made, or its reprint with some few additions by Maffei (Verona, 1730). Erasmus had, however, published one at Basle (1523), and there is an earlier, though greatly inferior, one by Badius Ascensius (Paris, 1510). The De Trinitate, combined with the treatise of Augustine on the same subject, was printed at Milan in 1489, and reprinted a few years later at Venice. A few of Hilary's opuscula were also contained in this edition.

In conclusion, it must be observed that, though Hilary in his De Trinitate (lib. vi. 36-38) speaks of Peter's confession as the foundation of the church, he in other writings, more especially in his commentary on the Psalms, is inclined to make Peter himself, whom he terms caelestis regni janitorem, the foundation. Such variation, as is well known, is far from uncommon. Among ourselves, writers so different as Bishop Pearson and Dean Stanley both interpret the passage as referring to St. Peter personally. But if, as is by no means impossible, Hilary took the Cyprianic view of the episcopate, he might (as Cyprian did) speak of himself or of any bishop as being in some sense a successor of St. Peter. Still in the fragmenta we find contained a letter from the fathers of Sardica to pope Julius, which certainly does refer to the Roman see as the head see. If Hilary approved of the document thus recorded, he may very probably have allowed to Rome a primacy, at any rate, in the West. But this is a somewhat slender foundation to build a superstructure upon; and it is singular to find Ceillier's editor, in his anxiety to damage the authority of the fragmenta, somewhat injuring the credit of the only one brief sentence in the extensive works of Hilary which can be cited as a recognition, however indirect, of the Roman primacy. He says: "On signale un grand nombre d'erreurs dans le second fragment, qui contient une lettre du concile de Sardique à toutes les églises et une autre au pape Jules" (Ceillier, iv. p. 63, note).

In practice Hilary did not often take his stand upon authority. The metropolitan see of Arles was in his time occupied by the Arian Saturninus, Hilary's chief opponent in his earlier day. He had not long been in the episcopate when, by force of character, by will, by intellect, by confessorship, he came into the first rank of champions. The idea of controversy being settled by the fiat of any one bishop, whether of Rome or any other see, had never dawned upon his mind. No leave was asked when he descended into Italy to confront Auxentius. Everywhere he fights, or treats, somewhat in the style of a volunteer; and we venture to think that any one, who studies his life and his works without a pre-conceived bias, will entirely sympathize with the remark of the Roman Catholic Möhler when he applies to Hilary the well-known dictum of Gibbon concerning Athanasius, that "in a time

It may be doubted whether in our English church histories Hilary occupies quite so prominent a place as he does in ancient authorities, as, for instance, in the writings of Augustine—who names him in company with Cyprian, and in those of Jerome, Socrates, Rufinus and Cassiodorus. He has been more fortunate abroad. Möhler does him full justice; Villemain praises his eloquence: De Broglie thoroughly recognises his deserved prominence, and Dorner is enthusiastic in his eulogies: Guizot, while acknowledging his great influence, yet, by a strange and rare piece of carelessness, ascribes to him only pamphlets. [J. G. C.]

HILARIUS (8), bishop of Tlemessus, one of the bishops of Lycia who had expressed a desire to separate themselves from their heterodox brethren, and join in communion with Amphilocheus of Iconium, A.D. 375. (Basil. Epist. 218 [403]; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 971.) [E. V.]

HILARIUS (9), a bishop of Isauria, who witnessed Gregory Nazianzen's will. (Greg. Naz. Test.) [E. V.]

HILARIUS (10), the name assigned to the eleventh of the mythical archbishops of London in the list drawn up by Jocelin of Furness, and copied by Stow. (Ussher, Antiquitates, p. 67; Godwin, de Praesulibus, ed. Richardson, p. 170; Stubbs, Registrum Sac. Angl. p. 152.) [S.]

HILARIUS (11), the name of a bishop who subscribes the acts of the first council of Toledo, A.D. 400. Gams (Kirchengeschichte, ii. 309; Series Episcoporum, 23) considers him to have been bishop of Cartagena (Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Española, ii. 182; Mansi, iii. 1002; Innoc. Pap. Ep. 3, in Patr. Lat. xx. 486 b). [F. D.]

HILARIUS (12), a bishop of an unnamed diocese mentioned in a letter of Chrysostom to Olympias (Chrys. Epist. 14, ad fin.). Chrysostom reposed great confidence in him, and found his presence at Constantinople so useful that he was only prevailed upon to give him written permission to visit his diocese, where his presence was urgently required, on the understanding that he was to return as speedily as possible. His loyalty to Chrysostom caused him to be brutally treated by his own clergy, and, regardless of his great age, he was banished to the remotest parts of Pontus. Palladius records of him that for eighteen years he had not tasted bread, subsisting simply on vegetables and porridge (Pallad. p. 195). [E. V.]

HILARIUS (13), apparently a deacon in a list of bishops and deacons of Macedonia addressed by Innocent I. 414 (Innoc. ep. 17, in Patr. Lat. xx. 527A; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 25). [C. H.]

HILARIUS (14), bishop of Altinum (Altino) c. A.D. 422. In that or the preceding year he was present with other bishops at the consecration of the first church of Rialto. (Cappelletti Le Chiese d'Italia, ix. 517.) [R. S. G.]

HILARIUS (15), a bishop, sometimes confounded with his more celebrated namesake the bishop of Arles, but the latter did not become bishop till A.D. 429, whereas the letter of Augustine which entitles his correspondent "consacerdos," i.e. colleague in the episcopate, cannot have been written latter than 417, as will appear below. He has also been identified (as by Baron. ann. 439, xlv.; cf. Gall. Chr. vi. 7, Mansi, v. 1189 note) with Hilarius who wrote to Augustine from Syracuse [HILARIUS (34)]. But it is evident from the letters themselves that Hilarius of Syracuse was a different person from the bishop to whom Augustine wrote. This latter was most probably bishop of Narbona, chief city of the province of Narbonensis Prima, who, following the example of Proculus, bishop of Massilia (Marseilles), claimed in his own province the title and rights of metropolitan in opposition to Patroclus bishop of Arles, on whom pope Zosimus conferred authority over the provinces of Narbonensis Prima and Secunda, as well as that of Viennensis Secunda, A.D. 417. Whether Hilarius obeyed this mandate does not appear, but his claim was revived, A.D. 422. When the clergy and people of Loteva (Lodève) on the death of their bishop complained to pope Boniface I. that the bishop of Arles, the same Patroclus, attempted to force a bishop upon them against their own wishes and that of their metropolitan, the bishop of Narbona, Boniface annulled his predecessor's decree, and pronounced a decision in favour of the independence of the provinces above mentioned. (BONIFACIUS, Vol. I. p. 328; Ceillier, vii. 538, viii. 11; Tillemont, 258, vol. xiii. p. 678; Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxiii. 45, xxiv. 31; Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. § 94, vol. i. p. 447, Eng. Tr.; Gall. Christ. vi. 6; Zosimus, Ep. 8, ap. Labbe, Concil. ii. 1570, 1571, 1585.)

St. Augustine wrote to Hilarius concerning Pelagianism, A.D. 416. After commending to his attention Palladius, the bearer of the letter, he expresses his preference for the method of treatment by reconciliation rather than exclusion from the church, and mentions the letter addressed by a recent council at Carthage to pope Innocent of Rome against these opinions, and also one to the same effect from the bishops of Numidia. Without entering at length into the arguments against them, which the approaching departure of the ship forbids him to do, he contents himself with calling attention to the petitions in the Lord's Prayer for forgiveness of sins and protection against temptation (Aug. Ep. 178 al. 94). [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (16), bishop of Rhegium Julium (Reggio) c. A.D. 434. He is said to have held a provincial synod with thirteen other bishops, which was confirmed by Sixtus III. of Rome. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ix. 433.) [R. S. G.]

HILARIUS (17) ARELATENSIS (HILARY OF ARLES), ST., a highly distinguished prelate, bishop of Arles and metropolitan. He was born about A.D. 401, and died in A.D. 449 in the forty-eighth year of his age.

Name.—The name may have been formed either from the Greek ἰλαρός (cheerful), or from its Latin equivalent "hilaris" or "hilarus." But the fact that it first appears in quarters where the use of Greek largely prevailed, renders it probable that, though borne by subjects of the Roman emperors, it was Greek in its origin. That it is not a name of early occurrence might be suspected, inasmuch as designations suggested by external peculiarities were at first much more common than those implying mental qualities. In fact it does not appear to be met with in history before the 4th century of the Christian era.

Authorities.—1. References to himself in his biography of his predecessor, Honoratus of Arles.

2. Vita Hilarii.—This biography is ascribed in an Arles MS. to Ravennius (al. Reverentius), the successor of Hilary in his see, but it is usually assigned to St. Honoratus bishop of Marseilles, a disciple of Hilary. Gennadius expressly asserts it and Ceillier (viii. 434) is considered to have established the validity of this claim. It is given in the Chronologia Lirinensis, by Surius under May 5, and in the Bollandist collection (Acta SS. Mai. ii. 25).

5. Acts of the council of Riez in Provence (Concil. Regense, al. Reienne, seu Rhégiense), held in A.D. 439; and of the council of Orange (Arausicanum) in A.D. 442, over both of which Hilary presided; also those of the council of Vaison (Vasense) in the same year. (Labbe, Concilia, tom. i. p. 1747, p. 1783.)

6. Notices of a council summoned at Vienne by Hilary in A.D. 444 on the case of Chelidonius; and of a counter council in A.D. 445, summoned by Leo at Rome, which claimed to reverse the decision pronounced by Hilary and his brethren. Of these councils we do not possess the acts, but they are respectfully referred to by Hilary's biographer, and by Leo. (See Labbe, ubi supra, index A.D. 444; and compare Natalis Alexander, Hist. Ecclesiastica, tom. v. p. 168, art. viii. De Concilio Romano in causa Hilarii Arelatensis; also the more recent historians of the period.)

7. Notices of St. Hilary are also to be found in the writings of St. Eucherius [EUCHERIUS (1)] (who dedicated to Hilary his book De Laude Eremiti), of St. Isidore, of Sidonius Apollinaris, and others; and very specially in certain writings of St. Prosper and St. Augustine, to which references will be found below.

Life.—Hilary (known to history as Hilary of Arles, from the see of which he became bishop) was born, as we have said, in Gaul in the earliest period of the 5th century, probably in A.D. 401. The place of his birth is unknown, but he appears to have been a native of that part of Gallia Belgica, which at a later date was called Austrasia. Although the names of his parents have not come down to us, there seems no doubt that he was of noble family. Hence, as in the case of several other famous men, who in maturer years have adopted a very severe course of life, the great contrast between the early nurture of Hilary and the hard simplicity of his monastic and episcopal career has been admirably pointed out by his biographers.

The education of Hilary was such as became his station. It was, according to the standard of the age, a thoroughly liberal one, and included the study of philosophy and of rhetoric. That in this latter department of culture he became no mean proficient is proved by the flowing and graceful style of the one assured composition of his pen, which has been preserved.

The early ambition of Hilary's mind lay in the direction of secular greatness. Both station and culture gave him every prospect of success, and he appears to have ably discharged the duties of some dignified offices in the state, though we are not informed of their precise nature. At a later period of the world's history, Hilary would, in all probability, have tried, like an Alfred or a St. Louis, to sanctify temporal authority, and to infuse into earthly politics the salt of religious principle. But such ideas did not dawn upon the mind of his age. The very notion of sanctified intellect being cherished in the country parsonage, in the university professoriate, on the judicial bench, or in the council-chambers of an emperor, belongs to a much later epoch. In Hilary's time, and long after it, an ardent devotion to religion was almost inseparably connected with flight from the world; though the duties of the episcopate might indeed call its holders from hallowed retreats, and necessarily involve some connexion with temporal rulers and affairs of state.

Hilary must have been still a very young man, when the example and the entreaties of his friend and kinsman, Honoratus of Arles, induced him to renounce all secular society, and betake himself to the solitude of the isle of Lérins. The struggle had, by his own shewing, been a severe one, but Honoratus having had recourse to private and special prayer, after one of the many conferences he had vainly held with Hilary, at length found his friend prepared to join him.

The temperament of Hilary was evidently one of those to which may be applied the well-known phrase originally employed by Caesar concerning Brutus, quicquid vult, valde vult. Having resolved to enter the monastic state he sold his estates to his brother, and gave the proceeds partly to the poor, partly to some monasteries which needed aid. At Lérins he became a model monk in the very best and highest sense, both as regards external conduct and inward devotedness of spirit. But after a short period, probably not exceeding two years, his friend Honoratus, who had allured Hilary to the lonely island, endeavoured to withdraw him from this retreat. This change of conduct on the part of Honoratus arose from the fact that he had been chosen (A.D. 426) bishop of Arles, and desired the comfort and assistance of Hilary's companionship in the discharge of his new duties. As letters proved unavailing, Honoratus went in person to fetch Hilary, and succeeded.

This companionship, however, did not last long. Honoratus died on January 16 in A.D. 429, and Hilary at once prepared to return to Lérins. But the citizens of Arles, accompanied by a troop of soldiers, detected him (it was said) by a miracle, and compelled him to occupy the vacant see. And thus, says his biographer, Hilary undertook the office of a watchman (speculatoris suscepit officium. Compare Ezek. iii. 17, xxxiii. 7, in the Vulgate).

Hilary, as bishop, lived in many respects like a monk, though by no means as a recluse. Lightly and simply clad, he traversed on foot the whole extent of his diocese and of his province. When at home he dwelt in a seminary with some of his clergy. The redemption of captives occupied much of his care. For their sakes he would earn money by the toil of his own hands, tilling the earth and planting vines.

For the same object, like many other prelates of hallowed memory, he did not scruple to sell on emergencies sacred church vessels, substituting for them others of meaner material. He continued his studies, and was constant in meditation and prayer. As a preacher, Hilary evidently produced a great impression, not only by the excellence of the matter contained in his sermons, but likewise by his intonation and powers of delivery. Indeed a poet of the day, by name Livius, went so far as to declare that if St. Augustine had come after Hilary he would have been judged inferior.

Fulfilling as a teacher, in many respects, the ideal to be set forth in after-time by Chaucer, Hilary evidently did not fail in bestowing reproof:—

"If were any person obstinat,
What so he were of highe or low estat,
Him wold be snibben sharply for the nones."

But his biographer assures us that his rebukes, though terrible, were reserved for the proud and worldly—"extitit rigidus, sed superbis;"—and tells us of Hilary interrupting a sermon in order to denounce, as unworthy of the Holy Communion, a magistrate whom he had fruitlessly rebuked in private for partiality in his judicial capacity.

The canons passed by the councils of Riez and of Orange, over which Hilary presided in A.D. 439 and 442 respectively, are not of very great importance, being, in the main, of a disciplinary character. A rather curious case was, however, treated at Riez. A presbyter, by name Armentarius, had been consecrated bishop of Embrun ("Ebredunum seu Ebrodunum"), by two bishops only, in contravention of the Nicene canon, which required the presence of three. The consent of the comprovincial bishops and of the metropolitan (i.e. Hilary himself) was also wanting. Armentarius was excluded from the see, but, proving penitent, was permitted, under some humiliating restrictions, to act as a chor-episcopos. A special canon, the seventh, insists strongly on the rights of the metropolitan.

It seems undeniable that Hilary was inclined to press the claims of this last-named office to a degree which must be considered one of usurpation; partly, perhaps, in regard to the geographical extent of the jurisdiction claimed by him for the see of Arles, and certainly with respect to the rights of the clergy, the laity, and the comprovincial bishops. But before proceeding to the consideration of the important contest with pope Leo, in which Hilary became involved, it may be well to interpose a few words on the semi-Pelagianism of which he has been accused.

In the year 429, the very year in which Hilary became bishop, two letters (numbered respectively as 225 and 226 in the Benedictine edition of St. Augustine) were addressed to the great bishop of Hippo, one by Prosper, and one by another Hilary, a layman. In the former, Prosper, after recounting various shades of dissent manifested in Southern Gaul from the Augustinian teaching on predestination, expressly names Hilary, bishop of Arles, as among the recalcontra. But in mentioning this dissent, Prosper not only refers in terms of high encomium to Hilary ("præcipuae auctoritatis et spiritualium studiorum virum"), but intimates that in all other respects the bishop of Arles was an admirer and supporter of Augustine's teaching. He believed, indeed, that Hilary had some intention of writing to Augustine for explanation on the points at issue. The epistle of Hilary, the layman, though its statement is more brief and general, entirely confirms that of Prosper. It is to this expression of sentiment that St. Augustine is alluding, when, in the 21st chapter of his book, De Dono Perseverantiæ (tom. x. p. 852, ed. Ben.), addressed to the above-named correspondents, he avows his gratitude for the affection displayed towards him, though he is surprised at the dissent from his own view. To shew his own consistency in the matter, Augustine appeals to his reasonings in a letter addressed to Simplicius, bishop of Milan, before the rise of the Pelagian heresy.

If, on this evidence, and also from the respect shewn by him to Faustus of Riez [FAUSTUS 11], we are compelled to class Hilary of Arles with the semi-Pelagians, it must be recognised that he is a supporter of their views in their very mildest form. Few learned divines of any Christian communion in our own day would contend that it was incumbent on us to accept, as a test of orthodoxy, all the anti-Pelagian propositions set forth by St. Augustine. That Hilary had some grounds for fearing that Augustine's teaching might imperil the acknowledgment of man's free agency is admitted by many of our historians, as, for instance, by Canons Bright (Hist. of Church, p. 307) and Robertson (Hist. of Chr. Church, bk. iii. chaps. ii. and vii.). That Hilary's sentiments on the subject did not involve him in personal alienation, is shewn by the circumstance that St. Germain of Auxerre [GERMANUS], who went twice over to Britain to contend against Pelagianism, was a companion of the bishop of Arles on, at least, one of his tours through Gaul.

It was out of this tour, undertaken by Hilary as metropolitan, that there arose the important contest between the bishop of Arles and the bishop of Rome, which ended in procuring for the Roman see a great increase of authority, both in respect of territory and of power. The struggle is in many respects a remarkable one. Each side was well championed. Leo and Hilary were men of saintly piety, earnest and energetic in the discharge of their duties. Both conscientiously believed themselves to be in the right; both, it must be added, were apt to be hasty and high-handed in carrying out their views of ecclesiastical government. It will be necessary, in the first place, to state the facts admitted on both sides.

Hilary found at Besançon (Vesontio), or, according to some, at Vesoul, a bishop named Chelidonius (al. Quelidonius or Celidonius, but the guttural would probably be preserved in the Gaul of that age), the validity of whose position was assailed on two grounds, both certainly savouring of the singular and formal rigorism of the day. The Levitical precept (Lev. xxi. 7, 13, 14, slightly modified in Ezekiel xlv. 22), which forbade a priest to marry a widow, was now extended so as to include the case of an aspirant to the episcopate, even if he had so acted while yet a layman. Again, the rule that bishops should not judge in a case of blood was pressed in such wise as to exclude from the prelacy men who had previously, as lay magistrates, on some occasions pronounced a sentence of capital punishment.

Hilary held a council at Vienne in A.D. 444. Its acts have not been formally recorded, but we learn from Hilary's biographer, and also from the testimony of Leo, that by its sentence Chelidonius was deposed from the episcopate. Thereupon Chelidonius appealed to Rome, and betook himself in person thither. Although it was now mid-winter, Hilary went on foot across the Alps. After having performed his devotions at the tombs of the apostles, he presented himself to Leo, and respectfully requested the bishop of Rome to act in conformity with the canons and usages of the universal church. Persons who had been juridically deposed were known to be serving the altar in Rome. If, on inquiry, Leo found this to be the case, let him, as quietly and secretly as he pleased, put a stop to such violation of the canons. If Leo would not do this, Hilary would simply return home again, as he had not come to Rome with a view of bringing forward any action or accusation. It seems probable, however, that he would have listened to Leo if the Roman bishop had been content with suggesting a rehearing of the cause in Gaul, a degree of interference often allowed even to secular rulers by bishops, who may be considered thoroughly anti-Erastian.

Leo declined to take this view of affairs. Although Gaul was not, any more than Africa, a portion of the Roman patriarchate, the Roman pontiff resolved to assert over that region a claim similar to that which he had just failed to establish in Africa [LEO]. He summoned a council, or at least a kind of conference, in which Hilary, for the sake of peace, consented to take part. Several bishops were present, as also Chelidonius himself. Hilary, with much plainness of speech, defended his conduct. Leo had him put under guard; but the bishop contrived to escape from his guards, and (apparently in February, A.D. 445, so far as we can make out the precise dates) returned to Arles. Leo proceeded with the case; found the charge of marriage with a widow not proven against Chelidonius; and formally (as he had already done informally) pronounced him restored to his rank of bishop and to his see.

But not content with the reversal of Hilary's sentence, Leo proceeded to deprive the bishop of Arles of his rights as a metropolitan, and to confer them on the bishop of Vienne. He made two further charges against Hilary; one that he had traversed Gaul attended by a band of armed men; the other, that he had hastily, without waiting for any election on the part of the clergy and laity, consecrated a new bishop in the room of Projectus, a bishop (according to Hilary, within his province), who was at that time ill. Moreover, Leo availed himself of his great influence with the reigning emperor, Valentinian III., to obtain an imperial rescript directed against Hilary, as one who was injuring the peace of the church and rebelling against the majesty of the empire. This celebrated document, which virtually promises the support of the secular arm to the claim of the Roman pontiff to be a universal bishop, was issued in A.D. 445, and runs as follows: "Ut Episcopis Gallicanis omnibusque pro lege esset, quidquid apostolicæ sedis auctoritas sanxisset: ita ut quisquis episcoporum ad iudicium Romani antistitis evocatus venire neglexisset per moderatorem ejusdem provinciae adesse cogeretur." This important rescript was addressed to the celebrated general Aetius.

It is obvious that few ecclesiastical writers can pretend to come, with wholly unbiassed minds, to the criticism of this controversy. We may almost expect to be able to anticipate the comments likely to proceed from the pen of a Roman Catholic, a Lutheran, or an Anglican divine. To a certain extent this anticipation would prove correct. Protestant historians, as a rule, take the side of Hilary. But Roman Catholics are much divided. Writers of the ultramontane school, as Rohrbacher or the Italian Gorini (cited in the recent edition of Dom Ceillier), are severe upon Hilary, and profess to regard the emperor's rescript as an English judge might look upon a clause of an act, which had only stated explicitly some principle always recognised, and converted common law into statute law. But the Gallicans, as Quesnel and Tillemont, stand up strongly in defence of Hilary; and it is not too much to say that the language of Tillemont against Leo is far stronger than that of dean Milman. The following remarks must, of course, be read with that abatement, which must be made for the prejudices of one who does not suppose it likely that he should entirely be able, on a question of this nature, entirely to divest himself of all party bias and prejudices.

On the side of Hilary it must be said, that his conviction that the see of Arles gave him metropolitan power over the whole of Gaul, was based upon no small amount of cogent testimony. The case in favour of this view has been ably summed up by Natalis Alexander (Hist. Eccles. sec. v. cap. v. art. 8), and by the Rev. W. Kay in a note subjoined to the Oxford translation of Fleury (London, 1844). But if it hold good for the case of Chelidonius, it is not equally clear for that of Projectus. That Hilary should make his escape from Rome, when he found the secular authority employed to detain him, was only natural and most justifiable. That he should himself take soldiers with him in making his own visitations may be reasonably ascribed (in accordance with the suggestion of Fleury) to the disturbed state of the country. In the affair of Projectus he may have strayed beyond the ill-defined limits of his province, and most certainly violated canonical rule. But there is no reason to doubt that such a man as Hilary, in so acting, really believed that Projectus would not recover, and was anxious to provide against an emergency. As for the exceeding freedom of language employed by Hilary in the presence of Leo, a freedom which greatly shocked Leo and probably some others among the audience,<sup>a</sup> it must be remembered that the bishop of Arles was always accustomed to speak very plainly. Moreover, as a friend of Hilary, the prefect Auxiliarius subsequently observed: "Roman ears were very delicate."

Those who are willing to accept these pleas on behalf of Hilary do not thereby commit themselves to unreserved censure on the action of pope Leo. The encouragement to interference in the affairs of Southern Gaul was undeniably very great. Strong as was the case for the jurisdiction of Arles over most of the Gallican sees, its authority over Narbonensian Gaul had long been contested, and claimed for the bishop of Vienne. At least one contest between Gallic bishops, that of Patroclus of Arles against Proculus of Marseilles, had already been carried to a former bishop of Rome, Zosimus, in A.D. 422 (some two and twenty years before the case of Hilary), though the result had not been encouraging to the partisans of Rome, inasmuch as Zosimus misjudged it, and his successor, Boniface, referred it back again to the prelates of Gaul.<sup>b</sup> But Leo, though at times dwelling more upon St. Peter's confession of faith than on his personal position, yet in all his letters bearing on the contest with Hilary, repeats continually the text (St. Matt. xvi. 18) on which other bishops of Rome had dwelt so much, and which stands emblazoned in the cupola of St. Peter's. He appeals to it, as if no other interpretation had ever been heard of, as if it were in itself the sole and sufficient justification for his conduct.

In addition to all other advantages Leo enjoyed, as we have seen, the unhesitating support of the emperor. His recourse to such aid has been severely censured; and Tillemont has declared concerning the famous law of June 6, A.D. 445, in words which have often been cited, that "in the eyes of those who have any love for the church's liberty or any knowledge of her discipline, it will bring as little honour to him whom it praises, as of injury to him whom it condemns" (Tillem. Mémoires Ecclési. tom. xv. art. xx. p. 83). But it must be owned that few ecclesiastics have been able to resist the temptation of availing themselves of the support of the state, when it is sure to be exercised in what they believe to be a right direction. Certainly, Baronius (as Tillemont naturally adds) is fully justified in appealing to this act of Valentinian as a proof of the powerful aid lent by the emperors towards establishing the greatness and authority of the popes.

Still on the part of Valentinian III. this step is not surprising. Leo was, even as a citizen, a man of great mark and political weight at Rome; and to a Roman emperor of the 5th century, already accustomed to see in the bishop of Rome a man wielding a kind of co-ordinate authority with himself, it would seem as natural that the orthodox clergy of Southern Gaul, who were all of pure Roman or Gallo-Roman race, should carry out the mandates of the see of Rome, as that prefects and secular officers should obey the orders of the court of Ravenna. The fact that Gaul was not properly included in the patriarchate of Rome, however important from an ecclesiastical point of view, would probably seem to the emperor a fine distinction not worthy of being taken into account. It has been urged that the circumstance of pope Hilarius, the successor of Leo, having appealed to Valentinian's rescript, rather than to any earlier document in support of the claims of Rome over Gaul, is tantamount to an admission that any pretension of such nature was previously unknown. But it is possible to press this argument too far. A claimant of authority may be glad to lay hold of a weapon so serviceable as a recent decision, which is clear, dogmatic, and seemingly supported by the conjoined sanction of church and state, without necessarily admitting thereby that he could not allege anything from antiquity. That Chelidonius at once bethought himself of appealing to Rome, and that Hilary expected to be compelled to rehear the case, are evidences that the crosier of the Roman see had by this time in some degree overshadowed the independence of the Gallican episcopate. But it is nevertheless true that the extent of Leo's claim was a real novelty, and marks an epoch in the history of the pontificate.

That Leo was not only sincere in his conviction respecting the rightfulness of his claim, but that he also believed its development to be a blessing, and perhaps a necessity, for Christendom is very possible. Nevertheless, if our acquaintance with the remarkable gifts of this great pontiff, with the learning, the acuteness, the courage, which vindicate his claims to canonization, dispose us to judge gently his conduct in the contest with St. Hilary, it must be said that we are extending to St. Leo a degree of charitableness, of which he has not in this case set us an example. To put the worst possible construction on all the acts of such a man as the bishop of Arles was a grievous fault. But of this fault, in a very aggravated form, Leo must, before any fair tribunal, be pronounced unquestionably guilty. The letter of the pope, which goes most fully into the case, is simply unpardonable. To call the departure of Hilary from Rome a base flight (turpis fuga) is strong language. But that Leo, himself so prone to make use of the secular arm, should complain of Hilary for travelling accompanied by soldiers; and that he should attribute Hilary's hasty consecration of a successor to Projectus to a desire to kill the invalid bishop, and deceive the substituted presbyter, is an outrage upon all fairness and decency.*

Of the remaining four years of Hilary's life, after his return to Gaul, we know little more, than that they were as incessantly occupied with the discharge of his duties as the earlier ones. Practically the acts of Leo do not appear to have affected his position (see Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. ii. c. vii. pt. i. and Fleury), and Hilary never acknowledged their validity. Yet that they were not wholly ignored is shewn by an appeal to Leo, made after Hilary's death, for the restoration of its ancient metropolitical rights to the see of Arles. The attempts of Hilary to conciliate Leo by the remonstrances of friends availed but little. But when, after the death of Hilary, which occurred on May 5, A.D. 449, the prelates of the provinces announced to Leo that the election of a successor had fallen on Ravennius, who had been duly consecrated, Leo wrote an acknowledgment, which sounds like a virtual retraction of his imputations on the motives and character of Hilary, and at length most justly entitled him a man "of holy memory."

Writings.—The great importance of one composition ascribed to the pen of Hilary renders it desirable to consider the uncertain before the certain writings. Waterland, as is well known, devotes one chapter of his Critical History of the Athanasian Creed to an argument in support of the belief that Hilary of Arles was the author of the (so-called) Creed of St. Athanasius. This view, if it could be proved, would of course be a fact of great importance, not only with reference to the career of Hilary, but also in its general bearing upon church history, and theological science. But Waterland does not "pretend to strict certainty" on the subject, and it cannot be alleged that subsequent research has raised his view above the position of an ingenious conjecture. To regard the authorship of Hilary as unproven does not, it need hardly be said, necessitate the adoption of a late date (see The Athanasian Creed, by the Rev. G. W. Ommaney, M.A., London, 1875), nor the rejection of the view that this creed may owe its origin to Southern Gaul.

Among other doubtful works assigned by some to Hilary of Arles must be classed certain poems on sacred subjects. These are as follows:—1. Poema de septem fratribus Maccabæis ab Antiocho Epiphane interfectis. This may be found in Sicard's Antidot. cont. omn. Hæreses, 1528 (there ascribed, however, to Victorinus Afer), in a Sylloge Poetarum Christianorum, published at Lyons in 1605, and in more than one Bibliotheca Patrum. 2. A poem, more frequently attributed to Prosper Aquitanus, and generally included in his works, entitled Carmen de Dei Providentiâ. 3. Carmen in Genesim. This poem (which, like the two preceding, is in hexameters) has been more often ascribed to the earlier Hilary, the bishop of Poitiers. Accordingly it was printed in the edition of that father's works by Miraens (Paris, 1544), in several collections of patristic writings, and separately by Morellus (Paris, 1559) and Weitzius (Franconia, 1625). The Benedictine editors reject it with some indignation from the genuine works of Hilary of Poitiers; remarking, however, that this decision does not involve an adjudication of it to Hilary of Arles. But despite faults— theological, grammatical, and metrical—the poem is curious as being a real attempt at that blending of the Christian and the classic elements of literature, which was displayed in after ages so brilliantly, though after all with questionable success, by such able scholars as the Jesuit Casimir and the Presbyterian Buchanan. Two lines refer, with some terseness of expression, to the three children and the prophet Daniel.

"Hinc inter flammas pueri cantare parati, Et puer impasti quem non tetigere leones."

One other brief narrative has been ascribed to the pen of Hilary, but it is more than doubtful. Arles kept a commemoration of a local Christian celebrity, St. Genesius, who (like Porphyrius in the time of Julian) was believed to have been suddenly converted, while ignorantly mimicking Christian rites upon the stage. On one of these anniversaries, a bridge over that branch of the Rhone, on which the city stands, broke down. This was no uncommon occurrence, but the narrator declares that, on this occasion, though a crowd of men, women, and children was passing over, no one was injured. To what else, he asks, can such a result be ascribed, save to the intervention of Christ, vouchsafed doubtless to the intercession of His martyr Genesius? This narrative is given by the Bollandists in their account of St. Genesius, under the date of Aug. 25. They argue on chronological grounds against the opinion of Quesnel, who ascribes the document to Honoratus. But this negation, which is probably well-founded, does not prove Hilary to be its author. Neither in tone nor style does it resemble the remnant of Hilary's compositions, and, with the majority of critics, we feel disposed to regard it as spurious.

But although the above-named specimens of verse and prose must all be ranked as extremely doubtful, we have the authority of Hilary's biographer for asserting that he did compose some poetry (versus), wrote many letters, an explanation of the creed (Symboli Expositio—this is a main element in Waterland's argument), and also sermons for all the church's festivals (Homiliae in totius anni Festivitates). These were apparently extant when Honoratus wrote. We have now only the two following:—

1. Epistola ad Eucherium Episcopum Lugdunensem [EUCHERIUS (1)].—This brief letter was published by Barralis, A.D. 1613, in the Chronologia Lerinensis. It is also given in the Bibl. Patr. Muz. tom. vii. issued at Lyons in 1667; and was reissued by Quesnel and by John Salinas. (The last-named, a canon of the church of St. John Lateran at Rome, brought out a complete edition of Hilary of Arles, in 1731, in conjunction with the works of Vincent of Lérins.) It would not be easy, within the short compass of some fifteen lines, to give a more favourable idea of modesty, and of a friendly admiration of his correspondent, than is here accomplished. To Hilary's regret, the demand of a restoration of certain books by Eucherius has only left him time for a cursory but most admiring perusal. He trusts that the heavy and persistent rains now falling may not damage the volumes; would be glad of a visit from their author, that he might ask for explanation of some difficulties; and, failing that, would even be thankful to be allowed the sojourn with him of some youthful student, whom Eucherius had trained.

2. Vita Sancti Honorati Arelatensis Episcopi.—This may be read in the collections named above (at p. 1228, tom. vii. of the Lyons collection), and with varying texts in the Bollandist collection, Acta Sanctorum, for Jan. 16, and at p. 11 of tom. ii. The following is a fair specimen of its style. (Something of what many would consider a modern feeling may be traced in the appeal to the moral miracles exemplified by Honoratus, and in the reference to the crown of martyrdom attainable in times of peace.) "O magna et incluta, Honorate, tua gloria! Non indignit meritum tuum signis probari. Ipsa enim conversatio tua, plena virtutibus et admirationis novitate praecepsa, perpetuum quoddam signum ministravit. Multa quidem tibi divinitus signorum specie, indulta novimus, quicunque propius assistebamus, sed in his tu minimam partem tuam computabas; majusque tibi gaudium erat, quod merita et virtutes tuas Christus scriberet, quam quod signa homines notarent. Habet et pax Martyres suos; Christi enim tu perpetuus, quam diu in corpore moratus es, testis fuisti." [J. G. C.]

HILARIUS (18) (HILARUS), bishop of Rome from Nov. 19 (or 17, Bolland.) 461 to Sept. 10, 467, during nearly six years, having succeeded Leo I. after a vacancy of nine days. He was a native of Sardinia, the son of one Crispus, and at the time of his election archdeacon of Rome. He had been sent, when a deacon, as one of the legates of pope Leo to the council at Ephesus called Latrocinium (449), held by order of the emperor Theodosius under the presidency of Dioscorus of Alexandria. When all the other members of this council had been intimidated into signing a blank paper, to be filled up with a sentence of condemnation and deposition against Flavianus of Constantinople, the papal legates alone refused to sign. Flavianus had previously, on his condemnation being pronounced by Dioscorus, delivered an appeal in writing to these legates; on which occasion Hilarius is especially mentioned by Prosper, Leo's secretary, and in the acts of the council, as having boldly protested against the sentence. After the council, Flavianus having died from the violent treatment he had undergone, Hilarius, fearing with reason the like usage, escaped from Ephesus by night in disguise, and travelled by by-roads till he was safe in Italy. His conduct on this occasion has procured for him the title of Confessor. A letter from Hilarius, addressed after his return to the empress Pulcheria, gives an account of these transactions (Baron. ad ann. 449, and Act. Concil. Chalced.). His short pontificate is chiefly memorable for his assertion of the authority of the see of Rome in Gaul and Spain. His predecessor, Leo, during his struggle with St. Hilary of Arles for supremacy over the churches of Gaul, had obtained from the emperor Valentinian III. a famous rescript (445) confirming such supremacy to the fullest extent both in Gaul and elsewhere [LEO]; and to such extent it was accordingly claimed by Hilarius. Soon after his accession (Jan. 25, 462) he wrote to Leontius, bishop of Arles and exarch of the provinces of Narbonensis Gaul, announcing the event, and referring to the deference due to the Roman see. In times past there had been disputes about jurisdiction between the bishops of Arles and Vienne, in the course of which the popes had asserted their claim to adjudicate; and pope Zosimus (417–419) had assigned to the bishop of Arles, as his own vicar, jurisdiction over the aforesaid provinces, including Vienne, Lyons, Narbonensis prima and secunda, and the maritime Alps. In the same year Hilarius wrote a second letter to the same Leontius in reply to one received from him. Leontius had warmly and deferentially congratulated the pope on his accession, exhorting him to tread in the steps of his predecessor, and to continue the favour shewn to the see of Arles, and protect it against opponents of its jurisdiction. The pope, in his reply, commends his correspondent's deference to St. Peter, and desires that the discipline of the Roman church should prevail in all churches, so that, as there was but one faith, there should be but one discipline. A third letter, still in the same year, brings such discipline to bear. The occasion of it was this. Rusticus, metropolitan of Narbonne, had nominated his archdeacon Hermes as his own successor, but had failed in obtaining from pope Leo an approval of his nomination. Nevertheless, on the death of Rusticus, Hermes had been accepted by the clergy and people of Narbonne as their metropolitan bishop. On this, Frederic, son of Dietrich, king of the West Goths, himself an Arian, who had previously prevented this same Hermes from obtaining the see of Biterræ (Béziers) to which Rusticus had appointed him, wrote to acquaint the pope with the "wicked usurpation" and "execrable presumption" of Hermes in intruding himself into the see of Narbonne. Accordingly Hilarius wrote this third letter to Leontius. Its purport was to blame him for allowing the transaction without reporting it to the apostolic see, the appointment by a bishop of his own successor being regarded as uncanonical. It begins: "We are amazed to find you so forgetful of Christian law as not to have acquainted us with the iniquitous things that have happened in a province belonging to your monarchy, that we might correct what you cannot or will not." He repeats the language of Frederic, calling the intrusion of Hermes a wicked usurpation and execrable presumption, and requires Leontius to send to Rome a statement of the affair, signed by himself and other bishops (Hil. Ep. vii. Labbe). The matter was now brought before a synod assembled at Rome by Hilarius (462), where many bishops happened to be present at the time to celebrate the anniversary of the pope's accession. In this synod the promotion of Hermes was declared uncanonical, and he was accordingly degraded from the rank of metropolitan, but, "out of great indulgence, and for the sake of peace," allowed to retain his see. The power of ordaining bishops was transferred during the life of Hermes to the oldest bishop of the province, but was to return to the see of Narbonne after his death. Hilarius notified this decision in a letter dated Dec. 3, 462, to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne, Lyons, Narbonensis prima and secunda, and the Pennine Alps, which letter also contained regulations for the discipline of the church in Gaul; among other things that the bishops of the aforesaid provinces were to assemble yearly under the presidency of the bishop of Arles (Hil. Ep. viii. Labbe).

In 463, Hilarius again interposed in the affairs of the Church in Gaul; and on this occasion not only Leontius, but also Mamertus, metropolitan of Vienne, a man celebrated for his saintliness, fell under his displeasure. The old disputes about jurisdiction between Arles and Vienne had been already spoken of. The city Diaë Vocontiorum (Die in Dauphiné) had been assigned by pope Leo to the jurisdiction of Arles; but Mamertus had, notwithstanding, ordained a bishop of that see. Hilarius again derived his information from an Arian prince; this time from Gundriac, the Burgundian king. Accordingly he wrote another severe letter to Leontius, censuring him, as before, for not having apprized the holy see, and charging him to investigate the matter in a synod, and then send to himself a synodal letter giving a true account of it. Mamertus seems to have continued to assert his claim to jurisdiction in spite of the pope; for in the February of the following year (464) we find two more letters from Hilarius, a general one to the Gallican bishops, and another to various bishops addressed by name, in the former of which he accuses Mamertus of presumption and prevarication, threatens to deprive him of his metropolitan rank, and disallows the bishops whom he had ordained till confirmed by Leontius. The second of these two letters is noteworthy for the fact that in it the pope rests his claim to supremacy over Gaul on imperial as well as ecclesiastical law; alluding, we may suppose, to the rescript of Valentinian above alluded to. "He (i. e. Mamertus) could not abrogate any portion of the right appointed to our brother Leontius by my predecessor of holy memory; since it has been decreed by the law of Christian princes that whatsoever the prelate of the apostolic see may, on his own judgment, have pronounced to churches and their rulers, for the quiet of all priests of the Lord and the observance of discipline itself in the removal of confusions, is to be reverently received and tenaciously observed; nor can those things ever be upset which shall be supported by both ecclesiastical and royal injunction." (Hilar. Epp. ix. x. xi. Labbe.)

It is a curious circumstance of this dispute, as well as of the earlier one between Leo the Great and Hilary of Arles, that the principal persons concerned in them, those so severely objugated by the popes as well as the popes themselves, are in the Calendar of Saints. Baronius finds it needful to account for St. Leo and St. Hilarius having so bitterly inveighed against St. Hilary and St. Mamertus by saying that popes may be deceived on matters of fact, and, under the prepossession of false accusations, persecute the innocent. (Baron. ad ann. 464.)

In 465 Hilarius exercised over the Spanish Church the authority already brought to bear on that of Gaul, but in the Spanish case on appeal. Two questions came before him. First, Silvanus, bishop of Calchorra, had been guilty of three offences against the canons. He had ordained bishops without the knowledge or consent of his metropolitan, Ascanius of Tarragona; he had ordained one bishop in another province; he had latterly conducted such ordinations alone, unassisted by other bishops. Ascanius and his suffragans had in 464 sent a synodal letter on the subject to the pope, requesting directions. (Inter Hilar. Epp. ii. Labbe.)

Secondly, Nundinarius, bishop of Barcelona, had nominated one Irenæus, bishop of another see, as his own successor; and, after his death, the nomination was confirmed by the metropolitan Ascanius and his suffragans. But, as if feeling some doubt on the matter, they wrote to the pope, on the suggestion of Vincentius, duke of Tarragona, desiring his concurrence, and acknowledging the primacy of St. Peter's see. Both these letters were considered in a synod of bishops again being held at Rome on the anniversary of his accession. On the second case it was decided that Irenæus should quit the see of Barcelona, and return to his former one, and that some one of the clergy of Barcelona should be selected by Ascanius and consecrated. The reason alleged was not only the unlawfulness of translations, but still more the necessity of putting a stop to the notion, said to be not uncommon in Spain, of the episcopate being capable of being devised by will, as if it were hereditary. The other case, that of Silvanus, in regard (as the pope said in his letter on the subject) to the necessity of the times, and because the whole case against him was not altogether clear, was leniently dealt with. The Spanish bishops were ordered to condone his uncanonical acts, and the bishops ordained by him were confirmed by the pope, on condition of their being neither deuterogamists, nor persons who had married others than virgins, nor illiterate, nor maimed, nor such as had undergone public penance. But similar proceedings were prohibited for the future. (Hilar. Epp. i. ii. iii. and Concil. Rom. xviii. Labbe.)

In 467 the new emperor Anthemius, having come to Rome to take possession of the Western empire, was induced by one Philotheus, a heretic of the Macedonian persuasion, whom he had brought with him, to issue a general edict of toleration for heretics. This edict was, however, revoked before coming into effect; and pope Gelasius (Ep. ad Episc. Dardan.) says that this was due to Hilarius having in the church of St. Peter remonstrated with the emperor, and induced him to promise on oath that he would allow no schismatical assemblies in Rome. In the same year Hilarius died.

He appears in the Roman Calendar as a saint and confessor, his day being Sept. 10. In remembrance of his deliverance at Ephesus from the trials that procured him the title of confessor, he built, after he became pope, in the baptistery of Constantine near the Lateran, two chapels dedicated to St. John Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, to the latter of whom he attributed his deliverance. The chapel to the Evangelist bore the inscription, "Liberatori suo Johanni Evangelistae, Hilarius famulus Christi." (Bolland. citing Caesar Rasponus.)

Anastasius Bibliothecarius describes at length his various costly gifts to churches, and ornamentation of them; and speaks of his foundation of monasteries to St. Laurentius and St. Balneus, of an oratory to St. Stephen "in baptisterio Lateranensi," and of two libraries in the same place. He adds, "In urbe Roma constituit ministeriales qui circuirent constitutas stationes"; also, that he was buried at St. Laurentius' church in a crypt near the body of the blessed bishop Sixtus. It is said to have been at his instance that Victorinus Aquitanus compiled his Paschal cycle, "considerans Theophili Alexandrini episcopi cyclum jam in declivum labentem." (Baron. ad ann. 463, quoting Gennad. de Vir. Illustr. c. 88.) Baronius adds (in loc. citat.) that Bede attributes the cycle rather to Victor, bishop of Capua; "sed complures testantur haec de Victorino." The extant writings of Hilarius are his letters referred to above. A letter quoted as his in the acts of the second council of Nice, adducing a passage from St. Chrysostom in favour of image-worship, is spurious. Anastasius mentions his decreta sent to various parts, confirming the synods of Nice,

Ephesus, and Chalcedon, condemning Eutyches, Nestorius, and all heretics, and confirming the domination and primacy of the holy Catholic and apostolic see. In the Roman council held under him A.D. 465, above referred to, five canons were promulgated, debarring deuterogamists, those who had married other than virgins, penitents, illiterate, or maimed persons from ordination, and forbidding dying bishops to nominate their successors. (Concil. Rom. xviii. Labbe.)

HILARIUS (19) (HILARUS), bishop of America (Amelia), was present A.D. 465 at the council held at Rome. He was succeeded in the following year by Tiburtinus. (Mansi, vii. 959; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 335; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 196.)

[R. S. G.]

HILARIUS (20), bishop of Conversano, present at the third synod under pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who adopts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele (§ 220). (Mansi, viii. 253.)

[A. H. D. A.]

HILARIUS (21), bishop of Photice, who signed the synodic epistle of Vetus Epirus to pope Hormisdas in 516. (Mansi, viii. 405; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 143.)

[C. H.]

HILARIUS, bishop of Mende. [HILARUS.]

HILARIUS of Novaria. [FYLACRIUS.]

HILARIUS of Perga. [HILARIANUS (2).]

HILARIUS (22), seventh bishop of Digne, succeeding Portianus, and followed by Heraclius, was present at the fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, the second of Clermont in the same year, and the fifth of Arles in 554. (Mansi, ix. 136, 144, 703; Gall. Christ. iii. 1113.)

[S. A. B.]

HILARIUS (23), first bishop of Carcassonne, commemorated June 3. His age is uncertain, save that the ancient martyrology of this church places him under the Arians—an indefinite expression, however, since the Visigoths ruled the district from the 5th to the 8th century, and were not converted from Arianism till the end of the 6th. Hilarius may have lived about the latter date. He is commemorated at Carcassonne conjointly with St. Valerius, but there is reason to conjecture that they are in fact the same person (Gall. Ch. vi. 863; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 291.)

[R. T. S.]

HILARIUS (24), metropolitan bishop of Salamis (Constantia), in Cyprus. He probably lived during the first half of the 7th century, celebrated both as a man of sanctity and of learning, and as a converter of heretics to the Church. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1048; Lusignano, Chorographia di Cipro, p. 25.)

HILARIUS (25), bishop of Comblutum (Alcalá de Henares) from about 623 to about 648. He appeared at the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), his signature preceding those of forty-five bishops. He also subscribed the acts of the fifth, sixth, and seventh councils, in all of which he took the first place among the suffragans present. His pontificate must have lasted about twenty-five years, and is contemporary with the great outburst of monastic enthusiasm in the neighbouring Vierzo under St. FRUCTUOSUS. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 405, 413, 423; Esp. Sagr. vii. 184.) [ASTURIUS.] [M. A. W.]

HILARIUS (26) (ALARIUS, ALARICUS), bishop of Auria, or Orense. His signature appears as sixth among those of the third council of Braga, in A.D. 675, which was attended by eight bishops, and twenty-sixth among those of the thirteenth council of Toledo, which was attended by forty-eight bishops (Esp. Sag. xvii. 45; Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Española, ii. 512, 660).

[F. D.]

HILARIUS (27), bishop of Toulouse, commemorated May 21; remarkable for his devotion to the memory of St. Saturninus. He is placed next or next but one to Saturninus, who is assigned to the 3rd century, but his period is not ascertained. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 11; Gall. Chr. xiii. 4; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 132.)

[R. T. S.]

HILARIUS (28) I AND II, respectively first and seventh bishops of the Veromandui, before the 6th century when the see was fixed at Noyon. (Gall. Ch. ix. 979.)

[R. T. S.]

HILARIUS (29), martyr with Proclus in the reign of Trajan; commemorated July 12. They were natives of Ancyra, zealous and successful preachers of the faith. When Proclus, who was the first seized, was being led to execution, he met Hilarius, who was his kinsman, and saluted him, whereupon Hilarius was apprehended and beheaded. (Basil. Menol. iii. 163.)

[C. H.]

HILARIUS (30), a Roman official, writer of the imperial order to the vicar of Africa concerning the journey back of bishops from Arles (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 212, ed. Oberthür).

[H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (31), a deacon of Rome, sent by Liberius bishop of Rome as legate with Lucifer bishop of Cagliari and Pancratius a presbyter to the emperor Constantius. He was at Milan in that capacity when violent measures were taken against the Catholics by the Arians in the council of A.D. 355. He was personally a great sufferer for his loyalty to the faith of Nicaea. (Hieronym. de Vir. Illust. 95, in Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 697; Mansi, iii. 243-247.) He subsequently joined the followers of Lucifer, and wrote in their interest on the re-baptism of heretics (Hieronym. Diol. adv. Luciferian. 21, 27, in Patr. Lat. xxxiii. 175, 182); but seems to have become reconciled before the death of Damasus, A.D. 384. He is thought to have been the author of the Comment. in XIII. Epp. Beati Pauli attributed to St. Ambrose [cf. HILARIUS (6), AMBROSIASTER], and also of the Questiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti appended to the works of St. Augustine. (Patr. Lat. xxxv. 2206; Bellarmine, de Script. Eccl. 76; Garnier, Appendix ii. ad part. ii. Op. Mar. Mercat. in Patr. Lat. xlvi. 316-320.)

[T. W. D.]

HILARIUS (32), a friend of Basil's school-boys, for whom he had always felt affection and admiration. We have one letter of Basil's to him, written A.D. 375, expressing the severe disappointment it had been to him on his arrival at Dazimon to find he had left it a few days before, as he had much desired to confer with him on the troubled state of the church and his own private distresses. His sorrow at missing him was much increased by the failure in the transmission of a letter Hilarius had written to him on ecclesiastical matters. Hilarius was in bad health, and Basil exhorts him to patient endurance. (Basil. Epist. 212 [370].) [E. V.]

HILARIUS (33), ST., priest and confessor at Oisé (Aviciacus), a village about eight miles from Sens. According to tradition he died at the close of the 4th century at Oisé, where his body lay till the year 841, when St. Aldricus archbishop of Sens translated it to Sens (Sept. 23). Nothing trustworthy is known of him, or even where he lived. The legendary Lectiones make him a relative and godson of Hilary of Poitiers. His day of commemoration is July 1. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. i. 39-42.)

HILARIUS (34)—Sept. 27. Martyr at Sion in Valais during the Vandal irruptions in the 4th or 5th century. (Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HILARIUS (35), or HILARUS, a presbyter, who sent to St. Augustine, c. A.D. 414, a letter with sundry questions as to opinions held by certain persons at Syracuse, chiefly relating to Pelagianism. They are as follows:—

1. Whether man can be free from sin, and of himself keep God's commandments?

2. Whether an infant, dying without baptism, can be saved?

3. Whether a rich man, even if he keep God's commandments, can enter into the kingdom of heaven without first parting with his riches?

4. Whether oaths are lawful?

5. Whether the church, which ought to be spotless (Eph. v. 27), is the one which is visible, or the one to which we look forward? For some held that it is possible for the visible church to be so (Aug. Ep. 156).

To these questions Augustine replies at length (Ep. 157).

1. As to freedom from sin, let those who think this possible look at 1 John i. 8. Let them remember the prayer which our Lord gave to His apostles, and to all Christians, in which forgiveness of sins forms one of the petitions; also the confession of sin made by Daniel (Dan. ix. 20). A broad distinction must be made between the guilt of those who, having been preserved by God's grace from great crimes, have endeavoured to make amends for their faults by prayers and alms, and those who, on the ground that no one is free from sin, give themselves up to self-indulgence. As to capacity of righteousness without help, this notion is refuted (a) by the Lord's Prayer, which prays that we may not be led into temptation; (b) by the ninth commandment, which forbids sinful appetite; (c) by the close connexion of the law with Christ, Who is said to be its completion (Rom. x. 4), though the Jews put Him to death; (d) by the terms of our Lord's mission, Who came as the great physician, to call not righteous persons but sinners to repentance. Those who want Him not are like insane persons, of whom we know that the greater the disease the less is their call for the physician. Our free-will, therefore, belongs to us, not in order that we may reject Divine help, but that we may seek it in prayer. We possess nothing but what we have received (2 Cor. x. 17). Let us, therefore, not presume upon our gifts, for God resists the proud, but use the means which He gives for improving them.

II. As to salvation of unbaptized infants:—if the sin of Adam has infected the race from birth (Rom. v. 12–19), and there can be no new birth except in Christ, this principle must necessarily apply to infants, though it must be completed by release from the guilt of subsequent transgression by application of the same remedy. Thus it was to Christ, God and man, and not to mere obedience to law, nor to exercise of free-will, that the patriarchs looked by faith for salvation. As by Adam came death, so by Christ alone comes salvation. It is on the same ground only that we can hope for pardon, whether as infants or as actual transgressors, for it is only through Christ that the former can be released from the guilt of sin. This doctrine is opposed by many, by some even at Carthage, especially by Celestius, who, however, was compelled unwillingly to admit the necessity of Christ's redemption even for infants.

III. As regards the case of rich men, the question appears to be met (a) by the instances of Abraham and Jacob, (b) by the fact that in the parable Lazarus was not accepted because he was poor, nor Dives rejected because he was rich; and if in reply to this it be said that in the former cases men had not yet been bidden, as afterwards they were by the Gospel, to sell their goods and give the value to the poor, the answer is, that in order to attain eternal life our Lord bade the man who asked Him what he was to do, not to sell his goods but to keep the commandments. It was in order to attain perfection that Christ recommended the former course to him. So St. Paul exhorts rich men to make good use of their wealth, and though both he and our Lord warn us of the danger of riches, yet the latter reminds us that with God nothing is impossible (Matt. xix. 16, 22, 26; 1 Tim. vi. 17, 19). A distinction must also be drawn between "leaving" and "selling" (Matt. xix. 29). A Christian ought to be ready, if necessary, to "leave," i.e. give up everything for Christ's sake, riches, relatives, wife, even though he may not be called on to do so (Luke xiv. 26, 27, 33). There is reason to think that some of those who are so loud in condemning the rich are themselves living on their contributions. But as for himself, says Augustine, he has acted on the principle of giving up his possessions, although he had but little to give up: but it was not a point of little or much; that he had gained by the sacrifice he was well assured; yet he would not condemn others.

IV. V. The other questions must be passed over briefly. The church contains good and bad fish. Oaths should be avoided as much as possible, but there are many expressions used by St. Paul which are equivalent to oaths, as "God is my witness," and the like. It is best never to swear, but while there is no sin in swearing truly, it is a grievous offence to swear falsely (Aug. Ep. 157). [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS, pope. [HILARIUS (18).]

HILARIUS (1) (HILARIUS), one of the two clerks (exceptores), employed at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411, on the part of the proconsul, to prepare and verify the lists of the persons present and to take notes of the proceedings. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 344, 410, 465, 466, 480, 483, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (2), Donatist bishop of Sullita, or Suliana, in Byzacene, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 451, ed. Oberthür). [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (3), bishop of Bofeta, or Buffada, in Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. He had formerly been a Donatist, but had become a Catholic, and had at that time no rival in his see. With this change Alypius taunted Petilianus when he was obliged to acknowledge it (Mon. Vet. Don. i. 120, 121). [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (4), a layman of Carthage, of tribunitian rank, who found fault with the practice which prevailed there of singing hymns at the altar either before or after the oblation. The complaint is mentioned by Augustine, but his reply is not extant (Aug. Retract. ii. 11). [H. W. P.]

HILARIUS (5) (HILARIUS), a Gallic bishop joining in a synodic epistle of Ravennius bishop of Arles to pope Leo in Dec. 451, and addressed with the others by Leo in reply. (Leo Mag. epp. 99, 102, in Patr. Lat. liv. 966, 969.) [C. H.]

HILARIUS (6), notary, sent as legate with Ennodius bishop of Pavia and others by pope Hormisdas to the emperor Anastasius in 515. (Mansi, Concil. viii. 395, B. D.) [C. H.]

HILARIUS (7) (HILARIUS, popularly St. CHELIRS), ST., sixth bishop of Mende, following Leonicus and succeeded by St. Evanthius, entertained St. Leobinus, afterwards bishop of Chartres at Mende, circ. A.D. 520 (Acta S. Leobini, i. 3, Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 350), and was present at the first council of Clermont A.D. 535, where he subscribed himself as "episcopus ecclesiae Gabalitanis," i.e. Javouls (Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 863, Florence, 1759–98). It has been suggested that an ode of Venantius Fortunatus "ad Hilarium episcopum" was addressed to him (lib. iii. c. 21; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 142 n.), but it probably was written after his death.

The Bollandists publish from old MSS. a short life of him, which they consider bears the marks of having been written soon after his death. It is, however, of an extremely legendary character. According to it, though his name was given to him from his disposition, from an early age he subjected himself to austerities and ingenious tortures. About two miles from Mende he built a cell, where he lived with three brethren. Later he built a monastery near the Tarua, and gathered a great company of monks there. Here he fought against the pagan revels of January, which still survived in the neighbourhood. The monotony of his life was broken by many visits to the monastery on the isle of Lérins. When the Sicambri (i.e. Franks) invaded his district, he mitigated the horrors of war, especially by redeeming captives from slavery. The Life makes no mention of his acts as bishop of Mende. The date of St. Hilarius's death is unknown, but it must have taken place before 541, when St. Evanthius was already sitting. He was commemorated Oct. 25 (Usuard., Wandalbert). His remains were in 777 transferred by Fulradus, abbat of St. Denys, to the new monastery of Salona. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. xi. 619 seqq.; Gall. Christ. i. 86.) [S. A. B.]

HILARUS (8), subdeacon. In a letter to Anthemius, another subdeacon, Gregory directs that for having made false accusations Hilarius is to be deprived of his office, publicly beaten, and sent into exile. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xi. indict. iv. 71 in Migne, lxxvii. 1021.) [A. H. D. A.]

HILARUS (9), the archpriest and guardian of the Roman see, who with the pope elect, John IV., wrote to the Irish bishops in 640 on the Paschal controversy. (Bede, H. E. ii. 19.) [S.]

HILBERTUS (HILDEBERTUS), ST., fourth abbat of Fontanelle, succeeding St. Ansbert, and followed by St. Bainus (circ. 700). At his suggestion the monk Aigradus undertook to write the life of his predecessor St. Ansbert, which still survives, though apparently retouched by a later hand (Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 1048, Paris, 1668-1701). He also built a church, in honour of the same saint, about four miles from the monastery, where a wooden cross had formerly stood. St. Hilbert was buried in the church of St. Paul, but translated afterwards to the greater church. (Gall. Christ. xi. 167.) [S. A. B.]

HILDA, properly HILD named after a Saxon war-goddess, was the daughter of Hereric, nephew (not grandson, as Florence of Worcester understood "nepotis" in Bede, iv. 23) of Eadwine or Edwin, afterwards king of Northumbria. As a member of the house of Aelle or Ella, king of Deira, Hereric, like his uncle, was persecuted by Aethelfrith or Ethelfrid the Fierce, who had united Deira to Berenicia. With his wife Bregswid, whom Florence calls Beorhtswith, he found shelter in the little British district of Elmete, in the present West Riding of Yorkshire, then governed by a king named Cerdic. Here he became the father of two daughters, Hereswid or Hereswith—afterwards the wife of Ethelhere, the brother and successor of Anna, king of the East Angles, and, as Bede tells us, the mother of a later king, Aldwulf—and Hilda, whose birth in 614 was preceded by a dream which was afterwards interpreted as foreshadowing to Bregswid the spiritual "light" which her expected child was to diffuse. Hereric was soon afterwards poisoned by order of, or with the connivance of, the British king Cerdic, to whom all Saxons, exiled or triumphant, would be objects of enmity. Edwin punished this murder by the annexation of Elmete and the expulsion of Cerdic (Nennius, Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 76), and Hilda, as a girl of thirteen, received baptism with her grand-uncle (himself only twenty-nine years her senior) from the hands of Paulinus on Easter Eve in 627. She resolved, about A.D. 647, to embrace the monastic life and spent a year in East Anglia, hoping to be able to join her sister Hereswid, who had withdrawn into the convent of Chelles, near Paris; but Aidan, bishop of Lindisfarne, recalled her to Northumbria, and she passed another year with a very few companions, under monastic rule on land of one "hide" or "familia" on the north bank of the Wear. She was then appointed to succeed Heiu, who had been abbess of a small convent called Heruteu (the Isle of the Hart) at Hartlepool, A.D. 649. She "took pains to rule it according to such maxims of monastic discipline as she could learn from wise men. For bishop Aidan and all the religious who knew her, were accustomed to visit her, to hold her in regard, and to give her instructions, for the sake of her innate wisdom and her love for the (monastic) service of God" (Bede, iv. 23).

At the end of 655, after the decisive battle of Winwidfield, Hilda received the infant princess Aelfled from the hands of her father, king Oswy, to be trained as a nun (Bede, iii. 24), and two years later, having obtained an estate of ten hides at the place called Streaenshalch, which Bede interprets "the Bay of the Lighthouse" and which we know by its Danish name of Whitby, she fulfilled with energy the task of organizing this new community; and it was under her roof that the famous conference on the Paschal question was held in the spring of 664. Hilda was then an adherent of the Scotie Easter, but she joined in the general adoption of the more accurate and "Catholic" rule. Her monastery, like the later foundations of Coldingham, Barking, Repton, Wimborne—like the great Irish house of St. Bridget at Kildare,—and like those of Autun, Brie, Fontevrault, and others, included monks as well as nuns, both classes being under the rule of the abbess, and the nuns taking precedence of the monks (Kitchin, Hist. France, i. 252); and Hilda, who for her eminence in piety and grace was called "the Mother" by all who knew her, trained all the inmates in "the practice of justice, piety, chastity, and all other virtues, but especially of peacefulness and charity; so that, after the model of the primitive church, no one there was rich or poor, all persons had all things in common, for nothing appeared to be the property of any individual. So great, also, was her prudence, that not only all common people in their necessities, but even sometimes kings and princes sought counsel of her and found it." Thus Bede, who adds, in illustration of the good effects of Hilda's government, that bishops began to look to Streaenshalch for their future clergy, and five of the monks, Bosa, Aetla, Oftfor, John (St. John of Beverley), and Wilfrid (second of the name), were in course of time raised to the episcopate. Many persons living at a distance were benefited by Hilda's example. She appears to have shared in the general feeling of Northumbrian churchmen, which condemned Wilfrid when he appealed to Rome against the division of his diocese without his consent: she even joined with archbishop Theodore in sending persons to accuse him before pope Agatho (Eddius, Life of Wilfrid, c. 52). It was probably in these later years of her life that she heard from her reeve the strange story of the development of poetical powers in the herdsman Caedmon, and in presence of many learned men examined Caedmon himself, heard him recite his song, and caused him to assume the habit as a monk of the house. She had the trial of a long last illness, which began in 674—four years previously to the first troubles of Wilfrid; a succession “of feverish attacks wore out her strength; but she ceased not during six years to praise her Maker, and to teach the flock entrusted to her that Christians should serve Him obediently while they had health, and in sickness or adversity should never omit to render their thanks to Him.” At length, in the autumn of 680—the year of the council of Hatfield, of Wilfrid’s return home, and of his severe imprisonment—Hilda, who had but recently founded at Hackness a small nunnery dependent on the mother-house, felt that her work and her endurance were about to end. She received her last Communion, “exhorted her nuns to keep Christian peace with each other and with all, and while uttering her farewell counsels looked cheerfully on death, or rather, in the words of the Lord, passed from death unto life,” November 17, 680. [W. B.]

HILDEBALDUS (HILDIVALDUS, HILTRIBALDUS), twenty-third or twenty-fourth archbishop of Cologne, succeeding Ricolfus and followed by Hadabaldus, was one of a number of the higher clergy, whom Charles the Great admitted to intimacy and employed on diplomatic missions (see Theodulfus, Carmen ad Carolum, iii. 1; Migne, Patr. Lat. cv. 319, in which he follows the royal family, and allusion is made to his presence at the king’s table). At the council of Frankfurt in A.D. 794, Charles, having obtained the pope’s licence, proposed to make him the royal chaplain in succession to Angilramnus, with the sanction of the assembled prelates. The date of his accession to the see is uncertain, but must have been previous to this council, since in the canon he receives the title of episcopus (Canon liii., Baluzius, Capitularia, i. 270). For the story of Charles’s first acquaintance with him, see Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (i. 540), who quotes the Cölnische Chronik (fol. 115a). He was one of the deputies who, in A.D. 799, was sent to meet pope Leo on his journey to Paderborn, and, after accompanying him on his return to Rome, assisted at the inquiry instituted by Charles into the outrage committed upon him by the Roman populace (Anastasius quoted in Eckhart, Franciæ Orientalis, i. 789; Gall. Christ. iii. 634). He consecrated St. Liudger to the see of Münster, A.D. 802, after with difficulty overcoming his reluctance. To the latter’s objection that a bishop should be blameless, Hildebald humbly replied that he himself was far from being so (Vita S. Liudgeri, i. 20, Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 411). In 811 his signature appears first among those of the bishops who attested Charles’s will (Einhard, Vita K. M. xxxiii., Pertz, ii. 463). In 813, together with Richolfus, bishop of Mainz, he presided over the council of Mainz (Labbe, Sacr. Conc. xiv. 64, Florence, 1759–98). The following year was that of Charles’s death. Seven days after the fatal illness had seized him he sent for Hildebald—“familiarissimum pontificem suum”—that he might receive from his hand the sacraments before his death (Theganus, Vita Lud. Imp. vii., Pertz, ii. 592). Hildebald seems to have retained his office of royal chaplain and his influence under Louis the Pious, as in 816 we find him commissioned with Theodulfus, bishop of Orleans, and others to meet pope Stephen V. and escort him to Rheims (Vita Lud. Imp. xxvi., Pertz, ii. 620). Hildebald was also abbat of Monsee in the diocese of Passau, where he succeeded Henrius in or before the year 803, and was followed by Lantbertus on his resignation of the active duties between 814 and 818 (see the Traditiones of the monastery quoted by Eckhart, ibid. ii. 155–6). The year of his death is usually given as 818, but the Annales S. Emmeramni (Pertz, i. 93) place it in the following year (cf. Eckhart, ibid.). According to Gelenius, quoted by Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. Franc. 818, xx. tom. vii. 492–3), he was buried in the church of St. Gereon by the altar of St. Maurice; and the same authority states that the new metropolitan church of Cologne was built by him (Le Cointe, ibid.). Baluzius gives a præceptum for the institution of bishoprics in Saxony, which purports to be signed by Hildebald, royal chaplain, but the date (789) proves it to be spurious, as the office was not conferred on him till five years later (Capitularia, i. 245). The same remark applies to another given on p. 259.

Though Hildebald and his predecessors for some way back are usually spoken of as archbishops, it is doubtful whether Cologne had yet acquired a metropolitan jurisdiction. The change is generally fixed between 794 and 799. The canon of the former year calls him episcopus merely, while Angilramnus of Metz is archiepiscopus. But after the latter date he is more frequently spoken of by the higher title, though in the Annales S. Emmeramni, which record his death in 819, he is episcopus only. Rettberg concludes that the subject needs further investigation (Kirchengeschichte, i. 540; cf. Eckhart, Franciæ Orientalis, i. 756). Gams, while mentioning that the usual view makes Hildebald the first archbishop, expresses his belief that the occupants of the see of Cologne were archbishops at least as early as the 6th century (Series Episc. 269). [S. A. B.]

HILDEBERTUS (1), instructor of Coelius Sedulius, said by Ussher (Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 319, 576) to have flourished A.D. 460. By a strange mistake Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 353, and Men. Scot. Dec. 21), followed by Tanner (Bibl. 403), who gives a long list of works ascribed to him, has confounded him with that Hildebert who was bishop of Le Mans and afterwards archbishop of Tours, in the beginning of the 12th century. Colgan, on the other hand, would seek to identify him with St. Ailbhe. (Colgan, Acta SS. 316, c. 2, 319 n. <sup>45</sup>; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 221, Dec. 21; Spotswood, Hist. Ch. Scot. 8.) [J. G.]

HILDEBERTUS, bishop of Meaux. [HILDEBERTUS.]

HILDEBERTUS (Sigebert, Chron. ann. 697), brother of Clovis. [CHILDEBERT III.] [C. H.]

HILDEBERTUS, abbat of Fontenelle [HILBERTUS.]

HILDEBERTUS (2) (EMEBERTUS), ninth bishop of Cambrai and Arras, between St. Vindicianus and Hunaldus. His death is placed on June 24 in 713 or 715. (Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 35, 49; Gall. Christ. iii. 5, 8; Le Glay, Cameracum Christianum, 10.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEBERTUS (3), according to the Gallia Christiana, twenty-first bishop of Cologne, between Hildegarius and Berthelinus, but his place in the series is very doubtful. It appears to rest solely upon the testimony of an epitaph in the church of St. Gereon (quoted in the Gallia Christiana, iii. 631), and even that is most questionable, since the name Hildebertus involves an error of prosody, while that of Hildegarius, or Hildegerus, the twentieth in the see, which later critics would substitute for it, is metrically correct. Those who believe in his existence impute to him the contention with St. Boniface as to the see of Utrecht (HILDEGARIUS). He is omitted by Pottbast and Gams. (Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 539; Gall. Christ. iii. 631.)

HILDEBOLD of Cologne. [HILDEBALD.]

HILDEBRAND I., ninth bishop of Séez, succeeding Lendebaudis, and followed by Rodobertus, is said to have been sitting in 575, but nothing is known of him. (Gall. Christ. xi. 676; Gams, Series Episc. 625.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEBRAND, bishop of Benevento, circ. 622-633. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 26.) [A. H. D. A.]

HILDEBRAND, king of the Lombards. [HILDEPRAND.]

HILDEBRAND, archbishop of Cologne. [HILDEBALD.]

HILDEFONSUS, HILDEFUNS, bishop of Toledo. [ILDEFONSUS.]

HILDEGARDA (HILDEGARDIS, HILDIGARDA), the 2nd wife of Charles the Great, of a family of high rank among the Suevi. For her pedigree from Gotefrid duke of the Alemanni see Theganus, Vita Ludovici Pii, 2, Pertz, Scriptores ii. 590. She had a brother named Oudalricus. According to her epitaph she was married at a very early age, and died young. She gave birth to four sons, one of whom scarcely survived its birth. Those who lived were Charles, Pippin, and Louis afterwards surnamed the Pious, the successor of his father. She also had three daughters, Hruodrudis, Bertha and Gisla. In A.D. 780 she accompanied Charles on his visit to Italy. She died on the 30th of April, 783, and was buried in the church of St. Arnolfus at Metz. Her most laudatory epitaph is preserved. The same year Charles married Fastrada. (Einhardus, Vita Karoli Magni, c. xviii., Pertz Scriptores, ii. 453; Monum. Carolina, ed. Jaffé, 525; Pauli, Gesta Episc. Mettens. Pertz, ii. 265; Monach. Sangall. Gesta Kar. i. 13, Pertz, ii. 736; and see the various Annales in Pertz, Scriptores, i. 12, 17, 32, 41, 63, 64, 67, 70, 92, 160-1, 164-5, 350, 352; ii. 223, 240; Ideler, Leben und Wandel Karls des Grossen, i. 211.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEGARIUS (1), twenty-first occupant of the see of Sens, between Mederius and Annobertus. In the tenth year of Dagobert (631) he subscribed the charter of St. Eligius for the foundation of the monastery of Solenniicum (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 662). In a charter given about A.D. 636 to the monastery of the Holy Cross at Rebaix, by St. Faro, bishop of Meaux, a fragment of which has survived (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1137), the name of Hildegarius, or Childegarius, archbishop of Sens, appears among the subscriptions, as also in another for the monastery of St. Fara (Eboriacense), purporting also to be given by St. Faro, but plainly a forgery. (See Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1133 n.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEGARIUS (2) (HILDIGARIUS, HILDEGERUS, CHILDEGARIUS), bishop of Cologne, between Agilulfus or Regenfried, about 750 and Hildebert, or more probably Berthelinus. In A.D. 753 he accompanied Pippin on an expedition against the Saxons, and was killed at a fort called Juburg, or Iburg. This occurrence is mentioned in various Annales to be found in Pertz, Scriptores, i. 10, 11, 26, 27, 116, 138, 139, 331, 346. He seems to be the prelate alluded to as recently dead in a letter of St. Boniface to pope Stephen III. assigned to the year 753 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 787; Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, 259). If, as seems probable, the epitaph quoted by the authors of the Gallia Christiana (iii. 631) as belonging to Hildebertus, is really to be ascribed to Hildegarius (HILDEBERTUS), he was buried in the church of St. Gereon. The titles of beatus and martyr have been attributed to him on account of his violent death at the hand of barbarians. He is commemorated June 28 and Aug. 8, the days of his death and burial respectively. In the spurious life of St. Swibert it is stated that Hildegard, on a Saxon expedition, fell from his horse in full armour and was injured, but was healed on visiting the tomb of that saint. He is again mentioned with reference to the canonization of St. Swibert (Vita S. Swiberti in Suziorum, de Probat. Sanct. Hist. 1 Mart. ii. 28, 32; Gall. Christ. iii. 631; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 539; Poth. Biblioth. Suppl. p. 299.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEGARIUS (3) (HILTIGARIUS), forty-third bishop of Trent, between Amator and Daniel; in Pottbast's list by Voldericus. He was sitting in the year 802 (misprinted in Ughelli, 902). He is said to have restored the shrine of St. Vigilius, and buried the relics of some martyrs in it. (Ughelli, Italia Sacra, v. 512, Rome, 1653; Poth. Biblioth. suppl. p. 423.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEGERUS, bishop. [HILDEGARIUS.]

HILDEGODUS (HILDIGUNGUS), 32nd bishop of Soissons, between Deodatus I. and Rothadus I., one of the subscribers of the Placitum of Attigny in A.D. 765. (Mansi, xii. 675; Gall. Christ. ix. 339.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEGRINUS. [HILDIGRIMUS.]

HILDEGUARD, bishop. [HILDOARD.]

HILDELITHA, abbess. [HILDILID.]

HILDEPRAND (HILDEBRAND), nephew of Luitprand king of the Lombards, associated with his uncle during the latter part of his reign. Very little is known of him. He assisted to take Ravenna c. 729, and when the town was recaptured with the help of the Venetian fleet he was taken prisoner. During the illness of Luitprand, in 735, he was called to the throne as joint king. On his uncle's death he reigned apparently for a few months, and then was cast out to make way for Ratchis, 744. But the accounts and the chronology are uncertain. (Codex Carolinus, ed. Jaffé, p. 15; Paulus Diaconus, vi. 54, 56; Pauli Continuatio Tertia, 19, in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 207; Liber Pontificalis, ed. Vignol. ii. 73.) [A. H. D. A.]

HILDERIC (1) (HILDRIX), son of Hunneric king of the Vandals (by Eudocia the daughter of the emperor Valentinian III.) and grandson of Genseric. He succeeded his first cousin, Trasamund, as king of the Vandals, on May 28, A.D. 523. Though his predecessor had obliged him to take an oath that he would not restore to the orthodox party their churches and privileges, the first act of his reign was to grant them complete freedom of worship. The exiled bishops were recalled, Boniface was consecrated bishop of Carthage in the church of St. Agileus, and the Catholics were allowed to fill the sees which had become vacant during the persecution. (Appendix to Prosper's Chronicle, Vita Sancti Fulgentii, and Chronicle of Victor Tunnnensis in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 607, lxx. 145, lxxviii. 953.) These measures have caused it to be supposed that Hilderic, owing to the influence of his mother, was really a Catholic himself, but they appear to have been due to his mild disposition which bordered on feebleness. He could not endure the name of war to be mentioned, and entrusted all military affairs to his cousin Hoamer, who was surnamed the Achilles of the Vandals. His reign was marked by a great defeat of the Vandals by the Moors in the Byzacene province, and by the breach of the Vandal alliance with the Goths and Theodoric, whose sister Amalafriada, the widow of Trasamund, was thrown into prison on a charge of conspiracy. She died in confinement, and it was suspected that her end had been hastened by violence. All her escort of Goths were put to death (Cassiodorus, Variarum, ix. 141, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxx. 765). The relations, however, between Hilderic and Justinian were of the most friendly character. The heir presumptive to the throne was Gelimer, the eldest of the house of Genzo, Genseric's second son, a good soldier, and a clever and unscrupulous man. Taking advantage of Hilderic's weakness he gradually encroached on his authority, and finally in the eighth year of his reign persuaded the Vandals to depose him, alleging that his unwarlike disposition and his defeat by the Moors, and also his intention to hand over the sovereignty to Justinian instead of allowing it to pass to the rival branch of the royal family made such a step necessary. Gelimer then ascended the throne and imprisoned Hilderic, Hoamer, and his brother Evages. The only reply Gelimer vouchsafed to Justinian's remonstrances was to increase the rigour of their confinement and to cause Hoamer's eyes to be put out; and as soon as he heard of the landing of Belisarius he sent orders to his brother Ammatas, who commanded at Carthage, for the execution of Hilderic and Evages, Hoamer having previously died. They were accordingly put to death in their prison, A.D. 534. (Procopius, de Bell. Vand. i. 9, 17.) A rare silver coin of Hilderic's is described by Eckhel, Doctrina Numorum Veterum, iv. 138. [F. D.]

HILDERIC (2), second recorded bishop of Spire, between Josse and Athanasius or Athanaricus. He was present at a council of Paris held in 614, according to Gams, in whose Series he appears (p. 313). He is omitted from the list of the Gallia Christiana (v. 313), and is unknown to Le Cointe and Rettberg (Kirchengeschichte, i. 213, 639). He does not occur in the list of Potthast (Biblioth. suppl. 411), nor in Remling (Gesch. der Bischöfe zu Speyer.) [S. A. B.]

HILDERIC, bishop. [HUGHIERIUS.]

HILDERIC (3), duke of Spoleto c. 738. He was put into the duchy by king Luitprand, in the place of Trasamund, who had rebelled against him and fled to Rome. The next year Trasamund returned, killed Hilderic, and reinstated himself. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55; Liber Pontificalis, ed. Vignol. ii. p. 60.) [A. H. D. A.]

HILDERIC (4), abbat, disciple of Paulus Diaconus, whose epitaph he wrote in a set of heroic acrostic verses, running to the letters in "Paulus Laevita doctor praeclarus et insons." (Paul. Diac. in Patr. Lat. xcv. 430.) [C. H.]

HILDERIC (5), thirty-third bishop of Meaux, succeeding Brumerus, about A.D. 800. In a letter to Charles the Great, Hincmar says that on account of the great age and long-standing sickness of Hilderic, by reason of which the interests of religion and knowledge, and the sacred edifices, were suffering from neglect, the episcopal duties were entrusted to Hucbert, the preceptor of the palace. (Surius, de Prob. Sanct. Oct. tom. v. p. 742.) Hucbert succeeded him on his death, about 823. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1603.) [S. A. B.]

HILDEVERT (HILDEBERT, DATLEVERT), twentieth bishop of Meaux, between St. Faro and Herlingus, said to have been born of noble and pious parents, named Adalbertus and Eva, who entrusted his education to St. Faro. In the life of St. Faro by Hildegard bishop of Meaux, about 70 years later, there is a story that Datlevertus, as he is there called, built a church of great magnificence beside that of St. Faro, with the object of overshadowing it and bringing it into contempt, but the latter saint, on the night before it was to be dedicated, incited so fierce a storm that it fell to the ground and was destroyed. A synod of bishops, moreover, suspended the builder. (Acta SS. Benedict. saec. ii. p. 620, Paris, 1668-1701.) He died about A.D. 680, and is said to have been buried in a church which he had built about six miles from Meaux, but was afterwards removed to the cathedral. He was commemorated May 27. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 712.) [S. A. B.]

HILDIGARIUS. [HILDEGARIUS.]

HILDIGRIMUS (HILDEGRINUS), 31st bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, between Bovo and Adelinus. He was brother of St. Liudger bishop of Münster, and son of Thiatgrim and Liaburga, Frisians of high rank, brother of Heriburga, and uncle of Gerfrid bishop of Münster, Thiatgrim bishop of Halberstadt and Theotmar abbat of Monte Cassino. He was a disciple of his more famous brother, and during the persecution by the Saxon duke Wutukint or Witichind in 784, accompanied him to Rome, and shared his retirement of two years and a half at Monte Cassino. Nor were they separated during St. Liudger's mission to the Frisians (Altridus, Vita S. Ludgeri, Migne, Patr. Lat. xcix. 778, seqq.). Finally he succeeded St. Liudger as second abbat of Werden in the diocese of Cologne. The year 804 is given as about the date of Hildigrim's elevation to the see of Châlons. He lived till the 19th of June, 827, and was buried in his monastery church at Werden, where he was succeeded by St. Gerfridus. For St. Hildigrim as abbat, see Gall. Christ. iii. 725; and for the deeds relating to Werden in which his name occurs see Lacomblet, Urkundenbuch für die Geschichte des Niederrheins, i. pp. 16-19. Hildigrim is supposed to have been the first bishop of Halberstadt (see Gall. Christ. ix. 8; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 889; Potthast, Biblioth. suppl. 327), but the opinion is fraught with difficulties. Chroniclers of the 11th century recount that in the year 781 Charles the Great entered Saxony, divided it into eight bishoprics, and over one of them, Seligenstadt, set Hildigrim as bishop, who within the year transferred the see to Halberstadt (Annalista Saxo, Pertz, Scriptores, vi. 560, 565, 573; Annales Quedlinburgenses, Pertz, ibid. iii. 38; Thietmar, Chronicon, iv. 45, Pertz, ibid. iii. 787). But in a charter of 797 Hildigrim describes himself as a deacon merely (Lacomblet, ibid. i. pp. 6-7, No. 9). Add to this the silence of the three 9th-century biographers of St. Liudger, who know Hildigrim only as bishop of Châlons. We may conclude with Rettberg that Hildigrim has no real connexion with Halberstadt (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 471 seqq.). His day of commemoration was the 19th of June, the day of his death. [S. A. B.]

HILDILID (HILDELITHA), 2nd abbess of Barking. Bede, who extracted several miraculous stories from a book of Barking, mentions the long rule of Hildilid, her translation of the bones of the saints, male and female, who rested in the monastic ground, into the church of St. Mary, and a miraculous cure of a blind woman which took place during her time. (H. E. iv. 10.) She succeeded Ethelburga, the sister of Earconwald, in the abbess-ship, but the date of that event is uncertain. If the charter of Oethilred (Kemble, C. D. 35) to Ethelburga be genuine, her promotion must have been later than 675. Florence of Worcester, however, mentions it in the year 665 (M. H. B. 532); and again in 675 (ib. 535), and according to another account it must have been after the death of Earconwald, who is said to have been visiting his sister, when he was seized with his last illness (Mon. Angl. i. 436). She was one of the virgins to whom St. Aldhelm dedicated his book on the praises of virginity (Opp. ed. Giles, p. 1), and her name occurs in a letter written by Boniface (Wynfretus) to Eadburga, abbess of Minster, as the authority on which the visions of a man who had been raised from the dead at Wenlock are reported. (Mon. Mogunt. p. 53; Epp. Bonif. ed. Würdtwein, ep. 20.) According to the legendary life of St. Earconwald, Hildilid was a foreign lady, invited by the bishop to instruct his sister in her monastic duties; from this Reyner (Apost. Bened. pp. 64, 65) infers that she came from Chelles. Mabillon (AA. SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pt. 1, p. 288) has an article on Hildilid, in which the 24th of March is assigned as the day of her commemoration; see also Boll. AA. SS. 24 March, vol. iii. pp. 484-487. The year of her death is uncertain, but it must have preceded that of Bede, and indeed the letter of Boniface, written about 717 or 718, almost implies that she was then dead. Cuthburga, the first abbess of Wimborne, was one of her pupils at Barking. (Will. Malmesb. G. R. ed. Hardy, p. 49.) See also Flor. Wig. ad ann. 675; M. H. B. 53; Will. Malmesb. G. P. lib. ii. § 73.

HILDIVALDUS. [HILDEBALDUS.]

HILDMER (HILDMAER), a prefect of Egfrid king of Northumbria, and a person of great piety, at whose house Cuthbert, who was greatly attached to him, was a frequent guest. Bede describes a cure which the saint is said to have wrought upon Hildmer's wife, who was possessed by a devil (V. S. Cuth. c. 16; Anon. Life, ed. Stevenson, 270-1). On another occasion we are told that Hildmer himself was healed of a disease by tasting some bread which Cuthbert had blessed. (Id. c. 31.)

[J. R.]

HILDOARDUS, fifteenth bishop of Cambrai and Arras, succeeding Albinus, and followed by Halitgarius, was consecrated A.D. 790, and conferred on his church many benefits, among them a charter which he obtained from Louis the Pious exempting the church property from state burdens, and confirming the privileges granted by the two previous kings (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 49-51). Among the bishops assembled at the dedication of the monastery of St. Riquier in A.D. 795 or 799 there was present a Hildignardus, who may possibly be this prelate. About 808, at the bidding of Louis the Pious, he consecrated the church of St. Gislenuis, in Hannonia, after its restoration. In 813 he subscribed the council of Rheims, and in the following year was present at that of Noyon. In 816 he obtained from Louis a charter confirming the church of Cambrai in its possessions. He did not long survive the last-mentioned date. (Mansi, xiv. 75, 141; Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 18, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 126; Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium, lib. i. 39, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 49-51; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 799, ii. ix., 816, ii. tom. vi. 679, 681; vii. 363; Gall. Chr. iii. 10.)

HILDRADUS, abbat. [HYLDRADUS.]HILDRIC, bishop of Meaux. [HILDERIC.]

HILDUARA, a Gothic queen, wife of GUNTHIMAR. She is known to us from a letter of the comes Bulgara or Bulgchram, addressed to Gunthimar in 611 or 612, partially printed by Florez (Reynas de Espana, i. 16). The comes has just heard of the death of Hilduara, and writes, "In her we mourn the governess of the poor, the devout worshipper of the Catholic faith, a noble woman, of gracious aspect, of beautiful appearance and benignant mind." These notices of the Gothic queens are very rare and scanty. [See articles EGLONA; GOIS-VINTHA; LIUBIGOTONA; RECIBERGA.]

[M. A. W.]

HILDULFUS (HIDLUFUS, HYDULPHUS, IDOLFUS, IDOU), ST., founder of the monastery of Moyon Moutier (Medianum), in the Vosges, and reputed archbishop of Treves. There are three lives of this saint extant. The first purports to consist of passages from, or an abridgment of, the original Acta written by his disciples, and is attributed to the monks of Moyon Moutier in the year 964. It is published in Belhomme's Historia Monasterii Mediani, p. 50, and in the Acta SS. Jul. iii. 221. The second and third, also given by Belhomme and the Bollandists, are based upon the first.

According to these authorities Hildulfus was sprung from a noble family of either Nervian or Norican, i.e. Bavarian race, was ordained at Regensburg while Pippin was king of France, and succeeded Milo archbishop of Treves. After some years he resigned his see and built the monastery Medianum. Hither flocked many monks, and amongst them St. Spinulus, and Hildulfus's brothers John and Benignus. There visited him his brother Erard bishop of Regensburg. At this time he baptized and restored to sight Odilia the daughter of duke Heticor and Etico of Alsace, who was born blind. In the course of time Hildulfus was taken with a fever and died. From the Chronicon Senoniense (c. xi.-xv., Spicilegium, ii. 607-9) may be added that after the death of his friend Deodatus, Hildulfus left his own monastery (probably to the care of Leutbaldus, see Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 700, n. lvii.), and ruled that of Jointures for twenty-eight years until his death. The memory of the intercourse of the two foundations was kept up by annual ceremonies until the 17th century (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. iii. 880 n.).

This story of his life teems with chronological and other difficulties. The reign of Pippin, and the succession to Milo at Treves, fix his epoch in the middle of the 8th century, while the baptism of St. Othilia or Odilia, the foundation of Moyon Moutier, and the friendship with Deodatus all belong to the last half of the seventh. The majority of writers, following Belhomme (ibid. p. 11, cf. Gall. Christ. xiii. 386, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iii. 211, and Gams, Series Episc. 318), have made choice of the earlier of the two dates, and, ignoring the lives, as well as the Historia Trevirensis (Spicilegium, ii. 211, Paris, 1723) and the Chronicon Senoniense (c. xi.-xv., Spicilegium, ii. 607-9), place his episcopate between that of St. Numerianus and St. Basinus, circ. A.D. 666-671. The further difficulty that his name is omitted from the oldest catalogue of the archbishops they ascribe to his retirement from the see. Rettberg, who has discussed the question at some length (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 467-9, 523), points out that in both the lives of St. Maximin, though he is given the title of bishop, no see is added, and he is associated with two other prelates, who cannot be identified (Vita S. Maxi- mini, c. ii., Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vii. 23, et alia, Auct. Lupo Serratio, Surius, May 29, tom. iii. 491), and that all other notices of his archbishopric are either very late or, like the spurious charter for the monastery of St. Deodatus (see Honthelm, Hist. Trevir. i. 84), plainly untrustworthy. The story of his relationship to Erard, bishop of Regensburg, which is also inadmissible, he suggests may have resulted from the collocation of the two at the baptism of St. Odilia, though in her 11th-century biography Erard alone is mentioned (Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. iii. 2, 489-90). On the whole he concludes that Hildulfus has no right at all in the list of the archbishops of Treves, and at most must bear the rank of anchorite and founder of the monastery. Nor does his appearance in the legend of Genevieve of Brabant substantiate his claims (cf. Boll. Acta SS. 2 Apr. i. 57). [S. A. B.]

HILDUTUS, Welsh abbat, master of St. Gildas. (Colgan, Acta SS. 181, c. 3.) [LLTYD.] [J. G.]

HILIN, clerical witness to grants to bishop Trychan, and the see of Llandaff, early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 190, 193, 453, 455.) [J. G.]

HILLA, an early benefactor of Glastonbury, who in a charter dated 744 gave lands at Balderesberge and Scobbanwirthe to the monastery then governed by abbat Tunberht. (Kemble, C. D. 92; Mon. Angl. i. 47; W. Malm. Ant. Glast. ed. Gale, p. 311.) The charter seems to be spurious, although the attestations may have been taken from a genuine act. [S.]

HILLARIUS, Irish saint. [ELAIR.]

HILLIDIUS, bishop. [ILLIDIUS.]

HILLUS, 4th bishop of Séez, between St. Landericus and Hubertus, towards the close of the 5th century. (Gall. Chr. xi. 675.) [S. A. B.]

HILMICHIS, armour-bearer of Alboin, king of the Lombards. He was persuaded by the queen Rosamund to plot the death of the king. The traditional story is given at length by Paulus Diaconus. He states that the actual murder was committed by Peredeo. Agnellus (Liv. Pont. Eccl. Ravenn. 96) attributes it, possibly with more truth, to Hilmichis (see note in Monumenta Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 339). Hilmichis wanted to become king, but was rejected by the Lombards, and fled with Rosamund to Ravenna. She was persuaded by Longinus the exarch to marry him, but in trying to poison Hilmichis was detected by him, and compelled to swallow the same poison. (Oriyo Gentis, 5 Paulus Diaconus, ii. 28, 29.) [A. H. D. A.]

HILTBERT, abbat. [HILBERT.]

HILTIBALDUS. [HILDEBALDUS.]

HILTIGARIUS. [HILDEGARIUS.]

HILTIGISUS (HILTIGISILUS), a bishop who was present at the fifth council of Paris, in A. 615, and subscribed the canons with the appended description "de Tholosâ" (Gams, Series Episc. 636, 637). It is doubtful whether he belonged to Toulon or Toulouse, or to neither of those see

In the Series of Gams he is inserted under both dioceses, and in the Gallia Christiana is omitted from both. (Gall. Chr. i. 743, xiii. 8.)

HILTRUDIS, ST., the daughter of Wilbertus and Ada of Poitou, born about the middle of the eighth century. King Pippin presented her parents with an estate near Laetitia or Laesciae (Notre Dame de Liesse) in Hainault, and there they built a monastery, of which their son Guntradus became abbat. Their daughter Hiltrudis, to avoid the marriage which they pressed upon her with Hugo, a prince of Burgundy, fled into the woods, and was at length allowed to take the veil. She entered the monastery of Laesciae, living for seventeen years behind the monks' oratory, renowned for her austerities and benevolence. On her death a monument was put up to her by her brother Guntradus and his monks. The monastery, after going through many vicissitudes, was restored in the 17th century, when a statue and inscription were placed within it in honour of the saint, by the then members of the fraternity. She was commemorated on Sept. 27. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 488; Mabil. Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. ii. 381; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Sept. 27.)

[L. G. S.]

HILWARIS, Scotie virgin, companion of St. Odda, and honoured as patron of Rhoda, where she lies beside St. Odda. She flourished A.D. 713, and her feast is Nov. 28. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 341.)

[J. G.]

HIMBERTUS (HIREBERTUS) appears as fourteenth in the list of the bishops of Beauvais given by the Gallia Christiana, succeeding Maurinus or Marinus, and followed by Clemens, about the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 695.)

HIMBERTUS, bishop. [HUMBERTUS.]

HIMELINUS (HEMELINUS, HYMELINUS), ST., a priest commemorated March 10 at Visenack, near Tillemont in Brabant, where he was buried. He is said to have been Irish by origin and related to St. Rumoldus bishop of Mechlin. A short anonymous life of him, published by the Bollandists, places his life in the time of king Pippin. Beyond however the statement that he visited Rome, it furnishes nothing but a string of miracles. His name appears in some of the later martyrologies, but his existence rests on no good authority. (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 46; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, c. xix. vol. iii. 194, 197.)

HIMERIUS, catholicus of Alexandria. [HEMERIUS.]

HIMERIUS (1), a celebrated sophist during the reigns of the emperors Constantius and Julian (Photius, cod. 165). He was a native of Prusias or Prusa in Bithynia, the son of Ameinias a rhetor of that city (Eunap. Vit. Soph. s. n. Himer. ed. Boissonade, i. 95, s. n. Prohaeres. ib. 87; Suidas, s. v. Himer.). He was educated at Athens (Him. eclog. x. 16; orat. vii.); and ultimately married a lady who seems to have been connected with some of the most illustrious families of that city (eclog. vii. 4). For some reason he left Athens after having exercised the profession of a sophist there for some time, and retired into Bœotia, where he was residing when the tidings reached him of the death of his son Rufinus, a youth who had already distinguished himself by his remarkable attainments. On hearing of this, he composed an oration which shews him to have been a man of great tenderness of feeling as well as of considerable learning and eloquence (orat. xxiii.). He afterwards exercised his profession at Constantinople (orat. vii., xvi.), but returned to Athens, where he was the rival of Prohaeresius (Suidas, u. s.). Among his pupils there were Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen, probably also Julian afterwards emperor. (Socr. H. E. iv. 26; Soz. H. E. vi. 17.) In his prosperity Julian shewed Himerius great kindness, and seems to have been sincerely attached to him. (Eunap. u. s.; Zosim. Hist. iii. 2; Himer. orat. v.)

Himerius died blind at a great age, leaving a daughter whose name is unknown, but of whose affection for her brother he speaks (orat. xxiii. § 12). He was a very decided pagan (eg. orat. vii. xxiii.), but does not appear to have openly opposed Christianity. Photius (cod. 165 fin.) says that he secretly carped at it. The most complete edition of the Remains of Himerius is that of Dübner, and the fullest account of his life, that of G. Wernsdorf prefixed to his edition of the Remains, 1790. Westermann, Gesch. d. Beredsamkeit in Griechent. u. Rom. i. 339.)

HIMERIUS (2), magister officiorum to whom Basil bishop of Caesarea wrote an earnest letter praying his interest in behalf of their common friend Hera (Ep. 275 al. 416, Migne, Patrol. Gr. xxxii. 10, cf. Epp. 273 al. 216, 274, al. 217). From the terms in which Basil speaks of their friend it would appear that Hera was a bishop, and from those in which Basil addresses Himerius the latter would seem to have been a magister officiorum, and certainly a Christian. It is therefore clear that this Himerius is not the contemporary sophist of the same name (Wernsdorf, Vit. Himerii, xxxvi. xxxvii., prefixed to his edition of the works of Himerius the sophist).

HIMERIUS (3) (in the oldest MSS. EUMERIUS, in some COMERIUS), bishop of Tarragond before 385. To him was addressed the first extant papal decretal by pope Siricius in the year 385. Himerius had sent a letter containing questions on fourteen doubtful points to pope Damasus in the last year of his pontificate. The letter, however, reached Rome after the death of Damasus, and was answered by Siricius in a letter containing fifteen chapters, fourteen of which are in categorical answer to the enquiries of Himerius. Cap. i. forbids the rebaptism of Arians (who had been represented by Himerius as embracing Catholicism in considerable numbers in Spain), and threatens those who disobey the "generalia decreta" sent by Liberius to the provinces with exclusion "a nostro collegio synodali sententia." Cap. ii. forbids the administration of baptism, except at the two seasons of Easter and Whitsuntide. The pope understands that no rule on the subject has been observed in Spain, but that baptisms take place at Christmas, at the feast of the Epiphany, and on saints' days, an irregularity which must be corrected in future. (Epiphany was the favoured time for baptisms in the early Spanish Church; conf. Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (1), 427, note, (2) 190; Neale, Tetralogia Liturg. p. 224). In the case of infants, however, or of any extreme need—perils of shipwreck, siege, invasion, or sickness—baptism is to be administered promptly and without delay. Cap. iii. decrees the exclusion from the church of those who, forsaking their Christian profession, have returned to the worship of idols or to participation in the public sacrifices. If they repent, they are to be admitted to “the grace of reconciliation” at death. Cap. iv. forbids the violation of betrothal vows (“conjugal velatio”). The betrothed maiden must not pledge herself again to any other, “quia illa benedictio, quam nupturae sacerdos imponit, apud fideles ejusdem sacrilegii instar est, si ulla transgressio violetur.” Gams concludes from this, taken in connexion with can. 8 of the first council of Saragossa (A.D. 380), that at this time in Spain both brides and consecrated virgins were veiled. Tejada y Ramiro, however, for velatio proposes to read violatio (Colecc. de Can. ii. 730). Cap. v. concerns relapsed penitents, who are to be excluded from the table of the Lord, to whom, however, the viaticum may be administered at death. Cap. vi. treats of those monks and nuns (monachae) who have broken their vows of chastity. Such offenders are to be excluded from the church and from the society of their monasteries, and are to do penance “retrusae in suis ergastulis.” Conf. this chapter with can. 6 of the council of Saragossa, drawn up five years earlier, where the first historical mention of Spanish monachism occurs (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 126). Cap. vii. is concerned with offences against continence on the part of the clergy. The Spanish clergy, says the pope, plead the liberty of marriage accorded to the Levites under the old dispensation as an excuse for their own practice. He meets their arguments, and lays down the general rule that from the day of their ordination all priests and deacons must live chastely. Offenders are to be deposed from their offices. Cap. viii. and ix. are concerned with the disqualifications for ordination, while cap. x. gives general directions as to the training of the clergy. Whoever is destined for the priesthood must be baptized in childhood, and afterwards enter the order of lectors. As acolyte and subdeacon he may marry, but if he wishes to become a deacon, he must take the vow of chastity. Five years after he obtains the office of deacon, he may be made presbyter, and ten years later he may become a bishop. Cap. xi. and xii. are further concerned with the morals of the clergy. Cap. xiii. desires that monks should enter the ranks of the clergy, and pass in due order through the clerical grades. (Conf. with can. 6 of the first council of Saragossa, Tejada y Ramiro, l. c.) Cap. xiv. forbids public penance on the part of the clergy, and excludes all who have performed such penance from ordination. The fifteenth chapter is of miscellaneous contents. Himerius is exhorted to ensure the due observance of the canons and decretal constitutions for the future, and to make known the decisions of the pope’s letter not only to those of his own diocese (i.e. province of Tarraconensis), but to those of the four remaining provinces, Carthaginensis, Baetica, Lusitania, and Gallicia. Such a task falls naturally to Himerius “pro antiquitate sacerdotii tui,” a phrase which seems to shew that the bishop was an old man at the time. Besides its importance for general church history, the letter of pope Siricius is important in Spanish church history as shewing that by the end of the 4th century the division of Spain into five ecclesiastical provinces was fully recognised, as proving that the church of Tarraco possessed metropolitan rights over the Tarraconensis of Constantinople, and as suggesting by inference that the other provinces, Carthaginensis among them, were equally with Tarraconensis subject to one metropolitan. It may probably be assumed with safety that at this time, just before the barbarian invasions disturbed the old order of things, the ecclesiastical system of Spain exactly answered to the civil, and that, as Tarraco was the civil and ecclesiastical head of Tarraconensis, so also was Cartagena of Carthaginensis. From the destruction of Cartagena by the Vandals, in 425, forty years after this letter of Siricius, we may date the beginning of the claim of Toledo. [MONTANUS, GUNTHIMAR, JULIAN.] Himerius is the second known bishop of Tarraco, the martyr FRUCTUOSUS (died 259) being the first. He was not present at the council of Saragossa in 380, though the pope’s reference to his age proves him to have been bishop at the time, and Saragossa was of course within his province. (Isid. de Vir. III. cap. 16, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiv. 629; Baronius, A.D. 385, vi.; Esp. Sagr. xxv. 35; Jaffé, Regesta Pont. p. 20.) [M. A. W.]

HIMERIUS (4), bishop and metropolitan of Nicomedia, A.D. 431. Firmus bishop of Caesarea Capp. mentions a chorepiscopus named Alypius as soliciting a reconciliation through Himerius. Firmus here gives Himerius the epithet θεορεβής, and from the respectful expressions of the letter Mnratore infers that the incident happened before Himerius became involved with the Nestorian party (Firmus, ep. 5 and note, in Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 1486). The name of Himerius frequently occurs in the documents of the council of Ephesus, but little is known of him personally, and that little is well summed up by Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 589), who remarks that he is the first bishop of Nicomedia occurring with the title of metropolitan (cf. Mansi, v. 776). Wernsdorf also notices him among the Himerii, in his life of Himerius the sophist prefixed to his edition of that author (p. xxxv.). The following sketch will exhaust, we believe, the references to Himerius in Mansi. His name occurs among the fathers of the council (Mansi, iv. 1395, v. 593). He signed the contestatio of June 21 in reference to John of Antioch and the oriental bishops (v. 766); he formed one of the conciliabulum of that party (iv. 1399); he joined them in the address to the church of Hierapolis (v. 776); he shared in their excommunication, July 17 (iv. 1323, 1426). In the Synodicon adversus Tragoediam Irenaei (vid. Theodoret in Pat. Gr. lxxxiv.; Mansi, v. 776–869; Baluze, 705–795), his name occurs in chapters 13, 23, 26, 28, 31, 70, 71, 87. In chap. 71 Theodoret, then one of the same party, congratulates him on his past firmness and exertions for the “apostolic faith.” Another passage mentioning

Himerius in the same chapter is freely quoted by Pelagius II. (ep. 5 olim 7, § 20, in Pat. Lat. lxxii. 754 D). In ch. 70 Theodoret begs to be mentioned to Himerius by Helladius bishop of Tarsus, and in ch. 87 by John of Antioch, as being still a loyal adherent of the party. Nevertheless it appears, as remarked by Le Quien, that Himerius as well as Theodoret, became reconciled to Cyril and returned to orthodoxy; for in ch. 190, which enumerates the bishops who were suffering deprivation and exile for their opposition, the name of neither is found. Diodorus, the preceding known bishop of Nicomedia, is not dated by Le Quien; Eunomius, who followed Himerius, was sitting in 449. [C. H.]

HIMERIUS (5), disciple of St. Lupus bishop of Troyes, known to us from a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris addressed to his father Sulpicius. He is there spoken of as "antistes," but if we are to understand that he was a bishop his see is unknown. The word, however, is sometimes applied by Sidonius to abbats. The letter is highly eulogistic of his wisdom, learning, piety, asceticism, and other good qualities. (Sidon. Apoll. Epist. vii. 13 in Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii. 582 n.) [S. A. B.]

HIMERIUS, bishop of Treves. [JAMBLICHUS.]

HIMERIUS (6), bishop of Ameria (Amelia) in Umbria, c. 520. (Ughell. Ital. Sac. i. 296; Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 197; mentioned in Mart. Rom. June 17.) [A. H. D. A.]

HIMILTRUDIS, mother of Ebbo archbishop of Rheims (A.D. 816-851), commemorated in a spirited epitaph ascribed to Ebbo himself. It is to be found in Flodoard (Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 19, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 128), and places her birth on the banks of the Rhine early in the reign of Charles the Great, and her death in the reign of Louis the Pious. She assisted Ebbo her only son in his diocese for nearly ten years before her death, and helped to rebuild the metropolitan church of Rheims. (Cf. Gall. Christ. ix. 34; Ceillier, xii. 332.) [S. A. B.]

HINCHO, fourth in the list of the bishops of Lisieux, between Launobaudus, and Leodeboldus, one of the bishops who signed the praeceptum of Emmo, archbishop of Sens, for the monasteries of St. Columba and St. Pierre le Vif, in A.D. 658 or 659. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1170; Gall. Christ. xi. 764.) [S. A. B.]

HINGUETENUS, ST., ninth bishop of Vannes, succeeding Budocus, and followed by St. Mereadocus, perhaps towards the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 918.) [S. A. B.]

HINNA (HYMNA), represented as a holy abbess in the third and fourth lives of St. Brigid as given by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 541, 561, 566), but the name is probably a form of Kinnia or Cinne. [CINNE.] [J. G.]

HIPPARCHUS, martyr at Samosata with Philotheus, Habibus, Jacobus, Parégrus, Romanus and Lollianus. Their martyrdom is fixed at A.D. 297 by Assemani (Acta SS. Mart. Or. et Occ. vol. ii. 123-147), and attributed to the order of the Caesar Galerius. The Persians under Narses their king invaded the Roman dominions in A.D. 296, and after some temporary success were decisively defeated by Galerius in 297. Making a triumphant progress through Syria and Mesopotamia Galerius ordered all persons living in Samosata to assemble in the Temple of Fortune in the midst of the city, and there to sacrifice. Some time prior to the publication of this edict, two of the city magistrates, Hipparchus and Philotheus, had embraced Christianity and built themselves an oratory in their own residence. One day, after the edict had been promulgated, the other five mentioned above, who seem to have all been quite young men and as yet unbelievers, paid a visit to the two magistrates, and found them praying before a cross. After some discussion they were converted, and immediately baptized by a priest named Jacobus, who was summoned by a letter from Hipparchus, and told to bring with him "urceum aquae, hostiam, et cornu olei unctionis." The absence of the magistrates from the ceremonies having been noticed they were all arrested, and after various tortures, lasting from April 10 to June 25, they were crucified. From the expression quoted above Assemani argues for the antiquity of the rite of consecrating the water of baptism beforehand, which was then carried about in the font, since otherwise, it would only have been imposing unnecessary trouble upon the priest, as it cannot be imagined that in such a house a fit and proper vessel for baptism could be wanting. He quotes in support of his view Cyprian, Epist. 70; Tertull., Liv. de Bap. cap. 4; Cyrill. Hierosol., Catech. iii. 3, and several other passages, almost all of which will be found quoted and discussed in the article FONT, BENEDICTION OF, in Dict. Chr. Antiq. (Maskell, Mon. Rit. i. pp. 13 sq.) Though Assemani contends for A.D. 297, after the final defeat of Narses and capture of his wives and children, as the true date of, and for Galerius as the agent in, this martyrdom, it may be doubted if there is not a confusion in the Acts between Galerius and Maximinus. Their names were very much alike, one was Caius Maximianus Galerius, the other was Caius Valerius Maximinus Galerius. If such be the case this would place the martyrdom about the year 308, when Maximin was ruling in Syria and raging fiercely against the faith. He naturally would not tolerate Christianity among the magistrates of the metropolis of the province. This date would remove another difficulty involved in the fact that Eusebius (H. E. viii. 4) tells us that it was only a few here and there who suffered death for Christ prior to the year 303, and that these were all soldiers. The Acts as recorded in Assemani (Acta Mart.) are in Syriac and Latin. They profess to be written by the priest who baptized the converts, and by the tutor of Gallus, a nobleman of the city. The former was present in disguise at the execution (Ceillier, ii. 469). [G. T. S.]

HIPPOLYTUS (1), a martyr of Apulia under Antoninus, commemorated at Placentia on Jan. 30. (Ferrarius, Catal. General. SS., from the tabulae of the church of Placentia; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1026.) [C. H.]

HIPPOLYTUS (2) ROMANUS. It has seldom happened in ecclesiastical history that one who enjoyed so much celebrity in his lifetime as Hippolytus has been so obscurely known to the church of subsequent times. He was at the beginning of the 3rd century unquestionably the most learned member of the Roman church. He was a man of very considerable literary activity; his works were very numerous, and their circulation spread from Italy to the East, some of them having been translated into Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, and perhaps other languages. His widely known name assumes various disguises, shortened into Poltus in the popular memory of Italy, in Egypt taking the more stately form Abulides. There is evidence also that he took a very active part in the affairs of his own church. But the contemporaries who came into contact with him seem not to have been men of literary ability; and if the controversies in which he engaged called forth any writings from them, none of them long survived. Consequently there are no contemporary witnesses to give us any information concerning his personal history. A century after his death Eusebius evidently knows nothing of Hippolytus beyond what he can infer from such works of his as had reached him. The works of Hippolytus were soon superseded by those of other writers more able and more learned. They ceased to be much read, and copies of them were not multiplied. Scarcely one has come down to us without mutilation, and concerning almost every work which we assign to him there has been controversy whether it be really his. But the celebrity of his name survived, and it became the subject of various legends, the statements of which have not always been carefully distinguished from the authentic history of the saint. In the scantiness of trustworthy information there has been dispute whether Hippolytus was a presbyter or a bishop; and if a bishop, of what see; what was the scene of his labours, Italy or Arabia; whether he was orthodox or a schismatic; whether he was a martyr, and if so, by what death he died. It is of comparatively recent years that the recovery of the work on heresies, now by general consent attributed to him, has cleared away some of the obscurity which hung over his personal history, though there still remain many questions to which we can give but doubtful answers.

The earliest notice of Hippolytus is by Eusebius in two passages (H. E. vi. 20, 22). In the first passage, speaking of ecclesiastical writers of whom letters were then preserved in the library at Jerusalem, he mentions Beryllus, bishop of Bostra in Arabia, the author of letters and of other works besides; and adds, "likewise Hippolytus, who was bishop of another church somewhere," and goes on to mention the anti-Montanist dialogue between Caius and Proclus. In the second passage he gives a list of the works of Hippolytus which he had met with (not including any letters), this being probably the list of those preserved in the library at Caesarea, but adds that many other works by the same author might be found elsewhere. The first passage was so translated by Rufinus as to convey the idea that Hippolytus, as well as Beryllus, was an Arabian bishop, and this is, no doubt, why Hippolytus is cited as bishop of the metropolis of the Arabians by Gelasius (De Duabus Naturis, Lagarde, no. 11, p. 91) at the end of the 5th century. The theory that Hippolytus was an Arabian bishop was revived by Le Moyne, and accepted by Cave and other critics of eminence; but it really seems to have no foundation, more than the collocation of names in Eusebius already mentioned. A mistake of the same kind, it has been thought, has arisen from a collocation of names in Jerome's Chronicle, who notes as illustrious writers flourishing under the reign of Alexander, Geminus presbyter of Antioch, Hippolytus, and Beryllus bishop of Bostra. Döllinger supposes that it is only owing to a confusion hence arising that a Hippolytus presbyter of Antioch has found his way into the martyrologies. See, however, HIPPOLYTUS (7). Jerome in his Catalogue shews independent knowledge of works of Hippolytus not mentioned by Eusebius, but, notwithstanding all his opportunities for acquaintance with the traditions of the Roman church, he has nothing to tell about the personal history of Hippolytus, and merely repeats the statement of Eusebius that he had been a bishop, but says that of what see he had not been able to learn. Elsewhere (Epist. ad Damasum, vol. i. p. 156) and in the preface to his Commentary on Matthew (vol. vii. p. 7), he gives Hippolytus the title of martyr; and in the Epistle to Magnus (i. 427) he couples him with Apollonius. The Benedictine editors, following some old MSS., describe both as Roman senators but there is little doubt that according to the true reading the title belongs to Apollonius alone. Hippolytus is barely mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. 31, p. 205); but Theodoret quotes several passages from his writings, describing him as the "holy Hippolytus, bishop and martyr" (Dial. I. vol. iv. p. 54; Dial. II. p. 130; Dial. III. p. 232; see also Haer. Fab. iii. 1). The description of Hippolytus by Pseudo-Chrysostom (De Pseudoprophetais, vol. viii. 79, app. as  $\delta$  γλυκίστατος καὶ εὐνούστατος is worth quoting only as shewing the celebrity which long attached to his name in the East. Indeed he came to rank as a father of the apostolic age. Cyrillus Scythopolitanus twice adds to his name the description τῷ παλαιῷ καὶ γνωρίμῳ τῷ ἀποστόλῳν (Cotelier, Mon. Ecc. Gr. iii. 354, iv. 82), a description which he probably derive from Palladius (Rosweyd, Vit. Pat. p. 781; Lagarde, Hippolytus, p. 204). How Palladius came by it we discuss no. 21 infra. Easter tradition usually describes Hippolytus as bishop of Rome. "One may consider it as a rule in the Greek MSS.," says Döllinger, "that when a more exact designation is added to his name Hippolytus is given as bishop of Rome." (The fragments collected in De Lagarde's edition the majority are entitled merely "of Hippolytus," or "of Hippolytus, bishop and martyr" but about twenty describe him as bishop of Rome and only three place him elsewhere. The earliest author who can be named as so describing him is, if we may trust a catena, Apollinaris in the 4th century (see Lagarde, no. 72, p. 171). Later he is so quoted by Eustachius of Constantinople, who wrote before 582, by Leontius of Constantinople (De Sectis, 503), Anastasi Sinaita (Hodegus, p. 356), Germanus of Constantinople, John of Damascus (Opp. Le Quien ii. 757), Syncellus (p. 597) and others. It is even possible that he may have been described in MSS. read by Eusebius, for Eusebius knew too well the recognised list of Roman bishops to accept this designation as correct; and therefore we might have thus the explanation of his account that he was a bishop, but he could not tell of what see. Hippolytus likewise appears as pope and bishop of Rome in the Greek menologies, and is also honoured with the same title by the Syrian, Coptic, and Abyssinian churches (for the authorities for this statement see Döllinger, pp. 86, 87). In modern times the received designation for Hippolytus has been bishop of Portus; but the earliest authorities for so describing him are as late as the middle of the 7th century, viz. the Paschal Chronicle (p. 6) and Anastasius,\* and there is no Western authority. Now there were current in the East at the time the acts of CHRYSSE (Vol. I. p. 515), in which the martyrdom of one Hippolytus at Portus is related, and it is very conceivable that either Anastasius, or the Paschal chronicler, finding in his authorities Hippolytus described as bishop of Rome, and knowing that this could not be right, thought to make a correction by substituting for Rome the Roman Portus, where a Hippolytus was believed to have been martyred. Le Moynes attempted to combine the account which connected Hippolytus with Arabia with the account that he was bishop of Portus Romanus by the hypothesis that by the latter name was meant the harbour at Aden in Arabia. But in truth the testimonies that he was bishop of Portus are too few and too late to deserve much respect, and the origin of the idea that he was an Arabian bishop has been already explained. A mass of evidence proves that Hippolytus in whatever capacity had Rome for the principal scene of his activity; but that he could have been bishop of Portus near Rome is hard to reconcile with the fact that Jerome, for whom the martyrs of Rome and its neighbourhood had so much interest, knew nothing as to the see of which Hippolytus was bishop, and that pope Gelasius was equally ignorant.

If the earliest witnesses have no certain information to give as to the place where Hippolytus laboured, at least they leave us at no loss to determine the time when he lived. Eusebius tells that he was the author of a work on the Paschal feast, in which he gives a sixteen-years' Easter table, and accompanies it with a chronology, the boundary of his calculations being the first year of the emperor Alexander, i. e. A. D. 222. Now, in the year 1551, in some excavations made on the Via Tiburtina, near Rome, a marble statue was brought to light, representing a venerable person sitting in a chair, clad in the Greek pallium. The back and sides of the chair contain Greek inscriptions. The back has a list of works presumably written by the person represented. One side has a sixteen-years' cycle, exactly corresponding to the description of Eusebius, and beginning with the first year of Alexander. Other evidence puts it beyond doubt that this cycle is really that of Hippolytus. The list of works sufficiently agrees with the list of works ascribed to Hippolytus by Eusebius and Jerome; and in point of fact no doubt is entertained that Hippolytus is the person intended to be commemorated. The list of Paschal full moons in the cycle gives accurately the astronomical full moons for the years 217–223 inclusive. For the next eight years the true full moons are a day or two later than those given in the table, and after that deviate still further; so that after two or three revolutions of the cycle the table would be found useless. We have reason to conclude, then, that this table must have been framed about the time which it specifies, A. D. 222; and, again, that the chair must be a nearly contemporary monument; for however Hippolytus might at first be honoured by the Roman church for the boon he conferred on it by giving it a table for finding Easter, it is not conceivable that that table would be put on permanent record with the view of doing its author honour, after it had been tried long enough to make its worthlessness apparent. A further argument for the antiquity of the chair is drawn from the fact that the language of the inscription is Greek. We know otherwise that the Roman church at its commencement contained a large section, if not a majority, of foreigners, whose habitual language was Greek. This inscription must have been placed before that section had disappeared, and before Latin had become the exclusive language of the church. A further proof of antiquity is furnished by the list of Hippolytine writings itself, which is completely independent of those of Eusebius and Jerome, and which, it may be safely asserted, no one in the West could have been able to draw up at any long interval after the death of Hippolytus. The date thus fixed for the publication of one of the works of Hippolytus agrees with what we otherwise know, that he was a contemporary of Origen, Jerome telling us that it appeared from a homily of Hippolytus then extant, that it had been delivered in Origen's hearing. We know from Eusebius (H. E. vi. 14) that Origen visited Rome, though he does not enable us to fix the date more nearly than that it was in the reign of Caracalla, and episcopate of Zephyrinus, i. e. some time in the years 211–217. In one of these years he might easily have heard Hippolytus preach. We must place the commencement of the activity of Hippolytus as early as the 2nd century. Photius tells us that the treatise of Hippolytus "Against all the Heresies" professed to be a synopsis of lectures delivered by Irenaeus. There has been a diversity of speculation as to the circumstances under which Hippolytus could have heard Irenaeus lecture. It has been conjectured that he might have been a pupil of Irenaeus before either had left Asia Minor (though the dates make this little probable), or that he accompanied with him in Gaul. But the simplest supposition seems to be that Hippolytus heard Irenaeus lecture in Rome. Eusebius tells of one visit of Irenaeus to Rome about 178. A note in a Moscow MS. of the martyrdom of Polycarp (Zahn's Ignatius, p. 167) represents him as teaching at Rome several years before. There is then nothing unlikely in the supposition that Irenaeus came again to Rome, and there delivered lectures against heresies. The time could not have been long after the beginning of the last decade of the 2nd century. It has been shewn (Vol. I. p. 506) that the author of the cycle engraved on the chair must also have been the author of a chronicle, a Latin translation of which is extant, the last event recorded in which is the death of the emperor Alexander, which occurred in 235. In the same year an entry in the Iberian Catalogue of bishops of Rome records that Pontianus the bishop, and Hippolytus the presbyter, were transported as exiles to the pestilent island of Sardinia. It is difficult to believe that the Hippolytus here described as presbyter is not our Hippolytus. It is no doubt possible that he may have returned from exile, and afterwards suffered martyrdom in some other way; but the probability is that both he and Pontianus gained the title of martyrs by dying in the mines to which they had been condemned. From the "depositio martyrum" of the Liberian Catalogue, it appears that the bodies of Pontianus and Hippolytus were both deposited on the same day (Aug. 13), the former in the cemetery of Callistus, the latter in that on the Via Tiburtina, and it is natural to think that one body as well as the other was brought from Sardinia to Rome. The translation of Pontianus, we are told, was effected by pope Fabianus, probably in 236 or 237. A very different account of the martyrdom of Hippolytus is given by Prudentius (Peristeph. 11), who wrote at the very beginning of the 5th century. His story is that Hippolytus had been a presbyter, who was involved in the Novatian schism, but that on his way to martyrdom, when his loving followers who accompanied him in great numbers asked him which sect was the better, he recanted his former teaching, and exhorted them to abandon Novatian and unite with the Catholics. He is brought before the ruler (whether emperor or prefect is not stated), who was then at Ostia. The tyrant had been vainly trying to shake by torture the constancy of Christians. Then, when his wearied satellites were forced to give up their unavailing efforts, he vents his rage in sentences of death. One he orders to be beheaded; another to be crucified; some to be cast over precipices; others burned alive; others drowned. Then Hippolytus is brought before him, his captors declaring that he was the head of the Christians, who would be all terrified into submission if he were put to some unusual death. The judge inquires his name, and on learning it sentences him to be torn in pieces by wild horses, like Hippolytus of old. Prudentius describes the subterraneous tomb of the saint, and states that he saw on the spot a picture representing this execution. He mentions that this martyrdom was commemorated on the 13th August. He gives an account of the crowds who flocked to the commemoration, and also a description of a stately church, with a double row of pillars, which, however, Döllinger considers was not the church of St. Hippolytus, as a reader of Prudentius might suppose, no trace of such a church being found in any of the early lists of Roman churches, but of St. Laurence, a saint whose cultus attained much greater celebrity, who was also buried on the Via Tiburtina, his church being adjacent to the tomb of Hippolytus.

The account of Prudentius does not agree with that of any of the martyrologies, and Baronius in fact accuses Prudentius of having mixed up three different Hippolyti, viz. our bishop; a military officer who had charge of St. Laurence before his execution, and was converted and baptized by him; and the presbyter of Antioch already mentioned, who, like the Hippolytus of Prudentius, is said to have returned to the church from Novatianism. There is no reason for thinking Prudentius less entitled to credit than the martyrologies, which are much later, and it has been already explained how the story of an Hippolytus of Antioch probably arose. But the story of Prudentius himself (who makes gross mistakes in the case of other non-Spanish martyrs) rests on no better authority than an "aunt," and seems to be but his poetical version of the tale which he found in circulation at the tomb of Hippolytus more than 150 years after his martyrdom. In making Hippolytus a Novatian he is chronologically wrong, for that schism did not arise until after the death of our Hippolytus; and the strange modes of death by which he makes Hippolytus and the other martyrs suffer are alien to Roman customs, especially at a time after the edict of Caracalla, when the inhabitants of the empire had all received the privileges of citizenship. The story of Prudentius, however, throws light on the genesis of the story of the martyrdom of Hippolytus the military officer. We cannot reasonably believe that there were two martyrs both named Hippolytus, both buried on the Via Tiburtina, both of whom, on the same day, Aug. 13, suffered by being torn in pieces by wild horses. But we learn from Prudentius that close by the church of St. Laurence there was a tomb of Hippolytus, adorned by a pictured representation of such a death. This we may well believe had been originally intended to depict the sufferings of the mythological Hippolytus, and, being inscribed with that name, had been copied or transferred by Christians to adorn the resting-place of a martyr of whom nothing but the name was known. From this picture, and its proximity to the church of St. Laurence, was generated the myth of a Hippolytus connected with the martyrdom of St. Laurence. It is plain that the tale told by Prudentius was by this time forgotten. But the tale told by Prudentius is plainly also the offspring of the picture, and when we remember that we have authentic evidence of the deposition, on August 13, on the Via Tiburtina of the remains of a Hippolytus who is coupled with Pontianus, we must conclude that this was the real owner of the tomb, and that in the century and a half which passed before Prudentius visited it, all but his name and the day of his feast had been forgotten.

It is time now to speak of the light which has been cast upon the history of the saint by the recovery of the treatise against heresies, the portion of which, previously extant, had been known under the name of Origen's Philosophumena. We make no scruple in treating this as the work of Hippolytus, for this is the nearly unanimous opinion of critics, Lipsius being, as far as we are aware, the only one who still hesitates, and cautiously cites the author as Pseudo-Origenes. From this work it appears that the writer took an active part in the affairs of the Roman church, in the episcopates of Zephyrinus and Callistus. The story he tells of the origin and actions of the latter pope will be found in the article on his name (Vol. I. p. 391). Suffice it here to say, that Döllinger has shewn that, without imputing wilful misstatement to Hippolytus, it is possible to put on all the things he relates about Callistus a very much more favourable interpretation than he has done; and with regard to the charge that Callistus in trying to steer a middle course between Sabellianism and orthodoxy had invented a new heresy, the retort may be made that it was Hippolytus himself, who in his dread of Sabellianism had overpassed the line of orthodoxy, and laid himself open to the charge of Ditheism. But the point to which Döllinger called attention, with which we are most concerned here, is that Hippolytus in this work never recognises Callistus as bishop of Rome. He says that Callistus had aspired to the episcopal throne, and that on the death of Zephyrinus "he supposed himself to have obtained what he had been hunting for." But Hippolytus treats him only as the founder of a school (διδασκαλείον) in opposition to the Catholic church. This is the very word that Hippolytus uses with regard to Noetus (Cont. haer. Noeti, Lagarde, p. 44), of whom he says that when expelled from the church he had the presumption to set up "a school." Hippolytus tells, however, that Callistus and his party claimed to be the Catholic church, and that they gloried in their numbers, though this multitude of adherents had been gained by unworthy means, namely, by improper laxity in the reception of offenders. He relates that Callistus had received into his communion persons whom he himself had excommunicated. He adds that this school of Callistus still continued when he wrote, which was plainly after the death of Callistus, and he refuses to give its members any name but Callistians. From this language we can draw no other conclusion than that the breach between Hippolytus and Callistus proceeded to open schism; Hippolytus, not owning Callistus as bishop nor as belonging to the church, claiming for himself and his followers the title of the church, and only regarding Callistus and his confessedly larger party as a heretical school. It would follow that Callistus also would regard Hippolytus as no longer a member of the church, but only as the head of a "school;" and it is to be feared not only as a schismatic but a heretic; for after the public charge of Ditheism, which stung Hippolytus so much, that he refers to it twice over, he could scarcely have tolerated his opinions as within the limits of permissible speculation. But the question arises, if Hippolytus did not regard Callistus as bishop of Rome, whom did he so regard, for it is not credible that he believed that Rome had been permitted to remain many years without a bishop. To this question it is difficult to give any answer but Döllinger's; Hippolytus claimed to be bishop of Rome himself. In the introduction to his work, Hippolytus claims to hold the episcopal office; he declares that the pains which he took in the confutation of heresy were bestowed on account of the duty which lay on him as successor of the apostles, partaker of the grace of the Holy Spirit that had been given to them, and which they transmitted to those of right faith; clad with the dignity of the high priesthood and office of teaching and guardian of the church. Afterwards, as has been said, we find him exercising the power of excommunication, and casting persons out of the church, who thereupon join the school of Callistus. Thus we seem to have a key to the difficulty how it was that Hippolytus could be described in the Liberian Catalogue only as presbyter, and yet be known in the East universally as bishop, and very widely as bishop of Rome. His claim to be bishop was not admitted by the church of Rome, but was made in works of his, written in Greek and circulating extensively in the East; whether by expressions of his in the works themselves, or more probably in the titles prefixed to them by his ardent followers. We have also a key to the origin of the tradition that Hippolytus had been a Novatian. He had been in separation from the church, though the exact cause of difference came to be forgotten. Against another hypothesis, that Hippolytus was at the same time bishop of Portus, and a leading presbyter of Rome, Döllinger urges, besides the weakness of the proof that Hippolytus was bishop of Portus, that there is no evidence that Portus at the time had a bishop, and that, according to the then constitution of the church, the offices of presbyter and bishop could not be thus combined. As to the time of the schism, Döllinger contends that it could not have occurred immediately on the election of Callistus, because Hippolytus declares that Callistus, through fear of him, had excommunicated Sabellius, and this influence is only intelligible on the supposition that he was still in the ranks of the Roman clergy. But he supposes that later, probably on the occasion of the altercation already referred to, Callistus may have excommunicated Hippolytus and his followers as Ditheists, and Hippolytus then allowed himself to be elected bishop of Rome by his followers. The argument does not appear to us conclusive; for on Döllinger's theory Hippolytus could not well accuse Callistus of being afraid of him, whose next step was to excommunicate him; but if Hippolytus had already separated from Callistus on account of his Sabellian leanings, Callistus might naturally be afraid of giving countenance to the imputation. Further it may not be too minute to urge that Callistus says in the plural number δῖθεοι ἐστὲ, language which seems to imply that Hippolytus was then the head of a party distinct from the church. Lastly, there is exactly the same reason for saying that Hippolytus refused to recognise Zephyrinus as bishop, as that he rejected Callistus; for he speaks of the former also as "imagining" that he governed the church. In consistency then Döllinger ought to have made the schism begin in the time of Zephyrinus, and so De Rossi does, adding a conjecture of his own, that the leader of the schism had been Victor's archdeacon, and had in that capacity obtained his knowledge of the early life of Callistus, and that he was actuated by disappointment at not having been made bishop on Victor's death. On the other hand, as we shall presently point out, to make a schism of which no one in the East seems to have ever heard begin so early ascribes to it such long duration as to be quite incredible. At whatever time it began, it continued after the death of Callistus, some time after which the account in the treatise on heresies was plainly written. We cannot tell how long this schism may have lasted. Döllinger thinks it even possible that it may have continued up to the time of the deportation of Pontianus and Hippolytus to Sardinia. He regards with some favour the hypothesis that this banishment might have been not on account of their religion, but a measure taken to preserve the peace of the city threatened by dissensions and disputes for the possession of churches between the adherents of the rival leaders. Later at least we find such an interference of heathen authorities provoked by Christian dissensions under the episcopates of Marcellus and Eusebius. The Liberian Catalogue states that Pontianus "discinctus est" in Sardinia, which may mean that he died, but has been more generally understood to mean that he resigned his see; and Döllinger suggests that Hippolytus may have resigned his pretensions at the same time, and that so the quarrel was happily made up. All this is very doubtful. On the death of Alexander, who was favourable to the Christians, though it is not likely that his successor, Maximin, who was absent in Germany, sent home any orders for the persecution of Christians, yet there would be a new city prefect and a change of policy in Roman administration, by which the Christians, as adherents of the late emperor, were very likely to suffer. It seems to us then most likely that Pontianus and Hippolytus were banished early in the reign of Maximin as the two leading members of the Christian community.

We own we find it hard to refuse to accept the explanation of von Döllinger, which makes Hippolytus the first anti-pope; but we cannot dissemble that the difficulties arising from the fact that the existence of so serious a schism has been absolutely unknown to the church from the 4th century to the 19th, are so great, that if we knew of any other way of satisfactorily explaining the language of Hippolytus we should adopt it in preference. We are not told who consecrated Hippolytus as bishop; in the case of Novatian we are told of three bishops being brought from country towns of Italy to ordain him, and we can scarcely suppose that there were fewer in the case of Hippolytus. A schism which bishops thus took the lead in inaugurating must have been a serious one: it lasted at least five or six years, and if we make it begin in the time of Zephyrinus as we seem bound to do, perhaps twenty years, and it had as its head no insignificant person, but the most learned man of the Roman church, and the one whose name was most likely to be known to foreign churches. Yet the existence of this schism was absolutely unknown abroad. All Greek lists of the popes, as well as the Latin, include Callistus, and make no mention of Hippolytus. And the confessed ignorance of Eusebius about the see of Hippolytus is proof enough that he was not in possession of the key to the difficulty. In the Novatian disputes which commenced about fifteen years after the death of Hippolytus, when many must still have been alive who could remember the controversy between him and Callistus, we do not read a word of allusion on either side to the comparatively recent schism of which a man holding rigorist views resembling those of Novatian was the head. We ask ourselves was the question who was bishop of Rome regarded at the time as a matter of such purely local concern that controversy on the subject could go on at Rome for years together and the outside world know nothing of it, and that although the unsuccessful claimant was a person on other grounds very widely known. Let us recall what took place on the election of Novatian, not twenty years after the death of Hippolytus. Letters were despatched by both the rival claimants to the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria; legates sent by the contending parties into Africa; schisms made in provincial towns, a bishop who took the part of one candidate being confronted by a bishop of the opposing party. If the absence of evidence ever entitles us to assert a negative, we may safely say that nothing of this kind took place during the episcopate of Callistus. No foreign arbiters were appealed to, and the schism, whatever it was, did not spread beyond Rome. And yet is it conceivable, if Hippolytus really set up a rival chair to Callistus, that he whose books and letters widely circulated in the East, and who must have been much better known there than his opponent, should have made no attempt to enlist on his side the bishops of the great Eastern sees? Once more, is it likely that if Hippolytus had been the author of a long-continued and dangerous schism at Rome, the predominant party should have completely condoned his offence, that he should have been honoured for centuries as a saint and a martyr, and that his name should have come down to our times with scarce a stain on his reputation as an orthodox member of the Catholic church, until words of his own came to light to cast doubt on it? We feel it ungracious to point out improbabilities amounting almost to impossibilities in the theory now most generally received, when we must own ourselves ill able to replace it with anything more satisfactory. We can only suggest that perhaps difference of language may have to some extent mitigated the asperity of feeling caused by these controversies. It is now generally recognised that in the earliest Roman church the predominant element was Greek. But this was no longer the case at the end of the 2nd century. Christianity had then ceased to be merely the religion of a foreign colony in Rome, and had laid hold of the native population. Pope Victor, whose name bespeaks his Latin origin, wrote in Latin; and from his time on, the Greek section of the Roman church was an ever decreasing minority. Yet this section, swelled as it was by the foreign Christians whom mercantile or other business brought to Rome, must have been not inconsiderable in numbers; and it is reasonable to believe that when Latin first supplanted Greek as the liturgical language of the church of Rome, a Greek service for the use of those who only understood that language was still kept up. We know that a Greek baptismal profession, Greek lessons, Greek hymns continued to be used at Rome at a much later time. If there were at the time we are discussing a Greek congregation at Rome, the head of it is very likely to have been Hippolytus, all whose extant writings are in Greek, and of whom we have no evidence that he wrote anything in Latin. The head of such a congregation might naturally be entrusted with the episcopal power of admitting or excluding members, since doubtful cases could scarcely be investigated by a Latin-speaking pope. And the supposition that he may have received episcopal consecration, besides giving an explanation of the enigmatical dignity ἐθνῶν ἐπίσκοπος ascribed by Photius to Caius<sup>b</sup> would give a less violently improbable account of the claim of Hippolytus to episcopal dignity than the theory that he had been consecrated as anti-pope. As he was probably the last holder of his anomalous office, it is not surprising if no remembrance was retained of its exact constitution; but it is in the nature of things probable that the period when the church of Rome was Greek and when it was Latin should be separated by a certain bilingual period; and it is not unnatural that the arrangements made for the church during that interval should be forgotten when the need for them had passed. The severity of the persecutions at Rome under Decius and Valerian seems to have obliterated much of the recollections of the history of the early part of the century. But whether Hippolytus was bishop or presbyter, it remains that he wrote his attacks on Callistus in Greek and addressed them to Greek-speaking people, and that there is no evidence that he made any assault on the unity of the Latin-speaking church. This may account for the faintness of the impression which his schismatic language produced, and for the facility with which it was pardoned. Hippolytus was clearly a man who did not restrain his language. If he owned Zephyrinus as bishop, the most unruly presbyter of our own church could not shew less belief in the infallibility of his bishop than Hippolytus does in that of Zephyrinus. It does not appear to us that Hippolytus could ever have had a chance of success as a rival candidate against Callistus. To say nothing of the disadvantages he was under as a foreigner never thoroughly naturalised, the Roman church in choosing a bishop who would have to administer large revenues always looked more to practical ability than to knowledge of speculative theology; and so usually the archdeacon had the best chance of election. Callistus was a trained man of business, and his being sought out by Zephyrinus, and placed in an important office, shews that he was known to possess administrative ability. Hippolytus seems to have been a mere man of books; but such a one would naturally be indignant when a man whom he looked on as uneducated in theology intruded into what he regarded as his own special department, and gave what seemed to him erroneous definitions. That the arrogance and intemperance which he then displayed did not deprive him of permanent honour in the Roman church, is to be accounted for by the leniency with which men treat the faults of one who has real claims to respect. Hippolytus was a man of whose learning the whole Roman church must have been proud; he was of undoubted piety, and of courage which he proved in the good confession which he afterwards witnessed. The way of return would not be made difficult for such a man at any time that he really wished all dissension to be at an end.

Some obscure traces of this controversy remained for some time. That Theodoret (Haer. Fab. iii. 3) speaks of Callistus as one who made some additions to the heresy of Noetus is to be accounted for by his having the tenth book of the work of Hippolytus, and that only; for the summary there given makes mention of Callistus as a heretic, but gives no indication that the pope was intended, a point of which Theodoret has no suspicion. An independent tradition of these disputes is contained in the acts of a pretended council at Rome under Sylvester (acts probably forged in the 6th century), in which a heretic Callistus is condemned for Sabellianism, and a deacon Hippolytus for Valentinianism. This charge of Valentinianism was one which, as we shall presently see, was likely enough to have been brought against Hippolytus by Callistus and his party, so that the forgers of these acts appear to have really had some true traditions to go upon, however much these may have been distorted and misunderstood. From this source was probably derived what is stated in the Felician catalogue of the popes, that pope Sylvester assembled 277 bishops and condemned Callistus, Arius, and Photinus. In some MSS. of the decree of pope Gelasius concerning apocryphal books, the name of Callistus is found in a list of heretics, but as it is joined with that of Donatus, we must regard as the true reading that of the majority of MSS., Celestius, who is mentioned as a Donatist by Augustine and by Optatus, the latter of whom calls him Celestius (Theiner, Ep. Rom. Pont. i. 470). Again, Bonizo, a writer of the 11th century, in his catalogue of Roman bishops (Mai, Nor. Pat. Bibl. vii. part iii. 34) makes a statement about Callistus which a comparison with Hippolytus (Ref. ix. 12, p. 290) proves to have been derived from a trustworthy source. "Hic jam accusationem Episcoporum voluit difficillimam esse, et ut infames et suspecti et inimici in eorum ne suscipiantur accusationem omnino prohibuit. Eos haereticos nominat qui dicunt sacerdotes post lapsum, si dignam egerint paenitentiam non posse redire ad pristinos ordines."

The preceding discussions have told all that is known of the life of Hippolytus. It will be seen that we know nothing of him except as a resident at Rome, and if he was not born in Rome as the child of Greek parents, we know not when nor from what place he came. Some omissions in his account of heretics might lead us to think that he did not continuously reside at Rome from his first attendance on the lectures of Irenaeus, but any such inference must be very doubtful. De Smedt has conjectured that he derived his account of the early history of Callistus only from the report of Carpophorus; * but whatever Hippolytus may have learned from this source he certainly claims to speak as a contemporary and with a first-hand knowledge of what he relates.

We now proceed to enumerate the works of Hippolytus. In this task we have been greatly helped by the list of Caspari, Taufsymbol und Glaubensregel, iii. 377.

(1) We place first as perhaps that which is most completely associated with the name of Hippolytus, his sixteen years' cycle (mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome in passages already referred to), and the little treatise in which he explained it. This is among the list of works given on the statue, 'Ἀποδείξεις χρόνων τοῦ πάσχα κατὰ ἐν τῷ πίνακι. That the cycle engraved on the statue is undoubtedly the very cycle of Hippolytus is not only proved by the facts that it begins with the first year of Alexander in conformity with the account of Eusebius, and that, as we pointed out, Vol. I. p. 507, it interprets the seventy weeks of Daniel in the manner peculiar to Hippolytus; but the thing is placed beyond doubt by its literal agreement with a Syriac version of the cycle of Hippolytus preserved in a chronological work by Elias of Nisibis (Lagarde, Analecta Syriaca, p. 89). The cycle of eight years used by Greek astronomers for harmonizing lunar and solar years has been explained (Vol. I. p. 508), and is much older than Hippolytus. What was novel in the scheme of Hippolytus was his putting two eight-years cycles together in order to exhibit readily the days of the week on which the full moons fell. He assumed that after eight years the full moons returned to the same days of the solar month, and he took notice that after sixteen years the days of the week moved one backwards; that is to say, the full moon in the first year of the cycle being Saturday, April 13, after sixteen years it would be Friday, April 13, and so on.<sup>d</sup> He joined together on his table seven sixteen-years cycles, after which the full moons return to the same day of the week as well as of the month. The cycle of Hippolytus is not astronomically correct, and, as the Syriac writer just mentioned correctly states, the error accumulates at the rate of three days for every sixteen-years cycle. Of this Hippolytus has no suspicion, and he supposed that he could by means of his cycle determine all paschal full moons future or past; for instance, that he could tell the exact day of the week and year on which took place the first passover and all other passovers mentioned in the Old Testament. It has been explained (Vol. I. p. 506) how by marking these passovers on his cycle Hippolytus has enabled us to recover his whole chronological system as well as his mode of interpreting Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks. The days marked on the cycle are those of the true astronomical full moons for the years 217-223 inclusive. The third year of the cycle, however, has a double date, March 21, 22; but the week-day marked corresponds to the 21st, and the table of Easter days, also engraved on the statue, is calculated on the supposition (when it makes any difference to the calculation) that March 21 is the correct day. On the other hand, the Syriac gives only March 22. No one has explained why this year of the cycle should be given a double day; but remarking that the true full moon in 216 fell on March 21, in 224 on March 22, it seems to us likely that Hippolytus became acquainted with the eight-years cycle in 215 or 216, that he then registered the actual full moons for eight years, and supposed that he had all the information necessary. Finding, however, the full moon in 224 to fall on March 22, not 21, he corrected a fault which he attributed to an inaccuracy in his first year's observation, and did not know that it resulted from the inherent fault of the cycle itself. If this be so, it gives 224 for the date of publication of the cycle. The cycle on the statue, it has been already said, is given in Greek, but it is clearly a Western production. The dates are given by the Roman method of Kalends, Nones, and Ides; a Western rule is followed, that if the full moon fall on a Saturday, Easter Sunday is not the next day, but that day week (the object being never to celebrate Easter earlier than the 16th day of the moon), and the equinoctial limit is made the 18th March instead of the 21st as at Alexandria (Ideler, Chronologie, ii. 213). In passages cited from Hippolytus by the Paschal Chronicle (p. 6, or p. 12 Dindorf), Hippolytus maintains that our Lord did not eat the Jewish passover before His Passion, but suffered on the 14th day of the moon, being Himself the true passover. Accordingly it is assumed on the cycle that the Passion falls on the full moon day, and Hippolytus, evidently counting the year as A.D. 29, that of the consulship of the two Gemini, marks the day March 25, which, according to his calculation, is the day of the paschal full moon for that year. Actually this is a week astray, the true day being March 18. We are safe in presuming that whenever March 25 is mentioned as the day of the Passion, the cycle of Hippolytus is the source of the account.*

(2) Eusebius in the passage where he has spoken of the work on the paschal feast just considered (τὸ περὶ τοῦ πάσχα σύγγραμμα), goes on to give a list of the other works of Hippolytus he had met with, among which is one περὶ τοῦ πάσχα. The use of the definite article in the first case might lead us to think that Eusebius only knew one such work of Hippolytus, which he mentions the second time according to its place in his collection of works of Hippolytus. But it may be considered certain that Hippolytus treated doubly of the paschal celebration; in the work just reviewed giving rules for finding Easter; in another writing, which probably was an Easter-day sermon, treating of its doctrinal import. A passage was cited in the Monothelite controversy at the Lateran Council in 649 from Hippolytus's ἐξήγησις εἰς τὸ πάσχα. (Homilia Dominicae Paschae); see Lagarde's Hippolytus, no. 143, p. 203; and another extract is given in the book of Timotheus Aelurus against the council of Chalcedon (Lagarde, Anal. Syr. p. 88). Both of these extracts are of a dogmatic,

* This Hippolytine date for the Passion passed into the Acts of Pilate, and thence, as we are told by Epiphanius (Haer. 50, see also Philaster, Haer. 58), some made it their practice to commemorate the crucifixion always on this day. It is obvious that if early trustworthy tradition had preserved the day of the solar year on which our Lord suffered, the church would not have perplexed herself with calculations of paschal full moons.

not a chronological character. The passage just referred to from the Paschal Chronicle purports to be taken from the first book of the treatise on the holy paschal feast (Lagarde, Hippol. no. 13, p. 92). The nature of the passage is such that either it might be a piece of Scripture exposition taken from a doctrinal work, or it might form part of a chronological work in which the question was discussed whether our Lord suffered on the 14th or 15th day of the month. But the chronological discussion concerning Easter would scarcely supply matter for more books than one. We do not attempt to decide, therefore, whether Hippolytus treated of the paschal feast chronologically and dogmatically in separate treatises, or in different books of a single treatise.

(3) Among the works ascribed to Hippolytus on the statue is a chronicle. The list runs χρονικὴν πρὸς Ἑλληνας, and it has been contested whether this describes two separate works, or a chronicle written with a controversial object (see Vol. I. page 505); but the question may be regarded as settled by the remains of the chronicle itself, which shew it to have been written for the instruction of Christians, and not as a polemic against heathenism. In the article CHRONICON CANISIANUM, a full account of this chronicle has been given, and of the reasons which shew that it and the cycle on the chair must have had the same author. The chronicle records the death of the emperor Alexander, and therefore it is plain that the deportation of Hippolytus and Pontianus to Sardinia could not have taken place under Alexander as the later papal catalogue has it, but under Maximin. It follows, also, that this chronicle is likely to be the latest work of Hippolytus, and therefore that a passage common to it, and the later treatise on heresy (Vol. I. p. 507), was not taken from it, but from an earlier work, a supposition which presents no difficulty. It appears from the summary of articles prefixed to the chronicle that it originally terminated with a catalogue of the bishops of Rome, with the lengths of their episcopates. This is absent from its place in the Filocalian collection, which contains the earlier part of the chronicle; doubtless because further on a fuller catalogue is given ending with pope Liberius. But the earlier part of the catalogue ending with pope Urban, A.D. 230, bears internal marks of being derived from a source different from that of the rest of the list. The list gives the consuls of the first and last year of each bishop: down to Urban the consuls of the first year of each bishop are never the same as those of the last year of his predecessor, but are those of the succeeding year. With one exception there are no historical notices in this part of the chronicle. After the death of Urban a different mode of treatment begins. Frequently the days of the ordination and of the death of the bishops are noted: the years of the death of one bishop, and of the accession of the next, are no longer referred to two successive consulates but ordinarily to the same; and historical notices appear bearing all the marks of contemporaneousness, and making the list into a short chronicle. Hence Mommsen concludes that the list down to Urban is derived from an older document, which contained no names of consuls (and in fact the title of this section in the chronicle of Hippolytus contains no intimation that there were any such notes of time); that the compiler, finding the names of consuls given in the second part of the lists which he put together, completed the earlier part by adding in names of consuls, using for that purpose a table of consuls still to be found in another part of his collection, but in the process committing several palpable mistakes. That the earlier part is derived from the chronicle of Hippolytus, contained in the same collection, is not only probable in itself, the earlier part not proceeding beyond what Hippolytus might have written, but is made almost certain by the commencement of the Liberian list, which begins with a statement that our Lord suffered on the 25th March in the consulship of the two Gemini, the very date deduced from the cycle on the stone. We can tell why Hippolytus should have fixed on the 25th March, namely, because it was the day of the paschal full moon in the year 221, and he supposed it to have been the same every eight years previously; but there is no reason why any one else should have fixed on this which is certainly not the true date. The great peculiarity of the Liberian list is that it places Cletus after Clement, and counts Cletus and Anencletus as distinct. For a reason that will appear further on, we have thought it important to give the evidence connecting this peculiarity with Hippolytus (see Vol. I. p. 555).

(4) We pass now from the chronological to the anti-heretical writings. First, we consider the treatise against all heresies, which may have been the earliest work of Hippolytus. It is mentioned both in the lists of Eusebius and of Jerome, and a passage is quoted from it in the Paschal Chronicle, though it is not in the list on the chair as we have it, which shews that we cannot build any conclusion on the absence of a name from that list. The fullest account of this treatise is given by Photius (Cod. 121). He describes it as a small book, βιβλιῶδιον, against thirty-two heresies, beginning with the Dositheans and ending with Noetus and the Noetians; that it purported to be an abstract of discourses of Irenaeus; that it was written in a clear, dignified style, though not observant of Attic propriety; and that, besides other incorrect statements, it denied Paul to be the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. In the case of this work Lipsius (Quellenkritik des Epiphanius) has performed a rare, if not a unique, literary achievement, namely, the restoration to some extent of a lost work by means of the unacknowledged use made of it by later writers. The investigation is founded on a careful comparison of the treatises on heresy by Epiphanius and Philaster, from which it is deduced that things common to both, which it had been supposed Philaster had borrowed from Epiphanius, were really taken by both from a common source. It is not chronologically impossible that Philaster might have used the work of Epiphanius. This work contains two notes of time—one near the beginning, shewing that it was commenced in the year 374, the other in the 66th of the eighty sections, shewing that that part was written in the year 376. The work, therefore, could not have been published before the end of that year or the beginning of the next. We cannot fix with equal precision the date of Philaster's work, but 380 is a not improbable date, and it may be asserted that the work of Epiphanius did not precede it by any such interval as to make it very probable that the bishop of Brescia must have been acquainted with it. But on a closer examination it is found that the things common to Epiphanius and Philaster, all are met with only within certain well-defined limits; that elsewhere their treatment of the subject is entirely independent, and that though Philaster shews the greatest anxiety to make his work complete, swelling as much as possible his list of heresies, he leaves unmentioned a multitude whose names he could have learned from the work of Epiphanius, if he had ever seen it. To illustrate the method pursued, let us take the case of the pre-Christian sects, with an enumeration of which both Epiphanius and Philaster commence, the one counting twenty, the other twenty-eight. The list of Epiphanius is Barbarism, Scythism, Hellenism, Judaism; then Stoics, Platonics, Pythagoreans, Epicureans; then Samaritans, Essenes, Sebnaeans, Gortheni, Dositheus; Sadducees, Scribes, Pharisees, Hemerobaptists, Ossenes, Nazarenes, Herodians. The list of Philaster is Ophites, Cainites, Sethites, Dositheus, Sadducees, Pharisees; Samaritans, Nazarenes, Essenes, eighteen other Jewish heresies, Herodians. On comparing these lists we see that there are four names common which occur in the same order in both, and that there are three other names common—Samaritans, Essenes, and Nazarenes—which are differently placed in the two lists. Now let us take into comparison the list of heresies which is appended to Tertullian's treatise on prescription, and here we find, in the corresponding place, only the four names Dositheus, Sadducees, Pharisees, and Herodians. Thus, then, the theory suggests itself that Epiphanius and Philaster used a common authority, which in this place had only these four names; and that they enlarged the list differently, each interpolating the names of such other sects as he was able to find. This conclusion gains strength as we proceed with the examination. We find the list of Pseudo-Tertullian running like a thread through the other two lists, the names in it being found in the same order in the other two, but with other names variously interpolated as already described. When we get beyond the point to which the list of Pseudo-Tertullian reaches, all agreement between Epiphanius and Philaster ceases. If the same heretics are mentioned by both, they are only such as could not be left out by any one writing about heresy, and there is no agreement as to the places assigned to these names. On the other hand, with respect to the names in which Epiphanius and Philaster follow the list of Pseudo-Tertullian, the agreement extends to the matter as well as to the selection of names; and it is under these heads exclusively that the things common to the two writers are found. We cannot resist the conclusion that the two writers have used a common authority; but the first sight inference that that authority was Pseudo-Tertullian is disproved by the fact that Epiphanius and Philaster have much in common which is not found in the third writer. It follows, then, that all three used a common original, to which Pseudo-Tertullian has adhered the most closely, dealing with it rather in the way of abridgment than of enlargement, except that he adds the names of some heretics who taught at Rome at the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd century. Now the list of common names begins with Dositheus and ends with Noetus. When we count the number of these names we find them to be about thirty-two. We say "about," because as there is room for question whether or not one or two names are to be included in the list, the number cannot be stated with such absolute precision as to exclude the reckoning thirty-one or thirty-three. None of the heresies mentioned is later than Hippolytus, and that Epiphanius at least made use of an authority written at Rome may be inferred from the fact that, speaking of Marcellina, who, Irenaeus tells us, came to Rome, he says "came to us," an expression which is only to be accounted for by his having verbally copied a Roman authority. While, then, we count it as demonstrated that Epiphanius, Philaster, and Pseudo-Tertullian used a common authority, we consider that the reasons stated make it probable in a very high degree that that authority was the earlier anti-heretical treatise of Hippolytus. Lipsius is able, then, by collecting the common matter of Epiphanius, Philaster, and Pseudo-Tertullian, not only to give a list of the thirty-two articles of that treatise, but also to recover much of their substance. He even attempted to carry his divination further, and comparing his restored Hippolytus with Irenaeus to infer that they too used a common authority, probably the lost work against heresies by Justin Martyr. But this attempt to see a lost work by twice-reflected light is too difficult for even the author to have confidence in his success. Considering that in his latter work Hippolytus merely combines what he found in Irenaeus with his own reading of heretical works, we think it likely that in his earlier treatise he had no authority but the lectures of Irenaeus. But it seems to us probable enough that these lectures, delivered by Irenaeus after the publication of his great work, and treating, not specially of Valentinianism but of heresies generally, were based on an earlier treatise.

With regard to the time when the work on the thirty-two heresies was published, we have the following indications. The tract of Pseudo-Tertullian mentions the following names of heretics, which do not occur in the other authorities, and therefore, in the opinion of Lipsius, were not contained in the original: Proclus, Aeschines, Blastus, the second Theodotus, Praxeas and Victorinus (?). These heretics appear all to have been at Rome in the time of Zephyrinus, and no later heretics are mentioned. We thus obtain Rome as the place, and the episcopate of Zephyrinus, A.D. 199-217, as the time when the list was appended to the tract of Tertullian. If we agree with Lipsius that the treatise of Hippolytus did not contain these names, it must have been written before they became famous, and we can therefore hardly place it later than the episcopate of Victor. But we think that one at least of these names could not have been omitted by Irenaeus or his disciple. If we ask whether Quartodecimans are likely to have been included in a heretical list by Irenaeus, the title of his work against Blastus On Schism may remind us that the same man might consistently contend for the toleration of foreign churches, yet condemn strongly the schismatical introduction of the foreign practice at Rome. It was by insisting on this that Blastus caused the troubles at Rome which probably led to the measures taken by pope Victor to put down Quartodecimanism. It seems then more likely that the name of Blastus was mentioned by Hippolytus than that it was added several years after his schism had ceased to be formidable. On the whole we think it most likely that it was in the early years of Zephyrinus that Hippolytus published his notes of the lectures of Irenaeus against heresies, with the view of leading up to an assault on Noetianism, which was at Rome the most formidable heresy of the day. And considering that, according to the opinion of Lipsius himself, the original of the tract of Pseudo-Tertullian was written in the lifetime of Hippolytus, it seems to us simplest to believe that it was written by Hippolytus, and that it was (see No. (5)) the summary of the contents of the Syntagma.<sup>f</sup>

(5) A work, or rather a fragment, bearing in the MS. the title of "Homily of Hippolytus against the Heresy of one Noetus," was first printed by Vossius, in a Latin translation made by Turrianus; and afterwards the Greek was printed by Fabricius from a Vatican MS. On examination it appears to be not a homily, but the conclusion of a treatise against more heresies than one. It begins: "Certain others are privily introducing another doctrine, having become disciples of one Noetus." It goes on then to refute the Noetian objection that the assertion of the distinct personality of our Lord contradicts those texts of Scripture which declare the absolute unity of God. At the end of this discussion he says: "Now that Noetus also has been refuted, let us come to the setting forth of the truth, that we may establish the truth, against which all so great heresies have arisen, without being able to say anything." Pope Gelasius quotes a passage from this work, as from an anti-heretical treatise, "Hippolytus in memoria haeresium." Fabricius then suggested that we have here the last chapter of the treatise against the thirty-two heresies, containing the confutation of Noetus, together with the exposition of the truth in opposition to all the heresies, with which the work concludes. The rhetorical style of this latter part would account for its being taken for a homily. The fragment contains an identification of the method of Noetus with that of Theodotus, which harmonizes well with the supposition that this fragment is from the work in which the section on Noetus follows close after that on Theodotus. On the other hand, Volkmar and Harnack have contended that the treatise, of which this fragment is the conclusion, must have been directed against Monarchian heretics only, as it is only against the doctrine of such heretics that the conclusion of the fragment sets forth the truth. We think this argument too weak to balance the fact that we nowhere read that Hippolytus composed such a special treatise. A more weighty argument is that Photius describes the work against the thirty-two heresies as a little book (βιβλίον), while, if we regard this fragment as a single chapter (allowing it to be even much the largest chapter), the work must have been one of considerable bulk. It may be believed that in the case of each of the earlier heresies, a work against heresies must have contained, in addition to a short description of the heresy (which is what Lipsius usually gathers from the secondary authorities), some attempt to confute it. We are inclined to accept the solution of this difficulty proposed by Lipsius, namely, that the little book which Photius met with was not the σύνταγμα itself, but only a summary of its contents, not differing very greatly from that of which Pseudo-Tertullian may be regarded as giving a translation. We know other cases in which anti-heretical treatises were accompanied by such summaries, and in which these got into independent circulation. It is only with such a summary of the work of Epiphanius that Augustine was acquainted; and it has been told already that Theodoret only knew the summary of the later work of Hippolytus. The expressions μερῶς and ἀδρομερῶς, with which in his later work Hippolytus describes his former mode of treatment, do not of necessity imply that the former work was a short one, but only that he had then refrained from giving that complete exposure of the secret doctrines of the heretics which he gave subsequently.

The writing which we are discussing furnished Epiphanius with the materials for his article on Noetianism. Indeed he copies it in a mechanical manner, which is somewhat ludicrous. Our fragment begins by saying that Noetus lived not long ago. Epiphanius begins in the same way, but goes on to explain that "not many years ago" means 130 years or so. It is not to be understood, however, that Epiphanius transcribes Hippolytus, but he follows him all through, using his arguments, and sometimes his words, but bringing all into conformity with what theological accuracy in his own time demanded. There is also a close affinity between this fragment and Tertullian's tract against Praxeas. It has been questioned (see Volkmar, p. 136; Harnack, p. 202) whether the resemblances are greater than might be expected to occur in the writings of men of kindred opinions, replying to the same arguments of a common antagonist. It seems to us that Lipsius (Quellen, p. 184) has clearly established a literary dependence of one on the other; nor can we think it doubtful that Tertullian is the borrower. It is remarkable that Tertullian never names Hippolytus, though this is not the only evidence that he used his writings, and though there was much agreement in their doctrine.

The orthodoxy of the tract against Noetus might seem to be guaranteed by the use made of it by pope Gelasius. It seems unsuspected by Tillemont, Ceillier, Lumper, and others who have discussed it. It was formally defended by bishop Bull, and the tract was published by Routh (Ecc. Script. Opusc.) as a lucid exposition of orthodox doctrine. When, however, it came to light that the teaching of Hippolytus had been censured by pope Callistus, Döllinger had no difficulty in pointing out features in it open to censure. Though Hippolytus acknowledges the

Logos to have been from eternity dwelling in God as His intelligence, he yet appears to teach that there was a definite epoch determined by the will of God, prior no doubt to all creation, when that Logos, which had previously dwelt impersonally in God, assumed a separate hypostatic existence, in order that by Him the world should be framed, and the Deity manifested to it. Thus, beside God there appeared another; yet not two Gods, but only as light from light a ray from the sun. Hippolytus also teaches [see HERMOGENES; TERTULLIAN] that it was only at the Incarnation that He who before was the Logos properly became Son, though previously He might be called Son in reference to what He was to be. Döllinger imagines that this emanation doctrine of Hippolytus may, in the controversies of the time, have been stigmatized as Valentinian, and that thus we are to account for the fact already mentioned that a late authority connects this heresy with his name.

(6) In the year 1842 Minoides Mynas, in execution of a commission given him by the French government, brought to Paris from Mount Athos, besides other literary treasures, a 14th-century MS. containing what purported to be a refutation of all heresies, divided into ten books. Owing to mutilation, the MS. begins in the middle of the fourth book; but from the numbering of the leaves it is inferred that the MS. had never contained any of the first three books. Miller, who published the book in 1851 for the University of Oxford, perceived that these newly-recovered books belonged to the same work as what had been published under the name of Origen's Philosophumena, by Gronovius, and afterwards in the Benedictine edition of Origen, though it had been perceived that the ascription to Origen must be erroneous, as the author claims the dignity of high priesthood, and also refers to a former work on heresies, while no such work is said to have been composed by Origen. Miller accordingly, in his edition reprinted the Philosophumena as the first book of the Elenchus, but ascribed the whole to Origen. It is to be remarked that the tenth book, which gives a summary of the whole, makes no mention of the contents of the second, third, or fourth books, so that we are left to conjecture as to the contents of the second and third books. The plan of the book is to refute heretics by shewing that their doctrines were derived from heathen sources. The description of the doctrine of the heretics only commences with the fifth book; the first book contains the doctrines of the Greek philosophers; the fourth expounds the system of the astrologers; the second and third books must, therefore, have dealt with some other form of heathenism, possibly Chaldee or Babylonish. The publication of Miller's edition gave rise to very active discussion, which was all the more lively on account of the bearing on modern controversies of that part of the ninth book which charged a bishop of Rome with heresy. Miller's ascription to Origen was generally rejected; an anonymous dissertation in an English periodical claimed the work for Caius, and this view was adopted by Baur and others. Jacobi, on the other hand, in a German periodical, put forward the claims of Hippolytus, a theory which was embraced by Bunsen (Hippolytus and His Age, 1852; 2nd ed., Christianity and Mankind, 1854) by Wordsworth (St. Hippol. and the Ch. of Rome, 1853, 2nd ed. 1880) and may be said to have been completely established by Döllinger (Hippolytus und Kallistus, 1853), a work to which we refer by the pages of Mr. Plummer's English translation. Some additional light was thrown on the subject by Volkmar's Hippolytus und die römische Zeitgenossen, 1855, a work intended as the first part of a treatise on the ante-Nicene heresies, with which, however, the author has not proceeded. Other writers for whom the authorship has been claimed are Tertullian, to whom De Rossi inclines in the conclusion of a series of able papers on this work in his Bullettino di Arch. Christ., 1866; and Novatian, the case for whom is argued by Armellini, de Prisca Refutatione Haeresion, 1862. In the present state of the controversy we think it needless to give reasons for rejecting the claims of others, considering it enough to state the positive evidence for the authorship of Hippolytus, evidence which we regard as quite conclusive. From the book itself we infer that the author lived at Rome during the episcopates of Zephyrinus and Callistus, and for some time afterwards; that he held high ecclesiastical office, and enjoyed much consideration, being not afraid to oppose his opinion on a theological question to that of the bishop, and able to persuade himself that fear of him restrained the bishop from a course on which he otherwise would have entered. Hippolytus satisfies these conditions better than any one else for whom the authorship has been claimed. Further, the hypothesis that Hippolytus was the author gives the explanation of the prevalent Eastern belief that he was bishop of Rome, of the tradition preserved by Prudentius that he had been once in schism from the church, and of the singular honour of a statue done him; for his position as head of a party would make it intelligible why his adherents should delight to glorify his learning and prolific industry.<sup>a</sup> These arguments might make the authorship of Hippolytus highly probable, but the case is turned into certainty by the fact that the work on heresies connects itself with six distinct works of Hippolytus.

(a) The Treatise against the thirty-two Heresies.—The author begins by saying that he had a long time before (πάλαι) published another work against heresy, in which he had dealt with the subject in a rougher way, refraining from that minute exposure of the secret doctrines of the heretics which he was then about to make. Of those for whom the authorship has been claimed, Hippolytus is the only one whom we know to have published a previous work on heresies. The distance of time that would separate the two works would be twenty years, if not more.

<sup>b</sup> It seems to us, however, more likely that the statue was erected soon after his death, by consent of all parties, near the place where his remains were buried, and where it was subsequently found. In a list of works published during the time of schism, the treatise against heresy would have been prominently mentioned. The present list omits mention of all the works which could have given offence to his former opponents.

This and the difference of plan which he announces are enough to account for some differences both in contents and in method of treatment between the earlier and the later treatise. On the other hand, Volkmar, p. 89, gives decisive proof of the affinity of the two treatises, enumerating seven points in which they agree together, differing from other authorities.

(b) The Treatise on the Universe.—At the end of the work (x. 32, p. 334) the author refers to a previous work of his περὶ τῆς τοῦ πατρὸς ὁμοίας. Now among the works ascribed to Hippolytus on the statue, we read πρὸς Ἑλληνας καὶ πρὸς Πλάτωνα ἢ καὶ περὶ τοῦ πατρὸς. When we come presently to speak of this work we shall discuss what Photius says about it; suffice it here to say that there is no room for doubt that the book described by Photius is the same as that referred to by our treatise, and that Photius tells that the book which he describes contained a polemic against Plato, from which we may conclude that it was the same as that whose title is inscribed on the statue. Wordsworth (p. 56) points out several verbal coincidences between our treatise and the extant remains of the treatise described by Photius which leave no doubt that both proceed from the same author. Photius remarks that the author of the work on the universe was also the author of The Labyrinth, there being at the end of the latter work a statement that its author had written the former. Photius states that he had found in the margin of his MSS. both works ascribed to Caius, but will not himself be positive that the work on the universe referred to in The Labyrinth is the same as this one. We have already said that Volkmar has established that Theodoret was acquainted with the tenth book of our treatise, but not with the preceding nine. This tenth book, then, must have been in separate circulation. Theodoret gives it no title, and appears not to know the author's name. Now the tenth book begins with the words, "The labyrinth of heresies." We may, then, reasonably conclude that what Photius knew as The Labyrinth was our tenth book, which, for want of another title, was known by its first word. It is not likely that a different book, for some unknown reason called The Labyrinth, should also have ended with a claim to the authorship of the treatise περὶ τοῦ πατρὸς. Photius mentions that The Labyrinth was by some inscribed as Origen's.

(c) The Chronicle and the Treatise on the Psalms.—It has been mentioned (i. 507) that the enumeration of the seventy-two nations among whom the earth was divided (x. 30), and which the author states that he had previously given in other books, precisely agrees with that given in the Chronicle of Hippolytus. This chronicle was in all probability later than the Refutation of Heresies, and therefore could not have been the previous work referred to. But Hippolytus wrote commentaries on the book of Genesis, where this enumeration would naturally be given in treating of ch. x., and he appears to have been, like many prolific writers, apt to repeat himself. This same enumeration is given in his commentary on the Psalms (No. 29 infra).

(d) The Tract against Noetus.—On comparing his tract with the exposition of the truth given at the end of the treatise, the identity of doctrine, and sometimes of form of expression, is found to be such as decisively to prove common authorship. The same doctrine is found, that the Logos, which had from eternity dwelt in the Deity as His unspoken thought, afterwards assumed a separate hypostatic existence, differing from created things not only in priority but also because they were out of nothing, He of the substance of the Godhead; and being the framer of the universe according to the divine ideas (in the Platonic sense of the word) which had dwelt in Him from the first. That the Son's personal divinity was not by the original necessity of His nature, but given by an act of the divine will, is stated more offensively than in the earlier tract. He says to his reader "God has been pleased to make you a man, not a god. If He had willed to make you a god He could have done so; you have the example of the Logos." The principal difference between the language of the former work and of the latter is, that in the former, not the latter, the exposition of doctrine treats of the Holy Spirit. Döllinger accounts for this by the fact that the latter work being addressed to heathen, the mention of this specially Christian doctrine was there less suitable. Lipsius points out that in those passages of the former work where the Holy Spirit is mentioned, the subject is the relation between the Father and the Son, and the mention of the third Person of the Trinity is irrelevant. He concludes, therefore, that the passages which contain this mention are interpolations intended to correct an omission displeasing to the orthodoxy of later times. We cannot refute this suspicion, but we may remark that while (if the passages be not genuine) Hippolytus, who speaks elsewhere of the Holy Spirit several times in this treatise on heresies, cannot be censured for not introducing a mention of Him out of place; it is quite possible that, when speaking of the first two Persons of the Trinity, he might be led on to speak also of the third even though his subject did not demand it. Volkmar goes farther than Lipsius in rejecting, as interpolations, parts of the tract against Noetus.

(e) The Treatise on Antichrist.—In the second chapter of this treatise (Lagarde p. 2), when telling how the prophets treated not only of the past but of the present and the future, he uses language in some respects verbally coinciding with what is said on the same subject in the Elenchus (x. 33, p. 337).

We consider that the evidence which has been produced does not come short of a demonstration of the Hippolytine authorship. The title of the work we are considering would be φιλοσοφούμενα ἢ κατὰ πασῶν αἵρέσεων ἐλέγχος; the name Philosophumena properly applying to the first four books, the Elenchus to the six latter. The chief value of the book to us consists, in addition to the light it casts on the disputes which disturbed the church of Rome at the beginning of the 3rd century, in the extracts it has preserved from otherwise unknown Gnostic writings, which the author inserted in order to shame these sects by an exposure of their secret tenets. The attack which the work contained on the character of pope Callistus was fatal to its circulation. No doubt when a reconciliation was effected at Rome all parties were desirous to suppress the book. The first book was preserved, which contained a harmless and useful account of the doctrines of heathen philosophers; and the tenth book, which presented no cause for offence (there being nothing to indicate that the heretic Callistus mentioned in it was intended for the bishop of Rome), also found some circulation, and was seen by Theodoret and Photius. But these two writers are the only ones in whom we can trace any knowledge even of the tenth book, which was certainly not used by Epiphanius. The rest of the work appears not to have been met with by any writer whose works have come down to us, and but for the chance which preserved a transcript of a single copy that found its way to the East, the work would have altogether perished.

Much of what was written immediately after the discovery of the Elenchus has now become antiquated. We content ourselves, therefore, with referring generally the reader who may be interested in the history of the discussion to the theological periodicals for 1852-4, in which articles on the subject are numerous. An able summary of the principal points in the controversy is contained in De Smedt's dissertation, De Auctore Philosophumena in his Dissertationes Selectae, Ghent, 1876. The treatise against heresies was edited a second time, with much critical care, by Duncker and Schneidewin, Göttingen, 1859. This edition marks the pages of Miller's edition, by which, accordingly, we refer to the work. An edition was also published by Cruice, Paris, 1860. Miller and Schneidewin spent no pains on the previously known first book. This has been edited in a thoroughly satisfactory manner by Diels (Doxographi Graeci, Berlin, 1879), who also investigates the sources whence Hippolytus drew his account of Greek philosophy.

(7) The Little Labyrinth.—Eusebius (E. H. v. 27) gives some long extracts from an anonymous work against the heresy of Artemon. Internal evidence shews that the writer was a member of the Roman church; and he speaks of things that occurred in the episcopate of Zephyrinus as having happened in his own time. On the other hand, Zephyrinus is described as Victor's successor, language not likely to be used if Zephyrinus were at the time bishop, or even the last preceding bishop. The writer's recollection too does not appear to go back to the episcopate of Victor. He deduces that bishop's opinion from his public act, the excommunication of Theodotus, but does not pretend to any personal knowledge of his own. The date would therefore be some little time after the episcopate of Callistus. Theodoret (Haer. Fab. ii. 5) refers to the same work, describing it as one written against the heresies of Artemon and Theodotus. He appears when writing not to have looked beyond Eusebius, all the things he cites from it being to be found in the extracts which Eusebius has preserved, but he has an independent knowledge of the work, and we learn from him that it was known in his time under the name of the Little Labyrinth, and was attributed by some to Origen, though in Theodoret's opinion this assumption was disproved by the difference of style. Photius (Cod. 48), as we have seen, ascribes to Caius a book called The Labyrinth, which we have identified with the summary of the Elenchus; he does not mention the Little Labyrinth, but adds that it was said Caius had composed a special treatise against the heresy of Artemon. It does not appear that Photius had himself seen the latter treatise. We have no reason to think that the Labyrinth of Photius and the Little Labyrinth of Theodoret were the same; on the contrary it is likely that the latter was identical with the treatise against Artemon, which Photius expressly distinguishes from his Labyrinth. As the name "labyrinth" appears not to have been the proper title of the summary of the Elenchus, but only a convenient designation taken from its first word, for a book without a title, so also may have originated the name "little labyrinth." This book too may have begun either with the words "little labyrinth," or with the word "labyrinth," and have been called "little" to distinguish it from another larger work called by the same name. As the time and place of the author agree with those of Hippolytus, so it is natural to think that the two works known by the name of Labyrinth had the same author; and the writer from whom Eusebius gives extracts tells of the two Theodoti who are mentioned by Hippolytus in both his works against heresy. But there are strong arguments against the identification. (a) This writer speaks of Victor as thirteenth bishop from Peter, whereas if he had adopted the reckoning which counts Cletus and Anacletus as distinct, a reckoning which we have seen reason to ascribe to Hippolytus, Victor would have been fourteenth. (b) He speaks all through of Zephyrinus with greater respect than we should expect from the author of the Elenchus, and he speaks with strong disapproval of one Natalius who allowed himself to be induced by love of the first place, and by a salary<sup>1</sup> to accept the office of counter-bishop in a heretical communion, in apparent unconsciousness that he could himself be charged with having occupied a similar position. (c) The writer mentions among "the brethren who wrote against the heathen in defence of the truth, and against the heresies of their time." Justin, Miltiades, Tatian, and Clement. One could scarcely write thus who was aware that Tatian had been one of the heretics of his time. Now at the time of this composition the heresy of Tatian might well have been forgotten, and he might only be known to Caius as the author of the "address to the Greeks"; but Hippolytus has articles on the heresy of Tatian both in his earlier and his later treatise. (d) The writer's dislike to the use of technical logical terms, and to the study of heathen philosophy by Christians, is what we should hardly expect from the author of the Philosophumena.

None of these reasons is absolutely conclusive against the Hippolytine authorship; yet when these topics of internal evidence are combined with the fact that we have some external evidence for the authorship of Caius and none for that of Hippolytus (for the fact that Photius was wrongly informed as to the authorship of the work on the universe is no proof of the erroneousness of what seems to have been quite independent information as to the authorship of the treatise against Artemon); we must in the alternative, Caius or Hippolytus, give our verdict for Caius.

(8) The Work against Bero and Helix (see HELIX).—It has been already stated that a certain Anastasius of the 7th century is the earliest authority for designating Hippolytus as bishop of Portus. He so calls him in sending to Rome extracts made by him at Constantinople, from what purported to be a treatise of Hippolytus περὶ θεολογίας καὶ σαρκώσεως against the above-named heretics, his adversaries having hindered him from getting possession of the entire work. Döllinger (p. 295) has given conclusive reasons for regarding this as no work of Hippolytus, but as a forgery not earlier than the 6th century. We hear nothing either of these heretics or of this work against them before the 7th century, although it afforded testimonies against monophysitism of which it is incredible that earlier writers would not have availed themselves if they had known of them. The technical language of these fragments is also that which was developed by the controversies of the 5th century, and is quite unlike the language of the age of Hippolytus. It was doubtless Anastasius who supplied another passage from the discourse περὶ θεολογίας produced at the Lateran Council in 649.

(9) A Syriac list of the writings of Hippolytus given by Ebed Jesu, a writer of the very beginning of the 14th century (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 1, p. 15), contains a work whose Syriac title is translated by Echeleusis, De Regimine, by Assemani, De Dispensatione. Adopting the latter rendering and taking "dispensatio" to be equivalent to οικονομία, we should guess the subject of the work to be our Lord's Incarnation. It may therefore be identical with that last considered. If the other rendering be adopted, the work would relate to church government, and might be identical with some of the writings of which we speak, No. 21.

(10) The Treatise against Marcion.—This work is mentioned in the catalogues of Eusebius and of Jerome, but no fragments of it have been preserved.

(11) On the statue, however, we have enumerated a work περὶ τὰ γὰθὸν καὶ πῶθεν τὸ κακόν. This may well have been an anti-Marcionite composition, and possibly the work mentioned by Eusebius.

(12) Defence of the Gospel and Apocalypse of St. John.—We may probably class among the anti-heretical writings, the work described in the list on the chair as ὑπὲρ τοῦ κατὰ Ἰωάννην εὐαγγελίου καὶ ἀποκαλύψεως. This is also included in the list of Ebed Jesu, who enumerates "a defence of the Apocalypse and gospel of the apostle and evangelist John." The work on the Apocalypse mentioned by Jerome we take to be different, and we notice it among the exegetical works. Hippolytus in his extant remains constantly employs the Apocalypse, and his regard for it is appealed to by Andrew of Caesarea (Max. Bibl. Patr. v. 590). It is doubtful whether the opponents of the fourth gospel and the Apocalypse were not among the 32 heresies of the Syntagma. Such a heresy is not mentioned by Pseudo-Tertullian, who appears to have closely followed his original, but the ascription of these books to Cerinthus is reckoned as a heresy by Philaster (Hæc. 60), and by Epiphanius (Hæc. 51). It is possible that Epiphanius in his long article on the Alogi may have made use of the treatise now under consideration; at least some of the objections which he notices have the air of belonging to an earlier date than his own. It has been supposed that CAIUS was the writer, replied to by Hippolytus, who ascribes the Apocalypse and the gospel to Cerinthus; but (see Vol. I, p. 385) the arguments for supposing that Caius rejected the Apocalypse are inconclusive; and it is in the highest degree improbable that he, an orthodox member of the Roman church, rejected the gospel of St. John.

(13) One argument in support of the view just referred to, is that Ebed Jesu (u.s.) enumerates among the works of Hippolytus Chapters (or heads) against Caius, which it has been conjectured were identical with the work last considered. To this it is enough to say that Ebed Jesu reckons in his list the two works as distinct. But it has been a puzzle what other heresy of Caius Hippolytus could have confuted. It has been conjectured with little probability that a work against Cainites is intended.<sup>k</sup> At the end of the article CAIUS, we have given Lightfoot's explanation, which, however, on reflection, does not satisfy us; and although much of what is told of Caius is so completely a duplicate of what is true of Hippolytus, as to give plausibility to the theory that both names belonged to the same person, whose works circulated, some under one name, some under the other; yet the evidence for the separate existence of Caius cannot be got rid of without a good deal of forcing, and if we give faith to the catalogue of Ebed Jesu, we cannot maintain the identity of persons who appear to have been in controversy with one another. Earlier critics naturally assumed that if Hippolytus were in controversy with Caius, Hippolytus must have been on the side of the church, and Caius must have been a heretic or schismatic. This assumption is not reasonable now that we have learned that Hippolytus was for a considerable time at variance with the bulk of the Roman church, of which we have reason to think Caius was a leading presbyter, and the ablest literary man left behind by Hippolytus. It is therefore quite credible that written controversy may have taken place between them, which on their subsequent reconciliation, both parties were willing should perish.

(14) It is hard to draw the line between controversial and dogmatic books. Thus, with regard to the treatise cited by Anastasius Sinaita (Lagarde, No. 9, p. 90) περὶ ἀναστάσεως καὶ ἀφθαρσίας, which may be the same as that described on the statue as περὶ Θεοῦ καὶ σαρκὸς ἀναστάσεως and by Jerome as De Resurrectione, we cannot tell whether it was a simple explanation of Christian doctrine, or directed against the errors of heretics or heathens.

(15) A controversial character more clearly belongs to another work on the same subject, a fragment of which is preserved in Syriac (Lagarde, Anal. Syr. p. 87). This fragment contains what Stephen Gobar (Photius, Cod. 232) noted as a peculiarity of Hippolytus, and which is found also in both his treatises against heresy, that he makes Nicolas the deacon himself, and not any misunderstood saying of his, the origin of the errors of the Nicolaitans. Here he is charged with maintaining that the resurrection has passed already, and that Christians are to expect none other than that which took place when they believed and were baptized. The Syriac entitles this work as addressed to Mamaea the queen, who is explained to have been the mother of Alexander (i.e. Alexander Severus). It is no doubt from the same work that Theodoret makes a couple of quotations (Lagarde, No. 10, p. 90), also relating to the resurrection. Theodoret calls the work from which he quotes a "letter to a certain queen," and therefore it is possible that the name Mamaea may have only been conjecturally added by the Syriac writer, who knew that Hippolytus was contemporary with Alexander Severus. It is natural to think that the work under consideration was identical with one mentioned in the list on the chair also addressed to a lady, whose name suggests that she was a member of the imperial family. The title there runs προτροπικὸς εἰς Σεβήρειαν. Döllinger gives as the most probable guess as to the lady intended, Julia Aquila Severa, the second wife of Elagabalus. It is not unlikely that this work may have contrasted the Christian certainty of immortality with the hopelessness of heathenism.

(16) One work at least Hippolytus specially directed to the heathen, and though this is not included in the list of Jerome he probably alludes to it (Ep. ad Magnum, i. 423) where he classes Hippolytus with others who wrote "contra gentes." In the list on the chair we read χρονικῶν πρὸς Ἕλληνας καὶ πρὸς Πλάτωνα ἢ καὶ περὶ τοῦ παντός. Here we might take πρὸς Ἕλληνας as the title of a distinct work, or we might take these words either with what precedes or with what follows. That the last is the true construction appears both from the title given in one of the MSS., in which a fragment is preserved, ὁ λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας ὁ ἐπιγεγραμμένος κατὰ Πλάτωνα περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντός αἰτίας, and from the fact that the same fragment contains addresses to the Greeks. This, then, is evidently the treatise περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντός οὐσίας, mentioned at the end of the Elenchus, and of which Photius speaks in a passage already referred to (Cod. 48). He there tells that the treatise was in two short books, that it shewed that Plato was inconsistent with himself, and also shewed that the Platonic philosopher Alcinoüs had spoken falsely and absurdly about the soul, and matter, and the resurrection, and that it proved that the Jewish nation was much older than that of the Greeks. The copy used by Photius was entitled as by Josephus, but he remarks that this is inconsistent with the language of the work concerning our Lord, and that he had found in marginal notes that the work was really by Caius the author of the Labyrinth; that the work, being without author's name, was differently ascribed; to Josephus, to Justin Martyr, to Irenæus,<sup>1</sup> as the Labyrinth itself was sometimes inscribed as Origen's. But the opinion of Photius's anonymous annotator must give way to the testimony of the list on the chair, which assigns the work on the universe to Hippolytus; and to the other arguments (see No. (6) c), which shew the Labyrinth to be the work of the same author.

The theory of the universe embodied in this work made all things consist of the four elements, earth, air, fire, or water. Things formed of more elements than one are subject to death by the dissolution of their component parts, but things formed of one element (as for instance angels, who are formed of fire alone) are indissoluble and immortal. Angels also being of fire have no female, for it is from water the generative principle is derived. Man is made of all four elements, his soul being formed of air, and called ψυχή, because this element is colder than the other three. The principal extant fragment was first printed by Hoeschel in the notes to his edition of the Bibliotheca of Photius (Lagarde, § 6, p. 68). Another very short fragment is preserved by Joannes Philoponus (Lagarde, § 57, p. 124). The former fragment contains a description of Hades; it is a place under ground where souls are detained until the day of judgment. The gate is guarded by an archangel. When the angels appointed to that service conduct thither righteous souls, they proceed to the right to a place of light called Abraham's bosom, where they enjoy continued present pleasures with the expectation of still greater happiness in the future. The wicked, on the other hand, are hurried down to the left into a place of darkness where is the lake of fire, into which no one has yet been cast, but which is prepared for the future judgment. There they not only suffer present temporary punishments, but are tormented by the sight and smoke of that burning lake, and the horrible expectation of the punishment to come. The sight of the righteous also punishes them, between whom and them a great gulf is fixed. And again while the bodies of the righteous will rise renewed and glorified, theirs will be raised with all the diseases and decay in which they died.

Bunsen conjectures that some points in his account, for which Hippolytus has not Scripture authority, might have been taken by him from the Apocalypse of Peter. The fragment as published by Fabricius is enlarged by Wordsworth (Hippolytus, p. 306) from a Bodleian MS. previously however printed by Hearne. In the Fabrician form it seemed to come to a proper end with a doxology. Wordsworth has added a kind of postscript also ending with a short doxology which is a kind of expansion of the apocryphal text, "In whatsoever things I find you in these will I judge you," that is, that the future, whether of the backsliding righteous man, or of the repentant sinner, will depend on the state in which death finds him. And so these words are also explained by Justin Martyr (Trypho. 47) and by Clement of Alexandria (Quis dicit salv. 40). In this work Hippolytus, who seems to have been fond of referring to his previous writings, when speaking of our Lord refers to other works in which he has treated of the same subject in more detail (λεπτομερέστερον), a word which reminds us of the ἀδρομερώς of the beginning of the Philosophumena. The subject is one on which Hippolytus must have touched in so many writings that it is not easy to say to which in particular he refers. When we have mentioned one more controversial work we shall give the names of two or three which may answer the conditions of this problem.

(17) The Demonstration against the Jews.—

The Greek text of a fragment of a work bearing this title was first published by Fabricius (vol. ii. 1), from a copy supplied by Montfaucon from a Vatican MS. There is no external evidence to confirm the ascription in the MS. of this work to Hippolytus. The mutilated list on the chair begins -ovs;<sup>m</sup> but it is bare conjecture which completes this into πρὸς Ἰουδαίους. There is nothing in the fragment which forbids us to suppose Hippolytus to have been the writer. It shews that the Jews have no reason to glory in the sufferings which they inflicted on Jesus of Nazareth, for that it had been foretold that the Messiah should so suffer, and that these sufferings had been the cause of the misery afterwards endured by the Jewish nation. Fabricius conjectures that our fragment is a part of a commentary on Psalm lix.; but on scarcely sufficient grounds, that Psalm being only treated of as far as the writer's argument requires. He goes on to give testimonies from the Book of Wisdom, which he cites as really Solomon's, in this agreeing with another fragment of Hippolytus (Lagarde, § 135, p. 200). De Magistris, published (Act. Mart. ad Ost. Tib., app. p. 452) as if it were part of this treatise, the treatise (Adversus Judaeos) commonly printed among the spurious works of Cyprian (iii. 143, Hartel), but there is no reason to think that this was by Hippolytus, or that it is a translation from the Greek.

We pass now to dogmatic writings.

(18) Jerome in his list of the writings of Hippolytus gives "Προσομίλια de laude Domini salvatoris." This is the homily which he tells us mentions that it was delivered in the presence of Origen. Jerome goes on to say that it was in imitation of Hippolytus that Ambrose urged Origen to the publication of his commentaries on Scripture, a passage which gave rise to some confusion on the part of Photius, who makes Hippolytus hold the relation to Origen really occupied by Ambrose. As a homiletic commentator on Scripture, Hippolytus (as the list of his exegetical writings will shew) was no less indefatigable than Origen, and there is nothing incredible in the statement that the labours of one may have stimulated those of the other.

(19) The work on Antichrist.—Of all the writings of Hippolytus this is the only one that has come down to us in a perfect state, or nearly so. It appears in Jerome's list with the title De Antichristo; Photius calls it περὶ Χριστοῦ καὶ ἀντιχρίστου, and the title which it bears in the MS. from which the first printed edition was made, is περὶ τοῦ σωτήρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ περὶ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου. The work is addressed to one Theophilus, and the author cautions him against communicating to unbelievers what he was about to teach him, quoting Paul's directions to Timothy, "the things thou hast heard of me commit thou to faithful men." The doctrine of the treatise as to the coming overthrow of the Roman power would give good reason for this caution. Having made some introductory remarks on the manner in which the Word had inspired the prophets whose testimony he was about to use, he proceeds to the subject in hand. Jerome's title is that which best describes the treatise, of which Antichrist is almost exclusively the subject, except that the later title has some justification in the parallel between Christ and Antichrist, with which he begins, shewing how the deceiver had sought in all things to liken himself to the Son of God. He was to be, like Christ, a lion (Deut. xxxiii. 22), a king, a lamb (Rev. xiii. 11), he was to come in the form of a man, and to be of the circumcision; he was to send out false apostles and gather in a people, and as the Lord had given a seal to those who believe in Him, so should he, &c. The writer then quotes fully all the prophecies that speak of Antichrist and arrives at the conclusion that he shall be of the tribe of Dan; that Daniel's four kingdoms are the Babylonian, Median, Grecian, and Roman; that the ten toes of the image are ten kings among whom the Roman empire should be divided, that from among these Antichrist should arise, and should overthrow three of the kings, viz., those of Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia, and make an expedition against Tyre and Berytus; and then should gain the submission of the Jews, hoping to obtain vengeance by their means, that he should shew himself forth as God, and persecute to the death those who refuse to worship him, that he should reign three years and a half, and then that he and his kingdom should be destroyed by Christ's second coming. For the problem of the number of the beast, while other solutions mentioned by Irenaeus are noticed, that of Ἀαρείνος is preferred. This is one of many coincidences shewing that Hippolytus used the treatise of Irenaeus against heresies, which are enumerated (§ iv.) by Overbeck in an able monograph on this tract Quaestionum Hippolytearum specimen. Overbeck discusses also the points of contact between this tract and Origen, arriving at the conclusion that these may be accounted for without supposing either writer indebted to the other. The most striking resemblances are the doctrine (De Ant. 45) that the Baptist on being beheaded by Herod acted also as our Lord's forerunner to the souls in Hades (Origen, de Engast. xi. 327, Lomm.; see also Hermas, Simil. ix. 16), on which point certainly it seems possible that Hippolytus borrowed from Origen; the application of the natural history of the partridge to explain Jer. xvii. 11 (De Ant. 55; Orig. in Jer. xv. 303), and the application of the natural history of the lion's cub to deduce our Lord's three days in the grave from Gen. xlix. 9 (De Ant. 8; Orig. in Gen. viii. 289). Overbeck infers from the hostility to the Roman empire exhibited in this tract that it was written in a time of persecution, and conjectures that its date was about that of the edict of Severus against the Christians, A.D. 202. Before the recovery by Gadius of the genuine work on Antichrist there had been printed by Picus as the work of Hippolytus, one entitled on the End of the World, and on Antichrist, and on the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is now recognised to be spurious, but the forger must have been acquainted with the genuine treatise.

(20) The text of a homily on the holy Theophany was communicated to Fabricius by Gale from a MS. still preserved at Cambridge. There is also extant a Syriac translation of great part of this homily, viz. to the end of chap. 7 (Wright, Catal. of Syr. MSS. of Brit. Mus. ii. 842). The ascription of the MSS. is not confirmed by any external evidence. This homily is not mentioned in any of the lists of the Hippolytine works, nor is it quoted by any ancient author. We do not, however, see anything in the homily which Hippolytus might not have written, and Wordsworth has pointed out a remarkable coincidence with the Refutation, viz. that in both man is spoken of as becoming a god by the gift of new birth and immortality. The homily commences with rhetorical comments on St. Matthew's narrative of the Saviour's baptism, proceeds then to speak of the privileges conveyed by baptism when the life corresponds to the profession, and, lastly, with an exhortation to his hearers to partake of these blessings. The other homilies we notice among the exegetical writings which, for all we know, may have been all homiletical.

(21) In the list on the chair we have enumerated περὶ χαρισμάτων ἀποστολικῆ παρῶδοσις. There is room for doubt whether we have here the title of one work or two. For different speculations on the subject see Fabricius, p. 83. The two principal theories about the work on the Charismata are (a) that it treated of the Montanist claims to inspiration; (b) that it was a book of canons; this theory being founded on the fact that the 8th book of the Apostolic Constitutions (see Dict. Christ. Ant. I. 124) begins to treat περὶ χαρισμάτων, and then in three MSS. (all, however, traceable to a common source) has the heading διατάξεις τῶν αὐτῶν ἁγίων Ἀποστόλων περὶ χειροτονιῶν διὰ Ἰππολύτου. It is beyond need of argument that this part is not the work of Hippolytus, but it would be natural to conjecture that the treatise of Hippolytus might have at least furnished materials for the first two chapters of this book of the Apostolic Constitutions, which treat of Charismata. But these are just the chapters which do not bear the name of Hippolytus, and there are a number of verbal coincidences between these and the previous books of the Apostolic Constitutions (see Caspari, Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufsymbol, iii. 389), and none with the genuine works of Hippolytus. Still, the widely prevalent ascription of Apostolic Constitutions to Hippolytus makes it probable that the work whose title is given on the chair contained something of the kind. Jerome (Ep. 52, ad Lucinium, vol. i. p. 432) tells that Hippolytus had written on the questions whether Saturday ought to be a fast day, and whether the Eucharist ought to be received daily, questions which may well have been treated of in a work on church canons. The Syriac versions also ascribe Apostolic Canons to Hippolytus (Wright, Catal. Syr. MSS. ii. 949, 1033, 1037). Wansleb in 1572 published titles of thirty-eight canons which he found current in Egypt under the name of Abulides, but owned that he could not in the least conjecture who Abulides was. Subsequently he was identified with our Hippolytus, and these canons were published in full (Arabic, with Latin translation) by Haneberg in 1870. This editor maintains that they are correctly ascribed to Hippolytus, an opinion which he is not likely to succeed in establishing, though he has pointed out some things in the collection which probably date from the time when Christianity was still a persecuted religion. These canons describe Abulides as the first patriarch of the city of great Rome, and we see that some confusion has occurred in making Hippolytus take the place of Clement as a reporter of Apostolic Constitutions. It is likely that this function was attributed to Hippolytus in Egypt before the time of Palladius, and that it is in this way we are to account for his strange description of Hippolytus as an immediate disciple of the Apostles. And if we enquire further how the name of Hippolytus came to be prefixed to Apostolic Constitutions, no answer seems more probable than that the work Apostolic Tradition, whose title is given on the chair, really did give a collection of rules purporting to have been made by the Apostles.

(22) On the chair we have words, which have been read ῥῶτα εἰς πάσας τὰς γραφὰς. Instead of the first word Scaliger reads ῥῶτος, and Bunsen conjectures ὁμιλία. In no other case are two different works put down on the same line of the inscription, otherwise it would be most simple to understand the four last words of the line as referring to the exegetical works which extend over the whole of Scripture, and to infer from the word ῥῶτα that Hippolytus was the writer of Christian hymns. Thus, in the passage extracted by Eusebius from the Little Labyrinth, we have ψαλμοὶ καὶ ῥῶτα. If the line describes only a single work it may denote hymns, one in praise of each of the books of Scripture, and perhaps giving a poetical account of its contents. We pass now to the exegetical writings.

(23) On the Hexaemeron.—This work is given in the lists both of Eusebius and of Jerome. The latter states (Ep. 54, ad Pammach. et Ocean. vol. i. p. 525) that Ambrose had made use of it in his work on the same subject.

(24) εἰς τὰ μετὰ τὴν ἑξαήμερον (Euseb.). In Genesis (Jerome).—This is the book from which we suppose the account of the seventy-two nations of the earth to have been taken.

(25) On Exodus.—This we only know from Jerome's list. No quotations from it have been preserved, unless we adopt a doubtful suggestion by Magistris that Theodoret's citations from the λόγος εἰς τὴν ᾠδὴν τὴν μεγάλην are from a commentary on the Song of Moses (Ex. 15).

(26) There is extant a fragment (Lagarde, 51) of a commentary on "the blessings of Balaam;" and Trithemius also ascribes to Hippolytus a commentary on the book of Numbers. An Arabic catena on the Pentateuch, of which a portion was published by Fabricius, ii. 33-44, and more recently the whole of the book of Genesis by Lagarde, Materialien zur Kritik und Geschichte des Pentateuchs, contains numerous extracts from an Hippolytus whom it describes as the expounder of the Targum. It is as hard to say why our Hippolytus should be so described as to guess what other Hippolytus could be meant. There is a general assent of critics that the scholia do not belong to our Hippolytus. Bardenhewer, however (p. 33, vid. inf.), finds things in them which remind him of his manner, and thinks it possible that these notes may have worked up some materials really derived from Hippolytus.

(27, 28) Theodoret cites several passages from the Discourse on Elkanah and Hannah. Another part of the book of Samuel was the subject of a special treatise called by Jerome de Saul et Pythonissa, and in Greek εἰς τὴν ἐργαστριμυθον, for so an imperfect line on the chair is generally, as we believe, correctly completed. According to a fragment published by Magistris, Hippolytus maintained that Samuel did not really rise, but that a demon assumed his form, and by his own sagacity foretold Saul's death, though with a mistake as to the time. The opposite opinion was maintained by Origen.

Following the order of the books of the English Bible we come next to

(29) The Commentary on the Psalms.—The existence of this work is testified by Jerome, and also by the inscription on the chair. Yet elsewhere when writing to Augustine he gives a list of commentators on the Psalms (Ep. 112, vol. i. p. 754), he wholly leaves out Hippolytus, counting Eusebius as the next Greek commentator after Origen. We cannot say whether this was mere forgetfulness, or whether Jerome only read, of Hippolytus, homilies on particular Psalms, and some general observations on the whole book of Psalms. In his catalogue Jerome gives to the work of Hippolytus the title not, as in some other cases, In Psalmos but De Psalmis, which might suggest that the work of Hippolytus was not a commentary but only treated generally of the Psalms. Jerome however describes the work on Daniel, which certainly was a commentary, as De Daniele, and the Greek title of the work on the Psalms would seem to have been Εἰς τοὺς ψαλμοὺς. Theodoret quotes passages from the commentary on the 2nd, 23rd, and 24th Psalms, and on the ὡδὴ μεγάλη, which may mean the 119th Psalm. It is very possible these quotations may be from separate homilies, and not from the present work. A fragment published by Bandini comments on the 78th Psalm. Several other fragments of doubtful genuineness are given by Magistris (Migne, x. 722). Of more than doubtful genuineness is one (Lagarde, 125, p. 187) which purports to be introductory to the whole book, treating of the inscription, authorship, division, and order of the Psalms. Overbeck (p. 7) had given reasons for thinking this not to be the work of Hippolytus, but an Alexandrian composition later than the Hexapla of Origen.<sup>a</sup> And this may be said to be placed beyond doubt by the Syriac fragment (Lagarde, Anal. Syr. p. 83), which we accept as representing a genuine extract from the introduction of Hippolytus, and from which it appears that the writer of the Greek fragment had certainly made use of the introduction of Hippolytus, but had worked up his materials in his own way. For instance, the Syriac begins by telling how David's four chief singers had each under him seventy-two players on instruments, these mystically corresponding to the seventy-two nations among whom the earth was divided; thirty-two of Ham, twenty-five of Shem, fifteen of Japhet. This touches on a favourite discovery of Hippolytus (see Vol. I. p. 507). The same idea appears in the Greek (Lagarde, pp. 193, 194), but in a different place, and much less distinctly enunciated. Eusebius also reproduces it, but so indistinctly as to suggest that he did not take it directly from Hippolytus. Hippolytus classifies the Psalms according to their authors and inscriptions, and explains that they are all called David's, though he did not write them all, because he was the originator of the institution of temple psalmody, in the same way as the book of Esther is called after her, and not after Mordecai, of whom it has much more to tell, because Esther, by her act of self-sacrifice, was the originator of the whole deliverance. Hippolytus points out that the Psalms are not in chronological order, and accounts for this by the supposition that Ezra did not find them all at once, and that he placed them in books as he found them. The Greek, on the contrary, supposes that the chronological order was deranged in order to establish a mystical connexion between the number of a Psalm and its subject. Eusebius here follows Hippolytus.

(30) On Proverbs.—This work is mentioned in Jerome's list. Some fragments have been preserved in catenae (Lagarde, pp. 196–199). Lagarde has omitted fragments published by Mai (Bib. Nov. Pat. vii.). These will be found in Migne, p. 6. There are a few points of resemblance between these and the treatises on Antichrist and on the Universe, though not of a decisive character. Döllinger, p. 318, deduces the doctrine of Hippolytus on the Eucharist from two passages. The first is from the spurious part of the treatise against the Jews, No. 17. The second is from one of the present fragments on "Wisdom hath builded her house." Ritschl (Enst. Alt. Kirch. 2nd ed. p. 563) maintains that this also is spurious, holding that the framer of the catena only means to quote as from Hippolytus the two sentences, χριστὸς—περιθήμενος (lines 13–18, Lagarde). Further light has been thrown on the subject by the publication of a shorter version of the same fragment by Tischendorf (Anecdota Sacra, p. 227), whence it appears that all the Eucharistic language which we have a right to ascribe to Hippolytus is "He has given His divine flesh and His holy blood for us to eat and drink for the remission of sins."

(31) (32) Jerome enumerates a commentary on Ecclesiastes; both Eusebius and Jerome one on the Song of Songs. Lagarde gives one fragment from the former (No. 136, p. 200), and four from the latter (No. 35, p. 200; and Anal. Syr. p. 87). One of these states that Hezekiah suppressed the works of Solomon on natural history, because the people sought in them for the recovery of their diseases, instead of seeking for help from God.

(33) (34) (35) Jerome enumerates a commentary on Isaiah; Eusebius one on parts of Ezekiel. Assemani states (Bib. Or. i. 607) that there is Syriac testimony to the existence of one on Jeremiah. Possibly in the last case a mistake may have arisen from the citation of passages of Jeremiah explained in other works; as, for instance, Jer. xvii. 11, is explained in the treatise on Antichrist. Of the fragments remaining of these commentaries we may note a curious calculation, that whereas in the miracle of Joshua the day was lengthened by only twelve hours, in that of Hezekiah it was lengthened by twenty; viz. by the ten for which the sun went back, and the ten more by which it returned again; and also note that in expounding the four living creatures of Ezekiel (Lagarde, Anal. Syr. p. 90), while he follows Irenaeus in assigning one to each of the Evangelists, he does not, like him, assign the lion, the eagle, and the man to John, Mark, Matthew respectively, but, as has been done in later times, to Matthew, John, Mark.

(36) On Daniel.—This work is included in Jerome's list. It is the subject of an article by Photius; is quoted by several other writers, and large fragments of it remain. It is the subject of one of the most valuable of recent contributions to Hippolytine literature, a tract by Bardenhewer, Freiburg, 1877, in which he collects all the notices of this work, discusses the different extant fragments, and by their means restores the original as far as it is possible to do so. Catena quote passages from the commentary of Hippolytus on Susanna, but the early lists do not mention this as a separate treatise, and Bardenhewer is probably right in thinking that it was the commencement of the commentary on Daniel, to which book that of Susanna was commonly prefixed in bibles of the time. The list of Ebed-Jesu attributes to Hippolytus an exposition of Susanna and of Daniel the Little. This writer's list of Old Testament books includes Daniel, Susanna, and Daniel the Little. There is no evidence what is meant by the last: Bardenhewer conjectures the story of Bel and the Dragon. If this be so, no fragments of the commentary remain. The work was divided into books, for a portion of the commentary on the Song of the Three Children is quoted by Eustratius as from the second book; but we cannot tell the number of books, nor their arrangement. Some of the fragments make it probable that the work had been homiletic.

Hippolytus supposes Susanna to have been the daughter of the high priest Hilkiah (2 Kings xxii. 4), and sister to the prophet Jeremiah, and he probably, like Africanus, identified her husband with the Jehoiachin who was kindly treated by Evil-Merodach. But his interest is much less in the historical than in the typical explanation, for he was of the opinion so general with the Fathers, that the persons, institutions, and events of the Old Testament included, beside their literal meaning, a typical representation of things corresponding in the new dispensation. Susanna then was the Christian church; Joacim, her husband, represented Christ; the garden, the calling of the saints; Babylon, the world; and the two elders, the two peoples that plot against the church, viz. the Jews and the Gentiles. The bath was baptism; the two handmaids, faith in Christ and love to God, through which the church confesses and receives the laver. The passage throws some light on the baptismal usages of the time.

The remains of the commentary on our canonical Daniel contain a theory attested by Photius, that our Lord had come in the year of the world 5500, and that its end should be in the year 6000, that is to say, not until 500 years after the Incarnation. In Scripture proof of this calculation, Hippolytus appeals to the  $5\frac{1}{2}$  cubits which he finds in Ex. xxv. 10; to the sixth hour, John xix. 14, which denotes half a day or 500 years; and to Rev. xvii. 10. This 5500 years must be understood as round numbers, for the Chronicle of Hippolytus counts the exact number of years as 5502. An extant fragment on Daniel is more clearly at variance with the Chronicle in making our Lord's life thirty-three years. This must have arisen in a transcriber's correction, for however strange it is that Hippolytus, who attached such value to St. John's Gospel, should not have deduced from it a longer duration for our Lord's ministry, the Chronicle and the cycle on the chair agree in making His earthly life but thirty years. We must not wonder at the tendency of transcribers to alter the chronology, as they supposed for the better, when we find Bardenhewer himself proposing to alter the 245 years which the fragment gives for the kings of the Medes into 230. We learn from the Chronicle that 245 years was the computation of Hippolytus; 230 was that of Africanus. In explaining the seventy weeks of Daniel, Hippolytus divided them—seven weeks from the first year of Cyrus to the return of the people under Ezra, sixty-two weeks from Ezra to Christ, and one week at the end of the world. This interval between Ezra and Christ does not agree with historical calculation, and we have noticed (Vol. I. p. 507) the singular fact that Hippolytus was aware of this himself. Both in his Chronicle and in the cycle on the chair he gives 563 years for the interval between Ezra and Christ, while in the cycle he gives for the same interval, "according to Daniel," 433 years, but gives no hint what way he had of reconciling the discrepancy. We see that the commentary on Daniel must have been written before 224, which is the date we have assigned to the cycle, but how much earlier we cannot tell. Bardenhewer places it as early as 202, judging from the language which the commentary on Susanna uses as to the persecutions of the church. We are ourselves disposed to place it a good deal later. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 7) tells us that Judas, writing about 203, thought that Antichrist would immediately appear, for that the minds of the generality of Christians at the time were greatly disturbed by the violence of the persecution then raging. We think we must allow at least a dozen years to pass for the persecution to have spent its force, and the minds of Christians to cool down, before the theory was likely to suggest itself that the coming of Antichrist was still two or three centuries off.

(37) On Zechariah.—We only know of this work from the list of Jerome and from the prologue to his commentary on Zechariah.

(38) On Matthew.—We know of this work from the prologue to Jerome's commentary on Matthew; and Theodoret quotes from a discourse on the parable of the talents, which, however, may have been a separate homily. Bardenhewer claims for the treatise on Daniel a fragment which had been supposed to belong to the commentary on Matt. i. 11, and which states that Matthew, wishing to keep the descent of our Lord pure, skipped over the sons of Josiah and passed to his grandson Jechoniah. The five sons of Josiah are enumerated in the same way in the chronicle as in this fragment.

(39) On Luke.—Two fragments are given by Mai (Lagarde, p. 202), and Theodoret has preserved part of a homily on the two thieves.

(40) On the Apocalypse.—This work is in the list of Jerome, is mentioned by Jacob of Edessa (Eph. Syr. Opp. Syr. I. 192), and by Syncellus, 358. Some fragments of it are preserved in an Arabic Catena on the Apocalypse (Lagarde, Anal. Syr. app. pp. 24–27).<sup>o</sup> It appears that Hippolytus (who is described as pope of Rome) interpreted the woman (Rev. xii. 1) to be the church; the sun with which she is clothed, our Lord; the moon, John the Baptist; the twelve stars, the twelve apostles; the two wings on which she was to fly, hope and love. He understood the verse xii. 10 to speak, not of an actual swallowing up by the earth of the hostile armies, but only that they wandered about in despair. He understood by the wound of the beast (xiii. 3) the contempt and refusal of obedience with which Antichrist would be received by many on his first appearance; and by the healing of it the subsequent submission of the nations. The two horns (xiii. 11) are the law and the prophets, for this beast will be a lamb outwardly, though inwardly a ravening wolf. Of the number of the beast, besides the Irenæan solutions, Lateinos, Euanthas, and Teitan, he gives one of his own, Dantialos, a name possibly suggested by the theory that antichrist was to be of the tribe of Dan. The kings of the East (xvi. 12) come to the support of Antichrist. Armageddon is the valley of Jehoshaphat. The five kings (xvii. 13) are Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius, Alexander, and his four successors. The next is the Roman empire, whose time was not yet completed; the seventh, who had not yet come, was Antichrist.

This enumeration includes all the works that, there is evidence, were composed by Hippolytus, unless we add the letters which it would seem Eusebius was acquainted with. We reject the story of the virgin of Antioch and Magistrianus, ascribed to Hippolytus by Palladius (Lagarde, p. 204). It is the same story as that of Theodora and Didymus (Ruinart, p. 396). Ambrose agrees with Palladius in laying the scene at Antioch. It is sufficient to mention the tracts on the twelve apostles and on the seventy disciples. For other spurious works see Lumper viii. 107. The list of genuine writings, however, is quite long enough to establish the immense literary activity of Hippolytus, especially as an interpreter of Scripture; and though the samples we have incidentally given are enough to shew how different were his principles of interpretation from those of our time, he was not in respect to them at variance with the general opinion of his own age, and no doubt his labours must have given a great impulse to the study of God's word. As a writer he must be pronounced active rather than able or painstaking; Diels describes his work as usually "minimo labore aliunde surreptum"; the service which he does us in reporting the contents of lost writings is often marred by the unskilfulness with which he makes his abstracts; he forms his own opinions rashly, pronounces them dogmatically, and adheres to them obstinately. Yet when every drawback has been made, he must be owned to be deserving of the reverence which his literary labours gained for him from his contemporaries, and of the honour paid him at his death. For centuries afterwards his name was obscured; but his glory blazed out again when in the time of Charlemagne his relics were transferred to France. For some interesting particulars of this translation see Benson, Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, i. 190. We bring this article to a close by quoting his account of the visit of pope Alexander III. to his shrine in the church of St. Denys in 1159. "On the threshold of one of the chapels he paused to ask 'Whose relics it contained?' 'Those of St. Hippolytus,' was the answer. 'I don't believe it, I don't believe it, non credo, non credo,' replied the infallible authority. 'The bones of St. Hippolytus were never removed from the holy city.' But St. Hippolytus, whose dry bones apparently had as little reverence for the spiritual progeny of Zephyrinus and Callistus as the ancient bishop's tongue and pen had manifested towards these saints themselves, was so very angry that he rumbled his bones inside the reliquary with a noise like thunder, 'ut rugitus tonitruui putaretur.' To what lengths he might have gone if rattling had not sufficed we dare not conjecture. But the pope, falling on his knees, exclaimed in terror, 'I believe, O my Lord Hippolytus, I believe, pray be quiet. Credo domine Hippolyte credo, jam quiesce.' And he built an altar of marble there to appease the disquieted saint."

Literature.—A collected edition of the remains of Hippolytus was first published by Fabricius in two volumes, Hamburg, 1716, 1718. They have been since published in Galland, Bibl. Vet. Pat. vol. ii. and in Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. x. The edition generally referred to in this article is Lagarde's, Leipzig and London, 1858. Lagarde has also published some Syriac and Arabic fragments in his Analecta Syriaca and Appendix. A few fragments omitted by Lagarde will be found in Migne. Articles on Hippolytus are to be found in Tillemont, vol. iv.; Ceillier, vol. i.; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vii. 183, ed. Harles, where is to be found the best account of the older bibliography; and Lumper, vol. viii. where is reprinted Ruggieri's essay on Hippolytus. Separate dissertations on Hippolytus have been written by Hänel, de Hippolyto Scriptore, 1838, and Kimmel, de Vita et Scriptis Hippolyti, 1839. Caspari's list already referred to supersedes these earlier lists. The discovery of the "Refutation" made a good deal of the older literature antiquated. We have referred in the section on that work to some of the more important of the writings which that discovery elicited. The more important of the special dissertations on the other works have been referred to under their respective sections. [G. S.]

HIPPOLYTUS (3)—Aug. 22. According to Baronius a bishop of Portus, and martyr by drowning under the emperor Alexander Severus. On Aug. 24 he commemorates St. Aurea, who was flung into the sea, and whose body was buried by the blessed Nonnus, which was the original name of Hippolytus before he was baptized, according to the Greek text of the Acts of St. Aurea, or Chryse, published by Magistris in 1795, so that Baronius buries St. Aurea by means of a man who was executed two days before. Döllinger, in Hippolytus and Callistus, pp. 39–48, minutely criticizes the story. His theory is that the Acts of St. Aurea are the production of a romancing Greek of the 6th century, or later. The heroine of the history is an imperial princess—Aurea. The persecutors are the emperor Claudius and the prefect of the city Ulpianus Romanus. In the Acts the first Claudius appears to be meant, as they make one of the actors, Censorius, say, “Christ in our days hath come down into the world.” The prefect tortured and scourged the princess at Ostia, and finally threw her into the sea with a stone round her neck. The holy Nonnus, however, who is also called Hippolytus, draws her corpse out of the water, buries her before the gates of Ostia, reproaches the prefect, and is by his command bound hand and foot and drowned in a pit near the town walls of Portus, whereupon, for the space of an hour, voices as of children were heard to cry, “Thanks be to God.” The Acts of St. Aurea were accessible only in Latin in Mombritius till the Greek edition was published in 1795. The Greek text is, in Döllinger’s opinion, the original, and the source whence the later Greeks and Baronius derived their idea that Hippolytus the presbyter was bishop of Portus. They are of course of no direct historical value. [CHRYSE.] [G. T. S.]

HIPPOLYTUS (4)—Dec. 2. A martyr noted by the Roman Mart. and Baronius. He is said to have lived an ascetic life in a cave outside the city. His sister Paulina and her husband Hadrias having been baptized, they were condemned by the judge Secundianus to torture and death. But the Acts of these martyrs are worthless, as Pearson has shewn in Annal. Cypr. Döllinger discusses the case of this martyr in Hippolytus and Callistus, p. 48. [G. T. S.]

HIPPOLYTUS (5)—Aug. 10 (Bas. Men.), Aug. 13 (Mart. Vet. Rom., Usuard.). An apocryphal martyr, invented in the 5th or 6th century. His story, as given in the martyrology of Ado, is taken from the spurious acts of St. Laurentius the Roman archdeacon, where we are told that upon the arrest of that saint he was delivered by the prefect Valerian into the custody of Hippolytus, a high military officer, who was converted by the numerous miracles which St. Laurentius performed, and was at once baptized by him. He then emancipated his slaves, and performed the funeral rites of St. Laurentius on the third day after his martyrdom, for which he was summoned before the emperor, who asked him if he had turned magician in carrying off the body of Laurentius, to which he replied that he had done it not as a magician but as a Christian. The emperor thereupon ordered his family, his servants, and his nurse, Concordia, to be beheaded without the walls at the Porta Tiburtina, and himself to be torn asunder by wild horses. According to the Acta Laurentii, the wife and daughter of the emperor Decius, Tryphonia and Cyrilla, seeing the emperor horribly tormented by a demon for his cruelty to Hippolytus and his family, earnestly sought baptism, whereupon Tryphonia forthwith died in peace, while Cyrilla was strangled. Döllinger, in Hippolytus and Callistus (Plummer’s transl.), pp. 28–39 and 51–60, discusses the rise and development of this legend, which has largely helped to confuse the story of the genuine Hippolytus, the Roman presbyter and writer of the 3rd century. His theory concerning the martyr is briefly this. St. Laurentius was buried on the Via Tiburtina. There, in the 5th century or probably earlier, a church had been erected in his honour, near to which the presbyter Hippolytus had also been buried. Later on this person was forgotten, at any rate became unknown to the vulgar. Some heathen monument, on which the tragical end of the son of Theseus of that name was sculptured may have been found in the neighbourhood, and been supposed by the Christians to represent his martyrdom. Possibly it was even the name alone with which the current story, still under the influence of heathen recollections, connected itself, and gave us the saint torn to pieces and mangled by horses (Cf. Bunsen’s Christianity and Mankind, i. 426). A tombstone with the name of Concordia was then assigned to the nurse of Hippolytus, who was also made into a martyr, while a room found there became the prison where Hippolytus had kept Laurentius. In the Notitia of the 9th century we therefore read, “Inde in Boream sursum in monte Basilica Sancti Hipoliti est, ubi ipse cum familia sua tota xix. Mart. jacet. Carcer ibi est, in qua Laurentius. Ibi est Trifonia uxor Decii Caesaris et Cyrilla filia ejus; inter utrasque Concordia et Sanctus Genesis et multi martyres ibi sunt.” Döllinger fixes the composition of this story between the time of pope Liberius and that of Leo the Great, a period of about seventy years. The oldest document in which this mythical martyr appears, may have been the semi-heathen, semi-Christian calendar of Polemius Sylvius, which falls within the year 448. Among the few saints’ days noted therein, we find the martyrdom of Laurentius and Hippolytus on Aug. 13. The whole subject is in a state of great confusion in the martyrologies, which Döllinger has striven, with his usual critical power and vast knowledge, to arrange in some consistent order. At the same time the impartial reader must feel sorely perplexed between the opposing theories of Döllinger and Bunsen. (Cf. for the more modern traditions on the subject of this martyr, Aug. Hare’s Walks in Rome, ii. 139.) [G. T. S.]

HIPPOLYTUS (6), the bearer of a letter to Rome from Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vi. 45). It was doubtless an imperfect recollection of this Hippolytus which caused Baronius, who is followed by others, to imagine a connexion between Hippolytus Romanus and Clement of Alexandria. [G. S.]

but being restored by grace of Christ, returned to the church, for which he died as an illustrious martyr." Of this martyr Döllinger (Hippol. and Callist. pp. 48, 49, 50) thus disposes: "He never existed at all, although he is mentioned in Martyrologies, especially from the 9th century onwards. An Hippolytus of Antioch is entirely unknown to any Greek authorities, even to St. Chrysostom, who, being himself of Antioch, so constantly mentions things and persons in his native city. The name of Hippolytus of Antioch is not found in any of the Martyrologies which have come down to us from times prior to the 8th century. All statements respecting him go back to the so-called Martyrology of Jerome, a compilation which notoriously is not the work of that doctor of the church, and which we know only in the condition in which it was in the 8th century, with no lack of mistakes, confusions, and reduplications. But how did this fictitious presbyter of Antioch get into this compilation? From the Chronicle of Ensebius, translated by Jerome, which formed the basis of the Martyrology, and whose short notice of Hippolytus gave occasion to the error. In his Chronicle we read under the year 250, Geminus presbyter Antiochenus et Hippolytus et Beryllus Episcopus Arabie Bostrenus, clari scriptores habentur. Nothing being known of Geminus and the et having dropped out of the manuscript, the Presbyter Antiochenus was appropriated to the more celebrated name of Hippolytus. Thus has arisen the presbyter Hippolytus of Antioch, who is utterly unknown to the Greeks, and out of whom also Ado, by transferring to him the well-known narrative of Prudentius (Peristephan.), made a Novatianist." (Cf. Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind, i. 428.) Döllinger's theory about this martyr must however collapse in presence of the fact that the ancient Syrian Martyrology published by Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature for Oct. 1865 and Jan. 1866, notes at Jan. 30, Hippolytus, a martyr in the city of Antioch. The manuscript from which Wright took the Martyrology was transcribed in the year of the Greeks 723, i.e. A.D. 412. He fixes the date of its composition to the end of the fourth century. There is no mention however of his Novatianism in the Syrian Martyrology. (Journ. Sac. Lit. Oct. 1865, p. 45.) Hippolytus of Antioch may possibly have been the messenger sent by Dionysius of Alexandria to Rome with an Epistle about the office of deacons. He may have attended the synod of Antioch to which Dionysius mentions that he had been invited (Euseb. H. E. vi. 46). This synod was rejected for its decision on rebaptism of heretics by Stephen bishop of Rome. This may account for Hippolytus being called a Novatian in Western martyrologies like Usuard and Ado, (Euseb. H. E. vii. 5; Hefele, Councils, lib. i. cap. i. sec. 6), as Novatian was very strict on points of rebaptism (Cyprian, Ep. lxxiii.). [G. T. S.]

HIPPLYTUS (8)—Feb. 3. A martyr, according to Baronius, in Africa with Felix Symphronius, and others, possibly about the time of Cyprian. (Mart. Rom.) [G. T. S.]

HIPPLYTUS (9), notary of the Roman see, sent by Gregory the Great with letters to queen Theodelinda. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iv. indict. iii. 2, 4; Migne, lxxvii. 669, 671.) [A. H. D. A.]

HIPPLYTUS (10), bishop of Lodi 759 to 761. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xii. 287.) [A. H. D. A.]

HIPPONICUS, a Keeper of the Records (scrianiarius), to whom St. Nilus addressed a letter in which he says that many pray to God to deliver them from their bodies, as though the body dragged the soul into sin, in spite of a man's will; but that they should rather pray for deliverance from their evil habits and desires. (Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Ecclés. viii. 217; Nilus, Epist. i. 137.) [I. G. S.]

HIREBERTUS, bishop. [HIMBERTUS.]

HIRENA, HIRENE. [IRENE.]

HIRMYNHILDA (Elmham, ed. Hardwicke, p. 296; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 246), abbess. [EORMENGILDA.] [C. H.]

HIRUNDINUS, bishop of Misua, in Proconsular Africa, was banished to Corsica by Huneric after the convention at Carthage, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 231.) [R. S. G.]

HISACIUS (Anast. Hist. Eccl. ex Theoph. 56, Bonn, 1841), confessor. [ISAACIUS.] [J. G.]

HISCIPIO (HISPICIO), sixth in the series of the bishops of Carcassonne, his predecessors being unknown for more than a century. He subscribed the council of Narbonne held in 788, and is said to have lived till 798. He was succeeded by Rogerius. (Mansi, xiii. 823; Gall. Christ. vi. 864.) [S. A. B.]

HISERMUNDUS, bishop of Rieti, c. 773. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 302.)

[A. H. D. A.]
HISMAELIS, Welsh saint. [ISMAEL.]

HISTOPODES. Suggested by Gothofred, and adopted by Suicer, as the true reading, instead of "Spadones" in the Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 17. The edict relates to the Eumoniiani, who certainly were no "Spadones" (Epiph. H. lxxvi., Theodoret. Haer. Fab. iv. 3; Aug. de Haer. liv.). Gothofred accounts for the application of the epithet ἱστοπόδες to these heretics by their practice of immersing the head first when administering baptism (Epiph. u. s.), and explains it by "Pederectus" or "Erectipedes" (not. in d. l. Suicer, Thesaur. s. v. Ἀναβάπτισις, i. a. Εὐνόμιος, i. 4). [T. W. D.]

HISTORIANS, ECCLESIASTICAL. In this article only writers of ecclesiastical histories properly so called are included, together with a few writers of important biographies, such as almost amount to ecclesiastical histories. Writers of mere Chronica are treated elsewhere [CHRONICA]. A fuller account of each ecclesiastical historian, together with complete lists of their works and the best editions of them, is given under their respective names. Here only the historical works of each writer are noticed.

With the partial exception of Hegeppus, nothing like a history of the church or any branch of it seems to have been attempted during the first three centuries; for of the Chronicles of Julius Africanus and Judas (Eus. H. E. VI. xxxi. 2, vii. 1) we know too little to say whether they were in any degree of the nature of an ecclesiastical history. Several causes contributed to this:—1. The prevalent belief that Christ would soon return to judgment; 2. The pressure of the work of converting the world; 3. The comparative scarcity of literary ability in the church; 4. The insecurity of life hindering study. Not till the 4th century does the writing of ecclesiastical history really begin. Eusebius, the father of it, was followed by Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret simultaneously in the East, by Rufinus and Jerome in the West. But the great writers of the 4th century wrote to settle the burning questions of their own day, whether of doctrine or of discipline, rather than to record events. The greatest names are not among the writers of church history. The controversies of the 5th and 6th centuries produced at least six ecclesiastical historians in the East; but, excepting fragments, only the work of Evagrius has survived. During the 6th and 7th centuries, the passion for Lives of Saints prevailed both in East and West, and was most prejudicial to sober history.<sup>b</sup> The West, moreover, had returned to semi-barbarism, and its literature was under the discouraging influence of Gregory I. Scarcely anything original was produced. Liberatus and Gregory of Tours are almost the only writers of ecclesiastical history, the Tripartite History of Cassiodorus being merely a compilation from the Greek. Isidore of Seville has varied learning, but very little originality; his successors have still less. Both learning and originality revive a century later in Beda, in whose age almost all the best writers, with the exception of a few Franks and Italians, came from Britain. In the West the practice of writing church history may be said to have spread from the centre of the empire to the extremities, and then to have returned to the centre again. From Rufinus in Italy we pass to Sulp. Severus, Hilary of Arles, Gennadius, Gregory of Tours, and Fortunatus in Gaul; thence to Isidore, Ildefonsus, and Julianus in Spain; then to Beda in Britain; and finally to Paulus Diaconus in Italy again. From early in the 7th century till long after the close of the 9th there was no writer of church history in the East. In the whole of the mediæval period Nicephorus Callisti is the only name worth mentioning. Indeed for more than a century and a half (630–800) there is no Greek historian or annalist of any description, a fact perhaps without a parallel in the literary history of any highly civilised people. The materials for the ecclesiastical historian of this period must be gleaned from the acts of councils, the didactic and polemical works of theologians, and a few original letters.

The Greek writers of ecclesiastical history in the first eight centuries will first be given in chronological order, and then the Latin writers. To each series is appended a list of writers of profane history during the same period, together with their dates and the period covered by their works: much material for the ecclesiastical historian is to be found in them, and sometimes in them only.

HEGESIPPUS, c. A.D. 120–185. A converted Jew, who traced a parallel between Jewish sects and Christian heresies, and made the first beginnings of ecclesiastical history. Works—(1) His ὑπομνήματα in five books have perished, with the exception of nine fragments, eight preserved by Eusebius and one by Photius (collected by Routh, Rel. Sacr. i. p. 207; also in Grabe's Spi-cilegium). (2) That Hegesippus wrote a work on the succession of the bishops of Rome is an opinion that rests on a rendering of Eus. H. E. IV. xvii. 3; γενόμενος δὲ ἐν Ῥώμῃ διαδοχὴν ἐποιήσαμην μέχρις Ἀνικίτου. Διαδοχὴν, the reading of the MSS. is said to mean a list or catalogue. Rufinus may indicate that the reading in his time was διατριβήν. He translates permansit ibi.

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, or PAMPHILI, c. A.D. 263–340. The “Christian Herodotus” and “Father of Ecclesiastical History,” an honour justly claimed by himself (H. E. I. i. 4). Of Western Christianity he knew comparatively little. [EUSEBIUS (23), p. 324.] For gaining information about the church in the East he had almost unrivalled advantages. He had large personal experience, and Constantine placed at his disposal the archives of the empire, especially those throwing light on the persecutions. Papias, Hegesippus, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria had given accounts of various scenes in church history, more or less intermixed with doctrinal and other matter. Eusebius was the first to attempt a united and complete history, into which he introduced large quotations from the writings of other authors. Works—(1) Ecclesiastical History (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία) in ten books, from Jesus Christ to the death of the emperor Licinius, A.D. 324. For that period Eusebius stands alone; his successors shew their respect by leaving his ground untouched. (2) The Martyrs of Palestine (περὶ τῶν ἐν Παλαιστίνῃ μαρτυρησάντων).—On the persecutions under Diocletian and Maximin, A.D. 303–310; usually placed as an appendix to book viii. of the Ecclesiastical History. (3) Life of Constantine (εἰς τὸν βίον τοῦ μακαρίου Κωνσταντίνου βασιλέως λόγος τέσσαρες). A panegyric rather than a biography, but full of information not found elsewhere (see Heinichen's 23rd Meletema, iii. p. 754). (4) The Chronicle (Χρονικῶν κανόνων παντοδαπῆ ἱστορία) gave a sketch of universal history down to A.D. 325. (5) The Life of Pamphilus, his friend and patron, is lost. (6) The Martyrium Collectio (ἡ τῶν μαρτυρίων συναγωγὴ), said to have been in eleven books, is also lost. It was a larger work than the Martyrs of Palestine, treating of martyrdoms throughout the empire.

DOROTHEUS, said by Theophanes to have been bishop of Tyre, martyred under Julian, and writer of many works on ecclesiastical history. Neither Eusebius nor Jerome mentions him.

ATHANASIUS (ST.), c. A.D. 296–371. Works—(1) Historia Arianorum ad Monachos, written between A.D. 355 and 360, and not now extant as a whole. (2) Vita Antonii, written after the death of St. Antony (A.D. 356), probably about A.D. 365.

GELASIVS, c. A.D. 320–394. Bishop of Caesarea. He wrote a continuation to the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, the preface to which was known to Photius. Gelasius of Cyzicus perhaps refers to it (Hist. Conc. Nicaen. i. 7). See below on Rufinus.

PHILOGORGIUS, c. A.D. 368–430, of Borissus, in Cappadocia. His Ecclesiastical History in twelve books was to a large extent a defence of Arianism as the original form of Christianity. It was thus a very early instance of history written for a controversial purpose. It extended from about A.D. 318 to 423. Only one considerable extract made by Photius, and a few fragments preserved in Suidas and elsewhere, survive, together with an analysis of the whole by Photius. It is valuable as giving the Arian view stated by an Arian.

PALLADIUS, c. A.D. 367–431, bishop of Helenopolis. Whether he is the same person as Palladius, the author of the Lausiac History, will be found discussed elsewhere. For convenience, both works are noticed here. (1) Historia Lausiaca (ἡ πρὸς Λαύσανα τὸν πραιπόσιτον ἱστορία περιέχουσα βίους ὁσίων πατέρων). A collection of biographical notices or anecdotes of ascetics. (2) Dialogus Historicus Palladii episcopi Helenopolis cum Theodoro Ecclesiae Romanae Diacono, de vita et conversatione Beati Joannis Chrysostomi, episcopi Constantinopolis. A vindication of Chrysostom, containing valuable information.

PHILIPPUS SIDITES, fl. c. A.D. 425. A presbyter of Side. He was thrice a candidate for the patriarchate of Constantinople; and, after his first failure, gave vent to a good deal of spleen in his Christian History (Ἱστορία Χριστιανική). This was a voluminous work in thirty-six books, extending from the creation to A.D. 428. Socrates gives some account of it (E. H. VII. xxvii.). Only three fragments remain.

IRENAEUS, Count of the empire and imperial commissioner at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he sided with the Nestorians. He was made bishop of Tyre, A.D. 444, and deposed by Theodosius II., A.D. 448. Whereupon he wrote an elaborate history of the council—Tragoedia seu Commentarii de rebus in Synodo Ephesina ac in Oriente gestis, in which the orthodox were roughly handled and the Nestorians glorified. The original Greek is lost, but parts of a Latin translation remain. They were published by Lupus at Louvain, 1682, under the title Variorum Patrum Epistolae ad Consilium Ephesinum pertinentes.

SOCRATES. His Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία in seven books covers 134 years, from Constantine to Theodosius II. A.D. 306–439; thus overlapping Eusebius, in order to supplement him, by twenty years. It gives an account of a very eventful and troubled period, the history of the first three general councils. Like Eusebius, he has enriched his work with large quotations from original documents. See Holzhausen, de omnibus quibus Socrates, Sozomenus ac Theodoretus si sunt. Gottingae, 1825.

SOZOMENUS. His Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία in nine books is imperfect, leaving off in the middle of a chapter. It extends from A.D. 323 to 423. As compared with Socrates his style is superior, his ability inferior. It is commonly supposed that Socrates' work appeared first, and this is probable; although the similarity between the two histories might be accounted for by the authors using the same materials. Sometimes one, sometimes the other has more detail. Sozomen has much about hermits and monks, his family having been converted by Hilarion (l. i.). He does not mention Socrates among his predecessors, when he names Clemens (i.e. the author of the Clementina), Hegesippus, Africanus, and Eusebius. He incorporates few original documents.

THEODORET, c. A.D. 386–458. Opponent of Cyril of Alexandria, and one of the most learned theologians of his age. Works—(1) Ecclesiastical History (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία λόγοι πέντε), intended as a continuation of Eusebius. It begins with Constantine, and ends with the death of Theodore of Mopsuestia, A.D. 325–429, but was not completed till after A.D. 444. It is very learned and impartial, and though shorter is superior to the contemporary works of Socrates and Sozomen. It is quite independent of the other two. Theodoret is rich in information respecting the patriarchate of Antioch, and specially wanting in chronological data. (2) Religiosa Historia (Φιλόθεος ἱστορία ἡ ἀσκητικὴ πολιτεία). Biographies of thirty hermits and monks; a very inferior work, written in extravagant admiration of asceticism, for the most part from personal observation. (3) Haereticarum Fabularum Epitome (Ἀρετικῆς κακομυθίας ἐπιτομή) in five books, a history of heresies in a polemical form.

HESYCHIUS OF JERUSALEM, d. A.D. 434. A good many of the works of Hesychius are extant; but some, including his Ecclesiastical History, are lost. He is mentioned among historians, Chron. Pasch. i. p. 680, ed. Bonn., and an extract, still extant, was read at the second council of Constantinople.

GELASIIUS OF CYZICUS, fl. c. A.D. 475. Chiefly known for his History of the Nicene Council (Σύνταγμα τῶν κατὰ τὴν ἐν Νικαίᾳ ἀγίαν σύνοδον πραχθέντων), in three parts, written to expose the Eutychians. The third part is mutilated. On this and other small histories of the council of Nicaea, see Hefele, History of Councils, i. p. 263, English edition.

BASILIIUS CILIX, fl. c. A.D. 500. His Ecclesiastical History in three books is lost. Photius knew the second book, which extended from A.D. 483 to 518. It was written from a Nestorian point of view and contained a great many original documents.

ZACHARIAS RHETOR, fl. c. A.D. 540, bishop of Meletine. His Ecclesiastical History, extending from c. A.D. 450 to 491, is often quoted and censured for Nestorian leanings by Evagrius. Considerable remains of an anonymous Syriac history are claimed by Assemani (Biblioth. Orient. ii. p. 53) as a translation, or even the original, of Zacharias's History.

JOANNES AEGEATES. A presbyter of Aegae, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History in ten books, extending from c. A.D. 430 to 477. He was an admirer of Dioscorus and of the proceedings at the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449. The loss of such a work by an avowed Eutychian is much to be regretted.

THEODORUS LECTOR. A reader in the great church at Constantinople in the time of Justin I. (A.D. 518–527) or Justinian I. (A.D. 527–565), according to general belief. But if all the fragments reasonably assigned to him are his, he must have lived nearly 200 years later, under Philippicus, 711-713. Theodorus is quoted by Joannes Damascenus and Theophanes, and in the acts of the 7th general council—all later than 713. Works—(1) Ecclesiastical History, in two books, from Theodosius II., where Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret end, to Justin I. Some extracts preserved by Nicephorus Callistus, and a few smaller fragments remain. It is doubtful whether Nicephorus had the whole work. (2) Selections from Ecclesiastical Histories (Ἐκλογὴ ἐκ τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν ἱστοριῶν) in two books. A compendium of church history, compiled like the Tripartite History of Cassiodorus from Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoret, and extending from Constantine to the death of Constantius II. (A.D. 361). Joannes Damascenus and others speak of the two as one work in four books. The Ἐκλογὴ exists in MS., but being mainly a compilation is of little value except for determining readings in Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoret.

CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS, fl. c. A.D. 550. A monk of Palestine. He wrote lives of St. Euthymius, St. John the Silentiary, St. Sabas, and other monks.

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, c. A.D. 356-600. a pleader, probably at Antioch. Works—(1) Ecclesiastical History, in six books, extending from A.D. 431-594. It is avowedly a continuation of Theodoret, Sozomen, and Socrates (I. i.), and is specially valuable for the history of the Nestorian and Monophysite controversies, being the only historical work produced by those controversies which has come down to us entire; but it contains a great deal of purely secular history. (2) A volume mentioned in the Eccles. Hist., but no longer extant, of Memorials, Letters, Decrees, Orations, and Disputations.

JOANNES MOSCHUS, c. 610. A monk of Palestine who visited a large number of monasteries both in East and West, and then wrote a history of monks called Λειμών, or Λειμωνῶνριον, or Νέος Παράδεισος, Pratum Spirituale, Vivarium, or Hortulus novus. It is written in imitation of the Laisic History of Palladius, and throws valuable light on oriental monachism.

In the following list of Greek writers of secular history in the first eight centuries, the approximate date of the writer is placed first, and then in brackets the approximate limits of the period covered by his history.

- Josephus, A.D. 37-98 (B.C. 170-A.D. 73).
 Dion Cassius, A.D. 155-235 (B.C. 700-A.D. 229, incomplete).
 Herennius Dexippus, A.D. 220-280 (to A.D. 263, extracts and fragments).
 Eunapius, A.D. 347-415 (A.D. 270-404, extracts and fragments).
 Zosimus, A.D. 370-430 (Augustus to A.D. 410).
 Olympiodorus, fl. A.D. 425 (A.D. 407-425, epitome by Photius).
 Priscus Panites, A.D. 420-471 (A.D. 445-447, extracts and fragments).
 Malchus, fl. A.D. 495 (A.D. 473-480, extracts and fragments).
 Petrus Patricius, A.D. 500-562 (Augustus to A.D. 350, extracts).
 Procopius, A.D. 500-565 (A.D. 408-553).
 Agathias, A.D. 536-582 (A.D. 553-558).
 Paulus Silentiarius, fl. A.D. 563 (A.D. 563).
 Menander, fl. A.D. 580 (A.D. 558-583, extracts and fragments).
 Theophylactus Simocatta, fl. A.D. 620 (A.D. 582-602).

Latin Writers.

LACTANTIUS, c. 250-325. Reputed author of De Mortibus Persecutorum. It sketches the persecutions from Nero to Diocletian in order to shew that all the chief persecutors came to a bad end. In spite of the obvious bias of the work it is accurate and trustworthy.

RUFINUS, c. A.D. 345-410. His works are some original, some translations from the Greek. (1) The Historiae Ecclesiasticae Libri XI are partly the one and partly the other. The first nine books are a loose translation of Eusebius, through which Eusebius was for centuries known to the West. The last two books (down to the death of Theodosius) are original. (2) Historia Eremitica s. Vitae Patrum, lives of 33 Nitrian hermits, long ascribed to Jerome. Of the inaccuracy of Rufinus as a historian readers of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. Praef. ad Lib. II. and cap. i.) are well aware. His partiality is extreme, and his credulity great.

HIERONYMUS, commonly called JEROME, c. A.D. 342-420. The most learned of the Latin fathers. Works—(1) De Viris Illustribus or De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis contains 135 short biographies of the most eminent fathers of the church from St. Peter to Jerome himself, with lists of their writings. It was written A.D. 392-393. It contains much information not found elsewhere, and meagre as some of the notices are the value of the whole can scarcely be overrated. (2) Lives of the hermits Paul, Hilarion, and Malchus, sometimes placed among his Epistles. Several of his epistles are really biographies, e.g. those on the deaths of Neponatian, Lucinius, Lea, Blasilla, Paulina, Paula, and Marcella. All are written in praise of asceticism. (3) A free translation and continuation of the Chronicon of Eusebius, a principal source of historical knowledge in the West during the middle ages, dictated A.D. 380.

SULPICIOUS SEVERUS, c. A.D. 363-420. A monk under St. Martin of Tours, intimate with Paulinus of Nola and Jerome. The "Christian Sallust." Works—(1) Vita S. Martini Turonensis, written about A.D. 400. (2) Historia Sacra, from the creation to A.D. 400, finished c. A.D. 403. It is not without merit, though full of all kinds of mistakes. It contains valuable information about the Priscillianists. (3) Dialogi duo, sometimes arranged as three. Written c. A.D. 405. An account of oriental hermits on one side and of St. Martin on the other, with some notice of the controversy about Origen.

OROSIUS, c. 400-420. A Spanish presbyter active in the Priscillianist and Pelagian controversies. Works—(1) Commonitorium ad Augustinum, an account of religious parties in Spain, written in Africa, c. A.D. 413. (2) Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII. Written at Augustine's suggestion to shew that the present calamities [ALARIC] were not sent by the gods as a judgment for the overthrow of the old religion, but were only such as have been "common to men" in all ages. It extends from Adam to A.D. 417; but excepting the last part it is a mere blundering compilation from third-rate authorities. Its style it imitates Tertullian and Cyprian. It was much read in the middle ages; hence MSS. of it abound.

Bishop of Arles, A.D. 429. His Vita S. Honorati Arlatensis Episcopi is a panegyric on his tutor and predecessor in the see, the founder of the monastery of Lérins.

GENNADIUS, fl. c. A.D. 490. A semi-Pelagian presbyter of Marseilles. He continued Jerome's work De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis by adding 100 short lives of ecclesiastical writers from A.D. 392 to about 495. Like Jerome, he ends with himself. The existing text is suspected of being interpolated.

LIBERATUS, fl. c. A.D. 535. Archdeacon of Carthage. His Breviarium is a concise and valuable history of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies for 125 years, A.D. 428-553. It is compiled mainly from original documents.

CASSIODORUS, c. 465. Chief minister of the Ostrogothic kingdom in Italy till its overthrow by Belisarius A.D. 539. Works—(1) Chronicon, a compilation, made for Theodoric, from Eusebius, Jerome, Prosper, &c. (2) Historiae Ecclesiasticae Tripartitae Libri XII., a compilation from Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoret, whose Ecclesiastical Histories were translated for Cassiodorus by his friend Epiphanius Scholasticus. From it and Rufinus, the West for nearly 1000 years derived all that it knew of the early church. The popularity of this epitome, contrasted with the fate of that of Theodorus Lector (see above), marks the comparative state of learning in West and East. (3) Libri XII. de rebus gestis Gothorum—Only the abridgment by Jornandes survives, enough to shew how regrettable is the loss of the original.

GREGORIUS TURONENSIS. The "Father of French History." Bishop of Tours A.D. 573. Works—(1) Miraculorum Libri VII., containing the Miracles of S. Martin in four books, the Glory of the Martyrs in two, and the Glory of Confessors in one. (2) De Vitis Patrum. Lives of monks. (3) Historia Ecclesiastica Francorum (less well called Historia or Gesta Francorum), in ten books. Following Eusebius and Jerome he begins with the Creation, but in the first book reaches A.D. 397; the remaining nine books cover A.D. 397 to 591. His last and best work; it is specially important for the history of discipline in the ancient Gallican church, but is a good deal spoiled by the credulity of the author. All that he narrates as a contemporary is most valuable for the history of a period of which the materials are scanty.

VENANTIUS FORTUNATUS, c. 530-605. Bishop of Poitiers and friend of Gregory of Tours. Works—(1) Life of S. Martin, in four books, in verse. (2) Lives of eight or ten Gallic saints, in prose.

GILDAS, fl. c. A.D. 560. Author of De Excidio Britanniae Liber Querulus. These Complaints refer to the ruinous condition of Britain after the English conquest.

ISIDORUS HISPALENSIS, bishop of Seville, c. A.D. 600-636. A man of enormous learning for his age and country and of great ability. Works—(1) A continuation of the De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis of Jerome and Gennadius, adding (according to the older editions) 33 lives, from Hosius of Cordova (d. c. A.D. 359) to Maximus bishop of Saragossa. But in the Madrid editions (1599, 1778) several lives are prefixed from a MS. not previously collated, from Sixtus II. bishop of Rome, to Marcellinus. (2) Chronicon, from the Creation to A.D. 614. (3) Historia Gothorum, Vandalorum, Suevorum.

ILDEFONSUS, archbishop of Toledo A.D. 657-667. Works (1)—A continuation of the De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis of Jerome, Gennadius, and Isidore from pope Gregory I. to Eugenius of Toledo, which is still extant. (2) A continuation of the Historia Gothorum of Isidore, which is lost.

JULIANUS POMERIANUS, fl. c. A.D. 680. Archbishop of Toledo. Among other works he wrote an appendix to the De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis of Isidore and Ildefonso. Felix and another unknown author carried the series still further.

BEDA, A.D. 673-735. The "Father of English learning." Works—(1) Life of St. Cuthbert. (2) Lives of the Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow. (3) Chronicon, from the Creation to A.D. 729. The first attempt in England at a universal history, and the first instance of the Dionysian era being employed in an historical work. (4) Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, in five books, from the landing of Julius Caesar to A.D. 731. The first fifty chapters are mainly a compilation from Pliny, Solinus, Orosius, Eutropius, and Gildas. From the mission of Augustine, A.D. 596, Beda ceases to compile and becomes an historian. As the work of a scrupulous, cautious, able scholar, its value can scarcely be overrated. See 29 Testimonia, quoted in Mayor and Lumby's edition of Lib. III. IV. p. 180, Cambridge, 1878.

WILLIBALD, priest and biographer of St. Boniface.

PAULUS DIACONUS or PAUL WARNEFRID, fl. c. A.D. 740-800. Deacon of Aquileia, private secretary of Desiderius last king of the Lombards. When Charles the Great conquered the Lombards, A.D. 774, Paul joined the group of scholars at the court of Charles, but eventually retired in disgrace to Monte Cassino. Works—(1) Gesta Episcoporum Metensium, a history of the bishops of Metz, apparently written at Charles's court. (2) Historia Miscella, now in twenty-four books. The first eleven are Eutropius's with additions; the next five are Paul's; the last eight are a continuation by Landulphus Sagax in the 14th century. For centuries it was a common school book in Europe. (3) Historia seu de Gestis Longobardorum, in six books, from the rise of the nation to A.D. 773. Almost the only source for the history of the Lombards.

LIBER PONTIFICALIS. This work, also called De Vitis Romanorum Pontificum, Gesta Romanorum Pontificum, and Liber Gestorum Pontificum, is of the utmost importance to the ecclesiastical historian. It contains lives of all the popes down to the middle of the pontificate of Stephen VI. (c. A.D. 885). It is commonly ascribed to Anastasius, librarian of the Roman church c. A.D. 860-885. But Hefele and others have shewn that Anastasius can be the author of some of the later biographies only, the last two being later than Anastasius; and that the bulk of them must be of much earlier origin and within our period. The Liberian catalogue, the first part of which is by Hippolytus, is the source of the earlier lives; the remainder are by various hands. The oldest recension of the Liber Pontificalis, ending with Conon, was made c. A.D. 700.

HITENLAU, leader of a Christian emigration from Armorica to Britain. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 504.) [J. G.]

HLODIUS (Bede, H. E. iii. 19), king of the Franks. [CLOVIS II.] [C. H.]

HLOTHERE, bishop of the West Saxons. [LEUTHERIUS.]

HLOTHERI, HLOTHERE (LOTHARIUS), king of Kent. He was a son of Earcombert and Sexburga, and succeeded his brother Egbert in July, 673. Egbert had left sons, one of whom, Eadric, certainly shared the Kentish throne with his uncle. Under their joint names was issued the second extant series of Kentish laws. (Ancient Laws and Institutes, ed. Thorpe, p. 11.) As in the date of the acts of the council of Hatfield in 680, Hlothere alone is mentioned as reigning in Kent, the joint reign probably belongs to the later part of Hlothere's career. Another competitor or sharer of the throne, whose name, however, occurs only in spurious charters, is Swebheard, who calls himself son of Sebbi, king of Essex (K. C. D. 14); and who also reigned after the death of Hlothere, conjointly with Wiltred. (Chr. S. 323.) Eadric, with the help of the South Saxons, made war upon his uncle. Hlothere was wounded in battle, and died under the treatment adopted for his cure, on the 6th of Feb. 685, after a reign of eleven years and seven months. (Bede, H. E. iv. 5, 26; Ann. Cant. Pertz, Scr. iv. 2.) The mention of London in connexion with Hlothere is interesting. It was Hlothere who assisted the thegn Imma to repurchase his freedom (H. E. iv. 22) from his master at London; and in the last of the laws that bear his name he prescribes certain conditions for sale in London, in a passage which has been used as an argument to shew that by Lundenwic is meant Sandwich. It would almost seem probable from this that the Kentish king still retained authority in London as in the days of Ethelberht. We may compare with this the mention of Egbert in the Chertsey charter [EARCONWALD], and the claims of Swebheard, Sigiraed, &c., in Kent: or infer that under Mercia Kent may have had something to say in London. In 676 Ethelred, of Mercia, ravaged Kent (Bede, H. E. v. 24; Ang. S. Chr. M. H. B.

321), and the charter of Swebheard (K. C. D. 14) is confirmed by Ethelred. Kent probably was coveted on the one side by Mercia and on the other by Wessex. As the hostility of Wessex begins as soon as Hlothere is dead, it seems not improbable that the dynastic jealousies were complicated with foreign alliances of the different branches of the royal house, whilst the divisions in Wessex itself, and the existence of Sussex as a debatable territory were constant sources of trouble to Kent for many years. Of any ecclesiastical action of Hlothere there is little trace; no religious question is touched in his laws. His name appears as granting two charters, one to St. Augustine's (Elmham, p. 248; Kemble, C. D. 16), and one confirming the grant of Swebheard at Sturry. (Elmham, p. 249.) He also, as 'Clotherius rex Cantuariorum,' appears as signing the spurious decree of Theodore for the division of dioceses (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 153). Alford makes St. Richard the mythical king of England, who lived and died as a recluse at Lucca, a son of Hlothere; but see RICHARD.

HOCCA, a prefect or reeve of Wilfrid bishop of York, mentioned by Eddi as recovering for his master a youth who had been promised to him by his mother, and had been carried off by her to avoid the fulfilment of her promise. (Eddi, cap. 18.) [J. R.]

HODIERNUS, bishop of Senlis (Gall. Chr. x. 1382). He signed the fifth council of Orleans in 549, and the third of Paris c. 557, but the form of name at both (Mansi, ix. 137, 747) is Gonotigernus or Cunautejernus. [C. H.]

HODILRED, a person who, calling himself "parens" of Sebba king of the East Saxons, bestowed on the abbess Ethelburga the lands of forty manentes for her monastery at Beddanhaam in the time of St. Erkenwald, and about 692 or 693. (Kemble, C. D. No. 35.) Ethelburga was no doubt the abbess of Barking. The exact relationship of Hodilred (or Oethelraed as he is called among the witnesses of the charter) is unknown. Sebba is usually said to have been the son of Saeward, and must have been long dead. [SEBBI.] [S.]

HODINGUS (ODIGUS, AUDINGUS), twentieth bishop of Le Mans, succeeding Gauziolenus, and followed by Merolus, and afterwards twenty-sixth of Beauvais, succeeding Andreas, and followed by Adalmanus, was a priest of Charles the Great's court, when he was elevated to the see of Le Mans. Here he remained nearly two years, but finding himself powerless for good in the disorganized condition to which the diocese had been reduced, returned to Charles, and afterwards received the see of Beauvais, where, after a long life of labour, he died and was buried. (Gesta Pontificum Cenoman. c. xviii.; Mabill. Vet. Analect. p. 290, Paris, 1723; Gall. Christ. ix. 696, xiv. 355.) [S. A. B.]

HOEL, Welsh saint. [HYWEL.]

HOEL I. of Brittany, called the son of Arthur's sister Anna by Dubricius, king of the Armoricans (Geoffrey of Monmouth, ix. 2), who invited by an embassy came to help his uncle CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. III.

against the English invasions. According to the story, Hoel was besieged in Alclud (Dumbarton) by the Scots and Picts. Afterwards Hoel was sent to war in Aquitaine and so on. The legend, using real Breton names, such as Dubricius and Hoel, represents the close connection between the British tribes on both sides of the western part of the Channel. This was merely the continuation of old alliances, for Caesar, iii. 9, says the Veneti of Brittany "auxilia ex Britannia quae contra eas regiones posita est accessunt." As the story of Arthur in Nennius and those who enlarged his story came from Brittany, it is natural to find Breton names in it. In Geoffrey, vi. 4, there is a similar embassy to Brittany conducted by Guethelinus, who is called Archbishop of London. The story of Hoel's niece Helena at Mont St. Michel, in Normandy, occurs in the legend of Arthur's expedition against Rome. The Cambrian Biography places Hoel's court at Llan Illtyd Vawe or Lantwit in Glamorgan. Emyr Llydaw, who is named as Hoel's father, was nephew of St. Germanus. A great number of his descendants, headed by Cadvan, emigrated to this country from Armorica, and are ranked among the most eminent of the Welsh saints (Rees, 213; Guest, Mabinogion, 382).

[C. W. B.]

HOEL II. of Brittany. According to the Breton traditions he was the eldest son of Hoel I., in whose wars he greatly distinguished himself. He succeeded his father in a portion of his dominions under the title of count. He was cruel and irreligious, and chiefly remembered for his persecution of St. Malo, whom he obliged to quit his diocese, cir. 546. In the following year, 547, Hoel perished by the hand of his brother Canao. Cir. 535 he married Rimo, daughter of Malgo king of Britain, and left by her a son named Judual. (Morice, Hist. de Bret. i. 80, ed. 1835.) [C. H.]

HOEL III. (JUTHAEL, HOWELL), king of Brittany, son of Judual and grandson of Hoel II. According to the Breton historians he reigned independently of the kings of France, who, in his time, made no attempt to include Brittany in their partitions. He was born about 560, and died in 612, after a reign of eighteen years. By his wife Pratella he was the father of Solomon, Judicael, St. Judocus and St. Winnocus, the first two succeeding him as kings of Brittany. (Morice, Hist. de Bret. i. 121, ed. 1835.) [C. H.]

HOENUS, a poet, mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris as his instructor. (Sidon. car. ix. p. 361, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 703 B.) [C. H.]

HOILDIS (HOILDE), virgin. [HOYLDIS.]

HOLEMUNDUS (HONEMUNDUS), bishop of Salamanca from 682 to 693 onwards, subscribed the acts of the thirteenth (683), fifteenth (688), and sixteenth (693) councils of Toledo. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287, 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 278.) [ELEFTHERIUS (14).] [M. A. W.]

HOLY GHOST. The doctrine of the Holy Ghost embraces the teaching of the Church with regard to His person and His mission. Under the former head may be placed the doctrine of His personality, Deity, and procession; under the latter, the doctrine of His operation in the creative and redemptive economies, including His relation to the canon of Scripture, to the Incarnation and the Incarnate Son, to the χαρίσματα, the sacraments, the entire organic life of the Church, and the spiritual life of individual Christians. In the present brief survey of the history of this complex subject, it will be convenient to follow for the most part the historical order, gathering up the teaching of each age upon the whole doctrine before we proceed to trace its further development during the succeeding period.

The apostolic doctrine of the Holy Ghost had been anticipated to some extent by the writers of the Old Testament. Throughout the Hebrew Scriptures (v. Dict. of the Bible; SPIRIT, THE HOLY) mention is made of a Spirit of God (רוּחַ יְהוָה אֱלֹהִים, or simply רוּחַ יְהוָה) characterized by holiness, goodness, and omnipresence (Ps. li. 11; Neh. ix. 10; Ps. cxxxix. 7), the source of life in nature (Gen. i. 2; Ps. cxliii. 10), of wisdom and power in man (Exod. xxviii. 3; xxxi. 3; Ps. cxliii. 10), and of a special inspiration in the prophets (2 Sam. xxiii. 3; Hos.

ix. 7, רוּחַ יְהוָה, ἄνθρωπος δὲ πνευματοφόρος, LXX). The deuterocanonical books also give prominence to the idea of a Holy Spirit, identified apparently with the Divine wisdom; it fills the universe (Sap. i. 7; xii. 1), loves mankind, and teaches and purifies men's minds and hearts (ib. i. 4, 5, 6; ix. 17). Later Jewish thought, however, tended to lower the teaching of the canon. The Sadduceanism of our Lord's time cut at the root of all belief in spiritual existences (Acts xxiii. 8; Sadd. γὰρ λέγουσιν . . . μὴ εἶναι . . . πνεῦμα). With Philo, the Spirit of God is no more than the wisdom which God imparts to the wise, or the influence which He exerts over the inspired (De Gigant. 5; De Monarch. i. 9), and this view became at a later period a settled article of the Jewish creed.* On the other hand, the New Testament exhibits an immense advance in this respect upon the doctrine of the older revelation. The Holy Ghost, as a Divine Agent, is represented as performing most important offices in reference to the Incarnation, the life of the Incarnate Word, and the foundation and building up of the Catholic Church. Some of our Lord's weightiest discourses deal largely with the mission of the Paraclete (John iii. 1-8; iv. 7-14; vii. 37-39; xiv. 15-xvi. 16; Acts i. 4-8), and the apostolic epistles are full of passages, both practical and dogmatic, relating to His person and operations (see esp. Rom. viii. 2 sq.; 1 Cor. xii. 1-14; Gal. iv. 6; v. 22 sq.; Eph. iv. 4-30; Tit. iii. 6; Heb. vi. 4; James iv. 5 (?); 1 Peter i. 1, iv. 14; 1 John iii. 24; iv. 13; v. 5; Jude 20). The preaching of the apostles doubtless equally abounded in references to the doctrine of the the Holy Ghost (cf. Acts ii. 33, 38; v. 32; x. 38, &c.), and the earliest baptismal creeds and rules of faith bear witness to the important place which this doctrine held in the primitive tradition of the Church (see Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole, pp. 42 sq. 64 sq.; Gebhardt, Patr. Ap. Opp. fasc. i. 2, p. 115 sq.<sup>b</sup>).

Passing outside the present canon, yet not beyond the limits of the 1st century, we find in the epistle of St. Clement of Rome a reflection of the apostolic teaching as to the effusion, the personality, and the Deity of the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 2: πλήρης πνεύματος ἁγίου ἐκχυσίς ἐπὶ πάντας ἐγίνετο. ib. 48: οὐχί . . . ἐν πνεύματι τῆς χάριτος τὸ ἐκχυθὲν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς; ib. 58: ζῆ γὰρ δὲ θεός, καὶ ζῆ δὲ κύριος Ἰ. Χ. καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον). St. Clement is especially full upon the relation of the Holy Spirit to the canon of Scripture (c. 45, ἐγκεκρέφατε εἰς τὰς ἱερὰς γραφὰς τὰς ἀληθεῖς τὰς διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου, cf. cc. 8, 13, 16, 22, 42). The same constant reference to the inspiration of Scripture characterizes the epistle of Barnabas (e.g. cc. 9-10), whilst the effusion of the Spirit on the whole Church is taught with equal distinctness (c. 1, ἀληθῶς βλέπω ἐν ὑμῖν ἐκκεχυμένον ἀπὸ τοῦ πλουσίου τῆς ἀγάπης κυρίου πνεῦμα ἐφ' ὑμῖν, cf. c. 19). In the shorter Ignatian epistles the Spirit is named together with the Father and the Son as one with Them, and yet distinct in person (Magn. 13); His procession from God (Philad. 7, ἀπὸ θεοῦ ὄν), His mission by the Son (Eph. 17, τὸ χάρισμα δὲ πέπομφεν ἀληθῶς ὁ κύριος), His operations in the miraculous Conception (Eph. 18), and in the sanctification of the members of Christ (Eph. 9, Smyrn. 13; Philad. inscr.), are distinctly recognised. The early Martyria of St. Polycarp and St. Ignatius include the Holy Ghost in their doxologies (Mart. St. Polyc. 14-22; Mart. St. Ign. 7).

But of all the remains of the subapostolic age, if it may be included in that category, the "Shepherd of Hermas" is the most prolific in references to the Holy Spirit. The form in which the Shepherd is cast renders it difficult to determine the exact significance of its dogmatic statements. The writer appears to recognise not only a Holy or Divine Spirit (κατ' ἐξοχήν), but a multiplicity of spirits commissioned by Him to teach and inspire men (comp. Mand. xi. 5, πᾶν . . . πνεῦμα ἀπὸ θεοῦ δοθέν . . . ἀνωθέν ἐστίν ἀπὸ τῆς δυνάμεως τοῦ θεοῦ πνεύματος. ib. infra: ὁ ἄγγελος τοῦ προφητικῆς πνεύματος. Sim. ix. 13, ἅγια πνεύματα εἰσιν: cf. however 1 Joh. iv. 2, πᾶν πνεῦμα δὲ ὁμολογεῖ . . . ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν; Rev. i. 4, τὰ ἑπτὰ πνεύματα τοῦ θεοῦ). The Holy Spirit in the good is pure and bright, and ministers to God with cheerfulness; but in the passionate it is cramped, and struggles to escape, and cannot minister as it desires (Mand. v. 2, 3; Sim. ix. 32). The writer of the Shepherd is a firm believer in the continuance of the prophetic gift (Mand. xi. cf. Hilgenfeld, prolegg. xix.), and professes himself to have been under some sort of special inspiration (Vis. i. 1, πνεῦμά με ἔλαβεν). In two passages (Sim. v. ix.) he identifies the Spirit with the Son, and it is difficult to determine to which of the Persons his language applies. Dorner (Person of Christ, i. 1-130 sq., infr. 388 sq.) maintains the reference to the Son: Bishops Bull and Hefele take the opposite view; whilst the latest editors, Gebhardt and Harnack, suppose that Hermas, in common with some other writers of this age, did not always discriminate between the Holy Ghost and the pre-existent Christ (Patr. Ap. Opp. fasc. 3, p. 152). Of this confusion of language, if not of thought, a notable instance occurs in the newly-recovered portion of the homily known as the Second Epistle of St. Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (Ps. Clem. 2 Cor. 14 : ο τοιοῦτος οὐ μεταλήμψεται τοῦ πνεύματος ὃ ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός. τοσαύτην δύναται ἡ σὰρξ αὐτῆ μεταλαβεῖν ζῶν καὶ ἀφθαρσίαν, κολληθέντος αὐτῆ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἀγίου, cf. Dr. Lightfoot ad h. l., and ὦ. 9, p. 202).

* See Pearson, art. viii. p. 371, note u (ed. Burton). Perhaps it was on this account that the rejection of the Holy Ghost's personality was a rare error among professedly Christian teachers of the first eight centuries. Lactantius is charged by St. Jerome with having held it: "Spiritus Sancti omnino negat substantiam, et more Judaico dicit eum vel ad Patrem referri vel Filium." (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 748). And St. Gregory of Nazianzen (Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvi. 137) speaks of some who in his day regarded the Spirit as an ἐνέργεια (see below). Comp. Aug. de Haer. iii.

<sup>b</sup> The following is a summary of the teaching of the earliest symbolical documents with regard to the Person and Mission of the Holy Ghost: The Holy Spirit, who through the prophets proclaimed the dispensations of God and the Advents, and by whom, as the Spirit of the Father, the miraculous Conception was effected, was in due time, according to promise, sent from the Father by the ascended Lord, to be the vicar of Christ on earth the teacher of truth, the sanctifier of the faithful, and the pledge of their immortality. As there is one Father and one Son, so there is one Paraclete, who is associate in honour and dignity with the Father and the Son, in whom the Church believes as she believes in the Father and in the Son, and in whom, through the Son, she worships the Father.

The Greek apologists of the 2nd century were so fully occupied with the endeavour to shew that the philosophical conception of a θεὸς λόγος was realised in the Person of the historical Christ, that they paid comparatively little attention to the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, and even ascribed to the Son operations and offices which the later thought of the Church referred to the Spirit of God. Thus in the Epistle to Diognetus we are told that it is the Word who "holds converse with men, by whom He chooses, and when He wills;" it is by the Word that "the Church is perpetually enriched." Theophilus of Antioch attributes the inspiration of the Old Testament prophets to the Second Person; "the Word, being God's Spirit, came down upon the prophets and spake by them" (Autol. ii. 23). Even the miraculous conception is said by Justin to have been wrought by the Word Himself (Apol. i. 33, τὸ πνεῦμα οὖν καὶ τὴν δύναμιν τὴν παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐδὲν ἄλλο νοῆσαι θέμις ἢ τὸν λόγον), a view which lingered on in the Church to the middle of the 4th century (cf. Iren. v. 1; Tert. Prax. 26; Cyr. de Idol. Van.; Hil. Trin. ii. 24, 26; and see Dorner, i. 1, p. 392 sq.; Newman, Tracts, p. 320; and the pref. to the Benedictine ed. of St. Hilary; Migne, Patr. Lat. ix. p. 35 sq.). On the other hand, it is to the apologist Theophilus that the Church owes the first recorded use of the word τριάς in reference to the Godhead (Autol. ii. 15, αὶ τρεῖς ἡμέραι πρὸ τῶν φωστῆρων γεγονυῖαι τύποι εἰσὶν τῆς τριάδος, τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ λόγου αὐτοῦ καὶ τῆς σοφίας αὐτοῦ, where, it will be observed, the Logos and the Sophia are clearly discriminated). The same writer speaks expressly of a distinction of Persons in the Unity of God (διαίρεσις ἐνομιέναν). Justin says, with even greater precision, "We place the Spirit of prophecy in the third order (ἐν τρίτῃ τάξει); for we honour Him with the Word" (Apol. i. 13; cf. infr. 60). He shews, however, some disposition unduly to subordinate the Spirit to the Word, calling the Third Person "the Angel of God, the Power of God, which was sent to us by Jesus Christ" (Tryph. 116, cf. Neander, Hist of Chr. Dogmas, i. 173); and in one obscure sentence he has been thought, perhaps without sufficient reason, to give to the created angels a place of honour not inferior to that which he assigns to the Holy Ghost (Apol. i. 6; cf. Bull, ii. iv. § 8; Käye, J. M. p. 52; Semisch, ii. 350 sq.; Liddon, Bampton Lect. p. 570; a summary of the literature will be found in Braunn's edition of the Apologies, pp. 87-9). Justin's pupil, Tatian, even speaks of the Holy Spirit as the minister of the Son (Adv. Graec. 13, τὸν διάκονον τοῦ πεπονητός θεοῦ). His view of the Spirit's operations is interesting. "The Spirit of God is not with all men, but with some, namely, with those who live righteously; descending to the soul's level, and linking itself with it, whilst to other souls it announced its secret by means of prophecies. Souls which give heed to wisdom attract to themselves this kindred Spirit" (Orat. adv. Graec. 13; Migne, Patr. Gr. vi. 13). In Athenagoras we find a distinctly nearer approach to the later Church doctrine of the Holy Trinity. He seems to have already conceived the idea of the Holy Spirit as the Bond of the Divine Unity (Legat. 10 ὅντος τοῦ νοῦ ἐν πατρὶ καὶ πατρὸς ἐν υἱῷ ἐνότητι καὶ δυνάμει πνεύματος). Even the doctrine of the essential procession of the Spirit finds expression in his statement that the Holy Ghost is an "effluence (ἀπόρροια): cf. Wisd. vii. 25; Ritter and Preller, Hist. Philos. p. 132) from God, from Whom it emanates and to Whom it returns like a ray of the sun," or as "light from fire" (Legat. 10, 24, ἀπορρέον καὶ ἐπαναφερόμενον ὡς ἀκτίνα ἡλίου . . . ὡς φῶς ἀπὸ πυρός).

Outside the Catholic Church two very opposite influences combined to draw attention to this doctrine during the 2nd century, viz.: Gnosticism and Montanism. Most of the Gnostic systems found place for the conception of the Holy Spirit, although in more or less wildly distorted forms. Simon, who before his baptism had claimed to be "the power of God called the Great" (ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη), and who had learnt from the apostles to connect the idea of Divine energy with the name of the Holy Ghost (Acts viii. 9-19), appears at a later time to have identified either himself, or his partner, Helena, with the Paraclete (Iren. i. 23, 1; Hippol. vi. 19; Epiph. Haer. i. 2; Hieron. in Matt. 24, 5). In his esoteric teaching he represented a female power<sup>c</sup> as having proceeded (προελθοῦσα) from the Father of all; and this power (to which he gave the name ἐπινοία) was probably intended to answer to the ἄγιον πνεῦμα of Christianity (Hippol. vi. 13). The Ophite sects expressly identified the "female power" with the Spirit, whilst they distinguished it from the Thought of God, which thus took the place of the Christian Logos (Iren. i. 30, 1). Into the singular system of Basilides the Holy Spirit entered largely, but as a ministering spirit, not consubstantial with the sonship (οὐχ ὁμοούσιον, sc. τῆ υἱότητι) which is κατὰ πάντα ἰσοουσίας τῶν οὐκ ὄντι θεῶν (Hippol. vii. 22; Clem. Alex. fragm. 16). Valentinus, who fell back on the emanation theory which Basilides had discarded, placed his Christ and Holy Spirit in a syzygy, put forth by command of the First Cause, but not proceeding directly from Him, or forming part of the original pleroma; the purpose of this secondary emanation was the restoration of order among the elder Aeons (Iren. i. 2, 4, 5; Hippol. vi. 31). In this conception we discover several of the elements of the Catholic doctrine; the procession of the Holy Ghost, His coequality with the Son, His temporal mission are dimly shadowed forth; whilst, on the other hand, in deriving the Spirit from Nous rather than from Bythos, Valentinus, like Basilides, anticipated the heretical teachings of the 4th century (Athanasius, ad Serap. i. 10).<sup>d</sup>

It seems more than doubtful whether, in the first instance, Montanism was an attempt to lay any new stress upon the Person or office of the Paraclete. Neander has pointed out (Ch. H. ii. 207; cf. Epiph. Haer. 48, 11 sq.) that the original stand-point of Montanus and Maximilla was that of the Old Testament rather than of the New; the new prophets represented themselves simply as the organs of "the Lord God Almighty." But in the minds of men, this supposed outburst of prophetic power could not but connect itself with our Lord's promise, especially in an age which still felt the miraculous energies of the Holy Ghost (cf. Iren. v. 6, 1; Euseb. H. E. v. 7). It seemed to many as if a second and greater Pentecost had dawned upon the church. Even the developed Montanism, however, did not profess to add to the deposit of the faith (Epiph. l. c. 61); had it done so, Tertullian would have regarded the Spirit of Montanus as hostile and evil (De Monogam. 2). Its mission was, rather to correct and raise the rule of life (De Anima, 55; De Fuga, 14; De Monog. 1, 2); a maturity of grace, a period of riper age in Christ was the looked for result of this new influx of spiritual power. Nevertheless, Tertullian himself claims to have gained from the Montanist movement a fuller knowledge, or at least a clearer apprehension of the Catholic faith: "nos vero," he writes (Ad Prax. 2), "et semper et nunc magis instructiores per Paracletum, deductorem scilicet innotuitatis, unicum quidem Deum credimus sub hac tamen dispensatione quam οικονομίαν dicimus." He calls the Holy Spirit "the interpreter of the Divine economy to those who receive the new prophecy" (ib. 30); the Paraclete of Montanus, he says, has cleared up the dark sayings of the earlier revelation, by preaching the whole mystery of godliness (De Resurr. Carnis, 63). It may be doubted, however, whether Tertullian's own insight into doctrine was in any way due to his Montanism; a portion of the sect declined after a while into a Sabellian confusion of the Persons (Hippol. viii. 19; x. 25; cf. Socr. i. 23). Its real place in the history of this doctrine seems to be that of a pioneer; the report of a revival of the prophetic gifts stirred the consciousness of the Church, and led her to pay deeper attention to the Person and work of the Holy Ghost.* On the other hand, it appears from an obscure passage in Irenaeus, that in some quarters a violent reaction against Montanism led men to reject the fourth Gospel, as containing the great promise of the Paraclete (iii. 11, 9, "alii vero ut donum Spiritus frustrarentur . . . illam speciem non admittunt quae est secundum Joannis evangelium in qua Paracletum se missurum Dominus promisit; sed simul et evangelium et prophetiam repellunt Spiritum"). But this party, whether identical or not with the Alogi of Epiphanius (Haer. li. 3), exerted no lasting influence over the thought of the Church.

Two outgrowths of Jewish Christianity contributed to the early treatment of this doctrine. The Nazarenes seem to have laid special stress on the relation of the Holy Spirit to the Person and ministry of our Lord; the Spirit was described in their gospel as the Mother of Christ (Orig. in Johann. ii. 6); at the baptism the fons omnis Spiritus Sancti descended on Him with the words, "Fili mi, in omnibus prophetis expectabam te ut venires et requiescerem in te. Tu es enim requies mea; tu es filius meus primogenitus." The Twelve Testaments speak frequently of the outpouring of the Spirit from the Father upon the Christ, and through Him upon all mankind; but whether the Nazarene Holy Spirit is to be regarded as hypostatical must remain doubtful. Ebionism diverged further from the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Ghost. In its Gnostic developments (e.g. in the systems of Cerinthus and Elchasi), the Spirit was represented as an Aeon, sometimes identical with Christ, sometimes distinct from the Son of God, in the latter case a female power. The Clementine Homilies speak of the Divine Monad as self-extended into a Dyad, the Wisdom or Spirit of God, which is one with Him, as the soul is one with the body, being put forth like a hand for the creation of the world: ἡ δὲ σοφία, ἡ ὡσπερ ἰδίῳ πνεύματι αὐτὸς ἀεὶ συνέχαιρεν, ἦν ὡς ψυχὴ τῶ θεῷ, ἐκτελεῖται δὲ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ ὡς χεὶρ δημιουργοῦσα τὸ πᾶν. The process is described as an extension followed by a contraction: κατὰ γὰρ ἕκτασιν καὶ συστολήν ἡ μονὰς διὰς εἶναι νομίζεται. On the other hand, the Recognitions distinguish clearly between the Son and the Spirit, but describe the Spirit as the creation of the Son, in language which forms a singular anticipation of later heresy: "Spiritus Sanctus . . . habet quod est ab Unigenito . . . factus est enim per factum, subconnumeratur autem Patre et Filio."

Closely allied to Ebionism was the earlier Monarchian movement, headed by Theodotus. It seems, however, at least in its original form, to have scarcely touched upon the Person of the Holy Spirit, confining itself to a bold denial of the Deity of our Lord.<sup>f</sup> The more specious Monarchianism of the Patripassians, Praxeas and Noetus, Beryllus and Sabellius, returned to the use of the Trinitarian language, although, equally with the Ebionite monarchians, these teachers rejected the Catholic doctrine of a Trinity of distinct hypostases. In the system of Praxeas, who first made himself remarkable by the violence of his opposition to Montanism (Tert. Prax. 9), the Person of the Son still occupied the prominent place, though Tertullian assumes that his party extended to the Spirit the principle upon which Praxeas explained the coexistence in God of the Father and the Son (ib. 9, 27). At Rome, according to Hippolytus (ix. 12), Callistus taught, τὸν λόγον αὐτὸν εἶναι υἶόν, αὐτὸν καὶ πατέρα ὀνόματι μὲν καλούμενον, ἐν δὲ ἂν τὸ πνεῦμα ἀδιάρητον . . . καὶ τὰ πάντα γέμειν τοῦ θεοῦ πνεύματος τὰ τε ἄνω καὶ κάτω καὶ εἶναι τὸ ἐν τῇ παρθένῳ σαρκωθὲν πνεῦμα οὐχ ἕτερον παρὰ τὸν πατέρα,—a statement in which the personal Holy Spirit seems to be wholly left out of sight, whilst the name of the Spirit of God is given to the Divine Essence, which is also called Father, or Son, or Word.<sup>g</sup> But the riper theology of the Sabellian school distinctly provided for the πρόσωπον of the Holy Ghost. Sabellius is said to have illustrated his view of the Trinity by the διαίρεσεις χαρισμάτων; as the One Spirit manifested itself in various divine gifts, so, he said, the One God passed through three great phases of self-revelation: οὗτος καὶ ὁ πατὴρ ὁ αὐτὸς μὲν ἐστίν, πλατύνεται δὲ εἰς υἶόν καὶ πνεῦμα (Ath. Or. c. Ar. iv. 25). Other analogies were found in the threefold nature of man, and in the sun's form and light and heat (Epiph. Haer. 72). With regard to the third mode of Divine manifestation, it is doubtful whether Sabellius regarded it as having had any existence prior to the Pentecostal effusion, or as destined to outlive the present dispensation (Ath. l. c. cf. Neander, C. H. ii. 323-4). The doctrine of Paulus of Samosata on this point seems to have differed from that of Sabellius chiefly in that he regarded the Spirit as a property, rather than as a self-manifestation or πλατύσιμος of God. The Word and the Spirit, he said, are in God in the same manner as reason resides in man (Epiph. Haer. 115). Paulus did not deny the mission of the Spirit, but he seems to have resolved it into the exercise of an impersonal influence; the Holy Spirit was merely the grace which descended upon the Apostles (Leontius, de Sect. 3). So little, however, did he enter into this branch of Christian doctrine, that his heretical view of it escaped censure from the council which condemned his Christology.

When we turn from these heretical movements to the teaching of the Catholic Church, we find important contributions to the history of this doctrine proceeding from Christian teachers who lived during the latter part of the 2nd century and the first half of the 3rd.

Irenaeus, who represents at once the Asiatic school of St. John, and the Church of South-Eastern Gaul, is the earliest of these contributors. Vigorously rebuking the error of Valentinus, who confounded the temporal mission of the Holy Spirit with His eternal relation to God (ii. 19, 9), and rejecting the term emanation (προβολή, emissio) as one which seemed to imply a separation of the One Divine Essence (ii. 13. 5, 6), he preferred to leave the mode of Divine processions unexplained (ii. 28. 6), and to express their results by figures of speech. The Son and the Spirit are the two hands of God (iv. prae-f. ib. 20. 1). The Son is the Offspring (progenies), the Spirit the Image (figuratio) of the Father; the Son is His Word, the Spirit His Wisdom (iv. 7. 4). The Son and the Spirit minister to the Father, as the hands and the intellect minister to man—not like created intelligences, which are external to the Life of God (iv. 7. 8). The Spirit of God is no mere temporary spiration, but a Spirit eternal as God himself (ἡ οὖν προῆ πρόσκαιρος, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ἀένανον, v. 12, in reference to Isa. lvii. 16, LXX). Irenaeus has some interesting remarks on the relation of the Spirit to the Son. The gift of the Spirit is a fruit of the Incarnation; He is the “communicatio Christi” (iii. 24. 1), “de corpore Christi procedens nitidissimus fons” (ib. infra); by the Spirit we mount up to the Son, as by the Son we ascend to the Father (v. 36); he who has not the Holy Ghost, has not the life of Jesus Christ (fragm. 36); the insufflation of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles (John xx. 22) is a proof of His Deity (Syr. fragm. ap. Pitra, Spic. Solesm. i. p. 6). On the teaching office of the Third Person Irenaeus is especially full. He finds it exercised in the inspiration of the prophets and apostles (iii. 21. 4),<sup>h</sup> and in the perpetual illumination of the Church (iii. 24. 1). Only within the bosom of the Church is the light of the Spirit to be enjoyed: “In ecclesia . . . posuit Dens . . . universam reliquam operationem Spiritus, cuius non sunt participes omnes qui non currunt ad ecclesiam . . . ubi enim ecclesia, ibi et Spiritus Dei; et ubi Spiritus Dei, illic ecclesia et omnis gratia; Spiritus autem veritas.” The work of the Holy Spirit in the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist is also set forth: see iii. 17, 82, and fragm. 38 (Neander, Hist. Dojrm. i. 230; Dorner, Person of Christ, I. i. pp. 466-7).

From the same Church, a few years earlier, issued the famous letter to the Churches of Asia Minor, containing an account of the persecution which raged at Lyons and Vienne in A.D. 177. It bears distinct traces of the influence exerted by the Gospel of St. John upon the early doctrine of the Holy Ghost, who is described in it as the Paraclete and as the Spirit of the Father (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ πατρικόν).

From North Africa, at the end of the 2nd century, we receive the vigorous and

<sup>f</sup> The earlier Monarchians attributed the miraculous Conception to the ἄγιον πνεῦμα. But whether they discriminated between the πνεῦμα and the λόγος is more than doubtful (Neander, C. H. ii. 297). The Melchizedekians, however, who emanated from their school, spoke of Melchizedek as a power greater than Christ, which they probably intended to answer to the Holy Ghost of the Catholic Church. Hieracas at a later time completed the identification of Melchizedek with the Third Person of the Trinity.

independent testimony of Tertullian. Writing against the Monarchian views of Praxeas, Tertullian lays the foundation of the Catholic doctrine of Divine processions. The Valentinian προβολαί were separate existences parted from their source; but there is a "προβολή veritatis," a "custos unitatis, qua prolatum dicimus Filium a Patre sed non separatum." In like manner there is a true procession of the Holy Ghost, who is a distinct person from the Father and the Son, and yet abides in the unity of the Divine Essence. The Spirit is third from the Father and the Son, "sicut tertius a radice fructus ex fructe, et tertius a fonte rivus ex flumine, et tertius a sole apex ex radio." (Prax. 8, cf. infra 25.) Elsewhere Tertullian expresses the same truth by representing the Spirit as derived from the Father through the Son; "Spiritum non aliunde puto quam a Patre per Filium" (ib. 4). The Spirit, he says, receives of the Son, even as the Son of the Father; and thus it is that the Three are linked together in the one Divine Life; "ita connexus Patris in Filio in Paraclito tres efficit coherentes, alterum ex altero" (ib. 25). He speaks of a subordination of the Spirit to the First and Second Persons, but it is not a subordination of nature; there is a tertium nomen divinitatis (ib. 30), a tertius gradus in Paraclito (ib. 9), yet the Persons are "tres non statu sed gradu, nec substantia sed forma, nec potestate sed specie" (ib. 2). Of the mission of the Spirit Tertullian speaks in no uncertain language. It is part of his rule of faith that the Holy Ghost is sent in the room of the ascended Christ to sanctify the Church ("regula est autem fidei . . . Jesum Christum . . . misisse vicariam vim Spiritus Sancti, qui credentes agat"). In Baptism the Spirit descends from heaven and sanctifies the waters, imparting to them a sanctifying power (De Baptismo, 4); His presence is further invited and secured by the laying on of hands which follows the baptismal rite (ib. 8). Of the special office which in his later years Tertullian assigned to the Montanist Paraclete mention has already been made.

Tertullian's great pupil, St. Cyprian, refers only in passing to the doctrine of the Spirit's Person (see De Domin. Orat. 23, "de unitate Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti plebs adunata," ib. 34); but dwells at length on His relation to the corporate and individual life of the church. In Baptism the Holy Spirit, he teaches, "totus infunditur, aequaliter sumitur" (Ep. 69, § 14); the subsequent increase or loss of grace depends on the conduct of the individual. But baptism, to be valid, must be administered by one who himself possesses the Holy Spirit (Ep. 70, § 3; 79, § 9). Only the Catholic Church, as being the Bride of Christ, has power to regenerate sons to God (Ep. 75, § 14); only the Church possesses the fountain of living waters (Ep. 73, § 11). Like Tertullian, St. Cyprian speaks of the imposition of hands as a means conjointly with baptism, of imparting the Holy Ghost (Ep. 73, § 9). To the inspiration of the prophets and apostles, and of the Scriptures generally, he bears constant witness (cf. Westcott, Study of the Gospels, pp. 429 sq.).

At Rome, the birthplace of the heretical Monarchianism, Hippolytus, the disciple of Irenaeus, wrote against Noetus, as Tertullian against Praxeas; but his treatise touches but slightly upon the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. On the Deity of the Spirit, however, it is express. It is impossible, Hippolytus says, to glorify God aright, without acknowledging each Person of the Holy Trinity (διὰ γὰρ τῆς τριάδος ταύτης πατὴρ δοξάζεται). Through the Incarnate Word . . . we adore (προσκυνοῦμεν) the Holy Spirit . . . In no other way can we form a conception of the Unity of God, but by truly believing in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (c. Noet. 12-14). The Father has subjected all things to the Incarnate Son, except Himself and the Holy Ghost (ib. 8). The personality of the Spirit is distinctly implied, but Hippolytus seems purposely to confine the term πρόσωπον to the Father and the Son (πρόσωπα δὲ δύο, οἰκονομία δὲ τρίτην τὴν χάριν τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος, c. 14). He is careful to set forth the distinct office of the Holy Ghost in the Divine economy (ὁ γὰρ κελεύειν πατὴρ, ὁ δὲ ὑπακούειν υἱός, τὸ δὲ συνετίξον ἅγιον πνεῦμα . . . πατὴρ γὰρ ἠθέλησεν, υἱὸς ἐποίησεν, πνεῦμα ἐφάνησεν, ib. infra). The Prophets are represented as having been completely furnished by the prophetic Spirit, and honoured by the Word Himself (De Antichr. 2); their inspiration proceeded from the Father's power (τῆς πατρῴας δυνάμεως ἀπόπνοιαν λαβόντες, c. Noet. ii. 12).

Novatian, in his De Trinitate (c. 29), appeals, like Tertullian, to the traditional rule of faith, which, as known to him, required belief in the Holy Ghost "of old promised to the Church, and vouchsafed according to the promise in the fullness of the time." He dwells on the identity of the Spirit as given under the Law, and under the Gospel ("non est in evangelio novus, sed nove datus"); under the Gospel Christ, in whom the fullness of the Spirit abides, is the fountain from which His gifts descend in copious abundance on the Church ("totius S. Spiritus in Christo fonte remanente, ut ex illo donorum atque operum venae ducerentur"). Novatian usually assumes rather than asserts the Deity of the Holy Ghost; see, however, c. 29: "cum Spiritus Sancti divina aeternitate sociari."

The Roman Dionysius (ob. 269) has left an important protest against the tritheistic tendency, which seems to have shewn itself in some quarters as a reaction against Sabellian teaching. The fragment incidentally bears witness to the relation of the Holy Ghost to the other Persons of the Holy Trinity. We may not divide the Divine unity, Dionysius says, into three separate hypostases; the Second and Third Persons, as regards Their principle and source, are subordinated to God (the Father), the Word being united to Him, the Spirit abiding in Him (ἑμφιλοχεῖν δὲ τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἐνδιατάσθαι δεῖ τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα); the Holy Trinity must be gathered up into One Person as its Supreme Source and Head (εἰς ἓνα ὡς περ εἰς κορυφὴν τινα, τὸν θεὸν τῶν ὄλων τὸν παντοκράτορα λέγω, συγκεφαλαιοῦσθαι τε καὶ συναγέσθαι πάσα ἀνάγκη). We must be careful not to break up the Unity into three Godheads; the Divine μοναρχία must be steadily maintained, whilst at the same time we hold by the truth of the Holy Trinity, and retain our baptismal faith in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (οὐτ' ὄν καταμερίζειν χρὴ εἰς τρεῖς θεότητας τὴν θαυμαστήν καὶ θείαν μονάδα . . . ἀλλὰ πεπιστευκένα εἰς θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα καὶ εἰς Χρ. Ἰ. τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ καὶ εἰς τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα . . . οὕτω γὰρ ἂν καὶ ἡ θεία τριάς καὶ τὸ ἅγιον κήρυγμα τῆς μοναρχίας διασώζοντο, ap. Athan. de Decr. S. N. c. 263).

There still remains to be considered under this head the teaching of the Church and School of Alexandria. The Alexandrian Clement promises (Strom. v. 14) to investigate the whole question of the Holy Spirit's Person and gifts in his treatises "on prophecy,"<sup>1</sup> and "on the soul;" but these books, if ever written, have unfortunately been lost. An important fragment, however, has been printed by Cotelier, which may, with much probability, be assigned to one or other of them (see Bp. Lightfoot's Clement of Rome, pp. 219-220). It contains perhaps the first instance of the use of ἐκπόρευσις, in reference to the Holy Ghost; but the word seems to be employed to express His temporal mission, though the eternal derivation is distinctly taught in other terms: "Blessed is the man who knoweth the gift of the Father through the procession of the Holy Ghost (δι' ἐκπορεύσεως τοῦ παναγίου πνεύματος: cf. πνεῦμα μὲν ἐστίν . . . ἐκπορευτική ὑπαρξις cited by Vecvus from the ὄροι διάφοροι of Clem. Alex.). Blessed is he who knoweth and hath received, for the Holy Spirit is His gift, and this He gave under the form of a dove . . . a guileless Spirit, free from wrath and bitterness, perfect and undefiled; emitting It from His own Heart (ἀπὸ σπλάγχων ἰδίων προϊέμενος), to order the ages and give the knowledge of the Invisible. Holy, therefore, and right is this Spirit, which came forth from the Father (τὸ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ προελθόν), His power and will, manifested for the complete setting forth (πλήρωμα) of His glory; they who receive it are moulded in the mould of truth, of perfect grace."

In his extant works Clement manifests his belief in the Deity of the Spirit; thus the Paedagogus ends (iii. 12) with a prayer for grace to praise aright the Father and the Son together with the Holy Ghost (ὁδὸς δὲ ἡμῖν αἰνούμενος εὐχαριστεῖν τῷ μόνῳ πατρὶ καὶ υἱῷ . . . σὺν καὶ τῷ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι, πάντα τῷ ἐνὶ . . . ᾧ ἡ δόξα, κ.τ.λ.). He recognises also the unity of the Holy Ghost, contrasting it with the diversity of His gifts; the Spirit is ἀμερῶς μεριζόμενος (Strom. vi. 16, cf. supr. 15, Paed. i. 6). His presence in the faithful forms as it were a new element of their complex human nature (τὸ διὰ τῆς πίστεως προσγινόμενον ἁγίου πνεύματος χαρακτηριστικὸν ἰδίωμα). His divine gifts are the fragrant ointment compounded of many celestial spices, which the Christ provides for His friends (Paed. 11. 8). In like manner Clement connects the Word and the Spirit, when he speaks of the inspiration of the prophets, ascribing this to either Person almost indiscriminately. (See cxx, in Kaye, Clement of Alex. p. 354; Westcott, Study of the Gospels, p. 435.) To the Montanistic movement he shews little favour (Strom. iv. 14); yet, if he does not commit himself to the "new prophecy," he holds firmly by the doctrine of a perpetual illumination of the Church and of individual believers (τῷ πεπιστευκῶτι προσεπιπέισθαι τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα φαιμεν, Strom. v. 13). He who obeys the Word has his soul united to the Spirit (Strom. ii. 1-13); the true Gnostic is spiritual, a believer in, a disciple of, the Holy Ghost (Strom. v. 24; Paed. i. 6); he is thus enabled to sound the depths of Scripture and to read its inner meaning, though in doing this he is careful to be guided by the traditional rule of faith (Strom. vi. 15). Clement deals less fully with the work of the Spirit in the corporate life of the Church; yet he does not fail to connect His operations with the Sacrament of Baptism. "We, the baptized," he says (Paed. i. 6), "having put away the sins which like a mist darkened the light of the Divine Spirit, possess a spiritual eye which is free, unobstructed, and full of light, wherewith alone we gaze after the Divine, like men initiated into sacred mysteries, the Holy Ghost flowing in upon us from heaven." The preparatory instruction of the catechumen leads him on to faith; and faith, coupled with baptism, receives the teaching of the Holy Ghost (πίστις δὲ ἅμα βαπτίσματι ἁγίῳ παιδεύεται πνεύματι). Clement's teaching with reference to the Holy Eucharist is singularly obscure; he speaks of the Spirit in connexion with the Eucharistic gift, but it is doubtful whether he means the Holy Ghost or the Divine Word. Cf. § 2; ib. § 47. ἐν τῷ πνεύματι τῷ αὐτοῦ κοσμήσειν λέγει τὸ σῶμα τοῦ λόγου, ὡσπερ ἀμέλει τῷ αὐτοῦ πνεύματι ἐκθρέψει τοὺς πεινῶντας τὸν λόγον.

In the writings of Origen we find the first attempt, after Tertullian, at a scientific treatment of the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. He teaches that the Spirit is associated in honour and dignity with the Father and the Son (Princ. i. praef.); eternally proceeds from the Father as the Son is eternally generated (ii. 2, § 1, "ingenitum Filium generat Pater et Spiritum Sanctum profert, non quasi qui ante non erat, sed quia origo et fons Filii vel Spiritus S. Pater est; et nihil in his antierius posteriusve intelligi potest"); and is therefore absolutely good (i. 2, § 13, "Sp. S. procedens sine dubio bonitatis eius special in se refert quae est in eo fonte"). The special operations of the Holy Ghost, unlike the operations of the Father and the Son, are confined to the souls of Christians (i. 3, § 5), amongst whom His gifts are divided, whilst His essence remains indivisible (i. 1, § 3). The same Holy Spirit wrought in the saints of both Testaments, although after the Ascension His mission was extended and enlarged (ii. 7, § 1, 2). By participating in the Holy Spirit men become spiritual and holy; to participate in the Spirit is to participate in the whole Trinity, since the Trinity is indivisible, because incorporeal (iv. 1, § 32; cf. i. 3, § 5). Origen's recognition of an inner spiritual meaning in Holy Scripture, however unguardedly expressed (iv. 1, § 12 ἐστὶν ὅπου οἰοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς γραφῆς μόνῃ χρῆσθαι) did not hinder him from acknowledging in the fullest manner the inspiration of the Sacred Books; they are the writings of the Holy Ghost (Hom. in Num. xxvii. 1), and every letter exhibits, as far as the case admits, the traces of a Divine wisdom (Philocal. 2).

by St. Jerome and by Epiphanius (Hieron. Epp. ad Avit., ad Pamm. et Ocean.; Epiph. Haer. lxiv. 8) with regarding Him as a creature; and St. Basil is almost disposed to endorse this accusation (De Spiritu Sancto, 29). It appears to have rested partly on an ambiguous passage in the De Principiis (i. praef. § 4, "non iam manifeste discernitur utrum natus an innatus vel Filius etiam Dei ipse habendus sit, necne.")<sup>k</sup> The commentary on St. John's Gospel, of which the Greek is extant, reveals the extent of Origen's departure from the language of the Church. He maintains the inferiority of the Spirit to the Son, in respect of origin; the Son being of the Father alone, the Holy Ghost of the Father through the Son. Commenting on John i. 2 (πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο) he asks whether the Spirit must not be included in the category of the γενητά. From this conclusion he sees only two modes of escape; the Spirit, if not γενητόν, must either have no distinct personality, or must be like the Father, "ingenerate." Rejecting both these views, he falls back upon the affirmative answer to his question. The Holy Spirit in some sense had His genesis through the Son; in honour and order He is above all γενητά,<sup>l</sup> yet in thought He must be included among them. Perhaps this is why He is not also called Son of God, the Only Begotten alone being by nature Son from the beginning, and being, as it seems, necessary to the Person of the Holy Spirit, as ministering to Him not only Being but attributes (οὐ χρήσειν εἴκοιεν τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα, διακονούντος αὐτοῦ τῇ ὑποστάσει οὐ μόνον εἰς τὸ εἶναι, ἀλλὰ καὶ σοφὸν εἶναι καὶ λογικὸν καὶ δίκαιον), and dispensing His gifts to mankind (τῆς ὕλης τῶν χαρισμάτων, ἐνεργουμένης μὲν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, διακονουμένης δὲ ὑπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὄφειστώσης δὲ κατὰ τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα). The result is that the Spirit is conceived of as being in some sense inferior to the Son by whom He had His Being (ἐν τῶν πάντων τυγχάνον ὑποδεέστερον [c. l. ὑποδεεστέρω] τοῦ δι' οὐ ἐγένετο νοούμενον). In this passage it seems clear that Origen suffers himself to use γενητός in the two distinct senses of "derived" and "created." In the former sense the Spirit is γενητός, for He is ἐκπορευτός. And in this sense He is διὰ τοῦ λόγου, and therefore in the order of the Divine Life inferior to Him, since the Son is from the Father alone. Thus while the language of the great Alexandrian teacher anticipates Arius, his doctrine is not far removed from that of Augustine; it is an approach to the Western Filioque.

Among the pupils and successors of Origen Pierius, we are told by Photius, represented the Holy Ghost as inferior in glory to the Father and the Son; and the same is hinted with regard to Theognostus (Biblioth. codd. 119, 106). Both teachers possibly re-echoed Origen's ambiguous language as to the genesis of the Spirit. St. Basil lays a yet heavier charge against Dionysius of Alexandria. (Epp. 41.) Yet the same father quotes from Dionysius an orthodox doxology "to God the Father and the Son, with (σὺν) the Holy Ghost;" and the fragments of Dionysius's letter to his Roman namesake include more than one passage which is irreconcilable with the Arian view. The following is decisive: "Each of the names (Father, Son, Holy Ghost) is inseparable from the next. Thus . . . when I add the name of Holy Ghost, I at once recall the thought of His derivation from the Father through the Son (πόθεν καὶ διὰ τίνος ἦκεν). The Father's nature is not alien to the Son, nor can the Son be parted from the Father; and in Their hands is the Holy Ghost." (Ath. de Sent. Dionys. 17.) In the shorter, and probably genuine Exposition of the Faith attributed to Gregory of Neo-Caesarea, another pupil of Origen, we find even stronger assertions of the Spirit's unity with the Father and the Son, coupled with what appears to be an explicit statement of His procession through the Son (ἐν πν. ἁγ. ἐκ θεοῦ τὴν ὑπαρξιν ἔχον καὶ δι' αὐτοῦ πεφηνός).<sup>m</sup> Methodius of Tyre, who belongs to the end of the 3rd century, has some remarkable language bearing on the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit, he says, is an ἐκπορευτὴ ὑπαρξις: He proceeds, like Eve from the side of Adam. He is one of the two ἀρχέγονοι δυνάμεις αἱ δορυφοροῦσαι τὸν θεόν (Migne, Patr. Gr. xviii. 201), Yet He is consubstantial with the Father (ὁμοούσιον πνεῦμα, ib. 351).

We pass now to the troublous times of the 4th century, which gave form and shape to the faith of the Church with regard to the consubstantial deity of both the Son and the Spirit of God.

The heresy of Arius<sup>n</sup> concerned itself at first with the Person of the Son, yet not to the exclusion of the Third Person. Thus the Thalia broadly stated that "the essences (αἱ οὐσίαι) of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are of their very nature distinct and alien and separate," and that "one hypostasis is more glorious than another, and that to an infinite degree" (Athan. c. Ar. Or. i. 6; de Syn. 15). The Nicene Council, however, was content to deal with the question of the Son's Deity, and its creed ended with the simple words καὶ εἰς τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα. It was afterwards argued, and with justice, that even this one clause implied the Godhead of the Holy Ghost, since the belief of which the creed speaks can be reposed in God only (Greg. Naz. Or. xxxvii.; Epiph. Haer. lxxiv.). But in point of fact, the omission of an express statement upon this point was doubtless due to the circumstance that in A. D. 325 the battle was raging almost exclusively around the Godhead of the Word; the Godhead of the Spirit had been only incidentally denied (Basil, Epp. 78, 387). The seeds of this further error had been sown already; but the harvest was not fully ripe till half a century later (ib. Ep. 78).

Between 325 and 360 frequent opportunities presented themselves to the Eusebian party of expressing their views as to the Deity of the Holy Ghost in the synods which were held during this period. But it was the policy of the party at this time to veil its departure from the Nicene standard under language which sounded both scriptural and primitive. Thus the various creeds, Arian and semi-Arian, which were now put forth (v. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole, pp. 148-174), whilst assigning to the Spirit a position distinctly inferior to that of the Father or of the Son, and dealing almost exclusively with His temporal mission, abstained from any direct attack upon the Godhead of the Third Person. The following is a summary of their teaching: "We believe in the Holy Ghost, the Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth promised by the prophets and by the Lord, and sent to the apostles to teach them all things, and to comfort, sanctify, and perfect believers; the Son having bestowed the Holy Ghost upon the Church in accordance with the Father's will (πατρικῶ βουλήματι). We anathematize all who call the Holy Ghost the Ingenerate God (τὸν ἀγέννητον θεόν), or who confound His Person with the Son, or speak of Him as a part of the Father, or of the Son, by whom He is, i.e., was sent into the world (per Filium est, δι' υἱοῦ ἀποσταλέν). We reject as unscriptural the terms 'hypostasis,' 'one hypostasis,' as applied to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

Meanwhile, if the synods were satisfied with this indefinite or negative teaching, individuals had everywhere begun openly to assert their unbelief in the Deity of the Spirit. Thus in 358, Lucifer of Cagliari charges the emperor Constantius with maintaining that the Paraclete was "not the very Spirit of God" (Pro Athan. ii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 898). St. Athanasius and St. Hilary had already pointed out the impossibility of a sound belief touching the Holy Ghost, if the consubstantiality of the Son were denied. (Ath. Or. c. Ar. i. 8; Hil. de Trin. ii. 1.) The preaching of the Arian clergy had no doubt run far in advance of their creeds in this direction. On the side of the church there was at first a natural reluctance to touch the Nicene formula, which was felt to be the best outward bond of Catholic unity (Socr. ii. 27, 30). At Sardica (347), the Western bishops expressed their satisfaction with the creed of 325; and at Ariminum (359) the Catholics even held it to be unseemly and unlawful to make any change. Yet expansions of the Nicene creed, of private authorship, were not unknown. Thus one was produced, it appears, though not authorised, at Sardica (Sozom. iii. 12; Theodoret. i. 5; Hist. Tripart. iv. 24; cf. Ath. ad Antioch. 2); a long exposition attributed to St. Athanasius, and anterior to the year 360, defines the Holy Spirit to be ἐκπρό-πνευμα τοῦ πατρὸς; and a creed is given by Lucifer of Cagliari (A.D. 358, v. Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 127, note) which contains the article, "Credimus in Spiritum Paracletum, verum Dei Spiritum." At length, in 361-2, it became requisite to meet the growing unbelief with definite counterstatements put forth by synodical authority. While yet an exile in the desert of the Thebaid, Athanasius had learned from Serapion, bishop of Thmuis in the Delta, that in his diocese some who had abandoned the Arian doctrine of the Son, exceeded the teaching of Arius with regard to the Holy Ghost, declaring Him to be (1) a creature, and (2) a ministering spirit, differing from the angels only in degree (λεγόντων αὐτὸ μὴ μόνον κτίσμα, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν λειτουργικῶν πνευμάτων ἐν αὐτῷ εἶναι, Ad Serap. i. (init.)) This new party were known as the Tropici; as to the origin of the name, see Ath. ad Serap. i. 2, 10. On the return of Athanasius to Alexandria, a synod was held, whose synodical letter (the Tomus ad Antiochenos ap. Ath.) contains the first condemnation by the church of unbelief as to the Deity of the Holy Ghost. All who wished to return to the church from the ranks of Arianism were now required to condemn those who affirmed that the Holy Ghost is a creature and separate from the essence of the Son (διηρημένον ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ). The tome proceeds: οἱ γὰρ προσποιούμενοι μὲν ὀνομάζειν τὴν ὁμολογηθεῖσαν ἐν Νικαίᾳ πίστιν, τολμῶντες δὲ κατὰ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος βλασφημεῖν, οὐδὲν πλέον ποιοῦσιν ἢ τὴν Ἀρειανὴν ἀρεσιν τοῖς μὲν ῥήμασιν ἀρνοῦνται, τῷ δὲ φρονήματι ταύτην κατέχουσιν. This document was addressed to the church of Antioch, where it received the subscription of the new bishop Paulinus, who added a confession of his own in which he anathematized those who assert that the Spirit is a creature made by the Son. Sozomen states that the Alexandrian Council declared the Spirit to be consubstantial with the Father and the Son (v. 12, cf. Socr. iii. 7; Rufin. H. E. i. 28). The word ὁμοούσιον is not used in the tome in reference to the Spirit; but the statement is substantially correct; throughout the letter the Holy Spirit is regarded as one in essence with the First and Second Persons—ἀδιαίρετον τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ πατρὸς.

The church had spoken none too soon. Not only in Egypt, but at Constantinople and throughout Thrace and western Asia Minor, the new heresy had begun to make way. In Europe and Asia it was brought to the birth by the deposition of Macedonius in 360. That unscrupulous prelate took his revenge upon the Acacians by putting himself at the head of the semi-Arians, who were now retracing their steps towards the doctrine of Nicaea. It was agreed to accept the ὁμοούσιον in reference to the Son; the Person of the Holy Ghost presented greater difficulty. Eustathius of Sebasteia was unwilling to call Him either God or a creature; Macedonius, Marathionius, and other less devout but more influential members of the party refused to leave the matter in suspense; if not true God, the Spirit, they urged, must needs be a creature; and if a creature, a minister and servant of God (Socr. ii. 45; Soz. iv. 27; Theodoret. ii. 6). The new sect were known as Macedonians, Marathionians, or Pneumatomachi. Within twenty years they had become so nearly coextensive with the semi-Arians, that the names were used as synonymous (Conc. Cpi. Can. i. τὴν [ἀρεσιν] τῶν Ἡμωριανῶν εἶπουν Πνευματομάχων).

o See the Arian sermons printed by Card. Mai (Scr. Vcl. Nov. Coll. iii. 202 sq.).

In 363 another synod of Alexandria, under the guidance of St. Athanasius, reaffirmed the Deity of the Spirit. Its synodical letter, addressed to the emperor Jovian, condemns those "who, wishing to revive the Arian heresy, denied the Nicene faith, which they pretended to confess, by misinterpreting the term ομοούσιον, and blaspheming the Holy Ghost, whom they declared to have been made by the Son (ποίημα διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ πεποιήσθαι); whereas the framers of the creed had glorified Him together with the Father and the Son, by including Him in the one Faith of the Holy Trinity" (μᾶλλον συνεδόξασαν αὐτὸ τῷ πατρὶ καὶ τῷ υἱῷ ἐν τῇ μιᾷ τῆς ἁγίας τριάδος πίστει, διὰ τὸ καὶ μίαν εἶναι ἐν τῇ ἁγίᾳ τριάδι θεότητα). (Ad Jovian, 4; Migne, xxvii. 820.) At Rome, on the other hand, the deputies of a Macedonian synod (Lampsacus, 365) succeeded in obtaining the support of pope Liberius, by suppressing, as we may suppose, their doctrine of the Holy Ghost, whilst they represented themselves as practically holding the Nicene doctrine of the Son. But in 366, on the accession of Damasus, the bubble burst, and at Rome, as at Alexandria, the new heresy was condemned by synod after synod. Hefele counts up four of these synods in the interval between 368 and 381 (ii. 287-393) their respective dates being the years 369, 374, 376, 380. In these councils the Roman church (1) declared the Holy Ghost to be increate, and of one majesty, essence (usiae), and power with the Father and the Son: (2) anathematized Arius, Macedonius, Eunomius, and all others who refused to assert the Holy Spirit's eternity, essential procession from the Father ("de Patre esse vere ac proprie"), omniscience, omnipresence, perfect unity with the Father and Son, distinct personality, and claim to universal adoration; all, again, who called the Spirit a creature or said that He was made by the Son, although they might be orthodox in other points. The true faith is declared to be the belief in a Trinity of one Godhead, power, majesty, and essence. This "tome of Damasus," as it was called, received the subscriptions of 146 bishops at Antioch in the year 378. (Hefele, pp. 291, 360-3.) In other parts of the church councils were held at this time with the same result. An Illyrian synod of A.D. 375 (?) professed faith in "the Consubstantial Trinity"; a Gallian synod seems to have taken the same course; and the ecclesiastical action of the West was followed by an imperial letter from Valentinus and his colleagues, in which the decision of the Church was fully affirmed. In the East, between 374 and 379, a synod was held at Iconium under St. Amphilocheus, from whose synodical letter we gather that the Nicene formula was still regarded as sufficient "for those at least who read it with intelligence"; in doxologies, however, the Spirit was to be glorified with the Father and the Son, according to the teaching of the baptismal formula (χρῆ . . . συνοδοξάζειν, cf. τὸ . . . συνοδοξάζομενον of the Constantinopolitan creed). Matters were in fact ripening for an authoritative expansion of the creed to meet the new and growing developments of heresy. The Macedonians were rapidly gaining ground, especially with the laity, who were attracted by the apparent simplicity of their doctrine, and by their moral lives (Soz., iv. 27). Apollinaris (if we may believe Gregory of Nazianzus, ad Cledon, ep. 1) had begun to speak of a "scale" of Deity, in which the Spirit stood not only last but lowest. Above all, Eunomius had combined the Arian and Macedonian views, and had worked them out into their boldest and coarsest form, holding the Spirit to be the creature of a Son, who was Himself the creature of the Uncreate: πρῶτον καὶ μείζον πάντων τοῦ μονογενοῦς ἔργων, προστάγματι μὲν τοῦ πατρὸς, ἐνεργείᾳ δὲ καὶ δυνάμει τοῦ υἱοῦ γενόμενον (Migne, xxx. 868). Even the word δημιούργημα was applied by the Eunomians to the Giver of Life (Basil. adv. Eun. ii. 33). Under these circumstances it is not surprising to find that the bishops had already begun to teach their flocks a fuller creed. Two such forms are found at the end of the Ancoratus of Epiphanius, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus. The first and shorter of the two is nearly identical with the creed now known as the Constantinopolitan, which has recently been shewn (by Dr. Hort, Two Dissertations) to be substantially the old baptismal creed of the church of Jerusalem, modified and enriched by the introduction of clauses drawn partly from the Nicene creed, partly from the writings of St. Athanasius and St. Cyril; the new statements as to the Holy Spirit belonging to the latter class. It seems probable that these additions were made to the Jerusalem creed by St. Cyril shortly after the Alexandrian synod of 362. But, be that as it may, in 374 the expanded creed is recommended by St. Epiphanius as one which should be taught to all catechumens. He adds a much longer form, in which the doctrine of the Holy Ghost is treated yet more fully: "On this wise we believe in Him, that He is the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of God . . . uncreate, proceeding from the Father and receiving (λαμβάνον: v. Hort, p. 122, note) from the Son, and the object of faith." At the end is the Nicene anathema, extended to those who refused to believe in the eternity or uncreated essence of the Holy Ghost.

At length, in 381, the work of local synods and episcopal confessions was clenched by the ruling of a second oecumenical council. It is true that the council which Theodosius summoned at Constantinople could scarcely have regarded itself as possessing oecumenical authority; whilst in the West it certainly was not regarded in this light before the 6th century (cf. Pusey, On the Clause "And the Son," pp. 36-39). Nevertheless the honours of oecumenicity were ultimately awarded to it by the whole church, because it completed the series of councils by which the doctrine of the Holy Ghost's Deity was affirmed, and in fact expressed the final judgment of the Catholic church upon the Macedonian controversy. The first canon of Constantinople rules (1) that the faith of Nicaea shall remain in force, (2) that "every heresy be anathematized, particularly the heresy of the Eunomians or Anomoeans, . . . and that of the semi-Arians or Pneumatomachi." It was followed by an imperial decree which required that the churches be given up to those bishops who held the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit to be "of one majesty, power, and glory" (Cod. Theodos. xvi.). Whether the creed known as the Constantinopolitan (v. supra) was recited at the council and received its sanction is perhaps open to question; it finds no place in the records of the council itself, nor in any extant document for the next seventy years, although at the end of that period it was recited at Chalcedon as the creed of the 150. Possibly it may have been read at Constantinople by St. Cyril, as a personal profession of faith, and in this way have received the approval of the assembled fathers. (Hort, pp. 106-7, and supra p. 75). Certainly its moderate yet sufficient expression of the Deity of the Holy Ghost fitly enshrines the conviction to which both West and East had been guided: [πιστεύομεν] εἰς τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον κύριον καὶ ζωοποιόν τὸ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον τὸ σὺν πατρὶ καὶ ἰσὺ συνπροσκυνούμενον καὶ συνομοζῶμενον τὸ ἀληθινὸν διὰ τῶν προφητῶν.

Other councils followed at Constantinople in 382 and 383, and gave the coup de grâce to the Pneumatomachian heresy. The council of 382 addressed a letter to the Westerns, in which the Eastern bishops professed their belief in a "consubstantial and coeternal Trinity." In 383 each party was required to deposit with the emperor a written confession of its faith, and the emperor, after perusing all, adopted further measures for the suppression of the sects which "divided" the indivisible Trinity. They were forbidden to hold assemblies or to ordain. In the East, at least, the orthodox doctrine of the Holy Ghost was now everywhere triumphant.

It is time to turn from the synodical action of the church to the treatment of this doctrine by individual writers and teachers who lived during the 4th century.

First of these in point of time comes Eusebius of Caesarea, whose long and industrious life (c. 264-340) links together the thought and work of the ante-Nicene age with those of post-Nicene times. An enthusiastic Origenist (Soer. ii. 21), and unable to understand that new heresies called for greater strictness of theological definition, he sometimes used language with regard to both the Son and the Holy Spirit which, judged by the standard of the 4th century, might lead us to class him with the advanced school of Arianism. With Eusebius the Spirit is third in dignity as well as in order (Præp. Evanq. vii. 16); He is the moon in the Divine Firmament; He receives all that He has from the Word; His very Being is through the Son. Thus He is neither "God" (i.e. ὁ ἀγέννητος θεός) nor "Son," since He has not received His origin from the Father like the Son, but is one of the things which were made by the Son (ὅτε θεός, οὔτε υἱός, ἐπεὶ μὴ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ὁμοίως τῷ υἱῷ καὶ αὐτὸ τὴν γένεσιν εἴληφεν· ἐν δέ τι τῶν διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ γενομένων (De Eccl. Theol. iii. 6). Yet He surpasses every generated nature—τῆς τρίτης δυνάμεως πᾶσαν ὑπερβεβηκυῖα γενητὴν φύσιν, οὕσας τε πρώτης μὲν τῶν διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ συστασῶν νοερῶν οὐσιῶν, τρίτης δὲ ἀπὸ τοῦ πρώτου αἰτίου. The procession of the Spirit seems to have been regarded by Eusebius as identical with His mission. He uses ἐκπορευέσθαι both of the Son and of the Spirit—in the latter case, in reference to the inspiration of the prophets, the baptism of Christ, and the sanctification of the elect.

If Eusebius allowed himself to use language which savoured of Arianism, his antagonist Marcellus hardly steered clear of Sabellian error.

He is said to have denied the proper personality of the Spirit (τὸν παράκλητον ἰδίως ὑφεισηκέναι, Basil. Ep. 263). He called the Spirit a "further extension of an extension" (παρέκτασιν τῆς ἐκτάσεως, Theodoret. Haer. Fab. ii. 18), and held that the Godhead is "one tripersonal hypostasis" (Euseb. Eccl. Th. iii. 6). He pleaded that his words had been misunderstood (Soer. i. 36), and to a great extent this may have been the case.<sup>1</sup> In the fragments of his work preserved by Eusebius he uses the Sabellian term πλατυσμός to express the truth that the unity of the Divine Essence is not broken by generation or procession. With regard to the procession of the Spirit, his view approaches remarkably near to that of the later Western church. He regards the Father and the Son as one undivided ἀρχή, and thus explains the fact that the Spirit, who proceeds from the Father, receives of the Son, and is by the Son given to mankind (Euseb. Eccl. Th. iii. 4-6).

St. Cyril of Jerusalem (315-386) lived to see the end of the great struggle which commenced in his childhood; and it is perhaps not surprising that during the course of the controversy his own views underwent modification perhaps more than once (Soz. iv. 25; vii. 8; Soer. v. 8). His treatise on the Holy Spirit (Catech. xvi., xvii.)—the first systematic work upon this doctrine—belongs to the earliest years of his ministry (347-8). It is difficult to discover its exact standpoint with regard to some of the questions afterwards in dispute; but the following points can be made out:—(1) He rejects the Origenist idea of a γένεσις of the Spirit by the Son; condemns (by anticipation, as it seems) the doctrine of the "servitude" of the Third Person (Catech. viii. 5; τὰ σύμπαντα μὲν δούλα αὐτοῦ . . . τὸ ἅγιον αὐτοῦ πνεῦμα ἐκτὸς τούτων πάντων). (2) He regards the Spirit as the coequal in dignity of the Father and the Son (Catech. iv. 16; σὺν πατρὶ καὶ υἱῷ τῆ τῆς θεότητος δόξῃ περιμνηται). (3) He lays great and repeated stress on the personal unity of the Spirit—on the hypostasis as distinguished from its manifestations. (4) Of the procession (if we except one probably spurious fragment, v. Migne, xxxiii. 964) he says nothing more than that the Son imparts to the Spirit that which He receives from the Father—πατὴρ μὲν δίδωσιν υἱῷ καὶ υἱὸς μεταδίδωσιν ἅγιον πνεῦματι (Catech. xvi. 24)—further than this, he thinks, it does not become us to push our inquiries. (5) On the other hand, into the operations of the Spirit no writer before Cyril, and scarcely any after him, enters at so much length. The sanctifying and deifying (θεσποιόν) grace of the Holy Ghost, he insists, is necessary to every intelligent nature, angels and archangels not excepted (iv. 6; cf. xvi. 23). Amongst men He inspired the prophets, descended on the Lord, was given to the apostles, is given to us in the moment of baptism (iv. 16, τὸ καὶ νῦν κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦ βαπτίσματος σφραγίζου σου τὴν ψυχὴν), and at our confirmation (xxi.

3, 3); He consecrates and changes the Eucharist (xiii.; v. 9, 17; πάντως γὰρ οὐ ἐν ἐφάψαιτο τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα, τούτο ἡγιασται καὶ μεταβέβηται . . . ἅγια τὰ προκείμενα ἐπιφοίτησιν δεξάμενα ἁγίου πνεύματος); suggests all holy thoughts (xvi. 19), and, like fire, at once consumes the sins and illuminates the souls of all who receive His grace (xvii. 5).

To St. Athanasius the doctrine of the Holy Ghost owes scarcely less than the cognate doctrine of the Son. His systematic treatment of the subject is to be found in the letters to Serapion (v. supra). (1) He meets the error of the Tropici on the broad ground that a mixture of natures in the One undivided Trinity is inconceivable (Serap. i. 17; εἰ κτίσμα ἦν, οὐ συνετάσσετο τῇ τριάδι· ὅλη γὰρ εἰς θεὸς ἐστίν). (2) In working out this argument he is led to examine the relation of the Spirit to the Father and to the Son; and thus for the first time we are presented with something like a scientific treatment of the Procession dogma. (a) Already in the Ecthesis he had called the Spirit ἐκπόρευμα τοῦ πατρὸς (§ 6), and it has been observed that the formula τὸ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον (a combination, as it seems, of John xv. 26 with 1 Cor. ii. 12) is frequent in his pages (Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 86, notes 3, 4, 5). Moreover, the attempt of the Tropici to combine the Catholic doctrine of the Son with a rejection of the Deity of the Spirit led Athanasius into a vein of thought hitherto little worked, viz., the essential relation of the Spirit to the Son. In his Orations against the Arians he had struck this vein. The Spirit, he had said, was, even before the Incarnation, given by the Word as being His very own (Ἰδιον: i. 46, 48). The Spirit receives all He has from the Word; the Word, not the Spirit, is the link of union with the Father (iii. 24; οὐ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸν λόγον συνάπτει τῷ πατρὶ· ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον τὸ πνεῦμα παρὰ τοῦ λόγου λαμβάνει). In the letters to Serapion the idea is worked out further. "The living energy and gift of the Living Word is said to proceed from (ἐκ) the Father, because it shines forth and is sent and given from the Word, who is confessed to be of (ἐκ) the Father. Thus the Holy Ghost has the same relation in point of order and nature (τοιαυτὴν τάξιν καὶ φύσιν) to the Son, as the Son to the Father. As the Son, who is in the Father, and in whom the Father is, belongs to the essence of the Father (ἴδιος τῆς τοῦ πατρὸς οὐσίας); so the Spirit, who is in the Son, and in whom the Son is, must not be numbered amongst created beings or separated from the Word (i. 20, 21). The Son being of (ἐκ) the Father, belongs to the Father's Essence (ἴδιος τῆς οὐσίας αὐτοῦ); consequently, the Spirit being of (ἐκ) God, must belong essentially to the Son (ἴδιος κατ' οὐσίαν, ib. 25). So far is the Holy Ghost from being external or alien to the Word (ἐκτὸς τοῦ λόγου), that it is through being in the Word that He is in God (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ ὅν ἐν τῷ θεῷ δι' αὐτοῦ ἐστίν, iii. 5). He is the very form (μορφή) and express image (εἰκών) of the Son, as the Son is the form and image of the Father (iii. 2; iv. 3)." Thus the position of the Pneumatomachi was untenable; they could not sincerely maintain the Deity of the Son, while they impugned the Deity of the Holy Ghost: εἰ γὰρ ἐφρόνον ἄρθως περὶ τοῦ λόγου, ἐφρόνον ἐγκρίως καὶ περὶ τοῦ πνεύματος, ὃ παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται, καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ ἴδιον ὅν παρ' αὐτοῦ δίδεται τοῖς μαθηταῖς. It is impossible not to see in these statements another approach to the Western doctrine of the procession. With regard to the mission of the Spirit, St. Athanasius, like St. Cyril, holds that, whilst the whole creation is the field of His operations, He works in an especial and peculiar manner upon the baptized, whom He unites to God (τῇ τοῦ πνεύματος μετοχῇ συναπτόμεθα τῷ θεότητι), and who, in virtue of this union, are in a manner "deified" (θεοποιούνται: iii. 24, 25).

A few years later the teaching of Athanasius on this subject was carried a stage further by Didymus. According to the last great catechist of the school of Alexandria, the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father ἀνάρχως, ὁμοουσῶς, ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀρρήτως. Thus the procession of the Spirit is strictly parallel to the generation of the Son: the Second and Third Persons derive their essence from the Father συνυφεστώτως καὶ συμπροεληλυθότως (de Trin. ii. 1, 2). Yet if the Spirit proceeds from the Father, He also abides with the Son in a manner peculiar to the Godhead (ἐκπορεύεται παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ μένει παρὰ τῷ υἱῷ θεϊκῶς: ib. 21). In his earlier work, On the Holy Spirit, if we may trust Jerome's translation and its existing MSS., Didymus deals with this topic in language which scarcely falls short of the later Latin church teaching; e.g., he writes: "Neque alia substantia est Spiritus Sancti praeter id quod datur ei a Filio." Still stronger statements of this view are to be found in the writings of St. Epiphanius, where there is no reason to distrust the MSS., and the Greek text is still extant. In treating of the procession of the Holy Spirit, Epiphanius avoids the use of the preposition διὰ, always employing ἐκ or παρὰ (Pusey, On the Clause, &c., p. 119). He does not hesitate to say that the Spirit is from the Father and the Son (ἐκ, παρὰ πατρὸς καὶ υἱοῦ; or παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ ἐκ τοῦ υἱοῦ; Ancor. 9. 73); from both (παρ' ἁμφοτέρων: ib. 69-70); from the essence or Godhead of both (ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς οὐσίας, ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς θεότητος, ἐκ πατρὸς καὶ υἱοῦ; Haer. 62, § 4). Yet in common with all the Greek fathers Epiphanius refrains from using the verb ἐκπορεύεσθαι to denote the Spirit's eternal relation to the Son. "The Spirit," he repeatedly says, "proceeds from the Father and receives from the Son," thus adhering to the distinction apparently observed in our Lord's own words (John xv. 26; xvi. 14).

The doctrine of the Holy Spirit was treated with even greater fulness and precision by the great Cappadocians of the 4th century, St. Basil and the two Gregories. The first-named of these fathers, indeed, out of tenderness for the scruples of weak brethren, abstained from calling the Holy Ghost God, lest he should be thought to hold tritheistic views (Greg. Naz. Or. 33; cf. Basil, Ep. 70). But he pointed out that the Holy Ghost is neither a creature nor a servant of God; that though third in Order, He is One in essence with the First and the Second Persons (Adv. Eunom. iii. init.), and is, therefore, to be classed with Them (συναριθμείσθαι) not in a subordinate category (ὕπαριθμείσθαι) and to be glorified with Them as coequal (De Sp. S. 17, 29, 32).* With regard to the relation between the persons, Basil maintained that the procession is essential and eternal (De Sp. S. 16, 18; Hom. in s. xxxii.); that the relation of the Spirit to the Son corresponds with the relation of the Son to the Father (ὡς ἔχει ὁ υἱὸς πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, ὡς πρὸς τὸν υἱὸν τὸ πνεῦμα); that He is the Spirit of the Son, and manifested through the Son (διὰ υἱοῦ πεφηνέναι: Adv. Eunom. v.); that He depends on the Son (τοῦ υἱοῦ ἤρτηται), yet is united to the Father as the principle from which He proceeds (Ep. 38). Hence our way of approach to God is in the Spirit through the Son: He who lays hold of the furthest link of a chain draws the whole towards him, so he who attracts to himself the Holy Ghost, attracts also the Son and the Father. Thus, whilst on our part we advance from the Spirit through the Son to the Father, the life of God proceeds in an opposite order: ἡ φύσις ἀγιότης καὶ ὁ ἀπὸ φύσιν ἀγιασμός καὶ τὸ βασιλικὸν ἀξίωμα ἐκ πατρὸς διὰ τοῦ μονογενοῦς ἐπὶ τὸ πνεῦμα διήκει (De Sp. S. 18). In some sense, therefore, the Spirit is through the Son, not however in the manner suggested by Origen (ib. 29), still less after the Eunomian conception. Lastly, with regard to the work of the Holy Spirit, St. Basil held a general operation on all created things, a particular operation on all good men (πάντα μὲν πληροῦν τῇ δυνάμει, μόνοις ἔδν μεθεκτὸν τοῖς ἀξίοις, De Sp. S. 9), and a special presence vouchsafed to all the baptized, although unworthy (ib. 16). The fullest manifestation of the Holy Ghost is reserved for the future life (τῶν δικαίων στέφανος ἡ τοῦ πνεύματος ἐστὶ χάρις, when the lost will be finally cut off from His help and grace (ib. infra). St. Basil's brother, Gregory of Nyssa, strikes out a bolder path. Starting with a careful discrimination of the terms οὐσία and ὑπόστασις—the former is explained as = τὸ ὑποκείμενον; the latter as a συνδρομή τῶν περὶ ἕκαστον διαμετῶν—he proceeds to argue that since the nature of God is simple and indivisible, the relation of the οὐσία to the ὑποστάσεις in God must be one of διάκρισις συνημμένη and συνάφεια ἀκακρυμμένη. Between the hypostases he finds, in the first place, a twofold division into (1) the principle (2) the derived; the second head subdivides itself into (a) the immediately, (b) the mediately derived (Migne, Patr. Gr. xlv. 134); thus:

 { τὸ προσεχὲς ἐκ τοῦ πρώτου = ὁ υἱός τὸ αἰτιατὸν { τὸ διὰ τοῦ προσεχὲς ἐκ τοῦ πρώτου = τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα.

Hence, although the Holy Spirit proceeds coeternally with the generation of the Son (τὸ πν. συμπαραμαρτυρῶν τῷ λόγῳ), He is, nevertheless, of the Father in such wise that He is also through the Son; for otherwise He would be a second Son (τῆς τοῦ υἱοῦ μεσιτείας αὐτῷ τὸ μονογενὲς φυλαττούσης). In this sense, therefore, i.e. having regard to the "principle" of Godhead (κατὰ τὸν τῆς αἰτίας λόγον), the Spirit may be conceived of as posterior to the Son, although in fact neither is prior or posterior to the other, since the life of God is not conditioned by time. In a solitary passage which is found only in a few MSS., but those (it is right to add) of great age, Gregory of Nyssa speaks of the Spirit as from the Son (ἐκ τοῦ υἱοῦ, De Orat. Domin. iii.). If the words are genuine, they must be interpreted by the language which he usually holds upon the subject, i.e., as equivalent to ἐκ διαδόσεως διὰ τοῦ μέσου (Adv. Marcell. 6) —in other words, as = ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ.

St. Gregory of Nazianzus treated the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in a more popular and practical way. On his promotion to the see of Constantinople he found the wildest chaos of opinions prevalent in that city upon the subject: οἱ μὲν ἐνέργειαν τοῦτο [sc. τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα] ὑπέλαβον, οἱ δὲ κτίσμα, οἱ δὲ θεόν οἱ δὲ οὐκ ἐγνωσαν ὁπότερον τούτων αἰδοῖ τῆς γραφῆς (Or. Th. v. 5). When he proceeded to preach the Deity of the Holy Ghost he was in danger of being stoned in the streets as "a setter forth of strange gods." He met the opposition of the Pneumatomachi by the plainest statements of the Catholic doctrine. "Is the Spirit God?" he asks in one of his sermons. "Yes. But is He consubstantial? Yes, if He is God." He appealed both to Scripture and to the experience of the Christian life. "If the Spirit is not to be adored, how can He deify me (ἐμὲ θεοῦ) in baptism? From the Spirit comes our new birth, from the new birth our new life, and from the new life our knowledge of the dignity of Him from whom it is derived." But why had the doctrine of the Spirit's Godhead been so little dwelt upon in earlier times? He answers that it came last in the order of the Divine revelation. The Old Testament revealed the Father, in the New the Son was manifested; each truth had to be firmly established in the minds of men before the next could follow. The Deity of the Holy Ghost was one of those truths which the Church could not bear at first, but which she is now learning from the Divine Comforter Himself (ib. 26, 27). On the doctrine of the procession, as we might have expected, St. Gregory speaks less decidedly. He deems it enough to know that the Holy Ghost is not begotten but proceeding (προῖδν ἐκπορευτῶς, Or. in S. lumina), and that procession (ἡ ἐκπεψίσις) is His distinctive property (τὸ ἴδιον), which involves at once His personality and His essential Deity (Or. Th. v. 7, 8).

One more witness may complete the testimony of the Eastern church of the 4th century. St. Ephraem of Edessa (ib. 375), who represents the East Syrian or Mesopotamian church, teaches that the Father "produced the Holy Ghost out of His own substance, neither before nor after the Word, but together with Him, seeing that the Godhead of the Holy Trinity is coeternal" (Opp. i. 127). He interprets Gen. i. 2, of the Holy Ghost, "the Spirit of God the Father, from whom He proceeds timelessly, with whom and with His only begotten Son He is equal in essence and power" (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i. 65). The Holy Ghost, he says, "is mingled" with the waters of baptism and "blended" with the bread of the Eucharist (Rhythms, 40, Oxf. tr. p. 235); the greatest of angels are taught by His inspirations (ib. 5, p. 120). But speculations on

x. xlv. an inscription is given, which runs: δόξα πατρὶ καὶ υἱῷ καὶ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι. This inscription is dated 369. St. Basil was consecrated A.D. 370, and his treatise de Spiritu Sancto, in which he defends the conglorification of the Spirit, belongs perhaps to the year 374-5.

this doctrine are to be shunned by the devout. "Love the brooding of the Holy Spirit, and approach not to pry into Him. The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost by their names are comprehended; be not curious about their subsistencies . . . what blendeth their distinctions, what distinguisheth their blessed estates." (2nd Rhythm, conc. Faith, p. 400 sq.)*

Even in the West theological thought had been active upon this subject during the 4th century. Two Gallican bishops, both from Aquitaine, led the way. Phoebadius of Agen, writing Against the Arians about 358, touches lightly upon the questions which were then just coming into view. "If any man takes offence at our doctrine of the Son, let him know that we hold the Spirit to be of God (de Deo), distinct in Person (alius) from the Son, as the Son is from the Father." A year or two years later the greater St. Hilary of Poitiers put the finishing stroke to his treatise On the Trinity. His treatment of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit shews how reluctantly Catholic writers of this period were forced into a minute examination of the mystery of the Spirit's Being. "There should be no need," he says, "to speak at length of the Holy Spirit; and yet since some are ignorant we cannot hold our peace. The Spirit, as to His origin, is of the Father and the Son ([de] Patre et Filio auctoribus confitendus est). If the Arians insist on asking such questions as, Through whom is He? for what end? of what nature? we can only reply with Apostles and Prophets, He is through (per) Him through whom are all things [= the Son, cf. De Trin. ii. 1], and from (ex) Him from whom are all things [= the Father, ib.]." In answer to the inquiry whether the Spirit is from the Father or from the Son (utrum ex Patre an ex Filio), Hilary refers to St. John xv. 12 sq. It is clear, he argues, that the Spirit receives from the Son, and so from the Father also, so that He may be said "accipere ex utroque" (De Trin. viii. 20; cf. Op. Hist. Fragm. ii. 31); but he does not decide whether accipere = procedere, nor does he venture to speak of a procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son. His own phrase is ex Patre per Filium (xii. 53, 57). With regard to the operations of the Third Person, Hilary holds that the Holy Spirit comes to us first in baptism (initia Spiritus Sancti, Tract. in Ps. lxiv.). The Spirit's work is that of an Advocate, and His advocacy is exerted in enabling our feeble powers to grasp and believe the Incarnation (De Trin. vi. 35). We have natural capacities for understanding revelation; we have eyes to see the truth; but eyes are not light; we must be enlightened by the Holy Ghost, or our eyes let in only darkness. Lastly, the work of the Spirit in us requires the co-operation of our own wills: "in tantum datur in quantum quis volet sumere; in tantum residet in quantum quis volet promereri."

Trinity, against Arius. His work presents a marked contrast to the calm and judicial style of St. Hilary; but the following accords with Hilary's view of the procession:—"We confess also the Holy Ghost as having all things from (ex) God the Father, the Word (that is, Jesus Christ) delivering to Him all things that Christ hath from (a) the Father." Victorinus is perhaps the first of Latin writers to call the Spirit the "Bond" (connexio, complexio) of the Father and the Son (De Trin. Hymn. 3). But much of his language is obscure, if not unsound, and the piety of the writer is more conspicuous than his power as a theologian. A far more important contributor to the western literature on this subject is St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, whose De Spiritu Sancto, written in the year of the second Council, is in fact the earliest Latin monograph upon the doctrine of the Spirit. His treatment of the doctrine is not original; for use is made of materials gathered from Athanasius, Didymus Basil, and Gregory of Nyssa (Migne, Patr. Lat. xvi. 730); the arrangement, however, is due to St. Ambrose, and much of the vigour of the thought. Objections are answered seriatim; and the arguments for the Deity of the Holy Spirit are arranged with remarkable skill and power. The Holy Ghost is shewn to be Very God, inasmuch as He (1) is impeccable, (2) has power to forgive sin, (3) has power to create, (4) is a proper object of Divine worship. Ambrose uses the word procedere to express the Spirit's temporal mission, and in this sense does not scruple to speak of a procession of the Spirit from the Incarnate Son. "Not as though the Spirit were sent or proceeded from a place, when He proceeds from (ex) the Son. . . . In proceeding from (a) the Father and the Son, the Spirit is not separated from the Father or from the Son" (De Sp. S. i. 11). The Son is "the Fountain of the Holy Spirit, who is with God" (ib. i. 15). The doctrine of an eternal procession from the Son is not expressly taught by St. Ambrose, but it certainly seems to underlie such a temporal procession as he maintains. Moreover he regards the "receiving from" the Son as parallel to "proceeding from" the Father (De Sp. S. ii. 11), whilst in his later commentary on St. Luke (c. viii.) he incidentally speaks of the essential goodness which the Son receives from the Father as communicated by the Son to the Holy Ghost.

St. Augustine, the spiritual son of St. Ambrose, completed the development in the Latin church of the procession-dogma. In the year 391 Augustine, then a presbyter of the church of Hippo, was summoned by the great African synod of that year to deliver a dogmatic discourse, which is preserved among his writings under the title De Fide et Symbolo. In approaching the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, he warned the synod that this subject had not yet been fully investigated by the church (De F. et S. c. 9 "de Spiritu Sancto autem nondum tam copiose ac diligenter disputatum est"). Already, however, certain landmarks had been fixed. The Spirit is the gift of God, but in His nature He is not inferior to the Giver. He is not begotten either of the Father or of the Son, nor is he ingenerate, in the sense of having no principium, but owes His Being to the Father. Less certain is the view which regards Him as the mutual Love of the Father and the Son. The essential truth is that He is God, one in nature with the Father and the Son, although in Person distinct. In a sermon preached about the same time to catechumens, Augustine says:—"We believe in the Holy Ghost, who proceeds from the Father, yet is not the Son; who abides in the Son, yet is not the Father of the Son; who receives from the Son, yet is not the Son of the Son, but the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; the Holy Spirit, who is Himself God." When at a later period of his life the systematic mind of the great Doctor began to desiderate a fuller doctrine of the Spirit, he started from the same basis—"The one Spirit is the Spirit of Both" ("non sunt eis singulis singuli, sed unus amborum est" De Civ. Dei, xiii. 24, § 3). The next step is gained in the De Trinitate, which was in its author's hands for nearly twenty years, but first appeared in its present form subsequently to the year 415. In this treatise, after pointing out the connexion between procession and mission ("mitti est cognosci quod ab eo procedat"), Augustine distinctly says, "We cannot [in the face of John xx. 22] affirm that the Spirit does not proceed also from the Son" (iv. 20). Next, in order to guard the μοναρχία, he holds that as the Father is the principium of the Son, the Father and the Son are the One principium of the Holy Ghost (v. 14). Nevertheless there is this difference between the procession of the Spirit from the Father and His procession from the Son; from the Father he proceeds principaliter, from the Son, by virtue of the Father's eternal gift and generation:—"Filius de Patre natus est, et Sp. S. de Patre principaliter et, ipso sine ullo temporis intervallo dante, communiter de utroque procedit" (xv. 25). As if anticipating the objection of the later Eastern church, Augustine continues, We have no right to infer from John xv. 26 that a procession from the Son is excluded: "sic ait de Patre procedit ut non diceret de me non procedit" (Tract. in S. Joann. xcix. 6, 7; cf. C. Maxim. ii. 14). Further, he is careful to strengthen his position by applying the doctrine of the procession to a mystical and devotional purpose, which won for it a ready acceptance by the preachers and the faithful of the Western church. To St. Augustine in great part is due the working out of the view already mentioned, which regards the Holy Ghost as the essential Love of the Father and the Son, the consubstantial coeternal Communion, the Unity, Charity, Sanctity, which belongs to Both, proceeds from Both, and knits Each to the Other in the endless ebb and flow of the Divine Life (De Trin. vi. 5; xv. 20).

On the work of the Holy Spirit, Augustine is equally full, though his teaching on this subject has less of dogmatic interest. As he brought out the Deity and procession of the Spirit against the attacks of Arianism, so against Pelagianism, which was a virtual denial of the Spirit's office (cf. Pearson, art. viii.), he maintained the necessity of His preventing and co-operating grace. This is not the place to enter upon the history of the Pelagian heresy, but the following canons of the Council of Orange (529) shew at once the bearing of that controversy on the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, and the answer which the Western church, as led by St. Augustine, returned to the Pelagian and semi-Pelagian views:

—"Si quis ut a peccato purgemur voluntatem nostram Deum expectare contendit, non autem ut etiam purgari velimus per sancti Spiritus infusionem et operationem in nos fieri confitetur, resistit ipsi Spiritui Sancto [Prov. xix. 21, Philipp. ii. 13]." "Si quis sicut augmentum, ita etiam initium fidei ipsumque credulitatis affectum, quo in eum credimus qui justificat impium et ad generationem sacri baptismatis pervenimus, non per gratiae donum, id est, per inspirationem Spiritus Sancti. . . sed naturaliter nobis inesse dicit, apostolicis dogmatibus adversarius approbatur" (Conc. Araus. ii. Can. iv. v.; comp. also vi., vii., xvii.).

In the East St. Augustine's contemporary, Theodore of Mopsuestia (circ. 394-328), was meantime handling the doctrine of the Holy Ghost in a manner peculiar to himself. In Theodore's extant writings the following ideas upon the subject continually appear: (1) The Holy Spirit was not revealed under the old dispensation as a distinct Person in the God-head (Comm. in Agg., c. ii.; Migne, lxxvi. 484-5, especially these words:—ἡ παλαιὰ δὲ (ὡς ἔφη) πνεῦμα ἄγιον ἐν ἰδίῳ προσώπῳ καὶ ἄποστατοῖς ἰδίᾳ κενωρισμένους τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἐπίστατο πνεῦμα δὲ ἅγιον ἐκάλει, ἦτοι πνεῦμα θεοῦ, τὴν χάριν αὐτοῦ ἢ τὴν ἐπιστασίαν ἢ τὴν κηδεμονίαν, κ.τ.λ.).<sup>5</sup> But this remark is extended to the Son (infra, Migne, 501). (2) The Spirit was not given before the Ascension; hence the insufflation recorded in John xx. 22 was merely prospective, and our Lord's λάβετε πνεῦμα ἅγιον is equivalent to λήμψεθε πν. ἅγ. (3) The special office of the Holy Spirit is that of the Giver of Life (fragm. on Rom. viii. 2, τῆς ἀθανάτου ζωῆς παρεκτικόν), by whom the Lord was raised from the dead, and whom in baptism we receive as the earnest and pledge of our own resurrection, and of our perfection, which is hereafter to be wrought out by His agency. This view is sometimes carried to the extent of throwing into the shade the present ethical operations of the Spirit. Thus ἐν πνεύματι (Rom. viii. 2) is explained as meaning simply ἐν ἐλπίδι τῆς ἀθανάσιας (Migne, 882), (4) Theodore's doctrine of the Incarnation leads him to dwell at unusual length on the operation of the Spirit upon the Man Christ. The Man assumed by the Word—ἰληθὲς—was accounted worthy to be inhabited by the Holy Spirit in a manner altogether unique (ἡξιώθη γούν καὶ τῆς τοῦ πνεύματος ἐνοικήσεως πρώτος παρὰ τοὺς λοιποὺς ἀνθρώπους καὶ ἡξιώθη ταύτης οὐχ ὁμοίως τοῖς λοιποῖς). To other men belongs a μερικὴ μετουσία of the Spirit; He received the whole (ἅπαν τὸ πνεῦμα). By the Holy Spirit the Man was formed of the substance of the Virgin to be the Temple of the Eternal Word. By the Holy Spirit the same Man, on account of His singular merits, received at his baptism an adoption, regeneration, and unction peculiarly His own (Migne, 980-1, 998, 1018). By the Holy Spirit the miracles of Christ were wrought, His foreknowledge of future events imparted, and His perfect sanctity attained (Sachau, Fragm. Syr. pp. 65, 66). Our participation in the Spirit depends upon our incorporation into the Man on whom the fulness of the Spirit was thus outpoured (on Eph. i. 23: "Corpus eius sumus omnes nos qui credimus, similitudine naturae participationem suscipientes gratiae Spiritus illius qui in eo factus est . . . illam participationem percipimus quae apud eum est"). (5) Theodore's comment on St. John xv. 26 is explicit in favour of the doctrine of an essential procession of the Spirit from the Father: ἐξ αὐτῆς τοῦ πατρὸς τῆς οὐσίας ἔχει τὴν ὑπαρξίν· εἰ γὰρ μὴ φυσικῆ ἐκείθεν πρὸδόν ἐλεγεν διὰ τοῦ 'ἐκπορεύεται,' ἀλλὰ τὴν ἀποστολὴν ἐξωθεν γινομένην, ἄπορον περὶ τίνας λέγει, κ.τ.λ. This property (ἰδικόν τι) of proceeding distinguishes the Divine Spirit from created angels, who are simply the ministers and messengers of the Deity. The ecthesis which bears Theodore's name, and asserts his views, whilst laying stress on the essential Deity, distinct personality, and eternal procession of the Spirit, seems for the first time to strike the note of opposition to the dogma of the Spirit's eternal derivation through the Son (οὔτε υἱὸν νομίζομεν, οὔτε διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ τὴν ὑπαρξίν εἰληφός); although it may be doubted whether in this clause the belief is already in view.

In the year which followed Theodore's death, Alexandria and the West became acquainted, through the preaching of Nestorius, with the views of the Antiochene school upon the Incarnation and the doctrine of the Spirit. On the latter point, although it came into sight only in an incidental manner, issue was at once joined by Cyril, in the ninth of his famous anathematisms: εἰ τις φησὶν τὸν ἕνα κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν δοξάζεσθαι παρὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, ὡς ἀλλοτρίᾳ δυνάμει τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτοῦ χρώμενοι καὶ παρ' αὐτοῦ λαβόντα τὸ ἐνεργεῖν δύνασθαι κατὰ πνευματῶν ἀκαθάρτων καὶ τὸ πληροῦν εἰς ἀνθρώπους τὰς θεοσημείας, καὶ οὐχὶ δὴ μᾶλλον ἴδιον αὐτοῦ τὸ πνεῦμα φησὶν, δι' οὗ καὶ ἐνήργησεν τὰς θεοσημείας· ἀνάθεμα ἔστω. In Theodoret's reply to these anathematisms, this assertion of Cyril that the Spirit is the Son's "very own" was challenged as blasphemous, if it implied more than His consubstantiality with the Son and procession from the Father: ἴδιον δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ υἱοῦ, εἰ μὲν ὡς ὁμοφυῆς καὶ ἐκ πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον ἔφη, συνομολογήσομεν καὶ ὡς εὐσεβῆ δεξιόμεθα τὴν φωνήν· εἰ δὲ ὡς ἐξ υἱοῦ ἢ δι' υἱοῦ τὴν ὑπαρξίν ἔχον, ὡς βλάσφημον τοῦτο καὶ ὡς δυσσεβὲς ἀπορρίβωμεν.<sup>a</sup> In the following year (431) the third oecumenical council approved Cyril's letter which contained the anathema, without noticing Theodoret's objection. Cyril had appended an explanation, which looked very much like a direct assertion of the Spirit's derivation from the Son (ἴδιον ἔχον τὸ ἐξ αὐτοῦ καὶ οὐσιωδῶς ἐμπεφυκὸς αὐτῷ πνεῦμα ἄγιον), and this, too, passed the council; whilst, on the other hand, it condemned the Theodorean creed already mentioned, in which a ὑπαρξὶς διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ was denied. But here the controversy ended for the time. St. Cyril, however, after the council, continued to speak of the Spirit as ἐξ υἱοῦ (παρ' υἱοῦ, δι' υἱοῦ), and his doctrine of the procession seems to have been substantially one with St. Augustine's. Thus he says that the Son "gives the Spirit out of his own fulness" (adv. Nest. iv. 1), and according to the law of His nature (παρ' αὐτοῦ κατὰ φύσιν προχέμενον (in S. Joann. i. 33), and that the Spirit is thus "shed forth essentially from both [the Father and the Son], or, in other words, from the Father through the Son (οὐσιωδῶς ἐξ ἀμφοῖν, ἤγουν ἐκ πατρὸς δι' υἱοῦ, προχέμενον). St. Cyril lays stress on the practical effects of this view of the relation which the Spirit bears to our Lord. Since He is the very Spirit of Christ, Christ dwells by Him in the faithful (σχετικῆ ἐνοίκησις, ἐνωσις) who are united to the Lord and to the rest of His body, with which, through the Spirit, they become concorporeal (σύσσωμοι) in the Holy Eucharist (adv. Nest. iv. 5).

It is remarkable that in the far East the language of St. Cyril upon the Spirit's relation to the Son had been anticipated before the rise of Nestorianism. In 410 the council of Seleucia (Mesopotamia), which was presided over by two bishops since numbered among the saints, St. Isaac and St. Maruthas, and which was afterwards acknowledged as authoritative by Jacobites and Nestorians alike—put forth an exposition of faith containing the words, "We confess the living Holy Spirit, the living Paraclete, who is from the Father and the Son (ἐκ πατρὸς καὶ υἱοῦ)" in one Trinity." The Armenian version of the homilies of Severianus, bishop of Gabala, who died early in the 5th century, represents him as having taught indifferently that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, and that He proceeds from the essence of the Father and of the Son (Aucher, pp. 15, 17). After the rise of Nestorianism, the latter view was naturally more prevalent among Jacobites than among Nestorians. In the Jacobite liturgies the Holy Spirit is repeatedly said not only to proceed from the Father but to "receive" or "receive substantially" from the Son. The Nestorian liturgies on the other hand refer in a pointed way to the procession from the Father, without alluding to the relation which the Spirit bears to the Son; e.g., the liturgy of Theodore says, "We confess the Holy Ghost of the glorious essence of Thy Godhead, who proceeds forth from Thee, O Father, and with Thee and with Thine Only-begotten Son is praised, worshipped, and revered by all."<sup>v</sup>

In the West, the 5th century, besides producing the writings of St. Augustine, was fruitful in dogmatic treatises which bore more or less directly upon the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. Two Western treatises deal exclusively with the subject—the De Spiritus Sancti Potentia of Nicetas of Aquileia, and a work of Paschasius, the Roman deacon, who died A.D. 512. From the African church about the same time proceeded twelve books On the Trinity by Vigilus, bishop of Thapsus, and more than one work on the same subject by Augustine's devoted follower Fulgentius, bishop of the neighbouring see of Ruspe. Of these writers, Nicetas is content to teach in firm and vigorous language the Deity of the Holy Ghost; with regard to His procession he merely says, "Sufficit fidelibus scire quia Filius quidem genitus est, Spiritus autem de Patre procedens est; et ipsis utamur verbis quibus uti divina Scriptura nos voluit"; adding, "Cuius processio aut qualis aut quanta sit nulli conceditur scire" (Migne, Patr. Lat. lii. 356). But the bishop of remote and half-Eastern Aquileia stands alone in this reserve. Before the year 450 we find the first great preacher of the Roman church, St. Leo, teaching that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Father and of the Son, not as though He were their creature, but as deriving His eternal existence from that which is the Father and the Son (sempiternæ ex quo quod est Pater Filiusque subsistens); that our Lord's words, "He shall receive of Mine" imply that "the Son, of the Father's gift, gives to the Spirit that which the Spirit receives" (Serm. 65, 66; Migne, liv. 402-4). The Gallican and African churches—the former, in spite of the semi-Pelagianism which placed many of its teachers in antagonism to St. Augustine—held this view with even greater distinctness. Thus Gennadius of Marseilles, writing early in the second half of the 5th century, begins his manual "On the Doctrine of the Church" with the words "Credimus unum esse Deum, Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum; Patrem eo quod Filium habeat, Filium eo quod Patrem habeat, Spiritum Sanctum eo quod sit ex Patre Filioque procedens." The Holy Spirit, he continues, is not begotten, for He is not Son; nor is He ingenerate, for He is not Father; nor made, for He is not from (ex) nothing, but He is God, proceeding from (ex) God the Father and God the Son. Another Gallican priest of this century, Julianus Pomerius, regards the doctrine of the Filioque as an elementary truth which should be taught to the laity; "as to the Holy Spirit, we ought to instruct them how He proceeds from the Father and the Son, and cannot be called either generate or ingenerate." Avitus, archbishop of Vienne (ob. 523) goes so far as to assert that this view of the procession was already included in the rule of the Catholic Faith (Migne, lix. 385-6). In North Africa, about the same time, Vigilius declares that it is the property of the Holy Ghost to proceed from the Father and the Son; whilst Fulgentius treats this view of the procession as imperative: "firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites eundem Spiritum Sanctum, qui Patris et Filii unus Spiritus est, de Patre et Filio procedere; de Filio quoque procedere Spiritum Sanctum prophetica atque apostolica nobis doctrina commendat."

One thing only was still wanting to secure for the Augustinian doctrine of the procession a lasting place in the traditions of the Western Church. It had not yet been incorporated into any generally accepted creed. To the Church of Spain it was reserved to gain for it this crowning honour. Two causes co-operated to render the Spanish clergy painfully alive to the importance of a fuller symbolical statement of the Catholic doctrine. Priscillianism disturbed the peace of the Church in Spain, from the end of the 4th century to the end of the 6th; and, amongst its other errors Priscillianism revived the Sabel-lian view of the Trinity (Aug. c. Priscill. 4), and, as it seems, confounded the Persons of the Son and the Spirit (Oros. Comm. ad Aug. 2). Further, at the beginning of the 5th century, the invasion of the Visigoths brought in a deluge of the worst form of Arianism, including the Eunnoman doctrine of the creation of the Spirit by the Son. These attacks upon the truth compelled the Spanish Church to formulate her faith in a series of confessions which abound in the most precise dogmatism upon the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The series opens with a "Rule of the Catholic Faith against all heresies, and especially against the Priscillianists." It is framed on the creed of Nicaea, with expansions necessary for meeting new heresies. "We believe"—the bishops of Spain and Portugal profess—"in One God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—one Trinity of Divine Essence. . . The Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but proceeding from the Father and the Son. The Father is unbegotten, the Son begotten, the Paraclete not begotten, but proceeding from the Father and the Son." This faith, although placed in the Concilia under the year 400, probably belongs to the synod or synods of 447, held on the recommendation of pope Leo, whose own letter to Turibius on the subject of this council incidentally asserts the procession of the Spirit "from Both" (Leo, Ep. 15; Migne, liv. 680). The profession put forth under this high sanction may have regulated the belief of the Spanish Church throughout the rest of the period of Arian ascendancy; but it is not before the conversion of the Visigoths that the Filioque reappears in the records of the national synods. At Toledo, in 589, king Reccared and his subjects made their solemn submission to the Church, acknowledging the authority of the first four oecumenical councils and rehearsing the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople. In the second of its capitula, this Spanish council of 589 ordered that the creed should thenceforth be recited by the people at mass, just before the Pater noster; adding that the form then to be used must be that of the Eastern churches, namely, the one prescribed by the Council of Constantinople. The synod, therefore, without doubt imagined that the Latin creed which it rehearsed was a faithful representation of the Greek original.* Yet in this Toletan version, the article on the Holy Ghost runs as follows: "Credimus et in Spiritum Sanctum, dominum et vivificantem, ex Patre ET FILIO procedentem." How the words "et Filio" had found their way into the Latin must remain matter of conjecture; possibly they originated in a marginal gloss, itself suggested by the rule of 447. The insertion might easily have escaped notice in a creed so little known to the West as the Constantinopolitan was at this period. Henceforth, at any rate, the interpolated form excited no suspicion; and from its use in the Mozarabic rite, it became the heritage of the laity no less than of the clergy; no Spanish priest could celebrate, no Spanish layman assist at the sacrifice without solemnly professing his faith in the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son (see Dict. of Christian Antiq., art. CREED). Nor was it only in this incidental way that the doctrine was taught to the Spanish laity. Synod after synod, subsequent to 589, laid emphasis on the Western view of the procession of the Spirit, no doubt on account of the direct antagonism in which this dogma stood to the Arian blasphemy as to the creation of the Spirit by the Son. During the 7th century the subject was dealt with by five or perhaps six more Toletan councils, three of which affirmed the procession from the Son in words singularly near to those of the so-called Athanasian Creed. The following table will shew the progress made in these successive confessions of the Spanish church:

COUNCIL.	DATE.	STATEMENT OF DOCTRINE WITH REGARD TO THE HOLY GHOST.
Toledo, iv.	633	"Nec creatum nec genitum, sed procedentem ex Patre et Filio."
Toledo, vi.	638	"Neque genitum neque creatum, sed de Patre Filioque procedentem utriusque esse Spiritum, ac per hoc substantialiter unum sunt quia et unis ab utroque procedat."
?	?	"Non ingentum neque genitum, non creatum nec factum, sed Patris et Filii, semper in Patre et Filio, coaeternum."
Toledo, xi.	675	"Non genitum vel creatum, sed simul ab utroque procedentem . . . quia caritas sive sanctitas amorum agnoscitur."
Toledo, xiv.	688	"Voluntas procedens ex Mente et Verbo."
Toledo, xvi.	693	"Ex Patre Filioque absque aliquo initio procedentem, ex Patris Filiique unione."

In the East the fourth oecumenical council confirmed the teaching of the second council, citing, for the first time in the records of the Church, the words of the Constantinopolitan creed (Mansi, vii. p. 112; Conc. Chalce. act. v. Oct. 22-25, A.D. 451). The following clauses in the Definitio of Chalcedon are important: διὰ μὲν τούτων τῶ πνεύματι τῶ ἁγίῳ μαχομένους τὴν χρόνους ὑστερον παρὰ τῶν ἐπὶ τῆς βασιλευούσης πόλεως συνελθόντων ἑκατὸν πενήκοντα ἁγίων πατέρων περὶ τῆς τοῦ πνεύματος οὐσίας παραδοθεῖσαν διδασκαλίαν κυροῖ [ἢ παρούσα νῦν αὕτη σύνοδος] ἦν ἐκείνοι τοῖς πᾶσιν ἐγγνώρισαν ὑχ ὡς τι λείπον τοῖς προλαβοῦσιν ἐπάγοντες,

ἀλλὰ τὴν περὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος αὐτῶν ἔννοιαν κατὰ τῶν τὴν αὐτοῦ δεσποτείαν ἄθετέιν πειρωμένων γραφικαῖς μαρτυρίαῖς τρανῶσαντες. Thus it was the Spirit's essential Godhead (οὐσία, δεσποτεία), on which the thoughts of the Fathers of Chalcedon were fixed; nor does it appear that the question of His procession was raised, although St. Leo's legates were present and subscribed. On the contrary after reciting the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, the council asserts that this faith sufficed: ἤρκει μὲν ὅν ἐντελῆ τῆς εὐσεβείας ἐπίγνωσίν τε καὶ βεβαίωσιν τὸ σοφὸν καὶ σωτήριον τοῦτο τῆς θείας χάριτος σύμβολον· περὶ . . . γὰρ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος ἐκδιδάσκει τὸ τέλειον. In the writings of individual Eastern Church teachers who lived during the two centuries which followed the council of Chalcedon, the subject of the procession is occasionally discussed, with some latitude of opinion, but with no approach to a controversial spirit. Thus Gelasius of Cyzicus (circ. 470) expounds the orthodox doctrine much in the style of St. Cyril: "We all receive from the Son the Holy Spirit, who is of the same essence with the Father and the Son, proceeding from the Father and the very own (ἴδιον) of the Son" (Hist. Conc. Nicaen. ii. 20-22). The poet Nonnus, on the other hand, lays stress upon the procession from the Father, even in his paraphrase of St. John xvi. 14 (Migne, xliii. 881). The Pseudo-Dionysius (whose works, first mentioned by a writer of the third decade of Cent. vi., probably belong to the latter part of Cent. v.) is also disposed to emphasize the ἐκ πατρὸς; in his mystical language, the Father is the πηγάα or θεογόνος θεότης, from which the Son and the Spirit are produced as offshoots and flowers, or as lights from the source of light (De Divin. Nom. ii. 5-7). In the 6th century we find the same diversity. Leontius of Byzantium knows no distinction between the Son and the Spirit but this, that while the Son derives His Being from the Father by generation, the Spirit is produced by procession; the Spirit is, like the Son, a γέννημα τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ θεοῦ (De Sectis, i. iv.; Migne, lxxvi. 1196). Anastasius of Antioch teaches that the Holy Ghost has an eternal procession from the Father—the Spirit is ἀεὶ ἐκπορευόμενος as the Son is ἀεὶ γεννώμενος—adding, however, that the Spirit receives from the Son all that the Son has, that is, all things that are the Father's: ἐξ αὐτοῦ (sc. τοῦ θεοῦ) ἐκπορευόμενος καὶ ἀποστελλόμενος οἱ μόνον παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἀλλὰ καὶ παρὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ . . . καὶ μὴ ὁ κύριος δεικνύς αὐτὸ ἐξ αὐτοῦ ὑπάρχειν, ἐμφυσῶν τοῖς μαθηταῖς ἔλεγε Λάβετε πνεῦμα ἅγιον.†

* In the second half of this century a section of the Monophysites headed by John Philoponus held that in the Holy Trinity there are three φύσεις or οὐσίαι μερικαῖς as well as one φύσις ε. οὐσία κοινῆ (Leont. De Sectis v.). If the common nature of the Godhead had become incarnate in our Lord, the Holy Ghost, Philoponus argued, would have been made flesh, as well as the Son (Migne, Patr. Gr. xciv. 748). S. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of Macdon as the first upholder of tritheistic views (ὁ πρῶτος τρεῖς θεοὺς εἰπών). The error is repeatedly condemned in the Arian creeds of the 4th century; the orthodox were represented as virtually guilty of it. Cf. Greg. Na. Or. 37, εἰ θεὸς καὶ θεὸς καὶ θεός, πῶς οὐχὶ τρεῖς θεοί;

Meanwhile a fifth. oecumenical council had been held at Constantinople in the year 533, at which Theodore of Mopsuestia's singular view as to the ἐμφύσησις of John xx. 22 (v. supra) was condemned. But the underlying difference between the Eastern and Western views of the procession again escaped notice, although at this time it seems to have been already recognised at Rome.* It was reserved for the next great Chronological controversy to bring to light a century later the continually increasing divergence of opinion upon the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. It appears that pope Martin I. (649-654), in some document which found its way to the East, expressed his belief that the Holy Spirit "proceeds also from the Son," and that this statement was seized upon by the Monothelite party at Constantinople as a proof of the heterodoxy of their papal antagonist (cf. Migne, Patr. Gr. xci. 133 sq.; Patr. Lat. cxxix. 577; cf. ib. 560). St. Maximus, in a letter to the Cyprian priest Marinus, defends the language of the Westerns, among whom he had resided both in Africa and at Rome. He offers a double apology for his Latin friends. (1) They had explained that their Filioque was not meant to represent the Son as the αἰτία of the Spirit; that it was, in fact, virtually equivalent to per Filium (ἀλλ' ἵνα τὸ δι' αὐτοῦ προίεναι δηλώσωσι, καὶ ταύτη τὸ συναφές τῆς οὐσίας καὶ ἀπαράλλακτον παραστήσωσιν). (2) The misunderstanding was due in great part to the difficulty which the Westerns encountered in explaining their ideas to the Greeks; it was owing to diversity of language as much as to divergence of belief. That the Spirit proceeds from the Son was true enough in one sense of the word, however false in another (cf. Anastasius Biblioth. l. c., "scilicet et nos et Graecos edocet secundum quiddam procedere et secundum quiddam non procedere Spiritum Sanctum ex Filio").<sup>b</sup>

In the year 680-1 Monothelitism received its death-blow at the sixth oecumenical council. But the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's procession from the Son did not come before this council; indeed, this question was perhaps purposely avoided by the Westerns out of regard for the peace of the church. Several preparatory synods had been held in the West; and it is remarkable that, with one exception, the confessions of faith which issued from them had abstained from asserting the Filioque.<sup>c</sup> The Milan synod declared its belief that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Person of the Eternal Father; the Lateran synod simply endorsed the Constantinopolitan creed, citing it in Latin, but without the interpolation.<sup>d</sup> The

one local confession which contained the words "and from the Son" was not produced at Constantinople. It came from England, and was put forth by a synod held at Hatfield in September, 680, under the presidency of Archbishop Theodore. The English bishops ended their summary of the faith with the words, "glorificantes Deum Patrem sine initio et Filium suum unigenitum ex Patre generatum ante saecula, et Spiritum Sanctum procedentem ex Patre et Filio inenarrabiliter" (Bed. H. E. iv. 17, 18). It can hardly be supposed that this remarkable assertion of the procession from the Son was due to the Greek archbishop; he accepted it, doubtless, from the lips of the assembled bishops. One of the Cotton MSS. (Brit. Mus. Cleopatra E. i.) contains a series of English episcopal professions, of which no fewer than five, belonging to the period 798-846, express the same view of the procession (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii.). It seems probable that England had received the doctrine of the Filioque at her conversion, and from Augustine himself, the emissary of a pope whose extant writings shew that he regarded it as part of the Catholic faith.

The beginning of the 8th century produced the last great theologian of the Eastern Church, St. John of Damascus. He enters with great care into the doctrine of the procession, and his language is a fair and well-balanced exposition of the teaching of the Eastern Church during her best and purest times. The following are the main lines of his teaching:— (1) The Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father as the αἰτία, ἀρχή, or πηγή, of Godhead (De Rect. Sent. i.). (2) He is not from the Son in this sense, although He is the Spirit of the Son (De Fide Orth. i. 8). (3) Yet He proceeds through the Son, if not from Him (δύναμις τοῦ πατρὸς, ἐκ πατρὸς μὲν δι' υἱοῦ ἔκπορευομένη, De F. O. i. 12); the Father is the διὰ λόγου προβολεύς of the Holy Ghost (ib. 7).<sup>e</sup> (4) Further, the Spirit proceeding from the Father rests in the Son, and is the image of the Son as the Son is the image of the Father, and the agent by whom the Son impresses His own image on man (ib. 13). (5) In the life of God it is through the Son that the Spirit is united to the Father (δι' υἱοῦ τῷ πατρὶ συναπτόμενον). It will be seen that this view of the procession mediates between the views of St. Cyril and Theodoret, and represents, in fact, the mean of Greek church teaching upon the subject.<sup>f</sup>

Ten years after the death of St. John of Damascus the procession of the Holy Ghost became for the first time a subject of synodical debate. The controversy began in the West. At a Frankish synod held in the year 767 at Gentilly, near Paris, certain Easterns were present, envoys very possibly from the emperor Copronymus to the court of Pepin. The prinnext after the 6th Council, the procession from the Son is distinctly maintained (Migne, cv. 67).

principal matter of debate was the vexed question of image-cultus; but other points of difference cropped up in the course of the discussion: "quæstio ventilata inter Graecos et Romanos de Trinitate et utrum Spiritus Sanctus sicut procedit a Patre, ita procedit a Filio" (Ado, Vienn. Chron. a. dcccxvii.). Apparently nothing was said as to the interpolation of the creed; the fact of the interpolation may have been still unknown in Gaul. Nor does the question of doctrine seem to have been as yet regarded as of vital importance. At the second Council of Nicaea, twenty years after the Council of Gentilly, no direct reference was made to the subject on either side. Two steps, however, were taken, which had an important bearing on the subsequent history of the controversy. (1) The Nicene council solemnly rehearsed the uninterpolated creed, declaring, "We subtract nothing, we add nothing, but keep all the doctrines of the Catholic Church without diminution." (2) Further, it accepted as orthodox the profession of the patriarch Tarasius, which contained the words, Πιστεύω . . . εἰς τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον τὸ κύριον καὶ ζωοποιῶν, τὸ ἐκ πατρὸς δι' υἱοῦ ἐκπορευόμενον. It might have seemed as if East and West having once sanctioned this formula, a platform had been found on which their union might have been permanently established. But events in the West prevented this hope from being realised.

Within a year after the Council of Gentilly Pepin had been succeeded by Charles the Great. Whether on theological or political grounds, or from mixed motives, Charles readily placed himself at the head of the Western divines in their crusade against the Nicene doctrine of the image-cultus. The question of the procession of the Holy Spirit again came to the front in the course of this controversy. The emperor, in his letter to pope Hadrian I., argued that the Nicene Council had compromised its orthodoxy by accepting the statement of Tarasius, who had represented the Holy Ghost as proceeding "non 'ex Patre et Filio; secundum Nicaenum Symbolum, sed 'ex Patre per Filium" — a proof, by the way, of the fact which we shall presently find confirmed from another quarter, that at the court of Charles the interpolated creed was already in use to the exclusion of the original form. Next, in or about the year 790, appeared the Libri Carolini, in which the emperor's protest was followed up by an elaborate argument against the per Filium, and a vigorous assertion of the binding force of the Filioque. Four years later (794) a great council, at which nearly every branch of the Western church was represented, assembled at Frankfort to condemn Adoptionism and the cultus of images; and occasion was taken to reassert in its profession of faith the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's Procession from the Son. At Friuli (Forum Julii), in 796, the bishops of the patriarchate of Aquileia, under their patriarch Paulinus, entered upon a formal vindication of the interpolated creed, which by this time, no doubt, had begun to draw forth serious remonstrances. Finally, in 809, the emperor summoned a council to meet at Aix for the express purpose of defending both the doctrine of the Filioque and the adoption of the words into the Latin creed. Of the proceedings of this council only the briefest records remain; but a series of documents have survived which sufficiently explain the occasion upon which it was assembled, and the results to which it led. It appears that an open collision between Easterns and Westerns upon the question of the interpolated creed had occurred at Bethlehem on the Christmas Day of 808.<sup>b</sup> A colony of Frank monks, settled on the Mount of Olives, had been charged by a Greek with heresy, and a violent attempt had been made to eject them from the Church of the Nativity, where they were keeping the festival. On inquiry it proved that, amongst other minor points of difference, they departed from the Greek rite by reciting the words "And the Son" in the creed. In self-defence the Latin monks appealed to the pope, now Leo III., stating that their use was derived from the emperor's own chapel, where they had formerly heard the creed sung in this form. Leo replied by sending to Jerusalem a profession of faith in which the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's procession from the Father and the Son was distinctly affirmed, but with no special emphasis, and without allusion to the existence of any controversy upon the subject. At the same time he forwarded to Charles the letter of the monks, simply referring it to the consideration of the emperor. It was in consequence of this affair that the council of Aix was summoned: with what general result it would not have been difficult to conjecture, even if our knowledge went no further. But two other documents remain, from which it appears (1) that Charles addressed to the pope, in the name of the council, a lengthy argument in support of the Western doctrine; and (2) that on the question of the interpolated creed, he sent a special mission to Rome to seek the papal sanction for its continued use. On this point, however, the pope proved to be resolute. He agreed with the German divines in characterising a wilful rejection of the doctrine as heretical; but he refused to admit the right of the Western church to add to the words of an oecumenical confession. The delegates of Charles pleaded that the excision of the Filioque might be dangerous to the faith of the simple and unlearned, who had long been accustomed to hear the fuller creed sung at mass; the pope replied by suggesting that the singing of the creed should be altogether abandoned until the interpolated words had dropped out of the recollection of the laity. Probably it was in consequence of this interview that Leo III. was led to set up over one of the most sacred spots in Rome (the Confessio of St. Peter) two silver shields, on which had been engraved Greek and Latin copies of the Constantinopolitan creed, both alike free from the Western addition (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxi. 635; cxxviii. 1238; cxcii. 552). The firmness of this pope seems to have preserved the Roman church for the next two centuries from the liturgical use of the Filioque; it was not until the year 1014 that the Spanish and German custom prevailed, and the Latin creed, now doubtless in the interpolated form, was chanted at mass in the churches of the Holy City. Meanwhile, Charles and his successors appear to have disregarded papal remonstrance. Sixty years after the conference between Leo and the delegates of the emperor, the whole Gallican church, according to Aeneas of Paris, united every Lord's Day to sing, "Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son." Even in the lifetime of Charlemagne a controversial literature on this subject had made its appearance; the treatise of Theodulf and that which is ascribed to Alcuin belong to this reign. The plague of discord had begun, and before the close of the century which opened with the coronation of Charles the Great, East and West were already embroiled in a strife which has outlived a thousand years.

HOMERITE CHURCH AND MARTYRS. [ELESBAAN, ETHIOPIAN CHURCH, JOSEPHUS DUNAANUS.]

HOMINICOLAE. 1. A term of reproach applied to the Catholics by the Apollinarists.

(Facund. pro Defens. Tr. Cap. ix. 3, Migne, Patrol. lxxvii. 750.)

2. Nestorius and followers were so called by the Catholics (Lib. Diurn. c. ii. 9, Migne, Patrol. cv. 48.) [T. W. D.]

HOMOBONUS (1), sub-deacon of the Roman church, by whom Pelagius I. sent relics to king Childebert in 556 (Pelag. ep. 9 olim 10 in Patr. Lat. lxxix. 403 B.) [C. H.]

HOMOBONUS (2), bishop of Albano. He was ordained bishop by Gregory the Great (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. 11 in Migne, lxxvii. 613). He was present at the synods of 595 concerning the service of the pope, the goods of the church, and other minor matters. Also at the synod of 601, regulating the affairs of abbats, and tending to free abbays from episcopal control. (Mansi, ix. 1228; x. 488.) [A. H. D. A.]

HOMOLUNCH (OMULUNG, OMOLINGG), a Mercian abbat, whose name as witness is attached to three of the Evesham charters. (Kemble, C. D. 33, 56, 58.) Of these the first and third are regarded by Kemble as spurious. The first is undated; the other two are dated 706. [S.]

HOMOŌNIUS. An Apollinarist bishop, a letter addressed to whom by Timotheus, another bishop of the same sect, is quoted by Leontius Byzantinus (adv. Fraud. Apollinarist., Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. 2, 1959.) [T. W. D.]

HOMOPHRONIUS, one of the chief members of the board of the hospital founded by St. Basil at Caesarea. During the troubles relating to Sacerdos, the governor of the hospital, after the death of Basil, Homophonius wrote to invite Gregory Nazianzen to some festal gathering in the institution. Gregory, in his reply, expresses his regret that the state of his health prevents his coming, and sends a message of encouragement and counsel to Sacerdos. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 237.) [E. V.]

HOMOUSIANI. A term of reproach applied by the Arians to the Catholics. (Collat. Auj. c. l'acent.; Angustin. Op. Migne, Patrol. xxxiii. 1157, 1161; Fulgent. contr. Fastidios. cap. 1, Migne, u. s. lxxv. 509; adv. Pintam. lb. 709; Vict. Vitens. de Persecut. Vandal. iv. 2, Migne, u. s. lviii. 238.) [T. W. D.]

HOMOUSIOS, HOMOEUSIOS (ὁμοούσιος, ὁμοιούσιος). The formation of these words may be compared with that of δύσβιος and δμοιβίσιος, δμοειδής and δμοειδής or δμοιειδής, δμογενέμων, and δμοιογενέμων. But δμοούσιος is to be distinguished from ταυτοούσιος (see Epiphian. Haeres. lxxv. § 7; tom. ii. p. 528, Migne), thus δμοιούσιος would connote similarity in essence: δμοούσιος union in essence: ταυτοούσιος identity in essence. But much of the difficulty in the use and reception of the word homousios arose from the fact that the word ὁσία was itself used freely in the writings of controversialists, before there was a general assent as to its meaning: the difficulties arising from the uncertain usages of ὁσία and ὁπόστασις in the earlier times are well known.

I. The word δμοούσιος occurs four times in Irenaeus, all in book i. chap. v. (§§ 1, 5, 6). For its application to our Lord, Bishop Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. ii. 1, 2), and, after him, Dr. Newman (Arians, part i. chap. ii. § 4) have referred to the author of the Poemander (i.e. to the so-called Hermes Trismegistus) as using it in most ancient times, "in the beginning of the 2nd century" ὁμοούσιος γὰρ ἦν. The book is now deemed to be of the 4th century. Pamphilus the martyr is quoted as maintaining that Origen expressly said that the Son is homousios with the Father, but the words are not found in any extant writing. Tertullian (in a passage wherein his language can scarcely be upheld) states, "Hunc ex Deo prolatum didicimus et prolatione generatum et idcirco filium Dei et Deum dictum ex unitate substantiae" (Apol. xxi.). So Against Praxeas, cap. ii. "Tres sunt, non statu sed gradu: nec substantia sed forma: nec potestate sed specie. Unius autem substantiae et unius status et unius potestatis quia unus Deus."

It would seem that in the time of Paul of Samosata (bishop of Antioch, A.D. 260, deposed 269) the term ὁμοούσιος had been generally applied by the orthodox to the Son of God. The opinions of Paul are clouded with the haze with which he succeeded in surrounding them; two synods in succession failed in eliciting from his writings such formulae as he would acknowledge to represent his teaching, and a skilful logician was required to argue with him and drive him into a corner. Bishop Hefele's account (book i. ch. ii. § 9) is that Paul drew near to the Sabellians on one side, and to Artemon on the other. He held the unicity or solitariness of God, so that before the Advent the Logos was the Reason or Wisdom of God, but not a personal Being. He held that this Logos or Reason came to dwell in the man Jesus, the son of Mary, not absolutely or essentially, but qualitatively, and admitting of degrees more or less. Thus, though he acknowledged that Jesus was (as the New Testament distinctly states) the Son of God, yet he denied that personally, as Son of God, He came down from heaven. He supported his opinion by the usage of the word ὁμοούσιος as applied to the relations of our Lord to the Father, thus shewing that the word was then accepted as a Theological and Christological term. It is acknowledged that Paul's opponents could not argue with him, and in fact his reasoning is difficult to follow. Athanasius (de Synodis, 45; Migne, tom. xxvi. p. 772) states that Paul had argued that if the Christ had not become God from being man, He could not be homousios with the Father, and so of necessity there must be three usiae—one presupposed, and the other two proceeding from it.* On this account it was, in all probability (says Athanasius), that the fathers of Antioch rejected the word, and said that the Christ is not homousios; for the Son is not so related to the Father as Paul conceived. So it would seem that, while Paul denied the previous existence of the Son of God as such, he held that after the Resurrection Christ became God, absorbed, it would seem, in the Deity; and he built this last tenet on the reception of the word homousios. The synod of Antioch, against the former part of Paul's teaching (that the Logos before the Incarnation was not a Personal Being), distinctly asserted that Christ was before He appeared in human flesh. "If Christ is, as He is, the power of God and the wisdom of God, He is before all ages; thus, and as Christ, He is one and the same thing in essence"; i.e. (as we understand it) He is ever essentially the same. They treated in another way the argument which Paul built up on the usage of the word homousios; they cut the ground beneath it, and rejected the word. Great efforts have been made to invalidate the witness to the rejection of the word at Antioch, but Athanasius, without affirming it, argues on the hypothesis that it may have taken place, and Hilary, about 354, speaks of it as a fact. "Male homousion Samosatenu confessus est; sed numquid melius Arian negaverunt? Octoginta episcopi olim respuerunt, sed trecenti et decem octo nuper receperunt." (De Synodis, § 86; Migne, x. 538.) If the bishops at Antioch rejected the word, they were following up the lead of Dionysius of Alexandria, who had been accused to his namesake at Rome of avoiding it. In his treatise De Sententiâ Dionysii (Migne, Greek Series, xxix. 479, &c.) Athanasius again and again insists that it was in his controversy with Sabellius that his predecessor in the patriarchate had at least ignored it, but that he ever upheld the great truth to the support of which Athanasius's life was devoted—namely, the true and perfect Deity of the Son of God. The word was rejected when one meaning was assigned to οὐσία; it was recalled when language became more defined. And he quotes the letter of Dionysius, in which he complains that words which he had employed against the Sabellians to shew that the Son of God was not identical with the Father, were used by his calumniators as if he had taught that the Son was essentially different from the Father, was not homousios with the Father, and he adds that these calumniators closed their eyes to the arguments and illustrations that he had used; "They seemed to be ignorant of the fact that when we deal with words that require some training to understand them, different people may take them in senses not only differing but absolutely opposed to each other." (See his letter in Athanasius's treatise, ut supra, § 18, p. 508.) Thus it seems again that although the word was used in the 3rd century of the essential relations between God the Father and our Blessed Lord, the special sense in which it was to be understood was vague and undetermined. Some took οὐσία in a materialistic sense; they were unable to form any conception of spiritual, immaterial existence; and in an interesting parenthesis in his work, de Decretis, § 10, Athanasius connects Paul of Samosata with the Sadducees, as if Paul could not conceive that the orthodox held that the Word was Son of God in any other sense except ἀνθρωποπαθός, whereas God is ζῦλος καὶ ἀσώματος. (Ἀνοούσιος, in an interesting passage of Irenaeus, I. xv. 5, seems to be almost equivalent to unsubstantial in our vulgar language, and Neander complains of the materialistic notions of the divine essence exhibited by Tertullian; for an example see a passage quoted above.) Others had not learned to distinguish between substance and subsistence.

Only a few had anticipated the meaning which we now universally attach to it: "essence or substance."<sup>b</sup> And the ambiguity undoubtedly caused much of the questioning of the 4th century; the difficulties of the derivation being put forward possibly by some in a factious spirit as furnishing objections to the use. Thus Hilary of Poitiers, in his work de Synodis (§§ 67, 68, 69; Migne, x. 525), mentions four modes in which the words "of one substance" were understood, and of these modes three were erroneous. And Athanasius repudiates the meaning which the "Greeks" would give to the word (see above) by saying "this is not the meaning of the bishops of Nicaea."

Let us look, then, for Athanasius's own meaning. He describes, with what we might call considerable naïveté (de Decretis, N. S. §§ 19, &c.; Migne, xxv. 456, the letter was written between 350 and 354), the way in which the Eusebians were watched at the council, until expressions could be introduced into the creed with which it was hoped they would not agree. Thus the bishops proposed "that they should describe the Word of God as the very power and image of the Father, resembling Him, and in no respect deviating from Him (ἀπαράλλακτον κατὰ πάντα τῷ πατρὶ), unchanged, and ever and always in Him without separation, for never was He not, but the Word was always, subsisting eternally with the Father, as the brightness of light." But when they found that Eusebius's party would accept these terms and explain them away, then the bishops were compelled to concentrate the meaning they drew from the Scriptures, and to write that the "Son is homousios with the Father, in order that they might signify not only that the Son resembles Him, but is the same in His resemblance, and that the resemblance is different from that which is called imitation in us." Moreover, the word provided against another difficulty. "Resemblance among men is compatible with, or rather necessitates, a bodily severance; but, the nature of the Father and the Son being different from ours, the Word of God not only resembles (ὁμοιος throughout) the Father, but is inseparable from the essence (οὐσίας) of the Father; and He and the Father are one; and the Word is always in the Father and the Father in the Word; and therefore the synod selected the term homousios," consubstantial, of one substance.

This, then, is the meaning which, in his struggle at Nicaea, Athanasius attached to the word, and for which he desired to press the word upon the church. But it is interesting to note how before his death even he was compelled to give up one part of this meaning, or, at all events, to modify the conception that one great advantage of the word was that it connoted that the nature of the Father and the Son was so far different from ours, that whilst resemblance with us necessitates a bodily severance, it is not so with Them. True that in the passage where he speaks of the Son being homousios with us (de Sententiâ Dionysii, § 10, p. 493), it is in connexion with our Lord's saying, "I am the vine and ye are the branches; and the vine and the branches are homousia, and un-separated;" but the word as applied to men was soon deprived of this last condition. In his work, de Synodis (§ 51, p. 784), he applies the term to any two brothers, and says that one or both of them would be homousii with their father.

It certainly seems clear, therefore, that in his later days Athanasius felt compelled to resign one condition as attached to the word on which in his earlier years he had insisted, and was content to maintain that the great point urged by the council of Nicaea was the true Deity of the Son of God, His true eternity.<sup>c</sup> Thus he became willing to receive as friends those who were unwilling to accept the word, "if they would acknowledge that the Son of God is one with the Father, and appears as is the Father, in resemblance and the one Deity;" only he adds, They who acknowledge this ought not to shrink from the use of the Nicene watchword. And certainly those who could apply it to the relations between man and man ought not to shrink from using it of the relations between the Father and the Word.

The remarks which we have made explain the difficulties mentioned by Eusebius of Caesarea in his description of the mode in which the word was introduced at Nicaea. He felt compelled to write to his flock a kind of apology for his assenting to the rejection of their creed and to the introduction of this test word. It is clear that his people were acquainted with the word, and objected to it. It is not unlikely that their contiguity to Antioch had made them familiar with the treatment of the term at the council of 269. In fact, Eusebius had himself attended the schools of Antioch. Thus it is not unlikely that both he and they had been accustomed to attach a materialistic sense to the word οὐσία. At all events, their bishop made a point of explaining to them that the most religious emperor had pressed the recalcitrant bishops to accept the word, on the ground that it was not in the proposed creed "to be understood in a corporeal or material sense, or as if there were any severance or separation between the Father and the Son;"<sup>d</sup> for their nature, which is immaterial and incorporeal, cannot admit of this.<sup>e</sup>

II. It seems somewhat difficult to assign the precise date when the word homousios, ὁμοιούσιος, was proposed to supplant the homousios of the Nicene Creed. But we have the great advantage of possessing not (as usual) an adversary's account of the arguments by which the introduction of the title was upheld, but the very letter of the synod of Ancyra (held in the year 358), which contains the address of Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius and others (twelve in all) by which they commended their faith to the Christian world. It is preserved in the work of Epiphanius against heresies (No. Ixxiii.), and is followed by a letter of the same Basil, and George the bishop of Alexandria, on the same subject. They stood upon the distinction between the divine and human natures of our Lord, and the analogy of each to the nature of God and man. To the former they applied the words "Whatsoever things the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise"—ὁμοίως ποιεῖ. (John v. 19.) With reference to the latter they quoted the language of St. Paul (Rom. viii. 3), "God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, and Phil. ii. 7, "He was made in the likeness of men." They appealed to the resemblances between heavenly and earthly relations, as exhibited in the beautiful passage "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ from whom every fatherhood takes its name;" and said that the very expression "image of the invisible God," shewed that there must be a likeness, and with the statement of the likeness they wished to be content. They saw that their language that the Son was like to the Father κατ' οὐσίαν escaped the difficulties which had been raised against the ὁμοούσιος, and they put forth a series of canons, the last of which contained the words, "if any one say that the Son is ὁμοούσιος or ταύτοούσιος with the Father, let him be anathema."

<sup>c</sup> So Bishop Bull (Defens. Fid. Nicaen. c. li.) adduces passages which prove their writers' belief in the true Deity of our Lord, as evidence in favour of the Homousios. But in the Nicene Creed itself the phrases very God and of one substance with the Father connote distinct truths. The council intended that the Unity of the Godhead should be implied in the latter term.

If these bishops hoped in any way to make a successful compromise between the Arians and the orthodox they were miserably disappointed. The Arian synod of Sirmium A.D. 357 (Hilary, de Synodis, § 11), and the synod of Seleucia, A.D. 359 (Athanasius, de Synodis, § 29; Epiphanius, ut supra, § 25), rejected both terms, even whilst the latter anathematised the "Anomoeon," the "dissimilar." The word οὐσία was the word which they would not accept, and for this word Basil of Ancyra and George of Alexandria struggled. It was about this time that Hilary's work on the synods of the East was written, and so far as it was known it must have had a pacific effect. He would himself have preferred the term homoeusios; indeed he objected to the use of homousios, or rather of the words una substantia unless it was always preceded by some explanation, "potest una substantia pie dici et pie taceri." "Perfectae aequalitatis significantiam habet similitudo." But notwithstanding this he never heard the Nicene faith without exultation: "explain the Nicene word carefully, and objections to it fall to the ground."

And the result he hoped for followed. The Homoeusians of the East, repelled by the Arians, soothed by the Catholics, gradually became absorbed by the latter. Dr. Hort (Dissertations, p. 96) considers that it was a few years later, i.e. between 362 and 364, that St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in whose earlier creed neither term appeared, accepted the homousios, and it would seem that at the time of the Council of Constantinople, the division on the subject was over. It is true that the Semi-Arians are mentioned in the first canon, but it seems that they were then considered to be the same as the Pneumatomachi, and the old Latin translation replaces the designation by Macedonii. The perfect Deity of the Son of God was no longer spoken against by them. The name semi-Arian had been passed on to those who questioned the perfect Deity of the Holy Spirit. Perhaps the illustrations used by Epiphanius combined to produce this result. He said (ut sup. pp. 469-72) that gold and copper, silver and tin, iron and lead were of similar substance or essence. So the application of the word homoeusios to our Lord implied that He was outside the essence of the Father.

III. But the arguments and illustrations of the Homoeusians had a further consequence. The comparison between our Lord and the Father in His divinity, and between our Lord and us in His humanity assisted in enforcing the application to Him of the term "homousios" in His relation to man as well as in His relation to God. They had insisted that He was of like essence; the next generation accepted the term that He is of the same essence. Thus the synod of Antioch in 433, whilst it maintained that the "Son of God was perfect God and perfect Man," held too that "He was homousios with the Father in regard to His Deity and homousios with us in regard to His Humanity." The same was repeated at a synod of Constantinople in 448, "homousios with His mother" replacing the equivalent phrase. The later form was adopted by Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, in his letter to the emperor Theodosius in 449, and by the ecumenical council of Chalcedon in 451.

IV. It remains only that we notice the modes in which the word has been represented in other languages. We find "unius substantiae, quod Graeci dicunt homousios," in the version of the Nicene creed given by Hilary; "unius substantiae vel essentiae, significans filium non ex nullis extantibus nec ex alia substantia, sed de patre natum esse," in the belief of the church of Carthage in 484 (Mansi, vii. 1143; Hahn, 141). The synod of Braga, 563, had "unius substantiae et virtutis et potestatis" (Mansi, ix. 774; Hahn, 155), and the words "unius substantiae" were adopted at Toledo in 589, 633, 675. In 683 the bishops assembled at the last named place preferred "unius essentiae." A synod at the Lateran, under Martin I., A.D. 649, adopted "consubstantialis"; one at Milan, 680, "coessentialis et consubstantialis"; one at Rome in the same year, "consubstantialem Patri, id est ejusdem cum Patre substantiae." They translated the formula of Chalcedon, "consubstantialem eundem Deo Patri secundum deitatem, consubstantialemque nobis secundum humanitatem." In the Western form of the creed of Constantinople, "consubstantialem" is the term now adopted. Our own article on the Trinity has preferred the words "ejusdem essentiae," the English of which, however, is the same as that which we find in the Creed, "of one substance." In Article II. we have "patri consubstantialis," which is translated in the same manner. In Article V., of the Holy Spirit, the Latin is again different, "ejusdem essentiae;" translated in 1563, "of one essence," in 1571, "of one substance." [C. A. S.]

HOMUNCIONATES. The Catholics were so called by the Arians. (Arnob. Jun. c. Serap. Conf. i. 2; Migne, Patrol. liii. 241.) [T. W. D.]

HOMUNCIONISTAE. A designation applied by Augustine to Arians generally, as well as to the Photinians. (Fragm. Serm. d. v. "Noli me tangere," Op. ed. Par. 1614, x. 628.) [T. W. D.]

HOMUNCIONITAE. A designation applied by the Catholics to the Photinians (Mar. Mercat. Diss. ad Contradict. xii. Anathem. Nestor. § 20; Migne, Patrol. xlviii. 929) and by Prudentius to the Humanitarians generally (Apoth. contr. Homuncionit. in Migne, Patrol. ix. 961). Also a heretical sect noticed by Prædestinatus. They held that Gen. i. 26, 27, referred to the human body (De Haer. lxxvi., Oehler, Corp. Haer. i. 261). Philastrius has a long account of this heresy, to which, however, he assigns no name (De Haer. xcvi.; Oehler, u. s. 93). Augustine also mentions it, but also without assigning any name to it (De Haer. lxxvi. u. s. 218). Both Prædestinatus and Augustine ascribe similar opinions to the Vadiani, who are the Ἀδδιανολί of Epiphanius, Haer. lxx. (u. s. 212, 252). [HOMUNCIONISTAE.] [T. W. D.]

HONASTERIUS, bishop of Eliberi, belongs possibly to the first half of the 4th century. His name is eleventh in the list of bishops of this see, taken by Florez from the Cod. Aemiliensis. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 103.) [CAECILIUS.] [M. A. W.]

HONEMUNDUS, bishop of Salamanca. [HONEMUNDUS.]

HONESIMUS (Usuard. Mart. Feb. 16), disciple of St. Paul. [ONESIMUS.] [C. H.]

HONESTUS (1), presbyter, apostle of Pampeluna. His story is told in the Acta of his disciple Firminus, the first bishop of Amiens. In the reign of Decius, bishop Saturninus on his way from Rome to Toulouse, passing through Nîmes, found there Honestus, a well-educated young man, instructed him in the faith, took him to Toulouse, subsequently ordained him presbyter and sent him to preach at Pampeluna. One of Honestus's first converts there was the senator Firmus, who placed his son Firminus under his care. Honestus trained Firminus for the ministry, and procured him ordination from Honoratus bishop of Toulouse. He is thought to have died about A.D. 270, and to have suffered martyrdom. (Boll. Acta SS. 15 Feb. ii. 860.) In the Actaria of Usuard he is mentioned under Feb. 16. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 341) claims Honestus as a luminary of the primitive church of the Scots, and says that he wrote Institutio Cleri and ad Gallias Episcopos (Tanner, Bibl. 410). [C. H.]

HONESTUS (2), bishop of Jesi (Aesium). He signed the second epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Mausi, xi. 302; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

HONOVERHTUS, archbishop of Cologne. [CHUNIBERTUS.]

HONOBERTUS (ANNOBERTUS), twenty-second bishop of Sens, succeeding Hildegarius, and followed by Armentarius, subscribed the deed of grant of the deacon Blidegisilus for the construction of the monastery of Fossés St. Maur, near Charenton, in A.D. 640 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1157-9). Under the name of Annobertus, he also appears in the spurious life of St. Babolenus, as one of the bishops present when Clovis II. granted the royal demesne of Brictonicum, on the Marne, to Blidegisilus for his foundation. (Vita S. Baboleni, Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Script. i. 661; Gall. Christ. xii. 9; Gams, Series Episc. 629.) [S. A. B.]

HONORATA, virgin, a younger sister of Epiphanius bishop of Pavia, mentioned by Ennodius in his life of that saint (see Patr. Lat. lxiii. 218, 222). She is described as worthy of her brother, and not inferior to him in piety. Epiphanius, in the year of his embassy to the emperor Anthemius, committed her to the care of Luminosa, a woman of rare piety, with whom she was still living when Odoacer sacked Pavia in 476. Honorata, with other women, fell into the hands of the enemy, but Epiphanius procured her release on the day of her capture. Ferrarius, in his account of Honorata (see Boll. Acta SS. 11 Jan. i. 680), says she had three sisters, Luminosa, Speciosa, Liberata, all older than herself. [C. H.]

HONORATUS (1), African bishop, Syn. 2 Carth. sub Cyp. A.D. 252 (Cyp. Ep. 57); in Syn. 4, A.D. 254 (Cyp. Ep. 67); and in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. (de Bapt. i.) A.D. 255 (Ep. 70). The last two are certainly the same person, the first doubtful. [E. W. B.]

HONORATUS (2), Numidian bishop, addressed in Cyp. Ep. 62; in A.D. 252 (see JANUARIUS I.), and in Cyp. Ep. 70 from Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. Haer. i. He appears in syn. 7 sub Cyp. Carth. de Bap. iii., as seventy-seventh in order of speaking, and bishop of Tuca in Numidia. Morcelli has transposed him into the bishop of Tuca in Proconsular province Suff. 52. [E. W. B.]

HONORATUS (3), second bishop of Toulouse about 270. He consecrated St. Firminus first bishop of Amiens. Commemorated Dec. 25 (Gall. Christ. xiii. 4). [R. T. S.]

HONORATUS (4), probably the name of the Donatist bishop of Sciliba, Sicilibba, Sicilibra, Sicilippa, or Silibbia, a town of proconsular Africa, about thirty miles south-west of Carthage (Halouch Alouina) Ant. (Itin. 45, 4), who suffered in the persecution carried on by Leontius and Ursacius c. A.D. 317. But the form of expression throws a little doubt upon the name "Honoratum episcopi Scilibensis jugulum Tribuni gladius . . . compunxit" (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 223, ed. Oberthür; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 279). [H. W. P.]

HONORATUS (5), a bishop of Mauritania Sitifensis, at the council of Hippo in 393 (Mansi, iii. 926 c, 925-930; Hefele, ii. 401). [C. H.]

HONORATUS (6), bishop of Vercellae, coming next to Limenius, but after a long interregnum in consequence of civil discords. He followed closely in the steps of his earlier predecessor Eusebius, and especially in his zeal for orthodoxy. Paulinus bishop of Nola was his intimate friend, as was also St. Ambrose, at whose dying hours he was present, giving him the sacrament, A.D. 397 (Paulin. Vit. Ambros. § 47 in Patr. Lat. xiv. 43). Honoratus was succeeded by Duscilius or Coelius. He was buried in the church of St. Eusebius, where a Latin metrical inscription (which may be seen in Ughelli and Cappelletti) was placed over his tomb. He was commemorated on the day of his death, Oct. 29. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 761; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 363, 426.)

HONORATUS (7), a Donatist bishop, who sent a message to St. Augustine proposing to discuss with him by letter the disputed points in the Donatist controversy. [HEROTES.] This was at some time between A.D. 396 and 410. Augustine professed himself willing to accept this challenge, and as a preliminary step mentioned some points to which satisfactory answers ought in the first place to be given. That the church is universal, as is shewn by the titles of St. Paul's epistles and by that of St. John's address to the seven churches of Asia Minor (Rev. i. 11). It was never intended to be limited to Africa alone: why should the promise of Christ be contracted? The Donatists try to fasten on the Catholic church the name of Macarius, but no mention is made in the Gospel either of him or of Donatus. [MACARIUS.] It is incumbent on the Donatists to shew first the ground of their limitation; but as to the Catholics, they are content to refer to Scripture prophecies. He expresses his desire to carry on the discussion, but no trace is extant of any further correspondence on the subject. (Aug. Ep. 49.)

[H. W. P.]

HONORATUS (8), the name of six African bishops, Catholic and Donatist, present at the Carthaginian conference of 411 (Gest. Collat. Carth. cognit. i. in Patr. Lat. xi. 1257 sq.), namely of—Abidda, or Avitta, a town of Proconsular Africa, about fifty miles south-west of Carthage, and twelve south-east from the river Bagradas (Ptol. iv. 3, 20; Gest. num. 126; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 62).

Adquesira, in Mauritania Caesariensis, Donatist. He was perhaps the bishop who accounted for the absence of any Donatist congregation at Quidia or Quizica in the same province by saying that the last bishop had perished under persecution (num. 143, 188; Af. Ch. i. 67).

Jomnium, a sea-port town of Mauritania Caesariensis, about eighteen miles east of Rusucanis (Mers. el Fehem) (Ant. Itin. 17, 1); Donatist (num. 208; Af. Ch. i. 190).

Lares, or Alaribus, a town of Proconsular Africa, about twenty-eight miles south-west from Mustis (Sidi Bou Agez) (Ant. Itin. 26, 3; Procop. Bell. Vand. ii. 22), Donatist, Victorinus being the Catholic occupant of the see (num. 131; Af. Ch. i. 199).

Mathara, in Numidia (num. 120; Af. Ch. i. 217).

Tysdrus, Dydrus, or Turdus [HELPIDIUS (1)], Donatist, the Catholic bishop being Navigius (num. 121, 206; Af. Ch. i. 337). [H. W. P.]

HONORATUS (9), a bishop present at the council of Milevis, against Pelagianism, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 176.) [H. W. P.]

HONORATUS (10), bishop of Arles, sprung from a noble family in Belgic Gaul, on the borders of the modern provinces of Champagne and Lorraine. Virtuous from his youth, he renounced after his baptism all worldly delights; and having by his example converted his cousin Venantius, set out with him and an aged Christian, Caprasius, to visit sacred sites.

Both Venantius and Honoratus, in setting out on this pilgrimage, distributed all their property to the poor. Venantius died in Greece, and Honoratus was divinely warned to repair to the island of Lerins, to which he afterwards gave his name. It was then desolate, and the abode of wild animals. Abiding in this solitude, Honoratus was presently ordained against his will, probably by his friend Leontius, bishop of Frejus. He set himself to establish a monastery on the isle, and disciples flocked to him from all quarters, among the first of whom was Hilary, afterwards of Arles, whom he prevailed on by prayers and tears to renounce the world. The fame of his piety caused him to be chosen bishop of Arles, where, however, he lived but two years, dying on Jan. 14 or 15, 429, somewhat suddenly, since he had preached to the people on the Epiphany. Hilary, his successor both as abbat and as bishop, attended his death-bed, and received his last words, glowing with the love of Christ. The faith of the people, we are told, caused them to clothe the remains with splendour, but greater faith caused them presently to strip it nearly naked, each contending for some rag of the dress. He was commemorated on Jan. 16. (Hilarii Sermo de Vit. S. Honorat. in Pat. Lat. l. 1249, sq.; Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxiv. 56, 57; Gall. Ch. i. 527; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 16; ii. 17; Ceillier, Aut. Ecc. viii. 440.) [R. T. S.]

HONORATUS (11), bishop of Thiabe, in Numidia, c. A.D. 428. Possidius, who calls him "vir sanctus," states that he consulted Augustine at the time of the Vandal invasion respecting the duty of bishops and clergy to retire before the danger. Augustine in reply sent him a letter he had written to Quodvultdenus (given at length by Possidius, ut inf.). Honoratus was not satisfied by Augustine's reasoning, and quoted our Lord's direction to flee to another city. Augustine then addressed him expressly on the subject in ep. 228. (Possid. Vit. August. cap. 30; cf. also Vit. Aug. ex Scriptis, lib. viii. cap. 8, § 7; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 314.) [R. S. G.]

HONORATUS, bishop of Circa or Constantia. [ANTONINUS.]

HONORATUS (12), a Gallic bishop joining in a synodic epistle of Ravennius bishop of Arles to Leo the Great cir. Dec. 451, and addressed by him in reply. (Leo Mag. ep. 99, 102, in Patr. Lat. liv. 966, 970, 985.) He is identified by the Sammarthani as the first bishop of Toulon (Gall. Chr. i. 741). [R. T. S.]

HONORATUS (13), bishop of Thassos (Thasos), the island in the Aegean, lying off the Macedonian coast, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 161; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 87.) [L. D.]

HONORATUS (14), ST., bishop of Marseilles towards the close of the 5th century (A.D. 483-494).

Name.—The name is so common in the 4th and 5th centuries as to render it occasionally difficult to avoid confusion. Its history seems easily traceable. It is, in the first place, simply a participial adjective employed as an epithet denoting respect on moral grounds, in which ense it is frequently employed by Cicero. It then becomes (as in one usage of honourable in England and her colonies and in America) a mark of certain offices; and thus Ovid applies it to a praetor and a consul. In the Theodosian code it has virtually become a substantive denoting the holders of such offices. The final transition to its adoption as a proper name is a light and obvious one.

Authorities.—(1) Gennadius, Virorum Illustrium Catalogus (cap. 94). [GENNADIUS.] (2) Allusions to himself in the biography of St. Hilary. HILARIUS (17).] Among modern authorities, Ceillier (viii. 434) has interwoven some notice of him into his account of Hilary of Arles, and Rivet, in the Histoire littéraire de la France, tom. ii. p. 644 et seqq.

Life.—Honoratus was for many years a disciple of Hilary of Arles. He is commended for his piety and eloquence, and knowledge of Holy Scripture, by Gennadius, who says of him, "Os suum quasi armarium scripturarum aperit." He also attracted the favourable notice of pope Gelasius. [GELASIUS (1).] He may have been trained in that famous school of Lerins of which the earlier Honoratus of Arles [HONORATUS (10)] is regarded as the founder. Of the details of his career we are ignorant, and even the date of his election is disputed, being placed by Tillemont as early as 475. That Gelasius, after his election to the Roman see, noticed Honoratus, is a proof that his episcopate must have lasted beyond A.D. 492. He evidently left a most favourable impression of himself in the minds of his flock at Marseilles.

Writings.—Vita S. Hilarii Episcopi Arelatensis.—On the controversy between Hilary and Leo the Great. Honoratus does not write as a partisan, but, conscious of the excellencies of the two opponents, is guarded and even reticent. The biography, as a whole, leaves on the mind a very favourable impression of its author as well as of its subject. It also renders very intelligible the report that Honoratus, whenever any business took him outside his diocese, was much in request for sermons at the hands of his other prelates.

Honoratus also composed some other biographies of a like character. But all are lost.

[J. G. C.]

HONORATUS (15), the name of eight African bishops banished by Hunneric A.D. 484, from the list of Victor Vitensis (Notitia, pp. 56–0, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 269 sq.), viz. the bishops of—

Castellum in Numidia. (Morcelli, Af. Christ. 127.)

Fata in Numidia. (Af. Ch. i. 156.)

Macriana in Byzacene. He died in exile. (Af. Ch. i. 208.)

Tagara in Proconsular Africa. (Af. Ch. i. 298.)

Tagaria in Byzacene. (Af. Ch. i. 298.)

Tamascania in Mauritania Sitifensis, died in exile. (Af. Ch. i. 304.)

Timica. (Af. Ch. i. 325.)

Tizia. (Af. Ch. i. 329.)

[R. S. G.]

HONORATUS (16), bishop of Novara, cir. 90, between Victor and Pacatianus, contemporary with Ennodius bishop of Pavia, who composed for him an address to be delivered at the dedication of a basilica of the apostles erected on the site of a pagan temple (Ennod. dict. ii. in Patr. Lat. lxiii. 267). Ennodius likewise praises him in his poems, and makes special allusion to a strong castle which he had built. (Carm. lib. ii. epig. 11, 110, in Patr. Lat. lxiii. 337, 355; Ugh. Ital. Sac. iv. 692; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiv. 433, 435, 443, 526.) [C. H.]

HONORATUS (17), ST., eighth in the list of the bishops of Amiens, succeeding Beatus and followed by St. Salvius, according to the Gallia Christiana. A short life of him by one of the clergy of Amiens survives, the date of which is fixed by internal evidence at about the close of the 11th century (Hist. Litt. de la France, viii. 684). It presents considerable chronological difficulties. According to this story, in the year 600, in the time of pope Pelagius (he had died in 590) the emperor Maurice sent great treasure to Childebert, king of the Franks, to gain his assistance in the defence of the empire. At this time Honoratus, the successor of Firminus (who lived in the 4th century), was bishop of Amiens, and by his good works and austerities gained the favour of God, as was proved by the discovery through a vision of a priest named Lupicinus, during his episcopate, of the bodies of the holy martyrs, Fuscianus, Victorinus and Gentianus, which had been hidden more than 300 years. They were translated with the sanction of Childebert, whose consent was gained through a miracle, and the property of Megium was given by him to the clergy who were appointed to do them honour. After this and many other good deeds St. Honoratus died while visiting his native parish called Portus (Port), and was there buried. This place was burnt in after years by the barbarians, but the bones of the saint were preserved and translated to his own church at Amiens. Many miracles were worked by him both before and after his death, but have escaped record. The author, however, relates some which had happened in 1060 and the following years. An appendix to the life by another writer gives some more miracles which had happened previously to 1204, and ends with an injunction to pray for the matron Sibylla, who had lately built a church in Paris to the glory of St. Honoratus. This was afterwards the celebrated collegiate church of St. Honoré, which has given its name to one quarter of the city (Hist. Litt. ibid.).

There has been considerable controversy as to the date of St. Honoratus. Le Cointe would place him in the reign of Childebert I. (A.D. 511–558), making his episcopate commence about 554 and close in 580, which is, of course, some years anterior to the time of Pelagius and Maurice (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 554, n. xx. 580, n. xviii. xix. tom. i. 800, ii. 208); while the Bollandists believe the king in question to have been Childebert II. (A.D. 575–596), and refer to Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 42, for his subvention by Maurice (Acta SS. Mai. iii. 612). This view is also taken by the authors of the Gallia Christiana (x. 1152), who put his date at 588, and they are followed by Gams (Series Episc. 487). The objection to it is that Childebert II., king of Austrasia, would have no such jurisdiction over Amiens in Neustria, as the narrative supposes. St. Honoratus is commemorated May 16. [S. A. B.]

HONORATUS (18), ST., 20th archbishop of Bourges, succeeding Humatus, and followed by

Arcadius, was present at the second council of Orleans in A.D. 533, presided over the first of Clermont in A.D. 535, and subscribed the letter to king Theodebert in the name of the assembled bishops. (Mansi, viii. 838, 863; Gall. Christ. ii. 12; Ceillier, xi. 847-850.) [S. A. B.]

HONORATUS (19), archbishop of Milan at the time of the invasion of the Lombards, 569. He fled from Milan to Genoa (Paulus Diaconus, ii. 25). Many of the ecclesiastics and people accompanied him, and for some years the congregation remained and the archbishops were chosen at Genoa. See LAURENTIUS II., bishop of Milan, and references to the letters of Gregory the Great. [A. H. D. A.]

HONORATUS (20), bishop of Seville from May 12, 636, to Nov. 12, 641; subscribed the acts of the sixth council of Toledo (A.D. 638). (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 413; Esp. Sagr. ix. 214.) [M. A. W.]

HONORATUS (21), bishop of Torcello, 717-724. Cappelletti places him between Deusdedit and Vitalis II., giving the succession at this period different from Ughelli, who also names the bishop Honorius and not Honoratus. (Ugh. Ital. Sac. v. 1365; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ix. 527, 611.) [A. H. D. A.]

HONORATUS (22), II., said to have been seventeenth bishop of Marseilles, between Babo and Vadaldus (A.D. 804-811). The greatest obscurity envelopes the bishops of Marseilles of this epoch. (Gall. Christ. i. 641.) [S. A. B.]

HONORATUS (23), an intimate friend of Augustine at Carthage, who, when both were young, "puri miserrimi," had induced him to adopt Manichaean opinions, of which Honoratus had previously entertained great dislike. This must have been between A.D. 373-382, for Augustine retained these opinions for nearly nine years. Soon after Augustine became a presbyter, A.D. 391, he wrote his book entitled De Utilitate Credendi, which he addressed to Honoratus for the express purpose of inducing him to abandon his Manichaean views (Aug. de Util. Cred. i. 2; vi. 17; Retract. i. 14; Possidius, Vit. Aug. i.).

There seems to be sufficient reason, as will be seen below, for identifying this friend of Augustine with the Honoratus who, many years later, A.D. 412, sent to him five questions, which he requested Augustine to answer for him.

1. What is the meaning of the words "My God, my God," &c. in Ps. xxi. (xxiii.)?
2. What is the meaning of Eph. iii. 17?
3. In the parable of Matt. xxv. 2-12, who are the wise, and who the foolish virgins?
4. What is meant by "outer darkness" (Matt. xxii. 13.)
5. What is meant by the "Word made Flesh" (John i. 14.)

To these questions Augustine, in his reply, takes the liberty of adding a sixth, viz. What is the grace of the New Testament? and proceeds to take this last as a key to the whole. He shews that man has two lives and two sorts of happiness, sensual and spiritual, and been made by the Creator capable of a higher life than the natural one, and of happiness even in this world higher than that of a sensual kind, concerning which, being entirely of God's gift, He held out promises in the Old Testament. These, however, were intended to prepare the way for a higher condition, and were prophetic of it. And so, in the fulness of time, He sent his Son into the world, bearing the nature both of God and man, and though "his own," whether Jews or rebellious men in general, "received Him not," yet to those who received Him He gave power to become "sons of God" (John i. 9-13). This is the grace of the New Testament, and what is called "adoption," by which we become partakers of the "Word" of God, not bringing Him down to our level, but raising us to partake of His nature. He had a true human soul, and He thought fit to partake of our flesh and to suffer persecution, a mystery which is expressed in Ps. lxxiii., and can only be explained by the method pointed out in verses 16, 17. Thus it was that Christ, in His human agony, uttered the words, "My God, my God," &c. (Ps. xxii. 1), words which may be described as the voice of the church His body, suffering in Him, but looking forward to the grace and promised hopes of the New Testament. We are Christians therefore on account not of this life, in which God may seem sometimes to forsake us, but of the future one into which the Lord led the way by His death. St. Augustine proceeds then to comment on the rest of Ps. xxii. in a manner of which the key may be said to be the idea that the Body of Christ represents the church, and His limbs its members, and the enemies surrounding Him the dangers, both temporal and spiritual, which beset the life of Christians. In the same view the latter, or jubilant, portion of the psalm is explained in reference to the church after the resurrection. The "brethren" of verse 22 are the apostles, and the seed of Israel, verse 23, the body of Christians in general (Matt. xxviii. 10; John xx. 17).

The "outer darkness" is the absence of Him who is the light of the world, the society of the devil and his angels, shared by the men who do not believe in Him, and who refuse His love. Or they may mean the bodily torments which alarm those who are governed only by servile fear. The "vows" (verse 25) denote the sacrifice of Christ's body, of which the "poor" shall eat and be satisfied (verse 26), while the rich and proud eat and worship only, but are not satisfied (verse 29).

Thus also the "length and breadth," &c. of Eph. iii. 18 is explained as a figurative description of the Cross, whose length is patience, its breadth good works, its depth the hidden will of God, and its height eternal reward. This mode of interpretation is one adopted by many of the Fathers, and by Augustine himself in other parts of his writings.

Thus, Augustine goes on to say, the rational soul must be made by grace capable of divine love and hope, cleansed by God's mercy, and protected from the error of the foolish virgins. In this parable the sleep into which all the virgins fell is death, the lamps are good works, those of the wise virgins done with a good intention, and those of the foolish for the sake of men's applause, to be bought for money from wicked flatterers, whereas in the case of those who are truly good the approbation of our own conscience, or rather the consciousness of God's work within us, is the true witness which w ar about with us (2 Cor. i. 12). And thus when the foolish virgins apply for admission to the feast, it is not said that they succeeded in buying oil for their lamps, but that they sought admission when it was too late.

By commenting on the psalm in this way Augustine thinks that he has answered the questions of his correspondent, inviting him to regard the present life as a crucifixion of sense, an extension, as it were, of our bodies on the length and breadth of the Cross, and a surrender of ourselves to God's mercy, a process by which we shall arrive in due time at that knowledge of Christ's love which surpasses knowledge (Ep. iii. 19).

Some portions of this interpretation of the words of Scripture are no doubt too literal and fanciful, others are founded on the imperfect physical science of the time, but there is much of the treatise which is highly edifying and of great value. Some of the same ideas, more briefly expressed, are found in the discourse on Ps. xxii. in the Enarrationes, but with special reference of a sarcastic kind to the Donatists.

The line of exposition of the psalm, erroneously attributed to St. Jerome, and in many points resembling that of St. Augustine, may be seen in the works of St. Jerome (Aug. Ep. 140; Enarr. in Ps. xxi. vol. iv. pp. 165-182; Hieron. App. vol. vii. app. pp. 879-886). In his Retractations Augustine calls this letter a book, a name which from its length it fully deserves, but he does not there mention the name of the sender of the questions, nor does he allude in any way to the book De Utilitate Credendi. But in his work against Julianus, Augustine represents Julianus as reminding him of the letters which he had written to Honoratus, whom he describes as "Manichæo æque," that is, he had been a Manichæan as well as Augustine himself in former days, and the letters mentioned by Julianus are the book De Utilitate Credendi, which deals with Manichæism, whereas the letter which has just been considered (Ep. 140) deals with Pelagian rather than Manichæan questions. In this letter Honoratus is mentioned as not having yet received baptism, and consequently not the Lord's Supper, though Augustine speaks hopefully of his future participation in both of these sacraments. If Honoratus, to whom Augustine addressed his letter of reply to his five questions, be the same person as he to whom he had addressed his book De Utilitate Credendi more than twenty years before, which appears to be sufficiently probable, we can hardly help regarding Honoratus as a person of unsettled mind, who, having begun life, or nearly so, as a Manichæan, and having passed the age of fifty was a little advanced in Christianity, as not to have received baptism, but was still even bewildered amid the sceptical theories of Pelagianism. Cassiodorus says that he was a presbyter. If so, he must have attained the age of fifty-five at the time when he became so (Aug. Retr. ii. 1; Opus c. Julianum, 26, vol. ix. p. 1464; Tillemont, 67, vol. xiii. p. 168). [H. W. P.]

HONORATUS (24), a monk of Tagaste, who was long afterwards ordained to be a presbyter at Thiava, or Thiaba, in Numidia, died intestate. The law of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D.

379-392, enacted that in the case of any clerical or monastic person, male or female, dying intestate, and not leaving behind him parents, children, wife, or relatives on either side, his goods, except such portion of them as might be liable to civil claims, were to be handed over to the church to which he belonged, "cui fuerit destinatus." Alypius, bishop of Tagaste, in conjunction with St. Augustine, decided at first that as Honoratus had belonged to two churches, his goods should be divided between them, but after reconsidering the matter, and conferring thereon with Samsucius [SAMSUCIUS], who disapproved of the first award, Augustine gave his opinion, that, in accordance with the letter of the law, the goods of Honoratus ought to go entirely, all or none, to the church of Thiaba, as the church of his "destination." To divide the property was in this view of the matter unjust both on religious and legal grounds, and would throw a suspicion of pecuniary interest in it on the episcopal order. Honoratus might have made a will, or if having made none he had left heirs, his property would go to them, as was the case at the death of one Aemilianus. His estate, therefore, ought to go to Thiaba, and Augustine requests Alypius to forward to the clergy of that place a notice of his decision. But as the monks of Tagaste regarded him as indebted to them for the value of the moiety of the estate of Honoratus, he expressed his readiness, if Alypius thought it right, to divide into two portions any funds that might be at the disposal of the church of Hippon, and retaining for its use such a proportion as the number of its members would require, to present the remainder to the church of Tagaste. HONORATUS (27), presbyter. Gregory the Great gave him the charge of the church of Bevagna (Mevania) until a bishop should be elected for the see. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 81; Migne, lxxvii. 534.)

HONORATUS (28), archdeacon and bishop-elect of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, correspondent of popes Pelagius II. and Gregory the Great. From the pontificate of Pelagius II. Honoratus had been complaining of the treatment he suffered from Natalis his bishop, whose conduct had been instigated by revenge, because Honoratus had prevented him from giving to his own family the sacred vessels of which he was the depositary. Natalis had wished to eject Honoratus from his archdeaconry, by endeavouring to ordain him presbyter against his will. Pelagius had charged Natalis not to cherish resentment or to harbour any such design. Notwithstanding this, Natalis had assembled a council of his province, had deposed Honoratus, had put into his place a creature of his own, and had ordained the ex-archdeacon presbyter by force. Honoratus complained to Gregory, and the bishop wrote to justify himself. Gregory sharply rebuked Natalis, ordered Honoratus to remain archdeacon, and, if the quarrel went on, to go straight to Rome. Natalis did not obey, and Gregory wrote again warning him to re-establish Honoratus. The correspondence took place between the years 590-592 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 93, 99). In 593 Vitalis died and Honoratus was by his party elected to succeed. He was never consecrated however, and to avoid a schism he soon resigned. (Greg. HONORIUS (1), FLAVIUS AUGUSTUS, emperor, born 384, died 423. A full account of the life of Honorius is given in the Dictionary of Classical Biography, vol. i., under his name, with those of his father Theodosius I., Stilicho, Alaric, and others. He was most probably born at Constantinople; but he certainly accompanied his father on his triumphal entry into Rome in 389. He was sent for again into Italy to be declared emperor of the West in 394 at Milan, and remained in that city almost uninterruptedly till 399. Neither he nor his brother Arcadius seem to have been anything but ill-informed spectators of the tremendous events which were passing around them. It might be said in their time, as in France in 1815, that no man was fit to occupy the throne who could not spend twelve hours a day in the saddle; and Honorius seems to have been constitutionally timid and inactive, though not unamiable; and capable of cruelty or treachery (or rather of terrified connivance at either), only under the influence of his fears. He was probably cowed and overpowered in early life by the alternate fierceness and devotion of his father, who sometimes reminds us of the Hispano-Gothic character of later days. In his submission to spiritual or ecclesiastical guidance he only followed his father's example. Perhaps the best-remembered event of his childhood may have been the submission of Theodosius to Ambrose in 390. It was a triumph of spiritual power, no doubt, but it was unquestionably one of genuine faith on both sides. An emperor grievously in the wrong humbles himself for it before a bishop in the right, on the ground of their mutual belief in Christ. To non-Christians both are of course without excuse; but history would have treated them both more severely if Ambrose had confined himself to verbal remonstrance on the massacre of 7000 people; or if Theodosius had repeated the process in Milan, beginning with Ambrose. His influence, exerted on both spiritual and temporal basis, and with the judgment alike of a casuist and a statesman, seems to have been almost paramount both in the palace and with the people of Milan throughout Honorius's early days; and as it would seem, from Tillemont's account of the first year of this reign, that Stilicho deferred to the saint, not without cordial regard, the real heads of church and state must then have been more at one than in the following period.

The secular history of the first year of Honorius belongs to the life of Stilicho. His wonderfully rapid and successful expedition to the Rhine to complete the pacification of the Franks, who had served Eugenius, occupied the summer of the year 395. Marcomir the Frank became his captive. Two decrees of general amnesty are found in the Theodosian Code (XV. xvi. 11 and 12), extending to acts of oblivion of all service of the departed "tyrant" Eugenius. Stilicho's presence in Greece was required in 396 to act against Alaric. Rufinus indeed had induced Arcadius to forbid his approach in person; but Gainas, to whom Stilicho committed that part of his Northern army which belonged to the Eastern empire, caused the detested minister's death on Nov. 27. Eutropius the eunuch succeeded Rufinus in his power over the mind of Arcadius, and seems to have preferred the ravages of Alaric to the defence of Stilicho. The former advanced from Thessalia, where Stilicho had opposed him till his dismissal by Arcadius, to the Peloponnese; and though the master-general of Honorius almost succeeded in blockading him, escaped across the gulf of Corinth, near Rhium, into Epirus; the court of Arcadius being, as Tillemont says, more afraid of Stilicho than of Alaric, who was appointed master-general of Eastern Illyricum in 398. Eastern court intrigues may have been connected with the revolt of Gildo, in Africa, against the Western empire in 397-8 (Zosimus, p. 788, and Claudian, infra), and Tillemont refers the open declaration of Arcadius against Stilicho as a public enemy to that time.

The general amnesty to the Eugenian party was probably due to Stilicho, and it included many pagans, among whom were the two Flaviani. The younger was made prefect of Rome in 399, partly, it seems, at the instance of Symmachus. But there is an important enactment against paganism in the first year of Honorius's reign (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 13), which forbids all sacrifices, and apparently all public assemblage for pagan worship, as with other forms of error. The legislation against heresy is varied and stringent. It is possible that Stilicho may have impressed on Ambrose and the young emperor the danger of too severe pressure at such a time on the Roman centre of idolatrous worship, but they seem to have acted at once against heretical Christians. In XVI. v. 25 a Theodosius's coercive edicts are re-enacted in their sharpest form, and all concessions revoked. The Eunomians in particular excluded from rights of military service, of legal testimony, and of inheritance, though this special severity is relaxed soon after (v. 27), in accordance with Theodosius's edicts (XVI. v. 22-24). All heretical congregations are forbidden, and their celebration of the holy mysteries, with ordination either of bishops or presbyters, altogether interdicted. Two more of the first severe edicts of this year provide that slight error or deviation ("vel levi argumento a tram-Catholica") shall be crushed ("sine timore dispendii") regardless of expense. Penalties for neglect of statutes on heresy are made capital (XVI. v. 28), and c. 29 is inquisitorial, and applies to all employés and officials, civil or military. All found to be "culpa hujus affines" are to be expelled from the service and the city. This is dated Nov. 23, Constantinople, so that Arcadius, or rather Eutropius, may be supposed to be its author.

The domestic legislation of this and following years bears witness to the severe and ill-adjusted system of taxation by means of bodies of curiales or decurions. Two decrees (XII. i. 140, 48) require the choice of decurions, who are able to pay in their own persons. From XII. i. 141-145 are occupied with restrictions on all attempts of municipes to evade taxation ("aut peregrinando, aut militiae ambitione"), under penalty of confiscation. Curiales are not to be excused payment as "navicularii," ibid. c. 148-150 (see XIII. v. 24-5). There are restraints on informations by comites (VIII. xiii. 6, 7), and apparitors employed at a distance are to confine themselves to the business on which they are sent. As a comment on former results of this system, and of the large "latifundia" and slave labour, one of Honorius's earliest decrees, T. C. XI. xviii. 2, is that 528,042 acres of land, now lying utterly waste, shall be allowed to the provincials of Campania free of tax, the record of its assessment to be burned. There are many regulations for officials in this year, and four decrees for public works and highways.

To the year A.D. 396 belongs Stilicho's thwarted campaign against Alaric in the Peloponnese, and he must have been drawn nearer the conviction, which may have overpowered his loyalty in the end, that the empire and its nominal rulers could be saved by him only, and in spite of the rulers themselves. Gibbon's reflection, that he kept Honorius in helpless inactivity, reflects on St. Ambrose as well, but probably neither of them were really answerable for the weakness of their pupil, which seems only to have been exceeded by that of Arcadius, because the latter was always in baser and feebler hands. It is difficult to say how strictly the Honorian edicts against heresy were at this time carried out, but no such persecution as that of St. Chrysostom is laid to the account of the emperor of the West. He certainly took interest and made exertions in suppressing the gladiatorial games after the death of St. Telemachus, and seems to have been naturally as harmless and helpless as the cocks and hens, who were long his chief worldly interest.

There is no doubt however that the ecclesiastical legislation of 396 and the following years is very severe. On March 2, 396 (T. C. XVI. v. 30) all heretical places of assemblage were confiscated, and all meetings interdicted by whatever name they might be called. By edicts 31 and 32 the Eunomian clergy are banished, and inquiries are directed to be made after their leaders. A fourth (XVI. vii. 6) deprives all apostates of testamentary power; their property is to go to their natural heirs, and by XVI. x. 14 all privileges of pagan priesthood or ministry are done away. The Jews are protected by three edicts (XVI. viii. 11-13).

St. Ambrose died at the end of this year or early in 397 (Tillemont, v. 498). In secular matters some efforts are made at relief. All confiscations by Tatian are to be made good (IX. xlii. 13), as well as some made by Strator (or possibly an official who held that title) in Africa.<sup>a</sup> The next edict refers to "peraequatio" or adjustment of taxation; the next provides a heavy fine for dishonest officials. By VII. iv. 21 the provincials are protected from military imposts, and the local army taxation is not to exceed the standard of Valentinian I. A solidus is to be returned (XI. xxi. 2) to provincials on every 25 lbs. of copper. On the other hand, the fisc lands are not to be encroached upon, and time is to give no title (X. i. 15); and if a curialia moves out of his city to a farm, that farm is to be confiscated for the impiety he has shewn ("vitando patriam")—a notable expression as to the civic life of Rome. Senatorial land is to be taxed apart from curial. The duty of protostasia, or forming and directing committees of taxation, is not to be evaded by senators (XI. xxiii. 3, 4). The bakers of Rome, who are much reduced and discouraged, are to have their land at fixed rent and moderate price,<sup>b</sup> and members of imperial council, with veteran officers, are to be excused acting as praetors and exhibiting games (VII. iv. 28; VI. iv. 28-30). It is noticeable, as illustrating the old pagan estimate of imperial dignity, that Honorius, in statute VI. xxvi. 7, 8, speaks of Julian as Divae Memoriae.

During 397 the Eastern and Western empires were divided by the dread of Arcadius's court for Stilicho, and Alaric seems to have been preparing, backed or directed by Eutropius, for his first invasion of Italy. But the immediate distress of the year was the rebellion of Gildo, count of Africa, who had stood neutral in the contest between Theodosius and Eugenius, but recognised the authority of Honorius since his father's death in 395. Solicited by Eutropius (Claudian. in Eutr. i. 399-505), he now pretended to transfer his allegiance to Arcadius, and anticipated Heraclian's rebellion after Stilicho's death. The Senate to whom Honorius appealed, under Symmachus's direction as well as Stilicho's, sent two fleets, one under the Christian Mascezel, brother of Gildo, the other simply as a corn flotilla. The former embarked at Pisa in the spring of 398, and Mascezel, being encouraged by a vision of St. Ambrose, who had died the year before, gained a decisive victory over Gildo. Mascezel returned to Milan the same year, leaving Africa at peace and the Roman corn markets well supplied. This is the year of Honorius's merely formal marriage with Maria, daughter of Stilicho, and he appears to have made some journeys from Milan early in 399, perhaps for the first time since his succession. He first visited Ravenna in February, returning to Milan; in and after June he was at Brescia, Verona, Padua, and Altinum.

The following edicts on church matters extend over 397 and 398. The Apollinarians were banished from Constantinople (T. C. XVI. v. 33) on April 1, which is the only coercive measure of the year, and does not belong to Honorius. By XVI. ii. 30, January 31, all ancient privileges are confined to bishops and clergy, with the proviso "Nihil extraordinarii muneris ecclesiae, vel sordidae functionis agnoscatur," which is repeated in XI. xvi. 22 (June 4). The Jews are protected from popular tumults (XVI. viii. 12, 13), and equal privileges and respect are shewn to high-priests and patriarchs as to the higher Christian clergy. (It seems possible that Ambrose may have felt inclined to make amends, or it may have been made after his death, to the Jewish race in consideration of his obstructing the course of Theodosius's justice in 388, after the destruction of the synagogue of Callinice.) But in 398 there are severe statutes on heresy. By T. C. XVI. v. 34 (Constantinople, but in Honorius's fourth consulship) Eunomian and Montanist clergy are banished from all cities and deprived of civic rights. If they are detected meeting to perform their rites in the country they are to be banished, and the building confiscated. Their books to be seized and burned, and keeping them made a capital offence. The Manichaeans were specially attacked next year (c. 35), and those who harboured them were threatened. C. 36 (next year) allows testamentary rights to the Eunomians, but forbids them to assemble, or to celebrate the mysteries. Their clergy ("ministri sceleris, quos falso nomine antistites vocant") are to be banished.

Clerical rights of sanctuary for criminals are formally refused by an edict (De Poenis, ix. xl. 16). Intercession, however, is permitted. This claim seems to have been pressed by the clerical and monastic body by violent means, which the immediate authorities had difficulty in restraining. Cases in which "tanta clericorum ac monachorum audacia est, ut bellum relint potius quam iudicium" are to be referred to the emperor for severer adjudication. Bishops, it is added, are to blame if they do not punish the offences of monks—an observation which pointed to a considerable difficulty in the episcopal position ever since monastic orders existed. Debtors public and private, including some unhappy curiales, had, it seems, claimed sanctuary in churches (IX. xlv. 3). They are to be removed "manu mox injecta." Again it is enacted (XI. xxx. 7) that no cleric or monk is to assert sanctuary by forcible defence for condemned criminals. At the same time (VI. ii. 32) bishops are recommended to ordain clergy from the monastic orders.

By IV. xi. 38, a free woman who marries a slave is not to be reduced to his condition ("nisi trinis denuntiationibus arceatur"). There are fresh adjustments of the allotment of public land (XIII. xi. 9). De Censitoribus, ix. 39, grants protection from informers (calumniatores) in Africa, and the serious question of the Roman "canon" or corn-rate appears again in 397-8 (XIV. xv. 384). In XIV. xix. 1, a maximum is fixed at one nummus.

Ambrose had successfully resisted the reintroduction of the altar or statue of Victory into the senate house in 384; and by 399 it may have appeared to Honorius's advisers that the time was come when paganism might be hastened out of existence. It can hardly be supposed that Stilicho was very active in this movement; he must have felt it as one of the chief causes of division which was paralysing the empire in presence of its worst enemies. The paganism of the Roman senate and people was connected with the proudest associations of their public and domestic history, and there is no wonder that it lingered long in the old patrician houses of the metropolis, as well as among the pagan or rustic population of the country. This was a source of weakness in keeping the Christian emperors away from Rome, and enlarging that barrier which must always have existed between barbarian emperors and senatorial houses of the ancient blood of Rome. Perhaps it may have been thought fit to hasten this division to an end by direct attempts at suppressing paganism. At all events the edicts of A.D. 399, which extend to the destruction of temples in the country, must have been felt grievously throughout Italy, and have been connected with many attempts at insurrection or resistance, and with still more disaffection and evasion of military service. Gibbon observes that Stilicho's new levies in the extreme danger of Radagaisus's invasion were rigorously exacted and pusillanimously eluded (v. iii. chap. xxx. p. 76), and in the next page, that "the oppressed votaries of Jupiter and Mercury respected in the implacable enemy of Rome the character of a devout pagan." No doubt, as he says in a note, Radagaisus worshipped Thor and Woden, and not Jupiter or Mercury. Nevertheless, all paganism whatever, from the savage German's to the luminous historian's, does in effect make common cause against Christianity. As to "devout" paganism, there can be no doubt that the utter corruption of belief on which the empire had stood since the emperor was first adored as a god, proved an active solvent in the empire's utter decay. The death struggle of a paganism long fostered, and quite without real devotion, contributed to the final overthrow of the mystic Babylon.

Its immediate result in the life of Honorius seems to have been the undermining of Stilicho. The eunuch influence in both Eastern and Western courts had always been set against him. If Olympius was capable of genuine fanaticism he or his like must be supposed to have been influential in the new measures as to pagan worship, and there seems no doubt that Stilicho was opposed to anything which thinned his muster-rolls and weakened the hearts of his followers. Perhaps he had heard of the wise counsels of Athanasius, which anticipate in their spiritual wisdom our own sad experience of 1600 years of religious strife. The great bishop had advised Jovian (Brogliè, L'Eglise et l'Empire Romain,<sup>c</sup> vol. v. p. 362) to bear with error; to bear witness to truth as emperor, but trust for its victory to the God of truth. Stilicho hardly reached this, as is proved by the many laws against heretics and idolaters in the code, but the accusations of Orosius (vi. 37) and the hostility of Zosimus on the pagan side, seem to justify Gibbon's honourable estimate of him. In any case he had a few years of glory to come, and his great enemy was preparing for the defeats of Pollentia and Verona. In 398-9 Alaric was declared master-general of Eastern Illyricum by Arcadius, and also raised on barbarian bucklers as king of Visigoths, with one name only between him and Rome (De Bello Getico, 603).

Claudian is the chief authority (De Bello Getico and Cons. VI. Honorii), for Jornandes confounds the Italian wars of Alaric, and only fixes the date (400) of Stilicho's consulship with Aurelianus. Zosimus transfers Stilicho's second victory to near the Danube. Between 400-403 Alaric had crossed Pannonia to the Julian Alps, had taken Aquileia and subdued Istria and Venetia, had perhaps been enforced from the Danube, and was threatening Milan. Honorius was now in his fifteenth year, and with the court which surrounded him thought only of flight into Gaul. Stilicho hastily left Italy by Como and the Valtelline, and assembled an army in Rhaetia, though he had no empty the Rhenish fortresses of their garrisons, and leave Gaul, and even Britain, defenceless. Milan was without fortifications; the passage of the Adige, the Mincius, the Oglio, and the Adda were unusually easy, and Honorius seems to have been overtaken in his flight for Arles, and was soon besieged in Asta or Asti in Savoy. Stilicho returned and cut his way through the Gothic lines to his rescue with a chosen vanguard. His levies seem to have issued at once from several passes of the Alps, and enclosed Alaric in his turn, cutting off all supplies. The battle of Pollentia on March 29, 403, was compared to Marius's victory over the Teutones and Cimbri (Claudian, de Bello Getico, 580-617). Alaric's cavalry appear to have been unbroken, and he seems to have been able to pass the Apennines, and even to threaten Rome. He was induced to agree to a treaty and return northward, but on the way attempted to occupy Verona as the key of the principal pass of the Rhaetian Alps, by which in fact his rear had been turned. Whether he or Stilicho were most to blame for this act of treachery seems doubtful, but he was entrapped and defeated with a loss as severe as that of Pollentia. He was however allowed to retreat, or effected his retreat, to the dissatisfaction of the people and the court or clerical party (Orosius, vi. 37), and Honorius went with Stilicho to Rome to celebrate the last triumph of the empire. The customary games took place with great magnificence, and this was the occasion on which St. Telemachus sacrificed himself by attempting to separate the gladiators. Honorius seems not to have prevented their exhibition, though there are traces of his attempting to substitute hunting scenes, races, and grand cavalry displays, among which seems to have been the ancient game of Troy. He no doubt exerted himself to the utmost to prevent the repetition of any such scene. For the future the prohibitory edict of Constantine (T. C. XV. xii. 1) was observed faithfully, perhaps for want of means. After a stay of some months at Rome, during which he appears to have honestly done all in his power to conciliate the senate, clergy, and people, Honorius determined to fix his residence in the fortress of Ravenna, which was not only almost impregnable on the land side, but afforded an easy way of escape by sea in case of pressing danger. The Milanese, like the Romans and on longer acquaintance, entertained a certain affection for him, and desired his return among them; but he had soon good reason, on the irruption of Radagaisus, to feel that his choice of residence had been a wise one, both strategically and for his own comfort.

The anti-pagan legislation of 399-400 has been partly anticipated. It prepares for the consummating decree of confiscation in 408. T. C. XVI. x. 15, prohibits sacrifice, but restrains the destruction of temples, as monumental public works. In July there is an edict (c. 16) for the destruction of rural temples ("sine turba ac tumultu") as if the pagani of the provinces had not existed, or had been effectively Christianised. It appears that some concession was found necessary, for in September Tit. x. 17, allows the usual civic festivals and days of enjoyment (festos et communem laetitiam) strictly without sacrifice, and only by way of holiday indulgence in games, &c., after ancient custom. This is commented on by Gibbon towards the end of his twenty-third chapter, on the "Decay of Paganism," vol. iii. p. 16; where he points out how offerings of produce without sacrifice might be used; and the various evasions by which absolutely pagan celebration might elude Christian rule. Such usages might remain for ages, and be carried bodily into Christian country life by popular custom. This is matter of historical experience in all countries; and the May or Beltane, and other strange rites of the Teutonic races, bear witness to it in our own day. There is a final injunction this year (c. 18) against destroying temples, if sacrifices in them have been thoroughly discontinued.

XVI. v. 35 is a severe edict against the Manichaeans and their harbourers in Africa (June). In the next month (c. 36) the Eunomians are released from intestacy, and allowed freedom of movement. Their meetings are still forbidden, and their profane mysteries made a capital offence. As the crudest form of Arianism, this heresy seems to have specially vexed Honorius and his advisers. An edict (De Religione, XVI. xi. 1) gives bishops a claim to special authority in causes involving religious questions. "Quoties de religione agitur episcopos convenit agitare."

Five decrees in succession—XII. i. 161-165—enforce the curial duties, and increase the stringency of taxation. Ecclesiastics are to find substitutes in the curiae. Appeals are, however, allowed (XI. xxx. 58, 59). The Roman corn-rate comes forward again (XIV. xv. ult.), and by a statute (De Feriis, II. viii. 23) all games of theatre and circus are stopped, and whatever "ad molliendos animos repertum est" is prohibited on Sundays. Only the emperor's birthday is to be kept, when it falls on Sunday.

Next year (400) the games are forbidden during the seven days of Lent and the week before Easter, also on Christmas-day and Epiphany.

The Jewish patriarchs are forbidden to collect money from the synagogues, probably, as Tillemont says (v. 510), to prevent its transmission eastward.

400. The legislation of this year contains a severe law of civic banishment and exclusion from society on bishops and clergy who have been deprived or degraded by their fellow clergy for seditious conduct (T. C. XVI. ii. 35). Sons of priests are not to be forced into the ministry (XII. i. 166). XI. i. 27 and 28, and De Veteranis, VII. xx. 12, enforce heavy fines on the richer sort of defaulters in their taxes, and aim at preventing evasions of taxation either by veteran soldiers, or under a false plea of veteranism.

401. There are twenty-three decrees this year. By IX. xlii. 17, the goods of proscribed persons are not to be disposed of for two years' grace. The single edict on ecclesiastical matters, addressed to Pompeianus, proconsul of Africa, except bishops and clergy actively employed in sacred duties, from the "auraria pensio," which seems (from Brissonus, Dict.) to have been generally a tax on commercial men. XI. xvii. 2, 3, are on collecting horses in Africa, probably for Stilicho's army. XI. xxxviii. 3 is a general measure of relief to debtors. VI. 16 enforces personal exertion on the curiales in the work of taxation.

402, 403. Two decrees only in the first year, one on recruits (VII. xiii. 15), for whom proper officers are required. Tit. xviii. 11, 12, refer to deserters, who seem to have banded together, as they are to be treated as rebels if they offer resistance to arrest. Harbourners to lose the house or property in or on which a deserter has been secreted. Also (cc. 13 and 14) they are to be secured by any possible means, and the provincials are to treat them as robbers. This points to the sufferings involved in the earlier campaigns of Alaric in Italy.

In 404 there are fourteen decrees, chiefly on religious matters. Of XVI. viii. 15, 16, 17, De Judaeis, the first renews the general privileges of their patriarchs, the second deprives or exempts Samaritans from military rights or exemptions; the third withdraws the prohibition of 400 as to collections in the synagogues (supra). XVI. ii. (37 Aug.) releases from prison various clerical persons concerned in popular tumults in Constantinople, but expels them, with all other foreign bishops and clergy, from the city. XVI. iv. 4 5. (De his qui super Religione contendunt) prohibits all disorderly assemblage, warns owners of slaves not to let them take part therein, and provides a heavy fine for any numularii, palace officials, or members of corporations, who may be concerned. Cap. 6 is addressed to rulers of provinces, and coerces "the orthodox, who now forsake the holy churches, and assemble elsewhere ('alio convenire conantur'), and venture to dissent from the religion of Acacius, Theophilus, and Porphyrius," now dominant in Constantinople—November. Tillemont considers that all these edicts have reference to the tumults which took place during the year on the persecution of St. Chrysostom, excepting that which refers to officials, issued in January. The saint was not actually exiled till June. A strict order for the preparation and transport of buccellatum, or biscuit for the army (VII. v. 2).

The irruption of Radagaisus is said by Gibbon to have taken place in 406, by Tillemont a year earlier. His paganism and ferocity betray the character of the wildest Northmen of later days, and he seems, like a merely barbaric general, to have thought more of his front than his flanks.

Stilicho raised thirty legions in Italy with great difficulty, by offering freedom and bounty to all slaves who would serve.<sup>d</sup> Radagaisus passed between Honorius at Ravenna and the Roman main army at Pavia; and advanced, wasting and destroying, to the walls of Florence, now for the first time made famous in history, though mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. i. 79) as a flourishing city in the reign of Tiberius. Stilicho made his accustomed use of the spade in war, and had soon enclosed his enemy within lines of circumvallation on the hills of Fiesole. Radagaisus had to capitulate, and was beheaded, and his Germans were sold as slaves in such numbers that their price fell to a single gold piece. But another great mass of barbarians invaded Gaul in the same year, probably crossing the Rhine when frozen over, on Dec. 31. The Franks were faithful to their early alliance with Stilicho in Honorius's first year, but were unable to resist the mingled host of more than 100,000 Suevi, Vandals, Alani, and Burgundians, who now entered Gaul, and never afterwards retreated. The British army soon afterwards revolted under a new Constantine; he crossed to Boulogne, and received the submission of such parts of Gaul as were unoccupied by the barbarians, against whom he obtained some successes. He appears to have been defeated or checked by an imperial army under Sarus the Goth, who was however compelled to retreat from Valentia, where Constantine fortified himself. Spain was added to his dominions without resistance, except from an army raised by the four kinsmen of Honorius, which was destroyed in the Pyrenees, A.D. 408, the year of Stilicho's death.

After such an invasion as that of Radagaisus, and in his desperate circumstances as the last general of Italy's last army, the old warrior seems to have turned towards his worthiest enemy, and felt the necessity of making terms with Alaric. The death of Arcadius on the 1st of May, 408, must have brought plans to a head on all sides. Alaric and Stilicho were in fact negotiating for the empire of the East. For some time during the interval of peace in Italy Honorius had been interceding with Arcadius for Chrysostom, and wished, perhaps between religious and political motives, to go to Constantinople and take possession of affairs for his nephew, Theodosius II., then seven years old. This Stilicho opposed; he no doubt coveted the opportunity of directing the Eastern empire as well as the West, and so continuing his negotiations with Alaric for Illyricum on more even terms of power. Further, Maria, wife of Honorius, was dead a maid, and he wished, against the will of Stilicho, to marry her sister Thermania. Serena opposed her husband's views. The marriage took place, and with it a considerable alienation between Honorius and his formidable guardian. Olympius and the court party aggravated it to the utmost, persuading the emperor that Stilicho meant to depose him, and to make his own son Eucherius emperor. The latter is said to have been a heathen, and may have been under suspicion. Stilicho had always professed Christianity, and had deferred to St. Ambrose in his lifetime, having much in common with him. But he now seems to have been altogether at variance, like Charles Martel in after days, with the clergy he defended; and Honorius's fears, alike of God and man, were raised to the point at which he could betray, or let others do so for him. A mutiny was excited at Pavia in Stilicho's army, which destroyed some of his chief friends almost in Honorius's presence. Stilicho was at Ravenna, whither Olympius sent his mutinous troops to arrest him. He took sanctuary in a church, was induced to leave it, and killed immediately by the hand of Heraclian, count of Africa, Aug. 23. Olympius was at the head of affairs. Eucherius, with many friends of Stilicho, were slain. Thermania was repudiated by, or for, Honorius, and died soon after with Serena. As Gibbon observes: "It is the last humiliation of the character of Honorius, that posterity has not condescended to reproach him with his base ingratitude to the guardian of his youth, and the support of his empire."

Stilicho had most likely preferred death to civil war in the presence of Alaric, who now in October crossed the Alps on pretence of a large claim of money. Honorius fled to Ravenna, and Alaric besieged Rome for the first time (A.D. 408), but accepted a large ransom in 409, and withdrew into Tuscany, where Ataulphus, or Adolf, probably joined him. He renewed the siege in the same year, took Ostia and the public granaries, and Rome submitted to him. Attalus was proclaimed emperor by him. Meanwhile Olympius had been succeeded by Jovius in the management of Honorius and his court; Jovius by Eusebius, Eusebius put to death, and Allobichus, who caused his death, himself executed. Alaric marched against Ravenna, and Honorius was preparing for flight by sea to the Eastern empire, when he received a reinforcement from his nephew, Theodosius II. He began a negotiation with Alaric in 410, but it was broken off through Sarus, the Gothic king's bitter enemy; and the capture and sack of Rome followed. Alaric's death took place before the end of the year, and in 412 Adolf withdrew into Gaul, where he remained until he was driven into Spain by Constantius about three years after. Meanwhile Constantine was established in Gaul, and had in 409 advanced as far as Verona, intending to share in the general ruin of Italy. But he withdrew on the revolt of Gerontius, one of his generals, in Spain: and was soon besieged in Arles. Constantius, who now appears on the stage, was sent by Honorius to recover Gaul and Spain, as his Eastern reinforcement sufficed for Italy without Alaric, and as Heraclian had saved Africa for him, probably with a view to his own revolt about 413. Constantius drove Gerontius into the Pyrenees, defeated a fresh body of barbarians, finally compelled Constantine to surrender, and sent him into Italy, where Honorius had him executed against his own promise, his fears again prevailing over his conscience.

Constantius now acted the part of Stilicho. He may have already aspired to the hand of Placidia, the emperor's sister, who was now in Adolf's hands. A revolt took place on the Rhensish frontier under Jovinus, commander of one of the remaining fortresses. Attalus, the ex-emperor, in vain attempted to induce Adolf to make an alliance with him. On the contrary, Adolf made a treaty with Honorius, and got possession of Jovinus and his brother Sebastian, both of whom were executed. Another rebel of the name of Sallustius perished about the same time (412 or 413); and the African revolt of Heraclian took place, on the failure of which he perished. Adolf had again proclaimed Attalus emperor, and married Placidia; but was attacked by Constantius, and driven with his Visigoths out of Narbonne into Spain, where he was assassinated, and Attalus made prisoner. Honorius spared his life, and extended a general amnesty to his followers. In 417 Constantius married Placidia, who had undergone much ill-usage from Adolf's murderer, but been restored by Wallia, who finally succeeded him.

There are five religious decrees out of eighteen in A.D. 405. Two relate to the Manichaean and Donatist heresies; no new law is enacted, but former statutes are put in force or threatened: "Una sit catholica veneratio, una Salus sit, Trinitatis par sibi que congruens Sanctitas expectatur." XVI. vi. 3, 14 are against the repetition of baptism, which some persons seem to have thought might be repeated not only after heresy, but for forgiveness of repeated sins. Persons guilty of rebaptizing others are deprived of all their property, which is however secured to their heirs if orthodox. The contumacious are threatened with loss of all civil rights, and there is a heavy fine for connivance.

The maximum rate of usury for senators is fixed at half of the "centesimae usurae," or 6 per cent.

406. On January 2 there is a stringent demand for the use of ships, threatening a general confiscation if the usual evasions are practised (XIII. vii. 2). Five army decrees follow: one on deserters, two on accounts of military taxes, a fourth and fifth on recruits (VII. xviii. 15, iv. 27, 28; xiii. 16 and 17). The last offer a bounty of two solidi to slaves, especially if serving with their master. Ten are promised, and three ordered to be paid, to every efficient ingenuus who enlists. If Gibbon's date of the inroad of Radagaisus for this year be correct, Stilicho must have been forming a reserve army. Or his recruits may probably have been chiefly employed on the great circumvallations round Florence.

IX. (xxxv. 10) denounces capital punishment on libellers and their readers, and even on those who fail to destroy the libel, or give information. This, and some of the decrees on particular heresies, may seem, from a not unnamable simplicity, to be Honorius's own composition.

Three decrees (XV. i. 44, 45, 46) on public buildings. The statue of the present or a past emperor is permitted to be removed for repairs; buildings are to be restored in their original style, with stone staircases if possible; and there is an order against private buildings built in contact with public ones.

XII. i. 167. Curiales are not to attempt to escape their burdens by substitutes.

A.D. 407, 408. On religious matters, XVI. v. 40, 41, include the Manichaean, Phrygian, and Priscillianist sects in the liabilities of the Donatists, i.e. loss of rights of property and succession, gift, sale, and contract, will, or right to restrain orthodox slaves from worship. The sin of heresy is expressly made a public offence, because crimen in religione divina in omnium fertur injuriam. However by c. 41 simple "confessio" or acknowledgment of error and return to orthodox service is made sufficient for restoration to all rights, and Honorius shews genuine anxiety to recall his people to the right path on easy terms. XVI. ii. 38 enacts clerical immunities for Africa.

In 408 there is no decree of interest before the death of Arcadius in May, except one to enforce taxation on, or prevent evasion by, members of the great corporation of suarii, or provision dealers. XVI. viii. 18 states that at their feast of Purim ("Aman ad recordationem") the Jews are accustomed to burn or insult the cross. This is to be put a stop to, otherwise their ceremonies are "infra contemptum Christianae legis," and may continue. There are six statutes on heretics and pagans. XVI. v. 42, 43, 44, 45, with XVI. x. 19, and V. 14, 7, and XVI. ii. 36, De Episcopis. Enemies to the Catholic faith are forbidden to serve in the emperor's palace guard. All statutes against Donatists, Manichaeans, and Priscillianists are ordered to be fully enforced, and a new sect called Caelicolae are, with them, to be deprived of all buildings for public assemblage. Donatists who have not yet confessed their heresy, but only withdrawn from Catholic service ("saevae religionis obtentu"), are included. Certain Jews and Donatists have insulted the Sacraments, and are to be punished; and all illegal assemblage for heretical worship is again prohibited. XVI. ii. 39 provides that a cleric who has been degraded, and has renounced the clerical office, shall be at once made a curialis, and forbidden to resume his orders.

IX. xlii. 20, 21, 22, are for the confiscation of all the property of the dead Stilicho and his friends, as satellites praedoni publico. His supporters are cut off from all hope of pardon. Gibbon quotes this statute with natural indignation.

408. V. v. 2, De Postliminio (recovery of right after war), a measure enjoining the liberation of all free persons reduced to slavery by accidents of war, as barbarian captivity. The buyer is to have the price of such a person restored him, his expenses of maintenance are not chargeable to the state. Nevertheless the person thus restored to society should do what he can for the benefit of his redeemer ("obsequio aut opere quinquennio"). Tillemont says (v. 567) the bishops are charged to attend to the execution of this law. The words are "Christianos sollicitudinem hujus rei gerere."

A.D. 409. De Haereticis, XVI. v. 46, Jan., 47, June. Two edicts to enforce laws on Jews, Gentiles, or pagans, and heretics. Tillemont says that the death of Stilicho caused a general outbreak of heretics, the Donatists of Africa in particular asserting that his laws against them were now abrogated. The five decrees from November 16, 408, to the end of that year are supplemented by these two.

Two edicts in March and July forbid amusements ("voluptates") on Sunday, and ordain that Jews shall be exempt from public calls on their Sabbath (II. viii. 25, 26). On taxation an attempt is made (XI. viii. 3) to prevent exactions from provincials by illegal weights and measures, and to provide them legal remedy, which the officials refuse them. See also XI. vii. 18 of exactions of officials. For other legislation of relief in this year see Tillemont, v. 575, and ref. The decisions are the subject of six decrees, the first on May 16, the others from September to December 8. No person serving in a decury ("mancipatus curiae") is to aspire to the oath of any kind of military service (XII. i. 168). Privileges are renewed to the decuries of Rome herself (XIV. i. 6). XIII. v. 77, much mutilated, seems to be a grant or concession, and cap. 171 (Dec. 8) fixes the time of holding the curial office in Gaul at sixteen years.

A.D. 410. In 410 there are four decrees (out of nineteen) on heresy, the mind of the imperial court being steadfastly abstracted from the fate of the city of Rome (which Honorius may or may not have confounded with the death of his old hen, Roma, as Procopius says he did). The Montanists, Priscillianists, and others, are forbidden military service, and other means of exemption from curial burdens (XVI. v. 48). To the intestacy of the Eumoniens is added the reversion of bequests to the fisc, if no orthodox heir survive; c. 51 altogether abrogates a former imperial oraculum or rescript, by which certain heretics had been allowed to meet in secret. Taxes and arrears are excused to Africa (XI. xxviii. 5, 6). Amnesty for soldiers led into rebellion by their officers ("sacramenta sectati," IX. xxxviii. 11). XVI. xi. 3 confirms all existing religious statutes.

A.D. 411, 412. XVI. v. 52, January. Heavy fines, or total confiscation of property, on obstinate Donatists. Pressure is to be exercised by masters on their slaves, and by the local authorities on coloni. Heretical clergy banished from Africa (c. 53). Jovinian and others, his followers, to be corporally punished and banished to island of Boas, on coast of Dalmatia. XVI. ii. 40, 41, De Episcopis. Church properties exempted from fugatio (a kind of land-tax by acreage, Brisson), also from repairs of public roads and bridges. By c. 41 clergy are to be tried only before their bishops, and special care is to be taken to avoid scandal, by only bringing forward accusations which can be definitely proved. For perfect tolerance towards the Jews, XVI. viii. 20, 21.

De Expositis, V. vii. 2, is a humane law by which those who have left slaves to perish without support transfer their property in them to those who will support them. The fact to be proved before a bishop.

To resume external history. In the year 418 Wallia and his Visigoths were settled in the south-west of France with Toulouse for their capital. Britain was entirely lost, and the Armoricians were maintaining themselves in independence. A fresh revolt under another Maximus seems not to have been suppressed till 422. Wallia, however, acted in Spain as a feudal ally of the empire, won a succession of victories over the Alani, Vandals, and Suevoi, and restored great part of the Peninsula to Honorius, who is said by Prosper's Chronicle to have entered Rome in triumph a second time. The Burgundians occupied the two provinces which still bear their name, and the Franks were settled on the Rhine. All continued to acknowledge the title of Honorius, and to hold titles from the empire; and all accepted the civil law and magistracy of Rome. Honorius himself had confirmed the independence of Britain and Armorica about 410.

Honorius was induced by Placidia to give Constantius a share in the empire, to make her Augusta, and her son Valentinian Nobilissimus Puer, in the year 421. Constantius died about seven months after, while preparing for war with Theodosius II., who had refused to recognise him as Augustus. This was probably a welcome event to Honorius, but he shewed great affection for his sister, rather absurdly as it appears, by too frequent kissing. This seems to have been offensively misinterpreted by their attendants, as by Gibbon, and may have been one of the causes of a violent quarrel, which caused alarm and tumult at Ravenna, and made it necessary for Placidia to retire to Constantinople. Within a few months after her departure Honorius died of dropsy in his fortieth year (423), Aug. 27.

The legislation of his later days has little historical interest, but the enactments which he published on paganism and heresy from 413 to 423 are as follows:—Two against repetition of baptism, 413; two against Donatists, v. 54, 55. These comprise (T. C. XVI. vi. 6, 7) the settlement effected by Marcellinus on Honorius's part at Carthage, between the orthodox and the Donatists, which, Tillemont says, brought the heresy to an end. Another follows the next year, against any public assemblage for heretical purposes, v. 56. By v. 57 Montanist congregations are forbidden; their clergy are to be banished if they attempt to ordain others. Harbours to be deprived of the house or property where the heretic remained. Their places of meeting, if any are left standing, to be the property of the church. By c. 58 houses of Eunomian clergy are confiscated to the fisc; or any in which second baptism has been administered. Their clergy are exiled, and they are again deprived of testamentary and military rights. All these, except the last, are addressed to Africa. By III. xii. 4, marriage with a deceased wife's sister or husband's brother is forbidden.

XVI. x. 20. All pagan priests are required to return to their native place. Confiscation to the church or the emperor of lands and grounds used for pagan purposes. To become a pagan is now a capital offence. Next year (416) Gentiles, or persons guilty of participation in pagan rites, are excluded from the army, or from official or judicial positions.

In the last year of his life Honorius renews and confirms all his edicts against heresy, with special mention of Manichaeans, Phrygians, Priscillianists, Arians, Macedonians, Eunomians, Novatians, and Sabbatiani.

XVI. v. 59, 60. He is able to say that he believes there are very few pagans remaining, and so far his persecution may seem to have been successful, as with the Donatists and others. Other and more powerful causes were at work, and error and idolatry were taking other forms.

The statute (T. C. XVI. x. 22 and 23) runs thus, and seems remarkable enough for transcription:—"Paganos, si qui supersunt, quanquam jam nullos esse credamus, promulgatorum legum jam dudum praescripta compescant." The next (c. 23) states that pagans caught in acts of idolatrous ceremonial ought to be capitally punished, but are only subject to loss of property and exile. He denounces the same sentence in c. 24 on Manichaeans and Pepuzitae, who are worse than all other heretics, he says: "quod in venerabili die Paschatis ab omnibus dissentiant." He ends with a strong caution against any violence on Christian pretences to pagans or Jews leading quiet and legal lives, with penalty of triple or fourfold restitution.

Two more decrees this year are for the restoration of all fabrics taken from the Jews, even for church purposes; or, at least, in case the holy mysteries have been celebrated in such buildings, that equal accommodation may be provided for the former holders. Honorius must have acted under dictation in this, as in all things. He possessed no character except a timid docility, with some natural goodness of heart or gentleness, which at least made those who led him captive to pity him. Otherwise he could not have continued to reign so disastrously for twenty-eight years. He seems to have engaged in persecution because, in fact, he could not be trusted with any other state work except mere pageantry. But it is not quite sufficiently considered, in excuse of the coercive action of his reign, that persecution was by no means an invention of his or Theodosius's, but an inheritance of the empire. Such questions as the expediency or the possibility of perfect toleration, the limits of pressure or coercion, and what body in the state is to exercise it, have been debated in theory, and hewn through in practice, from the beginnings of society to the present date, and are still unsettled. Nor can they be solved, unless the relation of the individual conscience to the public, and of the individual soul to the church, were accurately known and defined. That there is a point at which the church militant must cease to strive with invincible ignorance or determined error, leaving them to the civil power, as civil dangers or nuisances only; that her representatives are not to command, or strike with the sword, any more than remove their opponents by the suborned dagger, seem to be rules which the sad experience of eighteen hundred years has but imperfectly taught the Christian world. Only the great spirit of Athanasius seems to have anticipated them in his day, though he did not always act on them. The world knew no tolerance, and never had known it in Honorius's time; and his position as emperor compelled him to do as other emperors had done before him. The title of Divus Caesar had once had this most serious meaning, that Christians were subject to capital punishment for refusing to worship Caesar. The temptation to a Christian emperor to hold heresy or paganism an offence against the State, which he personified (at least on earth, and in heathen theory in heaven), was too much for man. Without asserting that all the faults of the Christian church may be traced to the fatal gift of Constantine, we cannot doubt that her alliance with the temporal power proved as dangerous as her investiture with temporal rule was fabulous. Pagan emperors had claimed to rule as personal and present divinity, and this claim had always specially embittered their persecution of the Christian faith. It was never, in fact, withdrawn; the ruler of Rome was invested with an awe beyond man, and that, in fact, descended to the mediæval popedom. Constantine himself had allowed his statues to be worshipped with incense and lights, and so most unhappily encouraged the earlier iconodulism of half-Christianized Greeks. But the connexion he instituted between the temporal and spiritual power tempted a Christian despot, like Theodosius, under guidance of a great representative of the church, to think that God was surely with them in whatever persecuting edict they set forth; and thus Justinian's words, "Sacriligii instar est dubitare" (Cod. IX. xxix. 3), were literally meant, and logically, if not conscientiously, believed. The empire could not forget its traditions. Excuses which are admitted by Christians for Aurelius or Diocletian ought to be considered in behalf of Theodosius and his sons. The fierceness and the necessities of their age have always been allowed, as palliations for the proceedings of Gardiner and Mary, and more grudgingly for those of Elizabeth.

It is conceivable, though it may not have been possible, and certainly did not happen, that St. Ambrose might have acted against all offenders as he did against Theodosius, with the spiritual weapon only. It is conceivable that he might have confined the church's handling of worldly punishment to protest and refusal of her rites and have warred on heresy by argument, instruction, and example of Christian ministry, and those means only. Paganism would certainly have expired as a religion with Alaric's sack of Rome and her temples. But the alliance between the imperial power and the new and searching principle of spiritual government was in fact too tempting for both, and became, as in later days, a league of despotism with superstition. Offences must have come, but it might have been within the power of Ambrose to utter some such protest on the death of Priscillianus (by Maximus's orders at Treves, 385), as should have established the rule that the church will not strike with the sword.* On the contrary, Theodosius's fifteen edicts in fifteen years, from 380-384, extend over the ministers, assemblies and persons of heretics, and make not only the Manichaean heresy punishable by death, but the Quarto-deciman error as to keeping Easter. Ambrose, like other Churchmen, could not abstain from full use of the mighty arm of flesh at his command, and the institution of inquisitors must certainly have been an ecclesiastical measure. It was reserved for modern times, after 1500 years' experience of vain attempts at coercion, to despair of it at length, and acknowledge, not that error is sinless, but that it is not a crime on which the written law can rightly lay its hand.

Again, it should be remembered that the Christian faith had by its own influences so elevated and organized the influence of the human conscience as to have become a temporal power by the nature of things. The Christian spiritual power ruled men's persons and fortunes; the bishop was in fact obeyed by his large share of the population, and became a temporal magistrate because men made him arbitrate for them. (See Guizot, Civ. in Europe, Lect. II. p. 34, ed. Bohn.) He was consequently involved with the civil power in coercive measures of all kinds, and in all directions.

Lastly, the division of the empire, of which the deep-rooted pagan associations of Rome had been one cause, in its turn left Rome the last hold of paganism, as she continued to be till Alaric and Genseric pulled down the nests of the last Olympians. But the long continuing evil was not only that the empire was divided between Rome and Constantinople, but Italy between Rome and Milan or Ravenna. Ambrose must have felt that the remaining paganism of Rome was his chief difficulty, and his influence must have been accordingly exerted on Honorius in his first days. Hence, perhaps, his supineness and indifference to the fate of Rome, and perhaps, in a great degree, the paralysis of Italian defence as soon as the barbaric genius of Stilicho was withdrawn.

A coin of Honorius is figured in Smith's Biographical Dictionary under his name, and is probably the first in Eckhel's list, which correctly describes it as a head with the diadem or binding fillet set with pearls. The countenance has an inexpressiveness which may have belonged to the subject in a special degree, but certainly extends to most portraiture after the 3rd century. The reverse is a soldier with helmet and spear, and a shield bearing either a horseman or a cross. Others are commemorative of victory or peace. One represents the emperor in the paludamentum, bearing a globe and the labarum. On another, with Vota Publica, are two emperors with nimbi, which is important evidence of the derivation of that symbol from Imperial effigies (see Tyrwhitt, Art Teaching of Prim. Ch., Index "Nimbus"). Another, the last mentioned, bears D.N. HONORIUS. P. AUG. with laurelled head, but has ASINA and an ass suckling a chicken, with Æ. III. on the other. Taninius considers this a heathen insult to Honorius as a Christian persecutor (parallel, it would seem, to the well-known "Grafito Blasfemo" recently discovered). The ass's head however, as Eckhel observes, is not the same thing as the whole animal. Could it be any insulting allusion to Honorius's feathered favourites? See Procopius's story above mentioned (Bell. Vand. lib. i. c. 2; Eckhel, vol. viii.). [R. St. J. T.]

HONORIUS (2), bishop of Milevis in Numidia, towards the end of the 4th century. He is mentioned by Augustine (Contr. Petilian. cap. 38) as having been deposed as unworthy, by the sentence of his fellow bishops. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 228.) [R. S. G.]

HONORIUS (3), bishop of Cella or Cellae Picentinae, a town of Byzacene, on the east coast, between Tacape and Tabalta, so named from its granary (Sidi-Meddub) (Ant. Itin. 50, 4; Pliny, H. N. xviii. 22), present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Gesta Collat. Carth. cognit. i. num. 126.) [H. W. P.]

HONORIUS (4), Donatist bishop of Bartana, probably in Byzacene, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411, at which he complained of the treatment which he had received from Victor, the Catholic bishop of the place. (Gesta Collat. Carth. cognit. i. num. 126.) [H. W. P.]

* See Gibbon, chap. xxvii. (v. li. p. 528, ed. Millman). He observes (as the repetition of edicts in the Code proves) that the Theodosian and Honorian penalties were seldom enforced; referring to Sozomen, lvii. c. 12. See also p. 528 for the distress of Ambrose and Martin of Tours on the execution of Priscillian.

HONORIUS (5), a bishop, probably of the Numidian province, who appeared at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411, on behalf of Januarius, bishop of Casae Medianenses. As no other Catholic bishop of this name is mentioned, it is likely that he was the bishop of Cella mentioned above [HONORIUS (2)]. [JANUARIUS]. (Coll. Carth. i. 135.) [H. W. P.]

HONORIUS (6), a bishop present at the council of Milevis, against Pelagianism, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 176.) [H. W. P.]

HONORIUS (7), the name of three African bishops banished by Hunneric in 484, in the list of Victor Vitensis (Notitia, 58, 59, in Patr. Lat. lviii.), viz. of—

Aquae Albae in Mauretania Sitifensis. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 78.)

Benepota in Mauretania Tingitana (?). (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 100.)

Oppenna in Byzacene. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 251.) [R. S. G.]

HONORIUS (8) (II. ?), bishop of Salona. He obtained the see, after a vacancy of thirteen years (A.D. 480–493). Two letters of pope Gelasius to Honorius are extant, written c. A.D. 495 (Migne, lix. 50–53), warning him to use all efforts to extinguish the Pelagian heresy (Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. ii. 133–149). He died A.D. 505. [J. de S.]

HONORIUS (9) III., bishop of Salona, succeeding Stephanus, c. A.D. 528. He presided at the provincial synods held at Salona, A.D. 530–2. Farlati (Illyric. Sacr. ii. 161 et seq.) derived his account from a codex in the Barberini library, entitled Historia Salonitanorum Pontificum. Another MS., substantially the same, was edited by Joannes Lucius (Amstelod. 1668), and a third is preserved in the archives of the College of the Propaganda. Lucius and Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. v. 219) take different views as to the accuracy of the narrative; the former believing it interpolated in many places, the latter accepting it as a trustworthy authority. But it is very doubtful whether more than one synod was held in the lifetime of Honorius. It was attended by eight bishops, in addition to the metropolitan, and ten presbyters also signed the canons, which were thirteen in number. They deal with questions of discipline mainly; the clergy are forbidden to lend or borrow money without the consent of the bishop (§ 1, 2), or to move from one diocese to another without due sanction (§ 7); bishops are not to ordain except when additional clergy are needed (§ 8). In his episcopate Salona suffered severely from the Gothic war (A.D. 535–8). Honorius died A.D. 544. After his death he was mentioned by pope Vigilius in terms of severe censure (see Epist. ad Rusticum, Patrol. Lat. lxi. 44), as having permitted certain uncanonical ordinations. [J. de S.]

HONORIUS (10) IV., bishop of Salona, c. A.D. 566. (Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. ii. 211.) [J. de S.]

HONORIUS (11), 13th bishop of Sion, succeeding Heliodorus, and followed by Leudemunus, towards the close of the 6th century. It has been doubted whether he is not identical with Heliodorus, the twelfth bishop. (Gall. Christ. xii. 736.) [S. A. B.]

HONORIUS (12), bishop of Brescia, c. 585. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 563.)

[A. H. D. A.]

HONORIUS (13), bishop of Tarentum. He received a letter from Gregory the Great, allowing the use of a baptism. (Epist. lib. xiii. indict. vi. ep. 20 in Migne, lxxvii. 1274.)

[A. H. D. A.]

HONORIUS (14), bishop of Cordova from about 618. He attended the second council of Seville (619), presided over by St. Isidore, and appears to have been the junior bishop present (see order of signatures, Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 355). Can. 2 of the council decided a dispute between Honorius and Isidore's brother, FULGENTIUS of Ecija, as to the boundaries of their respective bishoprics. A church was claimed by one side as within the parish of Celti (Penaflor), and by the other as belonging to that of Regina (near Llerena; Cortez y Lopez, Dicc. Geog. ii. 341, iii. 304; Corpus Inscr. Lat. ii. 33). The council orders commissioners to be sent to inquire into the matter. If ancient testimony is forthcoming on the side of the appellant bishop, the church is to be restored to him. If not, it is to remain in the hands of its present possessor, to whom an ownership of thirty years has given a prescriptive right, which prescriptive right is defined by the edicts of secular princes, and by the "auctoritas Presulum Romagorum." (Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. ii. 667; Esp. Sagr. x. 232; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. (2) 85.) [M. A. W.]

HONORIUS (15), bishop of Rome from Oct. 27, 625, to Oct. 12, 638, during nearly thirteen years; successor to Boniface V. and contemporary with the emperor Heraclius.

What makes his pontificate peculiarly memorable is the rise of the Monothelite heresy, and the implication in it of the pope himself. The unity of the Person of our Lord having been affirmed at Ephesus (431) against Nestorianism, and the distinct co-existence of His divine and human natures at Chalcedon (451) against the Monophysites, the further question now arose whether there were to be conceived as co-existing in Him two wills and two energies (i.e. operations of will), as well as two natures. On the one hand the idea of two wills, or of two energies, in the one Word made flesh, was felt by some to be inconsistent with Christ's undivided personality, and to involve the idea of internal conflict. On the other hand, the idea of one will only, or of one energy only, was felt to involve the Monophysite view of the absorption of the human nature into the divine. The question was brought into prominence through the intervention of the emperor Heraclius, who during his successful campaign against the Persians (from A.D. 622) seems to have become interested in it through conversations with Monophysite bishops in Syria and Armenia. It may be that he was thus led to conceive the idea of uniting by a common formula the Monophysites and orthodox, and effecting this purpose by the phrase "Divine-human Energy" (ἐνέργεια θεαῶνδρική), as that by which the Incarnate Word worked. It had the recommendation to the orthodox of having been used in the writings attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, whom both parties venerated,<sup>a</sup> and might satisfy the other party as denoting one energy of will only though of a compound nature. This, at any rate, was the formula now offered for acceptance. The emperor having consulted Cyrus bishop of Phasis in Colchis on the subject, and he feeling a difficulty about it, recourse was had to Sergius patriarch of Constantinople, who in his reply to Cyrus, though expressing himself vaguely, favoured the idea of one only energy in Christ rather than the other.<sup>b</sup> He rested his opinion, such as it was, entirely on the dicta of fathers, not on the merits of the question itself, being apparently a man of no great originality. No oecumenical council, he said, had determined the question; many venerable teachers of the church had spoken of one operation of will in Christ, but none, as far as he knew, of two; if any such could be found, his authority might be followed, it being right to adopt the very words of the fathers, and to avoid novelties (Serg. Ep. ad Cyrum). Cyrus was sufficiently satisfied with this reply to declare in a synod at Alexandria (to which patriarchal see he was soon after appointed) the doctrine of a single energy; and he is said to have succeeded, by means of comprehensive formulæ on nine dogmatic points, in bringing thousands of Monophysites, who abounded there, into union with the orthodox church. But he was strenuously opposed by one Sophronius, a monk from Palestine, then in Alexandria, who insisted that the doctrine of one energy only led inevitably to Monophysitism. By mutual consent Sergius was again consulted, Sophronius himself undertaking a journey to see him. Sergius still adhered to the view he had already expressed, but was against framing any new dogma in its favour, for fear of giving offence or being misunderstood, and strongly advised discontinuance of the controversy, and to this effect he wrote to Cyrus. In 634 the monk Sophronius was made patriarch of Jerusalem, after which it was that pope Honorius became involved in the controversy. To him Sergius now wrote, stating what had been done, and seeking the concurrence of the bishop of Rome both with his own doctrinal views and with his policy of recommending silence. His own views, as expressed in this letter, are that the assertion of one energy or of two ought to be alike avoided, as calculated to cause offence and misunderstanding, the former as seeming to do away with the two natures which were united in Christ, the latter as seeming to imply two wills in Christ, contrary to each other, which (he says) would be impious. In reply Honorius sent two letters to Sergius, one on the receipt of his, the other after having been solicited by a deputation and a letter from Sophronius to declare for two wills and energies. In these two memorable letters, which were the ground of the charge against him of implication in heresy, he approves of the measures of Cyrus at Alexandria, which had resulted in the reconciliation of so many heretics, and agrees with Sergius in acknowledging but one will in Christ, and this both on the main ground taken by Sergius, that none of the fathers had spoken of two, and also on the merits of the question itself. But, as to one or two energies, he holds that neither Scripture nor councils had authorised the assertion of either view, and fully agrees with his correspondent that both assertions ought to be avoided, lest simple people should be betrayed by the one into Monophysitism, or by the other into Nestorianism. It is enough, he says, for men to believe that our one Lord Jesus Christ, Son of the living God, and very God, operates in two natures, divinely and humanly. In his disquisition on the merits of the question his main argument is the same which seems to have influenced Sergius, viz. that duality of will seems to him to involve contrariety, such as could not be in Him whose divinity had assumed, not our fallen human nature in which the flesh lusts against the Spirit, but our original uncorrupted nature. And he justifies the assertion of one will only in Christ, notwithstanding His complete humanity, by the supposed analogous case of its being orthodox to say that God suffered in Christ, though it was not in His divine nature that He suffered. In like manner, he argues, it is right to say that the same Divine Word willed throughout, in His human nature as well as in His divine. The obvious difficulty of the texts, "I came not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me," and "not my will but thine be done," he attempts to get over by saying that Christ spoke thus for our sake, "to whom He gave an example, that we should follow His steps." Honorius wrote also to Cyrus and Sophronius, similarly enjoining silence.

These letters of Honorius to Sergius have been a source of difficulty to upholders of papal infallibility. The popes after him were consistent supporters of the doctrine of two wills. Of these John IV. (641) tried to explain away the alleged heresy of his predecessor by saying that he had only denied the existence in Christ of two contrary wills in His own members (cf. Rom. vii. 23), such as we have from our first parents' sin. (Johann. Ep. ad Constantin. Imp. in collectan. Anastas. ; Mansi, x. 682.)<sup>c</sup> But, though this had been a main ground of Honorius's argument, it is evident from the extracts given above that he had built much more upon it; having apparently failed to see that the harmony between the flesh and the spirit in the humanity of Christ was a distinct question from that of the coexistence in the Incarnate Word of a human and a divine will. In all the measures taken afterwards at Rome against the Monothelites no mention is made of Honorius; but when in the 6th general council (680), the doctrine of two wills and two energies was finally asserted, Honorius was anathematized by name among other former upholders of heresy. "And with them we anathematize, and cast out of the holy Catholic Church, Honorius who was pope of the elder Rome, because we have found through his letters to Sergius that he followed his opinion in all respects, and confirmed his impious dogmas" (Synod. Oecum. vi. actio xiii.; Mansi, xi. 556). The same anathema was repeated in act. xvi. and act. xviii. (Mansi, xi. 622, 655). The acts of the council were signed by the legates of pope Agatho, and it was accepted as oecumenical both in the East and West. Further, Leo II., the successor of Agatho, in his letter to the emperor Constantine, in which he confirms the council, writes: "We anathematize . . . and also Honorius, who did not purify this apostolic church by the teaching of the apostolic tradition, but by profane treachery endeavoured to pollute the undefiled." (Mansi, xi. 731.)<sup>d</sup> See also his letter to the Spanish bishops (Mansi, xi. 1052), and to Evagrius, king of Spain (ib. p. 1057). Also in the profession of faith, subscribed by subsequent popes on their accession, they anathematized "Sergium, &c. . . . unacum Honorio, qui pravæ eorum assertionibus fomentum impendit" (Lib. Diurn. cap. ii. tit. 9, professio 2). In the face of these facts the orthodoxy of Honorius has been since maintained by the assumption of one or other of the following positions: 1. That the 6th oecumenical council erred, not of course in its definitions of faith, but as to the matter of fact about Honorius. 2. That it was not for heresy, but for negligence in suppressing heresy, that he was condemned. 3. That he was never condemned at all, the acts of the council having been corrupted. The first of these positions is taken by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who cites in confirmation the letter of pope John IV. above referred to (Anastas. Ep. ad Joan. Diac. Collectanea); also by Cardinal Turcercranta (de Eccles. l. 2, c. 93); Bellarmine (de Rom. Pontif. 4, 11); Cardinal Pallavicino (Hist. Concil. Trident. 7, 4); Melchior Canus (de Locis Theolog. 5, 5); Arsdekin (Theolog. tripart. 3, quaest. 3); and Franciscus Antonius Cavalcanti (Vindiciæ Roman. Pontif. Romæ, 1749). It is argued on this head that a general council, as well as a pope, may err in matters de facto, though not in matters de jure. This position involves the assumption, either that the language of Honorius in the letters as we have them was misunderstood, or that the letters themselves were spurious or interpolated. The latter is the contention of Bellarmine, who, further, to the allegation that at any rate a general council thought a pope capable of error on a matter of faith, replies that it was as a private person, not as a pope, that he was regarded as thus capable. The second position is taken by De Marca (Baluz. in ejus Vita Præfixa Libris de Concord. Sacerdot. et Imp.); Garnier (Append. ad not. cap. 2, Libri Diurn. Rom. Pontif.); Tamaquins (Hist. Monothel.); Pagi (ad ann. 533), and Combesius (Hist. Monothel.). But see the language of the acts of the council, above quoted. The third position is maintained at great length by Baronius. See also Binius (note on Honorius). The contention is that the name of Honorius has been substituted in the acts of the council for that of Theodorus, a deposed Monothelite patriarch of Constantinople. The grounds for this contention are that pope Agatho, whose letter to the council was accepted as an oracle of God, had stated in his letter to the emperor (which was read at the council) that all his predecessors had resisted heresy; and further that Anastasius Bibliothecarius (in Compendio Actuum Synodal.) says that Theodorus was condemned by name, whereas in the extant acts of the council his name does not appear. Further, the letter of Leo II. to the emperor is supposed by Baronius to be spurious, and by Bellarmine to be corrupt. On the position thus taken by Baronius, Bower (History of the Popes, Agatho) remarks, "Nothing, surely, but the utmost despair could have suggested to the annalist so desperate a shift." Against all these evasions see Bower (as above), Richer (Hist. Concil. General. i. 296), Du Pin (de Antiq. Eccles. Discipl. p. 349), Bossuet (Defensio).

Early in his pontificate (626) Honorius took up the cause of Adaloald, king of the Lombards, who, according to Paulus Diaconus (de Gestis Longobard. l. 4, c. 3), had been deposed on the ground of insanity in favour of Arioald, his sister's husband. A letter from the pope to Isacius, exarch of Ravenna, has been preserved, in which he animadverts on the bishops beyond the Po having supported Arioald, and desires the exarch to send them to Rome for due punishment, after the hopes for restoration of the deposed king to his throne.

In the latter part of his reign (634) he sent palls to Honorius and Paulinus, the metropolitans respectively of Canterbury and York, with directions that, in the event of the death of either, the other should consecrate a successor without the necessity of having recourse to Rome. Bede (H. E. ii. 17, 18) gives the letters which he wrote on this occasion to Edwin, king of Northumbria, and to Honorius, in the former of which he exhorted the king to perseverance to good works, and to frequent perusal of the writings of St. Gregory. Bede also states that he wrote to the Scots on the Easter question, which then divided them from the English Christians of the Roman obedience, exhorting them to conform to the catholic usage (H. E. ii. 19).

There are extant several letters of Honorius, including those given by Bede, to be found in Mansi, and other collections, and described by Jaffé in the Regesta Pontificum, pp. 156-159. Those to Sergius, with that of Sergius to him and others bearing on the Monothelite controversy, are preserved in the acts of the 6th oecumenical council.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius says that Honorius repaired many churches, and enriched others with valuable gifts, and that he obtained leave from the emperor to cover the church of St. Peter with gilt copper tiles, removed from the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus; also that he instructed the clergy, and instituted a weekly litany on Saturdays in procession to the churches of St. Apollinaris and St. Peter, to be joined in by the whole people. [J. B.—y.]

HONORIUS (16), the fifth archbishop of Canterbury. Of his life before he became archbishop nothing more is known than that he was a Roman, and had been, as stated by Bede and also by pope Zachary, one of the disciples of St. Gregory (Bede, H. E. v. 19; Bonif. Epp. ed. Jaffé, p. 185). If this is not a mere supposition on the part of those authorities, Honorius must have been over forty years when he was raised to the episcopate. The exact date of his promotion has never been quite ascertained. The chief data for fixing it are the notices given by Bede in reference to the succession of East Anglian bishops, of whom two at least were consecrated by Honorius. Bisi, bishop of Dunwich, who was present at the council of Hertford in 673, was consecrated by Theodore, i.e. in 669 at the earliest. His predecessor, Boniface, had ruled for seventeen years under Honorius, who consecrated him; his appointment cannot be thrown later than 653, in which year Honorius died, and may be placed earlier, as it seems not improbable that he was dead in 667, when Wighard was sent for consecration to Rome. Thomas, the predecessor of Boniface, had ruled for five years, and Felix, the first East Anglian bishop, who was either consecrated or recognised as bishop by Honorius, exercised his office for seventeen years. Supposing that no long interval occurred between the successive East Anglian bishops, a period of twenty-two years at least must have intervened between the appointment of Felix and that of Boniface; in other words, the beginning of the episcopate of Felix cannot be placed later than 631, and most probably was earlier, probably as early as 628. Hence it seems a natural inference that the date assigned by the Anglo-Saxon chronicle for the death of Justus and succession of Honorius, A.D. 627, should be accepted. (See Wharton, Ang. Sac. i. 92, 93; Smith's notes on Bede; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 73, 82; Bede, H. E. iii. 20.) This date may be held to receive some slight confirmation from the consensus of the medieval chronologists, who generally give twenty-six years as the length of the episcopate of Honorius (see Ang. Sac. i. 2, 87; Will. Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 6, &c.).

The consecration of Honorius was performed by Paulinus, now bishop of York, and the only remaining bishop of the Roman succession. It took place at Lincoln, in the stone church just built by the "praefectus" Blaecca (Bede, H. E. ii. 16, 18), probably in the early spring of 628. In seeking consecration from Paulinus Honorius was acting in accordance with the intention of St. Gregory as declared to Augustine, touching the relations of the two metropolitan sees, but Paulinus had not yet received his pall, and there was moreover no alternative if the new archbishop were to be consecrated in England.

Although the personal action of Honorius can be traced in only a few of the events which happened during his long pontificate, what little is known of him marks him as a missionary, and, in will at least, the founder of new churches. One of his first acts must have been to welcome and consecrate, or recognise the episcopal character of Felix the Burgundian, who not later than 631 began the conversion of East Anglia. Another would be to receive the widowed queen of king Edwin of Northumbria and the missionary party headed by Paulinus, who were obliged to return to Kent after the battle in which Edwin and the Christianity of the North fell before Penda. Paulinus was settled by Honorius in the see of Rochester, not later than the year 633. In 634 pope Honorius I., who had not heard of the fall of Edwin, sent from Rome two palls for the two metropolitans, with a letter addressed apparently to the two conjointly, in which he rules that for the future the new archbishop is to be consecrated by his surviving colleague. The letter, which was accompanied by one addressed to Edwin, is dated June 11, 634, nine months after Edwin's death. So much had the intercourse between Rome and Canterbury lost of its original regularity and frequency. (Bede, H. E. ii. 17, 18.)

Another letter addressed by pope Honorius to the archbishop, and assigning the primacy to Canterbury, has been preserved by the monks of Christ Church, but it is subject to the same suspicions which affect the genuineness of the other documents in the same series (Will. Malmesb. G. P. lib. i. § 32; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 85); it is without date, but cannot be thrown later than 638, when the pope died. Its regulations are contradictory to those of the former letter, which places the two metropolitan sees on an equal footing; so that, if genuine, it must have been drawn up after the pope had learned the destruction of the Northumbrian church. But even this is highly improbable.

With the conversion of the West Saxons, which began about 634, Honorius seems to have had nothing to do. The powerful secular agency exerted in that direction by Oswald of Northumbria was prompted by the Scottish rather than the Kentish church. With the Scottish prelates, however, especially Aidan, Honorius was on friendly terms, although the intercourse probably did not reach the point of intercommunion. (Bede, H. E. iii. 25.)

In 640 Honorius saw the death of king Eadbald, who since his conversion had continued steady in support of the church. Unfortunately the history of the saints of the Kentish royal house is so full of legendary matter that no historical deductions can be drawn from it, and it is impossible to say what share Honorius may have had in educating or guiding the monastic heroines of Kentish history.

In 644 Paulinus died, and Ithamar, his successor in the see of Rochester, was consecrated by Honorius. He was the first Englishman who was made bishop, and continued the Canterbury succession as consecrator of Deusdedit (Bede, H. E. iii. 14, 20). A few years later Honorius consecrated Thomas, a Gyrvian deacon, as successor to Felix of East Anglia; and on the death of Thomas, after an episcopate of five years, Berhtgils, or Boniface, a Kentish man, in his place (Bede, H. E. iii. 20). This must have been among the last acts of his administration. He died on the 30th of September 653, and was buried with his predecessors in the north porch of the church of St. Augustine (Bede, H. E. iii. 20). A poetical epitaph is given, as usual, by Elmham (ed. Hardwick, p. 183).

The episcopate of Honorius, long as it was, was marked by no great development within the immediate area of his influence. The right hand of fellowship was extended to the East Anglian mission, and one bishop of East Anglia was supplied from Kent; but no attempt seems to have been made to recover Essex or Sussex, which were left to the later exertions of the thern missionaries. This seeming weakness of the Kentish church may be attributed to three things, the great age of Honorius, who must have been over seventy at the time of his death; the slightness of the connexion with Rome, which did not now become rare and intermittent; and the overpowering influence of Penda in the middle of the seventh century. But, further than this, even the monastic chroniclers abstain from making Honorius a great monastic founder. He appears in Bede merely as the consecrator of abbat Tronius at St. Augustine's (p. 175); and his name occurs in no single charter, forged or genuine. His life, by Gosselinus, still in MS., contains, according to Sir T. D. Hardy, nothing of historical importance; the biography by Capave is an abridgment of that work (Nova Agenda, f. 181; Acta SS. Bolland. Sept. vol. i. p. 691). A short poetical life is contained in the Lambeth MS. 159. Modern views of Honorius and his episcopate may be found in Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. i. pp. 100-123; and in Bright's Chapters of Early English Church History. [S.]

HONORIUS (17), bishop of Malaga from about 690. He appears at the 16th council of Toledo, 693, where his signature is twenty-third among fifty-eight. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; p. Sagr. xii. 323.) [PATRICIUS.]

HOR (OR, "Ωρ, Soz.), Egyptian monk, cir. 400, contemporary with Rufinus and Palladius, from whom our fullest information of him is derived (Ruf. Hist. Monach. cap. 2; Palladius, aus. Hist. cap. 9). In his early days he buried himself in the remotest solitudes, but in his old age, directed by a vision, he removed to the vicinity of Thebes. Numbers flocked to him, and he became "the father of many monasteries." These were populous communities, a thousand brethren appearing to be the usual number, and on one occasion three thousand are mentioned. Sozomen (vi. 28) and Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xi. 34) in their briefer notices place Hor in the Thebaid, as does Rufinus, who visited him there; but Palladius represents him as occupying the mountain bordering on Nitria. The monasteries he superintended were therefore probably in both districts. Hor was famed for his virtues and his wisdom. The current anecdotes reported that he was never known to lie, to swear, to curse, or without necessity even to speak. The monk Pystus once went to visit him and his companion Athre, the latter being as famed for obedience as Hor was for humility. Pystus asked them for a saying. Hor replied to this effect: "Whatsoever you behold, go and practise it: for God helps him who is forcing himself to deeds beyond his own strength." (Heraclid. Paradisi, cap. 2 in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 260 a; Verba Seniorum, libell. iii. §§ 7, 8, libell. xv. § 43, in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 961, 1008.) Rufinus describes him at the age of ninety as one who from his very dress seemed invested with an angelic honour (in allusion, as Rosweyde notes, to the ἀγγελικὸν σχῆμα worn by Egyptian monks of advanced age and sanctity), having a long beard, hair of dazzling whiteness, and a countenance so beaming with happiness that he appeared scarcely to belong to earth. Jerome, however, in his letter to Ctesiphon (ep. 133, § 3, p. 1030, ed. Vallars. in Patr. Lat. xxii. 1151), reckons Hor as one of the Origenist heretics. He is placed in the Menaea under Aug. 7.

HORAEAE ('Ωραία), according to the SETHITES, the wife of Seth (Epiph. Haer. 39, p. 286). Mosheim conjectures instead of Horaea, Norea (see Irenaeus, I. 30, p. 111). Epiphanius states that the word Horaea was used by the heretical sects as the name of a certain power, and remarks that according to the Book of Jubilees the name of the wife of Seth was not Horaea, but Azurah (compare Rönisch, Buch der Jubiläen, p. 368; and Ewald, Jahrbücher der bibl. Wiss. 1850, p. 253).

HORMISDAS (3), bishop of Rome after Symmachus from July 26, A.D. 514, to Aug. 6, 523, for a little more than nine years, Anastasius and Justin being successively emperors of the East, and Theodoric ruling the West as king of Italy. He was a native of Frusino in Campania, the son of one Justus. Pope Silverius (acc. A.D. 536) is said to have been his son. (Liberat. Breviar. 22.)

The memorable event of his pontificate was the restoration of communion between the churches of Rome and Constantinople, which had been interrupted since the year 484, in connexion with the Eutychian heresy. [See FELIX III. and ACACIUS.] The first overtures were made in the year 515 by the emperor Anastasius, moved thereto by pressure of circumstances rather than inclination. He had previously been distinguished as an upholder of Eutychianism and a persecutor of orthodoxy; he had banished orthodox bishops, including especially Macedonius the patriarch of Constantinople, for whom (A.D. 511) he had substituted the Monophysite Timotheus. In concert with him he had in 512 caused the clause (first introduced by the notorious Peter the fuller, and considered to involve Monophysitism), "who was crucified for us," to be added to the Trisagion, when sung at Constantinople; in consequence of which there had been a tumult and bloodshed in the church, and afterwards a popular sedition, accompanied by much slaughter, which the emperor had been only able to appease by deceitful promises of concession. (Marcellinus Comes, Cedrenus.) In 513 he had banished Flavianus the patriarch of Antioch, and intruded into the see a Monophysite, Severus, who is said to have greatly persecuted the orthodox there. In 512 the orthodox bishops of the East had applied to pope Symmachus for admission to communion with Rome; but, as they were unwilling to erase from their diptychs the name of the deceased patriarch, Acacius, whose excommunication by pope Felix had been the original cause of the breach with Rome, the attempt had failed.

What moved at length the emperor himself to seek reconciliation with the pope was the fact of Vitalian, a Scythian, the commander of the imperial cavalry, having taken up the cause of orthodoxy, made himself master of Thrace, Scythia, and Mysia, and marched with an army of Huns and Bulgarians to the gates of Constantinople. Anastasius had been obliged to procure peace by assenting to three conditions: 1st, that persecution of the orthodox should cease; 2nd, that deposed orthodox bishops should be restored to their sees; 3rd, that he should summon a council at Heraclea, to which the pope should be invited, and where free discussion should be allowed. (Theophan. Chron. ad an. Imp. Anast. 23.) Now it was (A.D. 515) that the emperor wrote to Hormisdas, desiring his concurrence in restoring unity to the church by means of the council he proposed to summon, and saying that he would have made overtures sooner but for the hardness (duritia) of former popes. Dorotheus, bishop of Thessalonica, wrote at the same time, expressing his desire of union. Hormisdas, in his guarded reply to the emperor, thanks God for inspiring him with a desire for union, but declines to write more at length till he should learn the purpose of the proposed council. He replied also in general terms to the letter of Dorotheus. The emperor now wrote a second letter, in which he invites the pope, with such of his bishops as he might select, to attend a council already summoned to meet at Heraclea, "for declaring the faith and obviating doubt and discord." To this proposal Hormisdas was not prepared to accede till he saw better what the emperor was driving at. He sent accordingly legates to Constantinople,—two bishops, Eudodius and Fortunatus, a presbyter, Venantius; a deacon, Vitalis, and Hilarus a notary,—charged with letters to the emperor and to Vitalian, together with a statement of the necessary conditions of union. They were: 1. That the emperor should issue a written declaration to all the bishops of his dominion that he accepted the council of Chalcedon and the letters of pope Leo. 2. That a like declaration should be publicly signed by the Eastern bishops, who should also anathematize Nestorius, Eutyches, Dioscorus, Aelurus, Peter Mongus, Peter the Fuller, and also Acacius, with all their followers. 3. That persons exiled for religion should be recalled, and their cases reserved for the judgment of the apostolic see. 4. That such exiles as had been in communion with Rome and professed the catholic faith should in the first place be at once recalled. That bishops accused of having persecuted the orthodox should be sent to Rome to be judged. Thus at the outset, as ever afterwards, the pope took his stand on a very different ground from what was contemplated by the emperor. The latter proposed a free discussion in council of the questions at issue between the Monophysites and the orthodox. The pope required the unconditional acceptance of orthodoxy, and submission to himself as the head of Christendom, before he would treat at all. He did not reject the idea of a council, but he did not wish for one, nor being wanted from his point of view. The Easterns had but to renounce their errors, and accept the terms of reconciliation dictated by the apostolic see, and peace would be at once restored. The legates had also private instructions given them by the pope in writing, which curiously illustrate his suspicion of the emperor, and his adroit diplomacy. They are instructed to treat any bishops who may receive them on their arrival in Greece with suitable respect, for fear of seeming to the people averse to union, and to accept lodging from them, but at the same time to decline entertainment at their tables, or provisions and gifts beyond the necessary charge for their onward journey. Arrived at Constantinople, they are to receive no one but the emperor's own messengers till they have been admitted to his presence; after which admittance they may hold intercourse with orthodox and well-affected persons, from whom they are to try to elicit information as to the real design of the court. They are to be resolute in refusing to be introduced to the emperor by the patriarch Timotheus, or to allow his presence at their interview, alleging the pope's orders that no bishop should be present, and saying, if necessary, that they had matters to communicate with respect to the patriarch himself which he must not neglect. Minute directions are given them for their interview with the emperor. First, they are to deliver the pope's letter, with courteous assurances of the prayers of the holy father, and his desire for union. The letter being read, they are to make the significant intimation that the holy father had also charged them with a let-the emperor's servant, Vitalian, and to request the pope to deliver it. But they are to plead the pope's orders against letting the emperor see it, at the same time disdaining earnestly, if necessary, the imputation of its containing any secret communication, or of the legation having any object but the maintenance of the constitutions of the fathers, and the expulsion of heretics from the church. Should the emperor reply that such was also his own purpose in inviting the pope to the proposed council, they are to intimate gradually that the end would be attained by the maintenance of the council of Chalcedon and the letters of pope Leo. If the emperor should declare his acceptance of the council and the letters, they are to affect great joy, and kiss his feet; and then to intimate by degrees, and with humility and circumspection, but finally fixing tears with their entreaties, and reminding him of the day of judgment, the necessity of his declaring his acceptance publicly and in writing. Should he demand of them that they should in the meantime accept Timotheus as bishop of Constantinople, they are to plead, with much deference, that there are two claimants to the see, and that, according to the canons, the case between them should be reserved for judgment after Catholic unity had been restored; and they are here to bring in again the name of Vitalian, reminding the emperor of what he had promised him. In case of the emperor's consenting to issue the required declaration, one of the legates is to see personally to its publication in all the provinces; and they are to inform the pope by letter of the progress of things. They are also charged that, if memorials against any bishops should be presented to them, they are to receive them, but take care to reserve them for the judgment of the apostolic see. (Hormisd. Ep. v. Indiculus. Labb.)

This legation failed, inasmuch as Anastasius, though now professing orthodoxy, demurred to the condition of erasing the name of Acacius from the diptychs. But he continued his overtures. Next year (516) he sent two distinguished laymen to Rome with a letter to Hormisdas, pleading that the question of the name of Acacius might be deferred for the consideration of the projected council. He wrote also to the senate of Rome and to king Theodoric, desiring their good offices. But Hormisdas continued resolute, and the ambassadors returned with letters from the pope and senate, which were such that the emperor dismissed the bishops already assembled at Heraclea for the intended council. In a letter to Avitus of Vienne (A.D. 517) the pope, referring to this embassy, complains of the fruitless and perfidious promises of the Greeks, and especially of laymen instead of ecclesiastics having been sent; and this, he says, "not with the intention of getting out of the mire in which they were immersed, but of obscuring the clearness of the catholic faith with their own darkness." In the same letter he rejoices at the faithfulness of the churches of Gaul, as well as of Thrace, Dardania, and Illyricum, which had stood firm against persecution and the communion of Rome. It appears that forty bishops of Illyricum and Greece had renounced obedience to their metropolitan of Thessalonica, and sent to Hormisdas to seek communion with Rome. (Theophan. Chron.)

The next step was taken by Hormisdas himself, who, building on the emperor's political necessities, sent, in 517, a second embassy to the East, with increased instead of relaxed demands. It consisted of two bishops, Ennodius, before employed, and Peregrinus of Mizenum, who carried letters to the emperor, to the orthodox bishops, monks, and people, and this time to Timotheus the patriarch, who had not been addressed before. They were charged also with a rule of faith (regula fidei) for the signature of all who desired reconciliation with Rome, which was more exacting than any previous document. The signers of it are to declare that, mindful of the text "Thou art Peter," &c. the truth of which has been proved by the immaculate religion ever maintained by the apostolic see, they profess in all things to follow that see, "in which is the entire and true solidity of the Christian religion," and to desire communion with it. Accordingly they accept, not only the decrees of Chalcedon and the "tome" of pope Leo, but also all the letters on religion that he had ever written; and they not only anathematize Nestorius, Eutyches, Dioscorus, Timothy Aelurus, Peter Fullo, and Acacius, with all their followers, but also exclude from their diptychs all who had been "sequestered from Catholic communion," which is explained to mean communion with the apostolic see. This involved the post-mortem excommunication of bishops, however orthodox themselves, who had lived and died during the interruption of communion with Rome, and notably of Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople, who had not only professed the true faith, but had even been deposed and banished for doing so. Such demands ended the negotiations with Anastasius, who peremptorily dismissed the legates, and sent a reply to Hormisdas, dated July 11, A.D. 517, in which he expatiates on the gentle and forgiving spirit of Christ and His religion, by way of contrasting it with that of the pope, and ends thus: "Henceforth we repress our request in silence, deeming it unreasonable to entreat those who contumaciously reject entreaties; we can bear to be injured and set at naught; we will not be commanded." (Hormisd. Epp. post Ep. xxii. Labb.)

Persecutions were now renewed in the East. Severus of Antioch is accused of having caused the monasteries of the orthodox in Syria Secunda to be burnt, and 350 monks to be massacred. The survivors, having applied in vain to the emperor for redress, sent a deputation to the pope, carrying a letter with 169 signatures, in which their woes are detailed. They acknowledge in ample terms the supremacy of "the most holy and blessed patriarch of the whole world," "the successor of the Prince of the Apostles," and "the Head of all," implore him to exercise his power of binding and loosing in defence of the true faith, and anathematize all heretics, Acacius among the rest (Inter Epp. Hormisd. post Ep. xxii. Labb.). To this appeal (which is among the instances of the authority accruing to the Roman see from its being resorted to for support against surrounding oppression) Hormisdas replied in a long letter, addressed to all the orthodox in the East, in which he exhorts them to steadfastness in the faith of Chalcedon, and to patience under present straits. (In Act. V. Concil. Constantin. Labb. vol. v. p. 1111.)

The death of Anastasius (July 9, A.D. 518), and the accession of the orthodox Justin, changed the aspect of affairs. During divine service at Constantinople, while John the Cappadocian (who had lately succeeded Timotheus as patriarch) was officiating with his clergy, the populace, who had been all along on the orthodox side, seem to have made a most unseemly riot in the church in the impatience of their orthodox zeal. Cries of "Long live the emperor!" "Long live Augusta!" "Long live the patriarch!" "Thou art orthodox, whom art thou afraid of?" "Out with Severus the Manichean!" "Out with the Manicheans; dig up their bones!" and the like, interrupted the service for hours. "Manichean" seems to have served as a general term for "heretic." The patriarch made speeches to them from the ambo, begging them to wait for a synod under the emperor's sanction; but they would not brook delay. By continued cries, by closing the doors of the church, and saying they would not leave it till he had done what they wanted, they compelled him to proclaim the acceptance of the four general councils, including Chalcedon, to anathematize Severus of Antioch, and to recite from the diptychs the names of Euphemius and Macedonius (the orthodox successors of Acacius, who had been deposed for their orthodoxy), and also that of pope Leo. After this a synod was held, attended by some forty bishops, which ratified what the patriarch had done, and pronounced the deposition of Severus of Antioch. Letters were sent to various Eastern metropolitans, including those of Jerusalem, Tyre, and Syria Secunda, who forthwith reported to the synod the full acceptance of orthodoxy by their several churches (Concil. Constantinop. Act v.; Labb. vol. v. p. 1131, &c.).

Coercive measures were used by Justin. He issued two edicts, in one of which (not extant, but referred to in the Acts of St. Sabas), he ordered the restoration of the orthodox exiled by Anastasius, and the acknowledgment of the council of Chalcedon in the diptychs of all churches. In the second (referred to in an edict of Justinian against heretics), he declared heretics incapable of all public offices, civil or military. He ordered also the deposition of heretical bishops (Liberat. Breviar. c. 19), and (according to Evagrius, lib. iv. cap. 4) directed Severus of Antioch, who continued to denounce the council of Chalcedon, to be seized and have his tongue cut out. But he escaped to Alexandria, where, with Julianus of Halicarnassus, he was protected by the Eutychian patriarch Timotheus (cf. Theophan. Chron. ad an. Imp. Justin. i.; Procopius, Hist. Arcan. c. 6).

Letters were now sent to Hormisdas from the emperor, from the patriarch John the Cappadocian, from other bishops, and from Justinian, the emperor's nephew, who was eventually his successor. The pope replied at once and cordially, but distinctly told the patriarch that the erasure of the name of Acacius, and the subscription of the rule of faith rejected by Anastasius, must be the first steps to restoration of communion. Next year (519) Hormisdas sent a legation to Constantinople, consisting of two bishops, Germanus and John, a presbyter Blandus, and two deacons, Felix and Dioscorus. These he charged with letters, not only to the emperor and patriarch, but also to the empress Euphemia, and to other persons of distinction, including three influential ladies, Anastasia, Palmatia, and Anicia. They carried with them the libellus which has been described above, to be signed by all who desired reconciliation. They had also private instructions given them of a similar character to those which had been given for the guidance of the legates sent formerly to Anastasius with differences suiting the changed circumstances. They were in these directed to communicate on their road with any bishops who would sign the libellus, but not even to accept hospitality from such as would not—only provision for their journey, if needed. At Constantinople they might receive persons known to be orthodox, and the emperor's emissaries, but no one else, till their interview with him. Admitted to his presence, they were to insist on John the patriarch signing the libellus. Should he and the emperor, while consenting to condemn Acacius, demur to including Euphemius and Macedonius, they were to say they had no authority to alter the terms. In case, however, of continued refusal direct repudiation of the two prelates might be omitted, on condition of their names being at any rate erased from the diptychs. John having been on these terms received into communion, his libellus was to be read, if possible, publicly, or at any rate in the presence of the bishops and archimandrites. The emperor was to be requested to write to all metropolitans, sending them a letter from the patriarch, in which he should tell them what he had done, and exhort them to do the same. Should the emperor refuse to write, John was at least to be required to do so.

The legates kept the pope informed by letter of their progress. On their road they had been received with joy at Aulon, Scampes, and Lychnidus in Macedonia; the libellus had been signed, and communion restored. At Thessalonica Dorotheus, the bishop there, had put them off on the plea that all the bishops under his jurisdiction were not present; but he had promised that if one of the legates would return thither from Constantinople the terms required would be complied with. At Constantinople they had been met by Vitalian, Justinian, and other senators, and conducted into the city amid acclamations; they had been received by the emperor in the presence of the senate, and a deputation of four bishops to represent the patriarch, who was himself absent, but with whom the emperor proposed to the legates that they should confer. But they replied that they had not come to dispute, but to offer terms for acceptance. The libellus was read; the bishops present had nothing to say against it, and the emperor and senators recommended them to accept it. But the patriarch proved unwilling to sign it as it stood. At a second meeting in the palace, at which he was present, he proposed to write a letter of his own instead; and at length, after much contention, it was agreed that he might embody the libellus unaltered in a letter, pre-facing it with his own preamble. This was done, the names of Acacius and his successors in the see, Fravitas, Euphemius, Macedonius, and Timotheus, and those of the emperors Zeno and Anastasius, were erased from the diptychs; the bishops of other cities, and the archimandrites also, who had been previously reluctant, now me to terms; and the legates wrote to the pope expressing wonder and thankfulness that to complete a triumph had been won without edition, tumult, or shedding of blood.

The preamble by which the patriarch sought to save his conscience or his dignity was meant as a protest against the claim of Rome to dictate terms of communion to Constantinople, and an assertion of the co-ordinate authority of his own see. He says in it, "Know therefore, most holy one, that, according to what I have written, agreeing in the truth with thee, I too, loving peace, renounce all the heretics repudiated by thee: for I hold the most holy churches of the older and of the new Rome to be one; I define that see of the apostle Peter and this of the imperial city to be one see." The same view of the unity of the two sees is expressed in the letter which he wrote on the occasion to Hormisdas. And even Justin, in his own letter to the pope, guards against implying that the authority of Constantinople was inferior to that of Rome, saying that "John, the primate of our new Rome, with his clergy, agrees with you," and that "all concur in complying with what is your wish, as well as that of the Constantinopolitan see."

Peace being thus concluded at Constantinople, a deputation was sent to Thessalonica, headed by bishop John, the papal legate, according to the agreement previously made, to receive the submission of the church there. Licinius, nominated by the emperor, was one of the number. Here matters were not so easily arranged. A priest, Aristides, accompanied by two bishops, was appointed by Dorotheus, bishop of Thessalonica, to meet the deputation. He objected to certain parts of the libellus, but was told that it could not be altered. At a second interview an infuriated crowd rushed in, killed two boys attending bishop John, and broke the head of the bishop, who with the rest narrowly escaped alive. An orthodox person, called John, who had entertained the legate, was also attacked and slain. After this Dorotheus tore the libellus in two before the people, and declared that never to the day of his death would he sign it or assent to such as did. He, with Aristides, was accused by the papal legates of having instigated the mob. Hormisdas, on hearing of what had taken place, wrote to the emperor, requiring that Dorotheus should be deposed and a successor appointed, and that both he and Aristides should be sent to Rome for judgment. But he wrote in vain. Dorotheus was summoned to Constantinople to be tried there, sent thence to Heraclea while his cause was being heard, and eventually allowed to return to his see. He and his church were now restored to Catholic communion, and he wrote a respectful letter to the pope (A.D. 520), repudiating all complicity with the violence offered to his legate, stating that, on the contrary, he had risked his own life to protect him, and expressing great regard for the pope personally and for the apostolic see. Hormisdas replied to the effect that he was anxious to believe in his innocence, and in his being the author of the peace now concluded, but expressing dissatisfaction that he "delayed even to follow those whom he ought to have led," and hoping that he would "repel from himself the odium of so great a crime, and in reconciliation to the faith would at length follow the example of those who had returned." From this reply it would appear that Dorotheus himself, though professing orthodoxy and restored by the emperor to the see, had not so far fully complied, if ever he did, with the pope's terms. It may be that he kept his promise that he would never do so, and that Justin connived at his refusal on condition of his writing an apologetic letter, such as he did write, to Rome (Inter Epp. Hormisdas, lxii. lxiii. lxxii. lxxiii.). At Antioch, after the flight of Severus, the emperor wished to make the deacon Dioscorus (one of the pope's legates) his successor. But Hormisdas, desiring to recommend him to the emperor for the see of Alexandria, objected to the appointment (Hormisd. Ep. liv. Labb.). At length, after contentions which lasted nearly three months, one Paul, a presbyter of Constantinople, was nominated by the emperor on the ground of his having for ten years resisted Severus at Antioch, and by his command ordained. The pope's legates, who were present, acquiesced in the appointment, but required in the pope's name that the new patriarch should be ordained at Antioch, and not at Constantinople, by way of protest against any claim of the Constantinopolitan patriarch to jurisdiction in the diocese of Antioch. And this was conceded (Int. Epp. Hormisd. post Ep. lxxv.). Paul obeyed the imperial order with respect to matters of faith, but obtained leave to abdicate within two years, rather than submit to the investigation of charges that were being brought against him on moral grounds (Int. Hormisd. Epp. post Ep. lxxx.). He was succeeded by Euphrasius, of the manner of whose election nothing is known, who at first erased from his diptychs the council of Chalcedon and the name of the pope himself, but was soon brought to penitence and conformity by the fear of consequences, "metu poenitens redditus" (Theophan. ad ann. 513). At Alexandria Timotheus, who had succeeded the younger Dioscorus as patriarch, supported by his people, utterly condemned the council of Chalcedon, alleging that the doctrine of two natures which it had asserted was the very Nestorianism against which his predecessor Cyril had so strongly contended; and Justin was not strong enough to enforce conformity there, nor did Monophysitism ever cease to be the prevailing creed of the Alexandrian church.

Notwithstanding the general triumph of orthodoxy throughout the East, with the exception of Alexandria, the unbending pertinacity of Hormisdas still caused difficulties. It has been seen that the names of the orthodox patriarchs, Euphemius and Macedonius, who had died out of communion with Rome, having been restored to the diptychs at Constantinople on the accession of Justin, had again been erased at the instance of the papal legates. At Antioch, also, this had now been done. Other churches, however, refused to comply with this condition, which was still insisted on by Hormisdas. In the year 520, the emperor, Justinian, and Epiphanius (who had at the beginning of the year succeeded John as patriarch) wrote urgent letters to him on the subject. They alleged that, though the condition was complied with in the imperial city, yet no small part of the Orientals, especially in the provinces of Pontus, Asia, and Oriens, would not be compelled by sword, fire or torments to comply, and they implored the pope not to be more exacting than his predecessors had been. The reference to persecution as unavailing in this case suggests the kind of influences that had been already contributed to conformity. Here, however, Justin would not persecute, not only because he felt it would be of no use, but also, doubtless, because the universal feeling in the East, at Constantinople as well as elsewhere, was in this particular against the pope. But the latter still persisted in his demand, and in his reply to Justin urged him, as a duty, not to shrink from coercion. He reminded him of the text, "He that persevereth to the end shall be saved"; he tells him that wounds inflicted for a remedial purpose are desirable, that the process of healing is often unpleasant to those to whom it is applied, that it is right for those who are not moved by the example of a religious prince to be subdued to his command; and, as to himself, he says that he hears a voice ever murmuring in his ears, "No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." At the same time he sent a letter to the patriarch Epiphanius, deputing to him authority for dealing after his discretion with various cases. (Epp. Hormisd. lxxii. et sqq. Labb.; and Concil. Constant. act v. Labb. vol. v. p. 1119.)

In connexion with the settlement of the Eastern churches a nice question, arising out of the now defined orthodox doctrine of One Person and Two Natures in Christ, came before Hormisdas for settlement. There being but one Personality in the Incarnate Word, and that Divine, it seemed correct to say that this Divine Person suffered; and yet, on the other hand, saying this seemed to attribute passibility to the Godhead. It was undoubted Nestorian heresy to deny that He whom the Blessed Virgin brought forth was God. But He who was brought forth was the same with Him who suffered on the Cross. On the other hand "God was crucified" had been a favourite Monophysite formula, used to emphasize their doctrine of the absorption of the human nature into the divine; and great offence had formerly been given to the orthodox by the addition of "Who wast crucified for us" to the Trisagion by Peter Fullo. The adoption of this addition at Constantinople under Anastasius had caused, as has been related, a popular tumult, and it was probably its abrogation during the reaction under Justin that caused certain Scythian monks to defend the formula, and to maintain that "ONE—of the holy and undivided Trinity (unum ex sancta et individua Trinitate) suffered. The emphatic "one" seems to have been meant to express the unity throughout of Him who was begotten from eternity, who was born, worked, and suffered. This appears more plainly in the law of Justinian which afterwards enunciated the doctrine: "Unius ac ejusdem passionem et miracula, quae sponte pertulit in carne, agnoscetes. Non enim alium Deum Verbum et alium Christum novimus, sed unum et eundem" (Lex Justinian. A.D. 533, Cod. I. i. 6). A deacon Victor, with others, preferred the expression that "One person of the Trinity" (unam personam ex Trinitate) suffered; thus confining the allegation of suffering to one person only, others condemned both expressions. A further fine, and not very intelligible, distinction was introduced by Justinian, who in one of his letters on the subject, supposes it right to say that "One in the Trinity" (unum in), but not that "One of the Trinity" (unum ex) suffered (Int. Hormisd. Epp. post Ep. lxxvi. Labb.). The question was laid before the legates of Hormisdas, when in Constantinople, A.D. 519; and they decided against the Scythian monks. Their position was that the faith had been fully and sufficiently defined at Chalcedon and in the letter of pope Leo, and that the formula of the monks was an unauthorised novelty, likely to lead to serious heresy. The monks contended that its adoption was necessary for rendering the definitions of Chalcedon distinct against Nestorianism. Vitalian seems to have supported them. Justin and Justinian did not know quite what to think, and begged the pope to settle the question. He wrote to desire that the monks should be kept at Constantinople; but they managed to get away to Rome to lay their case before him. At first he declined to entertain the question till his legates should return and give him full information; and he desired Victor, accused by the monks of heresy, to be sent also to Rome. He continued to put them off, keeping them a whole year at Rome without an answer. He wrote, indeed, a long letter to the emperor, defining at length the true faith on the Trinity and Incarnation, but giving no distinct verdict as to the phrase contended for by the monks. (Ep. lxxix. Labb.) At length they left Rome, having publicly proclaimed their views there. After this Hormisdas wrote to Possessor, an African bishop, inveighing strongly against these monks as having troubled him for a whole year with their vexatious subtleties, and elated to such a pitch of pride as to expect the whole world to defer to their novel notions (Ep. lxx. Labb.). To this letter one of the monks, Maxentius, replied in language no less warm. It is hardly credible (he says) that the letter can have been written by him whose name it bears, especially as it contains neither reason nor argument, but is entirely filled with criminations and vain abuse. He complains of the monks having been detained so long at Rome after their long and dangerous journey, and then put off without an answer; of the heretics quoting the letter against them as though the authority of the bishop of Rome forbade the statement that Christ was One of the Trinity; and he adds, "I confidently affirm that if, either by letter or word of mouth, this same Roman bishop should forbid the assertion that Christ the Son of God is One—of the Holy undivided Trinity, the church of God would not agree with him, but utterly and entirely execrate him as heretic." (Joh. Maxent. ad Ep. Hormisd. Resp. Bibl. Patr. Galland, vol. ix. p. 539.) Hormisdas does not seem to have actually condemned the expression of the monks, though he was annoyed by their propounding it, and spoke strongly against it as an unnecessary novelty. In the end, however, their view triumphed. For in the year 533 the emperor Justinian issued the edict already quoted, asserting that "The sufferings and miracles are of one and the same—for we do not acknowledge God the Word to be one and Christ another, but one and the ame:—For the Trinity remained even after the incarnation of the One Word of God, who was of the Trinity; for the Holy Trinity does not admit of the addition of a fourth person. We mathematize Nestorius the man-worshipper, and those who think with him, who deny that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God and our God, Incarnate, made man, and crucified, was one of the holy consubstantial Trinity" (Lex Justinian. Cod. l. i. 6). The contemporary pope John II., in his letter to Justinian, approved of this statement, "which" (he said) "since it agrees with the apostolic doctrine, we confirm by our authority" (Joann. Pap. ii. Epp. in Pat. Lat. lvi. 18 B), and it has since been accounted orthodox to affirm that God suffered in the flesh, though in His assumed human, not in His original divine, nature. (See Pearson on the Creed, Art. IV.)

Hormisdas died early in August, 523, having held the see nine years and eleven days. He, as well as all the popes during the schism with the East, except the too conciliatory Anastasius, has had his firmness acknowledged by canonization, his day in the Roman Calendar being August 6. His extant writings consist of letters, eighty being attributed to him, one of which, to St. Remigius (in which he gives him vicariate jurisdiction over the kingdom of Clovis, which he had converted) is probably spurious, inasmuch as it implies that Clovis was still reigning, though he had died in 511, more than two years before the election of Hormisdas. Most of the remaining seventy-nine letters refer to the affairs of the East, of many of which some account has been given. Several, not hitherto noticed, have reference to the metropolitan see of Nicopolis in Epirus, to which John had been elected A.D. 516, in the place of the deceased Alcison, who had been received into communion with Rome. John also, with his synod, desired the like communion, and the pope's confirmation of his election, which was accorded on condition of the libellus condemning Acacius with other heretics being signed. But Dorotheus of Thessalonica took it amiss that the customary notice of the election had not been sent to himself, and took measures of persecution against John. Hormisdas supported the latter on the ground of the heresy of his superior Dorotheus, and, among other letters on the subject, sent one to the emperor Anastasius, commending John to his protection (Int. Epp. Hormisd. vi., vii., viii., ix., xvii., xviii., xix., xx., xxi., xxii., Labb.).

Three of the letters of Hormisdas (Epp. xxiv., xxv., xxvi., Labb.) are to John bishop of Tarragona, Sallustius bishop of Seville, and the bishops of Spain in general. In these he gives the two prelates vicariate jurisdiction over eastern and western Spain, exhorts against simony and other irregularities, and directs the regular convention of synods.

This pope, as has been abundantly shewn, was a man of great administrative and diplomatic abilities, singularly uncompromising and firm of purpose, and was among the most strenuous and successful assertors of the supremacy of the Roman see. The authorities for his life have been referred to in connexion with its several incidents.

HORMISDATES (Asseman.), HORMISDAS (Theodor.). A martyr under Goronanes or

Verananes, king of Persia, with Suenes and Benjamin, a deacon. He expostulated with the king on his treatment of the Christians, for which action he suffered. (Theodoret, H. E. v. 39; Asseman. Mart. Orient. i. 231.) [G. T. S.]

HORMISDATSCIRUS, prince of the Magi, and a fierce persecutor of the Christians under Sapor II. king of Persia. Simeon Metaph. divides his name and makes two different persons, Masdrath and Seroth. (Asseman. Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 223, 225.) [G. T. S.]

HORMIZAS, bishop of Comana in Cappadocia, about 460; appointed by the archbishop ALPIUS to investigate the charges against Lampetius. (Photius, Cod. 52.) [EUCHITES.] He is probably the Hormisdas who in 457 joined with the bishops of Armenia Secunda in a synodal letter to the emperor Leo. (Mansi, vii. 589; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 450.) [G. S.]

HORMUZD, presbyter and martyr at Seleucia in Persia, under Sapor II. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 432.) [G. T. S.]

HORONTIUS, bishop of Vicenza, one of the ten bishops, who, after a synod of bishops of the district of Venetia, signed a letter to the emperor Maurice, c. 590, justifying their refusal to condemn the Three Chapters (Hefele, § 281; Mansi, x. p. 466). He is also mentioned by Paulus Diaconus (iii. 26) as one of those who held aloof from Severus, patriarch of Aquileia, and others who had condemned the Three Chapters. [A. H. D. A.]

HOROSIUS, "abbas," sent by pope Gregory the Great for the disposition and correction of the affairs of the monasteries of the islands of Monte Christo and Gorgonia. He was also sent, together with Symmachus the defensor, for the selection of a strong and suitable position for a monastery on the coast of Corsica. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 51, 52; Migne, lxxvii. 513, 514.) [A. H. D. A.]

HOROTHETES, in the Valentinian fragment preserved by Epiphanius (Haer. 31, p. 171) one of the five Prunici, who formed the latest birth of spiritual beings there described, and who are called ἰσὶ τῆς Μεσότητος. In the Valentinian system described by Irenaeus (I. ii. 4, p. 10) Horothetes, with most of the accompanying names, all become titles of the same Aeon Horus. [G. S.]

HORRES—March 13. Martyr by fire at the city of Nicaea with Theuseta his mother, Theodora, Nymphodota, Marcus, and Arabia. (Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HORTENSIANUS, African bishop. Syn. 2 Carth. sub Cyp. (Cyp. Ep. 57.) Probably the same as the one at Syn. 5 Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. Haer. i. (Cyp. Ep. 70), and as the bishop of Lares in Numidia (Fell), in Syn. 7 Carth. de Bapt. iii. sub Cyp. No. 21; plainly not the Numidian Lares (Morcelli), but that between Carthage and Circa. [E. W. B.]

HORTENSIUS, bishop of Autentum, in Byzacene, was banished by Huneric A.D. 484. (Vict. Vit. Notit. 58; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 89.) [R. S. G.]

HORTULANUS (1), bishop of Bennefensis in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. He seems to have distinguished himself by his bold opposition of the Arians. (Vict. Vit. Notit. 57; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 101.) [R. S. G.]

HORTULANUS (2), "monachus monasterii Fundensis." Gregory the Great relates his life and miracles in the Dialogues. (Greg. Magn. Dial. lib. i. 3; Migne, lxxvii. 164.)

HORUS (Ἦρος). According to the doctrine of Valentinus, as described by Irenaeus i. 2, p. 10, the youngest Aeon Sophia, in her passion to comprehend the Father of all, runs the danger of being absorbed into his essence, from which she is saved by coming in contact with the limiting power Ἦρος, whose function it is to strengthen all things outside the ineffable Greatness, by confining each to its appointed place. According to this version Horus was a previously existing power; but according to another, and apparently a later account, Horus is an Aeon only generated on this occasion at the request of all the Aeons, who implored the Father to avert a danger that threatened to affect them all. Then (as Hippolytus tells the story, vi. 31) he directs the production of a new pair of Aeons, Christ and the Holy Spirit, who restore order by separating from the Pleroma the unformed offspring of Sophia. After this Horus is produced in order to secure the permanence of the order thus produced. Irenaeus (u. s.) reverses this order, and Horus is produced first, afterwards the other pair. The Valentinian fragment in Epiphanius (Haer. 31, p. 171), which seems to give a more ancient form of this heresy, knows nothing of Horus, but it relates as the last spiritual birth the generation of five beings without consorts, whose names are used in the Irenaeian version as titles for the supernumerary Aeon Horus. But besides, this Aeon has a sixth name, which in the version of Hippolytus is made his primary title Σταυρός; and it is explained (Irenaeus, i. 3, p. 16) that besides his function as a separator, in respect of which he is called Horus, this Aeon does the work of establishing and settling, in respect of which he is called Stauros. A derivation from στυπίζω is hinted at. Yet when we find the story go on to tell of the Aeon Christus being extended upon Stauros, one is led to suspect that the introduction of this name is due to the desire to find in the upper spiritual world a foreshowing of all the work of earthly redemption. Later indeed it was found possible to deny the literal earthly crucifixion of the Saviour by interpreting the texts which speak of it of this scene in the world of Aeons. The distinction just explained as to the different use of the names Horus and Stauros was not carefully observed by Valentinians. Thus the last word is sometimes used when the function of separation and division is spoken of (Excerpt. ex Script. Theodot. 22 and 42, Clem. Alex. ii. pp. 974, 979), it being remarked in the latter passage that the cross separates the faithful from the unbelievers; and Clem. Alex., who occasionally uses Valentinian language in an orthodox sense, speaks in the same way (Paed. iii. 12, p. 303, and Strom. ii. 20, p. 486).

In the Valentinian theory there is a double Horus, or at least a double function discharged by Horus. On the one hand, he discharges as already described, a function within the Pleroma, separating the other Aeons from the ineffable Bythus, and saving them from absorption into his essence. On the other hand, Horus is the outside boundary of the Pleroma itself, giving it permanence and stability by guarding it against the intrusion of any foreign element. When we consider the discordance of the different accounts of Horus (the same work being ascribed to him which is elsewhere ascribed to Christ and the Holy Spirit), and the name Saviour being given to him, and the fact that by no way of counting can he be included in the number of thirty Aeons, there is reason to infer, as already intimated, that this personification of the limiting power was not made till a late stage of the development of Valentinian doctrine.

This name has no connexion with the Egyptian deity Horus. (See Matter, ii. 134.) [G. S.]

HOSEA, presbyter of bishop Abda and martyr with him under Isdgerdes I. (Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. pt. 2, p. lxi.) [C. H.]

HOSIUS (1), (OSIUS), a confessor under Maximian and bishop of Corduba, the capital of the province of Baetica in Spain. He took a leading part on the Catholic side in the controversies of the first half of the fourth century. For nearly fifty years he was the foremost bishop of his time. He was held in universal esteem and enjoyed unbounded influence among his contemporaries. Eusebius says that "he was approved for the sobriety and genuineness of his faith, that he had distinguished himself by the boldness of his religious profession, and that his fame was widely spread." (Vit. Cons. bk. ii. capp. 63, 73.) Socrates calls him "the celebrated Hosius." (Hist. bk. ii. cap. 29.) Sozomen says that "he was honoured for his faith, his virtuous life, and his steadfast confession of truth." (Hist. bk. i. cap. 16.) Athanasius is never weary of repeating his praises. "Of the great Hosius," he says, "who answers to his name, that confessor of a happy old age, it is superfluous for me to speak, for he is not an obscure person, but of all men the most illustrious." (Apol. de Fugâ, sect. 7.)

Considering his great renown and the prominent part that he took in the affairs of his time, it is remarkable how very little is known of his personal history. We are unable to fix precisely either the time or the place of his birth. The early Christian writers speak of him as a native of Spain; but in recent times this has been called in question. Neander (Hist. vol. iii. p. 41. Bohn's translation) is inclined to think that Hosius was the Egyptian bishop from Spain mentioned by Zosimus (ii. 29)—Aegyptius quidam ex Hispania Romam delatus—who became known to Constantine through the ladies of the court, and is said to have taught the emperor remedy for all his sins. But this is a mere conjecture. The whole story, as related by Zosimus, rests only on popular rumour. It is mentioned by Sozomen (Hist. bk. i. cap. 5) but in a somewhat different form; and it is considered by him as "the invention of persons who wished to vilify the Christian religion." There seems no reason, therefore, why we should refuse to accept the testimony of Eusebius Athanasius, and others, that Hosius was a native of Spain. The date of his birth, however, can be ascertained only approximately. We learn from Athanasius (Hist. Arian. § 45) that when Hosius was upwards of a hundred years old, and after he had been more than sixty years a bishop, he was summoned by Constantius from Spain to Sirmium, and detained there a whole year. Such violence was there used to the aged bishop that at last he yielded, and subscribed an Arian formula adopted at the second synod of Sirmium, held about the middle of A.D. 357. Soon afterwards he returned to his native country and died. We cannot be very far wrong, therefore, in placing his birth about A.D. 256, and this is the date assigned to it by Tillemont (Mém. tom. vii. p. 302, 4to ed.).

The next question that arises for consideration is when and where did Hosius become a confessor for the Christian faith. The common view is that he suffered in the Diocletian persecution between A.D. 303 and A.D. 305; but this is more than doubtful. Upon this point, we have his own testimony in his letter to Constantius preserved by Athanasius (Hist. Arian. sect. 44). "I was a confessor at the first," he says, "when a persecution arose in the time of your grandfather Maximian" (ἔγώ μὲν ἀμολόγησα καὶ τὸ πρῶτον, ὅτε διωγμὸς γέγονεν ἐπὶ τῷ πάτρῳ σου Μαξιμιανῷ). But these words hardly convey the idea that he is referring here to the general persecution enjoined by Diocletian. The allusion seems to be to some less known and local persecution of which Maximian was the chief promoter. The Diocletian persecution was instigated by Galerius Maximianus, the Caesar and son-in-law of the emperor; but the Maximian referred to by Hosius was the Augustus and colleague, not the son-in-law of Diocletian. Maximianus Herculius was made Caesar in A.D. 285, and Augustus in A.D. 286, as is shewn by coins and inscriptions (cf. Clinton, Fasti Romani, vol. i. p. 328), and for six years the wide extent of the Roman empire was divided between these two rulers, Diocletian being emperor of the East and Maximian of the West. In A.D. 292, a further partition of the empire took place, and the sovereign authority was again subdivided by the appointment of two Caesars, Constantius and Galerius Maximianus.

Now before we can determine, with any probability, where and when Hosius became a confessor, it is necessary to consider first, what ground there is for believing that the Diocletian persecution extended as far as Spain. Of the four rulers who at this time governed the whole Roman empire, "every one," says Gibbon (Hist. vol. i. p. 426, chap. 13), "was sovereign within his own jurisdiction." In their respective divisions each had full liberty of action. Their mutual independence may be shewn in a very singular way. The division of the empire and of the imperial power made it possible that conflicting decisions of legal questions, and a general uncertainty of law, might arise, and a want was felt to ascertain the existing laws as far as they rested on imperial rescripts. To this we owe the collection called the codex Gregorianus (Tenfel, Rom. Lit. vol. ii. sect. 389). It appears also in another way. After Galerius had prevailed upon Diocletian to adopt a new policy, and to commence a persecution of the Christians, they decided upon this course in their own dominions without waiting to consult their colleagues; but they sent letters to them urging them to do the same. "Etiam litterae ad Maximianum atque Constantium comveverant ut eadem facerent." (Lactant. de Mort. Per. cap. xv.) Maximianus, who ruled over Italy and Africa, readily complied with their wishes, not so Constantius.

He could not place himself in open opposition to his colleagues, but he took care to elude the force of a measure which he was unable to prevent. He caused the churches to be closed, and allowed a few of them to be demolished, but he suffered no injury to fall upon the Christians, with respect either to their lives or to their property (loc. cit. cap. xv.). Eusebius gives similar testimony. "The emperor Constantius," he says, "had no share in the hostility raised against us. He neither demolished the churches, nor did he devise any other mischief against us." (Hist. bk. 8, cap. 13.) And again elsewhere, "Constantius adopted a course of conduct different from that pursued by his colleagues; while they besieged and wasted the churches of God, levelling them to the ground, he kept his hands pure from their abominable impiety, and never in any respect resembled them. They polluted their provinces by the indiscriminate slaughter of holy men and women, but he preserved himself free from the stain of this fearful crime . . . he at the same time originated the profoundest peace throughout his dominions, and secured to his subjects the privilege of celebrating without hindrance the worship of God." (Vit. Const. bk. i. cap. 13.) In the appeal of the Donatists to Constantine, that their case might be heard before judges from Gaul, they say incidentally that his father did not, like the other emperors, persecute the Christians (Patrol. tom. viii. col. 747, ed. Migne), "cujus pater inter caeteros imperatores persecutionem non exereuit."

Now how are we to interpret express statements of this kind made by contemporary writers if any general persecution of the Christians took place under the edicts of Diocletian in any part of the dominions of Constantius?

The martyrologies are full of the names of martyrs who suffered at this time in Africa and Italy, in Egypt, Palestine, and throughout the East, but only two can be assigned to this period with certainty in Gaul, St. Peregrinus, bishop of Auxerre, and St. Jovinian, his reader. (Tillemont, Mém. tom. v. p. 57.) Tillemont remarks that almost all the martyrs who were put to death in Gaul under Diocletian suffered at the beginning of his reign, while Maximianus Herculius was in that country. (Tom. v. p. 3.) He is of opinion also that St. Alban and the others who suffered martyrdom in Britain must have suffered at the latest in A.D. 286 or A.D. 287.

In the able and original essay on the persecution of Diocletian by Mr. A. J. Mason (Cambridge, 1876), a similar view is maintained. He says (p. 48 note) that "it is perhaps worthy of notice that all the martyrdoms before A.D. 303, of which we have any certain knowledge, took place in Maximian's half of the empire. The Passion of St. Maurice refers to Maximian by name."

Some critics have doubted whether Spain was included in the territory of Constantius, and have accounted for the publication of the edicts of Diocletian in that country by supposing that it still remained under the government of Maximian Hercules. But there are many strong reasons against such a supposition.

1. In the division of the provinces which took place under the second triumvirate, B.C. 43, Spain, with Gallia Narbonensis, was assigned to Lepidus. 2. The great western kingdom reigned over by Tetricus from A.D. 267 to A.D. 274, consisted of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. 3. When Constantius was made Caesar in A.D. 292, Maximian's half of the empire was thus subdivided. "Cuncta quae trans Alpes Galliae sunt Constantio commissa; Africa Italiae Herculis." (Aur. Vict. de Caesar. xxxix. 30.) 4. On the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in A.D. 305, the provinces of the empire at first were thus apportioned:—Gaul, with Italy and Africa, was given to Constantius, and the rest of the empire to Galerius. But Constantius, content with the dignity of Augustus, refused to undertake the administration of Italy and Africa. (Eutropius, x. 1.) Orosius also makes a similar statement; but being a Spaniard, he is a little more explicit. Constantius, he says, "Italian, Africam, Hispaniam et Gallias obtinuit. Sed, vir tranquillissimus, Gallia tantum Hispaniaeque contentus, Galerio caeteris partibus cessit." (Hist. bk. vii. cap. 25.) 5. Constantius, says Sozomen (Hist. lib. i. cap. 6) was not willing that Christianity should be accounted unlawful in the countries beyond the confines of Italy, that is to say, in Gaul, in Britain, or in the region of the Pyrenean mountains as far as the western ocean. 6. A list of the Roman provinces in A.D. 297 has been discovered in MS. at Verona and published by Mommsen in the Abhandlungen der Akad. der Wissen. (Berlin, 1862, pp. 489–531). From this it appears that the provinces at that time were substantially the same as they are known to have been somewhat later. 7. In his new organization of the empire, it is almost certain that Constantine followed the lines marked out conventionally by Diocletian. He divided the empire into four prefectures, and the praefectura Galliarum comprised the dioceses of Spain, Gaul, and Britain. (Cf. Not. Dig. ed. Böcking, vol. ii. p. 476.) These various facts leave no room to doubt that in the division of the empire Spain was always an appendage of Gaul, and under the same administration.

If so, it was under the jurisdiction of Constantius, and both Lactantius and Eusebius affirm that he took no part in the persecution of the Christians.

On the other side, it is asserted that in the Diocletian persecution, St. Vincent, the most famous of the martyrs of Spain, was put to death, with eighteen other martyrs, at Caesar-Augusta (Saragossa), and that a multitude of others suffered also in various parts of the country. These are commemorated in the Roman martyrology on April 16 and Nov. 3. But when we examine the evidence alleged in proof of these Spanish martyrdoms, we find that they rest upon nothing more than vague ecclesiastical tradition. They are not mentioned by any contemporary writer. They are first referred to in the poems of Prudentius, and from thence have found their way into the martyrologies of Bede, Usuard, and Ado. One or two Spanish martyrs are mentioned in the Acta Martyrum of Ruinart. Few scholars, however, would regard these documents as sufficiently trustworthy to decide an obscure or doubtful point of history.

The accounts we have of these martyrdoms do not profess to be taken from original documents. They were compiled from secondary sources or from tradition after peace was restored to the church. It often happened that the judges themselves forbade the official report to be entered on the books, partly because they were conscious that their cruelties were distinctly illegal, and feared to leave the full statement indelibly inscribed on the archives of their provinces. (Mason's Essay, p. 141.) This fact is expressly mentioned in the Passio Sancti Vincentii Levitae. (Ruinart, p. 323, Verona ed.) A similar remark is also made by Prudentius. (Peristeph. i.)

"O vetustatis stilentis obsoleta oblivio!
Invidetur ista nobis, fama et ipsa extinguitur:
Chartulas blasphemus olim nam satelles abstulit.
Ne tenacibus libellis erudita secula
Ordinem tempus modumque passionis proditum
Dulcibus linguis per aures posteriorum spargerent."
(Dressel's ed. p. 305.)

The Passio S. Vincentii contains no clear indication as to the date of his martyrdom. In the second chapter of the narrative (ed. Ruinart, p. 323) it is stated, "Daciano cuidam Praesidi gentili et sacrilego a dominis et principibus suis, Diocletiano videlicet et Maximiano, saevienti in Christianos forte occasio cecidisset." This does not read like the description of a persecution authorised by an imperial edict. It is much more like an account of one of those local attacks upon the Christians which occurred at various times in different parts of the Roman empire. Moreover, the mention of the names of only the two Augusti throws a doubt upon the received date of the martyrdom. In the Acta S. Maximiliani, which are generally allowed to be authentic, the date is fixed precisely, and shewn to be in A.D. 295 by the mention of the names of the two consuls, Tuscus and Anulinus. There were then four rulers at the head of the state; and their names are correctly given in the Acts, and in their right order. "In sacro comitatu dominorum nostrorum Diocletiani et Maximiani, Constantii et Maximi, milites Christiani sunt." (Ruinart, p. 264.) A perusal of the documents in Ruinart which relate to this period will shew that in the acts of the martyrs who suffered in the Diocletian persecution mention is almost always made of one or both of the Caesars as well as of the two Augusti; while the persecutions that took place towards the end of the 3rd century, and before A.D. 303, are generally attributed to the sole instigation of Maximianus Hercules. (Cf. the Passiones Agaunensium Martyrum circ. A.D. 286; Ruinart, p. 241; SS. Victoris et Aliorum circ. A.D. 290, p. 255; S. Bonifatii Martyris, p. 249; with those of a later period: Acta S. Maximiliani circ. A.D. 295, p. 263, S. Marcel circ. A.D. 298, p. 265; S. Felicis circ. A.D. 300, p. 313; SS. Saturnini et aliorum circ. A.D. 300, cap. v. p. 340.)

When, therefore, the names of the Caesars are omitted, as is the case in the Passio S. Vincentii

t is an indication that the Acts relate to a period anterior to their appointment.

The evidence on this point furnished by lapidary inscriptions is very scanty, but as far as it goes it leads us to believe that the names of all the four rulers were always mentioned in official documents, and that when only two are recorded, there we have a sign of an earlier date. The celebrated edict of Diocletian, fixing the price of articles of food, discovered by Col. Leake in Asia Minor, appears to have been issued in A.D. 301, and it runs in the name of all four emperors. A remarkable inscription on a marble column, commemorating the appointment of the two Caesars, is still extant in the Museum at Seville (cf. Hübner, Corpus Inscript. vol. ii. No. 439), which, in the opinion of Mommsen, though now imperfect, originally bore the names of the two Augusti as well as of the Caesars. (Coeit. p. 197.) On the other hand, the well-known inscription on a pillar set up to mark the boundary between Pax Julia and Eborac which contains the names of the two Augusti, together with that of Datian, is condemned by Hübner as spurious. (No. 17*, p. 5, appendix.)

The testimony, however, mainly relied upon to prove that the edicts of Diocletian were put in force in Spain as well as in the East is that of Prudentius, a Spanish poet. He was born A.D. 348, became a Christian as he advanced in life, and published some Christian poetry in A.D. 405, about a century after the events alleged to have occurred. As he has himself told us (ubi sup.) that the original records of these Spanish martyrdoms were destroyed, it is evident that we must not look to this author for authentic history. He gives us simply the traditions of his time. The fourth hymn of his Peristephanon, written in honour of the eighteen martyrs who suffered at Caesar-Augusta, does not furnish the slightest clue as to the time when they met with their death. Comparing the number of martyrs who died at Carthage and at Rome with those that were put to death at Caesar-Augusta, the poet says of the Spanish town—

* * * * *
Sola in occursum numerosiores
Martyrum turbas Domino parasti.

* * * * *
Vix parens orbis populosa Poeni
Ipsa vix Roma in sollo locata
Te decus nostrum superare in isto
Munere digna est.”

(Peristeph. Hymn iv. 53-60, p. 343, ed. Dressel.)

On reference to the Roman Martyrology (April 16; Nov. 3) it will be found that the expression in this hymn — “numerosiores” — is adduced to justify the commemoration of an innumerable company of martyrs who suffered at Caesar-Augusta in the Diocletian persecution; and in the notes of Baronius on the different martyrs who are alleged to have been put to death at this period in Spain, Prudentius is his ultimate authority.

Are we then on evidence of this kind—the evidence of a poet who lived a century after the alleged events, and who has put into verse the traditions of his time—to set aside the distinct assertions of contemporary writers like Lactantius and Eusebius, and to hold that the Diocletian persecution extended to Spain? Assuming that Constantius may have so far complied with the wishes of his colleagues as to publish in his western provinces the first edict ordering the demolition of the churches, yet it is quite impossible to believe that the second edict enjoining that the bishops and presbyters should be seized and cast into prison was ever put in force in any part of his dominions (cf. Euseb. Hist. lib. viii. cap. 6, ad fin.). In fact there is no direct mention of its publication anywhere but in the East. (Mason's Essay, p. 173.) We come, therefore, to this conclusion that it could not have been at this period that Hosius became a confessor.

But if not then, the question has still to be solved, when was it that he did suffer? We have it on his own testimony that he had been a confessor in the time of Maximian. The way, however, in which he mentions the fact seems like the way in which an aged man would be likely to allude to the experiences of his early life. It is not probable that Hosius would have said “καὶ τὸ πρῶτον” had he been referring to an event which took place when he was about forty-eight years old. Is it not more probable that he became a confessor in some special and local persecution carried out under the orders of Maximianus Herculeus while he was sole ruler of the West, and before the general persecution authorised by the edicts of Diocletian?

The history of the time will, perhaps, help us to elucidate this question. Maximian was proclaimed Caesar and Augustus on the 1st August, A.D. 286. Immediately afterwards he set out for Gaul to quell a rising of the Bagaudae or peasants, which had broken out in that part of the empire. He made no secret of his intention to turn this into an opportunity for exterminating the Christians. Nor was he long before he began to put his purpose into effect. The martyrologies have preserved the names of many martyrs who suffered in the latter part of the third century in the principal cities of Gaul while he was carrying on this campaign. His chief agents in this cruel work seem to have been Rictius Varus and Datian. The latter was the judge who condemned to death at Agennum in Gaul, circ. A.D. 287, St. Fides and St. Capracius commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on Oct. 6, and in Surlus on Oct. 20. From the acts of these martyrs we learn (vid. Surlus) that Datian was at that time praeses of Aquitania, that he was naturally of a cruel disposition, and that he was a devoted instrument in carrying out the purposes of Maximian. No doubt he is the same Datian who is mentioned by Prudentius (Peristeph. Hymn v. ver. 25) as having been the cruel persecutor of St. Vincent. Considering the proximity of Aquitania to Spain, and the fact that the Aquitani belonged to the Iberian stock, it is very probable that Datian, after he had finished his work of persecution in Gaul, was transferred by Maximian to Spain for the same purpose. The Martyrium S. Domini et sociorum ejus (Surlus, Oct. 9) is one of many instances which prove that wherever Maximian went his hostility against the Christians never slumbered. His coarse and brutal nature, together with the cruel disposition which tradition has assigned to Datian, make it very probable that at this period, between A.D. 286 and A.D. 292, while Maximian was sole ruler of the West, there were many martyrdoms in Spain as well as in Gaul and Italy. At this time Hosius would have been between thirty and thirty-six years of age, and it is far more likely that he suffered persecution and witnessed a good confession than at a later period under the mild rule of Constantius. Beyond Hosius's own statement, we have no contemporary evidence upon the subject. As Spain was the most westerly portion of the world known to the Romans, events that took place there would not be likely to obtain much more than local notoriety. We are unable, therefore, to do more than say that the probabilities are against Hosius having become a confessor in the Diocletian persecution, and in favour of his having done so ten or twelve years earlier.

We are ignorant of the time when Hosius was made bishop of Corduba, whether it was before or after his confession. As the bishops and officers of the church were generally the first to suffer in the outbreaks of persecution, it is more than probable that he was already bishop of Corduba at the time when he became a confessor. The earliest of his public acts with which we are acquainted is his presence at the synod of Elvira; but the date of this synod, like that of other events in his history, is involved in much obscurity. On examining the decrees of the council, it appears to have been held at a time when the church was at rest and in prosperous circumstances. From the second and the fifty-sixth canons we learn that some flames and magistrates had become Christians. Canon 21 suspends from communion for a time any one who neglected to attend church on three successive Sundays. Canon 35 prohibits women from watching by night in the cemeteries, on account of the abuses connected therewith; the 36th enjoins that no pictures should be introduced into churches, and prohibits all mural representations of the objects of worship. Other regulations of the council relate to questions of ecclesiastical discipline, many of them prescribing the punishment due to certain carnal sins. Now is it conceivable that just after sanguinary edicts had been issued against the Christians, ordering the demolition of their churches, and forbidding them to hold meetings for worship under pain of death, a number of bishops and presbyters from various parts of Spain would be likely to meet together and draw up such canons as these without the slightest local or personal references to the violent persecution which had been and was still raging in other parts of the empire? From the Acta Martyrum Saturnini Dativi et aliorum (Ruinar, p. 338) we see that these martyrs were put to death merely for holding meetings; because "collectae factae sunt, contra praecepta Imperatorum." On comparing this fact with the 21st canon of the synod of Elvira visiting with punishment those who kept away from church for three Sundays following, we see how impossible it is to adopt the common view that the synod was held in A.D. 305, a few months after the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian. What we know of the state of the church at the end of the 3rd century answers very well to the state of things disclosed in the canons of the synod.

For upwards of forty years the church had enjoyed, with brief interruptions, a state of peace and repose. "The number of Christians had gone on increasing in every rank of society. With the increased wealth of its members, the outward form of the buildings used for worship underwent a change; and in large cities, in the place of the old simple places of assembly, splendid churches began to be erected." (Neander, Hist. vol. i. 197. Bohn's translation.) At such a time there was great danger of the over-adornment of churches, and prohibitions against mural decorations would have been in due season. Mendoza, who has written more fully upon this synod than any other author, is of opinion that its date should be placed in A.D. 300 or A.D. 301. A few years before the Diocletian persecution appears, from the internal evidence, to be the most probable date of the synod.

Nineteen bishops from different parts of Spain were present at the council. It may therefore be regarded as a national synod, representing the whole church of Spain. The president was Felix of Acci (Gnadox) in Baetica, as being probably the oldest bishop present. The name of Hosius comes next. The import of this must not be overlooked. As a general rule, the order of signatures to the acts of councils indicates also the order of precedence among the bishops. They held rank either according to the date of their consecration or the importance of the episcopal see which they filled. (Hefele, Hist. of Councils, vol. i. 64, English translation.) As Hosius at this time was probably not over forty-five years old, his high position at the synod could not have been due to his age, but must have been obtained in right of his see. We infer, therefore, that at this period Corduba held the first place among the cities of Spain.

It is very difficult, at the present day, to form a true conception of Corduba in its ancient grandeur. During the first and the beginning of the 2nd century of our era, Spain had reached a very high development in the social system of Rome. Roman influence was so completely infused into Baetica that the natives had forgotten their own language. Roman schools were opened in the coloniae and municipia, the most brilliant of which were at Corduba and Osca. For nearly two centuries Spain produced men remarkable in all kinds of culture. Lucan and the two Senecas were born at Corduba, and its schools thus had the honour of furnishing rivals even to Virgil and Cicero. In the time of Hosius this intellectual activity had considerably declined, and the pre-eminence in literary culture had passed over to the province of Africa. But although Corduba was no longer in the foremost rank in intellectual power, it must still have retained a high place in the social development of the time. A man called to fill such an important see would most probably be one of some personal distinction. To what causes Hosius may have owed his elevation to the bishopric we are entirely ignorant. But considering the great influence he afterwards exercised over the mind of Constantine, and over his own contemporaries, there can be no doubt that he must have possessed very striking personal qualities.

From the rank held by Hosius at the synod of Elvira, it is probable that great deference would is shewn there to his opinions, and that these would, to a large extent, be reflected in the decrees of the synod. Baronius (ad an. 57) attaches little importance to this synod, which he suspects of Novatian tendencies. The very first canon furnishes striking evidence of the fact. It decrees that those adults who have sacrificed to idols have committed a capital crime and can never again, even to the end of their lives, be received into communion. Now the denial of pardon to those who had sinned in times of persecution was the chief error of Novatian. He wrote, says Socrates (Hist. bk. iv. cap. 28), "to all the churches, assisting that they should not admit to the sacred mysteries those who had sacrificed." The discipline of the Novatians was in other respects also very rigid, especially with reference to carnal sins; and it is remarkable how many of the canons of Elvira relate to such offences. The stern and austere spirit in which they were dealt with shews how deeply the fathers at Elvira had felt the influence of Novatian principles. Though we cannot trace the hand of the bishop of Corduba in the composition of these canons, yet it is fair to assume that as he was a leading member of the synod, its decrees would be in harmony with his own convictions.

For twelve or thirteen years after this synod, nothing is known of the life of Hosius. At the end of this period, he seems to have been brought into close personal relations with the emperor Constantine, and thenceforward his acts form a part of the history of his time. It would be interesting to know in what way the acquaintance was first formed between the bishop of Corduba and the emperor, and how Hosius acquired the great influence over the mind of Constantine, which it is believed that he exercised up to the period of the Nicene council. But history is absolutely silent upon this point. There is not a single passage in any ancient writer which relates the origin of their connexion. All we can do, therefore, is to form our own conjectures upon this point from a few scattered notices in the history of the time.

On the death of Constantius at York in A.D. 306, Galerius reluctantly ratified the choice of the British army, and gave to the son of his deceased colleague the sovereignty of the three Western provinces beyond the Alps. One of the earliest acts of Constantine was "to visit all the provinces which had previously been under his father's government." (Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. i. cap. xxv.)

A few years later, in A.D. 312, the well-known vision of the cross appeared to him when within a few miles from Rome in the course of his campaign against Maxentius. He then, says Eusebius (loc. cit. c. 32), sent for those "who were acquainted with the divine mysteries and doctrines, and inquired the meaning of the sign;" and they availed themselves of the opportunity to give him instruction in the fundamental truths of Christianity. So deep an impression was produced upon his mind by their teaching and by the heavenly vision that "he made the priests of God his counsellors" (loc. cit.). Now by combining these facts we think there is very little doubt that it was during his government of the Western provinces that Constantine first became acquainted with Hosius. At this period, the bishop of Corduba was the greatest bishop of his time, and his high repute among the Christians could not be unknown to Constantine. To him, therefore, the emperor would naturally turn in a season of difficulty, and when he required instruction in the principles of the Christian faith. If this conjecture be correct, it is probable that Hosius was the chief instrument in his conversion; and if so, this fact would fully explain the ascendancy which for many years afterwards he exercised over the mind of the emperor. It is generally said that after this period Hosius became the emperor's chief adviser in ecclesiastical matters. In A.D. 313 we find him at the imperial court discharging some official duties. An epistle is extant in Eusebius (Hist. bk. x. cap. 6) addressed by Constantine about the beginning of A.D. 313 to Caecilianus, bishop of Carthage, in which the emperor makes a grant of three thousand folles to the ministers of the Catholic church in the provinces of Africa, Numidia, and Mauritania. And he says, "After you have obtained the money you are to order it to be distributed according to the brief addressed to thee from Hosius" (κατὰ τὸ βραβεῖον τὸ πρὸς σὲ παρὰ Ὁσίου).

The absence of Hosius from the synod of Arles, held on the 1st August, A.D. 314, is somewhat remarkable. This was the most numerously attended council that had up to that time been held in Christendom. Bishops from Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain were assembled there as representatives of the whole Western church. Considering the prominent position that Hosius at this time occupied in the church, it is somewhat singular that he was not present at the synod. Constantine was also absent, being engaged in his first war with Licinius in Pannonia. It is very possible that Hosius may have been in attendance upon the emperor, as we learn from Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. ii. cap. 4) that in this campaign Constantine took with him "the priests of God," in order to have the benefit of their prayers and "to have them constantly about his person, as most trusty guardians of the soul."

Traces exist of the presence of Hosius at the imperial court in A.D. 316. The Donatists having been condemned at the synod of Arles, appealed from the council to the emperor, as if the question at issue had been a civil one. Constantine, yielding to their importunities, at length consented to hear their cause himself (cf. August. Ep. 88, 43). He summoned Caecilianus, the Catholic bishop of Carthage, with his Donatist adversaries, to appear before him at Rome, where he was staying, in August 315 A.D. (Hefele, vol. i. p. 198). It was not, however, till fifteen months afterwards (November A.D. 316) that the contending parties actually appeared before Constantine at Milan, when the Donatists were for the third time condemned—by the synods of Rome and of Arles, and lastly by the emperor himself. To weaken the effect of this sentence, they spread abroad a report, as we learn from Augustine (Contra Epist. Parmen. lib. i. cap. 8, vol. ix. p. 43, ed. Migne), that it was by the advice of Hosius, a friend of Caecilianus, that they had been condemned.

In the relations between Christianity and paganism there is ground for thinking that the position of Hosius at this time must have been somewhat of a representative one on the Christian side; otherwise it is difficult to understand why the emperor should have addressed to him a law declaring free such slaves as were emancipated in the presence of the bishops or clergy (A.D. 321. Codex Theodos. lib. iv. tit. 7, col. 379, Hänel's ed.) By the end of A.D. 323 Constantine had become sole master of the whole Roman empire in the east and west, and he then threw the whole weight of his countenance on the Christian side. He found the province of Africa distracted by controversies, among which the Arian question was the most sharply contested one. On his return to Nicomedia, Constantine, being desirous that there should be religious concord as well as civil peace throughout his dominions, took measures for its re-establishment. To this end, says Socrates (Hist. bk. i. cap. 7), "he sent a letter to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and to Arius, by a trustworthy person named Hosius, who was bishop of Corduba in Spain, whom the emperor greatly loved, and held in the highest estimation," urging them not to contend about matters of small importance (Euseb. Vit. Const. bk. ii. cap. 63). It is evident, therefore, that Constantine was not at first aware of the fundamental questions at issue in the Arian controversy. Neither the exhortations of the emperor, however, nor the authority of his envoy, had any effect (Socrates, Hist. bk. i. cap. 8). That Hosius, a bishop of the Western church, and speaking only Latin, should have been selected for this mission is a striking proof of the high opinion entertained of him by the emperor. He would have seemed a very unsuitable person to send to a city in the East in which Greek civilization had reached its highest development. It is remarkable, likewise, that the mission with which he was entrusted gave him precedence as an imperial commissioner over the bishop of Alexandria, whose see ranked next to that of Rome.

It is not very clear what he did while he was at Alexandria. The accounts we have of his proceedings are very imperfect and confused. He appears to have devoted himself with great earnestness to refuting the dogmas of Sabellius (Socrates, Eccles. Hist. bk. iii. cap. 7), who, as is well known, maintained that the appellations Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are only so many different manifestations and names of one and the same Divine Being. But as to the steps he took with reference to Arius, history is silent. We know, however, that he failed to extinguish the flame which the Arians had lighted. "In every city of Egypt bishops were engaged in obstinate conflict with bishops and people against people (Euseb. Vit. Const. bk. iii. cap. 4). Some were so transported beyond the bounds of reason as to insult the statues of the emperor."

Hosius, finding it impossible to terminate these controversies, had to return to Constantine with the acknowledgment that his mission had failed. The emperor thereupon resolved to convoke an oecumenical council, and to invite the attendance of bishops from all quarters. It is generally believed that he took this step under the advice of Hosius (Sulpit. Sever. Hist. ii. 55. "Nicaena synodus auctore illo (Hosio) confecta habebatur").

The council was held at Nicaea in A.D. 325. The part that Hosius took there has been the subject of much controversy. (1) Was he the president of the council, and if so (2) did he preside as legate of the pope? These are the questions that have been most warmly disputed. If he did not actually preside over the council there is no doubt that he was among the very first of the bishops present. Unfortunately no complete account of the acts of the synod has come down to us, if such ever existed. The only means, therefore, that we have of becoming acquainted with the proceedings of the council is to compare together the accounts of contemporary writers who were present, and then to draw our own conclusions (Neander, Hist. vol. iv. p. 18, Bohn's translation). Among these the most important witnesses are Eusebius of Caesarea and Athanasius. Next to them are the ancient church historians, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Rufinus. Neander is of opinion (loc. cit.) that Athanasius, who accompanied his bishop in the capacity of deacon, was not in such a good position for obtaining an accurate knowledge of the intrigues which influenced the course of the council as the bishop Eusebius, who stood in such close connexion with the court. For this reason he thinks that the account of Eusebius is more likely to be correct than that given by Athanasius. On the other hand, Montfaucon, the Benedictine editor of the works of Athanasius, says, "that he is far superior to any other historian of the period both from his bearing for the most part a personal testimony to the facts he relates and also from his great accuracy and use of actual documents." The History of the Council of Nicaea (ap. Mansi, vol. ii. p. 759) which bears the name of Gelasius of Cyzicus, and was written in Greek about A.D. 476, is little more than a compilation from earlier historians. It is full of mythical stories, and is of very little authority. Where it differs from more ancient writers its statements are either doubtful or manifestly false.

(1) Roman Catholic writers, such as Baronius, Nat. Alexander, Fleury, Alzog and Hefele, maintain that Hosius was president of the council, but that he owed his position to the fact that he was the legate of the pope. In proof of this they refer to Gelasius (lib. i. cap. 5), who says: "Ipse etiam Osius ex Hispanis, nominis et famae celebritate insignis, qui Silvestri Episcopi maxime Romae locum obtinebat . . . in consessu illo adfuit"—ἐπέχων καὶ τὸν τόπον, Mansi, ii. 806 D.

There is a little ambiguity in these words. A man may occupy a place which rightly belongs to another, but it does not follow that he is his representative because he sits in his seat. Nat. Alexander, however, is very positive on this point. "There is no reason," he says (vol. vii. p. 390), "why Hosius should have presided over this council unless he had done so in the name of the pope of Rome. His own renown would not have been a solid reason why the bishop of a church of no great importance in Spain, and subject to the metropolitan of Hispalis, should have presided over an oecumenical council held in the East, and should have taken precedence over the legates of the apostolic see the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, and over Caecilianus the primate of the whole Africa church, unless he had filled the place and exercised the powers of the supreme Pontiff especially as in Spain, at the synod of Elvira, where only nineteen bishops were assembled, he took only the second place." Hefele (History of Councils, vol. i. p. 39) calls attention to the order adopted by Socrates (bk. i. cap. 13) in giving the names of the principal members of the council: Hosius, bishop of Corduba; Vitus and Vincentius, presbyters of Rome; Alexander, bishop of Alexandria; Eustathius, bishop of Antioch; Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem. "We see," says Hefele, "that he follows the order of rank. He would therefore never have placed the Spanish bishop Hosius before the great patriarchs of the East, if he had not been the representative of the pope." But this assumption has no historical foundation. Eusebius says (Vit. Const. bk. 3, cap. 7), "The prelate of the imperial city was prevented from attending by extreme old age, but his presbyters were present and supplied his place." A similar statement is made by Sozomen (Hist. bk. i. cap. 17). "Julius, bishop of Rome, was unable to attend on account of extreme old age, but his place was supplied by Vito and Vincentius, presbyters of his church." At this epoch, although the bishop of Rome held the first place among all his brethren partly on account of his being the bishop of the principal city in the world, yet his ecclesiastical jurisdiction does not appear to have extended beyond the churches of the ten provinces of Italy, called in the versio prisca of the 6th Nicene canon "suburbicaria loca." The churches of the East were mainly under the jurisdiction of the metropolitans of Alexandria or Antioch, and these great bishops would not brook the slightest interference of their Western brethren in their ecclesiastical affairs. Moreover, the great strength of Christianity at that time lay in the East. The West was still imperfectly Christianized. It is difficult, therefore, to understand how any competent scholar could ever have maintained that Hosius presided at the council of Nicaea—an Eastern synod—as legate of the pope.

(2) But when we inquire how it was that the usual order of precedence was departed from on this occasion, we are a little at a loss for a satisfactory answer. Du Pin (Nouv. Bib. tom. ii. part 2, p. 315) is of opinion that Hosius presided at the council because he was already acquainted with the question at issue, and because he was highly esteemed by the emperor. Schröckh holds in substance the same view (Kirchengeschichte, Thl. v. s. 336.) He says that Hosius obtained his distinguished position on account of his great influence with the emperor. And this seems the most probable explanation that the matter admits of. It would be difficult to understand how the bishop of an unimportant see in Spain came to take precedence over the great patriarchs of the East if he had not been appointed by the emperor to fill the chief place in the synod. Hosius, at this time, was at the height of his reputation, and enjoying the fullest confidence of his imperial master. He was himself, says Dean Stanley (Eastern Church, Lect. 3), "as the world-renowned Spaniard, an object of deeper interest to Christendom than any bishop of Rome could at that time have been." The power of the popes of Rome at this epoch was not sufficiently consolidated for their claim to preside at councils to have been admitted. Eleven years before this time, at the great council of the West held at Arles in A.D. 314, the emperor appointed Marinus, bishop of Arles, to preside over the assembly, while pope Silvester was represented there as at Nicaea, by two presbyters and two deacons. (Cf. Hefele, History of Councils, vol. i. p. 181.) No one questions that the council of Nicaea was convoked by the emperor Constantine; and there is good reason to believe that Hosius held the foremost place in this great synod by his appointment.

As already stated, Hosius is believed to have been the emperor's adviser in ecclesiastical matters. The part that Constantine took in the proceedings of the council of Nicaea shews that he must have received some instruction beforehand in the questions at issue from an orthodox teacher. He was himself at this time only a catechumen. It is very unlikely, therefore, that he would have been able to give such a philosophical explanation of the term Homousion, as he appears to have done; from the letter addressed by Eusebius to the Christians at Caesarea, and preserved by Socrates (Hist. bk. i. cap. 8). Again, the emperor's letter to the churches respecting the council of Nicaea (Euseb. Vit. Const. bk. 3, c. 17-20) bears in some parts unmistakable traces of the hand of a theologian in its composition. We cannot, therefore, be very far wrong in thinking that at this period the mind of Constantine was very much under the secret influence of Hosius. Dean Milman (Hist. of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 364, crown 8vo. edition), referring to the letter of Constantine to Arius and Alexander, says that it was, "in its spirit, a model of temper and conciliation. It is probable that the hand of Hosius is to be traced in its composition. His influence was uniformly exercised in this manner. Wherever the edicts of the government were mild, conciliating, and humane, we find the bishop of Corduba."

The history of the events that followed immediately after the council of Nicaea is involved in much obscurity. At the conclusion of the council, Hosius seems to have returned to Corduba. For nearly twenty years afterwards he lived in retirement in his own diocese. Not a trace remains of his return to the court of Constantine. As far as we know, the convocation of the council of Nicaea was the last step that the emperor took at his suggestion. Up to this time Hosius appears to have enjoyed the fullest confidence of his imperial master; but they parted at Nicaea, and it does not appear that they ever met again. We must look to the history of the time for some explanation of the causes that brought about these altered relations.

On leaving Asia Minor, Constantine set out for Rome, which he reached by slow stages about July A.D. 326. His brief stay in the imperial city was marked by deeds of cruelty. In the midst of the Vicennalia, the people of Rome heard with regret that Crispus, his son, had been banished for an unknown crime to Pola in Istria, and soon the news came that he had been put to death, some said by the sword, others by poison. Not long afterwards a second execution followed. The young Licinianus, his nephew, a boy of twelve years of age, was killed, at the suggestion, it is said, of the empress Fausta. At no distant date retribution overtook Fausta herself on account of this crime, and she is said to have been suffocated in the steam of a hot bath. These domestic tragedies were followed by a great number of public executions. The true causes of these events are involved in mystery, but after their occurrence, Constantine is said to have become a prey to remorse. There can be no doubt that a great change took place in his character after he became sole master of the Roman empire. He was spoiled by prosperity. "Insolentia rerum secundarum aliquantum Constantinum ex illa favorabili animi docilitate mutavit," says Eutropius (lib. x. cap. 4). In the beginning of his reign he was "optimis principibus," but towards its end "mediis or vix mediis comparandus" (Eutrop. x. 6). He became arrogant and impatient of counsel, distrustful and suspicious. And the moral deterioration of his character was accompanied with great vacillation in his religious opinions. At the end of a few years after the council of Nicaea, the emperor had fallen under Arian influences. A most important change had taken place in the relations between the two parties. Arius was recalled; and at the instigation of Eusebius of Nicomedia and his adherents, a false charge was brought against Athanasius, who was condemned and banished to Gaul (A.D. 335). Not long before his death, in A.D. 337, Constantine received baptism at the hands of Eusebius of Nicomedia, an Arian bishop. From this fact, Hieronymus infers that he had adopted the views of the Arians. Whether this was the case or not is somewhat uncertain. There is no room, however, to doubt that a few years before his death the Arians had acquired great influence over his mind.

This change in the character and the opinions of Constantine was no doubt the true cause of the altered relations between himself and Hosius. As the influence of the Arians over his mind increased, that of his old counsellor would of necessity decline. There is no doubt that the absence of Hosius from the court owed its origin to the will of the emperor. The decrees of more than one council prohibited bishops from going thither unless they were summoned or invited. At the synod of Sardica in A.D. 347, we find Hosius himself proposing a canon to this effect. "Ne episcopi ad comitatum accedant nisi forte hi qui religiosi imperatoris litteris vel invitati vel evocati fuerint." (Cf. Bruns, vol. i. p. 95, Latin text.)

History is altogether silent concerning Hosius for the next twenty years. He does not appear to have been present at any of the synods held between the synods of Nicaea (A.D. 325) and of Sardica (A.D. 347), nor to have taken any public part in the controversies between Athanasius and the Arians during that long period. In A.D. 345, the emperor Constans summoned Athanasius to Milan from Rome, and there informed him that he had been urged by certain bishops (believed to have been pope Julius, Hosius and Maximinus of Treves) (cf. Hilar. Frag. 2, p. 16) to use his influence with his brother Constantius, that a council might be called to settle the questions concerning him. The place of meeting was to be Sardica, a town in upper Moesia, situated within the dominions of Constantius, but on the borders of the two divisions of the empire. While Athanasius was in Milan, he was directed by Constans to go to Gaul to meet Hosius there and travel with him to Sardica. (Athanas. Apol. ad Const. cap. 4.)

At this time Hosius was nearly ninety years old. For him to undertake so long a journey as that from the south-western extremity of Spain to the confines of Illyricum implies that he was still in the enjoyment of considerable vigour of body, and that age had made no change in his convictions nor impaired his zeal. Nor had his long retirement in any degree lessened his influence, or diminished the unbounded respect which had for so many years been felt for him by his contemporaries. In the encyclical letter of the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, to be found in Athanasius (Apol. contr. Arian. cap. 44), Hosius is spoken of as "one who on account of his age, his confession, and the many labours he had undergone, is worthy of all reverence." Whatever doubt there may be as to his presidency over the council of Nicaea, there can be none in this case. It is affirmed in express terms by Athanasius (Hist. Arian. cap. 16). "The great Hosius," he says, "was president of the council." The acts shew that he was the life and soul of the synod, proposing most of the canons, and taking the foremost part in the proceedings.

With regard to this synod it will be sufficient here to mention that the principal object for which it was convoked was to remove the dissensions between the Western and Eastern bishops, which had sprung up in connexion with Athanasius and his friends. The points at issue had occasioned much contention and bitterness, and the synod afforded a great opportunity for Hosius to display his wisdom and conciliatory spirit. The Eastern bishops, however, of whom Eusebius of Nicomedia was the leader, refused to attend the council, although repeatedly invited to do so. Hosius made a special effort to conciliate the Eusebian party, which he thus refers to in a letter to Constantius (Athanas. Hist. Arian. cap. 44). "On my own account," he says, "I challenged the enemies of Athanasius, when they came to the church where I generally was, to declare what they had against him. This I did once and again, requesting them if they were unwilling to appear before the whole council, yet to appear before me alone." The Eusebians, however, rejected all the overtures made to them. They refused to take any part in the synod of Sardica, and held a so-called synod of their own at Philippopolis in Thrace. From this place they addressed an encyclical letter to the churches, condemning Hosius, with Julius, bishop of Rome, and others, chiefly for holding communion with Athanasius. Hosius, they said, besides this offence had always been a persecutor of a certain Marcus, of blessed memory, a strenuous defender of evil men, and a companion of wicked and abandoned persons in the East (Hilar. Frag. iii. vol. ii. col. 674, ed. Migne). Such was his character, as drawn by his opponents, while at the very same time his friends at the council of Sardica pronounced him to be "a man worthy of all reverence."

For the next seven years we hear nothing of Hosius. A letter is extant written to him by pope Liberius, about the beginning of A.D. 354, which shews the great respect in which he was at that time held. The pope writes to him, full of grief, because Vincentius of Capua, one of his legates at a synod consisting chiefly of the Eusebian party, held at Arles in A.D. 353, had consented under constraint to give up communion with Athanasius. He had placed great confidence in this legate, Liberius says to Hosius, because "judex in eadem causa cum Sanctitate tua frequenter resedisit" (Hilar. Frag. vi. tom. ii. col. 688, ed. Migne).

We now approach the closing scenes in the long career of Hosius. During a lifetime of almost unexampled duration he had preserved an unblemished name, and had been a consistent and uncompromising supporter of the Nicene faith. At length, when he was a hundred years old, he gave way for a brief moment to the violence of his persecutors, and consented under torture to hold communion with Valens and Ursacius (Athanas. Hist. Arian. 45). We shall consider presently what the concession wrung from him actually amounted to, as it has been much magnified and misrepresented.

In A.D. 355 a synod was convoked by Constantius, at Milan, which deserved, says Tillemont (Mém. tom. vi. p. 362), the name of a robber synod even more than that of the false council of Ephesus. It was at this synod that the Eusebians first openly declared themselves in favour of the dogmas of Arius, and endeavoured to secure their acceptance by the church. The emperor called upon the orthodox bishops to join in the condemnation of Athanasius. Whoever refused to do so was to expect banishment. Overcome by his threats, most of them gave way, and consented to condemn Athanasius, and to hold communion with the Arians (Rufinus, lib. i. cap. 20). The few who stood firm were banished, bound with chains, to distant provinces:—Dionysius, exarch of Milan, was sent to Cappadocia, or Armenia; Lucifer to Syria; Eusebius of Vercellae into Palestine (cf. Athanas. Apol. Const. 27). In the following year, Liberius, bishop of Rome, was summoned to Milan, where Constantius was residing, and allowed three days to choose between signing the condemnation of Athanasius and going into exile. He took the latter alternative, and went into banishment at Beroea, in Thrace. From the very first, however, the object of the Arians had been to gain over the great Hosius to their side. "As long as he escaped their wicked machinations they thought they had accomplished nothing. We have done everything, they said to Constantius. We have banished the bishop of the Romans, and before him a very great number of other bishops, and have filled every place with alarm. But these strong measures are as nothing, nor is our success at all more secure so long as Hosius remains. Begin then to persecute him also, and spare him not, ancient as he is. Our heresy knows not to honour the hoary hairs of the aged." (Athanas. Hist. Arian. § 42.) At their solicitation the emperor had previously summoned Hosius to Milan, circ. A.D. 355. On his arrival he urged him to subscribe against Athanasius, and hold communion with the Arians. But the old man, full of grief that such a proposal should have been even uttered to him, would not for one moment listen to it. After severely rebuking the emperor, and endeavouring to convince him of his error, he withdrew from the court, and returned to his own church and country. Constantius wrote to him frequently, sometimes flattering, sometimes threatening him. "Be persuaded," he said, "and subscribe against Athanasius, for whoever subscribes against him, thereby embraces with us the Arian cause." Hosius, however, remained fearless and unmoved, and wrote a spirited answer to Constantius, which has been preserved by Athanasius, and is the only composition of his which has come down to us. (Hist. Arian. § 44.)

The emperor, however, did not desist, but continued to threaten him severely, with the view of either bringing him over by force, or of banishing him if he refused to comply, for, says Socrates (Hist. bk. ii. chap. xxxi.), if this could be effected, the Arians considered it would give great authority to their opinions. Finding that he could not persuade Hosius to subscribe, Constantius sent for him to Sirmium, and instead of banishing him he detained him there a whole year. "Unmindful," says Athanasius (loc. cit.), "of his father's love for Hosius, without reverence for his great age, for he was then a hundred years old, this patron of impiety and emperor of heresy used such violence towards the old man that at last, broken down by suffering, he was brought, though with reluctance, to hold communion with Valens and Ursacius, but he would not subscribe against Athanasius (A.D. 357). He says, elsewhere (Apol. pro Fug. § 7), that Hosius yielded for a time to the Arians, as being old and infirm in body, and after repeated blows had been inflicted upon him above measure, and conspiracies formed against his kinsfolk."

Socrates gives similar testimony (loc. cit.). He says "that Hosius was most unwillingly obliged to be present at the synod; and when he refused to concur with them, stripes and tortures were inflicted on the old man until they had constrained him to acquiesce in and subscribe their exposition of the faith." (Cf. Dr. Newman, The Arians, chap. iv. sect. 3.)

It is very difficult to determine which of the confessions of faith drawn up at Sirmium was actually signed by Hosius. Whether there was only one synod of Sirmium or two or three, at intervals of a few years apart, is a question upon which learned men have differed widely. The predominant opinion is expressed by Valesius in a note to Socrates. (Hist. lib. ii. c. 30.) He says that there were three synods of Sirmium, each of which issued a different creed. The first was in A.D. 351, at which Photinus was deposed; this published a confession in Greek. The second in A.D. 357, at which Hosius was compelled to be present, and his subscription obtained by force to a creed written in Latin called by Hilarus "blasphemia apud Sirmium per Osium et Potamium conscripta." (Opp. ed. Migne, tom. ii. col. 487.) The third Sirmian creed, otherwise called the "Dated Creed," from its naming the consuls, was agreed upon at a convention of bishops held at that place in May A.D. 359. This was the creed afterwards produced by Ursacius and Valens at the synod of Ariminum. (Cf. Athanas. de Synod. 48.) No doubt could have arisen as to the formula actually signed by Hosius had it not been that Socrates (Hist. bk. ii. c. 30) says that three creeds were drawn up at the same synod of Sirmium as that which deposed Photinus, in A.D. 351—one in Greek and the other two in Latin—neither of which agreed together. But this is clearly an error. Sozomen relates (Hist. bk. iv. c. 12) that “Hosius had certainly, with the view of arresting the contention excited by Valens, Ursacius, and Germinius, consented, though by compulsion, with some other bishops at Sirmium to refrain from the use of the terms Homoousion and Homoiousion, because such terms do not occur in the Holy Scriptures and are beyond the understanding of men.” Now these very expressions occur in the creed set forth at Sirmium in Latin, and afterwards translated into Greek, which may be found in Socrates. (Hist. bk. ii. ch. 30.) The phraseology corresponds so exactly with the description given by Sozomen, that there is no room to doubt that this was the confession actually signed by Hosius.

As a further proof that Socrates is in error as to the date of the creed subscribed by Hosius, it may be mentioned that among the number of Oriental bishops said to have been present with him at this synod was George of Alexandria. It was not, however, till the early part of A.D. 356 that Athanasius was, for the third time, driven from his see, and his place filled by George, previously of Cappadocia. Other considerations also shew that it is not likely that Hosius was present at any synod of Sirmium against his will in A.D. 351. It was in A.D. 350 that Constans, the emperor of the West, met with his death at Helena, a castrum at the foot of the Pyrenees. Immediately afterwards the authority of the usurper Magnentius was acknowledged through the whole extent of the two great prefectures of Gaul and Italy. (Gibbon, Hist. vol. ii. p. 280.) And it was not till this rebellion was finally crushed in A.D. 353 that the divided provinces of the empire were again united under the sole rule of Constantius. It could not, therefore, have been till after this period that Hosius came under his power. The letter of Liberius to Hosius already referred to, which was written at the beginning of A.D. 354, is an additional proof that up to that time the bishop of Corduba was regarded as one of the pillars of the Catholic party.

It may be doubted, says Dean Stanley (Eastern Ch. Lect. vii. c. 3), “whether in his own age the authority of Hosius in the theological world was not even higher than that of Athanasius.” It was to be expected therefore that the Arians would make the most of the concession wrung from him. As they were constantly slandering Athanasius, they would not be likely to have many scruples about calumniating Hosius. It is related by Epiphanius (Haer. 73) about twenty years after this period that the Arians thought they could condemn the teaching of the church as to the Homoousion by producing letters which they had fraudulently procured from the venerable bishop Hosius, in which it was stated that the substance was dissimilar. Another reference to this subject is made by Sozomen. He tells us (bk. iv. cap. 12) that Eudoxius, bishop of Antioch, circ. A.D. 358, ventured to uphold the heresy of Aetius, that the Son is dissimilar to the Father, and to reject the terms Homoousion and Homoiousion. When he received the letter of Hosius he spread a report that Liberius had also made the same admission (ch. xv.). These letters were most probably spurious. There is reason also to believe that the creed actually signed by Hosius was interpolated and sent into the East in his name. This may perhaps explain the expression of Hilarius (contr. Constantium, cap. 23, col. 580, ed. Migne, vol. ii.) when he speaks of “deliramenta Osii et incrementa Ursacii et Valentis.” (Cf. Newman’s notes to Athanasius Eng. trans. vol. i. p. 162.)

Exaggerated reports of the fall of Hosius were spread by the Arians far and wide. His perversion was used as one of their strongest arguments against the Catholic party in Gaul. To this a contemporary writer, Phoebadius, bishop of Agennum, replies (Lib. contra Arian. c. 23, Patrol. ed. Migne, vol. 20, col. 30): “Novit enim mundus quae in hanc tenuerit aetatem qua constantia apud Sardicam et in Nicaeno tractatu assensus sit et damnaverit Arianos. . . . Si nonaginta fere annis male credidit, post nonaginta illum recte sentire non credam.” The Donatists also, whose views Hosius had opposed as strongly as those of the Arians, did not fail to calumniate their old adversary. After his death they circulated reports against his memory, asserting that he was condemned for some crime by the bishops of Spain. For this, they said, he was afterwards absolved by the bishops of Gaul, and then received again into communion by the Spanish bishops. Augustine notices this charge, and vindicates his memory. “Flagitandum est,” he says, “ut probent.” (Lib. contra Parmen. lib. i. cap. 4, sec. 7, ed. Migne, vol. ix. col. 38.) Marcellus and Faustinus, two presbyters who were followers of Lucifer of Cagliari, relate (Libellum ad Theodos. circ. A.D. 383 or A.D. 384) that on the return of Hosius to Spain, Gregory, bishop of Elvira, refused to hold communion with him; and as Hosius was in the act of pronouncing his deposition he was struck dumb and fell from his seat. But the story does not seem entitled to any credit. The harsh intolerance of the Luciferians, says Dean Stanley (Eastern Ch. Lect. iv. p. 173), was so great “that, rather than receive a single bishop tainted with Arianism, they would have excommunicated the whole Christian world.” It is very possible however that the first part of the story may have had some foundation, as a letter is extant (Hilar. Frag. xii. tom. ii. col. 713, ed. Migne) from Eusebius of Vercellae to Gregory of Spain, written about A.D. 360, in which he congratulates him on having, as becomes a bishop and a minister of God, withstood the transgressor Hosius.

Among the ancient writers, no one has referred to the lapse of Hosius with so much bitterness as Hilarius of Poitiers. This is the more remarkable as he had never so much as heard of the Nicene Creed until he went into exile. (Hilar. de Sym. cap. 91, ad finem, vol. ii. col. 545, ed. Migne.) Hilarius, however, was a master of invective. Of his style, Hieronymus says, “Gallicano cothurno attollitur.” The intense indignation that he displays when making mention of Hosius is only equalled by the vehement manner in which somewhat later he rails against Constantius. (Cf. Contra Const. tom. ii. col. 578, ed. Migne.) He charges Hosius in conjunction with Potamius, bishop of Lisbon, with having rawn up the second creed of Sirmium, which he designates in one place (Opp. ed. Migne, tom. ii. col. 487) as the "blasphemia," in another (Opp. tom. ii. col. 599) as "deliramenta Osii;" and he says that his fall was due to his having been "inimicum sepulcri sui amantem" (tom. ii. col. 39, ed. Migne): that is, to his having been too anxious to get away from Sirmium and die in his own country. He also says that God had allowed him to live on to extreme old age that men might know his true character. "Idcirco est reservatus ne iudicio humano ignoraretur qualis ante vixisset." (Opp. tom. ii. col. 523.) As these hard sayings occur in Hilarius's treatise De Synodis, it is worth while to inquire when this was written, and what opportunities he had of ascertaining the truth in these matters. Hilarius was sent into exile to Phrygia, in the heart of Asia Minor, about the middle of A.D. 356. Here he remained a little over three years. During this period he wrote his treatise De Synodis, probably in A.D. 358, a year after the second synod of Sirmium, at which Hosius was forced to be present. He himself tells us (De Synod. cap. 63, tom. ii. col. 433) that the majority of those with whom he was living had no true acquaintance with God—in other words that they held Arian opinions. "Ex majori parte Asiæ decem provinciarum intra quas consisto, vere Deum nesciunt." Whatever tidings came to him from the world would therefore reach him through Arian channels. His means of information in that remote district are not for one moment to be compared with the opportunities enjoyed by Athanasius for ascertaining the truth. Hilarius, moreover, is the only ancient writer who says that Hosius had any hand in the composition of the creed published by the second council of Sirmium. He evidently gave too much credence to his Arian informants, who would be sure to exaggerate the extent of the countenance to their heresy given by the famous bishop of Corduba. The great improbability of Hilarius's assertion appears in this way. We learn from Marcellinus and Faustinus (loc. cit.) and from Phœbadius (loc. cit.) that Potamius, the reputed author with Hosius of this confession, at one time gave his adherence to the Nicene faith, but for the sake of a piece of land, which he earnestly coveted, he was induced by Constantius to abandon the orthodox party. Hosius made known his perversion to the bishops of Spain, and treated him as a heretic. In revenge, it is said that it was at his instigation that Hosius was summoned to Sirmium. Potamius is joined by Phœbadius, with Ursacius and Valens, as an ardent propagator of Arian opinions, and as the author of a letter on this question which was circulated in the East and West, and to which the name of Hosius may perhaps have been surreptitiously attached. How very improbable it seems after the relations that had formerly existed between the two men, for one all his life long a consistent supporter of the Nicene Creed, the other a renegade—that they should have combined together to produce a heretical confession of faith. Moreover, it seems to be forgotten that at this time the bishop of Corduba was about a hundred years old. At such an age men do not willingly invent new creeds; they are far more likely to cling tenaciously to old ones.

Sulpicius Severus shews in his history, written about A.D. 404 or A.D. 405, that he was acquainted with the writings of Hilarius. He had heard of the lapse of Hosius, but he speaks of it as resting on a popular rumour which seemed to him quite incredible unless extreme old age had enfeebled his powers and made him childish. "Osium quoque ab Hispania in eandem perfidiam concessisse opinio fuit: quod eo mirum atque incredibile videbatur quia omni fere ætatis suæ tempore constantissimus nostrarum partium et Nicaena Synodus auctore illo confecta habebatur; nisi fatescentis ævo (etenim major centenarius fuit ut sanctus Hilarius in epistolis refert) deliraverit." (Hist. Sac. lib. 2.)

It was not to be expected that a bishop who had taken a leading part for half a century in the bitterest controversies of that troubled time should escape detraction and calumny from his enemies; but false accusations against him were hardly to be expected from "the house of his friends." To clear his memory from the charges of Hilarius it is sufficient to point out that the synod of Sardica, A.D. 347, spoke of Hosius as a man of a "happy old age, who, on account of his age, his confession, and the many labours he has undergone, is worthy of all reverence." So public a testimony as this to his high character is enough to silence all detraction. And it may be further remarked that the affectionate and reverential language in which the great Athanasius describes the passing frailty of his venerable friend, the father of the bishops, is very different from the furious and intemperate tone in which it is referred to by Hilarius. "This true Hosius, and his blameless life," says Athanasius, "were known to all." As he relates the violence used towards him, he can find words only of the tenderest commiseration for his friend. But against Constantius, his persecutor, his indignation knows no bounds. "When the great Hosius, the father of the bishops, suffered these things, who could fail to perceive, says Athanasius, that the charges against myself also and the rest, were false and altogether mere calumny?" (Athanas. Hist. Arian. 46.)

There is a little doubt whether Hosius succumbed to the violence used against him at Sirmium, and died there in A.D. 357, or whether, after subscribing the Arian formula drawn up in that city, he was permitted to return home and end his days in Spain. This question involves the further one—whether before his death he recanted his error, and was readmitted into the Catholic church, or whether he retained his Arian opinions to the last. The authority of his name was so great that it was to be expected that this point would be vehemently contested. The story told by the Luciferians, quoted above, and the charges brought against his memory by his old enemies the Donatists, serve at least to shew that, according to ecclesiastical tradition, he died in Spain. The question is fully examined by Baronius (sub an. 357, capp. xxx.—xxxvii.), who does not believe the story told by the Luciferians. Which, he asks, is entitled to most credit, the great Athanasius or the apostate Marcellinus? The story of the latter is not confirmed by any contemporary writer. Had it been true, it must have been known to Athanasius. He says distinctly that Hosius yielded to the outrages of the Arians "for a time, as being old and infirm in body" (Apol. pro Fug. sect. 5), and that "at the approach of death, as it were by his last testament, he bore witness to the force which had been used towards him, and abjured the Arian heresy and gave strict charge that no one should receive it" (Athanas. Hist. Arian. 45). These words clearly imply that his lapse was but a temporary one, that he died in communion with the church, and in the midst of his friends, and not surrounded by his cruel persecutors. Hilarius, who was no lover of Hosius, says, as we have seen above, that his fall was owing to his anxiety to leave Sirmium and be buried in his own country—"nimum sepulcri sui amantem." Do not these words imply that he gained his object, and that he returned to Spain? The very charges brought against his memory by the Donatists show that before his death he had been readmitted into communion by the Spanish bishops. On these various grounds, therefore, we infer that after Hosius had subscribed the creed of the second synod of Sirmium (A.D. 357), he obtained permission to return to his own country, and that he died there. The date of his death is a little uncertain, but from Marcellinus we learn that it was soon after his return to Spain, and before the concession he had made to the Arians had become widely known. As the treatise of Athanasius (Hist. Arian.) in which it is referred to was written between A.D. 358 and 360, it must have taken place before that period. Some writers are of opinion that he died towards the end of A.D. 357; others maintain that he lived till A.D. 359. No materials, however, exist for fixing the precise date of his death.

At the time of his death, Hosius was upwards of a hundred years old (Sulpic. Sev. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 55), and had been more than sixty years a bishop (Hist. Arian. 45). His profound acquaintance with Christian doctrine was combined with a singularly blameless and holy life. He seems to have possessed great tact and judgment, together with a conciliatory disposition. No bishop of his time exercised so much influence over his contemporaries, or was held in such high esteem, and yet it is remarkable how very little is known of the way in which he acquired or maintained his ascendancy. To the last he appears to have retained great vigour of body and freshness of intellect. In extreme old age, his earnestness and zeal in defence of the Nicene faith were as conspicuous as in earlier years. The shadow cast upon his name by the concession extorted from him by the Arians must not be allowed to obscure the rightful honour due to him for his labours and sufferings on behalf of the Catholic faith during a lifetime of almost unprecedented duration. "Even Christianity," says Dean Milman (History of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 427, ed. 1875), "has no power over that mental imbecility which accompanies the decay of physical strength, and this act of feebleness ought not for an instant to be set against the unblemished virtue of a whole life."

Of his writings nothing remains but the letter to Constantius transcribed by Athanasius (Hist. Arian. 44). Isidorus of Seville (570-640) says that he wrote a letter to his sister (De Laude Virginitatis), in beautiful and eloquent language (De Script. Eccles. lib. i.). It is said that he also composed an explanation of the sacerdotal vestments of the Jewish high-priest, which he seems to have interpreted in a mystical sense.

Authorities.—The life of Hosius is nowhere related with any fulness by any ancient writer. It has to be drawn up from incidental notices in many different authors. In the course of the foregoing article, most of the places in which his name occurs in any contemporary or ancient writer have been referred to. The general history of the time may be studied in the works mentioned at the commencement of the article. CONSTANTINUS I. Vogt, Histor. Litteraria Const. Mag. Hamburg, 1720, may be consulted with advantage. For the reign of Constantine Burckhardt and Keim are the two principal authors, though somewhat rationalistic. A very full account of the life of Hosius, and a discussion of various points in his history, will be found in Gams (Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, Band ii. pp. 1-309, Regensburg, 1864). [T. D. C. M.]

HOSIUS (2), bishop of Lacedaemon, subscribed the synodal letter of the province of Hellas to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. There is no earlier bishop of this see known. (Mansi, vii. 612; Le Quien Oriens Christ. ii. 189.) [L. D.]

HOSPITALIS, bishop of Valencia toward the end of the 7th century. He was represented by his deacon, Asturius, at the twelfth council of Toledo (681), and was probably dead in the following year. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270 Esp. Sagr. viii. 172.) [M. A. W.]

HOSPITIUS, ST., a recluse in the neighbourhood of Nice in Provence. The authority of his life is Gregory of Tours, who places him in the reign of Childebert, and only a little earlier than his own time. His cell resembled a prison and his bare limbs were fettered with voluntary chains, in penance for many sins he confessed to have committed. To his visitors he predicted the irruption of the Lombards into Italy; the bulk of his story is occupied with details of alleged miraculous cures. Papebroch, who comments on Gregory's narrative, which is transferred to the Acta Sanctorum, places the abode of Hospitius on the long narrow peninsula which forms the eastern boundary of the bay at the head of which stands the town of Villefranche near Nice. Papebroch mentions some remains of monastic buildings on the spot, and the maps still shew the name of St. Sospir (probably a misprint of Sospit) still clinging to the peninsula. This saint died about 580, and was commemorated on May 21. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. vi.; Glor. Confess. cap. 97; Boll. Acta S. Mai. v. 40.) [C. H.]

HOSPITO, "dux Barbaricorum," in the island of Sardinia. He is praised by Gregory the Great because he is a Christian, while his people are heathen worshipping stocks and stones. He is urged to give all possible help to Cyriacus and the bishop Felix, whom Gregory has sent to convert them. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iv. indict. xii. 23; Migne, lxxvii. 692.) [FELIX (146).] [A. H. D. A.]

HOTIFREDUS. [HOOTFRIDUS.]

HOWEL, HOWELUS, brother of Gildas. (Rowlands, Mon. Ant. Rest. 180; Colgan, Acta SS. 177, c. 4.) [J. G.]

HOWYN, Welsh saint. [HYWYN.]

HOYLDIS (HOILDIS, OTHILDIS, HOU, HOILDE, HOULDE), ST., according to a legendary life published by the Bollandists and by them attributed from internal evidence to the 14th century, was one of seven daughters of Signarus, a count of Parta or Perta, near Chalon-sur-Saône; St. Lintrudis, St. Ama, St. Manehildis, and St. Pusinna were her sisters. The date of the sisters is assigned to the 5th century, but the Bollandists suggest that Hoyldis is identical with a St. Hilda, the disciple of St. Helena the mother of Constantine. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 773.) [S. A. B.]

HROTHWARI, HROTWARA, a Mercian abbess, daughter of Bugga, and grand-daughter of Dunna, the abbess of a monastery at Withington, in the diocese of Worcester. Dunna left her monastery to Hrothwari, under the guardianship of her mother, who when she came of age refused to surrender it. Archbishop Nothelm, in 736 or thereabout, examined in the case in a synod, and compelled the mother to give up the monastery. Hrothwari in 774 surrendered her rights to bishop Milred of Worcester, who bestowed the monastery on the abbess Ethelburga, daughter of Alfred of Hwiccia, for her life. (Kemble, C. D. 82, 124.) An abbess of this name is commemorated in the Liber Vitae of Durham, p. 3. [S.]

HUA BECCE, Irish abbat. [HUI BECCE.]

HUAETBERT (HUAETBERTUS, HWAETBYRHT), abbat of Jarrow and Wearmouth, A.D. 716.—At the close of his Life of Ceolfrid, Bede gives some valuable notices of his successor. Huaetbert was elected abbat on Whitsunday, A.D. 716, by a joint vote of the inmates of the twin monasteries assembled at Wearmouth. His qualifications for the office were considerable. He had been brought up at Jarrow from his childhood, and was a thoroughly trained and experienced person. In addition to what he had learned there, he had acquired at Rome in the time of pope Sergius I. (A.D. 687-701) all the information he could gain. He had also been in priest's orders for twelve years, so that he was in the prime of his life and activity. When the election at Wearmouth took place, Ceolfrid, although on his way to Rome, had not yet left England, and Huaetbert's first act was to go after him with a few friends to catch him, if he could, before he set sail. He came up with him at a monastery belonging to Aelberht, at a place called Cornu Vallis, and gave him some presents for Gregory II. (A.D. 714-731), and a commendatory letter for himself, in which he spoke of him in most eulogistic terms. The two abbats met at Cornu Vallis for the last time, and the elder gave his younger brother his blessing, with the best advice he could offer for his guidance. They parted, and when Ceolfrid's companions returned from Rome they brought back with them to Huaetbert a complimentary reply from the pope.

When Huaetbert went back to Jarrow he received the customary benediction from bishop Acca. Bede informs us that he was remarkable for the energy with which he maintained the rights and dignity of his houses. He records, unfortunately, only one point in which Huaetbert's zeal was manifested, and wherein he seems to have greatly pleased the historian. He took up the bones of abbat Easterwini, which were lying in the porch as you entered the church of Wearmouth, together with those of Sigfrid, his old master, and depositing them in a coffin with a separation in the middle, placed them in the interior of the building near the remains of Benedict Biscop himself. This was done on August 23, the anniversary of Sigfrid's birth, and the same day was the last of a venerable inmate of the house of the name of Witmer, whose body was interred in the place which had just been left empty.

The sole authorities for this account of Huaetbert are the anonymous biographer of the abbats of Jarrow (Bede, Opp. Hist. Minora, 318-334), and Bede's work (chiefly borrowed from this) on the same subject (ed. Smith, 293-302). Bede dedicated to Huaetbert his treatise De Temporibus. [J. R.]

HUAIL (HUEIL, HUIL), son of Caw, was first a warrior under king Arthur, and called in the Welsh Triads one of the three first leaders of battle, with Trystan and Cei (Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, ii. 460). As afterwards devoted to religion, and a member of the college of St. Cattwg, he is classed among the Welsh saints, and a church in Euas, Herefordshire, was dedicated to him (Rees, Welsh Saints, 232). But according to others, his character was not saintly, and he was beheaded by king Arthur on the Maen Huail in Ruthin, Denbighshire (Mye. Arch. ii. 69; E. Williams, Iolo MSS. 503, 515, 653; Lady Ch. Guest, Mabinog. ii. 260, 335; Jones, Welsh Bards, ii. 22; R. Williams, Emin. Welshm. 224.) [J. G.]

HUBERTUS (1), fifth bishop of Sez, between Hillus and Litaredus, A.D. 500. (Gall. Christ. xi. 675.) [S. A. B.]

HUBERTUS (2) (HUCBERTUS, HUGBERTUS, HUMBERTUS), ST., 31st bishop of Maestricht succeeding St. Lambert, and first of Liège, whither he transferred the see. Few figures have undergone a greater transformation at the hands of legend-writers than St. Hubert. All that is authoritative concerning him is to be found in a life written by an anonymous disciple, probably within twenty years of his death. But the definite information conveyed is small, the account being unusually overlaid, even for that age, with disquisitions, reflections, and miracle-stories. It was first published by Surius (Nov. 3, tom. vi. 50 sqq.), afterwards by Joannes Roberti with notes (see his Hist. S. Huberti, p. 20, sqq. Luxembourg, 1721). It ends with an account of the first translation of the saint's remains, which took place in 745, sixteen years after his death, and was probably the occasion of the work. (Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 74-5.)

After the martyrdom of St. Lambert, Hubert was elected to fill his place (A.D. 708), and won universal love by his blameless life. In the twelfth year of his episcopate he was warned in a vision to translate the bones of St. Lambert from Maestricht, where he had been buried, to the place of his martyrdom, Liège. This he accomplished in the following year with solemnities attended by bishops, priests, and people. This removal of St. Lambert's remains was equivalent to a transfer of the see to Liège, which takes its first start as a place of importance from that event. (See Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 560, and the authorities there referred to.) St. Hubert did not confine himself to Liège, but preached in the Ardennes, Toxandria (a country extending from near Tongres to the conflux of the Vahal and the Rhine, Gibbon, c. xix. n.), and Brabant, and broke in pieces the idols which still existed in those parts. His last illness seized him on a journey he had undertaken to Brabant to consecrate a newly-built church, and he died at Fura, between Brussels and Louvain (A.D. 727). His body was carried back to Liège, where it was buried in the church of St. Peter. His son Florebert, who succeeded him in the see, was present.

The St. Hubert of this meagre account has assumed very different proportions in later legends. A son of Bertrand Duke of Aquitaine, and grandson of Charibert king of Toulouse, strenuous in study and in arms, he held the post of Count of the Palace under Theoderic, and at an early age was married to Floribana the mother of Florebert. His conversion became the future patron saint of the chase. One holy day, whilst others were going to church, Hubert started forth to hunt. As he rode there appeared in the path a stag with a supernatural cross between its horns, and at the same time he heard a voice saying, "Unless thou turnest to the Lord and leadest a holy life, thou shalt quickly go down into hell." Leaping from his horse he fell down and worshipped, and henceforth led a new life. Leaving the part of France where the tyranny of Ebroin was now supreme (i.e. Neustria) he betook himself to duke Pippin in Austrasia, accompanied by St. Oda, the widow of his father's brother Boggis, another duke of Aquitaine (cf. the Vita S. Odae, Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 10, 139), or, according to another version, his own wife. From the court of Pippin he visited St. Lambert at Maestricht, by whose counsel he made a pilgrimage to Rome. Here the pope, St. Sergius (who however had been dead seven years), saw in a vision the martyrdom of St. Lambert, and was bidden to consecrate Hubert as his successor. St. Peter himself gave the new bishop a key which, besides the power of binding and loosing, had the virtue of healing lunacy (an allusion to the saint's posthumous renown for the cure of hydrophobia). Seated on the episcopal throne he confronted Pippin, whose creatures, according to the legend, had slain St. Lambert. (Conversio S. Huberti, Roberti, ib. p. 5 sqq.; Fétis, Légende de S. Hubert, Bruxelles, 1846; Rettberg, ib.)

In the 16th year after his death St. Hubert's remains were solemnly elevated, Carloman and his nobles taking part in the ceremony (Surius, ib. c. 19, 20, p. 59). After this they were undisturbed till the year 825, shortly before which Walcandus bishop of Liège had rebuilt and endowed the monastery of Andain (Andaginum) in the Ardennes. On Sept. 30, 825, the bones were solemnly transferred to Andain, which henceforth bore the name of St. Hubert, (Surius, ib. c. 21-24, pp. 60-2; Roberti, ib. 64-71; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. iv. 1, 295-7, Paris, 1668-1701. For the monastery of Andaginum or S. Huberti, see Gall. Christ. iii. 966 sqq.)

The legendary St. Hubert was a popular figure throughout the middle ages, especially in his character of patron of the chase and healer of hydrophobia. Several military orders and archer companies took their name from him, and he has formed the subject of many literary compositions, especially of a devotional and non-critical order. For works that treat of him, see Chapeville, Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, i. 129-144; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. tom. iv.; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Nov. 3, tom. vii. 494 sqq.; Abregé Curieux de l'Histoire de Liège, Liège, 1673; Cantiques en l'Honneur de St. Hubert, Tournay; Prioux, St. Hubert, Apôtre des Ardennes, Patron des Chasseurs, Paris, 1853; Des Granges, Bibliothèque des Chasseurs, Vie de St. Hubert, Moulins; Kneip, St. Hubertus-Büchlein, Luxemburg, 1874. [S. A. B.]

HUBERTUS (3) (GERBERTUS), twenty-ninth bishop of Soissons, succeeding Gerobold, or Gobaldus, and followed by Madalbertus, a little after the middle of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 339.) [S. A. B.]

HUBERTUS (4), bishop of Coutances, succeeding Angulo, and followed by Willardus, said to have been sitting in A.D. 798. (Gall. Christ. xi. 866.) [S. A. B.]

HUCBERTUS (HUBERTUS), ST., a monk at Bretigny (Bretiniacum), on the Oise, in the diocese of Soissons, in the early years of the 8th century. In the Martyrologium of Usuard under May 30, occur the words, "ipso die sancti Hucberti episcopi et confessoris" (Migne, Patr. Lat. ccxv. 101). Hucbert, however, never was a bishop, and this mistake has betrayed many later martyrologists into a confusion between him and Hubert [HUBERTUS (2)] of Maestricht and Liège (ibid. 103-4; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vii. 277). There seems to be no trustworthy information about him, but the Bollandists publish life, the basis of which they think may be as old as the 10th century, though it has been added to by a monk named Piso in the 14th or 16th century. According to it St. Hucbert was born at Bretigny, of noble parents named Peter and Joanna, who were also rich and pious. At twelve he ran from home to the monastery church, where the subdeacon was reading the prophets. Asking that the words might be explained to him, he was instructed by the abbot in some of the doctrines of religion. Much taken with the exposition, he asked to be admitted to the monastery, and, nothing daunted by his instructor's account of the hardships of the monastic life, he formally submitted himself to the rule of St. Benedict, in the reign of Hildebert king of France (apparently Childbert III. A.D. 695-711). His parents were greatly disturbed at hearing that he had become a monk, but at length consented. Henceforth, St. Hucbert devoted himself more zealously to sacred studies and austerities, and at the age of twenty was ordained a priest. He died on May 30, in the reign of Dagobert (apparently Dagobert III. A.D. 711-715), after spending ten years and three months as a monk. He was buried at Bretigny. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vii. 271 sqq.; cf. Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. iii. i. 720-1, Paris, 1668-1701. For the monastery of Bretigny see the Gallia Christiana, ix. 390.) [S. A. B.]

HUEAMINANAIG, the Wise, abbat of Clonmacnois, is in Ann. Ult. A.D. 767. (O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. iv. 101, cf. Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 366, n. 8, 367.) [J. G.]

HUEIL, Welsh saint. [HUAİL.]

HUEL, Welsh saint. [HYWEL.]

HUETLAC (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 87, charter of Ethelbald king of Mercia, A.D. 742), bishop; probably Heatholac bishop of Elmham. [C. H.]

HUGBERT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 1023, charter of Kenulf king of Mercia, A.D. 801), bishop; probably Higbert of Lichfield [C. H.]

HUGBERT, bishop. [HUBERTUS (2).]

HUGH. [HUGO.]

HUGHIERIUS (HILDERICUS, HULDERICUS), bishop of Coutances, succeeding Waldamarus, and followed by Frodomundus, thought by Mabilon to be the bishop Hughierius who subscribed the charter of Emmo archbishop of Sens, for the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif, in A.D. 658 or 659. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1175; Gall. Christ. xi. 866.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (1) PEREGRINUS, ST., confessor, commemorated July 7 at Nanvigné, in the diocese of Auxerre. The Bollandists publish a short life of him, translated into Latin from the French, which they regard as a 15th century embodiment of popular traditions. It is of course worthless historically. According to it, he was born at a place called Morondia in the diocese of Autun, of poor but pious parents. On attaining manhood he was moved to relinquish the world and issue forth from his home barefooted and destitute. Coming to Buxiacum, a village near Varzy, in the diocese of Auxerre, he threw himself down under a tree exhausted with thirst. A blind woman, who compassionated him, recovered her sight. Escaping secretly from the admiration of her neighbours, he came to Nanvigné, about two leagues from Varzy, where there was a chapel dedicated to St. Simeon Stylites. The place and its tutelage pleased him, and he took up his abode there. The remainder of his life was spent in imitating the austerities of his patron. He died July 6, and, according to conjecture, towards the close of the 5th century. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 447, vii. 864.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (2) I., 19th bishop of Geneva, succeeding Rusticus, or Patricius, and followed by Andreas Graecus, early in the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 382.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (3) I., thirteenth bishop of Alby, between St. Amaranthus and Joannes, said in the chronicle of the bishops of Alby to have been sitting in A.D. 722, at which time the Saracens took possession of the city. Le Cointe believes he survived till 725, when Alby was restored to the Franks. (Gall. Christ. i. 7; Le Cointe, Ann. Eocl. Franc. 722, lviii., 725, xxiv.; tom. iv. 681, 732.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (4), ST., 37th bishop of Paris, between Bernecharius and Merseidus; 25th of Rouen, between Radilandus or Rolandus and Ratbertus; and 15th of Bayeux, between St. Framboldus and Leodeningus. In addition to these dignities, which he held at the same time, he was abbat of Fontenelle and Jumèges (Gemeticense), and in earlier life precentor of Metz. He was the son of Drogo duke of Burgundy and Champagne, and consequently grandson of Pippin of Heristal, and nephew of Charles Martel. To this last relationship he owed this accumulation of offices, which he could only hold in disregard of the canons. If we may believe the chronicler of Fontenelle, his numerous dignities served only to furnish extended opportunities for well-doing. He was, at any rate, the most liberal of all the abbats of Fontenelle in his gifts to that foundation. The year 722 is given for his elevation to the greater portion of his dignities, though the precentorship and archbishopric of Rouen were held by him before that date. He died at Jumèges, in A.D. 730, on April 8, though he is commemorated on the following day. He was buried in the church of St. Mary, at Jumèges, but in the 9th century his remains were translated to the priory of Hasprum, a dependency of that monastery in the diocese of Cambrai. (Chronicon Fontanellense, viii. in the Spicilegium, ii. 270, Paris, 1723; and Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae, Scriptores, ii. 280; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. i. 844; Gall. Christ. vii. 28, xi. 17, 351.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (5) I., eighteenth bishop of Séez, between St. Chrodegandus or Godegrandus, and Benedictus, in the latter half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xi. 677.) [S. A. B.]

HUGO (6), legendary patron of the abbey of Tewkesbury, who is said to have buried Brittrich king of Mercia in the chapel of St. Faith at Tewkesbury, and to have been buried there himself in 812. (Mon. Angl. ii. 60.) The story is an impudent fabrication; and the Hugh in question, if the name belong to any real person, must have been either earl Hugh of Chester or Hugh of Montgomery, earl of Shrewsbury, at the end of the 11th century. [S.]

HUGON, abbat. [HAGONA.]

HUI BECCE (HUA BECCE), abbat of Fobhar now Fore, co. Westmeath, died A.D. 769 (Ann. Ult.) or 765 (Four Mast. A.D. 765). [J. G.]

HUIL, Welsh saint. [HUAİL.]

HUILLUS, a Jew who instructed Origen. (Jerom. Apol. adv. Rufin. § 13, Opp. ii. 469, ed. Vall.) [C. H.]

HUITA, bishop of Lichfield. [HWITTA.]

HULDERICUS, bishop. [HUGHIERIUS.]

HUMATUS, 19th bishop of Bourges, between Siagrius and St. Honoratus (circ. A.D. 523-7). (Gall. Christ. ii. 11.) [S. A. B.]

HUMBEAM (Chron. Mail. ann. 749), king of the East Angles. [HUNBEANNA.] [C. H.]

HUMBERHT, a priest who attests a charter of Aldred ealdorman of the Hwicccians, about the year 780. (Kemble, C. D. 146.) [S.]

HUMBERTUS, bishop. [HUBERTUS (2).]

HUMBERTUS (1) (HUNBERTUS), ST., first abbat and second founder of the monastery of Maroilles in the diocese of Cambrai, in the 7th century. Four lives of him have been discovered, but probably all worthless historically; (1) published by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 559); (2) published by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 767, Venice, 1733); (3) published in the supplement to Surius (6 Sept.); (4) discovered by the Bollandists (ib. p. 559), and apparently only constructed out of the first (Hist. Litt. de la France, vii. 317). Probably the only trustworthy information about St. Humbertus is to be found in his deed of grant for the monastery. By this he endows with lands the monastery called Maricolae, which one Chronobertus, or Radobertus, had built. It is first given by Baldericus in the Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium (i. 27 in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 44), but the names are there transposed, Humbertus being made the founder and Chronobertus the donor of the land. The grant amended may be seen, besides other places, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1197, where a list of the various editions of it is given in the notes, and in Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 560.

St. Humbertus lived in the time of Childeric II. (A.D. 660-673), and was the son of noble parents—Eurardus or Ebrardus, who has the title of Beatus, and Popita. At Laon he became a priest and entered a monastery. In course of time he departed home to inquire after the possessions which had descended to him. Here he met two travellers, St. Amandus and St. Nicasius, whom he hospitably entertained, and hearing they were on their way to Rome, obtained permission to accompany them. On a second visit to Rome he offered his patrimony to the pope, but was bidden return and build with it a church in France. At Maroilles, therefore, he erected a monastery. (According, however, to the deed of grant, he endowed a monastery already founded. Possibly the biographer was misled by the incorrect version of Baldericus already mentioned.) Here he spent the remainder of his life. He was visited by St. Aldegundis the abbess of Maubeuge, with whom a friendship arose that lasted till his death on March 25. In the Gallia Christiana (iii. 127) the second abbat is Hormungus, whose name occurs in a royal decree of the year 750.

Humbertus is commemorated March 25, the day of his death, and Sept. 6, that of his translation, but his name does not appear in the older martyrologies. For the history of his monastery, see Gall. Christ. iii. 127 sqq. [S. A. B.]

HUMBERTUS (2) I., archbishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Leodrandus, and followed by Benimondus, perhaps early in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702.) [S. A. B.]

HUMBERTUS (3) (HIMBERTUS), 22nd bishop of Avignon, succeeding Josephus and followed by Ragenutius, from A.D. 794 to 820. He is said to have subscribed a charter of Wigo bishop of Girone, in favour of the monastery of St. Stephen, which was preserved among the records of the church of Arles, and either he or his predecessor rebuilt the church of St. Mary after its destruction by the Saracens. (Gall. Christ. i. 802; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 794, cx. 820, xxi. tom. vi. 531, vii. 530; Gams, Ser. Episc. 504.) [S. A. B.]

HUMELIANUS (EMILIANUS), bishop of Seville, was one of the successors of OPPAS, and ranks therefore among the bishops of the captivity. His name occurs only in the catalogue of the bishops of Seville given in the Cod. Amilianiensis. (Esp. Sagr. iv. 236.) [M. A. W.]

HUMERIUS, a deacon whom Acacius patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 471-489, ordained to the presbyterate, notwithstanding that he had been deposed from his office, and was also an excommunicate at the time. (Felic. iii. Ep. 6, ad Acac. July 28, A.D. 484; Mansi, vii. 1053; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 52.) [T. W. D.]

HUMFRIDUS (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 746, 756, ed. Coxe), bishop of Winchester. [HUNFERTH.] A bishop of the same name occurs in some spurious charters (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 987, 988) before A.D. 675. [C. H.]

HUNA, a monk and priest of the family of St. Etheldreda, who attended her on her death-bed and buried her. After the burial he retired to an island near Ely, called from him Huncaia, and there spent the rest of his life as a solitary. After his death miracles were wrought at his tomb, and his relics were in consequence carried to Thorney. (Hist. Eliens. lib. i. c. 22, ed. Stewart, p. 59.) [S.]

HUNALDUS (HUNOLDUS), tenth bishop of Cambay and Arras, between Hildebertus and St. Hadulphus (circ. A.D. 713-717). The name occurs in the Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium (lib. i. 34, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 49, Gall. Christ. iii. 8). [S. A. B.]

HUNBEANNA, king of East Anglia, who divided that kingdom with Alberht after the death of king Elfwald in 749. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 662.) Thorpe in his edition of Lappenberg believes the name to be a corrupt misreading of Beorna (vol. i. p. 243). Nothing is known of him under either name. [EAST ANGLES KINGS OF.] [S.]

HUNEGUND, ST., abbess of Humolaria (Homblières), near the walls of St. Quentin, in Picardy, in the 7th century. Her body was supposed to have been discovered A.D. 946, see ter which the nuns were replaced by monks. Her father, the first abbat, wrote St. Hunegund's life. He states that she was of a noble family. Her father, Vermandois, born at the villa of Lambais, near Verberie, two miles from the monastery of Comblèbres, to which the villa was afterwards given, probably by her parents. St. Eligius (St. Eloy), afterwards bishop of Noyon, was her godfather. Being betrothed, perhaps married, to Eudaldus, she persuaded him to take her to Rome, that they might begin their married life with the pope's blessing. In the presence of the pope she made a vow of virginity, receiving from him instead of the nuptial blessing a nun's veil. Eudaldus, indignant, returned at once to his own country. A few years later, when Hunegund had become abbess of Humolaria, Eudaldus was reconciled to her, eventually made her his heir, and was buried, at his own request, in her convent. She died 690, or perhaps several years earlier. Her name is in many of the codices to be found, and notably in four of the oldest, viz. Ms. Heriniensis, and those of Antwerp, Utrecht, and Leyden; also in a calendar supposed to be of the year 826, preserved by D'Achéry, and in most of the chief martyrologies of more recent date. Her day was Aug. 25. The authorities are: Baron. Annal. ad ann. 946, 954; Mallon, *Acta SS. O. S. HUNFERTH (1) (HUNFRITH), the seventh bishop of Winchester, appointed to succeed Daniel in 744. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 329.) He held the see until 754, and was then succeeded by Cyneheard (ib. 330). He attended the council of Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360), and attested two grants of king Cuthred to Winchester in 749. (Kemble, C. D. 1006, 1007.) He is mentioned in a letter to Lullus (Mon. Mog. 269) by his successor Cyneheard, as "mitimus episcopos." [S.]

HUNFERTH (2) (HUNFRITH), a deacon of the diocese of Elmham, who attests the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547; Kemble, C. D. 1024.) He is possibly the Hunferth who became bishop of Elmham, and whose profession of obedience to Archbishop Wulfred is extant, 816-824. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 591.) [S.]

HUNFERTH (3), a Kentish priest, who attests the act of Archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

HUNFREDUS, HUNFRIDUS, the name of a bishop in a spurious charter of Ethelbert I. king of Kent. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 982.) [C. H.]

HUNGUS (UNGUS), son of Uргуnust king of the Picts, appears in the Legend of St. Andrew (Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 138 sq. 183 sq. 175 sq.; Brev. Aberdon. Prop. SS. p. hym. f. cxvii.) as king in the east of Scotland, when St. Regulus brought the relics of St. Andrew, and received Kilrymont, now St. Andrews, and the surrounding district, to build churches to the honour of God and the apostle. This Hungus of the legend is identified with Unnuist, Oengus, or Angus, son of Fergus king of the Picts, who ruled for thirty years (A.D. 731-761), and who, according to the chronicle at the end of Bede's History, "regni sui principium usque ad finem facinore cruentum tyrannus carnifex perduxit" (Mon. Hist. Brit. 289). For the interpretation of the legend and the localisation of Hungus in history, see Skene, Celt. Scot. i. 288-299, ii. 271, 272, and his Notice of the Early Ecclesiastical Settlements at St. Andrews, in Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. iv. 300 sq.; Reeves, Culdees, Evid. M.; Gordon, Scotichr. i. 70 sq.; Grub, Ecl. Hist. Scot. i. c. 9, who adopts, however, a second Angus, Ungus, or Hungus, son of Uргуnust, or Fergus, king of the Picts (A.D. 821-833), as the Hungus of the legend. [J. G.]

HUNNERIC (UGNERICUS, HUNERIX, HONORICUS), the eldest son of Genseric, whom he succeeded as king of the Vandals Jan. 24, A.D. 477. In his youth he had been sent to Rome as a hostage for the observance of the treaty his father had made with Valentinian III., and after the sack of Rome had married, 462, the captive Eudocia, the eldest of the daughters of that emperor. His reign was not marked by any war except against the Moors, who revolted, and ultimately succeeded in establishing their independence. Soon after he ascended the throne he ordered diligent search to be made for Manichaeans, of whom he burnt many, and sent more into exile across the sea. For this conduct he is commended by Victor. His subjects were oppressed with taxes and exactions, but at the beginning of his reign he shewed himself favourable to the Catholics, relaxed the strictness of his father's laws against them, and at the intercession of his sister-in-law, Placidia, the widow of the emperor Olybrius, and the emperor Zeno, allowed, in A.D. 481, a bishop of Carthage to be elected, the see having remained vacant since the death of Deogratias, in A.D. 457. Hunneric, however, made this concession only upon condition that a similar liberty should be allowed to the Arian bishops and laity in Zeno's dominions, and declared if this were not granted not only the newly elected bishops, but all the other orthodox bishops with their clergy, would be banished to the Moors. Eugenius was accordingly consecrated bishop of Carthage.

With the view of securing the succession to his son, Hunneric treated the members of his family with great cruelty. His brother Theodoric was sent into exile, and his wife and children were put to death. The Arian patriarch of Carthage, who was supposed to favour Theodoric, was burnt alive in the midst of Carthage, and for the same reason many of his clergy shared a like fate or were thrown to the wild beasts; nor did Hunneric spare the friends whom his father had commended to him on his death-bed, if he suspected they were inclined to support his brother.

Having thus consolidated his power, Hunneric took measures against the Catholics. The influence of Eugenius on the Vandals was especially dreaded by the Arian clergy, at whose suggestion the king forbade him to preach in public, or to allow men or women in Vandal dress to enter the Catholic churches; for Hunneric, like his father, was determined that none of the dominant race should adopt a belief opposed to that of his sovereign. The bishop replied that the house of God was open to all, and no one could forbid them to come in, especially as a great number of Catholics, being the king's servants, wore the Vandal dress. Men were thereupon posted at the church doors with long rakes, with which, whenever they saw a man or woman in Vandal dress entering, they seized them by the hair so as to tear off hair and scalp together. Many died in consequence of this treatment. Hunneric's next proceedings were against Catholics who held posts at the court or belonged to the army. They were deprived of their offices and pay; many of the former were forced to work in the fields near Utica, and the latter were deprived of their property and exiled to Sicily or Sardinia.

A law confiscating the property of deceased bishops and imposing a fine of 500 solidi on each new bishop at his consecration was contemplated, but the project was abandoned for fear of retaliatory measures being taken against the Arians in the Eastern empire.

Virgins were hung up naked with heavy weights attached to their feet, and their breasts and backs burnt with red-hot irons, to extort, if possible, a confession of immorality, which might be used against the bishops and clergy. Many expired under the torture, and the survivors were maimed for life. Catholic bishops, priests, deacons, and laity, to the number of 4976, were sent in a body into banishment among the savage Moors of the desert. Victor gives a touching description of their sufferings during their marches by day and in the crowded dens where they were obliged to pass the night.

But these cruelties were only the prelude of a more extensive and systematic persecution. Hunneric on Ascension Day, A.D. 483, published an edict to Eugenius, and the other Catholic or, as he termed them, Homoousian bishops, ordering them to assemble at Carthage on Feb. 1, in order to meet the Arian bishops in a conference, and to decide the points in controversy between them, promising them a safe conduct. Eugenius suggested that the foreign Catholic and Arian bishops should be summoned by either party to the conference, but this proposal was rejected by Hunneric.

Even before the conference, however, the persecution began. Victor mentions various bishops who were cruelly beaten and sent into exile, while on Sept. 20, Laetus bishop of Nepta was burnt, to terrify the rest of the Catholic party. When the meeting assembled, the Catholics were indignant to find that Cyrila, the Arian patriarch, occupied the presidential chair. After a scene of much confusion and mutual recrimination the Catholics presented to the assembly a statement of their belief and the arguments by which they supported it. The Arians received it with indignation, as in it the opposite party claimed the name of Catholics for themselves, and falsely suggested to the king that the disturbance was the fault of their opponents. Hunneric seized this pretext for publishing, on Feb. 25, an edict he had already prepared and distributed to the magistrates throughout his dominions. He thereby ordered all the churches of the orthodox party to be handed over with their endowments to the Arians, and further, after reciting the penalties imposed on the Donatists in A.D. 412 and 414, by edicts Honorius (Codex Theodosianus, xvi. 5, 52 and 54), enacted that the Catholics should be subjected to the same scale of penalties and disabilities. Pardon was promised to those who should renounce Catholicism before June 1.

The persecution, however, began before the three months' grace had expired. The first to suffer were the bishops assembled at Carthage. They were expelled from the town with nothing but the clothes they had on, and were obliged to beg their bread. The inhabitants were forbidden to give them shelter or food under pain of being burnt alive with their whole family. While they continued outside the walls in this miserable state, they were summoned to meet personally by the king at the Temple of Memory, and were required to take an oath to support the succession of Hilderic the king's son, and to hold no correspondence with the countries beyond the sea. On these conditions the king promised to restore them their churches. Some took the oath, but others refused to swear, excusing themselves by the precept "Swear not at all." They were then told to separate, and the names and sees of the bishops of each party were taken down, and they were all sent to prison. A few days afterwards those who had taken the oath were told that, as they had infringed the precept of the Gospel, the king had ordered they should be banished to the country and have land assigned them to cultivate, on condition, however, that they should not chant, or pray, or baptize, ordain or receive any into the church. To those on the other hand who had refused, they said, "You refuse to swear because you did not wish our master's son to succeed him. Therefore you are exiled to Corsica, where you shall cut timber for our master's navy." Of the 466 who attended the council, 88 fell away to Arianism; among the remainder one was a martyr and one a confessor; 46 were banished to Corsica, and the remainder to the country parts of Africa.

In the meantime throughout Africa a more cruel persecution raged, neither age nor sex being a protection; some were cruelly beaten, others were hung, and some were burnt alive. Noble ladies were stripped naked and tortured in the public streets. Victorian, a former proconsul of Carthage, was the most illustrious victim of the persecution. Victor's fifth book is filled with accounts of the constancy and sufferings of the Catholics. Eugenius was entrusted the custody of the cruel Antonius, the Arian bishop of a city in Tripoli, where his hardships brought on a stroke of paralysis. Another bishop, Habebus, was bound and gagged by Antonius, and forced by him to undergo the rite of a second baptism, which indeed was imposed by force or fraud upon many of the orthodox party. The Vandals, who had renounced Arianism, were treated with peculiar cruelty. Some had the eyes put out, and others their hands, feet, nose or ears cut off. The eyes of Uranius, who had been sent by the emperor Zeno to intercede for the Catholics, were shocked by these horrid sights, as Hunneric, to insult the ambassador and his master, had ordered some of the cruel scenes of torture to be enacted in the street through which he had to pass on his way to the palace.

The most celebrated event of the persecution occurred at Typasa, a seaport town of Mauriana. When the citizens saw that a former secretary of Cyrila's had been consecrated as the Arian bishop of their town, the greater part of them took shipping and crossed to Spain. A few who could not find room on board remained behind, whom the Arian bishop on his arrival endeavoured, first by persuasion and then by threats, to induce to become Arians. They refused, and having assembled in one house began publicly to celebrate the divine mysteries. When this became known to the bishop he secretly despatched to Carthage an accusation against them to the king, who sent one of his officers with orders to have their tongues cut out by the roots, and their right hands cut off in the middle of the forum before the assembled province. This cruel punishment was duly performed, but they continued to speak as plainly as before. This event is attested by Victor, who was probably an eye-witness, though he does not expressly say so; by the eye-witnesses Aeneas of Gaza the Platonic philosopher (Theophrastus, in Migne, Patr. Græc. lxxxv. 1000), Justinian (Codex, i. 27), and Marcellinus (Chronicle in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 933), all of whom had seen some of these persons at Constantinople; by Procopius (de Bello Vandalico, l. 8); by Victor Tununensis (Chronicle in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 946); and by pope Gregory the Great (Dialogues, iii. 32 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 293), and has generally been considered not only to have been a miracle, but the most remarkable one on record after apostolic times. The variety of the witnesses who attested it, and the consistency of their testimony on all material points, give it claims to belief, such as few apparently preternatural events possess. Dr. Middleton was the first to suggest (Free Inquiry, 313-316) that, assuming the account to be true, it by no means follows that the event was miraculous, a position he maintains by instances of a person born without a tongue, and of another who had lost it by disease, who, however, were able to speak.* Mr. Twisleton in his recent book, The Tongue not Essential to Speech, has shewn this explanation of the event to be probable. He gives numerous cases of persons in Eastern countries who had suffered a similar mutilation, and also of persons in England whose tongues had been removed by surgical operations, and who still were able to pronounce distinctly all the letters except d and t: one of the latter was actually seen by the author, and conversed with him. He sums up his inquiry by saying: "The final result seems to be that questions connected with the phenomenon of speech in the African confessors are purely within the domain of natural science, and that there is no reason for asserting or suspecting any miraculous intervention in the matter." The persecution continued to rage till the death of Hunneric, which took place the following Dec. 11. Like the persecutor Galerius his body mortified, and bred worms.

* Gibbon in this case, as in some others, appears to take a malicious pleasure in representing the case for the miracle on the testimony as impregnable, being sure that few rational men will admit the miracle. Middleton wrote before Gibbon, yet Gibbon does not refer to him there, though familiar with his writings.

The sources of the above account are Victor Vitensis De Persecutione Vandalica, ii. iv., and v. in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii., with Ruinart's Appendix; Procopius de Bello Vandalico, i. 8; the Appendix to the Chronicle of Prosper, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 605; and the Chronicle of Victor Tununensis in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii.; Gibbon (c. xxxvii.) gives a good narrative of the persecution, and Ceillier (Auteurs Sacrés, x. 452-462) may also be consulted. [F. D.]

HUNOLDUS, bishop. [HUNALDUS.]

HUNBERTUS, abbat. [HUMBERTUS.]

HUNUANUS (MINARUS, NUMIANUS), 27th bishop of Noyon and Tournay, between Framengerus and Guido I. He is said to have died in 741, after an episcopate of 18 years. But this date is very doubtful. (Gall. Christ. ix. 985; Vita S. Berlandis, Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 381.) [S. A. B.]

HUPARCIUS, bishop. [EPARCIUS.]

HUPORTUNUS, twenty-seventh bishop of Geneva, succeeding Albo and followed by Eucherius. The name is perhaps a corruption of Opportunus or Importunus. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 383.) [S. A. B.]

HURMAN, bishop of Hulwan in Persia and martyr under Sapor II. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 432.) [G. T. S.]

HWÆTRAED, a Kentish abbat, who, together with archbishop Bregwin, attests an act of king Eanmund appended to a grant of Sigiraed, king of half Kent, to Rochester. (Kemble, C. D. 114; Mon. Angl. i. 163.) He is probably the same person as Hwitred or Wetred, abbat of Reculver (Mon. Angl. i. 454), to whom Eardulf king of Kent gave land at Berhamstede (Kemble, C. D. 1005), and Ealhmund about 784 gave land at Scildwic. (Kemble, C. D. 1013; Mon. Angl. i. 455.) The charters are very doubtful. [S.]

HWICCA, bishop of Lichfield. [HWITTA.]

HWICCI, HUICCI, HWICCAS, WICCII, the inhabitants of a district between the south and middle Angles and the Welsh, which is ecclesiastically represented by the ancient diocese of Worcester, and comprised Worcestershire (except sixteen parishes beyond the Abberley hills, which belonged to Hereford), Gloucestershire, on the east of the Severn, including Bristol, and the southern half of Warwickshire. Worcester, the chief town, derived its name from the nation, appearing first as Wigernaceaster, Wigarceaster, Wigraceaster, and, in Latin, Wigornia. As this district contained a large number of early ecclesiastical foundations, and remained for a longer time than the other Mercian provinces under the separate rule of hereditary under-kings or subreguli, who were patrons of the early church, it seems desirable to give a chronological series of these rulers, many of whom were not of so much eminence as to require independent treatment.

At the time of the conversion of Mercia the Hwiccan princes seem to have extended their rule over that portion of Somersetshire which lies north of the Avon, and so included Bath as well as Bristol, Worcester, and Gloucester. All of these were seats of early monastic bodies; besides these Hwiccia contained the more rural monasteries of Evesham, Pershore, Deerhurst, Winchelcomb, and Tewkesbury, and a large number of still smaller monasteries, the possessions of which were at a later period included in the estates of the cathedral monastery of Worcester. Of these, Bredon, the monastery in which archbishop Tatwin was educated, Westbury, on the foundation of which the later monasteries of archbishop Oswald were based, and Berkeley, which subsequently was appropriated to Reading abbey, were the most famous.

The first Hwiccian rulers of whom we have any knowledge were Eanfrith and Eanhere, who were Christian at least as early as A.D. 661 (Bede, H. E. iv. 13). [EANFRITH.] The title of king is not given to these princes. Osric, however, who is mentioned by Bede as ruling about A.D. 690, is distinctly termed by him "Rex Osric." He is recognised as the founder of Bath abbey, of St. Peter's, Gloucester, and of the cathedral monastery of Worcester, and flourished, so far as we know from charters, as early as A.D. 676. He probably was connected with the royal house of Northumbria. (See Bede, H. E. iv. 23; and OSRIC.) Oswald, brother, and possibly joint ruler, with Osric, was the founder of Pershore. [OSWALD.] In 692 Oshere, possibly a son or a nephew of Osric, was able to call himself "rex Hwiccorum" in several charters, some of which are genuine (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 17, 36). [SEE OSHERE.] Oshere is the last person to whom the title of king is given. In the next generation the family is represented by Ethilward, who calls himself "subregulus, Osheri quondam Wicciorum regis filius" (Kemble, C. D. 56). In close connexion with him are Ethilheard and Ethelric (Kemble, C. D. 53, 57), who seem to be his brothers, Ethelric calling himself a son of king Oshere. (Kemble, C. D. 83.)

In 757 Eanberht (Kemble, C. D. 102, 105) was "regulus Hwiccorum," conjointly or contemporaneously with his brothers Uhtred and Aldred, but whether they were sons, nephews, or grandsons of Ethelheard is not clear. Possibly an intervening ruler, Alhferth (C. D. 124, 146) may have been father of the three. Uhtred is "Hwiccorum subregulus," in 767 (C. D. 117), 770 (ib. 118), and possibly later (ib. 148); Aldred in 777 (C. D. 131), and earlier (ib. 125), and possibly later (ib. 145, 146, 150, 154); he is called by Oifa a "dux propriae gentis Hwiccorum."

Wigferth, or Wiferth, duke of the Hwiccas, was buried in the church-yard of St. Peter's at Worcester, as were also the parents of Aldred, Uhtred, and Eanberht (Kemble, C. D. 102, 128). He was then probably of the same family, and his date seems to fall between 781 and 798 (Kemble, C. D. 175, &c.).

Ethelmund, whose death is recorded in the Chronicle under the year 802 (Chr. S. A.D. 800), was then ealdorman of the Hwiccas. He was the son of Ingild, who is mentioned by Uhtred in 767 as one of his comites (Kemble, C. D. 117). The elder line of succession must either have died out or been set aside. Ethelric, son of Ethelmund, went on pilgrimage, and left his estates to several churches, with remainder to Worcester (C. D. 186). This inheritance became at a later period a matter of dispute in council and witenagemot, ib. 218. (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 483, 514, 549, 592.)

These dates can only be regarded as an approximation to a true chronology, and are drawn from materials scarcely any portion of which is beyond suspicion; but the consistency of the computation, and the basis which it has in the references made by Bede to the royal rulers of the Hwicci, are arguments in favour of the existence of some such line of succession, of which fuller particulars may have been existing in the records of the Worcestershire monasteries at the time when their extant cartularies were drawn up. The documents on which they are founded are to be read in the Gloucester Cartulary (ed. Hart), in the Worcester Cartulary of Heming (ed. Hearne), and in the great collection of J. M. Kemble. [S.]

HWITTA, HWITA (HWITA, HWICCA), the tenth bishop of Lichfield (M. H. B. 623). On the death of bishop Aldwin, who had held the two Mercian sees until 737 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 659), the diocese of Mercia under Lichfield, and that of Middle Anglia under Leicester, were finally divided; Hwitita being consecrated to the former and Totta or Torthelm to the latter. Hwitita attended the council of Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360), and his name is attached to a charter granted by Ethelbald of Mercia at Godmundeslaech, in 749. (Kemble, C. D. 99; Spelman, Conc. i. 256; Wilkins, i. 100; Malmesbury, G. R. lib. i., ed. Hardy, pp. 116, 117; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 386.) He was succeeded by Hemele, who first appears in charters in 752. [S.]

HYA, of St. Ives. [HIA.]

HYACINTHUS (1)—July 3, martyr. He was a native of Caesarea in Cappadocia and became a chamberlain in the court of Trajan, where he followed the Christian religion. Being charged with this he was bidden to sacrifice to the gods and eat of the meat which had been offered in sacrifice. On his refusal he was imprisoned, and as the emperor would only permit food to be supplied to him which had been previously offered to idols, he was starved to death. (Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Boll. Jul. i. 633.) [G. T. S.]

HYACINTHUS (2), an eunuch who brought up Marcia, afterwards concubine to the emperor Commodus. He was employed by her to bear to Sardinia an order which she had obtained for the release of certain Christian prisoners who worked there in the mines; and his relations with Marcia gave him influence enough to procure on his own responsibility the release also of CALLISTUS (I p. 391), who had not been included in the list. Hyacinthus was a Christian, and his mutilation did not prevent his holding the office of presbyter. (Hippol. Ref. ix. 12, p. 288.) [G. S.]

HYACINTHUS (4), bishop of Miletus, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1146.) [L. D.]

HYACINTHUS (5), 5th bishop of Perpignan, r, as the see was then, Helena, between Ivaricus and Clarus, said to have taken up arms against Wamba king of the Visigoths, with the rebel Paul, and to have been captured by him in A.D. 673. The date of his death is unknown, but apparently it happened previously to 676, when his successor is known to have been sitting. (Gall. Christ. vi. 1032.)

HYACINTHUS (6), bishop of Sorrento. He signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, in 680. (Mansi, xi. 302; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

HYACINTHUS (7), bishop of the Lusitanian see of Cosia, the first of whom we have authentic knowledge. He appears at the third council of Toledo as the junior bishop, his signature occurring in the sixty-second place before those of the vicars. (Agnirre-Catalani, iv. 262; Esp. Sagr. iv. 56.) [M. A. W.]

HYACINTHUS (8)—July 26. Roman martyr at Portus under a magistrate named Eonitius. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Till. ii. 573.) [G. T. S.]

HYACINTHUS (9)—Sept. 9. A martyr at the thirtieth milestone from Rome in the Latin country with Alexander and Tiburtius. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HYCHAN, ST., the saint of Llanhychan, in the vale of Clwyd, Denbighshire, in the 5th century. His festival was Aug. 8. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 144.) [C. W. B.]

HYDROCK, ST., to whom Lanhydrock in Cornwall is dedicated. The feast day is 5th May: William of Worcester (Itin. 108), "Sanctus drocus confessor, die 5 Maii, F litera." The names beginning with Lan are ancient; it is a Cymric prefix, and rare in Scotland.

[C. W. B.]

HYDROPARASTATAE (ὑδροπαράσταται), a name given to the followers of Tatian and other Gnostics who rejected wine in the Eucharist and substituted water for it. The practice was condemned in Clement Alex. Strom. i. 19, where we read: "Those destitute of prudence, that is, those involved in heresies, I enjoin, remarks Wisdom, saying, 'Touch sweetly stolen bread and the sweet water of theft,' the Scriptures manifestly applying the terms bread and water to nothing else but to those heresies which employ bread and water in the oblation, and according to the rule of the church. For there are those who celebrate the Eucharist with mere water." The context shews that Ebionite practices are here referred to, and we otherwise know that celebration in water only was used by the Ebionite sects (Iren. v. 1; Epiph. Haer. xx. 16, and the Clementines generally). Theodosius, in an edict of 382, classes the Hydroparastatae with the Manichaeans and accuses them of all kinds of crimes, and pronounces sentence of death upon all those who take the name of Encratites, Saccophori, or Hydroparastatae, ordering Florus, pretorian prefect of the east, to make strict search for them (Hael, Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. v. p. 1530, 1570; cf. Mosheim, H. E. cent. iv. p. ii. c. 5 § 1). The rejection of wine was a leading principle with perfect Manichaeans: they called it "the gall of the Prince of Darkness." Others before them even among the heathen held it in abomination, and refused to offer it in libation to the gods as being the blood of the giants who waged war with heaven (cf. Plutarch, de Iside; Jortin, ii. 288, ed. 1752). By way of reaction against the views of the Hydroparastatae, the Armenians fell into the opposite practice of rejecting the mixed chalice, taking their stand upon St. Chrysostom's homily on Matt. xxvi. 29, where he repudiates the heresy of the Hydroparastatae and urges strongly the necessity for the presence of wine to constitute a valid sacrament. Against the Armenian view the Trullan council A.D. 692 passed its 32nd canon (cf. Assemani, Biblioth. Juris Oriental. v. 109 sqq.). We find the practice of substituting water for wine in the Eucharist, but without any heretical intent, opposed by St. Cyprian (Ep. lxiii.). Some in his time were accustomed to celebrate the Eucharist in the morning without wine, in the evening with wine. From this epistle it would seem as if the custom arose during the time of persecution. Men were then daily communicants, and could be detected by the smell of the wine. "It remaineth that the whole discipline of the truth is overthrown, unless what is spiritually enjoined be faithfully maintained. Unless indeed this be any one's fear in the morning sacrifices, lest by the savour of wine he smell of the blood of Christ. Yet so then the brotherhood is beginning to be kept back from the Passion also of Christ in persecution, while in the oblations they learn to be ashamed of the Body and blood-shedding of Christ." The whole epistle is deserving of most careful study. It shews what St. Cyprian's opinion was about Communion in one kind [ENCRATITES]. (Mosheim, H. E. cent. ii. p. ii. c. 5 § 9; Fleury, H. E. lib. iv. 8, xviii. 9, vii. 15; J. Vogt, Biblioth. Hist. Haeres. p. 239.)

[G. T. S.]

HYDROTHEITAE, a name invented by the author of "Praedestinatus" (75) for the heretics represented by Philaster (96), and after him by Augustine (75) as holding that water was not made by God, but had existed from eternity.

[G. S.]

HYDULPHUS, bishop. [HILDULFUS.]

HYGBALD, an abbat in Lindsey, mentioned by Bede (H. E. iv. 3) as having heard from the great missionary Egbert St. Chad's vision of the ascent to heaven of his brother Cetti's soul. There can be little doubt that he is identical with the Hygbald whose name occurs in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis (p. 9). Hygbald's monastery seems to have been Bardney, where he is said to have educated St. Swibert. (V. S. Swiberti, ap. Surium, A.A. SS. 1 March, tome ii. p. 3; Mabillon, A.A. SS. O. S. B. saec. ii. index.) He is no doubt the person from whose name Hibaldstow in Lindsey is called, and in whose name the church of that period and three others in the neighbourhood are dedicated. Sir Harris Nicolas (Chron. Hist. p. 154) gives Sept. 22 as the day of his commemoration; Mabillon mentions July 21; Mr. Parker gives Sept. 20 (Angl. Kal. p. 247).

HYGBERHT (Kemble, C. D. 1020). HYGE-BEORHT (K. C. D. 985). HYGEBERHT (K. C. D. 141, 143, 152, 153, 155, 156, 157, 164, 167, 175), archbishop. [HIGBERT.]

HYGINUS (1), bishop of Rome after Telesphorus, probably from 137 to 141, during four years and some months. Our early authorities for the dates and duration of his episcopate are confused and uncertain, as is the case with other bishops of that early period. The Liberian Catalogue is probably correct in giving Caesar and Albinus (Balbinus) as the consuls of the last year of Telesphorus, denoting A.D. 137; but is certainly wrong in giving twelve years as the duration of the episcopate of Hyginus. The dates of his accession and decease are absent from the catalogue, as we now have it, there being several such lacunae about the period referred to, including the entire omission of three popes known to have existed between Hyginus and Callistus. The later Felician Catalogue, followed as to the number of years by subsequent editions of the Liber Pontificalis, gives four years, three months, and three days as the duration of the reign of Hyginus, which may be accepted as most probable (see Lipsius, Chronol. der röm. Bischöfe, pp. 169, 263). Anastasius (Lib. Pontif.) says of him that he was a Greek by race, son of an Athenian philosopher, of unknown genealogy, and that he sat for four years, three months, and eight days, in the times of Verus and Marcus, from the consulate of Magnus and Camerinus (? Niger and Camerinus, A.D. 138) to that of Orfidus and Priscus. Orfitus and Priscus being the consuls of the year 149, the date thus indicated is inconsistent with the duration of four years assigned by the same authority, being due apparently to the error with respect to the latter, above noticed, in the Liberian Catalogue. Anastasius adds, "hic clerum composuit, et distribuit gradus," that he was buried near the body of St. Peter in the Vatican on the 11th of January, and that the see remained vacant for three days.

Nothing certain is known about Hyginus. Several spurious decretals are assigned to him. One, addressed "to all living in the apostolic faith and discipline," is on matters of such faith and discipline. Another, addressed to the Athenians, is hortatory against sin in general, and especially (as is usual in spurious decretals) against disobedience to the apostolic see. Gratian has other decreta under his name. He appears in the Martyrologium Romanum on the 11th of January as a saint and martyr, and is said to have suffered gloriously in the persecution of Antoninus. But the title of martyr being shared with him by all the first thirty bishops of Rome but two, there is no solid ground for concluding him to have been one. [J. B—y.]

HYGINUS (2) (ADYGINUS, or IGINUS), bishop of Cordova (Corduba) towards the end of the 4th century. Taking great alarm at the first outbreak of the Priscillianist heresy, he reported it to his colleague, Idatius of Emerita (Merida). On the severity of the persecution increasing, Hyginus inclined to lenient measures. For this cause he was treated with special indignation by the orthodox party. (Sulp. Sev. ii. 47.)

[M. B. C.]

HYGINUS (3), martyr. [GENIUS.]

HYLAS, a freedman of Jerome's friend Melania. He accompanied St. Jerome and his friends from Aquileia to Syria, and died in 374 at Antioch, at the same time with Innocentius Jerome esteemed him highly, and speaks of him as one "qui pietate morum maculam servitutis abluerat." (Jer. ep. iii. 3, ed. Vall.)

HYLDRADUS, an abbat who sent a psalter to Florus priest of Lyons, with a request that he would correct it so accurately that it might serve as a model for transcription. The answer of Florus was discovered by Cardinal Mai, and published by him in his Scriptores Veteres, iii. 251-5. (See Rohrbacher, Hist. Univ. de l'Eglise Cath. 5th ed. vi. 313, and Ceillier, xii. 492.)

The letter contains an allusion to some verses of Florus, which he had sent to Hyl-dradius. These were published by Muratori, as addressed to an abbat Eloradus, but with an expression of doubt as to the correctness of the name (Murat. Antiq. Ital. iii. 855-7). The letter makes it clear that the name Eloradus was a misreading of Hyl-dradius. [S. A. B.]

HYLDREN, ST., William of Worcester (Itin. 114) says, "Sanctus Hyldren episcopus jacet in parochia Lansalux juxta parochiam Lanteglys, ejus festum agitur primo die Februarii." The parish of Lansallos in Cornwall was dedicated to St. Ildierna in 1331, but probably this is the same name. There seems to have been a very early sanctuary in this parish. [C. W. B.]

HYLDULFUS (Orderic. Vital. H. E. v. 9), bishop of Rouen. [HIDLPHUS.] [C. H.]

HYMELINUS. [HIMELINUS.]

HYMENAEUS, bishop of Jerusalem. He is stated to have held the see for the long space of thirty-two years, A.D. 266-298; but the whole period is absolutely barren of recorded events connected with his own church, although for the last fourteen years of his episcopate Diocletian was emperor (Euseb. H. E. vii. 14; Chron. ad ann. 266; Epiphan. Haer. lxxvi. § 20). Hymenaeus was one of the leading bishops at the synods held at Antioch 264-269, on the case of Paul of Samosata (Euseb. vii. 28-30). The conversion of St. Maurice and the Thebaean legion of which he was leader, is stated in the acts of their martyrdom, A.D. 285, to have been due to a bishop of Jerusalem, who, from a consideration of the dates, as Le Quien and Papebroch have shewn, may be probably identified with Hymenaeus. (Neale, Patriarchate of Antioch, p. 56.) [E. V.]

HYMENAËUS, bishop of Alexandria. [EUMENES.]

HYMERIUS, bishop of America. [HIMERIUS.]

HYMETIUS, a Roman of high rank, who held the office of vicar of the city of Rome, A.D. 362, in the time of the emperor Julian (Cod. Theod. XI. xxx. 29). He was uncle to Eustohim, the friend of Jerome (q. v.), and was conversant to the ascetic practices in which his niece was being educated. With his wife Prae-textata, he endeavoured, by flattery, and by introducing her into society, and even by some degree of compulsion, to draw her away from those practices, but without success. (Jerome, p. 107, 5, ed. Vall.) Ammianus Marcellinus, circ. A.D. 368, relates that Hymetius, having been made proconsul of Africa, greatly distinguished himself by his generosity to the people of Carthage during a time of famine; but an accusation of treasonable designs being brought against him, he was recalled by the emperor Valentinian and committed for trial. The senate only sentenced him to banishment to the island of Boa. Valentinian was indignant at what he considered their too great lenity, and it was only at the urgent intercession of the nobles, one of whom was the ex-prefect Prae-textatus, probably a relative of Praetextata, that he relented and spared Hymetius's life. The sentence of the senate, however, seems to have been executed. (Am. Marc. xviii. 1.)

[W. H. F.]

HYMNA, Welsh abbess. [HINNA.]

HYMNEMUND, chosen abbat of Agaunum or St. Maurice, in the Valais, at the council held there in A.D. 515. (Mansi, viii. 533; Gall. Chr. xii. 789.)

[I. G. S.]

HYMNETIUS, a physician probably of Caesarea, from whose skill Chrysostom had derived great benefit, for which he expresses his gratitude in a letter written after his arrival at Cucusus, A.D. 404 (Chrys. Epist. 81). In a second letter, written perhaps in A.D. 406, he commends to Hymnetius's care a bishop named Seleucus, who had been to visit him, who was suffering from a severe cough (ibid. 37, 38).

HNYD, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, wife of Tudval the yellow-haired, and mother of Guincov. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 604.)

HYPATIA (1). The account given by Socrates (Ecll. Hist. vii. 15) of this celebrated person is as follows:—"There was a lady in Alexandria, by name Hypatia, daughter of the philosopher Theon. She advanced to such a point of mental culture as to surpass all the philosophers of her age, and receive the office of lecturer in the Platonic school, of which Plotinus had been the founder, and there expound all philosophic learning to any who were desirous of it. Students of philosophy came from all quarters to hear her. The dignified freedom of speech, which her training had implanted in her, enabled her to appear even before the public magistrates with entire modesty; none could feel ashamed to see her take her station in the midst of men. She was revered and admired even the more for it, by reason of the noble temperance of her disposition. This then was the woman upon whom malicious envy now made its attack. She was wont to have frequent communications with Orestes [the prefect]; this aroused enmity against her in the church community. The charge was that it was through her that Orestes was prevented from entering upon friendly relations with the bishop [CYRIL].

Accordingly some passionate fanatics, led by Peter the Reader, conspired together and watched her as she was returning home from some journey, tore her from her chariot, and dragged her to the church called Caesarium; there they stripped her and killed her with oyster shells, and, having torn her in pieces, gathered together the limbs to a place called Cinaron, and consumed them with fire. This deed occasioned no small blame to Cyril and the Alexandrian church; for murders, fightings, and the like are wholly alien to those who are minded to follow the things of Christ. This event happened in the fourth year of the episcopate of Cyril, in the consulships of Honorius (for the tenth time) and Theodosius (for the sixth time) in the month of March, at the season of the fast" (i.e. March, A.D. 415). Little can be added to this account. Synesius of Cyrene (afterwards bishop of Ptolemais) was a devoted disciple of hers. According to Suidas, she married Isidorus. No trustworthy account connects Cyril directly with her murder; but of course he must bear the blame of participation in the temper which led to it.

HYPATIA (2). In the synodical book of the council of Ephesus is given a letter, from its style evidently the work of a female writer, which is falsely attributed to Hypatia, the philosopher of Alexandria. The writer of the letter has still to be called Hypatia for want of the real name. The letter complains of the condemnation and banishment of Nestorius, which took place seventeen years after the death of the real Hypatia. The writer is struck by the teaching of the Christians that God died for men; she founds her plea for Nestorius on an appeal to reason and Scripture. (Baluze, Concil. App. p. 837, Paris, 1683, fol.; Ceillier, viii. 387.)

[W. M. S.]

HYPATIANUS, bishop of Heraclea on the coast of Propontis, and metropolitan of Thracia. He is mentioned in a life of Parthenius bishop of Lampsacus (see Boll. AA. SS. Feb. 7); present at the second council of Sirmium, A.D. 357, according to Epiphanius. (Haeres. lxxiii. 21; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1104.)

HYPATIUS (1), bishop of Gangra in Paphlagonia. Our only knowledge of him is drawn from the untrustworthy Menaea of the Greek church. According to these he was present at the council of Nicaea, and met his death at the hands of a party of Novatians in a mountain defile in the reign of Constantius. (Siret. Menolog. Graec. Mar. 31, Nov. 14 in Canisius, Thesaur. Monum. iii. 420, 486; Menol. Basil. Nov. 14; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. vi. 642, ix. 651; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 549.) In a Greek MS. of the Magnum Menologium Graecorum for November, in the Imperial Library of Vienna, once belonging to Sambucus, there is a Life and Martyrdom of this Hypatius, occupying nine folio pages. It is described by Lambecius in his Comment. Biblioth. Caesar. lib. viii. num. 36, p. 803, ed. Kollar.

[E. V.]

HYPATIUS (2) I., Arian bishop of Nicaea in Bithynia, ejected along with other Arians and Eunomians by the emperor Theodosius, c. A.D. 379, when he retired to his native town of Cyrus in Syria (Philost. H. E. ix. 19). He was a pupil of Aetius, and was appointed to Nicaea by Eudoxius. (Epiphanius, adv. Haer. lxxiii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xlii. 886; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 642.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (3), chorepiscopus, who, together with another of the same order named Abraham, and Alypius the superior of the monks of his diocese, men remarkable for their piety and intelligence, was sent by Theodoret to pope Leo, in A.D. 449, to appeal against his deposition by the "Robbers' Synod" of Ephesus (Theod. Ep. 113, ad fin.). At a later period of his life Theodoret undertook, at his request, his commentary on the Octateuch and on the Books of the Kings (Theod. in Octat. praef.; in Reg. praef.) [E. V.]

HYPATIUS (4), bishop of Zephyrium on the coast of Cilicia, present at the fourth general council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and signing the synodical epistle addressed by the bishops of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 457. (Mansi, vi. 569, and vii. 430; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 884.) [J. de S.]

HYPATIUS (5), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Vetus Epirus. He signed the letter of his provincial synod to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 619; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 141.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (6), bishop of Sidyma in Lycia. He subscribed the letter of the synod of Myra, the metropolis of the province, to the emperor Leo, 458. (Mansi, vii. 580; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 973.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (7), bishop of Claudiopolis, the metropolis of the province of Honorias, adjoining Paphlagonia, signed the petition of the Constantinopolitan synod A.D. 518 to the patriarch John concerning the conduct of Severus of Antioch, which was read at the fifth session of the synod under Mennas A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1048; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 569.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (8) I. bishop of Ephesus, along with Epiphanius of Constantinople and Eusebius, introduced St. Sabas on his arrival from Palestine to the emperor Justinus I.

On the invitation of the emperor Justinian, bishop Hypatius and others held a conference with the Severian bishop concerning the faith in the palace A.D. 532, when we have the first unequivocal mention of the writings of Dionysius Pseudo-Areopagita, which were produced by the Severians in support of their Monophysite views; Hypatius, however, impugned their genuineness [DIONYSIUS, PSEUDO-AREOPAGITA]. (Mansi, viii. 817-836.) In 533 he was sent by the emperor together with Demetrius of Philippi with a letter to pope John II., asking for letters condemnatory of certain monks, called Acoemetæ, who adopted Nestorian views. This letter and John's answer are extant (Mansi, viii. 795). Hypatius's name is also found among those who were present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas A.D. 536 which condemned Anthimus. (Mansi, viii. 1143; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 681.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (9), bishop of Nicopolis, the metropolis of Vetus Epirus, concerning whom there is extant a letter of pope Honorius I., dated Dec. 13, A.D. 626. The pope refuses to send him the pallium till he should come into Roman ground, and before St. Peter swear that he had honourably obtained his bishopric, and had taken no part in the murder of his predecessor Soterichus, whilst he held his former position as deacon of the church. (Mansi, x. 581; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 137.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (10) II., bishop of Ephesus, a supporter of the veneration of images, barbarously put to death along with a priest named Andrew at Constantinople by the emperor Leo the Isaurian A.D. 730. Commemorated by the Greeks on Sept. 20, by the Latins on Aug. 29. (Sirlet's Menologium Graecorum in Canisius, Thesaur. Monum. iii. 469; Mart. Rom. Aug. 29; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 683; Acta SS. Boll. vi. Aug. 514.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (11) II., bishop of Nicaea, present at the seventh general council A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 365.) [L. D.]

HYPATIUS (12)—June 3. A boy martyr at Byzantium. He was a native of Nicomedia. He suffered with Lucillianus, a priest, and with three other boys, Claudius, Paulus, and Dionysius, in the reign of Aurelian. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

HYPATIUS (13), consul A.D. 359, in association with his brother Eusebius (Athan. de Synod. p. 576, § 8 in Pat. Gr. xxvi. 691; Ammian. Marcell. xxix. 2). He was the brother of Eusebius wife of the emperor Constantius. Ammianus Marcellinus describes him as "vir quieti placidique consilii, honestatem lenium morum velut ad perpendicularum librans" (u. s.), c. 371. Hypatius and Eusebius were at Constantinople with the emperor Valens, and were falsely accused to him of treasonable designs. Valens lending a too willing ear to their accuser their lives were in great danger; but they managed to escape, and soon afterwards returned to the West. In 379 Hypatius was prefect of Rome (Cod. Theod. XI. xxxvi. 26), and in 382-383 he was prefect of Italy (Cod. Theod. II. xix. 5; III. i. 4; XI. xvi. 13; XII. i. 99, 100; XVI. vii. 3). He is probably the Hypatius whom Gregory of Nazianzus addressed in his ninety-seventh letter (ἔ πᾶντων ἑπιστολῶν, Ep. 97 in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 169; Gothofred. Prosopogr. Cod. Theod. s. n.). [T. W. D.]

HYPATIUS (14), a relative of Basil, commended by him to Eusebius bishop of Samosata, in order that by his prayers, and those of other holy men about him, a cure of the malady under which Hypatius had been long suffering, in which physicians had proved helpless, might be granted. If these means failed, Basil begged that Hypatius might be sent with commendatory letters to other holy men. (Basil. Epist. 31 [267].) [E. V.]

HYPATIUS (15), a friend and correspondent to whom Gregory Nazianzen wrote from Arianzus, A.D. 382, that he had given way before the envy of others, and had left the government of the church to those who regarded it as a stage play, careless of the seriousness of its interests (Greg. Naz. Epist. 192 al. 96.) [E. V.]

HYPATIUS (16), a presbyter, who, with the deacons Eusebius and Lamprotatus, had been called to suffer severely in the persecution against Chrysostom, who wrote two letters from Cucusus, A.D. 405, to console him and to encourage him to maintain his struggle. (Chrys. Epist. 97, 180.)

HYPATIUS (17), one of those who begged of Epiphanius to compose a treatise in exposition of the faith, having visited him expressly from Egypt for that object. The result was Epiphanius's Ancoratus. (Epiph. Ancor. § 1, p. 6, in Pat. Gr. xliii. 18, 19.)

[C. H.]

HYPATIUS (18), addressed in a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris, begging his consent to the sale of half the estate at Ebrوليو (Ebruil), near Clermont, to Donidius, one of his clergy, who possessed half of it, and whose ancestors had owned the whole. (Epist. iii. 5 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 499.)

HYPATIUS (19), presbyter and hegumenus of the Rufinian monastery in Bithynia. He was a native of Phrygia, and from his father, a scholasticus, received a learned education. Leaving his home he passed into Thrace, where after some time spent in a pastoral employment he erected a monastery, which he fortified against the Huns, who vainly attempted to capture it, but devastated the surrounding country. He then abandoned the spot and repaired to Constantinople, where he met two ascetics like himself, Timotheus and Moschion. Crossing over to Chalcedon in company they wandered eastward in search of a mountain or a cave. At a distance of about three miles they came to an abandoned monastery originally presided over by Rufinus. Here he established himself, being then about forty years old, and gathered a community over which he presided many years. His period is the first half of the 5th century. His life by Callinicus his disciple is given by the Bollandists. (Acta SS. 17 Jun. iii. 303.)

Callinicus relates the following instances of the zeal of Hypatius bringing him into collision with his lukewarm bishop Eulalius [EULALIUS (12)]. Understanding that Nestorius, before his formal accusation, was broaching novel opinions, Hypatius had the patriarch's name removed from the office books of the church wherein he officiated, which was the church of the apostles adjoining his monastery (§§. 14, 38, 51, 53). Eulalius bishop of Chalcedon, alarmed at this daring act, which amounted to an excommunication of the all-powerful patriarch, remonstrated and threatened, but Hypatius undauntedly persisted in what he had done. While Nestorius was at the council of Ephesus in 431 Hypatius is said to have had a vision of his condemnation there, and when official news of his deposition arrived Hypatius and Eulalius were both present in church at the reading of the sentence (§ 44). On another occasion, when Leontius the prefect of Constantinople was taking steps for the re-establishment at Chalcedon of the Olympic games abolished by Constantine, Hypatius, finding that Eulalius was for doing nothing and incurring no risks, openly declared that he would by main force defeat this restoration of idolatry at the head of his monks, though it should cost him his life.

Leontius having had warning of this opposition relinquished the project and returned to Constantinople (§ 45). A certain ascetic archimandrite, Alexander, from Asia Minor, having taken up his abode in the capital with a hundred monks, gained amongst the people much reputation for sanctity, but in consequence of his bold rebukes of the imperial household was ordered to leave. The exiles betook themselves to the church of Hypatius, but Eulalius, having received orders from the palace, had them beaten and expelled. Hypatius immediately welcomed them into his monastery and dressed their wounds. The bishop threatened fresh violence, but the rustic neighbours volunteered a defence, and a riot was imminent, when a messenger from the empress ordered that the servants of God should not be molested. Alexander and his party retired in peace, and founded in the neighbourhood a monastery, of which the inmates bore the name of Acemetæ, the Sleepless. (§ 57; vid. art. ACOEMETÆ in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, and the Bollandist account of their founder in Acta SS. Jan. i.1018.)

HYPATIUS (20), father-in-law of Salvian, bishop of Marseilles in the last quarter of the 5th century.

Authority.—Salviani Epistolæ [SALVIANUS], especially letters iv. and ix. We know little of Hypatius, except that the name of his wife was Quieta, and that he was still a heathen when Salvian married his eldest daughter, Palladia. Palladia, it appears, became a Christian either at the period of her marriage or shortly before it. Hypatius subsequently became a Christian also. From the marriage of Salvian and Palladia was born a daughter named Auspiciola; but while their child was still an infant they mutually agreed to lead a life of continence. This resolution becoming known to Hypatius greatly annoyed him. His son-in-law and daughter wrote in very affectionate terms to soothe him, but whether their appeal was successful or not is unknown.

[J. G. C.]

HYPATUS—June 18, tribune, martyr under Adrian, who was prefect of Phoenicia under Vespasian. Having been sent to apprehend the martyr Leontius he fell into a fever and heard a voice warning him that if he would recover he should call upon the God of Leontius. He did so, and the result was his recovery, baptism, and martyrdom. (Basil. Menol.)

HYPERECHIUS (1) (SPERECHIUS), comes rerum privatarum, under the emperor Honorius, A.D. 397 (Cod. Theod. VII. xiii. 12; Sperchio. n. Gothofr. X. i. 14). He is probably the "castrensis apparitor" of c. A.D. 365, who is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvi. 8). Gregory of Nazianzus warmly recommends an Hyperechius to Victor, a magister militum, as most honourable (Ep. 134, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxvii. 229). Basil of Caesarea also wrote to an officer of rank of that name, who seems to have been a friend and a correspondent of his (Ep. 328 in Patr. Gr. xxxii. 1073), and an Hyperechius is also frequently named in the correspondence of Libanius. In one of his letters to Caesarius, apparently the brother of Gregory of Nazianzus, who was comes rerum privatarum,

A.D. 364, and praefectus urbis of Constantinople, A.D. 365 (Gothofred. Prosopogr. Cod. Theod. s. n.), he speaks of Hyperechius in very high terms, and pleads that he will do his best to secure him promotion in the imperial service (Ep. 1285, cf. Ep. 1070). An Hyperechius is also mentioned more than once in the letters of Aurelius Symmachus. From one of these addressed to Eutropius it would appear that Hyperechius was a foreigner by birth (Ep. lib. iii. 51). [T. W. D.]

HYPERECHIUS (2), bishop of Zela, A.D. 435. The epistle to the emperor Leo from the synod of Helenopontus is signed with the name of Hyperitius episcopus Tili, where Zela should be substituted. (Mansi, vii. 608; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 541.) [F. A.]

HYPERECHIUS (3) (HYPERETHIUS, HYPERICIUS), bishop of Aspona in Galatia Prima, at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 571 C, 945 A; vii. 122 B, 404 B; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 480.) [T. W. D.]

HYPERECHIUS (4), a priest and abbat, who lived in the early part of the 6th century. He was the author of some monastic rules, and of an "Adhortatio ad Monachos." (Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Ecclés. xi. 697; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxix. 1471, &c.) [I. G. S.]

HYPERIUS, bishop of Junopolis (Abonotichus) on the coast of Paphlagonia, mentioned in the heading of the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 608; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 555.) [L. D.]

HYPOLISTUS (HIPPOLYTUS), presbyter and martyr, cir. 303, at Atripalda, or Tripalda, a village in the south of Italy, north of Salerno, on the Sabbath near Avellino. His Acta, printed by the Bollandists from an ancient monastic manuscript, are of the usual legendary character. He came as a missionary from Antioch, and found the people for the most part votaries of Diana, but they flocked to his preaching in large numbers. Having built his little oratory (aediculam) near a temple of Jupiter, it was found that the demon who resided within the image of that god gave no responses. Hypolistus was seized, taken before the senators, and commanded to sacrifice, which he indignantly refused to do. While he continued to oppose the prevalent idolatry, the temple and its image were destroyed by lightning, whereupon he was seized, weighted with stones, and thrown into the Sabbath. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 41.) [C. H.]

HYPYSTARIII (Greg. Nazianz.), HYPYSTIARI (Greg. Nyss.), worshippers of the Most High, a sect first discovered in the earlier part of the 4th century. It presented features partly Christian, partly Jewish, and partly heathen, which prove it to have been one of the precursors of Mahometanism which appeared from time to time in the East. It seems to have been a remnant of Sabaeism, which was propagated from its cradle in the region of the Euphrates into Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor, and especially into Cappadocia (Herodot. edit. Rawlinson, i. 72, v. 49, vii. 72, and critical Essay xi. sec. 7, at end of t. i.; Cramer's Asia Minor, i. 261). It thus came into contact with Jewish ideas, especially in the form of Essenism, and with Christianity, by both of which it was materially influenced, but with neither of which it coalesced. The first historical notices of it occur in the works of St. Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. xviii. 5) and St. Gregory of Nyssa (contra Eunom. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xlv. 483). They describe the sect as adoring a supreme God, but as opposing a Trinity on the one hand and polytheism on the other. They were distinguished from the ancient Sabaeans in giving the Supreme Being the name of ἕσπερος or πρωτοπλάτης, and ascribing to him universal dominion over the world, while they still preserved traces of their origin in retaining the symbols of fire and light, the only ones they admitted, and which, according to some, they adored. They rejected all intermediate or secondary beings between man and the Most High, and professed monotheism pure and simple, distinguishing themselves thus from the ancient Sabaeans, as in turn they differed from the Christians in the denial of the revelation of God in the character of Father (Greg. Nyss. l. c.). This monotheistic element connected them with Judaism in its various forms. They were distinguished, however, from Jews in their pure theosophic worship, in rejecting sacrifices, circumcision, and every external practice, worship in their view being purely interior. Yet with that inconsistency which ever clings to human nature, they retained the observance of the Sabbath and abstinence from certain kinds of food. This absence of an external cultus hindered them from making proselytes; they seem to have been few in number even in Cappadocia, though reinforced there by an immigration of Magi, mentioned by Strabo (Geograph. lib. xv. p. 504, ed. Casaub.). They were an outcome of the religious ferment on the borders of the Roman empire, caused by the contact of Christianity, Judaism, and Oriental theosophy. They seem to have been identical in principle with the θεοεβείς of whom Cyril speaks (Cyril. Alex. de Adorat. lib. iii.), and with the Coelicolae proscribed by Byzantine law (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 8, lib. xix. tit. 5; Augustin. Ep. 44), mentioned also in Constit. Sirmont. xii. ed. Haenel, p. 465, though this last authority professes ignorance of their peculiar dogmas [COELICOLAE.] The EUPHEMITAE mentioned by Epiphanius (Haeres. lxxviii.) seem also to have been closely allied, if not identical, with this sect. He describes them as "sprung from gentiles, but tending neither to Judaism nor Christianity, acknowledging that there are gods, but worshipping none but one alone, whom they call the Omnipotent." [EUCHITES.] This opinion has been advocated by Suicer (Thes. Eccles. t. ii. p. 1406). Tollius, in his Insignia Itin. Ital. p. 108 note, traces the gypsies back to the same Euchitae or Euphemitae, quoting Theod. Haeret. Fabular. iv. 11. The father of the celebrated Gregory of Nazianzus belonged originally to this sect, whence he was converted by the influence of his wife Norma, and of Leontius bishop of Caesarea the metropolitan of Cappadocia, to become in time a bishop of the Catholic church (Gregor. Naz. Sen.). To this circumstance we owe our knowledge of this sect (Matter. Hist. du Gnost. ii. 389; Fleury, H. E. l. xi. s. 30; Neander H. E. iv. 487, Bohn's tr.). In the early part of this century exhaustive treatises on this sect were written in Germany by Ullmann (Heidelb. 1833) and Boehmer (Berol. 1824). The latter especially, in an essay published in 1824, with a preface by Neander, has discussed, with minute accuracy, every view which has been taken of this sect, but without adding anything of material value to the information which we derive from the two Gregories, upon whose testimony all his speculations are founded. His conclusion is, as already stated, that the Hypsistarii were a remnant of ancient Sabaeism, but without making, in our opinion, sufficient allowance for the necessary influence of Jewish and Christian ideas upon the sect. He is also inclined to hold that the Hypsistarii acknowledged inferior divinities and worshipped idols, basing this view on a chance expression of Gregory Nazianzen in one of his poems, where, speaking of his father, he says, ἐπ' εἰδώλοις πάρος ἦεν ζῶων. A mere poetical expression seems however a very slight ground to base a conclusion so contrary to all other authorities, and unsupported by Gregory's own more formal statement. (Till. Mém. ix. 312; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. art. "Hypsistarii.") Wetstein (Proleg. Nov. Test. pp. 31, 38) also identifies them with the Coeloclares, and derives them from the proselytes of the gate. The Hypsistarii do not seem to have been extinct even in the 9th century, as they are referred to by Nicephorus patriarch of Constantinople, in his Antirrhet. I. adv. Constant. Cop. in Migne, Patr. Gr. t. c. p. 210, as a "spurious and abominable sect, compounded of heathenism and Judaism." Cf. Lyde's Asian Mystery, cap. iv.-i. Lond. 1860, where he describes the Ansaireeh of Syria, who present many features similar to those of the Hypsistarii. On p. 154 will be found an extract from their catechism describing their mass, which they have evidently derived from Christianity, though Lyde classes them with Mohammedan sects. In this catechism they quote our Lord's words of institution. See also a paper by M. V. Langlois on the Ansaireeh in Revue d'Orient for June 1856. Probably a critical investigation of the religious state of Asia Minor and Syria would discover many remains of ancient heresies (cf. Lightfoot on Colossians, p. 405). [G. T. S.]

HYP SISTIUS, bishop of Philadelphia in Isauria, on the river Calycadnus, to the north of Aphrodisias (Wiltsh. Handbuch der Kirchl. Geogr. i. 203). He was present at the second general council at Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi iii. 568; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1021.) [J. de S.]

HYP SIUS or HYP SEUS appears among those Eutychians, who, styling themselves ἀρχιμανδρίται ἐλάτιστατοι, appealed for a general council to the emperor Marcian in 481 A.D. (Labbe, iv. 524). The orthodox archimandrites in the council of Chalcedon refused to recognise him as an archimandrite, and described him as a μεμολήτης [ELPIDIUS (31)], having two or three others under him (Labbe, iv. 521 A). [C. G.]

HYPYTHIANI, heretics mentioned by Origen (Comm. Ser. in Matt. 28) as using apocryphal writings, different however from those used by the Basilidians. The name does not occur elsewhere, and it is likely there is a corruption of reading. Lipsius conjectures "Sethiani" [GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL, p. 715], and the Sethites certainly were quite distinct from the Basilidians, and used apocryphal writings. (Epiph. Haer. 29, p. 286.) [G. S.]

HYRALDUS (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 765, ed. Coxe), bishop of Elmham. Matthew Paris (ed. Luard, i. 345) calls him Halardus, and the name appears to have been intended for the person known as Alheard [ALHEARD]. He is assigned to 765 in an imaginary list of bishops who were placed under the archbishop of Lichfield. The list should be dated 787, but it is without historical authority. [S.]

HYSEBERHT, an abbat of the diocese of Worcester, who stands first on the list of the clergy who attended bishop Deneberht at the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) He may have been abbat of the monastery of St. Mary at Worcester. [S.]

HYSTASPES, PROPHECY OF. In the 2nd century there was in circulation a book of prophecies purporting to have been written by Hystaspes, father of Darius king of the Medes. The story went that Hystaspes was a disciple of Zoroaster, and that having been instructed by the Brahmins in astronomical and magical science, he was skilled in foretelling future events (Amm. Marcell. xiii. 6; see also Agathias, ii. 24, p. 117, Bonn ed.). The book came, no doubt, from the same workshop as some of the so-called Sibylline oracles, with which it is coupled by all the Christian fathers who cite it. These are (1) Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 20, 44), from whom we learn that it contained a prediction of the destruction of the world by fire; (2) Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5, p. 761), apparently quoting a speech put into the mouth of Paul in the "Preaching of Peter" (see PETER, PREACHING OF), whence we learn that the book foretold the opposition to the Son of God made by kings, their persecution of those who believed in Him, His patience and second coming (παρουσία), language indicating a Christian, rather than a Jewish author; and (3) Lactantius (Inst. Div. vii. 15, 18), who tells that Hystaspes prophesied the destruction of the Roman empire, the wickedness of the end of the world, the prayers of the oppressed faithful to Jove, answered by his destruction of the sinners. If we are to believe Justin, the reading the books of Hystaspes and the Sibyl was made a capital offence, and certainly the circulation of predictions of the fall of the empire may well have been regarded as dangerous to the state. [G. S.]

HYSTERA. Irenaeus (i. 31, p. 112), followed by Epiphanius (Haer. 38, p. 276), speaking of the sect which the latter calls Cainites, and telling how they counted opposition to the Creator to be a duty, states that he had met a work of theirs in which their disciples were exhorted to undo the works of Hystera, and that by Hystera was meant the maker of heaven and earth. This phrase does not occur elsewhere in the extant remains of Gnostic teaching. What most nearly resembles it is the word μήτρος, used by the Sethites (Hippol. Ref. v. 19, pp. 140-142). They taught (p. 140) that the form of heaven and earth resembled that of the pregnant womb; and they appear to have applied the word womb with some reproachful epithet (ἡ ἀκάθαρτος μήτρα) to the lower or material principle. It seems plain that it is the same sect whose doctrine is briefly described by Epiphanius (Haer. 25, p. 80), where also both the word μήτρα and some other Sethite words are found. Possibly the words Hystera and Metra are independent Greek translations of the same Syriac word [G. S.]

HYSTEREMA (ὕστερημα), a technical word in the system of Valentinus. As the system is reported by Hippolytus (vi. 31, p. 180) this word is used as the complement of the word Pleroma, denoting all that is not included in the meaning of the latter word. Thus the ὄρος or boundary is described as separating the Hysterema from the Pleroma, itself partaking of the nature of both; but preserving all inside fixed and immovable by permitting nothing from without to enter. We can understand in the same sense the passage in Epiphanius (Haer. 31, 4, p. 166), where the same name is given to the Demiurge; for it appears in the case of the word Hebdomas that the Valentinians gave to the Demiurge the name of the realm over which he ruled, and from which he had his origin. Marcus speaks of the Demiurge as καρπὸς ὕστερηματος (Iren. I. xvii. 2, p. 86; xix. 1, p. 90), probably, as Lightfoot suggests (Coloss. p. 335), in contrast with the description of the Christ as καρπὸς πληρώματος. Marcus would seem to have used the word Hysterema, in the sense already explained, to denote the region outside the Pleroma (see Iren. I. xvi. 2, p. 82), where, in his usual way of finding mysteries in numbers, he regards the former region as symbolised by the numbers up to 99 counted on the left hand, the latter by 100 counted on the right hand. As Marcus uses the word Pleroma in the plural number, so (see Lightfoot, l. c.) he may have used Hysterema also in the plural number to denote the powers belonging to these regions respectively. But it seems to us likely that the assertion that Marcus counted a second or a third Hysterema is but an inference drawn by Irenaeus himself (I. xvi. 3, p. 83), from the fact that he found the name καρπὸς ὕστερηματος applied not only to the Demiurge, but to his mother, Sophia Achamoth. Irenaeus ordinarily uses the word, usually rendered labes by the old Latin translator, in no technical sense, but with the general meaning of defect, commonly joining it with the words ἀγνοία and πᾶθος. In Irenaeus the usual antithesis to Pleroma is not Hysterema, but κένωμα. The word Hysterema is found also in Excerpt. Theod. 2, 22 (Clem. Alex. pp. 967, 974), in the latter passage in a technical sense; but the context does not enable us to fix its meaning. Hysterema is said by Epiphanius (Haer. 24, p. 74) to have been used as a technical word by Basilides. [G. S.]

HYSYCHIUS, bishop of Vienne. [ISICRUS II.]

HYVAIDD HIR stands in the Welsh Triads as one of three princes of alien origin, who were raised to sovereignty for bravery. He was son of Bleibb, Bleibbian, or Bleibbig Sant, better known as that St. Lupus bishop of Troyes who accompanied St. Germanus to Britain to put down Pelagianism. (Williams, Emin. Welshm. 42, 229; Rees, Welsh Saints, 126, 160.) [J. G.]

HYWEL (HOEL, HUEL), Welsh saint found at Llanhywel or Llanhowell, attached to Llandeloy, co. Pembroke. He may be the same as Huel or Hywel, eldest brother of Gildas [HUEL] (ap. Vit. Gild. by Caradoc), but it is uncertain. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 225, 245, 348; Nat. Gazet. ii. 633, 652.) [J. G.]

HYWGI, or BUGI, a saint who lived in the 6th century, and was the father of St. Beuno. He gave all his lands for the endowment of his brother Cattwg's college at Llancarfan, where he spent the latter part of his life. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 233.) [C. W. B.]

HYWYN, ST., said to have founded Aberdaron on the coast of Carnarvon, from whence pilgrims generally crossed to the island of Bardsey (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 219). He was one of a large company of refugee saints who returned from Armorica to insular Britain with St. Cadvan, A.D. 516. He first joined the famous congregation at Llantwit Major, Glamorgan, and afterwards retired to Bardsey. The churches at Gloucester and Hereford dedicated to St. Owen, and those at Bristol and Chepstow to St. Ewen, probably belong to him. The Celts held this frontier till Athelstan's time, who expelled the Britons from Hereford, Exeter, and other places (see Kerslake, St. Ewen, Bristol, and the Welsh Border, 1874.) [C. W. B.]

I

IA (1), Aug. 4, martyr in Persia under Sapor II. cir. 360. The Basilian Menology represents her as belonging to Castrum Romanum near the frontier, where she was taken captive with nine thousand Christians, by Sapor. On being discovered in the practice of her religion, she was delivered to the Magi, before whom she not only refused to abjure Christianity, but boldly ridiculed the Persian faith. She was tortured, and finally beheaded (Basil. Menol. Aug. 4, Sept. 11). Assemani (Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 133) discusses the question of her identity with Eudocia [EUDOCIA (2)] and decides in the negative. A martyrny in her memory at Constantinople, on the left hand of the Golden Gate, was found in a ruinous condition through age in the reign of Justinian, who restored it at a great expense. (Procop. Aedif. lib. i. § 12 Du Cange, Cpohis. Christ. p. 102.) [C. H.]

IA (2), the wife of Julian the Pelagian, bishop of Eclanum, early in the fifth century. Their epithalamium was written by Paulinus of Nola (poem. xxv. in Pat. Lat. lxi. 633). Rosweyd (ibid. p. 921, note 289) mentions other examples of the name Ia, remarking that it exists in modern German as Ida, Iye, Iyken. [C. H.]

IA of St. Ives, in Cornwall. [HIA.]

IABRAOTH, the leader of the six great archons who repented when Sabaoth Adama and his six persisted in disobedience. (Pisti Sophia, p. 360.) [G. S.]

IACHTANABAS, in the system of Pisti Sophia, one of the five great archons (see HECATE who preside over the punishments of the "middle region." Under him are the demons which when they enter into men lead them to accept persons, to take gifts as judges, and wrong the innocent, to forget the poor, and bestow their cares on things wherein there is no profit. Such souls are tortured in this region for 150 years and eight months. (Pistis Sophia, p. 370.)

[G. S.]

IAGO (1). Fourth bishop in the short succession at Margam before its union with Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 625, n. 2.)

(2) Ab Beli ab Rhun ab Maelgwn Gwynedd, king of North Wales A.D. 599-603, assassinated by Cadavael Wylt, king of Gwynedd. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 273, 283.)

IALDABAOTH, a being who, in the system of the Ophites, as described by Irenaeus (i. 30), and after him by Epiphanius (Haer. 37), held a place corresponding to that occupied by the Demiurgus in the system of Valentinus. The most probable derivation of the name is that given by Gieseler, son of Chaos, לְאֹהֵב כְּהוֹת. For the myth told of him, see OPHITES. In the places cited he is described as chief of the seven angels, by whom the world was made, and by whom the planets are ruled [HEBDOMAS]; but in another system described by Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91; see also Haer. 25, p. 77) he holds but the second position. Epiphanius tells that Gnostic books were current which bore the name of Ialdabaoth, or which treated of him (Haer. 25, p. 78; 26, p. 89). In the latter passage he is connected with the Sethites; and Theodoret also (Haer. Fab. v. 9) speaks of the Sethites as counting him as the framer of man. The name of Ialdabaoth does not occur in the account of Ophite and Sethite doctrine given by Hippolytus in the fifth book of his treatise against heresies, unless we adopt a very doubtful conjecture of Duncker and Schneidewin, who, at p. 104, where Esaldaeus is spoken of as the framer (δημιουργός) of this creation, propose to substitute Ialdabaoth. In PISTIS SOPHIA Ialdabaoth has sunk from his high estate and resides in chaos, where, with his forty-nine demons, he tortures wicked souls in boiling rivers of pitch, and with other punishments (pp. 257, 382). He is an archon with the face of a lion, half flame and half darkness (p. 47).

[G. S.]

IALUHAM, the satellite of Sabaoth Adamas, who gives the cup of oblivion to souls which have completed their punishment, and are about to be sent back into a body. (Pistis Sophia, p. 381.)

IAMBERT (Kemble, C. D. 106, 139). [JAENBERT.]

IAMBUS, African bishop. Syn. 2 Carth. A.D. 52 (Cyp. Ep. 57). Syn. 4, A.D. 254 (de Basilid., Cyp. Ep. 67), and in Syn. 7 Carth. A.D. 257 (de Sep. 3; Sentt. Epp. No. 47), where he is called confessor (ed. Erasmus) and bishop of Germaniana, in prov. Byzacena. His see contained a nucleus of German veterans (? the first German Christians; Fell), and subsequently had some of its arms attached to the see of Rome (see Morcelli, Chr. Christ.). It was near Aquae Regiae.

[E. W. B.]

IAO, in the Ophite system, the name of one of the archons who rule the seven heavenly spheres (Irenaeus, I. 30, p. 109; Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 31; Epiphanius, Haer. 26, p. 91). [HEBDOMAS.] In the Valentinian system, the magic word with which Horus restrained the attempts of Achamoth to enter the Pleroma (Irenaeus, I. iv. p. 91).

In the first system, though Harvey (Irenaeus, I. p. 33) has offered a more recondite explanation, there seems no reason for thinking the word anything but the Tetragrammaton יהוה, which, together with other Hebrew names for the divinity, the Ophites pressed into the service of their angelology. It would seem as if the Valentinians, ignorant of the true etymology of the word, tried to find another account for its origin in their myth of the interjection uttered by Horus. Again the Marcossian formula of redemption (Iren. I. 21, p. 96) runs in the name of Iao, "Who redeemed his soul in the living Christ." Possibly this may be the hidden name which, in the same section, we are told Jesus of Nazareth put on for the redemption of angels. From the explanations given by Irenaeus (II. 35, p. 170), and the difference which he makes between Jaoth and Jaoth, it is to be feared nothing can be gathered but the slenderness of the venerable father's knowledge of Hebrew. [HEBREW.] In the mythology of PISTIS SOPHIA there are at least two beings of the name, the little Iao ἀγαθός, from whom is derived a power which resides with John the Baptist (p. 12), and the great Iao ἀγαθός (p. 371). It is natural to infer that the system had a number of evil beings of the same name. [G. S.]

IARLAI THE (HIERLATH, HIERLATIUS)

(1), third bishop of Armagh, cir. 468, commemorated Feb. 11. He was the son of Trena, son of Fieg, descended from the Dal Fiatach, and is said to have been cousin to St. Dichu (April 29), the special friend and first disciple of St. Patrick. [DICHU.] He died in the year 482 (Ann. Tig.), and was succeeded by Corbmac as fourth bishop, St. Patrick being still alive.

(2) Bishop of Tuam, commemorated June 6 and Dec. 26. He has a memoir compiled by Colgan (Acta SS. 308-10). His first monastery is said to have been at Cluainfois, near Tuam, where he also had a school; but his chief residence was at Tuam, to which he afterwards removed, founding what became one of the famous schools of Ireland, and becoming first bishop of Tuam; he is also called archbishop of Connaught. Of his episcopal acts we hear nothing beyond his asceticism and the utterance of some prophecies regarding his see and his successors, but the genuineness of these is more than doubted (O'Reilly, Irish Writ. xxxv.). His name does not appear in the Irish Annals. As he is placed in the second class of Irish saints, we seem to come nearer the truth by saying that he was not a disciple either of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 268 b) or of St. Benignus, but flourished about the middle of the 6th century. Colgan says he founded Tuam in the year 510 and died in 540. His chief feast is Dec. 26. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 32.) [J. G.]

died 699, commemorated on Jan. 16 (O'Clery, Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 19). [COLMAN (25).] His name assumes a variety of forms, as IARLOGA, IARNLA, IARNLAIG, HIERLOG. [J. G.]

IARNOG (IERNOC), the pilgrim, commemorated July 31. He was the son of Oengus, son of Nathfraich king of Munster. He flourished in the end of the 5th century, his father having been slain A.D. 489. In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves 206 n., 207) he is called Uithir the sickly. (Colgan, Acta SS. 174, n. 13.) [J. G.]

IBAR is said, in the Life of St. Fillan (Jan. 9), to have found that saint when an infant in a lake, baptized and educated him. St. Ibar was a bishop, preached the gospel in many parts of Scotland, and died in Teviotdale. This person is perhaps to be distinguished from St. Ibhar (April 23) of Begery [IBHAR]. His feast is March 22. (Colgan, Acta SS. 49; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 236, 342, 344, 359.) [J. G.]

IBAS, bishop of Edessa c. 435-457 A.D. Ibas was a Syrian by birth. His name in Syriac is

Hiba = Donatus. We are destitute of all particulars as to his early years. He appears first as a presbyter of the church of Edessa during the episcopate of Rabbulas, and warmly espousing the theological views of which his bishop was the uncompromising opponent. Ibas was an ardent admirer of the writings of Theodore of Mopuestia, which he translated into Syriac and diligently disseminated through the East. The famous theological school of Edessa, of which, according to some accounts, Ibas was the head, and to which the Christian youth from Persia and the adjacent lands had for a considerable time resorted for education, offered great facilities for this propagation of Theodore's tenets. The growing popularity of doctrines which appeared to him decidedly heretical caused Rabbulas much alarm, and he used all his efforts to get Theodore's works anathematised and burnt. Ibas accuses him of having carried out this design in a high-handed, despotic way, more worthy of a tyrant than a bishop, and "under the cloak of orthodoxy, punishing not the living only, but the dead," and publicly before the church launching his anathemas on the writings of the blessed Theodore, because they convicted him of unsoundness in the faith (Epist. ad Marim., Labbe, Concil. iv. 662). The church of Edessa was generally favourable to Theodore's line of teaching, and Ibas was supported by the majority, in opposition to their bishop. Andrew, the venerable bishop of Samosata, the unflinching opponent of Cyril and all who ranked themselves under his banner, was consulted by Ibas and his friend whether they should publicly denounce Rabbulas, and risk a schism, and he strongly advised immediate action (Tragœd. Iren. c. xliii. Baluz. col. 748). Ibas attended the council of Ephesus in 431 A.D. as a presbyter, and was cognisant of Cyril's autocratic conduct (Epist. ad Mar. u. s.). In 433 he wrote the letter to Maris, either then or subsequently bishop of Hardschir in Persia, to which subsequent events attached a celebrity entirely unwarranted by its contents. The greater part of this letter is contained in the acts of the councils of Chalcedon (Labbe, Concil. iv. 661), and of Constantinople (ibid. v. 510), and in Facundus, Defens. trium Capitulum (lib. vi. c. 3). Maris had been at Edessa previous to the outbreak of the controversy between Nestorius and the orthodox party, and Ibas wrote to him as to a friend to acquaint him with what had occurred since his visit. This letter, though evidently written under great exasperation of feeling, shews Ibas to have been a man of independent judgment, free from party spirit. On the one hand, Nestorius is so severely censured for his refusal to allow the title θεοσώκος to be given to the Virgin, and for the incautious statements which had led many to identify his views with those of Paul of Samosata, who thought Christ to be mere man, that the indignation of Irenæus of Tyre, the unswerving adherent of Nestorius, was roused (Trag. Iren. Baluz. col. 821). On the other, he accuses Cyril of Apollinarianism, and denounces the heresy of his twelve chapters, charging him with maintaining the perfect identity of the manhood and Godhead in Christ, and denying the Catholic doctrine of the union of two Natures in One Person. He then proceeds to narrate, with strong reprobation, Cyril's conduct at Ephesus in securing the condemnation of Nestorius before the arrival of John of Antioch and the Oriental bishops, out of personal animosity, and draws a lamentable picture of the bitter animosities, suspicions, and dissensions, of which this had been the cause. He acquaints his correspondent in tone of triumph with the reconciliation which had at last been brought about between Cyril and John, on the former having accepted orthodox definitions, and begs that he will everywhere publish the victory of sound doctrine by which peace had been restored to the church, and the mid-wall of partition of enmity taken away. He tells him that the Egyptian and his party have been brought to shame and compelled to eat their own words; no one daring as heretofore to assert that the Godhead and the manhood form one nature, but acknowledging both the temple and Him that dwells therein Jesus Christ. At the same time Ibas communicated to Maris John's letter to Cyril and Cyril's reply, the perfect orthodoxy of which Ibas acknowledges, and states that on the strength of it he had reopened communications with Cyril, writing letters to him and receiving letters from him (Labbe, iv. 660, 662). On the death of Rabbulas in 435 or 436 A.D. a reactionary wave carried Ibas to the episcopal throne of Edessa. Ibas's appointment was very distasteful to those of his flock who adopted the strong anti-Nestorian views of their late bishop, and they speedily concerted measures to secure his deposition. They prepared the way by spreading charges against him, as being the cause of the dissensions between the Egyptian and Syrian bishops, and as openly preaching heretical doctrines. The sensitive orthodoxy of the monastic party was soon aroused, and Ibas was made to feel how fallacious were the hopes of a restoration of peace expressed in his letter. The accusations so industriously disseminated were not slow in reaching the ears of Theodosius and Proclus, who in 434 had succeeded Maximian patriarch of Constantinople. To the latter the matter appeared so serious that towards the close of 437 A.D. he wrote to John of Antioch, as the leading prelate of the East, though really having no canonical jurisdiction over Ōsrhoene, begging him to persuade Ibas, if innocent, to remove the scandal by condemning both publicly in his church and by his signature certain heretical propositions chiefly drawn from Theodore's writings which Proclus had annexed to a "tome," or official letter, which he was sending to the church of Armenia against the errors of Nestorius. The same demand was made by Proclus of all the Eastern bishops; but with only partial success. The letter was received without scruple by Ibas and the bishops generally, but they refused to condemn Theodore's propositions. (Labbe, v. 511-514.)

But though for the present foiled, the malignant faction at Edessa maintained the same hostile attitude to their bishop. They watched his words and actions with jealous vigilance, and eagerly noted everything that might swell the roll of charges they were secretly preparing to bring forward at a favourable moment. The leaders of the cabal were four presbyters, Samuel, Cyrus, Eulogius, and Maras, acting at the instigation of one of Ibas's own suffragans, Uranius bishop of Himeria, a pronounced Eutychnian. Samuel had a private grudge against his bishop, who some years before had taken him to task for stating in a sermon that "the Life had suffered death," and had inhibited him from preaching. (Labbe, iv. 654.) Domnus, who had in 442 succeeded his uncle John as bishop of Antioch, visiting Hierapolis for the enthronisation of the new bishop Stephen, the conspirators chose that moment for action. Cyrus and Eulogius formally laid before Domnus the accusation against Ibas, signed by about seventeen of the clergy of Edessa, and supported by as many as thirty. (Labbe, v. 658.) It was asserted also that the charge was backed by many of the leading laymen of the city and military officers. (Labbe, v. 512.) Ibas, who was on the point of starting for Hierapolis to pay his respects to Domnus, on hearing of the accusation, at once summoned his clergy, and, after pronouncing excommunication on Cyrus and Eulogius as calumniators, warned the rest that he would treat in the same way all who participated in their proceedings. No immediate step seemed to have followed the presentation of the libel. The friends of peace, among whom the excellent Theodoret was ever the most prominent, laboured hard to restore tranquillity, but to no purpose (Theod. Epist. 111). In 445 Ibas was summoned by Domnus to the synod held at Antioch in the matter of Ebasianus of Petra, but he excused himself by letter. (Labbe, iv. 739.) The sympathies of Domnus were with Ibas rather than with his persecutors, and he shewed no readiness to enter into the charges brought against him. At last, in Lent 448, the four chief delators presented their indictment before Domnus and the council of the East in a manner too formal to be neglected. Domnus consequently summoned Ibas to appear before him after Easter to answer the charges. At the same time, by the advice of Theodoret, who was then at Antioch, he recommended him to hold off the excommunication from his accusers, in order that they might not be deprived of the Eucharist and other Christian privileges at Easter. Ibas declined to do this himself, but left the matter in the hands of Domnus, who restored them to communion on condition of their not leaving Antioch till the affair was settled, threatening those who disobeyed not with excommunication only, but deposition. (Labbe, iv. 639-643; Liberat. c. 13; Theod. Epist. 87, 111.) After Easter the council was held at Antioch. It was not attended by a large number of bishops. The existing acts bear only nine signatures. (Labbe, u. s. 643.) That of Theodoret, the warm friend of Ibas, is not among them. He was detained, to the great chagrin of Ibas's accusers, by the imperial prohibition to leave his diocese. (Theod. Ep. 87, 91, 111.) Ibas in person answered the charges laid against him. These were eighteen in number; the greater part of a frivolous character and destitute of proof. Among them was that he had appropriated a jewelled chalice to his own use; that the wine at the Eucharist was inferior both in quality and quantity; the malversation of sums given for the ransom of captives; simoniacal ordinations, and the admission of unfit persons to the ministry and even the episcopate, especially his nephew Daniel, stated to be a scandalous person, whom he had made bishop of Charrae. The most weighty charges, however, were that he had anathematised Cyril and charged him with heresy; that he was a Nestorian; and especially that at Easter 445, in the presence of his clergy, assembled according to custom to listen to the bishop's paschal address, and receive the Eulogiae or Easter gifts, he had delivered himself of the blasphemous words: "I do not envy Christ His becoming God, for I can become God no less than He." "This is the day that Jesus Christ became God." (Labbe, iv. 647-654; Liberat. c. 12.) The first of these charges he acknowledged, the others he indignantly repudiated, and denounced their authors as base slanderers. On the opening of the council only two of the four accusers appeared. Samuel and Cyrus had gone off to Constantinople, in defiance of the terms on which the excommunication had been taken off, to lay their complaint before the emperor and the patriarch, the favourable feeling of Domnus towards the accused being too evident for them to hope for an impartial trial. The question being one of facts, Domnus and the council declined to proceed with the investigation in the absence of the chief witnesses, and it would seem that the case was postponed indefinitely. (Labbe, iv. 642 sq.; Theod. Epist. 111.) Baulked of their prey, Eulogius and Maras hastened to join their fellow conspirators at Constantinople, where they found a powerful party in strong hostility to the Eastern bishops, Theodoret in particular. Their faction was soon strengthened by the arrival of Uranius, the prime mover of the whole cabal, and half a dozen more of the Edessene clergy. The emperor and Flavian, who had succeeded Proclus as patriarch, listened to their complaints, but declined to hear them officially. The case was remitted for trial to the East, and by an imperial commission, dated Oct. 26, 448, Uranius of Himeria, Photius of Tyre, just elected Sept. 9, A.D. 448, on the deposition of Irenaeus, and Eustathius of Berytus were deputed to hear it, and Damascius, the tribune and secretary of state, was despatched as imperial commissioner. Flavian deputed his deacon Eulogius to keep him informed of the proceedings. Ibas's nephew, Daniel of Charrae, and John of Theodosiopolis, were included in the indictment. The whole proceeding was manifestly illegal. It was contrary to the canons of the church that a number of bishops should be subjected to the judgment of other bishops, two belonging to another province, on the strength of an imperial decree. No one, however, protested. The imperial power was regarded as absolute, and the Christian world, weary of strife, was ready to accept any arbitration which might restore peace. The tribunal also was grossly unfair. Of the three judges, one, Uranius, was the ringleader of the movement against Ibas, and the other two were his creatures who had obtained their sees by his instrumentality. (Martin, Le Brigandage d'Éphèse, pp. 118-120.) Tyre was named as the place of trial, but the case was soon transferred to Berytus, where it was opened in the episcopal residence, Feb. 1, 449, according to Pagi (ad ann. 548, no. 9). The exasperation at Tyre, stirred up by the monks and presbyters, at the blasphemies charged against Ibas was so great that it was thought more politic to remove the trial to Berytus to avoid disturbances. (Labbe, iv. 636.) The court sat in the hall of Eustathius's episcopal residence. The bill of indictment was produced by Ibas's accusers. Ibas in reply laid before his judges a memorial signed by a large body of his clergy, denying that he had ever uttered the blasphemies attributed to him; if he had, they would have left his communion, and begging that he might be sent back to Edessa in time for the Easter duties. (Labbe, iv. 667-671.) Only three witnesses appeared to support the accusation, two of whom were deacons, David and Maras. They also urged that Ibas had treated Cyril as a heretic, and brought forward as proof the celebrated letter to Maris (ibid. 659-662). The commissioners found it prudent to decline coming to any judicial decision. From judges they became arbitrators, and persuaded both parties to acquiesce in a friendly arrangement. His enemies agreed to lay down their accusations on Ibas promising that he would forget the past, regard his accusers as his children, and, should any fresh difficulty arise, remit it for settlement to Domnus; and that, to avoid suspicion of malversation, the church revenues of Edessa should be administered, like those of Antioch, by oeconomi. Ibas gave equal satisfaction on theological points. He engaged that on his return he would publicly anathematise Nestorius and all who thought with him, and declared the identity of his doctrine with that agreed upon by John and Cyril, and that he accepted the decrees of Ephesus equally with those of Nicaea as due to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. The concordat was signed, Uranius alone dissenting, Feb. 25, A.D. 449. (Labbe, u. s. 630-648.)

The truce thus made had no elements of permanence, and a very few weeks saw it thrown to the winds. The Eutychnian party had resolved on the ruin of Ibas, and, irritated at their failure at Berytus, left no stone unturned to secure this end. All powerful at Constantinople through the intrigues of Chrysaphius, Dioscorus and his partisans easily obtained from the feeble emperor, indignant at the condemnation of Eutyches, an edict summoning a general council to meet at Ephesus on the 1st of the ensuing August. Before this could meet, much could be done to punish Ibas for his dangerous good fortune in securing his acquittal. The reports diligently spread in Edessa of Ibas's heterodoxy during his absence had poisoned the minds of his people against him. His reception was so unfavourable that he was obliged to consult his safety by leaving the town and calling upon the 'magister militiae' for a guard to protect his person. He soon discovered that all appeal to the civil power was idle; he was regarded as a public enemy, who was to be crushed at all hazards. The count Chaereas as civil governor of Osrhoene, but with secret instructions from Constantinople, emanating from Chrysaphius and Eutyches, was deputed to arrest and imprison him, and reopen the suit against him. When Chaereas entered Edessa, April 12, 449, to commence the trial, he was met by a turbulent body of abbats and monks and their partisans, male and female, clamouring very furiously for the immediate expulsion and condemnation of Ibas and his Nestorian crew. Ibas was "a second Judas," "an adversary of Christ," an "offshoot of Pharaoh." "To the fire with him and all his race." Two days afterwards the enquiry began in the continued absence of Ibas, in the midst of the same violent and disorderly interruptions. All Edessa knew that Chaereas had come not to hold a legitimate investigation, but to ratify a sentence of condemnation already passed, under the colour of judicial proceedings. Chaereas, however, was moving too slowly for their hatred. His pace needed to be accelerated by pressure from without. The populace of Edessa were therefore adroitly plied with highly coloured statements of the enormities of which Ibas had been guilty, and on the following Sunday, April 17, the excitement of the people assembled in the church for worship was so violent that the count was compelled to quiet them by the promise that the verdict of the synod of Berytus should be reviewed, and a new investigation commenced. This began the next day; all the old charges were reproduced by the same accusers as before, amid wild yells of "Ibas to the gallows, to the mines, to the circus, to exile," drowning every attempt at explanation or defence. The issue was what had been determined from the beginning. Chaereas addressed a report to the imperial government, declaring the charges against Ibas proved, and on the 27th June the emperor acknowledged the receipt of the document, and commanded that a bishop should be substituted for Ibas, who would command the confidence of the faithful. (Perry, The Second Synod of Ephesus; Martin, Le Brigandage d'Éphèse, livre ii. ch. ix.) His deposition could only take place at a legally constituted synod, but meanwhile the malice of his enemies could be gratified by his maltreatment. He was forbidden to enter Edessa, apprehended and treated as the vilest of criminals, being dragged about from province to province, so that he changed his quarters forty times and had experience of twenty different prisons. (Labbe, iv. 634; Liberat. c. 12; Facundus, lib. vi. c. 1.) The council of Ephesus, so notorious for the scandalous violence of its proceedings, which gained for it, from Leo the Great (Epist. 95), the title of the

"Gang of Robbers," opened on the 3rd of the following August. One of the objects for which it had been convened was to get rid finally of Ibas. This was the work of the second session, held on Aug. 22. Ibas was not cited to appear; indeed to have done so would have been a mockery, as he was then in prison at Antioch. (Labbe, iv. 626, 634.) Before the witnesses were allowed to enter, the three bishops who had conducted the investigation at Tyre and Berytus were requested to give some account of their proceedings. Instead of declaring the fact that, after examination made, they had acquitted Ibas of the charges laid, these miserable men made some pitiful excuses as to their inability to arrive at the truth from the distance of the place of trial to Edessa, and endeavoured to shift the whole burden from their shoulders by reminding them that an investigation had subsequently been held at Edessa itself, which had received the approbation of the emperor, and that the wisest course for the council would be to enquire what was the decision there arrived at before proceeding with their own investigation. This advice was followed. The monks of Edessa and the other parties to the indictment were admitted, and the whole of the depositions and correspondence read to the assembly. The termination of the reading of the document was the signal for an outburst of wild maledictions, invoking every kind of vengeance, temporal and eternal, on the head of this "second Iscariot," this "veritable Satan." "Nestorius and Ibas should be burnt alive together. The destruction of the two would be the deliverance of the world." Enlogius, the presbyter of Edessa, who had been one of the first accusers of Ibas before Domnus, followed with a summary of the proceedings from their commencement, specifying all the real or supposed crimes laid to his charge. The question of deposition was then put to the council, and carried without a dissentient voice. Among those who voted for it were Eustathius of Berytus and Photius of Tyre, who had previously acquitted him on the same evidence. The sentence was that he should be deposed from the episcopate and priesthood, deprived even of lay communion, and compelled to restore the money of which it was pretended he had robbed the poor. So ended the trial which has made so much noise in history. Ibas, twice acquitted, was condemned without being heard, without even being summoned; and no protest was raised in his favour, not even by those who, a few months before, had honoured him with their suffrage. (Martin, livre iii. ch. ii. u. s. p. 181; Labbe, iv. 674; Chron. Edess. anno 756; Asseman. Bibl. Or. i. 202.) We have no certain knowledge of what befel Ibas on his deposition. Assemani asserts that he took refuge with Theodoret in the monastery of Apamea, but he gives no authority for his statement. A letter written to him by Theodoret to encourage him under his calamities, and sent by a presbyter named Ozeas, proves that at that time, and for some time previously, they had not been together (Theod. Epist. 132). The sudden death of the feeble Theodosius, which occurred in less than a year, followed by the elevation of the orthodox Marcian to the imperial throne, and the execution of Chrysaphius, brought about a complete revolution in ecclesiastical affairs. At the beginning of 451 A.D. the deposed and banished bishops were allowed to return from exile, but the question of their restoration to their sees was reserved for the consideration of the general council which had been summoned, and which met in October at Chalcedon. In the 9th session, Oct. 26, after the restoration of his faithful friend Theodoret, the case of Ibas came before the assembled bishops. On his demand to be restored in accordance with the verdict of Photius and Eustathius at Berytus and Tyre, the acts of that synod were read, and the decision deferred till the morrow.

The next day, on the opening of the session, the legates of the pope gave their opinion that Ibas, as being unlawfully deposed, should be at once restored. Several of the bishops opposed this, and desired a fuller investigation. Some persons who were present to bear witness against him having declined to proceed, the council contented itself with having the acts of the synod of Berytus read, concluding with the celebrated letter to Maris. (Labbe, iv. 635-666.) Ibas followed with the memorial of his clergy in his favour, produced at Berytus. (Ibid. 666-671.) The proposition that the acts of the "Latrocinium" should be read was negatived by the papal legates, and after some discussion on that point, the restoration of Ibas was put to the vote and carried unanimously. The legates led the way, declaring his letter orthodox, and commanding his restitution. All the prelates agreed in this verdict; Juvenal alone, whose complicity in the "Latrocinium" might have well kept him silent, qualifying his vote by some depreciatory expressions to the effect that he was a repenting heretic, who had seen the error of his ways, and whose advanced years demanded compassion. (Ibid. 678.) The condition of his restoration was that he should anathematise both Nestorius and Eutyches, and accept the tome of Leo. Ibas consented to these terms without any difficulty. "He had anathematised Nestorius already in his writings, and would do so again ten thousand times, together with Eutyches, and all who teach the One Nature, and would accept all that the council holds as truth." On this he was unanimously absolved, and restored to his episcopal dignity, and voted as bishop of Edessa at the subsequent sessions. (Labbe, iv. 793, 799; Facundus, lib. v. c. 3.) Nonnus, who had been chosen bishop on his deposition, being legitimately ordained, was allowed also to retain his episcopal rank, and on Ibas's death, Oct. 28, 457, quietly succeeded him as metropolitan. (Labbe, iv. 891, 917.) The fictions invented to save the credit of the council of Chalcedon, that Ibas had disowned the letter to Maris, at Chalcedon (Greg. Magn. lib. viii. ep. 14), as he was asserted by Justinian to have done before at Berytus, as having been forged in his name, are thoroughly disproved by Facundus (lib. v. c. 2, lib. vii. c. 5). This is not the place to enter on the controversy concerning his letter to Maris, which arose in the next century, in the notorious dispute about the "Three Articles," when the letter was branded as heretical, together with the works of Theodoret of Mopsuestia and Theodoret's writings in favour of Nestorius, in the edict of Justinian, and was formally condemned in 553 A.D. by the fifth general council, which pronounced an anathema, in bold defiance of historical fact, against all who should pretend that it and the other documents impugned had been recognised as orthodox by the council of Chalcedon. (Evang. H. E. iv. 38; Labbe, v. 562-567.) Ibas is anathematised by the Jacobites in their profession of faith as a Nestorian. (Asseman. tom. i. p. 202.) According to the chronicle of Edessa, Ibas, during his episcopate, erected the new Church of the Apostles at Edessa, to which a senator gave a silver table of 720 lbs. weight, and Anatolius, praefectus militum, a silver coffer to receive the relics of St. Thomas the Apostle, who was said, after preaching in Parthia, to have been buried there. (Socr. H. E. iv. 18.)

Ibas's literary work lay more as a translator and disseminator of the writings of others than as an original author. His translations of the theological works of Theodoret of Mopsuestia, Diodorus of Tarsus, Theodoret, and Nestorius himself, were actively spread through Syria, Persia, and the East, and were very influential in fostering the Nestorianising tenets which have, even to the present day, characterised the Christians of those regions. His influence was permanent in the celebrated theological school of Edessa, in spite of the efforts of Nonnus to eradicate it, until its final overthrow, and the banishment of its teachers to Persia. (Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. tom. xv.; Asseman. Bibl. Orient. tom. i. pp. 199 sq., tom. iii. pp. lxx.-lxxiv.; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 426; Facundus, Defens. Christ. ii. 502.) [S. A. B.]

IBERIAN CHURCH. The early history of the Iberian or Georgian Church is wrapped in fable. St. Andrew, Simon the Canaanite and Elioz, the soldier who obtained the Lord's coat by lot, are said to have been the first evangelists of this country, where too the children of Barabbas the robber are said to have taken refuge after the destruction of Jerusalem (Klaproth in Jour. Asiatique, 1834, t. xiii. p. 47). The national conversion, however, of Georgia was not effected till about the same time as that of Armenia, at the conclusion of the 3rd or beginning of the 4th century. Some fix it at 276; others, as Brosset, at 318; and Baronius, at 327; others at 335 A.D. It was brought about by a pious woman, St. Nina, Nino, Nunia, or Nouni (NINA), from Cappadocia, with her companions, Ripsima and Gaiana (Moses Chor. ii. 83), whose exertions were rewarded by the conversion of the King Mirian, the first of the line of Chosroes who sat on the Georgian throne. Nina was related to St. GEORGE, the great martyr, whence according to some the name by which the district is now distinguished. Her history will be found detailed at length in the almost contemporary historian Rufinus (H. E. i. 10), who claims to have heard the story at Jerusalem from the Armenian prince Bacurius, who then held the position of Domesticorum Comes among the Romans, and did the state great service as a general. (Cf. Soc. H. E. i. 20; Sozom. H. E. ii. 7; Theodoret, H. E. i. 24; all of whom, however, only repeat or enlarge the story of Rufinus.) Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. ii. 83) tells the same story, quoting it from the Armenian historian Agathangelus. (Cf. Langlois, Hist. Graec. Frag. t. v. pars i. p. 136, for remains of this author.) We may therefore conclude that St. Nina is a historical character. During the 4th century the Georgian church on the whole prospered. The Patriarch Eustathius of Antioch is said to have come into Georgia to establish the people in the faith, when he consecrated a certain John as first bishop of Iberia. The Georgian church had, indeed, during this century an attack of Arianism at the hands of its patriarch Mobidakh, and of heathenism under the apostate king Miridates IV. During the 5th century its fortune was similar to that of the neighbouring church of Armenia. It received a great literary impulse at the hands of the Armenian scholar Mesrobes, who invented for it an alphabet of thirty-eight letters, and assisted in the translation of the Scriptures and church Services into the vernacular out of the Greek, in which they had been hitherto read (Moses of Chorene, Hist. Arm. iii. 54). The Iberian church continued in subjection to the Patriarch of Antioch till about A.D. 556, when the Catholicus Pharsman III. severed the ancient connexion, a separation which was finally completed by the Catholicus Saba in 601. Between 596 and 615 a separation took place between the Iberians and the Armenians, the former adhering to the decrees of Chalcedon, while the latter took the Monophysite side. In the beginning of the 5th century according to some, in the middle of the 6th century according to others, A.D. 541-555, there was a great revival of religion under the preaching of the "Thirteen Syrian Fathers," led by a certain John, celebrated as an ascetic and saint in the Georgian Calendar on May 7. The names of his companions were Habibus, Antonius, David, Tenon, Thaddaeus, Jesse, Joseph, Isidore, Michael, Piros, Stephanos, Shio, and the deacon Elias, attendant upon John. From the same Syria came Manichæan, or perhaps Mazdakite, missionaries according to Renan (quoting the Armenian historian Samuel of Ani in Jour. Asiat. 1853, t. ii. p. 431) in A.D. 590; according to Joselian's History of Georgia, trans. by Malan, p. 82, in A.D. 650. Both authorities agree, however, in stating that they were forcibly expelled, though Samuel of Ani regrets that they left their Manichæan works behind them, among which were the Repentance and the Testament of Adam, whence spread many wild Gnostic and Cabbalistic ideas among them and their Armenian neighbours, as can easily be proved by a comparison between the Apocalypse of Adam, published by Renan, l.c., and the opening of the Hist. Chronol. of Mkhithar of Airavank, in the Mém. d'Acad. de St. Pétersbourg, t. xiii. 1869. Though the Manichæan leaders were expelled, their doctrines remained, as we find that Armenia and its neighbourhood afforded large supplies of Manichæan allies to Leo the Isaurian and the iconoclastic emperors of the 8th century [ICONOCLASTÆ]. From the middle of the 5th to the middle of the 7th the Iberian church suffered much from Persian invasions. The Persians were finally expelled in 642 by Stephen I., to be succeeded, however, by a greater woe in the shape of the Saracens, who first invaded it under Mirvan, Mahomet's nephew. During the 8th century there were two terrible Saracen invasions, one at the beginning, the other towards the end thereof. The further history of the Iberian church lies beyond our period; let it suffice to say that it has always held fast to its early faith, and has even in these latter times shewn some symptoms of that literary spirit which rendered glorious the earliest days of Armenian and Iberian Christianity. (Joselian's Hist. of the Georgian Ch., trans. by Charles C. Malan; Mém. sur la Relig. Chrét. en Georgie, by M. Rottiers in Jour. Asiat. sér. i. t. xi. Paris, 1827; Le Quien, Or. Christ. t. i. p. 1333.) Those desirous of pursuing the subject of the modern history, language, literature, &c. of Georgia, will find ample materials in the first, second, and third series of the Jour. Asiatique. See specially a History of Armenia, written by Vakhtang, a Georgian prince at the beginning of the last century, and trans. by Klapproth, t. xii. Dec. 1833, p. 519, continued in t. xiii. In trois<sup>e</sup>. sér. t. xiv. pp. 505-506, A.D. 1842, there will be found a general index, where, under head of Georgie and Georgien, are references to a vast number of memoirs on this subject by the most eminent French Orientalists of that time, cf. Jour. Asiat. 1850, t. xv. pp. 48-86. The Mém. de l'Acad. de St. Pétersbourg and the Bullet. de l'Acad. St. Pétersbourg have also many valuable papers by Brosset, some of which we have quoted. [G. T. IBHAR (EBUR, IBERIAN, IBERIUS, YBOR), bishop of Begery, commemorated April 23. St. Ibar is spoken of in the legends of the middle ages as one of the four bishops who preached the gospel in Ireland before the arrival of St. Patrick, but this probably had its origin in the desire to oppose the primal claims of the see of Armagh. In the older Lives he assumes the more probable position of disciple of St. Patrick. Dr. Todd attaches him to a southerly tribe, the Ui-Eachach Uladh in Iveagh, co. Down (Reeves, Ecll. Ant. 334 sq., 348 sq.; Ussher, Brit. Ecll. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 335-6). He is first found in the Arran Isles in Galway Bay, and then in the plain of Geshille, King's County. But St. Ibar's most celebrated residence was on the island of Begery, in Wexford Haven. There he had a famous school, to which they came from all quarters of Ireland, and a house for monks, clergy, and others. When he became a bishop is not known. He seems, however, to have had nothing to do with the episcopate at Kildare, though he may have been a friend of St. Bridgeta's (Feb. 1). He died at Begery in the year 503 (Ann. Tig. ap. O'Conor, Reer. Hib. Script. ii. 127), or perhaps with greater probability in A.D. 500 (O'Conor, ib. ii. 127, n. <sup>o</sup>), which is the date given by the Four Masters, at the fabulous age of 303, as stated in the Irish Annals, or 350, as given in the Annales Cambrenses (Mon. Hist. Brit. 830). His memory was deeply revered in Leinster, and a curious story is told (Journ. Kilken. Archaeol. Assoc. iv. 90, new ser.) of a wooden image which was long preserved in Begery for worship and for taking oaths, and was called St. Iberian. Among the wonders attributed to him is that of driving the rats from the district of Fernegina in Leinster, as related by Giraldus Cambrensis (Top. Hib. Dist. ii. c. 32). (Lanigan, *Ecll. Hist. ICONOCLASTAE (εικονοκλάσαι, θυμολέοντες, χριστιανοκατήγοροι, Johan. Damasc., and Niphorus; εικονομάχοι, χριστομάχοι, Theod. Stud., HAGIOCAUSTAE). In the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, under the head of IMAGES, there will be found an exhaustive statement (1) of the position taken up by the church of the first three centuries upon the question of images; and (2) of their gradual introduction into the Christian church. To the history of images and their religious use as there stated we have nothing to add. Our task will be to treat of them so far as they have been in any degree a subject of controversy during the first eight centuries. We shall therefore, as far as possible, avoid the ground already covered by that article, simply discussing the iconoclastic controversy in its rise, its development, its final issue, noting, as we pass, the circumstances and tendencies—political, religious, and philosophical—which so completely altered the church's standpoint on this question.

We may divide the history of the controversy thus: (1) from the apostles to the time of Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 717; (2) from Leo the Isaurian to the final triumph of the image worshippers in A.D. 842.

During the first three centuries this controversy can scarcely be said to have arisen. No more conclusive proof of this can be given than a comparison, which can be very easily made, between the apologies addressed to Jews or Gentiles by Clement of Alexandria, by Origen, by Justin, or Minucius Felix, with those addressed to the same classes some four or five hundred years later by Leontius of Cyprus, A.D. 600, or John of Damascus, A.D. 730. In the former case, the Christian writers glory in their rejection of images. In the latter, they are perpetually on the defence against the assaults of Jews and Saracens on this special point. Dr. Pusey has, however, examined the alleged proofs of image worship in the early church with great learning and minuteness in a note to cap. xvi. of the Apolog. of Tertullian in the Oxford Library of the Fathers, and has shewn conclusively that it had no existence therein. (Cf. Roma Sotter. t. ii. by Brownlow and Northcote for what can be said on the other side.)

In the beginning of the 4th century we find this question making its first appearance within the bounds of the church as an internal controversy. At the council of Elvira, in 305 or 306, according to Hefele, we discover the first trace of it in the 36th canon, "Placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur." We must conclude then that, in Spain at least, some of the new converts, many of whom may have been wealthy, as the 40th canon implies,* were introducing pictures into the churches.

The next trace of this controversy which we discover is in the celebrated correspondence between Eusebius and Constantia, widow of the emperor Licinius, sister of Constantine the Great and an Arian. This lady, probably between 323 and 327, wrote to Eusebius asking for an image or picture of our Saviour. To this request he replied in a letter which, however its arguments may be regarded, is conclusive as to the practice of the church of the Nicene age. As this letter formed the ground round which, during the controversies of the 8th and 9th ages, and specially at the councils of 754 and 787, many a hard-fought battle raged, we give the essential portions of it, as it is found in the completest shape in the latest authority (Niceph. Antirrheth. c. ix. in Pitra, Spic. Solesm. t. i. p. 383). "Since you have written to me concerning an image of Christ, what kind of image then do you seek? Whether is it of that true nature which in His substance bears His character (χαρακτήρα), or of that form of a servant which He assumed for us? Since, then, He is composed of a double form, I do not think thou art solicitous about that form of God concerning which we were once taught by Him that no one knows the Father save the Son, and no one knows the Son save the Father who begot Him. Thou askest then, unless I am deceived, for an image of the form of a servile body which He assumed for us. But we learn that it has been mixed with the glory of the Deity, and that its mortal part has been swallowed up of life. Nor can we conceive what He is like now, after His return to heaven, since when God's Word was among men, granting a vision of His kingdom as a kind of foretaste and pledge, He transfigured the form of a slave and shewed it superior to human nature, when His countenance shone as the sun and His clothing as light. Who therefore can paint in dead colours the splendour of such glory and majesty as His disciples could not look upon? If, therefore, His form in the flesh could obtain such power from God dwelling in it, what must it have been when, mortality being discarded, it has changed the form of a slave into the glory of God? Now His body has been transfigured, and has become immortal and incorruptible, and has been transferred into the light ineffable, most suitable to God the Word. How, therefore, will any one attempt the impossible? How delineate the image of that admirable and incomprehensible (ἀληπτος) form, if we may call that divine and intellectual (νοερός) nature a form? unless indeed we shall act like heathen painters, delineating things in no way like their archetypes. If you desire, again, an image of the servile body before it was changed into God, dost thou not remember God's command, 'Thou shalt not make to thyself the likeness of anything in heaven above,' &c.? Dost thou not know that such things are specially forbidden by the universal church?" He then proceeds to mention two facts which illustrate the church's decided opposition to images in any shape: (1) that he once met a girl bearing about two paintings, which she said were St. Paul and the Saviour, which he took from her, "since," said he, "I do not think such things should be let loose among the vulgar, lest we seem to turn our God into an image. For I hear Paul teaching that we all should no longer cling to carnal things; and if we have known Christ according to the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more." (2) He tells the empress that the heretics have images of Simon Magus and of Manes, which they worship, and then adds, "May such things be far from us, that we, as pure in heart, may truly deserve to see God." Such is the substantial argument of the letter to which the patriarch Nicephorus, A.D. 800, in the work discovered by cardinal Pitra, devotes a lengthened reply, seizing with great skill upon the many vantage points which the letter affords, as Eusebius again and again expresses himself with the theological inaccuracy which characterises so many of the ante-Nicene fathers. Here we may just note that Eusebius in this letter suggested the line of thought which the Iconoclasts adopted and worked out; nay, even the very language they used when he spoke of the glorified humanity of the Saviour as changed into God, and therefore "incomprehensible," "unbounded," "uncircumscribed," "ἄλητος," and incapable of delineation in a limited and circumscribed figure. In opposition to this, as they said, Monophysite view, the image worshippers contended for the reality and limitation of His glorified body and the consequent possibility of its delineation, which, of course, apparently placed them on the side of Catholic orthodoxy as against heresy. This much we say by anticipation that the reader may see the important bearing of this document upon the entire controversy. As to the practice and belief of the church at that period, this letter, in union with the decree of Elvira, is decisive, and shews that though some attempts had been made to innovate upon the ancient rule, no church sanction could as yet be pleaded for such action. Two other documents have come to light of late years which establish the same conclusion though from opposite points of view, viz., the works of Macarius Magnes, a writer of the 3rd or 4th century, published at Paris in 1877, and the Antirrhet. of Nicephorus, by Card. Petra in his Solism. Spicileg. t. i. The arguments of Macarius Magnes were pressed by the Iconoclasts at the time of the second Nicene council and were answered by Nicephorus [MACARIUS MAGNES]. During the rest of the 4th century we discover no further trace of this question as a controversy, though the use of painting was gradually introduced more and more, as we learn, for instance, from the oration of Gregory of Nyssa upon the martyr Theodore (Migne, Patr. Graec. xli. 738), where we are told that the scenes of martyrdom were depicted upon the wall of the church, but with express mention that it was for instruction, not for reverence or worship. The case of Paulinus at Nola, discussed in the DICTIONARY OF ANTIQ. (l. c.), shews the same tendency in the West, while the celebrated destruction of the painted curtain at Bethlehem by St. Epiphanius proves that the introduction of paintings in any shape was distasteful to very many. This is the first instance of Iconoclasm in the history of the Christian church, one which afforded much trouble to John of Damascus, and of which he could only dispose by declaring, in his first oration, the story to be a forgery. The circumstances are related in Epiphanius's own letter to John of Jerusalem (Hieron. Epist. li. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 517-527). This letter proves that Epiphanius held the strictest view, and regarded any use of pictures in the church as wrong. It is abundantly evident, however, that the laxer view was widely prevalent by the year 400. Yet that no reverence or adoration of any kind was paid to such pictures between 400 and 420, is shewn by two pieces of evidence both of a negative and yet most convincing character. (1) Vigilantius seems to have been a very keen censor of the errors of his time. He condemns and ridicules relic worship, invocation of saints and martyrs, use of lights, masses at the graves of the martyrs, and monasticism. Yet he never once hints at image worship as an existing evil. (2) St. Augustine, in commenting upon Psalm cxlii. 5, and in Ep. 102, ad Deograt., speaks of the special danger connected with images, refuting the argument of the pagans, who, taught by the Neoplatonic philosophy, anticipated the favourite defence of image worship put forth by the second Nicene council. St. Augustine would not sanction any relative worship which says "nec simulacrum, nec daemonium colo, sed effigiem corporalem ejus rei signum intueor, quam colere debeo." He expressly mentions and repudiates the distinction between λατρεία and προσκύνησις as applied to images<sup>b</sup> (Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. xxxvii. 1483; cf. also Hagenbach, Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalt. ii. 42, and Neander, H. E. iii. 407-418, where are given other testimonies against the practice drawn from Asterius, Amphilochius, and other writers of the 4th century). The introduction into churches of mosaics and paintings of all kinds became universal during the 5th century. The Holy Ghost was commonly represented as a golden dove, placed over the altar and over the font (Amphiloch. Vita S. Basil. c. vi.; Ambros. Lib. de-ius qui Myst. Usit. c. iii.; Du Cange, s. v. Columba; Fleury, H. E. lib. xxx. c. 18). The Nestorian controversy also gave a great impetus to the introduction of pictures of the Blessed Virgin and the Holy Child Jesus; while, again, the Eutychian discussions, by emphasising the real and continuous existence of His glorified humanity, intensified the tendency to honour Christ's image, which, as many believed, testified to this truth. Two other circumstances accelerated during this century the aesthetic movement within the church. (1) The patronage of the imperial family and of the wealthy classes who followed their example. By them magnificent churches were built, into whose decoration the most expensive paintings were introduced without remonstrance. Kugler (Handbook of Painting, pp. 25-28) mentions mosaics of the 5th century as still existing in the cathedral at Ravenna, and a full-length picture of Christ in the monumental chapel of the empress Galla Placidia in the same place. (2) The desire to make the transition from heathenism to Christianity as easy as possible, by Christianising every custom which possibly could be adopted.

The development of image worship from this point was very rapid, as is minutely traced in the DICTIONARY OF ANTIQ. (Art. CROSS; CRUCIFIX; IMAGES), till the church, in its Eastern division especially, was wholly devoted to the practice. Yet we are not to imagine that a change so complete and so striking took place without occasional protests, even in the 5th and 6th centuries. Such protests from time to time were made; but unfortunately the history of them must always be derived from opponents. We possess, however, indirect evidence of high value on this point. Montanists, Novatians, Nestorians, Eutychians, all of whom broke with the church before 452, preserved in their constitution and doctrine clear proof that image-worship was not then an authoritative church-practice (DICT. OF ANT. Vol. I. p. 820). [NOVATIANISM.] To this day the Nestorians have no images in their churches, and the Monophysites have, from the first, been opposed to the use of any images save that of the cross. Thus we find at the end of the 5th century, or beginning of the 6th, Xenaias, or Philoxenus, the Monophysite bishop of Hierapolis, taught that the angels were incorporeal; he would not allow them to be represented with human bodies; he held that Christ was dishonoured by pictorial representations of His body; that the only worship acceptable to Him was purely spiritual, and that it was a childish thing to represent the Holy Ghost under the form of a dove. He therefore destroyed the images of angels and hid those of Jesus Christ (Fleury, H. E. l. xxx. s. 18). A little later (A.D. 518) the clergy of Antioch complained of their patriarch Severus, who was also a Monophysite, to the patriarch John of Constantinople and his synod, charging him with heathen and magical practices, and also with melting down the doves of silver and gold usually suspended over the altars and fonts, saying that they ought not to represent the Holy Spirit in such a manner (Fleury, H. E. l. xxxi. s. 39; Du Pin, on council of C. P., A.D. 536, in H. E. t. i. p. 701, Dub. ed. 1723). In Mansi, t. xiii. p. 318; we have formal testimony to this opposition of the early Monophysites to image-worship from Epiphanius, the authorised advocate of images at the second Nicene council. In the West again we find Serenus bishop of Marseilles demolishing the images and casting them out of the churches in the beginning of the 7th century. The letters of Gregory the Great to Serenus, an accurate analysis of which will be found in Fleury (H. E. lib. xxxvi. 9 and 35), Neander (v. 275), and the article on images in DICT. OF ANTIQ. shew clearly that the church-teachers in the West held very moderate views on this question. Gregory praises Serenus for his zeal against image worship, but thinks pictures in churches useful for those who cannot read. From outside the church the Jews and Saracens kept up, during the 7th century, incessant reproaches against this practice. The Apology of Leontius of Cyprus (A.D. 600), directed against the Jews, shews us the arguments by which image-worship was defended. It will, perhaps, save time to remark that this work of Leontius seems to have been the storehouse whence all later advocates of images derived their weapons, as his arguments are identical with those used by Bede (A.D. 710) in his work De Templ. Salom. c. xix., in Opp. t. 8, p. 40, ed. Colon. 1688; by Gregory II. in his letters to Leo the Isaurian; by Joan. Damasc. in his orations for images (730), and by the 2nd Nicene council. Leontius argued that the Mosaic law was not directed unconditionally against all devotional use of images, but only against the idolatrous use of them, since the temple and tabernacle both had their images, as the cherubim, the brazen oxen, &c. He argues that in the Old Testament the ceremony of prostration sometimes occurs as a mark of respect even to men, and therefore could not by any means imply the notion of idolatry. He refers to the cures said to have been wrought by means of images. Summing up all, he says, "The images are not our gods, but they are the images of Christ and His saints, which exist and are venerated in remembrance and in honour of these, and as ornaments of the churches."

We have already noted some circumstances which aided the progress of image-worship, but it might fairly be asked, Were these sufficient to work such a radical change? We certainly think not. Christianity resisted the might of Rome for three centuries, and were there not some deeper and subtler influences at work we do not believe that she would have changed her position when the Caesars treated her with smiles instead of frowns. In our view the seeds of this change, pregnant with such vast results, were sown in the 3rd century by the philosophy of Origen and the Alexandrian school. That philosophy was in its essential principles, whether taught by Philo, Ammonius Saccas, Clemens Alexandrinus, or Origen, essentially the same. The limits of this article necessarily forbid us to adduce the proofs of this position, which will, however, be found in abundance in Neander, H. E. i. 29-48, 68-84, as concerning heathen and Jewish Neo-Platonism, and in a lengthened and able treatise on the Christian Alexandrian school (t. ii. 224-266). Its teachers, Christian and Pagan alike, were all agreed in adopting the aristocratic principles of the Platonic philosophy, which distinguishes between the position of the multitude, whose views of religion are gross and carnal, and that of spiritual men who rise above the sensuous and soar upwards to the supreme original essence. With this view they all connected a method of allegorising or of symbolical interpretation, whereby it was possible to spiritualise and appropriate every part of existing religious systems, teaching that they were useful for the gross multitude who could rise no higher, while the spiritual man used them as types and symbols of eternal realities. This philosophy, as taught by Origen, though its author lived and died under suspicion, powerfully affected the whole Christian world, and influenced, like all great spiritual movements, even those who were most fiercely opposed to it. Through Gregory Thaumaturgus in the 3rd century, through Pamphilus, Eusebius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus in the 4th, the teaching of the Alexandrian school permeated the whole church; and as it had taught Dio Chrysostom under Trajan, Porphyry, Hierocles, Theotecnus, Julian, Hypatia, and the rest of the Neo-Platonic school to spiritualise the cultus of heathen idols, so it prepared the ground for the same view of Christian art. The influence of Origen became at last triumphant in the 6th century through the pretended works of Dionysius the Areopagite, which, by their higher mysticism, intensified the movement towards image worship. "Precisely as, in earlier times, Platonism had attached itself to the pagan cultus, and to the hierarchical system of paganism, out of which combination arose a Mystico-theurgical system of religion, so we find a theurgical system or mystical symbolism of this sort, formed out of a mixture of Christianity and Platonism, completely elaborated in the writings forged under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite" (Neander, iii. 497; cf. Westcott on Dionysius Areopag. in Contemporary Review, May 1867, sec. viii.). In accordance with this view of Origen's influence upon the church, we find that John of Damascus, the fathers of the second Nicene council, and Nicephorus the Patriarch appeal for support more frequently to the writings of the followers of Origen, to Basil, the Gregories, and Dionysius than to those of any others (Ueberweg, Hist. of Philosophy, ed. Porter, p. 325, chap. on Patristic Philosophy after Council of Nice).

Another influence which helped to change the position of the Church was the adoration of relics and invocation of saints, both of which practices were sternly suppressed by Constantine Copronymus as the logical antecedents of image worship. Porphyry witnesses to the belief in the power of relics during the 3rd century, as he ascribes to the tricks of devils the miracles asserted to be worked by them (Hieron. Cont. Vigilant.); and, as to the 4th century, that same treatise of St. Jerome, and St. Chrysostom's Orat. in Mart. (Migne, Pat. Graec. t. i. pp. 661-666) shew to what an extravagant length the cultus of relics had then proceeded (cf. story of GERVASIUS), while as to the invocation of saints the series of stories told by St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, lib. xxii.) concerning miracles worked by prayer to them, sufficiently prove how firmly established the practice was at that time (FRIDENTIUS). For men who adored the relics of the saints, and invoked the saints themselves, the transition to the adoration of the pictures of the men thus invoked would not be very difficult, since the principle involved—viz. whether worship should be paid to aught save God—had been already conceded (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctr. ii. 73, ed. Clark; Basnage, Hist. d'Église, liv. xviii.—xxiii.).

2nd Period—from Leo the Isaurian to the triumph of image-worship, A.D. 842. "At the head of the controversies by which the decline and fall of the Roman empire were materially affected we may justly rank the worship of images, so fiercely disputed in the 8th and 9th centuries, since a question of popular superstition produced the revolt of Italy, the temporal power of the popes, and the restoration of the Roman empire in the East." Such is the way in which Gibbon, in his forty-ninth chapter, introduces the history of this question. He clearly perceived its important political and religious effects, but did not see how directly this controversy resulted from the "mysterious controversies concerning the Trinity and the Incarnation," of whose progress he had already treated. Even Neander fails fully to grasp the connexion between the Eutychian, Monophysite, and Monothelite controversies and the iconoclastic movement. He seems to consider this latter an isolated phenomenon, dependent for its existence upon the iron will of the Isaurian dynasty, and not springing from any pre-existing spiritual forces. And yet it is impossible to believe that a struggle so fierce, touching men's most sacred feelings, and lasting for a century and a half, could have been maintained by any race of sovereigns unless they found spiritual as well as material support in a considerable section of the people. Such support, we believe, the Isaurian dynasty did find, as the iconoclastic movement was the natural outcome of the Monophysite view of Christ's person. We may, in fact, sum up the matter thus. Hitherto we have been tracing a superstitious movement, whose roots extend backwards even as far as Philo, and before the Christian era. Now we have to trace a counter-movement, whose foundations were laid in the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, at least two hundred and fifty years before its triumph. The Monophysite party had always a powerful following in the East. We have already noticed the opposition to image-worship manifested by Xenaïas and Severus, two bishops of that party between 480 and 520. We have not mentioned, however, that they both flourished under an emperor Anastasius, 492-518, who himself held Monophysite and even Manichaean views (Le Beau, l. c.) [MAZDAK]. From time to time we find other emperors upholding the same system, or the kindred Monothelitism, for though treated as a distinct heresy, this last was only a development of the older Monophysitism—Monothelitism having arisen from the attempts of the emperor Heraclius to unite the Monophysites of Armenia to the Greek church, in pursuance of which he held a conference at Hierapolis with Athanasius, the catholicus of Armenia in 629, wherein he devised a formula which satisfied the Monophysites, and gave birth to the Monothelite heresy (Mosheim, H. E. cent. vii. p. ii. c. v.; Neander, H. E. v. 242). [MONOPHYSITISM; HERACLIUS.] This system was supported by Heraclius himself and his grandson Constans II. during the first seventy years of the 7th century; and though condemned at the sixth general council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, yet found a vigorous patron in the Armenian Philip, almost the immediate predecessor of Leo the Isaurian, and who was even, if we may trust cardinal Pitra (Spicil. Solesm. t. i. p. 338, note), an iconoclast before Leo. Nicephorus, in his work De Rebus post Maurit. under the year 712, and Theophanes in his Chronographia, both testify that Philip was supported in his Monothelite views by John patriarch of Constantinople, Germanus metropolitan of Cyzicus, afterwards patriarch of Constantinople, and very many priests and senators. Again, outside the immediate bounds of the Greek church, the Monophysite party was very strong. The Armenian church was so devoted to this view as to date its era from the national council of Tiber or Tiven, at which the decrees of Chalcedon were formally rejected [ARMENIANUS] (cf. The People of Turkey, ed. Poole, Lond. 1878, t. ii. pp. 323, 325), while the entire Egyptian church and a considerable portion of the Syrian held the same doctrine. Now the essential principle of this heresy, whether we view it as Eutychianism, Monophysitism, or Monothelitism, is this—that in Christ's person His human nature, or perhaps more strictly His human body, has been absorbed into—swallowed up, we might almost say—in the divine (the very word "demersum" is used in Combefis, Hist. Monoth. p. 362, with reference to our Lord's flesh: cf. Mai, Script. Vet. vi. 422; and Acta Concil. Chalced. Actio I. in Mansi, vi. 649), and thus sharing in the attributes of the divine nature, is free from the conditions of space and time, incomprehensible, unlimited, and therefore incapable of delineation.<sup>c</sup> Such then was the state of parties in Greek Christianity, and such the tone of mind in a large section thereof at the accession of Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 716. The policy of this emperor will be detailed in the article under his name, and it will be sufficient here to state that his famous edict against images was issued in 726, in which year likewise was destroyed the great statue of Christ at Constantinople. In 731 a synodal excommunication of the Iconoclasts under Pope Gregory III., to which Leo replied by measures of war, virtually severed the Papacy and Italy from the throne of Constantinople.

The earlier years of Constantine Copronymus, who succeeded Leo in 741, were very troubled ones. His brother-in-law Artabasdas, who headed the revolt against him, proclaimed himself protector of the image-worshippers. After the conquest of Constantinople, Nov. 2, 743, and the execution of the usurper, Constantine seems to have spent nine years consolidating his power and feeling his way before he resumed the attack on images, whose supporters had proved themselves so powerful. In 752 he held throughout the East silentia, or provincial synods of clergy and laity combined, to prepare the minds of the people for his intended legislation. Constantine then summoned a general council by his own authority in 754, at which three hundred and thirty-eight bishops attended under the presidency of the aged Theodosius archbishop of Ephesus, the theological adviser of Leo thirty years before. The acts of this council are only known to us by the abstract preserved for us in the sixth action of the second Nicene council, in Mansi, xiii. 207, where their recitation and refutation occupy more than one hundred and sixty pages. Their argument against image-worship is briefly as follows, and is evidently based on the letter of Eusebius, already quoted, and upon the principles of Monophysitism. They consider the question under two heads:— (1) As regards images of Christ. (2) As regards images of the saints. With respect to images of Christ, they hold such to be unlawful on several grounds. Since the Incarnation the human nature of Christ has been deified. It therefore partakes of the properties of Deity. His human nature is therefore incomprehensible (ἀκατάληπτος) and uncircumscribed (ἀπερίγραφος), and therefore cannot be depicted within the bounds of a circumscribed figure. If it be pleaded, however, that the flesh of Christ alone is painted, as not being divine, there is a division of the substance, and consequently Nestorianism. If it be pleaded that the deified humanity is painted, but not so far forth as Christ is by nature God, then this is adding a fourth person to the Trinity. Further, Christ has left us in the eucharist the only lawful image of Himself when He said, "This is my body," &c. Again (2), as regards the images of the saints, they took different ground. Here the union of the divine and human natures did not confuse the question, as in our Lord's case. Why should not circumscribed images be made of persons whose natures were undoubtedly limited and conditioned? They, therefore, distinguished the position of Christianity as standing between, and apart from, Judaism and heathenism. It rejected on the one hand the bloody sacrifices of the Jewish law. It rejected on the other the idols of heathenism. Here, however, they took up the position of a fanatical opposition to all art. The heathen, not having the hope of a resurrection, strove to represent things as present which were absent, and thus deceived themselves by the "abominable art of painting." The saints are now at rest with God; it is therefore unlawful to represent them by a dead and hateful art discovered by pagans. They then proceed to quote authorities from the Fathers, and to prohibit the use, or possession even, of images, either in public or private, with a salutary provision added guarding against the indiscriminate destruction of rich buildings or shrines under pretence of iconoclastic zeal. They therefore decreed that no alteration was to be made in existing churches without the special permission of the patriarch and emperor. The second council of Nicaea, by the mouth of their advocate, and Nicephorus, the ablest writer on that side, in his Antirrhet., as published by cardinal Pitra in his Spicileg. Solesm. t. i. p. 338, make the following reply to this argument, which we give here, though anticipating the order of time. The iconoclasts had staked their all upon their special view of Christ's person. Their opponents therefore bent all their efforts to prove the circumscription of Christ's human nature, a conclusion which indeed necessarily results from the decrees of Chalcedon on this subject. Epiphanius, the advocate of the council, argues thus. "Christ was circumscribed according to His humanity both before and after His resurrection," quoting John xi. 15, and Acts i. 11. It is manifest, therefore, that so far as He is God, and the Word of God, He is invisible, uncircumscribed, and incomprehensible (ἀόρατος, ἀπερίγραπτος, ἀκατάληπτος), and in every place. So far as He is man He is visible and circumscribed, and therefore may be depicted within a limited and circumscribed figure (Mansi, xiii. 339). By far the ablest defence of the popular practice was that put forward by Nicephorus. At the meeting of the Nicene council he was nearly thirty years of age, and occupied the position of secretary to the imperial commissioners, John and Petronius, in which capacity he officially attended its sittings. After its dissolution he retired to a monastery, where he spent his time till A.D. 806 in study and writing. In his Antirrhet. (Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. t. i.) he deals with the arguments and quotations of the council of 754. Taking up this argument about the limitation of Christ's glorified human nature, he strove to identify the cause of the image-worshippers with that of Catholic orthodoxy, and thus ensured the final defeat of their opponents, who had chosen a line of defence which seemed heretical. On page 338 he shews that the Fathers all testify that "Christ was perfect in His divine and human natures. They openly proclaim that the distinctions and properties of each nature met in one person, without change or confusion; so that neither was Deity changed into the nature of flesh, nor the substance of flesh into Deity. Whence it results that He is circumscribed according to the flesh, uncircumscribed according to the spirit." The iconoclasts, having taken up their ground, were forced by him to work out their premises to their logical conclusions. He shews their views to be essentially doctetic. He calls them phantastici, as they seem to have adopted the idea, which, indeed, was necessarily involved in the Monophysite conception, that all the bodily actions of our Lord after His resurrection were not real, but phantastic. Cardinal Pitra (l. c.) regards their controversial defeat by Nicephorus as so complete that he describes them in a note as convicted of being men "qui humanitatem violenter ac divinam discerperent Verbi personam" (cf. Neander, H. E. v. 300, ed. Bohn, where the arguments of the two parties are ably contrasted). We have been led thus to unite the history of the two councils as the story or arguments of the one cannot be understood apart from the other. We can now make our narrative of the facts more concise. The council of 754 decreed the suspension of any clergymen who were possessed of an image, and the excommunication and punishment by the civil power of any laymen who offended thus. This enactment was not suffered to be a dead letter. The emperor first strengthened his military position by a large immigration of fierce iconoclasts, Paulicians, Manichæans, and Monophysites, from Germanicia, Doliche, Melitene, and other towns on the borders of Armenia (Finlay, ii. 55; Renan, Hist. des Langues Sémitiq. p. 281; Schmidt, Hist. des Albigeois. Some attribute to this immigration the origin of the Albigenes). He then began and maintained till the end of his reign a most vigorous persecution, which was principally directed against the monks, the most ardent champions of image-worship. Those desirous of investigating more minutely the history of this period should consult the works of the new Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. 8, p. 131, published A.D. 1853), where in relating the martyrdom of St. Andrew of Crete, they discuss the chronology and events of Constantine's reign.<sup>4</sup> He also entered (A.D. 757) into negotiations with Pepin king of France, with the double object of regaining possession of the exarchate of Ravenna, and engaging him in an opposition to images. With the embassy in 757 he sent presents, among which was an organ, which was the first seen in Western Europe (Hefele, Councils, t. iv. § 338, ed. Paris). Constantine died Sept. 14, 775, and was succeeded by his son, Leo IV., a prince of a gentle and moderate disposition, who pursued the policy which had become traditional in the Isaurian line, but who does not seem to have engaged in any active persecution. However, the seeds of reaction had been already sown. During the lifetime of Copronymus image-worship had found favour among the female members of the imperial household. His wife Irene, and his daughter Arethusa, were devoted to this practice. Severe towards his subjects who transgressed, he permitted his third wife to protect a nun who was a devoted worshipper of images, and to whom the education of this daughter was entrusted. Leo IV. died Sept. 8, 780, when IRENE his wife was proclaimed regent during the minority of her son Constantine VI. Under her name will be noticed the reactionary steps which issued in the Nicene Synod of 787. The pith of this council's work was contained in the seventh actio, where it was decreed that "the holy and venerable images may be exposed to sight, as well as the cross, both those which are made in colours, or any other kind whatsoever. That they may be placed in churches, set upon sacred vessels, upon sacerdotal vestments in houses and highways. That these images may receive kisses and reverence (ἀσπασμὸν καὶ τιμητικὴν προσκύνησιν), but may not be adored with the true adoration due to God alone (τὴν ἀληθινὴν λατρείαν)."

By the decrees and deliberations of this assembly, followed by the writings of Nicephorus and Theodorus Studita, iconoclasm received a blow from which it never fully recovered. Other circumstances also tended to ensure the triumph of the opposite view, especially the practical extinction of the Isaurian dynasty, on whose determination and iron will the movement had depended for its principal support. Constantine VI., however willing he might have been to follow the traditional policy of his house, was mentally unfitted for doing so by the education his mother had given him, and physically incapacitated by the same mother, in the circus locked in the embrace of women of ill-fame. The author of St. Stephen's Life, for instance, in the Analecta Græca, t. i. 446, 454, published by the Maurinians, thus describes the alterations made by Constantine in a church of the Virgin Mary at Constantinople; Ὁπωροφυλάκιον καὶ ἄρνεοσκοπεῖον τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἐποίησεν. As for Constantine himself, he is reported to have disapproved the practice of calling any one a saint, while the iconoclasts in general seem to have anticipated the Puritans in this direction. In the life of St. Stephen (l. c. p. 491) we are told that they avoided the phrase in common use, "we are going to this or that saint," viz. his church; they preferred to say, "we are going to Theodore, or to this or that martyr or apostle." All such accusations indeed must be taken cum grano salis, as we only possess the accounts of their opponents. However, it is evident that a purely negative movement like theirs would be apt to produce irreverence among the vulgar (cf. Neander, H. E. v. 299-302, and the authorities there cited).

The first twenty years of the 9th century were very similar to the first twenty years of the 8th, as far as the Eastern empire was concerned. Sovereign succeeded sovereign in rapid succession. During the reign of Nicephorus I., 802-811, and of Michael I., 812-13, the image-worshippers remained supreme, though their opponents were tolerated. In 813 Leo the Armenian mounted the throne. Then again iconoclasm triumphed for a time. He held a council at Constantinople, A.D. 816, which re-affirmed the decrees of the synod of 754, and ordered images and pictures to be removed from churches. (Bower, History of the Popes, iv. 189-196, ed. 1754, gives an accurate account of this council and of Leo's action against images.) The next two emperors, Michael II. (the Stammerer) and his son Theophilus, pursued the same policy. By Theophilus iconoclasm was supported with a very high hand, according to the monkish writers, who duly tell us of all the persecutions raised by the iconoclasts, but never of their own. The following instance, however, shews that this emperor was sternly intolerant. "In the year 832 an edict was issued, prohibiting every display of picture-worship, and commanding that the word holy, usually placed in letters of gold before the name of a saint, should be erased. A celebrated painter of ecclesiastical subjects named Lazarus was imprisoned and scourged, but subsequently released from confinement at the intercession of Theodora" (Finlay, ii. 148). Milman tells us in addition, that as Lazarus "persisted in exercising his forbidden skill, hot iron plates were placed on his guilty hands. He took refuge in the church of the Baptist, where, having recovered the use of his hands, he painted, on the restoration of images, the celebrated picture of our Saviour over the gate Chalce," whose destruction inaugurated the iconoclastic war (Lat. Christ. lib. iv. c. viii.). The history of iconoclasm has a remarkable uniformity. Another female comes into power, another restoration of images. After the death of Theophilus, his widow Theodora administered the empire in the name of her son Michael, afterwards called the Drunkard. She had always been a worshipper of images, though in secret. As soon, therefore, as she had extorted from the clergy a sentence of absolution for her dead husband, she proclaimed a solemn festival for the restoration of images, since which time, Feb. 19, 842, images painted on a flat surface, as distinguished from statues, have formed part of the recognised religious worship of the Eastern world.

The Controversy in the West.—Our narration has already shewn that image-worship had taken as firm root at Rome as in the East. It was different among the Franks. Constantine Copronymus opened negotiations with Pepin, and endeavoured to gain him to his side. A synod of the Frankish nation was therefore held at Gentilly, A.D. 767, where this question was discussed, but with what result we know not. Under Charles the Great matters were different. He took a decided stand in opposition to the iconoclasts on the one side, and to the pope and the Nicene council on the other (CHARLES THE GREAT; CAROLINE BOOKS). His successor, Lewis the Pious, pursued the same moderate course. No plainer proof can be required of this monarch's hostility to the views of the pope and image-worship in general than the decrees of the council of Paris, A.D. 824 (Du Pin, H. E. cent. ix. cap. i.), combined with the fact that he appointed Claudius, the most violent Western iconoclast, bishop of Turin. The same spirit prevailed among the Franks throughout the 9th century, as is manifest from one simple fact. In the Chronicon of Ado archbishop of Vienne (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. p. 128), the Nicene council is expressly called a false synod on account of its decrees in favour of image-worship.

Contemporary Literature.—In the 8th century the works of Germanus, John of Damascus, Nicephorus, Theodorus Studita, and the letters of the popes in Mansi, t. xii. and xiii., set forth the views of the image-worshippers. Perhaps the works of the patriarch Nicephorus, as contained in Migne's Patr. Graec. and Pitra's Spicileg. Solesm. t. i. iv., and in Mai Spic. Rom. x. 152, afford the best insight into the dogmatic position of that party. In Combeffis (Orig. Constant. Manipulus, pp. 159-190) will be found another work on this subject ascribed to the same person. It is the report of a disputation between Nicephorus and the emperor Leo the Armenian, in which the patriarch produces the same arguments as in the other works to which we have referred. A polemical tract, by John of Oznum, primate of the Armenian church subsequent to 718, may also be consulted. His works were published in 1834 by the Mechitarists of S. Lazare, near Venice.*

On the iconoclastic side we have, practically, no Eastern literature remaining, as their opponents destroyed it all. In the Hortus S. Crucis of the Jesuit Gretser, we find indeed some of the popular squibs of the day in a number of acrostics by the iconoclasts and their opponents, composed in honour of the cross, which both parties agreed in reverencing. They were discovered in the 16th century by Fronto (cf. Theod. Studd. Opp. Migne, Patr. Graec. t. xcix. 438-40). The iconoclastic literature of the West is much richer. Not to mention the Caroline books, we possess some remains of the works of Claudius of Turin, and a treatise of Agobard archbishop of Lyons, against images. On the other side we have the writings of Jonas bishop of Orleans, and the deacon Dungal of Paris. Wal. Strabo, a monk of Fulda, in his work De Divinis Officiis, takes a middle view, but still one decidedly opposed to that of the Greeks. The most of these works are analysed in Du Pin, cent. ix. cap. i.

Modern Authorities.—The more modern literature of the subject is so immense that it would be both impossible and useless to name all the books which have treated of the subject. We append some of the most important, in addition to those mentioned in the body of our article. On the Roman Catholic side are the works of Natalis Alexander, Petavius, Maimbourg (Hist. des Iconoclastes). On the Protestant side those of Spanheim (Hist. of Imag.), and of Dallaeus;

Bohn), will be found most useful for the early history of images. Bower, in t. iii. p. 197, t. iv. 89-115 of Hist. of Popes, ed. 1754, treats the same subject in an exhaustive manner. ICONTIUS, presbyter and abbat of the Roman monastery of St. Stephen pope and martyr, addressed in 761 by pope Paul I. in ep. 12 of the series of his letters known as the Labbeana Sylloge. Another reading of the name is Leontius, while the title of the letter reads Joannes. (Pat. Lat. lxxxix. 1190; Mansi, xii. 645.)

IDA, a dux in Gaul under Theoderic king of Italy, during his occupancy of the Visigothic dominions in Gaul. He was charged by Theoderic to see to the restoration of the property of the church of Narbonne, which had been alienated during the reign of his son-in-law Alaric. † IDABERGA (EDBURGE, IBERGE, IDURBERGA, ITISBERGA), English virgin, commemorated on June 20 at Bergue St. Winox in Belgium, her translation being associated with that of the Northumbrian king St. Oswald, but the Bollandists (Acta SS. 20 Jun. iv. 29-30) are unable to define her history, and say she may have flourished in the 7th century. Butler (Lives of the Saints, June 20) considers her as daughter of Penda king of Mercia.

IDALIUS, bishop of Barcelona, who, to judge from the subscriptions to the 13th and 15th councils of Toledo, probably succeeded Quiricus A.D. 666. He was the most intimate friend of Julian of Toledo, who dedicated to him his work the Prognosticon futuri sæculi. Julian, in the letter which accompanied the copy sent to Idalius, describes how the book originated in the suggestions of Idalius, who was spending Easter with him at Toledo; probably in A.D. 688, in which year Easter fell on March 29, the council at which Idalius is known to have been present meeting on May 11. According to Felix (Vita S. Juliani in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 448) Julian also dedicated to Idalius a book entitled Responsiones, which is no longer extant, in defence of the canons and laws forbidding Christian slaves to serve heathen masters. Idalius probably died about A.D. 689, as in 693 his successor, Laulfus, at the sixteenth council of Toledo precedes twelve bishops. (Florez, Esp. Sagr. xxix. 139, 444; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. ii. 513, 550, 586; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (2), 178; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 454, 815.)

IDATIUS (1) CLARUS (IDACIUS), bishop of Merida at the time of the origin of Priscillianist heresy. He is first mentioned when this heresy had begun to spread. He was then warned by Hyginus bishop of Cordova to take measures to check it; but he attacked Instantius and his followers with more zeal than discretion, and thereby only added fuel to the flame. At the council of Saragossa, which condemned Priscillian, A.D. 380 (Mansi, iii. 635), the signature of Idatius appears in the last place. The Priscillianist bishops replied by consecrating Priscillian bishop of Avila. This step roused Idatius and Ithacius to greater exertions, and after many scandalous contests, Idatius procured a rescript from the emperor Gratian, which ordered the expulsion of the heretics from the whole of Spain. When cir. 385 Priscillian appeared before Maximus at Trèves, Idatius and Ithacius came forward as his accusers, and Priscillian was sentenced to death. Idatius did not long enjoy his success. According to Sulpicius Severus he resigned his see, an act of wisdom and moderation, which was, however, tarnished by an unsuccessful attempt to regain it. According to St. Isidore, he was excommunicated (in A.D. 389 according to Prosper of Aquitaine) on account of the share he had taken in the death of Priscillian, and sent into exile, where he died in the reign of Theodosius and Valentinian III., i.e. before May 15, A.D. 392, the date of Valentinian's murder. His excommunication and exile must have been later than the defeat of Maximus by Theodosius, which happened in the latter half of A.D. 388. The sentence of excommunication was probably pronounced by St. Ambrose and St. Martin, who had opposed the infliction of the punishment of death for heresy, and by the bishops who had taken the side of Theodosius; and that of exile by Theodosius, to whom he was inimical as a partisan of Maximus. Idatius was the author of a treatise against the Priscillianists, and Isidore relates he was surnamed Clarus, a name he deserved for his eloquence. [PRISCILLIANUS, AMBROSIUS.] (Isidore, de Viris Illust. c. 15, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 1093; Sulpicius Severus, Hist. Sac. ii. 46-51, in Migne, *Patr. IDATIUS (2) (YDATIUS), a Gallic bishop, who subscribed the synodical epistle of the bishops of Gaul to St. Leo (451), thanking him for his epistle to Flavianus upon the Eutychian heresy, and accepting it as a satisfactory exposition of the orthodox faith. (Leo Mag. Ep. xcix. in Patr. Lat. liv. 1107.) [R. T. S.]

IDATIUS (3) (IDACIUS; surnamed LEMICENSIS), bishop of Aquae Flaviae (Chayes or Chiaves) in Galicia, from A.D. 427 to about 470, and author of a well-known chronicle which takes its place in history as one of the various continuations of Jerome. Our sources for his life are, first, the notices contained in his own work, and, secondly, the meagre life of him by Isidore in the De Vir. Ill. cap. ix., which, however, is nothing but a summary of Idatius's own prologue. The existing material was elaborately sifted and put together by Florez (Esp. Sagr. iv. Madrid, 1749), and more recently in a less complete and satisfactory manner by Garzon, the learned Jesuit chancellor of the university of Ghent, whose edition of Idatius, finished before 1763, was published at Brussels in 1845 by P. F. X. de Ram. (See list of editions given below.)

Birth-place and bishopric of Idatius.—Idatius tells us in the prologue to his chronicle, that he was "Provinciae Gallaeciae natus in Lemica civitate," a passage which has given rise to various misunderstandings, especially to the persistent ascription to him of the bishopric of Lamego (so even Wattenbach, in the last edition of his invaluable Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, p. 70), a Lusitanian town, of which he was certainly neither native nor bishop. "Lemica" in the sentence just quoted is a copyist's error for Limica, the town of the Limici on the river Limia, now Lima, which runs into the sea midway between the Douro and the Minho. Pliny, Mela, Strabo, and Ptolemy mention the river Limia, Limius, or Limaea (Idat. ed. De Ram, Dissert. praevia, p. 9), while the Limici are known to us from the famous inscription placed under Trajan on the bridge of Aquae Flaviae (Chiaves), and still existing there, in which they, with nine other civitates, are mentioned, probably—though not certainly—as having cooperated in the work of the bridge (Corpus Inscr. ii. 2477; Esp. Sagr. iv. 314). The town of the Limici has been variously identified by different authors (Nic. Antonio, Bibl. Vet. i. 256; Florez, iv. 304). Hübner, in vol. ii. of the Corpus Inscr. p. 350, gives what is probably the true solution of the question, in distinguishing the site of the civitas or Forum Limicorum from that of the mansio Limia or Limaca further down the river, while at the same time he makes the term civitas Limicorum, as it occurs on the Chiaves inscription, cover all the settlements along the Limia valley. However this may be, we may safely conclude that Idatius was born in the town of the Limici of the Chiaves inscription on the river Limia. Against his connexion with Lamego, either as native or bishop of the town, geographical facts are conclusive. Idatius was born about the year 388, very shortly after the execution of Priscillian and his companions at Trèves, and just about the time when, as he himself tells us in his Chronicle (ad ann. 386), the Priscillianists, falling back with fresh force on Spain after the death of their chief, took a special hold on the province of Galicia. About the year 400 Idatius was in Egypt and Palestine, where, as he informs us in his prologue, and in the body of his chronicle (ad ann. 435), he, "et infantulus et pupillus," saw St. Jerome at Bethlehem, John bishop of Jerusalem, Eulogius of Caesarea, and Theophilus of Alexandria. His return from the East to Galicia may be dated about 402. (Compare Florez's arguments, based on a comparison of three entries in the chronicle, Esp. Sagr. iv. 301, with Garzon's attempt, ed. De Ram, p. 11, to establish a later date). He thus reached his native country in safety before the storm of barbarian invasion, which drove out Orosius (q. v.) and prevented Avitus presbyter of Braga from journeying homewards from Jerusalem between 409 and 416 (Epist. Aviti ad Balconum, Esp. Sagr. xv. 374). What took him to the East is unknown to us, but the fame of St. Jerome's retreat at Bethlehem may very well have attracted thither those with whom the boy travelled, as we know that it drew other travellers from the West at the time. With Augustine, the friend of the Gallican Orosius from 410 onwards, Idatius in his Eastern journey seems to have had no personal contact, to judge from his notice of Augustine (ad ann. 412), as compared with that of St. Jerome. In 416, seven years after the irruption of the Suevoi, Alani, and Vandals into the peninsula, Idatius entered the church, for so no doubt we are to understand the entry in the Chron. Parvum (see below) under that year, "Idatii conversio ad Dominum peccatoris" (cont. Florez, l. c. p. 302), and in 427 he was made bishop (see Prol. Esp. Sagr. iv. 348). In 431 matters were so bad in Galicia, and the rule of the Suevoi had become so intolerable, that Idatius was sent by the Gallician provincials to Aetius in Gaul to ask for help. He returned in the following year accompanied by the legate Censorius, by whose efforts possibly, although not till after his departure from Galicia, the bishops were enabled to persuade HERMERIC, the Suevoian king, to a peace with the provincials. Thenceforward for about twenty-four years Galicia enjoyed comparative tranquillity, whatever might be the disturbances and troubles of the rest of Spain, and the Gallician bishops found themselves to some extent free to deal with the Priscillianist and Manichaean doctrines then prevailing in Galicia, and which had even infected some members of the episcopate (Epist. Leo Magn. ad Turribium; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. &c. ii. p. 889). Between 441 and 447 must be placed the letter of Turribius to Idatius and Ceponius (? bishop of Tuy) on the subject of the Priscillianist apocryphal books (Esp. Sagr. xvi. 95; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 887). In 444-5, in consequence of the confessions of certain Roman Manichaeans, in which the names of their co-believers in the provinces were given up, letters were sent to the provinces by pope Leo, informing and warning the bishops (Prosper ad ann. 444; see Garzon's note 6, ed. De Ram. p. 83). Accordingly we find Idatius and Turribius in 445 holding a trial of certain Manichaeans discovered at Astorga, no doubt by aid of the papal letters, and forwarding a report of the trial to the neighbouring metropolitan of Merida, evidently with the object of putting him on his guard. And in 447, in answer to various documents from St. Turribius on the subject of the Gallician heresies, Leo sent a long decretal letter to Spain to be circulated by Turribius, urging the assembly of a national council, or if that should be found impossible, at least of a Gallician synod, in which, by the efforts of Turribian, and of Idatius and Ceponius, "fratres vestri," a remedy might be devised for the prevailing disorder. It is scarcely possible that such a synod should have ever actually met, or we should have had a mention of it in Idatius's Chronicle, which rarely omits any ecclesiastical news it was in his power to give.

In the troubled times which followed the flight and execution of Rekiar [FRUMARIUS, FRANTA], Idatius himself fell a victim to the disorders of the country. His capture at Aquae Flaviae by Frumari (July 26, 460) was owing mostly, no doubt, to his importance as a leader and representative of the Roman population, but partly, perhaps, as Florez suggests, to the hatred of certain Gallician Priscillianist informers (their names at least are Latin; conf. Chron. ad ann.), who had felt the weight of the bishop's authority. He was released in three months, and after his return to Chiaves lived at least eight years longer under the Suevian kingdom which he had too hastily declared to be "destructum et finitum" in the year 456 (? "pene destructum," as Isidore, his copyist in Hist. Suecorum, eod. loc.), but which took a new departure on Frumari's death (464), under Remismund. His Chronicle breaks off at the end of the year 469, and he himself must have died before 474, the year of the death of the emperor Leo, under whom Isidore places the death of Idatius. (Esp. Sagr. iv. 303, ed. De Ram. pp. 15, 39.)

(2) Idatius's Chronicle.—The prologue to the Chronicle, composed apparently after its completion, at any rate in the extreme old age of its author, gives a full account of its intention, sources, and arrangement. It was intended as a continuation of the chronicle of Eusebius and Jerome, Idatius including his own works in one volume with theirs (ed. De Ram. p. 48, note 3, and p. 59, note 4), and its author himself divides it into two parts, the first starting from the year 379, where Jerome breaks off, and ending at the year 427, in which Idatius was made bishop; the second extending from the year 427 to the end. In the first division his information was derived, as he himself tells us, "vel ex scriptorum stylo vel ex relationibus indicantium." Sulpicius and Orosius seem to have been his main authorities, to which may be added the works of SS. Augustine and Jerome (Esp. Sagr. iv. 335, 356), and the lives and writings of certain contemporary bishops (John of Jerusalem, l. c. 357, Paulinus of Beziers, ib., Paulinus of Nola, 358, &c.). "Thenceforward" (i. e. from 427), he says, describing his second division, "I, undeservedly chosen to the office of the episcopate, and not ignorant of all the troubles of this miserable time, have added both the falling landmarks (metas ruituras) of the oppressed Roman empire, and also what is more mournful still, the degenerate condition of the church order within Gallicia, which is the end of the world, the destruction of honest liberty by indiscriminate appointments (to bishoprics), and the almost universal decay of the divine discipline of religion, evils springing from the rule of furious men, and the tumults of hostile nations. This is the note of the whole Chronicle, which gives us a vivid and invaluable picture of one scene, a most important scene in the great drama of the fall of the Western empire, and without which we should be almost in the dark as to the events of the first half of the 5th century in Spain. Idatius's description of the entry of the Vandals, Alani, and Suevo into the Peninsula in October 409, and of the two following years of indiscriminate pillage and ruin before the division of the country by lot amongst the invaders took place, is well known, and we can only refer to it here.

The Chronicle altogether embraces ninety-one years inclusive. On the chronology of the last five years, and on the possible interpolations of certain chronological notes by the copyist, see ed. De Ram, p. 39, also Florez, iv. 310. St. Isidore says that the Chronicle goes down to the eighth year of Leo. It really goes down to the eleventh, although the eighth year is the last year of Leo mentioned in it, introduced wrongly, where we ought to have the eleventh. Did the MS. used by Isidore only go down to the eighth year of Leo (466), or were there already copyists' errors in it which deceived him? On the whole subject see the elaborate work of De Ram and Florez.

MSS. and Editions.—No MS. of the complete Chronicle of Idatius is now known to exist. The MS. belonging to the Jesuit College of Clermont in Paris, which was first printed by the Spaniard San Lorenzo at Rome in 1615, and then by Sirmond in 1619, is now lost. It is thought by Waitz to have passed from the College of Clermont to the Paris Library and to have existed there for some time under the description Suppl. Lat. 696, but it cannot now be found there, and has been sought for vainly elsewhere (Waitz in Pertz's Archiv, 8, 13; Th. Mommsen, Corpus Inscr. Lat. i. 484). The MS. was described by its first editor as "Parisiensis." Sirmond, however, says it ought to be rather called "Metensis," as he believes it to have been copied in a Metz monastery, whence it came into the hands of the Parisian Jesuits (Sirmond, Opera, 1728, ii. 227). A list of the editions will be found in De Ram's preface to Garzon's Idatius.

(3) The Fasti Idatiani were first attributed to Idatius by Sirmond, partly because in the ancient MS. from which he printed the Chronicle, the Fasti followed immediately upon the Chronicle, and partly also because he believed that there was strong internal evidence for the Idatian authorship (Opera, 1728, ii. 287). This opinion has been generally adopted up to the present day, notably by Dr. Mommsen (Corpus Inscr. Lat. i. 484), Florez being the great exception. The grounds on which Florez, however, based his dissent are extremely slight, and have now fallen out of the debate (see Esp. Sagr. iv. 457, and Garzon's answer, ed. De Ram, p. 41). Of late the history of the Fasti has been cleared up with the utmost learning and acuteness by the German scholar Oswald Holder-Egger in the Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere Deutsche Geschichtskunde, ii. pp. 59-71. His general conclusions are (1) that the Fasti Idatiani are one of two derivatives of certain consular Fasti put together at Constantinople in the 4th century, the Chronicon Paschale (Migne, Patr. Graeca, xcii.) being the other. (2) That the common source of the Fasti as we have them and of the Chron. Pasch. was itself compiled at Constantinople from older Roman Fasti, such as are still preserved to us in the Chronographus of 354 (Mommsen, Corp. Inscr. Lat. i. 483; Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, p. 48) the notices peculiar to Constantinople beginning from the year 330, when Byzantium became the second capital of the empire. (3) That after the years 390-5, when the Chron. Pasch. branches off from the Fasti Idatiani, a copy of the Constantinople Fasti came westward, received first certain additions in Italy, and lastly reached Spain, where a Spanish reviser and continuator gave them the shape under which they are now known to us as the Fasti Idatiani. That Idatius the author of the Chronicle was the reviser of the Fasti, Holder-Egger does not believe, but is inclined to hold that the agreement between Chronicle and Fasti is best explained by the theory that Idatius used but did not compose the Fasti. His arguments, however, on this point scarcely seem to be conclusive, and he is indeed prepared to admit that certain trifling additions to and alterations in the Fasti were probably made by Idatius. For the later use of the Fasti Idatiani, the East Roman Fasti, as the Ravenna annals are the West Roman Fasti (Wattenbach, i. 49), see the rest of Holder Egger's article, Die Chronik des Marcellinus Comes und der Ost-römischen Fasten, Neues Archiv, &c. ii. 44.

Editions of the Fasti Idat.—Sirmont, Opera, vol. ii. partially; first completely by Philip Labbe, Bibl. Nova MSS. i. 3, from the lost Codex Claromont.; Graevius, Antiq. Rom. xi.; Roncalli, Vetust. Lat. Script. Chron. ii.; Ducange, appendix to Chron. Paschale, p. 439; Migne, Patr. Lat. 51, a reprint of Roncalli; Patr. Gr. 92, a reprint of Ducange.

MSS. of the Fasti.—A full account of the MS. material is given by Dr. Mommsen, Corp. Inscr. Lat. i. 484.

(4) The Chronicon Parvum Idatii.—Flores published this from three MSS.: (1) a MS. which had formerly belonged to the historian Mariana; (2) a MS. from the collection of the antiquary Perez at Toledo; (3) a fine 13th-century MS. from the Colegio Mayor of San Ildefonso at Alcalá, containing the chronicles of Eusebius, Jerome, Prosper, Victor Tununensis, the so-called Chronicle of Sulpicius and others. The Chron. Parv. is the work of a compiler who made an unskillful abbreviation of the larger chronicle, leaving out a great deal, but tacking on a continuation up to the time of Justinian. It is not to be confused with the excerpta from Idatius made under Charles the Great, and first published by Canisius (see above). Flores supposes that as no complete MS. of the Chronicle has ever been discovered except that possessed and printed by Sirmont, the Chron. Parvum is what is meant wherever mention is made of the Chronicle of Idatius in old catalogues of MSS. Mariana was only acquainted with the Chron. Parv., and Morales possessed an edition of Idatius even less complete than the Chron. Parv. It is worth notice that one passage at least, the entry under the year 416 already referred to, "Idatii conversio ad Dominum peccatoris," which must once have existed in the large Chronicle, but was not present in the unique MS. printed by San Lorenzo and Sirmont, has been preserved to us in the Chron. Parvum.

IDAXIUS, Donatist bishop of Muzuca, in Byzacene, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Collat. Carthag. cognit. i. 206.) [H. W. P.]

IDDON, son of Ynyr Gwent, and prince of South Wales, who, in gratitude for victories over the Saxons, gave churches and lands to bishops Teilo and Arwystyl and the see of Llandaff in the 6th century. The grants consisted of Llanarth, Llandeilo Porththalawg, Llandeilo Cresseney, all in Monmouthshire, and a place named Llancoyt. The charters conferring them are given in the Book of Llandaff. Rees points out that Godwin assigns their dates incorrectly. He afterwards devoted himself to religion, on which account he is reckoned among the Welsh saints. He had two brothers, who are also accounted saints, Ceidio and Cynheiddon. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 358 sq., 412 sq.; Rees, Welsh Saints, 233-4; Williams, Emm. Welshm. 238.) [J. G.]

IDDUAS, bishop of Smyrna at the council of Ephesus, 431 (Mansi, v. 589). On Dec. 18, A.D. 437, Sixtus III. bishop of Rome, writing to Proclus bishop of Constantinople, says, "You have the latest copy of the procedure lately held in the case of our brother Idduas, concerning whom we have decreed that your decision should be maintained, as we did not wish in any way to impair your authority, persuaded of your justice, integrity, and good intention." If this is the same prelate, it would appear that the bishops of Constantinople already exercised patriarchal authority over the province of Asia, although by the council of Constantinople, canon 2, the jurisdiction of the bishops of Thrace was to be confined to Thrace itself, and it was not till the council of Chalcedon that the patriarchate of Constantinople received its full dimensions. It might be expected that the usage would grow up before it was formally recognised. In the fifteenth actio of the council of Chalcedon, the presbyter Philippus stated that John Chrysostom had deposed fifteen bishops of the province of Asia. The second and third canons of the council of Constantinople were not accepted by the bishops of Rome even to the time of Hormisdas. (Xysti III. Pap. Epist. ix., Patr. Lat. t. i. p. 612; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 741; Ceillier, viii. 253.) [W. M. S.]

IDLOES, ST., the founder of Llanidloes in Montgomeryshire; his day is Sept. 6. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 298; Williams, Dict. of Welshmen, p. 236; Myo. Arch. i. 172, ii. 25, 45; E. Williams, Iolo MSS. 558, 651; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 596.) [C. W. B.]

IDNERTH, the last bishop of Llanbadarn in the 8th century, said to have been killed there by his people. (Giraldus Cambrensis, Itin. Camb. ii. 4; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 146; Jones and Freeman's St. David's, 266.) [C. W. B.]

IDONUS (ODONUS), twenty-second bishop of Senlis, between Bethelmus and Adelbertus, apparently about A.D. 800. (Gall. Chr. x. 1384.) [C. H.]

IDOLFUS, IDOU, IDULFUS, bishop of Trèves. [HILDULPHUS.]

IDONIUS, bishop of Rusadum in Mauritania Caesariensis, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 59. Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 264.) [R. S. G.]

IDUBERGA (ITTA, ITTABERGA, YDUBERGA), widow and nun, was daughter of Godinus duke of Aquitaine, and wife of Pippin of Landen. She was also sister of St. Modaldus archbishop of Trèves, and mother of Grimoald who became mayor of the palace, St. Begga and St. Gertrude. When Pippin died, Iduberga, according to the Vita S. Gertrudis (c. 1, Bolland. Acta SS. 17 Mart. ii. 594, 8 Mai. ii. 307), devoted herself to religion, and, by the advice of St. Amandus, built a monastery at Nivelles in Brabant, into which she entered under her own daughter St. Gertrude. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 8 Mai. ii. 307) date her birth about A.D. 592, and St. Gertrude's about A.D. 625, the widowhood of the former A.D. 640, and her death, a sexagenarian, A.D. 652. [J. G.]

IESTYN (JESTIN, YESTINUS). (1) Son of Cadfan ab Cynan, Welsh saint of the 4th century. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 89, 102; Williams, Emin. Welshm. 238; Mye. Arch. ii. 45.)

(2) Son of that Geraint, prince of Damnonia, who was slain at the battle of Llongborth, was the founder of Llanestyn in Carnarvonshire and of Llanestyn in Anglesey, where a stone was seen in the last century with an inscription purporting that he was buried there. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 113, 232; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 628.) [C. W. B.]

IEUAN (IEFAN), Welsh saint, sharing with Sannan and Afran the dedication at Llantrisaint in Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints, 31, 324). He was probably the pupil of St. Dubricius, and the clerical witness to grants by king Peibau of Ergyng to St. Dubricius and the see of Llandaff early in the 6th century. (Lb. Landav. by Rees, 314-21, 324.) [J. G.]

IGILIUS (VIGILIUS), fourth bishop of Avignon, placed by some lists in the year 134, is said to have ruled for forty years. (Gall. Chr. i. 851.) [R. T. S.]

IGINUS, bishop. [HYGINUS.]

IGNATIUS (1), ST. (called THEOPHORUS), Oct. 17, the second bishop of Antioch (c. A.D. 70-c. 107), between Evodius and Hero [EVODIUS (1), HERO (1)]. He is sometimes reckoned the third bishop, St. Peter being in that case reputed the first. As one of the series of Antiochene bishops he will be found in Bosch (Pat. Ant. in Bolland. Acta SS. Jul. iv. introd. p. 8) and Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 700).

The question of the life and writings of Ignatius, including the connected subject of the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, has been described by M. Renan as the most difficult in early Christian history next to that of the fourth gospel. We propose to introduce the reader to the present condition of this problem by first setting down what is known of the matter from sources whose date and authorship is ascertained; proceeding then to consider the professed histories of the saint contained in the various Acts of his martyrdom; and discussing lastly the epistles in the various forms in which they successively presented themselves to the modern world, assigning to each form, with what certainty we may, its proper antiquity.

I. About A.D. 165 Lucian wrote his satire de Morte Peregrini. He relates to us (cc. 14-41) that Peregrinus was made a prisoner in Syria. But the Christians (not of Syria but) of Asia Minor sent messengers and money to him according to their usual custom in the case of persons imprisoned for their faith. Peregrinus, on his part, wrote letters to all the more important cities; forwarding these by messengers whom he appointed (ἐχειροτόνησε) and entitled νεκραγγέλους and νευτεροδρόμους. The coincidence of this story with that of Ignatius, as told us afterwards by Eusebius, would, if it stood alone, be a strong evidence of connexion. The similarity of these expressions with the πρέπει χειροτονήσαι τινα ὡς δυνήσεται θεοδρόμος καλεῖσθαι of ad Pol. vii. would if the words stood alone make it almost certain that Lucian was mimicking the words of the epistle. These two probabilities together represent the reason which we have for believing that the composition in which they both occur was written by one who was acquainted with the story and even some of the letters of Ignatius. (Renan, i. 38; Zahn, i. 517; Pearson, i. 2; Denzinger, 85; Lightfoot, ii. See Authorities at foot of this article.)

Theophilus of Antioch, who flourished before A.D. 167, has a coincidence with Ignat. Ad Eph. xix. 1, where the virginity of Mary is said to have been concealed from the devil.

Irenaeus, about A.D. 180 (adv. Haer. iii. 3, 4), bears his testimony to the fact that Polycarp wrote to the Philippians. The same writer (v. 28) mentions how a Christian martyr said, "I am the bread-corn of Christ, to be ground by the teeth of beasts that I may be found pure bread;" which remarkable words are found in Ig. Ad Rom. iv. 1. The passage of Irenaeus is quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 36) as a testimony to Ignatius. [For 17 apparent coincidences of expression between Irenaeus and the shorter Greek epistles of Ignatius see Zahn, ii. 331. Some, however, of these fall at least very far short of a demonstrable connexion.]

Origen, early in the 3rd century, Prol. in Cant. (Op. ed. Delarue, iii. 30), in vindicating the glowing expressions of love to God used by saints, writes, "I remember also that one of the saints, by name Ignatius, said of Christ, 'My love was crucified';" and the words are found in Ig. Ad Rom. vii. 2. Origen also (Hom. in Luc. vol. iii. 938) says, "I find it well written in one of the epistles of a certain martyr, I mean Ignatius, second bishop of Antioch after Peter, who in the persecution fought with beasts at Rome, that the virginity of Mary escaped the prince of this world" (Ig. Ad Eph. xix. 1).

But in Eusebius, early in the 4th century, we find the full account which explains these fragmentary allusions and quotations. In his chronicle he twice names Ignatius as second bishop of Antioch after the apostles; in one case adding the fact that he was martyred. In his ecclesiastical history, besides less important notices both of our saint and Polycarp, he relates at large (iii. 22, 37, 38; iv. 14, 15) that Ignatius, whom he calls very celebrated among the Christians, was sent from Syria to Rome to be cast to the beasts for Christ's sake. When journeying guarded through Asia he addressed to the cities near the places of his sojourn both exhortations and epistles. Thus while in Smyrna, the city of Polycarp, he wrote one letter to Ephesus, another to Magnesia, another to Tralles. Besides, he wrote a letter to the Romans, begging them not to impede his martyrdom. And of this epistle Eusebius, thinking it good to give a specimen, appends Rom. v. at length. Then he tells how Ignatius, having left Smyrna and come to Troas, wrote thence to the Philadelphians and Smyrnaeans, and also to Polycarp their bishop. One sentence from Smyr. iii. Eusebius copies as containing the record of a saying of Christ not otherwise handed down. [The attempts of Dailé, 433 sq., to evacuate the foregoing testimonies are really captious. He argues that "the martyr said" in Irenæus is not equivalent to the martyr "wrote"; denies the genuineness of the works of Origen referred to; and slights the authority of Eusebius as too late in point of time to be of value. See the answer, Pears. i. 6-8.]

The Apostolical Constitutions in their interpolated condition shew very evident connexions indeed with the interpolated or so-called longer epistles of Ignatius. But in their uninterpolated form as known to us through the Syriac translation of the Didascalia these Constitutions in several places coincide very strikingly with the shorter Greek or seven Vossian epistles.

An epistle which passes under the name of Athanasius, and which if not by him is by a contemporary writer, quotes a passage from Ad Eph. vii. 2, as written by Ignatius, who after the apostles was bishop of Antioch and a martyr of Christ. [See the question of the genuineness of this epistle argued, Cureton, lxxviii.; Zahn, i. 578.]

St. Basil (ed. Ben. ii. 598) quotes, without naming Ignatius, the familiar sentence from Ad Eph. xix. 1, concerning Satan's ignorance of the virginity of Mary. St. Jerome's testimony upon the subject is altogether secondary, being dependent on that of Eusebius.

St. Chrysostom (Op. vol. ii. 592) has a homily on St. Ignatius which relates that he was appointed by the apostles bishop of Antioch; was sent for to Rome in the time of a persecution to be there judged; instructed and admonished with wonderful power all the cities on the way, and Rome itself when he arrived; was condemned and martyred in the Roman theatre crying, Ἐγὼ τῶν θηρίων ἐκείνων ὀνάμιον; and his remains were transferred after death with great solemnity to Antioch. [Zahn (i. 33-49) does not believe that proof can be adduced from the genuine writings of Chrysostom that he was acquainted with the writings of Ignatius. But see the other side powerfully argued by Pearson, i. 9; Denzinger, 90; Lipsius, ii. 21.]

Theodoret is frequent in his citations of the seven Vossian epistles, and mentions Ignatius as ordained by St. Peter, and made the food of beasts for the testimony of Christ.

Severus of Antioch (A.D. 513-551) has a long catalogue of sayings from Ignatius, in which every one of the seven epistles is laid under contribution. These are to be found in the Syriac in Cureton, in the Greek in Zahn (ii. 352). And Cureton also furnishes us with a large collection of Syriac fragments, in which passages taken everywhere from the seven Vossian epistles are declared to have the force of canons in the church.

The foregoing may suffice to furnish us with a solid framework of ancient testimony, to which all theories of the history and writings of Ignatius which pretend to credence must be adapted.

II. But we possess also a multitude of Acts of the martyrdom of St. Ignatius, which, if we could accept them, would furnish us with very particular accounts of his life and death. Of these Ussher published three in whole or part; one in Latin from two related MSS.; another, also in Latin, from the Cottonian library; a third in Greek from a MS. at Oxford. The Bollandists published a Latin martyrdom in the Acta SS. for Feb. 1; Cotelierius a Greek one by Symeon Metaphrastes. Ruinart, and afterwards Jacobson (Pat. Ap. ii.), printed a Greek MS. from the Colbertine collection (Ms. Colb.); J. S. Assemani found a Syriac one which, being unpublished, may perhaps be the same as that partly printed by Cureton (i.). Aucher, and afterwards Petermann (p. 496), published an Armenian one. Dressel printed a Greek version of the 10th century (Ms. Vat.). Of these Colb. is the original of Ussher's first-named Latin, and the Syriac is identical. The Greek printed by Ussher is identical with Ms. Vat. Ussher's Cottonian and the Bollandist are closely related, being a combination of Ms. Vat. and Ms. Colb. The nine are reduced therefore to five, possessing each a certain independence. But of these Ms. Colb. and Ms. Vat. are by far the most valuable, being completely independent of each other, while the remaining versions are mixtures of these two, adding nothing new to them save in the case of that of Symeon Metaphrastes, who gives a legend (plainly derived from the misunderstanding of the name Θεοφόρος) that Ignatius was the child carried and blessed by the Lord.

Ms. Colb. (see Zahn, ii. p. 301) relates the condemnation of Ignatius by Trajan in Antioch; and incorporates the epistle to the Romans. From the arrival at Puteoli the narrative proceeds in the first person plural, as if the writer was a companion of the saint, who is thrown to the beasts on Dec. 20. The bones alone remain, which are transferred to Antioch. This MS. bears at least marks of interpolation. The saint, contrary to the testimony of the letters is brought by sea from Seleucia to Smyrna. The "we" in the latter part is plainly imitated from the Acts of the Apostles, and commence at an impossible point. The prayer of the saint that the beasts should be his grave is inconsistent with the collection of the bones and the funerals which follows, and which bears the appearance of having been added in support of the claims of relics. Thus the story is a lame one, and our chief obligation to it lies in its incorporation of the epistle to the Romans. The other epistles the author has not read carefully. He speaks of a general persecution under Trajan, and makes Ignatius a disciple of John and fellow-hearted with Polycarp. Now Jerome, who in his book de Vir. Illust. cap. xvi. (ed. Vallars. ii. 855), makes Polycarp a disciple of John, but plainly implies that Ignatius was not so, in his account of the chronicle of Eusebius classes both Polycarp and Ignatius with Papias as hearers of the apostle (ib. viii. 692). Ms. Colb. must then have derived from Jerome, or the mistaken form of Eusebius which appears in him. If so the account must date from the end of the 4th century. But when we compare the narrative with Eusebius, we find that the fable of the general persecution under Trajan agrees only with the loose expressions of the Chronicle. The Ecclesiastical History of the same writer, had it been known, would have corrected the error. Eusebius plainly knew nothing of the martyrdom or the story we find in it. But there are apparent connexions between it and Chrysostom as above quoted, which lead us to the belief that some one acquainted with that writer gave the martyrdom its present form. Dec. 20, the date given in this martyrdom for the feast of St. Ignatius, was originally in all probability the feast of the translation of the relics under Theodosius II. (408-450). We thus arrive at the belief that this martyrdom, written in the 4th century, assumed its present form after the first half of the 5th. The author, possessing but a general knowledge of the other epistles, which he imagined to have been all written from Smyrna, is best acquainted with that To the Romans, which he gives at length.

Ms. Vat. (Zahn, ii. 307) omits all judicial proceedings in Antioch. Ignatius is sent for by Trajan to Rome, as a teacher dangerous to the state; an argument takes place before the senate between the emperor and the saint; the lions kill him, but leave the body untouched, and it remains as a sacred deposit at Rome. Notice follows of the letter of Pliny to Trajan, plainly out of Eusebius (H. E. iii. 33); Dec. 20 is marked as the saint's day. Now the use of the history of Eusebius, written A.D. 325-30, gives a terminus a quo for the composition of this martyrdom, while a terminus ad quem is furnished by the use of it made by Symeon Metaphrastes early, perhaps, in the 10th century. There is a certain connexion between Ms. Vat. and Jerome and Chrysostom, notably in the account given of the purpose of the journey to Rome. And it has also, as Ussher pointed out, undeniable coincidences with the spurious and interpolated epistles, the date of which will presently be fixed in the latter part of the 4th century. Thus we find that Ms. Vat. arose on the basis of an account of the journey and death of the saint, extant at the end of the 4th century. On the whole, the martyrdoms are late and untrustworthy compositions, wholly useless as materials for determining the question of the epistles; we are thrown back on Eusebius.

III. Eusebius in the Chronicle (ed. Schöne, ii. 152, 158, 162) omits (contrary to his custom) the durations of the episcopates of Antioch, and there is a gap of three years between Peter and Euodius. The accession of Ignatius is placed ann. Ab. 2085; but no exact time is stated for that of his successor, Hero. The martyrdom of Ignatius is mentioned, indeed, in connexion with the beginning of Hero's episcopate, but is not said to be contemporary with it. We are, therefore, thus far left to place Ignatius's death at any time between Ab. 2123, Traj. 10, and 2132, Traj. 19. In H. E. iii. 22, Eusebius, in a general way, makes the episcopates of Symeon and Ignatius contemporary with the first years of Trajan and the last of St. John, and (iii. 36) with Polycarp and Papias. The only record of the martyr's date which we possess before Eusebius, is that of Origen, who states (ut sup.) that Ignatius had been of old regarded as the second bishop after Peter, and a martyr; though it would seem from Chrysostom that Euodius was in his time forgotten at Antioch. We have then a tradition of the early part of the 3rd century at latest, that Ignatius was third bishop of Antioch, and at the beginning of the 4th at latest, it was held that he was martyred in the persecution under Trajan, which was not in the earliest years of his reign. We are at liberty to date his epistles, journey, and death, in any year from 105 to 117. Funk fixes it at 107.

In the year 1878, Harnack published a tract (Die Zeit des Ign. Leipzig.) in which the tradition that Ignatius was martyred under Trajan is impugned. The argument rests upon the fact that the acts of the martyrdom being proved by Zahn, with the general assent of all his critics, to be untrustworthy, the date of the saint's death rests wholly on the testimony of Eusebius; while (1) the date in the Chronicon of Eusebius is traceable to the Chronicle of Julius Africanus (A.D. 222); (2) the date in that author depends on a chronological scheme, in which a fixed relation is observable between the accessions of bishops of Antioch and bishops of Rome, so that Ignatius's death was placed just one Olympiad after the accession of the fifth Roman bishop Alexander; (3) Eusebius shews his want of confidence in this date by placing the death of Ignatius after it; (4) in his Ecc. Hist. Eusebius has given no repetition of the chronology of the Chronicon, or any other in its place, and shews that he had no other data to rest on but the information of Julius Africanus, untrustworthy as that has been shewn to be (Harnack, p. 66 sqq.). But (1) it is very improbable that Eusebius had no tradition save through Africanus, or the latter no tradition save four names; (2) the relation of the Antiochene list to the Roman is only made out by considerable forcing (Harnack, p. 15), and it is very possible that while this principle of arrangement might be partially used, yet in cases where there was a trustworthy tradition of a date, that date was given, whether it exactly agreed with the scheme or not; and of such cases, Ignatius on the face of the table seems to be one; (3) Harnack asserts (p. 70) the great likelihood that Julius Africanus only included in his Antiochene list names which he really knew, the very fact that he is obliged to assign them unnaturally long periods of office proving this. But if this were so, why assume that the names which he knew would be those which lay nearest to his own time? Would it not be likely that such a name as Ignatius would be preserved to him in connexion with its proper date, which was but a little more than a century before his time, while perhaps two or three later but less important names might have been lost? When we add to this the independent testimony of Origen, contemporary with Africanus, that Ignatius was second bishop after St. Peter, repeated as this is in the Ecl. Hist. of Eusebius (iii. 36), we can see that if the date of Ignatius were set afloat, it might very well be backwards and not forwards that we should be compelled to move it. See, however, the article EVODIUS.

We may here, also, notice the theory of Volkmar, which the author of Supernatural Religion (i. 268) regards as "demonstrated," that the martyrdom of Ignatius happened not in Rome but in Antioch, in A.D. 115, upon Dec. 20 (on which day his feast was kept), in consequence of the excitement produced by an earthquake which had occurred a week previously. Professor Lightfoot has said enough about the respect due to the authority of John Malalas, upon whom this attractive theory rests. But Zahn, ii. (xii. 343, 381), renders a still more decisive answer. It is now known from the ancient Syriac Menologion, published by Wright (Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 45), that the feast of St. Ignatius was originally kept not upon Dec. 20 at all, but upon Oct. 17, a few days before which was the feast of a St. Pelagia, in exact agreement with the opening words of Chrysostom's oration upon our saint. (Zahn, i. 33, and Lightfoot, ii. 352, note §, are to be corrected in accordance with this discovery.)

The other details, which we find in the Martyrdoms and elsewhere, are but expansions from hints supposed to be found in the letters, of which we find an instance in the long dialogue between Ignatius and Trajan upon the name Θεοφόρος. But there is no reason to suspect the genuineness of this addition to the saint's name in itself. It is given untranslated in the Syriac version of the 4th century. The interpolator found it in his copy, for it stands in all his epistles except that to Polycarp; and in all the MSS. of the shorter translation, both Greek and Latin, it holds its place. The writers of the 4th century, regarding it as a title of honour, do not quote it; in the 6th it came to be regarded as a name.

The tradition that Ignatius was martyred at Rome for the faith can be traced higher than the records of it in Eusebius and Origen. The designation of world-famed, which Eusebius gives to our saint, shews that he had, besides the epistles, the information of general tradition; and the words of Origen are to the same effect. The testimony of Irenaeus, which Eusebius adduces as perfectly agreeing with the tradition known to him, dates but seventy years after the fact. It is true that these expressions come from writers who knew the epistles; but the mere existence of the epistles at such a date, even if they were spurious, would be sufficient proof of the existence of the tradition. And it is impossible that such a story should have arisen so soon after Trajan, if it had contradicted the known facts or the prevalent customs of his reign.

It is plain that Eusebius wrote with the collection of letters before him, and knew of no other collection besides the seven which he mentions. These, as we have seen, he arranges according to place and time of writing, gives his quotation from Romans as out of "the Epistles," and cites Irenaeus's quotation from Ignatius, as proof of that writer's knowledge of them, although Irenaeus did not mention the author's name.

IV. The gradual presentation of the various Ignatian documents to the modern world is related in the introduction to Cureton's Corpus Ignatianum and is briefly as follows. Late in the 15th and in the beginning of the 16th century twelve epistles, purporting to be from Ignatius, were given to the world, first in Latin translations, and then in the original Greek together with three others manifestly spurious, which existed in Latin alone. The epistles which bear non-Eusebian titles were soon suspected of spuriousness, and it was proved that the text of the Eusebian, as then known, was interpolated. But Ussher first restored the genuine text by means of a Latin translation which he discovered, and his arguments (except in the particular of his doubt whether Ignatius wrote separately to Polycarp) were confirmed by Vossius's publication of the Medicean MS. Thenceforward the world has had before it the longer and the shorter (or Vossian) recensions, the former of which contains the seven Eusebian epistles above-named in a longer text, and in addition epistles of Mary of Castabala to Ignatius, with his reply, of Ignatius to the Tarsians, Philippians, Antiochenes, and Hero, his successor; the Vossian comprising only the Eusebian letters, and those in a shorter text. The longer recension has had few defenders, while the shorter had many and early assailants, moved especially by its support of episcopacy. Of these Daillé was perhaps the ablest, but he was very widely considered to have been sufficiently answered by bishop Pearson. At present we may consider the genuineness of the longer recension as a whole to be out of court; the time and method of its interpolations and additions are the only points which it presents for consideration.

Mr. Cureton had in 1839 transcribed from Syriac MSS. in the British Museum a fragment of the martyrdom of Ignatius, and of the Epistle to the Romans therein contained. In 1847 the same scholar discovered, among the Syriac MSS. in the meantime acquired, three epistles of Ignatius, namely those to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and to the Romans, transcribed in the 6th or 7th century. These epistles are in a form considerably shorter still than the shorter recension of the earlier time. Its discoverer believed it to be the sole genuine text, and argued the point very ably, but with a confidence which in its contrast with the present state of belief should operate as a warning to all who are tempted to be too positive on any side of this difficult controversy. Many scholars at the time accepted the Curetonian theory, among whom Bunsen signalled himself by a voluminous work in its defence.

Among the various forms in which we possess the epistles, it but remains to notice the Armenian version, first printed, though very incorrectly, in 1783. It is mentioned by Cureton, who, however, by no means perceived the effect which its testimony was to have upon his own argument. The scholar to whom the correct publication and due estimate of the Armenian version are due is Petermann. According to this authority the Armenian was rendered out of the Syriac in the 5th century, and it agreed with Ussher's Latin MS. in that, while it contains several post-Eusebian epistles united with the Eusebian, the latter are free from any such systematic interpolations as those of the longer recension.

V. When we proceed to fix the date of the longer recension, we find that the latest of ancient writers who cites only the Eusebian epistles in the uninterpolated text is the monk Antonius in the early part of the 7th century (Cureton, p. 176; Zahn, ii. 350). Severus of Antioch, 6th century (Cureton, 212; Zahn, 352), cites all the Eusebian epistles in a text free from interpolations. So also Timotheus of Alexandria and Theodoret. In a rich collection of sentences culled from Ignatius, and given in the Syriac as ecclesiastical canons (Cureton, 197), there is no sign of the post-Eusebian epistles nor of interpolations, and all the Eusebian are cited except Romans.

We cannot doubt, then, that in Ussher's MS. and in the Armenian translation we have (minute textual criticism apart) the seven epistles as the fathers from Eusebius to Severus of Antioch used them; and as the interpolator had them before him to form the foundation of his work. The arguments of Ussher upon this point have never been answered. But he (p. 127) fixes the interpolations in the 6th century on the ground, perfectly sure, so far as it goes, that they must have been before Stephanus Gobarus, Anastasius of Antioch, and Gregory the Great, all of whom cite the interpolated text. But the Armenian, with the Syriac translation from which it sprang, bring back the composition of the six additional epistles to the year A.D. 400 at latest; and these are undoubtedly the work of the same hand which interpolated the others. On the other hand, the work of interpolation cannot have been done before 325, or Eusebius would have cited or alluded to it; moreover, it shews undoubted marks of dependence on his history. The epistle to the Antiochenes, for instance, commences with an expression cited by Eusebius (vi. 11) and by no other, from Alexander's epistle to that people. The period of the interpolator is thus fixed at the latter part of the 4th century. His doctrine, as Ussher shewed (p. 221), is stark Arianism.

Turrianus observed the connexion of Pseudo-Ignatius with the Apostolical Constitutions, thinking both genuine. Vedelius and others supposed that Pseudo-Ignatius used the Constitutions in his work of interpolation. Ussher believed that the interpolation of both the letters and the Constitutions came from the same source. But we do not seem to know more than that there is a near relationship of the two. The actual identity of the two interpolators does not seem consistent with the different ideas about the proper age of bishops in the two works: the Constitutions (ii. 1) directing that men not under fifty are to be chosen, and that any departure from this is only to be allowed as exceptional, while in Pseudo-Ignatius a deacon (Heron), who is not to be despised for his youth, is to succeed Ignatius upon his speedily approaching death, and the letters from and to Mary of Castabala have for their object the choice of young men. Pseudo-Ignatius appears to know the rule of the Constitutions on this point, and, from some motive or other, to oppose it. He shews acquaintance with the first six books of the Constitutions already interpolated from the Didascalia (see Apos- tolical Constitutions in DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITY) not with books vii. and viii. (Zahn, i. 151).

Several of the names in Pseudo-Ignatius are borrowed from the period A.D. 360 to 380. (Philost. iii. 15; Theod. i. 5; v. 7; Soc. iii. 25; iv. 12.) The titles selected for the new letters are also easily accounted for in the same period. It was very natural to insert a letter to the Antiochenes; for that to Tarsus in Cilicia the mention of Philo, the Cilician deacon, in the shorter letters (Smyrna and Philad.) gives a motive. That to the Philippians is hardest to account for; but its date from Rhegium points to Mart. Vat., which brings Ignatius that way. Pseudo-Ignatius also interests himself against the Quartodecimans; proving that they must have been still strong when he wrote, which was not the case at the very conclusion of the 4th century. The object of the fiction is the establishment of loyalty and unity against provincialism and novelty; hence the opposition at once to the Nicene formulary and to Marcellus and Photinus. These oppositions point to the period 360-380.

Thus all historical indications point out the second half of the 4th century as the date of the interpolations; their style and spirit indicate their author as a literary man full of platitudes, and detesting everything striking or extraordinary. The freshness and originality of the shorter recension are totally wanting in his work.

Upon the whole Zahn conjectures the interpolator to have been Acacius, the scholar, biographer, and successor of Eusebius at Caesarea, who, as Sozomen (iv. 23) informs us, was regarded as heir to the learning, as well as the position of that divine. The roughness of the known character of Acacius agrees with the abusiveness of Pseudo-Ignatius. His attacks upon ultra asceticism in respect of meats and marriage are in harmony with the part which Acacius took in the deposition of Eustathius of Sebaste in 360.

VI. Ussher had heard news of a Syrian translation of Ignatius, but Renaudot first gave to the world certain information on the subject, and published a collection of canons in which passages of Ignatius were included (Cureton, 197 sq.). The nature of the discovery made by Cureton has been narrated above. This scholar, it may be conjectured, would not so eagerly and confidently have sprung to the conclusion that he had detected a mass of forgery in the shorter Greek epistles, if it had not been for the similar achievement of Ussher in respect to the longer. But really there is nothing in the fact that the shorter recension had been enlarged into the longer which should lead us to anticipate that any previous process of the kind had taken place. The conjecture of Cureton, after Dailé, that the interpolator of the longer was tempted to his undertaking by a knowledge that the same thing had been done before, is most improbable. The probability is quite the other way, for one wishing to produce an effect by such means would certainly choose as the foundation of his inventions a composition to which no suspicion had ever been attached; the theory seems to be hardly more worthy of serious notice than M. Renan's airy statement that Ignatius was fated to be the subject of interpolation. A serious inquirer, after he has disposed of the longer recension, will find himself face to face with the question whether still another fiction remains behind without any rational prejudice whatever derived from the proved forgeries, which, though earlier discovered, were long subsequent in their concoction to any possible date of the suspected ones.

Different Syriac translations of Greek works give similar citations from Ignatius in somewhat varying language. The most probable solution of this phenomenon appears to be that the authors mentally recalled and cited from memory an existing Syriac version. Merx (Meletemata Ign. p. 79) contends that there were two such translations, and further believes that he discerns signs even of a third; the first the versio Severiana, the second more ancient, but both belonging to the 3rd century, the third containing the non-Eusebian epistles. To Merx, who is referred to with scant justice by Zahn, belongs great credit, as having first carried out that careful general examination of all the Syriac fragments which Cureton ought to have made, but had omitted. But against the theory of a plurality of Syriac versions, Zahn's arguments are apparently accepted by Lipsius (iii.). From the one Syriac translation Zahn contends that the Armenian version came in the 5th century, and from it, at perhaps a somewhat later period, the extracts were taken, which Cureton mistook for the original epistles.

We are to remember that the connexion in which Cureton's epistles were found is that of a series of extracts from fathers whose remaining works are not supposed to be rendered doubtful by their absence from this Syriac MS.; and Petermann (xii.) has corrected Bunsen's supposition that the concluding words of the MS. imply that the epistles of Ignatius, as known to the writer, were all comprised in what he copied. Zahn (pp. 199, 200) compares the Syriac extracts numbered i. and ii. in Corp. Ign., taken as they were, beyond doubt, from the existing Syriac translation, with S. Cur. (i.e. Cureton's Syriac Epp.); and apparently succeeds in making out that the same translator, whose work is presented in a fragmentary form in S. Cur. meets us in these extracts. E.g. the expression θηριομαχεῖν, and many other peculiar words, are similarly rendered; though no. i. seems sometimes to preserve better the text from which it was copied. [We may here mention that Lipsius (iii.), while recalling his former opinion that S. Cur. is the genuine form of the epistles, maintains his belief that there is a difference between the text of the seven Eusebian epistles as we have them in their shorter form, and that which formed the basis of the interpolator's work, and that the Curetonian epistles often agree with the latter rather than the former.] Zahn (i. pp. 187, 213, 221) offers evidence, that independently of the Armenian version, unmistakable allusions in Ephrem Syrus and in one Cyrillonas prove the existence of a Syriac translation of Ignatius soon after the middle of the 4th century; and that, not in Cureton's text, but in a far completer one. The letter of John the Monk (Corp. Ig. 205), contemporary with Ephrem Syrus, has been thought to be a witness in favour of S. Cur., since he cites four sentences from Romans which are to be found in that version. But he speaks of Ignatius as writing letters to the famous cities, by which he must mean the greater cities which lay in the way from Antioch to Rome; and it seems impossible he could have used the expression had he known, besides Romans, which he cites, only the epistles to the Ephesians and Polycarp. The isolation of Romans (see next section) does not seem to have prevailed in the East, since the manner in which it and the others are quoted is precisely similar. If Cureton's fragment (i.) cites the six others and not Romans, that is accounted for by the fact that Romans contained nothing about church government. The Syrians and Armenians know nothing of the seven Eusebian epistles in their interpolated condition; the additional six cannot have been translated into Syriac sooner than from 400-450, and Petermann has shewn that in respect of these, too, the Armenian version is from the Syriac. The translator of the six must have attached them to the former version of the seven without interpolating the latter.

We may cull from S. Cur. itself certain proofs that it was not the original. The epistle to Polycarp ends in that version with the words, "I salute thee who wert deemed worthy to go to Antioch in my place;" an expression which, in spite of what Lipsius has urged, certainly implies that the person in question was supposed to be Ignatius's successor in the bishopric. Now Ignatius could not have written this; such a method of filling the bishopric of Antioch as the despatch of a successor from Smyrna, could not have been thought of by him; and if the writer of S. Cur. was led into this error by the epistle to the Antiochenes (xiv.), that proves that he used the same larger collection as the Armenian translator a century before him. In the beginning of Romans, again, the correct reading is: "I write to all the churches, and testify to every man"; an expression very unsuitable if he was writing only to two churches and Polycarp. S. Cur. therefore knows of other epistles. Must we not see in its words an allusion to the epistles to the Ephesians, Magnesians, and Trallians written during the same residence in Smyrna, which his Syrian countrymen knew long before he wrote, and which we have in our hands? (See on this whole question Baur, Erster Abschnitt.)

Moreover, there are certain passages in Cureton's Syriac which are plainly not complete in themselves; we select one from each of his three epistles. That to the Ephesians begins with a salutation, but has none at the conclusion; and the version of the celebrated passage concerning the three secrets of the cry is incomprehensible as it stands in the Syriac. For the epitomator not understanding that the three New Testament facts just mentioned were themselves the three secrets in question, inserts an "and" which utterly confuses the sense. The conclusion of the epistle to Polycarp in the Syriac is also plainly imperfect. And Lipsius himself confessed that Rom. vi.-x. flow so well in the Greek text that the tests by which he discovers interpolations quite failed him in this case, and he called in the aid of the Syriac fragments to fill up the blank in Cureton's text, thus admitting the imperfection of the latter. On the whole, as Baur observes (52) "it is much easier to explain the Syrian text by the professedly interpolated one than vice versa."

As for the motive of the epitomator it is surely quite sufficient to suppose that he intended to make one of those selections of the best parts of a good work, which in all ages have been practised upon the most eminent writers without disrespect; Hefele (see Denzinger, pp. 8, 196) believes himself able to discern the practical ascetic purpose of the selection, and we observe that very naturally the abbreviator begins each epistle with a design of taking all that is most edifying; but his resolution or the space at his command fails him before the end, and he abridges far more at the conclusion than at the beginning. His form of Ephesians has alone a uniform character of epitome from the first; which seems accounted for by the fact that very early in Ephesians come a number of personal names plainly fit to be omitted. Denzinger powerfully urges (p. 77 sq.) the certainty that the Monophysites would have complained when the seven epistles were quoted against them had these been spurious, and he and Uhlhorn have fully shewn how entirely the epitomator is committed to any doctrines in the shorter recension which can be found difficult. What a useless and objectless task then would any one have had in interpolating and extending Cureton's three into the seven which we possess! And upon the whole case we seem able to pronounce with much confidence that the Curetonian theory is never likely to revive from the abeyance into which it has at present fallen.

VII. The epistle to the Romans stands in a position somewhat different from the other six Eusebian letters, being used by some authors who use no others, and omitted by some who cite the others. The explanation of this fact is, according to Zahn, that Romans did not at first belong to the collection, but was propounded by itself, whether in union with a martyrdom or not. That a literary man like Eusebius, or an admirer of Ignatius, such as Severus of Antioch, should possess both Romans in this separate form and the collection of six, does not prove that the whole seven were united in a volume. That Romans was at first absent from the collection seems to be indicated by the fact that it escaped without the interpolations which the other epistles suffered at the hands, probably, of Acacius. And the solution of this difference of fate Zahn finds in the circumstances of the first collection of Ignatius's letters. The church of Philippi having heard Ignatius during his journey through Macedonia, learnt that he had written letters from Smyrna and Troas, and wrote to Polycarp to send them. Polycarp replied in the epistle which we possess, before the news of the death of Ignatius at Rome had arrived; and he attached to his answer the letters to the bishop and church of Smyrna and those to the Ephesians, Trallians, Magnesians, and Philadelphians, all which were easily attainable to him; Romans only had gone out of his reach. Among Zahn's critics Hilgenfeld (ii.) does not believe that this distinction between the position of Romans and that of the other epistles is reconcilable with Eusebius; while Renan, on the other hand, accepts it so fully as to maintain that Romans alone is genuine, the rest spurious.

VIII. The circumstances of the journey and martyrdom of Ignatius, as we gather them from the seven epistles and from that of Polycarp, are as follows:—He suffers under a merely local persecution. It is in progress at Antioch while he is in Smyrna, whence he writes the epistles to the Romans, Ephesians, Magnesians, and Trallians. But Rome, Magnesia (xii.), and Ephesus (xii.) are at peace. And in Troas he learns that peace is restored to the church in Antioch. Of the local causes of this Antiochene persecution we are ignorant, but it is not in the least difficult to credit. The imagined meeting of the emperor and the saint is not found in the epistles; it is "the world" under whose enmity the church is there said to suffer. All now recognise that, according to the testimony of the letters, Ignatius has been condemned in Antioch to death, and journeys with death by exposure to the beasts as the settled fate before him. He deprecates interposition of the church at Rome (quite powerful enough at the end of the 1st century to be conceivably successful in such a movement) for the remission of a sentence already delivered. The supposition of Hilgenfeld (i. 200) that prayer to God for his martyrdom, or abstinence from prayer against it, is what he asks of the Romans seems quite inadmissible, and we could not conceive him so assured of the approach of death as we find him to be, if the sentence had not been already pronounced. The right of appellation to the emperor was recognised, and could be made even without the consent of the criminal, but only if the sentence had proceeded from some magistrate other than the emperor himself. And thus the Colbertine Martyrdom, which makes Trajan the judge at Antioch, contradicts the epistles no less than the Vatican which puts off the process to Rome.

Ms. Coll., in spite of what Denzinger has said (p. 68), brings Ignatius by sea to Smyrna; but Eusebius, who had read the epistles, supposes the journey thither to be by land, and it is plain that he is right. The journey "by land and sea" (Ad. Rom. v.) may easily refer to a voyage from Selencia to some Cilician port, and thence by road; but that the journey was chiefly by road follows from Rom. ix., where he says that the churches received him οὐχ ὡς παροδεύοντα and κατὰ πόλιν με προήγον; and he met the heretics against whom he warns the Ephesians on the way journeying from thence (παροδεύσαντας ἐκείθεν). It seems that the ordinary way of passing from Antioch to Ephesus was by land, and Ignatius calls the messenger to be sent by the Smyrnaeans to Antioch θεοδρόμος (Pol. vii.). Ignatius did not come by the common road which led through Magnesia and Ephesus, but left the great road at Sardis, and came by Laodicea, Hierapolis, Philadelphia, and perhaps Colossae, as we learn by the fact that he had certainly visited Philadelphia and met there the false teachers from Ephesus (Zahn, 258 sq. also 266 sq.).

The churches to which the author writes were not chosen at random, but were those which had shewn their love to him by sending messengers to him. The letters were therefore, in the first place, letters of thanks, which quite naturally extend themselves into admonitions; and this furnishes the occasio scribendi.

We find the writer throughout his journey in the enjoyment of much freedom, though chained to a soldier. In Philadelphia he preaches, not in a church, but in a large assembly of Christians; in Smyrna enjoys intercourse not merely with the believers of that place, but with the messengers of other churches. He has much speech with the bishops concerning the state of the churches. That of Ephesus he treats with special respect, and anticipates writing a second letter (Ad Eph. xx.); that of Tralles he addresses in a markedly different manner (Ad Tr. 2, 12). He must, therefore, have had time in Smyrna to acquaint himself with the condition of all the neighbouring churches. If the writing of epistles under the circumstances of his captivity should cause surprise, it must be remembered that it is only short letters that he writes, and not books. The expression βιβλίον, which in Eph. xx. he applies to his intended second missive, is often applied to letters. He dictated to a Christian, and thus might, as Pearson remarks, have finished one of the shorter letters in an hour; the longest in three. Perpetua and Saturus wrote in prison narratives as long as the epistles of Ignatius (Acta SS. Perp. et Fel. Ruinart). The supposition of a ten days' sojourn in Smyrna would amply meet all the necessities of the case; and we know too little of the circumstances to pronounce it unlikely that his guard, for some reason of their own, would have made such a stay. Nor is there anything in the treatment which the letters suppose extended to Ignatius inconsistent with that used to other Christian prisoners; notably not with that of St. Paul. There is, indeed, no exactly parallel case on record (see Lightfoot, ii.); but the numberless libelli pacis, written by the martyrs in prison, and the celebrations of the holy mysteries there with their friends in periods when we have no reason at all to suppose the treatment of Christians more lenient than in that of Ignatius, forbid us to consider the liberty given him extraordinary, more especially as the word ἐνεργετούμενοι which he applies to his guard points, doubtless, to money given them by the Christians.

Ignatius is always eager to know more Christians, and to interest them in each other. The news of the cessation of persecution in Antioch stirs him to urge Polycarp to take an interest in that church. The great idea of the Catholic church is at work in him. He does not deny that his request that messengers should be sent to Antioch is an unusual one, but dwells upon the greatness of the benefit which will result (Pol. 7; Sm. 11; Phil. 10).

But when Polycarp, in a few weeks or months afterwards, writes his epistle to the Philippians, the messenger has not yet been sent. At this later period Ignatius has but lately passed through Philippi, going by the Via Egnatia to Neapolis. The Philippians have written immediately after to Polycarp; and forwarded a message to the Antiochenes, expecting to be in time to catch the messenger for Antioch before his departure. Ignatius has plainly been suggesting the same thoughts to them as he had to Polycarp; and this would be plainer still if the reading in Eus. H. E. iii. 36. 14 (ἐγράψατέ μοι καὶ ὑμεῖς καὶ Ἰγνάτιος) were more sure, and thus a second letter had been received by Polycarp from Ignatius. But this second epistle, if written, has been lost. Polycarp wrote immediately after receiving the epistle of the Philippians. He speaks of the death of Ignatius, knowing from the fact of the sentence in Antioch that it was certain; knowing also probably the date of the games at which he was to die. But he is not acquainted with any particulars, since he asks for news concerning the martyr and those with him (Ep. Pol. xiii.), and according to the request of the Philippians Polycarp forwards all the epistles of Ignatius to which he had access, namely, those to the Asiatic churches, which it is natural to suppose copied and exchanged among them; but not all that he knew to have been written.

IX. The chief difficulty in the way of accepting the epistles as genuine has always been found in the form of church government which they record as existing, and which they support with great emphasis. In the cities of Asia Minor and in Syria, they display to us the threefold ministry established, and the terms Ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος are applied to perfectly distinct orders; a state of things and use of language which is argued to be wholly incompatible with a date early in the 2nd century. Hence Daillé derived his "palmary argument" (cap. xvi., answered by Pears. ii. 13). But Daillé ascribed the forgery to the period when the conversion of Constantine or of his father had begun to be rumoured; departing herein from the belief of former critics upon his own side, who had suggested dates varying from 150 to 210 (Pears. i. 6). Later negative critics have found themselves, for other reasons, compelled to return to the earliest of these dates, or (as in the case of Lipsius) to one ten years earlier still. But though the era of the supposed forgery is thus brought within a quarter of a century of a period consistent with the genuineness of the writings, the certainty is not abated with which it is thought possible to pronounce the episcopacy of the letters inconsistent with that belief.

But it is very noteworthy that the testimony of the epistles on this point extends no further than the localities just named. In the epistle to the Romans Ignatius only once names the office of a bishop, and that in reference to himself; and in Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians, there is absolute silence as to the existence of any bishop, while the deacons and presbyters are addressed at considerable length. At the first blush this circumstance strikes one as being adverse to the supposition that the epistles are forgeries. For instance, if we accepted the theory that either the seven or, omitting Romans, the six, Ignatian epistles were fabricated in the interests of episcopacy, while that of Polycarp was composed as an introduction to them (Hilgenfeld, ii.), it seems inexplicable that the introduction should be thus entirely unconnected if not inconsistent with the body of the forgery upon the very point which is supposed to furnish its motive. It is unnecessary to this argument to imagine with Zahn that the letters on supposition of their genuineness imply a consent on the part of their authors to the existence of presbyterian government at Rome and Philippi, or even the fact that there were no bishops there. All that is needed is to observe that the writers of these two epistles have not urged upon our attention the existence of any bishops in these eminent churches, whose example was more likely to be influential with those whom it was desired to guide than any others in the list. According to Zahn the principle discernible in the epistles is this, that where bishops existed, as they did in Asia Minor and Syria, obedience should be rendered to them under those sacred and awful sanctions, the mention of which has appeared so exaggerated to many in after times; but that this does not imply any condemnation, on the part of the writer, of churches such as Rome, where he knew that episcopacy did not exist. In fact it would seem that, according to Zahn, Ignatius recommends obedience to church governors for the sake of unity, in a very parallel way to that in which submission to the powers that be in the temporal government is inculcated in the New Testament without implying any abstract preference for one form of power above another. Certainly this seems to put a considerable force upon the words of the epistles. But the phenomena are perfectly consistent with the supposition that episcopacy existing from the times of the apostles in Asia Minor and Syria, and believed by the Christians of those parts to be a divinely ordained institution, made its way gradually throughout other parts of the church, and that those who most valued it might yet know that it did not exist in churches to which they wrote, or not be assured that it did, and might feel it no part of their duty to enter upon a controversy concerning it.

Zahn's scheme finds a difficulty in the words of Ad Eph. iii. οἱ ἐπίσκοποι οὐ κατὰ τὰ πέρατα θρισθέντες. And though (i. 299) he tries to explain the passage consistently with his theory, yet it appears from his note (ii. in loc.) that the explanation does not satisfy him, and he seems inclined to alter the text (see Hilgenfeld, ii.). But the passage is consistent with the supposition that the institution, thoroughly needful in the writer's opinion, was gradually making its way in various parts of the world. A similar observation may be made upon the passage in Trall. 3, which declares of bishops and presbyters that χωρὶς τούτων ἐκκλησία οὐ καλεῖται. Zahn understands the declaration to be opposed not to the supposition of a church constituted without bishops and presbyters, but to that of a church practically conducted without the concurrences of the ministry of whatever degree, who as matter of fact existed in it. No doubt this is the immediate application of the words; but it is difficult to deny that a stronger sanction of episcopacy lies at their root. This, however, is perfectly in harmony with the conception of the condition of the time which we have just sketched.

But there is one branch of Zahn's argument to which we can give the fullest concurrence, and to which, so far as we are aware, his critics have attempted no answer. He observes that there is no attempt whatever even in those epistles in which obedience to the bishop is exalted to the highest, at recommending it in opposition to other forms of church government. Not only is the supposition that Ignatius was introducing episcopacy utterly out of the question, but none of the epistles bear the slightest trace of any recent introduction of the institution in the places in which it exists; for the passage in Mgn. 3 refers, as the preceding context shews, to the rule of a young bishop, not a recently introduced episcopate. There is no sign of any dispute of the episcopal authority on the part of the disobedient; even those who resist it yet recognise it in words (Mgn. 4). If episcopacy had not been a settled institution, the opposition to it would have come from the inferior orders of the clergy; but there is no trace of any such thing (Eph. 4, 6; Mgn. 2, 3). The presbyterate is everywhere identified with the episcopate in its claims to obedience, and those who resist the one resist the other. Passages of this nature indeed afforded to the early Puritans arguments that Ignatius favoured the "congregational way," which Hammond (ch. vi.) is not altogether successful in repelling. It is extremely hard to reconcile these characteristics with the supposition that the letters were forged, either to introduce the rule of bishops, or to uplift it to an unprecedented position for the purpose of resisting the assaults of heresy. Those who feel any plausibility in such suppositions will do well to read the letters over, with the special intention of observing whether they support episcopacy in the particular way and against the particular opponents and objections, of which we should necessarily have found traces in the case supposed.

A good deal of uncertainty remains as to the relations which the smaller congregations outside the limits of the cities held in the Ignatian church order to the bishops of the latter. In the idea there expressed, the jurisdiction of the bishop is co-extensive with that of the college of presbyters, and no provision seems to be made for episcopal rule over country congregations whose pastors are not in the "presbytery"; an uncommon expression in antiquity, but used thirteen times by Ignatius. We may, however, conceive very well that a good deal in these matters remained to be arranged by the necessities of things in the course of time. For instance, we may not quite go with Pearson, who argues that when Ignatius calls himself (Ad Rom. ii.) τὸν ἐπίσκοπον Συρίας, he means that Syria was, in the modern sense of an organised authority, his diocese. Yet diocesan episcopacy may in its germ be comprehended in the phrase, like the rule of a temporal prince, consolidated in some centre, and ready to be extended in time and by the necessity of things, to the outlying parts.

The duties which the epistles ascribe to the bishop are very similar to those which St. Paul (Acts xx.) lays upon the presbyters. Only in one place (Pol. 5) do they speak of the preaching of the bishop; and it is not peculiar to him, but common with the presbyters. The deacons have other duties wholly distinct from these; they concern themselves with the meat and drink given to the poor, and with the distribution of the mysteries of the Eucharist. But the presbyters are very closely united with the bishop. They are not his vicars, but his συνέδριον (Phil. 8; Pol. 7), and yet the bishop by no means appears as a mere president of the college of presbyters. Zahn shews that even though the development of episcopacy were thought to have taken place through the elevation of one of a college to a presidency, in those parts where it did not exist in the end of the 1st century, it would still be impossible to hold this to have been the case in Asia. The one fact of the youth of many of the earliest Asiatic bishops puts this theory out of the question in respect to them. Whatever development or change is implied in the passage from the state of things represented in 1st Peter and 1st Timothy to organised episcopacy, took place, according to the testimony of all records both of Scripture and tradition, in the thirty years between the death of St. Paul and the time of Domitian; had Asia Minor for its centre, and was conducted under the influence of St. John and apostolic men from Palestine, in which country Jerusalem offers us the records of a succession of bishops more trustworthy perhaps than that of any other see. Now the Syrian churches were from the first in the closest union with Palestine. And thus all the most undoubted records of episcopacy in the sub-apostolic age centre in the very same quarters in which our epistles represent it as existing, a coincidence which is certainly of weight in determining the question of their authenticity.

It is certainly somewhat startling to those accustomed to regard bishops as the successors of the apostles that Ignatius everywhere speaks of the position of the apostles as corresponding to that of the existing presbyters, while the prototype of the bishop is not the apostles, but the Lord Himself. Zahn does not sufficiently mark, however, how hasty it would be to infer from this that Ignatius regarded bishops as representatives of a position higher than that of the apostles, or denied that the office and authority of the apostles is represented and historically succeeded by that of the bishops. The state of things visibly displayed when the Lord and His apostles walked the earth together is for Ignatius the type of church order for all time. And he is not to be taken as denying that after Christ had left the earth, and while His apostles still remained on it, each of them in his sphere represented the Lord, while the presbyters under him took towards him the place which he and his brother apostles had taken towards their Master. (See Bp. Harold Browne, The Strife and the Victory, 1872, p. 62.) There can, however, be little doubt that had the epistles been forged to support episcopacy, they would not have omitted an argument of such weight as the apostolical authority and succession.

As may be expected from this close union of the invisible Saviour with the visible church order, the duty of submission is with Ignatius the first call upon each member of the church, and exhortations to personal holiness go hand in hand with admonitions to unity and obedience. The word ὑποτάσσεται denotes the duty of all, not (be it marked) towards the bishop alone, but towards authority in all its steps (Mgn. 13 and 7). But the bishop represents the principle of unity in the church. Ignatius does not seem to feel the need of grounding his demand of obedience to the bishop upon personal service rendered by the latter. It follows directly from duty to God for all who have place in His church.

Sprintz ingeniously argues (p. 67) that the supremacy of the bishop of Rome is taught by Ignatius, on the ground that, first, he teaches the supremacy of the Roman church over others (Rom. proem.), and, secondly, teaches the supremacy of the bishop in every church. But the explanation of the passage in Romans is very doubtful, and the marked omission of any mention of the bishop of Rome seems, at all events, inconsistent with the supposition of a supremacy belonging to him apart from the natural position of his church.

The emphatic terms in which these letters propose the bishop as the representative of Christ have always presented a stumbling-block to many minds, even apart from the question of date. But before we pronounce these expressions exaggerated, we must remember that obedience to the bishop is valued by the writer for the sake of unity, while unity is for him the only fence against the heresy to which small and disunited bodies are subject (Phil. 4, 8; Mgn. 1, &c.). Also it seems obvious to remark that identification of the position of the church ruler with that of the Lord would be more easy to a writer of an age very close to Christ than to one of later date. When the Divine nature of the Lord and His elevation in heaven come through lapse of time to overshadow the remembrance of His life on earth, it seems a superhuman claim on the part of any office to say that it represents Him. But it would naturally be otherwise when the recollection of His human intercourse with men was fresh; for why should not men represent one so truly man? Thus the strong expressions in question may in truth be a mark of early date.

X. In our epistles (Sm. 8) is first found the phrase Catholic Church. The expression is pronounced by Lipsius (iii.) to prove of itself the later date of the epistles. But it is impossible to feel such a decision otherwise than very precarious, even if, with Lipsius, we reject the testimony of the Martyrdom of Polycarp to the use of the expression. It must first have been used by some one; why not by Ignatius as well as another? If, indeed, his use of it implied the Catholic organization of later times, the argument would have much weight. But this is not at all the case. The expression, "Where Jesus Christ is there is the Catholic church" might be used by any one who had taken in the idea of the church presented to us in such passages of Scripture as Eph. iv. (see on the use of the phrase Lightfoot; p. 205). Srintz remarks that the phrase naturally follows upon the preceding statement of the relation of the bishop to the particular church: what the bishop is to it, that Christ is to the Catholic church at large. And thus to Ignatius the church of each place is a miniature of the church at large (Sm. 8), and its unity is guarded by all the sanctions of the Christian faith.

The one faith, that is to say, the continued activity of the divine facts of Christianity, is in the epistles the bond of the church. "The gospel" is that which the apostles as the presbyterate of the church proclaimed (Phil. 5). It means not the four written gospels, but the substance of the message of salvation. The manner in which the writer speaks of the apostles as the proclaimers of this gospel implies that they, like the prophets and like the flesh of Christ, to which He compares their message, have a way of being as actually present as the existing presbyters. And this shews that their writings at the time existed to be the constant model of the proclamation of the gospel by the church. The New Testament is for Ignatius already a written collection like the Old. (Sm. 5, and especially Sm. 7, 2.) He quotes it with the word ῥέγραπται (Phil. 8). Its revelation consists of the deeds and sufferings, and also of the words of Christ. (Mgn. 8; Eph. 3, 9, 17; Rom. Inscr. Mgn. 2.) The apostles being for Ignatius the presbyterate of the church and ruling being the office of presbyters, admonition to right doing is the office of the apostles. Διατάσσεται is the word which denotes its exercise (Tr. 3, 7; Rom. 4), and the διατάγματα of the apostles are normal for the church. Thus the facts of Christianity living in the church constitute the bond of a unity which is invisible as regards its essential elements and principles, but visible and real in its results. It is a fleshly union, exercised and exemplified in individual congregations (Rom. ix.; Eph. i.); and in it the bishop is the type and exemplification of Christ, the presbyters of the apostles. The deacons have no counterpart in the invisible church.

We find in the epistles the germ of the great ideas of worship afterwards developed in the church. The altar-idea and the temple-idea as applied to the church are there (Eph. 5; Mgn. 7; Phil. 4). The Eucharist holds its commanding place (Rom. 7; Phil. 4, and probably Eph. 5), though the question what were its rites at this early period is hard to answer from the letters. Ἀγάπη (Sm. 8) is applied to the Eucharist, and ἀγαπᾶν (Sm. 7) means to celebrate it. In Ignatian phraseology Εὐχαριστία is used where the blessing of Holy Communion is denoted, Ἀγάπη means the whole service of which the consecration is only a moment. In Sm. 7 those who speak against the gifts of God are plainly those who deny τὴν εὐχαριστίαν σάρκα εἶναι τοῦ σωτήρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. From Mgn. 8, 9, we learn that Christians did not keep the Jewish Sabbath, but did observe the Lord's Day.

XI. With respect to the theology of the epistles great differences of opinion have prevailed. The more significant theological statements are called out by the heresies to which the writer opposes his conception of the nature of Christ, yet does not fall into a controversial tone. The originality and reality of the revelation in Christ is the great point with him. Hence follows the unreasonableness of Judaizing, which he sometimes presses in terms apparently inconsistent with the recognition of Jewish Christians as really believers. But probably, like St. Paul, he is treating the question from the Gentile stand-point alone. Prophets and the law are worthy of all honour in Christ; πάντα δοῦν καλὰ ἔστιν ἐὰν ἐν ἀγάπῃ πιστεύητε. The prophets were Christians in spirit, and Christ raised them from the dead (Mgn. 9). They were believers in Christ; yea, even the angels must believe in His blood (Sm. 6). But for this practical and real salvation finding its expression in history the heretics would substitute a shadowy representation of religious notions in a merely apparent and unreal life of Christ. Therefore we find Ignatius constantly adding the word ἀληθῶς to his records of the acts of Christ (Sm. 3, 4; Tr. 10). Ἐν σαρκί is an equivalent phrase. And the Blood is named with or instead of the Flesh, to shew that the Lord had in death the same bodily constitution as in life, of which the faithful partake in the Eucharist. Being real flesh Christ was the New Man, and the revelation of God in the earth (Eph. 18). He is an eternal Person, but He is God's Son, as born of Mary and of God. When the writer speaks of an outcoming of Christ from God, he means the Incarnation, and not anything previous. Though he uses the epithet ἄδιος with Λόγος, yet he does not seem to mean that it is as Λόγος that the Lord is eternal. It is as incarnate and as man, that He is the Logos of God. His twofold nature furnishes the explanation of the opposite attributes ascribed to Him (Eph. 7; Pol. 3). Baur and Lipsius have discovered Patripassianism in the last quoted passage. But this accusation is inconsistent with all the rest of the epistles, and seems, indeed, to have been since surrendered by Lipsius himself. In opposition to Baur's assertion that except in one suspected place there is no mention of Christ as Son of God, Zahn finds himself able to enumerate twenty-nine cases in which this takes place. The epistles lay vast stress upon the Godhead of the Lord; it is because of this that His birth is the entrance of the New Man, and His death the resurrection of the faithful. To them He stands in a personal and practical relation, which makes Him their God. His present invisible relation to them involves an increase of the activity of His Godhead, and of its revelation to men (Ad Rom. 3; Ad Eph. 15); but He was always God. Therefore Ignatius can speak of the blood and of the suffering of God (Eph. 1; Rom. 6). The τρία μυστήρια κραυγῆς, the three mysteries loudest in proclamation of truth to those who can hear, are the Incarnation, Birth, and Death of Christ, hid in their real significance from the devil and from the unbelieving. Neither the term Son nor the term Λόγος is applied to express the relations of the divine Persons in themselves. The writer contents himself with maintaining on the one hand the unity of God, on the other the eternal personality of Christ. The absolutely Trinitarian expressions in the epistles are few, but remarkable from the fact that the Son is repeatedly placed before the Father and the Spirit, shewing that it was no mechanical recollection of the formula of baptism which caused the juxtaposition of the Three Persons (Eph. 9; Mgn. 13).

XII. The question what special heresies are denounced in the epistles possesses, in relation to their date, an importance scarcely below that of episcopacy. All of them, except Romans, contain warnings against heresy, and the exhortations to unity and submission to authority derive their urgency from the pressure of this danger. It was long a question whether two forms of heresy, Judaic and Docetic, or only one, Judaic-docetic, were aimed at. But already in 1856, despite the arguments of Hilgenfeld (i. 230), it appeared to Lipsius (i. 31) that this question was decided in the latter sense. The heretics in question were wandering teachers, ever seeking proselytes (Eph. 7), and all the denunciations of heresy are directed against that mixture of Judaism with Gnosticism, the representatives of which had been met by the writer in his journey (Mgn. 8, 10, 11; Tr. 9; Sm. 1). The idea of Ritschl (Entst. der altk. Kirche, p. 580), that Montanism is to be discerned in the teachers whom the epistles reprove, appears to have met with little favour. No separation in the church had occurred save in Philadelphia, and perhaps at Ephesus; the former being apparently the place where these false teachers had come in contact with the writer. But we are not to suppose that he had no acquaintance with their form of heresy until he had met it in Asia Minor. He speaks as one who knew it well, having met it in Antioch, where also other heresies had been developed. But this particular form alone had spread into Asia Minor. The teachers of it do not appear to have been openly immoral, and they did not require circumcision of the Gentiles. But thinking of Christianity as a temporary development of the permanent religion Judaism, they drew chiefly from the Old Testament, and Ignatius repeatedly explains that his condemnation of them implied no depreciation of the prophets. In Phil. 8 occurs a well-known passage, which, if we read ἀρχαίους and ἀρχαία, involves a declaration on the part of the heretics that they would not believe unless convinced from the Old Testament. But Zahn, with many authorities, reads ἀρχαίους and ἀρχαία, i.e. original sources or written records; and his observations upon Hilgenfeld's opposite criticism will be found in ii. 78. Thorough Docetism is the only Gnostic doctrine which Ignatius ascribes to these men. They applied it to the whole life of Jesus before death and in resurrection, and by a perfectly natural sequence of thought they applied it to the doctrine of the Eucharist. We are not in a position to decide whether they thought of all the earthly acts of Jesus as unreal, or of these acts as real while the connexion of the real Christ with them was illusory. Probably the former was the case.

Cureton and other critics have supposed themselves to discern direct allusions to the teaching of Valentinus in the epistles (but see Pearson II. vi.). But the allusion contained in the words Λόγος ἀπὸ Σιγῆς προελθὼν (Mgn. 8) is not applicable to Valentinus, who placed many aeons between Σιγή and the Logos, and in respect of whom Irenaeus recalls his dependence on previous systems precisely at this point of the invention of an aeon Σιγή. (On the reading in this passage see Zahn, ii. in loc.; Lightfoot, ii.; Funk, lxx.) In truth it is not possible to fix the date at which heresy first took hold of the conception of the Logos. (See on the whole question Denzinger, p. 15 sq.) The Docetism which is so persistently attributed in the epistles to the heretics who are the subjects of their denunciation, afford better means of comparison than this one sentence concerning the Logos.

Now, for the records which are most nearly contemporary with Ignatius, A.D. 110, we must fall back on the later New Testament writings, on the so-called Epistles of Barnabas, on Hege-sippus, and on the information given us by the fathers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries upon the earliest form of the heresies of Basilides and Valentinus. The latter may be in his own person too late. But Basilides is probably early enough, and disciples of his might have been wandering in Asia Minor; Cerinthus too was of this age. In the New Testament the two first epistles of St. John contain warnings against Docetism, which Polycarp in his Epistle (7) applies to the heretics of his own time, which was also that of Ignatius. Of all the heretics whom Bunsen and others have supposed the epistles to denounce, Saturninus alone can be really proved to have held the doctrines which they condemn. He taught Docetism strongly enough (Tr. i. 24, 2); and all the condemnations which our epistles direct against that tendency might apply to him; although the particular teachers whom the writer has in view added Judaistic tenets to his Docetism. But he was a contemporary and fellow-citizen of Ignatius. In truth we have not much information outside our epistles regarding the development of Gnosticism in the reign of Trajan; only a few words of Hege-sippus and Justin. But these convey two facts highly consistent with the epistles. 1. The connexion of Gnosis with Judaism. 2. That the older form was the more Docetic. The form of heresy which the letters denounce must have existed at some time or other; we really cannot feel the least confidence that it is more likely to have existed in A.D. 145 than in A.D. 110. And Uhlhorn (in Herzog's Enc.) well remarks that the expressions τινες and ὀλίγοι ἄφρονες (Sm. 5; Tr. 8) would have been inapplicable to the heretics at any late period of the spread of Gnosticism.

XIII. When we try to frame to ourselves a conception of the personality of the writer of these epistles, we are of course shut up to the information which they themselves convey. And from the epistles, as Hilgenfeld (i. 225-6) truly remarks, different critics, according to their bias, have conceived themselves able to derive in some cases the very highest, and in some the very poorest, notion of the writer's character. The letters are in themselves indeed more characteristic than any which remain to us between the time of St. Paul and the great fathers of the 4th century; but they give us no record of the writer's surroundings or of his ways in his diocese when the times were quiet. His name is Latin; but this indicates nothing as to his race any more than the names Crispus and Marcus which occur in the New Testament. His style is very Semitic. He had not seen the Lord or the apostles, and was not, as Ms. Colb. makes him, a fellow pupil with Polycarp, of St. John. It is perhaps somewhat precarious to infer with Zahn, from his strong terms of self-reproach (Eph. 21; Mgn. 14), that he had led an un-Christian or anti-Christian life in early years. The longing for death which he expresses is we grant extreme; but such is the realizing power of his faith that this longing is really for life under another and better form. We do not know that he courted martyrdom before his judges, since we only meet him after he has been condemned, and is well used to the idea. And as he was the only martyr of the persecution—certainly, at least, the only one sent to Rome—it seems not unnatural (in spite of what Hilgenfeld, i. 220, objects) that he should, out of the fulness of a simple heart, and without any contradiction of a genuine humility, make his martyrdom a chief theme in every epistle. We do not really know that he considered martyrdom in the light which was afterwards so common in the church, as a reconciliation for others (see Zahn, ii. 13, on the words ἀντίψυχον and περίψημα). All his exhortations have the one burden and object, closer union with Christ. He bids others seek, and seeks himself that union in permanence and perfection which the Holy Eucharist gives here in part. He does not imagine death in itself to have any value (Rom. 4; Tr. 3, 4; Eph. 12; Sm. 4). The prayers he asks are not for his death, but for his due preparation (Eph. 21; Mgn. 14; Tr. 12, 13). Flattery has been attributed to him; but his strongest expressions of praise are given to the church of Antioch, of which he does not write at all. For an interesting summary of the moral aspect of the Ignatian epistles in respect, first, to the personality of the writer, and, secondly, to the ideal which his teaching presents, see Sprintzl, p. 244 sqq.

XIV. The great majority of critics, whether adverse to the genuineness of the epistles or not, have recognised the fact that the seven epistles professing to be of Ignatius, and the one of Polycarp, form an indivisible whole. As regards the seven Ignatian, the great reason for this is found in the individuality of the author as there displayed. M. Renan, indeed, is an exception to this prevailing tone of opinion. He recognises the freshness and individuality of Romans, but regards the others, with the exception of two or three passages, as cold, commonplace, desperately monotonous, without living peculiarities. But this character of the style of the writings appears to us extremely exaggerated. It has always, indeed, been allowed that Romans is the brightest and most interesting of the letters. But the circumstances shew a reason for this. The chief subject of Romans is the personal eagerness of the writer for martyrdom; he is writing to the place where he expects to suffer, and to people who have the power of helping or hindering his object. It would have been unnatural had the other letters of admonition and exhortation displayed the same rapidity of style. But they also are full of characteristic phrases, and are not different from what might be expected of the author of Romans, writing in the circumstances and on the subjects to which they refer.

The epistle of Polycarp contains a witness for the whole body of epistles, which (if it be genuine) renders almost all others superfluous; since it mentions letters written to Smyrna itself by Ignatius, and by Polycarp collected and sent to Philippi; and it intimates the existence of others besides. Thus those who believe the Ignatian letters to be a production of the second half of the 2nd century are forced to consider the epistle of Polycarp as a fraud also, in whole or in part. But for a satisfactory defence of the epistle of Polycarp, we must refer to Professor Lightfoot's essay on the subject, Cont. Rev. 1875. With it we might consider the genuineness of the Ignatian epistles as well nigh proved.

It is not denied by Daillé or even by Renan that Ignatius wrote epistles; and the improbability that the letters of such a man should have utterly disappeared, is well shewn by Pearson (I. v.). We have before mentioned certain characteristics which a forger, written for the purposes supposed, would have displayed. And it is truly observed by Zahn, that fictions regarding sub-apostolic times are very prone to introduce apostolic names; instances of which tendency may be found in the story of Abgarus and in Pseudo-Ignatius. Nothing of the kind is discernible in our epistles. For a forger late in the 2nd century, it would have been impossible to avoid mentioning Polycarp's connexion with the apostles, or alluding to the epistles to the seven Asiatic churches in Revelation; they are never mentioned. In all the historical fictions of antiquity, reiterated pains are taken to make one understand the facts meant to be maintained. In Ignatius the facts are hard to reach; the writer is not thinking of readers who have all to learn from him. Lastly, no ancient fiction has succeeded in individualising character to the degree which is here displayed; let it for instance be considered whether it is possible to suppose the picture of the false teachers which meets us in these epistles to be an invention.

We possess the advantage of knowing what so acute a critic as M. Renan (ii.) has to reply to the arguments of Zahn. He objects that while the development of one of the ἐπίσκοποι into an ἐπίσκοπος must have been very early, it cannot have been so early as A.D. 110 or 115. But the origin of episcopacy in the elevation of a presbyter, and the date of that origin, will probably not be considered by all to be matters so well settled, as to form the basis of an argument. Again, M. Renan argues that the heresies combated in the epistles are of later date and kindred to the Valentinian. But he himself seems to grant that this objection is precarious. For he observes that similar errors are reproved in the Pastoral and Johannine epistles, which he conceives to be of the first half of the 2nd century. The opinion that there is an orthodox form of belief outside of which all is error, seems to M. Renan more appropriate to the time of Irenaeus; but the student may be left to judge by comparison whether this idea is more apparent in our epistles than in the admitted writings of St. Paul. The great sign, M. Renan again observes, of apocryphal writings is a tendency; and this, as he thinks, is to be observed in the epistles as regards episcopacy and the condemnation of heresy. But this test must not be urged so far as to pronounce all writings forged which embody strong opinions; and that the tendencies in question are so manifested in our epistles as to deprive them of the marks of connexion with actual life and circumstances, is exactly what seems to us contrary to fact. Again, M. Renan urges the slight use of the epistles (except Romans) among the fathers. And, perhaps it may be strange, but on this as well as many other objections (as e.g. Daillé's imputation [p. 440] of κακοζήλια, in the frequent use of Pauline words), it is to be remarked that the strangeness is quite as great if the epistles be regarded as forged, as it is on the supposition that they are genuine. If, indeed, it were possible to contend that they were composed later than the time of the fathers in question, the argument might be worth something. But it is granted that they belong to the 2nd century, and no advanced period of it. And Eusebius shews that they were widely circulated and of uncontested authorship. The difficulty, therefore (if it be really so great at all), is pretty nearly the same upon the one hypothesis as upon the other. The difference in point of testimonies of genuineness, which M. Renan labours to establish between Romans and the other epistles, is rebutted by the patent fact that Romans iv. itself bears witness that other epistles were written by the same author. It is true that upon this point M. Renan objects that the tenor of the other epistles does not record any fear of hindrance to the martyrdom on the part of the Romans, which might correspond to the words of the passage in question: "I write to all the churches, and tell them all that I willingly die for God if ye do not hinder me." But it seems very natural to suppose that the willingness to die for God is that which he means to declare as the burden of his epistles, while the words "if ye do not hinder me" are added only for the admonition of the Romans themselves.

Our space does not permit us to notice the exceedingly precarious and arbitrary process by which M. Renan on the one hand selects from Romans, which he acknowledges on the whole to be genuine, certain spurious expressions, and from the other six, which he thinks on the whole to be spurious, certain sentences too racy not to be genuine. Neither the external nor the internal testimony allows such dismemberment. M. Renan, in conclusion, lays down as probable the following points. A Christian of Antioch, about A.D. 115, was arrested, condemned, and sent to Rome; the churches demanded counsel of him; he saw Polycarp in Asia, and had an extended correspondence with churches, among the rest with Rome. Thirty or thirty-five years afterwards, Polycarp wrote to the Philippians concerning him, and about A.D. 170 a forger, zealous for episcopacy and orthodoxy, wrote in imitation of the pastoral epistles six letters in his name, the epistle of Polycarp serving him for a basis; and the same writer tampered with the epistle of Polycarp to make it correspond with the Ignatian forgery, adding c. 13 in order to represent the Philippians and Ignatius as having written to him.

Thus it appears that these improbabilities, on which the author of Supernatural Religion, and even, though less decidedly, Hilgenfeld (17), rely as condemning the whole story for an undoubted fabrication, are recognised by M. Renan as established facts, even though he does not believe that the epistles we possess are those to which the story refers.

Pfleiderer (Paulinism, Eng. tr. ii. 216) only claims with respect to the doctrinal contents of the Ignatian epistles, that the Judaistic character of the Gnosticism controverted in them does not afford satisfactory grounds for referring their date to an earlier period than the middle of the 2nd century, to the second half of which he asserts that all other indications point. But this writer seems in his own words rather to have "assumed as proved," than carefully investigated the spuriousness of the Ignatian letters. He shews no acquaintance with the writings of Zahn, and misdates the tract of Merx, to which he does refer, by ten years. We may safely decide that any writer who pronounces a question, on one side of which such a work as that of Zahn remains unanswered, to be settled on the other side, merely proves himself unworthy the attention of earnest inquirers. Far less decided is the conclusion with which Hilgenfeld ends his review, namely, that Zahn is not so successful that criticism need strike sail in its decision against the genuineness.

The question is one which the supporters of episcopacy may see with the utmost equanimity decided either way. On the one hand, the epistles, if pronounced genuine, exhibit, as we have shewn, certain phenomena which are somewhat puzzling to maintainers of an episcopacy universally diffused from the first. And, on the other hand, even if spurious they are still documents of the highest value, because belonging to the middle of the 2nd century. [See Lightfoot, i. 211, 232, and Lipsius, i. 160, the latter of whom believing them forged still thought them more valuable than the Curetonian epistles which at that time he considered genuine. The former scholar has since adopted opinions far more favourable to the genuineness of the epistles (ii. 357, and Zahn, ii. vi., where Dr. Lightfoot is recorded to have expressed himself in a letter as more and more impressed with the unity and priority of the seven epistles as representing the genuine Ignatius.)]

On supposition of forgery the epistles would still stand good as proofs of the existence of episcopacy from a period far earlier than their own time. They do not, as has been before remarked, bear any appearance of recommending the institution to persons who doubt its right, but rather that of exalting its importance where it is already in full possession. Yet the forgery must have had some motive. To furnish this, episcopacy must have been in some sense making its way, if not to established existence, yet to power and efficiency. And that it would have to make its way through opposition is but what human nature tells us. We suppose also, in order to afford a reason for the forgery, that testimony from previous ages must have been at the time valued and weighed. Under these conditions some one is presumed to have devised a fiction which, though not at all defending episcopacy against the particular persons who in the case supposed would be its assailants, yet exalted it in terms well-nigh extravagant. He placed his fiction at a period which at the highest estimate cannot have been more than fifty-five, and was probably not more than thirty-five, or even twenty-five, years behind his own time. And he chose the form, not of a treatise, or of a letter to an individual, but that of seven or eight letters to various churches, in every one of which many persons must have been alive to testify that no such letter had been received. The supposition that such a figment should have been received without a trace of doubt or resistance which has come down to us, would seem to presume the Christians of those days to have been not only uncritical but of a different intellectual nature from the men of to-day.

On the whole we must avow our belief that while no opinion on the subject will ever probably be so established as to exclude doubt, the supposition of the genuineness of the seven Vossian epistles is that which involves the fewest difficulties.

While this article is passing through the press the work of the Bishop of Durham upon the Ignatian epistles so long and so eagerly looked for by all students of the subject is announced as speedily to appear.

Cureton (Corp. Ign.) or (better still, except for Syriac scholars) Zahn (ii.) will furnish the student with all the documents and ancient testimonies. The special treatise of Zahn on Ignatius is, as Prof. Lightfoot remarks, little known in England, and is of an exhaustive character. The reader will understand that, while we have not hesitated to dissent from this work where necessary, we have very freely availed ourselves of its pages. [R. T. S.]

IGNATIUS (2) (EGNATIUS), Roman martyr. (Cyp. Ep. 39.) [See CELERINUS.] [E. W. B.]

IGNATIUS (3), fourteenth bishop of Mainz, said to have ruled for thirteen years, cir. A.D. 295, and been martyred. (Gall. Ch. v. 434; Gams, Ser. Ep. 288, who, however, does not accept the list in which the name of Ignatius appears, nor does Potthast, Bibl. Hist. supp. 353.) [R. T. S.]

IGNATIUS (4). Three bishops of Caesena (Cesena) occur under the name: viz. c. 232, reputed to have destroyed temples of Jupiter and Minerva; a second, c. 403; a third 500-539. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 452, 453; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 526, 527.) [R. S. G.]

IGNATIUS (5), hegumenus of Syces, at the seventh synod, 787. (Mansi, xiii. 151.) [T. W. D.]

IGNATIUS, a name regularly borne by the Jacobite patriarchs.

IGONOMUS, bishop. [EGEMONIUS.]

ILAN, bishop at Caerleon in the 4th cent. (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 154.) [J. G.]

ILAR, ST., was the founder, early in the 6th century, of Llanilar in Cardiganshire, and probably of other churches now thought to be dedicated to St. Hilary (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 224). But the parish of St. Hilary, in which St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall is situated, is probably named after St. Hilary of Poitiers. Mont St. Michel on the opposite coast is also in the parish of St. Hilaire, and there is a parish of St. Paul close by in each case—i.e. St. Pol de Leon. [C. W. B.]

ILDEBRAND, king. [ILDIBAD.]

ILDEFONSUS (1), bishop of Assisi, cir. 600, according to the catalogues of the see, between Aventius and Aquilinus (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 90, 187). Ughelli (Ital. Sac. i. 479) does not include him. [C. H.]

ILDEFONSUS (2), ST. (HILDEFONSUS, HILDEFUNS), bishop of Toledo from December 657 to January 667. Of St. Ildefonsus two early lives exist; one historical in tone, and contemporary, by JULIAN his successor in the see, the other, extravagant and legendary, written about a hundred years after his death, by Cixila bishop of Toledo towards the end of the 1st century of Mohammedan rule in Spain. (Florez places the pontificate of Cixila between 774 and 783, Esp. Sagr. v. 344.) According to the life attributed with tolerable certainty to Julian, which appears in certain MSS. among the appendices to the Libri de Viris Illustribus of Isidore and Ildefonsus, the latter was the successor of EUGENIUS II. in the see of Toledo. He shewed an early devotion to the monastic life, and, while still a boy, ran away from home to the famous monasterium Agaliense, close to Toledo, from which sprang many eminent churchmen of Spain in the 7th century. [HELLADIUS (12), JUSTUS, EUGENIUS (26).] His father pursued him in vain. The youth managed to conceal himself till the parental search was over, and then promptly became a monk. About the year 632 he was ordained deacon in the monastery by the venerable Helladius, then bishop of Toledo (De Vir. Ill. cap. vii.), and between 632 and 652 became abbat of Agali, possibly as the successor of the Richila "Agaliensis monasterii pater," mentioned in his biography of Justus (l. c. cap. viii.). While abbat, he attended and signed the important eighth council of Toledo, under REKESVINTH, in 653, at which abbatial signatures occur for the first time, and the ninth in 655. Thence, "post multum tempus" (Vita by Cixil.), he was translated to the see of Toledo, being forced thither by the king (principali violentiâ) in 657, on the death of Eugenius II.

From the date of his accession to the see of Toledo onwards, all that history knows of Ildefonsus may be summed up in the date of his death, the place of his burial, and the list of his works as given by Julian. He died, according to Julian, on the day following the completion of the eighteenth year of Rekesvinth, i.e. on Jan. 23, 657, and was buried in the famous church of St. Leocadia, at the feet of his predecessor, Eugenius II. Julian gives a full catalogue of his works (see below), and says that besides the completed writings, of which he inserts the titles, many others were left begun or half finished by the saint. It is not, however, upon these dry and trustworthy facts that the fame and cultus of San Ildefonso rests in Spain, but upon the well-known legends of Cixila's life, which, filtering down into the popular saint-lore and devout belief of the peninsula, are still realities to thousands (Ribadeneyra, Flos Sanctorum, i. 368; Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. i. 246; Florez, Esp. Sagr. v. 279).

Ildefonsus's Works.—According to Julian, Ildefonsus divided his writings into four volumes, of which the first contained seven theological treatises.

tises. Four of these are now lost. The remaining three are—

(a) Liber de Virginitate S. Mariæ contra tres infideles, i.e. Jovinian, Helvidius, and "a certain Jew," first printed at Valencia by Carranza in 1556 (Migne, Patr. Lat. xvi.). This may be classed among those controversial treatises against the Jews so common among Hispano-Gothic churchmen and their Spanish successors.

(b) Liber de Cognitione Baptismi, or Liber Adnotationum de Ordine Baptismi.—This is the most important of the works attributed to or written by Ildefonsus. Nothing was known of it but the title as given by Julian, till Baluze, about 1738, discovered a MS. of it in Normandy, and published it in his Miscellanea, lib. vi. (Paris, 1738). No second MS. has been discovered, and Cardinal Lorenzana reprinted Baluze's edition in the SS. Patrum Tol. Opp. (i. 162), adding critical notes and emendations. Adolf Helfferich (Der Westgothische Arianismus, p. 41) was the first to point out that in this supposed book of Ildefonsus is preserved the earlier work of a certain bishop JUSTINIAN, of Valencia, of which the title is given in the short biography of him by St. Isidore (De Vir. Ill. cap. 33).

Helfferich shews (1) that the contents of the present book as regards four at least out of five divisions can be identified with those of Justinian's as described by Isidore (p. 44); (2) that Isidore, a generation before Ildefonsus, borrowed from it in his De Officiis Ecclesiasticis (p. 37); (3) that the varying discipline and practice allowed by the book (especially in the point of single or threefold immersion in baptism) is contrary to the views and laws of the Spanish church in the middle of the 7th century, but is consistent with what we know of them in the 6th. Ildefonsus shortened the book in some respects, leaving out for instance the controversy with the Bonosiani, mentioned by St. Isidore as present in Justinian's work, probably because it treated the same questions as had been already handled by him in his treatise on the Virgin (we are here at variance with Helfferich), and added to it in others (conf. the passage from Greg. Moralia, i. 15, in cap. 127). But here his claim to the work ends. The Liber de Cognitione Baptismi contains 233 chapters, and is divided into two books. It is undoubtedly of considerable interest to the student of church antiquities.

(c) De progressu spiritualis deserti, or Liber de itinere Deserti quo pergitur post Baptismum, a genuine work of Ildefonsus, intended evidently as a sequel to the Liber de cogn. bapt.

The second volume consisted of letters, of which only two doubtful examples remain, addressed to Quiricus of Barcelona (Esp. Sagr. v. 499).

The third volume contained hymns, sermons, and masses. Of the hymns none can now be pointed out with certainty (Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (2), p. 188. Conf. also the learned Illustracion of Amador de los Rios in vol. i. of his Historia de la Literatura Española, on Himnos de la Iglesia Española durante el siglo vii. p. 471). Fourteen sermons, including the three first published by Florez, were printed by Cardinal Lorenzana under the head of Opera dubia, and have probably nothing to do with the saint. According to Cixila, Ilde-fonsus wrote two masses in honour of SS. Cosmas and Damian, the patron saints of Agali. Cixila also speaks of masses by him in honour of the Virgin. On the subject of the identification of these masses see Florez, v. 510.

The fourth volume contained "epitaphia" and "epigrammata," none of which are extant. Many spurious poems attributed in the 16th and 17th centuries to St. Ildefonsus are to be traced to the fertile brain of Roman de la Higuera (conf. Nicolas Antonio with Bayer's notes, lib. v. cap. 6, 308; also Lorenzana's SS. Patr. Tolet. Opp. i. 291, and Godoy Alcantara, Historia critica de los falsos chronicones, Madrid, 1868, p. 216).

De Viris Illustribus.—This genuine work of Ildefonsus is not mentioned by Julian. It is commonly found attached to the similar work by Isidore, of which it is an avowed continuation (see preface), and contains fourteen lives, of which seven are those of bishops of Toledo, Asturius, Aurasius, Montanus, Helladius, Justus, Eugenius I., and Eugenius II. In addition we have biographies of Donatus, founder and abbat of the monastery of Servitanum, Joannes bishop of Saragossa, St. Isidore, Nonnitus of Gerona, Conantius bishop of Palencia, and Braulio of Saragossa. Ildefonsus's lives are more concerned with literary history than with biography, but they have both a historical and literary value, and are a precious addition to our knowledge of the time. They are marked throughout by the loftiest assertion of the claims and dignity of the see of Toledo, which is described in the preface as "locus terribilis omnique veneratione sublimis."

Chronicon Ildefonsi.—This fabulous continuation of the Historia Gothorum of Isidore, attributed by Lucas of Tuy and Roderic of Toledo to Ildefonsus, extends to the eighteenth year of Rekesvinth, and contains the stories of the deposition of Theodisclus of Seville and the preaching of Mohammed in Spain. This curious and early forgery deserves a more critical examination than it has yet received. It is printed in Schott, Hispania Ill. iv., and in the SS. Patr. Tol. Opp. i.

The life of St. Ildefonsus written by Rodericus Cerratenensis, the author of a 13th-century Sanctorale, of which the greater part is still unpublished, was first printed by Lorenzana. The Acta Sti. Ildefonsi, printed by Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. i. p. 246, were professedly taken from a MS. breviary belonging to the cathedral of Astorga. From them are derived the traditional names of Ildefonsus's parents, the reputed date of his birth, and his supposed relation to Eugenius II.

The standard edition of St. Ildefonsus is to be found in the work already quoted, SS. Patrum Toletanorum quotquot extant Opera, edited by Cardinal Lorenzana, archbishop of Toledo, Madrid, 1782-85-93. A reprint of this and of much of Nicolas Antonio's criticism is given in Migne, Patr. Lat. xvi.; Conf. AA. SS. Boll. Jan. ii. 535, 1148; Mabillon, AA. SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 515, 519-21, iii. 628; Ceillier, Hist. des Aut. Eccl. xvii. 712-18; Carranza, *De Vita Sti. ILDERICUS (GILDERICUS), a bishop present at the council of Braga, A.D. 563 (Mansi, ix. 780), thought to be the same as Adoricus the first bishop of Egítania (Guarda) in Lusitania. (Gams, Ser. Episc. 100.) [T. W. D.]

ILDIBAD, king of the Ostrogoths, 539-541. He was in charge of Verona at the time when Ravenna was taken by Belisarius, and Vitigis sent prisoner to Constantinople. He sent an embassy, probably of submission, to Belisarius, who had possession of his sons in Ravenna, but he did not himself come into his hands, for Belisarius being now recalled to Constantinople, the Goths resolved to elect another king. They assembled at Pavia, and asked Uraias, nephew of Vitigis, to be king. He however refused on the ground of the misfortunes of his uncle Vitigis, and designated Ildibad as a fitter man, especially as his uncle was Theudis king of the Visigoths. The Goths summoned Ildibad from Verona, clothed him with the purple, and saluted him as king. He addressed the assembled Goths, advising them rather to obtain if possible Belisarius for their king. In accordance with his advice messengers were sent to Ravenna to Belisarius, who had not set out for Constantinople, to entreat him to be king, and to say that Ildibad was willing to come and lay the purple at his feet, and acknowledge him as king of the Goths and Italy. Belisarius refused, and the messengers returned to Ildibad. At first Ildibad had only a thousand men with him, and was restricted to Pavia alone. But the fiscal oppression of Alexander the Logothete, an official from Constantinople, alienated many, and Ildibad grew stronger. The general Vitalius came with a force against him at Treviso, and was completely defeated. But now Ildibad alienated the hearts of the Goths from him. On account of his wife's jealousy of the wife of Uraias, he murdered Uraias. Then Vilas, one of the king's bodyguard of the nation of the Gepidae, bearing a grudge against the king because his wife in his absence had been given to another, seized his opportunity while Ildibad was feasting with his nobles, and cut off the king's head, ann. 541. (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. ii. 29, 30, iii. i.; Jordanis, de Breviatiōe Chronicorum, Muratori, i. p. 241; Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 223-226.) [A. H. D. A.]

ILDISCLUS (HILDISCLUS, IDISCLUS, ISDISCLUS), bishop of Segontia (Sigüenza) from cir. 631 to soon after 638 (Florez, Esp. Sagr. viii. 124). He signed at the fourth council of Toledo in 633 (Mansi, x. 643), and from his low place in the list it is inferred by Florez that his appointment was then recent. He was also at the fifth council of Toledo in 636 (Mansi, x. 657) and at the sixth in 638 (ib. 671). In the seventh in 646 his successor Ubideric or Wideric is placed high up and had probably been long sitting. [C. H.]

ILDOARDUS, bishop of Piacenza, c. 715. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 15; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 198.) [A. H. D. A.]

ILDOLFUS, bishop. [HILDULFUS.]

ILDULFUS (Mansi, xi. 159), bishop of Iria. [FELIX (92).]

ILERGIUS, bishop of Egara from 599 to 610. His signature appears last among those of the second council of Barcelona (Nov. 1, 599), and occurs again appended to the Decretum Gundemari (610?) [see GUNTHIMAR. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324; Esp. Sagr. xlii. 191.) [IRE-NAEUS.] [M. A. W.]

ILERUS (ISERUS), ST., appears in the lists as tenth bishop of Mende, succeeding Agricola, perhaps early in the 7th century (Gall. Christ. i. 87; Gams, Series Episc. 577), and is commemorated in the diocese Dec. 1. He is only known to us from the story of St. Enymia, who is said to have been the sister of Dagobert and daughter of Clotaire II., and whom he consecrated as abbess of the monastery, which she built in the district of Mende (A.D. 628). (See Boll. Actâ SS. Oct. iii. 408, de S. Enimiâ.) But since the investigation of the recent Bollandists (Oct. xi. 628), it seems doubtful whether his claims to an existence, independent of St. Hilarus the sixth bishop [HILARUS (7)], can be made good. The result of their researches is that no mention of him can be found in the older records of St. Enymia (ibid. 628), the first being in the songs of the 13th-century Provençal poet, Bertrand of Marsailles, who, amid many anachronisms, makes much mention of a St. Yles, or Ylis, in connexion with St. Enymia. Finally they conclude that there never was a St. Ilerus at Mende distinct from St. Hilarus, and they trace his commemoration on Dec. 1 to a confusion with St. Eligius, whose day it is, the popular appellations of both being St. Chely (p. 630 seqq.). No bishop of Mende's name is known for more than two centuries after the date ascribed to Ilerus. [S. A. B.]

ILID (1), ST., "a man of Israel," said to have come with Caradog or Caractacus from Rome to Britain in the 1st century, and to have taught Christianity. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 77-81.) [J. G.]

ILID (2), Welsh name of JULITTA, martyr with her son Curig. Ildid and Curig are patrons of Llanilid, Glamorganshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 82, 97, 139, 307.) [J. G.]

ILITARICUS, ILITARIUS, fourth bishop of Perpignan, or, as the see was then called, Helena, succeeding Acatulus, and followed by Hyacinthus, was present at the tenth council of Toledo in A.D. 656. (Mansi, xi. 43; Gall. Christ. vi. 1032.) [S. A. B.]

ILLADHAN (ILANDUS, ILLANDUS, IOLLADHAN, ILUNDUS, JOLLATHAN), bishop of Rathliphthen, commemorated June 10. He was son of Eochaidh of the race of Laeghaire son of Niall, and lived in Fircall, King's County, A.D. 540. He is noted as one of the masters of St. Aed. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 165, 429; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi.

534, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 540; Colgan, Acta SS. 191, 422; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 3.) [J. G.]

ILLIDIUS, third in the list of the bishops of Dax between Gratianus I. and Carterius, early in the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 1038; Gams, Series Episc. 543; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 201.) [S. A. B.]

ILLIDIUS (HILLIDIUS, ST. ALLYRE), fourth bishop of Clermont, the pupil and successor of St. Avitus. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Fr. i. 40) gives a very high character of him, and records (Vitae Patrum, ii.) that in his old age he was sent for to cast a devil out of the daughter of the emperor of Treves (i.e. Maximus), which he did, and refusing the treasures which Maximus offered him, obtained for his Arverni the boon of being allowed to pay their tribute in gold instead of corn and wine. The saint died upon his way back. Gregory relates several miracles wrought by the relics of St. Illidius. The date of his death is uncertain, but it must have been between 381–387, if the story of his intercourse with Maximus be true. There is an epitaph on him by Sidonius Apollinaris (vii. 17). He was commemorated on June 5. (Ceillier, Aut. Eccl. xi. 380; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 425; Gall. Ch. ii. 227.) [R. T. S.]

ILLOG, ST., the saint of Hirnant in Montgomeryshire. His day is August 8. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.) [C. W. B.]

ILLOGANUS, ST., the patron saint of Illogan, a parish north of Camborne in Cornwall. William of Worcester, 128, says, "Sanctus Illogham de Cornubia jacet prope Redruth," taking his account from the Dominican martyrology at Truro. The parish feast now takes place on the nearest Sunday to Oct. 18. [C. W. B.]

ILLTYD, Welsh saint. [ILTUTUS.]

ILLUS (HILLUS, HYLUS, ELLUS), a civil officer of high rank under the emperors Leo I. and Zeno. For his connexion with civil affairs see Dict. Gr. Rom. Biog. [ILLUS]. It was probably his friendship with Pamphilius that involved him in the suspicion of being favourable to heathenism. Damascius the Neo-platonist, a contemporary and apparently a heathen, mentions him among those who met with an ill fate for setting themselves against the Christian religion (quoted in Photius, cod. 242 s. f. in Pat. Gr. civ. 1301 d). Theodoros Lector, however (H. E. ii. 1), implies that Illus successfully used his influence with Zeno for the protection of the orthodox bishops, and Suidas bears similar testimony (s. v. Λέωντος Μοναχός). Illus was certainly a great friend of Joannes Talaia the Catholic patriarch of Alexandria. [T. W. D.]

ILTUTUS (ELTUTUS, ELCHUTUS, ILLTYD, HILDUTUS), ST., was by birth an Armorican, being the son of Bicanys, by a sister of Emyr Llydaw, whom John of Tynemouth calls Rieni-guilda, and was therefore the great nephew of St. Germanus (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 123, 179), and lived in the latter part of the 5th century. His name is preserved at Llantwit Major (Llan-illtyd Fawr), where he is said to have built a church and a school, under the patronage of Meirchion, a chieftain of Glamorgan. "The Welsh further honoured him for his having introduced among them an improved method of ploughing; before his time they were accustomed to cultivate their grounds with the mattock and over-treading plough, implements which, the compiler of a triad upon husbandry observes, were still used by the Irish." Hence his name was connected with many churches (R. Rees, 44, 54, 139, 178–80, 323). He was commemorated Feb. 7 and Nov. 6, and is said to have been buried near the chapel that bears his name in Brecknockshire, where there is a place called Bedd Gwyl Illtyd, or the grave of St. Illtyd's Eve, from its having been the custom to watch there during the night previous to the saint's day. A life of the saint is printed in W. J. Rees's Cambro-British Saints, pp. 158–182, from the Cottonian MS., Vesp. A. XIV.; but it is later than the 12th century, when it was the fashion to write lives of the saints for public edification, and to bring down the account of their miracles to the Norman times. David, Samson, Paulinus, and Gildas, are said to have been educated in St. Illtyd's school, which, with Llancafarn and Docwinni, were the three great monastic schools of Llandaff diocese. An inscribed cross at Llantwit Major, thought to be of the 9th century, has on it 'Samson posuit hanc crucem pro anima eius, Illtet, Samson regis, Samuel, Ebisar' (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christianae, No. 61; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 628), which at least serves to shew the connexion of Samson with Illtyd. The name Ebisar occurs also in No. 65 (if that is a distinct inscription). A chapel of St. Illutus existed at St. Dominick in Cornwall (Oliver, Monasticon, 438). It is to be noted that Christian inscriptions are hardly ever found in the districts where pagan Roman inscriptions abound, and vice versa: they are nearly confined to the more purely Celtic country districts. Those which contain the word "anima" are comparatively late (Hübner, p. xvi.), and generally it may be said that these British inscriptions have something peculiar about them; the Britons in this, as in other matters, were divided from the rest of the world. There is a curious legend about Illutus in Nennius, § 79, and an earlier notice in Gildas's Epistle, § 36, if Usher is right in identifying the "preceptorum magistrum elegantem" with Illutus. See too the Liber Landavensis, 288–93, 313. Bale says that there remain of the saint's writings two epistles, Super questione ad Sampsonem and Ad Issaum et Atroclium abbatem. There was a saint Isan connected with Illtyd's College (R. Rees, 257.) [C. W. B.]

ILUARIUS, bishop of Isaura, at the council of Constantinople, 381 (Mansi, iii. 570). In Mansi's margin the name is Illyrius, but Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 1085) reads Hilarinus, and identifies him with the bishop [HILARIUS (9)] in the Testament of Gregory Nazianzen. [C. H.]

ILUNDUS, Irish bishop. [ILLADHAN.]

IMBETAUSIUS (BETHAUSIUS, AMBETAUSIUS), bishop of Rheims; attended the first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (Mansi, ii. 476). (Gall. Chr. ix. 4.) [R. T. S.]

IMMA (1), a thegn of Elfwin, brother of Egfrid king of Northumbria. Bede (iv. 22) gives an account of his adventures. He was brother of Tunna, the abbat of a monastery called from him Tunnacaestir. At the battle on the Trent in which Elfwin was killed, in 679, Imma was left for dead, but recovering strength after a few hours bound up his own wounds and was carried as a prisoner to the captain of the Mercian forces. Being asked what he was, and fearing to confess himself a king's thegn or "miles," he declared that he was a rustic and a married man, and had come on the field bringing supplies to the army. He was then received, cured of his wounds, but kept in chains. In the meantime, his brother Tunna had searched the field of battle, and having found a body which he supposed to be Imma's, had buried it, and offered masses for his brother's soul. Strange to say, the effect of this ceremony on the still living Imma was that no chains could bind him. His captors supposed that he carried a charm, but he himself disavowed this, and suggested that the miracle might be owing to the prayers which Tunna, supposing him to be dead, was offering for him. The captain, now suspecting that Imma was not what he pretended, questioned him strictly, and compelled him to acknowledge the truth. Having thus ascertained his value, he sold him to a Frisian at London, but the miracle still continued to work, and his new master, weary of binding him, gave him leave to ransom himself. Having sworn to return or send the ransom, he was suffered to go into Kent, where he made himself known to king Hlothere, who was related to the Northumbrian kings, and who enabled him to pay the price required. He then returned to his country and told his tale, which Bede heard from one who had heard it from Imma himself. See also Hist. Eliens. lib. i. c. 23. [S.]

IMMA (2), ST. (IMMINA, IRMINA, UMBINA, YMMA), princess and nun in Franconia in the 8th century, the only child of Hetthan, or Otto, or Hattau, last duke of the Eastern Franks. Hetthan and Imma built a church near their castle on the hill afterwards called Marienburg, or Old Würzburg. Imma lived there as a nun with several companions for more than forty years; then for greater quiet she gave up her own residence and patrimony to St. Burchard, first bishop of Würzburg, obtaining in exchange the neighbouring monastery of Karelburg or Carloburg. There she abode till her death, and was buried by Burchard in the church built there by St. Gertrude. Her name does not appear in the principal calendars, but she is counted among the saints of Germany, and is called "blessed," and "venerable" by many writers. The authorities are the Life of St. Burchard by Egilward, of unknown date, in Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pars i. 706, 707, 718, ed. 1672; Bueus in Acta SS. Boll. Oct. vi. 584, 585; Müller, Würzburger Chronike, in Ludewig's Geschichtschreiber, 359; Mergetherius, Historie der Bischöffen, in Ludewig, ut supra, 390; an anonymous Chronicon Wurzburgense, preserved by Baluze, Ludewig, ut supra, IMMA (3), wife of Einhard the secretary of Charlemagne. According to a letter of Lupus to Einhard (Ep. iv. inf.) she was "nobilissima femina," but her origin and family are unknown, unless, as has been conjectured, she was a sister of Bernhart bishop of Worms. They had one son named Vussenius. To her and her husband Louis the Pious granted the estate of Michillinstat in the Odenwald, where Einhard might obtain leisure for his Life of Charles the Great. With her consent he afterwards gave it to the monastery of Lauresheim. When Einhard became a priest, they separated. She died in A.D. 836, and a letter expressive of Einhard's grief is extant (Bouquet, vi. 402; Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 535).

According to a late legend, which first appears in the Chronicon Laureshamiense of the 12th century, she was a daughter of Charlemagne, and betrothed to the king of the Greeks, but fell in love secretly with Einhard. Although the story has not lacked believers, it is plainly refuted, if by nothing else, by the fact that Einhard himself, who in his Life of Charles enumerates all his children, makes no mention of her. It seems to have been borrowed from William of Malmesbury's story of the emperor Henry and his sister in the Gesta Reg. Angl. ii. § 190. (Lupus, Epist. iv. ad Einh.; Einhardi Epist. xxx. Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 410, civ. 519; Chronicon Laureshamiense in Bouquet, v. 383, 384; Ideler, Leben und Wandel Karls des Grossen, i. 26-33.) [S. A. B.]

IMPORTUNUS (1), placed by Hilary of Arles and his supporters in the see of Besançon, upon their deposition of Celidonium for marrying a widow; but deprived when Celidonium was restored by St. Leo. (Hilar. Arelat. Sermo de Vit. Honorat. Arcl. in Patr. Lat. l. 1257; Leo Mag. Ep. x. in Patr. Lat. lvi. 633.) [R. T. S.]

IMPORTUNUS (3), a bishop at the second council of Orleans in 533. (Mansi, viii. 838.)

[T. W. D.]

IMPORTUNUS (4), a cleric ordained by Vigilius bishop of Rome, who afterwards deposed him along with others in the affair of the deacons Rusticus and Sebastianus, cir. 550. (Vigil. ep. in Pat. Lat. lxxix. 50; Baron. A. E. ann. 548 ii., 550 xxxiv.; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 80.)

[T. W. D.]

IMPORTUNUS (5), bishop of Atella. Gregory the Great wrote to him, A.D. 592, and after the bishop's death, A.D. 599, gave directions about his will. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 13; lib. ix. indict. ii. 77; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 99, 131.)

[A. H. D. A.]

IMPORTUNUS (6), a "vir palatinus" of Ravenna. From a letter of Gregory the Great in 600 (lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 26; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 141), it appears that an argentarius named John had been reduced to great straits in standing bail for Importunus, who is described as "in ecclesia diu jam residens."

[T. W. D.]

IMPORTUNUS (7), thirty-first bishop of Paris, succeeding Sigobaudus, and followed by St. Agilbertus, subscribed the charter of Drauscus, bishop of Soissons, for the nunneries of St. Mary in that diocese in 666 (Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1186). There is extant an angry letter, addressed by him to a "papa" Frodobertus or Chrodobertus, possibly the thirty-first archbishop of Tours. It was published, though with many lacunae, by Baluze in the Capitularia Regum Francorum, ii. 563, Paris, 1780. (Gall. Christ. vii. 26, xiv. 30.)

[S. A. B.]

IMRAITEACH (INNRACTHECH), of Gelann-Cloitighe (now probably the vale of the river Newtown-Barry), anchorite, died A.D. 769. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 373.)

[J. G.]

IMRILIUS (MIRILIUS, MIRINUS), Irish saint, brother of St. Comgan (Feb. 27) of Glenn-Uissen, in the 6th century, according to the kalendar of Cathald Maguire. (Colgan, Acta SS. 417, 418.)

[J. G.]

INA, king of Wessex, commemorated Feb. 7, as patron of Llanina, Cardiganshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 52, 322.)

[INE.] [J. G.]

INACHIUS, addressed by Firmus, bishop of Caesarea, who had sent him a hound, named Helena, and probably a hawk. (Firmus, Epp. 43, 44, ap. Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 1509, sq., the latter epistle being Inachus's answer, though erroneously given as a second letter to Inachus; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, x. 152.)

INAN (EVAN), confessor, commemorated Aug. 18. He is represented by the Scotch hagiologists as belonging to Irvine, Ayrshire, where he lived in great holiness, and wrote Locorum Sacrorum nomina, Homiliae ex Sacra Scriptura, Epistolae (Tanner, Bibl. 429, from Dempster). According to some, he flourished in A.D. 839, under the Scotch king Kenneth I., but this Kenneth reigned two centuries earlier. St. Inan died, and was buried at Irvine. The Bollandians (Acta SS. 18 Aug. iii. 663) treat "de S. Inano seu Evano Conf. in Scotia, saec. ix.," but refer with great hesitation to the accounts given by the Scotch authorities, and place Inan in the reign of Kenneth I. or II. Dedications are doubtful as between him and St. Ninian. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 379; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 200; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 160, 206, 208, 242, 359, but at page 208 calls him "Juani;" Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. i. 173; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. xi. 295-6, with topographical notes on his dedications at Beith and Irvine, Ayrshire.)

INANTIUS (YNANTIUS, UNANTIUS, HYMNATIUS), a Gallic bishop, who subscribes the synodical epistle to St. Leo in 451. He is also in 449 addressed by St. Leo, with his comprovincials of Arles, in a congratulatory epistle on the elevation of Ravenius to that see. (Leo Mag. Epp. 40, 66, 99, 102, in Patr. Lat. liv. 890, 998, 1112, 1135.)

INCARNATION OF THE WORD. The history of the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God, the doctrinal centre of Christianity, brings us into relation with almost every heresy of the Eastern church. In the ordinance of God "the world's salvation was without the incarnation of the Son of God a thing impossible"; and as "He which without our nature could not on earth suffer for the sins of the world, doth now also by means thereof both make intercession to God for sinners and exercise dominion over all men with a true, a natural, and a sensible touch of mercy," so are we, in pursuing the history of this doctrine, and in the elucidation of the difficulties connected with it, continually reminded of the truth of other words of our great divine from whose writings the above quotations are taken. "It is not in man's ability either to express perfectly or conceive the manner how this was brought to pass. But the strength of our faith is tried by those things wherein our wits and capacities are not strong. Howbeit because this divine mystery is more true than plain, divers having framed the same to their own conceits and fancies are found in their expositions thereof more plain than true. Inasmuch that by the space of five hundred years after Christ, the church was almost troubled with nothing else saving only with care and travail to preserve this article from the sinister construction of heretics." (Hooker, E. P. V. li. 3 and lii. 1.) We must add that these five hundred years were needed for the church to struggle through the thickets and entanglements of unprecedented difficulties, and to attain the power of mapping out the results of her enquiries by lines which no subsequent investigations have succeeded in obliterating.

It seems that the expectations which the Israelites had formed of their Messiah were these. He was to be a man of the family of David, a "man born of human parents" (καὶ γὰρ πάντες ἤκουσαν τὸν χριστὸν ἑβραίων ἐξ ἀνθρώπων προσδοκᾶμεν γενήσασθαι) (Trypho in the Dialogue, Justin M. cap. xlix. p. 263), and "Elias would come to anoint him." "In this some amongst us" (says Justin in the dialogue)

"agree." With the nations of the West, at all events with the uneducated amongst them, the conception that the gods might come down in the likeness of man was not unknown. But the Persian religious system exercised also a considerable influence on the heresies of the earliest years. "The principal sources of Gnosticism may probably" (says Dean Mansel) "be summed up in these three. To Platonism modified by Judaism it owed much of its philosophic form and tendencies. To the Dualism of the Persian religion it owed one form at least of its speculations on the origin and remedy of evil." "To the Buddhism of India, modified again probably by Platonism, it was indebted for the doctrine of the antagonism between spirit and matter." (Lectures on Gnosticism, pp. 31, 32.) To these and other influences was the teaching of St. John exposed: "The Word became flesh"; "Whoso believeth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is born of God."

In an article like this we must limit ourselves to giving only the broad outlines of the history of these momentous struggles, and we must begin with that which, if not the very earliest, is at least one of the earliest phases of Gnostic error. CERINTHUS, who is supposed to have been a man of Jewish descent (Mansel, ut supra, p. 112), adopted that which Trypho describes as the Jewish view of the Messiah. He believed that Jesus was the Christ, but that Christ which the nation expected their deliverer to be. The tradition is as old as Irenaeus, who quotes it as from Polycarp (Irenaeus, III. lii. 4), that St. John, seeing Cerinthus in a bath at Ephesus, rushed out, alleging that he feared lest the house should fall upon him. Cerinthus held that Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary; that He became distinguished above all others by His wisdom and His life; that after His baptism the Christ descended upon Him; that He then preached the unknown Father and performed miracles; but towards the end of His passion the Christ departed from the Jesus, and the Jesus suffered and was raised, whilst the Christ remained impassible, being, as He was, "the Spirit of the Lord." In the former of these tenets the EBIONITES and the CARPOCRATIANS consented. Epiphanius could not discover whether the NAZARENES held the mere humanity of Jesus.

We have mentioned that Cerinthus held that the Christ who was impassible left the Jesus, the Man of sorrows, before His crucifixion. It is difficult to resist the belief that it was in anticipation of the difficulties of both Jews and Gentiles in this behalf that St. Paul was led at Corinth to preach "Christ as having been crucified," though this preaching was to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness. The semi-converted Jews and Greeks struggled against this teaching; they invented first one mode, then another, of evading the difficulty. Dorner (English translation, i. p. 111) suggests that the Docetae, who were prominent before the mind of Ignatius, were probably Jews, and the suggestion, coming from such an authority, is worthy of the most respectful consideration. The Jews, we know, have uniformly rejected the conception of a suffering Messiah; and thus Jewish half-converts would be anxious to remove out of the way of their brethren the stumbling-block of the Apostle's teaching. Whether or not they were the inventors of the conception that the sufferings of the cross were borne in appearance only by Him who had performed the miracles which Cerinthus acknowledged, they were ready to adopt any suggestion that came from any source which would help them out of their difficulty; and thus they were prepared to combine so far with those who held that our Lord's body was only a phantasm.

But the teaching of the apostles on the sufferings of our Lord was firmly retained by the apostolic fathers. Clement of Rome assumed that His sufferings stood before the eyes of the Corinthian church; and in the Ignatian epistles, as we read them in the Greek, we find the Trallians urged to stop their ears when unbelievers said that Christ suffered only in appearance. "Jesus Christ was truly born, was truly crucified, and died." And to the people at Smyrna even stronger language was addressed. "He truly suffered; He truly raised Himself, not, as some unbelievers say, that He suffered in seeming only, the selves existing in seeming too. If Christ has existed only in appearance, my bonds are vain."

But as yet there was no attempt to explain the difficulty. The fathers were content to insist that the Saviour was truly born and truly suffered. They had learnt from St. Peter (1 Ep. iii. 18) to distinguish between the flesh and the spirit in our Lord, and thus they continued to uphold the truth. Nay, they proceeded further, and upheld with equal fervour the truth of St. John's teaching, "The Word became flesh." Thus the writer of the homily commonly called the Second Epistle of Clement Romanus begins by telling his hearers that they must think of Jesus Christ as of God, and remember how many things Jesus Christ endured to suffer for our sakes (§ 1). In § 9 the preacher urged his hearers to meditate on the resurrection of the flesh. "If Christ the Lord," he said, "who saved us, being first spirit then became flesh, and so called us; in like manner shall we also in the flesh receive our reward"; and in the newly recovered portion (§ 14) we read of the church that "she was spiritual, as was also our Jesus; but He was manifested in these last days that He might save us." Still the difficulty remained; and even the words of Clement, partially quoted above, if taken literally, shew that the church was not as yet prepared clearly to distinguish the two elements in the truth of Christ's passion: "Ye were content with the provisions which God supplies. And, giving heed unto His words, ye laid them up diligently in your hearts, and His sufferings were before your eyes."

So there were in these earliest of times two distinct tenets, held to some extent by the same schools: the EBIONITES, CARPOCRATIANS, and CERINTHIAN, denying the deity of our Lord; the schools of SATURNINUS, VALENTINUS, BASILIDES, and others, denying His humanity [see DOCETISM, Vol. I. pp. 868, 869]. Cerinthus to a certain extent denied both; and it is a most deeply interesting problem to follow out the history of the controversies which resulted from these imperfect and heretical teachings.

But, first of all, we must duly appreciate the historic fact that the great body of Christians did continuously hold and proclaim the belief that Christ Jesus was God and Man. They held this against all assailants. It is impossible to read the declaration of Irenaeus that "the churches amongst the Celts and the Iberians, in the East and in Egypt, held and taught the belief in the Son of God who was made flesh [ῥὸν σαρκωθέντα] for our salvation, and that He is our Lord and our God and our Saviour," without acknowledging that Irenaeus believed that what he declared was true. We put by the side of this the well-known words of Pliny that the Christians sang a hymn to Christ as God; we compare it with the repeated contention of CELSUS, who must have lived before 180, and who takes it for granted that the Christians held that Jesus was the Son of God and God. Of His humanity, Celsus had no doubt; his arguments were based on the unreasonableness of the belief that one who was divine could or would have undergone what Jesus suffered. (See the passages cited by Dorner.)

The Gnostics granted this. They allowed that this was the belief of the ordinary Christian world; but they held that the apostles had also handed down "among the perfect" an esoteric doctrine, a disciplina arcani, and that they had been the recipients and were now the teachers of this doctrine. The indignant language in which Irenaeus repudiated this assertion is well worthy of study; but we ought equally to notice how anxious all these Gnostics were to avail themselves of every verse of Scripture which might be forced to give some support to their opinions; an indication this of the value universally set upon the writings of the apostles, and of the belief that every word they wrote was worthy of attention. Ultimately the only method the heresiarchs found of invalidating the testimony of Scripture was that of rejecting from the canon all passages which they could not bring into accordance with their schemes.

Before we pass on, we must refer to a passage in the Visions of Hermas which has caused great questioning. It is of considerable moment in the history of the doctrine before us. The peculiar Christology of the volume has been misunderstood in consequence of a clause, "Filius Spiritus Sanctus est" (Simil. v. 5), found in that Latin version with which, until recent years, we were compelled to be content. The words are not in the MS. of the Palatinate first edited by Dressel, nor are they in the Aethiopic version, nor are they in the Greek MS. carried by Simonides to Leipzig. (We have in Simil. ix. 1, "That Holy Spirit [which spake to them in the form of the church] is the Son of God.") Still the genuine words of Hermas are remarkable. Expounding the vision he had seen, the man told Hermas, "The field was the world. The Lord of the field was He who had created all things and adapted them and empowered them. The servant [of the parable] was the Son of God. The vines were this people whom He planted." "God had planted the vine; that is, He created the people and delivered them to His Son; and the Son appointed angels over them to preserve them together; and He purged their sins, labouring much, and enduring many toils. Having purged the sins of the people, He shewed them the way of life." But now comes the difficulty. "The Holy Spirit, which existed previously, which created all the creature, God made to dwell in [the] flesh which He selected. And this flesh, in which the Holy Spirit dwelt, did well serve the Spirit, walking in holiness and reverence, absolutely in nothing defiling the Spirit." And thus the flesh itself was rewarded.

We can point boldly to this passage as indicating the belief of the writer in the pre-existence of the Son of God as Spirit and as Holy Spirit; we can point to it as representing symbolically His taking up His abode in human flesh, flesh entirely free from pollution. But we miss the precision of later years; there is no allusion—perhaps the parable did not permit it—to the Christian tenet that this flesh proceeded from the Virgin.

We must refer to the several articles to which the names of the heresiarchs to whom we shall refer are prefixed, for details of their respective doctrines, being content with simply mentioning the effect which their teachings had on the subject of the Incarnation. Of some of them we have already spoken. CARPOCRATES seems to have applied the theory of the pre-existence of the human soul to the soul of Jesus; he held that its powers were simply far greater than the powers of the souls of others; that it not only remembered what it had seen in prior existence, but also was able to pass through the conditions of this life without contamination. Thus in a sense he held the humanity of our Lord, but denied His divinity. (Dorner, p. 187, and Irenaeus, i. 24.) The CARPOCRATIANS went beyond their master; they held not only that Jesus was a man, born like other men, but that the divine power which was given to Him was no more than may be acquired by any other man. (Mansel, p. 122.)

SATURNINUS held the malignity of matter; and as it was impossible for the divine to have direct relation with the material world, he was compelled to describe the Saviour as ἀγέννητον ἀσώματος καὶ ἀειδίου, unborn, without body and without form, and as manifested in appearance only (Irenaeus, i. 24, 1, and Mansel, p. 130, 132). TATIAN is said in some MSS. of Jerome (On Galatians, vi. 8) to have held that "the flesh of Christ was putative," and by some it has been supposed that, in consequence, he omitted from his Diatessaron the genealogies of our Lord and all allusion to His descent from David (Mansel, p. 138): but the best MSS. of Jerome have CASSIANUS, not TATIANUS (see above, Vol. I. p. 413). BARDESANES, BASILIDES, and VALENTINUS are said by Theodoret (Epist. 145) to have held that our Lord was born of the Virgin, but they maintained that He received nothing from her substance, but παροδόν τινα δι' αὐτῆς ὡσπερ διὰ σωλῆνος ποιήσασθαι (Mansel, p. 140). Theodoret adds that they also held that He only seemed to be a man, seen as He was seen by Abraham and others of old. But, if this is correct, the disciples of Basilides deviated in one respect from their master: they admitted the reality of the bodily sufferings of Jesus (Hippolytus, vii. 27, fol. 94 v. and Mansel, 157); they conceived that these were undergone to separate the spiritual in Jesus from the material. Valentinus, on the other hand, maintained that there was no need of such separation, for the body in which our Lord appeared was not material, although it was visible, tangible, capable of suffering, like a material body (Mansel, 192).

We come now to MARCION. He denied much that his predecessors had acknowledged. With him, Christ appeared on the earth suddenly, with the appearance but not the reality of the mature humanity. He denied the birth from Mary. His gospel began with the words, "In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, God came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, and taught on the sabbath days." The death of Christ was seeming. He went down to Hades to proclaim the kingdom of the true God to those whom the Demiurge had condemned as transgressors. It is a question whether Marcion distinguished between the persons of the Father and the Son. Neander held that virtually, if not explicitly, Marcion was a Patripassian. (Mansel, 216.)

We may here mention the somewhat strange phenomenon that the Clementine homilies represented the Saviour as a mere man, born like other men. Dean Mansel (p. 231) considers that this resulted from the antagonism exhibited in these homilies to the teaching of Marcion. Because he denied to the Saviour all human parentage, his opponents did not distinguish Him from the prophets of old.

We have already referred to the creed of Irenaeus, and the distinct statement contained in it that the Son of God was made flesh, σάρκα θέντα, for our salvation. In iii. 16, &c. the bishop, after describing in detail many of the heresies we have mentioned, proceeds to insist that Jesus Christ is the one and the same Word of God, the Only Begotten, incarnate for our salvation, and that He was born of the Virgin: Son of God made Son of man. He says that we express our belief "in one Jesus Christ." He quotes 1 Cor. xv. 21, to prove His true humanity, and Rom. xiv. 15, to shew that it was Christ that died. It was a man who overcame the enemy of man; the Mediator between God and man was associated with both God and man. His quotations and his assertions are deeply interesting. He held clearly and distinctly that our Saviour was man, and was the Word of God. The Word was, as it were, silent in the temptation and crucifixion and death. It spake in the victory and the endurance and the love and the resurrection and the assumption.

But Tertullian devoted an entire treatise to vindicate the truth in regard to the humanity of our Lord. That treatise is generally entitled De Carne Christi. It was further described by the writer as De Carne Domini adversus Quatuor Haereses. He maintained that Christ had the power to continue to be God, though clothed with man; that Christ suffered nothing, if He did not suffer truly. "The property of each substance exhibited the man and the God: here born, there not born; here of flesh, there of spirit; here weak, there wondrous strong; here dying, there alive." We need not multiply quotations, but we must observe that Tertullian used language of a character which would scarcely suit the necessary refinements of our later Christology. "Was not God truly crucified? Did He not truly die as He was truly crucified? Was He not truly raised up, as He truly died?" Tertullian maintains that this flesh of Christ was earthly, terrena; not heavenly, caelestis. It was not animalis in the sense which some would introduce, as if the anima became caro or carnalis. The soul of Christ was like ours, sensible and rational, and must be distinguished from the flesh. It was man, not angel, that He bore, for He came to deliver man. Still less was His flesh spiritual. Thus He did away with the sin in the flesh; He did not do away with that which Tertullian calls the flesh of sin, apparently taking the thought from St. Paul's words, "body of sin." He is Son of God in the spirit, Son of man in the flesh; Spirit descended into the Virgin's womb, to partake of flesh from that womb. To justify the words of his creed, ex Virgine (not per Virginem), he appeals to Matt. i. 16, "virum Mariae ex qua nascitur Christus." This treatise deserves well the commendation of Dörner. "So rich had been the development of Tertullian's powers relative to the truth of the humanity of Christ. No preceding writer can compare with him in this respect. No one plunges into the act of the Incarnation with such love, such admiration, such penetration."

There can be little doubt that the work Against Praxeas was written at a later period of Tertullian's life than his treatise De Carne Christi. The heresy which, for the sake of maintaining the unity of the Godhead, identified the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, assumed the truth of the deity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: it was an effort to escape the charge of polytheism. Tertullian puts forward in opposition the rule of the church: "We believe one only God, but with this dispensation, which we call the economy, that of this one God is a Son, His Word, who proceeded from Him, through whom all things were made, and without whom nothing was made; that He was sent by the Father into the Virgin, and was born of her, God and man, Son of man and Son of God, and named Christ Jesus." This was the rule which came down from the beginning of the gospel; measured by it, the novelty of Praxeas became rejected. It is towards the end of the treatise (ch. xvii.) that Tertullian explains the relation between the two natures in our Lord, in a marvellously interesting fashion, his language being more guarded than that we quoted above. "The Holy Thing that shall be born shall be called the Son of God. The flesh was born: the flesh then is Son of God." Nay (says Tertullian), the words are spoken of the Spirit of God . . . the language cannot be used of the flesh; but of Him, God, who was born in flesh: the Word and the Spirit, which by the Father's will was born with the Word . . . Was then the Word transfigured in flesh or did He clothe himself with flesh? Surely, clothed Himself. God cannot change. And transfiguration is the destruction of the earlier state. That which is transfigured into something else ceases to be what it was before, and becomes to be what it was not before . . . If the Word became flesh by transfiguration or change of substance, then the substance of Jesus would be one, formed of two, viz. of flesh and spirit; a mixture, as electrum is a mixture of gold and silver, which is neither gold nor silver, but a tertium quid. And thus Jesus would be neither God (for the Word had ceased to be) nor flesh nor man, for that is not properly flesh which is Word. Of both would come something which is neither, but which is far different from either . . . But Christ is Son of God and Son of man, God and man, each substance being distinguished in its own properties: . . . we see a twofold state, not confused but conjoined in one Person, God and man. The Spirit performed the works peculiar to it, the works and signs: the flesh underwent the sufferings, hunger, thirst, grief unto death." Such was Tertullian's anticipation of the judgments of the four great councils.

It is interesting to turn from the great Carthaginian writer to the almost contemporaneous leader of the school of Alexandria. Clement's views of the human character of our Lord are instructive. He held that the body of our Saviour was true human body, but a body without form or beauty. It was the form of a servant; how could it then be adorned? Thus Christ was God undefiled in the fashion of a man. The peculiarity of Clement's view was this. He held that our Lord did not need food. He did eat indeed, but not for the sake of His body, but to prevent His followers from falling into the docetic errors which had subsequently arisen amongst professing Christians. For (proceeds Clement) He was absolutely free from human passions: no movement either of pleasure or pain affected Him. Thus at times Clement speaks of the body of Christ as simply a vesture. Though He was the fruit of the Virgin, He needed not to be sustained by her in His infancy. At other times he represents the Saviour as having obtained mastery over the body—the body itself being capable of suffering, and having suffered—and as thus having enabled His followers to obtain mastery over theirs. (Compare Paed. i. 2, p. 99, i. 6, p. 123, iii. 1, p. 251; Strom. iii. 17, p. 559, vi. 9, p. 775.)

From Clement we may pass to Origen. And here we have a distinct expression of the faith of the church. In the De Principiis (if we may trust the translation of Rufinus) Origen taught that all believed that God sent our Lord Jesus Christ to call first Israel, and, when they refused, the nations. This Jesus who came was born of the Father before all creation. He who in the creation ministered to the Father (for through Him all things were made) in these last days, "emptying Himself," was made man, incarnate whilst He was God, and, made man, continued God, as He was. He assumed a body similar to ours, differing in this alone, that it was born of the Virgin and the Holy Spirit. And this Jesus Christ was born and suffered in truth.

So far all seems clear. But in full agreement with the general tone of the work which we have quoted, Origen knew there were questions below this surface, questions as to the quomodo, to which the Christian must seek an answer. How did the Word dwell in the man Jesus? the Deity in the humanity? Very beautiful and very striking are the antitheses which Origen heaps together, as In Levit. Homil. iii. 1, and In Jerem. Hom. viii. 8, 9. And he was one of the first who drew attention to the great truth embodied in Luke ii. 52, "Jesus increased in wisdom" (In Jer. Hom. i. 7). And so Dorner was led to say that Origen was the first to appreciate the profound bearing which right conceptions as to the human soul of Christ must have on the clearing away of the clouds which overhang the mystery of His incarnation.

Thus, after he had described (in the preface to the De Principiis) the church's belief in the true humanity of Christ, the great teacher proceeds (book ii. ch. 6) to the investigation—How or Why our Lord and Saviour became man. He opens the discussion with a few exquisite sentences which Hooker might have incorporated in his fifth book, and then proceeds to give his view of the medium through which the union between God and man was effected in Christ Jesus. He finds this medium in the soul of Christ, the rationalis anima (§ 5). This soul Origen deemed to have been pre-existent (as he held the souls of all men to be), and to have been always inseparably inherent in Him, as the Wisdom and Word of God, the Truth, the Light. This soul loved righteousness, and therefore God anointed it with the oil of gladness—with the Word of God, and with wisdom—above its fellows, i.e. above the holy prophets and apostles. Thus this soul was made with the Word, in an eminent degree, one Spirit, because it was so joined to the Lord; and so it became capable of mediating between God and flesh—for it was impossible for the nature of God to be mingled with flesh without a mediator—and so the "Deus homo"—the God-man—is born.

"These are thoughts which have occurred to me whilst meditating on subjects so difficult as are the Incarnation and Deity of Christ. If any one can find out anything better, and can confirm what he says by more evident proofs taken from holy Scripture, let his opinions be received in preference to mine." A clear proof this, if proof is wanting, that the church was feeling her way into the depths of the truth, and not simply resting on the surface of truths received.

All questioning in the church on the incarnation of our Lord seems to have subsided during the remainder of the 3rd century. SABELLIANISM occupied the attention of the theologians of the East. True that the nature of the God-man was involved in this heresy, but the side of this nature to which attention was drawn was the divine character of our Lord. And so it remained until after the council of Nicea. The well-known creed of Eusebius expressed the belief of the church in the one Lord Jesus Christ, "who for our salvation was incarnate and lived amongst men [τὸν διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν σαρκωθέντα καὶ ἐν ἀνθρώποις πολιτευόμενον], and suffered, and rose again the third day, and ascended to the Father, and will come again in glory"; and it insisted that the Father is truly Father, and the Son truly Son. The Nicene fathers altered this as follows: "who for us men and for our salvation came down, and was incarnate, and was made man [ἐνανθρωπήσασα, entered on man], suffered, and rose again the third day," thus bringing out two points on which the creed of Caesarea had been silent. The exposition, found amongst the writings of Athanasius, and, rightly or wrongly, attributed to him, is, as we might expect, very clear and distinct on the point of the deity of our Lord, but it uses language deemed (we must suppose) at the time consistent with the conception of ἐνανθρώπισις, but which was afterwards rejected. In the consummation of the ages, He—the Word, the Wisdom, the Son—"coming down from the bosom of the Father, assumed from the undefiled Virgin Mary τὸν ἡμέτερον ἄνθρωπον Christ Jesus, whom He delivered up to suffer on our behalf, of His own free will: in which man He being crucified and dying for us rose from the dead and was taken up to heaven . . . and [thus shewed] the way to heaven, whither the Divine Man, ὁ κυριακὸς ἄνθρωπος, went up as forerunner for us, in which man He is to judge quick and dead." The term ὁ κυριακὸς ἄνθρωπος, which we are obliged to translate "the divine man," is found twice again in the latter part of the Exposition; both times in connexion with an explanation of Jerem. xxxviii. 21, where Aquila is quoted as reading ἔκτισε Κύριος καινὸν ἐν τῇ θηλείᾳ, and "the new thing" is said to signify the divine body, τὸ κυριακὸν σῶμα. Thus the divine man was created as "the beginning of ways" (Proverbs viii. 22); and "a way is a bodily thing, visible to the eye, and such is the divine man." The passage is difficult; the explanation of the Benedictines and Dr. Routh, that ἡμέτερος ἄνθρωπος means "our human nature," and the "Dominicus homo" means "the human nature of Christ," will not satisfy all the requirements of the passages before us. Whether Athanasius was the writer of these words may be doubted; but whoever was their author, it seems clear that, when they were written, the writer was uncertain as to the nature of the union between the Son of God, the only begotten Word, Wisdom, Son, and the Man Christ Jesus, whom He assumed. We see here that a serious danger lurked in the church as to the meaning of a figure used by Clement of Alexandria. He spoke (Cohort. c. x. p. 86) of the Word as "having taken the mask [τὸ προσωπεῖον] of a man, as having moulded Himself in flesh, and acted the saving drama of humanity." Certainly further discussion was needed; further guidance of the Holy Spirit to lead the church into the truth on this momentous subject. In his second book on the Sermon on the Mount (§ vi.), written about the year 393, St. Augustine used the expression, "The only begotten Son of God shall come from heaven visibly in dominicō homine to judge the quick and dead"; but in his Retractions, which date about thirty years later, he expressed his regret for his language, and withdrew the phrase. "I question whether the Man Christ Jesus, who is Mediator between God and man, is rightly called homo dominicus, seeing He is Lord Himself: indeed, what man in His holy family may not be called homo dominicus? . . . The language may be defended, but I regret that I have used it."

This effect of the attention of the church being at the end of the 3rd century called paramently to the divine nature of our Lord is further exhibited in the Latin writer ARNOBIUS. Meeting the challenge that, if Christ is God, He died like a man, Arnobius asks, "Who was it that was seen hanging on the cross? who was seen dying? The man in whom He had clothed Himself, and whom He carried with Him." [Homo quem induerat et secum ipse portabat.] (i. 62.) "The death was the death of the man assumed, not of Himself: of that which was carried, not of Him that carried." LACTANTIUS'S view is different and better. He regarded the humanity of our Lord as perfect: he held that He truly suffered in the body, truly died; but suffered in order to shew how a man should suffer, died to shew how a man should triumph over death. (Inst. iv. 24.) But we should be inclined to say that by Lactantius the perfect deity of our Lord during His sojourn on earth was lost sight of in the conception of His perfect humanity.

Most refreshing is it to turn from these imperfect and misleading conceptions to the works of the great Athanasius. The two treatises, the Oration against the Heathen and the Oration on the ἐνανθρώπησις of the Word, are considered to have been composed before the council of Nicea, and if they have a controversial aspect, that aspect must be regarded as directed rather against the world outside the church than against any heresy or false teaching claiming to be within it. The object of the latter work is to exhibit the reasons for the incarnation: it is only by the way that we learn Athanasius's teaching as to the mode of the incarnation. Still the teaching comes out clear and distinct, and, after our previous labours, we are the better able to appreciate the immense stride which Christology took under the guidance of this remarkable man.

Athanasius used the word ἐνανθρώπησις, but there is no doubt of the meaning he attributes to it. He says distinctly (§ 44) that our Lord γένετο ἄνθρωπος. We never read here that He assumed τὸν κυριακὸν ἄνθρωπον, though we meet three or four times with the words τὸ κυριακὸν σῶμα, and read of its formation, its death (§ 26), its resurrection (§ 31). This body the Word formed for Himself in the womb of the Virgin, to be a temple for Himself: He appropriated it as His organ (§ 8). It is a body not different nor alien from ours: indeed Athanasius calls it ours (§ 8). Thus as a man He lived amongst men (§ 15). Thus (he proceeds, § 18) when you read of theologians saying that He did eat and drink and was born, know that His body, as body, was born, and was fed with corresponding food, whilst He, God, the Word, being united with this body, ordained all things, and by the things which He did in the body indicated that He was not [merely] a man but God, the Word. And from time to time Athanasius exhibits the human and the divine characteristics in our Lord, in antitheses with which we are now familiar; and from time to time he exhibits that which, as we have seen, was the great intention of the oration; the object of this incarnation, how He gave up His body as a sacrifice to destroy death, how He fulfilled the death of mankind, how He became man in order that we might be made divine. αὐτὸς ἐνηθρώπησεν ἵνα ἡμεῖς θεοποιηθῶμεν. The difference between the language of this treatise and the language of the Exposition of the Faith to which we have referred before is surely sufficient to shew that, although that Exposition is found among the works of Athanasius, it cannot be of his composition. For Athanasius himself says, "He was born, He appeared a man, He died and rose again" (§ 15 and § 21); he speaks of the Lord as carrying about His body; very different, as we saw, was the language of the Exposition.*

We must refer briefly to the peculiar views of MARCELLUS of Ancyra on the incarnation before we pass on to the later controversies of the 4th century. In his zeal against the Arians, Marcellus rendered himself obnoxious to the charge of Sabellianism, and Eusebius of Caesarea was induced to write against him. In his works Against Marcellus and On Ecclesiastical Theology, Eusebius quotes largely from the writings of Marcellus; and amongst the quotations is one in which he is represented as speaking of "the man united to the Logos." "This man was made (or became) man," and thus the Word, uniting itself with the flesh from the Holy Virgin, became "the first begotten of every creature" (Euseb. con. Marcell. Ancy. ii. 3). To this epoch Marcellus assigned the fulfilment of the oft-disputed words of Proverbs viii. 22. To this epoch again he assigned the realisation of the conception that "He is the image of the invisible God." In this connexion (l. c. p. 49) Marcellus uses the words ἀειλήθη τὸν ἄνθρωπον; it is possible that because of this use Athanasius (as we saw in our last note) repudiated the phrase. But this human being, or humanity, Marcellus regarded so absolutely as a mark and part of Christ's humiliation that he insisted as part of his teaching that it must cease to be when the day of final redemption comes: he must have denied the glorification of the body. Indeed he went further and held that after the day of Judgment the flesh which He had assumed must be deserted by the Word, so that neither should the Son of God subsist longer, nor the Son of man whom He had assumed. (See Pearson on the Creed.)

* Athanasius seems to have become himself aware of the ambiguity which lurked under the words ἐνηθρώπησεν, ἐνανθρώπησις. In the Oration iii. against the Arians, written after 355, we have, § 30: ἄνθρωπος γέγονε καὶ οὐκ εἰς ἄνθρωπον ἦλθε. So iv. 35, after quoting Luke xxiv. 39, καθὼς ἐπὶ θεωρεῖτε ἔχοντα, he says, καὶ οὐκ εἶπε Τὸν ἢ Τὸν ἄνθρωπὸν μου δὲν ἀνέληφα, ἀλλ' Ἐμὲ.

It is refreshing to turn to St. Cyril of Jerusalem. His teaching is clear and simple. "The only begotten Son of God came down from heaven upon earth, assuming manhood of like passions with us, born of a holy Virgin and the Holy Spirit: the manhood being not in appearance but in truth; nor yet passing through the Virgin as through a conduit, but incarnate from her, and nurtured by her." And he insisted that our Lord did some things as God, some things as man; but He it was that did all these things.

Before Athanasius was called to his rest, it became his duty to struggle against another form of error, which was encouraged, it is said, by his great enemies the Arians, but was apparently provoked in them by their desire to oppose the teaching of their foe Marcellus. He, as we have seen, held that the human nature of our Lord was such a characteristic of His humiliation that, in order to His final absorption in the Deity, it must be annihilated. The Arians, or at least some branch or offset of their party, announced before Athanasius died that the body of our Lord was consubstantial, homocousion, with His divinity. They taught that it came down from heaven. In a letter to Epictetus bishop of Corinth (written, it is supposed, about the year 371), Athanasius indignantly combated this and other errors of which we have already spoken, but of the prevalence of which this letter furnishes painful evidence. The occasion was thus given to the great bishop to insist once more on that on which he had pressed again and again in his earlier life, that the Word became perfect man, as He was perfect God. He distinguished, as he had done before, most forcibly between the divine and the human in the life of our Lord. At the same time, he taught that by the union and communion of the Word with the human body a great accession had been made to it (cf. Hooker, E. P. bk. v. ch. liv. §§ 6, 7, 8). From being mortal it had become immortal; from animal it had become spiritual; though made from earth it had passed the gates of heaven (§ 9). That which happened to the body of our Lord, He Himself is said to have suffered. And thus while it is true that the Word has come to others to enable them to prophesy, from the Virgin the Word came forth as Man, having assumed flesh.

Besides this letter to Epictetus, Athanasius wrote about the year 372 two books, entitled On the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ against Apollinarius, in the first of which the same subject is treated perhaps in a more formal manner; but on this portion of their contents it will be unnecessary again to touch. More momentous is it to note that from this discussion Athanasius passes to another, to meet the error of those who held that in Christ was a heavenly intelligence replacing the inner man in us. Athanasius had maintained, some years at least before (see Incarnation of the Word against the Arians, § 44), that the Word had become perfect man. Opponents now maintained that this was impossible, first, because where there is perfect man there is sin; and, secondly, because two perfect things cannot become one. Christ could not (they said), by becoming man, have exhibited in Himself that which in us savours of and bears the flesh. Thus He took τὸ ἀνόητον in order that He might Himself be the νοῦς in Himself. We cannot here enter into the arguments by which Athanasius insists on the perfect humanity of our Lord; suffice it to say that, whilst with reference to the first point he exposes the cunning of the Arians—who, under the pretence of exalting the humanity of our Lord, were endeavouring to depreciate His deity—and shews that the conception that Christ's body came down from Heaven deprives the life of Christ of its universal, ethical, and efficient potency, he is led on (§ 7) to speak briefly of the nature of sin, and to maintain that sin is not of the essence of the human nature.<sup>b</sup> And then, with wonderful foresight, he anticipates the controversies of the next eighty years: he maintains that the union of the Logos with the flesh is without confusion (§ 10), that the Being was the same who suffered and could not suffer (11). Christ is God, and Christ is man: Christ is God and man; and Christ is one (εἷς) (13). And then he passes to consider the effect of the teaching of those who denied that Christ had the inner man (this inner man, he says, is the ψυχή), and who held that the νοῦς ἐκρουπάλιος took the place of the inner man in Christ (15). "If such were the case, Christ could not be perfect God and perfect man" (16). And such Christ is, even though those whom Athanasius addresses may stigmatise him as a man-worshipper. In the treatise on the Incarnation against Arians (§ 21) Athanasius had distinguished most forcibly between the human will and the divine will in Christ. This distinction, too, seems to have been objected against by the friends of Apollinarius. "If," said the latter, "we are to believe that there was the human νοῦς in Jesus, there must have been two νοῦς, the one divine and never mutable, the other human and mutable. Thus there must really have been two persons in the Christ." The only way to evade this result seemed to them to be this, to deny the human νοῦς; to deny, in other words, the perfect humanity. And this the Apollinarians did.

We have now come to a period in the history of the doctrine of the incarnation when it becomes the history of the church. The controversies regarding the teaching of NESTORIUS and EUTYCHES, the councils of EPHEBUS and CHALCEDON, are given elsewhere. And so we pass on by the disruption of the church of the East to the period of the Monothelitic age, when the minds of men were turned from the consideration of Christ Jesus in essence to the thought of Him in action, and to the motives which influenced His action. These will be discussed in the article MONOTHELITES. The next century was interrupted by the Spanish bishops Elipandus and Felix, who were named ADOPTIONISTS. But generally in the West the grand definition of the council of Chalcedon has been accepted as giving the final results to which the church has attained in her investigations on this momentous subject.

It is simply impossible to give any short summary of the works which have been written upon the subject of the incarnation. It is so distinctly the centre of Christianity proper that every theologian of eminence has touched upon it. The writer must, however, express his obligations to the great work of Dermer. [C. A. INDICIA, virgin of Verona, the subject of two epistles of St. Ambrose to Syagrius bishop of Verona (ep. 5, 6, in Patr. Lat. xvi. 891), written cir. A.D. 380. With the full consent of Zeno the bishop, apparently of Verona, she was duly received into the order of Christian virgins, and both at Rome with St. Marcellina, and afterwards at Verona living with her sister, who was married to one Maximus, she was without reproach, visiting and being visited by clergy and laity. Many years had passed since her first reception when an evil report was carried to a neighbouring monastery, and soon brought to the town, against the character of Indicia. Her brother-in-law Maximus, taking up the matter with great apparent heartiness, carried the question before Syagrius that justice might be done. But seemingly without formal accusers, or witnesses, or assessors, and without hearing exculpatory evidence, Syagrius ordered her to be clinically examined by certain women. Strong in her sense of innocence, Indicia would not submit to this indignity, but appealed to St. Ambrose of Milan for protection and a fair trial. Syagrius also wrote stating his view of the case and insisting upon his judgment being carried out. Maximus, who was the real promoter of the charge, attended in person, speaking of a great crime but refusing to be the formal accuser. Two witnesses, Renatus and Leontius, attended, but without agreement in their testimony. Ambrose took the case up de novo, and, with the assistance of some other bishop, made a thorough investigation into all the circumstances, received the witness of both her friends and her enemies, and came to the conclusion that she was entirely guiltless of what she was accused of. He then embodied his decision in the two letters to Syagrius, especially in the first, saying that Syagrius had decided her case irregularly, contrary to all civil and ecclesiastical law, and contrary, at the outset, to good manners, modesty, and honour. [J. G.]

INDIMUS, bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia, near the river Calycadnus. He was present at the Ephesine Latrocinium, A.D. 449, but apparently without adopting its conclusions, as his name appears in 451 at the council of Chalcedon. In 459, he signed the synodical decree of Gennadius against the Simoniacs. (Mansi, vii. 402; Gennadii Epist. Encycl. in Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 1621; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 899.) [J. de S.]

INDRACTUS, ST. William of Malmesbury wrote a "Passio S. Indracti, Dominicae et sociorum Glastoniae," which was abridged by Capgrave (see Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 5, i. 689, 690, Hardy's Catalogue of Materials, i. 338, ii. 156). William says he has inserted nothing but what he found in an English account of the martyrdom. In the days of the West Saxon king Ine, Indract, the son of an Irish king, went with nine followers on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return was murdered at Hywise near Pedred (the Parret), when on his way to visit St. Patrick's tomb at Glastonbury. Ine had the martyrs buried on either side of the altar at Glastonbury (see Freeman's Norman Conquest, i. 436). William of Worcester (Itin. 150), says: "Sanctus Indractus martir et confessor die 8 Maii, jacet apud Shepton per 5 miliaria de Glastynbery cum sociis suis centum martiribus." But the day usually assigned to Indractus is Feb. 5. There was a chapel of St. Indract in the parish of St. Dominick in Cornwall. But the parish feast is now on August 4—i. e. the day of the founder of the Dominican order, who has here usurped the place of a Celtic saint (Lake's Cornwall, i. 299) Dominica. [C. W. B.]

INDRACTUS, INDRECT (INREACH-TACH), was a very common Irish name, and often appears in the early Annals (Colgan, Acta SS. 254, n. 3). An Indract is given by Ware as the first bishop at Kilmacduagh after St. Colman (Feb. 3), whom he followed after a lapse of two centuries, having died A.D. 814. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 15; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 427.) [J. G.]

INDUSTRIUS, addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris, in a letter occupied with the praises of one Vectius a layman. (Epist. iv. 9, Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 513.) [S. A. B.]

INE, INI, INA, king of the West Saxons, A.D. 688-726; a famous warrior, legislator, and ecclesiastical benefactor.

He was, as is stated in the preamble of his laws, the son of Cénred (Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, p. 45). Cénred, according to the pedigree given in the Chronicle and by Asser, was the son of Ceolwald, son of Cutha, grandson of Ceaulin (M. H. B. 348, 468). Cénred was an under-king or "subregulus" in part of Wessex, possibly in Somersetshire, where a good deal of the interest of his son's reign is centred (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 641). The genealogies give Ine a brother named Ingild, and two sisters, Cuenburh and Cuthburh, the joint founders of Wimburn. [CUTHBURGA; INGILD.] It has been conjectured that Ine was also half-brother, by his mother, of Mul and Ceadwalla. [CEADWALLA.] This is quite possible; Cénred may have married the widow of Cenbyrht, their father, who died in 661. A further hypothesis regards the mother of Mul as a foreigner, possibly a British lady, a theory which would account for the partial appropriation by the Welsh writers of the exploits of Ine, and the confusion between Ceadwalla and Cadwalader (see Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, i. 262; Freeman, King Ine; Somersetshire Archaeological Society's Transactions, vol. xviii. pp. 28 sq.). Later writers, especially the chroniclers of Abingdon, and William of Malmesbury in his account of that monastery, make Cissa, the founder of Abingdon, father of Ine; a statement which, unless we identify Cissa with Cénred, is inconsistent with the best authorities (W. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, pp. 191, 354). The statement made on similar authority, that Ine was brother of Kenten, father of St. Aldhelm, has no historical foundation (ib. p. 332). Cénred survived his son's accession to the throne, on the departure of Ceadwalla for Rome; and it may accordingly be inferred that Ine succeeded by election, according to the ancient theory of succession, as the ablest and most promising member of the royal house. Ethelburga, the wife of Ine, was also a lady of the royal house, and is said, on the very doubtful evidence of a charter, to have been sister of Ethelheard, Ine's successor. [ETHELBURGA.]

As Ine's achievements in the several fields of war, legislation, and ecclesiastical history, are almost entirely unconnected with one another, it may suffice here to class them under these three heads.

1. Ine's wars are recorded in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and thence transferred with little amplification or embellishment to the pages of the later systematic historians, William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntingdon. After having drawn up his laws and secured a measure of internal peace, Ine, in 694, proceeded to renew the struggle, in which Mul and Ceadwalla had preceded him, with the king of Kent. He demanded satisfaction for the murder of Mul. Wihtred, the king of Kent, offered a wergild (probably of 30,000 mancuses, M. H. B. 323, 539). This Ine accepted, and peace was made, which continued during the lifetime of the two kings (Bede, H. E. iv. 25, &c.).

William of Malmesbury mentions in connexion with this business a war of Ine with the East Angles, in which the nobles of that kingdom were expelled from the land (G. R. lib. i. ed. Hardy, p. 48). There is, however, nothing in what we know of East Anglian history at this period to confirm the story.

In the year 710 Ine was at war with Gerent, king of the Welsh of Cornwall. In this he was assisted by his kinsman Nun, who possibly ruled the South Saxons under Ine's overlordship (M. H. B. 323). Another king or under-king of Wessex in the early half of Ine's reign was Baldred, whose name occurs among the benefactors of Malmesbury, and who may be identified with the Baldrich of the later Welsh writers, who mention him as a ruler in Devonshire and Cornwall (Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, i. 263).

In 715 Ine is again found at war with a king of English race, Ceolred of Mercia. Ceolred seems to have invaded Wessex, and at Wodnesbeorge the two kings fought. The Chronicle (M. H. B. 323) does not state what was the issue of the struggle, but Henry of Huntingdon adds (ib. 724) that the slaughter was so great that it was regarded as a drawn battle; anyhow it stopped any further incursion from Mercia for the time. Wodnesbeorge is identified with Wanborough, between Swindon and Ramsbury, a field marked by more than one bloody encounter between Mercia and Wessex.

In 721 Ine had to begin a long struggle with domestic rebellion, the origin of which is not at all cleared up by contemporary evidence, but which must be supposed to have sprung from questions concerning dynastic rights and the succession to the crown, which, owing to Ine's advancing years and childlessness, might easily come into dispute. In that year Cynewulf the etheling was slain by Ine (Chr. S. M. H. B. 327). In 722 another etheling, Ealdberht, took up arms, and probably with the assistance of the Britons, seized Taunton, which Ine had built as a frontier fortress against the Welsh. He was dislodged from Taunton, which was forthwith demolished by queen Ethelburga, and fled into Sussex, where Ine either was already at war or quickly followed him. The war with Sussex seems to have ended with the death of Ealdberht whom Ine slew there in 725. Soon after this event Ine determined to resign his throne; he left it to the junior princes (Bede, H. E. v. 7). Ethelheard, the queen's brother, was his successor, but he did not obtain full possession until he had defeated Oswald, another etheling and his rival, who died in 730. Oswald, if we may so interpret the genealogies, which give no account of the pedigree of Ethelheard, was probably the nearest heir, and it may have been his claims to the succession which led to the final determination of Ine to resign.

2. The laws of Ine, preserved by the care of Alfred and contained in the Textus Roffensis, were published early in his reign, about the year 690. In the preamble the king states that he establishes his royal dooms, with the advice of his father Cœnred, his bishop Hedda, and his bishop Eorcenwold. Eorcenwold was bishop of the East Saxons, but had great influence in Surrey, which lay within Ine's kingdom; it is not therefore necessary to suppose that Ine was master of London, but it does seem natural to conclude that Surrey was now freed from the claims of the kings of Kent and Mercia.

The code, or collection of customs, contains seventy-six clauses, some of which are subdivided into minor articles; they are printed in Thorpe's Anglo-Saxon Laws, pp. 45-65; in Lambard's Archaionomia, p. 1; Wilkins's Anglo-Saxon Laws, pp. 14-27; Schmid's Gesetze der Angelsachsen, pp. 20-57; and the ecclesiastical enactments are given separately in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 214-219. The ecclesiastical clauses prescribe the baptism of children within a month of birth (cl. 2), fines for working on Sundays (cl. 3), the payment of church scot at Martinmas (cl. 4 and 61), the law of sanctuary (cl. 5), and contain some minor enactments touching oaths and wergilds. Next in interest to these are the clauses which relate to the British population; clauses 23 and 32 fix the wergild of the wealth; several of the others shew that the social distinction between the two races was diminishing, or else that the population for which the king was legislating was by no means disproportionately divided. Most of the other articles relate to the ordinary subject-matter of the early laws, the punishments for house-breaking, fighting, murder, and other crimes, with tariff of wergilds and money fines. To the student of early jurisprudence, these laws are particularly important, as being, with the exception of the Kentish laws, the earliest results of Anglo-Saxon legislation.

3. Far the greatest part of Ine's posthumous reputation is due to his activity as a founder of monasteries and patron of learned and holy men. Of these, the best known is St. Aldhelm, but it must be remembered that St. Boniface spent his early years in Wessex under Ine's rule, and had acted as messenger between him and archbishop Berhtwald, while the glimpses which during Boniface's career are obtained of the domestic church history of Wessex are very important. It is clear from them that the work of education, as well as practices of devotion and the fostering of missions, occupied no small part of the thought of the West Saxon ruler. One sign of this may be found in the subdivision of the West Saxon diocese, which archbishop Theodore had been unable to secure, but which was effected by Berhtwald, with the concurrence of Ine, after the death of bishop Hedda. [HEADDA.] In 705 the see of Sherborne was founded for the district west of Selwood and placed under Aldhelm; and in 711 or thereabouts the old kingdom of Sussex was made a new diocese under bishop Eadberht. [See ALDHELM and EADBERHT.]

The monastic establishments specially favoured by Ine were:—(1) Glastonbury, of which he was regarded as the English founder. Legend of later date made this ancient seat of religion a relic of the original Christianity of Britain; unfortunately the hands of forgers or fabricators have been at work so industriously on this topic that absolutely nothing can be confidently affirmed touching either the older foundation or Ine's share in the revival. The evidence, however, of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, which was certainly drawn up long before the second restoration of Glastonbury under Dunstan and the period of forgery, shews that Ine was, in Alfred's time, known as the builder of the monastery at Glastonbury (M. H. B. 323). That it was done with special reference to the soul of the murdered Ml, as stated by William of Malmesbury (de Antiq. Glaston. ap. Gale, p. 310), is a statement redolent of later ideas. The mention, among the letters of Boniface, of Glastonbury as a flourishing monastery must, however, preclude us from regarding the charters of the monastery as altogether baseless fabrications. Some of them are even regarded by a critic so severe as Kemble as genuine. They may all be found in the first volume of the Codex Diplomaticus and elsewhere. (2) Malmesbury, one of the special foundations of Aldhelm [ALDHELM], the fabulous part of whose history is largely due to the same authorities. The Malmesbury charters, very few of which have any pretension to genuineness, will also be found in the Codex Diplomaticus, and in the fifth book of William of Malmesbury's Gesta Pontificum. (3) Abingdon, the founder of which was said to be Cissa (see above), but the endowment of which was carried on under Ine's patronage (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 31, 45, 46; Hist. Abend. i. 9, 11, 12). (4) At Sherborne, Bradford, possibly at Wells, and other places of less importance under Aldhelm's rule. Into any critical examination of the evidences of these houses it is, of course, quite impossible to enter; but the conclusion may be briefly stated: there is good evidence of the existence of flourishing monasteries, during Ine's reign, at Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Wimborne, Nursling, Tisbury, Waltham, and Sherborne; less distinct evidence for Frome, Bradford, and the other places under the sway of Aldhelm; and little more than a ray of obscure light touching Abingdon; that being simply the fact that an old monastery existed there before Ethelwold founded the historic abbey in the 10th century.

There was a good deal of synodical activity under Ine, and some part of it may, no doubt, be attributed to his personal action, and not merely, as the hagiographers were inclined to represent, to the direct influence of men like Aldhelm. That he came under the direct influence of archbishop Theodore, there is little or rather nothing to shew; had that been the case, the West Saxon diocese could scarcely have remained so long undivided. The council in which his laws were propounded was composed not only of bishops, ealdormen, and witan, but of a large company of God's servants, by which we are probably to understand monks and clergy (Ancient Laws, p. 45). In 704 there was a council of the church held at some place unnamed, in which it was determined that, unless the measure for the division of the diocese, proposed by archbishop Berhtwald, should be carried into effect, the West Saxon clergy should be refused communion (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 267). In 705, in a West Saxon synod, Aldhelm, still abbat, was appointed to write his letter to Gerent king of Damnonia, on the paschal controversy; a measure which may possibly have had some connexion with the war which has been already mentioned in 710 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 268). To the same year belongs a privilege issued by Ine at Wimborne, freeing the monasteries of Malmesbury, Frome, and Bradford from secular interference, and securing the election of the abbats. This act, which is of very questionable authenticity, if not altogether spurious, purports to be confirmed by a West Saxon council held at Adderbourne on the Nodder (Will. Malmes. G. P. lib. v. § 226; Kemble, C. D. 54; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 276). On better authority may be accepted the fact that a great conference of kings and bishops was held at Brentford, the same year, to determine on the disposition to be made of the West Saxon exiles who had found a home in Essex (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 274); and, finally, to 705 belongs the council which established the see of Aldhelm at Sherborne (ib. 275). Between 710 and 716 was held the synod in which, by the advice of Ine, Boniface, still bearing the name of Winfrith, was sent to consult archbishop Berhtwald; possibly the subject of the negotiation was the foundation of the new see at Selsey (ibid. 296). Most of the other documents in which the name of Ine occurs labour under almost insuperable suspicions.

The length of Ine's reign is stated by Bede as thirty-seven years; this computation, starting from the year 688, which seems to be certainly the year of Ceadwalla's resignation, fixes the year of Ine's resignation as A.D. 725 (Bede, H. E. v. 7). The king's purpose in going to Rome was, as Bede tells us, that he might, by sojourning for a time on earth in the neighbourhood of the saints, fit himself for a more friendly reception by them in heaven. The legendary story of the circumstances which led to the immediate decision is told by William of Malmesbury, or some Glastonbury writer who annotated the Gesta Regum (ed. Hardy, p. 48). [See ETHELBURGA.] The queen, having determined that Ine should be weaned from the delights of the world, took occasion one day, after they had quitted a royal village in which a great feast had been held, to take her husband back to the scene of the festivity. He found it filled with filth and rubbish, and a sow which had just littered placed in his royal bed. The queen improved the lesson, and Ine determined to follow the example of Ceadwalla, and the other Saxon kings who had sought for rest under the shadow of the apostolic see. At Rome, according to William of Malmesbury (p. 54), he lived a modest, unpretending life; it is uncertain, owing to the difficulty of the punctuation of the passage, whether or no he parted with the long hair which would be a sign of royalty; "ne pompam suae conversionis faceret, non publicis vultibus expositus crinem deposit, sed ut solius Domini oculis placeret, amictu plebeio tectus clam consenuit." His wife Ethelburga remained in faithful attendance on him until his death.

If there is any basis for the tradition that Ine founded the Schola Anglorum at Rome, a tradition which has only late historical authority, it must have been at this period. The authority is Matthew Paris, who (ed. Luard. i. 330) states that the institution was founded with the approbation of pope Gregory II., who reigned from 715 to 731. In making the statement, Matthew Paris probably used some legendary material, which was also worked up in the Lives of the Offas; but the tradition could not have been a very old one, or William of Malmesbury would not have omitted the opportunity of adding some mention of it to the other merits of Ine. He ascribes the foundation of the Schola Anglorum to Offa (G. R. lib. i. § 109, ed. Hardy, p. 153). The existence of the school early in the next century is made certain by the mention of it in the Chronicle, A.D. 816. A statement connected by Matthew Paris with this story, namely, that Ine imposed a tax named "Romescot," a penny a year annually, on all the houses in Wessex, for the support of the English school, is founded on a somewhat earlier authority; which is likewise found, but without any mention of the school, in the anonymous Liber de Adventu Saxonum (Sym. Dun. ed. Hinde, p. 207), printed among the works of Symeon of Durham. Whether there is any truth in the story, or whether it is merely a throwing back of some of the charitable acts of Offa and Ethelwulf, it is now impossible to decide. The first mention of the Rom-feod which occurs in the Anglo-Saxon laws is in the laws of Edward and Guthrum; but Alfred's liberality towards the English school and Offa's benefaction of an annual payment to the popes rest upon historical statements which cannot be overthrown.

A late insertion in the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor represents Ine's legendary character in a new light. According to this story, Ine was elected king by an angel, and was the first English king of all Britain; he took for his wife Guala, from whom the country formerly called Cambria took the name of Wales, and, by marrying English and Britons to wives of the other nation, produced a new race. The wisdom, justice, and warlike skill of Ine are further extolled. The passage is, however, so entirely fabulous that it is needless to inquire to what documentary antecedents it may be referred (Gesetz der Angelsachsen, ed. Schmid, p. 512). No part of it can be earlier than the reign of Edward I.

Still, in the curious misrepresentations of true history contained in the Welsh traditionary history, there are certain glimpses of the fact that Ine has some pretension to be a sort of international hero. Geoffrey of Monmouth (lib. xii. c. 18), who had confounded Cadwalader with Ceadwalla, makes king Alan of Armorica send his son Ivor and his nephew Ini or Ynyt to rule the relics of the Britons, and represents the two princes as harassing the English for forty-nine years. This story, or the germ of truth which it contained, was amplified by later Welsh annalists who ascribe to Ivor, as victories over the English the victories won by Ine over the Welsh, and even make Ivor end his days at Rome as the historic Ine did. It is not indeed to be contended that all Ine's struggles with the Welsh ended in victories; that seems most unlikely from the history of the next reign [ETHELHEARD]; but it is clear that a good deal of confusion and possible misrepresentation is found in the later Welsh annals and in the later Brut (see Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, i. 256; Freeman, King Ine, pp. 34-40). [IVOR.]

Besides the accounts of Ine to be found in the ordinary English histories and authorities above quoted, reference may be made to the Elogium Inae, by Mabillon, AA. SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pl. 1. pp. 490-494; and the Bollandist acts, Feb. 6, tom. i. pp. 905-924.

Mabillon assigns to Ine a letter of consolation addressed to a sick brother, "regi In," and supposes it to have been written to Ine, ex-king, after he had become a monk at Rome. In the MS., however, edited by Jaffé, the superscription is "militi S'i"; and there seems no reason to ascribe it to Boniface as the writer; it contains, however, nothing of importance (Mon. Mogunt. p. 308). The arguments adduced to prove that Ine became a monk are of no value, resting upon the assumption that he introduced the Benedictine rule into the West Saxon monasteries.

The exact date of Ine's death is unknown. The Chronicle places both his visit to Rome and his death under the year 728; but the former event cannot well be placed later than 725, and it is by no means certain that Bede had heard of his death. The day of the "depositio" of Ine is given as Feb. 6 (Nicolas, Chronology of History, p. 154); under which date Ine is commemorated in the Acta Sanctorum, on the authority of Menard, and Mayhew, who, in his notices of the English Benedictine saints, cites the "Tabulae" of the Basilica of St. Peter for the fact that Ine died a monk and was buried, about 727, at the entrance of that church (AA. SS. Feb. i. 913). [S.]

INEGUUALD (Kemble, C. D. 82), bishop. [INGWALD.]

INELLA is mentioned, in the Life of St. Farannan, among those who came to welcome St. Columba on one occasion when he came back to Ireland, but Colgan (Acta SS. 337, c. 7, 339, n. 25) supposes Inella to be another form of Derinella of Oct. 16 (26). [DARBELIN.] [J. G.]

INFANTIUS, count of the East under the emperor Arcadius. Like his father Modestus, a distinguished prefect of the East, he was a man of exceptionally high character (Libanius, ep. 906, p. 422, ed. Wolf). The emperor addressed him a constitution (Dec. 30, 393) forbidding the recognition of the Jewish law on the subject of marriage, and also forbidding bigamy. (Cod. Just. lib. i. tit. ix. num. 7). [T. W. D.]

INFERTAGSEUS. [INFERTAIGSE.]

INFRIDIUS (Alcuin. i. 268). [NEFRIDIUS.]

INGALDUS, bishop. [INGWALD.]

INGELD, a West Saxon abbat, mentioned among the letters of Boniface. In one of these, written to the monks of Glastonbury by a priest named Wiehtbert, who had gone to join Boniface (after the year 732), the monks are directed to salute the brethren "in giro, primo Ingeldum abbatem et congregationem nostram." (Ep. 98, Mon. Mogunt. p. 247.) From this it appears that Ingeld's monastery was not far from Glastonbury. In another letter (Ep. 46; Mon. Mogunt. p. 126), the congregation of an abbat named Aldhun with the two abbesses, Cuenburga (Cuenburga) and Coenburga, addresses Coengils, abbat, Ingeld abbat, and Wiehtberht priest. Coengils was abbat of Glastonbury, Cuenburga was sister of Ine and Ingeld, and abess of Wimborne. In the letter Cuenburga mentions her sister Quengith and other friends departed, for whom intercessory prayers are to be offered. The date of this letter is marked by Jaffé 729-744, relying on William of Malmesbury's dates for abbat Coengils; but it may be earlier. These facts point to an identity or relationship of Ingild and Ingeld. [S.]

INGELTRUDIS (INGITRUDIS), first abess of the nunnery of Bellus Mons (Beaumont), as it was called in later times, when its site had been changed.

In the latter half of the 6th century a widow Ingeltrudis, a relative of king Guntram, and by some believed to be a daughter of Clotaire, but more probably a sister of Ingundis and Aregundis, two of his wives, assembled a congregation of women within the precincts of St. Martin's Church at Tours (in atrio Sancti Martini). She then persuaded her married daughter Berthegundis to leave her husband and assist her in governing it. But the fear of excommunication with which Gregory bishop of Tours, moved by her husband's complaints, menaced her, soon forced the latter to depart. She returned, however, in three or four years, but again had to leave, taking refuge this time with her brother Berthramnus bishop of Bordeaux, until king Guntram ordered her departure. Upon her brother's death, to the quarrel with her husband she added a bitter contention with her mother the abess as to her father's property, the king Childebert and the bishops Gregory and Maroveus seeking in vain to compose it. In 590 Ingeltrudis, then about 80 years of age, feeling the approach of death, installed a niece as her successor, and died, leaving her curse upon her daughter. The latter, armed with an authority obtained from Childebert, entered the monastery and stripped it of its contents, overwhelming the new abess with reproaches. The story, which is told by Gregory with considerable detail, is interesting as a picture of Merovingian times. Ingeltrudis was apparently a partisan of the pretender Gundobald. (Greg. Tur. Hist. France, v. 22, vii. 36, ix. 33, x. 12; Gall. Christ. xiv. 311-313).

INGENIOSUS, a cleric condemned with eight others for Jovinianism by Siricius bishop of Rome, and by the synod of Milan, in 390. The epistle of Siricius and the reply of Ambrose in the name of his synod occur in Pat. Lat. (xiii. 1168, xvi. 1121, 1123), Mansi (iii. 663, 664), Labbe (ii. 1024, 1026). [T. W. D.]

INGENIUS, see also INGENUS.

INGENIUS, one of the presbyters of Marcotius, who condemned Arius in 321 (Mansi, ii. 779; Alexand. ep. 2 in Pat. Gr. xviii. 580), and probably the same presbyter of Mareotis who subscribed a letter to the council of Tyre in 335 in support of Athanasius (Athanas. Ap. c. Ar. § 74; Mansi, ii. 1154, where the name is Ingenius in the Greek and Ingenuus in the Latin).

INGENOCUS was one of St. Winoc's companions and disciples, perhaps a brother, in the 7th century. He was first in the monastery of St. Sithiu, under St. Bertin, and then became abbat. His feast is Feb. 10. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 192; Rees, Welsh Saints, 321.)

[J. G.]

INGENTIUS, decurio of Ziqua, a town in proconsular Africa, once secretary to Augustinus, and notorious for the fraud which he endeavoured to perpetrate in the case of Felix bishop of Aptunga, mentioned by Augustine (ep. 88 al. 68, § 4, 141 al. 152, §§ 10, 11, and elsewhere). [FELIX (26).]

[H. W. P.]

INGENUINUS (INGUINUS, GENUINUS), ST., third bishop of Säben, whence the see was later transferred to Brixen in the Tyrol, succeeding St. Lucanus after an interval, and followed by Constantius (Gams, Series Episc. p. 265; Sinnacher, Beyträge zur Geschichte der bischöflichen Kirche Säben und Brixen, i. 1, 2), though a couplet of an anonymous poet of the 9th century, possessing considerable authority on the succession of the Bavarian bishops, asserts that he was the first of this diocese, succeeded by Mastulo (Mabill. Vet. Analecta, p. 347; Reschius, Ann. Ecol. Sabiniani, i. 77). A few facts are known of his life. In 595, when the Franks were returning from their expedition into Lombardy with numerous captives, Inguinus of Savio, and Aquellus of Trient interceded, and ransomed the inhabitants of Ferruge Castrum, said to be Verruca (Paulus Diac. de Gest. Langob. iii. 30, Migne, Patr. Lat. xv. 533-4; Aimoin. de Gest. Franc. iii. 82, Bouquet, Recueil, iii. 108). His other appearances in history are in connexion with the schism of the Italian bishops on the point of the Trias Capitula, of which he was a defender. His name is found among the bishops present at the council of schismatics at Marauum in 591. See Paulus Diaconus (ib. iii. 26), who, however, treats the Roman party as the schismatics, and the council as the representatives of orthodoxy (cf. Bar. ann. 579; Pagi, xi.; Mansi, n.). His subscription, too, is found to the libellus, or letter, addressed by the bishops of Istria on the same occasion to the emperor Maurice, complaining of their treatment by the Romans, and begging for his intervention (Reschius, ib. saec. vi. xxxii. tom. ii. 406, 414; Bar. ann. 590, xxxviii.-xliii.; Mansi, x. 463-6). On both of these occasions the description is "Episcopus sanctae ecclesiae secundae Rhaetiae." To the Acta of the fictitious council of Grado, supposed to have been held in 579, his name is represented as signed by one Marcianus, a presbyter (Reschius, ib. saec. vi. 23, tom. ii. p. 373; see Bar. ann. 579; Pagi, xiii. xiv.; Mansi, n., and Labbe, ib. ix. 927-8, for the evidence proving this council to be an invention). He died cir. 605 and was commemorated Feb. 5. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 669 seqq.; Sinnacher, ib. i. 143 seqq.; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 218, ii. 280.)

[S. A. B.]

INGENUUS (1), Sept. 11. A reputed martyr at the Portus Romanus with Hippolytus (Mart. Hieron.), whom the Bollandists (Acta SS. Sept. iii. 777) regard as a different person from the Hippolytus of Aug. 22.

[G. T. S.]

INGENUUS (2) (Ἰγγένυς), Dec. 20, soldier and confessor at Alexandria, under the emperor Decius. He was one of a party of soldiers and was standing with three companions, Ammon, Zeno, and Ptolemaeus, near the tribunal of the judges, when a Christian was brought up who seemed to be about to deny his faith. Upon this the soldiers made earnest gesticulations, which attracted general attention, but before they could be seized, rushing towards the bench (βάθρον) which the accused occupied at his trial, they professed themselves Christians, and the judge, becoming alarmed, let them go. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 41-2; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.)

[J. W. S.]

INGENUUS, presbyter. [INGENIUS.]

INGENUUS (3), fifth bishop of Embrun, succeeding Armentarius. He began his episcopate about A.D. 440, and was therefore probably consecrated by Hilary of Arles. He sat in the council of Orange, A.D. 441 (Mansi, vi. 441), and in 450 was one of the nineteen bishops who wrote to St. Leo, recognising Arles as their metropolitan see (Leo Mag. ep. 66, in Pat. Lat. liv.). In 451 he took part in the council of Arles, in which the epistle of St. Leo to Flavianus was read and accepted (ep. 99). He carried to Rome the synodical letter to the pope, and brought back from Rome Leo's notification of the council of Chalcedon (ep. 102, capp. 1, 5). He was reproved by St. Leo for surrendering his metropolitan rights. He sat in the third council of Arles, 455 (Mansi, vii. 907), held upon the question between Theodore of Frejus, and Faustus abbat of Lérins. The Ingenuus of the passages cited above, in which the bishops are named without sees, is assumed to be the Ingenuus bishop of Embrun whom, in the time of pope Hilary, we find complaining to Rome of encroachments on his rights by Auxanius, who had obtained by surprise the sanction of Rome. He was hereupon confirmed in his claim to metropolitan authority in the Maritime Alps (Hilar. Pap. ep. 4 in Pat. Lat. lviii. 20; Baron. A. E. ann. 465, xxviii.). He was present at Rome in 465 in a council held under Hilary (Mansi, vii. 965, the see named). The year of his death has been variously supposed to have been 465, 475, 487, and after him the Arians obtained possession of the see until early in the next century, when it was temporarily recovered for the Catholics by Catulinus [CATULINUS (3)]. (Gall. Ch. iii. 1058.)

[R. T. S.]

INGENUUS (4), bishop of Ubaba in Mauritania Caesariensis, was banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vitens. Notiz. 59; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 348.)

INGENUUS (5), a presbyter at the council of Agde in 506, representing his diocesan Aper bishop of Bigorritana civitas (Tarbe). (Mansi, viii. 337.)

[T. W. D.]

INGENUUS (6), a hermit near Autun, stated to have boiled his broth for many years in a wooden saucepan which the flames never injured. Gregory of Tours (Glor. Conf. 98) relates this on the information of an abbat who frequently visited the hermit and shared the meal which he saw so cooked. [T. W. D.]

INGENUUS (7), a shepherd of Brivas (Brioude), who seized on some adjoining land belonging to the church of St. Julian, and kept forcible possession of it against the clergy. On the following festival of the saint, as Ingenuus was feasting with others at Brivas, a flash of lightning struck him alone of all the guests, and he perished. (Greg. Tur. Mirac. S. Jul. ii. 15.) [T. W. D.]

INGETRUDIS, abbes. [INGELTRUDIS.]

INGILBERTUS, nineteenth or twentieth bishop of St.-Paul-Trois-Châteaux, succeeding Gemmarus and followed by Richardus, perhaps about the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 708.) [S. A. B.]

INGILDUS (1), brother of Ine king of Wessex, son of Cenred and father of Eoppa, the great-grandfather of Egbert. His death is mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle under the year 718; but it is not improbable that he lived longer, and was identical with the abbat Ingeld. [S.]

INGILDUS (2), 10th bishop of Valence, succeeding Agilulfus and followed by Bobo, was present at the council of Châlons held about A.D. 650. The signature of a bishop Ingildus appears to the charter of Landericus, archbishop of Paris, given in 652, in favour of the monastery of St. Denys, and though no see is appended, it may well belong, as far as the date is concerned, to this bishop of Valence. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 302; Mansi, x. 1194; Gall. Christ. xvi. 295.) [S. A. B.]

INGITRUDIS, abbes. [INGELTRUDIS.]

INGLEIS, brother of Ine. [INGILD.]

INGOBERGA, wife of the Frank king Charibert of Paris, and mother of Bertha queen of Kent. Charibert, who died in 567, shortly before his death repudiated her and took in her room Marcovefa and Merosidis, who had been her attendants (Aimoin. Gest. Franc. iii. 2; Chron. of S. Denys, ii. 24; Hermann. Contract. Chron. s. a. 563, all in Bouquet, t. iii.). For what we know of Ingoberga, we are indebted to Gregory of Tours, who was acquainted with her. He describes her as very sedulous in vigils, prayers, and alms. He places her death in the fourteenth year of Childebert II., i. e. in or about 588, and he thinks she must have been in her seventieth year. A few months before she died she sent for Gregory, with whom she arranged to bequeath a benefaction to the church at Tours and the basilica of St. Martin. She also left land to the church at Le Mans, and charters of manumission for several of her bond-servants. Bertha was her only daughter (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ix. 26). Ingoberga and her bequest to Le Mans are mentioned in the testament of Bertramnus bishop of Le Mans, at whose instance the bequest was made. (Mabillon, Analect. Vet. ed. 1723, p. 255.) [C. H.]

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. III.

INGOLDUS, bishop. [INGWALD.]

INGOMARUS (CHUNINGUS), a Frisian noble. In 719 when Radbod duke of Frisia was on his death-bed and still a pagan, he saw in a vision an angel of light, who promised him a palatial abode in the next life should he die in the religion of his fathers, offering to conduct any one whom Radbod might send to view it. Ingomar was sent, but bishop Wulfran obtained leave for his deacon to accompany him. Soon after the two set out the promised conductor appeared, and in due time they arrived in view of a resplendent mansion. The deacon exclaimed, If all this was created by God may it remain; if by Satan may it disappear! Instantly the whole scene vanished, the guide included. Ingomar and the deacon found themselves entangled in a filthy marsh, and on their return Radbod died without baptism. Ingomar was baptized, and accompanied Wulfran to the monastery of Fontenelle on the Seine. The story is told in an account of Radbod's death by Jonas of Fontenelle, printed by Surius (Prob. SS. Hist. 20 Mart.), by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 20 Mart. iii. 147), and by Baronius (A. E. ann. 719, vi-xi.) [C. H.]

INGOMERIS (IGNOMERUS), son of Clovis and Clotilda. His baptism, quickly followed by his death, "in ipsis albis," is related by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Fr. ii. 29). [CLOTILDA.] [T. W. D.]

INGRATIUS, son of Dulcissimus, said to have been miraculously healed by Aridius abbat of Limoges. (Greg. Tur. Vita Aridii, § 10.) [T. W. D.]

INGUALD, bishop. [INGWALD.]

INGUINUS, bishop of Säben. [INGENUINUS.]

INGULFUS, the name of a priest whose attestation is attached to the forged charter of Crowland. (Kemble, C. D. 66; Mon. Angl. ii. 107.) [S.]

INGUNDIS, third wife of Clotaire I. king of the Franks, and mother by him of Charibert of Paris, Guntram of Orleans, Sigebert of Rheims, Clodosinda queen of the Lombards, and two sons who died in their father's lifetime, viz. Guntharius and Childeric. She asked her husband to procure a suitable marriage for her sister Aregundis, and Clotaire complied by marrying her himself, Ingundis consenting, it is said, to the bigamy. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 3; Id. Epitom. 47.) [T. W. D.]

INGUNTHIS (INGUNDIS, SEDEGUNDIS), daughter of Sigebert king of Austrasia and Brunichildis, and at the age of twelve wife of Hermenigild the Catholic prince of Spain. At the time of her marriage (A.D. 579) her grandmother, Goisvintha, was the second wife of Hermenigild's father Leovigild, and like him an Arian, while Ingunthis was a Catholic (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 38). Goisvintha at first received Ingunthis with great kindness, but finding that she had been the means of converting Hermenigild to the Catholic faith, became greatly incensed, and instigated a bitter persecution against the Catholics. A civil war ensued, cir. 582, and in 585 Hermenigild was put to death

(Greg. Tur. H. F. v. 39). Before his death he committed Ingunthis and their infant son to the care of the Greeks, who took them to Constantinople. On the way, however, Ingunthis died, Gregory of Tours says in Africa, but according to Paulus Diaconus in Sicily. (Greg. Tur. H. F. viii. 28; Id. Epitom. 82; Paul. Diac. Gest. Langob. iii. 21; Joan. Biclari. in Pagi, Crit. s. a. 583 ix., 584 ii. iii.; Joannes Mariana, De Rebus Hispanicis, lib. v. cap. 12.) [HERMENIGILD, GOISVINTHA.] [T. W. D.]

INGWALD, the sixth bishop of London (M. H. B. 617). He succeeded Waldhere, who was alive in 705 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 274) between that year and 716.

His name appears as Hinwald in an Evesham charter dated 706 (Kemble, C. D. 57), but this is very questionable; and the same may be said of another Evesham charter dated 709, and attested by "Ingualdus episcopus." (K. C. D. 60.) Ingwald was, however, at the council of Clovesho in 716, when the privilege of Wihtred was confirmed. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 301.) He joined in the consecration of archbishop Tatwin, June 10, 731, Bede (H. E. v. 23), and attested a Withington charter (K. C. D. 82) as late as the year 736. His death under the year 745 is noted by Simeon of Durham from the continuator of Bede or other northern authorities. (M. H. B. 288, 662.) [S.]

INJURIOSUS (1), 15th archbishop of Tours, succeeding Francilio, and followed by St. Baldus (or by Agrestius if he belonged to this see), was a citizen of Tours, of humble but free birth. He completed the church of St. Mary at Tours, and built that of St. Germain-sur-Loire. He was present at the second council of Orleans in 533, was represented by Camadnus, a priest, at the third in 538, and was present in person at the fourth in 541. He successfully resisted the attempt of Clotaire to levy a tax on the revenues of the churches of his kingdom. He died about A.D. 545. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 2, x. 31; Mansi, viii. 838, ix. 20, 120; Gall. Christ. xiv. 19.) [S. A. B.]

INJURIOSUS (2), an ex-civarius, who treacherously murdered Armentarius a Jew, another Jew, and two Christians, in the reign of Childbert, cir. 575. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. vii. 23.) [T. W. D.]

INJURIOSUS (3), a senator of Clermont in Auvergne, married to a wealthy lady of that city, and buried with her in one of the churches there. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. i. 42; Id. Glor. Conf. cap. 32; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 38.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENS (INNOCENTIUS), eighth bishop of Le Mans, succeeding St. Principius, and followed by Scienfredus, was adopted and educated by the sixth bishop of that see, Victorius II. He was present at the second council of Orleans in 533, and the fourth in 541. The mother church of the city was restored by him, and that of the apostles beyond the Sarthe enlarged by the addition of an apse. The monasteries of his diocese found a munificent patron in him. Many of the old ones were enriched, and new ones founded. It was probably owing to this liberality that his subscription was forged to many pretended grants and charters, some of which were published by Mabillon in the Vetera Analecta (infra). His episcopate lasted forty-five years, ten months, and twenty-six days. (Gesta Pontificum Cenoman. c. viii., Mabill. Vetera Analecta, 245, Paris, 1723; Mansi, viii. 839, ix. 120; Gall. Christ. xiv. 344.) [S. A. B.]

INNOCENTIA (1), Sept. 16, virgin, alleged martyr at Ariminum in the Diocletian persecution, mentioned in later martyrologies. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. v. 310.) [C. H.]

INNOCENTIA (2), a lady belonging to one of the principal families of Carthage. She was afflicted with cancer in the breast, and on being informed by her physician that the disease was incurable, betook herself to prayer, when she was admonished in a dream to watch at the baptistery at the approaching Easter festival, and request the baptized woman that should first meet her to mark the cancer with the sign of Christ. She did so, and was immediately cured. Augustine, who relates this story, says that he conversed with the lady upon the subject. (August. Civ. Dei. xxii. 8, § 3.) [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (1), a bishop of Verona, of extremely uncertain date, like almost all the early bishops of that city. The Bollandists place him in the 4th or 5th century. (Acta SS. 14 Mart. ii. 348; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 575; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 746; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. 2.) [R. S. G.]

INNOCENTIUS (2), said to have been bishop of Justiniana in Africa, in the fourth century, just after the persecution of Diocletian. His apocryphal life is related in a "legendary" of the church of Gaeta printed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 7 Mai. ii. 138) with conjectures by Papebroch, who thinks that Justiniana (not otherwise known in Africa) may have been Adrumetum. When he had been seven years a bishop in Africa he crossed over to Italy and settled at Capratia near Terracina, where he died on May 7. His body was afterwards removed to the church of St. Mary at Cajeta. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 68.) [R. S. G.]

INNOCENTIUS (3), bishop of Dertona (Tortona), between Meliodorus and John, A.D. 318-342 (Cappelletti), or 326-353 (Ughelli). He was the son of Quintius, a Roman noble, and his wife Innocentia; was born at Dertona, fled to Rome at the time of Diocletian's persecution, and was there ordained by Sylvester, and subsequently appointed by him bishop of Dertona. (Acta SS. 17 April. ii. 482; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 853; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 669.) [R. S. G.]

INNOCENTIUS (4), a bishop addressed by Basil in two epistles. The first (50 al. 409), written at the commencement of Basil's episcopate, A.D. 370, shews Innocent as a man advanced in years, of great worth, well known for the firmness with which he advocated right views on the subject of the Holy Spirit. The second (81 al. 49), A.D. 372, shews Innocent in view of death, anxiously seeking a faithful successor to guide his church in those tempestuous times. He solemnly appeals to Basil either to be himself that successor, or else to send to him for consecration a certain presbyter of Caesarea. Basil is unable to comply with the first request, and as to the second, names a presbyter far superior to the one Innocent had asked for, a disciple of Hermogenes [HERMOGENES (4)], and likely to prove an admirable bishop. The see of Innocent, wherever situated, was evidently an important one, and his administration of it had been conspicuously successful. [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (5), Donatist bishop of Tabalta, or Thebalta, in Byzacene (Ant. Itin. 48, 6, Tarfonah), of the Maximianist party, a member of the council of Cabarsussis, A.D. 394. (Aug. En. in Ps. xxxvi. 20; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 292.) [H. W. P.]

INNOCENTIUS (6), bishop of Germania, or perhaps Germanicana, a place mentioned by Antoninus as between Aquae Regiae and Thysdrus, i.e. in Proconsular Africa (Ant. Itin. 55, 3). But a place of this name is mentioned by St. Augustine as being under his episcopal care, and if so, it was probably in Numidia, near to Hippo Regius (Aug. Ep. 251). Innocentius was present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 120.) [H. W. P.]

INNOCENTIUS (7), bishop of Lamiggiga, in Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 133; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 411, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

INNOCENTIUS (8), Donatist bishop of Guzabeta, a place of unknown site, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 198). (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 448, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

INNOCENTIUS (9), probably an African bishop who joined with St. Augustine and others in a letter of remonstrance to the Donatists, from a council held at Zerta, in Numidia, A.D. 412. (Aug. Ep. 141.) [H. W. P.]

INNOCENTIUS (10), a bishop present at the second council of Milevis, A.D. 416. (Innoc. Pap. ep. 27 in Pat. Lat. xx. 569, and Mansi, iv. 335 marg.) [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (11), ninth bishop of Rouen between Victricius and Evodius, early in the 5th century. (Gall. Chr. xi. 9.) [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (12) I., bishop of Rome, after Anastasius, from May, A.D. 402, to March 12, A.D. 417, during nearly fifteen years. He is described in the Liber Pontificalis as a native of Albano, and son of another Innocent. St. Jerome (Ep. 8) calls him the son as well as successor of Anastasius (Apostolicae cathedrae et supradicti viri successor et filius), using, we may suppose, the word son metaphorically.

The circumstances of the beginning of the 5th century, as well as the character and talents of Innocent, render his pontificate important. Christianity had now for nearly a century been the religion of the emperors; paganism was fast becoming a system of the past; the capture of Rome by Alaric during the pontificate of Innocent, regarded as the divine judgment on the old heathen city, and causing the dispersion and ruin of the remains of the old heathen nobility, completed the downfall of the ancient order of things. With the ascendancy of the church had grown also that of the hierarchy, and especially of the head of that hierarchy in the West, the Roman bishop. Various causes had contributed, and were now contributing, to this result. The need felt of centres of unity and seats of authority to keep the church together amid the doctrinal conflicts of the age; the power and importance hence accruing to the patriarchal sees, and especially to Rome as the one great patriarchate of the West, the see of the old seat of empire, and the only Western one that claimed apostolic origin; the view now generally received of the bishop of Rome being the successor of the prince of the apostles; then the removal of the seat of empire to Constantinople by Constantine, leaving the pope, when there was but one emperor, the sole Western potentate; and when there were two, as was the case in Innocent's time, the eventual fixing of the imperial residence at Ravenna instead of Rome—such were among the causes of the aggrandisement of the Roman see in the time of Innocent. Further, it is to be remarked that the controversies which had distracted the church during the preceding century had tended to the increased estimation and importance of the Roman see. For the West had been comparatively free from the heat of these controversies, which were of Oriental origin, nor had the popes taken much personal part in them; but they had notwithstanding almost invariably supported the orthodox cause; they had received and protected the orthodox under persecution; and, after watching with quiet dignity the Eastern struggle, had accepted and confirmed the decisions of orthodox councils. Hence the see of Rome stood out before the eyes of men as the bulwark of the cause of truth; and its claim to be the unerring guardian of the apostolic faith and discipline was gaining extensive credence. And if the circumstances of the time made Innocent's pontificate an important one, no less did his own character and talents. He was eminently the man to enter into, and make the most of, the position he was called to occupy. Unstained in life, able and resolute, with a full appreciation of the dignity and prerogatives of his see, he lost no opportunity of asserting its claims, and under him the idea of universal papal supremacy, though as yet somewhat shadowy, appears already to be taking form.

At the time of his accession, the empire had been for seven years divided between the two sons of Theodosius, Arcadius and Honorius; the latter, now eighteen years of age, under the control of the great general Stilicho, being the ruler of the West. It was not till two years after Innocent's accession (A.D. 404) that he fixed his residence at Ravenna.

I. WEST. (1) Illyria.—Immediately after his election (A.D. 402) Innocent wrote to Anysius bishop of Thessalonica, informing him of the event, and giving him the oversight of the churches of eastern Illyria. The prefecture of Illyria had been dismembered since the year 388, the Eastern part of it, including Dacia and Macedonia, being assigned to the Eastern empire. The popes Damasus and Siricius had, however, continued to claim ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the separated portion, delegating their authority to the bishops of Thessalonica. This letter, then, of Innocent's involved no new claim, nor any assertion of authority over the East generally; only a continuance of the position of his predecessors, who had protested against any curtailment through political changes of the jurisdiction of the Roman see. (Innocent. Ep. 1. Galland. Bibl. Patr.)

When Rufus, some years after, succeeded Anysius as bishop of Thessalonica, a letter was at once sent also to him, reversing the vicariate commission, defining its extent, and reminding the bishop that it was from the favour of the apostolic see only that his jurisdiction was derived. Several years later (A.D. 414) we find Innocent exercising authority of a summary kind, and without the intervention of the bishop of Thessalonica, in the province of east Illyria. The bishops of Macedonia had sent him a synodal letter, desiring directions on the following questions: (1) Whether persons who had been ordained by one Bonosus, a deceased heretical bishop, might be admitted to the priesthood. The Macedonian bishops thought that such persons might be so admitted on their receiving the blessing of an orthodox bishop, for that Anysius had permitted this, and the Nicene canons had allowed it in the case of the Novatians. (2) Whether persons who had married widows might not be ordained, and be made bishops, for which allowance they had pleaded on the ground of the custom of their church; and whether those who had married one wife before, and another after baptism, might not also be ordained. (3) They had asked leave to raise to the episcopate one Photinus, who had been condemned by Innocent's predecessors, and to depose a deacon called Eustatius. It appears that some at least of these questions had already been before Innocent, and decided by him, for in his reply he expresses surprise and displeasure at their being again mooted.* He then authoritatively decides the questions. Those who had married widows he debars from ordination, citing the prohibition of such marriages to the high priest under the Mosaic law. Those ordained by Bonosus are debarred from the priesthood on the ground of the law of the Roman church (lex nostrae ecclesiae), according to which persons baptized by heretics, though admissible to lay communion by imposition of hands only, received no recognition of their supposed orders.<sup>b</sup> (1) The Nicene canon about the Novatians, he says, applied to them only, and the condonation by Anysius had only been a temporary expedient. The question whether those who had married one wife before, and another after baptism, were to be accounted deuterogamists, and so incapable of ordination, is one which he discussed also at length in other epistles.<sup>c</sup> (2) He decides that they are to be so accounted, for that baptism is not the commencement of a new life in such sort as to relax the obligations of a previous marriage. As to Photinus, though with hesitation and much anxiety, he allows his promotion, notwithstanding the condemnation of him by previous popes, on the ground that they had been imposed on by false reports; and he disallows the deposition of Eustatius. (Ep. xvii. Galland.) Another epistle, addressed to the bishops of Macedonia, confirms the deposition of Babalius and Taurianus, who had appealed to Rome from the sentence of the bishops of their province, and whose appeal the bishops seem to have taken amiss. For Innocent presses upon them the advantage, rather than the contrary, of having their judgment revised (Ep. xviii. Galland.)

(2) Gaul.—Victricius bishop of Rouen, who had been in Rome towards the end of the year 403 (Ep. ad Victric. § 14, and Paul. Nolan. Ep. ad Victric. xxxvii. 1), applied to the pope soon afterwards for information as to the practice and discipline of the Roman church. In reply Innocent sent him a letter containing 14 rules, of which he says that they are no new ones, but derived by tradition from the apostles and fathers, though too generally unknown or disregarded. He directs Victricius to communicate them to the bishops and others, with a view to their future observance. They are to the following effect: (1) No bishop may ordain without the knowledge of his metropolitan, nor without the assistance of other bishops. (2) No one, who has served as a soldier after baptism, may be ordained. (3) Ordinary causes against bishops are to be determined by the other bishops of the province, saving always the authority of Rome. (4) Greater causes, after the judgment of the bishops, are to be referred to the apostolic see, "as the synod (referring, we may suppose, to the canons of Sardica) has decreed." (5) No cleric may marry a widow, since his doing so would be a bar to the priesthood. (6, 7) No layman who has so married, or who has himself been twice married, whether before or after his baptism, may be ordained. Under these heads Innocent enforces at some length his view, above referred to, of baptism not affecting obligations incurred by previous marriage. (8) No bishop may ordain any one from another diocese without the leave of its bishop. (9) Converts from Novatianism and Montanism are to be received by imposition of hands only, without iteration of baptism; but such as, having left the church, had been re-baptized by heretics, are only to be received after long penance. (10) Priests and Levites who have wives are not to cohabit with them. This rule is supported by argument, resting mainly on the prohibition of intercourse with their wives to priests under the old law before officiating. Christian priests and Levites, it is argued, ought always to be prepared to officiate. (11) Monks, taking minor orders, may not marry. (12) Courtiers and public functionaries are not to be admitted to any clerical order; the reasons given being that they might have to exhibit or preside over entertainments undoubtedly invented by the devil, and that they were liable to be recalled to his service by the emperor, so as to cause much "sadness and anxiety." Victorius is reminded of painful cases, to which he had been witness when in Rome, in which the pope had with difficulty obtained from the emperor in person the exemption even of priests from being recalled to his service. (13) Veiled virgins, if they marry, are not to be admitted even to penance till the husband's death; but (14) such as have promised virginity, but have not been "veiled by the priest," may be reconciled after penance.

In the following year (A.D. 405) Innocent was similarly consulted by another bishop of Gaul, Exsuperius of Toulouse, whom he commends in reply for referring doubtful questions to the apostolic see, and gives him the following directions: (1) Priests or deacons who cohabit with their wives are to be deprived, as pope Siricius had directed. The prohibition of conjugal intercourse to the priests in the Old Testament before officiating is adduced as before; also St. Paul's injunction to the Corinthian laity to abstain for a time, that they might give themselves unto prayer; whence it follows that the clergy ought always to abstain; to whom prayer and sacrifice is a continual duty. When St. Paul said that a bishop was to be the husband of one wife, he did not mean that he was to live with her; else he would not have said, "they that are in the flesh cannot please God;" and he said, "having children," not "begetting" them. . . . At the same time, the incontinence of clergy whom the injunction of pope Siricius had not reached may be condoned; but they are not to be promoted to any higher order. (2) To the question whether such as had led continually loose lives after baptism might be admitted to penance and communion at the approach of death, Innocent replies that, though in former times penance only and not communion was accorded in such cases, the strict rule may now be relaxed, and both given.

(3) Baptized Christians are not precluded from inflicting torture or condemning to death as judges, nor from suing as advocates for judgment in a capital case. Innocent, however, elsewhere precludes Christians who had been so engaged from ordination (Ep. xxvii. ad Felicem). (4) To the question how it was that adultery in a wife was more severely visited than in a husband, it is replied that the cause was the unwillingness of wives to accuse their husbands, and the difficulty of convicting the latter of transgression, not that adultery was more criminal in one case than in the other. (5) Divorced persons, who marry again during the life of their first consort, and those who marry them, are adulterers, and to be excommunicated; but not their parents or relations, unless accessory. Lastly, a list is given of the canonical books of Scripture, the same as are now received by the church of Rome; while certain books, bearing the names of Matthias, James the Less, Peter, John, and Thomas, are repudiated and condemned.

(3) Spain.—In the year 400 had been held the first council of Toledo, its main purpose being to deal with Priscillianists returning to the church. Two bishops so returning, Symphorius and Dichtynius, with others, had been received by the council; but certain bishops of Baetica had still refused to communicate with them. A Spanish bishop, Hilary, who had subscribed the decree of the council of Toledo, went with a priest, Elpidius, to Rome, to represent this to the pope; complaining also of two bishops, Rufinus and Minicius, who had ordained other bishops out of their own province without the knowledge of the metropolitan; and of other prevalent irregularities with respect to ordinations. It does not appear that the complainants had been commissioned by any synod, or other authority of the Spanish church, to lay these matters before the pope, or request his interference. Innocent, however, did not omit the opportunity of addressing a letter, after a synod held at Rome, to the bishops who had constituted the Toledo council, advising or directing them; though without any assertion, such as he makes in addressing other churches, of the authority of the Roman see. In this letter he condemns those who refused to communicate with reconciled Priscillianists, and directs the bishops to inquire into the cases of Rufinus and Minicius, and to enforce the canons. As to other prevalent irregularities, such as the ordination of persons who had, after baptism, pleaded as advocates, served in the army, or as courtiers (curiales) been concerned in objectionable ceremonies or entertainments,—he directs that such irregularities of this kind as had already occurred should be condoned for fear of scandal and disturbance, but that they should be avoided for the future. Lastly, he insists on what appears so often in his letters, the incapacity for ordination of such as had married widows or had married twice, and again protests against the view that baptism annulled the obligation of a previous marriage. He supports these prohibitions by arguments from the Old Testament, and from St. Paul, a "Husband of one wife" (Ep. iii. Bibl. Patr. Galland.). There is no evidence to shew how this admonitory letter was received in Spain.

(4) Africa.—In the year 412 or 413, Innocent wrote to Aurelius bishop of Carthage, requesting him to announce in synod the day on which Easter should be kept in 414, with the view of its being announced, as was then customary, to the church by the bishop of Rome (Ep. xiv. Galland.). Towards the end of the year 416 he received synodal letters from councils held at Carthage and Milevis in Numidia, and from St. Augustine (who had taken part in the latter council), with four other bishops, on the subject of the Pelagian controversy; to all of which letters he replied in January 417. This correspondence is interesting, as illustrating the relations then subsisting between the West African church and the see of Rome. For such relations at an early period see STEPHANUS, CYPRIANUS, SIXTUS II. The synodal letters inform Innocent that the synods in question had renewed the condemnation of Pelagius and Caelestius that had been pronounced five years previously at Carthage, and very respectfully request him to add the authority of the apostolic see to the decrees of their mediocrity (ut statutis nostrae mediocritatis etiam apostolicae sedis auctoritas adhibeatur); setting forth the heresies condemned, and arguments against them. The African bishops evidently attach great importance to obtaining the pope's condemnation of Pelagius, on the ground of the weight it would carry, though not all implying that the validity of their own condemnation depended on his approval. The five bishops imply some doubt as to his probable action in the matter, having heard that there were some in Rome who favoured the heretic; and they await the result with suspense, fear, and trembling. ("Familia Christi . . . suspensio corde, cum timore et tremore adiutorium Domini etiam per caritatem tue venerationis expectat.") They also send a work believed to be by Pelagius, and another written in answer to it by Augustine, with the passages marked to which the pope's attention is particularly directed; as well as a letter addressed by Augustine to Pelagius, which they request the pope to forward, since it would come with more weight from him than from the writer. They suggest that he should either summon Pelagius to Rome or address him by letter, desiring his conversion rather than his condemnation. They apologize, in conclusion, for sending his holiness a more prolix letter than he would perhaps care to receive, which they do, not as pouring in their rivulet to increase his large fountain, but wishing that he should shew by his reply whether their little stream and his abundant one flow from the same source. Innocent, in replying to these letters, assumes much greater dependence on the see of Rome on the part of the Africans than their language had implied, and takes the opportunity of asserting very large claims to general authority. He commends the bishops of the Carthaginian synod for referring the matter to his judgment, knowing as they did what was due to the apostolic see, the see of the apostle from whom all episcopal authority was derived; for having observed the decrees of the fathers, resting on divine authority, according to which nothing done, even in remote and separated provinces, was to be considered settled till it had come to the knowledge of the Roman see, and been confirmed by its authority; that is, all waters proceeding from the fountain of their birth, the pure streams of the uncorrupted head might flow through the different regions of the whole world. Here the metaphor of waters, used by the five bishops, has a new and very different turn given to it. The abundant stream of Rome, flowing, it is hoped, from the same fountain-head as the smaller stream of Africa, becomes itself the fountain-head from which all streams must flow. He addresses the bishop of the Milevetan synod in the same strain. He then proceeds to condemn the Pelagian heresy in strong terms, and to anathematize all its abettors and supporters. His utterances on the subject are marked rather by strength of language than by any valuable addition to the arguments adduced by his correspondent: but to adduce proofs he says is unnecessary, since they had said all that was wanted. He declines to accede to the suggestion of the five bishops that he should make overtures to Pelagius, or send for him to Rome. It is for the heretical, he says, to come to me of his own accord, if he is ready to retract his errors; if he is not ready, he will not obey my summons, if sent for; if he should come, repudiate his heresy, and ask for pardon, he will be received (Epp. Augustine, xc.—xcv.; Epp. Innoc. clxxxii.—clxxxiii. Galland.).

In a letter to Decentius bishop of Eugubium in Umbria (dated A.D. 416), the claims of the Roman see are no less strongly asserted than in the letters to the African bishops. Decentius had been in Rome, and there learnt the usages of the Roman church, which he desired to follow; and with this view he had afterwards requested directions on certain points from Innocent; who, in reply, tells him that no one can be ignorant of the obligation of all to observe the traditions, and those alone, which the Roman church had received from St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles, and which that church ever preserved;—especially as it was manifest that no churches had been founded in Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Sicily, or the interjacent islands, except by St. Peter himself, or his successors. The letter proceeds to require observance of the following Roman usages. (1) The pax in the Eucharist must be given after communion, not before. (2) The names of such as offer oblations at the Eucharist are not to be recited by the priest before the sacrifice, or the canon. (3) Infants after baptism may not be confirmed by unction except by the bishop; but priests may anoint other parts of the body than the forehead, using oil that has been blessed by the bishop. (4) Saturday as well as Friday in each week is to be observed as a fast, in commemoration of the whole time during which Christ was in the grave. (5) Demoniacs may receive imposition of hands from priests or other clergy commissioned by the bishop. (6) St. James's direction that the sick are to call for the elders of the church does not preclude the bishop himself from administering the unction in person; but not only priests, but also any Christian may anoint, using chrism prepared by the bishop. Penitents, however, to whom the other sacraments are denied, may not receive unction, "quia genus sacramenti est." It appears plain from the way the unction of the sick is spoken of that it was then used with a view to recovery, not as a last rite. (7) One Roman custom:—that of sending, on the Lord's day, the Eucharist that has been consecrated by the bishop to the presbyters throughout the city, that all on that day at least may partake of one communion;—is not to be observed elsewhere, when it would involve carrying the sacrament to great distances. Even in Rome, it is added, it is not taken to the priests in the various cemeteries<sup>d</sup> (Epp. xxv. Galland.).

<sup>d</sup> The word used for what was sent at Rome to the priests throughout the city is fermentum; used also with the same reference by Anastasius on St. Melchisedes: "Hic fecit ut oblationes consecratas per ecclesias ex consecratu Episcopi dirigerentur, quod declaratur Fermentum;" and on Siricius: "Hic constitit . . . quod nominatur Fermentum." The meaning of the word thus used has been variously taken. In the conference, A.D. 1146, at Constantinople, under the emperor John Comnenus, between Anselm bishop of Havelberg and Nicetas bishop of Nicomedia, on the part of the Latin and Greek churches, it was taken to mean leavened bread, and adduced by Nicetas in proof of the ancient use of such bread in the Eucharist. Anselm met the argument by saying that it was not the Eucharist itself but the eulogia that were denoted by the word. (Anselm, Dialog. l. 3, c. 13, 15.) Baronius (ad ann. 313) upholds the same view. Mabillon and Bona agree with Nicetas in taking the word to mean leavened bread, and

II. THE EAST.—In the year 404 began the intervention of Innocent in the affairs of the East, in the matter of St. Chrysostom. The latter having been deposed and driven from Constantinople after the synod of the Oak in 403, and having been brought back and reinstated for a time, was finally expelled on June 20, A.D. 404, and banished to Cucusus in Armenia. Innocent was informed of these events from several sources. First came a letter from Theophilus, bishop (commonly called pope) of Alexandria (who had presided at the synod of the Oak, having been the instigator and agent of the whole persecution), stating simply that he had deposed Chrysostom. This letter was from Theophilus singly, not a synodical one, and seems to have given no details. Then one Eusebius, a deacon of Constantinople, who happened to be then at Rome, went to the pope to prepare him for the startling news. Three days later, three more letters were brought by four brothers, written before Chrysostom's final banishment, giving details of what had so far occurred. One was from Chrysostom himself, another from the 40 bishops who remained in his communion; the third from his clergy. That from Chrysostom is preserved, being given by Palladius in his Dialogus de Vita S. Johan. Chrysost. It was addressed, not to Innocent alone, but to the bishops of Rome, Aquileia, and Milan, as the three great bishops of the West, and, after giving a full account of the iniquitous proceedings of Theophilus and of their consequences, it requests the three Western bishops to protest by letter against the illegality of what had been done, and to continue in communion with the writer, who declares himself ready to defend himself before a lawfully constituted council. To all these letters Innocent is said to have replied that, while he still remained in communion with both parties, he reprobated the past proceedings as irregular, and proposed a council of Easterns and Westerns, from which both the avowed friends and enemies of the accused should be excluded, as the only mode of settlement. A few days later a priest and deacon brought a second letter from Theophilus, with the acts of the synod of the Oak, from which it appeared that Chrysostom had been condemned by 36 bishops, of whom 29 were Egyptians. Innocent's short letter in reply is extant, in which he repeats, and says he can but repeat as often as he is written to, that he cannot renounce communion with Chrysostom on the strength of the past futile proceedings, and demands that Theophilus should proffer his charges against him before a proper council, according to the Nicene canons. Communications from Constantinople continued to reach Innocent. One brought by a priest, Theotecnus, from about 25 bishops of Chrysostom's party, informed him of his banishment to Cucusus, and the burning of his cathedral church. To them, as well as to the banished prelate, the pope sent letters of communion in reply, being unable to render help. To a letter from Acacius of Beroea and a few other hostile bishops (brought, Palladius tells us, by a hideous, deformed, hardly intelligible, dwarf called Paternus, who described himself as a presbyter of Constantinople), in which Chrysostom himself was accused of having set fire to the church, no answer was vouchsafed. In the meantime Arsacius, a weak old man, had been intruded into the see of Constantinople. Cruel persecution of the friends of Chrysostom was set afoot by the Eastern emperor Arcadius, instigated doubtless by the empress Eudoxia, on the plea of discovering the incendiaries of the church; edicts were issued, ordering, among other things, the spoliation and banishment of bishops who refused to communicate with Theophilus, Arsacius, and Porphyrius (the last of whom had intruded himself into the see of Antioch), who formed the triumvirate that had managed the ecclesiastical affairs of the East. The consequence was a number of letters to Rome from oppressed bishops and clergy, and the resort thither of many in person, including Anysius of Thessalonica, Palladius of Helenopolis (the author of the Dialogus de Vit. S. Johan. Chrysost.), and Cassianus, famous afterwards as a monk and a writer. Innocent represented the state of things to the emperor Honorius, who wrote thrice to his brother on the subject. His second and third letters are preserved, the latter of which he sent under the advice of a synod, assembled by the pope at his request to consider what had best be done. The synod had recommended him to write to Arcadius, urging the assembling of a council of Easterns and Westerns combined at Thessalonica, as a convenient intermediate place. Thus advised, he had desired Innocent to appoint five bishops, two priests, and one deacon, as a deputation from the Western church; and these he charged with this third letter, in which he requested his brother to summon the Oriental bishops to Thessalonica, there to meet the Western deputation. He also sent letters that had been addressed to himself by the bishops of Rome and Aquileia, as specimens of many so addressed, and as representing the opinion of the Western bishops on the question at issue (Innoc. Ep. ix. Galland. ; Pallad. Dialog. c. iiii.)

The deputation was accompanied by four Eastern bishops, who had fled to Rome. It failed entirely. Its members were seized at Athens, thence conveyed to Constantinople, and confined in a castle called Athyra, on the coast of Thrace, the Eastern bishops being placed in separate cells. On the legates refusing to give up their letters, except to the emperor in person, or to communicate with Atticus, who had now succeeded Arsacius as interloper into the see of to denote the Eucharist, having otherwise proved the late introduction of unleavened bread for the Sacrament in the Western church. Sirmondus (in lib. de Azymis) holds also that fermentum denotes the Eucharist, and that leavened bread was consecrated formerly in the West as well as in the East; but he takes the word itself to have no reference to the kind of bread used, but to be applied to the Sacrament in this particular case, because, like leaven, it permeated and united the churches of Rome, and he quotes Augustine (Tractat. in Joann. xvii.) in illustration of the idea expressed by the word: "O Sacramentum pietatis, O signum unitatis, O vinculum caritatis!" This view seems more probable than that the bread, whether consecrated or unconsecrated, was itself called leaven because it was leavened. But, whatever the reason of the word being used, it is plain from the language of Innocent's letter that the Eucharist itself was intended. In the oldest extant Ordo Romanus, supposed to represent the ritual of Rome in the time of Gregory I., the same word fermentum is applied to a portion of the reserved host, which it was then the custom to put into the chalice after each new consecration.

Constantinople, they were eventually sent away, and reached Italy in safety. Persecution was continued in the East; Honorius contemplated a war against his brother, but was deterred by a threatened invasion of the Goths; and Innocent failing in his attempt to bring about an impartial council, separated himself from the communion of Atticus, Theophilus, and Porphyrius. Baronius, going on certain supposed letters between him and the Eastern emperor, supposes him to have excommunicated Arcadius and Eudoxia. But nothing is said of this by the writers of the time. Chrysostom continued in exile at Cucusus, carrying on a correspondence with his friends, including Innocent, and died near Comana, on his way to a new and worse place of banishment, Sept. 14, A.D. 407, in the 60th year of his age.

The appeal of St. Chrysostom and his friends to Innocent during their troubles involved no acknowledgment of any authority of the Roman bishop over the Eastern church. They apply to him, not as a superior or a judge, but as a powerful friend, whose support they solicit. Chrysostom's own letter, though in Roman editions it appears as addressed to the pope alone, was really written to the three principal bishops of the West. Its contents leave no doubt of this. Honorius, in his letters to his brother, speaks of the Western bishops generally having been applied to, and quotes their views as being of equal moment with that of the bishops of Rome. And Innocent in his replies makes no claim to adjudicate himself, nor does he mention in this case an assertion of the universal supremacy of his see, such as appears in his letters to the Africans and to Decentius, but all along recommends a council of Easterns and Westerns as the proper authoritative tribunal. For a view of papal claims over the East less than a century later see articles on FELIX III. and ACACIUS.

After the death of Chrysostom the pope and all the Westerns remained for some time out of communion with Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch. The church of Antioch was the first to be reconciled. Alexander, having succeeded Porphyrius, A.D. 413, replaced the name of Chrysostom in the diptychs of his church, restored to their sees two bishops, Pappus and Elpidius, who had been confined during three years for their adherence to his cause, and sent a legation to Rome to sue for restoration of communion. This was cordially granted in a synodal letter, signed by 20 Italian bishops. Innocent wrote also privately to Alexander congratulating him warmly, and desiring for the future a frequent interchange of letters. At the same time Acacius of Beroea, who had been among Chrysostom's bitterest opponents, was received into communion by Innocent through Alexander, to whom the letter of communion was sent for transmission, so as to secure compliance with all required conditions before its delivery. Atticus of Constantinople was reconciled a few years later. Hitherto he had refused to place the name of Chrysostom on the diptychs; and the majority of the faithful in his own city, as well as the Western bishops, had consequently refused communion with him. After the peace of Antioch, a bishop Maximianus went to Constantinople to persuade him, and thence wrote to Innocent, requesting him to take the initiative; but the latter declined to move in the matter till Atticus himself should sue for reconciliation, as Alexander had done, after fulfilling the required conditions (Ep. xxii. Galland.). Alexander also went to Atticus, but failed to bring him round (Nicephor. l. 14, c. 26). At length, moved partly by the threatening attitude of the populace, and partly by the advice of the emperor, he consented, with a bad grace, to place Chrysostom's name on the diptychs, and was received into communion. The church of Alexander was the last to come to terms. It was not likely that Theophilus would yield. His nephew Cyril, succeeding him Oct. 18, A.D. 412, was at first equally inflexible. Atticus, after his own reconciliation, having urged him to do as he had done, he replied, in a bitter ironical letter, that he would as soon put the name of Judas on his rolls as that of "John." But he yielded at last, though not till A.D. 417, ten years after the death of Chrysostom. Throughout the proceedings with respect to Chrysostom, both before and after his death, Innocent appears to have acted with dignity, fairness, firmness, and moderation. Of the correspondence with Alexander of Antioch, desired by Innocent in his letter above cited, one specimen remains. Alexander having consulted the pope as to the jurisdiction of his patriarchal see of Antioch, the latter replies that in accordance with the canons of Nice (Can. vi.) the authority of the bishop of Antioch extends over the whole diocese, not only over one province. The word diocese is here used, in its original sense, to denote the civil division of the empire that comprised many provinces. The Oriental diocese, which is here referred to, included 15 provinces, over the metropolitans of which the patriarchal jurisdiction of Antioch is alleged to extend. This jurisdiction is stated to imply the right of the bishop of Antioch not only to ordain the several metropolitans, but also to require that they should not ordain other bishops without his leave, and in cases where it is practicable, to ordain, if he thinks fit, such other bishops himself. In particular, the bishops of the island of Cyprus, who had been accustomed to ordain new bishops independently of any higher authority, are to be warned to follow the example of other provinces, and accept episcopal ordination from Antioch. It is to be observed that the claim of the Antiochene patriarch over Cyprus, thus supported by Innocent, was afterwards negated by the oecumenical council of Ephesus (431), which declared it to be an innovation introduced contrary to the laws of the church and the canons of the holy fathers, affecting the liberty of all; and those who presided over the churches in Cyprus were empowered to preserve, without gainsaying or opposition, their right of performing by themselves the ordinations of bishops, according to ancient custom (Can. viii.). In cases where an ancient province had been subdivided by imperial authority, the order of the church is not to be changed in deference to such mundane changes, but the bishop of the original metropolis is to retain his jurisdiction over the whole original province. Further, the orders of clerical converts from Arianism are not to be recognised as valid, it being out of the question that heretics, whose very baptism has to be supplemented by the imposition of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, should be supposed capable of conferring the grace of ordination. This letter to Alexander is remarkable for the view expressed in its preamble of Antioch sharing, in some degree, with Rome the dignity of St. Peter's chair, on the ground of its having been his first see before he went to Rome. Gregory the Great, in a letter to Eulogius of Alexandria, repeats this view, and brings in Alexandria also, as having been founded by St. Mark, who was St. Peter's disciple. He speaks of the three sees in question as a kind of Trinity, representing the authority of the Prince of the Apostles.

Two more letters, written by Innocent in the last year of his life, are further illustrative of his attitude towards the churches of the East. St. Jerome had been attacked in his cell at Bethlehem by a band of ruffians, and had narrowly escaped: the two noble virgins, Eustochium and her niece Paula, who lived in retirement under his spiritual direction, had also been driven from their house, which had been burnt, and some of their attendants killed. The leaders and instigators of this assault were unknown, but the party of Pelagius was suspected. Innocent, on hearing of it, wrote to Jerome, offering to exert "the whole authority of the apostolic see" against the offenders, if they could be discovered, and to appoint judges to try them if accused. He wrote also to John bishop of Jerusalem, who was no friend to Jerome, in an authoritative tone, reproving him severely for allowing such atrocities within the limits of his jurisdiction. (Epp. xxxiv. xxxv. Galland.)

III. ALARIC.—It remains to give some account of Innocent's connexion with the siege and capture of Rome by Alaric the Goth. There were three Gothic invasions of Italy. The first under Alaric, and the second under Radagaisus, had been defeated by Stilicho; the third was after the disgrace and execution of this great general, being led by Alaric himself, who now came again and laid siege to Rome, A.D. 408. Innocent was within the city, the emperor at Ravenna. Famine and plague having ensued during the siege, Zosimus, the heathen historian, alleges that Pompeianus, the prefect of the city, having been persuaded by certain Etruscan diviners that by means of spells and sacrifices, to be performed on the Capitol, they could draw down lightnings and direct them against the enemy, Innocent was consulted, and gave his consent; but that the majority of the senators refused theirs (l. v. c. 40). Sozomen also mentions the circumstance, but he does not implicate Innocent (l. ix. c. 6). It seems highly improbable that a pope such as Innocent was would lend his sanction to any rites of heathenism. In 409 Alaric was induced to raise the siege by the offer of a ransom, and two deputations were sent to the emperor at Ravenna to induce him to sanction the terms agreed on. The first having failed, Innocent himself accompanied the second, and was thus saved from being in the city when it was finally taken. On the failure of all negotiations with Honorius, and after the temporary setting up of Attalus as a rival emperor, Rome was captured on August 24. A.D. 410. Accounts of the horrors that ensued are given by Sozomen, by Augustine in his De Civitate Dei, by Orosius, copying from Augustine, and by Jerome in some of his letters. The last gives a very terrible picture; but Augustine, and after him Orosius, are careful to dwell on the mitigation of general barbarity through the religious feeling of Alaric and his Goths, who, though Arians, were still Christians. They speak of his proclamation ordering respect to human life and to the churches of the Apostles, of church treasures being spared, and of the deferential treatment of Christian virgins. This is made much of by Augustine in his De Civitate, as the evidence of the triumph of the gospel; and, indeed, the whole issue of Alaric's invasion is regarded as a judgment on heathen, rather than Christian, Rome, and as a vindication of the church; the pope's providential absence being further compared by Orosius to the saving of Lot from Sodom. And undoubtedly the event was a marked one in the progress of the supersession of heathenism by Christianity.

The destruction of the old temples, never afterwards restored, the dispersion and ruin of old families which had clung longest to the old order, as well as the view just spoken of, that judgment had fallen on old heathen Rome, which its old deities had been powerless to protect; such causes conspired to complete the triumph of the church, and to add eventful importance to the reign of Innocent. It was soon after this great event that Augustine (A.D. 413) began his famous work, De Civitate Dei, though he took thirteen years to complete it, in which work he seems to see before him a vision of the kingdom of God rising on the ruins of the kingdom of the world:—a vision which gradually took more distinct shape in the idea, already more or less grasped by Innocent, of a Catholic Christendom united under the Roman see.

Innocent appears as a saint and confessor in the Roman Martyrology on July 28. But in some early martyrologies March 12 is given as the day of his depositio. His Epistolae et Decreta are printed in Galland's Bibl. Pat. t. viii. and in Migne, Patr. Lat. t. xx. [J. B.-y.]

INNOCENTIUS (15), bishop of Muzuca in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Morcellii, Afr. Christ. i. 238.) [R. S. G.]

INNOCENTIUS (16), the name of four bishops at Roman synods under Symmachus in 499–504 (Mansi, viii. 234, 235, 252, 269, 299, 314–316), viz. —

Third bishop of Ferentinum (Ferentino), between Bassus and Bonus, at the third and sixth (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 672; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 397, 430); apparently the "Foresensis" of the first (Mansi, viii. 234);

Second bishop of Forum Sempronii (Fossombrone), succeeding Felix, at the first, third, fourth and sixth (Ug. ii. 827; Capp. iii. 266, 282),

Third bishop of Mevania (Bevagna), succeeding Justinus, at the first, third, and sixth (Ug. x. 138; Capp. iv. 389, 392); also at the synod of Felix in 487 (Mansi, vii. 1171);

Third bishop of Tiferum Tiberinum (Città di Castello), succeeding Marius, at the fifth and sixth (Ug. i. 1318; Capp. iv. 585, 746).

[A. H. D. A.]

INNOCENTIUS (17), circ. A.D. 532, bishop of Maronea, present at the conference held by Justinian at Constantinople between the Catholics and the Severians. At the request of his friend the presbyter Thomas, he wrote a long narrative of the conference, which is the only detailed account of it extant. The conference is variously dated 531, 532, and 533. (Mansi, viii. 817, ix. 304; Baluze, p. 1011; Baronius, Ann. ad ann. 532, xxx.; Ceillier, xi. 847; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1197.) [W. M. S.]

INNOCENTIUS, bishop of Le Mans, 533. [INNOCENS.]

INNOCENTIUS (18), fifth bishop of Rodez, succeeding Theodosius and followed by St. Deusdedit I., was originally count of Mende or Gévaudan. In this capacity he accused Lupintius abbat of St. Privatus, in that city, of speaking treasonable words against queen Brunechilde, and though he failed to make good his charge in court, he nevertheless got the abbat into his power, beheaded him with circumstances of great barbarity, and threw his body into the river Aisne. As a reward for his loyalty he obtained from the queen the bishopric of Rodez upon the death of Theodosius, though not until the strife for the office had run so high that the church was almost stripped of its sacred vessels, and all its richest effects (circ. 583). As soon as he was consecrated he began to harass Ursicinus bishop of Cahors, claiming from him property which he asserted had been taken from the church of Rodez. The strife continued incessantly between them for some years, until it was composed by the sentence of the metropolitan sitting in conclave at Clermont. The circumstances of his death are unknown. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 37, 38; Gall. Christ. i. 200.)

INNOCENTIUS (19), fifth in the list of the bishops of Tarentum, at some period before Andreas, who was living in 590. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ix. 125.) [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (20), a bishop in Sardinia, of what see is uncertain. He was addressed, with other bishops, by Gregory the Great, and on one occasion ordered to give judgment in a dispute between the abbes Desideria and the abbat John, A.D. 598. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. 8, lib. xiii. indict. vi. 4.) [A. H. D. A.]

INNOCENTIUS (21), bishop of Arezzo, 599. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 71; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 410.) [A. H. D. A.]

INNOCENTIUS (22), bishop of Merida in A.D. 605, succeeding Massona, being a deacon at the time of his consecration. It is related that he was a man of such sanctity, that whenever rain was wanted he used to form a procession of the inhabitants of Merida, and visit the churches with them, and that before they had completed the procession abundance of rain would be granted in reply to his prayers. After a short episcopate he was succeeded by Renovatus. Innocent subscribed the decree of Gundomar which established the primacy of Toledo in A.D. 610. He is commemorated on June 21. (Boll. AA. SS. Jun. iv. 99; Paulus Diaconus in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 162; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. ii. 432; Gams, Kirchengeschichte, ii. part ii. 76.) [F. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (23), fifteenth bishop of Carpentras, succeeding Anastasius, and followed by Oloradus, or Odoardus, is said to have been sitting in A.D. 702. (Gall. Christ. i. 898.) [S. A. B.]

INNOCENTIUS (24), subdeacon, last named of the seven sleepers of Ephesus, brother of his two companions Gaudens and Quiriacus, sons of Amnarus, according to the version of the story in the Epistle to Sulpicius of Bourges. (Greg. Turon. Opp. in Pat. Lat. lxxi. 1107 B, 1113 D, 1115 D.) [EPHESUS, SEVEN SLEEPERS OF.]

INNOCENTIUS (25), June 11, a martyr in the persecution of Diocletian, but unknown to the martyrologies. His monument was discovered recently in Algiers, by Mgr. Robert bishop of Constantina (Cirta), and is described by De Rossi in his Bullettino Archeol. Crist. (1875 p. 162). On the monument he is said to have suffered at Milevis "in diebus turificationis." [G. T. S.]

INNOCENTIUS (26)—Sept. 22. A member of the Thebaean legion. [LEGIO THEBAEA.] [G. T. S.]

INNOCENTIUS (28), presbyter of Sirmium, who subscribed the letter addressed by his diocesan Germinius to Rufianus and other bishops in 366 or 367. (Hilar. Fragm. xv. given in Pat. Lat. x. 724; Mansi, iii. 402; Baron. s. ann. 366, xxix.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (29), a friend of St. Jerome, to whom he addressed the first letter which has come down to us, about the year 371 or 372. Innocentius was one of the band of friends then living together at Aquileia devoted to study and to asceticism. He does not appear to have been ordained. He was specially attached to Jerome, and admired his talents. Jerome had then recently returned from a journey in Gaul, where his studious bent had shewn itself, but his power of writing had, as he expresses it, grown rusty. Innocentius urged him to write, and especially to give an account of a wonderful occurrence which Jerome had heard of in passing through Vercellae, probably from his friend Evagrius, who had returned with Eusebius, the bishop of that place, from his exile in the East. This was the story of a woman who was sentenced unjustly by the consular of the province to be put to death, but who, being struck seven times with the axe, was still unharmed, and for whose life Evagrius had interceded. Jerome complied with his request, and Innocentius thus became the cause of a composition which in its style forms a worthy beginning of a most remarkable literary career. Evagrius soon afterwards came to Aquileia, and the friends lived happily together for a time. But a sudden tempest which arose against Jerome, and which some attribute to the violent words used against the consular of the province in the letter to Innocentius, dispersed them. Innocentius resolved to accompany Jerome to the East, and shared his journey through Asia Minor to Antioch, whence they had proposed either to go on to Jerusalem or to retire (as Jerome afterwards did) into solitude. But Innocentius was taken suddenly ill, as was Hylas, another of the companions, and died in the early summer of 374. Jerome mentions his death in his letter to Rufinus (Ep. iii. 3, ed. Vall.) as the tearing out of one of his eyes, the loss of a part of his very soul. [W. H. F.]

INNOCENTIUS (30), a student of Italian birth, at one time attached to the court of Constantius. With his companion Palladius, he embraced an ascetic life in a cell on the Mount of Olives, of which he was afterwards ordained presbyter. Basil commends the two solitaries in a letter to Epiphanius (Ep. 258 [325]), as well as in one to themselves A.D. 377 (ibid. 259 [184]). He laments the distracted state of the Church, and despairs of peace, which seems to have taken leave of the earth. He can add nothing to the Nicene creed as a formulary of the faith, except as regards the glory of the Holy Spirit, which was omitted because, at the time of the composition of the creed, it had not been called in question. He would very much like to see them, but he would not ask them to visit him, for he knows how hard it is for those who have embraced a life of poverty and support themselves by manual labour to take a long journey. Still, they could pray for him. After Innocent's death, which seems to have occurred c. A.D. 420, Palladius (who is distinguished by Tillemont from the author of the Historia Lusiaca) wrote commemorating his virtues and miracles, of which he had been eyewitness during the three years he had spent in his company. (Hist. Lous. c. 103, p. 1022.) [E. V.]

INNOCENTIUS (31), an haruspex of Milan, who is said to have confessed under torture that he had used magical arts for the purpose of compassing the death of St. Ambrose. (Paulin. Vit. Ambrose, 20; Migne, xiv. 33.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (32), father of Innocent I. mentioned in the life of this pope by Anastasius Bibliothecarius. (Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 145.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (33), an ex-advocate of the vicariate of Africa, residing at Carthage, and with all his household eminently religious. When Augustine and his friend Alypius returned to Africa as Christian believers but not yet in holy orders (i. e. cir. 389), they were received by Innocentius with the greatest kindness, and resided with him for some time. Innocentius was then suffering acutely from fistulæ, for which he had undergone one operation, and with the greatest dread was looking forward to another.

Friends came daily to pray with and encourage him, such as Saturninus bishop of Uzalis, the presbyter Gelosus, the deacons of the church of Carthage, and Aurelius bishop of Carthage. All these, Augustine included, were with him on the evening previous to the intended operation, but none of them supplicated so fervently as the sufferer himself, whose agony of prayer was indescribable. On the day following, at his own request, they returned to witness what he believed would prove his death, Augustine being again present; but when the surgeons proceeded to the operation, it was discovered that the place had healed up. A scene of congratulation and thanksgiving ensued. It was about 426 when Augustine penned the full narrative of this event towards the end of his De Civitate Dei (xxii. 8). Bishop Aurelius was then still living, and Augustine had frequently from time to time conversed with him on this remarkable instance of answer to prayer. [C. H.]

INNOCENTIUS (34), a Catholic presbyter of Hippo, put to death by the Donatists, as stated by Augustine in a letter to the tribune Marcellinus early in 412. (Aug. ep. 133 al. 159, § 1.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (35), a presbyter, probably of Africa, in the early part of the 5th century, a friend of St. Augustine and St. Jerome. He was engaged, on the orthodox side, in the Pelagian controversy, and is spoken of by Jerome (ad Apronium, Ep. 139, ed. Vall. A.D. 417) as endeavouring to rescue from heresy and discord the noble family of Apronius. From expressions about the state of the family in Jerome's letter to Ctesiphon (Ep. cxxxiii. 13), written two years earlier, it is inferred that Apronius was of Ctesiphon's family. Some Pelagian teachers had been introduced among them; and they, believing them to be sincere and good men, had supplied them with funds, but without any intention of separating themselves from the orthodox. The endeavour of Innocent failed. He was not able to avert the perversion of many of the family and the destruction of its unity. But Apronius stood fast, and Jerome writes to him to invite him to come to Palestine. Innocent was a person of some position, as we find him the bearer of a rescript from the sixth council of Carthage, A.D. 419, to St. Cyril of Alexandria, asking for an authentic copy of the Nicene canons. He carried back the copy and a letter from St. Cyril, and was again, along with Marcellus subdeacon of Carthage, deputed by the council, on Nov. 26 of the same year, to bear a copy of the same Nicene canons to pope Boniface at Rome (Mansi, Conc. iv. 434, 513; S. Bonifacius, Epp. et Decret. append. vii. ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. xx. 787; Dionysius Exig. Cod. Canon. ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 226, and Mansi, iii. 835). But when sent to Alexandria he appears also to have gone on to Jerusalem and delivered letters from St. Augustine and Alypius to St. Jerome. This is the inference, as Baronius points out, from the contents of the letter which Innocent bore to Augustine and Alypius from Jerome. We may suppose it probable that Innocent was accompanied to Palestine by Apronius in compliance with Jerome's invitation. (Hieron. ep. 143, ed. Vallarsi; Aug. ep. 202; Baronius, Ann. 419, xcvi.) [W. H. F. & J. G.]

INNOCENTIUS (36), the name of two presbyters at the Roman council under Boniface II. in 531. (Mansi, viii. 742, 747.) [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (37), prefect of Africa, under the emperor Maurice, and a friend of Gregory the Great, among whose letters are two addressed to Innocentius in 600. Gregory congratulates him on his appointment, sends him by request a copy of his Exposition of Job, and recommends him to study Augustine. In another letter Gregory complains of certain injuries done by the officials of Innocentius to Victor bishop of Fasiana in Sardinia, this island being then in the African prefecture (Dict. Gr. and Rom. Geog. i. 72A). In another letter Innocentius appears as giving Gregory information of the irregularities of Januarius bishop of Cagliari (lib. x. ind. iii. epp. 37, 38; lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 5; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 138, 140). [T. W. D.]

INNOCENTIUS (38), interpreter for pope Martin when under examination at Constantinople (Mansi, x. 856 D; Baron. A. E. ann. 651, ix.). He is said to have been of Africa, and is described as "Consul filius Thomae," but Baronius in the margin reads consularius for consul. The Sacellarius who conducted the examination was enraged at the defence, and would not hear out the interpreter. [T. W. D.]

INNRECHTACH, INNRACHTHACH, INRECHTACH, INNRACTHECH.

(1) Anchoret. [IMRAITEACH.]

(2) Bishop of Kilmacduagh. [INDRACTUS (1).]

INO, wife of the emperor Tiberius II. (John of Ephesus, H. E. p. 179, tr. R. Payne Smith). When publicly recognised as Augusta her name was changed to Anastasia. [TIBERIUS II.]

[G. T. S.]

INSTANTIUS, a Spanish bishop in the latter half of the 4th century. He and Salvianus, another Spanish bishop, were the first followers of Priscillian. At the synod of the bishops of Spain and Aquitaine, held at Saragossa (Caesar Augusta), sentence of condemnation in their absence was passed against Instantius and the other leaders of the Priscillianist party. In 381, after the rescript of the emperor Gratian banishing heretics, Instantius accompanied Priscillian and Salvianus from Spain to Italy. On their way through Gaul they spread the Priscillianist doctrines into Aquitaine. At Rome they were refused audience by pope Damasus at the papal court. At Milan they were similarly repulsed by Ambrose. On their return to Gaul they won over Macedonius, an imperial officer. Through his powerful influence, the decree of Gratian was reversed in their favour. Having returned to Spain, they found Volventius the proconsul ready to side with them. Their sees and churches were restored without opposition. After the death of Gratian, and the assumption of the empire by Maximus, Priscillian and Instantius attended the synod of Bordeaux, 385, to defend their cause there. Instantius was declared to be unworthy of his bishopric. Priscillian then appealed to the emperor. The cause was transferred to the imperial consistory. Both sides proceeded about it to the new emperor at Treves. After several hearings, severe measures were resorted to. Capital sentence was pronounced against Priscillian and others, some of his associates. Instantius was condemned to banishment to the Scilly Islands. Thither he was soon after followed by Tiberianus, another Priscillianist. (Sulp. Sev. ii. 46-51; Mansi, iii. 633; Hefele, Councils, ii. 292.) [M. B. C.]

INVENTIUS (1) (INVENIUS, JUVENTIUS), the name of two bishops at the council of Carthage in 416. (August. epp. 176 al. 90, 181 al. 91; Innoc. Pap. epp. 26, 29; Mansi, iv. 321.) [C. H.]

INVENTIUS (2)—Sept. 12. He is said to have been sent by Hermagoras, the first bishop of Aquileia in the time of Nero, to Ticinum, together with Syrus, to preach the gospel, where, after much success, they died. [HERMAGORAS.] (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Till., Mém. ii. 561.) [G. T. S.]

INVENTUS, said to have been one of 360 martyrs who suffered at Gerona during the persecution of Diocletian, at the hands of the praeses Dacianus and his legate Ruffinus. St. Inventus is locally known as St. Trobat, the vernacular equivalent. (Boll. A.A. SS. 22 Jan. ii. 414; J. T. Salazar, Martyrolog. Hisp. i. 242.) [F. D.]

INVOLATUS, bishop of Tortosa, was the last prelate of this see under the Gothic kings. He subscribed the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo (May 2, 693). (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; Esp. Sagr. xlii. 71.) [M. A. W.]

INVOLATUS, an abbat at the council of Toledo in 688. (Mansi, xii. 22.) [T. W. D.]

INZUS, bishop of Corna in Lycaonia, present at the council of Constantinople, 381 (Mansi, iii. 570). Le Quien believes the reading of the name corrupt, and proposes Euzoïus. (Or. Chr. i. 1085.) [C. H.]

IOANBERHTUS (Kemble, C. D. 137, 138, 140), archbishop. [JAENBERT.] [C. H.]

IOAVA, IOAVAN (IAOVA, IOHOEVIVUS, IOVINUS, IOVINUS, JOAVA, JOEVINUS), of Leon, bishop and confessor, commemorated March 2. His life, written by Albert Le Grand from Armorican materials, is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 441-443) and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 2 Mar. i. 139, with introductory notes and a Vita, ex Lectionibus Brev. Leon.). He was an Irishman, nephew of St. Paul bishop of Leon, and sent into Britain for education under his uncle, possibly at St. Illtyd's. Having been recalled to Ireland, where his father wished him to be married, he forsook all and followed his uncle, who had removed from Wales into Armorica, and become bishop of Leon. There he was for a time under St. Judulus in his monastery at Landevenecanum (Landevenech), in the diocese of Quimper, where he spent his novitiate, and he may for some time afterwards have led an anchoretical life in the country of Ack (Butler, Saints). He then went to Leon, where he became a priest and abbat. He was afterwards consecrated to be bishop-coadjutor at Leon, but seems to have ived in his monastery on the island of Baz or Brazparza, to which he had in his priesthood been appointed by Judulus. He died there, March 2, about A.D. 554, but neither the time nor the details are certain. At Plougneu, in Finisterre (Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. &c. ii. pt. i. 93 sq.), there is an inscription, but of a date much later than the bishop himself: "D. Ioeuua Epus Leonis fuit hic sepultus." (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 9, § 12; Colgan, Acta SS. Ind. Chron. A.D. 550, 552; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 81.)

IODOCUS. [JUDOCUS.]

IOLAN (JOLAN, TOLAN), bishop of Ceannaradh, now Kingarth, in Bute, Scotland, died A.D. 688 (Four Mast.), but at A.D. 689 in the Ann. Tig. he is "Johannes Eps Cingalarathensis," and in the Chron. Scot. "Tolan Eps. Fasad." (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 295; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 215, iv. 64.)

IRCHARDUS (ERCHADE, ERTHAD, YARHARDUS), a Pictish saint, commemorated Aug. 24. The chronology of St. Irchard is most difficult and confused, so that by some he is placed in the 5th century, and by others in the 6th. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 24 Aug., r. 773-4) give an article based on Dempster and the Brev. Aberd., but arrive at no assured result. The chief authority is Brev. Aberd. (Prop. SS., p. festiv. f. lxxxix.). He was a disciple of St. Ternan, and born in the braes of Tolmaad, Kincardine O'Neil, Aberdeenshire. St. Ternan ordained him priest, and Gregory, the bishop of Rome, consecrated him to the episcopate; on his return he led a solitary life among the northern Picts, and died at Kincardine O'Neil. Adam King says he lived as "bishop and confessor in Scotland, under King Malcolm I. 933," and Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 245), attributing to him Lecturae in Biblia, De Divina Essentia, Allegoricae Scripturae, also says he flourished A.D. 933. He probably flourished in the 5th or 6th century, and his feast is Aug. 24, though Dempster has also July 24. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 133, 160, 206, 209, 240, 466, and Lives St. Nin. and St. Kent. 355; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 168; Todd, St. Patrick, 302 n.; Haddan and Stubbs, Counc., &c. ii. 139.)

IRENAEUS (1), bishop of Lyons, June 28.

I. His Life.—Very little is known of Irenaeus's outward and personal history. We know indeed little more than the following particulars: that he was a native of Asia Minor, and in early youth had seen and heard bishop Polycarp of Smyrna, that he afterwards came into Gaul, and during the persecution of A.D. 177 carried, as presbyter of Lyons, a letter from the Gallican confessors to the Roman bishop Eleutherus (A.D. 174 or 175-189); that after the death of bishop Pothinus of Lyons (A.D. 177) he became his successor, and was still exercising the episcopal office in the time of bishop Victor, who succeeded Eleutherus in the see of Rome (A.D. 189-198 or 9); and that he took a leading part in all the ecclesiastical transactions and controversies of that time. St. Jerome therefore speaks of him (De Vir. Illustr. 35) as having flourished in the reign of the emperor Commodus (A.D. 180-192). The birth-year of Irenaeus is assigned to widely distant epochs. The earliest and the latest dates proposed are some 50 years apart from one another. Dodwell (Dissert. iii. in Iren. 6 sqq.) fixes it for the years A.D. 97 or 98; Grabe (Prolegomena, sect. i. 1) decides for A.D. 108; Tillémont (Mémoires, iii. p. 79) for A.D. 120, and so Lightfoot (The Churches of Gaul, in Cont. Rev. Aug. 1876, p. 415); Dupin and Massuet (Dissert. ii. in Irenaeum, 1) for A.D. 140. Massuet's date is that adopted by Kling (Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.), Böhlinger (Die Kirche Christi und ihre Zeugen, i. 1), and many others. Ziegler (Irenaeus der Bischof von Lyon, p. 15 sq.) would bring it down as low as A.D. 147. Harvey, the latest editor of Irenaeus, regards A.D. 130 as the most probable date (Proleg., vol. i. clv.); Ropes (Biblioth. Sacra, 1877, April, p. 288 sqq.) prefers A.D. 126 as the most probable date, and so Leimbach (Zeitsch. für luth. Theologie, 1873, p. 614 sqq.); with him is agreed Hilgenfeld (Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1879, p. 319), and Dr. Oscar von Gebhardt (Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1875, p. 369 sqq.) allows any time between 126 and 130. In deciding this question one point to be steadily kept in view is that Irenaeus developed his chief literary activity in the times of the Roman bishops Eleutherus and Victor, i.e. in the two last decades of the 2nd century. From this it is clear that he could not, at all events, have been born so early as the closing years of the 1st century or the first ten years of the 2nd. He was on the other hand already a presbyter in A.D. 177, and in the same or following year was elected bishop after the martyrdom of his predecessor, the venerable nonagenarian St. Pothinus. That he should at that time have only just attained his thirtieth year (the earliest age at which a man could receive episcopal ordination) is a very unlikely supposition. We cannot therefore, on this account alone, assign his birth to a much later period than cir. A.D. 140. To fix the date more closely still we may appeal to a passage in the work Contra Haereses, v. 30, 3, where Irenaeus, speaking of the Apocalypse of St. John, says: οὐδὲ γὰρ πρὸ πολλοῦ χρόνου ἐπαράθη, ἀλλὰ σχεδὸν ἐπὶ τῆς ἡμετέρας γενεᾶς, πρὸς τῷ τέλει τῆς Δομιτιανοῦ ἀρχῆς. From these words Dodwell drew his conclusion that Irenaeus must have been born a short time after Domitian's death, and either under the emperor Nerva, or in the first year of the reign of Trajan. But all that Irenaeus really says and what it comes to is this, that the Apocalyptic Vision was seen towards the end of Domitian's reign († 18 Sept. A.D. 96), and that this brought the composition of the book very near to the time of his (Irenaeus's) own generation. The length of the period designated in antiquity by the term "generation" varied from 30 to 33 and even 40 years. This consideration might lead us to fix the date of Irenaeus's birth at cir. A.D. 126 or, possibly (some ten years afterwards) cir. A.D. 136. This last we may assume is the latest admissible date. Another passage of importance for the determination of this question is found in the fragment of a letter to Florinus preserved by Eusebius (H. E. v. 20); with which should be compared another passage, c. Haer. iii. 3, 4, preserved in the original Greek by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 14). Irenaeus tells us [here that being still a boy or in early years (ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ) he had seen Polycarp and listened to his discourses and his teaching. Now the martyrdom of Polycarp took place not, as was formerly assumed, in A.D. 166 or 167, but some ten years earlier, in A.D. 155 or 156. The letter to Florinus was (as will be more fully shewn hereafter) most probably written during the episcopate of Victor, and at the earliest about A.D. 190. Irenaeus was at that time already an elderly man. Dodwell thinks it possible to make out the exact time when Irenaeus and Florinus were both living at Smyrna from the circumstance that Florinus was then holding a distinguished position in the imperial palace (εἶδόν σε λαμπρῶς πράττοντα ἐν τῇ βασιλικῇ αἰλῇ). This he thinks could only have been the case during Hadrian's second residence in Asia Minor, which Dodwell assigns to the year 122, but Grabe more correctly to the years 127-129. But even the later date will (after what has been said above) appear much too early. Lightfoot (Supernatural Religion, iv. in Cont. Review for May 1875, p. 833 sq.) is disposed to fix on the year 136, about which time T. Aurelius Fulvus, who afterwards became the emperor Antoninus Pius, was proconsul of Asia (Waddington, Fastes des Provinces Asiatiques, p. 724). But the mere mention of the αἰλή βασιλικῇ by no means implies of necessity the actual presence of the existing or future emperor in Smyrna at that time. A surer result might be arrived at could we determine with any certainty how old Irenaeus himself was when he sat (as he tells us) at the feet of Polycarp. Dodwell assumes that the age of a παῖς ranged from the 20th to the 30th year, and that the πρώτη ἡλικία of such παῖς would probably reach to his 25th year. Irenaeus himself (Haer. ii. 24, 4) reckons 5 ages, through which the human race passes—those of infans, puer, parvulus, juvenis, senior. Elsewhere (Haer. ii. 22, 4) he enumerates these five ages in a different order and more correctly as infans, parvulus, puer, juvenis, senior: and remarks that Jesus, when about 30 years of age (qui inciperet esse tanquam triginta annorum), came to baptism, being still a juvenis, and not having yet attained the aetas provector. The age of a juvenis he reckons from the 30th to the 40th year (quia autem triginta annorum aetas prima in iolis est juvenis et extenditur usque ad quadragesimum annum omnis quilibet confitebitur; a quadragesimo autem et quinquagesimo anno declinat jam in aetatem seniore, quam habens Dominus noster docebat). If, according to this, the indoles juvenis begin about the 30th year, the age of παῖς will commence with that of youthful maturity, say about the 18th year, and just that time of life will be the one denoted by the expression πρώτη ἡλικία—so that not the age of childhood, but that of early young-manhood will have been the period of Irenaeus's connexion with St. Polycarp. That the latter was then already a πᾶν γηραλέος is not expressly stated, but follows indirectly from the words to Florinus. In order to shew that it had been possible for him in early youth to see and hear St. Polycarp, Irenaeus adds: ἐπὶ πολὺ γὰρ παραμένει καὶ πᾶν γηραλέος . . . . ἐξῆλθε τοῦ βίου. That Polycarp must have been at that time far advanced in life is evident from his own words, as Irenaeus reports them: ὡ καλὲ θεεῖ, εἰς οἴους με καιροὺς τετήρηκας. For as Dodwell rightly observes, qui queritur sese ad ea usque tempora reservatum, is una inmebat jam se ordinarios etiam senectutis limites esse praetergressum. Now as Polycarp died in his 86th year, we must fix the date of Irenaeus's discipleship some 10 or 15 years previously. This would bring it to cir. A.D. 140-146, and make the year 122 the earliest possible date for his birth. The supposition is however possible, that Irenaeus's connexion with Polycarp belonged to the latest years of Polycarp's life, and thus would make A.D. 136 or A.D. 137 the latest date for Irenaeus's birth. Means for deciding the question may perhaps be found in a statement in the Moscow MS. of the Martyrium Polycarpi, according to which Irenaeus was teaching at Rome at the time of Polycarp's martyrdom: οὗτος γὰρ ὁ Εἰρηναῖος κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦ μαρτυρίου τοῦ ἐπισκόπου Πολυκάρπου γενόμενος ἐν Ῥώμῃ πολλοὺς ἐδίδαξεν. Leaving on one side for the present the particular detail that Irenaeus had already appeared in the character of a public teacher at Rome, the statement seems to be worthy of credit. The martyrologist appeals on its behalf to the writings of Irenaeus himself: καὶ τοῦτο δὲ φέρεται ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Εἰρηναίου συγγράμμασιν, ὅτι ἡ ἡμέρα καὶ ὥρα ἐν Σμύρνῃ ἐμαρτύρησεν ὁ Πολυκάρπος ἡκουσεν φωνῆν ἐν τῇ Ῥωμαιοῦ πόλει ὑπάρχων ὁ Εἰρηναῖος ὡς σάλαγγος λεγούσης: Πολυκάρπος ἐμαρτύρησεν (comp. Gebhardt, Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1875, p. 362 sq.). Although this narrative is not to be found elsewhere, it may very well have been contained in one of the now lost writings of Irenaeus. And we know further from Irenaeus's own testimony (Haer. iii. 3, 4, and Epist. ad Victorem, ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 24), that Polycarp undertook a journey to Rome for the purpose of conferring with the then bishop Anicetus on various questions which were then in controversy. This journey must have been made soon after Anicetus's accession and shortly before Polycarp's own martyrdom, i.e. in the year 154, or at latest in 155 (if Polycarp's martyrdom did not take place before 156). The time therefore in which Irenaeus could have received instruction from Polycarp must have preceded A.D. 154. But whether he removed to Rome before that year, or whether he did so in Polycarp's company, remaining as a resident in the city after the aged bishop's departure,—in either case he must have already reached an age of between 20 and 30 years. From all this A.D. 130 would seem to be the most probable date for the birth-year of Irenaeus. It can hardly be placed much later than this, though it might have been a few years earlier: and Irenæus would accordingly be some fifty years of age at the time of his episcopal election.

Concerning his birth-place, all we know is that Irenæus was a native of Asia Minor: but that he was born in Smyrna, where in early youth he heard the discourses of Polycarp, is not left on record. Harvey conjectures that his mother tongue was Syriac, but the grounds alleged for this hypothesis are quite inadequate to prove it or to establish his supposed familiarity with the Syriac version of the New Testament (Harvey, Prolegomena, I. cliii. sq. Index of Words, ii. 551, but comp. Ropes, Bibl. Sacra, 1877, April, p. 293 sq.). The alleged translations of Aramaic formulas of prayer and invocation in the section against the Valentinians of his work Contra Hæreses (i. 21, 3) are rather arguments against than for an acquaintance with Syriac. The way moreover in which Irenæus handles the Greek language is no proof whatsoever of a want of complete familiarity with it. If he excuses himself for want of literary training or for deficiencies in the art of rhetorical exposition, that proves as little his non-Hellenic origin as his further designation of himself as one who habitually conversed in a barbarous language: the reference evidently being in the latter case to such a use of a Celtic dialect in daily intercourse, and probably in public ministrations also, as a residence in Gaul made matter of necessity: οὐκ ἐπιζητήσεις δὲ παρ' ἡμῶν τῶν ἐν Κέλτοις διατριβόντων, καὶ περὶ βάρβαρον διάλεκτον τὸ πλείστον ἀσχολουμένων, λόγων τέχνην ἦν οὐκ ἐμάθομεν, οὐτε δύναμιν συγγραφῆως ἦν οὐκ ἠσκήσαμεν οὐτε καλλωπισμὸν λέξεων, οὐτε πιθανότητα ἦν οὐκ οἶδαμεν (Hæc. i. Praefat.). Of his youthful literary training and culture we can only judge by what appears in his writings. From these it appears that he had some acquaintance with the Greek poets and philosophers, among whom he cites Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, and Plato. Of his Christian training we know from his own testimony that, besides the instructions received from Polycarp, he had availed himself of those of other teachers also, "Presbyters" (of Asia Minor), whom he designates as mediate or immediate disciples of the apostles themselves (c. Hæc. ii. 22, 5; iv. 27, 1; 32, 1; v. 5, 1; 30, 1; 33, 3; 36, 1). Whether he was personally acquainted with Papias, whom he mentions so frequently, must remain uncertain. If he was in Rome A.D. 156, we may conjecture that he continued his studies there. The time of his removal into Gaul is unknown. An occasion for it may have been found in the close ties of relationship which connected the missionary church of Gaul with the mother-churches of Asia Minor. At the time of the persecution, to which the aged bishop Pothinus fell a sacrifice in the 17th year of Marcus Aurelius A.D. 177 (comp. my Chronologie der Römischen Bischöfe, p. 185). Irenæus was a presbyter at Lugdunum, and became (as we have seen) after the death of Pothinus his immediate successor in the episcopal office. That he also wrote the epistle of the Gallican confessors to the churches of Asia Minor and Phrygia, in which they give so vivid a description of the persecution (ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 1) is an uncertain conjecture. There is indeed a fragment preserved by Oecumenius and assigned to Irenæus (Fragm. Graec. xiii. ap. Harvey, ii.

482 sq.), which really stands in very close connexion with that epistle, mentioning in a similar way the calumny about "Thyestean banquets," which rested on depositions wrung from tortured slaves, the endeavours of the persecutors to force the martyrs Sanctus and Blandina to make a like confession, and Blandina's answer, which, though not identical with that contained in the epistle, is nearly related to it. In the fragment the martyr's words are reported thus: πῶς ἂν τούτων ἀνδραρχοῦντο οἱ μὴδὲ τῶν ἐφευγμένων κρεῶν δι' ἄσκησιν ἀπολαύοντες; in the epistle thus: πῶς ἂν παιδία φάγοιεν οἱ τοιοῦτοι οἷς μὴδὲ ἀλόγων ζώων αἷμα φαγεῖν ἐξόν; It is evident that the latter text, as preserved in the epistle, is the more original of the two, and the conjecture naturally offers itself, that the alleged fragment of Irenæus may be only an extract from the epistle in somewhat altered form. Irenæus's mission to Rome and to the then bishop of Rome, Eleutherus, was undertaken τῆς τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν εἰρήνης ἕνεκεν, i. e. (as we are further informed) to intercede with Eleutherus for the Montanists of Asia Minor in the name and on behalf of the Gallican confessors (Eus. H. E. v. 3, 4). That another object of the journey was that Irenæus himself might at the same time obtain episcopal consecration at Rome is an unproved assertion of some Roman Catholic authors. He at any rate became Pothinus's successor in the see of Lyons (Euseb. H. E. v. 5), and probably entered on his office immediately after his return. The assertion that he was consecrated at Rome as bishop by Eleutherus is commonly supported by the assumption that there was at that time no other episcopal see but Lyons in all Gaul. Such an inference is however hardly warranted by the fact that in the narrative of the persecution at Vienne a deacon only and no bishop is mentioned, which might be accounted for on the supposition that Vienne at that time belonged to the diocese of Lyons. A better argument might be derived from another passage in Eusebius (H. E. v. 23), in which he appears to speak of Irenæus as having been bishop of all the churches of Gaul (τῶν κατὰ Γαλλίαν δὲ παροικιῶν ἅς Εἰρηναῖος ἐπεσκόπει). But neither can it be regarded as a sure proof.

As bishop of Lyons Irenæus was distinguished not only by his zeal for the conversion of the heathen (compare the Acts of St. Ferreolus and his companions, Boll. Acta SS. 16 Jun. iii.) [FERREOLUS (1)], but more especially by his conflicts with heretics and his strenuous endeavours to maintain the peace of the church, in true accord with his name Εἰρηναῖος (Peace-man). His great work Against all Heresies was probably written during his episcopate. As the preface informs us, he then came forward for the first time as an ecclesiastical writer. We subsequently find him exerting himself once more to protect the churches of his native country (Asia Minor) from Roman pretensions and aggression. The Roman bishop Victor was endeavouring to compel the churches of Asia Minor, which had hitherto kept Easter, with the Jews, on the 14th of Nisan, to conform their practice to that of Rome. On their refusing so to do, and resolving to adhere to the custom of their forefathers, for which they carefully detailed their reasons in a letter addressed to Victor by Polycrates bishop of Ephesus, he had cut them off from his church-communication. The harshness of this treatment was highly disapproved by many even of those who concurred with the Roman bishop on the point in question, and kept with him the Easter festival on the Sunday following the equinoctial full-moon. Among these was Irenaeus himself. In the name of all the Gallican churches he addressed a remonstrance to bishop Victor, contained in a writing of which a considerable fragment has been preserved. In this he reminds his Roman colleague of the example set by his own predecessors, who had found no occasion or necessity in these differences of paschal observance for excommunicating their brethren of Asia Minor. On the same occasion Irenaeus (as Eusebius further informs us, H. E. v. 23) made appeal to other foreign bishops besides Victor, but without any effect on the harsh determination of the Roman. Another writing of Irenaeus is also mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. v. 20), and seems to have referred to the same subject. It was entitled περὶ σχιλομαρος, and was addressed to Blastus, head of the Roman Quartodecimans.

How long Irenaeus exercised the episcopal office is uncertain. His death is commonly assigned to the year A.D. 202 or 203. This calculation rests on the assumption that he suffered martyrdom in the reign of Septimius Severus. But the fact of such martyrdom is by no means established. Tertullian, Hippolytus, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Ephrem, Augustine, Theodoret are silent on the subject. In the Syriac fragments Irenaeus is frequently spoken of as having been "a disciple of Polycarp, bishop and martyr," but is not himself honoured with the martyr's title. Neither do we find him anywhere so designated in the quotations from his writings made by Maximus, Leontius, Johannes Damascenus, Anastasius Sinaita, Oecumenius, or the Catenae (comp. the Greek fragments). Of existing MSS., in only one, and that the most recent, the Codex Vossianus, belonging to the 14th century, is he styled "Episcopus et martir." The first witness for his martyrdom is found in Jerome's commentary on Isaiah, written cir. A.D. 410, where (c. 64) Irenaeus is spoken of as vir apostolicus episcopus et martyr; but the same Jerome, when elsewhere treating ex professo of his life and writings (in the Tract De Viris illustr. c. 35), is on this point of martyrdom altogether silent. One is tempted to adopt the conjecture of Dodwell, that the words et martyr may be an interpolation. If not, Jerome must have become acquainted with the alleged fact of Irenaeus's martyrdom subsequently to the year A.D. 392, in which the De Viris illustribus was written. There is at any rate no witness producible for it before the beginning of the 5th century. On the other hand, in the Questiones et Responsiones ad Orthodoxos of Pseudo-Justin (p. 468 D, Morell.), Irenaeus is plainly referred to as ὁ μάρτυς καὶ ἐπίσκοπος Λουγδύνου. Further, a fragment (preserved elsewhere also) is found in a Syriac MS. and introduced with the remark, that it is taken from "Irenaeus, whom the heretics slew" (Fragm. xxv. Harvey, ii. 454). This perfectly isolated statement appears either to rest on some confusion of names and histories, or at any rate to have been derived from some very obscure source. Harvey suspects that our Irenaeus may have been confounded with a namesake, who was bishop of Sirmium [IRENAEUS (3)], and is said to have died a martyr's death under Diocletian on the 25th of March (A.D. 304?). St. Jerome may also himself have confounded this Sanctus Irenaeus, episcopus et martyr, with the great bishop of Lyons. Besides these the Martyrologies commemorate four other martyrs of the same name, on 10 Feb. 26 March, 5 May, and 26 Aug. respectively. The first writer who gives any more detailed account of the martyrdom of our Irenaeus is Gregory of Tours in his Historia Francorum, i. 29. He there relates that in the persecution under Severus streams of Christian blood flowed through the streets of the city, so that neither the names nor even the number of the martyrs could be ascertained. But among these innumerable sufferers was the bishop Irenaeus. The whole narrative has a very apocryphal appearance. It may indeed be true that "this in itself somewhat feeble testimony of the credulous Frankish historian" represents "a special tradition of the Gallican church of the latter half of the 6th century" (Görres, Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie, 1878, p. 321); but this by no means invalidates the counter-testimony borne by the silence of older witnesses in the 3rd and 4th centuries. Further, the smaller Martyrologium Romanum assigns no place in its catalogue to the martyrdom of Irenaeus, whereas, on the other hand, the Martyrologium Hieronymianum, Bede, Ado, Notker, Usuard, &c., fix its commemoration for June 28 in accordance with a brief Gallican martyrology found by Massuet at St. Germain's in a MS. which he assigns to the 8th century. The Acta Martyrii as we now possess them are a very late and untrustworthy compilation (comp. Ruinart, Acta Martyr. sincera, p. 708).

II. His Writings.—The chief of these was the great work in five books against Gnosticism entitled: "Ἐλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, Detectio et eversio falso cognominatae agnitiois." (The full Greek title is found in Eusebius, H. E. v. 7; Photius, Bibl. Cod. 120 and elsewhere; compare also the frequent references to it made by Irenaeus himself in the praefationes to books ii., iv., v. and the conclusion of book iv.) The work is commonly cited under the briefer title πρὸς αἰρέσεις (Contra Haereses). We possess it entire in the Latin version only, which, however, must have been made from the Greek original very soon after its composition, since the Latin text was used by Tertullian some ten years afterwards in his tractate adv. Valentianus. Its author was a Celt (so we conclude from the barbarous Latinity), and probably one of the clergy of Lyons. The greatest part of the original work being now lost, the slavish literality with which the translator represents the Greek words before him imparts to his version a very high value. Many obscurities of expression, which arise in part from a misunderstanding of the Greek idiom, admit of an easy solution by translating back the Latin into Greek. Beside this Latin version, which appears to have superseded from an early date throughout the Western church the use of the Greek original, there was also a Syriac translation, of which numerous fragments have been preserved. These have been put together for the first time by Harvey in his edition of Irenæus (ii. 431 sqq.). They are derived from the collection of Nitrian MSS. in the British Museum, some of which are as old as the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries (comp. Harvey, i. 431, note). To these are added (Nos. xxi. xxxi. and xxxii.) fragments of an Armenian interpolated version first published by Pitra in his Spicilegium Solesmense, tom. i. (Paris, 1852). Of these No. xxi. only is taken from the work Against Heresies. The almost entire agreement between these Syriac fragments and the Old Latin version is a further testimony to its genuineness and fidelity. The Greek original, which is said to have been still in existence in the 16th century, was made great use of by Hippolytus (or whoever was the author of the Philosophumena), Epiphanius and Theodoret. To the numerous extracts made by these writers, and especially the first two, we owe the preservation of the greater part of the original Greek of the first book—the preface and cc. 1–21 entire, and numerous fragments of the remainder. Of the other books, the Greek has come down to us in isolated passages, and for the most part through citations made by Eusebius. The only existing witnesses for the original text of the Latin version are three MSS., the editio princeps, and the various readings given by earlier editors from MSS. which in part have since disappeared. The oldest of the three MSS. was formerly a codex Claromontanus (of the 10th or 11th century), and is now at Cheltenham in the library of the late Sir Thomas Phillipps. It contains 246 (not 232) leaves, and from fol. 189 a second hand is observable (Harvey, pref.). It is on this MS. that the text of Massuet is based. It has been of late years collated afresh by Mr. Harvey. At v. 26, 1 it breaks off abruptly with the words Et decem cornus quae vidisti—while shortly before this there is a considerable lacuna between the words potest vita manifestari (v. 13, 4) and vocalis est (v. 14, 1). To the same family with this Clermont MS. belongs the Codex Leydensis Vossianus, 63 (33), fol. (cxi.) iii. and is a copy made A.D. 1494 from a much more ancient MS. in large letters. It was used by both Massuet and Grabe, but by the latter only from a very unreliable collation for which he was indebted to Dodwell. A fresh collation has been made by Stieren. This MS. has many lacunae, occasioned for the most part by δμοιοτέλευτον. The chief of these (v. 13, 4–14, 1) it has in common with the Codex Claromont., whereas on the other hand it contains the text of book v. to the end. (Comp. Stieren, de Codice Vossiano, Lipsiae, 1847.) The third MS., Cod. Arundelianus, 87 (14th cent.), is now in the British Museum. This MS. was collated by Grabe, and has been again collated by Harvey. It breaks off at c. Haer. v. 31, 2, with the words dignos habuerit, and belongs to a different family from the two former MSS. The three codices from which the text of the editio princeps by Erasmus was formed are now lost. No information concerning their age and origin has come down to us; but a comparison of the printed text of Erasmus leads to the conclusion that the text of these MSS. must have been very corrupt and full of lacunae. Nearly related to them appear to have been the Leyden MSS. of Joshua Mercerus, whose various readings are recorded on the margin of a copy of Erasmus's edition preserved at Leyden. Of these readings, communicated to him by Dodwell, Isaac Vossius made use, referring to them by the titles Merc. I. and Merc. II., by which numbers however he did not denote a first and second MS., but only that in one case the reading was found in only one MS., in the other in both. Another MS. (the Codex Ottobonianus of the 13th cent.), which was used by Massuet in preparing his edition, has now likewise disappeared; it seems to have belonged to the same family. Yet another ancient MS. appears to have been collated by Feuarentius and used by him for his edition; but little more can now be known of it than its previous existence. It must however have been nearly related to the Codex Vossianus, in common with which it contained the five last chapters of book v., and was in fact the sole authority whereon Feuarentius published those chapters for the first time. In his editions it is cited as Codex Vetus. It differs moreover from another MS. made use of by Feuarentius, but rarely cited by him, the Codex Vaticanus (comp. Stieren, Prolegom. p. xxx.). Finally, Passeratius appears to have made use of a MS. not otherwise known, from which he gleaned a considerable number of various readings in the first book and the first eight chapters of the second, and noted them in the margin of a copy of Erasmus's edition. Many of the corrections thus obtained are, however, as Harvey has observed, evidently mere conjectures.

The editio princeps of Desiderius Erasmus appeared in 1526 at Basle in the workshop of Frobenius. It was followed in 1528 and 1534 by two other editions prepared under the superintendence of Erasmus himself, and afterwards by numerous reprints issued in the period from 1545 to 1567. In 1570 appeared at Geneva the edition of Nicolaus Gallasius, who was the first to add the fragments of the Greek text preserved in the Excerpta of Epiphanius. After the worthless edition of Johann Jakob Grynaeus in 1571, a real and considerable step in advance was made by the first edition of the Minorite of Paris, Francis Feuarentius, in 1575 and 1576, and again by his second edition of 1596. On the basis of the ancient MS. which he made use of Feuarentius published for the first time the complete text, adding numerous Greek and Latin fragments. From this edition of 1596 were taken the reprints of 1625, 1639, and 1675, and that also in the second volume of the Bibl. Patrum Lugdun. of 1677. Based on fresh manuscript materials were the more critical editions of Joh. Ernst Grabe (Oxford, 1702), and the Benedictine of St. Maur, Renatus Massuet (Paris, 1712, ed. 2, Venice, 1734), of whom the former (Grabe) made use of the Codices Arundel. and Vossian., while the latter (Massuet), beside availing himself of the labours of his predecessors, reconstructed his text from the Codices Claromont., Ottobon., and Passerat. Both these editors augmented the collection of fragments already in existence. Grabe added copious Prolegomena, Massuet three Dissertations, De Gnosticorum rebus, De Irenæi Vita et Scriptis, and De Irenæi Doctrina. The division into chapters in Massuet's edition differs from that in Grabe's. A reproduction of Massuet's text enriched by a fresh collation of the Cod. Vossian., and a reprint of the prefaces of Erasmus, Gallasius, Feuarentius, Grabe, and others, is the edition of Ad. Stieren (2 vols. Leipsic, 1853). The latest edition is that of Wigan Harvey (2 vols. Cambridge, 1857), based on a new and careful collation of the Codices Claromont. and Arundel. In addition to the fragments already published by Massuet and Stieren, Harvey has put together all those preserved in the original Greek by the author of the Philosophimena, as well as the newly discovered Syriac and Armenian fragments. His Prolegomena contain new and minute investigations into the origin, characteristics, and main phenomena of Gnosticism, as well as concerning the life and writings of Irenaeus.

The work Against Heresies was written in Gaul. (Irenaeus says so expressly, lib. i. praef. 3, cf. i. 13, 7. We follow here and elsewhere Massuet's division of chapters.) The date of composition is determined by the passage (iii. 3, 3) in which he speaks of Eleutherus as at that time twelfth in succession to the apostles on the episcopal chair of Rome (ἄν δωδεκάτῳ τόπῳ τῶν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων κατέχει κλῆρον 'Ελευθερος). According to this, the third book was written at the earliest A.D. 174 or 175, at the latest A.D. 189 (comp. my Chronologie der röm. Bischöfe, p. 184 sqq.). The commencement and completion of the whole work were possibly some years apart, but in any case we have no right to go down so low as the episcopate of Victor (A.D. 189-198 or 199) for the date of books iv. and v. If in the absence of more exact information we fix on the mid-period of Eleutherus's episcopate we may tentatively assume the year A.D. 182, or (considering that the two first books alone appear to have been written immediately the one after the other—comp. the prefaces to books ii. and iii.-v.), we may propose the period from A.D. 180 to 185 as the date of composition for the whole work. Attempts to assign a more exact date are fruitless. The conclusion that Irenaeus wrote the work as bishop and not at an earlier date than A.D. 178 as presbyter, is by far the most probable, though it cannot be drawn with absolute certainty from the words of the preface to the fifth book to which Massuet appeals: quoniam in administratione sermonis positi sumus: any more than from like expressions elsewhere (comp. ii. 17, 1, Necessaris et hoc facientes—he is referring to his conflict with heresy—quoniam hujus rei credita est nobis procuratio; and the preface to book iv.). Neither can a perfectly satisfactory conclusion be drawn from the fact that Irenaeus was acquainted with the translation of the Old Testament by Theodotion. In the passage (iii. 21, 1) when he discusses the well-known prophecy Isai. vii. 14 he remarks: 'Ἄλλ' οὐχ ὡς ἐπιόφασι πάντες ἢν μεθερμηνεύειν τοιμῶντων τῆν γραφήν' ἰδοὺ ἡ νεάνις ἐν γαστρὶ ἔξει καὶ τέξεται υἶόν, ὡς Θεοδοτίων ἠρμήνευσεν δ' Ἐφέσιος, καὶ Ἀκύλας δ' Ποντικός, ἀμφότεροι Ἰουδαῖοι προσήλυτοι· οἷς κατακλιουθήσαντες οἱ Ἑβραῖοι ἐξ Ἰωσήφ αὐτὸν γεγεννησῆαι φάσκουσιν. To these two translators here mentioned the name of Symmachus ought to be added, who rendered the Hebrew word in the same way. But Symmachus appears not to have been known to Irenaeus at the time of his writing the above-cited passage. The time of Aquila, disciple as he was of the celebrated Rabbi Akiba, coincides undoubtedly with that of the emperor Hadrian.

(Comp. in addition to Epiphanius De Mensuris et Ponderibus, c. 13, the proofs adduced from the Talmud by Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, iv. 437 sqq. ed. 2.) Theodotion on the other hand, whom Epiphanius regards as junior to Symmachus, lived and wrote according to him (De M. et P. c. 17) περὶ τὴν τοῦ δευτέρου Κομμοδου βασιλείαν, i. e. between A.D. 180 and A.D. 192. The Chronicon Paschale (p. 491, ed. Bonn) fixed still more definitely the date of his version as having been made Marcello (i. Marullo) et Aeliano cons. i. e. in A.D. 184. The expression "Reign of the second Commodus" is erroneously turned by Harvey (I. clviii. and II. 110 note) into "the second year of Commodus," and alleged as proof that the work c. Haereses could not have been written before the year 181. The accounts in Epiphanius are on this point unfortunately very confused. As successor to Antoninus Pius he designates (c. 16) 'Caracalla or Geta' or M. Aurelius Verus with a reign of seven years. Contemporary with this last Lucius Aurelius Commodus has also reigned seven years, followed by Pertinax with six months, and Severus with eighteen years. In the time of Severus he places the Bible-translator Symmachus, whom he speaks of as a Samaritan and Jewish proselyte (he was in fact a Jewish Christian). Symmachus is closely followed by Theodotion (μετὰ τούτων κατὰ πόδας ἐν τῷ ἔξῃς χρόνῳ) during the reign of "the second Commodus," who is said to have reigned for a period of thirteen years after the time of the forenamed Lucius Aurelius Commodus. This Theodotion is designated not as an Ephesian but erroneously as Ποντικός ἀπὸ τῆς διαδοχῆς Μαρκίου τοῦ αἰρεσιάρχου τοῦ Σινωπίτου, and as having afterwards passed over to Judaism. A like confusion of statement with regard to the succession of Roman emperors is found in the following paragraphs. In c. 18 we read of the fifth version that it was discovered after the persecution of Severus in the time τοῦ υἱοῦ Σευήρου τοῦ ἐπικληθέντος Καρακάλλου τε καὶ Γέτα, whereupon Epiphanius gives the following succession of emperors after Antoninus Pius: Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, who is also called Verus, nineteen years; μετὰ τούτων Κόμοδος ἄλλος βασιλεύει ἔτη γ', περὶ οὗ χρόνου γνωρισθῆναι Θεοδοτίωνα εἴπομεν. After this Commodus follows Περτίναξ ἄλλος for six months, and then Σευήρος ἄλλος with his son Antoninus, together eighteen years. After Severus follows Ἀντωνίνος δ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ, δ καὶ Γέτας ἄλλος, δ καὶ Καρακάλλος ἐπικληθείς, καὶ ποιεῖ ἔτη ζ'. In the seventh year of this prince the Editio Quinta (that namely which followed Theodotion's version, which was reckoned as the fourth) was discovered at Jericho concealed in wine-jars (ἐν πίθαις). Caracalla is followed by another Antoninus, who reigns four years, and he by Alexander, son of Mammaea, who reigns thirteen years, and so forth. That Epiphanius here identifies Caracalla with his brother Geta is the least of his blunders. He makes a worse mistake when, misled by the frequent recurrence of the name Antoninus, he confuses Marcus Aurelius with Caracalla, and gives to the former the seven years of the latter emperor. The confusion is rendered greater still by Marcus Aurelius being designated as Severus instead of Verus, in consequence of which this emperor is further confounded with Septimius Severus. And so the blundering goes on: Lucius Verus, the adopted brother of Marcus Aurelius, is confounded with his own son Lucius Aurelius Commodus, who in the first instance (c. 16) is immediately followed by Pertinax and then by Severus, but afterwards (c. 17) by the "second" Commodus. Further on (c. 18), while the series of names is otherwise correctly given, he proceeds to speak of a Κόμοδος ἄλλος, and Περτίνιας ἄλλος and a Σεῦρος ἄλλος. One thing however seems clear from his statement, that he would place the date of composition of Theodotion's version in the reign of Commodus, son and successor of Marcus Aurelius, and that by "the first Severus," in whose time he supposes Symmachus to have written, he must mean Verus, i. e. Marcus Aurelius himself. This account of the old Greek versions can hardly have been derived from Irenaeus as Credner supposes (Beiträge zur Einleitung in die biblischen Schriften, ii. 255), but probably from the same source as that from which Eusebius drew his account of Origen's Hexapla (H. E. vi. 16), and perhaps from the now lost statement of Origen himself. The date assigned to Theodotion seems at any rate to have been derived from an old and trustworthy tradition, although the further notices concerning him may be purely fabulous, being in part results of some confusion between Theodotion and Aquila, and in part products of Epiphanius's own exuberant fancy. The notice in the Chronicon Paschale was probably derived from Epiphanius (comp. also Lightfoot in Contemp. Review, 1876, August, p. 412). The precise date there given (A.D. 184) is not more trustworthy than numerous others of a like kind, and no competent inquirer will be imposed on by this pretence at chronological exactness. The Chronicon in any case cannot be regarded as an independent authority in addition to that of Epiphanius. And while his statement may fairly be assumed to rest on that of some older witness we cannot so far depend upon its accuracy as to use it in endeavouring to determine the precise date of the great work of Irenaeus. One thing is certain. Theodotion's version was not generally known and used at that time. Besides Irenaeus himself his disciple Hippolytus knew and used it, but Tertullian was not yet acquainted with it (Overbeck, Questionum Hippolytearum specimen, p. 101 sqq.). It is then quite possible that, Theodotion being an inhabitant of Ephesus, and Irenaeus keeping up through life close relations with Asia Minor, Theodotion's work may have come into his hands and been made use of by him long before it became generally known. There is therefore no apparent reason against fixing on circa A.D. 180 for the date of Theodotion's version, and a few years later for the work of Irenaeus. We can hardly say that we have any other grounds for determining its date more accurately. Neither the mention of Montanistic prophecy, nor that of Tatian in the list of heretics, can be regarded as such. The former is noted by Eusebius in the Chronicon under the year 171, the latter under 172. Leaving the correctness of these dates as an open question, it is enough to remark here, that Montanism on the one hand, and Tatian's Encratism on the other, were contemporaneous phenomena. They do not help us to assign a more definite chronological position to the work c. Haereses.

As the first external motive for undertaking its composition, Irenaeus himself mentions (lib. i. praef. ; ii. 17, 1 ; iii. praef.) the request of an unnamed friend that he would give him some instruction as to the heretical opinions of the Valentinians, and how to refute them. The recent spread of the Valentinian sect through the Rhone district had already given Irenaeus occasion to make himself more particularly acquainted with their writings and tenets. The dangerous character of their teaching had been fully recognized by others before him, whom he modestly designates as multo nobis meliores ; but these had been in his opinion (iv. praef.) incapacitated through ignorance of the Valentinian "Rule" or system of doctrine for adequately undertaking the task of refutation. That so it was then his first object to refute Valentinianism, and only in a secondary and occasional way to attack other forms of heresy, is evident from the whole construction and arrangement of the first book, which is almost exclusively occupied with the Valentinians, and the same may be said in great measure of the second book also. Irenaeus himself repeatedly observes that he who refutes the Valentinians does at the same time refute all other heresies (cf. ii. 31, 1) "destructis itaque his qui a Valentino sunt, omnis haereticorum eversa est multitudo," an assertion of which he proceeds (31, 1-35, 5) to give detailed proof, in reference to the various heretical parties. So also in the reference to the fourth book he speaks of the "doctrina eorum qui sunt a Valentino" as a "recapitulatio omnium haereticorum," and in the second book of having taken them as an example of the way in which all heretics are to be refuted (tanquam speculum habuimus eos totius eversionis). In the three following books the circle of vision is unquestionably enlarged. Irenaeus, now taking the Scriptures for his guide, goes through in order the fundamental doctrines of Gnosticism, and along with those of Valentinus reviews the cognate dogmas of other heretical schools and specially those of the Marcionites. But we nowhere find such a connected view and refutation of other Gnostic systems as is given of the Valentinian in the second book.

The sources from whence Irenaeus derived his information were in the first instance the writings of the heretics themselves. In the preface to his first book he speaks of the ὑπομήματα of disciples of Valentinus ; and observes in passing that he has been in personal communication with some of their number. And more particularly it is the school of Ptolemaeus, an ἀπὸδυσημα τῆς Οὐαλεντίνου σχολῆς, whose dogmatic system he sets himself to describe. The detailed account (c. Haer. i. 1-7) gives a description of its particular development in the Western or Italian form, and this derived not from one but from several writings, one of which Clemens Alexandrinus also made use of in the excerpta ex scriptis Theodoti, cc. 44-65. From another source were further derived the additional details given cc. 11 and 12, with regard to various opinions within the Valentinian system and in reference to Valentinus himself, Secundus, Ptolemaeus, and others ; c. 13, 1-5, cc. 14 and 15 are concerned with Marcus, his magic arts, and his theories about the symbolism of letters and numbers. These accounts of Marcus conclude with the citation of some Iambic Senarii, written against him by a Divinae aspirationis Senior et Praeco veritatis (ὁ θεοπνευστος πρεσβύτερος καὶ κήρυξ τῆς ἀληθείας). The same venerable authority is further designated, after the quotation, as "amator Dei senior," which Epiphanius expresses by ὁ θεοφιλὴς πρεσβύτερος. Hilgenfeld conjectures that it may be Polycarp who is thus referred to; while Harnack supposes this πρεσβύτερος to be identical with the Melior nobis (ὁ κρείσσων ἡμῶν), of whom Irenaeus speaks i. 13, 3, and elsewhere. The designation "Amator Dei," i. e. probably θεοφιλὴς (not θεοφιλῆς), might, it has been thought, point to Theophilus of Antioch, of whom Eusebius speaks (H. E. v. 24) as having been the author of various haeresiological works. But if so he could not be the same as the Auctor ad Autolyicum, who was a contemporary of Irenaeus. The accounts given of the disciples of Marcus (c. 13, 6-7 and cc. 16-18), and further notices (cc. 19-21) which do not specifically refer to the Marcosians, seem not to have been derived from a written document (comp. i. 13, 7). Of special interest would it be if we could obtain any certain information as to the sources of the accounts given in cc. 11 and 12, which announce themselves as a sort of appendix to the more detailed account given in cc. 1-7. These later notices are certainly not derived from the writings proper of the Valentinian school. Cap. 11, 1 contains a condensed account of the personal teaching of Valentinus himself in contradistinction to the later developments of his system; c. 11, 2 and 3, give various detached notices of the teaching of his oldest disciple Secundus, and of another unnamed Valentinian—ἄλλος ἐπιφανὴς διδάσκαλος—out of which earlier critics, following the mistaken lead of Epiphanius, constructed a proper name Epiphanes [EPIPHANES]. Harnack on the other hand supposes Heraclion to be referred to. (Comp. Lipsius's two essays, Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, pp. 161-168 sq. and Quellen der ältesten Ketzergeschichte, p. 170). After interposing (11, 4) some polemical observations, Irenaeus proceeds to describe, with a slight use of parody, the doctrines of other Valentinian teachers who are also unnamed (11, 4 and 5); and then (c. 12, 1) proceeds to speak of "ἡ qui sunt circa Ptolemaeum scientiores" (οἱ δὲ περὶ τὸν Πτολεμαῖον γνωστικώτεροι) with polemical remarks (12, 2), and then (12, 3) of a further modification of Valentinian doctrine by others "qui prudentiores putantur illorum esse." The whole concludes (12, 4) with an enumeration of the various opinions of the school concerning the Sôter. The statements made (12, 1) with regard to the school of Ptolemaeus do not agree with those of the main account, although in the preface to book i. he promises that special attention shall be paid to the doctrine of those περὶ Πτολεμαῖον. Of these later notices we may certainly conclude that such at least as referred to the personal teaching of Valentinus (c. 11, 1) were derived from some written source, and probably an older haeresiological work, on which may also have been based the statements in cc. 11 and 12, and some even of those that follow respecting Marcus and the Marcosians. Traces of such a work are plainly to be seen in one section of the first book (cc. 22-27) which is introduced (22, 2) with the words: "Quam sit igitur adversus omnes haereticos detectio atque convictio varia et multifaria, et nobis propositum est omnibus iis secundum ipsorum charactera contradicere, necessarium arbitrati sumus, prius referre fontem et radicem eorum, uti sublimissimum ipsorum Bythum cognoscens intelligas arborem de qua defluerunt tales fructus." After this introduction follow descriptions, more or less detailed, of the doctrines of Simon (23, 1-3), Menander (23, 4), Saturninus (24, 1 and 2), Basilides (24, 3-7), Carpocrates (25, 1-6), with a Roman local story of a certain Marcellina, who appeared in Rome during the episcopate of Anicetus, then further of Cerinthus (26, 1), the Ebionites (26, 2), the Nicolaitans (26, 3), Cerdon (27, 1) and Marcion (27, 2-4). He concludes with a promise to undertake the refutation of Marcion in a separate work ("sed huic quidem . . . seorsim contradicemus, ex ejus scriptis contradicentes ei"). A longish Appendix follows (cc. 28-31) introduced with the words: "ab his autem qui praedicti sunt, jam multae propagines multarum haeresum factae sunt." The first examples given of these propagines are the Encratites, whom Irenaeus regards as descendants of Saturninus and Marcion. Their founder is Tatian, a contemporary of Irenaeus, and formerly a disciple of Justin Martyr (28, 1). These are followed by antinomistic Gnostics whom Irenaeus derives from Basilides and Carpocrates (28, 2). The Appendix concludes (cc. 29-31) with a very detailed account (directly drawn from original sources) of the doctrine of the so-called Barbelioteae and various other Ophite sects, γνωστικοί in the narrower sense, whom Irenaeus regards as forerunners of the Valentinians (31, 3, comp. 11, 1), their Gnosis being of the popular type early prevalent in Syria. The whole section (cc. 28-31) is evidently an addition made by Irenaeus himself, whereas that which precedes it (cc. 23-27) is as evidently based on some older heresiology, a view more and more generally entertained since the appearance of my essay, Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius. At the same time it can hardly have been a mere literal transcript from the original work. In what is said for instance of the Carpocratians, Irenaeus refers to the συγγράμματα of the sect as if he had himself made use of them. In the section about Simon the original account (21, 1) appears to have been enlarged from a second authority (21, 2-3). Whether, further, what is said of the Ebionites (who appear to be hardly entitled to a place in a catalogue of Gnostic sects) was derived from an older haeresiology, seems to be very doubtful, and the same may be said of the account of the Nicolaitans, which attributes no special doctrines to that sect, but is simply based on a combination of Acts vi. 5 with Rev. ii. 6 and 13. Valentinus, on the other hand, could hardly have been omitted in the older haeresiology, and is only left out here because Irenaeus has already treated at length of him and of his school. In the Essay referred to I offered the hypothesis that the authority followed by Irenaeus may have been none other than the lost σύνταγμα of Justin Martyr κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γεγεννημένων αἱρέσεων (Justin. Apol. i. 26). Irenaeus himself on one occasion (iv. 6, 2) cites as Justin's σύνταγμα πρὸς Μαρκιῶνα. It is not improbable that these two συντάγματα may be one and the same work. As Irenæus's own work, while specially directed against the Valentinians, took notice by the way of other Gnostic sects and parties, so may Justin likewise, while chiefly combating the errors of Marcion as being the most formidable heretic of his time, have given also a brief account of various other contemporaneous sectarian opinions. A solution of this difficult question might be attainable if Justin's σύνταγμα had served as the original authority for any other haeresiological work besides that of Irenæus. And such in all probability was the case. The σύνταγμα of Hippolytus against all Heresies which we are enabled for the most part to reconstruct from the haeresiological works of Epiphanius and Philaster, and from the Libellus adversus Omnes Haereses appended to Tertullian's de Praescriptione, appears to go back in many instances to an original authority quite independent of Irenæus. In his preface, fragments of which have been preserved by Photius (Bibl. cod. 121), Hippolytus refers to the oral teaching of his great master Irenæus and not to his written work. A close comparison will prove however that he must have known and made use of this also. But for a whole series of sections the relation between the two haeresiological treatises is such that Irenæus cannot have been the original authority followed by Hippolytus; nay, passages occur in which the relation between the two works can only be explained on the assumption of their having used the same older written document. (Comp. my Quellen der ältesten Ketzergeschichte, p. 162 sqq.) This older work appears to have been specially made use of in the section about Valentinus: for it is just here that Hippolytus exhibits a remarkable series of contacts with the statements of Irenæus (i. 11, 1) concerning the doctrine of that heresiarch. But if it already contained similar accounts to those given by Irenæus (i. 11, 2 sqq. and i. 12) of the disciples of Valentinus, and the notice concerning Marcellina (i. 25, 6), this older document cannot have been identical with Justin's σύνταγμα, but must have been a later work of unknown authorship written in the time of Soter or in the first years of Eleutherus. Such an inference however is not necessary. Hippolytus may have been exclusively indebted to Irenæus for his knowledge of Marcellina, and of the disciples of Valentinus, as he enumerates them,—Ptolemaeus and Secundus, Heracleon, Marcus and Colarbasus; the last of these names is derived from a misunderstanding of a passage in Irenæus (Haer. i. 14, 1); the teaching attributed to Heracleon appears to be based on Haer. i. 11, 3, and that assigned to Ptolemaeus on Haer. i. 11, 5; though Heracleon is not named in the former passage, but evidently referred to as the Alius quidam qui et clarus est Magister (ἄλλος ἐπιφανὴς διδάσκαλος, while the alii (ἄλλοι) of the latter passage must be distinguished from the disciples of Ptolemaeus. Since then Hippolytus undoubtedly made some, though a slight, use of Irenæus, especially in the section respecting the Valentinians (Quellen der ältesten Ketzergeschichte, p. 166 sqq.; Lüdemann in the Literarisches Centralblatt, 1876, n. 11), the possibility remains that the notices in question were not to be found in the older heresiology. If such be the case my former hypothesis that this work was no other than the σύνταγμα of Justin Martyr retains a preponderating likelihood. (Comp. Lüdemann, l. c.) The series of heretics thus given would seem, from the statements of Irenæus and Hippolytus, to have been as follows: Simon Menander, Saturninus, Basilides, Carpocrates, Cerinthus, Valentinus, Cerdon, Marcion. The assumption is however not absolutely certain. Harnack (Zur Quellenkritik der Geschichte des Gnosticismus, Leipzig, 1873; comp. Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1874, p. 143 sqq.), after comparing the list of Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. H. E. iv. 22) with various passages in Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 26, 58; Dial. c. Tryph. 35), proposes another series: Simon, Menander, Marcion, Carpocrates, Valentinus, Basilides, Saturninus, which has in its favour the remarkable circumstance that the last three names, by an arrangement setting all chronology at defiance, appear ranked in the same order in Hegesippus as in the Dialogue with Trypho. This is not however by any means an irrefragable proof (comp. the arguments in my Quellen, &c., and those urged by Lüdemann). For whatever arrangement Justin may have made and followed of the names of the heresies which he was combating, the probability remains the same, that Irenæus knew and made use of his Syntagma (comp. also the passage v. 26, 2).

As to the other sources from which Irenæus may have derived his acquaintance with Gnostic opinions, two such have been conjectured for the information displayed in bks. iii.—v. concerning the details of Marcion's system, which along with that of the Valentinian is the heretical system most frequently referred to in that portion of his work. These two sources, as conjectured by Harnack (l. c. p. 56), were, first, Marcion's own writings; and secondly, a refutation of Marcion, composed by a presbyter of Asia Minor. But while it is true that Irenæus does repeatedly announce his intention to write a special refutation of Marcion's heresy (i. 27, 4; iii. 12, 12), this cannot be taken as a proof of his having already devoted particular attention to the canon and writings of Marcion. The numerous scattered notices concerning Marcion, contained in the later books of his great work, go seldom much beyond what had been already said in i. 27, 2 and 3. And though in that part of his fourth book to which Harnack refers Irenæus does actually give us a word-for-word report of what a venerable Asiatic presbyter had urged against Gnostic heresies, this may have been derived from oral communication, and is at any rate no proof that the presbyter in question had written a special treatise against Marcion. (Comp. Quellen der ält. Ketzergeschichte, p. 57.)

Of great interest would it be to obtain more exact impressions concerning those other presbyters to whose words and writings Irenæus makes frequent reference. Besides the "God-loving elder," from whom he borrows the lambic Senarii against Marcus, Irenæus cites on various occasions from "presbyters and disciples of the apostles;" under which title, besides Polycarp, bishop Papias of Hierapolis must certainly have been included. It is from the fourth book of Papias's Λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις that Irenæus cites the saying traditionally attributed to our Lord on the alleged testimony of the apostle

St. John concerning the glories of His millennial kingdom (v. 33, 3 sqq.). The citation is introduced with the words "Quemadmodum presbyteri meminerunt qui Joannem discipulum Domini viderunt," and is followed by ταῦτα δὲ καὶ Πάπιας Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δὲ ἑταῖρος γεγονώς, ἀρχαίως ἀνήρ, ἐγγράφως ἐπιμαρτυρεῖ ἐν τῇ τετάρτῃ τῶν ἐαντοῦ βιβλίων ἔστι γὰρ αὐτῷ πέντε βιβλία συντεταγμένα. From this mode of expression we might possibly infer that Irenæus was not quoting directly from Papias. But such an inference is contradicted by the words which immediately follow: "Et adjectit dicens: Haec autem credibilia sunt credentibus." The dicens here must be Papias himself. From the same work of Papias may have also been derived the citations at v. 5, 1, and v. 36, 1, in which Irenæus appeals in like manner to the πρεσβύτεροι τῶν ἀποστόλων μαθηταί (Lightfoot, Contemporary Review, 1875, Oct. p. 840 sqq.). Beside these venerable presbyters Irenæus makes repeated reference to an authority whom he designates as ὁ κρείττων ἡμῶν (i. praef.; i. 13, 3, comp. iii. 17, 4, "superior nobis"). Since reference is here obviously made to a personality well known to his readers, the conjecture is a natural one that Irenæus is alluding to his predecessor in the episcopate of Lyons, the martyred bishop Pothinus. The utterances quoted from this authority, with their vivid descriptions and exposures of Gnostic corruptions of Christian morals and doctrine, may have been solely derived from oral communications and personal intercourse. Pothinus may also be alluded to in lib. iv. praef. 2, "Quapropter hi qui ante nos fuerunt et quidem multo nobis meliores non tamen satis potuerunt contradicere his qui sunt a Valentino, quia ignorabant regulam ipsorum." But here again it is by no means certain that these words refer to a written work against the Valentinians. They may with equal propriety be understood of an oral polemic, in sermons or otherwise. Less likely would it seem that Pothinus can be meant by the "presbyter" from whom the long account is taken, lib. iv. 27-32 (Lightfoot, Cont. Rev. 1876, Aug. p. 416). Harnack concludes also that he must be different from the one mentioned previously, who, as he observes, is spoken of in terms of much higher commendation and esteem (Patres Apostolici, ii. 2, ed. ii. p. 106). In most of the other not infrequent appeals to the authority of "elders and disciples of apostles," there is nothing that compels us to assume a reference to any written works. Take, for example, Haer. ii. 22, 5, where we read that it was the unanimous testimony of the elders in Asia who had conversed with St. John, that he had always delivered to them that our Lord had reached an age of over forty years. (Compare further the collection of the fragments of these elders in Gebhardt and Harnack's Patres Apostolici, i. 2 ed. ii. p. 105 sqq., especially fragm. v. viii. ix. x. xii. xv.)

Of any use made by Irenæus of the writings of Polycarp there is no certain trace. This is the more remarkable considering the deep veneration in which Irenæus held his ancient teacher and the faithful remembrance in which he stored his oral utterances (Haer. iii. 3, 4, cf. Ep. ad Florin. ap. Euseb. v. 20). He knows indeed several writings of the bishop of Smyrna

(Ep. ad Florin. ap. Euseb.) and makes also special mention of Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians (Haer. iii. 3, 4). Of the works of Justin Martyr Irenæus knew and used—besides the Syntagma against all Heresies of which we have been speaking, and the possibly identical Syntagma against Marcion—the former of the two Apologies, without, however, making any citation from it (Quellen der ältesten Ketzergeschichte, p. 63). From which of Justin's works the Citation, v. 26, 2, is derived cannot be made out with certainty. Harnack's assumption that the line of argument adopted in bks. ii.-v. against Marcion, which in several points coincides with that of Tertullian's work, adv. Marcionem, i.-iii., was itself derived from Justin's Syntagma against Marcion, must be here left to itself.

With far greater confidence may we assume Irenæus to have used the Memoirs of Hegesippus (iii. 3, 3; 4, 3, comp. Quellen der ält. Ketzergesch. p. 73). Besides these he makes one occasional citation from the epistle of Ignatius to the Romans (v. 28, 4), but here again without mentioning his name.

Irenæus's great work is divided into five books. The first book contains a detailed account of the Valentinian system, together with a general view of the opinions of the other sects. The second book undertakes to exhibit the unreasonableness and self-contradiction of the doctrines of Valentinianism. The chief object of Irenæus here is to combat the doctrine of the Demiurge or Creator as a subordinate existence placed outside the Pleroma, of limited power and insight, and separated from the "Father" by an infinite chasm. At the same time he also controverts the Valentinian doctrine concerning the Pleroma and its antithesis the Kenoma, the theory of Emanations, of the Fall of Achamoth, and the formation of the lower world through the sufferings of the Sophia; and finally, at great length, of the Gnostic teaching concerning souls, and the distinction made between Psychici and Pneumatici. The third, fourth, and fifth books contain the refutation of Gnostic doctrines from Holy Scripture. This is preceded by a short dissertation on the sources of Christian truth. The one foundation of the faith is the gospel transmitted first by oral tradition and then subsequently committed to writing. The Gnostics, however, will allow neither the refutation of their doctrines out of Scripture, nor disproof from tradition. Against the one they appeal to a secret doctrine handed down among themselves, against the other to their own higher knowledge (gnosis). Irenæus meets them in the first place by stating the characteristics of genuine apostolic tradition, which at the same time ensures the right interpretation of Holy Scripture. The chief Media and transmitters of this tradition are the apostolic churches and their episcopal successions derived from the apostles themselves (Haer. iii. 1-4). He proceeds to give the proof from Scripture—first, as against the doctrine of the Demiurge and then against the Gnostic Christology. There is but one God, Creator of the world and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Son, the Eternal God-Logos, and has truly been made Flesh in order to redeem mankind from its fall in Adam. Under this head he combats the errors of both Docetæ and Ebionites; and then returning to his main purpose he attacks once more the chief Gnostic doctrine in a refutation of Marcion's attempt to distinguish between the Good God on the one hand and the Just or Judicial God on the other. This occupies him at the close of the third book.

The fourth book is directed against the same doctrine. Irenæus now attacks the distinction made between the lawgiver and the Father, shewing the identity of the divine revelation in the Old and New Testaments, the close connexion between law and gospel, and the typical pre-announcement of the New Testament in the Old. In conclusion he shews that eternal happiness or endless misery will befall men from the same God, as reward or as punishment for their own free choice of good or evil. Finally, the fifth book gives a detailed argument in proof of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body and of the millennial kingdom.

Of the other writings of Irenæus, fragments only, or bare names, have been preserved. Whether he ever carried out the intention, announced i. 27, 4 and iii. 12, 12, of writing a special treatise against Marcion, cannot be now determined with certainty. Eusebius in one place (H. E. v. 8) mentions this intention, and in another (H. E. iv. 25) simply reckons Irenæus, along with Philip of Gortyna and Modestus, among authors who had written against Marcion. Of his Epistle to Florinus, Eusebius has preserved a considerable fragment. FLORINUS was an older contemporary of Irenæus, and like him had once been a disciple of Polycarp. He was afterwards a presbyter at Rome, and was deposed, as it would seem, for heresy (Euseb. H. E. v. 15). The epistle of Irenæus, addressed to him, bore also, according to Eusebius (H. E. v. 20), the title, περὶ μοναρχίας ἢ περὶ τοῦ μὴ εἶναι τὸν Θεὸν ποιητὴν κακῶν. This implies that Florinus had adopted Gnostic opinions. The "God" whom he appears to have regarded as the author of evil was the Gnostic Demiurge. He afterwards, according to Eusebius, inclined to Valentinianism; whereupon Irenæus addressed him in another treatise, περὶ ὁμοδόδος, from which Eusebius quotes the concluding words, conjuring the copyists to make an accurate and faithful transcript of his words. The epistle, περὶ μοναρχίας, is regarded by Leimbach (Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie, 1873, p. 626 sq.) and Lightfoot (Contemp. Review, 1875, May, p. 834) as one of Irenæus's earliest writings. Leimbach would date it between A.D. 163 and A.D. 177. But his arguments are trivial; first, he thinks that the reminiscences of Polycarp's teaching make an impression of having been written at a time when his martyrdom had recently taken place; secondly, that the expression οἱ πρὸ ἡμῶν πρεσβύτεροι οἱ καὶ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις συμφωτισθέντες naturally suggests that Irenæus was himself no more than a presbyter when he made use of it. But, Leimbach's "impression" notwithstanding, the epistle was certainly written some considerable time after Polycarp's death; for, as we have seen, Polycarp was already an aged man when Irenæus became his youthful disciple; and in this epistle, Irenæus looks back on his time of youth as one that has long since passed away, and is now far behind him. The date, moreover, of Polycarp's martyrdom is not as Leimbach still assumes, the year A.D. 167, but either 155 or 156. The second argument is a still more trivial one. Leimbach can have made but small acquaintance with the writings of Irenæus, if he imagines that the term πρεσβύτερος constituted for him an antithesis to ἐπίσκοπος. It is just a characteristic feature of his style and mode of expression that this antithesis was for him as yet unknown. Of far greater importance is Lightfoot's argument that the treatise περὶ ὁμοδόδος was probably written before the great work Against Heresies, inasmuch as its detailed treatment of the Valentinian system would have made a special tractate on the Ogdoad superfluous. And had we no other information on the subject we might have been content to draw such an inference. But Lightfoot seems to have overlooked the fragmentary portion of an epistle to Victor of Rome, preserved among the Syriac fragments of Irenæus (fragm. xxviii. ap. Harvey, ii. p. 457), which is introduced with the words: "And Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, to Victor, bishop of Rome, concerning Florinus, a presbyter who was a partisan of the error of Valentinus, and published an abominable book, thus wrote:" whereupon follows the fragment itself, thus rendered in the Latin version: "Nunc autem quia forte vos lateat libri eorum, qui etiam ad nos usque pervenerunt, notum facio vobis, ut pro vestra dignitate ejiciatis e medio scripta illa opprobrium quidem afferentia in vos, quia scriptor jactaverit se unum esse e vobis. Offendiculo enim sunt multis, simpliciter et nulla facta quaestione recipientibus tanquam a presbytero blasphemiam qua Deum afficiunt. Considerate enim horum scriptorem ut per ea non tantum asseclis noceat, mentem paratis in blasphemias adversus Deum, sed et nostros laedat, quia per libros ejus falsa dogmata de Deo in mentes eorum injicit." From the words with which this fragment is introduced it appears that the epistle from which it is taken could not have been written till after the first three books of the work Against Heresies, probably not till after the completion of the whole work, and, at the earliest, about A.D. 190. Now it is indeed probable that the tract περὶ ὁμοδόδος was written some time before this epistle was addressed to Victor, for we may surely assume the likelihood of Irenæus having addressed himself personally in the way of remonstrance to a former friend and associate, before calling on the bishop of Rome to take measures against him. But on the other hand it is not likely that any considerable period intervened between the two writings, and we may assume it therefore as most probable that the περὶ ὁμοδόδος was also written in Victor's time, and therefore after the work Against Heresies. And herewith resolves itself the proof likewise of an early date for Irenæus's former writing addressed to Florinus, the περὶ μοναρχίας. From the Syriac fragment of the letter to Victor it appears that Florinus was still a member of the Roman presbytery when that letter was written. For even though the antithesis of "assecclae Florini" and "nostri" might seem to favour a contrary assumption, it is quite evident from the words preceding that Florinus was still in reality a presbyter of the church of Rome. And this confirms the statement of Eusebius that Florinus was deposed at the same time with Blastus from the Roman presbytery: οἱ δ' ἐπὶ Πάμης ἤκειον, ὦν ἡγείτο Φλωρίνος, πρεσβυτερίου τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀποπεσών, Βλάστος τε σὺν τούτῳ παραπλησίῳ πτώματι κατεσχημένος (H. E. v. 15). If Eusebius meant by this to reckon Florinus among the Montanists of Rome, he would be guilty of an error which his own words further on (v. 20) would make manifest. But, as it is, he goes on to say: οἱ καὶ πλείους τῆς ἐκκλησίας περιέλκοντες ἐπὶ σφῶν ὑπῆγον βούλημα, θάτερος ἰδίως περὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν νεωτερίζειν πειρώμενος. So then he clearly makes a distinction between the error peculiar to Florinus and that of Blastus. And the error of Florinus was, according to H. E. v. 20, nothing more nor less than his Gnosticism. Neither have we in any case the right to throw doubt upon the contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous deposition of the two men; and certain it is that the schism of Blastus, of which we shall have to speak presently, and which also gave occasion for Irenæus to raise a protesting voice, took place during the episcopate of Victor. The Syriac fragment quoted above mentions only writings of Florinus as containing "blasphemies against God," wherewith agrees the purpose of Irenæus's first work, addressed to Florinus, as designated by its title, to maintain the divine monarchy, and to prove that God, i. e. the Creator, was not the author of evil. It remains therefore quite possible that the epistle to Victor may have been written soon after the tractate περὶ μοναρχίας. The designation of Florinus in the introductory words to the fragment as "a partisan of the error of Valentinus," is not inconsistent with this assumption, nor again is the statement of Eusebius, that he afterwards attached himself to the false doctrines of the Valentinians, a convincing proof to the contrary, inasmuch as this appears to have been merely an inference drawn by Eusebius from the titles of the two treatises written by Irenæus against him (Ταύτης γὰρ τοι τῆς γνώμης—that the Creator was the author of evil—οὗτος ἐδόκει προσσπεῖν δι' ἐν αὐτῷ ὑποσυρόμενον τῇ κατὰ Οὐαλεντίνου πλάνῃ καὶ τὸ περὶ ὀγδοάδος συντάττεται τῷ Εἰρηναίῳ σπούδασμα). It is not likely that the controversy with Florinus should have dragged on through a period of twenty years, and quite as incredible that Florinus should have remained a member of the Roman presbytery after openly embracing the Gnostic distinction between the highest God and the Demiurge, and advocating the doctrine rarely found among heretics themselves, that the Demiurge was the author of evil: I am therefore of opinion that both writings against Florinus appeared in Victor's time, and not long one after the other. The motive for their publication was, as we learn from the Syriac fragment, the appearance of heretical books, of which Florinus was the author. One of these probably set forth his doctrine of the Demiurge, and another that of the Ogdoad. How it came to pass that Victor's first intelligence as to the heretical writings of one of his own presbyters should be derived from Irenæus we are not informed. The books may have been written in Asia Minor before Florinus removed to Rome, and obtained admission to the Roman presbytery. But this would make it doubly probable that Irenæus would lose no time in calling Victor's attention to his heretical opinions, and would therefore be in favour of a later not an earlier date for the writings against Florinus. The tractate περὶ ὀγδοάδος is also mentioned in the introductory words of a Syriac fragment of the passage Haer. i. 9, 3 (Fragm. iii. ap. Harvey vol. ii. p. 434). It is possible also that Fragm. Graec. viii. (ap. Harvey, ii. 479, comp. Fragm. Syr. xxv. ap. Harvey, ii. 454), and Fragm. Graec. xliii. (ap. Harvey, ii. 509), were taken from it. The first of these (Fragm. Graec. viii.), which is cited by Leontius under the title Εἰρηναίου ἐπισκόπου Λουγδούνων, is found also in a Paris manuscript (Bibl. Nat. Cois. 2951) with this inscription—Εἰρηναίου ἐπισκόπου Λουγδούνων τῆς Γαλλίας κατὰ Βαλεντίνου—from which it appears that the original work must have been directed against the Valentinian doctrines. The Syriac text is in part more comprehensive.

If Eusebius is right in making the deposition of the Roman presbyter Blastus contemporaneous with that of Florinus, the epistle addressed to the former by Irenæus and entitled περὶ σχίσματος (Euseb. H. E. v. 20) must also belong to the same period. Blastus was, according to Eusebius, the head of the Roman Montanists (H. E. v. 15)—comp. also Pacianus Epist. ad Hymproniam. c. 1—and, according to Pseudo-Tertullian (Libell. adv. Omn. Haereses, 22), a Quarto-deciman. Both accounts are probably correct. With regard to the Montanists of Asia Minor we know that (in accordance with the custom prevalent among the Christians of that country) they kept Easter on the 14th day of Nisan (comp. Schwegler, Montanismus, p. 251); it is therefore quite credible that Blastus, as a Montanist, may have conformed to the Quarto-deciman practice, and, as a member of the Roman presbytery, may have sought to introduce it into the imperial city. But if Blastus be the one referred to in another Syriac Fragment (Fragm. xxvii. ap. Harvey, ii. 456), he certainly was not an Asiatic but an Alexandrian; and on this supposition his Quarto-decimanism must have grown out of his close connexion with the Montanists of Asia Minor, since the paschal calendar of the Alexandrine church was the same as that of Rome. One can moreover quite understand bishop Victor's responding to any attempt on Blastus's part to create a schism in the Roman church by introducing the Asiatic custom, with deposition from the presbyteral office. Such a breach of discipline in his own diocese (the actual spectacle of some Roman Christians keeping Easter with the Asiatics on the 14th Nisan, and in opposition to the ancestral custom of the bishops of Rome) will have naturally excited him to uncompromising harshness towards the brethren of Asia Minor generally; so that on these refusing to conform at his demand to the Roman custom, he at once cut off the churches of the Asiatic province and the neighbouring dioceses from his church-communion (see an article of mine on this subject in the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1866, p. 192 sq. and Chronologie der röm. Bischöfe, p. 174). These ecclesiastical troubles moved the man of peace, Irenæus, to address letters of remonstrance on the one hand to Blastus, and on the other to bishop Victor. To the former of these, which according to Eusebius bore the title of περὶ σχίσματος, may possibly be assigned a Syriac fragment (xxvii. ap. Harvey, ii. 456), which is introduced with the following words:—"Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, who was a contemporary of Polycarp, disciple of the apostle, bishop of Smyrna and martyr, and for this reason is held in just estimation, wrote to an Alexandrian to the effect that it is right, with respect to the Feast of the Resurrection, that we should celebrate it upon the first day of the week." But inasmuch as we know from Eusebius (H. E. v. 24) that Irenæus wrote on the same subject to several persons, it is also quite possible that this Alexandrian may have been a different man from Blastus. The actual wording of the fragment gives no special support to either hypothesis. Of the letter to Victor Eusebius has preserved a considerable extract (H. E. v. 24). From this it appears that the controversies of that time regarded not merely the time of the Easter Festival, but also the mode and duration of the antecedent Paschal fast. Some kept one day, others two days, others several days; and some again reckoned their fast-day at forty hours of day and night (οἱ δὲ τεσσαράκοντα ὥρας ἡμερίδας τε καὶ νυκτερίδας συμμετροῦσι τὴν ἡμέραν αὐτῶν). The interpretation which supplies ἡμέρας and places a colon after τεσσαράκοντα is against the construction of the sentence, and yields no intelligible sense. But these differences of practice notwithstanding, resting as they do on ancient custom — so Irenæus proceeds to say — the church's peace and unity of faith have never yet been disturbed thereby. For although former bishops of Rome, from Xystus to Soter, had never kept the 14th of Nisan, yet had they always maintained full church communion with any who might come from other dioceses where the 14th of Nisan was observed. When Polycarp, for instance, visited Rome in the time of Anicetus, they retained each his own traditional custom without breach of ecclesiastical unity, Anicetus permitting Polycarp to celebrate the Eucharist in his own church, and both separating afterwards in peace. No title is given by Eusebius to this epistle, but according to the Quæstiones et Responsa ad Orthodoxos of Pseudo-Justin (c. 115) it was at one time entitled περὶ τοῦ Πάσχα (comp. Fragm. Græc. vii. ap. Harvey, ii. 478). From the same work Pseudo-Justin gives us the further information that the old Christian custom to refrain from kneeling on Easter Day, as a sign of Christ's resurrection, whereby we were delivered from sin and death, is carried back by Irenæus to apostolic times, and that he also noted the continued observance of the custom through the season of Pentecost, inasmuch as the whole period (of fifty days after Easter) was regarded as equal to Easter Day itself. To this epistle we may also assign the words quoted by Maximus (Sermo vii. De Eleemos.) as an extract ἐκ τῆς πρὸς Βλίκτωρα ἐπιστολῆς, the sentiment of which seems better suited to the peace-making purpose of the περὶ τοῦ Πάσχα than to the controversial character of the other writing, the περὶ τοῦ σχίσματος, to which Harvey would assign it (Fragm. Græc. v. ap. Harvey, ii. 477; and Fragm. Syr. xxviii. p. 456, note). From another writing of Irenæus, belonging to the same controversial cycle (but whether from the epistle to Blastus or from this to Victor we cannot say), the third fragment, published by Pfaff, appears to have been taken (Fragm. Græc. xxxvii. ap. Harvey, ii. 505).

Of the other writings of Irenæus Eusebius mentions (H. E. v. 26) a short tractate, πρὸς Ἑλληνας, which bore also the title περὶ ἐπιστήμης, an ἐπίδειξις τοῦ ἀποστολικοῦ κηρύγματος, addressed to a certain Marcian, and a βιβλίον διαλέξεων διαφόρων, in which he is said to have cited the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Wisdom of Solomon. Jerome, who seems to be here simply copying Eusebius, makes, however, a distinction (de Vir. Illustr. 35) between the λόγος πρὸς Ἑλληνας and the περὶ ἐπιστήμης (scripsit . . . contra Gentes volumen breve et de Disciplina aliud). Harvey consequently assumes that in our text of Eusebius an ἄλλος τε must have fallen out before περὶ ἐπιστήμης (vol. i. p. clxvi.). Besides this he alludes to a Syriac fragment which mentions the περὶ ἐπιστήμης, and from which it would appear that that work was a refutation not of Pagan, but of Gnostic, and especially of Valentinian heresy. As I cannot find the fragment alluded to in Harvey's collection, I am unable to judge of the correctness of his theory. To this same treatise, περὶ ἐπιστήμης, Harvey would also assign a Greek fragment published by Combefis (ap. Harv. Fr. Græc. xxiv. ii. 491) and the first of the Pflavian Fragments (ap. Harv. Fragm. Græc. xxxv. ii. 498). The tractate of Apostolical Preaching addressed to Marcian appears to have been a catechetical work on the Rule of Faith. Harvey conjectures that two fragments given in Latin by Feuarentius (Fr. Græc. v. and vi. ap. Harvey, ii. 477, 478), and the second and fourth of the Pflavian fragments (Fr. Græc. xxxvi. and xxxviii. ap. Harvey, ii. 500 sqq. and 506) may have been taken from this work. But the first of these fragments of Feuarentius has been preserved in the original Greek by Maximus, who assigns it apparently to another work, λόγος περὶ πίστεως, addressed to Demetrius, a deacon of Vienne. This treatise began, according to Maximus, with the words (ζητῶν τὸν Θεὸν ἀκούε τοῦ Δαβὶδ λέγοντος). The tractate περὶ πίστεως is not mentioned elsewhere. The last work of Irenæus, named both by Eusebius and Jerome the βιβλίον διαλέξεων διαφόρων, appears, in accordance with the usage of those early times as to the word διαλέξεις (comp. Harvey, i. p. clxvii. sqq.), to have been a collection of homilies on various texts of Scripture. Rufinus incorrectly renders διαλέξεις by Dialogus and Jerome by Tractatus. In a MS. of the Parallela of Joannes Damascenus is found, with the inscription τοῦ ἁγίου Εἰρηναίου ἐκ τῶν Διλέξεων (i. διαλέξεων), the noble saying first published by Halloix (Vita Irenæi, p. 504): τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Χριστιανοῦ οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἐστὶν ἢ μελετᾶν ἀποθνήσκειν (Harvey, ii. 480). From these homilies were probably taken the numerous Greek fragments found in various catenæ, and containing expositions of various passages of the Pentateuch and the historical books of the Old Testament and also of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke (Fr. Græc. xv.-xxiii. xxv.-xxix. xxxi. xxxiii. xxxiv., xxxix., xl., xlii.-xlvii.); as well as the Syriac fragment of an exposition of the Song of Solomon (Fr. Syr. xxvi. ap. Harvey, ii. 455), and the Armenian homily on the Sons of Zebedee (Fr. Syr. xxxii. ap. Harvey, ii. 464 sqq.). To the same collection will have also belonged a tractate on the History of Elkanah and Samuel, which is mentioned in a Syriac manuscript (Harvey, ii. 507 note). Some other titles of lost works of Irenæus are found mentioned in the fragments. Beside the above-mentioned λόγος περί πίστεως addressed to Demetrius, is found in an Armenian MS. the fragment of a work De Resurrectione Domini, attributed to Irenæus, which is also preserved in the Syriac, though in a briefer form (Fr. Syr. xxx. and xxxi. ap. Harvey, ii. 460 sqq.). This De Resurrectione may, as Harvey conjectures, be the same work as the περί τοῦ Πάσχα. To it he would likewise assign the Greek fragments IX. and X. first extracted by Halloix from the Parallele of Joh. Damascenus (Harvey, ii. 480) as well as the fourth Pflaffian fragment (Fr. Græc. xxxviii.). But fragment X. may have been taken from the περί μοναρχίας, and fragment xxxviii., as Pflaff conjectured, either from the διαλέξεις διάφοροι or the work addressed to Marcian. Another Greek fragment, first edited by Grabe, bears the epigraph: ἐξ ἑτέρου βιβλίου Εἰρηναίου συγγράφους περί τοῦ μὴ εἶναι ἀγέννητον τὴν ἑλνν. This, Harvey is disposed to assign to a tractate περί τοῦ παντός, of which some (according to Photius, Bibl. Cod. 48) regarded Irenæus as the author (vid. Harvey, i. p. clxx.), but which may with greater probability be assigned to Hippolytus. Another fragment, first printed by Massuet, which treats of the History of the Fall (Fr. Græc. xiv. ap. Harvey, ii. 483 sqq.), is found in the Contemplationes Anagogicæ, upon the Hexaëmeron attributed to Anastasius Sinaita. The writer introduces his quotation with the words: φάσκει γὰρ (viz. Irenæus), κατὰ τῆς τῶν μαρτῶν Ὁφίων ἀίρεσιον ὀπιζόμενος. But the fragment itself has nothing at all to do with the Ophites, and must, if genuine, have formed a portion of the διαλέξεις διάφοροι. Yet another fragment, first edited by Münter (Fr. Græc. xli. ap. Harvey, ii. p. 508), bears the superscription τοῦ ἁγίου Εἰρηναίου ἐκ τῶν διατάξεων. It consists of the saying: εἰ μὲν λέγοντες αἰετὸς ἀξίους, κακῶς δὲ οὐδέποτε τοὺς ἀναξίους τευζόμεθα καὶ ἡμεῖς τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δόξης καὶ βασιλείας. Collections of such διδαχαὶ or διατάξεις are met with under the names of various early ecclesiastical writers. But perhaps we should here read διαλέξεων instead of διατάξεων. Finally, in the introductory words of Fr. Græc. xliii. (ap. Harvey, ii. 482 n.) preserved by Oecumenius, on 1 Pet. iii. (p. 198), we find what may be regarded as the title of another work of Irenæus, περί Σάγκτου καὶ Βλανδίνης τῶν μαρτῶρων. The words which follow, though apparently announcing themselves as an extract from such a work, may really have been derived from the statements contained in the well-known epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne. The fourth of the fragments extracted by Halloix from Johannes Damascenus (Fr. Græc. xli. ap. Harvey, ii. 481) is of anti-Gnostic purpose, and treats of the Resurrection of the Body; while the Syriac fragment (xxix. ap. Harvey, ii. 458), first published by Pitra (Spicileg. Solesm. i. p. 6), appears to be directed against Docetic doctrines. The genuineness of most of these pieces is not impugned from any quarter, though in some cases it might be difficult to establish. An exception to this remark must be made in reference to the four fragments (Fr. Græc. ap.

Harvey, xxxv.—xxxviii.) published by Ch. M. Pflaff from manuscript Catenæ in the Library of Turin, which soon afterwards disappeared. The genuineness of these Pflaffian fragments had been doubted by Scipio Maffei and others. These doubts were raised chiefly, it would seem, on dogmatic grounds, but the genuineness of the second fragment, which treats of the doctrine of the Holy Communion, appears subject to question for purely critical reasons also. The only undoubtedly genuine of these Pflaffian fragments is the third (Fr. Græc. xxxvii.).

III. The Theology of Irenæus, and his Influence on the Ecclesiastical Developments of his Time.—Irenæus, along with Tertullian, Hippolytus, Cyprian, on the one side, and Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen on the other, was one of the main founders of the ancient Catholic church, as it rose, amid conflicts with Gnosticism and Montanism, out of the church of the post-apostolic era. It would be a mistake to follow Baur and the Tübingen school in explaining the development of primitive Catholic Christianity as the fruit of a compromise effected by the Pauline and Petrine parties soon after the middle of the 2nd century as a means of overcoming the new opposition. The earliest post-apostolic form of Christianity was itself no mere product of the conflicting antitheses of the apostolic time, or of their reconciliation. The Jewish-Christian communities of Palestine and Syria formed, even towards the end of the 1st century, but a small and vanishing minority in relation to the swelling dimensions of the Gentile church. That to some extent Jewish-Christian influences did operate upon Gentile Christianity during the former half of the 2nd century is not wholly to be denied; and yet the one feature in which we are most tempted to trace them—the conception of the gospel as a new law—is quite as much the outcome of an internal development within the Gentile church itself. The ultimate triumph of Christian universalism, and the recognised equality between Jewish and Gentile members of the church of the Messiah, was a fruit of the life-long labours of St. Paul. The new Christian community, including as it did a large majority of Gentile members, regarded itself as the true people of God, as the spiritual Israel, and as the genuine heir of the church of the Old Testament, while the great mass of Jewish unbelievers were, as a penalty for their rejection of the true Messiah, excluded from the blessings of the kingdom of God. To this new spiritual Israel were speedily, in part at least, transferred the forms of the Old Testament theocracy, and all the Jewish Scriptures were received as divinely inspired documents by the new church. But, whereas St. Paul had emphasized the antithesis between law and gospel, the Gentile churches after his time attached themselves more closely to the doctrinal norm of the older apostles, and laid stress on the continued validity of the law for Christians; though, seeing it was impossible to bind Gentiles to observe the ceremonial law, it was sought to give its precepts after the example of the Jewish religious philosophy of Alexandria a spiritual interpretation. Already, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, do we find the relations between Old and New Testament viewed under the aspect of Type and Anti-type, Prophecy and Fulfilment. The later Gentile Christianity learned to see everywhere in the Old Testament types of the gospel revelation, and secured thereby the means of combining freedom from the Mosaic ceremonial law with the maintenance of the entire continuity in all respects of the Old and New Testament revelation. The Moral Law, as the centre and substance of the Mosaic revelation, remained the obligatory norm of conduct for Gentile Christians; Christ had not abrogated the law of Moses, but fulfilled and completed it. The Gentile Christianity of the post-apostolic era is, in comparison with the far deeper theology of St. Paul, deficient in specially Christian thoughts, retaining and expressing them in a poor and outward way. Even writers like Clemens Romanus, who carefully and professedly attached themselves to the person and teaching of St. Paul, shew an imperfect understanding of his characteristic doctrines. Instead of genuine Pauline thought, we have in the whole literature of the post-apostolic period the same simple type of doctrine. The theological learning of the time confines itself almost exclusively to a typological interpretation of the Old Testament. So much the greater, on the other hand, is the influence exercised upon these writers by the heathen philosophic culture of the time. On the Apologists, for instance, of the middle portion of the 2nd century—a Justin, a Tatian, a Theophilus, an Athenagoras—this influence appears to have operated with special force. Without attaching himself to any particular school of philosophy, Justin Martyr is nevertheless making constant endeavours to comprehend Christianity under the then generally accepted forms of philosophical speculation, and to commend it as a manifestation of the highest reason to the cultured minds of his time. In this way he became the first founder of a Catholic system of theology. The doctrine of the Divine Logos as the "Second God," the Mediator through Whom all divine revelation is transmitted, is already made use of by Justin as an apologetic weapon, and remains from his time onwards a standing basis for the philosophical defence of Christianity. And this very doctrine of the Logos approved itself in after times as the strongest weapon in the church's armoury in the conflict with Gnostic opinions.

The widespread appearance of the manifold forms of Gnosticism in the 2nd century is a most significant proof of the far-reaching influence exercised by pagan thought and speculation on the Gentile church of that age. The danger which now threatened Christianity from the influx on all sides of foreign thought was all the greater because the Gentile churches of the time had yet but a feeble comprehension of the ideas specially belonging to Christianity. It was in fact the conflict with Gnosticism which gradually reawakened and gave fresh vigour to such ideas in Christian minds, inaugurating that revival of fundamental Christian and Pauline thought which distinguishes the theology of Irenaeus and of the other early "Catholic" doctors at the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd century from the simpler and poorer view of Christian truth presented in the works of the early Apologists.

The perils with which the Gnostic speculation menaced the Christian system were, on the one hand, concerned with that which formed a common groundwork for Christianity and Judaism; i.e. first and specially the Monotheistic principle itself, and then the doctrines of Divine Justice, of the Freedom of the Will, and of Future Retribution; on the other hand, they had regard to the traditions peculiar to Christianity concerning the historical person and work of Jesus Christ, the genuine human realism of His life and sufferings, the universal application of His redeeming work to all believers, and, lastly, the external and historical character of that final restitution to which Christians looked forward. The Monotheistic idea, the divine μοναρχία, was assailed by the Gnostic doctrine of the Demiurge, the Pleroma, and the series of Aeons; and the universally accepted doctrine of our Lord's Incarnation and Messiahship by the various forms of Gnostic doctism. Further, the whole ethical basis of Christian religion was destroyed by the distinctions which the Gnostic teachers' made between two or three separate races of mankind, and by their view of redemption as a purely theoretical process, or as the impartation of true knowledge (gnosis) to those only, who by their own originally pneumatic nature had from the beginning of the world been predestined to reception into the heavenly realm of light. In the place of the Christian doctrine of Freewill, and consequent responsibility, came that of an iron heathenish metaphysical Necessity, by which the fortunes of men are arbitrarily determined; in the place of a future divine recompense according to the measure of faith and works, came a one-sided over-estimation of mere knowledge as the one condition of ultimate salvation; in the place of the original Christian notion of the final consummation as consisting in a series of great outward visible occurrences, the resurrection of the flesh, a day of final judgment, and the setting up on earth of a millennial kingdom, came the spiritualistic conception of a saving deliverance of pneumatic souls and their translation into the upper world; whereas for the Psychici was reserved only a limited share in such knowledge and salvation, and for the material ("hylic" or "choic") man, and, so likewise for the earthly bodies of men, in general nothing but an ultimate and complete annihilation.

It cannot be denied that both the Gentile Christianity of that era, and the Catholic theology of following times, took up and appropriated various elements nearly related to these Gnostic speculations. Alongside of that heretical gnosis appeared a Catholic gnosis also, which differed essentially from the former in its endeavour and determination to maintain unimpaired the received foundations of Christian faith. Yet, in truth, the idealistic speculations of the Alexandrine school were separated from those of the heretical gnosis by very uncertain lines of demarcation, as they were afterwards, in some essential points, rejected by the church. But Irenaeus, in contradistinction to the Alexandrine doctors, appears to have been much less desirous of setting up a Catholic in opposition to the heretical Gnosis, than to secure the foundations of the common Christian faith by strengthening the bands of existing church unity. He does indeed recognise the existence of certain subjects which, as lying outside the rule of faith delivered to all, might be safely entrusted to the deeper and more searching meditations and inquiries of the more enlightened. But these related only to such questions as concern a clearer understanding of the details of the history of divine revelation, the right interpretation of parables, insight into the divine plan of human salvation (why God should bear with such long-suffering the apostasy of angels and the disobedience of man at the Fall), the differences and unity of the two Testaments, the necessity for the Incarnation of the Logos, the second coming of Christ at the end of time, the conversion of the heathen, the resurrection of the body, &c. (Haer. i. 10, 3). These are indeed for the most part such questions as would arise in the course of the Gnostic controversy; but the form in which Irenæus presents them assumes everywhere a clear antithesis to Gnostic speculation, and a firm retention of the Catholic rule of faith. Only in quite an isolated form is once named the question why one and the same God should have created the temporal and the eternal, the earthly and the heavenly; while Irenæus insists all the more strongly on the narrow bounds within which human knowledge and insight are confined, and on the impossibility for mortal man to know the reasons for everything (ii. 25, 3; 28, 1), and is never weary of chastising the arrogant presumption of the would-be Pneumatici who dare to exalt themselves above the Creator, while notwithstanding their own impotence in the presence of His works is manifest to all (ii. 30, 1 sqq.). In opposition to these Gnostic pretences he says:—

“Ἄμεινον καὶ συμφορότερον, ἰδιώτας καὶ ὀλιγομαθεῖς ὑπάρχειν, καὶ διὰ τῆς ἀγάπης πλησίον γενέσθαι τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἢ πολυμαθεῖς καὶ ἐμπείρους δοκοῦντας εἶναι, βλασφήμους εἰς τὸν ἑαυτῶν εὐρίσκεσθαι δεσπότην (ii. 26, 1).

The theoretical refutation of Gnostic opinions, as contained for instance in the second book, is full of acute remarks. His main purpose is to repel the Gnostic assault on the divine monarchy. He shews that by the separation of the Creator from the highest God, the absolute being of God Himself is denied. Neither above nor beside the Creator Himself can there be any other principle, for so God Himself would cease to be the all-embracing Pleroma, and being limited from without would cease to be infinite. And so again, if the Pleroma be separated from all beneath it by an immeasurable discrepancy, a third principle is introduced, which limits the other two, and is greater than both, and the questions concerning the limiting and the limited become boundlessly insoluble. Similar arguments are urged by Irenæus against the doctrine of creative Angels. If their creative energies are thought of as independent of the Godhead, God Himself ceases to be God; if as dependent upon Him then is He represented as standing in need of inferior assistants. Against the assumption of a vacuum (κένωμα, σκιά κενώματος) outside the divine Pleroma, he remarks that, if the world be thought of as produced out of this void and formless substratum without the knowledge of the προπατόρ, then the attribute of omniscience is denied Him. Nor can it be explained why for such endless times He should have left that space thus empty. Again, if God did actually beforehand form this lower world for Himself in thought, then was He its real creator. And in that case its mutability and transient duration must have been fore-willed by the Father Himself, and not be due to any defect or ignorance on the part of an inferior maker. The origin of the κένωμα also is incomprehensible. If it be an emanation from the divine Pleroma, that Pleroma itself must be burdened with emptiness and imperfection. If on the other hand, it be self-originated, it is really as absolute as the Father of all Himself. Such a defect, again, in the Pleroma, like a spot on a garment, would have been at once removed, in the very beginning, had the divine Father been able to remove it; if otherwise, the blame of letting it remain so long must fall upon Him, and He will have to be accounted, like the heathen Jupiter, repentant over His own ways. Nay, if He was unable to remove this defect in the beginning, He cannot be able to remove it now. The imperfection of this lower world leads back then to the conclusion that there must have been something void or formless, dark or disorderly, an element of error or infirmity in the Father Himself or in His Pleroma. The like thought recurs in the further argument that the temporal and transient could not have been made after the image of the unchangeable and eternal without introducing into it an alien element of mutability. The image must be like its prototype, and not opposed to it, and therefore the earthly material composite cannot be the image of that which is spiritual without drawing down the spiritual into its own sphere of materialism. The same objection is made to the notion that the corporeal may be an image or shadow of the spiritual world. It is only something corporeal that can cast a shadow. Again if it be maintained that the Creator could not make the world out of Himself, but only after a foreign archetype, the same must be true of the divine Father. He also must have derived, from some other source, the archetype of that higher world of which He was the maker, and so on. The question about type and archetype would thus be drawn out into infinity (ii. 1–8). But inasmuch as we must stop at some original at last, it is far more reasonable to believe that the Creator and the One only God are one and the same (ii. 16, 1 sqq.).

It is in the interest of the same great principle, the assertion of the absolute divine Perfection and Unity, that Irenæus controverts the Valentinian doctrine of the Aeons. Besides noting the arbitrary way in which the Pleroma is made to consist of thirty Aeons neither more nor less (ii. 12, 1; 15, 1; 16, 1) he finds fault with the anthropomorphic conceptions which underlie the whole theory of emanations. The single circumstance that the Propator Himself is reckoned as an Aeon, the un-emanate, unborn, illimitable, formless One placed in the same class with emanations and births and limitations and forms, is to destroy the absolute perfection of the divine Nature (ii. 12, 1). And then again the separation from the Godhead of its own indivisible elements, the conception of the divine Ἐνοια, the divine Νοῦς, the divine Λόγος, &c., as so many hypostases, which in various stages have issued from its bosom, is an unwarrantable transfer of human passions and affections to the divine, which on the contrary is all Ἐνοια, all

Noûs, all Λόγος, and knows of no such division from itself (ii. 13). And if these hypostases are thought of as each entirely outside and apart from the Godhead, then must they each and all share in the divine perfection, without any diminution or inequality (ii. 13, 6). He subjects also to acute criticism the way and manner in which each of these Aeons is supposed to have been produced: was it without substantial separation, as the ray proceeding from the sun, or was it hypostatical, as one human being is personally distinct from all others, or was it in the way of organic growth, as the branch springs out of the tree? Then again he asks with regard to these emanations whether they are all of the same substance with those from which they proceed, and contemporaneous with them, or whether they have come forth in different stages? and finally, whether they are all simple and alike, as spirits and lights, or composite and corporeal and of various forms? (ii. 17, 1 sqq.). Irenaeus insists, in fact, on carrying out to their literal consequences the mythological conceptions, according to which the Valentinian Aeons were regarded as so many distinct personalities, produced according to human analogy among themselves, and he offers the alternative, that they must either be like their original Parent the Father, and therefore impassible as He is (in which case there could be no suffering Aeon like the Valentinian Sophia), or different from Him in substance and capable of suffering, upon which the question arises, how such differences of substance could come to exist in the unchangeable Pleroma. Moreover all these personal differences and limitations, variations of form and characteristics, imply corporeal properties in the Aeons, which are quite inconsistent with the pure spirituality attributed to the Pleroma. And if again they proceed one from another as light from light, or the flame of one torch kindled from that of another torch, then must they be of like or the same substance, and the only difference between them would be the various points of time at which they have been kindled (ii. 17, 3 sqq.). But the main thought to which Irenaeus is continually returning, is that to affirm any imperfection within the Pleroma, such as the ignorance of the Father attributed to the Aeons which emanate from Bythus, or the sufferings of the Aeon Sophia (due again to ignorance), is simply to drag down the whole Pleroma and the Propator Himself into a common fellowship of suffering (ii. 17, 5 sqq.).

It is evident that so acute and striking a polemic as Irenaeus is here conducting against the polytheistic elements of Gnosticism must have equally subserved the interests of philosophy by its maintenance of the absolute character of the divine idea, and those of religion by its assertion of the divine monarchy. That the philosophic culture requisite for the conduct of such a mode of controversy, must have been drawn directly or indirectly from the schools of Gentile philosophy is a fact that by no means proves that Irenaeus and the Christian teachers of Alexandria, who were in full agreement with him, were under the influences of merely pagan thought. For indeed no system of theology which should refuse to develop the Christian idea of God from that of the absolute could escape the necessity of conceiving the divine Being as Himself subject to human limitations, that is, after a manner essentially pagan. Irenaeus indeed, like the other opponents of Gnosticism on the church's behalf, was clearly convinced that the whole system betrayed influences of heathen thought. He refers (ii. 14, 1 sqq.) to the Theogony of the comic poet Antiphanes, which taught the production first of chaos out of night and silence, then of Erôs from chaos and night, then of light from Erôs, then in succession that of the first and second races of the Gods, and finally that of the world and of man. That which the Valentinians impudently give out as their own peculiar inscrutable secret, is represented under other names at every theatre. In a similar way they had also pieced together in a variegated cento of doctrines the rags borrowed from the heathen philosophers. From Thales the Milesian declaring water to be the first principle of things they had taken their Bythus (the Deep), which is water under another name; from Homer deriving the origin of the Gods from Oceanus and mother Thetis (Tethys) comes the Gnostic Syzygy of Bythos and Sige. What Anaximander had said of the Infinite containing in itself the seed of all things, the Gnostics have transferred to their Bythos and its emanating Aeons, and so also what the so-called Atheist Anaxagoras had dogmatized of the formation of animals from seeds which had dropped down from heaven to earth, they apply to the "seed" of their own "mother," that is, themselves. Their doctrine of the κένωμα and the σκιά is derived from Democritus and Epicurus; that of things visible being types of unseen realities from Democritus and Plato; and that of the formation of the world out of a ready prepared matter from Anaxagoras, Plato, and Empedocles. The theory that everything must return to the originals of its component parts, and that God Himself is bound by this Necessity, so that even He cannot impart to the mortal immortality, to the corruptible incorruption, was derived by the Gnostics from the Stoics. Finally, the Valentinian doctrine of the Sotêr as made up from all the Aeons, each contributing thereto the flower of his own essence, is nothing more than the Hesiodic fable about Pandora. If in these examples of his theory some things are associated which do not properly belong to one another, the general point of view from which Irenaeus contemplates the opinions of the Gnostics is undoubtedly the right one. And if, as was certainly the case, the Valentinian system did really, under the mythologic veil which it borrowed from heathenism, contain some deeper, nobler truths, the fact was naturally overlooked by the zealous controversialist. Still less could he discern the possibility with regard to his own dogmatic system that some spiritual and eternal verities might be clothed in a vesture borrowed from the things of sense and time.

But however much the Gnostics may have been indebted to heathen thought, they still wished and meant to be Christians, and indeed set up a claim to possess a deeper knowledge of Christian truth than the Psychici of the Church. Like their opponents they also appealed to Scripture in proof of their peculiar doctrines. Nay, it would even seem that the Gnostics were the first to make for that purpose a profitable appeal to the Scriptures of the New Testament. And besides this, they also boasted to be in possession of genuine apostolical traditions, deriving their doctrines, some from St. Paul, others from St. Peter, and others again from Judas, Thomas, Philip, and Matthew. In addition moreover to the secret doctrine which they professed to have received by oral tradition, they appealed also to alleged writings of the apostles themselves or their disciples. In conducting his controversy on these lines with the Valentinians, Irenæus remarks first on their arbitrary method of dealing with Scripture; and, making use of a proverbial expression, he describes their mode of drawing arguments from it as a "twisting ropes of sand" (i. 8, 1; ii. 10, 1). While they endeavour to establish from Scripture opinions at variance with the teaching of apostles and prophets, they indulge themselves in every kind of perverse interpretation, and violently wresting texts out of their natural connexion put them arbitrarily together again after the manner of the centos made from Homer (i. 9, 4). He compares this proceeding of theirs to that of a bungler who has broken up a beautiful mosaic portrait made of a king by some skilful artists out of costly gems, and now puts the stones together again to form an ill-executed image of a dog or fox, maintaining that it is the same beautiful king's portrait as before (i. 8, 1). In the commencement of his chief account of the Valentinian system he gives various examples of their allegorical method of interpreting Scripture (i. 3); at the close of it he enters into further details, and after several other instances gives an extract from a commentary on the prologue of St. John's Gospel by one of the school of Ptolemaeus (i. 8, 5). Inasmuch as it was specially our Lord's parables on which the Gnostics delighted to exercise their arts of interpretation, Irenæus repeatedly lays down the principles on which such interpretation should be made (ii. 10, 2; 20, 1 sqq.; 27, 1 sqq.). Passages dark and ambiguous already are not to be cleared up by still darker interpretations, nor enigmas to be solved by still greater enigmas; but that which is dark and ambiguous must be illustrated by that which is consistent and clear (ii. 10, 1). It must be allowed that Irenæus himself in interpreting Scripture, especially when, like the Gnostics, he indulges in allegory, is not free from forced and arbitrary methods of exposition (comp. for example the interpretations of Judges vi. 37, in Haer. iii. 17, 3; Jon. ii. 1 sqq. Haer. iii. 20, 1; Dan. ii. 34, Haer. iii. 21, 7). But in opposition to the fantastic interpretations which characterize the Valentinian school, he represents for the most part the historical sense of the written Word. His main purpose in the three last books is to refute the Gnostics out of Scripture itself.

In contradistinction to the writers of the former half and the middle of the 2nd century, Irenæus quotes as frequently from the New Testament as he does from the Old. Whereas formerly men had been content with the authority of the Old Testament as the documentary memorial of divine revelation, or with the Lord's own words in addition to the utterances of law and prophets, they now felt more and more impelled, and that by the very example of the Gnostics themselves, to seek to have a fixed collection of

New Testament Scriptures and to extend to these also the idea of Divine inspiration. The Gnostics in their opposition to the Old Testament, which they supposed to have proceeded from the Demiurge or some subordinate angelic agency, had appealed to writings real or supposed of the apostles, as to documents of a more perfect form of Divine revelations, and the first point now was to establish as against them the essential unity of both revelations—Old and New. Almost the whole of the fourth book is devoted by Irenæus to the proof of this point against Marcion. It is one and the same Divine Spirit that spake both in prophets and apostles (iii. 21, 4), one and the same Divine Authority from which both the law and its fulfilment in Christ proceeds. The Old Testament contains presages and fore-types of Christian Revelation (iv. 15; 15, i.; 19, i. &c.); the literal fulfilment of its prophecies proves that it came from the same God as the New Testament Scripture, and is therefore of the same nature with it (iv. 9, 1). The prophets and the gospels together make up the totality of Scripture (Universae Scripturae, ii. 27, 2). The notion of the Bible as of one divinely inspired whole, consisting of both Old and New Testaments, is now, in this way, clearly enunciated. Even a Justin Martyr seems to regard the Gospels rather as memoirs (ἀπομνημονεύματα) drawn up by apostles of the Lord's words and actions, than as canonical Scriptures. Irenæus, on the other hand, cites passages from the Gospels as inspired words of the Holy Spirit, using the ordinary formulae of citation employed in reference to the Old Testament (iii. 10, 4 16, 2; comp. ii. 35, 4 and 5). The same is the case with the allusions to the apocryphal epistles and the Apocalypse (iii. 16, 9; v. 30, 4). The two main divisions of the New Testament canon are for him the Gospels and the apostolic writings (τὰ εὐαγγελικά καὶ τὰ ἀποστολικά, i. 3, 6). These two already constitute for Irenæus a complete whole, like the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and he therefore blames the Ebionites for using only the Gospel of St. Matthew, the Docetae only that of St. Mark, Marcion St. Luke's Gospel only and the Pauline Epistles, and even these not un mutilated (iii. 11, 7 and 12, 12). With regard to those who reject the Gospel of St. John, he remarks that these "unhappy ones" do with the Gospel cast away also the divine prophetic spirit of which it contains the promise (iii. 11, 9). But he is no less determined in his condemnation of the use of apocryphal writings. The teachers of Alexandria, with their laxer notions about inspiration, made use of such without scrupulosity. Irenæus finds himself impelled by his opposition to the Gnostics to insist on drawing a clear line of demarcation between canonical Scriptures and apocryphal writings. He blames the Valentinians for boasting to possess "more gospels than actually exist" (iii. 11, 9), and the Gnostic Marcus for having used besides our Gospels "an infinite number of apocryphal and spurious works" (i. 20, 1). On the other hand he is able himself to prove that there must be just four Gospels, neither more nor less. The proof indeed is a somewhat singular one. From the four regions of the earth, the four principal winds, the fourfold form of the cherubim, the four covenants made by God with man, he deduces

the necessity of one fourfold gospel (iii. 11, 8). This gospel first orally delivered, and then fixed in writing, Irenaeus designates the fundamentum et columna fidei nostrae (iii. 1, 1). The New Testament canon of Irenaeus embraces nearly all the books that later times have received; namely, the Four Gospels, twelve Epistles of St. Paul (the omission of the short Epistle to Philemon appears to have been accidental), the first Epistle of St. Peter, two Epistles of St. John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Revelation. The omission of the third Epistle of St. John is most probably accidental also. From the Epistle of St. James there is probably a quotation at iv. 16, 2 (comp. James ii. 23), and the frequently recurring expression "lex libertatis" appears to have been borrowed from the same source (James i. 25). The possible references to the Epistle to the Hebrews are uncertain. Resemblances, perhaps echoes, are found in several places (comp. Harvey's Index), and Eusebius testifies (H. E. v. 26) that both the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Wisdom of Solomon are mentioned by Irenaeus in his διαλέξεις διάφοροι. The epistle is cited as a Pauline work in one Fragment only, the second Pflaffian (Fr. Graec. xxxvi. ap. Harvey).

But in the controversy with the Gnostics refutation out of Scripture was not sufficient. Both parties appealed to Scripture in support of their opinions; the victory was doubtful, at least it was disputed. Tertullian's advice was therefore in such cases to forego the Scripture argument (De Praescript. Haer. 19, Ergo non ad Scripturas provocandum est, nec in his constituendum certamen, in quibus aut nulla aut incerta victoria est). Irenaeus assumes the possibility of its being the case that we might have had to do without New Testament Scriptures altogether. In this case we should have to inquire of the tradition left by the apostles of the churches (iii. 4, 1: quid autem si neque apostoli quidem Scripturas reliquissent nobis, nonne oportebat ordinem sequi traditionis quam tradiderunt eis quibus committebant ecclesias?) But the Gnostics also appealed to an apostolical tradition. Irenaeus complains that when one would refute them from the Bible they accused it of error, or declared the interpretation to be doubtful. The truth can only be ascertained they said by those who know what the true tradition is (iii. 2, 1). But this teaching is identical with that of Irenaeus himself, who maintains that then only can we understand the Scriptures when possessed of, and guided by, the true tradition. And this true tradition he insists on finding in the rule of faith (κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, Regula Fidei), as contained in the baptismal confession of the whole church (i. 9, 4; comp. 22. 1).

In this way Irenaeus obtains at last a sure note or token by which to distinguish the genuine apostolical tradition (ἡ ὑπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας κηρυσσομένη ἀλήθεια, i. 9, 5; praeconium ecclesiae, v. 20, 2; apostolica ecclesiae traditio, ii. 3, 3; or simply παράδοσις, traditio, i. 10, 2; ii. 2, 2 and frequently) from the so-called apostolical secret doctrine to which the Gnostics made their appeal. The Baptismal Confession (or Credo) acquired its complete form only through the conflicts of the Gnostic controversy. In the writings of Irenaeus, as in those of others his contemporaries, it is cited in various, now longer now shorter, forms. This circumstance, however, is no proof that one or other of these was the actual form then used in baptism. The probability is far greater that the shorter form of the old Roman credo which is still preserved to us was that already used in the time of Irenaeus. (Caspari Ungedruckte &c. Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufsymbols und der Glaubensregel, tom. iii. 1875, p. 3 sqq.) The variations from the Roman formulary as we find them in the creeds of the Eastern churches, and in great measure also witnessed to by Irenaeus, the Asiatic, appear to have been introduced in order to express, with greater distinctness, the antithesis of Christian belief to Gnostic heresy. So here a special emphasis is laid on the belief in "One God the Father Almighty who made heaven and earth," and in "one Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who became flesh for our salvation." Of this rule of faith Irenaeus testifies that the church, though scattered over the whole οἰκουμένη, even to the ends of the earth, proclaims and teaches and delivers as with one mind and mouth, even as she has herself received it from the apostles and their disciples (i. 10, 1 and 2). In this way a clear determinate note is given by which one may distinguish the genuine Christian tradition from that of heresy. To the pretended secret doctrine of the latter is opposed the public preaching of the faith of the apostolic churches; to the mutability and endless varieties of Gnostic doctrines the unity of the church's teaching; to their novelty her antiquity, and to their endless subdivisions into schools and parties the uniformity and universality of her traditional witness. That only which, from the times of the apostles, has been handed down in unbroken tradition by the elders of the church, and publicly and uniformly taught in the churches, that doctrine which at all times and in every place may be learned by inquiry from the successors of the apostles in their teaching office, that alone is the Christian apostolic truth (i. 10, 2; iii. 2, 2; 3, 1, 3, 4; 4, 1 sq.; 24, 1; iv. 33, 7 sq.; v. 20, 1).

The like observation had been made already by the learned church antiquarian Hegesippus, who, cir. A.D. 170, undertook long journeys in order to assure himself of the general agreement of Christian communities in their doctrinal traditions: in each apostolic church he set himself to inquire for the unbroken succession of its pastors and their teaching, and records with satisfaction the following as the result of his investigations: "In every succession in every city it is still maintained as the law announces and as the prophets and the Lord." And again, "So long as the sacred choir of the apostles still lived, the church was like a virgin undefiled and pure, and not till afterwards in the times of Trajan did error, which so long had crept in darkness, venture forth into the light of day" (Ap. Euseb. H. E. iv. 22; iii. 32).

Irenaeus and Tertullian did then but follow those who had gone before them in laying stress upon this note of genuine tradition, while giving to the principle of Catholic agreement a more precise expression, and using it with great effect in their conflicts with heresy. Irenaeus is specially emphatic in everywhere contrasting the vacillation and variety of heretical opinions with the uniform proclamation of one and the same apostolic witness in all the churches of the world (i. 8, 1; 10, 1). Truth, he remarks, can be but one; while each heretical teacher proclaims a different doctrine of his own invention. How impossible is it that truth can have remained so long hidden from the church, and been handed down as secret doctrine in possession of the few! Whereas she is free and accessible to all, both learned and ignorant, and all who earnestly seek her find. With almost a shout of triumph he opposes to the unstable, ever-changing, many-headed doctrinal systems and sects of Gnosticism, with their vain appeals to the obscure names of pretended disciples of the apostles, or to supposititious writings, the one universal norm of truth which all the churches recognise. "The church, though dispersed through the whole world, is carefully guarding the same faith as dwelling in one and the same house; these things she believes, in like manner, as having one soul and the self-same heart; these, too, she accordantly proclaims, and teaches, and delivers, as though possessing but one mouth. The speeches of the world are many and divergent, but the force of our tradition is one and the same." And again, "The churches in Germany have no other faith, no other tradition, than that which is found in Spain, or among the Celts, in the regions of the East, in Egypt and in Libya, or in these mid parts of the earth." He compares the church's proclamation of the truth to the light of the sun, which is one and the same throughout the universe, and visible to all who have eyes to see. "The mightiest in word among the presidents of the churches teaches only the same things as others (for no one here is above the Master), and the weak in the Word takes nothing away from what has been delivered him. The faith being always one and the same, he that can say much about it doth not exceed, he that can say but little doth not diminish" (i. 10, 2). "The tradition of the apostles made manifest, as it is, through all the world can be recognized in every church by all who wish to know the truth" (iii. 3, 1). But this light from God shines not for heretics because they have dishonoured and despised Him (iii. 24, 2). Compare also the first of Pfaflian fragments (Fr. Graec. xxxv.).

The argument from antiquity, from which later on Tertullian and Clemens of Alexandria forged such formidable weapons with which to batter down the novelties of heresy, is also employed by Irenaeus on behalf of church tradition. Does anywhere a controversy arise about matters of faith, let recourse be had to the most ancient churches in which the apostles themselves once resided, and a decisive answer will then be found. This oral tradition, derived from the apostles exists even in the churches among barbarous nations, in whose hearts the Spirit, without ink or parchment, has written the old and saving truth (iii. 4, 1 and 2). But while thus the genuine tradition may, in the apostolic churches, be traced back through the successions of the elders to the apostles themselves, the sects and their doctrines are all of later origin. There were no Valentinians before Valentinus, and no Marcionites before Marcion. Valentinus himself and Kerdon (Marcion's teacher) did not appear in Rome till the time of Hyginus the ninth bishop after the apostles, Valentinus flourished under Pius, Marcion under Anicetus (iii. 4, 3). All these founders of sects were much later than the apostles (iii. 21, 3), and the first bishops to whom they committed the care of the churches (v. 20, 1). In contradistinction to their ψευδώνυμος γνώσις the true gnosis consists in the doctrine of the apostles and the maintenance of the pure and ancient constitution of the church (τὸ ἀρχαῖον τῆς ἐκκλησίας σύστημα) throughout the world (iv. 33, 7).

The main point then, on which all at last turns, is the clear proof of a pure transmission of apostolic teaching through immediate disciples of the apostles themselves, and through their disciples after them. What is the tradition of the elders (πρεσβύται, πρεσβύτεροι), i.e. the heads of apostolic churches who stood in direct communication with the apostles themselves or with their disciples?—is the question, therefore, which Irenaeus is everywhere asking. These elders are the guardians and transmitters of the apostles' teaching. As in the preceding generation Papias had collected the traditions of "disciples of the Lord," so now in this Irenaeus is collecting reminiscences of their disciples, mediate or immediate, a Polycarp, a Papias, &c. And as Hegeippus had been careful to inform himself as to the succession of pastors from apostolic times, so Irenaeus, in opposition to the doctrines of the Gnostics, appeals not only to the ancestral teaching maintained in churches of apostolic foundation, such as Rome, Smyrna, Ephesus, but also to the lists of those men who, since the apostles, had presided over them (iii. 3).

The main representatives therefore of genuine apostolical tradition are for Irenaeus the bishops of the churches as successors of the apostles and guardians of their doctrines. In the episcopate itself, as a continuation of the apostolic office, he finds the one sure pledge of the church's unity and the maintenance of her doctrine. Although the expression ἐκκλησία καθολική, which came into vogue towards the end of the 2nd century, does not occur in the writings of Irenaeus, the thing itself is constantly before him, i.e. the conception of one true church spread over the earth, and bound together by the one true Faith, in contrast to the manifold and variegated and apostate forms of "heresy." The external bond of unity in this universal church is the episcopal office. The development indeed of monarchical episcopacy was a primary consequence of the conflict with Gnosticism, and its origination out of simpler constitutional forms betrays itself in a mode of expression derived indeed from earlier times, but still common to Irenaeus, with Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Hippolytus, and others, the use, namely, of the official titles, πρεσβύτεροι and ἐπίσκοποι, to designate alternately the same persons. πρεσβύτεροι in this context are, in the first place, "Elders," i.e. "ancients" or fathers, who represent the immediate connexion of the early church with the apostolic time. This name or title is then transferred to the later heads of churches, inasmuch as they in succession to the apostles have been faithful transmitters of what was handed down to them. The true unbroken apostolical succession and praeconium ecclesiae is therefore attributed to the same persons, now as πρεσβύτεροι now as ἐπίσκοποι (iii. 3, 2, comp. iii. 2, 2; iv. 26, 2, 4, 5; Ep. ad Victorem ap. Ens. H. E. v. 24); nay, in so many words, the "successio episcopalis" was assigned to the πρεσβύτεροι (iv. 26, 2). By these "presbyters" however we are certainly not to understand any ordinary clergymen but heads of churches (especially those of apostolic foundation), who alone were capable of acting as the guardians and maintainers of church unity. The episcopate is for Irenæus no mere congregational office, but one belonging to the whole church; the great importance attached by his contemporaries to the proofs of a genuine postolical succession rests on the assumption that the episcopate was the guardian of the church's unity of teaching, a continuation in fact of the apostolic teaching-office, ordained for that purpose by the apostles themselves. The bishop, in reference to any particular congregation, is a representative of the whole Catholic church, the very idea of catholicity being indebted for its completion to this more sharply defined conception of the episcopal office. It is in the episcopate thus completely formed that the Catholic church first manifested herself an organic unity as "the body of Christ." As formerly the apostles, so now the bishops, their successors, are the "ecclesia representativa." Only through the episcopate as the faithful guardian and transmitter of the apostolical tradition do such congregations retain their hold on visible church unity and their possession of the truth (comp. iv. 33, 7).

The significance of the episcopal office rests therefore on the fact of an apostolical succession. And on this historical connexion of the bishops with the apostolic era depends the certainty of their being possessed of the true tradition. And further, that this assurance is not illusory is proved by the actual uniformity of church teaching throughout the world, the agreement of all the apostolic churches in the confession of the same truth (iii. 3, 3). Beyond this historical proof of the church's being possessed of the true teaching through her episcopate, the argument is not carried further by Irenæus. The later dogma of a continua successio Spiritus Sancti, i.e. of an abiding special gift of the Holy Spirit attached to the episcopate of apostolical succession, has nevertheless some precursive traces in his writings. Though the Holy Spirit is a cala ascensionis ad Deum, of which all the faithful are partakers, yet the guidance of the church by the Spirit is mediated by apostles, prophets, and teachers, and they who would have the guidance of the Spirit must come to the church. "For, where the church is, there is the Spirit of God, and where the Spirit of God is, there is the church and all grace—the Spirit, moreover, is the truth" (iii. 24, 1). And if the unity of the church and the transmission of the true apostolical tradition depends on the apostolical succession of the bishops, the consequence is inevitable that through them the "operatio spiritus sancti" must chiefly manifest itself. Expressly therefore is the "charisma veritatis" attached to the episcopal succession (iv. 26, 2). But this is not to be understood of a gift of inspiration enabling the bishops to discover fresh truths, but rather in such guidance as enables them to preserve the original truth. And therefore it is more particularly the churches of apostolical foundation, and in the West specially the church of Rome, which can give the surest warrant for the true and incorrupt tradition. In this sense the much-disputed passage is to be understood, in which so many would gladly find a witness for the primacy of the Roman church over all others: "For with this church must, on account of her more excellent origin (propter potiorem principalitatem, i.e. διὰ τὴν διαφορωτέραν ἀρχήν), every church, that is, all the faithful coming from all quarters, put themselves in agreement, as being the church in which at all times by those who come from all quarters the tradition derived from the apostles has been preserved" (iii. 3, 2). The potentior principalitas denotes here not only the superior antiquity of the Roman church as the greatest, oldest, and most widely known (i.e. in the West where Irenæus was writing), but also her nobler origin as founded by those "two most glorious apostles Peter and Paul." The mention of the "faithful coming from all quarters" points again to the position of the great world's metropolis and centre of intercourse for nations of the most distant regions of the earth. The place where Christians from all lands were continually coming and going, was that in which they could most easily convince themselves of the oneness of apostolical tradition in the whole church. Obscurations and corruptions of that tradition, which were quite possible in remoter churches, would at Rome be soonest discovered and most easily removed. It is not of any Roman lordship over other churches or a primatial teaching-office committed to the Roman bishop that Irenæus is here speaking, but only of the surer warrant offered by the position of that church for the uncorrupt maintenance of the apostolical traditions. So, after reckoning the succession of Roman bishops down to Eleutherus, his own contemporary, Irenæus proceeds: τῇ αὐτῇ τάξει καὶ τῇ αὐτῇ διαδοχῇ, ἥ τε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ παράδοσις καὶ τὸ τῆς ἀληθείας κήρυγμα κατήνηκεν εἰς ἡμᾶς (iii. 3, 3). But just the same he says of the church of Ephesus founded by St. Paul, and till the times of Trajan under the guidance of St. John: ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἐκκλησία ὑπὸ Παύλου μὲν τεθεμελιωμένη, Ἰωάννου δὲ παραμειναντος αὐτοῖς μέχρι τῶν Τραϊανου χρόνων, μάρτυς ἀληθῆς ἐστὶ τῆς ἀποστολικῆς παραδόσεως (iii. 3, 4).

The unity of the Catholic church, thus secured by the continuance in the church of the apostolic office, is regarded by Irenæus as mainly consisting in a doctrinal unity. The church being the one rich treasure-house, in which the apostles have deposited the whole truth, all those who promise any other way to life are thieves and robbers (iii. 4, 1). Of the other side of the idea of the church, her guardianship of sacramental grace, Irenæus gives hints only. Yet he is certainly on the way to that conception when he singles out the continuance of spiritual gifts as a special note of the true church, meaning thereby not merely the charisma veritatis, but also the gifts of prophecy and miracle (ii. 32, 4, comp. iii. 11, 9). He is not less decided in opposing schismatics, who destroy the church's unity (iv. 26, 2; 33, 7), than heretics who corrupt her doctrine. In regard to internal divisions among the faithful he is never wearied in urging the interests of peace. Neither in the Montanistic movement, nor in the Paschal controversy, does he see any grounds for the severance of church communion. With Montanists he has in common the belief in the continuance of the prophetic charisma and the hope of the future Millennial kingdom: but to their rigoristic principles with regard to penance he is (at least practically) unfavourable. A proof may be found in the epistle of the Gallican confessors to the brethren of Asia Minor, which is written entirely in his spirit, and emphasizes the indulgence shewn to the lapsed by their most honoured martyrs, who "themselves, departing with peace to God, caused no grief to their virgin-mother (the church), nor discord to the brethren, but promoted peace and unanimity among all" (Eus. H. E. v. 2). At the same time Irenaeus sets himself in most determined opposition to that separatist temper, which, denying the presence of the Spirit in the church, would claim His gifts exclusively for its own sect or party. And even if we are not warranted in identifying with the Montanists those "false prophets" of whom he speaks (iv. 33, 6) as with lying lips pretending to prophesy, any more than those who in the well-known passage (iii. 11, 9) deny the Gospel of St. John—all the more applicable to them is the following description: "Men who bring about schisms, devoid of true love to God, seeking their own advantage rather than the unity of the church; wounding and dividing for petty reasons the great and glorious body of Christ, and so far as in them lies destroying it; speaking peace, but acting war, and in sober truth straining out the gnat and swallowing the camel. For no reformation which they could bring about would outweigh the evils produced by their schism" (iv. 33, 7).

The great importance attached by Irenaeus to the maintenance of church unity rests for him on the assumption that the church being sole depositary of divine truth is the only trustworthy guarantee of human salvation. While himself sharing, with the Montanists, not only the hope of the millennial kingdom but also the expectation of its outward visible glory (v. 32-36), and delighting in reminiscences of what the "elders" (Papias) have handed down concerning it as from the lips of the apostle St. John (v. 33, 3), Irenaeus does, on the other hand, with his conception of the church as an outward visible institution of prime necessity for human salvation, pave the way for that catholic ideal, which, in contrast to the dreams and aspirations of Montanism, would substitute for a glorious vision of the future the existing church on earth as God's visible kingdom. And no sooner does the visible church as an outward institution come to be regarded as the essential medium of saving grace than all its forms and ordinances at once acquire a quasi-legal or sacramental character. The church is for Irenaeus an earthly paradise, of the trees of which every one may eat, while heresy has only the forbidden tree of knowledge, whose fruits are death-bringing (v. 20, 2). As the church's faith is the only faith which is true and saving (iii. praef.), so is he alone a Christian man who conforms to the church's institutions and laws. (Comp. iii. 15, 2; v. 20, 1.) The church's sacrifices, the church's prayers, the church's works alone are holy (iv. 18, 1 sqq.; ii. 32, 5).

This essentially legal conception of Christianity is common to the early Catholic church with that of the generation which followed the apostles. St. Paul's thought that Christianity is first of all a new religion, a new relation to God through Christ, and then, derivatively, a new moral life, has for the post-apostolic age already become grievously obscured. The great Catholic doctors gave to this legal conception of the church a further development. For Tertullian, Clemens, and Origen the work of Christ was primarily the promulgation of a new divine law. Irenaeus calls indeed Christianity the New Testament of freedom (iii. 12, 14; iv. 16, 5; 34, 3; comp. iii. 10, 5), but by this freedom he simply understands the exemption of Gentile Christians from obedience to the Mosaic ceremonial law: with which conception that of Christianity as itself a new law is perfectly compatible. In antithesis to Marcion, who derived the Mosaic law from the Demiurge, the gospel from the good God, Irenaeus maintained the substantial identity of both covenants (unius et ejusdem substantiae sunt, iv. 9, 1; comp. 9, 2; 13, 3, &c.). Even when he appropriates the Pauline antithesis of bondage and liberty (comp. also iv. 9, 1 sq.; 13, 2; 16, 5; 18, 2; 34, 1 sq., &c., &c.) the religious premises which led up in St. Paul's mind to that antithesis seem wanting to Irenaeus. Even the New Testament consists for him in a body of divine precepts. The bondsman and undisciplined has indeed one law, the free, the justified by faith another (iv. 9, 1); but inasmuch as the nucleus of both Testaments is one and the same, namely, those natural precepts (naturalia praecepta) (iv. 13, 4; comp. 15, 1), which have from the beginning impressed themselves on the mind of man, it follows that the evangelical law of liberty (iv. 34, 4) differs only quantitatively, not qualitatively, from that of Moses. This difference consists on the one hand in the abolition of the precepts of the ceremonial law, which for the Israelites themselves had but a temporary purpose and validity, to restrain from idol worship, to uphold external discipline, or to serve as precursors and symbols of spiritual precepts (iv. 13, 2; 14, 1 sqq.; 15, 1; 16, 3 sqq.; 19, 1; 23, 1 sq.; 24, 1 sq.), and on the other in the reinforcement of those natural precepts which have come down to us from the beginning (iv. 9, 2; 13, 1; 16, 5). The laws of liberty (decreta libertatis) do not annul the duty of obedience; the difference between sons and servants from this point of view consists in the sons having a larger faith (iv. 32, 2), and exhibiting a more ready obedience (iv. 11, 4). Accordingly, the antithesis between the two Testaments is not an antithesis of fear and love. Love is the greatest commandment under the Old Testament (iv. 12, 3). Fear continues as a precept under the New. The difference is a quantitative one. Christ has even enlarged the precept of fear—the children must fear as well as love more than the servants (iv. 16, 5). On the one side the children indeed are free, on the other they are still servants (iv. 14, 1). The two lawgivings differ only in the number and greatness (multitudine et magnitudine) of their commandments. The law of liberty being the greater of the two is given not for Jews only, but for all nations (iv. 9, 2), but the precepts of a perfect life (consummatae ritae praecepta) are for both Testaments the same (iv. 12, 3).

The new precepts which characterise Christianity are, in the first place, the ordinances and institutions of the church. Among other distinguishing notes of the new law Irenaeus further emphasizes that Christians believe not in the Father only but also in the Son, that they do as well as say, and that they abstain from evil desires as well as from evil works (iv. 13, 1). And even while largely using Pauline language when he speaks of Justification by Faith (iv. 5, 5; 9, 1; 16, 2; 21, 1), his legal conception of Christianity still betrays itself in a non-comprehension of St. Paul's fundamental thought, Faith is opposed by Irenaeus to the ψευδώνυμος γνώσις of the heretics, and essentially consists in the reception of the Regula Fidei, the Rule of Faith; it is therefore simply defined as obedience to the will of God (iv. 16, 5), i.e. a moral duty, and not, as for St. Paul, the subjective form in which a new religious life and relation is first constituted.

This legal conception leads Irenaeus further to insist on the freedom of the will, and on salvation as conditioned by a man's own ethical self-determination. It is characteristic of all Catholic practical theology that it tends to limit the free forgiveness of sins to the moment of baptism, and after that to make salvation dependent on a godly life and the performance of good works. In the same spirit Irenaeus quite innocently puts in juxtaposition justification by obedience to the natural precepts and justification by faith: "naturalia legis per quae homo justificatur quae etiam ante legislationem custodiebant qui fide justificabantur et placebant Deo" (iv. 13, 1). He is led of course thus strongly to insist on the moral law by his opposition to the Gnostic teaching that the spiritual man is exempted from it and obtains salvation through his higher gnosis. His energetic assertion of the freedom of the will has also a polemical object—to refute the Valentinian dualistic doctrine, which made the salvation of the spiritual man the result of his original pneumatic nature (comp. especially iv. 37). But this perfectly justifiable opposition leads Irenaeus to put too much in the background the doctrine of Divine grace as the only source of human salvation. He even puts it as a Divine requirement that in order to the Spirit's resting upon them, Christians must, beside their baptismal vocation, be also adorned with works of righteousness (iv. 36, 6). This seems inconsistent with the Pauline teaching, that it is only by the gift of the Spirit that Christians are enabled to do good works at all. But again, on the other hand, he says of the Spirit that He dwells in men as God's creation, working in them the will of the Father, and renovating into the newness of Christ (iii. 17, 1). As dry ground, without dew from heaven, can bear no fruit, so neither can the soul perform good works without the irrigation of the water of life (iii. 17, 2). This latter doctrine stands, however, side by side, quite unreconciled with the legal conception of Christianity. If in one place the Spirit is spoken of as confirmatio fidei nostrae (iii. 24, 1), Irenaeus nowhere points out that, as the antithesis of human work, the grace of God and the operation of the Spirit are the only ground of man's salvation. If faith itself be simply the acceptance of the rule of faith, and consists in obedience to church ordinances, the consequence is inevitable that good works must be, along with faith, a meritorious cause of justification.

If in this way Irenaeus may be said to anticipate the mode of thought which characterises the Catholicism of a later time, the same cannot be said of his teaching on the sacraments. Indeed the sacramental side of Catholic theology did not take shape till long and after the Montanistic and Novatian controversies. Whereas both these parties insisted on finding the church's sanctity in the spiritual endowments and personal holiness of individual members, "Catholics" sought for the note of holiness mainly in the church's sacramental ordinances, or in marvellous operations of the Holy Spirit in certain functions of her public life. The chief organ of these operations would be the episcopate, which thus came to be viewed as not merely the guardian of doctrinal purity, but also the bearer of supernatural grace and powers, and following the type of the Old Testament priesthood as a kind of mediator between God and men. This side of the Catholic ideal of the church is not yet developed in the writings of Irenaeus. On the contrary, he still holds fast by the original Christian conception of the universal priesthood and outpouring of the Spirit on all believers (iv. 20, 6 sqq.; v. 6, 1; comp. iv. 13, 2 sqq.; 33, 1 sqq.). On this he insists, first, as against the Gnostics, and their claims to an exclusive possession of the divine πνεῦμα, and, secondly, against the false prophets, and their denial of the presence of the Spirit in the church (iii. 11, 9; iv. 33, 6). The sacramental idea of grace imparted through the church is for Irenaeus restricted to baptism as a divine institution for the salvation of man, the type of which is the ark of Noah (iv. 36, 4). Of priestly absolution and its sacramental significance he nowhere speaks; on the contrary, he adopts the saying of an elder which has a somewhat Montanistic ring about it—that after baptism there is no further forgiveness of sins (iv. 27, 2). This, as is clear from the epistle of the Gallican confessors, is not meant to exclude the possibility of indulgence being extended to the fallen under any circumstances. But it remains a characteristic of Irenaeus's position that, while claiming the "charisma veritatis" as a privilegium of the episcopal office, he does not claim for it also the sacramental power of the keys. In his doctrine of the Eucharist also he nowhere specially insists upon its being an episcopal privilege to administer that sacrament. The familiar thought of the Ignatian Epistles, that separation from the episcopal altar is at the same time a separation from the church herself, finds no distinct utterance in the writings of Irenaeus. And yet in his time the ministration of the Eucharist by bishops and presbyters was undoubtedly a long-established custom. In regard to the dogma of the Holy Communion Irenaeus, like Justin Martyr, expresses the thought that through the invocation of Christ's name over the earthly elements the Divine Logos does actually enter into such mysterious connexion with the bread and wine as to constitute a union of an earthly and a heavenly πράγμα similar to that which took place at the Incarnation itself. In virtue of this union of the Logos with the bread and wine those earthly substances are made the flesh and blood of Christ; and it appears to have been with Irenæus a favourite thought, that through the partaking of Christ's flesh and blood in the Holy Communion our earthly bodies are made partakers of immortality (iv. 18, 4 sq.; 33, 2; v. 2, 2 sq.; comp. also the second Pfafrican fragment, Fr. Græc. xxxvi. ap. Harvey). On the other hand, no traces whatsoever of the sacrifice of the Mass are to be found in his writings. What Irenæus designates as the Church's sacrifice in the Holy Eucharist, and calls in contradistinction to the sacrifices of the Old Testament a Nova Oblatio, are only the thank-offerings of bread and wine presented to the Creator as the first-fruits of His creatures, and not the body and blood of Christ, the sacrifice of which is renewed by the consecrating priest in a bloodless manner (iv. 17, 5 sq.; 18, 1 sq.).

The chief significance of Irenæus as a theologian consists in his doctrine concerning the Person and Work of Christ. It is characteristic of the Gentile Christianity of the post-apostolic age, that while falling back in many respects to the legal standing-ground of the Old Testament, it sought in some measure to make up for the losses thus incurred, and regain its hold on what was new and peculiar in the Christian religion by giving shape and utterance to the highest views of the person of its Founder. The doctrine of Christ's Godhead was the theological expression of the absolute significance of that divine revelation which was enshrined in His person and work. While the Gnostics regarded Christ as only one among numerous radiations of the divine essence, thereby imperiling on the one hand the truth of the divine monarchia, and on the other the absolute and final character of the gospel revelation, the opposing doctrine of the Godhead of the Logos, and of His Incarnation in Jesus Christ, provided the exact theological truth and formula of which the Christian conscience felt the need, in order to gather into one the scattered elements which the multitude of Gnostic Aeons were dividing. Following the guidance of the Gospel of St. John the more philosophically cultured teachers of the church—a Justin, a Theophilus, a Tatian, an Athenagoras, the Alexandrine Clemens and Origen, Tertullian and Hippolytus—found in the doctrine of the Divine Logos the classical expression which they needed for the unique and absolute character of the gospel revelations. It was in antithesis both to the Gnostic doctrine of Aeons, and the psilanthropism of the Ebionites, that the Divine Logos or Eternal Thought of God Himself was conceived of as the personal organ of all divine revelation which had issued from the inner life of the Divine Paternity. His manifestation in the flesh is therefore the climax of all the revelations of God in the world. To this Logos-doctrine Irenæus has likewise attached himself. The invisible Father has become visible in the Logos (iv. 20, 7). The divine "Pleroma" (Irenæus borrows the Gnostic term to express the fulness of divine perfection, ii. 1, 3 sq.) is revealed in the Logos. God Himself is all Intelligence, all Thought, all Logos; what He thinks He utters, what He utters He thinks; the all-embracing divine intelligence is the Father Himself, who has made Himself visible in the Son (ii. 28, 5). The infinite, immeasurable Father is, in the words of some old teacher of the church, become measurable and comprehensible in the Son (immensus Pater in Filio mensuratus), for the Son is the "measure of the Father," the manifestation of the Infinite in finite form (iv. 4, 2). In contrast with Tertullian, Irenæus's first great purpose and object is to emphasize the absoluteness and spirituality of God, and therefore to reject anything like a physical emanation (prolatio) of the Logos, lest God should be made into something composite, and something other than His own infinite thought (principalis mens), or His own Logos (ii. 28, 5). The older teachers of the Logos-doctrine conceived the generation of the Logos after the analogy of the temporal process from thinking to speaking, and assumed that His issuing from the Father as a distinct person, i.e. the out-speaking of the inward divine thought, first took place at the creation. Tertullian represented the same conception in a more sensuous form. The Father is for him the whole Godhead, the Son "partio totius;" and on this point he expressly recognises the resemblance between his view and that of the Gnostics (c. Prax. 8).

Irenæus, on the other hand, is driven by his own opposition to the Gnostic doctrine of Aeons to reject anything like a προβολή or prolatio from the Godhead as a limitation of His infinity or an anthropomorphism. He is therefore the first doctor of the church who maintained with the utmost distinctness the eternal coexistence of the Son with the Father (semper coexistens Filius Patri, ii. 30, 9; iii. 18, 1). His frequent designation of the Son and Holy Spirit as the "Hauds of God" is a figurative expression to denote their being not so much emanations of the Godhead as organs of its creative energy. To presumptuous endeavours to comprehend the way in which the Son comes from the Father he opposes our human ignorance, and mocks at the vain attempts of those who would transfer human relations to the Infinite and Unchangeable One (quasi ipsi obstetricaverint prolationem enunciant, ii. 28, 6). These polemics, if directed in the first instance against the Gnostics, are not less applicable to the emanistic theories of other teachers. On the other hand, the clearly marked division between the Logos-doctrine of an Hippolytus and Tertullian, and the Patripassian conception of it can hardly be said to exist for Irenæus, who often speaks as if the eternal Logos were but the self-revealing side of the otherwise invisible and hidden Godhead, without one's being always able to see how the personal distinction between the two can be thus maintained. His doctrine of the Logos was at any rate developed (unlike that of Tertullian and Hippolytus) without any direct reference to Patripassianism (of which no mention is made in his writings), while the true human personality of the Son is maintained against the Gnostics with as much decision as His true Godhead against the Ebionites.

This conception of the Logos as the one great and absolute organ of all divine revelations, leads Irenæus, as it did Justin Martyr and the other Apologists, to refer back to His agency all the pre-Christian manifestations of God (iv. 20, sq.). But Irenaeus is the first Christian doctor who expressly applies this thought, in his conflict with the Gnostics, to the origination of the Mosaic law (iv. 9). "Both Testaments proceeded from one and the same head of the family (paterfamilias), our Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of God, who spake (of old) to Abraham and to Moses" (comp. iv. 12, 4). This view might, it is clear, very easily lead to an effacement of nearly all distinction between the abiding and the transient validity of portions of the Old Testament. And so we find in after times not a few precepts of the old ceremonial law once more regarded as obligatory upon Christians—a view which by Irenaeus, however, is nowhere maintained.

The fulfilment of all previous revelations is attained in the personal manifestation of the Logos in the flesh. By the Incarnation of the Son the divine purpose in creation, the union (adunatio, communitio, commixtio) of God and man has been accomplished, and the end is brought back to the beginning (iv. 20, 2, 4; 33, 4; v. 2, 1, et passim). From the beginning has the Son been aiding His own formation (iv. 6, 7). But only through the Incarnation itself, by which the Father became visible in the Son, has the "gloria Dei," which is "vivens homo," been fully manifested (iv. 20, 7). The vision of God is the life of man, and this life-giving vision we have through the Word incarnate.

Together with the Logos the Spirit of God is often spoken of as organ of divine revelation. The two together are the creative "hands of God." It is not, however, easy to determine their right relation one to the other. The designation of the Holy Spirit as Wisdom (Sapientia) reminds us of the Alexandrine phraseology, in which λόγος and σοφία are also distinguished without the distinction being fully worked out or consistently adhered to. Irenaeus uses the term "sapientia" of the Divine Spirit always. But the comprehension of his meaning is made somewhat difficult by his sometimes speaking of our communion with the Son as mediated by the Spirit (v. 36, 2), and sometimes of the historical manifestation of the Logos as the mean whereby men become partakers of the Spirit of the Father (iv. 38, 2). The solution of the difficulty will probably be found in the observation that Irenaeus uses the term "Spirit of God" in now a narrower, now a wider sense. In the narrower sense of the term the Spirit appears to be the organ of Divine Revelation in the heart and consciousness of man, and so distinguished from the Logos as the universal organ of Divine Revelation to all creatures and all worlds (v. 1, 1; comp. iii. 21, 4; iv. 33, 1, 7, &c.). In the other and wider sense the Spirit is the inner Being of God Himself in contradistinction to the material universe and the σάρξ (caro) or human corporeity. The former sense is always there to be assumed where the Spirit is distinguished from the Logos as another divine hypostasis, progenies et figuratio Dei (iv. 7, 4; 20, 1 sq.); the latter, where the Spirit is spoken of as "the bread of immortality" (iv. 38, 1), and the life-giving principle from which endless life wells forth (v. 12, 2). It is with reference to this latter meaning of the term that Irenaeus, speaking of the humanity of Jesus Christ, gives expression to a thought, which is often recurred to by later theologians, that the Spirit is the anointing (unctio, χρίσμα) and bond of unity between the Father and the Son. The Holy Spirit is in fact, for him, the uniting principle between God and man in general. God through the Spirit imparts Himself to man, while man, on the other hand, through the Incarnation enters into God (v. 1, 1). This last thought leads us on to the grand conception which Irenaeus entertains of the development of the whole human race from Adam up to Christ. Man was not from the first, according to Irenaeus, made perfect and immortal, but designed, in God's purpose concerning him, to become so. But this can only be through the Spirit of God. And in order that man may be made partaker of the Spirit and thereby united to God, it was necessary that the Logos should become incarnate (iv. 38, 1 sqq.). The image of God (εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ) for which man was created, could not become visible before the Incarnation, and so man lost this image, the likeness of God, the possession of the Spirit (v. 16, 2), falling into sin by his own fault, and thereby coming not only under the power of natural death, but rendered incapable of exhibiting the image of God (v. 12, 2; 23, 1 sq.). Though thus Irenaeus regards sin, not like the Gnostics as a necessity of nature, but as man's own free act; he not the less on the other hand works out the thought that God has permitted the existence of evil, because only by the contrast could the worth of goodness be appreciated, as that of health after sickness, that of light after darkness, and life after death (iv. 37, 7; 39, 1). Without sin there would have been no consciousness of need, no desire for union with God, no thankfulness for His mercy (iii. 20, 1 sqq.). The chief motive which Irenaeus has for entering into such disquisitions as these, is again his conflict with Gnostic error, especially that of Marcion, who explained the origin of evil in the universe by the theory of two Gods—the highest and an inferior one. In this sense he appropriates the language of the prophet (Isai. xlv. 6, 7) I am the Lord: I make peace and create evil, and works out the thought that for the very sake of destroying evil a final recapitulatio totius iniquitatis may be necessary (v. 29, 2). We are now in a position to comprehend in its fulness the doctrine of Irenaeus concerning the Incarnation of the Logos and the divine purpose in the Incarnation. Two equally significant thoughts may be here distinguished: the idea of humanity being raised to perfection in Christ through union with the divine nature, and that of the victory gained by humanity over sin and the devil in the God-man its head.

The Incarnation is for Irenaeus not merely an historical fact, but has for its basis the eternal divine predestination of man. It was only by God becoming man that man could attain the predestined end of his original creation. The perfecting of humanity in Christ is at the same time a realisation of the true idea of humanity—the Logos first assimilating Himself to man, and then man to Himself—(semet ipsum homini et hominem sibi met ipsi assimilans). "In past times it was said indeed that man had been made after God's image, but it was not shewn. For the Logos was still invisible after whose image man had been made. And on this very account did man also easily forfeit the likeness. But when the Logos of God became flesh He established both points: He truly exhibited the (divine) image, by Himself becoming that which was the image of Himself, and firmly restored the likeness by making man to be like the unseen Father" (v. 16, 2). Man's destination is to be like God, and by the attainment of this likeness God's great purpose is accomplished of indwelling in man, and so of uniting man to Himself (iii. 20, 2). And hence follows the necessity that He by whom the perfecting of man was accomplished should be Himself both God and man. Irenaeus is therefore as strongly opposed to the Ebionitic as to the Docetic error. To the Ebionites he objects that they do not receive the doctrine of the commixture of the heavenly wine with the earthly water, the union of God and man, but retaining the leaven of the old birth (after the flesh) abide in mortal flesh and in that death which disobedience has incurred (v. 1, 3; iii. 19, 1). It was necessary that the Logos should become man in order that man, receiving the Logos and obtaining the sonship, might become son of God. In no other way could we obtain incorruption and immortality than by being united to that which is incorruptible and immortal. Only through the absorption of the one by the other can we become partakers of the divine Sonship (iii. 19, 1; comp. iii. 18, 7). On the other hand, in opposition to Gnostic docetism, Irenaeus insists no less strongly on the truth and reality of the Incarnation of the Logos. If this were but putative, salvation would be putative also (iv. 33, 5). The mediator between God and man must belong to both in order to unite both (iv. 18, 7). If we are truly to know God and enter into fellowship with the divine Logos, our teacher must Himself have become man. We need a teacher whom we can see with human eyes and whose voice we can hear, in order to be followers of His deeds and doers of His words (v. 1, 1). The fundamental thought in this argument—that the divine nature of which we are to be made partakers can be brought nigh to us only in the form of a genuine human existence—is expressed elsewhere still more emphatically, when Irenaeus insists that Christ, in order to conduct the human race to its divine destination, must Himself belong to it, and take upon Him human flesh and all the characteristics of humanity; that if man is to be raised to God, God must come down to man (iv. 33, 4, πῶς ἄνθρωπος χωρήσει εἰς Θεόν, εἰ μὴ ὁ Θεὸς ἐχωρήθη εἰς ἄνθρωπον). The second Adam, the head of our spiritual humanity, must Himself come of the race of Adam in order to unite the end with the beginning (iii. 22, 3 sq.; 23, 1; iv. 34, 4; v. 1, 3; 16, 1 sq.). The profound conception of a recapitulatio (ἀνακεφαλαιώσις) of humanity in Christ is one to which Irenaeus is perpetually recurring. It was necessary that the Incarnate Logos manifesting Himself at the end of time should gather into Himself all that originally belonged to the essence and to the final destiny of man in order to unite humanity with the indwelling Godhead, and in this way to conduct God's original creation to its divinely appointed end (iii. 18, 1; 22, 1, 3; 23, 1; iv. 38, 1 v. 1, 2 sq.; 14, 1; 23, 2; 36, 3; comp. iv. 40, 3; v. 16, 2). For this reason it was also needful that Christ should recapitulate and pass through all the stages of an ordinary human life in order to consecrate each of them in us, by a likeness to Himself in each (ii. 22, 4; iii. 18, 7). And it was moreover needful that He should come at the end of time in order to conduct all who from the beginning had hoped in Him, to eternal life in fellowship with God (iv. 22, 1 sq.; comp. 27, 1). As Christ then was typically pre-formed in Adam (iii. 22, 3), so on the other hand was Adam's destiny accomplished in Christ (v. 1, 3; 16, 2 sq.). The Spirit of God descended on the Son of God made man that in Him He might accustom Himself to an indwelling in the human race (iii. 17, 1). Man was to grow used to receive God, and God to indwell in man (ii. 20, 2).

With this thought of the recapitulatio of the human race in Christ is combined another of equal depth and significance—that of the victory over sin and deliverance of sin's captives from the power of Satan by the obedience of Christ. This deliverance or redemption was necessary before the divine purpose of the union of God and man could be accomplished. For if man, created by God for life, but corrupted by the serpent, had not returned to life, but been wholly subjected to death's power, God would then have been defeated, and the devil's iniquity proved itself stronger than His holy will. But God, triumphant and magnanimous, has by the second Adam (Christ) bound the strong man and spoiled his goods, and deprived death of its prey, and brought back man once slain to life. He who by false promises of life and the likeness of God had bound man in the chains of sin has now been justly made captive in his turn, and his prisoner, man, set free (iii. 23, 1 sq.; comp. 18, 7; iv. 21, 3). The power of the devil over man consisted in man's sin, and the apostasy into which the devil had seduced him (v. 21, 3), but now the disobedience of one man has been repaired by one man's obedience (iii. 18, 7; 21, 10). The first Adam was initium morientium, the second Adam initium viventium, who needed to be both God and man, no less in order to become the saviour, than to be the perfecter of mankind (iii. 22, 4; v. 1, 3). Only one who was Himself man could overcome man's enemy, and bind in his turn him by whom man had been bound; in this way alone could the victory over the enemy be altogether just. And so, on the other hand, only one who was also God could accomplish a redemption which should be stable and sure (iii. 18, 7; v. 21, 3). Christ must be truly man, in order as man to be truly tempted, must be born of a woman, in order to deliver those who by a woman had been brought under the devil's power, and must truly live and suffer as a man in order as man to fight and triumph. Again—He must also be the Logos in order to be glorified, in order as the strong one to overcome the enemy in whose power the whole human race found itself (iii. 18, 6, 7; 19, 3; iv. 33, 4; v. 17, 3; 21, 1; 22, 1); and finally that man might learn that it is not through himself, but only through God's mercy that he obtains incorruption (v. 21, 3). The recapitulation of mankind in Christ consists therefore not only in man's original destiny being accomplished by the beginner of a new humanity, but also in His taking up and conducting to a triumphant issue, at the end of time, the conflict wherein, at the beginning, man had been overcome. The victory of God made man is man's victory, inasmuch as all humanity is summed up (recapitulated) in Christ. Man must himself overcome the evil one, and leave him bound with the same chains wherewith he himself had once been bound—the chains of transgression (v. 21, 3); but the first man could not thus have triumphed, having been by him seduced and bound, but only the second man, the Son of God after whose image Adam was created, and who has become man in order to take back His old creation ("antiquam plasmationem") into Himself (iv. 33, 4). The devil had obtained his dominion over the first man by deceit and violence, whereas the redemption of the new race had taken place not with violence but, as became God, in the way of free persuasion: (secundum suadela[m], quemadmodum decebat Deum suadentem, non vim inferentem, accipere quae vellet: v. 1, 1). The dominion of the devil is an unjust dominion, inasmuch as he, like a robber, has seized and taken to himself what did not belong to him, estranged us from our original godlike nature, and made us into his own disciples. Again divine justice demands also that what the devil has obtained by conflict should in a lawful conflict be wrung back from him. The Son of God deals, according to His own sense of right, with the apostasy itself, redeeming from it, at a price, that which was His own (non deficiens in sua iustitia iuste etiam adversus ipsam conversus est apostasiam, ea quae sunt sua redimens ab ea, v. 1, 1, comp. 24, 4). Christ came not snatching with deceit that which was another's, but justly and graciously resuming that which was His own; justly in regard to the apostasy (the evil one) from whose power He redeemed us with His own blood, and graciously in reference to us whom He so redeemed (v. 2, 1). The persuasion (suadela) of which the Son of God made use, consisted, so far as the devil was concerned, in his free consent to accept the redemption price of the Lord's death for his prisoners: and so the Lord redeemed us, giving His soul for our souls and His flesh for our flesh (v. 1, 1). Two thoughts are here to be distinguished. The first is that of Christ's victorious conflict with the evil one, maintaining, spite of all his temptations, full and entire obedience to the Father, unmasking Satan as rebel and deceiver, and thereby proving Himself the strong one (v. 21, 2 sq.). The second thought is that of redemption through Christ's blood, which is expressly represented as a price paid to the devil and by him voluntarily received. The first thought is developed mainly with reference to the history of the temptation in the wilderness. In the third temptation the evil one is completely exposed and called by his true name, the Son of God appears as victor, and, by His obedience to the divine command, absolves the sin of Adam (v. 21, 2). With this chain of thought, complete in itself, the other theory of a redemption-price paid down in the blood of Christ, is placed in no connexion. It is not said that the devil, acting up to his rights, caused the Saviour's death, which indeed is represented from another point of view as a price legitimately offered and paid down to him (v. 1, 1). The thought, moreover, subsequently worked out by Origen, that the devil deceived himself with the hope of bringing under his power one whom he was too weak to hold, is not yet to be found in Irenaeus. But along with this conception of the redemption-price offered to the devil appears another thought, that man has been reconciled to God by the sacrifice of the body of Christ and the shedding of His blood (v. 14, 3).

It must be allowed that Irenaeus has no complete dogmatic theory with regard to the nature of Christ's work of redemption. One reason is that his theological speculations nowhere appear in the form of an independent system, but are simply developed in polemical contrast to those of the heretical gnosis. It was indeed by the very conflict with Gnosticism that the currents of Christian religious thought were once more put in rapid movement, and that problems which had exercised St. Paul were again presented to the mind of the church. Little as Irenaeus might be able to comprehend in all its depth the Pauline theology, he was not the less energetically occupied with the same world of thought. Perhaps in no other respect does the intellectual difference between his time and the post-apostolic era of the church appear more manifest.

IRENAEUS (2), bishop of Ulinae (Ullitani), in Numidia, fifty-fourth suffrage in Conc. Carth. sub Cyp. vii.; called in later MSS. confessor.

[E. W. B.]

IRENAEUS (3), (IRENEUS, Usuard.)—March 25, bishop of Sirmium and martyr at Sirmium under the governor Probus in the Diocletian persecution (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard; Till. Mém. v. 250). The Basilian Menology gives this Irenaeus and Ireneus bishop of Lyons on the same day, Aug. 23. Some suppose that the story of the martyrdom of the latter arose from his having been confused with the bishop of Sirmium (Iren. Frag. xxv. ed. Harvey, ii. 454). The Acta of this martyr, printed from an ancient manuscript by the Bollandists (25 Mart. iii. 556), and Ruinart (Acta Sinc. 403), give Ap. 6, 304, as the date of his death (cf. Fleury, H. E. viii. 51). [G. T. S.]

IRENÆUS (4), bishop of the island of Scyros, at the council of Sardica, A.D. 343. Secoro in the subscription should be altered to Scyro. (Mansi, iii. 39; Le Quien, ii. 232.) [L. D.]

IRENÆUS, bp. of Jerusalem. [IRENIUS.]

IRENÆUS (5), bishop of Tripolis in Phœnicia. He took part in the Arian synod of Selencia, A.D. 359. (Epiph. Haer. lxxiii. § 26; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 823.) [J. de S.]

IRENÆUS (6) (IRENIO), bishop of Gaza, present at the council of Antioch, A.D. 363 (Mansi, iii. 374). He is the next known bishop after Asclepas, and died in 392 or 393 (Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 609; Baron. A. E. ann. 398, xvii.). He is mentioned by Marcus Diaconus in his life of St. Porphyrius bishop of Gaza (Boll. Acta SS. 26 Feb. iii. 647 C, 648 B), and his successor is there said to have been Aeneas. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on Dec. 16. [J. de S.]

IRENÆUS (7), count of the empire and subsequently bishop of Tyre in the fifth century. He affords an example of that remarkable change of vocation of which we have other instances in Ambrose, Nectarius, and Ephraemius of Antioch, by which a civil career, in which considerable distinction had been gained, was exchanged in middle life for the episcopate. Irenæus is first known to us as a count of the empire, of high character, much esteemed for his statesmanlike qualities, and still more for his virtues. Though a layman, he took a zealous interest in theological controversies, and was ardently attached to the cause of Nestorius, of whom he was a personal friend. At the summoning of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, Irenæus accompanied Nestorius; but, as is distinctly stated in the emperor's missive to the council, not in any official capacity, or with any authority to interfere in the affairs of the council, but out of pure friendship, to afford the accused archbishop the support of his presence and counsel (Labbe, Concil. iii. 443). On the assembling of the synod Irenæus employed his power and influence in behalf of his friend, to the great irritation of Cyril and his party, who accused him, on the one hand, of entrapping the more simple-minded of the bishops by his seductive wiles (Labbe, ibid. 749, 762; Baluze, 524), and on the other, of intimidating the synod, by which, it was asserted, he threw the whole assembly into confusion and endangered the lives of its members (Labbe, ibid.; Baluze, 496). The haste with which Cyril secured the condemnation of Nestorius must have aroused his vehement indignation, and when, five days afterwards, the approach of John of Antioch and the Eastern bishops was announced, Irenæus, accompanied by a guard of soldiers, hurried out to apprise them of the high-handed proceedings of the council. He was followed at an interval by deputies from the council, who, as Memnon relates, were at the count's instigation maltreated by the soldiers, and prevented from having an audience with John (Labbe, ibid. 764; Mercator, ii. præf. xxvii.). To counteract the influence of Dalmatius and the monastic party at Constantinople, put in commotion by the intelligence from Ephesus and the arrival of the three Cyrillian deputies, the Eastern bishops deputed Irenæus to proceed thither himself with letters to the emperor and the leading officers of state, narrating their side of the story (Labbe, ibid. 717-720). Further letters were despatched to be laid by him before Theodosius, when Cyril's party, declaring itself the synod, had passed a decree annulling the whole of the proceedings of the rival synod. The emperor was requested to transfer the council to Constantinople, or at least to Chalcedon, where they might be under his more immediate protection, and be delivered from the fear of violence which threatened them at Ephesus (Labbe, ibid. 716; Baluze, 706; Mercator, ibid. p. xxxii.). Irenæus arrived only three days after the Cyrillian deputies, but they had employed their time so well, and gained such general credence, that he found the minds of all in power prejudiced against him, and even ran some risk in getting into the city. At last he obtained an audience of Theodosius, when he used his utmost endeavours to counteract the influence of the former deputies, and prevailed on him to give a hearing to both parties. His statement of the proceedings of the rival councils was so convincing that Theodosius was on the point of pronouncing the condemnation of Nestorius illegal, and confirming the verdict of the Oriental synod held under the presidency of John of Antioch, with the threat of additional punishments to the deposed bishops if they continued contumacious, when the arrival of John, the Syncellus and physician of Cyril, entirely frustrated his efforts and gave a new turn to the proceedings. Perplexed by the counter-statements, with the professed desire of complete impartiality, the feeble Theodosius took the course of confirming the depositions made by both parties—that of Nestorius by the Cyrillians, and those of Cyril and Memnon by the Orientals—and annulled all the remainder of the proceedings, and despatched the count John, his high treasurer, to Ephesus, with discretionary powers to act as he saw best for the peace of the church (Labbe, ibid. 721). Irenæus communicated these extraordinary proceedings by letter to the Oriental bishops (Labbe, ibid. 717-721; Liberat. c. 26, p. 26; Mercator, ibid. p. xxxii.). On the final confirmation of the sentence against Nestorius, in A.D. 435, Irenæus shared his friend's fate.

The decree of Theodosius which banished Nestorius, Aug. A.D. 435, pronounced the same sentence against Irenæus and a presbyter named Photius, as participators in and propagators of his impiety. Irenæus was condemned to be stripped of all his honours, to have his property confiscated, and to be deported to Petra, in order that he might there "suffer the torment of perpetual poverty and solitude" (Baluz. p. 884, c. clxxxviii. clxxxix.). According to the Actes du Brigandage (Martin, p. 138; Le Pseudo-Synode d'Éphèse, p. 86), Irenæus passed twelve years in his Arabian banishment without once participating in Christian ordinances. His time was spent in the preparation of a history of the troubled scenes in which he had taken part, enriched with a large number of historical documents known as the Tragoedia

Irenæi. The violence of the invectives contained in this work against Theodoret, Ibas, and all who had questioned Nestorius's perfect orthodoxy, renders it probable that it was written during the early part of his banishment, and that the lapse of time brought with it calmer thoughts and more friendly feelings towards those who, agreeing with him in the main, had been unable to follow him in his uncompromising advocacy of Nestorius and his teachings. His doctrinal views seem also during this period to have received some modification, for Theodoret, in his letter to Domnus after his elevation to the episcopate (Epist. 110), as well as in that to Irenæus himself (ibid. 16), speaks of his using the test-word θεολόγος without scruple, and testifies to his perfect orthodoxy. At the close of this period it is somewhat startling to find the banished heretic suddenly reappearing as the unanimous choice of the bishops of the province of Phœnicia for the metropolitan see of Tyre, vacant by the death of Beronicianus, and their choice ratified by the leading members of the episcopate of Pontus and Palestine, and accepted with warm commendation by Proclus of Constantinople. The date of his ordination as bishop of Tyre is uncertain. The twelve years mentioned above, spent by him in exile, would bring it to either A.D. 443 or 447, according as they are dated from the first deposition in 431 or its final ratification in 435. As Proclus, whose approbation of his election is named by Theodoret, died at the close of 446, it must have been before the end of that year. The later date is, on the whole, the more probable; that given by Gams, A.D. 449, is certainly wrong. (Theod. Epist. 110.) In the complete silence of history it is vain to speculate on the causes which led to his recall from exile, and the selection of one who had hitherto been known only in a civil capacity, for one of the leading Eastern sees, and that with such wide-spread and unanimous approbation that even the canonical objection of his having been twice married was not suffered to be a bar to his ordination. It is impossible that this unusual step could have been taken without the cognisance of the emperor, whose authority must have been put in exercise to annul the sentence of perpetual banishment, and without whose sanction the electing prelates would not have ventured on choosing such a person as bishop. But the feeble mind of Theodosius was swayed in the most opposite directions by those who for the time happened to have influence over him, and who made him their instrument in carrying out their designs. If the party which regarded Theodoret, the warm friend of Irenæus, as their representative had gained sufficient ascendancy to secure the acquittal of Irenæus and his restoration to court favour, their power was of brief duration. The emperor soon fell under the sway of the eunuch Chrysaphius, the godson of Eutyches, whose favour had been gained by Cyril's still more violent and tyrannical successor Dioscorus, and he became the facile tool of the Monophysite party. The ordination of Irenæus was a blow as unwelcome as it was unexpected to this party, already irritated by the patronage given by successive bishops of Constantinople to their opponents. If tamely submitted to, other like ordinations would follow.

The opposite party would gain possession of the leading sees, and they would sink to a subordinate place. Since the reconciliation of John of Antioch and Cyril, a kind of hollow peace had existed between the two parties—the Egyptians and Orientals. It was rather a truce than a peace, which this elevation of a leading Nestorian sympathiser to the episcopate rendered no longer possible. Irenæus had been consecrated by Domnus, the patriarch of Antioch. He, therefore, was the first object of attack. He was plied with missives from the dominant clerical party at Constantinople, asserting that the election of a convicted heretic and a digamus was ipso facto null and void, and charging him under severe threats to proceed to a fresh election. The emperor's name was adroitly kept in the background; but it was implied that the malcontents were acting with his sanction. In this difficulty Domnus turned for counsel to Theodoret, who replied that "it was better to fall under the ill-will of man than to offend God and wound one's own conscience." He supplied him with the form of a letter* to be sent to the meddlesome ecclesiastics at Constantinople, asserting the perfect orthodoxy of Irenæus, and excusing himself for disregarding the canonical objection of his double marriage by the examples of Alexander of Antioch, Acacius of Beroea, and Praylus of Jerusalem, and professing his readiness to submit to any punishments the emperor pleased, rather than do a wilful wrong. "The see being filled by a canonically elected bishop, he could not lawfully proceed to another election." But all such remonstrances, however just, were futile. The ruin of Irenæus had been resolved on by the faction of Chrysaphius, Eutyches, and Dioscorus, and Theodosius was compelled to seal with his imperial authority the act of deposition. If we may accept Gibbon's statement, that "he never perused the papers that were presented for the royal signature," the emperor is not to be regarded as directly responsible for the act of injustice perpetrated in his name. An edict was issued (Feb. 17, A.D. 448), renewing those formerly published against the Nestorians, which, after commanding that all their writings should be burnt, and making the possession of any of them a capital offence, proceeded, in order to prove his detestation of these doctrines, to order that Irenæus, who, though he had previously incurred his displeasure on that account, and was moreover a digamus, had, he knew not how, got ordained bishop of Tyre, should be deposed from his see and deprived of the dress and title of priest, and be compelled to live as a layman in his own country, and never set foot again in Tyre. The wide publication of this edict is shewn by a note appended to the copy printed by Labbe (Concil. iii. 1215), that it was read in the church of a monastic community in the Egyptian desert two months after it had been issued, April 18, A.D. 448. Domnus still sought to temporise, in the hope that the emperor's mind would again change, and that he might be saved from being compelled to do what his conscience told him was a flagrant wrong. But he was soon undeceived. Two presbyters, Isaiah and Cyrus, arrived from Alexandria, with a letter from Dioscorus reproaching Domnus for delaying to give a bishop to Tyre. As long as the see was kept vacant, the faithful feared Irenaeus might return to it. If he did not wish to contravene the commands of the emperor, he must proceed immediately to ordain a new bishop. Still Domnus hesitated, until fear of ulterior consequences prevailed over his conscientious scruples, and Photius was made bishop of Tyre, Sept. 9, 448 (Actes du Brigand. pp. 134, 143). After this Irenaeus disappears entirely from the scene. One of the acts of the Latrocinium in 449 was to confirm his deposition, after that of Ibas and Daniel of Charrae, and to pass an anathema on him (Martin, Actes du Brigandage, pp. 82-86; Evagr. H. E. i. 10). As Irenaeus is not mentioned in the proceedings of the council of Chalcedon, it is probable that he was no longer alive.

* The phraseology of this letter, which stands as the 110th epistle of Theodoret, has given rise to much misapprehension. The use of the first person—ἐγὼ ἑρωτόνησα τὸν θεοφιλέστατον ἐπίσκοπον Εἰρηναῖον—has led some to suppose that Theodoret, who belonged to another province, was the consecrator of Irenæus, or that he took part in his consecration, or even, with the Abbé Martin (Le Pseudo-Synode d'Éphèse, pp. 84, 85), that it is erroneously ascribed to Theodoret, and was really written by Domnus. It is clear from the tenor of the epistle that it was written by Theodoret, and that the first person is employed by him as writing in Domnus's name. (Tillemont, tom. xv. pp. 871, 872, Theodoret, note 5.)

During the latter part of his chequered career Irenaeus enjoyed the friendship and confidence of Theodoret, who speaks in high terms of his orthodoxy, magnanimity, liberality towards those in adversity, especially those who had known better times, and his other virtues (Theod. Epist. 35, 110), and wrote him frequent letters. At one time he commends to his charity Theophanes, one of the banished bishops (Baluz. 947); at another, Celestiacus, formerly a wealthy and honourable senator of Carthage, driven out in destitution by the Vandals, with his wife and children and whole family (Theod. Epist. 35); at another, he consoles him on the death of his son-in-law (ibid. 12), and again resolves a case of conscience (ibid. 3). From another letter we find that Irenaeus was in the habit of transmitting his discourses for his friend's perusal, and that in these the Virgin Mary was repeatedly designated as the "mother of God," without asserting directly—which was however implied—that she was also the "mother of the man," an omission which had been charged against Theodoret as a crime (ibid. 16).

Irenaeus's great historical work, the Tragoedia, has unfortunately perished, and is only known to us from an ill-executed Latin translation of large portions of it, made subsequently to the time of Justinian (c. 193) by a partisan of "the Three Chapters." The barbarous style and other indications lead to the belief that the translator was an African. We know from Irenaeus's own words (c. 79, Baluz. 781) that the work was in three books, the last of which related to the transactions at Alexandria in 433 A.D. and the reconciliation of Cyril and John of Antioch, on which and its authors he bestows some strongly vituperative epithets. The anonymous translator, who has given very little more than the letters and other documents, invaluable for the light thrown on the transactions of the period, together with the summaries of Irenaeus and some interpolations and explanations of his own, sometimes barely intelligible, entitled his work Synodicon. It was first given to the world in 225 chapters by Chr. Lupus (Christian Wolf, an Augustinian professor of theology at Louvain), in Epistolae Diversae, as Ad Ephesinum Concilium variorum Patrum Epistolae (Louvain, 1682), from a MS. at Monte Cassino, and was reprinted the next year by Baluze in his Nova Collectio Conciliorum, coll. 663-959 (Paris, 1683). Baluze complains that Lupus made his transcript carelessly, and with serious omissions, and that all his own attempts to secure a more accurate collation of the MS. were frustrated by the obstinacy of its monastic guardians. Mabillon was equally unsuccessful. We do not know whether any subsequent attempts have been made to get a sight of the codex. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom. xiv. p. 605.)

The letter of Irenaeus to the Oriental bishops at Ephesus, detailing the result of his deputation to the emperor at Constantinople, is given in the original Greek (Labbe, Concil. iii. 717), and in a Latin translation in the Synodicon, c. 21.

This see was originally part of the diocese of Barcelona, but was made a separate one by Nundinarius bishop of Barcelona, with the consent of the archbishop of Tarragona and his suffragans, about the middle of the 5th century, and Irenaeus was appointed first bishop. Nundinarius made him his heir, and expressed as his last wish that he should be his successor. This appointment was universally desired, and was approved of by the other bishops of the province, who wrote to pope Hilarus, asking him to confirm it. The pope, on Dec. 30, 465, replied to the letter of the bishops, rebuking them severely for transgressing the Nicene decree, which prohibited the translation of bishops. He ordered that Irenaeus should be removed from the see of Barcelona, and sent back to his own see. (Gams, Kirchengesch. ii. 430; Hilarus in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 14, 19; Esp. Sag. xxix. 114-119; xlii. 182.)

IRENAEUS (11), bishop of Harpasa in Caria, an opponent of the faith of Chalcedon. Le Quien mentions an excerpt of his work against the council among the MSS. of the Jesuits' library at Paris. He probably flourished during the reign of the emperor Anastasius, A.D. 491-518. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 909.) [L. D.]

IRENAEUS (12), 26th bishop of Pavia. c. 787, between Hieronymus and Ubalduus. (Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xii. 406, 516.)

[A. H. D. A.]

IRENAEUS (13), grammarian of Alexandria. IRENAEUS (3) in the *Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog.*ocrates (H. E. iii. 7) quotes his work on the Attic dialect, as saying that the word ὑπόστασις is barbarous. [T. W. D.]

IRENAEUS (14), Aug. 26, martyr at Rome with Abundius during the Decian persecution. Having rescued the body of St. Concordia HIPPOLYTUS (5), they were flung into a sewer, whence their bodies were recovered and buried near the tomb of St. Laurence on the Via Tiburtina. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon. Usuard.; Till. Mém. iii. 236.) [G. T. S.]

IRENAEUS (15), Dec. 15, said to have suffered martyrdom with Antouius, Theodorus, and others, under the emperor Valerian at Rome. (Mart. Rom.) [T. W. D.]

IRENAEUS (16), July 3, deacon and martyr at Clusium in Etruria, with Mustiola and many others, under Aurelian, A.D. 274. (Mart. Usuard.; A. S. S. Boll. Juf. i. 638-41; Tillem. Mém. iv. 54.) [G. T. S.]

IRENAEUS (17), a magistrate addressed by St. Ambrose (ep. 26) cir. 386. All the MSS., the Benedictine editor observes, have this letter ascribed to Irenaeus, while all the printed editions have Studius, to whom also the previous letter is addressed, the two letters, as shewn by their contents, being written to the same person. The Benedictine and Ceillier (v. 492) suggest that the magistrate was named Studius Irenaeus. [J. G.]

IRENAEUS (18), priest, to whom St. Ambrose, in 387, addressed twelve letters, Epp. 27-33, 64, 69, 73, 74, 76, cf. Bened. note, and Ceillier, v. 493. [J. G.]

IRENAEUS (19), a taxgatherer of Hippo, whose dead son is reported by St. Augustine Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 19) to have been restored to life after having been anointed with the oil of the martyr Stephen. [T. W. D.]

IRENAEUS (20), an envoy who conjointly with Faustus [FAUSTUS (37)] brought back from the emperor Anastasius, probably in 493, a letter to pope Gelasius (Gelas. ep. 8 in Pat. Lat. lix. 41; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 54). Baronius (Annal. 493, vi.) thinks it probable that he was one of those unnamed envoys referred to by Cassiodorus (Var. i. 1) as sent by Theodoric the Great to Anastasius. [T. W. D.]

IRENAEUS (21), surnamed ὁ Πενταδιαστής by John Malalas, and by the Chronicon Paschale, described as ὁ Πενταδίας, which the Latin version of Du Cange doubtfully renders filius Pentadiae), an officer of great reputation and a native of Antioch (Joann. Malal. Hist. Chron. libb. xvi. xviii. t. ii. 113, 182, ed. Oxon.). In 507 he was sent by the emperor Anastasius I. to quell a riot at Antioch, and by measures of great severity succeeded (ibid. 110-113). In 519, as count of the East, he was entrusted by the emperor Justin I. with the duty of expelling from Antioch the heretic bishop Severus. Count Irenaeus resided at Antioch. (Evagrius Scholasticus, H. E. lib. iv. cap. 4 and note by Valesius; Baron. Ann. ad ann. 519, cxliii.) In 528, he being then magister militum, was sent with two others, Belisarius and Cerycus, by Justinian, to aid Tzathius, king of the Lazi, a people who had embraced Christianity some years previously, and were now being attacked by the Persians; but here the three commanders failed, and were replaced by Peter (Chron. Pasch. s. a.). About 530 he was sent by Justinian as magister militum to supersede Theodorus as dux of Palestine and extinguish the insurrection of the Samaritans. This duty he accomplished, but not without acts of much cruelty, to avoid which some of the Samaritans submitted to baptism, and made hollow professions of Christianity (Chron. Pasch. ann. 530; Joan. Mal. u. s. 182; Clinton, F. R. ann. 529). This occurrence would appear to have been the occasion of the undated novel 114 of Justin II. De Samarititis. (Corp. Jur. Civ. ed. Kriegel, t. iii. p. 636; see also Novell. 129 De Samarititis, Jun. 15, 551, Krieg. iii. 129; Cod. Justinian. lib. i. tit. v. num. 12, 17, 18.) [T. W. D.]

IRENAEUS (22) (HIRENEUS, Us.; IRENE, Ado)—Feb. 10. Martyr at Rome with Zoticus, Jacinctus and Amantius. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

IRENAEUS (23) (HIRENEUS)—May 5, martyr by fire at Thessalonica with Peregrinus and Irene. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

IRENAEUS (24) (HIRENEUS)—Mar. 26, deacon, martyr, commemorated at Pentapolis in Libya, with bishop Theodorus and the readers Serapion and Ammonius. (Mart. Usuard., Adon.) [G. T. S.]

IRENARCHUS (1)—Nov. 28. Martyr at Sebaste in the Diocletian persecution. His office was that of a lictor, to whose lot it fell to apply torture to the martyrs. Converted by their patience, he was in turn tortured and beheaded. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

IRENARCHUS (2), deacon representing Cometas, bishop of Amastus, in Paphlagonia at the council of Constantinople in 680. (Mansi, xi. 650, 678.) [T. W. D.]

IRENE (1)—May 5, a mythical martyr, celebrated specially at Constantinople, when there were three churches dedicated under her name, the earliest of which was built by Constantine the Great (Codinus, De Aedif. C. P. p. 38, p. 73, ed. Bekker). The legend is that she was taught the truth by an angel, and baptized by Timothy the disciple of St. Paul. Her father Licinius bound her to a wild horse, but she escaped unhurt, while he was killed by the animal. She restored him to life by her prayers, when he, with three thousand others, embraced Christianity. They suffered under a president Amelianus. (Bas. Men.; A. S. S. Boll. Mai. ii. 4.) [G. T. S.]

IRENE (2) Cyp. Ep. 42 (cf. AUGENDUS, "Rutilorum," i.e. like Florida (and russati, Fell., but ?), a confessor who had shed blood, a leading member of Felicissimus's party, excommunicated with him. [E. W. B.]

IRENE (3) (AERENA, HÈRENA, HIRENE, SERENA, SYRENA), widow of the Roman martyr Castulus, c. A.D. 300. In the Acta S. Sebastiani, written by St. Ambrose (Opp. Migne, Pat. Lat. xvii. 1056, c. 23), she is represented as having gone to take away and bury the body of St. Sebastian, but finding life in it, she carried him home, nursed, and restored him to health.

[J. G.]

IRENE (4) (HIRENIS, Usuard.)—April 5. Virgin and martyr at Thessalonica under a count Sisinnius, with her sisters Agape and Chionia. [CHIONIA.] The Basilian menology (Ap. 5) places the event under Maximian, and relates that Irene was found in possession of the sacred writings which they had all been accustomed to read. These were taken from her and burnt, and herself then condemned to public outrage, from which however she was divinely preserved. Finally she was burned alive. But under Dec. 22, this menology states that she was slain by the sword of a soldier, while Usuard makes her die by an arrow of Sisinnius. (Mart. Bed., Vet. Rom., Usuard., Adon., all under Ap. 5; Fleury, lib. viii. capp. 55, 56, who puts her martyrdom on Mar. 25; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 42.)

[G. T. S.]

IRENE (5) (ERENA, HEIRA, HIRENA), sister of pope Damasus (A.D. 366-384), and virgin, commemorated on Feb. 21. She was of Spanish extraction, but was probably born in Rome. After the death of her father Antonius and her mother she lived with her brother Damasus. She must have early taken the vow of virginity, as she is said to have been only in her twentieth year when she died of fever in the twelfth year of her brother's elevation to the papacy, that is, in A.D. 378. She spent much of her time with her brother in the catacombs. He wrote to her memory an epitaph in fifteen hexameter lines, which have often been printed. (Gruter, Inscrip. Ant. ii. 1172, no. 10, Ed. Amst. 1707; Baronius, Ann. ann. 984, xxi.; Boll. Acta SS. 21 Feb. iii. 245.)

[J. G.]

IRENE (6), supposed by some to have been a concubine of Dioscorus patriarch of Alexandria, on the following grounds. At the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, Actio III., Ischyron, a deacon of Alexandria, publicly charged the patriarch with having a concubine Pansophia, "surnamed 'Ορεινή" (Mansi, vi. 1016). But from an epigram in the Greek Anthology, where the word ειρήνη is introduced in such a manner as seems to insinuate the name of a bishop's concubine, it has been conjectured that the 'Ορεινή of the council is a corrupt reading of what was originally Ειρήνη. (Anthologia Palatina, cap. xvi. num. 19, ed. Dübner, Paris, 1872, vol. ii. p. 530, and note p. 610; Gibbon, D. and F. vol. vi. p. 28 note, ed. Smith.)

[C. H.]

IRENE (7), wife of Domitius Patricius, rendered fruitful through the prayers of Theodorus Siceotes, as stated in Eleusius's life of this father, given by the Bollandist (Acta SS. 22 Apr. iii. 33), and quoted by Baronius (A. E. ann. 608, viii.).

[C. H.]

IRENE (8), virgin martyr, born near the city of Thomar, in the eastern part of Leyria, near the river Naba, a tributary of the Zezere, which flows into the Tagus from the north, a little below the town of Abrantes. Some authors call her birthplace Nabancia, from the name of the river. Her parents were named Hermigius and Eugenia, and were of gentle birth. Eugenia's brother Selius was abbat of a famous monastery there. Her legend, which has all the elements of a modern romance, describes how Britaldus the son of the governor of Lusitania became enamoured of her; how she repelled the criminal advances of her preceptor Remigius, who revenged himself by blasting her character; and how she was finally murdered by Britaldus, who had been deceived by the slander. Her martyrdom is placed in A.D. 653 in the reign of Recisvinth. Her feast is celebrated on Oct. 20. (J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. v. 592; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 201; Boll. AA. SS. Oct. viii. 911.) The stories of this Irene and some of the preceding ones are reviewed in Guazzugli Marini's Notizie riguardanti il culto di Santa Irene martyr, Osimo, 1783.

IRENE (9) I., first wife of the emperor Constantine V. (Copronymus), to whom she was married A.D. 733. She was the daughter of the chaganus or king of the Khazars or Turks, and the emperor Leo Isaurus, on giving her to his son, first had her baptized and called her name Irene (Theoph. Chron. A. C. 724; Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. anno xvi. Leonis, in Pat. Gr. cxxi. 878). She was probably the niece of the emperor Justinian II. (Rhinotmetus), as his second wife was Theodora, daughter of Buisus, king of the same nation. Indeed, from the time of Heraclius, who in 626 offered his daughter in marriage to the king of the Khazars, it seems to have been the policy of the emperors to form matrimonial alliances with their ruling family, using them as a set-off to the power of Persia and the Saracens. (Le Beau, Hist. du Bas-Empire t. xi. p. 119.) Theophanes and Cedrenus (u. s.) describe her as deeply read in theology (τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα), eminent for piety, refuting the impiety of her husband and father-in-law and the enemies of God (τῶν ἀθέων). Irene seems in secret to have favoured image-worship. On Jan. 25, 750, she became the mother of a son, who afterwards reigned as Leo IV., the Khazar (Theoph. A. C. 741). She must have died very soon afterwards, as her successor, the empress Maria, also died that year. (Du Cange, Hist. Byzant. p. i. de Familii Imper. Constantinop. p. 105, ed. 1729.)

[G. T. S.]

IRENE (10) II. (in the Latin writers HIRENE, HYRENA, HERENA, and in the Chron. of St. Denys, HELAINE), wife of Leo IV. Chazar, empress in title from A.D. 769, and a ruling empress in her son's name or her own from 780 to 802. She was contemporary with Charles the Great in the West and with Haroun al Rashid in the East. Her importance in ecclesiastical history arises from the prominent part she bore in the establishment of images in the Eastern Church. The only separate work on her is Vincent Mignet's Histoire de l'Impératrice Irène, Amst. 1762, 12mo. The principal ancient authority for her is Theophanes (Patr. Gr. cviii.), a contemporary historian, a supporter of her ecclesiastical policy, and one of those present in the seventh synod.

Irene was a native of Athens, and when selected as a wife for his son by the emperor Constantine Copronymus, was an orphan (Theoph. p. 404 int.). When she was thus elevated, the Greek race was low in estimation, mere provincials, while the ruling class were Asiatics. On her arrival from the south in the summer of 769 she was at first lodged in the palace of Hieria, on the Propontic promontory of Heraeum Ducange, Cpōlis. Chr. lib. iv. p. 122, col. 2, ed. 1729. There were two places named Heraeum on the Propontis: this one was on the Asiatic side, south of Chalcedon, and not far from Prince's Island. The palace of Hieria became again her residence later in life, and on Prince's island she was buried. On Sept. 1, 769, she was conveyed across the water by a flotilla of swift vessels gay with silken decorations, and was received at Constantinople by a concourse of the principal citizens, male and female, who conducted her to the palace (Th. 374). On Sept. 3, at the church of Pharos within the palace (Ducange, Cpōlis. Chr. lib. iv. p. 64) the ceremony of betrothal to Leo was performed (ἐγένετο σπύζα), the patriarch Nicetas officiating. On Dec. 17 Irene was crowned empress in the great state-chamber of the palace (the triclinium Augustaei, Onc. lib. ii. p. 95, col. 1, D), and passing from thence to the Daphne in another part of the palace (ibid. p. 98, num. 24, and lib. iv. p. 94, num. 89), she received with Leo, in the chapel of St. Stephen, the nuptial garlands (τὰ τοῦ γάμου στέφανα, nuptiales corollas), the bestowal of which, with the benediction, completed the union (Ducange, Gloss. Gr. art. στέφανοι, and cf. Goar's notes on Cedrenus, p. 817, Patr. Gr. cxxi.). It may be noticed that Nicephorus the patriarch concludes his history with a mention of Irene's marriage and coronation (De Rebus post Maur. p. 86, in Pat. Gr. t. c. p. 990). As Leo was now in his twentieth year, Irene would naturally be about seventeen, which is the age given her by modern writers, and for which there seems no textual authority.

On Jan. 14, 771 (Th. 375), she gave birth to her only child, who received the name of Constantine, in honour of his grandfather. The death of this emperor on Sept. 14, 775 (Th. 378), advanced her husband Leo to the throne.

Leo probably foresaw the ambitious designs of his five half-brothers, and anticipated his own early death. At any rate, the coronation of his son on Easter-day (Th. 379), Ap. 14, 776, was celebrated with what appears an unusual anxiety to make the succession secure. After the ceremony, which was performed in the Hippodrome, Irene's procession followed that of the two emperors into the great church, where she occupied the empress's state seat apart in the catechumens' galleries (cf. Duc. lib. iii. pp. 22, 23). Her share in the programme, which is carefully stated by Theophanes, seems to shew an intention that she should be honoured with all proper dignity, but one unequivocally subordinate to her son's. In after years neither the army nor the people would suffer her name to precede his, as she desired.

Irene's family shared in her exaltation. In 777 her cousin (unnamed) was bestowed in marriage by the emperor on the Bulgarian prince Teleus, a refugee at court for the previous two years, a patrician and a Christian (Th. 380).

On Feb. 6, 780, died the patriarch Nicetas, and on Feb. 20 Paul was elected in his room, both of course belonging to the iconoclastic party. In the middle week of Lent (i.e. cir. Mar. 5) burst forth the emperor Leo's strong feelings, hitherto unnoticed, on the religious question of the day, by the arrest of six officers of the household for image-worship—Jacobus, Papias, Strategius, Theophanes, Leo, Thomas, with some others, who were all flogged, tonsured, ignominiously dragged through the streets and flung into prison, where Theophanes sank under his sufferings. The historian who narrates this (Th. 382) does not name Irene, but Cedrenus (p. 819) in his version of the story makes her the chief offender. Leo, he says, discovered two images in her pillow, and ascertained that she procured them through the principal officer of the household (ὁ παρίας) and other great functionaries (all unnamed). In the bitterest terms he charged her with having broken the oath she had sworn to his father upon the sacred mysteries; in vain she protested her innocence, asserting that the images had never been even seen by her; Leo thrust her off as a perjured woman and would have nothing further to do with her. Whichever version of the story is the more correct, it is plain that in the very palace there was an influential party devoted to the proscribed images. That they would seek to draw the empress to their side may be regarded as certain. If Irene was not already biased in that direction as an Athenian and a woman, as is sometimes too sarcastically remarked, it is still likely, as Dr. Finlay suggests, that policy would prompt her to look for a counterpoise against her natural enemies, the Isaurian princes and the army, in the church, which was then at heart devoted to images and in full influence with the people.

On Sept. 8, 780, Irene was a widow, at eight-and-twenty, and began to rule as guardian of her son. Forty days afterwards (Th. 383), i.e. cir. Oct. 18, 780, a plot was discovered, to give the succession to the caesar Nicephorus. Of Leo Chazar's five brothers, Christopher and Nicephorus were caesars; Nicetas, Anthimus, and Eudocimus, nobilissimi; and now, to incapacitate them all for the throne, Irene commanded them to be tonsured and forced into the clerical order. On the following Christmas-day the five imperial clergymen were obliged to exhibit their new profession before all the people by distributing the eucharistic elements at the great church.

At the same festival Irene went in a state procession to St. Sophia's to restore a crown of jewels which her husband had removed from thence (Th. 383). She had taken then already the position of a friend and patroness of religion. Another mark of her devotion about the same time is more significant. Cedrenus (p. 821) places it here, though Theophanes (370) and Glycas (pars iv. p. 530, ed. Bekker) put it in the reign generally. The relics of St. Euphemia, reported to have been recovered at Lemnos (Glycas says Lesbos), were ceremoniously brought to Constantinople and deposited in the church which Irene had restored for their reception near the Hippodrome. The act would be applauded as indicating a pious disposition on the side of images [EUPHEMIA (1)]. Another circumstance of the same period shews the party of reaction starting the idea that Irene's advent is in the special order of divine providence (θεοθεν παραδόξως, Cedren. 820), and had even been prophesied. It was given out that in the long walls of Thrace a tomb had been discovered containing the bones of a man lying beside an urn which bore this inscription: "Christ shall be born of the Virgin Mary, and I believe in Him. Under Constantine and Irene, O sun, thou shalt behold me again" (Th. 384).

In 781 she obtained the consent of Charles, king of the Franks, to a union between his daughter Erythro (a child of eight, known as Rotrude in the West) and her son Constantine (Th. 384). This engagement is known to Eginhard (Vit. Car. c. 19) and the Western annalists generally, who make it to have been negotiated at Rome in 781, though some put it under 787 (Duchesne, Script. ii. 22, 177; Bouquet, t. v. index under "Rotrudis").

In 782 the Saracen horsemen, appearing across the water on the heights of Chrysopolis (Scutari), compelled Irene to purchase a three years' truce by a heavy annual tribute to the calif (Th. 384). During this truce she sent an army in 783 to make imperial authority respected among the Slavonians of Thessalonica, Greece, and Peloponnesus (Th. 385). In 784 she and her son made a tour of Thrace, visiting Anchialus, Berrhoea (which now took her name Irenopolis), and farther west, Philippopolis. Besides a strong military escort, she took with her "organs and other musical instruments," which may have charmed the barbarian colonists of those regions. (On these expeditions and the Slavonic movements at this period see Finlay's Hist. Greece, ii. 86.)

On Aug. 31, 784, the patriarch Paul abdicated. His dying words, uttered later in the year, bemoaning his past opposition to images (Th. 385, 386), prove that public opinion on that subject had become earnest and expectant. The selection of a new patriarch was Irene's opportunity. Every ecclesiastic then eligible must have been appointed in the iconoclastic supremacy. She therefore thought of advancing a layman, her own secretary Tarasius. In the palace of Magnaura, up the Golden Horn in the north angle of the city (regio xiv. Duc. lib. ii. p. 102, col. 1), she assembled the people and took counsel with them. Tarasius was called for, and coming forward, dilated on the miserable distractions of the church, all owing to the arbitrary high-handedness of Leo Isaurus, who put down the images by his sole edict (sc. A.D. 726), instead of constitutionally acting through a council. Tarasius would accept the patriarchal chair only on a promise that a council might meet and close the controversy properly. No opposition was offered, and on Christmas-day 784, Tarasius was consecrated (Th. 386). No time was lost, and in the course of 785 invitations were sent out. Pope Hadrian was communicated with, and as the Saracen truce was yet open, so were the patriarchs of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch (Th. 388, 389).

We learn from a Western writer only that in 786, before Easter, Charles at Capua conferred with the emperor Constantine's ambassadors, who came to him "ad petendam filiam." Having conversed with them, "he dismissed them" (Eginhard. Annal. 786 in Bouquet, v. 208, and Pat. Lat. civ. 425). This is somewhat vague. Perhaps the marriage was the ostensible business, the real intention being to see that things were all smooth in the West before the council met.

That there were difficulties to be overcome was soon apparent. On Aug. 17, 786 (Th. 389, another reading being Aug. 7, while in Mansi, xii. 1000 D it is Aug. 1), the council attempted to meet in the church of the Apostles, the second greatest in Constantinople. Irene and Constantine occupied the catechumens' galleries to witness the proceedings. What they witnessed was a fierce iconoclastic soldiery, trained under Constantine Copronymus, in forcible possession of the church, drowning the voice of the ecclesiastics, who were obliged to desist. Irene had sufficient address to remedy that difficulty. In the month of September she had the malcontent troops sent out on distant service, and more docile recruits placed in garrison (Th. 389, 390). Constantinople, however, must have been found of doubtful temper, for in May 787 new invitations were issued and the place of assembly changed.

There are a few minor discrepancies of date, owing to various readings of texts, as to some of the sessions of the seventh synod. On Sept. 24, 787 (Mansi, xii. 992; Th. 390 says Oct. 11), it opened in the church of St. Sophia at Nicaea, under the imperial sanction of Constantine and Irene. Tarasius was its guiding spirit. Its members were almost if not entirely drawn from the limited territories which then acknowledged the imperial authority. Of all the Georges and Gregories, for instance, there was not one who belonged to the dominions of the califs [GEORGIUS (37), GREGORIUS (48)]. Two obscure monks, John and Thomas, were present, and signed for all the three Oriental patriarchs, of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, but they could not have been there had they not come during the previous truce for the earlier meeting and been detained since (Th. 389, 390). A passage in a letter of Theodorus Studita (ep. 38, lib. i.) has brought into question if even the two priests named Peter, who signed for the pope, were merely accredited to the synod and were not strictly bearers of a letter to Tarasius (vid. Mansi, xii. 1084. See also on these doubts Baron. ann. 787 lviii., and Gibbon, vol. vi. p. 164, note, ed. Smith). In the third session, Sep. 29 (Mansi, xii. 1113, 1153) the emperor and empress were complimented by the synod as a new Constantine the Great and another Helena. The seventh session, Oct. 13 (ib. xiii. 365), closed the sittings at Nicaea, when the ruling of the synod was subscribed and synodal letters were issued to the emperor and empress, and to the clergy of the capital, giving an official account of the proceedings. But Irene was anxious for some personal share in them, and the members before dispersing were requested to come to Constantinople. There in the palace of Magnaura, on Oct. 23, Constantine and Irene presided, with the holy-gospels before them, and in addition to the bishops, citizens and sympathising soldiers crowded into the chamber. This popular gathering was an eighth session according to some, as e.g. in the arrangement of Mansi (xiii. 414), while Pagi (ann. 787 vi.) and others treat the proceedings as extra-synodal. The Acta were the solemn subscription, first by the empress and afterwards by her son, of the synod's definition in the midst of addresses and hearty acclamations. (Mansi, xiii. 414, gives details; Theoph. 390, only a brief statement.) Thus what may be called the religious party of the day triumphed over the irreligion and lax belief in high places, but greatly through alliance with superstition in the lower orders. A religious policy based on an imperial view of things, persisted in by three Isaurian statesmen for half a century, is revolutionised in a moment by the genius of this Greek princess in concert with the ecclesiastics and the populace.

Now came a series of public troubles. In 788 the understanding between Irene and Charles suffered a rupture. This is reported both by Eastern (Th. 391) and Western (Bouquet, t. v. Index "Graeci") writers, but with discrepancy and obscurity. Theophanes states that Irene this year broke off the engagement with Rotrude, and in November married Constantine to the Armenian Maria. Then, after touching on something else, he proceeds to relate, without any connexion, how Irene sent an army into Lombardy (meaning the Lombardy of South Italy), and how it was defeated and the commander slain. Two Western authorities, and no more, assign reasons for the Byzantine attack, Eginhard and the metrical annals (Bouq. v. 152, 209), and both of these say that the object of the invasion was to be revenged on Charles for refusing his daughter Rotrude to Constantine. This Western account is the most intelligible, and, if correct, it shows Charles taking the earliest opportunity of breaking with the image-party. In 789 the Byzantine fleet suffered a reverse in conflict with the Saracens off Cyprus.

Perhaps it was the public disasters that encouraged the young emperor, now a married man, to cast off the yoke of his mother's tutelage. The design he formed among his intimate friends was to seize Irene and exile her to Sicily (Th. 391, 392). He succeeded in obtaining the reins of power, but not in the manner he expected. The violent earthquake of Feb. 9, 790, helps to fix the date. The court had retired for safety to the country palace of St. Mamas, up the Golden Horn (Duc. lib. i. 45, col. 1. iv. 121, col. 2), and the citizens were all under tents in their gardens, when, perhaps owing to the confusion of the court throwing the conspirators off their guard, Irene's minister Stauracius discovered the plot. Constantine was flogged and confined to the palace. Irene then sought to reverse the imperial style and place her own name first, which seemed her chief ambition. But this the army would not brook. In Sept. 790 they murmured, in October they mutinied, and then Irene in alarm released Constantine, who fled out to the troops at Atroa (ἐν τῇ Ἀτροῇ), and was by them saluted sole emperor. In December Irene had to retire to Eleutherium, a palace erected by herself on the Propontic shore of the city at its south-west angle (regio xii. Duc. lib. ii. p. 104; cf. p. 54 col. 1 c). In a year, however, Constantine's filial heart relented, and his mother was released from her seclusion.

On Jan. 15, 792, Irene reappeared in public, and had as hearty a reception as ever, but heard her name greeted only after that of her son (Th. 394). A disastrous defeat of Constantine in person, on July 20, 792, made the army mutinous and menacing. This brought the five uncles upon the scene for the second time as his opponents; but they all fell into his hands, and in the pleasant palace of St. Mamas, by his orders, Nicephorus lost his eyes and his brothers their tongues (Th. 395). Constantine, having provoked the army, next quarrelled with the church, by putting away Maria in Jan. 795, and in September taking Theodote. Theophanes states that Irene artfully encouraged her son in both these steps for her own ends (Th. 396, 397). The alienation of the monastic party from the emperor was complete. The most influential among them, Theodorus (afterwards called Studita), though he was a relative of Theodote, excommunicated him and was banished, as were the great body of the monks, who had followed his example (Vit. Theod. Stud. num. xiv. in Pat. Gr. xcix. 142). In Sept. 796 Irene accompanied Constantine with all the court and a large military escort to the baths of Prusa, beyond Nicaea, for his health. Here in October news arrived that Theodote had borne a son; Constantine immediately hurried home alone, and in his absence Irene successfully employed all her arts to corrupt both court and military, which she completely gained over to her schemes. On June 17, 797, an attempt to seize Constantine failed, and her confederates losing heart brought her into the greatest peril; they were goaded forward, however, under threats of exposure. Constantine fell into her power, and on Aug. 19, 797, by her orders, in the very room of the palace where he was born, he was deprived of his eyes. Theophanes, who was then living, relates that for seventeen days afterwards the very sun, in horror of the deed, refused to shine, and ships wandered about without guidance (Th. 398, 399). The text of Theophanes has given rise to some dispute as to whether Constantine survived his blinding. The words are ἐκτυφλοῦσιν αὐτὸν δεινῶς καὶ ἀνιάτως πρὸς τὸ ἀποθανεῖν αὐτόν. Baronius (Ann. 797 i.) relates that he died under the blow. For this statement Gibbon (vol. vi. p. 87, Smith) takes him to task, and Schlosser (p. 327 n) by various texts supports Gibbon. Cedrenus (831) and Zonaras (lib. xv. c. 14) distinctly record that Constantine survived his mother. Now again, for the third time, the five uncles return to view. Rushing from their confinement, they made a piteous appeal, blind and inarticulate, at St. Sophia's; but no one would rise against Irene. They were led away and taken to Athens. The empress's steady supporters, the monks, were at once summoned back from exile and returned in great triumph, Irene herself as well as the patriarch going out to welcome Theodorus home (Vit. Theod. Stud. num. xxv.). A daring raid of the Saracens in 798, pushed to the verge of the Bosphorus, with the loss of some of the empress's own state equipage from Mangana (Th. 400; cf. Le Beau, xii. 375), seems to have tempted the party of the five uncles for the fourth time. But the stroke failed, and those of them who had lost their tongues were now deprived of eyes (Th. 400), after which they disappear from history. Their reiterated appearances shew that the Isaurian party were undaunted and unflagging. It was the business, therefore, of Irene's supporters to keep her popular; and this was not difficult. Palace deeds can be shrouded and misrepresented at the moment by a sufficient number of interested men. Public disgraces could little affect those who had lost the imperial instinct and the old Roman spirit. Irene could still therefore trust herself amongst the people, and the pageant scene by which her name is so well remembered, and which belongs to this period, need not occasion surprise. On Easter-Monday, Ap. 1, 799, Irene and her court celebrated the customary processional return from the church of the Apostles, after the service of the day, with more than usual pomp. From this church in the extreme west to her palace in the east, through the entire length of Constantinople, in the evening of the day, she rode in her golden chariot, scattering largess among the crowds, while her four white steeds were led by as many patricians (Th. 400; Cedr. 828).

But patricians were now scheming in an heirless palace for themselves. In May 799, as she was rising from a nearly mortal illness, one of her two trusted ministers betrayed to her the secrets of the other, and in vexation and anger she withdrew to the palace at Hieria. On June 3, 800, died the minister Stauracius, leaving Aetius to plot alone (Th. 400).

It was Irene's lot to be reigning over the empire when the great western coronation of Dec. 25, 800, so humbled Byzantine pride. The female sceptre in the East may perhaps have caused Charles to be the more loudly applauded at Rome. But Irene's popularity, probably a partisan one, never seems to have failed, and the last thing we hear of her rule is a remission of taxes and commercial dues in March 801 (Theoph. 401; Cedren. 828; Hist. Miscell. in Pat. Lat. xc. 1125 D). The release must have been on a great scale; for Theodorus Studita addressed her in a long panegyric (lib. i. ep. 7) for her beneficence, declaring that the people had been delivered from a truly Egyptian bondage and graphically describing the relief afforded to all the various trades.

In the autumn of 802 arrived at Constantinople an embassy from the new emperor of the West, proposing a union of the two empires by the marriage of Charles and Irene. The minister Aetius, who was hoping to gain the sceptre into his own family, seeing Irene favourably entertaining the project, plotted her overthrow. Such is the statement of Theophanes (402). The embassy is a fact, being reported also by Western annalists, who name as the envoys Jesse bishop of Amiens and the count Helmgandus (Bouquet, t. v. index, "Irene"). They are silent, however, as to any project of marriage, merely stating that the embassy was for the confirming of peace, and was sent in return for one that came first from Irene herself. Charles's age was sixty, and Irene's about fifty; the marriage proposal may therefore have been, as Gibbon suggests (vi. 180), a report propagated by Irene's enemies, to charge her with the guilt of betraying the church and state to the strangers of the West.

But whatever the occasion, a successful plot overthrew Irene at last, and Charles's ambassadors were at Constantinople to witness the revolution, which was abrupt and brief. On the night of Oct. 30, 802, Nicephorus the treasurer drew soldiers around the palace of Eleutherium, wherein Irene was lying ill (Zon. xv. 3). In the morning he conducted her his prisoner to the great palace, where she was detained while he went on to St. Sophia's and had himself crowned her successor (Th. 402 fin.; Cedren. 830 init.). In vain she besought the favour of continuing in occupation of her own palace Eleutherium. Nicephorus must have been too well aware of the risk to concede that; and when he had extracted from her where the treasure was concealed, he obliged her to remove to Prince's Island, where she had founded a monastery. In the inclement season of November she was taken to Lesbos, where, on Aug. 9, 803, she expired. The following ancient writers who mention her Lesbos exile are silent as to her maintaining herself there by spinning (Le Beau, xii. 400):—Theophanes, Cedrenus, Anastasius, Zonaras, the continuator of the Historia Miscella. The day of her commemoration, Aug. 15, given by Le Beau (ibid.), seems also unconfirmed. Aug. 7 is the day assigned to her in the Basilian Menology, where she is also mentioned at Ap. 17.

A bronze statue in her honour, erected by her son Constantine at the phiala or fountain of the Hippodrome, is mentioned by Codinus (De Orig. Cp. p. 124, ed. Bekker; cf. Duc. lib. ii. p. 86, col. 2). Her name seems also to have become associated with one of the city palaces, according to a passage in Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who, in his life of Hadrian II. (num. 628), in the Liber Pontificalis, when relating the reception of that pope's envoys by the emperor Basil in 869, writes: "descendentibus ad Irenes palatium in domum quae dicitur magna Aurea... laudabiliter suscipiuntur" (Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1390; Duc. lib. ii. p. 102, col. 1 D). Ducange suggests, with much probability, that our Irene is the person intended in this passage; but he does not identify the palace. Taken by itself, "Irenes palatium" would seem best to indicate Eleutherium; but in its connexion it might better suit the Magnaura itself, as distinct from the particular chamber in it (the splendid Magna Aurea, on which see Duc. lib. ii. 102, col. 2) which gave it the more usual name. If this was the Irene's palatium, the name might have preserved the memory of her public connexion with it, and the more particular event of her subscribing the seventh synod there.

Dr. Finlay states (Hist. Gr. ii. 76 note, 86) that several small Byzantine churches at Athens, a few of them surviving to present times, are traditionally said to have been erected by the empress Irene; but the cathedral of Athens is dedicated not to the empress Irene but to the martyr Irene.

One female relation of Irene has been already mentioned in this article. There was another at Athens named Theophano, who, though betrothed to another, was compelled by Irene's successor Nicephorus to marry his son Stauracius (Zonaras, Annal. xv. 14).

The details of Byzantine history during Irene's period may be read in Le Beau (Hist. du Bas-Empire, 1824, t. xii. 280-400); Schlosser (Geschichte der bilderstürmenden Kaiser, 1812, pp. 250-339); and Finlay (Hist. Gr. t. ii. pp. 69 sqq.). [C. H.]

IRENE (11), monialis, addressed perhaps cir. A.D. 800, conjointly with another named Euphrosyne by Theodorus Studita (lib. ii. ep. 104 in Patr. Gr. xcix. 1359), who exhorts them to persevere in the monastic life. [R. S. G.]

IRENE (12), praeposita (ἡγουμένη) of some female monastery, addressed by Theodorus Studita, perhaps about A.D. 800, respecting the behaviour to be observed towards a presbyter who had been detected in communion with heretics. (Theod. Stud. lib. ii. ep. 203.) [R. S. G.]

military officer of high rank, apparently at Constantinople. Four letters of Theodorus Studita are addressed to her. He consoles her in the illness of her daughter (lib. i. ep. 55). He bids her (ii. 175) use her influence with her husband that he may exercise his command in the fear of God, care for the widow and the orphan, love the monks and the poor, and above all be true to the orthodox faith (sc. in opposition to the Iconoclasts). She has consulted him respecting the monastery named The Lions, of which her deceased daughter was the director for many years, and where she lies buried. Irene desires now to convert the institution into a male monastery, and Theodore strongly dissuades her from such a step (ii. 192). In another letter (noticed by Baronius under the year 818) she appears to have lapsed in her fidelity to the image cause, but she has confessed her fault, done penance for it, and is now in banishment from Constantinople and all her earthly comforts. Theodore is lavish of his admiration, and assures her that her praise is on all lips (ii. 68). [C. H.]

IRENE (14) (HIRENE), May 5. Martyr at Thessalonica with Irenaeus and Peregrinus. (Mart. Usuard., Adon.) [G. T. S.]

IRENICUS (Latinised PACIFICUS), presbyter and hegumen of the monastery of the Pictores (τῶν γραφητῶν), in the jurisdiction of Photinus bishop of Chalcedon. He subscribed the libellus monachorum addressed to the patriarch Mennas in 536. (Mansi, viii. 1015.) [T. W. D.]

IRENIO, bishop of Gaza. [IRENAEUS (6).]

IRMINA, ST. (HIRMINA, ERMINA), daughter of Dagobert king of Austrasia, abbess of Horreum (Oeren, Horres), near Trèves. On the death of count Herman, to whom she was betrothed, she desired to become a nun. Dagobert gave his granary at Trèves to St. Modoald to be converted into a monastery, where Irmina was either first abbess, succeeded by St. Modesta, or second abbess, following Modesta and succeeded by St. Anastasia. A pestilence in her nunnery was supposed to have been stayed by St. Willibrord, to whom she gave Epternach and other estates. The charter by which Dagobert establishes the monastery of Horreum, and those conveying Irmina's gifts to Epternach, represent her as daughter of Dagobert I. (A.D. 628-638) by Nantilda; but Henschenius and most of the hagiographers pronounce her to be daughter of Dagobert II. (A.D. 674-679), by Matilda, an English princess, whom he married during his exile. Pertz gives the deeds amongst Diplomata Spuria and declares Irmina a fabulous person. Her life by Theofrid, abbat of Epternach in the 12th century, appears not to have been thought sufficiently trustworthy to be included in the principal collections. Le Cointe gives extracts from it. The date assigned to her death varies between 702 and 720. She was buried at Weissenberg, a monastery in the Vosges founded by Dagobert. She is said to have been sister of Adela the first abbess of Palatio-lum (Palz near Trèves), who was perhaps a real person, though her will and her relationship to Dagobert are considered fictitious. St. Irmina appears in the modern Roman Martyrology, and in the auctaria to that of Usuard, Dec. 24. She is regarded as the patron saint of Trèves, and founder, with St. Willibrord, of Epternach. She is represented as forming, with her reputed father and sister, a group of saintly founders. Authorities, Pertz, *Monum. IRMINBURGA, queen. [EORMENBURGA (2).]

IRMYNBURGA, the name of an abbess in a spurious charter of Wihtrud king of Kent, A.D. 694. (Elmhams, ed. Hardwick, 296; Kemble, C.D. 44; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 246.) [EORMENBURGA (1).] [C. H.]

ISAACUS (1), bishop of Carcha Beth-Seleucia, martyred A.D. 339, the 34th year of Sapor II. in the persecution instigated by the Magians. He was stoned to death by the leading Christians of Beth-Nicator at the command of Artascir king of Adiabene and brother of Sapor (Assem. Bibl. Orient. i. 189; Assem. Acta Mart. i. 96, 100, 133, 226). He was commemorated on Nov. 20. [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (2), the name of two Meletian bishops in the Thebaid, one of Cleopatra, the other of Letopolis (Athanas. Apol. c. Ar. cap. 71; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 521, 527). The bishop of Letopolis (ἐν Λητοῦς) is believed to be the bishop Isaac "a Lueto" at the synod of Philopopolis, in 343 (Mansi, iii. 139). [C. H.]

ISAACUS (3), 2nd known bishop of Geneva, between Diogenus and Dominus (Gall. Chr. xvi. 377), cited by St. Eucherius bishop of Lyons, as one of the sources of his knowledge of the story of St. Maurice and the Thebaean Legion. He ruled probably between A.D. 389 and 415; certainly before 441. Isaac's informant was Theodorus or Theodolus, bishop of Sion. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 274; Gall. Chr. xii. 769, 770.) [R. T. S.]

ISAACUS (4), archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, fifth in his see from Simeon the martyr, lived under Isdigerd of Persia and the emperor Theodosius, being thus a contemporary of St. Chrysostom. Amru notes his contempt of the world, his charity, wisdom, and miraculous powers. Cajumas resigned the patriarchate in favour of Isaac at a synod held at Modain (Seleucia) before Maruthas bishop of Mayafarqin or Tagrit [MARUTHAS], A.D. 399. The interpolator of Amru relates how Isdigerd, having fallen sick, applied to Arcadius (rather to his son Theodosius) for a physician. Maruthas was sent, with a letter begging toleration for the persecuted Christians of the East. Isdigerd was cured, and the persecution ceased, so that Isaacus was enabled to fulfil his long-cherished design of a synod. In A.D. 410 forty bishops and metropolitans met at Modain under the presidency of Maruthas and Isaac, and twenty-two (Amru) or twenty-six (Renaudot) canons were framed and passed. They are extant in a Syriac MS. at Florence, and all relate to church discipline, save the second, which contains an exposition of the faith (Renaudot, Lit. Or. 2, 272). U

Then Maruthas submitted the canons of the West, and the bishops in turn displayed what Eastern canons had been discovered. Assemani doubts the existence of the latter, as this was the first synod of the Orientals. Elias, who was metropolitan of the Nestorians of Damascus, 893 A.D., has given in his Nomocanon, part ii., an account of the synod under Isaac primate of Seleucia and Maruthas bishop of Mayafarqin. He states that Maruthas had rendered the Nicene canons into Syriac, and that at this synod the question of their reception was discussed and decided in the affirmative, all the bishops present setting their seals to the document. Isaac died A.D. 411. (Assem. Bibl. Orient. I. 194, 195; II. 400, 401; III. i. 363-368; Elias Damasc. Nomocanon, 507, p. ii. in Cod. 37, an Arabic MS. in the Vatican, quoted by Renaudot; Concilium Seleucia et Ctesiphonti habitum, a. 410, T. J. Lamy, Lovan. 1869.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (5), bishop of Uthina, or Uthina, a town in the eastern part of Proconsular Africa, mentioned by Pliny as a Roman colony, and by Ptolemy as between the rivers Bagradas and Triton (Plin. H. N. v. 4, 29; Ptol. iv. 3, 34). He was present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 133).

ISAACUS (6), bishop of Pachnamunis and Elearchia, on the eastern shore of the lake Butos in the Delta. He was present at the third general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he sided with Cyril, and signed all the synodical decrees. (Mansi, iv. 1128, 1221; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 568.) [J. de S.]

ISAACUS (7) I., ST. (SAHAG THE GREAT, PARTHEV, THE PARTHIAN), catholicos of the church of Greater Armenia, according to one account for forty, according to another for fifty-one years, 390-441. Moses of Khorene states that he belonged to the house of the founder of the Armenian church, being the son of Nerses the Great, the son of Athenogenes, the son of Iousig, the son of Verthanes, the son of Gregory the Illuminator. His long patriarchate is remarkable for the invention of the Armenian characters by Mesrob, to whom they were revealed according to the native tradition by the divine grace; the translation of the Scriptures into the Armenian language, and the commencement of the golden age of Armenian literature; by the revision of the Armenian liturgy, first translated from the Greek by Gregory, which has continued unaltered ever since in the Armeno-Gregorian church; and by the destruction of the independence of Armenia, which has since been ruled successively by the Persians, the Saracens, the Turks, and the Russians. At the commencement of his patriarchate Isaac visited the Persian king at Ctesiphon, where on behalf of his sovereign, he acknowledged Armenia to be tributary to the Persian empire. Owing to the troubled state of the country he was virtually ruler for several years. In 428, from which date Armenian chronology becomes more certain (St. Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 320, note) the Persian king deposed Ardashes IV., the last of the Armenian Arsacidae, and Isaac retired into Western Armenia, either by order of the Persian monarch or through the enmity of the satraps of his own country, whom it is said he had offended by refusing to join in their plans. Owing to the disorders and troubles of the church and country, he was unable to alter the mistake into which the Armenian church had fallen in celebrating the Lord's nativity concurrently with His baptism on Jan. 6, upon which subject he had held communication with Chrysostom. Whilst he was in Western Armenia (428-439) he sent Mesrob to Constantinople with letters to the emperor Theodosius II., the patriarch Arcadius, and the general Anatolius, who was commissioned by the emperor to build the city of Theodosiopolis (called Garin by the Armenians, Erzeroum by the Turks), near the sources of the Euphrates, as a place of refuge for Isaac. Meanwhile the Persian kings set up others as patriarchs in his stead, but at length the Armenian satraps repented and invited Isaac to resume his throne. This he refused to do, but appointed one administrator in his stead, according to some Mastentzes, according to Moses of Khorene Samuel, nominated by the Persian king. [ARMENIANS.] After the death of his vicar he seems to have partially resumed his episcopal functions over the whole Armenian community. On account of the patriarch's expulsion, the archbishop of Cappadocian Caesarea disallowed the ordination of bishops, which had been conceded to Isaac; but by the influence of the Persians all connexion between Armenia and Caesarea was from this time forth broken off—a fact which tended towards the isolation of the Armenian church. Isaac did not attend the general council of Ephesus. He died at the age of one hundred and ten years, being the last Armenian patriarch of the family of Gregory the Illuminator; he was followed to the grave in six months by his friend Mesrob. The last chapter of the third book (the fourth is lost) of the history of Moses of Khorene is an elegy on Ardashes, the last of the Armenian Arsacidae, and on Isaac the last patriarch of the family of Gregory the Illuminator. He is commemorated by the orthodox church on Nov. 20. (Moses of Khorene, bk. iii. c. xlix.-lxviii., in Langlois, Hist. de l'Arménie, ii. 159-173; St. Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 437; Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. vii.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1375; Malan, Life of St. Gregory, p. 28.)

ISAACUS (8) II. (SAHAG), of Arcan, catholicos of the Armenian church for seven or five years, between Musce and Christopher I. He was of Oughga in the province of Hark'h (Charca or Arcan). [ARMENIANS.] (Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. x.; Le Quien, O. C. i. 1381; St. Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, ii. 438, gives his date at A.D. 510.) [L. D.]

ISAACUS (9) III. (SAHAG), of Bazacastrium, catholicos of Armenia, c. A.D. 670-690, between Israel and Elias, previously bishop of the province of Rhodog. [ARMENIANS.] (Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. xv.; Le Quien, O. C. iii. 1389; St. Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 438.) [L. D.]

ISAACUS (10), bishop of Tana in Egypt, between Andropolis and Nicius, represented at the third general council (A.D. 431) by his colleague Adelphius of Onuphis, who signed on his behalf. He took part personally in the Ephesine Latrocinium, A.D. 449, and two years later supported Dioscorus at the council of Chalcedon by his protest against the decree of condemnation.

He also refused to approve of the epistle of Leo to Flavianus. (Mansi, iv. 1225; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 525.) [J. de S.]

ISAACUS (11), bishop of Thinis or Thynis (Ptolemais), in Thebais Secunda, one of the orthodox Egyptian bishops who, with some Alexandrian clerics, fled to Constantinople in A.D. 457, to escape the persecution of Timotheus Aelurus and the Eutychians [NESTORIUS, bishop of Phragones]. His name appears in their petition to the emperor Leo (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 696; Mansi, vii. 530), and at the head of the letter addressed to them by the pope Leo (Leo, Mag. Ep. clx. 1336). He appears also in the list of bishops subscribing the encyclical letter of the council held at Constantinople in A.D. 459, under Gennadius, against simony. (Hard. ii. 783. See Oriens Christianus, ii. 606.) [C. G.]

ISAACUS (12), bishop of Apamea in Syria Secunda, and metropolitan. He is mentioned in the records of the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. It was stated that his name had been removed from the diptychs by his heretical successor. (Mansi, viii. 990; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 913.) [J. de S.]

ISAACUS (13), doubtful bishop of Pola, c. 546. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 802.) [A. H. D. A.]

ISAACUS (14) NINIVITA, abbat, anchorite, and bishop of Nineveh, towards the end of the 6th century, for he quotes Jacobus Sarungensis and pseudo-Dionysius, and writes to Simeon Stylites junior, called Thaumastorita, who died A.D. 593 (Vatic. Cod. Graec. 391 ad fin.). An anonymous life is prefixed to his works, in the Vatican Cod. Nitr. xx., an Arabic MS. written A.D. 1516, in Syriac characters. The life states that Isaacus was by birth a Syrian, and that, with his brother who became abbat, he entered the great monastery of St. Matthew at Nineveh. Afterwards he retired thence to a lonely cell, where he long remained, in spite of his brother's earnest entreaties for his return. His fame as an anchorite became so great that Isaacus was raised to the bishopric of Nineveh, which, however, he resigned on the very day of his consecration, owing to the following incident. Two persons broke into his cell, wrangling about a debt. Isaacus urged the creditor to forbearance, on the ground of Luke vi. 30. The allusion was received with scorn. Concluding, therefore, that his own office was superfluous in a place where the gospel was so little esteemed, and feeling that episcopal functions interfered with the ascetic life, Isaacus finally retired to the desert of Scete or Scetis, where he died a pattern of saintliness. Lambecius (Comment. lib. v. p. 74 sqq.), Cave (Hist. Literar. i. 519), and others, make Isaacus retire from Mesopotamia to Spoleto in Italy; confusing him with another Isaacus Syrus, whom Gregory the Great (lib. 3, Dialog. cap. 14) relates to have lived near Spoleto from the beginning almost to the end of the Gothic dominion, i.e. from before 541 to 552 A.D. nearly.

Works.—Ebedjesu (Cat. p. 63) writes that "he composed seven tomes on spiritual guidance, and on divine mysteries, judgments, and government." A considerable number, though not all, of these discourses are extant in Syriac, Arabic, and Greek MSS. in the Vatican and other libraries. Cod. Nitr. xx. examined by Assemani, contains large portions of the first three tomes, and four sermons of book 4; and Cod. Nitr. xxi. and xxii. supply book 4, serm. 5-18 in Syriac. Assemani adds to book 4 three other discourses from Greek MSS. In the MSS., which he reviews, book 1 contains twenty-eight, book 2 forty-five, book 3 forty-four, and book 4 twenty sermons, and the epistle to Simeon. At the end of book 1 in Cod. Nitr. xx. the scribe wrote: "Finished is all that I found of the first book of Mar Isaac; the rest survives only in the regions of Syria."

The Greek codd. 391, &c. of the Vatican; Cod. Theol. 104, num. 7, fol. 128, at Vienna; and codd. 12, Barocci, num. 1, cod. 256 in MSS. Roe cod. 10, cod. 295 in MSS. Cromwell, cod. 116 (Isaaci Syri anachoretæ Homiliae asceticæ 99. Graece redditaæ ab Abramio et Isaacio [sic] Monachis S. Sabae, pp. 1-610) in the Bodelean; as well as MSS. at Turin, Milan, and elsewhere, contain a Greek version of the discourses of Isaacus done from the Syriac, by Patricius and Abraham, monks of St. Saba. Fifty-three of them were rendered from the Greek into Latin, circ. A.D. 1407, by a monk who freely abridged and altered the order of his original. In this form they appear in the various Bibliothecae Patrum, as a continuous treatise entitled De contemptu mundi, uniformly but wrongly attributed to Isaacus Antiochenus.

Among the Nitrian MSS. of the British Museum there are two codices, numbered 694 and 695, of about the 10th century, each purporting to contain the first half of the works of Isaacus Ninivita. No. 694 has the superscription, "In the strength of our Lord Jesus Christ we begin to write the writings of holy Mar Ishaq, solitary and bishop of Nineveh. First half." Then follow sixty discourses, of which all but about six answer to those reviewed in Assemani. The last third of the MS. is lost. No. 695, which is perfect at the end, begins in a similar way, and gives a number of discourses contained in No. 694, as well as about twenty-five others. The Greek version of Isaacus was first published at Leipsic 1770, by Nicephorus Theotokius.

Isaacus Ninivita is much quoted by the old Syrian writers. His style teems with metaphor; his matter is often interesting, theologically as well as historically. He treats mainly of the ascetic life, its rules, and its spiritual experiences. Watching, fasting, silence, and solitude are means to self-mastery. There are three grades of anchorites—novices, proficients, and the perfect. The worth of actions is gauged by the degree of the love of God which inspires them. By the thoughts which stir within, a man may learn to what grade of holiness he has risen. There are three methods by which every rational soul can approach unto God, viz. love, fear, divine training. He who has gotten love feeds on Christ at all times, and becomes immortal, John vi. 52. Blessed is he who eats of the bread of love, which is Christ: he eateth Christ, who is God of all: as St. John testifies, God is love. Sermm. 8, 47, 48 (B. M. cod. 694) treat of the alternations of light and darkness, the deep dejection and sudden ecstasy to which anchorites were subject. For the former Isaacus prescribes holy reading and prayer—"infer tibi violentiam ad orandum, et praestolare auxilium, et veniet tibi te ignorante." Serm. 23 is directed against those who asked, If God be good, why did he create sin, Gehenna, Death, and Satan? In another place Isaacus says that there is a natural faculty whereby we discern good from evil, to lose which is to sink lower than one's natural state; and this faculty precedes faith, and leads us thereto. There is also a faculty of spiritual knowledge which is the offspring of faith. He explains the "many mansions" of heaven as meaning the different capacities of the souls abiding there; a difference not of place but of grace.

Zingerle (Mon. Syr. i. 97 sqq.) has published Serm. 31, On the natural offspring of the virtues; and Serm. 43, On the various grades of knowledge and faith. Other titles are, On the differences of revelations and operations in holy men; In how many ways the perception of things incorporeal is received by the nature of man (B. M. cod. 694, 14 and 24); That it is wrong without necessity to desire or expect any sign manifested through us or to us (do. 695, 46).

A short tract, De Cogitationibus (περὶ λογισμῶν), attributed to this Isaacus, is given in Migne, vol. lxxxvi., along with the De contemptu mundi. A book, De causa causarum or Liber generalis ad omnes gentes, treating of God and the creation and government of the universe, has been assigned to this Isaacus; it really belongs to Jacobus Edessenus (fl. 710); see Pohlmann, Zeitschr. d. Morgenländ. Gesellsch. 1861, p. 648.

ISAACUS, of Jerusalem. [HESYCHIUS (12).]

ISAACUS (15), bishop of Neve, north-west of Bostra in Arabia according to Le Quien (Or. Christ. ii. 864). Lambecius in his descriptive catalogue of the MSS. in the Imperial Library of Vienna (Bibl. Caes. Vindob. lib. v. p. 73, ed. 1672) mentions a set of eighty-seven Greek ascetic sermons, with an ancient inscription attributing them to Isaacus Syrus, abbat and anchorite, formerly bishop of Nineveh [ISAACUS (13)]. Le Quien refers to the MS. thus described, but reckons Isaac among the bishops of the city of Neve, which was also called Nineveh. Lambecius identified his Isaacus Syrus with the anchorite Isaac of Spoletum in Gregory's Dial. iii. 14 [ISAACUS (38)], and Le Quien followed him; but that identification is not warranted by Gregory's story, which is silent as to the anchorite having ever been a bishop and merely states that he came from the parts of Syria. [C. H.]

ISAACUS (16), reputed bishop of Syracuse. Gratian (Decretum, pt. ii. caus. xvi. quaest. ii. cap. i.) has a letter with the rubric, "Presbyteri in monasterium ecclesiarum per abbates instituantur," purporting to be addressed to Isaac in reply to his inquiries by pope John IV. (640-

642). The letter also appears in the current editions of the Councils (Labbe, v. 1772; Mansi, x. 697). Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 160) accepts it as genuine, but the more general opinion is that the letter is apocryphal (Richter n. in Gratian u. s.). The list of bishops of Syracuse (Pirro, Sic. Sac. i. 608) places no bishop between Zosimus, who was sitting in 640, and Elias, who died in 660. [T. W. D.]

ISAACUS (17), bishop of Susa, A.D. 680. (Assem. Acta Mart. i. 80, col. 2; Id. Bibl. Orient. ii. 422.) [C. H.]

ISAACUS (18) appears in most of the lists fortieth archbishop of Lyons, succeeding Lambertus, and followed by Lebuinus, towards the close of the 7th century; but the authors of the Gallia Christiana, relying on the authority of the oldest catalogues, would expunge him altogether from the series, and their reasons appear to have much force. He is utterly unknown except from the occurrence of the name in various catalogues. He is omitted from the Series of Gams. (Gall. Christ. iv. 49; Gams, Series Episc. 570.) [S. A. B.]

ISAACUS (19), fourteenth, or in Gams's Series twentieth, bishop of Vannes, succeeding Agus, and followed by Winhelocus, is said to have been sitting in A.D. 814. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 919.) [S. A. B.]

ISAACUS (20), servant of "the empress Alexandra," and martyr with his fellow-servants Apollo and Codratus (Basil. Menol. April 21). Alexandra is said by some martyrologists to have been the wife of Diocletian (Lactant. Mort. Persec. capp. 15, 39, notes, in Pat. Lat. vii. 321, 542). [T. W. D.]

ISAACUS (21), a Donatist who, together with Maximianus, met his death at Carthage in consequence of the cruel punishment inflicted on them by order of the proconsul of Africa, A.D. 348. The history is related by a fellow Donatist named Macrobius [MACROBIUS], but though he does not mention the name of the proconsul, there can be no doubt that the tragedy which he describes took place in connexion with the mission into Africa of Paulus and Macarius [DONATISM, p. 883]. The narrative is told in barbarous Latin and a rhetorical style so turgid as to suggest the suspicion of exaggeration in the details. But these, horrible as they are, agree too well with what we know to have taken place in other cases to permit us to disbelieve them. Maximianus was the first to suffer, but Isaac provoked the anger of the judges by his taunting exclamations, and was forthwith compelled to undergo a treatment no less brutal than that of his precursor in suffering. Having been first scourged with "plumbata," a whip armed with leaden bullets, and then beaten with sticks, they were both cast into prison, but Isaac disappointed the further violence of his tormentors by death. This took place on a Saturday. Crowds immediately flocked to the prison, singing hymns as if the day were the eve of Easter, and they watched beside the corpse in order to ensure for it Christian burial. In order, however, to disappoint this intention, the proconsul on the day following gave orders that both the living man and the dead body should be cast together into the sea. In order to execute this command, the soldiers were obliged to clear the way from the prison by force, and many persons were wounded in the struggle. The two victims were carried out to sea, and thrown into it at some distance from each other in baskets weighted with sand so as to ensure their sinking. But the action of the waves, caused according to the writer's belief by divine interposition, tore away the sand, and after six days brought the two bodies to shore close to each other, where they were received with welcome by their fellow Christians on their way to the churches. From their hands the bodies of the men who had thus won their crown of martyrdom received Christian burial, and the malice of those who had sought to deprive them of it was gloriously defeated.

Notwithstanding the inflated style of the narrative, very different, as Mabillon remarks truly, from that of the existing accounts of the deaths of true Catholic martyrs, and notwithstanding the very slight notice which St. Augustine takes of the event, into which he acknowledges that he had made very little enquiry, and also his evident success in convicting some of the accounts of Donatist martyrdoms of inaccuracy, if not of direct falsehood, there seems to be no reason for doubting the substantial truth of the narrative in general, especially when we view the case in conjunction with that of Marculus, who in December of the same year suffered death for a similar cause and with similar circumstances of cruelty. Neither can we doubt that the cause for which these men suffered was essentially one of religion. It is true that, in speaking of such cases, St. Augustine compares them to that of Hagar, and by this comparison seeks at the same time to excuse the treatment and to suggest the remedy which ought to be adopted by those who were liable to it. In other places he argues in favour of the duty of the state as the guardian of truth to repress heresy, and insinuates that those who are guilty of this offence are punished not so much on account of religion as of treason or disloyalty, an argument similar to that employed in later times to justify religious persecution in our own country. But we must bear in mind (1) that the proceedings here related took place six years before St. Augustine's birth, and had not been repeated in his time, and that thus he was no witness either to the truth or falsehood of the narratives; (2) that the behaviour and language of Isaac remind us more of the characteristics of angry partisans than of Christian martyrs; (3) that the glaring faults of the narrative in style and temper do not extenuate the treatment which, after every allowance for exaggeration, the sufferers must have endured. (Aug. Tr. in Joann. xi. 15; c. Cresc. iii. 49, 54; Mabillon, Vet. Anal. p. 185; Mon. Vet. Don. No. 29, pp. 237, 248, ed. Oberthür; Ceillier, v. 106; Morcelli, Africa Christiana, ii. 249.)

ISAACUS (22), martyr in Persia under Sapor II., with Simeon and Bachthisoë, for refusing to offer sacrifice to fire. (Basil, Menol. May 15.)

ISAACUS (23), presbyter and martyr at Hâlsar in Persia under Sapor II. (Wright's Syrian Martyrol. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 432; Assem. Acta Mart. i. 96, 100). The Syrian Martyrology (l.c.) mentions three other martyrs of this name, a presbyter at Ctesiphon and two deacons elsewhere. [C. H.]

ISAACUS (24), monk in Egypt, disciple of St. Antony, mentioned in Jerome's life of Hilarion (capp. 30, 31). Soon after Antony's death, Hilarion came to visit his tomb, and on the summit of a hill met the two monks Isaac and Pelusianus, the former having been the interpreter of Antony (i.e. as Tillemont, vii. 139, explains, when Antony conversed with Greeks). Isaac related to Hilarion the following anecdote. Three years before there came a flock of wild asses to drink at the foot of the hill, and Antony, finding them straying into his garden and damaging the plants, commanded one of the leaders to stand, smote him on the flanks with his staff, and demanded why they presumed to eat what they had not planted. Ever afterwards the animals, after quenching their thirst, retired without touching either tree or herb.

ISAACUS (25), a friend of Eusebius bishop of Samosata. Isaac having visited Basil A.D. 373, would be able to report to Eusebius in what a wretched state of health, and how overwhelmed with ecclesiastical troubles he found him. (Basil. Ep. 136 [257].) [E. V.]

ISAACUS (26), a Jew who professed to be a convert to Christianity and whom the party of Ursinus bribed to accuse pope Damasus, in order to lessen both his personal and his official authority. In the year 378 a council, which was assembled at Rome, entirely acquitted St. Damasus, and in their letter, addressed to the emperors Gratian and Valentinian, reported the case as a special aggravation of the conduct of the heretics. Isaac afterwards relapsed. [ISAACUS (29.)] (Mansi, iii. 504 B; Pagi, Crit. ad ann. 378 xx.; Append. Cod. Theod. ap. Sirmond. i. 749, 752.) [J. G.]

ISAACUS (27) (HISACIUS, ISAACIUS, ISACIUS, Ἰσαάκιος in Theod.), confessor in Constantinople, probably abbat, A.D. 383. The earliest notice of him is given by Sozomen (vi. 40). In Basil's Menologium, May 30, there is a notice drawn from Sozomen. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 30 Mai. vii. 247 sq.) give other lives. The general outline supplied by Sozomen is followed by Theodoret (Ecl. Hist. iv. 31, al. 34), and by Theophanes (Chron. A.C. 370, Patr. Gr. cviii. 194). Isaac is said by Sozomen to have been in Constantinople when Valens emperor of the East (A.D. 364-78) was making war upon the Goths. As he was leaving for his last expedition, he was met by Isaacius, who came to plead specially for the free use of the Christian churches: "Restore, O emperor, to the orthodox and to those who keep the doctrine of the Nicene council the churches which thou hast taken away, and thou shalt have the victory over thine enemies." Failing this he foretold disaster as a judgment. But the emperor only ordered him to be arrested and kept in prison, till he should finish the war and return to punish him. The emperor soon died miserably in fleeing from battle, and according to the Vita

(auct. anon.) Isaac was highly honoured by Theodosius the Great, Valens's successor, and buried at last, by his orders, in the church of St. Irene; his body was afterwards translated to the church of St. Stephen, which was built by Aurelian, the consul (A.D. 400). He is often confounded with ISAACUS (32). [J. G.]

ISAACUS (28). Several eminent solitaries of the Egyptian deserts in the 4th century bore this name. The references are scattered up and down in the Vitae Patrum, and it is not always clear which Isaac is intended. The following seem to be distinct persons.

(i.) Abbat ISAACUS, presbyter of the anchorites in the Scetic desert (ἡ Σκήτις, copt. Schiêt), southwest of Lake Mareotis. At seven years of age he withdrew from the world, A.D. 358, and attached himself to Macarius of Alexandria, the disciple of St. Anthony. Palladius relates of abbat Isaac that he knew the Scriptures by heart, lived in utter purity, and could handle deadly serpents (κεράτται) without harm. Fond of solitude, he so lived for fifty years. His followers were 150 in number. Certain anecdotes in the Apophthegmata patrum appear to belong to him. "Abbat Isaac was wont to say to the brethren, Our fathers and abbat Pambo wore old bepatched raiment and palm husks (σεβένια); nowadays ye wear costly clothing. Hence! It was ye who desolated the district." (Scetis was overrun, circ. 395 A.D., by the Mazices, a horde of merciless savages.)

"Abbat Isaac said, abbat Pambo used to tell us a monk should wear a cloak that he could throw out of doors for three days together, without fear of any one carrying it off." (Pambo was of Mount Nitria, Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. cap. x. These two stories may, therefore, refer to Isaacus of Nitria.)

When the anchorites of Scetis wanted to make Isaacus their presbyter, he fled into Egypt, and hid himself in a field. The fathers pursued, and chanced to halt for the night in the same field, loosing their ass to graze. In the morning they found the animal, which had strayed, standing by the fugitive. Isaacus yielded at once, saying, "It is God's will: whithersoever I fly, to that I come." (That this story relates to Isaac of Scetis is proved by the words, presbyterum eum patres volebant facere in Scythi, i.e. Sceti. De Vit. Patr. lib. vii. cap. 33, § 2, in Migne, tom. 73.) Cassianus, who was in Scetis A.D. 398, conversed with Isaacus, to whom he assigns the 9th and 10th of his Conferences (Collationes), which treat of prayer. In the former Isaacus distinguishes four kinds of prayer, according to 1 Tim. ii. 1 (Collat. 9, capp. 9-14). Then he expounds at length the Lord's Prayer (capp. 18-23). The highest type, however, is prayer "unuttered, unexpressed," like that of Christ on the mountain or in the garden (cap. 25, de qualitate sublimioris orationis). In cap. 36 he advises short and frequent petitions (frequentur quidem sed breviter), lest, while we linger, the foe suggest some evil thought.

The 10th Conference begins by relating how the patriarch Theophilus scandalised the Scetic anchorites by his Paschal Letter denouncing Anthropomorphism; and how the aged abbat Serapion, though convinced of his error, could not render thanks with the rest, but fell a-weeping and crying, "They have taken my God from me!" Cassianus and the other witnesses asked Isaacus to account for the old man's heresy. Isaacus made it a survival of heathen ideas of Deity in a simple and unlettered mind (capp. 1-5).

After this, Isaacus goes on to shew how to attain to perfect and unceasing prayer. That end will be realised when all our love, all our desire, every aim, effort, thought; all that we contemplate, speak of, hope for, is God; when we are united with Him by an enduring and indissoluble affection. Cap. 10 gives as a prayer suited to all emergencies the verse Ps. lxx. 1.

Ill prays he who only prays when upon his knees. He prays never, who even upon his knees is distracted by wandering thoughts. Such as we would be found when praying, such should we be before we pray.

When fifty years old, Isaacus was expelled from his desert by Theophilus of Alexandria, albeit that prelate had made bishops of seven or eight of his anchorites. Isaacus turned for succour to St. Chrysostom and Olympias. He was still living in A.D. 408.

Collat.* 9, 10; Migne, xlix. 770 sqq.; Apophthegmata Patrum, Migne, lxx. 223; a number of anecdotes under heading περὶ τοῦ Ἀββᾶ Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου τῶν Κελλίων, but they refer to several persons, cf. De Vit. patr. lib. iii. col. 752, in Migne, lxxiii.; Tillemont, Mém. viii. 650, 617, 648, and 813, note vi.; Ceillier, viii. 174-177.

(ii.) ISAACUS, presbyter and abbat of the Nitrian desert, sometimes called Presbyter of the Cells (Κελλία N. of Nitria), succeeded his master Cronius, another disciple of St. Anthony.

The chief account of this Isaacus also is to be found in the passage of Palladius already cited (Dialog. Migne, xlvii. col. 59, 60). He was head of 210 recluses. His charity, mildness of temper, and humility were famous. He built a hospital for the reception of the sick, and of the numerous visitors of his community. Like Isaacus of Scete, he was an adept in the Scriptures. Like him, too, after thirty years of sojourn in the desert, he was driven forth about A.D. 400 by the patriarch Theophilus, who had chosen a great number of his disciples to be bishops. The Apophthegmata Patrum gives some stories about Isaac of the Cells. "The abbat Isaac said, In my youth I lived with abbat Cronius. Old and trembling as he was, he would never bid me do anything; he would rise by himself, and hand the water-cruse (τὸ βαυκάλιον) to me and the rest. And abbat Theodore of Pherme, with whom also I lived, would set out the table by himself and say, 'Brother, if thou wilt, come and eat.' I said, 'Father, I came to thee to profit: why dost not bid me do somewhat?' He answered never a word; but when the old men asked him the same thing, he broke out with, 'Am I Coenobiarch, that I should command him? If he like, what he sees me doing, he will himself do.' Thenceforward I forestalled the old man's purposes. And I had learned the lesson of doing in silence."

Once a brother entered the church of the Cells wearing a small hood. Isaacus drove him out: "These parts belong to monks; thou, being of the world, canst not stay with us." The abbat used to say, "I have never entered my cell with anything on my mind against any of the brethren; and never have I allowed another to enter his cell, dissatisfied with me."

The last illness of Isaacus was long and grievous. One of the brothers made him some porridge (ἀθήρη) with prunes (μυξαρία) in it. The old man refusing it, the brother prayed, "Take a little, Father, for thy sickness' sake." "Brother, I would be content to live in this state thirty years." Dying, he was asked, "What shall we do, Father, when thou art gone?" He bade them walk as they had seen him walk, and God would keep them. Otherwise they should not continue in that place.

It thus appears that, after the persecution of Theophilus, Isaacus had returned to his desert. In the Apophthegmata Patrum, Migne, tom. lxxv. 223, 239, there are other anecdotes concerning this Isaacus. Cf. Tillem. Mém. viii. 623-625.

(iii.) ISAACUS, called Thebaeus, an anchorite of the Thebaid, probably not identical with ISAACUS (2), Presbyter of the Cellia, although Cronius, the master of the latter, at one time lived in the Thebaid (Vit. Patr. lib. vii. col. 1044, Migne, tom. lxxiii.). Alardus Gazaeus, the Benedictine annotator of Cassianus, writes (Collat. 9 ad init.) that there were two chief anchorites named Isaac; one who lived in the Scetic desert, and another called Thebaeus, often mentioned in the Vitae Patrum and in Sophronius (sic) Pratum Spirituale, cap. 161. In the latter passage the writer, Joannes Moschus, tells his disciple Sophronius that he had met abbat Isaac of the Thebaid (Thebaicum genere) and heard from his own lips how that fifty years ago a demon in guise of a youth had appeared at the window of his cell, offering to help him with some mosquito curtains (κωνάρειον) that he was trying in vain to make; and how the baffled demon claimed him for his own, because for three Sundays he had communicated in an unforgiving temper. Isaac rushed forth to his neighbour's cell, and begged forgiveness. The demon in a rage demolished his curtains and mat (storea).

Once Isaac ("de Thebaida;" Vit. Patr. v.) had banished an offending brother from the congregation. When he would have entered his cell, an angel stood in the way. "God sends me to learn where you wish Him to bestow the solitary whom you have condemned." The abbat owned his fault and was forgiven, but warned not to rob God of His prerogative by anticipating His judgments. Isaac Thebaeus used to say to the brethren, "Bring no children hither. Four churches in Scetis have been desolated, owing to children."

(iv.) ISAACUS, disciple of St. Apollon, probably lived at Cellia. He was accomplished in every good work. On his way to the church he would hold no converse with any, and after communion he would hurry back to his cell, without waiting for the cup of wine and the food (παξαμάτης), usually handed round among the brethren after service. "A lamp goes out, if one hold it long in the open air; and if I, kindled by the holy oblation, linger outside my cell, my mind grows dark." Apophthegm. Patr. col. 241. ἔλεγον

[C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (29) SENIOR is mentioned, in an anonymous life of Ephraim the Syrian, among the more distinguished disciples of Ephraim, who were also Syriac writers. ("Now to each of his disciples grace was given, and they wrote homilies and expositions,"—min're and turgome Vatic. Cod. Nitr. 5). He is cited by Joannes Maro (Tract. ad Nest. et Eutyech.), by Barhebraeus (Hist. Dynast. 91), and by many other Syriac and Arabic authors, most of whom, however, confuse him with Isaac, presbyter of Antioch (Assemani, B. O. i. 165). Gennadius (ff. 490) in his de Scriptor. Eccl. cap. 26, has written thus: "Isaac wrote, concerning the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation of the Lord, a book of very dark disputation and involved discourse; proving that there are three Persons in the one Godhead, each possessing a proprium peculiar to himself. The proprium of the Father is that he is the origin of the others, yet himself without origin; that of the Son is that, though begotten, he is not later than his begetter; that of the Holy Ghost is that it is neither made nor begotten, and yet is from another. Of the Incarnation he writes that two Natures abide in the one Person of the Son of God." This chapter precedes those about Macarius and Evagrius Pontinus, who lived ante A.D. 400. It is hence inferred that Isaac flourished about the end of the 4th century. (Cave, i. 415, places him about 430 (?), adding, however, that some put him a century earlier.)

The work of Isaac, not unfairly described by Gennadius, is entitled Libellus fidei SS. Trinitatis et Incarnationis Domini. It is a brief treatise, and is printed in Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxiii. It was first edited by Sirmond in Opuscul. vet. Scriptor. Dogmat. Paris, 1630. In a codex Pitheoanus, teste Sirmond, the title is Fides Isaacis (or Isacis) ex Judaeo. Hence Isaac Senior has been identified by Tillemont (viii. 409) with Isaac the converted Jew who calumniated pope Damasus [ISAACUS (26)]. Assemani thinks that the silence of Gennadius and his epitomiser Honorius renders it doubtful that Isaac Senior, the author of the libellus fidei, was a Jew. Cf. also Galland, vii. Proll. p. xxv.; Ceillier, vi. 290; Mansi, iii. 504 B; Pagi, Crit. ad ann. 378, xx.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (30), monk, in the diocese of Constantinople, who was one of a party among the monks who were opposed to St. Chrysostom and accused of maligning him (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. viii. c. 9). This was probably the monk Isaac who fled into Egypt with Theophilus bishop of Alexandria, after the tumult which Theophilus had fostered against St. Chrysostom in Constantinople. (Ib. viii. c. 19.) [J. G.]

ISAACUS (31) ANTIOCHENUS, born at Amid (Diarbekir) in Mesopotamia, called "the Great" and "the Elder," a priest of Antioch in Syria, flourished in the middle of the 5th century, under Theodosius the younger and Marcianus, and is said to have visited Rome. His teacher was Zenobius, the disciple of St. Ephraim, not (as Cave) Ephraim himself. The Chronicle of Edessa speaks of him as an archimandrite, without specifying his monastery, which was at Gabala in Phoenicia. He died about A.D. 460. The Jacobites keep Oct. 14, the Maronites Nov. 20, in his honour. This Isaacus is sometimes confused with Isaacus of Nineveh. Barhebraeus (Hist. Dynast. p. 91) unjustly brands him as a heretic and a renegade. He was author of numerous works in Syriac, of which the chief were polemics against the Nestorians and Eutychians, and of a long elegy on the overthrow of Antioch by the earthquake of A.D. 459. He also wrote a poem on the Ludi Seculares, held by Honorius in his sixth consulship (A.D. 404), and another on the sack of Rome by Alaric (A.D. 410). Jacobus of Edessa reckons him among the best writers of Syriac. His poems are extant in MSS. of the Vatican and other European libraries. Many of them are wrongly ascribed to St. Ephraim, and included amongst his works in the Roman edition. Isaacus usually wrote in heptasyllables. In the Vatican MSS. examined by Assemani are found 104 metrical discourses on a variety of topics, mostly, however, connected with the ascetic life. In discourse No. 7 Isaacus speaks of relic-worship and holy days. Besides Sunday, many Christians observed Friday, the day of the Passion. No. 9 attacks prevalent errors on the Incarnation. Here Isaacus seems to fall into the opposite heresies, failing to distinguish Nature from Person. But elsewhere he uses language unmistakably orthodox. Assemani thinks his words have been tampered with by Jacobite copyists. (Dr. Bickell, praef. p. ix., mentions a cod. Vatican. "orthodoxam Isaaci fidem demonstrans." Cf. also the fragment De Curru Ezechiel, translated below.) No. 10, new-born babes should be baptized to scare away the fiend. It is not meet that the unbaptized should suck milk partly generated by the Eucharist. No. 24, Christ suffered as man, not as God. No. 25, Satan has no power over us save by permission of God, and our own free consent. Nos. 45, 46, on the Lenten Fast, urge abstention from vices as well as from food. "If thou canst not abstain from wine, at least give up wrong and robbery; and the High Judge will not doom thee for thy wine-drinking." No. 50 touches on the question of future retribution: "The fault is temporal, the punishment eternal." This aims at those Syrian monks who had adopted the opinion of Origen on this subject. No. 59 is a hymn asserting, against the Cathari or Novatians, that fallen man recovers innocence not only by baptism, but also by penitence. It was written on hearing a youth singing a poem beginning, "Quis me destruat, et reaedificet, atque virginem reficiat?" No. 53 illustrates the doctrine of the Trinity by the sun, the soul, and the flint for striking fire. No. 62 is a hymn of supplication, lamenting the disasters of the age, e.g. the inroads of Huns and Arabs, famine, plague, and earthquake. No. 65 advises priests seldom to excommunicate, often to impose physical penances. No. 74, attributed to Ephraim in the Ferial office of the Maronites, is a prayer in quinquasyllables, for which reason Assemani assigns it to Balaesus, who wrote in that metre. Johannes Maro quotes two discourses not found in the Vatican MSS. The first, on Ezekiel's chariot, clearly asserts two natures and one person in Christ: duo aspectus, una persona; duae naturae, unus salvator. Similarly, the second, on the Incarnation. Bickell has printed them both, so far as he found them extant (S. Isaac. Opera, i. 50, 52). The former of these fragments may be given as a specimen—

"In the preaching of truth | a wonderful likeness appeared:
On a chariot, in hidden mystery, | one Self, two forms—
Both the lowly and the mighty — | the seer beheld:
one Person
Subsisting in twain shapes (shuchlase differences) | amazing the eyes of beholders.
Half of Him devouring fire, | and half the glare of noon.
From the appearance of His middle upward, | He was like unto fire devouring;
From the appearance of His middle downward, | He was like the Bow in the clouds.
For Messiah it was who was shewn | in the chariot
mystically;
His Godhead and His Manhood | appeared in the likenesses:
Two aspects, one Person; | two Natures, one Saviour.
In the chariot His likeness and His mystery, | in His Gospel His sureness and His truth;—
His shadow in the chariot — | His body behold in the Gospel!"

The library of the British Museum possesses about eighty of the discourses, hymns, prayers, &c., of St. Isaacus, in MSS. ranging from the 6th to the 12th centuries: see especially codd. 740, 742, 745, 746, 747, 748, 766, 753, 768, 450. Cod. 919, Eccl. Hist. of Zacharias Rhetor, contains a life of him, and is published in Land, Anecd. Syr. iii. p. 84 sqq.

Dr. Bickell, in the preface to his still incomplete edition of the works of Isaac, gives a list of 178 entire poems, and of thirteen others imperfect at the beginning or end (179–191); three prose writings dealing with the ascetic life (192–194); five sermons in Arabic, on the Incarnation, &c. (195–199); and a sermon in Greek, on the Transfiguration, usually assigned to St. Ephraim (200). His first volume contains fifteen poems, including one of 2004 lines, De avi illa quae Antiochiae Trisagion cantavit; the second consists of twenty-two poems, one of which (De Poenitentia) has 1924 lines. Full prolegomena are promised with the last volume.

The poems of Isaac are important for the right understanding of the doctrines of the Nestorians, Eutychians, Novatians, Pelagians, and other sects; besides being authorities for the events, manners, and customs of the writer's age. [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (32), confessor with SS. Dalmatus and Faustus in Constantinople. He had lived at first in the desert, but came afterwards to Constantinople to the monastery which, at a later date, was known as that of St. Dalmatus. Dalmatus and his son Faustus he induced to enter the monastery, but of his own death nothing is known. (Basil. Men. iii. 192, Aug. 3.) [FAUSTUS (26).] [J. G.]

ISAACUS (33), a deacon of Longinus, archimandrite of Doloche in Syria, who sent him and his brother-deacon Matthew with consolatory letters and succour to Theodoret during his imprisonment in the monastery of Apamea. (Theod. Ep. 131.) [E. V.]

ISAACUS (34), deacon of Edessa, one of the subscribers to the letter to the council of Berytus, A.D. 448, in defence of his diocesan Ibas. (Mansi, vii. 253, where the Latin text has Sanctius.) [T. W. D.]

ISAACUS (35). In a letter to John the Stylite, Jacob of Edessa informs his correspondent that there were three Syriac writers called Mar Isaac, of whom two were orthodox (m'haim'ne), in his sense of the word, and one was "a Chalcedonian heretic."

(i.) ISAAC of Amid, a disciple of St. Ephraim the Syrian, was the first. He, in the reign of the emperor Arcadius, went to Rome to see the Capitol, and on his way home was imprisoned at Byzantium. After his return he became a priest of the church of Amid.

(ii.) The second was ISAAC, a presbyter of the church of Edessa during the reign of Zeno. He went up to Antioch where Peter the Fuller was patriarch (471-485), and preached against the Nestorians. "And he saw there in the street of the city an orthodox citizen carrying on his hand the bird called psittacus (parrot), which was trained and taught to say the hymn of the three Holies (the Trisagion), and to say therein also 'who wast crucified for us!'" Isaac made this the text of an harangue.

(iii.) The third was ISAAC, also a presbyter of Edessa, who in the time of the bishop Paulus (510-526) was orthodox, but afterwards, in the time of bishop Asclepius, deserted to the Nestorians.

The letter of Jacobus, containing these statements, is extant in cod. dccvii. (about 9th cent.), which is a collection of the correspondence of that bishop (see Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. pp. 603-604.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (36), the name of two presbyters who subscribed the deprecation from Syria Secunda to pope Hormisdas in 517. (Mansi, viii. 427.) [T. W. D.]

ISAACUS (37), surnamed THE PERSIAN, a prominent Monophysite, accused by the council of Jerusalem in 536 of having publicly struck an image of the emperor Justinian at Verina (eis τὰ Βηρίνης), at the same time tearing up and burning a silken velum on which the portrait of that emperor was painted, and denouncing him as a heretic in the presence of a number of his followers (Mansi, viii. 897). His treatment of the image and the velum exposed him to the penalty of death for high treason. (Corp. Jur. Civ. Digest. lib. xlviii. tit. iv. 5, 6.) [T. W. D.]

ISAACUS (38), abbat of Spoletum (Spoleto) c. A.D. 550. The primary authority is pope Gregory the Great (Dial. iii. c. 14, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 243 sq.). This life had been frequently published by hagiologists (Surius, De Prob. Sanct. Vit. 11 Apr. ii. pt. i. 141-2, Cologne, 1618; Lipomanus, SS. Vit. f. 443, Venet. 1551; Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. i. 107-9, ed. Achery, 733; Bolland. Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii.

23-30). Unfortunately the life by St. Gregory is not historical, but more intended for moral teaching and the exaltation of the saint's thaumaturgic power. Jacobillus (Vite de Sante, i. 391-5, Folign. 1647) treats of the saint and his monastery. Gregory professes to write from the testimony of a virgin Gregoria, who lived at the church of St. Mary in Rome, but at the outset by saying Isaac lived during the whole period of the Gothic wars, he suggests an incredibility. St. Gregory gives an account of Isaac's arrival from Syria at Spoletum and his early connexion with the church there. The Bollandists call him nephew and successor of St. Laurentius Illuminator in the monastery of Farfa in Umbria, and think that after living on a wooded hill called Monte-Luco, near to Spoletum, he built a monastery dedicated to St. Mary or rather a laura with distinct cells for the monks. The monastery of St. Julian is supposed by Jacobillus to have been founded by St. Isaac, but this the Bollandists doubt, though allowing that much of its early history is now obscured by the rise of the Benedictine monastery at Farfa. The church of the Madonna delle Grazie with its numerous hermitages, the successors of the original laura, is still shewn, and at the foot of the neighbouring Monte Luco is the old monastery of St. Giuliano. The writings attributed to St. Isaac, and mentioned by the Bollandists, appear to be unknown. [J. G.]

ISAACUS (39), a monk of the convent of Maro at Armanaz, near Apamea, who with another named Sergius was deputed to present a controversial letter from his community to the monks who were of the party of Petrus Callinicensis, patriarch of Antioch (elected 578 A.D.). The patriarch had procured, in a synod at Gubo Baroyo, the condemnation of those who had adopted the opinion of Stephanus, a sophist of Alexandria, with respect to the hypostatic union. Stephanus and his Syrian followers held that "the difference in the natural signification of those things whereof Christ is constituted, could not be maintained without division and number of the natures." Many Syrian monks, and whole cities in the district round Antioch, as a result of this dispute, went over to the Chalcedonian side. [Petrus CALLINICENSIS.] (Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 69-82.)

The letter, with which Isaac was charged, contained five propositions, and is extant in the Syriac cod. dccclvii. (8th cent.), a Monophysite compilation of "proofs from the holy fathers against divers heresies." (Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 945, No. xvi. 1.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (40), abbat of the convent of the Iberians (daïro d'urtöye) at Amid. The Syriac cod. ex. fol. 64 a, gives a contemporary record of his death. "In the year 894, according to the Greek reckoning [A.D. 583], on the first of Elul, departed from this world of troubles to the world of joys Mar. Ishaq, of blessed memory, head of the holy house of the Iberians," &c. (Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 70.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (41), abbat of the convent of Cyriacus at Tel Haticha, mentioned in the Syr. Cod. dxcvii. p. 489 (7th cent.), which contains the first eight books of St. Cyril's Treatise On Worship in Spirit and in Truth. After the colophon there is a note: "This MS. belongs to the holy Coenobium of Beth Cyriacus at Tel Haficha," &c., concluding that it was written at the costs of the abbat Isaac, the priest Andrew, and the rest of the brethren. (Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 489.) [C. J. B.]

ISAACUS (42), exarch of Ravenna, c. 625-643. The first notice we have of Isaac is in a letter written to him by pope Honorius probably about 625, in which the pope requests the exarch to send to Rome the bishops of Northern Italy who had been favouring the tyrant Arioad as Honorius called him. Of this matter we know nothing further (Jaffé, Regesta Pont. p. 156). Arioad became king of the Lombards about 626, and Fredegar relates that he sent a message to Isaac desiring him to kill or poison Taso (a duke whom Fredegar calls of the province of Tuscany). If the exarch would do this, the king promised to let him off one hundred pounds out of the three hundred pounds of gold which the Lombards were in the habit of receiving yearly from the Romans. Isaac succeeded in carrying out by treachery the king's wish, and after this time, says the chronicler, two hundred pounds of gold only continued to be paid yearly by the Roman patrician (i.e. Isaac). (Fredegar, cap. 69; Migne, lxxi. 649.) It is exceedingly probable that this story of Fredegar is only a variation of the story told by Paulus Diaconus (G. L. iv. 40) of the murder of Taso and Cacco by the Exarch Gregorius. (Forschungen zur Deutsch. Gesch. II. 430.)

At the time of the election of pope Severinus, i.e. in 638, Isaac is heard of again. When the pope was chosen but not yet ordained, the chartulary Maurice, acting in behalf of the exarch, devastated the episcopal residence at the Lateran. Great resistance was offered by the Romans, and we are told in the Gesta Pontificum, "venerunt omnes armati, qui inventi sunt in civitate Romana a puero usque ad senem." Isaac was summoned to Rome, and on his arrival he took the plunder which Maurice had obtained, and sent part of it to Constantinople. He further sent many of the chief dignitaries of the church into exile. (Gesta Pontificum, ed. Vignol. i. 248.)

During the early part of the reign of Rotharis king of the Lombards (636-652), the Byzantine power in Italy, at the head of which was Isaac, suffered considerable losses. Rotharis conquered and plundered Genoa, Savona, and other towns of the district about 641 (Fredegar, cap. 71; Migne, lxxi. 651). He also fought a battle with the Romans on the Panaro, and eight thousand Romans fell, according to Paulus Diaconus (iv. 27).

In the acts of pope Theodore (Gesta Pontificum, i. 254), who was pope from 642 to 649, we are told that Maurice the chartulary rebelled in Rome against Isaac, refusing to obey him, and saying that the exarch wanted to make himself emperor. Isaac thereupon sent Donus, his magister militum, with an army to Rome. Maurice was deserted, and captured and beheaded before he reached Ravenna. This was probably early in the pontificate of Theodore, and immediately after this Isaac died.

We learn from the Greek inscription on the still existing sarcophagus which his wife erected to him in the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, that he was an Armenian and that he ruled for eighteen years. (See the inscription in Camill. Spreti, Histor. Ravenn. vol. i. class. i. 276, vol. ii. part i. 237-258; or Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom. ii. 135.) Allusion is also made to a son or nephew of Isaac's in another inscription. (Camill. Spreti, vol. ii. part i. p. 37.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ISAACUS (43), June 3, monk at Cordova, martyred by the sword at the age of twenty-seven. (Mart. Usuard.) [C. H.]

ISAACIUS. [ISAACUS.]

ISACOCIS (Ἰσακῶκῖς, Ἰσακῶκῖς being Mansi's reading), bishop of Armenia Major, who signs the synodal epistle of the synod of Antioch to the emperor Jovian, A.D. 363, between Euty chius of Eleutheropolis and Titus of Bostra (Soc. iii. 25; Mansi, iii. 372). In the Latin synodal epistle contained in the Historia Tripartita (vii. 4) his name is written Isaacius in one version (Mansi, iii. 373 A), and Josacius in another (Pat. Lat. lxxix. 1071 A). A letter of Basil (ep. 92 al. 69), addressed to the bishops of the West in 372 (Pat. Gr. xxxii. 477A), has Ἰσακῶκῖς among the oriental bishops in whose name he writes without naming their sees, and Valsius (note to Soc. l. c.) thinks he must be our Isacocis, as does also Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 1374). Le Quien also identifies the Ἰσακῶκῖς of the Antiochene synod and the Ἰσακῶκῖς of St. Basil with Ἰουθήκ fourth or fifth catholicos of Armenia, who is well known in the history of his church [JOSEC I.]. But if Saint-Martin (Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 487) and Langlois (Historiens de l'Arm. ii. 138, note 3 on Moses of Choren, iii. 11) are correct in assigning the period A.D. 330-336 to Josec, whom they write Honsig and Iousig, the identification must be abandoned and Isacocis must be considered as occupying some unknown suffragan see in Armenia during the catholicate of Nerses I. [C. H.]

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF. (Ἀπόκρυφον Ἰσαίου, Origen; τὸ ἀναβατικὸν Ἰσαίου, Epiphani.; Ascensio Esaiæ, Hieron.) The apocryphal book which is thus called entirely escaped the notice of Western Christendom for many centuries, with the possible exception of one or two passing glimpses as in the works of Euthymius Zigabenus, of Georgius Cedrenus, the Quæstiones et Responsiones of Anastasius and the Bibliotheca Sancta (lib. ii. p. 59, ed. iii.) of Sixtus Senensis, A.D. 1566. In the second decade of this century it was first brought into notice by Dr. Richard Laurence, then professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and afterwards archbishop of Cashel. He published it in A.D. 1819 from an Ethiopic MS. with a Latin and English version, critical notes, and dissertation. Since that date it has been discussed, among many others, by W. Gesenius, who has prefixed a lengthened dissertation on it, to his Commentary on Isaiah, by H. Ewald in his History of Israel, and by A. Dillmann, who, in a learned and accurate treatise embodying the Ethiopic and Latin texts carefully revised, notes, and prolegomena, has brought the latest light to bear on the question. This work (Brockhaus, Leipzig) was published in 1877. Dillmann enjoyed one special advantage over those possessed by earlier writers. Previous to the war waged by England against Abyssinia in 1868 we possessed but one Ethiopic MS. of the Ascension, that used by archbishop Laurence, and now in the Bodleian library. Upon the capture of Magdala, April 13, 1868, the troops seized a vast quantity of MSS., now placed in the British Museum under the title of Collectio Magdalensis. Among them were discovered two copies of the Ascension of Isaiah, which Dillmann carefully compared with the edition of Dr. Laurence. We may now proceed to set forth (1) The contents of the book; (2) Its age and origin; (3) Its ecclesiastical use.

1. The Contents.—The book belongs to that class of apocalyptic literature of which the Books of Enoch, the 4th Book of Esdras, and the Shepherd of Hermas are conspicuous examples. It is clearly divisible into two parts. The Latin version numbers eleven chapters. The first five of these contain the narrative of Isaiah's persecution and martyrdom at the hands of Manasseh. The second division embraces the last six chapters, and sets forth the Vision or Ascension of Isaiah in the 20th year of Hezekiah. The following is a brief analysis of the different chapters. Chap. i. introduces Hezekiah in the 26th year of his reign, instructing Manasseh in righteousness; Isaiah at the same time prophesying of his wickedness and of his own death at the young prince's hands. Chap. ii. shews fulfilment of the warning thus given, and tells us of the persecution and flight from Jerusalem to the desert of Isaiah, his son Josheb, Micah, Hananias, and Habbakuk, where they are watched and betrayed to Manasseh by one Balkira, a Samaritan. Chaps. iii. and iv. give us a shorter account of Isaiah's vision, which is afterwards expanded into the details contained in chap. vi.—xi. On account of this vision Satan is enraged against the prophet, and procures his execution by sawing asunder with a wooden saw. In these first five chapters, whether written or not by a person distinct from the author of the remainder, there are most probably embodied some traditions current among the Jews from pre-Christian times, as for instance in chap. iii. 7-9, wherein Balkira accuses Isaiah of blasphemy because that whereas Moses said there is no man who can see God and live, Isaiah said that he had seen God and still lived. In chap. vi., which begins the second part of the book, we have a statement of the circumstances under which Isaiah saw his vision. In the 20th year of Hezekiah, the prophet came from Gilgal to Jerusalem, and conversed with the king, the princes, eunuchs, and councillors standing around. While he was so engaged the prophet suddenly fell into a trance, "his soul was raised above its ordinary conceptions, nor did he perceive the men who stood before him. His eyes were wide open, his mouth silent, and his mortal mind elevated above itself. But he still breathed, for he saw a vision." Under the guidance of an angel sent from the seventh heaven, the spirit of Isaiah then ascends through the seven different heavens, which are each severally described. In chap. vii. they ascend into the firmament, where he sees Sammael or Satan and his hosts engaged in perpetual warfare among themselves. They then ascend still higher into the first heaven, wherein he sees a throne in the midst, with one sitting thereon, and angels on the right and left glorifying.

His guide instructs him, however, that the glory is all offered to Him who sitteth in the seventh heaven and to His Beloved. They then ascend into the second heaven, wherein is greater and quite different magnificence, with a throne and one sitting on it, and angels glorifying as before. The prophet there falls on his face to worship him sitting on the throne, when the guide restrains him, saying, "Adore not, neither the angel nor the throne which are in the six heavens, till I have shewn thee the seventh heaven" (cf. Rev. xix. 10, and xxii. 8, 9). He is then shewn the other heavens, each one similarly furnished with a throne and angels, and each surpassing the previous ones in glory till he comes to the sixth heaven, wherein was no throne, nor were there any standing on the left, but all participated in equal glory, and were all praising the Father, and his Beloved Christ, and the Holy Ghost. At last he ascends into the seventh heaven, where he sees the Father and "the Lord God, Christ who is called in the world Jesus" (cap. ix. 5), and the angel of the Holy Spirit. Isaiah sees all the just from Adam down joining with the angels in adoring and worshipping the three, while at the same time the Lord Jesus and the angel of the Holy Spirit, together adored and glorified God the Father (cap. ix. 40). Chap. x. sets forth the descent of Christ through the seven heavens, and through the firmament, preparatory to his Incarnation (cf. Dorner, Person of Christ, i. 453, Edin. 1861). Chap. xi. sets forth the story of Christ's birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension, very much as we have it in St. Matthew, with traces of some later speculations, as, for instance, that the devil was deceived by the Incarnation (cap. x. 30, xi. 23, 24), a point which Irenaeus and Origen have elaborately worked out. (See Irenaeus, lib. iii. 18, 6; Origen in Matt. tom. xiii. 9; Oxenham, Catholic Doctrine of Atonement, p. 117-121.)

2. Its Age.—We have very early testimony to the existence of this book. Justin Martyr (Dialog. cum Tryph. § 120 in Patr. Gr. vi. 755 A) seems to quote it when accusing the Jews of having removed from the sacred text the tale of Isaiah's execution, πρίονι ξυλίνῳ ἐπίστατε. Tertullian (de Patientia, c. 14) clearly quotes cap. 5, 14, of the Ascensio, but without naming it. Origen is the first who quotes it by name. He calls it the Apocryphon Isaiae in Comment. in Matt. xiii. 57. In his Epist. ad Africanum (Migne, Patr. Gr. xi. 66) he quotes it as an apocryphal book which the Jews had corrupted. In Hom. 1 upon Isaiah (Patr. Gr. xiii. 223; cf. Fabric. Cod. Pseud. Vet. Test. i. 1090; Laurence, p. 145) he quotes, without naming the source, from c. iii. v. 9, the accusation of blasphemy brought by Balkira against Isaiah (cf. Hieron. in Isaiam, lib. i. cap. i., Patr. Lat. t. xxiii.). All these early quotations refer merely to the story of the martyrdom, which terminates with chap. 5. None of them notice the apocalyptic vision which occupies the latter portion of the book. The first part of the book was therefore in existence in some shape from the middle of the 2nd century at latest, and most probably may be dated even much earlier. The earliest notice of the Vision or Anabaticon (c. vi.—xi.) is found in the account of Hieracas and his teaching given us by Epiphanius, Haeres.

lxvii. Hieracas lived towards the end of the 3rd century. He distinctly quotes c. ix. 35, 36 (cf. Rom. viii. 26; Heb. vii. 3) in defence of his view that Melchisedec, king of Salem, should be identified with the angel of the Holy Ghost. [HIERACAS, MELCHISEDECIANS.] There are other points of contact between the theology of Hieracas and that of the Vision. He is said, for instance, to have rejected the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, meaning thereby the gross material body, while holding the existence of a spiritual body (σῶμα πνευματικόν), a view which is clearly stated in c. vii. 14, 26; ix. 7-18, and 24-26 (cf. Epiph. adv. Haeres. lxviii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. t. xlii.). One extract from the ninth chapter will sufficiently prove this:—"Ibi vidi omnes justos qui inde ab Adamo, et ibi vidi Abeam sanctum et omnes justos, et ibi vidi Enochum et omnes qui cum eo, nudatos vestitu carnis, et vidi eos in vestitu eorum superno et ipsi erant sicut angeli." According to this writer heavenly bodies or vestments are ready and prepared beforehand in heaven for the just who are still militant on earth. Indeed one passage alone (c. xi. 34, 35) proves this to have been the meaning which the writer placed upon the "supernae vestes." The angel guide who had shewn him the wonders of the heavens tells him at last that it is time to return to his earthly body, saying, "Revertes in vestem tuam donec dies tui impleantur, tum huc venies" (cf. Fleury, H. E. t. ii. l. viii. s. 26). Again, in cap. ix. 16, we find a period of 545 days, or a year and a half, fixed as the time of our Lord's life upon earth after the resurrection, an opinion maintained by the Valentinians and Ophites, heretics who flourished from the middle of the 2nd century, especially in Egypt and its neighbourhood (Iren. adv. Haeres. i. i. 5). The view again given in this work of the Incarnation is decidedly of a docetic character (cap. ix. 13; xi. 7-11), resembling very closely that of the Valentinians in earlier and of the Paulicians in later times; "who ascribed to our Lord a body resembling the earthly only in appearance, of higher stuff, which he brought with him from heaven and with which he passed through Mary as through a channel without receiving any portion of it from her" (Neander, H. E. v. 360, ed. Bohn). In the Vision the birth of our Lord is represented as taking place without any natural pangs. The doctrine also of the person of Christ and of the Holy Ghost which is taught in the Vision is not strictly orthodox. The Son and the Holy Spirit are called God and adored (cap. ix. 31, 36), yet they in turn glorify and adore God (cap. ix. 40). The Holy Ghost is spoken of as the Angelus Spiritus Sancti, just as Origen tells us in his work, de Principiis, i. 3, that the two winged seraphim seen by Isaiah in the vision (Isaiah vi.) were the only-begotten Son and the Holy Ghost. (Compare with this the similar doctrine of the Clementine Recognitions, written at the beginning of the 3rd century, as noted by Dörner, Doctr. of Person of Christ, div. i. vol. i. app. pp. 446, 447, Clark's edition, and also an art. in the Journal of Philology for 1871, t. iii. p. 223, by E. H. Palmer, on "The Eastern Origin of the Christian Pseud-Epigraphic Writings.") From all these concurrent circumstances we are inclined to conclude that the Martyrium Isaiaë was worked up into its present shape, and the apocalyptic vision elaborated in detail and added thereto by Hieracas himself or by one of the same later Origenistic school some time during the 3rd century. It has been almost universally agreed that the author or authors of the book were converted Jews. The Coptic and Abyssinian churches have, however, down to the present time retained (as in the rite of circumcision) quite enough of Jewish sentiment and ceremonial to explain the Judaic elements in the work; while the theory here advocated would account for the respect paid in the Coptic church to the Ascensio Isaiaë as evidenced by the fact that there alone perfect copies of it have been preserved. [COPTIC CHURCH.] Epiphanius, Haeres. xl., mentions it also as one of the books used by the Archontici, a body of heretics who in the beginning of the 4th century taught that there were seven heavens presided over by seven different Archons, and rejected the resurrection of the body on Gnostic grounds. [ARCHONTICI.] There are several references to it in Jerome's works, as, for instance, in Comment. in Isaiaem, cap. lxiv. vv. 4, 5; Apol. adv. libros Rufini, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxiii. It is also quoted in Ambros. Psalm. cxviii. Opp. ed. Bened. t. i. p. 1124, and in the imperfect work on St. Matthew attributed to St. Chrysostom (Chrysost. Opp. Montf. t. vi.), and then falls out of notice among Catholic writers. Dr. Laurence took quite a different view of the age and origin of the work. Considering its allusions to our Lord's second coming, its reference to one persecution only, and its plain allusion to Nero (cap. iv. 2, 12, 14, 18), he fixes the date of its writing for A.D. 68 or 69. All the passages, however, on which his theory depends are found in the first part of the book (the Martyrium), which may have been compiled during the 1st century. Laurence's strong point is the reference to Nero, where Antichrist is spoken of as "the king of this world descending out of heaven in the likeness of a man, a king of iniquity, and the murderer of his mother." On the long-continued expectation, however, of the reappearance of Nero as Antichrist compare Lactant. de Mort. Persecut. 42; Sulp. Sev. Dialog. ii. 16; Hieron. in Daniel. xi. 28, in Isaiaem, xvii. 13; August. de Civ. Dei, xx. 19; Bleek's Lect. on the Apocalyp. ed. S. Davidson, p. 97; Jour. Sac. Lit. ed. Burgess, t. xii. p. 33, Oct. 1860. Dillmann divides the book into three parts. The earlier portions of the book he ascribes to the end of the 1st or early part of the 2nd century. The latter portions he would fix somewhat later in the 2nd century.

3. Its Theological Use.—The Martyrium, cap. 1-5, as we have already seen, is frequently quoted by Catholic writers till Jerome's time, after which its use seems to have been confined to heretical sects. The Arians seem to have employed it extensively. Its doctrine concerning the person of Christ and its Manichean views of matter, as shewn in its doctrine of the "supernae vestes," commended it to them, and rendered it the fitter for their purpose. As Milman has well observed (Hist. of Lat. Christianity, i. 178)—"The same Oriental tenet which gave birth to the various Gnostic sects and to Manicheism had lain at the root of Arianism, which arose out of that profound sense of the malignancy of matter, which in its grosser influence had led to the Manichean Dualism. The pure parental Deity must stand entirely aloof from all connexion with that in which evil was inherent, inveterate, inextinguishable." In Mai, Nova Collect. t. iii. par. ii. p. 238, 239, we find two fragments of it among certain Arian MSS., one the same as cap. iii., and the other identical with the first twenty verses of cap. vii. Mai professes himself completely ignorant of the apocryphal book whence they were taken. This book seems also to have been much used by the wild immoral sects of the middle ages, the Paulicians, Bogomili, Cathari, Massaliani, Beghards (see Mosheim, H. E. on sects and heresies of cent. xii. and xiii.). We find, therefore, Euthymius Zigabenus (Victoria de Massaliani. Anath. iv.), a writer of the beginning of the 12th century, anathematizing the Massaliani for holding a Trinity in the seventh heaven higher than the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost "according to the execrable vision falsely attributed by them to Isaiiah" (Tollii, Insignia Itiner. Ital. p. 116). Gieseler conjectures that a Latin version of cap. vi.-xi. referred to by Sixtus Senensis (Biblioth. Sanct. lib. ii. p. 59) as printed at Venice some time in the 16th century was originally made for the use of those heretics in centuries xii. or xiii. This he concludes from its use of the word "honorantia," which, in his opinion, is scarcely ever found prior to that time. This version was republished by Gieseler in 1832, and is added by Dillmann to his able monograph.

ISAIAS. [ESAIAS.]

ISAIAS (1), martyr of Mt. Sinai. [SABAS.]

ISAIAS (2), BAR CHADABU, of Arzun (Erzerroom), fl. A.D. 330, martyrologist of the persecution under Sapor II. A.D. 327. He relates especially the deaths of two brothers, Jonas and Brichestus, at whose trial he was present as an officer of the king's horse. (S. E. Assemani, Acta Martyrum Orient. et Occident. i. pp. 215-225. Romae, 1748.) [C. J. B.]

ISAIAS (3), of Háleb (Aleppo), an anchorite of the 4th century. His life is written in the Syriac Cod. aceclx. [1197 A.D.] of the Br. Mus. See Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. pt. iii. p. 1129, § 38. He was the last of the 70 disciples of Eugenius, an Egyptian who with his followers settled on the river Mascas, south of Nisibis, and took part in the consecration of Jacobus as bishop of that city. Eugenius was the first to introduce the ascetic life among the Christians of Persia. When Nisibis (363 A.D.) surrendered to Sapor, that monarch treated Eugenius and his monks with kindness, bestowing upon them a village with a mill near it. See the life of Eugenius by his disciple Michael in § 41 loc. cit. The emperor Constantine in an epistle praises Eugenius along with Antony and another ascetic. [C. J. B.]

ISAIAS (4), abbat of Scete. [ESAIAS (3).] (Cf. Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. vol. ii. pp. 458-465.) Codd. dlxxv. (dated A.D. 604) and dlxxvi. (7th century) are Syriac duplicates of the Oratt. abbatis Isai. in Galland, Bibl. vet. Patr. vii. and Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. They begin with (1) A discourse, On the greatest benefits of the soul; (2) Sayings of 12 wandering monks; and

(3) How it becomes the brethren to behave to each other. There are one or two things besides, not contained in Galland and Migne. [C. J. B.]

ISAIAS (5), patriarch of Armenia, A.D. 775-788, between Sion and Stephen I. He was of Eghabadrusch (the name of a town and monastery), in the canton of Nik. (Saint-Martin, Mém. sur l'Armén. i. 439; ii. 417, 458.)

[G. T. S.]

ISAM (HISAM, ISHAM, HESCHAM, HISCAM), fifteenth calif, the tenth in the Ommiad dynasty at Damascus. He is called Isam by the Greeks, and usually Hescham by the Orientals. Saint-Martin states (in his ed. of Le Beau, t. xii. 129 n) that the Arabs name him Abou'l-Walid Hescham, which accounts for his being called Ewelid (i.e. Walid) in the Historia Miscella (Pat. Lat. xc. 1082 c, 1090 a) and from thence by Baronius (ann. 741 vi. 742 i.; cf. Pagi, 742 v.). According to the Alexandrine system of chronology in Theophanes, Isam reigned from 716 to 734. Herbelot (Bibl. Or. s. n.), from oriental sources, places his death in 742, after a reign of nineteen years and eight or nine months. Arabic writers date his death 6 Rabi' i. a. h. 125, which is reckoned as Jan. 7, 743 A.D. by L'Art de Vérif. (v. 151), and Feb. 6, 743, by Saint-Martin (u. s. 193 n). The latter assigns him a reign of nineteen years and seven months, which would make his accession to have been in July 723. L'Art puts his accession in 724, giving his age at death fifty-three or fifty-five years. Isam's reign was almost entirely comprised within that of the emperor Leo III. Isaurus. He was the son of Abdulmalek, the tenth calif, and brother of Izid II. his predecessor. He was succeeded by his nephew (wrongly called son in Theoph.) Walid II. the son of Izid II. The internal troubles of the empire following Leo's decrees against image-worship in 726, brought in (A.D. 731) the invading armies of Isam commanded by his two sons, Maowiyah (Mawias) and Suliman (Σουλειμάν), the two scourges of Asia, besides the famous Batal (Βατάλ, Theoph.) or Sid-al-Battal, the prototype of the western Cid and the renowned champion of Islam (Finlay, ii. 19). In the six years A.D. 734-739, the Saracen incursions were uninterrupted. In one of them, A.D. 736, Batal made a prize of a man who pretended to be Tiberius the son of Justinian II., and Isam affected to treat him with great distinction, playing him off against Leo (Theoph. 344). Another eminent captive was Eustathius, son of the patrician Marianus, taken in 737 at a fortress named the Iron Castle (σιδηροῦν κάστρον). In May 739, the whole force of the Saracen empire poured into Asia Minor in four columns. It was completely overthrown by Leo and his son Constantine in person at a spot named by Theophanes Acroinon (Ἀκροϊνόν, 345, or Ἀκρωϊνόν, 327, where Goar's note places it in Bithynia: the name in Anastasius is Achrohenum, Achrobinum, Chrahimon, in Pat. Lat. cviii. 1353 c, 1366 c). After this defeat the Saracens ceased to be formidable to the empire until the rise of the Abbassides and Bagdad califate. Isam (Th. 347) in the following year, 740, avenged himself by ordering a general martyrdom of his Christian captives dispersed through his dominions, the most illustrious of the victims being Eustathius above mentioned, who suffered at Charrae. [EUSTATHIUS (50).] Though such a foe to Christianity, Isam before his death conferred a signal favour on one branch of it under his rule. He permitted the church of Antioch, now "widowed" forty years (Th. 349), to resume the election of its patriarch, on condition of the choice falling on the monk Stephen, for whom he had a personal regard. This patriarchate therefore revived in the person of Stephen III. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 744). For the civil details of the reign see Le Beau (Hist. du Bas-Emp. xii. 169; Finlay, Hist. Gr. ii. 19). [T. W. D.]

ISAN, ST., a saint of the 6th century who was the founder of Llanishen in Glamorgan-shire and Llanishen in Monmouthshire. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 257.) [C. W. B.]

ISAURUS or ISAURA, an Athenian deacon and martyr with Felix and Peregrinus at Apollonia of Macedonia, under Numerianus, A.D. 282 (Acta SS. Boll. Jul. ii. 268; Bas. Men.). The same persons seem commemorated by the Bollandists and the Mart. Rom. on June 17, the place of their birth and execution and their names being identical. The only difference being that in Bas. Men. the martyrs of July 6 perished by fire, those of June 17 by the sword. [G. T. S.]

ISCHYRAS (1), one of the forty-seven orthodox Egyptian bishops who came with Athanasius to the council of Tyre in 335 (Athan. Ap. c. Ar. 79; Mansi, ii. 1143). There follows in this list the name of Ammon, and the two together must be the Ischyrammon in the corresponding place of another list of Egyptian bishops who assented to the decrees of the council of Sardica in 343 (Ap. c. Ar. 50; Mansi, iii. 68). Perhaps it is in favour of Ischyrammon being the true name, that there are four other bishops in the list whose names terminate in "ammon."

[C. H.]

ISCHYRAS (2) (ISCHYRION, Sozom.), Egyptian pseudo-presbyter and finally bishop; a slanderer of Athanasius. His story, which begins under the predecessor of Athanasius, is made out from scattered passages in the Apol. c. Arian., and a slight outline is given by Socrates (i. 27). He belonged to a hamlet in the Mareotis too small for a church of its own (§ 85, ed. Migne), and there had a conventicle attended by seven persons at the most (77, 83). He did not bear a good moral character (63), and was once charged with insulting the emperor's statues (vol. i. 185 b. n.). The Alexandrian synod of 324 disallowed his orders and pronounced him a layman (74, 75), disproving his pretensions to have been ordained by bishop Meletius, in whose brevarium his name did not appear (11, 28, 46, 71). He had given out that he was a presbyter of the pseudo-bishop COLUTHUS, but no one out of his own family believed him, as he never had a church, and no one in the neighbourhood looked on him as a clergyman (74, 75). He never attended ecclesiastical assemblies as a presbyter (28). In spite of the synod, he continued to act as a presbyter, and was doing this in the cottage of Ision when Athanasius, being on a visitation in the Mareotis, sent his presbyter Macarius to bid him desist. When Macarius reached the house, Ischyras was reported ill in his cell or in a corner behind the door (28, 63, 83), certainly not officiating at the Eucharist (41). This occurrence may be assigned to about A.D. 329, between the latest date (June 8, 328) possible for the consecration of Athanasius and Nov. 330, when the troubles broke out. Ischyras on his recovery went over to the Meletians, in conjunction with whom he framed his accusation against Macarius (63), and through Macarius against Athanasius. It was in the spring of 331 (see vol. i. p. 184, and Hefele, ii. 13) that the three Meletians accused Macarius at Nicomedia of having broken a chalice, overturned a holy table, and burnt service books on the occasion of his visit. As his friends became ashamed of him (63), Ischyras confessed the fabrication to the archbishop and implored forgiveness (16, 28, 63, 74). This would be in mid- Lent, 332. In the summer of 335, Ischyras, having meanwhile been gained over by the Eusebians, revived the accusation before the council of Tyre (13), and accompanied the synodal commission to the Mareotis to investigate the truth of it (27). For his reward his Eusebian patrons procured (85) an imperial order for the erection of a church for him at a place called Pax Secontaruri, and the document recognised him as a "presbyter" [HEMERIUS]. They afterwards obtained for him the episcopal title (16, 41), and he figures as bishop of Mareotis among the bishops who assembled at Sardica in 343 (Socr. ii. 20; Soz. iii. 12, here "Ischyron"), and afterwards withdrew to Philippopolis (Hilar. Frag. iii. in Pat. Lat. x. 677 A; Mansi, iii. 139), at which synod, however, his name is corruptly written Quirius. No other instance of a bishop of Mareotis occurs. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 530.) [T. W. D.]

ISCHYRION (1), Dec. 22 (Us.), June 1 (Rom. Mart.). Martyr in Egypt in the Decian persecution. "But many others were also torn asunder in cities and villages, of which I shall mention one as an example. Ischyron was hired by one of the rulers in the capacity of a steward. This man was ordered by his employer to sacrifice, but as he did not obey, he was abused by him. Persevering in his purpose, he was treated with contumely, and as he still continued to bear with all, his employer seized a long pole, and slew him by thrusting it through his bowels." (Euseb. H. E. vi. 42.) [G. T. S.]

ISCHYRION (2), one of the forty-seven orthodox Egyptian bishops who came with Athanasius to the council of Tyre in 335 (Athan. Apol. c. Ar. 79; Mansi, ii. 1143). As he does not appear in the list of the Egyptian bishops who accepted the decrees of Sardica in 343, he was then probably dead. [C. H.]

ISCHYRION (3), bishop of Leonto or Leontopolis in the small Egyptian Delta. He signed the epistle of Eugenius of Ancyra on behalf of Marcellus in 372. (Mansi, iii. 473; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 553.) Mansi thinks he may have been the preceding. [J. de S.]

ISCHYRION. [ISCHYRAS.]

ISCHYRION (4), deacon of Alexandria, and adherent of St. Cyril, author of a letter addressed to St. Leo of Rome, accusing Dioscorus. [Dioscorus, Vol. I. p. 855.] [J. W. S.]

ISDIGERDES (1) I. (JEZDEDSCHERD, YAZ-

DEJIRDUS, YEZDEGERDES; Ἰσδιγέρδης and Ἰσδε-γέρδης by the Greeks; in Armenian YAZGERD; on his coins, יזדקרטי, i.e. IZDIKERTI), king of Persia, surnamed Al Aitham (the Wicked), always known in history as Isdigerd I., though an obscure and uncertain predecessor of the same name makes Mordtmann reckon him as Isdigerd II. There is a slight discrepancy as to the dates of his reign, and Rawlinson thinks the best evidence is in favour of A.D. 399 for the commencement, and 419 or 420 for his death.
He was the son of Sapor III., succeeding his brother Vararanes IV., and was succeeded by his son Vararanes V. He reigned at Ctesiphon.
For his coin see Rawlinson, Seventh Monarchy, 1876, p. 278. With the Romans he appears to have lived in peace; Agathias (Hist. iv. 26,
p. 264, ed. Bonn, 1828) and Theophanes (Chron.
i. 125, 128, p. 69, ed. Bonn. 1839) relate how the emperor Arcadius on his death-bed directed his son Theodosius to be put under Isdegerdes' tutelage. (Petavius, Rat. Temp. pt. i. l. vi. c. 15, p. 249, Lugd. 1710; Greg. Abul-Pharajius, Hist.
Comp. Dyn. i. p. 91, Oxon. 1663.) His reign is of importance in the history of the Persian church, as for a time he was almost a Christian, and as Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vii. 8) says, gave every facility for the propagation of the gospel, yet probably closed his days in persecuting the church.
Under the example and influence of Maruthas bishop of Martyropolis in Mesopotamia, who had been sent to him on an embassy from the Romans, early in his reign, but the year is unfixed, he was very favourably disposed towards Christianity, and the church in his realm had peace, with fullest liberty of worship and church-building.
The opposition and impostures of the magi round his throne and person he was able, with the assistance of Maruthas and other Christians, to overcome and expose, and miracles are said to have been wrought before him for the confirmation of the Gospel. A second visit of Maruthas seems only to have deepened the impression (Socrates, ib.). But the indiscreet and impetuous zeal of one of Maruthas's companions, Abdas bishop of Susa, lost this royal convert to the faith. Abdas burned one of the temples of fire (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 39). This offence
Isdigerd was prepared to overlook, if Abdas would rebuild the burned pyre; failing this the king threatened to burn down and destroy all the Christian churches in Persia. Abdas, esteeming it as morally wrong to rebuild the temple as to worship at the altar [ABDA], refused to comply, and Isdigerd kept his word.
The churches were at once burned down, Abdas was himself among the first of the martyrs, and a persecution commenced in or towards the end of Isdigerd's reign, which his son and successor Vararanes or Bararanes carried on with the most revolting cruelty, and which was only ended by the presence of the Roman legions. From the odium of this persecution the memory of Isdigerd is specially shielded by Socrates (Hist.
Eccl. vii. 18-21), who throws it on his son, but Theodoret (ib. v. 39) probably gives the truer account; and at the same time Isdigerd had probably neither the time nor inclination to carry out his edicts with severity against the Christians. His character is described as noble and generous, tarnished only by this one dark spot which belongs to the last year of his reign, or a brief period in the middle of it. For the best modern literature of this reign, see at the end of the following article. [G. T. S.]

ISDIGERDES (2) II., king of Persia, the son and successor of Vararanes V. All modern writers agree in placing his death at A.D. 457, but differ somewhat as to the length of his reign. For its commencement Rawlinson thinks the best evidence is in favour of Clinton's year 440. Soon after his accession he declared war against the Roman empire. Theodosius II., however, in a short time made peace with him, and Isdigerd then undertook a war, which continued many years (443-51), against the Tatars of Transoxiana. The chief interest for the student of church history in Isdigerd II. arises from the attempt he made to force the Zoroastrian religion on Christian Armenia. In this he was ably seconded by his vizier Mhr-nerse, whose proclamation, still extant, embodies the Zoroastrian objection to Christian doctrine [MHR-NERSES, MESROBES]. It was answered in a council of eighteen Armenian bishops, headed by the patriarch Joseph, at Ardashad in 450. This document, which is also extant, is a lengthened apology for Christianity, and contains a detailed confession of faith, with a resolution of adhering to it couched in these terms: "Do thou therefore enquire of us no further concerning these things, for our belief originates not with man.
We are not taught like children; but we are indissolubly bound to God, from whom nothing can detach us, neither now, nor hereafter, nor for ever, nor for ever and ever" (Hist. of Vartan, tr. by Neumann, 1830) [ELISÆUS (1)].
Isdigerd's attempt to convert Armenia to Zoroastrianism was manifestly dictated by a desire to detach the country from the Christian Roman empire. In 451 he attacked the Armenians.
They endeavoured to secure the help of the emperor Marcian, who was, however, paralysed through fear of Attila and the Huns. In 455 or 456 the Persians triumphed in a great battle, wherein the patriarch Joseph and many nobles were taken prisoners and martyred. (Agathias,
iv. 27; Tabari, Chronique, iii. 127; Clinton,
Fasti Romani, i. p. 546; Tillem. Emp. vi. 39;
Saint-Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie. vol. i.
p. 322; Pathkanian, Histoire des Sassan. in Journal Asiatique, 1866, pp. 108-238; Mordtmann, Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen
Gesellschaft, t. viii. 70; Rawlinson's Seventh Or.
Monarchy, 1876, cap. xv. p. 301, where other authorities will be found.) Pathkanian's article gives a list of writers who have treated of this period. A coin of Isdigerd II. is engraved in Rawl. p. 278. He was succeeded by Perozes.
[G. T. S.]

ISENGERUS (ISENGRENUS), said to have been the seventh bishop of Verden-on-the-Aller, in modern Hanover, commemorated on March 21.
It is supposed that he was a Scottish missionary, who went over to the north of Germany about the beginning of the 9th century. In the succession at Verden he is placed between Cor-tilla and Harruchus, and, like the latter, was a Benedictine monk and abbot of the monastery of Amarbaric (Amarbaricanus, Amarbaricensis).
But about the person, his work, and time, there is no little doubt. Potthast, Biblioth. suppl. p. 435, does not include him among the bishops of Ver-den, and makes Haruch succeed Tanko in 808. Colgan (Acta SS. 715, March 21) and Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 379) have drawn together the testimony of Krantz (Metropolis) and others. His martyrdom took place about A.D. 824, and Dempster says he wrote Ad suam Ecclesiam. (Tanner, Bibl. 447; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 118; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 195; Colgan, Acta SS. 715-16; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 102, calling him Joingerus. On the localising of Ambaric near Verden, and not as equivalent to Armagh, see Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 4; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 568; Colgan, Acta SS. 240, n. 1, 348 a, b.) [HARRUCHUS.] [J. G.]

ISERNINUS. [ISSERNINUS.]

ISERUS, alleged bishop of Mende. [ILERUS.]

ISHMAEL, Welsh saint. [ISMAEL.]

ISICHIUS. [HESYCHIUS (9).]

ISICIUS, a chorepiscopus in Isauria and a bishop of Prusa. [HESYCHIUS (4).]

ISICIUS, bishop of Carcesa. [HESYCHIUS (1).]

ISICIUS (1) I. (HESICHIUS), 19th bishop of Vienne, a senator of the place, husband of Audientia, and father of Avitus his successor in the see, and of Apollinaris bishop of Valence. He died, according to the martyrology of Ado, on March 16; according to the necrology of Vienne, upon Nov. 12. The year is uncertain, but there is reason to believe that he lived to the year A.D. 490. (Gall. Ch. xvi. 19; Boll. Acta SS. 16 Mart. ii. 447.) [R. T. S.]

ISICIUS (2) II., ST. (ISITUS, ESYCHIUS, HESYCHIUS, HYSICHIUS), twenty-fourth archbishop of Vienne, succeeding St. Pantagathus, and followed by St. Naamatus (Ado, Chronicon, 564). He is said in earlier life to have held high civil office, and to have been quaestor of the city. When he entered the ranks of the clergy he devoted himself to study, especially astronomy; and occupied a chair in the school of Vienne, from which he was transferred to the archbishopric. He was present at the fifth council of Orleans and the second of Clermont in Auvergne, both held in 549, and at the second of Paris about 553 (Mansi, ix. 135, 144, 740). According to the Life of St. Tygris it was St. Isicius who ordained Felmasius, the first bishop of Maurienne in Savoy (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 75). This is also said to be affirmed by a fragment of an old chronicle of Maurienne, published by Billiet (Gall. Christ. xvi. 25). The passage in St. Tygris's Life brings him down to at least the commencement of Guntram's reign in Burgundy (A.D. 561). His death is ascribed to the year 565. His sister Marcella composed his epitaph, consisting of several stanzas of Sapphic verse, which may be read in the Gall. Christ. (ibid.) He is commemorated Nov. 12, the day of his death. [S. A. ISIDORA, a pious lady addressed by Severus of Antioch, in an epistle "to Isidora who loves Christ." (Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 568, cod. DCXCIII. (of 8th cent.) § vii. 9.) [C. J. B.]

ISIDORUS (1), Jan. 2, a reputed bishop of Antioch (Usuard, Adon.), of which see, however, Baronius (in Mart.) declares that there never was a bishop of that name, nor does Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 699 sqq.) mention any. In Mart. Hieron. he is called Isiridonus bishop of Antioch. The tradition is that he was slain by the Arians. If they really killed a bishop of Antioch, it is most likely we should have heard more about it. (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i. 83.) [G. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (2), bishop of Cyrus, ordained to the episcopate by Eusebius of Samosata when the latter was returning from exile in 378 (Theodoret, H. E. v. 4). Theodoret, who praises Isidore for his eminent zeal, mentions him in a company of bishops who visited Marcan the solitary after Easter in some year not stated (Hist. Relig. cap. 3, p. 1143, in Pat. Gr. lxxxii. 1331). In 381 Isidore was present at the council of Constantinople, in the records of which his description is corruptly given as Suriensis instead of Cyrensis. (Mansi, iii. 569; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 931.) [C. H.]

ISIDORUS (3), one of the Egyptian bishops and confessors, exiled to Diocæsarea in the reign of Valens. He and his fellow exile Adelphius jointly addressed Apollinaris as one in harmony with themselves shortly before Apollinaris broached his heretical opinions, and their letter was subsequently used by Apollinaris for his own purposes against Paulinus of Antioch. (Facundus Hermianens. Def. Trinum Capit. lib. iv. cap. 2 in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 618 d.) [C. H.]

ISIDORUS (4), bishop of Hermopolis Parva (Demenhur) in Egypt; celebrated in the martyrologies upon Jan. 3. He lived in the 4th century, had been a monk in one of the Nitrian convents, and survived to a very advanced age. (Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca, cap. 9, 10, in Patr. Gr. xxxiv. 1025 seq.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 515.) [J. de S.]

ISIDORUS (5), bishop of Athribis in Egypt. His name is mentioned in one of the homilies of Theophilus Alexandrinus, who states that in a former year he had ordained "in Athribi pro Isidoro Athanasium." From this we infer that Isidore lived in the later part of the 4th century. (Patr. Gr. lxxv. 340; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 555.) [J. de S.]

ISIDORUS (6), bishop and confessor, who, among a multitude of monks, met St. Paula when she came from Alexandria to visit the monastic communities of Nitria (Jerom. ep. 108, § 14, ed. Vallarsi). Vallarsi (p. 698, note e) suggests that he was St. Isidore of Pelusium. [J. G.]

ISIDORUS (7), pretended bishop of Cordova. The earliest mention of him (the Chronicle which bears the name of Dexter being now considered to be a forgery of the 17th century) is in the Chronicle of Sigebert, who wrote about A.D. 1100, and is as follows:—"Isidore bishop of Cordova wrote to Orosius four books on the Books of Kings" (Migne, Patr. Lat. clx. 559), and accordingly Trithemius, assuming the Orosius above mentioned to be the historian of that name who flourished early in the 5th century, places Isidore about A.D. 420. However, as no mention whatever of such an Isidore is to be found before Sigebert, that is to say, for 700 years after his supposed date, it is now believed that this Isidore is a fictitious personage, whose existence was assumed by Sigebert to account for a quotation in a sermon he believed to be by St. Augustine (St. Augustine, vol. v. appendix, Sermo 208, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxix. 2129), but which was probably written by Fulbert of Carnotum, now Chartres. The quotation in question comes really from St. Isidore of Seville's treatise de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 67, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 148. Sigebert, having once for this reason formed the hypothesis of an Isidore anterior to or contemporaneous with St. Augustine, may have had his belief confirmed by a further confusion between the Orosius to whom St. Isidore dedicates his allegories and the celebrated Orosius who lived about two centuries before St. Isidore; and mixing up the allegories with the four books on the Books of Kings, which is part of the treatise that comes next in order to the allegories, have supposed these four books to be the work of the imaginary Isidore. Sigebert may have found the word Carnotense on the margin of the above-mentioned sermon, and misreading it "Cordubense," have thus arrived at the see of his hypothetical Isidore. (Esp. Sagr. x. 220; Gams, Kirchengeschichte, ii. 418.) [F. D.]

ISIDORUS (8), bishop of Priene (Cadmea) near the mouth of the Maeander in the ecclesiastical province of Asia. At the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon his name was subscribed in his absence by Hesperius of Pitane, at the order of Stephen of Ephesus, to the formula of faith that was read before the emperor Marcian, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 717.) [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (9), one of the orthodox Egyptian bishops who, with some Alexandrian clerics, fled to Constantinople in A.D. 457, to escape the persecution of Timotheus Aelurus and the Euty-chians [NESTORIUS bishop of Phragones]. His name appears also at the head of the letter addressed to them by pope Leo (Leo Mag. Ep. clx. 1336). We have no means of ascertaining his see. [C. G.]

ISIDORUS (10), bishop of Zoar in Palestine. He signed the synodical epistle of the province of Jerusalem to the patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 518, complaining of the invasion of the see of Antioch. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 743; Mansi, viii. 577.) [J. de S.]

ISIDORUS (11), bishop of Chalcis (Kenneserin) in Syria, to the south of Beroea. Having adopted Monophysite opinions, he was deprived of his see and exiled by edict of the emperor Justin, A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 788, on the authority of Dionysius patriarch of the Jacobites.) [J. de S.]

ISIDORUS (12) I., bishop of Samos. Joannes Moschus (Pratum Spirit. c. 108, in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 2969) relates, cir. 600, that on landing at Samos he visited Isidorus, who was at that time abbat of the monastery Charixenus, and that he afterwards heard that he was raised to the bishopric of the island. [ISIDORUS (22).] [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (13), April 4, bishop of Seville, A.D. 600-636. Notwithstanding the prominent place that Isidore of Seville holds in Spanish ecclesiastical history, the facts of his life that have been preserved to us are but few, and considerable uncertainty attaches to many points of his history. We know that his father was Severianus, who has frequently been called prefect of Cartagena. Isidore's own words, however (De Vir. ill. 41), are "genitus patre Severiano Carthaginensis provinciae;" where he is speaking of his brother Leander. Severianus has been often assumed to have been of Gothic origin, or closely connected with the Gothic royal family, an assumption, however, which upon examination is found scarcely tenable. An obvious difficulty is that the names of Isidore's family are Greek and Latin—Leander, Isidore, Severianus, Fulgentius, Florentina. We can suppose the persons bearing these names to have been Goths, who were early severed from their home and adopted foreign appellations; or we may account for it by supposing that these were their baptismal names, just as Hermenegild when he renounced Arianism assumed the name of Joannes. In fact, the two points which appear certain about Isidore's origin are that his father was of the province of Cartagena, and that for some reason his parents left their original home either before or very shortly after his birth and came to Seville. It is not certain, therefore, whether Isidore was born at Seville or at Cartagena, but the balance of authority is in favour of the latter. Arevalo (i. 122) decides for Seville; so Dupin: Florez, on the contrary (Esp. Sag. ix. 193, x. 120), is in favour of Cartagena. Much greater uncertainty attaches to Isidore's mother. She has even been called the daughter of Theoderic, and her name is given as Theodora by the bishop of Palencia Don Rodrigo Sanchez (Florez, ix. 192); but by others as Theodosia, and the addition is made of Cervella or Cervilla. But others again, resting on a metaphorical passage from a letter of Leander to his sister, have called her Turtura. This passage is from the last chapter of what is known as the rule of St. Leander, and is given in vol. i. of Isidore's works, p. 7, edit. Arevalo; it is also quoted by Florez (ix. 192). All tends to shew that the parents of Isidore died when he was very young. He was the youngest of the family. Leander the eldest was archbishop of Seville from about 579 to 599, and Fulgentius was bishop of Astigi or Eciija in the province of Seville.

The precise year of Isidore's birth cannot be ascertained. We only know that he was archbishop of Seville for nearly forty years, and that he died in 636. Leander received the pall from Gregory the Great in 599. He therefore did not die till that year, or the following one. Gams selects 600 as the year of Leander's death, and consequently of Isidore's succession (ii. 41), and it must have been about that time; so that if we place the birth of Isidore about 560, we shall not be far wrong.

Isidore of Seville is sometimes called Senior, and sometimes Junior. He is called Junior with reference to a supposed Isidore of Cordova [ISIDORUS (7)], and Senior with reference to Isidorus Pacensis [ISIDORUS (23)]. (Florez, x. 220.) The name is a common one, and seems to carry us back in its origin to the banks of the Nile and the worship of Isis. The early manhood of Isidore was probably passed in a monastery, where he would find the opportunity for pursuing those studies which afterwards caused him to be so famous. It is a question whether he ever belonged to a coenobite order. The best editor of Isidore comes to the conclusion that he did not. If we accept this decision, which appears to be sound, there is an end to another story, of the unwillingness with which Isidore left his monkish cell when Leander sent for him, as he felt death approaching, and indicated him as his successor; and about the bishops and people after Leander's death unanimously choosing him for their primate, and dragging him reluctantly from his cell.

We meet with Isidore's name in connexion with the so-called decree of Gunthimar, the Gothic king, and a supposed synod of Toledo in the year 610 assigning metropolitan rank to the see of Toledo. In the list of subscriptions appended to the Decretum in the conciliar collections (e.g. Mansi, x. 511) Isidore stands second, following the king, and his subscription is expressed in the following terms: "Ego Isidorus Hispalensis ecclesiae provinciae Baeticae metropolitanus episcopus, dum in urbem Toletanam pro occursu regio advenissem, agnitis his constitutionibus assensum praeberi atque subscripsi." After him come the bishop of Merida and others, including Fulgentius bishop of Astigi, the brother of Isidore.

Isidore next comes before us as presiding over the second council of Seville in November of the year 618 or 619, in the reign of king Sisebut (Mansi, x. 555). The church of Seville is spoken of as the "holy Jerusalem." The governor of the city, Sisisclus, and the treasurer Suanilanus were present, and the clergy stood. The first canon decided the limits of the bishopric of Malaga. The second canon had reference to a similar local determination of rights between Astigi and Cordova. The fourth rendered null and void the ordination as deacons of those who had married widows. The seventh forbade that presbyters should be delegated by their bishop to erect altars, to consecrate churches; to consecrate presbyters, deacons, or virgins; to give imposition of hands or the chrism to the baptized or to converted heretics; to reconcile penitents in public to the church. It forbade also that in the presence of the bishop they should baptize, say mass, preach, bless the people, or "sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi conficere." The eighth canon declared that liberated slaves who had proved ungrateful and injurious should return to slavery. The ninth canon provided that stewards of ecclesiastical property should not be seculars but clerics. The tenth provided that monasteries recently founded in the province of Baetica, i.e. Seville, the modern Andalusia, should be respected and preserved as well as the ancient ones, and that any bishop who destroyed them should be excommunicated. The eleventh gave, under certain stringent rules, the administration, protection, and instruction of nunneries to monks, who were to manage their country estates, and transact all their necessary town business. The twelfth had reference to the retraction of a Syrian Monophysite bishop. The decrees concluded with setting forth in full the doctrine of the Person of Christ against the Acephali, supporting it with appeals to Scripture, the Apostles' Creed, and the fathers. This document was signed by eight bishops, of whom Isidore subscribed first as metropolitan of Baetica. There is some uncertainty hanging over Isidore's presence at a council held at Toledo about the year 625; to this he appears to allude in a letter to Braulio the bishop of Saragossa: "Tuas sanctitatis epistolae me in urbe Toletana invenerunt: nam permotus fueram causa concilii." Arevalo supposes that this meeting may have been adjourned and gathered together again eight years afterwards. If such a council ever met, we have none of its decrees. About the same time also there is said to have been a synod held at Seville under the presidency of Isidore, at which Martianus bishop of Astigi, the successor of Fulgentius, was deposed. On this doubtful point see Florez, España Sagrada, t. x. p. 106.

We come now to the fourth council of Toledo, which was held in the year 633, in the extreme old age of Isidore, and shortly before his death. The Gothic king Swintila had recently been deposed by Sisenand, and it appears that the latter was only too glad to strengthen his cause by courting the favour of the church. Isidore certainly favoured the cause of Sisenand, though for what reason it does not appear. He repaired, however, to Toledo at an early period of his reign to salute him. This was perhaps a year or more before the council, according to Gams. Great obscurity hangs over the end of the reign of Swintila, the accession of Sisenand, and this visit of Isidore to Seville. As he speaks of the virtues of Swintila, we are at a loss to understand his conduct shortly after to a king who appears to have been a usurper; it is probably to be explained by a not unnatural desire on his part to pay homage to the rising sun (cf. Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 188). At all events Isidore was president as metropolitan of Seville at the fourth council of Toledo, which assembled shortly after Sisenand came to the throne. It met in the basilica of St. Leocadia, and was composed of prelates from Gaul and Narbonne, as well as all the provinces of Spain. The king, with the magnates of his court, was present, and threw himself on the earth before the bishops, and with tears and sighs entreated their intercession with God, exhorting them also to observe the ancient decrees of the church, and to reform abuses. The results of this council were embodied in seventy-five decrees, for a summary of which see Dict. Chr. Antiq. ii. 1968. They were signed by the six metropolitan archbishops of Spain. This council was the only one in which they were all present, and it was the most numerously attended of all the Spanish synods. Isidore's name was signed first as the oldest metropolitan and the oldest bishop present (Mansi, x. 641). It may be taken as expressing with tolerable accuracy the mind and influence of Isidore. It also presents a vivid picture of the church of Spain at that period. For instance, the position and deference granted to the king is remarkable, and nothing is said of allegiance to Rome. The church is free and independent, and yet bound in solemn allegiance to the acknowledged king. The relations also of the church to the Jews are striking, and the canons shew that there must have been many Jews in the Spanish community, and that the Christian church had not yet emancipated itself from the intolerance of Judaism.

This council was the last great public event of Isidore's life. He died three years afterwards. As he felt his end approaching he distributed his goods lavishly among the poor, and is said to have spent the whole day for six months in almsgiving. Then when his last illness overtook him he strengthened himself to perform public penance in the church of St. Vincentius the martyr, gathered around him the bishops, the religious orders, the clergy, and the poor, then, as one bishop invested him with the penitential girdle, and another strewed ashes on his head, he made a pious and eloquent prayer, translated in full by Gams, received the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, took affectionate leave of all present, retired to his cell, and in four days died.

Isidore was undoubtedly the greatest man of his time in the church of Spain. He was versed in all the learning of the age, and was well acquainted with the classic and sacred languages, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. His works shew him to have been a man of varied accomplishments, and of great versatility of mind; and the prominent place he long filled in his own country is sufficient indication of his general ability and character. His eloquence is said to have been so great as to have struck all who heard him with astonishment, and it may be fairly said that he represented and gathered in himself all the science of his time. He has been quoted by Bingham as giving his testimony against the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation, and Arevalo has taken the trouble to reply to the charge; but in point of fact the Roman doctrine had not advanced so far as Transubstantiation, nor did it reach that point for many years afterwards. The language of Isidore is studiously scriptural. He is also quoted as holding predestinarian views, but his language seems hardly to go so far. "Obdurare dicitur Deus hominem, non ejus faciendo duritiam, sed non auferendo eam, quam sibi ipse nutritiv. Non aliter et obcaecare dicitur quosdam Deus, non ut in eis eandem ipse caecitatem faciat; sed quod pro eorum inutilibus meritis caecitatem eorum ab eis ipse non auferat." and the same editor maintains that his doctrine is Catholic. Seventeen years after his death, at the 8th council of Toledo, in 653, the epithet Egregius was applied to him. This title was again confirmed at the 15th council of Toledo, 688. Afterwards, popes and councils vied in doing him honour, till Benedict XIV. permitted the office of St. Isidore to be recited in the universal church with the antiphon "O doctor optime," and the gospel, "Vos estis sal terrae."

The works of Isidore are many and multifarious. We begin with his Etymologies or Origins. According to the testimony of Braulio and Ildefonsus, this was his last work. He speaks as late as 632 of the MS. being uncorrected on account of illness, and says he had sent it to Braulio for revision. Gams believes that it was written between 611 and 632, or more probably between 622 and 632, when the friendship between the two men would be most intimate. This treatise is dedicated, "Domino meo, et Dei servo, Braulioni Episcopo," with the following brief preface: "En tibi, sicut pollicitus sum, misi opus de origine quarundam rerum, ex veteris lectionis recordatione collectum, atque ita in quibusdam locis annotatum, sicut extat conscriptum stilo majorum." It is in twenty books, and treats of the whole circle of the sciences in a very concise, methodical, and convenient manner. It is for the period a really wonderful work, and the authors quoted in the course of it shew the extent of classical reading with which its writer was familiar.—Aesop, Anacreon, Appuleius, Aristotle, Boethius, Caesar, Cato, Catullus, Cicero, Demosthenes, Ennius, Herodotus, Hesiod, Homer, Horace, Livy, Lucan, Lucretius, Martial, Ovid, Persius, Pindar, Plato, Plautus, Pliny, Quintilian, Suetonius, Terence, Varro, Virgil, Sallust, and Juvenal. The work passed through many editions—no less than ten are specially described by Arevalo between 1470 and 1529. (See Dressel, De Isidori Originum Fontibus; and for Isidore's use of Suetonius see Reifferscheid, C. Suetonii Tranquilli Reliq. Lips. 1860. For a complete list of the authors used in the Etymologies see C. B. Arevalo, i. 431, and Otto in Lindemann's Corp. Grammat. Vet. iii. 641.) We can give only the barest outline of its contents. The subjects of the several books are as follows: i. Grammar in 44 chapters, containing an immense amount of information that many a schoolboy would be glad to find in a convenient form. ii. Rhetoric and Dialectics, in 31 chapters. iii. The four mathematical sciences: i.e. arithmetic, 9 chapters; geometry, 5 chapters; music, 9 chapters; and astronomy, 48 chapters; algebra, as its name testifies, being not yet invented. iv. Medicine, in 13 chapters. v. of Laws, 27 chapters, of Times, 12 chapters; vi. of ecclesiastical books and offices, 19 chapters; vii. of God, angels, and the orders of the faithful, 14 chapters; viii. of the church and divers sects, 11 chapters; ix. of languages, nations, kingdoms, warfare, citizens, and relationships, 7 chapters. x. An alphabetical index and explanation of certain words. A vast amount of erroneous ingenuity is displayed in deriving all the words of the Latin language from itself: e.g. "Nox, a nocendo dicta, eo quod oculis noceat. Niger, quasi nubiger, quia non serenus, sed fusco opertus est. Unde et nubilum diem tetrum dicimus. Prudens, quasi porro videns: perspicax enim est, et incertorum praevidet casus. Timidus, quod timeat diu, id est, a sanguine, nam timor sanguinem gelat, qui coactus gignit timorem. Cauterium dictum quasi cauturium quod urat," &c. xi. treats of men and of portents, in 4 chapters; xii. of animals, in 8; xiii. of the universe (mundus), in 22; xiv. of the earth and its parts, in 9; xv. of buildings, land-surveying, roads, &c., in 16; xvi. of mineralogy, stones, weights, measures, and metals, in 27; xvii. of agriculture, in 11; xviii. of war, and of various kinds of games, in 69; xix. of ships, of architecture, of clothes of various kinds, in 34; xx. of food, of domestic and agricultural implements, carriages, harness, &c., in 16. The treatise, which in the Roman edition occupies two quarto volumes, is a singular medley of information and ignorance, and presents a remarkable picture of the condition of life and knowledge at the time. It is difficult to give any correct idea of it. Under certain chapters and sections it treats of a great variety of subjects by giving a concise definition or explanation of certain select words, more or less connected with or suggested by the particular subject, thus conveying instruction in an encyclopaedic form. At times, however, additional matter is introduced, not immediately arising out of the main discourse, e.g. in the 5th book, under the head of "De discretione temporum," a chronological summary of sacred and secular history from Adam to Heraclius finds place. It concludes in these striking words: "Eraclius xvii nunc agit imperii annum: Judaei in Hispania Christiani efficiuntur. Residuum sextae aetatis soli Deo est cognitum." The whole period (after an idea common in Augustine) is divided into six ages, the limits of which are Noah, Abraham, Samuel, Zedekiah, Julius Caesar, Heraclius. Again in the sixth book the writer gives a sort of introductory account of the several books of the Bible. However we may be disposed to treat the labours of Isidore with something of contempt, it is probably not possible to overrate the value and the usefulness of this treatise to the age in which he lived, and indeed for many ages it was the most available handbook to which the world had access.

2. The next work of Isidore to be mentioned is Libri Differentiarum sive de proprietate sermonum. Liber primus, De Differentiis Verborum; Liber secundus, De Differentiis Rerum. This book, like the last, is written in the same gnomic and sententious style. The writer tells us that he had in view the corresponding treatise of Cato, and that after his example he had partly edited a few of these differences, and partly borrowed them from other authors. In the first book he treats of the differences of words, arranging them alphabetically, and the distinction drawn is oftentimes acute and accurate, e.g. "Inter aptum et utile: aptum ad tempus, utile ad perpetuum. Inter ante et antea: ante locum significat, et personam; antea tantum tempus. Inter alterum et alium: alter de duobus dicitur; alius de multis. Alter enim sine uno esse non potest." The first book contains 610 of these brief and pregnant sentences. The second book treats in forty sections and 170 paragraphs of the differences of things, as for instance between Deus and Dominus, Substance and Essence, and the like. This is in fact a brief theological treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity, the power and nature of Christ, paradise, angels, and men, under which is an elaborate definition of words denoting the various members of the body, sin, grace, free-will, the law, and the gospel, the active and contemplative life, virtues, vices, and the like.

3. Allegoriae quaedam sacrae scripturae, with a preface "Domino sancto ac reverendissimo Fratri Orosio." This treatise has sometimes been referred to the supposed elder Isidore of Cordova [ISIDORUS (7)]. There was an Oronius metropolitan of Emerita after and before the year 638, and the two names may have been confused. Some critics have suggested an Orosius in Monte Christi, mentioned by Gregory I. But it is not probable at that age that a foreigner should have been a bishop of Spain. The book consists of a spiritual interpretation and unfolding of the names of Scripture characters in the Old and New Testaments. As Adam was fashioned on the 6th day, so Christ was born in the sixth age of the world. As Cain the elder killed his brother, so did the elder people (the Jews) kill Christ on Calvary; 129 names and characters are selected from the Old Testament and explained, and 121 from the New, these latter being in many cases from our Lord's parables, miracles, &c., as the ten virgins, the woman with the lost piece of money, the man who planted a vineyard, and the like. The king being angry who sent his armies and destroyed those murderers and burnt up their city is interpreted of God the Father, who sent Vespasian Caesar with his armies to destroy Jerusalem. We are struck by the intimate acquaintance with Scripture evinced in all these writings, and the wonderful way in which it had permeated the teaching and life of the church of the time. This treatise is one of intrinsic interest.

4. A treatise somewhat similar to the last is the one known as De ortu et obitu patrum qui in Scriptura laudibus efferuntur, containing 64 chapters on Old Testament characters and 21 on New, from Adam to Machabaeus and from Zacharias to Titus respectively. The genuineness of this treatise also has been much doubted, though perhaps without adequate reason, as the chief cause of doubt arises from one passage, which may have been interpolated if it is needful to adopt that supposition. This passage is as follows: "Jacobus filius Zebedaei frater Joannis quartus in ordine, duodecim tribubus, quae sunt in dispersione Gentium, scripsit, atque Hispaniae, et occidentalium locorum gentibus evangelium praedicavit, et in occasu mundi lucem praedicationis infudit. Hic ab Herode Tetracha gladio caesus occubuit. Sepultus in Marmarica." As Gams says, this short sentence swarms with inventions and inaccuracies. The idea of James the elder being the author of the epistle to the Jews is too monstrous to need contradiction. James the younger was the apostle of the Jews, undoubtedly. James the elder never left Jerusalem; but if James had preached in Spain, he would not have been the apostle of the Jews, but of the heathen. Moreover, it was not Herod the Tetrarch, but Herod Agrippa I., who put James to death. Besides, Isidore himself, in the Etymologies, 7, 9, speaks of James the son of Zebedee more accurately, and says nothing about his preaching in Spain and nothing about his writing the epistle, and in the fourteenth book of the same treatise, chapter 5, when he makes mention of Libya and the north of Africa, he omits all notice of any such place as Marmarica. Gams therefore comes to the conclusion that the passage is an interpolation, and Fabricius and others say that it dates from the time of pope Callixtus II. This treatise gives the full scriptural account of the several characters it selects, but adds sundry other particulars on its own authority, which are often curious, e.g. Job "filius Zarae de Bosra, rex Idumaeorum, quartus post Esau, successor Balach filii Beor, homo gentilis," &c. He says that the rock which was smitten by Moses was near Petra, "ubi etiam et nunc usque ostenditur," and the same of the sepulchre of Joshua, "ubi usque hodie insigne monumentum ejus ostenditur." So likewise of Bethlehem he says, "Ibi etiam sepulchrum Jesse patris David ostenditur." One would like to know how far these various sites were traditionally identified in the 7th century. Of the apostle John we are told, "Mutavit in aurum silvestres frondium virgas, litoreaue saxa in gemmas." Gams, ii. 395, however, doubts the genuineness of this passage also, because "we do not find such silly legends in Isidore anywhere else," overlooking the fact that we must first determine what is in Isidore and what is not, and that this cannot be determined except upon independent grounds not involving the rejection of what, as a matter of fact, we do find.

5. Prooemia in libros Vet. et Nov. Test. consist of very brief introductions to the several books of the Old and New Testament, including Tobias, Judith, Esdras, and Maccabees, "ex quibus quidem Tobiae, Judith, et Maccabaeorum, Hebraeion recipiunt. Ecclesia tamen eosdem intra canonicas scripturas enumerat." The several introductions are preceded by a brief general introduction to the whole Bible. In this list the Acts of the Apostles is enumerated immediately before the Apocalypse.

6. Liber numerorum qui in sanctis Scripturis occurrunt.—A mystical treatment of numbers from one to sixty, omitting some after twenty. This treatise ends with a curious computation to shew that the sum of the several numbers up to seventeen makes one hundred and fifty-three, the number of the miraculous draught of fishes. But the same idea had also occurred to St. Augustine.

7. Quaestiones tam de Novo quam de Veteri Testamento.—a series of forty-one questions on the substance and teaching of Scripture with appropriate answers. Some of these are very interesting. "Dic mihi quid est inter Novum et Vetus Testamentum? Respondit: Vetus est peccatum Adæ: unde dicit apostolus: Regnavit mors ab Adam usque ad Moysem, et reliqua. Novum est Christus de virgine natus. Unde Propheta dicit: Cantate Domino canticum novum: quia homo novus venit, nova praecepta attulit, id est, novum testamentum. Dic mihi quibus modis creditur Deus? Respondit: Tribus sive iv. id est Deus bonus, perfectus, omnipotens, sempiternus debetur credi: quia sine his dici non potest Deus. Dic mihi cur esuriit salvator? Ut illuderet Satanam," &c.

8. Secretorum expositiones sacramentorum, seu quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum.—A mystical interpretation of the principal events recorded in the books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Ezra, Maccabees. The writer says in his preface that he has gathered together the opinions of ancient ecclesiastical writers, namely, Origen, Victorinus, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Fulgentius, Cassianus, and pope Gregory the Great. Genesis is treated of in thirty-one chapters, Exodus in fifty-nine, Leviticus in seventeen, Numbers in forty-two, Deuteronomy in twenty-two. Joshua in eighteen, Judges in nine, including one chapter on Ruth; 1 Kings, i. e. Samuel, in twenty-one, 2 Kings in six, 3 Kings in eight, 4 Kings in eight, Ezra in three, Maccabees in one. The mystical method of interpretation is pursued here to an excessive degree, not that in itself that constitutes a valid cause of complaint, inasmuch as it was the vice of the age rather than the man, as, e. g., on the words, "The Lord shall sell him into the hand of a woman" Deborah evidently shews "quia non est apud illum populum primatus, nec permanet apud eum victoriae palma, sed apud Jahel mulierem, id est, ecclesiam: nam Jahel ista alienigena, in cujus manu victoria facta est, figuram tenet ecclesiae ex gentibus conjugatae." The portion of this work which treats of Genesis is a kind of paraphrase on the book, the last chapter dealing with the blessing of Jacob. The explanation is allegorical in style and moralising in tone. It will be seen that the treatment of the latter books is much more brief than that of the others, particularly the Pentateuch.

9. De Fide Catholica ex Veteri et Novo Testamento contra Judaeos.—This is addressed to his sister Florentina, and was apparently written at her request. The treatise is in two books. The first, which contains sixty-two chapters, treats of the person of Christ, from His existence in the bosom of the Father before the world was, till His ascension and His return to judgment. The second book consists of 28 chapters, and treats of the consequences of the Incarnation, that is to say, of the unbelief of the Jews, and the ingathering of the Gentiles, of the conversion of the Jews at the end of the world, and of the cessation of the Sabbath.

10. Sententiarum Libri iii.—A kind of manual of Christian faith and practice. The first book, in 30 chapters, treats of God and His attributes, that the Creator may be known from the beauty of His creation, that the passions of men, as, e. g. grief, jealousy, &c., may be attributed to God, though figuratively, but that He knows no succession of times. It discourses also upon the world, the origin of evil: "Malum a Deo non est creatum sed inventum: et ideo nihil est malum, quia sine Deo factum est nihil: Deus autem malum non fecit," of angels, of man, of the soul, and senses of the flesh, of Christ and the Holy Spirit, of the church and heresies, of the heathen nations, of the law, of seven rules or principles for the understanding of Scripture, of the difference between the two testaments, of symbol and prayer, of baptism and communion, of martyrdom, of the miracles wrought by the saints, of Antichrist and his works, of the resurrection and judgment, of hell, of the punishment of the wicked, and of the glory of the just. Great use has been made throughout of the works of Augustine and Gregory. The second book consists of 44 chapters, and treats of wisdom, of faith, of charity, of hope, of fear, of conversion and the converted, of the examples of saints, of compunction of heart, of penitence and confession, of despair and those who are forsaken of God. The third book consists of 62 chapters, and treats partly of ecclesiastical life and of the ecclesiastical orders, of the judgments of God, of God's twofold chastisement, John xv. 2, of infirmity of the flesh, of patience under divine chastisement, of the temptations of the devil and particularly in dreams, of prayer, reading, and study, of learning without grace, of contemplation and action, of despising the world, of the saints who separate themselves from the world, of the higher precepts of monks, their humility and work, of their laxity and care for the things of the world.

11. De ecclesiasticis officiis.—Two books. The first book treats de origine officiorum, and is addressed "Domino meo et Dei servo Fulgentio episcopo," his elder brother, the bishop of Astigi, who had asked of him an account of the origin and the authors of the ecclesiastical offices, that is to say, of the old Spanish liturgy. "As you wished, I have here put this book together for you from the most ancient authorities [which, according to Isidore's manner, are freely used but not otherwise named], wherein I have for the most part exercised my own liberty, but have added many things found elsewhere. If these latter do not please, the blame will not be mine."

The first book contains forty-five chapters, and treats of the services of the church. Concerning the use of Jerome's translation, he says—"Cujus editione generaliter omnes ecclesie usquequaque utuntur, pro eo quod veraciter sit in sententiis et clarior in verbis." He treats also of praises, offertories, the mass, and prayers, the Nicene creed, benedictions, sacrifice. Here occurs the important passage: "Hoc enim in mysterio tunc factum est, quod primum discipuli corpus et sanguinem Domini non acceperunt jejuni. Ab universa autem ecclesia nunc a jejuniis semper accipitur. Sic enim placuit Spiritui sancto per apostolos ut in honorem tanti sacramenti in os christiani prius Dominicum corpus intraret, quam ceteri cibi, et ideo per universum orbem mos iste servatur. Panis enim, quem frangimus, corpus Christi est, qui dixit: Ego sum panis vivus, qui de coelo descendi. Vinum autem sanguis ejus est, et hoc est quod scriptum est: Ego sum vitis vera; sed panis, quia corpus confirmat, ideo corpus Christi nuncupatur, vinum autem, quia sanguinem operatur in carne, ideo ad sanguinem Christi refertur. Haec autem dum sunt visibilia, sanctificata tamen per Spiritum sanctum in sacramentum divini corporis transeunt." Then he goes on to quote at length the sixty-third epistle of St. Cyprian.

The second book treats of clerics, their rules and orders, of the tonsure, of the episcopal office, of vicars episcopal, of presbyters, of deacons, sacristans, and subdeacons, of readers, psalmists, exorcists, acolytes, porters, monks, penitents, virgins, widows, the married, catechumens, exorcism, salt, candidates for baptism, the creed, the rule of faith, baptism, chrism, imposition of hands, and confirmation.

12. Synonyma de lamentatione animae peccatricis.—This also is in two books, and is one of the most curious of Isidore's works. The term synonyma is oddly chosen, and is calculated to mislead, as though it denoted a grammatical treatise of some kind, the fact being that it seems to be used to express the similarity of the ideas which are continually recurring but are couched in slightly different language. The book is a kind of soliloquy between Homo and Ratio. Homo begins by lamenting his lost and desperate condition in consequence of sin, and Ratio, undertakes to direct him aright to lead him to a higher and holier condition issuing in the bliss of eternal felicity. The first book dwells generally on man's deplorable condition, which is depicted in somewhat feeble and turgid language. The second book drops the dialogue form, and Ratio expatiates on fornication, on chastity, on various vices and the opposite virtues.

13. Regula Monachorum.—It is this treatise which has led some to suppose that Isidore was himself a Benedictine monk, the only order then established in the West; but Gams has determined that there is not sufficient proof of it. The work is in twenty-four chapters, and treats of the situation of the monastery, the election of an abbat, the various duties of the monks, their mode of life, their dress, discipline, and the like.

14. Thirteen short letters follow; to bishop Leudefred of Cordova, to Braulio, to whom he speaks of giving a ring and a pall, to Helladius of Toledo, on the fall of a certain bishop of Cordova, to the duke Claudius, whom he congratulates on his victories, to Massona bishop of Merida, and to the archdeacon Redemptus.

15. De Ordine Creaturarum.—This book has been doubted by some, and, though it is maintained by Arevalo to be genuine, he prints it in smaller type. Gams reckons it among the works of Isidore. It is written in fifteen chapters, and treats of the faith in the Trinity, of the spiritual creation of the waters which are above the firmament, of the firmament of heaven, of the sun and moon, "De spatio superiori et paradiso coeli, de spatio inferiori et hemisphaeriis diversis," of the devil and the nature of demons, of the nature of waters and the course of the ocean, of Paradise, of the nature of man after sin, of the diversity of sinners and their place of punishment, of purgatorial fire and the future life.

16. De Natura Rerum liber.—This is one of the most celebrated of Isidore's treatises. It is dedicated to king Sisebut, "Domino et filio [carissimo]," who came to the throne A.D. 612, and reigned eight years and a half. He was one of the best of the kings of Spain, and his death was universally lamented by the Goths. Isidore calls him "Christianissimus," and speaks of him as excelling in intellect and eloquence. He had been requested by him to write on the subject of his treatise, and he had studiously availed himself of all that the ancients, and more particularly those of the Catholic church, had written thereon. He follows them in turn, and sometimes verbally, in order to be sustained by their authority. There are forty-eight chapters, in which he discourses of the days, the night, the week, the months, the seasons, the solstice and the equinox, the world, the five zones of the world, the parts of the world, of heaven and its name, of the planets, of the waters, of the heavens, of the nature of the sun, of the size and course of the sun, of the light of the moon, of the course of the moon, of the eclipse of the sun and moon, of the course of the stars, of the position of the seven planets, of the light of the stars, of falling stars, of the names of the stars and whether they have any soul, of the night, the thunder, the lightning, of the rainbow, the clouds, the showers, the snow, the hail, the nature of the winds and their names, of the signs of storms, of pestilence, of the heat of the ocean, why the sea does not get larger, why it is salt, of the river Nile, of the names of the sea and the rivers, of the position and motion of the earth, of the mount Etna, and of the parts of the earth. He makes use of diagrams in this treatise to illustrate his meaning. For a full analysis of the sources of this book see Gustavus Bekker's new edition, Berlin, 1857.

17. Chronicon.—This is a very brief summary of the principal events from the creation of the world to the reign of the emperor Heraclius and that of king Sisebut. The history of the world is divided into six ages, the fifth reaching to Augustus, and the sixth to the fifth year of Heraclius and the fourth of Sisebut. Isidore says that others had written similar chronicles, as Julius Africanus under Marcus Aurelius, Eusebius of Caesarea, and Jerome, and many others: among them is specially mentioned "Victor Tununensis ecclesie episcopus," who carried down his chronicle to the consulate of the younger Justin. Hertzberg gives an elaborate analysis of the sources of Isidore's two chronicles in the Forschungen zur deutschen Gesch. xv. 289.

18. Historia de regibus Gothorum, Wandalorum et Suevorum. The Goths, according to Isidore, perhaps in this conjecture more accurate than sometimes, are descended from Gog and Magog, and are of the same race as the Getae. They first appeared in Thessaly in the time of Pompey, and under Valerian they devastated Macedonia, Greece, Pontus, Asia, and Illyricum. The history is brought down to 621, the reign of king Swintila. Notwithstanding his own origin and connection with Rome, he is strongly in praise of the Goths; and Spaniards of his time esteemed it an honour to be reckoned Goths. This brief sketch of Gothic history is invaluable, inasmuch as it is our chief authority for the history of the West Goths. With regard to the Vandals we learn from him less, and his sketch of the Suevi is very brief, the former compressing the history of 123 years into a single page, and the latter that of 177. The Vandals entered Spain under Gunderic, and were destroyed on the fall of Gelimer, and the Suevi entered under Hermeric in 409, and became incorporated with the Gothic nation in 585. Some further remarks on this work will be found at the end of the article.

19. De Viris illustribus liber.—Many of the Greeks and Latins had treated of the Christian writers before Isidore, but he determined to give a brief outline of those whom he remembered to have read himself. The list embraces forty-six names, and Braulio has added that of Isidore himself in the celebrated "Prænotatio librorum S. Isidori a Braulione edita." Among those of whom a short account is here given are Xystus the pope, Macrobius the deacon, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Hosius of Cordova, Eusebius of Dorilaëum, Chrysostom, Hilary of Arles, Gregory the pope, Leander his own brother, and Maximus of Saragossa. This is a valuable summary of important facts in ecclesiastical history. It is too often disfigured by the fierce and illiberal polemical spirit of the day—see, for instance, the writer's remarks on the death of Hosius of Cordova.

Other minor works are assigned to Isidore, which it is unnecessary to enumerate. His right to some of them is doubtful.

Isidore's Latin was past its purity. He uses many Spanish words, which are therefore full of interest, and Arevalo has collected no fewer than 1640 words which would not be understood by the ordinary reader, or would strike him as strange. His style is feeble and inflated, having all the marks of an age of decadence. He was a voluminous writer of great learning, well versed in Holy Scripture, of which he manifests a remarkable knowledge; he had also a trained and cultivated mind; but he appears rather as a receptive and reproductive writer than as one of strong masculine and original mind. He is a very conspicuous ornament of the Spanish church, and sheds great glory on the age he adorned. He did much to hand on the light of Christianity, to hold it up and make it effectual to the amelioration of a semi-barbarous nation, and his character contrasts favourably with those of a later period. We must not exact of him more than was to be expected; the marvel is that in the commencement of the 7th century an author should have arisen in the Gothic church of Spain so great and wise and good as Isidore.

A full list of the Lives of Isidore up to the present time may be seen in Chevalier's Sources Historiques du Moyen-âge, p. 1127. The following may be specified: those of Henschen in Boll. Acta SS. 4 Apr. i. 327; Arevalo in his edition of Isidore's Works; Florez, Esp. Sag. ix. 173 ed. 1752; Dupin, Ecol. Writ. t. ii. p. 1 ed. 1724; Ceillier, xi. 710; Cave, i. 547; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 3 vols. 8vo. Regensburg, 1862-74; the great want of this excellent work is an adequate index; the first volume alone has a "Register." Dahn, Könige der Germanen; Fabricius, Bibliotheca Latina; Nicol, Antonio, Bibliotheca Hisp. Vet., ed. Bayer, Matr. 1788, 4 vols. fol.; Bourret, L'École Chrétienne de Seville, Paris, 1855; Montalembert, The Monks of the West, 1860; Bähr, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, 1837; W. S. Teuffel, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, Leipzig, 1870.

The following editions of Isidore's works may be mentioned: Opera Omnia, ed. Brel and Grial, fol., Paris, 1601, Cologne, 1617; Opera Omnia, ed. Grial with notes by Gomez, 2 tom. fol., Matriti, 1778; Arevalo, Sancti Isidori Hispal. Episc. Opera Omnia, 7 vols. 4to, Romæ, 1797-1803. This is the best and standard edition. The first two volumes contain, under the title of "Isidoriana," a collection of all that is known of his life, and of the editions of his writings; vols. iii. and iv. contain the Etymologies; vol. v., the Differentiæ, De Ortu et Obitu Patrum, Proœmia, Liber Numerorum, and the Questiones; vol. vi., the De Fide, Sententiæ, De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, Synonyma, Regula Monachorum, Epistolæ, De Ordine Creaturarum; vol. vii., the De Natura Rerum, Chronicon, Historia of De Regibus Gothorum, &c., De Viris Illustribus. Arevalo's edition has been reprinted by the Abbé Migne in his Patrologia Latina, lxxxi.-lxxxiv., with the addition of an eighth volume, containing the Collectio Canonum ascribed to Isidore; vols. lxxxv.-lxxxvi. of Migne contain Liturgia Mozarabica secundum Regulam Beati Isidori. There is an excellent edition of the De Natura Rerum Liber by G. Becker, Berlin, 1857. Professor J. E. B. Mayor, of Cambridge, has given a list of editions and authorities in his Bibliographical Clue to Latin Literature, p. 212. [S. L.]

De Reg. Gothorum, Wandalorum, et Suevorum.—The histories, of all Isidore's works, have the most practical value for us at the present day. The Historia Gothorum is still to us, as it was to Mariana, one of the main sources of Gothic history. Upon the histories in general was based all the later mediæval history-writing of Spain, and in the world-wide reputation of their author, the works and merits of his historical predecessors and authorities, of Idatius or Joannes Biclarenensis were for centuries forgotten. Of the two forms of the histories there have been altogether fifteen editions since the 16th century, and a critical edition has still to be made. Of late years, however, a most valuable contribution has been made to our knowledge of the exact place of the histories in historical work by Dr. Hugo Hertzberg, in an inaugural dissertation published at Göttingen in 1874 under the title, Die Historien und Die Chroniken des Isidorus von Sevilla: Eine Quellenuntersuchung, Erster Th., die Historien. In this essay Dr. Hertzberg has so far superseded the work of previous editions, of Florez or Rösler or even of Arevalo, that it is only necessary for us here to sum up his results, from which any future edition of the histories must take its departure.

Dr. Hertzberg's great merit lies in the clearness with which he succeeds in shewing us exactly how Isidore worked, what was the kind and amount of his material on the one hand, and the method employed in working it up on the other. His points are:

(1) That the histories have come down to us in two forms—a shorter and a longer—which he names respectively text A and text B. This fact, though it was apparent before Hertzberg to Rösler and Arevalo, was misunderstood, and no one before him had attempted a close comparative examination of the texts, or the division of MSS. and editions into two groups, according to the text each represents.

(2) That text A is the earlier form and B the later, whereas up to 1874 A had been universally regarded as a mere excerpt from and epitome of B. That this cannot be the case Hertzberg proves abundantly from an examination of the many independent statements in A, and of the passages where A uses the sources more fully and exactly than B, and where even B can be proved to have used A's version of the authorities and not the authorities themselves.

(3) That text A was concluded probably about 621, the year of the death of Sisebut, and that five years later Isidore (reversing the process which had produced his two Welt-Chroniken) undertook a new redaction, adding moralising and theological remarks and explanations, especially Bible quotations and references, and inserting besides fresh historical statements, all of which, however, are of a more or less doubtful and legendary character. His intention evidently was to give a more popular and didactic character to his work; to make it, in fact, more readable. And it may be noticed that the tone of B towards Arianism is far more passionate than that of A.

(4) That the Elogium Hispaniæ commonly prefixed to the histories is, in all probability, not Isidore's work.

(5) That the Recapitulatio in laudem Gothorum, with which the H. Goth. concludes, has also a doubtful connexion with the histories, though whether by Isidore or no, it is probably of the reign of Sisebut. This point is less clearly made out, and to our mind it remains most probable that the Recapitulatio is one of the B additions. The interesting mention in it of maritime successes under Sisebut, which Dr. Hertzberg is unable to explain, surely is only a magniloquent reference to the recovery of the maritime towns of Carthaginensis from the Imperialists, which took place under this king (Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 178).

Isidore's sources in the Histories.—He nowhere expressly names his authorities as in his Chronicle, but Dr. Hertzberg has tabulated them with a laborious exactitude beyond praise. They are: (1) for Spanish events IDATIUS (q. v.), used specially in the sections from Thorismund to Euric in the H. Goth., in the H. Vand. up to the death of Genserik, and in Hist. Suv. up to the conversion of the Suevi to Arianism under Remismund (462); (2) for African events Victor Tununensis, used in the H. Vand. from the death of Genserik to the end; (3) the Chronicle of Jerome and the Libri Septem adversus Paganos of Orosius, the use of both which sources is evident in the opening sections of the H. Goth. and H. Vand.; (4) Prosper's chronicle in a few passages (Diss. p. 49); (5) Isidore's contemporary, JOH. BICLARENSIS (q. v.), who is used freely, with little verbal copying, in the reigns of Leovigild and Reccared; (6) the Historia Tripartita of Cassiodorus (or rather of the Scholasticus Epiphanius) in two passages; (7) Eutropius in one; (8) the lost chronicle of Maximus of Saragossa.

With regard to Isidore's use of Maximus we shall have more to say under the head MAXIMUS OF SARAGOSSA. It may be noticed that the often-quoted passage in Isid. (text A), where, after his description of the sack of Rome by Alaric, he praises the mildness of the Goths, "so that at the present day the Romans living in the kingdom of the Goths love their rule so greatly that they hold it better to live with the Goths in poverty, than to be great under the Romans, and to bear the heavy weight of the taxes" is imitated from Orosius (vii. 41) "ut inveniantur jam inter eos (Gothos) quidam Romani, qui malint inter barbaros pauperem libertatem quam inter Romanos tributariam sollicitudinem sustinere." The Isidorian version of this panegyric was not included in the later B text.

Dr. Hertzberg's general conclusions are, that Isidore neither possessed large material, nor did he use what he had well. In no case did he take all that earlier chronicles had to offer him, but only extracts from them. So that there is no completeness of compilation, while the choice and arrangement of statements is often bad, and the proper chronological order frequently disregarded. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, however, the permanent historical value of the Historia Gothorum is in certain portions of it very great. From the reign of Euric, where Idatius breaks off, Isidore becomes for a time our only informant. He alone preserves the memory of Euric's legislation, while our knowledge of Visigothic history under Gesalic, Theudis, Theudigisel, Agila, and Athanagild rests essentially on Isidore's testimony. In the prominent reigns of Leovigild and Reccared Joh. Biclarenis becomes our great source, but Isidore's additions to him are not unimportant. From Reccared to Suintila he is again our best and sometimes our only source. The Hist. Vand., on the contrary, is historically valueless, as we possess the sources from which it is a mere extract, and the same may almost be said of the Hist. Suv. Just where Isidore might have drawn most from oral testimony and thus supplied a real gap in our historical knowledge, viz. in the hundred years of Suevian history between Remismund and Theodemir, he fails us most notably. The whole missing century of history is despatched in one vague sentence which tells us nothing.

For a complete catalogue of the nine MSS. of B, and the two MSS. of A existing, as well as of the editions of both texts, see Dr. Hertzberg's Diss. 8-18. He has also affixed to his essay a complete analysis of both texts according to the sources.

(For general references see Potthast, Bibl. Hist. Med. Aeci. The B text of the histories is printed in Esp. Sagrada, vi. with an introduction and long notes by Florez.) [M. A. W.]

ISIDORUS (14), bishop of Astorga before the year 675, in which was held the third council of Braga. He subscribed the acts of the council as fifth among eight bishops (Mansi, xi. 159). The only other mention of him occurs in a strange and probably interpolated passage in the works of the contemporary Gallician saint and biographer of St. Fructuosus, Valerius abbat of San Pedro de Monber. (Conf. Esp. Sagr. xvi. 399, 115; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 262.) [M. A. W.]

ISIDORUS (15), bishop of Abydos on the Hellespont, at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 653; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 773.) [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (16), bishop of Rhodes, present at the same. (Mansi, xi. 644; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 925.) [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (17) I., bishop of Saetabis (Xativa), at the 12th council of Toledo (681), where he subscribed fifteenth among thirty-five. (Mansi, xi. 1039; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270; Esp. Sagr. viii. 48.) [MULTUS.] [M. A. W.]

ISIDORUS (18) II., bishop of Saetabis from about 687 until after A.D. 693. He subscribed the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo (688, 693) under Egica. (Mansi, xii. 21, 84; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. viii. 49.) [MULTUS.] [M. A. W.]

ISIDORUS (19), bishop of Gordo-servorum (Juliopolis) in Bithynia, present at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692 (Mansi, xi. 996). Le Quien (Oriens Christ. i. 659) suggests an emendation of the text of the subscriptions, which would make Isidorus also present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (20), bishop of Anazarbus, was present at the Trullan or Quinisext synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 993; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 883.) [J. de S.]

ISIDORUS (21), bishop of Edessa (Aegae) in central Macedonia, present at the same. (Mansi, xi. 993; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 79.) [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (22) II., bishop of Samos, present at the same. (Mansi, xi. 1005; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 930.) [ISIDORUS (12).] [L. D.]

ISIDORUS (23) PACENSIS, bishop of Beja: the name given to the author of the contemporary Chronicle (first printed by Sandoval bishop of Pampeluna in 1615), which, commencing in 611, extends beyond the date of the fall of the Gothic monarchy, and terminates in 754. After examining the vexed question of authorship, we shall endeavour to shew, by a brief sketch of the contents of the Chronicle in question, how far it may be held to supply any biographical information. Lastly, we shall consider the claim of its composer, whoever he was, to certain other writings which have been attributed to him.

I. In a notice prefixed to a MS., now lost, which once existed in the monastery of Oviedo, by Pelayo, bishop of that see, about A.D. 1100, mention is made of "junior Isidorus Pacensis ecclesiae episcopus," as the author of one of the Chronicles contained in the volume. But the Chronicle so described is really the work of Isidore of Seville. Sandoval, the original editor of the Chronicle now in question, appears to have been the first to assign its authorship to the Isidorus Pacensis named by Pelayo. Following him, Juan Vaseo, a Spanish scholar who flourished about the middle of the 17th century, testified (Florez, Esp. Sagr. viii. 270) that he had seen a MS. of this Chronicle, which bore the name of Isidorus Pacensis as its author. The same thing was asserted by Nicolas Antonio (Bibliotheca Vetus) of two other ancient MSS. of the Chronicle, one at Alcalá, the other at Osma; but according to Florez (loc. cit.), neither of these MSS. contains any indication of authorship. Florez, however, considering that the statement of Pelayo, though mistaken, proved that there was such a person as "Isidorus Pacensis," and that he wrote Chronicles, and joining his testimony to that of Vaseo, was disposed to acquiesce in the general traditional opinion of Spanish scholars, and assume that one Isidore, otherwise unknown, bishop of Pax Julia, now Beja, in the Portuguese province of Alemtejo, near the Spanish frontier, composed the work under discussion. (An opinion once held, that Pacensis refers to Badajoz, not to Beja, has been long since so completely exploded that it need not be further alluded to.) On the other hand, Professor Dozy (Recherches sur l'hist. et la litt. de l'Espagne, 1860) considers that there is no solid ground for attributing the Chronicle to Isidorus Pacensis, or even for supposing that such a person ever existed. The scribe who wrote the prefatory notice to the MS. of Oviedo, — Pelayo, according to Dozy, — was thinking of the works of Isidore of Seville contained in it, and meant to write "Hispalensis;" but through the omission of the first syllable, and the change of l into c, the word came out "Pacensis." And in point of fact this MS., if we may trust to the copy of it made in the 16th century as correctly representing its contents (for the volume itself has disappeared), did not contain this particular Chronicle. Again, if the author of the Chronicle had been a bishop or a native of Beja, some notice of Beja would probably have been found in it, especially as the people of this town made a memorable rising against the Mussulman governor of Spain in his own day; but Beja is not once mentioned from the beginning to the end. Cordova, on the contrary, is frequently mentioned, and in such a manner (so at least thinks Prof. Dozy) as to suggest that the writer was living there at the time when he wrote. Thus he says (§ 76) that in a particular year three suns were seen in the heavens, "cunctis Cordubae civibus prospicientibus." Yet a third view as to the authorship is hazarded by Gams, the learned Benedictine historian of the Spanish church (Kirchengesch. v. Span. ii. 347). Gams thinks, (1) that the author of the present Chronicle was not a Spaniard, but an Oriental, a Nestorian Christian who came to Spain with an Arab army about 740. Not only does he know, according to this view, more about Moorish and Mahometan affairs than a Spaniard could have been in a position to know, but there is one passage (§ 70) where the writer speaks of having composed an "epitome" on the wars of the Moors against "Cultum," i.e. Kolphoum, the Arab general employed (Dozy, Mus. d'Espagne, i. 244) to put down the Berber revolt of 723, which, in Gams's opinion, points decisively to the hand of an Oriental. (2) This Nestorian writer is identified by Gams with a certain Melito, who appears in one or two MSS. as the editor and reviser (though more in the way of curtailment than addition) of St. Isidore's Chronicle, which terminates in the fifth year of Heraclius (A.D. 614); and whom he believes to be the same person with Milita, a literary supporter of the heresiarch Elipandus, in 799.

Such being the different views taken as to the authorship of the Chronicle, all that we need say is that it is a question which must ultimately be decided by Spanish scholars, who alone have all the materials for an exhaustive judgment in their hands. It is obvious, however, that Dozy's supposition that "Hispalensis" was in some way changed into "Pacensis" does not cover all the facts, because it leaves the occurrence of the word "junior" unexplained. It may further be remarked that the frequent mention of Cordova need not count for much; it was the seat of Moorish government at the time; from it expeditions were sent forth, and to it they returned; the frequent occurrence of the name need not therefore imply that the writer of the Chronicle resided there, any more than the repeated mention of "Westminster" in the contemporary part of Henry of Huntingdon would warrant a similar inference in his case. As to the "three suns" which were seen by the citizens, if some strange optical phenomenon which admitted of being so described was witnessed at Cordova, there can be no difficulty in supposing that the rumour of it would reach to Beja, or even farther. With regard to the view of Gams, an obvious objection to it is, that the thirty-seventh section (noticed below), if there be no reason to think it interpolated, is written with a passionate intensity, which, while perfectly natural in a Spaniard writing of the downfall of his country, could not well have characterized the work of a Nestorian Christian, to whom the glories of Gothic Spain must have been of little moment. Even if the theory of Nestorian authorship were granted, the identification of the author with Melito, and still more with Milita, would remain extremely problematical. The actual contents of that variety of the Isidorian Chronicle which bears the name of Melito, do not correspond to the description of any one of the three historical works which the author of the Chronicon Pacense claims to have composed. So shadowy a personage is Melito, that Florez, no mean authority, doubts whether he ever existed. Lastly, beyond the very slight resemblance in the names, no reason is adduced by Gams for identifying Milita, the friend of Elipandus, with the chronicler Melito; and although it be conceded to him, that the author of the present Chronicle, which he closed at 754, might have lived on to 799, the year in which Milita helped Elipandus, it is evident that the probability of his having died shortly after the earlier date is enormously greater.

II. The Chronicon Pacense, divided into eighty sections, commences nearly where the Chronicle of St. Isidore ends, that is, at the beginning of the reign of Heraclius, A.D. 611. The writer shews an acquaintance with the successions of the Eastern emperors and the Gothic kings of Spain, as well as of the Mohammedan caliphs. He enters into many details respecting the numerous councils held at Toledo in the course of the 7th century, and speaks of the Roman see (§§ 8, 26) in a tone of respect which it is difficult to conceive a Nestorian either feeling or expressing. The style is barbarous, but, as a rule, equable; when, however, the reduction of Spain under the yoke of Islam has to be narrated, it rises, just as might be expected if the writer were a native, into a strain of rude eloquence, thrilled by grief and passion, which is extremely touching. "Who could relate," he says, "all these perils; who could count up these grievous calamities? If all one's members were turned into tongues, human nature would still be unable to describe the ruins of Spain, or her many and terrible woes. To sum up for the reader all these scourges in a few words—passing over innumerable destructions which, from Adam to the present day, in numberless countries and cities, a foul and cruel enemy has inflicted upon the world—whatever history tells us was endured by captive Troy, whatever Jerusalem suffered according to the warnings of the prophets; whatever Babylon had to bear; finally all the martyrdom of misery which fell on Rome, once made glorious by the preaching of Apostles—all these evils, however many they be, Spain, once the land of delights but now made wretched, full of honour and full of shame, has experienced in herself." In three different places (§§ 65, 70, 78) the writer mentions other works of his composition. In the first he excuses himself from relating at length the civil wars which raged among the Arabs in Spain about 742, because he has told the story elsewhere, "patenter et paginaliter manent nostro stylo conscripta." In the second he refers to the "epitome" on the war against Kolthoum already noticed. The third passage probably refers to the work which he had already spoken of in § 65; he now calls it "liber verborum dierum saeculi." The Chronicle is written, according to Dozy, in "rhymed prose," and unquestionably rhyming passages may be traced here and there, especially in the earlier portion; but over the greater portion of the work the attempt at rhyme, if it was really made, has failed so signally that the product is indistinguishable from ordinary prose. But if the description "rhymed prose" were truly applicable to the whole work, eminent critics are not agreed as to the inference to be drawn from the fact. Dozy says that this kind of composition was then in fashion throughout Spain; Gams declares, on the contrary, that it was unknown to the Spaniards, but was in use among the Orientals. The text is in a bad state, marginal glosses having evidently crept into it in various places, and lacunae being not uncommon; yet on the whole it is more readable than Dozy's report would lead one to suppose.

The last question for consideration refers to the proposal to ascribe to the writer of the Chronicon Pacense the authorship of other extant treatises. Gams, as we have seen, is disposed to assign to him the Chronicle of Melito; this point we have already discussed. He also would identify him with the author of the continuation of Joannes Biclarenensis (printed in Florez, vol. vi.), which extends from 600 to 723. There are several objections to this view. (1) The continuator is very brief, whereas Pacensis seems to speak of his other works, except perhaps the "epitome," as more detailed than the Chronicle which we possess, this last being itself more detailed than the continuation of Biclarensis; (2) the very words of Pacensis do indeed often occur in the continuator, but this is more simply explained by supposing that they were borrowed, than that the same person wrote both treatises; (3) out of eleven pages which the continuation occupies in Florez, only three refer to transactions later than the Moorish invasion, whereas the lost works of Pacensis seem to have dealt solely with such transactions. ISIDORUS (24), son of Basilides. [BASILIDES, Vol. I. p. 278.]

ISIDORUS (25), early Christian writer. [HERONYMUS (1).]

ISIDORUS (26), Dec. 14 (Us.), Feb. 5 and Dec. 14 (Mart. Rom.). Martyr by fire at Alexandria in the Decian persecution, with Hero and Ater. (Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. cap. 41.) The Basilian Menology furnishes a number of details upon the martyrdom of Isidorus, which are plainly apocryphal. [G. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (27), May 14 (Bas. Men.), 15 (Us.). A soldier and martyr in the island of Chios, 251 (Mart. Ad., Us.; Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. iii. 449). He was a native of Alexandria, and went to Chios in the fleet commanded by Numerius, before whom he was accused by the centurion Julius of being a Christian. In his examination he professed his belief in Christ as the creator of heaven, earth, and sea, and as miraculously incarnate of the Virgin Mary for human redemption (Bas. Men.). [G. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (28), Alexandrian monk and priest. Born cir. 318, he became early in life an ascetic on the Nitrian mount, and distributed his possessions, which were large, to the poor. He had seen St. Antony. In 341 he accompanied Athanasius, by whom he was ordained, to Rome. During the persecutions under Valens, in 373, he was torn from his solitude and transported to an island. Afterwards we find him at Alexandria, as governor of the great hospital. In 388, when the contest between Theodosius and Maximus was impending, Isidorus was despatched by Theophilus of Alexandria to Rome with alternative letters, which were to be presented to whichever combatant should prove the victor. But the lector who accompanied him having stolen the letters, he retired hastily from Rome. His conduct on this occasion, however, satisfied Theophilus, since to it is afterwards attributed that anxiety on his part to raise Isidorus to the see of Constantinople, which was disappointed by the nomination of St. Chrysostom. We next find him deputed by Theophilus to examine the condition of things in Palestine, where, by taking the side of John of Jerusalem, he brought on himself the strong censure of Jerome, accompanied by accusations of Origenism. Palladius describes a visit which he paid to Isidorus in Alexandria, and the asceticism which the latter exercised without the slightest display or moroseness of manners. He paid still another visit to Rome with Acacius of Beroea, being sent by Theophilus at the instance of Chrysostom to reconcile pope Damasus with Flavianus of Antioch. At fourscore years of age he became an object of hatred and persecution to Theophilus for espousing the cause of Peter, when accused by Theophilus of admitting a Manichean to communion, and for applying to the relief of the poor a sum which a lady had given him for that special purpose, instead of giving it to the bishop for his buildings. Theophilus brought a hateful charge against him, excommunicated him, and forced him to flee first to his old home at Nitria, and then to Chrysostom at Constantinople, where he was admitted to communion of the prayers, but not to the Eucharist. He died in 403, aged 85. (Palladius, Hist. Lausiac. capp. 1, 2, and Dial. de Vit. Chrys. pp. 20-23; Socrat. vi.; Soz. viii. 2, 11 sq.; Theod. iv. 21; S. Hier. ed. Vall. ii. 447; Baron. a. a. 388, 68, and a. a. 397, 3.) [R. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (29), FLAVIUS ANTHEMIUS, a civil officer of high rank in the East, under the emperor Theodosius II. His official life may be traced in the Cod. Theodos. At the dates Sep. 4, 410, and Oct. 29, 412, he was prefect of Constantinople (VIII. xvii. 2, 3; XV. i. 50). At Nov. 11, 416, he was prefect of the East, according to the Cod. Justin. (I. xix. 6), or according to some MSS. of this text still prefect of the city. In 424 two edicts were addressed to him (Apr. 22, Oct. 10) as prefect of Illyricum, the second granting exceptional privileges to the church of Thessalonica (Cod. Th. XV. iv. 4; XI. i. 38). In Nov. 426, as prefect of Illyricum, he was enjoined to suppress heathenism throughout his jurisdiction by destroying all remaining pagan "fana, templa, et delubra," and "expiating" the spots by setting up the cross on them, death being the penalty of all who should resist. On Aug. 3, 435, an edict was issued to him as prefect of the East, enacting that the Nestorians should thenceforth bear the name of Simonians, that their meetings should be suppressed, and that the writings of Nestorius should be burnt (XVI. v. 66). The prefect addressed a constitution to his officers commanding them to see the edict executed (Mansi. v. 414). In the same year an edict addressed to Isidore denounced exile against Irenaeus bishop of Tyre, and Photius a presbyter of Constantinople, as determined partisans of Nestorius (Synod. Adv. Trag. Iren. cap. 188, in Mansi. v. 960). In 463, on Ap. 3, June 4, July 14, Aug. 4, Isidore was still prefect of the East (Cod. Th. VIII. iv. 30; XI. v. 3, xxviii. 17; XII. i. 189-192; XIV. xvi. 2, xvii. 2). He is mentioned in the forty-second and forty-seventh letters of Theodoret, as having approved the report of commissioners sent at Theodoret's request to examine into the taxation of his episcopal city. (Baluze, Nova Collect. Concil. 583, 585, 731, 883; Baron. ad. ann. 435, Pagi. n. ii.; Theod. Epist. 42, 47.) He was also a correspondent of Isidore of Pelusium [ISIDORUS (31)] (Isid. Pelus. lib. i. ep. 299). [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (30), a deacon of Alexandria, who is said by the layman Sophronius to have cruelly treated him by order of the patriarch Dioscorus. (Mansi. vi. 1031 c.) [DIOSCORUS (1), Vol. I. p. 855 a.] [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (31) PELUSIOTA, an eminent ascetic, theologian, and guide of souls in the 5th century, was born at Alexandria (Photius, Bibl. 228). His family was probably of high rank. From the wide range of his reading, as shewn by his familiarity with Greek poets, historians, orators, and philosophers, we may infer that he received the best education which the Alexandrian school could bestow. But he also felt the full influence of that great development of Egyptian monasticism which was consecrated, in the minds of the orthodox of that time, by the mysterious seclusion of Athanasius during his third exile, and by the persecution of the "holy solitaries" after his death, and which, as described by an African Christian of high official standing thirteen years later, made so deep an impression on the as yet unconverted Augustine (Confess. viii. 6; cp. Isid. Epist. i. 173, alluding to "the blessed Ammon"). Isidore resolved to adopt the monastic life in its coenobitic form, as it had been organised by Pachomius at Tabenna, and was being exhibited by various communities in the Upper Thebaid which followed his rule, by others in the Lower Thebaid, and the 5000 inmates of the cells of Nitria (cp. Fleury, b. xx. c. 9). But the place which he selected was in the neighbourhood of Pelusium, an ancient border town at one of the Nile-mouths, supposed to derive its name from the fact that it was the last place in Egypt occupied by the "Hyksos," regarded as "Philistines" (Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii. 24, 207). Jerome says of it that it had "a very safe harbour," and was a centre of all "business connected with the sea" (Comm. in Ezech. ix. 30), although, for whatever reason, its inhabitants were proverbial for dullness (Jerome, Ep. lxxxiv. 9). It was the capital of the province of Augustamnica Prima, and was as such the seat of a "corrector" or governor. One of these functionaries, on his arrival, was recommended by Isidore to the confidence and respect of the decurions (Epist. i. 226). When Isidore first knew the place, it was, he tells us, "rich and populous" (Epist. iii. 260). It suffered much from the maladministration of a Cappadocian named Gigantius; and from a letter of Isidore to Rufinus, the praetorian prefect, entreating that this man might be "set over none but Cappadocians" (Ep. i. 489; cp. 484) we infer that the writer must have been, as Tillemont expresses it (xv. 98), "already a considerable person in A.D. 395," for Rufinus was slain towards the close of that year. At this time, it may be observed, Ambrose was still living and working at Milan. Augustine was in the last year of his presbyterate, for he was consecrated in December 395; Jerome had plunged into the Origenistic controversy; Chrysostom, at Antioch, was making use of a movement of external religiousness under pressure of public dangers (Tillemont, xi. 101); Arcadius and Honorius were beginning their "slumbers" on the two thrones of the newly divided empire. Isidore was not a person to do things by halves. Believing that monastic life was the "imitation and receptacle of all the Lord's precepts" (Ep. i. 278), he became a thorough monk in all that pertained to ascetic self-devotion. When a friend sent him a cloak (or "melotes"), he sent back a tunic (or "colobium") in return (Ep. i. 216). Evagrius says of him that, "to use a poetic phrase, his fame was wide," that "he so macerated his body by labours, and so fattened his soul by 'anagogic' doctrines [i.e. by the mystical interpretation of Scripture], that he led an angelic life on earth, and was through life a living pillar both of monastic life and of divine contemplation" (Hist. i. 15). Whether he became abbat of the monastery, Tillemont considers to be uncertain (xv. 101); the authoritative style of his letters to the monks is not decisive, considering his uniform style of correspondence; in one letter (Ep. i. 150) he writes as if he were not abbat, but it is probable that he became so. We know from Facundus (Def. Tri. Capit. ii. 4), and, indeed, virtually from himself (Ep. i. 258), that he was ordained a presbyter, very likely by the good bishop Ammonius (Ep. ii. 127), clearly not by his successor, Eusebius, whom Isidore depicts as the centre of a scene of ecclesiastical scandal which was to him a standing grief and offence. [EUSEBIUS (71).]

It may be hoped that the inevitable sense of this ecclesiastical degeneracy near his own home led Isidore to generalise somewhat too despondingly as to its prevalence all around. Alluding to Eusebius's love of church-building, he speaks out: "It was not for the sake of walls, but of souls, that the King of heaven came to visit us." "Could I have chosen, I would have rather lived in apostolic times, when church buildings were not thus adorned, but the church was decked with grace, than in these days, when the buildings are ornamented with all kinds of marble, and the church is bare and void of spiritual gifts" (Ep. ii. 246; cp. ii. 88). "Once pastors would die for their flocks; now they destroy the sheep by causing the soul to stumble. . . . Once they distributed their goods to the needy; now they appropriate what belongs to the poor. Once they practised virtue; now they ostracise [a favourite phrase with Isidore] those who do. . . . I will not accuse all" (Ep. iii. 223). "Once men avoided the episcopate because of the greatness of its authority; now they rush into it because of the greatness of its luxury. . . . The dignity has lapsed from a priesthood into a tyranny, from a stewardship into a mastership [δεσποτῆλα]. For they claim not to administer as stewards, but to appropriate as masters" (Ep. v. 21, to a bishop). "It is not long since the church had splendid teachers and approved disciples;" and it might be so again if bishops would "lay aside their tyranny, and shew a fatherly interest in their people . . . but until that foundation is well laid, I think it idle to talk about the topstone" (Ep. v. 126). He would say to worldly and arrogant prelates, "Abate your pride, relax your superciliousness, remember that you are but ashes. . . . Do not use the arms of the priesthood against the priesthood itself" (Ep. v. 131). "When those who were crowned with the priesthood led an evangelical and apostolical life, the priesthood was naturally dreaded by the sovereignty; but now it is the sovereignty which is dreaded by the priesthood, or rather by those who seem to discharge it, but by their conduct insult it" (Ep. v. 268, to Cyril). "Some . . . openly reproach priests; others pay them outward respect, but in secret revile them. . . . This does not surprise me. As they do not act like those of old, they are treated differently.

Those of old corrected kings when they sinned; these do not correct even rich subjects; and if they try to correct some poor man, they are reproached as having been convicted of the same offences" (Ep. v. 278). So, speaking to an ambitious deacon about 1 Tim. iii. 1, he corrects a misapprehension. "Paul did not say, 'Let every one desire the episcopate.' . . . It is a work," he proceeds, in a memorable series of antitheses, "not a relaxation; a solicitude, not a luxury; a responsible ministration, not an irresponsible dominion; a fatherly supervision, not a tyrannical autocracy" (Ep. iii. 216). Elsewhere he complains that bishops would receive persons excommunicated by other bishops, to the ruin of the discipline of souls (Ep. iii. 259), and that in their bitter contests these official peacemakers would fain devour each other (Ep. iv. 133). The secularisation of the episcopal character he traces in one letter to the excessive honour paid by emperors to bishops; and then he adds: "There are bishops who take pains to live up to the apostolic standard; if you say, 'Very few,' I do not deny it; but . . . many are called, few are chosen." He was thinking of such bishops as Serapion (Ep. iii. 44) or Lampetius (Ep. ii. 221), or his friend Hermogenes of Rhinocorura, whom he calls "a good man, if ever there was one, in thought and action, worthy of the episcopate" (Ep. v. 466). One sees in him an intense habitual moral earnestness, vigilant against all that implied, or might tend to, sin; as when he himself says, in regard to sensual temptations, "The phrase, 'It does not matter,' has made vice rush wildly into men's lives" (Ep. v. 17), or as when he "rejoices exceedingly" in a correspondent's amendment of life (Ep. v. 208). His downright censures, delivered under a serious conviction that he was specially appointed for the purpose (Ep. i. 389; cp. Tillemont, xv. 102), naturally made him enemies among the higher clergy, who tried to put him under some sort of ban, and thereby, as he expresses it, "unintentionally set a crown upon his head" (Ep. v. 131). But he was not less stern to faults in other orders, such as the inhospitality (Ep. i. 50), the gluttony (Ep. i. 392), or the "pugnacity" (Ep. i. 298) of monks, or their neglect of manual labour (Ep. i. 49), or the disorderliness of those who haunted cities and frequented public shows, as if all that "the angelic life" required were "a cloak, a staff, and a beard" (Ep. i. 92; cp. i. 220, and Chalcedon, can. 4). He not only rebukes a physician who is morally diseased (Ep. i. 391), denounces a homicide who went "swaggering" through Pelusium (Ep. i. 297), and warns a wicked magistrate to flee from eternal punishment (Ep. i. 31), but remonstrates with a soldier for invading the cells of monks and teaching them false doctrine (Ep. i. 327), and with a general for attempting to take away the privilege of sanctuary (Ep. i. 174), &c. In a letter probably addressed to Pulcheria, he reprobates the conduct of some imperial envoys, who had strangely compromised their Christianity in the negotiation of a peace (Ep. iv. 143).

It is remarkable that each of the two great church questions on which Isidore took a decided part brought him into some degree of collision with his own patriarch, Cyril of Alexandria. The first of these related to the recognition of St. Chrysostom's memory as worthy of the reverence of faithful Christians. Theophilus of Alexandria had practically procured his deposition and exile; the West had supported him while he lived, and after his death had suspended communion with the churches which would not insert his name in their diptychs. Antioch had yielded the point; even Atticus of Constantinople had done so, not from conviction, but for peace-sake. Cyril, the nephew and successor of Theophilus, held fast to his uncle's position. Isidore had loved and honoured "holy John," if he had not, as Nicephorus says (xiv. 30), been instructed by him. In a letter to a grammarian, he quotes Libanius's panegyric on his oratory (Ep. ii. 42); in a letter to another Isidore, he specially recommends "the most wise John's" commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Ep. v. 32); in another letter, recommending his treatise "on the Priesthood," he calls him "the eye of the Byzantine church, and of every church" (Ep. i. 156); and he describes the "tragedy of John" in the bitter words: "Theophilus, who was building-mad, and worshipped gold, and had a spite against my namesake" (see Socr. vi. 9), was "put forward by Egypt to persecute that pious man and true theologian" (Ep. i. 152). In a like spirit he wrote to Cyril to this purport: "If, as you yourself say, I am your father, I dread the condemnation of Eli . . . or if, as I am rather persuaded, I am your son, since you represent the great Mark, I am anxious on account of the punishment inflicted on Jonathan for not hindering his father from consulting the witch. . . . Put a stop to these contentions: do not involve the living Church in a private vengeance prosecuted out of duty to the dead, nor entail on her a perpetual division [αἰώνιον διχόνοιαν] under pretence of piety" (Ep. i. 570, transl. by Facundus). Cyril took this advice, and the "Joannite" quarrel came to an end, probably in 417-418 (Tillemont, xiv. 281; see Photius, Bibl. 232).

The other matter was far more momentous. When Cyril was at the council of Ephesus, absorbed in his great object of crushing Nestorianism, Isidore wrote to him: "Prejudice does not see clearly; antipathy does not see at all. If you wish to be clear of both these affections of the eyesight, do not pass violent sentences, but commit causes to just judgment. God . . . was pleased to 'come down and see' the cry of Sodom, thereby teaching us to enquire accurately. For many of those at Ephesus accuse you of pursuing a personal feud, instead of seeking the things of Jesus Christ in an orthodox way. 'He is,' they say, 'the nephew of Theophilus,'" &c. (Ep. i. 310; comp. a Latin version, not quite accurate, by Facundus, l. c.). He who thus wrote had no sympathy with Nestorius; in the close of the letter he seems to contrast him with Chrysostom; in the next letter he urges Theodosius II. to restrain his ministers from "dogmatizing" to the council, the court being then favourable to Nestorius. Isidore was, indeed, very zealous against all tendencies to Apollinarianism; he disliked the phrase, "God's Passion," although, as he must have known, it had high authority; he insisted that the word "Incarnate" should be added,—it was the Passiuon of Christ (Ep. i. 129); he urged on Cyril the authority of Athanasius for the phrase, "from two natures" (Ep. i. 323), and he even uses the yet clearer phrase, ultimately adopted by the council of Chalcedon, "in both natures" (Ep. i. 405); but he repeatedly insists on the unity of the Person of Christ, the God-Man, which was the point at issue in the controversy (Ep. i. 23, 303, 405). He says that "the Lamb of God," as the true Paschal victim, "combined the fire of the divine essence with the flesh that is now eaten by us" (Ep. i. 219); in a letter to a Nestorianising "scholasticus" he even calls the Virgin (not simply Theotocos, but) "Mother of God Incarnate" (Θεοῦ σαρκωθέντος μητέρα" (Ep. i. 54). And when Cyril, two years later, came to an understanding with John of Antioch, Isidore gravely exhorted him to be consistent, and said that his most recent writings, compared with his former ones, shewed him to be "either open to flattery or an agent of levity, swayed by vainglory instead of imitating the great athletes" of the faith, &c. (Ep. i. 324). Perhaps these letters were "the treatise to" (or against) Cyril, which Evagrius ascribes to Isidore. While some credit is due to one so ardent and strong-willed as Cyril was by nature for allowing the eminent recluse to treat him with such freedom, it may be thought that Isidore shews too evident a pleasure in playing the monitor to his patriarch, and forgets, at least in the latter case, his own maxims as to accurate enquiry. He was better employed when he uttered warnings against the rising heresy of Eutychianism: "To assert only one nature of Christ after the Incarnation is to take away both, either by a change of the divine or an abatement of the human" (Ep. i. 102); among various errors he mentions "a fusion and co-mixture and abolition of the natures," urging his correspondent, a presbyter, to cling to the "inspired" Nicene faith (Ep. iv. 99).

His theology was generally characterised by accuracy and moderation. In a truly Athanasian spirit (conf. Athan. de Decr. Nic. 22) he writes, "We are bound to know and believe that God is, not to busy ourselves as to what He is" (i.e. attempt to comprehend His essence; Ep. ii. 299). He is emphatic against the two extremes of Arianism and Sabellianism. "If," he argues, "God was always like to Himself, He must have been always Father; therefore the Son is co-eternal" (Ep. i. 241 and cp. i. 389); and Eunomians exceed Arians in making the Son a servant (Ep. i. 246). Sabellians misinterpret John x. 30, where εἶν shews the one essence, and the plural εἶμεν the two hypostases (Ep. i. 138). In the Trinity, the Godhead is one, but the hypostases are three (Ep. i. 247). In Heb. i. 3, the ἀπαύλασμα indicates the co-eternity, the χαρακτήρ the personality; it is in things made that "before" and "after" have place, not in "the dread and sovereign Trinity" (Ep. iii. 18; cp. the Quicumque, ver. 25). The belief in three persons in one essence excludes alike Judaism and polytheism (Ep. iii. 112). Of John xiv. 28, he observes that "greater" or "less than" implies identity of nature (Ep. i. 422). On Phil. ii. 6 sq. he argues that, unless Christ was equal to the Father, the illustration is irrelevant; if He was equal, then it is pertinent. "If Christ had deemed equality with the Father to be a thing gained by accident [ἔρμαιον], He would not have humbled Himself, . . . but since He was by nature equal, and had His prerogative of birth [εὐγένειαν] by virtue of His essence, He did not decline to do so. A slave who has been emancipated and adopted as a son would regard that dignity as a ἀρπαγμα, and would not endure to do any household work; but a genuine son, being born noble, and so above all suspicion, would not decline to do anything of the sort." (Ep. iv. 22. The passage is interesting as shewing that he, like St. Chrysostom, while interpreting οὐχ ἀρπαγμὸν—Θεῶ of the condescension, understood St. Paul to mean, "Christ could afford to waive the display of His co-equality, just because He did not regard it as a thing to which He had no right.") In another letter he explains Rom. iii. 25; when no other cure for a man's ills was possible, "God brought in the only-begotten Son as a ransom; one Victim, surpassing all in worth, was offered up for all" (Ep. iv. 100). He contends that the Divinity of the Holy Spirit—denied by Macedonians—is involved in the Divinity of the Son (Ep. i. 20). Against the denial of the latter doctrine he cites a number of texts, and explains the "humble language" used by Jesus as the result of the "economy" of the Incarnation, whereas the "lofty language" also used by Him would be inexplicable if He were a mere man (Ep. iv. 166). "Baptism," he writes to a count, "does not only wash away the uncleanness derived through Adam's transgression, for that much were nothing, but conveys a divine regeneration surpassing all words—redemption, sanctification, adoption, &c.; and the baptized person, through the reception of the sacred mysteries [of the Eucharist: cf. Ep. i. 228], becomes of one body with the Only-begotten, and is united to Him as the body to its head" (Ep. iii. 195). He censures such abstinence as proceeds from "Manichean or Marcionite principles" (Ep. i. 52); notices the omissions in the Marcionite Gospel (Ep. i. 371); accuses Novatians of self-righteous assurance (Ep. i. 100), but is credulous in regard to scandalous imputations against the Montanists, much resembling the libels which had been circulated against the early Christians (Ep. i. 242).

These letters illustrate the activity of Jewish opposition to the Gospel. They tell us of a few who cavilled at the substitution of bread for bloody sacrifices in the Christian oblation (Ep. i. 401); of another who criticised the "hyperbole" in John xxi. 25 (Ep. ii. 99); of another who argued against a bishop from Haggai ii. 9 that the temple would yet be restored (Ep. iv. 17). And although Paganism, as a system and organised power, was defunct (Ep. i. 270), yet its adherents were still voluble; they called Christianity "a new-fangled scheme of life" (Ep. ii. 46); they contemned its principle of faith (Ep. v. 101); they disparaged Scripture on account of its "barbaric diction" and its defects of style (Ep. iv. 28); they sneered at the "dead Jesus," at the Cross, at the Sepulchre, at the "ignorance of the apostles" (Ep. iv. 27); and Isidore heard one of them, a clever rhetorician, bursting into "a broad laugh" at the Passion, and presently put him to silence (Ep. iv. 31). He wrote a "little treatise" (λογίδιον), "which some preferred to other works on the subject," to prove that there was "no such thing as fate" (Ep. iii. 253), and a book "against the Gentiles," to prove that divination was "nonsensical" (Ep. ii. 137, 228), thus using in behalf of religion the "weapons and syllogisms of its opponents, to their confusion" (Ep. iii. 87). Both are now lost. His familiarity with heathen writers—among whom he cites and criticises Galen (Ep. iv. 125)—gave him great advantages in discussion with unbelievers; and he takes occasion from a question as to Origen's theory about the lapse of souls to recite a variety of opinions still current, apparently among those who still rejected the Gospel. "Some think that the soul is extinguished with the body . . . some have imagined that all is governed by chance; some have entrusted their lives to fate, necessity, and fortune. . . some have said that heaven is ruled by providence, but the earth is not" (Ep. iv. 163). In one letter he attends to the wrongs done to the Christians' argument by Christians' misconduct: "If we overcome heretics, pagans, and Jews, by our correct doctrine, we are bound also to overcome them by our conduct, lest, when worsted on the former ground, they should think to overcome on the latter, and, after rejecting our faith, should adduce against it our own lives" (Ep. iv. 226).

Very many of his letters are answers to questions as to texts of Scripture. Like Athanasius, he sometimes gives a choice of explanations (e.g. Ep. i. 114); although a follower of Chrysostom, he shews an Alexandrian tendency to far-fetched and fantastic interpretation, as when he explains the live coal and the tongs in Isa. vi. 7 to represent the divine essence and the flesh of Christ (Ep. i. 42), or the carcase and the eagles to mean humanity ruined by tasting the forbidden fruit and lifted up by ascetic mortification (Ep. i. 282), or when "he that is on the house-top" is coerced into denoting a man who despises the present life (Ep. i. 210). These specimens may be sufficient. He reproves a presbyter for criticising mystical interpreters (Ep. ii. 81), but he says also that those who attempt to make the whole of the Old Testament refer to Christ give occasion to pagans, and to those heretics who do not recognise it: "for while they strain the passages which do not refer to Him, they awaken suspicion as to those which without any straining do refer to Him" (Ep. ii. 195). With similar good sense he remarks that St. Paul's concessions to Jewish observance were not a turning back to the Law, but an "economy" for the sake of others who had not outgrown it (Ep. i. 407). Again he observes that church history should relieve despondency as to existing evils, and that even the present state of the church should remove mistrust as to the future (Ep. ii. 5). Difficulties about the resurrection of the body are met by considering that the future body will not be like the present, but "ethereal and spiritual" (Ep. ii. 43). He admits that ambition is a natural motive, and can be turned to good (Ep. iii. 34). Ascetic as he was, he dissuades from immoderate fasting, lest an "immoderate reaction" ensue (Ep. ii. 45). Obedience to the government, when it does not interfere with religion, is inculcated, because our Lord "was registered and paid tribute to Caesar" (Ep. i. 48). But he exhorts Theodosius II. (probably soon after his accession) to "combine mildness with authority" (Ep. i. 35); he intimates that this prince's ears were too open to malicious representations (Ep. i. 275); and he speaks to a "corrector" in the manly tones so seldom heard in those days, except from the lips of typical Christians: "He who has been invested with rule ought himself to be ruled by the laws; if he himself sets them aside, how can he be a lawful ruler?" (Ep. v. 383.) Among his opinions on Biblical points, these may be mentioned: that the genealogy traced through Joseph proves that Mary also must have sprung from David (Ep. i. 7); that the fourth beast in Daniel meant the Roman empire (Ep. i. 218); that the seventy weeks extended from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes to the eighth of Claudius (Ep. iii. 89); that the Epistle to the Hebrews was by St. Paul (Ep. i. 7). Like some Fathers, he interprets Mark xiii. 32 evasively (Ep. i. 117). He corrects the confusion between the two Philips (Ep. i. 447). His shrewdness and humour, occasionally tinged with causticity, appear in various letters. "I hear that you have bought a great many books, and yet . . . know nothing of their contents;" take care, he proceeds, lest you be called "a book's-grave," or "a moth-feeder;" then comes a serious allusion to the buried talent (Ep. i. 127). He tells a bishop that he trains the younger ministers well, but spoils them by over-praising them (Ep. i. 202). He hears that Zosimus can say by heart some passages of St. Basil, and suggests that he should read a certain homily against drunkards (Ep. i. 61). He asks an ascetic why he "abstains from meat and feeds greedily on revilings" (Ep. i. 446). His friend Harpocras, a good "sophist" (whom he recommends for a vacant mastership, v. 458, and urges to keep his boys from the theatre and hippodrome, v. 185), had written a sarcastic "monody," or elegy, on Zosimus and his fellows, as already "dead in sin;" Isidore, whom he had requested to forward it to them, defers doing so, lest he should infuriate them against the author; however, he says in effect, if you really mean it to go, send it yourself, and then, if a feud arises, you will have no one else to blame (Ep. v. 52). He seems to be drawing from life when he remarks that "some people are allowed to be tempted in order to cure them of the notion that they are great and invincible persons" (Ep. v. 39). He points out to a palace chamberlain the inconsistency of being glib at Scripture quotations and "mad after other people's property" (Ep. i. 27). But for all this keenness and all this didactic severity, and in spite of his expressed approval of the use of torture (Ep. i. 116), he impresses us as a man of kindly disposition; he writes with laconic cordiality to a count, "A cheery life to you, who are so kind to all!" (Ep. i. 161.) He dilates to a bishop on the "sacred delight" with which he looks forward to seeing him at a coming festival (Ep. ii. 31). He writes to Harpocras, "If for a little while I do not hear from you, I become quite low-spirited. . . . Write regularly, for so you will be still more endeared to me" (Ep. v. 125). He observes that "God values nothing more than love, for the sake of which He became man and obedient unto death; for on this account also the first-called of His disciples were two brothers. . . . Our Saviour thus intimating that He wills all His disciples to be united fraternally" (Ep. i. 10). In this spirit he says of slaves, "Prejudice or fortune. . . has made them our property, but we are all one by nature, by the faith, by the judgment to come" (Ep. i. 471); and he tells how a young man came to his cell, asked to see him, was introduced by the porter, fell at his feet in tears, and at first in silence, then, on being reassured, said that he was the servant of Iron the barrister, and had offended his master, in ignorance, but too deeply for pardon. "I cannot think," writes Isidore, "that the true Christian Iron, who knows the grace that has set all men free, can have a slave" (οικέτην ἔχειν, Ep. i. 142). This tenderness is in harmony with the candour ("si sainte et si belle," says Tillemont, xv. 104) with which he owns that when he has tried to pray for them who have deliberately injured him, he has found himself doing so "with his lips only." "Not that I doubt that some have attained that height of excellence: rather, I rejoice at it and rejoice with them, and would desire to reach the same point" (Ep. v. 398).

Isidore's letters naturally contain allusions to the religious customs or opinions of his age: such as pilgrimage to the shrines of the saints, as of St. Peter (Ep. ii. 5; cp. i. 160 on that of Thecla, and i. 226 on the martyrs who "guard the city" of Pelusium); the benediction given by the bishop "from his high chair," and the response of "And with thy spirit" (Ep. i. 122); the deacon's linen garment, and the bishop's woollen "omophorion" which he took off when the gospel was read (Ep. i. 136); the right of taking refuge in churches (Ep. i. 174); the wrongfulness of exacting an oath (Ep. i. 155).

The time of his death cannot be placed later than A.D. 449, or, at farthest, 450 (see Tillemont, xv. 116). He is commemorated, in the East and West, on Feb. 4.

Two thousand letters of his, we are told, were collected by the zealously anti-Monophysite community of Acemetæ, or "sleepless" monks, at Constantinople, and arranged in four volumes of five hundred letters each. This collection appears to be identical with the extant two thousand and twelve letters, distributed, without regard to chronology, into five books (see Tillemont, xv. 117, 847), of which the first three were edited by Billius, the fourth by Rittershusius, and the fifth by Andrew Schott, a Jesuit; the whole being included in the edition published at Paris in 1638. Many of the letters are, in effect, repetitions of each other. [W. B.]

ISIDORUS (32), of Alexandria, the successor of Marius, who had succeeded the philosopher Proclus as the preceptor of Damascius. He died before 526. It is apparently he who is said by Suidas to have been the (nominal) husband of Hypatia; but this has been remarked by others to be chronologically impossible. He must not be confounded with Isidore of Gaza, an error into which Gibbon falls. (Clinton, Fasti Rom. i. 855-6, and Epit. Fast. Rom. pp. 200 and 216.) [R. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (33), an engineer (μηχανοποιός) associated with Anthemius by the emperor Justinian in 532 for the restoration of St. Sophia. He was a Milesian and a man of great genius (Procop. Aedif. lib. i. cap. 1). Paulus Silentarius, in his Descriptio S. Sophiæ (pars ii. ver. 136, p. 28, ed. Bekker), speaks of him as πρόνομον ἔχων νόον. Justinian consulted him on plans for preventing inundations in the frontier city of Daras (ii. 3). Isidorus had a nephew of the same name and profession, and likewise a Milesian, associated with Joannes Byzantius in the public works of Constantinople (ii. 8).

ISIDORUS (34), presbyter and hegumenus of a monastery near the martyrion of St. Epimachus in the jurisdiction of Photinus bishop of Chalcedon. He was one of the subscribers to the libellus addressed to the patriarch Mennas in 536. (Mansi, viii. 1016.) [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (35), of Gaza, an eminent philosopher, who retired with six others, to Persia, in the 28th year of Justinian, A.D. 554, being disgusted with the manners of the Christians, and hearing great things of the simple life of Chosroes and the happiness of his people. But they were speedily undeceived, and returned, in spite of the entreaties of the Persian king. (Agathias, Hist. lib. ii. cap. 30.) [R. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (36), prefect of the patriarchal library at Alexandria, who rendered Anastasius Sinaita good service in his controversies with the heretics of that city. (Anastas. Sinait. Via Duz, x. in Pat. Gr. lxxxix. 186.) [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (37), deacon of Alexandria, messenger from the patriarch Eulogius to Gregory the Great in 596 and 603. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. vi. ind. xiv. ep. 60, lib. xiii. ind. vi. ep. 42; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 119, 152.) [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (38), vir clarissimus, excommunicated by Januarius bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, for personal reasons only. The bishop was in 592 reprimanded by Gregory the Great. In 593 Isidorus was summoned to Rome, that in his presence and that of the bishop Gregory might examine his complaints. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 49, lib. iii. indict. xi. 36 in Migne, lxxvii. 590, 632; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 101, 104.) [A. H. D. A.]

ISIDORUS (39), a monk martyred at Corduba (Cordova). (Usuard. Mart. Apr. 17.) [R. T. S.]

ISIDORUS (40), a man of rank at Palermo, who bequeathed a sum for a xenodochium in that town. In 601 Gregory the Great, through Fantius the defensor, complained of the dilatoriness of the heirs, and gave instructions that the bequest, if insufficient for the purpose intended, should be appropriated to the Xenodochium of St. Theodorus founded earlier by a certain Peter. (Greg. Mag. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 10, ed. Migne; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 146.) [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (41), hegumenus of Latrum, at the council of Nicaea in 787. (Mansi, xiii. 152 E.) [T. W. D.]

ISIDORUS (42), a presbyter of Antioch. [JOANNES (11) TALAIA.]

ISION (1), bishop of Athribis in Egypt. His name appears in the list called the Breviarium of Meletius, given to Alexander, after the Nicene synod. Iasion was also one of the faction which attempted to convict Athanasius of various crimes. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, Patr. Gr. xxv. 375; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 553.) [J. de S.]

ISION (2), of Mareotis. [ISCHYRAS.]

ISIRNINUS. [ISSERNINUS.]

ISITIUS, martyr at Antioch. [ISICHIUS.]

ISITIUS, archbishop of Vienne. [ISICIUS.]

ISITIUS, bishop of Grenoble. [HESYCHIUS (11).]

ISMAEL, a Persian martyr. [MANUEL.]

ISMAEL ST., son of Budic by Anaumed, the sister of St. Teilo. He received from his uncle the appointment of bishop of Menevia. He was the founder of St. Ishmael's near Kidwelly in Carmarthenshire, and of St. Ishmael's and other churches in Pembrokeshire. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 244, 252; see Giraldus Cambrensis, Itin. Cambriae, i. c. 11, p. 86.) [C. W. B.]

ISOCASIUS, a native of Aegae in Cilicia. He was a philosopher, and after having filled several offices of state with great reputation, he was quaestor at Antioch, when in 467 he was accused to the emperor Leo of being a pagan. The emperor sent him for trial, from Constantinople, where he was then residing, to Theophilus, the praeses of Bithynia, at Chalcedon. Jacobus Cilix surnamed Psychristus, the medical attendant of the emperor, and greatly esteemed by the people of Constantinople, being a friend of Isocasius, successfully pleaded with Leo that he might not be tried by a praeses because of his rank (Cod. Theod. IX. i. 13, A.D. 376; II. i. 12, A.D. 423; Cassidor. Var. iv. 22). Isocasius was therefore brought back to Constantinople to be tried there by Pusaeus, the pretorian prefect of the East, who was also consul. Pusaeus was a former colleague of his; and at his trial Isocasius appealed to him, saying, "Judge me as we used to judge others together." The people who stood by hearing this, earnestly appealed in his behalf to the emperor, and then, apparently with his permission, took Isocasius to the great church, where he was baptized. The emperor afterwards sent him back to Cilicia. (Joannes Malal. lib. xiv. t. ii. 76, 77 ed. Oxon.; Chron. Pasch. s. a. 467 in Migne, Patr. Gr. xcii. 822; Theophanes. Chron. s. a. 460 in Pat. Gr. cviii. 291.) He is mentioned by Basilius of Seleucia, in Vita S. Theclae Mart. (l. ii. c. 25), as having been cured of a sickness in St. Thecla's church near Aegae, and thereupon converted from paganism. (Boll. Acta SS. 21 Sept. vi. 562 E.)

ISOCHRISTI (Ἰσοχριστοί), a sect of Origenistic monks of the sixth century, mentioned under that name by Cyril of Scythopolis in his Life of St. Saba (cap. 89 in Coteler. Eccl. Gr. Monum. iii. 372). In a theological controversy between the Laura of Firminus and the Nova Laura in Palestine, the disputants fastened names on their opponents, and the Neolaurites were called Isochrusti, and the Firminiotae Protocristae and Tetradiatae. The emperor Justinian in his letter against the Origenists addressed to the council of Constantinople under Mennas cir. 543, distinctly refers to the opinions of the Isochrusti, viz. that at the restitution of all things all men will be united with God in the same manner as Christ is, and thus that our Lord in no sense differs from others who are endowed with reason. The council condemned the tenets in its thirteenth canon, which is drawn in almost the very words of the emperor's letter (Cedrenus, Compend. p. 662 in Pat. Gr. cxxi. 721 C; Mansi, ix. 399, 536 D). Cyril of Scythopolis states (u. s.) that Theodorus Ascida bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia warmly espoused the opinions of the Isochrusti, numbers of whom were under his influence promoted to the highest ecclesiastical dignities. Evagrius (H. E. iv. 38) quotes a passage of Theodorus to the effect that since the apostles and martyrs now work miracles and are held in so much honour, their "restitution" must consist in their becoming equal to Christ (cf. Fleury, H. E. xxxiii. 40, 51; Baumgarten-Crusius, Comp. der Dogmengesch. i. 207; Dörner, Person of Christ. ed. Clark, div. ii. vol. i. p. 132). [T. W. D.]

ISONIUS, a Priscillianist bishop who recanted at the council of Toledo in 400. (Mansi, iii. 1006.) [T. W. D.]

ISOËS (Ἰσῶς), presbyter, legate of the bishop of Thyatira at the council of Nicaea in 787. (Mansi, xiii. 143 c.) [T. W. D.]

ISPASANDUS (SPASANDUS, VASANDUS), archdeacon of Tarragona, representing Cyprianus bishop of Tarragona at the council of Toledo in 683 (Mansi, xi. 1076). He is probably the same person as ESPASANDUS, bishop of Complutum. [T. W. D.]

ISRAEL of Tmesu, for ten years catholicos of Armenia, between Anastasius and Isaac III. [ARMENIANS.] According to the annalist he was of the town of Zotmuds, and held the see for six years (Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. xv). Saint-Martin (Hist. sur l'Armen. i. 107, 438, ii. 367) places him in 667-677, and makes him born at Iothmous, a town of Vanant, a canton of the province of Ararat. [C. H.]

ISSERNINUS (ISERNINUS, ISIRNINUS, ISERINUS, JERNINUS, SERINUS), was one of St. Patrick's earliest disciples, and is said to have been ordained deacon when St. Patrick was consecrated, and Auxilius made a priest by bishop Amathorex, in Gaul. [PATRICIUS.] He is afterwards spoken of as a bishop who was sent to aid St. Patrick, and settled at Kilcullen, county Kildare. He was probably a Gaul, but Colgan (Acta SS. 477-479) can scarcely be right in identifying him with St. Sezin. Spelman places this synod about 450 or 456. Isserninus's death is given in the Ann. Tig. in the year 469. (Colgan, Tr. Thom. pass.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. pass.; Todd, St. Patrick, 317, 332, 485, 486; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 17, Wks. vi. 400, 401, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 439, 469.) [J. G.]

ISSEUS, a son of Brychan of Wales, the patron saint of S. Issey, a parish near Padstow in Cornwall, which was also called Egloscruc and Nansant. We also find it called "parochia sanctorum Ide et Lydi," and the present church is dedicated to St. Filius. There are parish fairs on June 4 and Sept. 22. There is a holy well in the parish. The worship paid to wells in the pagan times (Revue Celtique, i. 308) secured them much devotion after Christianity came in; and there are still some superstitious customs connected with the wells in Cornwall. (See W. Bottrell's Traditions of West Cornwall, 1870; see Historia Gildae, § 4: "fontes vel colles, aut fluvios olim exitiabiles nunc vero humanis usibus utiles, quibus divinus honor a caeco tunc populo cumulabatur.” For lives of St. Ida the virgin, see Hardy's Catalogue of Materials for the History of Great Britain and Ireland, i. 144-5; and see Joyce's Irish Names of Places, p. 13. Compare W. C. Borlase, the Age of the Saints, 1878, p. 72, 84. [C. W. B.]

ISSUI, ST. (ISHAW), a martyr to whom Partricio or Partrishaw, a chapel under Landbedr in Brecknockshire, is dedicated. His day is Oct. 30. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.) [C. W. B.]

ISYCHIUS, presbyter and hegumenus of the monastery of St. Theodosius, apparently at or near Jerusalem, who subscribed the libellus to the patriarch Mennas in 536 in the name of the monks of the wilderness of the holy city. (Mansi, viii. 1017.) [T. W. D.]

ISYCHIUS, martyr at Antioch. [ISICHIUS.]

ITA (1), of St. Ives. [HIA.]

(2) Of Killeedy. [ITE.]

ITACIUS. [IDATIUS.]

ITALICA (1), a lady to whom St. Augustine wrote to console her on the loss of her husband, whom, he reminds her, she will see again without fear of separation, but exhorting her to remember that no one will see the light of God's presence in its fulness before the day of final revelation of the same. Evodius mentions this letter in one which he wrote to Augustine. (Epp. 92, 161.)

In a second letter addressed to Italica, Augustine acknowledges the receipt from her of three letters, and in his reply expresses his regret that neither she nor her agent, who had written to announce to him his intention of sending to Rome, had given him any account of the calamities which had taken place there, viz. the capture of Rome by Alaric, A.D. 408, of which he had heard an imperfect account from some bishops who were then in the city. As he speaks of her children, but not of her husband, it is probable that this is the same person as the one mentioned in Ep. 92. She is also probably the one of that name to whom St. Chrysostom addressed a letter A.D. 406.

She appears to have offered to St. Augustine a house in exchange for one in which he was interested, but he informs her that it is not in his power to effect the exchange, as the one which she wished to receive formed part of the ancient possessions of the church of Hippo Regius. (Aug. Ep. 99; Chrys. Ep. 170; Ceillier, ix. 98.) [H. W. P.]

ITALICA (2) PATRICIA, a lady addressed by Childebert king of the Franks, in 588 (Duchesne, Script. i. 870; Bouquet, iv. 86). She appears to have been related to the emperor Maurice (Ducange, Fam. August. p. 106), and to have been married to Venantius, an ex-monk and a patricius of Syracuse. In 593 there was some dispute in relation to the poor between Italica and pope Gregory the Great, who sent his deacon Cyprian to arrange matters. (Greg. Epp. lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 60; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 106.) A portion of this letter appears in the Decretal of Gregory IX. (Corp. Jur. Canon, lib. ii. tit. xxvi. 2, ed. Leips. 1839, pars ii. p. 369.) In

Aug. 599, Gregory writes to Italica and Venantius; he felicitates them on their welfare of which he has heard; the wretched state of mankind portends, he believes, the approaching end of the world; he salutes Barbara and Antonina, the daughters of Venantius (lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 123; Jaffé, 135). In 601 Gregory writes to comfort Venantius in his illness (lib. ix. ind. iv. ep. 25; Jaffé, 142), and it appears that the sick man's estate is being attacked, and his daughters are coming to Rome for its protection (ep. 25, 75; Jaffé, 142, 145); Gregory directs John bishop of Syracuse to exert himself in behalf of the family, and as Venantius is to be urged to resume the monastic habit, the inference is that Italica is now dead (ep. 31; Jaffé, 142). Venantius recovered, and in 602 was addressed by Gregory as patricius of Palermo (lib. x. ind. v. ep. 45, lib. xi. ind. vi. ep. 14; Jaffé, 145, 150). [T. W. D.]

ITALICUS (1), an officer of the Christian city of Majuma, near Gaza, in the 4th century, whose duty it was to keep horses for the Circensian games. There was a rivalry between Majoma and the heathen city of Gaza; and it was believed that a spell had been laid on the chariot of Italicus by Marnas, the idol of Gaza. Jerome records that the hermit Hilarion, by pouring water on the wheels of the chariot, liberated it from the spell, and that the Christian city immediately prevailed in the races. (Jerome, Vita Hilarionis, 20.) [HILARION.] [W. H. F.]

ITALICUS (2), probably a relative of Italica Patricia. In May 602, Gregory the Great wrote to John bishop of Syracuse respecting some rents that were due to the church of Rome from an estate called Gelas in Sicily, apparently in the occupation of Italicus and Venantius (Greg. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 43; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 148; C. H. Sack, Patrimonia. Eccl. Rom. pp. 67-69.) [T. W. D.]

ITAMAR (Kemble, C. D. 984). [ITHAMAR.]

ITE (IDA, IDE, ITA, MIDA, MITA), commemorated Jan. 15. Of this saint we have a very early life, supposed by Colgan to have been written about A.D. 640, and by Ware to have been in the end of the 6th century. This, taken by Colgan from an old Kilkenny MS., is given by him (Acta SS. 66-74, with notes, and an appendix of three chapters on her parentage and country, saints, her kinsmen, and testimonies to her by others), and by the Bollandists. (Acta SS. 15 Jan. [i. 1062 sq.], ii. 345-350, with short preliminary notice.)

St. Ite (known also as Ida, Ide, Ita, Ytha, and with the prefix of affection and reverence, mo. Mida, Mide, Midea, Mita) was of the noble family of the Desii in Waterford. Her mother was Neacht, and her father, Kennfoelad, son of Corbmac, descended from Fiacha Suighdhe, son of Fedhlimidh Reachtmhar, king of Ireland. Born about A.D. 480, and apparently of Christian parents, she received at baptism the name of Deirdre, latinised Dertreha and Dorothea, and was afterwards known as Ite (from 1074, denoting her "thirst" for the love of God). At an early age she began to shew the love and spirit of God in her heart by unusual austerity and devotion. When marriage was desired for her, she declared her wish for the life of Christian virginity, and at last secured her father's consent to take upon her the monastic veil and vows, possibly from the hands of St. Declan (July 24) of Ardmore. Having prayed to be guided in her choice of a place in which to serve God best, she went to the territory of the Hy-Connail, and at the foot of Mount Luachra built her house, at first called Cluain-Credhail, and now Killeedy, in the barony of Glenquin, co. Limerick. Pious maidens soon came and placed themselves under her direction, and she secured such reverence that she is still regarded as the St. Brigida of Munster. She was on terms of closest friendship with the chief saints of that age, like St. Brendan (May 16) of Clonfert, and St. Comgan (Feb. 27) of Glenn-Uissen, and has had attributed to her many miracles and prophecies. At last, on Jan. 15, A.D. 570 (Ann. Tig.), after a life-long suffering from some terrible ailment, she departed to the Lord, invoking a blessing upon the clergy and people of the Hy-Connail, among whom she had sojourned. She was held in special honour in the county of Limerick, and many churches, called Killeedy and Kilmeeady, are under her patronage. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 29, 33, 81 sq.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 17; Colgan, Acta SS. 220 n. 44, 589, c. 1, 598, c. 2.) [J. G.]

ITERIUS, abbat. [ITHERIUS.]

ITHA of St. Ives. [HIA.]

ITHACIUS, bishop of Ossonoba, from before 379 until about 388. (Esp. Sag. xiv. 215.) [PRISCILLIANUS.] [M. B. C.]

ITHAMAR. [MARSAN.]

ITHARNAISC (IOTHARNAISC) is joined in commemoration with Latharnaisc at Jan. 14, in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 15), and is alone in Mart. Tallaght on that day, but in both is "of Achadh-ferta" (the field of the grave). He is possibly the same as Ethernasc or Iotharnaisc (Dec. 22) of Clane, and as the Ethernan or Ithernaisc whom Dempster Men. Scot. places on Jan. 24. [ETHERNASC.] (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 199, 431; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 311.) [J. G.]

ITHERIUS, ST., fifteenth bishop of Nevers, succeeding Rogus and followed by Ebarcius, in the list of the Gallia Christiana, but in that of Coquille fourteenth, followed by Opportunus. It has been disputed whether he belonged to Bourges or Nevers, though he is usually assigned to the latter. He is said to have died in 691, and is commemorated as a saint on July 8, at Nogent, in the diocese of Sens. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 629; Coquille, Hist. du Nivernois, p. 38, and sub fin., Paris, 1612; Gall. Christ. xii. 628.) [S. A. B.]

ITHERIUS (ITERIUS, HITHERIUS, French, ITHIER), ninth abbat of the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, succeeding Wulfardus I. and followed by Alcuin, was one of the higher ecclesiastics whom the Carolingian princes were in the habit of employing on civil and diplomatic missions. We first hear of him as one of the hostages from high families of his province given by Waifarius, duke of Aquitaine, to Pippin in 760 (Annal. Franc. ad an. 760; Einhardi Annal. ad ann. 760, Bouquet, Recueil des Hist. des Gaules, v. 35, 199). Almost immediately he must have been appointed by the latter his chancellor, since we have his subscription in that capacity to a royal charter dated in that year, and ranging over the next fifteen years there are a number of grants and charters, first of Pippin and then of Charles the Great, signed by him as chancellor or by his deputy (Bouquet, ibid. pp. 704, 707-710, 712, 715, 717, 723-7, 729-734). In 769 we learn from a letter of pope Stephen to Charles and his mother praising the religion, wisdom, and loyalty of Itherius, that he was a member of a mission sent to Rome (Bouquet, ibid. pp. 538-9). His abbacy is said to have been conferred on him about 774. In 782 he was again Charles's ambassador to Rome, this time to Adrian I. Two of the pope's letters in 782 and 783 make mention of him. In the latter year he had assisted in a mission for the recovery of some territory for the holy see (Bouquet, ibid. pp. 564, 566). In 785 he is again at Rome, charged in company with Magenarius of St. Denys to consult the pope on Charles's behalf as to the penance which should be imposed upon those of the recently conquered Saxons who had apostatized from Christianity (Bouquet, ibid. 567). It was on this occasion that he obtained from Adrian a confirmation of the privilege which his monastery shared alone in France with that of St. Denys at Paris, Lobes and Hohenove in Alsace, of possessing its own peculiar bishop. The bull was given in June, 786 (cf. Gall. Christ. vii. 349, and Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xlv. 21). In 791 he founded a monastery or cell called Cormaricus (Cormerie) on the Indre as a dependency of St. Martin's, and dedicated it to St. Paul (Bouquet, ibid. v. 457 n., vi. 519, 571, 613). His praeceptum for its foundation is given in Gall. Christ. xiv. instr. vii. col. 9; see col. 254 for its history. Besides the papal bull, he obtained three royal grants in favour of St. Martin's (Bouquet, ibid. v. 737, 747, 754). In his last illness he was consoled by a letter from Alcuin. He died in 796. (Alcuin. ep. 27. Opp. i. 36, 37, ii. 565, ed. Froben.; Gall. Christ. xiv. 160-1.) [S. A. B.]

ITISBERGA, virgin. [IDABERGA.]

ITISBERGA, a virgin honoured at Yberghe, a village in Artois, between Aire and St. Venant, on the river Lys. She is thought to have lived about the beginning of the 8th century. According to one legend, she was a daughter of king Pippin and Bertha, and would therefore be sister to Charles the Great; but as Einhard (Vita Car. Magn. xviii., Patr. Lat. xcvi. 44) expressly states that Charles had only one sister, Gisla, this is impossible, unless Itisberga is to be identified with Gisla, which some commentators have ventured to assert. She is commemorated May 21. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 44-6.) [S. A. B.]

ITTA, ITTABERGA. [IDUBERGA.]

ITTA, virgin. [ITE.]

IUDOC, Armorican saint. [JUDOCUS.]

IUST (JUSTUS), son of Bracan or Brychan of Brycheiniog, and said by Colgan (Acta SS. i. 312, c. 5, quoting a list by Aengus the Culdee) to be in the region of Slemna, corruptly called Levinia in Albania or Scotland; he is otherwise unknown. (Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 23, 36, n. 73.) [JUSTAN.] [J. G.]

IUTHWARA, British virgin, martyred in South Wales in the 8th century. Cressy (Ch. Hist. Brit. xxiii. 9) gives her legend from Capgrave, in which she suffers death at her brother's hand. Her feast is Dec. 23. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 321.)

IVA, IVE, of St. Ives in Cornwall.

IVENTIVS (Usuard. Sept. 12) of Pavia. [JUVENTIUS.]

IVO, ST. (Yvo), June 10, a supposed Persian bishop in Britain, after whom the town of St. Ives in Huntingdonshire was named. His life was written by the monk Goscelin, when a resident at Ramsey, at the request of the abbat Herebert. As this abbat became bishop of Thetford in 1091, the life would have been undertaken a few years earlier. It was based on a more diffused account drawn up by a previous abbat Andrew, who collected his information while in the East on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This abbat is called Withman in the History of Ramsey (Gale, i. 434), and is there said to have remained abroad a year. As 1020 was the year of the pilgrimage (Monast. Angl. ii. 547), this earliest account of Ivo may be considered as compiled about the year 1021. Goscelin's Life of Ivo is printed in Boll. Acta SS. 10 June ii. 288. It describes Ivo as a missionary bishop, a star of the East, a messenger of the true Sun, divinely marked out for the western region of Britain. Quitting his native Persia, he passed through Asia and Illyricum to Rome, enlightening every place he visited. From Rome he proceeded to Gaul, where the admiring king and nobles would fain have detained him, but he pushed forwards into Britain with his three companions. There he rescued the people from idolatry. The first-fruit of his labours was "a youth of patrician dignity named Patricius, the son of a Senator." Passing into Mercia Ivo settled at the vill of Slepe, three English leucæ (Gosc. cap. 2, § 8) from Huntedun. There he laboured many years, there he died and was buried. About one hundred lustra (Gosc. cap. 1, § 4) had passed since the bishop's death, when a peasant of Slepe chanced to strike his plough against a stone sarcophagus, within which were found, besides human remains, a silver chalice and insignia of the episcopal rank. Slepe had then become one of the estates of the abbey of Ramsey, eight leucæ (Gosc. cap. 2, § 8) distant, and abbat Eadnoth was informed of the occurrence. The same night a man of Slepe saw in a vision one robed as a bishop, with ornaments corresponding to those found in the sarcophagus, who said he was St. Ivo and wished to be removed to the abbey, with two of his companions, whose burial-places he described. The translation was accordingly effected, and on the spot where the saint was found a church was likewise dedicated to him, connected with which was a priory, as a cell of the parent abbey. The spot was thenceforth known as St. Ives. A later hand adds that in the reign of Henry I. the relics of the two companions were re-translated to St. Ives from Ramsey. As Ramsey abbey is known to have been founded about 991 or a little earlier (Mon. Hist. Brit. 580 n; Monast. Angl. ii. 547), Eadnoth the first abbat (Liber Eliens. ed. Stewart, p. 188) would be living about A.D. 1000 (the common date of the translation is 1001). Reckoning back one hundred lustra or four hundred years (computing by the four-year lustrum), we arrive at the year 600 as about the period of Ivo's death, and this is in fact the year given by Florence of Worcester (Chron. in M. H. B. 526). If then Ivo died in 600, his mission at Slepe must be placed about 580-600, which figures nearly correspond with the reign of the emperor Maurice, with whom Diceto (in Gale, iii. 559) makes him contemporary. Thus Ivo's Mercian mission preceded the arrival of Augustine by about half a generation, and anticipated by some seventy years the conversion of Mercia as narrated in Bede. The utter improbability of this will be obvious, and the monks of Ramsey must be held responsible for the legend. Their abbey had been newly built and needed relics; a consecrated spot was wanted for a daughter-house. This will explain all, and the invention of St. Ivo was of a piece with that of the two Kentish princes. [ETHELBERT (5).]

Even if the tale is, as to its facts, a pure romance, as probably it is, there was yet perhaps something local which caused the fabrication to assume the particular form it bears and gave it currency. Possibly there may be here indicated a lingering tradition of old British Christianity, and a reminiscence of its oriental origin, leaving the period out of the question. It would be nothing surprising if a British remnant should have survived in that locality so late as the Conquest. There are not wanting obscure indications that Britons did actually maintain themselves in eastern Mercia and the fastnesses of the fens long after the conversion of the whole English race [GUTHLAC]. Moreover the name of Patrick appearing in this story gives it a Celtic look, and the locality might have been a sort of eastern Glastonbury. The Celtic element in the first conversion of the Mercian Angles was likely enough to prolong the vitality of Celtic traditions if there was some Celtic blood there for them to take hold of. If then there was Celtic blood and Celtic traditions surviving in that part of the fens about the time when Ramsey was founded, the oriental colouring given to the legend is accounted for. The stone sarcophagus might easily have been a genuine Roman relic, furnishing a material basis of the story and suggesting the occasion. It may be added, if the above inferences are not unreasonable, that the legend of St. Ivo contains a reminiscence that the Christian missionaries who reached Britain from the East came by way of Gaul, combining also the tradition of their having been sent from Rome.

It remains to observe that Slepe is found in Domesday, and according to local accounts is still the name of one of the manors of St. Ives.

The priory of St. Ives, the ruins of which have survived to modern days, is described in Monast. Angl. ii. 631. In the time of Brompton (Twysd. p. 883) no saint in England was so eminent as St. Ivo at Ramsey for the cure of diseases.

After Goscelin, the story was written again by John of Tynemouth in the fourteenth century, in whose Synctilogium, before the manuscript was burnt, it stood No. 70 (Smith, Cat. Cotton MSS. p. 29). It was one of those, however, adopted by Capgrave in the 15th century for his Nova Legenda (ff. 199) and so is preserved to us. At the point where Ivo is said to have arrived at Rome, this version states that it was the pope who commissioned him to Britain. The manuscript lives of Ivo are mentioned by Hardy (Desc. Cat. i. 184-186), and it appears that the Life by Goscelin exists as a Bodleian manuscript in a fuller form than the recension of it given by the Ballandists, the Life in Capgrave being another abridgment. One of the manuscripts mentioned by Hardy purports to be the very Life by abbat Andrew referred to by Goscelin.

IVOR, Welsh Saint. [IFOR.]

IVOR, IVORUS, bishop. [IBHAR.]

IVOR, son of Alan of Armorica, according to the Annales Cambriae succeeded Cadwalader, king of the Britons, in 682, and reigned forty-eight years. (M. H. B. 841.) Geoffrey of Monmouth (lib. xii. c. 18) makes him son of Cadwalader and cousin of Ine, falling in with the common confused identification of Ceadwalha of Wessex with the British Cadwalader. According to Skene, Four Ancient Books of Wales, i. 73, 75, Ivor's reign is altogether fictitious; it was invented to fill a gap in the history of the British kings, and the events of it were taken from those of the reign of Ine. As to the connexion of Ivor's history with that of Ine, see INE.

IZID II. (IZITH, IEZID, IEZITH, EZID, YESID), fourteenth calif, the ninth of the Omniad dynasty at Damascus. He was the son of Abdulmalek, and succeeded his cousin Omar II., and was followed by ISAM. He died on the 26th of the Arabic month Schaban, A.H. 105, i.e. Jan. 28, 724, A.D. (L'Art de Vérif. v. 151). He began to reign in 720 (ibid.) or 719 (Herbelot). Theophanes (p. 336) under his year A.C. 715 (i.e. 722 in our reckoning) relates that a certain Jew, a native of Laodicea on the Phoenician coast, promised Izid a reign of forty years if he would expel the images from the Christian churches throughout his dominions. The edict was issued, and thus anticipated the famous one of Leo Isaurus in 726. Yet Izid's reign proved a very short one. The same account is given by Zonaras (Annal. xv. 5). It is related more fully at the Nicæan synod of 787, by the presbyter John, who was one of the representatives there of the three oriental patriarchates. He names the Jew Tessaracontapechys, and says the interview occurred at Tiberias while Izid was visiting Palestine. (Mansi, xiii. 197.)

[C. H.]

JACOBUS (4) or JAMES, bishop of Nisibis in Mesopotamia, in the early part of the 4th century, called "the Moses of Mesopotamia," from his wisdom, and the miraculous powers with which he was accredited. He was born at Nisibis or Antiochia Mygdonia towards the end of the 3rd century. He is said to have been nearly related to Gregory the Illuminator, the apostle of Armenia. At an early age he devoted himself to the life of a solitary, practising the severest self-discipline. The celebrity James acquired by the strictness of his asceticism and his spiritual gifts, caused Theodoret to assign him the first place in his Religiosa Historia or Vitae Patrum—where he is entitled  $\delta \mu \acute{\epsilon} \gamma \alpha \varsigma$ —in which his self-imposed austerities, and the miracles of which he was the reputed worker, are fully detailed. During this period of his life he took a journey to Persia for the purpose of spiritual edification by intercourse with the Christians of that country, as well as of confirming their faith under the persecutions they had to endure from Sapor II. Theodoret records several grotesque but not unkindly miracles as taking place at this time (Theod. Vit. Patr. pp. 1110 sq.). Gennadius (de Script. Eccl. c. 1) reports that James was a confessor in the Maximian persecution, and Nicephorus adds (H. E. viii. 14) that he was conspicuous at the council of Nicæa, like Paphnutius, for the seams and scars left by his sufferings. This is, however, discredited by the silence of Theodoret. On the vacancy of the see of his native city, James was compelled by the demand of the people to become their bishop. His episcopate, according to Theodoret, was signalised by fresh miracles. A like tale is told of him as of Gregory Thaumaturgus (Greg. Nyss. Vit. Greg. Thaum.) and of Epiphanius (Soz. vii. 27; Theod. u. s. p. 1112), viz., the meeting with two beggars, one of whom while feigning death to impose on him, actually died by divine judgment.

In 325 James was summoned to the council of Nicaea (Labbe, Concil. ii. 52, 76). A leading part is ascribed to him by Theodoret in the debates of that council, as the champion of the whole orthodox band, ὁδὸς τῆς ἀριστέως καὶ προμαχὸς ἀπάσης φάλαγγος (Theod. u. s. p. 1114). He is commended by Athanasius, together with Hosius, Alexander, Eustathius, and others (Adv. Arian. tom. i. p. 252). According to some Eastern accounts of the council, James was one of those whom the emperor Constantine marked out for peculiar honour (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 203). Abraham Ecchellensis ascribed to him the compilation of the eighty-four Arabic Nicene canons, the spuriousness of which has been sufficiently proved (Pearson, Vind. Ignat. part. i. p. 187; Hefele, Hist. of Councils, vol. i. p. 366, Engl. trans.). His name also occurs among those who signed the decrees of the council of Antioch, in Encaeniis, A.D. 341, of more than doubtful orthodoxy (Labbe, Concil. ii. 559). But as no mention of his being present at this council occurs elsewhere the fact is at least questionable (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. tom. vi. note 27, les Ariens; Hefele, Councils, ii. 58, Engl. transl.). That the awfully sudden death of Arius at Constantinople, on the eve of his anticipated triumph, A.D. 336, was due to the prayers of James of Nisibis, and that on this emergency he had exhorted the faithful to devote a whole week to uninterrupted fasting and public supplication in the churches, rests only on the authority of one passage, in the Religiosa Historia of Theodoret, the spuriousness of which is acknowledged by all sound critics. The gross blunders of making the death of the heresiarch contemporaneous with the council of Nicaea, and of confounding Alexander of Alexandria with Alexander of Constantinople, prove it to be an ignorant forgery. In the account of the death of Arius given by Theodoret, in his Ecclesiastical History, from Athanasius (Theod. H. E. i. 14; Soz. H. E. ii. 20) no mention is made of James in connection with the death of Arius; and he is equally absent from that given by Athanasius in his letter to the bishops. As bishop of Nisibis James was the spiritual father of Ephrem Syrus, who was baptized by him, and remained by his side as long as he lived [EPHRAIM (4)]. Milles, bishop of Susa, when visiting Nisibis to attend a synod for settling the differences between the bishops of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, c. A.D. 341, found James busily engaged in erecting his cathedral, towards which, on his return, he sent a large quantity of silk from Adiabene (Asseman. Bibl. Or. tom. i. p. 186). On the attempt, three times renewed, of Sapor II. to make himself master of Nisibis, A.D. 338, 346, 350, James deserved the gratitude not of his fellow townsmen alone, but of the whole empire, of whose eastern provinces Nisibis was regarded as at once the bulwark and the key, by the power with which he maintained the faith of the inhabitants in the Divine protection, the enthusiasm he kindled by his words and his example, and the military genius and administrative skill with which he opposed and thwarted the measures of the besiegers. The tale of the final siege of 350, which lasted three months, and of the bishop's successful efforts to save his city, must be read in the pages of Gibbon (c. xviii. vol. ii. pp. 385 ff.) or de Broglie (L'Église et l'Empire, tom. iii. pp. 180-195). See also Theod. u. s. p. 1118; H. E. ii. 26; Theophan. p. 32. Nisibis was quickly relieved by Sapor being called away to defend his kingdom against an inroad of the Massagetae. The date of James's death is not known, but he cannot have long survived this deliverance. He was honourably interred within the city, in pursuance, it is said, of an express charge of Constantine to his son Constantius, indicative of the reverence he entertained for him, in order that after death his hallowed remains might continue to defend Nisibis against its enemies. When in 363, Nisibis was yielded to the Persian monarch, the Christian inhabitants carried the sacred talisman with them. (Theod. u. s. p. 1119; Soz. H. E. v. 3; Gennad. u. s. c. 1.)

James of Nisibis is not enumerated by Jerome among ecclesiastical writers, which is accounted for by Gennadius by the fact that he wrote only in Syriac, a language of which Jerome was ignorant at the time he compiled his catalogue. Gennadius speaks of him as a copious writer, and gives the titles of twenty-six different treatises of which he was the author. Assemani, having rashly denied his having been an author (Bibl. Or. tom. i. p. 17 c. v.), retracts the assertion in his Addenda (Ibid. pp. 557, 652), where he states that his kinsman, Gregory the Illuminator, having asked James for some of his writings, he sent him a considerable number of controversial, doctrinal, and practical treatises. In this statement of Assemani's there are several inaccuracies. The Gregory who wrote to James was not the "Illuminator," as Antonelli has satisfactorily proved (note, p. 1), and the request he made, as his letter given by Caillau shews, was that he would answer some theological questions he had propounded, and on James postponing this to a personal interview, that he would write to him on faith, its nature, foundation, building up, &c. In compliance with this request James sent him a collection of treatises of his composition. These, or some of them, eighteen in number, were found by Assemani in the Armenian convent of St. Antony at Venice, together with Gregory's letter, and James's reply. The titles of these treatises—De Fide, De Dilectione, De Jejunio, De Oratione, De Bello, De Devotis, De Pœnitentia, De Resurrectione, &c.—correspond generally with those given by Gennadius, but the order is different. In the same collection he found the letter of James to the bishops of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, on the Assyrian schism. It is a lengthy document, in thirty-one sections, lamenting the divisions of the church and the pride and arrogance which were their cause, and exhorting them to study peace and concord. These were all published with a Latin translation and a learned preface establishing their authenticity and notes by Nicolas Maria Antonelli in 1756. They were also printed in the collection of the Armenian fathers, published at Venice in 1765, and again at Constantinople in 1824. The Latin translation is found in the Patres Apostolici of Caillau, tom. 25, pp. 254-543. The liturgy which bears the name of James of Nisibis, said to have been formerly in use among the Syrians (Abr. Ecchell. Not. in Catal. Ebed-Jesu, p. 134; Bona, Liturg. i. 9), is certainly not his, but is rather to be ascribed to James of Sarug (Renaudot, Lit. Or. tom. ii. p. 4). James of Nisibis is commemorated in Wright's Syrian Martyrology, and in the Roman martyrology, July 15; in the Greek menology, Oct. 31; in the Synax. Maronitarum and Synax. Coptarum on 18 Tybi, i.e. Jan. 13. (Asseman. Bibl. Or. tom. i. pp. 17 sqq.; 186, 557, 652; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom. vii.; Ceillier, Ant. Eccl. tom. iv. p. 478 sqq.; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. tom. ix. p. 289; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 189.) [E. V.]

JACOBUS (5), a disciple of St. Honoratus at Lérins, and first bishop of Tarantaise. He died at Arles Jan. 16, 429. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 26; Gall. Christ. xii. 701.) [R. T. S.]

JACOBUS (6), bishop of Dorostorum (the modern Silitria) on the Danube, one of the party of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, v. 767, 776; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1227.) [L. D.]

JACOBUS (7). [CHARISIUS.]

JACOBUS (8), 3rd bishop of Embrun, died A.D. 438. (Gall. Christ. iii. 1055.) [R. T. S.]

JACOBUS (9), bishop of Anemurium in Isauria, represented at the council of Chalcedon 451, by Basil of Selencia. (Mansi, vi. 566; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1015.) [J. de S.]

JACOBUS (10), bishop of Prymnesia (Pronisus) in Phrygia Pacatiana; at the council of Chalcedon, Marianus of Synnada subscribed his name, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 164; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 843.) [L. D.]

JACOBUS (11), bishop of Lemelifense in Mauritania Sitifensis, banished by Huineric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 59; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 201.) [R. S. G.]

JACOBUS (12), bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia, near the end of the 5th century. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 893.) [J. de S.]

JACOBUS (13) SARUGENSIS, bishop of Batnae, a little town in the district of Sarug in Osrhoëne. He enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for learning and holiness, and was sainted alike by orthodox and heretics. The Syrian liturgies commemorate him with St. Ephraim as an "os eloquentissimum et columnam ecclesiae."

Three lives are extant, two in the Vatican and one in the British Museum (cod. dcccclx. 46, dated A.D. 1197). Of these the oldest and best is the spirited eulogium by his disciple Georgius, who was perhaps a bishop of the Arabs. The other two, which are anonymous and later than the 10th century, are in close agreement with it. According to these authorities Jacobus was born at Kurtom on the Euphrates (A.D. 452), in answer to the prayers of childless parents. His father was a priest. Brought up in the fear of God by his parents, Jacobus was further taught in one of the schools of Edessa (according to Mares the Nestorian). There is a story of his prophetically announcing the fall of Amid in his twenty-second year, while writing his poem on Ezekiel's vision of the chariot. According however to Joshua Stylites the Persians took the town A.D. 503, when Jacobus was not twenty-two, but fifty years of age. The poem on Ezekiel's vision contains no reference to the fall of Amid. The elegy on that event is quite distinct; see cod. dccciii. Br. Mus.

The anonymous Life (Vatic.) states that Jacobus was made bishop of Batnae ("urbis Sarug") when sixty-seven and a half years old, A.D. 519, and that he died two and a half years afterwards, i.e. A.D. 521. Before A.D. 503 Jacobus was a periodeutes or visitor of the district of Batnae, a middle rank between the episcopate and the priesthood. This we learn from Joshua Stylites. Cf. epist. 16 in the Br. Mus. cod. dclxxii. The Stylite adds that Jacobus had composed many homilies on passages of Scripture, and psalms, and hymns; which proves that his fame was already established in 503.

Renaudot (tom. ii. Liturgg. Orientt.) has charged Jacobus with Monophysitism, a charge which Assemani and Abbelos shew to be unwarranted. Timotheus of Constantinople (fl. 6th cent. ad init.) calls him "orthodox," Isaacus Ninivita and Joannes Maro quote him as such, and we have seen that Joshua the Stylite, his contemporary, calls him venerable. The Maronites, always hostile to Nestorians and Jacobites, honour him as a saint. Further, he began his episcopate under Justin, by whose orders Severus was driven from Antioch, Philoxenos from Hierapolis, and other heretics from Mesopotamia and Syria. Had Jacobus been a Monophysite, he would have shared their fate. Not a single Catholic writer of the 5th, 6th, or 7th century, says Assemani, has so accused him. It is true that Barhebraeus and the Life in the British Museum allege that he communicated with Severus; and Dionysius in his Chronicon asserts that St. Jacobus of Sarug would not communicate with Paul of Antioch, because the latter confessed the two natures. But here Dionysius is self-contradictory in the matter of dates. Some passages of the hymns extant speak of the single nature of Christ, but they may be interpolated. There is direct evidence that after the council of Chalcedon the Monophysites began to tamper with texts (cf. Evagr. iii. 31). They even attributed whole works, written in their own interests, to great names, such as Athanasius and Gregory Thaumaturgus. And Jacobus Edessenus testifies that a certain poem was falsely ascribed by the Jacobite sect to the bishop of Batnae shortly after his decease (Barhebr. Horr. Myst. ad Gen. vi.). A silly poem directed against the council of Chalcedon (cod. Nit. 5 fol. 139) is proved by internal evidence to be spurious. Professor Bickell says that before Justin's reign St. Jacobus may, on grounds of prudence, have professed adherence to the emperor Zeno's Henoticon; a fact which would not of itself imply more than the absence of that narrow spirit of persecuting bigotry, which in those times was so general. But his writings in general supply ample proof of orthodoxy on the doctrines in question.

Works.—St. Jacobus was a very voluminous writer. Barhebraeus says that he employed seventy amanuenses in writing his homiletic poems, of which 760 exist, besides expositions, epistles, hymns, and psalms. Georgius, in his panegyric, gives a list of those of his poetic writings which treat of the great men of the Old Testament, of angels, and of the mysteries of the Son of God. The anonymous Life (Vatic.) states that his homilies (mim'rê) were 763 in number. Of these writings many may be lost: most of those which survive are unedited.

Prose Works.—(1) An anaphora or liturgy (Renaud. Lit. Or. ii. 556-566). It begins Deus Pater, qui es tranquillitas! and is also found in Ethiopic. (Br. Mus. cod. cclxi. 11. "Anaphora of holy Mar Jacob the Doctor, of Batnan of Serug." Also cod. cclxiii. and cclxiii.)

(2) An order of Baptism; one of four used by the Maronites (Assemani, Cod. Lit. ii. 309).

(3) An order of Confirmation (ib. iii. 184).

(4) A number of epistles—the Brit. Mus. cod. dclxxii. (dated A.D. 603) contains thirty-four in a more or less perfect state, among which are

(a) Epist. to Samuel abbat of St. Isaacus at Gabûla; on the Trinity and Incarnation. "The Father unbegotten, the Son begotten, the Spirit proceeding from the Father, and receiving from the Son."

(b) Epist. to the Himyarite Christians.

(c) Epist. to Stephen bar-Sudaïl of Edessa, proving from reason and Scripture the eternity of heaven and hell.

(d) Epist. to Jacobus, an abbat of Edessa, explaining Heb. x. 26, 1 John v. 16, and two other contrasted passages.

(e) Epist. to bishop Eutychianus against the Nestorians.

(9) Six Homilies; on Nativity, Epiphany, Lent, Palm Sunday, The Passion, The Resurrection (Zingerlé, Sechs Homilien des heilig. Jacob von Sarug, Bonn, 1867).

Poetic Works.—Assemani gives a catalogue of 231, with headings and first words. Very few have as yet been printed. See Zingerlé, in Zeitschr. d. Morgen. Gesellsch. 1858, p. 115; 1859, p. 44; 1860, p. 679, &c. Abbeloos, in his Life, gives two on the B. V. M., from which he tries to prove that Jacobus held the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. The poem On S. Simeon Stylites appears in S. E. Assemani, Act. Martyr. ii. 230; that On St. Abib, and SS. Guria and Samona, martyrs, and a short hymn On the Edessene Embassy to Christ, with extracts from two other poems, are printed in Cureton's Anc. Syr. Doc. p. 86, London, 1864; two others in Wenig's Schol. Syr. The subjects are, for the most part, the personages and events of the Old and New Testaments, especially the words and deeds of Christ. Jacobus is very fond of an allegorical treatment of Old Testament themes. Thus Ezekiel's vision is made to refer to the church, the altar, and the Eucharist. Another poem (Assemani's, no. 3) states that the apostles were prefigured by the heads of tribes, the disciples by the seventy elders; Jesus, by Moses; and another (no. 5 in Assemani) makes Jacob, Leah, and Rachel symbolize Christ, the synagogue, and the church.

Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. pp. 502-525 gives an account of upwards of forty MSS. and fragments of MSS., containing metrical discourses, and letters and a few homilies in prose, by St. Jacobus. Cod. dclxxvi. has a note, "Now this book was written at Edessa, in the year 876," i.e. A.D. 565. Cod. dclxxviii. (6th or 7th cent.) has a discourse on "righteous Job," in two parts, of which the first is in heptasyllables, after the manner of Ephraim, the second in dodecasyllables. Cod. dclx. of the same date is a mere remnant

(three discourses) of a large collection of sixty-six metrical homilies, as its index shews. There are also a number of canticles (sûgyotho), hymns, and prayers; see Wright's Cat. Index, pp. 1291-1294. Assemani says that many poems in the Syrian church books pass under the name of St. Jacobus because they are written in his metre, i.e. in dodecasyllables or tetrasyllables thrice repeated. This was his usual, though not invariable, measure. In regard to style, Jacobus Edessenus classed the bishop of Batnae with St. Ephraim, Isaacus Magnus, and Xenaias Mabugensis, as a model writer of Syriac. "After Ephraim," says Prof. W. Wright, "we may mention three writers of verse, Balai, Cyrillona, and Isaac of Antioch. These, however, are deservedly cast into the shade by Jacob of Batnae or Serug, one of the most prolific and at the same time most readable authors of his class." In wealth of words and ease of expression he ranks next to Ephraim. (Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 283-340; Cave, ii. 110; Abbeloos, de Vitâ et Scriptt. S. Jacobi Batn. Sarugi in Mesop. Episc. Lovan. 1867; Matagne, Act. Sanct. xii. Oct. p. 824; Bickell, Consp. Syr. 25, 26.) [C. J. B.]

JACOBUS (14) I., Nestorian bishop of Gondisapor, living in 522. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 409; Le Quien, ii. 1182.) [C.H.]

JACOBUS (15) or JAMES BARADAEUS, (AL BARADAI, BURDOHO, BURDEONO, BURDEANA, or BURDEAYA, also PHASELITA, or ZANZALUS), ordained by the Monophysite party bishop of Edessa (c. 541 A.D.), with oecumenical authority over the members of their body throughout the East. By his indomitable zeal and untiring activity this remarkable man rescued the Monophysite community from the extinction with which it was threatened by the persecution of the imperial power, and breathed a new life into what seemed little more than an expiring faction, consecrating bishops, ordaining clergy, and uniting its scattered elements in an organisation so well planned and so stable that it has subsisted unharmed through all the political and dynastic storms that have swept over that portion of the world, and preserves to the present day the name of its founder as the Jacobite church of the East. Contemporary materials for the life of this Monophysite apostle are furnished by the two Syriac biographies from the pen of his contemporary John of Asia, the Monophysite bishop of Ephesus, ordained by him, printed by Land (Anecdota Syriaca, vol. ii. pp. 249-253; pp. 364-383), as well as by the third part of the Ecclesiastical History of the same author (Payne Smith's translation, pp. 273-278, 291). The account of Jacobus Baradaeus in the Chronicon Ecclesiasticum of Barhebraeus, otherwise Abul-pharagius, towards the end of the 13th century (pp. 215 sqq., ed. Abbeloos and Lamy), is chiefly derived from these biographers, and supplies but little new matter, Asseman. (Bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 424; tom. ii. pp. 62-69; 324-332, 414; tom. iii. pp. 385-388); Le Quien (Or. Christ. tom. ii. col. 1346 sqq. 1358); and Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. tom. ii. p. 341; Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p. 133), together with our own Cave (Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 524), have carefully collected the facts given by these authorities, as well as by Eutychius, the Melchite patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 933-940 (Annal. tom. ii. pp. 144-147).

The surname Baradaeus is derived from the ragged mendicant's garb patched up out of old saddle-cloths, in which, the better to disguise his spiritual functions from the unfriendly eyes of those in power, this indefatigable propagator of his creed performed his swift and secret journeys over Syria and Mesopotamia. Baradaeus is a classicalised form of the Syriac—ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ Bur-dē'āyā or ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ Burdē-ā-nā, in Arabic

البرادعي al-Barādī, from the word

ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ or ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ burda'tā or barda'tā, Arabic بردعة barda'ah, defined by Payne Smith (Thesaurus Syriacus, col. 604) as a "cento dorsualis," or saddle-cloth of an inferior kind used for asses, and then a shabby worn-out garment; and by Lane in his Arabic Lexicon (p. 186, col. 2), as in its primary sense, a cloth of the kind called حلس, which is put beneath the saddle of the camel, called رحل but conventionally applied in modern times to an ass's saddle-cloth, pannel, or dorser, and secondarily to an old tattered garment. John of Ephesus states, in connexion with the origin of his surname, that he cut a coarse robe into two pieces, and wore one-half as an undergarment, and the other half as an upper garment without changing them summer or winter, until they grew quite ragged and tattered like an old

selites, is stated by Renaudot (Lit. Or. ii. 341) to be equivalent to "Baradaeus," and to be derived from a Syriac word signifying "segmenta," and to correspond to the later Greek βακεδύτης. This is erroneous. Professor W. Wright states that the word ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ pēsiltā, which a Greek or Latin writer would very naturally represent by Phasilta, means "a cut stone" (for a building) and "a quarry," and has no connexion with patchwork or rags. The Dairā-daphēsiltā, or "convent of "Pesilta," of which Jacobus was a presbyter before his elevation to the episcopate, was probably so called either from being built of hewn stone or from standing near a quarry, and it was from his connexion with this monastery that he received the name "Phase-lites." The name Zanzalus is said by Nicephorus (H. E. xviii. 52) and by Demetrius, metropolitan of Cyzicus (quoted by Ducange, sub voc.) to have been given to him "on account of his excessive shabbiness," διὰ τὴν ἄκραν (ἄγαν, Demetr.) εὐτέλειαν. The word τζάντζαλον is defined by Ducange (Gloss. Med. et Infim. Graecit.) as "nugamentum, φλαυρία, quidpiam vile ac tritum;" but he gives no derivation. That furnished by Asseman ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ zallil, vilis, parvi- pretii, or ܘܒܪܕܐܘܫ or dallil, paucus, rarus, pauper, tenuis, is rejected by Payne Smith and other trustworthy authorities.

James Baradaeus is stated by John or Ephesus to have been born at Tela, more fully Tela Mauzalat, otherwise called Constantina, in honour of its second founder, A.D. 350, a city of Osrhoëne, fifty-five miles due east of Edessa, towards the close of the 5th century. His father, Theophilus Bar-Manu, was one of the clergy of the place. In pursuance of a vow of his parents, James, at the age of two years, was placed in that monastery under the care of the abbat Eustathius. Here he was trained in Greek and Syriac literature, as well as in the strictest asceticism (Land, Anecdot. Syr. tom. ii. p. 364).

As he grew into manhood he became remarkable for the severity of his self-discipline. Having on the death of his parents inherited all their property, including a couple of slaves, he manumitted them, and made over the house and estate to them, reserving nothing for himself (ibid. 366). He received deacon's orders, and eventually became a presbyter. The reputation of working miracles soon attached to so rigorous an ascetic.

The sick came from far and near, some even from the Persian territory, to be healed by him, the cure being sometimes effected at a distance without personal communication. His fame spread over the East, and at last reached the ears of the empress Theodora, who was eagerly desirous of seeing him, as one of the chief saints of the Monophysite party, of which she was a zealous partisan. James, however, was indisposed to leave the retirement of his convent, and even when chosen by his party to go to Constantinople to plead their cause before the emperor Justinian, whose subserviency to his empress failed to secure the Monophysites from a persecution which threatened their very existence, a vision of Severus, the Eutychian patriarch of Antioch, and John, the deceased bishop of Tela, was needed to induce him to leave his monastery for the imperial city. His companion was Sergius, who was subsequently ordained by him Monophysite patriarch of Antioch (ibid. 368). On his arrival at Constantinople James was received with much honour by Theodora. But the splendour of the court had no attractions for him. He retired to one of the monasteries of the city, where he lived as a complete recluse. His convent, however, became a centre of attraction to comers, both lay and cleric. Among his visitors was Harith (Aretas) ibn Jabala, "the Magnificent," sheikh of the Christian Arabs A.D. 530-572, who, as an adherent of the Monophysite creed, had set out to pay his respects to James during his residence at Pesilta, but had been turned back by a vision. The period spent by James at Constantinople—fifteen years according to John of Ephesus—was a disastrous one for the Monophysite body. Justinian had come to the resolution to enforce the Chalcedonian decrees universally; and the bishops and clergy who refused to accept them were removed from their flocks, and punished with imprisonment, deprivation, and exile. Whole districts of Syria, and the adjacent countries, were thus deprived of their spiritual pastors, and the Monophysites were threatened with gradual extinction. For ten years many churches had been destitute of the sacraments, which they refused to receive from what were to them heretical hands, and thus had to choose between being spiritually "famished or poisoned" (Gibbon). The extreme peril of the body to which she extended her "ambiguous favour" was represented to Theodora by the sheikh Harith, and by her instrumentality the recluse James was drawn from his cell, and persuaded to accept the hazardous and laborious post of the apostle of Monophysitism in the East. At that time a considerable number of Monophysite bishops from all parts of the East, including Theodosius of Alexandria, Anthimus, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, Constantius of Laodicea, John of Egypt, Peter, and others, who had come to Constantinople in the hope of mitigating the displeasure of the emperor, and exciting the sympathies of Theodora, were detained by Justinian in one of the imperial castles in a kind of honourable imprisonment. By them James was ordained to the episcopate, nominally as bishop of Edessa, but virtually as a metropolitan with an oecumenical authority. The date of his ordination is uncertain, but that given by Asseman (A.D. 541) is probably correct. The result proved the wisdom of the choice. Of the simplest mode of life, inured to hardship from his earliest years, tolerant of the extremities of hunger and fatigue, "a second Asahel for fleetness of foot" (Abulpharagius), fired with an unquenchable zeal for what he regarded as the true faith, with a dauntless courage that despised all dangers, James, in his tattered beggar's disguise, traversed on foot the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia, and the adjacent provinces, even to the borders of Persia, everywhere ordaining bishops and clergy, by his exhortations when present, and by his encyclical letters when absent, encouraging his depressed co-religionists to courageous maintenance of their faith against the advocates of the two natures, and organising them into a compact spiritual body. By his indefatigable labours, in the words of Gibbon (vol. vi. p. 75, ed. 1838), "the expiring faction was revived, and united and perpetuated . . . The speed of the zealous missionary was promoted by the fleetest dromedaries of a devout chief of the Arabs; the doctrine and discipline of the Jacobites were secretly established in the dominions of Justinian, and each Jacobite was compelled to violate the laws, and to hate the Roman legislator." The number of clergy ordained by him is stated to have reached the incredible number of 80,000. John of Ephesus stretches it to 100,000 (Land, Anecdotes. Syr. ii. 251), comprising eighty-nine bishops and two patriarchs. The wonderful success of his missionary labours in reviving the moribund Monophysite church excited the indignation of the emperor and of the Catholic bishops. Orders were issued for his apprehension; rewards were offered for his capture. But, in his beggar's garb, aided by the friendliness of the Arab tribes and their chiefs and the people of Syria and Asia, he eluded all attempts to seize him, and outlived Justinian, and his equally orthodox successor, Justinian II., into the reign of Tiberius. The longer of the two lives of James, by John of Ephesus (Land, u. s. pp. 364-383), must be consulted for the extent and variety of his missionary labours, as well as for the miracles which illustrated them. Among these a devout credulity reckons wonders of no ordinary kind. The dead were raised to life, the blind were restored to sight, rain was given, and even the sun was made to stand still lest the holy man should be benighted (ibid. pp. 372, 373, 377, 379 sqq.). Edessa, when attacked by Chosroes I., after the capture of Batnae and the other towns on the Euphrates, was saved by the prayers of James, who providentially happened to be in the city. Chosroes was scared by a terrific vision, and gave up the siege (ibid. p. 380 sq.). The biography in fact bristles with wonders.

But however marvellous his success as a propagator of the faith, James failed miserably when he attempted to govern the vast and heterogeneous body he had created and organized. The simplicity and innocence of his character, as described by his contemporary, John of Ephesus (H. E. iv. 15), suspecting no evil because he intended none, disqualified him for rule, and put him in the power of "crafty and designing men about him, who turned him every way they chose, and used him as a means of establishing their own powers, swaying him now in this direction, now in that, like a child." The unhappy dissensions between him and the bishops he had ordained, and among the rival nationalities who regarded him as their spiritual father, threw a cloud over the closing portion of James's long life. The internecine strife between the different sections of the Monophysite party is fully detailed by John of Ephesus, who records with bitter lamentation the blows, fighting, murders, and other deeds "so insensate and unrestrained that Satan and his herds of demons alone could rejoice in them, wrought on both sides by the two factions with which the believers—so unworthy of the name—were rent," provoking "the contempt and ridicule of heathens, Jews, and heretics" (Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. c. 30). For a full account of these miserable religious squabbles between members of the same schismatical body, we must refer our readers to John of Ephesus' History (Payne Smith's translation, pp. 48 sqq., 81 sqq., 274 sqq.).

One of these party squabbles was that between James and the bishops Conon and Eugenius, whom he had ordained at Alexandria—the former for the Isaurian Seleucia, the latter for Tarsus—who became the founders of the obscure and short-lived sect of the "Cononites," or, from the monastery at Constantinople to which a section of them belonged, "Conobandites" (John of Ephesus, H. E. i. 31, v. 1-12; Payne Smith's trans. pp. 49-65). [CONON.] Each anathematized the other, James denouncing Conon and his companion as "Tritheists," and they retaliating by the stigma of "Sabellian." On the dispute being laid before Justinian he is reported to have said, "How can I hope to set you at peace with others when you are divided among yourselves?" (Bar-Hebraeus, Chronicon, pp. 214 sq.)

A still longer and more wide-spreading difference arose between James and Paul, whom he had ordained patriarch of Antioch on the death of Sergius of Tela, who had succeeded the notorious Severus, the real founder of the Monophysite heresy. Whether Sergius also was ordained by James admits of question. Abbeoos and Lamy, in the notes to their edition of Bar-

Hebraeus (p. 214), say that it cannot be admitted, since Sergius was ordained on the death of Severus at Alexandria, in 539, and James had not then himself received episcopal orders. Le Quien also states that Sergius was ordained by John of Anazarbus, A.D. 539, with the title of patriarch of Antioch (Oriens Christian. tom. ii. col. 1347). It is however distinctly asserted by John of Ephesus (Land. ii. 256, 370), and he can hardly have been mistaken on such a fact. The chronology of this period is very uncertain. However this may have been, there is no doubt that on Sergius' death within three years Paul was ordained his successor by James, assisted by Eugenius and Thomas of Edessa (Or. Christ. u. s. 1358; Land, u. s. p. 371; Asseman, Bibl. Orient. ii. 331). [PAULUS, Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch.] The circumstances of this quarrel, by which "the church of the believers"—i.e. the Monophysites—"was split into two parts, and both sides entered upon unappeasable wars and contentions one with the other" (John of Eph. H. E. i. 41, p. 81) were briefly these:—

Paul and the other three leading bishops of the Monophysites having been summoned to Constantinople under colour of taking measures for restoring unity to the church, on proving obstinate in their adherence to their own creed, were thrown into prison, where they were detained for a considerable time, and subjected to the harshest treatment. This prolonged persecution broke their spirit, and one by one they all yielded, and accepted the communion of John the patriarch of Constantinople, and the "Synodites," as the adherents of the Chalcedonian decrees were contemptuously termed by their opponents, "lapsing miserably into the communion of the two natures" (ibid. i. 41; ii. 1-9; iv. 15). Paul, stung with remorse for this cowardly act of treachery, escaped from the palace where he was kept under surveillance, and made his way into Arabia, taking refuge with Mondir, the son and successor of Harith. On hearing of his defection James had at once indignantly cut Paul off from communion; but at the end of three years, on receiving the assurance of his contrition, his act of penitence having been laid before the synod of the Monophysite church of the East, he was duly and canonically restored to communion by James, who notified the fact by encyclic letters (ibid. iv. 15). Paul's rehabilitation caused great indignation at Alexandria, where he was well—some asserted too well—known, being a native of the city and formerly synecellus to the patriarch Theodosius. They clamoured for his deposition, which was carried into effect by Peter, the intruded patriarch, in violation of all canonical order; the patriarch of Antioch, which it will be remembered was Paul's position in the Monophysite communion, owning no allegiance to his brother prelate of Alexandria. "Nor did the fact," writes John of Ephesus, "of his having no legal rights himself, restrain him from this piece of audacity" (ibid. iv. 16). Once again James shewed his pliancy to the influence of those about him. He allowed himself to be persuaded that if he were to visit Alexandria the veneration felt for his age and services would bring to an end the unhappy dissension already existing between the churches of Syria and Egypt, and though he had denounced Peter, both orally and in writing, as a spiritual adulterer for invading a see already canonically occupied, he was induced not only to hold communion with him, but to draw up instruments of concord and to give his formal assent to the act of deposition of Paul, only stipulating that it should not be accompanied by any act of excommunication (ibid. c. 17). James's evil counsellors having persuaded the unsuspecting old man to do all they desired, allowed him to return to Syria, accompanied by three of the suffragans of Alexandria to confirm the account of what had passed there. The intelligence was received with indignation and dismay in Syria, and though some acquiesced in what had been done out of respect to their aged metropolitan, the majority rejected the whole as uncanonical and invalid. The schism which resulted between the adherents of James and Paul, A.D. 576, "spread like an ulcer" through the whole of the East, and declared itself with especial violence in Constantinople. In vain did Paul again and again entreat James to discuss the matters at issue between them calmly, promising to abide by the issue. In vain did Mondir put himself forward as a peacemaker. The simple old man was but a puppet in the hands of interested parties, who, conscious of the weakness of their cause, shrunk from investigation, and caused an obstinate refusal to be returned to all overtures of accommodation (ibid. cc. 20, 21). Equally fruitless was the attempt of Longinus the leading bishop of the Monophysites of Egypt, and the consecrator of the patriarch Theodore, to put an end to the quarrel by a judicial examination. With this view he visited Syria, accompanied by Theodore and other men of weight, and conferred with Mondir, but the partisans of James utterly rejected his mediation, and having deceitfully invited him to the convent of Mar-Ananias under colour of holding a private consultation with James, it was with difficulty he escaped with his life from the turbulent mob he found awaiting him (ibid. c. 22). Barhebraeus says that the purpose of this assemblage was the election of a patriarch in Paul's room, but that some of the bishops objecting that he was still alive, and had never been canonically deposed, it broke up without doing anything. Wearied out at last with the deepening strife, and feeling the necessity of taking some decided step for putting an end to the violence and bloodshed which was raging unchecked, the old man suddenly declared his intention of going to Alexandria. His avowed object was what all desired, the restoration of peace to the sorely divided church, but the means by which he proposed to effect this were kept a secret. Some said he was going in conjunction with Damianus, who had succeeded Peter as patriarch of Alexandria, to consecrate a new patriarch for Syria in the place of Paul; others on the contrary that he was going to propose terms of accommodation with Paul and his adherents; but whatever his plans were, they were never disclosed. Alexandria was never reached. For on the arrival of the party, numbering eight, including several bishops, at the monastery of Cassianus or Mar-Romanus on the Egyptian frontier, a deadly sickness attacked them, which within twelve days carried off, first, one of the bishops who accompanied him, who was also abbat of Cartamin in Mesopotamia, then his own syncellus Sergius, and then, after three days' illness, James himself, and finally the deacon who attended on him. On the news of the sickness reaching Alexandria, Damianus with his clergy, hastened to the monastery, but arrived after the old man's death. His desire to carry off James's remains as a sacred treasure was thwarted by the members of the convent, who refused to part with them. The suddenness and strangeness of the fatality led to many surmises; some regarding it as a Divine judgment, others as an act of mercy, God taking him to Himself, that if he were meditating any step that would increase the troubles of the Church, "the soul of the pious old man might not suffer loss" (ibid. c. 33). The story set about by the enemies of Paul, that James's death was caused by some of his partisans, who by his command attacked him and his companions, beating them with staves, and stoning them, and that they were just able to creep to the monastery and die there, is indignantly rejected by John of Ephesus. The other report that the ship in which the party sailed from Syria was overwhelmed by a storm and sunk, is not absolutely rejected by him, though he thinks that the evidence for it is weak (ibid. iv. 38, 58). The date of his death is given by Assemani, July 30, 578 A.D. His episcopate is said to have extended over 37 years, and his life, according to Renaudot (Lit. Or. ii. 342) to 73 years.

A liturgy bearing the name of "Jacobus Bordayaeus" is given by Renaudot (Lit. Or. tom. ii. pp. 332-341), who confuses him, as Baronius also does (ad. ann. 535), with Jacobus Baradaeus. That this liturgy is correctly assigned to the Jacobite church, is proved by the special memorial of their founder, "memento Domine omnium pastorum et doctorum ecclesiae orthodoxae . . . praecipue vero Jacobi Bordaei," as well as by the special condemnation of those who "impiously blasphemed the Incarnation of the Word, and divided the union in nature (unionem in natura) with the flesh taken from the holy mother of God" (ibid. 337, 338).

The Catechesis, the chief dogmatical formulary of the Jacobites, "totius fidei Jacobiticae norma et fundamentum" (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 524), though adjudged to be his by Cave, Abraham Ecchellensis, and others; together with the Encomium in Jacobitas, and an Arabic Homily on the Annunciation, are discredited by Assemani on philological and chronological grounds. JACOBUS (24) EDESSENUM, the Commentator, or Interpreter of Books (ܝܚܝܘܢ ܕܟܬܘܒܝܢ), "one of the ablest and most versatile men of his age, an accomplished Greek scholar, acquainted with Hebrew, a theologian, historian, philosopher, and grammarian, a hard student, and practical man of the world" (Wright).

From Barhebraeus (ap. Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 336) we learn that he was born at 'Indobo, a town in Gâmêh, one of the districts of Antioch. While yet a mere youth he resigned wealth and position, and became a monk, doubtless with the intention of devoting himself wholly to the pursuit and advancement of knowledge. After studying the Greek language and the Scriptures in the monastery of Aftânoyo (Aphthonios) at Qinnésrîn, Jacobus proceeded to Alexandria; and having availed himself to the full of the means of instruction afforded by that famous centre of oriental and western ideas, he returned to Syria, and settled at 'Urhoi (whence Orrhoêne and Osrhoêne) better known as Edessa (a classicized form of ܐܕܫܐ 'Ôdsâ) and Orfah (ܐܪܦܐ) of which city he was ordained bishop in A.D. 651 (Dionysius in Chron.). About four years later Jacobus retired from his see, in consequence of the insubordination of certain of his clergy. He had also been engaged unsuccessfully in a warm dispute with the patriarch Julius and other bishops, concerning the observance of the canons. An aged monk named Habib was consecrated as his successor, and Jacobus withdrew first to Kîshûm (ܟܝܫܘܡ), a monastery between Berea and Edessa, and then to Eusebona in the region of Antioch, where he stayed eleven years, expounding the Psalms and studying the Greek Scriptures. From that retreat he once more migrated to the neighbouring Tel'ada, where he spent nine years, occupying himself chiefly with his critical labours upon the books of the Old Testament. On the death of Habib, the people of Edessa besought the patriarch to induce Jacobus to return to them. Only four months after this reinstatement, Jacobus died at Tel'ada, whether he had gone to fetch his books, June 5, A.D. 708 (or 710, Dionysius). Dionysius relates that he had taken a leading part in a synod convoked A.D. 706 by Julianus the patriarch of the Jacobites. Assemani throws doubt upon this statement, apparently without good reason. That Jacobus was a Monophysite there can be little question, notwithstanding Assemani's endeavours to refute Renaudot. (Liturg. Orient. ii. 380, Bibl. Or. i. 470-474.)

The letters of Jacobus addressed to John the Stylite (vid. no. dcccvii. in Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS.), prove that Renaudot was correct. Thus in Epist. 10 Jacobus says that to answer a certain question he would require to have by him all the writings of the principal fathers, Athanasius, Basil, the two Gregories, John (Chrysostom), Cyril (of Alexandria), Severus, Ephraim, Xenaias, and Jacob (Sarugensis). Here, as in another passage which Assemani tries to explain away, Jacobus ranks the heresiarchs Severus and Philoxenus with the great doctors of the church. And in Epist. 14 he thus answers the question who was Peter the patriarch of Antioch, whom the "heretics" called the Fuller, and why he got this name: "he was called . . . fuller because his ancestors had been fullers by trade. The Chalcedonian heretics now style him Fuller by way of contumely." Lastly, in no. dcccclxxii. there is an extract from a letter of "Mar Jacob of Edessa to the deacon Barhad b'shabbo against the Chalcedonians;" i.e. against those who upheld the authority of the council and decrees of Chalcedon.

Writings.—"Ex infinitis propemodum Jacobi scriptis," says Assemani, "haec duntaxat ad nostram notitiam pervenerunt." But although much has perished, enough survives to enable us to estimate the position of Jacobus in Syriac literature.

I. As a translator of Greek works he was indefatigable. Barhebraeus states that he made a Syriac version of the Homilies of Gregory Nazianzen. In A.D. 701 (according to the Vatican Cod. Nitr. 31) Jacobus translated the Δόγματα ἐπιθρόνου or Festal Homilies of Severus. This work exists in a MS. of the British Museum, no. dclxxxv. (Wright) dated A.D. 868. There are 125 homilies arranged in three books. A scholion on the word Hosanna implies an acquaintance with Hebrew. "The Greeks said שְׁמַחָתָא (WCCANNA) for שְׁמַחָתָא, sounding Semchath and Nun twice, because they could not pronounce Shin and 'Ayin," cf. also another Scholion, "Concerning the august and, according to the Hebrews, separated name . . . שְׁמַחָתָא (שְׁמַחָתָא)." A table is given, which is interesting as it bears on the pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton (יהוה). Jacobus and his teachers appear to have said Yehyeh (cf. Exod. iii. 14).

His translation of certain treatises of Aristotle proves the interest which Jacobus felt in philosophy proper. Assemani mentions a Vatican Cod. Syr. xxxvi. entitled "The Categories and Περὶ ἐρμηνείας and Analytic of Aristotle;" a note in which states that it was "Interpreted by St. Jacob the metropolitan of the city of Edessa." It is a translation, with notes, and a life of Aristotle. Jacobus also wrote Commentaries (ܩܘܿܠܘܿܬܐ) on the Isagoge of Porphyry, which had been translated into Syriac by Athanasius, afterwards patriarch of the Jacobites, in A.D. 645. And there is in the British Museum collection a tract (Wr. no. dcccxl.) discussing φύσις (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ), οὐσία (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ), ὑπόστασις (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ), τὸ εἶναι (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ), πρόσωπον (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ), and εἶδος (ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ).

II. As a liturgical writer Jacobus edited the order of Baptism of Severus, and made a new recension of his hymns. The latter is contained in no. ccccxxi. (Wr.) dated A.D. 675, and not improbably an autograph of Jacobus. A note states that "Jacob Philoponus revised and corrected these hymns, 365 in number, whereof 295 are by Severus, in the year of the Greeks 986." See also Codd. ccccxxii. and ccccxl. Cf. also a note in the Vatican Cod. Syr. xv.; "All the hymns, then, of the holy Mar Severus in this book are 295. But the rest are of John bar Aftūnoy, abbat of Qinnessin, and another John, abbat of the same house, and of others whose names are unknown; according to the recension of Mar Paulus and Mar Jacob Ūrhoḡo."

Jacobus, further, revised the old text of the Anaphora of St. James "the brother of the Lord;" see no. cclxxxvi. (10th cent.), and Vatic. Cod. Syr. 35; compiled another Anaphora, beginning "God, father of all, and lord of lords!" published in Latin by Renaudot, Lit. Or. ii. 371; and an order for the consecration of water (Wr. no. cclxxxvii. m.); arranged the Horologium, see no. ccccxciii. (services for the canonical hours of the ferial days); expounded the Order of Baptism (no. cclxxxvii. 1, j. a fragment), and drew up that which is used in the rituals of the Maronites and Jacobites, beginning

ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ ܘܿܫܘܿܬܐ. Jacobus also expounded the Syriac Liturgy (Cod. id.). Assemani (B. O. i. 479 sqq.) has printed this work, from from a somewhat different text. Lastly Jacobus drew up ecclesiastical canons, and sent them to his correspondents John the Stylite and Addai the presbyter: see no. cclxxxvi. (Wright, Cat.)

III. But the fame of Jacobus of Edessa rested chiefly upon his Scholia and Commentaries on the Scriptures. The British Museum possesses several MSS. of the former, viz. no. dccvi. (9th or 10th cent.) containing extracts from Scholia on Genesis, 1 Samuel, and the two books of Kings; and no. dcccxi. 75, 77 (dated A.D. 874). Dr. Phillips has published a number of these extracts in a work entitled 'Scholia on passages of the Old Testament, by Mar Jacob bishop of Edessa. The Syriac text with English Translation and Notes' (London, 1864).

There is also a Cod. dcccliii. which (No. 13) contains "Jacob of Urhoi on Paradise, the Creation of Adam," &c., and Scholia on passages in Kings, Zechariah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, &c. But these are the merest wreck of labours which included the whole of the Scriptures. A Vatican MS. (Cod. Syr. iii.) states that the Scholia and Commentaries together came to 2860!

The expositions of Jacobus display a thorough knowledge of the sacred text. Though fond of allegory, he does not allow that tendency to override and exclude the natural meaning. Nor was he over-anxious to extend the sphere of the miraculous. His common sense and moderation appear in the Scholia on Gen. xxiii. 13 and 1 Kings xvii. 4-6. In the former he thinks that the ram was neither a special creation nor a phantom, but a stray from a flock grazing somewhere on the mountain; in the latter that the ravens were ordinary birds and not angels, as some idly told; and the food they brought Elijah was common food, set before them at God's command by one of the prophets. In allegorizing the story, Jacobus makes the unclean birds which ministered represent "those priests who, although of impure races, are accounted worthy to act as priests in the holy and heavenly sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ."

IV. Jacobus also laboured greatly to restore his native tongue, the Syriac, to its original purity. It was largely due to his efforts in this direction that the dialect of Edessa became recognized as the standard of elegance. He was the first to write a Syriac grammar, and his work, which he called (ܐܘܢܝ ܡܫܢܐ)

ܐܘܢܝ ܡܫܢܐ, "An Emendation of the Syriac Language," is much quoted by all other Syrian grammarians, and especially by Barhebraeus in his great grammar the Book of Splendours (ܚܘܚܐ ܕܩܘܢܝܐ), wherein he calls Jacobus

ܚܘܚܐ ܕܩܘܢܝܐ, Saint. Unhappily only a very small portion of the work survives (Wr. no. dcccxcvi., two vellum leaves of 9th or 10th cent.). In it Jacobus illustrated his invention of a new set of vowel signs for the Syriac language. They were to be written not above and below but, like the Greek vowels, in the same line with the consonants. The new symbols were these:

ā	ē	ē	ī	ī	ū	ū

and Olaf ʾ was to be used for ā (ō).

Barhebraeus gives these seven new signs in his Book of Splendours, pt. 4, ch. 2. He says, "Paul of Antioch, a Syrian presbyter (aware that even the Greeks originally had a defective writing, since they had only seventeen signs, and afterwards characters were gradually added, until with twenty-four signs their writing reached perfection;) asked St. Jacob of Edessa that he too might supplement the defects of the Syrian writing. The saint answered him, 'Many before thee and me have entertained this wish; but to avoid destruction of the books written in the defective character, this useful work was let alone.'" Jacobus, however, sent the above seven characters in the same epistle to Paul of Antioch.

It has also been thought that the introduction of the Greek vowel signs, commonly used in Syriac books, must be ascribed to Jacobus of Edessa. The earliest examples of their use in the Nitrian MSS. of the British Museum, occur in codices of his works (Wr. nos. ccccxxi. and lx., dated A.D. 719). See Abbé Martin, Jacques d'Edesse et les Voyelles Syriennes.

Jacobus, further, gave much attention to the kindred subject of the Syriac Massora. In no. clxii, a Biblical MS. of the 9th or 10th cent., reference is frequently made in the margin to his orthographical variations of reading, thus: ܐܘܢܝ ܡܫܢܐ "the Saint" (Abbé Martin). Cf.

Histoire de la Ponctuation ou de la Massore chez les Syriens, par l'Abbé Martin, Paris, 1875; and A Letter by Mar Jacob, bishop of Edessa, on the Syriac Orthography (by G. Phillips, D.D., London, 1869), which letter the Abbé Martin also has edited (Jacobi Edesseni episcopi epistola, Paris, 1869). The original is contained in the same Cod. clxii. 2, 1, and is addressed to George bishop of Sarug. It is followed by a treatise on the tenses, persons, genders, diacritical marks, and signs of punctuation, which has also been published by the same editors; and by another tract on the accents or signs of punctuation, illustrating the proper modes of writing them. (See Appendix of the above work of Dr. Phillips.)

V. Of the Chronicle which Jacobus wrote in continuation of the work of Eusebius, no copy is known to exist. Ebedjesu (Cat. 106) says: "Jacob the Edessene wrote | Concerning times, and a chronicle." In the British Museum there is a fragmentary Cod. (no. dcccxxi. 10th or 11th cent.) entitled that is, "Chronicle subsequent to that of Eusebius of Caesarea; composed by Jacob the lover of toil." It begins, "Whereas Eusebius of Pamphilius, bishop of Caesarea Stratonis in Palestine, composed a chronicle great and universal and renowned, with all care and diligence, and with as much research as was possible to a man, in order to reach and grasp remote ages." The introduction consisted of four sections. The first was "concerning the canon which Eusebius made, and the three years whereby he falsified his computation." The second treated of the dynasties contemporary with the Roman empire, but omitted by Eusebius. The third set forth what dynasties were co-ordinated by Jacobus with the Roman empire, and the fourth gave a separate chronology of each dynasty. Then followed the chronological canon, beginning with Olympiad cclxxvi., and ending in this MS. with Ol. ccclii. The last monarchs mentioned are Heraclius I., Ardeshir III., and Abubecr the successor of Mahomet.

VI. In his old age Jacobus published a new recension of the Old Testament. Cod. no. lx. (Wr. Cat.) contains the books of Samuel, and part of 1 Kings. It is of the date A.D. 719 or earlier. A note at the end of 1 Samuel runs: "This first book of Kings was corrected so far as possible, and with much labour, from the various versions of the Syrians and Greeks, by the hand of the holy Jacob bp. of Urhoi, in the year 1016 of the Greeks (A.D. 705) in the great convent of Tel'ada." No. xi. contains Isaiah. Barhebraeus notices Jacob's various readings in the Psalms.

VII. JACOBUS Edessenus was a great letter-writer. His chief correspondents were John the Stylite of ܝܘܨܬܐ, Eustathius of Dara, Addai the presbyter, and George bishop of Sarug. The Cod. no. dccvii. (Wr. Cat.) contains about twenty-six epistles more or less perfect. The first is part of a long poem in heptasyllables, and now begins: "God creates by his power | And nature as commanded | And mind observeth nature." It is followed by six others, addressed to Eustathius. This MS. also has sixteen letters to John the Stylite. The first invites questions (edited with trans. and notes by R. Schröter, Zeitschr. Morg. Gesellsch. xxiv. p. 261); the rest are occupied with answers on various points of history and theology. Epist. 12 was published in the Journal of Sacr. Lit. 4 ser. x. p. 430.

Jacobus Edessenus has been confounded with Jacobus Nisibenus (Masius; Hottinger), and with Jacobus Sarugensis (Baronius; Nairon, Index ad Eupol.; Cave ii., 110).

JACOBUS (29) ST., twenty-fourth bishop of Toul, present at the council of Compiègne in 757 (Mansi, xii. 757, 675; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 757, xv. tom. v. 564; Patr. Lat. xvi. 1516). From the description appended to his signature, "Episc. de monasterio Gamundias," it seems that he was at this time abbat of St. Guemund in the diocese of Metz, but whether he governed the monastery at the same time with the see of Toul, as the authors of the Gallia Christiana (xiii. 960) believe, or resigned the see first, which is Le Cointe's view (765 xx.), is doubtful. He is said to have died about 767 at Dijon, where he had stayed to pray at the tomb of St. Benignus. He was buried there near the shrine, and is commemorated June 23. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iv. 583.) JACOBUS (34), a presbyter recommended by Ambrose to Severus, a bishop in Campania. (Ambros. Ep. 59, p. 1016; Ceillier, v. 499.) [C. H.]

JACOBUS (35), a reader accused of fornication. (Theophil. Alexand. Commonit. can. v. in Labbe, ii. 1800.) [T. W. D.]

JACOBUS (36), a young man whose name usually occurs with that of Timasius. They had been persuaded by Pelagius to embrace a monastic life, and they brought under the notice of Augustine a book written by him. His answer consists of the book entitled De Naturâ et Gratia, which was written A.D. 415. It had the effect of convincing Jacobus and Timasius of the errors of Pelagius, a result for which they expressed their gratitude in a letter to Augustine, which is quoted at length in his work de Gestis Pelagii, Aug. 168, 177; Epp. 179, 2-10, 186; de Gest. Pelag. 10, 23, 24.

A person named Jacobus is also mentioned in a letter of Augustine to Christinus (Ep. 256). [H. W. P.]

JACOBUS (37), a deacon and "archimandrite of the Syrians" at Constantinople. (Labbe, iv. 232 c.) [FAUSTUS (28).] [C. G.]

JACOBUS (38) ST., a disciple of St. Maro, whose austerities he surpassed. Many miracles of healing are related of him. He lived in the 5th century. (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. xxi. in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxii. 1431; Ceillier, x. 20.) [I. G. S.]

JACOBUS (39), surnamed THE PERSIAN, a follower of Julian the Ascetic. (Theod. Rel. Hist. cap. 2, in Pat. Gr. lxxxii. 1310 c, 1311 B), and afterwards of Eusebius of Mount Coryphe, in the fifth century (ib. cap. 4, p. 1346 c.) [EUSEBIUS (118).] [C. H.]

JACOBUS (40), deacon of Heliopolis or of Edessa, the author of the life of Pelagia, an actress and courtesan at Antioch, converted by Nonnus, then bishop of Heliopolis. The date of this conversion may probably be placed in the second half of the 5th century [see PELAGIA]. A deacon of Edessa signed the address of the clergy in favour of Ibas (Labbe, iv. 669), who, if we accept Baronius's view, was probably the same with the biographer of Pelagia. [E. V.]

JACOBUS (41), abbat of Llancarvan, Glamorganshire, and called "governor of the altar of St. Cadoc," ruled apparently in the lifetime of St. Cadoc, in the 6th century. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 354 n. 390; Lib. Landav. by Rees, 381-7.) [J. G.]

JACOBUS (42) DIACONUS (JAMES THE DEACON), one of the companions of Paulinus, the first bishop of York, especially when he was baptizing in the Trent (Bede, H. E. ii. 16). When Paulinus returned to Kent, in A.D. 633, James was left behind, the sole relic apparently of the mission. He chiefly resided, as Bede says, at a village near Catterick, which bore his name. He did a great work in teaching and baptizing. When peace was restored to Northumbria, and the troubles resulting from Edwin's death were over, James exercised, with great success, his power of teaching, singing, and church music among the increasing congregations; indeed he was the first to introduce the Kentish or Roman manner of singing in the Northumbrian church (H. E. ii. 20; iv. 2). In A.D. 664 James was present, on the side of Wilfrid, at the great conference at Whitby (Id. iii. 25). Bede (who was born in A.D. 673) says that James survived, full of years and good works, to his own time (Id. ii. 16, 20).

Smith, the editor of Bede, conjectures that the Yorkshire village in which James chiefly resided was Aikburgh (Jake's burgh or town), a few miles south of Catterick (p. 102). This is probable enough. A little further south is the village of Haukswell, which may perhaps be Jake's Well. In the churchyard there is an early cross covered with interlacing work, on the base of which Mr. D. H. Haigh thought he could trace the words Haec est crux Sti Jacobi (adopted by Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. 68). This, however, has been doubted. [J. R.]

JACOBUS (43) O'FARANNAN, "the greatest preacher in his time," died A.D. 746. (Ann. Ul.) [J. G.]

JACOBUS (45), June 11, martyr at Milevis under Florus in the Diocletian persecution. [INNOCENTIUS (25).] [MATRONA.] (De Rossi, Bull. 1875, p. 162; 1876, p. 59; 1877, p. 97.) [G. T. S.]

JACOBUS (46)—March 22. Presbyter and martyr of Thelscialila, or the village of Scialila, on a tell or hill above the Euphrates in Persia, with his sister Maria a nun. He suffered under Sapor II., A.D. 346. See Assemani (AA. MM. i. 121) and Ceillier (iii. 333). He is apparently the presbyter and martyr of Telatha-Schelila, under the same king, mentioned in Wright's Syr. Mart. but without a day. [G. T. S.]

JACOBUS (47), the name of a presbyter of Seleucia, and also of a deacon, martyred under Sapor, mentioned, but without a day, in Wright's Syr. Mart. [G. T. S.]

JACOBUS (48), surnamed ZELOTES—Nov. 1. Presbyter and martyr in Persia, under Sapor, with Joannes a bishop. (Mart. Rom.; Bas. Men.; Assem. AA. MM. Orient. i. 102.) [G. T. S.]

JACOBUS (49), presbyter, martyr in Persia in the reign of Sapor, with the bishops Melisius and Acepimas. He was commemorated on April 22. (Usuard. Mart.; Baron. A. E. ann. 344, xvi.; Mart. Roman.) [C. H.]

JACOBUS (50)—Nov. 27. A Persian martyr under king Isdigerd I., or his son Vararanes IV., cir. 420. (Mart. Rom.; Bas. Men.; Assem. AA. MM. i. 242; Natal. Alex. H. E. saec. v. cap. 1.; Fleury, H. E. lib. xxiv. s. 26.)

[G. T. S.]

JACOBUS (51), deacon, martyr with Mari-anus, a reader at Lambesa in Numidia. He was commemorated on April 30. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Roman.) [C. H.]

JACOBUS (52), Aug. 9, one of the ten martyrs for the image of Christ under Leo Isaurus. (Sirlet. Menol. Graecorum; Baron. Ann. 726, xiii.)

[C. H.]

JACOBUS (53), governor of Cappadocia, addressed by Gregory Nazianzen, cir. 380, on behalf of Simplicia (ep. 207 al. 146, and ep. 208 al. 147, but uncertain; Tillem. ix. 548, 726; Ceill. v. 254).

[C. H.]

JACOBUS (54), count. [CYRILLUS (7), vol. i. p. 768, col. 2.] (Mansi, Concil. iv. 1398 b, d.)

[C. H.]

JACOBUS (55) CILIX, surnamed PSY-CHRISTUS (Chron. Pasch. s. a. 467). [ISOCASIUS.]

JACOBUS (56), protospatharius, confessor for images under Leo IV. Chazar in 780 (Theoph. p. 382). [IRENE (10).] [C. H.]

JADER, bishop of Midila, in Numidia (an inscription has "Veteranorum Medilitanorum"). His name is Punic; it is supposed by Morcelli (Afr. Chr. i. 226) to be the same as IAR, of which he gives an instance from an inscription. But in Gruter, Inscr. p. cccclxx. 1, occurs the name itself, "Jader Jummon." (Cypr. Sentt. Episc. 40, epp. 76, 79; August. de Bapt. lib. vii. c. 9.) [E. W. B.]

JAENBERT (JAMBERT, JAINBERT, JANIBERT, LAMBERT, GENGBERHT), the thirteenth archbishop of Canterbury. Before his promotion to the archiepiscopate he had been abbat of St. Augustine's, to which office, according to the Canterbury historians, he was appointed in the year 760, on the death of Aldhun the ninth abbat, and blessed by archbishop Bregwin. (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 319; Thorn, ap. Twysden, c. 1775.) The attestation of Jaenbert as abbat is appended to four charters, also attested by archbishop Bregwin, and all of them somewhat suspected. They are (1) the grant of land at Sarr to Sigeburga abbess of Minster (Kemble, C. D. 106; Elmham, p. 322), dated in the thirty-sixth year of Eadbert, who is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have died in 748, but here seems to be reigning in 761; (2) a grant of the same king to Jaenbert himself and the monastery of St. Augustine's (Kemble, C. D. 107; Elmham, p. 319) of land at Mundingham (cf. Thorn, ap. Twysden, 1775); and bearing the same date; (3) the charter of Dunweald, the thegn of king Ethelbert, who grants property at Queengate (K. C. D. 109; Elmham, 326) to St. Augustine's; this is dated 762; and (4) an undated confirmation by a king named Eanmund of a grant by Sigiraed, king of half Kent, to Rochester, not dated, but attested by Bregwin. (K. C. D. 114; Mon. Angl. i. 163.) These charters do not throw any real light on the date of Jaenbert's promotions. Archbishop Bregwin died in August 765 [BREGWIN], and, when it was found that he had been buried at Christ Church, contrary to the right and privilege asserted by St. Augustine's as the place of burial for kings and archbishops, Jaenbert is said to have determined to appeal to Rome. According to this story, which in its details is certainly of late authority, the monks of Christ Church, in order to avoid the appeal, elected Jaenbert to the archiepiscopal see. (Elmham, p. 330; Thorn, c. 1775.)

The consecration of Jaenbert is recorded in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (A.D. 763, M. H. B. 333) as having taken place forty days after mid-winter, in the year following his predecessor's death, and therefore, if the computation of Bregwin's death be correct, in the year 766. Elmham, however, dates the event on Jan. 8. Feb. 2 in 766 was a Sunday, and on that day probably Jaenbert was consecrated, possibly by archbishop Egberht of York, possibly by his own provincial bishops; as this was the first case in which the archbishop of York possessed the pall since the days of Honorius and Paulinus, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he acted on the occasion.

There is a charter dated 765 in which Jaenbert appears (Gengberhtus) as archbishop, but it is of very questionable authority. (K. C. D. 113; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 403.)

Of the early years of Jaenbert's episcopate we have very few data. The kingdom of Kent was broken up among a variety of claimants, in the West Saxon, East Saxon, and Mercian interests, and Jaenbert probably was more powerful in his ecclesiastical position than any single pretender to royalty. It may have been now that the archbishops first assumed the right of coining their own money; Jaenbert, at any rate, is the first archbishop of Canterbury, any of whose mintage has been preserved. (Hawkins, Silver Coinage, ed. Kenyon, p. 102.)

In the first year after his consecration Jaenbert received the pall from pope Paul I. (Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 544), and as the four bishops, Ethelbert of York, Alhmund of Hexham, Aluberht the missionary to Old Saxony, and Ceolwulf of Lindsey, are said to have been consecrated on April 24, 767, it is most probable that this was done by Jaenbert immediately after his investiture with that most important emblem (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 663).

The charters of the following years furnish proof of the activity and extensive influence of Jaenbert: they also prove the gradual predominance of Offa and the approach to a state of affairs in which the freedom of the Kentish church would be seriously endangered. As early as 767 the archbishop is found attesting a grant of Offa to Stidberht, in company with two Mercian bishops (K. C. D. 116); in 772 he attests two grants of Offa, one to St. Augustine's (K. C. D. 119), and another to the bishop of Selsey (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402). In 774, the year to which Florence of Worcester refers the great defeat of the Kentish men by the Mercians at Otford (M. H. B. 544), Jaenbert is found accepting a grant at Higham in Kent from Offa (K. C. D. 121, 122), and also attesting grants made at Mercian Witenagemots. It is unnecessary to describe the several grants which bear Jaenbert's signature during the following years. Jaenbert was at a council at Brentford in 781, in which some causes connected with Worcester were settled (K. C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439); and after that little is heard of him until the year 786.

It is to these years no doubt that we must fix the growth in Offa's mind of a policy adverse to Jaenbert and the independence of Canterbury. Possibly Jaenbert himself may have taken part with that body of Kentish nobles who afterwards supported Eadbert Praen against Offa. The chronicle under the year 784 mentions the reign of the West Saxon Ealhmund in Kent, and there can be no doubt that Ealhmund in Kent, like his son Egbert in Wessex, represented the patriotic party opposed to Mercian rule. Offa may further have suspected some complicity between Jaenbert, or the West Saxon party in Kent, with Charles the Great, who, during these years, was apparently viewed with jealousy by Offa, and who had informed Adrian I. that the king of Mercia was thinking of unseating the pope himself. (Mon. Carolina, ed. Jaffé, p. 279; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 442.) In the late biography of Offa, it is plainly asserted that Jaenbert had invited Charles to invade England (M. Paris, V. Off. ii. p. 21, ed. Wats); but this testimony is too weak to allow such a charge to be believed, although Charles may have been asked to lend his aid to the Kentish nobles. The result proves that the uneasy relations had been long increasing, and that Offa mistrusted an archbishop who was firmly established outside of his own dominions. He accordingly determined to apply at Rome for the gift of an archiepiscopal pall to Higbert, the bishop of Lichfield, the effect of which would be to cut off the Mercian episcopate from the obedience of the see of Canterbury. The several steps of the negotiation are obscure, and are unfortunately darkened more than was necessary by the attempts made by William of Malmesbury and Matthew Paris to fill up the vacant spaces. It is certain, however, that in the year 786 and 787, two Roman legates, George and Theophylact, visited England, were received by Jaenbert at Canterbury, visited Offa and Eanbald, and propounded a series of canons, which were accepted in provincial councils of both the provinces. In the council of the province of Canterbury Jaenbert sat with twelve bishops; Offa and three or four ealdormen were likewise present. The place of the council, which must be dated in 787, is not given, nor is the division of the province of Canterbury mentioned in the decrees of the council. But the Chronicle, apparently referring to the same assembly, mentions (A.D. 785; M. H. B. 336) a contentious synod at Cealchyth, in which Jaenbert gave up some portion of his bishopric; Higbert was chosen archbishop by Offa, and Egfrid, Offa's son, was consecrated king. It can scarcely be doubted that this was part of the work of the legates; although we have no data as to the exact nature of their share in it, and king Kenulf in writing to pope Leo III. distinctly claims the authority of Adrian for the diminution of the rights of Canterbury. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 522.)

Higbert did not assume the pall at the legate council, so that possibly he may not have received it until 788; from that year he attests charters as archbishop, and as equal in rank, although inferior in seniority, to Jaenbert.

As to the exact number of sees taken from the obedience of Canterbury, we have no contemporary information. William of Malmesbury mentions Worcester, Leicester, Sidnacester, Hereford, Elmham, and Dunwich. (G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 16.)

The following years saw several councils; one at Acleah in 787 (K. C. D. 151). There was apparently one at Cealchyth, Chelsea, in 788 and 789, and many charters were confirmed in both years. (See K. C. D. 152, 153, 155, 156, 157; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 463-466.) No special personal act of Jaenbert is recorded. The exact year of his death is uncertain; the best authority, Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 667), places it in 791; Florence of Worcester and the Chronicler in 790 (M. H. B. 337, 546); Elmham in 789. The day was Aug. 11 (Obit. Cant. in Angl. Sacr. i. 53) or Aug. 12 (Flor. Wig.). Gervase, vol. ii. p. 346, assigns him twenty-seven years, which, dated from 766, brings down his death to 793; but this is not worth considering. The same writer adds that he was buried at St. Augustine's, and Elmham gives his epitaph. (Ed. Hardwick, p. 335.)

JAHABALAHA. [JABALLAHA.]

JAINBERT, JAMBERTH. [JAENBERT.]

JAMBlichus (1), one of the seven sleepers of Ephesus, commemorated on Oct. 23. (Basil. Menol. i. 137.)

[C. H.]

JAMBlichus (2), a celebrated Neoplatonic philosopher, born at Chalcis in Coele-Syria. He lived in the time of Constantine, and did not outlive that emperor, but the exact dates of his birth and death are uncertain. (Zeller puts A.D. 330 as the probable date of his death.) For his life and works see Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 549.

Christianity, never mentioned in the extant works of Jamblichus, is nevertheless a profound moving cause, whether by sympathy or antipathy, of all that he wrote. It would be unjust to deny to Jamblichus some sound elementary ideas on morality and religion, but his pre-determination was to find the sound development of these ideas in all the effete philosophies and religions of his day. He was one of those who endeavour to put new wine into old bottles. His learning was great, but the use to which he was able to turn it was but small. The impulses to beneficent action and to progressive systematic knowledge were clogged and thwarted in him by his obstinate adherence to the old and hitherto dominating systems. That Jamblichus did not become a Christian cannot be imputed to him as a crime; that he travestied history in his life of Pythagoras, in order to find a rival to Christianity, was certainly an offence. His popularity in his own age is easy to understand. He satisfied the conscience of his hearers by the rank which he assigned, and justly assigned, to morality and religion; he flattered their prejudices by teaching them that the dogmas and mysteries of the most venerable forms of religious cultus were the secret and difficult entrance into a true life; he excited their ambition by exhibiting the total results of his researches in the form of a philosophy, which, fantastic and diffuse as it appears to us, who have such good grounds for disbelieving it, must have seemed brilliant and comprehensive to minds that thought contemplation the final good of man, and action a comparatively vulgar and transient thing. Not that Jamblichus is either to be blamed for any excessive subtlety of intellect, or praised for intellectual successes; his whole effort lay in other regions, partly in the inculcation of goodness, but more frequently in the much easier task of inculcating those deceptive imaginations and mystic apparatuses which have mimicked goodness through all human history. We read that Jamblichus personally was of excellent and gentle character; this may be believed. For the philosophical theories of Jamblichus in their more particular detail we must refer to the full and minute account given by Zeller (Die Philosophie der Griechen, vol. v. pp. 613-646.)

JANUARIANUS (1), bishop of Tubulba, or Tubulbaca, in Byzacene, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. Cognit. i. 126.)

[H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (2) or JANUARIUS, bishop of Gisipa Major, in Proconsular Africa, present at the Carthaginian conference (i. 133). (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 420, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (3) or JANUARIUS, Donatist bishop of Casae Nigrae, in Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (i. 10, 14, 149). He was regarded as the primate of the Donatist bishops, taking rank even before Primianus. (Coll. Carth. i. 14; Aug. Ep. 88. Possidius, Indic. Opp. Aug. c. 3.)

[H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (4), Donatist bishop of Auzaga, or Auzagga, in Numidia, who was dead at the time of the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (See Ant. Itin. 30, 36; Ptol. iv. 2-31; and Böcking, Not. Dignit. Occ. pp. 604, 643; Coll. Carth. i. 179.) [PRIVATUS.] [H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (5), Donatist bishop of Tubursicus or Tubursicus, a town of Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411 (Collat. Carth. Cognit. i. 143, 201). (Ptol. iv. 3, 29.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (6), a Donatist bishop, probably the preceding. (Coll. Carth. ii. 251.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIANUS (7), bishop of Mascula in Numidia banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notit. 57; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 215.) [R. S. G.]

JANUARINUS, a monk of the monastery of St. Aurelian, or the Holy Apostles, at Arles, was the author of an epitaph upon Florentinus, the first abbat of his monastery. It may be read, among other places, in Baronius, Annales, an. 553, n. cclv. Januarinus is named in the diptyches which follow the Regula of his monastery (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 397), among the patres and institutores of the foundation, and the authors of the Gallia Christiana (i. 600) doubt whether he should not be included among the abbats. (Cf. Ceillier, xi. 321.) [S. A. B.]

JANUARIUS (1), the first named of eight Numidian bishops to whom in A.D. 253 Cyprian (Ep. 62) sends a large contribution for the relief of Christians whom the barbarians had carried into captivity. The order in which they are named, viz. Januarius, Maximus, Proculus, Victor, Modianus, Nemesianus, Nampulus, Honoratus, corresponds, with one exception, to the order in which they occur in the next list of eighteen Numidian bishops (ubi falso I. Jubaiano) to whom is addressed by Cyprian and the African bishops the synodal reply on the baptism of heretics from the first Carthaginian council on the subject, A.D. 255 (Cyp. Ep. 70). He is probably the bishop of Lambaese who spoke sixth in the third council (A.D. 256), and in this case again is probably the successor of the deposed heretic bishop PRIVATUS, q. v. [E. W. B.]

JANUARIUS (2), ninth of thirty-six bishops of Africa at the council de Basilide. (Cyp. Ep. 67.) [E. W. B.]

JANUARIUS (3), seventeenth of thirty-six bishops of Africa at Syn. Carth. de Basil. (Cyp. Ep. 67). Probably, judging from seniority, the same as twenty-second bishop in fifth council, A.D. 255 (Ep. 70), and same as twenty-third bishop in seventh council (de Bap. Haer. iii. in Sentt. Epp.), where he appears as "Episcopus de Vico Caesaris" in Prov. Byzac. (i. e. Ep. Vicensis, or Itin. Anton. ap. Morcelli, "de Vico Augusti"). [E. W. B.]

JANUARIUS (4) gave thirty-fourth suffrage of eighty-seven bishops in Syn. Carth. de Bap. iii. A.D. 256, as Episcopus Muzulensis (v. l. Mozulensis, &c.), probably of Muzuca, in Prov. Byz. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 238.) [E. W. B.]

JANUARIUS (5), a Numidian bishop in the reign of Constantine. (Aug. Excerpt. de Don. app. vol. ix. p. 729; Mon. Vet. Don. no. 26, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (6), bishop of Jericho, at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 693; Le Quien, iii. 653.) [J. de S.]

JANUARIUS (7), a Donatist minister or bishop, probably the same as JANUARIANUS (3). (Aug. c. Petil. iii. 53, 54.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (8), Donatist bishop of Flumenpiscensis, in Mauretania Sitifensis, associated with Felix of Zaba. (Opt. ii. 18.) [FELIX (185).] [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (9), the name of several bishops present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411, viz. of Tunusuda, or Thunusida, a town probably of Numidia (Plin. H. N. v. 4, 24; Ptol. iv. 3, 30). (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 120.)

(Donatist) Lamasa, Lamasba, or Lamsa, a town of Numidia, eighteen miles from Diana (Ant. Itin. 25-8). (Lamaza) (Coll. Carth. i. 128, 187; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 408, 438, ed. Oberthür.)

Cunculiana, or Cenculiana, in Byzacene. (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 648.)

Aptuca, an African town, called by Pliny Abutuca, either in Proconsular Africa or Numidia. (Coll. Carth. i. 128, 201.)

Casae Medianenses, in Numidia. (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 644; Coll. Carth. i. 135; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 423, ed. Oberthür.)

(Donatist) Numidia, a town in Mauretania Caesariensis. (Coll. Carth. i. 188.)

(Donatist) Aquae Albae, probably in Byzacene. (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 647; Coll. Carth. i. 197.)

(Donatist) Tubursicus. [JANUARIANUS (5).]

(Donatist) Horrea Caelia, a town on the seacoast of Byzacene, eighteen miles north of Hadrumetum (Ant. Itin. 56, 5 [Herklah]). (Coll. Carth. i. 201.)

(Donatist) Centuriona, a town of Numidia (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 644). (Coll. Carth. i. 202.)

(Donatist) Nara, a town of Byzacene, fifteen miles from Sufetula (Ant. Itin. 49, 8). (Coll. Carth. i. 206.)

(Donatist) Betagbara, a place of unknown site in Africa (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 654). (Coll. Carth. i. 206.)

(Donatist) Libertina in Proconsular Africa. (Coll. Carth. i. 116, 201.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (10), one of the bishops who met at the council of Carthage against Pelagius A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 175, 181.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (11), bishop of Aquileia, addressed by Leo the Great in Dec. 447 (Leo Mag. Ep. 18, 729, Migne). His name appears in some MSS. as Julian. Ughelli (Ital. Sacra, v. 25) states that he occupied the see of Aquileia for eight years, but there seems to be no evidence for this. The letter (Leo Mag. Ep. 1, 589) written about A.D. 442 to a bishop of Aquileia, was probably written to a predecessor of this one (cf. also De Rubens, Monumenta Eccl. Aquil. pp. 133-140.) [C. G.]

JANUARIUS (12), thirteenth bishop of Beneventum (Benevento), the celebrated martyr and patron saint of Naples; commemorated on Jan. 19. It has been warmly disputed whether he was a native of Naples or of Beneventum, but little is known of the events of his life. He was put to death at Puteoli, Sept. 19, A.D. 305 (or perhaps 304), by the order of Timotheus, prefect of Campania. It is very doubtful at what date the alleged liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius began, some authorities placing it as early as the 10th century, others as late as the 14th. It was certainly known in the middle of the 15th century. (Boll. Acta SS. 19 Sept. p. 761; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 312, viii. 13; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 13.)

JANUARIUS (13) II, bishop of Beneventum (Benevento), c. A.D. 343, present at the council of Sardinia. (Hilar. Frag. ii. cap. 14 in Pat. Lat. x. 642 B; Athanas. Apol. c. Ar. cap. 50; Mansi, iii. 47; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 15; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 14.)

JANUARIUS (21), first bishop of Alba, afterwards called Viviers, before the 5th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 541.) [R. T. S.]

JANUARIUS (22), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, A.D. 505-515. A letter addressed to him by Theoderic is preserved in Casiodorus. (Variarum, iii. 7; Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. ii. 149-154.) [J. de S.]

JANUARIUS (23), bishop of Vegesela in Numidia, present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 647; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 350.) [R. S. G.]

JANUARIUS (24), bishop of Mascula in Numidia, was present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 647; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 215.) [R. S. G.]

JANUARIUS (25), bishop of Calaris (Cagliari) in Sardinia. He appears to have been a contemporary of Gregory the Great through nearly the whole of his pontificate, and he received a great number of letters from him on a variety of subjects. In the early part of his correspondence the pope thought favourably of the bishop and commended various persons to him (Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 62-64; Migne, lxxvii. 520). Later on he heard complaints against him, and wrote him various letters of censure (Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 49; lib. iii. indict. xi. 36; Migne, lxxvii. 590, 632; Epist. lib. iv. indict. xii. 9, 26; Migne, lxxvii. 675, 694; Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. 1, 2; Migne, lxxvii. 939). In his last letter Gregory praises the bishop for his pastoral zeal (Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. 4, 65; lib. xi. indict. iv. 25; Migne, lxxvii. 941, 1001, 1135). [A. H. D. A.]

JANUARIUS (26), bishop of Malaga. The only information we have about him is derived from a letter of Gregory the Great, written in A.D. 602 or 603, addressed to one John, whom he was sending to Spain with the title of Defensor. From this letter it appears that Januarius had complained to the pope that he had been deprived of his see, and seized and violently carried off out of the church, and another bishop appointed in his place by Comitulus, who was the commander-in-chief in the dominions of the emperor in Spain, and the bishops of his party. The pope directed John to inquire into the matter, and if no crime that deserved exile or deposition was proved against Januarius, to restore him to his see, and to deprive the intruding bishop of his orders, and hand him over to Januarius, that he might either keep him in prison or send him to the pope.

What purports to be the sentence of John is also preserved. After reciting that he had heard the cause, and examined witnesses on both sides, he pronounces that Januarius had done nothing to merit being deprived of his see, and still less being violently removed from the church, and orders that he should be restored, and that the bishops who had opposed him should be punished as the pope's letter had directed, and the intruding bishop deprived of his orders. Florez is, however, inclined to think none of these documents are genuine, but is of opinion that as the forger of them used the name of Comitulus, whom we know to have been a real personage, he also used the name of a real bishop, and that therefore Januarius should be admitted among the bishops of Malaga. (Gams, Series Episc. p. 49; Esp. Sag. xii. 321; S. Greg. Mag. Epist. xiii. ind. vi. eq. 45, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. p. 1250 et seq.; Ceill. Auteurs sacrés, xi. 532.) [F. D.]

JANUARIUS (27), the name of two Byzacene bishops, one of Gattia, the other of Bana, who subscribed the letter of that province A.D. 641 against the Monothelites. (Mansi, x. 927, 928; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 96, 166.) [R. S. G.]

JANUARIUS (28), the name of two bishops in Proconsular Africa, one of Libertini, the other of Musti, present at the council A.D. 646 against the Monothelites. (Mansi, x. 940; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 205.) [R. S. G.]

JANUARIUS (29), one of the seven martyred sons of Felicitas; commemorated on July 10. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (30), one of four subdeacons decapitated at Rome with the martyr bishop Xystus, in the reign of Decius. He was commemorated on Aug. 6. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (31), one of the twelve sons of the centurion Marcellus, martyred with him in Spain under the praeses Agricolaus A.D. 298. (Baron. A. E. 298, ix.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (32), martyred at Cordova, with Faustus and Martialis. He was commemorated on Oct. 13. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [FAUSTUS (19).] [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (33), one of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa, commemorated on April 16. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (34), two presbyters of Elvira, 303, one of Laurus, the other of Barba in Baetica. (Mansi, ii. 108.) [T. W. D.]

JANUARIUS (35), a subdeacon and a "fossor" of Cirta, at the inquisition for sacred books in 303. (Ang. c. Cresc. iii. 29, 33; Gesta apud Zenoph. apud Aug. Opp. vol. ix., app. p. 794; Augusti, Archæolog. vol. ix. p. 557.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (36), Jovinianist, condemned by pope Siricius in A.D. 390. (S. Siricius Papa, Epist. vii. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 1171; S. Ambrosius Ep. xlii. ap. Migne, Ib. xvi. 1128; Baronius, Ann. vi. a. 390, xlvi.) [J. G.]

JANUARIUS (37), one of five martyrs at Carthage, buried in the basilica of Faustus, commemorated on July 15. (Usuard. Mart.) [CATULINUS.] [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (38), a scribe or notary on the Catholic side at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 1, ii. 1, iii. 1.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (39), a presbyter who became a member of St. Augustine's monastery at Hippo, and respecting the disposition of whose property a troublesome controversy arose. (Aug. Serm. 355, 3, 4; Serm. 356, 11; Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. 317.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (40), a friend of St. Augustine, and called by him his son, as being probably much younger than himself. He is called in some MSS. "notarius," i.e. a secretary or scribe, and a person of this name is certainly mentioned in affectionate terms by Augustine as the bearer of a letter from himself to Paulinus, A.D. 417; but nothing is known for certain about him beyond what may be gathered from the replies of St. Augustine to his enquiries. These are contained in two letters, written about A.D. 400, of which the second amounts in length to a book or treatise, and is so styled by himself in his Retractions. The letter or letters of Januarius are lost; but the replies to them shew that the subject of them was connected with ritual observance, and so Augustine himself entitles his second letter de Ritibus Ecclesiae.

Although in the course of St. Augustine's argument, especially in the second letter, there is a good deal of fanciful and inconclusive reasoning, the whole work is of great value, as shewing the principle sanctioned by the church of allowing liberty of usages in matters not ruled either by Scripture or by express decree. Maintaining the firmest loyalty towards the authority of the church, he claims on that authority a liberty in matters of secondary importance, which it is of the greatest consequence to assert and uphold. (Ang. Retract. ii. 20; Epp. 54, 55.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (41), a Donatist presbyter of Ucus Major or Ucitanum, present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411 (i. 133). (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 418, ed. Oberthür; Plin. H. N. v. 4, 29; Ptol. iv. 3, 29; Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 643.) [H. W. P.]

JANUARIUS (42), monk. [BACHIARIUS.]

JANUARIUS (43), subdeacon of the church of Messina, founded a basilica there. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 5 in Migne, lxxvii. 541.) [A. H. D. A.]

JANUARIUS (44), martyr with Felix (199) at Heraclea, and commemorated on Jan. 7. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (45), martyr with Pelagia at Nicopolis, a town in Lesser Armenia, commemorated on July 11. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JANUARIUS (46), presbyter and martyr, Oct. 24. (Usuard. Mart.) [FELIX (174).] [C. H.]

JAQUINTUS, the first known bishop of Gauria (Coria), in Spain, subscribed the third council of Toledo in 589. (Mansi, ix. 1002; Florez, Esp. Sag. xiv. 56.) [C. H.]

JARLOGA, JARLUGH. [JARLUGH (1).]

JARUMAN (JERUMAN), the fourth bishop of the Mercian church (Mon. Hist. Brit. 623). He was appointed on the death of Trumhere, by the influence of Wulfhere king of Mercia, and in connexion with the Scottish mission (Bede, H. E. iii. 24). The date of his appointment, according to the Lichfield annalist (Ang. Sac. i. 425), was 662; and, although the precise year cannot be regarded as fixed on such authority, it is clear that, as Jaruman was the second bishop since the accession of Wulfhere in 657, and was in office in 665, the computation cannot be very far wrong. Jaruman's activity was not confined to Mercia. Under the pressure of Wulfhere he undertook the recovery of the East Saxons to the faith from which they had fallen after the death of king Swithelm and the apostolic Cædæ. Bede, who learned the history of Jaruman from a priest who had accompanied this mission, gives him a high character for industry, and enlarges on the success which he achieved in the destruction of the idolatrous temples, and the propagation of the faith (H. E. iii. 30). The death of Jaruman, which is fixed by the Lichfield writer in 667, must have taken place before Theodore in 669 placed St. Chad at Lichfield (H. E. iv. 3). Jaruman appears in the foundation charter of Medeshamstede, in the Peterborough MS. of the Chronicle (M. H. B. 313, 315). [S.]

JASIMUS, bishop of Spire. [JESSES.]

JASON (1), bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia, supposed to be the Jason mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 21; commemorated in the Greek Mænaea on April 27. (Basil, Menol. iii. 73; Le Quien, ii. 869.) [J. de S.]

JASON (2) and PAFISCUS. [ARISTO PEL-LAEUS.]

JASON (3). [ELPIDIUS (41).]

JASON (4), Dec. 3, son of the tribune Claudius and his wife Hilaria, martyred with them at Rome. (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JAST (JUSTUS), obscure Irish saint, given by Aengus the Culdee (Felire, l. iv. c. 76), as son of Bracan or Brychan, and the Saxon Dina, but is unknown in the Welsh pedigrees. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 13.) [J. G.]

JAZDEPHANES (1) (JESUPHANA, "JESUS HEAR HER"), Nestorian bishop of Saharzur or Sciaharzul, who cir. 630 joined the Jacobites and assisted in ordaining Maruthas maphrian of Tagrit. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 419; Le Quien, ii. 1329, 1535, 1593.)

(2) called CATARENSIS, Nestorian bishop of Cascara, present at the death of the catholicus Jesujab III. Adiabenus in 660. He wrote Spiritual Philosophy and other works in Syriac. (Assem. ii. 420, iii. 188; Le Quien, ii. 1165.) [C. H.]

JEHUDAH I. (R.), B. Simon III. grandson of Gamaliel II., also called R. Jehudah, the Prince (ר' יהודה), R. Jehudah the Holy, or simply Rabbi (רבי) = the Teacher, was born circa A.D. 150. He was the seventh of the fifteen patriarchs of the house of Hillel, who for upwards of 450 years (from circa B.C. 30 to A.D. 425) were the hereditary presidents of the Sanhedrin. Though heir to a large fortune and to a sickly constitution, he was a most diligent student. Under the guidance of R. Simon b. Joshai, and R. Eleazar b. Shamma at Usha, whither the Sanhedrin removed after the cessation of the Hadrian persecutions, he so successfully developed his great natural powers that when quite a youth he became very distinguished for his great learning, and was placed by his father and the college in the first rank of disciples. Therefore when he had to succeed to the presidency of the Sanhedrin at the age of twenty (circa A.D. 170), he was perfectly qualified to discharge with honour the important functions connected with this high office. Being himself an ardent student he thoroughly sympathised with all who were anxious to devote themselves to the study of the Law. He became an attraction to all the intellectual young men. They flocked to him from far and wide, from Palestine and from Babylon, to place themselves at his feet at Beth Shearim, also called Beth Shari, the present Turan, where the Sanhedrin now hold their sittings, and he maintained at his own cost hundreds of poor students. How thoroughly he identified himself with them may be seen from his beautiful saying: "I learned much from my teachers, more from my colleagues, but most from my own disciples" (Machoth, x.). The importance which he attached to education may also be seen from his solicitude about the instruction of children. "The world," he declared, "only exists by the breath of the children at school. Children are not to be taken from school even if it were for the rebuilding of the temple" (Sabbath, ii. b.). Owing to his feeble health he removed his residence, and with it the seat of the Sanhedrin to Sepphoris, which, according to tradition, was the home of the Virgin Mary's parents, and where she is said to have received the salutation of the angel. Though the Sanhedrin here had its complete number of seventy members, and though the power to decide religious questions and the care for the spiritual wants of the different communities were vested in them, yet so great was the confidence they reposed in the piety, learning, judgment, and administrative powers of R. Jehudah, that they voluntarily renounced all the authority which formerly belonged to the entire college and to the individual members, and made it over solely and exclusively to the president. He was therefore the first patriarch who had the sole power to nominate and appoint the disciples to the office of judge and teacher of the Law for all the Jewish communities, whilst the nomination of the Sanhedrin without his consent was invalid. He had no Deputy-president (אב בית דין) nor official Speaker (חכם); he was in fact the first spiritual autocrat. By this change uniformity of teaching and practice was secured throughout all the congregations far and wide, since the president would not ordain any teachers with whose theological views he was not personally acquainted and thoroughly satisfied. Of great interest to the student of ecclesiastical history are the qualifications which were deemed necessary in a Jewish minister of religion in the 2nd century of the Christian era. The congregation at Simineas, in applying to R. Jehudah to send them a pastor, asked for one "who has the gift to deliver public discourses, is able to adjudicate legal matters, to superintend the affairs of the synagogue, to instruct the youth, to draw up legal documents, and to attend to all the higher wants of the community" (Jerusalem Yebamoth, xii.), and it was only such men of learning and authority that R. Jehudah ordained. Invested with such power, R. Jehudah carried through reforms which his predecessors in office could not venture to attempt. These reforms generally tended to relieve the people from the rigorous interpretation of the canonical laws put forth by former Sanhedrins. He allowed prayer to be offered up in any posture and under any circumstances. He abolished several fasts, he repealed some of the stringent laws about the observance of the Sabbath, he freed many of the border cities from the tithal laws and from the year of release, which weighed heavily on the farmers. When his own brothers and relatives were alarmed at his innovations, declaring that he allowed what the six previous presidents his own ancestors forbade, he forcibly replied: "King Hezekiah destroyed the brazen serpent which Moses erected in the wilderness, because it led the people to idolatry. Now there were pious kings before him—Asa, Jehoshaphat, &c.—who destroyed all the idols in Judaea, but did nothing to this brazen serpent erected by Moses. How could Hezekiah destroy that which his ancestors spared? You will say that it was his own merit to do it. I, too, regard this as a meritorious work, which my ancestors left for me to accomplish" (Chulin, 6 b). One of the most important reforms introduced by R. Jehudah was his reinstating Hebrew not only as the language of ecclesiastical intercommunication, but as the medium of common intercourse among the Jews. Under the presidency of Gamaliel I., A.D. 30, the language of the Jews, not only in Palestine and Babylon, but also in Media, Greece, and in the other countries of the dispersion, was Aramaic [GAMALIEL I.]. Now R. Jehudah, who was a distinguished linguist, and knew thoroughly Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, and Latin, ordained that pure Hebrew was to take the place of the impure Aramaic. He declared that "the corrupt Aramaic is of no use in Palestine. Speak either Greek or Hebrew" (Pessachim, 41, with Baba Kama, 82 b). And we have it on record that even his servants could speak pure Hebrew.

That however which immortalised R. Jehudah's name is his compilation and redaction of the Mishna, circa A.D. 189. Since the attempt of his grandfather, Gamaliel II., and R. Akiba made on a smaller scale to collect the various canon laws, the Jewish nation had experienced different changes, and new laws had developed themselves in the different schools. R. Jehudah therefore resolved to collect all the traditional lore, to subject it to re-examination, and codify it once for all. His immense wealth, his extraordinary learning, his unparalleled authority as a spiritual autocrat, his power to command the different doctors of the law, his intimate acquaintance with the various representatives of the traditions of the different schools, and his power of incessant work combined to enable him to produce the grand code which others attempted, but failed to carry through. The materials which he collected R. Jehudah arranged in six parts, consisting of sixty-two treatises, for an account of which we must refer to the article TALMUD in this Dictionary.

Hardly ever did a spiritual autocrat care and provide more thoroughly for the wants of a nation under his control. By precept and by example he endeavoured to set forth the divine mission of Judaism. The prayers which he offered are models of brevity and earnestness.

Though the Holy Land was in possession of the heathen, and tyrants lorded it over God's heritage, he often found comfort in the prayer, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is the Lord of the land" (Gittin, 63). He warned the people against those who preached that the law was done away with, and that circumcision availed nothing (Rom. iv. 7; Gal. ii. 19, 20; Phil. iii. 20; Col. ii. 11), by declaring "Every sin is forgiven on the great day of atonement, except the rejection of the Law, the heretical interpretation of the Law, and the doing away with the covenant of circumcision" (Yoma, 85). "The path which you are to pursue," he urged, "is the one which is honourable in itself, and brings thee honour from thy fellow man. Keep the little precepts as carefully as the important ones, for thou knowest not the reward of the commandments. Balance the loss which thou mayest sustain by observing a precept against the future recompense thereof, and the advantage which thou mayest gain from committing a sin against the future punishment. Remember three things, and thou wilt not get into sin. Know what is above thee, an eye which seeth and an ear which heareth, and that all thy deeds are written in a book" (Aboth, ii. 1). At the age of sixty R. Jehudah felt that his work here below was finished, and that he must prepare to meet his Creator. He had two sons, named Gamaliel and Simon, and a daughter. He appointed the elder to the presidency of the Sanhedrin to which he succeeded under the title of Gamaliel IV., and his younger son Simon he constituted Chacham (צַחָמ) = the Speaker and official referee in the Sanhedrin. Having set his house in order, and given strict injunctions that his funeral should be of the simplest kind, that his servant was to have the principal share in the preparation of his corpse for burial, and that there should be no public mourning for him, R. Jehudah, whom the nation called the Holy, a distinction which no other president of the Sanhedrin, or any doctor of the Law ever received, departed this life on a Friday about A.D. 210. The disciples who tenderly watched at the death-bed of the Patriarch dared not announce his death to the anxious crowd outside. At last Bar Capara stepped forward and said, "Angels and men contended for the ark of the covenant, the angels prevailed, and the ark is no more." The people then exclaimed, "He is dead!" Bar Capara replied, "You have said it" (Kethuboth, 103). The gratitude and true appreciation of his services, of the nation, and of his numerous disciples, were manifested in the following national sentiments. "Never since the days of Moses were the knowledge of the divine Law and authority united in one person as much as in R. Jehudah" (Sanhedrin, 36). "With the death of Rabbi humility ceased, the fear of God disappeared, and sufferings multiplied" (Sota, 49). "He who sees Rabbi in dreams may expect wisdom" (Berachoth, 57 b). "If the Messiah is to be of living men, he must be like Rabbi" (Sanhedrin, 98 b). Comp. JEROME. [HIERONYMUS.]

JERUMAN, bishop. [JARUMAN.]

JESER, catholicus of Armenia. [ESDRAS.]

JESERNINUS, bishop. [ISSERNINUS.]

JESSE, twenty-first bishop of Amiens, succeeding Georgius in A.D. 798 or 799, was intimately concerned with the civil history of the time. We first hear of him in the latter year as one of the bishops deputed by Charles the Great to meet pope Leo on his approach to France. Later he escorted him back to Rome, and inquired on the part of Charles into the outrage committed on him by the Roman populace. In 802 he was sent with count Helmgautus to Constantinople to reply to the overtures of peace which the empress Irene had made. He seems indeed to have occupied a certain official position as ambassador, for in 805 we find one of the capitulars of Charles intrusted to him to be made known in all parts (Migne, Patr. Lat. xvii. 289). About 808 he appears to have been sent to Ravenna on a mission to Leo III., as there is a letter of that year from the pope to Charles, expressing suspicion as to his fidelity (Patr. Lat. xviii. 534). In the following year he was present at the council of Aix. In 811 he was one of the bishops and nobles who subscribed Charles's will (Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 463). In 812 he addressed to the priests and soldiers in Christ of his diocese a letter on the subject of baptism, which, though not so expressed, was undoubtedly an answer to the questions on that subject proposed by Charles in the preceding year to the bishops of his empire. It was first published by Des Cordes at Paris in 1615 at the end of the opuscula of Hincmar archbishop of Rheims, and may be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. cv. 781 sqq. For an account of it, see the Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 528, and Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, xii. 338. In 814 he was present at the council of Noion, summoned by Wulfarius archbishop of Rheims, and recorded by Flodoard (Hist. Ecol. Rem. ii. 18, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 126). He was also present at the council held at Thionville in A.D. 821, and that of Paris in 829. In the following year he joined the rebellion of Lothaire against his father, Louis the Pious, and was degraded from his bishopric for high treason at the council of Nimègue, and though he regained his see when Lothaire succeeded in displacing his father, he was finally ejected on the restoration of Louis in 834, and driven with others of the rebels into Italy, where he died of a plague in 836. He was succeeded in the see by Ragenarius. [S. A. B.]

JESSES (GESSIUS, JASINUS, TESSIS), reputed first bishop of Civitas Nemetum (Speyer) in 346. (Gall. Christ. v. 715; Mansi, ii. 1371.)

[R. T. S.]

JESU-BUCHAT (JESUBOCHT), a Nestorian bishop in Persia, placed by Le Quien (ii. 1177) in the eighth century. Assemani mentions his writings, but can define no period. (Bibl. Or. iii. 194, 269, 279, 351.) [C. H.]

JESUDENHA, bishop of Kosra after 706 and writer in Syriac. (Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 195, 196, 256, 309; Le Quien, ii. 1177.) [C. H.]

JESUJAB (1) I. ARZUNITA, by birth an Arab, studied at Nisibis, and afterwards became bishop of Arzun (Erzeroom). On the death of Ezekiel he was raised to the patriarchate of the Nestorians (A.D. 580) by the goodwill of Hormisdas king of Persia. Barhebraeus relates that he visited Naaman, prince of the Christian Arabs, in the hope of winning him over from the Jacobites, but died (A.D. 596) in the tents of the Maadenes, and was buried at Hirat, in the monastery of Hind, Naaman's daughter. Amru gives a fuller account. (See John of Ephesus, Ecol. Hist. ii. 40 sqq.) After the deposition and death of Hormisdas, Chosroes Abruzius, his son and successor, sent Jesujab to the emperor Mauricius, to beg help against Beheram (Varames), the late king's generalissimo (A.D. 592; see Pagi).

In A.D. 588, Jesujab called a synod (Ebedjesu cxi. ap. Assem. B. O. III. i. 279), and enacted thirty canons. He wrote besides twenty-two questions on the sacraments of the church, an apology (perhaps the same as his confession of faith to Mauricius), epistles, a work against Eunomius, another against a heretical bishop, and replies to twenty questions put by Jacobus bishop of Dadian (Ebedjesu, Cat. lxxii.). Elias Damascen. Nomocanon. II. 8, 9, 14, gives his canons, the letter to Jacobus, and his rules for the Eucharist (B. O. III. i. 514). A Vatican MS. (B. O. ii. 487) contains questions or enigmas, in dodecasyllables, on Christ, love, hope, the Eucharist, &c., by "Jesujab," whether Arzunita or not is uncertain (B. O. III. i. 108-111; Badger's Nestorians, ii.). [C. J. B.]

JESUJAB (2) II., GADALENSIS, a native of Gadhalah in the district of Mosul. He studied at Nisibis, became bishop of Balada, and afterwards catholicus of the Nestorians (A.D. 628). Barhebraeus relates that he did his utmost to further the cause of learning by restoring schools which had been destroyed. Siroes (Shirwai) king of Persia sent him, accompanied by Cyriacus of Nisibis, Paulus of Adiabene, Gabriel of Beth Seleucia, Jesujab of Adiabene, Sahaduna bishop of the Garmaeans, and others, on an embassy to Heraclius. At Apamea the party rested in an orthodox monastery, where the abbat (by the power of magic, according to Thomas Margensis, Hist. Monast. ii. 4) induced Sahaduna to renounce Nestorianism. [JESUJAB (3).]

At the imperial court Jesujab found it convenient to pretend conformity to the imperial faith; condemning Diodorus of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius, and accepting Cyril, and the expression Theotokos. He was then allowed to officiate at the altar (Barsumas of Susa, quoted by Barhebraeus). On his return his name was expunged from the diptychs; but the patriarch denied the allegations against him, and was restored by the influence of Sirois. Barhebraeus also speaks of a visit of Jesujab accompanied by Saïd prince of the Nagrans, a Christian tribe of Arabs, to Muhammad, who gave him a document favourable to the Christians. Jesujab died A.D. 647, in the time of Omar ben Alkhettab, from whom he had obtained a charter of protection for himself and his people. He was author of a Commentary on the Psalms, and of epistles, narratives, and discourses on various subjects (Ebedj. Cat. lxxi.). Amru mentions a book against sceptics, another on ambiguities of language, and a catechism of twenty-two questions and answers on the sacraments. (Assem. B. O. III. i. 105-108, 344, 346, 416; ib. ii. 417, 418; Badger's Nestorians, ii.)

[C. J. B.]

JESUJAB (3) III. ADIABENUS, catholicos of the Nestorians. He was the son of Bastumag, studied at Nisibis, and afterwards entered the monastery of Beth 'Abé. He became successively bishop of Nineveh, metropolitan of Mosul and Arbela, and, on the death of Maremes, catholicos of the Nestorians, holding office from A.D. 650 to A.D. 660.

While a bishop, he was sent by the king of Persia as envoy to the emperor Heraclius. On that occasion he stole the chest containing the bones of St. Peter and St. Paul from Antioch, and put the treasure in Beth-'Abé (Thomas Marg. lib. ii. cap. 4). By bribing the magistrates, he prevented the Jacobites from building a church in Mosul (Epp. i. 43-48). Become a metropolitan, he vigorously contended with Sahada, nicknamed Sahaduna, archbishop of Mohuzé d'aryûn (metropolitan city of the Garmaeans), who had renounced Nestorianism for orthodoxy. On this matter five letters are extant. As patriarch, Jesujab was a patron of letters. But when he resolved to raise a school at Beth-'Abé in connexion with the monastery, abbat Kamjesu and a number of his monks, after vainly protesting, deserted their house, bearing with them the bones of Mar Jacobus, their founder. The patriarch was therefore obliged to establish his school elsewhere. After this Jesujab engaged in a long struggle with the chief bishops of Persia and Socotora (Qatara), who had declared themselves independent of the see of Seleucia. Amru says that Jesujab went to Persia, and received the submission of Simeon the metropolitan. But Barhebr. alleges that down to the time of Timotheus (a century later) the Persian bishops were not subject to the catholicos of Seleucia. They maintained their own customs—e.g. they wore white robes like secular priests, ate flesh, and lived in wedlock. It appears, however, from the patriarch's own epistles, that he did not himself visit Persia, and that the bishops of that country had formerly maintained unbroken communion with his see. Jesujab accuses his opponents of apostasy, though they had merely disowned allegiance to him. Georgius, the successor of Jesujab, managed to win back the revolted churches (Thomas Marg. ii. 14).

Works.—Jesujab was the chief Syriac writer of his day. Assemani gives a list of 105 epistles, mostly addressed to monks and bishops on church matters. Some (i. 3-5) speak of Persian persecutions; i. 46 was sent to Cyriacus, archbishop of Nisibis, with 1000 cors of barley and a quantity of dates for the relief of his people; ii. 6, 7, 21, relate to Sahaduna. In iii. 21, to the monks of Socotora, Jesujab asserts that more than twenty bishops and two metropolitans are subject to his jurisdiction. Some of his epistles have perished. He himself describes his book Kothbo d'hufokh hushobé, a controversial work directed against the doctrine of Christ's Unity of Person, which was maintained by Sahaduna. His Martyonútho dalwoth 'noshin hadwoyé was a hortatory address to novices. Jesujab was anxious to reform the monks. In ep. 3 he urges them to labour, to live under one abbat, and not to wander without leave. But his great work, in which Thomas Margensis (Hist. Monast. II. cap. 11) tells us that he had the assistance of Ananjesus, was the revision of the Penkitho d'hydro (codex circuli)—i.e. the divine office or breviary. (Therein he prescribed the third hour for the Eucharist.) Besides he put forth an order of baptism, an order of penitence, a form of consecration of a church, chants, discourses, hymns (used anonymously in the Chaldean offices), paraclitic homilies, as well as various argumentative writings (Ebedjesu, Cat. cap. lxxiv.). A life of Jesusabran, monk and martyr, is also mentioned. (B. O. III. i. 106, 113-143, 285, 633; Bickell, Consp. Syr. 38, 74, 5, 88, 90, 1.) [C. J. B.]

JESUJAB (4), Nestorian bishops, viz. of Cardaliabed (also called Sena and Elsen) cap. 640 (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 492; Le Quien, ii. 1173), and of Bassora cap. 686 (Bibl. Or. ii. 423; Le Quien, ii. 1209). [C. H.]

JESUZACHA (1), Jacobite bishop of Mosul, in the sixth century. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 414; Le Quien, ii. 1561.)

(2) Nestorian bishop of Bethseleucia or Carcha cap. 720. (Assem. ii. 494; Le Quien, ii. 1332.)

[C. H.]

JEU, in the system of Pistis Sophia, the chief ruler of "the place of those who belong to the right hand," a region next, but a long way below, that of the "treasure of light," but infinitely above that of the visible heavens (p. 186). It is the office of Jeu to draw light from the treasures above, and transmit it to the regions next below (p. 193). He is therefore the ἐπίσκοπος or ἀγγελος of light; he is also called the πρεσβυτήρ primi statuti (p. 322), and the "first man" (p. 285). He restrains the archons of the lower heavenly spheres, and punishes them if they transgress (pp. 34-90). He is the father of Sabaoth, the lowest archon of the "place of the right hand," and from Sabaoth is derived the  $\psi\upsilon\chi\acute{\eta}$  of Christ, who accordingly is made to speak of Jeu as "the father of my father" (p. 127). There is also a book of Jeu purporting to have been written by Enoch, containing mysteries spoken to him from the tree of knowledge and from the tree of life (pp. 246-354).

JEZDEGERDES. [JSDIGERDES.]

JOAB, catholicos of Armenia (790-791). (Saint-Martin, Mem. sur l'Arménie, i. 439.)

[G. T. S.]

JOACHIM, bishop of Bologna, A.D. (470) (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 461, 579). He is not recognised by Ughelli (Ital. Sac. ii. 10).

Bishops are in alphabetical order of sees. Those whose sees are unknown may be looked for under East, Egypt, Ethiopia, Gallic, Italian, Macedonian, Persian, Syrian, Welsh.

JOANNES (1), bishop of Abela (Avila) from about 687 till after 693, at the fifteenth (688) and sixteenth (693) councils of Toledo. (Mansi, xii. 21, 85; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 25.) [PRISCILIANUS.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (2), bishop of Abila (Baalbec) in Phoenicia Secunda. His name appears among the signatures to the synodical letter of his province, addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 457. But it is possible, as Le Quien suggests, that for Joannes we should read Jordanes, if the latter was not his predecessor. (Or. Christ. ii. 844; Mansi, vii. 559.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (3), bishop of Abydos on the Hellespont, present at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 993; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 774.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Acilizene, vid. of Ecclesina.

JOANNES (4), bishop of Adada in Pisidia, present at the Trullan synod A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1004; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1054.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (5), bishop of Adana in Cilicia to the east of Tarsus. He was present at the sixth general council of Constantinople, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 640, 651, 679; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 882.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (6), bishop of Adria, probably in the 8th century, as is gathered from an inscription in the church of Santa Maria della Tomba. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 13.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (7), bishop of Adriana in second Pamphylia; present at the Trullan synod (Quinisext), A.D. 692. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 1023; Mansi, xi. 1004.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (8), bishop of Adriana in the Hellespont, at the seventh synod, A.D. 787, as given in the Latin text of one list (Mansi, xii. 1100), where the bishop's name should be Sisinnius (xiii. 143, 390; cf. Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 782.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Adrianople, vid. of Hadrianople; bishop of Aemonia, vid. of Novas.

JOANNES (9), bishop of Albanum (Albano) c. A.D. 594, in which year his name is found appended to a grant made by Gregory the Great to the monastery of Subiaco. He is said to have been also "Bibliothecarius Sanctae Sedis," but this is doubtful. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 288; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 658.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Albintimilia, vid. of Ventimiglia.

JOANNES (10), fourteenth bishop of Alby, in A.D. 734. The same source names no successor till 812. (Gall. Chr. i. 7; Gams, Series Episc. 484.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES, bishop of Alessio, vid. of Scylacium.

JOANNES (11) I., surnamed TALAIA and TABENNESIOTES, the Catholic successor of Timotheus Salofaciolus in the patriarchate of Alexandria, A.D. 482 and afterwards bishop of Nola. From his having been a presbyter in the monastery of the Tabennesians at Canopus near Alexandria, he was known as Tabennesiotes (Pagi Critic. s. a. 482, xix.; the Libellus Synodicus has Ταβενσιώτης, Mansi, vii. 1178 B). Previous to the expulsion of Salofaciolus from his see, John had held the office of oeconomus under him (Brevic. Hist. Eutychn. Mansi, vii. 1063), and when that prelate retired to Canopus John accompanied him. On the restoration of Salofaciolus to Alexandria John returned with him, and through his friend Illus the ex-consul, who was then magister officiorum, he was reinstated in the office of oeconomus, and put in charge of all the churches of the city. He was not unmindful of the obligation under which he was thus laid to his friend, and accordingly sent him many valuable presents (Liberatus, Breviar. c. 16 in Migne, Patrol. lxxviii. 1020). Shortly afterwards John was sent by the Catholics of Alexandria to the emperor Zeno, to thank him for the restoration of Salofaciolus, and to pray that when a vacancy occurred in the see they might choose his successor. Zacharias, on whose authority Evagrius relies for his narrative of the legation, says that John was detected in an endeavour to procure the succession for himself, and was therefore bound by an oath not to accept the see if he should be elected to it. He was successful in the object of his mission, and obtained an edict from the emperor complying with the request of the Catholics (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 12). After his return he became greatly distinguished as a preacher in Alexandria (Brevic. Hist. Eut. u. s.).

Salofaciolus died A.D. 482, and the Catholics of the city then elected Joannes (Brevic. Hist. Eut. u. s.). The Monophysites, however, elected Peter Mongus, notwithstanding that he was then in exile, and by unworthy means prevailed upon the emperor to expel John, and recall Mongus (Liberatus, c. 17; Theophanes, s. a. 476). Mongus accompanied Augustalius when he replaced Ebn Gustus, who had orders to comply with the request of the Monophysites (Eutychnus, u. s.). In the meanwhile John sent the usual synodic to Simplicius bishop of Rome by Isidorus a presbyter and Paulus a deacon, but neglected to send one directed to Acacius bishop of Constantinople, contenting himself with sending one to his friend Illus, who was then in that city, with instructions to make what use of it he thought fit, and accompanying it with a letter addressed to the emperor. When the magistrianius whom John employed as his messenger to Constantinople arrived there, he found that Illus had gone to Antioch, whither he followed him with the synodic. On receiving it at Antioch, Illus delivered the synodic to Calandio, then recently elected to the patriarchate of that see (Liberatus, c. 17, 18). Acacius, taking offence at not receiving a synodic from John, joined the Monophysites in their appeal to the emperor against him, and also prevailed upon Zeno to write to Simplicius, praying him not to acknowledge John on the ground that he was unworthy of the episcopate, and had perjured himself (Simplic. Ep. 17, July 15, A.D. 482, in Mansi, vii. 992). Without waiting for the reply of Simplicius, however, Zeno instructed Apollonius the Praefectus Augustalis, the Augustalius of Eutychnus, and Pergamius the dux, to expel John.

When he was thus driven from Alexandria, Talaia went to Illus at Antioch, and under his advice, having procured letters of intercession from Calandio addressed to Simplicius, he went from thence to Rome (Liberatus, c. 18). He was favourably received by Simplicius, who at once wrote to Acacius, urging him to intercede with the emperor to put an end to the scandals which had arisen at Alexandria (Ep. 18, Nov. 6, 482 in Mansi, vii. 995). To this Acacius replied that he did not recognise John, but had received Mongus into communion by command of Zeno, and Simplicius rejoined, blaming him for what he had done in no measured terms (Liberatus, c. 18).

Simplicius died March 2, A.D. 483, but John was also warmly supported by his successor Felix III., who shortly cited Acacius to answer certain charges which had been brought against him by Talaia, and at the same time wrote to the emperor earnestly praying him to withdraw his countenance from Mongus and to restore John (Libell. Citationis ad Acac. Mansi, vii. 1108; Felic. Ep. 2, A.D. 483, in Mansi, vii. 1032). On the return of the legates, who had been sent with these communications to Constantinople, Felix held a synod at Rome, in which he excommunicated Acacius for his persistent support of Mongus (Ep. 6, July 28, A.D. 484, in Mansi, vii. 1053), and also wrote to Zeno to inform him of the fact, and at the same time let him know that "the apostolic see never would consent to communion with Peter of Alexandria, who had been justly condemned long since" (Ep. 9, Aug. 1, A.D. 484, in Mansi, vii. 1065). But Felix met with no greater success than his predecessor had done; and John seems to have remained at Rome until the death of Zeno and the succession of Anastasius, A.D. 491.

John had known the new emperor at Alexandria, where he had had an opportunity of shewing him kindness when he landed at the city after having suffered shipwreck. Presuming that Anastasius would not be unmindful of the service which he had then rendered him in former days, John resolved upon a personal appeal to him, and went to Constantinople with that intent. On hearing of his arrival Anastasius at once gave orders for his being sent into exile, and John was only too thankful to make his escape and return to Rome (Theophanes, s. a. 484, p. 118; Victor Tununens. s. a. 494 in Migne, Patrol. lxxviii. 948). Felix died Feb. 25, A.D. 492, but his successor, Gelasius I., also equally interested himself in John (Gelas. Epp. 13, 15, in Mansi, viii. 49 seq., cir. A.D. 493-495).

All these efforts to procure his reinstatement, however, were of no avail; John never returned to Alexandria, but received, as some compensation for the loss of his patriarchate, the see of Nola in Campania, where, after a residence of many years, he died in peace (Liberatus, c. 18).

During his episcopate of Nola, he appears to have written an ἀπολογία addressed to Gelasius, in which he anathematized not only the Pelagian heresy, but also Pelagius himself, and Celestius, as well as Julianus of Eclana. (Photius, Biblioth. cod. liv.: Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 417, 419; Remondini, del Nolana Eccl. Storia, iii. 56-59; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 251; Tillemont, Mém. xvi. 313, et seq.; Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 604, et seq.; ACACIUS.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (12) II., surnamed MELA and HEMULA, patriarch of Alexandria, 496-507, a Monophysite, who accepted the Henoticon of Zeno, and entered into communion with Flavian of Antioch (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 23). His apocriariii, who went to Constantinople at the beginning of his patriarchate, entered into negotiations with the delegates of pope Anastasius II., but owing to the Alexandrine hostility to the council of Chalcedon these negotiations bore no fruits. (Theoph. Chronogr. A.M. 5989; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 423.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (13) III., surnamed NIKIOTA and NICEOTA, also MACIOTA in Liberat. Diac. Brév. 18, Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 507-517. He adopted Zeno's Henoticon, though he said it was imperfect because it contained no anathema against the council of Chalcedon; but he failed in inducing the Acephali to return to the communion of the church. (Phot. cod. 54; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 425; Theoph. A. C. 499, 504, 505; Evag. H. E. iii. 23.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (14) IV., patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 569-579. He was consecrated at Constantinople by John the patriarch. Anastasius patriarch of Antioch protested in vain against this invasion of the rights and privileges of the Alexandrian church. John was accepted only by the Catholics, or Melchites as they were called by their opponents, who set up rival patriarchs for themselves. (Theoph. Chronogr. A.M. 6061-2; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 437.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (15) V., surnamed ELEEMOSYNARIUS, and MISERICORS, Catholic patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 609-616. He was born at Amathus in Cyprus, his father, Epiphanius, being governor of the island; he became widely celebrated for his acts of charity towards the poor, and on the death of Theodorus the people of Alexandria requested the emperor to appoint him to the patriarchal throne, which he reluctantly accepted. There he continued to shew forth his lovingkindness towards the destitute and afflicted. Leontius, bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus, wrote a life of him, which was translated into Latin by Anastasius the Librarian, at the order of pope Nicolas (Acta SS. Boll. ii. Jan. 498). This work was mentioned at the fourth session of the seventh general council, A.D. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 54). Simeon Metaphrastes also wrote his life, different in many points from that of Leontius; Jan. 23 (Migne, Patr. Gr. cxiv. 894-966). He is commemorated by the Greeks on Nov. 12. He was the original patron saint of the Hospitaliers. (Basil. Menol. in Migne, Patr. Gr. cxvii. 183; Ceillier, xi. 658; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 445.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (16), Theodosian bishop of Alexandria, c. A.D. 620-625, contemporary with George the Catholic patriarch (Le Quien, ii. 447). Two of his festal letters are quoted by his contemporary Anastasius Sinaita (Via Dux, c. 15, in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxix. 257). [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (17) SEMNUDAEUS, Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, 677-686, succeeding Agatho. He lived on friendly terms with Abdul-aziz the Saracen ruler of Egypt, rebuilt the church of St. Mark, extended the bounds of the Jacobite church, and was noted for his liberality to the poor. (Renaudot, Pat. Alex. 174; Le Quien, ii. 452.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (18), Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, 775 or 6-799, contemporary with the Melchite patriarch Politian. (Renaudot, Pat. Alex. 241; Le Quien, ii. 462.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (19), bishop of Alinda in Caria, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 156; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 911.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (20), bishop of Altinum (Altino), probably between A.D. 579 and 635, but his exact date is not known. A second John of this series, between Dominicus and Deodatus, c. 800, was bishop of Torcellum, whither the seat of the bishopric had been removed about the middle of the 7th century. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ix. 518, 527.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (21), bishop of Amasia, the metropolis of the province of Helenopontus. We have his signature to the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 641, 671, 690; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 528.) [F. A.]

JOANNES (22), bishop of Amastris (Sossamus), on the coast of Paphlagonia, c. A.D. 750. An oration by him on image worship is quoted by Nicolaus Comnenus. (Praenotiones Mystagogicae, iii. sec. 1, 9; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 563.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (23), bishop of Amathus in Cyprus, at the seventh synod, A.D. 787, in one Latin list; but the bishop's name is more correctly Alexander. (Mansi, xiii. 367 D; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1064.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (24), bishop of Amida (the modern Diarbekir), on the Tigris. He died shortly before that city was taken by the Persians, A.D. 502. (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i. 280, 283; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 992.) A second John, a Jacobite, succeeded to the see A.D. 551. (Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 48, n.; Le Quien, ii. 994.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (25), bishop of "Ammoria" in the reign of Justin I. (Assem. Dissert. de Monophys. p. 3, num. ii. in Bibl. Or. t. ii.). Le Quien, undecided whether by Ammoria is intended Ane-murium in Isauria or Himerium in Osrhoëne, places him under both these sees (Or. Chr. ii. 984, 1017). [C. H.]

JOANNES (26), bishop of Amyzon in Caria, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 156; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 911.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (27), bishop of Anaea in the province of Asia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 647, 676, 993; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 719.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Anazarbus, vid. of Justinianopolis in Cilicia.

JOANNES (28), according to Ughelli, bishop of Ancona, c. A.D. 602 (Ital. Sacr. i. 329). But Ughelli was apparently misled by the title of the letter of Gregory, which he quotes as his authority (Coleti, n. in l.). The letter (A.D. 603) is addressed "Joanni Episcopo," without any mention of a see, and simply instructs him to make enquiries as to the relative fitness of those persons who were candidates for the episcopate of Ancona, which was then vacant [FLORENTINUS (18)] (Gregor. Ep. xiv. 11 in Migne, Patrol. lxxvii. 1313; Jo. Diac. Vit. Greg. iii. 12 in Patr. lxxv. 137). The letter also appears in the Decretum of Gratian (Dist. lxxxv. 1; Cappelletti, vii. 27). There was a doubtful John bishop of Ancona, c. 629 (Cappelletti, vii. 29).

[T. W. D.]

JOANNES (29), bishop of Ancona, present at the council of Agatho, at Rome, A.D. 679 (Mansi, xi. 814). Ughelli is mistaken in saying that he was present at the council of Constantinople in 680 (Ital. Sacr. i. 339; Coleti, n. in l.; Cappelletti, vii. 30).

[T. W. D.]

JOANNES (30), bishop of Andrappa, in the province of Helenopontus, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680 (Mansi, xi. 649, 675). Andrappa was also known as Claudiopolis and Nova Claudiopolis. (Gams, Ser. Episc. 442; Baudrand, Lezic. Geogr. s. v.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 540.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES, of Anemurium, vid. of Ammorium.

JOANNES (31), bishop of Antioch in the second quarter of the 5th century. He succeeded Theodotus A.D. 429, and died A.D. 448, after a thirteen years' episcopate (Theodoret, Ep. 83), being succeeded by his nephew Domnus II. Nothing certain appears to be known of the place of his birth and education, or of his life, before his elevation to the episcopate. Cave states that he was brought up in the monastery of St. Euprepius in the suburbs of Antioch, where he had Nestorius and Theodoret as his fellow students (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 412), but Cave cites no authority for this statement. Cyril of Alexandria, John's great antagonist, in one of his violent diatribes alludes in encomiastic terms to his intimate acquaintance with the doctrines and canons of the church (Labbe, Concil. iii. 1050); and, according to Theodoret, testimony was also borne to the thoroughness of his theological education and the accuracy of his dogmatic knowledge by one equally indisposed to take a friendly view, Cyril's successor, the patriarch Dioscorus. (Theod. Ep. 83). As none of his theological writings or sermons have come down to us, beyond the fragment of a homily delivered at Chalcedon, and his controversial letters, we have no means of judging of the worth of these eulogistic expressions. The fact that the letter of remonstrance addressed by him to Nestorius before the council of Ephesus, so remarkable for its wise persuasiveness, was currently attributed to Theodoret, seems to shew that John's literary reputation was not of the highest. In depth and extent of theological learning he was certainly as much inferior to Cyril as he was in strength of character and determination of will.

Our knowledge of John commences with his election as successor to Theodotus in the see of Antioch. In A.D. 429 his devotion to his episcopal labours was so great and attended with such success as to obtain the admiration of all the bishops of the East, who according to the aged Acacius of Beroea rejoiced and congratulated themselves on having such a leader (Labbe, iii. 386). But the troubles which have rendered John's episcopate so unhappily famous began immediately to shew themselves. Almost at the same time with himself, his old companion and fellow townsman Nestorius had been appointed to the see of Constantinople, and had inaugurated his episcopate with a sermon in the metropolitan church, repudiating the term "Mother of God," θεοτόκος. On the history of the controversy thence arising see CYRILLUS (7) and NESTORIUS. Celestine the Roman pontiff summoned a synod of Western bishops in August 430 A.D., which unanimously condemned the tenets of Nestorius. The name of John of Antioch now for the first time appears in the controversy. The support of the Eastern prelates, of whom the patriarch of Antioch was chief, was of great importance. Celestine therefore wrote to John, together with Juvenal of Jerusalem, Rufus of Thessalonica, and Flavian of Philippi, informing them of the decree passed against Nestorius (Baluz. p. 438, c. xv.; Labbe, iii. 376). At the same time Cyril wrote to John calling upon him, unless he wished to be separated from the communion of the West, to accept Celestine's decision, and unite with him in the defence of the faith against Nestorius (ibid. p. 442, c. xviii.; Labbe, iii. 379). Such a declaration of open hostility against an old friend, of whose virtual orthodoxy he was convinced, and with whose views on the nature of our blessed Lord he probably felt more real sympathy than with the more narrowly defined opinions of Cyril, was very distasteful to John. Measures of peace should first be tried. He would see what friendly persuasion could effect. He therefore despatched a letter full of Christian persuasiveness, by the count Irenaeus, to Nestorius, in his own name, and that of his brother bishops Archelaus, Apringius, Theodoret, Heliades, Melchius, and the newly appointed bishop of Laodicea, Macarius, for whose ordination the above-named bishops had probably come to Antioch, all of them his sure friends, and all sharing in their counsels of peace. He entreats him not to plunge the church into discord on account of a word, to which the Christian ear had become accustomed, and which was capable of being interpreted in his own sense. He begs Nestorius to regard this letter as a confidential not an official communication, expressive of his real sentiments towards him. He feels it his duty to send him copies of the unwelcome letters he has received from Rome and Alexandria, which he begs him to read calmly, and without prejudice or too much reliance on his own opinion. He expresses his conviction that Nestorius holds the common faith; why then should he refuse to adopt the common terminology? The ten days allowed by Celestine for decision was indeed a short time. But it was quite long enough. A single day, nay a few hours would suffice for him to make up his mind to adopt a term employed by the fathers, and in accordance with the truth. He enlarges on the danger of schism, warning him that the East, Egypt, and Macedonia are about to separate from him, and closes a letter so admirable in tone and feeling, so happy in its expression that, as has been already remarked, it has been attributed to the practised pen of Theodoret, by exhorting him to follow the example of Theodorus of Mopsuestia in retracting words which had given pain to the orthodox, since he holds the orthodox faith on these points equally with them (Baluz. p. 445, c. xxi.; Labbe, iii. 390 sq.). John wrote also at the same time to the count Irenaeus and to Musaeus bishop of Antara, and Helladius bishop of Tarsus, who were at Constantinople at that time, in the hope of availing himself of their influence with Nestorius in support of his advice (Baluz. p. 688). Nestorius's reply, though courteous and respectful, indicated no intention of following John's counsels of moderation. He declared himself orthodox in the truest sense. He had no rooted objection to the term θεοτόκος; but he thought it an unsafe one, because it was accepted by some in an Arian or Apollinarian sense. He preferred Χριστοτόκος, as a middle term between it and ἀνθρωποτόκος. He proposed to defer the discussion to the general council to which he was looking forward, at which he hoped he should meet John and arrange all differences without offence to any and to the advantage of all. John had had too large experience of the presumption of the Egyptian (Cyril) to find anything surprising in it. But he trusted his measures would prove effectual in this as they had done in other matters (Baluz. p. 688).

However much we may regret Nestorius's rejection of John's counsels of peace, his acceptance of the party watchword would only have postponed for a time a struggle that was imminent, and which for the better definition of the faith was not only necessary, but desirable. The divergence of the Antiochene and Alexandrian schools of thought in their way of regarding the mystery of the Incarnation lay at the root of this controversy about the term θεοτόκος. This antagonism between the two schools was brought into open manifestation by the publication of Cyril's twelve "anathematisms" on the teaching of Nestorius. This bold step at once changed the aspect of the controversy, converting it from a personal attack on Nestorius to a general attack on the Antiochene school of dogma. This was the light in which it was regarded by the leaders of that school. Such a challenge of their orthodoxy must be promptly and decidedly met. Nestorius, on receiving these fulminations of the Alexandrian patriarch at the end of A.D. 430, lost no time in transmitting copies of them to John, together with his two sermons of Dec. 13 and 14, in which he professed to have acknowledged Mary as the "Mother of God" (Baluz. p. 691, c. iv.). John declared himself horror-stricken at the Apollinarian heresy which characterised Cyril's articles. He made them known far and wide, in Cappadocia, Galatia, and through the East generally, accompanying them with earnest appeals to the bishops and the orthodox everywhere to openly repudiate the grave errors they contained (Baluz. p. 838, no. xxxvi. Epist. Alexandri Episc.). His letter to Firmus is preserved (Baluz. p. 691, c. iv.), in which he expresses his abhorrence of the "capitula," which he considers so unlike Cyril both in style and doctrine that he cannot believe that they are his, and calls upon Firmus, if they reach Pontus, to examine them well and get them abjured by the bishops of the province, without naming the supposed author. He rejoices over Nestorius's public acceptance of the test-word, in the two sermons he has sent him, which has quieted the storm and restored tranquillity to the church of Constantinople. While taking these measures for the general repudiation of Cyril's heretical formularies, John was also careful to have them refuted by able theologians. See the articles ANDREAS SAMOSATENSIS and THEODORET.

The breach between the two patriarchs was now complete. Antioch denounced Alexandria, and Alexandria Antioch as heretical. The struggle required a larger arena to be fought out. This arena was supplied by the general council summoned by Theodosius to meet at Ephesus at Pentecost, A.D. 431. Passing over the details of the earlier weeks of this council, which have only a remote connexion with John, it will be enough here to mention that the arrival of John and the oriental bishops having been delayed more than a fortnight beyond the time fixed for the opening of the council, Cyril, and the majority who acted with him, resolved to wait no longer, but to proceed at once to the trial and, which was indeed a foregone conclusion, the condemnation of Nestorius. John wrote a letter in which he apologised for the tardiness of his arrival, which had been caused partly by circumstances which had unavoidably delayed his setting out from Antioch, partly by the difficulties of the journey—transport failing, and the beasts of burden breaking down. Antioch was forty-two days' journey from Ephesus, at the fastest. He had been travelling without interruption for thirty days; he was now within five or six stages of Ephesus. If Cyril would condescend to wait a little longer, he hoped in a very few days to embrace his brother of Alexandria (Baluz. p. 451, c. xxiii.). Cyril's decision was fixed and unalterable. An excuse for commencing proceedings before the arrival of John, was found in a courteous message John had sent by his two metropolitans Alexander of Hierapolis and his namesake of Apamea, but certainly never intended to be acted on, that if he was delayed Cyril was to proceed with the business the emperor had entrusted him with (Labbe, iii. 569, 1043, 1051). On Monday, the 22nd of June, A.D. 431, the bishops met, to the number of 198, in the church of St. Mary the Virgin, and within the space of one short day the bishop of New Rome, the ecclesiastical head of the second city in the world, was tried, condemned, sentenced, deposed, and excommunicated. Five days later, Saturday the 27th of June, John arrived with fourteen bishops accompanying him. His reasons for delay were very sufficient. His patriarchate was a very extensive one. His attendant bishops could not leave their churches before "New Sunday," i.e. Low Sunday, the octave of Easter, April 26. The distances some of them had to travel were so great that they could not all as semble at Antioch before May 10. When all was ready for the start, John's departure had been arrested by a famine at Antioch and consequent outbreaks of the populace; the weather had proved unfavourable; their progress was impeded by floods (ibid. 602); the transport had broken down; many of the bishops were aged men, unfit for rapid travelling. There was nothing to support Cyril's accusation that John's delay was intentional and premeditated, designed either in some unexplained way to shield Nestorius from the anathema of the council, or to escape participation in the condemnation which he saw was inevitable.

John, as has been said, brought with him only fourteen bishops. The two Alexanders and others had preceded him, but he had strictly followed the imperial commission, that each metropolitan should be accompanied by only two suffragans. Whatever was to be done must be done with promptitude and decision. Cyril being apprised of John's approach sent a deputation of bishops and ecclesiastics to offer him welcome and to apprise him in the name of the council of the deposition of Nestorius, and to signify to him that he must no longer regard him as a bishop (Labbe, iii. 761). John, who had already heard from his friend count Irenaeus, with the utmost indignation, of the hasty decision of the council, refused to admit the deputation to his presence, and they complained that on pressing for admission they were rudely treated by the guard whom Irenaeus had sent to do honour to and protect the Eastern bishops. The deputation, however, accompanied John into the city and even to the door of the house where he took up his quarters, at which they were compelled to wait for some hours, exposed to the insults of the soldiers and the attendants and hangers on of the Orientals (ib. 593, 764). While the deputies of the council were waiting outside, a rival council was being held within. The Alexanders and the other bishops who sided with John, on hearing of the arrival of their venerated chief, flew to his lodgings, where, with a precipitancy equal to that against which they were protesting, quite alien from the solemnity of the act, weary and travel-stained, "before they had shaken the dust off their feet, or taken off their cloaks" (Cyril. Epist. ad Coelest. Labbe, iii. 663), the small synod—the "conciliabulum" their enemies tauntingly called it—of forty-three bishops, passed a sentence of deposition on Cyril and Memnon, and of excommunication on all the other prelates of the council, until they should have condemned Cyril's "capitula," which they declared tainted not only with Apollinarian, but with Arian and Eunomian heresy (ibid. 596, 637, 657, 664 passim). The sentences of excommunication and deposition were posted up through the city with the utmost formality. The work of the "conciliabulum" being thus completed, John vouchsafed an audience to the deputies of the council who had been so long waiting to be admitted to his presence. They communicated the decrees of the council with regard to Nestorius, but received, they asserted, no other reply but insults and blows (ibid. 764). On their return to Cyril and his assessors they made a formal complaint of John's treatment, of which they shewed marks on their persons. The council immediately declared John separated from their communion until he should have explained such strange conduct.

The next day was Sunday. Cyril and Memnon being, in the view of John and his party, excommunicated persons, though no steps seem to have been taken to serve the decree of excommunication on them, leaving them to learn it by common report (τὸ θρυλλούμενον, ibid. iii. 637), were incapacitated from celebrating the holy mysteries. Candidian was therefore sent to them on Saturday evening to command them to desist from the attempt. The prohibition was naturally regarded with contempt, and both on that Sunday, June 28, and during the whole period of Cyril's sojourn at Ephesus, he, as well as Memnon, continued to celebrate the Eucharist, which up to that time they appear not to have done in person (Baluz. p. 704; Labbe, iii. 737). John's attempts to reduce Cyril and his adherents to submission by his own authority having thus proved fruitless, he had recourse to the emperor and the ecclesiastical and civil power at Constantinople. Among the interminable series of letters which burden the narrative of this controversy are several written to Theodosius, to the empress Pulcheria and Eudocia, the clergy, the senate, and the people of that city (Labbe, iii. 601-609; Liberat. c. vi.) to explain the tardiness of his arrival, and to justify the sentence pronounced on Cyril, Memnon, and the other bishops. These letters were sent by Candidian, who was commissioned to give the emperor an unvarnished report of the whole proceedings. Theodosius wrote in reply to the council, June 29, by the hands of Palladius, expressing his displeasure at these proceedings, declaring their decisions null, and forbidding any bishop to leave Ephesus until the dogmatic question had been settled (ibid. 704). The letter, which reached Ephesus June 29, was received with very different feelings by the two parties. Cyril and his friends complained, July 1, of the garbled statements by which Candidian had deceived the emperor, and begged that a deputation of five bishops might be allowed to wait upon him (ibid. 748). John and his friends welcomed the letter with a thousand benedictions. They assured the emperor in their reply that they had not acted with any undue warmth, or from personal feeling, but from pure zeal for the faith which was imperilled by the Apollinarianism of Cyril's "anathematisms." If their numbers were small, which their enemies taunted them with, it was because they had had more respect to the injunctions of the emperor. It would have been equally easy to the Eastern metropolitans, if they had been so minded, to have come attended with a crowd of bishops (ibid. 705). Relying on imperial favour, John, with Candidian's help, strove to persuade the Ephesians to demand a new bishop in the place of the deprived and excommunicated Memnon, but to no purpose. The churches of Ephesus were held like fortresses to hinder the accomplishment of any such a design, and an attempt to force his way into that of St. John the Baptist ended in a riot in which some of the mendicants at the church doors were wounded (ibid. 764). Meantime the legates of Celestine had arrived from Rome, and after confirming the sentence against Nestorius, the council, strengthened by their presence, and the assurance of the approbation of the bishop of Rome, proceeded, July 16, to summon John to appear before them. The first deputation found John's house surrounded with soldiers and could get no admission. The second was informed that John could hold no intercourse with excommunicated persons (ibid. 640). On this the council declared null all the acts of John's "conciliabulum" and decreed that if John refused to answer to the third citation, he should be treated with the utmost severity according to the canons (ibid. 645). John's only answer was to re-publish his condemnation of Cyril and Memnon and its alleged grounds in the form of a placard affixed to the walls of the city (ibid. 648). The next day, July 17, three bishops and a notary were sent to cite John for the third time. They found his door surrounded by a hostile body of clergy, who were with difficulty prevented from assaulting them by the soldiers, to whom one of the bishops, Commodus of Tripolis, had been previously known, their regiment having been quartered in his city. They were again refused admission to John, who sent down to them his archdeacon, whose name the deputies did not know, "a little pale man with a thin beard," who offered them a paper, which they declined to receive. The archdeacon returned to the presence of John, and in obedience to his instructions refused to receive any paper from them or to listen to any message, stating that the whole matter had been laid before the emperor and they awaited his decision. The third citation was addressed to Asphalius a presbyter of Antioch, to be communicated to John (ibid. 649-652). The council on their return separated John and the bishops who had joined him from the communion of the church, and pronounced them disqualified for all episcopal functions, and published their decree through the whole church (ibid. 802). Passing over various incidents, we come to the unwilling consent extorted from the perplexed young emperor that eight deputies should be sent by each party to lay their respective case before him. The oriental deputation included John of Antioch. Some little time before this John and his associated prelates had despatched two letters, one to the church of Antioch, the other to the aged Acacius of Beroea, fully detailing the course of events at Ephesus, and in a most unworthy manner rejoicing over the deposition and imprisonment of Cyril and Memnon, and desiring that, if the council should presume to send any of their emissaries to Antioch, they would cause him to be immediately arrested and put into the hands of the secular power as a sower of sedition (Baluz. pp. 713-715, cc. xviii. xix.).

The two counter deputations presented themselves to Theodosius in the first week in September. The emperor knew the temper of his city too well to run the risk of the disturbances their presence might cause, if he allowed them to cross the Bosphorus, and gave both parties audience at Chalcedon. While the deputies of the council confined themselves to the personal question between Cyril and Nestorius, John and his companions argued the doctrinal point before the emperor. John himself did not shrink from openly defending the orthodoxy of Nestorius, declaring his deposition illegal, and exposing the heresy of Cyril's anathematisms (Baluz. pp. 837, 839). He is reported to have declared with an oath, that even if Cyril were to condemn his own words and renounce his errors he would never regard him as a bishop, or admit him to communion except as a layman and a penitent (ibid. pp. 843, 874). To support their evidently failing cause, John and his fellow deputies wrote to some of the leading prelates of the West, the bishops of Milan, Aquileia, and Ravenna, as well as to Rufus of Thessalonica, laying before them in earnest terms the heretical character of Cyril's doctrines (Theod. Epist. 112; Labbe, iii. 736), but apparently without favourable result. The victory finally remained substantially with the Cyrillian party. After six audiences the emperor, weary of the fruitless strife, declared his final resolve. Nestorius, who was generally abandoned by his supporters, was permitted to retire to his former monastery of St. Euprepis at Antioch. Maximian, a presbyter of Constantinople, in defiance of the protest of John and his party, was consecrated Oct. 25 bishop of the imperial see in his room. Memnon and Cyril were reinstated; the former was to remain at Ephesus as its bishop; Cyril and the other bishops were to return to their homes. John and the orientals were only not formally condemned because the dogmatic question had not been discussed. Before he retired vanquished from the scene of struggle, John delivered a closing remonstrance. The churches of Chalcedon had been closed against the oriental bishops and they had been precluded from meeting for reading the Scriptures or receiving the eucharist. But they had obtained the use of a spacious hall in which they held meetings for public worship and for preaching. Large crowds assembled to listen to the powerful sermons of Theodoret, and the milder exhortations of John. The feelings of annoyance and mortification with which John left Chalcedon were deepened by the events of his homeward journey. On reaching Ancyra he and his companions found that they had been anticipated by letters from Theodotus, the bishop of that city, who was one of the eight deputies of the council, as well as from Firmus of Caesarea, and Maximian the newly appointed bishop of Constantinople, commanding that they should be regarded as excommunicate. John immediately despatched a vehement protest to Antiochus the prefect, renewing his sentence of excommunication on Theodotus and his party, denying the consecration of Maximian—"for how could he receive grace from those who had none to give, having previously deprived themselves of it by their own act?" This protest he requested Antiochus to shew to the emperor, the high officers of state, and to the senate (Baluz. p. 741, c. xxxviii.).

From Ancyra John proceeded to Tarsus. Here he was in his own patriarchate. He immediately proceeded to hold a council, together with Alexander of Hierapolis and the other deputies, at which he confirmed the deposition of Cyril and his brother commissioners (ibid. 840, 843, 847). At the same time Theodoret and the others engaged never to consent to the deposition of Nestorius. On reaching Antioch, about the middle of December, John summoned a council of bishops, which was very numerously attended, at which a fresh sentence was pronounced against Cyril, and a letter was drawn up addressed to Theodosius, calling upon him to take measures for the general condemnation of the doctrines of Cyril throughout the world, as being contrary to the Nicene faith, which they were resolved to maintain to the death (Socr. H. E. vii. 34; Liberat. c. vi.; Baluz. p. 741, c. xxxix.). A letter was also written by him in his own name to Appinian, duke of Mesopotamia, in which he expatiated on the abominable character of Cyril's heresies (ibid. p. 839, c. cxxxvi.). One of John's first cares on his return to Antioch was to visit the venerable Acacius of Beroea, whose sympathy in all the controversy had greatly strengthened and consoled him. He was accompanied by six other bishops. The old man was rejoiced by their visit, but deeply grieved to hear of the untoward result of their proceedings, and communicated his sorrow in a letter to Alexander, probably him of Hierapolis (ibid. p. 746, c. xli.). Having learnt that Rabbulas, bishop of Edessa, who had voted at Ephesus for the deposition of Cyril, but had afterwards declared himself a convert to his opinions, and had thus become, in Cyril's words, "the pillar and guard of the truth for the whole of the East," had written strongly against the doctrine of Theodore as the source of the error of Nestorius, whose teaching he anathematized; John gathered a few bishops, in whose name he wrote to Rabbulas's suffragans in Osrhoene, stating that if what was said of Rabbulas was true they ought to suspend communion with him, which he desired them to do until he had had opportunity to summon him and examine the matter (ibid. p. 749, c. lxiv.). Nestorius meanwhile was quietly settled in his monastery at Antioch, where he lived in peace and respect for four years, receiving it was said, at least at first, many presents and tokens of regard from John (Evagr. H. E. i. 7; Labbe, 14, 1071; Baluz. p. 906, c.). Almost the last recorded act of pope Celestine, the first mover in this unhappy controversy, before his death in July 432, was to write to Maximian of Constantinople, who had ventured on the bold step of deposing Helladius of Tarsus, and three other metropolitans attached to the party of John, advocating the adoption of mild measures towards the condemned bishops, among whom he specially names John himself, provided they would condemn the errors of Nestorius, together with those who held and propagated them. (Labbe, iii. 1071.)

The battle was now over, and the victory remained with Cyril. His return to Alexandria bore the character of a triumphal progress, and he was received in his own city with enthusiastic acclamations as the successful champion of the orthodox faith (Labbe, iii. 105). But the victory had been purchased by a schism in the church. Alexandria and Antioch were two hostile camps, of which Cyril and John were the commanders, each declaring the other the enemy of the truth, whose evil designs must be thwarted and crushed, or the very existence of the church would be imperilled. For three weary years a bitter strife was maintained. The issue of this conflict however was never doubtful, and as it advanced it became more and more certain what it would be. John, anxious for the peace of the church, and alarmed for his own safety in this unequal battle, soon began to shew symptoms of yielding. The emperor had given way to the urgent demands of Celestine, and had pronounced for the banishment of Nestorius. John might not unreasonably fear that his inveterate antagonist would revenge himself by demanding his own deposition. It was time that he should make it clearly seen that he had no real sympathy with the errors of the heresiarch. His relations with the exiled archbishop had greatly changed since he had become his near neighbour at Antioch. Perhaps the honour with which he had been treated had given him umbrage (Evagr. H. E. 1, 7). The pertinacity with which he continued to promulgate the tenets which had proved so ruinous to the peace of the church irritated him. This change of feeling with regard to the original cause of the quarrel removed one obstacle to the reunion of Cyril and John. The newly elected bishop of Rome, Sixtus, who had warmly embraced Cyril's cause, made special mention of John in the letter addressed to the prelates of the East in the interests of reunion, A.D. 432, declaring that even he might hope to be received again into the Catholic church, provided he repudiated all whom the council of Ephesus had deposed, and proved by his acts that he really deserved the name of a Catholic bishop (Coteler. Mon. Eccl. Græc. i. 47). John's nephew and successor Domnus added his urgency in the same direction (Cyril. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthy. cc. 42, 56). Theodosius sought to bring matters to a decision by commanding John to meet Cyril at Nicomedia, without any attendants on either side, and there arrange their differences. When this was done both the prelates were to wait upon him at Constantinople. As long as they were at variance he refused to see them (Labbe, iii. 1083). Matters however were not yet ripe for this friendly conference. John declined it on the plea of ill-health, and also because he had been informed that a plot had been formed to waylay and murder him. Besides, he heard that those now in power would demand of him as the price of peace the anathematization of the two natures, which not even Cyril had ventured to propound (Baluz. p. 754, c. l.). The execution of this order was committed to the tribune and Secretary of State Aristolaus, one of the most ardent in the cause of reunion (Baluz. 753, 756, 764). By this time Cyril had moderated somewhat of his arrogant dogmatism, and was disposed to limit his requirements to the condemnation of Nestorius and the recognition of Maximian as his successor. On the arrival of this emissary of concord, John summoned Alexander of Hierapolis, Andrew of Samosata, Theodoret, and probably some others, to Antioch. A conference was held with the view of drawing up terms of peace. At this it was agreed that if Cyril would reject his anathematisms they would restore him to communion. Six short articles were also drawn up, the acceptance of any one of which would be regarded as a sufficient warrant for reunion. Of these articles Aristolaus chose one, as the most likely to find favour with Cyril and his adherents. This was to the effect that all parties should be content with the symbol of Nicaea, rejecting all the other documents which had been the cause of so much trouble (ibid. 756, c. liii.). The propositions for union were dispatched by John to Cyril by Aristolaus. John and his fellow bishops next sought the intervention of Acacius of Beroea, the universal object of veneration, for his age, piety, and wisdom, in the hope that his influence with Cyril might render him more willing to accept the terms (Baluz. 756, c. liii.; Labbe, iii. 1114). We must refer to another article [CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA] for a fuller detail of this transaction. It is enough to say here that Cyril, though naturally declining to retract his condemnation of Nestorius's tenets, in his reply to Acacius, opened the way for a reconciliation between him and John. John, with a readiness which shews how eager he was to come to terms with his formidable foe, declared himself fully satisfied of Cyril's orthodoxy. His explanation had removed all the doubt his former language had raised (ibid. pp. 757, 782). Paul, bishop of Emesa, was despatched by John to Alexandria to confer with Cyril and bring about the much-desired restoration of communion (ibid. 783). These events, which took place in December 432, and January 433 A.D., have been fully narrated in another article. [CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, Vol. I. p. 769.] It is enough here to say that Cyril was at first greatly offended by the tenor of John's letter. "He expected an apology for the past, and he found a new insult" (Labbe, iii. 1151). He was however appeased by the representations of Paul that the bishop of Antioch meant no offence, and without further hesitation signed a confession of faith sent him by John. This had been originally drawn up by Theodoret at Ephesus, declaring in express terms "the union of the two natures without confusion in the One Christ, One Son, One Lord," and confessing "the Holy Virgin to be the Mother of God, because God the Word was incarnate and made man, and from His very conception united to Himself the temple taken from her" (Labbe, iii. 1094; Baluz. pp. 800, 804; Liberat. 8, p. 30). Cyril in his turn then gave Paul a paper containing the profession of his faith and explaining his anathematisms, which Paul approved (Labbe, iii. 1090) Cyril then advanced a step, requiring as the price of agreement the acceptance of the deposition of Nestorius, the recognition of Maximian, and an acquiescence in the sentence passed by him on the four Metropolitans deposed as Nestorians. These terms were accepted to by Paul. Each party was sincerely desirous of peace, and equally disposed to make mutual concessions. Paul placed in Cyril's hand a written consent to all his requirements, on which he was admitted to communion, and subsequently allowed to preach at the Feast of the Nativity (Cyril. Epist. 32, 40; Labbe, iii. 1095; Liberat. c. 8, p. 32). Paul however was proceeding a little too fast for John, who sent letters stating that neither he nor the other oriental bishops could consent so hastily to the condemnation of Nestorius, from whose writings he at the same time gave extracts to prove their orthodoxy (Baluz. p. 908). Paul shewed the correspondence to Aristolaus, who wrote very strongly, reprimanding the malcontents. Cyril, and the court began to weary of so much indecision. To bring matters to a point, two deacons, Cassius and Ammonius were despatched from Alexandria to Antioch with a document drawn up by Cyril and Paul for John to sign (Cyril. Epp. 40, 42), together with letters of communion to be given him if he consented to do so. Fresh delays ensued. John, though desirous of the re-establishment of peace, and apprehensive of the danger that would ensue if he continued to hold out against the wishes of Theodosius and of the empresses by whom his feeble mind was swayed, took exception to some of the language of the document. But Aristolaus, a sensible, prompt man of action, had threatened that if John interposed any more scruples he would go straight to Constantinople and let Theodosius know that it was he alone who delayed the settlement (Cyril. Ep. 40, p. 153). John in alarm reduced his demands for modification. The alterations required by him, of the nature of which we are ignorant, were accepted by Cyril, and at last in April 433 A.D., the act giving peace to the Christian world was signed and dispatched to Alexandria, where it was announced by Cyril in the cathedral on the 23rd of the month. John accompanied it with a letter to Cyril, in which he stated that in signing this document he had no intention to derogate from the authority of the Nicene creed, nor to fathom mysteries beyond the power of human thought to grasp or human language to express; but simply to stop the way against assailants of the true faith. He also expressly recognized Maximian as the lawful bishop of Constantinople in the place of Nestorius, sometime bishop, but deposed for teaching meriting anathema. He also wrote a circular letter of communion addressed to pope Sixtus, Cyril and Maximian (Labbe, iii. 1087, 1154, 1090, 1094; Cyril, Ep. 41). The East and West were once more at one. Cyril testified his joy in the celebrated letter to John, commencing "Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad" (Labbe, iii. 1106-1111). John also wrote a letter to Theodosius by the hands of Aristolaus who was returning to the court, thanking him for the peace which his cares and labours had procured for the church, which he begged him to render universal by restoring to their sees the deposed bishops. Those who had been consecrated in their room, he somewhat naïvely suggests might wait for the death of their predecessors to resume their place. As for himself he accepted the ordination of Maximian and the deposition of Nestorius, and anathematized all the latter had said and written against the true faith (Baluz. p. 737).

This accommodation however was far from being satisfactory to the extreme members of either party. Isidore of Pelusia and other adherents of Cyril expressed a fear that he had made too large concessions for the sake of peace, especially in recognizing the phrase, "two natures." On the other hand John's conduct had given great offence to many of his oldest friends and warmest supporters. They complained of his having betrayed them, and accused him of cowardice, of base desertion of the faith through fear of man, of truckling to the powerful advocates of a hollow peace to secure his position as bishop. The letters written by him to announce his reconciliation with Cyril were coldly received. Theodoret refused to abandon Nestorius. He would not deny the orthodoxy of Cyril, but he demanded that he should condemn his anathematisms, and that the four metropolitans should be restored. Alexander of Hierapolis wrote in a still more severe and uncompromising tone, and shewed the depth of his feelings by his acts. Soon after the return of Paul of Emesa he took the decided step of breaking off communion with John, his patriarch (Baluz. pp. 799, 832). It would be wearisome to follow out in detail the unhappy events of the next two years, during which John, with the zeal of a new convert, seeking to crush down all self-questioning by vigorous action, was endeavouring to force the bishops of his patriarchate to accept the submission to which he had bowed his neck. The task was a difficult and painful one, and the manner in which it was carried out throws a painful cloud over John's closing years. The narrative will be found in other articles [ALEXANDER OF HIERAPOLIS; ANDREW OF SAMOSATA, HELLADIUS OF TARSUS; IRENAEUS OF TYRE] and need not be repeated here. One by one the remonstrants succumbed to what we can hardly shrink from calling the persecution of their former leader. Theodoret was one of the last to hold out. His unwillingness to abandon Nestorius, and his rooted dislike to Cyril's articles raised a coldness between him and John, after the reconciliation of the latter with his great antagonist, which was much strengthened by an unhappy and entirely unwarrantable usurpation of power on John's part. In violation of all canonical law, at the close of 433 A.D. or the beginning of 434 he had taken upon himself to ordain bishops for the Euphratesian province, on the plea that Alexander the metropolitan had forfeited his functions by his obstinate refusal to accede to his terms of peace (Baluz. pp. 830 sq.). This usurpation caused serious irritation among the bishops of the province, who with Theodoret at their head at once withdrew from communion with John. In the synodical letter they put forth they charged him with having ordained unworthy persons, whose evil doings were notorious, and could not fail to have been known to him (Baluz. pp. 831, 850). But a party document emanating from persons suffering from extreme irritation is not the place where one expects exact truth. Even if the newly ordained bishops were such as they described, we may assert with confidence that their character was unknown to John. John unhappily continued his acts of usurpation, and by a painful want of consideration for his old friend and fellow combatant, chose this time for consecrating a bishop for Sergiopolis, a town which had clustered round the new church built by Alexander in honour of St. Sergius, at his own cost. John did not even take the trouble to inform Alexander of his intentions. The bishops of the province appealed to the empress Pulcheria against the act, but the issue is not known (ibid. pp. 838, 865). The disaffection spread. Nine provinces subject to the patriarch of Antioch renounced communion with John, who was at length driven to call in the aid of the imperial power to force them into union by ejecting the bishops who refused to accede to the terms of agreement he had arranged with Cyril. The Cilicias, under the leadership of Helladius of Tarsus, were foremost in their refusal to yield. John made a special appeal through the patrician Taurus for the aid of the secular arm in their case (Baluz. p. 827). His request was favourably received by Theodosius, who despatched a rescript ordering the expulsion of all bishops who continued to refuse to unite with John (ibid. pp. 829, 844). As narrated in another place [HELLADIUS, Vol. II. p. 889], all eventually yielded except the stubborn old bishop of Hierapolis and four others. Theodoret, whose noble nature was proof against menaces, yielded to the entreaties of James of Cyrus, and other solitaries of his diocese, famous for their sanctity, to consent to a conference with John. He was received by his old friend with the utmost cordiality. All reproaches were silenced; and when he found that John did not insist on his accepting the sentence against Nestorius, he embraced the concordat, and returned to communion with John and Cyril (ibid. pp. 834-836). The way towards accommodation had been much smoothed by the death of Nestorius's successor, Maximian, Ap. 12, 434 A.D., and the appointment as archbishop of Constantinople of the saintly Proclus, who, in the early part of the Nestorian controversy, had preached the great sermon on the Theotokos (Socr. H. E. vii. 40; Baluz. p. 851). The event was made known to John by the patrician Taurus, who received the intelligence with great joy (Baluz. p. 827). Proclus embraced communion with both John and Cyril (ibid. 858), and despatched to them a synodical letter of the bishops who had enthroned him (of which we only have a fragment), addressed apparently to the whole church, requesting communion with them (ibid. 851). All Proclus's influence was exerted in favour of peace, and that so successfully, that all the remonstrant bishops, with the exception of Alexander of Hierapolis and five others, ultimately accepted the concordat and retained their sees. Alexander was ejected in April 435 A.D. A strong representation was made by John to Proclus in the following year that Nestorius in his retirement was persisting in his blasphemies and perverting many from the truth, both in Antioch and throughout the East (ibid. p. 894), accompanied by a formal request to Theodosius that he would expel him from the East, and deprive him of the power of doing mischief (Evagr. H. E. i. 7; Theophan. p. 78.) An edict was accordingly issued commanding that all the heresiarch's books should be burnt, that his followers should be called "Simonians," and their meetings suppressed (Labbe, iii. 1209; Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 66). The property of Nestorius was confiscated, and he himself sentenced to be banished to the remote and terrible Egyptian oasis.

Although Nestorius was banished and Nestorianism placed under the ban of the imperial and ecclesiastical power, Nestorian doctrines were far too deeply rooted in the Eastern mind to be eradicated by any persecution. Cyril, suspecting that the union for which he had been so long labouring was more apparent than real, and that some of the bishops who had verbally condemned Nestorius in their hearts still cherished his teaching, procured orders from the Imperial government, which Aristolaus was commissioned to carry into effect, that the bishops should severally and explicitly repudiate Nestorianism. A formula of Cyril's having been put into John's hands for signature, he wrote to Proclus to remonstrate against this multiplicity of tests which allowed the bishops no repose, and distracted their attention from the proper care of their dioceses, in some of which the Jews and Pagans were causing great disturbances (ibid. 894). This letter was written in 436 or 437 A.D., and was probably sent by Aristolaus on his return to Constantinople.

Fresh troubles speedily broke out in the East in connexion with the writings of the greatly revered Theodore of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus, which were all the more greedily studied, now that those of Nestorius, their disciple, had been forbidden. The bishops and clergy of Armenia having appealed to Proclus for his judgment on the teaching of Theodore (Labbe, v. 463). Proclus replied by the celebrated doctrinal epistle known as the "Tome of St. Proclus." To this were attached some passages selected from Theodore's writings, but without the name of the author, which he deemed deserving of condemnation (ibid. 511-513). This letter he sent first to John with the request that he and his council would sign it, and thereby signify their union in the same faith (Liberat. p. 46; Facundus, lib. 8, c. 1, 2). At the same time he wrote a private letter to John exhorting him to watch diligently over those God had committed to his care; and since Ibas had been accused, he hoped falsely, of Nestorianizing views, he urged him to procure his signature to the Tome, to prove the falsity of the reports (Labbe, v. 511-513). In compliance with Proclus's request John assembled his provincial bishops at Antioch. They expressed annoyance at being called on for fresh signatures, as if their orthodoxy was still questionable; but they made no difficulty about signing the "Tome," which they found worthy of all admiration, both for the beauty of its style, and the dogmatic precision of its definitions. But the condemnation of the appended extracts, to which the bearers of the tome without authority from Proclus had appended the revered name of Theodore, was an entirely different matter. The very mention of such a demand called forth loud and indignant protests. They utterly refused to condemn passages divorced from their context, and capable, even as they stood, of an orthodox interpretation. A fresh schism was menaced, but the letters of remonstrance written by John and his council to Proclus and Theodosius, put a stop to the whole matter. Proclus assured them that he had no desire for a sweeping condemnation of so renowned a teacher as Theodore; but on account of the heretical character of the propositions, as they stood, he had hoped for the mere confirmation of the truth that they would have condemned them, without reference to the author. Even Cyril, who had taken an active part in the controversy, and had striven hard to procure the condemnation of Theodore, was compelled to desist from its further prosecution by the resolute front shewn by John and his Orientals, some of whom John told him were ready to be burnt rather than condemn the teaching of one they so deeply revered (Cyril. Epp. 54; 199), and to declare himself satisfied with the condemnation already long since passed on the tenets of Nestorius. Theodosius also, in a letter to John and the Oriental bishops, expressed his resolute determination that the peace of the church should not be disturbed by any fresh controversy, and his desire that no one should have the presumption to decide anything unfavourable to those who had died in the peace of the church (Baluz. p. 928, c. ccxix.). The date of this transaction is uncertain, but it may be placed with tolerable safety in 438 A.D. It is the last recorded event in John's career. We have no separate record of his death, but from the dates of the episcopate of his nephew and successor, Domnus, it must have occurred in 441 or 442 A.D. (Tillemont, Mémoires Eccl. tom. xiv. xv.; Ceillier, Auteurs Ecclés.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 412; Neander, Church. Hist. vol. iv., Clarke's edition; Milman, Latin Christianity, vol. i. pp. 141-177; Bright, Hist. of Church, pp. 310-365.) [E. V.]

JOANNES, of Antioch; vid. of Apamea.

JOANNES (32), called MARO (ܝܘܢܢܐ) after the famous monastery of St. Maro on the Orontes, or, as in the Carshunic MS. of Stephan. Edenensis, Joannes Sirimensis (ܝܘܢܢܐ ܟܦܪܝܐ), flourished about A.D. 700, and was the first patriarch and religious founder of the Maronites, a Syrian sect which has perpetuated his surname. He was born of noble and pious parents at S'rûm (Sirimis), a fortress on the Black Mountain over Antioch. Ebedjesu calls him Bar Frangoyé, which means that his parents were "Franks," i.e. Latins. He was educated first at Antioch, later at St. Maro's, and completed his studies at Constantinople. On the death of his parents he returned to Syria, and after recognizing his nephew Abraham as head of the family, retired with Cyrus, his other nephew, to St. Maro's, where he became monk and priest. By written and oral arguments he gained many converts from among the Jacobites (cf. Pagi ad ann. 635, num. 5); and visitors were attracted to him from all quarters. His fame grew apace, insomuch that the Latins of Antioch induced the Roman legate, in A.D. 686, to appoint him bishop of Botrys on the coast of Phœnicia; their object being to save the Libanotes from falling into heterodoxy. The zeal and ability of Joannes in his new sphere won over great numbers of Monophysites and Monothelites; and soon his followers had overflowed the Lebanon and occupied the Holy Land from Antioch to Jerusalem itself. Strangers, foreign slaves, natives, all alike pressed into the ranks. Joannes ordained priests and bishops for his flock, and appointed military chiefs for their protection. His captains struck dread into the Persians, and were even successful against the more formidable Saracens. In the second year of Justinianus Rhinosmetus, Joannes became patriarch of Antioch in the room of Theophanes. (The Greek prelates of that period make no mention of this: he can only have been elected, therefore, by the bishops of his own sect.) Soon, however, he was driven from the city, and took refuge at St. Maro's, from whence he sent his Book of Faith to the Libanotes. But his enemies gave him no rest; so with a great escort, furnished by Simeon prince of the Lebanon, and commanded by his nephew Abraham, he set out for the castle of Semar Gebail, near Botrys.

The patriarch now gave himself up to the work of organizing his church in the Lebanon. But in the spring of A.D. 694, an imperial army invaded Syria, razed St. Maro's, slaying 500 monks, and carried havoc everywhere. Thereupon the Maronite leaders rushed down from the heights, and wreaked signal vengeance. Mauricius, one of the generals, was slain in the battle; the other, Marcianus, died of his wounds. After this, Joannes built another monastery at Caphar Hai, a stronghold near Botrys, and there he ended his days, Feb. 9, 707. That day is observed by the Maronites, and the patriarch is commemorated in their offices.

Eutychius of Alexandria (Annal. ii. p. 191), followed by William of Tyre and many succeeding writers, has charged the Maronites and their founder with Monothelitism, a charge which Maronite scholars have laboured to refute. Nairon and Assemani at least make it very doubtful; although Mosheim writes that there are strong reasons for believing that it was Joannes Maro who brought the Libaniotes to embrace Monothelitism. He admits, however, that the ancients are silent on the point. Ceillier entirely disbelieves the accusation. A. G. Hoffmann (in Ersch u. Gruber) leaves the question undecided, remarking, after Assemani, that falsification of documents by interpolation and omission is quite supposable in the present instance. At the same time, the modern Maronites, owing to their anxiety to prove that their sect has never swerved from orthodoxy, can hardly be impartial judges. Pagi (ad ann. 400 num. 19) asserts that the monks of St. Maro were always orthodox; and therefore the Monophysite sects persecuted them. Le Quien iii. p. 10, sqq. sums up the arguments on both sides, leaving the reader to decide upon them. Of writings reputed to belong to Joannes Maro there are extant in the Vatican—

(1) A Liturgy or Anaphora beginning, "Before Thee, King of kings, and Lord of lords!"

(2) The Book of Faith, a treatise directed against the Nestorians and Monophysites. Stephanus Edenensis accuses Thomas of Caphartaba, a Monothelite bishop, of interpolating this treatise. The work begins by naming and assenting to the first four councils, and then after a summary profession of faith in the Holy Trinity, goes on to quote authority for its doctrines, referring to Pope Sylvester, Athanasius, Gregory Nyssen, St. Ambrose, St. Jacobus Sarugensis, and others, including "Saint" Severus of Antioch, which may be an interpolation. To these testimonies the writer adds the definitions of the councils, and concludes by a charge to diligently examine all this evidence of the truth.

(3) A treatise against the Monophysites.

(4) A treatise against the Nestorians.

(5) A letter on the Trisagion, defending the Syrian addition who wast crucified for us. Probably a forgery, based on the Dialogue between a Syrian and a Greek on the Trisagion by David bar Paul, a Jacobite bishop.

(6) A work on the Priesthood, really by Joannes Darenisus.

(7) An explanation of the Liturgy of St. James the Apostle, rightly ascribed by Renaudot (Lit. Or. ii. Dissert. prooem. p. 15, where all these works are rejected) to Dionysius Barsalibaeus.

The British Museum has a "concise discourse on the Incarnation of God the Word" (Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 114); and an exhortation in Arabic (Rosen and Forshall's Cat. xli. 8) by Joannes of Maron.

Joannes bar Frangoyê must not be confused with Joannes, bar Finkoyê, a Nestorian writer of uncertain epoch; nor with the Joannes Maro, who lived about A.D. 901, and is mentioned by Barhebr. Chron. ii. 236.

Bickell states that the last proves that Monothelitism once flourished among the Maronites. [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (33), bishop of Antioch in Pisidia. He signed the report of the synod of Constantinople to John the patriarch concerning Severus of Antioch, 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1039.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (34), bishop of Apamea in Syria Secunda; present at the second general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Theodoret, H. E. v. 4; Mansi, iii. 568; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 911.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (35), surnamed CODONATUS, successively bishop of Apamea, the metropolis of Syria Secunda, patriarch of Antioch, and bishop of Tyre, in the latter half of the 5th century. He was originally of Constantinople (Simplic. Ep. a Luc. Holst. ed. Mansi, vii. 996), where he seems to have allied himself to Peter Fullo, the exiled bishop of Antioch. When Fullo was restored to Antioch by the usurper Basiliscus, c. 476, John accompanied him to that city, and one of the first acts of Fullo on recovering his see was to ordain Codonatus, who was then a presbyter, to the episcopate of Apamea.* The citizens of that see, however, refused to receive him, and John had to return to Antioch (Breviar. Hist. Eutychn. Mansi, vii. 1064; Liberatus, Brevic. c. 18 in Migne, Patrol. lxxviii. 1027).

On the deposition of Basiliscus, A.D. 477, and the recovery of the empire by Zeno, that emperor exiled Peter Fullo a second time, and John, the rejected of Apamea, was chosen to succeed him. After he had occupied the see for some three months, however, he was deposed and condemned by a synod held at Antioch (Brevic. u. s.; Liberatus, u. s.; Theophanes, s. a. 469; Mansi, vii. 1018). The successor of John at Antioch was Stephen (Libell. Synod. Co. Ant. in Mansi, vii. 1175), who immediately sent a synodic to Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, to inform him of his accession to the see, and also of what had taken place with regard to Fullo and to Codonatus, and Acacius at once convened a synod at Constantinople, A.D. 478, by which Fullo and John were again condemned and a letter was sent to Simplicius bishop of Rome, praying him to concur in their condemnation (Brevic. Eutyck. u. s.; Vales. de Petr. Antioch. c. 2, ad cal. Evagr. H. E.; Mansi, vii. 1018). Simplicius replied declaring John deprived of all association with Christian persons, debarred all right of appeal, and without any reconciliation (Mansi, vii. 996).<sup>b</sup>

Stephen died A.D. 481, and was succeeded by another of the same name (Theophanes, s. a. 473), and upon his murder shortly afterwards by the party of Fullo (Libell. Synod. Co. Laodic. in Mansi, vii. 1176, Theophanes, u. s.), the emperor commanded Acacius to ordain Calandio, which he accordingly did. But in the meanwhile a council of Oriental bishops at Antioch, not knowing what was done at Constantinople, elected Codonatus to the patriarchate a second time (Victor Tununens. s. a. 488; Theophanes, u. s.). But Calandio took possession of the see, and John was again deposed. Acacius, however, notwithstanding his previous condemnation of him, and his earnest appeal to Simplicius to have that condemnation stringently confirmed, at once translated him to Tyre, where he was enthroned by Calandio. (Brevic. Eutyck. u. s.; Liberatus, Breviar. c. 18; Felix III. Ep. ad Acac. July, A.D. 484 in Mansi, vii. 1053; Ep. Synod. Rom. ad Monach. Orientales, Oct. A.D. 485; Theophanes, u. s.; Pagi Crit. s. a. 477, xi. 479, i. 482, ii. 484, xi.; Tillemont, xvi. 301, 316, 335, 353; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 726, 727, 808, 912; Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 602.)

JOANNES (36), bishop of Apamea Cibotus, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 396; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1046.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (37), bishop of Apri in Thracia, at the seventh general council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 993 E, 1096, xiii. 142, 367 A; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1125.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (38), patriarch of Aquileia c. 606. He was set up in opposition to the patriarchs of Grado [EPIPHANIUS (24)]. He had been an abbat, and three bishops were forced, according to the chronicle of Grado, to ordain him at Friuli by Gisulf the Lombard duke of Friuli and with the consent of Agilulph the Lombard king (Chronica Patriarcharum Gradensium in Monumenta Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 394, and note; Paulus Diaconus, iv. 33; Signonius, Hist. lib. ii. p. 48). A letter of Joannes to king Agilulph has been preserved, in which he complains of the oppression of the Greeks and the forcible carrying off of some bishops of Istria to Ravenna. He probably alludes to their ill-treatment by Smaragadus, exarch of Ravenna, mentioned by Paulus Diaconus (iii. 26). His rival at Grado was Candidianus, and his successor at Aquileia was Marcianus. (De Rubeis, Monum. Eccles. Aquil. p. 289; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 39; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 68.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (39) II., schismatical patriarch of Aquileia, c. A.D. 663. He succeeded Fortunatus, and is said to have held his see for ten years.

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (40), bishop of Aquinum (Aquino) in the 6th century. He is said to have been contemporary with John III. of Rome, A.D. 560-573. (Ug. Ital. Sacr. i. 441.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (41), bishop of Arbel, martyred under Sapor II. (Whight's Anc. Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 432.)

[G. T. S.]

JOANNES (42), bishop of Arcadia in Crete, present at the seventh general council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 1099, the see here mis-called Arcadiopolis, xiii. 146, 370 c, 391; Le Quien, Or. Chr.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (43), bishop of Arcadiopolis in Thracia, present at the seventh general council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 994 D, 1096, xiii. 139, 367 A, 383; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1135.) [NICEPHORUS.]

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (44), bishop of Arce in lesser Armenia; represented at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 149, 594; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 447.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (45), bishop of Argos, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 642, 673; Le Quien, Or. Ch. ii. 183.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (46), bishop of Ariassus in the second Pamphylia; signed synodal letter to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 576; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 1024.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (47) I., bishop of Ariminum (Rimini), succeeded A.D. 366. He was followed (A.D. 395) by Joannes II. who is supposed to have been living in A.D. 438. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 418; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 374, 375.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (48), bishop of Ariminum, present at the first, third, and sixth synods under pope Symmachus in March 499, Oct. 501, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who adopts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele (§ 220) (Mansi, viii. 234, 253, 315). There was a John IV., who died in or before 590. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 375.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (49) I., 28th archbishop of Arles. He is said to have died A.D. 675. (Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. 1; Acta SS. O. S. B. ii. 1032; Gall. Christ. i. 542.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (50) II., 34th archbishop of Arles, was one of the prelates who subscribed Charles the Great's will (A.D. 811). In 813 he presided over the sixth council of Arles. He is said to have died in A.D. 819. (Einhart, Vita Kar. M. sub fin., in Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 463; Mansi, xiv. 57; Vita Martini, Bouquet, vi. 306; Vita Ludovici Imp. 26, Pertz, ii. 620; Gall. Christ. i. 545.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (51) I., surnamed MARTACUNES, δ Μαρτακουνῆς in the Catal. and MANTACU-

NENSIS in Hist. Arm., catholicos of Armenia, preceding Papchen, and according to the catalogue for six years, but in the Historia Armena for twelve. [ARMENIANS.] (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1380; Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. ix. pp. 66-78.) Saint-Martin (Mem. sur l'Armen. i. 437) assigns him to the years 480-487. [L. D.]

JOANNES (52) II., catholicos of Armenia, between Nerses II. and Moses II. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1383), for seventeen years according to the catalogue, for fifteen according to the Historia Armena (Galanus, cap. 11) which states that he was of the town of Zeighuan and was surnamed CAPIEGHINUS. St. Martin (i. 437) assigns him the period A.D. 533-551. While he is called Joannes in Galanus, he is named only Βιαύτης in the Narrat. de Reb. Arm. and Εὐανέτης in the catalogue. Le Quien preserves both names. [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (53) III., of COCOSTA, orthodox catholicos of Armenia, more strictly of the province of Greek Armenia, reckoned (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1384), 28th in the series of the Armenian catholicos, following Moses II. The earlier sources of information are the Narratio de Rebus Armeniæ, and the catalogue appended to it (Combefis, Bibl. Nov. Auct. ii. 271), besides the Historia Armena of Galanus (cap. 13). The Narratio designates him as ἀπὸ τῆς Κωκοστᾶ Παγκράτων χῶρας, the catalogue only as ἀπὸ τοῦ Πακρανᾶ, the Hist. Arm. as "Ghoconthanus ex oppido Pacaranae." By all these authorities twenty-six years are assigned to John, but without dates. The dates are not computed by Le Quien, nor in the present instance are they given explicitly by St. Martin (Mém. sur l'Armen. i. 437). It was in the summer of 591 (Rawlinson, Seventh Orient. Monarchy, p. 493) that Chosroes II. king of Persia was established upon his throne. The emperor Maurice received for the important services he had rendered to Chosroes the Armenian province of Taron, extending to the river Araxes and the city of Tiben (geographical details in St. Mart. i. 25, and his notes on Le Beau, Le Bas Emp. x. 332). This province constituted Greek (also called Roman) Armenia, in the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of which Maurice placed the orthodox John, in consequence of the Armenian church, which was Monophysite, and Moses II. its catholicos, repudiating all intercourse with Maurice, while the episcopate of the ceded province were willing to conform. The date of this event then may be considered as A.D. 591 or 592, and from that period the question of orthodoxy and Monophysitism continued in hot debate through all Armenia, the authorities say for fourteen years, until the province was recovered by Chosroes. In 594 (St. Mart. i. 437) Moses II. was succeeded by Abraham I. whom Le Quien reckons the twenty-ninth catholicos. In 603, after Phocas had succeeded the murdered Maurice, Chosroes II. began his long war upon the empire. The recovery of the Armenian province, if the fourteen years are to date from 592, would be in or about 606, but the narrative of the war in Rawlinson (p. 502) would have suggested 609. When the monophysite supremacy was thus re-established by the change of civil rule John had to retire from the province and discharge his functions in exile for his people who remained. The twenty-six years assigned to him would end about 617 or 618, and the twenty-three years of Abraham in 617 (which in St. Martin's computation in regard to him), so that these two rivals were contemporary nearly all their time. [C. H.]

JOANNES (54) III. al. IV., catholicos of Armenia, under whom the schism between the Armenian and orthodox churches was consummated. [ARMENIANS.] (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1391; Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. xvii.). The Historia designates him as OZNIENSIS. He is not mentioned in the Narratio nor in the catalogue. St. Martin (i. 438) places him in A.D. 718-729, between Elias and David I., and states that he was surnamed IMASDASAR, THE PHILOSOPHER. He wrote a work on the person of Christ, two editions of which have been published at Venice, A.D. 1807 and 1816. He also wrote against the Paulicians and several works on Armenian ritual, which are still extant in MS. He attended the council of Tovin in 719. (Dwight, Catal. Armen. Auth. in Jour. Amer. Orient. Soc. t. ii. p. 254.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Asia, vid. of Ephesus.

JOANNES (55), bishop of Assos in the Troad, in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 1097, xiii. 141, 386; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 702.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (56), bishop of Athens, at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, where he acted as one of the legates of the Roman see. (Mansi, xi. 642, 672; Le Quien, ii. 171.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (57), bishop of Attalia, at the synod of Constantinople A.D. 518 (Mansi, viii. 493); whether he was bishop of Attalia in Lydia or of the better known town of the same name in Pamphylia is uncertain (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 888, 1028). There was a John, bishop of Attalia, at the seventh synod, 787, according to the Latin list (Mansi, xii. 1101, xiii. 370 B), where the Greek has Joseph. [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Auca, vid. of Valpnesta.

JOANNES (58) I., bishop of Augustopolis in Palestine, present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1218; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 727). In 536 there was a John II. at the council of Constantinople (Mansi, viii. 1172; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 728). [J. de S.]

JOANNES (59), bishop of Aureliopolis (Pericome) in Lydia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1366; v. 767; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 895.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (60), bishop of Auximum (Osimo), in 680. (Mansi, xi. 316; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 496; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (61), May 20, bishop of Auxuma (Axum), near the river Astaboras in Ethiopia. He is mentioned in the Ethiopic Calendar edited by Ludolfus (Hist. Aethiop. ii. 202), together with four other metropolitans of Abyssinia. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 645.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (62), bishop of Avignon in the list of La Rivière, who makes him the seventh bishop, John I. The commencement of his episcopate is dated A.D. 219 (Gall. Christ. i. 852). La Rivière's John II. is made the twenty-first bishop, who ruled for about fifteen years, died A.D. 429 (Gall. Christ. i. 860). The Sammarthani print La Rivière's list without adopting it. The Johns whom they recognise are the following two:—

JOANNES (63) I., eleventh bishop of Avignon, subscribed by deputy the second council of Mâcon in A.D. 585. He died before 587. (Gall. Christ. i. 798; Gams, Series Episc. 503; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. ix. 958, Florence, 1759-98.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (64) II., nineteenth bishop of Avignon. He is said to have died about the year 750 (Gall. Christ. i. 802; Gams, Series Episc. 503). As far as the dates are concerned he may be identical with the Joannes III. who appears in Dom Polycarpe de la Rivière's list of the bishops of Avignon (Gall. Christ. i. 866) as thirty-third bishop of that diocese. But the greatest obscurity envelopes the early bishops of this see. The authors of the Gallia Christiana publish two distinct lists of bishops for Avignon, their own (pp. 795-840), and one compiled by Dom Polycarpe de la Rivière (pp. 851-70), between which there is the least possible agreement. The former is undoubtedly the least untrustworthy. [S. A. B.]

JOANNES, bishop of Avila, vid. of Abela; bishop of Axum, vid. of Auxuma.

JOANNES (65), bishop of Azana in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the seventh synod, 787. (Mansi, xii. 1109, xiii. 150, 398; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 800.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (66), bishop of Balneoregium (Bagnorea) c. 600, elected by popular suffrage. His election was enquired into and approved of by Gregory the Great. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 515; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 588.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (67), "Episcopus Barbileorum," subscribed the synodical letter of the council of Chalcedon to Leo the Great, A.D. 451. (Leo, Mag. Ep. 98, 1105.) [C. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Barcusena or Barcusi, vid. of Justinapolis.

JOANNES (68), bishop of Baretta in the ecclesiastical province of Asia. At the council of Chalcedon, his name was subscribed in his absence by Hesperius of Pitane at the order of Stephen of Ephesus, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 731). In the Latin list the name of the see is Bargasa, which was a Carian city, and not known to have been episcopal. [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Bassora, vid. of Bostra; bishop of Batnae, vid. of Rhaesina; bishop of Beja, vid. of Pax Julia.

JOANNES (69), bishop of Bellunum (Belluno), c. A.D. 364, in which year he is said to have died in exile. Others place his death, A.D. 564. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 170; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 108.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (70), bishop of Beneventum (Benevento), elected A.D. 415 (Sarnelli, Memor. dei Vescovi di Benev. p. 24; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 16; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 15). A later John occurs in this see, c. 748 (Cappelletti, iii. 30.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (71), bishop of Bergamum (Bergamo), probably c. A.D. 668. For a story about him and king Cunipert, see Paulus Diaconus, vi. 8. He died c. A.D. 691, but whether as a martyr or not is uncertain. He was commemorated on July 11 (Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iii. 200). Others speak of a John bishop of Bergamum as martyred A.D. 556; but this statement is apparently without foundation. (Mansi, xi. 303; Mutio, Sacr. Istor. di Bergamo, p. 195; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 589; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 458, 539.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (72), bishop of Berytus (Beirut) in Phoenicia Prima. He flourished in the 5th century. (Maenol. Graec. 19th Feb.; Le Quien, Or. Ch. ii. 819.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (73), Nestorian bishop of Bethbagas and afterwards of Adiabene, in the 8th century. (Assem. B. O. ii. 494, iii. 478; Le Quien, ii. 1221, 1231.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (74), bishop of Beth-garma, or of Beth-seleucia according to Maruthas, martyred in the 34th year of Sapor (Assem. B. O. i. 189, iii. 748; Le Quien, ii. 1237). Le Quien considers him to be the John in the list of bishops martyred under Sapor, mentioned by Sozomen (ii. 13). [C. H.]

JOANNES (75), Nestorian bishop of Bethgarma in the 5th century. (Le Quien, ii. 1238.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (76), bishop of Bigastrum (near the modern Orihuela), appears at the eleventh council of Toledo (A.D. 675). (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247; Esp. Sagr. vii. 128.) [VINCENT.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (77), bishop of Bizya in Thracia. He took part in a conference at Constantinople with the Severians, A.D. 533. (Mansi, vii. 817; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 1147.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (78), bishop of Blera (Bieda), south of Viterbo, present at the Roman synod under Gregory II. in 721. (Mansi, xii. 265; Hefele, § 330.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES, bishop of Bomarzo, vid. of Polymartium.

JOANNES (79), said to have been bishop of Bononia (Bologna), c. A.D. 344. (Lambertini, Trattato sopra gli atti d'alcuni Santi, pp. 61, 62; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 8; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 448, 579.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (80), bishop of Bosphorus on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 518. He also attended the synod under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1048, 1143; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1327.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (81), bishop of Bostra, and metropolitan of Arabia. He was present at the 5th general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 174; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 858.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (82) called BASSORENSIS, Monophysite bishop of Bassora or Bostra in Arabia, died A.D. 650. He was author of an Anaphora beginning, Deus Largitor Caritatis et Aequanimitatis, rendered into Latin by Renaudot, vol. ii. Liturg. Orient. p. 421. The oratio fractionis in the Coptic Liturgy of St. Basil is drawn from this source. Jacobus Bartelensis, bishop of Maiphercata in Libr. Thesaur. par. 4, cap. 1, seems to imply that Joannes was also a commentator on the Scriptures, quoting his opinion that angels existed before the creation of the world, a doctrine for which Jacobus Tagritensis also refers to him. (Assem. B. O. ii. 97, 153, 239; Le Quien, ii. 1477.)

[C. J. B.]

JOANNES, bishop of Botrys. vid. of Antioch.

JOANNES (83), bishop of Brysis in the province of Haemimons in Thracia. A difficulty has arisen in identifying the exact locality, owing to a double mention in the Notitiae of Leo. (See Patrol. Gr. cvii. 370, where an archbishop of Brysis is mentioned, and in a later catalogue, p. 382, a simple bishopric.) One of these took part in the seventh general council, A.D. 787, at Nicaea. (Mansi, xii. 996 B, 1100, xiii. 143, 367 D; Le Quien, i. 1187.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (84), two bishops of Buazicha, or perhaps only one, who was also a physician, cir. 780. (Assem. B. O. 422, 431; Le Quien, ii. 1179.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (85), bishop of Bulleria in Proconsular Africa, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. The Notitia misreads the name of the see "Bullensium regio," which might have been intended for Bulla Regia, but that this town was in Numidia. (Victor Vit. Notit. 56; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 109; cf. note p. 246 in Ruinart's ed. of Victor, 1737.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Burgos; vid. of Valpuesta.

JOANNES (86), bishop of Cabillo (Châlonsur-Saône), c. 470. The circumstances under which he was ordained to his episcopate are narrated by Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. iv. 325, Migne, Patrol. lviii. 551). He is commemorated April 30. (Act. Sanct. April, iii. 778, 779; Gallia Christ. iv. 863.)

[EUPHRONIUS (5).]

[T. W. D.]

JOANNES (87) (surnamed ABRIS, i.e. LEP-ROSUS), Nestorian bishop of Cadne (Le Quien, ii. 1311), then in 686 of Nisibis (ii. 1198), and afterwards intruding catholicos of Seleucia (ii. 1123; Assem. B. O. ii. 423, 424, 429).

[C. H.]

JOANNES (88), metropolitan of Caesarea in Palestine, between Gelasius and Eulogius (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 563). The authority for him is the life of Porphyrius bishop of Gaza by Marcus Diaconus (Boll. Acta SS. 26 Feb. iii.). Porphyrius was consecrated by John (cap. 2, p. 647), from which circumstance the commencement of John's episcopate is determined to have been in 395 (Tillem. Mém. x. 850). John accompanied Porphyrius on his visit to Constantinople

(cap. 5) and on his return (cap. 8). He was dead in 404, in which year Chrysostom wrote (ep. 87) to his successor Eulogius. [C. H.]

JOANNES (89), (surnamed CHUZIBITA or CHOZEBITA and GRAMMATICUS), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, previously a monk in the laura of Chuziba (Evag. H. E. iv. 7; Joannes Moschus, Prat. Spirit. 24, 25, ap. Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxxvii. 2869). He was present at the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 518. Some writings of his are mentioned, but these are not now extant. One was an Apology for the Faith of Chalcedon referred to by Anastasius Sinaita in his Hodegus (cap. 6 in Pat. Gr. lxxxix. 101 D, 104 A, 105 D). Passages of Severus against John are quoted by Leontius of Jerusalem in his treatise against the Monophysites (Galland. Bibl. Pat. xii. 733; Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vii. 138). He was commemorated Oct. 28. (Basil. Menol. i. 149; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 570.)

[T. W. D.]

JOANNES (90), bishop and metropolitan of Caesarea in Palestine, present at the 5th general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553 (Mansi, ix. 174, 191 A, 389; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 572). He is the last known bishop of this see before the Latin period.

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (91), bishop of Caesarea in Bithynia; present at the synod at Constantinople under Mennas, 536. (Mansi, viii. 1147; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 627.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (92), bishop of Caesena (Cesena). c. 804. (Manzonius, Caesen. Chronol. p. 7; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 457; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 532.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (93), bishop of Calibe in Proconsular Africa, at the provincial council, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 116.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (94), Jacobite bishop of Callinicus (Leontopolis) on the Euphrates, chosen patriarch by the Mesopotamian bishops in opposition to Georgius, who was regularly elected by the whole communion. He held the position for four years, and died A.D. 765, when Georgius held a synod at Sarug, and deposed the bishops Joannes had ordained. (Dionysius, Chron. in Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 112, 340; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 972.)

JOANNES (95), bishop of Callipolis (Gallipoli), in the gulf of Tarentum, received a letter from Gregory the Great in 593 with reference to the crime of Andrew bishop of Tarentum. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. 46 in Migne, lxxvii. 641.) A later John, present at the Lateran synod of 649, and designated Gabopolitanus. (Mansi; x. 867), is reckoned to this see. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 100.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES, bishop of Capaccio, vid. of Paestum; bishop of Capodistria, vid. of Justinopolis; bishop of Caprita or Caorla, vid. of Concordia.

JOANNES (96), bishop of Carina, in Sicily, c. A.D. 649. His name is found as having been present at the Lateran council under Martin I., but in some editions of its records John is called bishop of Catania. (Mansi, x. 867; Pirro, Sicil. Sacr. i. 511.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (97) called CARPATHIUS. Photius (Cod. 201 in Patr. Gr. ciii. 163 b) mentions a work entitled To the Monks of India, the Consolatory Book for which they had asked, by John the Carpathian. In all probability he was bishop of the island of Carpathus in the Aegean, present at the sixth synod, 680. Cave enumerates other works attributed to him and preserved in the libraries of Vienna and Paris. (Mansi, xi. 651, 694; Cave, i. 612; Ceillier, xii. 21: Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 947.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (98), twenty-first bishop of Carpentras, said to have held the see in A.D. 813. (Gall. Christ. i. 899.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (99), bishop of Catania, in Sicily, c. A.D. 649 (Pirro, Sicil. Sacr. i. 518). He appears to have attended the Lateran council under Martin I., if he has not been confused with John, bishop of Carina (g. v.). [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (100), bishop of Cauria (Coria in Lusitania) from about 640 till after 653. (Mansi, x. 771, 1222; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423, 448; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 57.) [M. A. W.]

JOANNES, bishop of Celesene, Celezine, Celzene; vid. of Ecelisina.

JOANNES (101), bishop of Cemenoleon (Cimici, Cimella) at the council of Narbonne, 788, where he subscribed as "Cimelanensis" (Mansi, xiii. 824). This city was in the immediate neighbourhood of Nicaea (Nizza, Nice) and both cities sometimes designated the diocese [MAGNUS]; but after this John the title of the see was usually taken from Nicaea alone. He appears to have succeeded Syagrius, c. A.D. 787. He was present at the council of Narbonne, A.D. 788 or 791, where he subscribed as bishop of Cimella, being the last bishop who used this, the old title of the see. (Gall. Christ. iii. 1275; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 704.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (102), bishop of Cerasa in Lydia, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 893; Mansi, ix. 177.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (103), bishop of Cerasus, present at the seventh council, 787. (Mansi, xiii. 146, 370 D, 391; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 514.) [F. A.]

JOANNES (104), bishop of Ceretapa (Chaeretapa) in Phrygia Pacatiana, ordained by Eunoimius the Arian bishop of Cyzicus. When Theodulus was deposed by the council of Seleucia, A.D. 359, the Arians appointed Caeterius bishop, who, dying shortly afterwards, was succeeded by Joannes. (Philostorgius, H. E. ix. 18; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 811; Mansi, iii. 324.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Cesena; vid. of Caesena.

JOANNES (105), bishop of Chalcedon, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 210 D, 641, 670, 690, 989.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Chalcis, vid. of Euboea; bishop of Châlons-sur-Saône, vid. of Cabillo.

JOANNES (106), bishop of Characmoba in Palestine, c. A.D. 800, mentioned by Leontius in his life of St. Stephen Sabaita. (AA. SS. Boll. 13 Jul. iii. 544 c.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (107), bishop of Charrae (Haran) in the ecclesiastical province of Osrhoena, present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 1078, 1085, vii. 553; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 977.) He may be the "Joannes episcopus Carrhorum" in the Latin text of Mansi, vii. 438, but omitted in the Greek. [L. D.]

JOANNES (108), Jacobite bishop of Charrae cir. 740 (Le Quien, ii. 1503). Renaudot (Liturg. Or. ii. 260) thinks that the Liturgy bearing the name of Chrysostom among the Jacobites ought to be assigned to this bishop. [C. A.]

JOANNES (109), bishop of Chrysopolis in Arabia, to the east of Bostra. He was present at the fourth general council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, although he is described in the Latin codices as Joannes Cyropolitaneus. (Mansi, vii. 403; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 867.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Cindgalarat. [IOLAN.]

JOANNES, bishop of Cittanova; vid. of Aemonia.

JOANNES (110), bishop of Cius in Bithynia, present at the Trullan synod A.D. 692; in the subscriptions he is called simply bishop of Bithynia. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 634; Mansi, xi. 992.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Civita Castellana; vid. of Faleria.

JOANNES (111), bishop of Claudiopolis in Isauria, present at the synod of Constantinople in 520. (Mansi, viii. 492; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1028.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Claudiopolis in Hellespontus; vid. of Andrapa.

JOANNES (112), bishop of Cnidus (Stadia) on the peninsula of Caria, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 156; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 917.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Cogni; vid. of Iconium.

JOANNES (113), surnamed SILENTIARIUS, bishop of Colonia and afterwards one of the most celebrated of the monks. His life was written by Cyril of Scythopolis.

John was born in A.D. 454, at Nicopolis in Armenia. His father and mother were Encratius and Euphemia, noble and wealthy; many members of his family had held high office in court and camp. His parents being Christians, he and his brothers received a Christian education. Encratius and Euphemia dead, and their property divided, John consecrated himself to God in the eighteenth year of his age, built a church at Nicopolis in honour of Mary the mother of Christ, and taking ten brethren set up a monastery. In his twenty-eighth year, i.e. cir. 481, the bishop of Sebastia, metropolitan of the district, at the request of the people of Colonia, consecrated him bishop of that see. Elevated to the episcopate against his will, he continued his monastic life, specially avoiding the baths. "He thought it the greatest of all virtues never to be washed;" "determined never to be seen, even by his own eyes, without his clothes." His character had the happiest effect on his own family.

When he had been bishop of Colonia ten years he had occasion to go to Constantinople to appeal to the emperor. Here a thought came into the head of John—why should he return to be troubled with the affairs of Colonia? He embarked on a ship without the knowledge of any of his friends, and made his way to Jerusalem. Here he took up his abode in a hospital for old men, wherein was an oratory of George the Martyr, but was supernaturally guided to the community of St. Sabas.

Sabas presided over 150 anchorets; he received John, and had him appointed to some petty office. A guest-house was being built; the former bishop of Colonia, the noble of the Byzantine court, fetched water from a torrent, cooked for the builders, brought stones and other materials for the work. Next year the time came for the change of officers; the new steward appointed John to the humble duty of receiving the guests and presiding over the kitchen. A monastery was at this time being built more than ten stadia from the guest-house; it was to serve as a preparatory discipline before St. Sabas would admit new comers to the separate life of the anchoret community. John was ordered to the same servile offices during this work as during the construction of the guest-house. Sabas now allowed him a cell, and imposed on him the rule of silence for three years. Five days of the week he remained alone, seen of none, and eating nothing. On Sundays he was always first in the church, and last out of it. During service he stood trembling with humility and fear, and, at the administration of Holy Communion, used to burst into floods of tears, to the admiration and edification of the other solitaries. At the end of the three years he was himself appointed steward.

Sabas considered that it was high time now that John should be ordained, ignorant of his ecclesiastical rank. He took him to Jerusalem, and introduced him to archbishop Elias, and he was obliged to confess to the archbishop that he was a bishop. Archbishop Elias wondered at his story, summoned Sabas, and excused John from ordination, promising that from that day he should be silent, and that nobody should ever molest him.

Sabas was greatly afflicted at being, as he thought, deceived in thinking John worthy of the presbyterate, but it is said that an angelic vision appeared, he learnt the truth, hurried to John's cell, embraced him, and told him that he knew all. John was sorry, for he felt that he would have to leave the community; but the aged archimandrite promised him that nobody should know his secret.

From that time he never left his cell for four years, and was seen by nobody but the brothers who served him, except at the dedication of a church in the community, when he was obliged to go out and pay his respects to archbishop Elias. The patriarch was captivated with his conversation, and held him in honour as long as he lived.

In 503 Sabas left his community on account of the insubordination of those who lived in the new part of it, and went to Scythopolis, capital of the Second Palestine. John also departed, and went into the desert of Ruba. Here he remained silent about seven years, only leaving his cave every third or fourth day to collect wild apples, the usual food of the solitaries.

About this time Alamundarus Zizices, chief of the Saracens under the Persians, invaded Arabia and Palestine. The anchorets of the community sent to John, begging him, for the sake of safety, to return and remain at peace in his cell. He preferred, however, to trust in God, and told his biographer, Cyril, how an enormous lion used to patrol day and night in front of his cave. Theophanes would place this invasion twenty years later than it is apparently dated by Cyril.

Soon afterwards, Sabas returned to his old community, where peace had been established. He persuaded John also to return. This was in the fifty-sixth year of his age, A.D. 510. Here he continued to live a life that seemed to the idealists of those days absolutely angelical, and many stories are told of his miraculous endowments. He must have died about 558 A.D. He is honoured on May 13, but in the Menology of the emperor Basil on Dec. 8. Ceillier attributes Cyril's biography to Zacharias, bishop of Mitylene.

JOANNES (114), bishop of Comana Pontica, called Manteium at the time of Pliny. His signature is found to the decrees of the sixth general council A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 651, 678; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 518.) [F. A.]

JOANNES (115), bishop of Combi, present at the synod called Quinisext or Trullan, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1001, where the reading of the see is Sombus; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 991.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (116), bishop of Commacum in Pamphylia, at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 518 (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1026.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (117) I., twelfth bishop of Como, between Prosper and Agrippinus, elected Aug. 3, 565, died Aug. 3, 568. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 315; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 261.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (118) II., eighteenth bishop of Como. He died Oct. 5, 660 (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 262; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 318.) He was commemorated at Como on Oct. 2, but Oct. 5 was also observed in his honour. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. i. 353.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (119) III., bishop of Como, acceded probably c. A.D. 660 or 665, and died A.D. 668. He followed Joannes II. (Acta SS. 20 Oct. viii. 903; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 262; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ix. 318.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (120), second or third bishop of Concordia, on the Venetian mainland. He succeeded Augustinus in 604, and refusing to submit to the schismatic patriarch of Aquileia, whose authority was then dominant in those parts, he retired with his clergy and the Catholic portion of his flock to the neighbouring island of Caprulae which had recently been annexed to the metropolitan Catholic jurisdiction of Ravenna. (Dandulus, Chron. lib. vi. cap. 4, pars 8 in Muratori, t. xii. p. 110; Sigonius, Hist. lib. ii. ann. 605, p. 48; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 326; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 419.) The date of the removal to Concordia is fixed by Ughelli as A.D. 604. [C. H.]

JOANNES (121) I., tenth bishop of Constance, succeeding Gaudentius in 614 or 615, known to us from Walafrid Strabo's Life of St. Gall, whose disciple he was, and whom he buried [GALLUS (11)]. The sermon which St. Gall preached on the occasion of his consecration (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 9 seqq.) was translated by the new bishop for the benefit of the people of the country. This account of Walafrid's is not free from difficulties (see Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 44.) The date of John's death is unknown. He ranks among the beati. (Vita S. Galli, lib. i. capp. 15, 20, 24, 25, 30, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxiv. 991, 994, 998, 1003; Muelinen, Helvetia Sacra, i. 8; Gall. Christ. v. 893.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (122) II. (HANNO, HANNUS), appears in the list of the Gallia Christiana (v. 894), as fifteenth bishop of Constance. He is, however, omitted from the lists of Muelinen (Helvetia Sacra (i. 8) and Gams's Series Episc. (p. 271), and his position in the catalogue seems to be unsupported by testimony. According to Rettberg, the bishops of Constance up till the commencement of the 8th century are involved in the deepest obscurity. (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 106.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (123) III., 20th bishop of Constance, succeeding Sidoinus, or Sidonius (Gall. Chr. v. 895). In the lists of Muelinen (Helvet. Sac. i. 8), and Potthast (Bibl. supp. 302), who do not recognise Joannes II., he appears as second of the name. Before his elevation he was a monk of Augia Dives (Reichenau), and with the bishopric he assumed the abacies both of Reichenau and St. Gall. He trod in the steps of his predecessors, and strenuously asserted the episcopal jurisdiction against the claims of the two monasteries of Reichenau and St. Gall to independence (Pertz, Scriptores, i. 74 n.). An attempt at compromise failed, owing to the bishop's bad faith (Ratpertus, De Casibus Mon. S. Galli. c. iii., Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxvi. 1061). He was present at the council of Attigny (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 1516, Pertz, iii. 30, Legum, i.). With Lullus of Mainz and Heddo of Strasburg he is made to take part in the pretended mission to Rome on the subject of simony. But the only authority for the story is a spurious document (see Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 69, 108). He died in 781, having held his three offices for twenty-one years. (Hermannus Contractus, Chron. ad ann. 759, 781, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxliiii. 161, 164; Catal. Abbat. Sangall. et Aug. Pertz, ii. 35, 37.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, vid. of Nova Justinianopolis; bishop of Constantina in Mesopotamia, vid. of Tela; I. bishop of Constantinople. [CHRYSOSTOM].

JOANNES II. (124), surnamed CAPPADOX, Aug. 18, twenty-seventh bishop of Constantinople, patriarch and metropolitan, between the intruder Timothy and Epiphanius, A.D. 517-520. Designated by Timothy, appointed by Anastasius after an enforced condemnation of Chalcedon, John of Cappadocia, although (unless a mistake has been made with other Johns) a saint in the Greek Calendar, and called by Photius "the very home of virtue," bore a pitiable character. His short patriarchate is memorable for the celebrated Acclamations of Constantinople, and the reunion of East and West after a schism of thirty-four years.

At the death of Timothy John was presbyter and chancellor of the church of Constantinople. Whatever his subsequent career, the fact remains, that to gain the patriarchal throne he anathematized opinions to which the whole of the rest of his life shewed his vigorous adherence.

On July 9, 518, the long reign of Anastasius came to a close. Justin succeeding re-established orthodoxy. On the following Sunday, July 15, a strange scene occurred in the cathedral. The new emperor had entered, and the archbishop, accompanied by twelve other prelates, was making his way through the throngs that filled the nave. Every corner was densely crowded. As he came near the raised dais where the pulpit stood shouts arose, "Long live the patriarch! Long live the emperor! Long live the empress! Why do we remain excommunicated? Why have we not communicated these many years? You are Catholic, what do you fear, worthy servant of the Trinity? Long live the emperor! Long live the empress! Cast out Severus the Manichee! Let that holy synod, worthy of the Trinity (Chalcedon), this instant be proclaimed! Depart! or proclaim our synod! Long live the emperor! O Justin, our emperor, you win! This instant proclaim the synod of Chalcedon, because Justin reigns." These and other cries continued for some time. At length John obtained silence, and said, "I crave your patience, brethren; allow us first to adore the sacred altar, and after that I will give you my reply." The procession then passed into the inclosure, but the excited congregation went on shouting outside the gates of the choir in similar strains:—"You shall not come out unless you anathematize Severus. I take my oath on it! Long live the emperor!" The patriarch meanwhile had gained time for thought and consultation; he came out and mounted the pulpit. "You know my labours, dearly beloved," he said, "which of old I bore for the faith, which I have borne till the present, which I continue to bear till death. There is therefore no need of disturbance or tumult. Nothing has been done against the faith; none dares to anathematize the holy synod (of Chalcedon). We recognise for orthodox all the councils which have confirmed the decrees of Nicaea, and principally these three—the Council of Constantinople, the Council of Ephesus, and the great Council of Chalcedon."

But the authority of John was too scant to settle the matter in this way. The people evidently suspected either his honesty, his consistency, or his courage, and they were determined to have a more formal decision. They continued shouting for several hours, mingling with their former cries such as these: "Fix a day for a festival in honour of Chalcedon!" "Commemorate the holy synod this very morrow!" "Unless I get an answer, I stay here till night!" John then proposed to await the consent of the emperor, who had probably long since retired from the church. But the people were firm against all temporizing, and the deacon Samuel was instructed to announce the desired festival. The Greeks still commemorate on the Sunday nearest July 16 the 630 fathers of Chalcedon, and also the other general councils.

But John had not yet satisfied the people. Long after this concession, they continued as with one voice to shout with all their might, "Severus is now to be anathematized. I don't go out, unless I get an answer. I take my oath. You are orthodox; anathematize him this instant. Anathematize him, or there's nothing done!" The patriarch saw that something must be settled. He took counsel with the twelve attendant prelates. They agreed to the curse on Severus. The following decree of this extemporaneous and intimidated council was carried by acclamation: "It is plain to all that Severus in separating himself from this church condemned himself. Following, therefore, the canons and the fathers, we hold him alien and condemned by reason of his blasphemies, and we anathematize him." Loud rang the domes of St. Sophia with shouts of triumph from hoarse throats, and at length the crowd dispersed to their own homes. It was a day long remembered in Constantinople.

The next day was Monday the 16th. The promised commemoration of Chalcedon had taken place. Again the patriarch had made his professional entrance. Again as he approached the pulpit clamours arose from the whole people. "Long live the patriarch! Long live the emperor! Long live the new Constantine! Long live the new Helen! Restore the relics of Macedonius to the church! Restore those who are exiled for the faith! Let the bones of the Nestorians be dug up! Let the bones of the Eutychians be dug up! Cast out the Manichees! Cast out the two Stephens! Let the name of Macedonius be restored to its place! Cast out the new Ezumas! Cast out the accursed fellow from the palace! Restore Euphemius and Macedonius to the church! Let the Roman synodals be valid! Place the four councils in the diptychs! Place Leo, bishop of Rome, in the diptychs! Bring the diptychs to the pulpit!" This kind of cry continuing, the patriarch replied, "Yesterday we did what was enough to satisfy my dear people, and we shall do the same to-day. We must take the faith as our inviolable foundation; it will aid us to reunite the churches. Let us then glorify with one mouth the holy and consubstantial Trinity." But the people went on crying madly, "This instant, let none go out! I abjure you, shut the doors! You no longer fear Amantius the Manichee! Justin reigns, why fear Amantius?" So they continued. The patriarch tried in vain to bring them to reason. It was the outburst of enthusiasm and excitement long pent up under heterodox repression. It bore all before it, like a reservoir that has burst. The people shut the doors, and redoubled their shouts. The patriarch was at last obliged to take the diptychs and get inserted the names of the four councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, of Euphemius and Macedonius, patriarchs of Constantinople, and of Leo bishop of Rome. Then the multitude sang with one loud voice, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people!" They stood on either side the sacred enclosure, and chanted this canticle for more than an hour. By this time the choir had assembled on the raised platform, and, turning eastwards, sang the Trisagion. Then the whole people was silent, and listened to the sacred strain. The gospel was then read, and the communion office of the catechumens finished. Then came the complete office; the gates of the choir were closed, the service went on, and the moment arrived for the recitation of the names of the defunct bishops from the diptychs. The multitude closed round in deep silence about the holy table. And when the deacon had read only the new insertions, again a mighty shout arose, "Glory be to thee, O Lord!" The liturgy was quietly finished, and care was taken by the orthodox monks, who doubtless were the main authors of the whole demonstration, to write out a verbatim record of what had taken place on these two most remarkable days, and to present it as a memorandum to the patriarch John.

To authenticate what had been thus done, John assembled a council of forty bishops, who happened to be at the capital. The abbats of the city presented a petition to the same effect, which bore 104 signatures. The council assembled July 20, 518, A.D. The memories of Euphemius and Macedonius were reinstated, according to the precedent of Paul, banished in the days of Constantine, John Chrysostom and Flavian. All who had been exiled on account of these two prelates were also restored. The four general councils, and the name of Leo bishop of Rome, were also inscribed in the diptychs. Severus of Antioch was anathematized after an examination of his works, in which a distinct condemnation of Chalcedon was discovered. A synodal was then written to the patriarch John, who had not been present (probably on account of the ostensible irregularity of his enforced proceedings in St. Sophia), and he was requested to report it to the emperor, the empress, and the senate. John then wrote to John of Jerusalem and to Epiphanius of Tyre, telling them the good news of the acclamations and the synod. His letters were accompanied by orders from Justin to restore all who had been banished by Anastasius, and to inscribe the council of Chalcedon in the diptychs.

At Jerusalem and at Tyre there was great joy. Many other churches declared for Chalcedon, and during the reign of Justin two thousand five hundred bishops sent in their adhesion and approval.

Now came the reconciliation with Rome. The emperor Justin wrote to the pope a fortnight after the scene of the acclamations, informing him of his election, begging him to further the desires of the patriarch John for the reunion of the churches, and to send bishops capable of arranging terms. John wrote saying that he received the four general councils, and that the names of Leo and of Hormisdas himself had been put in the diptychs. Count Justinian, the emperor's nephew, also wrote saying that the only difficulty now remaining was the name of Acacius. A deputation of two bishops, a presbyter and two deacons were sent to Constantinople, bearing a large number of letters, and with instructions that Acacius was to be anathematized by name, but that Euphemius and Macedonius might be passed over in silence.

The deputies arrived at Constantinople, on Monday in Holy Week, March 25, 519. Next day, Tuesday, the 26th, they had an audience of the emperor, in presence of all the senate, and of four bishops deputed by the patriarch. Justin received the pope's letters with great respect, and told the ambassadors to come to an explanation with the patriarch.

Wednesday and Thursday passed, and on Thursday, March 28, the patriarch came to the palace, and a general assembly was held. He received the pope's formula, but at first wished to express his adherence in the form of a letter; but after some contest with the legates, he agreed to write a little preface, and to place after it the words of Hormisdas, which he copied out in his own handwriting. Two copies were sent by the legates to Rome, one in Greek, the other in Latin. Emperor, senate, and all present were so overjoyed at this ratification of peace, that some even burst into tears.

The sting of the transaction still remained; they had now to efface from the diptychs the names of five patriarchs and two emperors, Acacius, Fravitta, Euphemius, Macedonius and Timotheus; Zeno and Anastasius. All the bishops at Constantinople gave in their consent in writing; so did all the abbats, after some had raised a difficulty.

It was Easter day when the pacification of the churches was promulgated. From the palace the court and people, equally enthusiastic, surged into St. Sophia. Again the vaults resounded with acclamations in praise of God, the emperor, St. Peter, and the bishop of Rome. The expectations of the opponents, who had prophesied sedition and tumult, were signally disappointed. Never within memory had so vast a number communicated. The emperor sent an account of the whole proceedings throughout the provinces, and the ambassadors forwarded their own report to Rome, saying that there only remained the negotiations with Antioch. John also wrote to Hormisdas to congratulate him on the great work effected, and to offer him the credit of the success. John also received this year a letter from Avitus, the famous bishop of Vienne, warmly commenting on the happy event.

On Jan. 19, 520, we find John writing to Hormisdas, noting that Easter that year would fall on April 19. Soon afterwards he died. He is commemorated in the Greek church on Aug. 18.

JOANNES (125) III., surnamed SCHOLASTICUS, THE LAWYER, thirty-second bishop of Constantinople, patriarch and metropolitan, intruded by Justinian and his successor during the twelve years' exile of Eutychius (April 12, 565—Aug. 31, 577). He was born at Sirimis, in the region of Cynegia, near Antioch. In his early days there was a flourishing college of lawyers, at Antioch, where he entered, and did himself credit. This was suppressed in 533, with other provincial schools of law, by a constitution of Justinian, who determined that this study should be practised only at the capitals of the empire. Passing into the ranks of the clergy, he became agent and secretary of his church. This would bring him into direct communication with the court at Constantinople. When, towards the close of Justinian's life, he tried to raise the sect of the Aphthartodocetæ to the rank of orthodoxy, and determined to expel the blameless Eutychius for his opposition, no more appropriate instrument of the imperial pleasure could be thought of for the patriarchal chair than the able lawyer-ecclesiastic of Antioch, who had already distinguished himself by his great edition of the canons.

Little is known of the episcopal career of John the Lawyer. Seven months after his appointment Justinian died. The new emperor, Justin II., was crowned by the patriarch, Nov. 14, 565. A picturesque description is given of the scene in a poem by Victor Tununensis. John himself died shortly before Justin. Evagrius makes John crown Tiberius II., but Eustathius, the biographer of the patriarch Eutychius, clearly shews that Justin was still alive when the death of John enabled Eutychius to be recalled.

One of the most useful works of that period was the Digest of Canon Law formed by John at Antioch. Following some older work which he mentions in his preface, he abandoned the historical plan of giving the decrees of each council in order, and arranged them on a philosophical principle, according to their matter. The older writers had sixty heads. He reduced the number to fifty. To the canons of the councils of Nicaea, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Ephesus, and Constantinople, already collected and received in the Greek Church, John added the "Apostolical Canons," to the number of eighty-nine, the twenty-one of Sardica, and the sixty-eight of the canonical letter of Basil. In writing to Photius, pope Nicholas I. cites a harmony of the canons which includes those of Sardica; the only harmony at that time answering this description would be that of John the Lawyer. When he came to Constantinople, he edited a new work, the Nomocanon, an abridgement of the first, with the addition of a comparison of the imperial rescripts and civil laws (especially the Novels of Justinian) under each head. Balsamon cites this work without naming the author, in his notes on the first canon of the Trullan Council of Constantinople. In a manuscript of the Paris library the Nomocanon is attributed to Theodoret, but in all others it bears the name of John. Theodoret would not have inserted the "apostolical canons" and those of Sardica in such a work; and the style has no resemblance to his. In 1661 these two works of John the Lawyer were printed at the beginning of the second volume of the Bibliotheca

Canonica of Justellus, at Paris. Photius (Codex lxxv.) mentions his catechism, in which he established the Catholic teaching of the holy and consubstantial Trinity, saying that he wrote it in 568, under Justin II., and that it was afterwards attacked by the impious and silly Philoponus. Fabricius on the whole considers it probable that the Digest or Harmony and the Nomocanon are rightly assigned to John the Lawyer. He is commemorated by some Greek menologies on Feb. 21. (Fabricius, xi. 101; xii. 146, 193, 201, 209; Evagrius, H. E. iv. 38; v. 13, Patr. Graec. lxxxvi. part 2; Theoph. Chronogr. 204, &c., Patr. Graec. cviii.; Niceph. Callist. iii. 455, Patr. Graec. cxlvii.; Victor Tununensis, Patr. Lat. lrviii. 937; Baronius, ad ann. 564, xiv. xxix.; 565, xvii.; 578, 5; Patr. Constant. in Acta SS. Bolland. Aug. i. p. *67.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (126) IV. (surnamed THE FASTER, JEJUNATOR, sometimes also called CAPPADOX, and thus liable to be confused with the patriarch John II.), thirty-third bishop of Constantinople, metropolitan and patriarch, from April 11, 582 to Sept. 2, 595, commemorated by the Greek church on Sept. 2. He was born at Constantinople of artisan parents, and himself was a sculptor. According to a discourse attributed to him, he appears to have become a monk. His predecessor seems to have heard that he was likely to be appointed, and did not augur well of him on account of the obtrusiveness of his fasts. John is said to have fled at the time of the election, but to have taken good care to let it be known where he was.

In 587 or 588 John the Faster summoned a general council of the East to decide the cause of Gregory archbishop of Antioch. Gregory, afterwards pope Gregory the Great, who was then living at Constantinople, asserts that this was only a pretext of John for extending his authority and airing his favourite title. That title had been claimed before by John the Cappadocian and by Mennas, but not so boldly enforced. John the Faster summoned the bishops of the East in the name of "the Oecumenical Patriarch." The archbishop of Antioch was acquitted, and returned to his see. Pelagius II., bishop of Rome, solemnly annulled the acts of this council, and the archdeacon Laurentius, who represented the Roman see at the capital of the East, was forbidden to assist John at the administration of communion.

In 593 Gregory sent as his representative at Constantinople Sabinianus, his secretary, who succeeded him in his see. He had written before to John, blaming him for having allowed an Isaurian presbyter named Anastasius, accused with some other Isaurian presbyters of heresy, to be beaten with ropes in the church of Constantinople. These letters are lost, as is John the Faster's reply, in which he had said he did not know why Gregory wrote. In the letter which Gregory sent by Sabinianus he answered in very strong terms.

In 595 the controversy again blazed forth about the title of universal bishop. We find Gregory the Great writing to the emperor Maurice to the effect that though such an honour had been offered to the bishop of Rome by the Council of Chalcedon, no Roman prelate had ventured to accept or use it. To his legate Sabinianus he wrote as Pelagius had written to Laurentius, forbidding him to communicate with John. Letters on other subjects passed at this time between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. A presbyter of Chalcedon named John had been condemned by John the Faster's ecclesiastical court on a charge of Marcionitism [EUCHITES]; the presbyter had appealed to Rome and was acquitted by the Roman synod. Gregory speaks to the patriarch of "your most sweet and delightful letters about John," and writes himself with great politeness. Another case was that of a presbyter named Athanasius, accused of being to some extent a Manichee, and condemned as such. Gregory shews that the accuser on this occasion was himself a Pelagian, and that by the carelessness, ignorance, or fault of John the Faster, the Nestorian council of Ephesus had actually been mistaken for the Catholic, so that heretics would be taken for orthodox, and orthodox condemned as heretics!

In 596 the schemes and ambitions of John the Faster were ended by death. About his fasting, the purity of his life, and the extreme austerity of his personal habits there could be no doubt. Saintsship was accorded to him by the Byzantines as spontaneously as the title by which they had indicated his celebrity for abstinence.

His Writings.—Isidore of Seville (De Script. Eccl. 26) attributes to him only a letter on baptism addressed to St. Leander. John, he says, "propounds nothing of his own, but only repeats the opinions of the ancient fathers on trine immersion." This tract is no longer to be found.

But there are extant four works attributed to John the Faster. 1. His Penitential, Libellus Poenitentialis, or, as it is described in the third book of the work of Leo Allatius, de Consensu Utriusque Ecclesiae (Rome, 1655, 4to.), Praxis Graecis Praescripta in Confessione Peragenda, ἀκολουθία καὶ τάξις ἐπὶ ἑξομολογουμένων. In 1651 Morinus published it at Paris in folio from a MS. of the Altempsian Library in his work on Penitence; it came out again at Brussels in 1685, Venice, 1702. Morinus added the places where it had been quoted. It has been urged that this work must be long after the time of John the Faster, because it mentions three fasts of forty days to be kept by Christians, in which laymen as well as ecclesiastics were to abstain from meat; whereas these three fasts were hardly heard of by the Greeks before the 10th century, and were suppressed in the 11th. Morinus, however, considers that these are interpolations in the work of John the Faster, and that we have the body of his production. Schröckh is hardly satisfied about it. But the fact that John was blamed by later writers for too great indulgence agrees very well with the character of the existing work, as the catalogue of vices detailed at disgusting length is of the most hideous and appalling description. The Greeks of the middle ages always attributed this and the next to John the Faster.

2. Λόγος πρὸς τὸν μέλλοντα ἐξαγορεύσαι τὸν ἑαυτοῦ πνευματικὸν υἱόν; Instructio, qua non modo confitens de confessione pie et integre edenda instituitur, sed etiam sacerdos, qua ratione confessiones excipiat, poenitentiam imponat et reconciliationem praestet informa- tur. This was edited at the same time by Morinus. He got the MS. from the library of Charles de Montchal, archbishop of Toulouse. Morinus was doubtful whether this was John's, or whether some writer had taken it from his Penitential. The MS. attributed it directly to John.

3. Περὶ μετανοίας καὶ ἐγκρατείας καὶ παρθενίας λόγος; Homily on Penitence, Continence, and Virginitv.

This has often been printed among Chrysostom's homilies, but it is now agreed not to be Chrysostom's, as the style is base, turgid, and occasionally ungrammatical. This would suit the account we have of the education and character of John the Faster. Montfaucon, Vossius, and Pearson held it to be by John the Faster; Morel and Savile still printed it among Chrysostom's works.

4. Περὶ ψευδοπροφητῶν καὶ ψευδοδιδασκάλων καὶ ἄθελων αἰρετικῶν καὶ σημείων τῆς συντελείας; Homily on False Prophets and False Doctrine.

Said to be written shortly before the author's death. Attributed occasionally to Chrysostom, by Peter Wastel to John of Jerusalem, but by Vossius, Petavius, and Cave to John the Faster.

5. A set of Precepts to a Monk, not yet edited, in a MS. at the Paris library.

Migne reproduces the Penitential, the Instructions for Confession, and the Homily on Penitence. (Joh. Jejun. Arch. CP. in Pat. Gr. lxxxviii. 1089, &c.; Theoph. Chronogr. 212, 213, 225, Patr. Graec. cviii.; Niceph. Callist. H. E. xviii. 34, Patr. Graec. cxlvii. p. 396; Baronius ad ann. 588-593; AA. SS. Bolland. Aug. 1, p. 69; Fleury, ii. Book xxiv. c. 44, &c.; Ceillier, xi. 427, &c.; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. xi. 108, xii. 239; Greg. Mag. Epist. I. ix. 4, &c. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 447, &c.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (127) V., (A.D. 669-673 or 675), 41st bishop of Constantinople, metropolitan and patriarch. Pagi points out the error of Baronius in dating his episcopate from 658. A letter of his to Macarius is quoted in the sixth General Council, where he is styled "of blessed memory." (Pope Paul V.'s Concilia Gen. Eccl. iii. p. 207, Sext. Synod. Act. 13 (Rome, 1628); Baronius ad ann. 658; Pagi, note; Niceph. Callist. Enarratio, Patr. Graec. cxlvii. p. 457; AA. SS. Bolland. August. i. p. 83.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (128) VI. (712-715 A.D.), 48th bishop of Constantinople, patriarch and metropolitan. At the expulsion of the patriarch Cyrus by the emperor Philipppicus John was deacon and chartulary of the Great Church. He subsequently declared that Philipppicus had determined to replace Cyrus by as thorough a Monothelite as himself; that the bishops had interposed, had recommended to him John as agreeable to themselves and likely to suit the tyrant; and that, much against his will, to save the church further troubles, he had consented to bend to the storm, to forswear the 6th Council General, and to accept the patriarchate. If John here describes his position accurately, he was confessing himself a hypocrite. In 713, on the deposition of Philipppicus, his successor Anastasius II. was crowned by the patriarch John, when all the bishops and clergy proclaimed the restoration of the 6th Council General to its full honours.

John wrote a long letter to pope Constantine, still extant in Latin in the collection of the writings of Constantine. He apologises for not having written on his election; he had been prevented by the tyrant. Giving the account already cited of his promotion, he complains of the severity of Philipppicus, his heterodoxy, and the dangers which the church had suffered; takes credit for not having abjured the Council of Chalcedon; professes his faith in two natural wills and two natural operations in Jesus Christ; adds that Philipppicus had gained nothing by burning the imperial copy of the 6th Synod, because in the patriarchal palace he had kept carefully the same acts, subscribed by the bishops and emperor, and besides that, that there was the copy made by Paul, afterwards patriarch; prays the pope to pardon the past, and to send his synodical letters in token of mutual charity as he now sends his own; and protests that he will never have peace, nor will sleep ever close his eyes till he has seen the church of God preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. What reply the bishop of Rome made, we do not know; but the deacon Agatho, warden of the archives of the Great Church of Constantinople, protonotary and second chancellor of the patriarchal court, put John's letter at the end of the acts of the 6th General Council, with a note. In 715 or 714 the episcopate of John came to a close. Zonaras represents him as deposed; but Theophanes, a more trustworthy authority, says that he died. (Theoph. Chronogr. 320, Patr. Graec. cviii. p. 773; Const. Pap. Epistol. 3, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. p. 341; Niceph. Callist. Enarratio, Patr. Graec. cxlvii. p. 458.)

[W. M. S.]

JOANNES (129), bishop of Cordylus in the second Pamphylia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. The name of the see appears in Mansi also under the forms Codrula, Cudrula, Crudula. (Mansi, xiii. 150, 371D, 396; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1032.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Coria; vid. of Cauria.

JOANNES (130), bishop of Corinth and metropolitan of Hellas, consecrated A.D. 595. Amongst the letters of pope Gregory I. there are two addressed in 595 to this bishop, giving him directions concerning the right ruling of God's flock, and warning him against simony (Ep. v. 52, 57). He is also mentioned in three circular letters of 595, 597, 599. (Ep. v. 58; viii. 5; ix. 68; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 162; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 115, 123, 130.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (131), bishop of Corycus on the coast of Cilicia. He was present at the sixth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 680, and also signed the canons of the "Quinsextine" synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi xi. 640, 651, 679, 1006; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 881.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (132), bishop of Cremona, present at the council held under Eusebius of Milan A.D. 451. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 97, p. 1084; Ital. Sacra. iv. 580.) [C. G.]

JOANNES (133), a bishop of Crete, addressed along with others by pope Gregory the Great in 597 and 599 (Epp. lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 5, lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 68; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 123, 130). The first letter reads Joanni Cretensi

Scoritano, which is probably an error of punctuation (vid. the bishop of Scodra). [C. H.]

JOANNES (134), bishop of Cronium, or Cronia, in Sicily, c. A.D. 680 (Gams, Series Episc. p. 955.) Doubt has been thrown on the existence of such a place, at least as an episcopal see. (Piccolus, De Antiq. Jure Siculae Eccles. pt. i. cap. 5; Pirro, Sic. Sac. i. 509.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (135), bishop of Croton (Cotrone), mentioned in the Fragmentum Damnationis Theodori of pope Vigilius, A.D. 551 (Vigil. Pap. Epp. in Pat. Lat. lxxix. 62B; Mansi, ix. 60D; Baron. A. E. ann. 551, xi.). The name Joannes however is by Migne and Mansi read Jordanes, and in Baronius his designation is Cortonensis. Ughelli (Ital. Sac. ix. 384) and Cappelletti (xxi. 188) adopt him as John of Croton in succession to Flavianus. [C. H.]

JOANNES (136) I, bishop of Cucusus, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 389; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 452.) A second John of this see was present at the Trullan synod (Quinisext) A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 999.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, archbishop of Cyprus (Mansi, xi. 961; Baron. A. E. ann. 690, xii.), vid. of Nova Justinianopolis.

JOANNES (137), bishop of Cyrrhus (Cyrus), north-east of Antioch. During the usurpation of Basiliscus, A.D. 475-477, he assembled a synod in his city and anathematized Peter the Fuller, who had again seized the patriarchal throne of Antioch. (Mansi, vii. 1018, 1176; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 932.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (138) I, bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of the Hellespontine province, 650, addressed in a letter by St. Maximus (Epist. vi.), demonstrating the incorporeality of the soul. To him also Maximus dedicated his "quaestiones in Gregorium" in the "liber Ambiguorum." (Migne, Patr. Graec. xci. 238, 116*; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 755.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (139), bishop of Dalda (Messen) in Lydia; present at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 996D, 1102, xliii. 143, 370 A, 390; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 892.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (140), bishop of Damascus, and metropolitan of the province Phoenicia Secunda. He signed his name as metropolitan to the protest of the Eastern bishops at the third general council of Ephesus (his predecessors Magnus and Philippus having simply used the title Damascenus at the previous oecumenical councils). He was afterwards sent as delegate with John of Antioch to the emperor. (Mansi, iv. 1270; Synod. Adv. Trag. Iren. cap. 23, 28 in Mansi, v. 791, 795; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 835.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (141), bishop of Damascus, and metropolitan of the province Phoenicia Secunda. He signed the encyclical letter of his province, addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 559; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 835.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (142), Nestorian bishop of Damascus, cir. 632. (Assem. B. O. iii. 107; Le Quien, ii. 1289.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (143), called DARENSIS, Monophysite bishop of Dara, a town about twelve miles from Nisibis. He was a contemporary of Dionysius Telmaharensis (patriarch 818-841 A.D.); although Abraham Echéllensis assigns him to the 4th cent., and Cave places him between the 6th and 7th. See Barhebraeus, ii. 285, apud Assem. B. O. ii. 219. He must be deemed, therefore, beyond the period dealt with in the present work, and he is only noticed to correct the errors which have been made as to his date. [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (144), bishop of Dascyllium in Bithynia; present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Quinisext synod, A.D. 692. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 629; Mansi, xi. 211 A, 650, 677, 996.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (145), bishop of Decatera in Dalmatia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xliii. 374 A, 727; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 250.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (146), bishop of Derthona (Tortona) c. A.D. 557, or, according to others, 568. He is variously stated to have sat for two and for twelve years. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 833; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xliii. 670.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (147), bishop of Dertosa (Tortosa), signs the fourth and sixth councils of Toledo (A.D. 633, 638, Mansi, x. 642, 671). (Esp. Sagr. xlii. 85; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. &c. ii. 315, 348.) [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (148), Nestorian bishop of Destsana, martyred with St. Simeon Barsabœ under Sapor. (Assem. B. O. iii. 585; Le Quien, ii. 1213.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (149), bishop of Diocæsarea in Isauria, on the Calycadnus. He was present at the fourth general council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where he signed the sixth session. (Mansi, vii. 144; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1021.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (150), bishop of Dora in Palestine, present at the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1174; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 579.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, of Drepanum, vid. of Helenopolis.

JOANNES (151), bishop of Dumium before A.D. 589. He subscribes the acts of the third council of Toledo. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238; Esp. Sagr. xxiii. 38.) [ST. MARTIN.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (152), a bishop in the East addressed by Gregory Nyssen. (Ep. 19 in Pat. Gr. xlvi. 1071.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (153), bishop of Ecelisina present at a council of Constantinople in 459 (Mansi, vii. 917; Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 1619). This city, in Great Armenia, was variously written Celezene, Celezine, Celzene, Acilzene. It afterwards, under all John's known successors, bore the name of Justinianopolis. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 435.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (154), bishop of Egara before the year 683. He sent his vicar Samuel to represent him at the thirteenth council of Toledo (A.D. 683), and appeared in person at the fifteenth and sixteenth councils (688, 693). (Aguirre-Catalani, v. 287, 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. xlii. 196.) [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (155), bishop of the Egyptian Meletians and one of the heads of the sect, mentioned with much respect by Epiphanius (Hæc. lxxviii. 5). [C. H.]

JOANNES (156), one of the Egyptian bishops whom Leo the Great addressed, A.D. 460, on the occasion of the election of Timotheos Salofaciolus to the see of Alexandria in place of Timotheus Aelurus. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 73, 1437.) [C. G.]

JOANNES (157), bishop of Elepla from about 620 to 646. He signs the acts of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633). [ISIDORUS; EPARCUS.] Though his see is not named, he is identified by being the only suffragan bishop of St. Isidore at that time of the name of Joannes. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 63; Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Española, ii. 315, 348, 360.) [F. D.]

JOANNES (158) I. II. III. IV. V., bishops of Elvira or Eliberi or Granada. Of these, only the names are known and the order of their succession. Joannes I. was the successor of Gregorius Baeticus, who was alive in A.D. 392, and was then a very old man. After him the order of succession was Valerius, Lusidius, Joannes II., Joannes III., Visus, Joannes IV., Joannes V., all undated. A Joannes bishop of Elvira subscribes the acts of the fifteenth council of Toledo in A.D. 688 (Mansi, xii. 21; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 351), and Florez calls him Joannes V. (Gams, Ser. Episc. 34; Florez, Esp. Sag. xii. 138, 158.) [F. D.]

JOANNES (159) II., bishop of Ephesus, one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo I. addressed his circular letter in 457 or 458 (Mansi, vii. 523; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 679). The Apostle John is reckoned as John I. [C. H.]

JOANNES (160) (called JOHN OF ASIA and JOHN OF EPHESUS), Monophysite bishop of Ephesus, born circ. A.D. 516, and still living in 585, a Syriac writer whose chief work was his History of the Church. In the extant portion of that work, he describes himself once as "John, who is called superintendent of the heathen (ܝܘܢܢܐ) and Breaker of Idols" (ii. 4), and twice as "John who is over the heathen, who was bishop of Ephesus" (ii. 41; iii. 15). Elsewhere he styles himself, "John bishop of Ephesus" (iv. 45), or simply, "John of Ephesus" (v. 1); and, lastly, "John of Asia, that is, John of Ephesus" (v. 7). From these references it is clear that John of Ephesus is the historian so often mentioned by Syriac writers as John bishop of Asia; "Asia" meaning the district of which Ephesus was the capital.

A statement of Evagrius (v. 24) appears to shew that our author was his kinsman. His words are: καὶ τὰ ἐχόμενα δὲ τοῦτῃ Ἀγαθίῳ τῷ ἁγίῳ καὶ ἰωάννῃ ἐμῷ τε πολλῆρ καὶ συγγενεῖ καθ' εἰρὸν ἰστόρηται, μέχρι τῆς Χοσροῦ τοῦ νέου πρὸς Ῥωμαίους φυγῆς, καὶ τῆς εἰς τὴν αὐτοῦ βασιλείαν ἀποκαταστάσεως. The period thus indicated, viz. from the time of Justinian to the restoration of Chosroes the younger by the emperor Maurice, fairly synchronizes with John's history. Assemani, indeed, concluded from a passage in the Chronicon of Dionysius; that some other John was intended by Evagrius. The Jacobite patriarch names John of Asia as one of his authorities, in the following manner: "Now from Theodosius the Younger unto king Justinian [we have borrowed] from the holy John bishop of Asia; that is, unto the year 885" [A.D. 574]. Accordingly, Assemani supposed that John's narrative terminated with that year; but the Third Part of the work itself, since discovered, proves that it extended to at least A.D. 585 (see iv. 61).

Dr. Land in his monograph entitled, Johann von Ephesus der erste syrische Kirchenhistoriker, has discussed the question whether our author is to be identified with any one of his numerous namesakes who wrote during the same period; and has pronounced in the negative.

What we know of the personal history of John of Ephesus is gathered from the meagre extracts from the second part of his great work, which are preserved in the Chronicon of Dionysius; and from the extant third part, which is to some extent a biography of the writer. From Dionysius (apud Assemani, Bibl. Or. 83-90) we learn that John's birth-place was Amid in northern Mesopotamia. He stood high in the confidence of the emperor Justinian, by whom he was commissioned in A.D. 542 as "Teacher of the heathen" in the four provinces of Asia, Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia. John's success as a missionary was such that in four years seventy thousand persons adopted Christianity. The emperor supplied vessels, vestments, and books for ninety-six new churches, of which forty-one were reared at the cost of the converts, the rest built with imperial funds. In the third part of his history (ii. 44) John mentions that Deuterius was his fellow labourer in this good work during thirty-five years; and that he left him as his successor in Caria. Together they had built ninety-nine churches and twelve monasteries. Recurring to this subject (iii. 36-37) John tells how the work began among the mountains round Tralles. His chief monastery, Darira (ܕܪܝܪܐ), rose upon the site of a famous temple, which he had demolished.

In A.D. 546, John of Ephesus was charged with an enquiry into the secret practice of pagan rites by professing Christians. Members of all ranks in the state were inculturated: Phocas, prefect of the capital, being informed against, poisoned himself. John was appointed to instruct the accused in Christian doctrine; and an imperial edict prescribed conversion within three months! Theophanes informs us, further, that heathens and heretics were to be excluded from public office.

From the third part of John's history we learn that in the second year of Tiberius (A.D. 579), upon the rumour of a heathen plot to destroy the Christians of Baalbec, the emperor ordered an officer named Theophilus to suppress paganism in the East. Torture, crucifixion, the sword, wild beasts, were among the means employed.

Numbers were accused; the prisons teemed with victims of every rank; and a permanent inquisition was established for their trial.

As bishop of Ephesus or "Asia," John appears to have exercised supervision over all the Monophysite congregations of Asia Minor. His thirty years of influence at the court of Justinian, and his high personal qualities, gave him very considerable authority among his own party. He tells us himself (v. 1) that in the reign of Justin II. "John of Ephesus was dwelling in the royal city and controlling all the revenues of all the congregations of the Faithful there and in every place." And, in a chapter written in A.D. 531, he mentions his old intimacy with Tiberius at the court of Justin: "He and I were often together, and stood with the other courtiers before the serene Justin" (iii. 22). Hence it was, perhaps, that Barhebraeus supposed John to have succeeded Anthimus as "bishop of the Orthodox" at Constantinople (Bibl. Or. ii. 329). But his own writings prove that John of Ephesus was never recognized as patriarch; Theodosius of Alexandria, who found a protector in the empress Theodora, virtually held that position until his death in A.D. 567.

As his narrative testifies, John suffered grievously in the persecution instigated first by John Scholasticus, whom he calls John of Sirmin [Evagr. Ἰωάννης ὁ ἀπὸ Σιρμιῶνος], and afterwards by Eutychius. Together with Paul of Aphrodisias and subsequently patriarch of Antioch, Stephen, bishop of Cyprus, and the bishop Elisha, John of Ephesus was imprisoned in the patriarch's palace. In the heated debates which followed, the four Monophysite bishops stoutly charged John of Sirmin with breach of the canons in annulling the orders of their clergy. And when the patriarch demanded of them "a union such as that between Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch," they declared their willingness provided they might drive out the council of Chalcedon from the Church, as Cyril had driven out Nestorius. The weak and vacillating emperor, of whom John testifies that for six years he had been friendly to the "orthodox," and who was still sincerely anxious for peace, attempted to secure that end by drawing up a dogmatic formula, in the shape of an imperial edict, which he sent to the four captive bishops for revision. Their changes were admitted, but the "Nestorians and semi-Nestorians" of the court—so John puts it—scared the timid emperor into further alterations, of which the chief was an inserted clause, "that the customs of the

(ܩܘܢܝܢܐ ܕܥܘܠܡܐ), which meant that the obnoxious council was still to be proclaimed from the Diptychs. Weary of the dispute, and probably not understanding its grounds, Justin now signed the document, and required the subscription of John of Ephesus and his companions. They declined, and thirty-three days were passed in constant wrangling between them and the patriarch. Meanwhile they were kept under close guard; the patriarch's creatures stripped them of everything; friends were denied admittance to their prison; and their personal followers were also confined in the dungeons of the palace. The misery of the four bishops was aggravated by the reproaches of the leading Monophysite laymen, who supposed that, but for their obstinacy, a compromise might be effected which would stop the persecution. The cunning patriarch was careful to encourage this belief. At last his victims gave way, the patriarch promising upon oath that the council of Chalcedon should be sacrificed. The four bishops twice communicated with him; but when they reminded him of his promise, he referred them to the pope; he could not, for their sakes, risk a schism from Rome. Our historian touchingly describes the sorrow of himself and his companions over this fraud; even their opponents pitied them, until they once more faced them with galling taunts, which led to a second imprisonment (i. 17-25). The emperor made further fruitless attempts at conciliation. The upshot of a discussion before the senate (ܩܘܢܝܢܐ) was that the four bishops boldly uttered their anathema "upon the whole heresy of the two natures," and cast off communion with their deceivers for ever. Thereupon they were sentenced to "banishment," and the sentence was at once carried out. They never saw each other again. John of Ephesus was confined in the hospital of Eubulus at Constantinople. Though helpless from gout, and exposed to the attacks of swarms of vermin, he was denied all assistance. As he lay in his filthy prison, it seemed to him that his feverish thirst was slaked and his misery comforted by a heavenly visitant, whose coming he describes with much pathos and simplicity. After a year, John was removed to an island, where he remained eighteen months, when the Caesar Tiberius ordered his release. For three years, however, he was under surveillance, until the patriarch died (A.D. 578). Before the outbreak of this persecution, John of Ephesus and Paul of Aphrodisias had argued publicly with Conon and Eugenius, the founders of the Cononites, nicknamed Tritheites, in the presence of the patriarch and his synod, by command of Justin (v. 3). Conon had vainly tried to win the support of John, who proved to him that he was a heretic, and afterwards wrote him a letter of warning (v. 1-12). Eutychius, who, upon the death of John of Sirmin, was restored to the patriarchal throne, was hardly more tolerant of Monophysites than its late occupant. Persecution was renewed, and John of Ephesus again met with disgraceful injustice. By another imprisonment Eutychius wrung from him the resignation of a property which Callinicus, a chief officer of the court, had bestowed, and which John had largely improved and converted into a monastery. After being further deprived of his right of receiving five leaves at the public distributions, for which he had paid three hundred darics, John was released.

Tiberius, the successor of Justin, though unwilling to persecute, was overcome by popular clamour. The mob of the capital groundlessly suspected their new emperor of Arian leanings (iii. 13, 26). An edict was therefore published ordering the arrest of Arians, Manicheans, etc. Under cover of this, the "orthodox" were once more harried and plundered. The first victim was our author, John of Ephesus (iii. 15), who had now lived many years in Constantinople, and had already endured so much cruel treatment. He and his friends were incarcerated at Christmas in a miserable prison called the Cancellum (A.D. 578?); and after much fruitless argument were finally dismissed with orders to leave the city. After a time, persecution was checked by the emperor. But in 581 Eutychius again bestirred himself for the violent suppression of the hated sectaries (iii. 20, 21); and Tiberius, distracted by his wars, left the patriarch to deal with the "Διακριόμενοι" as he chose. The next patriarch, John the Faster, was steadfast against persecuting Christians (v. 15, 21).

It is greatly to our historian's credit that, during the long and bitter strife which raged among the Monophysites themselves, in the matter of the double election of Theodore and Peter to succeed Theodosius as their patriarch of Alexandria, he maintained an honourable neutrality, standing equally aloof from Paulites and Jacobites, although his sympathies were with Theodore, the Injured patriarch (iv. 9-48). John wrote his account of this pernicious quarrel in A.D. 583, the second year of Maurice; for he says that it had already lasted eight years (iv. 11), and that he is writing an outline of events from the year of Alexander 886 [A.D. 575] onwards (iv. 13). In his anxiety to heal the schism, John sent as many as ten epistles to "the blessed Jacob" [Baradaeus], protesting his own neutrality, and urging reconciliation between the two factions (iv. 46), and after Jacob's death (A.D. 581) his party made overtures to John of Ephesus, then living at the capital, to induce him to recognise Peter of Callinicus as patriarch of Antioch, in the room of Paul (iv. 45). In reply the historian rebuked them for violating the canons. John sums up his account of the schism by accusing both sides of an utter want of mutual charity, and an entire aversion to calm examination of the grounds of their quarrel. He adds that he has briefly recorded the main facts from the outset to the current year, 896 (A.D. 585); the latest date observable in his work.

The Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus originally consisted of three parts, of which the third only is known to be extant. The author states (part iii. bk. i. ch. 3) that he has already written a history (stories) of the church in two parts (طریقہ) and twelve books, each divided into chapters, "beginning from the times of Julius Caesar, and the rest of the former kings of the Romans, and then in succession compiling and arranging the stories of the church, as far as to the sixth year of the reign of Justin II., son of the sister of Justinian." The third part contains six books, each preceded by an index of subjects, and arranged in chapters; so that the plan of the work was symmetrical. If, as Dr. Payne Smith assumes, the first part was a mere abridgment of Eusebius, its loss, as he says, is not much to be regretted. The disappearance of the second part is more unfortunate; as it would probably have furnished us with much important matter for the reign of Justinian. It brought the history down to the year A.D. 571. The third part continues it from that point to about A.D. 585, thus covering a period of about fourteen years, between the sixth year of Justin II. and the fourth of Maurice. It was called forth by the persecution above described, which broke out in the sixth or seventh year of Justin, and the writer makes many apologies in the course of his narrative for want of chronological order, occasional repetitions, and even inconsistencies of statement (see esp. i. 3; ii. 50); defects which he ascribes to the stress of untoward circumstances. "This," he says, "should be known to critics; many of these stories were penned in time of persecution . . . people conveyed away the papers inscribed with these chapters, and the other papers and writings, into divers places, and in some instances they remained hidden so long as two or three years in one place or another" (ii. 50). John had no memoranda of what he had already written, and he never found an opportunity for revision. With these drawbacks, the work possesses an interest which naturally belongs to original accounts. John of Ephesus was contemporary with most of the characters described in his book; he writes of what he himself saw and heard and of doings in which he was personally concerned. For thirty years, as we have seen, he was a trusted servant of Justinian; and Gibbon would probably have recognised in the second part of his history a valuable gauge of the servility and the malice of Procopius. And had Gibbon possessed the third part of John's work, he would hardly have surmised that "the sentiments of Justin II. were pure and benevolent," or believed that the four last years of that emperor "were passed in tranquil obscurity" (cf. iii. 1-6); had he read what John has to say of the worthless stepson of Belisarius he might have rated "the gallant Photius" less highly. From the same source he might have learned that it was the thoughtless improvidence of Tiberius which forced the unhappy Maurice to appear in the light of a grasping niggard (cf. iii. 11; v. 20). As regards chronology, Assemani, who did not love a Monophysite, accuses John of inaccuracy, asserting that he used a peculiar Greek era, making almost all Justinian's acts and his death, ten years later than the dates assigned by Evagrius, Theophanes, and Cedrenus. But in the third part of his history (v. 13) John gives the usual date for that emperor's death, viz., Nov. 14, 876 [565]. Of Theophanes Gibbon has said that he is "full of strange blunders" and "his chronology is loose and inaccurate;" his verdict in regard to John of Ephesus would have been very different.

In his record of the great controversy of his day, John's attitude is that of a man who is thoroughly convinced that his own party holds exclusive possession of the truth. The Monophysites are "the orthodox" (الذبحه) "the faithful" (مكتسب); their opponents are "Synodites," "Nestorians" or at least "half-Nestorians" (طریقہ نسطور); the synod of Chalcedon is "the stumbling block and source of confusion of the whole church" (حکله عکسہ سببہ سسہ بکلسہ جکلسہ); "it sunders Christ our God into two natures after the Union, and teaches a Quaternity instead of the holy Trinity" (i. 10, 18); the four bishops taunt the patriarch with "the heresy of the two natures, and the blasphemies of the synod, and of the Tome of Leo" (i. 18). At the same time, John does not labour to blacken the memory of his chief adversaries; the strong terms in which he speaks of the pride of power and savage tyranny of John Scholasticus are warranted or at least excused by facts (i. 5, 12, 37); and a Baronius can denounce John of Sirmin in language equally decided (Ecd. Hist. ad ann. 564). In regard to Eutychius, John protests his adherence to truth: "Although we declare ourselves opposed to the excellent patriarch Eutychius, yet from the truth we have not swerved in one thing out of a hundred; nor was it from eagerness to revile and ridicule, that we committed these things to writing" (iii. 22). His impartiality becomes manifest in his description of the great schism which rent asunder his own communion; unsparing in his censure of both factions, he refers their wicked and worse than heathenish rancour to the instigation of devils (iv. 19, 22, 39). Credulous John was, but credulity was a common attribute of his age. His stories about the great plague which raged in 544 and for many years following (Procop. ii. 22; Evag. iv. 29) are instances (Extracts in Dionysius). He assigns that calamity to the malice of demons, just as he accounts for Justin's mania by demoniacal possession. John fled before the plague from Palestine to his own country, and thence to Constantinople, but found no place uninfected. His marvels are probably what he heard from the lips of other panic-stricken fugitives.

A more serious objection might be founded upon his approval of the cruelties connected with the suppression of heathenism (iii. 34), and his intolerance of "heresy" other than his own. In 550 John of Ephesus dug up and burnt the bones of Montanus, Maximilla, and Priscilla, the false prophets of Montanism (Extr. ap. Dionys.). Herein also the historian was not superior to the mistakes of his contemporaries. But the spirit of persecution is hardly the peculiar mark of any age, church, or sect; and one day the 19th century may itself be branded as the age in which a so-called freethought persecuted religion.

Apart from these blemishes we may recognise in John of Ephesus an historian who sincerely loved truth; a bishop who was upright and devoted, when too many others were cringing and corrupt; and a man whose piety rested upon a thorough knowledge of Scripture, and whose common sense and humane spirit loathed the frantic excesses of partisans.

His style, like that of most Syriac writers, is verbose and somewhat unwieldy; yet he does not lack the eloquence of simple truth and homely pathos.

The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus was first edited from the unique MS. in the British Museum, by Dr. Cureton (Oxford, 1853)—a splendid reproduction of the original; it has been translated into English by Dr. Payne Smith (Oxford, 1860), and into German by Schönfelder (München, 1862). These versions are of great assistance to the student, many chapters being defective in the original. The title of the work varies; the pages of the MS. are headed "Ecclesiastica of my lord John, bishop of the city of Ephesus;" at the beginning of the 3rd, 5th, and 6th books the title runs "Part Three of the Ecclesiastica (ܝܘܢܢܝܘܨ) concerning stories of the Church, &c."

The British Museum also possesses other MSS. containing extracts from John's history, and a work entitled Lives of Eastern Saints, published in Land, Anecdota Syriaca, vol. ii. See Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 1296; Rosen and Forshall, Cat. xlix. [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (161) III., Aug. 4, bishop of Ephesus, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 993 A, xiii. 133, 366 B, 379.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (162), last bishop of Epidaurus in Dalmatia, which was utterly destroyed by the Avars and Slavs in 639, after which, c. A.D. 650, John removed the see to Ragusa, of which he is reckoned the first bishop. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. vi. 36.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (163), bishop of Erizi in Caria; at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 651, 680; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 921.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (164), bishop of Errha, in the province of Arabia. His metropolitan, Constantinus bishop of Bostra, subscribed the sixth action of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, in his behalf. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 866.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (165), bishop of Etenne (Trisennea) in Pamphylia, present at the second Nicene Council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 997 A, 1104, xiii. 145, 370 c; Le Quien, Or. Cir. i. 1004.) The name of the see is variously spelt in Mansi. [L. D.]

JOANNES (166), a missionary bishop to the Ethiopians, reported by John of Asia (Assem. Bisl. Or. i. 359-362) to have been sent by the emperor Justin in 521 at the request of Aidog king of Ethiopia. On the difficulties of this subject see articles ELESBAAN, p. 72, and ETHIOPIAN CHURCH, p. 237. [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (167), a supposed bishop of Euboea, and perhaps of Chalcis, according to Le Quien, who, however, can assign only a proximate date, viz. before the eighth synod. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 214.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (168), Jacobite bishop of Euphemia in 541. (Assem. B. O. ii. 324; Le Quien, ii. 1441.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (169), A.D. 603, bishop of Euria or Euroea in Epirus. Being compelled to retire from Euria by the barbarians, he took refuge in Corfu, and tried to assume episcopal jurisdiction over Cassiope, which was in the diocese of another bishop. But the metropolitan and Gregory the Great forbade this assumption, in spite of the consent of the emperor. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 8, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1310; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 153; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 146; Ceillier, xi. 533.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES, of Faenza, vid. of Faventia.

JOANNES (170), the name of two supposed bishops of Faleriona (Falerone) in Picenum in the 6th century (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 661). On this town see Ughelli Ital. Sac. x. 91. [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (171), the name of three bishops of Faleria (Falere, Falaro) in Tuscany, a see removed to Civita Castellana in the 11th century (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. x. 91; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 12, 69). One of them was present at the Roman synods of 595 and 601 (Mansi, ix. 1228, x. 488; Hefele, §§ 288, 289; cf. Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 114). The second was at the Roman synod of 679, under Agatho (Mansi, xi. 314, 776, one reading being "ecclesia Phalaritana," another "ecclesia Salernitana"). The third was at the Roman council of 743 (Mansi, xii. 367; Baron. A. E. ann. 743 xxv.; Hefele, § 364). [C. H.]

JOANNES (172), bishop of Faustinopolis, in the second Cappadocia; present both at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Quinisext synod A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 650, 677, 999; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 404.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (173), bishop of Faventia (Faenza), present at the Lateran synod under Stephen IV. in 769 (Mansi, xii. 715; Hefele, § 343). In Mansi the name of the see is Fentia. Ughelli (Ital. Sac. ii. 491) does not reckon him, but Cappelletti does (Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 246, 304). [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (174), bishop of Ferentino, near Anagni, c. 796. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 401.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (175), bishop of Ferrara, 772, between Maurelius and Andrew II. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 26, 224.) For the earlier Johns of this series see under Vicohabentia. [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (176), bishop of Flavia in Cilicia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 144; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 900.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Foronovo or Vescovio, vid. of Vicosabina.

JOANNES (177), eighth bishop of Forum Julii (Fréjus) in Gams's Series Episc. (p. 551), about 521, but omitted from the Gall. Christ. (i. 423). (Mansi, viii. 337.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (178), bishop of Gabala, in Syria Prima. He took part in the proceedings of the council of Constantinople A.D. 536 (Mansi, u.s. 928, 936, 949, 976). Joannes seems to have been the author of an In vitam et politiam Severi haeresiarachae, the commencement of which was read at the council of Nice, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 183, 644; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 798.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (179), bishop of Gabala (Talaza) in Lydia; present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787, where in the subscriptions he is called bishop of Abala or Tabala. (Mansi, xii. 996 D, 1102, xiii. 143, 370 A, 390; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 896.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (180), bishop of Gadara in Palestine, present at council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 943, where the reading is Gadira, vii. 141; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 597.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (181), a Gallic bishop, represented at the council of Arles, in 524. (Sirmond. Concil. Gall. i. 209; Mansi, viii. 627.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Gallipoli, vid. of Calipolis.

JOANNES (182), bishop of Gargara, in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, in A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 703.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (183), bishop of Gema, at the seventh synod, 787 (Mansi, xiii. 391). As the name corresponds in position with Joannes bishop of Etenua in other lists of the synod (cf. 735 E) Gema seems to be one of the numerous variations of Etenna. [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Genoa, vid. of Janua.

JOANNES (184), bishop of Germanicia in Commagene, one of the easterns who favoured Nestorius at the council of Ephesus in 431 (Mansi, v. 885; Synod. adv. Trag. Iren. c. 105). He did not accompany John of Antioch to Ephesus, but attended the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where he signed the decrees as well as assented to Leo's tome (Mansi, vii. 27, 136; Leo. Mag. ep. 98 in Patr. Lat. liv. 963); at the eighth session he was compelled as a suspected person to pronounce a separate anathema on Nestorius (Mansi, vii. 193). There are extant two letters of Theodoret of Cyrus to him, in which a fuller correspondence is mentioned. (Epp. 133, 147, in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxiii. 1221, 1275; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 940.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (185) BICLARENSIS, the author of a valuable chronicle of Hispano-Gothic affairs during the reigns of Leovigild and Recared, abbat of the monastery of Biclara or Vallclara in Tarraconensis, and finally bishop of Gerona. All that we know of his life is derived (1) from the biography of him given by Isidore in the de Viris Ill. cap. xlv. (Esp. Sagr. v.); (2) from certain signatures to councils; (3) from one or two scattered phrases in his Chronicle.

(1) According to St. Isidore "Joannes Gerundensis Episcopus" was a Goth by birth, and born at Scalabis (Santarem) in Lusitania. About the age of eighteen or nineteen (cum esset adolescens) he went to Constantinople, there perfected himself in Greek and Latin learning, and returned to Spain after an absence of seventeen years, at a time when Arianism, under the guidance of Leovigild, was specially active. The king endeavoured to win him over, but finding him immovable exiled him to Barcelona, where for ten years (see below) he suffered much persecution from the Arians of that town, of which we know UGNAS to have been the Arian bishop (C. Tol. III. Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. l. c. ii. p. 226). Afterwards (i.e. after Leovigild's death in 586) he built the monastery of Biclara in Tarraconensis, composing a Rule for his monks. "He added to the book of Chronicles (i.e. of Eusebius, Jerome and Victor Tununensis), from the first year of Justin the Younger to the eighth year of Maurice prince of the Romans and the fourth of king Recared, a truly useful history, well and elegantly composed, and he is said to be writing ('multa alia scribere dicitur,' according to Florez and Arevalo, others scripsisse) many other things which have not come to our knowledge."

(2) Among the signatures of the second council of Saragossa (A.D. 592) is found plain "Joannes," without any bishopric attached, as is the case also with the other twelve signatures. That the Joannes of 592, however, is to be identified with the "Joannes peccator de Gerunda," whose signature appears among those of C. Barc. II. A.D. 599, is plain; first, from the comparative examination of the signatures of 592 with those of the famous conversion council of 589, and secondly, from the relative seniority of the Joannes of 592, and the "Joannes — de Gerunda" of 599 (conf. Florez, Esp. Sagr. vi. 356-360). Besides these two fairly established signatures of 592 and 599, the name Joannes appears in three somewhat doubtful documents; (a) the appendix to the Acts of C. Saragossa II., known as de Fisco Barcinonensi, Era DCXXX., which, if genuine, throws a curious and valuable light on the powers of the bishops in the Gothic state (see, however, Dahn's objections, Könige der Germanen, vi. 397); (b) the Decretum Gundemari, of which a full discussion will be found under GUNTHIMAR; (c) the Acts of the Council of Egara, which are only found in one of the Council-MSS. (Cod. Aemil.), and certainly bear no convincing marks of genuineness (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 701).

(3) It is plain from his Chronicle that Joannes was still in Constantinople in the year 573. Under the seventh year of Justin and the fifth of Leovigild, he writes, "In regia urbe (Constantinople) mortalitas inguinalis plagae exarscit, in qua multa millia hominum vidimus defuisse." And from other evidence less direct it becomes extremely probable that he was there at least till the year 576. Such details as:— "(574) Hujus Tiberii Caesaris die prima, in Regia urbe inguinalis plaga sedata est," or after the victorious campaign of Justinian, "magister militum orientis," against Chosroes in 575, "exuviasque eorum pro triumpho Constantinopolim dirigit: xxxiii elephantos inter cetera, qui magnam spectaculum Romanis in urbe Regia exhibuerunt: praedae vero de manibus Romanorum, Persarum multitudinem ad nimiam vililitatem nummo publico vendiditae sunt," which cannot be traced to any other known chronicles of the time, seem on the face of them to spring from personal knowledge, and to imply the reporter's residence at Constantinople during the time referred to.

The Dates of his Life.—Florez gives them as follows: his birth 540, his journey to Constantinople 558 or thereabouts, his return to Spain 575, his exile 575 or 576, the foundation of the monastery of Biclara about 586, his appointment to the bishopric of Gerona 591, his appearance at C. Saragossa II. 592, at C. Barc. II. 599, at Toledo under Gunthimar 610, at Egara 614, and his death 621 or thereabouts. Our only evidence for the time of his death is deduced from San Ildefonso's statement about his successor Nonnitus (De Vir. Ill. cap. x.), who is said to have lived under Suintila (621-631), and Sisenand (631-636), and who appears among the oldest bishops at C. Tol. iv. (633). The year 576 was chosen by Florez as that of Joannes' exile in order to fit the chronology of Isidore, according to whom Joannes was ten years at Barcelona, and it is of course not possible to protract the period of his exile beyond the year 586, the date of the death of Leovigild and the accession of Recared. In chronological matters, however, Isidore is never to be trusted implicitly, and, as Gams has already pointed out, we know of no persecution of the Catholics by Leovigild before 579, the date of the outbreak of Hermenegild's rebellion. Joannes was, in all probability, exiled in 580, when after the council of Arian bishops held at Toledo in that year, Leovigild made certain overtures to the Catholics, especially to their bishops and prominent men, whose varying success is described both by Joannes (A.D. ann. 580) and Isidore (Hist. Goth. Esp. Sagr. vi. 491). Joannes resisted the "seductio" to which others, notably the bishop VINCENT of Saragossa, succumbed, and was then no doubt exiled to Barcelona, one of the western coast towns which, to judge from the conciliar data of the time, were, together with the newly filled Suevoian sees, the strongholds of Gothic Arianism under Leovigild.

His Chronicle embraces twenty-three years from 567 to 589, both inclusive. Florez's conclusion that it was finished in the year 590 is upset by a careful scrutiny of the Chronicle itself. Görres (Zeitschrift für Historische Theologie, 1873, i. p. 95) has shewn it was written at earliest in the year 604. The last year of the emperor Maurice (d. 602) and that of Gregory the Great (d. 604) are both mentioned in the text under "Anno vi. Tib. Leovigildi an. xiv." and "Anno v. Mauric. Recaredi a. i." On the other hand it must have been written before the year 610, in or about which St. Isidore finished the De Viris Illustribus.

The Chronicle was intended, as we have already stated, and as Joannes informs us in his brief preface, to serve as a continuation to Victor Tununensis (the African chronicler so largely used by Isidore in his Chronicle and in the Histories), and to complete the series of chronicles bearing the names of Eusebius, Jerome, Prosper, and Victor, which with Idatius, Orosius, and a few others (see analysis of Isidore's sources in the Histories, art. ISIDORE), formed the historical library of the literary Spaniard of his day. The Spanish era so common in Isidore, but which appears before Isidore in only two passages of Idatius, is not once mentioned by Joannes. In fact up to the reign of Recared, Joannes writes not merely from the Catholic, but it may almost be said from the East Roman standpoint. In spite of his Gothic descent, up to the year 589, there are but few traces in his work of any special patriotic interest in Spanish affairs, and none of any distinctively Gothic feeling. To him Constantinople is always the "urbs regia," whereas throughout the 7th century, unless within the actual boundaries of the East-Roman possessions, the title represented Toledo only to a native of the peninsula; and the Visigothic kingdom is still dependent on the foedus with Rome, now represented by the heir Byzantium, which made the foundation of the kingdom of Toulouse. [See art. WALJA.] This attitude indeed changes greatly with the accession of Recared, with whom a new order of things began for the Catholics, and in correspondence with facts should have changed earlier had Joannes' church feeling allowed it. For it was Leovigild who, towards the end of his successful reign, had finally done away with the remnants of nominal dependence on the empire left by Euric, as is abundantly proved by the history of his coinage recently unravelled by the French scholar Alois Heiss (Description des Monnaies des Rois Visigoths d'Espagne, p. 80, Paris, 1874; conf. Forschungen z. Deutsch. Gesch. xiii. p. 635). To his political success, however, in extending the boundaries and reviving the prestige of the Gothic state, Recared was to add a social success, and by the relinquishment of Arianism, and the great act of the conversion council, was to bring about a fusion between Goths and Romans undreamt of by his predecessors. Thenceforward there is no further idea of dependence on the empire for the Gothic state; rather Goth and Roman alike are united in their efforts to dislodge the imperialists from their last foothold within the peninsula. From the reign of Recared to about the middle of the 7th century a national feeling existed in Spain, such as had never existed there before, and which was not to reappear there for hundreds of years. Of this change of view on the part of the Catholic subjects of the Gothic state, which we find fully developed in Isidore, Joannes' younger contemporary, Joannes' narrative of Recared's first three years is an early and excellent indication. His history of Leovigild, especially of the Hermenigild revolt, is marked by singular fairness and impartiality, the ability of the great Arian king having evidently excited in him an unwilling admiration. But the dry precision of narrative in which Leovigild's campaigns had been described, gives place to a very different tone with the accession of Recared. Leovigild's annexation of Galicia and the campaign against the Franks which occupied his last years [see art. LEOVIGILD] are told without a word of comment, but Recared's successful repulse of the Frankish attack in 588 is thus made use of. "In this battle, therefore, the divine grace and the Catholic faith which king Recared and the Goths had faithfully received are known to have operated. For God gives the victory without difficulty to whom He will whether to few or to many. Thus the dux Claudius with scarcely 300 men is known to have put to flight almost 60,000 Franks and to have slain the greater part of them with the sword. Not without cause is God praised in our times for His operation in this battle, who in like manner in old times destroyed many thousands of Midianites by the hand of Gideon and his 300 men."

Joannes' account of the conversion council and his reflection on it have a special interest, as one of the two or three contemporary records by a keenly interested witness of the church's final triumph, her formal triumph at least, over Gothic Arianism. One other Teutonic nation, the Lombards, had still to make its submission, but Joannes, whose notices of Italian affairs are throughout vague and fragmentary, takes no notice of this in his triumphant review of the situation. It is mournfully characteristic of the later course of Gothic history that Joannes is not able to close his Chronicle with this paean of triumph and of peace. The last section of his history is taken up with the history of one of those intrigues of the Gothic nobles which typify the chronic weakness and disunion of the Hispano-Gothic state.

JOANNES (186), Nestorian bishop of Gondisapor (or Lapetha) cir. 630 (Le Quien, ii. 1182). A later John of this see became catholicos. [JOANNES (368).] [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Gordus vid. of Proconnesus.

JOANNES (187), bishop of Gortyna in Crete, to whom Gregory the Great addressed an epistle in the year 598. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 259; Epist. S. Gregor. Magn. ap. Migne, lxxvii. 909, and Grat. dist. 52, c. 1.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (188), bishop of Gothia, during the reign of Constantine Copronymus. After the death of Constantine he visited Constantinople, and on returning to his country he was seized by the Chazars. He managed to escape from them, and crossing the sea took up his residence at Amastris on the coast of Paphlagonia, where he died. He was represented at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. He is commemorated by the Greeks on June 26. (Basil, Menol. iii. 143; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 190; Mansi, xiii. 137; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1243.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (189), patriarch of Grado, appears to have succeeded Vitalianus, c. A.D. 766. In A.D. 802, he refused to consecrate to the bishopric of Olivola a Greek named Christophorus, who had been chosen to that see at the instance of John, duke of Venice. The duke led a fleet to Grado, took it, and put the patriarch to death by throwing him from the top of a tower. (Baronius, Annal. Eccles. 802, 10.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (190), patriarch of Grado, elected cir. 803 on the retirement of Fortunatus into France. [FORTUNATUS (27).] He was previously abbat of St. Servulus. After holding the see four years he was deposed by a synod. (Ughelli, v. 1096; Cappelletti, ix. 37, 102; Baron. A. E. ann. 806 x.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (191), bishop of Gammii in Byzacene, present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cognit. i. 215; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 176; Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 648.) [H. W. P.]

JOANNES (192), Nestorian bishop of Haditha in the 8th century. (Assem. B. O. ii. 431; Le Quien, ii. 1225.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (193), bishop of Hadriani or Hadrianopolis, a city of the Hellespont according to the Greek text of the council, but according to the Latin (which must here be right) in Bithynia; present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 626; Mansi, xi. 649.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (194), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Thracia, present at the fifth general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 175; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1173.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES bishop of Haran, vid. of Charrae: bishop of Haura, vid. of Syrian Jacobites: bishop of Hectorius, vid. of Stectorius.

JOANNES (195), bishop of Helenopolis (Drepanum) in Bithynia; present at the Quinisext synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 996; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 624.) [L. D.]

JOANNES of Heliopolis, vid. of Juliopolis.

JOANNES (196), bishop of Hephaestus in Egypt, in the province of Augustamnica Prima. He attended the Ephesian Latrocinium, A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 923 A, 933 B). He had previously taken part in the third general council at Ephesus. (Mansi, iv. 1219; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 547.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (197) I., bishop of Heraclea and metropolitan of Thracia, replies to the letter of Leo concerning the death of Proterius, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1107.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (198) II., bishop of Heraclea and metropolitan of Thracia. He had been elected emperor, but disqualified by being forced to enter orders. (Victor Tun. Chron. in the Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 952.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (199), bishop of Heraclea Ponti in the province of Honorias next Paphlagonia, present at the seventh general council (second Nicene), A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 997 A, 1104, xiii. 145, 370 D, 391; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 573.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (200), bishop of Heraclitopolis (Pidachthoë) in lesser Armenia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 647, 673, 694; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 438.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (201) BEVERLACENSIS (ST. JOHN OF BEVERLEY), bishop of Hexham and York in the 7th and 8th centuries, is said to have been born at Harpham, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, and to have been the child of noble parents. In early life he was under the charge of archbishop Theodore, who educated him and gave him his name of John (Stubbs, col. 1692; Lelandi Coll. iv. 100). After this he became one of the pupils of Hilda at Whitby (Bede, iv. 23; Wendover, i. 107; Vita S. Beg. 157), but not of Elfheda also, as some assert (Folcard, V. S. Joh. c. i.; Stubbs, 1962). John was claimed by the University of Oxford as an alumnus, his figure appearing as a Fellow in one of the old windows of the chapel at University College (Smith, Annals, 129), and in another window, at Salisbury cathedral, as the first Master of Arts at Oxford (Fuller, Worthies, ii. 497). There was of course no university at Oxford at all at that time, and there is no authority therefore for the appropriation of John (Twyni Antiq. Acad. Oxon. 169; Caius, de Antiq. Univ. Cant. i. 106; Wood, Antiq. Univ. Oxf. i. 28; and Hist. Univ. Oxon. iv. 37-8).

John was a man of learning, and hence the zeal of the pedigree-makers of the University of Oxford in an after day to connect him with that place. As a preacher and an instructor, John had a great reputation and success. In the exposition of the Scriptures, in history, and in other subjects, he was a skilful student and teacher. He had generally a number of pupils under his charge. Among these at one time was Bede, whom he afterwards admitted to holy orders. Bede gives us the only authentic account of his master that we possess. (Folcard, c. 2; Stubbs, col. 1692; Bede, iv. 23, 29; v. 2, &c.)

The zeal and learning of John, and his connexion with Theodore, would stand him in good stead at the Northumbrian court. It was probably owing to king Aldfrid that John was made bishop of Hexham in A.D. 687, during the many changes of that time. There are some chronological speculations connected with this appointment, into which it is unnecessary to enter (cf. Fasti Ebor. i. 85-6). With Hexham John was already acquainted. He had lived for some time an ascetic life at a place called Hersheshou, or Harneshalg (Erne = eagle), on the opposite bank of the Tyne, where he afterwards constructed a church in honour of St. Michael. This is, I believe, St. John's Lee, a beautifully wooded mound, across the river, and at a short distance from Hexham. It was here that St. John was afterwards accustomed to pass the season of Lent in solitude and prayer. The sick and the needy pursued him, and it was from among them that he picked out the deaf and dumb youth whom he is said to have cured (Beda, v. 2; Folcard, cap. 4, &c.).

John was bishop of Hexham eighteen years. In A.D. 705, on the death of Bosa, he was translated to York. We know, unfortunately, very little of what he did in Yorkshire. We hear of his diligence in visiting monasteries, attending to the poor, and consecrating churches. He seems also to have been a favourite with king Osred and his nobles. But throughout his life he never neglected his studies and his devotions. When he was in York, the church of St. Michael the archangel (probably the modern Belfrey church), which was close to his residence, was the place which he sought for secret intercession and prayer. Like his master, Theodore, he had always a little company of pupils under his charge. Among these, at various times, were Bede, St. Sigga, Bercthune and Herebald, abbats of Beverley and Tynemouth, and Wilfrid, who succeeded him in his bishopric (Folcard, c. 5, &c.). The following works are ascribed to John by Bale: Pro Luca Exponendo, lib. i.; Homelie Evangeliorum, lib. i.; ad Hyldam Abbatissam, lib. i.; ad Herebaldum Discipulum, Epist. i.; ad Audoenum et Bertinum, Epist. ii. et alia (Scr. Brit. cent. i. 89). Whether this ascription is accurate or not, I have no opportunity of discovering.

John seems to have been a quiet, amiable man, who, although practically in opposition to Wilfrid, still continued to keep himself clear of the heats of partisanship, and it was probably owing to his gentleness that the friends of Wilfrid did not parade his name for abuse or censure. John had also, like other prelates of his time, a leaning towards asceticism, and as his years increased the attachment became stronger. During his wanderings in the East Riding he observed a place called Inderawood, a land of wild forest and waters, interspersed with green pasture lands, to which a later age has given the name of Beverley, from the beavers, as it is said, which then sported in the waters of the Hull. A little church was there already, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. Fascinated by the beauty of the position, John became its owner. He added a choir to the church, and converted it into a house of monks, whilst, on the south side, he built a nunnery in honour of St. Martin, thus constructing what was called a twin monastery. He endowed the place as well, purchasing for it lands in Ridings, Welwick, Bilton, and Patrington. The neighbouring nobles assisted him, and Inderawood became, even in its founder's time, an important ecclesiastical centre. To this place, which had become dear to him, John retired in A.D. 718, resigning his see to his friend and pupil, Wilfrid II. Berchtune, another favourite scholar, was the abbat of Beverley. John stayed with him for the remainder of his life, intent upon his religious exercises, and dying there on May 7, 721, was buried in St. Peter's porch. (Bede, v. 6; Folcard, c. 13; Lel. Coll. iv. 100; Dugd. Mon. ii. 127; Sanctuar. Dunelm. and Beverlac. 98, &c.)

The church of Beverley adopted John as its patron saint—indeed he is generally called St. John of Beverley. His remains were placed above ground in a feretry of wood beautifully carved. In A.D. 1037 John was canonized by Benedict IX., and Elfric, archbishop of York, translated his body and deposited it in a shrine ornamented with precious metals and stones (Stubbs, col. 1700; Lelandi Coll. iv. 102). Exactly 150 years after this the minster of Beverley was destroyed by fire, which resulted in the construction of a new shrine and a fresh translation of John's remains in the year A.D. 1198. These were discovered in 1664 under a marble stone, at the entrance into the choir, with an inscription on a leaden plate, and they were again seen so late as 1736 (Dugdale, Visitation of Yorkshire, 22; Thoresby, Diary, ii. 434; Wood, Life, ed. Bliss, 140; Poulson, Beverlac. 666, 681).

John was regarded as one of the principal saints in the north of England. A special sanctity seemed to belong to him during his life, and to have been still greater after his decease. His shrine is said to have possessed extraordinary curative powers, and a sweet oil to have flowed from his tomb (Archbp. Kempe's register sub anno 1443; Fasti Ebor. i. 90). In the 9th century Beverley was fortunate enough to find a conspicuous benefactor in Athelstan, who halted there on his way to Scotland, and made great promises of what he would do if victory attended his arms. When he returned in triumph, his promise was nobly kept. He is said to have founded at Beverley a college of secular canons, and to have endowed it with lands in Lockington and Brandesburton. He bestowed also upon the place the privilege of sanctuary, which became of great repute, as may be seen in one of the registers which has been preserved (published by the Surtees Soc.). A mythical portrait of Athelstan still exists at Beverley, holding in his hand his charter of franchise, with the words

"Als fre make I thee
As hert may theak,
Or eghe may see."

(Mirac. S. Joh. ed. M. R. 263-4; Lel. Coll. iv. 101-2; Codex Dipl. ii. 186; Foedera, viii. 369).

The honours which Athelstan paid to Beverley were confirmed and added to by his successors. Edward the Confessor was a benefactor to the minster, and William I. and Stephen were prevented, it is alleged, by miraculous interposition from plundering the district, and the Conqueror became afterwards its friend (Folcard, et app. 264-9; Lel. Coll. iv. 102-3). John paid a visit to the place and increased its privileges (Poulson, Beverlac. 63, 537). Edward I. took St. John's banner with him to the Scottish war, to assist him to victory, and visited Beverley more than once to make his offerings at the shrine (Liber Garderoba, 27; Trivetii Ann. 321). Henry IV. also came to Beverley (Foedera, viii. 369), but it was in the time of his son that the minster obtained its highest distinction. The great victory of Agincourt was won on October 25, the day of the translation of St. John's remains, and the delighted conqueror ascribed his success to the saint's intercession. To shew his gratitude, he made a pilgrimage to Beverley with his queen, and it was by a special order of archbishop Chicheley that St. John's death-day, May 7, was to be observed for the future as a distinguished festival (Foedera, ix. 421; Nicolas, Agincourt, 176; Dugd. Mon. ii. 166; Poulson, 595; Lyndewode's Provinciale, ed. 1679, p. 70).

The chief and most trustworthy biographer of John is his pupil Bede, whose account (H. E. iv. 23, 29; v. 2, &c.) has been merely expanded by every subsequent writer. In the middle of the 11th century Aldred, archbishop of York, a great friend to Beverley, prevailed upon Folcard, a monk of Canterbury and afterwards of Thorney, to compose a Life of St. John, which he did in thirteen chapters. The style is pleasing enough, but in the matter there is little new. This Life is printed in the Acta SS. Boll. (7 Mai. ii. 168), and in the York historians, in the Rolls Series, i. 239, et seqq. In the same volume there are some other historical and liturgical pieces referring to John, but of trifling value. (See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 423-430.) [J. R.]

JOANNES (202), metropolitan, bishop of the Euphratesian Hierapolis (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 927). At the provincial synod held at Antioch civ. 445, John, as the successor of Panolbius, was directed to consecrate a new bishop for Perrha in the room of Athanasius bishop of Perrha. [ATHANASIVS (3).] (Mausi, vi. 465; Ceillier, x. 666.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES, of Himerium, vid. of Ammoriam.

JOANNES (203), two bishops of Hirta, one a Jacobite, 617-650, the other, surnamed AZRAK or CAERULEUS, a Nestorian and a writer, cir. 726. (Assem. B. O. ii. 425, 429, iii. 158, 182, 616; Le Quien, ii. 1171, 1172, 1585.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (204) bishop of Hormuzd-Ardashir in Chuzistan, martyr in Persia under Sapor II. (Wright's Syr. Mart., in Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 431.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (205), surnamed Montanus, the first known bishop of Horta (Orte in Etruria), c. A.D. 330. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 734; Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 26.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (206), bishop of Hydruntum (Otranto) in 680. (Mansi, xi. 299; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (207), bishop of Hyrcania in Lydia, who, with Cosinius of Hierocaesarea, was the cause of the synod assembled at Constantinople by Flavian, A.D. 448, on account of a dispute between them and their metropolitan, Florentius of Sardis (Mansi, vi. 652); at this synod he subscribed the condemnation of Eutyches. He subscribed the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 572; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 887.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (208), an Italian bishop, but of what see is unknown (Baronius, s.a. 519 ii.), one of five legates sent by Hormisdas bishop of Rome to Constantinople, to negotiate the reconciliation of East and West, A.D. 519, at the request of the emperor Justin I. (Ep. Justin. ad Hormisd. Labbe, iv. 1470). See HORMISDAS, GERMANUS (16), MAXENTIUS. (Labbe, iv. 1484, 1485, 1487, 1488, 1495, 1496, 1501, 1503, 1507, 1510, 1512, 1513, 1515, 1519, 1521, 1529.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (209), bishop of Iconium (Cogni), the metropolis of Lycaonia, consecrated cir. A.D. 375. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1069; Metaphr. Addenda, Nov. 23, in Migne, Patr. Graec. cxvi. 957.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (210), bishop of Ilium, proxy for his metropolitan, Euprepins of Cyzicus, at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 389; De Quien, Or. Chr. i. 777.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Imerium, vid. of Ammorra; bishop of Interamna, vid. of Narnia.

JOANNES (211), ST., mentioned in the Menaea under Feb. 4, as bishop of Irenopolis, present at the first general council, A.D. 325. In the conciliar lists of the Nicene fathers (Mansi, ii. 694, 699) the bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia is Narcissus. Le Quien in consequence assigns the Irenopolis of John to Isauria. (Boll. Acta SS. 4 Feb. i. 466; Wiltch, Handbuch der kirchl. Geogr. i. 203; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1029.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (212), bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia, near the river Calycadnus. He was one of the Monophysite bishops removed by the emperor Justin in the year A.D. 518. (Assem. Dissert. de Monophys. in Bibl. Or. ii. 3; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 900.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, Italian bishops, vid. of Ancona and of Nepi.

JOANNES (213), bishop of Janua (Genoa) in 680. (Mansi, xi. 307; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 841; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 283, 417.) There is said to have been a John bishop of Genoa c. A.D. 742 or 752 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 282, 417; Gams, Series Episc. p. 815), but he is omitted by Ughelli. [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (214), bishop of Jericho in A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 655.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (215) I., seventh bishop of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. iv. 5, Chron. Ann. 111). Among six bishops enumerated in the Chronicon as sitting in about fourteen years, commencing in 111 after Justus, John stands fourth. Eusebius could ascertain nothing of them but their names and succession. See also Epiphanius, Haer. lxxvi. 20, Boll. (Acta SS. Mai. iii. introd. p. vi.), Le Quien (Or. Chr. iii. 101), Clinton (F. R. ii. 556), Tillemont (Mém. ii. 189). Papebroch also treats of John as a saint, commemorated on June 7 (Boll. Jun. ii. 4).

[C. H.]

JOANNES (216) II., bishop of Jerusalem from 386 to 417, in succession to Cyril; a prelate whom being known to us chiefly through the invectives of Jerome, it is particularly difficult to estimate. Imbued with that tendency of the Eastern church teachers which formed their chief difference from those of the Western church, he with difficulty brought himself to acquiesce in the condemnation of Origenism or to take any steps against Pelagius, with whom he was brought in contact at the close of his episcopacy. And the presence of Jerome and other immigrants from Italy, and the anti-Origenistic vehemence of Epiphanius of Salamis and Theophilus of Alexandria, made it impossible for him to escape the reproach of laxity and, indeed, at times of heresy.

—He was born between the years 350 and 356 (Jerome, Ep. lxxxii. 8, ed. Vall.), and when a young man passed some time among the monks of Nitria in Egypt. There he, no doubt, imbibed his affection for Origen's teaching, and there he probably became acquainted with two persons who subsequently had much to do both with his own history and with that of the Origenistic controversy, the monk Isidore (one of the Long Monks) and Rufinus. During the troublous times before the accession of Theodosius, when Arianism was in the ascendant, he declines, if we are to believe Jerome (Cont. Joan. Jerus. 4) to communicate with the orthodox bishops who were exiled by Valens. But no imputation of Arianism rests upon him. He was evidently esteemed very highly. He was a man of great eloquence (Jerome, Cont. Joan. Jerus. 41) and subtlety of mind, whom his flatterers did not scruple to compare with Chrysippus, Plato, and Demosthenes (id. 4); and he was little more than thirty years old (Jer. Ep. lxxxii. 8, ed. Vall.) when he was chosen to succeed Cyril in the bishopric of Jerusalem. It was a see of great importance, subject in certain respects to the metropolitan at Caesarea, but acting at times independently; of great wealth, being enriched, as Jerome says, by the wealth of the whole world (Cont. Joan. Jerus. 14); and of great interest on account of its holy places, which were visited by pilgrims from all parts. It had also a special interest from the settlements of distinguished persons from the West, which made it during his episcopate a focus of Christian and literary activity, and with two of which, that of Rufinus and Melania in the Mount of Olives, and that of Jerome and Paula at Bethlehem, he was destined to have close but dissimilar relations. Jerome accuses the bishop of making a gain of his bishopric and living in luxury (Comm. in Joann. c. 14 and Ep. lvii. 12); but this may be no more than the common feeling of the monk against the bishop, embittered by momentary resentment. It is certain that the clergy of Jerusalem were attached to him. Rufinus, thought it a sufficient defence of his own faith to say that what he taught was that which was preached in the church of God at Jerusalem by the holy bishop John (Ruf. Apol. i. 13). But the most important testimony to him is that given by the pope Anastasius, in a letter to him in the year 401, a time when the adversaries of John, Pammachius and Marcella, had access to the pope, and only two or three years after Jerome's Philippic was composed, Anastasius speaks of the splendour of his holiness and of his divine virtues; his eminence and his praise, he says, are so conspicuous that he cannot find words equal to his merits. He accounts it an honour to have received praise from one of so serene and heavenly a disposition, the splendour of whose episcopate shines throughout the world. (This letter is given in Vallarsi's Rufinus, p. 408, 409; Migne's Patr. vol. xxi.) This testimony must be weighed against the adverse statements of Epiphanius and Jerome in their quarrel with him.

At the time of his becoming bishop of Jerusalem in 386, Rufinus had already been settled on the Mount of Olives some nine years, and Jerome and his friends were just entering on their work at Bethlehem. At first, while they were friends, he lived in impartial friendship with them both, seeking out especially that of Jerome ("nos suo arbitrio diligebat," Jerome, Ep. lxxii. 11, ed. Vall.), and making use of Rufinus, whom he ordained, as a learned man, in business which required his special talents. But their peace was after some six years disturbed. A certain person named Aterbius (Jerome, Cont. Ruf. iii. 33), who by his officious insinuations and imputations of Origenistic heresy caused the first breach between Jerome and Rufinus, had, no doubt, some dealings with the bishop also; and it is probably through him that the suspicions of Epiphanius, the venerable bishop of Salamis, were aroused. When, therefore, Epiphanius came to Jerusalem in the year 394, the strife broke out. For an account of the origin and progress of the controversy, see EPIPHANIUS (1) and HIERONYMUS (2).

During the dispute between Jerome and Rufinus, John in no way intervened. He is thought by Zöckler (Hieronymus, p. 249) to have inclined rather to the side of Jerome. We certainly find Jerome, in a letter to Theophilus, in commendation of his encyclical (Ep. 86, ed. Vall.), pleading for his bishop. John had accepted a person who had come to Jerusalem from Alexandria, and who was under the ban of Theophilus, and thus had incurred the wrath of that fierce prelate which, in a similar matter, four years afterwards, proved fatal to St. Chrysostom; but Jerome represented that Theophilus had sent no letters condemnatory of this person, and that it would be a rash proceeding to condemn John for a supposed fault which was committed in ignorance. As regards Rufinus, John wrote a letter to the pope Anastasius, the exact tenor of which can be only dimly inferred from the pope's reply, which alone is extant. John would seem to have been less anxious to defend Rufinus than to secure that he should not himself be implicated in the charges thrown out against Rufinus by Jerome's friends at Rome. The pope, with the most fulsome expressions of esteem for John, bids him put all such fears away, and judge Rufinus for himself. He professes to know nothing about Origen, not even who he was, while yet he has condemned his opinions; and as to Rufinus, he only says that, if his translation of the works of Origen implies an acceptance of his opinions (a matter which he leaves to his own conscience) he must see where he can procure absolution. That John was not then in familiar communication with Rufinus, but that he was on those terms with Jerome, may be inferred from the fact that in his controversy with Rufinus, Jerome made use of this letter (Cont. Ruf. ii. 14), while Rufinus did not know of its existence, and, when he heard of it, treated it as an invention of Jerome (Jerome, Cont. Ruf. iii. 20). The reconciliation of John with the monks of Bethlehem is further attested by Sulpicius Severus (Dial. i. 8), who had stayed for six months at Bethlehem, and who says that John had entrusted to Jerome and his brother the charge of the parish of Bethlehem.

Beyond this testimony of Sulpicius and a letter from Chrysostom to John in 404 (Migne's Patr. Gr. vol. lii.), which shews that he had taken Chrysostom's part, we hear nothing more of John for some twelve or thirteen years, when the Pelagian controversy brings him once more to view. Pelagius and Coelestius, having come to Palestine in the year 415 and proceeded to Jerusalem, were encountered by Orosius, the friend of Augustine, who had come to visit Jerome, and afterwards by the Gaulish bishops Heros and Lazarus. Orosius, who gives an account of these transactions in the first nine chapters of his Liber de Arbitrii Libertate, addressed himself to John, as did also Pelagius; but John was not willing to accept without inquiry the decrees of the council of Carthage, and resented their being pressed upon him by Orosius. The two parties were in secret conflict for some time, till John determined on holding a synod, to put an end to the strife, on July 28, 415. At this synod John was the only bishop present; the rest were presbyters and laymen. He shewed some consideration towards Pelagius, allowing him, though a layman, to take his place among the presbyters; and when there was a clamour against Pelagius for shewing disrespect for the name and authority of Augustine, John, by saying, "I am Augustine," undertook both to ensure respect to that great teacher, and not to allow his authority to be pressed too far against his antagonist. "If," cried Orosius, "you represent Augustine, follow Augustine's judgment." John thereupon asked him if he was ready to become the accuser of Pelagius, but Orosius declined this duty, saying that Pelagius had been condemned by the African bishops, whose decisions the bishop of Jerusalem ought to accept. The proceedings were somewhat confused from the necessity of employing an interpreter. In the end it was determined to send a letter to the pope Innocentius, and to abide by his judgment, and meanwhile John imposed silence upon both parties. But this satisfied neither. The opinions of Pelagius continued to be spread by private intercourse, and Augustine wrote to remonstrate with John against the toleration of heresy. On the arrival of the Gaulish bishops Heros and Lazarus, another synod was held at Diospolis (416) under the presidency of Euzoios the metropolitan bishop of Caesarea, in which John again took part. Augustine in his work against Julianus records the decision of this council, which was favourable to Pelagius, but considers that his acquittal was due to the uncertainties occasioned by the difference of language, which enabled Pelagius to express himself in seemingly orthodox words; and both in this work and in his letter to John he treats him as a brother bishop whom he holds in high esteem.

Meanwhile the more intemperate partisans of Pelagius resorted to open violence. The dialogue of Jerome against the Pelagians, though mild in its language compared with his other controversial works, incensed them to madness, and they proceeded to attack and burn the monasteries of Bethlehem. What the attitude of John at this time may have been cannot be affirmed with any certainty. That he was in any way an accomplice in such proceedings is incredible. Nothing of the sort appears from the letters of Jerome, though he speaks in a resigned manner of his losses. The only allusion to John, and that a doubtful one, in his writings at this time is contained in the preface to the fifth book of his Commentary on Jeremiah, where he says, "Hananiah the son of Azur fights against Jeremiah, and Shemaiah wishes the prophet to be sent to prison, and Zephaniah the priest assents to the words of the false prophets." But this allusion, if it be such, may only indicate a passing resentment against the conduct of John in the synod of Jerusalem. The words of Jerome to Augustine (Ep. 142), "Capta Jerusalem tenetur a Nebuchodonosor," are of a later date and can hardly apply to John. The complaints, however, of the ill-treatment of Jerome and of the Roman ladies at Bethlehem reached the ears of pope Innocent, and he thereupon wrote to John a letter (In Jerome, ep. 137, ed. Vall.) of sharp rebuke. He does not imply that John had been accessory to the violence used; but, considering that a bishop ought to be able to prevent such acts, or at least to relieve their consequences, he bids him take care that no further violence is done, lest the laws of the church should be put in force against him. It is right to say that the view here taken of these transactions, which agrees with that of Zöckler (Hieronymus, pp. 310-316), is contrary to that of Thierry (St. Jerome, book xii. ch. iii.), who looks upon John as a partisan of Pelagius, and as the enemy of Jerome to the end.

But John was now at the close of his career. It is possible that the letter of Innocentius never reached him, for it can hardly have been written, as Vallars shews (preface to Jerome, sub litt. cxxxv.-viii.), before the year 417, and John died (see Ceillier, vii. 497, &c.) on the 10th of January in that year. It is possible therefore that, after a troubled episcopate of thirty years and a life of from sixty to sixty-five years, failing health may have prevented his exercising full control in this last and most painful episode of his career.

Several works are attributed to him, as may be seen in Ceillier (vii. 97, &c.), and Gennadius (80) mentions a work which he wrote in his own defence; but no work of his has come down to us. His name must, therefore, always be viewed through the medium of other, mostly hostile, writers, and through the mists of controversy. An attempt was made by Wastel to attach to John several anonymous writings, a treatise on early monasticism, Comm. on Job and Matt., and Homilies. He also gives John the additional names of Nepos Sylvanus, and defends him by impugning the letters of Jerome and the treatise of Orosius. The work seems absolutely devoid of foundation, and no one has been convinced by it. (Wastelius, Vindiciae, &c., Brussels, 1643.)

JOANNES (217) III., bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 513-524. He was the son of Marcianus, who was made by Elias presbyter of the Anastasis, and afterwards bishop of Sebaste. John's brother Antony was also ordained bishop of Ascalon, and John himself deacon of the Anastasis (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Sab. c. 37). On the banishment of Elias by Anastasius, John was forcibly thrust into his episcopal seat by Olympius the prefect of Palestine, on his engaging to receive Severus into communion and anathematize the decrees of the council of Chalcedon (ibid. c. 56). Such an engagement awoke the orthodox zeal of St. Sabas and the other fathers of the Desert, who successfully used their influence with the new-made bishop to prevent the fulfilment of the compact, which Olympius wanted sufficient firmness to enforce. Intelligence of the failure of his project having reached Constantinople, Anastasius in hot wrath recalled Olympius and despatched in his room a namesake of his own, one Anastasius, who, coveting the dignity enjoyed by Olympius, had offered to forfeit three hundred pounds of gold, if he failed to induce John to fulfil his agreement, A.D. 517. Not having much confidence in milder measures, Anastasius surprised the unsuspecting bishop, and threw him into the common prison, until he should fulfil his promise. This step delighted the populace of Jerusalem, who regarded John with abhorrence as having obtained Elias's seat by fraud. One of the leading men of Caesarea, Zacharias by name, gaining a secret interview with the imprisoned bishop, persuaded him to feign assent to Anastasius' requirements, and to promise him that if he would release him from prison, he would, on the following Sunday, publicly signify his agreement to the original conditions. Anastasius, believing John's professions, liberated him. The following Sunday a vast concourse assembled, including as many as ten thousand monks. Anastasius was present with his officials to receive the expected act of submission. All being assembled, John, having ascended the ambo, supported on either side by Theodosius and Sabas the leaders of the monastic party, was received with vociferous shouts, "Anathematize the heretics;" "Confirm the synod," which lasted for some hours. When at last silence was secured, John and his two companions pronounced a joint anathema on Nestorius, Eutyches, Soterichus of the Cappadocian Caesarea, and all who rejected the decrees of Chalcedon. Anastasius, though utterly unprepared for this open violation of the compact, was too much terrified at the vast and turbulent multitude, evidently prepared for any deed of violence, to venture on remonstrance, and hastily made his escape to Caesarea. The emperor, driven to fury at hearing of this audacious contempt of his authority, declared his intention to punish with banishment the three who had thus mocked him (ibid. c. 57). Anastasius, however, had too much on his hands to pay much attention to the ecclesiastical disputes at Jerusalem, and John was allowed to go unpunished. The death of Anastasius in A.D. 518, and the succession of Justin, changed the whole complexion of affairs. Orthodoxy was now in the ascendant. The patriarch of Constantinople, John of Cappadocia, who had previously acquiesced in all Anastasius's measures, now, at the demand of the rabble, publicly anathematized Severus, and declared his acceptance of Chalcedon. The whole East followed the example of the capital, and became orthodox with the orthodox emperor. John could now, without fear of consequences, summon his synod to utter the same anathemas, and make the same profession of faith with his brother patriarch in the imperial city, and was rewarded for his compliance by being received into communion with the apostolical see by pope Hormisdas, at the written request of Justin (ibid. c. 60). John died 524 A.D., after an episcopate of eleven years, during the earlier part of which, while Elias was still alive, he was regarded by the orthodox as an intruder. (Theophan. Chronogr. p. 136; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. xvi. 721; Fleury, Hist. Eccles. livre xxxi. ch. 27-28; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 185.) [E. V.]

JOANNES (218) IV., bishop of Jerusalem, succeeded Macarius at the close of 574 A.D. (Evagr. H. E. v. 16; Baronius, 561. i.). He had been brought up in a monastery of the Acoemetæ. Nicephimus assigns 22 years to his episcopate; Theophanes only 20. He was still exercising his office when Evagrius was finishing his history, A.D. 593 (Evagr. H. E. vi. 24). The one event recorded of his episcopate is the discovery at Zafad, which is said to signify Joppa, of the seamless coat of Christ, and its solemn translation by him, assisted by Gregory of Antioch, and John the Faster of Constantinople, to Jerusalem, where it was deposited in the marble chest in which it had been found, in the same church in which the True Cross was adored. This event is placed by Fredegarius in his Chronicon, printed in the works of Gregory of Tours (p. 600), in the year 590 A.D. He erroneously names the bishop of Jerusalem Thomas, instead of John. (See Ruinart, Annot. ad Glor. Martyr. i. 8.) [E. V.]

JOANNES (219) V., bishop of Jerusalem. According to Theophanes (Chronogr.) John was appointed to the patriarchate of Jerusalem, which had then been without a bishop for sixty years, in 705 A.D., and exercised the episcopate for thirty years till 735 A.D. John of Damascus, in a letter to the archimandrite Jordanes, loads him with complimentary epithets, stating that he had been his disciple, and that no one knew him better than he, or drank more deeply into his spirit. He denies the assertion reflecting on John's orthodoxy, that he addressed the Trisagion to the Son alone, and not to the three Divine Persons severally. Papebroch (tom. iii. no. 156, Maii) expresses his opinion that John of Damascus was summoned by John to Jerusalem, and after receiving ordination, remained there some time in attendance upon him. A spurious invective epistle against Constantine Copronymus, ascribed to John of Damascus, also bears the name of John V.; but as John died 735 A.D., and the epistle cannot be placed before 754 A.D., it is impossible he should have been the author. Le Quien thinks it possible that another bishop named John may have succeeded John V. before Theodore. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 290.) [E. V.]

JOANNES (220), bishop of Juliopolis (Heliopolis, Basileum) in the province of Galatia Prima. (Mansi, xi. 996; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 476.) The name of the see in Mansi is Iliopolis. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Justiniana Prima, vid. of Prima Justiniana; bishop of Justinianopolis in Armenia, vid. of Ecclisiana.

JOANNES (221), bishop of Justinianopolis (formerly Anazarbus) in Cilicia, metropolis of Cilicia Secunda. In the reign of Justin I. the city was destroyed by an earthquake, and was rebuilt by that emperor, after whom it was then called Justinopolis (Evagr. iv. 8). But it was more commonly called Justinianopolis, probably because the work which the ucle commenced was completed by the nephew (Le Quien, ii. 887; Mansi, ix. 274-278, 286). He died before A.D. 536, as his successor Aetherius subscribed the acts of the council of Constantinople, which was held that year. (Mansi, ix. 391.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (222), bishop of "Justinianopolis or Barcena civitas," at the council of Constantinople, 553 (Mansi, ix. 391). In another list (ib. 171) he occurs as bishop of Barcusi. This town is placed by Nilus Dioxapatrius in his Notitia Patriarchatum (Pat. Gr. cxxxii. 1089 B), as in the patriarchate of Antioch; but it appears unknown to Le Quien. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Justinopolis, vid. of Capodistria and of Justinianopolis.

JOANNES (223), ST., bishop of Juvavia (Salzburg), between Flobargisus and St. Virgilius (Gesta Archiepisc. Salz. 2, Pertz, Monum. xiii. 6, 19; Potthast, Bibl. suppl. p. 398. Boniface on his return from his third visit to Rome, with the concurrence of duke Ottilo and Odilo, divided Bavaria into four districts (parochiae), and consecrated a bishop for each of them (739). To the first of these, that of Salzburg, he appointed John (Willibaldus, Vita S. Bonifacii, c. ix., Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 623). The arrangement received the ratification of pope Gregory III. in a letter written the same year (Ep. vii., Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 583). John has been called an Englishman, but there is no positive testimony on the point. The date of John's death is uncertain, but it must have happened in or previously to 745, as in that year his successor, St. Virgilius, was recommended for the see to duke Ottilo by Pippin, mayor of the palace. According to a few martyrologies he has the title of saint, and is commemorated June 10. (Hansizius, Germania Sacra, ii. 75-7; Rettberg, ii. 233.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (224), bishop of Lampsacus, present at the seventh general council A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 996 c, 1101, xiii. 144, 370 A, 390; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 774.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (225), bishop of Laodicea, the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana, represented at the fifth council, 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 795; Mansi, ix. 390.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (226), bishop of Laodicea Libani in the province of Phoenicia Secunda. He is mentioned by John of Damascus (Patr. Graec. xc. 217; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 842), and probably lived early in the 8th century. [J. de S.]

JOANNES, of Lapetha, vid. of Gondisapor.

JOANNES (227), bishop of Lappa in Crete in the second half of the 7th century (Vital. Pap. Epist. 1, 2, 3 in Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. col. 999; Le Quien, Or. Chr. II. 268). He was present at the sixth synod, 680. (Mansi, xi. 211 A. 642, 674.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (228), bishop of Larissa, and metropolitan (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 106). See HADRIANUS (4) for an account of his dispute with that bishop. For the dates see Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 102, 115, 123, 130. [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (229), bishop of the island of Lemnos, in the Aegean, present at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 373, 391 Limbus; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 85.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Leontopolis, vid. of Callinicus and of Zalichns.

JOANNES (230), bishop of Leros, in the Aegean, at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 394; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 945.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Lesbos, vid. of Mitylene; bishop of Lissus, vid. of Scylladium.

JOANNES (231), bishop of Lithoprosopus at the 7th synod, A.D. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 374 B, 387). A mountain named Lithoprosopus near Botrys on the Phoenician coast is mentioned by Cedrenus (Hist. Compend. t. i. p. 659, Bekker). Botrys was an episcopal city (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 827) and may be the one here intended, but Le Quien mentions neither this John under Botrys, nor any see of Lithoprosopus. [C. H.]

JOANNES (232), bishop of Lucca 780, died 803. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 502; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 796.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (233), bishop of Luceria (Lucera), was living A.D. 300, and was succeeded by St. Marcus, A.D. 302. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 454.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (234), one of the bishops in Macedonia addressed by pope Innocent I. on Dec. 13, 414. (Ep. 17 in Patr. Lat. xx. 527; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 25.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (235), bishop of Maeonia, in Lydia, subscribed the letter of his province to the emperor Leo A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 573; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 883.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Maestricht, vid. of Trajectum; bishop of Malaca, vid. "Melicitanus."

JOANNES (236), bishop of Maronea on the Aegean, in Thracia; present at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 391; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1197.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES, of Maronites, vid. of Antioch.

JOANNES (237), bishop of the Marsi (Ughelli Ital. Sac. i. 888). His name is found with that of Julian bishop of Cingulum in the Damnatio Theodori, August 551. (Mansi, ix. 60; Hefele, § 264; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 476.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (238), a bishop designated MELICITANUS, addressed by pope Hormisdas (Ep. lxiv.) in A.D. 519 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 470; Jaffé, Regesta, 68, no. 537). The bishop and his see are unknown. Harduin suggests the reading Malacitanus as if he were bishop of Malaca (Malaga) in Spain, and Migne Milanus and Nileopolitanus. [J. G.]

JOANNES (239), surnamed ARCHAPH, Meletian bishop of Memphis in Egypt. He is mentioned in the Breviarium of Meletius (Athan. Apol. c. Arian. 71, ed. Migne). In this document he is named simply John, as he is everywhere in Athanasius, except once in a letter from Alexander bishop of Thessalonica (ib. 65), where he is "Archaph (Ἀρχάφ) also called John." In the only place where he appears in Socrates (l. 30) he is "Archaab (Ἀρχαάβ) also called John." It was he who started the rumour in Egypt of the Meletian bishop Arsenius having been made away with by Athanasius (Ap. c. Ar. 65, 66). John subsequently made a complete submission, went to church, received the communion with the archbishop, and confessed his guilt (17). He also made his statement to the emperor, and Constantine sent an approving reply. John is next heard of at the council of Tyre in the summer of 335, when the chalice calumny was revived with aggravations. Socrates (i. 30) relates that John stole off in the confusion of the scene and escaped, what afterwards became of him is not said. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 585.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (240), second known bishop of Mentesa some years before 589. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 262; Mansi, ix. 1001; Esp. Sagr. vii. 247.) [M. A. W.]

JOANNES, bishop of Messen, vid. of Dalda.

JOANNES (241), bishop of Messene, in the province of Hellas, present both at the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449, and at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he also signed a synodal letter to the emperor Leo A.D. 458. (Mansi, vi. 930; vii. 160, 612; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 197.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (242), bishop of Metropolis, in the province of Pisidia, one of those who signed the synodal letter of a council at Constantinople, A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1049; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1038.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (243), bishop of Mibiarcia in Byzacene, subscribed the letter from the provincial council to Constantine, son of Heraclius, A.D. 641. (Mansi, x. 927, Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 225.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (244), bishop of Midaëum, in Phrygia Salutaris, present at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1147; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 841.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (245), surnamed CAMILLUS and BONUS, bishop of Milan, c. A.D. 641 or 645, in succession to Fortis. For the sources of his life see Boll. Acta SS. i. 622. The tradition at Milan which makes him present at the Roman council of 649 is not supported by the subscriptions (Mansi, x. 865); he probably only accepted the decrees. In Ughelli his death is placed on Jan. 10, 679 after a pontificate of twenty-nine years, which some reduce to twenty years and others to ten. He was succeeded by Antonius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 67; Cappelletti, Le Chiese Sacr. d'Ital. xi. 132.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (246), bishop of Miletopolis, in the Hellespontine province, addressed by pope Hormisdas, A.D. 519. (Mansi, viii. 471; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 780.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (247), bishop of Miletopolis, in the Hellespontine province, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 646, 676; Le Quien, i. 781.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, of Mindus, vid. of Myndus.

JOANNES (248), bishop of Mitylene (Castro), present at the general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431; he calls himself bishop of Lesbos. (Mansi, v. 767; iv. 1305; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 955.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (249), bishop of Modena, c. 744. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 231.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (250) I., fifth bishop of Montpellier, or, as it was then called, Maguelonne; present at the council of Narbonne held in A.D. 788 or 791. (Mansi, xiii. 824; Gall. Christ. vi. 733.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (251), bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia, known only from his mention in catalogues and Diptycha, occupied the see between Bassianus and Auxentius in the second half of the 5th century. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 892.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (252), bishop of Mosyna, in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the Trullan synod A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1006; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 823.)

JOANNES, bishop of Mutina, vid. of Modena.

JOANNES (253) I., bishop of Myndus, near Halicarnassus in Caria, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 211 A, 651, 680; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 918.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (254) II., bishop of Myndus, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. The name of the town is otherwise written Mindus and Mybdus in Mansi. (Mansi, xii. 1105, xiii. 148, 371 A, 394.)

JOANNES (255), bishop of Myrina, near Cumæ in the province of Asia, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 392; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 706.)

JOANNES, bishop of Nablus, vid. of Neapolis in Palestine.

JOANNES (256), said to have been bishop of Narnia, in the latter part of the 5th century, on the authority of a letter of Pelagius bishop of Rome quoted by Gratian (Decretum, caus. vii. qu. i. c. 18). In Migne's edition of Gratian the whole canon in which it appears is noted as "caput incertum" (Patrol. clxxxvii. 754, n. 141). Mansi gives the quotation among the letters of Pelagius II. A.D. 578–590 (ix. 910); Berard, however, contends that the letter is of still later date, and that the John mentioned in the quotation is the bishop of that see, A.D. 963 (Gratiani canones gen. ab apoc. discreti, i. p. 2, 499). But Jaffé (Reg. Pont. p. 86) notices the letter among those of Pelagius I. (A.D. 555–560), although he refers to Mansi, who assigns it to Pelagius II. As Interamna (Terni) was in ruins when Joannes is said to have been bishop of Narnia, he is supposed to have had charge of that see also. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 746, 1012.)

JOANNES (257) I., bishop of Neapolis (Naples) in Campania. On the authority of the Chronicle of the Neapolitan Bishops by Joannes Diaconus, Chiocarello places him cir. 388; and by the same authority he is stated to have transferred the body of St. Januarius from the neighbourhood of Puteoli to Naples (Chiocarello, Antist. Neapol. Eccles. p. 45; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. viii. 54; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 60). Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. xix. 387, 522) places him c. 402–432; Ughelli makes him earlier.

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (258) II., called MEDIOCRIS, occupied this see for twenty years, c. 540–c. 559. (Ugh. vi. 49; Cappelletti. xix. 389, 522; Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, pars i. in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 410, 411.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (259) III., between Paschasius and Caesarius, is placed by Ughelli from 616 to 635, and nearly the same by Cappelletti. (Gesta Episcoporum Neapol. pars i. 25, and note in Monum. Rerum Langob. p. 414; Ugh. vi. 57; Cappelletti. xix. 398, 523.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (260), bishop of Neapolis (Nablus or Sichein) in Palestine; present at the synod of Jerusalem A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1174; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 650.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (261), bishop of Neapolis in Proconsular Africa, was present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 648; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 242.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (262) I., third bishop of Nemausus (Nismes), consecrated circ. A.D. 511. Gregory of Tours speaks very favourably of him. His name is said not to occur in the old catalogues of the bishops of Nismes. He was believed to have been buried in the church of St. Julian the martyr. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 78; Hist. générale de Languedoc, i. 255; Gall. Christ. vi. 428.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (263) II., twelfth bishop between Vintericus and Christianus, perhaps cir. 813. (Gall. Christ. vi. 430; Hist. générale de Languedoc, i. 475.)

JOANNES (264), bishop of Neocaesarea in the provincia Euphratensis, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 393; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 948.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (265), a bishop to whom in March 592, Gregory the Great gave the visitation of the church of Nepi, while its own bishop, Paul, was commissioned to take the visitation of the church of Naples. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 26 in Migne, lxxvii. 562, Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1025; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 100.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (266), bishop of Nepi, present at the Roman synod of 743 under pope Zacharias. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364; Ugh. i. 1025; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 208.) Baronius (A. E. ann. 770 xvi.) places his death at Rome in 770.

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (267), bishop of Nicaea or Nicopolis in Thrace, at the seventh synod, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 374 A, 387; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1169; Wiltsch, i. 172.) Nicaea, also called Nice (Níen), was where the council of 359 was held (Mansi, iii. 309) and not far from Hadrianople. It is believed to have been the same as Nicopolis.

[J. de S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Nicia (Nice, Nizza) in Italy, vid. of Cemenelon.

JOANNES (268) II., bishop of Nicomedia, one of the principal actors in the iconoclastic synod collected by the emperor Constantine Copronymus, A.D. 754. He was anathematized by name at the seventh session of the seventh general council. (Mansi, xiii. 400; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 591.)

JOANNES (269), bishop of Nicopolis in Lesser Armenia, present at the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449. He attended the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, and subscribed the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo A.D. 458, and also the decree of Gennadius of Constantinople, A.D. 459. (Mansi, vi. 929, vii. 147, 589, 920; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 429.)

JOANNES, of Nicopolis in Thrace, vid. of Nicaea.

JOANNES (270), A.D. 516, bishop of Nicopolis and metropolitan of Epirus. He succeeded on the death of Alcyon. Determined to embrace the communion of Rome as a pledge of stability and the true faith, in consequence evidently of the mission which Hormisdas had sent to Constantinople, he sent a paper to the pope approving the four general councils, condemning the heretics, and especially Acacius. This proceeding greatly angered Dorotheus bishop of Thessalonica, who subjected John to a series of persecutions. The synod of Epirus, consisting of seven other bishops who had consecrated John, had written to the pope at the same time with details of their struggles for orthodoxy. The pope replied suitably to the metropolitan and his synod; he was the more pleased because in these disturbed days of the Eastern church applications for his communion had become rare, and he sent a profession of faith to be signed by those who desired alliance with the Roman see. In 517 Hormisdas wrote again to encourage him to perseverance in spite of all his troubles. Dorotheus, however, refused to leave him alone, and the same year there came letters from John to Rome saying that the persecution had become extremely bitter, Dorotheus having excited against him the civil and judicial powers, urgently imploring the pope's help, and asking that he might be allowed to make peace with Dorotheus, though a heretic, by sending him notice of his election according to ancient custom. Hormisdas wrote to the bishops Ennodius and Peregrinus, his legates in the East, telling them that John must on no account comply with the demands of Dorotheus; to John and his synod to the same effect; to Dorotheus, remonstrating strongly on his conduct, and to the emperor Anastasius to interest him on behalf of John. But the mission to the emperor was unsuccessful, and its failure was the signal for an outbreak of persecution against the orthodox throughout the East. In 518 the death of Anastasius, the succession of Justin, and the celebrated acclamations of Constantinople, restored peace to the church. [DOROTHEUS, BISHOP OF THESSALONICA.] (Hormisdas Pap. Epist. 7, 9, 11, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, Patr. Lat. lxiii. col. 387, &c.; Baron. Annal. ad ann. 516, xliii. &c.; Anastasii Biblioth. Sanctus Hormisdas, Patr. Lat. cxviii. col. 473; Ceillier, x. 616; Evagr. Scholast. H. E. iii. 31, Patr. Graec. lxxxvi. part 2, col. 265; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 135.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (271), Jacobite bishop of Nikiusi, in Egypt. In 686 he was among the bishops present at the death of the Jacobite patriarch John Semnudaeus at Alexandria (Renaudot, Pat. Alex. Jacob. p. 176). The patriarch Simon, who succeeded in 714, made him director of monasteries on account of his skill in ecclesiastical law. A monk whom he ordered to be castigated for a gross offence died under the infliction, whereupon the rest of the bishops successfully petitioned the patriarch for John's removal from his see on the ground of his having caused death, and being no longer qualified to minister at the altar (182). John wrote an account of the Chronicon Byzantinum, which is described in two articles of the Journal Asiatique (1877 t. ii. p. 451, 1868 t. i. p. 245), by M. Totenberg, who thinks it useful for comparison with the Chronicle of John Malalas and John the monk of Antioch as printed in Müller (Fragm. Hist. Graec. iv. 536). The original was in Greek. It is now extant only in an Ethiopic version made in 1602. [G. T. S.]

JOANNES, bishop of Nisibis, vid. of Cadne; bishop of Nismes, vid. of Nemausus; bishop of Nola, vid. Joannes I. Talaia, of Alexandria.

JOANNES (272), bishop of Nomentum (La Mentana) in 800. The existence of this bishop rests on evidence somewhat indirect. He is not included in the series by Coletus (Ugh. Ital. Sac. x. 146) and Cappelletti does not notice him (i. 560, 585), but Gams thinks he may be accepted (p. xiii.). See also Piello Luigi Galletti, in his Gabio Antica Citta' di Sabina (1757, p. 60) and Marronus (Eccles. Sabinens. p. 7). [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Norcia, vid. of Nursia; of Nova Claudiopolis, vid. of Andrapa.

JOANNES (273), bishop of Nova Justinianopolis, on the Hellespont, originally archbishop of Constantia (Salamis), in the island of Cyprus, but transferred to his new seat along with many of the inhabitants of the island, by the emperor Justinian II. on account of the attacks of the Saracens from Egypt. John was present at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692, the thirty-ninth canon of which confirms the ancient privileges accorded to the archbishops of Cyprus by the council of Ephesus; all the Hellespontine province was subjected to him, including the see of Cyzicus. This canon did not however continue to hold good for long; the church of Cyzicus recovered its metropolitan authority, and the archbishops returned to Cyprus. (Mansi, xi. 989; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1042, 1050.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (274), of Pannonia, bishop of Novas or Novae-(Citta Nova distrutta) a fortress between Concordia and Treviso, on the Venetian mainland, and having the neighbouring island of Caprita or Caprulae (Caorle) in the lagunes under his episcopal charge. He was in the jurisdiction of the schismatic patriarch of Aquileia, and was expelled from his see in 598. (Greg. Magn. Epp. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 10; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 126; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 1335; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ix. 490, 507; Ceillier, xi. 513.) [JOANNES (120).] [C. H.]

JOANNES (275), bishop of Nursia (Norcia) in 680. (Mansi, xi. 303; Hefele, § 314.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (276), bishop of Nyssa at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 391; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 393.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (277), bishop of Nyssa at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 642, 673; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 393.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (278), bishop of Nyssa at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 993 E, 1098, xiii. 142, 367 B, 386; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 393.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Oca, vid. of Valpuesta.

JOANNES (279), bishop of Odysus in Moesia Inferior on the Euxine, at the synod of Constantinople A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1226.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (280), bishop of Olympus, a large town in Lycia, at Constantinople A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050, 493; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 977.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Orte, vid. of Horta; bishop of Orvieto, vid. of Urbevetanum; bishop of Osimo, vid. of Auxinum; bishop of Otranto, vid. of Hydruntum.

JOANNES (281), bishop of Ovisa at the seventh synod, A.D. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 367 C), mentioned in the Latin list but not in the Greek. The place is not known. Another reading makes it Onisa, and there is an Onisa or Onisia mentioned by Pliny (H. N. iv. 20) as an island near Crete opposite the promontory and town of Itanus; but there is no other trace of this place having been episcopal, nor does it occur among the Cretan bishoprics in Le Quien (i. 256). [C. H.]

JOANNES (282), bishop of Oxoma (Osma), from 591 to c. 606. He is the first bishop of this see whose name has come down. His signature occurs amongst those of the (disputed) provincial synod at Toledo (A.D. 597). (Esp. Sagr. vi. 160, and vii. 288; Mansi, x. 478.) [M. A. W.]

JOANNES, bishop of Pace, vid. of Pax Julia; bishop of Padua, vid. of Patavium.

JOANNES (283), bishop of Paestum (Pesto), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 866, 1163; Hefele, § 307; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 465; Cappelletti, xx. 334, 363.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (284), bishop of Palermo, received several letters from Gregory the Great at the end of the pope's life, 603. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xiii. indict. vi. 43; lib. xiv. indict. vii. 3, 5 in Migne, lxxvii. 1292, 1305, 1307; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 152, 153.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (285) I., bishop of Palmyra in the province of Phoenicia Secunda, represented at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, signed the letter to the emperor Leo in the year 457. (Mansi, vii. 170; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 845.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (286) II., bishop of Palmyra, exiled in the year 518 by the emperor Justin I., for his adherence to the Monophysite party. (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. p. 3, of the Diss. de Monophys.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 846.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (287), bishop of Paltus in Syria, exiled to Petra by the emperor Anastasius, for his resistance to the Monophysite party, and was recalled by Justin, A.D. 518. (Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 3; Vict. Tun. Chron. ad ann. 505; Chron. Marcellini, ad ann. 518; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 800.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (288) I., bishop of Pampeluna, A.D. 610. His signature occurs first among those of the disputed Decretum Gundemari, A.D. 610 (see GUNTHIMAR). The Joannes whose signature is found among those of the third council of Egara, 614, to which no names of sees are appended, is identified by Sandoval with the Joannes of Pampeluna of Gunthrimar's Decretum. (Catalogo de los Obispos de Pamplona, p. 7 b; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324, 342.) [ST. SATURNINUS.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (289), bishop of Panium (Theodosiopolis) in Thracia, at the seventh general council of Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 996 B, 1099; xiii. 142, 367 C, 387; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1120.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (290), called BORLESITA, Jacobite bishop of Paralus in Egypt in the time of Damianus the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, in the 6th century. (Renaudot, Patr. Alex. Jacob. p. 146; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 571.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (291), bishop of Parembole in Palestine (Castra Saracenorum), present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 137; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 769.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (292), bishop of Parentium (Parenzo), present at the synod of Marano, near Venice, c. 590. [ELIAS (19).] (Paulus Diaconus, Gest. Lomb. iii. 26, note a in Pat. Lat. xc. 527 as to the reading.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (293), bishop of Parthicopolis, a town of uncertain position in Macedonia, represented at the council of Chalcedon. (Mansi, vi. 573, vii. 161; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 75.)

JOANNES (294), bishop of Patavium (Padua). He was elected c. A.D. 457, and probably held his see for twenty years. Padua having been destroyed by Attila, Joannes is said to have removed the seat of his bishopric to Fossa Clodia, but to have returned to Padua on its being rebuilt. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 329; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 487.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Pavia, vid. of Ticinum.

JOANNES (295), bishop of Pax Julia (Pace, Beja) from before 681 till after 693. He appears as "Joannes Pacensis" at the twelfth council of Toledo (A.D. 681), at the thirteenth (683), at the fifteenth (688), and at the sixteenth (693). (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287, 313, 333; Mansi, xi. 1039, 1075, xii. 21, 84; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 250; conf. Florez on the identification of the see, l. c. 221-235.)

[APRINGIUS.]

[M. A. W.]

JOANNES (296), bishop of Perath-Maishan in Persia, martyred under Sapor II. (Wright, Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 432.)

[G. T. S.]

JOANNES (297), bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 642, 672, 992; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1015.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (298), bishop of Pergamus before middle of the sixth century. (Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 715.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES, of Pericome, vid. of Aureliopolis.

JOANNES (299), bishop of Persia. He was present at the council general of Nicaea, 325, the only one from Persia recorded in the list, his name appearing as "Joannes Persidis." (Mansi, ii. 694, 699; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1251; cf. Stanley, Eastern Church, 5th ed. p. 104, note 5; Euseb. Vita Constant. iii. 7, iv. 8, 13; Baron. Annal. ad an. 325, ccix.; Ceillier, iii. 319.)

[W. M. S.]

JOANNES (300), Nov. 1, bishop and martyr in Persia, with Jacobus Zelotes a presbyter, in the reign of Sapor. (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec., Sirllet; Mart. Rom.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (301), bishop of Perugia, ordained Pelagius I. pope in 555. (Liber Pontificalis, Vita Pelagii I., ed. Vignol. i. p. 223; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. p. 82.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (302), bishop of Pessinus, the metropolis of Galatia Secunda at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 642, 671, 691; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 492.)

[T. W. D.]

JOANNES (303), bishop of Petra, metropolitan of the province of Third Palestine, in A.D. 457. (Mansi, vii. 559; Le Quien, iii. 726.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (304), bishop of Petra in the province of Lazi, the only known bishop of this see, present at the Quinisext council of 692. (Mansi, xi. 1006; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1345.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (305), bishop of Phaenus in Palestine, present at the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1174; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 748.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (306), bishop of Phanagoria, on the eastern side of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, in A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1327.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (307), bishop of Philadelphia in Arabia, south of Bostra. About the year 650 he was authorised by pope Martin I. to assume metropolitan authority over the whole Eastern church owing to the see of Antioch being occupied by a Monothelite, and that of Jerusalem being vacant. (Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 153; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 862; Ceillier, xi. 750.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (308), bishop of Philadelphia, in the province of Lydia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 647, 677; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 870.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (309), bishop of Phocaea, in the province of Asia, present at the Trullan synod (Quinisext), A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 993; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 735.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (310), bishop of Photice in Old Epirus, at the council of Chalcedon, 451. His subscription corruptly designates him as "Proticensis" and "Bruticensis." (Mansi, vii. 403; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 143.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES, of Pidachthoe, v. of Heraclionopolis.

JOANNES (311) I. bishop of Placentia (Piacenza), A.D. 503. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 15; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 197.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (312) II. was elected A.D. 595. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. xi. ep. 19; Ughelli, ii. 248; Cappelletti, xv. 15.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (313) III., was bishop from 693 to 715. (Cappelletti, xv. 15; Ughelli, ii. 198.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (314) I., bishop of Pisa c. A.D. 493. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvi. 38.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (315) II., bishop of Pisa c. A.D. 743. He was probably surnamed JUSTINUS. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 401; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvi. 40.)

[JUSTINUS.] [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (316), elected bishop of Pistoria (Pistoia) in 700. (Troja, Codice Diplom. iii. p. 46, 249.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (317), bishop of Podalia, in Lycia, present at the synod of Constantinople A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1147; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 974.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (318), bishop of Poemanium in the province of the Hellespont, in 458 A.D. (Mansi, vii. 587; Le Quien, i. 769.)

[L. D.]

JOANNES (319) I., twenty-fourth bishop of Poitiers, present at the council of Rheims, held in A.D. 625. (Flooard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 5; Mansi, x. 594; Gall. Christ. ii. 1151.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (320) II., thirty-fifth bishop of Poitiers. Alcuin wrote an epitaph upon him. (Alcuin, Opera, ii. 214; Migne, Patr. Lat. ci. 750; Gall. Christ. ii. 1155.)

[S. A. B.]

JOANNES (321), bishop of Polemonium in Pontus Polemoniaca, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 946, vii. 122, 404, 605; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 515.)

[F. A.]

JOANNES (322), bishop of Polybotum in Phrygia Salutaris, called "Thaumaturgus," from his reputed miracles, lived during the reign of Leo the Isaurian, (Sirlet, Menol. Graec. Dec. 5) His commemoration was on Feb. 13, according to the Basilian Menology, and on Dec. 5 according to the Menol. Graecorum. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 843.)

JOANNES (323), bishop of Polymartium (Bomarzo), present at the Roman synod of 743. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (324), bishop of Pompeiopolis (Soli) in Cilicia. He was present at the Quinsextine synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1006; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 878.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (325), bishop of Portus Romanus (Porto). He signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, in 680, to the third council of Constantinople. He was selected as one of the deputies from this Roman synod to Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 210 D, 302, 641, 670, 687; Hefele, § 314, § 315; Liber Pontificalis, Vita Agathonis, ed. [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (327), bishop of Praenetus (Proiectus) on the Propontis, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 374 B, 397; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 622.)

JOANNES (328), bishop of Prima Justiniana in Illyria. John was unanimously elected to the bishopric; whereupon Gregory, probably in 591 (lib. ii. ep. 22) wrote to the bishops of Illyria and to John, gave him the pall, and confirmed him as vicar of the Roman see. In the affair of John of Larissa and Adrian of Thebes [JOANNES BISHOP OF LARISSA], the bishop of Prima Justiniana shewed himself quite unworthy of this confidence; he confirmed the unjust decision of the bishop of Larissa without examining the witnesses. Gregory therefore wrote and deprived him of communion for a month, 592 (lib. iii. ep. 6). He is mentioned elsewhere in Gregory's letters. (Epist. ii. 23; viii. 5; ix. 68; xi. 47; xii. 30, Patr. Lat. lxxvii.; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 102, 130, 147; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 286; Ceillier, xi. 487.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (329), bishop of the island of Proconnesus in the Propontis, translated from the see of Gordus in Lydia (Socrates, H. E. vii. 36); present at the general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1124; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 783.)

JOANNES (330), bishop of Psynchus in Egypt, at the council of Chalcedon, 451. (Mansi, vii. 51; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 615.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (331), bishop of Ptolemais (Acre) in Phoenicia, in A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1041, seq.; cf. also Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 816.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (332), bishop of Puteoli (Pozzuoli). His date, which was probably early, is not exactly known. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 318.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES, of Ragusa, vid. of Epidaurus.

JOANNES (333) I., surnamed ANGELOPTES, bishop of Ravenna, either A.D. 418 or 430. He died c. A.D. 433. (Boll. Acta SS. 7 July, ii. 468; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 331; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 29.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (334) II., bishop of Ravenna, c. A.D. 452-477. In his time Ravenna was besieged and taken by Theodorik, king of the Goths, who afterwards fixed his residence there. He is stated by Ughelli and others to have been represented by Simplicius. But the letter of Simplicius was written A.D. 482, and seems to have been really addressed to Joannes III. of Ravenna. (Acta SS. 12 Jan. i. 727; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 333; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 37; Mart. Rom. Jan. 12.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (335) III., archbishop of Ravenna, 578-595. He was, as he himself says, brought up in the bosom of the church at Rome. Gregory the Great corresponded with him frequently, and tried to extend the influence of the Roman church by his means (Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. 56, 57 in Migne, lxxvii. 650, 654; Paulus Diaconus, iii. 26, and note p. 106, in Monumenta Rerum Langob. 1878; Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 35, 46 in Migne lxxvii. 573, 583). A few years later, Gregory brought five charges against Joannes, to the general effect that he was presuming beyond his position (Epist. lib. v. indict. xiii. 15 in Migne, lxxvii. 735). See also Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Ravenn. 98, in Monum. Rerum Langob. p. 342, Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 95, 100, 101, 110, 111.

JOANNES (337) V., archbishop of Ravenna, c. 613-632. (Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Ravenn. cap. 105-107, in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, pp. 346-348, and note, p. 346.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (338) VI., archbishop of Ravenna, c. 725, for about twenty years probably. He was sent into exile to Venice for one year by the people of Ravenna, and recalled by the exarch. He attended the synod of Gregory III. in 731.

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (339) VII., archbishop of Ravenna, c. 778-785. (Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eocl. Ravenn. cap. 161-163, in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, pp. 381-383.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (340), a very doubtful archbishop of Ravenna c. 789. (See note to Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eocl. Ravenn. cap. 166, in Monum. Rerum Langob. p. 386.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (341) I., bishop of Rhegium (Reggio) in Calabria, present at the Lateran synod in 649. (Mansi, x. 867; Cappelletti, xxi. 156.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (342) II., bishop of the same see at the council of Constantinople in 680. (Mansi, xi. 210 d, 641, 670, 687, Cappelletti, xxi. 157.) Ughelli (ix. 324) considers this John the same as the preceding. In other places Ughelli (ii. 243) and Cappelletti (xv. 361) appear to make the later John bishop of the Lombard Reggio, Regium Lepidi. [C. H.]

JOANNES (343), bishop of Rhaedestus, at the seventh synod, 787. (Mansi, xii. 995, 1100, xiii. 142, 367 c, 387; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1129.)

JOANNES (344), bishop of Rhaesina (Theodosiopolis) in Osrhoene, present at the synod of Antioch, A.D. 444 or 445, and at the council of Tyre in 448 or 449. (Mansi, vii. 325, 210; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 981.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (345), bishop of Rhodes, the metropolis of the Cyclades, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, A.D. 449, when he voted for the decrees against Flavian of Constantinople and Eusebius of Dorylaeum, and for the orthodoxy of Eutyches (Mansi, vi. 914) and represented the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 431; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 924.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, of Rimini, vid. of Ariminum.

JOANNES (346) I., bishop of Rome after Hormisdas from Aug. 13, A.D. 523, to May 18, A.D. 526. He was the son of one Constantius, an Etruscan, and had been a Roman presbyter (Anastas. Lib. Pont.). The emperor Justin, having during the pontificate of Hormisdas restored the churches in the East to orthodoxy and communion with Rome, continued to evince his orthodox zeal by the persecution of heretics. Having already suppressed the Eutychians and Nestorians, he issued in 523 a severe edict against Manicheans, condemning them, wherever found, to banishment or death (Cod. Justin. leg. 12). Justin's edict had debarred also other heretics from public offices, but had excepted the Arian Goths because of his league with Theodoric, the Gothic king of Italy. Soon afterwards, however, he proceeded against the Arians also, ordering all their churches to be consecrated anew for the use of Catholics. Theodoric, who, though an Arian, had hitherto granted free toleration to Catholics in his own dominions, remonstrated with the emperor by letter, but without effect. He therefore applied to the bishop of Rome, whom he sent for to Ravenna, and desired him to go in person to Constantinople to use his influence with the emperor, threatening that, unless toleration were conceded to Arians in the East, he would himself withhold it in future from Catholics in the West. An anonymous author of the time (Anonym. Vales. p. 59) adds that he also demanded that Arians who had been made to renounce their religion should be allowed to return to it; that the pope, though ready to undertake the other part of the commission, declined this; and that the king, incensed, ordered him to be conveyed at once to a vessel, and put to sea. However that might be, John went (A.D. 525), accompanied by five bishops and four senators. The unprecedented event of a visit in person of a bishop of Rome to Constantinople seems to have caused a great sensation there. He was received with the utmost respect by acclaiming crowds and by the emperor. Invited by the patriarch Epiphanius to celebrate Easter with him in the great church, he consented only on condition of being seated on a throne above that of the patriarch. He officiated in Latin, and according to the Latin rite. None were excluded from his communion except Timotheus patriarch of Alexandria (Theophan.; Marcellin. Com.). Anastasius (Lib. Pontif.) states that the emperor, though now in the eighth year of his reign, bowing to the ground before the vicar of St. Peter, solicited and obtained the honour of being crowned by him.

With regard to the result of the embassy, there is a concurrence of testimony that John both prayed for and obtained a cessation of Justin's measures against the Arians. Baronius indeed (and also Binius), anxious to vindicate a pope from the charge of tolerating heresy, insists that John really, like a second Regulus, dissuaded the emperor from the concessions demanded of him. The grounds alleged for this view are—(1) a letter from the pope himself to the bishops of Italy, supposed to have been written from prison after his return, in which he exhorts them to consecrate at once all Arian churches for Catholic use, and states that, when at Constantinople, he had done the same in the East with the emperor's concurrence; (2) a citation from Gregory Turonensis (de Gloria Martyrum c. 40); (3) the fact that John and his companions, on their return from Constantinople, were received with displeasure by Theodoric, and imprisoned; which, it is argued, would not have been the case, had they done what was required of them. But (1) the letter referred to is now considered spurious, and allowed to be so by Pagi and Du Pin; (2) Gregory of Tours is evidently vague and inaccurate; he does not seem even to be aware of the mission to Constantinople; (3) the imprisonment of John by Theodoric, though its cause is not known, may be otherwise accounted for. It might be due to the pope's refusal, alleged by the anonymous writer, to urge on the emperor the allowance of relapse to converted Arians; or, very probably, to suspicion of his implication in treasonable negotiations with the emperor, on the charge of which, just before his return, Boethius, with his father-in-law Symmachus, had been imprisoned by the king. Against the supposition of Baronius, Pagi (Critic.) cites the following testimonies: "Justin, having heard the legation, promised that he would do all except that those who had been reconciled to the Catholic faith could by no means be restored to the Arians" (Anonym. Vales.); "The venerable pope and the senators returned with glory, having obtained all they asked from Justin" (Anastasius): "Justinus Augustus granted the whole petition, and restored to the heretics their churches, according to the wish of Theodoric the heretical king, lest Christians, and especially priests, should be put to the sword" (Auctor. Chron. Veterum Pontificum); "Having come to Augustus, they requested him with many tears to accept favourably the tenour of their embassy, however unjust,—and he, moved by their tears, granted what they asked, and left the Arians unmolested" (Miscell. lib. 15, ad an. vi. Justin.).

Whatever the cause, it is undoubted that John and the other legates were on their return received with displeasure by Theodoric, and imprisoned at Ravenna, where the pope died on the 18th of May in the following year, 526. His body was removed thence, and buried in St. Peter's at Rome, on May 27, on which day he appears in the Roman Martyrology as a saint and martyr. See also Fragm. Vales. Greg. Dial. i. iii. c. 2.

Two spurious letters, one of which has been referred to, have been assigned to him. No genuine writings remain. [J. B.—y.]

JOANNES (347) II. (called MERCURIUS), bishop of Rome after Boniface II., from Dec. 31, A.D. 532, to May 27, A.D. 335. He was the son of one Projectus, a Roman by birth, and had been a Roman presbyter (Anastas. Lib. Pont.). The canvassings and contests, usual at this period on the vacancy of the see, which had caused the intervention of the king Theodoric on the accession of Symmachus and of Felix, were such on this occasion as to delay the election for eleven weeks. Church funds had been expended on bribery, and even sacred vessels had been publicly sold for the purpose (Ep. Athalaric. ad Joann. pap.; Cassiodor. Variar. l. ix.; Ep. 15.).

To check such abuses, the senate had in 530, after the election of the previous pope, passed a decree rendering void all promises and contracts made for securing votes in the election of a pope, and disfranchising all persons implicated in them; limiting also the sums that candidates might promise to distribute in charity after election, and ordering moneys expended in canvassing to be recoverable from the recipients or their heirs, and to be devoted to pious uses after payment of a third part to the informer. Athalaric, at the earnest instance of the "defensor ecclesiae," now confirmed this decree, and notified his having done so in a letter to the new pope, desiring him to inform the bishops of Italy (Inter Epp. Joann. II. Labb.; Cassiodor. Variar. ix.; Ep. 16.). Baronius takes it for granted that it was at the pope's own instance that the defensor ecclesiae had moved the king to confirm the decree. But of this there is no evidence.

The most noteworthy incident of this pope's brief reign is a doctrinal decision of his, in which he appears at first sight to differ from one of his predecessors. Pope Hormisdas had in 522 written in strong condemnation of certain Scythian monks who had upheld the statement that "One of the Trinity (Unus ex Trinitate) suffered in the flesh." [See HORMISDAS.] His rejection of the phrase had at the time been construed so as to imply heresy (Ep. Maxent. ad Hormisd.), and now the accemetæ, or "Sleepless Monks," of Constantinople argued distinctly from it in favour of the Nestorian position that Mary was not truly and properly the mother of God; saying with reason that, if He who suffered in the flesh was not of the Trinity, neither was He who was born in the flesh. The emperor Justinian, supported by the patriarch Epiphanius, having condemned the position of the sleepless ones, they sent a deputation to Rome, urging the pope to support their deduction from the supposed doctrine of his predecessor, and quoting the text, "If I build, again the things which I have destroyed, I make myself a transgressor." The emperor, having embodied his view of the true doctrine in an imperial edict, sent also an embassy of two bishops—Hypatius and Demetrius—to Rome with a letter requesting the pope to signify in writing to himself and the patriarch his acceptance of the doctrine of the edict, which he lays down as indubitably true, and assumes to be, as a matter of course, the doctrine of the Roman see (Inter Epp. Joann. II. Labb.).

But the edict was in fact a distinct assertion of the correctness of the phrase that had been contended for by the Scythian monks, and so much objected to by Hormisdas. Its words are, "The sufferings, as well as miracles, which Christ of His own accord endured in the flesh are of one and the same. For we do not know God the Word as one and Christ as another, but one and the same. For the Trinity remained after the incarnation of the one Word of God, who was of the Trinity; nor does the Holy Trinity admit the addition of a fourth person. We anathematize Nestorius the man-worshipper, and those who think with him, who confess not that our Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, and our God, incarnate, made man, and crucified, is ONE of the holy and consubstantial Trinity") Lex. Justin. Cod. 1, i. 6. In his letter he expresses himself thus:—"For we do not acknowledge God the Word to be one and Christ another, but one and the same, consubstantial with the Father according to His divinity, and one and the same consubstantial with us according to His humanity, passible in the flesh, and one and the same impassible in the Godhead."

John, having received both deputations, assembled the Roman clergy, who at first could come to no agreement. But afterwards, when Ferrandus, deacon of Carthage, consulted by the Roman deacon Anatolius, had expressed his adhesion to the view that the Divinity itself might properly be said to have suffered in the flesh, and when this appeared to be the general view of the learned, a synod was convened by the pope, in which Justinian's confession of faith was accepted and confirmed. To this effect he wrote to the emperor (March 25, A.D. 534), saying, "We find that thou hast proposed an edict to the faithful out of thy love of the faith, and for removing the intention of heretics, according to the apostolic doctrine, with the consent of our brethren and fellow bishops. Which edict, because it agrees with the apostolic doctrine, we confirm by our authority (Joann. II. Ep. ii.; Labb.). He also wrote to the Roman senators, laying down the true doctrine as the emperor had defined it, supporting it from Scripture and the Fathers, and warning them not to communicate with the "Sleepless Monks."

This case has been adduced (e.g. by Bower in his Lives of the Popes) as a glaring instance of two popes contradicting each other in definition of doctrine, and an argument against their infallibility. It is contended, on the other hand (as by Baronius), that Hormisdas never actually condemned the doctrine endorsed by John; that he only repudiated the use of the phrase which expressed it at the time when it was first put forward, as being then unnecessary, unauthorized, intended in a heretical sense, and likely to sow the seeds of heresy. And it is true that we do not find in the letters of Hormisdas any distinct condemnation of the phrase itself, however strongly he inveighed against its upholders, as troublesome and dangerous innovators. But the fact remains, whatever it is worth, that a doctrinal statement which one pope strongly discountenanced, as at any rate unnecessary and fraught with danger, was, twelve years afterwards, at the instance of an emperor, authoritatively propounded by another. The view expressed by Justinian and accepted by John has ever since been received as orthodox.

In 534 John was consulted by Caesarius of Arles with respect to Contumeliosus, bishop of Riez (Regensis Ecclesiae) in Gaul, who had been guilty of some incontinence. He wrote in reply three letters on the subject to Caesarius, to the bishops of Gaul, and to the clergy of Riez, directing the guilty bishop to be deposed and confined in a monastery, and a visitor to be appointed during the vacancy of the see.

A letter assigned to this pope by the Pseudo-Isidore, addressed to a bishop Valerius, on the relation of the Son to the Father, is spurious. All his genuine letters that are extant have been referred to above. He died on May 27, A.D. 535, and was buried in the basilica of St. Peter.

[J. B.—y.]

JOANNES (348) III., bishop of Rome, after Pelagius, from July 18, 560, to July 12, 573, during nearly thirteen years; ordained after a vacancy of four months and seventeen days. He was the son of one Anastasius, a person of distinction at Rome (Anastas. Lib. Pont.). About this pope very little is recorded. There are only two incidents in which his name appears. Two bishops, Salonius of Ebredunum, and Sagittarius of Vapuncum, in Gaul, had been deposed by a synod held by order of king Guntram at Lyons, under the metropolitan Nicetius. The deposed prelates obtained the king's leave to appeal to Rome, and John III. ordered their restoration. The order was complied with; but, having been guilty of fresh misdemeanours, they were eventually deposed finally by another synod convened by Guntram, and their sees filled up (Gregor. Turon. Hist. l. v. cc. 20, 27). The second incident involving John III. is mentioned by Anastasius (Lib. Pontif. in Vit. Joann. III.), and by Paulus Diaconus (i. 5), to the effect that the exarch Narses, complained of by the Romans to the emperor, having retired to Naples, and there invited the Lombards to invade Italy, the pope went to him, and persuaded him to return to Rome. The whole story about Narses in this instance is indeed discredited by Baronius (Ann. 567, No. 8-12), but credited by Pagi and Muratori (cf. Gibbon, ch. xlv.). [J. B.—y.]

JOANNES (349) IV., bishop of Rome after Severinus, from December 24, 640, to October 11, 642, during less than two years. He was a Dalmatian, son of one Venantius, a learned man (scholasticus) and had been, when elected, deacon of Rome (Anastas. Lib. Pont.). The see having been vacant since Aug. 2, 640, the delay of his ordination was due to the imperial confirmation not having been previously obtained. During the interval a letter from the Scottish bishops and presbyters, addressed to Severinus, arrived at Rome, on the question of the computation of Easter. Bede gives extracts from the reply sent to the Scots, which condemns strongly their Easter usage, and also warns them against Pelagianism, which was reported to have crept in among them (Bede, H. E. ii. 19; Diurn. Rom. Pontif. tit. i.).

John's short reign was marked by his resolute opposition to the Monothelitic heresy, then maintained at Constantinople, and his apology for his predecessor Honorius, who was accused of having supported it. About the time of the death of the latter the emperor Heraclius had issued, at the instance of the patriarch Sergius, the profession of faith known as the Ecthesis, alleged to have been approved by the Eastern patriarchs, and proposed for general acceptance. It asserted the existence of one will only in Christ, and forbade the discussion in future of the question of one or two energies, or the assertion of either view. It came out too late for Honorius to express an opinion about it, but his successor Severinus, during his short reign of two months, appears to have condemned it; probably in synod. For in the profession of faith made afterwards by the popes they accept the decrees of Severinus, John, Theodorus, and Martin against "the new questions that had arisen in the royal city . . . professing, according to the motion of two natures, also two natural operations"; and condemn under anathema whatever these pontiffs had condemned, and receive what they had received. (Lib. Diurn. Rom. Pontif. c. 3, tit. vi.) John also lost no time in condemning the heresy of the Monothelites, for which purpose Theophanes states that he convened a synod of bishops at Rome (Theophan. ad Ann. Heracl. xi.). Pagi (Critic. ann. 640 ii.) argues that this must have been almost immediately after his accession, since Heraclius (who died Feb. 11, 641) alludes in a letter addressed to him to his having already written to Pyrrhus (patriarch of Constantinople after Sergius), condemning the Ecthesis. Such prompt action on John's part was probably a main cause why the emperor, in the letter referred to, tried to back out of his patronage of the Ecthesis, saying that he had nothing to do with its preparation, though the patriarch Sergius had persuaded him to authorise and sign it.

It appears that the patriarch Pyrrhus continued to press the doctrine contained in the Ecthesis, and sent letters to the West, alleging against the reigning pope, the support of it by Honorius. To meet this allegation, John wrote to the emperors Constantine and Heraclonas, who had succeeded their father Heraclius, a letter the main purport of which was to vindicate Honorius from the charge of heresy. His contention is that Honorius had not denied the co-existence of a divine and a human will in Christ, as God and man, but only that there were in him, as man, two contrary wills of the flesh and of the spirit; that Sergius having informed him that some taught two contrary wills in Christ, he had replied that the human nature assumed by our Lord was the original nature of Adam before his fall, in which the will was one, not the corrupted nature, such as we inherit, in which the flesh lusts against the spirit; that the whole argument of Honorius had reference to the "dispensation of Christ," not to His "supernal nature." As to the adequacy of this defence, see article on HONORIUS. On the real question at issue with the Monothelites John argues more successfully. "According to which nature," he says, "do they assert the one will of Christ? If according to His divine nature only, they deny Him to be perfect man with the Manicheans; if according to His human, they deny him to be perfect God with Photinus and Ebion. If they allege one will of both natures, then in confounding the natural wills they confound the natures; and to assert but one will of the Divinity and humanity, and one operation, is nothing else than to assert with the Eutychians the operation of one nature alone in Christ." He asserts also that the orthodox fathers, throughout the world, agreed in teaching, as two natures, so also two wills and operations in Christ. He concludes by requesting the emperors to restrain the propagators of the new heresy, and to cause the Ecthesis, which was now posted in public places, to be taken down and torn; that so, through their authority and the "apostolical perfection," it might be null and void for ever; thus would they be offering, at the beginning of their reign, a salutary sacrifice to the Lord; and thus might they obtain His blessing (Joan. iv. ep. ii. Labb.). The two emperors addressed, during their short and troubled reigns, are not known to have taken any action in consequence of this letter. Constans, their successor, is said by pope Theodore, the successor of John, in a letter to the patriarch Paulus, to have concurred with John; but the Ecthesis, as appears from the same letter, still remained posted in the city (Theodor. I. ep. i. Labb.).

Anastasius (Lib. Pontific.) records that this pope was diligent in collecting relics, in building, restoring, and adorning churches, and redeeming Christian captives "a gentibus" (meaning the Slaves, who had now invaded Illyricum); and that he was buried in St. Peter's. Besides the letter to the emperors, another of his remains to Isaac, bishop of Syracuse, granting to monks the right of instituting, as well as presenting, the priests of their own churches (John iv. ep. iii. Labb.). Besides the authorities referred to above, there is allusion to John's defence of Honorius in the Disputatio S. Maximi cum Pyrrho (Baron. in append. tom. viii.; and Labb. Concl. t. vi. p. 1537).

JOANNES (350) V., bishop of Rome after

Benedictus II., from the latter part of July 685 to Aug. 2, 686, during little more than a year, the see having been vacant two months and eighteen days; the son of one Cyriacus, and a native of Antioch in Syria (Anast. Lib. Pont.). He was the first pope who was consecrated at once after his election without waiting for the imperial confirmation, a mandate allowing this having been obtained from the emperor Constantine Pogonatus in the time of Benedict II. [BENEDICTUS II.] He had, as deacon, been one of the three representatives of pope Agatho at the sixth oecumenical council (681). There is an extant letter addressed to John from Justinian II. (who succeeded Constantine Pogonatus in September, 686). But this letter, being dated February 17, 687, could not have been received by John, who died before its date. It may be concluded to be that said by Anastasius (In Vit. Conon. pap.) to have been received by Conon who succeeded John, of which the account entirely agrees with its contents. It may have been prepared before the news of John's death had reached Constantinople, and his name left inadvertently in the superscription when it was dated and despatched. The only act recorded of this pope is his restraining in synod the abuse that had grown up of the archbishops of Calaris (Cagliari) in Sardinia ordaining bishops there independently of the Roman see. Cironatus of Cagliari had so ordained one Novellus, bishop of Turris Libissonis (Porto di Torre). [J. B—y.]

JOANNES (351) VI., bishop of Rome, after Sergius, from October 20, 701, to January 9, 705, during a little more than three years; a Greek by race; chosen after a vacancy of fifty days. (Anastas. Lib. Pont.) On his accession Apsimar (emperor under the name of Tiberius during the deposition and exile of Justinian II.) sent Theophylact, the exarch of Italy, from Sicily to Rome, apparently with some hostile intention. Against him the military of Italy assembled tumultuously before the gates of Rome; but the pope protected the exarch, closing the gates of the city against the insurgents, and sending a deputation of clergy to treat with them in their camp, and so allayed the sedition (Anastas.). Gisulphus, the Lombard duke of Beneventum, having invaded Campania, and taken a large number of prisoners, John VI. is said to have sent to him also an embassy of priests, to have redeemed all the captives, and induced the invader to retire (Anastas.; and Paul. Diac. Gest. Longobard. l. 6, c. 27).

This pope is principally memorable for his entertainment of the appeal to him of the English Wilfrid. Wilfrid had previously (679) appealed in person to pope Agatho against the synod held under archbishop Theodore and king Egfrid of Northumbria, in which he had been expelled from his diocese of York. He had been then honourably acquitted of all charges against him during the sittings of the sixth oecumenical council. Having at length (686) been restored by king Aldfrid, through the intervention of Theodore, to his entire see, he had been again (692) expelled from it by the king; and subsequently, though in the meantime supported by pope Sergius, been condemned in a synod held under archbishop Beorhtwald, who had succeeded Theodore, and required to confine himself to his monastery of Ripon, relinquishing his other preferences. The charges against him had been his alleged exorbitant possessions, and his refusal to consent to the subdivision of his see. Wilfrid had declared to the synod his determination to appeal again to Rome, on which the king and archbishop had both said that his preference of Rome's judgment to their own alone justified his condemnation. After visiting the friendly king Ethelred of Mercia, who promised to send messengers or letters to Rome in his behalf, he made his third journey to Rome, being now seventy years of age. Archbishop Beorhtwald also sent representatives to oppose him. His case was heard in synod by John VI. (704), seventy assemblies of bishops in the course of four months being said to have met. During the proceedings the record of his previous appeal to pope Agatho during the sixth general council was read; from which it appeared that, having been absolved from all charges certain and uncertain, he had taken his place in the conclave of bishops, and signed the confession of faith in the name of the British churches. The reading of this record is said to have produced a great effect, the pope and all the bishops declaring that he who had been thus acquitted and honoured by Agatho, and who had been a bishop for nearly forty years, ought by no means to be condemned, but sent back with honour to his country. He would fain have spent the remainder of his days in Rome, but was not permitted. Though thus justified by pope John against the criminations of his accusers, he still did not obtain from him an order for restitution to his see. For the pope in his letters to kings Ethelred and Aldfrid states that, in the absence of the principal persons concerned in the dispute, the case could not be so far terminated at Rome. He therefore directs archbishop Beorhtwald to convene a synod at which these principal persons should be present, viz. Rosa, John, and Eadfrid, the holders respectively of the sees of York, Hexham, and Lindisfarne, into which the old diocese of Wilfrid had been divided. He hopes that the matter may be thus finally settled; but in case of its being necessary to appeal again to Rome, he requires all concerned to appear personally, on pain of the ipso facto deposition of any bishop who might refuse to come. The result was the synod under Beorhtwald, near the river Nidd, in which a compromise was at length effected, and peace restored. Baronius erroneously assigns this last appeal of Wilfrid to Rome, and the pope's letter, to the year 705, in the pontificate of John VII. Pagi (Critic.) establishes the date as given above. The main authority for the facts is Eddius in his life of St. Wilfrid. See also Bede (H. E. v. 19). John VI. was buried on Jan. 10 in St. Peter's. [J. B.—y.]

JOANNES (352) VII., bishop of Rome after John VI., from 1st March, 705 to 17th Oct. 707, for two years seven months and seventeen days, the see having been vacant for one month and eighteen days. Like his predecessor he was a Greek, his father's name being Plato. His reign was uneventful. Soon after his accession the emperor Justinian II. (having recovered the empire after his banishment) sent him by two metropolitan bishops the canons of the council called Quinisextum, or the Council in Trullo, with an earnest request that he would summon a Roman synod to confirm such parts of the canons as were approved, and reject the rest. They had, it is to be remembered, been rejected entirely by Pope Sergius, when sent to him by the emperor Justinian after the council in 692, as containing things adverse to the prerogatives and customs of the Roman see. John VII. returned them to the emperor unaltered. His inaction in the matter is attributed by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vit. Pontif.) to "timidity through human frailty;" but is commended by Binus and Baronius on the ground that his most dignified course was to ignore altogether the proceedings of the pseudo-synod in Trullo.

During his pontificate, Aripert, the Lombard king, is said to have restored to him papal patrimony in the Cottian Alps, which had been seized by the Lombards, and to have sent the instrument of donation engraved in letters of gold. Anastasius speaks of him as learned and eloquent, and describes his extensive works in decorating churches, adding that among the pictures with which he adorned them portraits of himself were to be found. From the scanty notices of him, which we derive from Anastasius, we may gather him to have been a man of taste and culture rather than of energetic action. He was buried on the 18th of October, A.D. 707, in St. Peter's, before the altar of the Oratory of the Blessed Virgin which he had himself constructed.

[J. B.—y.]

JOANNES (353), bishop of Rubum (Ruvo), A.D. 493 (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vii. 1032). Gams (Ser. Episc. 918) makes him Joannes II., and mentions (but without any approximation to a date) an earlier Joannes, who is not mentioned by Ughelli. [R. S. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Sabina, vid. of Forum-novum; of Salamis, vid. of Nova Justinianopolis.

JOANNES (354), bishop of Salerno in 680. (Mansi, xi. 314; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (355), the name of six bishops of Salona in Farlati's Illyricum Sacrum; viz. :—

I. 16th bishop (275—282 or 5) (i. 633).

II. 19th (298—300) (i. 706).

III. 21st (303—304) (i. 708).

IV. 29th (395—405) (ii. 46).

V. 31st (428—450) (ii. 91).

VI. Surnamed RAVENNAS, who became John I., first archbishop of Spalato from 650 to 680, when this city was built in succession to Salona which was destroyed in 639. [J. de S.]

JOANNES (356), bishop of St. Salontentia (τῆς ἁγίας Σαλονεντιανῆς or Σαλονεντίας), present at the seventh synod, A.D. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 139, 366 B). The see may be the same as one called in another list St. Saluntia (τῆς ἁγίας Σαλουντιανῆς ἐκκλησίας), which also sent a John to this synod (ibid. 387); but both the names seem unknown. [C. H.]

JOANNES, of Salzburg, vid. of Juvavia.

JOANNES (357) I., bishop of Saragossa before A.D. 540. His signature appears among those of the council of Barcelona (A.D. 540), and of the council of Lerida (546). (Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. iii. 29, conf. Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 120; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. de la Igl. Española, ii. 138, 686; Esp. Sagr. xxx. 126.) [VALERIUS.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (358) II., bishop of Saragossa from about 619 to about 631. He was the brother and predecessor of the famous Braulio of Saragossa, and succeeded Maximus the historian. A short life of him will be found in the De Viris Ill. of Ildefonsus (cap. vi. in Pat. Lat. xcvi. 201, and Esp. Sagr. v. 476). According to Ildefonsus he occupied the see twelve years, and flourished under Sisebut and Suintihila (Esp. Sagr. xxx. 141). He composed a treatise (not extant) on the calculation of Easter (Cave, i. 576). [VALERIUS.] [M. A. W.]

JOANNES (359), bishop of Sardis, addressed by Theodorus Studita (ep. 108 in Pat. Gr. xcix. 1367; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 863). It is not known whether he is the John bishop of Sardis who wrote the life of St. Nicephorus the martyr. (Boll. Acta SS. of Feb. ii. 285.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, bishop of Sassari, vid. of Torres.

JOANNES (360), archbishop of Scodra (Skutari), at the south of Dalmatia(?). His name is omitted in many lists of the bishops of this diocese, owing probably to a passage in Gregory the Great's epistle to Malchus bishop of Dalmatia, A.D. 591 (lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 38 in Migne, lxxvii. 492), in which Joannes seems to be referred to as a layman who had a dispute with bishop Stephanus of Scodra. But the superscription of another letter (ibid. p. 909; lib. viii. Indict. i. ep. 668), including, among other names, that of "Joanni Scoritano," caused Farlati to place Joannes between Stephanus and Constantius, with the approximate date, A.D. 598. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 275-278; Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. vii. 301-334; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 95, 130.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (361), bishop of Scopia (Skupi) in Dardania, signed, A.D. 493, an epistle of the Dardanian bishops to pope Gelasius. (Mansi, viii. 13; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 310.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (362), bishop of Scyllacium (Squillace), sent there in 592 by Gregory the Great. He had formerly been bishop of Lissus (Alessio) in Dalmatia, and was to return there if it became free from the invaders who had driven him out (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. epp. 37, 38; Migne, lxxvii. 575). In 592 Gregory committed to him the visitation of the vacant episcopal church of Crotona. In 598 he was reproved by Gregory the Great for having encroached on the rights of the neighbouring monastery of Castellum (lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 34; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 101, 125). [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (363), bishop of Scythopolis in Palestine, cir. A.D. 496-518. We are informed by Photius (cod. 231) that Sophronius patriarch of Jerusalem, in his synodical epistle to Honorius, mentioned John as having written in defence of the council of Chalcedon. Pope Agatho likewise in 680 speaks of him in his epistle to Constantine Pogonatus (Mansi, xi. 270 C) as one of the defenders of the catholic doctrine. Sophronius and Agatho both probably referred to a work of John against Severus quoted at the Lateran council of 649 (Mansi, x. 1107) and at the council of Constantinople in 680 (Mansi, xi. 438). As the passage read on the latter occasion mentioned the controversy between Severus and Julian of Halicarnassus (q. v.), the date of John's death must have been somewhat later than that given by Le Quien. Cave (i. 506) thinks he may be the same as JOANNES MAXENTIUS, who was a Scythian and an archimandrite. Le Quien (iii. 690) also is uncertain as to his identity with Joannes Scythopolitanus Scholasticus mentioned by Cyril of Scythopolis in his Life of St. Saba. But this John was a layman and lived under bishop John's successor Theodosius. Our bishop was as early as the 9th century confounded by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Pat. Lat. cxxix. 740) with another John Scholasticus of Scythopolis, who wrote a commentary on the pseudo-Dionysius (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 690). [J. de S.]

JOANNES (364), bishop of Sebaste, the metropolis of the first province of Lesser Armenia, present both at the "Latrocinium Ephesinum," A.D. 449, and at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he also subscribed the letter to the emperor Leo A.D. 458. (Mansi, vi. 928; vii. 138, 589; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 424.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (365), bishop of Segni (Signia), present at the Roman synods under Gregory II. in 721 (Mansi, xii. 265; Hefele, § 330) and 743 under pope Zacharias. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (366), bishop of Seleucia, martyred under Sapor II. (Wright's Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 431.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (367), bishop of Seleucia on the Tigris, in or before 559, but whether over the orthodox there or as catholicos over the Nestorians is uncertain. (Le Quien, ii. 1118.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (368), son of Martha, catholicos of Seleucia, 679-681, and previously bishop of Gondisapor. (Assem. B. O. ii. 422; Le Quien, ii. 1123, 1183.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, intrud. cathol. of Seleuc. v. 87.

JOANNES (369), bishop of Seleucia Trachea in Isauria, on the river Calycadnus about A.D. 446. He is mentioned with praise by Basil Seleuciensis in his life of Thecla (Patr. Graec. lxxxv.). (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1014.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (370) I., bishop of Settae (Satta, Sitae, Sita), in the province of Lydia, present the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and at the Trullan synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 650, 677, 995.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (371) II., bishop of Settae (Satta, Sitae), in the province of Lydia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 996 D, 1101, xiii. 143, 370 A, 390; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 881.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, of Sichein, vid. of Neapolis.

JOANNES (372) I., bishop of Side, the metropolis of the first Pamphylia, mentioned by Socrates (H. E. vii. 27). He lived in the middle of the 4th century. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 997.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (373) II., bishop of Side, present at the sixth general council A.D. 680, and at the Trullan synod A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 641, 669, 687, 989.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (374) (GIO), Nestorian bishop of Sighaufu cir. 699-713. (Le Quien, ii. 1269.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (375), bishop of Silbium, in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the seventh general council (second Nicene), A.D. 787. The name of the see is also written Sibliā, Sublium, Sybis, in Mansi. (Mansi, xii. 1108, xiii. 147, 371 B, 393; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 809.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (376), Nestorian bishop of Singara in the 8th century. (Assem. B. O. ii. 497; Le Quien, ii. 1333.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (377), bishop of Sion, in the province of Asia, a town mentioned only in the acts of the councils, present at the Trullan synod (Quinisext), A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 993; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 722.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (378), bishop of Siscia (Sissek) on the Save, in Pannonia, present at the synod of the "Provincia Salonitana" A.D. 530. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. v. 329.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (379) I., second bishop of Sisteron. (Dynamius, Vita S. Marii, c. 2, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 27; Gall. Christ. i. 474.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES, bishop of Sita (Mansi, xi. 650, 678), vid. of Settae; of Sombus, vid. of Combi.

JOANNES (380), bishop of Sora, c. A.D. 492-496, was written to by Gelasius I. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 156*.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (381), bishop of Sora, in Paphlagonia, present at the Trullan (Quinisext) synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1000; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 557.) [L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Sorrento, vid. of Surrentum; bishop of Sosamus, vid. of Amastris.

JOANNES (382), a bishop in Spain, mentioned by pope Innocent I. (Innoc. ep. 3, cap. 3 in Pat. Lat. xx. 409; ep. 23 in Mansi, iii. 1063.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, of Spalato, vid. of Salona. [J. de S.]

JOANNES (383), reputed second bishop of Spoletum (Spoleto), c. A.D. 70. (Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. *167; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 329.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (384), bishop of Spoleto, present at the first, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth synods of pope Symmachus in March 499, Oct. 501, Nov. 502, 503, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who adopts, with a slight alteration, the arrangements of Hefele (§ 220) (Mansi, viii. 235, 252, 268, 299, 315). He is reported by a doubtful tradition to have been killed by the soldiers of Totila. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 338.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES, bishop of Squillace, vid. of Scyllacium; bishop of Stadia, vid. of Cnidus.

JOANNES (385), bishop of Stobi in Macedonia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 642, 673; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 76.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (386), bishop of Surrentum (Sorrento). Gregory the Great twice wrote letters to him, in 591 and 598 (lib. i. indict. ix. 54; lib. ix. indict. ii. 25 in Migne, lxxvii. 515, 964; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. pp. 96, 127; Hefele, § 288, § 289; Mansi, ix. 1228.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (387), bishop of Sycamazon in Palestine, at council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1366, v. 530; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 657). He is also called variously Ἀμνός, Ἀϊδάρης, Αἰδάρης, Janes, Azanus. (Mansi, iv. 1123, 1218, v. 590, 713, vii. 703.) [J. de S.]

JOANNES (388), bishop of Synnada in Phrygia, the metropolis of the province of Phrygia Salutaris, some time between A.D. 715 and 740, a correspondent of Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople. (S. German. Epist. 2 in Patr. Graec. xviii. 155, &c.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 830; Ceillier, xii. 37.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (389), bishop of Syracuse. After he became bishop, Gregory wrote him many letters concerning church property and other matters from 595 to 603. (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 116-151; Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. v. indict. xiii. 18; lib. vi. indict. xiv. 18; lib. vii. indict. xv. 9; lib. ix. indict. ii. 12; lib. x. indict. iii. 47 in Migne, lxxvii. 137, 810, 863, 955, 1103; Boll. Acta SS. 23 Oct. x. 67.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (390) II., bishop of Syracuse. He seems to have lived between A.D. 700 and 768, and is said to have perished at sea. (Pirro, Stail. Sacr. i. 609.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES, bishop of Talaza, vid. of Gabala.

JOANNES (391), two patriarchs of the Syrian Jacobites, one of whom ruled during 631-649; the other (previously bishop of Haura) died in 754. (Assem. B. O. ii. 335, 479; Le Quien, ii. 1363, 1366, 1507.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (392) I., styled Saba (senex), head of the monastery of St. Matthew, ordained maphrian of the Syrian Jacobites, by a synod of six bishops meeting at Tagrit. His primacy lasted only one year and six months, during which he ordained three bishops. He died Jan. 2, A.D. 688 (Barhebraeus in Assem. B. O. ii. 429; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1537). He was author of an Anaphora or Liturgy, beginning

ܡܫܠܡܐ ܕܥܡܘܢܐ ܕܥܡܘܢܐ ܕܥܡܘܢܐ: "Perfect love towards Thee and towards each other;" which is cited by Stephanus Edensis, cap. vii. no. 19. [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (393), surnamed BIONITA, maphrian of the Syrian Jacobites at Tagrit from 757, previously a monk of St. Matthew's. (Assem. B. O. ii. 432; Le Quien, ii. 1539.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (394), bishop of Taphar in the district of the Homeritae in Abyssinia (Wiltch. Handb. der Kirchengesch. i. 443). The Homeritae had been converted to Christianity in the sixteenth year of Justinian (Theophan. Chronogr. Patrol. Gr. cviii. 489), and begged the emperor to give them a bishop. They received Joannes, a παρρωμόριος of Alexandria, a man of great piety. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 663.)

[J. de S.]

JOANNES (395) I., fourteenth archbishop of Tarentaise, perhaps towards the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702.) [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (396), bishop of Tarentum, present at the synods of 595 and 601. These are two separate synods according to Hefele (§ 288, § 289); according to Jaffé (Regesta Pont. p. 114) there was only one synod, and that in 595. (Mansi, ix. 1228, x. 487.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (397), bishop of Tarentum, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 866; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (398), bishop of Tarragona, presided at the councils of Tarragona and Gerona held on November 6, A.D. 516, and June 8, A.D. 517 (Tejada y Rumiros, ii. 115, 121). In the interval he visited Italy. He announced his arrival to pope Hormisdas, but was prevented from meeting him. The pope replied to some enquiries John addressed to him, and also sent a letter to all the bishops of Spain on the same points. A second letter which he wrote is undated, but was probably written at the same time as the first, and not, as Ceillier (x. 625) considers, in A.D. 519 after the end of the schism. (Hormisdas, Epist. xxiv. xxv.; li. in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 422, 423, 459; Esp. Sag. xxv. 58-71; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 1. 436.)

[F. D.]

JOANNES (399), Jacobite bishop of Tarsus, living in 668. (Assem. B. O. ii. 335; Le Quien, ii. 1465.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (400), the first known bishop of Tarvisium (Treviso), c. A.D. 320. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 467; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 602.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNES (401), bishop of Taurominium, present at the council of Nicaea in 787. (Hefele, § 347; Mansi, xii. 993 c, xiii. 139, 366 E, 383, 498; Pirro, Sic. Sac. 489.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (402), called BAR CYRIACUS, one of the earliest champions of Monophysitism, bishop of Tela Mauzalat, or Constantina in Mesopotamia. In 512 he, with five other episcopal followers of Severus, attended a synod at Sidon, which met to discuss their doctrines. He was one of fifty-five bishops who in A.D. 519 were banished by order of Justin. According to the life of Joannes, by Elias his personal follower, he was born at Callinicus, and died a martyr's death at the hands of Ephraim, A.D. 538, aged 55 (MSS. nos. dcccclx and dcccclxxviii. in Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS.). Another MS. dated A.D. 688, and published in Laud's Anecd. Syr. ii. 169, gives a life of Joannes of Tella by John of Ephesus. Joannes is commemorated as a martyr on Feb. 6 in a Jacobite calendar. His "Canonical Resolutions" have been published by Lamy, de Syrorum fide in re eucharistica, Louvain, 1859. The work answers forty-eight questions put by a priest named Sergius. Several MSS. of the British Museum contain these canons; cf. nos. cclxxxvi. 5, b. dcccvii. 27, 18, dcccvii. 2. In Wright's Cat. no. dlvi. 3, is a confession of faith, in the shape of a letter to the monasteries round Tella: and no. mxxxv. states that 170,070 persons received ordination from Joannes. (Assem. B. O. i. 396; ii. 53-89; Bickell, Consp. Syr. 40; Ceillier, x. 643.) [C. J. R.]

JOANNES (408) I., bishop of Thessalonica, mentioned in the letter of the Arian council of Philippopolis to the African church (Mansi, iii. 133). John was dead before the meeting of the council, A.D. 343, as Aetius is found (ibid. 38, 43) in the records of the council as bishop of Thessalonica at that time. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 29.) [L. JOANNES (409), bishop of Thessalonica, at the 6th general council, 680, as legate of the pope (Mansi, xi. 639, 670, 687; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 42). There is attributed to him a Dialogue between a Pagan and a Christian in favour of painting angels and spirits cited in the council of Nicaea, 787 (Mansi, xiii. 163). He composed likewise (1) an oration εἰς τὰς μυροφόρους γυναικας, arguing that there is no contradiction in the Gospel narratives of the Resurrection of Jesus. This has been printed among Chrysostom's works, in the editions of Savile (t. v. p. 740) and Migne (Pat. Gr. lix. 635), and by Combefis (*Auct. JOANNES, of Trisenna, vid. of Etenne.

JOANNES (426), bishop of Tropaea (Tropea), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, where his designation is Trapeianns and ἐπισκ. Τροκσῶν. (Mansi, x. 866; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 450; Hefele, § 307.)
[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (427), bishop of Tymbradum in Pisidia, present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 374 B, 396; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 106.)
[L. D.]

JOANNES, bishop of Tyre, vid. of Apamea.

JOANNES (428), a bishop designated as Unogoritanus (Οὐνογοριτῶν) at the Lateran council of 649. (Mansi, x. 867.)
[C. H.]

JOANNES (429), bishop of Urbevetanum (Orvieto, Urbs vetus), received a letter from Gregory the Great in 590. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 12 in Migne, lxxvii. 458; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 93.)
[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (430), bishop of Valeria (Valera de Arriba), subscribes the acts of C. Tol. iii. (589). This is the first appearance of the see of Valera, which belonged to the province of Carthaginensis, disappeared with the Moorish invasion, and towards the end of the 12th century was merged, together with the ancient see of Évrica in the modern see of Cuença. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238; Esp. Sagr. viii. 202, 207.)
[M. A. W.]

JOANNES (431), bishop of Valpuesta. His name occurs in a charter of Alphonso II., king of Oviedo, dated Dec. 21, A.D. 804. The king thereby confirms to the church of Valpuesta what had been acquired by that bishop or his predecessors. In a document dated the same day, and witnessed by four bishops and two abbats, Joannes recites how he came to Valpuesta, and rebuilt and endowed the church of Santa Maria. His name occurs again as witness to a document dated Dec. 30, A.D. 844. He must therefore have been bishop more than forty years (Esp. Sag. xxvi. 84). The see of Valpuesta under this bishop succeeded Auca (Oca), and is now represented by Burgos.
[F. D.]

JOANNES (432), bishop of Velitrae (Velletri) received two letters from Gregory the Great in 592 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 99, 102; Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 14, 50; Migne, lxxvii. 549, 591). He was present at the synods of 595 and 601. (Mansi, ix. 1223; x. 488.)
[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (433) II., bishop of Velitreae, present at the Roman synod under Gregory II. in 721. (Mansi, xii. 264; Hefele, § 330.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (434), bishop of Venusium (Venessa), acceded, probably, c. A.D. 443. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 218.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES (435), a bishop of Verona, of uncertain date. It seems agreed that he succeeded St. Maurus. The Bollandist places him in the 4th century. (Boll. Acta SS. 6 Jun. i. 641; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 573; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 749; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. 2.)

[R. S. G.]

JOANNES of Vescovio, vid. of Foronovo.

JOANNES (436), bishop of Vicohabentia (Voghenza), cir. 462. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 518; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 19, 224; Rubeus, Hist. Ravennal.; lib. iv. p. 183, ed. 1572.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (437), bishop of Vicosabina or Sabina at the Lateran council of Rome in 649 (Mansi, x. 867; Ugh. i. 157). With respect to his see, which some make the same as Forum-novatum (Vescovio) and different from Nomentum, cf. Ughelli Ital. Sac. x. 103, i. 157; Marronus, *De Eccl. JOANNES (444) PRESBYTER, a shadowy personage of the sub-apostolic age, the reasons for belief in his existence being solely derived from an inference drawn by Eusebius from language used in a passage of Papias. In the middle of the third century, Dionysius of Alexandria (Eus. H. E. vii. 25) had maintained on critical grounds that the author of the fourth Gospel and of the Catholic Epistle could not also have been the author of the Apocalypse. Dionysius takes for granted that the author of the Gospel was John the apostle, and he has no difficulty in conceding that the name of the author of the Apocalypse was also John, since the writer himself says so; but he urges that the writer never claims to be the apostle. He calls himself simply John, without adding that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved, or he who leaned on our Lord's breast, or the brother of James, or in any other way forcing us to identify him with the Son of Zebedee. Now there might easily have been more Johns than one. The Acts of the Apostles mention another John, namely, him whose surname was Mark. And there might have been many more; for, as in the days of Dionysius himself, the names Peter and Paul were borne by many of the children of the faithful, so it was to be believed that in earlier times many adopted the name of John from love and admiration of the apostle, and from a wish to be loved by our Lord as he was. Further, it is said that there are two tombs in Ephesus, each called John's. It will be observed that, except in the statement last made, Dionysius does not pretend to have found any actual trace of any John of the apostolic age besides John the apostle and John Mark. His argument does not proceed beyond this; that if we have good critical reasons for believing the authors of the Gospel and of the Apocalypse to be distinct, the fact that both bore the name of John does not force us to identify them, since there easily might have been more Johns than one. It was some three quarters of a century later that Eusebius found historic evidence for regarding as a fact what Dionysius had suggested as a possibility. He produces from the preface to the work of Papias an extract which we shall discuss at more length in the article on that father. What concerns us here is that Papias, speaking of the pains he had taken in collecting oral traditions of the apostolic times, says, "on any occasion when a person came in my way, who had been a follower of the elders, I would enquire about the discourses of the elders—what was said by Andrew, or by Peter, or by Philip, or by Thomas or James, or by John or Matthew or any other of the Lord's disciples, and what Aristion and the Elder John, the disciples of the Lord say" (Lightfoot's translation). Eusebius points out that in this passage the name John occurs twice; the first time, occurring in a list of apostles, it no doubt represents John the apostle; the second time occurring in a different list, placed after the name of Aristion, and with the title elder prefixed, it must be held to represent a different person. Thus it is a mistake to describe Papias as a hearer of John the apostle; the John whose traditions he several times records is John the Elder, not John the apostle. We find thus, remarks Eusebius, that "the account of those is true who have stated that two persons in Asia had the same name, and that there were two tombs in Ephesus, each of which, even to the present time, bears the name of John." "It is likely that the second (unless we allow that it was, as some would have it, the first) beheld the revelation which is ascribed to John" (H. E. iii. 39). Although Eusebius does not here name Dionysius of Alexandria, it is plain that he had in his mind that passage of his writings which he gives at length elsewhere. The ambiguous way in which he speaks of the Apocalypse agrees with his language elsewhere. It is easy to see that his personal inclination was to pronounce the book non-apostolical; but that he was kept in check by the weight of authority in its favour. We may conclude from the silence of Eusebius that the other passages in Papias where John was mentioned contained no decisive indications what John was intended.

Modern writers have not been unanimous in their judgment on this criticism of Eusebius. Several reject it, finding themselves able to understand Papias not as speaking of two Johns, but as mentioning one John twice over. So, for example, Milligan (Journal Sac. Lit. Oct. 1867); Riggenbach (Jahrb. für deutsche Theol. xiii. 319); Zahn (Stud. und Krit. 1866, p. 650, Acta Johannis, 1880, p. cliv.). But a far more powerful array of critics is ranged on the other side, endorsing the conclusion of Eusebius; for example, Steitz (Stud. und Krit. 1868, p. 63); Lightfoot (Contemp. Rev. Aug. 1875, p. 379); Westcott (N. T. Canon. p. 69); while less orthodox critics with one consent build their theories in confidence that John the Elder is as historical a person as Peter or Paul.

It is otherwise with ancient writers, for the argument of Eusebius seems to have made little impression at the time, and his successors seem to know only of one John, and go on speaking of Papias as the hearer of John the apostle. In this they followed Irenaeus, and it is an important fact in this controversy, that Irenaeus, who was very familiar with the work of Papias, of which he made large use, and whose Eastern origin ought to have made him acquainted with the traditions of the Asiatic church, shews no symptom of having heard of any John but the apostle, and describes Papias (V. 33, p. 333) as a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp. That Polycarp whom he thus counts as the contemporary of Papias was a hearer of John the apostle is stated explicitly by Irenaeus in his letter to Victor (Eus. H. E. v. 24; see also his letter to Florinus, v. 20). That Polycarp was made bishop of Smyrna by John the apostle is stated by Tertullian (Praescrip. v. 30), and was never doubted by subsequent writers. Polycrates in his appeal to the great lights of the church of Asia (Eus. v. 24), names John who leaned on our Lord's breast who sleeps at Ephesus, but says nothing about any second John buried there or elsewhere. The silence of Dionysius of Alexandria is positive proof that no tradition of a second John had reached him. If he knew and remembered the passage in Papias it did not occur to him to draw from it the same inference as Eusebius. Neither, though he mentions the two monuments at Ephesus, both bearing the name of John, does he say what would have been very much to his purpose, that he had heard that they were supposed to commemorate different persons; and in fact Jerome, who in his "catalogue" repeats the story, tells us that there were those who held that the same John was commemorated by both.* The Acts of Leucius, are notoriously the source whence the fathers, from the 4th century on, derived Johannine traditions. Zahn will scarcely make many converts to his opinion that Leucius was earlier than Papias, but we count it highly probable that Leucius was a full century earlier than Eusebius. And we can assert, with as much confidence as such a thing can be asserted of a book of which only fragments remain, that Leucius made no mention of any John but the apostle. If at the time when Leucius put his stories together, any tradition had remained of a second John, this would surely have been among the Leucian names of the apostle's disciples, so many of which we are able to enumerate. Eusebius had not thought of his theory at the time of his earlier work, the Chronicle, in which he describes Papias as a disciple of the evangelist. So, too, Jerome is not self-consistent, speaking in one way, when he is immediately under the influence of Eusebius, and at other times following the older tradition. In the East the only trace of the theory of Eusebius is that the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) make John ordain another John, as bishop of Ephesus in succession to Timothy. The writers who used the work of Papias do not seem to suspect that any John but the apostle was the source of his information. One fragment (Gebhardt and Harnack, ed. 2, No. iii. p. 43) was preserved by Apollinaris, who describes Papias as a disciple of John; some authorities add "the Apostle," but in any case where John is mentioned without addition no other is meant. Anastasius of Sinai (Gebhardt, No. vi.) describes Papias as δ ἐν τῷ ἐπιστηθίῳ φοιτήσας and No. vii. as δ Ἰωάννου τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ φοιτητής; Maximus confessor (No. ix.) describes him as συνακμήσαντα τῷ θεῷ εὐαγγελιστῇ Ἰωάννῃ. An anonymous but ancient note even makes Papias the scribe who wrote down the gospel from the apostle's dictation. In short, in his opinion on this point, Eusebius among ancient authorities stands completely alone, differing alike from his predecessors and his successors.

It by no means necessarily follows that Eusebius was wrong. If he has correctly interpreted the language of Papias, the authority of so ancient a witness outweighs that of any number of later writers. We can conceive either that there were two Johns in Asia, and that the latter's fame was so absorbed by the glory of his greater namesake, that all remembrance of him was lost; or else we may imagine that the second John, the source of apostolic traditions to the Asiatic churches, held so very high a place in their consideration that, though not really so, he passed in common fame as the apostle. On this second supposition it is unnecessary to believe that the real apostle visited Asia at all. A mistake such as that here supposed is believed by many to have been made in the case of the Philip who settled at Hierapolis, and whose daughters are celebrated in the church. Ecclesiastical tradition describes him as Philip the apostle, yet St. Luke may give us a right to think that he was in reality only one of the seven (Acts vi.).

The supposition that John the apostle was never in Asia Minor has been embraced by Keim (Jesu von Nazara), Scholten (Der Apostel Johannes in Kleinasien) and others. But except that the recognition of the residence of a different John in Asia opens to us the possibility of a confusion their reasons for disbelief in the apostle's residence in Asia are so worthless that it would be a waste of space to discuss them. And there is an immense mass of patristic testimony that John the apostle lived to a great age and died in Asia in the reign of Trajan. Thus to confine ourselves to the second century, in addition to Irenæus who speaks repeatedly on this point, and to Polycrates and Tertullian already mentioned, we have Clement of Alexandria, and Apollonius (Eus. v. 18) in a document which shews intimate knowledge of affairs at Ephesus. It is curious how extremes meet; for the view which most completely rejects the traditional account really conflicts the least with traditional opinions. Those who deny that the Apostle John was ever in Asia, abandon Eusebius's theory of two Johns in Asia, can lay no stress on the two Ephesine tombs, and are unable to solve any difficulties about the Johannine writings by dividing them between two Johns. If they hold that John the Elder was the author of the fourth Gospel, yet Papias leads us to regard this John as a personal disciple of our Lord, and the Gospel itself implies that he was an eyewitness of the things he relates, and that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved. Now there is no reason why it might not be as completely an open question among the most rigidly orthodox whether John the beloved disciple were identical with John the apostle, as it is whether James, our Lord's brother, was one of the twelve.

Considering next the other supposition, that both John the apostle and the elder taught in Asia, it is natural to enquire can we transfer to the second anything that is traditionally told of the first. Dionysius and Eusebius transfer to him the authorship of the Apocalypse, but those of the present day who divide the Johannine books between these two Johns unanimously give the Apocalypse to the first. St. Jerome too assigns to "the Elder" the two minor epistles, and this is a very natural inference from their inscription. Concerning that inscription it may be remarked that it is a modest one, if the writer could have claimed the dignity of apostle, but if not it seems arrogant that any one should designate himself as the elder at a time when there must have been elders in every city. There is also a great assumption of authority in the tone of the 3rd epistle. The writer sends his legates to the churches of the district, is angry if these legates are not respectfully received by the local authorities, and addresses these churches in a tone of command. It may be suggested as an explanation of this, that the writer knew himself to be the sole survivor in the district of the first Christian generation; and it agrees with this that Papias describes him as a disciple of our Lord, yet speaks of him in the present tense while he speaks of the apostles in the past. Yet this hypothesis is scarcely tenable if we give credence to what is told of the great age attained by the apostle John, who is said to have lived to the reign of Trajan. This hardly leaves room for any one who could claim to have heard our Lord to acquire celebrity after the apostle's decease. Further, it has often been noticed that no one who used the fourth Gospel only could know that there had been an apostle of the name of John. Even our Lord's forerunner, who in the other Gospels is called John the Baptist, in this is simply John, as if there were no need to distinguish him from any other. The apostle was perhaps the only man in the church who would never feel such need, therefore if he were the author of the Gospel, all is intelligible; but if the author were his disciple, it is conceivable that he should thus suppress the name of his great master and predecessor in labour in Asia; and if beside the apostle there were in our Lord's circle another John, is it to be explained that the writer should not have cared to distinguish them?

Thus the Eusebian interpretation of Papias is forced to stand on its own merits. It obtains no confirmation from independent testimony, nor has it the recommendation of giving a key to the solution of any perplexing problems. It is certainly possible that we with our more powerful instruments of criticism may be able to resolve a double star which had appeared to the early observers single. Yet considering how much closer and more favourably circumstanced they were, we have need to look well that the mistake is not our own. Reviewing then the Eusebian arguments, we find that one must be rejected, namely, that by calling his second John the elder, Papias meant to distinguish him from the apostle. This would be so if he had called the first John an apostle, but actually he calls him an elder. When he speaks one moment of the elders James, John, and Matthew, and the next moment of Arision and John the elder, if we suppose him to have been careful in his use of language he must have been speaking of the same John. If we suppose, as do Lightfoot and others, that he uses the word elder in different senses in the two places, at least the word cannot be used the second time to distinguish him from those to whom it is applied the first time. If it is to distinguish him from anyone it is from Arision, to whom, though also called a disciple of the Lord, this name is not applied. And here falls away Eusebius's second argument, that Papias by placing John after Arision meant to assign to him a less honourable place, since John is given a title of dignity, which is refused to Arision. Some light is thrown on the sense in which the word elder is applied to John by Papias in his preface by the fact that one of his traditions is told with the formula, "These things the elder used to say." This phrase must surely mean something more than that the authority cited was one of the many presbyters of the church. And we cannot help connecting with the phrase the fact revealed by the minor Johannine epistles, that there was some one in the Asiatic church who spoke of himself, and no doubt was habitually spoken of by others, as "the Elder."

Of the Eusebian arguments then the only one that remains is that Papias mentions the name

John twice over, and therefore may be presumed to speak of two Johns. This would follow if Papias were a careful and accurate writer; but can we be certain that he was? Can we be sure that he might not first enumerate John in his list of seven apostles, concerning whom he had been able to glean traditions, and a second time in his shorter list of men of the first Christian generation who had survived to his own day. If by such an inaccuracy Papias has misled any one, it may be said in his excuse that he did not write with the intention of puzzling posterity. He wrote for the men of his own day, to whom the facts were well known, and the idea of being misunderstood would no more occur to him than it would to us, if we spoke of one of our leading statesmen at one moment by his surname only, the next with the addition of his title or Christian name.

And Papias might plead that he had guarded himself against mistake by giving his second John the title of elder, for that he could not have imagined that any one would suppose him to have used the word elder twice in different senses in the same sentence. The second time it does not mean "one of the first generation of Christians," for Aristion to whom the title is refused was that; it does not mean one holding the office of presbyter, for then the phrase "the elder," would have no meaning. What remains but that the second John had the same right to the title as Andrew, Peter, and the rest to whom it is given in the beginning of the sentence?

The result at which we arrive is, that while we own the Eusebian interpretation of Papias to be a possible one, we are unable to see that it is the only possible one; and therefore while we are willing to receive the hypothesis of two Johns, if it will help to explain any difficulty, we do not think the evidence for it enough to make us regard it as a proved historical fact. And we frankly own that if it were not for deference to better judges, we should unite with Keim in relegating, though in a different way, this "Doppelgänger" of the apostle to the region of ghostland. [G. S.]

JOANNES (445), Aug. 18, presbyter. He and another named Crispus are said to have carefully buried the bodies of those who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian, and afterwards to have been martyred themselves. (Ado, Martyrol.; Usuard, Martyrol.; Acta Sanct. August, iii. 545.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (446), presbyter of Nicomedia, an eyewitness of the sufferings and martyrdom of Basilus bishop of Amasea in Pontus, under the emperor Licinius, if the very legendary Acta now extant under his name (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 417) are genuine. The question of the martyrdom is discussed by Valesius (note on Euseb. Vit. Const. ii. 1) and Pagi (Crit. s. a. 316, viii.), who both decide for the fact while rejecting the Acta in their present form (cf. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 158. Tillemont, v. 515-517). [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (447), priest, addressed with another named Antiochus, by St. Athanasius, A.D. 371 or 372. (Athanasius, Epist. ad Joann. et Antioch. Presb. in Opp. pt. i. p. 763; Tillemont, viii. 246.) [J. W. S.]

JOANNES (448), deacon, Chrysostom's open enemy and first accuser at the synod of the Oak in 403. The first of his twenty-nine charges alleged that Chrysostom had ejected him for flogging his servant (τὸν οἰκεῖον παῖδα) Eulalius (Photius, cod. 59; Baron. ann. 403, xvii. renders "filium suum"). John must have been one of the two unnamed deacons who according to Palladius (Dial. cap. 18 in Pat. Gr. xlvii. 27) were ejected by Chrysostom for murder and adultery respectively, and afterwards accused Chrysostom at the instigation of Theophilus, who restored them upon Chrysostom's deposition. Tillemont (Mém. xi. 140) infers that the homicide was this John. [C. H.]

JOANNES (449), a deacon, who (according to the deacon John's ninth article of accusation against Chrysostom) was cited with two other deacons, Acacius and Edaphius, by Chrysostom before a full assembly of the clergy, and accused of having stolen his humerale or pallium (τὸ μαφόριον), with an insinuation that they had put it to some other use. (Phot. cod. 59; Baron. 403, xvii.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (450), a presbyter whom Chrysostom, mentions with great respect (τὸν κύριόν μου) in a letter to Alphius (ep. 21), probably A.D. 405. Stirred up by Alphius, and supplied by him with the means, John had undertaken a mission to the pagans of Phoenicia. In another letter the same year (ep. 55) Chrysostom speaks of him again with much warmth (ὁ ποθεινότατος καὶ γλυκύτατος), and expresses great joy in the undertaking. He was apparently of the neighbourhood of Apamea. (Ceillier, vii. 132; Tillem. xi. 303.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (451), a presbyter sent by Chrysostom from Cucus in 405 to encourage the presbyters and monks who were preaching to the heathen in Phoenicia (Chrys. ep. 123). Tillemont (xi. 303) identifies him with the preceding. See also the following. [C. H.]

JOANNES (452), presbyter, who with Paulus a deacon was sent by Chrysostom, when he had been three years in exile, to Rome, with a letter to Innocent I. thanking him and imploring his further interposition (Epist. to Innocent in Migne, Patr. Gr. li. 533). The letter could not have been written earlier than the close of A.D. 406 (ib. 529). From his letter to Cyriacus, Demetrius, and others (Ep. 148), which seems to have been written A.D. 405, we learn that John and Paul were preparing to set out on their journey at that date. It therefore would appear that they had been detained (u. s. 529, Vit. Chrysost. Migne, xlvii. 259). John and Paul were also the bearers of letters, A.D. 406, to Proba a lady at Rome (Ep. 168), to Juliana (Ep. 169) and to Italica (Ep. 170). [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (453), oeconomus, apparently of the church of Cyrus in Euphratesia, addressed by Theodoret bishop of Cyrus. (Theod. ep. 146.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (454), presbyter, legate with the deacon Epictetus from pope Celestine to the council of Ephesus in 431 (Mansi, v. 267 B, 271 B, 272 E); vid. also Baronius ann. 431 clxxviii., 432 v. ix. xv. xix. and in the epistles of Celestine 22, 23, 24, in Pat. Lat. l. 538. [C. H.]

JOANNES (455), presbyter and defensor of the church of Constantinople, charged in the third session of the Council of Constantinople, held in 448 under the patriarch Flavian, to cite Eutyches. (Labbe, Concil. vi. 495; Baron. Annal. ann. 448, xxvii. xxviii.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (456), an ecclesiastic of Edessa, one of the accusers of Ibas in 448 (Mansi, vii. 211). There was among them likewise a deacon John (ib. 255). [C. H.]

JOANNES (457), a presbyter who was primate of the Alexandrian notarii at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 449. (Mansi, vi. 611 C, 614 A, 618 D.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (458), a presbyter, probably of Constantinople, who, accused of heresy, betook himself to Rome in A.D. 451 in company with Basilus, a brother presbyter similarly situated, in order to clear his character. Having condemned the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, they were both sent back by Leo the Great, with his recommendation to the favour of the archbishop Anatolius. (Leo Mag. Ep. 87, 1054. See LEO and Tillemont, xv. 624.) [C. G.]

JOANNES (459), a deacon sent to inform pope Hilary of the occupation of the see of Narbonne by Hermes in 462. [HERMES.] (Hilar. Ep. 7 in Pat. Lat. lviii. 24.) [R. T. S.]

JOANNES (460), a "vir eruditus Antiochenus presbyter," who, according to Ado of Vienne, wrote against Faustus the semi-Pelagian bishop of Riez, and was, apparently, a contemporary of his (Adon. Chron. ann. 492 in Migne, Patrol. cxxiii. 107). Ado, however, gives no clue to his identification. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (461), surnamed GRAMMATICUS, a presbyter of Antioch mentioned in the De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis of Gennadius of Massilia (cap. 93, Migne, Patrol. lviii. 1115), who speaks of him as living when he wrote, c.A.D. 495, and as declaiming extempore. He was a native of Antioch, and had been a "grammaticus" or professor in some department of literature before his ordination to the presbyterate. Gennadius says that he wrote against those "qui in una tantum substantia asserunt adorandum Christum, nec acquiescunt duas in Christo confitendas naturas," who also maintained "unam in Filio Dei et hominis personam esse, non unam carnis et Verbi naturam." He likewise controverted some opinions which were thought to have been incautiously advanced by Cyril of Alexandria against Nestorius, and calculated to encourage the followers of Timotheus Aelurus. Marcellinus Comes (Chron. in Pat. Lat. li. 933) copies the first portion of the account in Gennadius and places John under A.D. 486. Cave (i. 455) makes him to have flourished in 477. The learned presbyter John of Antioch, who, according to Odo of Vienne, wrote against Faustus of Riez [FAUSTUS (11)] is probably a different person [MAXENTIUS]. Our John is likewise to be distinguished from another Joannes Grammaticus surnamed also PHILOPONUS, who belonged to Alexandria and flourished later (Baron. A. E. ann. 486, i.). [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (462) COELIUS, a deacon of Rome opposed to the election of Symmachus as bishop of that city, A.D. 498, and apparently one of his accusers to Theoderic, then king of Italy (Anastas. Vit. Symmach. Migne, Patrol. cxxviii. 451). Sept. 18, A.D. 506, he addressed a "Professio" to Symmachus, in which he prayed his forgiveness. (Labbe, iv. 1401; Mansi, viii. 344; Hefele, Concilienesch. ii. 647.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (463), surnamed AEGEATES (δ Αἰγέατης), a presbyter, cir. 483, called by Photius (cod. 55) a Nestorian, and the author of a work against the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. Photius, who had read the treatise, which was in the same volume as a similar one by John Philoponus, calls the author an impious man, but commends the polish and smoothness of his diction as well as the perspicuity of his style. He was anathematized as a Nestorian cir. 520 by the clergy and abbats of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Syria Secunda (Mansi, viii. 512 A, here surnamed Aegæota), and again at the council of Constantinople in 680 (xi. 567, here coupled with Cyrus and both called τοὺς Αἰγέατας). Photius (cod. 41) identifies him with the John who wrote a Eutychian ecclesiastical history from Theodosius II. to Zeno (i.e. cir. 428-483). This history is quoted by Theodorus Lector (H. E. lib. ii. § 31 in Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 199), who names the author John δ Διακρινόμενος (Segregatus, Haesitans), a name by which the followers of Eutyches and Dioscorus called themselves. It was also quoted at the seventh synod, 787, as the work of John Diacrinomenus (Mansi, xiii. 179). Fabricius thinks that Photius called John a Nestorian inadvertently instead of a Eutychian. Le Quien in his Dissertationes Damascenae prefixed to the works of John of Damascus elaborately argues that the historian John of Phot. cod. 41, John Haesitans or Diacrinomenus, was the same as John Rhetor [JOANNES (574)], and different from John Aegæates. Some hitherto unpublished fragments of his works and a dissertation upon him and Theodorus Lector will be found in Rev. Archéol. nouv. sér. t. xxvi. p. 271. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (464), a deacon who in 520 bore a letter from the four Eastern deputies at Rome to Fulgentius and other African bishops exiled in Sardinia. (Fulgent. ep. 17, cap. 1 in Pat. Lat. lxxv. 452; Pagi, Crit. ann. 520, xiii.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (465), reader, one of the four deputies referred to in the preceding article. (Fulgent. ep. 16 fin., ep. 17 init.) [MAXENTIUS.] [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (466), presbyter, to whom, as well as to Venerius a deacon, Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe addressed his treatise De Veritate Praedestinationis. (Pat. Lat. lxxv. 603.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (467), deacon of Rome, to whom are dedicated three treatises ascribed to Boetius. (Pat. Lat. lxxiv. 1299 and note, ib. 1311, ib. 1337). Migne's editor identifies him with John I. bishop of Rome. Baronius (A. E. ann. 522, iii.) thinks that identification possible. [C. H.]

JOANNES (468), the name of two of the clergy of Rome who followed the party of Rusticus and Sebastianus against pope Vigilius. (Mansi, viii. 359 A; Baron. ann. 548 ii., 550 xxiv.) [IMPORTUNUS (4).] [C. H.]

JOANNES (469), presbyter of the church of Rome. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. ep. 37 in Migne, lxxvii. 633.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (470), presbyter of Ravenna. Gregory the Great, A.D. 595, cannot allow him to be consecrated as metropolitan of Ravenna, on account of his ignorance of the Psalms. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. v. indict. xiii. 48 in Migne, lxxvii. 777.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (471), presbyter of Chalcedon accused of sharing in the heresy of the Marcianistae. See EUCHITES, vol. 2, p. 261. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 53, lib. vi. ind. xiv. epp. 15, 16, 17, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. 803; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 105, 116.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (472), deacon of Naples. Gregory the Great, in a letter A.D. 600, says, that Joannes, one of the candidates chosen to be bishop, cannot be consecrated on account of the impurity of his life. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. x. indict. iii. 62 in Migne, lxxvii. 1114.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (473), subdeacon at Ravenna, addressed by Gregory the Great in the years 600, 602, 603 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 141, 147, 150). He was urged to arrange the settlement of a dispute between the metropolitan of Ravenna and another bishop. The pope also gave him charge in other letters over various ecclesiastical matters. This is possibly the same subdeacon who was ordered by Gregory to go to Genoa, whither many of the inhabitants and ecclesiastics of Milan had fled, and see whether Constantius had been rightly elected as archbishop of Milan on the death of Laurentius. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xiii. indict. vi. 17; lib. iii. indict. xi. 30 in Migne, lxxvii. 1272, 627.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (474), surnamed MARACUMENSIS and MAUROCOMITA, an Armenian, the friend of Comitas or Gomidas the catholicos, whom he desired to succeed. When ESDRAS of Nica, A.D. 632, was chosen catholicos, John was his chief opponent; though personally John was worsted in his attempts, his cause was successful, since his disciples destroyed the union that had been effected between the orthodox and Armenian churches. [ARMENIANS.] (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1387; Galanus, Hist. Arm. c. xiii.) [L. D.]

JOANNES (475), the name of four presbyters of Rome present at the third Lateran council in 601, viz. of the following churches—SS. John and Paul, St. Vitalis, St. Chrysogonus, St. Sylvester. (Mansi, x. 488, 489; Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 1338.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (476), presbyter, correspondent of St. Maximus abbat of Chrysopolis in the 7th century. (S. Maxim. Abbat. Epist. 7, 8 in Patr. Graec. xci. §§ 243, 244, 248, 249; Ceillier, xi. 768.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (477), surnamed LURIO, subdeacon under pope Gregory II., in whose life by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Pat. Lat. cxviii. 979) he is mentioned. [C. H.]

JOANNES (478), deacon of St. Sophia at Constantinople and treasurer of the empire, placed by the emperor Anastasius II. in command of a naval expedition which in 715 was sent to Phoenicia to destroy timber and stores which the Saracens were collecting for an attack on Constantinople. The armament mustered at Rhodes, where it mutinied and slew John. (Theoph. Chronog. ann. 707, p. 322 in Pat. Gr. cviii.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (479), archpresbyter of the church of St. Susanna at Rome, present at the Roman council of A.D. 745. (Mansi, xii. 380; Baron. A. E. ann. 745, xxii.; De Rossi, Bullet. 1870, pp. 89–112.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (480), clergy at the seventh synod, 787:

A presbyter (Mansi, xiii. 167, 174, 190).

A presbyter representing Nicetas, bishop of Colonia (142, 367 A, 386).

A presbyter representing the see of Stectorius in Phrygia Salutaris (147, 371 C; Le Quien, i. 850), and himself bishop-elect of Stectorius (Mansi, xii. 997 E, 1103).

A deacon representing the Roman see (1096).

A deacon representing the bishop of Phaselis (997 B, 1105, xiii. 146, 370 D, 394; Le Quien, i. 986.) [C. H.]

Monks.

For others, vid. martyrs, Nos. 535, etc.

JOANNES (481), one of the five original disciples of Pachomius. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 303 A, in Vita Pacom. cap. 3.) [I. G. S.]

JOANNES (482), monk, elder brother of Pachomius and his companion in the monastery of Tabenne. (Acta Pacomii, cap. 2, um. 9 in Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 299.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (483), the head of a monastery named Chnum in Egypt, to whom the saint Pachomius (ep. iv.) wrote one of his letters of spiritual counsel in the mystical language which was believed to have been revealed to him by angels. (Jerome, vol. ii. 90, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

JOANNES (484), a young man who had embraced an ascetic life with a companion, Macarius. Basil wrote to them from his Pontine retirement, 358 A.D., to encourage them. (Basil. Epist. 18 [211].) [E. V.]

JOANNES (485), a monk, to whom is addressed the epistle of Ephraim the Syrian On Patience. (Ephr. Opp. p. 271, ed. Voss. 1603; Assem. B. O. i. 150.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (486), a coenobite in Egypt in the monastery of Paul, visited by Cassian and Germanus in their early travels about A.D. 390. (Cassian, Collat. xix. 2, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xlix. 1125.) [I. G. S.]

JOANNES (487), called St. JOHN OF EGYPT and OF LYCOPOLIS, an anchorite of Lycopolis in the Thebaid, in the latter half of the 4th century. Tillemont says his reputation was only second to that of St. Antony. He was by trade a carpenter (Palladius, Hist. Laus. c. 43), and at twenty-five years of age he retired into the wilderness. Here he attached himself to an old hermit as instructor (Cassian, de Coen. Inst. c. 23, 4–5), and after the old hermit's death he retired to a mountain near Lycopolis (Palladius, Hist. Laus. 43; Rufinus, Hist. Monach. cap. 1 in Pat. Lat. xxi. 391). Here he lived for forty or forty-two years, dying at the age of ninety in A.D. 394 (Rufinus, l. c.; Tillemont, x. p. 720).

As the reward of his great sanctity the saint received, says Cassian, the gift of prophecy (de Coen. Inst. iv. 23; Palladius, Hist. Laus. 43), for which he became famous, being visited by crowds who came to consult him on their affairs, or to hear his predictions of the future (Hist. Laus. 47). His reputation for prophecy reached the court, and he foretold to the emperor Theodosius himself the success of his arms against Maximus, A.D. 388 (S. Aug. de Civitate Dei, v. c. 26). He was often consulted on important matters by the same emperor (Palladius, Hist. Laus. c. 43), and eventually predicted the victory of that prince over Eugenius, and his death in the following year, A.D. 395. Many miracles are also related as performed by this saint (Rufinus, ubi supra, Palladius, ubi supra, St. Aug. de Cura pro Mortuis gerenda, ch. 17).

The year before his death in 394 he was visited by Palladius (who became, as he foretold, a bishop) and by Petronius, of which two visits we have full accounts in Palladius (H. L. 43-60) and in Rufinus (l. c.). [J. W. S.]

JOANNES (488), a monk brought forward against Chrysostom at the synod of the Oak in 403. [HERACLIDES (5).] (Phot. cod. 59 in Pat. Gr. ciii. 105 D, 108 B, C; Tillem. Mém. xi. 197.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (489), son of Aethrius (ὁ πατρὶς Αἰθρίου), called by Baronius (ann. 406, xxi.) JOANNES AETHRIUS. Palladius (Dial. cap. 20, in Pat. Gr. xlvii. 72) enumerates him among the presbyters who supported Chrysostom and were exiled in consequence. [C. H.]

JOANNES (490), surnamed COLOBUS, CURTUS, and PARVUS, a monk of Scete, apparently early in the 5th century. Anecdotes of him and sayings attributed to him may be seen in the Apophthegmata Patrum of Cotelier (Eccl. Gr. Mon. i. 468 sq.) and in Roswey's Vitae Patrum. (Pat. Lat. lxxiii. 867, 894, 916, 917, 934, 948, 958, 970; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 39.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (491), priest and archimandrite, no doubt of Syria, who with two others, Maximus and Thalassius, express to Cyril their zeal against the Nestorians. Cyril sends them his treatise on the Incarnation. (Synod. Adv. Tragoed. Iren. cap. 208 in Mansi, v. 995; Tillem. xiv. 619.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (492), archimandrite addressed in 450 by Theodoret (ep. 137). [C. H.]

JOANNES (493), an archimandrite of Constantiople, who addressed the emperor Marcian in 451 and sat in the fourth session of the council of Chalcedon. (Labbe, iv. 512 D.) [C. G.]

JOANNES (494) CALYBITA (ὁ Καλυβίτης), monk, a native of Constantinople. He entered the monastery of the Acoemetae. Here the only temptation that overcame him was a longing to see his home and his parents, and even this he accomplished without breaking his vow; for with the consent of the superior he proceeded to the house and built for himself, outside the gate, a hut (καλύβη) where he lived as a mendicant until his death (Basil. Menol. Jan. 15). Bolland (Acta SS. Jan. i. 1029) places him in the 5th century. [C. H.]

JOANNES (495), a Syrian anchorite of the fifth century, a disciple of Limnaeus (Act. Sanct. Febr. iii. 291). (Theodoret, Religios. Hist. 23 in Pat. Gr. lxxxii. 1455; Act. Sanct. Febr. iii. 379.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (496), a schismatic monk, follower of Severus of Antioch, with whom he was anathematized at the council of Tyre, A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1078 c.) [I. G. S.]

JOANNES (497), a monk, deputed with another monk Sergius from the lesser archimandrites of Syria Secunda in 517 to the emperor Anastasius to complain of Severus patriarch of Antioch. (Relatio Minorum Archimand. in Mansi, viii. 426 A; Baron. ann. 517, lii. lvi.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (498), July 21, solitary in Palestine in the reign of Justin. (Basil. Menol.; see also the Rom. Mart. and Boll. Acta SS. Jul. v. 164.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (499) APAMEENSIS, an orthodox ascetic, lived circ. 6th century in one of the numerous monasteries on the Orontes in Coele-Syria. Ebedjesu, Cat. 47, says: "Johannes of Apamea composed three volumes, also letters on spiritual regimen, on the passions, and on the perfect state." The codices Nitr. Vatic. xvii. xix. contain certain discourses on the mind and its powers, and the rules of the ascetic life; and further twenty "Heads of Instruction" (Syr. rishé d'ulfono). Some of the subjects are—the nature of human weakness; how to bear adversity; what work is pleasing to God; how friend should behave to friend, and by what means true friendship is proven. There are also five epistles. No. 1 treats of the Trinity and the Incarnation; No. 5, addressed to Leontius, of spiritual communion with God in the present life (Assemani, B. O. i. 430-2, iii. i. 50). Some of his works, including fragments and letters, are among the Syriac MSS. of the British Museum (Catal. Cod. MSS. Or. in B. M. pt. i. 129, 5 n.). [C. J. B.]

JOANNES MAXENTIUS. [MAXENTIUS.]

JOANNES (500), a Scythian monk, one of four deputies who were sent from the East to Rome in 519. (Fulgent. epp. 16, 17 in Pat. Lat. lxxv. 443 A, 451 C, D; Justinian. ep. ad Hormisd. Labbe, iv. 1516.) [MAXENTIUS.] [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (501), archimandrite of the Nova Laura in Palestine, A.D. 532. (Cyrill. Scythop. Sab. Vit. 36, ap. Cotelier. Eccl. Gr. Monum. iii. 273; Baron. s. a. 532, viii.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (502), called RECLUSUS, a British hermit near Caen, connected with a miracle, related by Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Confessorum, c. 23, ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxi. 847, giving the date A.D. 400, 5 May). Cressy (Ch. Hist. Brit. xi. c. 22) places his death A.D. 537, and his feast June 27, from the Gallician Martyrology. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 320.) [J. G.]

JOANNES (503), ST., founder and first abbat of the monastery of Reomaus, or Reomus (Reomé, afterwards known as Moutier-St.-Jean) in the diocese of Langres. His life was written by an anonymous monk of the monastery, who from internal evidence lived in the next generation (§ 10). It was published by Mabillon from a MS. of St. Germain des Prés (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 633, Paris, 1668). For a criticism of its style and worth see the Hist. Litt. de la France (iii. 285), whose authors believe that it was known to Gregory of Tours (cf. the De Glor. Conf. lxxxvii. with the corresponding passage in the Vita). In the year 659, about one hundred and twenty years after John's death, Jonas, the author of a life of St. Columban, wrote another life of St. John (Acta SS. 28 Jan. ii. 856). Mabillon has thought it only necessary to publish the added book on the miracles (Ibid. p. 637), which alone finds place among Jonas's works in Migne's Patrologia Latina (lxxxvii. 1083).

St. John was born in the territory of Langres and early established a monastery on the banks of the stream Reomaus, which with a brief interruption he ruled till his death, which is placed in Jan. 23, 539.

For the subsequent history of the monastery see Gall. Christ. iv. 658. [S. A. B.]

JOANNES (504), surnamed CLIMACUS, and SCHOLASTICUS, and SINAITA, abbat of mount Sinai. According to Cave (i. 534) he flourished cir. 564. At the age of sixteen he entered the monastery of Mount Sinai. On the death of his abbat he embraced the life of an anchorite, but being elected abbat of Mount Sinai at the age of 75, he felt it his duty to give up his solitary life, and unwillingly undertook the charge. At the entreaty of John abbat of Raithu, he now composed his works, the Scala Paradisi and the Liber ad Pastorem; from the title (κλίμαξ) of the first of these the saint gained his distinguishing name of Climacus (Climakos). It contains his experiences in the spiritual life, with advice and instructions for the attainment of a higher degree of holiness, and is dedicated to the abbat of Raithu, who afterwards wrote a commentary upon it. (Patr. Gr. lxxxviii. 1211-1248.) After having for some time presided over the monastery he returned into solitude, appointing his brother Georgius as his successor. He died at an advanced age about the beginning of the 7th century, and is commemorated on Mar. 30. (Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 834; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxviii. 631-1210; Surius, de Probatis Sanct. Historiis, Mar. 30.) [I. G. S.]

JOANNES (505), in the 6th century, monk of Raithu, near the Red Sea, some leagues from Mount Sinai, to whom the "Scala Paradisi" of John Climacus was dedicated. He afterwards wrote a commentary upon the saint's works, which is still extant. (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxviii. 631, 1211; Ceillier, xi. 677, 691.) [I. S. G.]

JOANNES (506), called PENARENSIS, Mar. 19, a native of Syria, who, migrating to Italy, founded at the "urbs Penarenensis" (probably Parana) a monastery, which he governed as abbat for forty years. (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Adon., Netker., Wandalb.; Acta SS. Mart. iii. 30.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (507) SABA (Syr. sobo qdsho = a sener sanctus), a native of Nineveh, fl. in the 6th century, and was an orthodox monk of Dilatha or Daliatha (Arab. al-daliath), a small town of Mesopotamia, on the western bank of the Euphrates. His day in the Syrian kalendar is March 15. His works are thirty discourses and forty-eight epistles, of which Syriac and Arabic MSS. exist in the Roman libraries. They were collected by his brother Joannes, to whom for the most part they are addressed. Though abounding in digressions, the style is marked by feeling and persuasive eloquence. To the discourses is prefixed a letter to his brother, stating that their aim was to console him for the writer's absence. They are headed thus:—"On the divine gifts and spiritual solaces vouchsafed to monks for their comfort and delight, and on spiritual contemplation, and the knowledge of mysteries and thoughts, also on the struggle with evil spirits, on prudence, and the practice of the virtues." (Assem. Bib. Or. i. 433-444, iii. i. 103, 4; Bickell, Consp. Syr. p. 26.) [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (508), surnamed MONASTERIENSIS, May 5, presbyter and solitary at Chinon in the 6th century. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 50.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (509), called of BETH-RABBAN or BETHNARSI, disciple and successor of Jacobus, the founder of the monastery of Beth-Haba, flourished in the 6th century. After six months of rule he left that house, and lived as an anchorite near Dakuka, on a mountain in the district of Garmai, where Rabban Ezekiel's monastery was afterwards established. Jesujab, when still bishop of Nineveh, wrote a letter to the brethren of Beth-Haba, in which he stated that Joannes had been a monk full seventy years before his departure from their house; thirty years he had lived as a solitary, forty with Jacobus as a coenobite. Joannes was for some time in the monastery of Beth-rabbân, which was subject to the same abbat as Beth-Haba. Ebedjesu (ap. Assem. Bibl. Or. III. i. 72) states that he wrote a commentary on Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Job, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Proverbs, also certain tracts against Magi, Jews, and heretics. He was further the author of prayers for rogation days, a prayer on the death of Chosroes I. (died A.D. 579), and another on a plague which befel Nisibis, besides paracletic addresses for each order in the church (i.e. metrical discourses read in the office of the dead), a book of questions relating to the Old and New Testaments, psalms, hymns, and chants. One of his hymns may be read in the Mosul Breviary, p. 61. It occurs also in a MS. of the British Museum (Wright, Cat. p. 135).

Rosen and Forshall (Cat. MSS. xii. 3 n.) mention another hymn of Joannes. Cf. also Lelong, Bibl. Sacr. ii. 794. [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (510), a monk in the monastery of St. Mark at Spoleto, brother of Eleutherius, abbat of the same house. A story is told of him to shew how a soul on the point of departure sometimes recognises the one with which it is on a moral level, and which will be its companion for eternity. (Greg. Mag. Dial. iv. 35 in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 376.) [EUMORPHIUS.] [C. H.]

JOANNES (511), abbat of the monastery of St. Lucia in Syracuse, addressed by Gregory the Great. (Greg. Magn. Epp. lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 3; lib. vii. ind. xv. 39 in Migne, lxxvii. 898.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (512), abbat, bearer of letters from Gregory the Great in 593 to Theodelinda, the Lombard queen. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iv. indict. xii. 4 in Migne, lxxvii. 671.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (513), abbat of Regium, addressed by Gregory the Great in 595 (lib. v. ind. xiii. ep. 50 and note, in Migne, lxxvii.). [C. H.]

JOANNES (514), a monk who had returned from what Gregory the Great called "Histicorum Schisma" to the bosom of the church. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. vi. indict. xiv. 39, 47; Migne, lxxvii. 829, 833.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (515), abbat of a monastery near Cagliari in Sardinia. Gregory, in a letter to Januarius the bishop, A.D. 600, directed that he should be ordained. This is possibly the same Sardinian Joannes who had a controversy with the abbess Desideria in 602. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xi. indict. iv. 25; lib. xiii. indict. vi. 4 in Migne, lxxvii. 1137, 1257.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (516), abbat of Mount Sinai addressed by Pope Gregory the Great in 600. (Greg. Magn. Epp. lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 1 in Migne, lxxvii.) Gregory's editor Goussainville is inclined to identify him with John Climacus. [JOANNES (504).] [C. H.]

JOANNES (517), apparently a monk, addressed as "religiosus" in 600 by pope Gregory the Great. (Greg. Magn. Epp. lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 27 in Migne, lxxvii.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (518), a monk in Gregory the Great's own monastery in Rome, of whom Gregory gives an account in his Dialogues. (Greg. Magn. Dial. iv. 47 in Migne, lxxvii. 409.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (519), the name of several anchorites and others in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt, mentioned by John Moschus in his Pratum Spirituale (Pat. Gr. lxxxvii. pt. 3; Pat. Lat. lxxiv.); viz.—

i. an aged anchorite in the monastery of Eustorgius in the Jordan wilderness, cir. 500 (Prat. cap. 1). He afterwards founded a church in the cave of Sapsas near the brook Cherith.

ii. of Ptolemais (Acre) in Phoenicia (Prat. 56). He resided as a disciple and attendant of a certain aged man of eminence in the street Παράσημα or Caparisma of that city, and his great virtue was scrupulous obedience. John after his master's death attained to a similar eminence and was reported to possess miraculous powers of healing.

iii. soldier of Alexandria, mentioned by Paladius abbat of the monastery of Thelazomenum at Alexandria (Prat. 73).

iv. monk of the monastery of St. Theodosius at Scopulus near Seleucia, gifted with the power of casting out demons (Prat. 83).

v. surnamed HUMILIS, anchorite in Cilicia (Prat. 87).

vi. surnamed of PETRA, an anchorite in Egypt, visited by John Moschus and his companion Sophronius (Prat. 113).

vii. anchorite of Oasis, once a reader in the great church of Constantinople, ransomed from the enemy (Prat. 112). [LEO.]

viii. anchorite and presbyter of the monastery of the eunuchs in the Jordan wilderness who related anecdotes of the anchorites Sisinnius, Callinicus, and Sergius (Prat. 136–138).

ix. surnamed the PERSIAN, a monk in Egypt who visited Rome and narrated an anecdote of Gregory the Great (Prat. 151).

x. surnamed CILIX, hegumen of the laura of Raithu near the Red Sea. John Moschus records his six admonitions to his monks (Prat. 115). See also Prat. 177.

xi. surnamed RUTILUS, anchorite (Prat. 179).

xii. surnamed MOABITA (Prat. 179).

xiii. anchorite of Sochus, whose story was told to Joannes Moschus by Dionysius presbyter of the church of the Ascalonites (Prat. 180, 182; Mansi, xiii. 194 E).

xiv. surnamed EUNUCHUS, anchorite near Alexandria, visited by John Moschus while residing in the Nonus (ἐν τῷ Ἐννάτῳ) at that city (Prat. 184). [C. H.]

JOANNES (520), surnamed MOSCHUS and EUCRATAS (also EVERATAS and EVIRATUS, corruptions of Eucratas as Fabricius remarks), a monk, author of Pratum Spirituale, cir. A.D. 620. The materials of his life are to be collected from his book (which exhibits no historical arrangement), a brief notice by Photius (cod. 199) and a Greek Vatican manuscript of which Migne has printed a Latin version entitled Elogium Auctoris. This document extends the chronological material, but the editor states nothing as to its age and authority. It purports to have been composed while the laura of St. Sabas in Palestine was standing.

Photius states that Moschus commenced the recluse life in the monastery of St. Theodosius. The date may have been about 575. In the Pratum Moschus is found at two monasteries named after two Theodosii, near Antioch and Jerusalem respectively. The one intended by Photius is a laura founded about 451 by the younger St. Theodosius at a short distance east of Jerusalem (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 683). The Pratum (cap. 92) shews Moschus at this spot, described as "in the desert of the holy city," Gregory being the archimandrite. In the reign of Tiberius (Prat. 112) John Moschus departed with a companion, Sophronius Sophista (said to have been afterwards patriarch of Jerusalem), for Egypt and Oasis. This circumstance, which is unnoticed by Photius, is assigned by the Elogium to the beginning of the reign of Tiberius (i.e. 578), and Moschus is stated to have been sent by his superior on monastic business. This absence was perhaps a temporary one, and Moschus's more protracted wanderings in Egypt may be assigned to a much later day. His Palestine life extended over above a quarter of a century, and Sophronius Sophista is frequently mentioned as his companion, once with a remark that it was "before he renounced the world." The monastic communities of which he speaks are usually designated by the word λαύρα. From many of them he received visitors, who related to him anecdotes of their most eminent members. At others Moschus is himself a visitor or a resident. Photius states that he began monastic life at St. Theodosius, he afterwards resided with the monks of the Jordan desert and in the new laura of St. Sabas. The Pratum will fill up this outline. The laura of Pharon (Φαράων, Φαράων, Φαρά, Pharan in the Latin version) was his residence for ten years (40). The situation of it appears as within burying distance of Jerusalem (42), as well as near the laura of Calamon and the laura of the Towers of Jordan (40). The laura of Calamon (τοῦ Καλαμώνος), where Moschus visited, was near Jordan (157, 163). Another ten years (67) he resided at the laura of Aeliotae (τῶν Αἰλιωτῶν). This also was near Jordan (134), and was still under the rule of its founder Antonius (66). Moschus was at Jerusalem at the consecration of the patriarch Amos (149), probably therefore A.D. 594 (Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 246); he records having ascended from "holy Gethsemane" to the "holy mount of Olives" (187). He was a resident at the laura of St. Sabas, called new laura (3, 128) near the Dead Sea (53), and a few miles east of St. Theodosius (Bolland. u. s.). He visited the μονή of the eunuchs near "holy Jordan" (135-137), the xenodochium of the fathers at Ascalon (189), and Scythopolis (50). That he held the office of a καθῆναρχος is an inadvertent statement of Fabricius, citing Prat. 50, where it is a narrator, not Moschus, who called himself by the title.

From the wilderness of Jordan and the New Laura, says Photius, John went to Antioch and its neighbourhood. The Elogium states that he removed thither from the New Laura, when the Persians attacked the Romans in consequence of the murder of the emperor Maurice and his children. The murder occurred on Nov. 27, 602, and in 603 Chosroes declared war against Phocas. The Pratum shews Moschus at Antioch or Theopolis (88, 89); likewise at the neighbouring city Selucia while Theodorus was bishop (79); but as this bishop is not otherwise known we get no date (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 780). He visited the μοναστήριον (also μονή) of the elder St. Theodosius, on the Rhosicus Scopulus, a mountain promontory between Rhosus in the gulf of Issus and Selucia (80-86, 95, 99). At a village six miles from Rhosus, in the seventh indiction (i.e. some time between Sept. 1, 604, and Aug. 31, 605), he heard the story of JOANNES HUMILIS.

From those parts, says Photius, he went to Alexandria and Oasis and the neighbouring deserts. This was his principal visit to Egypt, the only one noticed by Photius, and the most prominent one in the Elogium, which states his reason for leaving Syria to have been the invasion of the empire by the Persians. This allusion helps to decide the period, which must have been when Chosroes overran north Syria in and after 605 (as detailed by Rawlinson, Seventh Monarchy, 501, 502). At Alexandria Moschus remained eight years (as the Latin version renders χρόνους ὀκτώ, Prat. 13 fn.) in the μοναστήριον of Palladius (69-73). The names of monastic localities in and about Alexandria occur in Prat.

60, 105, 110, 111, 145, 146, 162, 177, 184, 195. There are recorded also visits to the Thebaid cities of Antiuons and Lycus (44, 143, 161), to the laura of Raythu (115, 116, 119), which was on the Red Sea shore (120, 121), and to Mount Sinai (122, 123). Photius states that from Egypt Moschus went to Rome, touching at some islands on his voyage, and that at Rome he composed his book. What drove him from Egypt appears in the Elogium. The holy places had fallen into the hands of the enemy and the subjects of the empire were terror-stricken. This statement again assists the chronology; for as the Persians obtained possession of Jerusalem in 615, and in 616 advanced from Palestine and took Alexandria (Rawl. 503, 504), the rumour of their approach would cause the retirement of Moschus in one of those years. The Pratum (185) records a visit to Samos. The Elogium relates how on his deathbed at Rome he delivered his book to Sophronius, with a request that he might be buried if possible at Mount Sinai, or else at the laura of St. Theodosius. Sophronius and twelve fellow-disciples sailed with the body to Palestine, but hearing at Ascalon that Sinai was beset by Arabs, they took it up to Jerusalem (in the beginning of the eighth indiction, i.e. cir. Sept. 1, 620), and buried it in the cemetery of St. Theodosius.

The work of Moschus consists of anecdotes and sayings collected by him in the various monasteries he had visited. The persons thus introduced are usually eminent anchorites, and of his own time, as he states in his dedicatory address to Sophronius; but some whose stories were related to him belonged to an earlier period, as e.g. John of Sapsas [JOANNES (519) i.]. The work is now distributed in 219 chapters, but it was originally comprised, says Photius, in 304 narrations (διηγήματα). The discrepancy may be due in a measure to arrangement, as some chapters (e.g. 5, 55, 92, 95, 105) contain two or even three distinct narrations, introduced by the very word διήγημα in the verbal form. Moschus (To Sophron.) compares the character of his worthies to various flowers in a spring meadow, and names his work accordingly Λειμῶν (Pratum). It has borne other titles; in the time of Photius some called it Νέον Παραδείσιον (Hortulus Novus), and since then it has been named Viridarium, Νέος Παράδεισος (Novus Paradisus), and Λειμωνάριον. The present title, Pratum Spirituale, appears to have originated with the first Latin translator, said by Posservinus to have been Ambrosius Camaldulensis (ob. 1439), who translated numerous works of the Greek fathers (Oudin. iii. 2437). The Pratum in this version forms liber x. of Rosweyde's Vitae Patrum (1615), which Migne reprinted in 1850 (Pat. Lat. lxxiv.), prefixing to the Pratum the Elogium Auctoris already described. In 1624 an incomplete Greek text made its appearance, accompanying the Latin, furnished by Fronto Ducaeus in the second volume of the Auctarium to the fourth edition of La Bigne's Magna Bibliotheca Patrum. In La Bigne's edition of 1654 it stands in vol. xiii. p. 1057. In 1681 Cotelier (Eccles. Gr. Mon. ii. 341) supplied more of the Greek and gave an independent Latin translation of some parts. In 1860 Migne (Pat. Gr. lxxxvii. 2814) reprinted the Greek as thus augmented, leaving a gap of only three chapters (121, 122, 132), retaining the Latin of Ambrosius throughout. Other bibliographical particulars, including an account of the Italian and French versions, will be found in Fabricius (Bib. Gr. x. 124, ed. Harles). The authorship of the Pratum used sometimes to be attributed to Sophronius, in whose name it is cited by John of Damascus (De Imagin. orat. i. 328, ii. 344, iii. 352 in Pat. Gr. xciv. 1279, 1315, 1335), and likewise in actio iv. of the seventh synod in 787 (Mansi, xiii. 59). John Moschus and his book are treated by Cave (i. 581) and more fully by Ceillier (xi. 700). An analysis of the Pratum for illustrations of church discipline will be found in Dupin (Engl. translation, 1722, t. ii. p. 11). [C. H.]

JOANNES (521), the 2nd abbat of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, as recorded in the latest chronology of that monastery (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, pp. 2, 127; Thorn, ap. Twysden, c. 1766). He is probably to be identified with the Joannes mentioned by Bede in his Chronicon (Monum. Hist. Br. 96) as sent with Augustine and Mellitus to Britain, and the fact of his being abbat may possibly rest upon a true local tradition, although it is not mentioned by Bede. Elmham gives an account of the free election of Joannes, according to the decree of Augustine, that the abbat should be chosen from among the monks of the house, of his benediction by archbishop Laurentius, and his friendship with king Ethelbert. He is mentioned as abbat in the bull of pope Boniface IV., in which the rights of St. Augustine's are confirmed, and which can scarcely be regarded as genuine (Elmham, 129-131; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 67, 68). The date of abbat John's death is fixed by the Canterbury writers in 618; Elmham gives his epitaph, stating that he was buried in the church or chapel of St. Mary, and in abbat Wido's time translated to a place behind the altar of St. Gregory (Elmham, p. 147). See also Mon. Angl. i. 120. [S.]

JOANNES (522), a monk of Antioch, cir. 620, author of an Historia Chronica ab Adamo, which at one time enjoyed much reputation. Hody in his Prolegomena to the Chronographia of John Malalas, mentions several authors who partly made use of the work. Constantine Porphyrogenitus has extracts from it in his Collectanea de Virtutibus et Vitiis (pp. 779-883, ed. Paris, 1635). See also Cave, i. 577; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vii. 446 n. ed. Harles. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (523), a solitary on an island visited by Ansoaldus, defensor of the church of Poitiers, on his voyage home from Sicily at the time of the death of Dagobert king of the Franks (A.D. 638). See Aimoin, Hist. Franc. iv. 34, in Pat. Lat. cxxxix. 791. [C. H.]

JOANNES (524), monk of the monastery of St. Theodosius, legate of pope Martin I. in 649 to John bishop of Philadelphia. (Martin, ep. 5, in Pat. Lat. lxxxvii. 102 A.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (525), called ARCHICANTATOR or the PRECATOR. He belonged to the church of St. Peter at Rome, and was likewise abbat of the monastery of St. Martin in that city. He was brought to England in 678 by Benedict Biscop with the leave of pope Agatho. The desire of Benedict was to elevate in every possible way the aesthetic tone of his countrymen, whilst Agatho, in addition to this, was glad to have an agent in England on whom he could thoroughly rely for information and support. When John came to Wearmouth he gave oral instruction in singing and reading to the choir, and committed to writing for their use the yearly scheme of the festivals as observed at Rome. In Bede's time this was preserved in the library at Wearmouth, having been copied far and wide, as many came to profit by John's teaching, and skilled musicians flocked from the Northumbrian monasteries to listen to the famous stranger. He gave lessons also in other places, and was welcomed wherever he went.

John was commissioned by Agatho, before he returned to Rome, to make strict inquiry into the orthodoxy of the English church. He brought with him for his assistance a copy of the decrees of the Lateran synod (649) of Martin I., of which he allowed a scribe at Wearmouth to take a copy. In September, A.D. 680, he took these decrees with him to a council of the English church summoned by archbishop Theodore to Hatfield, where he acted as papal commissary, and where the document was formally read and approved. A copy of the acts of the council was placed in his hands for transmission to Rome, whither, as his work in England was done, he soon bent his steps.

He began his homeward journey in A.D. 681. In France he was struck with sickness and died, so near to Tours that his friends were able to convey his body to the monastery of his own patron, St. Martin, then, and for a long while before, a place of renown. John had halted there as he came to England in A.D. 678, and had promised the brethren, in answer to their most earnest entreaties, that he would sojourn with them for a time as he returned. John's body was honourably interred at Tours, and the missive which he was bearing was carried on to Rome, and gladdened the pope's heart with the news that England had kept the faith. (Bede, H. E. iv. 18, v. 24; Vitae Abbatum, c. 5, in Smith's Bede, Appendix, No. xii.; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 143-151.) [J. R.]

JOANNES (526), a monk of Zyga toward the close of the 7th century. He took part in a public disputation with Anastasius Sinaita at Alexandria. He was a Monophysite and a Theodosian. (Anast. Vitae Dux, c. 10, Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxix. 165-180.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (527) STYLITES, a person to whom Jacobus Edessenus (d. A.D. 710) addressed certain epistles in answer to questions growing out of his studies (Wright's Cat. p. 595). Two were published by Prof. Wright in Journ. Sacr. Lit. 1867, p. 430; a third by Schroeter in Zeitschr. d. morg. Gesellsch. 1870, p. 261. See Assem. B. O. i. 486. Wright's Cat. p. 988 describes a letter of the Stylite to Daniel, priest of an Arab tribe, on Gen. xlix. 10. The writer shews his learning, by quotations from Eusebius, Andronicus, Chrysostom, Cyril Alex., Hippolytus, Ephraim, Jacobus of Edessa, &c. The same MS. contains four letters from Georgius bishop of the Arabs to Joannes, dated A.D. 714, 716, and 718. (Different from Joannes Stylites, fl. 830; see B. O. iii. pt. i. 256-308.) [C. J. B.]

JOANNES (528), monk and presbyter of Euboea, cir. 744, author of a sermon on the conception of the Holy Virgin, and of another on the Infants of Bethlehem. The former alone is mentioned by the earlier bibliographers (Lambecius, Bibl. Caes. Vindob. v. 22, viii. 380; Ballerini, Syllog. Monum. i. 36; Pat. Gr. xcvi. 1451; Mai, Auct. Class. x. 570). Leo Allatius, in his Prolegomena to the works of John of Damascus, edited by Le Quien, believed the author to have afterwards become bishop of Euboea (Pat. Gr. xciv. 171, 178). This opinion is given in Cave, and it was on the same ground probably that Le Quien placed a John among his bishops of Euboea. [JOANNES (167).] [C. H.]

JOANNES (529) DAMASCENUS (ST. JOHN, OF DAMASCUS, Ἰωάννης ὁ Δαμασκηνός, surnamed also Μανσοῦρ and Χρυσόπρασ), monk.

(1) Life.—Our chief authority for the life of this doctor of the Eastern church, is the account drawn up by John patriarch of Jerusalem, which will be found prefixed to most editions of his works. The writer has sometimes been assumed to be John IV. (as in an able article in the Revue Belge, tom. xii. p. 6); but this patriarch died before John of Damascus, in 735. The general tone of the narrative points to a time considerably later, when the iconoclastic storm had passed away, and there was a danger of the history of Damascus being forgotten, preserved as it was only in rude and scattered Arabic accounts:—ὡς ἔτυχεν, ἐσχεδιασμένον ἀγροικιστί . . . διαλέκτω καὶ γράμμασι τοῖς Ἀραβικοῖς (§ iii.). Hence Le Quien considers the author to be the John of Jerusalem who flourished in the latter part of the 10th century, and who is said to have been burnt alive by the Saracens for treasonable correspondence with the emperor Nicephorus Phocas. This Life is briefly characterised by Neander as fabulous, and in one striking incident which it relates does certainly tax very largely the credulity of the reader. But with this exception, and after allowance has been made for its generally rhetorical and inflated style, there seems no reason for discrediting it in its main outlines. It will accordingly be followed, in the present article, with the aid of such checks as the writings themselves may supply.

The Christian family from which John of Damascus was sprung was one of distinction in that city, and was known by the Arabic surname of Mansour. It has been supposed that this was a term of opprobrium, applied personally to John by his enemies. Thus, in the sixth session of the seventh general council at Nicaea, 787, at which the decisions of the Iconoclastic synod in 754 were revoked, a reference was made to their own champion as stigmatised under this name by Copronymus:—ὡς παρ' αὐτοῦ ὑβριστικῶς Μανσοῦρ προσήγορευται. But the truth probably was, as Theophanes relates (Chronographia, ed. Migne, p. 841), that the emperor perverted the name Mansour, "ransomed," to Mamzer, "bastard;" a Hebrew word retained in the Vulgate of Deut. xiii. 2. Such perversions were common. Thus John was miscalled by one adversary Jannes for Joannes; by another, Sarabaita (cf. Gieseler, tr. by Davidson, ii. p. 12) for Sabaita; while he himself nicknamed the Iconoclastic bishops ἐπισκότους for ἐπισκόπους. The name of Μανσοῦρ or Mansûr was, in fact, a familiar one among the Arabs, as a glance at the index to Weil's Geschichte der Khalifen will shew, and an Al-Mansour, the illustrious founder of Bagdad, ascended the throne of the Caliphs at the very time that the synod, condemnatory of John Mansour, was sitting at Constantinople. If we conclude, then, that this was a family name, and that John was so called after his grandfather (παππικῶ ὀνόματι, Theoph. ubi sup.), and not after his father (as Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. p. 97), it is probable that his father was the Sergius, son of Mansour, who is also mentioned by Theophanes as an ἀνὴρ Χριστιανικώτατος, and as being λογθέτης, or treasurer, to the caliph Abdulmelek (A.D. 685–705). Since the surrender of Damascus to Abu Obeidah in 634, the Saracens had rapidly extended their conquests along the shores of the Mediterranean. About the year 699, in particular, some portions of Sicily had been overrun by them, and captives from the island, by their own desire, settled in Damascus. There is therefore nothing improbable in what John of Jerusalem tells us, that among the captives brought back into Damascus for death or slavery, there was, on one occasion, an Italian monk, possibly from the opposite shores of Calabria, named Cosmas:—κόσμος τὴν ὕψην, κοσμιώτερος τὴν ψυχήν, καὶ τὴν κλήσιν Κοσμάς (§ 8). His grave and reverend bearing impressed even his captors; while the bitter grief he expressed, not at the prospect of death, but at the loss of the stores of learning he had painfully amassed, with no intellectual heir to succeed him, made no less an impression on Sergius. Ever ready, at his own cost, to purchase the liberty of Christian slaves, Sergius took a special interest in the captive now before him. For here was just such a man as he had long been desiring to find as an instructor for his son. Hastening to the caliph he begged the life of Cosmas, and installed him, to his unbounded delight (ἵππος ἦν εὐθὺς δευμὴν ἀπορρήξας, κ.τ.λ., § 10), as tutor to two pupils,—his own son, and a youth whom he had adopted, a native of Jerusalem, also named Cosmas. It will be observed that no date has been assigned for John's birth, nor does it seem possible to fix any with precision. The year 676 has been named, but this would make him at least twenty-three years old when he became the pupil of Cosmas, if we assume the events just related to have happened in 699 at the earliest. All that can be said with any certainty is, that he was born before the end of the century. Passing over the glowing account given by the biographer of the progress made by the two young men in their studies—a comparison with Diophantus giving an interesting glimpse of the early days of algebra—we come to the time when Cosmas, having taught them all he knew, begs permission to end his days in a monastery. This was reluctantly granted; and the young Mansour, having finished his education, was sent for to court. Here he reached a yet higher office than his father had held; being made πρωτοσύμβουλος, or vizir, to the reigning caliph. As Yezid II. (719–723) is known to have played the part of an Iconoclast himself, at the instigation, it is said, of some Jewish adviser (Lebeau, Hist. du Bas-Emp. t. xii. p. 134), he is scarcely likely to have been the one to promote to high office a Christian of such opposite sentiments as John. Perhaps, therefore, we should fix upon his successor, Hidjam (723-742). Whichever it were, now ensued the events which have made the name of John of Damascus chiefly memorable. Leo the Isaurian ascended the Byzantine throne in 717. In 726, turning his attention from military to ecclesiastical affairs, this emperor issued his first edict against image-worship. The adoration of images and paintings in Christian churches was hereby forbidden, but their destruction was not as yet enjoined. But after an interval of four years, a second and much more stringent edict appeared, commanding all such statues and pictures to be destroyed or effaced. What the emperor's motives may have been, is a point that has been much disputed (Neander, Ch. Hist. ed. Bohn, v. p. 280). But the interesting discovery, some twenty years ago, of a long letter written by Leo to the caliph Omar II.* narrows the question in some degree; as showing that Leo began his reign by holding the established opinions of the church, and maintaining them so strenuously as to deserve (like our own Henry VIII. under somewhat similar circumstances) the title of Defender of the Faith. The change may have been due to a conviction, more strongly impressed upon him every year, that Christianity, as it then was, must be purified if it was to contend successfully against the vigorous growth of Islam. Whatever may have prompted him to such a course, these edicts raised a storm that lasted through the rest of his own reign, and through the still longer one of his son and successor Constantine. Of the three chief opponents whom he had to encounter, his own patriarch Germanus, pope Gregory II., and Damascenus, the last was the most active and intrepid. The edict of 730 was followed by two controversial addresses, in quick succession, from his pen, in which the cause of image-worship was upheld. A third is extant, but its genuineness is disputed. The courage of Damascenus, in sending forth these missives, is extolled by his biographer (§ 3); but a modern historian, with more reason, thinks his boldness the less surprising, "considering that he was secure either in Damascus or in his monastery, and a subject of the Saracenic kingdom" (Milman, Lat. Christ. ed. 1854, ii. p. 166). His antagonist being thus out of his reach, Leo is said to have had recourse to stratagem. Getting possession of a letter in John's own handwriting, he set his notaries to work to forge one in the same characters, purporting to be addressed to himself. In this the writer was made to apprise him of the unguarded state of Damascus, and to offer the emperor his aid in surprising it. The epistle so concocted was sent to the caliph by Leo, with an accompanying letter from himself, duly exposing this treasonable offer on the part of a Saracenic subject. The result was according to his expectation. John was sent for to the presence of his sovereign; his protestations of innocence were unheeded; and his right hand was ordered to be then and there struck off. Such is the account; and if it has seemed to the reader unlikely that Leo would stoop to such duplicity, or that the caliph, if he believed the story, would be content with cutting off his councillor's hand instead of his head, the sequel will not be more acceptable to him. For it relates, in brief, how the sufferer, after a night spent in earnest prayer to the Virgin for the restoration of that hand which had laboured so strenuously in her defence, found his prayer answered, and the missing limb restored to him whole as the other. A mark of suture was all that remained, when morning came, to shew where the executioner's knife had passed. The caliph, on hearing the wonderful news, sent for his late minister, and questioned him strictly; and then, unable to resist the evidence before him, avowed his full conviction of the latter's innocence, and would fain have reinstated him in his former office.

Such is the story, and it is idle to attempt to rationalise it, as Lebeau and others have done. It is thoroughly in keeping with the age and party to which Damascenus belonged.

In what follows, we feel on surer ground. Nothing in the records we have of John of Damascus is more certain than that he was, in his latter years, an inmate of a monastery. When, therefore, his biographer tells us that, in consequence of what has been just related, he craved permission to retire from the world, and to that end disposed of all his possessions among his relatives and the poor, there is nothing improbable in his account. Nor, if we allow for some rhetorical colouring, need we discredit altogether the stories told us of the reception Damascenus met with, and the hardships he endured as a novice. The convent chosen by him was the old Laura<sup>b</sup> of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem, the same to which his tutor, Cosmas, had retired in years gone by. At first, none of the monks was willing to take so formidable a pupil in charge. One after another declined the task. But in the end an aged monk was found to undertake the office, and the severity of his discipline was only to be matched by his disciple's unflinching obedience. Silence, such as Pythagoras enjoined on his neophytes; an entire abstinence from writing (a hard condition for the author of the famous circular letters); a renunciation of all secular learning—μη τὸ παραπᾶν φθέγγη τι τῶν τῆς ἐξω παιδείας (§ xxiv.); such were some of the injunctions imposed. On one occasion, as a practical test of obedience, he was ordered to journey to Damascus, carrying a load of baskets of convent manufacture, and there, in the streets he had once trodden as a high officer of state, to risk the jeers and ill-usage of the crowd by demanding for these baskets an exorbitant price. On another occasion, for the offence of inditing a funeral hymn for the brother of a deceased fellow monk, he was driven from the cell of his spiritual director, loaded with reproaches, and only re-admitted after a penance

* There was published, in 1856, a French translation, by the Archimandrite Chahnazarian, of an Armenian history of the conquests of the Arabs from A.D. 661 to 771, written by a varabed or doctor of the Armenian church, named Ghévond, a contemporary of the latter events he records. According to him, Omar II. had written to Leo IV. (who ascended the throne in the same year with himself) a letter of enquiry respecting various points of the Christian faith; and the emperor's reply occupies pp. 42-97 of Chahnazarian's translation.

<sup>b</sup> A description of the Mar Saba, or Monastery of St. Sabas, in its present condition, will be found in Conder's Tent Work in Palestine (1878), I. p. 302. It stands on the side of a ravine, overlooking the Dead Sea, about ten miles south-east of Jerusalem.

so humiliating as to strike even the rest of the inmates with consternation. When the blade had been sufficiently tempered by such probation, the old monk was warned in a dream to prolong the discipline no further. The flow of such precious streams of sacred learning and song must be no longer checked, for the strains of John of Damascus would surpass even the song of Moses and the minstrelsy of Miriam. Thus at length was he left free to pursue his beloved studies. Now were composed the hymns with which, in the minds of many, his name is most of all identified. As a fellow worker in this task he had his adoptive brother, the younger Cosmas, who was an inmate of the same monastery, until made bishop of Maiuma in Palestine. At some time previous to A.D. 735, John himself was ordained to the priesthood, by his friend and namesake, John patriarch of Jerusalem. The date depends on our accepting the statement of Theophanes, before referred to, that this patriarch died in the above-mentioned year. His ordination does not appear to have withdrawn him to any great extent from the cloister. At times, indeed, he was occupied in preaching abroad. His extant homilies were delivered in various places, and some passages in them seem to indicate that the preacher had now arrived at old age:—γεγρακῶτα λόγον . . . ὀπλιζόντες (Homil. ii. in Dormit. B. V. Mariæ, § 1). But it was chiefly in quiet study that his declining years were passed. Interpreting, as his biographer tells us, the "double honour," of which a good presbyter is declared worthy, to mean a double obligation to humility, obedience, and discipline of mind and body, he set himself, as such a mental discipline, the task of revising and correcting his multifarious works. It is instructive to notice how a flowery exuberance of style, κάλλος ἀνθρῶν ἄγαν (§ 36), is spoken of as one of the faults corrected, by a writer whose own tendency is so much in that direction. The same brilliant fault, if such we may call it, was that which earned for him his other surname of Chrysorroas, the "golden-flowing." This, at least, is the statement of Theophanes: ὁ καλῶς ἐπικληθείς Χρυσόροσος, διὰ τῆν ἐπανθοῦσαν αὐτῷ τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐν τε λόγῳ καὶ βίῳ χρυσαυγῆ χάριν. Yet surely there was an allusion also in the name to that famed river of Damascus, the scriptural Abana, the Greek Chrysorroas, which is the very life-blood of the city. It may have been owing to this repeated revision of his works that some of them—the Dialectica more especially—are found in such various forms in different manuscripts. Death came upon him while occupied in these pursuits, but in what year is uncertain. There can be little doubt that he was alive in 754, when the Copronymian synod was held. If the conjecture of Petavius, to be afterwards noticed, as to the date of the Canon Paschalis, be correct, he was alive in 759. On the other hand, it is probable that he was dead in 767, when the seventh general council reversed the decrees of the previous one. That he did not suffer martyrdom, but died peacefully in his convent, may be inferred from the statement of Joannes Phocas in the 12th century, that his sepulchre was still to be seen there, near the tomb of St. Sabas himself. For some reason unknown to us, his remains were subsequently removed to Constantinople. Such at least is the conclusion to be drawn from a passage in Georgius Pachymeres, which testifies to the saint's body being there in the 14th century, and to its being made the subject of an ordeal, to which the partisans of Arsenius challenged those of his rival Josephus (Historia Andronici, lib. i. cap. xiii.). In the Greek church his commemoration-day is the 4th December; in some Menologies the 29th November. In the Latin church it is May 6.

(2) Works.—In enumerating the works of Damascenus, it will be convenient to follow the order in which they stand in Migne's edition (Paris, 1864), as being the most complete hitherto published. This contains a reprint of Le Quien's edition of 1712, extending to p. 856 of vol. iii., while the remainder is occupied by various pieces of more or less doubtful genuineness, such as the Vita Barlaam et Joasaph, some of which Le Quien had expressed the hope of being able to publish in a supplementary volume (Praef. Gen. § xxi). First in importance must be placed:—

I. Fons Scientiæ (vol. i. pp. 521–1228). Under this heading is included a group of three works, each complete in itself, but combining to form a cyclopaedia of Christian theology; the Capita Philosophica, de Haeresibus Liber, and de Fide Orthodoxa. It is addressed, in a prefatory letter, to Cosmas bishop of Maiuma, and would therefore appear to have been written, or at least finally arranged in its present form, not earlier than A.D. 743, that being the received date of Cosmas's consecration. The title of Πηγὴ γνῶσεως, or Well-spring of Knowledge, is given to the trilogy by the author himself, at the end of cap. ii. of the Capita Philosophica, in which he says that he designs to trace in outline (ἐνπογράφασθαι) an epitome of knowledge of every kind: διὸ ΠΗΓΗ ΓΝΩΣΕΩΣ ὀνομαζέσθω. And that he intended the three component parts to stand in their present order is plain from the same letter, in which he says that he will first set before the reader what is best in Greek philosophy (τῶν παρ' Ἑλλήσι σοφῶν τὰ κάλλιστα), then the follies of divers heresies (τῶν θεοστυγῶν αἰρέσεων τὰ φληναφήματα), and lastly, the destroyer of error, and banisher of falsehood, divine truth. His purpose is thus so to clear and strengthen the intellectual vision of the disciple, that, after seeing through and detecting what is false, it may recognise and repose in the true.

(1) His own title for the first of these portions is Κεφάλαια Φιλοσοφικά, from which it might be thought that he did not intend to limit the scope of it to dialectic alone. And this accords with what he says towards the end of cap. iii. about beginning with the logical division of philosophy, "which is rather an instrument (ὄργανον) of philosophy, than itself a division of it." But the common title by which the work is known, De Dialectica, gives a sufficiently accurate description of it. It is, in fact, a series of short chapters on the Categories of Aristotle, along with the Quinque voces, or universals, of Porphyry's Isagoge. The variations between the MSS. in which it is found, some giving sixty-eight chapters, and others an abridgment in fifteen chapters only, seem to point to interpolations by other hands, and may account in some degree for the inconsistencies that have been pointed out (Ritter, Christliche Philosophie, ii. p. 557 n.). Besides the interest which this treatise possesses, as shewing what knowledge of the Organon was to be found in Syria in the middle of the eighth century, and the comparative indebtedness of Arabs to Christians, or Christians to Arabs (Sedillot, Des savants Arabes, 1871), it throws light on many terms of theological controversy then employed. The Monophysite discussions, in particular, betray their presence in the author's mind by the way in which he comments (c. xxx) on οὐσία, ὑπόστασις, and the like; while the term μονοθελήτης is said to have been of his coinage (Robertson, Hist. of the Chr. Ch. vol. ii. p. 41). In mastering Aristotle, or as much of him as was then known, he no doubt felt that he was wresting a powerful weapon from the hands of opponents, Nestorian or others. To their use of the authority of this "thirteenth apostle" he can refer slightly enough: εἰ μὴ που τὸν παρ' ὑμῶν ἄγιον Ἀριστοτέλην ἡμῖν, ὡς τρισκαδέκατον ἀπόστολον, εἰσαγάγοιτε (c. Jacobitas, cap. 10).

(2) The second work of this group is the De Haeresibus Compendium (περὶ αἱρέσεων ἐν συντομίᾳ). In his letter to Cosmas, Damascenus had disavowed all claim to originality in the treatises he was dedicating to him: ἐγὼ δὲ ἐμὸν μὲν, ὡς ἔφημ, οὐδέν (p. 525); and in none of the three is this more conspicuous than in the De Haeresibus Liber. The writer professes indeed to be giving the contents of the seven "tomi," or sections, of the Anacephalaeosis of Epiphanius. He begins, accordingly, with the four conditions of life mentioned by St. Paul (Col. iii. 11), those of the Greek, Jew, Barbarian, and Scythian—as the fruitful parents of all succeeding heresies, and goes regularly on to the last heresy recorded by Epiphanius, that of the Massalians, the eightieth in order (p. 729). After this, comes a detailed account of the opinions of the Massalians, taken chiefly from Timotheus Presbyter (Cotelerii Eccles. Gr. Monum. iii. 400), and then some twenty-three heresies more, ending with that of the Apocryphists or Doxarii. There is some uncertainty as to the exact number, from the doubts entertained of the genuineness of one or two in the list. But counting the Nestorians as the eighty-first (p. 737), and including the doubtful ones, there are a hundred and three in all. Damascenus himself states the number to be exactly one hundred (ἐπεὶ πᾶσαι εἰσι τὸν ἀριθμὸν ρ', p. 777); but the additional ones may have been inserted by himself in some later revision. Of the last twenty-three, the most interesting is the account given of the Mohammedans, whom he calls Ishmaelites, in accordance with the etymology given for the word Saracens, as if Σάρρας κενός, that is, descendants of the Hagar who was sent empty away by Sarah. This, and the short notice (p. 773) of the Christianocategori, or Iconoclasts of his own time, are probably all that is strictly original in this part of the work. His other authorities, besides Timotheus Presbyter, seem to have been Theodoret and Sophronius (circ. 640). Like Epiphanius, he concludes his account of errors with a profession of the true faith; and the book ends, like one of his Odes, with a Θεοσκόμιον, or ascription of praise and worship to the Virgin Mother.

(3) De Fide Orthodoxa ("Εκδοσις ἀκριβῆς τῆς ὀρθοδόξου πίστεως"). This is in many respects the most important of Damascenus's works. It is not only the first complete body of divinity that has come down to us, but it has helped to modify very largely, by virtue of its being so, the theology of the West. It became known in Europe, through a Latin version made by Burgundio of Pisa, as early as the time of Eugenius III. (1145–1153). The statement is thus made very probable, that Peter Lombard had this Latin translation before him, when preparing his Book of the Sentences. So that we have here, without adverting to Aquinas later on, a visible connecting link between Eastern and Western scholasticism. In fact, the very division into four books, which the De Fide now presents, is believed to have been due to transcribers, who wished to make it harmonise more in outward form with the familiar work of Lombardus. This division, it will be observed, breaks the connexion between at least two consecutive chapters, the 43rd and 44th (on God's Providence and Foreknowledge), and was not contemplated by the author himself, as is shewn by all the earlier MSS. These exhibit only a division into 100 chapters; a number possibly meant to correspond with that at which he had fixed the list of heresies. The first book, comprising chs. i.–xiv., treats of the nature and attributes of God, and the persons of the Holy Trinity. The second (chs. xv.–xliii.) is on the creation, the physical universe, paradise, man, his faculties and passions. The third (chs. xliii.–lxxiii.) is on the incarnation, the nature and personality of Christ, and other topics more or less connected with Monophysite and Monothelete controversies; ending with the descent into hell. The contents of the fourth (chs. lxxiv.–c.) are somewhat miscellaneous. The previous order of subjects is proceeded with to the end of ch. lxxv.; after which, as if the resurrection and ascension had brought him in some sort to the end of his theme, he turns back to treat of various incidental matters—faith, baptism, image-worship, Holy Scripture, the Sabbath, and the like—ending once more with the resurrection. It is difficult to trace any real sequence of subject in these concluding chapters; among which, for instance, the Sabbath, virginity, circumcision, antichrist, are discussed in this order; and the most natural conclusion seems to be, that in re-writing and expanding, the original outline had become disturbed. The three Cappadocian doctors, especially Nazianzen, are his chief guides. The writings of the Pseudo-Areopagite are also often referred to, and in particular the De Divin. Nominibus. In many cases the words are adopted, without any formal citation, as in the passage about Christ walking on the waters (cap. ii. sub fin.; De Div. Nom. cap. ii.). Want of space precludes any detailed analysis. He begins with a statement of the sufficiency of Holy Scripture, in which God has revealed to man all that is necessary for his salvation. This, as Langen points out, Joh. von Damaskus, p. 271, is partly supplemented, partly contradicted, by the statement elsewhere (De Imag. I. xxiii.; II. xvi.), to the effect that the gospel was at first diffused orally; and that thus, besides the written form in which it is now embodied, there was an unwritten tradition, from which the church derives her authority for such rites as the threefold immersion in baptism, praying towards the East, veneration of images, and the like. In treating of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, his language is in contrast with that found in the doubtful Barlaam and Joasaph, though he uses a form of the word προβολή, to which Athanasius had objected. His theory of God's predestination, as depending on His foreknowledge of man's co-operation (I. xxx.), is widely removed from that of Augustine. In bk. ii. ch. iv., and still more plainly at the very end of the work, he discusses the nature of that "fire" which will consume the wicked; pronouncing it to be not material, as earthly fire is, but "such as God knows," οὐχ ὑλικὸν οἶον τὸ παρ' ἡμῶν ἀλλ' οἶον ἂν εἶδει ὁ Θεός (p. 1228). In the Dialogus c. Manichaeos (§ 36, p. 1541), his language on this subject is yet more explicit. The absence of any reference to original sin has been pointed out as a grave defect in such a work (Tribbechov, de Doctolib. p. 281). As sacraments properly so called, or mysteries instituted by Christ, he recognises only two—Baptism (completed in confirmation) and the Holy Eucharist. About the other sacred rites, raised to that dignity from the time of Peter Lombard, he is either silent, or speaks with the indefiniteness of the Pseudo-Dionysius. In his treatment of the Eucharist, he teaches that the bread and wine are changed, through the invocation of the Holy Ghost, into the body and blood of Christ (IV. xiii.), but says nothing as to the manner of that change. There is thus, as Waterland pointed out (Works, ed. 1843, V. p. 205), no support given to the later doctrine of Transubstantiation. The virginity of the Mother of the Lord (IV. xiv.), and the position held by her; the veneration due to the Cross and to the holy icons (IV. xv.); the canon of Scripture (IV. xvii.), and others, are subjects handled by him in turn, of which a bare enumeration must suffice. In the way of secular knowledge, the detailed account of the heavenly bodies in bk. ii. ch. viii., recalls what his biographer had recorded of the progress made by him in astronomy. In the account of paradise (bk. ii. ch. ix.) he interprets the four rivers to be the Ganges, the Nile, the Tigris, and the Euphrates. Many controversial topics, such as the additions to the Trisagion, the twofold nature and will of Christ, and the like, need only be alluded to here, as they form the subject of separate treatises to be noticed later on.

II. De Imaginibus Orationes III. (πρὸς τοὺς διαβάλλοντας τὰς ἁγίας εἰκόνας: vol. i. pp. 1232–1420). The occasion which called forth these addresses has been spoken of already. After issuing his first edict in 727, Leo had a conference with the old patriarch Germanus, in the hope of bringing him over to his views. But finding him inflexible, and observing the mischief that divided opinions were fast beginning to produce, he issued in 730 his second and more stringent edict; forbidding now, not merely the idolatrous worship, but even the very use, of images in churches. On this Germanus resigned his office, and his syncellus, or secretary, Anastasius, was, with but a fortnight's delay, appointed in his stead. At some time after the issuing of the first edict, but before the appearance of the second, probably as soon as the news of what the emperor had done reached Damascus, John drew up his first protest (Oratio I.) in the form of a Λόγος ἀπολογητικός, or Defence of the Sacred Images, for circulation among the Christians of the empire. That it was before the resignation of Germanus became known, seems clear from the reference made to the patriarch as τῷ καλῷ ποιμένι τῆς λογικῆς Χριστοῦ ποιμνῆς (cap. 3); terms which would hardly have been applied to the imperial nominee, Anastasius. The second address (Oratio II.) must have been written after 730, for in it the writer speaks of Germanus as now deposed:—καὶ γὰρ ὁ μακάριος Γερμανὸς . . . ἐρραπίσθη καὶ ἐξόριστος γέγονε (cap. 12). The immediate cause of this second address, as he declares it at the outset, was the want of perspicuity in the first:—διὰ τὸ μὴ πάνυ εὐδιάγνωτον τοῖς πολλοῖς τὸν πρῶτον εἶναι. With many, perhaps, who were more within reach of the emperor's power than Damascus himself was, the difficulty experienced may have been, not so much in understanding the meaning of his arguments, as in deciding what practical course to take. The third (Oratio III.) is not much more than a repetition of what had been said before in the two previous ones. It must have followed quickly upon the heels of the second; for no anathema is as yet pronounced in it on the offending emperor; and we know that this was not long delayed, when the deposition of Germanus became public. Damascus throughout prays that the necessity for such a step may be averted. After citing the words of St. Paul (Galat. i. 8), and significantly inserting the name of king—"But though we, or an angel from heaven, or a king, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you"—"shut your ears," he winds up with, "for I shrink as yet from saying what the divine apostle said: Let him be accursed" (Or. iii. cap. 3, p. 1321). The genuineness of this third oration was disputed by Hody, on the ground of a later author (as he considered him), the chronicler Malelas, being cited among the authorities at the end. But the great uncertainty as to the date of that writer makes this only a weak argument. At the end of each address, Damascus gives a series of extracts from earlier Christian writers in support of his views. It is a significant circumstance that the first passage thus cited in all three is taken from the writings of the Pseudo-Areopagite: a proof of the influence exercised on these speculations by the mystic symbolism there found. As the arguments employed by Damascus have been summed up by Neander (ubi sup. pp. 286–290), they may be very briefly noticed here. He urges, that the prohibitions against idolatry, in the Old Testament, could have no force as applied to Christians; since they stood on higher ground, and were bidden to walk by the spirit, and not by the letter. If Solomon was directed to adorn the walls of the temple in Jerusalem with figures of living creatures, with flowers and fruit, how much more fitting was it to adorn the walls of Christian temples with figures of the saints! And if an opponent should reply, that the images of Christ and the Virgin Mother were sufficient for this purpose, was not this to dishonour His chosen servants, and to disparage that human nature which Christ had exalted by His Incarnation? In this, in truth, lay the difference between the old dispensation and the new. Under the old, no temple was dedicated to God in any man's name; no man's death was any other than an occasion of mourning. But now the memory of the saints was held in honour, so that the "mourning for a Jacob" was changed into the "rejoicing for a Stephen" (Or. i. cap. 21). Yet it was no divine honour, no latria, that was paid to these images by the faithful. To say so was a calumny: εἰ ὡς θεοῖς ἐλατρεύομεν, ὄντως ἡσεβούμεν (Or. ii. cap. 5). The image was but as a mirror, in which they could see, as "through a glass, darkly," the reflection of Him whom alone they worshipped: καὶ εἰκὼν δὲ ἔσοπτρὸν ἐστὶ καὶ ἀνίγμα, ἀρμόζον τῇ τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν παχύτητι (Or. iii. cap. 2). It may be noticed in passing that the text on which so much stress is laid by Romanists, adorate scabellum pedum ejus (Ps. xcvi. 5), is quoted by Damascenus (Or. i. cap. 27; iii. cap. 34), but without any special prominence.

III. De Recta Sententia Liber (Λιβέλλος περὶ ὀρθοῦ φρονήματος, vol. i. pp. 1421-1432). This is a formal profession of faith, followed by an abjuration of certain heresies. The occasion of it would not be very obvious, but for another title, preserved by Leo Allatius: ἴσον λιβέλλου ὑπαγορευθέντος ὑπὸ Ἰωάννου τοῦ Δαμασκηνοῦ, ἐπιδοθέν δὲ παρὰ Ἡλίας ἐπισκόπου Πέτρῳ μητροπολίτῃ Δαμασκού. From this it would appear to be a profession of faith, drawn up by Damascenus, for the use of some (Maronite) bishop named Elias, to be recited by the latter, on his reception into the orthodox church by Peter, metropolitan of Damascus. The convert swears, among other things, to have no communion with the Maronites (§ 8), which shews that these refugees were already regarded as heretical (Hardwick, Hist. of the Chr. Church, ed. 1861, p. 77 n). Agreeably with this, we find in another work of Damascenus the term Μαρωνίζεω applied to the crime of altering the Τρισάγιον:—καὶ ἡμεῖς Μαρωνίζομεν (al. παρωνήσομεν), προσθέμενοι τῷ Τρισάγιῳ τὴν σταύρωσιν. De Hymno Trisag. Epist. § 5. The mention of the last heresy (§ 7), as one "which had then been raised against the holy church of Christ," is thought by Le Quien to point to those called Christianocategori in the De Haeresib. Liber, that is, the Iconoclasts of Damascenus's own time. But the expression seems a very general one.

IV. Contra Jacobitas (vol. i. pp. 1436-1501). The Greek text of this piece is incomplete; one leaf of the Vatican MS., from which Le Quien reprinted it, being wanting. The deficiency (p. 1483) is partly remedied by a Latin version from an Arabic MS. of the same treatise. The title states it to be written by Damascenus in the name of Peter bishop of Damascus, to the so-called Jacobite bishop of Daraea (τοῦ Δαραίας, a safe emendation for Τουδαρίας: Daras, or Daraea, being, according to Le Quien, a town some six miles from Damascus). The object desired was the conversion of the latter to the orthodox faith. There is thus a certain correspondence between this piece and the one preceding; and had the name of the Jacobite bishop been Elias, it would have seemed highly probable that he was the one for whom Damascenus performed the counter office of inditing the De recta Sententia Liber. But the expression in § 1, where the metropolitan is made to speak of himself as smitten with anxiety for a kinsman and namesake (πρόφ τοῦ ὁμοφύλου καὶ τῆς ὁμωνυμίας βαλλόμενος), appears to indicate one bearing the name of Peter like himself. The Jacobites being Syrian Monophysites (Guericke, ubi sup. p. 370), the arguments are upon the twofold nature of Christ.

V. Dialogus contra Manichaeos (vol. i. pp. 1505-1584). This is in the form of a dialogue between Orthodoxus and Manichaeus. Its genuineness was doubted by Billius, a former editor of Damascenus's works, on the ground that the writer speaks of the fire, with which the wicked will be tormented, as not material fire, but the unquenchable flame of sinful desire, ever raging, ever baffled: ἡ κόλασις ἐκεῖνη οὐδὲν ἔτερον ἐστίν, εἰ μὴ πῦρ ἐπιθυμίας τῆς κακίας καὶ ἁμαρτίας, καὶ πῦρ ἀστοχίας τῆς ἐπιθυμίας (§ 36, p. 1541). But, though Damascenus might be led into some extreme in this direction, to avoid unnecessary offence to the anti-materialist principles of his opponent, there is no contradiction between the view taken above, and that set forth in the closing chapter of the De Fide. And as if to set all doubt at rest, the canon appointed for the saint's commemoration-day in the Greek church (Dec. 4th), records his having combated the doctrines of the Manichaeans. Damascenus was not alone among the early teachers of the church, in holding this view, as may be seen from a glance at the authors named by Sixtus Senensis (Biblioth., 1610, pp. 338, 376). Not only this, but several others of the topics under discussion, have a fresh interest for us at the present day, when the question of the Manichee is being repeated: "If God is good, why does he punish the wicked in the future state, and not rather annihilate him?" (§ 45, p. 1548). The theory of an antecedent and a consequent will in God (§ 79, p. 1577), by which His foreknowledge is vindicated from the charge of being a cause of evil, is also worth attention.

VI. Disputatio Christiani et Saraceni (vol. i. pp. 1585-1597, with which might be joined the dialogue under the same title in the Addenda, vol. iii. pp. 1336-1348). For the first of these Le Quien had no Greek text, and was obliged to adapt to the Latin version, in which form alone the Dialogue was known to him, detached passages of Greek, drawn from the writings of Theodorus Abucara, a disciple of Damascenus. The Dialogue as now given in a Greek dress, from a MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna, is shorter than the original of the Latin version would appear to have been, beginning with the question at the commencement of § 7 of the latter. But both end alike, with the Saracen's defeat. A short dialogue by Abucara himself, on the same subject, is printed by Le Quien at the end of the first Disputatio (vol. i. p. 1596). The objections of a Mohammedan to the doctrine of the Incarnation are met (iii. 1340), and the alternative put to him, whether the Word of God (of which the Koran itself speaks) was created or uncreated. If he should reply uncreated, then the Word was God; if created, then there must have been a time when God was without a Word (ib. 1341). Damascenus had used the same argument before (De Haeres. vol. i. p. 768); and had also retorted upon the Mohammedans their own idolatry at the Χαβαθάν, or Kaaba, and the glaring fictions in the writings of their prophet.

VII. De Draconibus et Strygibus (Περὶ δρακόντων and Περὶ στρυγγῶν, vol. i. pp. 1600-1604). These appear to be two short fragments from some larger work. They were sent to Le Quien by Montfaucon, from a MS. of no great antiquity; but their genuineness has not been questioned. The author is combating popular superstitions about dragons and vampires; a novel aspect in which to contemplate Damascenus. His subject might remind us of Sir Thomas Browne's chapters on "popular and received tenets concerning animals;" but the method of treatment, it need not be said, is very different. As to the dragons, he argues that no doubt there are such creatures, but they are neither more nor less than huge snakes. In illustration of this, he cites Dion Cassius's account of the one that met Regulus and his army in Africa, 120 feet long. As to the notion that they were in a special degree a mark for thunderbolts (ὅτι ὑπὸ τῆς βροντῆς διόκεται ὁ δράκων), the lightning strikes all alike. And this gives him an occasion to speak of the phenomena of lightning and thunder. The Stryges or Stryngæ (Στρίγγαι), also called Geludes, were imaginary beings, supposed to appear in female form, and strangle children, or suck their blood (τὴν οἰκονομίαν, their "inside"). The line of argument taken in reply must strike us as a singular one. It is, that none but Christ could enter in this way through closed doors; and to affirm such stories as these would be to make a wretched sorcerer, a μάγος γυνή καὶ αἰσχρά, do as much as Christ.

VIII. De Sancta Trinitate (vol. ii. pp. 9-17). A short catechism, in the form of question and answer, on the Holy Trinity. The twofold nature and incarnation of the Second Person are the points chiefly discussed. Damascenus has handled the same subject more at large in the third book of the De Fide. One passage deserves notice as indirectly illustrating Philipp. ii. 5 (οὐχ ἄρα γινόμεν ἡγήσατο κ.τ.λ.), namely, that before Christ's incarnation He was known to the angels only; but after that, to mankind as well, and thus His glory was increased by His humiliation (§ 4, p. 15).

IX. De Hymno Trisagio Epistola (vol. ii. pp. 21-61). This is a letter addressed to the archimandrite Jordanes on the subject of the Tersanctus. Damascenus had been informed by letter from the abbat Sergius, that Anastasius, abbat of the monastery of St. Euthymius, had brought forward some passages from the Fathers, which seemed to countenance the innovation of Peter Fullo, in ascribing the Tersanctus to Christ alone. Worse than this, Anastasius had claimed Damascenus himself as an authority for this view. Shocked at such a discovery, Damascenus writes to the archimandrite to disclaim such an imputation, and to reiterate the arguments for the thrice-repeated Doxology being applicable to none other than the whole three Persons of the Blessed Trinity. The original Trisagion or Tersanctus, consisted simply of the words in Isai. vi. 3, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord of Hosts" (Constit. Apost. viii. 15, ed. 1564, f. 136). The Monophysite party strove to procure the addition to this of the formula ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς, or ὁ ἐσταυρωθῆς. Peter Gnaphnes, or Fullo, was particularly active in trying to carry this measure at Antioch, where he was reinstated patriarch in 485. Hence Damascenus speaks in this letter of the mischief he had been the means of introducing: τὴν ἐκ τοῦ Κραφέως κακίᾳ ἐπεισφρήσασαν λύμην (p. 24). The importance attached to the subject was shewn by the popular tumults occasioned by it in Constantinople, and by the fact that the anathema of Felix II., issued against Acacius in 484 as a result of his attempted compromise, was the final act by which the communion between the Eastern and Western churches was broken off. (Gieseler, ii. 91.)

X. De Sacris Jejuniis (vol. ii. pp. 64-77).—This is a letter to a monk named Cometas, on the subject of the Lenten fast. It had come to Cometas's ears that his correspondent approved of the lengthened fast of eight weeks before Easter, instead of seven, and he writes to ask for an explanation (§ 2). Damascenus replies that this is not the case, but that the peace of the church should not be disturbed by such trifles, as he evidently considers this to be. Those who advocated eight weeks had a certain reason on their side; for as the Saturday and Sunday in each week had to be deducted, there would be left the exact number of forty days. Some of Damascenus's remarks are conceived in a true spirit of Christian charity, and accord well with the passage he quotes from St. Paul (Rom. xiv. 3).—On the varying duration of the Lent fast at different periods, and the uncertainty as to the origin of the very name Quadragesima, see Bingham, Antiqq. bk. xxi. ch. i.

XI. De Octo Spiritibus Nequitiae, and de Virtute et Vitio (vol. ii. pp. 80-97).—Of these two short pieces, the first is a letter to some monk, whose name is not given, and the second a kind of appendix to it. It is possible that the two may have been originally portions of one connected whole, as the latter begins abruptly (p. 85) without any form of address, while towards the end (p. 97) the resumption of the second person (εἰ βούλει δέ, κ.τ.λ.) seems to betoken the continuation of a letter. In the first portion, a summary is given of the eight vices by which a monk is chiefly liable to be beset:—gluttony, evil concupiscence, covetousness, and the rest; together with the means by which they may be overcome. Damascenus, in writing this, seems to have had the institutes of Joannes Cassianus before his eyes. The title of that which follows, reminds us of the doubtful treatise ascribed to Aristotle, de Virtutibus et Vitiis. In this, Damascenus classifies virtues and vices according to the twofold nature of man. Long lists of both are given; the number in the Latin translation, it may be observed, not coinciding with that in the Greek. The old prejudice against the use of the bath is noticeable in the reckoning of ἀλουσία (p. 88) among the corporeal virtues. A French essayist makes the obvious remark on this, that Damascenus would not have been likely to oppose the canonisation of an Elizabeth of Hungary. (Perrier, Jean Damascène, sa Vie et ses Ecrits, 1862, p. 14.)

XII. De Institutione Elementari (Εἰσαγωγή δογμάτων στοιχειώδης, vol. ii. pp. 100-112). This treatise, though ending abruptly, as if incomplete, would form a useful introduction to the study of Damascenus. It was written at an earlier period than the works composing the Fons Scientiæ, and bears somewhat the same relation to the polemical tracts against Monophysites, Monotheletes, and Nestorians that follow, as the Capita Philosophica does to the De Haeresibus Liber. It is addressed to John bishop of Laodicea, and begins with definitions of the terms most used in controversy with the Monophysites. The latter made φύσις, ὑπόστασις, and ἄξιον to be synonymous. Damascenus here distinguishes them, as the synod of Chalcedon had done (cf. Gieseler, ubi sup. p. 87 n.).

XIII. De Natura Composita contra Acephalos (vol. ii. pp. 112-125).—The title shews this to be similar in subject to No. iv. noticed above. The Acephali, or "headless," were the extreme Monophysite party in Egypt, so called as having separated from their patriarch, Peter Mongus, of Alexandria, who had subscribed the Henoticon. (Guericke, ubi sup. p. 362).

XIV. De Duabus in Christo Voluntatibus (vol. ii. pp. 128-185).—The long secondary title of this piece shews that the two natures, as well as the two wills, of Christ are treated of; and hence it may be looked on as directed against Monophysite, as well as Monothelete, doctrines. It has already been mentioned that the term Monothelete is said to have been first used by Damascenus. In this treatise he enunciates clearly the position of the Catholic or Dyothelete body, namely, that in Christ the Divine will operated through the human, as through an instrument (ἡ θεία ἐνήργει αὐτοῦ θέλησις κ.τ.λ. § 42). We may observe also how he builds on the preparatory teaching given in the Institutio elementaris. Taking up, for example, the definition of ἰδιώματα, or properties, there laid down, he argues that Christ could not be perfect God, unless He had all the idiomata of Godhead, Divine will included; nor perfect man, unless He had all the idiomata of man, human will included; whence the co-existence of two wills in Christ must follow.

XV. Adversus Nestorianos (vol. ii. pp. 188-224).—As the preceding treatises were chiefly written to prove the true humanity of Christ, so this was written to establish His divinity, and by consequence, the title of the Blessed Virgin to be called Θεοτόκος, or Mother of God. It was the reiteration of this epithet by theologians in Constantinople that had provoked the spirit of Nestorius himself (circ. 430). Damascenus contends that whilst the term Christipara, by which Nestorians sought to replace it, was true and appropriate in itself, it did not express the whole truth, and therefore the other ought to be all the more insisted on (§ 43). He appeals to the Nicene Creed, which he cites at length (§ 35) in support of his views. In one passage (§ 2, p. 190) he uses a comparison which might make one think he had before his mind's eye the manufacture of sword-blades, for which his city became so famous. As a sword, he says, which has the nature of iron, acquires the nature of fire when heated in the forge, without losing that of iron, so Christ took by His Incarnation that human flesh subsisting (ἐνυπόστατον) which He bore without losing His divinity.

XVI. Fragmenta (vol. ii. pp. 225-245).

(1) A section found in one MS. at the end of the De duabus Voluntatibus. It is against the Monophysite argument, that, if man consisted of two natures, body and soul, and if Christ was

God and man, He therefore must consist of three natures: Godhead, soul, and body. It begins with an invective against the monk Severus, who became patriarch of Alexandria, and whose Monophysite agitation at Constantinople had stirred up popular tumults (Guericke, ut sup. p. 363). The subscription at the end (p. 228) calls the author John Mandar, and his work Πάνδεκτος. The title of the work may perhaps have reference to the encyclopaedic nature of the De Fide, where the same argument is treated (bk. iii. cap. 16). The name Mandar is probably a corruption of Mansour, and may be compared with the form Makur, said to be found in a MS. in the Cambridge University Library, and explained in the catalogue as Μακάριος (Cat. of the MSS. vol. iii. pp. 628-9).

(2-9) Fragments of no importance; the last two being from a catena on St. Luke iii. 13.

(10) Detached passages on the months, as reckoned by various nations. The word γάρ at the beginning shews it to be a fragment of some larger work.

(11) Canon Paschalis, a table to find Easter. This was printed from the Computus of Isaacus Argyrus (circ. 1373). Isaac refers the composition of it to A.D. 765, but this is not certain. Petavius thinks the occasion of it might have been the discussions in the nineteenth year of Copronymus's reign (A.D. 759), as to the true date of the festival.

(12) Quid est Homo? A fragment of a letter, the text of which is very corrupt. It begins by defining man as a ζῶον λογικόν, κ.τ.λ., and then speaks of the four humours, their place and effects in the body. It ends in the middle of a sentence.

XVII. De his qui in Fide dormierunt (Περὶ τῶν ἐν πίστει κοιμημένων. Vol. ii. pp. 248-277). The genuineness of this treatise has been disputed. The subject is the benefit which the departed may receive from the prayers of the living. It might have been expected, therefore, that the dispute as to authorship would be affected by the nature of the subject; and that Romanists would chiefly be found on one side, Protestants on the other. But in the present case, we find writers like Suarez, Bellarmine, and Le Quien himself, deciding against the genuineness of the work; partly on the ground of the "enormes fabulae" which it contains, and partly because it does not accord with Damascenus's avowed opinions as we find them in the De Fide. The "fabulae" referred to are such as those we find in § 9 of the deliverance from Hades of Falconilla, by the prayers of Thecla; or in § 16 of the like deliverance of the emperor Trajan by the intercession of pope Gregory; or in § 10 of the oracular skull which Macarius used to consult. As Vossius says (De Histor. Gr. lib. ii. c. 24), we must regard Damascenus as "in plerisque credulus," unless we reject the treatise as spurious. No doubt the latter is the right alternative. We find no reference to this treatise in the Supplement. Tert. Partis of Aquinas, where we might most have expected it. Its teaching contravenes that which we find as the acknowledged teaching of Damascenus in the De Fide (bk. ii. c. 4): namely, that as the angels, after their fall, had no place of repentance, neither have men after death. The style, it may be added, is not like that of the undisputed works. The way of citing authors, which in Damascenus does occasionally savour of grandiloquence, is altogether overdone (as in the case of St. Chrysostom, § 6). The introduction, moreover, of a long passage in very poor iambs (p. 257), seems unworthy of the reputed author.

XVIII. De Confessione, necnon Potestate Ligandi et Solvendi (vol. ii. pp. 284-304). This piece was printed by Le Quien from a copy sent him by Dr. Thomas Gale, with a Latin translation also by him. It is in the form of a letter, in reply to some one who had written to enquire what right monks, not being in priestly orders, had to hear confessions and grant absolution. By the ninth paragraph, however, the writer uses the plural, "brethren," as though forgetting his special correspondent. Le Quien doubts the genuineness of the letter, on the ground that Damascenus makes one of the heretical tenets of the Messalians to be their professing to give absolution without priestly authority—ἀνευ ἱερέως ἀθευτείας (vol. i. p. 733). As to the prevalence of the practice itself, there seems to be no doubt. John, patriarch of Antioch (circ. 1090) testifies to its having prevailed for 400 years before his time, and says that the iconoclastic persecutions drove people, in retaliation, to pay this honour to monks.

XIX. Adversus Constantinum Cabalinum (vol. ii. pp. 309-344). A λόγος ἀποδεικτικός, or demonstration, against the emperor Constantine Copronymus (for his sobriquet of Caballinus, see the Dict. of Biogr. and Mythol.), on behalf of the holy images. It is generally admitted not to be the work of Damascenus. The writer speaks of Germanus (§ 20) as his own bishop (τοῦ ἀρχιερέως καὶ ποιμένου ἡμῶν Γερμανοῦ), when relating the incident which gained the emperor his disgraceful surname of Copronymus. This, it is argued, would befit a monk of Constantinople, but not of Damascus or Jerusalem. The style also is unlike that of Damascenus, and inferior to it, exhibiting barbarous compound words, specimens of which are given by Le Quien. That it was written after 754 is shown by the allusion to the synod held in that year, and to the emperor's compliant patriarch, Constantine (754-766), whom he miscalls phatriarch ("Φῆ nota foetoris"), § 15, in keeping with a fashion that has been before referred to.

XX. Epistola ad Theophilum Imperatorem (vol. ii. pp. 345-385). As Theophilus was emperor of Constantinople from 829 to 842, it is obvious that this letter was written by some one who lived nearly a century after the time of Damascenus. Its subject, a defence of image-worship, probably caused it to be inserted among his writings. It is thought by some to be the address mentioned by Constantine Porphyrogenetus as drawn up in the joint name of the three Eastern patriarchs—Christopher of Alexandria, Job of Antioch, and Basil of Jerusalem. The traditional account of our Lord's personal appearance (§ 3), and other passages in this letter, are interesting; but as the author is manifestly not Damascenus, they do not further concern us.

XXI. De Azymis (vol. ii. pp. 387-396). Two short pieces are given under this title, the first being an abstract of the second. Their subject is, the question whether Christ instituted the sacrament of the Lord's Supper with leavened or unleavened bread. Whoever may have written the brief introduction, it is plain that the bulk of the tract is not Damascenus's, but the work of some Meletius: καὶ Μελέτιος δέ τις . . . γράφει πρὸς αὐτὸν οὐτωςί. The writer contends that leavened bread must have been used, for one reason, because unleavened bread was not properly bread at all, as lacking the elements of leaven and salt, which answer mystically to soul and mind. He uses some words of interest to the lexicographer, such as κουλλίκιον (p. 389), which he says was the children's way of pronouncing κολλύριον (or κολλίκιον?) a cake of unleavened bread.

XXII. De Corpore et Sanguine Christi (vol. ii. pp. 401-412). This consists of an introductory letter, followed by a κεφάλαιον, or summary, on the same subject. Le Quien, who maintains it not to be the work of John of Damascus, has given the title as found in one Paris MS., which, if admitted, would dispose of the question at once. That represents the author to be Peter Mansour, and not John: τοῦ ἀγιωτάτου Πέτρου τοῦ Μανσοῦρ πρὸς Ζαχαρίαν ἐπίσκοπον Δοδάρων. What Peter it might be, supposing the title to be correct, is not agreed. One reason for thinking it not to be Damascenus's, is the dignified tone with which the letter begins: σημαίνωμεν τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ ἀγάπῃ, κ. τ. λ., a style befitting one bishop, when writing to another, but unlike the tone of humility, almost of deprecation, with which Damascenus generally commences. But the real point at issue is, whether the opinion here held as to the corruptibility of Christ's Body could possibly have been held by the author of the De Fide. The writer holds that Christ instituted the sacrament of the Eucharist before His resurrection, because up to that time His Body was capable of a certain corruption; but "the Body incorruptible through the resurrection is not broken, nor eaten, nor drunk; nor does the incorruptible Body possess blood" (§ 2. p. 408). This, it is urged, is clean contrary to what we read in the De Fide, bk. iv. c. 1: ὡς αὐτὴ ἐστὶν ἡ σὰρξ ἡ παθούσα καὶ ἀναστίασα (ubi legend. ἡ αὐτὴ?). Waterland (ubi sup. p. 200), endeavours to fasten it upon Damascenus, thinking that the external evidences for it outweigh "the slight suspicions drawn from the internal characters."

XXIII. Fragmenta Dubia (vol. ii. pp. 412-418). Two short passages, found in some MSS. as interpolations in Bk. iii. c. 3, and Bk. iii. c. 7, of the De Fide. Le Quien thinks they may be the glosses of some annotator.

XXIV. Expositio Fidei (vol. ii. pp. 417-438). A treatise of which the original Greek is not to be found. The present Latin translation was made from an Arabic version existing in MS. in Paris. From its similarity of tone and manner to acknowledged works of Damascenus, especially the De Recta Sententia, no doubt is entertained as to its authorship. The Arabic translator would seem, however, to have added something of his own in the passage: "Enimvero non convenit naturam divinam geniturae expertem esse, ulliusve perfectionis. Quo enim pacto, qui genitura destitutus sit, perfectus fuerit?" (§ 3). This savours more of the Mohammedan, than of the author of the chapter De Virginitate. The language in which evil is spoken of (§ 5), as a defect closely resembles that used by Dionysius on the same subject.

At the end of the Expositio Fidei Le Quien prints a short fragment, in a Latin version, taken from the same Arabic manuscript as the above. It belongs to one of the Iconoclastic addresses, though not corresponding very closely to any of the extant ones.

XXV. Loci Selecti in Epistolas S. Pauli (vol. ii. pp. 441-1033). According to the title, ἐκ τῆς καθολοῦ ἐρμηνείας Ἰωάννου τοῦ Χρυσσοστόμου ἐκλογαὶ ἐκλεγείσαι, the selected passages are taken from the various homilies of St. Chrysostom. The majority of them are so; but on some of the epistles—those to the Ephesians, Philipians, Colossians, and Thessalonians—the commentary given is not from that father. It might thus seem as if Damascenus had felt the greater value of Chrysostom's homilies on Romans and Corinthians, as compared with those written by him on the other epistles. In what is not from Chrysostom, Theodoret and Cyril of Alexandria are said to be the authors from whom most is taken. But in some passages, the comment must be either Damascenus's own, or at any rate that of some writer subsequent to the rise of Nestorianism. Thus, as Le Quien points out, the note on Col. ii. 9 (p. 893), respecting the indwelling of the Godhead in Christ, expressly denies it to be merely σχετικὴν, a term used by that party. In its present form, the commentary is arranged in short paragraphs following the detached portions of the text to which they refer. Their shortness, as compared with the long dissertations of St. Chrysostom, makes it probable that in the first instance they were written opposite the text in some MS.; a later transcriber breaking them up for arrangement in their present order. A close scrutiny of the text of the epistle might bring to light some various readings of interest (one such, noticed in passing, is χορηγοῦν for ἐπιχορηγοῦμενον, Col. ii. 19); especially as the MS. from which Le Quien printed the work is of respectable antiquity, being, as he conjectures, of about 800 A.D.

XXVI. Sacra Parallela (Ἱερὰ παράλληλα, vol. ii. p. 1040—vol. iii. p. 441) and Parallela Rupefucaldina (vol. iii. 441-544). The general nature of these works may be easily described. They consist of detached sentences from Holy Writ, followed by illustrative passages, from other parts of Scripture or from the fathers, arranged in an alphabetical order, for which some leading word in the sentence is a guide. Thus, under λοιδορία will be quoted Prov. x. 19, οἱ ἐκφέροντες λοιδορίας, κ.τ.λ. Sometimes the general sense of a passage is gathered up into one word, not actually occurring in that passage, as 1 Tim. vi. 3-6 is classed under οἱ λογομαχοῦντες. For convenience of finding what is wanted, there is an alphabetical index at the beginning, and at the end of the group under each letter are παραπομπαί, or cross-references, as a further guide. The author tells us in his preface that he had arranged the work at first, not in alphabetical sequence, but in three books, according to the general subject of each: the first being on God and the Holy Trinity; the second on human affairs; and the third specially on virtues and vices (p. 1041). But though the plan of the work is thus easy to describe, its actual contents present many difficulties. As originally conceived by Damascenus, the design seems to have been, to limit the collection to sentences from Holy Writ, moral, gnomic, and didactic (ὄσα ἠθικῶς ἢ γνομικῶς ἢ παραινετικῶς, ἰδ.), and to an anthology of illustrative passages from the fathers of the church (τὰ περὶ τούτων σποράδην κείμενα ἀποφθέγματα ἠθολόγηται). His intended title is also given by him (p. 1044) as simply τὰ ἱερὰ. This design has been altered and encroached upon, by himself at a later time, or by others, in various ways. In a short prologue which stands before the preface (p. 1039), and which reads more like the statement of one who had made an epitome of Damascenus's own work, the selection is limited to virtues and vices (παρὰλλήλους θέντες τὰς ἀρετὰς, καὶ τὰς ἀντιῦγους . . . αὐτῶν κακίας). Moreover, in a kind of postscript to it, and in a similar one found at the end of the longer preface (p. 1044), it is mentioned that extracts from Philo and Josephus have been inserted; a thing plainly contrary to the author's original intention. In fact, in the list of authors quoted throughout the Parallela, drawn up by Fabricius, we find the names of Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and most of the chief classical authors of Greece. It should be said, however, that by far the greatest number of quotations is taken from Chrysostom, the two Gregories (of Nazianzus and Nyssa), and Basil. We may thus perhaps be right in concluding, that a collection of this kind has been treated as common property, and that the student or transcriber has added or omitted as he thought fit. This will explain the differences found in the Parallela Rupefucaldina, so called as being taken from a MS. given by cardinal Rochefoucauld to the Jesuits' college at Clermont; in which are passages written apparently by one living a century earlier than Damascenus, that is, under the reign of Heraclius (611-641). Such at any rate is the interpretation put by Le Quien upon the writer's comment on Ezek. xii. 2, where he says that such an affliction as befel Israel in the carrying away of their holy things, had now fallen on Christendom; for that the destructive factions of the blue and green (on which see Gibbon, ch. xl.) had ended in the Holy Cross and the church of the resurrection falling into the hands of the infidel (vol. iii. p. 472). This, and a similar allusion (p. 474, under Hosea iv. 1-3), is understood by the editor to refer to the invasion of Syria by Chosroes in the beginning of Heraclius's reign, when the True Cross, as was said, was carried away into Persia. And hence he considers the Parall. Rupefucaldina, while in the main Damascenus's own work, to have been interpolated by some one from an older writer, living in the time of Heraclius. On account of its being substantially the same work, only portions of the Parall. Rupefucald. are printed by Le Quien, to serve as specimens.

XXVII. Homiliae (vol. iii. pp. 545-816). These are thirteen in number, counting two fragments. The genuineness of all of them is contested by Oudin (de Script. Eccl. Comment. i. p. 1780). They are:—

(1) Hom. in Transfigurationem Domini. Delivered on the festival of the Transfiguration, in the church erected on Mount Tabor in memory of that event. The words of the Psalmist: "Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name," are made prophetic of the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, which Hermon overlooked, and of His glorification on the western mountain (§ 3). The language is exuberant, but often striking. What can be more beautiful than the brief comment on Christ's leading the disciples apart to pray: μήτηρ γὰρ τῆς προσευχῆς ἡ ἡσυχία (§ 10)? He disclaims, indeed, all desire to set before his hearers a discourse "luxuriant with the arts of Grecian eloquence" (§ 5); but the very luxuriance of his diction reminds us that the orator is Chrysorrhoeas; or, if not he, one closely imitating his style.

(2) In Ficū arefactam. On the withered fig-tree. In the title, the author is termed "Priest of the holy church of the Resurrection;" whence, if Damascenus be indeed the one meant, we may suppose it was delivered by him when an inmate of the monastery near Jerusalem. There is not the same impetuosity of language as in the preceding, though the difference of subject might in part account for that.

(3) In sanctam Parasceven. A sermon for Good Friday. Some former editors had assigned this to St. Chrysostom; and as such it is included in the edition of Sir Henry Savile. It is noticeable as containing a proverb, or what appears to be such, of which no explanation has been found. Speaking of the scrupulous care of the Jews not to enter the Praetorium, lest they should be disqualified for eating the passover, he adds:—"They are cautious not to be defiled, when they are already defiled; προβάτω τὸ πρόβατον λύντες" (§ 4).

(4) In Sabbatum sanctum. For Holy Saturday. This is the longest of the homilies, and in other respects an important one. After speaking of the associations of the day (§ 3), the preacher takes occasion from the pause and suspension, as it were, of Christ's work, then commemorated, to pass in review the mysteries of God's existence, of man's creation, of the fall, of the Incarnation. This takes him over ground on which his footsteps are familiar to us; and we have passages about the divine Hypostases (§ 4), and the will and energy of Christ (§ 12) that sound like echoes of the De Fide. In the exuberant flow of words there is much that resembles the first homily, especially where he is describing the works of creation (§ 5) with the firmament τῶν μεταρσῶν τε καὶ ἀβύσσων ὑδάτων μεταχίμων, and the blazing sun, ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτὸς διτλοδρόμον ἐργάτην. His language on the μεταποίησις in the Holy Eucharist (§ 35) is also noticeable.

(4*) In Annuntiationem B. V. Mariæ. This is given in a Latin version only, made from an Arabic translation of the original. The Greek text is not to be found. Being very imperfect, it has been reckoned as one of the two fragments at the beginning of this list.

(5) In Annuntiationem B. V. Mariæ. An oration, unique of its kind among those ascribed to Damascenus; almost every sentence beginning with the word of salutation, Χαίρε, Hail! The repetition becomes yet more wearisome, when, through one long section, every sentence begins with Χαίρε ὅτι τέτοκας, and afterwards Χαίρε ὅτι γεγέννηκας. There are three distinct historical allusions in it (p. 657), which may help to fix the date. The preacher pours forth his gratitude to the Virgin, because through her (1) they worshipped the holy images, (2) the Roman empire was at peace, (3) the barbarian dog Ishmael (i.e. the Saracen) was cut down with the sword. This plainly indicates a time of peace, or success in war, and would not suit the latter part of Damascenus's life. Hence, Le Quien would place it near the beginning of Leo's reign, when Hidjram had ascended the throne of the Khalifs (circ. 723). But it might be an equally fair inference to conclude, with Oudin, that it is the work of some writer a century later than Damascenus.

(6, 7) In Nativitatem B. V. Mariæ.—Le Quien makes no question about the genuineness of these two homilies. Oudin thinks the occasion of them a proof that they cannot be the work of Damascenus, since the festival in honour of the nativity of the Blessed Virgin was not instituted till a century later. The profusion of quotations from scripture is noticeable in these, as in others of the present series, and the ingenuity with which an allegorical meaning is extracted from passages in the Old Testament is often striking. But to a western mind there is something almost painfully overstrained in the endless repetition of such images as: Ἦ ζεύγος λογικῶν τρυγόνων Ἰσαακὲμ καὶ Ἄννα (p. 669), or the ever-varying allusions to the unbroken virginity of the mother of the Lord. At § 7 of the second homily (p. 689), begins a succession of Χαίρε sentences, like those in No. 5.

(8-10) In Dormitionem B. V. Mariæ. The authorship of these three homilies is doubtful. Cave (Script. Eccl. i. 625) argues that the second, at any rate, cannot be the work of Damascenus, since there is a mention in it of Euthymius's History (§ 18, p. 748). Combes is of the same opinion. Fabricius replies, that the objection is not valid, since the Euthymius quoted is not the one who lived under Alexius, but an earlier writer who died A.D. 473. A long extract from this "Euthymiac History," whose ever it may be, is given towards the end of the second homily; relating how the empress Pulcheria (414-453), being anxious to learn what was the last resting-place of the Blessed Virgin, sent to Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, to enquire; and was informed by him of the accepted tradition, which is then set forth. A translation of part of this will be found in the Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 269, where is also given an account of the rise and development of the cultus of the Virgin Mary. A detailed account of the same will further be found in Gieseler (ubi sup. ii. p. 313, n.). The first homily is in a more temperate and self-restrained style than the second; in which the preacher (§ 4) imagines himself transported to the scene of the Assumption, and portrays, in long detail, the objects with which his eyes or his thoughts were occupied. Even here, he cannot leave out a passing allusion to the δύο φύσεις and δύο ἐνεργείας with which men's minds had been so absorbed. One passage (p. 733) recalls the writer of the Hom. in Ficū arefactam; namely, where he compares the reception of the incarnate son of God into the womb of the Virgin, to the reception of fire by straw, glorifying, not consuming, it (cf. p. 577). He is careful, at the same time, to guard against being supposed to pay divine honour to the Virgin: οὐ θεὸν ταύτην φημι ὄντες ἄπαγε, τῆς Ἐλληνικῆς περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα μυθεύματα (Hom. ii. § 16, p. 744). The third homily, like the first, is short and of little importance compared to the second.

(11) Laudatio S. Joannis Chrysostomi. An

encomium upon St. Chrysostom. If the author were really John of Damascus, he might be thought to allude to his own surname of Chrysorroas, when he says at the beginning that those who would attempt to set forth the praises of the "golden-mouthed" should pour forth a golden stream of oratory (λόγον προφέρειν χρυσόροον). With an inveterate reminiscence of the controversies of the time, he commends St. Chrysostom (§ 3) for upholding the true doctrine of the Hypostases, and the distinctions of will in Christ. The special references to the saint's history begin with § 8. We are there told of his birth of a good family at Antioch, of his baptism about the age of eighteen (an earlier age than that commonly given, but agreeing with the date of A.D. 354 assigned for his birth by Cave), his being ordained Reader at the age of thirty, and so on, much as we find in the ordinary accounts of his life. (Dict. of Chr. Biogr. i. p. 518). The style is highly ornate and figurative. In one passage, for instance, after relating Chrysostom's removal from Antioch to the capital, he adds, καὶ τὴν θυγάτρα τοῦ μεγάλου ἀρχιερέως νυμφεύεται. And we have to recall the words of Ps. xlv. 13, to see the meaning to be, that Chrysostom left his father's house and his own people of Antioch, to espouse this "king's daughter," the imperial church of Constantinople.

(12) Laudatio S. Barbarae Martyris. It would be difficult to believe that this is really the work of Damascenus. The "enormes fabulae" which discredited a previous treatise (xvii.) are as nothing compared to what we find here. It reads, in fact, more like a Greek version of one of the Legenda aurea than anything else. Langen, however, Johannes von Damaskus, p. 238, is inclined to accept the panegyric as one really delivered by him. The inserted ῥησίν, with which the narrative begins, may imply that Damascenus is only repeating the account left by another. St. Barbara is represented as the only daughter of a provincial governor named Dioscorus, in the reign of Maximianus II., A.D. 305-311. To guard her beauty from danger, she was kept immured in a lofty tower (§ 7), where, though her father was an idolater, she grew in every Christian grace. By and by, being required to choose among the suitors for her hand, she sternly refused them all, as already espoused to Christ. On this, her father's affection changes to fury. He pursues her with a drawn sword: at the critical moment, a rocky mountain-side, less stony-hearted than himself, opens its breast to receive and shelter her from his fury. But, nothing daunted, he crosses the mountain, to find her on the other side (§ 10). She is dragged back again; and details of her various tortures, and miraculous deliverances, till at length she falls beneath her father's sword (§ 17), fill the rest of the panegyric. She and St. Juliana repose side by side, and the ruthless parent, on his return, is consumed by lightning. The scene is said to have been near Euchaita (?) in Paphlagonia.

(13) A fragment found in a catena on St. Luke, i. 35, being apparently an extract, with some alterations, from the first homily on the Nativity (Migne, vol. iii. p. 664).

XXVIII. Preces tres (vol. iii. pp. 816-7). Three prayers, for use before the Holy Eucharist, taken from a Greek horologium. The word πᾶλλων in the second, if not corrupt, is a noticeable one.

XXIX. Carmina (vol. iii. 817-856) and Hymni (iii. pp. 1364-1408). Under these two headings are included the canons, or prose hymns, as well as the metrical ones. The first of the two groups, including all those printed by Le Quien, contain the following: (1) Three hymns in iambic metre, on the Theogonia, or Birth of Christ, the Theophania, or Epiphany, and the Pentecost, of which the authorship of the last is a little uncertain; (2) four canons, on Easter, the Ascension, the Transfiguration, and the Annunciation; and (3) a prayer in anacreontics. The second group, containing the additional ones printed by Migne, includes (1) a canon on the passing of the Virgin Mary; (2) stanzas (Idiomela) from the funeral office; and (3) six canons found by Cardinal Mai in a MS. in the Vatican, chiefly filled with portions of Homer, Hesiod, and the like, and published by him in the Spicilegium Romanum. Their titles are: In S. Basilium, In S. Chrysostomum, In S. Nicolaum, In S. Petrum, In S. Georgium, and In S. Blasium. We have thus preserved to us, in all, four pieces in classical metres; one set of verses on no fixed pattern, known as Idiomela; and eleven canons or hymns in rhythmical prose. The number might, it is certain, be largely increased. Those in iambic metre are acrostichal; that is to say, at the beginning of each stands a quaternion of elegiacs, summing up the contents of the piece; and the iambic verses then begin, each in turn, with the letters composing the words of these capitulary lines. The device was no doubt found convenient for recitation by memory. There is much room for critical emendation in the hymns. In the second, for example, on the Epiphany (p. 825), the verse that should begin with  $\phi$ , to correspond with that letter in θεοφωγγεῖ, really begins with the word  $\Theta\lambda\acute{\alpha}\nu$ ; the one that should begin with  $\xi$ , to answer to the  $\xi$  in  $\Phi\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\xi\alpha\varsigma$ , begins with the word Προφήτης, and so on. It need not be said that the iambs would not stand the test of classical rules. They scan, indeed, rather arithmetically than metrically. Even if we allowed accent to take the place of quantity, it would be difficult to perceive the rhythm in many cases. Still, the text is in a manifestly imperfect state; the line last referred to, for instance, being Προφήτης ἐγκάτοις φλοιδόμενος (p. 829). Of the canons, some are acrostichal, as the one on the Transfiguration (p. 848); others not. In the six discovered by Mai, the acrostichal sequence is very broken and irregular, that on St. George being the most complete. An account of the construction of the canon, with its nine odes, each ode made up of troparia, or rhythmical verses on the pattern of one preceding, called the Hirmos—will be found in Dr. Neale's Hymns of the Eastern Church (1870), p. 35. In the same work are given translations of some of these hymns of Damascenus.

XXX. Vita Barlaam et Joasoph (vol. iii. pp. 859-1240).—Of all the works ascribed to John of Damascus, none has enjoyed a greater celebrity than this. Such, at least, is the impression conveyed by the vast number of MSS. in which it or some portion of it is to be found, no less than by the numerous versions of it in oriental and European languages. The Greek text was first published by Boissonade in the Anecdota Gr. (Paris, 1832), but without the elaborate apparatus of introduction and commentary that he had designed. An old Latin version of it had appeared in the Speculum Historiale of Vincent of Beauvais. The question of its genuineness, which Boissonade forbore to enter upon, in deference to an expected edition by Schmidt and Kopitar, has never been satisfactorily settled. Leo Allatius concludes it, on a review of the whole matter, to be Damascenus's; influenced chiefly by the evident partiality of the writer for Gregory of Nazianzus and other admitted teachers of Damascenus, and partly by the prominence given to the subject of image-worship. The balance of modern criticism is also in its favour. On the other hand, if the reading καὶ τοῦ Ἰσίδου be sustained (p. 1028, cf. Allatii Proleg. vol. i. p. 154), such a doctrine as to the procession of the Holy Spirit would not accord with the known teaching of Damascenus. One form of the title describes it as "a profitable history, brought from the interior of the land of the Aethiopians, called India, to the Holy City, through the monk John," &c. The author's name is thus somewhat indefinitely given, and various other persons have been suggested who might properly answer to that description. The outline of the story is very briefly this:—A king of Aethiopia, or India (for the names are used interchangeably), named Abenner, is a severe repressor of the growth of Christianity and especially of monasticism in his neighbourhood. After a time he has the blessing he had long coveted, a son and heir. The child is named Josaphat or Joasaph, and after the astrologers have been consulted at his birth, he is guarded with the most jealous care by his father, that all bad influences, Christianity above all, may be kept from him. The description of the secluded state in which he is kept, yet with every imaginable enjoyment within these limits, reminds us of the parallel description in the encomium on St. Barbara. All is in vain. The youth's curiosity is awakened. He gains a reluctant permission to ride beyond the limits of the royal demesne. On one of these excursions he meets by chance with a cripple and a blind man; on another, with a man in the last stage of old age and infirmity. The answers given by his attendants, when he questions them about these strange and sorrowful sights, leave him but ill at ease and anxious for better counsel. In due time a monk, named Barlaam, in obedience to a divine vision (p. 895) makes his way to India, and in the guise of a merchant procures admission to the palace, and to speech with the young prince. Their conversations, in which Barlaam instructs his disciple in the Christian faith, are related with the utmost prolixity; but at length Joasaph receives baptism at the hands of his teacher (p. 1033). Barlaam now takes his departure, and his son's conversion having been disclosed to the king by a courtier named Zardan, the latter is overwhelmed with vexation and sorrow. By the advice of his priests and counsellors he tries expedient after expedient to overthrow the constancy of the prince in his new faith, but all to no purpose. The very agents set to work upon him become converts. As a last resource, by the advice of Araches (p. 1173), he abandons all further attempts at compulsion, and proposes to divide the kingdom with his son, in the hope that worldly cares and concerns of state may wean him from the Christian religion. The partition is made, but with far different results. Joasaph, like another Solomon, so prospers that all men flock to his kingdom; and Abenner, unable any longer to resist conviction, writes to him to confess himself too a disciple of the faith he had so long persecuted. The old king thus dies a Christian (p. 1196); and Joasaph, abdicating his share of the sovereignty, starts on a journey in quest of Barlaam. After two years of weary wandering he finds him in a cave in the desert, and there abides with him till his death. The bodies of the two are afterwards discovered reposing together, unchanged by decay, and in the odour of sanctity. The remarkable similarity of many features in this story to those in the Lalita Vistara, the legendary Life of Buddha, was pointed out by Max Müller in an article on the Migration of Fables (Contemp. Rev., July, 1870), and had been previously traced out in detail, with the aid of M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire's Le Bouddha et sa religion, by Dr. Liebrecht, in Ebert's Jahrbuch für röm. und engl. Literatur, 1860, ii. pp. 314–334. The credit of a still earlier notice of the parallel thus presented is due, as Max Müller reminds us, to M. Laboulaye. A discussion of the subject will also be found in Zotenberg and Meyer's edition of Gui de Cambrai's early metrical version of the Barlaam and Josaphat (in the Biblioth. des littér. Vereins, Stuttg., 1864, lxxv. p. 311 sqq.), and in Dr. Langen's Johannes von Damaskus, p. 251 sqq. The resemblance between the two stories is so striking in many respects, especially in what is related of the excursions of Joasaph, as compared with the famous Drives of Buddha, that it would be hard to disprove the relationship between them. In fact, some such connection seems rather implied than not, in the wording of the title given above. If we accept the hypothesis, some explanation still seems wanting of the Jewish cast of the proper names employed. That the names of SS. Barlaam and Josaphat should be found both in the Greek Menaea and the Roman Martyrology, is a circumstance which will give rise to some instructive reflections, if the view of Max Müller and others as to the Buddhist origin of the story be adopted.

XXXI. S. Artemii Passio (vol. iii. pp. 1252–1320).—This is stated in the title to be drawn from the Ecclesiastical History of Philostorgius (A.D. 358–425) and some others, by the monk John. The piece was first published by Mai, in the Spicileg. Romanum. As nothing was previously known to be extant of the History of Philostorgius, beyond the fragments of it preserved by Photius, and as he has been charged, on the strength of those passages, with misrepresenting facts in favour of Arianism, the present treatise not only increases our knowledge of Philostorgius's writings, but also vindicates him to some degree from the charge of heresy; that is to say, if any reliance can be placed on the S. Artemii Passio, as really representing Philostorgius. In itself, it is a composition of much the same nature as the Laudatio S. Bar- barae. After a confused and disjointed account of the events which led to the accession of Julian (361-363), Artemius is introduced as a friend of Constantius (§ 9), and a devout Christian. Of his parentage nothing is known, saving that he was of noble birth. Being ordered to sacrifice to the idols by Julian (§ 40), he refuses, and a series of altercations ensues between him and the emperor, in one of which some oracular verses of Apollo are quoted (§ 46). The way in which Julian is made to state his own views is not uninteresting. After various fruitless attempts to coerce or win over Artemius to his own party, the emperor becomes so enraged at finding an oracle of Apollo in Daphne (a suburb of Antioch) destroyed by lightning, that he orders Artemius to be crushed to death between two masses of rock (§ 60). Even this fails to kill the martyr, who emerges and walks about the city, testifying against the emperor, though so battered and bruised as not to look like a human being. Finally, after his faith has been sufficiently proved, he suffers death at the hands of the executioner on Friday, Oct. 20 (§ 67).

XXXII. Joannis orthodoxi Disputatio cum Manichaeo (vol. iii. pp. 1320-1336).—It is uncertain whether this is the work of Damascenus. There is little resemblance between it and the previous Dialogus contra Manichaeos (no. V.). It was first printed by Mai in the Bibliotheca Nova Patrum (IV. ii. 104).

XXXIII. Disputatio Saraceni et Christiani (vol. iii. pp. 1336-1348).—See above, no. VI.

XXXIV. Adversus Iconoclastas (vol. iii. pp. 1348-1361).—In some MSS. this declamation is assigned to John patriarch of Jerusalem, and there appears little or no reason to ascribe it to Damascenus. In § 3 there seems to be a manifest allusion to the Copronymian synod of 754; and if so, it could not have been written by that John, patriarch of Jerusalem, who ordained Damascenus and whose death is fixed in 735.

XXXV. Canon et Hymni (vol. iii. pp. 1364-1408).—See above, no. XXIX.

XXXVI. Fragmenta in S. Mattheum (vol. iii. pp. 1408-1413).—Taken from the Catena of Nicetas Serron. The most noticeable passage is one on the Transfiguration (p. 1408), the language of which is very similar to that found in the Homily on the Transfiguration (p. 552). By help of this latter, indeed, the text may be easily amended; as  $\phi\omega\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho\ \acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\phi\ \tau\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\iota}\zeta\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota$ , for instance, should plainly be  $\phi\omega\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho\ \acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\phi, \kappa.\tau.\lambda.$

On a review of the works of Damascenus as detailed above, the first reflection that arises is that we have not as yet the materials from which to form a just estimate of his character and ability; or rather the materials are there, but so unsifted as to be of little service. At present, the image before us is partly of iron and partly of clay; and the first requisite would be to decide, as exactly as possible, what the writings are that shall bear his name. This is a task not likely soon to be accomplished. Great as are the merits of Le Quien's edition, and great as was the advance made in it beyond all predecessors, it will still be evident that it includes many pieces that have no pretence whatever to be considered the works of John of Damascus. On the other hand, it is equally certain that many genuine compositions still remain in manuscript. Lists of such may be found in Fabricius, and in the letter of Allatius concerning his contributions to the projected edition of Aubert (Migne, vol. i. p. 113). It will plainly make a great difference in the judgment we form, to know for certain whether the Laudatio S. Barbarae, for example, be or be not the production of Damascenus. For the present, therefore, any estimate of his position must only be tentative. But after every reservation has been made, no one can doubt that he was, in the language of Waterland, "a very considerable man, and worthy of better times;" "the father of the modern Greeks, and their great oracle" (Works, v. 197). In fact, even this expression only does him half justice. For he has been a spiritual father of the Latin church almost as truly as of the Greek. His unique position, at the point of divergence of East and West, helped to give him this importance. Though communion was suspended between the two great divisions of the church in the very year (677) after that assigned to his birth, the final separation did not take place till after his death. Both sides can thus appeal to him as an authority. His writings reflect the transitional character of his age. He was not only, like his great contemporary Bede, a storer up of the doctrinal teachings of the past, he was a creative spirit for the future. In systematizing Christian theology, and applying to it the logical methods of Aristotle, he showed how the lines of orthodoxy were to be defined, and where they were to be guarded against the heretics of his own or previous times. Through Lombardus and Aquinas he may fairly be claimed as the progenitor of the scholastic systems of the West. As a champion of image worship, he was fighting on what we may consider the wrong side; but he fought resolutely and well; and many of his arguments are weighed respectfully by Neander. While defending what others thought idolatrous in his own church, he could clearly see and expose the idolatry of Mahometans, as shown in their devotions at the Kaaba; and he is deservedly placed by Maracci at the head of writers against that false religion. But it is perhaps as a Christian poet that his name will in our time be chiefly held in honour. One well fitted to pronounce an opinion, has assigned him "the double honour of being the last but one of the Fathers of the Eastern church, and the greatest of her poets." (Neale, Hymns of the Eastern Church, 1870, p. 90.) His noble canon for Easter Day is still yearly heard amid circumstances that lend an unsurpassed impressiveness to it in the Greek Church; and the echoes of it are prolonged by ourselves, whenever the strain is raised: "Tis the day of Resurrection; Earth, tell it out abroad." It is no small glory to a Christian singer that his words should be heard, not only at such a season, but also in the last solemn office, when those of his own faith are laid in the grave. (See the Euchologium, ed. Goar, 1647, p. 532.)

Bibliography.—An old Latin version of the De Fide, by Burgundio of Pisa, had been used by Aquinas, as before mentioned; but the first printed edition of any separate Latin version of Damascenus was that of the De Fide, by Jacobus Faber of Etaples, in 1507. The first edition of the Greek text was that of the same work, together with the De iis qui in fide dormierunt, at Verona, in 1531. In 1546 the first approach was made to an edition of the collected works, in a Latin dress, by Gravius of Bayeux. This was published at Cologne. In 1548, an edition appeared at Basle, with the Greek text of the two pieces in the Veronese edition printed opposite the Latin. A new Latin version was made by Billius, and an improved edition, with his translation, appeared at Paris in 1577. Both these editions were reprinted more than once. In 1636, Jean Aubert was requested to prepare a new and corrected edition. For this purpose, he had the benefit of Leo Allatius's collections. But Aubert died before accomplishing his task, and the work was at length taken up by the learned Dominican Michael Le Quien, whose edition in 2 vols. fol. appeared at Paris in 1712. This was reprinted at Venice in 1748, in the same form, and forms the basis of the edition in the Abbé Migne's Patrologia. The prolegomena are excellent, but in any future edition it would be very desirable that the works should be sifted and grouped together in a better order.

Authorities.—The principal of these have been mentioned in the course of the article. Le Quien's edition is indispensable. Next in usefulness has been found a series of two articles in the Revue Belge et Étrangère (tom. xii. 1861, pp. 1, 117), by Félix Nève. These are specially valuable for the light thrown on the position taken by Damascus against the Mohammedans, and the influence he exercised in preserving Greek learning in Syria. The excellent monograph of Dr. Joseph Langen, Johannes von Damaskus (Gotha, 1879) was not met with till the present article was in type; but a few insertions, suggested by it, have been made. It gives by far the fullest and most careful analysis of the prose works of Damascus that has yet appeared. The hymns are left untouched. A Dutch version of some of these is given in Grundlehner's Johannes Damascenus, Utrecht, 1876. An essay by J. G. Renoux on the Dialectic (Paris, 8vo. 1863) is also worth consulting. The writer regrets that he has not been able to procure a sight of C. J. Lénström's de Expositioe Fidei orthodoxae, Upsal. 1839. An estimate of the place to be assigned to Damascus in the history of music will be found in the Résumé Philosophique, prefixed to tom. i. of the Biographie univ. des Musiciens by M. Fétis, 1837, p. lxx. The Biblioth. Graeca of Fabricius, and the collections of Ceillier, and of Rohrbacher and Chantrel, need only be alluded to by name. [J. H. L.]

JOANNES (530), subdeacon and abbat, bearer of a letter from pope Paul I. to Pippin king of the Franks, A.D. 764. (Paul. ep. 7 in Pat. Lat. lxxxix. 1148 B; Mansi, xii. 605 A.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (531), presbyter, hegumenus, and anchorite, addressed by the patriarch Tarasius, 787. (Mansi, xiii. 472.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (532), the name of several monks at the seventh synod, 787, viz. :—

i. The presbyter and syncellus of Theodore patriarch of Antioch and of Elias patriarch of Jerusalem, his colleague Thomas representing Politianus pope of Alexandria. Ignatius in his life of Tarasius (cap. v. § 19) makes this distinction, which is not observed in Mansi (xii. 993 A, xiii. 134, 366, 379). The passages in Ignatius will be found in Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 580 F, 584 C, 585 A, and notes. John resided at Constantinople.

ii. Vicarii, viz., of Nicephorus bishop of Dyracchium (Mansi, xii. 993 B), of bishop Procopius (xiii. 138), of Stephen hegumenus of Bonisa (155), of Strategius hegumenus (ib.), of the bishop of Patrae (366 D).

iii. Presbyter of St. Sergius of Germia (xiii. 154).

iv. Hegumeni of Chenolaccus (xiii. 151), Lacca (ib.), Pagurium (ib.), Coelada (154), St. Salvator (ib.), Zoticus (ib.), St. Mary Deipara of Ruda (155), St. Theodorus martyr (155).

[C. H.]

JOANNES (533), monk of Jerusalem, who first excited a question respecting the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost. (Einhard. Annal. ann. 809, in Pat. Lat. civ. 472; the same statement occurs in various other annalists, vid. Bouquet, v. 58 D, 257 A, 333 D, 356 A; Baron. ann. 809, lii.) [C. H.]

Martyrs, arranged in order of commemoration.

For other martyrs see bishops Nos. 41, 74, 189, 204, 296, 366, 384; Clergy, No. 445.

JOANNES (534), the name of two martyrs under Sapor II., recorded without a commemoration day in the Ancient Syrian Martyrology of Wright. (Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1866, p. 432.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (535), abbat of Monagria, martyr for images mentioned in the Acta of St. Stephen the younger, as quoted by Baronius (A. E. ann. 766, xx.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (536), January 15, a solitary of Mount Sinai, martyred by the Saracens towards the end of the 4th century. (Menol. Graec. Sirlet; Cal. Byzant.; St. Nili de Caede Monach. Montis Sinae Narrat. in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxix. 590, &c.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 953.) [I. G. S.]

JOANNES (537), Jan. 31, physician and martyr in the persecution of Diocletian with Cyrus of Alexandria (Cal. Byzant. Jan. 31; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 252). In Daniel the date is A.D. 292. Their natalis or certamen is assigned to Jan. 31 (in Sirlet. Menol. Graec. it is Jan. 30). Their invention and translation were observed on June 28 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, iv. 261). More may be seen in Baron. A. E. ann. 414, xx.; Pagi, 414, xiii.; Mai, Spicil. Rom. iv. 230 sq.; Boll. Acta SS. 31 Jan. ii. 1081.

[C. H.]

JOANNES (538), March 20, one of twenty martyrs of the New Laura of St. Sabas near Jerusalem, slain in 797 by the Ethiopians. He was the hegumeniarch of the laura. (Sirlet. Menol. Graec.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 255; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 166, 171, 172, §§ 34, 42.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (539), April 27, hegumenus of the monastery of the Cathari, a monastery at Constantinople (Ducange, Cpol. Chr. lib. iv. p. 107, ed. 1729). His history is discussed by Henschen (Boll. Acta SS. 27 Apr. iii. 495). Before his ordination to the priesthood he attended the seventh synod, 787, with his preceptor. On the recommendation of the emperor Nicephorus, 803, he became archimandrite of the monastery of the Cathari, which he ruled in peace for ten years when by order of Leo Armenus in 813, he was dragged from his monastery and banished first to Pentadactylum near the Maeander in Asia Minor and afterwards to Criotaurus in Bithynia. His sufferings ceased for awhile under the emperor Michael, but in the reign of Theophilus he was banished to the island of Aphusia or Aphrusia (probably in the Euxine), where after two years and a half he died, cir. A.D. 832. The geography is dealt with in Henschen's notes.

[C. H.]

JOANNES, abbat of St. Gall. [JOANNES (123).]

JOANNES (540), May 24, count, martyr in the reign of Antoninus. (Basil. Menol.) [MELETIUS.] [C. H.]

JOANNES (541), called PSYCHAITA, May 25, monk in the laura of Psychaitas (τοῦ Ψυχαιτροῦ) (Basil. Menol.). The name of the monastery is discussed in Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 100.

[C. H.]

JOANNES (542), June 23, a presbyter, said to have been beheaded at Rome by command of the emperor Julian. (Ado, Martyrol.; Usuard. Martyrol.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Acta Sanct. June, iv. 482-485.) [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (543), June 26, master of the household (praepositus) of Constantia, the daughter of Constantine the Great, martyr under Julian, with his brother Paulus her primicerius, commemorated at Rome. (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.; Baron. A. E. ann. 362. cell.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 159.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, June 28, vid. Jan. 31.

JOANNES (544), July 27, Aug. 4. (Menol. Gr. Sirelet.) Oct. 23 (Basil. Menol.). [EPHEBUS, SEVEN SLEEPERS OF.]

JOANNES, Aug. 18. [JOANNES (455).]

JOANNES (545), Aug. 27, martyr at Tomi with the tribune Marcellinus and others. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (546), Sept. 7, martyr at Nicomedia under Diocletian and Maximian. (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom., Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 12.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (547), Sept. 16, son of Marcianus, martyred with him in the reign of Diocletian. (Baron. A. E. ann. 303, cxiii.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (548), Sept. 20, a martyr in Palestine, an Egyptian (Euseb. Mart. Pal. cap. 13). commemorated on Sept. 20 (Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 147; Baron. A. E. ann. 309, xx.). The Syriac version of the Mart. Pal. (Cureton's transl. pp. 48, 85) does not mention him. [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (549), Sept. 27, martyr at Cordova with his brother Adulfus. (Mart. Usuard., Rom.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (550), Nov. 28, exlegatarius, martyr for images at the same period as Stephen the younger under the Iconomachi. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (551), Dec. 21, martyr with Festus in Tuscia. (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Rom.) [C. H.]

Miscellaneous.

JOANNES (552), reputed one of lxx. disciples. [MENAS.]

JOANNES (553), an official at Edbra in Syria, who changed a Pagan temple there into a church dedicated to the martyr St. George [GEORGIUS (43)] in the ninth year of Constantius and Constans, i.e. A.D. 346. (Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. 8627, cf. Hogg on St. George in Trans. R. Soc. Lit. vi. 270, vii. 106; Greek Christ. Inscr. in Contemp. Rev. June 1880.) [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (554), July 30, a soldier in the reign of Julian, who when sent to persecute the Christians executed his orders in pretence only, favoured the escape of the Christians, and finally became one himself. (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Actu SS. Jul. vii. 148.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (555), a Priscillianist. In one of the later processes at Trèves following the execution of Priscillian and his chief associates, 386, he is named with Tertullus and Potamius as having given evidence against his party. They were punished only by temporary banishment within Gaul, "quia ante quaestionem se et socios prodidissent" (Sulp. Sev. ii. 51). [M. B. C.]

JOANNES (556), a native of Samosata in the 4th century, son of a woman named Callinice. He and his brother Paul were brought up by their mother as Manicheans or Gnostics. Paul and John laboured together in that region to spread some such opinions. The rise of the PAULICIANs in that neighbourhood led afterwards to an association of this sect with them. (Photius, c. Manich. lib. i. 2, 16; Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. § 21 in Pat. Gr. civ. 1273.) [M. B. C.]

JOANNES (557), a civil officer of high rank under the emperors Theodosius I. and Honorius. In 394 he was tribune and notary, and was sent by Ambrose of Milan to intercede with Theodosius for such of the followers of the defeated usurper Eugenius as had taken refuge in churches (Paulin. Vit. Ambr. § 31 in Pat. Lat. xiv. 38). In 404 he was count of the treasures, and greatly interested himself in the defence of Chrysostom (Pallad. Dial. cap. 3 in Pat. Gr. xlvi. 14). In 408 he was tribune, and at the siege of Rome by Alaric was one of the ambassadors sent out to that prince as an old acquaintance and πρόξενος (Zos. v. 40). In 412 John was prefect of Italy (Cod. Theod. III. viii. 3; XIII. xi. 12) and still held that office when Paulinus wrote his Life of Ambrose (Paulin. u. s.) [JOVIUS; JOANNES (561)]. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (558), a count whom Chrysostom was accused (in the eleventh charge of the deacon John at the synod of the Oak, A.D. 403) of having denounced in a sedition of the troops. (Phot. cod. 59; Baron. 403, xvii.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (559), circ. A.D. 420. A Phrygian officer who was rumoured to have caused the death of his brother Aemilius by a plot. (Synes. Ptolem. Episc. epp. 2 and 44, Patr. Graec. lxi. 1324 and 1365; Ceillier, viii. 30.)

[W. M. S.]

JOANNES (560), count of the sacred bounties to the emperor Theodosius the Younger. There are two edicts addressed to him in that capacity, published in the Codez. He first appropriates the moneys formerly paid to the Jewish patriarchs to the Imperial treasury. The patriarchate itself having expired (Cod. Theod. xvi. viii. 29; Cod. Just. l. ix. 17, May 30, A.D. 429); the second relates to purely civil matters (Cod. Theod. vii. viii. 15, April 24, A.D. 430). He was sent in 431 to the council of Ephesus, and arrived in its sixth session. For the part taken by him see CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, JOHN OF ANTIOCH, NESTORIUS. (Mansi, iv. 1395, 1397, 1434; Baron. Ann. ad ann. 431, cxxviii. &c.; Facundus Hermiens. Def. Tri. Cap. vii. 4 in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 691.)

[W. M. S.]

JOANNES (561), surnamed PRIMICERIUS, usurping emperor of the West, from Sept. 423 to May or June 425, as reckoned by Clinton (F. R. i. 606). His short tenure of power is related by Socrates (vii. 22, 23), Olympiodorus (in Photius, cod. 80, Pat. Gr. ciii. 277), Cassiodorus (Hist. Trip. xi. 18), Philostorgius (H. E. xii. 13), Theophanes (Chronog. A. C. 415), and by the western chroniclers Prosper and Idatius (Bouquet, i. 616, 629). Gibbon's account compiled from these authorities will be found in vol. iv. p. 172 of Smith's edition. Valesius in his note on Socrates (l. c.) identifies this John with the tribune and notary above. [JOANNES (557).]

In the Theodosian Code (lib. xvi. tit. ii. 47) there is an edict dated Aquileia, Oct. 8, 425, addressed to Bassus, re-establishing a privilege of the church which "the tyrant of our time" had suppressed, viz. the right of the clergy to be tried by their bishops, instead of by the secular courts. This "tyrant" (i.e. usurper), designated as "infaustus praesumptor" is unnamed, but the commentary of Gothofred which is followed by Baronius (ann. 423, iii.) and Fleury (lib. xxiv. cap. 33) identifies him with the usurper John the Primicerius, who, as it is inferred from the evidence of this law, issued edicts in opposition to the church during his brief tenure of power, and must consequently have been an Arian. [C. H.]

JOANNES (562), surnamed MEDICUS, the syncellus or domesticus of Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria. (Mansi, iv. 1393 B; Baron. ann. 431, cxxiv.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (563), a decurio or senator, possibly of Alexandria, agent for the emperor Marcian at the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, iv. 535 c; Tillemont, xv. 671, 775-6), afterwards sent by Marcian into Egypt, A.D. 454, in order to secure the adherence of the monks to the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, iv. 856 c). Leo the Great mentions him as a "vir spectabilis," and of praiseworthy orthodoxy (Leo Mag. Ep. 141, 1296, Migne). His mission does not seem to have obtained much success. [C. G.]

JOANNES (564) PHILOPONUS, a "grammaticus" of Alexandria; a distinguished philosopher, a voluminous writer (Suidas, s. v. Ἰωάννης Τρ.), and one of the leaders of the Tritheites of the 6th century (Sophron. Ep. Synodic. Co. Const. A.D. 680; Act. xi. in Mansi, xi. 501; Leont. Byzant. De Sect. Act. v. in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvi. i. 1232. From his great industry he acquired the surname of Philoponus, which his theological opponents changed to Mataeponus.

He was a native of Alexandria (Niceph. u. s.), and a pupil of Ammonius the son of Hermeas, a celebrated teacher in that city (Io. Philop. Εἰς τὰς κατηγορίας Ἀριστοτέλους; Lambecius, Comm. Biblioth. Caes. Vindob. vii. 143. Clinton, F. R. ii. 331). His earliest known appearance as an author was in his περὶ αἰδιότητος, a reply to the Ἐπιχειρήματα ἢ κατὰ Χριστιανῶν of Proclus, surnamed Diadochus. It discovers great dialectic ability as well as great learning, the quotations which it contains covering the whole range of the literature of his own and previous times (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. ed. Harles, x. 652-654), and is said by Suidas not only to have been a complete refutation of the great Neo-Platonist, but also to have convicted him of gross ignorance (s. v. Πρόκλος).

Apparently about the same time he was engaged in a controversy with Severus, the deposed bishop of Antioch (Suidas, s. v. Ἰωαν. Galland. Bibl. Vet. Patr. xii. 376; Cureton, Fragments, 212, 245, seq.). Nothing of his remains however unless it be his Πρὸς τοὺς Ἀκεφάλους κεφάλαια ἰζ', which is still in MS. (Lambecius, u. s. iv. 474). To the same period may be assigned a treatise De Universalī et Particulari, addressed to Sergius, then a presbyter, but afterwards the successor of Severus at Antioch, which is described by Assemani in his catalogue of the Syriac MSS. which he brought from the East (Bibl. Or. i. 613).

Sergius was ordained patriarch of Antioch by the Monophysites c. A.D. 540, and at his request Philoponus wrote a work which he entitled Διαιτητής, Arbitr, the Umpire, and dedicated it to him. Nicephorus speaks of this as a "most powerful work" (λόγος δεινός), and says that it was dedicated to Sergius the patriarch of Constantinople (H. E. u. s.), but Quercius has shewn, that he, like others, has confounded the two patriarchs of the same name (u. s. 1413). The Διαιτητής is an attempt to shew that the doctrine which Philoponus and his followers held upon the subject of the union of the two natures in the person of our Lord was dialectically necessary. The argument is admirably condensed by Prof. Dorner in his History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ (Clark's transl. ii. 1. 416). It consisted of ten chapters, a short quotation from the fourth of which, and apparently the whole of the seventh, may be read in the De Haeresibus of Joannes Damascenus (H. 83, in Patr. Gr. xciv. 745). Nearly the whole work, the only parts wanting being portions of the first and second chapters, exists among the Syriac MS. in the British Museum (Wright, Catal. ii. 587). The same collection also contains some fragments of it (ib. i. 114, 388), and the whole work appears to be preserved in the Vatican (Assem. Biblioth. Apostol. Vatic. Cod. MSS. iii. 250) as well as a compendium, and two apologies for it (ib. 251).

Philoponus also wrote another treatise at the request of his friend the patriarch of Antioch, which in the edition published by Gallandius is entitled Περὶ κοσμοποιίας λόγοι ζ', De Mundi Creatione, l. vii. (Bibl. Vet. Patr. xii. 473), but in that of Corderius, Vienna, 1623, τῶν εἰς τὴν Μωυσέως κοσμογονίαν ἐξηγητικῶν λόγων ζ', Commentarii in Mosaicam Cosmogoniam, l. vii. and is referred to by Photius, who also confounds the patriarchs under the titles of Εἰς τὴν κτίσιν, De Universi Creatione (xxxviii.), and Εἰς τὴν ἐξαήμερον, In Hexaemeron (xl.iii. ccxl.). Cave, as well as others, have supposed that the Hexaemeron of Georgius Pisides was written in reply to this work (Hist. Liter. i. 563), relying on a statement of Nicephorus (H. E. xviii. 48*). But Quercius has shewn that to be a mistake of the historian, and also that both the poem of Georgius and the Treatise of Philoponus were written with the same object in view, the vindication of the Mosaic cosmogony (Praef. de Geo. Pisisd. ejusd. Script. u. s. 1174, 1178; Monit. de Hexaemer. Geor. Pisisd. u. s. 1435).

At what period Philoponus distinctly avowed what is known as Tritheism (Eulog. Patr. Alex. Orat. Phot. ccxxx. ed. Schott. p. 879) does not clearly appear. But it must have been before the middle of the sixth century as Mar Abas, "Primas Orientis," who died A.D. 552, was one of his converts to that doctrine (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 411; Quercius, u. s. 1421). Notwithstanding this however, if not because of it, the emperor Justinian sent one of his officers named Stephanus to Alexandria to summon Philoponus to Constantinople "in causâ fidei." The Grammaticus did not obey the summons but wrote to the emperor a letter, the substance, though unfortunately not the text, of which is briefly given both by the Assemans (u. s. iii. 252) and Cardinal Mai (Spicil. Rom. iii. 739), excusing himself on the plea of age and infirmity. In this letter he also urged Justinian to issue an edict prohibiting the discussion of the "two natures." If there is any connection between this letter and the summons which evoked it, and the edict published by Mai (Scr. Vet. Coll. Nov. vii. 1, 292), it must have been written before A.D. 551, as the edict mentions Zoilus as patriarch of Alexandria who was deposed in that year. Assemani also notices a treatise which Philoponus addressed to Justinian, De Divisione differentia et numero, which was probably written in defence of his Tritheism (Bibl. Or. i. 413 = Catal. u. s. 252).

On the death of Joannes Ascunaghes, the founder of the Tritheites, Athanasius who had embraced his opinions, sent his Demonstrationes to Philoponus at Alexandria. The Grammaticus then wrote a treatise on the subject and sent it to his friend at Constantinople. The Alexandrians, hearing of this, condemned both Philoponus and his book. The Monophysites finding that this publication brought them into great disrepute appealed to the emperor Justin II., who had married Sophia, a granddaughter of the empress Theodora, and was known to be favourable to their party. He complied with their request, and the matter was committed to Joannes Scholasticus who had succeeded Eutychnius, on his refusal to subscribe the Julianist edict of Jus-tinian, A.D. 565 [EUTYCHUS 18] (Greg. Bar. Hebr.; Asseman. Bibl. Or. ii. 328).

At the disputation, Conon who represented the Tritheites [CONON (4)] and Eugenius [EUGENIUS (14)] were required to condemn Philoponus, but they refused (Phot. Biblioth. xxiv.). The Grammaticus was condemned by John however (Wright, u. s. ii. 705), and it was probably then that the emperor issued an edict which though otherwise tolerant is severely elaborate in its repudiation of Tritheism (Evagrius, H. E. v. 4).

We hear nothing more of Philoponus until A.D. 568, when John the patriarch of Constantinople having delivered a catechetical discourse on the "Holy and consubstantial Trinity" (. . . περὶ τῆς ἁγίας καὶ ὁμοουσίου Τριάδος) he published a treatise (Βιβλιδάριον) in reply to it. Photius is unsparing in his criticism both of the style and the argument of this work, and charges the author with having perverted the authorities whom he quotes in it (Biblioth. lxxv.). By this time Philoponus must have been a very old man, but as he was a contemporary of Georgius Pisides (Niceph. H. E. xviii. 48, Querc. u. s.), who flourished under the emperor Heraclius (A.D. 610, 641—GEORGIUS 54) he appears to have been surviving some years afterwards. Quercius however shews good reason for regarding the date of A.D. 617, which appears in his In quatuor priores libros Physicorum to be an error (u. s. 1412, 1413), though Clinton would retain it (F. R. ii. 164). And it is not likely that the author of such a work as the κατὰ Πρόκλον so early as A.D. 529 could have written the Commentary some ninety years afterwards.

During the lifetime of Philoponus the Tritheites appear to have continued to be united under his leadership (Tim. Presb. Receipt. Haer. in Patr. Gr. lxxvi. i. 62), but after his decease they became divided, because of the opinions which he had maintained on the subject of the resurrection-body, both in his writings against the heathen, and in a special work which he wrote on this subject. This last was in several books, of which Photius speaks in no respectful terms (Bibl. xxi. xxiii.) though it found great favour not only with that section of the Monophysites which persevered in their adherence to Philoponus, but also with Eutychnius the Catholic patriarch of Constantinople (Jo. of Eph. u. s. 147; EUTYCHUS 18). When the division took place among the Tritheites those who still followed their leader were distinguished as Philoponiaci, and, from the fact that Athanasius was prominent amongst them, also as Athanasiani (Schönfelder, Die Tritheiten, app. to his German translation of John of Ephesus, 269, 274, 297), while their opponents were called Cononitae, after Conon of Tarsus, who had written a refutation of the Περὶ ἀναστάσεως. Both parties charged each other with being Sadduceae, Gentiles, Valentiniani, Marcionitae, Manichaei and Origenistae,* while the Philoponiaci also charged the Cononitae with being Hermogenistae (Tim. Presb. u. s. Nicetas Choniata. Thesaur. ix. in Pat. Gr. cxl. 46; Niceph. H. E. xviii. 47<sup>b</sup>).

Besides the works already mentioned, Philo-ponus also wrote—(1) Contra Andream disc. iv. (Wright, u. s. ii. 917). This Andreas may have been the Julianist "inclusus" whom Gregory I. speaks of in his letter to Eusebius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ep. ix. 69; July, A.D. 601, Jaffé, Regest. Pontif. Rom. 145), and against whom Eusebius also wrote [EUSEBIUS (86)]. (2) Κατὰ τῆς σπουδῆς Ἱαμβλίχου ἢ ἐπέγραψε περὶ ἀγαλμάτων, Adversus Jamblichii opus quod de Simulacris inscripsit. The work of Jamblichus, which is no longer extant, was written to prove that the idols were divine. We only know the reply from what Photius says of it (Biblioth. cexv.) (3) Περί τοῦ Πάσχα, De Paschate Disputatio, the latest and best edition of which is that of Gallandius (u. s. 471). It is a treatise on the Last Supper of our Lord with His disciples, and appears to be the Βιβλίον ἀνάγνωμον which Photius describes in his Bibliotheca (cxv. Fabricius, u. s. x. 642). (4) Κατὰ τῆς ἁγίας καὶ οἰκουμένης τετάρτης συνόδου, Adversus sacram et oecumenicam quartam Synodum. This we only know from Photius (Bibl. Iv.). It is one of the πλείστα συγγράματα δυσχερῆ δὲ καὶ δυσεξέλεγκτα κατὰ τῆς συνόδου, which Nicephorus ascribes to him (xviii. 45), and is probably that which is quoted in the sentences from the Ἀπολογία ὑπὲρ τῆς ἐν Καρχηδόνι συνόδου καὶ τοῦ-τόμου τοῦ ἁγίου Λέοντος of Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch [EPHRAIM 6], which were read at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680 (Act. x. Mansi, xi. 435; Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. ii. 2099). (5) Questiones addressed to Christophorus and others, which were replied to by Georgius, bishop of Tacritum, Tacrit, in the province of Mesopotamia, c. A.D. 580 (Asseman. Bibl. Or. i. 465). (6) Tractatus de differentia quae manere creditur in Christo post unionem (Assem. iii. 252.) Nicephorus also speaks of his having written against heresies (xviii. 4). The De Fide Orthodoxa of Nicetas archdeacon and Chartophylax of the Great Church at Constantinople, described by Lambecius as Contra Joannem Philoponum, was written in reply to another Joannes of a much later date, whom Nicetas himself speaks of as Joannes Itala (Com. d. Bibl. Caes. iii. 410; Kollar's note.)

For a list of the numerous non-theological works of Philoponus we must refer our readers to Fabricius (Biblioth. ed. Harles, x. 642-652) and Clinton (Fast. Rom. ii. 331-333; Ritter, Hist. de la Philos. Chrétienne, ii. 457).

JOANNES (565) SCYTHOPOLITA, a scholasticus of Scythopolis in Palestine. Photius had read a work of his in twelve books Against Separatists from the church or Against Eutyches and Dioscorus, written at the request of a patriarch Juliannus, who was probably Julian patriarch of Antioch, A.D. 471-476 (Phot. cod. 95, in Pat. Gr. ciii. 339 n). The author whom he opposed concealed his name, but gave his work the title Against Nestorius, craftily designed to allure the unwary. Photius thinks he may have been Basilus Cilix [BASILIUS OF CILICIA], who afterwards wrote against John a dramatic Dialogue worthy of his religion; Photius (cod. 107) had read this. John of Scythopolis was also the author of παράβσεις or commentaries on the Pseudo-Dionysius, which had a wide circulation for some centuries. Among the Syriac MSS. in the British Museum there is a Syriac translation of Dionysius, with an introduction and notes by Phocas bar Sergius of Edessa, a writer of the 8th century. The notes are in great part a translation of the παράβσεις (Wright, Catal. Syr. MSS. pt. ii. p. 493). Anastasius Bibliothecarius in the 9th century met with a copy of these commentaries at Constantinople, and sent a Latin version of them to the emperor Charles the Bald, together with the Scholia of the confessor Maximus on the same author, but these he was careful to distinguish from those of John by a cross. Anastasius in his letter to Charles (ep. 2 in Pat. Lat. cxxix. 740) states that the commentaries are reputed to be those of John bishop of Scythopolis. This version is no longer extant. The παράβσεις are also distinguished from the Scholia of Maximus in several MSS. which were seen by archbishop Usher (Bibl. Theol. MSS. quoted by Cave, i. 506; Dissert. de Pseud.-Dionys. in Usher's Works, xii. 504, ed. Elrington; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. 9, ed. Harles; De Rubeis, Dissert. ad Opp. Dionys. in Pat. Gr. iii. 66, 67). In the printed editions of the Areopagite both works are so confused that they can be distinguished only, if at all, by their contents, e.g. where there are clear traces of the author or the work described by Photius, as in De Coelesti Hierarchia, cap. 7; De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia, cap. 7 (Le Quien, Dissert. Damasc. ii. in Pat. Gr. xciv. 281-284; De Rubeis, u. s. 65). The scholia on Dionysius which Joannes Cyparissiota (A.D. 1360) ascribes to Dionysius Alexandrinus (Theol. Symb. decas i. cap. i. and dec. ii. cap. 2 in Pat. Gr. clii. 746, 761) are those of John (Cave, i. 506). Cave confuses this scholasticus of Scythopolis with John Maxentius, to whom he therefore ascribes the commentaries on Dionysius [MAXENTIUS].

JOANNES (566), a familiar friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. (Sidon. Apoll. Epp. lib. ii. ep. 5 in Pat. Lat. lviii. 480.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (567), a distinguished professor of the classic learning in southern Gaul, in the time of Sidonius Apollinaris and the Gothic domination. (Sidon. Apoll. Epp. lib. viii. ep. 2 in Pat. Lat. lviii. 599.)

[C. H.]

JOANNES (568), a scholasticus of Scythopolis in Palestine. In 520 Sabas on visiting that city was met by this John in company with Theodosius, who had recently succeeded John the bishop of Scythopolis. Cyril of Scythopolis (Vit. Sab. § 61 in Cotelier. Eccl. Gr. Monum. iii. 327), relating an incident which then occurred, speaks of John as a certain scholasticus at Scythopolis, the son of Expelleutas, an excellent and enlightened man. The date is conclusive as to John being a different person from John bishop of Scythopolis (Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 690; De Rubeis, Dissert. ad Opp. Dionys. in Pat. Gr. iii. 69) [JOANNES (363)]. The description of him by Cyril, besides the date, seem to prove that he was also different from the Joannes Scythopolita of Photius. [T. W. D.]

JOANNES (569) RHETOR, of Antioch, historian, cited as an authority in the Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius for certain facts. Evagrius (iv. 5) states that John concluded his history by a pathetic description (περικαθώς) of the destruction of Antioch. This event occurred in 526 and John Rhetor is reckoned to have been flourishing about that period. (Cave, i. 508; Hodus, Proleg. to John Malalas, p. xxx. § 7.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (570), one of a body of senators addressed in 534 by pope John II. on the Divinity and Incarnation of Christ. (Mansi, viii. 803; Pat. Lat. l. xvi. 20; Baron. ann. 534, xxiv.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (571), chancellor of Cassiodorus, who addresses him in indiction xii. i. e. 534, upon his appointment, explaining in much detail the duties of the office. (Cassiod. Var. lib. xi. ep. 6.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (572), patricius, addressed by pope Pelagius I. (Pelag. Epp. Frag. in Pat. Lat. l. xix. 411); another fragment (ibid. 416) is addressed to a Joannes who is styled "comes patrimonii." [C. H.]

JOANNES (573), son of Androgynus of Amasæa, stated to have been born through the prayers of Euty chius patriarch of Constantinople, while in exile there. (Vit. Euty ch. cap. vi. §§ 44, 46 in Boll. Acta SS. 6 Apr. i. 559 note, 560; Baron. ann. 564, xx.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (574), surnamed ASCUNAGHES or ASCOSNAGUS, founder of the sect of the Trithēites in the 6th century. He was the disciple and subsequently the successor of Samuel Peter Syrus, who taught Greek learning at Constantinople. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 325; Dissert. de Monoph. num. iv. in B. O. ii.) [MONOPHYSITES, JOANNES (564) PHILOPONUS.] [C. H.]

JOANNES (575), a Monophysite confessor at Constantinople in the reign of Justin II., in conjunction with two others, Peter and Eudaemon, all of them described as of consular rank, John being also called a consul. (John of Ephes. H. E. ii. 11, in R. P. Smith's transl. pp. 107-110.) [JULIANA.] [G. T. S.]

JOANNES (576), an historian mentioned by Evagrius (H. E. v. 24), who couples him with Agathias Rhetor, saying that they treated of the period from the end of Justinian to the flight of the younger Chosroes to the Romans (i. e. from cir. 560 to 591), but had not published their histories. Speaking of John, Evagrius uses the expression, ἐμῶ τε πολλῆ καὶ συγγενεῖ. C. B. Hase in his edition of Leo Diaconus (Paris, 1819, fol.) included (p. 169) a fragment of John's history from a Vatican manuscript which he had discovered, and in his preface (p. xiii.) discusses the author. He thinks that a large portion of John's work, and in its original form, survives in Theophylact Simocatta. As the "fellow citizen" and relative of Evagrius, John has been reckoned by some as belonging to Antioch, where Evagrius appears to have resided. But it is more usual to regard him as a native of Epiphania in Syria, which was the birthplace of Evagrius; and of this opinion is Valesius (in his note on the passage of Evagrius), Cave (i. 546), and Hase who designates him "scholasticus et extræfectus Epiphaniensis." He has been also confused, as Hase remarks, with John Malalas. [C. H.]

JOANNES, prince. [HERMENIGILD.]

JOANNES (577), ex-consul, patrician, and quaestor, addressed by pope Gregory the Great in 591. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 31 in Migne, lxxvii. 483.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (578), notary under Gregory the Great in 592. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 49; lib. iii. indict. xi. 36 in Migne, lxxvii. 590, 632.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (579), the builder of a monastery in Pesaro (Pisaurum), in which bishop Felix had placed his throne, and allowed public masses to be celebrated, for which Gregory the Great remonstrated with him, A. D. 596. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. vi. indict. xiv. 46 in Migne, lxxvii. 832.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (580), agrimensor in the time of Gregory the Great. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. vii. indict. xv. 39 in Migne, lxxvii. 898.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (581), præfectus urbis (Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 176) in the time of Gregory the Great (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. x. indict. iii. 6, 7 in Migne, lxxvii. 1070, 1071). He was the last præfect of the city that is known for nearly two centuries. (Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Rom, ii. 51.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (582), Praepositus Italiae (or præfectus. Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 176). In 599 Gregory wrote to him to complain of wrongs done to the church at Naples. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. x. indict. iii. 21 in Migne, lxxvii. 1080.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (583), vicarius of Italy in the time of Gregory the Great, as Carl Hegel conjectures. (Greg. Magn. lib. ix. indict. ii. 35 in Migne, lxxvii. 970; Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 65, 178.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (584), "vir clarissimus palatinus," at Naples, in the time of Gregory the Great. (Greg. Magn. lib. x. indict. iii. 26 in Migne, lxxvii. 1084; Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 178.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (585), tribune at Siponto in the time of Gregory the Great. (Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 182; Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xi. indict. iv. 24 in Migne, lxxvii. 1135.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (586), defensor, commissioned by pope Gregory the Great in 603 (lib. xiii. ind. vi. ep. 45, 46, in Pat. Lat. lxxvii.; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 152). [C. H.]

JOANNES (587) (surnamed LEMIGIUS), sixth exarch of Ravenna, between Smaragdus and Eleutherus), c. 612-616. He was killed, together with some of his officials, during a revolt at Ravenna. (Liber Pontificalis, ed. Vignol. i. 239; Ersch und Gruber, Encycl. xxxix. i. p. 318; Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Rom, ii. 116; Rubeus, Hist. Rav. lib. iv. p. 167, ed. 1572.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (588), sacellarius of Peter a pretor of Numidia. He was one of the accusers of the abbat St. Maximus in 657, Baronius (ann. 657, iv.) gives the documents in full from the Vatican MSS. [C. H.]

JOANNES (589), the name of a primicerius, and likewise of a consiliarius at Rome, having charge of the see at the time of the election of pope John IV. in 640. (Bed. H. E. ii. 19.) [C. H.]

JOANNES (590), called THE CHAMBERLAIN, correspondent of Maximus abbat of Chrysopolis in the 7th century. John would probably be at one time head chamberlain to the emperor Heraclius. (St. Maxim. Abbat. Epist. 2, 3, 4, 10, 12, 27, 43, 44, 45 in Patr. Graec. xci. § 220, &c.; Ceillier, xi. 767.) [W. M. S.]

JOANNES (591) (surnamed PLATYN), 13th exarch of Ravenna, between Theodore II. and Theophylact (687-702). (Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 170, 171; Liber Pontificalis, ed. Vignol. i. 301, 305). Rubeus (Hist. Rav. lib. iv. p. 179, ed. 1572) gives him the surnames Platon and Platina. [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (592), first defensor, mentioned by Anastasius in his account of pope Constantine (num. 171, Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 948; Baron. A. E. ann. 709, ii.). [C. H.]

JOANNES (593) (surnamed RIZOCOPUS), 15th exarch of Ravenna, between Theophylact and Euty chius. The pope Constantine was sent for by the emperor Justinian. On his way to Constantinople he met John at Naples (A.D. 710), who had come no doubt by way of Sicily. The new exarch went to Rome, and, in the absence of the pope, for reasons unknown, killed his treasurer, vicedomus, and other persons. He then went on to Ravenna, where he lost his life in an insurrection, c. 711. The rebellion is remarkable as being the occasion of one of the earliest leagues of Italian cities (in the Middle Ages). (Liber Pontificalis, ed. Vignol. ii. 5; Agnellus in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, c. 139, p. 369; Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Rom. ii. pp. 194-198.). Rubeus (Hist. Rav. lib. iv. p. 185, ed. 1572) gives the surname as Tyzocopus. [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNES (594), a Syrian, the father of Gregory III., as stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in his life of that pope (num. 190, Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1024). [C. H.]

JOANNES (595), silentiarius of the emperor Constantine Copronymus, envoy to pope Stephen II. in 752. (Anast. Biblioth. Vit. Steph. II. num. 232 in Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1087.) [C. H.]

JOANNES, Irish saint. [EOIN.]

JOANNICIUS (1), secretary of Theodore exarch of Ravenna. In his youth he attracted the attention of Theodore by his learning. The exarch took him into his own palace, and after three years was ordered to send him to the court at Constantinople. For some unknown reason he returned to Ravenna while Damian was archbishop (692-708). He must have been a leader in the seditions against Justinian II., for when the patrician Theodore was sent by Justinian to carry out his revenge upon Ravenna, Joannicius was taken among other chief men of the city, and carried with Felix the archbishop to Constantinople. When he was called into Justinian's presence (c. 711) the emperor ordered reeds to be thrust under the nails of all his fingers and commanded him to write. Joannicius wrote, not with ink, but with his own blood, "Deus in adiutorium meum contende," and other words (Agnellus, cap. 141), and addressed the emperor, "Quid, moriture, agis? Periet audacia tua."

Then Justinian ordered him forth to punishment. Justinian himself died in 711. The whole story is found in the history of Theodore. Damian, Felix, archbishops of Ravenna by Agnellus, who was a descendant of Joannicius. (Agnelli Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Ravenn. in Monumenta Rerum Langob. 1878, c. 120, 125, 137, 140, 141, 146.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOANNICIUS (2), bishop of Abellinum (Avellino), said to have succeeded Sylvester c. A.D. 535, and to have died A.D. 556. (Zigarelli, Cattedra di Avellino, p. 47; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. viii. 192; Cappelletti, xix. 160, 188.) [R. S. G.]

JOANNITAE (Ἰωαννίται), a designation given to the friends and supporters of Chrysostom, after their exclusion from St. Sophia's. (Soz. H. E. vi. 18; Soz. H. E. viii. 21.) [CHRYSOSTOM, Vol. I. p. 529 a.] [T. W. D.]

JOATHAS, May 22. Martyr under Maximian, and patron saint of the church of Bellinum. (AA. SS. Boll. Mai. v. 142.) [G. T. S.]

JOBIANUS. [JOVIANUS.]

JOBINUS. [JOVINUS.]

JOBIOUS (1) (Ἰώβ, Ἰώβιος, JOB), an orthodox presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople (Labbe, iv. 212 A). He appears at the council of Constantinople in 448 as subscribing the deposition of Euty ches by the hand of his deacon Andreas (Labbe, iv. 232 A). Theodoret wrote to him during his deposition by the Latrocinium, A.D. 449, expressing his joy on hearing that in his old age he was contending for the faith (Theod. Epist. 127). He is addressed by Leo I., in common with the other orthodox archimandrites in 450 (Leo Mag. Ep. lxxi. p. 1012). He appears also among the orthodox archimandrites who addressed an anti-Euty chian petition to the emperor Marcian in 451, and who were summoned to sit in the fourth session of the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, iv. 517 D). [FAUSTUS (28).] [C. G.]

JOBIOUS (2) (Ἰώβιος, JOVIUS), bishop of Nebe or Nevis, in Arabia, at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168 c; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 863.) [J. de S.]

JOBIOUS (3) (Ἰώβιος), monk in the East and theological writer, probably living in the time of Justinian (A.D. 527-565), but his personal history is unknown. Cave thinks he flourished A.D. 530. He wrote against the Euty chian Severus, bishop of Antioch, but the work is lost. He wrote another work upon the incarnation, which is also lost, but very numerous fragments of it are preserved in Photius's treatise upon the same subject. (Phot. Cod. 222, init.; Ceillier, xi. 185 n.) [J. G.]

JOCUNDIANUS. [JUCUNDIANUS.]

JOCUNDUS. [JUCUNDUS.]

JODOCUS, Breton saint. [JUDOCUS.]

JOEVINUS, of Leon. [IOAVA.]

JOHAS, one of the Egyptian bishops to whom the pope Leo I. writes, A.D. 460. (Leo Mag. Ep. 73, 1437.) [C. G.]

JOINGERUS, bishop. [ISENGERUS.]

JOLLATHAN, Irish bishop. [ILLADHAN.]

JONADAB, Nestorian bishop of Hazza and Arbel in the province of Adiabene in the reign of Chosroes II. of Persia. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1229; Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 416, 491.)

[C. H.]

JONAS (1), bishop of Circesium in the province of Osrhoëné, said on the authority of Hebed-Jesu Sobensis, to have been present at the first Nicene council, A.D. 325. His name is not found in the lists of the council. (Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 170, iii. 588; Mansi, ii. 692; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 978.)

[L. D.]

JONAS (2), Mar. 29, monk and martyr in Persia, in the reign of Constantine the Great. (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 770.)

[C. H.]

JONAS (3), bishop of Parthopolis, a town of uncertain position in Macedonia, signed the letter of the council of Sardica to the churches, A.D. 344. (Mansi, iii. 42, 47; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 75.)

[L. D.]

JONAS (4), Feb. 11, monk and gardener in the Egyptian monastery of Muchonse, which was under the government of Pachomius, in the 4th century. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 520.)

[C. H.]

JONAS (5), bishop of Labda in Proconsular Africa, was banished to Corsica by Hunicer, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 55; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 194.)

[R. S. G.]

JONAS (6), abbat and author of the 7th century, was born at Sigusia (Suza) in Liguria, as we learn from a passage in his Vita Attalæ (cap. vi. Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 117, Venice, 1733) about the close of the 6th century. An expression in the prologus to the Vita S. Columbani (§ 4, Mabillon, ibid. p. 4), has led some to suppose that he was of Irish extraction (Cave, Hist. Eccl. i. 580), but the phrase more probably alludes to his having been educated by Irish monks (Mabillon, ibid. note; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 262-3). Our knowledge of his life is derived from scattered hints in his writings. About 618 he entered the monastery of Bobbio between Genoa and Milan, where Attala had three years before succeeded St. Columban, the founder and first abbat. Here he was instructed, and perhaps acted as secretary to Attala and Bertulfus who succeeded Attala in 627. In this year he accompanied the new abbat to Rome, where he obtained from Pope Honorius immunity for his monastery from episcopal jurisdiction (Vita Bertulfi, § 4 sqq., Mabillon, p. 151). An obscure allusion to three years' journeyings by sea (Vita Columbani, § 2, Mabillon, p. 3) perhaps gave rise to the idea that he visited Ireland to collect materials for the early life of Columban, an idea unsupported by evidence and implicitly contradicted by the tone in which he speaks of that country (cf. Lanigan, ibid.). About 640 he left Bobbio, and three years later, after visiting Luxeuil, undertook the life of St. Columban and his successors, while probably sojourning at Evoriac (now Farmoutier) in the diocese of Meaux. This was the monastery of St. Burgundofara, whose life he also wrote. In 659 he was a few days at Réomé in the diocese of Langres on his way to Châlons-sur-Saône to accomplish some mission imposed upon him by the young king Clotaire III. and the queen-mother Balthildis (Vita S. Joannis, præf., Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 856). He is thought to have been still living in 665, but the date of his death is unknown. That he was an abbat appears from his own assertion (Vita S. Joannis, ibid.) and from the testimony of his contemporary Raimbertus (Vita S. Walarici, § 9, Mabillon, ibid. ii. 73), but of what monastery is doubtful. The authors of the Hist. Litt. de la France think it was Elnone, St. Amandus's foundation, and consequently must identify him with St. Jonatus of Marchiennes. But though he undoubtedly visited Elnone the dates are against his identity with Jonatus, which would prolong his life till about 690. Wattenbach places him at Bobbio (Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, i. 93) and others at Luxeuil (Cave, i. 580), but it is not clear that the catalogues of either of these monasteries admit of the insertion of his name at this period. Cave erroneously gives two abbats of the name, ascribing, however, the life of John of Réomé to both of them (i. 580, 591). Short accounts of his life may be found in Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 603-4; Ceillier, xi. 737; Abel, Die Geschichtschreiber der Deutschen Vorzeit, vii. 75-76; Fabricius, cited Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1009; Cave, Hist. Eccl. i. 580; Hardy, Descriptive Cat. of Brit. Hist. i. part i. p. 210.

His Works.—These consist of biographies of St. Columbanus, Eustasius and Attala, his successors at Luxeuil and Bobbio respectively, of Bertulfus the 3rd abbat of Bobbio, and of St. Burgundofara and Joannes of Réomé. The first four are extremely valuable. Though he arrived at Bobbio three years after Columban's death, he was intimate with many who had known him well, and protests that he relates only what he had heard from credible witnesses. Attala, Eustasius and Bertulfus, he had known personally. St. Fara's life is little else than an account of the miracles supposed to have occurred at Evoriac during her rule, while in that of St. John of Réomé, who died about 120 years earlier, he merely retouched an older biography, adding an account of his miracles in the form of a dialogue [JOANNES, abbat of Réomé]. Surius published four of these lives, Columban's on Nov. 29, Attala's on March 10, Eustasius's Mar. 29, and Bertulfus's Aug. 19, but imperfectly and with alterations of the text. The Bollandists give those of Attala and Eustasius correctly from original MSS. (Acta SS. Mar. ii. 43-5, iii. 786-90). Mabillon in his 2nd sæc. gave all in the order of their deaths except that of John of Réomé, in whose case he had preferred the work of the earlier writer, and gave only the book of miracles from Jonas (sæc. i. 612 sqq.). From Mabillon is taken the edition of Jonas' works in the Patrologia Latina (lxxvii. 1011-87). The life of Columban has been translated by Abel (Geschichtschreiber, ibid. 77-95) and Arnauld d'Andilly.

In the literary dearth of the 7th century Jonas is a writer of some importance, and obtained a considerable reputation. His contemporary Raimbertus speaks of him as "vir magnus, eloquentia plenus et dictandi peritus, polito et limato satis sermone" (Vita S. Wularici, § 9, Mabillon, ibid. ii. 73). Bede incorporates the lives of Columban and his successors into his ecclesiastical history, while Flodoard turned Columban's life into hexameters (lib. xiv. c. 18, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 870). This eloquentia which delighted the 7th century, and which Wattenbach traces to an education by Italian grammarians, consists in an artificial and bombastic style repugnant to good taste, and not unfrequently obscuring the sense. But notwithstanding this drawback, and some errors of chronology and history, his works are of great value, especially for the history of the great Irish missionary and his followers. For estimates of them and an account of the editions &c., see Hist. Litt. iii. 604-8; Ceillier, xi. 737; Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, i. 92, ii. 368; Hardy, Descriptive Catal. i. 1, 210-1; Abel, ibid. pp. 75-6; Fabricius, ibid.

JONAS (7), monk of Fontenelle in the first half of the 8th century, was the author of the life of St. Wulframnus the bishop of Sens who after his mission in Friesland retired to Fontenelle and died there in 720 (not 710 as Cave erroneously states, Hist. Eccl. i. 623; cf. Gall. Christ. xii. 10). Jonas, who undertook the task at the bidding of his abbat St. Baiuus, and apparently on the occasion of the translation of the saint's body eight years after his death, must have known Wulframnus personally. Critics pronounce that the life, as we have it, has been altered and interpolated to a great extent. Surius published it in this condition (Mart. 20). The Bollandists thought it unworthy of a place in their collection, and contented themselves with extracts (Acta SS. Mart. iii. 143 n. 2). Mabillon, after some hesitation, published it in full, but with the addition of brackets and notes to indicate the probable alterations and additions (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pars i. 340-8, Venice, 1734). Mabillon also inclines to see in Jonas the monk of Fontenelle, who wrote the life of St. Conedus, a recluse in a neighbouring isle, which he published from a MS. of that monastery (ibid. saec. ii. 826-9). The Bollandists, however, ascribe it to Aigradus on the authority of words used by him in his life of St. Ansbertus (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 345 n. 16), but, according to the editors of the Hist. Litt. de la France, erroneously. The latter consider that the style favours the authorship of Jonas (iv. 35, 55-7), though other evidence is wanting.

JONAS (8), Jacobite bishop of Beth-Nuhadra, from before 759 to 773. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 111 and Dissert. de Monoph. num. ix. in B. O. ii.; Le Quien, ii. 1591.)

[C. H.]

JONAS (9), Jacobite bishop of Gulmarga, before 790. (Assem. B. O. ii. 432 and Dissert. de Monoph. num. ix.; Le Quien, ii. 1581.)

[C. H.]

JONAS (10)—Sept. 22, presbyter and monk, mentioned in the acts of his two sons Theodorus and Theophanes, confessors for images. He ended his days in the new Laura of St. Sabas in Palestine. The Basilian menology places him under the above day, on which also the prophet Jonah was commemorated. The Bollandist Suyken, following other martyrologies, assigns him

Sept. 21 (Acta SS. Sept. vi. 270), and believes him to have died about the beginning of the 9th century [JONIUS].

[C. H.]

JONATUS (JONAS), ST., first abbat of Marchiennes, about three leagues from Douay, in the latter half of the 7th century. This monastery was founded by St. Amandus on land of Adalbaldus, the husband of St. Rictrudis, probably about the year 643, though in the Annales Marchianenses an interpolated entry, in 13th-century handwriting according to the note in Pertz, puts it as early as 610 (Monum. Germ. xviii. 610). St. Amandus entrusted the government of his foundation to Jonatus, who was then a monk at the monastery of Elhone (St. Amand), about three leagues from Marchiennes. A few years later, perhaps in 652, he succeeded Ursus at St. Amand, and held the two abbacies together until the following year, when St. Amandus, quitting his see, resumed the charge of the latter. Thereupon Jonatus retired to Marchiennes, which he ruled till his death, about the year 690. During his abbacy St. Rictrudis, with her two daughters, retired to Marchiennes, and thenceforth apparently it became a monastery for both sexes (Vita S. Rictrudis, Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 944). There is no authoritative information as to his life, but the Bollandists publish extracts from two sets of nine lectiones, ascribed to the monk Huchald, circ. A.D. 930 (Hist. Litt. de la France, vi. 220; Ceillier, Hist. Générale des Auteurs Sacrés, xii. 802), as bearing on his history. The authors of the Hist. Litt. de la France (iii. 603-4) and others would identify Jonatus with the abbat Jonas, who wrote the life of St. Columban amongst other works, but the conjecture has not met with general acceptance [JONAS (6)].

After Jonatus's death Marchiennes became wholly or principally a nunnery, and so remained till about 1024, when the nuns were expelled and monks restored. Jonatus is commemorated Aug. 1, the supposed date of his birth, and April 8, that of his elevation, but his name does not appear in the more ancient martyrologies. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 70-5; Gall. Christ. iii. 393.)

JONILLA, martyr at Langres. [JUNILLA.]

JONIUS, Aug. 5, presbyter and martyr in Gaul, cir. 287. The tradition is contained in the Acta Breviora printed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Aug. ii. 13). In the Roman Martyrology of Baronius the name is Jonas and the day Sept. 22, where there is evidently a confusion with Jonas of St. Sabas [JONAS (10)].

[C. H.]

JORDANES, bishop of Abila (Belinas) in the province Phoenicia Secunda, took part in the synod of Antioch, A.D. 445, and was represented at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 570; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 843.)

[J. de S.]

JORDANES, bishop of Cotrona. [JOANNES (132).]

JORDANIS (JORNANDES has been till recent times the more commonly used form of the name But the MS. evidence is against it. It is possible that Grimm's hypothesis that Jornandes was the Gothic name, which on his becoming an ecclesiastic was changed to Jordanis, is true (Wattenbach, p. 62), historian of the Goths (and probably bishop of Crotona, in Brutium) in the middle of the 6th century.

Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 1877, pp. 55–67. From the works of these three authors a full survey of the whole question may be derived. Their information is based upon important earlier works, especially Cassell, Magyarische Alterthümer, 1848, and Shirren, De ratione quae inter Jordanem et Cassiodorum intercedat commentatio, Dorpat, 1858. See also von Sybel, De Fontibus Libri Jordanis, &c., Berlin, 1838, and the same author in *Histor. II. Writings.—The only works of Jordanis of which we have certain knowledge are the De breviatione chronicorum (more commonly but wrongly called De regnorum successione) and the De Getarum origine et rebus gestis. It has been conjectured (see below) that he also compiled a work on geography, which is quoted by the Cosmographus Ravennatensis, and which being largely borrowed from Cassiodorus, senator, was in part worked up into the De Getarum origine.

(1) The De breviatione chronicorum (Muratori, Scriptores Rerum Ital. i. 222–42) is a compendium of the history of the world. The work is of little value, and only important as indicating the strong feeling of the Goth Jordanis that the power of the Roman empire was to last to the end of time. It also shews what authorities Jordanis had probably come in contact with, independently of those quoted in the work of Cassiodorus, which is a matter of importance in the investigation of the problem of his History of the Goths.

The relation of the De breviatione to the De Getarum origine appears to be as follows. Jordanis was engaged on the De breviatione, when his friend Castalius urged him to compress what he knew of the larger work of Cassiodorus into a smaller history of the Goths. He broke off his chronicle, which he was then writing in the twenty-fourth year of Justinian (April 550–551) at the point which he had then reached, probably the captivity of Vitigis in 539. He at once began to work upon the Gothic history, and completed it probably in the year 551, or at the beginning of 552. He then again worked at the chronicle, continued it up to a somewhat later date than the History, and completed it in 552. The Chronicle was dedicated to Vigilius, probably the pope (see below), and sent to him with the History (cf. the dedication, Muratori, i. p. 222).

(2) The De Getarum origine et rebus gestis.—This is one of the most important works written during the period of the Teutonic settlements in Western Europe, and its contents and purpose deserve a careful investigation. In amount of matter it may be equal to about twenty pages of this Dictionary. Its contents are most conveniently arranged under four heads (cf. Ebert. p. 532).

1 (cap. i. 13). The work opens with a geographical account of the world and in particular of Northern Europe and the island "Scandza," Jordanis then identifies the Goths with the Scythians, whose country he describes, and praises their learning and their bravery. He then recounts their wars with the Egyptians and the Amazons, and, identifying the Goths with the Getae, describes the deeds of Telephus and Tomyris. Cyrus, Xerxes, and Alexander the Great are mentioned, as also Caesar and Tiberius. With the 18th chapter he suddenly passes to the devastation of the banks of the Danube by the Goths and their victory over the Romans. At this point, having brought the Goths in contact with the Romans, he breaks off his record to give fuller details about the royal Gothic race of the Amali.

2 (cap. 14–23). He carries the genealogy of the Amali down to Mathasuentha, the granddaughter of Theodoric and widow of Vitigis, who just before the time Jordanis was writing had married, as he tells us, Germanus, brother of Justinian. He then returns to the Goths and their movement into Moesia and Thracia. Claiming for the emperor Maximus a Gothic father he thus raises the Goths to high honour. The deeds of Ostrogotha are then related, the victory over the Gepidae, the expeditions to Asia Minor, and Geberich's conquest of the Vandals. After Geberich came Hermanaric conqueror of the Heneti and many other tribes.

3 (cap. 24–47). In the third division of the history Jordanis begins with an account of the Huns, of their victory over the Goths, and of the death of Hermanaric. He traces the separation of the Visigoths from the Ostrogoths, and follows their history. He gives a short account of Alaric's invasion of Italy, and following the Visigothic history he introduces the history of Attila's invasion of Gaul and defeat. The battle of Châlons is described at considerable length. At the close of the section he gives an account of the subjugation of Italy by Odoacer and the deposition of Augustulus.

4 (cap. 48–60). Jordanis now returns to the Ostrogoths, once more mentions the defeat of Hermanaric, and this leads him to speak of the death of Attila. He describes the movement of the Ostrogoths into Pannonia, the reign of Theodemir and the birth of Theodoric. The history of the dealings of Theodoric with Zeno, of his entrance into Italy and his victory over Odoacer are given. The outline of the fortunes of the Goths in Italy is related very briefly, and the work closes with the captivity of Vitigis, and another mention of the marriage of Mathasuentha with Germanus.

The words of Jordanis himself in the dedication of the De Getarum origine, or History of the Goths—as it may be more convenient to call it—are the best introduction to the discussion of the problems connected with the work itself.

"Volentem me . . . oram tranquilli literis stringere . . . in altum, frater Castali, laxare vela compellis, relictoque opusculo quod intra manus habeo, id est, de abbreviatiōne chronicorum, suades, ut nostris verbis duodecim senatoris volumina de origine actibusque Getarum, ab olim adusque nunc per generationes regesque descendunt in uno et hoc parvo libello coartem, dura satis imperia . . . Super omne autem pondus, quod nec facultas eorumdem librorum nobis datur, quatenus ejus sensui inserviamus. Sed ut non mentiar, ad triduanam lectionem dispensatoris ejus beneficio libros ipsos antehoc relegi. Quorum quamvis verba non recolo, sensus tamen et res actas credo me integre tenere. Ad quos et ex nonnullis historiis Graecis ac Latinis addi convenientia, initium finemque et plura in medio mea dictione permiscens.”*

The impression which Jordanis wished to be derived from these words appears to be that he had written an abstract of what he could retain from memory, of a three days' reading of the History of the Goths by Cassiodorus, that he had added extracts of his own from Latin and Greek writers, which he had in his own hand, and that the beginning and middle and end of the work were his own composition. With a view to the examination of these statements, it will be well first to consider the relation of the two works of Jordanis to one another, especially with reference to his use of authorities in them. And this investigation will throw light on the connexion between the work of Jordanis, and the lost twelve books of Gothic History by Cassiodorus. It may fairly be assumed that the Chronicle was nearly completed before the History was begun, though this assumption is not absolutely necessary to the general conclusion—What is practically made probable by the comparison of the works is that the greater number of the authorities quoted in the History were not in the hands of Jordanis at all. We may first notice that, in giving an account in the history of events mentioned in the Chronicle (see Köpke, 62, 63, where several passages are carefully compared), Jordanis several times introduces new and important matter which he would probably have used, if he had had access to it, in writing the Chronicle. The most conspicuous instance of this is in the case of the account of the Huns. In the Chronicle there is no mention of the early history of the Huns, and of Attila only what Marcellinus Comes gives is related. But in the De Getarum origine the statements about the Huns, their invasion of Western Europe, and the battle of Châlons, occupy a fifth part of the whole work. Further, Jordanis quotes in his history a great many new authorities of whom there is no mention, and from whom there are no extracts in the Chronicle. He quotes, or occasionally misquotes, Tacitus, Strabo, Mela, Dio Chrysostomus, Trogus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Dexippus and others, (see Von Sybel, De Fontibus Libri Jordanis).

And when, leaving the special comparison of the History with the Chronicle, we consider the nature of the quotation in the History, there appears every reason to think that Jordanis did not use his materials at first hand. He quotes, for instance (cap. 2), from Livy a passage which is clearly borrowed from Tacitus. He twice quotes Claudius Ptolemaeus in describing the island and people of Scandza, but there is nothing given by Jordanis which corresponds with what Ptolemaeus says, and it is clear that he knew his name only, and not his writings. There is other evidence of this kind, which shews that Jordanis in his History was not himself in contact with many of his authorities, though he is sufficiently near the original in many of his quotations to warrant the supposition that he had hastily copied, or in part tried to remember the quotations made by another writer. On the other hand, he never once mentions in the History Marcellinus Comes, whom (next after Cassiodorus) he uses most largely, and on whose work the last chapter of the History is entirely based. The most probable conclusion to be drawn would seem to be that Jordanis had before him when writing the History, Orosius and Marcellinus Comes, as before in the case of the Chronicle, and that far the greater part of the remainder of the work is based on Cassiodorus, consisting partly of extracts actually copied, and partly of fragmentary recollections of parts of the work which he had not copied. As we know Jordanis to have copied authorities without acknowledging them in several cases, there seems no difficulty in assuming that he had copied extracts from the work of Cassiodorus, on which he himself acknowledges that his History is based. And this is far more likely than that he trusted to his memory, as he seems to imply, for all which he gives from Cassiodorus. The learned apparatus of authorities would then naturally be ascribed to Cassiodorus. For it would seem impossible that a writer such as Jordanis clearly was (he calls himself “agrammatus”) could have come in contact with, and been able to use adequately the number of authorities mentioned in his History. His many misquotations may be, in some cases, due to a mere desire to use, in a showy manner, names of authorities whom he had heard or seen, or occasionally to a misunderstanding or confusion of a quotation made by Cassiodorus himself. The belief that the De Getarum origine consists mainly of extracts from the History of Cassiodorus, unskillfully woven together by Jordanis, is borne out by its fragmentary and confused character. In several cases the extracts seem to have been fitted into their wrong places (Bessell, 102, 114). There are many gaps, omissions, and unnecessary repetitions. Thus in cap. 9 the following passage occurs: “quos Getas jam superiori loco Gothos esse probavimus Orosio Paulo dicente.” But in the 5th chapter, where the Getae are mentioned, no such proof is forthcoming. (Compare also cap. 17 and cap. 4, and see Köpke, 72.) The work is in fact a mosaic of fragments fitted together, rather than a continuous history. This, indeed, Jordanis himself to a certain extent acknowledges when he says in his preface, “addidi convenientia initium finemque et plura in medio mea dictione permiscens.” It might certainly have been supposed from these words that the preface at least was the composition of Jordanis himself. But the most convincing evidence of the writer's want of originality has been shewn by the discovery made by Von Sybel with reference to this preface (Schmidt, Zeitschrift für Geschichte, vii. 288). It is to a great extent a literal copy of the introduction by Rufinus to his translation of Origen's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. The comparison of the two works will shew the plagiarism of Jordanis in its clearest light.

It will be well now to consider how far the statements of Jordanis as to his relation to Cassiodorus receive confirmation from what we know of the works or life of Cassiodorus himself. Certain passages of the De Getarum Origine, as Köpke has shewn, correspond with what Cassiodorus says in the Variarum (e. g. Variarum, xii. 22, 24, and Jordanis, 29; see Köpke, 68-70). The amount of verbal similarity extends in these cases only to a few words here and there; but there are other indications no less marked of the hand of Cassiodorus. In the eleventh chapter of the history, Jordanis relates the nature of the instruction given by Ciceneus to the Goths—"Qui . . . omnem paene philosophiam eos instruxit; erat enim hujus rei magister peritus. Nam ethicam eos erudiens barbaricos mores persecuit; physicam tradens naturaliter propriis legibus vivere fecit . . .; logicam instruens eos rationis supra ceteras gentes fecit expertos; practice ostendens, in bonis actibus conversari suavit; theoricam demonstrans signorum duodecim et per ea planetarum cursus omnemque astronomiam contemplari edocuit," &c. This enumeration of the sciences of ethics, physics, logic, and astronomy corresponds with much that we know of the learning and writings of Cassiodorus. And the distinction between practice and theory is actually given in similar terms in the "De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Litterarum" of Cassiodorus, cap. ii. De Arte Rhetorica (Migne, lxx. 1157).

The authorities already mentioned, who are quoted by Jordanis, were, most of them, undoubtedly known to Cassiodorus. There is no question whatever that Cassiodorus had a very real and solid acquaintance with Latin literature. The writings of the chief grammarians, chroniclers, and church historians were familiar ground to him. Hence there is little difficulty in ascribing to him all the knowledge which seems to shine through the erratic and unlearned representation of it which Jordanis provides.

Among the authorities which Jordanis quotes special notice may here be taken of three only:—

(a) In cap. 15, in speaking of the emperor Maximus, he says: "Ut dicit Symmachus in quinto suae historiae libro." This work is lost, but there can be hardly any doubt that it was the work of Symmachus, the father-in-law of Boethius, with whom Cassiodorus would be well acquainted, and not the work of Q. Aurelius Symmachus, author of the Relationes. This is proved almost beyond question since the discovery of the Anekdoton Holderi. Cassiodorus himself, in this document, says of Symmachus: "Parentesque suos imitatus historicum quoque Romanam septem libris edidit" (see Anekdoton Holderi, Usener. Bonn. 1877, p. 4, and p. 29).

(b) One lost authority, Ablavius, is spoken of by Jordanis (cap. 4) in the following terms: "Quod et Ablavius, descriptor Gothorum gentis egregius, verissima attestatur historia." He is quoted also in chapters 14 and 23. Many conjectures have been made about him. Von Sybel supposed from the words which precede the passage quoted above ("quemodmodum et in praecipis eorum carminibus paene historicum vita in Commune recolitur"), that he had collected the sagas of the Goths. This, however, seems hardly to be borne out by the context. The derivation of Hemli from  $\epsilon\lambda\eta$ , which Jordanis (cap. 23) ascribes to Ablavius, has given rise to the supposition that he was a Byzantine writer. In any case he was probably one of the authorities of Cassiodorus, and not used as an original source by Jordanis (Köpke, 82; Wattenbach, 57).

(c) It has been shewn by Waitz (Gott. Nachv. 1865, 97 ff.), that the annals of Ravenna were used as an authority in several passages of the History of Jordanis (e. g. in chap. 57, in the account of the war between Theoderic and Odoacer, and in the end of cap. 45, p. 163, ed. Closs.). It has been proved that Cassiodorus made considerable use of these annals in his Chronicon, hence the assumption that the use in the De Getarum Origine of the annals of Ravenna is that of Cassiodorus, and not that of Jordanis, is a natural one (Holder-Egger, "Die Ravennaten-Annalen," in Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft f. ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde, i. pp. 296-298, Han. 1876). If the general view of the History of the Goths by Jordanis here taken (which was first propounded by Schirren, and afterwards worked out by Köpke, Bessel, and others) be true, the standard of Jordanis as a historian is but low. He does not acknowledge several authorities whom he largely uses, and he displays an array of authorities as if quoted by himself, of whom he personally knows nothing except at second-hand. At the same time it must be remembered that Jordanis does not claim originality for himself, except under the clause in the preface ("initium finemque et plura in medio mea dictione permiscens"). A few words in the preface, even after the exposure of the source from which it is borrowed, remain his own. Some lines in the last two chapters are certainly original. And though we have certain evidence that his Chronicon was based on other writers, yet in the one or two passages where he seems to quote from it in the History may be reasonably admitted under "dictio mea." But this phrase receives considerable extension if a theory suggested by Bessel be accepted. On eight occasions in the Ravennatis Anonymi Cosmographia, Jordanis is quoted as cosmographer in the following or similar terms: "Testatus mihi Jordanis cosmographus," &c. Seven out of these eight passages are found in Jordanis's History of the Goths. Bessel thinks it not improbable that on the first occasion when Jordanis saw the Gothic history of Cassiodorus, he made extracts simply for the purpose of a geographical work, which work is the one that the cosmographer of Ravenna quotes. Then when he saw the work for a second and hasty perusal ("ad triduanam lectionem . . . antehoc relegi") he made extracts of a more general kind, picking out the history of Attila and other matters that seemed to him most interesting. This theory will explain the large amount of geographical matter that is found in the sixty chapters of the history. It also extends the application of "dictio mea" to those passages, especially in the opening chapters of the work, which may be supposed to be borrowed from the geographical compilation of Jordanis himself. Yet at the same time the substratum of the whole work must still be ascribed to Cassiodorus, so that in any case the ultimate verdict on Jordanis is not one which allows him much individuality as a historian.

The question now arises whether it is possible to disentangle the real work of Cassiodorus from the setting in which Jordanis has placed it. That many passages in Jordanis bear the stamp of the solid original work of Cassiodorus; that many of the authorities named by Jordanis would be probably familiar to Cassiodorus, can, as we have seen, be shewn. But a complete separation of the work of Cassiodorus from the rest can from the very circumstances of the case hardly be possible. Köpke (pp. 74-76) has attempted to indicate the places where Jordanis breaks off from or returns to the extracts from Cassiodorus with phrases such as "unde digressi sumus," or "ut ad nostrum propositum redeamus." In this way he separates off from the main part of the book that which he considers to be the framework fitted together by Jordanis out of quotations from Virgil and Marcellinus Comes, or here and there words of his own. This, however, does not supply us with any means for getting at the passages which may be considered to be pure unaltered extracts from Cassiodorus himself. For, indeed, it is impossible to do so. There is enough of obvious mistakes or misquotation throughout the book to make it certain that we cannot attain to this. Yet of this much we may be tolerably sure, that though the work has passed through the hands of Jordanis, and though many parts of the extracts bear the traces of his treatment and colouring, yet enough remains of the lost work to enable us to feel certain of close contact with the mind and words of Cassiodorus, and, to a certain extent, to understand the purpose before him in his great work.

Before considering the object of the twelve books of Cassiodorus' Gothic history, so far as we can gather that object from the reproduction which Jordanis has given us, notice should be taken of any information which can be obtained about the work from outside sources. The history of the Goths (called probably De Origine Actuque Geticæ Gentis) was arranged by Cassiodorus in twelve parts after the manner of his church history (Historia Ecclesiastica Tripartita), and the state papers (called Varie sc. Epistolæ), both of which are in twelve parts. It was certainly completed before 534, the year of the death of Athalaric (see the quotation, Varie, ix. 25, below). It has been supposed by Köpke and others that the work was completed just before Athalaric's death, about 533, and that the words in Jordanis (cap. 59) "cetera in pace et tranquillitate passessa," which follow statements about the reign of Athalaric and his mother, mark the close of the last extract made from Cassiodorus.

Since the discovery of the Anekdoton Holderi, however, it has become practically certain that the Gothic History was composed some years before 533. Cassiodorus says of himself in the Anekdoton, "Scripsit, præcipiente Theodorico rege, historiam Gothicam, originem eorum et loca moresque xii. libris annuntians." Now the Anekdoton was written in 522. The Gothic History was, therefore, written probably not later than 521. The difference made in our estimate of the work of Jordanis by the change of date for the close of the extracts from Cassiodorus is very small. He gives but very little information for the years between 521 and 533, and it is but a very few additional lines which are thus carried to his credit as possibly his own original composition (Anekdoton Holderi, Usener, p. 4, p. 74, Bonn, 1877). In any case, however, his words, "ab olim adusque nunc," about the History of Cassiodorus cannot be exactly true. Jordanis was writing about the year 552, and the work of Cassiodorus was probably ended more than thirty years before.

In two passages of the Varie Cassiodorus takes notice of his Gothic History. In the introduction he puts into the mouth of a friend the following words, "Duodecim libris Gothorum historiam defloratis prosperitatibus condidisti." But by far the most important passage, of which nearly every word is helpful in shewing the purpose of his work, is in the ninth book of the Varie (25), where Cassiodorus gives a description of his History in a letter addressed nominally by the king Athalaric to the senate in 534, when on the occasion of Cassiodorus being made prætorian prefect: "Tendit se etiam in antiquam prosapiam nostram, lectione discens quod vix majorum notitia cana retinebat. Iste reges Gothorum longa oblivione celatos latibus vetustatis eduxit. Iste Amalos cum generis sui claritate restituit, evidenter ostendens in deciman septimam progeniem nos habere regalem. Originem Gothicam historiam fecit esse Romanam, colligens quasi in unam coronam germen floridum, quod per librorum campos passim fuerat ante dispersum. Perpendite quantum vos in nostra laude delixerit, qui vestri Principis nationem docuit ab antiquitate mirabilem, ut sicut fuistis a majoribus vestris semper nobiles aestimati, ita vobis regum antiqua progenies imperaret."

These words, which are undoubtedly those of Cassiodorus himself, clearly shew that the primary object of his book was not literary, but political. He saw the growing antagonism between Goths and Romans, and he was a daily witness of Theoderic's efforts to lessen that antagonism. He saw the king trying to combine the old and the new elements, and to form a kingdom in which Roman and Goth could live side by side with mutual respect for one another. He determined to assist by his writing his master's plans. His aim in his literary work was the same as that of Theoderic in his political work. He would try to draw the Goths and Romans together by shewing them that the two nations were alike honourable both for the antiquity of their race and for the glory of their history. He would tell the Goths of the greatness of the Roman empire, with whom they fought in ancient days, and he would shew the Romans that the kingly family of the Amali was as noble as that of any Roman house. No one was better fitted than Cassiodorus to write a history of the Goths. His real knowledge of ancient writers, his constant opportunities of converse with the king and the Gothic nobles, his personal share and that of his father in all the later or contemporary events, provided him with ample material for his work of different kinds. What the history as a whole was like, and how the twelve books were arranged, we have now no power of knowing. But with reference to the earlier part of the work we can clearly see from Jordanis how the political theory of Cassiodorus was worked out. He adopted the belief, which many of the writers whose works he knew had helped, that the Getae and the Goths were the same nation. Further than this he accepted the identity of the Goths with the Scythians, a theory which had been stated by several Greek writers. Thus the Goths were brought into contact or conflict with the great nations of antiquity, and even the Amazons appear as Gothic women. These theories were of the greatest value to him, and he doubtless used every available record or tradition to make them real and living. Yet even with all the notices which he could collect from Greek or Roman authorities, and with all the stories and sagas that he heard at the court of Ravenna, his stock of accurate information about the early history of the Goths cannot have been large. It must also always be remembered that the very theory of the history with which Cassiodorus wrote his book shews that much of his writings must be accepted with reserve. His main purpose was to write in the interests of a certain nation and a certain family. Thus his connexion with and reverence for Theoderic led him to glorify the royal stock of the Amali. The Balthei, therefore, whatever their real position may have been, could for Cassiodorus be only "secunda nobilitas" as compared with the "prima nobilitas" of the Amali. Hence it is clear that all such theories as that of an under-kingdom or a second grade of nobility when based on passages of Jordanis alone must be considered as at least precarious.

Thirty years after the last Roman statesman had written his Gothic history to teach his countrymen that they might without shame respect and honour the ancient race of the Goths, the Gothic bishop, in his adaptation of the work, shewed that he rested his hopes of the future quite as much on the Roman empire as on the Gothic race itself. However little individuality as a historian Jordanis may have had, at least it lay with him to choose and adapt his extracts from Cassiodorus in accordance with his own feelings, and there is enough of himself in his work to enable us to catch something of the spirit in which he wrote. For him the end of the great struggle between Goths and Romans had come, as he seems to imply in his words in the fourteenth chapter: "qualiter autem aut quomodo Amalorum regnum destructum est, loco suo, si Dominus juvaverit, edocebimus."

For him the war between Totila and Belisarius, or Narses, which was yet going on while he wrote, had no supreme interest. The race of the Amali, with which he was connected, and on which all his hopes were centred, had ceased to rule the Goths. His desires for the future rested rather on the union of the brother of the emperor with the granddaughter of Theoderic than on the issue of a struggle which he probably and rightly thought hopeless. His Catholic sympathies, rejecting the idea of an Arian ruler, and his family pride, alike contributed to this result. Three times in the course of his work he alludes to the marriage of Mathasuentha, widow of Vitigis (with whom she had been brought in captivity to Constantinople) to Germanus, brother of the emperor Justinian (cap. 14, 48, 60). In the last passage he tells how Germanus had died, leaving an infant son: "Item Germanus: in quo conjuncta Aniciorum gens cum Amala stirpe spem adhuc utriusque generis Domino praestante promittit. Hucusque Getarum origo ac Amalorum nobilitas et virorum fortium facta ac laudanda progenies. Laudabiliori principi censis et fortiori duci manus dedit, ejus fama nullit seculis, nullis silebitur aetatibus, sed victor ac triumphator Justinianus imperator et consul Belisarius Vandalici, Africani, Geticique dicentur." We see here elsewhere what the spirit of a Gothic ecclesiastic in the 6th century was.

The work of Jordanis is the first since Tacitus which attempts to treat the history of the Teutonic nations from their side. The manner in which this is done is full of interest. The eternity of the empire had impressed itself on the mind of Jordanis. The idea, therefore, that the Goths were equally learned and equally ancient with the Romans must have been an assistance and support to him (or others like him), when Theoderic was visibly ruling almost as a miniature emperor in Italy. But the thought of a union between the imperial family and the Amali must have been one which would reconcile, and alone satisfactorily reconcile, his hopes for the great family to which he himself belonged, and his belief in the church and empire of Rome. This traditional belief in the empire and the church was destined never to be altogether broken in Italy. And after two centuries of struggles between rival principles in church and state the next Italian ecclesiastic who attained importance as a historian, Paulus Diaconus, himself, like Jordanis, of Teutonic race, was able to witness the return of imperial power of old Rome, and to have personal and friendly intercourse with the new Teutonic emperor himself. To Jordanis the first Teutonic historian of a Teutonic race such a possibility was unknown, and he could only fix fruitless hopes on a union of the Greek and the Goth, to solve his difficulties. For the spirit of the age and times which we thus seem to gather from Jordanis's work we owe him a debt of gratitude in the first place, and in the second place for his preservation, if only in a broken form, of fragments from the greatest work of Theodoric's great secretary.

Editions.—For a complete list of editions see Potthast, Bibliotheca Historica Mediæ Aevi, 1862, p. 102. The most important editions of the history of the Goths are as follows:—

- (1) Together with Paulus Diaconus, Conv. Pentinger. Ang. Vind. 1515. (2) With Procopius, ex rec. Beati Rhenani Basil. 1531.

- (5) Gruteri, in Hist. Aug. SS. Lat. Minores, 1611. (6) In Bibl. Patr. Max. Lug. 1677.
- (7) In Cassiod. Opera, c. P. Gavetii notis. Rothomagni, 1679, and Venetiis 1729. (8) Muratori, Scriptores Rev. Ital. i. 187–241. Medial. 1723. (9) Migne, Patrologiæ Cursus, lxi. Appendix to works of Cassiodorus. (10) Jordanis, De Getarum Origine et Rebus Gestis, ed. C. A. Closs. Stuttgart. 1861.

An edition is promised as part of the Monumenta Germaniæ, among the Auctores Antiquissimi, under the superintendence of Prof. Mommsen. The two works of Jordanis are undertaken by Mommsen himself. Neues Archiv. D. G. F. ältere Deutschen Geschichtskunde, ii. 5.

III. Life.—Jordanis tells us that his grandfather was notary to Candac, chief of the Alani in Moesia, and that he himself was a notary before he became an ecclesiastic. The words “ante conversionem meam” opposed to “notarius fui,” no doubt imply that he entered a monastery. He says that he was of the Gothic race, and he was apparently connected with the royal family of the Amali. We know from his own writings no more of him, and nothing further can be absolutely certain. But a discovery, first made by Cassel, has led to an extremely important conjecture about the identity of Jordanis, which is so much confirmed in various ways that it may be considered as at least of very high probability.<sup>b</sup> The name of one Jordanes Crotonensis, bishop of Crotona (now Cotrone) in Bruttium, is found, with the names of several other bishops, appended to a document sometimes called the Damnatio Theodori, issued by pope Vigilius in August 551 at Constantinople. If this should be our Jordanis, it becomes exceedingly probable that the Vigilius already mentioned, to whom the Chronicle of Jordanis is dedicated and sent, along with the History of the Goths, is Vigilius the pope. In order to discuss the question it will be well to notice shortly the occasions on which pope Vigilius and Jordanes, bishop of Cotrone, were probably thrown together. Vigilius was pope from 537 to 555. He had been made pope by the influence of Belisarius at Rome, at the request of the empress Theodora. After the issue of the Three Chapters by Justinian, which Vigilius apparently dared not sign when in Italy, the pope was summoned to Constantinople, which he reached on Christmas Day in 547. He was retained at Constantinople, or in the neighbourhood, for seven years, till the end of 554, when he at last obtained permission from Justinian to return to Italy. During his stay at Constantinople he was much persecuted by the emperor and his party, who tried to force him against his will to sign a confession of faith in accordance with their views. He was bold enough to excommunicate the bishop of Caesarea, and then fearing the emperor's wrath, he took sanctuary in the basilica of St. Peter, in Constantinople. The praetor then came to drag him forth by the feet or beard, or in any way he could; but he held tight to the altar, and upset it, and nearly pulled it on to himself, which so shocked the people and the soldiers that the praetor found it necessary to desist. It was while he was in this church with his companions, and, among others, several Italian bishops, that he issued (Aug. 551) the document in which the name of Jordanes, bishop of Cotrone, is found. He at length came out of the church with a promise of safety, but again, in fear of the emperor, he fled to the church of St. Euphemia, at Chalcedon. He refused to be present at the second council of Constantinople, which was held in 553, and he published a constitution of his own on the subject of the discussions of that council. For doing this his name was erased from the diptychs. He was allowed to return to Italy in 554, and died at Syracuse, on his way home, in 555. Now we have seen that on internal grounds the History and the Chronicle were both completed about the year 552, in which case Jordanis the historian, if he is the same person as the bishop of Cotrone, must have been in or near Constantinople at that time. There are several reasons which make this exceedingly probable. One of the chief arguments (see Ebert, 535) against the connexion here imagined between Jordanis and the pope, is based on the supposed too great familiarity of the expressions of Jordanis in his dedication of the Chronicle to Vigilius, if he were really addressing a pope. He speaks of the History of the Goths, which he sends to Vigilius with the Chronicle, in the following words:—“jungens ei Aliud volumen . . . quatenus diversarum gentium calamitate comperta, ab omni aerumna liberum te fieri cupias et ad Deum convertas, qui est vera libertas. Legens ergo utrosque libellos scito quod diligenti mundum semper necessitas imminet . . . Estoque toto corde diligens Deum et proximum,” etc. . . . It is true that Jordanis addresses Vigilius as “frater;” but he calls him “magnifice” and “nobilissime frater.” And when the circumstances of the case are considered, when it is remembered that Vigilius was appointed by Theodora because she hoped he would be unorthodox, and what a far from dignified position he held as pope, the words of Jordanis do not seem very strange. The close relations into which their troubles had brought them, together with some deficiency, perhaps, on the part of the Goth Jordanis of knowledge as to the appropriate manner in which a Roman bishop should be addressed in writing, are sufficient to explain his language. There are several considerations now to be noticed, which make the theory under discussion a probable one:—

<sup>b</sup> The idea that Jordanis was an archbishop of Ravenna has long been known to be groundless. See Muratori, Scriptores, i. 189.

(a) We know from Jordanis directly that he was an ecclesiastic, and the knowledge of Origen's work on the Romans, which he shews in the preface, makes this indirectly probable. Hence there is no reason for supposing that he was not a bishop.

(b) The calamities and troubles which he speaks of in his address to Vigilius, certainly coincide remarkably with what we know of the pope of that name.

(c) The words which he uses in the introduction to the History in speaking to his friend Castalius, "si quid parum dictum est, et tu, ut vicinus genti, commemorans, adde," would have a special appropriateness if we may suppose Castalius to have been living at Cotrona, the home of Jordanus, because the town was not actually in possession of the Goths though in close contact with them.

(d) As we have seen, pope Vigilius fled to Chalcedon probably at the end of 551, and if Jordanus was with him, the special acquaintance which he appeared to have with the place ("Chalcedonam . . . quae hodieque quamvis regiae urbis vicinitate congaudeat, signa tamen suarum ruinarum aliquanta ad indicium retinet posteritatis," cap. 20) would be explained.

(e) Lastly, there are several considerations which make it exceedingly probable that he wrote his work at Constantinople. His almost complete ignorance of the later and contemporary events in Italy is thus explained. In the same way his detailed acquaintance, shewn in several passages, with the affairs of the empire is accounted for. And the remarkable words he uses at the close of the history have new light thrown upon them: "Nec me quis in favorem gentis praedictae quasi ex ipsa trahentem originem, aliqua addidisse credat, quam quae legi aut comperi. Nec si tamen cuncta, quae de ipsis scribuntur aut referuntur, complexus sum, nec tantum ad eorum laudem quantum ad ejus laudem qui videt, exponens." This passage is one which certainly might have been composed in the neighbourhood of the imperial court, and by one who wished to protect himself against the charge of writing in favour of the enemies of the empire.

The way in which the History came to be composed as it was seems now to become remarkably clear if we adopt, as we almost safely may, this view of the personality of Jordanus. As bishop of Cotrona, in Bruttium, he lived not far from the monastery in Bruttium (monasterium Vivariense) to which Cassiodorus had retired after his active life as a statesman was over. It was here that he first saw the twelve books of the Gothic history. It was here, again, that he was allowed by the steward of Cassiodorus a second perusal of the work. When he was with the pope in Constantinople he was suddenly called upon to write his Gothic history, and, as he tells us, he had to make the best of what materials he had at hand or could remember. The De Getarum origine et rebus gestis as we have it now is the result. [A. H. D. A.]

JORDANUS (1), twelfth bishop of Siena, subscribed to a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761 to the abbat John. (Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, Regesta Pont. 195; Ughelli, iii. 530; Cappellotti, xvii. 402, 557.) [A. H. D. A.]

JORDANUS (2), seventh bishop of Signia

(Segni), present at the Lateran synod under Stephen IV. in 769. He is mentioned by Andrew bishop of Praeneste by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in his life of this pope (num. 287 in Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1159). (Mansi, xii. 715; Hefele, § 343; Ugh. i. 1235; Cappell. vi. 618, 638. [A. H. D. A.]

JORNANDES, historian. [JORDANIS.]

JOSECHUS (JOZACHUS), Nestorian bishop of Ahwaz or Huz, cir. 500, by whom Cavades king of Persia and his daughter were healed. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1192; Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 409.) [C. H.]

JOSEPHAT. [BARLAAM.]

JOSECI, fifth catholicos of Armenia, between Gregory II. and Pharnesec (or fourth omitting Gregory). In the Narratio de Rebus Armenis and in the appended Greek catalogue (Combesis, Novum Auct. t. ii. p. 271 sq.) he is called Ἰουσάχ. The Historia Armena (Galanus, cap. 5) names him Hesy chius. The form of his name given by St. Martin (Mém. sur l'Arménie. i. 437) is Housig, and in the Historiens de l'Arménie translated by Langlois (t. i. p. 221 et freq.) it is Iousig. Moses of Khorene (lib. iii. capp. 11, 14), the Historia Armena, and the catalogue assign him six years, and St. Martin computes his dates as A.D. 330-336, those of the contemporary king of Armenia, Diran II., being A.D. 325-341. The anonymous Life of Nerses in the Historiens de l'Arménie (Langl. t. ii. p. 21) calls him the grandson of Verthanes, but Faustus of Byzantium (lib. iii. cap. 12 in Langlois) makes him the son. In both these works Josec appears as a young man, and through Verthanes he was descended from Gregory the Illuminator. If his dates are rightly computed by St. Martin, Josec I. cannot be identified with ISACOCIS. Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 1374) assumes that identification, but he does not investigate the dates. Josec I. died by martyrdom under king Diran, as related by Moses and Faustus, but the legends introduce Julian's name in a manner which clearly implies an anachronism. [C. H.]

JOSECI II., eighth catholicos of Armenia (or seventh omitting Gregory II.) between Nerses and Zaven (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1375). In the Greek catalogue mentioned in the preceding article he is named Ἰουσάχ, second of the name, with three years to his pontificate. The Historia Armena (cap. 7) assigns him four years and names him Isaac, of the race of Alpianus, bishop of Harch. Faustus of Byzantium, in the version of Langlois (lib. iii. cap. 17), names him Schahag, as does St. Martin (Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 437). From Faustus (vi. 2) it appears that the family descended from bishop Albin or Albanus of the village of Manavazguerd, this place being in the province of Hark'h (St. Martin, l. c.). St. Martin calculates his dates as A.D. 374-378, the contemporary king of Armenia being Bab (370-377). At the time of his election there was no one of the line of Gregory the Illuminator eligible. Faustus relates (iii. 17) that after Josec's installation he administered to the church of Armenia with great zeal, but that no heed was paid to his counsels. The king and high nobility, says Faustus, abandoned the Lord and his commandments and fearlessly returned to all the sins of former days. This description must mean that they relapsed into idolatry. A general impiety also pervaded all classes from the lowest to the highest. The catalogue remarks that Josec II. and his two successors were but titular catholici, as they were prohibited from ordaining by the archbishop of Caesarea. This prohibition may have arisen from the circumstance that these three catholici were not of the line of Gregory, but from the inferior stock of bishop Albin. [C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (husband of the B. V. M.), APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF (Boll. Acta SS. 19 Mart. iii. 4; see also Fabric. Cod. Apoc. Nov. Test. index, s. v.). On the Arabic history of Joseph see GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL, t. ii. p. 706, and Fabr. Cod. Pseud. V. T. ii. 309. [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS ARIMATHAEUS, APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF (Boll. Acta SS. 17 Mart. ii. 507; Fabric. Cod. Apoc. N. T. i. 270). This work relates the legendary mission of Joseph to Britain. The honour of having freed Ireland from venomous reptiles has been transferred by some from St. Patrick to Joseph. (Usher, Eocl. Ant. Brit. c. 16, Opp. v. 37, vi. 300, 551, ed. Elrington.) [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS AND ASENATH, APOCRYPHAL BOOK OF, a work known from very early times and attributed to St. Ephraim the Syrian. Moses of Agel translated it into Syriac (Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. p. 1047; Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 286). It was found in Armenian, by M. Brosset (Journ. Asiatique, 4 sér. t. xv. 1850, p. 85). [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (1), fourteenth bishop of Jerusalem, between Ephraim and Judas, the last but one of the bishops of the circumcision (Euseb. Chron. sub. ann. 124 and H. E. iv. 5). In Jerome's translation of the Chronicle he is called Joses, and in Epiphanius (Haer. lxvi. 20) Ἰωσὴς. The Patriarch Nicephorus (Pat. Gr. t. c. p. 1035) and Georgius Syncellus (Chronog. t. i. p. 661, ed. Bonn) assign him two years. For this bishop in modern investigations, see the Patriarchs of Jerusalem by Papebroch (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. introd. pp. ix. x.); Le Quien (Or. Chr. iii. 144), Clinton (F. R. ii. 556). The period assigned to these early bishops of Jerusalem by Nicephorus can be but approximately correct, and all that can be safely said in the case of Joseph is that he was bishop somewhere about A. D. 132 or 133. [C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (2), catholicos of Armenia (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1079). The Historia Armena (Galanus, cap. 8) places him twelfth, between Sourmag and Chyut, assigning him two years. He appears as taking a prominent part in public affairs during the two years 450, 451, but his tenure of office must have been longer. The Narratio (u. inf.) gives him at least twelve years. Saint Martin (Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 437) places him between Mesrob and Melidé, giving his dates as A. D. 441-452, but these figures do not represent his place in the series accurately. Moses of Khorene (lib. iii. cap. 67 in Langlois, Histor. de l'Arm.) states that Mesrob at the close of his life nominated him his successor, though only with the rank of deputy. From another source it appears that Joseph owed his nomination to Isaac the Great (Narrat. de Reb. Arm. in Combefis, Nov. Auct. t. ii. p. 274; the appended catalogue does not name Joseph). The explanation of these various statements is that the king of Persia, of which Armenia had been a province since the conquest of 428, desired that Sormac, who had ruled the Armenian church during the last year of the life of Isaac the Great, should continue catholicos for life, and when he died, six years later, Joseph was installed in the full title (Hist. Armen. by John the catholicos, p. 49 in Saint Martin's tr.). The Persian king contemporary with Joseph was Isdigerd II., and the governor of Armenia was an Armenian Christian Vasag, prince of the Siounians (442-452). Joseph was one of the band of Armenian scholars who had been trained under Mesrob and Isaac the Great, and afterwards in the Schools of Athens and Constantinople [MESROBES]. He returned to Armenia probably about A. D. 434. Before his elevation he was a priest of Hoghotzim in the canton of Vaiotz-dzor (Vale of Vaï, i. e. Woe) in the province of Sanik or Sisistan (Saint Martin, l. c.). His patriarchate occurred at a most critical period, when Isdigerd II. was bending all his efforts to supplant the Christianity of Armenia by the Zoroastrian religion.

A full contemporary account of this matter will be found in Elisha Vartabed's History of Vartan, which has been translated from the Armenian by Neumann and Langlois [ELISHA (1)]. Through his Vizier Mihr-Nerses Isdigerd issued a proclamation to the Armenians, which is one of the most valuable ancient Zoroastrian documents we possess. A reply to it was issued in 450 by a synod of seventeen bishops held at Ardashad. The name of Joseph bishop of Ararat, heads the subscriptions (Neum. 13, 14, 87), the province of Ararat, one of the fifteen into which Armenia was divided, being evidently his own immediate diocese. This seems Joseph's first appearance in these events. The reply is given in full by Elisha; for the spirit of it see art. ISDIGERD II. Exasperated by that bold manifesto, the king ordered the leading Armenian princes to appear before him, and they, depositing a confession of their faith with Joseph, obeyed (Neum. 21). In the royal capital on the feast of Easter, 450, they were summoned into the king's presence, and peremptorily ordered to adore the sun on its rising the next day. Finding Isdigerd inexorable, they feigned compliance, and Isdigerd accepting the act as a formal submission of their country, sent them home accompanied by a band of magi, who, supported by a large military force, were to instruct the Armenians in the Zoroastrian religion and laws. On the appearance of this armed mission the bishops went among their flocks exhorting them to resistance. The people were resolved, and a Holy League was formed. On behalf of his distressed country Joseph wrote an appeal to the emperor Theodosius II., but shortly afterwards, July 28, 450, Theodosius died, and Marcian his successor would not help (Neum. 36, 37). The Armenian Christians nevertheless assembled in arms, 60,000 in number, and among them were Joseph, Leontius the priest, many other priests and a multitude of deacons (51). On June 2, 451, at the Dekh-mud a tributary of the Araxes (St. Martin, i. 41), led by their prince Vartan, they were disastrously defeated (Neum. 51). A fortress where the priests had taken refuge also fell. Joseph and Leontius were about to be put to death, when they asked to be sent to the king, having hopes of making terms for their people. They were sent, but would not waver in their steadfastness (83, 66). Thus much Elisha relates of Joseph in his seventh chapter, his last as Neumann believes. In an eighth chapter added by Langlois in 1867, and in another Armenian writer, Lazarus of Barb (cap. 48 in Langlois, ii. 315), it is stated that in the sixth year of Isdigerd (i. e. in 455), and on the 25th of the month roditz, the patriarch Joseph, Sahag bishop of Reschdouni, the priests Arsenius, Leontius, Mousché, and the deacon Kadchadch were executed in the province of Abar, near Révan, a village of the Moks. Lazarus (l. c.) records his dying words. On the position of Abar see Langlois (t. ii. p. 186, note 1), and Neumann (p. 77, note 18). [LEONTIUS.]

JOSEPHUS (3), bishop of Heliopolis in the province of Phoenicia Secunda, present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451 (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 59 A), subscribes the synodal letter of the council to Leo the Great (where his see appears as Iliopolis). (Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1104.) [C. G.]

JOSEPHUS (4), fifteenth bishop of Acheruntia (Acerenza), A.D. 429, between Asideus and Justus. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 13; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xx. 420, 450.) [C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (5), a physician who having earned the favour of Chosroes Anushirwan, by the royal influence became patriarch of the Nestorians, A.D. 552. He enacted twenty-three canons in his second year of office; but was deposed in the third, because of the capricious tyranny which he exercised over priests and bishops alike. Fear of the king prevented the election of a successor, until after the death of Josephus, which occurred A.D. 567.

Elias Damascenus relates that, on the request of a synod, Josephus confirmed the canons of the Eastern and Western fathers, and published them in a single volume, with certain additions of his own. At this synod the order of the sees was determined, Nisibis obtaining the second place. Josephus also drew up a list of the patriarchs or bishops of Seleucia from the earliest times to his own day. After his deposition he seems to have consoled himself by forging letters in the name of St. Jacobus Nisibenus and St. Efrein, addressed to Papas, a former bishop of Seleucia, who, like himself, had been deposed by his suffragans. Further, a synodical letter of the "Western Patriarchs," admitting the privileges claimed by the Catholicus of Seleucia, is ascribed to the hand of Josephus. These privileges were independence of the patriarchal see of Antioch, and accountability to Christ alone. In support of this epistle, Barhebr. gives a fragment of another, which he says was written by the "Western fathers" on occasion of a strife about the privileges of Seleucia, which arose in the primacy of Papas. This fragment quotes freely from the synodical epistle. Barhebraeus adds the authority of the patriarchs Timotheus (A.D. 780) and Dadjesu (fl. A.D. 450). Timotheus assigns this second epistle to the patriarchs Caius of Rome, Peter of Alexandria, Paul of Antioch, Flavian of Ephesus, and Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, and Gregory Thaumaturgus. But these personages were not contemporaries. The probable truth is that the patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans admonished the subjects of the archbishop of Seleucia, that their spiritual head was not to be lightly accused as Papas had been, nor indeed to be tried at all by his inferiors; and this is all that Dadjesu's testimony, supposing it to be genuine, implies. In fact, this second epistle was another forgery by Josephus, as is clear from its invoking the other patriarchs in a matter which concerned none but the patriarch of Antioch. Further, the Arabico-Nicene canon 38 rules, concerning the archbishop of Seleucia, "Henceforth be it permitted him to appoint metropolitans," so that he did not previously enjoy that right; and canon 40 forbids synods of the Persian bishops, lest they should enact canons without consulting the patriarch of Antioch, "albeit their lord (i. e. the archbishop of Seleucia) has attained unto the rank of patriarch." That the synodical epistle is spurious, appears from the words, "And his throne comes next after the four patriarchs of the world"; the title "patriarch" and the number "four" being taken from the Arabico-Nicene canons, which in truth suggested both of these forgeries.

From the acts of the Eastern martyrs and from Sozomen, it is evident that the bishop of Seleucia had always been primate of Assyria and Babylonia, subject, however, to Antioch. But no ancient Syriac, Latin, or Greek writer, has recorded that the other patriarchs bestowed the patriarchal dignity upon the see of Seleucia, or exempted it from the jurisdiction of Antioch. That is plainly a Nestorian fiction, accepted by the Jacobites, because their Mafriani (of whom Barhebraeus was one) claimed to be the successors of the bishopric of Seleucia. The primacy of this see was expressly asserted at the synod held by Isaacus and Maruthas, A.D. 410. [ISAACUS (4).] (Assem. B. O. iii. pt. i. 432-435, II. 398, 413, III. i. 51-60; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1117; Badger, Nestorians, i. p. 137; Bickell, Consp. Syr. p. 60.) [C. J. B.]

JOSEPHUS (6) (Ἰωσήπος), bishop of Nicomedia, under whose name Le Quien found a manuscript fragment of a sermon delivered "in the persecutions." Le Quien assigns it to a period subsequent to the fifth synod (A.D. 553). (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 590.) [L. D.]

JOSEPHUS (7), third bishop of Freising in Bavaria. The date of his election is not positively known, but was probably in 748 or 749, as there is extant a deed of grant dated in February of the latter year, and in his episcopate. Of his life we know very little, except what may be gleaned from the numerous deeds of gift in favour of his churches. These documents may be found in Meichelbeck's Historia Frisingensis, tom. i. pp. 48-60, pars altera, pp. 26-32. Josephus is mentioned honourably by Arnoldus in his Miracula S. Emmeramni (i. 5, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxli. 1002). According to three somewhat late catalogues, he died on Jan. 17, 764. This is not improbable, as Aribo is known from documents to have been sitting in 765. For his history see, besides the sources above aliuded to, Meichelbeck's Geschichte der Stadt Freising, by Baumgärtner, Freising, 1854; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 258; Roth, Kozroh's Benner über die ältesten Urkunden des Bisthums Freising, i. 1-3, and Verzeichniss der Freisinger Urkunden, pp. 3, 4.

JOSEPHUS (8), bishop of Padua, c. 765. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 428; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 489.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOSEPHUS (9), bishop of Derthona (Tortona), present at the Lateran synod under Stephen IV. in 769. (Mansi, xii. 715; Ughelli, iv. 628; Cappelletti, xiii. 672, 693; Hefele, § 343.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JOSEPHUS (10), twenty-first bishop of Avignon, is said to have sat from A.D. 765 to 794. (Anastasius, Vita Stephani III., Bouquet, v. 459 n.; Gall. Christ. i. 862.)

[S. A. B.]

JOSEPHUS (11), Nestorian metropolitan bishop of Maru, A.D. 778, who apostatised to the Mahometans. (Assem. B. O. ii. 433, 495, iii. pt. i. 207; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1262.)

[C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (12), bishop of Attalia in Lydia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 144; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 888.)

[L. D.]

JOSEPHUS (13), patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites 789-791. (Le Quien, ii. 1370.)

[C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (14), maphrian of the Syrian Jacobites in the 8th century. (Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1539.)

[C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (15), twenty-second bishop of Le-Mans towards the close of the 8th century. His crimes and cruelty to his clergy became so notorious that a council of bishops degraded him, and he was handed over to the archbishop of Tours, to whom he was related by birth, and by him sentenced to a penitential imprisonment in a cell called Condeda in the district of Tours, where he died. He was in possession of the see for nearly nine years. (Gesta Pontificum Cenoman. c. xx.; Mabill. Vet. Analect. p. 291, Paris, 1723; Gall. Christ. xiv. 356.)

[S. A. B.]

JOSEPHUS (16), Nestorian metropolitan bishop of Elamitis or Gondisapor, cir. 800. (Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1183.)

[C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (17) L, forty-fourth archbishop of Tours, is first mentioned in a decree dated in 802 of Charles the Great (Bouquet, Recueil, v. 767). He was a friend of Alcuin, who during his episcopate was abbat of St. Martin's (Ep. xxiv., Bouquet, ib. 619; Vita Alcuini, 29, 31, Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iv. 343). See also Bouquet, and ib. vi. 447.

The year of his death is unknown, but he is said to have sat twenty-three years and nearly six months (Salmon, Recueil de Chroniques de Touraine, p. 214).

JOSEPHUS (18), catholicos of Armenia (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1393). The Historia Armena (Galanus, cap. 18, p. 269), assigning him eleven years between George I. and David II., describes him as of Arakadzodn, and adds that he was of the metropolitan city of St. Gregory. He does not appear in the Greek catalogue (in Combefis, Bibl. Nov. Auct. ii. 271), which ends before his period. Saint-Martin (Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 439) puts his dates as A.D. 795-806, and gives him the surname of Garidj or Scorpion. [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (19), according to his Jewish designation, יוסף בן מתתיהו הכהן (Joseph, the son of Mattathiah [Matthias] the priest), or, as at a later period he called himself after the Flavian emperors, FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS. Few characters in Jewish history have provoked such unanimous condemnation, alike by Jews and Christians, with perhaps the solitary exception of the latest Jewish writer on the subject (Hamburger, Real-Encycl. section ii. p. 505), who holds that the steadfast adherence of Josephus to Judaism, and his able literary defence of its tenets, form sufficient ground, not only for pardoning his "supposed" wrongs to his nation, but for this solemn verdict of Jewish posterity: "He hath made his peace with us!" Whether or not the view which he presented of his religion and people was really so full and satisfactory, will appear in the sequel. There cannot, however, be any doubt that the part which he played in the closing drama of Jewish national history, and, still more, the information which we owe to him concerning certain parts of Jewish history, and the state, manners, and views of his contemporaries,* entitle him to our most careful notice. Accordingly, we propose first to give a sketch of his Life; then, to analyse his Writings; and lastly, to examine the import and bearing of his views relatively to Theology. Under this latter particular we shall have to treat of his relation to Philo and to Rabbinitism, of his views as to the Canon, of his interpretation of Holy Scripture, of his ideas about the Messiah, and of his alleged testimony to Jesus Christ.

L. The Life of Josephus.—It was a stirring time when Josephus was born in Jerusalem, in the first year of the emperor Caligula (16th March, A.D. 37 to the same date 38), or rather, to be as precise as possible, some time between the 13th September, A.D. 37 and the 16th March, 38.<sup>b</sup> Up to that period the infant Church had been at least tolerated, though not without persecutions, in the city which had crucified the Lord; and it had struck its roots downwards and grown in strength. But matters could not long continue so, and the success of the Gospel, especially among that section which in official circles may have been regarded as the most dangerous class for proselytism, soon led to a general persecution. Whatever system of chronology we may adopt<sup>c</sup>—in the present instance more or less conjecturally—it must have been close on the date when Josephus was born that St. Stephen obtained the first martyr's crown, and "the church at Jerusalem" was in great measure "scattered abroad" (Acts viii. 1-4). It was probably a year afterwards that Saul of Tarsus was arrested on his way to Damascus by the vision of the Lord, and became the disciple and apostle of Him Whom he had persecuted with such bitter zeal. The high-priestly office was in those days in the hands of the Sadducean party, to which the aristocracy of the capital generally belonged. The actual occupant of the sacred office was Theophilus (A.D. 37-41; comp. Jos. Ant. xviii. 5, 3), the son of Annas (A.D. 6-15), and the brother-in-law of Caiaphas (A.D. 18-36), both so infamous from their connexion with the betrayal of our Lord.<sup>d</sup> With this high-priestly family, of which not less than eight members filled the highest office between the years 6 and 65 after Christ,<sup>e</sup> Josephus was at least distantly connected, as in after life he owed his position, in great measure, to their friendship and support.

* It is, however, an exaggeration to assert, as some have done, that without him no history of New Testament times could have been written.

<sup>b</sup> Comp. Jos. Ant. xx., 11, 3, where he synchronises the fifty-sixth year of his own life with the thirteenth of the reign of Domitian, which commenced on the 13th of September. See Wieseler, Chronologie d. Apostol. Zeitalters, p. 98. See, however, also the remarks, ib. p. 71, note, according to which Josephus may have been born somewhat later.

For, Matthias, the father of Josephus,<sup>f</sup> belonged, like the high priestly family, to the first of the twenty-four "courses" into which the priesthood was arranged. On his mother's side he claimed descent from the Asmoneans, one of his female ancestors having been a daughter of Jonathan, the brother of Judas the Maccabee, and the first high priest of that family. His early education was in accordance with his station. We can readily believe that, with his talents, he made rapid progress in such knowledge as was imparted to the Jewish youth of that time. In this he must have been greatly aided by his father, of whose reputation he speaks in as high terms as of his social standing. But when Josephus would have us believe that at the age of fourteen he was so distinguished,<sup>g</sup> that the high priests and leading men of Jerusalem constantly resorted to him for deeper information on legal questions, we must regard <sup>d</sup> The high priests between Annas and Caiaphas were: Ishmael, the son of Phabi (A.D. 15-16), Eleazar, a son of Annas (A.D. 16-17), and Simon, the son of Camithos (A.D. 17-18). Comp. Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, 2. Between Caiaphas and Theophilus we have to insert Jonathan, a son of Annas (A.D. 36-37). Comp. Jos. Ant. xviii. 4, 3; 5, 3.

<sup>f</sup> From Josephus's Life Ewald (Gesch. d. Völk. Isr. vol. vi. 3rd ed. p. 700, note) infers that Matthias was born when his father, Josephus the elder, was in his seventy-sixth year. Salvador (Gesch. d. Römerherrschaft in Jud. transl. by Eichler, vol. ii. p. 35) makes Matthias sixty years old when Josephus was born, a gross and gratuitous improbability, since he was alive during the siege of Jerusalem.

<sup>g</sup> Paret (in Herzog's Real-Encycl. vol. vii. p. 24) and others suggest that in this account of himself Josephus may have had in view Luke ii. 46, 47. This is not impossible. But it was reserved for a Professor of Theology (Hansrath, Neutestam. Zeitgesch. 2nd ed. vol. iii. p. 439, note 4) to suggest, that the passage in the Gospel may have been borrowed from Josephus! In general Hansrath's account of Josephus, as indeed much else in his book, is greatly exaggerated, and contains many mistakes, all being apparently sacrificed to pictorialness, no matter whether the picture be true to history or not.

it either as a gross exaggeration, or else as a peculiar mode of representing a very natural occurrence. It is quite likely that learned visitors to his father's house may have taken pleasure in putting questions to a clever lad, since this is entirely in accordance with Jewish habits. But the absurdity of supposing that leading men in a city so full of learned Rabbis, as Jerusalem at that time, would seek information from a boy, is only fully measured when we remember that, according to the ordinary Jewish educational arrangements, higher study—that of the Talmud—was merely begun at the age of fifteen.<sup>h</sup> For similar reasons we must take a like view of his magniloquent assertion, that at the age of sixteen he had made himself fully acquainted with the varying and special tenets of the three great Jewish parties: the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes.<sup>i</sup> It was natural and necessary that a youth, circumstanced as he was, should have learned Greek, though he owns his deficiencies in this respect, attributing them not unjustly to the national prejudice, which excluded everything un-Jewish from education (Ant. xx. 11, 2). Josephus seems never to have quite overcome this defect; and even at Rome, when translating into Greek his History of the Jewish War—as probably in his other literary labours—he had to avail himself of the help of those who had full command of the Greek language (Ag. Apion, i. 9).

But the enquiries, or else the ambition, of Josephus could not be satisfied through the ordinary channels of Jewish religious information. Whether, as he puts it, from a desire for deeper knowledge, or from the irresistible religious impulse of the times (Hausrath), or from the ambition of becoming a Jewish saint-leader, or from all these motives combining unconsciously to himself, certain it is, that at the age of sixteen he left the Jewish capital, with its attractions, to resort to the retreats of that mysterious sect, the Essenes. It may well have been, that the strange rites which they practised, the mystic doctrines and the higher fellowship with God which they professed, and the peculiar asceticism by which they aimed at purification of the soul through mortification of the body—all so thoroughly Oriental—had their attractions for the imagination of an Eastern youth just springing into manhood. Josephus must have well known the terrible decay among the aristocratic circles of Jerusalem. The almost incredible venality, covetousness, and corruption of the higher classes, the hypocrisy and hollowness of his Sadducean friends, the utter emptiness of Pharisaical profession—in short, the moral ruin of the people, which alike had caused, and resulted from their rejection of the One only exhibition of ideal Israel in the Person of the Lord Jesus, was patent to every observer. Those refined canon-law subtleties which wholly engrossed the learned Rabbis of Jerusalem, when, to use their own illustration, mountains were pulverised by being rubbed against each other (Sinh 24. a), yielding, however, only the smallest residuum of precious ore,<sup>1</sup> could not have fascinated a mind like that of Josephus. In the rank and file of the Pharisaical party, especially among its more extreme section, there were, indeed, many thoroughly, even terribly, in earnest. But their general ignorance, bigotry, and narrow fanaticism must have repelled a Sadducean aristocrat—not to speak of the acknowledged fact, that many, even of those who were sincere, combined the utmost punctiliousness in outward observances with very real and gross sin and crime, while a large proportion of the party were neither more nor less than interested hypocrites. (Comp. here especially the description of the seven kinds of Pharisees in Jer. Ber. ix. 7, which is much more full than either Sotah iii. 11, or Sotah 22 b). If there were, therefore, religious reality in any party, a youth like Josephus would naturally look for it among the unworldly, self-denying Essenes, who had left the society of men, and cast aside their petty strifes to seek holiness and closer fellowship with God, far from Jerusalem and all the haunts of busy life. Accordingly, we find him during the next three years (from his sixteenth to his nineteenth year) in that community, sharing their rites, learning such of their doctrines as were imparted to novices, and conforming to their mode of life. Probably then, or else afterwards, he placed himself under the guidance of one Banus,<sup>2</sup> much noted for the strictness of his asceticism, which was manifested by a dress made of the bark and integuments of trees, by a diet of herbs, and by frequent ablations. Josephus was, no doubt, keenly observant of all that passed in this holy community, and its influence upon him was permanent. In times of need he would claim what the initiated among them had professed in their ecstatic state: inspired dreams, visions, prophecies, and mystic interpretations of dark predictions (comp. for example, Jewish War, ii. 8, 12; iii. 8, 3, 9; iv. 6, 3; vi. 5, 4; Life, 42). Certain fundamental doctrines of the Essenes he held all his life long. Among these we may specially mention his ascription of all the evil that beset the soul to its dwelling in the body<sup>1</sup> (Ag. Apion, ii. 24), from which it would therefore be freed by death

<sup>i</sup> Even Schürer (Lehrb. d. Neutestam. Zeitgesch. p. 20), like most other writers, makes Josephus pass through the Academies of the Pharisees, Sadducees (?), and Essenes. Ewald even infers from it the existence of an Essene Academy in Jerusalem! But Josephus only speaks of having made himself acquainted with these sects, and there is not an allusion to those imaginary academies.

(Jewish War, vii. 8, 7; comp. with ii. 8, 11); and his strong views on what, for want of a better term, we may designate as Predestinarianism (in passages too numerous for quotation). On the whole, therefore, we may take it, that, barring the rationalistic Judaism of his later life, and his sympathies with what of Philo's teaching he knew, could understand, or was capable of receiving, Essenism retained its hold upon him all his days, and that his ideal of Judaism would have been what he had learned and witnessed among that party. And this disposes of the controversy whether Josephus should be classed with the Pharisees or with the Essenes. (Comp. the discussion in Gerlach, Weissag. d. A. Testam. in d. Schriften d. Fl. Josephus, pp. 1–19, where, however, the Essene aspect is too much pressed.)

On his return to Jerusalem, we find Josephus among the Pharisees. This step, although inconsistent, morally speaking, was natural on his part. In all ages, men to whom ambition or need has dictated a policy, have at least outwardly connected themselves with the party that commanded power, however secretly differing from their views. And at that time any one who wished popular influence or support must have belonged to the Pharisees—that is, to them as a party, without necessarily implying acceptance of all their tenets, or practice of their observances beyond what was convenient or absolutely requisite. Although we have no special information on the subject, we infer that the next seven years were spent by Josephus in attending to the ordinary duties of the priesthood, and in strengthening his connexion with the aristocratic party. But the monotonous routine of such a life must have daily become more irksome. An impulse had seized him, even stronger than that so common—we had almost said, so characteristic of, and so irresistible—to the Jew, of breaking through his narrow bounds, and exploring the great world beyond, with its unknown potentialities and possibilities. In his own Jerusalem he had come to know the proud foreigner who ruled the world from the mighty city on the Tiber. He must also have learned how much could be achieved in Rome by servility, intrigue, and cunning. The success of the Herodians—even of the then representative of that house, Agrippa II.—was due to those means. May not some vision of what might be in store for himself have flitted across him? He was in the opening of manhood, connected with the high-priestly party, an aristocrat, and yet popular with the Pharisees. All these circumstances would favour his chances of promotion by seeking to become an intermediary between Rome and his people. We own there is no historical evidence for this suggestion, except that, when occasion did arise, he attempted to act that part, by playing off his countrymen against Rome, and Rome against his countrymen, keeping, however, always in view his own safety and advantage. Nor can we suggest a more charitable interpretation of the strange expedition to Rome which he now undertook.

As Josephus represents it, the object of this journey, undertaken when he was twenty-six years of age, was to compass the liberation of some friends (priests) whom Felix had sent prisoners to the capital; his zeal on their behalf being quickened, as he tells us, by tidings that, in their faithfulness, they had refused Gentile fare in their prison, and lived on nuts and figs. But the expedition nearly proved fatal to him. The ship in which he had embarked foundered in the Adriatic, and out of 600 persons only 80 kept themselves afloat during that fatal night, and were picked up in the morning by a ship from Cyrene. Among them was Josephus. Landed at Puteoli, he soon became intimate with a person powerful at court. Aliturus, the new friend of Josephus, a Jew by birth, and by profession an actor, was a great favourite with the emperor Nero. Through him he was introduced to Poppaea, the paramour and wife of the emperor, who, like others of her class and condition, compounded for vice by novel, especially Jewish, observances, probably without actually embracing Judaism. Josephus calls her "a worshipper of the true God" (Ant. xx. 8, 11)—a designation only true if coquetting with Judaism, and advocating the cause of the Jews (u. s.), when it did not interfere with her likings,<sup>m</sup> may be regarded as a test of religion. At any rate, Josephus was so far successful. Through Poppaea's influence the captive priests were liberated, and their gallant advocate was dismissed by the empress laden with rich presents, as marks of her Jewish devotion.<sup>n</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Ewald suggests that this name was a Grecianised form of Abanu, in which case it would correspond to the "Pater" of a Roman Catholic order.

<sup>1</sup> This view, however, was not exclusively that of the Essenes, but is also expressed by Philo. It is another question, whence Josephus derived it, and whether both the Essenes and Philo may not ultimately have drawn from a common source. Without entering into detailed explanations, we may state our belief that the opinions of Josephus on this subject were derived from the Essenes.

The journey of Josephus to Rome took place in A.D. 63 or 64. We mark the date as of special interest, not only on its own account, but for other reasons. For, even if (with Wieseler) we assume that Festus arrived in Judaea not later than the summer of A.D. 60, it may well have been that St. Paul was not actually sent from Caesarea to Rome till the year 61, in which case he would have arrived there in spring 62, when the two years of his first captivity would end in 64, the latest date for Josephus's journey to Italy. At any rate, the two dates are sufficiently near, to raise the question whether the liberation of St. Paul may not somehow have been connected with the interference of Poppaea on behalf of Jewish prisoners.<sup>o</sup> Be this as it may, Josephus must during his stay in Rome have become acquainted with the work and aims of St. Paul. These things had not been done in a corner, and the activity of the prisoner of Christ during these two years must have been known and felt in the Ghetto. But what a contrast between these two men who were at the same time in Rome, each professing to be a true Israelite, and to love his people—all the more striking from the circumstance, that each had well-nigh perished by shipwreck before reaching the shores of Italy!

When Josephus returned to Jerusalem in company with his liberated friends, his reception must have been triumphal, all the more that before his departure he had been regarded as identified with the popular and anti-Roman party. If such had ever really been the case, what he had seen in Rome must have changed his ideas of the possibility of a successful resistance on the part of his countrymen. But the elements of dissatisfaction could no longer be repressed. The almost incredible misrule, rapacity, and tyranny of the late governors had arrayed every honest man against Rome, however the more prudent might shrink from actual contest with the dreaded power. What now followed forms part of the great Jewish war (A.D. 66-73), and can here only be briefly indicated. According to his own statement (Life, 4, 5), Josephus at first urged counsels of peace, in view of the inferiority of the Jews to their enemies. Unsuccessful in this, he withdrew with his friends to their duties in the Temple, fearing they might fall victims to the more violent party. In that retreat he remained till it seemed as if the more moderate, or, at least, his own friends, had obtained the upper hand. But the "moderate" party proved far less so than could have been expected. Indeed, the resistance to Rome had already attained such proportions as to render war inevitable, and to involve in it everyone who did not leave the fated capital. Step by step it had proceeded. The first event had been the robbing of the Temple treasury by Florus, with the bloody popular tumults consequent upon it, ending in the forced retreat of Florus upon Caesarea. This was in May 66. Then followed a vain attempt on the part of Agrippa II. to effect a pacification, and the cessation of the daily sacrifice hitherto offered for each emperor, which may be regarded as the formal renunciation of allegiance to Rome. Upon this, the peace party obtained 3000 horsemen from Agrippa, and seized on the Upper City. But the insurgents held the Temple-Mount and the Lower City, and finally forced the royal troops to relinquish their position, and to flee into the upper palace of Herod, when the palaces of the high priest Ananias and of Agrippa were fired. This was in August 66. Next, the insurgents seized Fort Antonia, and laid siege to the upper palace of Herod. The troops of Agrippa were now allowed to withdraw, while the Roman garrison retired into the three fortified towers, the rest of the palace being fired. This was in September 66. The murder of the high priest Ananias (not the then officiating one) now followed, and then the foul butchery of the Roman garrison, who had laid down their arms on condition of being allowed to retire in safety. The revolt had now entered on its second stage. This was in October 66. The sole hope of the peace-party lay in the advance of Cestius Gallus from Syria. He came, indeed, and occupied the northern suburb Bezetha, which he fired; but was forced to retire, and finally defeated in the defiles of Bethhoron, with the loss of all his material of war. This was in November 66. The rebellion was now triumphant, and all who had hitherto stood aloof were obliged, or persuaded, to join its ranks. A popular assembly entrusted the conduct of the insurrection to the leading men in Jerusalem, most of whom, however, belonged to the more moderate party. Strange to say, the most important command in the coming war, that of Galilee, was confided to Josephus. His commission was to disarm wild and lawless bands to arm the trustworthy part of the population, and, without making any attack, to hold the country against the Romans.<sup>p</sup> If he succeeded, the revolution would lead to liberty; if he failed, both Jerusalem and the national cause were lost.

<sup>n</sup> Schiller (Gesch. d. Röm. Kaiserreichs, p. 583 note) maintains that Poppaea was never actually a Jewish proselyte, and that she only coquetted with Judaism.

It seems almost equally difficult to understand the infatuation which selected for such a post one so unfit for it, even if his fidelity had been beyond question, and the grounds on which Josephus himself accepted the trust. Perhaps the populace may, in their elatedness, have regarded a zealous young priest, although under thirty years of age, and wholly ignorant of military affairs, as equal to any combat with Israel's enemies. On the other hand, the leaders may have secretly hoped that he would pursue a peace policy, and effect a compromise with Rome; while Josephus himself may from the first have cherished the same purpose, trusting that at last the moment had arrived when he should play a prominent part. Indeed, the whole procedure was such as might be expected to end in disaster. First, a popular assembly entrusts the conduct of a war with Rome to a Sanhedrim—though probably not the ordinary, but one appointed ad hoc; next, a general like Josephus is selected for the most difficult and dangerous post; and finally, two priests—Joazar and Judas—are associated with him in his task! The chief, if not sole occupation of these latter seems to have been the collection of the tithes which had of late not been paid; and, when that failed, they returned to Jerusalem. Our view of the motives which influenced Josephus is fully borne out by the measures which he took. His object seems to have been threefold—to have the people of Galilee well in hand; to secure facilities for opening communications with the Romans; and to maintain his own influence at Jerusalem, so as to counteract any opposition that might be raised. Besides his friends in the capital, his father was there, who kept him well-informed of what passed; while timely presents from his spoils (Life, 15) secured those who would defend his interests. On the other hand, there could be no lack of opportunities for shewing that his enmity to Rome was not very deep-rooted, and to which he might afterwards appeal. Thus he allowed Sepphoris, the key of Galilee, to remain undefended, and its inhabitants, notorious for their leanings to Rome, to keep up communication with the coast. Again, he sought to protect the property of Agrippa, and of his adherents, and to restore it when taken by the national party; and he was reported to be secretly collecting means for unknown purposes. These were more than suspicious proceedings. In point of fact, though the national party in Galilee had at first received him with open arms, they soon saw cause for loudly accusing him of treason. Galilee at that time was far from united. Most of the country people did not want war; while the cities, especially Tiberias, were torn by factions, all having different aims. The nationalist party alone, headed by John of Gischala, was, if unscrupulous, bigoted, and cruel, at least honest, and thoroughly in earnest against Rome. The discontent with the new governor broke into open rebellion when, as already stated, Josephus retained, with the view of restoring it, certain property belonging to Agrippa and Bernice, which a band of nationalists had seized. A multitude of armed men from Taricheae and the neighbourhood, to the number of 100,000 men, if we may credit Josephus, crowded the hippodrome, and threatened to burn Josephus in his own house. Deserted by all his guards except four, he lost not his presence of mind. In the garb of a mourner, with a sword hung round his neck, he appeared in the assembly. His tears having excited compassion, he succeeded in turning the citizens of Taricheae against the others by protesting, that he had only retained the booty in order, by its sale, to surround their city with walls. Having thus gained the Taricheans, he frightened the others by enticing their leaders into his house, and there executing on them the most cruel vengeance. Yet a second time, in a rising at Tiberias, Josephus, with two companions, escaped only by a ruse from the hands of John of Gischala. But a greater danger than such plots soon threatened him from Jerusalem itself.

Before describing this, we must briefly indicate the measures which Josephus had taken for the defence of Galilee. His first care had been to secure the pacification of the country, and his own undisputed authority in it. For this purpose he appointed in every city a council of seven judges, and over the whole province a kind of Sanhedrim of seventy, the latter, however, as he informs us (Life, 14), not so much to invest them with supreme authority, which he retained in his own hands, as to make friends of the leading men in every city, and to have them as hostages for the good behaviour of their fellow-citizens. What may be called his strictly defensive measures consisted in raising fortifications around the principal towns, and in other places that were naturally strong, and in collecting an army. The latter seems to have amounted to 60,000 foot, a very weak contingent of cavalry, 4500 mercenaries, and a body-guard of 600 men (Jewish War, ii. 20, 8).<sup>q</sup> It was, of course, impossible to transform these men into disciplined soldiers. In fact, not a few of them were wont to return on the Sabbath to their homes (Life, 32). Josephus, however, did what he could to promote discipline, by appointing a great many officers, and by teaching his troops at least the most necessary military evolutions (Jewish War, ii. 20, 7). But meantime, John of Gischala had succeeded in raising such a strong feeling against him in Jerusalem, that a deputation of four leading men, two priests and two laymen, was sent to Galilee to enquire into the charge of treachery against Josephus. The deputation was liberally furnished with money, and accompanied by 2500 soldiers<sup>r</sup> to enforce, in case of need, their sentence. But Josephus had received timely information from the capital, and taken his measures accordingly. Partly to secure a retreat, and partly to make a shew of activity, knowing it would be impossible to remove a general in face of the enemy, he had marched towards the sea-shore against a small Roman detachment under Placidus. On their arrival in Galilee, the Jerusalem deputies found matters different from what they had expected. Among the population generally, who favoured Josephus from fear that on his retirement they would be at the mercy of the extreme party, they saw little ardour for war. We can scarcely wonder at this, remembering the state of parties, and that the Galileans, being nearest the Roman head-quarters, best knew the strength of the enemy, and would have to bear the first brunt of the conflict. On the other hand, many openly and loudly took the part of Josephus, while only four cities (Gamala, Tiberias, Gabara, and Gischala) were decidedly against him. At Tiberias, John of Gischala had joined the deputies. It is heart-sickening to follow the intrigues on both sides, to hear of the lies by which each sought to entrap the other, and of pretended fasts to which they came, not to humble themselves, but with daggers about their persons to murder each other. Such a movement could neither expect the blessing of heaven nor success with men. In the end, the cunning of Josephus prevailed. A deputation which he sent to Jerusalem with liberal bribes, procured his reinstatement and the recall of the deputies. As the latter would not obey, Tiberias, their head-quarters, was taken by Josephus, and with difficulty saved from plunder. Upon this, John had to retire to Gischala, while the refractory deputies were seized by trickery, and sent back under an armed escort (Life, 40-62). Yet another time Tiberias revolted, in favour of Agrippa and the Romans, when it was again subdued by Josephus. Amid these events the year 66 passed.

<sup>p</sup> I cannot see any warrant in the language of Josephus (Life, 7, 14) for the charge of Schürer (u. s. p. 328, note), that Josephus had the impudence to assert that his mission had been to pacify Galilee. This would have been in glaring contradiction to the measures which he took, and to the whole after-history. At the same time, the original orders of the Sanhedrim were very cautiously worded.

<sup>r</sup> This, according to Jewish War, ii. 21, 7; according to Life, 40, their number was only 1600. In general, these two works not unfrequently contradict each other, being intended to serve different purposes.

The year 67 witnessed the closing scenes of the great Galilean drama. Tidings of the first Roman defeat under Cestius had reached Nero while in Achaia. So formidable a rising required his ablest general, and the command in Judaea was entrusted to Vespasian. It was spring when he arrived from Antioch at Ptolemais with the first corps of his army. The second corps was to follow from Alexandria, under the leadership of Vespasian's son, Titus, that handsome dashing soldier, the idol of his men. The effect of these preparations upon Galilee was almost magical. Even before Titus arrived, Sepphoris had opened communications with head-quarters, and was soon occupied by a Roman garrison of 6000 men, while 1000 horsemen scoured the country all around, and laid it waste (Jewish War, iii. 4, 1). Josephus was unable to recover Sepphoris. Its loss meant that of the national cause in Galilee. In fact, with the exception of the fortified cities, and a wild stand made by bands of desperate men, no serious resistance was anywhere offered. No sooner had the combined forces of Vespasian and Titus (the 5th, 10th, and 15th, and twenty-three cohorts from other legions),* together with those of their four royal allies (Agrippa, Antiochus of Commagene, Sohemus of Emesa, and Malchus of Arabia), amounting in all to about 60,000 men, pitched their camp on the borders of Galilee, than the greater part of the undisciplined rabble which formed the army of Josephus ran away, without waiting till a blow should be struck. Josephus and those around him fled to Tiberias, while the Romans advanced, ravaging the land. This sudden collapse of the national cause led Josephus to hope, that the leaders at Jerusalem might see the impossibility of resistance. For himself, he tells us, he knew he could always secure terms; but he now wrote to the Sanhedrim, placing before them the alternative of either making their submission, which he would negotiate, or of sending an army capable of fighting the Romans (Jewish War, iii. 7, 2). Perhaps it is not uncharitable to suppose, that, if Vespasian had entered into direct negotiations with him, Josephus would scarcely have waited for the answer of the Sanhedrim. As it was, the leaders at Jerusalem could not accept the one, nor comply with the other of his alternatives, and events had to take their course. Tiberias was not strong enough to offer safety to Josephus and his followers, even if its fidelity could have been depended upon. As most of those who still remained under the national banner had already retired to Jotapata, Josephus followed them thither, arriving in that fortress on the 21st May, 67. The next evening the army of Vespasian was already under its walls. Few places could have been better fitted to stand a siege in olden days than Jotapata, the Gopatata of the Rabbis (comp. Relandus, Palæstina, ed. Norimb. 1716, pp. 603, 641), the modern Jefât (Robinson, Bibl. Researches, iii. pp. 105-107). Standing on an eminence enclosed by mountains, it was surrounded by precipices, and wholly inaccessible except from the north, where the city "extended out upon the sloping extremity of the opposite mountain." But this part Josephus had previously taken care to fortify. The main danger lay in a possible want of water, as the town was wholly dependent for its supply upon cisterns. The failure of a first attack shewed the Romans that the place was not to be taken by a coup de main. Accordingly they commenced a regular siege in their own methodical manner. The garrison within defended themselves like desperate men who knew that no quarter was to be expected. It must be admitted, that whatever versatility in expedients, determination, and undaunted bravery could effect, was done by Josephus and his companions in arms. The story of this siege reads almost like a romance—how provisions were obtained by creeping out at night disguised in the skins of animals; how the heavy battering rams of the Romans were undermined, and set on fire after their defenders had been cut down; how in the face of the enemy the wall was heightened twenty cubits by means of the most ingenious devices; how again and again successful sorties were made, and Vespasian himself wounded; and how the walls were protected by sacks of chaff, and the assailants thrown from their scaling bridges by clever and novel artifices. But Vespasian had the best auxiliary in the exhaustion of the garrison and the increasing want of water, which no ingenuity could fully conceal. In vain Josephus attempted to seek safety by flight. His soldiers would not allow him to leave Jotapata. At last a deserter informed the Romans that from very weariness the guards fell asleep on the walls in the morning. This then was the opportunity. Soon after midnight a chosen corps silently scaled the citadel, where danger was least apprehended. Titus and a tribune were the first on the walls. The sleeping guards were massacred, and the citadel occupied. As morning broke the dense columns of the Romans poured down upon the city. A desperate fight ensued. No quarter was asked or given. But Josephus had prepared even for such an eventuality. A cistern had been connected by a subterranean passage with one of the many caves with which the rock was burrowed on which the city stood. Sufficient provisions had here been stored, and Josephus, with forty of the most eminent citizens, fled thither, awaiting a favourable opportunity for escaping. But they were betrayed by a woman, to save her own life. Vespasian now sent two tribunes to summon Josephus to surrender, promising that his life should be spared. But no answer came from the cistern below. A second message through the tribune Nicanor, who had been a friend of Josephus, convinced him that the promise of mercy might be trusted. Already the angry soldiery above threatened to throw fire into the cistern, when Josephus saw the wisdom of expressing his willingness to surrender. There is the usual amount of hypocrisy in his narration of what followed, and of a prayer which he pretends to have offered, which closed with a protest that he did not go over to the Romans as a deserter from the Jews, but as a minister of God! But his companions below felt otherwise. Well knowing that their lives were forfeited, they would not allow him to escape, offering him the alternative of suicide, or death at their hands. In vain Josephus tried all the arts of his eloquence to prove the sinfulness of suicide and of murder. Foiled in this, he resorted to one of his usual devices. According to his own account, he proposed that they should cast lots in what succession to kill each the other, when Divine Providence reserved him for the last! Although we do not credit this story, he certainly contrived that he and one other should be the last to survive. It was not difficult to persuade his remaining companion to follow him to liberty, and Josephus appeared as a prisoner in the Roman camp. At the intercession of Titus, his life was spared; but Vespasian proposed to send the stubborn defender of Galilee as a trophy to Nero. From this also the ready wit of Josephus found a means of escape. He demanded secret audience, and assuming the language of a prophet, saluted Vespasian and Titus as the future Caesars. Needless ridicule has been cast upon this prediction. But Josephus must have foreseen the certain fall of Jerusalem; and he may have known that, according to a common Jewish interpretation of Isaiah x. 34, the Temple could only be taken by a king. Similarly, at a later period, the great Rabbi Johanan ben Saccal, like the other leading Rabbis a member of the peace party, when he had himself carried out of Jerusalem on a bier saluted Titus with "Vive, Domine Imperator"

(Midrash on Eccl. vii. 11; Gitt. 56 a and b). Vespasian, although incredulous, was too superstitious to reject what was thus announced, all the more that it agreed with his secret hopes (comp. Tacitus, Hist. ii. 78; Suet. Vesp. 5). Josephus obtained his object, and remained in chains in the Roman camp. After all, the siege of Jotapata had only lasted forty-seven days (to July 1, 67). On July 4, the army retired to Caesarea for rest and refreshment. Josephus accompanied it, not as an ordinary prisoner, but as one determined to secure his own advantage by betraying his countrymen to their enemies. This was the reason of the inveterate hatred of him which the Jews on every occasion expressed, and which led to the most determined attempts to kill the renegade. At first, indeed, his treason had not been credited at Jerusalem, and he was supposed to have fallen among the defenders of Jotapata; but when the truth became known, the fury of the people exceeded all bounds. His father and mother were imprisoned; nor can we doubt that the massacre of the more moderate party in Jerusalem, and the bloodshed and horrors which followed the rule of the extreme nationalists in the city, were due to the conduct of Josephus, to his presence with the enemy, and to the hypocritical speeches which, by command of the Romans, he addressed to the besieged, and which on one occasion nearly proved fatal to him.

But in the camp of the Romans it did not fare ill with the former governor of Galilee. In Caesarea, Vespasian had given him a Jewish captive in marriage, instead of the wife left in Jerusalem. The woman, however, afterwards ran away. A second union did not prove much happier, the only difference being that it was now Josephus who parted from his wife. His fourth marriage was with a rich Jewess from Crete, who bore him two sons, and whose virtues he extols with his usual magniloquence. This is not the place to follow the history of the Jewish war to its bitter end. The part which Josephus took in it has already been indicated: the rest may be told in a few sentences. Already all the country around had been subdued, and everything prepared for the siege of Jerusalem, when events in Rome, and the death of the emperor (June 9, 68) arrested the progress of the war. Nero was followed in rapid succession by Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, when the legions at Caesarea, weary of these puppet-imperators, proclaimed Vespasian (July 3, 69). The prediction of Josephus was now fulfilled; and in solemn acknowledgment thereof his chains were struck off with due formality. In the spring of the year 70 Vespasian set sail from Alexandria for Rome, while Titus returned to the war with fresh accessions to his army. Josephus was of course attached to his staff, and his knowledge of the country and people may have been of use, though these advantages were more than counterbalanced by the exasperation and consequent resistance caused by his presence and ill-advised attempts to persuade to submission. But the city which had crucified the LORD was doomed. Within, internecine war, unrestrained violence, and bloodshed prevailed, to which the nameless horrors of famine conducted the siege of Jerusalem. But there are few historical notices of the Rabbis free from gross mistakes.

were soon added. Even Josephus was startled by the utter desolation which the besieging army had wrought in places so sacred to Jewish memory, as well as by the scenes enacted by the so-called defenders of Jerusalem. The Roman army had arrived before the City a few days previous to the Passover, A.D. 70. On May 7 the first wall was taken; on the 12th, the second. On July 5 Antonia was held, or rather immediately destroyed by the Romans; on the 17th the daily sacrifice had to cease, from utter want of what was needful for it; and finally, on Ab 10 (August), the Temple itself was destroyed by fire (Jewish War, vi. 4, 5). Jewish tradition connecting this with the former destruction of the Temple has, indeed, fixed Ab 9 as its date (Taan. iv. 6), the following touching notice of the event being afterwards added (Taan. 29 a):—"The destruction of the temple, both of the first and of the second, was on the eve of Ab 9 (the evening of the 8th), at the outgoing of the Sabbath, and at the end of the Sabbatic year; and the course of Jehoiarib (the first course) was on service, and the Levites were just chanting the hymn, and standing at their desks. And what was the hymn which they chanted? 'And He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and in their wickedness shall He cut them off.' (Ps. xciv. 23.) And they could not finish to say, 'The Lord our God shall cut them off,' when the strangers came and silenced them."

Happily it is not our task to describe the horrors which followed the fall of Jerusalem. Josephus, who, in his attempts to act as intermediary, had, as already noticed, been often in danger of his life (comp. Jewish War v. 7, 4; 9, 4; 13, 3; vi. 2, 2; 7, 2), witnessed the destruction of a city, to whose resistance his own conduct had not a little contributed. In his Life (75) he makes boast that he had not taken anything from the ruins of his country, but that, besides rescuing a copy of the Holy Scriptures from the Temple, he had saved the lives of his own family, of fifty friends, and afterwards of about 190 of his acquaintances, and even obtained that three of them were taken down from the cross, only one of whom, however, survived. But his services to Rome were not without their rewards. We will not probe the feelings with which even he must have witnessed the triumphal procession at Rome. Certain it is, that he obtained from the conquerors lands in Palestine, a lodgment in Vespasian's former palace, the privilege of Roman citizenship, an annual pension, and other honours and advantages, all of which he retained through successive reigns, and that notwithstanding the determined attempts of his many enemies. Thus we find him under Titus (A.D. 79-81) and under Domitian. He must have survived beyond the third year of Trajan (A.D. 100) since his autobiography was written after the death of Agrippa II., which took place in that year. According to a statement of Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 9), a statue was erected to him in Rome.

II. The Works of Josephus.—Of these the following four have been preserved:—

1. "About the Jewish War" (as he styles it in his Life, 74).<sup>v</sup> According to his own account it was occasioned by untrustworthy narratives of the war which had appeared. Originally written in Aramaean, it was afterwards translated by him into Greek. He was well qualified for such a work. Even during the siege of Jerusalem he had taken copious notes (Ag. Apion, i. 9). Besides, he had the benefit of the personal Commentaries of Vespasian, of letters on the subject from king Agrippa, of which he enumerates not less than sixty-two (Life, 65), and, finally, of a revision of the whole by Vespasian and Titus, who not only approved of the work, but subscribed to it, as did also king Agrippa. We may therefore accept the general trustworthiness of the narrative, bearing, however, in mind its evident tendency in favour of Rome, and still more his regard for his own interest, which was always his first object. The style of the book is perhaps even more stilted and self-conscious than was common at that time. The orations reported in it are, of course, his own composition; nor can we attach implicit credence to the extraordinary numbers which he occasionally adduces. But in regard to general accuracy, his narrative contrasts most favourably with the historical notices of the Rabbis, which, almost uniformly, contain the grossest anachronisms. The main object of Josephus is so to tell his story as to represent himself as favourable to the Romans; his next, to make his countrymen appear in the same light, and as having been seduced into rebellion by a party of reckless "robbers." This apologetic tendency also explains the view which he presents of Jewish institutions and sects, the rationalistic cast which he gives them, and his frequent attempts to represent them as similar to what was known and approved at Rome.<sup>w</sup>

In writing his work on the Jewish War, Josephus only deemed it necessary to treat briefly of the early history of his people from the rise of the Maccabees, since (as he tells us, Preface 6) this part had been so well described by Jewish and even by Greek writers. Accordingly, the History of the Jewish War consists of seven books, unequal in their details:—Book 1 extends from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of Herod; Book 2 goes to the commencement of the great war; Book 3 describes the war in Galilee; Book 4 reaches to the siege of Jerusalem; Books 5 and 6 tell of the siege and capture of that city; while Book 7 details the last scenes of the war.

2. Jewish Antiquities (Ἰουδαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία).—The favour with which his first work had been received, induced Josephus to write a larger one, treating of the whole history of his people to the outbreak of the great war. This work he dedicated to Epaphroditus,<sup>x</sup> probably a freedman and courtier of the Caesars. The object of this book was to present Judaism and the Jews in the most favourable light to Gentile compares Josephus, as the historian of the second destruction of the Temple, with Jeremiah, as that of the first. Though his conclusions are, of course, immeasurably in favour of the prophet, the comparison itself will appear to most readers singularly out of taste.

readers.<sup>7</sup> In estimating its value, we have always to bear in mind the sources from which his information was derived. The account of the period to Nehemiah is taken from the Old Testament, with many legendary additions, to which we shall refer in another part of this article. The period between B.C. 175 and 135 is sketched according to the first book of Maccabees, supplemented from other sources. (Comp. Grimm, Exeg. Handb. z. d. Apok. Lief. iii.; Einl. pp. xxvii.—xxx.) The history of the Maccabees is chiefly derived from the lost Histories of Strabo, and of Nicolaus of Damascus. In this part Livy is also mentioned. (Ant. xiv. 4, 3.) The reign of Herod is described according to the History of Nicolaus, and a book entitled The Memorabilia of King Herod. (Ant. xv. 6, 3.) The narrative of Herod's immediate successors is extremely brief. All the more detailed are the somewhat irrelevant accounts of events at the death of Caligula and accession of Claudius. The account of the high priests was probably derived from official documents in Jerusalem. (Comp. Ag. Apion. i. 7.) The copies of the Roman decrees in favour of the Jews, inserted by him, are most valuable. (Comp. Ant. xiv. 10; xiv. 12, 3–5; xvi. 6, 2–7; xix. 5, 2, 3; xx. 1, 2.) But in this, as in the other works of Josephus, we look in vain for any trace of proper appreciation of the spiritual elements in the history of Israel.

The Jewish Antiquities consist of twenty books, of which the first ten give the history of Israel to the end of the Babylonish captivity; Book xi. to Alexander the Great; Book xii. to the death of Judas Maccabee; Book xiii. brings the history of the Maccabees down to the death of Alexandra; Book xiv. reaches to the accession of Herod the Great; Books xv., xvi. and xvii. contain the history of Herod I., while the other three relate events to the beginning of the Jewish war. As might be expected, it is mainly in this work, and in his treatise Against Apion, that the theological views of Josephus appear. These will be explained in another part of this article. Suffice it here to notice that, besides much which is uncritical and rationalistic, discrepancies are not wanting between statements in the Antiquities and others in the Jewish War, and even mistakes in regard to plain Biblical facts. (Comp. Hamburger, u. s. p. 508.) The Jewish Antiquities were probably completed about A.D. 93 or 94, in the thirteenth year of the emperor Domitian, and in the fifty-sixth of the life of Josephus.

3. Against Apion; or, more fully, The Apology of Flavius Josephus on the Antiquity of the Jews against Apion.—On the whole, we are disposed to place this book next in the order of Josephus's writings. (Comp. Ewald, u. s. p. 107, whose reasoning, however, is not quite conclusive.) The bitter hatred and the absurd charges against the Jews of that greatest of ancient charlatans, Apion, are sufficiently known to the historical student. Nevertheless, such were the prejudices of the Gentiles at the time, that his statements received more or less general credence. To defend his countrymen—perhaps we should rather have said, himself and his countrymen—from the prejudices thus raised; to vindicate his own work on the Antiquities of the Jews against hostile critics; and, at the same time, to demonstrate the antiquity of his race, their nobility, and the pre-eminence of their institutions and laws—such, viewed negatively and positively, were the objects which Josephus had in view in writing this treatise. Apion was merely the representative of a class of enemies, and the refutation of his charges forms a comparatively small part of what might be more aptly designated as a general Apology for Judaism. This work is also dedicated to Epaphroditus. Unquestionably, it must be pronounced the most successful literary effort of Josephus. Its language is warm, often impassioned; and the plan and arguments are ably conceived. Throughout the first book the name of Apion is not even mentioned. All the more bitter are his attacks on him in the second book (ii. 1–13), after which Josephus enters on an eloquent vindication of Moses and of his laws (ii. 14–32), closing with an argument against heathenism—of course Greek, not Roman (ii. 33–35), and with some general remarks. It is difficult to fix the date of this book otherwise than to say that it was written after the Antiquities—as Ewald thinks, one year later.<sup>8</sup>

4. The Life.—In this instance also the title is misleading, since the treatise is mainly a defence of Josephus from the charges against his conduct in Galilee brought by Justus of Tiberias (in a work which has not been preserved). For purposes of his own, Justus had evidently represented Josephus as having been much more hostile to Rome than suited the Jewish court-favourite. As Vespasian, Titus, and Agrippa were now dead (Life, 65), such imputations might have proved dangerous. Nor did Josephus scruple, for the sake of his position in Rome, to represent his own conduct in the most odious light, as that of a deliberate traitor to his own country. This self-vindication is the main object of the treatise, the biographical notices of himself serving only as Introduction (Life, 1–6) and Epilogue (Life, 75, 76).

Besides these four works, Josephus seems to have written another, now lost, which, from his references, appears to have borne on the history of the Seleucidic kings (Ant. xiii. 2, 1; 2, 4; 4, 6; 5, 11). The treatise Περὶ τοῦ παντός bearing his name (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 48) is now generally ascribed to Hippolytus. Josephus had planned two other works—one in four books about God and His essence (Ant. xx. 11, 23), and the other on the laws of the Jews (Ant. iii. 5, 6; 8, 10). The latter is probably the same which is also referred to under two other names (αιτιολογία, Ant. i. 1, 1; 10, 5; iii. 6, 6; and Commentary on Jewish Customs and their Reasons, iv. 8, 4). From what we know of Josephus's tendencies, we can scarcely regret his inability to carry out these plans. The so-called Fourth Book of Maccabees, or On the Rule of Reason, which was long ascribed to Josephus, and is inserted in most editions of his works (Edit. Havercamp, vol. ii. pp. 497-520), is in all probability not of his composition.

<sup>7</sup> We specially note in this work the attempt either ostentatiously to forbear an opinion on miracles, or else to explain them in a rational manner, and such extraordinary statements, as, for example, Ant. iv. 8, 10 (comp. Ag. Apion. ii. 33) that Moses had forbidden the Jews to despise or insult the gods of other nations.

<sup>8</sup> Reference should here be made to the very elegant translation into Hebrew of the treatise Against Apion, which the learned reader will find reprinted in Filipowski's beautiful edition of the Sepher Yuchasin (after that work itself), where it occupies more than thirty-five double-columned pages.

The well known English translation of the Works of Josephus by Whiston is not only uncritical, but often incorrect and inaccurate. It is much to be regretted that the excellent version by Traill, edited by Isaac Taylor (London, 1862), only extends over the Jewish War. But the Greek text itself requires thorough revision, as will appear from the following.

Criticism of the Text of Josephus.—Readers of Josephus are probably not aware, how much remains to be done for the correction of the text of Josephus. What may be called the textus receptus, from which translations are made, is that of Havercamp (2 fol. vols., Amsterdam, 1726). But this is very defective. It is based on comparatively recent and corrupt MSS., only occasionally corrected by comparison with better ones. Thus, after all, it virtually reproduces the text of what is known as the editio princeps (Basil. 1544, Frobenius), which is derived from MSS. of no value. In his critical edition of The Jewish War, Cardwell, while doing ample though discriminating justice to the labours of Hudson, pronounces this well-deserved caustic criticism on Havercamp, that, while having access to all critical helps, “he owed much to the diligence of others without adding anything adequate of his own”; while, on the other hand, owing to the hopeless confusion which he introduced, “the reader could wish that he had left untouched what others had contributed” The reprints—for they are little better—of Oberthür and Richter deserve no special notice. Hence Cardwell was right in thus characterising the state of matters at the beginning of his labours: Restat igitur Flavius Josephus quasi ab integro publici juris faciendus (De Bello Jud. vol. ii. pp. v. vi.). Cardwell’s work (2 vols. Oxonii 1837) extends only over the Jewish War, of which he gives in his first volume the Greek text with the various readings; and in the second volume its ancient Latin translation (generally regarded as the work of Rufinus), prefaced by 32 pages, of which the first ten, treating of MSS. and previous editions, are the most important, and followed by copious notes (pp. 396-618). English students may reflect with satisfaction, that the merit of what in the past has been done for the critical revision of the text of Josephus belongs chiefly to Oxford scholars, even as the Bodleian Library possesses one of the best MSS. of the first ten books of the Antiquities. Great praise is due to Cardwell. He specially collated six MSS., which he respectively designates—L (Bibl. Laurent. Florentinae, Cod. 19, saec. xi.); M (in the same library, Cod. 36); N (same library, Cod. 17); P (Biblioth. Nation., Paris, Cod. No. 1425); R (same library, Cod. No. 1429) and T (Bibl. Sir Thomas Phillipps). Cardwell rightly regards Cod. P as the best of these MSS. In point of fact they represent three classes: P the first; N and L the second; and M the third. But, as will presently appear, Cardwell’s collation of MSS. was not complete; it only extended over the Jewish War; nor did the laborious scholar apply the result of his inquiries to the actual production of a critically correct text.

It seems once more reserved for a German scholar to supply what is still required. Dr. Benedictus Niese, Professor in the University of Marburg, has for many years been engaged in collating the MSS. of Josephus, with an amount of diligence and self-denial which deserves most grateful acknowledgment. When we think of the years of weary and unpretentious labour spent in a work to which a purely scientific interest attaches, we feel how deeply the whole literary world is indebted to one who is content to devote almost a lifetime to what can yield so little material return. The labours of Professor Niese are now nearly completed, and he hopes soon to go to press with what will for the first time give to modern students an approximately correct text of all the works of Josephus. It is to a private communication from Professor Niese that the writer of this article is mainly indebted for the facts which he is about to lay before his readers.

At the outset it is necessary to remark, that the different works of Josephus have all traditions of their own. Antiquities, the Jewish War, and the work Against Apion, have each been separately handed down. Again, the twenty books of the Antiquities have come down in two separate portions, each of ten books, though originally they may have consisted of four parts, each containing five books. All MSS. which contain either the entire works of Josephus, or even all the twenty books of the Antiquities, are not older than the 14th century. But to enter on a criticism of the separate works:—

A. The Jewish War.—This work does not bear exactly the superscription which we generally read, but this title, ἱστορία ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου πρὸς Ῥωμαίους. Here we have two classes of MSS. Of the first class the Paris Codex (Bibl. Nation. No. 1425, marked P by Cardwell), the Codex Ambrosianus in Milan (D. super. 50, not noted by Cardwell), and the Codex Marcianus Graecus, 383, may be regarded as representatives. The first two of these Codices date from the 11th, the third from the 11-12th century. Cardwell’s Codex N (dating from the 12th century) and next to it his Cod. L (dating from the 11th century) are good representatives of Class II. of MSS., although Cod. L is considerably interpolated. Such MSS. as Cod. M (dating from the 14th century) must be ranked still lower, say, in a third class.

B. Antiquities.—These, as before stated, must be arranged in two portions:—

a. Antiquities, Books i.-x. The best MSS. here are: Codex Parisinus 1421 (dating from the 14th century) and Codex Bodleianus Gr. 186 (dating from the 14th or 15th century). Next are ranked Codex Marcianus 381 (dating from the 13th or 14th century), Parisinus Graec. 1419, and Vindobonensis (Bibl. Imper.), Histor. Graec. 20 (both dating from the 11th century). But the three last-mentioned MSS. are all more or less interpolated.

b. Antiquities, Books xi.-xx., and The Life. Here we place first the Codex Palatinus Gr. 14 (Rom. Vatic. Bibl.), which dates from the 9th or 10th century. It is therefore the oldest of all MSS. Unfortunately, Books xviii. to xx. are wanting, which is the more to be deplored, as the well-known passage concerning Jesus Christ occurs in Book xviii. Next to the Cod. Palat. 14 are to be ranked Codex Ambrosianus F. 128, super. (dating from the 11th century); Codex Leidensis F. 13 (dating from the 11th century); and Codex Laurentianus (Florence) 69, cod. 20. The two latter MSS. contain only Books xi. to xv.

C. The Work Against Apion.—The best MS. of this is Cod. Laurentianus, 69, 22. It dates from the 11th century.

D. Of great importance for the criticism of the text is also the Epitome of the Antiquities, which exists in a number of MSS. The same remarks apply to the Latin translations of the works of Josephus. The oldest of these is the version of the Jewish War, which is generally attributed to the presbyter Rufinus (born about 330, ob. 410 A.D.). The translation of the Antiquities and Against Apion is of later date, and supposed to have been undertaken by direction of Cassiodorus (De Institutione Divin. Liter. 17). As Cassiodorus was born in 470 and died about 563, this version is about a century and a half later than that of Rufinus, since it was probably executed towards the close of Cassiodorus's life, when he had retired from political affairs to his monastery of Viviers [See Dict. of Christian Biog. Vol. I. p. 417]. A remarkable Codex of this version is the well-known Papyrus in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, of which, however, only Books vi. to x. are preserved, and even these not completely.

In view of the corrupt state of our textus receptus it must be matter of sincere congratulation to the general reader, that, on the high authority of Professor Niese, we can convey to him the assurance that a detailed examination of all the existing MSS. of Josephus has not brought to light a single new historical fact. None the less important will a correct text be to the student, who, above all, must value accuracy. In one respect, indeed, some practical result may be hoped for. A careful comparison of all the readings may enable us to correct at least a few of the gross chronological inaccuracies and inconsistencies in the present text of Josephus, to which attention is called in another part of this article. It must, however, be admitted that the results hitherto gained, so far as summarized in Dr. Destinton's recent Programme (Die Chronologie des Josephus), are not very encouraging. But we may perhaps be allowed to infer, that, in view of the extensive corruptions, corrections, and interpolations in the MSS., there may have been alterations even in that original copy, from which our two best MSS. (the Cod. Parisinus 1421, and Bodleianus Gr. 186) are alike transcripts.

Literary Criticism of the Text.—Here we ought to consider in detail the literary sources from which the information of Josephus was derived; the chronology, and the geography of Josephus. The limits of an article only allow of some very general hints, together with directions how the student may get help in further investigation. Among the sources whence Josephus derived his information as to Biblical times, we assign, of course, the first place to the Old Testament and Jewish tradition. This branch of the subject will be fully treated in this article. As regards the Apocrypha, Josephus evidently draws, sometimes verbatim, from the apocryphal I. Esdras (III. Esdras). Not to point out striking agreements in peculiar modes of expression, the following passages referred to by Bloch (Die Quellen d. Flav. Jos.) will illustrate this dependence on the apocryphal, and divergence from the canonical Ezra: Ant. xi. 1, 1, comp. I. Esdras, ii. 3, 4; Ant. xi. 1, 3, comp. I. Esd. ii. 11; Ant. xi. 2, 1, comp. I. Esd. ii. 16; Ant. ib. comp. I. Esd. ii. 18, 19, 20, 21; Ant. xi. 2, 2, comp. I. Esd. ii. 25. The correspondence between I. Esd. iii. and iv. and Ant. xi. 3, is well known. Other correspondences will readily occur on comparison, and are mostly indicated in Mr. Eddrup's notes on I. Esdras (Comment. of the S. P. C. K. on the Apocryphal Books). It is, of course, not possible here to enter on the divergences between Josephus and Pseudo-Ezra. Similarly, a comparison of Ant. xi. 6 will shew that his narrative of Esther is based on the text of the LXX, with its additions. However, we have here old Jewish traditions, for the Dream of Mordecai, and his prayer and that of Esther occur, with more or less variations from the Greek text, in the second Targum on Esther, in the Midrash Esther, and in the work of Josippon ben Gorion (ed. Breithaupt, pp. 74–80). Comp. Zunz, Gottesd. Vortr. p. 121. The dependence of Josephus on the 1st Book of Maccabees, which offers a somewhat wide and very interesting field of study, has previously been referred to. A discussion of what Josephus owed to the Jewish Hellenist writers, and of what he derived from the historians of other nations, and especially from Greek writers—whether he consulted their works, or had only extracts from them before him, with all such kindred questions—would require too long a digression. We must refer here to the “literature” at the close of this article, and especially to the recent Tractate of Bloch, though it requires to be used with caution, and we have to express our dissent from not a few of its conclusions. The reader will also find much to interest him in J. Freudenthal's Hellenistische Studien. But the general results at which we have arrived, have already been embodied in an analysis of the works of Josephus. For the Chronology of Josephus the brochure of Dr. Destinton, though far from complete, deserves the scholar's attention. M. von Niebuhr's Gesch. Assurs should also here be consulted. On the Geography of Josephus, a very exhaustive and satisfactory book, in the form of a dictionary, has lately been written by Gustav Boettger (Leipzig, 1879), in which the geographical notices throughout Josephus' works are collated, and in each case compared both with the Bible and with the results of the latest investigations. Lastly, the student who wishes to utilise Josephus for the criticism of the New Testament is referred to J. T. Krebs' Observationes in N. T. e Flav. Jos. Lipsiae, 1755. The book, which is the result of much labour, occupies, of course, only the critical standpoint of its own time, but has, in our experience, been found both interesting and useful.

III. The Import and Bearing of the Views of Josephus relatively to Theology.—1. Relation of Josephus to Philo and to Rabbinism.—Under this head we shall also have to refer to some of the dogmatic views of Josephus. The authorship of the Fourth Book of Maccabees being, to say the least, very doubtful, we shall not touch on the connexion between the views expressed in that book and those of Philo, otherwise than to refer the reader to the Commentary of Grimm on 4 Maccabees (p. 288), to the monogram of Freudenthal (Breslau, 1869), and to Siegfried's Philo von Alexandria (pp. 6, 20, &c.).

As might be expected, Josephus was acquainted with the history of Philo, and knew of the unhappy embassy to Caligula which he had headed in A.D. 40 (Ant. xviii. 8, 1). He speaks of Philo in the highest terms; and even had we no positive evidence, we could scarcely doubt that he had perused his principal writings. If Josephus had ever written that treatise on "the laws of the Jews" which he planned, he would no doubt have often availed himself of Philo's works. But more than that, it has been well pointed out (Siegfried, u. s. p. 2, 7, 8, &c.) how closely the preface to the Antiquities resembles Philo's introduction to his treatise De Opificio Mundi. Both statesubstantially the same reason why an account of the creation preceded that of the Mosaic legislation. Philo directs attention to the harmony between the law and the world, concluding from it that he who most fully observed the law would also prove the best citizen of the world. Similarly, Josephus lays it down that it was needful first to present a proper view of the character of God, as apparent in His works, so as to prove that the same order which prevailed in nature also pervaded the law of God. Further, Josephus expressly adopts Philo's principle of a deeper allegorical by the side of a literal interpretation of Scripture. Lastly, in not a few instances his allegorical interpretations so closely resemble those of the great Alexandrian, that we cannot doubt he had derived them from his writings, although it must be admitted that coincidences in this respect have been exaggerated by some writers (as by Gfrörer, Philo u. d. Alex. Theos. vol. ii. pp. 356-367). Thus, for example, like Philo, Josephus regards (Ant. iii. 7, 7) the tabernacle as the symbol of the world, the most holy place as that of heaven (comp. Philo, De Vita Mosis iii. 6), the shewbread as that of the twelve months of the year, the candlestick as that of the seven planets (ib. 7), and the four materials of which the veil was made as that of the four elements (byssus, earth; purple, the sea; hyacinth, the air; coccus, the fire). We will not pursue the subject farther than to say, that Josephus's symbolical interpretations of the various parts of the High priest's dress closely resemble those of Philo, and that there is a similar correspondence in their interpretation of such names as Abel, Cain, Melchisedec, and Ishmael (Ant. i. 2, 1; 10, 2; 10, 4; comp. Siegfried, u. s. p. 280). Further instances of analogy in Scriptural interpretations between Josephus and Philo will be given in the article on PHILO.

In regard to theology proper also, we notice that the views of Josephus about the nature of God are essentially the same as those of the great Alexandrian. Like him, Josephus holds that God must be regarded as entirely apart from all human qualities, and as unrecognisable in His essence (Ag. Apion, ii. 16). Moreover, it is very characteristic of the Alexandrian origin of Josephus's views that, like Philo, he maintains that the Greek sages, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Plato, and the Stoics, had perceived substantially the same truths as Moses, but had imparted their knowledge only to the initiated, while the Jewish lawgiver had communicated it, and that in the fullest form, to the people generally. We are of course aware that this assertion is made by Josephus in an apologetic treatise primarily intended for Greek readers, in which also this other Alexandrian expression occurs, "that God permeated the whole world" (Ag. Apion, ii. 39), and this Philonic statement, "that the soul was inborn to the body, derived its evil from it, and would accordingly be purified by death" (Ag. Apion, ii. 24). But as similar views are advanced in his other works, we infer that they were not introduced merely for the sake of his Greek readers, but were really held by Josephus himself (comp. for example Ant. vi. 11, 8; viii. 4, 2). Again, Josephus, like Philo, points out in the Mosaic legislation the four cardinal virtues spoken of by the Greek philosophers (Ag. Apion, ii. 16). But on the other hand, the evidence is not sufficient to prove (as Gfrörer holds, u. s. p. 364-366) that Josephus had adopted the views of Philo concerning the Logos. (Similarly Lutterbeck, Neut. Lehrb. vol. i. pp. 411, 412, exaggerates the analogy between Philo and Josephus and the Alexandrianism of our historian.) At the same time, we must not be understood as implying that Josephus either understood, or was capable of sharing the deep, almost rapt, mystical views of such an enthusiast as Philo. It was only the rationalistic part of his system which he could either grasp or adopt.

Relation between Josephus and Rabbinitism.—The judgment of Ewald, that Josephus was "weak in his Hebrew" (u. s. p. 100), and the statement of Lutterbeck (u. s. p. 411) that he made use only of the Septuagint version of the Bible, must be received with certain modifications. Undoubtedly Aramaean was his mother tongue, in which language, as he informs us, he originally wrote his Jewish War (Comp. also Ant. iii. i. 6). Of course the Aramaean was closely kindred to the Hebrew. At the same time, the various derivations from that language in Josephus's Antiquities quoted by Bloch (Quell. des Fl. Jos. pp. 12-17) imply not more than a merely superficial knowledge of the original. Carpov has shewn (Crit. Sacra, Pars iii. pp. 937-949) in his refutation of Whiston, that in not a few instances Josephus diverges from the text of Scripture, either from ignorance of Hebrew or of set purpose. His peculiar chronological statements, which accord neither with the Hebrew text, the Septuagint, nor the Samaritan Pentateuch, nor, indeed, are always consistent, must not be ascribed to the possession of a purer Hebrew text than our own, but were, when not caused by the corrupt state of our MSS., due to a rationalistic endeavour to remove supposed difficulties, or else to ignorance or mistakes on his part. It is probable that Josephus chiefly followed the translation of the LXX, although not to the entire neglect of the Hebrew text.<sup>a</sup> Similarly, we must receive with modifications the views ordinarily entertained about the amount of information which Josephus derived from Rabbinical traditions. This will be discussed in detail in another part of this Article, when treating of Josephus's Interpretations of Holy Scripture. Suffice it to state in the meantime, that writers have here erred from excess on the one side and on the other. It is undoubtedly true, as the learned Selden remarks (De Synedr. vet. Ebr. lib. iii. p. 1106, the passage is wrongly quoted by Carpov), that, whether purposely or from ignorance, Josephus "sometimes notably diverges from the best-established Rabbinical statements." And even those who most incline to the opposite view (Duschak, Josephus Flavius u. d. Trad. Wien, 1864, and Hamburger, u. s. pp. 507-509) are obliged to admit occasional divergences. We are inclined to think that Josephus's knowledge of traditionalism was only superficial. But he must, at least, have been acquainted with the views popularly current at the time in Jerusalem. He lacked, however, deeper and more accurate erudition; nor did he scruple either to omit, insert, or alter, according to Rabbinical traditions, as in each case suited his special purpose. Duschak has arranged his comparison of Josephus with traditionalism under the four particulars of Worship, Jurisprudence, Ethics, and Ceremonial Law, and in each case indicated wherein Josephus agreed with, and wherein he differed from the Rabbis. Similarly, Hamburger has pointed out in the writings of Josephus a number of Haggadic additions to Biblical stories. On the other hand, he has also been forced to admit that in not a few instances Josephus either goes beyond, or diverges from the Halachah, or traditional law. There can, however, be no doubt that Josephus wished to appear, probably to be, an orthodox Jew, nor yet that he was utterly incapable of anything beyond either externalism or else rationalism. The Christian student will be interested to know that, like all his contemporaries, Josephus believed in the reality of demoniacal possessions. If it were necessary to show the infinite difference between the views of the New Testament writers on this subject, and those of their contemporaries, alike as to the rationale of these possessions and the mode of exorcising the demons, we could find no better exemplification than in the statements of Josephus on this subject in his Jewish War, vii. 6, 3, and Ant. viii. 2, 5. (Comp. also the very curious collection by Dr. Gideon Brecher, in his interesting treatise on the Transcendental, Magic, and Magical Cures in the Talmud. The information there brought together might well startle those who are inclined to derive the New Testament account of demoniacs from the views popularly entertained at that time.)

2. Josephus's Views on the Canon.—This point is manifestly of the deepest interest, since Josephus may be regarded as in some measure representing the opinions entertained by the Jews in the first century of our era. Here we must quote in extenso what may be designated as the classical passage on this subject, in the treatise Against Apion (i. 7, 8). After enlarging on the trustworthiness of the Jewish records, "since they were written only by prophets, who learned what was original and most ancient by inspiration of God, and who also chronicled distinctly what had happened in their own time," he adds, "For there are not with us innumerable books, disagreeing and contradicting each other; but only two and twenty books, containing the record of all time, which are justly believed divine.<sup>b</sup> And of these five are those of Moses, which contain the laws, and the tradition (the account) of the origin of mankind, even to his death. And this period embraces about 3000 years. But from the death of Moses until the reign of Artaxerxes, who ruled after Xerxes, the prophets who succeeded Moses wrote what was done in their days in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God, and rules of life for man. But from Artaxerxes to our own time (events) have indeed been written down, yet the same authority does not attach to these as to the (books) before them, because there has not been an exact succession of prophets. But it is evident by fact how much faith we attach to our own books. For although so many ages have elapsed, no one has ever yet ventured to add anything to them, nor to take away from them, nor to change. How to all Jews it is inborn (natural) immediately from their birth to regard them as the very teachings of God, and to adhere to them, and for their sakes, if need be, willingly to die."

From this passage several inferences may be drawn, most of which are confirmed by other statements of Josephus. First, Josephus arranged the canon into three parts—the law, the prophets, and the remaining books, the Chethuvim, γραφήια or ἀγιόγραφα—a general designation for which the Jerusalem Talmud also uses the title Chochmah, Wisdom (comp. Fürst, u. s. pp. 55, 73, 74). Further, it will be noticed that Josephus primarily designates the Hagiographa as "hymns," because the Psalter stood at the head of them (comp. Fürst, u. s. and generally Oehler in Herzog's Real-Encykl. vol. vii. pp. 253, 254). We remark the same in Philo<sup>c</sup> (De Vita Contempl. ed. Mang. vol. ii. p. 475), and also in the New Testament (St. Luke xxiv. 44). Again, Josephus, like Origen, Melito, and Jerome, enumerates twenty-two books, according to the Hebrew alphabet, instead of twenty-four as in the Septuagint and the Talmud. Fürst has shown (u. s. 3, 4), that the latter enumeration originated in Babylon, while that into twenty-two books was at first the common one in Palestine, and perhaps also in Alexandria. The question as to their order may probably be thus answered: After the five books of Moses, Josephus would place the following thirteen as prophetic books—Joshua, Judges and Ruth, the books of Samuel, the books of the Kings, the books of Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, Esther, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, the book of the twelve minor prophets, and Job. (Oehler, u. s. p. 251). The Chethuvim would embrace Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs. Derenbourg (Hist. de la Palest. pp. 478, 479) somewhat alters this arrangement, by adding to the nine books which now form the second section of the Hebrew Bible the following four, Ezra and Nehemiah, Daniel, Esther, and Chronicles, while he places among the Chethuvim the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon, as forming together one opus, ascribed to Solomon. The statement of Josephus about two books of Ezekiel<sup>d</sup> (Ant. x. 5, 1) is easily explained by the Talmudic arrangement of these prophecies, into those which predicted destructions (Ezek. ii.—xxxix.) and those which conveyed hope and comfort (chs. xl.—xlviii.). A similar arrangement of Jeremiah into two books is also mentioned in Jewish tradition (Sifre, ed. Friedmann, 64 a.), although it is difficult to explain the division, as the Rabbins do, on the same ground as that of the book of Ezekiel. The common arrangement into prophecies concerning Israel and Judah (chs. i.—xlv.) and prophecies concerning other nations (xlv.—li.) is evidently more natural.

The question concerning the outward form of the canon is, however, of much less importance than that of his views on the Inspiration of the Old Testament. In accordance with uniform Jewish tradition (comp. for example, Sanh. 11 a.; 1 Macc. ix. 27, and many other passages) to the effect that the prophetic succession ceased with Malachi, Josephus marks the time of Artaxerxes as the limit of the period of inspiration. On the other hand, it would scarcely be possible to express the doctrine of inspiration more strongly than he does. To him the Scriptures are "the holy books" (Ant. Intr. 4; ii. 16. 5; iii. 5, 2; iv. 8, 48; ix. 2, 2; x. 4, 2, &c.; Life 75), "the holy writings" (Jewish War, vi. 5, 4; Ant. x. 10, 4; Ag. Ap. i. 10; ii. 4), to which he ever appeals in confirmation of the truth of miracles, and which he saved out of the ruins of Jerusalem as the treasure he most valued (Life, 75). It is indeed true that, as by the Jews generally, so by Josephus the pre-eminence is assigned to Moses (Ant. iv. 8, 49, and in numerous other passages), and after him to the prophets, properly so-called, viz.:—Isaiah (Ant. x. 2, 2), Jeremiah, Ezekiel (Ant. x. 5, 1), Daniel (Ant. x. 11, 7), and the twelve minor prophets (Ant. x. 2, 2). But the passage which has been quoted at the beginning of this section (Ag. Ap. i. 7, 8), sufficiently shews that he applied the idea of inspiration to the whole Old Testament. Thus, stronger expressions could scarcely be employed than those which Josephus uses in reference to the book of Daniel (Ant. x. 11, 7), while at the same time he implies that such revelations were not confined to any one special prophet. This appears also from the terms which he applies to inspiration generally, ἐπινοια (Ag. Ap. i. 7) and προφητεία (Ant. ii. 8, 1; ix. 8, 6). Inspiration is defined as implying not only immediate contact with God, but as being filled with, or seized by, the Divine (comp. such passages as Ant. iv. 6, 5; vi. 8, 2; viii. 13, 3; ix. 3, 1; x. 11, 3, 5, 7). In fact, as Balaam spake by inspiration, "not of himself, but impelled by the Divine Spirit," so he is represented as warning Balak not to suppose in regard to prophets, "that it was of themselves either to be silent or to speak when the Spirit of God seizes upon them, for He puts into their mouths such sounds as He willeth, and words such as they are not conscious of," so that they cannot "forbear to speak the Divine, nor yet offer violence to His will, since nothing is any longer their own, when He prevents and enters into them." (Ant. iv. 6, 5.) Accordingly, as he puts it in another passage concerning Moses, "Whatever he uttered seemed as if you heard the voice of God Himself" (Ant. iv. 8, 49). Hence, as we have already noted, there could not be any contradictions in Scripture, and what seemed such might be easily conciliated. The first test of a genuine prophet was the truth of his predictions, which of course would appear by their fulfilment (Ant. x. 11, 7). Each fulfilled prophecy was a guarantee for the others (Ant. iv. 6, 5), and all these predictions afforded ever fresh evidence of the reign of God, and of His providence (Ant. x. 8, 3; xvii. 13, 5). Although everything was foreseen and appointed, yet prophecy was intended to warn men, and to bring them to repentance (Ant. x. 3, 1). There was still another test by which the truth of a prophecy might have been ascertained, viz., the precious stones on the High priest's garment, which by their peculiar sheen indicated the Presence and the will of God (Ant. iii. 8, 9). This privilege had, however, been forfeited about 200 years before Josephus wrote his book. But the most effectual security lay in the "exact succession of prophets," by which, no doubt, Josephus meant the orderly transference of the office from one prophet to another (comp. Ant. iv. 7, 2; 8, 46; viii. 13, 7; Jewish War, iv. 8, 3), and the taking up by each of the message of his predecessor. Only one objection remains to be answered. It must be admitted that Josephus attributed the gift of prophecy to persons in later times, such as to Hyrcanus (Ant. xiii. 10, 7; Jewish War, i. 2, 8). More than that, he ascribed it to many of the Essenes, and even claimed it occasionally for himself (Jewish War, iii. 8, 3; 8, 9; iv. 10, 7). But such isolated predictions he regarded as entirely exceptional, and as in no wise similar in character to the functions of the prophetic office (comp. Gerlach, u. s. p. 36).

Josephus's Interpretation of Holy Scripture.—It would of course be impossible to attempt, within the limits of an article, a detailed examination of every Biblical passage as interpreted by Josephus. The student who is interested in the subject will find useful hints and help in the treatises of Duschak and Tachauer, in the remarks of Zunz (Gottesd. Vortr. p. 120, n. c), and in Hartmann's well known work (Engel. Verb. d. A. Test. mit d. Neuen, pp. 464—515). Our present object is rather to point out the divergence of Josephus from the plain meaning of the Biblical text, and to indicate its causes. In so doing we shall strictly confine ourselves to the narrative portions of the Bible, to the omission of all reference to statements on legal or ceremonial ordinances, which would form a separate branch of study. Even thus we must aim not so much at completeness of detail, as at comprehensiveness of view. The version which Josephus gives of Scriptural narratives differs from that in the sacred text: by numerical deviations; through mistakes on his part; by alterations, additions, and omissions, chiefly intended to give a more rational cast to the history, or else to present Judaism in a more favourable light to the Gentiles (rationalistic and apologetic); and, lastly, by legendary embellishments, derived from tradition, which also occur in Rabbinical works preserved to us.

Numerical Deviations.—These seem almost inexplicable, since Josephus, at times, contradicts his own statements. Thus, in Ant. i. 3, 3, the date of the Flood is given as 2656 (according to the Hebrew text it is 1656), while at the same time the sum of the ages of the patriarchs to the Flood, as enumerated by Josephus in the very next paragraph, amount to 2256.<sup>e</sup> In the textus receptus of Ant. i. 6, 5, Abraham is stated to have been born in the year 292 after the Flood, while in the same paragraph the sum of the ages of his ancestors, when their sons were born, gives the figure 993 as that of the nativity of Abraham. But in this case the explanation is easy. Codd. R. and O. give the total figure as 992, which apparently has been corrected in the textus receptus to bring it into accordance with the Hebrew. At the same time the figure 992 does not correspond with the LXX. In Ant. i. 3, 2 and 3, there are deviations from Gen. vi. 16, 18, in regard to the ark, and to the number of the unclean beasts in it. In Ant. i. 18, 1, Jacob's birth is erroneously placed after the death of Abraham (comp. Gen. xx. 5, with xv. 7), and in Ant. i. 22, 1, the age of Isaac is put down as 185 instead of 180, as in Gen. xxxv. 28. Similar numerical deviations occur in Ant. iii. 8, 2, where the number of offerers is stated to have been 605,550, whereas in Ex. xxviii. 26, it is 2000 less; in Ant. iii. 12, 4, where the number of those capable of going to war differs by 100 from that in Numb. ii. 32; in Ant. iii. 12, 5, where the number of the Levites is higher by 1880 than that in Numb. iii. 39; while in Ant. iv. 7, 1, the account given of the spoil differs numerically from that in Numb. xxxi. 32-36. These instances may suffice for our present purpose; but the final discussion of the subject must stand over till we have such a text, as we may hope for from the critical labours of Professor Niese. We only add, that it is utterly impossible to reconcile Josephus's account of the Tabernacle with that of Scripture, or his measurements of the Temple of Herod with those furnished by the Rabbis.

Erroneous Statements.—Of these the following may serve as specimens. In Ant. i. 3, 5, the statement about the raven differs from that in Gen. viii. 7. In Ant. i. 1, 3, the explanation of the name Diglath, and in i. 19, 8, of that of Zabulon is false. In Ant. i. 16, 2, Bethuel is said to have been dead at the time of Rebekah's engagement. In Ant. ii. 3, 1, Rachel is represented as alive when Joseph was sold. In Ant. ii. 5, 2, the accounts of the chief butler's dream, and in ii. 5, 5, of Pharaoh's dream, differ in some details from those given in the Bible. In Ant. ii. 12, 3, we are told that God shewed Moses not only two signs, but also the changing of the water into blood, which is contrary to Ex. iv. 9. In Ant. ii. 14, 4 and 5, there are inaccuracies as compared with Ex. x. 11, 24. In Ant. ii. 2, 4, the relationship of Miriam to Hur, and in iii. 6, 1, that to Bezaleel are given erroneously. Kindred mistakes occur in Ant. iii. 8, 7 as compared with Lev. x. 4, and in Ant. iv. 1, 1, and iv. 2, 2, as compared with Numb. xiv. 40, and Numb. xvi. i. As other instances of inaccuracy we may mention Ant. iv. 7, 1, as compared with Numb. xxxi. 29; Ant. iv. 4, 4 (as to the redemption of unclean animals) as compared with Numb. xviii. 16; and Ant. iv. 8, 23, as compared with Deut. xxii. 19.

Alterations.—It is interesting to compare the account of Josephus concerning the serpent (Ant. i. 1, 4) not only with the simple Biblical narrative, but with the very strange legends of the Rabbis as presented in Bereshith Rabba and Yalkut. Very curiously Josephus commits the same error (of representing God as forbidding the touch of the tree of knowledge) to which the Rabbis trace the fall of Eve, since she had added to the word of God (Yalkut i. par. 26, p. 8, col. c and d). In Ant. i. 2, 2, we have curious statements about Cain and the seventy-seven sons of Lamech, for which there is no warrant either in Scripture or in tradition. Other alterations are such as in Ant. ii. 2, 2, about Joseph's motive in telling his dream; in ii. 2, 4, as compared with Gen. xxxvii. 12; in Ant. ii. 6, 2, as compared with xlii. 9; and in Ant. ii. 9, 2, where Josephus speaks of Egyptian midwives for the Jewish women. The altered version of the Law of Tithes (Numb. xviii. 26-28) which Josephus gives in Ant. iv. 4, 3, is in the spirit of the dominant priestly party of his time. To mention only one other instance: the account which Josephus gives of the death of Moses (Ant. iv. 8, 48) contrasts most painfully with the sublime simplicity of that of Scripture.

Additions.—In Ant. i. 2, 3, Josephus inserts a curious story about two pillars which the children of Seth erected to inscribe on them their discoveries. In Ant. ii. 4, we have romantic additions about the relation between Joseph and Potiphar's wife, and in ii. 9, 3 and 4, about the circumstances of Moses' birth. In Ant. iii. 6, 2, we read of a festival after everything was ready for the building of the tabernacle. The notice that Miriam died forty years after the Exodus (Ant. iv. 4, 6) may possibly be based on Jewish tradition (comp. Tachauer, p. 74). But the remark about a command which Moses gave to Phinehas about the disposal of the Midianite captives (Ant. iv. 7, 1) is of Josephus' own invention. So is the pretended prohibition under pain of death of keeping (magical?) poison (Ant. iv. 8, 34). The same remark, of course, applies to such stories as that of Solomon's power to exorcise demons (Ant. viii. 2, 5), although it must be admitted that, considering the large store of legends on this and kindred subjects current in Rabbinical literature, Josephus made a very moderate use of them.

Additions, Rationalistic and Apologetic.—Rationalistic.—Among these we may include the reason for Lamech's punishment (Ant. i. 2, 2); the description of the rainbow as God's bow, perhaps after a Greek legend (Ant. i. 3, 8); the notice of "others" than Shem, Ham, and Japheth, as colonising with them the earth (i. 4, 1);

<sup>e</sup> The latter number differs from that of the LXX. which gives 2242, or, according to a very old correction 2262, as the date of the Flood. (Comp. the table in DeLitzsch's Genesis, p. 189). But if we correct the textus receptus of Josephus by Codex O, the sum of the ages of the patriarchs will amount to exactly the same number as in the LXX.

the account of Abraham's intercourse with the Egyptian priests (i. 8, 2); the curious painting of Eliezer's mission to Rebekah (i. 16, 2); the remark about Isaac's old age hindering his worship (i. 18, 5); that of the reason why Jacob would not lodge in the city of Bethel (i. 19, 1); and the explanation of the names Israel (i. 20, 2) and Ephraim (ii. 6, 1), which differs from that in the Bible. The reason given for not eating the siew which had shrunk (i. 20, 2) sounds rationalistic, and differs not only from that in the Bible, but from the traditional account of the matter (comp. Tachauer, p. 57). On the other hand, the statement that Jacob loved Joseph "for the virtue of his mind" (ii. 2, 1) accords both with the rendering of Onkelos and with Bereshith Rabba (48). Thoroughly rationalistic are the explanations of the motives for the long journey through the wilderness (ii. 15, 3), of the natural manner in which the waters of Marah were healed (iii. 1, 2), of the reason for the institution of the Feast of Tabernacles (iii. 10, 4), and many others.

Apologetic Additions, Alterations, and Omissions.

—These are very numerous. Among the most remarkable are, the peculiar version which Josephus gives of the murder of the Shechemites Ant. i. 21, 1, and his total omission of the Biblical narratives about Judah and Tamar, about the sin of the Golden Calf, and the breaking of the first Tables of the Law by Moses. The legend of Moses' fight against the Ethiopians (Ant. ii. 10) is given in a version almost the opposite of that in Rabbinical tradition, which represents Moses, as in his flight from Egypt, fighting for the Ethiopians against Balaam and his sons, who held the capital of Ethiopia, in rebellion against the legitimate king. Ultimately Moses succeeds to the throne, takes the capital, and marries the former king's widow. But after forty years he succumbs to the intrigues of enemies, who gain over even his wife, and at the request of a popular assembly leaves Ethiopia and migrates to Midian. With these legends the account of Josephus may be compared, noting, however, that he makes no mention of the murder of the Egyptian by Moses, but assigns his flight to very different reasons (Ant. ii. 11, 1). Similarly, we ascribe to the desire of presenting Judaism in the most favourable light the daring assertion (iv. 8, 10) that the Jews were not allowed to blaspheme the gods of other cities, nor to rob their temples, nor to deprive them of things dedicated to idols. The statement (Ant. iii. 12, 2) that priests were not allowed to marry women who kept inns, may have arisen from the fact that Josephus translated the word חַלְלוֹת (harlot) in regard to Rahab (Ant. v. 1, 2, 7) by inn-keeper, as does also the Chaldee. At the same time, some of the other statements about the marriages of priests read rather like apologetic additions. Such alterations of Biblical ordinances as in Ant. iv. 8, 23, 35, and 43, probably belong to the same class as those of which we have given examples.

Legendary Additions and Explanations, derived from Rabbinical Tradition.—That some of Josephus's embellishments of Biblical narratives were derived from Jewish tradition, is proved by the fact that they occur in Rabbinical writings. At the same time we must repeat our former observation, that his knowledge of traditionalism must have been superficial. He chiefly repeats that of which an educated priest in Jerusalem could not have been ignorant, and even this not always correctly. The legends which he tells are mostly connected with the chief Biblical personages, and such as at the time would probably be in every one's mouth; little more than what mothers or elementary teachers might repeat to children in their Scripture-lessons. Of anything deeper there is no trace. Every one would know that the Flood was supposed to have commenced in the month Marcheshvan (Ant. i. 3, 3), though some teachers named the month of Ijar (comp. Yalkut on Genesis i. 56, p. 14, col. c). Similarly, the traditional interpretation of the names of the rivers of Paradise, given by Josephus in Ant. i. 1, 3, must have been familiar to all (comp. Bechor. 55 a; Yalkut on Gen. c. 21, 22, p. 7, col. b). In Ant. i. 1, 1 Josephus notes that, and promises in another work to explain the reason why, in Gen. i. 5, Moses designates it as "one day," and not as the first day. The same question is discussed in Rabbinical writings, for example, in Ber. R. 2, and very fully in c. 3 towards the end (ed. Warsh. p. 10 a and b). Comp. also Nasir 7 a (line 11, etc. from the bottom). The legend (Ant. i. 1, 4) that the animals had the power of speech, occurs also in the Book of Jubilees. The statement of Josephus (Ant. i. 2, 1) that Adam and Eve had also daughters, occurs not only in the Book of Jubilees, but in Ber. R. 22, where it is stated that on the very day of their marriage five children were born to them. In the same paragraph Josephus refers to the punishment of Cain's posterity to the seventh generation. This is the view of the Midrash on Gen. iv. 23. A little further on Josephus speaks of Cain's fear of the wild beasts. Similarly, in the Midrash (Ber. R. 22 on Gen. iv. 15) all the animals, and last of all the old serpent also, are described as assembling to avenge the blood of Abel. The statement of Josephus (Ant. i. 2, 3) to the effect that the descendants of Seth "were the inventors of that peculiar sort of wisdom which is concerned with the heavenly bodies and their order," and that they made certain other inventions, seems based on the traditions in Yalkut on Genesis c. 41 (p. 11, col. d, comp. also the curious notice in Jubilees viii.), where the arrangement of the calendar, knowledge of the future, and acquaintance with all trades is attributed to Adam. The statement (Ant. i. 3, 1) that Noah preached repentance, occurs not only in the New Testament (2 Peter ii. 5) but in the Talmud (Sanh. 108 a, lines 4 and 3 from the bottom), while the legend in Ant. i. 3, 5, that pieces of the ark were still shewn by the Armenians, is based on the tradition in Sanh. 96, a. (lines 13, 14, and 15 from the top), where Senacherib is said to have found a board of the ark. In Ant. i. 3, 7, we read that the sacrifice of Noah was intended to conciliate God, which corresponds with the tradition in Tanchuma (ed. Warshau p. 15 a, line 9 from the top), to the effect that Noah offered it from fear that another flood might come upon the world. The idea (Ant. i. 4, 2) that the proposal to build the tower of Babel originated with Nimrod occurs in Chul. 89 a, line 24 from top. The supposition that Sarah was the sister of Lot (Ant. i. 7, 1) is found in Sanh. 69 b, lines 22 etc. from bottom, where Israh is identified with Sarah, and a very strange account is given of the former name. It will readily be believed that Josephus's sketch of Abraham and of the Sodomites contains many traditional elements. But the special notice of the want of hospitality in Sodom is explained by this tradition in Yalkut 83, p. 24, col. c (taken from the Pirke de R. Elieser), that a proclamation was made in Sodom that any one who gave a piece of bread to the poor should be burnt. Similarly, the statement (Ant. i. 11, 2) that the three angels who came to Abraham only made a show of eating is common to Jewish tradition (Ber. R. 48, on Gen. xviii. 8, and in other places). That one of these angels was sent to inform him about the birth of his child, and the other two about the overthrow of Sodom, is told with slight modifications in Yalkut i. 82 (p. 23, col. b, about the middle). The story about Dinah going into the city to see the finery of the women (Ant. i. 21, 1) occurs with some modifications in Yalkut. The notice (Ant. i. 22, 1) that Rebekah was dead before Jacob reached the home of his father, occurs in Beresith Rabba 81, close of that parashah (ed. Warsaw, p. 146 a). That the final temptation of Joseph took place at the time of an Egyptian festival, when none but Potiphar's wife and Joseph were left in the house, is found in Yalkut i. 146 (p. 44, col. d, line 19 from the bottom). The same motives for Jacob's sacrifice before entering Egypt, which are given by Josephus in Ant. ii. 7, 2, are mentioned in Yalkut i. 152 (p. 48, col. b, line 22 from the top). The notice of Josephus (Ant. ii. 8, 2) that the bones of the brothers of Joseph were brought up from Egypt, occurs substantially even in that most ancient commentary, Sifré on Deuteronomy (144 b). The supposed prediction of Egyptian astrologers which led to the command to slay all male Hebrew children (Ant. ii. 9, 2), is given with much detail in Yalkut i. 164 (p. 51, col. a, towards the end), and also at considerable length in Shemoth Rabba 1. The account of the divine promise to Amram concerning Moses (Ant. ii. 9, 3) occurs substantially in Mechilta on Ex. xv. 20 (ed. Weiss, p. 51 b). The curious legend about the birth of Moses (Ant. ii. 9, 4), which Christian tradition may afterwards have applied to the Virgin-Mother, occurs, only much more exaggerated, in Sot. 12 a, and Shem. R. 1. The story that the infant Moses was only given to his mother after he had refused the nourishment of Egyptian women (Ant. ii. 9, 5) is found in Shemoth Rabba (ed. Warsaw, Part 2, p. 5 b, line 4 from the top). In the same place, a few lines further down, we have the legend (Ant. ii. 9, 7) about Moses taking the crown from the head of Pharaoh. The legend about Moses' beauty and genius (Ant. ii. 9, 6) is a very common Jewish tradition. The story (Ant. ii. 15, 1) that the bread which the Israelites took from Egypt lasted them for thirty days, is found in Yalkut i. 257 (p. 73, col. c, line 8 from the bottom); that about the thunder and lightning during the night that the Egyptians were overwhelmed in the sea (Ant. ii. 16, 3) occurs in Yalkut, i.

235 (p. 69, col. a, about the middle); that about the armour of the Egyptians being cast upon the seashore (Ant. ii. 16, 6) is found, with considerable embellishments about the gems which the Israelites obtained from the Egyptian chariots, in Yalkut i. 254 (p. 73, col. a, towards the end of that section). The marvellous embellishment of Ex. xv. 27, in Ant. iii. 1, 3, is founded on Mechilta, p. 54 b. The statement (Ant. iii. 2, 1) that the Amalekites induced the neighbouring nations to make war with Israel occurs in Mechilta, p. 61 a, and in Yalkut i. 262 (p. 75, col. d, about the middle) where the discussion between Amalek and the other nations is detailed. The curious idea (Ant. iii. 8, 1) that Moses himself wished to be high-priest, is found in Shemoth Rabba 37 (p. 51 b, last five lines) where indeed one of the Rabbis maintains that he actually was such. The account of the number of lamps in the candlesticks in the sanctuary which burned during the day and night respectively, is, as might be expected, in accordance with Jewish tradition (comp. Sifré, ed. Friedmann, p. 16 a). The view that the gem on the right shoulder of the High-priest shone out, and that the answer by Urim and Thummim was by light on the various letters (Ant. iii. 8, 9) is expressed in the Talmud (Foma, 73 b). So also (Sotah 48, a and b) that this miracle had ceased with the anterior prophets, or as some have it, with the destruction of the first Temple. The objections which Korah is declared to have raised against Moses (Ant. iv. 2, 2 and 3) are substantially the same as those in Jewish tradition (Bamidbar Rabba, 18), and so is the plea of Moses not to destroy the righteous with the guilty. Similarly, the story of Balaam, and the mention of his advice to corrupt the children of Israel (Ant. iv. 6, 5-9), are derived from Rabbinical tradition (comp. Sanh. 106 a). Lastly, the curious statement that Moses wrote down his own death (Ant. iv. 8, 48), is based on the legend (Baba Bathra, 15 a) to the effect that, up to Deut. xxxiv. 4, Moses always repeated what God dictated to him, and then wrote it down, but from that verse he repeated it no longer, but wrote it down with tears, while the notice (Ant. iv. 8, 49) that Moses died in the month of Adar occurs in Kidd. 38 a, lines 15, &c. Not to prolong this analysis, we may mention, as instances outside the Pentateuch, Ant. v. 1, 12, about the eminence of the 36 men of Ai who were slain, although this may have been partly apologetic; the remark about the kind of milk Jael gave to Sisera (Ant. v. 5, 4); the name Daniel as that of the son of Abigail (Ant. vii. 1, 4); and most markedly, the account of David's reason for choosing pestilence rather than famine or war (Ant. vii. 13, 3), which occurs almost literally in Yalkut ii. c. 165 (p. 26 c, towards the end), though the latter may be borrowed from Josephus, since the account of the pestilence in Ant. vii. 13, 3, has, so far as we know, no parallel in Jewish tradition.*

* The analysis given in the text, of course, lays no claim to completeness, which would have required almost a separate treatise. In making it I have been greatly indebted to the researches of Tachauer and Bioch. The former, however, are ill-arranged, and both not always critical nor yet quite accurate. In such places as I have availed myself of their aid, their statements have been carefully examined and critically sifted. The

4. Josephus's Ideas about the Messiah.—The preliminary and almost insuperable difficulty which Josephus had here to encounter was to reconcile his position towards the Romans with his faith in the truth of prophecy. Accordingly he always rather hints than expressly states his views in regard to the future deliverance of Israel by the Messiah. But that he cherished such hopes, appears even from his general statement that Daniel had predicted not only the future troubles, but also the happiness of his people (Ant. x. 11, 7). Commenting on the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and its interpretation, Josephus explains (Ant. x. 10, 4) that the first of these kingdoms was the Babylonian, the second the Medo-Persian, and the third the Macedonian (meaning thereby not only that of Alexander the Great, but also that of his successors). The sorrows described in the 8th chapter of Daniel had come upon the Jews during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes<sup>b</sup> (Ant. x. 11, 7; xii. 7, 6). The fourth empire was the Roman (Ant. x. 10, 4). The desolation predicted in Daniel ix. came upon Jerusalem in the great war against Rome (Jewish War, iv. 6, 3; comp. vi. 2, 1). Again, Josephus had evidently Dan. ix. 27 in mind in the well-known passage (Jewish War, vi. 5, 4) in which he refers to a prophecy that the Holy House should be taken when the temple had become four-square. According to him this happened when the Jews destroyed the surroundings of the temple up to the inner sanctuary, which was four-square, in order thus to prevent the approach of the Romans. (It should be noticed, that the words Dan. ix. 27, rendered in our A. V. "for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate," literally translated are, "And upon the wing [or corner] of the abominations the destroyer.")

If this were all, we should have to conclude that Josephus had formally renounced his Jewish hope of a Messiah—or rather that, as he expressly states (Jewish War, vi. 5, 4), he regarded the prediction of a ruler of the habitable earth coming from Judaea as "certainly denoting the government of Vespasian, who was appointed emperor in Judaea." But this statement was evidently dictated by the necessities of his position in regard to the Romans. On the other hand, we have the expression already mentioned of his expectation that, as Daniel's predictions of judgment had been fulfilled, so those of the future prosperity of his people would also become true. More than this, in Ant. iv. 6, 5, when speaking of the prophecies of Balaam, of which some had come to pass in Josephus' own time, he adds, that from the fulfilment of these predictions "one might easily guess that the rest would have their completion in the time to come." We must therefore conclude, that Josephus did not regard the prophetic history of the Jews as closed with the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. But the most significant passage of all is that in which, commenting on Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's vision of the four empires, he excuses himself from interpreting the fate predicted upon the fourth (or Roman) empire on the plea, that he had "only undertaken to describe things past or present, but not things future," and advises those who might wish to understand "the uncertainties of futurity," to study for themselves the prophecies of Daniel. Evidently, Josephus had his own opinions on the subject which it did not suit him to express. We are, therefore, warranted in inferring that, like all his countrymen, including even Philo, Josephus expected a Messianic era in accordance with the prophecies of Daniel, although posterior to the destruction of Jerusalem. No doubt he also associated with it the future destruction of the Roman empire. But, as regarded events in his own time, his interpretation of the prophecies of Daniel was the very opposite of that of his Jewish contemporaries. It may be interesting to notice, that Josephus seems to have regarded the murder of the high priest Ananos as the fulfilment of the prediction in Dan. ix. 26 about the cutting off of the Anointed One. In his Jewish War (iv. 5, 2) he describes this crime as an evidence that God had doomed Jerusalem to destruction and the Temple to be burned. We cannot pursue the subject further, but refer for hints in confirmation of our views to Ant. vii. 4, 4; x. 2, 2; xv. 11, 1; xvii. 2, 4, at the close. (Comp. Gerlach, to whose researches we are here greatly indebted, u. s. pp. 86–89.)

We only add, that the mistaken idea, that Josephus held the transmigration of souls, or ascribed this doctrine to the Pharisees, has arisen from a misunderstanding of the passage in Jewish War, ii. 8, 14, which will be corrected by comparing it with Ant. xviii. 1, 3.

5. The Alleged Testimony of Josephus to Jesus Christ.—For the proper understanding of this question we must quote in full the passage in which this so-called testimony occurs. Literally translated, it reads as follows (Ant. xviii. 3, 3):—"About this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if, indeed, one may call Him a man, for He was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. And He drew to Himself many of the Jews and many of the Hellenes. He was the Christ. And when, on the accusation of the principal men among us, Pilate had condemned Him to the cross, they did not desist who had loved him at the first; for He appeared to them on the third day again alive, as the Divine prophets had foretold this and a thousand other wonderful things about Him. Until now the race (class, party) of those that are called Christians after Him has not ceased."

For the further criticism of this passage, we note, that it occurs, with only unimportant verbal differences, in every manuscript of the Antiquities, that has been preserved, excepting, of course, the Codex Palatinus, in which Books xviii. to xx. are missing. The passage was first quoted in support of Christianity by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Dem. Ev. iii. 5), and from his time till the 16th century passed unquestioned. This, however, need scarcely sur-quotations from the Talmud and Midrashim have, for want of space, not been given in extenso; but I hold myself responsible for them, and have at some trouble indicated in each case not only paragraph, but page, column, and, in most instances, even the line, so as to render it as easy as possible for readers to refer to them.

<sup>b</sup> We are, of course, not concerned to prove the correctness of Josephus's interpretation, and only note the fact. We should, however, remark, that, according to Wieseler (D. 70 Jahre. d. Proph. Dan.), Josephus applies only Daniel viii. to the Syrian domination.

prise us, when we remember the absence of criticism during that period. Such a testimony would be extremely welcome to the Fathers and early Church writers, especially considering their high estimation of Josephus. The bare enumeration of what was said in his favour by writers up to the 10th century occupies more than thirteen folio pages in Havercamp's edition of Josephus (vol. ii.). Some of these laudations are most extravagant, St. Jerome going so far as to call Josephus "the Greek Livy" (Epist. 22, ad Eustoch.).

The opinions at present entertained about the passage in question may be ranged under three classes. First, there are critics who hold the genuineness of this passage. The most recent and able defence of this view is in a work, beautiful even for its typography, by a learned Vienna professor: Historia Revelationis Divinæ Novi Testamenti, Scriptore Josepho Danko; Vindebonæ, 1867, vol. i. pp. 308-314. The second view is that of those who regard the whole passage as spurious, of which Gerlach (u. s.) may be taken as the ablest exponent. Lastly, there are writers who consider the passage as authentic indeed, but as largely interpolated. This view has been defended by Ewald (Gesch. d. V. Isr. vol. v. pp. 181-186), and by Paret (in Herzog's Real. Encykl. vol. vii.) Before entering on a criticism of the subject, however brief, we must add two other passages from Josephus, not only on account of their intrinsic importance, but as also bearing on this controversy. The first of these refers to St. John the Baptist. It occurs in Ant. xviii. 5, 2, and reads as follows: "But to some of the Jews it appeared that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and, indeed, as a righteous punishment on account of what had been done to John, who was surnamed the Baptist. For Herod ordered him to be killed, a good man, and who commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism. For that the baptizing would be acceptable to Him, if they made use of it, not for the putting away (remission) of some sins, but for the purification of the body, after that the soul had been previously cleansed by righteousness. And when others had come in crowds, for they were exceedingly moved by hearing these words, Herod, fearing lest such influence of his over the people might lead to some rebellion, for they seemed ready to do anything by his counsel, deemed it best, before anything new should happen through him, to put him to death, rather than that, when a change should arise in affairs, he might have to repent," etc.

The second passage refers to the martyrdom of St. James the Just, and occurs in Ant. xx. 9, 1, as follows: "Ananos thinking that he had a proper opportunity, since Festus was now dead, and Albinus was still upon the road, assembled the Sanhedrim of judges, and bringing before them the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, whose name was James, and with him some others, and having made an accusation against them as breaking the law, delivered them to be stoned. But those who were regarded as the most just among them of the city, and as the most exact about the laws, felt grievously about this."

The last quoted passage about St. James is regarded by most interpreters as on the whole genuine. This remark applies even more strongly to the statement of Josephus about St. John the Baptist. We venture to think, that these admissions have an important bearing on the question of the impugned passage about Christ, since it is scarcely possible to imagine that such statements concerning St. John the Baptist and St. James the Just would have been made without any reference whatever to Christ Himself. But this is not all. When in Rome, Josephus must have become acquainted with the activity of St. Paul. Moreover, he was contemporary with the Neronic persecution; he must have been well aware of the spread of Christianity in Palestine; nor could he have been ignorant of the withdrawal of the Christians from Jerusalem before its fall. It is quite true, that Jewish writers not unfrequently omit all mention of even the most important and interesting events if these militate against their dogmatic predilections. But a movement so far-reaching could scarcely be wholly ignored in a historical work like that of Josephus. To these arguments of our own, we have to add those urged by the learned Vienna professor, viz.: The consensus of the Fathers; the occurrence of the passage in all existing manuscripts; the aptness of the place in which it is inserted; and finally, the Josephine style and diction of the passage. In regard to the aptness of its insertion we may note, that it is not only preceded by an account of the Jewish tumults against Pilate, but followed by a filthy story of the deceit practised by the priests of Isis, which led to the destruction of the temple of Isis, and the punishment of those who introduced new rites into Rome. As this story has nothing to do with the subject which Josephus has in hand, it has been suggested (by Paret) that it was intended by him as one of those vile anti-Christian insinuations about Christ, too common in that age, made in a manner which, without breach of charity, may be designated as peculiarly Josephine.

But although thus far our inquiries have led us to expect some statement about Christ in the writings of Josephus, it seems impossible to peruse the language of the passage in question without feeling that in some parts, which will readily occur to the reader, it is that of a Christian, and not of a Jew like Josephus. We seem, therefore, shut up to the conclusion that, like not a few other passages in ancient documents, the expressions attributed to Josephus must have been altered, and in some parts interpolated by later writers. While, therefore, we regard it as an authentic, although altered and interpolated, testimony to Christ, it is a question how far it should be used by historical writers for apologetic purposes. For our own part, we echo the sentiment: "Unde non est nimium taxanda corum agendi ratio, qui malunt hoc argumento non uti; ne infirmis armis pugnare videantur, ubi validissima non desunt."<sup>1</sup> (Danko, u. s. vol. i. p. 314.) The view above advocated seems, so far as we can gather, to have been also that of the learned Professor Mill of Cambridge, whose remarks on this, as on all other subjects, deserve the most careful attention (Mill, Observations on the Pantheistic Principles, pp. 290-292).

<sup>1</sup> Acting on this principle, I have treated the testimony of Josephus to Christ as if it were wholly non-existent, in the Temple, Its Ministry and Service, p. 36.

The literature of this subject is so extensive, that it is impossible here to quote it in full. In Fürst's Bibliotheca Judaica, vol. ii. it occupies no fewer than 15 pages, and is by no means complete. Most of the later works on the subject are mentioned by Schürer, u. s. pp. 27-30. We have made use of the beautiful edition of Josephus by Havercamp (in two folio volumes, 1726), with which the learned Cardwell's edition of the Jewish War (Oxford, 1837, 2 vols.) must be throughout compared; and of the following works: For Roman History, besides the ordinary historical sources, Schiller, Gesch. des Röm. Kaiserr.; Friedlaender, Darstell. aus der Sittengesch. Roms, 3 vols.; as to Chronology, chiefly, Wieseler, Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalters, and also Destinon, Chronologie d. Jos.; as to geography, G. Boettger, Topogr. Histor. Lexicon zu Fl. Jos.; and on the various other branches of the subject, Herzog's Real-Encykl. vol. vii. (the articles by Paret and Oehler); Hamburger, Real-Encykl. sect. ii. part 4; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. vols. vi. and vii.; Derenbourg, Hist. de la Palest., Schürer, Lehrb. der N. Test. Zeitg.; Hausrath, N. Test. Zeitg. vol. iii.; Lutterbeck, Die N. Test. Lehrbeg. vol. i.; Duschak, Josephus Flav. u. die Trad.; Grimm, Das Erste Buch der Macc.; Gfrörer, Philo. u. die Alex. Jos.; J. Freudenthal, Hellenistische Studien; Danko, Hist. Rev. Div. Nov. Test. vol. i.; and such Jewish histories as those of Jost; Gesch. der Isr. vol. ii.; and Salvador, Gesch. der Röm. Herrsch. im Judaea, translated by Eichler, vol. ii. The above works, and others not specially mentioned, have, of course, been consulted and fully considered in the preparation of this article. Plaut's Fl. Jos. u. d. Bibel and Baerwald's Jos. in Gal., besides some minor monographs, have not been within reach,—a loss, however, which is in no way serious, since their views are fully discussed in other books.

JOSEPHUS (20), presbyter, martyred with several others in Chuzistan, under Sapor II. (Wright, Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 432.) [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (21), of Tiberias and Scythopolis, a Christian Jew and a count. His religious history is related at length by Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. 4 sq.), who had it from his own lips. The emperor Constantine bestowed on Joseph after his baptism the dignity of count, and granted him leave to erect churches at Tiberias, Diocaesarea, Capernaum, and other towns of the district, where none had existed before. This must have occurred before A.D. 336. Joseph retired from Tiberias and built himself a mansion at Scythopolis. At Scythopolis Arianism was rampant, Patrophilus being the bishop. Joseph was the only Catholic there, and nothing but his rank saved him from Arian violence. Joseph, who endured much from both the Jews and the Arians, is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology as a confessor on July 22, at which day the Bollandists give his history (Acta SS. Jul. iv. 238). Isaac Vossius thinks count Joseph may have written the Hypomnesticum [JOSEPHUS (31)]. (Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. i. 369, and Cod. Apoc. V. T. t. ii. app.) [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (22), ST., an anchorite in Egypt about the middle of the 4th century. He was a disciple of St. Antony. See Roswey's Vitae Patrum (lib. v. libell. xv. num. 4). He is commemorated on June 17 (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 296.) [I. G. S.]

JOSEPHUS (23), a solitary of Raithu, near the Red Sea, where he lived for many years and died before the massacre by the Saracens in A.D. 373. (Ceillier, iv. 285, 286.) [I. G. S.]

JOSEPHUS (24), one of sixteen presbyters martyred with bishops Abdas and Ebedjesus in Persia under Sapor II., A.D. 375. (Assem. Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 144.) [C. H.]

JOSEPHUS (25), Apr. 18 (Assem.); Apr. 22 (Mart. Rom.); Nov. 3 (Bas. Menol.). A Persian presbyter of Beth-Cathuba a pagus of Adiabene, and martyr with Acepimas a bishop, and Aitilahas a deacon. They were arrested in 376, and after tortures on several occasions were stoned to death in 380. He was then nearly seventy-five years of age. (Assem. AA. MM. i. 171, 185, 208; Sozom. H. E. l. ii. c. 13.) [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (26), Nov. 20. Martyr, A.D. 343, in Persia with a bishop named Nyrsas or Narses, whose disciple he was. In Mart. Rom. they are noted on Nov. 20; according to Assem. they suffered on Nov. 9. (Bas. Men.; Assem. AA. MM. i. 96.) [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (27), abbat, an Egyptian anchorite at the end of the 4th century. Cassian relates his conversations in the 16th and 17th books of his Collationes. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xlix. 1012, etc.; Ceillier, viii. 147.) [I. G. S.]

JOSEPHUS (28), Joseph Ua Faelainn, abbat of Birr, King's County, and surnamed the Wise, died A.D. 785. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 780, i. 387; Ann. Ult. A.D. 784.) [J. G.]

JOSEPHUS (29), Joseph Ua Cearnaigh, abbat of Clonmacnoise, King's County, died A.D. 794. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 789, i. 397; Ann. Ult. A.D. 793.) [J. G.]

JOSEPHUS (30), hegumen of the monastery of the Cathari and steward of the church of Constantinople. It was he who, as related by Theophanes, performed the scandalous marriage in A.D. 795 between the emperor Constantine VI. and Theodote. (AA. SS. Bolland. Vita Tarasii, Feb. 25, cap. vii.; Theoph. Chronogr. A.C. 788, p. 397 in Patr. Graec. cviii.; Ceillier, xii. 154.) [W. M. S.]

JOSEPHUS (31) (JOSEPPUS, Ἰωσήπος), author of the Hypomnesticum (ὑπομνηστικὸν βιβλίον), a work of doubtful age, first published by Fabricius (in his Cod. Psevl. V. T. t. ii.). It is in part a commentary on, in part a paraphrase of the Scripture history, with some chapters added on the persecutions and heresies which afflicted the church. Fabricius is inclined to fix its date at the 10th century, since it quotes (cap. 136) Hippolytus Thebanus, who cites Simeon Metaphrastes. Cave (i. 397) assigns it to A.D. 420, as it mentions no heresy later than the fourth century, and he regards cap. 136 as an interpolation. Fabricius accounts for the author stopping at the heresies of the fourth century by the circumstance that he merely copies Epiphanius and has no other information. Isaac Vossius attributes the work to count Joseph of Tiberias [JOSEPHUS (21)]. [G. T. S.]

JOSEPHUS (32), surnamed or christened EPAPHRODITUS, a Paulician schismatical teacher in the 8th century. He headed a party in opposition to Zacharias, son of Geognaesius. Owing to the violence of the orthodox Paulicians, and danger threatening from the Saracens, Joseph removed with his followers to Antioch in Pisidia. The sect thus spread beyond the boundaries of Armenia into the countries of Asia Minor. (Phot. c. Man. i. 20; Pet. Sic. Hist. Man. i. 30-1; Neander, Ch. Hist. v. 345.) [M. B. C.]

JOSEPPUS. [JOSEPHUS (6), (31).]

JOSES, bishop of Jerusalem. [JOSEPHUS (1).]

JOSHUA (1) STYLITES, a Syrian monk, about the end of the 5th century. He was a native of Edessa, and entered the monastery of Zuenin near Amida in Mesopotamia. After some years he determined to imitate St. Simeon and live the rest of his days on a column, from which he derives his distinguishing name. Before this he had, at the request of the abbat Sergius, to whom he dedicated the work, written the history of his times, from A.D. 495 in 507, entitled History of the Calamities which befel Edessa, Amida, and all Mesopotamia. A full description and analysis of the work, with quotations from the original Syriac, are given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. i. 260). The Chronicle of Josua, as his history is called, was published at Leipzig in 1878, in the Abhandlungen für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, in the original Syriac, with a French translation made by Abbé Paulin Martin. It was preserved for us by its insertion in the history of Dionysius of Telmahr, who wrote in cent. ix. The translator describes it as the most ancient history extant in the Syriac language, and specially valuable because Joshua had taken a personal share in the operations he describes. His text supplies many omissions, and corrects mistakes in Assemani's abstract. He fixes the date of its composition between A.D. 510-515, and classes him as a Monophysite, while Assemani regarded him as orthodox. [I. G. S. and G. T. S.]

JOSHUA (2), 17th or 20th bishop of Coutances, perhaps in the earlier half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xi. 866; Gams, Series Episc. 542.) [S. A. B.]

JOSHUA (3), Jacobite bishop of Sigara, cir. 750. (Assem. B. O. ii. 338 and Dissert. de Monoph. in B. O. ii.; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1595.) [C. H.]

JOSSÉ, saint in Brittany. [JUDOCUS.]

JOVIANUS (1), FLAVIUS, Christian emperor from June 27, 363, to Feb. 16, 364. The authorities for the life of Jovian are generally the same as those for that of Julian. The fifth oration of Themistius, and certain tracts printed among the works of St. Athanasius, are important, for the special points of his edict of toleration and dealings with the Arians. There is a useful life of Jovian by the Abbé J. P. R. de la Bléterie, Paris, 1748, 2 vols., and 1776, 1 vol., containing also a translation of some of Julian's works.

Life.—Jovian was born about the year 331, and was thus much the same age as his predecessor Julian (Amm. xxv. 10, 13, says he died in his thirty-third year. S. Hieron. sub ann. 2380, says he was in his thirty-fourth. So Socrates, iii. 26, ζήσας ἔτη λγ). His father, the count Varronianus, was an inhabitant of the territory of Singidunum (Belgrade) in Moesia, the country which gave birth to so many emperors (Victor, Epit. 68). His name was no doubt given him by his father in memory of the corps of the Jovians which he commanded (cp. Amm. xxv. 5, 8). At the time of his unexpected elevation to the empire he was the first of the imperial body-guard, "domesticorum ordinis primus," a position of no very great distinction (Amm. xxv. 5, 4). In this capacity he had occupied the funeral car of Constantius on its way to the tomb, and the formal honours then paid him, as the representative of the dead, seemed by some to be ominous of his future distinction (Amm. xxi. 16, 20, 21).

Julian died of his wound at midnight, between June 26 and 27, 363, in the midst of his retreat from Persia, leaving his army surrounded by active enemies. It was no time for delay, and early in the morning the generals and chief officers of the infantry and cavalry met to deliberate on the choice of an emperor. There were two principal parties, that of Arinthaëus and Victor, and the old adherents of Constantius on the one side, and that of Nevitta and Daglaiphus and the Gallic officers of Julian on the other. The choice of all, however, fell on Saturninius Secundus Sallustius, the prefect of the East, a moderate heathen, who was respected also by Christians, and had done his best to restrain the excesses of the late emperor. He refused the dangerous honour on the score of infirmity and old age. Upon this an officer in the company, "conjecturior aliquis miles," whom it is easy to conjecture was the historian Ammianus himself, suggested that they should act as if the emperor was still living, and go on till they reached Mesopotamia and rejoined the remainder of the army. By this means they would secure an incontestible election. Others, it would seem, exclaimed against any delay, and Jovian's name was put forward.

His friends pressed for him with noisy persistence, and prevented a full discussion, and so (as often happens) the election was carried. He was hastily clad in imperial robes, and led out to receive the homage of the troops, some of whom, mistaking the shouts of "Jovianus Augustus" for "Julianus," believed for a while that their favourite had recovered (Amm. xxv. 5, 1-6).

The new emperor was a Christian and a firm adherent of the Nicene faith. He had, indeed, some claim to the honours of a confessor under his predecessor, but Julian, it is said, did not wish to part with so good an officer (Socr. iii. 22). He was in other respects a man of no very marked ability, and was esteemed rather for his father's merits than his own (Amm. xxv. 5, 4; Eutropius, x. 17, commendatione patris quam sua militibus notior). He was in fact a generous, bluff and hearty soldier, popular with his companions, fond of jest and merriment, and addicted to those pleasures which have never been severely censured in the camp (Vict. Epit. 6, laetus ingenio; Amm. xxv. 10, 15, vultu laetissimo . . . iocarique palam cum proximis adsuetus . . . edax tamen et vino Venerique indulgens, quae vitia imperiali verecundia forsitan correxisset). He had a bright and open face, always cheerful, and lighted with a pair of clear gray eyes. His figure was extremely tall, and his gait rather heavy, and it was long before an imperial wreath could be found to fit him. He was only a moderate scholar, and in this and many other of his qualities was a strong contrast to Julian (Amm. xxv. 10, 14, 15).

Jovian was, as has been said, a sincere believer, but it is difficult, in fact impossible, to credit the statement of Rufinus that he would not accept the empire till he had obliged all his soldiers to become Christians (Hist. eccl. ii. 1). At the same time, the greater part of the army did, no doubt, return without difficulty, to their profession of faith to which they had been accustomed under Constantius. The labarum again became their standard; and Jovian's coins present, besides the  $\text{P}$ , the new and striking type (now so familiar) of the ball surmounted by the cross, the symbol of the church dominating the world (see Eckhel, Num. vet. viii. p. 147).

Ammianus is careful to note that sacrifices were offered, and entrails of victims inspected on the morning of Jovian's inauguration to decide on the movements of the army (xxv. 6, 1). This had of course been regularly done under the late régime, and preparations had perhaps been made in expectation of the election of a heathen successor; and Jovian in the first excitement of his unexpected elevation might not have thought of interfering. But directly the reins of power were in his hands such things apparently ceased at once.

We need not describe at length the perplexities of the Roman generals in their endeavours to escape from Persia, and the protracted negotiations with Sapor, to whose terms Jovian felt it imperative to submit. It is impossible at this distance of time to judge of the policy of his conduct, especially when two historians, who were both at that time serving in the army, are at variance on the point. Eutropius calls the peace "necessary but ignoble," while Ammianus thinks that Jovian might have reached the friendly and fertile province of Corduene, distant one hundred Roman miles, in the four days which were spent in parleying (Eutrop. Brev. x. 17; Amm. xxv. 7, 8).

The terms were, indeed, ignoble and humiliating, the cession of the five Mesopotamian provinces which Galerius had added to the Roman dominions, and of the fortresses of Nisibis and Singara, the former of which had been the bulwark of the empire since the reign of Mithridates. No less disgraceful was the sacrifice of Arsaces, king of Armenia, the firm ally of the Romans, and a Christian prince moreover, allied to the house of Constantine by his marriage with Olympias (Amm. xxv. 7, 9-12; cp. Greg. Naz. Or. v. 15, pp. 156, 157, ed. Paris, 1778). Some may think that Jovian ought to have struggled on against all odds, and that he was too ready to yield in order that he might keep his army intact, and so secure his accession to the throne. But on the whole it seems probable that no better terms could have been obtained, without the loss of nearly all the army.

After crossing the Tigris with difficulty, the Roman forces marched for six days through very desert country, to the fortress of Ur, where they were met by a convoy of provisions, sent from the army of Sebastianus and Procopius, with whom Julian's army had had no communications since the commencement of the campaign. Jovian at once took measures to secure his own recognition, by sending emissaries to the western provinces, and appointing his father-in-law Lucillianus master of the horse and foot, and charging him to proceed at once to Milan (Amm. xxv. 8). At Thilsaphata or Thisalpheta, on the frontier of the empire, he was met by Sebastianus and Procopius themselves, and was accepted by their troops without opposition (Amm. xxv. 8, 16).

The scenes which took place at Nisibis were heartrending, when the inhabitants were informed that they must leave their homes. Jovian however was firm in keeping his word, and it is clear that, whatever might have been the case, if the treaty had been made by an inferior officer, a promise ratified by the emperor in person could not be broken as long as he remained sovereign. Ammianus insinuates that he could have acted otherwise: "imperator, ut fingeat, alia metuens, periculi pericula declinante" (xxv. 9, 2). The Persian standard was hoisted on the citadel, in token of the change of ownership, and the weeping and broken-hearted people were forced by their own emperor to go into exile. They were settled by Jovian in the suburb of Amida.

Another incident of Jovian's encampment near Nisibis (for he refused to enter the city) was the execution of the notary Jovianus, whose name and pretensions of a certain kind made him an object of suspicion. Ammianus allows that there were some grounds for a charge of treason, but his hurried and secret death is a blot upon the memory of Jovian (xxv. 8, 18).

After leaving Nisibis the emperor himself proceeded to Antioch. The remains of Julian were sent under the care of his cousin Procopius, to be buried at Tarsus, the place where he had intended to reside on his return from the Persian war. Procopius was justly looked upon as a possible rival, but for the present he kept himself quiet, being terrified by the execution of Jovianus, and remained in obscurity till the time of his unsuccessful rising under Valens (Amm. xxvi. 6). An account of the singular ceremonies of the funeral at Tarsus, which, according to Roman usage, was a mixture of mourning and mimicry of the deceased, will be found in Gibbon (Decline and Fall, chap. 24 at the end).

The consternation of the Pagans at the news of the death of Julian, and the accession of Jovian was as sudden and as marvellous as the triumph of the Christians. All Antioch made holiday, and churches, chapels, and even theatres were filled with cries of joy, and taunts at the discomfiture of the heathen party. "Where are the prophecies and foolish Maximus? God has conquered and His Christ" (Theodoret, iii. 28). St. Gregory at the same time was writing his bitter and brilliant invectives at Nazianzus, where but a few months before the Christian population had trembled at the approach of Julian (Orations, iv. and v., the σθηλιτευτικοί: they were probably not delivered from the pulpit; see p. 75 of the Benedictine ed. Paris, 1778). Some acts of violence were committed, especially in the destruction of temples and altars, and more were apprehended. At Constantinople a prefect of Julian's appointment was in danger of his life (Sievers, Libanius, p. 128; cp. Lib. Epp. 1179, 1186, 1489). Heathen priests, philosophers, rhetoricians and magicians hid themselves in fear, or were maltreated by the populace. Libanius himself was in peril at Babylon, and was accused before Jovian of never ceasing his ill-omened lamentations for his dead friend, instead of wishing good fortune to the new reign (Liban. de Vitâ suâ, vol. i. pp. 93, 94, ed. Reiske; cp. Sievers, Libanius, pp. 128 foll., Chastel, Destruction du Paganisme, pp. 154, 155, who, however, is not accurate in all details). Libanius was saved by the intervention of a Cappadocian friend, who told the emperor that he would gain nothing by putting him to death, as his orations would survive him and become current. This looks as if his Monody was already written and known at least by report, though probably only delivered to a select circle of friends. The Epitaphius was probably not completed and published till five or six years later (Sievers, p. 132).

To appease this disturbed state of feeling Jovian issued an edict of toleration, in which he declared that all his subjects should enjoy full liberty of conscience, though he forbade the practice of magic. Our knowledge of this edict is drawn from the oration of Themistius, delivered at Dadastera in February in honour of his entrance into the consulship of the year 364 (Themistius, Oratio, v. pp. 68-70; cf. Chastel, p. 156). It was, however, probably one of the earliest of his laws. It is impossible to reconcile the positive statements of Themistius with that of Sozomen, that Jovian ordered that Christianity should be the only religion of his subjects (Soz. vi. 3, μόνη εἶναι σέβας τοῖς ἀρχομένοις τῶν Χριστιανῶν πίστιν); and Socrates, who quotes the oration of Themistius, says that all the temples were shut, and that the blood of sacrifices ceased to flow (iii. 24). Jovian may very probably have strongly recommended the Christian faith in his edicts without pretending to enforce it, and the cessation of sacrifice seems to have been a popular rather than a directly imperial movement (the passage in Libanius's Monodia, vol. i. p. 509, appears to refer to Constantius rather than Jovian; and that in the Epitaphius, pp. 619, 620, was written, according to Sievers, five or six years later). Jovian, as we have already said, was reconciled to Libanius (Ep. 1489 to Modestus), and further protected the philosophers Maximus and Prisan, the intimate friends of Julian, in the enjoyment of the honours which they had received during his reign (Eusebius, Vita Maximi, p. 58, ed. Boissonade, 1822, τιμῶν τοὺς ἀνδρας διέτέλεσε).

The reaction under Jovian, as far as it was directed by his orders, consisted in fact rather in favours granted to Christians than in acts of oppression towards paganism (see, however, the inscription at the end of this article). The edict of toleration was perhaps issued at Antioch, which he reached some time in October, having been at Edessa on Sept. 27 (Cod. Theod. vii. 4, 9, = Cod. Just. xii. 37, 2; it is omitted by accident in Hänel's Series Chronologica, p. 1654, but is given by Godefroy and Krüger). He hastened to restore the Christian church to its privileges. He wrote a circular letter to the governors of provinces ordering that the ordinary assemblies should be held in the churches. He restored the immunities of the clergy, and the stipends paid to the virgins and widows of the church, and such part of the allowance of corn which Julian had withdrawn as the state of public finances allowed (Sozom. vi. 3; Theodoret, i. 11; iv. 4). A count named Magnus, who had burned the church of Berytus in the late reign, was ordered to rebuild it, and nearly lost his head (Theodoret, iv. 22, p. 180 B). At the same time probably Jovian issued a law condemning to death those who solicited or forced into marriage the virgins of the church (Cod. Theod. ix. 25, 2, this law is addressed to Secundus, prefect of the East, and is dated at Antioch, Feb. 19, a day or two after Jovian's death according to most accounts. Either we must read Ancyrae or suppose that the month is wrongly given, see the commentators ad-loc.).

Jovian, however, is remembered in church history on account of his connexion with St. Athanasius, more than any other of his actions. [See ATHANASIVS, Vol. I. p. 199.] The death of Julian was, it is said, revealed to his companion Theodore of Tabenne, and the bishop took courage to return to Alexandria. Here he received a letter from the new emperor praising him for his constancy under all persecutions, reinstating him in his functions, and desiring his prayers (St. Athan. Opera, i. 622 = vol. ii. col. 812, ed. Migne). Jovian in another letter (which is no longer extant) desired him to draw up a statement of the Catholic faith. He accordingly summoned a council, and wrote a synodal letter, stating and confirming the Nicene creed (l.c. and Theodoret, iv. 3).<sup>a</sup> Armed with this he set sail for Antioch (Sept. 5, 363), where he met with a most gracious reception. The leaders of other ecclesiastical parties had done their best to anticipate him in securing the goodwill of the emperor, but could gain little beyond expressions of his desire for unity and toleration. A quaint and graphic account is given of the pertinacity with which the Arians, and especially the bishop Lucius, who had been set up as a rival of Athanasius, followed Jovian about in his daily rides in hopes of prejudicing him against the champion of Catholicity (l.c. pp. 624, 625 = vol. ii. col. 819 foll.). The bluff emperor reining up his steed to receive their petitions, and his rough and sensible answers mixed with Latin words to their old and worn-out charges and irrelevant pleas, stand out before us with singular vividness. We can almost hear him saying, "Feri, ferī," to his guards, in order to be rid of his troublesome suitors (εἶπον ὑμῖν ὅτι τὰ περὶ Ἀθανάσιον ἤδη διοίκησιν ἔσχε· καὶ ὀργισθεῖς εἶπε· φέρι, φέρι, col. 821, cf. ἐκβαίνω γὰρ ἐγὼ εἰς τὸν κάμνον). After repeated interviews, always unsuccessful, Lucius ventured to appear again before the emperor at the gate of the palace, and begged an audience. Jovian stopped and said to him, "Lucius, is it thou to whom I am speaking? How camest thou hither, by sea or by land?" "By sea, sir," replied Lucius. "May the God of the universe, may the sun and the moon," said the emperor, "punish the companions of the voyage for not having thrown thee overboard into the sea! May the ship be eternally the sport of outrageous waves, and never arrive in port!"

<sup>a</sup> Gibbon (Decline and Fall, ch. xxv. vol. iii. p. 60 ed. Bohn) sneers at Athanasius for assuring Jovian "that his orthodox faith would be rewarded with a long and peaceful reign," and remarks that after his death this clause was omitted from some MSS., referring to Valerius on the passage of Theodoret, and Jortin's Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. iv. p. 38. But the expression is not that of a prophet who stakes his credit upon the truth of his prediction, but little more than a pious reflection, of the nature of a wish.

Although the prospects of the church at large now seemed brighter than they had done for some time, little seems to have been effected by Athanasius with the Arians at Antioch, and Jovian was disappointed in his endeavour to terminate the schism between the Catholic bishops Meletius and Paulinus (S. Basil, Ep. 89, vol. iii. p. 258, ed. Gaume). A coldness ensued between Meletius and Athanasius, and the latter was led to recognise the bishop of the Eustathians as the true head of the Antiochene church on his making a declaration of orthodoxy. Soon after this he returned in triumph to Alexandria.

The city of Antioch, which had ridiculed Julian, was also witty at the expense of Jovian, and he seems to have been the butt of many parodies and pasquinades. The heathen historians, however, Ammianus and Zosimus, tell us little of this period. The former details some of the portents which happened during the emperor's residence at Antioch—the sudden fall of the brazen globe from the hand of Maximian's statue, the awful sounds in the council-chamber, and the comets visible by daylight (xxv. 10). He and Zosimus are both silent as to the excesses against heathenism attributed to Jovian by some later writers, and we may therefore safely pass them over.

Jovian quitted Antioch in December, much against the will of his soldiers, as we may imagine, and, proceeding by forced marches, came to Tarsus, where he adorned the tomb of Julian. At Tyana, in Cappadocia, he received the news that Malarich had declined the charge of Gaul, and that Jovinus still continued in his old position, but faithful to the new regime. Jovian also learned that his father-in-law Lucillianus had been murdered at Rheims in an accidental mutiny of the Batavian cohorts (Amm. xxv. 10; Zos. iii. 35). The deputies of the Western armies saluted their new sovereign as he descended from Mount Taurus. With them was Valentinian, so soon to be his successor, whom he appointed captain of the second division of scutarii (Amm. xxv. 10, 9, "secunda schola scutariorum").

The death of Lucillianus was followed by another and a heavier blow, the news of the loss of his father Varronianus, whom he had for some time hoped to associate with himself in the consulship of the ensuing year. The loss was softened, however, by the arrival of his wife Charito and his infant son Varronianus, who, it was determined, should fill the place destined for his grandfather. The inauguration of the new consuls took place on January 1 at Ancyra. The little child, when enthroned in his curule chair, naturally enough burst into a fit of crying, and could not be pacified. (Amm. xxv. 10, 11; cf. Themist. Or. v. p. 71). Zonaras (Annal. xiii. 14) says that Charito never saw her husband after his elevation, but this seems to be a mistake; see De Broglie, iv. p. 485, note.) The oration of Themistius already mentioned was, it seems, delivered at this time.

Jovian still pushed on, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and arrived at an obscure place called Dadastané, about halfway between Ancyra and Nicaea. Somehow about Feb. 16, after a heavy supper, he went to bed in an apartment recently built, the plaster of which was still damp. A brazier of charcoal was brought in to warm the air, and in the morning he was found dead in his bed. Thus an accident, which had been nearly fatal to Julian at Paris, the nature of which seems to have been unknown to the ancients, put an end to his short reign of only eight months. (Amm. xxv. 10, 12, 13, describes his death; the date is variously given as the 16th, 17th, and 18th of March; see Clinton. Julian describes his own accident, Miropogon, p. 341, and attributes it to the damp drawn out of the walls.) He was buried at Constantinople, and after a ten days' interval was succeeded by Valentinian.

St. Augustine says in the City of God that it was suitable to the divine wisdom to crown Constantine with prosperity, to shew that God can recompense his servants in this world, and that the devil is not the only dispenser of earthly good; but it was suitable also to the same wisdom to strike down Jovian, notwithstanding his piety, in order that men should learn not to follow the faith merely from expectation of temporal rewards (de Civ. Dei, v. 25).

Owing to the shortness of Jovian's reign, inscriptions relating to him (other than those on milestones) are very rare. This fact, as well as its peculiar character, gives an interest to the following, which is still to be read over the portal of the church of Panaghia at Palaeopolis in Corfu. It may be found in the Corpus Inscr. Graec. vol. iv. 8608, from various authorities, and it was also copied on the spot by the present bishop Wordsworth of Lincoln in 1832, who alone gives the first line.

"αὕτη πύλη τοῦ κυρίου δίκειο εἰσελεύσονται [i.e. δίκαιο εἰσελεύσονται] ἐν αὐτῇ.
πίστιν ἔχων βασιλεῖα ἐμὸν μενέων συνέρειδον σοί, μάκαρ Ὑψίμεθεν, τόνδ' ἱερὸν ἔκτισα νηῖον, Ἐλλήνων τεμένη καὶ βομιῶν ἐξαλαπάξαρ, χερὸς ἀπ' οὐτιδαγῆς Ἰοβιανὸς ἔδον [ἔδονον?] ἀνακτι."

"This is the gate of the Lord; the righteous shall enter into it.
Having faith as a queen, the fellow-worker of my might,
I, Jovian, having destroyed the precincts and altars of the Greeks,
To thee, O blessed Ruler on high, built this holy temple,
As a gift to the king from an unworthy hand."

If this inscription is of the date to which it pretends, we must suppose that the funds for this church were supplied by Jovian, whose family may have had estates in Coreyra. The expression, "having destroyed the precincts and altars of the Greeks," however, ill agrees with his edict of toleration, and the passage quoted by Jacobs to illustrate it from the Monody of Libanius, p. 502, seems to refer to the times of Constantius, not to Jovian. Yet it is also difficult to imagine a forger writing χειρὸς ἀπ' οὐτιδανῆς without some authority. [J. W.]

JOVIANUS (2), named by Ceillier (iii. 411) as martyr with HERCULLIANUS under Julian (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. 596); but these are more usually understood, not as proper names, but as the names of the military companies to which MAXIMILIANUS and Bonosus belonged. [G. S.]

JOVIANUS (3) (JOVIANUS, JOVINUS), bishop of Himeræum in Osrhoena, present at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 569; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 983.) [L. D.]

JOVIANUS (4), bishop of Fermo, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649 (Mansi, x. 867; Ughelli, ii. 683; Cappelletti, iii. 652; Hefele, S. 307). In Mansi the name is Jobianus in the Latin list and Julianus in the Greek. Ughelli reads Lobianus.

[A. H. D. A.]

JOVIANUS (5), a bishop at the Lateran council of 769, where the subscription, apparently corrupt, stands "Juviano episcopo Gallis" (Mansi, xii. 715). Cappelletti (iii. 237, 261) includes him among the bishops of Callium (Cagli) as well as among those of Gallese (vi. 64, 72). Gams likewise (Ser. Ep. 677, 686) gives him under both, but Ughelli (ii. 811, x. 109) under neither.

JOVIANUS (6), Jul. 19, martyr at Synnada. [LAMPYRUS.]

[G. T. S.]

JOVILLA (Baron. A. E. ann. 179 xxxvii. ed. Thiera), martyr at Langres. [JUNILLA.]

JOVINIANUS (1), May 5. A reader, and martyr at Auxerre at the hands of the heathen whom he was teaching. Henschen remarks that the name occurs in several martyrologies under these other forms, Juvinianus, Vivianus, Vivinianus, Romanus; and that in the ancient martyrology of the Queen of Sweden he is stated to have arrived at Auxerre with St. Peregrinus in the time of pope Sixtus II. in the third century. (Mart. Usuard, Adon., Hieron.; AA. SS. Boll. Mai. ii. 5.)

[G. T. S.]

JOVINIANUS (2), condemned as a heretic by synods at Rome and Milan about A.D. 390. Our fullest information about him is derived from St. Jerome, who wrote two books, Adversus Jovinianum. From these we learn that he had been a monk, living austerely, but adopted certain views which led him to substitute luxury in dress and personal habits and food for the asceticism of the convent. The opinions ascribed to him by Jerome are these: (1) A virgin is no better as such than a wife in the sight of God. (2) Abstinence is no better than a thankful partaking of food. (3) A person baptized with the Spirit as well as with water cannot sin. (4) All sins are equal. (5) There is but one grade of punishment and one of reward in the future world. We learn further from St. Augustine (lib. i. contra Julian. cap. ii.), and from the letter of the Milanese synod to Syricius (Ambrose, Op. Epist. 42), that Jovinian maintained that the Virgin Mary did not preserve her virginity in giving birth to Jesus Christ, in opposition to the orthodox view, which represented the Saviour as issuing from the closed womb in the same way as after his Resurrection he passed through closed doors, a view which Jovinian denounced as Manichean. These opinions, or part of them, Jovinian published in a book which Jerome describes (apparently with justice) as written in a most affected and unintelligible style. He was living at Rome (Romanam fidem me absente turbavit, Jerom. Prolog. adv. Pelag.), and wrote in Latin (ut Latina quoque lingua habeat haeresim suam, id. lib. ii. Adv. Jovin. § 37). Certain Christians at Rome, and amongst them Jerome's friend and correspondent Pammachius, brought the book to the notice of Siricius, the bishop of Rome, who called together a meeting of his clergy, and condemned the new heresy. Together with Jovinianus are named Auxentius, Genialis, Germinator, Felix, Prontinus, Martianus, Januarius, and Ingeniosus, as his followers Hoping for protection from Theodosius, who was now at Milan, Jovinian and his friends proceeded thither; but Siricius sent three of his presbyters, Crescens, Leopardus, and Alexander, with a letter of warning addressed to the church at Milan. Ambrose responded warmly to the orthodox zeal of Siricius, and in conjunction with eight other bishops, endorsed the sentence of excommunication passed by the Roman church. In a letter written by Ambrose in the name of the synod of Milan to Siricius conveying this judgment, it is also stated that the emperor "execrated" the impiety of the Jovinianists, and that all at Milan who had seen them shunned them like a contagion. From this point we know nothing of Jovinian's life; but in the year 409, Jerome, writing against Vigilantius, refers to Jovinian as having "amidst pheasants and pork rather belched out than breathed out his life," and alleges that his perverse mind had passed into Vigilantius. We may infer, therefore, that he died some little time before that date.

It is easy to understand how obnoxious the heresies of Jovinian were to the great ecclesiastics of his time. The merit of virginity and of abstinence was one of the points upon which zealous Churchmen were then in the habit of insisting most strongly. Jerome writes against Jovinian, he says, in answer to an appeal made to him by holy brethren at Rome who desired that he should crush the Epicurus of the Christians with evangelical and apostolic vigour. When they received the reply, the vigour of it was a little too much for them (quod nimis fuerim). His praise of virginity seemed to do something of a wrong to marriage. Accordingly Pammachius (prudenter et amanter, as Jerome acknowledges) thought it best to suppress the copies of Jerome's answer. But the vigorous controversialist tells him that the books had been already too much circulated to be recalled. He was not so fortunate as most contemporary writers; whatever he wrote was seized upon by friends or enemies, and quickly made public (Epistolae, 48, 49). As regards the other propositions ascribed to Jovinian, it is difficult to be sure what he meant without seeing his own explanations. He is not accused of any worse immorality than an indulgence in good living, which was probably exaggerated rhetorically by Jerome. Augustine reproaches him with having seduced consecrated virgins of advanced age into accepting husbands; but he himself abstained from marriage, not because he thought there was any merit in doing so, but on account of the troubles involved in matrimony. (See Jerome, lib. i. adv. Jov. § 3; Augustine, de Haeresibus, § 82, lib. ii. de Nupt. et Concep. § 23; Retract. lib. ii. § 23.) [J. L. D.]

JOVINUS (1) (Cyp. Ep. 59). [See PRIVATUS], African lapsed and schismatic. [E. W. B.]

JOVINUS (2), March 2, martyr at Rome with Basileus, under Gallienus and Valerianus (Mart. Us.; AA. SS. Boll. Mart. i. 128.) [G. T. S.]

JOVINUS (3), bishop of Perrha, an intimate friend of Basil and of Eusebius of Samosata. Basil wrote to him at the end of 372, begging him to return the visit he had paid him (Basil, Epist. 118 [318], 127 [253]). His name appears among the bishops who signed the appeal to the Western bishops for aid towards the restoration of the peace of the church, 372 A.D. (Ibid. 92 [69]). In the stress of the ecclesiastical troubles of his age, Jovinus held communion for a short time with Arian prelates (Theod. H. E. iv. 13, where the ordinary text has the erroneous reading "Perga," which was in another province). [E. V.]

JOVINUS (4), a count of the empire addressed by Basil (Basil, Epist. 163 [378]). For edicts addressed to him in 363, 367, 373, see under his name in the prosopopea of Gothofred's Cod. Theod. [E. V.]

JOVINUS (5), archdeacon at Aquileia. He was one of the friends who gathered round St. Jerome at Aquileia in the year 372 (Ruf. Apol. i. 4). Jerome writes to them from the desert A. D. 374 (Ep. 7. ed. Vall.). Jovinus was afterwards (Ruf. Ap. i. 4) a bishop, but his see is not known. [W. H. F.]

JOVINUS (6) (JOBINUS), bishop of Perrha, at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381 (Mansi, iii. 569). He lapsed for a time into Arianism (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 13 in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxii. 973). He was one of the Orientals who wrote to the Italian and Gallican churches to preserve the true faith. (Basil, Ep. xcii.; Ibid. cxviii. cxxvii., in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxii. 210, 218; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 943.) [L. D.]

JOVINUS (7), abbat of Poitiers in perhaps the 4th century. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 1 Jun. i. 71, 72 [73 sq.]) have a "Sylloge Historica de ejus cultu, genere, et professione monastica," in three sections, but give little beyond the various entries in the martyrologies, while on these little can be built, so that everything about him is uncertain. Usuardus (Mart. Auct. Jun. 1 and 5, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 112-114, 126) notices his commemoration, but in quoting from Molanus calls him LOVINUS. [J. G.]

JOVINUS (8) (JOBINUS), bearer of a letter from Euodius to St. Augustine. (Aug Ep. 161.) [H. W. P.]

JOVINUS (9), bishop of Ascalon (Scalona) in Palestine. Elected before the year A.D. 415, in which year he was present at the synod of Diospolis. (Augustin. contra Jul. i. 5; Mansi, iv. 315; and Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 599.) [J. de S.]

JOVINUS (10) (JOVIANUS), bishop of Debeltus in the province of Hemimontus; present at the council of Constantinople in 448 (Hard. Concilia, ii. 470), and at the council of Chalcedon in 481 (Hard. ii. 373 c: in the act of the sixth session of the council, his name appears miswritten as Jvnenaluis). See also Leo Mag. Ep. ed. p. 1104, Hard. ii. 787; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1182. [C. G.]

JOVINUS of Leon. [IOAVA.]

JOVINUS (11), bishop of Aquino, at the end of the 6th century. (Greg. Magn. Dial. lib. iii. 8 in Migne, lxxvii. 233; Ughelli (i. 396) places him as sixth bishop. [A. H. D. A.]

JOVINUS (12) (JOBINUS), deacon and abbat; deprived for misconduct by Gregory the Great, in a letter to Constantius archbishop of Milan, A.D. 594. (Epist. lib. v. indict. xiii. ep. 4 in Migne, lxxvii. 725.) [A. H. D. A.]

JOVITA—Feb. 15. Reputed deacon and martyr at Brixia, with Faustinus a presbyter, A.D. 120. The Bollandists spend much time and space over a story which is manifestly apocryphal. (AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 805-821.) [G. T. S.]

JOVIUS (1), bishop of Sagalassus (Selgessus) in Pisidia, present at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 570; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1043.) [L. D.]

JOVIUS (2), a nobleman of Gallic extraction residing in Campania in the neighbourhood of Paulinus bishop of Nola. An idea of him may be gathered from various passages of a long letter (Ep. 16) and a long poem (nmm. xxii.) which Paulinus addressed to him, the latter in 398 or 399. In ver. 165 of the poem Paulinus uses the word "cognatum" to him. In the life of Paulinus collected from his works (cap. 33, § 2 and cap. 34) a summary of the passages relating to Jovius may be found. The compiler is in doubt whether he may be the Jovius mentioned by Zosimus. [JOVIUS (3).] (Paulin. Nolan. Opp. in Patr. Lat. lxi.; Ceillier, viii. 63.) [C. H.]

JOVIUS (3) (JOVINUS, JOVIANUS), a civil officer under the emperor Honorius. (Zos. v. 47, 51, vi. 8, 9, 12; Soz. ix. 7, 8; Olympiodorus in Photius, cod. 80; Symmachus, ep. viii. 30, 49, ix. 56; Gothofred. Cod. Theod. prosop. s. n.) [T. W. D.]

JOVIUS (4), count, who with another named Gaudentius overthrew the temples and broke the images of the gods at Carthage on March 19 A.D. 399 (Clinton, F.R. ii. 544). See also Augustine, Civ. Dei. xviii. 54. [T. W. D.]

JOZACHUS. [JOSACHUS.]

JUBAIANUS, a Mauritanian bishop, A.D. 256, who forwarded to Cyprian a document controverting his views on baptism, which was then being circulated in Africa, and probably originated with Stephen of Rome. Cyprian's answer (Ep. 73) is very elaborate, and was read by him as an exposition of his views at the September council, A.D. 256, together with the reply in which Jubaianus expressed himself as convinced. Neither of Jubaianus's letters are extant, and it has appeared to some critics as if Augustine had expressed some doubt on the genuineness of this and other of the baptismal documents (contra Crescon. iii. 33; cf. ad Vincent. Ep. xciii. ad Macrob. vol. ii. p. 246, 2, vol. ii. p. 309). The fact is that in each case the possibility of their non-genuineness is simply an admission for the purposes of argument.

JUCUNDIANUS (JOCUNDIANUS), July 4, martyred in Africa. (Usuard. Mart., Adon., Vet. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 5.) [C. H.]

JUCUNDUS (1) (JOCUNDUS), martyr in Africa, A.D. 203. He is mentioned in the acts of Perpetua and Felicitas (cap. iv. AA. SS. Boll. Mart. i. 636) as having already suffered by fire in the same persecution. See also Mart. Hieron. under March 7 and Jan. 9. [G. T. S.]

JUCUNDUS (2) (JOCUNDUS), bishop of Sufetula, an important city of Byzacene (Ant. Itin. 53, 4, Shaw, p. 118) (Spatila or Sobeythalah), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411, i. 126. He was also present at the council of Carthage A.D. 418. (Bruns. Concil. i. 159, 194.) [H. W. P.]

JUCUNDUS (3), bishop of Tarvisium (Treviso), c. A.D. 421. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 486, Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 602.)

[R. S. G.]
JUCUNDUS (4) (JOCUNDUS, LOCUNDUS), Nov. 14, fourteenth bishop of Bologna, cir. 485 (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 10; Cappelletti, iii. 462, 579; Mart. Rom.). Alidosi (I summi Pontifici, p. 3) places his death in 556 and makes his successor Theodore. [C. H.]

JUCUNDUS (5) (JOCUNDUS), a bishop designated as Angustanus and Subaugustanus, at the third, fourth, and sixth synod of Symmachus at Rome, A.D. 501-504 (Mansi, viii. 252, 268, 315). Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 623; cf. Boll. Acta SS. Sep. iii. 77 E) regards him as bishop of Subangusta, supposed to have been near Praeneste. The Sammarthani however decide for Aosta (Gall. Chr. xii. 808). This Jucundus may be, as the Sammarthani observe, the anonymous bishop of Aosta, respecting whom Theoderic king of Italy wrote to Eustorgius bishop of Milan.

JUDAS (2), commentator and chronographer, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. c. 7).

[J. G.]

JUDICAELUS (JUDICAILE, JUDICAHIL, ST. GIGUEL), ST., king of the Bretons in the earlier half of the 7th century. He was one of the sons, of Juthael or Hoel III., who died in 612, and Pritella or Pratella. According to the usual account, he was displaced in the succession by a younger brother, who reigned as Salomon II. or Gozlyn till his death, about 632, and compelled Judicael to take refuge in the monastery which St. Mevennius (Mén) had lately founded and submit to the tonsure. Upon the usurper's death without issue, he emerged from his retreat, assumed the government, and married a wife named Moronoe. Before long, however, he became involved in hostile relations with Dagobert I., king of the Franks (cir. 635), but was at length induced to treat personally with Dagobert. A treaty was concluded by which, apparently, Judicael acknowledged the Frankish suzerainty, and gifts were exchanged; but the Breton king refused Dagobert's invitation to the banquet, and retired to dine with his chancellor Andoenus (St. Ouen), whom he knew to be a servant of the true religion (Andoenus, Vita S. Eligii, c. xiii, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 491; Fredegarius, Chron. ann. 635, lxxviii.; Gesta Dagoberti I. xxxviii., Bonquet, ii. 590; Aimoin, De Gest. Franc. iv. 29, Bonquet, iii. 132; Florentius, Vita S. Judoci, Surius, Dec. 13). It is supposed that remorse for his broken vows, fostered by the exhortations and remonstrances of St. Eligius and St. Andoenus, led Judicael to the step which he took about 638 of resigning his crown and retiring again to his old monastery, St. Mén, which he is said to have completed and endowed (Chronicon Briocense). Here he passed the remaining twenty years of his life, and, after his death on Dec. 17, 658, was buried beside the founder at the gates. For the history of this monastery, see Gall. Christ. xiv. 1019 sqq. His day of commemoration is Dec. 17. His Life was written by Ingomar at the end of the 10th or beginning of the 11th century, but it is lost. (Hist. Litt. vii. 236.) [S. A. B.]

JUDOCUS (IODOCUS, JODOCUS, JOSSE, JUDICUS), priest and hermit in Brittany in the 7th century, and commemorated Dec. 13. Ordericus Vitalis (Hist. Eccl. iii. c. [13] 19; Migne, Patr. Lat. clxxxviii. 290 sq.) is the earliest author relating the legend of St. Judocus, but his account appears to be based on the Vita S. Judoci, presbyteri et confessoris, given by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. ii. 566 sq.). Surius (Vit. Sanct. iv. pt. iii. 253 sq.) publishes Vita S. Judoci, filii regis Britonum et confessoris per Florentium Abbatem conscripta. The special account of the translation and miracles of St. Judocus was written by Isembard, a monk of Fleury, on the discovery of the saint's remains in the year 977 (Ord. Vitalis, ib.). (For the MS. and other authorities upon the legendary Life of St. Judocus, see Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 265 sq. pt. ii. 823; Potthast, Bibl. i. 767.)

Judocus, in France called Josse, was son of Juthail, or Judathail (Hoel, or Howel III.) king of Brittany, who died about A.D. 602, and brother of Judicael, who, succeeding his father on the throne, abdicated about A.D. 638. [JUDICAEL.] Judocus refused the vacant throne, and fleeing from the monastery of Lanmailmon, where he had been educated, visited Rome along with eleven companions, and on his return was ordained as chaplain to Haymon, duke of Ponthieu. But after seven years he retired to a cell "in eremo Braic ad rivum Altaiae" (the Alteja or Authio), where he lived eight years. Afterwards at Runiac on the river Quantia (Canche) he built an oratory, which he dedicated to St. Martin, and was there fourteen years. He died, as is usually accepted from Lobineau, in A.D. 668. (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xvi. 15; Rees, Welsh Saints, 321; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 221.)

Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 376-8) calls him "Canonicus Lateranensis," and ascribes to him De Anchoretica Vita, l. i. De Contemptu Mundi, l. i., but probably without reason (Tanner, Bibl. 447). [J. G.]

JUDRUIS, or Athrwy, a Welsh prince, and grandson of Tewdryg, died A.D. 632 or 633. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 146.) [C. W. B.]

JUGWALD (Wend. s.a. 675). [INGWALD.]

JULIA MAMMAEA. [MAMMAEA.]

JULIA DOMNA. [DOMNA.]

JULIA (1), martyr, A.D. 250. [ARISTO.]

JULIA (2), May 22. Virgin and martyr in Corsica. (Mart. Vet. Rom.; Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 167.) [G. T. S.]

JULIA (3), July 15. Martyr at Carthage (Usuard, Ado.) [CATULINUS (2).] [C. H.]

JULIA (4), July 21. Virgin and martyr at Treves, under Aurelian. (Mart. Us.; AA. SS. Boll. Jul. v. 133.) [G. T. S.]

JULIA (5), Oct. 7. Virgin, and martyr under Maximian. (Mart. Ad., Us.) [G. T. S.]

JULIA (6), Apr. 16, one of the eighteen martyrs at Saragossa (Prudentius, Peristephanon, hymn iv.) in the reign of Diocletian. The Martyrologium Romanum reads Julia, but an epigram of St. Eugenius (Patr. Lat. lx. 373) and Usuard read Julius. [F. D.]

JULIA (7), one of the eight virgins martyred with Theodotus at Ancyra; commemorated on Oct. 1 and May 18. (Basil. Menol.; Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JULIA (8) PERPETUA, sister of Perpetuus, sixth archbishop of Tours, who in his will, cir. A.D. 490, leaves her a little cross of gold containing relics. In one place in the will she has the praenomen of Fidia. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1151.) [S. A. B.]

JULIA (9), virgin martyr at Merida, with Eulalia; commemorated Dec. 10. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JULIA (10), surnamed EUARESTA, a Christian woman, whose epitaph was dug up near the Via Latina at Rome, about 1858 ("nuper effossa," De Rossi, Inscr. Chr. proleg. p. cxvi. A.D. 1861). [G. T. S.]

JULIANA (1), a lettered unmarried lady, and a Christian at Caesarea in Cappadocia, at whose house Origen found a refuge from his persecutors for two years, and from whom he received a copy of the writings of Symmachus. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 17; Pallad. Hist. Laus. 147.) [C. H.]

JULIANA (2), sister of the martyr Paulus, with whom she suffered in the reign of Aurelian. They were commemorated on March 4, as well as on Aug. 17. (Basil. Menol. iii. 5, 206.) [C. H.]

JULIANA (3), Feb. 16, Dec. 21, virgin, and martyred in the persecution of Diocletian (Mart. Vet. Rom.; Basil. Menol. Dec. 21; Till. Mem. v. 491; AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 868; Ceillier, xiii. 602. A Prologue to her passion written by Peter of Naples is printed in Mai's Spicilegium Romanum (iv. 281). [G. T. S.]

JULIANA (4), July 27, said to have been martyred in 304 with Sempronia or Semproniana. These saints are first mentioned in the history of Domeneccus, which appeared in A.D. 1602. (Esp. Sagr. xxix. 351; Boll. AA. SS. Jul. vi. 430; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. iv. 266.) [F. D.]

JULIANA (5), one of 25 martyrs at Augsburg; commemorated on Aug. 12. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JULIANA (6), Feb. 13, a matron of Turin, said to have buried the bodies of Solutor, Adventor, Octavius, martyrs of the Thebaean legion in the 4th century. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 657.) [C. H.]

JULIANA (7), a widow lady commended by Ambrose in his Exhortatio Virginitatis (Pat. Lat. xvi. 335). See also Boll. Acta SS. 7 Feb. ii. 48; Ceillier, v. 457; Baron. Mart. Rom. Feb. 7, note. [C. H.]

JULIANA (8), mother of the virgin Demetrias (q. v.), to whom we have letters from Jerome, Augustine, pope Innocent, and Pelagius. She was of noble birth, being connected through her mother Proba and her husband Olybrius with some of the greatest families of Rome; and she was possessed of great wealth. When her daughter proposed to take vows of virginity, she refrained from using any influence to persuade her; but when Demetrias appeared in the church clad in the dress of a virgin she shewed her delight at this step, and considered her family further ennobled by it. She supported the cause of Chrysostom at Rome, and entertained his messengers. His thanks to her were conveyed in a letter from his place of exile (A.D. 406), exhorting her to hold fast and aid in allaying the waves of controversy. (Chrys. Ep. 169.) She fled with her daughter from Rome to Africa at the time of its sack by Alaric, but only to fall into the hands of the rapacious count Heraclion, who robbed her of half her property. She was commended to the African churches by pope Innocent in a laudatory letter (Ep. 15), which takes the rank of a decree in the collection of papal rescripts by Dion. Exig. (Coll. Dec. 39; Jerome, Ep. 130, ed. Vall.) She became acquainted with Augustine while in Africa, and she and her daughter had relations with Pelagius, who wrote a long letter to Demetrias (given among the Supposititia of Jerome in Vallarsi's edition, vol. xi.) vindicating free will by her example. Augustine, with Alypius, wrote to Juliana (Aug. Ep. 188, A.D. 418), arguing that all the virtues of Demetrias were not from herself, but from the grace of God. [W. H. F.]

JULIANA (9) ANICIA, daughter of the emperor Olybrius by his wife Placidia, and therefore granddaughter of the emperor Valentinian III. By her husband the patrician Areobindus she became the mother of Anicetus Olybrius the younger and Dalgalaifus (Du Cange, Fam. Aug. p. 60, ed. 1729). Juliana Anicia lived at Constantinople, and corresponded with pope Hormisdas (Hormisdas, Epist. in Patr. Lat. lxiii. 451). It was for her that the famous uncial Dioscorides, now in the Imperial Library at Vienna, was written, and it contains her portrait (Montf. Palaeographia Graeca, iii. 2).

[F. D.]

JULIANA (10), Monophysite confessor at Constantinople in the reign of Justin II. She was the daughter of the consul Magnes, who was descended from the emperor Anastasius, and was on one occasion banished with all his family, Juliana included. Her history is given by John bishop of Ephesus (H. E. p. 109, R. P. Smith's transl.). (Du Cange, Hist. Byzant. p. 81, ed. 1729.)

[G. T. S.]

JULIANA (11), abbess of the monastery of St. Vitus in Sardinia. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. 48 in Migne, lxxvii. 511.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JULIANA (12), abbess of the monastery of Paviliacus or Pauliacum (Pauilly) near Rouen, probably in the 8th century. See Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 661-6.

[S. A. B.]

JULIANA (13), a noble Italian lady, who married Memor or Memorius, said to have been bishop of Capua, and by him became the mother of Julian bishop of Eclana, cir. A.D. 386. She is mentioned by name by Marius Mercator (Subnotat. iv. 4 in Pat. Lat. xlvi. 131. Commonit. iv. 3 in Pat. Lat. 102; Pagi, ann. 419, v. vi.)

[T. W. D.]

JULIANISTAE. [JULIANUS (47).]

JULIANUS (1), bishop of Apamea Cibotis (Celaenae) in Pisidia, together with Zoticus of Comana, attempted to try the spirit of Maximilla the Montanist prophetess. (Eusebius, H. E. v. 16; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1045.)

JULIANUS (2), patriarch of Alexandria. According to Eusebius we should date his accession to the see in the year A.D. 180, and he occupied it for ten years. (Euseb. Chron. Patrol. Gr. xix. 565; Id. Hist. Eccl. v. 22; ibid. xx. 489; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 391.)

[J. de S.]

JULIANUS (3), bishop of Marcelliana (Girumarcelli), in Numidia; the word Girus which occurs elsewhere in Africa is connected by Morcelli with Giru, in the idea of arx, but? He says that the arx of Firmum (Fermo) is still so called. (Suffr. 66 in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii.; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 172.)

[E. W. B.]

JULIANUS (4), bishop of Thelepte, a colonia in Byzacene (afterwards one of Justinian's fortresses). (Suffr. 57 in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. de Bap. iii.; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 310.)

[E. W. B.]

JULIANUS (5) I. and (6) II., bishops of Jerusalem, coming twentieth and twenty-fourth in order of those enumerated by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 5, v. 12).

[E. V.]

JULIANUS (7), fourth or fifth bishop of Perusia, A.D. 304. (Ughelli, i. 1156; Cappelletti, iv. 457, 502.)

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (8), Oct. 12, third bishop of Laus Pompeia (Lodi). He was elected in 305 and died after an episcopate of eighteen years, eight months, nineteen days, on the authority of the ancient monuments of the church. (Boll. Acta SS. 12 Oct. vi. 59; Ughelli, iv. 656; Cappelletti, xii. 280, 391.)

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (9), an African bishop designated "Bazaritanus" or "Vazaritanus" (Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 98). His conduct was made the subject of the 44th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage under Aurelius, A.D. 397 (No. 54 in the Codex Canonum of the African church, Mansi, iii. 748, 888), where the circumstances are related. (Ceillier, vii. 724; Morcelli, ii. 332.)

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (10), first bishop of Le Mans, commemorated on Jan. 27. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 762; Ceillier, xii. 897; Gall. Christ. xiv. 339.)

[R. T. S.]

JULIANUS (11), first bishop of Lescar, is said to have been sent into Bearn by Leontius bishop of Treves, who was a native of that province, about the year A.D. 400. (Gall. Christ. i. 1285; Boll. Acta SS. 21 Aug. iv. 441.)

[R. T. S.]

JULIANUS (12), Donatist bishop of Midla or Midila, in Numidia (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 645), absent through illness from the Carthaginian conference, but represented by Rufinus, a priest of his diocese. (Coll. Carth. i. 193, 197.)

[H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (13), Donatist bishop of Tignica, a town of Numidia (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 646), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. i. 133, 208; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 412, 459, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (14), bishop of Tafalta or Tabalta, a town of Byzacene (Ant. Itin. 48, 6) (Tarfouah), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. i. 128.)

[H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (15), variously designated CAPUANUS, DE CAMPANIA, CELANENSIS, ECLANENSIS, ATHELANENSIS. He was bishop of Eclana, Eclanum, Eculanum, or more properly Aeclanum or Aeulanum (Noris, Ad Hist. Pelag. in Opp. iv. 747, ed. 1729-32), afterwards known as Quintodecimum, near Beneventum (Noris, Hist. Pelag. i. 18, in Opp. i. 178; Pagi, Critic. s. a. 419, ix.), a distinguished leader of the Pelagians of the 5th century. He was a native of Apulia (Augustin. Opus Imperfectum, vi. 18 in Pat. Lat. xlv. 1542), and apparently at Atella or Athela, in that province. Hence the preferable reading "Athelanensis" in the Chronicon of Prosper, s. a. A.D. 439 (Fr. Ballerin; cf. Noris, Op. iv. 880). The date of his birth is assigned to c. A.D. 386

* "Eclanensis" is also the reading of the current editions of Prosper, A.D. 439. Baronius uniformly calls Julian "Capuanus," and Gams supposes him to have been first bishop of Eclana, c. A.D. 416 (Ser. Episc. 855), and then to have succeeded his father at Capua c. A.D. 418 (ib. 867.)

(Garner, Diss. i. ad part. i. Opp. Mar. Merc. cap. 6, in Patr. Lat. xlviii. 291).

The father of Julian was an Italian bishop named Memor or Memorius, whose see is said, but on no sufficient authority, to have been Capua (Mar. Merc. Subnot. iv. 4, Garner's note g. u. s. p. 130; Pagi, Critic. A.D. 419; Cappelletti, Chies. Ital. xx. 19), and his mother a noble lady named Juliana (Mar. Merc. u. s.). Augustine of Hippo was intimate with the whole family, and wrote of them in terms of great affection and respect, c. A.D. 410 (Ep. 101; Noris, Opp. i. 422, iv. 747). Julian, c. A.D. 404, became a "lector" in the church over which his father presided, and while he held that office he married a lady named Ia, who has been supposed to be the daughter of Aemilius bishop of Beneventum (A.D. 404-415); but the Ballerini (Noris, Op. iv. 882) and Muratori (Anecd. Lat. i. diss. 8) have shewn good reason for believing that this is a mistake. Paulinus, afterwards bishop of Nola, composed an elaborate Epithalamium on the occasion, from which it appears that he also was on terms of great intimacy with the family (Poem. xxv. in Pat. lxi. 633). By c. A.D. 410 he had become a deacon, but whether Ia was then living or not does not appear. At that date Augustine expressed a strong desire that he should visit him at Hippo (Ep. 101), but we have no evidence of his having done so, though we know that he visited Carthage about that time, and there made the acquaintance of Augustine's friend Honoratus (Aug. Op. v. 26).

Julian was ordained to the episcopate by Innocent I. c. A.D. 417 (Mar. Merc. Commonit. iii. 2), but the name of his see is so variously given as to cause great confusion. Some MSS. of the well-known Decretum ascribed to Gelasius call him "Edanensis" (Gratian. Decret. distinct. xv. cap. 30, § 81, ed. Richter), and some MSS. of Gennadius describe him as "Capuanus," while others have "Campanus" (Script. Eccl. xlv. in Patr. Lat. lviii. 1084). Bede calls him "Julianus Celanensis Episcopus de Campania" (In Cantica, init. in Patr. Lat. xci. 1065), and also "Julianus de Campania," H. E. i. 10), while some copies of Petrus Diaconus (Basil, 1621, p. 114) describe him as "Edanensis." But "Edanensis" and "Celanensis" are evidently errors of the copyists, and neither Capuanus nor Campanus occur in the best MSS. of Gennadius (Noris, Opp. i. 177; Pagi, A.D. 419 viii.), while Marius Mercator, who was his contemporary, distinctly speaks of him as "Episcopus Eclanensis" (Nestor. Tract. praef. § 1; Migne, 184, Theod. Mops. praef. § 2; Migne, 1043).

Innocent I. died March 12, A.D. 417. Up to that date Julian had maintained a high reputation not only for great ability and extensive learning, but also for orthodoxy, on which account Mercator concludes that he must have sympathized with Innocent's condemnation of the Pelagians (Commonitor. iii. 2). Notwithstanding this, there is reason to believe that even Innocent had some ground for at least suspecting his proclivities (August. Cont. Julian. i. 13). But when the cases of Pelagius and Coelestius were reopened by Zosimus, shortly after the death of his predecessor, Julian seems to have expressed himself strongly in their favour and in the hearing of Mercator (Subnot. vii. 2; Noris, Opp. i. 183), and when that bishop issued his Tracta- toria respecting the sentence which had been pronounced against them by Innocent, notwithstanding his previous acquittal of both (Ep. 3, 4, A.D. 417; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. Rom. 417), and caused it to be sent to the bishops both of the East and of the West for their subscriptions, he was one of those who refused, and was accordingly deposed, and afterwards exiled under the imperial edicts which were issued by the emperor Honorius in the March of A.D. 418 (Mar. Merc. Commonitor. iii. 1).

Julian now addressed two letters to Zosimus (Augustin. Op. Imp. i. 18), one of which was very generally circulated throughout Italy before it reached the pontiff. Of this Mercator has preserved some fragments (Subnot. vi. 10-13, ix. 3). Of the other we have no remains (Pagi, Critic. A.D. 418, lvii.). Garnier indeed contends that the Libellus Fidei, which he has published for the first time (Ad Partem Primam, dissert. v. Migne, 509), is the missing letter, mainly, however, on the ground that from internal evidence "Augustine" must be a clerical error for Zosime (525 seq.). But cardinal Noris defends the reading "Augustine," and shews that the Libellus was addressed to Augustinus bishop of Aquileia (A.D. 407, c. 434), to whom, as an Italian primate, the Tractatoria would naturally be forwarded for the subscription of the bishops under his jurisdiction (Noris, Opp. iii. 117, iv. 752; Pagi, A.D. 418, lviii.). There are no signatories mentioned in the Libellus. The document is divided into four parts, the first two of which contain an elaborate confession of faith, the third an enumeration of various heresies, which the subscribers condemn; and in the fourth, after protesting that "if any one still takes offence at them," the signatories appeal to a "plenary council," they defend their refusal to subscribe the condemnation of "absent ones," on the ground of such precepts as Matt. vii. 1; John vii. 51; 1 Tim. v. 19. Whole sentences of the first and second parts correspond word for word with the libelli which Pelagius and Coelestius submitted to Zosimus (Garnier, u. s. 498).

About the same time Julian also addressed a letter to Rufus bishop of Thessalonica (A.D. 410-431), both in his own name and in that of eighteen fellow-recusants. Rufus was vicarius of the Roman see in Illyricum (Innocent's ep. to Rufus, June 17, 412, in Mansi, viii. 751), and was just then in serious collision with Atticus the patriarch of Constantinople on that account (art. ATTICUS; Boniface to Rufus in Mansi, viii. 751, 752, 754). As Atticus was well known to be a strenuous opponent of the Pelagians (Noris, Opp. iv. 884), it is not improbable that Julian and his brethren thought that Rufus might therefore be the more easily persuaded to favour them (Noris, Opp. i. 201, 202). Zosimus died Dec. 26, A.D. 418, and was succeeded by Boniface I., but not until April 10, 419, in consequence of the schism of Eulalius. This letter of Julian to Rufus, together with another addressed to the clergy of Rome, which he denied to be his (Augustin. Op. Imp. i. 18), falling into the hands of the pontiff, he sent them both to Augustine at Hippo, who drew up a reply to it in the three last of his Contra Duas Epistolas Pelagianorum. It is from this reply only that we have any knowledge of its contents (Garnier in Migne, 534). In it Julian avows an earnest desire to conciliate the aid of the Oriental bishops against the "profanity of Manichaeans," for so he styles the Catholics (Cont. Duas. Ep. ii. 1); accuses Zosimus of tergiversation, and the Roman clergy of having been unduly influenced in their condemnation of the Pelagians (ii. 3); charges both with various heresies (ii. 2-5); and protests that by their means the subscriptions of nearly all the Western bishops had been uncanonically extorted to a dogma which he characterizes as "non minus stultum quam impium" (iv. 8, § 20 init.). Garnier assigns this letter to Rufus as well as the two to Zosimus, to A.D. 418 (Ad Primam Partem, dissert. i. Migne, 292).

When Julian addressed his two letters to Zosinus he was preparing a reply to the first of Augustine's two books, De Nuptiis et Concupiscentiâ (Mar. Merc. Subnot. praef. § 7), which however was not completed until after the termination of the Eulalian schism (Augustin. Contra Julian. vi. 12). This he addressed to one of his fellow-recusants named Turbantius, whom he earnestly entreats to join him in prayer that the church may be delivered from the defilement of Manichaeism (ib. iii.). He sent some extracts from this work, which was in four books, and appears to have been entitled Contra eos qui nuptias damnant et fructus earum diabolo assignant (Augustin. de Nuptiis et Concupisc. ii. 4, § 11), and to Valerius, who forwarded them to his friend Augustine, and that bishop at once rejoined in a second book De Nuptiis et Concupiscentiâ (Augustin. Retract. ii. 53). But when the work itself subsequently came into his hands, and he discovered that the extracts did not in all respects correspond with the original, Augustine published a second and a fuller rejoinder in his Contra Julianum Pelagianum. As usual, Augustine freely quotes his antagonist, and from his quotations we find that Julian again insisted upon the Manichaeism of his opponents (lib. ii. passim); again charged Zosimus with prevarication (iii. 1, vi. 2), as well as elaborated the whole anthropology for which he contended. The chief quotations are given in the four last books of the rejoinder, the third being especially directed against the first of Julianus, the fourth against his second, the fifth against his third, and the sixth against his fourth. Each book seems to be discussed chapter by chapter.

When he was driven from the West, Julian and some of his fellow-exiles went into Cilicia, and remained for a time with Theodorus bishop of Mopsuestia in that province (Mar. Merc. Theod. Mops. praef. § 2), who is charged by Mercator with having been one of the originators of Pelagianism (Subnot. praef. § 1, Symb. Theod. Mops. praef. § 2), and who also wrote against Augustine (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 177; Mar. Merc. Garnier, Ad Partem Prim. dissert. vi.). In the meanwhile the rejoinder of Augustine had reached him, and he prepared an answer to it in eight books. This work he addressed to Florus, who was also a fellow-recusant (Co. Eph. A.D. 431, Actio v. in Mansi, iv. 1337; Mar. Merc. Subnot. praef.). Mercator has given copious extracts from it (Subnot. passim), but it is best known from Augustine's elaborate Opus Imperfectum, so called because he did not live to complete, which was evoked by it (Aug. Opp. t. x. in Pat. Lat. xlv. 1050). On the death of Boniface I., and the succession of Celestine I. in Sept. A.D. 422, Julianus appears to have left Cilicia and to have returned to Italy, probably in the hope that the newly-elected pontiff might be prevailed upon to reconsider the case of the Pelagians, a hope in which he may have been encouraged by the variance which had then arisen between the Roman see and the African bishops. Celestine, however, not only repulsed him, but also caused him to be exiled a second time (Prosper. Contr. Collator. xxi. 2, in Patr. li. 271), and in the meanwhile Julianus was also condemned, in his absence, by a council in Cilicia, Theodorus concurring in the censure (Mar. Merc. Symbol. Theod. Mops. praef. § 3; Garnier, Ad Primam Part. dissert. ii. Migne, 359). On this Julianus went to Constantinople, where the same fate awaited him, both from Atticus and his successor Sisinnius (A.D. 426, 427), that he had recently met with in Cilicia and at Rome (Prosper. Carmen de Ingratis, vv. 60-66 in Patr. Lat. li. 98; Garnier, u. s. 361; Coolest. ad Nestor. in Mansi, iv. 1025). On the accession of Nestorius to the patriarchate (A.D. 428), however, the expectations of Julianus were again raised, and he appealed not only to Nestorius, but also to the emperor Theodosius II., both of whom, at first, gave him some encouragement (Mar. Merc. Nestor. Tract. praef. § 1), which may have been the reason why there is no mention made of the Pelagians in the celebrated edict which the emperor issued against heresies at the instance of Nestorius (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 65, May 30, A.D. 428; Socr. H. E. vii. 29). The patriarch wrote to Celestine more than once in his behalf and that of his friends (Nestor. Ep. to Celest. in Mansi, iv. 1022, 1023), but the favour which he then shewed them soon involved him in some trouble, which led him to defend himself in a public discourse which he delivered in their presence, and of which Mercator has given a translation (u. s. Migne, 189 et seq.). A.D. 429 Mercator presented his Commonitorium de Coelestio to the emperor, in which he carefully relates the proceedings which had been already taken against the Pelagians, and largely comments upon their teaching in no measured terms. Julian and his friends were then driven from Constantinople by an imperial edict (Mar. Merc. Commonitor. praef. § 1). Towards the close of A.D. 430, Celestine convened a council at Rome, in which Julianus and others were condemned once more (Garnier, Ad Primam Partem, diss. ii.). Whether he went after his expulsion from Constantinople does not appear, but he with other Pelagians seem to have accompanied Nestorius to the convent of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and took part in the "Conciliabulum," which was held by Joannes of Antioch (Relat. ad Coel. in Mansi, iv. 1334). The reading "Thessalia" is a clerical error for "Italia" (Noris, Opp. i. 361, 363), Baronius (s. a. 431 lxxix.) infers from a passage in one of the letters of Gregory the Great (lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 49 in Pat. Lat. xv. lxxvii. 981) that the "Conciliabulum" absolved Julian and his friends, but cardinal Noris (Opp. i. 362) has exposed his error. The council in their synodical letter to Celestine declare their approval of all that had previously been done in the case of the Pelagians, and repeat their condemnation, expressly mentioning Julianus by name (Relat. u. s.; Mar. Merc. Nestor. Tract. praef. § 2).

Sixtus III., the successor of Celestine (July 31, A.D. 432), when a presbyter, had favoured the Pelagians, much to the grief of Augustine (Ep. 174). Probably not unmindful of this Julianus made another attempt to recover his lost position through him, but Sixtus evidently treated him with severity, as his predecessors had, mainly at the instigation of Leo. then a presbyter, who became his successor, A.D. 440 (Prosper. Chron. s. a. 439). When pontiff himself, Leo shewed the same spirit toward the Pelagians, and especially toward Julianus, that he had before his elevation to that dignity (De Promiss. Dei, pt. iv. c. 6 in Pat. Lat. li. 843). After this we hear no more of the deposed bishop of Eclana until his death, which took place in Sicily, c. A.D. 454 (Gennad. u. s.; Garnier, Ad Primam Partem, dissert. i. Migne, 297).

Some years after his death Julianus was yet again condemned by Joannes Talia, formerly patriarch of Alexandria, but c. A.D. 484 bishop of Nola in Italy (Photius, Bibl. Cod. liv.; s. f. Augustin. Opp. in Pat. Lat. xlv. 1684).

Julian was an able and a learned man. Gennadius speaks of him as "vir acer ingenio, in divinis Scripturis doctus, Graeca et Latina lingua scholasticus" (u. s.). Bede calls him "rhetor peritissimus," and speaks of his "copiam eloquentiae blandientis" (In Cantica, init.). He was also a man of high character, and especially distinguished for his generous benevolence (Gennad. u. s.), and seems to have been actuated throughout the great controversy on which he expended the greater part of his troubled life by a firm conviction that he was acting in the interests, not only of what he held to be the Christian faith, but also in that of morality itself. It is singular however that Petrus de Natalibus should devote a chapter of his Catalogus Sanctorum to him, under the title of De Sancto Juliano confessore (iii. 39). It is clear that he means Julianus of Eclana, as he quotes what Gennadius says of him, and refers to his having written four books "adversus Augustinum ejus impugnatores," whom however he strangely calls an "haeresiarchus." Petrus also says, what does not appear elsewhere, that Julianus wrote against others, as well as against Augustine.

Besides the works of Julian already mentioned Bede speaks of his "Opuscula" on the Canticles, and among them of a "libellus" De Amore, and a "Libellus" De Bono Constantiae, both of which he charges with Pelagianism, and from each of them, as well as, apparently, others, whose titles he has not mentioned, he gives some extracts (In Cantica, praef. Migne, 1065-1077). He also ascribes a Liber ad Demetriadem Virginem to Julian, but remarks that some rashly (temere) ascribe it to Jerome, whose however it is, though even Augustine at one time ascribed it to Pelagius. Garnier claims Julian as the translator of the Libellus Fidei a Rufino Palaestinae Provinciae Presbytero, which he has published in his edition of Marius Mercator (Ad Primam Partem, dissert. v. Migne, 449, diss. vi. Migne, 623). He also regards him as the author of the Liber Definitivum seu Ratiocinationum, to which Augustine replied in his De Perfectione Justitiae (n. 6 in Mar. Merc. Subnot. Migne, 145, 146).

JULIANUS (16), bishop of Sardica and metropolitan (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 302). He was present at the council of Ephesus in 431 and sided with John bishop of Antioch (Mansi, iv. 1411, v. 767; Theodoret. ep. 170). He subscribed with John the letter to the church of Hierapolis (Mansi, v. 776), and likewise the address to John and the other deputies of the conciliabulum at Constantinople (797). His name occurs among the same party; but without his see in two other places (iv. 1426 D, v. 1010 C). He maintained his opposition to the last. (Mansi, v. 966.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (17), bishop of Larissa in Syria (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 918). He was present at the council of Ephesus in 431, siding with the party of John bishop of Antioch (Mansi, iv. 1270, 1323 D, 1396 B, v. 797, 965), and as he was not deprived, it may be inferred that he submitted. [C. H.]

JULIANUS, bishop of Puteoli. [JULIUS (9).]

JULIANUS (18) (JULIUS), a Gallic bishop who signed the synodical epistle of Ravennius bishop of Arles to pope Leo the Great in 451 (Leo. Mag. Epp. 99, 102, in Pat. Lat. liv. 966, 970). Tillemont (Mém. xv. 65) identifies him with the bishop Julius who attended the council of Riez in 439 (Mansi, v. 1195, "Julianus" margin) and makes him bishop of Cavailon. (See also Gall. Chr. i. 940.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (19), bishop of Mostene in Lydia, present at Flavian's synod, A.D. 448, and subscribing the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 885; Mansi, vi. 752, vii. 573.) Among the Egyptian bishops at the Latrocinium in 449 there occurs (but in the Latin list only) a Julianus "Mostenae civitatis," whom Le Quien at one place (i. 885) assigns to the see of Mostene in Lydia, but at another place (ii. 561) to that of Bubastus in Egypt. [L. D.]

JULIANUS (20), bishop of Hypaepa in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, A.D. 449, and at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 855; vii. 152; Le Quien, i. 695.) [L. D.]

JULIANUS (21), bishop of Tabia, in the province of Galatia Prima (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 474). He took a prominent part both in the absolution of Eutyches and in the condemnation of Flavian of Constantinople, and Eusebius of Dorylaeum at the Latrocinium in 449. Two years afterwards he took part in the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 571, 946, 1092, vii. 147, 404). He addressed the emperor Leo on the subject of the murder of Proterius, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 616.) [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (22), bishop of Alexandria in Cilicia, represented at the council of Chalcedon in 451. (Mansi, vii. 164; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 904.) [J. de S.]

JULIANUS (23), bishop of Lebedus, near Colophon, in the province of Asia. At the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, his name was subscribed in his absence to the definition of faith read before the emperor Marcian by Stephen of Ephesus (Mansi, vii. 168. See also Baron. Ann. 449, lxxx.). He must not be confounded with Julianus, the pope Leo's legate, who, though identified by some with Julianus of Cos, was probably a Latin bishop, as Florentius of Sardis acted as his interpreter. (Mansi, vi. 613; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 725.) [L. D.]

JULIANUS (24), bishop of Rhosus in Cilicia; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 569; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 908.) [J. de S.]

JULIANUS (25), bishop of Celenderis in Isauria, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, in the records of which his name is occasionally given as "Julius" in the Latin codices, as also in the synodical epistle of the province of Isauria to the emperor Leo. (Mansi, vi. 566; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1015.) [J. de S.]

JULIANUS (26), bishop of Satala in Lydia, subscribed the letter to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 573; Le Quien, i. 896.) [L. D.]

JULIANUS (27), bishop of Cos, the friend and frequent correspondent of Leo the Great, among whose letters a large number are addressed to him. He was by birth an Italian, and had been educated at Rome (Leo. Mag. Ep. lxxxi. 1042; Migne, Ep. cxiii. 1190). He was thus acquainted with the Latin as well as with the Greek language (Ep. cxiii. 1194), and was for this reason useful to Leo, who was ignorant of Greek, and required translations of documents written in that language. But over and above this, Leo found in him a man after his own heart. He describes him as a "part of himself" (Ep. cxv. 1244). Long experience led him to put the fullest confidence in his orthodoxy, erudition, watchfulness and zeal (Ep. xxxv. 875, xci. 1066). Nothing could exceed the value of such a man to Leo, to watch over the interests of the faith and the Roman see in the East. He had been present at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 448, where he professed his belief in the "two natures in one Person"—an expression which Dioscorus could not tolerate when he heard it read out at Chalcedon—and subscribed the condemnation of Eutyches (Labbe, Concilia, iv. 188 B, 231 B). In the April of the following year he was present at the synod in Constantinople which the emperor had granted at the demand of Eutyches, to verify the records of the former council. Here we find him disputing occasionally the exact accuracy of the "Acta" (Labbe, iv. 231 (2), c. 234 (2) B; Tillemont, xv. 511). In the same year he wrote to Leo a letter which produced two replies dated the same day, June 13, 449, the first of a long series of letters from Leo to Julian (Opp. xxxiv. xxxv.). The latter of the two contains an elaborate dogmatic statement against Eutyches. After this he becomes one of the chief channels through which the pope impresses his wishes and policy on the East (see LEO). Through the Eutychian troubles he remained true to the faith, and seems to have suffered so much in consequence that, as he tells Leo, he had thought of retiring to Rome (Ep. lxxxi. 1042). It was Julius of Puteoli, however (q. v.), not this Julian, who was papal legate at the council of Ephesus. Leo condoles with him on his sufferings, and commends him to the favour of Pulcheria and Anatolius of Constantinople as one who had always been faithful to St. Flavian (Opp. lxxix. lxxx. 1037, 1041, dated April 451). In June 451 he begs him to associate himself with his legates, Lucentius and Basil, to the council of Chalcedon (Ep. lxxvi. 1063). He is commended to Marcian, the emperor, as a "particeps" with them (Ep. xc. 1065). His exact position at that council appears somewhat ambiguous. He is not mentioned among the legates in the letter of Leo to the council (Ep. xciii. 1070), but in the acts of the council he is always spoken of as holding that position (Labbe, iv. 80 C, 582 C, 569 E). In the list of signatures he appears not indeed at the head of the list among the other legates of Rome, yet higher than his own rank, as bishop of Cos, would entitle him to appear, and among the metropolitans (cf. Tillemont, xv. 645, and note, 43). His condemnation of Dioscorus, with reasons assigned, may be read in the acts of the third session of the council (Labbe, iv. 427 C). In the matter of the claims of Bassian (q. v.) and Stephen to the see of Ephesus, he gives his voice first for setting them both aside, then for allowing the choice to a local council (701 D, 703 D). He displeased Leo by not resisting the 28th canon of the council in favour of the claims of Constantinople, like the other legates (Ep. xcvi. 1098); on the contrary, he had written to Leo begging him to give his assent to it, for which he receives a stern reproof (Ep. cvii. 1172). After this however, he is in as good favour as ever. From March, 453, he held the position of apocrisarius or deputy of the see of Rome at the court of Constantinople. Leo requests him never to leave the court, but to remain there watching zealously over the interests of the faith (Opp. cxi. 1187, cxiii. 1190, "speculari non desinas;" cf. Tillemont, xv. 761). During this period Leo and Julian were in constant correspondence. Sometimes Leo complains of his slackness in writing (Opp. cxv. cxlvij). In March, 453, he writes requesting him to make a complete translation of the acts of the council of Chalcedon, which he has not yet been able thoroughly to understand (Ep. cxiii. 1194). Julian seems to have returned to his diocese in 457 (cf. Tillemont, xvii. 762, 791). In that year he writes a reply, in his own name only, to the circular letter of the emperor Leo, on the subject of the excesses of Timothy Aelurus, and the authority of the Chalcedonian council [LEO, the emperor]. In his reply, Julian urges that Timotheus should be punished by the civil power, and maintains strongly the authority of the council. "For where were assembled so many bishops, where were present the holy Gospels, where was so much united prayer, there, we believe, was also present with invisible power the author of all creation" (Labbe, iv. 942; Or. Chr. i. 935). After this date nothing further is known of him. [C. G.]

JULIANUS (28), bishop of Bologna, cir. 470 (Alidosi, I summi Pontifici, 1621, p. 3). Ughelli (ii. 10) and Cappelletti (iii. 462, 579) place him in 490. [C. H.]

JULIANUS (29), bishop of Antioch, 471-476 A.D. He was unanimously chosen on the second expulsion of Peter the Fuller by the emperor

Leo, but was deposed by Basiliscus, and Peter reinstated, and is said to have died of grief soon afterwards. (Theophanes, Chron.; Theod. Lector. H. E. i. 22; Le Quien, Oriens. Christ. ii. 725.)

[E. V.]

JULIANUS (30), eighth bishop of Avignon, between Saturninus and Eucherius. He subscribed the council of Arles, A.D. 475, though the name of his see is not appended to the signature, and he may be the bishop represented at that of Agde in A.D. 506 by a priest named Pompeius. A short letter of Sidonius Apollinaris is addressed to a bishop of this name, who is probably the same. (Sid. Apoll. Ep. ix. 5, Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii. 620; Mansi, vii. 1010, viii. 337.)

[S. A. B.]

JULIANUS (31), bishop of Vararus, in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Vict. Vit. Notit. 58; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 347.)

[R. S. G.]

JULIANUS (32), bishop of Mopsuestia expelled by the emperor Zeno, A.D. 490. (Theoph. Chronogr. A. C. 482 in Patrol. Graec. cviii. 325; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 893.)

[J. de S.]

JULIANUS (33), ninth known bishop of Brundisium, cir. 490, after Cyprianus. A decretal of Galasius is addressed to him. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 29; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xxi. 115; Gratian. Decretum, pars 2, caus. 12, qu. 2, cap. 26, in Pat. Lat. clxxxvii. 907.)

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (34), bishop of Dodona in Epirus, signed the report of the synod of Vetus Epirus to pope Hormisdas concerning the ordination of John of Nicopolis, A.D. 516. (Mansi, viii. 405; Le Quien, Oriens. Christ. ii. 140.)

[L. D.]

JULIANUS (35), second recorded bishop of Carpentras. He subscribed the council of Epao or Yenne, in A.D. 517. A bishop of the name was also present at that of Lyons in the same year, the fourth of Arles in 524, that of Carpentras in 527, and the second of Orange in 529. To none of these four subscriptions is the name of the see appended, but the dates render it probable that they belong to this bishop. A short letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (ix. 5, Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii. 620), addressed "domino papae Juliano," has been thought to have been written to him, but there is no foundation for the supposition, which also involves the duration of his episcopate for at least forty-seven years. (Gall. Christ. i. 895; Mansi, viii. 565, 570, 627, 708, 718.)

[S. A. B.]

JULIANUS (36), bishop of Bostra in Arabia, and metropolitan. He was exiled by Athanasius on account of his strenuous opposition to the Monophysites, but was recalled by Justin, A.D. 518. (See Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 33; Vict. Tunun. Chron. ad ann. 505, Pat. Lat. lxviii. 950; Pratum Spirituale, cap. 94; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 857.)

[J. de S.]

JULIANUS (37), bishop of the Sabines, previously a papal defender. In the latter capacity he was sent by the pope to summon the abbat Equitius [EQUITIUS (?)] to Rome, but while engaged in that task he received a message from the pope, who is said to have been supernaturally warned, to desist from molesting the holy man (Greg. Dial. i. iv.). Baronius (ann. 504, xviii.) relates this story from Gregory under the year 504, which has led to the episcopate of Julian being assigned in the Ital. Sac. (x. 73) to that year. The chief episcopal see of the Sabines was then Cures (Marronus, de Episc. Sabiens. p. 3); Julian is therefore reckoned bishop of Cures, third in the series, and his date is reckoned by Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 559, 586) as A.D. 540. The ancient Cures has sometimes been identified (as by Coletus in Ital. Sac. l. c.) with Turris or Torre.

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (38), a Gallic bishop at the council of Arles, called the third by Isidore Mercator (Pat. Lat. cxxx. 482 D), but the fourth, A.D. 524, by Mansi (viii. 627) and Sirmond (i. 207).

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (39), bishop of Adramyttium in the province of Asia, c. A.D. 530-550, to whom Hypatius of Ephesus addressed a book, of which a fragment is extant. (Le Quien, Oriens. Christ. i. 701.)

JULIANUS (40), twenty-third archbishop of Vienne, succeeding St. Avitus, and followed by St. Dominus, was present at the second council of Orleans, held in 533 (Mansi, viii. 838 (Ado, Chronicon, 519; Id. Martyrologium, April 22; Gall. Christ. xvi. 23; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 29).

[S. A. B.]

JULIANUS (41), third bishop of Tarbes, present at the fourth council of Orleans in A.D. 541. (Mansi, ix. 120; Gall. Christ. i. 1226.)

[S. A. B.]

JULIANUS (42), third bishop of Segnio (Signia), joining pope Vigilius in the Damnatio Theodori, Aug. 551. (Mansi, ix. 60; Hefele, § 264; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1235; Cappelletti, vi. 617, 638.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (43), bishop of Cingoli. He was one of the nine Italian bishops who signed the Constitutum de Tribus Capitulis issued by pope Vigilius at Constantinople, May 14, 553. (Mansi, ix. 106; Marronus, Auximat. Episc. Series, p. 15; Ughelli, x. 65; Cappelletti, vii. 468, 604; Hefele, § 272.) He received two letters from Pelagius I. (555-560). (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. pp. 84, 86.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (44), the name of three bishops at the 5th synod, 553, viz. of Batnae in Osrhoëne (Mansi, ix. 394; Le Quien, ii. 974), of Zeugma in Commagene (M. ix. 394; Le Q. ii. 944), and of Sardis (M. ix. 390; Le Q. i. 862).

[L. D.]

JULIANUS (45), bishop of Eborā, in Lusitania, died in 566 (?). His name appears in an inscription given by Florez, Esp. Sagr. xiv. 120. Hubner, however, on the ground of certain unusual forms, is suspicious of its genuineness (Inserr. Hisp. Christ. p. 91). [QUIRICIANUS.]

[M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (46), third bishop of Grumentum (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 496). Cappelletti (xx. 381, 398) calls him Julius, and makes him the second bishop, from 578 to 590, between Sempronius and Rodolfus. A decree (wherein he is called Julianus) was addressed to him in 580 by pope Pelagius II. (Ivon. Decret. pars vi. cap. 112 in Pat. Lat. clxi. 472.)

[C. H.]

JULIANUS (47), bishop of Halicarnassus in the province of Caria, one of the leaders of the Monophysites. In 511, he was active in conjunction with Severus and others in instigating the emperor Anastasius to depose Macedonius the patriarch of Constantinople (Theod. Lect. ii. 26). Theophanes erroneously speaks of his having been bishop of Caria before he was bishop of Halicarnassus (Chronogr. A.C. 503, in Pat. Gr. cviii. 362). On the accession of Justin I. in 518, severe measures were taken against the Monophysites, and Julian was driven from his see. He then went to Alexandria, whither he was soon followed by Severus on his expulsion from Antioch (Liberatus, Brev. cap. 19; Evagrius H. E. iv. 4; Vict. Tunnunens. Chron. s. a. 539). Timotheus the successor of Dioscorus the younger received them both kindly, and they took up their abode in the neighbourhood of the city. Shortly afterwards a monk appealed to Severus for his opinion as to whether the body of our Lord should be called corruptible or not. He answered that the "fathers" had declared themselves in the affirmative on that question. Some of the Alexandrian hearing of this reply then proposed the same inquiry to Julian, who said that the "fathers" had declared the contrary. A fierce controversy was thus evoked, in the course of which the Julianists charged the Severians with being Phthartolatrae or Corrupticolae, Ktistolatrae or Creaticolae, and Scenolatrae; while the Severians charged the Julianists with being Phantasiastae and Manichaei (Liberatus, u. s.; Tim. Presb. de Recept. Haer. in Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. 58; Niceph. Call. E. H. xviii. 45). But the designation by which the Julianists were more generally known was Aphthartodocetae or Incorrupticolae (Jo. Damasc. de Haer. § 84). Much was written on either side. The only writings of Julian that remain however are his Ten Anathemas, a Syriac version of which by Paulus the deposed bishop of Callinicus was published by the Assemans (MSS. Cod. Biblioth. Apost. Vatic. Catalog. iii. 230, 231). A Latin translation of this valuable document is given by Gieseler in his admirable monograph entitled "Commentatio qua Monophysitarum veterum variae de Christi persona opiniones imprimis ex ipsorum effatis recens editis illustrantur" (P. ii. p. 5). Three of his letters addressed to Severus, also translated by Paulus, as well as several fragments of works of his, are among the Syrian MSS. in the British Museum (Wright, Catal. Syr. MSS. pt. ii. 554, 929, 960, 961, pt. iii. 1059). The Assemani also give three letters of his to Severus from the Syriac MSS. in the Vatican (u. s. iii. 223).

Leontius of Byzantium tells us that Julian so earnestly contended for the "Incorruptibility," because in his view the doctrine maintained by Severus made a distinction (διαφοράν) between the body of our Lord and the Word of God, to allow of which was to acknowledge two natures in Him (De Sect. Act. v. 3, in Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 1230). This explanation is also given by Theodoros Rhaituensis (De Incarnat., in Patr. Gr. xci. 1498), and is fully sustained, especially by the eighth Anathema as published by Gieseler. He was certainly no Phantasiast, and also far from being a Manichaeist; but as Dorner justly observes, in asserting "the supernatural character of our Lord's body," Julianus and his followers by no means intended to deny its "reality," but only aimed at "giving greater prominence to His love by tracing not merely His sufferings themselves, but even the possibility of suffering" to His Self-sacrifice (Person of Christ, ed. Clark, ii. i. 129). Jo. Damasc. Orth. Fid. iii. 28; Euseb. Thessal. contr. Andr.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 162; Thom. Aquin. Sum. p. iii. q. i. art. 5 concl.

Julian by some means recovered his see of Halicarnassus, but in the council of Constantinople A.D. 536 under Agapetus bishop of Rome, he was again deposed (Theophanes, s. a. 529; Mansi, viii. 869; Libell. Synod. in Labbe, v. 276). After this date he disappears, but his opinions continued to spread long afterwards, especially in the East; where his followers ultimately became divided among themselves, one party holding "that the body of our Lord was absolutely (κατὰ πάντα τρόπον) incorruptible from the very 'Unio' itself" (ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς ἐνώσεως); another, that it was not absolutely incorruptible but potentially (δυνάμει) the reverse, yet that it could not become corruptible because the Word prevented it, and a third that it was not only incorruptible from the very 'Unio,' but also increate (οὐ μόνον ἀφάρτον ἐξ αὐτῆς ἐνώσεως, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἄκτιστον). These last were distinguished as Actistitae. (Tim. Presb. u. s. 43; Leont. Byzant. contr. Nestor. et Eutych. ii. in Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 1315, 1358; Id. De Sect. act. x. ib. 1259; Anastas. Sinait. Viae Dux, c. 23, in Pat. Gr. lxxxix. 296; Isaac. Arm. Cath. Orat. contr. Armen. c. 1, in Pat. Gr. cxxxii. 1155; Id. De Reb. Arm. v. 1243.)

About A.D. 549, four scholastici from Alexandria visited Ephesus, and prevailed upon bishop Procopius to avow himself a Julianist. In 560 immediately after his decease, seven of his presbyters, who were also Julianists, are said to have placed the hands of his corpse on the head of a monk named Eutropius, and then to have recited the consecration prayer over him.<sup>b</sup> Eutropius afterwards ordained ten bishops who were all Julianists, and sent them out as missionaries east and west, among other places to Constantinople, to Antioch, and to Alexandria, and also into Syria, Persia, Mesopotamia, and the country of the Homerites (Asseman. Bibl. Or. i. 316, ii. 86, 88, iii. pt. ii. cccclv.; Wright, Catal. Syr. MSS. ii. 755).

By A.D. 565 the emperor Justinian had become an Incorruptibilist. He issued an edict in which he avowed his change of opinion, and gave orders that "all bishops everywhere" should be compelled to accept Julianism (Evagr. H. E. iv. 39; Theophanes, s. a. 557; Cedrenus, Comp. Hist. ed. Bonn. i. 680; Pagi, Critic. s. a. 565, ii.). This naturally encountered great opposition, and especially from, among others, Anastasius patriarch of Antioch in the East (A.D. 559, 569), and Nicetius bishop of Trèves in the West (A.D. 527-566). (Nicetius, ep. 2 in Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 380.) But the Gainites of Alexandria took courage from the edict to erect churches in that city, and elected Helpidius an archdeacon to be their bishop (Theophanes, u. s.). Helpidius having almost immediately incurred the displeasure of the emperor, and died on his way to Constantinople, whither he had been summoned by him, they then united with the Theodosians under Dorotheus, who, Theophanes says, was one of that party, but who both Sophronius of Jerusalem, and John of Ephesus, the latter of whom especially was likely to be much better informed than the Chronographer, say was a Julianist (Sophron. Ep. Symodic. in Patr. Gr. lxxxvii. 3191; Jo. v. Eph. Kirchengesch. uebers. v. Schönfelder, i. 40, p. 47). Justinian died in November of A.D. 565.

The Julianists were still numerous at Alexandria during the patriarchate of Eulogius (Phot. Bibl. cod. 227), and continued to be so still later. Sophronius of Jerusalem speaks of "Menas Alexandrinus, Gaianitarum propugnator" as his contemporary (u. s. 3194), and Anastasius Sinaita relates a public disputation with the Gaianites of that city in which he personally took part (Viae Dux, u. s. 150 and etseq.; COPTIC CHURCH). They were also not unknown in the West as lately as the commencement of the seventh century (Greg. I. Ep. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 68, ad Euseb. Thessal. in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. A.D. 601; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 145; Euseb. Thessal. u. s.). In Armenia they were very numerous in the time of Gregory Bar Hebraeus (Assemann. u. s. ii. 296; Dorner, u. s. 13 n.; art. ARMENIANS).

Julian also achieved a very high reputation as a commentator on the Scriptures. Nicetas bishop of Heraclea, c. 1077, has selected many of the most striking passages in his Catena Græcorum Patrum in Beatum Job, from his exegetical and other writings. This catena was first published by Patricius Junius, with a Latin translation, London, 1637, fol., and afterwards in Greek only at Venice, 1792, fol. The quotations from Julian are in the 'Proemium' and pp. 37, 45, 66, 93, 170, 178, 228, 230, 273, 437, 465, 480, 505, 539, 547-613, of the former of these editions. (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. ed. Harles, viii. 647, 650; Cave, i. 495; Ceillier, xi. 344.) [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (48), fifth patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites, the successor and previously the synecellus of Peter the younger in 591. He ruled three years and five months and was succeeded by Athanasius I. (Assem. Bibl. Or. ii. 333; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1360). Wright (Cat. Syr. MSS. ii. 942, 971) refers to some fragments of his works extant in Syriac. [C. H.]

JULIANUS (49), bishop of Tortosa, signed the acts of the third council of Toledo under Recared (A.D. 589). Another bishop of Tortosa, i. e. Froisclus, appears at the council, first in the list of Arian bishops who there publicly abjured Arianism, and secondly in the general list of signatures. The conclusion is that Julianus was the original Catholic bishop of Tortosa, that he was exiled under Leovigild and supplanted by the Arian Froisclus. (Certain other cases of a similar kind can be traced at the council; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. de la Iglesia Española, ii. 255.) After the conversion council Julianus and Froisclus appear as joint bishops of

JULIANUS (50), bishop of Lerida (?), subscribes the acts of the second council of Saragossa, (A.D. 592). (Esp. Sagr. xlii. 101 and vi. 358; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. ii. 128, 131.) [PETER.] [M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (51), bishop of Braga, subscribed the acts of the fourth and sixth councils of Toledo (A.D. 633, 638). (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 413; Esp. Sagr. xv. 135.) [PATERNUS.] [M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (52) II., twenty-fourth bishop of Bologna, between Constantine and Deusededit, before A.D. 640. (Alidosi, I summi Pontifici, p. 4; Ughelli, ii. 11; Cappelletti, iii. 470, 579.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (53), bishop of Ruspe, signed the letter of the Byzacene provincial council, A.D. 641. (Mansi, x. 927; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 266.) [R. S. G.]

JULIANUS (54), bishop of Torcello, 642 to c. 679. (Ughelli, v. 1363; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ix. 526.) [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (55), bishop of Duae Senempalae in Proconsular Africa, signed the letter addressed to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, by the council of the province, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 941; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 132.) [R. S. G.]

JULIANUS (56), bishop of Acci (Guadix) from about 647 to about 654. He subscribes the acts of the eighth council of Toledo under Rekesvinth (Dec. 653). (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Esp. Sagr. vii. 37.) [FELIX.] [M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (57), bishop of Orte (Horta), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 866; Ughelli, i. 735; Cappelletti, vi. 56, 70; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (58) II., fourth in the list of the bishops of Lescar, succeeding Savinus after an interval of nearly a century, or fifth if Salvius (A.D. 663) belonged to this see, which is doubtful. He is said to have been in occupation of the see about A.D. 680. No successor in the diocese is known for nearly three centuries. (Gall. Christ. i. 1286.) [S. A. B.]

JULIANUS (59), bishop of Consentia (Cosenza in Calabria), signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 299; Ughelli, ix. 190; Cappelletti, xxi. 287; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (60), bishop of Catana, at the synod of pope Agatho in 679. (Mansi, xi. 305; Pirro, Ital. Sac. i. 518.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (61), metropolitan of Seville, at the twelfth council of Toledo (A.D. 681). He has been thought by some to be a confusion with Julian of Toledo, but Florez believes him to be a distinct person. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270; Esp. Sagr. ix. 233.) [HONORATUS.] [M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (62), 37th bishop of Naples, c. 690, for seven years (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, pars i. 34, in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1373, p. 420; Ughelli, vi. 58; Cappelletti, xix. 398, 523). [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (63), bishop and metropolitan of Toledo from Jan. 29, 680, to March 6, 690. He is the last eminent churchman of West Gothic Spain, and, next to Isidore of Seville, perhaps the most eminent. Julian's mediæval reputation cannot indeed be compared with that of Isidore. The catastrophe of the Mussulman invasion, on which his life borders so closely, destroyed his work to a great extent and effaced the traces of his influence. Nevertheless the more closely the questions, external and internal of the West Gothic state are studied, the more important will an accurate knowledge of Julian's career and aims be found to be. And fortunately there is still considerable material existing from which it may be obtained. The following notice will be divided into four heads: I. Life; II. Work; III. Character and Aims; IV. Sources and Authorities.

I. Life.—According to ISIDORUS PACENSIS, the author of a curious and valuable chronicle, which breaks off in the year 759 A.D., Julian was of Jewish extraction. Isidorus adds, however, that he was born "a parentibus Christianis," possibly some of the compulsory and half-hearted converts of whom such frequent mention occurs in the melancholy Jew-laws of the Visigoths. Their son, however, seems to have thrown himself from the first, with the natural instinct of ambition, heart and soul into the career of a Catholic churchman. He was baptized in the principal church of the city, became a pupil of the well-known Eugenius II., and remained as deacon and presbyter attached to the cathedral church of Toledo. His early life was marked by a warm friendship for a fellow-deacon GUDILA, and the friends seem to have become zealous teachers in the episcopal school of Toledo. After the death of Ildefonsus, Julian appears to have been regarded as the most eminent churchman in Toledo. He was at one time the favourite literary agent of Wamba, whose panegyric he wrote in the Historia Wambæ, in or about the year 576, and the friend of ERVIG, Wamba's palatinus and subsequent supplanter, while he seems to have been on intimate terms with the more distinguished bishops, such as IDALIUS of Barcelona. When bishop Quiricus died in January 680, four months after the death of Gudila, it could have astonished no one that Julian should succeed to the vacant see of Toledo.

Accession of Ervig and C. Tol. XII.—In the following October occurred the mysterious palace-revolution which overthrew Wamba, and Julian found himself called upon in a document forced from the betrayed king to anoint his overthrower Ervig in his place. What was Julian's share in the conspiracy cannot be made out with certainty, but the fact of his old friendship with Ervig, coupled with his conduct at the twelfth council of Toledo, oblige us to conclude that his connivance had been secured by the conspirators, either before or during the plot. (See Acta, but especially can. I. Tejada y Ramiro, Col. de Can. de la Igl. Esp. ii. p. 457.) In taking this attitude towards Wamba, of whom he had been in earlier years the extravagant panegyrist, Julian was no doubt influenced, not only by the prevailing ecclesiastical dissatisfaction with the later church-policy of that king (conf. Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 215, and Helfferich, Westgoth. Recht, p. 140), but by a special and recent act of Wamba's, i.e. the creation by the king of a new bishopric in a suburb of Toledo itself, "hic in suburbio Toletano, in ecclesia praetoriensi SS. Petri et Pauli," a proceeding which the council of 680, led by Julian, calls a piece of "insolent licence." The holder of such a bishopric would indeed have been an inconvenient rival to Julian, and supposing the step to have been taken after this appointment in 680, it can scarcely have indicated anything less than open dissension between the king and his metropolitan.

Ervig's Jew-laws.—The history of the twelfth council in detail will be found elsewhere (see art. ERVIG). The points, however, with which he is personally most closely concerned are two. (1) the frightfully harsh Jew-laws presented to and approved by the council, (2) the "Primacy" canon. Of the twenty-eight laws of which the titles are quoted in the ninth canon of the council, the greater number are older laws revived and confirmed. Twenty-six of them relate to the nominally converted and baptized Jews, who had been obliged by former legislation to make a profession of Christianity, but who were still Jews at heart, and are only new so far as some of the penalties prescribed are concerned. The former punishments of stoning and burning alive are replaced by confiscations of goods, stripes, decalvation and exile, it having been found apparently impossible to secure the execution of the older penalties, while circumcision only is visited with severer punishment than before (Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, v. 163). For any apparent mildness however in these twenty-six laws as compared with more ancient ones, the provisions of the first two laws presented by Ervig to the council more than compensate. These two edicts, De blasphematoribus Sanctae Trinitatis, and Ne Judæi aut se aut famulos a baptismi gratia subtrahant, concern the unbaptized and obstinate Jews, and may fairly be considered as the work of Ervig and his metropolitan. It would be difficult to match them even in the history of religious persecution (see the text in Lex Visig. xii. 2, 3), and it is almost incredible that after measures like these, the seventeenth council of Toledo, held twelve years later, should still have found worse horrors to inflict on a people, whose cup of suffering was wellnigh drained, and whose avengers were fast approaching. Modern writers have commonly regarded the Jew-laws of Ervig as the price paid by the usurper for the church's co-operation in the plot against Wamba. It is at any rate impossible to exonerate Julian from a principal share in them. [Dahn, l. c. p. 218; Helfferich, Westgoth. Recht. p. 192; Graetz, l. c. p. 162. For an able and minute account of the general course of Visigothic legislation concerning the Jews see Dr. Graetz's dissertation, Die Westgothische Gesetzgebung in Betreff der Juden, im Programm des Jud.-theol. Seminar, 1858.]

The Primacy Canon.—By far the most important event, however, of the council of 681, both for the history of Julian and for that of the see of Toledo, was the promulgation of the famous sixth canon, the basis of the ancient, and practically also of the modern primacy, of Toledo. This, we may well suspect, was the special gerdon of Julian's compliance in the events of 680, and it raised the see of Toledo to a height undreamt of even by Ildefonsus or Eugenius II. The primacy canon first of all recites certain difficulties attending episcopal elections as they then existed. Owing to the long distances to be traversed, there was often, it was pleaded, great delay in announcing the deaths of bishops to the king, and it was sometimes found impossible to wait for the libera electio of the prince, theoretically necessary in all appointments to bishoprics (conf. Dahn, Könige der Germanen, vi. Verfassungsgeschichte, p. 402). By such a condition of things the church is embarrassed and the royal power infringed. "Unde placuit omnibus pontificibus Hispaniae atque Galliae (Galliae wanting in some MSS.) ut salvo privilegio unius cujusque provinciae licitum maneat deinceps Toletano pontifici quoscunque regalis potestas elegerit et jam dicti Toletani episcopi iudicium dignos esse probaverit in quibus libet provinciis in praecedentium sedium (? sedes) praeficere praesules et decedentibus episcopis eligere successores."

Upon this follows the proviso that every bishop so ordained must within three months present himself before the metropolitan of his province for instruction and advice under penalty of excommunication should he fail to do so, unless he can plead royal commands in excuse of his non-appearance.

Thus was the whole ancient system of episcopal appointments which had obtained in Spain, notwithstanding recurrent abuses, since the earliest times, and which had been recently defined and re-established as against certain royal usurpations by the fourth council of Toledo (can. 19) abolished at one blow. For election by clergy and people, consecration by metropolitan and suffragans and final confirmation by the king was now substituted a central authority empowered to appoint to bishoprics all over Spain, and from which there was practically no appeal. "The Spanish church was centralised in Toledo; the primate of Toledo had become her Pontifex Maximus, with limitless and uncontrolled power" (Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. [2] p. 217). By what steps within the church this situation, unexampled in the contemporary history of the time, had been attained, must always remain a mystery. At first sight it appears incredible that the five remaining metropolitans should have consented so easily to such a curtailment of their powers and privileges. It is, however, very possible, as Wamba's and Sisebut's, and even Recared's episcopal appointments suggest (see arts. EUSEBIUS of Tarraco, WAMBA, also C. Barc. ii. 3), that under the strong Gothic kings the right of appointment to bishoprics had, in spite of such protests as C. Tol. iv. 19, been so frequently usurped by the crown, that in this assignment of at least an equal share in the matter to the metropolitan of Toledo, the Gothic church may have calculated that she gained more than she lost—she formally relinquished the ancient constitution which had been so often infringed, and she won for herself in return a powerful protector and representative in the face of the civil power. At the thirteenth council, three years later, the bishops in the most emphatic language confirmed the primacy canon. The decrees of the twelfth council are to last to all eternity (ea ipsa gesta—omni temporum aeternitate valitura decernimus), and among them "item de concessa Toletano pontifici generalis synodi potestate ut episcopi alterius provinciae cum conviventia principum in urbe regia ordinentur." Such a position as this could only be sustained and established by men of like power with Julian, and it is extremely doubtful how far the pretensions of the primacy were supported by Julian's less able successors. Certain proceedings at the sixteenth council of Toledo under Egica seem indeed to be directly at variance with the spirit of the primacy canon (Helfferich, Enst. und Gesch. des Westgothen Rechts, p. 210). In the darkness and confusion of these closing years of the Gothic kingdom, it is, however, no longer possible to trace the history of the new-made primacy. Echoes and memories of it reappear in the church of the captivity, especially in the career of Elipandus, and all but four hundred years after the death of Julian, Rome restored to his successor, the Cluniac monk Bernard, the dignity which had been originally assumed independently of Rome and used in a spirit of hostility to her. "Teque, secundum quod ejusdem urbis antiquitas constat extitisse pontifices, in totis Hispaniarum regnis primatem, privilegii nostri sanctione statuimus," says Urban II. in 1088, thus re-establishing as a grace from Rome, and as a means of binding the Spanish church closer to the apostolical see, an office which the Spanish bishops had originally conferred upon the bishop of the capital, partly in deference to the influence of a man of genius, partly as a bulwark against the royal power, and which in the mind of its founder appears to have symbolised the independence of the national church (cont. Bull. of Urban II. Esp. Sagr. vi. app. 5, and Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, iii. [1] pp. 1-39).

The Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Councils of Toledo. Julian's Dispute with Rome.—In November 683 Julian again presided at the thirteenth council of Toledo, of which an account will be found under Ervig. Immediately after its separation, and when many of the bishops were already journeying homewards, a notary from Rome arrived at Toledo, bearing letters written by pope Leo II., and forwarded to Spain by his successor-elect, Benedict II. The letters, four in number, were addressed (1) to all the bishops (praesulibus) of Spain; (2) to Julian's predecessor, Quiricus, who died in January 680; (3) to the king Ervig; (4) to the comes Simplicius (Jaffé, Reg. Pontif. 168; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 297).

The letters were to ask for the adhesion of the Spanish church to the decisions of the sixth general council (680) against the Monothelites. The Spanish church, of which no member had been present at the fifth general council (553), had always steadily refused to recognise it as such, and Rome was anxious to prevent any further misunderstanding. The Spanish bishops therefore were asked to assemble a national council for the sake of receiving and ratifying the decrees of 680. [Why Quiricus was written to instead of Julian, who in 683 had been for nearly four years metropolitan of Toledo, must always remain a difficulty. Rival explanations of it will be found in Florez, Esp. Sagr. v. 276, and Gams (Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. (2) 231). Baronius made it a ground for doubting the authenticity of the letters.] To comply immediately with the pope's request was impossible. The bishops had already dispersed, and the icy weather and ground "hardened with immensity of snow," forbade their recall. Julian, however, promptly drew up a dogmatic statement of the position of the Spanish church towards the Christological controversy of the day and forwarded it to Rome. In November 684 a provincial synod of Carthaginensian bishops, attended also by representatives of the remaining provinces who were to communicate to their metropolitans, and through them to the other provincial synods, what was done, met at Toledo under the presidency of Julian. In the fifth canon the decrees of the sixth council are acknowledged by the bishops present, and by the representatives of the five absent metropolitans, as of equal authority with the decrees of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and the sixth and seventh canons order them to be placed in the Codex Canonum of the Spanish church immediately after the acts of Chalcedon, the fifth general council being thus formally repudiated. The eighth canon contains an exposition of the two natures in Christ; this with the ninth, De duarum naturarum Christi voluntatibus et operibus, and the tenth: De haereticorum contentionebus evitandis, are in all probability excerpts from the first Apologetic of Julian, which had been forwarded to Rome early in 684, and which in the eleventh canon receives the formal approbation of the bishops.

In this noteworthy canon the "apologetica responsa defensionis nostrae" are not only approved, but are placed in the same position as decretal letters: "atque ad vicem decretalium epistolarum ea permanenda sancimus," a step of which Gams (l. c. p. 233) rightly points out the significance, and which is the first of many indications of the attitude assumed by Julian, and by the Spanish church, as led by him towards Rome. The matter however did not end here. In 686 apparently pope Benedict allowed himself some critical observations affecting the orthodoxy of Julian's apologetic of 684, which were taken down by Julian's envoy at Rome, and forwarded to Julian. Julian immediately sent an answer fortifying his position with quotations from the fathers, but not content with this he brought the whole matter once more before the fifteenth council of Toledo in 688. After a description of his transactions with Rome, in which the exact order of events is very hard to apprehend, he proceeds to justify two main theses: "voluntas genuit voluntatem et sapientia sapientiam;" and "tres substantiae in Christo sunt profitendae," both of which had been laid down in his first Apologetic, and to which the pope had taken objection as "incautiously" expressed. The pope's objections are declared to spring from hasty and careless reading of the first Apologetic, and Julian proceeds to quote largely from Cyril and Augustine in support of his own doctrine. This second document of Julian's is called by Felix "Apologeticum de tribus (? quartis) capitulis, de quibus Romanae urbis Praesul frustra visus est dubitasse," and is only partially preserved to us in the acts of the council of 688. The sections on the theses already quoted, and which refer to the first two chapters of the former Apologetic, are given apparently in full, but the arguments on the third and fourth chapters of the former document are wanting. We have only a final paragraph referring to them, and claiming paramount authority for the statements of the "celebrated doctors," Saints Ambrose and Fulgentius, quoted in support of them. All these quotations from the fathers had, says Julian, been forwarded to Rome two years before. If, however, objection is still made to their doctrine, on which the first Apologetic is based, "let us dispute with them (i. e. the pope and his advisers) no more, but rather adhering closely to the straight road of our ancestors, "erit per divinum iudicium amatoribus veritatis responsio nostra sublimis, etiamsi ab ignorantibus aemulis censeatur indocilis."

The history of opinion as to this attitude assumed by Julian in this second Apologetic, and on its concluding words, is not a little curious. Isid. Pacensis, writing fifty or sixty years after the death of Julian, says of the arrival of the second Apologetic at Rome: "quod Roma digne et pie suscepit et cunctis legendum indicit: atque summo Imperatori cognitum facit. Qui et rescriptum Domino Juliano per supra fatos Legatos satis cum gratiarum actione honorifice remittit et omnia quaecumque scripsit justa et pia esse depromit." Julian's 13th-century successor, Roderic of Toledo, repeats Isidore's words with emphasis (De Reb. Hisp. iii. 14). Mariana and Baronius first make some objections to the cavalier tone of the 2nd Apologetic, while Florez, applies all the disrespectful expressions in it, not to the pope, but to certain "Romans," regarding it as "inconceivable" that Julian should have spoken of the pope as an "ignorant rival." The Bollandists (AA. SS. Mart. i. p. 784) and others pass over the questionable expressions in silence. A modern Roman opinion on the subject will be found below under our third head.

Julian's Death.—On March 6, 690, two years after the fifteenth council of Toledo, Julian died, having occupied the see ten years and one month. He was buried in the church of St. Leocadia, where his predecessors Engenius III. and Ildefonus were already interred.

II. Works.—Of Julian's works a full list is given by his biographer Felix. The best edition of Julian's works is that by archbishop Lorenzana in vol. ii. of the SS. PP. Tol. Opp. already quoted. Lorenzana's edition is reprinted in Migne's Patr. Lat. xcvi. For a list of editions see Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. 1858, iii. 477. The most important of them appear to have been—

(1) Liber Prognosticorum futuri saeculi.—This book, addressed to IDALIUS of Barcelona, must have won considerable popularity to judge from the numerous MSS. of it which exist. It is divided into three books, concerned (1) with the origin of death, (2) with the souls of the dead and their condition before the resurrection of the body, (3) the final resurrection of the body. The preface addressed to Idalius is a good specimen of Julian's style, and contains some interesting personal reminiscences (conf. SS. PP. Tolet. Opp. ii. 3, and Helfferich, Westgothischer Arianismus, p. 74).

(2) Apologeticum fidei quod Benedicto Romanæ urbis Papæ directum est. This is the first Apologetic, not now extant, unless we are to consider canons 9, 10, and 11 of C. Tol. xiv. as fragments of it.

(3) Apologeticum de tribus capitulis, already described, printed by Lorenzana, ii. 77, and in all editions of the Spanish councils, among the acts of G. Tol. xv. This was, among his contemporaries, the most famous of all Julian's works, no doubt on account of the dispute with Rome which it involved.

(4) Liber de sextae aetatis comprobatione, prefaced by an oration and letter to king Ervig. This is an important controversial treatise. It makes one of a series of Spanish pamphlets, of which Isidore's Contra Judæos, and most probably the De Virginitate Sanctae Mariae contra tres infideles of ILDEFONSUS (q. v.), are other examples. A critical and explanatory account of the subject-matter will be found in Graetz's Geschichte der Juden, v. 160, seq.

(5) Liber Carminum, like those of Ildefonsus now lost, notwithstanding the ingenious efforts of the "false chroniclers" to replace them. (SS. PP. Tol. Opp. ii. 389; Nicolas Antonio, Bibl. Vet. v. 7, 401.)

(6 and 7) Liber Epistolarum and Liber Sermorum, both, alas! lost.

(8) Liber Antekimenon, or de Contrariis, a series of harmonizations of apparently contradictory passages in Scripture. Julian's authorship of it is proved by a quotation from it under his name, which occurs in the Apologetic of abbat Samson, of Cordova (810-890), lib. ii. cap. 24, apud Esp. Sagr. xi. (SS. PP. Toll. Opp. ii. 139-265).

(11) Liber Historiae de eo quod Wambæ Principis Tempore Gallis Exiit Gestum.—This is the most generally known, and by far the most valuable of all Julian's writings. Its style and literary form would alone make it a remarkable piece of writing for its time; but it has also independent historical value to a high degree in spite of its rhetorical air and unmistakable partisanship. Opening with an account of Wamba's election and of his unction at the hands of bishop Quiricus, of Toledo, it gives a minute description of the rising in Gallia Narbonensis which, immediately after his accession, threatened the new king's throne, and which was only suppressed after a six months' campaign (Dahn, v. 206-212). Attached to it in most of the MSS., also under Julian's name, is found the Judicium in tyrannorum perfidia promulgatum, apparently the official document drawn up by Julian, as the most distinguished writer and rhetorician of Toledo, on the king's return to the capital, in which the crimes and sentences of the rebels are carefully enumerated and confirmed. The whole object of the Historia is to glorify Wamba, and this end is pursued with a self-denial and consistency very rare in Julian's age. Six other treatises named by Felix, but not now extant, are of no importance. The last two entries, however, in Felix's list are worth notice. "Item librum Missarum de toto circulo anni in quatuor partes divisum; in quibus aliquas vetustatis incuria vitiatas ac semiplenas emendavit atque complevit; aliquas vero ex toto composuit. Item librum orationum de festivitatibus quas Toletana Ecclesia per totum circulum anni est solita celebrare, partim stylo sui ingenii depromptum, partim correctum, in unum congestit, atque Ecclesiae Dei usibus ob amorem reliquit Sanctae Religionis." In this passage lies the proof, too often overlooked, of the important part played by Julian in the history of the Mozarabic Liturgy. From him, and not from Isidore or Leander, the Toledan missal and breviary received their final shape under the Goths. He completed the work to which Eugenius and Ildefonsus had also largely contributed. It was his redaction of the Toledan missal which under the captivity became the nucleus of the Missale Mixtum (Lesley, Prefatio in Missale Mixtum, &c. Rome, 1755, p. lxxvi.), and was carried northwards into the infant kingdom of Asturias (l. c. note a), and in spite of later additions Julian's breviary is practically what we now know as the Mozarabic Breviary. Not Seville but Toledo was the parent of the Gothic liturgy as we have it; and if the name of any one man is to be attached to the Mozarabic liturgy, which was the work of many men and different centuries, not Isidore but Julian may best claim such a distinction. (Conf. Lesley, l. c. lxxv.; Aguirre, iii. 105; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. [2] 177, 185, 209; Florez, España Sagrada, iii. 262.)

Of Julian's genuine works only the Vita Ildefonsi remains. This with the life of Julian by Felix is commonly found attached to the De Viris Illustribus of Isidore and Ildefonsus, and was meant as supplementary to the work of Ildefonsus (Esp. Sagr. v. 482).

The supposititious works of Julian, such as the Chronica Regum Visigothorum and the Carmina, written for him by the literary forgers of the 16th century, will be found in Lorenzana (l. c. p. 385).

III. Julian's Character and Aims.—That Julian was a man of very great ability, and of singular force of will, is evident from his whole career. As the last and, next to Isidore, the greatest representative of a whole phase of Spanish culture, his life and writings assume a peculiar interest and importance. As an author he stands for his age very high. He is greatly superior to the industrious Isidore in literary skill. His history of Wamba, according to Ebert, testifies to the existence of a far higher type of classical culture in Spain in the 7th century than in France, where FREDEGAR is no match for Julian (Geschichte der Christ. Lat. Literatur von ihren Anfängen bis zum Zeitalter Karls des Grossen, Leipzig, 1874, p. 571).

As a statesman and a theologian his impression upon his time and country was very great, as is shewn by the extravagant praise of Felix and Isidorus Pachensis. Under Wamba and before he became bishop, his influence appears to have been considerable, while under Ervig he practically ruled Spain, and his power remained undiminished under Egica. (See Helfferich, Westgoth. Recht, 196). Of his literary and theological influence over the Spanish churchmen of his own day on both sides of the Pyrenees, and the letters of IDALIUS of Barcelona to him and to Sunifredus metropolitan of Narbonne (Esp. Sagr. xxix. 447) and the whole history of the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth councils of Toledo are a sufficient proof. There is, however, nothing in Julian's career to catch the popular imagination, and as a saint he has been throughout overshadowed and surpassed by the legendary glories of Ildefonsus. (On the correct date of Julian's death, see Florez, v. 306.)

Julian's aims appear to have been the aggrandizement of the national church and of Toledo as its head, bringing with it, as a necessary consequence, independence of all authority from without. His life was ruled by centralising and imperialist ideas, and his great mistake, according to Helfferich, lay in supposing his time and country ripe for the development of such views, and in believing the Teutonic and Roman elements within the Peninsula to be sufficiently fused to permit of the remodelling of the state on Byzantine principles (Westgothischer Arianismus, p. 73). His attitude towards Rome, though to some extent it is only typical of the whole tendency of 7th-century Spain, is still one of singular boldness, almost of insolence, and should be compared with the tone of earlier times, of IDATIUS, of the bishops of the first council of Toledo, or of the Gallician bishops under the influence of Martin of Braga just a hundred years before. Not Benedict II.'s letters of 683, but Julian's answers to them, were incorporated with the Spanish Codex Canonum. The non-Roman student will, however, probably regard Julian's share in the conspiracy against Wamba, his early patron and hero, and his persecution of the Jews, as darker stains upon his memory than his insubordination towards Rome. The Jew laws of the twelfth council for which he and Ervig are responsible, brought indeed a Nemesis with them. They led directly to the Jewish conspiracy discovered under EGICA (see art.), and ultimately to that Jewish co-operation with the Mussulman invaders which was everywhere fatal to the success of the Gothic resistance. Twenty-one years after Julian's death, the battle of the Guadalete was lost and the Gothic state overthrown. The sombre figure of the intriguing and persecuting bishop makes a close full of meaning and admonition to the history of that Hispano-Gothic church, in which much personal virtue and a high degree of literary civilisation were overshadowed and finally stifled by the growth of the worst evils that can assail an ecclesiastical system.

Concluding Notes.—(1) On the confusions of Julian with the African Julianus Pomerius, or with a supposed Julianus Diaconus, conf. Florez, l. c. p. 299. (2) On the question how did Toledo become the ecclesiastical head of Carthaginensis, see MONTANUS.

IV. Sources.—Our knowledge of Julian's life is derived mainly from the biography of him by his successor Felix, which, like Julian's own life of ILDEFONSUS, is found attached to the De Viris Illustribus of Isidore and Ildefonsus. It is written in a tone of warm panegyric, and supplies little or no biographical matter for the period of Julian's pontificate, but the details as to Julian's works are minute and trustworthy, and the account of his earlier life comparatively full. Altogether it is a valuable piece of 7th-century biography. Certain particulars not given by Felix, notably the fact of Julian's Jewish parentage, are to be gleaned from the 8th-century chronicler ISIDORUS PACENSIS (Esp. Sagr. viii.), while for a right understanding of Julian's career and aims the Acts of the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th councils of Toledo are of course indispensable (Aguirre-Catalani, iii., or Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. de la Igl. Esp. ii.).

Authorities.—Dahn, Helfferich, Gams, Graetz, Ebert, Lorenzana, Nicolas Antonio, Lex Visig. as quoted. For notices of editions of the separate works, Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. [1754] iii. should be consulted, and on the Hist. Wamb. Potthast, Bibl. Hist. p. 405, also the separate introduction in Lorenzana. [M. A. W.]

JULIANUS (64), surnamed ROMANUS, mis-called John II. by Elmacinus, eleventh patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites (687–708). (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1364; Assem. B. O. ii. 479.) In 688 he received Simon the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria into communion with his church (Renaudot, Patriarch. Alex. p. 180). In 706 he assembled a council at the monastery of Mar Silas, at which Thomas bishop of Amida and James bishop of Edessa were present (B. O. i. 468; Ceillier, xii. 101). The Chronicle of Dionysius (B. O. ii. 105) places his accession in A.D. 704. Julian induced the Jacobite church of Tagrit to terminate its schism and return to communion with his see (ii. 430). [W. M. S.]

JULIANUS (65), bishop of Piacenza, c. 780. (Ughelli, Italia Sacra, ii. 199, 200; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 16–18.) [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (66), the name of a presbyter and likewise of a subdeacon who both assisted St. Cyprian at his martyrdom, according to the Acta Proconsularia, by fastening the bandage before his eyes. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 218; Tillem. Mém. iv. 182.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (67), presbyter of Cordova at the council of Elvira, cir. 305. (Mansi, ii. 108 c.) [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (68), of Carthage, designated by Orosius, in his preface addressed to Augustine (Pat. Lat. xxxi. 667), as the holy son of Augustine and a servant of God, i.e. Augustine's deacon. It was at the instance of Julian, who was apparently acting under Augustine's direction, that Orosius undertook his history. [C. H.]

JULIANUS (69), a deacon of Aquileia, known to us by a letter to him from St. Jerome (Ep. 6, ed. Vall.). He had been the means of restoring Jerome's young sister, who had fallen into unchastity. [W. H. F.]

JULIANUS (70), presbyter of St. Anastasia at Rome, to whom Dionysius Exiguus dedicated his collection of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs. (Dionys. Exig. Collect. Decret. Pontif. Rom. praef. in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 231.) He occurs among the presbyters present at the Roman synod of pope Symmachus in 501. (Mansi, viii. 236, 237.) [W. M. S.]

JULIANUS (71), deacon, sent by Avitus bishop of Vienne to pope Symmachus, about A.D. 494, to ask for additional relics for the Burgundian king Sigismund. (Avit. Viennens. Ep. 27 in Patr. Lat. lix. 243.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS, deacon at Gaudianum [JULIUS (17).]

JULIANUS (72) POMERIUS, a Mauretanian priest cir. A.D. 500. He was ordained in Gaul, but continued as a priest the monastic life on which he had previously entered. Ruricius (lib. ii. ep. 8) calls him abbat, but does not say of what monastery. He lived at Arles under the patronage of Aeonius, whence Ruricius tried to draw him to Limoges (Ruric. Lemovic. Ep. ix. in Pat. Lat. lviii. 88). He composed (Isid. de Script. Eccl. xii.; Gennadius, Ser. Eccl. cviii.) a work on the "Nature of the Soul" in eight books, and others upon "Contempt of the World," "Virtues and Vices," and the "Training of Virgins." These are lost. But the three extant books on the "Contemplative Life," formerly attributed to St. Prosper, are really from the pen of Julianus Pomerius (Julian. Pom. de Vit. Cont. in Pat. Lat. lix. 415). They are addressed to another Julian, bishop probably of Carpentras. This work has been frequently printed under the name of Prosper, and is given in the appendix to his works, Venice, fol. 1744, 4to. 1782. We have a letter from Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, asking of Julian certain explanations, and suggesting subjects for treatises, but no reply is extant. Gennadius (Ser. Eccl. xcvi.) speaks of Julianus as still writing. (Cave, i. 460; Ceillier, Aut. Sac. x. 588.) [R. T. S.]

JULIANUS (73), missionary priest to the Nubians in the reign of Justinian. John of Ephesus (R. Payne Smith's tr. p. 251 sq.) and Bar-hebraeus (in Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 330) give an account of him. He was an old man of great worth, and one of the clergy in attendance on Theodosius the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, then residing at Constantinople. Julian had long desired to Christianize the Nobadae or Nubians, a wandering people east of the Thebais and beyond the limits of the empire, which they greatly harassed. The empress Theodora to whom he applied warmly encouraged the undertaking, and consulted Justinian about it. He too became interested, but objected to Julian as being a Monophysite, and named another instead of him, whilst Theodora persisted in favouring her candidate. John of Ephesus gives a full description of the rival missions, and the triumph of the empress's schemes. Julian being the first to reach the Nubian court won over the king, and secured the rejection of the emperor's envoy when he subsequently arrived. Thus the Nubians were gained to the Monophysite creed and to the jurisdiction of Theodosius. After labouring in the country two years Julian placed Theodore a Thebaid bishop in charge, and returned to Constantinople, where he soon afterwards died. For the subsequent history of this mission see LONGINUS. [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (74), presbyter of Halicarnassus, representing his bishop Calandio at the council of Chalcedon in 451. (Mansi, vi. 947, 1088, vii. 46, 121, 407, 947.) [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (75), martyr with the presbyters Lucianus and Maximianus at Beluacus (Beauvais); commemorated Jan. 8. (Usuard. Mart.; Rom. Mart.; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. praef. p. xxiii.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (76), Jan. 27, martyr at Sora or Atina, in the reign of Antoninus Pius. His Acta are given by the Bollandists from an Italian manuscript of Barth Chioccarelli. The Roman Martyrology places his martyrdom at Sora. Sora and Atina, two ancient Volscian cities, both commemorate him and both claim to have been the scene of his martyrdom. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 767.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (77), Feb. 3, martyr at Auxerre, a disciple of St. Peregrinus, the apostle and protomartyr of Auxerre in the times of the emperors Valerian and Gallienus. (Du Saussay, Mart. Gallic. suppl. p. 1086; Acta SS. Feb. i. 331.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (78), Feb. 6, physician and martyr of Emesa, in the reign of Numerian. (Basil. Menol. ii. 163; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 778.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (79), Feb. 16, martyr in Egypt with five thousand others (Mart. Adon., Usuard., Rom.; Basil. Menol.). There is a suggested reading which substitutes for quinque millibus, quinque militibus, and thus brings this martyrdom within the bounds of possibility. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 863.) [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (80), Feb. 19, martyr in Africa with Publius. (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (81), Feb. 27, martyr at Alexandria in the Decian persecution, A.D. 249-251. His martyrdom is described in the epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria to Fabius of Antioch, describing the martyrs there. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 41; Mart. Ad., Us.) [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (82), March 7. Martyr with Eubulus in Cyprus in the persecution of Julian. (Bas. Men., Mar. 7 and 8; AA. SS. Boll. 6 Mart. i. 426.) [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (83), Mar. 16, martyr. He was a native of Anazarbus in Cilicia, and the son of a Greek senator. Julian was enclosed in a sack with venomous serpents and thrown into the sea. His body floated to Alexandria, where it was buried by a widow (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). The Alexandria here mentioned would be the Cilician town of that name. The Bollandists (Mart. ii. 421) give this Julian as the one celebrated by Chrysostom in his homily On St. Julian the Martyr (Migne, Pat. Gr. t. l. p. 666). Chrysostom states that his relics were then at Antioch (§ 4, p. 671). [JULIANUS (67), (88).] [C. H.]

JULIANUS (84), Mar. 23, martyr at Caesarea. (Mart. Usuard., Wandalb., Rom.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (85), May 25, a martyr in Africa A.D. 259, with Flavianus, and six others. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 229; Baron. ann. 262, v.) [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (86), Jun. 5, martyr at Perusia with Florentius and others in the Decian persecution, according to the ecclesiastical tables. (Baron. ann. 254, xxix.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 33.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (87), Jan. 9, Jun. 21, martyr in Egypt in the reign of Diocletian (Basil. Menol. iii. 138). There is a different version of this martyrdom in Usuard and Ado. The Acta in Bolland (9 Jan. i. cap. iv. § 17, p. 579) place the martyrdom at an Antioch in Egypt; the Menol. Graec. of Sirlet names the city Antinopolis, and states that this was the Julian celebrated in Chrysostom's homily [JULIANUS (83)]. Bolland's article (l. c.) discusses the various Julians (§ ii.) and the days assigned to the present one (§§ iii. iv. v.), as to which see also Ruinart (Acta Sinc. p. 541). The Cal. Byzant. has a Julian of Tarsus under June 21. There was a church at Constantinople dedicated to SS. Julian and Basilissa. (Du Cange, Cpolis. Chr. lib. iv. pp. 86, 87, ed. 1729.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (88) ISTRICUS, June 22, a martyr in the reign of Decius, commemorated at Ariminum (Rimini). His Acta, edited with notes by Papebroch, are given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jun. iv. 140) from a manuscript of the Jesuit college of Rimini. The story is parallel with that of Julian of March 16, but with altered names and in a grossly legendary form. [JULIANUS (83).] [C. H.]

JULIANUS (89), June 27. Reputed martyr at Tiburtina in Italy, under Adrian, with Getulius his father, Symphorosa his mother, and his six brethren—Cereceus, Nemesius, Primitivus, Justinus, Stacteus, and Eugenius. After death they were cast into a deep pit, to which the heathen gave the name "Ad Septem Biothanatos." The title Biothanati was applied by them to the Christians from the readiness with which they surrendered themselves to death. (Mart. Ad., Us.; Tertullian, de Anima, c. lvii.) [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (90), July 20, martyr with Sabinus and fourteen others at Damascus. (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Rom.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (91), Aug. 7, martyr at Rome with Peter and eighteen others (Mart. Usuard.; Mart. Rom.). According to the Vet. Rom. Mart. and Ado the name is Juliana. [C. H.]

JULIANUS (92), martyr for image-worship, with several companions, including Maria Patricia, under the emperor Leo Isaurus, at Constantinople, commemorated on Aug. 9. (Basil. Menol. iii. 199; Menol. Graec. Sirlet; Baron. A. E. ann. 726, xiii.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (93), martyr with Macharius in Syria; commemorated Aug. 12 (Usuard. Mart.; Notker, Mart.). Notker places the martyrdom "in vico Magarito," and on the same day gives another Julian, placing him in "Historia" which may be Istria. [JULIANUS (83).] [C. H.]

JULIANUS (94), Aug. 28. Martyr of great celebrity at Brivas (Brioude on the Allier) in Auvergne, in the Diocletian persecution. He belonged originally to the city of Vienne, where he was a disciple of St. Ferreolus. [FERREOLUS.] St. Gregory of Tours occupies the whole of the fifty chapters of his second book De Glor. Mart. with setting forth his miracles. (Mart. Ad., Us.; Till. Mém. v. 279, 696; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 169; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 462.) He is mentioned by Venantius Fortunatus (Miscell. viii. 6), "Julianum Arvernus abundans." Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Auvergne, speaks of "the head of our Julian" (Epp. vii. 1), and refers to him again in Carm. xxiv. [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (95), martyr with Theodorus, Oceanus, and Amianus in the reign of Maximian, and commemorated on Sept. 4. (Basil. Menol. i. 13; Menol. Graec. Sirlet, Sept. 4, Sept. 9; Baron. A. E. ann. 308, xxvii.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (96), saint and martyr, was a priest of Ancyra in Galatia, during the persecution by Licinius in the beginning of the 4th century. He is commemorated on Sept. 13. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 54; Baron. Annales, A. D. 316, 53; Martyrol. Rom. Sept. 13; Basil. Menolog. i. 36.) [I. G. S.]

JULIANUS (97), Nov. 1, presbyter, martyr with Caesarius a deacon at Terracina. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (98), Feb. 16 (Basil. Men.), one of the twelve who were martyred with Pamphilus at Caesarea in Palestine. (Euseb. Mart. Pal. cap. 11, pp. 340, 341; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. iii. 13.) [ESAIAS (1).] [C. H.]

JULIANUS (99), one of the two Roman prefects who gave order for sending back to Africa the Donatists who had come into Gaul on the matter of Caecilianus, A. D. 315. (Aug. Excerpt. de Don. vol. ix. p. 790; Mon. Vet. Don. no. 21, p. 211, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (100), a gentleman of good birth and Christian parentage, a fellow-student with Basil and Gregory Nazianzen at Athens. He subsequently became commissioner of taxes at Nazianzus, and Gregory Nazianzen availed himself of their former intimacy to plead for the remission of the taxes of the clergy, and of the poorer parts of the population. All these requests were acceded to. (Greg. Naz. Orat. 9, 17; Epp. 167, 168, Carm. 49. See also Ep. 166.) [E. V.]

JULIANUS (101), an intimate friend of Basil. (Basil. Epist. 21 [373]; Ibid. 293 [266].) [E. V.]

JULIANUS (102), count of the East, previously viceroy of Egypt. Much of his civil history will be found referred to in the prosopopoea of Gothofred's Codex Theodosianus. He is called the uncle of the emperor Julian, and is said to have apostatized with him (vid. Passio of the martyr Theodore of Antioch in Mabillon's Vetera Analecta, t. iv. p. 187, ed. 1723, and in Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 588). His parentage is not stated. He was deputed by the Alexandrians to intercede for their pardon after the murder of the Arian patriarch George in 361 [GEORGIUS (4)], and succeeded in his mission. When the emperor made his systematic attack on the Antiochene church, Julian was appointed with two fellow-apostates Felix [FELIX (231)] and Elpidius [ELPIDIUS (36)] to shut up the cathedral and confiscate its sacred treasures (Theod. H. E. iii. 8 al. 12 al. 11). In this commission he acted with great zeal, impiety, and cruelty (Sozom. v. 8). In Oct. 362 he was seized with a dreadful internal complaint, under which he repented of his apostasy, and besought the prayers of his wife, who had remained a Christian. See Theodoret (iii. 9, al. 13). He died in Jan. or Feb. 363. The following modern authors may be consulted, Le Beau (Bas Empire, iii. 20, ed. Saint Martin), Rendall (Emperor Julian, p. 202). [G. T. S.]

JULIANUS (103), FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, the emperor, often called Julian the Apostate. He was born A.D. 331; appointed Caesar, Nov. 6, 355; proclaimed Augustus, April 360; succeeded Constantius as sole emperor, Nov. 3, 361; died in Persia, June 27, 363.

I. Authorities. A. Ancient. B. Modern. C. Julian's works, editions, and translations. D. List of his writings in chronological order (p. 488).

The authorities for the life of this remarkable man are peculiarly interesting and varied, as well as very much fuller than is ordinarily the case. Many of them are contemporaneous, and what is more, credible and outspoken witnesses. His own works, especially the epistles, the manifesto to the Athenians and the Misopogon, are largely autobiographic. Next we have the testimony of friends, near and distant, of various shades of opinion, and representing different points of view. We have the literary rhetorician, Libanius, the unenthusiastic soldier-historian Ammianus, the superstitious sophist Eunapius, not to mention Eutropius and Victor. On the other hand we have the powerful witness of St. Gregory Nazianzen, who was personally acquainted with Julian and of the same age, and the looser invectives of St. Chrysostom. All these were capable of forming an independent opinion from different sides, and if we read their writings by the light of Julian's own, there is little difficulty in framing one picture out of them. The superiority of the sources for the life of Julian is felt at once if we compare them with those for that of Constantine. There we have flat contradictions and reticent witnesses, out of whom we have to construct what is after all in some important respects only a probable and conjectural narrative. In the life of Julian there are of course some doubtful points, as there are in the life of a man who died yesterday, but he lives before us in almost as clear a light as one whom we have ourselves seen and known.

The following is a list of the more important authorities; a full catalogue would occupy a volume. A good deal of information will be found in J. F. A. Mücke, Julianus nach den Quellen, with additions in Rode, Die Reaction Julians, and Rendall's Hulsean Essay. In some respects Hoffmann's Bibliographisches Lexicon, Leipzig, 1838, and Oettinger's Bibliographie Bibliographique, Bruxelles, 1854, are still the most complete repertories.

A. Ancient Authors, Heathen.—The most important is certainly AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, books xv.—xxv.

This historian served in Julian's campaign against Persia (xxiii. 5, 7). He greatly admired him, but takes occasion frequently to criticise his conduct. Julian, in fact, was far too enthusiastic for most of the heathens of his time. Ammianus blames him in the following passages :

xvi. 7, 6; xx. 8, 18; xxi. 2, 4, 5; 10, 7, 8; xxii. 3, 7–9; 7, 3; 9, 1; 10, 6, 7; 12, 6, 7; 14, 1, 2; xxiii. 1, 2; xxiv. 7, 3, 8; xxv. 4, 16–21 (given by Mücke, part 2, p. 329). This shews his fairness; but he is not infallible. He naturally omits details of church history, and judges only from the outside.

Next comes LIBANIUS. The following are the most important of his orations for our subject: Prophneticus, an address on Julian's entrance into Antioch, July 362; Pro Aristophane, Nov. or Dec. 362; ad Julianum consulens, Jan. 1, 363; Legatio ad Jul. and de Ira Juliani, March to June 363, written during the Persian war; Monodia in Julianum and Epitaphius written after his death—the former delivered at once, the latter, according to Sievers, not till five or six years later (Libanius, p. 132). All these, together with his autobiography de fortuna sua, are in the first volume of Reiske's edition, Altenburg, 1791–97, 4 vols. 8vo. Of these the Epitaphius, by itself, almost a biography, of course with a particular tendency. The second volume contains a monody on Nicomedia, and a monody on the Burning of the Temple in Daphne, neither of which gives us many facts, and περὶ τῆς τιμωρίας Ἰουλιανοῦ addressed to Theodosius, and urging the prosecution of the supposed murderer of Julian, whom he calls Taienus, if the reading is right (p. 32). Libanius is more indiscriminating in his praise than Ammianus, but, though a strong partisan, he was neither a fanatical heathen nor a mere flatterer.

The letters of Libanius to Julian bear the following numbers in Wolf's edition: 33, 224, 372, 525, 586, 591, 602, 670, 712, 722, 1035, 1125, 1394, 1490, and 3, 14 of those in Latin only.

The following are the most important: 33, written after the earthquake at Nicomedia Aug. 358, congratulating him on his victories over the barbarians (mentioning Julian's 'commentaries' which recorded them), and the improvement effected in the character of Elpidius; and 372, opening in somewhat the same way, with congratulations on his oratory, suggests reasons why he had not bestowed favours on Libanius as he had on other rhetoricians; 670 thanks him for the reception of the oration pro Aristophane; 712 was written after Julian had left for Persia, and suggests a secret wish of the writer (for his marriage?); 722 describes the good effect of Alexander's government on the morals of Antioch, and the honour paid to Calliope in the theatre. These sixteen letters are translated by Duncombe (see below). Of his letters addressed to other friends, 648 narrates Julian's entrance into Syria; and 1061, 1186, 1350 describe the writer's feelings about Julian's death.

MAMERTINI gratiarum actio pro consulatu, delivered Jan. 1, 362, at Constantinople, of no great value; contained in Panegyrici veteres.

HIMERII Oratio vii. Laudes Constantinopolensium et Juliani Augusti in Greek, delivered at Constantinople in the absence of Julian at Antioch, perhaps on the feast of Mithra, Dec. 25, 362 (cp. heading of Or. v. and vi.). It begins by mentioning the orator's entrance as a bond between himself and the emperor. The best edition is Himerii Sophistae declamationes, Fr. Dübner, Paris, 1849, in Didot's collection (Philostratorum et Callistrati opera rec. A. Westermann; Eunapii vitæ Sophistarum iterum ed. J. F. Boissonade et Himerii declamationes accurate excusso codice optimo et unico).

EUNAPIUS was a child during Julian's reign, but his imagination even then was much excited by what he heard of him. The fragments of his historical works in the first volume of the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians, contain a good deal on the subject, but not of much importance. The Lives of the Sophists, ed. Boissonade, 2 vols. 1822, and again, Didot, Paris, 1849 (with Philostratus and Himerius, q.v.) are more interesting, especially that of Maximus. They are written in a turgid, flowery style, but are remarkable as showing the considerable extent of a religious enthusiasm more like Julian's own in the pagans of the East, and quite different from the colder position of Libanius or Ammianus. The edition generally referred to is that of 1822: but the text of 1849 has some improvements.

EUTROPIUS, another contemporary, has a remarkable character of Julian (Breviarium Hist. Rom. x. 16). AURELIUS VICTOR was promoted by him on his entrance into Sirmium, and followed him into Persia (Amm. xxi. 10. 6; xxiv. 4. 31; 6. 13), but his Caesares contains only the notice of his appointment as Caesar. The later Epitome is much fuller.

SEXTUS RUFUS, whose Breviarium was dedicated to Valens, has a few notices of the Persian war.

ZOSIMUS, ἱστορία νέα, ed. Reitemeier, Lipsiae, 1784, and in the Byzantine historians ed. Bekker, Bonn, 1837. The third book describes this reign. Zosimus, who lived circa A.D. 450, was a strong heathen, and therefore a warm admirer of Julian. He took pains to study the original sources of the time, especially the emperor's own works, but he was not a man of much ability, and is thoroughly one-sided. His local knowledge adds a little to the account of the Persian campaign.

Ancient Authors, Christian.

ST. GREGORY NAZIANZEN (the Benedictine ed., Paris, 1778, vol. i. folio), a contemporary and acquaintance of Julian's. He wrote two invectives (σπηλιευτικοί) soon after his death, in which he describes his injuries to the church in vehement and rhetorical language. (Orations iv. and v. pp. 78–176 in this edition. Or. vii. in laudem Caesarii fratris; xviii. funèbris in potrem; and xxv. in laudem Hieronis also contain matter bearing on the subject.) We must not look for a tolerant and unbiassed judgment in these writings, and on certain points the later church historians may be considered to have corrected Gregory's statements by their silence. But his passion is a historical testimony to the fears entertained by Christians, and many of the details agree with what we learn of the emperor's character from his partisans, and particularly from himself. His mild account of Julian's treatment of Caesarea is also a proof of his comparative fairness.

There are three letters of St. Gregory (Nos. 67, 68, 69) addressed to Julianus, but they do not belong to our subject, but to the prefect of the same name, who was employed in assessing the revenue (Ἰουλιανὸς ἐξισωτής, to whom he addressed an oration). Auer wrongly treats them as addressed to the emperor, Kaiser Julian der Ab. pp. 353 foll. The seventh epistle to his brother Caesarius, expresses his shame and sorrow at hearing of his giving way to the solicitations of Julian. This letter had the effect of detaching Caesarius from the temptation to which he had to some extent yielded.

The pretended correspondence between St. Basil and Julian is all certainly spurious with the exception of Julian's ep. 12, which is addressed to a Basil—who may be the saint, but is not necessarily so. Auer and the writer of the article, BASILIUS OF CAESAREA, Vol. I. p. 282, accept the letters, but apparently without sufficient consideration.

ST. CHRYSOSTOM has treated the circumstances of the removal of the relics of St. Babylas from Daphne at great length in his two orations, especially the second, usually entitled contra Julianum et Gentiles. He has also a homily in SS. Juveninum et Maximinum. See also Hom. in Matt. 4 and 43.

The Greek Church historians who wrote about seventy years later, SOCRATES, SOZOMEN, THEODORET, and PHILOSTORGIUS, and the Latin RUFINUS, who is somewhat earlier, all have a considerable body of matter descriptive of this reign, and each has something peculiar to himself. Philostorgius is the least important. Socrates is generally more judicious than Sozomen, though the latter has some local knowledge from his connection with Gaza. Theodoret generally follows the same lines, but has a number of characteristic and sometimes suspicious anecdotes. Rufinus is the nearest of all in date to Julian, dying in 410. He is also perhaps the most important of this class of historians for our subject.

Casual references are found in many other writers. Thus SULPICIUS SEVERUS gives an anecdote of his hero Martin of Tours in connection with Julian, Vita B. Martini, iv. 306. ST. AUGUSTINE de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53, records a feigned oracle which declared that Christianity should come to an end 365 years after the birth of Christ, and in his Confessions, viii. 5, cp. 2, he gives the history of Victorinus. OROSIUS has a curious story (vii. 30, 546) that Julian had prepared an amphitheatre at Jerusalem in which he vowed to expose bishops and monks to the wild beasts on his safe return. PRUDENTIUS (who was converted late in life) records his judgment of the emperor in remarkable words, e.g. "Perfidus ille deo quamvis non perfidus orbi," &c., which shew the impression of his able rule left upon the inhabitants of Gaul (Apotheosis, 449–459). The references in this paragraph are mostly given by Mücke, pp. 330–339.

Georgius CEDRENIUS, who wrote about 1059 A.D., adds a good deal that is mythical to the ordinary version of the history (pp. 300–308 of the old edition, pp. 525–529 of the Bonn edition). Joannes ZONARAS, who lived some fifty years later, is perhaps rather more correct. The most convenient edition at present is in Migne's Patrologia Graeca, vol. 134, Annals, xiii. chaps. 10–13. Cp. also the Fragmenta Tusculana in Mai, Spic. Rom. ii. 2; Patr. Gr. 85, col. 1807 f.

B. Authorities, Modern.—For the first essays on the life of Julian we should naturally look to the editions of his works by Petavius, Spanheim, &c. The following list is a selection of the most important or curious separate publications from a much larger number in English, French and German.

(a) English. The first separate treatment of Julian that I have observed is by Sir William CORNEWALLIS in his Essays; or Encomiums of sadness, and of Julian the Apostata: London, 1600–1601, 1616, 1626, etc. 4to. This is a quaint book, somewhat in the style of Sir Thos. Browne. It gives credit to Julian's good qualities; and is followed by a paraphrase of his Cacsars. From the numerous editions it seems to have been a popular book.

The parallel between popery and paganism, of which some of the Reformers were so fond, naturally led to a comparison between Julian's attempt and other instances of reaction. On the margin of the Codex Vossianus of Gregory Nazianzen, where he describes the sufferings of Mark of Arethusa, who had saved Julian's life, (or. 4, 91, p. 125, note d), an English hand has written: "Sic Cranmerus noster Mariam, Reginam postea Angliæ, magno et suo et aliorum malo, ab imminente capitis periculo servavit." In the last quarter of the 17th century, when a religious reaction under the Duke of York was in prospect, a number of pamphlets were published in which Julian figured largely. The most important was Julian the Apostate: being a short account of his life, the sense of the primitive Christians about his succession and their behaviour towards him; together with a comparison of popery and paganism: London, 1682. 12mo. This was intended to incite resistance to the Duke of York's succession, and to expose the doctrine of passive obedience, and was written by Samuel JOHNSON, chaplain to Lord Russel and rector of Corringham, Essex. It was answered by Dr. George HICKES (the non-juring bishop and northern scholar) in another anonymous pamphlet Jovian, or an answer to Julian the Apostate, of which two editions were published in 1683. It is not uninteresting to notice that Johnson's book was translated into French and turned against Louis XIV. a few years later, under the title of Julien l'apostat . . . avec une comparaison du papisme et du paganisme . . . et un petit traité de l'antichrist, traduit de l'anglois, [no place] 1688. 12mo. For further details see Brunet, s. v. Julien. Johnson was severely punished for his pamphlet and for his address to the Protestants in the army on Hounslow heath, and received a pension under William III. Cp. Macaulay, ch. 6. His works were collected and published in one folio volume in 1710.

In the next century La Blérierie's Life was translated by three ladies under the inspection of Mr. Bower: London, 1746. 8vo. The controversy with the deists gave rise to William WARBURTON'S well-known essay, Julian: or a discourse concerning the fiery eruption which defeated the emperor's attempt to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem: London, 1750. 8vo. (in vol. iv. of his Works: London, 1788. 4to.) which may still be read with interest. It was answered by Hierusalem: a review . . . in which Warburton's arguments are considered: London, 1752. LARDNER, in his Testimonies, ch. 46, also takes the other side, as does BASNAGE in his Histoire des Juifs. J. H. NEWMAN has restated the case for the miracle with great force in his Essay on the Miracles in early Ecclesiastical History: Oxford, 1842. All these are occasional publications. The first and still in some respects the best account of Julian by an Englishman is to be found in GIBBON'S Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in chaps. 19 and 22–24. Gibbon gathers up his information in his usual masterly way and gives a forcible and on the whole very just picture. Like some other cold and sceptical people (e.g. Strauss), Gibbon despised Julian's superstitious enthusiasm, and, though he cannot restrain some sneers at the church and the orthodox faith, this part of his history has generally met with comparative favour at the hands of Christian critics. Cp. an article by Mr. J. W. Barlow on Gibbon and Julian in the Dublin Hermathena for 1877. His object is to shew that Gibbon, in order to gain a reputation for impartiality, is unfair to the emperor, whom he thinks morally and intellectually the best man "of the whole series."

In the first three quarters of the present century little or nothing was published in England specially on this subject. An interesting and valuable essay, written for a Cambridge historical prize by the Hon. Arthur LYTTELTON, has been kindly placed at the disposal of the writer of this article, who owes to it several important references. It is embodied in the Church Quarterly Review for Oct. 1880, vol. xi. pp. 24–58, the Pagan reaction under Julian, which gives a fresh and vigorous view of the subject. Mr. Gerald H. RENDALL'S Hulsean Essay for 1876, The Emperor Julian; Paganism and Christianity, appeared in 1879, after this article had been some time in type. It is decidedly the best account of Julian's religious position in English, perhaps in any modern language.

(b) In French we have, of course, the invaluable Tillemont, and the other writers of church history. Besides the articles in the fourth volume of the Empereurs there is a special treatise on the Persécution de l'Église par J. l'Apostat, in vol. vii. of the Mémoires. We miss, however, a critical treatment of the authorities, and wide generalisations in Tillemont. He also seems to exaggerate the scope of the law against Christian professors.

The Vie de l'Empereur Julien, par Jean P. René DE LA BLÉRIERIE, Paris, 1735 and 1746, already mentioned, is an agreeable and sensible book, which may still be recommended to the ordinary reader. He translated some of Julian's works as an appendix to his life of Jovian; see below.

Abel DESJARDINS, L'Empereur Julien, Thèse présentée à la Faculté des Lettres de Paris, Paris, 1845. This is particularly useful on account of the attempt to settle the chronology of the letters and other works.

E. VACHEROT, Histoire de l'École d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1846, 3 vols. The chapter in vol. ii., Lutte du Polythéisme et du Christianisme, contains some just observations on the reasons for the failure of Julian and the Neoplatonists.

Émile LAMÉ, Julien l'Apostat, Paris, 1861, a pretentious and fanciful book, from which something may be learnt by a critical and well-informed reader, but which would be very misleading to an ignorant one.

The fullest history of Julian is no doubt that of Albert DE BROGLIE in the third and fourth volumes of his L'Église et l'Empire romain au quatrième siècle, Paris, 1866, &c. This is indispensable to the student of the period. The general attitude of De Broglie is that taken in this article, but he is too anxious to make points to be careful of minute accuracy, and therefore of entire fairness, and his references often want correction. Some instances of this will be found below.

These volumes were reviewed by C. MARTHA in the Revue des deux Mondes for March 1867, vol. lviii. pp. 137-169, who paints the emperor more favourably.

H. ADRIEN NAVILLE, Julien l'Apostat et sa Philosophie du Polythéisme, Paris and Neuchâtel, 1877, is a sensible and useful essay on J.'s theory of religion. It has been frequently referred to in section iv.

G. BOISSIER has summarised the modern views of Julian in an article founded on Naville, Rode and Sievers, in the Revue des deux Mondes, for July, 1880, vol. xl., pp. 72-111.

We may mention here C. H. van HERWERDEN, De Juliano imp. Religionis Christianae hoste eodemque vindice, Lugd. Bat. 1827, which is useful in shewing the evidence for Christianity which may be gleaned from his writings.

(c) In German we have a number of essays, but no exhaustive life of first-rate importance.

Gottfried ARNOLD began to take a new and more favourable view of Julian's character in his Unpartheische Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, 1700, vol. i. pp. 128, foll. SCHRÖCKH made a fuller collection of facts in his Christliche Kirchengeschichte, pt. 6.

In the present century we have NEANDER'S Kayser Julian und sein Zeitalter, 1812, in which the deep religious feeling of J. is brought out and his perversion made intelligible.

WIGGERS J. der Abtrünnige ein Verfolger des Christenthums und ein Verfolger der Christen, in Ilgen's Zeitschrift, 1837, pp. 115-158, attempted to draw a distinction between Julian's earlier and later measures of oppression. This is a useful piece of work, in a new line, but requires more chronological exactness to prove its point.

TEUFFEL, Zur Gesch. des K. J. in Schmidt's Zeitschr. für Geschichtswissenschaft, vol. iv. pp. 143-161. 1845: on the chronology of Julian's early life, and the genuineness of certain letters, Teuffel defends Ep. 28, Judaeis; 67, Arsaci; cp. Sozom. vi. 1; as well as 68-76 (Heyler); but condemns Ep. 77=75 Hertlein, Basilio Magno.

D. F. STRAUSS, Der Romantiker auf dem Throne der Cäsaren, Mannheim, 1847, is a very clever political pamphlet (like S. Johnson's) directed against King Frederick William the Fourth of Prussia, and his religious reaction, and is interesting chiefly as such.

J. E. AUER, K. J. der Abtrünnige im Kampfe mit den Kirchenvätern seiner Zeit, Vienna, 1855, is a considerable collection of material (by a Roman Catholic), but is uncritical, prejudiced, and often irrelevant.

C. SEMISCH, J. d. A., ein Charakterbild, Breslau, 1862.

MARGOLD (lectures), Stuttgart, 1862; translated into French by Eugène TALBOT, with original essay, Paris, 1863.

J. F. A. MÜCKE, Flavius Claudius Julianus: nach den Quellen, Gotha, 1867 and 1869 (2 parts), is the most complete modern German account.

He has the merit of calling attention to Julian's military campaigns (though apparently without much special talent for the subject), and he gives a large amount of useful bibliographical information. It is a painstaking but not brilliant book; and the history of the persecution of Christianity wants method and insight. Mücke depends, in fact, too much upon Ammi-anus, and is not unfrequently betrayed into partisanship with his hero.

E. ZEIDLER, Julian, 1869.

KELLERBAUER, Skizze der Vorgeschichte Julians, 1877.

FR. RODE, Geschichte der Reaction Kaiser Julians gegen die christliche Kirche, Jena, 1877. This is a useful study, and generally very accurate, paying proper attention to chronology. The writer takes up something of the same position as Keim does in his essay on Constantine's conversion—striving after fairness towards the church, without accepting its doctrines. He admires Julian's books against the Christians as anticipating the line of modern critical theology in many points, pp. 102, 103; cf. p. 32, note 10.

Of other writers who touch the subject in passing we may mention Richter in his West-römische Reich, and Sievers in his Leben des Libanius, chaps. x.-xii. The latter is valuable on account of the independent reading of the author and his detailed knowledge of Libanius and his correspondents.

Henrik ISEN'S interesting drama, Keyser og Galilæer (pub. 1873) has been translated from the Norwegian by Catherine Ray, under the title of The Emperor and the Galilean, London, 1876. Cp. J. G. E. HOFFMANN, Jul. der Abtrünnige, Syrische Erzählungen, Leiden, 1880; old romances reflecting the feeling of the Eastern Christians. Cp. Th. Nöldeke, Z. d. D. Morg. Ges. xxviii. 263 foll. 666 f.

C. Editions and Translations of Julian's Own Works.—There are four editions of the collected works.

1. Gr. et Lat. ed. Petrus Martinus et Carolus Cantoclarus, Paris, 1583-88.

2. Gr. et Lat. [ed. Dionysius Petavius], Paris, 1630, 4; much more complete than the foregoing.

3. Gr. et Lat. ed. Ezech. Spanhemius, Lipsiae, 1696, fol. cum notis, etc. This is the edition most often referred to, and its pages are in general use, and are given by Hertlein. It is the only edition containing St. Cyril's books, in which are preserved Julian's attack upon Christianity. Spanheim's own notes consist only of a huge commentary of 309 pages upon the first oration; but he reprinted those of some of the earlier editions upon the other books.

4. Ed. F. C. Hertlein, 2 vols. 8vo, Leipzig, Teubner, 1873, 1876. This is, what was much wanted, a good critical edition of all Julian's works except the fragments of the books against the Christians and the laws. The former have been edited by C. J. NEUMANN, Jul. Imp. librorum contra Christianos quae supersunt, Lips. 1880, with some Syriac fragments of S. Cyril, ed. E. Nestle.

Amongst the numerous editions of separate works the following may be mentioned:—

Caesares, ed. J. M. Heusinger, Gotha, 1736.

Epistolae, Gr. et Lat. ed. L. F. Heyler, Moguntiae, 1828, 8, a laborious but disappointing book. It does not contain the letters to Themistius and the Athenians, or the fragment on the duties of a priest. The letters are also edited by R. Hercher in Epistolographi Graeci, Paris, 1873, 8, in Didot's series.

Books against the Christians.—Déffense du Paganisme en grec et en français, par le Marquis d'Argens, Berlin, 1764, 2 vols. (ed. 3, Berlin, 1769.) This is a frivolous and worthless book. It was dedicated to D'Alembert.

Translations:—

Select works of the Emperor Julian and some pieces of the Sophist Libanius, &c. with notes by John Duncombe, M.A. London, 1784, 2 vols.

This contains all the works except the orations—having only that on the departure of Sallust and the fable from oration vii. It also contains the letters of Libanius to Julian, and the lives of Libanius and Jovian. The style is good and the notes are useful, but the translation is disfigured by terrible blunders; even in the notes he confuses Beroea of Ep. 27, i.e. Aleppo, with the Beroea of the Acts of the Apostles, vol. ii. p. 62.

Two Orations of the Emperor Julian—to the Sovereign Sun, and the Mother of the Gods—with notes by Thomas Taylor, London, 1793. 8vo.

Julian's Arguments against the Christians, by the same; privately printed. London, 1809.

Thomas Taylor, the translator of Plato and Aristotle, was a Neoplatonist in religion and even in religious practice. It is said that he sacrificed a ram to Zeus in a back-garden at Wandsworth. He naturally was in thorough sympathy with Julian, whose obscure theology he found luminous and clear. The character of his translation, as well as of his remarks, may be easily inferred. The second of these two publications also contains the letter to the Bostrenians and the edict against Christian professors. It was reprinted by Mr. Willis Nevins (Williams and Norgate, London, 1873), in the interests of Christianity, without Taylor's preface and observations, but with a curious introduction of his own.

Oeuvres complètes de l'Empereur Julien, traduites en français avec abrégé historique, notes, etc. par R. Tourlet. Paris, 1821, 3 vols. 8vo.

Julien, Oeuvres complètes, Traduction nouvelle accompagnée de sommaires, notes, éclaircissements, etc. par Eugène Talbot, Paris, 1863.

Les Césars de l'Emp. Jul. trad. en français, avec des remarques et des preuves enrichies de plus de 300 médailles, par M. Spanheim. Paris, 1683; Amsterdam, 1728.

Histoire de l'Emp. Jovien et Traduction de quelques ouvrages de l'Emp. Julien, par Jean P. R. de la Bléterie. Paris, 1748, 2 vols.; 1776, 1 vol. Contains Caesar, Misopogon, select letters and the fable from oration vii.

Le Opere Scelte di Giuliano Imp. da Sp. Petretini, Milano, 1821, 1822.

Julian's Caesars, übersetzt von C. N. von Osiander, and Misopogon, von H. Reichardt. Stuttgart, 1856.

Kaiser Julians Bücher gegen die Christen, von K. J. Neumann, Leipz. 1880. The Theodosian Code is quoted from Hänel's edition; the Justinian Code from P. Krueger's, Berlin, 1877, which contains some important rectifications of dates. Hänel's collection of the other fragments of laws in his Corpus legum ab imperatoribus latarum extra codices, Lips. 1857, may also be consulted.

D. Chronological List of Julian's Works.—The following catalogue of Julian's works is arranged, as far as possible, in chronological order—a convenience not to be found in any edition, yet indispensable for a study of his life and character. La Bléterie and Desjardins have of course been consulted in compiling it, but by no means always followed.

The following division of the material seems the most natural. Perfect certainty as to the result cannot of course be guaranteed.

§ 1. Writings before his appointment as Caesar, A.D. 351–355, while he was still in a private position.

§ 2. As Caesar up to the death of Constantius, Nov. 355–Nov. 361.

§ 3. As sole emperor, Nov. 361–June 363.

§ 4. Letters of uncertain date.

N.B.—The numbers in brackets after each epistle are those of Hertlein's edition, which agree generally (up to no. 64) with Spanheim and Heyler.

§ 1. Writings before his appointment as Caesar, A.D. 351–355. Desjardins seems rightly to have placed in this class a number of letters redolent of the schools, and containing reminiscences of recent rhetorical exercises.

A.D. 351–354 [Gallus Caesar Juliano: "I am rejoiced to hear from Aetius that my suspicions of your unsoundness in the faith of your forefathers were false" (p. 454, Spanheim)].

[This letter has been considered spurious, and probably with sufficient reason. See GALLUS, § 3.]

— Iamblichos: "accept the oration on the famous junction of the straits (by Xerxes) which I have written by the emperor's desire" (41).

[This man cannot be the great Neoplatonist Iamblichus, but perhaps his nephew, see Fabricii Bibl. Graeca, vol. v. p. 760, ed. Harless. Ueberweg, Hist. Philosoph. § 69 note, rejects all the letters addressed to Iamblichus, and there is some reason to doubt them.]

— Georgio (catholico), i.e. procurator of the fiscus: compares his letters to the small but finished works of Phidias.—"The mouse in the fable helped the lion, so you may receive something even from me" (8).

[Desjardins, p. 106, note 2, suggests that this may be George of Cappadocia.]

— Georgio catholico: compliments him on his letters; pleasant pedantry about the nymph Echo (54).

— Serapionis clarissimo: "I have sent you 100 long-stalked Damascene figs." Dilates on figs and the number 100, and ends by suggesting that his essay should have some publicity given to it—a clear sign of the youthfulness of the writer (24).

— Hecebolio: I send you a silver medal in return for your gold one. A letter from you would be more precious still than your present (19).

— Maximo: submits his orations to his judgment (16).

Libanio: the pleasure of travelling quietly and not in the public carriage (72).

[This letter, if authentic, must have been written before Julian was Caesar.]

355. PRO ARGIVIS: a declamation probably delivered at Athens, wrongly inserted amongst the epistles (35).

[Petavius attributes this oration to the youth of Julian, while Spanheim and Godefroy (ad Cod. Theod. xi. 25–30) place it during his reign. The fragment that follows, as well as the character of the piece, is in favour of the earlier date.]

— Fragment 3 (Suidas, s. v. Μουσαῖος), addressed perhaps to Diogenes or Lamprias, the Argive delegates: "You have borne well the drunken abuse which the governor of Hellas has heaped upon us. You are patient, like Socrates, and careful of the interests of your city, like Musonius."

— Diogeni: intercedes for his son (70).

[Perhaps addressed to the same man as the last.]

§ 2. As Caesar up to the death of Constantius: Nov. 355–Nov. 361.

355. Nov. ORATIO I. IN CONSTANTIIUM AUGUSTUM, a panegyric, probably written just after his appointment as Caesar.

356 (?). AD THEMISTIUM: a long philosophical letter addressed to the Neoplatonist (not the orator) on the dangers of sovereign power; hints, at the end, at a great scheme for the benefit of mankind, especially philosophers (pp. 253–267, ed. Spanheim).

[There can be little doubt that this letter was written about this time, and so Tillemont and La Blérierie conclude. De Broglie, iv. p. 116, and Clinton, following a conjecture of Petavius, place it after he became Augustus.]

356 (?). Iamblichos: "if I ever return to my native country (C. P.) I will never leave you" (60).

356 (?). Iamblichos: mentions his dangers in Pannonia and on the way to Bithynia, and elsewhere since they parted, and regrets the length of time since he left the East (61).

356 (?). Sosipatro: "I send this by the τροφῆς τῶν ἑμῶν παιδῶν, who will give you more particulars about us" (67).

356 (?). ORATIO III. IN EUSEBIAM AUGUSTAM. [Her visit to Rome (in 356) is mentioned p. 129; but the oration must be before the visit of Constantius, Ap. 29, 357, see Clinton anno 357.]

358. Iamblichos: "it is now the third year since I came from Pannonia, and saw you at Nicomedia having escaped the dangers and troubles of which you are aware. I have written to you several times, but you have not perhaps received my letters—once when the τροφῆς τῶν ἑμῶν παιδῶν came home, and since after yours brought by Sopater" (40).

358. Nov. ? ORATIO VIII. IN DISCESSUM SALLUSTII. [The year of Sallust's withdrawal is not certain. It may have been 357, cf. ad Ath. pp. 281, 282.]

358 (?). Oribasios: describes his dream about two trees (himself and Constantius). His refusal to sign a disgraceful document offered him by ὁ μικρὸς ἀνδρόγυνος (= Florentius?) "Would that the gods might give me back Sallustius" (17).

358 (?). ORATIO II. IN CONSTANTIIUM AUGUSTUM.

[For the probable date see p. 56 b, where he says he has himself seen the nations on the Atlantic; cf. Tillemont, Emp. iv. p. 499.]

359. Eumenio et Phariano (probably fellow-students at Athens): "it is nearly four years and three months since we parted. I am here amongst barbarians. Study classics, but especially philosophy" (55).

— Alypio: refers to the rebuilding of the cities of Gaul, writes from winter-quarters and speaks of his "Gallic and barbarous muse" (29).

— Alypio: "I am highly satisfied with your administration of affairs (in Britain? cf. Amm. xxiii. 1, 2). Thanks for the book of geography and the map" (30).

— Prisco: "I have long sent Archelaus to you and a free pass. Come unless you fear the rudeness of the Gauls (Galatae) or bad weather" (71).

[This letter may belong to the journey to Antioch in the summer of 362.]

360. Constantio Augusto, from Paris in the autumn, after the soldiers had proclaimed him Augustus. Refuses Gallic troops and proposes terms (Amm. xx. 8, 5–17).

361, autumn. Maximo, from Illyricum: rejoices in being able to sacrifice publicly and describes the devotion of the army (38).

— AD SENATUM POPULUMQUE ATHENIENSEM: a long defence of his conduct in taking up arms against Constantius, containing important details of his life till the time of writing (pp. 268–287, ed. Spanheim).

— AD CORINTHIOS; Frag.

§ 3. Letters and other works written as sole emperor.

361. Nov. or Dec. Juliano avunculo: "We are safe, thanks to the gods. I never wished the death of Constantius. I took up arms in obedience to the gods" (13).

[Constantius died Nov. 3.]

Dec. 19. CAESARES: at the Saturnalia at C. P.

Dec. 25. ORATIO IV. IN SOLEM REGEM.

Dec. at C. P. Eutherio: "We live preserved by the gods, and with us Hellenism. Come over if you can to C. P." (69).

[This Eatherius is probably the excellent eunuch of whom Ammianus gives a sketch, xvi. 7.]

— Hermogeni: "Constantius is dead, and I have escaped the wild beasts who surrounded him. They are to be brought to trial. Hasten hither at once" (23).

— Maximo: "Your letters are like medicine to me; write again, or rather come yourself" (15).

— Aelio episcopo: "I have recalled the others whom Constantius banished, but, mindful of our old acquaintance, I also invite you hither" (31).

— Basilio: "The company of a sage like you will be highly serviceable to me" (12).

[There is nothing in this letter to make us suppose it was addressed to St. Basil of Caesarea: it is possible however that it may have been to him.]

— Prohaeresio: "If you wish for materials for a history of my return I will give you the documents" (2).

[Possibly the reluctance of Prohaeresius (who was a Christian) to undertake the rhetorical defence of Julian, may have led to the coldness between them, cp. Eunap. Himerius, p. 95, where read with the later edition ὡς [not ὀ] διὰ τὴν εἰς Προαιρέσιον ἀχθῆδὸνα τοῦ βασιλέως ἀσμένως ὀφθησόμενος].

(?) Iamblichus: "Whilst we are wintering in Thrace your letters come like swallows" (53).

(?) Eusébio: "Come and receive an honorary consulate (μεθέξων τῆς ἑπατείας)" (20).

— Eustathio philosopho: "Fly hither on the public carriage." [Enodia = Hecate is mentioned here and in no. 20.] (76).

— Byzantinis (?): "Applaud me if you like in the theatre, but not in a temple like the Tycheaem" (64).

— Alexandrinis: "You have an obelisk lying on your shore which Constantius wished to bring hither. He has now departed this life, and I desire you to send it to myself, who have a filial love for your city. You may erect a colossal statue (of myself). Preserve the obelisk from superstition and defilement" (58).

(?) Artabio: "The Galileans must not be killed or beaten unjustly, but the worshippers of the gods should be encouraged in every way" (7).

(?) Theodoro pontifici: "I appoint you chief priest of Asia, and will give further directions later. I lament that the zeal of the worshippers of the gods should be outdone by the Jews" (63).

[Reiske thought that the long fragmentum Epistolae, pp. 288-305, is a part of this letter: it is more probably the sequel to it at a later date.]

(?) Judaeis: frees them from tribute, mentions his vengeance on the courtiers of Constantius, desires their prayers, and speaks of his wish to restore Jerusalem after his return from the Persian war (25).

[Both the date and genuineness of this letter are doubtful, but on the whole it is probably to be accepted.]

(?) Dionysio: A sarcastic and bitter letter to a Roman official who had been his friend, but had gone over to Constantius, and had compared Julian to Constans and Magnentius. Julian ridicules his arguments and his Greek, and refuses to restore him to office (59).

362 Jan. (?) at C. P. Alexandrinis: reprimands them sharply for the death of George of Cappadocia, but does not punish them (10).

[George was murdered by the populace Dec. 24, 361.]

— Ecdicio praefecto Aegypti: "Procure me George's books, some of which I copied when I was in Cappadocia" (9).

— Porphyrio: "Procure me George's books, and send them to Antioch" (36).

— Zenoni medico: "Return to Alexandria. If you left on account of George's turbulence you were unjustly treated" (45).

Beginning of March. Alexandrinis: "Athanasius and the other bishops were only allowed to return to their countries, not to their 'thrones.' He must leave Alexandria directly you receive this letter" (26).

Athanasius returned to his throne in the cathedral church, Feb. 22.]

March 13. Byzantinis: "We have restored to their duties all your senators and decurions who were exempted, whether as Christians or otherwise" (11).

[The date of this letter is probably the same as that of the general law taking away the privileges of Christians (Cod. Theod. xii. i. 50). He calls them Byzantines, partly perhaps from dislike of Constantine, partly to keep up the associations of old Greek history. There seems no reason to read Bisanthenis with Gibbon.]

March 28. ORATIO V. IN MATREM DEORUM.

[Delivered at the vernal equinox, and not, as usually dated, at Pessinus.]

— OR. VII. ADVERSUS HERACLIIUM CYNICUM.

[For the date see Lib. Epit. p. 574; Monod. p. 512, i.e. about the same time as or. v. Mücke's argument (pt. 2, p. 179) does not notice these passages, and is in itself inadequate.]

Before May. Maximo: "You require change of air, so use the public carriage to return home" (39).

May 12. De medicis: "The healing art is divine; it is just therefore that physicians should have immunity from the office of decurion" (25).

[May 12 is the date of the similar law, Cod. Theod. xiii. 3, 4, de medicis et professoribus].

May. Philippo: "I did not write often to any one across the Alps when I was Caesar, for fear of getting my friends into trouble. I hope soon to pass your way and to see you" (63).

— Callixenae: "Your faithfulness for the last twenty years deserves the highest praise. I appoint you priestess of the mother of the gods at Pessinus" (21).

June 17, at Ancyra or Pessinus. Edictum de professoribus: "It is dishonest to think one thing and teach another. No professor therefore who does not believe in the gods must expound the ancient writers. Christians may go to their churches and expound Matthew and Luke. Children are however free to attend what schools they please" (42).

[The date is perhaps the same as that of the law requiring professors to be sanctioned by the town-councils (Cod. Theod. xiii. 3, 5).]

June. ORATIO VI. IN IMPERITOS CANES: against certain false cynics.

[Composed about the summer solstice; p. 181 A.]

June or July. Aristoxeno philosopho (not Aristomeni): "Come and meet me at Tyana, and show us a true Greek among the Cappadocians" (4).

[June or July. Basilio magno: "I am on my way to conquer the Persians, Indians, and

- Saracens. Send me 1000 pounds of gold or I will devastate Caesarea;" ends with the famous words, ἀ γὰρ ἀνέγνωσ ἔγνωσ καὶ κατέγνωσ (75). This letter is for various reasons justly accounted spurious.]
- Antioch, Aug. 1. Bostrenis: "Any who return to the worship of the gods must first be purified and offer sacrifices of expiation. The people must not abet the seditions of the clergy. Your bishop Titus has sent me an impertinent memorial, in which he pretends that his influence has kept you from seditions. Shew that your wills are your own by expelling him from the city. I do not, however, sanction cruelty to the Galileans" (52).
- End of Sept. Ecdicio praefecto: A bantering reprimand for not telling him of the rising of the Nile. "It was fifteen cubits high on Sept. 20" (50).
- Oct. Ecdicio: "Though you write on nothing else [see foregoing letters], you should have written to tell me about Athanasius. He must leave not only the city but Egypt before Dec. 1," adding a postscript in his own hand on the baptism of certain Gentile ladies by Athanasius (6).
- [St. Athanasius received notice of this letter on Oct. 23. (See Bright's Orations against the Arians, p. lxxiii.)]
- Alexandrinis: Arguments against Christianity, and in favour of Serapis and the sun. Julian is now in the twelfth year of his Gentile belief. Athanasius must leave Egypt (51).
- (?) Arsacio pontifici Galatiae: laments lukewarmness of heathens: "I have given you 30,000 bushels of wheat a year to be given to the poor. Imitate the charity and humanity of the Galileans; support the virtue and dignity of the priesthood. I am ready to help the people of Pessinus if they will reverence the mother of the gods" (49).
- Nov. (?) Libanio: "Priscus has not yet come. Send me the oration and your advice" (3).
[Priscus and Maximus were both with Julian when Libanius wrote pro Aristophane, p. 455, and at the time of his death. Amm. xxv. 3, 23.]
- Libanio: "Thanks for your oration for Aristophanes. You have persuaded me to think better of him. We will confer as to what can best be done for him" (74).
[This oration is No. 14 in Reiske, vol. i. p. 424, foll. Cp. Sievers, Leben des Libanius, p. 96, for the date.]
- Photino (preserved in Latin): "You do well in denying the divinity of Christ. Diodorus (bp. of Tarsus) is an impudent sophist. If the gods help me I will disprove his positions" (79).
- ADVERSUS CHRISTIANOS LIBRI TRES.
The following were probably written in 362, but in what part of the year is uncertain.
- Hecebolio: "I have ordered the Galileans not to be ill-treated, but the Arians of Edessa have attacked the Valentinians. I order therefore the money of the church to be divided among the soldiers, and the estates to be added to the fiscus" (43).
- Boagrius: gives him his grandmother's Bithynian villa, his early play-place (46).
- Thracensibus: remits their taxes till the third indiction (47).
- Pictori: "Paint me as I really am, with the images of the gods in my hands" (65).
- Ecdicio praefecto: "I wish you to choose and train boys for sacred music at Alexandria, and will provide for their support" (56).
- Leontio: "We have heard much of your activity, and have sent you a complete set of armour, and enrolled you in our body-guard" (22).
- Anonymo: suspends a heathen priest who had maltreated another (62).
- Euclidi: "I have unwillingly let you go in pursuit of learning" (73).
- Anonymo (possibly Theodoro, cf. No. 63): "We should not have made Pegasus a priest unless we had been convinced of his devotion. I met him on my way to the court of Constantius (in the autumn of 355), when I visited Ilium novum, of which he was then bishop. He shewed his Gentile sympathies very clearly even then" (78, a newly found letter, first edited by Henning, in Hermes, vol. ix.).
- Arsaci satrapi Armeniae: "Join my forces against Persia. I shall either perish or triumph. I have not much confidence in you, but if you do not follow me I prophesy that you will be ruined by the Persians, and Nisibis will share your fate" (66).
[This is a ridiculous letter and appears to be spurious. For the fulfilment of the supposed prophecy, see Amm. xxvii. 12.]
- Letters, &c., written in the year 363.*
363. FRAGMENTUM EPISTOLAE on the duties of a priest, pp. 288–308 (probably written after the failure at Jerusalem, see p. 295 c, etc. and below, II., § 6 c).
- Feb. 12? Antiochenis: "No one is to be buried till after 6 P.M., to avoid bad omens" (77, first ed. in Hermes, vol. viii.).
[The date may be the same as that of the law de sepulchris violatis in Cod. Theod. ix. 17, 5, which also orders burials to take place by night.]
- End of Jan. or beginning of Feb. MISOPOGON in the seventh month of his stay in Antioch, p. 344 a, after his uncle Julian's death.
- March. Libanio: from Hierapolis, describes his march through Litarbe, Beroea (Aleppo), and Batnae; has been received by a sympathising friend at Hierapolis (27).
- § 4. Letters of uncertain date arranged in the order in which they are printed. They are mostly insignificant and merely complimentary.
[Sophistae cuidam: a letter not of Julian's, but of Procopius of Gaza] (1).
Theodora: Thanks for books and letter (5).
Libanio: Praise of an oration he had just read (14).
Eugenio philosopho: longs to be with him (18).
Gregorio duci: Thanks for a letter (28).
Luciano: "I write that I may be entitled to a letter" (32).
Dositheo: "Your name brought our father to mind. Strive to resemble him" (33).
Iamblichus: a highly laudatory but uninteresting letter (34).

Americo: consolation on his wife's death. Anecdote of Democritus and Darius (37).

Libanio: Thanks for letters received after recovery from illness (44).

Zenoni: "I am rather unwell and should like to hear from you" (48).

Elpidio: "I send you a short but friendly letter" (57).

§ 1. Early years of Julian as a Christian (A.D. 331-351).—Flavius Claudius Julianus was the youngest son of Julius Constantius, the half-brother of the emperor Constantine the Great, His mother, Basilina, was of the noble family of the Anicii, and daughter of Julianus the praetorian prefect, whose name was given to her son [see BASILINA in supplement]. Julian was born at Constantinople in the latter part of the year 331, the year after the dedication of the new capital. (Jul. Ep. 58, τὴν ἐμὴν πατρίδα Κωνσταντινίου πόλιν, cf. Amm. xxv. 5, 1. The date is gathered from Amm. xxv. 3, 23, and 5, 1, who says that on the day of his death June 26, 363, he was "anno aetatis altero et tricesimo," cf. Jul. Ep. 51, p. 434 d. Socrates calls him ὀκταέτης in 337 or 338, therefore he cannot have been born much after the middle of the year 331.) Basilina did not long survive her son's birth, but left him to the care of the eunuch Mardonius, a trusty servant whom his grandfather had educated to be her instructor in the poems of Homer and Hesiod (Jul. Misopogon, p. 352 b).

Upon the death of the great Constantine in May, 337, and the accession of his three sons, there was a general massacre of the male branches of the younger line of the Flavian family descended from Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora. In this tragedy there perished the father and eldest brother of Julian, his paternal uncle, his cousins the Caesars Delmatius and Hanniballian, and four other members of the family. Julian and his elder half-brother Gallus, who was sick of an illness which was expected to be mortal, were alone preserved, by the compassion or the policy of Constantius (cf. Socr. H. E. iii. 1; Greg. Naz. Or. iii. p. 58 b. Julian, ad S. P. Q. Athen. p. 270 c, gives the list of those who perished, and ascribes their deaths to Constantius, who he says wished at first to slay both himself and Gallus). Julian in particular is said to have owed his life to the interference of Mark, bishop of Arethusa, who gave him sanctuary in a church (Greg. Naz. Or. iii. p. 80 c). The boy was taken charge of by his mother's family, and his education was conducted under the direction of the Arian Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who was distantly related to him (Amm. xxii. 9. 4; cf. Soz. v. 2). When Eusebius was translated in 338 to the see of Constantinople it is probable that Julian went with him, and attended the schools of that city (cf. Libanius, ἐπιτάφιος, ed. Reiske, i. p. 525; Julian, Ep. 53; and Rode, die Reaction Julians, p. 22, note 10). His constant attendant and guardian was his mother's slave Mardonius, whose influence evidently had great power in moulding the character and tastes of his pupil, and who insisted strongly on a staid and perhaps rather pedantic demeanour (Liban. l. c.; Jul. Misopogon, pp. 351, sq.; Mücke, in his Julianus nach den Quellen, zweite Abtheilung, pp. 6 and 9, makes a curious blunder in supposing that Julian disliked Mardonius). Though educating him only for a private position, he set before him a high standard, and particularly held up to his imitation the names and characters of "Plato, Socrates, Aristotle, and Theophrastus" (Misop. p. 353 b). He kept him from the theatre and the circus, and taught him rather to love the Homeric descriptions of Phaeacia and Demodocus and Calypso's isle, and the cave of Circe (ib. 351 d). Such teaching can have contributed little to his Christianity, but doubtless fed the naturally dreamy temperament of his pupil. Julian tells us that from a child he had a strange desire of gazing at the sun, and that he loved to spend a clear night in looking fixedly at the moon and stars, so that he almost gained the character of an astrologer (Jul. Or. iv. ad regem Solem ad init.; cf. the fable, Or. vii. p. 229, in which he speaks of himself as entrusted by Zeus to the sun's guardianship.) These school days were occasionally broken by summer visits to a little farm of his grandmother's in Bithynia, on the coast of the Propontis, of which he retained a delightful recollection (Ep. 46).

But these pleasant days of freedom were brought to an abrupt conclusion by the command of Constantius. The death of his relative Eusebius (in 342) deprived Julian of a powerful protector, when he was about eleven years old; and soon after this (probably in 343 or 344) the emperor, swayed by some impulse of suspicion, recalled Gallus from his exile, and sent the two brothers to the distant palace of Macellum in Cappadocia (the date of the commencement of this retirement is not quite certain; see Rode, p. 25, note 22; cf. Jul. ad S. P. Q. Ath. pp. 270, 271; Soz. v. 2; Amm. xv. 2, 7). Here for six years they were kept under surveillance, with no lack indeed of material comforts, but apart from young men of their own age, and as it were forced into the society of their slaves (Greg. Naz. Or. iii. p. 58 b; Julian, ad Ath. p. 271 c). Their seclusion was only once broken by a visit from Constantius (Jul. ad Ath. p. 274, probably in 347, see laws of the Cod. Theod. in this year). Masters and teachers were not wanting, especially of that form of Arianism to which Constantius was devoted; and Julian now, if not before, made a considerable verbal acquaintance with the Bible, an acquaintance which frequently appears in his writings. He and Gallus were admitted to the office of Reader in the church—a proof (it may be remarked in passing) that he had been baptized, though no mention of the fact of his baptism is recorded. In the same spirit they interested themselves zealously in the building of chapels over the relics of certain martyrs (Greg. Naz. Or. iii. p. 58; Soz. v. 2). The success of Gallus in this building, and the ill-success of Julian was remarked at the time, and was (afterwards, at any rate) considered as an omen of his apostasy (Greg. Naz. l. c. p. 59). Julian no doubt continued his classical studies, and (we learn incidentally) borrowed books of rhetoric, philosophy, and theology to copy from the library of George of Cappadocia, who was afterwards intruded into the see of Alexandria (Jul. Ep. 9).

In the spring of 351 Constantius felt himself forced by the burden of empire to take a colleague, and Gallus was appointed Caesar. Julian with difficulty was permitted to leave Macellum, and seems to have returned for a short time to Constantinople; there he studied grammar with Nicocles, and rhetoric with Hecebolius, then a zealous Christian (Socr. H. E. iii. 1; on the rather difficult chronology of this time see Rode, p. 27, note 32). Constantius, fearing lest his presence in the capital might lead to his becoming too popular, ordered him to remove to Nicomedia (Liban. Epitaph. p. 526, προσφωρητικός, p. 408). Hecebolius, it would seem, saw this change with reluctance, and exacted a promise from his pupil that he would not attend the lectures of the famous heathen sophist Libanius; Julian kept his promise, perhaps fearing to excite suspicion by outward intercourse with a chief partisan of the old religion, but contented himself with a study of the written lectures of the master (Lib. l. c. 526 sq. Libanius does not name Hecebolius, but the description seems to point to him: Sievers, Libanius, p. 54, note 5, supposes Nicocles to be meant). There were others, however, in Nicomedia, besides Libanius, who attracted the attention of the young prince. He here learnt to know some of the more mystical of the heathen party, to whom paganism was still a reality, and the gods living beings, visions of whom were to be seen by night, and whose power still worked signs and wonders. "He is sent to the city of Nicomedes," says Libanius, "as a place of less importance than Constantinople. But this was the beginning of the greatest blessings both to himself and the world. For there was there a spark of the mantic art still smouldering, which had with difficulty escaped the hands of the impious. By the light of this" (turning to Julian) "you first tracked out what was obscure, and learnt to curb your vehement hatred of the gods, being rendered gentle by the revelations of divination" (Liban. Propheteticus, ed. Reiske, 1, p. 408).

While Julian was thus having his first experience of the inner circle of heathen life, Gallus met his brother for the last time as he passed through Bithynia to undertake the government of the East with which Constantius had invested him (Liban. Epitaph. p. 527, διὰ τῆς Βιθυνίας) Ammianus (xv. 2, 7) puts this meeting at Constantinople, but Libanius was in Nicomedia at the time, and is therefore a better authority. The two brothers, according to Julian's account, corresponded but rarely after this, and on few subjects (Jul. ad Ath. p. 273; Liban. Epitaph. p. 530). Gallus, it is said, having reason at a later date to suspect his brother's change of belief, sent the Arian Aetius to confer with him (Philostorgius, 3, 27); and a letter is extant, purporting to be from Gallus, which expresses great joy at the news of his firmness brought by Aetius (Jul. Ep. ad fin. On the whole I incline to think it is spurious: for the reasons, see the article on GALLUS, § 3). Julian, for his part, if we may believe Libanius, sent Gallus good advice on his political conduct, which had he followed he might have preserved both the empire and his life (Liban. ad Jul. cos. p. 376, ed. Reiske).

§ 2. Conversion to Heathenism (A.D. 351-355).—The secret apostasy of Julian was the result of his residence at Nicomedia, though it was not completed there. The chief agent in effecting it was the neoplatonist Maximus of Ephesus, a man who displayed the combination, which from time to time has not been uncommon, of philosopher, magician, and political schemer. Whether Maximus first visited him in Nicomedia or not is doubtful. (Socr. H. E. iii. 1, asserts that he did, but we find no mention of this in Libanius or Gregory, both of whom were contemporaries.) The fullest account of their intercourse is given by the sophist Eunapius in his life of Maximus, in somewhat high-flown and romantic language; but the story seems generally probable, and Eunapius, as son-in-law of Chrysanthius, was well acquainted with one at least of the parties concerned. We gather from this (though Eunapius is far from saying so) that a regular plan was laid for entrapping the young prince. The fame of the wisdom of Aedesius first attracted him to Pergamus; but he, being old and infirm, recommended him to his pupils, Chrysanthius and Eusebius. The latter was, or pretended to be, an adversary of the theurgic methods of Maximus, and a follower of the higher and more intellectual platonism. In this capacity he used to finish every lecture by a general warning against trickery and charlatans. Julian, who was much struck with this, took the advice of Chrysanthius upon the point, and asked Eusebius to explain what he meant. The latter replied by an account of Maximus, which gave a new edge to the already keen curiosity of Julian. "Some days ago" (he went on) "he ran in and called our company together to the temple of Hecate, thus making a large body of witnesses against himself . . . when we came before the goddess and saluted her, he cried, 'Sit down, dearest friends, and see what will happen, and whether I am superior to ordinary men.' We all sat down, then he burnt a grain of frankincense, and as he repeated some sort of chant to himself he so far succeeded in the exhibition of his power that first the image smiled and then even appeared to laugh. We were confounded at the sight, but he said, 'Let none of you be disturbed at this, for in a moment the torches which the goddess has in her hands will be lighted up'—and before he had done speaking light actually burned in the torches. We then retired, being amazed and in doubt at the wonder which had taken place. But do not you wonder at anything of this kind, just as I also through the purifying effects of reason conceive it is nothing of great importance." Julian (says Eunapius) hearing this, exclaimed, "Farewell, and keep to your books, if you will; you have revealed to me the man I was in search of." (Eunapius, Vita Maximí, pp. 48-51, ed. Boissonade.)

It is difficult to believe that Eusebius was not in league with Chrysanthius to bring Julian under the influence of Maximus. The young prince hurried off to Ephesus, and there threw himself with eagerness into the teaching of his new master, which seems exactly to have suited his fantastic temperament. Julian had no practical Christianity to fall back upon; the six precious years during which the boy is formed into the young man had been spent without either the gentle influences of a home education or the free discipline of school. The sense of being watched and suspected had sunk deeply into his mind at Macellum, and he had learnt to look upon Constantius not only as his jailor, but as the murderer of his nearest relations. This naturally did not incline him to the religion inculcated by Arian or semi-Arian court bishops, who, we may suppose, laid stress upon their peculiar points of divergence from the orthodox faith, and neglected the rest of Christian theology. Julian therefore conceived of Christianity, not as a great body of truth satisfying the whole man, but as a set of formulas to be plausibly debated and distinguished. On the other hand, he had a real, though, as it seems to us, a pedantic love of Hellenic authors and literature, and a natural dislike to those who destroyed the ancient monuments of the faith of the great men whom he admired. We have already remarked his characteristic dreaminess and love of mystery, and this found its satisfaction in the secret cults to which men like Maximus were addicted—all the more zealously as public sacrifice was difficult or dangerous. He was by nature ardent and superstitious; and even in good hands his religious temper would have required much correction. But into good hands he never fell. It is certain that the pagan coterie who got hold of him soon discovered the importance of their convert, and imbued him with the notion that he was the chosen servant of the gods called to bring back again Hellenic life and religion. The arts of divination were put in practice, and a speedy call to the throne was promised him; while he for his part made vows for the restoration of the temples in case he should ever become emperor. (Libanius, Epitaph. pp. 529 and 565, who agrees substantially with Socrates, iii. 1, p. 168, and Sozomen, v. 2, p. 181, cf. Theodoret, iii. 1.)

For the present, however, the fulfilment of such hopes seemed distant, and Julian did not hesitate to stoop both to dissimulation of his own belief and to pretended zeal for Christianity—a course which he carried on for ten years (Liban. Epit. p. 528; Amm. xxii. 5, 1; Socr. iii. 1; Soz. v. 2). He had, indeed, good reason to fear the suspicions of his cousin. In the year 354 Gallus was craftily removed from his government and executed [see GALLUS], and Julian was likewise apprehended, on charges which are somewhat obscurely known to us (Amm. xv. 2, 7—the charge of leaving Macellum without permission seems strange, since the brothers had been released from their retirement some four years before). For seven months he was confined in North Italy in the neighbourhood of the court, being removed from place to place (Jul. ad Ath. p. 272 d; Liban. Epitaph. p. 530; cf. Jul. ad Themist. p. 260 a). This imprisonment was brought to an end by the intervention of the gentle empress Eusebia, who procured for him an interview with Constantius, and leave to return to his studies (Jul. ad Ath.

pp. 272 274; Or. 3, p. 118 b). At first he determined to retire to his mother's property in Bithynia, Constantius having confiscated all the estates of his father. (Jul. ad Ath. p. 273; Ep. 40, p. 417 a, to Iamblichus—an interesting letter written three years later, and not concealing his religious opinions.)

He had hardly arrived in Asia Minor when the suspicions of Constantius were aroused by two reports brought by informers, one of treasonable proceedings at a banquet given by Africanus, the governor of Pannonia Secunda at Sirmium, the other of the rising of Silvanus in Gaul (Jul. ad Ath. p. 273 c, d; cf. Amm. xv. 3, 7 sq.). The first of these was no doubt connected in his mind with Julian, who had just passed through that country, and whom he in consequence recalled. As he was on his way back to Italy, however, he received permission, or rather command, to turn aside into Greece, a privilege which his friend Eusebia had procured for him (ad Ath. 273 d; Or. 3, p. 118 c. Julian himself in the latter passage speaks of his homeward journey being cut short, which accounts for its omission by Libanius, Epitaph. p. 531, and Ammianus, xv. 2, 1, who speak as if he went directly from Milan to Athens). He was thus enabled to gratify a wish he had long cherished of visiting Athens, which still retained great reputation as a university, and preserved its most beautiful buildings intact. (Many modern writers suppose two visits of Julian to Athens, relying upon his letter to Themistius, p. 260 A, ἀπιὼν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα πάλιν. But πάλιν here is probably to be taken as—"under different circumstances." Julian takes credit to himself for the cheerfulness of his letters to Themistius, first during his imprisonment, and again when he was going into Greece, and everyone considered him to be sent into exile—cf. Rode, p. 37, note 31; who, however, gives a different and less probable explanation of the word.) The young prince was naturally well received by the professors and sophists, such as Prohaeresius and Himerius, who were then teaching at Athens; and, having been all his life a student, was able to take a distinguished position in the learned society of the place. His enthusiasm for the ancient writers did not only shew itself in the appropriate quotations which were always ready upon his lips as he walked about the glorious sites of the city and its neighbourhood; nor in the zeal with which he pleaded in a petty quarrel between Argos and Corinth. (His speech is printed as No. 35 amongst his epistles.) He had also a turn for philosophy, and could discourse eagerly, in the modern neo-Platonic fashion, about the descent and the ascent of souls. Wherever he went he was surrounded by a swarm of young and old men, philosophers and rhetoricians, and (if we may believe Libanius) gained favour as much by the modesty and gentleness of his behaviour as by the qualities of his intelligence (Liban. Epitaph. p. 532). Two of the most distinguished of his fellow-students at this time were the future bishops Basil and Gregory Nazianzen, then as always close and intimate friends, and Julian was on familiar terms with both of them. Gregory, however, seems to have detected something more of his real character than the rest. He noticed in him an air of wildness and unsteadiness, a wandering eye, an uneven gait, a nervous agitation of the features, an unreasoning and disdainful laugh, an abrupt, irregular way of talking, which betrayed a mind ill at ease with itself—and he exclaimed, "What a plague the Roman empire is breeding! God grant I may be a false prophet!" (Or. pp. 161, 162.)

It is not at all impossible that Gregory, who had many friends among the professors, may have been aware of the real state of the young prince's mind, and of his nightly visits to Eleusis, where he could indulge his religious feelings without reserve. Maximus had given him an introduction to the hierophant of this place, who was a great miracle-worker, and in league with the heathen party in Asia Minor (Eunapius, Vita Maximi, pp. 52, 53). He can hardly have been, as Tillemont suggests, the man of Antioch, ὁ παρ' ἡμῶν, ὁ μόνος ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀμεμπτος, whom Libanius mentions in such high terms as the confidant of Julian at this time (Epitaph. p. 532). The hierophant was an Athenian and a descendant of the Eumolpidae (see Wytenbach's note to Eunapius, p. 282). The man meant by Libanius is perhaps Celsus, afterwards governor of Cilicia (cf. Amm. xxii. 9, 13; Sievers, Libanius, p. 90, note 28. Celsus is described by Libanius adversus inridentes, &c. (vol. iii. p. 456).

§ 3. Julian as Caesar, from Nov. 6, 355, to Nov. 3, 361, death of Constantius.

It was about May in the year 355 that Julian was permitted to go to Athens, and he could only have enjoyed his retirement a few months when he was summoned again to the court (Jul. ad Ath. p. 273 d). He left the city in low spirits and with many tears, and, stretching out his hands to the Acropolis, besought Athena to save her suppliant—an act which, he tells us, many saw him perform (ib. p. 475 a). Those who did so could hardly have doubted his change of religion, but they were, as we may suppose, a crowd of sympathisers who looked up to him as the future restorer of the old faith. On his journey he first crossed the Aegean to Ilium Novum, where he visited the antiquities under the guidance of the then Christian bishop Pegasius, who delighted him by omitting the sign of the cross in the temples, and otherwise shewing heathen sympathies. (Jul. Ep. 78 = the newly-discovered letter, first edited by C. Henning, in Hermes, vol. ix.)

On his arrival at Milan, Constantius was absent, but he was well received by the eunuchs of the empress (ad Ath. pp. 274, 275 b). His first impulse was to write to his protectress and implore her to obtain leave for him to return home. Before sending the letter he demanded a revelation from the gods whether he should dispatch it or not. In the night he received an intimation of their displeasure and a threat of disgraceful death if he did so, and, in consequence, schooled himself to yield his will to theirs, and to become their instrument for whatever purposes they chose (ib. pp. 275, 276; cf. Liban. ad Jul. consulem, t. 1, p. 378, θεῶν τις ἐπελθὼν μετέστησε τὴν βουλήν). Constantius soon returned, and the young prince submitted with rather an ill grace to the critical and uncongenial society of the court. The emperor, having thus admitted him to some sort of favour, determined, under the persevering pressure of his wife, and notwithstanding strong opposition, to give the dignity of Caesar to his sole remaining relative (Amm. xv. 8, 3; Zos. 3, 1). Some have guessed that the interest of the empress was of a more tender kind than mere compassion, but there is not sufficient evidence to make this more than a conjecture. Lamé romances a good deal on this point. On Nov. 6, 355, he received the insignia in the presence of the army at Milan, and was commissioned to undertake the control of the prefecture of Gaul (i.e. Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Germany), and especially the defence of the frontiers (ad Ath. p. 277 a; Amm. l. c.). As he entered the palace and drew the unwonted garb around him, in the place of his beloved pallium, he was heard to mutter the line of Homer, to which his wit gave a new shade of meaning:—

"Him purple death and destiny embraced."

(Amm. xv. 8, 17.) At the same time he received, through the management of Eusebia, the emperor's sister Helena as his bride, and a very acceptable present of a library from the empress herself (Or. iii. p. 123, d). Thus the reconciliation of the cousins was apparently complete, and the two surviving members of the Flavian family were brought into the closest outward relationship. Julian threw himself into the situation, and produced a spirited panegyric upon the reign and just actions of Constantius, which seems rightly to be assigned to this date (Or. 1, cf. Spanheim's notes, p. 5). He set out on Dec. 1, for his new duties with only a small retinue, out of which almost all his personal followers had been carefully removed (Amm. xv. 8, 17, 18; Jul. ad Ath. p. 277 b, c). Of his four slaves, one was his only confidant in religious matters, an African named Euhemerus (ad Ath. p. 277 b; Eunap. Vita Maximi, p. 54). His physician, Oribasius, who had the charge of his library, was only allowed to accompany him through ignorance of their intimacy (ad Ath. l. c.; Eunap. Vita Oribasii, p. 104). He entered Vienne with great popular rejoicing (for the province was hard-pressed by the barbarians), and possibly with secret expectations diffused already amongst the heathen party, which had been strong in the time of Magnentius. As he passed by a blind old woman asked the bystanders who was going through the town, and, learning his name and office, cried out, "There goes he who will restore the temples of the gods!" (Amm. xv. 8, 22).

During the five years that followed the young Caesar appears in a new character—that of a strenuous and successful general, and a popular ruler. The details of his wars with the Franks and Alamanns, the Sali and Chamavi, will be found in Ammianus and Zosimus, who naturally make much of his exploits. Perhaps we ought to recollect that he was his own historian, writing "commentaries" (now no longer extant) which were no doubt intended to rival those of the author of the "Gallic War." (Mücke, Julianus nach den Quellen, part i., has taken pains to describe these wars.) His most famous victory was that over Chonodomarius and six other kings of the Alamanni, near Strasburg, which checked them for some time to come. This took place in August 357. After an expedition against the Franks in the same autumn he wintered for the first time at Paris, which now makes almost its first appearance in history. It became a favourite abode of Julian's, who gives a well-known description of his φίλη Λουκερία in the Misopogon (p. 340, sq.). These successes naturally endeared him not only to the troops, but also to the people. His internal government was equally popular, and was directed particularly towards lightening the public burdens, so that he might seem really to merit the praise of Mamertinus: "Ita illi anni spatia divisa sunt, ut aut barbaros domitet, aut civibus iura restituat; perpetuum professus aut contra hostem, aut contra vitia certamen." In his civil capacity he had specially to contend with the avarice of Florentius, the praetorian prefect, who desired to increase the capitatio, and who on Julian's refusal to sign the indictment, complained of him to Constantius (Amm. xvii. 3, 2, and 5, in 357). He is perhaps the same official of whom he relates a similar incident in his seventeenth letter to Oribasius, and whom he calls δ μιχαρὸς ἀνδρόρηνος. If he means Florentius, the term "eunuch" must be used metaphorically (see Tillemont, Emp. t. iv. p. 693, note 3; see also section iv. Coins). Constantius, however, while reproving him for discrediting his officer, practically left him to act for himself in the matter; and such was his success that, whereas on his entering his government the tax was twenty-five aurei a head, when he left Gaul he had reduced it to seven (Amm. xvi. 5, 14, cf. xvii. 3, 6). Another ground of enmity on the part of Florentius was his condemnation on appeal of a provincial governor, accused of peculation, whom Florentius had acquitted (Liban. Epitaph. pp. 549, 550).

On a different occasion, when the well-known orator Delphidius, accused Numerius, governor of Narbonensis, of peculation before him, and exclaimed, "Can any criminal ever be condemned, great Caesar, if it is sufficient for him to deny his crimes?" Julian aptly retorted, "Can any one ever be found innocent, if accusation is enough to condemn him?" (Amm. xviii. 1. 4, cf. his remark on an "agens in rebus," ib. xvi. 5. 11.)

His private conduct was hardly less remarkable, and his mode of life was marked with great severity and simplicity. His ambition was to imitate Marcus Aurelius in giving an example of a philosopher upon the throne, as he took Alexander the Great for his model in warfare (ad Themist. p. 253). His table was very plainly furnished, and he refused all the luxuries which Constantius had set down, in the book of directions which he had written out for him, as proper for a Caesar's board (Amm. xvi. 5, 3). His bed was a mat and a rug of skins, from which he rose at midnight, and, after a secret prayer to Mercury, addressed himself first to public business, and then to literature. He studied philosophy first of all, then poetry, rhetoric, and history, making himself, amongst other things, a fair proficient in Latin. Nights so spent (says Ammianus) are sufficient proof of his virtue and chastity (xvi. 5. 4-8). His chamber was ordinarily never warmed, notwithstanding the inclemency of the winter; and one very cold night, at Paris, he was nearly suffocated by some charcoal in a brazier, which he ordered to be brought in, a suffocation which he erroneously attributed to the dampness of the room (Misopogon, p. 341).

All this attached the people, but was not agreeable to many of the courtiers. Julian knew that he was surrounded by disaffected officials and other spies upon his conduct, and continued to conceal his religious sentiments, and to act cautiously towards his cousin.

During his administration of Gaul he produced another panegyric upon Constantius, and one upon Eusebia, each of them in its own way calculated to make a favourable impression, though the exact occasion of neither can be determined (Or. 2 and 3). His other chief composition at this period was the oration on the departure of his friend Sallustius, whom Constantius removed (it was said) out of jealousy of his cousin's successes, which he ascribed to the good counsels of his adviser. (Zos. 3, 5; cf. Jul. ad Ath. p. 282 and Ep. 17.)

In these orations Julian, though indulging to the full his taste for classical parallels and illustrations, takes care to hide his change of religion. He speaks even of his prayers to God for Constantius, naturally indeed and not in a canting way (Or. 3, p. 118 d). Nor did he hesitate to join with him in issuing a law denouncing a capital penalty against those who sacrifice to or worship idols (Cod. Theod. xvi. 10, 6, April 356); in repressing magic and all kinds of divination with very severe edicts (ib. ix. 16, 4-6, in 357 and 358); in punishing renegade Christians who had become Jews (ib. xvi. 8, 7); and in granting new privileges to the Church and clergy, and regulating those already given (ib. xvi. 2, 13-16; the last as late as March, 361). It may be said, indeed, in his defence, that to have hinted at dislike to any of these measures would at once have aroused the strongest suspicions. One of the edicts against magic in particular, which threatens to punish every kind of divination with torture, seems to have been almost directed personally against Julian:—"Siquis magus . . . aut haruspex aut hariolus, aut certe augur, vel et mathematicus aut narrandis somniis occultam artem aliquam divinandi, aut certe aliquid horum simile exercens in comitatu meo vel Caesaris fuerit deprehensus, praesidio dignitatis cruciatus et tormenta non fugiat" (Cod. Theod. ix. 16. 6, dated July 5, 358, from Ariminum.) Yet the effect upon his conscience of condemning as a public officer what he was secretly practising in private, could not but have been hardening and demoralizing. For Julian was not without thought on such subjects. On another occasion he declared that he would rather die than sign the oppressive edict brought to him by Florentius (Amm. xvii. 3, 2); and in his later famous decree against Christian professors he writes vehemently of the wickedness of thinking one thing and teaching another (Ep. 42). He probably justified his own inconsistency to himself as a means to an end ordained by the gods, and took what care he could to prevent the execution of these rigorous laws within his dominions (cf. his remark about the law against rape, Amm. xvi. 5, 12). In the Western provinces, indeed, there was generally far more toleration of heathenism than in the East; and therefore it was easier for Julian to mitigate the severity of the laws which were nominally in force against it. See also section vi. Coins.

In April 360 Constantius, who was engaged on an important expedition against the Persians, ordered the flower of the Gallic auxiliaries to be sent to his aid (Amm. xx. 4). This request naturally produced great irritation among men who had enlisted on the understanding that they were not to be required to cross the Alps—an irritation which was no doubt fomented by the friends of Julian, particularly, it is said, by Oribasius (Eunap. Vita Oribasii, p. 104, τοσοῦτον ἐπλευνέκτει ταῖς ἄλλαις ἀρεταῖς ὥστε καὶ βασιλέα τὸν Ἰουλιανὸν ἀπέδειξε). The troops surrounded the palace at Paris and demanded that their favourite should take the title of Augustus (ad Ath. p. 284; Amm. xx. 4, 14). Julian, according to his own account, was quite unprepared for such a step, and would not accede to it till Jupiter had given him a sign from heaven. This sign was no doubt the vision of the Genius of the Empire, who declared that he had long been waiting on his threshold and was now unwilling to be turned away from it. Yet he warned him (so Julian told his intimates) that his residence with him would in no case be for long (Amm. xx. 5, 10; cf. Lib. ad Jul. cos. p. 386, θεοῦ δὲ τοῦτο πρόσταξις ἦλθεν ἀδελφῆ τῆς προτέρας). We have no reason, however, to think that Julian had any real hesitation, except as to the opportuneness of the moment. When he came down to address the troops, he still appeared reluctant, but the enthusiasm of the soldiers would take no denial, and he was raised in Gallic fashion upon a shield, and hastily crowned with a gold chain which a dragoon (draconarius) tore from his own accoutrements. He promised the accustomed donative (Amm. xx. 4, 18), which the friends of Constantius, it would seem, secretly tried to outdo by bribes (ad Ath. p. 285 a). The discovery of their intrigue only raised the popular enthusiasm to a higher pitch, and Julian felt himself strong enough to treat with his cousin. He dispatched an embassy with a letter in which he declined to send the Gallic troops, who (he declared) positively refused to go, and could not be spared with safety; but he offered some small corps of barbarian auxiliaries. He related the action of the army in proclaiming him Augustus, but said nothing of his own wish to bear the title. As a basis of compromise he proposed that Constantius should continue to appoint the praetorian prefect, the chief governor of that quarter of the empire, but that all lesser offices should be under his own administration (ad Ath. p. 285 d, and for particulars, Amm. xx. 8, 5–17, who gives the substance of the letter at length). But to these public and open requests he added a threatening and bitter private missive, which had the effect, whether intentionally or not, of rendering his negotiations abortive (Amm. l. c.). Constantius replied firmly by bidding him be content with his position as Caesar, while he gave some signs of a spirit of conciliation by removing the obnoxious officials Florentius and Lupicinus (Amm. l. c.). Julian in his manifesto to the Athenians declares that at the same time Constantius secretly attempted to rouse the barbarian tribes against him (p. 286 a; Liban. Epitaph. p. 558).

Such a state of things could only end in war, but neither party was in a hurry to precipitate it. Constantius was occupied in the Persian campaign, and Julian wished to consolidate his power. He received the new prefect Nebridius in agreement with his programme, but refused all other appointments. In the autumn he undertook a small expedition against the Atturian Franks, and retired to winter quarters in Vienne (Amm. xx. 10). Here he celebrated the fifth anniversary of his appointment, and appeared for the first time in the jewelled diadem, which since the latter years of Constantine had become the symbol of imperial dignity (Amm. xxi. 1, 4). During these events both Eusebia and Helena were removed by death, and with them almost the last links which bound together the cousins. Eusebia died the first, but when or where is not exactly certain (Amm. xxi. 6, 4). Helena's death occurred during the celebration of her husband's quinquennalia. We know little of their relations to each other, and Julian, who speaks of her several times, mentions her with terms neither of love nor of dislike. But it is a probable conjecture that he was indifferent to her, and that she was unhappy. She had borne but one child alive, and that one was lost at once through the unskilfulness or malice of the midwife. It was rumoured that Eusebia had through jealous several times caused her sister-in-law's miscarriage, being herself barren. It is difficult, however, to credit so horrid an accusation against one who elsewhere appears only in an amiable light, and such a charge was easy to invent and difficult either to prove or disprove. (Ammanian asserts it, xvi. 10, 18, but makes no reference to it in his laudatory notice of her character, xxi. 6, 4. His book was published in different portions.) Helena's remains were sent by Julian to Rome to be buried beside those of her sister, the virago Constantina, wife of his brother Gallus (Amm. xxi. 1, 5). Julian seemed to be waiting quietly, and he still kept up the pretence of being a Christian. At Epiphany (Jan. 6, 361) he kept the festival solemnly and even ostentatiously, joining in the public prayers and devotions of the people (Amm. xxi. 2). He witnessed with calmness the triumphant return of St. Hilary after his exile, and permitted the Gallic bishops to hold a council at Paris (S. Hilarii Fragmenta historica, pp. 1353, 1354). His name also appears after that of Constantius, attached to a law issued on March 1 at Antioch, giving privileges to Christian ascetics. But all this was of course mere dissimulation for the sake of popularity. In secret he was anxiously trying all possible means, suggested by the adepts in heathen ritual, to divine the future (Amm. xxi. 1, 6 sq.). He sent in particular for the hierophant of Eleusis, with whose aid he performed rites known to themselves alone (Eunap. Vita Maximini, p. 53; cf. Amm. xxi. 5, 1, placata ritu secretiori Bellona).

In the spring, an inroad of the Alamanni justified the refusal of the Gallic troops. Julian industriously circulated the report that it was due to the bribes of Constantius, and shewed his secret letters which he professed to have captured, thus more than ever alienating the soldiery from the emperor. His success over Vadomarius was followed by the submission of the other tribes (Amm. xxi. 5).

The irritation against Constantius was further increased by an arrogant letter, addressed of course to the Caesar Julian, requiring his immediate submission and merely promising him his life. Julian on receiving this despatch uttered an exclamation which betrayed his religion:—"He would rather commit himself and his life to the Gods than to Constantius" (Zos. iii. 9, 7).

The moment seemed now come for action. In a speech to the soldiers in which he referred in ambiguous language to the will of the God of heaven—arbitrium dei caelestis—he called upon them to take the oath of allegiance, and follow him across the Alps. He spoke in general terms of occupying Illyricum and Dacia, and then deciding what was to be done (Amm. xxi. 5). Nebridius alone refused the oath, and was replaced by Sallustius, who hurried back to meet his friend. Julian having thus secured the western provinces, made a rapid and successful passage through northern Italy, of which he received the submission, though the two consuls Taurns and Florentius fled away to Constantius. After a difficult march along the Danube he reached Sirmium, without opposition, having ordered the different divisions of his army to concentrate on that point. Then he took and garrisoned the important pass of Succi (Ssnlu Derband) on the Balkans, between Sardia and Philippopolis, thus securing the power of descending into Thrace at any moment. For the time he established his own quarters at Naissus (Nish), and awaited further news. From this place he wrote letters to the senate of Rome against Constantius, and manifestos in self-defence to the Athenians, Lacedaemonians, and Corinthians (Zos. iii. 10). The letter to the Athenians is preserved entire, and is an important piece of autobiography, as well as a straightforward, well-written, and telling apology.

It was possibly entrusted to the hands of the Eleusinian hierophant, who returned about this time to his country. It was perhaps also under his guidance that Julian underwent those secret ceremonies of initiation which are described by Gregory Nazianzen (Or. 4, 52–56, pp. 101–103). According to common report he submitted to the disgusting bath of blood, the Taurobolium or Criobolium, with which the worshippers of Mithra and Cybele sought to procure for themselves an entrance into eternal life. Julian's object, it is said, was not only to gain the favour of the gods, but also to wash away all supposed defilement contracted by his previous contact with the Christian mysteries. This is a miserable story and yet it is a very credible one. Existing monuments prove that many pagans of position continued the taurobolium till the end of the 4th century (see the inscriptions in Wilmanns Exempla Inscr. Lat. 107–126; e.g. 110, of Sextilius Agesilaus Aedesius v(ir) c(arissimus), &c., taurobolio criobolique in aeternum renatus, A.D. 376 at Rome = C. I. L. vi. 510). The rhetorician Himerius tells us that he was himself initiated into the mysteries of Mithra in order to seal his friendship with Julian; and the emperor orders, in his letters to the Bostrenians, that any who apostatise from Christianity should purify themselves with lustrations and expiatory sacrifices, before being allowed to join in heathen rites. (Himerius begins 'Ἡλιω Μίθρα ψυχὴν καθάραντες καὶ βασιλεῖ τῷ φίλῳ θεοῖς ἦδη διὰ θεῶν συγγενόμενοι, Or. vii. 2, Laudes C. P.; Jul. Ep. 52, p. 99 c).

Another story given by Gregory may be related here though it is obviously less certain than the former. During one of the ceremonies of initiation he descended with his guide into a subterranean cave, such as was a common adjunct of the heathen mysteries. He was assaulted by dreadful sounds, noxious odours, and phantoms of fire. Julian instinctively made the sign of the cross, and they vanished. He went on again and the same things occurred. This staggered him, and he turned to ask his guide for an explanation:—"They were not frightened, but regard us as profane," was his answer. "It is to the power of evil not of good that they have yielded" (ἐβδελύχθημεν οὐκ ἐφοβήσαμεν νικᾷ τὸ χεῖρον, Greg. Or. 4, 55, 56, p. 102). Julian was persuaded by this interpretation and went on with the ceremony, and returned from it fired with a fatal enthusiasm. Gregory does not say who was the initiator on this occasion, but merely calls him ὁ σοφὸς τὰ τοιαῦτα ἐτ' οὖν σοφιστής. This might do either for the hierophant of Eleusis or for Maximus; and some writers place the scene at Ephesus, some at Eleusis, and at an earlier date. If, however, the incident is historical at all, we must place it, I think, with Gregory, among the events just before his public declaration of belief.

Such, according to general report, were the secret incidents which preceded Julian's public declaration of his change of religion. There can be no doubt that both now and at other times he was addicted to all sorts of gross superstitions, and that the heathen mystics about him used all the arts in their power to establish his faith. At Naissus or Sirmium he threw off the mask, and professed himself openly a heathen. His first public sacrifice filled him with delight, and he wrote with exultation to his friend Maximus:—"We worship the gods openly, and the greatest part of the troops who accompanied me profess the true religion. We have acknowledged our gratitude to the gods in many hecatombs. The gods command me to consecrate myself to their service with all my might (τὰ πάντα ἀγνέειν εἰς δύναμιν), and most readily do I obey them. They promise us great returns for our toils if we are not remiss" (Ep. 38, p. 415 c).

In this position of affairs he received the news of his cousin's sudden death at Mopsucrene, at the foot of Mount Taurus, on Nov. 3, and learnt that he was accepted without opposition as the successor designated by his dying breath, a report of which we cannot of course guarantee the truth (Amm. xxii. 2, 6).

§ 4. Julian as Augustus at Constantinople, from Nov. 3, 361, to May 362.

After receiving the news of his cousin's death, Julian hastened to Constantinople, through the pass of Succi and by way of Philippopolis and Heraclea. He entered the Eastern capital amid general rejoicings, on the 11th December. His first care was the funeral of Constantius, whose body he caused to be interred with the usual honours. He himself laid aside all the imperial insignia, except the purple, and marched in the procession, touching the bier with his hands (Liban. Epitaph. p. 512, cf. Greg. Naz. Or. 5, 16, 17, pp. 157, 158). Constantius was buried near his father in the Church of the Apostles, but whether Julian entered the building is not stated. Henceforward he became generally more reticent about the misdeeds of his predecessor, and pretended that at least he had not wished him ill or desired his death (cf. Ep. 13 Juliano avunculo; 23 Hermogeni; 58 Alexandrinis de obelisco; and so he says nothing of him by name in the Caesars, and professes to respect him in the Misopogon, p. 357, b, c). Mücke (p. 161) even supposes that Orations ii. and iii. in praise of Constantius and Eusebia were put out about this time to conciliate the adherents of the old régime; but this is a mere conjecture, as the orations were certainly written before (see esp. Or. iii. p. 129 B.).

Almost his next act, however, was to appoint a special commission under the presidency of Saturninus Sallustius Secundus (to be distinguished from the prefect of the Gauls) for the purpose of bringing to justice the principal supporters of the late government. Julian himself avoided taking part in it, and allowed no appeal from its decisions. The commission met at Chalcedon, and acted with great and even excessive rigour, chiefly, it was reported, under the influence of Arbetio, whose appointment as a judge was much criticised as a mistake of the emperor's. In fact it was said that Arbetio ought himself rather to have been brought to trial (Amm. xxii. 3, 9; cf. Jul. Ep. 23, to Hermogenes, ex-prefect of Egypt). Men marvelled and shuddered to read acts that began "Consulatu Tauri et Florenti, inducto sub praenominibus Tauro" . . . Both consuls were tried; Taurus, who appeared, was banished; Florentius was condemned to death, but hid himself. The fate of Ursulus, the "high treasurer," (comes largitionum) excited universal compassion. His death, indeed, was considered a grave stain upon the justice of Julian, inasmuch as he had written to the treasurer of Gaul to advance the Caesar all the funds he needed, at a time when he was in a very critical position from inability to pay his soldiers (Amm. xxii. 3, 7). Less surprise was excited by the execution of Pentadius, and the once powerful eunuch Eusebius, who were sacrificed to the manes of Gallus (Amm. xxii. 3, 5 and 12; Socr. iii. 1, p. 171; cf. Jul. ad Ath. pp. 272, 274), and the cruel Apodemius and the infamous delator Paulus Catena were burnt to death amid general satisfaction.

Julian next turned his attention to the interior of the palace, which was choked up with a swarm of needless and over-paid officials, eunuchs, cooks, and barbers, who battened on bribes and exactions. All these he swept away, somewhat too indiscriminately, no doubt; but his measure was on the whole much approved (Amm. xxii. 4; Lib. Epit. p. 565). He further reformed the course of public business by inflicting a severe blow upon the corps of notaries, whose intervention between the emperor and the provinces led to much peculation and extortion; and by suppressing the "curiosi," originally inspectors of the posts, who had in the late reign become a sort of secret police, engaged in all manner of espionage and delation (Liban. Epit. pp. 565-568; Cod. Theod. viii. 1, 6 and 7, de numerariis; vi. 29, de curiosis). We have, however, no extant law of this date, de curiosis). It is probable that a great number of all classes of these officials were Christians, at least in name (Greg. Or. iv. 64, p. 106).

Reprisals and reforms such as these, though they lightened the public burdens, could not but be attended with a certain amount of unpopularity, and Julian felt it necessary to conciliate various classes of his subjects. He was specially careful of the city of his birth, and raised its senators to something like an equality with those of ancient Rome. He himself frequently appeared in the curia, and delivered studied harangues, and took part in their business, a compliment which had never been paid them by Constantius (Socr. iii. 1; Amm. xxii. 7, 3; Liban. Epit. p. 573). He built a new port for the city, and a public library in which he deposited his own books, and ordered an obelisk, which lay upon the shore, to be sent from Alexandria (Zos. iii. 25; Jul. Ep. 58; cf. Himerius, Or. vii. 15). We may also mention in this connexion the peculiar and somewhat affected honours which he shewed to the consuls whom he appointed to succeed Taurus and Florentius—Mamertinus, the rhetorician, and Nevitta the barbarian general. He walked on foot in their procession on Jan. 1, and fined himself ten pounds of gold for a mistake which he made in the ceremony at the games of Mamertinus (Amm. xxii. 7). He seemed to wish to bring back the traditions of the court of Augustus, in which the emperor still remembered that he was a citizen of the republic. In the same spirit he summoned by complimentary letters a number of persons whom he valued for the sake of old acquaintance, and especially for literary merit and devotion to the pagan cause. One of the first of course was Maximus (Ep. 15), whom Julian met with ostentatious affection. He happened to be speaking in the senate-house at the time when he heard of his arrival. Regardless of propriety, he leaped from his seat and ran to greet him, and insisted on bringing him back with him (Amm. xxii. 7, 3, cf. Eunap. Vita Maximi, p. 56; Liban. Epit. pp. 573, 574. λέγοντος αὐτοῦ . . . ἐκ μέσων ἀναπήδησας τῶν γερῶντων).

Towards Christians he adopted a policy of toleration, though desiring nothing more keenly than the humiliation of the Church. His object was to set sect against sect by extending equal license to all. His first act was one eminently popular with churchmen. He issued an edict allowing all the bishops exiled under Constantius to return, and restored their confiscated property (Socr. iii. 1, p. 171). On the other hand, the extreme Arian, Aëtius, as a friend of Gallus, received a special invitation to the court (Ep. 31). A letter "to Basil," seemingly of the same date, and of similar purport, may perhaps have been addressed to St. Basil of Caesarea, though it contains nothing which obliges us to suppose it (Ep. 12; de Broglie assumes it, tom. iv. pp. 133, 235, note). To Caesarius, the brother of Gregory, who was a physician of high repute attached to the court, Julian shewed great attention, and used all means in his power to effect his conversion. He even went so far as to enter into a public discussion on religion with him, and was much mortified by the ill success of his rhetoric (Greg. Naz. Ep. vi.; Orat. vii. 11-14). To Prohaeresius, the Christian sophist of Athens, he wrote offering him manuscript materials if he was willing to write the history of his recent expedition—an offer which was apparently declined (Ep. 2). From time to time he invited the leaders and chief laity of different Christian sects into his palace, and informed them with all suavity that they were at liberty to follow any form of belief they chose—his hope being (as Ammianus tells us) that when free license was given to every shade of opinion the Christian people would be no longer dangerous in its unanimity. At such gatherings as these he was wont to cry out (in imitation of some words of his hero Marcus Aurelius), “Listen to me to whom Franks and Alamanni have listened” (Amm. xxii. 5). The Donatists, Novatians, and perhaps some of the more extreme Arians were not loth to appear before the new emperor, but there is no trace of any important Catholic leader falling into the snare. (For the Donatists see Optat. Milev. iii. p. 54; S. Ang. contra Epistolam Parmen. i. 12, 19; cp. Ep. 52 Bostrenis, where he speaks of the persecution “of so-called heretics.”) In the same spirit he ordered Eleusius, Arian bishop of Cyzicus, to restore the ruined church of the Novatians, within two months. (Socr. ii. 38, p. 147; iii. 11, cf. Ep. 52, p. 436 a.)

The same toleration was also extended to the Jews, with whom Julian had a real though only an imperfect sympathy. Their ritual seemed to him a point of contact with Hellenism, and with their rejection of an Incarnate Saviour he was of course quite in harmony. He approved of their worship of the Creator of the World, but could not tolerate their identification of Him with the God whose especial people they claimed to be—and whom he, in accordance with his principles of polytheism, imagined to be an inferior divinity (S. Cyril. in Jul. iv. pp. 115, 141, 201, 343, 354, ed. Spanheim). A curious letter to “the community of the Jews” (Ep. 26) is extant, in which he frees them from certain tributes, especially from those designed by the courtiers of Constantius, on whom (he says) he has taken summary vengeance; and further desires their prayers to the Creator, and professes a wish to rebuild and inhabit Jerusalem with them after his return from the Persian war, and there give glory to the Supreme Being (τῷ κρείττονι). After considerable doubts as to the genuineness of this letter I have on the whole concluded that it may be accepted. It is a very curious composition, but not more strange than others which are probably authentic; and it is difficult to put a limit a priori to the peculiar turns of thought and expression in the mind of this remarkable man. (Teuffel defends its genuineness, in Schmidt’s Ztschr. für Geschichtswissenschaft, vol. iv. for 1845, Rode, p. 61).

This peculiar temper is displayed in the satire which he found time to write for the Saturnalia of the year 361 (just before Christmas) upon his predecessors in the empire. The Caesars is a series of clear and spirited scenes reminding us of the Ludus de morte Claudii of Seneca and some of the Dialogues of the Dead and the Sale of Lives of Lucian—without it being easy to fix upon any decided plagiarisms. Romulus is supposed to invite all the gods to a banquet at the Saturnalia, and with them all the emperors.

The gods are seated on the thrones, and the Caesars are brought in one by one in chronological order. This gives an opportunity for satirical remarks upon them, which are mostly put into the mouth of Silenus. Some are excluded altogether from heaven. The rest are set down to a symposium, in which they are joined by Alexander the Great. The more important of them make speeches in their own favour as candidates for the prize of merit, which is awarded as we should expect to Marcus Aurelius. Julian cannot help, however, shewing a wish that he could give it to Alexander. In this satire he displays an especial aversion to his uncle Constantine, but does not directly mention Constantius, whose recent death made a certain reticence only decent. (Some have supposed a reference to him in p. 336 b, but the right reading is doubtless Ἰησοῦν not υἱόν, with Hertlein. For the sneer at baptism cf. Cyril vii. p. 245.)

But all this activity was subordinate or rather subsidiary to the great task which lay nearest his heart—the restoration of heathenism to its former influence and power. He worked hard to rehabilitate both its theory and its practice. A few days apparently after writing the Caesars he composed an oration for the festival of the sun, no doubt that celebrated by heathens on Dec. 25, as the “Natalis Solis invicti,” in connexion with the winter solstice. Though Constantinople had never been a heathen city, or polluted with public heathen ceremonies, he ventures on the sanguine assumption of calling it “the festival which the imperial city celebrates with annual sacrifices” (Orat. 4, p. 131 d). The main body of the oration (which is addressed to Sallustius) is taken up with the obscure theory of the triple hierarchy of worlds the κόσμος νοητός or “intelligible world,” the κόσμος νοερός or “intelligent,” and the κόσμος αἰσθητός the “visible” or “phenomenal.” In each of these three worlds there is a central principle, who is the chief object of worship and the fountain of power; but the Sun king to whom Julian especially addresses himself, as the peculiar object of his enthusiasm, is the centre of the intermediate or “intelligent” world. This ideal god is evidently a kind of counterpoise in his theology to the Word of God, the mediator of the Christian Trinity (μέση τις, οὐκ ἀπὸ τῶν ἄκρων κραθεῖσα, τελεία δὲ καὶ ἀμιγῆς ἀπ’ ὅλων τῶν θεῶν ἐμφανῶν τε καὶ ἀφανῶν καὶ αἰσθητῶν καὶ νοητῶν, ἢ τοῦ βασιλέως Ἠλίου νοερά καὶ πάγκαλος οὐσία, p. 139 b, and τῶν νοερῶν θεῶν μέσος ἐν μέσois τεταγμένος κατὰ παντοίαν μεσότητα. Cf. Naville, Jul. l’A. et sa philosophie du polythéisme, pp. 102, sq.) This oration in honour of the sun should be read in connexion with the fifth oration ‘on the Mother of the Gods’ which he delivered at her festival, apparently at the time of the vernal equinox, and while he was still at Constantinople. It is chiefly an allegorical platonising interpretation of the myth of Attis and Cybele, very different from the modern explanation, which refers it to the circle of the seasons. We shall have occasion to return to this subject in speaking of Julian’s theory of religion.*

* It is usual to date this oration at the time of Julian’s visit to Pessinus in May or June, but (1) he speaks of the

In the practice of all superstitious ceremonies, whether public or mystical, he was enthusiastic to the point of ridiculous ostentation. He turned his palace into a temple. Everyday he knew better than the priests themselves what festival was in the pagan calendar, and what sacrifice was required by it. He himself acted as attendant, slaughterer, and priest. He was to be seen at one moment carrying the wood, at another blowing the flame, at another plunging his knife into the victim's throat, at another consulting the entrails. He had as it were a passion for all the details of heathen ritual (Liban. Epitaph. p. 564, ad. Jul. cos. p. 394 sq.; Greg. Orat. 5, 22, p. 161; de Broglie, iv. pp. 126, 127). No emperor before him had so highly prized his office of pontifex maximus, in fact it is no exaggeration to say that Julian valued it as equal to all the other prerogatives of the imperial dignity (χαίρει καλούμενος ἱερεὺς οὐχ ἦττον ἢ βασιλεὺς, Liban. ad Jul. cos. p. 394). In this capacity he attempted, it would seem, to introduce something of the episcopal regimen into the loose system of the heathen priesthood, himself of course occupying the papal or patriarchal chair (cf. Greg. Or. 4, ii. p. 138). Thus he appointed Theodorus chief priest of Asia and Arsacius of Galatia, giving them control over the inferior priests; the hierophant of Eleusis was set over Greece and over Lydia, and Callixene was made high priestess of Pessinus. (Ep. 63 Theodoro is early in his reign, and the long Fragmentum epistolae may be a sequel to it; Ep. 49 Arsacio is later, as is that to Callixene, Ep. 21. The appointments of the hierophant and of Chrysanthius are described by Eunapius, Vita Maximiani, pp. 54, 57.)

As chief pontiff he issued some remarkable instructions to his subordinates, some of which have fortunately been preserved to us.

His "pastoral letters," as they may properly be called, to the chief priests of Asia and Galatia, shew a striking insight into the defects of heathenism considered as a religious ideal, and a clear attempt to graft upon it the more popular and attractive features of Christianity. He regrets several times that Christians and Jews are more zealous than gentiles, especially in the great virtue of charity to the poor (Ep. 49, pp. 430, 431; in Frag. p. 305 he refers to the influence of the Agapé and similar institutions. In Ep. 63, p. 453 d, he describes the persistency of the Jews in abstaining from swine's flesh, &c.). He promises large endowments of corn for distribution to the indigent and the support of the priesthood; and orders the establishment of guest-houses and hospitals (ξενοδοχεῖα, καταγάγια ξένων καὶ πτωχῶν, Soz. v. 16, Jul. Ep. 49, p. 430 c). In the very spirit of the gospel he insists ἀγνεία or ἀγιστεία, the feast of Cybele, as going on, pp. 169 a, 161 c, 178 c, and describes it as part of the equinoctial festival, pp. 168 c, 175 a; (2) Libanius speaks of this oration as directly after the arrival of Maximus, Epit. p. 574, bottom; (3) Libanius and Ammianus say nothing of it in describing the visit to Pessinus, ad Jul. cos. p. 398, Amm. xxii. 9, 6. Mücke, p. 171, conjectures that it was written on the night of March 27, 363, when he was at Callinicum on the Euphrates, but this, though probably right as to the day and the month (see Amm. xxiii. 3, 7) does not agree with the year as indicated by Libanius, which must be 362.

on the duty of giving clothing and food even to our enemies and to prisoners (Frag. pp. 290–291). There seems no reason to doubt that his precepts on this point proceeded from personal conviction. "Who was ever impoverished" (he writes) "by what he gave to his neighbours? I, for my part, as often as I have been liberal to those in want, have received back from them many times as much, though I am but a bad man of business; and I never repented of my liberality" (Frag. p. 290 c).

In other places he enters into minute details on the conduct and habits of the priesthood. He orders the number of sacrifices to be offered by day and night, the deportment to be observed within and without the temples, the priest's dress, his visits to his friends, his secret meditations and his private reading. He must peruse nothing scurrilous or indecent, such as Archilochus, Hipponax or the old comedy; nothing sceptical like Pyrrho and Epicurus; no novels and love-tales; but sound philosophy like Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle and the Stoics, and the histories of actual events; and he must learn by heart the hymns to the gods, especially those sung in his own temple (Frag. pp. 300–301; cp. Ep. 56, to Ecdicius, ordering him to train boys for the temple choirs). He must avoid theatres and taverns, and generally all places of public resort where he is likely to hear or see anything vulgar or indecent (Frag. p. 304 b, c; Ep. 49, p. 430 b). As for the so-called "venationes" or spectacles of wild-beasts, not only priests, but the sons of priests, are forbidden to attend them (Frag. p. 304 d). The true priest is to be considered superior, at least in the temple, to any public official, and to be honoured as the intercessor between gods and men (Frag. p. 296 b, c; cf. the edict to the Byzantines against applauding himself in the Tychaenum, Ep. 64). He, however, who does not obey the rules laid down for his conduct, is to be removed from his office (Frag. p. 297; Ep. 49, p. 430 b); and we possess an edict of Julian's suspending a priest for three months on account of injury done by him to a brother priest (Ep. 62).

Besides this regulation of priestly life he wished to propagate positive belief in his religion by direct instruction. "He intended" (says Gregory Or. iv. 111, p. 138) "to establish schools in all cities, and professorial chairs of different grades, and lectures on heathen doctrines, both in their bearings on moral practice and in explanation of their abstruser mysteries." Of such lectures, no doubt, he wished his own orations on the Sun and the Mother of the Gods to be examples. Nor was he content with this imitation of Christian sermons and lectures, but desired to set up religious communities of men and women, vowed to chastity and meditation (ἀργενυθρίδι τε καὶ καρθνεύματα καὶ φροντιστήρια, cp. Soz. v. 16). These were institutions indeed familiar to Oriental heathenism, but out of harmony with the old Greek spirit of which Julian professed himself so ardent an admirer.

He was, indeed, without knowing it, not so much a disciple of Socrates as of the Hindu philosophy, a champion of Asian mysticism against European freedom of thought. Had he lived and been able to carry out his reforms we might have seen the curious spectacle of a heathen established church propagating itself in the Roman empire with some of the energy and self-denial of the early Buddhist missions. The success of the Manichaeans in many provinces, and for many centuries, though working in secret and with all the force of the law against them, shews us how many minds were ready to take up such a form of belief.

In his own person he adopted the Cynic mode of life, with all its roughness and austerity. He began to grow a beard and leave his hair untrimmed soon after his entrance into Constantinople, as a sign of his profession of philosophy (see below, section vi. Coins). His example attracted a number of superficial imitators who donned the cloak and the wallet, who did not object to grow a beard and bear a staff, but were not prepared for the cold baths, the hard bed, and the poor fare which belonged to the true disciples of Diogenes (cp. Or. vi. pp. 200, 201, and Or. vii. p. 225). Julian inveighed against these false cynics in two remarkable orations, one delivered apparently at Constantinople about the same time as the oration in honour of the Mother of the Gods, the other somewhere on his journey through Asia Minor, perhaps at Pessinus (Or. vii. in Heraclium cynicum, about the end of March, and vi. adversus imperitos canes, about midsummer, see p. 181 a). To the former of the two he subjoined a curious fable, intended as a specimen of a truly edifying mythus, in which he describes his relations to Constantius, and speaks of himself as a child entrusted to the guardianship of the sun (p. 229).

But Julian did not only use his literary and personal influence and pontifical authority in favour of the worship of the gods, he gave it also the full support of his imperial power. The temples, of course, were reopened where they were standing, or rebuilt at the expense of those who had destroyed them. They also received back again their estates, which had been to some extent confiscated under Constantius, a measure of reprisal which gave an edge to the persecution of those of his courtiers who had enriched themselves by these spoils (Amm. xxii. 4, 3, "pasti ex his quidam templorum spoliis;" Liban. Epit. p. 564, describes the general plan of restitution; cp. his Ep. 624 πᾶσι κηρύξας κομιέσθαι τὰ αὐτῶν).

It is further unnecessary to say that whoever was a friend of the gods was treated as a friend of the emperor's, whoever was their enemy became his (Lib. Epit. p. 564, and more strongly p. 617, ὄκ ἐπολέμησε τοῖς ἑμῶν πεπολεμηκόσιν). Yet direct persecution was forbidden, and milder means of conversion were practised (Ep. 7 to Artabius; Liban. Epitoph. p. 564). He even bore with some patience the public attacks of the blind and aged Maris, Arian bishop of Chalcedon, who called him an "impious atheist," while he was sacrificing in the Tycheum of Constantinople. Julian replied only with a scoff at his infirmity. "Not even your Galilean God will heal you." Maris retorted, "I thank my God for my blindness, which prevents me from seeing your apostasy," a rebuke of which the emperor took no further notice. (Sozomen, v. 4, where we must of course read τυχαίω for τειχίω, cf. Jul. Ep. 64, Byzantinis). Such comparative gentleness in the master of the world, joined to his flattering attempts at conversion, and evident joy when it was accomplished, naturally had an effect. Not a few persons of position apostatised, amongst whom may be mentioned his maternal uncle Julianus, his former tutor, Hecebolius, the officials Felix, Modestus, and Elpidius, and the former bishop of Ilium Novum, Pegasius, all of whom were rewarded by promotion. (Philostorgius, vii. 10; Soer. iii. 13; Libanius, pro Aristophane, pp. 435, 436, and Ep. 17; Greg. Naz. Or. iv. 62, p. 105; Jul. Ep. 78; cf. Sievers, Libanius, p. 105. On the readiness of many of these converts to return to the church cf. Asterius of Amasea, Hom. in Avaritiam, p. 227 and Hom. xix. in Psalms. v. p. 433, Migne).

But the number of these new converts was less than might perhaps have been surmised from the divided state of the Church and the low standard of court Christianity under Constantius. It was far less no doubt than Julian's own sanguine expectations. Caesarius, as we have seen, stood firm, and so did three prominent officers in the army, destined to be his successors in the empire—Jovian, Valentinian, and Valens (Valentinian was banished, Sozomen, vi. 6; Philost. vii. 7; cf. Greg. Or. iv. 65, p. 106). The steadfastness of the court and the army was indeed sorely tried. The monogram of Christ was removed from the Labarum, and replaced by the old S.P.Q.R.; and heathen symbols again began to make their appearance, to some extent at least, upon the coinage, and upon statues and pictures of the emperor, so that it was difficult to pay him respect without appearing to bow to an idol. (Greg. Or. iv. 80, 81, pp. 116, 117; Soer. vi. 17. For coins see below. Socrates probably somewhat exaggerates. The obscure letter of Julian to a painter, Ep. 65, appears to reprimand him for painting him without his customary images in his hands or by his side.) Julian even condescended to a trick to entrap a number of his soldiers, probably of the praetorian guard, by persuading them to offer incense on the occasion of their receiving a donative from his hands (Sozomen, v. 17; Greg. Or. iv. 83, 84, pp. 118, 119; cf. Rode, p. 62). Some of the soldiers on discovering the snare, from the jeers of their companions, protested loudly against it, and threw down their money; and Julian, in consequence, dismissed all Christians from his bodyguard. (Greg. l. c.; Soer. iii. 13.) Many of the common soldiers were doubtless less firm, and conformed to the change of the times, at least outwardly, but the election of Jovian by the Persian army looks as if their conviction was not at all a deep one. (Liban. ad Jul. cos. Jan. 1, 363, p. 399; Greg. Orat. iv. 64, 65, p. 106; S. Chrys. de Babylonia contra Julianum, § 23, vol. ii. pp. 686, 687, ed. Gaume; cp. Sievers, Libanius, pp. 107–109.)

At the same time it was very well understood that no Christian official would be promoted to high civil functions, while converts like Felix and Elpidius were advanced to the principal offices of the state. Julian is reported to have stated in an edict that the Christian law forbade its subjects to wield the sword of justice, and therefore he could not commit the government of provinces to them. Such a sentiment may be considered very characteristic, and this edict is probably an historical fact. (Rufin. i. 32, militiae cingulum non dari nisi immolantibus iubet. Procurationem provinciarum iurisque dicendi Christianis statuit non debere committi, utpote quibus etiam propria lex gladio uti vetuisset; cp. Sozom. v. 13, S. Chrys. in Juventinum et Maximinum, § 1, vol. ii. p. 691. The fact is admitted by Rode, p. 85, note 9, who well compares Jul. Ep. 43, Hecebolio; see, on the other hand, Libanius, pro templis, tom. ii. p. 103, where he contrasts Julian's toleration with Theodosius's rigour.) We must not, however, suppose that it extended to persons already in office or in the army, unless they offered resistance to the course of events.

This pressure put upon the army and the official class was seconded by measures aimed at the clergy as a body, and intended to reduce the Church generally to the position which it held before Constantine. The Church suffered as much perhaps as private owners of property by the order to restore the temples and refund temple lands. The clergy and widows who had received grants from the municipal revenues were not only deprived of them for the future but obliged to repay their previous receipts—an act of great injustice (Sozomen, v. 5). The Church also lost its power of inheritance, and the privileges accorded to its ministers of making wills and of jurisdiction in certain cases (Jul. Ep. 52, p. 437 A, Bostrenis). But perhaps what was felt most of all was the loss of immunity from personal taxation and from the service of the curiae or municipal councils, who were held responsible for the taxes of their district. A short decree issued on March 13, 362 made all persons, formerly privileged as Christians, liable to the office of decurion (Cod. Theod. xii. 1, 50). No doubt this disestablishment and disendowment of the Church was a measure technically defensible in a heathen emperor, and Julian reckoned on gaining the favour of the town-councils by these measures (cp. Sievers, Libanius, p. 111). We may even readily admit that the Church would have been safer and holier without some of its privileges, which bound it too closely to the state. But to abolish them all at once, without discussion or even warning, was a very harsh proceeding, which threw many persons into great suffering. We must not judge such a measure merely theoretically, but may feel sure that Ammianus only spoke the general opinion when he censured the conduct of his hero, "Municipalium ordinum coetibus patiebatur iniuste quosdam adnecti, vel ab his consortiis privilegiis aut ordine longe discretos" (Amm. xv. 4. 21, cf. xxii. 9. 12). A Greek decree of apparently the same date, addressed to the Byzantines—for so it would seem that Julian preferred to call the citizens of Constantinople—extended the effect of this measure to all privileged persons whatsoever, except those who had "done public service in the metropolis," that is probably those who had as consuls or praetors exhibited costly games for the public amusement (Ep. 11 ἔξω τῶν ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει λελειουργηκότων—Mamertinus and Nevitta would be cases in point). The wide scope of this decree was limited by a later one addressed to the "chief physicians" confirming them in their existing immunities (Cod. Theod. xiii. 3-4, nearly equivalent to Ep. 25*). We do not hear of a similar favour granted to literary professors, but it can hardly be doubted that it was given by a man of Julian's tastes. In other cases, however, he was very chary of allowing such privileges, being very properly anxious to spread the burden of taxation over as large an area as possible. Another measure of economy, the suppression of the free use of the public posts, was hardly open to criticism, at any rate as regarded Christian officials. It had been much misused by bishops of the late reign, running to and fro to those synods which had contributed not a little to the unrest and distraction of the Church (Cod. Theod. viii. 5. 12, dated Feb. 22).

In the spring of this year, while he was still at Constantinople, the affairs of the church of Alexandria attracted Julian's attention, and led him to take the first decided step outside of the policy of personal toleration which he had laid down for himself. The intruded Arian bishop, George of Cappadocia, had made himself equally detested by pagans and Catholics. On Dec. 24 he was foully murdered by the former (without any intervention of Christians) in one of those barbarous and furious riots which were characteristic of the city. Dracontius, master of the mint, who had overturned an altar recently set up in his office, and Diodorus, who was employed in building a church and gave offence to pagan prejudices by cutting short the hair of some boys employed under him, were both torn to pieces in the same sedition (Amm. xxii. 11, 9, and cp. Coins). Julian wrote an indignant reprimand to the people, but, with what appears to us to be wholly mistimed leniency, inflicted no punishment for the disorder (Ep. 10, Amm. xxii. 11; cp. Julian's letter to Zeno, Ep. 45). He took care, moreover, to make a particular enquiry for those books of George's which he remembered using in Cappadocia, and now wished to add to his library (Ep. 9 and 36, to Ecdicius and Porphyrius.) On Feb. 22 St. Athanasius was again seated upon his throne amid the rejoicing of the people. Julian at once detected in him an enemy whom he could not afford to tolerate. He wrote to the Alexandrians (apparently at once), saying that one who had been so often banished by royal decree ought to have waited for a special permission to return; that he had indeed allowed the exiled bishops to come back, but that he did not mean to restore them to their churches; Athanasius, he fears, has resumed his "episcopal throne," to the great disgust of the "god-fearing Alexandrians." He therefore orders him to leave the city at once, on pain of greater punishment (Ep. 26. Rode, though generally very accurate, makes a mistake, p. 80, note 15, as to the relation of this letter to Ep. 6, having overlooked Ep. 51, p. 98 c). Athanasius braved the emperor's wrath, and did not leave Alexandria, except, perhaps, for a time, feeling, probably, that he had only acted entirely within the limits of the emperor's original decree. Public feeling was with him, and an appeal was apparently forwarded to the emperor to reconsider his sentence. (Ep. 51, written probably in October 362, speaks of Athanasius as ἐπιστημένους by the Alexandrians. It refers to the banishment from Alexandria as πάλαι; so Ep. 6, πρὸ πλείονος χρόνου.) The sequel of this appeal will appear later.

Another change of policy about this time, which may be mentioned in this connexion, shewed a still further advance in the region of intolerance and inconsistency. Julian determined to take the control of education into the hands of the state, being convinced from his own experience of the immense influence which it had in the formation of opinion, and very possibly being urged on by the sophists and rhetoricians who surrounded him. On June 17, from some place upon his route between Constantinople and Antioch, probably either from Ancyra or Pessinus, he issued an edict, which was promulgated at Spoleto, to the Western empire, on the 28th of the same month. This document said nothing about Christian teachers, but required that all professors and schoolmasters should receive a diploma of approval from the municipal council in every city, before venturing to teach. This diploma was to be forwarded to himself for his counter signature (Cod. Theod. xiii. 3, 5). The oppressiveness of this measure in its interference with the liberty of teaching, and in the power it gave the emperor to veto any appointment which he disliked, is sufficiently obvious; and it was no doubt secretly aimed at Christian teachers. But it was far eclipsed by another, which is generally supposed to have been issued soon after it, and which struck an open and a violent blow at the welfare of the Church. It may have been issued even earlier; it can hardly have been much later. (Ep. 42, with no title or date. Ammianus refers to it after the account of Julian's wintering in Antioch, xxii. 10, 7, but he is not always careful of chronological order, e.g. in the next chapter he describes the death of George, which had taken place nearly a year before. Nor does any writer connect the decree with Libanius, which must have been almost certainly done, rightly or wrongly, if it had been issued at Antioch.)

This edict is so notorious and so often quoted that it is desirable to give a summary of it. "True learning," it declares, "consists in right opinions, not in literary proficiency. Even in trifles discord between mind and tongue is wrong. But in great things, such as teaching, only a cheat and a charlatan will teach one thing while he thinks another. All teachers, especially those who instruct the young, ought to be gentle, and not oppose the common belief, and try to insinuate their own—rhetoricians, grammarians, and sophists or teachers of philosophy and political science in particular.

"Now Homer, Hesiod, Demosthenes, Herodotus, Thucydides, Isocrates, and Lysias all founded their learning upon the gods, and considered themselves dedicated to Hermes or the Muses. It is monstrous, then, that those who teach these writers should dishonour their gods. I do not wish them to change their religion that they may retain their offices, but I give them the choice, either not to teach, or, if they prefer to do so, to teach at the same time that none of these authors is guilty of folly or impiety in his doctrine about the gods. They make a living by the writings of these men, and ought not to perjure themselves for a few drachmas.

"Up to the present time it was unsafe to profess the religion of the gods, but now there is no longer any excuse (as there was then) for reticence of opinion. If such teachers think these authors which they expound wise, and draw philosophy from them, let them emulate their religion. If they think them in error, let them go to the churches of the Galileans and expound Matthew and Luke, who forbid our sacrifices. I wish, however, the ears and tongues of you Christians may be 'regenerated,' as you would say, by these writings which I value so much.

"We do not, however, forbid (Christian) children to go to school. We do not wish to force them into the right path, but to persuade them. The ignorant should, in my opinion, be instructed, not punished."

The careful reader will have noticed the excuse which Julian makes, by the way, for his own recent dissimulation and hypocrisy, while he is attacking Christian professors most unfairly as teaching one thing and thinking another. He will notice also that he makes a distinction between teachers and learners. How is it then that the church historians say that Julian forbade Christian children to be taught heathen literature? (Rufin. i. 32; Sozom. v. 18; cf. Soc. iii. 16). The probability seems to be that Christians considered the decree practically to exclude them from the schools. For Julian expressly orders all teachers to insist on the religious side of their authors. Grammar-schools under his edict were to become seminaries of paganism. No indifferent or merely philological teaching was to be allowed. No sincere Christian parents therefore could venture to send their sons to such schools, though Julian could not but be eager that Christian children should frequent them. This is, in fact, Gibbon's solution: "The Christians were directly forbid to teach; they were indirectly forbid to learn, since they would not frequent the schools of the Pagans."

It is to be remarked that the quotation given by Gregory, as if from this decree, is not found in the text of the edict as it has come down to us (Or. 4, 102, p. 132). Perhaps he may be quoting from a defence of his measure in some other of Julian's writings, such as the books against the Christians. The words which he attributes to him are at any rate characteristic enough—"Literature and the Greek language are naturally ours, who are worshippers of the gods; illiterate ignorance and rusticity are yours, whose wisdom goes no further than to say 'believe.'" The last taunt, it will be observed, is borrowed from Celsus (Origen, c. Celsum, i. 9).

Two celebrated men are known to us who gave up their posts rather than submit to this edict, Prohaeresius of Athens, whom many thought superior to Libanius, and C. Marius Victorinus of Rome. Julian had already made overtures to the former of these (Ep. 2), and no doubt hoped to gain him, as he had gained his old tutor Hecebolius. It is said that he even offered to exempt him from the action of the edict; but he refused to be put in a better condition than his fellows (St. Jerome, Chron. sub anno 2378; cf. Eunap. Prohaeresius, p. 92; Himerius, p. 95; and Frag. 76, p. 544, ed. Boissonade). Victorinus was equally famous at Rome, and his constancy was a subject of just glory to the Church (see the interesting account of his conversion, &c., in St. Augustine, Conf. viii. 2-5).

Courageous attempts were further made to supply the place of classical literature by putting historical and doctrinal portions of Scripture into Greek prose and verse. Thus the elder Apollinaris wrote twenty-four books in hexameters, which were to form a substitute for Homer on the biblical history up to the reign of Saul, and produced tragedies and lyrics, and even comedies, on biblical subjects (Soz. v. 18). The younger Apollinaris, with equal versatility, reduced the writings of the New Testament into the form of Platonic dialogues (Socr. iii. 16); and some of the works of Victorinus in Latin, such as the poem on the seven Maccabean brothers, and various hymns, may have been written under the same stimulus (cf. Tenfel, Gesch. der Röm. Lit. § 384, 7). The Greek tragedy, still extant, of Christus patiens probably belongs to the same class of writings. Whatever may have been the merit of these books, they could not properly supply the place of the classical training; and if Julian had lived, and this edict could really have been put in force for any time, it must have been a very dangerous instrument for the injury of the faith. (Socrates has some very good remarks on this subject, iii. 16.)

§ 5. Julian's Journey through Asia Minor, May—July, 363.

After a sojourn of about five months in Constantinople Julian began to think of foreign affairs. He was freed from any fears of internal resistance by the surrender of Aquileia, which had been seized behind his back by some of the troops of Constantius. He determined upon an expedition against Persia, the only power which he thought worthy of his steel. Shortly after May 12 he set out upon a progress through Asia Minor to Antioch. (This is the date of the confirmation of the immunities of physicians. Zosimus, iii. 11, 6, says he spent "ten months in Byzantium," but this is an obvious blunder.) Passing through Chalcedon, he made his first halt at Nicomedia, which had recently been almost destroyed by an earthquake (in 358 Amm. xvii. 7). The sight of its ruins drew tears from his eyes, and he gave considerable sums towards the work of restoration (Amm. xxii. 9, 3, 4). He passed through Nicaea into Galatia, apparently as far as Ancyra, from which place, perhaps, he despatched the edict about education which we have just described (Amm. xxii. 9. 5, ad Gallograeciae fines unde dextrorsus itinere declinat Pessinunta convertit; ib. 8, Ancyram redit; see Spruner's map. If the law, Cod. Just. i. 40, 5, is rightly attributed to Julian, he was at Ancyra on May 28; see Krueger, p. xxxviii. and chronological table, ed. 1877). To the time of his residence at Ancyra belongs the following somewhat hyperbolic inscription set up by Secundus Sallustius, which celebrates his triumphant march from the Western Ocean to the Tigris!—DOMINO TOTIVS ORBIS | IVLIANO AVGVSTO | EX OCEANO BRI | TANNICO VIS (i.e. viis) PER | BARBARAS GENTES | STRAGE RESISTENTI | VM PATEFACTIS ADVS | QVE TIGRIDEM YNA | AESTATE TRANSVECTO SATVRNINVS | SECVNDVS V. C. praef. | PRAET. d. N. M. g. e. (C. I. L. iii. 247, Orell. 1109, Wilmanns 1089, who partially confuses the two Sallusts). From Ancyra he also visited Pessinus in Phrygia, which lay at some distance to the S.W., off the high road, in order to pay his homage to the famous sanctuary of the Mother of the Gods, at which he offered large and costly presents (Amm. l. c. Lib. ad Jul. cos. p. 398). The oration in honour of this deity, who, with the Sun-god, was Julian's chief object of veneration, was probably delivered, as we have seen, at an earlier date; but he took occasion about this time to vindicate the doctrine of Diogenes from the aspersions of false and luxurious cynics (Or. vi. eis τοὺς ἀπαίδευτους κύνας, delivered about the summer solstice, p. 181 a). The appointment of Callixene as high-priestess may, perhaps, have been made at this time (Ep. 21); another letter shews us that he was not satisfied with the progress of heathenism amongst the people of the place (Ep. 49, Arsacia pontifici Galatiae, ad fin.). From Pessinus he returned to Ancyra, where, according to the Acts of the Martyrs, a presbyter named Basil was accused of exciting the people against the gods and speaking injuriously of the emperor and his apostate courtiers. Basil was cruelly treated in his presence, and, after being brought up a second time, was put to death by red-hot irons (Bollandists, March 22; also in Ruinart, Acta Mart. Sincera, p. 599; Sozomen, v. 11). [See BASILIVS OF ANYCRA, Vol. I. p. 282.] He left Ancyra, according to the same Acts, on June 29, and soon after was met by a crowd of litigants, some of them clamouring for a restoration of their property, others complaining that they were unjustly forced into the curia, others accusing their neighbours of treason. Julian shewed no leniency to the second class of complainants, even when they had a strong case, being determined to allow as few immunities as possible (Amm. xxii. 9. 12; cf. xxv. 4. 21). To the rest he was just and fair, and an amusing instance is recorded of the way in which he disposed of a charge of treason. The accuser had no better evidence to offer than that the supposed criminal was making himself a robe of purple silk. Julian heard him for a long while, till, at last, his patience was exhausted; then, turning to the high treasurer, he said, "Give this dangerous babbler a pair of purple shoes to carry to his adversary, to match the robe which he says he has been manufacturing, that people may understand how little mere pieces of cloth can do without power in the wearer" (Amm. xxii. 9, 8—11).

On passing into Cappadocia, his ill-humour was roused by finding almost all the people Christian. "Come, I beseech you," he writes to the philosopher Aristoxenus, "and meet me at Tyana, and shew us a genuine Greek amongst these Cappadocians. As far as I have seen, either the people will not sacrifice, or the very few that are ready to do so are ignorant of our ritual" (Ep. 4). He had already shewn his anger against the people of Caesarea, the capital of the province, who had dared, after his accession, to destroy the Temple of Fortune, the last that remained standing in their city. According to Sozomen (v. 4), he erased the city from the "list of the empire and called it by its old name Mazaca." He fined the Christians three hundred pounds of gold, confiscated the property of their churches, and enrolled their ecclesiastics in the militia of the province, besides imposing a heavy poll-tax on the Christian laity. But either these severe measures must have been justified by great violence on the part of the Christians, or Sozomen's account is exaggerated; for Gregory Nazianzen, in referring to this subject, says, that it is perhaps not fair to reproach him with his violent conduct to the Caesareans, and speaks of him as "justly indignant" (Or. 4, 92, p. 126). Such mild language on the part of Gregory, with respect to circumstances where he was naturally tempted to declaim, may well make us attach more weight to his statements with respect to Julian's misdoings on other occasions. At the present time the emperor was further incensed by the tumultuous election of Eusebius to the bishopric of Caesarea, a proceeding in which the soldiers of the garrison took part. This Eusebius was still a catechumen, but a man of official rank and influence, and known to be an enemy of the emperor's (Greg. Or. in patrem, xviii. 33, p. 354). The elder Gregory firmly resisted the remonstrances of the governor of the province, who was sent to him by Julian, and the storm passed away (ib. 34, p. 355). "You knew us," cries Gregory, "you knew Basil and myself from the time of your sojourn in Greece, and you paid us the compliment which the Cyclops paid Ulysses, and kept us to be swallowed last" (Or. 5, 39, p. 174). The silence of Gregory may also be taken as clenching the arguments from style against the genuineness of the supposed correspondence between Julian and St. Basil, which would otherwise be assigned to this date (see p. 490 f.). The letters referred to are Epp. 40, 41, in the editions of St. Basil, the first of these = Jul. Ep. 75 (77 Heyler); cf. Rode, p. 86, note 11). Julian apparently avoided Caesarea and the Caesareans as much as possible, and pressed on to places where he expected to find the people better disposed to heathenism. He probably left it on his left hand, and proceeded as directly as possible to Tyana, near the southern extremity of the country.

A more pleasant reception awaited him in the neighbouring province Cilicia. As he entered it by the famous pass of the Pylæ Ciliciae he was met by the governor, his friend Celsus, once his fellow-student, and probably his confidant at Athens. (See above, § 2 at the end.) Julian kissed him, and, as he stood by the altar, listened to the panegyric which Celsus had prepared for him—a greeting more agreeable to him than any of the customary presents made to emperors on their progresses through the provinces (Amm. xxii. 9, 13; Lib. Epit. p. 575, and Ep. 648). He shewed his high esteem for his encomiast by taking him up into his chariot and entering with him into Tarsus, a city which evidently pleased him by its welcome. Celsus accompanied him to the southern boundary of his province, a few leagues north of Antioch. Here they were met by a large crowd, among whom was Libanius. The great rhetorician had prepared no panegyric, being always independent in his relations with the emperor, but was much flattered by his first words on recognising him in the concourse—"When shall we hear you?" (Lib. de vita sua, p. 81; Epist. 648; see Sievers, Libanius, p. 91). He reached Antioch before July 28, the date of a law found in both the Codes, permitting provincial governors to appoint inferior judges or judices pedanei. (Cod. Theod. i. 68 = Cod. Just. iii. 3, 5; in a fuller form in C. I. L. iii. 459).

We have seen that in the previous seven months philosophic toleration and gentle means of conversion were being gradually abandoned by the emperor for unjust pressure, though not attaining to open persecution. The eight months spent at Antioch left Julian much more bitter against the Church, and less careful to avoid injustice to its members, in fact countenancing persecution even to death, though, in word, still forbidding it and proclaiming toleration. Julian's character was, as we have already seen, an inconsistent one, and we have constantly to draw a distinction between his principles and profession on the one hand and his individual acts on the other. (Libanius says that Julian spent nine months at Antioch, Epit. p. 578, 15, but it is hard to make more than eight.)

The narrative of events during this period is somewhat difficult to pursue in a single thread, and it is, therefore, better to divide it into an account of (a) his relations with the citizens of Antioch; (b) his relations to the church at large; (c) attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.

(a.) Internal State of Antioch.

On his entrance into the city Julian's wish was fulfilled. The orator greeted him in a speech of moderate length, in which he begins by congratulating him on bringing back at once the ancient rites of sacrifice and the honour due to the profession of rhetoric (Prospioneticus Juliano, ed. Reiske, i. p. 405). But other sounds, less sweet than those of the voice of Libanius, filled the city upon his arrival, and saddened him with a presage of his coming doom. It was the festival of the lamentation for Adonis, and the air resounded with shrieks for the lover of Venus, cut down in his prime as the green corn fails before the heat of the summer sun.<sup>b</sup> This ill-omened beginning was followed by other equally unpropitious circumstances, and the residence of Julian at Antioch was a disappointment to himself and disagreeable to almost all the inhabitants. He was impatient, or soon became so, to engage upon his Persian campaign; but weighty reasons, such as the difficulty of making the necessary preparations in time, determined him to pass the winter at the Syrian capital. (Liban. Epit. p. 576, foll. speaks of his impatience; Amm. xxli. 10, 1, says, "Ibi hiemans ex sententia;" the two are not difficult to reconcile.) He had anticipated much more devotion on the part of the pagans, and much less force and resistance on that of the Christians than he discovered in reality. He was disgusted at finding that both parties regretted the previous reign—"Neither the Chi nor the Kappa" (that is, neither Christ nor Constantius) "did our city any harm" became a common saying (Misopogon, p. 357 a). To the heathens themselves the enthusiastic form of religion to which Julian was devoted was little more than an unpleasant and somewhat vulgar anachronism. His cynic asceticism and dislike of the theatre and the circus was unpopular in a city particularly addicted to public spectacles. His superstitution was equally unpalatable. The short, untidy, long-bearded man, marching pompously in procession on the tips of his toes, and swaying his shoulders from side to side, surrounded by a crowd of abandoned characters, such as formed the regular attendants upon many heathen festivals, appeared seriously to compromise the dignity of the empire.<sup>c</sup> The blood of countless victims flowed everywhere, but, to all appearance, served merely to gorge his foreign soldiery, especially the semi-barbarous Gauls; and the streets of Antioch were disturbed by their revels, and by drunken parties carrying one another home to their barracks (Amm. xxii. 12, 6). These things were patent to every one, and were in every one's mouth for ridicule or censure. More secret rumours were spread of horrid nocturnal sacrifices and of the pursuit of those arts of necromancy from which the natural heathen conscience shrank only less than the Christian.<sup>d</sup> If all this vexed the pagans, we can conceive how bitter it was to the large body of Christians, especially in the person of one who was a renegade from the faith which first obtained its name at Antioch. The wonder is, not that Julian quarrelled with the Antiochenes, but that he left the city without a greater explosion than actually took place. In his conduct of public business, indeed, where there was no question of religion, he was generally fair, and Ammianus gives several rather interesting anecdotes of his justice and clemency (xxii. 10). Even here he was impulsive and inconsistent in action, and inquisitive, and undignified in manner; but in general he did not scruple to acknowledge and repair his faults when corrected by a friend. At other times, as we shall see, he exhibited that obstinacy which is not infrequently found with a flighty temper—an obstinacy which is acquired rather than natural, being partly the result of reserve from living in an uncongenial atmosphere, and partly, perhaps, affected by persons who are conscious that their character wants ballast and steadiness.<sup>e</sup>

Not a little of the irritation between the emperor and the citizens of Antioch was centered upon the suburb of the city, called Daphne, a delicious cool retreat in which, as it was fabled, the nymph beloved by Apollo had been transformed into a laurel. Here was a celebrated temple of the god, and a spring that bore the name of Castalian, and here in former days had been the favourite haunt of the gay, the luxurious, and the vicious. Gallus, during his government as Caesar had counteracted the genius loci by transposing to it the relics of the martyr bishop Babylas, whose chapel was erected opposite the temple of Apollo. The worship of the latter had almost ceased, and Julian, going to Daphne, in the month of August (Loüs), to keep the annual festival of the Sun-god, was surprised to find no gathering of worshippers. He had himself taken some trouble about the matter, returning for the purpose from a visit to the temple of Zeus Casius, several leagues distant, and imagining as he came along all the pomp of ritual in which he delighted. To his disgust the city had provided no sacrifice, and only one poor priest appeared, offering the sacrifice of a single goose, which he had provided at his own expense. Julian rated the town council soundly, and gives us in his Misopogon the speech which he made on the occasion (Mis. p. 361 d, sq.). He took care that in future sacrifices should not be wanting, and eagerly consulted the oracle and unstopped the Castalian spring. After a long silence he learnt that Apollo was disturbed by the presence of the "dead man," i.e. Babylas. "I am surrounded by corpses," said the voice, "and I cannot speak till they are removed" (Soz. v. 19; Chrys. de S. Bab. § 15, p. 669; Liban. Monodia in Daphne, vol. iii. p. 333). All the corpses were cleared away, but especially that of the martyr (Amm. xxii. 12, 8; Misopogon, p. 361 b). A remnant of religious awe or old superstition perhaps prevented Julian from destroying the relics of which his actions practically acknowledged the power, and they were eagerly seized upon by the Christians, and borne in triumph to Antioch. —The procession as it went along the road, for the five miles which separated Daphne from the city, chanted aloud the verses of Psalm xvii. :—"Confounded be all they that worship carved images and that delight in vain gods." Julian was incensed by this personality, and forced the prefect Sallustius, much against his will, to enquire into it with severity, and punish those concerned. A young man, Theodorus, in particular, was hung upon the rack (equuleus) and cruelly scourged with iron nails for a whole day long, till he was supposed to be dying. Rufinus, the church historian, who met him in after life, asked him how he bore the pain. Theodorus replied that he had felt but little, for a young man stood by him wiping off the sweat of his agony, and comforting him all the time (Rufin. i. 35, 36, referred to by Soc. iii. 19, and given in Ruinart, Acta Martyrum, p. 604, ed. Ratisbon. 1859). The anger of Julian was braved in a somewhat similar manner by a widow named Publica, the head of a small community of Christian virgins, who sang in his hearing the Psalms against idols, and against the enemies of God. She was brought before a court and buffeted on the face with severity, but dismissed (Theodoret, iii. 19).

An anecdote related only by an author of the 11th century may be mentioned in this connexion, as it is not without interest, though of very doubtful accuracy. Julian, in his zeal for heathen worship, "sends Oribasius the physician and quaestor to restore the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Having arrived there and begun the work, he receives the following oracle from the daemon:—

<sup>d</sup> Theodoret, iii. 25, 27; Greg. Or. 4, 92, p. 126; Chrys. de S. Babyla, 14, p. 560; cp. Amm. xxii. 12, 7, for his intemperate confidence in diviners and charlatans of all kinds. There is an interesting passage at the beginning of the Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, which reflects the condemnation of necromancy by the better minds of heathenism, and nothing can be stronger than Plato, Laws, book x. p. 909.

εἶπατε τῷ βασιλεῖ, χαμαὶ πέσει δαίδαλος αἰλά, οὐκέτι φοῖβος ἔχει καλύβαν, οὐ μάντιδα δάφνην, οὐ παγὰν λαλέουσαν· ἀπέσπερο καὶ λάλον ὕδωρ."

(Cedrenus, p. 304, vol. i. p. 532, ed. Bonn.)

Shortly after the translation of the relics of St. Babylas to Antioch, on the night of Oct. 22, the temple of Daphne itself was burnt to the ground. The heathens accused the Christians of maliciously setting it on fire; they attributed it to fire from heaven, and the prayers of St. Babylas. A story also got about that Asclepiades the cynic had left a number of lighted candles burning in the shrine (Amm. xxii. 13; Soz. v. 20; Chrys. de S. Bab. § 17, p. 674). Julian's wrath was intense. He accused the Christians of the deed, and suspected the priests of knowing more about it (Misopogon, p. 346 b, p. 361 b, c). As a punishment he ordered the cathedral church of Antioch to be closed, and confiscated its goods (Amm. xxii. 13, 2; Soz. v. 8). The order was executed by his uncle Julianus, now count of the East, with all the zeal of a new convert, and with circumstances of disgusting profanity. He also caused Theodoret, a presbyter, who still collected a congregation of the faithful, to be tortured and beheaded (Ruinart, Acta Mart. p. 605). The Christian account tells us that Julian reproved his uncle as having brought him into disgrace, but in the Misopogon he gives him nothing but praise (l. c. p. 607, Misopogon, p. 365 c). The count's miserable death, which followed soon after, was naturally treated as a judgment from heaven (Soz. v. 8; Theodoret, iii. 12, &c.). That of Felix, another renegade, which happened a little earlier, was equally remarkable for its suddenness. People observed that the two together were a presage of the emperor's own doom, for now that Julianus and Felix were gone, Augustus would soon follow, playing upon the ordinary terms of the imperial title Julianus Felix Augustus in public documents (Amm. xxiii. 1, 5). This was a trivial saying, but one just calculated to disquiet and irritate a mind like Julian's.

Antioch meanwhile was afflicted by a dearth, which almost became a famine, and all the emperor's efforts to alleviate it tended only to intensify its severity. He imported a large quantity of grain from Egypt, and fixed the market price of corn at a low figure. Speculators bought up his importations, and would not sell their own stores, and soon there was nothing in the markets. Julian was obstinate, like his brother Gallus on a similar occasion, and declared that the fault was in the magistrates, while he tried in vain to infuse some of his own public spirit into the farmers and merchants (Lib. Epit. p. 587). The town council were equally unable to get him to understand the principles of political economy, and he commanded them all to go to prison (Amm. xxii. 14, 2; Lib. Epit. p. 588). Their confinement, however, did not last a day, and they were released by the intercession of Libanius, who tells us that he was not deterred from his petition by the sarcastic hint that the Orontes was not far off (de Vita Sua, vol. i. p. 85).

The whole winter, indeed, was clouded with misfortunes. On Dec. 2 the rest of Nicomedia was destroyed by earthquake, and a large part of Nicaea suffered with it (Amm. xxii. 13, 5). News was brought too that Constantinople was in danger from the same cause, and some suggested that the wrath of the earth-shaker Posidon must be appeased. This gave Julian, who had a real affection for the city, an opportunity of showing his enthusiasm. He stood all day long in the open air, under rain and storm, in a fixed and rigid attitude, like an Indian yogi, while his courtiers looked on in amazement from under cover. It was calculated afterwards that the earthquake stopped on the very day of the imperial intercession, and Julian, it was further said, took no harm from his exposure (Lib. Epit. p. 581). But this partial success did not make him feel secure of the favour of the gods. He was convinced that Apollo had deserted Daphne, and the other deities were not propitious. Even the day of his entering the consulship, Jan. 1, 363, which was graced with an oration of Libanius (ad Julianum imp. consulem) was disfigured with a bad omen: a priest fell down dead upon the steps of the temple of the Genius. This was the more annoying, as he had no doubt intended to make his fourth consulship mark a new era by taking as his colleague his old friend Sallustius prefect of the Gauls, an honour paid to no one outside the imperial family since the days of Diocletian (Amm. xxiii. 1, 1). At the same time too he received the news of the failure of the attempt to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem, which we shall recount below (Amm. xxiii. 1, 3).

In the meantime his designs for involving the city in heathen rites caused considerable excitement and odium. He profaned the fountains of the city of Daphne according to Christian ideas, and consecrated them according to his own, by throwing into them a portion of his sacrifices, so that all who used them might be partakers with the gods. He made a similar experiment by ordering all things sold in the market, such as bread, meat, and vegetables, to be sprinkled with lustral water. The Christians complained, but in general, did not hesitate to follow the precept of the apostle in eating freely all things sold in public, without enquiring into the ceremonies they had undergone (Theodoret, iii. 15). Two young officers, Juveninus and Maximinus, were one day lamenting this state of things, and were overheard to quote the words from the Greek Daniel, ch. iii. 32, "Thou hast delivered us to a lawless king, to an apostate beyond all the heathen that are in the earth." Their words were repeated by an informer, and they were ordered to appear before the emperor. They declared the cause of their complaint, the only one (as they said) which they had to bring against his government. They were thrown into prison, and friends were sent to promise them large rewards if they would change their religion; but they stood firm, and were beheaded in the middle of the night, on the charge of having spoken evil of the emperor (Chrys. in Juvent. et Max. 3, cf. Theodoret, iii. 15). The date of this "martyrdom" may have been Jan. 25, as it appears in Latin calendars (Bollandists, Jan. p. 618). There seems no reason to doubt the circumstances, which are consistent with other facts.

Such were some of the incidents of the internal struggle in which Julian found himself engaged, and which carried him on against his better judgment to acts of harshness and cruelty. With one half of his nature he was a fanatic, with the other a somewhat cold, sarcastic, and unsympathetic reasoner; and he passed from one temper to the other without perceiving it. He did not see that his fanaticism was an excuse for enthusiasm of a contrary kind in his subjects. But having provoked them by it, he applied the other side of his nature to judge their actions; and wondered how they could be disloyal to so tolerant and philosophic a sovereign.

He however proceeded to do what few or none of his predecessors had done before, and entered into controversy with his subjects. He had for some time been thinking of opposing Christian doctrine in a set form, and was specially incited to it by the books which Diodorus, bishop of Tarsus, had recently put out against a return to paganism [see DIODORUS, Vol. I. p. 837]. He wrote a letter to the heresiarch Photinus, in which he gave him credit for denying the divinity of Christ, and declared his own intention to write against Diodorus the traducer of heathen mysteries, whom he insults on account of his ill-health (Ep. 79, preserved in Latin by Facundus Hermianensis). Julian in consequence spent the winter evenings in writing those three books against the Christians, of which we possess the fragments in the refutation of St. Cyril of Alexandria (Lib. Epist. p. 581). The reader is referred to the section on Julian's theory of religion for a fuller account of them. In February 363 he gave another curious instance of his superstition and his wish to repress Christian feeling in his people, by decreeing that no funerals should take place by daylight, in order that no one should be disturbed by the ill-omened sights of mourning. (Ep. 77 first published in Hermes, vol. 8; cf. Cod. Theod. ix. 17, 5, dated Feb. 12.)

He discharged his spleen upon the general body of the citizens of Antioch in a still more extraordinary manner, by writing one of the most remarkable satires that have ever been published, which he entitled the Misopogon. "He had been insulted," says Gibbon, "by satires and libels; in his turn he composed under the title of the Enemy of the Beard, an ironical confession of his own faults, and a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of Antioch. The imperial reply was publicly exposed before the gates of the palace, and the Misopogon still remains a singular monument of the resentment, the wit, the humanity, and the indiscretion of Julian." (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. 24, vol. 3. p. 8, ed. Bohn).

It is of course Julian's own philosophic beard that gives the title to the pamphlet; but the discussion is naturally not confined to his outward man. The Misopogon should certainly be read by all who desire to have an insight into the character of the emperor, as it is far the most instructive of his works on this point. In form it is a dialogue between himself and the people, in which he describes his own virtues under the colour of vices, and their vices as if they were virtues. Occasionally he lays aside his irony and directly expresses his indignation against them; but in either case he reveals his own character with a humorous simplicity that in turn attracts and repels us.

This pamphlet was written in the seventh month of his sojourn at Antioch, probably that is to say in the latter half of January; and he left the city in the first week of March. Shortly before his departure he gave a practical turn to his anger against the people by appointing Alexander of Heliopolis governor of Syria—a man of turbulent and cruel disposition. "I know" (he said) "that Alexander is not fit to be a governor; but such a man suits this greedy and abusive people" (Amm. xxiii. 2, 3). He was followed as he left the town by a multitude who wished him a happy return, but he cut them short saying he intended to go to Tarsus (ib. 5; cf. Misopogon, p. 364 d, where he mentions his determination to go elsewhere). The only person apparently whom he left with any regret was Libanius, whose intercourse with him had been creditable to both of them. Libanius had asked for no favours except for his friend Aristophanes, who had suffered during the late reign on a charge of magic (see Libanius, pro Aristophane, and Epist. 670; Jul. Ep. 74, about Dec. 362). He had preserved his independence, with something of the pride of a teacher towards a pupil or a mistress towards a lover. There may have been something affected in his manner, but it was far better than the vanity and rapacity of Maximus. It was agreed between them that he should come when he was sent for, but he would not brook the suspicion of importunity by making frequent and unasked-for visits. Julian often said to him, "you have never let me make you a present, but I will settle it before I leave." One day after supper he said, "Here is my present at last. I declare that your actions assure you amongst philosophers the same rank that your speeches give you amongst orators." As he took leave of the councillors of Antioch who deprecated his anger and begged him to return, he said, "I see you put your trust in the man you will send as your ambassador to me,"—meaning, of course, Libanius,—“but I shall take him away with me too to Tarsus” (de Vita Sua, pp. 88–90). "I turn my back upon a city full of all vices, insolence, drunkenness, incontinence, impiety, avarice, and impudence," such were Julian's last words to Antioch (Lib. Legatio ad Jul. p. 469 sq.).

The general object of the emperor's policy was to degrade Christianity and to promote heathenism by every means short of an edict of persecution, or the imposition of a general penalty on the profession of the faith. This object he did not scruple to express publicly, as we have seen in the account of his residence at Constantinople. The chronology of many of the incidents which were subsidiary to this policy is obscure, and it is quite possible that some of those already related belong to this period, and that some which are still to be mentioned should have been described before. Pains, however, have been taken to discriminate them where it is possible.

We do not possess the text of many of Julian's edicts, a number of which were naturally removed from the statute book. We know, for instance, that he ordered the temples to be reopened and their estates to be restored, but we do not know the terms in which this order was couched. Probably he used bitter language against the "atheists" and "Galileans," ordering all chapels of martyrs built within the sacred precincts to be destroyed, and all relics of "dead men" to be summarily removed. Something of this kind must have been the σύνθημα or "signal," of which he speaks in the Misopogon as having been followed by the neighbouring "holy cities" of Syria with a zeal and enthusiasm which exceeded even his wishes (Misop. p. 361 a; Soz. p. 20, ad finem, mentions an order to destroy two Christian chapels near the temple of Apollo Didymaeus at Miletus). This confession from his own mouth goes far to justify the statements of his opponents. Riots occurred in consequence of this "signal" in many cities, particularly of Syria and the East, where the Christians were numerous, and popular passion was strong. The details of Julian's relation to some of these cases form perhaps the gravest stains upon his character.

The earliest case after his entry into Antioch, which can be dated exactly, was that of Titus, bishop of Bostra, in Arabia Auranitis. Julian had informed Titus (probably through the governor of the place) that he should be held responsible for every breach of the peace that occurred (Soz. v. 15, p. 102 b). The bishop had answered by a memorial, in which he declared that the Christian population was equal in numbers to the heathen, but that under his influence and that of their clergy they were careful to abstain from sedition (ἰδ.). Julian on Aug. 1, 362, replied by a public letter to the people of Bostra, in which he represents this language as an impertinence, and calumniates Titus as the accuser of the Christian body. This epistle is a curious mixture of tolerant language and suggestions of intolerant action, expressed in a way best calculated to irritate one section of the people against the other. After quoting the memorial of Titus, he proceeds:—"These are the words of the bishop concerning you. Observe, he does not ascribe your regularity to your own inclination; unwillingly, he says, you refrain 'by his exhortations.' Do you then use your wills, and expel him as your accuser from your city. . . . And for the future let the people of both parties agree amongst themselves; let no one be at variance or do an injury to another. . . . Men should be taught and persuaded by reason, not by blows, invectives, and corporal punishments. I therefore again and again admonish those who embrace the true religion in no respect to injure or insult the Galileans, neither by attacks nor reproaches. We should rather pity than hate those who in the most important concerns of all fare ill. . . . Such is their fate who turn from the worship of the immortal gods to dead men and relics" (Ep. 52).

A month or two later, probably in October, he continued his attack upon Athanasius, the first acts of which have already been described. The great champion had never left Alexandria, or had soon returned to it, and was boldly using his influence to make fresh converts, as well as to restore the peace of the Church by measures of conciliation addressed to the more reasonable of both parties, Arians and Catholics. A deputation from the city had been, as we have said, sent to petition the favour of the emperor and to intercede for the bishop. But Julian, who had been apparently occupied with other things, was thoroughly enraged to find that his first order had not been executed. He had recently been bantering the prefect Edidicus with negligence in his correspondence (Ep. 50). He now took a severer tone. "If you write to me on nothing else, you ought to write to me about Athanasius, the enemy of the gods, especially as you have long known my will and pleasure about him. I swear by great Sarapis if he does not leave Alexandria, but every part of Egypt, by the 1st of December, I will fine your cohort a hundred pounds of gold. You know that I am slow to condemn, but when I have condemned much slower in pardoning," adding in his own hand, "I am thoroughly pained at being treated in this way with contempt. By all the gods, no sight, or rather no news, of your doings could give me greater pleasure than that of Athanasius being driven from Egypt, the scoundrel who in my reign has dared to baptize Greek ladies of rank. Let him be expelled" (Ep. 6). At the same time he wrote a long effusion to the people of Alexandria, in which personal abuse of their bishop is mingled with arguments to enforce the worship of Sarapis and the visible gods, the sun and moon, and to depreciate the worship of "Jesus, whom neither you nor your fathers have seen," and "whose doctrine has done nothing for your city." "We have long ago ordered him," he concludes, "to leave the city, now we banish him from the whole of Egypt" (Ep. 51). The news of these decrees was brought to Athanasius on Oct. 23, and he felt it time to depart. "Be of good heart," he said to those who clustered round him, "it is but a cloud; it will soon pass" (Ruf. i. 32; Festal Epistles, Chronicle, p. 14, for the date). During the rest of Julian's reign he lived in retirement in the monasteries of the Egyptian desert. [See ATHANASIUS, Vol. I. p. 198.]

To Hecebolius (who was perhaps his old master advanced to some place of authority) he wrote concerning a sedition at Edessa, in much the same terms as he had written to the people of Bostra, but apparently with more justice. "I have always used the Galileans well, and abstained from violent measures of conversion; but the Arians, luxuriating in their wealth, have treated the Valentinians in a manner which cannot be tolerated in a well-ordered city. In order, therefore, that they may enter more easily into the kingdom of Heaven in the way which their wonderful law bids them, I have ordered all the money of the church of Edessa to be seized for division amongst the soldiers, and its estates to be confiscated" (Ep. 43, cf. Rufin. i. 32; Socr. iii. 13). This twisting of the gospel precept against the Church in the last sentence is a close parallel to the alleged edict forbidding Christians to exercise the sword of the magistrate, and supports its authenticity (So Rode, p. 85, note 9, see above p. 502 foll.).

Another case of disturbance was reported as having occurred between the cities of Gaza and Maiuma in Palestine. The latter, originally a suburb of Gaza had been raised by Constantius to the rank of an independent corporation. The people of Gaza had successfully petitioned the new emperor for a withdrawal of these privileges, and now in their exultation attacked their neighbours, and set fire to their chapels, with other acts of violence. Three brothers of a respectable family named Eusebius, Nestabus, and Zeno, were murdered with circumstances of great atrocity. The people were considerably alarmed by fear of what the emperor might do, and the governor arrested some of the ring-leaders, who were brought to Antioch. In this case Julian's sense of justice seems entirely to have deserted him. Not only was no reprimand addressed to the people of Gaza, but the governor was himself put on his trial and deprived of his office. "What great matter is it if one Greek hand has slain ten Galileans?" were words well calculated to bear bitter fruit wherever they were repeated, and equivalent, as Gregory argues, to an edict of persecution (Greg. Or. 4, 93, p. 127; Sozomen—who was a Gazene himself—v. 9; Rode accepts the greater part of this story, but rejects the words attributed to Julian, p. 92, note 12.) Doubt has been thrown upon the correctness of this last detail, but, I think, without sufficient reason. He did and said many things in a fit of passion, of which his cooler judgment disapproved. Disturbances against the Christians broke out in many parts of Palestine. Holy places and holy things were profaned, and Christian people maltreated, tortured, and destroyed, sometimes in the most abominable manner (Chron. Pasch. p. 546, ed. Bonn.; Soz. v. 21; Philostorgius, vii. 4). "Such scenes of religious madness" (says Gibbon) "exhibit the most contemptible and odious picture of human nature" (ch. 23, p. 550).

But perhaps all these scenes of horror were in their effect upon the popular mind unequal to the confession of Mark, bishop of Arethusa, a small town in Syria, who was said to have saved the life of the infant Julian. (Greg. Or. 4, 88-91, pp. 122-125; Soz. v. 10; Liban. Ep. 730.) His crime was refusal to pay for the restoration of a temple which he had destroyed in the preceding reign. His persecutors soon ceased to demand the full value, and only required some token of concession on his part. But he would not yield the smallest coin. He was scourged in public, his beard was torn, his naked body was smeared with honey, and hung up in a net exposed to the stings of insects and the fierce rays of the Syrian sun. Nothing could be wrung from him, and he was at last set free a conqueror. Wherever he went, he was surrounded by admirers, and this case became a warning to the more temperate and cautious pagans not to proceed to extremities. Libanius intercedes for an offender, lest he should turn out another Mark (Ep. 730); and Sallust, the prefect of the East, admonished Julian of the disgrace which this fruitless contest with an old man had brought upon the pagan cause. (Greg. Or. 4, 91, p. 125; Sallust's name is not mentioned, but his office and character are described with sufficient clearness.)

Some other details of his oppressive measures are recorded by the fathers and church historians. Thus St. Gregory tells us that in one of his edicts he ordered Christians to be called "Galileans" (Or. 4, 76, p. 114). This was only to legislate that others should follow his own universal practice, except where he distinguishes them by the appellation of "atheists" (I do not believe that the word Christians occurs anywhere in Julian's writings, except in his quotation from the letter of Titus of Bostra, Ep. 52, p. 101 d). In this usage he was following the example of Epictetus, who speaks of "the Galileans" as fearing neither sword nor tyrant "out of habit" (Arrian, Epictetus iv. 7). Gregory also tells us that he had in mind to deprive Christians of the right to use the law-courts, or rather that he intended to require a sacrificial use of incense from every litigant (Or. iv. 96, p. 129). Socrates further speaks of an actual pecuniary penalty imposed, according to their wealth, on those who refused to sacrifice, by means of which Julian raised large sums of money for his Persian campaign (iii. 13). Possibly this is to be explained of a certain number of fines inflicted on those who refused to bow to the emperor's statues, on account of their heathen ornaments, as Rode suggests (p. 86, note).

Eunapius, however, accidentally mentions a proceeding which looks like part of a larger measure for shifting the public burdens from heathen to Christian shoulders, and which he insinuates tempted Prohaeresius to waver in his constancy. "The emperor was measuring the land of the pagans for the purposes of the census, so that they might not be oppressed; and Prohaeresius asked Musonius to enquire of the gods whether this indulgence would continue. When he reported the answer, 'No,' Prohaeresius knew what was going to happen, and was in better spirits" (Eunap. Prohaeres. ad finem). We are not bound to believe the anecdote, but the historical setting can hardly be an invention.

(c) Attempt to Rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem.

Julian had apparently for some time past wished to conciliate the Jewish people. We have already noticed his expression of goodwill towards them, and his removal of the taxes which had been devised against them by the ministers of Constantius (Ep. 25). He did not indeed like their assumption of the peculiar favour of the supreme God, which he thought a mere piece of vanity. But he highly approved of their sacrificial system, and was quite ready to grant Jehovah a place amongst the other local deities (cf. Frag. p. 295 c; S. Cyril. in Spanheim's Julian, pp. 99, 100, and p. 305, on Sacrifice). It seems probable, therefore, that his chief motive in wishing to restore the Temple at Jerusalem was the desire to increase the number of divinities who were propitious to him, and to gain the favour of the Jewish god in the prosecution of his Persian campaign. This is substantially the account given by Socrates, who tells us that he summoned the Jews to him and asked why they did not offer sacrifice. They replied that it was not lawful for them to do so, except at Jerusalem, and he therefore determined to rebuild the Temple of Solomon (Socr. iii. 20). This account agrees best with the statements of the emperor himself in his epistles and in his books against the Christians; and the other motives attributed to him may be considered at any rate as subordinate to it (cf. Greg. Or. 5, 3, p. 149; Rufin. i. 37; Soz. v. 21). There is, however, an air of great probability in the statement of Philostorgius that he wished to falsify the prediction of our Blessed Lord as to the utter destruction of the Temple (vii. 9). Nor could the enmity of the Jews against the Christians be otherwise than very pleasing to him (Greg. l. c. ἐπαφῆκε καὶ τὸ Ἰουδαίων φῶλον ἡμῶν). Julian himself provided very large sums for the work, and entrusted its execution to the oversight of Alypius of Antioch, an officer who had been employed by him in Britain, and who was his intimate personal friend (Amm. xxiii. i. 2; Epp. 29 and 30 are addressed to him). The Jews were exultant, and were eager to contribute both their wealth and their labour with enthusiastic profusion. The rubbish was cleared away, and the old foundations were laid bare. But a stronger power intervened. To quote the words of Ammianus—"Whilst Alypius was strenuously forcing on the work, and the governor of the province was lending his assistance; fearful balls of flames, bursting out with frequent assaults near the foundations, and several times burning the workmen, rendered access to the spot impossible; and in this way the attempt came to a standstill through the determined obstinacy of the element (Metuendi globi flammaram, prope fundamenta crebris adultibus erumpentes, fecere locum, exustis aliquoties operantibus, inaccessum; hocque modo, elemento destinatus repellente, cessavit inceptum." Amm. xxiii. 1, 3). No doubt the Christians saw in this defeat of their oppressor not only a miracle of divine power, but a peculiarly striking fulfilment of the old prophecies in which fire is so often spoken of as the emblem and instrument of judgment. They might appeal, e.g. to Deut. xxxii. 22, Jer. xxi. 14, and particularly, perhaps, to the historical description of Lam. iv. 11, "The Lord hath accomplished His fury; He hath poured out His fierce anger, and hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof." They thought also, of course, of our Lord's own words, which were now more completely verified than ever. Julian retained his wide knowledge of the text of scripture, as we see by his writings, and these prophecies doubtless came into his head of themselves, and irritated him by their literal exactness. The "globi flammaram prope fundamenta erumpentes" of the historian are an undesigned coincidence with the words of Hebrew prophecy.

There is probably an awkward reference to all this in a remarkable passage of his fragmentary letter on the Duties of a Priest, which was apparently written a little after this time.

"Let no one disbelieve the gods" (he writes) "from seeing and hearing that their statues and their temples have been insulted in some quarters. . . . Let no one beguile us by his speeches, or unsettle us on the score of Providence. For those who reproach us on this head—I mean the prophets of the Jews—what will they say about their own Temple which has been thrice overthrown, and is not even now rising? This I have said with no wish to reproach them, inasmuch as I myself, at so late a day, had in purpose to rebuild it for the honour of Him who was worshipped there. Here I have alluded to it with the purpose of shewing that of human things nothing is imperishable, and that the prophets, who wrote as I have mentioned, raved, and were but the gossips of canting old women. Nothing, indeed, contradicts the notion of that God being great, but He is unfortunate in His prophets and interpreters. I say that they did not take care to purify their souls by a course of education, nor to open their fast-closed eyes, nor to dissipate the darkness which lay on them, and like men who see a great light through a mist, not clearly nor distinctly, and take it not for pure light but for fire, and are blind to all things round about it, they cry out loudly, 'Shudder and fear; Fire, Flame, Death, Sword, Lance,' expressing by many words that one destructive property of fire. But perhaps it is better to demonstrate separately how much these teachers of theology are inferior to our poets" (Frag. Ep. pp. 295 a–296 b; first adduced, I believe, by Warburton, Julian, bk. 1, ch. 4; cf. Newman, p. clxxviii. sq.). Dr. Newman's remarks on this passage may be quoted. "When it is considered that Julian was, as it were, defeated by the prophets of that very people he was aiding; that he desired to rebuild the Jewish Temple, and the Christians declared he could not, for the Jewish prophets had made it impossible, we surely may believe that in the foregoing passage this was the thought which was passing in his mind, while the prophetic emblem of fire haunted him, which had been so recently exhibited in the catastrophe by which he had been baffled" (l. c. p. clxxix.).

Warburton also refers to two passages of Libanius, in which he mentions earthquakes that presaged Julian's death. In the first place, he speaks of "earthquakes in Palestine and Syria destroying some whole cities and parts of others;" in the second passage, he connects them with the burning of the Temple of Apollo (de Fortuna Sua, p. 91; Monodia in Jul. p. 513 r).

From these heathen testimonies, and from the accounts of the fathers and historians of the church, Dr. Newman has put together the following detailed account of the occurrence, in which he chiefly follows Warburton. (S. Greg. Naz. Or. 5, 4–7, pp. 149–151, an oration written this very year 363; S. Ambros. Ep. 40, 12, to Theodosius.—"Non audisti, imperator, quia cum iussisset Julianus reparari templum Hierosolymis, divino, qui faciebant repurgium, igne flagrant?" S. Chrys. contra Judaeos et Gentiles, 16, vol. 1, p. 709, ed. Gaume; adv. Judaeos, v. 11, vol. 1, pp. 789, 790; contra Julianum et Gentiles, 22, vol. 2, p. 685; Rufin. i. 37; Socr. iii. 20; Sozom. v. 22; Theodoret, iii. 20; Philostorgius, vii. 14, &c.)

The order of the incidents is, of course, not certain, but only a matter of probable inference: nor can we guarantee the details as they appear in the later writers.

"They declare as follows:—The work was interrupted by a violent whirlwind, says Theodoret, which scattered about vast quantities of lime, sand and other loose materials collected for the building. A storm of thunder and lightning followed; fire fell, says Socrates, and the workmen's tools, the spades, the axes, and the saws were melted down. Then came an earthquake, which threw up the stones of the old foundation, says Socrates; filled up the excavation, says Theodoret, which had been made for the new foundations; and, as Rufinus adds, threw down the buildings in the neighbourhood, and especially the public porticoes in which were numbers of the Jews who had been aiding in the undertaking, and who were buried in the ruins. The workmen returned to their work; but from the recesses, laid open by the earthquake, balls of fire burst out, says Ammianus; and that again and again as often as they renewed the attempt. The fiery mass, says Rufinus, raged up and down the street for hours; and St. Gregory, that when some fled to a neighbouring church for safety the fire met them at the door and forced them back, with the loss either of life or of their extremities. At length the commotion ceased; a calm succeeded; and, as St. Gregory adds, in the sky appeared a luminous cross surrounded by a circle. Nay, upon the garments and the bodies of the persons present crosses were impressed, says St. Gregory; which were luminous by night, says Rufinus; and at other times of a dark colour, says Theodoret; and would not wash out, adds Socrates. In consequence the attempt was abandoned" (Newman, l. c. p. clxxvii.)

The reader will, no doubt, have observed that all these incidents present us only with a picture which resembles, even in its particular details, the extraordinary operations of what we call the forces of nature. Even for the luminous crosses there are some curious parallels in the natural history of storms of lightning and volcanic eruptions (see those collected by Warburton and quoted by Newman, p. clxxiii. notes.) The cross in the sky, like that seen by Constantine, has its likeness in the effects of mock suns and parhelia. It is impossible to decide, especially at this distance of time, how far these parallels are thoroughly adequate as descriptions of what was seen and felt at the time. But, supposing them to have been so, a Christian may still fairly assert his right to call the event a miraculous interposition of God's providence. It fulfilled all the purposes which we can assign to the Scripture miracles. It gave "an impression of the present agency and of the will of God." It seemed to shew His severe disapproval of the attempt, and His determination to support the doctrine and prophecies of Christ. It came, like the vision of Constantine, at a critical epoch in the world's history. It was, as the heathen poet has it, a "dignus vindice nodus." All who were present or heard of the event at the time thought, we may be sure, that it was a sign from God.

As a miracle then it ranges beside those biblical miracles in which, at some critical moment, the forces of nature are seen to work strikingly for God's people, or against their enemies. In the Old Testament we have, for example, the instances of the plagues of Egypt, the passage of the Red Sea and the drowning of Pharaoh's host, the crossing of the Jordan, the prolongation of sunlight at the battle of Gibeon, the destruction of Sennacherib's great army in one night before Jerusalem; in the New the stilling of the storm, and the earthquakes and the darkness at the crucifixion. A difference, indeed, strikes us at first between the series of biblical miracles and the one now in question; viz., that in them there is generally some visible agent or representative of God calling for, and, as it were, giving the signal to the work of nature. There we have Moses with his rod, Joshua raising his hand to heaven, and the like. But this is not universal. In the case, e.g. of Sennacherib's army, the visible agent is at a distance. Hezekiah's prayers were in the Temple apart from the beleaguering host, and so may be fitly compared to the prayers of Christians which we may be sure were offered against the success of Julian.

And, again, in the incidents which accompanied the crucifixion there was no visible signal given, but the darkness and the earthquake were, so to say, the spontaneous expressions of the sympathy of nature.

We see, then, in the Bible a number of miracles parallel to the one here supposed, in which the physical phenomena were apparently only extraordinary and opportune manifestations of the ordinary forces of nature. They might almost have passed as fortunate coincidences but for their extreme opportuneness. And yet the Church agrees to class them all as miracles. In this view then of the particular case before us, nature is to be compared to a prophet. A prophet, we know, sometimes moves about like ordinary men, doing the ordinary offices of life. Sometimes he speaks with inspiration, and breaks out into denunciations, predictions, and warnings. The repulse of Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem is, like some others of those recorded in the Bible, a case of nature prophesying.

§ 7. Julian's Persian Campaign and Death.— March 5—June 27, 363.

Julian's route into Persia is marked with considerable exactness; the first part of it by a letter which he wrote to Libanius from Hierapolis (Ep. 27). It is curious to notice that he found the road in bad condition the very first day's march out of Antioch, a circumstance which does not give a very high idea of the completeness of his preparations for the campaign. At Litarbe he took leave of the senate of Antioch, who met him there for the last time, and in the terms which we have recounted. At Beroea, the modern Aleppo, he tells that he "conversed with the senate on matters of religion—all praised my discourse, but few only were convinced by it" (Ep. 27, p. 399 d). We learn from another author that he attempted on this occasion to persuade a Christian senator, who had disinherited his apostate son, to take him back again; and being somewhat roughly answered by the father, he offered to act the part of a parent to the young man himself (Theodoret, iii. 22). This was just such a scene as Julian loved in certain moods. He could on such occasions bear familiarity and even impertinence from an inferior, and exhibit a rather affected tolerance and magnanimity. I think we cannot doubt that Julian's personal presence was the reverse of imposing, and that persons in speaking to him easily forgot that he was their sovereign.

At Batnae (the scenery of which he compared to that of Daphne) he found ostentatious preparations for sacrifice upon the public roads, but thought them too obviously studied and too redolent of personal flattery. At Hierapolis on the Euphrates he was received by one whom he had never seen before, but regarded as an old friend from his connexion with his friend Sopater and particularly from his resistance to the solicitations of Constantius and Gallus (Ep. 27). Leaving Edessa on his left hand, probably as a city too distinctly Christian to be visited with comfort, he next proceeded to Carrhae, a place of vigorous pagan traditions, where he was on March 19. At some distance from the town, there was a famous temple of the Moon, in which it was worshipped both as a male and a female deity, and which was known in history as the spot near which the emperor Caracalla was murdered (Herodian. iv. 13, 3; Spartian. Caracallus, 6, 6; 7, 3). Julian of course made a point of visiting it and offered sacrifices "according to the local rites." Of his secret doings in this temple there are different accounts. Ammianus had heard that he invested his relative Procopius, who was his only companion, with his paludamentum, and bid him seize the empire in case he died in the campaign on which they were engaged (Aram. xxiii. 3, 2). Among the Christians a report was current that he offered a human sacrifice. The story ran that he sealed up the temple and ordered it not to be opened till his return: and that after the news of his death people entered it and found a woman hanging by the hair of her head, and her body cut open as if to search for omens (Theodoret, iii. 26). The criticism of this story is not perfectly easy. The worship of the moon-god, the Assyrian Sin, was not, as far as we are aware, accompanied by human sacrifices in the country about Carrhae, or indeed elsewhere (so I learn from Mr. Sayce). We read, however, in many authors, that such sacrifices were offered, apparently to Mercury, for the purposes of divination, in this neighbourhood (Chwohlssohn, die Ssabier, cf. Döllinger, Heidenthum und Judenthum, pp. 403, 404). To such "local rites" as these it was not altogether unlikely that Julian would conform, and he obviously did many things in the name of religion that would at other times have been repugnant to his character. On the other hand, the story only comes to us in one comparatively late and somewhat careless author, and is one of a kind not unlikely to be invented ad invidiam, and indeed all the more likely if the customs of the place gave a certain air of probability to it. While, therefore, I do not think the story is to be summarily rejected, it cannot certainly be considered as decisive evidence.

From Carrhae two great roads diverge towards Persia, one to the left, keeping due east past Nisibis and across the Tigris, the other going generally in a south-easterly direction along the banks of the Euphrates. Julian chose the latter, but left a considerable body of troops under Procopius and Sebastianus to guard Mesopotamia, and to effect a junction with Arsaces satrap of Armenia, whose alliance he expected. Julian's army as it went along the river was accompanied by a large fleet, but he forbade any luxuries to be brought even for his own table. On March 27 he was at Callinicum and celebrated the festival of the Mother of the Gods (Amm. xxiii. 3, 7). At the beginning of April he came to Circesium (Carchemish) at the junction of the Chaboras and the Euphrates. Here he received distressing letters from his friend Sallustius in Gaul, urging him to give up his campaign as he felt sure that the gods were unfavourable and that it would have a disastrous issue (Amm. xxiii. 5, 6). At Zaitham (where Ammianus first begins to speak in the first person) they saw the high mound which marked the burial place of the emperor Gordian. The historian records numerous portents which met them on their march; amongst others, a lion which appeared at Dura gave rise to a curious dispute between the Etruscan augurs and the philosophers who followed in his train. The former shewed from their books that it was an ill omen; the latter (amongst whom were Maximus and Priscus) had historical precedents to prove that it need not be regarded as such. A similar dispute occurred the next day as to the meaning of a thunderstorm (xxiii. 5, 10 sq.). We may imagine that such superstitious discussions were not likely to embolden the soldiery, but Julian decided in favour of the philosophers and animated the army with his own courage. In an harangue which he delivered at this time he tried to dispel the prejudice that the Romans had never invaded Persia with success. Among the most important of his officers was Hormisdas (elder brother of Sapor the reigning king of Persia), who had angered the nobles of his country by some threats he had used towards them in a moment of passion, had been thrown into prison by them, and had made his escape to the court of Constantine. He became apparently a sincere Christian, and yet remained a useful and trusted officer of Julian. By his intervention several Assyrian towns opened their gates to the invaders (xxiv. 1, 6, &c.). After some other successes they came to Pirisabora,<sup>f</sup> the most populous city of Assyria after Ctesiphon, and close to the outlets of the natural and artificial rivers that join the Euphrates to the Tigris. Julian was successful in taking Pirisabora in three days, and gave a donation on this occasion to his troops. The soldiers complained of its smallness, but were brought back to their duty by a spirited oration, in which he asserted his own contempt of life, and readiness, if needed be, to retire into a private station (xxiv. 3, 4-7). He now turned to the east along the canal of Naharmalcha or King's river, which led direct to the great city of Ctesiphon on the Tigris. The country was inundated by the natives, and it required all Julian's inventive quickness and personal example to carry them through the marshes. He took another important city, Magoamalcha, in which his troops found a large booty. He himself would only accept as his share three pieces of gold, and a clever dumb boy, who was taught to express his meaning by signs. He refused even to see the beautiful female captives who were offered to him according to custom (xxiv. 4, 26, 27). After some other successes he arrived at the bank of the Tigris, at the ruins of the old Greek city of Seleucia opposite Ctesiphon. He forced the passage of the river by a very vigorous and dangerous movement in the face of the enemy, and found himself under the walls of the capital (Amm. xxiv. 6, 4-14).

But no threats or sarcasms could draw the inhabitants from their impregnable defences, and Sapor himself made no appearance. In the meanwhile the other forces of the Romans remained in Mesopotamia, where the two ambitious generals had fallen out, and received no support from Arsaces. But though Sapor did

<sup>f</sup> The date of Julian's arrival at this place may possibly be April 23. This is the date of the last law assigned to him in the two codes—Cod. Theod. xii. 7, 2 and Cod. Just. x. 73, 2—but with the place Salonae which is impossible. Godefroy conjectures acceptum Salonae, or changes Salonae into Sacronae. not appear to give battle, he sent a secret ambassador with offers of an honourable peace, the exact terms of which are, however, unknown to us (Liban. Epitaph. p. 608; Socr. iii. 21; Ammianus is here defective). These Julian declined, against the advice of Hormisdas, and not improbably under the influence of his ambitious philosophers. The example of Alexander the Great was always before him, and according to some accounts he even believed that his soul had passed into himself by transmigration (Socr. l. c.). He was fired with all sorts of vague and enthusiastic projects; he longed to visit the plain of Arbela, and to overrun the whole Persian empire like his hero (Liban. Epit. p. 609). These ideas were kindled into action by the arts of a certain Persian noble, who pretended to be a deserter, indignant against his sovereign, but who in reality played the part of a second Zopyrus (Greg. Naz. Or. 5, 11, p. 154; cf. Aurel. Victor, Epit. 67; Soz. vi. 1, p. 218). The fleet of course presented a difficulty. At all times it required a large number of men to man it, but a voyage up the stream of the Tigris (which would be the natural route for it to pursue) would have employed a still larger number of men to haul and row it (Lib. Epit. p. 610). He could not of course leave it to fall into the hands of the enemy, and he consequently determined upon the hazardous measure of burning it, with the exception of a very few vessels, which were to be placed on wheels. The order was executed at Abuzatha, where he halted five days (Zos. iii. 26). But a short time of reflection and a discovery that his Persian informants were deceiving him, made him regret his decision. He attempted to save some at least of the ships, but it was too late. Only twelve out of some 1100 were still uninjured. (Amm. xxiv. 7, 3-6; Zos. iii. 26, 4, says twenty-two, but this probably includes those first selected for carriage.) The information which we possess as to the circumstances which followed is obscure, but it is evident that what had been intended to be a triumphant progress almost insensibly became a retreat. The march was impeded by the burning of the country on the part of the enemy, which made it very difficult to procure forage and provisions. The Persian cavalry were perpetually harassing the outskirts of the army, and though beaten at close quarters were continually appearing in fresh swarms. The few ships that remained were insufficient to build a bridge by which the Romans might have opened communications with Mesopotamia. Nothing now was left but to pursue their way along the eastern bank of the Tigris, so as to reach the nearest friendly province of Corduene, in the south of Armenia, as quickly as possible. This was determined on June 16, only ten days before the death of Julian (Amm. xxiv. 8, 5). How far he had previously penetrated into the interior of the country it is not easy to determine. Not only is the text of Ammianus defective, but he seems confused in his geography, and does not give precise dates. The army reached the Tigris again at Symbra or Hucumbra, where they obtained a much needed supply of fresh provisions (Zos. iii. 27, 4; Amm. xxv. 1, 4). In the next few days the Romans fought several battles with success, but not of such a character as to ensure them a quiet march forwards. They suffered even more from want of food, and Julian bravely shared their privations on an equality with the commonest soldier (Amm. xxv. 2, 2). On the night of June 25, as he was studying some book of philosophy in his tent, he had a vision (as he told his intimates) of the Genius of the Republic leaving his tent in a mournful attitude, with a veil over his head, and over the cornucopia that he held in his hand—reminding him by contrast of the vision which he had seen the night before he was proclaimed Augustus. He shook off his natural terror, and went out into the night air to offer propitiatory sacrifices, when he received another shock from the appearance of a brilliant meteor, which he interpreted as a sign of the wrath of Mars, whom he had already offended (xxv. 2, 4; cf. xxiv. 6, 17). When day dawned the Etruscan diviners implored him to make no movement that day, or at least to put off his march for some hours. But his courage had returned with daylight, and he refused to delay, and gave the order to go forward. Several sudden attacks of the enemy in different quarters threw the army into confusion, and Julian, excited by the danger, rushed forwards without his breastplate, catching up a shield as he went. As he was raising his hands above his head to incite his men to the pursuit, a cavalry spear from an unknown hand grazed his arm, and lodged in his right side. Feeling himself wounded, he put his hand to the place, which he found bleeding profusely. He tried to draw out the spear head, but the sharp edges cut his fingers. He threw up his hand into the air with a convulsive motion, and fell fainting from his horse (Amm. xxv. 3, 7, compared with the other accounts). As he fell he uttered a cry, which was differently reported. Some said he threw his own blood towards heaven with the bitter words, "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!" (Theodoret, iii. 25). Others thought they heard him reproach the gods, and especially the Sun, his patron, for their desertion (Philostorg. vii. 15; Soz. vi. 2). He was at once borne to his tent, and his wound was dressed, no doubt by his friend Orbasius. For a moment he revived, and called for a horse and arms, but a gush of blood shewed how weak he really was. On learning that the place was called Phrygia, he gave up all hope, having been told by some diviner that he should die in Phrygia.

He addressed those who stood around him in a highly philosophic speech in the style of Socrates, of which we may well believe that Ammianus has preserved a correct report. He considered that death was sent him as a gift from the gods. He knew of no great faults he had committed either in a private station or as Caesar. He had always desired the good of his subjects, and had endeavoured to be a faithful servant of the republic. He had long known the decree of fate, that his death was impending, and thanked the supreme God that it had not come in any disgraceful or painful way, but in a glorious form. He would not discuss the appointment of his successor, lest he should pass over one who was worthy, or endanger the life of some one whom he thought fit. But like an honest child of the republic he hoped that it would find a good ruler after him.

He then distributed his personal effects to his intimate friends, and asked among others for Anatolius, the master of the offices. Sallustius (the prefect of the East) replied that he was happy. Julian understood that he had fallen, but lamented the death of his friend with a natural feeling which he had restrained in thinking of his own.

Those who stood round could no longer restrain their grief, but he still kept his habit of command, and rebuked them for their want of high feeling. "My life gives me confidence of being taken to the islands of the blest, to have converse with heaven and the stars; it is mean to weep as if I had deserved to be condemned to Tartarus." (Lib. Epit. p. 614, ἐπιτίμα τοῖς τε ἅλλοις, καὶ οὐχ ἥκιστα (τοῖς φιλοσόφοις) εἰ τῶν βεβιωμένων αὐτὸν εἰς μακάρων γήσουσιν ἀγόντων, οἱ δὲ ὡς ἀξίως ταρτάρου βεβιωκότα δακρύουσιν: Amm. xxv. 3, 22; "humile esse caelo sideribusque conciliatum lugeri principem dicens.") His last moments were spent in a difficult discussion with Maximus and Priscus on "the sublimity of souls." In the midst of this debate his wound burst afresh, and he called for a cup of cold water. He drank it, and passed away quietly at midnight on the evening of June 26, having not yet reached the age of thirty-two. (Amm. xxv. 3, 23; 5, 1; Socr. iii. 21, &c.)

It was never found out who threw the fatal spear, and though the Persians offered a reward, no one ever came forward to claim it. In such a mêlée it was quite possible that the weapon was discharged at a venture, or that the man who threw it fell himself shortly afterwards. The suggestion of Libanius that it was a Christian hand which thus wreaked vengeance on him was such as he would naturally make in his bitterness (Ἐπιταφ. pp. 612, 614). Gregory, Socrates, and Rufinus consider it uncertain whether the blow was dealt by a Persian or by one of his own soldiers (Greg. Or. v. 13, p. 155; Ruf. i. 36; Socr. iii. 21). Sozomen notices the suspicion of Libanius, and defends it in a spirit which cannot but be condemned (Soz. vi. 1).

The news of Julian's death, coupled with the intelligence that the army had elected a Christian, Jovian, to succeed him, caused enormous rejoicings, especially in Antioch. Several anecdotes are given of the knowledge of the event before the actual and authentic news was brought. Jovian was obliged to make peace by ceding the five Mesopotamian provinces, including Nisibis, which had been the bulwark of the empire in the East. Procopius was ordered to carry back the body to Tarsus, where it was interred with pagan ceremonies. The tomb was opposite to that of Maximinus Daïa, being separated only by the road, and thus the two last persecuting emperors were brought, as it were, face to face. On the tomb of Julian was engraven the following distich:

"Ἰουλιανὸς μετὰ Τίγγριν ἀγάθρον ἐνάθε κείται
ἀμφοτέρων βασιλεὺς τ' ἀγαθὸς κρατερὸς τ' αἰχμητής."

Zonaras (xiii. 13) and Cedrenus give an epitaph of four lines (also in Brünck's analecta, ii. p. 404):

Κύδνω ἐπ' ἀργυροῦντι ἀπ' Εὐφράτατο βόαν
Περσίδος ἐκ γαίης ἀτελευτήτω ἐπὶ ἔργῳ
Κινησῶσ στρατιῆς, τὰδ' Ἰουλιανὸς λάχε σῆμα
Ἀμφοτέρων βασιλεὺς τ' ἀγαθὸς κρατερὸς τ' αἰχμητής.

III.—Character.

Julian possesses a strongly marked character, with individual peculiarities which are more readily felt than analysed. He leaves upon us who stand at a distance of so many years the impression of a living man far more than most of those who are called historical personages. We like or dislike him as a matter of temperament, just as we are attracted to or repelled by our own contemporaries. We are inclined to judge him with something of the passion of actual partisanship, and of instinctive sympathy or antipathy. He is real and natural in the very strangeness and inconsistency of his conduct, and in the mixture of opposite qualities which it exhibits; and as a consequence of this inconsistency, it is impossible to say beforehand how his character will strike an observer. The most opposite and unexpected judgments have been formed upon him. He has been admired and pitied by religious-minded men, and detested and satirised by sceptics and atheists. His own friend Ammianus despised his superstition, and paints it in terms not much weaker than the invectives of Gregory and Chrysostom; Gibbon sneers at him alternately with his Christian opponents. A Comte wished to appoint an annual day for execrating his memory in company with that of Bonaparte, as one of the "two principal opponents of progress," and as the "more insensate" of the two (System of Positive Polity, E. T. vol. i. p. 82; an ordinance afterwards withdrawn, ibid. vol. iv. p. 351). Strauss treats him as a vain, reactionary dreamer, comparable to the mediaevalists who try to stay the march of modern thought. On the other hand, pietistic historians like Arnold, Neander, and even Ullmann, are tolerant and favourable towards him: thus deserting the standpoint of the ancient writers of the church.

The simple reason of this divergence is, of course, that the strongest force working in him was a self-confident religious enthusiasm, disguised under the form of self-surrender to a divine mission. Such a character constantly appears in different lights, and some of those who have judged him have looked chiefly at the sentimental side of his life, without considering his actions; while others have estimated him by his actions apart from his principles. There has been the more temptation to adopt this course because he was inconsistent himself in his conduct, and sometimes acted with, sometimes against, his principles; and hence any one who chooses to take a partial view of facts may easily find a justification in the positive statements of this or that historian, or of Julian himself.

A Christian who attempts to judge Julian without prejudice will probably go through several phases of opinion before he comes to a final estimate. All but the cold-hearted will sympathise, to some extent at least, with his religious enthusiasm, and with the sacrifices which he was ready to make in its behalf. It is impossible to doubt that he had a vein of noble sentiment, and a lofty and, in many ways, unselfish ambition. He had a real love of ideal beauty, and of the literary and artistic traditions of the past. There was something even pathetic in his hero-worship, and his attachment to those whom he supposed to be his friends.

If he was often pedantic and imitative, if he had a somewhat shallow and conceited manner, yet we must confess that much of this was the vice of the age, and this pettiness was thrown off in critical moments. Under strong excitement he often became simple, great, and natural.

Then, again, to take other features of his character, many persons will sympathise with his conservative instincts, and his wish to retain what was great in the culture and art of past ages; while others will be attracted by his mystic speculations and ascetic practices, which were akin to much that has been valued and admired in many great names in the history of the church.

But on reflection we cannot help perceiving that all this was combined with a ruling spirit and view of things which was essentially heathen, and therefore fundamentally defective, as well as antagonistic to all that we hold dearest and most vital. Julian was at bottom thoroughly one-sided. He was enthusiastic and even passionate in his religion; but it was the passion of the intellect and senses rather than that of the heart. The Christian ideas of love and grace were to him almost as if they had never existed. His whole scheme of individual life, and his whole philosophy of history, is at bottom pantheistic, that is to say, mechanical and fatalist, as we shall see in detail in the next section.

His natural instincts for well-doing were not indeed by any means wholly overlaid, and much (we may believe) of Christian habit remained; but his theory of virtue was as fruitless as that of any modern Hindu philosopher. The idea of the incarnation was foolishness to him, because he understood neither the greatness of God's will for collective humanity nor the need of atonement for man's sin. That God should take man's nature and die upon the cross appeared to him a mere madness, as it does to all who merely reason in an abstract intellectual plane of thought. Such a close contact of the finite and the infinite seemed shocking and even profane to the proud and morbid sensitiveness of the Neo-Platonist who saw God only in the pale light of reason, and judged of His goodness by the narrowness and meagreness of his own heart. Hence it came that conceit and pedantry in Julian developed into pride.

There were indeed special causes which to some extent account for this defect in his spiritual life. Much of his natural warmth of feeling had been chilled and soured by the sense of injustice and secret enmity under which he so long laboured. He could not forget the murder of his nearest relations, nor the suspicions, intrigues, and actual personal indignities of which he was the subject. His affections were thus deprived of their natural play, and when set free, they had a tendency to attach themselves to the first person who seemed to love him for his own sake; and these, we know, were unfortunately in many cases men of inferior character. His conscience was warped by the necessity (as he felt it) of long dissimulation; and his sense of responsibility was weakened by the slavery of living under suspicion and in a dependent and depressed position. He became a recluse and a dreamer, even when engaged in the eager bustle of political and military conflict. He never really understood human nature, though he had many of the elements of a popular hero. He had not the dignity of an emperor, and felt himself throughout rather a private citizen, though he governed in some respects extremely well.

These considerations make it intelligible how one who knew the better way by means of intelligence yet deliberately chose the worse. Julian knew the Bible far better than most modern sceptics, and knew it from his childhood. His is an example which may well puzzle those, if there are any, who believe that the Bible without the Christian life can make a man a Christian. We do not know much of his early surroundings, but what we know of them inclines us to suppose that their influence for good was but slight. His relation, Eusebius of Nicomedia, does not bear a high character. His pedagogue Mardonius was evidently more heathen than Christian in his sympathies, and a time-serving creature like Hecebolius was not likely to make much impression upon his pupil. But there was a pride, as we have said, in Julian's own nature, joined to a contempt for those to whom he was opposed, which, however it may have been aggravated by circumstances, prevented him from receiving the light that really shone upon him. The perception of this also makes us refrain from bestowing upon him the sympathy which we naturally feel for error in weaker natures.

We have endeavoured to give a fair general estimate of this remarkable character, with the full consciousness how hazardous such an estimate is. If any one wishes for a catalogue of qualities, which can, as it were, be ticketed and labelled, he cannot do better than read Ammianus's elaborate award (xxv. 4). The historian takes the four cardinal virtues, temperance, prudence, justice, and courage, and gives a due amount of praise tempered with some fault-finding under each head. His chastity<sup>8</sup> and <sup>8</sup> A good deal has been written on this topic. The points in favour of Julian are the strong praise of Ammianus and the absence of any definite attacks upon his morality in this respect. The points against him are—(1) He twice writes of the τροφεὺς τῶν ἑμῶν παιδίων, Epp. 40, Iamblichos, p. 417 C, and 67 Sosipatros; but his only child by Helena died as soon as it was born; therefore it is argued the παιδία must have been illegitimate (Amm. xvi. 10, 18; cf. Liban. Monod. p. 519, νός τε καὶ οὐκ ὄν πατήρ). (2) In the Μίσρογοσ, p. 519 C, D, Julian makes the dissolute Antiochenes say to him, ἀλλ' ἐκεῖνο τίς ἀνέξεται σου; καθέουεις ὡς ἐπίπαν νύκτωρ μόνος οὐδ' ἔστιν οὐδέ, ὃ σου τὸν ἄγριον καὶ ἀνήμερον μαλάζει θυμόν. The ὡς ἐπίπαν = "ordinarily" or "generally," instead of "always," has been interpreted as leaving room for occasional exceptions. (3) Julian was not choice in his companions, when a religious procession or banquet was in hand (see the passages quoted above, p. 507, note c).

We have thus to set a number of rather weak inferences, each of which can by itself be explained away, against a strong positive statement. For example, the τροφεὺς may have been an official such as Constantius was very likely to have named with his minute particularity of regulation of Julian's household; or Julian may be speaking metaphorically, as has been suggested, of his librarian; or the letters may be spurious, as some have thought all the letters to Iamblichus are on other grounds.

On the whole, the evidence is not sufficient to outweigh abstinence were remarkable. He aimed at justice, and to a great extent earned a high reputation for it. He was liberal to his friends, and careless of his own comforts and conveniences in a very remarkable degree; while he did much to lighten and equalise the burden of taxation upon his subjects. His successes in Gaul gained him the affection of the people, and his popularity with the soldiers may be gathered from the manner in which the dwellers in northern and western lands followed him into the midst of Persia. He may be said to have quelled a military tumult by the threat of retiring into private life.

The lighter qualities of his character present him in rather a disagreeable aspect. He was loquacious and inconsistent in small things as well as in great ones. He was, as we have frequently remarked, extremely superstitious, and even fanatical in his observance of religious rites, to a degree that made him appear trifling and undignified even to his friends. His manner was obviously irritating, and such as could not inspire respect in his subjects; and, on the other hand, he was too eager to gain popular applause. No one can doubt his cleverness and ability as a writer, but the greater number of his writings do not shew method, and they are often singularly deficient in judgment. An exception, perhaps, may be made in respect to the first oration to Constantius, the letter to the Athenians, and the Caesars. The latter, however, was a strange performance for one who was himself an emperor.

In person he was rather short, and awkwardly, though very strongly, built. His features were fine and well marked, and his eyes very brilliant; his mouth was rather over-large, and his lower lip was inclined to droop. As a young man he grew a beard, but he was required to cut it off when he became Caesar, and seems only to have grown it again after taking possession of Constantinople (see section VI. Coins). At Antioch it was allowed to grow to a great size. His neck was thick, and his head hung forward, and was set on broad and thick shoulders. His walk, as we have said before, was ungraceful; and he had an unsteady motion of the limbs, which, with his abrupt and nervous loquacity, suggest a somewhat epileptic constitution. There was in him, no doubt, some physical peculiarity which predisposed him to take such delight in the sensational excitements of Maximus and his sect. We have several notices of his ill-health at different times. (Ep. 48, Zenoni medico; St. Cyr. in Jul. vii. p. 234.) There is a fine life-size statue of Julian, of good and artistic workmanship, now standing in the ruined hall of his palace in the garden of the Hôtel Clugny at Paris. It is figured as the frontispiece to E. Talbot's translation of his works.

IV. Theory of Religion.

The most useful book on this subject is Julien l'Apostat et sa Philosophie du Polythéisme, by H. A. Naville, Paris and Neuchâtel, 1877. It is defective, however, in not going into the origin and relations of Julian's theory to that of other thinkers. A detailed study of Julian's system of religious philosophy is perhaps hardly in place in a sketch like the present. His theory, such as it was, was too superficial and occasional to leave much of a mark upon the history of thought. His book against Christianity became indeed a favourite weapon with infidels, but he never founded a school of positive belief. He was in fact an enthusiastic amateur, who employed some of the nights of a laborious career of public business in writing what, under the circumstances, must be called brilliant essays in the Neo-Platonic manner. He tells us that the oration in praise of the sun took him three nights (p. 157 C); that on the mother of the gods was composed, "without taking breath, in the short space of one night" (p. 178 D); the discourse against ignorant cynics was also the work of a single vigil. Such work as this may astonish us even now, but it cannot be a matter of surprise that it should be incomplete, rambling, and obscure.

There are, however, certain constantly recurring thoughts, which may be regarded as established principles with Julian; and of them we must give some account, prefacing what is to be said with some remarks on his relation to other thinkers. Julian forms one of that long line of remarkable men in the first four centuries after Christ who endeavoured to give a rational form to the religion and morality of the heathen world in opposition to the growing power of Christianity—men whose ill-success is one of the strongest proofs of the deadness of their own cause, and the vitality of that against which they strove. It may be debated indeed whether the earliest of his predecessors in this line of thought were conscious of the nature of the struggle in which they were engaged, but directly or indirectly whether by force of opposition or under the secret influence of the new religious movement they felt themselves called forth to give a new form to the faith of the old world. For it is a constantly observed fact, which almost merits the name of a law of social development, that one religious impulse stimulates and helps another, even when they do not at first meet in the clash of open conflict. When one man begins to think deeply of religion as a personal thing, his feeling is insensibly communicated to another, and so on to many whom the first never knows or even hears of.

And so we may say that Seneca and Plutarch, as well as Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, Celsus, Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, and Hierocles, were all in their way precursors of Julian.

For the sake of clearness, we may define the objects of their efforts on behalf of paganism as three:

1. To unite popular beliefs in many gods with some conception of the unity of the divine being, and to give some consistent, if not rational, account of the origin of the world, and of the course of human history.
2. To defend the myths and legends of heathenism, and generally to establish heathen morals on a higher basis than that of mere custom.
3. To satisfy the yearnings of the soul for the knowledge of God, while rejecting the exclusive claims of the Jewish and Christian revelation.

1. Doctrine as to the Nature of God.—The birth the positive testimony, which is supported by the seeming coldness of Julian's temperament in certain respects.

of Christ took place in the fulness of time, i.e. when mankind had been prepared for it, by many influences bearing them towards the acceptance of a revelation. One of the most important of these preparations was the movement towards monotheism. The old simple belief in many gods living together in a sort of upper world was broken down, and no system had a chance of being accepted by thinking men which did not assume at least the supremacy of one divine principle, and in some degree "justify" the action of Providence in dealing with mankind as a whole. But the worship of many gods had too deep a hold upon the fancy and affections, as well as the mind, of the people to be surrendered without a long struggle, and various methods were advanced to shelter and protect the current belief.

The systems thus formed were naturally all more or less pantheistic, finding unity in an informal abstraction from the phenomena of nature. But, as we should expect to be the case on European soil, they were neither logically pantheistic in the abstract way of the Hindu philosophical sects nor sharply dualistic like the speculations of the Gnostics and Manichaeans. The more practical minds of the Graeco-Roman world were satisfied to give an account of things as they appeared without overpowering and paralysing themselves by the insoluble question as to the existence and potencies of matter; and thus they were at once more inconsistent and less absurd than some of their contemporaries. While looking upon matter as something degrading, and upon contact with it as a thing to be avoided, they nevertheless did not define matter to be non-existent, or merely phenomenal, nor did they regard it as absolutely evil. In the same way, while they lost all true hold upon the personality of God, and believed in the eternity of the world (e.g. Jul. Or. iv. p. 132 c), they used the terms creation and providence, and spoke of communion with and likeness to God.

Into an eclectic system of this kind, it was not difficult to incorporate the gods of the heathen world, and to make them subserve a sort of philosophy of history. They come in, in fact, with Julian to take a double position:—(a) As intermediate beings employed in creation who protect the Supreme Being from too intimate contact with the world. (b) As accounting for the difference between nations, and so enabling men to uphold traditional usages without ceasing to hold to one ideal law and one truth (Jul. Or. vi. p. 184 c, ὡσπερ γὰρ ἀλήθεια μία, οὐτῶ δὲ καὶ φιλοσοφία μία).

The chief source of information on this part of Julian's theory is his Fourth Oration, in praise of the Sovereign Sun. The most striking feature of the theology proper of this system is its triple hierarchy of deities and worlds. Such a triple division was a common feature of Neo-Platonism and had its roots in thoughts current before the Christian era; but it was no doubt emphasised by later theorists as a counterpoise to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. That of Julian was probably borrowed from Iamblichus of Chalcis (uncle, it has been supposed, of his correspondent), to whom he frequently appeals in terms of the highest veneration (e.g. Or. iv. p. 146 A, 150 D, 157 D; see Ueberweg, Hist. of Philosophy, § 69, vol. i. pp. 252-254, E. T.).

According to this belief there are three worlds informed and held together by three classes of divine beings. The highest and most spiritual is the κόσμος νοητός, or "intelligible world," the world of absolute immaterial essences, the centre of which is the One or the Good, who is the source of beings and of all beauty and perfection, to the gods who surround him (p. 133 c).

Between this highly elevated region and the grosser material world comes the κόσμος νοερός, or "intelligent world," the centre of which is the sovereign sun, the great object of Julian's devotion. He receives his power from the Good, and communicates it not only to the gods around him, but also to the sensible world, the κόσμος αἰσθητός, in which we live. In this sphere the "visible disk" of the sun is the source of light and life, as the invisible sun is in the intelligible world. Any one who will read this oration with care will be convinced that Julian wished to find in his sovereign sun a substitute for the Christian doctrine of the second person of the blessed Trinity, and this appears in particular on pages 141, 142. (Cp. Naville, p. 104; Lamé, p. 234 foll.)

The position specially given to the sun is a proof of the advance of Oriental thought in the Roman empire, and it was certainly no new idea of Julian's. Amongst others, Aurelian and Elagabalus had made him their chief divinity, and Constantine himself had been specially devoted to the "Sol invictus." Julian, we have seen, had from his childhood been fascinated with the physical beauty of the light.

Towards the close of the century we find Macrobius arguing somewhat in the spirit of some modern enquirers that all heathen religion is the product of solar myths. Yet it is curious to observe the shifts to which Julian is put to prove this doctrine out of Homer and Hesiod, and from the customs of the ancient Greeks and Romans (pp. 135-137 and 143 foll.). He seems, indeed, conscious of the weakness of his arguments from the poets, and dismisses them with the remark that they have much that is human in their inspiration, and appeals to the direct revelations of the gods themselves—we must suppose in the visions which he claimed to receive (p. 137 c).

The connexion of this theory with the national gods is nowhere distinctly worked out. It is in fact part of the pantheistic character of this belief that the idea of the personality of the gods recedes or becomes prominent, like the figures in a magic lantern, according to the subject under discussion, without any shock to the dreamy Neo-Platonist. At one time they are mere essences or principles, at another they are Zeus, Apollo, Ares, &c. ruling and directing the fortunes of nations, and imposing upon them a peculiar type of character and special laws and institutions. At one moment they are little more than the ideas of Plato, at another they are actual δαίμονες, acting as lieutenants of the Creator. This last view is in essentials the same as that put forward by Celsus (probably in the reign of Marcus Aurelius) in his book, known to us from its refutation by Origen (bk. v. ch. 25 to 33). It is the view asserted at length by Julian in his books against the Christians, especially as a defence of the customs and institutions of antiquity against the innovations of the religion which strove to break down all prejudices of class and nation. (St. Cyril. adv. Jul. iv. pp. 115, 116, 130, 141, 143, 148, &c.; cp. Fragmentum Epistolæ, p. 292 c, d, ἄνθρωποι τοῖς γενεάρχαις θεοῖς ἀποκληρωθέντες, οἳ καὶ προήγαγον αὐτούς, ἀπὸ τοῦ δημιουργοῦ τὰς ψυχὰς παραλαμβάνοντες ἐξ αἰῶνος; for the subject generally, see Naville, ch. iii. "Les Dieux Nationaux.")

It is easy to see how fatal such a doctrine as this must be to anything like moral progress. If everything is as it is by the will of the gods, no custom, however revolting, lacks defence. It is strange that, after the refutation of this absurdity by Origen, any one should have been bold enough to put it forward as a serious theory (cp. Orig. contra Celsum, v. ch. 25-28 and 34-39).

With regard to the relation of images and sacrifices to the gods, who are worshipped by these means, there is an interesting passage in the Fragment of the Letter to a Priest (pp. 293 foll.). He warns his correspondent not to consider images as actually receiving worship, nor to suppose that the gods really need our sacrifices. But he defends their use as suitable to our own bodily condition. (Ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἡμᾶς ὕπας ἐν σώματι σωματικὰς εἶδει ποιεῖσθαι τοῖς θεοῖς καὶ τὰς λατρείας, ἀσώματοι δὲ εἰσιν αὐτοί, p. 293 d.) "Just as earthly kings desire to have honour paid them and their statues without actually needing it, so do the gods. The images of the gods are not the gods, and yet more than mere wood and stone. They ought to lead us up to the unseen. And yet being made by human art, they are liable to injury at the hands of wicked men, just as good men are unjustly put to death like Socrates, and Dion, and Empedotimus. But their murderers afterwards were punished by divine vengeance, and so have sacrilegious persons manifestly received a due reward in my reign." (Pp. 294 c-295 b.)

2. Defence of Pagan Morality.—We have already described at some length Julian's attempts to raise the morality of his heathen subordinates, especially in the priesthood. He was conscious of a defect, and strenuously set himself to remedy it, though he could do little more in the way of quotation of texts than allege a few general maxims drawn from ancient writers as to kindness to the poor, &c. His strongest argument is one that might well have made him hesitate—the shame of being so much outdone by the "Galileans."

Another branch of this subject was the relation of morality to Greek mythology, and with this he busied himself on two occasions, about the same time. The two orations, The Praise of the Mother of the Gods and Against the Cynic Heraclius, were probably both delivered about the time of the vernal equinox, while he was still at Constantinople, in the year 362. In the first of these he gives an elaborate explanation of the story of Attis; in the second he rebukes Heraclius for his immoral teaching in the form of myths, and gives an example of one which he thinks really edifying, which describes his own youth under the protection of the gods.

The explanation of the myth of Attis is important as a specimen of Julian's theology. According to modern interpreters, this myth, as well as that of Adonis in its hundred forms, describes merely the succession of the seasons. The mother of the gods is the earth; Attis is the sun, who warms and delights her. His disappearance into the cave signifies the sadness of winter, &c. Julian, on the other hand, adapts it to his speculations on the triple hierarchy of worlds. With him the mother of the gods is, as it were, the female principle of the highest and most spiritual world. He calls her the lady of all life, the mother and bride of great Zeus, the motherless virgin, she who bears children without passion, and creates things that are together with the Father (p. 166 A, B). Here we are landed into the full obscurity of Gnostic principles and emanations, and the whole story is evidently only a kind of converse arrangement of that which meets us in the Valentinian myth of Achamoth (see Mansel, Gnostic Heresies, lectures 11, 12). Attis is a principle of the second or intelligent world, "the productive and creative intelligence, the essence which descends into the farthest ends of matter to give birth to all things" (p. 161 c). It is difficult to see how he is distinguished in his functions with regard to creation from the sovereign sun, but this is only one of the many weak points of this fanciful exposition. It does not perhaps help us much to be told that his material type in the lowest world is the Milky Way, in which philosophers say that the impassible circumambient ether mingles with the passible elements of the world (p. 165 c). The mother of the gods engages Attis to remain ever faithful to herself, that is, to look always upward. Instead of this, he descends into the cave, and has commerce with the nymph, that is, produces the visible universe out of matter. The sun, who is the principle of harmony and restraint, something like the Valentinian Horus (ὄρος), sends the lion or fiery principle to put a stop to this production of visible forms. Then follows the ἐκτρομή of Attis, which is defined as the ἐποχὴ τῆς ἀπειρίας, the limit placed upon the process into infinity. The part played by the sun is indicated by the season at which the festival took place, the vernal equinox, when he produces equality of day and night (p. 168 c, d). All this is, of course, afterwards explained as a mere passionless eternal procedure on the part of the supposed gods. A real creation proceeding from God's love and good pleasure was a thought far above the scope of this philosophy, to which the world was as personal as the so-called gods.

We cannot go further into details on this subject, and they will be easily found by the reader for himself. Enough has been said to shew how thoroughly pantheistic was Julian's interpretation of the myths, how destructive of any true conception of the divine nature, how thoroughly unmoral, how utterly incapable of touching the heart, was his theology. Yet he could not but feel the need of some personal commerce with God, however inconsistent such a wish might be with his intellectual view of divine things. The consideration of this leads us to the next point.

3. Intercourse with God.—When Julian was in Asia Minor under the influence of the philosophers Eusebius and Chrysanthius, and heard the details of the wonderful works of Maximus, he said (according to Eunapius), "Farewell, and keep to your books if you will; you have revealed to me the man I was in search of" (Eunap. Vita Maximi, p. 51). This story has been discredited by some, who think it strange that so great a lover of books as Julian should speak slightly of them. But it is confirmed by his own language in his Oration on the Sun (p. 137 c):—"Let us say farewell to poetic descriptions: for they have much that is human mixed up with the divine. But let us go on to declare what the god himself seems to teach us both about himself and the other gods" (ix. 11, 5). Julian here appeals from a book revelation, as it were, to a direct instruction given him, no doubt, as he supposed, in the numerous visions in which he was visited by the gods.

We have already noticed Julian's enthusiasm for the mysteries and his love of all rites and practices which promised him a closer intercourse with the gods. He could never bring himself to acquiesce in the colder methods of some of the masters of the Neo-Platonic school. He was not satisfied with the intellectual ecstasy described by Plotinus, nor with the self-purification of Porphyry, who generally rejected sacrifice and divination (Ueberweg, Hist. of Philosophy, § 68, notes, vol. i. p. 251, E. T.). The party of Iamblichus, to which Julian belonged, required something more exciting, something approaching to a control of God (theurgy), a quasi-mechanical method of communication with him, which could be put in force at will, and the result of which could be called by no other name than "Bacchic frenzy" (Orat. vii. pp. 217 D and 221 D, &c.). We know something by modern experience of the mixture of superstition and imposture which makes the theurgy of one age so like that of another, and we know that Julian was duped by men who were half deceivers and half deceived. He is one among many who are forced by an inward conviction to believe in supernatural revelation, but who will not have it except on their own terms. Of Julian, Libanius tells us somewhere that he knew the forms and lineaments of the gods as familiarly as those of his friends, and we have several times mentioned the visions which appeared to him at the great crises of his life. In his books against Christians he says, "Aesculapius often healed me, telling me of remedies" (S. Cyril. adv. Jul. viii. p. 234), and elsewhere he speaks of this deity as a sort of incarnate Saviour (Or. iv. p. 144 B, C).

This temper of mind indeed, while it speaks in high-flown, positive language of the knowledge of God, and pours contempt on the uninitiated, yet means something by the term knowledge very different from the sober and bracing certainty attained by Christian faith, hope, and love. There is in all the efforts of men of this kind, whether Neo-Platonic theurgists or modern "medinms," a trembling nervousness, which shows that the object grasped at is, after all, an object of sense rather than anything else. Here as elsewhere the pantheistic temper speaks grandly, but feels meanly.

Death indeed is looked forward to with some composure as the emancipation of the divine element in man from darkness. Julian several times prays for a happy death, and expected after it to be raised to communion with the gods. His two orations to the Sun and the Mother of the Gods both conclude with prayers of this kind, and we have already recounted the manner in which he actually met his end (Lib. Epist. p. 614; Amm. xxv. 3, 22). But the doctrine of the ascent (sublimitas) of souls, on which he was conversing with Maximus and Priscus when that end at last came, was a very different thing from the Christian's hope. It was in fact the same in substance as the barren and deadening Oriental doctrine of transmigratio. And it is remarkable that Julian, who felt himself so favoured by the heavenly powers, in one of his most ardent prayers to the sun, looks forward to a felicity which has no certainty of being eternal. (Or. iv. p. 158 c; see some good remarks on the contrast between this and the Christian doctrine in Naville, pp. 59 foll.)

V. Polemic against Christianity.

We have already spoken at length of Julian's measures against Christianity. How near this effort was to his heart may be gathered by his prayer to the mother of the gods, where he speaks of "cleansing the Empire from the stain of atheism" as the great wish of his life (Or. v. p. 180 B). We have seen also that he abstained from anything like a general persecution or prohibition of Christianity, though certain tendencies to such a procedure are apparent, and might have developed if he had reigned much longer.

Julian, however, as long as he lived, preferred the method of persuasion to that of constraint, and his books against the Christians are an evidence of this temper. It is difficult to analyse them in their present form, and we may well believe that in the fulness of their original arrangement they were obscure and unmethodical. He begins by saying that he wishes to give the reasons which have convinced him that the Galilean doctrine is a human invention (Cyr. ii. p. 39). He then goes on to attack the narratives of the Bible as fabulous. He allows indeed that the Greeks have monstrous fables likewise (p. 44), but then they have philosophy, while Christians have nothing but the Bible, and are in fact barbarians.

If Christians attack the idolatry of heathens, Julian retorts, "you worship the wood of the cross, and refuse to worship the ancle which came down from heaven" (Cyr. vi. p. 194).

On the whole, he does not spend much time in such questions, but accepts the Bible as a generally true narrative, and rather attacks Christianity on grounds of supposed reason, and in connexion with and in contrast to Judaism.

We may follow Naville in considering the main body of his works under three heads: (1) his polemic against the monotheism of the Old Testament; (2) his attack upon the novel and aggressive character of Christian doctrine; (3) especially against the adoration of Christ as God, and the worship of "dead men," such as the martyrs (cp. Naville, pp. 175 foll.).

1. Against the Monotheism of the Old Testament.—Julian, as we have seen, regarded the gods of polytheism as links or intermediaries between the supreme God and the material world, and so as rendering the conception of creation easier and more philosophical. He contrasts Plato's doctrine of creation in the Timæus with the abrupt statements of Moses, "God said," &c. (pp. 49-57). One might almost suppose (he urges) that Moses imagined God to have created nothing incorporeal, no intermediate spiritual or angelic beings, but to have Himself directly organised matter (p. 49).

He then goes on to argue against the supposition that the supreme God made absolute choice of the Hebrew nation as a peculiar people, to the exclusion of others. "If he is the God of all of us, and our common creator, why has he abandoned us?" (p. 106). Both in acts and morals the Hebrews are inferior. They have been always in slavery, and have invented nothing. As for morality, the imitation of God amongst the Jews is the imitation of a "jealous God," as in the case of Phinehas (Cyr. v. pp. 160-171). The worst of our generals never treated subject nations so cruelly as Moses treated the Canaanites (vi. p. 184). The only precepts in the decalogue not held in common by all nations are the two commandments against idolatry and for the observance of the sabbath.

The true view, to his mind, was of course that there was a God of the Jews, but that he was a local, national God, like those of other peoples, far inferior to the supreme God (iv. pp. 115, 116, 141, 148, &c.). In this way he was able to extend a certain amount of sympathy and favour to the Jews, as we have already seen. Sometimes he seems inclined to accept Jehovah as the creator of the visible world, while at other times he throws doubt upon this assumption; but in any case he considered Him a true object of worship. (Ep. 25, Judæcis, εὐχὰς ποιήσθε τῆς ἐμῆς βασιλείας τῷ πάντων κρείττονι καὶ δημορφῷ θεῷ, and Ep. 63, Theodoro, p. 453 D and 454, ἐν μέρει θεοσεβείας ὄντες, ἐπέλεπε δὲ τιμῶσιν . . . ἀλλ' ἀληθῶς ὄντα δυνατώτατον καὶ ἀγαθώτατον, ὃς ἐπιτροπεύει τὸν αἰσθητὸν κόσμον. But in Cyril. iv. p. 148, he blames Moses for confounding a partial and national God with the Creator.) Further, the Jewish usages of temples, altars, sacrifices, purifications, circumcision, &c. were all observed to have a close resemblance to those of heathenism, and were a foundation for many reproaches against the Galileans, who had abandoned so much that was laudable and respectable (vi. p. 202; vii. p. 238; ix. pp. 298, 299, 305, &c.).

2. This leads us to the second great topic—Julian's Attack upon Christianity as a Novel and Revolutionary Religion.—The bitterness with which he utters the word "Galilean," and his anger against Christians of both Jewish and gentile origin for deserting the ancestral laws of their respective peoples, appears elsewhere in some degree, but especially in these books. In the same spirit he puts Christianity much below Judaism. "If you who have deserted us had attached yourself to the doctrines of the Hebrews, you would not have been in so thoroughly bad a condition, though worse than you were before when you were amongst us. For you would have worshipped one God instead of many gods, and not, as is now the case, a man, or rather a number of miserable men. You would have had a hard and stern law, with much that is barbarous in it, instead of our mild and gentle customs, and would have been so far the losers; but you would have been purer and more holy in religious rites. As it is, you are like the leeches, and suck all the worst blood out of Hebraism and leave the purer behind" (Cyr. vi. pp. 201, 202). It was natural under these circumstances that the apostle Paul should be the special object of his dislike. "He surpasses all the impostors and charlatans who have ever existed" (Cyr. iii. p. 100). He accuses the Jewish Christians of having deserted a law which Moses declared to be eternal (ix. p. 319). Even Jesus himself said that he came to fulfil the law. Peter declared that he had a vision, in which God shewed him that no animal was impure (p. 314), and Paul boldly says: "Christ is the end of the law;" but Moses says: "Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it;" and "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things." (Cyr. ix. p. 320 = Deut. iv. 2, xxvii. 27; cp. x. pp. 343, 351, 354, 356, 358, where he attacks us for giving up sacrifice, circumcision, and the sabbath, and asserts that Abraham used divination and practised astrology.)

In the same spirit he sneers at baptism, which cannot cure leprosy, or gout, or dropsy, or any bodily infirmity, great or small, but which is said to remove all the transgressions of the soul—adulteries, thefts, &c.—so great is its penetrating power! (vii. p. 245).

The argument against the Christian interpretation of prophecy is also remarkable, but is too detailed to be discussed here. He comments textually on the blessing of Judah, Gen. xlix. 10; on the prophecy of Balaam, Num. xxiv. 17; on that of Moses, Deut. xviii. 15-18; and on the prophecy of Emmanuel, Is. vii. 14; and tries to shew that they have no reference outside Judaism itself, though the last is evidently a difficulty to him (pp. 253, 261, 262).

3. Lastly, the great object of Julian's attacks is The Worship of Jesus as God, and the Adoration of the Martyrs.—The argument on this head is partly concerned with the prophecies just quoted, partly with the New Testament itself. He asserts that Moses never speaks of "the first-born Son of God," while he does speak of "the sons of God," i.e. the angels, who have charge of different nations (Gen. vi. 2). On the other hand, he says expressly, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve" (Cyr. ix. p. 290). Even if the prophecy of Emmanuel in Isaiah refers to Jesus, it gives you no right to call his mother θεοτόκος, as you constantly do. How could she bear God, being a human creature like ourselves? And how is her son the Saviour when God says, "I am, and there is no Saviour beside me"? (viii. p. 276).

"But you are so unfortunate as not even to keep to the apostles' traditions. Neither Matthew, Luke, nor Mark called Jesus God, but this excellent John, perceiving that a great multitude in many of the Greek and Italian cities were infected with this disease, and hearing, I suppose, that the sepulchres too of Peter and Paul were receiving worship, secretly indeed, but still receiving worship, first dared to assert it" (x. p. 327).

"He first speaks of God the Word, and then introduces John the Baptist's testimony about Jesus Christ, insinuating in this manner the idea that they are the same person" (ib.). "Some [i.e. the Gnostics] say that God the Word and Jesus Christ are different persons in John's [the evangelist's] mind, but this is not the case" (x. p. 333).

"John began this evil. You have gone on and added the worship of other dead men to that of the first dead man. You have filled all things with tombs and sepulchres; though

Jesus speaks of 'whited sepulchres full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness' (p. 335). "Why, then, do you bow before tombs? The Jews did it, according to Isaiah, to obtain visions in dreams, and four apostles also probably did so after their master's death" (p. 339). (The reference is to Is. lrv. 4, "which remain among the graves and lodge among the monuments:" the words δι' ἐνύπνια are added in the Greek version.)

In his letter to the Alexandrians he puts with equal force the folly of adoring a man, and not adoring the sun and the moon, especially the former, the great sun, the living, animated, intelligent, and beneficent image of the intelligible or spiritual Father (Ep. 51, p. 434).

It is strange to find this slighting disregard for men as objects of worship in one who assumed that he was a champion of pure Hellenism, especially in an emperor who succeeded a long line of deified emperors. But this only shews how strong was the pantheistic element in Julian's philosophy, as we have already frequently observed. Nor can we doubt that a great deal of his dislike to what he considered the Christian doctrine arose from aristocratic pride. He looked down upon Christ as a Galilean peasant, a subject of Augustus Caesar (Cyr. vi. p. 213). "It is hardly three hundred years since he began to be talked about. During all his life he did nothing worth recording, unless any one reckons it among very great acts to have cured halt and blind people, and to exorcise demoniacs in the villages of Bethsaida and Bethany" (vi. p. 191). He looks upon Christians as parvenus who have assumed a position of power for which they were not fitted, and as having acted wantonly in its exercise in destroying temples and prosecuting their own heretics, &c. "Jesus and Paul never taught you this. They never expected that Christians would fill so important a place, and were satisfied with converting a few maid-servants and slaves, and by their means to get hold of their mistresses, and men like Cornelius and Sergius. If under the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius they have succeeded in convincing a single distinguished person, you may hold me for a liar in every thing" (vi. p. 206).

Any one who is familiar with the work of Celsus as preserved to us by Origen will notice the reappearance of many of the same topics. Julian is, however (as far as we have his work), much more superficial, and touches on fewer points. (Celsus may be studied advantageously in Keim's useful reproduction of his book, Celsus' Wahres Wort, Zürich, 1873.) He is also more favourable to the Jews, and less personal in his attacks on the character of our Blessed Lord. His familiar knowledge of the Bible and external Christianity for so many years could not but have some influence upon him in the direction of reverence. But what is remarkable is that he should have almost no appreciation of the need of redemption or of the contrast between Christian and heathen life. The absence of these feelings we must ascribe in great measure to the misfortune of his early training, to the Arianism of his teachers, and the unloveliness and unloveliness of his early surroundings.

Some allowance must also be made for the corruption and extravagance of some forms of popular religion, and for the rash and violent acts of fanaticism committed by many Christians. The superstitious cultus of martyrs, for instance, was no doubt disavowed by the highest minds of the 4th century, such as St. Athanasius and St. Augustine. But in the masses newly converted from paganism it formed a natural centre for much of the old superstition and fanaticism to cling to. (S. Athan. Orat. contra Arianos, ii. 32; S. Aug. de Vera Religione, 55; and especially contra Faustum, xx. 21.) Faustus the Manichee objected to Christians that they had only rejected their heathen idols for martyrs. St. Augustine replies, "Populus Christianus Memoriam Martyrum religiosa solemnitate concelebrat, et ad excitandum imitationem, et ut meritis eorum consocietur, atque orationibus adiuvetur: ita tamen ut nulli Martyrum, sed ipsi Deo Martyrum, quamvis in Memoriam Martyrum, constituamus altaria," where "Memoria" seems to mean a chapel. (See more on the whole subject in Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. § 99, vol. ii. pp. 25-40, E. T.; see also HELENA, INVENTION OF THE CROSS.) The exaggerated devotion of the people was thus, as in many other instances, a cause of scandal to men of culture, and set them against the church, much as is the case at the present day in modern France.

But besides all this there was in the family of Constantine generally a hardness and self-assertion, though accompanied with strong religious pressure, which made them inaccessible to Christian feeling on the subject of sin. The members of it believe strongly in their providential vocation to take a great part in religious questions, but are very rarely troubled by scruples as to their personal unworthiness. Julian's own character, as we have seen, was specially inconsistent, but the ruling-element in it was self-confidence, which he disguised to himself as a reliance upon divine direction.

It is worth while in concluding this section to draw attention to some of Julian's admissions. He accepts the account of the Gospel miracles. He rejects the Gnostic interpretation of St. John, which separated the Word of God from the Christ. He witnesses to the common use of the term θεορόκος long before the Nestorian troubles. His remarks about the worship of martyrs and the adoration of the cross have also some importance as facts in the history of Christian worship.

VI. Coins.

The following remarks on the coins of Julian are based upon J. Eckhel, Doctrina Numorum Veterum, vol. viii.; Mionnet, De la Rarité et du Prix des Médailles Romaines, 2nd ed., Paris, 1827, vol. ii. p. 291 foll.; and H. Cohen, Médailles Impériales, vol. vi., Paris, 1862 (a new edition is in preparation). The section in Eckhel is particularly good.

The writer has also examined a number of the coins in the British Museum with the kind assistance of Mr. H. Græber. It is unfortunate that Count De Salis' arrangement was not completed before his death, and that he left no papers on the subject. Happily the chronological sequence of the different pieces is pretty clear.

The first thing that strikes us in the coins that belong to Julian's reign as Caesar is that the head is unadorned with either wreath or diadem (like that of his brother Gallus), and quite beardless. He had worn a beard as a private person, but was obliged to cut it off when he was made Caesar (ad Athen. p. 274 C). The taunts mentioned by Ammianus, xvii. 11, 1, "capella, non homo," and "hirsutus" must refer back to his private life. The features in some of these early coins are very handsome and intelligent. He does not seem to have grown his famous beard immediately after his assumption of the title of Augustus. There are two very fine gold coins in the British Museum, probably struck at or just after the quinquennialia in Nov. 360, in which he has none: (1) FL · CL · IVLLIANVS PER · AVG, bust to right with diadem; reverse, GLORIA REIPVBLICAE, figures of Rome and Constantinople holding a shield inscribed VOTIS · V MVLTIS · X and the mint-mark TR. (Treves). (2) A similar obverse and reverse, the latter with VOTIS · X MVLTIS · XX, and mint-mark LVG. (Lyons). These two coins are obviously close upon the same date, and shew (if any proof were needed) how impossible it is to use the number of VOTA to establish a date (see Eckhel's essay, De Numis Votorum, at the end of vol. viii.). Similar silver coins are described by Cohen, l. c., Nos. 20, 32-40, pp. 360-363, not only with the mint-marks of Treves and Lyons, but also with those of Sirmium and Constantinople. We may probably infer from this that he was afraid to appear singular by wearing this appendage till he felt his power secure. We know that after his entrance into Constantinople he still employed a barber. Ammianus (xvii. 4, 9) tells us an anecdote which has often been quoted. During the first days of his residence in the place he sent for one to cut his hair ("ad demendum capillum"). A magnificently dressed person appeared, who struck him with amazement. "I sent for a barber, not an agent of finance," and, on enquiring about his salary, was informed that he had twenty rations of bread a day and the same number of forage for his horses, and a large annual salary, besides other valuable sources of income. This discovery led him to turn out all barbers and cooks and other officers of the kind as persons who were of no use to him. After this we must suppose he adopted the cynic manner of life as described above.

The beard which appears after this gets gradually longer. The coins of Antioch have a very long one attached to an anxious old-looking face, something like the representations of Zeus.

Another peculiarity of the early coins of Julian, besides the simplicity of the head and its attire, is the absence from them of any Christian symbols. The only one on record which bears such an emblem is given by Cohen, No. 51, p. 365, from Wiczay, and is in the judgment of connoisseurs of extremely doubtful genuineness. The obverse is said to be D · N · CL · IVLLIANVS N · C ·; i. e. dominus noster Claudius Julianus nobilis Caesar, bust as usual to right; reverse, VIRTVS · AVG · N, Julian standing to left, holding a laurel branch, and a standard, and placing right foot on the back of a captive seated on the ground. Beneath the standard is said to be the  (cp. F. W. Madden, in Numismatic Chronicle, new series, No 69, p. 38, part i. for 1878). This absence of Christian symbols agrees with the view taken above of Julian's neutral relation to Christianity and heathenism in regard to legislation in Gaul.

If his coins as Caesar shew a curious absence of Christian symbols, those which he minted as Augustus are hardly less deficient in positive heathen types. The commonest reverse which approaches to heathenism is that of the bull with two stars above it, which is mentioned by some of the church historians as a memorial of his frequent sacrifices. (Soc. iii. 17; Soz. v. 19; Banduri, however, thinks rather of Apis and Mnevis; cp. Amm. xvii. 14, 6, 7.) Socrates (but not Sozomen) says that the bull stands beside an altar, but no coin of this kind is known to numismatists (Eckhel, l. c. p. 133). A tradition indeed is reported that Theodosius the Great melted down all the coins bearing Julian's face; but if so, he was very unsuccessful, as they are by no means rare, considering his short reign; and Socrates is probably in error (Banduri, Imp. Orient. p. 96, quoted by Eckhel, p. 127). It is also very remarkable that there are no coins of the mints of Constantinople, Cyzicus, Thessalonica, Lyons, Treves, Sirmium, &c., with inscriptions in honour of the Gods IOVI, MARTI, &c. and, what is still more striking, there is no reference to Julian's special patron, the sun.

The exceptions to this rule are a large class of copper coins struck in Egypt and a small number in Antioch. The Egyptian ones have sometimes an ordinary obverse, and a reverse with VOTA PVBLICA, and a figure of an Egyptian God such as Isis or Anubis; sometimes they have the epigraphs DEO SERAPIDI or SARAPIDI, ISIS FARIA, DEO SANCTO NILO, with different symbols from Egyptian mythology. This, however, is an exception more apparent than real. Eckhel shews that such coins were struck in Egypt even under Christian emperors such as Constantius II., Jovian, Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian (Eckhel, pp. 137, 138). One is found coined, whilst Julian was Caesar, D · N · IVLLIANVS NOB · CAESAR · reverse ISIS · FARIA, and beardless head of Julian surrounded with a gemmed crown (Eckhel, p. 136, from Banduri; Cohen, No. 70). The large number of this class in Julian's reign is no doubt to be attributed to the presence of a peculiarly zealous moneyer at Alexandria, and Eckhel very appositely recalls the fact that the Christian moneyer Dracontius was killed in a riot by the populace because he had overturned an altar set up in his mint (Amm. xvii. 11, 9). His successor, it would seem, was determined to be more popular. On these coins what appear to be Julian's features are sometimes represented with the emblems of Serapis, though the passage of Libanius which Eckhel quotes to illustrate this point is rendered inapplicable by a different and more probable reading. (Epitaph. p. 624, towards the end of the oration. The old edition reads, πολλὰ πόλεις ἐκέκινον τοῖς τῶν θεῶν παραστήσαστες εἶδσιν, ὡς τοὺς θεοὺς τιμῶσι. Reiske has restored εἶδσιν from MSS. instead of εἶδσιν.)

It is more questionable whether Helena is represented as Isis Faria, as has often been concluded by numismatists. But the discussion loses most of its interest if we are persuaded (as seems reasonable) that these coins were all struck in Egypt, and without special orders from the emperor. They have indeed no mint mark, but from this type they certainly cannot have been struck in Gaul, and are almost certainly Alexandrian, and probably were not in any case minted during the few months between Julian's assumption of the title of Augustus and Helena's death, about the time of his quinquennialia. The reason for supposing that it was Helena who was thus (ideally) represented as Isis by the Egyptians is simply this, that Julian sometimes appears as Serapis alone, sometimes as Serapis with Isis, and that Isis sometimes appears by herself. (These coins are described in detail by Cohen, pp. 377 foll.; cp. Mionnet, vol. ii. p. 296 foll.)

The other coins of Julian's reign struck at Antioch with heathen inscriptions are much fewer, and they do not bear his name. Only two types are mentioned, viz.: (1) GENIO ANTIOCHENI. Antioch with a crown of towers and veiled seated on a rock, at her feet the river Orontes, swimming: reverse, APOLLONI SANCTO, Apollo dressed as a woman, standing looking to the left, holding a patera and a lyre; and (2) GENIO · CIVITATIS, bust of Antioch towered and veiled looking to right: reverse, same as preceding. (Eckhel, p. 137; Cohen, Nos. 54, 55.)

We conclude then that from policy Julian did not make any general issue of coins with heathen inscriptions or strongly marked heathen symbols, which would have shocked the feelings of his Christian subjects. The statements of Socrates and Sozomen quoted above are in perfect harmony with this conclusion. [J. W.]

JULIANUS (104), June 9, an anchorite near Edessa about the middle of the 4th century, whose life was written by St. Ephrem Syrus. He is commemorated on June 9. Papebroch (Acta SS. u. infr.) is disposed to identify him with the following.

(Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. iii. 14; Boll. Acta SS. June ii. 175; Ceillier, vi. 45; Martyrol. Roman. June 9.) [I. G. S.]

JULIANUS (105) SABAS, Oct. 18, an anchorite, whose history is narrated by Theodoret. He is believed by the later Bollandists (Oct. viii. 353) to have been a different person from the preceding, contrary to the conclusion of Papebroch. The internal evidence confirms this view. The Julian of Ephraim lived a recluse and stationary life, while Julian Sabas was a man of travel and extended influence. Sabas or Sabbas, says Theodoret, was a title of veneration, meaning an elder, which thus corresponds with "abbas" or father, so commonly applied to anchorites in the East. His cave was in Osrhoëne, he practised extraordinary asceticism, and endured the extremes of heat and fatigue. In 372, on the expulsion of Meletius bishop of Antioch, the triumphant Arian party gave out that Julian had embraced their views, whereupon Acacius (subsequently bishop of Berrhoea), accompanied by Asterius, went to Julian and induced him to visit Antioch, where his presence exposed the slander and encouraged the dispirited Catholics. He afterwards returned to his cave and there died. (Theodoret, Ecl. Hist. iii. c. 19; iv. c. 24; Hist. Religios. num. ii.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Ceillier, viii. 238;

Wright, Cat. Syr. MSS. ii. 700 iii. 1084, 1090.) [C. H.]

JULIANUS (106), a wealthy nobleman to whom Jerome writes a letter of consolation in the year 406 (Ep. 118, ed. Vall.). Some expressions in the letter make it probable that he lived in Dalmatia, others that he lived at Rome. Possibly his residence was chiefly at Rome, though his property was in the country east of the Adriatic. [W. H. F.]

JULIANUS (107), a Christian to whom Marcellus addressed his report of the Carthaginian conference. [MARCELLUS.] (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 286, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (108), a servant of Paulinus and Therasia. [PAULINUS.] (Aug. Epp. 24, 25, 27.) [H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (109), a youth in whom St. Augustine took a warm interest. (Aug. Ep. 99.) [H. W. P.]

JULIANUS (110), a Samaritan rebel in the reign of Justinian (Joan. Malalas, Chronog. ii. 179; Chron. Pasch. s. a. 530; Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. Sab. cap. 70, 71; Theoph. Chronog. in Pat. Gr. cviii. 411; Clinton, F. R. 529). It was probably this rebellion that evoked the edict of Nov. 22, 530, enforcing the penalties previously denounced against the Samaritans (Cod. Just. l. v. 19). [T. W. D.]

JULIANUS (111) ARGENTARIUS, of Ravenna. He was probably treasurer of the church of Ravenna, and may possibly have been an architect. His name is found in charters of the time (cf. note to Agnellus, in Monum. Rerum Langob. p. 330). He was specially connected with the two great churches of St. Vitale and St. Apollinare in Classe. (Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eocl. Ravenn. 78 in Monum. Rerum Langob. p. 330; Richter, Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, 72, 98; Rubeus, Hist. Raven. 153, 159; Montfaucon, Diarium Ital. cap. 7.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (112), the name of three anchorites mentioned by John Moschus, viz.:

i. A Stylite, whose pillar was about twenty-four miles from that of his contemporary Simeon Stylites, whom he survived (Prat. 28, 57, 58).

ii. An anchorite of the monastery of the Egyptians in Cilicia, twelve miles from Anazarbus (Prat. 51).

iii. An anchorite of the monastery of Scopulus near Rhosus who refused communion with Macarius patriarch of Jerusalem, but was warned by a brother anchorite not to separate from the church (Prat. 96). [C. H.]

JULIANUS (113), a converted Jew, to whom Gregory the Great in 594 ordered an annual supply of money to be given. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iv. indict. xii. ep. 33 in Migne, lxxvii. 708.) [A. H. D. A.]

JULIANUS (114), advocate of Alexandria, praised for his constancy and firmness for the faith in the Monothelite controversy. (S. Maxim. Conf. ep. 17 in Pat. Gr. xci. 579.) [W. J. S.]

JULIANUS (115), patron saint of Luxulyan in-Cornwall, a name corrupted from Lau Julian or Lan Sulian (Oliver's Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis, 34; compare Haddan and Stubbs, i. 144-45, for a similar relation of the names Julen and Sulgen or Sulien, Sulien being the Welsh form of the name, which has been made into Julien). A Julien occurs as one of the daughters of Brychan of Brecknock. A St. Julian or Ulian is found in Tintagel; and the parish of Maker, opposite Plymouth, is dedicated to St. Julian. William of Worcester, 82, quotes from the Franciscan Martyrology of Salisbury, "S. Julliani commemoratio xvi. kalend. Febr.," perhaps a mistake for "vi. kal. Feb." if this refers to "St. Julien, bishop and confessor." For a Welsh Sulien, whose day is Sept. 1, see R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 220, and compare Kerslake's Damnonia outside Cornwall, 430. The parish of Luxulyan is now dedicated to SS. Cyric and Julitta, the better known name Julitta having assimilated Julian to itself. St. Julitta has also the parish of St. Juliot in Cornwall; her day in the Roman calendar was July 30 (in others June 14 or 16). The story of Julitta and her child Cyric was popular, and St. Basil wrote in praise of her [see above, v. CYRICUS]. There was a cell of St. Cyric in the Cornish parish of St. Veep; for a full account see Oliver's Monasticon, 69, where other dedications to these favourite saints are mentioned; see also R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 82, 97, 307; Kerslake's The Celt and the Teuton in Exeter, p. 11, and his Damnonia outside Cornwall, 421. In the Lives of Cambro-British Saints, 276-77, are printed six Welsh hymns, invoking the intercession of these saints. [C. W. B.]

JULITTA (1), July 16, martyr at Tarsus in 304 or 305. Her acts were declared apocryphal by pope Gelasius, as having been composed by heretics. A certain bishop, Zeno or Zozimus, having obtained them, wrote in the 6th century to Theodorus bishop of Iconium for a true narrative. He applied to two officials of the court (Justinian I. being emperor), Marcianus chancellor of the notaries, and Zeno of the imperial council, who furnished him with a true account as prescribed in the family traditions and records of her family in Iconium. Their narrative will be found in Combes, Mart. Triump. p. 231. Mart. Usuard. commemorates them on Jun. 16, and places their passion at Antioch. (Baron. Annal. 305, 315; Bas. Men.; Ceillier, iii. 42; Fleury, H. E. l. ix. 5, 7.) Concerning the decree of pope Gelasius and the Roman council of 494, by which the acts of St. Julitta were condemned, together with the apocryphal gospels and suspected works of the fathers, see the dissertations of Mansi appended to Nat. Alexand. H. E. saec. v. cap. ii. art. x. cap. v. art. xviii.; Fleury, H. E. lib. xxx. sec. 35; Du Pin, H. E. i. 521, ed. Dub. 1723.

[G. T. S.]

JULITTA (2), July 30, virgin, and martyr with Dorothea at Caesarea, in Cappadocia, A.D. 306. [BARLAAM.] (Boll. Acta SS. 30 Jul. vii. 141; Fleury, H. E. l. ix. s. 39; Baron. ann. 304, lxvii.; Nat. Alex. H. E. saec. iv. cap. i.) The Basilian Menology gives her under July 31.

[G. T. S.]

JULITTA (3). [SEVEN MARTYRS OF AN-CYRA.]

JULITTA (4), a widow lady of Cappadocia, on whose behalf Basil wrote in 372 to Helladius, a member of the household of the prefect of Cappadocia, begging him to use his influence for her with his master (Basil. Epist. 107 [287], 108 [288], 109 [422]). Tillemont is inclined to identify her with other widows (ἐλευθέραι) to whom some of Basil's letters are addressed. But for this there seem no sufficient grounds.

[E. V.]

JULIUS, AELIUS PUBLIUS. [AELIUS.]

JULIUS (1), seventh bishop of Lyons in the 3rd century. (Gall. Christ. iv. 15.) [R. T. S.]

JULIUS (2), second bishop of Vicohabentia (Voghenza), c. A.D. 331. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 517; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 15.)

[R. S. G.]

JULIUS (3), the name of a bishop of Milan at a synod said to have been held at Rome in 337 under pope Julius (Isid. Merc. in Pat. Lat. cxxx. 615; Mansi, ii. 1269). He is placed by Ughelli between Eustorgius and Protasius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 41; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 58; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. iv. 311.)

[R. S. G.]

JULIUS (4), bishop of Thebes in Boeotia, signed the canons of the council of Sardica, A.D. 344. (Mansi, iii. 38; Le Quien, ii. 211.)

JULIUS (5), bishop of Rome after Marcus from 6th Feb. A.D. 337 to 12th April, 352, during fifteen years two months and six days, elected after a vacancy of four months. His pontificate is especially notable for his defence of Athanasius, and for the canons of Sardica enacted during its course.

When Julius became pope, Athanasius was in exile at Trèves after his first deposition by the council of Tyre, having been banished by Constantine the Great in 336 at the instance of the Eusebian party. Constantine, who died on the Whitsunday of the year 337, was succeeded by his three sons, who divided the empire between them. Constantine II., the eldest, obtained the new capital of Constantinople, Constantius ruled over Thrace and the countries of the East, Constans over Italy and the West. In the year 338 Constantine II., writing from Trèves, informed the Alexandrians that he was carrying out his father's intentions in restoring Athanasius; and, with the assent of the two other emperors, the exile returned to his see, and was received in triumph. But the Eusebians (as the prevalent heretical party, professing a modified form of Arianism, was now called) continued their machinations. Their chief leader, Eusebius of Nicomedia, having succeeded in obtaining the patriarchate of Constantinople, and Acacius, another leader, having become bishop of Caesarea, the restoration of Athanasius was by them declared invalid; and one Pistus was set up as bishop of Alexandria in his stead. A deputation was now sent to Rome, consisting of a presbyter Macarius, with two deacons, Martyrius and Hesychius, in order to induce Julius to declare against Athanasius and acknowledge Pistus; the former being charged, in addition to previous accusations, with having resumed his see after deposition without the sanction of a synod, and with having sold for his own benefit the corn allowed to the Alexandrian church. On the other hand, the Catholic bishops of Egypt issued an encyclic in his favour, and he himself sent presbyters to Rome to support his cause. Both his deputation and that of the Eusebians had interviews with Julius, and maintained their cases before him. According to Athanasius himself in his Apology, and to Julius in his letter written afterwards to the Eusebians, the accusing party was so discomfited in argument that Macarius secretly withdrew from Rome, and his colleagues who remained there, having failed to convince the pope, desired him to convene a general council at which the charges against Athanasius might be heard before himself as judge. Socrates (H. E. ii. 11) and Sozomen (H. E. iii. 7) state that Eusebius wrote to Julius requesting him to assume the judgment of the case. But this is not asserted by Julius himself in referring to the matter, and is improbable in itself. He consented to the proposal, undertaking to hold a council at such place as Athanasius might choose, and seems to have sent a synodical letter to the Eusebians, apprising them of his intention. This appears to have been the state of things at the close of the year 339. The dates of the several events that followed are not without difficulty. Those adopted as most probable in the article on ATHANASIUS will be given below.

Early in 340 it appears that Pistus had been given up as the rival bishop, and that one Gregory, a Cappadocian, had been violently intruded by Philagrius the praefect of Egypt into the see; whereupon the Lenten services of that year had been the occasion of atrocious treatment of the Catholics of Alexandria. Athanasius, having concealed himself for a time in the neighbourhood, and prepared an encyclic in which he detailed the proceedings, seems to have departed for Rome in the Easter season of the same year (340), and to have been welcomed there by Julius, who, after his arrival, sent two presbyters, Elpidius and Philoxenes, with a letter to Eusebius and his party, fixing the time and place of the proposed synod; viz. December 340, at Rome. To this council the Eusebians not only refused to come, but also detained the envoys of Julius beyond the time fixed for it. For Elpidius and Philoxenes did not return to Rome till the January of 341, bringing with them then a letter, of which no authentic editions remain, but the purport of which is gathered from the reply of Julius to be mentioned presently. Julius suppressed this letter for some time in the hope, he said, that the eventual arrival of some of the Eusebians in Rome might spare him the pain of making it public, and in this hope also he deferred the assembling of the council. But no one came. However anxious the Eusebians had been to enlist the pope on their side against Athanasius, and though the proposal of a council under him had been made by their emissaries, they were by no means prepared now to submit to his adjudication. On the contrary, they took advantage of the dedication of a new cathedral at Antioch to hold a council of their own there, known as the "Dedication Council" (probably in August 341), which was attended by ninety-seven bishops. Here, besides preparing canons and three creeds, designed to convince the Western church of their orthodoxy, they confirmed the sentence of the council of Tyre against Athanasius, and endeavoured to preclude all prospect of his restoration by a canon with retrospective force, which debarred even from a hearing any bishop or priest who should have officiated after a canonical deposition. Julius meanwhile had at length made public the letter above referred to, and, being still in ignorance of the proceedings at Antioch, assembled his council in the church of the presbyter Vito at Rome. It seems to have met in the November of 341, Athanasius being stated to have been then a year and a half in Rome. It was attended by more than fifty bishops. The old as well as the more recent accusations were considered; the acts of the council of Tyre, and those of the inquiry in the Mareotis about the broken chalice [see ATHANASIUS], which had been left at Rome by the Eusebian envoys two years before, were produced; witnesses were heard in disproof of the charges, and in proof of Eusebian atrocities; and the result was the complete acquittal of Athanasius, and confirmation of communion with him, which, indeed, had never been discontinued by Julius and the Roman church. Marcellus of Ancyra also, who had been deposed and banished on a charge of heresy by a Eusebian council at Constantinople in 336, and who had been for fifteen months in Rome, was declared orthodox on the strength of his confession of faith, which satisfied the council. Other bishops and priests, from Thrace, Coelesyria, Phoenicia, Palestine, and Egypt, are said by Julius in his subsequent synodical letter to have been present to complain of injuries suffered from the Eusebian party. The historians Socrates (H. E. ii. 15) and Sozomen (H. E. iii. 8) say that all the deposed bishops were reinstated by Julius in virtue of the prerogative of the Roman see, and that he wrote vigorous letters in their defence, reprehending the Eastern bishops, and summoning some of the accusers to appear at Rome. But there seems to be much exaggeration in these statements. Paul certainly, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, whom Eusebius had succeeded, and who is mentioned by Socrates and Sozomen among the successful appellants, was not restored till the death of his rival in 342, and then only for a time, and not through the action of Julius: nor did Athanasius regain his see till 346. Indeed, Sozomen, in another passage (iii. 10), acknowledges that Julius effected nothing at the time by his letters in favour of Athanasius and Paul, and consequently referred their cause to the Emperor Constans. His real attitude and action with respect to the troubles in the East are best seen in the long letter which he addressed to the Easterns at the desire of the Roman council after its close, which has been preserved entire by Athanasius (Apolog. contr. Arian. 21-36). He begins by animadverting strongly on the tone of the letter brought back to him by his envoys, which was such, he says, that when he had at last reluctantly shewn it to others they could hardly believe it to be genuine. His own action in the matter had been complained of in the letter. He therefore both defends himself and recriminates, writing to the following effect:—"You object to having your own synodical judgment (that of Tyre) questioned in a second council. But this is no unprecedented proceeding. The council of Nice permitted the acts of one synod to be examined in another: and, if your own judgment were right, you should have rejoiced in the opportunity of having it confirmed; and how can you, of all men, complain, when it was at the instance of your own emissaries, when worsted by the advocates of Athanasius, that the Roman council was convened? You certainly are not in a position to plead the irreversibility of the decision of a synod, having yourselves reversed even the judgment of Nice in admitting Arians to communion. If on this ground you complain of my receiving Athanasius, much more may I complain of you for asking me to acknowledge Pistus, a man alleged by the envoys of Athanasius to have been condemned as an Arian at Nice, and admitted by your own representatives to have been ordained by one Secundus, who had been so condemned. It must have been from chagrin at being so utterly refuted in his advocacy of Pistus that your emissary Macarius fled by night, though in weak health, from Rome." He next refers, in a vein of sarcasm, to an allegation of his correspondents as to the equality of all bishops, which they had made either in justification of their having judged a bishop of Alexandria, or in deprecation of the case being referred to Rome. "If, as you write, you hold the honour of all bishops to be equal, and unaffected by the greatness of their sees, this view comes ill from those who have shewn themselves so anxious to get translated from their own small sees to greater ones." He here alludes to Eusebius himself, who had passed from Berytus to Nicomedia, and thence to Constantinople. Having next treated as frivolous their plea of the shortness of the time allowed for their attendance at the Roman council, he meets their further complaint that his letter of summons had been addressed only to Eusebius and his party, instead of the whole Eastern episcopate. "I naturally wrote (he says) to those who had written to me. If you expected me to address you all, you ought all to have addressed me." And, he adds emphatically, "though I alone wrote, I did so in the name of, and as expressing the sentiments of, all the Italian bishops." He then proceeds to justify at length the action of himself and of the Roman council. The letters of accusation against Athanasius had been from strangers living at a distance from him, and had been found to contradict each other: the testimonies in his favour from his own people, who knew him well, had been clear and consistent. He exposes the falsity of the charges about the murder of Arsenius and the broken chalice, and the unfairness of the Mareotic inquiry. He contrasts the conduct of Athanasius, who had come of his own accord to Rome to court investigation, with the unwillingness of his accusers to appear against him. He dwells on the uncanonical intrusion of Gregory the Cappadocian by military force into the Alexandrian see, and on the atrocities that had been committed to enforce acceptance of him. "It is you," he adds, "who have set at nought the canons, and disturbed the church's peace; not we, as you allege, who have entertained a just appeal, and acquitted the innocent." After briefly justifying also the acquittal of Marcellus from the charge of heresy, he calls upon those to whom he writes to remedy the wrong that had been done by repudiating the base conspiracy of a few. Lastly, he points out what would have been the proper course of procedure in case of any just cause of suspicion against the bishops in question. This part of his letter is important, as shewing his own view of his position in relation to the church at large. "If (he says) they were guilty, as you say they were, they ought to have been judged canonically, not after your method. All of us (i.e. the whole episcopate) ought to have been written to, that so justice might be done by all. For they were bishops who suffered these things, and bishops of no ordinary sees, but of such as were founded by apostles personally. Why, then, were you unwilling to write to us (i.e. to the Roman church) especially about the Alexandrian see? Can you be ignorant that this is the custom; that we should be written to in the first place, so that hence (i.e. from this church) what is just may be defined? Wherefore, if a suspicion against the bishop had arisen there (i.e. in Alexandria), it ought to have been referred hither to our church. But now, having never informed us of the case, they wish us to accept their condemnation, in which we had no part. Not so do the ordinances of St. Paul direct: not so do the fathers teach: this is pride, and a new ambition. I beseech you, hear me gladly. I write this for the public good: for what we have received from the blessed Peter I signify to you." If this language is carefully weighed, it will hardly be found to bear out the inferences of Socrates (ii. 8, 17) and of Sozomen (iii. 10), that, according to church law, enactments made without the consent of the bishop of Rome were held to be invalid. It certainly implies no claim to exclusive jurisdiction over all churches. All that Julius insists on is that charges against the bishops of great sees ought, according to apostolic tradition and canonical rule, to be referred to the whole episcopate of the church catholic; and that, in the case of a bishop of Alexandria at least, custom gave the initiative of proceedings to the bishop of Rome. In this reference to custom, he probably has in view the case of Dionysius of Alexandria, the charges against whom had been laid before Dionysius of Rome. The allegation made in the earlier part of his letter of the fathers of Nice having sanctioned the reconsideration of the decisions of synods is more difficult to account for. The only Nicene canon at all cognate to the subject is the fifth, which requires biennial provincial synods to review excommunications pronounced by bishops. But this is really irrelevant to the point at issue. He may be alluding to the action of the Nicene Council itself* in entertaining the case of Arius after he had already been synodically condemned at Alexandria. The whole action of pope Julius in this matter appears open to no exception, though it might seem at first sight an uncanonical proceeding to reverse in an Italian synod the decisions of an Eastern one on an Eastern question. But, if the synod consisted of Westerns only, it was the fault of the

* This indeed was one of the purposes which the emperor had at heart in convening it. Just as the synod of Aries had also met by his orders to reconsider the acquittal of St. Caecilian, decreed in the previous synod of Rome under Melchiodorus.—E. S. Ff.

Easterns themselves, who refused to attend it, though it had been at the suggestion of their own emissaries that Julius had convened it: there had been a notorious miscarriage of justice, which required some remedy: and, after all, what the Roman synod did was only to confirm the continuance of communion with Eastern prelates who were held to have been unjustly condemned. It had no power to do more. Still, the position of Julius on this occasion may be regarded as a step towards subsequent papal claims of a more advanced kind; and it probably suggested the canons of Sardica, pregnant with results, which will come under notice presently.

After the proceedings detailed above, Athanasius remained still in Rome, till, in the fourth year of his residence there—probably in the summer of 343—he received a summons from the emperor Constans to meet him at Milan (Athanas. Apolog. ad Imp. Constantium, 4). The death of Constantine II. in 340 had left Constans sole emperor of the West, and he had now been urged by certain bishops to propose to the Eastern emperor, Constantius, the holding of a new council, at which both East and West should be fully represented; and it was with a view to this that Athanasius was now sent for. With the concurrence of the two emperors such a council was summoned to meet at the Moesian town of Sardica on the confines of their empires, probably towards the end of the year 343. The usually received date of the council of Sardica (viz. 347) has been concluded, from recent investigations, to be erroneous. (See Art. on ATHANASIUS, p. 190, note.) The scheme of united action failed in consequence of the Eastern bishops having refused, after their arrival, to take part in the proceedings. They withdrew, along with five Western prelates, to Philippopolis, within the Eastern empire, where they held a separate synod of their own. Notwithstanding their absence, the rest of the Westerns met at Sardica, being presided over by the venerable Hosius of Cordova, who, some twenty years before, had taken the lead at Nice. In some editions of the Acts of the Council he, Vincentius of Capua, Calepodius of Naples, and Januarius of Beneventum, are designated legates of the Roman see. But this designation seems due only to the desire, which appears also in other cases, of assigning the presidency of all councils to the pope. According to Athanasius (Apolog. contr. Arian. 50), Julius was represented by two presbyters, Archidamus and Philoxenes, whose names appear ("Julius Romae per Archidamum et Philoxenem presbyteros") in the signatures to the synodal letter of the council after that of Hosius. Hosius undoubtedly presided, and there is no sign of his having done so as the pope's deputy either in the Acts of the Council or in the letter sent from it to Julius at the close of its sittings. Nor can the initiative, any more than the presidency, of the council be assigned to Julius. Sozomen indeed (iii. 10) says that Julius, when his own letter to the Eastern bishops had done no good, wrote to Constans on the subject, who thereupon requested his brother to send three of the Eastern bishops to him; that they were consequently sent, but, having concealed from Constans what had been done at Antioch, were sent home again. This, however, was previous to, and had no direct connexion with, the council of Sardica. The idea of its convention having been initiated by Julius is inconsistent with the statement of Athanasius himself, who calls God to witness that when he was summoned to Milan he was entirely ignorant of the purpose of the summons, but found afterwards that it was because "certain bishops" who were there had been moving Constans to induce Constantius to allow a general council to be assembled (Apolog. ad Imp. Constantium, 4). If Julius had been the mover, it is unlikely that Athanasius, who was with him at Rome, would have been ignorant of the purpose of his summons, or that he would have spoken only of "certain bishops." The fact seems to be that the council was convened, by whomsoever first suggested, by the emperors on their own authority, to review the whole past proceedings, whether at Tyre, at Antioch, or at Rome; and that without asking the pope's leave, or inviting him to take the lead. The council, however, when it met after the secession of the Eastern bishops, did all that he could have desired, had he himself presided. It confirmed and promulgated anew all the decisions of the Roman council, decreed the restoration of the banished orthodox prelates, and excommunicated the Eusebian intruders. It also passed twenty-one canons of discipline, three of which are of special historical importance. The extant Acts of the Council give them thus. Canon III. (al. III., IV.) "Bishop Osius said: This also is necessary to be added, that bishops pass not from their own province to another in which there are bishops, unless perhaps on the invitation of their brethren there, that we may not seem to close the gate of charity. And, if in any province a bishop have a controversy against a brother bishop, let neither of the two call upon a bishop from another province to take cognisance of it. But, should any one of the bishops have been condemned in any case, and think that he has good cause for a reconsideration of it, let us (if it please you) honour the memory of the blessed Apostle St. Peter, so that Julius, the Roman bishop, be written to by those who have examined the case; and, if he should judge that the trial ought to be renewed, let it be renewed, and let him appoint judges. But, if he should decide that the case is such that what has been done ought not to be reconsidered, what he thus decides shall be confirmed. Si hoc omnibus placet? The synod replied, Placet."

Canon IV. (al. V.) "Bishop Gaudentius said: Let it, if it please you, be added to this decree that when any bishop has been deposed by the judgment of bishops who dwell in neighbouring places (in finitimis locis), and he has proclaimed his intention of taking his case to Rome, no other bishop shall by any means be ordained to his see till the cause has been determined in the judgment of the Roman bishop."

Canon V. (al. VII.) "Bishop Osius said: It has seemed good to us (placuit) that if any bishop has been accused, and the assembled bishops of his own region have deposed him, and if he has appealed to the bishop of the Roman church, and if the latter is willing to hear him, and considers it just that the inquiry should be renewed, let him deign to write to the bishops of a neighbouring province, that they may diligently inquire into everything, and give their sentence

according to the truth. But if the appellant in his supplication should have moved the Roman bishop to send a presbyter (al. presbyters) 'de suo latere,' it shall be in his (i.e. the Roman bishop's) power to do whatever he thinks right. And if he should decide to send persons having his own authority to sit in judgment with the bishops, it shall be at his option to do so. But if he should think the bishops sufficient for terminating the business, he shall do what approves itself to his most wise judgment." <sup>b</sup> On these canons the following remarks may be made. First, they were designed to provide what recent events had shewn the need of, and what the existing church system did not adequately furnish; a recognised court of appeal in ecclesiastical causes. The canons of Nice had provided none beyond the provincial synod. If a bishop felt aggrieved by the sentence of the bishops of his province, his only strictly canonical redress was by appeal to a general council, which could be but a rare event, and was dependent on the will of princes. The need was now felt of a readier remedy. Secondly, it is to be observed how this remedy was provided: viz. by giving the Roman bishop the power, if he thought fit, of causing the judgment of provincial synods to be reconsidered; but only on the appeal of the aggrieved party, and only in one or other of certain prescribed ways. He might, when appealed to, refuse to take the matter up at all, thus confirming the decision of the provincial synod; or he might constitute the bishops of a neighbouring province as a court of appeal; and he might further, if requested, and if he thought it necessary, send one or more presbyters as his legates to watch the proceedings; or appoint representatives of himself to sit as assessors in the court. But he was not empowered either to interfere unless appealed to, or to summon the case to Rome to be heard before himself in synod; still less of course to adjudicate alone. Thirdly, it is evident that this course of procedure was sanctioned for the first time at Sardica. The canons, on the face of them, were not a mere confirmation of a traditional prerogative of Rome. The words of

<sup>b</sup> The editions of these canons, extant in Greek and Latin translations, vary in their wording and arrangement of them, but all agree in the drift as given above. Doubts have been entertained of their authenticity, but they are generally accepted. See Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. 2nd period, Div. I. ch. iii. note 7, where references are given.

[More than six years ago a paper was prepared by me for the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES exhaustively going into the question of their genuineness, and pronouncing against it with confidence. This paper remained in an unlocked box in the Bodleian Library for a year or more; when quite by accident I saw, among the new books of 1875 just received there, a work by Professor Aloisius Vincenzi, printed that year at the Vatican, entitled De Hebraeorum et Christianorum sacrâ Monarchiâ, and called a second edition of it. Part II. c. 7 of this work contains an elaborate disproof of the genuineness of these canons, on grounds so similar to my own, that I removed my MS., and the result was, that it was overlooked, when it should have been sent in for publication. Since then, more facts have come to light confirming my conclusion. But this is, not that they were forged in Africa by the orthodox bishops—which is the amusing hypothesis of M. Vincenzi—but in, or not far from Rome.—E. S. F.]

Hosius were, "Let us, if it please you, honour the memory of the blessed Apostle St. Peter," i.e. by conceding this power to the Roman bishop. Fourthly, the power in question was definitely given only to the then reigning pope, Julius, who is mentioned by name; and it has hence been supposed that it was not meant to be accorded to his successors (cf. Richer. Hist. Concil. General. t. i. c. 3, § 4). But it seems more natural to conclude that the arrangement was at any rate intended to be permanent, since both the need for it and the grounds assigned for it were permanent. Fifthly, since it was the causes of Eastern bishops that led to the enactment of these canons, it is probable that they were meant to apply to the whole church, and not to the Western only. The Greek canonists, Balsamon and Zonaras, maintain their narrower scope; and it is true that, the council having consisted of Westerns only, they were never accepted by the churches of the East. But though the council of Sardica was not in fact oecumenical, the emperors had intended it to be so, and the Roman canonists call it so in virtue of the general summons. Still they do not give it rank as a separate one of this nature, regarding it rather as an appendage to that of Nice; and it seems probable that its canons were from the first added at Rome<sup>c</sup> to those of Nice as supplementary to them, since in the well-known case of Apiarius, the African presbyter, which arose in the time of Zosimus (A.D. 417), this pope quoted them as Nicene; and pope Innocent (A.D. 402) seems previously to have done the same in defending his appellate jurisdiction over the church in Gaul. In the African case the error was eventually exposed by reference to the copies of the Nicene canons preserved at Constantinople and Alexandria, and the Africans thereupon distinctly repudiated the claims of Rome which rested upon this false foundation. But Boniface and Coelestine, the successors of Zosimus, continued to refer to these canons as Nicene; as did Leo I. in 449; and this continued to be the Roman position. It was probably a mistake originally, arising from the cause above mentioned; but the persistence of the popes in quoting these canons as Nicene after the mistake had been discovered is with reason adduced as an early instance of Roman unfairness in support of papal claims. It is further a significant fact, that in some Roman copies of the canons in question the name of Sylvester was substituted for that of Julius, as if with an intention of throwing their date back to the Nicene period.<sup>d</sup>

<sup>c</sup> In the collection of canons used at Rome, those of later synods appear to have been appended to those of Nice without distinction. Quesnel has published such a collection, containing forty-six canons, whereas twenty only were made at Nice, and twenty-one at Sardica. (Codex Canonum et Constitutionum Eccl. Rom. Append. ad Leonis Opera Quesnellii.)

Certainly, the earliest allusion to them is where pope Liberius says, in a letter whose genuineness has been needlessly questioned, "secutus traditionem majorum presbyteros urbis Romae... ex latere meo." What reference could be more direct than this? "ad Alexandriam ad supradictum Athanasium direxi, ut ad urbem Romam veniret." (Frag. iv. ap. S. Hil.)—E. S. Ff.

<sup>d</sup> See note on "Julio" in Can. iii. of the Sardican canons, "Ex interpretatione Dionysii Exigui (Labbe, l. ii. p. 274); Quidam MSS. habent Sylvestro." The same

The scope also of the canons came in time to be extended beyond its real import, being made to involve the power of the pope to summon at his will all cases to be heard before himself at Rome.* Our proper conclusion on the whole question seems to be, that, though these canons were probably intended by their framers to bind the whole church, the authority that imposed them was not really adequate to the purpose; but that the popes afterwards appealed to them unfairly in support of their claims by misrepresenting both their authority and their scope.

At the close of its sittings, the council of Sardica addressed letters to the two emperors, substitution is made in the collection published by Quessel, referred to in our last note.

* One specimen might here be dwelt upon at some length, if for no other reason, to direct attention to facts of history not hitherto taken into account by critics and commentators in dealing with an as yet unexplained statement of the three Greek historians, Theodoret, Socrates, and Sozomen. Theodoret, the earliest of the three, "composed his history," says Cave, "A.D. 450;" when, undoubtedly, the circumstances of his own appeal to Rome from the Latrocinium, and restoration by pope Leo the year before, would be fresh in his mind. He says of Julius: "Is vero ecclesiasticam legem secutus, et ipsos Romam venire jussit, et Athanasium ad dicendam causam evocavit" (ii. 4). This is but the language of Liberius already given in the preceding note, interpreted by his own case. Socrates (ii. 17) and Sozomen, in discussing the course pursued by the same pope, say there was an ecclesiastical canon forbidding any canonical action on the part of the churches, in opposition to the judgment of the bishop of Rome. This expression, μη κανονίζειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας, has been misunderstood. Accustomed as we have been to speak of the canons of councils as the only canons of antiquity with which we have to do, we forget the earlier and once exclusive meaning of the word to designate the clergy-roll of each church. Socrates and Sozomen had both meanings in their eye. An ecclesiastical canon—a canon of Sardica—debarred the churches from canonizing, in other words from making any changes in their clergy-roll, deposing bishops as Athanasius, or priests as Aparius—either in opposition to, or without waiting for, the judgment of the bishop of Rome. Facts alone shew this to be the identic meaning of all three passages: and also that it is to the canons of Sardica that all three writers alike refer. As these canons had not yet been regularly translated into Greek, which they were for the first time by John Scholasticus in the next century, they refer to their general import, rather than to their exact words. Further, that Constantinople must have been acquainted with them both at that time, and some time before, is clear, not only from the appeal of Theodoret himself, which was founded on them, but also from the inquiry made of the patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople by the Africans for the genuine Nicene canons, to compare with the canon quoted against them as Nicene by Zosimus. For, of course, this canon must have been brought under notice thus at both places. Lastly, one of these patriarchs, St. Cyril, in order to impart greater weight to his position, on starting to sit in judgment on the patriarch of new Rome, armed himself with legatine powers from pope Celestine, and came to Ephesus thus equipped, after the manner of Faustinus at Carthage, though carrying out his precedent on a grander scale. Thus the three Greek historians of the 5th century do nothing more than interpret the Sardinian canons by the facts of their own times, which had happened since they became current, and the acts of Julius by the Sardinian canons with their enlarged scope; which of course was in marked contrast even to their tentative language, and therefore much more to his actual deeds.—E S Ff.

to Julius, to the church of Alexandria, to the bishops of Egypt and Libya, and an encyclic "to all bishops." The letters to the emperors have not been preserved. In that to Julius the reason he had alleged for not attending the council,—viz. the necessity of his remaining in Rome to guard against the schemes of heretics—is allowed as sufficient; and he is presumed to have been present in spirit. He is told that, though the documents sent him and the oral report of his emissaries would inform him of what had been done, it was thought fit to send him also a brief summary. The most religious emperors had permitted the council to discuss anew all past proceedings, and hence the following questions had been considered:—(1) The definition of the true faith; (2) The condemnation or acquittal of those whom the Eusebians had deposed; (3) The charges against the Eusebians themselves of having unjustly condemned and persecuted the orthodox. For full information as to the council's decisions on these questions, he is referred to the letters written to the emperors; and he is directed, rather than requested ("tua autem excellens prudentia disponere debet, ut per tua scripta &c."), to inform the bishops of Italy, Sardinia, and Sicily of what had been done, that they might know with whom to hold communion. A list is appended of those who had been excommunicated by the synod. The whole drift of the letter is inconsistent with the idea of the council having been convened by the pope himself, or held in his name, or considered dependent on him for ratification of its decrees. He is not even charged with the promulgation of them, except to the bishops under his more immediate jurisdiction. The only expression pointing to his pre-eminent position is one in which it is said that it would appear to be best and exceedingly fitting (optimum et valde congruentissimum) that "the head, that is the see of St. Peter," should be informed respecting every single province. Nor is there in the letter to the Alexandrians, or in the encyclic to all bishops, any reference to him as having initiated or taken part in the council; only in the latter a passing allusion to the previous council which he (comminister noster dilectissimus) had convened at Rome. The letter to Julius is signed, first by Hosius, and then by fifty-eight other bishops, being probably those who were present at the close of the council. But as many as 284 are given by Athanasius (Apolog. contr. Arian. 49, 50) as having assented to its decrees, and signed its encyclic letter. They include, from various parts of the West with a few from the East 78, from Gaul and Britain 34, from Africa 36, from Egypt 94, from Italy 15, from Cyprus 12, from Palestine 15.

It was not till October 346, some three years after the council, that Athanasius was allowed to return to his see. From Sardica he went to Naïssus in Upper Dacia, and thence, at the invitation of Constans, to Aquileia, where he remained till he was at length recalled by Constantius. On his way thence to Alexandria he again visited Rome, and was again cordially received by Julius, who took the occasion of writing a letter of congratulation to the clergy and laity of Alexandria, remarkable for its warmth of feeling and beauty of expression. He regards the return at last of their beloved bishop after such prolonged affliction as a reward granted to their unwavering affection for him, to their continual prayers for him, to their letters of sympathy that had consoled him in his exile, as well as to his own faithfulness. He dwells on the holy character of Athanasius, his resoluteness in defence of the faith, his endurance of persecution, his contempt of death and danger. He congratulates them on receiving him back among them all the more glorious for his long trials and his fully proved innocence. He pictures vividly the scene in Alexandria, where he would be welcomed home by rejoicing crowds. And he ends by a prayer for a full and lasting reward of their faith and allegiance to be granted to themselves and their posterity both in this world and the world to come. The letter is the more admirable for the absence of all bitterness of expression towards the party of persecutors. Two copies of it remain; one given by Socrates (ii. 23), the other by Athanasius himself (Apol. contr. Arian. 52); and it may be taken as a sign of the modesty of the saint that in the latter the greater part of his own praises is omitted.

The only further notice we find of Julius is that of his having received the recantation of Valens and Ursacius, two notable opponents of Athanasius who had been condemned at Sardica. During the time of his temporary triumph they had already recanted before a synod at Milan, and written a pacific letter to Athanasius; but, not content with this, they went also of their own accord, A.D. 347, to Rome, where they presented a humble apologetic letter to Julius, and were admitted to communion (Athanas. Histor. Arian. ad Monachos, 26; Hilar. Fragm. i.). Their profession, however (in which they owned the falsity of their charges against Athanasius and renounced Arian heresy), proved afterwards to have been insincere. For when, after the death of Constans in 350, and the defeat of Maxentius in 351, the tide of imperial favour began to turn, they recanted their recantation, which they said had been made only under fear of Constans. But Julius, who died April 12, 352, was spared the pain of having to cope with the troublous times which ensued. The fresh charges, which were now got up, and sent to him and the emperor, arrived at Rome too late for him to entertain them. [LIBERIUS.]

The only extant writings of pope Julius are the two letters, to the Eusebians and to the Alexandrians, which have been referred to above. Two others, to the Easterns in the cause of Athanasius, asserting in strong terms the authority of the Roman see—being the first and second of his reputed letters—are certainly spurious, and are allowed to be so by Baronius and Binius. Gennadius (de Script. Eccl. c. 2), Evagrius (iii. 31), and Leontius (commentar. de sect. act. 8), speak of another letter, said to have been written by him to one Didymus about the Incarnation, containing heretical views; but regarded by them as really composed by Apollinarius under the name of Julius. Leontius mentions seven such supposititious letters. Ten decreta are ascribed to him in the collections of Gratian and Ivo. One of them is interesting for its allusion to certain usages in the celebration of the Eucharist;—viz. that of using milk, or the expressed juice of grapes, instead of wine; that of administering the bread dipped in the wine, after the manner of the Greeks at the present day; and that of making use of a linen cloth soaked in must, reserved through the year, and moistened with water for each celebration. All these are condemned, except the use of the unfermented juice of the grape, in which (it is said) is the efficacy of wine. This is allowed in case of need, if mixed with water, which is alleged to be always necessary to represent the people, as the wine represents the blood of Christ.

Among the numerous Oriental liturgies, current under the names of apostles, bishops of Rome, and others, the Syrian Jacobites had one ascribed to Julius;—so mentioned by Abraham Echellensis in notes to Hebed-Jesu, and so accounted by the later Maronites. It cannot, however, possibly belong to him or his age. (See Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. vol. ii. pp. 227, 234; Bona, de Rebus Liturg. Lib. ii. c. 9 (1), and Sala's note.)

Julius was buried, according to the Liberian and Felician catalogues, "in coemeterio Calpodii ad Callistum" on the Aurelian Way, where he had built a basilica. He is celebrated as a saint in Usuard and the Roman Martyrology, April 12, thus: "S. Julius papa, qui adversus Arianos pro fide catholica plurimum laboravit, ac multis praeclare gestis, sanctitate celebris quiescit in pace. Sepultus via Aurelia."

In the Liber Pontificalis, and in Bede's Martyrology, he is said to have been banished for ten months, and to have returned to his see after the death of the emperor Constantius. This is manifestly erroneous, since Constantius undoubtedly survived him. The authorities for this life appear in the references that have been given. [J. B.—y.]

JULIUS AFRICANUS. [AFRICANUS.]

JULIUS (6), bishop of Paphos, present at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 570; Le Quien, ii. 1059.) [L. D.]

JULIUS (7), African bishop, probably the same as Julianus (4), bearer of the letter to pope Innocent from the councils of Carthage and Milevis A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 181, 182; Tillemont, 264, vol. xiii. p. 693.) [H. W. P.]

JULIUS, of Cavailon. [JULIANUS (18).]

JULIUS (8), 23rd bishop of Avignon in the list of Dom Polycarpe de la Rivière (Gall. Christ. i. 862). In the year 439 a Julius was present at the council of Riez in Narbonne (Labbe, Sacr. Conc. v. 1195, Florence, 1759-98; cf. Bar. Pag. an. 439, n. xv.). He is said to have died in 449. His name does not appear in the list of the Gallia Christiana (i. 797), or in Gams's Series Episc. (p. 503). [S. A. B.]

JULIUS (9) (JULIANUS), bishop of Puteoli (Gesta de Nom. Acacii, in Labbe, iv. 1079 D), probably the bishop Julius to whom, A.D. 448, Leo the Great intrusted the execution of certain disciplinary measures in the church of Beneventum. [See DORUS, Leo Mag. Ep. xix. 736.] Certainly he, in company with Renatus the presbyter and Hilarus the deacon (q. v.), carried to Flavian of Constantinople the famous "tome" of St. Leo in June 449, and acted as his legate in the "robber" council of Ephesus (Leo Mag. Ep. xxxiii. 866, Migne). The legates are described by Leo as sent "de latere meo" (Ep. xxxii. 859, xxxiv. 870). He was not the first pope to use this phrase; see p. 530 sup. and the Ballerini in loc. Migne). The fact that Julius appears in the "acta" of the council most frequently as Julianus has caused him to be confused with Julian of Cos. That it was this prelate, however, and not Julian of Cos, who was the papal legate at Ephesus is proved by Leo's letter to the latter (xxxiv. 870), and by the fact that the legate did not know Greek, which Julian of Cos certainly did (see JULIANUS; Labbe, iv. 121 B; see also Tillemont, xv. note 21, pp. 901-2). Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. i. x., Prosper, Chron. and Gesta de Nom. Acac. in Labbe, iv. 1079 D, call the papal legate Julius, not Julianus (see also Marianus Scotus, Chron. ann. 450 in Pat. Lat. cxlvii. 726). On Quesnel's hypothesis, that Julius and not Renatus died on the road to Ephesus, and that Julian took his place, cf. Tillemont, l.c., and Hefele, Concil. ii. 368, 369. On their arrival at Ephesus the legates lodged with Flavian; it was on the ground that they had lived with him, and been tampered with by him (συνεκοτηθησαν, Lat. munerati), that Eutyches took exception to their impartiality as judges (Labbe, iv. 149 B).

The assertion of Liberatus (Breviarium, cap. xii.) that the Roman legates could not take part in the council ("assidere non passi sunt" are his words) because the precedence was not given to them as representing Rome, and because Leo's letter was not read, is not in harmony with the acta of the council (see Tillemont, xv. notes 26 and 27, p. 904). They undoubtedly did take part in the proceedings of the council, and Julius ranked after Dioscorus. His interpreter, as he could not speak Greek, was Florentius bishop of Sardis (Labbe, iv. 122 B). We read that he made several efforts to resist Dioscorus (q. v.), especially urging that Leo's letter should be read, but he does not seem to have been so prominent in opposition as Hilarus the deacon (Labbe, iv. 128 B, 149 B, 302 D). Leo, however, expresses high commendation of the conduct of his legates generally. They protested in the council, he says, and declared that no violence should sever them from the truth (Ep. 45, 922). He speaks to Theodosius, the emperor, of intelligence having been brought him of the acts of the synod by the bishop whom he had sent, as well as by the deacon (Ep. xliii. 902); but this in other letters (xliv. 911, xlv. 919) is corrected by the statement that only Hilarus made his escape to Rome. What happened to Julius we do not know, nor do we hear anything of him subsequently (Ughelli, Italia Sacra, vi. 272). Ughelli and Cappelletti (xix. 647, 669) name him Julianus and make him sixth bishop of Puteoli between Theodore and Stephen.

[C. G.]

JULIUS (10), bishop of Magarmell, or Vagarmeli, in Numidia, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notif. 57; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 211.) [R. S. G.]

JULIUS (11), bishop of Aegae (Ayas Kala), on the coast of Cilicia. Dionysius Telmarenensis states that Julius was exiled by the emperor

Justin I., in the year A.D. 518, for maintaining Monophysite opinions. (Asseman. Dissert. de Monoph. num. ii. p. 3 in Bibl. Orient. ii.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 896.) [J. de S.]

JULIUS, of Grumentum. [JULIANUS (46).]

JULIUS (12), Oct. 22, martyr commemorated by the Copts and Abyssinians, and thought to have suffered before Constantine. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 537.) [G. T. S.]

JULIUS (13), Aug. 19, senator and martyr at Rome under Commodus. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Roman.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (14), martyr at Dorostorum (Silistria) in Moesia in the reign of Alexander Severus. Commemorated on May 27. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Roman.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (15), said to have been martyred with Aaron at Caerleon-upon-Usk in the persecution of Diocletian, 304, but the story is doubtful. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 96; Liber Landavensis, 27, 215; Haddan and Stubbs, i. p. 6, 30.) [C. W. B.]

JULIUS (16), one of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa, commemorated April 16. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (17), priest, with his brother Julianus, deacon, are commemorated on Jan. 31 (Boll. Acta SS. 31 Jan. ii. 1101). See also the Auctaria of Usuardus, Mart. Auct. [J. G.]

JULIUS (18), martyr with Potamia in the city of Thagura or Tagora, an episcopal city in Numidia, commemorated on Dec. 5. (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Roman.; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 300.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (19), martyr at Gelduba or Gildoba (a place not identified) in Thrace; commemorated on Dec. 20. (Usuard. Mart. and note-Mart. Roman.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (20), one of the deacons anathematized along with Arius by Alexander bishop of Alexandria. (Theod. H. E. i. 3 al. 4, s. f.) [C. H.]

JULIUS (21), an Arian presbyter of Alexandria, expelled together with Arius by bishop Alexander, and restored by the emperor Constantian in the time of Athanasius. (Athanas. Hist. Ar. §71.) [C. H.]

JUMAEUS (JUMAEH, JUNEME), ninth bishop of Dol, in Brittany, perhaps near the beginning of the 8th century; it is not certain that he is distinct from Juthinaeus, the eleventh bishop. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 1041.) [S. A. B.]

JUNABUL, pupil of St. Dubricius at Hentland, Herefordshire, in the 5th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 315-321, 316, 324, 409, 624.) [J. G.]

JUNAN is noticed by Camerarius (De Scot. Fort. 200) at Dec. 2 as one who flourished with great favour and authority in Scotland in the reign of Kenneth II. If Junan be one of the many forms of Adamnan, he lived about a century from either of the Kenneths, but he may have been a different person. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 242, 360.) [J. G.]

JUNCUS, ST., the patron saint of Pelynt, near Looe, in Cornwall (William of Worcester, 114), but his church is now dedicated to St. Mary, as in so many other cases, St. Mary being a favourite dedication in later times.

[C. W. B.]

JUNEME, bishop of Dol. [JUMÆLUS.]

JUNEMENUS, bishop of Dol. [JUTHI-NÆLUS.]

JUNIANUS (1), Donatist bishop of Lamigiga in Numidia (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 645), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cogn. i. 133.)

[H. W. P.]

JUNIANUS (2), bishop of Simina, in Proconsular Africa, was at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 647; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 281.)

[R. S. G.]

JUNIANUS (3), anchorite at Limoges, commemorated on Oct. 16, with St. Amandus his master (Boll. Acta SS. 16 Oct. vii. 848 sq.). His name appears frequently in the Martyrologies (Boll. ib. 841; Usuardus, Mart. Auct. Oct. 16), and the miracles wrought at his tomb upon the blind and paralytic are affirmed on personal knowledge by St. Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Conf. c. 103), within sixty years after his death. See also Murray's Handbook of France, p. 244.

[J. G.]

JUNIANUS (4), Aug. 13, founder and first abbat of the monastery of Mariacum (Maire), in the 6th century. We are indebted for all we know of him to a life written in the reign of Louis the Pious, by Vulfinus Boëtius. The biographer's distance from the events he relates—nearly two centuries and a half—would detract largely from the value of his narrative, unless, as the critics assert, he merely retouched an older life, which they suppose to have been written by Auremundus, the saint's disciple and successor in the abbacy. (See Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 537, and Ceillier, xi. 693, xii. 364.) This life is to be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 307–319, Paris, 1688–1701, and in Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 38–46. It was also published by Labbe, and part of it is incorporated into Duchesne's Historiæ Francorum Scriptores, tom. i. 542–544, as bearing on French history. (Hist. Litt. iv. 500, 501.)

JUNILIUS (Ἰουλίος, JUNILLUS), an African by birth, whence he is commonly known as Junilius Africanus. He filled for seven years in the court of the emperor Justinian the important office of quaestor of the sacred palace, in which office he succeeded the celebrated Tribonian (Procop. Anecd. c. 20). The same authority informs us that on the death of Junilius, he was succeeded by Constantine, whom the Acts of the 5th general council shew to have held the office in A.D. 553. The death of Junilius may therefore be placed a year or two earlier. This office of quaestor was one of a judicial character, and in particular all appeals from the provinces would come before him for examination. We may be sure that this office would only be conferred on one who had distinguished himself by successful practice as a lawyer. Procopius, however, describes Junilius as ignorant of law, as acquainted only with Latin literature, as never having received any proper education in Greek, as speaking that language in such a way as often to excite the laughter of his attendants, and as disgracefully avaricious and corrupt in the administration of his office. We must not lay too much stress on this disparaging account of Procopius, the slanderous character of whose Secret History is well known. Junilius, though a layman, took great interest in theological studies. The theological activity of Justinian having made it necessary that a deputation of African bishops should visit Constantinople, one of them, PRIMASIUS of Adrumetum (q. v.), naturally came into conversation with his distinguished countryman, Junilius. Primasius made it his business to enquire who among the Greeks was distinguished as a theologian, to which Junilius replied that he knew one Paul [PAUL OF NISIBIS], a Persian by race, who had been educated in the school of the Syrians at Nisibis, where theology was taught by public masters in the same systematic manner as the secular studies of grammar and rhetoric were expounded elsewhere. On further enquiry Junilius owned that he was in possession of an introduction to the Scriptures by this Paul, which on the solicitation of Primasius he translated into Latin, merely altering it by breaking it up into question and answer, so as to throw it into the catechetical form. Kihn identifies this work of Paul with that which Ebedjesu (Asseman. Bibl. Or. III. i. 87; Badger, Nestorians, ii. 369) calls

Maschelmonutho desurtho
 The work of Junilius was called

"Instituta regularia divinae legis," but is commonly known as "De partibus divinae legis," a title which really is only that of the first chapter. Junilius, speaking of the two books of which his work consists, modestly contrasts himself with those who had brought into the Lord's treasury gold, silver, or precious stones: he, like the poor widow, had thrown in all he had, only two mites, and those borrowed. The scientific logical arrangement of this work soon gained for it popularity in the West, and shortly after its publication Junilius is named by Cassiodorus (Institut. i. 10) among the "Introductores divinae Scripturæ." Several MSS. of it are extant. The first printed edition was published by Gastius, Basle, 1545. It has been since often reprinted in libraries of the Fathers, among which we only think it necessary to name Galland, vol. xii., Migne, vol. lxxviii. The latest and best edition, for which 13 MSS. have been collated, is by Professor Kihn of Würzburg (Kihn: Theodor von Mopsuestia, Freiburg, 1880), a work admirable for the thoroughness of its investigations; and it may be said that few commentators have done more to throw light on their author than Kihn has done for Junilius.

Works on ecclesiastical writers had almost with one consent represented Junilius as an African bishop, and Utica had been conjectured as possibly his see. Galland, though unwilling to oppose the prevalent opinion, had expressed himself as not satisfied with the evidence for it. Kihn reports that of the 13 MSS. which he had consulted, only 4, and these clearly derived from a common source, give Junilius the appellation of bishop, and that not in the title but in the subscription at the end, a place where copyists are often bountiful of titles of honour. The work itself, dedicated to "his most reverend father Primasius," and speaking in the third person of the "fellow bishops of Primasius," gives no hint that the author claimed like dignity for himself. Kihn found new evidence to throw doubt on the episcopal character of Junilius. To the account which we gave (Vol. II. p. 583) of the writings of FULGENTIUS FERRANDES must be added that there were published by Reifferscheid, in 1872, in a Programme of the University of Breslau (Index Scholarum, &c.) under the name of Anecdota Casinensia, some remains drawn from the library of Monte Casino, and that these included five previously unpublished letters by Ferrandus. One of these was a letter of recommendation addressed to Junilius, and from a comparison with the forms of address used in other letters sent to ecclesiastics, Kihn concluded that Junilius could not have been a bishop, nor even a priest or deacon. The address gives him the title "illustris," and Kihn perceived that, according to the usage of the time, this could not be taken for a mere complimentary epithet, but must have been a title to which his correspondent had an official right. On examining what offices conferred this title, he found that they were only those of the very highest rank, and among these he found only two which it was likely Junilius could have held; that of Master of the Offices and Quaestor, and of these the latter seemed to him the most probable; but he long searched in vain for evidence that Junilius had held either office, and it was only when after repeated disappointments his hopes had sunk to zero, that his sagacious research was rewarded by finding in Procopius the account which we have already given, completely establishing the conclusion at which he had on other grounds already arrived. The chief importance of this result is that we learn that the work of Junilius does not, as has been often assumed, represent an African school of theology, but the Syrian; and in fact Kihn conclusively shews that the work (although possibly Junilius was not aware of it himself) is all founded on the teaching of Theodore of Mopsuestia (q. v.).

Junilius divides the books of Scripture into two classes. The first, which alone he calls Canonical Scripture, are of perfect authority; the second added by many (plures adjungunt) are of secondary (mediae) authority; all other books are thrown into a third class as of no authority. The first class consists of—(1) Historical Books: Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, and Kings, and in the N. T. the four Gospels and Acts; (2) (Prophetical, in which what is evidently intended for a chronological arrangement is substituted for that more usual): Psalms, Hosea, Isaiah, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. As for John's Apocalypse he says that amongst the Easterns it is much doubted of. (3) Proverbial or parabolic: the Proverbs of Solomon and the Book of Jesus the Son of Sirach. (4) Doctrinal: Ecclesiastes, the 14 Epistles of St. Paul in the order now usual, including that to the Hebrews, the first epistle of St. Peter, and that of St. John. In his second class he counts as added by very many—(1) Historical: Chronicles, Job, Esdras (no doubt including Nehemiah), Judith, Esther, and Maccabees; (3) Proverbial: Wisdom and the Song of Songs; (4) Doctrinal: the Epistles of James, 2 Peter, Jude, 2, 3 John. This list makes no express mention of the Lamentations nor of Baruch, which no doubt were included in Jeremiah, nor of the book of Tobit, which book however is quoted in a later part of the treatise. Kihn is no doubt right in regarding the omission of Tobit as being due only to the accidental error of an early transcriber; for it is not conceivable that a writer of the time should have designedly refused to include Tobit even in his list of deutero-canonical books. Junilius gives as a reason for not reckoning the books of the second class as canonical that the Hebrews make this difference, as Jerome and others testify. This is clearly incorrect with regard to several of the books in question, and one is tempted to think (though Kihn is of a different opinion) that Junilius himself added this reference to Jerome, and did not find it in his Greek original. The low place assigned to the book of Job and to the Song of Solomon is in accordance with the estimate of these books formed by Theodore of Mopsuestia. It is to be noted that Junilius quotes as Peter's a passage from his second epistle, which he had not admitted into his list of canonical books. It is to be remarked also that he describes the Psalms and the books of Ecclesiastes and Job as written in metre (see Bickell, Metricae biblicae regulae). The work of Junilius presents a great number of other points of interest (as for example his answer, ii. 29, to the question how we prove the books of Scripture to have been written by divine inspiration) on which we have not space to enlarge.

As the date of publication of the work of Junilius, Kihn assigns the year 551, in which year the chronicle of Victor Tununensis records the presence at Constantinople of the African bishops Reparatus, Firmus, Primasius, and Verecundus. He makes it probable that Junilius might have met Paul of Nisibis at Constantinople as early as 543. We do not venture to oppose the judgment of one entitled to speak with so high authority; but it would have seemed to us probable that the introduction into the West of this product of the Nestorian school of theology took place at an earlier period of the controversy about the Three Chapters than 551. It is of course by no means unlikely that Primasius paid earlier visits to Constantinople than that of which we have evidence on record. A commentary on the first chapter of Genesis had been ascribed to Junilius, but clearly wrongly. It is now generally attributed to Bede.

JUNILLA (JONILLA, JOVILLA), martyr at Langres, c. A.D. 189, commemorated Jan. 17. (Basil. Mémoires. ii. 115; Tillem. Mémoires. iii. 41, 608; Baron. A. E. ann. 179, xxxvii.) [C. H.]

JUNIOR (1), Donatist bishop of Rusicade. [FAUSTINIANUS (5).] [H. W. P.]

JUNIOR (2), bishop of Tigillaba, in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 56; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 322.)

[R. S. G.]

JUNIOR (3), bishop of Verona, at the end of the 6th century. (Mansi, x. 466; Hefele, § 281; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 589; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 749; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. 3; see also Paulus Diaconus, iii. 26.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUNIUS (1) (Cyp. Ep. 57), fifth bishop in title of Ep. Syn. Carth. 2, sub Cyp. de Pace, Ep. 70; third bishop in title of Ep. Syn. Carth. 5, sub Cyp. de Bap. i.

[E. W. B.]

JUNIUS (2) (Sent. Epp.), eighty-sixth suffrage in Syn. Carth. 7, sub Cyp. de Bap. 3, bishop of Neapolis (? Tripolis). His signature next to bishop of Oea seems to indicate that Neapolis was in prov. Trip. (Morcelli).

[E. W. B.]

JUNIUS (3), a short-hand writer (exceptor). [EDESIIUS (2).]

[H. W. P.]

JURANUS is the second in the list of seven hermits from an island in the Tiber, who accompanied St. Regulus into Scotland in the reign of King Hungus. (Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 187; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 360.)

[J. G.]

JURATA, Donatist bishop of Turretamalla, Turris Tamallensis, or Turris Tamalleni, a fortified town on the borders of Byzacene and Tripolis (Ant. Itin. 74, 3) (Telemin), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411, i. 126, 208. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 208, 458, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

JURWINUS (JURMANUS, JURMINUS), a son (according to the Historia Eliensis, ed. Stewart, p. 15) of Anna, king of the East Angles, by his wife Hereswitha, and brother of the king Aldulf, of Sexburga, Ethelberga of Brie, Etheldreda of Ely, and Wihlberga of Dereham. This account is, however, certainly erroneous; Hereswitha being the wife of Ethelhere and not of Anna. William of Malmesbury, who gives him the name of Germinus (G. P. lib. ii. § 74), mentions his tomb at Bury St. Edmunds, but adds that he had not been able to discover what his achievements were. The author of the Historia Eliensis, referring to the Gesta Pontificum Angliae, must have had the work of William of Malmesbury in view, although he could have found there no evidence of the sanctity of life and justice which he attributed to Germinus.

JUSTA (1), May 14, martyr with Justina and Heredina in Sardinia according to local tradition, which variously names the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and Diocletian as the period. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 271.)

[G. T. S.]

JUSTA (2), Aug. 1, virgin martyr at Aquila, a town of the Vestini near Amiternum in Italy, probably in the persecution of Diocletian. (Acta SS. Aug. i. 38.)

[G. T. S.]

JUSTA (3), and her sister Rufina, virgin martyrs in the 3rd century, were natives of Seville. They are said to have suffered in A.D. 287. They are commemorated July 19. (Esp. Sagr. ix. 276; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. iv. 163; Boll. *AA. [F. D.]

JUSTA (4), one of five martyrs at Carthage, buried in the basilica of Faustus, commemorated on July 15. (Usuard. Mart.) [CATULINUS.]

[C. H.]

JUSTA (5), daughter of the emperor Valentinian I. She was unmarried. (Socrates, H. E. iv. 31; Ducange, Fam. Aug. p. 59.)

[G. T. S.]

JUSTAN (JUSTIN, JUSTUS), surnamed Lene, is commemorated in Mart. Donej. and Mart. Tallaght, at July 29, and is supposed by Colgan to be the Justus whom St. Patrick left as a deacon at the church of Fidhart in Ui-Maine, and who is said in the same Life of St. Patrick to have lived to such an age as, when 140 years old, to have baptized St. Ciaran (Sept. 9) of Clonmacnoise from the service book given him by St. Patrick. Colgan also imagines that he may be the Justin whom St. Patrick left as a presbyter at the church of Ardbraccan with the Ui Tortain. If there be truth in this, he was Justus, son of Fergus, son of Eada Niadh, son of Breasal Brealach, who died A.D. 435 (Four Mast.); but the dates present the difficulty of a great-grandson of Breasal being a priest in the time of St. Patrick. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 136, c. 49, 151, c. 14, 177, n. <sup>95</sup>, 184, n. <sup>25</sup>, 267, col. 1, and Acta SS. 312, c. 5, 313, n. <sup>16</sup>; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 279.)

[J. G.]

JUSTIANUS (1) (JUSTINIANUS), bishop of Vercellae, present at the council held under Eusebius of Milan, A.D. 451. He subscribes the synodical letter of the council to Leo the Great (Leo Mag. Ep. 97, 1084; Italia Sacra, iv. 762). He is commemorated as a saint on March 21. (Bolland. AA. SS. March, vol. iii. 262; Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 366.)

[C. G.]

JUSTIANUS (2) (JUSTINIANUS), named by Tirechan among the disciples of St. Patrick (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 518), and called Mac Hy. He is probably Justus the deacon or Justus the priest. [JUSTAN.]

[J. G.]

JUSTINA (1), Oct. 7, virgin and supposed martyr under Nero or Maximian. (Boll. Acta SS. 7 Oct. iii. 790.)

[G. T. S.]

JUSTINA (2), martyr. [JUSTA (1).]

JUSTINA (3), July 13, reputed martyr at Tergestum (Trieste) in 289. Her legend is substantially the same as that of Dorothea, with an alteration of the names, Theophilus in the legend of Dorothea being Zeno in that of Justina. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iii. 483.)

JUSTINA (4), virgin martyr at Antioch, commemorated by the Greeks on Oct. 2 (Menaea; Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Gracc. Siret.), and by the Latins on Sept. 26 (Bede, Usuard, Vet. Rom. Mart., Ado). Her history is contained in that of St. Cyprian the martyr of Antioch [CYPRIANUS (2)]. Gregory Nazianzen, in his oration on the martyrdom of Cyprian (orat. 18 al. 24), refers to her much. Aldhelm dwells on her story in his metrical work, De Laudibus Virginum (p. 186, ed. Giles), and in his prose treatise De Laudibus Virginitatis (§ 43, Giles, p. 57). Cleus the Bollandist (Acta SS. Sept. vii. 195) elaborately examines all that has been written of the two martyrs.

JUSTINA (5), empress, second wife of Valentinian I., was a Sicilian by birth, and was, according to Zosimus (iv. 19 and 43), the widow of Magnentius, who had been killed in A.D. 353. Socrates (H. E. iv. 31) gives a romantic account, which Tillemont (Emp. v. 682) proves to be unfounded, of how the empress Severa by her praises of the beauty of her friend Justina so inflamed the passions of Valentinian, that he passed a law legalizing polygamy, and availed himself of it to marry Justina in the lifetime of Severa. In reality it is probable that Valentinian divorced his first wife for some reason or other (Chron. Pasch. 302), and then espoused Justina. The date of the marriage was probably A.D. 368.

Justina was an Arian, but during her husband's lifetime concealed her opinions (Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. ii. 15, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxi. 523). She, however, endeavoured to prevent him from allowing St. Martin of Tours to enter his presence (Sulp. Sev. Dial. ii. in Patr. Lat. xx. 205). In A.D. 375, with her infant son Valentinian, she accompanied her husband to Pannonia, and when he died at Bregetio, on Nov. 17, was at Murocincta or Acincta (Buda), a hundred miles away. The soldiers, six days after Valentinian's death, proclaimed her son Valentinian, then a boy about five years old, emperor, jointly with his brother Gratian and his uncle Valens; Italy, Illyricum and Africa being the portion of the empire allotted to him, an arrangement afterwards recognized by Gratian, who, however, apparently kept the government of the whole of the West in his own hands till his death in A.D. 383. (See Tillemont's arguments on the subject, Emp. v. 705-709.) Justina at once took advantage of the influence which her position as mother of the infant emperor gave her to advance the interests of her sect. In pursuing this object she soon came into collision with St. Ambrose. The first contest between them was probably about A.D. 380, when St. Ambrose was summoned to Sirmium to take part in the consecration of Anemius as bishop of that see; the empress, on the other hand, being desirous that the new bishop should be consecrated by the Arians. According to Paulinus (Vita S. Ambrosii, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xiv. 30), a miracle terrified the opponents of St. Ambrose, and the Catholics were allowed to consecrate their bishop in peace. The sequestration by Gratian of a basilica at Milan, which he afterwards restored, an event which happened about this time, is with considerable probability referred to Justina's influence (S. Ambrose, De Spiritu Sancto, i. l. 604, in Patr. Lat. xvi. 709).

After the murder of Gratian and the seizure by Maximus of Spain, Gaul, and Britain in A.D. 383, Justina, who, with her infant son, had taken up her residence in the Imperial Palace at Milan, had recourse to her former opponent St. Ambrose. She placed her son in his hands, and induced him to undertake the delicate task of going as ambassador to Maximus in order to persuade him to be contented with the provinces that had been Gratian's, and to leave Valentinian in undisturbed possession of Italy, Africa, and Western Illyricum (S. Ambrose, Epp. 20, 21, 24; Id. De Obitu Valentiniani, 1182 in Patr. Lat. xvi. 1001, 1007, 1035, 1368). His mission was successful, at any rate for a time, but the ungrateful Justina, when he had hardly returned a year, began to assail him at Easter, 385, with the object of obtaining one of the churches at Milan for the use of her fellow Arians. For an account of this memorable struggle see AMBROSICUS (Vol. I. 94, 95). It should be added that by a constitution (Codex Theod. xvi. 1, 4), dated January 21, A.D. 386, and drawn up by her direction (Soz. H. E. vii. 13), those who held the opinions sanctioned by the Council of Ariminum were granted the right of meeting for public worship, Catholics being forbidden under pain of death to offer any opposition or even to endeavour secretly to get the law repealed.

If Paulinus may be believed (Vita S. Ambrosii, 20), Justina, in addition to her open attacks on St. Ambrose, twice sent persons to assassinate him, but on each occasion he was miraculously preserved. Notwithstanding her ill-treatment of St. Ambrose, when danger again threatened, Justina once more had recourse to his services. After Easter, A.D. 387, he was sent to Trier to ask that the body of Gratian should be restored to his brother, and to avert Maximus's threatened invasion of Italy (Ep. 24). His mission was unsuccessful; Maximus crossed the Alps in the autumn, and made himself master of Italy without striking a blow. Valentinian and his mother and sisters fled by sea to Thessalonica, whence she sent to Theodosius imploring his help. Zosimus (iv. 44) narrates how she overcame his reluctance by the charms of her daughter, the beautiful Galla, whose hand was the reward of his assistance. Tillemont indeed (Emp. v. 740) doubts the story, as Marcellinus states that Galla went to Constantinople in A.D. 386, but he does not state that the marriage took place in that year, and the Duc de Broglie (L'Église et l'Empire, iii. 228), gives conclusive reasons for preferring the later date.

While Theodosius prepared to invade Italy by land a naval expedition was despatched against Rome. According to Zosimus (iv. 45, 46), Justina and her son accompanied the fleet, evaded the squadron under Andragathius, and reached Italy, but this statement is wrong as regards Valentinian, and probably is equally so as regards his mother. Some time in A.D. 388, the year of her son's restoration, Justina died (Soz. H. E. vii. 14; Rufinus, H. E. ii. 17). Besides Valentinian and Galla she had by Valentinian two daughters, Grata and Justa, who died unmarried (Socrates, H. E. iv. 31).

JUSTINIANUS (1), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia between Justinus and Antoninus, cir. 237. It seems an inadvertence in Gams (Ser. Episc. p. 419) to call him Justinianus II. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. i. 599.)

[J. de S.]

JUSTINIANUS (2), bishop of the Rauraci, recorded as attending the (apocryphal) council of Cologne, A.D. 346 (Mansi, ii. 1371). A Justinianus occurs among the bishops (under the head of Gallia) who accepted the Sardican decrees (A.D. 343), but are recorded without sees (Mansi, iii. 67), but there is no bishop of this name in the Ballerini list of those who attended the council (ib. iii. 43). The Sammarthani reckon him as the first known bishop of Basel, his successor being Pantalus (Gall. Christ. xv. 426). [R. T. S.]

JUSTINIANUS (3) (STINAN), Aug. 23, said to have come from Brittany to Wales in the time of St. David (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 238; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 160). The existence of a ruined chapel dedicated to St. Stinan, near St. David's in Pembrokeshire, seems to make his existence probable. There is a church of Llanstinan in the same county. [C. W. B.]

JUSTINIANUS (4), bishop of Valencia towards the middle of the 6th century. Isidore gives a short biography of him in his De Viris Ill. (cap. 33). According to Isidore Justinianus wrote a book of responsiones addressed to a certain Rusticus in confutation of various Arian and Donatist errors. It is the opinion of certain modern scholars that the work current under the name of Ildefonsus, Liber de Cognitione Baptismi, is only a working-up by him of the earlier work of Justinianus described by Isidore. (See art. ILDEFONSUS; Helfferich, Der Westgothische Arianismus, pp. 41-49; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 1, 455.) Justinianus flourished under Theudes (531-546), and subscribed the acts of the council of Valencia in the fifteenth year of that king (A.D. 546). (Esp. Sagr. viii. 158; Cave, i. 511; Ceillier, xi. 265.) [M. A. W.]

JUSTINIANUS (5), bishop of Abula (Avila) in 610 (?). His signature appears among those of the disputed Decretum Gundemari. [GUNTIMAR.] (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 21.) [PRISCILLIAN.] [M. A. W.]

JUSTINIANUS, bishop of Vercellae [JUSTINIANUS (1)]; of Tyana [JUSTINUS (20)].

JUSTINIANUS (6) I., Roman emperor (527-565). The account to be given here may be conveniently divided into five heads: (1) the life and personal character of Justinian; (2) his foreign policy and the leading political events of his reign; (3) his internal administration of the Roman empire; (4) his ecclesiastical policy and position; (5) his legislative work as a codifier and reformer of the law and a creator of new law.

I. Life and Character.—Justinian was born at Tauresium, a place on the borders of Illyricum and Macedonia, close to the fortress of Bederiana. It was in the district called Dardania, and has commonly been identified with the modern town of Giustendil; but it has lately been remarked that Giustendil is too far from the spot to which other evidence points, and Uskiub, the ancient Scupi, is suggested by an accomplished traveller as more probably the birthplace of the emperor (see Procop. Aedif. iv. 1, and Tozer, Highlands of European Turkey, ii. p. 370). After he came to the throne, he built at his birthplace a city which he named Justiniana Prima, and made the capital of the province and seat of an archbishop. His father's name was Istok, which is Latinized or Graecized as Sabatius; his mother's, Bigleniza, Latinized into Vigilantia. His own name is said to have been Uprauda, of which Justinianus, it has been suggested, was a translation, though as Justinianus seems a name drawn from that of his uncle Justinus, by whom he was adopted, it is more likely that if there be any relation (which after all is improbable) between the barbarian and the Roman names, it is with Justinus that Uprauda might rather be connected. The word Uprauda has been supposed to point to a Gothic origin; and we know that there were many Goths scattered over Illyricum. But Vpravda is an older form of the Slavonic word Pravda, meaning straight or right; so more probably the name is Slavonic, and Justinian himself the offspring of one of those Slavic families which had settled in Macedonia in the middle of the fifth century. Istok and Bigleniza have also a Slavonic sound (see Schafarik, Slavische Alterthümer, vol. ii. p. 160, of German translation, and Ujfalvy: Imperator Justinianus Genti Slavica vindicator). Anyhow, it is clear that he was a barbarian, who probably learnt Latin before he learnt Greek, and who always continued to speak Greek with a marked foreign accent (Proc. Anecd. 14). The year of his birth is not certain; A.D. 483 seems the most probable date. Early in life he came to Constantinople, and attached himself to the fortunes of his uncle Justin, a soldier from the same district, who, by service in the imperial guards under the emperors Zeno and Anastasius, had risen to high place. There is a story (see Alemanni, professing to quote Theophilus, in notes to c. 9 of Proc. Anecd.) that Justinian was at one time sent as a hostage to the court of Theodoric in Italy, as Theodoric himself had been in his youth a hostage at Constantinople. If it be true, this would have given him an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the condition of Italy under Ostrogothic rule, which might have contributed to the success of his subsequent enterprises there. There is nothing to shew how old Justinian was when he came to the Eastern capital; but we hear that he diligently prosecuted his education there in law and theology as well as in general literature, and the influence of his uncle would no doubt procure for him employment in the civil service of the state. When he was thirty-five years of age the emperor Anastasius died, and Justin stepped without opposition into the vacant throne. He was an illiterate soldier, and weakened by age, so that the help of his more active nephew was valuable, and, indeed, almost necessary to him. We gather from several authorities that while the conduct of legal and judicial business was left, at least at first, in the hands of the quaestor Proclus (Proc. Anecd. c. 6), the ecclesiastical affairs and the general administration of the state fell under the control of Justinian. He became consul in A.D. 521, entered the senate, and was ultimately appointed master-general of the army in the East (Proc. Pers. c. 12). Justinian became co-emperor with Justin in A.D. 527, having for some time previous been regarded as his uncle's probable successor (Proc. Pers. c. 11), since Justin had no children, and on Justin's death, a month later, he assumed without question the sole sovereignty of the Roman world, and retained it till his death in A.D. 565, at the age of 82, when he was peacefully succeeded by his nephew Justin II.

In A.D. 526 he married Theodora, a woman of singular beauty, and still more remarkable charms of manner and intellect. According to Procopius the empress Euphemia (originally called Lupicina), wife of Justin, was vehemently opposed to the marriage, and Justinian had to wait till after her death (Anecd. cap. 9). Theodora is said to have been a native of Cyprus, and had been a comedian, so that her lover was forced before the wedding could take place to obtain from the emperor Justin the repeal of a law which forbade the marriage of actresses with persons of the highest rank (see Cod. v. 5, 23). The gossip of the time, starting from this undoubted fact, made very free with her life, adventures, and character. It has accumulated in the Anecdota, or unpublished memoirs, ascribed to, and no doubt written by (although there has been a controversy on the point), Procopius, a variety of scandalous tales regarding her earlier career, the truth of which it is unnecessary to discuss here [see THEODORA]. She soon acquired an almost unbounded dominion over Justinian's mind, and was commonly regarded as the source of many of his schemes and enterprises. She died in A.D. 548, and the emperor did not marry again.

Although most of what we know directly about Justinian comes from Procopius (q. v.), this does not diminish the difficulty of forming a comprehensive and consistent view of his abilities and character. For while Procopius, in the works which were written for publication, and published during his own and Justinian's lifetime, the histories of the African, Gothic, and Persian wars, has spoken, not indeed with servility, but with that guarded respect which a despotic sovereign may expect, and in the De Aedificiis, which looks as if it was written at the express direction of Justinian in a kind of official way, has loaded the emperor with fulsome praise—he turns round and reviles him in the Anecdota (which did not appear till after—probably long after—the author's death) with a bitterness which to some extent defeats his purpose. [See PROCOPIUS.] Setting aside exaggerations in both directions, it may be concluded that Justinian was a man of considerable, if not first-rate abilities. He was well-educated, according to the ideas and customs of the time, and more or less conversant with many branches of knowledge. Procopius accuses him of being a barbarian both in mind and speech, which probably means only that he spoke Greek like an Illyrian provincial (Anecd. c. 14). Of his action in legal and theological matters it will be necessary to speak at length in a later part of this article. His artistic taste is evidenced by the many beautiful buildings which he erected in different parts of the empire, two among which—those of St. Sophia at Constantinople and St. Vitalis at Ravenna (though it does not appear that he had any share in designing this latter)—have had the unique distinction of becoming architectural models for subsequent ages, the one for the East and the other for the West. Several hymns still used in the orthodox Eastern church are ascribed to his pen, and he is the author of a treatise against the Monophysites, which Cardinal Mai has published. The records of his government and administration shew him to have been possessed of great ingenuity and enterprise, but the enterprise was often prompted more by vanity and the lust of power than by a regard to the welfare of his people, and his ingenuity was not guided or controlled by prudence, or by a solid knowledge of the economical conditions of prosperity. There was much more cleverness than wisdom about him; we see in his policy few indications of deep and statesmanlike foresight. The chief feature of his character, however, and that to which his fame and greatness are chiefly due, is his extraordinary industry and assiduity. He seemed to live for work, and toiled upon the throne harder than any clerk in his own service. Activity—restless and unwearied activity—which insisted on dealing with every subject, and very often on making changes for the mere sake of change, is the quality in him of which we derive the most distinct impression, both from the open praise and the secret censure of Procopius, as well as from the official records of his work. With this industry, he was naturally also abstemious and regular in his life and habits, observing the fasts of the church very strictly, able to go without food for a long period, taking little sleep, and spending most of his time, when not actually giving audiences, in pacing up and down the rooms of the palace listening to readers or dictating to an amanuensis. In fact, he cared little for any of the more vulgar pleasures (though he shewed an excessive partiality for the blue faction, he does not appear to have been personally addicted to the games of the circus); and he yielded to no influences except those of his wife Theodora. We are told that he was easy of access—a rare merit in the despotic centre of a highly formal court—pleasant and reassuring in his manners, but also deceitful, and capable both of treachery and of ingratitude, the proverbial vice of princes. How far this ingratitude was in the most notable case, that of Belisarius, excused by apprehensions of danger, is a problem not wholly solved or soluble. Wantonly cruel he does not seem to have been, and on several occasions he shewed an unexpected clemency, but his heart was a cold one, which shrank from no severities that his intellect judged useful.

In person he was well formed, rather above the middle height, with a ruddy and smiling countenance. Besides his effigy on coins, we have two probably contemporary portraits among the mosaics of Ravenna, one in the apse of the church of San Vitale, built in his reign, in which he appears among a number of other figures, the other now detached from its place, wherever that was, and preserved in the noble church of Sant' Apollinare in Urbe. They shew the same face, but the stiffness of the material makes it doubtful how far the portrait can be considered faithful. There is a certain air of gravity and thoughtfulness about the countenance and of dignity in the figure in the San Vitale mosaic. It bears a pretty close resemblance to his effigy on his coins.

II. The political events of Justinian's reign belong rather to the general history of the time than to an account of his own life. They may be read in the treatises of Procopius on the Vandalic war, the Gothic war, and the Persian war [see PROCOPIUS], in the narrative of Agathias, who continues Procopius from A.D. 552 to 558, in Theophanes's Chronographia (all three in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians), in the ecclesiastical history of Evagrius, and in several other authorities of less importance, who may be found referred to in Gibbon (who has given in his fortieth and three following chapters a full and brilliant picture of Justinian's times), and in Le Beau (Histoire du Bas Empire, vols. viii. and ix., with St. Martin's notes). Finlay (Greece under the Romans, vol. i. of new edition) has some valuable remarks, as also Hertzberg, Griechenland unter der Römer, vol. iii.; see also Dahn, Prokopios von Caesarea. At Justinian's accession the empire was generally at peace; though the Danubian frontier was disturbed by the inroads of the barbarian tribes; and hostilities lingered on with the Persians, then ruled by Kobad (Cabades), in Mesopotamia and Armenia. In Italy the great Theodoric had just died, and the East Gothic sceptre had descended to his grandson Athalaric, whose mother, Amalasantha, was acting as regent. The Vandal Hilderic was reigning in Africa; in Gaul Clovis had founded a great dominion, and reduced to a more or less dependent position the Visigoths and Burgundians. There is nothing to shew that Justinian had before his accession meditated any large schemes of conquest; but when the opportunity offered he embraced it eagerly. A revolt had taken place among the Vandals against Hilderic; and the Roman population of the province of Tripoli, refusing to acknowledge Gelimer, who had seized the crown, applied for aid to Justinian. An expedition was despatched in A.D. 533, under Belisarius, which landed without opposition, defeated Gelimer in two comparatively slight engagements, and reduced the whole Vandal kingdom to submission in the space of little more than three months. That the conquest was accomplished with so much ease is probably to be ascribed to the sympathy which the Roman population shewed to invaders of their own faith, the Vandals being not only Arians, but bigoted and persecuting Arians, and to the sluggishness of the Vandals themselves, who, never numerous, were scattered through their wide dominions, and had been effeminated by luxury and security. Not long after Gelimer was himself taken prisoner and sent to Constantinople. The Vandals who survived the war seem to have been rapidly absorbed into the African population; anyhow, we hear no more of them. The fleet of Belisarius received in rapid succession the submission of Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic Isles, all of which had obeyed the naval power of the Vandals. Orthodoxy was re-established there and in Africa. By a Constitution addressed to Solomon, the praetorian prefect in Africa, Justinian directed the laws against heretics to be put in force against the Arians and Donatists in Africa, and their meetings to be altogether forbidden (see the Constitution in Baronius ad ann. 535). The orthodox bishops met in a council, in which 207 prelates were present, and addressed a letter to pope John I. (Baron. ad ann. 535). This letter was answered by Agapetus, who had in the meantime succeeded on John's death. The orthodox churches of Africa were restored to the full enjoyment of their rights, property, and privileges. But the African church and province never regained its former prosperity. The misgovernment of the imperial lieutenants completed the ruin which the Vandals had begun, and the wild Moorish tribes encroached in all directions on the Roman population. A serious insurrection broke out in A.D. 543, and was suppressed with difficulty by the energy of Solomon, the governor of Africa. Another even more furious arose among the heathen Moors in A.D. 543. Solomon was killed and defeated by them. They maintained themselves in arms with more or less success for fifteen years. Great part of the country, one of the most productive parts of the Roman dominions, relapsed into solitude and neglect; the Christian part of the population was still divided by the mutual jealousies of Donatists, Arians, and orthodox. The ruin of these superb territories was completed by the Mohammedan conquerors of the succeeding century.

The success of his enterprise against the Vandals, which had appeared very hazardous to some of Justinian's wisest counsellors, encouraged him to attempt the recovery of Italy from the Ostrogoths, who had held it and Sicily since the invasion under Theodoric in A.D. 493-4. The circumstances were favourable to his designs of conquest, and if they did not suggest the latter, certainly quickened him in carrying them out.

Even in Theodoric's time the position of the East Gothic monarchy, though it included not only Italy but also Dalmatia, Illyricum, part of Pannonia, Rhoetia and Noricum, and the south-east corner of Gaul, though it exerted a kind of hegemony over Spain and the Germanic peoples to the north and north-east of Italy, was by no means secure. The Goths were a comparatively small Teutonic colony, almost isolated in this southern land. They were scattered in detached groups over it, numbering probably only some 700,000 in all, and they were more or less affected and weakened by a tendency to adopt the habits and ideas of the Italian population. Moreover, this very population regarded them with suspicion and dislike, not only as barbarian invaders, but also as Arian heretics. Theodoric had done his utmost to conciliate the pope and the orthodox clergy by confirming them in all their rights and giving no preference to ecclesiastics of his own sect. While the emperors were suspected of Monophysitism, these efforts of the Gothic king were fairly successful, since the schism between Rome and Constantinople prevented the orthodox Westerns from recognizing the Eastern monarch as the legitimate secular head of the Christian world. But when the orthodox Justin and Justinian had restored peace and cordiality between the Eastern and Western churches (infra p. 545), the natural inclinations of the Italians towards a Roman emperor and an orthodox sovereign revived with full force, and became a source of serious danger to the Gothic power. It was probably his alarm at signs of this disaffection that impelled Theodoric to his severe treatment of Boethius and Symmachus. [See THEODORIC.] The perils, which were considerable even under his strong government, became far graver under his weak and distracted successors. Upon his death in A.D. 526, the crown passed to his grandson Athalaric, then a child, who nominally assumed the government after a few years, but being still a youth, and falling into a consumption, left the management of affairs to his mother Amalasantha. She perceiving his approaching end, knowing that the Goths would not brook the rule of a woman, and fearing the vengeance of the relatives of three Gothic nobles whom she had put to death, opened negotiations with Justinian, and even promised to surrender Italy to him on having her own safety ensured and being received at Constantinople. Meanwhile Athalaric died, and Amalasantha, who could not bear to part with the power she had now so long wielded, placed on the throne beside herself her cousin Theodahad, the last male offspring of the Amal race, which was the first among the Goths, and usually gave kings to the nation. Theodahad was, however, equally cruel, cowardly, and incapable. He seized Amalasantha, confined her in an island of the lake of Bolsena, and before long allowed her to be put to death there by the kinsfolk of the slain nobles. The empress Theodora has been accused of having caused this murder by private instructions given to Peter, Justinian's envoy in Italy; and the motive alleged is her fear that a woman of such high birth, finished education, and commanding gifts of character might, if permitted to come to Constantinople, shake Justinian's fidelity to herself (see Procop. Anecdota, c. 16). The story may be true; Theodora's character is not such as to make it improbable, but there is nothing either in the circumstances or in the authority of the person who relates it to require us to accept it. When Justinian heard of the queen's death, he declared war, and professed himself her avenger. An army was moved upon Dalmatia, which, in a few combats, drove the Goths from their posts there; and at the same time negotiations were opened with the Franks, whom the emperor invited to co-operate with him, as good Catholics, against the Arian Goths.

The emperors at Constantinople conceived themselves to have been ever since the extinction of the western branch of the empire in A.D. 476, de jure sovereigns of Italy and the whole West, regarding the Gothic kings partly as their lieutenants, partly as mere usurpers. Justinian therefore scarcely thought any pretext needed; so far as one was wanted, he found it in the death of Amalasantha, who had placed herself under his protection, and in some petty grounds of complaint which he had against the Goths respecting Lilybaeum, the reception in Italy of deserters from his African army, and the treatment by the Goths of the Gepidae in Pannonia. Besides the Dalmatian force, he despatched Belisarius from Constantinople with a fleet, and over 7000 men, of whom 3000 were Isaurian infantry, in the autumn of 535. He first landed in Sicily, where there were but few Ostrogothic troops, and reduced it easily in a few weeks, meeting with no resistance except at Palermo. Then he attacked Italy, landing at Rhegium, and moving northwards with little opposition from the Goths and a more or less active welcome from the Roman population. The first serious resistance was made by Naples, where a small garrison, with a Gothic faction, consisting partly of Jews, among the townspeople held out with great courage twenty-one days. From Naples he advanced to Rome, and occupied it in December 536. The Ostrogoths had shortly before risen against the cowardly and worthless Theodahad, suspecting him of meaning to betray them to the emperor and thereby win his favour. In his place the army near Rome chose for king Witigis, a warrior whose mature age and experience atoned for the comparative humbleness of his origin. He seized and put to death Theodahad, and in order to strengthen his position divorced his own wife and married Matasantha, a daughter of Amalasantha, and thus a member of the Amal family. Witigis repaired to Ravenna to concentrate his scattered forces there and prepare for the campaign. He purchased peace and the promise of help from the Franks by ceding to them Theodoric's conquests in south-eastern Gaul, obtaining from a general assembly of the Gothic nation a ratification of his choice as king. Meanwhile not only had Belisarius begun to strengthen himself in Rome, but the whole south, east, and centre of Italy, including Tuscany, had come over to the emperor, the Gothic detachments either retiring northwards or themselves deserting. The Italian clergy seem to have been eager in welcoming the Eastern armies. Pope Silverius was foremost in urging the Romans to break the oath of fidelity they had just taken to Witigis, and the great senatorial families all obeyed the same impulse, partly perhaps from religious hostility to the Arians, partly from a natural pride which disliked Gothic rule, and which may have been strengthened by resentment from the executions of Boethius and Symmachus. When Witigis had gathered an army estimated at 150,000 Goths, he advanced against Rome, whose fortifications Belisarius had by this time repaired, and which he had provisioned from Sicily. His own force was small, nor were the inhabitants of Rome of much use for war; but his personal bravery, as well as his military skill, enabled him to resist successfully all the attacks which the Goths made from the seven camps they had formed round the city. The walls of Rome were strong, the Goths were unpractised in siege operations, and seem to have had little artillery; the imperial army, although small, was expert, and contained one arm, the mounted bowmen, to which Witigis had nothing similar to oppose. After he had lost many men from disease and hunger, as well as in fighting, he sent envoys to Constantinople to ask for peace, urging that Theodoric had occupied Italy at the request of the emperor Zeno, so that the legal title of the Goths was good, and even offering to cede Sicily, Naples, and Campania, and to pay an annual tribute. Justinian however refused all overtures. The siege, which had been suspended by an armistice, was resumed, but with no better success. Meanwhile an imperial general, John the Sanguinary, obtained important advantages in eastern Italy, took Ariminum, threatened Ravenna. To save his capital, Witigis broke up his camp before Rome a year and nine days from the time he formed it, and retired with a greatly reduced army. Belisarius followed him, and invested Ravenna, which was soon reduced to straits by want of food. Witigis, besides sending envoys to stir up Chosroes of Persia to attack Justinian, had been begging help from the Franks, and their king Theodebert had at last agreed to send him a contingent of 10,000 troops, Burgundians, not Franks, that the existing treaty between Justinian and the Frankish power might not appear to be violated. Ultimately Theodebert did himself appear at the head of an army, but, instead of relieving Witigis, he attacked and defeated first a Gothic and then an imperial detachment, ravaged the country along the Po, then shamelessly proposed to the Goths to aid them to drive out the Romans if they would yield half Italy to him for his pains. Belisarius, scarcely less active in diplomacy than in war, induced the Goths to reject this offer; they indeed felt that the hardness of Justinian was better than the utter faithlessness of the Franks. At last the Gothic chieftains in Ravenna, disgusted by the ill-fortune which attended Witigis, opened communication with Belisarius, whose genius had won their admiration, proposing to make him emperor of the West, sovereign both of Goths and Italians, independent of Constantinople. His fidelity was proof against this temptation, but he used it to prevent their acceptance of terms of peace which Justinian, foreseeing the outbreak of another Persian war, had at last offered, and to obtain an entrance for himself and his troops into the impregnable Ravenna. Then he seized Witigis and his treasures, and sailed with him and them for Constantinople, leaving the imperial power supreme in Italy. Justinian treated the captive king with indulgence, assigning him a residence in Asia Minor with a competent livelihood. The Goths, or such of them as had survived the two terrible sieges, gathered at Pavia, and were for making Uraias, nephew of Witigis, their king. When he refused, alleging the ill-luck which had attended his uncle, they chose Hildibad, an able warrior, but of no specially exalted rank. He gathered troops round him in North Italy, and had begun to make head against the Romans, when he was murdered by a private enemy. Then Erarich, a Rugian warrior, was chosen king by his own people, who had accompanied the Goths into Italy and shared their subsequent fortunes, and accepted by most of the Goths. When he, too, had perished after a few months, though not before he had disgraced himself by proposing to surrender Italy to Justinian on condition of receiving a great treasure for himself, the choice of the nation fell upon Totila, otherwise called Baduila, a nephew of Hildibad, and a man not more remarkable for his military energy and personal courage than for the gentleness and nobility of his character. Justinian's revenue commissioners, among whom a certain Alexander was conspicuous for his skill and harshness in extortion, had introduced into reconquered Italy the whole oppressive system of taxation which prevailed in the Eastern empire. The people, already reduced to beggary by the long wars which had desolated their country since the fall of the Western throne, evils and losses which the breathing-space under Theodoric had not been sufficient to repair, found themselves called on to pay taxes apparently as heavy as those which were levied on the flourishing regions of Asia Minor. They were even required to make up arrears that had not been demanded by the Goths; in fact, they found themselves in all respects far worse off than they had been under Gothic rule. Hence a spirit of disaffection spread apace among them. Totila recovered fortress after fortress from the incompetent generals who had succeeded Belisarius, till he was master of most part of Italy. At last Justinian in alarm sent Belisarius back, but this time without a sufficient force and with still more insufficient supplies of money. He was thus unable to effect much against the Goths, but kept moving by sea from place to place, till at last he succeeded in recovering Rome, which Totila had some time before entered, and had been on the point of levelling with the ground that it might not serve as a stronghold for the imperialists. After this Belisarius obtained from Justinian the permission to return which he had been (in despair of success) for some time seeking. Totila then recovered not only all Italy, except the three strongholds of Ravenna, Ancona, and Otranto, but also Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. He had restored the Gothic kingdom to a better position than it had held since the death of Theodoric. Knowing, however, its real weakness, the number of Gothic fighting men having been reduced from some 150,000 to not a third of that number in the war under Witigis, Totila repeatedly sought peace for Justinian. The emperor, although personally embittered against the Goths, and very anxious to have Italy, and especially Rome, again under his direct government, might possibly have consented but for the presence at Constantinople of a number of Romans of high rank, members of senatorial families. This band of émigrés, as one may call them, powerfully seconded by the Italian ecclesiastics, urged Justinian to send another expedition, dwelling not only on the sufferings of the country and their own, but doubtless even more on the hollowness of the Gothic power. At first an army was despatched under the command of Germanus, a nephew of Justinian, who was accompanied by Matasuntha, whom he had married after her divorce from Witigis. This was done in the not unfounded belief that many of the Goths would refuse to fight against the last daughter of the Amal house. But the plan was frustrated by the sudden death of Germanus. Then a strong force was fitted out and sent against Italy under the command of the eunuch Narses, an Armenian, who had already distinguished himself as the most accomplished general of the empire. Totila, with an army, which seems to have been inferior both in number and in appointments, gave battle near Taginae, a small town between Urbino and Fossombrone.

Probably he may have found it necessary to prevent defections by making a stand, instead of protracting the war, as prudence would rather have suggested. The issue was fatal to the Gothic name. Totila's army was defeated, and the hero himself slain. With him died the last hopes of the kingdom. The Goths however, who were now desperate, raised Teia, one of their most famous warriors, to the throne, and put to death all or most of their Roman senatorial hostages, together with some illustrious Roman youths whom Totila had kept around his person in court employments. To save a large part of the Gothic treasure which was defended against the imperialists in a fortress near Cumae, Teia marched south, and perished, sustaining a single combat against tremendous odds at the Lactarian mount, E. of Naples, in Campania. The remainder of his following, including his brother Aliger, capitulated on terms of safe departure; while some of the Goths in northern Italy offered the crown to Butelin, an Alemannic chieftain, who with his brother Leutharis had dashed across the Alps at the head of a host of Alemanni and Burgundians, with the connivance of the Frankish king Theodebald. Narses, however, destroyed Butelin and his host in a great battle near Casilinum in Campania A.D. 544. The small remains of the Gothic nation either passed into Spain and Gaul to mingle with other barbarians, or were lost among the Roman population of Italy, which now relapsed altogether and finally into Justinian's hands. It was however a desolated and depopulated Italy that he received. Nor was it long left to his successors. In A.D. 568, three years after his death, Alboin led the Lombard nation across the Istrian and Venetian Alps, occupied the whole north, together with the districts, dukedoms as they afterwards became, round Benevento and Spoleto. The Eastern emperors continued sovereignties of the rest and of Sicily; but their power was uncertain, and it ceased over the whole north and middle of Italy, including Rome, in the eighth century, when the contest regarding images led to the hostility of the popes and the revolt of the Italians, followed soon after by the establishment of the Frankish power in Italy. All this was the consequence of Justinian's invasion: for if he had left the Ostrogoths unmolested, they would probably have established a national monarchy in Italy, which might have checked the growth of papal power and have repelled transalpine enemies.

The third great struggle of Justinian's reign was that which he maintained against the Persians. Their empire was then under Kobad and Chosroes Anushirvan in the zenith of its power. Kobad had carried on with so much success the strife of the two powers, almost unbroken since the rise of the Sassanid dynasty in the third century, that the Roman armies were decidedly inferior in the field, and thought they did well when by careful strategy they held their positions against the more valiant and numerous Persian troops. In fact, they depended chiefly on the strength of their frontier fortresses, particularly the city of Dara. At the end of Justin's reign, Justinian had despatched Belisarius to the Euphrates, where his skill restored courage to the Roman army and turned the balance against Kobad. After several campaigns, Chosroes, who succeeded Kobad in A.D. 531, concluded in 533, on obtaining from the emperor eleven thousand pounds of gold, a peace which gave rest to the eastern provinces. In 539 war broke out again, partly owing to Justinian's intrigues, partly to the jealousy and alarm with which Chosroes saw the Roman victories in Africa and Italy. These feelings had been further stimulated by envoys sent by the Gothic king Witigis, though they did not reach Chosroes till Witigis had himself fallen. And at the same time a revolt against Justinian broke out in Armenia, a part of whose people appealed to the Persians for help. Chosroes took the command of a vast force, which the Roman generals were quite unable to resist in the open field. In 540 he reduced several cities, and was bought off by others, and after a short siege captured by assault Antioch, by far the greatest town of the eastern part of the empire, sacked it, and carried off many thousands of the inhabitants to a new city which he built for them near Ctesiphon, his own capital. These calamities, which reflect gravely on the prudence of Justinian, who ought never to have allowed the war to break out if his resources did not enable him to put a force in the field, and who certainly had not properly bestirred himself to send sufficient troops to the frontier, produced a profound impression throughout the world. Next year Belisarius was sent to Syria; but still with too small a force to enable him to take the offensive vigorously. Chosroes had gone off towards Colchis, so the moment was favourable for an advance. Belisarius however could only succeed in ravaging Mesopotamia, and taking the town of Saisarana. Next year he had to confront Chosroes himself, and by his skilful conduct not only stopped the Persian invasion, but even forced the king to recross the Euphrates with some loss of credit. Then he was again recalled, owing, it would seem, to the suspicions of Theodora, and for two or three years the war languished. In 544 Chosroes laid siege to Edessa, and when he found himself unable to take it agreed to a peace, which gave some rest to the Syrian provinces. The war had now however blazed out in a fresh place, at the south-east corner of the Black Sea, where the Lazæ, a wild race who have remained there ever since to attract the notice of diplomatists in our own day, had in 539 revolted from Justinian and invited the entrance of a Persian force led by Chosroes himself in 540. A fierce struggle followed during twenty-two years, interrupted once by a four years' truce. The most striking incidents in it were the repeated captures and recaptures of the strong fortress of Petra which the Romans had erected on the coast, apparently not very far from the modern town of Batoum. The truce for five years, which was concluded in A.D. 557 between Persia and the empire, did not interrupt this Lazic war; but Chosroes ultimately came to see that this region was not really a vulnerable part of the Roman dominions, nor one in itself worth conquering. Towards the end of Justinian's reign the fighting slackened; a peace for fifty years was concluded in A.D. 562. The terms of the treaty were humiliating to Justinian, for by it he undertook to pay thirty thousand gold pieces in every year; but the Persians abandoned Lazica, and it was agreed that neither party should erect any fortress on the frontier, that trade should go on freely, and that there should be reciprocal extradition of those who escaped from either empire to the other. (See the interesting provisions of the treaty in Menander Protector. Exc. Legat.) This peace lasted only ten years; but the war which began in A.D. 572 lies outside the reign of Justinian.

Less famous, but perhaps even more ruinous than these three great wars were the contests which Justinian had to maintain against the barbarians of Scythia and the Danube. From the Alps to the Black Sea, the northern border of the empire was the scene of a seldom intermitted warfare. The various tribes whom the Roman historian calls Huns, and who included the race subsequently distinguished as Bulgarians, poured from the south of what is now Russia down upon Thrace, ravaged it as well as Macedonia, penetrated on one occasion to the isthmus of Corinth, and six years before Justinian's death, in 559, appeared in great force under the walls of Constantinople, from which they were repulsed by the skill and vigour of Belisarius. The Slavonians, among whom we find the tribe called Antes sometimes particularly mentioned, were established in what is now Wallachia; their incursions were more frequent and as destructive as those of the Huns. Further to the west, the rival powers of the Gepidae and the Lombards, while maintaining war with one another, ravaged Illyricum and the north-west of Macedonia. It surprises us to find how little regular resistance seems to have been made to all these attacks. Although Justinian had built or repaired an immense number of fortresses (specified in Procopius, Aedif. bk. iv.), along the Danube and through his north-western provinces generally, the garrisons were too small or too timid to stop the invasions of these swiftly-moving and ferocious barbarians: nor do we ever hear of any regular army being kept in the field to watch and check them. Not only were villages destroyed and cultivated land laid waste, but immense numbers of the inhabitants were carried off into slavery, comparatively few of whom can have been ransomed. The only serious efforts which the emperor made against these enemies (besides the building of fortresses) were made by diplomacy. His policy was to foment hostilities between neighbouring tribes, taking sometimes one, sometimes another, into alliance with the empire, and offering large presents which were often so regular as to amount to a kind of black mail, by which to buy them off for the moment, or induce them to turn their arms against some other barbarian power. His activity as a negotiator was unwearied. Embassies from all parts of the barbarian world were from time to time arriving at Constantinople, exciting the wonder of the people by their strange garb and manners, and returning home laden with gifts and promises. Even the tribes of the Baltic and the Turks of Central Asia seem to have thus come into relations with him. His policy was much blamed in his own time (see especially Procop. Anc.), and may appear to have been shortsighted by supplying fresh inducements to the barbarians to renew their attacks, and letting them know the wealth of the capital; but before we condemn it we ought to consider whether any other policy was possible, and whether the incidental advantages of a diffusion of Roman influence and culture among the border tribes may not have been considerable.

III. We possess no systematic account of the internal state of the empire in Justinian's time, and can only gather what it must have been from occasional notices by historians like Procopius and Agathias, and from a study of Justinian's legislative measures. The civil service was, and had long been, in a high state of efficiency, as it consisted of trained officials, carefully distributed into departments, and subordinated to one another. Such alterations as Justinian made tended to perfect this organization, and to render all its members more completely the engines and slaves of the crown. He rearranged some of the provinces by edicts which convey an idea of the staff which each governor commanded (see e.g. Nov. xxiv.—xxx.). He appears to have in several instances weakened the local municipal institutions which still existed, particularly in the cities of Greece, by withdrawing their local revenues: and such authority as they thus lost would no doubt fall to imperial officials. The most important function of the administration was the collection of taxes. Justinian spent enormous sums not only on his wars but in the erection of churches, fortresses, and public buildings of every kind (a list will be found in the De Aedificiis of Procopius), and he was therefore always in want of money. Oppressive as the taxation had been before his time, he seems to have made it even more stringent; and when the land-tax and other ordinary sources of revenue failed, he was driven to such discreditable expedients as the sale of public offices, and even, we are told, to the prostitution of justice and the unjust confiscation of the property of private persons who had incurred his displeasure or were suspected of disloyalty. Though the instances of such wickedness rest chiefly on the prejudiced and untrustworthy authority of the Anecdota of Procopius (who ascribes the worst to the immediate action of the empress), stories which may be found in other historians give some support to the accusation. On one occasion he attempted to debase the coin, but was checked by a threatened insurrection in the capital. The same charges of venality and extortion are brought against Tribonian, John of Cappadocia, and others of Justinian's ministers. The administration of justice must have been greatly improved by the promulgation of the whole binding law in the Codex, Pandects, and Institutes: and great importance was evidently attached to the maintenance of the law-schools of Berytus and Constantinople; it is however probable enough that corruption may have largely prevailed among the judges. Brilliant as Justinian's reign may appear to us, the sufferings endured by the people from war, taxation, the persecution of heretics, the blows struck at the privileges of various classes and professions, as well as from the great plague and from destructive earthquakes, made his rule unpopular. The rebellions in Africa, and the disaffection of the reconquered Italians have been already mentioned. In Constantinople, not to speak of minor seditions, there occurred a tremendous insurrection in January A.D. 532, arising out of a tumult in the hippodrome, and apparently due, partly to resentment at the maladministration of John of Cappadocia, partly to the presence in the city of a large number of starving immigrants. The revolted held the city for some days, set fire to some of the finest buildings, drove Justinian into his palace fortress, and proclaimed Hypatius, nephew of the deceased emperor Anastasius, as emperor. Having no concerted plan of action, part of them, belonging to the blue faction of the chariot races, were induced to abandon the rest, who were then surprised and slaughtered by the imperial guards under the command of Belisarius. Thirty thousand people are said to have perished in this rising, which goes by the name of the Nika sedition, from the watchword used by the rebels. (See an interesting account of it by W. A. Schmidt, Der Aufstand in Constantinopel unter Kaiser Justinian.)

Justinian's commercial legislation was marked by the usual shortsightedness and ignorance of economic principles which we observe among the statesmen of the Roman empire. His monopolies and the other restrictions imposed upon trade must have done much to injure the still active commerce of the eastern Mediterranean. He does however deserve some credit for the efforts which he made to open up new channels for the traffic in silk, efforts which ultimately succeeded through the boldness of two Persian monks, who conveyed the eggs of the worm in a hollow cane from China to the empire. Thus the manufacture of this article was no longer at the mercy of the Persians, who had stopped the supply in time of war, and the culture of the silk-worm became thenceforward an important branch of industry in the Roman East.

Upon a review of Justinian's domestic government as a whole, with its mingled extravagance and rapacity, its restless activity, producing (except as regards the law, to be considered hereafter) few permanently beneficial results, its faults appear greatly to outweigh its merits. Even his great buildings, the most enduring monuments of his taste and zeal, were dearly purchased by the fiscal oppression which enabled him to raise them. His subjects had grown tired of him long before his death; but later ages looked back to his reign as a period of conquest abroad and magnificence at home, and accepted the surname of the Great.

IV. Ecclesiastical policy occupied no small share of Justinian's thoughts and care. As conducted by him, it may be considered under several separate heads, as it referred to theological doctrine, to the constitution of the church and hierarchy, to his dealings with the heretics and schismatics who abounded in the empire, and finally to the heathen, who had not yet ceased to exist, though rapidly diminishing in number.

Justinian's first object when he had been influencing or administering the government in the lifetime of his uncle the emperor Justin I. was to re-establish the communion of the church of Constantinople with that of Rome, which had been interrupted owing to the controversies arising out of the Monophysite heresy. The two emperors who preceded Justin, viz. Zeno the author, and Anastasius the maintainer of the Henoticon, had been more than suspect of Monophysitism and were detested by the more earnest adherents of the council of Chalcedon. Justinian wrote to Hormisdas, who was then pope, a letter (printed in Baronius, Ann. Eccl. ad ann. 518, 520), desiring to put an end to the schism, and it was accordingly, after long negotiations (for which see article HORMISDAS), closed in A.D. 519 after having lasted from A.D. 484, when the patriarch Acacius of Constantinople had been condemned by pope Felix II. On his accession in A.D. 527, Justinian professed himself a zealous supporter of the Two Natures and the decrees of Chalcedon, and the firmness of his throne is no doubt partly to be attributed to this coincidence of his own theological views with those of the bulk of his subjects in Constantinople, Thrace, and Asia Minor. Not only did he, as several previous sovereigns had done, pride himself upon his orthodoxy; he had great confidence in his own powers as a theologian, and took an active part in all the controversies of the time. Being a diligent student and a person of some literary preten-sions, he both read and wrote a good deal on theological topics. One book, in Greek, against the Monophysites, has been preserved; and was published by cardinal Angelo Mai from a Vatican MS. (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vii. 292). Others, letters which rise to the dimensions of regular treatises or edicts, may be found in Mansi, vol. ix., among the Acta of the Fifth General Council. Justinian's ecclesiastical policy, so far as it can be made out from the frequently prejudiced accounts of our informants, had two main objects, which were not, however, by any means consistently or undeviatingly pursued. The first of these was the maintenance of the orthodox doctrine of the Four Councils, and especially of Chalcedon. The second was the reconciliation of the Monophysites, or at least the inducing by apparent concessions the more moderate members of that party to accept the decrees of Chalcedon. He was generally so thorough-going, so self-satisfied, and so willing to attain his ends by persecuting, that one is a little surprised to see him occasionally shew tenderness to those whom at other times he condemns as heretics. The explanation probably is that, having been at one time under Monophysite influences, there were tendencies towards that view left in him, which occasionally, and most notably at the very end of his life, asserted themselves. And there was in his court an active, though probably concealed Monophysite party, which was headed by, and sheltered itself under, the empress Theodora. The known difference of opinion between the two royal consorts caused much surprise among their subjects, and was by some attributed to design (κατ' οἰκονομίαν says Evagrius) in order that he might know all the secrets of one party, and have its support, she those of the other. One of the emperor's first acts was to summon a conference of leading theologians on both sides so as to bring about a reconciliation, and induce the Monophysites to accept the Chalcedonian formulae. After several sittings, however, in one of which Justinian delivered a long allocution, vital points were reached on which neither side could yield, and the conference was dissolved. Among the Monophysite leaders of the time were a certain Severus, an active but violent man, who had been deposed from the patriarchate of Antioch in the time of Justin, and one Anthimus bishop of Trebizond. These men seem to have acquired much influence in Theodora's coterie, and it was probably owing to her persuasions that in A.D. 535 Anthimus was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople, in spite of the doctrinal suspicions attaching to him. Unluckily for him, an embassy, from the East Gothic king Theodahad, who had then succeeded his murdered wife Amalasantha, arrived shortly afterwards (Feb. 536 A.D.) at Constantinople. At its head was pope Agapetus. Having heard of the suspicions attaching to the opinions of Anthimus, and disapproving, according to the custom of Rome, of translations from one bishopric to another, he refused to communicate with the patriarch till he should have purged himself from the charge of heresy, and insisted that, when purged, he should return to his see of Trebizond. Justinian (perhaps owing to the support which Theodora seems to have given to Anthimus) was at first displeased and resisted; there is even a story that he so threatened Agapetus that the pope answered: "I came hither expecting to find a Constantine and I have found a Diocletian" (Anast. Vita Agapeti). However Agapetus prevailed, so much so that the Romans, as we gather from Anastasius, thought he had actually arraigned and brought to submission and orthodoxy the emperor himself, an idea which found its way into Dante (cf. Paradiso, canto vi. and the Tesoretto of Dante's preceptor, Brunetto Latini, p. 279 of Bolognese edition of 1878). Anthimus was deposed, though whether by Agapetus, or by a council, or by the authority of the emperor alone, does not very clearly appear. Baronius of course claims the first. Theophanes (Chronogr. p. 184) says that a synod was convoked against the Monophysites by Agapetus; and the edict of Justinian, issued to the synod held not long afterwards, speaks of Anthimus, as deposed first by the opinion of Agapetus, also by that of the holy synod held in Constantinople. Mansi however (viii. p. 869) thinks there was merely an informal gathering of bishops in Constantinople, after the deposition, which presented an address to pope Agapetus, and Theophanes may easily have mistaken the subsequent synod for one deposing the patriarch. Mennas, head of the hospitium of Samson in Constantinople, was appointed in the place of Anthimus, and consecrated by Agapetus, who soon afterwards died, having asked the emperor, however, to have the charge of heresy against Anthimus properly investigated. Accordingly, by the directions of Justinian, the new patriarch Mennas called a local synod—σύνδος ἐνδημοῦσα—which met during the months of May and June A.D. 536. Its Acta are fully preserved, and may be read in Mansi, Concilia, vol. viii. (cf. Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, ii. pp. 742-753). Anthimus is cited, does not appear, and is thereupon condemned and deposed from his see of Trebizond. On the complaint or suggestion of certain monks of Palestine, the synod goes on to deal with other persons suspected of Monophysitism, and anathematizes Severus, formerly patriarch of Antioch, Peter of Apamea, and Zoaras. An attempt is made to procure the destruction of a monastery said to be full of Eutychians, the one in fact which Zoaras haunts, but is avoided by the prudence of Mennas, who deprecates the taking any step except with the authority and approbation of the emperor. Two months after the synod, in August A.D. 536, Justinian issues an edict addressed to Mennas in which he confirms all that the synod had done, condemns anew the heretics denounced by it, forbids them to remain in Constantinople or in any great town, to disseminate their doctrines, to baptize. Their books are to be burnt and their adherents exiled. Among the various charges enumerated, some of which consist of personal accusations against Severus, we find that of obtaining protection from powerful persons near the emperor. The gist of the offences is Monophysitism and consequent schismatic proceedings.

After this there appears to have been a period of comparative calm in the ecclesiastical world of Constantinople, till unhappily some one turned the emperor's zeal into a new track, by calling his attention to the growth of Origenistic opinions in the East, and especially in Syria.

Origen's writings seem to have been comparatively little known, or at least discussed, for some time back, even in the East, and in the West not at all. However, about the beginning of the sixth century, there had been in the monasteries of Palestine, and particularly in that great one called the New Laura, a considerable diffusion of his opinions, which excited the alarm of St. Sabas, and, at the time we have now reached, of the patriarch Peter of Jerusalem. The latter took the opportunity of the presence at Jerusalem of Pelagius, apocrisarius of the Roman bishop, to induce him to make representations to the emperor on the subject, and sent along with him four monks, for the purpose of accusing the followers of Origen. This was in 543. The four monks laid before Justinian a writing, full of charges against Origenism, and were supported by Pelagius, and by Mennas, who was still patriarch. Among Justinian's chief ecclesiastical associates and confidants, were two bishops belonging to the Origenist party, Theodore Ascidas, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and Domitian, bishop of Ancyra. Both these prelates, who had formerly been monks, and may have risen by the favour of Theodore, resided usually at Constantinople, and had much influence with the emperor. Nevertheless they seem to have feared the charge of heresy too much to resist the monks from Palestine, and perhaps did not own their attachment to Origen's writings. Anyhow the emperor promptly condemned the accused opinions, issuing a long edict addressed to the patriarch Mennas, in which he classes Origen among the heretics, and singles out for anathema ten particular doctrines contained in his writings. A local council was thereupon convoked by Mennas, which dutifully echoed the emperor's edict, publishing its anathemas against fourteen propositions drawn from Origen, and condemning his person. Both Justinian and the theologians of his time generally were, it need hardly be said, quite out of sympathy with Origen, unable to appreciate the fine side of his writings, and disposed to be startled and shocked by many of his theories. Indeed his faults would hardly be more repellent to them than his virtues.

Theodore and Domitian had submitted, but their mortification drove them to take action in another way, and thus to awaken a long, needless, and most mischievous controversy. Justinian, it would seem, haunted by his old desire, one in itself proper enough, to bring back the Monophysite party to orthodoxy and church communion, was at work upon a treatise on the Incarnation, whereby he trusted to convince and conciliate the stubborn Acephali (or extremer Monophysites) of Egypt. Theodore, according to our authorities, suggested to him that a simpler way of winning back those who disliked the council of Chalcedon, would be to get certain writings condemned which that council had approved, but which the Monophysites disliked as being of a distinctly Nestorian tendency. (See Liberatus ap. Galland. Bibl. Patr. xii. 160, as to Theodore, and Facundus, b. i. c. 2, as to Domitian of Ancyra; cf. also Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iv. 38; and Vita S. Sabae.) They singled out three particular persons and treatises for condemnation, which soon became famous under the name of the τρία κεφάλαια (tria capitula), which we usually translate Three Chapters, but would be better called the Three Articles, viz. the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, a writer whom the Origenists always disliked, the treatise of Theodoret against Cyril and his twelve articles, and the letter of (or attributed to) Ibas, bishop of Edessa, to the Persian bishop Maris. As Hefele remarks (Conciliengeschichte, ii. 777) the words τρία κεφάλαια probably originally denoted three propositions in Justinian's edict of condemnation, i.e. three sentences or paragraphs containing three several anathemas—(1) on the person and writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia; (2) on the writings of Theodoret of Cyrrhus against Cyril of Alexandria, and on behalf of Nestorius; and (3) the epistle of Ibas to Maris. These three paragraphs were probably similar to the paragraphs 12-14 in Justinian's second edict called the ῥητορική πίστις; and were doubtless those which bishops were required to sign by way of evidencing their concurrence in the anathema. Later on, as the matter came to be constantly in men's mouths, the term τρία κεφάλαια began to be applied to the three topics of which the question consisted, so that at last it came to mean the persons and writings impugned; i.e. (1) Theodore and his writings; (2) Theodoret's impugned writings; (3) The epistle of Ibas. And this is the usual sense in the authors of the time (e.g. Facundus of Hermiane, whose treatise is entitled Defensio pro Tribus Capitulis), and in the protocols of the Fifth General Council. Unwise and unfortunate as this attack upon the three deceased theologians proved, it was not so utterly wanton and unprecedented as a modern student might at first sight fancy. The Monophysites had occasionally alleged as a ground for rejecting the decrees of Chalcedon that that council had approved Theodoret and Ibas, whose teaching was (in their view) tainted with Nestorianism. Theodore of Mopsuestia was, with his master Diodorus of Tarsus, in a sense the fountain of all the errors. Nestorius, as well as Theodoret, had been his pupil. Bishop Rabulas of Edessa had attacked his doctrines soon after his (Theodore's) death (in A.D. 448), and the (general) council of Ephesus would no doubt have condemned him had he not been then already dead. In fact Cyril of Alexandria had impeached his memory before the emperor Theodosius II., but the emperor prudently declined to pursue a theological opponent into the other world. The Nestorians still appealed to Theodore as their highest authority, and triumphantly pointed to the fact that he had never been condemned. Against Theodoret and Ibas the case was weaker. Both had joined in anathematizing Nestorius at Chalcedon, and been restored to their sees. But both had attacked Cyril, who, though claimed by the Monophysites, was also a bulwark of orthodoxy, and the epistle to Maris was a violent assault on the council of Ephesus. It might therefore be with some show of plausibility alleged that the authority of that council was not established while these assailants seemed to be protected by the aegis of Chalcedon.

Using such arguments as these, and seconded by the arts of the bitter Theodora (says Liberatus, ut supra), Theodore Ascidas and Domitian persuaded Justinian to compose and issue a treatise or edict against the Three Articles, conceiving that when he had thus committed himself his vanity would not allow him to draw back, and that the risk of his being worked upon by others, and turning angrily round upon them with his usual changeableness (solita levitate), would thus be avoided. The account is given by hostile authorities, but it is in itself sufficiently probable. Justinian fell into the trap, and lighted in mere heedlessness a flame which burnt long and fiercely in the church. Desisting from his book against the Acephali, he forthwith composed the suggested edict, which was issued between 543 and 545, probably in 545 A.D. It has perished, only three or four short extracts being preserved by Facundus. It was circulated through the church that it might obtain the signatures of the bishops. Some difficulty was at first found. The four Eastern patriarchs were naturally afraid of the consequences of reopening any question as to the authority of the council of Chalcedon. Mennas, after some hesitation, signed, but subject to a promise given him on oath, that he might withdraw his signature if the bishop of Rome should refuse to agree. He remembered the last schism and the victory of Rome, and had no taste for another. The other three patriarchs, Ephraim of Antioch, Peter of Jerusalem, Zoilus of Alexandria, under real or imagined threats of deposition, obeyed and signed, and after more or less intimidation to the unwilling, and the offer of various rewards to the servile, the great majority of the bishops through Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Macedonia, fell in with the emperor's wish. Being mostly strong Chalcedonians, they cannot have liked the course he compelled them to take, but having rich sees, and being wholly dependent on the state, they were not the men to make martyrs of themselves for anything less than a doctrinal difficulty of the first moment. In the Western provinces, where the bishops had less to lose, and had been accustomed to face Arian potentates, Justinian found a less ready spirit of compliance. The bishops of Africa led the opposition to his edict, and they were largely supported by those of Italy, Gaul, Illyricum, and Dalmatia. In Rome much alarm was produced by the arrival of the edict, and by the emperor's command to Vigilius, lately chosen pope, to repair to Constantinople. The papal secretary Stephen, and Dacius archbishop of Milan, who were then in Constantinople, had both broken off communion with Mennas upon his signing, and their reports would no doubt influence ecclesiastical opinion in Rome. Vigilius, we are told, and may well believe, was unwilling to go to Constantinople. Anastasius even relates a long story about his being seized by the imperial messengers in the church of St. Caecilia, and carried by force on board ship, but this is evidently later tradition. We hear on better authority that he was besought, as he started from Rome, not to consent to the condemnation of the Three Articles. There is a story told by Liberatus (c. 22), and accepted by modern writers, that when Vigilius had been formerly papal representative at Constantinople, a compact had been made by him with Theodora and other leading Monophy-sites, whereby, in return for their procuring his election as pope, he should play into their hands, and endeavour to subvert the authority of the council of Chalcedon. A letter alleged to have been written by him to the Monophysite bishops Theodosius, Anthimus, and Severus is given by Liberatus. The deposition of Sylverius managed by Belisarius, acting under the orders of Theodora, and the choice in his stead of Vigilius, are supposed to be the fulfilment of the first part of this plot. Vigilius had been frequently summoned by Theodora to carry out his part of the contract, for which he had already received the promised consideration, but he had evaded doing so. Now, however, Theodora had got her opportunity, which she could use all the better because Justinian naturally expected the pope to meet his wishes. Accordingly, we hear that she enforced by terrible threats his required appearance at Constantinople. Vigilius had a difficult part to play, for while he could not venture openly to oppose the emperor, and must have feared (whether he had really been party to any such plot or not) the anger of Theodora, he had also to reckon with the all but universal loyalty to the council of Chalcedon of the Roman church, and of the Western churches generally. Accordingly he played fast and loose, tergiversated, temporised, tried to please everybody, and, as usually happens, pleased nobody. The details of his behaviour belong rather to his own biography (see VIGILIUS), or the history of the Fifth General Council, than to the life of Justinian. It may therefore be sufficient to mention that he arrived in Constantinople in A.D. 547, having spent nearly a year in Sicily on his way; that he there at first assumed an attitude of hostility to the assailants of the Three Articles, and even refused to communicate with the patriarch Mennas, although he was secretly induced, by a promise, made under oath, that his compliance should not be used against him, to undertake to concur in Justinian's condemnation (Facundus, contra Mocianum, 592 D, Sirmond, ii. 593 E). After a time, in A.D. 548, he issued a document called the Judicatum, wherein he deliberately condemned the Three Articles, saving, however, the authority of the council of Chalcedon. He admits this to be a "dispensatio," needed by the fact that the Council's approval of the condemned teachers had become a stumbling-block. He might urge that these three men had been really in error, and that he could not be supposed to be impairing the authority of the Council, while he expressly saved it. However this was not the view of the Western bishops, nor even of all his own immediate retinue, whose opposition obliged him, after a while, to recall his Judicatum. About this time, in A.D. 548, the empress Theodora died, but matters had gone too far against the Three Articles, and Justinian had become too thoroughly committed for her loss to make much difference. He continued to coerce the recalcitrant bishops of Africa, depriving some of their sees, and after various negotiations with Vigilius, and putting him under a secret oath to condemn the three teachers, Justinian issued in A.D. 551 a second edict against the Three Articles addressed to the whole Christian world, which has been preserved under the name of the Confession of Faith, ὁμολογία πίστεως Ἰουστινιανῶ αὐτοκράτορος (printed in Mansi, ix. 537). This edict in its dimensions and style is nothing less than a theological treatise, taking the writings of the three impugned doctors, and discovering heresies in them by a process of minute scrutiny and inference. Vigilius was required to subscribe it, but whether from conscientious scruples, or from fear of what might await him in the West, he refused, and, to escape the consequences of Justinian's anger, took refuge in the basilica of St. Peter at Constantinople, from which the imperial messengers were unable, even by physical violence, to drag him away. Persuaded by a safe-conduct to return, he again escaped to the church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon. Here he remained, protesting his fears of the emperor, until the latter, who was anxious to obtain his concurrence in the summoning of a general council, since that now appeared to be the only solution for the dissensions and anxieties which the question of the Three Articles had excited, succeeded after long negotiations in inducing him to withdraw his ecclesiastical censure of the edict and its supporters. He then returned to Constantinople to await the opening of the council. His own wish had been to have a council in Sicily or Italy, that the Western prelates might attend and strengthen him. But Justinian would not agree to this; so after various proposals and counter proposals, one being that a small conference should be held, which Vigilius wished to be of four Oriental bishops, the three patriarchs and one other, to meet himself and three Westerns, while Justinian conceived that it ought to consist of five bishops from each patriarchate, the emperor became naturally tired of the shifty turnings of his antagonist, and, without more ado, himself summoned the council to meet at Constantinople. The first sitting was on May 5, A.D. 553. Eutychius, who, upon the death of Mennas in August 552, had become patriarch of Constantinople, presided. By him sat Apollinaris of Alexandria and Dominus of Antioch. Eustochius of Jerusalem was represented by three bishops. Altogether 151 bishops were present at the opening, while 164 signed at the end. Of these the very large majority belonged to the Eastern patriarchates. Six from Africa attended, but more than twenty were kept away by Vigilius, who himself refused to attend, knowing well that he would be overborne by numbers. To the invitations addressed to him, both by the emperor and the council, he returned evasive replies, alleging first that he was ill, and then that the Western church was not adequately represented, and declaring he would send a statement of his views in writing. This he did in a document called the Constitutum (printed in Mansi, ix. 61), and presented, not to the council, but to Justinian himself, who however refused to receive it. The council then went on its way without troubling itself about the pope's absence. Justinian addressed a letter to the fathers, reproaching Vigilius for his tergiversation, and requiring his name to be struck out of the diptychs, as having by his defence of Theodoret and Ibas excluded himself from the right to church-fellowship. Therewith he also produced evidence that the pope had already solemnly promised, both to himself and Theodora, to procure the condemnation of the Three Articles.

Thereupon the council, paying no further heed to Vigilius, proceeded with its examination of the writings impugned. (The details may be read in Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, ii. § 267-274. The Acta, nearly all of which are extant only in a Latin translation, may be read in Mansi, vol. ix.; see also under CONSTANTINOPLE, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.) The upshot was, as might have been expected from the unlimited control which Justinian exercised over his bishops, that Theodore of Mopsuestia was anathematized absolutely, while the rehabilitation which Theodoret and Ibas had met with from the fathers of Chalcedon stood them in such good stead that they, as persons, escaped, while anathema was pronounced against Theodoret's treatise in opposition to Cyril's Twelve Articles, and against the letter to Maris, which passed under the name of Ibas, but which the council, like the emperor, professed to consider doubtfully authentic. A series of fourteen articles, or anathematizations, was prepared, most of which corresponded closely with the articles of Justinian's ὁμολογία πίστεως, and in which the orthodox faith of the Trinity and Incarnation is restated. A recognition of the first four general councils and formal acceptance of their decrees was of course adopted, and in the eleventh article a general anathema against a number of heretics, viz. Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, Apollinarius, Origen, Nestorius, Eutyches, together with their adherents, and all those persons who have been anathematized by any of the four preceding general councils. It has been often supposed, and the belief is indeed as old as Evagrius, who was born before the date of the council, that the opinions of Origen and his followers were formally condemned at this council. (See Evagr. iv. c. 38; Theoph. Chronogr. p. 354 of Bonn edition, vol. i.) But this has arisen from confounding the former local council under Mennas in A.D. 543 with this General Council. The only reference to Origen which appears in the extant records of the proceedings is in the general anathema in which his name occurs. It is not therefore correct to say, as has sometimes been said, that any particular doctrines of his have ever been condemned by the whole church. And several writers of weight have even argued from the fact that he had not been condemned, like the six others mentioned above, by any general council, and that his heresies belong to a different group, so to speak, from theirs, as also from his not appearing among the persons condemned in Justinian's second edict, the ὁμολογία πίστεως before mentioned, which in other respects the eleventh article or anathema of the Fifth General Council follows exactly, that the name of Origen in that article or anathema is a later insertion. However, not only does the name appear in the Latin copy of the acts of the council which went to Rome, but the hostility to the decrees of the council shewn by the Origenist monks of the New Laura in Palestine may seem to imply that the council had assailed the memory to which they were so much attached. The fourteen articles which were the result of the council's labours were subscribed at the last sitting, on June 2, 553, by all the bishops, 164 in number, headed by Eutychius of Constantinople. Eight African bishops were among the signers. There can be no great doubt that Justinian, following the established usage of the Roman emperors, issued forthwith an edict confirming the decrees of the council. Such edict, however, if issued, has not been preserved. He certainly sent the decrees all over the empire for signature by the bishops. Little opposition was experienced in the Eastern world. The monks of the New Laura, who attacked the decrees, were chased out by the imperial general Anastasius, and probably a certain number of clergy may have been deposed, this being the punishment which the council had threatened against bishops or other clerics who should teach or speak against it. We hear, however, of only one bishop, Alexander of Abydus, who was deposed. It is interesting to know from Cyril of Scythopolis that this tenacious prelate perished in a great earthquake which befel Constantinople soon after the council, as a judgment for his resistance. Bishop Victor of Tununum, however, when he mentions this terrible earthquake, which overthrew many altars in the churches, has a different explanation to give of it. Like most of his African brethren, he was a defender of the Three Articles, and he tells us that Providence sent the earthquake as a punishment on the emperor and city for the sins of the council in shaking the faith of Chalcedon. Vigilius and the Western ecclesiastics in his train, who had signed the Constitutum, appear to have held out for some time. According to Anastasius (Vita Vigilii, with which cf. Marcellinus's Chronicle), the pope was banished, and of the clergy some were banished to Upper Egypt, and some condemned to work in the mines. Vigilius was not of the stuff of which martyrs are made; and the victories of Narses over the Gothic kings, Totila and Teias, which had just taken place, had made him more than ever the emperor's subject and laid Rome completely at Justinian's mercy. There was thus every motive for compliance. He had been six weary years at Constantinople, and must have sometimes felt that in purchasing the papal chair by his promises to Theodora he had made a bad bargain. Accordingly in December 553, Vigilius issued a letter (preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, and printed in Mansi, Concilia ix. 414), addressed to the patriarch Eutychius of Constantinople, in which he laments the discord which the enemy of mankind had aroused between himself and his brethren the other bishops, but owns that he was in the wrong, and is now glad to confess it, the darkness that had clouded his mind having been dispelled by a more thorough examination of the Three Articles with the writings of the fathers. He then proceeds to condemn and anathematize Theodore, Theodoret, and the letter of Ibas, repeating in some instances verbally the anathemas pronounced by the council. All this is not to prejudice the authority of the council of Chalcedon, which of course never meant to approve these heresies. A second manifesto of Vigilius, of February 554, and which seems to have been a Constitutum addressed to the bishops of the West, contains more elaborate examination of the letter of Ibas (whose authenticity he altogether denies), and a similar anathema upon the Three Articles. His object doubtless was to justify himself fully to the Western church, and escape from the effect of his former declarations against the condemnation of what Chalcedon had spared. Being then released by Justinian, he set off for Rome, but died in Syracuse upon the journey. The deacon Pelagius, who had played so considerable a part in the attack upon Origen while acting as papal apocrisarius at Constantinople, succeeded him. He was apparently nominated by Justinian; at least we do not hear of any regular election. Anastasius tells an improbable story of Justinian having asked the Roman prelates in Constantinople whether they would have Vigilius or Pelagius for pope, and of their saying that they desired Vigilius back again, but would take Pelagius on the next vacancy. Pelagius had at one time been opposed to the condemnation of the Three Articles, and had signed the first Constitutum of Vigilius, but had no doubt made his peace with the emperor, and when he became pope lost no time in announcing his adhesion to the Fifth General Council. Whether from this, or owing to the suspicion which lay on him of having ill-used Vigilius, and even contributed to his death, he was very unpopular at Rome. Only two bishops could be procured to join in his consecration. A serious schism followed the promulgation in the West of the anathemas of the Fifth Council. The bishops of Dalmatia and Illyricum were hottest in their opposition, and their archbishop Frontinus was taken to Constantinople, and thence banished to Upper Egypt. A manifesto by Justinian, addressed to some Western bishops (printed in Mansi, ix. p. 589), has been supposed to be an answer to remonstrances addressed to him by these Illyrians. The resistance in Africa was broken by similar violent means, a good many bishops being deposed and imprisoned in convents, under the auspices of the metropolitan Primasius of Carthage, and by the secular arm of the governor. In Gaul and Spain there was great discontent, which, however, did not go the length of a complete breach with Rome, while in North Italy the bishops of Tuscan, the province of Milan, and Istria and Venetia, broke off communion with the pope. The patriarchate of Aquileia, afterwards removed to Grado, and finally divided into the two small patriarchates of Grado and Aquileia, arose out of this schism, which did not come to an end till the beginning of the eighth century. Ultimately the whole Western church was brought by the efforts of the popes to recognize the Fifth General Council. The effect, however, which Justinian had been encouraged to expect, and which would appear to have been his inducement for raising this unhappy question, was not attained. Not a single Monophysite seems to have returned to the Orthodox church. The Egyptian Acephali in particular were as stubborn as ever.

Having entered on the slippery path of tampering with heretics, Justinian was led in his last days himself to lapse into heresy. Although Theodora was no longer alive to lead him astray, he seems to have come again under Monophysite influences. The doctrine that the body of Christ was insensible to fleshly passions and weaknesses, was in fact incorruptible, and so not ordinary flesh at all, had been broached early in the century by bishop Julian of Halicarnassus, a leading Monophysite, in opposition to the view of Severus, the already mentioned some time patriarch of Antioch, that Christ's body was corruptible up to the resurrection, and only afterwards ceased to be so. The question excited vehement disputes in Alexandria, where the school of Julian received the name of Aphthartodocetæ or Phantasiastæ (those who hold incorruptibility, those who believe in an unreal body), while the Severians were stigmatized as Phthartolatræ (worshippers of the corruptible). Justinian, whose arbitrary temper was not lessened by the weaknesses of age, published an edict declaring the doctrine of Aphthartodocetism to be orthodox, and requiring the assent of all patriarchs and bishops to this new article. He had always been inclined, even when opposing Monophysitism, to magnify the divine element in the nature of Christ, had for instance approved the formula "God suffered for us," or "one of the Trinity suffered," of the so-called Theopaschitæ. Eutychius of Constantinople was deposed for refusing to adhere to the edict. Anastasius of Antioch, whose praises are celebrated by Evagrius (Eccles. Hist. iv. 40), was threatened, and no doubt others would have been found to resist a doctrine which deviated so considerably from the standards of Chalcedon, and appeared to verge dangerously near to Docetism or even Manichæism. At this moment, however, Justinian died in A.D. 565, and the controversy at once collapsed, for his successor took comparatively slight interest in theological questions, and allowed the various parties to wrangle with little interference from the secular arm.

The general character of Justinian's ecclesiastical policy is sufficiently indicated by the facts already narrated. He was at the same time positive and unstable, apt to change his views, and accessible to the flatteries and influences of those who surrounded him, yet, withal, very opinionated in insisting upon any view he happened at the time to hold, and prepared to enforce compliance by the free employment of his despotic power. In spite of his protestations of respect for the clergy, the important place they held at his court, and the privileges which his legislation gave them, he never hesitated to resort to despotism and banishment to make them bend to his will. No Roman emperor so nearly assumed the position of a temporal pope, and none was so favourably placed for it, because after his time the power of the empire in the West steadily declined, by the loss first of North Italy, and afterwards of Africa. Nor had any preceding sovereign been so much interested in theological disputes, or arrogated to himself so great a right of interference. His control over the fifth council appears much more direct and considerable than that of his predecessors over the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. He was not less tyrannical towards the popes Sylvester and Vigilius, and has therefore incurred the wrath of modern papal writers, notably of cardinal Baronius.

Justinian was through his life a resolute, though (as has been seen) not always a consistent, persecutor. Among the heretics who were the objects of his severities, two classes may be distinguished, those who were undoubtedly Christians and accepted the faith of Nicaea, and those who went further astray and were tainted by errors savouring of heathenism. The former, including Nestorians and Eutychians, were punished with deposition from ecclesiastical office, with excommunication, and occasionally with banishment. The latter, including Manichæans, Gnostics, and Montanists, were more severely dealt with, were deprived of all civil rights, and forbidden to meet for the purposes of their worship. The enforcement of these penalties was often carried out with much cruelty, and sometimes produced sanguinary contests. The Montanists of Phrygia, being required to undergo baptism, shut themselves up in their churches, killed their wives and children, and set fire to the buildings. Similar rigours were inflicted on the Jews and Samaritans, though the Jews, as a serviceable element in the population, seem to have in practice fared somewhat better than the others. The revolts of the Samaritans, caused by the prohibition to take any property by inheritance, caused a terrible war, which desolated the part of Syria they inhabited. Its results at last so frightened Justinian that he relaxed by a constitution issued in A.D. 551 some of the penalties he had imposed on them (Nov. 129). As respects heathenism, it is not very easy to determine precisely how far the laws directed against it were carried out. They punish apostasy with death; they require all persons to undergo baptism, and they deprive pagans of all civil rights and privileges, while, of course, forbidding any public exercise of pagan worship. In spite of this, there can be no doubt that a great number of pagans continued to exist, not only among the population of the wilder and more mountainous districts of Greece and Asia Minor, but also among the cultivated and wealthy classes of the capital, and (probably) of other great cities likewise. We hear of an inquisition at Constantinople early (in the third year) in Justinian's reign (Theoph. Chron. p. 153), which revealed the existence of a large number of pagans in the higher official classes. An ordinance was then issued, forbidding all civil employment to persons not orthodox Christians, and three months were allowed for conversion. Not long before, we are told, Justinian had taken away all the churches of the heretics, except one of the Arians, and given them to the orthodox (Theoph. p. 150). This was followed by energetic enquiries through Western Asia Minor, which are said to have resulted in the enforced baptism of 70,000 persons. In spite of these measures, however, paganism continued to exist both in the less frequented parts of Asia Minor and in Greece. We hear of it in Achaia, while among the mountain tribes of Taygetus it survived till the days of Basil the First (867-886). The only place, however, where persons of intellectual and social eminence continued to openly avow themselves heathens was Athens, whose university, although sadly crippled, still survived, and drew a certain concourse of studious youth. These students were probably mostly members of the now dominant church, as were the officials of the city; but the professors, or at least the most distinguished among them, were not Christians. Although they were rather speculative moralists and mystics, making philosophy their rule of life, than worshippers of the old deities of Olympus, still their influence was decidedly anti-Christian. The policy of the Eastern emperors had for some time been hostile to Athens, not only on religious grounds, but also because they desired to advance the fame and importance of their own imperial university of Constantinople. Early in the 6th century, Damascius, a Syrian by birth, a Neo-Platonist by conviction, and a resolute heathen, became head of the Platonic Academy. Justinian had very little sympathy or tenderness for old institutions, and could hardly have been expected to be tolerant towards pagans when he was so severe against Eutychians and Nestorians. In A.D. 528, on the discovery of crypto-paganism in his capital, he issued several stringent constitutions, one of which, forbidding "persons persisting in the madness of Hellenism to teach any branch of knowledge," struck directly at the Athenian professors. In 529 he sent a copy of the then just published Codex Constitutionum, which contained this ordinance, to Athens, with a prohibition to teach law there any longer. He was anxious, probably as a means of securing the uniformity of law over the empire, to have it taught only at Constantinople and Berytus. Law was not one of the leading studies at Athens, still this prohibition must have tended to drive away students. Shortly afterwards another constitution appeared, prohibiting the further teaching of philosophy at Athens, and at the same time such property as yet remained to the Platonic Academy was seized and applied to public purposes. This finally extinguished the university. Damascius and six of his colleagues presently proceeded (in 532) to the court of Chosroes, king of Persia, at Ctesiphon, apparently expecting to find in him a sort of philosopher king, after the fashion of Plato's Republic. They were, however, disappointed, and before many months returned to the Roman empire, in which Chosroes secured for them, by a treaty he was then negotiating with Justinian, the freedom to live unbaptized and unmolested. They did not, however, settle again in Athens, which rapidly became a Christian city even in externals, its temples being turned into churches. So one may ascribe to Justinian the extinction in the Roman world of open and cultivated paganism as well as of the Platonic philosophy.

V. Justinian's legislation falls to be considered under two principal heads—his work as a codifier and consolidator of pre-existing law, and his own new laws, some of which were incorporated in the Codex Constitutionum; while others, published subsequently, and not officially collected by him, remain as detached statutes, and go by the name of the Novels (Novellae Constitutiones).

First as to his codification.

The law of Rome was drawn from a variety of sources. In the days of the free republic it consisted in strictness, solely of leges, statutes passed by the comitia centuriata or comitia tributa (these latter being called also plebiscita). Numerous commentaries were written upon these by the jurists, and numerous dicta, or expressions of opinion relating to legal questions uttered by them, were preserved, partly by oral tradition, partly in writing, which acquired authority scarcely inferior to that of the leges themselves. These were called the interpretatio. There were also of course the edicts of the magistrates, especially of the praetor, which had practically the force of law, though not part of the jus civile, but in theory mere temporary declarations of the magistrate's will. When the republic had by degrees been turned into a monarchy, the leges ceased to be passed, and were replaced by the senatus consulta, decrees of the senate; and ultimately by ordinances of the emperor, rescripta, decreta, edicta, &c., which went by the common name of Constitutiones. The edicts also continued to be issued by the magistrates annually until the time of Hadrian, when the Edictum Perpetuum was settled by Salvius Julianus. In the time of Augustus the practice grew up for the emperor to give his commission to a certain number of the more distinguished jurists to deliver, under his authority, their opinions, signed and sealed. These opinions thus came to be quoted as law in the same sense as if they had emanated directly from the sovereign, and became the means of introducing a great deal of new law into the system. As these commissioned jurists were generally also the composers of treatises on legal subjects, their writings soon began to enjoy the same weight as authorities which their formal opinions had received from the emperor's commission. During the two centuries from the time of Augustus to that of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235), under whom lived Modestinus, the last of the great so-called classical jurists, a vast mass of law was built up by the constant labours of these jurists, who both commented on the leges, senatus consulta, and edicts of the magistrates, and also compiled systematic treatises upon every department of jurisprudence. After the time of Modestinus, the succession of great legal writers practically came to an end, but the treatises then existing continued to be received and quoted as law in the tribunals over the whole empire. Legislation was now in the hands of the emperors alone, who continued to issue numerous constitutions, the bulk of which soon became very large. Thus in the days of Justinian, three hundred years after Alexander Severus, the subsisting and effective law of the Roman empire consisted of two great divisions: firstly, the imperial constitutions; and secondly, the writings of the great jurists of the later republic and earlier empire. These latter being all, or nearly all, from three to five centuries old in his time, were sometimes distinguished as the jus vetus, while the constitutions, the majority of which were much later in date, were called jus novum. Jus vetus of course included the leges and senatus consulta, and even to some extent the earlier imperial constitutions, because all these had been commented on in, and in fact practically incorporated with, the treatises of the jurists. And it also included not only the edict of the praetor, finally fixed and permanently enacted as a law by Hadrian, upon its settlement by Salvius Julianus, but also all the commentaries on this and other edicts. In Justinian's time this immense two-fold mass of law had got into a very unsatisfactory state. It was so vast that no private person was rich enough to purchase it all, nor indeed would it have been easy to find a great many of the treatises, or a great many of the constitutions, for authorised copies of the latter do not seem to have been published by the state beyond the few sent to certain high officials when first issued. Even the official libraries do not appear to have contained complete collections. Probably most practising advocates and judges possessed but a very small number of law books; and this must have caused serious confusion and difficulty, because on the argument of a case no one could tell what authorities might be cited on the other side, and the judge might be surprised by the production of constitutions, or treatises enjoying the force of law, which he had never heard of, and whose authenticity he might have no means of determining. Moreover in this immense mass of law there were many inconsistencies and repugnancies, later constitutions repealing or modifying earlier ones, one jurist differing from another, or interpreting an ordinance in a different sense from that which some later ordinance appeared to put upon it. Besides, the change in customs, ideas, economical and social conditions which had taken place since the treatises of the jurists were composed, and the earlier constitutions, even those so late as the time of Diocletian, were issued, particularly the vast changes involved in the establishment of Christianity as the dominant and general religion of the empire, had rendered much of the old law, though still formally unrepealed, practically obsolete. There was therefore a crying and overwhelming necessity for sweeping reforms both in the substance and in the outward form and expression of the law. Such reforms had been attempted in the time of Theodosius II., when the Theodosian Codex, containing a collection of the later constitutions not gathered into the collections made in the 4th century by Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, had been prepared and published A.D. 438. (See THEODOSIUS II.) This, however, dealt only with the imperial constitutions, not with the writings of the jurists, although to gather and digest these also had been a part of the plan of the large-minded advisers of Theodosius II. And now, nearly a century after the time of that emperor, the old evils were found to be as serious as ever, while the further changes in society had made the necessity for abolishing antiquated enactments even greater.

Justinian set to work so promptly after his accession that we may reasonably suppose he had meditated already upon the measures which were called for, and fixed his eyes on the men to be used as instruments. Very sensibly, he began with the easier part of the task, the codification of jus novum, the imperial constitutions of more recent date. A commission, consisting of John, ex-quaestor, and nine other eminent lawyers, of whom six were officials, Tribonian among them, one (Theophilus) professor of law, and two practising advocates, was appointed in February A.D. 528 with orders to go through the whole mass of constitutions and select out of them for preservation those which were still in force and of practical importance. The directions (preserved in the prefaces to the Codex) were to take the three existing collections, Codex Gregorianus, C. Hermogenianus, C. Theodosianus, and the uncollected later constitutions, and to rearrange under certain headings or titles the constitutions to be recognised as law, following in the distribution of the several constitutions within each title a chronological order. All superfluous matter, all preambles, all purely temporary provisions, were to be omitted, as well as all laws which had become practically obsolete. Contradictions were to be set right by striking out one or other of the conflicting passages. Power was given to alter the substance by the insertion or omission of such expressions as were needed to make the law conformable to existing practice, or consistent with itself, and generally to promote brevity and clearness. The Commissioners were even empowered to insert constitutions whose authenticity had been doubtful, if they found them useful. (See Const. Hæc Quæ prefixed to the Codex.) Pursuing these instructions, the commissioners distributed the matter before them into ten books, in general conformity with the order of the Edictum perpetuum (the praetorian edict as finally settled by Salvius Julianus in the reign of Hadrian), subdivided the books into titles, and in each title made the order of constitutions chronological. Of course some considerable care and judgment were needed in expunging contradictions, and deciding what superfluities might be rejected. Still in the main the work was of a comparatively simple nature, and it was therefore accomplished with creditable speed in less than fourteen months. In April, A.D. 529, the Codex Constitutionum was formally promulgated, and copies sent into every province of the empire, with directions that it should supersede all other constitutions or collections of constitutions previously in force. (See Const. Summa Reipublicæ prefixed to the Codex.) The next step was to deal with the jus vetus, the law contained in the writings of the authorised jurists, which practically included (as has been already explained) so much of the old leges, senatus consulta, and edicta as had retained any practical importance. But before proceeding to codify this mass of law a preliminary difficulty had to be dealt with. There were, as already remarked, many differences of opinion among the jurists whose writings had legal authority, some of such differences having arisen between the two famous schools of Sabinians and Proculians, and others having appeared after those schools had ceased to exist. Where the five leading authorities (Papinian, Paul, Ulpian, Modestinus, and Gaius) differed, the judge was required by a law of Valentinian III. and Theodosius II. to follow the opinion of the majority; and the general and earlier rule was that in cases where opinions were equal the judge might adopt whichever view he pleased (Cod. Theod. iii. 27, 3; cf. Gai. i. 7). Much confusion and uncertainty of course arose from these oppositions of opinion among the jurists; and the decline in the learning and ability of the judicial functionaries must have seriously aggravated the evil. Justinian accordingly prepared and issued a series of constitutions, fifty in number, dealing with and settling the disputed points. These are known as the Quinquaginta Decisiones. (See Const. Cordi Nobis prefixed to the Codex.) At the same time a large number of other ordinances were promulgated, amending the law in various respects and abolishing obsolete provisions. The ground being thus cleared, he appointed a commission of sixteen lawyers, under the presidency of Tribonian, who had now become quaestor. One was a high official, four were professors of law, the other eleven were practising counsel. Four had acquired experience by serving on the Code Commission. The instructions given to them are stated in the constitution Deo Auctore, Cod. i. 17, 1; and the manner in which the work was executed in the constitution Tanta (Cod. i. 17, 2), and in those called Omnem reipublicæ and Dedit nobis (Δέδωκεν), prefixed to the Digest. Summarised, these instructions were as follows—To collect into one body whatever was best worth preserving in the writings of the authorised jurists, making extracts in such a way as that there should be neither repetition nor contradiction, but only one statement of the law should be set forth upon each of the many points whereon discrepant views had formerly prevailed. No regard was to be paid to the writings of private unauthorised jurists. All authors admitted were to be deemed of equal value, since the weight to be ultimately given to the Digest was to be that of the imperial sanction (omnia nostra facimus). Redundancies were to be cut off, errors in the manuscripts or in the expression were to be set right, alterations to be introduced where necessary, the version finally propounded by the compilers was to be taken to be that of the original writer. No antinomia (contradiction) is to be allowed to remain. Nothing is to be repealed which has been already enacted in the Codex. Rules of law which have become obsolete are to be passed over. The work is to be distributed into fifty books, following, in general, the order of the Codex and of the Perpetual Edict. The constitution containing these directions is dated in December 530. The commissioners set to work with promptitude, distributing themselves into several committees for the purpose of making swifter progress. The mass of books to be read through for the purpose of making extracts was enormous; not less, we are told, than two thousand treatises, containing three millions of “verses” (apparently sentences). Many of these were supplied by Tribonian from his large private law library. The work, to which the names of Digesta or Pandectæ (Πανδέκται—all receivers) are indifferently given by Justinian, was completed in the autumn of A.D. 533, and published to the world with two prefatory constitutions (Omnem reipublicæ and Dedit nobis) on December 16th of that year. As had been originally proposed, the Digest consists of fifty books, which seem to follow more or less the order of the praetorian Edict. Each book is divided into titles, each title into the extracts, which are sometimes only a line or two, sometimes of considerable length. The present division into numbered paragraphs dates from the Middle Ages. The arrangement of the matter in the titles is unscientific, and was long a puzzle; it has now however been cleared up by the industry and acuteness of Bluhme (Die Ordnung der Fragmente in den Pandekten titeln), who shows that the commissioners worked in three or four committees, each committee taking a particular class of books to peruse and make extracts from, and inserting together in the title all the extracts it had made from books of that class. The first of these classes included the commentaries on Sabinus, the second, commentaries on the Edict, the third miscellaneous dicta, opinions, definitions, &c., of Papinian and several of the later jurists, while the fourth consisted of some miscellaneous treatises of less importance. In some titles, one or other of these classes is quite wanting; and occasionally the plan of arrangement has not been adhered to, or has been subsequently changed. The result is a want of rational nexus, which not only confuses the reader but indicates that the commissioners either did not care for scientific symmetry, or were in too great a hurry to have leisure to labour towards it. In recent times Pothier and others have rearranged the substance of each title, but as the established modern method of citation is by the extracts and paragraphs in the order wherein they appear in the original, it is usually more convenient to employ the book in Justinian's own form. He divides it into seven departments and fifty books, explaining the scheme of arrangement, which to a modern eye appears clumsy and unscientific. The total number of titles is 432, and of extracts from the jurists 9123. Prefixed to each extract is the name of the jurist whose it is, and of the treatise from which it is taken. The most numerous extracts, amounting to about one-third of the whole, are from Ulpian, who was not only a very voluminous writer but also one of the latest and highest legal authorities of the classical period. Next in quantity comes Paulus. The total number of jurists extracted from is thirty-nine. The whole book is published as an imperial constitution, and derives its force from the imperial sanction, which at the same time abrogates all the pre-existing law, except, of course, that contained in the Codex and subsequently published constitutions, and therewith forbids all reference to the works of the earlier jurists themselves. Nothing written by them, no part of the older law, not even the venerable Twelve Tables themselves, shall thenceforth have any legal authority. No judge nor advocate shall travel out of the four corners of these two new statutes, the Codex and the Digesta. To preserve their integrity Justinian actually forbids any commentaries to be written on the Digest, directing that even the Greek translation, which it was of course necessary to permit, should be a literal one, following exactly the order and phraseology of the Latin original. He further requires all copies to be made without the use of abbreviations or signs, lest the text should become corrupted. If difficulties of interpretation should arise, he directs the sovereign to be consulted as to the true meaning; if errors should be discovered, which he admits to be, notwithstanding the care used, still possible, or if circumstances should so change that any enactments would become unsuitable, he undertakes to remedy them by fresh constitutions. (See Const. Tanta, Cod. i. 17, 2.)

While the Digest was in progress, Justinian directed three of the chief commissioners—Tribonian, Theophilus, professor of law in the university of Constantinople, and Dorotheus, professor of law at Berytus (Beyrut in Syria, the other great law-school of the empire), to prepare an elementary manual for educational purposes, based on the existing treatises, and especially on the deservedly popular Institutes of Gaius, but brought up to the state of the law as changed by recent emperors, and by Justinian himself. This treatise, which consists, like the work of Gaius, of four books, dealing in succession with the law of Persons, of Things, and of Actions, was published shortly before the Digest, not only as a text-book for teaching, but also as a law, a constitution with full imperial authority. It is the treatise which we know now as Justinian's Institutiones.

So many changes had been made in the law since the publication of the Codex Constitutionum, especially by the issuing of the Fifty Decisions, that it naturally occurred to the emperor or to Tribonian, whom we may take to have been the prompter of most of his acts in these matters, that a revised edition of the collection of constitutions should be prepared, to include those published since A.D. 529, while it omitted others contained in that collection which had been in the interval repealed, or had become unnecessary. Thus the whole scheme of consolidation would be more complete and satisfactory, for these new constitutions being included in the Codex, judges and lawyers would have the whole law in their hands in the one volume, without the necessity of providing themselves with copies of ordinances which had appeared separately at intervals of time. Tribonian and four other commissioners were named for this work, with full powers of altering the Codex in every respect, not only by inserting the new constitutions, but by retrenching and amending the first edition, so as to make it conform in all respects to the law as settled. On November 16, 534, this revised Codex was issued with an introductory constitution (now prefixed to it) called Cordi nobis, addressed to the senate of Constantinople, which confirms it, explains the motives for its construction, and gives it sole validity, abrogating the former edition altogether. No copies of that older edition have been preserved, and the Codex we now have is this new one (repetitae praelectionis). It is divided into 12 books and 765 titles, containing 4652 constitutions, the earliest of which dates from Hadrian. The arrangement, while generally corresponding to, still differs in many points from, that of the Digest, and the topics dealt with are of course to a great extent different, since the contents of the Digest are nearly all not later in date than the time of Modestinus (A.D. 244); while far the larger part of the constitutions in the Codex are more recent, and perhaps a half of them the work of the Christian emperors. Administrative regulations of course occupy a much larger part of the Codex than of the Digest.

The necessity which Justinian foresaw for fresh legislation now arose, and although he must have felt that the completeness of his collections was to some extent marred by adding other constitutions to them, it was only natural that the appetite for legal reforms which he had contracted should prompt him to further change. Between the year 534 and the end of his reign a large number of constitutions appeared, the majority during the lifetime of Tribonian (who died in A.D. 545). We have in one of the collections which has been preserved 168 such constitutions, but several of these are by Justin II. and Tiberius. Some not in this collection have been preserved elsewhere, and probably some have been lost altogether, so that the total number, which cannot have been less than 166, may have been considerably larger. These are called, by way of opposition to the previously consolidated law, Novellae Constitutiones post Codicem (νεαπαλ διατάξεις), or shortly Novellae (νεαπαλ), Novels. They mostly have the form of edicts or general laws rather than that of rescripta, which had chiefly prevailed in earlier times, and are usually addressed to some exalted civil official, or, in ecclesiastical matters, to the patriarch of Constantinople or some other great prelate, who is charged to send them to the provincial governors, or to the metropolitans and bishops, as the case may be. The majority are in Greek, the tongue then most general over the empire, but some were originally published in Latin, and a few in both languages. They do not appear to have ever been gathered into one officially sanctioned volume (although this had originally been promised, see Const. Codi nobis), but several private collections were made, from which our present text is derived. The three on which that text rests are the Epitome of Julian, containing 125 Novels in Latin, the Greek collection made at Constantinople not very long after Justinian's death, containing 168 Novels (some, as remarked above, by Justin II. and Tiberius II.) and the thirteen edicts; and the Authenticum (or Liber Authenticarum), or vulgata versio, in Latin, containing 134 Novels. This was the collection commonly used in Western Europe in the Middle Ages, and only 97 of the constitutions contained in it were commented on—glossatae—by the glossators of the Middle Ages. Only these therefore have been received as binding law in those modern states which recognize the civil law. (See as to the Novels the treatise of Biener, Geschichte der Novellen Justinians, and generally as to the history and editions of the Corpus Juris, Rudorff, Römische Rechtsgeschichte, Leipzig, 1857.)

The Corpus Juris Civilis, which under Justinian became the sole law of the Roman empire, and which was accepted in the early Middle Ages as the law of Germany, Southern France, and Italy, and has exerted a great influence on the jurisprudence even of countries which, like England, repudiate (except in special departments) its authority, consists of the four parts already mentioned—the Codex, the Digesta, the Institutiones, and the Novellae. It need hardly be said that they do not constitute a code in the modern sense of the word (e.g. as we talk of the Italian or French code, the code of Louisiana, &c.). They consist (a) of two collections of detached laws or rules, not welded into one new body, but retaining in their parts the traces of their original creation, (b) of a short elementary text-book, which partly summarizes and partly explains the contents of those two collections, and (c) of a number of detached ordinances issued during a period of thirty years, and modifying, in some very important respects, the law contained in the two large collections. Now, as we have come in modern times to understand by codification the reduction of the whole law into one scientific system of rules, which are new in form and expression, though of course for the most part old in substance, the work which Justinian did would be better described as a Consolidation than a Codification. In his Codex and Digesta he frames no new rules—he merely collocates in a new order extracts from the pre-existing law-sources. The undertaking which he accomplished was no doubt far less splendid than a codification of the whole law of the Roman empire would have been. But it must be remembered, firstly, that the knowledge and juristic ability of Justinian's age were not equal to so great a task; and secondly, that if it had been carried out, the precious fragments of ancient legal thought which have been preserved in the Digest would in all probability have perished. As it is, the composition of the Digest has no doubt been one of the causes why so little of the vast and admirable juristic literature of the earlier Roman empire has come down to us. Still, in the Digest a good deal has been saved, of which a complete codification by Tribonian would have deprived us, a loss which would have been poorly replaced by his own work. On the whole, therefore, it may be said that Justinian exercised a wise discretion in attempting no more than he did attempt. And many as are the faults which may be pointed out in the arrangement of his Codex and Digest, and in the occasional disproportion of fulness of treatment to the importance of the topic, the work was done decidedly better than what we know of the literary and scientific characteristics of Justinian's age from its other productions would have led us to expect.

Justinian's Corpus Juris held its ground as the supreme law book of the empire for little more than three centuries. By that time the condition of society had so greatly changed, so much of the earlier law had become obsolete, and, one may probably add, the level of legal learning and ability had so sadly sunk, that something shorter, less elaborate, more adapted to the needs and capacities of the time was required. Accordingly the emperors, Basil the Macedonian, Constantine, and Leo the philosopher, directed the preparation of a new law book, which, revised and finally issued under Leo about A.D. 890, received the name of the Basilica, or Imperial Code. It contains, in sixty books, a complete system of law for the Eastern Empire, retaining, of course, a great deal of the substance of Justinian's Corpus Juris, but in a wholly altered form; the extracts from the Codex of constitutions, and those from the Pandects and Novels being all thrown into one new Codex, and intermingled with later matter. It is all in Greek; is much less bulky than the Corpus Juris, and has come down to us imperfect. The best edition is Haimbach's, Leipzig, 1833-1851, with supplement by Zacharia, Leipzig, 1846.

It remains to speak of the new legislation whereof Justinian was the author. It is contained partly in the Codex and partly in the Novels. The legal changes made by the constitutions of the first seven years of his reign, which have been incorporated in the Codex, are many of them solutions of problems, or settlements of disputes which had perplexed or divided the earlier jurists. These were promulgated in the Quinquaginta Decisiones already mentioned. A considerable number more relate to administrative subjects; while the rest are too miscellaneous, running over the whole field of law, to be even summarised here. As regards those which the student of Christian history is most directly concerned with—viz. the ecclesiastical constitutions, it would be tedious, and it is not necessary for the purposes of this article, to give a minute account of the principal legislative changes due to Justinian in church matters. These will better find their place in the articles in the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, which deal with the main subjects on which his legislative activity expended itself in this direction. A few remarks may, however, be profitably made on the emperor's ecclesiastical laws as contained firstly in the Codex Constitutionum, where they are abbreviated; and, secondly, in the collection of the Novels, where they appear at full and often wearisome length. The earlier ones are of course those in the Codex, while the Novels extend from A.D. 534 to 565.

In the Codex the first thirteen titles of the first book are occupied by laws relating to Christian theology and doctrine. Title I. is styled "De Summa Trinitate et Fide Catholica et ut nemo de ea publice contendere audeat," and contains (besides extracts from laws of earlier emperors) four laws by Justinian, beginning with the fifth, some of which have been taken into the Codex from the Collectio Constitutionum Ecclesiasticarum, and which lay down the true orthodox faith as defined by the first four general councils, and anathematize "Nestorius the man-worshipper, Eutyches the insane, Apollinaris the soul destroyer," and all who agree with these several heretics. One of these constitutions is an edict addressed by Justinian to pope John (as well as to Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople), with the reply of the pope confirming the edict as a declaration of the faith. The second title is, "De Sacrosanctis Ecclesiis et de rebus et privilegiis earum," and contains eight laws by Justinian, which deal chiefly with legacies to churches, or other pious or charitable uses, and with the management of church property. The third title is, "De Episcopis et clericis et orphanotrophiis et xenodochiis et brephotrophiis et ptochotrophiis et asceteriis et monachis et privilegiis eorum et castrensi peculio et de redimendis captivis et de nuptiis clericorum vetitis seu permissis." Sixteen of the laws in it (less than one-third in number, but more than one-half in bulk) are by Justinian, and treat of a great many topics, including the election and qualifications of bishops and priests, the choice of the heads (ἡγούμενοι, αἱ) of monasteries and nunneries, the observance of a pure and strict life in monasteries, the management of church property by the bishop and steward, with various provisions relating to charitable foundations, to the residence of the clergy at their churches, and the regular maintenance of divine service there, and to wills of property for church purposes. The fourth title, "De Episcopali Audientia et de diversis capitulis quae ad ius curamque et reverentiam pontificalem pertinent," is almost equally miscellaneous in its contents. Fourteen of the constitutions in it are by Justinian. The fifth, "De Haereticis et Manichaeis et Samaritis," contains a selection of persecuting or disabling laws from the time of Constantine down to and including Justinian's own. The penalties threatened, and the general severity of tone, steadily increase as time goes on, and the number of different kinds of heretics included in the denunciations is enlarged. In the one case (c. 21) a distinction is drawn by the emperor between the blacker and the less atrocious kinds of heretics and infidels. "Manichaeis Borboritis et paganis, necnon Samaritis et Montanistis et Ascodrogitis et Ophitis omne testimonium sicut et alias legitimas conversationes sancimus esse interdictum. Aliis vero haereticis tantum modo iudicialia testimonia contra orthodoxos, secundum quod constitutum est, volumus esse inhibita." The sixth title, "Ne sanctum baptismum iteretur;" the seventh, "De Apostatis;" the eighth, "Nemini licere signum Salvatoris, Christi humi vel in silice vel in marmore aut insculpere aut pingere;" the ninth, "De Judaeis et coelicolis;" and the tenth, "Ne Christianum mancipium haereticus vel paganus vel Judaeus habeat vel possideat vel circumcidat," are comparatively short, and contain only laws of earlier emperors. In the eleventh, "De Paganis Sacrificiis et Templis" we find an interesting collection of the various enactments against paganism from the famous edict of Constantius in A.D. 353 onwards, winding up with a general command to all heathens to be baptized forthwith, on pain of losing all their property and all civic rights; while death is the penalty for any one who, having been baptized, relapses into heathenism. All sacrifices, or other acts of pagan worship, are of course strictly forbidden and severely punishable; all gifts of property to any heathen temple or purpose are confiscated, the temples being all destroyed or appropriated to other uses, and the teaching of paganism, and indeed any teaching by any pagan, is absolutely prohibited. The twelfth and thirteenth titles, "De his qui ad ecclesias confugiunt vel ibi exclamant," and "De his qui in ecclesiis manumittuntur," are of less importance. They illustrate the growth of the mischievous right of sanctuary in churches, and the practice of manumission there. With the fourteenth title, "De Legibus et Constitutionibus Principum et edictis," ordinary civil legislation begins. Of course a good many references to ecclesiastical matters, and especially to the jurisdiction of the bishops, are scattered through other parts of the Codex. It will be seen from this summary that neither Justinian nor his predecessors had conceived the idea of framing a complete body of laws or rules for the government of the church, its hierarchical constitution and administration, much less for its internal discipline or its ritual. These things had been left to be settled by custom, by the authority of patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops, by the canons of councils passed as occasion arose. Not that the civil monarch supposed such topics to lie beyond the scope of his action, for in Constantinople the emperors, and Justinian most of all, regarded themselves as clothed with a supreme executive authority over the religious no less than the secular society. No such distinction as was afterwards asserted in the West between the temporal and spiritual powers had then been thought of. No Eastern ecclesiastic denied the emperor's right to summon general councils, direct them, and confirm their decrees. But, in point of fact, the emperors had been content to leave to churchmen the settling of what were regarded as being more or less technical and professional matters, which they were fittest to settle. The narrow and bigoted spirit, which runs through the persecuting laws included in the Codex, is fully as conspicuous in Justinian's own as in those of any of his predecessors. Moreover, by re-enacting them he made himself responsible for all that they contained. There is, however, this excuse to be made for him and them, that they might, in that age of the world, well believe it possible to stamp out heresy by a sufficiently vigorous exercise of the arm of flesh. And they did in fact succeed in stamping out paganism, though in one or two mountainous districts of Greece (such as the dells of Taygetus), and perhaps of Asia Minor, it lingered secretly on for two or three centuries more.

The Novels, as has already been said, are the constitutions issued by Justinian from A.D. 535 till his death in A.D. 565. Their topics are very various. Of the 153 in all to which the 168 appearing in the largest collection may be reduced by deducting four which are repeated, four which seem to be really formae issued by the praetorian prefect, and seven which belong to Justin II. and Tiberius II., the following rough classification may be made.

To these there may be added eleven edicta, not usually classed among the Novels, and mostly either special or administrative, and several constitutions drawn from various sources, and now, with the edicta, usually printed as an appendix to the Novels. These also are mostly either political or administrative or special; none of any ecclesiastical importance.

Most of the Novels were originally issued in Greek, which was the language of the great majority of Justinian's subjects, although not that of his own birth province, Illyricum. Those which were composed in Latin mostly refer to one or more of the provinces, such as Thrace, Africa, Sicily, where Latin was chiefly, or at any rate largely, spoken.

Those which are here classed as special and miscellaneous include some which relate to particular places (e.g. Constantinople) only; and some which are in the nature of rescripta or decreta, answers given by the emperor to particular questions addressed to him or decisions pronounced in cases brought before him as supreme judge by a sort of petition of appeal. As instances Nov. 155, 158, 159, 160 may be referred to. The largest group of Novels is the ecclesiastical. Next in number come those which deal with the civil and military, but especially the civil, administration of the state, and those (it is hard to draw a line between them) which relate to procedure and the conduct of legal business. These taken together number forty-eight. They throw a great deal of light on the condition of the empire and the character of the public service. In private law, the subjects most frequently handled are the law of inheritance and the law of marriage. In that of inheritance some very sweeping and usually beneficial changes are made, particularly by the famous Novel 118, which abolishes what remained of the antiquated rules of agnatic succession, and has substituted that clear, simple, intelligible system on which the law of intestate succession to personal estate in all the countries of modern Europe is based, a system so obviously just and convenient that a superficial observer may wonder why the Romans should have taken so long to reach it. Marriage and the legal relations arising thereon are dealt with, not only in the twelve Novels above mentioned, but in several others also, where they come in among other disparate topics, as well as in some of the Novels which have been here classed as Special and Miscellaneous. This was a subject which Justinian was fond of tinkering at, and not always successfully. The most remarkable of his provisions are to be found in Novels 117 (sects. 10 and 12) and 134 (sect. 11), in which he greatly limits the freedom of divorce previously allowed by the law, going to the very verge of abolishing the power which either party had theretofore of putting an end to the marriage. It may even be contended that by these Novels he actually did enact the invalidity of such a divorce: but the truer construction of them seems to be that though the word prohibemus is used of the divorces by mutual consent, and the punishment of life-long imprisonment in a monastery inflicted, there is nothing which goes so far as positively to retain the marriage-tie in existence, making the divorce null and void. However this severity was found unmaintainable: such complaints arose from all quarters that in A.D. 566 ten years after the 134th Novel appeared, the emperor Justin II., nephew and successor of Justinian, repealed (Nov. cxi.) the penalties provided by it and by the 117th, leaving the law as it had stood under the legislation of earlier sovereigns. A great many provisions regarding dowries are to be found in these Novels, springing from the desire to simplify what was a rather complicated branch of the law, and to make it secure the interests of the wife. Several constitutions, prompted by a desire for moral reformation, deal with criminal law, several relate to guardianship, the position of freedmen, and other parts of the law of persons, and nine deal with the law of obligations; none of them of any great importance. Both this department of the law and that which relates to what are called Real Rights had been (except some points relating to Inheritance) so thoroughly handled by the great jurists that comparatively few amendments were possible: nor are these topics (Obligations and Real Rights), however interesting to the scientific lawyer, so attractive to the amateur in morals and legislation as are those with which Justinian chiefly occupied himself. Among the ecclesiastical Novels, which are here reckoned as thirty-three in number, several groups may be distinguished. One group contains those which deal with the temporal rights and relations of the church and her ministers as holders of property. Eight constitutions may be referred to it, most of which are occupied with the question of the length of the period at which a good title to lands originally belonging to the church may be acquired by adverse enjoyment; and with the conditions and restrictions under which ecclesiastical lands may be alienated for a term or in perpetuity: both of them topics which gave Justinian much trouble, and on which he was sometimes obliged to reconsider and modify his first enactments. A second group comprises constitutions which are merely local in their application, having reference to some particular province (e. g. Nov. 37 to Africa) or to some particular church (e. g. Nov. 3 to the Great Church of Constantinople, Nov. 40 to the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem), or particular see (e. g. Nov. 11 to the privileges of the archiepiscopal chair of Justiniana Prima in Illyricum). To a third and more important group may be referred the constitutions, thirteen in number, which deal with ecclesiastical organization and discipline, the mode of choosing bishops and other clerics, their qualifications, the jurisdiction of bishops, the restrictions on the jurisdiction of civil courts in causes where clerics are concerned (a matter of great interest to any one who looks forward on the questions which were to occupy mediæval Europe), the rights, immunities, and position generally of the clergy (e. g. the exemption of a bishop from patria potestas, Nov. 81, the devolution of the property of a cleric dying intestate without legal heirs, Nov. 131, § 13), the regulations under which a church or oratory may be built, endowed, and consecrated, the internal discipline of monasteries and regulation of monastic life. It is not easy to classify these thirteen Novels under the topics they deal with, for these are a good deal mixed up together; indeed this whole classification is not, and could not be made, quite exact, since many Novels of one group contain some provisions which ought to have been placed in another. Several of these constitutions are re-enactments of preceding ones, or are in the nature of what we should call Consolidation Acts, summing up in one statute a number of scattered provisions contained in preceding ones. A fourth and last group includes four ordinances levelled at heretics (a good many provisions affecting whom incidentally occur in the other Novels, especially those of the last preceding group). One of these four is called Edictum de Fide, and is a short appeal to heretics to return to the safe teaching and anathematizings of the Catholic church (Nov. 132): another is directed against Jews and Samaritans, refusing to them all such immunities from public burdens as their exclusion from public offices and honours might otherwise have appeared to imply (Nov. 45); a third deprives heretic women of the privileges granted by Justinian's previous laws to women in respect of their dos; and the fourth is a sentence of deposition and anathema against Anthimus, some time patriarch of Constantinople, Severus, some time patriarch of Antioch, Peter of Apamea, Zoaras, and other persons tainted or supposed to be tainted with Monophysitism, issued in confirmation of the sentence passed upon them by the synod which met at Constantinople under the presidency of the patriarch Mennas in A.D. 536, as to which see supr. p. 546. The most generally remarkable characteristics of these ecclesiastical statutes, over and above the spirit of bitter intolerance which they breathe, are the strong disposition to favour in every way the church, the clerical order, and the monastic life; and the assumption throughout of a complete right of control by the imperial legislator over all sorts of ecclesiastical affairs and questions. Although there are of course some matters, such as those of ritual, penance, and so forth, which are not touched at all or touched very slightly, still the impression conveyed here, as well as in the Codex, is that the civil power claims a universal and paramount right of legislating for the church: nor is there any distinction laid down or recognized as already existing between matters reserved for the legislative action of the church alone in her synods and those which the emperor may deal with. He does no doubt always speak with the utmost respect of the sacred canons, sometimes quotes them, professes to confirm them, and in one place (Nov. 131, § 1) expressly declares that all the canons of the four great general councils are to have the force and rank of laws (τάξις νόμων ἐπέχειν). But there is no admission of the exclusive right of the church or of any ecclesiastical dignitary or body to legislate on any particular topics: this is indeed implicitly excluded by the laws, especially those in the first book of the Codex, which deal with the most specially spiritual of spiritual questions, the cardinal doctrines of the Christian faith. It is therefore not surprising that the African bishops who wrote against him in the matter of the Three Articles (supr. pp. 546-8) complain of his conduct as arrogating to the magistrate what belonged of right to the duly constituted officers of the church. Justinian appears to have conceived of himself as a despot in all matters, spiritual as well as temporal, finding his own bishops subservient, and assuming that subservience of ecclesiastical authorities, which had been the tradition of the empire (despite the occasional outbreaks of resistance to princes of suspected orthodoxy), to be the natural and almost necessary relative position of the temporal and spiritual powers. He probably never dreamt of the dangerous consequences which might follow the exemptions from civil jurisdiction which he conceded to the clergy, and the large powers of administering not only ecclesiastical but charitable property which he conferred on the bishops. And indeed the result proved that in the East these exemptions and powers were not dangerous. The Eastern emperor always maintained his authority over the church; while different political conditions enabled the Western patriarch and the Western church generally to throw off the control of the civil power and even extend its own jurisdiction over civil causes.

The provisions of these ecclesiastical Novels throw a good deal of light on the state of the Eastern church in the 6th century, and the evils which it was thought necessary to remedy. We hear once or twice of the ignorance of the clergy, persons being sometimes ordained who could not read the prayers used in the sacramental services of the Supper and Baptism (Nov. 6 and 137). Irregularities in monastic life were of course frequent, as appears from the penalties threatened (Nov. 5 and 133). Bishops were too fond of residing away from their sees, so that a prohibition to the administrator to send money to them while absent was deemed needful (Nov. 6, § 3; Nov. 123, § 9). The rules that a bishop must be unmarried, and a priest either unmarried or married only once and to a virgin, are insisted on. The habit of building churches, perhaps out of ostentation, and leaving them unprovided with funds sufficient for their due maintenance and service, is checked (Nov. 57 and 67), as also that of having private chapels in houses, or celebrating the sacred mysteries in houses (Nov. 58 and 131). The canonical direction to hold provincial synods twice or at the least once a year is often neglected, and is renewed (Nov. 138). The substance of the enactments contained in these Novels, as well as in the Codez, upon such matters as the election of bishops, celibacy of clergy, permanency of monastic vows, and so forth, will be found under the appropriate heads in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES. The regulations regarding a monastic life have a special interest for the ecclesiastical historian from their being very shortly anterior to the creation of the rule of St. Benedict of Nursia. Benedict was a contemporary of Justinian. [BENEDICTUS OF NURSIA.] [J. B.]

JUSTINIANUS (7) II. (RHINOTMETUS) succeeded his father Constantine Pogonatus in September, A.D. 685 (Anastasius, Vita Joannis V. in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxviii. 875), being then sixteen years of age. The first act of his reign was to renew the existing treaty of peace with the Caliph Abdalmelik, the most important stipulation being the removal of the Mardaites, a warlike tribe of Lebanon, who had formed a bulwark to the empire against Mohammedan invasion (Theophanes, Chron. 301-303 in Migne, Patr. Graec. cviii. 733-737).

Probably early in his reign, the bishop of Coloneia in Pontus denounced to him the Paulician followers of Constantine Silvanus [CONSTANTINUS (6)], who were increasing rapidly in that district. Justinian ordered them to be assembled, and put to the question, and such as obstinately persisted in their heresy to be burnt alive (Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manichaeorum, c. 27 in Patr. Graec. civ. 1281). In A.D. 687 Justinian wrote to pope Conon, announcing that he had found the Acts of the sixth council, and promising always to obey and uphold its decrees (Anastasius, Vita Cononis).

In A.D. 691, at the invitation of Justinian, the Trullan or Quinisext Council met at Constantinople. For an account of its object and proceedings see CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCIL OF (35) in Dict. of Christ. Antiq. When its decrees were sent to pope Sergius he declared he would die rather than accept them. The enraged emperor thereon sent Zacharias, the proto-spatharios, to Rome with orders to seize the pope and to carry him to Constantinople. The army of Ravenna however marched to Rome and prevented Zacharias executing his mission, and he narrowly escaped with his life from their fury (Anastasius, Vita Sergii, 161). In A.D. 694 the Mohammedans invaded Asia Minor, and carried off a great number of prisoners. All these disasters might have occurred without shaking the throne of Justinian had he not alienated the people and ecclesiastics of Constantinople by his oppression. Like his great namesake, he had a passion for building; the Triclinium called after him in the palace and walls surrounding the palace were his work. The eunuch Stephanus the Persian, a cruel and bloodthirsty man, was his minister for these works. Theodotus, a former recluse of Thrace, who had been called from his retirement to the management of the treasury, was in cruelty a worthy colleague of Stephanus. He harassed men of rank and wealth not only among the provincials but the citizens of Constantinople with exactions and confiscations. All these acts of misgovernment increased the popular hatred against Justinian, and he committed the additional imprudence of pulling down the church of the Virgin near the palace in order to erect on the site a fountain and seats for the party of the Veneti, and thereby made himself odious to the patriarch and clergy [CALLINICUS (2)]. In the autumn of the following year (695) came a revolution; Leontius, who had been three years in prison, was suddenly released and sent to take the command in Greece. He was about to embark, and when taking leave of his friends reproached them with the non-fulfilment of their prediction that he would be emperor, and lamented that he would be in hourly expectation of his death-warrant. They promised that their predictions would be fulfilled if he obeyed them. His servants were at once armed, the prison was seized by a stratagem, and the prisoners set free, and a cry was raised throughout the city, "All Christians to Saint Sophia." The patriarch, who had discovered that orders had been given by Justinian for a general massacre, of which he was to be the first victim, came to the assembled multitude and sanctioned their enterprise with the words, "This is the day which the Lord hath made." A rush was made to the hippodrome, where at daybreak Justinian was dragged before the enraged people. His life was spared for his father's sake (Nic. Cp. Patr. in Migne, Patr. Graec. c. 940), but his nose was cut off (whence comes his name of Rhinotmetus), and, according to some accounts, either his tongue or his ears as well, and he was banished to Cherson in the Crimea. His ministers Theodotus and Stephanus were dragged through the streets and finally burnt.

At Cherson he so alarmed the citizens by his boasts that he would one day recover his throne, that they deliberated about putting him to death or delivering him to the emperor. Hearing of their intentions he fled to the Khan of the Chazars, who received him hospitably, and gave him his sister Theodora in marriage; but afterwards had to escape to Terbelis the king of the Bulgarians. Terbelis received him honourably, and collected a mighty host of Bulgarians and Slaves to restore him to his throne.

Towards the end of 705 they marched on Constantinople. Three days were spent in unsuccessful negotiations with the citizens, who replied only by insults; finally Justinian, with a few comrades, succeeded in entering at night by an aqueduct, and made himself master of the city. Never was a victory more cruelly used. Innumerable multitudes of citizens and soldiers were executed in various ways, many being put into sacks and thrown into the sea. Callinicus the patriarch was deposed, blinded, and exiled to Rome. In his place was appointed a recluse of Amastria named Cyrus, who had predicted to Justinian his restoration (Agnellus, Vita S. Felicis in Migne, Patr. Lat. cvi. 701).

Justinian soon after his restoration sent two metropolitans to pope John VII. demanding the return of the tomes containing the canons of the Quinisext council which he had sent in the pontificate of Sergius, asking him to confirm those he approved and to strike out those to which he objected. The pope, however, afraid of giving offence to the terrible emperor, sent back the tomes unaltered (Anastasius, Vita Joannis VII.). In A.D. 708 Justinian violated the peace with the Bulgarians. He was taken by surprise at Anchialus, while the greater part of his army were foraging in the adjoining country. They were routed with great slaughter, and many prisoners and vast booty were taken by the Bulgarians. Justinian with those that escaped held out for three days, and then managed to escape by night to his ships, and returned, covered with disgrace, to Constantinople.

In A.D. 709 he sent a fleet and army under Theodorus, the commander of the troops in Sicily, to Ravenna, whose inhabitants he believed to have been implicated in his deposition. The city was plundered and the chief citizens were seized and taken to Constantinople and put to death there, while Felix the archbishop [FELIX (140)] was blinded and banished to Pontus.

Meanwhile the Arabs renewed their inroads on the eastern frontiers. Their most important success was the capture of Tyana in Cappadocia, after defeating the relieving army with great loss.

In A.D. 710 pope Constantine was summoned to Constantinople to give his submission to the canons of the Quinisext council [CONSTANTINUS I., POPE].

When Justinian had taken such revenge upon the people of Ravenna, it was not likely he would forget that the Chersonites had actually plotted to kill him or deliver him to Apsimar. In A.D. 710 he sent a mighty armament against their city with orders to slay all the inhabitants. The city was taken without resistance; but the result was that the remnant of the Chersonites revolted from Justinian, implored the protection of the Khan of the Chazars, and proclaimed Philippicus Bardanes, who had been banished thither, as emperor. Justinian made a movement which left Constantinople undefended; Philippicus sailed straight there from the Crimea, and took the city without striking a blow. Elias, the spatharius, whose children had been murdered and whose wife had been outraged by Justinian's orders, marched into Asia Minor against him. Justinian's army, after a short parley with Elias, deserted him on being promised an amnesty, and the emperor himself was seized by Elias and beheaded with his own hand. His head was presented to Philippicus, who sent it throughout his western dominions as far as Rome. The date of Justinian's death was the end of A.D. 711. His character in its conjunction of impetuous energy and ruthless cruelty strikingly resembles that of his grandfather Constans. [F. D.]

JUSTINUS (1), traditional first bishop of Sipontum (Siponto), said to have been ordained bishop of that city by the apostle Peter, A.D. 44, and to have lived till A.D. 111. A presbyter of Sipontum, of the same name, appears to have suffered martyrdom under Maximian, and there may be some confusion between the two. (Sar-nelli, Vescovi Sipontini, p. 16; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vii. 1106; Cappelletti, xx. 578.) [R. S. G.]

JUSTINUS (2) MARTYR, ST., son of Priscus, grandson of Bacchius; born at Flavia Neapolis (a town named after the emperor Flavius Vespasian, built hard by the ruins of the ancient Sychem [Eusebius, Onomast.], and now known as Nablous), in Syrian Palestine (Apol. 1).

He calls himself a Samaritan (Dialog. ch. 120, § 349, c, "my race, the Samaritans I mean"), so that his family had, probably, settled there definitely; but he is, obviously, not a Samaritan in the strict sense, either by blood or by religion; nothing in his writing would point to such an origin; he has not heard, even, of Moses or of the Prophets, until well on in life; he classes himself among those Gentiles to whom the Gospel was opened so largely when the main mass (Apol. i. 53, § 88, B) of the house of Jacob, in which he includes by name the Samaritans as well as the Jews, rejected it. He speaks of being brought up in heathen customs, of his being uncircumcised (Dialog. ch. 29, § 246, c), of his having received a thoroughly Greek education (Dialog. ch. 2, § 219). The name of his grandfather is Greek, of his father, and of himself, Latin; little can be got from them to shew his actual race. He is content to call himself a Samaritan, and we cannot do otherwise.

What we know of his life is gathered, almost entirely, from his own writings, and chiefly from his famous description of the studies through which he passed to his conversion, given in the beginning of his Dialogue with the Jew Tryphon. The opening of the Dialogue discovers Justin walking in the covered colonnades of a city, which Eusebius identifies with Ephesus (H. E. iv. 18), at a time shortly after the wars of the Romans against Bar-cochba in 132-136 (Dialog. ch. 1, § 217). To the Jew, who salutes him as a philosopher with whom he is anxious to converse, he recounts the story of his philosophic experiences, though we gain but little clue as to where, or at what time, these experiences occurred. He speaks of the days when he first felt the longing to share in that wisdom "which is, verily, the highest possession, the most valued by God, to whom it, alone, leads and unites us; for those are indeed holy who have applied their mind to philosophy." "With this hope in my heart, I gave myself, first, to a Stoic teacher; but when, after staying some time in his school, I got nothing told me about God (for my teacher himself knew nothing, and professed that such knowledge was unnecessary), I left him, and went to another, a Peripatetic, who thought himself a clever fellow. He kept me with him for the first few days, and then asked me to fix a salary for him, in order that our intercourse together might be profitable to both; at which I left him, not thinking him to be a genuine philosopher at all. But my soul was still bursting with a passionate desire to hear the sweet and excellent secret of philosophy, and so I went to a famous Pythagorean, a man who made much of his wisdom; and, as I talked with him, and expressed my desire to become his pupil and follower, he suddenly said, 'No doubt, then, you have already studied music, and astronomy, and geometry; for you surely do not fancy that you can gaze upon the truths which condition a happy life without having first learnt those lessons which draw the soul round from things of sense, and fit it for the world of spirit, so that it may be able to see the Beautiful, and the Good.' Much he said in praise of these studies, speaking of them as entirely essential, and so sent me away; for indeed I had to confess to him that I knew nothing of them. I was much grieved at this failure of my hopes, and all the more because I could not help thinking that he was a man who knew something; but then, when I thought of all the time that I should be taking over those studies, I could not endure the long delay, and so, in my difficulty, I thought of trying the Platonics, for their fame stood high. I went, for this, chiefly to a man who had lately settled in our town, an intelligent man, who was thought highly of by his school, and I advanced some way with him, and gave up the greater part of every day to it; and I was delighted with the perception of the Incorporeal, and the contemplation of the Ideas gave wings to my mind, and quickly I thought to become wise, and expected that, if it were not for my dull sight, I should be, in a moment, looking upon God; for this sight is the fulfilment of the Platonic philosophy.

"It was while I was in this frame of mind that one day I had a wish for quiet meditation, away from the beaten track of men, and so went to a bit of ground not far from the sea; and there, just as I was nearing the place where I looked to be alone with my thoughts, an old man, of a pleasant countenance, and with a gentle and dignified mien, came following me a little behind. I turned upon him, and stood still, with my eyes fixed closely on him, at which he said, 'Do you know me?'

"I denied it.

"Why, then, do you look at me so narrowly?" he said.

"Because I am surprised to find you here, in a place where I did not expect to see any one."

"I have been anxious about some of my people," he said; "they are away from home, and so I am come to see whether there is any chance of their appearing back again. But you, for what are you come here?"

"I delight," I answered, "in these strolls, in which I can hold converse with myself, without interruption; a place like this is most favourable for such talking as I love."

"Ah, you are a lover of talk, and not of action, or of reality," he said. "You are one, I suppose, who cares more for reasons than for facts, for words than for deeds."

"And how, indeed," I answered, "can a man act more efficiently than in exhibiting the reason that governs all, or than in laying hold of it, and there, borne aloft on it, looking down on others who stray helplessly below, and do nothing sane, or dear to God. Without philosophy and right reason, there is no possible wisdom. Every man, therefore, ought to esteem philosophy as his noblest work, and to let all else come second or third to it; for, by philosophy, things are made right and acceptable, without it, they become common, and vulgar."

"Philosophy, then, is the true cause of happiness, is it?" he asked in reply.

"Yes, indeed, it is," I said, "it and it alone."

A discussion follows on the possibility of philosophy giving the true knowledge of God, which is Happiness; at the close of which Justin confesses that his philosophy supplies no clear account of the soul, nor of its capacity to perceive the Divine, nor of the character of its life; the old man speaks with a decision that he professes to owe neither to Plato nor to Pythagoras, who are the bulwarks of philosophy; what teacher is there who can give certainty where such as these fail?

So Justin asks; and the old man replies that there have been men, far older than all these philosophers, men blessed and upright and beloved of God, who spoke by the spirit of God, and are called Prophets. These alone have seen the truth, and spoken it to men; not as reasoners who argue it out, for they go higher than all argument, but as witnesses of the truth, who are worthy to be believed, since the events which they foretold have indeed come to pass, and so compel us to rely on their words, as also the wonders which they have worked to the honour and glory of God the Father, and of His Christ. "Pray thou, then, that the gates of the Light may be opened too for thee; for these things can only be seen and known by those to whom God and His Christ have given understanding."

The old man departed, and Justin saw him no more; but in his soul the flame was fired, and a passion of love arose in him for these prophets, the friends of Christ; and as he turned it over in his breast, he found that here indeed lay the one and only sure and worthy philosophy. After this fashion, then, he won his title of philosopher.

This is all the account we have of his education and conversion. The scene with the old man is, perhaps, idealised; it has a savour of Plato; but the imagination of Justin was hardly equal to producing, unaided, such vivid detail of scenery and character. The description would imply that he was somewhat advanced in study, but still not past the enthusiasms of earlier life. The event, apparently, occurs in Flavia Neapolis, i.e. "OUR town," in which the Platonist teacher had settled; but "our town" may mean the town in which he and Tryphon were conversing, i.e., according to Eusebius, Ephesus. It must have happened before the Bar-cochba wars, if it is they from which Tryphon was flying when Justin met him. The conversion itself takes the form of a passage from the imperfect to the perfect philosophy; and throughout his life he retains the impress of such a conversion. He is not rescued from intellectual despair, rather he is in the highest condition of confidence at the moment when the old man meets him. The aim with which he started on his studies does not fail him; it is it which he achieves in becoming a Christian. Hence he is not thrown into an attitude of antagonism to that which he leaves; his new faith does not break with the old, so much as fulfil it. He still, therefore, calls himself the philosopher, still invites men to enter his school, still wears the philosopher's cloak (Dialog. i. § 217; Euseb. H. E. iv. 11; cf. the Acts of Justin). From the first, philosophy had been pursued with the religious aim of attaining the highest spiritual happiness by communing with God; the certified knowledge of God, therefore, professed by the prophets, and made manifest in Christ, comes to him as the crown of his existing aspiration.

One other motive he records to have affected his conversion, i.e. his wondering admiration at the steadfastness of Christians under persecution. "When I was still attached to the doctrine of Plato," he says (Apol. ii. 12, § 50, A), "and used to hear the accusations which were hurled against Christians, and yet saw them perfectly fearless in the face of death, and of all that is terrible, I understood that it was impossible that they should be living all the time a life of wickedness and lust." This appeal, which the moral steadfastness of the Christians had made upon him, he continually brings to bear upon others in his Apologies (Apol. i. 8, § 57; Apol. i. 11, § 58, E, &c.).

Perhaps, too, the lack of moral reality and energy, in the doctrines of philosophy, was not unfelt by Justin, for his words seem sometimes to recall the old man's taunt, "You are a man of words, and not of deeds" (cf. Apol. i. 14, § 61, E, "For Christ was no Sophist, but His word was the power of God").

We have no details on the life that followed his baptism. He seems to have come to Rome, and, perhaps, to have stayed there some time, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 11). His peculiar office was to bring forward the Christian apologetic into the publicity of active controversy in the schools. The collision with Tryphon in the Colonnades is probably but a specimen of the intellectual intercourse which Justin challenged by wearing the philosopher's cloak. The introduction to the Dialogue appears to record a familiar habit. The Second Apology mentions a dispute that had taken place with Crescens the Cynic (Apol. ii. 3, § 43, B, C). So, too, the memory passed vividly down to Eusebius, of Justin's characteristic attitude. "It was then," he writes, "that St. Justin flourished, who, under the dress of a philosopher, preached the word of God, and defended the truth of our faith by his writings as well as by his words." So again, the acts of his martyrdom speak of him as sitting in the house of Martinus, a recognised place of meeting for Christians, and there conversing with any who visited him, imparting to them the true doctrine. The persons condemned with him are companions of his, whom he has gathered about him, and so converted. "I took delight," says one of them, Evelpistus, "in listening to Justin's discourse."

When persecution fell sharply upon the church, he was in the van of those who considered it their first duty to make public to their judges the doctrine and life so foully accused. "Every sane man," he writes, "will pronounce this to be the honourable and only right requirement, i.e. that the subject should make clear the principles of their life and doctrine, and that the rulers should then be guided by perfect knowledge in deciding the case." "It is our business," he repeats, "to offer to all men the opportunity of examining our life and teaching, so that we may not be ourselves responsible, instead of those who are given to ignoring our affairs, for the punishment due to that which they blindly commit" (Apol. i. 3, § 54).

So, in the Dialogue with Tryphon, he speaks of the guilt that he will incur before the judgment seat of Christ if he do not freely and ungrudgingly open to them his knowledge of the meaning of Scripture (Dialog. ch. 58, § 280, B); and, again, he says: "We struggle to dissuade you from being led astray by the slanders spread against us by the evil demons, because we know that every man who can tell the truth, and tells it not, shall be judged of God: as God has borne witness by Ezechiel, saying, 'I have set thee as a watchman to the house of Judah. If a sinner sin, and thou dost not bear witness against him, he shall die in his sin, but of thee will I require his blood'" (Dialog. ch. 82, § 308, E). Such was the rigorous urgency which impelled Justin to do his utmost to bring his faith forward into the daylight. He held himself responsible for any ignorance in others which it was possible for him to remove. He brought into Christianity something of that Platonic enthusiasm which made the philosopher a holy and responsible missionary, whose sacred duty it was to let all men receive the truth in his possession without money and without price. Of what importance such a temper would be in the service of the church, we can guess from the constant taunt of the heathen against the Christians for their timid and suspicious secrecy—"Silent before others, they chatter under their breath in dark corners of the streets, to each other."

It is this freedom of apologetic which crowned itself towards the close of Justin's life in the three works of his which alone can be accepted as undoubtedly authentic: the two Apologies and the Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew. It is this same freedom which brought him to his death. It will be well, before discussing the works, to complete his life by recording such facts as we know about his death.

The secret cause of his seizure is supposed by Eusebius to have been the enmity of an opponent whom he had convicted of ignorance, Crescens the Cynic. "Crescens," Tatian writes, "who made himself a nest in Rome, while professing to despise death, proved his fear of it by scheming to bring Justin and myself to death as to an evil thing" (Oratio, c. 32; cf. Eusebius, H. E. iv. 16). Tatian does not assert that Crescens succeeded; but, if he implies it, then we have an ominous foreshadowing of the reality in the Second Apology. "Certainly, for myself, I expect to be taken in the plots of some such a one as I have named" (i.e. a relation, or a neighbour, or friend, who bears some grudge against him); "or anyhow of Crescens, that lover of noise (φιλολόβου) and display . . . whom I have convicted of possessing no real knowledge of our affairs . . . though he publicly declares that he knows us to be atheists and impious" (Apol. ii. 3, § 47). For the reality of his violent death for the cause of Christ, we have the indubitable testimony of his historic title, Justin Martyr. For the actual account of it, we are dependent on the Acts of his Martyrdom, which embody, probably without serious change, the simple and forcible tradition which the 3rd century retained of the death-scene. They have the appearance of containing genuine matter. According to these, he and his companions are brought before Rusticus, the prefect of the city, and are simply commanded to sacrifice to the gods, without any mention of Crescens, or of Justin's Apologies to the emperors. Justin, on examination, professes to have found the final truth in Christianity, after exploring all other systems; this truth, he declares, consists in adoring the one God, who has made all things, visible and invisible, and in adoring Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was foretold by the prophets to be coming into the world to preach salvation and teach good doctrine.

He declares that Christians meet wherever they choose or can, seeing that their God is not limited to this or that place, but fills heaven and earth; but he confesses that he himself, on this, his second, visit to Rome, holds meetings for his followers in the house of one Martinus, near the baths of Timotinus, there and there only. After a brave refusal to sacrifice, and an assurance of his certainty of salvation in Christ, he and those with him are condemned to be beaten with rods and beheaded. They pass out to their death, praising God, and confessing their Saviour; the faithful secretly carry off their bodies to a fit burial.

To answer this, we have (1) the internal evidence of the writings, and (2) the external traditions, chiefly of Eusebius, partially of Epiphanius, Tatian, &c. The internal evidence seems to be the most positive; we will, therefore, start with it, and test it by the traditions.

Taking the First Apology, what do we get?

The title is decisive; it is addressed to the "Emperor Titus Aelius Antoninus Pius, Augustus, Caesar; to Verissimus his son, philosopher, and to Lucius, the natural son of a philosophic Caesar, the adopted son of a pious Caesar." (So the latter part runs, if the reading in Eusebius, and several MSS., of φιλοσόφου for φιλοσόφου, be taken, it being almost impossible to call Lucius himself "a philosopher," while it seems just possible to give his father Aelius Verus the name.) Here we are clear; we have Antoninus Pius, as sole emperor, with his two imperial companions, adopted by him as sons at the request of Hadrian, i.e. Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus (cf. Neander, Ch. Hist. (Transl.) vol. ii. 446, 1851). With this Eusebian tradition agrees; according to it, the first Apology was addressed to Antoninus; in the Chronicon, it is definitely assigned to about the year 141 A.D., the fourth of that reign. Antoninus reigned from 137 A.D. to 161 A.D.; will 141 suit Justin's language?

According to some, even this is not early enough, for the title omits to salute Aurelius as Caesar, which he became publicly in 140 A.D. Against this lie several weighty objections. (1) Lucius Verus is called, possibly philosopher, certainly "ἐραστής παιδείας," lover of culture; but by 140 he is only ten years old. (2) Marcion is spoken of in the Apology as the greatest type of heresy, "with a following spread over every race of men," but Marcion, according to Irenaeus, &c., was a follower of Cerdon, who, with Valentinus, came to Rome and taught under the popeship of Hyginus, according to Eusebius and the Chronicles, between 139 and 142. Justin's language, omitting Valentinus, seems to belong to a time when Marcion's pre-eminence had overshadowed the earlier heretics (cf. Lipsius, Die Quellen der Ketzergeschichte, 1875, pp. 21, 22), and this could hardly be till well after 140.

Marcion may have begun his teaching before, but it is under Antoninus (according to general authority, cf. Tertullian, Clement, &c.), that he succeeds in putting himself in the front, and arrives at Rome. Yet, already before the Apology, Justin has written a book against him, with other heretics (Apol. i. 26, § 70, c). The dates of the popes may be uncertain, but it is nevertheless difficult to attribute to Marcion this immense position in the very first years of Antoninus (cf. contra, Semisch, Justin, p. 73. 1840).

(3) Justin professes to be writing 150 years after our Lord's birth, a round number, it is true, but in a context where the object is to diminish the interval, and therefore not likely to exceed it so largely for the mere sake of a round number. Without very positive evidence against it, the year 148—i.e. Justin's 150 A.D.—should be taken as the approximate date.

And the evidence is not quite positive, for a conjectural correction of Justin's title transposes the καί from after, to before, the καίσαρι, which closes the titles given to Antoninus; it is awkward to close with the lower name; it is more natural to suppose the καίσαρι to begin the address to Aurelius, in antithesis to the αὐτοκράτωρ given to Antoninus. If so, Aurelius is called Caesar; and, then, the date is later than 140 (Ritter, Volkmar; cf. contra, Semisch, Just. p. 67, 1840). This seems confirmed by the constant references to the co-ordinate philosophy and piety of the rulers, which incline us strongly to believe Aurelius to be sharing, actually, even if not yet officially, the power with Antoninus; officially, this was not made a fact until 147-8. This is more remarkably true of the second Apology, the pronounced language of which induces Volkmar to believe Aurelius to be already an official colleague of Antoninus. (Cf. Apol. i. 2, § 53, c; i. 12, § 59, d; Apol. ii. 2, 43, b; cf. Volkmar, Theolog. Jahrb. von Baur und Zeller, 14 N. 1855.) On the other hand, both Apologies limit markedly the title αὐτοκράτωρ to a single name, Antoninus Pius. (Cf. Apol. i. 1, § 53; Apol. ii. 2, § 42, c, § 43, b. Cf. Forschungen: T. Zahn, 1 part, p. 279.)

These reasons, apparently, tend to placing the first Apology somewhere near the end of the first half of the reign of Antoninus. This would not conflict with two other references to times. (1) That to the deification of Antoninus, i.e. 131 (Apol. i. 29, § 72), and that to the wars of Bar-cochba, 132, 136 (Apol. i. 31, § 72). Both have the same formula: τῶ νῦν γεγενημένῳ πολέμῳ and Ἀντιόχου τοῦ νῦν γεγενημένου. The expression is vague, but, we suppose, requires that these two events should be well within the memories of Justin's readers.

What of the second Apology?

Here, the address has at last, after many confusions, been determined to refer to Antoninus again, and Marcus Aurelius. This address is indirect; it is found in 2, § 42, c, where a single emperor is definitely meant, and in the last chapter, where the rulers are spoken of in the plural; and in 2, § 43, b, it is found that there are two people in office, Pius the αὐτοκράτωρ, and a philosopher, who is saluted as son of Caesar; and continued reference is made to the mingled piety and philosophy of these personages. These two, with the well-known titles, can hardly be other than Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. This is made almost a certainty when we consider that the second Apology seems to have followed close at the heels of the first; it is true that it stands separate, making a new start, going over the ground in its own way; but it bears all the mark of a sequel or appendix to the first. (Cf. Volkmar, in Theolog. Jahrb. 1855, N. 14; cf. Hort, in Journal of Classic and Sacred Philol. vol. iii. p. 155, 1857, of which much use is made in the article.) This is clear, among other things, from the references made in the second to the first Apology (cf. Apol. ii. 4, § 43; Apol. ii. 6, § 45; ii. 8, § 46), as to a writing close at hand and freshly remembered.

The only internal difficulty is the expression καίσαρος παῖδι, attached to this philosopher; Aurelius was not a Caesar's son; but it is suggested (see Hort, l. c.) from a reading traced in a Codex C of Eusebius, that an "οὐδέ" has been omitted between φιλοσόφῳ and καίσαρος, and that thus Lucius Verus, son of that Aelius Verus whose only fame it was to have been first called merely "Caesar" (Spartian. Ael. V. Vita), is intended by this latter name; so that the three of the first Apology are all repeated here. All other hypotheses seem loaded with difficulty, since they compel us, (1) either to call Marcus Aurelius by the name of "Pius," which is utterly unprecedented; or (2) Lucius by the name of Philosopher, which is profoundly meaningless. The main argument against this placing of the second Apology in the days of Antoninus is the statement of Eusebius, that Justin died in the days of Marcus Aurelius, to whom he wrote his second Apology (Eusebius, iv. 15, 18). This is repeated by Jerome. But Eusebius is very indistinct in his Chronicon about this subject, where he seems to place Justin's day earlier, and to be vague about the year of his death, referring to it under the account of the year 156. He himself places the first Apology in 141, yet the second must follow pretty soon after the first. He does not appear to possess other evidence than the writings in our hands. He is contradicted by another line of tradition, represented by Epiphanius, Cedrenus, Glycas. Above all, the title "Pius" used in the Apology is inexplicable on this supposition. It appears impossible to escape from this difficulty by supposing Eusebius to refer to a lost Apology, as was suggested by Scaliger, followed by Donaldson (Crit. Hist. of Ch. Lit. vol. ii. 1866, pp. 62-344). Eusebius definitely quotes our second Apology as the one in which Justin foretells his own death; it is to it that he refers when he speaks of the book presented to Aurelius.

But if it be accepted that the second Apology is addressed to Antoninus, and, probably, follows the first by no long interval, is it yet clear under which emperor Justin died? For the death under Antoninus it may be said (1) that Justin writes as if he expected the malice of Crescens to win its aim shortly; and that, according to Tatian, as interpreted by Eusebius, Justin did perish by the intrigues of Crescens (Apol. ii. 3; Tatian. Or. ad Graecos, 19); (2) that Epiphanius, by laying in 149-150 the rise of Tatian's heretical school, must have supposed Justin to be then dead; (3) that an independent tradition, possibly Alexandrian, represented by Cedrenus, places his death under Antoninus (cf. Hort, l. c.). But against this it is urged (1) that Epiphanius is helplessly wrong in assigning Justin's martyrdom to the days of Hadrian, and that this cannot but cause distrust of his date for Tatian; (2) that the Dialogue with Tryphon followed certainly the first Apology, and, if the first is quite close to the second, then the second also; that it refers to the peril of threatened death as vivid, but yet as passed (Dialog. 120, § 349), so that Crescens must have been baffled for the time, and an interval allowed sufficient for the production of a work of this size; (3) that the Acts of Justin report the name of Rusticus prefect of the city as the executing magistrate; that there is no reason to doubt this; and that there is no Rusticus prefect about this time except the famous tutor of M. Aurelius, made consul for the second time, apparently, in 161, prefect in 163 (cf. Borghesi, Œuvres Complètes, viii. p. 549). There seems no way of escaping this, except by doubting that it was a prefect that condemned him, a doubt which has every probability against it.

How, then, about Lollius Urbicus, the magistrate attacked in the second Apology? This famous man had been already in high command against Bar-cochba in 133, had been legate to South Germany, and then to Britain before 141; and a stone still records the raising of a wall which he undertook, according to Capitolinus, between the Clyde and the Forth, which was finished by 145 (cf. Mommsen in Hort, l. c.; Volkmar, l. c.; Aubé, St. Justin, p. 69). When he became prefect is uncertain; it might come soon after his return from these high offices; it anyhow preceded the date of the Apology of Aquileius, which is supposed to have been written about 156, and refers to it (cf. Apol. 274). Borghesi believes it to have continued until shortly before the death of Antoninus, i. e. until about 158-159, when he was succeeded by Salvius Julianus, who held office until the end of 162, when Rusticus followed (Borghesi, Œuvres Comp. viii. 549; Tillemont, Hist. Ecclés. (1701) ii. 327, on St. Felicitas; cf. Spartian, Did. Jul. c. 1; Ulpian, Digest. xxxvii. xiv. 17). The prefecture of Urbicus, then, allows for any date for the second Apology from about 145 down to the closing years of Antoninus. But if so, then it appears unlikely that Justin's martyrdom followed closely on his second Apology, for tradition would have no reason to change the name of the prefect if it had been the very man whom Justin had so publicly and prophetically challenged in the Apology. The change of name, surely, suggests that it was not under Urbicus that he suffered, but if not under Urbicus, then we are apparently carried down to the very last year of Antoninus, and there remains no reason for not at once attributing the martyrdom to the days of the great Rusticus in or after 163, following, if so, very closely the death of St. Felicitas under Salvius Julianus in 162. The only difficulty is that of supposing ten years or more to intervene between the Apology and the martyrdom; but this is not so impossible when we know that in this interval we are bound to insert his largest work, the Dialogue; and again when we remember that the intimate connection between Crescens of the second Apology and the death of Justin is quite conjectural; that the words of Tatian allow for a failure of the intrigue quite as much as a success, and that the Acts make no mention of Crescens at all. It seems more natural then to suppose that the danger from Crescens passed, and that an entirely new crisis brought about the death. (Cf. Volkmar, Theol. J. Jan. 1855. Cf. also Th. Zahn, Forschungen, 1 part, p. 277.)

There we must leave the question; the date of the Apologies is more important than the date of the martyrdom, and we have seen some reason to throw them back as far in the reign of Antoninus as is consistent with the prominence attributed to Marcion.

Of the date of Justin's birth, we have nothing certain. By Epiphanius he is stated to have been thirty years old at the date of his death. It is impossible to know what traditional authority this represents. The question seems outside all criticism. The evidence is not forthcoming. Only it may be noticed that there is no sign of great age in Justin's writings; they have still the impetus of strong life about them. He is in full intellectual vigour, we should gather, at the moment of his martyrdom. For the date of his conversion we have hardly a fragment of evidence beyond the fact already referred to, that it must be placed before the wars of Bar-cochba, 132-136 (Dialog. i. 1, § 217). Eusebius supposes him to have been still unconverted at the date of Antinous, A.D. 131 (Hist. iv. 8), but it is a question whether Eusebius has any evidence for this except Apol. i. 29, § 72, which certainly does not involve it.

The genuineness of the three writings already mentioned is universally accepted. The first Apology most definitely pronounces itself to be Justin's; the second obviously belongs to the first; the Dialogue claims to be written by a Samaritan, who had addressed the emperor; its personal history of the writer exactly tallies with his attitude towards philosophy in the Apologies. The peculiar phrase ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν Ἀποστόλων occurs in these three works, and in them alone. The whole tone of the three works agrees with the period assigned to them. The external evidence gathered up in Eusebius is strong and unbroken (cf. Euseb. iv. 18).

But it is otherwise with a mass of writing attributed by tradition to Justin. Here there are difficulties of varying force. (1) We have an Oratio ad Græcos; is this the Λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας spoken of as Justin's by Eusebius (Hist. iv. 18)? It does not deal with the problem attributed to it by Eusebius, i.e. the main mass of philosophical questions and the nature of demons. On the contrary, it is concerned with the immorality of heathen religion; it is short, not long, as Eusebius says, yet it does not shew signs of mutilation. There remains, therefore, no external evidence for it at all, while Eusebius's account would lead us to believe that the real speech was lost, for we have nothing answering to his description. Internally, it offers no conclusive evidence against itself, though it is written with more art than is usual with Justin. Grabe supposes it very doubtful, or much mutilated; Maranus thinks it Justin's, but not identical with the Λόγος mentioned in Eusebius. Semler, Möhler, later critics, doubt its genuineness. Otto, in his De Scriptis J. M., supports it.

(2) A Λόγος παραινετικός πρὸς Ἕλληνας, or Cohortatio ad Græcos, supposed to be the same with the Ἐλεγχος, mentioned by Eusebius, followed by Jerome, on the ground that its appeal lies in its attack; it is quoted by St. John Damascene. In this Cohortatio some differences have been noted from the acknowledged works of Justin. The author does not seem to be so thoroughly acquainted with the heathen philosophies. He attributes the origin of Polytheism to men's mistaken traditions rather than to definite impulses of evil spirits. He does not speak much of the Λόγος (cf. Kaye, Justin M. p. 6; and also Donaldson, Critic. Hist. of Ch. Lit. vol. ii. the Apologies). He says nothing of the germinal Word. He is far more negative to the Gentile philosophy than in the Apologies. The style, again, is more polished and artistic. The defence of it against these criticisms will be found in Otto, de Scriptis J. M. They might, possibly, be withstood, if there was strong counter external evidence; but this is wanting. We have only the notice by Eusebius of a book with another title. We have no positive evidence to this being that book.

(3) A fragment, περὶ Ἀναστάσεως, is quoted as Justin's by St. John Damascene. No book is attributed to Justin with this title by other writers, but it is argued by Grabe, &c., that it is part of the great work against all the heresies, since it is itself extremely polemical. Here, again, we are in this case—that if it is genuine the only external evidence for it does not refer to it correctly, and the evidence itself is extremely late. It is impossible to rest on such testimony as this, and this being so, internal difficulties are of weight. It is disallowed, therefore, by much later criticism. Its defence may be found in Otto, de Scriptis.

(4) A book, περὶ Μοναρχίας, mentioned by Eusebius as exhibiting the unique supremacy of God, from Christian as well as from Greek books (Hist. iv. 18), of which we are supposed to possess the latter half, in which the Gentile evidence for the authority of God is brought forward. But there seems to be no reason to suppose the work a fragment (cf. Donaldson, l. c.). The genuineness has been under discussion since it was doubted by Petavius, &c.; as it stands, it certainly does not correspond with the work recorded by Eusebius. The points in its favour may be found in Otto, de Scriptis, especially the note, p. 51, where the analogies with Justin's thinking are noted. Altogether, we have no positive evidence to depend upon. (Cf. on all this, Semisch, J. M. p. 163-167, 1840.)

These works may be classified as very doubtful; others are decidedly ungenueine.

(1) The ἀνατροπή δογμάτων τινῶν Ἀριστοτελικῶν, which hardly any one defends.

(2) The Ἀποκρίσεις πρὸς Ὀρθοδόξους, with its cognate Ἐρωτήσεις Χριστιανικαὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἕλληνας, and Ἐρωτήσεις Ἑλληνικαὶ πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς. In these Irenæus, Origen, the Manichees are referred to. Christianity is already paramount, &c.

(3) The letter to Diognetus, formerly attributed to him, has nothing of his style or character about it.

(4) The letter to Zenas and Serenus.

(5) The ἐκθεσις τῆς ὀρθῆς πίστεως, a work later than Nicaea.

Several works of Justin have been entirely lost:

(1) The book against all the heresies, to which he refers in Apol. i. 26, § 70.

(2) The book against Marcion, referred to by Irenaeus (iv. contra Her. c. 14; cf. v. 26), supposed by some to be part of the large work mentioned above.

(3) A book called Ψάλης, and another περὶ ψυχῆς, in which he contrasts his own doctrine with that of the Greek philosophers (Euseb. Hist. iv. 18).

"Many other works of his," says Eusebius, "are in the hands of the brethren." Evidently, however little we hold in our hands, he must have written a great deal, and the three undoubted works still in our possession will perhaps account for this voluminous character of his writings. For these three pieces are written loosely and unsystematically, and read like the outpouring of a mind that had ranged widely in its studies of heathen literature and philosophy, and had massed a large store of general knowledge, which could be easily and effectively brought to bear upon the subject that was astir, without any scrupulous regard to the artistic or symmetrical appearance of the result produced. The writer is frank, open, confident, with a generous optimism that prompts him to pour out freely his convictions, and his reasons for conviction, as if he could not but believe that men would agree with him, if only he could exhibit to them the arguments which had such force and clearness to him himself. His intellectual powers were not of that delicacy and subtlety which would make them critically conscious of their own use and work; they were not dialectic, so much as discursive; they were, therefore, unhampered, free to be at the service of his moral persuasions, acting under the spur of the higher impulse, with large and abundant vigour. There is no apparent return of the intellect upon its own handiwork, to perfect, or complete, or polish it; no intellectual anxiety, or severity, or discontent. He seldom, one would fancy, looks back, seldom forward, as he writes; there is but little care for a more elaborate rhetoric than such as comes spontaneously from the natural fervour of the writer; there is no foresight of an artistic climax; no sign of afterwork spent on improving an eloquent passage. Everything appears to be used as it comes to hand, without any rigidity of method, or exactness of plan. It is true that the two Apologies must have been written under the pressure of immediate need; the second, especially in its abrupt opening, bears the traces of the sudden excitement under the stress of which it was produced; but, on the other hand, there would be every possible reason for making the appeal for Christianity rhetorically effective and brilliant. The emperors are addressed throughout in the name of culture and philosophy. There is an urgent desire to exhibit the faith, as a system of thought deserving the attention of the highest and most cultivated minds. And when we turn to the Dialogue, which, however much it may represent an original conversation casually begun and accidentally protracted, was yet composed long after the event, probably, and in the quiet of leisurely reflection, we meet with the same looseness of treatment, the same disregard of careful finish. It is true that the opening of the Dialogue offers the one exception to this; the description of the search for truth with its close by the solitary shore, and under the visionary influence of the old and unknown stranger, is powerfully worked with a pleasant relief of light and shade, and a graceful tender dignity. Some touch of his old master, Plato, seems to have moved him for a moment, to endeavour, with success, after a more delicate and picturesque perfection than is usual with him; but the rest of the work almost entirely abandons the effort with which it began. Very little is done to sustain the play and animation of a dialogue. There is very little definite order in the argument. Each point is taken just as it occurs. There is less unity in the whole than in the Apologies themselves. The discussion of a multitude of texts, one following another, in which the force of the argument all turns, necessarily prohibits any artistic grace.

Yet, with all this lack of literary perfection or of strong speculative originality, Justin's writing, especially in the first Apology, is full of direct and striking force; it moves easily and pleasingly; his thinking is fresh, healthy, vigorous, and to the point; his wide knowledge is used with practical skill; his whole tone and character are immensely attractive by their genuineness, their simplicity, their generous high-mindedness, their frank and confident energy.

He himself denies the claim of eloquence (Dialog. c. 58): "I am not anxious to exhibit an array of words merely remarkable for its skill, for indeed for this I have not the capacity," though Tryphon courteously doubts this profession of inability. A careful examination of Justin's style is given in Otto's prolegomena to his edition (vol. i. lxi.). He notices that Justin seldom abandons the diction of common life; that the order of his sentences is often hampered; that the structure of his pronouncements often weak and intricate, his phrases and words not carefully selected. He notices for long digressions, Dialog. c. 30-40, c. 63-66, c. 79-83, &c.; for needless additions, Apol. i. 27-29, c. 43-44, Apol. ii. c. 3-9; for repetitions, cf. Apol. i. 4, § 55, c, with 7, § 56, d, c. 6, § 56, b, c, with 13, § 60, c, d, Dialog. 33, § 250, d, e, with c. 83, § 309, d, c, &c. For imperfect sentences: Dialog. c. 56. For unusual expressions, Dialog. c. 2, αἰρεῖ με ἡ νόησις; c. 131, ἀναριθμῶσι εἰπεῖν; Dialog. 114, ὑδωρ βρυνούσης ταῖς καρδίαις; Apol. i. 53, ἐμφορέω πειθῶ καὶ πίστιν τινί; Apol. i. 44, μέλον ἐστὶ γὰρ μέλει, &c. He continually uses shortened phrases, cf. Apol. ii. 13, οὐχ ὅτι ἀλλοτρία ἐστὶ τὰ Πλάτωνος διδγματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, &c. He leaves words to be supplied; he varies his use of the same words; he changes the grammatical construction as he writes.

Otto notices as characteristic, the accumulation of words of like signification; cf. Apol. i. 12, ἀγωγὸν καὶ σύμμαχον; c. 14, δούλοι καὶ ὑπρέται, &c.

For words of rare use, Otto mentions Dialog. c. 80, δ αἰρεσιώτης; c. 117, ἀμαξόβιος; c. 62, ἀναμφιλέκτως; Apol. i. 2, ἀνθρωπαρέσκεια; c. 27, ἀρρητοποιός; c. 55, βανασουργός; Apol. i. 33, 35, θεοφοροῦμαι; Apol. i. 18, ὄνειροπομπός; c. 9, μορφοποιεῖω; Apol. i. 61, προμαρτάνω; c. 44, προγνώστης; Dialog. 79, 89, ἐνδοτικός; c. 35, ἐπιλήψιμος; c. 120, καρπογονεῖω; c. 56, κυριολογεῖω; c. 20, νεκριμαῖος; c. 122, περιπτολογεῖω; c. 118, 123, φιλεριστέω, &c.; Apol. ii. 2, ἐκδυσωπέω; c. 13, παμμάχως; c. 6, φαρμακευτής, &c.

For words quite peculiar to Justin: Apol. i. 39, ἀλληλοφόνται; c. 46, ἀλογισταίνω; c. 49, βραχυπέδω; c. 18, δαιμονοβλήπτος; c. 19, εἰκονοποιέω, ἐπόπτευσις; c. 45, προαγγελτικός; c. 56, συνεπιγνώμων; Apol. ii. 11, ἐρωστοποιέω; c. 3, φιλόσοφος; Dial. 14, ἄζυμοφαγία; c. 53, ἀσαγής; c. 139, διακατάσχεσις; c. 44, 46, 47, δικαιοπραξία; c. 135, ἐπέεσσις; c. 134, θεϊδής; c. 49, λαοηγησία; c. 119, ὁμοίπιστος; c. 118, περικεκομμένως; c. 107, σακκοφορέω; c. 131, προανιστορέω; c. 94, σικοφανητός; c. 53, ὑποσαγής; c. 64, 67, φιλέριστοι; c. 85, ψηφιστικός.

The first Apology, called ἡ δευτέρα in two principal MSS. A, B; but, evidently, in spite of one adverse reference (Hist. iv. 17), known as the first to Eusebius (Hist. ii. 13, iv. 18), and referred to as the first, by the second, is composed with much more care and completeness than the second. It is addressed (as has been mentioned) to the emperor Antoninus Pius, to Verissimus, his son, the philosopher, and to Lucius, the natural son of a philosophic (if this reading, the most pointed and effective, may be trusted), the adopted son of a pious, Caesar, and together with them, to the sacred senate, and the whole people of the Romans. Antoninus had been adopted by Hadrian, on the condition of himself adopting Marcus Aurelius Verissimus, then seventeen years of age, son of Hadrian's sister, and Lucius Verus, then eight years of age, son of L. Aelius Vernus, a favourite of Hadrian, who, according to Spartian (Ael. Ver. Vita), "nihil habet in sua vita memorabile nisi quod primus tantum 'Caesar' est appellatus." In contrast with the gathered majesty of Rome thus grandly saluted, comes the title of those for whom the appeal to the magnificent authority is made, together with the name of him who ventures on this hazardous defence; it is, "on behalf of those who, taken as they are from out of every race of men, are yet everywhere unjustly hated and persecuted, that he, Justinus, the son of Priscus, of the Syrian city of Flavia-Neapolis in Palestine, himself one of those detested men, makes his address and entreaty."

He proceeds to define and justify his position of apologist before the rulers, with supreme dignity and confidence. He comes before them, as before men who, famous as they are for genuine integrity and philosophy, will be sure to follow that reason which bids them love and hold the truth, in spite of the prejudice of the multitude, even though it be at the risk of ruin. He calls upon them to let it be seen whether they are the loyal guardians of right, and the lovers of culture, which they are reported to be. For himself, he comes to them with no aim of winning favour by flattery; but, simply, to demand for himself and for his fellows the justice of an exact and critical examination, in which the judgment shall be given without regard to prejudice, or to superstition, or to irrational panic, or any long-established evil fame. It is, as it were, for the sake of the governors and their justice, that he seems to be asking a trial, for, "as for us Christians," he proudly declares, "we do not consider that we can suffer any ill from any one, unless we are convicted of wickedness or evil-doing; you can kill us indeed, but damage us you cannot" (Apol. i. 2, 54, A); "Princes who prefer prejudice to truth, can do no more harm than robbers in a desert" (Apol. i. 12, § 59, E).

So he opens his Apology, which can be roughly divided into three divisions, in the first of which (ch. 3-23) he refutes, generally, the false charges made against Christianity, and establishes their innocence. In the second (ch. 23-61) he exhibits the truth of the Christian system, and how it has got misunderstood. In the third (ch. 61-68) he reveals the character of the Christian worship and customs.

The charges against the Christians, encountered in Part I., are these: (1) The very fact of Christianity is itself treated as a punishable crime; Justin appeals to the principle of tolerance, i.e. that opinions should not be considered criminal, unless they result in criminal acts. "A name is, surely, not to be judged good or bad, except in regard to the actions belonging to it" (ch. iv.).

So he passes to the second charge (ch. 6), i.e. Atheism; and certainly, he allows, the Christians disbelieve in such gods as these; but how can they, with any justice, be called Atheists, who reverence and worship the Father of all Righteousness and Temperance and Virtue, Himself pure from all touch of evil, and the Son who came from the Father, and taught us this, and the whole Host of Angels that accompany Him, and are made like unto Him, and the Prophetical Spirit. "These are they whom we honour in reason and truth, offering our knowledge of them to all who will learn of us."

But (3) it is charged that some Christians have been proved malefactors. Yes, very likely, for we all are called Christians, however much we vary, just as under the single name of philosopher, there may be covered an endless variety of systems. Therefore, let every one of us be tried on his merits. If he is convicted of evil, let him pay the penalty, only let it be as an evil-doer, not as a Christian. If he be innocent of crime, let him be acquitted though he be a Christian.

We are charged (4) with aiming at a kingdom. But this can hardly be a kingdom on earth; for, then, we should be ruining all our hopes of it by our willingness to die for the name of Christ. Yet we never attempt to conceal our faith; and here Justin makes a direct appeal.

"Surely," he cries, "we are the best friends that a ruler could desire, we who believe in a God whose eye no crime can escape, no falsehood deceive; we who look for an eternal judgment, not only on our deeds, but even on our thoughts! So our Master, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, has taught us.

For the reality and true character of this faith in God through Christ, he offers the proof of the Christian's moral conversion. "We who once delighted in adultery, now are become chaste; once given to magic, now are consecrated to the one good God; once loving wealth above all things, now hold all our goods in common, and share them with the poor; once full of hatred and slaughter, now live together in peace, and pray for our enemies, and strive to convert our persecutors."

All this is emphasized by our belief in the Resurrection of the Body, in which we shall hereafter suffer pain for all our sins done here (ch. 18).

Is this incredible? Yet it is believed not only by us, but by all who turn to magic rites, to spiritualists, to witches, to frenzied seers, to oracles at Dodona or Delphi; by Empedocles and Pythagoras, Plato and Socrates, by Homer and Virgil.

Here begins a defence of Christian doctrine, on the ground of its likeness to doctrines already held in heathenism (ch. 21).

We alone are hated, even though we hold the same as the Greeks; we alone are killed for our faith, even though we do nothing bad.

(Ch. 30.) He turns to a new objection. "How do you know the genuineness of your Christ, or that He was not some clever magic-worker?"

Justin's answer is, by the proof of prophecy. The books of the Jews, translated in the Septuagint, in spite of the bitter hatred of the Jews against us, speak, years before the event, of us and of our Christ.

(Ch. 43.) He refutes the objection that belief in prophecy implies belief in fate. To believe in moral responsibility is necessarily to deny necessity.

It is by the foreknowledge of God which can tell how human choice will act, that prophecy is possible (ch. 44).

Prophecy, then, without any inconsistency, can speak as it does, of the ascension and dominion of Christ; and we, therefore, firmly believe in these events, and you will not stop us, for you can only kill us.

(Ch. 46.) A new objection: were all men irresponsible before 150 years ago, when Christ was born, under Quirinus?

No, there were Christians before Christ, men who lived in the power of the Word of God, Socrates and Heraclitus, Abraham and Elias.

(Ch. 56.) The demons have deceived men before Christ by the tales of Polytheism; and after Christ, by the impieties of Simon, Menander, and Marcion; but they have never been able to make men disbelieve in the end of the world, and the judgment to come: nor have they been able to conceal the advent of Christ.

(Ch. 59.) Not only Polytheism but Philosophy has stolen from our books. In all this, it is not that we happen to think as others do, but that they have imitated and used that which is really ours.

(Ch. 61-67.) He has spoken of Faith in Christ, and Regeneration of Life; he will now tell what this exactly means; and so proceeds to describe the Baptism by which the Regeneration is effected; the reasons for this rite of Baptism; its accomplishment in the Name of the Nameless God, called the Father, in the Name of the Son, Jesus Christ, crucified under Pontius Pilate, and in the Name of the Holy Spirit, who spake by the Prophets.

He describes (ch. 65) the Eucharistic Feast to which the baptized are admitted, and gives a brief account of the character to be attributed to the bread and wine then consecrated, and of the authority on which this rests.

He speaks once more of the feast, as it recurs on the Sundays, when they all assemble together, and (ch. 68) closes rather abruptly, with the personal directness which, throughout, gives dignity to the Apology. He pleads before the emperors, as an equal who explains himself to an equal, more anxious to ensure an understanding with those whom he respects, than to save himself; he writes because he is responsible for any failure of justice that occurs through an ignorance that he might remove: for, even though he is eager to clear himself, he has a certain proud, almost defiant assurance in reserve, which makes him almost ashamed of appearing to put out all his force into a defence. "If my words seem to you agreeable to reason and truth, then give them their due value; if they strike you as trifling, then treat them lightly as trifles; but, at least, do not decree death against those who do nothing wrong, as if they were enemies of the state. For, if you continue in iniquity, we foretell that you will not be able to escape the future judgment of God; we shall be content to cry, God's will be done!"

He adds an epistle of Hadrian to Minucius Fundanus, by which he could claim a fair trial such as he has asked for; but he would rather ask it as a matter of plain justice, than by right of law or precedent.

This letter of Hadrian's, we are told by Eusebius, was preserved by Justin in its Latin form (Hist. iv. 8), and thrown by him into Greek. Its style suits the age of Hadrian (Otto, edit. of Justin, vol. i. note on p. 190); it is considered genuine by Aubé, Ueberweg, doubted by Keim (Theol. Jahrb. t. xv.; Tub. 1856, p. 387). It gives so little to the Christians, that it seems hardly likely to be fictitious.

It may be asked, why, if it be genuine, the Christians did not appeal to it more constantly; or why, then, were they still persecuted under Hadrian, as we know they were, since it was then that Quadratus and Aristides wrote their Apologies? The answer seems to be, that the letter, after all, does not deny Christianity to be a crime; it remains an offence against the law, and if so, the letter allows Fundanus to give judgment accordingly. All it ensures is an open trial, with regular and examined witnesses; it also promises punishment to an accuser who fails to prove his charge. Of course, if so, the letter fails to grant what Justin demanded, i.e. that Christianity itself should not be considered a criminal offence; but Justin himself evidently feels disinclined to rest his case on the letter: he does not press it, he appeals to it quite carelessly, without emphasis or stress; evidently it is not a charter on which he can afford to take his stand; he brings it in, not as granting him his whole suit, but vaguely as guaranteeing Christians the sort of trial (τὰς κρισεις γενέσθαι καθὰ ἡξίωσαμεν) that they demanded. It would be an immense gain to force upon the mind of the governors that they were not to act blindly and recklessly, but that, if they punished Christians, they were punishing them directly as criminals, for then comes in all the force of Justin's apology, how can it be just to consider such innocent people to be criminals?

It was certainly, then, worth his while to quote it, even though it did not go beyond the lines laid down by Trajan; while, as long as it does not go beyond these lines it may well be genuine. It would allow for the fact of persecution occurring under Hadrian, and yet would account for Hadrian himself not being known as a persecutor. (Cf. Tert. Apol. v.) It tallies exactly with the limits of humanity to which it was then conceivable for an emperor to attain. The letter itself is addressed to Fundanus in answer to inquiries from his predecessor Serenus Graniacus (cf. Waddington, Fastes des Provinces Asiat. n. 128, p. 197, Paris, 1872), inquiries very much correspondent, apparently, to those of Pliny to Trajan.

The second Apology, possibly an appendix to the first (Otto, ed. p. lxxi.; Volkmar, Baur und Zell. Theolog. Jahrb. t. xiv. Tub. 1855; Keim, Protest. K.-Z. Ber. 1873, n. 28, col. 619), anyhow written at no long interval after the first, begins abruptly with an appeal directly to the Romans (which may have led to its being supposed to be addressed to the senate as the traditional title wrongly states), but is, in reality, addressed to the imperial rulers (cf. ch. 3, 14, 15), together with the whole people. These rulers, under whom the affairs which led to the Apology occurred, are, it has been argued, the emperor Pius and the philosopher Marcus Aurelius, and, according to a suggested reading, Lucius Verus, son of Caesar. The opening betrays by its suddenness, and emphasises by dwelling on the speed with which the Apology had been produced, the excitement under which it was composed. "Things had happened within the last two days in Rome," which were but too much like the irrational actions which the magistrates were everywhere carrying on, and which had driven Justin to write an Apology on behalf of his own people, who are, though the Romans know it not, and will not have it, their brothers, of like feelings with themselves. He writes it because everywhere any one who is chastised for an offence is prompted by his own evil passions, and helped by the devils who hate us, and by the judges whom these devils hold in their power, to bring us Christians to the death.

(Ch. 2.) To illustrate this, he relates the case which had so fired him with indignation; it is very typical of what Christians were subject to. The dissolute wife of a dissolute man is converted, and is anxious to separate from a husband who persists in unnatural and extravagant vice; her friends strongly dissuade her, her husband holds out some hopes of amendment, so she forces herself to remain; at last he goes a trip to Alexandria, and plunges into worse debauchery; she takes the step, sends a writ of divorce, and leaves him. Then this "good and noble husband" bethought himself of accusing her of being a Christian. While her case was pending, he managed to get a centurion who had under his charge a certain Ptolemaus, the wife's master in the faith, whom Urbicus had imprisoned, to challenge him with being a Christian. Ptolemaus, in obedience to his conscience, admits it, on which he is at once put into fetters, and long incarcerated; then, brought up before Urbicus, he is asked this one question, "Are you a Christian?" and on confessing it is at once condemned to death. Lucius, a Christian, cannot contain himself and publicly challenges Urbicus to justify a decision which punishes a man simply for the name of Christian. "You, too, are a Christian, I suppose?" is the only answer that he gets from Urbicus; and on confessing it, he, too, is condemned to death, declaring as he goes that he is glad to be free of rulers so unjust, and to depart to the Father and King of Heaven. Yet a third, in the same way passes to a like punishment; "And I, too, myself," breaks in Justin, "look for the same fate, for I, too, have enemies who have a grudge against me, and are likely enough to take this way of avenging themselves; Crescens especially, the sham philosopher, whom I have convicted of entire ignorance about the Christianity which he slanders."

(Ch. 4.) It may be said in scorn, "Be off, then, to your God in Heaven by killing yourselves, and trouble us no longer!" But Christians believe the world to be made by God to fulfil His purpose, they are not at liberty to destroy, as far as in them lies, the human race, for whom the world was created. Nor yet can they deny their faith, for this would be (1) to allow its guilt, as well as (2) to lie; and (3) would leave you in your evil prejudices.

(Ch. 5.) "Why does God not help His own?" He spares to punish and destroy the evil world, for the sake of this holy seed, the Christians, who are the real reason why God still preserves the order of nature, which the fallen angels have so corrupted.

(Ch. 7.) But a destruction by fire will come at last; so far the stories are right; a fire freely willed of God for the punishment of those who have freely sinned.

(Ch. 9.) Two retorts may be made. (1) This eternal fire is a mere frightening for children. (2) It supposes men to be virtuous through fear of punishment, not through love of virtue.

Justin answers that it is impossible to believe that God is, or that He cares for man, or that there is any absolute reality in virtue and vice, such as justifies rulers in punishing the guilty, without holding that God rewards the one, and punishes the other.

(Ch. 11.) Another reason why God allows us to suffer: it is because all men must pay the debt of death; and it is because of the blessedness won through discipline and probation; as Xenophon pictured in the choice of Hercules. We are as athletes who prove their virtue by risking death.

(Ch. 12.) By this Justin himself had been moved when he, while still a Platonist, saw how bravely a Christian suffered. How could they be sensual who so readily died to the world? You slay us who are innocent for doing things which you yourselves and your gods openly commit.

(Ch. 13.) These are the foul lies by which the devils try to hide from you the truth of Christ, at which lies we who possess the truth can afford to laugh; for our truth is that which all philosophers aimed after in their measure, but which, by their contradictions and inconsistencies, they confessed themselves not to have reached; which Truth was made man for us that He might share our sufferings and bring us healing.

(Ch. 14.) "For this truth's sake I ask you to make known this book of mine," that others may know the supernatural height of Christian doctrine, or at least may recognise that it is not like those lower philosophies of Sotades, and Epicurus, and Philaenis, which nevertheless are openly allowed to be heard and read. He closes with a prayer that all may learn the truth; and that the rulers may, for their own sakes, give a decision worthy of their high characters.

The effect of these Apologies upon the rulers of Rome is unknown; only we do know that the expectation by Justin of his death was not disappointed, and that Marcus Aurelius still mistrusted the motives which made Christians martyrs, and saw no reason to stay the outcry of the Roman crowd, when it demanded Christian victims. It remained a legal crime to be a Christian. Indeed, according to Roman ideas of government, it could hardly cease to be criminal as long as Christianity continued its private and peculiar organisation, and found it impossible to conform to the general tests of good citizenship, such as the oath to the emperor, &c. The Apologies never hint at any concession on such points, they are defiant in their statement that their present position is entirely innocent, and that, therefore, there is nothing which they can offer to withdraw or surrender. The very vigour of the Apologies must have revealed the intense and violent collision of Christian life with all the mass of pagan custom and pagan temper in which the solidity of Rome had laid its foundation. At the same time, though the practical outcome of the Apologies was so negative, we cannot argue from that, that the effect of so confident and large-minded a defence was not widely operative. The church itself evidently felt thoroughly satisfied and gratified by what Justin had put out for her; she ranked him among her most valued defenders; she set his name high, and followed much in his footsteps. A whole world of her theology dates itself from his writings. The church must have seen reason to believe that he had accomplished his task with success.

The Dialogue with Trypho follows the first Apology, and probably the second also, in the years between 142 and 148 according to Hort; in 155 according to Volkmar; in 160-164 according to Keim. It was written to report to a dear friend, Marcus Pompeius (cf. ch. 8, § 225, D; ch. 141, § 371, B), a discussion which Justin had held with the Jews during the time of the Bar-cochba wars. Nothing is said of the motives with which it was written for Marcus. The discussion represents the Christian polemic against the Jews; but it is to be noticed that Justin forces this form of discussion on Trypho; for Trypho makes his advance as a philosopher rather than as a Jew, and it is Justin who turns the talk on to the Jewish Scriptures by expressing his surprise at a Jew being still engaged in searching for truth in the Pagan philosophers when he possessed already in the Scriptures the authorised exponent of revealed wisdom, for the sake of whose secured certainty Justin himself had left behind him all other human systems. Trypho is, indeed, a most curious type of Judaism; a light and superficial inquirer in the courts of the schools, surrounded by a band of loud and lively friends, he begins with a reference to a Socratic at Argos, who had taught him to address courteously all who wore the philosopher's cloak, in the hope of learning, through the pleasant interchange of thoughts, something that would be useful to both. He smiles gracefully as he inquires what opinion Justin holds about the gods, and, apparently, justifies his philosophic studies in the face of Scripture, by claiming that the philosophers are equally with Moses searchers after the being of God. After the noisy friends have been avoided by retirement to a quiet seat, Trypho opens the question with the air of a free and tolerant seeker after truth; he has read the Gospel, and found in it a morality too high for real practice; and he is ready to acknowledge the piety of the better Christians. What he wonders at is that with so much goodness, they should nevertheless live as Gentiles without keeping the pure laws of God, e.g. the Sabbath and circumcision, by which He separates the holy from sinners; he wonders, too, how those who place their hope in a man can yet hope for a reward from God. He would most gladly have all this explained (cf. ch. 57, § 280, A; ch. 68, § 293, A). Trypho then is no fierce Jewish opponent, prepared to attack; he does not expect the Jewish controversy; he is a Jew, indeed, and holds to the Law, and has read the Christian books, and is quite prepared to meet their arguments, and can discuss the points of prophecy with them; but he does not profess to have made this his aim, he adopts the tone almost of an inquirer. "We were not prepared," he says in ch. 56, "for such perilous questions; for we have never before heard any one investigating and searching out and proving these things as you do. You see," he says at the end, "that it was not from any set purpose or preparation, that we got to talking on this subject" (cf. also ch. 63, § 286, B; ch. 90, § 17, C). He confesses himself much pleased with the interview; to have got more than he expected; he wishes he could come again; he begs Justin to remember him as a friend; he prays that Justin may come safely through his approaching voyage (ch. 142). We are far from the fierce fury of the Pharisee, or of the settled controversialist. It is the Jew under a new aspect that we find here, the Jew of culture, of the open and tolerant mind, with the easy courtesy of the literary world, to whom the law represents the customary and unquestioned habit of life with which God is satisfied, but to whom it is not the least the satisfaction of all his intellectual longings, the crown of philosophic endeavour, the mirror of wisdom. In front of such apparent openness, and willingness and easy-going lightness as this, it is perhaps not without artistic skill that Justin hints at the fierce and implacable hatred of Jew against Christian which had tortured and slain Christians without pity under Bar-cochba, and made Jews everywhere the most violent and remorseless of the church's slanderers and persecutors (ch. 108, § 335).

The Dialogue takes two days in the delivery; we assume this to have been an actual fact from the clumsiness of the repetition made necessary by the new hearers of the second day. No exact period is named at which the break occurs, but it has already happened, when we come to ch. 85: Grabe places it between ch. 70 and ch. 78, and imagines the end of the first portion of the Dialogue to be lost, but the MSS. do not bear this out (Grabe, Spic. Pat. ii. 163). Some fresh friends of Trypho add themselves to the party on the second day (cf. ch. 118, § 346, C); he speaks sometimes as if they were only two, at other times as if they were many. One of them is named Mnaseas (ch. 85, § 312), "the other" agrees readily with Justin's argument about the serpent, and is eager to hear more (ch. 74, § 322, B). They shout disapproval once, as if they were in a theatre (ch. 122, § 351, A). The whole is spoken as they sit on some stone seats in the middle of the gymnasium, just as Justin is preparing to sail on a voyage.

After the scenic introduction in which Justin gives the personal experience which made him acknowledge the high philosophy of the Jewish Scriptures as fulfilled in Christ, the actual argument begins at ch. 10. The points especially raised by Trypho were two, i.e. how the Christians could profess to serve God, and yet (1) break God's given law, and (2) believe in a human Saviour (cf. ch. 10, § 227, D). The purity of Christian living is acknowledged; the problem is its consistency with its creed.

Justin's argument in explanation may be very roughly divided into three parts (Otto, Prolegomena). In the first, ch. 11-47, he refutes Trypho's conception of the binding character of the Jewish law, which refutation involves him also in a partial answer to the second part of the problem, i.e. the nature of the Christ in whom they trust; for the passing away of the Law turns on the character of the Christ of whom it prophesies.

In the second part, ch. 48-ch. 108, he definitely takes up this second part of the problem, and expounds the absolute divinity of Christ, His pre-existence, incarnation, passion, resurrection, and ascension, by virtue of which the belief in Him is proved consistent with belief in God alone.

In the third part, ch. 109, he passes to what is the necessary outcome of these two principles, the conversion of the Gentiles, the new Israel, the abandonment of the old Israel, the sons of Abraham, unless they will accept the new covenant.

The whole is rested on the Scriptures, on the interpretation of prophecy. Justin starts with a claim to believe absolutely in the God of Israel; here is his common ground with Trypho (ch. 11), both therefore accept the old revelation (cf. ch. 68, § 298, A; cf. ch. 57, § 279, B; ch. 56, § 277, D). "I should not endure your argument," Trypho says (ch. 56, § 277, D), "unless you referred all to the Scriptures; but I see you try to find all your reasons in them, and announce no other God but the Supreme Creator of the world." Even when angry, Trypho dare not dispute the scriptural argument, "as was clear from his face" (ch. 79, § 305, B). Justin professes to have no dialectic power, but such as he gains from his skill in interpreting Scripture (ch. 58, § 290, B).

The whole Dialogue, therefore, is a perfect store-house of early Christian interpretation of Scripture. This forms its wonderful value; it carries us back to that first effort at interpretation, which dates itself from St. Peter's earliest speech at the election of Matthias, and knits itself so closely with the walk to Emmaus, when the Scriptures were first opened, and it was seen from them that Christ must suffer. The Old Testament is still the sacred guide and continual companion of the Christian Life, the type of the written revelation; everything is there. Only, by the side of it we already feel in Justin that a new power has appeared, a fresh canon is forming, another book is beginning to assert itself. It is just because Justin appears at the moment when this is gradually becoming clear that his work is full of such crucial interest.

In these three works, i.e. the two Apologies and the Dialogue, Justin covers a large part of the theological field. His treatment of the various questions on which he touches became an historic moment in Christian literature, and is peculiarly typical of the earliest form of Christian speculation outside and beyond the immediate lines laid down by the Apostolic writings. The Apostolic fathers were rather practical than speculative. The doctrinal works of people like Melito of Sardis are lost. It is the Apologists in whom Christianity, according to its preserved records, first prominently applies itself to the elucidation of its dogmatic position in face of questions as yet unattempted or unsolved, and of these Apologists Justin is among the earliest and the most famous. But in considering his theology it will be well to remember that we only possess his exoteric utterances; he is explaining his position to a Jew, or to an emperor; he is, in both cases, distinctly apologetic, i.e. he is taking up the position of his opponents, he is claiming to rely as much on the Old Testament, to believe as much on the absolute and only God as Trypho, to be as genuinely and reasonably philosophic as Marcus Aurelius. It is true he is very frank, apparently, and unreserved; but he cannot, for all that, be read without regard to the especial, pressing, and limited conditions under which he wrote. He is not spontaneously developing the Christian's creed, but is striving, under the stress of a critical emergency, how to exhibit it most effectively and least suspiciously, to an alien and unsympathetic audience, an audience prepared not merely to discuss but to judge and to kill. The whole position tended to increase and quicken the natural tendency of Justin's mind towards an optimistic insistence on likenesses and agreements, rather than on differences between himself and his opponents. This is not said to discredit his utterances, but simply in order to consider them, as all intelligent criticism must consider them, under their actual historical conditions. Justin is not to be read as if we were reading a dogmatic treatise of St. Thomas. Again, it is not unnecessary to remember how much Justin is moving on what is as yet new ground to a great extent; he is pioneering, he is venturing along unmarked and unexamined roads. Christian doctrine is still forming itself under his hands, and even on some most essential and cardinal points. At such a stage it is impossible to foresee all the consequences of an expression. Many a formula, sufficient for the immediate purpose, may have to be reconsidered in view of fresh eventualities. It is hopelessly illogical for us at a time like his, while Christianity is in the first flush of intellectual confidence, advancing towards a dominion which she foreknows to be her own, to look for that disciplined precision, and anxious forethought, and deliberate care, which would characterise her selected expressions after the subtle sifting of a hundred later controversies.

Justin's Theology, then, begins in the presence of (1) Jewish Monotheism, and (2) of the Primal and Absolute and Universal Cause of all Existence, posited by the philosophic consciousness of Paganism. He has to state how his conception of the Deity stands to these two great positions,

He answers, that he believes (1) in a God identical with the God of the Jews; "There is no other God, nor ever has been, but He who made and ordered the Universe; that very God who brought your fathers, Trypho, out of Egypt, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (Dialog. 11, § 228, A).

This God of creation is the one cause of all existence, therefore known as the Father: ὁ πατήρ τῶν ὄλων (Dialog. 114, § 342, A), or τῶν πάντων (Apol. i. 8, § 57, A); ποιητὴν τοῦ ὄλου καὶ πατέρα: ὁ δημιουργὸς πάντων καὶ πατήρ ὁ Κύριος: ὁ δεσπότης (cf. Apol. i. 12, § 60, A; Apol. i. 61, § 94, D, &c.). In Apol. ii. 6, § 44, D, he sums up all the names by which the absolute God may be known, πατήρ, Θεός, κτίστης, κύριος, δεσπότης. This is his cardinal and prevailing expression for God the Father—that He is the Maker and Ordainer and Lord of all creation. This God, the Father, though revealed to man under those names which describe His works, is Himself, in Himself, utterly nameless, whom it would be blasphemy to limit by a name, since He is unoriginate, ἀγένητος, and has, therefore, no more ancient Being than Himself from whom to receive His name (Apol. ii. 6, § 44, D). He remains, therefore, ἄρρητος (Apol. i. 13, § 61, A, § 94, D; Apol. ii. 10, § 49, A, 12, § 50, C; Dial. 126, § 355, C); ἀνωνόμαστος (Apol. i. 63, 95, C, &c.). He is "the only God," ὁ μόνος Θεός. He is in Himself, εἷς καὶ μόνος, incapable of leaving Heaven: ἅλ ἐν οὐρανόις μένων; for Him an Incarnation was incredible (Dial. 127, § 357, A). So far he is at one with Plato (cf. Apol. ii. 10, § 48; Plato, Timæus, p. 23, C), as well as with Trypho. There will be felt, in all this, a certain abstractness in Justin's conception of the Father; he is still touched by Platonism.

(2) But, besides the Father, Justin undertakes to exhibit the Divinity of a Second Person, the Son, ὁ μόνος λεγόμενος κυρίως υἱός (Apol. ii. 6, § 44), υἷον αὐτοῦ τοῦ ὄντως Θεοῦ (Apol. i. 13, § 60, C), to whom is allotted the second place, in honour and worship, after the ἄτρεπτον καὶ ἅλ ὄντα Θεὸν γεννήτορα τῶν ἀπάντων. He is, primarily, ὁ Λόγος, the Word of God, with God before creation began, συνῆν τῷ πατρὶ πρὸ πάντων τῶν ποιμάτων (Dialog. 62, § 285, D). With Him the Father communicated (προσομιλεῖ), having begotten Him before all things (γέννημα ἐπὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐγγεγέννητο). The manner of this begetting is spoken of as a projection (τῷ ὄντι ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς προβληθὲν γέννημα). Such is the Λόγος, called by Solomon the Wisdom, who co-existed with the Father at that moment when, at the beginning, by Him the Father made and perfected all things (Apol. ii. 6, § 44, E; Dialog. 62, § 285, D). He it is who is ὁ Θεός, ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν ὄλων γεννηθείς, and who is known as the Word, and the Wisdom, and the Power, and the Glory of Him who begat Him (Dialog. 61, § 284, A, B).

The Son is the instrument of "Creation" (δι' αὐτοῦ πάντα ἐκτίσθη); hence (in addition to His primal names, Λόγος, Υἱός), called Χριστός, κατὰ τὸ κεχρίσθαι τὰ πάντα δι' αὐτόν; but this name is in itself of unknown significance, just as the title "God" is no real name, but rather expresses a natural opinion, inborn in man, about an unutterable fact. Christ's Being, therefore, as well as the Father's, is beyond all human expression, and is known only economically; for, if this is true of the title Χριστός, it can hardly but be true of the higher names, Λόγος and Υἱός.

This Λόγος is identical with the Man Jesus, conceived through the Will of the Father on behalf of man, named Jesus, as being a Man and a Saviour.

Justin holds, then, the entire Divinity of Him who was born a Man, and crucified under Pontius Pilate. Nothing can be more pronounced or decided than his position; it is brought to the front by the necessities of both his arguments, that with the Jew and that with the Gentile. He starts with this position, that he worships as God, a man Christ Jesus; it is this that he has to justify to the Gentile (cf. Apol. i. 21, 22, § 67). "In that we say," he says, "that the Word, which is the first-begotten of God, has been born without human mixture, as Jesus Christ, our Master, who was crucified and died, and rose again;" or, again, "Jesus Christ, who alone was begotten to be the only Son of God, being the Word of God, and the first-born, and the Power of God (πρωτότοκος καὶ δύναμις), became Man by the will of the Father, and taught us these things." These are his statements, and he justifies their possibility to the emperors by appeals to Greek Mythology, i.e. he is so fast bound to this belief that he has to run the risk of all the discredit that will attach to it in the minds of the philosophic statesmen to whom he is appealing from its likeness to the debasing fables which their intellectualism either rationalised or discarded. That Justin is conscious of this risk of discredit is clear from chapters 53 and 54 of the first Apology, with which we may compare the taunt of Trypho (Dialog. 67, § 219, B). So again, in the Dialogue, it is the Christian worship of a man that puzzles Trypho; and the first necessity for Justin is to exhibit the consistency of this with the supreme monarchy of God. "First shew me," asks Trypho (in ch. 50 of the Dialogue), "how you can prove there is any other God besides the Creator of the universe?" and this not in any economical sense, but verily and indeed (cf. Dialog. 55, § 274, C); and Justin accepts the task, undertaking to exhibit Jesus, the Christ, born of a virgin, as Θεὸς καὶ Κύριος τῶν δυνάμεων (Dialog. 36, § 254, E), to shew Him to be, at the same time, both Θεὸς καὶ Κύριος, and also ἄνθρωπος καὶ ἄνθρωπος (Dialog. 59, § 382, C). The rigour with which this is posited may be tested by the crucial case, so much discussed, of the appearance to Abraham at Mamre. Here, it is allowed, after a little discussion, that no angelic manifestation satisfies the language used by Scripture. It is certainly God Himself who is spoken of. Justin undertakes to prove that this cannot be God the Father, but must be other than He who created all things—"other," he means, "in number, in person, not in will or spirit" (Dialog. 56, § 276, D, ἕτερος, ἀριθμῷ λέγω ἀλλ' οὐ γνάμῃ). So, again, he applies to this Divine Being the tremendous words delivered to Moses from the midst of the Burning Bush, and he will not suffer this to be qualified or weakened by any such subtle distinctions as Trypho attempts to draw between the angel who was seen of Moses, and the voice of God that spoke. He insists, against any such subtleties, that whatever Presence of God was actually there manifested was the Presence, not of the Supreme Creator, who cannot be imagined to have left His Highest Heaven, but of that Being who, being God, announces Himself to Moses as the God who had shewn Himself to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. To Him, therefore, apply the words "I am that I am."

By these two cases, specimens of a hundred others drawn from Law and Psalm and Prophets, it will be seen how clearly the problem was present to Justin, and how definitely he had envisaged its solution so far as the Old Testament was concerned; in direct collision with the Monotheism of the Jew, he defends himself, not by withdrawing or modifying his assertions, but by girding himself up to the supreme task of discovering the evidence for His Dual Godhead in the very heart of the ancient Revelation itself; and he discovers this evidence not in any by-ways or minor incidents, but in the very core and centre of those most essential manifestations of God to Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and Joshua, on the reality and solidity of which the whole fabric of Jewish faith and worship was reared.

This being so, Justin has to set himself to consider in what way these two Divine Beings stand to each other. Given the existence of a Second Person who can so effectually identify Himself with the first as to be called ὁ Θεός, how can we conceive the harmony and unity of such a Duality? Justin is clear that the distinction between the two Beings is real; it is a numerical distinction. The Word is no mere emanation of the Father, inseparable from Him as the light is inseparable from the Sun. He is a real subsistence, born of the Father's Will (Dialog. 128, § 358, B). The words used, therefore, to express their relation are words of companionship, of intercourse, of συνήν, προσομιλεῖ (cf. Dialog. 62, § 285, C, D, where he brings out the fact of this personal intercourse as involved in the consultations at the creation of man). They are two distinct Beings then, but yet they must be one, in order not to dissolve the absoluteness of the only Godhead. Such a unity may be pictured by the connection between a thought and the Reason that thinks it. The thought projected by the Reason is not a piece cut off the Reason that fathered it, yet is it identical in character with the Reason as if it were a part of that Reason itself. Or, again, it may be pictured by the unity of a flame with the fire from which it was taken. Such a flame is identical in nature with the original fire, yet it is not a part of that original fire, removed from it, for that original fire is exactly such as it was, undiminished and unmodified. And, nevertheless, the flame taken from it lives and burns in a separate reality of its own. Such a unity, again, is morally realised in the entire identification of the life and action of the Son with the will and mind of the Father (Dialog. 56, § 276, D).

Difficulties present themselves at each of these examples of the unbroken unity.

First, as to the analogy of the fire, or of the thought, the very force of the parallel compels us to think of a stage prior to the dual condition in which that which is now dual was single. What then of the existence of the Word before it became the προβληθὲν γέννημα? Justin is content with the statements: (1) That "before all things," already "at the beginning," this projection had been effected, the two Persons were already distinct (cf. Dialog. 62, § 285, D; 56, § 276, C, τὸν καὶ πρὸ ποιήσεως κόσμου ὄντα Θεόν). (2) That besides this actual projection of the Λόγος there is a state which may be described as a condition of inner companionship with God the Creator (συνήν). This precedence is never distinctly asserted to be temporal by Justin. In the Dialogue the συνών is stated to be eternal in exactly that sense in which the γέννημα is eternal, i.e. as being "before all things." It is not stated to possess an absolute eternity in distinction from the relative eternity of the γέννημα, though a certain mental distinction between the two conditions is perhaps implied in the famous passage of the second Apol. ch. 6. Even here, however, there is some indistinctness; the language may imply two sequent conditions (καὶ συνών, καὶ γεννώμενος), but it may just as well state two relations of the Son to the Father, both affirmed to be "before all things," but neither clearly regarded as preceding the other in time. On the whole, it looks as if Justin had no more absolute formula for eternity than "πρὸ τῶν ποιημάτων," and this he certainly applies to the γεννώμενος equally with the συνών. If so, any priority that he may possibly intend to attribute to the συνών is a logical priority. In any case the expression συνών, which must express the most absolute and eternal relation of the Son to the Father, is an expression of intercourse, of companionship, of personal duality; it is closely allied to προσομιλεῖ (Dialog. 61, 285, D).

It appears then more likely, from Justin's language, that he does not definitely pronounce on the question how the process of Begetting consists with the absolute eternity of the Personal Word begotten. He vaguely suggests an inward communion preceding the outward, in which the Word was, as it were, hidden within the bosom of the Father. But there is no precise realisation of a Λόγος ἐνδιάθετος and προφορικός. He hardly seems conscious of this difficulty suggested by his two analogies of the thought and the flame; he is satisfied with expressing, by them, the unity, and yet distinctness, of the Father and the Son. He is content to state that this unity in difference existed from the very first, before all created things. But his analysis seems hardly to have pressed back to the final question, which Arian logic discovered to lie behind all minor issues, i.e. was there a moment when the Father was not yet a Father? And such a suspension of analysis would be all the more natural, since Justin, in the writings before us, hardly enters on the contemplation of the Nature of God in and to Himself. His most essential conception of God is of Him as the Creator. It is always as the source of all things—the Father, the Maker, the Lord of the Universe—that he presents God to us. He is ὁ πατὴρ καὶ δημιουργὸς τοῦ ὅλου, &c. It is God in His relation to His works, that we contemplate. This is our starting-point, especially since it is only through His workings that we can name or know God at all. What He was in Himself before all His works does not seem considered, and it is therefore all the more sufficient to state that God came to the making of the world, already dual in character. It is not stated that it was for the sole purpose of creation that this duality came into existence. The passage in the Apol. ii. 6, rather implies that it was the name Χριστός that accrued to the Word, as the instrument of creation, though, of course, to all theology, and especially to a theology so cosmological as Justin's, the characteristic functions of the Second Person are regarded chiefly as concerned with creation. He still asserts that the moment at which creation was to begin found the Son already existent, as ὁ Θεός, in personal intercourse with the Father. With this he leaves us, only affirming that that character of Paternity which constitutes the relation of God to the world, had a prior and peculiar significance and reality in the relation that bonded together the absolute God and His Word (cf. Apol. ii. 6, § 44, ὁ μόνος λεγόμενος κυρίως υἱός).

Justin's metaphysic, then, culminates in the assertion of this essential Sonship pre-existent to the creation. This being so, his language remains as indecisive on the ulterior question of the origin of the Sonship, as is the language of Proverbs on the eternity of the Wisdom. In both cases the utmost expression for eternity that their logic had attained to is used. It is useless to press them for an answer to the puzzles of a later logic, which carried the problem back into that very eternity which closed their horizon. Only it must be remembered that it was inevitable that the natural and unsystematised language used before the Arian controversy should be capable of an Arian interpretation. Since the Father is indeed alone ἀγέννητος, the sole unoriginate fount of the Divine life, the expressions that were used about Him, and about the Son, must necessarily impute to Him an underivative, to the Son a derivative Being; and must, therefore, tend to class the Son rather with the rest of τὰ γενητά than with the sole ἀγεννητόν. It could only be at the end of a most subtle and delicate reflection that Christian logic could possibly realise that it was bound, if it would be finally consistent with itself, to class the derived Being of the Son, by virtue of the absolute eternity of its derivation, on the side of τὸ ἀγεννητόν rather than on that of τὰ γενητά. Justin, in the full flush of readiness to sweep in to the service of faith the dear and familiar language of his former Platonism, may have left himself unguarded and careless on this uttermost point of the philosophy of the Incarnation; but it will not easily be doubted—by any one who has observed how he develops the full divinity of the Son over all the ground which his logic covered with a boldness and a vigour that, in face of the inevitable obstacles, prejudices, misunderstandings excited by such a creed, are perfectly astonishing—what answer he would have given if the final issue of the position had once presented itself definitely to him.

Justin had also affirmed the moral unity of the Son with the Father. This is not stated to be the ground of the Unity. The analogies of the Thought and of the Flame, on the contrary, imply a unity of substance to be the ground of the κυρίως υἱότης, but it is introduced in order to explain the consistency of his belief with the reality of a single supreme Will in the Godhead (Dialog. 56, § 274), and the explanation naturally led him to affirm the complete subordination of the Son to the will of the Father. The Son is the expression of the Father's mind, the δύναμιν λογικὴν, which He begat from Himself. He is the interpreter of His Purpose, the instrument by which He designs. In everything, therefore, the Son is conditioned by the supreme Will; His office, His very nature, is to be ὁ ἄγγελος, ὁ ὑπηρετής. All His highest titles, υἱός and λόγος, as well as others, belong to Him by virtue of His serving the Father's purpose and being born by the Father's Will (ἐκ τοῦ ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς θελήσει γεγενῆσθαι, Dialog. 61, § 284, v). "I say that He never did anything but what the Maker of the world, above whom there is no God at all, willed that He should do" (Dialog. 56, § 276). The Father is above all. Trypho would not endure to listen to Justin if he did not hold this (Dialog. 56, § 278, v). The Son is then subordinate, and perfectly subordinate, but this subordination is such that it can allow the Son to identify Himself utterly with the Father, as with Moses at the Bush, and so to be called ὁ Κύριος and ὁ Θεός.

In the expression "born of the Father's Will" we are once more close to Arian controversy. Was there then a moment when the Father had not yet willed to have a Son? If so, how can the Son be eternal? Yet, if not, how was the Father's will free? Justin has no such questions put to him. He states this dependence of the Son for His very Being on the Will of the Father without anxiety as to His right to be named ὁ Θεός, and to receive worship in the absolute sense in which a Jew would understand that title and that worship. And here, again, surely it was inevitable that the Christian consciousness should have so stated frankly the subordinate and dependent character of the eternal Sonship, before it appreciated the subtle puzzle that would ensue when logic began its critical work upon the novel and double-sided conception. Subordination of the Son to the Father must represent the immediate, primary, natural, and intelligible method of presenting to the reflecting mind the reconciliation of the duality of Persons with the unity of Will. The very name of Son, or of the Word, implied it. So far, too, the logic inherited from the philosophies would supply the needful formula. It would take time to discover that Christianity held implicitly, in its faith in the entire Divinity of the Son, a position which, if ever it was to be made consistent with the explicit formula of the subordination, must necessitate an entirely new and original logical effort, such as would justify the synthesis already achieved by the Christian's intuitive belief in the absolute Divinity of a dependent and subordinate Son. This new logical effort was made when Athanasius recognised the dilemma into which the old logic of the Schools had thrown the Christian position, and, instead of abandoning either of the alternatives, evolved a higher logic, which could accept both. For it must be remembered, if we are to be impartial to Justin, that the Nicene controversy did not end in one side adopting one horn of the dilemma, and the other the other horn. It was not closed by the church throwing over the subordination, while the Arian threw over the entire Divinity of the Son. Nicaea effected a decision between those who accepted the dilemma, and those who rose above it. It was a decision between those who, by clinging to the older logic, found themselves forced by the intellectual necessities of the dependence to abandon the substantial equality of the Son; and those who, while confessing the subordination, were determined that it should be made theoretically consistent with the absolute Divinity, against which it appeared hopelessly to collide.

This being the result of Nicaea, the only possible test by which to try Justin (who certainly held both the divinity and the subordination), would be to ask whether, if he had seen the dilemma, he would have held the subordination of the Son to be the primary and imperative truth to the logical needs of which the fulness of the divine Sonship must be thrown over, or whether he would have felt the latter truth to be so intimately essential that a novel logic must be called into existence which should interpret it into accordance with the subordination. Our answer to such a question must, at the best, be problematical; it must depend on our conception of the main tendencies of Justin's writings. And here it cannot be felt that Justin's faith is a great deal more pronounced and definite than his Platonic logic; that the one is clear and strong where the other is vague and arbitrary, and, if so, that in a conflict between the two it is not very doubtful which would go to the wall. Justin's temper of mind is the complete reverse of that of Arius.

So much for Justin's treatment of the inner and absolute relations between the Father and the Son. On the ministerial activities of the Son for the Father he is much more explicit.

The Word has one chief mission from the Father, that of interpreting Him to man; hence He received the name of ἄγγελος (cf. Dialog. 56, § 275). He accomplishes this (1) to the Jews by means of the Theophanies, and through the lips of the prophets. Of the Theophanies I have already given instances. Justin attributes to the Second Person the appearance at Mamre to Abraham, in the Burning Bush to Moses, in the Vision of the Ladder to Jacob, by the Camp to Joshua. As to the prophets, He is spoken of as the direct inspirer whose spirit moves them, and whose words they speak. Cf. Apol. i. 36, § 76, D. The whole manifold Scripture, with all its many parts and voices, is, as it were, a great play written by a single author, the Word of God, who alone speaks through all the characters displayed. Of this Justin gives instances in ch. 37, 38, 39.

Again, He is, not only the inward force, but the outward object also, to which all prophecy is directed. The Jewish Scripture has in Him a permanent aim, a fixed canon; it all arranges itself round Him (cf. Apol. i. 31, § 73, A). To foretell Him and His work is the one purpose of prophecy. By it, His whole life in its main outlines is described, His advent, His birth from the virgin, His coming to man's estate, His curing of the sick, His raising the dead, His being hated, and unknown, and crucified, His death, resurrection, and ascension, His divine sonship, His mission of the apostles, His success among the Gentiles (Apol. i. 31, § 73).

(2) Justin attributes a revelation of the Word to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews; to them He is the ἄγγελος, the interpreter of the Father, not by prophetic anticipations, but by partial manifestation, of Himself. Every man in every race possesses a germ of the Word, by the power of which men knew what truth they did know, and did what good they did do; above all, the philosophers and lawgivers who, in their rational inquiries and speculations, were obeying the measure of the Word within them (κατὰ λόγου μέρος . . . δι' εὐρέσεως καὶ θεωρίας. Apol. ii. 10, § 48, C). It is Justin, then, who promulgates the famous formula: "Ὅσα παρὰ πᾶσι καλῶς εἰρηται ἡμῶν τῶν Χριστιανῶν ἐστί (Apol. ii. 13, § 51). "We do not believe less, but more, than Empedocles and Pythagoras, Socrates and Plato," he says: "we approve what they rightly said; but our doctrine is higher than theirs;" "not that the teaching of Plato is different from that of Christ, but that it is not entirely the same;" and so too with the Stoics, and poets, and historians (cf. Apol. i. 18, § 65, c; Apol. ii. 10, 13). This is the principle which the Alexandrians are to develop. These ancient friends of Christ, for their obedience to the Word, were hated like Christians are hated, as impious and curious busy-bodies; chief of them all was Socrates, who was martyred for Christ. With him are mentioned Heraclitus, Musonius the Stoic, &c. It is in the exercising of human reason to search out God that such as these obeyed the power of the Word, the Reason of God (λόγος πειραθέντες τὰ πράγματα θεωρήσαι καὶ ἐλέγξαι . . . διὰ λόγου ζητήσεως θεοῦ τοῦ ἀγνώστου ἐπιγνώσιν (Apol. ii. 10, § 48; cf. Apol. i. 5, § 55, E: λόγος ἀληθεῖ καὶ ἐξεταστικῶς). The difference between this general, and the Christian, revelations lies in the partial character of the λόγος σπερματικός; each philosopher, &c. saw only a part of the Word. Hence came the contradictions of the philosophic system, the inconsistencies of human law; each was but partially right; and some had one part, some another. Christians possess the whole Word of God, in the person of Christ Jesus; they, therefore, hold the canon of truth which distinguishes all that was good and true of old, from the false and the confused with which it was mixed up (Apol. ii. 9, 10, § 47). This distinction is radical; "since the germ and image of something, given to man according to the measure of his capacity, is quite distinct from that very thing itself which permits itself, by its own favour, to be so given and communicated" (Apol. ii. 13, § 51, c). This clear distinction exhibits the full reality of the personality attributed by Justin to the Word revealed in Christ; it is personality which distinguishes itself so decisively from the influence and energy which it exercises; it is it again which makes the distinction between a partial and a complete revelation to be so radical. The completeness of the Christian revelation lies in its being the revelation of Christ's Person (cf. Apol. ii. 10, § 48, ὅς ἐστί Χριστός; Apol. ii. 13, § 51).

Hence, the Revelation of the Word concentrates itself in the Incarnation; for so only, and then only, is the Word Himself in His personal reality, as distinct from all His activities, and superior to all His influences, made manifest and actual to man. "Our truth is more sublime than all human doctrine," says Justin, "on account of the entirety with which the divine Reason has appeared, for our sakes, as Christ, being manifested as body, and reason, and spirit" (Apol. ii. 10, § 48, B). It is because the Word of the absolute and ineffable God has "become a man for our sakes, sharing our passions, and curing our ills," that we surpass all the philosophers whose wisdom we claim to be ours (Apol. ii. 13, § 50). Christians now can worship and love the Word. They possess in Him a doctor who will authoritatively determine the truth, separating it from the confusions introduced into it by the demons (Apol. ii. 13, § 51; Apol. ii. 9, § 48, B). He has thus made the certain and secure revelation of the Father, which Socrates pronounced to be so difficult and perilous by the way of human reasoning; and He has made this revelation effective and universal, by being Himself no mere reasoner, but the very Power of the Ineffable God (δύναμις ἐστὶ τοῦ Πατρὸς, Apol. ii. 10, § 49, A; cf. Apol. i. 23, § 68, B). This Power of God avails to ensure security of truth to those even who cannot use reasoning effectively, to artisans and utterly unlearned people.

The identification of the man Christ Jesus with the antecedent Word of God is entire and unhesitating. Nothing can exceed Justin's preciseness. "Christ who was known in part by Socrates, for He was and is the Word which is in every man, and foretold things both by the prophets and in His own Person, when He took upon Him our nature and taught these things" (Apol. ii. 10, § 49, A). Here it is identically the same Person who is known to Socrates, and inspires the prophets, and taught mankind in the flesh (cf. Apol. i. 23: "Jesus Christ, who is the Word of God, His First-born, His Power, His only Son, was also made man;" cf. Apol. i. 63, § 96, A).

In consequence of the pre-existence, the Incarnation could only be effected by a supernatural birth. It is because the Christ existed personally in Himself before the ages, and then endured to be born as a man, that He could not be begotten by man, but must be born solely by the will of the Father who originally begat Him. Such a birth would be unnecessary for a human Christ; those, therefore, who held that God's Christ was not pre-existent or Divine, would not hold that He was born supernaturally of a virgin. So Justin claims that Trypho might accept the proofs that Jesus was Christ, even though he should fail to convince him of the eternal pre-existence and virgin-birth of Jesus (Dialog. 48, § 267, B); and here Justin confesses that some who are called Christians, and acknowledge Jesus to be Christ, yet hold Him to be a man born of men. He denies that he could ever agree with these people, even though the main mass of Christians now agreeing with him were to turn against him: but he speaks of these Ebionites with a mildness that is rather startling when we consider the immense strength and definiteness of His own belief, with which belief his own church, as he tells us, fully agreed, and which belief he would himself hold, on the supreme authority of the prophets and of Christ's own words, even though a majority in His church were ever to abandon it. Apparently he is justifying the possibility of the pis-aller, which he proposes to Trypho. It is a novelty to Trypho, it seems, to hear of there being such Christians: he expects them to hold what Justin holds. Evidently, the common church faith in the pre-existence and divinity of Christ is so entire that it already has a theology which is anxious to use the agony in the garden and the bitter cry on the cross as proofs that Christ was actually a man who could suffer pain (Dialog. 103, § 331, D, &c.), as if it were the humanity that was more likely to be doubted than the divinity. This supernatural birth is justified by Isaiah's prophecy (which he accuses the Jews of having corrupted, by changing παρθένος into νεάνις, and which the demons have caricatured in the myth of Perseus) (Dialog. 68, § 294), by Psalm cx.: "From the womb I begat thee" (Dial. 63, 286, D); and from many other texts in which Justin sees it foreshadowed that the blood of Christ would come not by human mixture, but solely by the will of God (Apol. i. 32, § 74; Dialog. 76, § 301). His language on this goes so far, that it seems sometimes hardly consistent with the perfect manhood of Christ. He is "like a son of man," i. e. not born of human seed. His blood is called the "blood of the grape," because it came not to Him from man, but direct from the will of the Father. He is the "stone cut without hands," &c.

The purpose of the Incarnation is to save men from evil deeds and evil powers, and to teach assured truth (Apol. i. 23, § 68, C; ἐπ' ἀλλαγῇ καὶ ἐπαναγωγῇ τοῦ ἀνθρωπείου γένους; Apol. ii. 9, § 48, B). He brings to bear the full divine energy (ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Πατρὸς) on a race diseased and deceived through the action of devils. So He is the medicine to cure (Apol. ii. 13, § 51, D), which He becomes by sharing our humanity (τῶν παθῶν τῶν ἡμετέρων συμμετόχος). He is therefore called the Saviour (Apol. i. 61, § 94, A), in whom we receive remission of sins and regeneration. His mode of action is by (1) teaching, as the Word, which is no mere persuasive argument but is a Power penetrating deeper than the sun into the recesses of the soul (Dialog. 121, § 350, A), enabling us not only to hear and understand, but to be saved (Apol. ii. 12, § 49). His truth is an absolute canon by which to sift the true from the false in human speculations, since He, the Entire Word, distinguishes with certainty, amid the confusion of the philosophies, that in them which is His own working. So completely and uniquely authoritative is He, that it is by His teaching alone that men rightly know and worship the one Father and God (Apol. i. 13). (2) He saves, secondly, by suffering on the cross: so sharing in all the reality of our flesh (cf. Dialog. 98, § 324, D, γέγονεν ἄνθρωπος ἀντιληπτικός παθῶν). He destroys death by death. He gains possession of men by the cross (cf. Dialog. 134, § 364, C, δι' αἵματος καὶ μυστηρίου τοῦ σταυροῦ κτησάμενος αὐτούς). By His blood He loosens the power of the devil (Dialog. 94, § 322, A); He removes death (Dialog. 105, § 332); by His blood He purifies those who believe (Apol. i. 32, § 74, A): hence, He, as crucified, is the Priest, the Eternal High Priest (cf. Dialog. 116, 343, E). Man's power to keep blameless, and to drive out devils, follows the economy of His Passion (Dialog. 31, § 247, D). Hence He is called βοηθός and λυτρωτής (Dialog. 30, § 247, C), the hope of Christians is hung on the crucifixion of Christ (Dialog. 96, § 323, C). By His stripes we are healed (Dialog. 17, § 234, E, 336, D). So He is the Paschal Lamb, who saves from death by the sprinkling of blood (Dialog. 111, § 338, C). He saved, by submitting to that which all men deserved for sin, i. e. the curse pronounced on all who kept not the law; therefore He was crucified, because the curse lay on crucifixion; but He was no more under God's curse when He endured our curse, than was the Brazen Serpent, which was ordered by God, though He had condemned all images. God saved of old by an image without violating the Second Commandment; He saves now, by a Crucified, those who are worthy of the Curse, without, for that, laying His Curse on the Crucified. It is the Jews, and not God, who now fulfil the text by "cursing him that hung on the tree" (Dialog. 96, 323). This cross and suffering the Father willed for man's sake, that on His Christ might fall the curse of all men: He willed it, knowing that He would raise Him again from this death, as Christ testified on the cross by His appeal to the Father. This coming of Christ to be despised, to suffer, to die, is justified by many appeals to prophecy, especially to Psalm xxii. (Dialog. 98, § 325), to Jacob's blessing, Genesis xlix. 8, 12, &c. It is the "hidden power of God which is exhibited in the crucified Christ" (Dialog. 49, § 269, c). This power (ἰσχύς τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ σταυροῦ, Dialog. 91, § 318, b) began to manifest its hidden efficacy, from the day of the resurrection; those who have faith in the cross, and exercise penitence, are, through the power of Christ, the great and eternal priest, stripped of the filthy garments of sin, and clothed with new robes, and made priests, through whom everywhere sacrifices are offered (Dialog. 116, § 344). Christ Himself is raised from the grave, to be led up into heaven, by the Father, there to be retained until He shall strike down all the devils His enemies, and until the number of the elect righteous shall be fulfilled, when He will be shewn in glory on the throne of His manifested kingdom. Then will be the great judgment of devils and sinners, but that judgment is delayed solely for the sake of gathering in all who may yet be willing to believe and repent (Apol. i. 45, § 82, d; Apol. ii. 7, § 45, b); till it comes, Christ sends down power on His Apostles, by which they, and all who will, consecrate themselves to the one God (Apol. i. 50, § 86, b, 49, § 85, b). This present efficacy of Christ is evident in the power of Christians over devils, who are bound and expelled by their adjuration (cf. Dialog. 76, § 302, a). This power offered to all, manifests itself especially among the Gentiles, and is rejected by Jew and Samaritan, as many a prophecy had foretold (Dialog. 91, § 319, a; cf. Dialog. 120, § 348, &c. to end of Dialog.). It calls men by the road of faith into friendship and blessing, and penitence and compunction, and assures them of a kingdom to come, eternal and incorruptible (cf. Dialog. 139, § 369, a). All on whom the power of the cross comes are gathered with one mind into one synagogue, and one church, a church born of His name and called by His name, addressed by the word in Scripture as His daughter, "Hearken, O daughter" (Dialog. 63, § 287, b). This church is described, with St. Paul's comparison, as one body, ἐν καλεῖται καὶ ἕστι σῶμα (Dialog. 42, § 261, a).

The eternal kingdom comes with Christ's second advent, in glory, as judge. He will judge every man, up to Adam himself (Dialog. 132, § 362, a); then shall the sinners and the devils weep, for to them He will allot a place in that eternal fire, which will destroy this world; believers He will admit to the kingdom, recalling the dead to life, and establishing them in an eternal and indis-soluble kingdom, themselves incorruptible, immortal, painless (Dialog. 117, § 345, b). This is the Melchisedec, king of Salem, eternal Priest of the Most High, who will remake a new heaven and a new earth, into which holy land His circumcised shall enter (Dialog. 113, § 341, a). This kingdom is generally spoken of as in heaven, as not earthly (cf. Apol. i. 11, § 59, a, &c.); it is a home with God, for the sake of which Christians easily despise all earthly delights, and lusts, and the fear of death. In one famous passage in the Dialogue (80, § 306, b; cf. Dialog. 113, § 341, a) he professes his agreement with the Jewish belief of a millennium in a restored and beautified Jerusalem; he claims to have explained himself already on this point, though nothing is to be found of this explanation in the Dialogue; many share this belief with him, he says, yet many pious and orthodox Christians reject it; it is only those who are, according to Justin, δρθογνώμονες κατὰ πάντα Χριστιανοί, who hold this faith with him, based on Isaiah lxx. 17, and on the Revelation of "one of themselves, by name John, an apostle of Christ," who speaks of a first resurrection, and then a second eternal resurrection and judgment of all men. Evidently there are no words of our Lord's to support this belief; it is a pious opinion, resting on the literal reading of the Apocalypse, held by the most strict believers, but not necessary to a pure and true faith (καθαρὰ καὶ εὐσεβὴς γνώμη). Far different are those who deny the future resurrection of the body altogether, and believe in an immediate entrance of the souls of Christians into heaven: "let Trypho beware of deeming such to be Christians at all." The resurrection of the body is one of the cardinal points of Justin's creed (cf. Apol. i. 18, foll.); it is essential to the reality of future punishment, and to the fulness of a Christian's security against all loss in death; it is to be justified by an appeal to the wonder of our first creation, and to the miracles of Christ (Dialog. 69, § 296, a).

When this Advent will be, we know not, though it may be soon. It will be preceded by the appearance of the Man of Iniquity.

Such is Justin's doctrine on the Second Person in the Godhead. On the action of the Third Person, he is not so definite; not that he is not continually speaking of Him, but His person and office are not always distinguished with precision from those of the Second Person. He is there, in Justin's creed, a recognised element in it, constantly occurring; but it is as if Justin's metaphysic had not yet had time or occasion to dwell on this point with anxiety or exactness.

The most definite mention of Him is in the typical formula for the object of Christian worship, and sacramental service; here He is distinctly allied to the First and Second Persons as the alone Third, who shares with them the adoration of Christians, and the ministrations of grace (cf. Apol. i. 13, § 60, ε, Πνεῦμα προφητικὸν ἐν τρίτῃ τάξει τιμῶμεν, where he is explaining what it is that Christians worship); again, in Apology, i. 60, § 93, b, he claims for the Spirit the truth of that τὸ τρίτον, which Plato was supposed to have suggested. Here, as in the former case, the τρίτον is parallel to ἡ δευτέρα χώρα, the place of the Son, and must, therefore, be understood in something of the same significance as that; and that "second place" signified, we know, a difference in number, in fact, in personality, not a mere logical distinction; yet it included such a unity of substance and will, that the terminology of the Godhead could be directly applied to it, with the exception of those symbols of absolute supremacy, i.e. the titles, "Father," "Creator," &c. As the Holy Spirit is directly included within the lines of the object worshipped, so is He directly implicated in the divine action upon men: thus the baptismal and sacrificial formula unite His name with that of the Father and the Son (Apol. i. 61, § 94, A, 65, § 97, D, 67, § 98, C). He, with the Son, is the medium by which praise and thanksgiving are offered to the Father; His is the third name in the might of which the Christian receives regeneration. One curious passage gives Him a strange place: in Apology, i. 6, § 56, c, Justin refutes the charge of Atheism by claiming that Christians honour and adore (σεβόμεθα καὶ προσκυνούμεν) "both God the Father, and the Son who came from Him, and the host of good angels that follow Him, and are made like to Him, and the Prophetic Spirit also." Here the angels are brought in front of the Spirit, through the need, probably, of expressing their unity with Christ by virtue of which they become the objects of Christian reverence (ἐξομοιοιούμενων). Several attempts have been made to avoid this sudden introduction of the angels, by various interpreters (cf. Otto's note on the passage, edit. vol. i. 1, 21); but it is hardly possible to read the passage otherwise than as it stands. It must be explained by its position; Justin is quite precise and clear in other passages, where the position attributed to the Holy Spirit is definitely marked, and this sentence, therefore, must be interpreted in accordance with them, not they be confused by it. He is, here, quickly and generally, portraying to the emperors the distance between Christianity and Atheism; to do so, he brings in all that made Christian worship most full and multitudinous in character, adding to those whom alone He elsewhere presents as the threefold object of adoration, those Spirits to whom, for their likeness and closeness to God, the Christian church paid honour and reverence. These, if introduced at all, are best introduced in close company with that Divine Person to whom they are peculiarly attached, and from whom especially they derive their title to sanctity (cf. Dialog. 31, § 247, E; Apol. i. 52, § 87-8; Dialog. 61, § 284, B), our Lord being Himself ὁ ἄγγελος, and being therefore named ἀρχιστράτηγος, the captain of the angelic host. Only through Him can they be revered; while the Holy Spirit receives worship by right of Himself. Justin, by throwing in at the end σεβόμεθα with προσκυνούμεν, covers all the varieties of adoration that his inclusion of angels may have made requisite; and he adds λόγῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ τιμῶντες, as if to suggest that there were carefully guarded lines of distinction in the Christian's worship. Elsewhere he shews himself perfectly conscious of the impossibility of paying absolute worship to any but God alone (Apol. i. 16, § 63); in the Dialogue, in order to justify the adoration of Christ, he knows clearly that he must shew Him to be higher than all angels (Dialog. 56, § 276). The whole argument with the Jew exhibits the precision of Justin's distinction between God and His angelic ministers; but, on the other hand, his language in this unique passage evidences the reverential service that could be offered, according to Christian use, to those who had been fashioned into the likeness of Christ.

The Holy Spirit is concerned with creation (Apol. i. 60, § 93, B), in His distinct personal fullness, as ὁ τρίτος, with a third station peculiar to Himself (τρίτη χώρα) in the Godhead.

His main office is with inspiration; He is τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ προφητικόν; this is His cardinal name. He speaks as Himself to man, using men as His organ (διὰ Μωϋσέως προεμήνυσε, Apol. i. 60, § 93, B); here, since the words follow the statement of the place of the Holy Spirit in the Triad, they must definitely intend Him in His distinction from the Word, to be the spring of inspiration; so, too, in the formula of baptism, it is the name of προφητικόν, which marks His distinction from the Word; and we must, therefore, apply to Him in His separate right and existence, the constantly recurring use of this name (cf. Apol. i. 38, § 77, C; 47, § 84, A, &c. &c.), in all which occasions He is spoken of as the direct author and speaker of prophecy, and prophecy is spoken of as peculiarly the note of God (Apol. i. 30, § 72, B, &c.). This Spirit is one throughout; it spoke once in Elias, and afterwards in the Baptist (Dialog. 49, 268). But for all this, Justin sometimes attributes to the Word this action of inspiration which gives to the Spirit His name (cf. Apol. i. 36, § 76, D); the prophets speak through the Word which moves them; and so again in Apol. i. 33, § 75, D, θεοφοροῦνται λόγῳ θεῶν (cf. also Dialog. 61, § 284, c, 62, § 285, 63, § 236, D). In both cases it is the effective agency by which the prophets are stirred to speak, which is attributed to the Word; and Justin attributes this on grounds which he expects the heathen emperors to acknowledge, it is language they must understand (Apol. i. 33). The action of God on man is so intimately bound up with the Word, by Justin, that it is rather wonderful how much of inspiration he attributes to the Spirit, than how little. It was natural to the Jew, as to the Gentile philosopher, to speak of the divine influence under which men spoke from God, as the Δόγος. It is impossible to suppose Justin did not discriminate between the two, when we remember the baptismal formula "in the name of the Holy Ghost" (Apol. i. 60, § 94, E). A more remarkable introduction of the Word is in Apol. i. 33, § 75, c, where the Spirit and Power of God that overshadowed the Virgin are identified with the Word. Justin, it seems, is attracted by the word ἡ δύναμις, which is for him a distinct name of the Word (Apol. i. 14), and he may think that this defines the meaning of the πνεῦμα here (cf. 2 Cor. iii. 17). The πνεῦμα, then, will be the divine power of Christ. In this interpretation Justin does not stand alone. (Cf. Clement, Ep. ch. 9; cf. also the very obscure passage in Hermes the Shepherd, 6th Siml., and Tert. adv. Prax. ch. 26.)

Below the Godhead, Justin holds very decisively the belief (1) in good angels, attached intimately to our Lord (cf. former quotations), messengers of God in Old and New Testament, fed in heaven on some manna (Dialog. 57, § 279, c), accompanying Christ in His glory on the last day; and (2) more particularly in bad angels, to whom the earth and man had been committed by God (Apol. ii. 5, § 44, A), but who overstepped their limits in wicked intercourse with women, who, from them, bore sons, the devils; they reduced the human race to servitude, by deceitful magic, and by terror, and by instituting sacrifices, &c. to themselves, for which they lusted now that they had known the passion of fleshly desires: they sowed the seeds of war, adultery, crime. Chief among them is he who is called the Serpent, the tempter of Adam and Eve, the Devil, Satan, a name ascribed to him by our Lord Himself at His temptation, signifying Apostate and Serpent (Apol. i. 28, § 71, B; Dialog. 103, § 331, B). Poets and mythologists mistook these bad angels for Gods, and sang their evil deeds, and popularised the names of them and of their brood (Apol. ii. 5, § 44). These devils, knowing the Scripture prophecies, attempted to baffle their effect, by inventing and multiplying false fulfilments of them; so it is that mythology speaks of Sons of God, born of women, of Bacchus, e.g. riding on His ass, and of His violent death, and His ascent into heaven; of Perseus virgin-born, of Hercules, "strong as a giant," of Aesculapius raising the dead. The poets, therefore, though ignorantly, were the tools of the devils, as Plato had said (Apol. ii. 10, § 48, D). So, again, the devils confused human instincts of law, and framed laws to suit their own wickedness. One thing they never discovered in prophecy, the sign of the Cross, though the symbol occurs everywhere, in masts, in rudders, in trophies, in the Brazen Serpent, in the uplifting of Moses' hands for victory, &c. (Apol. i. 55, § 90, C; Dialog. 36, § 313). They had caricatured Christian ordinances, e.g. the Eucharist in the services of Mithra (Apol. i. 66, § 98, C); baptism in the temple and sprinklings (Apol. i. 62, § 94, E). They had, since Christ came, attempted to produce the same confusion by prompting heretics (Apol. i. 56, § 91, A). All along they had inspired persecution of those who were moved by the Germinal Word (Apol. ii. 8, § 46, C), Heraclitus, Musonius, Socrates; and now, above all, they urged persecution against Christians, not being able to stop the knowledge of Christ's advent, or of the last judgment, but only able to prompt all wicked livers to hate and kill them (Apol. i. 57, § 91, D). The judges who persecute are devil-inspired (Apol. ii. 1, § 41, D). It was to free us from these devils that Christ became Man; His power is made manifest in the dominion that Christians exercise even now over devils (Apol. ii. 6, § 45, A); which power is an omen of their utter overthrow at the second coming of Christ, when they will be cast into eternal fire (cf. Apol. ii. 8, § 46, E). So the prophets foretell; and Jesus Christ Himself has taught.

The problem presented by the human Soul occupies the chief place in the account of Justin's conversion; the philosophers were felt to be uncertain and insecure in their conception of it, especially in the matter of its immortality, and of its consequent transmigration, and of its relation to the divine substance. Justin holds that the soul is no particle of the absolute mind, it has no life in itself: it is created, it is not life, but partaker of life, so that it could perish; but it receives, as a fact, immortality by the will of God, as is proved by a mass of practical testimony, by the word of Revelation, and by its consonance with the needs of justice; this immortality includes as its essential requisite the resurrection of the body, without which Justice could not fulfil itself; it will be given both to the just and to the unjust (cf. Dialog. 4, 5, 6; Apol. i. 21, § 67, D; 18, 19, § 65), though it is only rightly "immortality" for the just; for the others, it takes the shape of eternal fire. Justin can hardly be said to define the parts of the soul; the passage in which he seems to give it a triple constitution is very obscure; if it is intended to be exact, then the triplicity is named by him, body, reason (λόγος), and soul; but it is conceivable that only a dual division of human nature is intended (Apol. ii. 10, § 48, C).

Man, according to Justin, has been imprisoned in sin, since the fall of Adam, the first man, deceived of the devil, who fell greatly by deceiving Eve; hence "ye shall die" (Dialog. 124, § 353, D, ὁμοίως τῷ Ἀδὰμ καὶ τῇ Εὔᾳ ἐξομοιούμενοι, θάνατον ἑαυτοῖς ἐργάζονται), though originally made θεῶ ὁμοίως ἀπαθείς καὶ ἀθάνατοι (cf. Dialog. 88, § 316, A). Man, as the angels, was made so as to be incorruptible, if he kept God's laws. This biblical view falls in with his account of the whole human race, as sinning through the deceit of evil angels, who made them think their own bad passions to be possible in gods. This evil state, thus brought on, is spoken of as a tyranny from which man had to be delivered by another (cf. Dialog. 116, § 344, A; Apol. ii. 6, § 45, A); Christ comes ἐπὶ καταλύσει τῶν δαιμόνων. The whole race is under the curse; for, if the Jews were, by the laws of Moses, much more were the Gentiles with their horrible idolatry (Dialog. 95, § 322, D). Only by Christ is the curse removed; it is He who wrestles for us, our Israel, with the devil (Dialog. 125, § 354, D). Only by His grace are the devils made subject. But Justin combines with this a great anxiety to keep man's free-will intact; he is continually explaining himself on this point. Man is never deserted of God; he possesses, after the fall, the germinal λόγος, by which he discerns between good and evil, between true and false (cf. Dialog. 93, § 320, D; Apol. ii. 10). All men, unless utterly corrupted by evil angels and evil customs, distinguish right from wrong, even though they do the wrong; they all can love God, and do to their neighbour what they would have done to themselves. Man, then, though he sins since Adam, sins, each by his own act, freely (cf. Dialog. 88, § 316, A); for God made man ἐν ἐλευθέρᾳ προαιρέσει αὐτεξουσίους: all men could be sons of the Most High, all will separately be judged, as were Adam and Eve (Dialog. 124, § 354). Without this free power of choice, God could not justly reward or punish; the good laws and right thoughts of philosophers are a testimony to this power (Apol. ii. 7, § 46, A; Apol. i. 43, § 80, D). Justin frequently guards against Jew or Gentile supposing that the fore-ordained purpose of God, revealed by prophecy, removes in any way human responsibilities (Apol. i. 43, § 80). Man cannot be under any fixed fate, since he is obviously capable of alternative courses; so agrees Moses, "Behold in thy sight I have set good and evil;" so Plato, αἰτία ἐλομένου, θεὸς ἀναίτιος, hearing it from Moses. Prophecy comes from the fore-knowledge of God, fore-seeing how men will act, and foretelling the certain and irrevocable issue of such action (Apol. i. 44, § 82). He can fore-see that some men and angels will be ἀμεταβλήτως ποιητοί; but, yet, all may repent if they will, and by penitence be forgiven, even though some, as a fact, will never do so. Justin does not seem to exclude the angels from this hope (Dialog. 141, § 370, B). The Jews, therefore, cannot possibly plead that it was decreed of God that they should slay Christ. Yet, even after all this, Justin can still state that our natural birth placed us, of necessity, and without our knowledge, in the power of evil habits and a bad education, and can call us, so far, "the sons of ignorance and necessity" (Apol. i. 61, § 94, C). Evidently, he has not worked out a solution of this difficulty; he is resolute to retain free choice, yet, as a fact, sin was practically a universal necessity. Here he leaves us.

The gift of Christ to man is primarily remission of sins (cf. Dialog. 116, § 344, &c.), affected through penitence on man's part, excited by the word of his call into the true faith in the Creator; by Christ's power, sin is stripped off; is remitted; we are made regenerate (Apol. i. 61, § 94, D). This regeneration accomplished, and the truth being now known and confessed, we become bound, and fit, to accomplish a good life, to keep the commandments, to attain eternal life (Apol. i. 65, § 97, C). We are clothed with garments prepared of Christ (Dialog. 116, § 344); we are to imitate God's own virtues, to exhibit ourselves worthy of His counsel by works (Apol. i. 10, § 58, B). The entire change of character is beautifully given in Apol. i. 14, § 61, 15, &c. Christ comes to call men, not as just and chaste, but as impious, incontinent, unjust; but the result of the call is entire consecration to the good God, with complete holiness, the holiness of those who cannot escape the eye of God, and who will be judged according to the worth of their works (cf. Apol. i. 12, § 59, B); those only will be given immortality who approach nearer to God in holiness of life (Apol. i. 21, § 67, E). This can be done because Christ's word is with power; so that even women and the ignorant can be made chaste, and true to God. They look to a kingdom immortal, and holy; they are, therefore, incapable of damage or hurt on earth; nothing can touch them; they think little of unjust rulers, who at the worst can only kill them (Apol. i. 2, § 54, A; 11, § 59, A). Not that they are not good citizens of this world; rather they have all the virtues which human laws try in vain to produce; rulers ought to be glad of such citizens, who are their best auxiliaries for peace (Apol. i. 12, § 59); they do not dispute human authority in the state, they pray for it, they gladly obey it, they pay tribute, as Christ Himself taught them (Apol. i. 17, § 64, D); they will accept its punishments on wrong-doings, only they require it to act by reason, and with a sound mind. They consider that God made the human race with a purpose; therefore they may not abandon it, e.g. by all committing suicide; they have their duties towards it (Apol. ii. 4, § 43, C). It is for the sake of continuing this humanity for which God has plans, and for this alone, that they marry (Apol. i. 29, § 71, D); there are Christians yet unborn.

The most prevailing guard of this pure living is the belief in the resurrection of the body; for this hope consecrates the entire man to the holiness of the eternal kingdom; and still more, it renders real the sense of future punishment; we shall feel torture, hereafter, in our bodies; without this, future pain would be unreal and meaningless, for there would be no sensation (Apol. i. 18, § 65).

God will raise and endue with incorruptibility the dead bodies, now dissolved and scattered like seeds over the earth (Apol. i. 19).

This human race will endure until the number of those who are willing to become Christians is complete. It is because God acts by the free choice of man, that He does not destroy evil by force, but offers men the chance of escape, and gives them time to use the chance (Dialog. 102, 329, A).

The punishment that awaits the sinners, when the end comes, will be by fire, and for ever. On this point Justin is very pronounced (cf. Apol. i. 8, § 57, B): "an eternal punishment" (αἰώνιον κόλασιν), he says, "and not a mere period of a thousand years," ἀπαύστως κολάζεσθαι (Dialog. 45, 264, B); the kingdom is αἰώνιος καὶ ἄλυστος, the κόλασις πυρός is αἰώνιος too (Dialog. 117, § 345). He uses the language freely, and frankly, unhampered, apparently, by his theory of the soul, which makes its immortality dependent on the Will of God, Who wills it in the shape of Holiness (cf. Iren. bk. iii. 36; cf. Apol. i. 21, § 67). He justifies the existence of reward and punishment by the forcible argument, that, without them, you are compelled either to believe God indifferent to good and evil, or else good and evil to have no real actuality; both which beliefs are impious. The judgment is the witness of God's regard to the reality of the distinction (cf. Apol. ii. 9, § 47, E; cf. Apol. i. 28, § 71, C).

The church is that society of Christians in which the power of the regeneration is faithfully manifested, and the pure knowledge revealed in Christ loyally held; so Justin is anxious to explain that not all so-called Christians are real Christians, any more than all so-called philosophies mean the same thing (Apol. i. 7, § 56, D). There are many, professing to confess Christ, who hold impious and immoral doctrine, with whom the "disciples of the true and pure doctrine" do not communicate; they are marked out to be heretical by assuming the names of their particular founders, e.g. Marcion, Valentinus, Basilides (Dialog. 35, § 253, D). He compares them to the numerous Jewish sects (Dialog. 80, § 307, A). He speaks of them as prompted by the devils to bring discredit and confusion on the true faith. He instances as points of their falling away, "eating meat offered to idols" (Dialog. 35, § 253, A); disbelief in the God of the Old Testament (cf. Apol. 58, § 92, A); disbelief in the divinity of Christ (Dialog. 48, § 267, D); disbelief in the personal subsistence of Christ (Dialog. 128, 358, A; cf. Dialog. 130, § 359, A, on the sophistical rendering of Gen. iii. 22); disbelief in the future resurrection when the soul will recover its body and so enter heaven (Dialog. 80, 307, A). Such heresies Justin calls blasphemous, and impious, and atheistical, and devilish. He knows quite clearly how true believers stand towards them; there is a definite line. There are other varieties of opinion more or less tolerated; e.g. the disbelief in a literal millennium (Dialog. 80, 306, C); the surference of those Christians who think it right to retain the habits of the law.

The true Christians hold "the pure teaching of Jesus Christ;" they possess a pure and pious doctrine based on Scripture, and the words of Christ, not on human doctrine (Dialog. 48, § 269, D); they prove them true by holiness (cf. Apol. i. 26, § 70, B); the heretics may be capable of any wickedness for all Justin knows. He himself is quite clear and decided on which side he himself is in all this; he has himself written a work against all the heresies (Apol. i. 26, § 70, c).

The heresies confirm true believers in the faith, since Christ foretold them (cf. Dialog. 82, § 308, b; 35, § 253, c), even though many are led away.

The true believers are admitted to the body by the rite of baptism, on their acceptance of Christian verity, and their promise to live accordingly (Apol. i. 61, § 93, e). This baptism is the true circumcision of the Spirit (Dialog. 43, § 261, d); it works with the cross to expiate our sins (Dialog. 86, § 314, a); it is appointed by Christ Himself for the remission of sins; it is our regeneration, by which we are born again out of a state of sin into Light and Holiness; so called "illumination," φωτισμός (Apol. i. 61, 74). It presupposes penitence and a confession of faith (Apol. i. 61, 65).

Baptism admits to the brotherhood, the assembly, where common prayers are made (Apol. i. 65, § 97, c); where the kiss of peace is given; and the Eucharist offered by the leader of the brethren, ὁ προεστώς; who takes the bread, and water and wine brought him, and sends up praise and glory to the Father, in the name of the Son and the Holy Spirit; at the end of his thanksgiving the people give their good consent by together saying, "Amen;" after this thanksgiving, εὐχαριστία, the deacons administer the elements, with which thanks have been offered (τοῦ εὐχαριστηθέντος ἄρτου), to each one present, and carry some away to the absent. This food is itself called the Eucharist; no one may eat of it who does not believe the truth taught, and has not been washed by baptism; for it is not ordinary bread or wine, κοινὸν ἄρτον, but "in the very manner that Jesus Christ became incarnate by the word of God, had, for our salvation, both flesh and blood, so have we been taught that the food, which has been made a thanksgiving by the word of prayer which He gave us, by which food our own flesh and blood are, through a process of transformation, nourished, is both the flesh and the blood of that same incarnate Jesus;" he goes on to quote from the books of the apostles, the account of the institution of the Last Supper; and compares it with the initiatory offerings in the mysteries of Mithra (Apol. i. 65-66, § 97). In this passage the Incarnation is spoken of, as elsewhere, as the work of the Word Himself; though He is Himself the Incarnate One (cf. Apol. i. 32, 74, b, ὁ λόγος ὃς σαρκοποιήθεις ἄνθρωπος γέγονεν). The principle of the Eucharist is found in the principle of the Incarnation (though the analogy is hardly to be pressed into details); it is the flesh and blood of Christ, taken for our salvation, that are identified with the food; which food is itself so intimately allied with our flesh and blood that it still nourishes our actual bodies κατὰ μεταβολήν, though it is the flesh and blood of Jesus, after the word of prayer, δὲ εὐχῆς λόγου (by some rendered, "Prayer of His word," cf. Otto's notes, p. 181, of 3rd edit.), which He Himself instituted, i.e. the words ordained by Christ, given by Justin as "Do this in remembrance of Me: this is My body: this is My blood" (some have supposed it to mean the Lord's Prayer). In the Dialogue, 117, § 345, a, Justin speaks again of the "dry and liquid food" in which memorial is made by Christians, according to a received institution, of the suffering of the Son of God, τὸ πάθος ὃ πέποιθε. This memorial is there identified with those prayers and thanksgivings, offered by holy people, which alone are the sacrifices which are perfect and well-pleasing to God, in contrast with the Jewish sacrifices, and in fulfilment of Malachi i. 10. These sacrifices (θυσίαι) occur at the Eucharist of the bread and of the cup; the spiritual sacrifice of praise is then and there alone accomplished, by God's injunction. Isaiah xxxiii. 13, again, is fulfilled in the bread which our Christ ordered us (παρέδωκεν) to offer (ποιεῖν) for a memorial of His having taken to Himself a body, and so become possible (παθητός) (Dialog. 70, § 296, e). The words must be left as they stand; it is impossible to discuss them in this article.

Justin goes on to mention, beside the Eucharist which followed the baptism, that the Christians met every Sunday (ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου ἡμέρα), the day on which God began creation, and raised Christ (Apol. i. 67, § 97); that all came in who could, from country and town, to one place; that there the memorials of the apostles, or the books of the prophets were read publicly; then, the leader preached and admonished; after which all rose together and prayed; that then the rite is administered as before described. At such times, offertories were made, of voluntary gifts, laid in the hands of the leader, who distributed them to the sick, widows, &c. "Ever," says Justin, "do we remind ourselves of this rite" which followed our baptism; and "ever we live together; we who are rich give to the poor; and for everything that we have we bless the Creator of all through Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit" (Apol. i. 67); sending up to Him solemn prayers (προμνάς) and hymns, not deeming Him to be in need of blood, and libations, and sweet smells (Apol. i. 13, § 60, c). Sunday, then, was observed as a day of peculiar mark (cf. Dialog. 24, 241, b); this is in contrast with σαββαρίζειν, and "regarding the stars," which mean, distinctly, keeping the Jewish feasts; this the main body of Christians repudiated, so that it was by most treated as a criminal heresy to keep the sabbath, and they refused to hold communion with those Christians who still held to these Jewish customs. This severity Justin condemns; but his whole argument with Trypho accepts thoroughly the abolition of the Fourth Commandment. The sabbath symbolises Moses, and Christians hope not in Moses but in Christ; the Christian does not think himself pious for keeping one day idle, but for keeping a continual sabbath. The sabbath was given for the hardness of the Jews' hearts (cf. Dialog. 10, § 227, b, &c.; 19, § 237, c, 21, § 238).

The Law.—We may here touch on Justin's conception of the Law. He is in this very strong and decided. Definite as he is against Marcion, in his belief in the revelation of the true God made in the Old Testament, he yet takes an extreme view of the partial, and local, and temporal character of the Law. He bases himself, mainly, on his well-known principle of the complete universality of God: God is everlasting, throughout all time, over all people; He is the Judge of all the earth; His justice must be alike everywhere. Hence He cannot shut up His relations to man within the limits of a Law addressed to a single people, and for a limited period of time (Dialog. 23, § 240, e, 93, 320, c).

Facts prove this: for God was well-pleased with Abel, Enoch, Noah, Melchisedec, though they were uncircumcised and kept no sabbaths (cf. Dialog. 19, § 236, c). Again, if virtue lay in the mere act of circumcision, women would be in a worse case than men (Dialog. 23, § 241, c). It would be against God's nature to value such rites, and limitations, and new sacrifices, for their own sake, as if the good lay in them. Did the law, then, not come from Him? Yes; but God in it accommodated Himself to the Jews; it was for you Jews alone that it was necessary; because you forgot Him, He had to decree your sabbaths; because you fell away to idols, He had to demand of you sacrifices (Dialog. 19, § 236, b). He ordered you a temple, lest you should worship images. All was done to distinguish the Jewish race from the heathen; and this, not on account of the race's virtue, so much as for its proneness to evil.

To justify this, Justin appeals to the "everlasting voice of prophecy;" he quotes the many words of the prophets in which sabbaths and sacrifices are declared displeasing and unavailing. "I am not inventing all this," he says, but "this is what David sang, Isaiah preached, Zechariah proclaimed, Moses wrote" (Dialog. 29). Where the prophets insist on the laws, it was because of the people's sin (Dialog. 27, § 244, b). But Justin has, still, to account for the law being, in a relative sense, worthy of God; and this He does by distinguishing two elements in it, one eternal, the other temporal; the two stand to each other chiefly as sign and reality; so Justin discovers in the temporal provisions of the law allegories of eternal truths. This is what was meant when Moses gave minute rules about meats, and herbs, and drinks; it was to symbolise the moral laws (cf. Dialog. 20, § 237, c), but the Jewish people took it literally. They supposed, e.g. some herbs to be evil, some good; while, in truth, God meant all to be good, if it was profitable to men. The circumcision under Joshua was allegorical (cf. Dialog. iii. § 332). So, again, meat was a symbol of Christ; so, too, the Passover Lamb, and the scape-goats (Dialog. 40, 41, § 259, a). But if the law was allegorical, symbolic, it necessarily ceased when the reality came. So it ended with Christ; who has enabled us to sever the eternal from the temporal elements: He is the test and canon of what was real in the Law (Dialog. 67, § 292, c).

If Christ took away sin, He took away the reason for the law; He gave us the circumcision of the heart, which made the carnal circumcision needless (cf. βαπτισθητε την ψυχην ἀπὸ ὁργῆς καὶ ἰδού, τὸ σῶμα καθαρὸν ἔσται: Dialog. 14, 231, d). It will be observed that Justin does not consider that such a principle as this negatives the necessity of an outward baptism, or of an outward Sunday; for both these he holds. Prophecy confirms this; it speaks of a new covenant to be made in a Christ; and this for Jew as well as for Gentile, for both are to be saved in the same Christ (Dialog. 64, § 287, b). Why, then, did Christ keep the Law? Out of the economy of God; He accepted the Law as He accepted the Cross, and the becoming-man: it was in order to carry out the Father's will; but He was not justified by keeping the Law; otherwise He could not be the Saviour of all men (Dialog. 67, § 292, a), nor have introduced a new covenant.

The admission of the eternal significance of Christ necessarily carries us back behind the Law, to the conditions under which all men had always lived (Dialog. 23, § 241, b).

"The failure of the Jews to believe in the Christ is no argument for their being right; for it is foretold all along that the Gentiles are the children of prophecy, the true Israel, the perfect proselytes; it is of them that all the good promises are spoken. The whole of the end of the Dialogue is devoted to shewing this.

We realise in Justin the complete Gentilism of the Christianity of 140 A.D. He regards the Law rather as an evidence of peculiar evil, than of peculiar good, in the Jews; so he even says in scorn that circumcision only serves to mark them out for condemnation, as the accursed who are forbidden to enter Jerusalem; it enables the Romans to exclude them from the Holy Land. He attempts to make the law pedagogic to a certain degree; but only in view of especial sins; and, though the interpretation by allegory serves to redeem the Law to some extent, we see how imperfect a mode of interpretation it was, as long as no conception of gradual growth in God's scheme and in man's powers was ready to hand, to give the requisite elasticity. The question remains for Justin, why did God use allegory? and he can only answer, "For your sins." St. Paul's great language had to sleep in men's ears, until the reality of development was more fully opened. The allegorical mode is intensely interesting, as a herald, a beginning, of this; its principle is full of real significance; but it is still too abstract to deal with details effectively; in these it remains arbitrary, and far-fetched, and wilful.

But if Justin is hard upon the Law, he is very different towards Prophecy. On Prophecy, on Scripture, he relies absolutely; he asks to be believed, only so far as he can prove his truth by Scripture. It is the word of God, given by God through the Word, or chiefly through the Spirit. This is reiterated continually.

The whole Old Testament is as a great drama, with various actors, but of which there is a single author, the Spirit of God (Apol. i. 36, § 76, d). It is a unity; so that Justin does not believe that any one part can contradict any other; rather he would feel bound to confess his own ignorance, where such seemed the case, not daring to conceive a contradiction or error possible (Dialog. 65, § 289, c). His definition is this: "Certain men existed among the Jews, God's prophets, through whom the prophetic spirit foretold things before they occurred" (Apol. i. 31, § 72, b). Moses he calls the first; after Moses he speaks of an "eternal prophecy going forth" (Apol. i. 31; Dialog. 30, § 247, a). They foretold Christ, His coming, His birth from a virgin, His coming to man's estate, His curing disease, and raising the dead, His being hated and despised, and fixed to a cross, His death, resurrection, and ascension, His being, and being called, the Son of God, His sending out apostles, His success among the Gentiles (Apol. i. 31, § 73, a). Justin claims that this interpretation of Scripture is his chief and only proficiency (Dialog. 58, § 280, b); it requires the aid of grace; the Jews have never been able to understand them aright; their eyes are blinded. He charges them with having corraptured the Septuagint in order to avoid Christian interpretations (cf. Dialog. 71, § 297, B). In some of the cases he mentions we find all our authorities to be on the side of the Jewish text (cf. Dialog. 73, § 289, C, on the famous "a ligno"). It seems probable that Justin used a text current in the church, and justified, more or less insensibly, by Christian interpretations. In the text of the Septuagint he has unbounded trust; he believes it to represent the original, composed by Jewish translators sent by Herod at the request of Ptolemy, king of Egypt (Apol. i. 31, § 71, D).

Justin offers a very storehouse of Christian interpretations of Scripture, such as it is impossible to classify briefly; the strongest lines lie (1) in the exhibition of the divine plurality, through which Justin can, while retaining the absolute purity and separateness of God the Father such as the Jewish monotheism made imperative, yet justify and correlate together all the manifold manifestations of Himself by God under local and temporal qualifications, all of which receive their true and complete elucidation in the Incarnation. A unity of principle gathers the whole multiplied variety of revelation into a single unbroken process crowned in the taking of flesh; He whose nature it is to be the expression and exhibition of the Father's will, was at the tent door with Abraham, in the dream with Jacob, in the midst of the burning bush with Moses, at the camp side with Joshua, above the cherubim with Isaiah, and now, finally, is made man of Mary (cf. Dialog. 75, § 301, A). The Jew's faith involved an antithesis within its monotheism which was gradually becoming apparent to him, and of which Justin held the triumphant solution in his hands; he applies it fearlessly throughout the whole compass of the Old Testament, holding as he does, "that God the Father, the unutterable Lord, never can come into any separate place, nor walks, nor rises, nor sleeps, but abides ever in His own place, hearing and seeing all things by unutterable power; never moving; how could He speak to any one, appear here and there? &c. No, neither Abraham, nor Isaac, nor Jacob, nor any other man ever saw the unutterable Father. He whom they saw and heard was He who by God's will is Himself God, His Son, His angel" (Dialog. 127, § 357, B).

(2) Justin is strong in being able to gather into one the many-sided characteristics of the Messianic prophecy—the many human, mingled with the many divine, names attributed to the Christ: He is man—yet to be adored; He is suffering, yet triumphant; He saves His people, He is rejected by His people. The Jew had to apply this prophecy to one man—and this to another; he had a patchwork fulfilment; he took this and that of Hezekiah, or of Solomon, this of Israel, that of the Christ; and yet all the language used was continually overstepping the limits of applicability to Solomon or Hezekiah, at the same time that it was too human to apply to God; the result must be to give each text a separate interpretation, without regard to continuous consistency. But Justin, in the paradox of the Cross, has a key to the endless paradox of prophecy. All the shifting double-sided revelations of Godhead and manhood, of triumph and suffering, meet in a crucified king. He can give a unity of solution to a Christ who is called "Angel of great Counsel" and "Man" by Ezekiel, "As a Son of man" by Daniel, "Servant" or "Child" by Isaiah, "Christ" and "God" and "Adorable" by David, "Christ" and "the Stone" by many, "Wisdom" by Solomon, "Joseph, Judah, and the Star" by Moses, the "Morning Star" by Zechariah, "Suffering," and "Jacob," and "Israel" by Isaiah, and "Rod," and "Flower," and "Cornerstone" "cut without hands," and "Son of God," who is "despised and rejected," yet also is proclaimed "King of Kings, King of Hosts, King of Glory," and is "Set on the right hand of God," "Born of a virgin," yet "Existent before all the world," "the power of God, the glory of God," "the Word," the "Lord," "the Captain of the Hosts," "King," "Priest," yet also "Man," "the stone," "the child," "the sufferer" (Dialog. 126, § 355, B; 61, § 284, A; 34, § 251, D). Of course it is in giving force to this last characteristic of the Christ, i.e.  $\delta \pi α θ η ρ ό ς$ , at the same time that he gave reality to the highest title,  $\delta \theta ε ο ς \pi ρ ο σ κ υ ν η τ ή ς$ , that Justin shews his power over the Jew, who can only hover aimlessly between the two, unable to deal with or accept either the one or the other, the lowest or the highest. It may be remarked that Justin declares that no one ever understood the prophecy of the sufferings, until Christ opened it to His apostles.

(3) Justin is powerful in his deduction from prophecy of the failure, and unbelief, and ruin of the Jewish race—as the favoured people; and in the change of the manifestation of God from them to the Gentiles. Here he had much at hand which was only a stumbling-block to the strict Jewish reliance on blood and on privilege.

(4) He is successful in exhibiting the newness of Christ's covenant, the New Law, the New Heart; under this conception the continual discontent of God with the old sacrifices and sabbaths gains intensity of meaning; the calls to wash and be clean, and put away sins, are vivified: the prophetic types of a new and wider dispensation are brought into daylight. Cf. the whole latter part of the Dialogue.

Where Justin is weakest, is, naturally, in knowledge. He is ignorant of the original tongue; he is very arbitrary in his interpretation of details; he uses Christ as the accepted key to the whole complicated history, in a way that to a believer is often full of devotional suggestiveness, but to an unbeliever has no argumentative force. Instances may be found in such chapters as 77, 78, of the Dialogue, or ch. 81, &c., &c. He often takes the wrong sense of a passage. He interprets the passages condemnatory of the Jewish Sacrifices, &c., in a way that wins them a new meaning from Christ, but is certainly not their intended meaning. He can only meet Trypho's sharp criticism on this point, by appealing to his own presumption that God's approval of the Law can only have been an accommodation to the people's sins (Dialog. 27, § 244, B).

Prophecy is to Justin the main form of Christian evidences; and this for Gentile as much as for Jew. It is to prophecy he turns to prove that the Christian story of the Incarnation is not a poetic tale, without foundation; Greek mythology offers no testimony to its own reality (Apol. i. 54, § 89, A). To this he turns to prove that Christ's miracles were no magic or conjuring, they were foretold (Apol. i. 30, 31, § 72, A). On the ground of this, he claims that the remaining prophecies still unfulfilled should be believed, e.g. of future punishment, &c. (Apol. i. 52, § 87, A). It is the proof of prophecy which compels you to believe the Scriptures, without the perils and insecurity of an impossible logical demonstration of their truth (Dialog. 7, § 225, A). This is the certainty which Justin had never found elsewhere, to attain which he is converted. To foretell and then to bring to pass, he pleads, is the work of God alone. It will be noticed that Justin is shy of arguing from miracles: there had been too much of false wonder-working for him to appeal to them. As to the old Prophets, he speaks of their miracles as worthy to win them credit, since they were coincident with a lofty desire to reveal God, and with prophecy of Christ (Dialog. 7, § 225, A). Christ's miracles are to be believed on the ground of prophecy (Apol. i. 30). Miracles are, to him, proofs, when they have been testified to, but they cannot stand alone, as evidence.

The other evidence to which Justin appeals, is the (1) purity of Christian precepts (Apol. i. 14, § 61); (2) their constancy under torture (Apol. ii. 12, § 50, A; Dialog. 110, § 337, B); (3) the consecrated lives of uncorrupt virginity, the conversion of penitents to holiness (Apol. i. 15, 62 B, C; cf. Apol. i. 29, § 71, E); (4) the exorcising of demons (Apol. ii. 6, § 45, B); (5) the existence of prophetic gifts in the church (cf. Dialog. 82, § 308, B), as well as of gifts of spiritual power (Dialog. 35, § 254, B), of miracle, of healing (Dialog. 39, § 253, A).

Two points may be shortly referred to. What knowledge Justin displays (1) of Jewish, and (2) of Gentile learning.

He refers frequently to Jewish modes of interpreting texts, he seems used to dealing with them (cf. Dialog. 50, 269, D); but it is possible that he knows them rather in their polemic against Christians than in their own inner teaching. He charges them with escaping from texts against them by throwing doubts on the Septuagint, while all the Messianic texts that can be accommodated to human affairs, they attach to whom they choose, but not to Christ (Dialog. 63, § 294, B). Thus we hear of their attributing the fulfilment of the triumphs spoken of in the Psalms to Solomon, in Isaiah to Hezekiah (Dialog. 64, § 287, A; Dialog. 77, § 302, B). Justin does not seem to know of any Jewish theorising on the problem of the Δόγος. The Jews expect a purely human Christ (Dialog. 49, 268, A), to be heralded by Elias in person, and anointed by him; till which time the Christ is to be in obscurity; he will not even know himself (Dialog. 110, § 336, C). The texts that speak of Christ as passible, yet as God and adorable, they are compelled, Justin says, to attribute to Christ, but they refuse to allow this Jesus to be the Christ, though they have to confess that the Christ will suffer and will be worshipped. The divinity of Christ is, according to this, forced upon the Jews' belief by Christian logic, but they do not know what to make of it, and are in straits. Their natural creed is that He will be born of human parents, and will be raised from obscurity to glory and a kingdom; they cannot endure His being despised, and above all, under the curse of the law, crucified (Dialog. 32, § 249, B). It is the disgrace of the crucifixion, that is the chief point. Trypho easily allows the suffering of the Christ, though it is hard to say whether he held this before Justin's proofs or not (cf. Dialog. 36, § 254; 89, 317, A, C); but dishonour and malediction, these seem impossible and absurd. We may notice the passage in which Justin says that no one understood about the suffering, until Christ opened the Scriptures to His disciples (Dialog. 76, § 303, A). The double advent of Christ is a novel point to them. Their Christ is to be glorified for His perfect righteousness by the law (67, § 291, C). They looked forward to the millennium in Jerusalem (Dialog. 80, § 306, C). Trypho at one point disputes the fact of evil angels, and of their fall (79, § 305, B). As to the conversion of the Gentiles, the Jewish Doctors avoid declaring themselves, on the plea that the character of the Christ cannot be known until He has been made known (Dialog. 110, § 336, C). The world-wide offering of Malachi, the Jews interpreted of their own dispersed members (Dialog. 117, 344, C), the arrival of the Gentiles to the light, of the Geora or Proselytes (Dialog. 122, 350, C). They tried to avoid the plural number in Gen. i. 26, by explaining it of the angels to whom the making of man's body was committed. Justin talks of numerous Jewish heretical sects, Sadducees, Genistae, Meristae, Galilaei, Pharisees, Baptists (Dialog. 80, 307, C). He bitterly attacks their petty modes of argumentation, in which they cling to the tiniest difficulty in the face of a mass of evidence; like flies, they stick to the one sore spot (Dialog. 115, § 343, C), and he alludes constantly to the relentless and unceasing ferocity of the Jewish persecutors against the Christians.

(2) As to Gentile philosophy, Justin's general knowledge was evidently large; but the question remains as to how far he held to any system accurately or scientifically; and here it must be allowed that he sits pretty loose to them all. He places Plato highest of all, and was delighted in his doctrine of Eternal Ideas, but no definite Platonic formulae are used; the Ideas do not appear; the doctrine of the Word has general relations to Platonism, but that is all; it is itself utterly unlike any teaching in Plato; it belongs to the process of thought which has its roots in the Old Testament, and works through Philo up into Christianity. The anticipations of his own position which he finds in Plato are very general and incidental, such as the belief that the right exercise of reason was concerned with the knowledge of God; or the account of our moral probation in free will, as in the myth in the Republic, or the account of the final judgment. In detail, he gives us nothing of Plato's except the account of the "X" as the law of creation, in the Timaeus, which Justin supposes him to have taken from the account of the brazen serpent; and the statement of the triad character of things, which is taken from an epistle attributed till very lately to Plato. He also declares Plato's account of creation from formless matter, to have been taken from Genesis; but he only means this in the most general way, for he seems to fancy that Plato's formula is consistent with Moses' statement that this formless matter had itself been made by God (cf. Apol. i. 59, § 92, D; God made the earth, and the earth was without form). It is perfectly obvious that Justin's relation to Platonism is quite external; he treats him altogether from outside; he holds the Christian formulae, and whenever he detects a likeness to them in Plato, he delights in bringing it out, without regard to context, or system; these likenesses are entirely arbitrary and on the surface, and can never be pressed. Justin's canon of truth is absolutely in Scripture; from that stand-point, his kindly love for Plato pleases itself in exhibiting in him fragmentary resemblance to the truth; but if these fragments of truth ran their roots down into a mass of error, so much the worse for Plato; Justin has no idea of following them down. How true this is, is clear from Justin's second method of accounting for the truth scattered about Gentile philosophy. His first and highest theory is that this is the product of the germinal Word; his second is that it is taken confusedly from Scripture, which is earlier than all philosophies. This theory, which leads him to perfectly superficial and literal derivations of points in Plato from the books of Moses, exhibits the absolute supremacy of Scripture, and also the thoroughly external manner in which Justin regarded Platonism.

There is something to be said for his connexion with Stoicism; he approved their morals, he found in them a right account, to some extent, of the ultimate end of Nature, but he objects strongly to their physical doctrines, their belief in fate, their physico-Pantheistic conception of God, by which they must either identify God with evil and change, or else deny the reality of evil (Apol. ii. 7, 8); he considers their physics inconsistent with their ethics. Even their account of the ultimate conflagration is sullied by their formula of fate. Still, next to Plato, he sanctions them; he regards them as fore-runners of Christ, instinct with the germinal Word; he seems to follow their doctrine home more accurately than he does others. It is of them, probably, among others, that he is complaining at the beginning of the Dialog. § 213, A, that they speak of a Divine Providence over great things, but fear to bring it down to particular subjects and events.

Musonius, and Heraclitus, he honourably distinguishes; of the Epicureans he speaks scornfully, as of those who, with the followers of Arsitades, and Philaenis, are utterly beneath the level of Christian doctrine (Apol. ii. 15, § 52, B).

One problem, lately of peculiar prominence, remains to be considered, i.e. the relation of Justin to our Four Gospels. The amount and frequency of his references to our Lord's life and words, in the generation immediately preceding the day in which the present Gospels emerge, secure and alone, into the full daylight of history, make him of salient importance in determining their character; and the state of the present controversy, which has detected the subtle transition, through which the Gospel story passed, from the conditions of a living, oral tradition to those of formal written exemplars, increases the importance of Justin, inasmuch as he begins the definite references to written records, of a fixed character, capable of being used for devotional purposes. Are these records identical in substance and in form with our Gospels?

(1) The substantial characteristics of our Lord's life, down even to minute details, are, obviously, the same for Justin as for us. We can compose, from his quotations, a full summary of the whole Gospel life, from the angel's message to the Virgin down to the Ascension, entering into many particulars, illustrating prophecies, supplying the very words of our Lord, in many cases relating all the circumstances of the acts referred to; and, as a whole, it is perfectly clear that the peculiar and marked lines which run round and limit and determine in detail our Gospel, did so, too, to his. The same body of facts is selected; the same character, the same limits preserved, the same characteristics brought forward; the same motives, the same interests are concerned; the same prophetic aspects dwelt upon. This is noticeable, when we remember how very special and remarkable a choice must have been originally exercised upon our Lord's life, to select and retain the peculiar fragments, no more and no less, which are collected and sorted by our Synoptists.

(2) Justin makes some additions or changes in detail to this main story; they are few enough to be mentioned, that their character may be seen. He had a genealogy which, whether ours or not, he attributed to Mary, not to Joseph; Cyrenius he calls the first procurator of Judaea; our Lord's birthplace is a cave; the Magi come from Arabia; all the children in Bethlehem are killed; our Lord is not "comely of aspect;" He made ploughs and yokes, emblems of righteousness; the Baptist sat by Jordan; a fire shone in Jordan at our Lord's baptism, and the words from heaven complete the text of the second Psalm; the Jews ascribed our Lord's miracles to magic; John ceased his mission at our Lord's public appearance. The Lord said, "There shall be schisms and heresies;" and "In whatsoever I find you, in that will I judge you." The drops, at the Agony are not said to be of blood; His captors surround Him, "like horned bulls" of Psalm xxii.; the sneers of the crowd at the cross are expanded, "He who raised the dead, let Him save Himself."

Of these, several are, probably, confusions or amplifications of Justin's own; some represent additions found in various texts of our present Gospels, and were, probably, floating, popular, traditional interpretations of various passages. The only remaining points definitely distinct from our Gospels are, the home of the Magi, the cave of the Nativity, the posture of the Baptist, the two sayings of our Lord. Does Justin, then, seem to take these from tradition, or from any uncanonical Gospel? The uncanonical works known to us, that are akin to him in their account of the birth and the baptism, do not tally with the rest of his account of these events; it is much more probable, therefore, that they and Justin embody a common tradition about the cave and the fire in Jordan, than that he used them; or even if these details came from them, they are still, certainly, not his main authorities, they are not his Gospel. The two strange sayings do not occur in any preserved narrative. Both of them seem to be variant forms of thoughts recorded in our canon, but the form, especially of the latter, is distinctly original. We must hypothesise then the Gospel that he used, if it is not ours; for we have no relic of it in our hands, and here the remark seems convincing (cf. Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, p. 101) that this Gospel, if it existed, belongs not to an earlier but to a later stage of the story than our canonical works, i.e. the varieties do not exhibit new, unused authorities, different traditions, but belong to the stage at which the other traditions are either amplified by enlarging the details, or are fused for the purposes of harmony. Instances of the first are the cave, the fire in Jordan, the making of ploughs; they are quite insignificant; instances of the latter are the mingling of the messages of the angels to Joseph and Mary, probably the attribution of the genealogy to Mary, and much of what is given from the Sermon on the Mount. The testimony appears to be decisive that if Justin used another Gospel, and not ours, then it has the character of being a modified form of that narrative, which, in its earlier form, is imbedded in our synoptic Gospels.

But if the substance is the same as our narrative, modified by slight accretions from a subservient and subordinate tradition, or by harmonistic fusion, is there any reason to suppose that our Gospels were the authorities for this substance? To determine this, we must be able to find evidence of likeness off the main line of the material common to the various records, otherwise we should only shew that Justin and they drew from a common stock, but not that he used these particular books.

That they were books that he used, he tells us frequently; it is all "written;" the books are called by a name peculiar to Justin, ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν Ἀποστόλων; they are records of our Lord's sayings and doings, written either by Apostles, or their followers (Apol. i. 66, § 98, B; Dialog. 103, § 333, D). These books constitute τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, Dialog. 10, 227, E; a quotation is referred to this εὐαγγέλιον (Dialog. 100, § 326, C); the ἀπομνημονεύματα are themselves called εὐαγγέλια, he tells us, if the text is right (Apol. i. 66). All this points obviously to the existence of various records, "written either by Apostles or by their followers," constituting altogether a single story, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. So far our Gospels exactly correspond. More than this, it is almost incredible that he should not know St. Matthew, at least; besides the general mass of reference, which exhibits remarkable resemblance to this Gospel, he has marked notices that distinguish St. Matthew from the other forms of the evangelical tradition: the visit of the Magi, the descent into Egypt, Joseph's suspicions of Mary, texts, elsewhere unparalleled, form the Sermon on the Mount, the application of the prophecy Isaiah xlii. 1-4, to the colt with the ass; above all, the comment of the disciples upon the identification of the Baptist with Elias (Dialog. 49, § 269, A; Matt. xviii. 11-13), the expressions ἕνοχος εἰς (Matt. v. 22); ἀγαρεύσει (v. 41), &c., &c. The resemblance to St. Luke, in places where it is possible to distinguish the peculiar work of this writer from that of the general tradition, are in one or two cases almost impossible to resist, such as the quotation of the text, Luke xviii. 27 (Apol. i. 20, § 66), and in the use of the unique expression ἰσάγγελοι, Luke xx. 35-36; also in the most remarkable expressions at the annunciation, ἐπισκιάζειν δύναιμι ὑψίστου, &c., which are directly Lucan. Compare, also, the last word on the cross. The only statement entirely peculiar to St. Mark is that of the naming of the sons of Zebedee.

We have, then, this fact, that not only is the whole body of quotation accounted for as a whole, with a few rare exceptions, from our Gospels, but in some cases where St. Matthew and St. Luke affect by their individuality the common original tradition, there Justin reproduces them. Is there anything to set against the positiveness of this argument?

The inexactness of quotation is the one opposing element. Justin is inexact, it is true, in his Old Testament quotations, but he is more than three times as inaccurate in his New Testament quotations. It is intensely difficult to estimate the bearings of this inaccuracy, to know how much to discount for free combination which Justin uses extensively, how much for lack of memory, how much for mere paraphrase; and then to determine, after such discounting, how much evidence remains to shew Justin's use of any other Gospel besides our own, by which their language is qualified. Especially is this hard when we have also to extract the possibility of variant readings of our present texts; and it is interesting to notice that Justin's language has analogies to the texts that lie round the old Latin version (cf. Sanday, Gospels in Second Century, p. 133). Again, it may be the echoes of living tradition which are heard stirring in Justin's quotations rather than the voice of any positive written text besides those we know. Under such complicated circumstances, the variations of Justin's can afford but uncertain data for any hypothesis, unless, indeed, they exhibit a steady alliance with any known Gospel other than our own; but the affiliations in their case are fluctuating and wavering, now tending to this uncanonical work, now to that, but giving no sure clue. It remains an intelligible, and perhaps a probable hypothesis, that Justin used some other form of the Gospel than any now in the canon: if so, it was either a text used by the side of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and not differing from them in any degree more than they differ from each other; and if so, it would multiply the evidence for the authenticity of the narrative embodied in our canon; or else it was a text compounding and combining with some freedom the other two; and if so, it supposes these canonical Gospels to be already the formal authorities; for already it is a matter of interest to harmonise and combine their accounts. The supposition that Justin used a perfectly distinct form of the Gospel story from any that we now possess is always encumbered by the invincible difficulty that, even though it was of sufficient importance and acceptance to be used in the public offices of the metropolitan church as late as the boyhood of St. Irenaeus, it has nevertheless totally disappeared.

As to St. John, the main argument against its use is that from silence. Justin is full of doctrine on the subject of the Word, on the pre-existence and Divine authority of Christ, yet no words from the Johannine discourses appear in his work. This argument has necessarily great weight. On the other hand, any single distinct reference to St. John must outweigh all the force of such a negative. Is there, then, any such reference?

In Dialogue 88 Justin attributes to the Baptist himself the words of the prophet, φωνὴ βοῶντος. This attribution is one of those remarkable distinctions peculiar to St. John's Gospel. We know of no other ground for it.

Twice (in Apol. i. 22, § 68, B, and Dialog. 69, § 296, A) he speaks of our Lord healing people in firm ἐκ γενετῆς: the only recorded instance of this is the blind man in St. John, ἐκ γενετῆς.

In Apol. i. 61, Justin, it can hardly be doubted, is paraphrasing St. John iii. 3-5. He is referring to a definite statement of our Lord; and the statement—a most marked and peculiar one—occurs in St. John, and in no other known place. Justin continues to refer to it in a way that makes it hardly possible not to suppose him acquainted with the continuation in St. John. In its context in the Apology the reference to the physical impossibility of a literal new birth is singularly awkward (cf. Otto, note in loc.). It may be also noticed that Justin claims that he is believing Christ's own teaching when he believes in His Divine pre-existence; which would be more intelligible of St. John than of the other Gospels (Dialog. 43, § 267, D). There is, again, a notice of our Lord in Dialog. 106, § 333, which receives its proper interpretation only in St. John xiii. and xvii.: Christ, says Justin, knew that the Father gave everything to Him, and Himself demanded this. Such are the possible direct references, rare, indeed, but in one case, at least, remarkably noticeable. Indirectly, Justin holds a doctrine of the Word, clear, pronounced, decisive, such as finds no home or base for itself but in that authoritative record of Christ which is laid up for us in the fourth Gospel. This doctrine Justin does not originate, he shews little capacity for originality in subtle speculation: it is the accepted, familiar, Christian faith put forth for the whole body, as their common belief, without hesitation, apology, anxiety, scruple, or uncertainty. It presents the exact features of the Johannine teaching: the universalism of the Philonic Λόγος is identified with, and made concrete by, the living, vivid individualism of the Incarnate Messiah. The synthesis is done, is complete, without confusion or doubt. Justin is as definite, as full of sanctioned certainty on the reality of this doctrine of the Incarnate Word, as he is on the facts and discourses represented by our Synoptists. There is no line to be drawn between the two. The Life of our Lord is already for him the Life as it is in fusion with the dogma of the Word—the Life as it is under the manipulation that is displayed in the fourth Gospel. Have we got any cause of sufficient force to have achieved so decided a result, but the Gospel of St. John? This is the question that rises over against the problem presented by Justin's prolonged silence: without this Gospel we have hardly any hypothesis by which to explain his determinate hold on the doctrine of the Flesh-taking Word. (Cf. Thoma, in Zeitsch. für Wissenschaft. Theolog. 4th part, for year 1875, Leipzig: an elaborate discussion, with conclusion, "Justin cites only the Synopt., but he thinks and argues with the Fourth Gospel, evidencing its existence, but not its apostolicity;" but cf. on last point, Westcott, Canon of New Test. p. 150.)

In connexion with this there must be mentioned a passage in Dialog. 123, § 353, B, in which, if not the Gospel, then the first Epistle of St. John can hardly be supposed absent from the writer's mind. The peculiar conjunction of καλούμεθα καὶ ἐσμέν is essentially Johannine (1 John iii. 1, 2): as is the connexion of "sonship" with keeping τὰς ἐντολάς. Justin, again, knows the writings of the Valentinians, and this (according to the evidence of Hippolytus and Irenaeus) must have involved a knowledge of the Fourth Gospel. Altogether, the problem presented by his not quoting St. John is far easier to solve than the problem of his not knowing it.

As to the rest of the canon, Justin mentions the Apocalypse by name, attributing it to St. John (Dialog. 81, § 308, A). He can hardly but be thinking of the Epistle to the Romans in Dialog. 23, § 241, B. He has references to the First Epistle to the Corinthians (Dialog. 14, § 231, D; Apol. 1, 60, § 93; Dialog. 111, § 333, C), and to the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians (Dialog. 32, § 110). He constantly repeats the πρωτόκοκτος πάσης κρίσεως, which relates him to the Epistle to the Colossians; he has references which seem to recall the Epistle to the Hebrews (Dialog. 13, § 229, D; Apol. i. 12, § 60, ἀπόστολος . . . Ἰησοῦς Χριστός); his words appear in several places to refer to the Acts (cf. Apol. 50, § 86, B; Apol. 40, § 79, A). Everywhere he exhibits traces of St. Paul; and his controversy with Marcion must have involved a complete acquaintance with the theology and language of the great apostle.

Throughout Justin claims to possess, and to shew forth, with a certainty attested by sacrifice and death, a solid body of certified doctrine, which apostolic authority sealed and secured; Christ, as He had been foretold by prophets and announced to the world by apostles, is the assured ground of his faith (cf. Dialog. 119, § 343, A; Apol. i. 39, i. 42). The apostles are the twelve bells on the border of the high priest's garment, with the sound of whose ringing the whole world has been filled (Dialog. 42, § 263, C); the apostles are the evangelical preachers in whose person Isaiah cried, "Lord, who hath believed our report?" the apostles are "the brethren in the midst of whom" Christ gives praise unto God (Dialog. 106, § 333, C).

[H. S. H.]

JUSTINUS (3), a Gnostic writer, author of several books, only known to us by the abstract which Hippolytus (Ref. Haer. v. 23, p. 148) has given of one of them, called the book of Baruch. The following is the account which that book gives of the origin and history of the universe. It has sprung from three underived principles, two male, one female. The first of these is the Good Being, and has no other name; he is perfect in knowledge, and is remote from all contact with the created world, of which, however, he is afterwards described as the ultimate cause. It is the knowledge of this Good Being which alone deserves the name, and it is from the possession of it that these heretics claimed the title of Gnostics. The second principle is called Elohim, the Father of the creation, deficient in knowledge, but not represented as subject to evil passion. The third, or female principle, who is identified with the earth, is called Eden and Israel, destitute of knowledge, and subject to anger, depicted as of double form, a woman above the middle, a snake below. Of her, Elohim becomes enamoured, and from their intercourse spring twenty-four angels—twelve paternal, who co-operate with their father and do his will, and twelve maternal, who do the will of the mother. The principal part is played by the third of each of these companies; Baruch, the third of the paternal angels, being the chief minister of good, and Naas, or the serpent, the third of the maternal, being the chief author of evil. The paradise of the book of Genesis allegorically refers to these angels, who are intended by the trees, Baruch being the tree of life, and Naas the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. These angels people the world, forming beasts out of the lower or snaky part of Eden, and man out of her upper parts, that is to say, of the finest earth; and on man Eden bestows the animal soul, and Elohim the spirit, thus making man the seal of their love and union. The four rivers that went out of Paradise are interpreted as four companies, into which the maternal angels are divided, which in turns dominate the world, bringing on it each its special evil, famine, war, &c. The history of the cause why Eden works evil on man is described as follows:—When Elohim had framed the world he ascended to the loftiest part of heaven, thence to see if anything were lacking. He was accompanied by his angels, but not by Eden, his nature tending upwards, hers downwards. When Elohim reached the boundary of heaven he saw a light beyond what he himself had made, and cried, "Open me the gates, that I may go in and confess to the Lord; for hitherto I thought myself to be Lord." And there came an answer, "This is the gate of the Lord; the righteous enter through it." And the gate was opened, and he went in without his angels, and saw the things which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man." Then the Good One said to him, "Sit thou on my right hand." Elohim asked leave to return to destroy the world he had made, and liberate his spirit, which was bound up with it, but was told that having come to the Good One there he must abide, and could no longer do evil; and that Eden must keep the creation while she would. She adorns herself in the hope to attract Elohim back, but, being disappointed, she causes the first of her angels, Babel (who also is Aphrodite), to make adulteries and dissolutions of marriage among men, that they may suffer what she suffered through the desertion of Elohim. And she gives great power to her third angel, Naas, to afflict the spirit of Elohim which is in men. On the other hand, Elohim sends his angel, Baruch, to aid that spirit. Baruch's permission to man to eat of the other trees of Paradise but not of the tree of knowledge is interpreted to mean a permission to obey the other maternal angels, who only inspire passions in themselves innocent; but not Naas, the teacher of transgression of the law, who is represented as committing adultery with Eve and paederasty with Adam. The evils caused the human race directly by Eden, and indirectly by Elohim, whose desertion was the cause of her hostility, are counteracted by the good derived from Elohim, who both himself shewed the way of ascending to the Good One, and who also by the mouth of Baruch exhorted men to turn to him. Baruch was thus sent to Moses, and by him to the children of Israel. But as there was in Moses (as in all others, male and female) a soul derived from Eden, as well as a spirit derived from Elohim, "the soul set against the spirit, and the spirit against the soul," Naas, by means of this soul, caused Moses to obscure the commands of Baruch, and substituted his own. In like manner Naas led away the prophets from obeying the commands of Elohim given by Baruch. Again, Elohim sends Hercules, a prophet of the uncircumcision, whose twelve labours are so many victories over the power of the twelve maternal angels. But he, too, is led away, the agent of his seduction being Omphale, the same as Babel or Aphrodite. At length Baruch is sent to Jesus, whom he finds, a boy of twelve years old, feeding sheep. And Jesus alone resists all the seductions of Naas, who, in anger at his failure, causes him to be crucified. Jesus then leaves his body on the tree, saying to Eden, "Woman, thou fully hast thy son," that is to say, the animal soul derived from her and the earthly body, while he commends to the father Elohim the spirit which came from him, and himself ascends to the Good One.

Other texts of scripture besides those already cited are forced to bear witness to this theory, and testimony is similarly extorted from the heathen mythologies, the stories of Hercules, of Leda, of Ganymede, of Danae, being all expounded as in their true meaning referring to this history of Eden and Elohim, Baruch and Naas. The doctrines here expounded were propagated under an oath that those who received them would neither divulge nor forsake them. As Elohim, of whom it is written, "The Lord swear and will not repent," on admission to the Good One swore that he would preserve the mysteries entrusted to him and did not repent of his oath, so the disciple of this system must swear never to make known its mysteries, and never to relapse from the Good One to the creature; and his reward shall be to ascend to Him, and to behold the things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man.

We have described this system at greater length because Lipsius regards this work of Justinus, as, though probably written later than the middle of the 2nd century, representing in its fundamental ideas one of the oldest, perhaps the very oldest, form of Gnosticism, and as exhibiting the passage of Jewish Christianity into Gnosis. As we cannot share this view, it becomes necessary to examine the relations of Justinus to other heretical systems of the 2nd century. And, first, with regard to the system of the Clementine Homilies with which that of Justinus has some superficial affinities, we shall not dispute the possibility that Justinus may have been acquainted with Elkesaite writings, and may have thence derived the idea of his oath of secrecy; but his point of view is absolutely different from that of the Clementines. According to the Homilies Adam was the first incarnation of the true prophet, and those passages of the Pentateuch which impute sin to him are rejected as unauthorised interpolations; but nowhere is Adam subjected to such revolting degradation as in the system of Justinus. According to the Clementines Moses stands on a level altogether different from that of the later prophets; of the Old Testament writings his are almost exclusively quoted; anything in them which the homilist is unwilling to receive he imputes not to error of Moses, but to the corruptions of those who falsified his writings. Justinus puts the later prophets quite on the level of Moses, quotes their writings as freely as his, and treats all alike as led astray by Naas to corrupt the revelation of Baruch. And so far from agreeing with Lipsius that Justinus, like the homilist, identified Christianity with Judaism, we think it might as well be said that he identified Christianity with heathenism. Justinus is willing to conciliate both Jews and heathen by recognising, in the systems of each, elements coming from Divine inspiration; but he accuses as well Moses and the Jewish prophets, as Hercules, the heathen prophet, of having permitted themselves to be led astray from the right way, while Jesus alone held his course straight, and rightly delivered the Divine message. In the system of Justinus, as well as in the other systems described in the fifth book of Hippolytus, heathen myths receive great attention; and we cannot even venture to say that Justinus was a Jew. He was familiar with the books of the Old Testament, but so were generally Christians of his time, and he uses Hebrew names, but, perhaps, only such as had already passed into popular use. That the word Naas, for instance, was Hebrew for a serpent was known to Justin Martyr, who does not appear to have been acquainted with Hebrew. The high place given to the name Baruch accords with Irenaeus II. xxiv. p. 150. On comparing the language of Justinus with that of other Gnostic systems, we find points of resemblance which cannot well be explained, except as resulting from a literary derivation of one from the other, and which, in our judgment, clearly mark Justinus as the latest. Hippolytus classes Justinus with the Naasenes, with whom it might at first sight be thought that his resemblance was only apparent, for in his system the serpent has no place of honour, but is the cause of all evil to men; while also the form of a serpent is given to that grosser matter out of which the inferior parts of the creation are formed. Yet on comparing the system of Justinus with that of the Ophite sect described by Irenaeus (i. 30), the points of contact are found to be too numerous to be all accidental. In the system of these Ophites the commencement is made with two male and one female principle; the Creator is represented as ignorant that He had any superior; brilliancy of light is the distinguishing attribute of the highest principle (see also Pistis Sophia, passim). He who has bestowed on man his highest part is represented as himself suffering loss by the gift; Eve is accused of adultery; Christ is represented as leaving on His ascension His earthly body behind Him; and Justinus (p. 157), like the Naasenes of Hippolytus (v. 26, p. 103), looks on phallic images as set up for the worship of the supreme good principle. If there be a literary connexion between the systems of Justinus and of the Ophites of Irenaeus, it cannot be doubted on which side the obligation lies. Without laying stress on the improbability that if Justinus is entitled to such an important place in the history of Gnosticism as Lipsius ascribes to him, we should be indebted for the knowledge of his name to a work itself till recent times unknown—we find on comparison with the system of Saturninus, which Irenaeus represents as one of the oldest of the Gnostic systems, many features common to the Irenaeian Ophites, which disappear in the system of Justinus; for instance, the number of seven creative angels is by Justinus enlarged to twenty-four. We pass over other indications of later date, but on the whole, instead of looking on the system of Justinus as throwing light on the process by which Gnosticism grew, we feel bound to refer that system to the latest stage of Gnosticism when a philosophy in which any unproved assumption was regarded as sufficiently justified by any remote analogy, had reached its exhaustion, and when its teachers were forced to seek for novelty by wilder and more audacious combinations. And we are not disposed to quarrel with the verdict of Hippolytus that he had met with many heretics, but never a worse one than Justinus.*

JUSTINUS (9), bishop of Salona (Spalato), placed by Farlati (followed by Gams) after Paschasius, A.D. 194; but the order of these bishops rests on no other foundation than the Catalog.

* We have not built any argument on the affinities between the systems of Justinus and of Marclon as represented by Esnig (Ilgen's Zeitschrift, 1834, p. 76), because there is, of course, room for controversy how the coincidences are to be accounted for. But these coincidences are very striking: Justinus, like Marclon, gives to his highest principle the title of the Good One. And both systems are represented as teaching that, besides this good principle, there are two inferior, a male and a female, who are related to each other as husband and wife, the former being the Creator, the latter matter; that man was their joint work: that the Creator made his abode in heaven, leaving his consort on earth; that dissensions between these two were the cause of error and suffering to the human race.

JUSTINUS (10), a Manichaean addressed in A.D. 372 by Marius Victorinus in a treatise entitled, Liber ad Justinum Manicheum. The treatise will be found in Patrol. Lat. viii. 999. [G. T. S.]

JUSTINUS (11) SICULUS, the author of a letter extant in Greek and Latin under the Latin title Epistola Justinii episcopi in Sicilia ad Petrum Fullonem, cir. A.D. 483, protesting, with some bishops under Peter's patriarchal jurisdiction, against his heretical addition to the Trisagion. Rocco Pirro (Sic. Sac. i. 16) argues that his see must have been Palermo; but Pagi (ann. 485, xv.) believes that "Sicilia" is an error for "Cilicia." The letter will be found in Mansi (vii. 1115), and in John Zonaras (In Canones Apost. 1618, p. 538). It is discussed by Cave (i. 457) and Ceillier (i. 433). H. Valesius (Dissert. in Petr. Full. in Hist. Eccles. Script. p. 595, ed. Cantab. 1720) calls in question the genuineness of all these epistles, but on no sufficient grounds. Dodwell (Dissert. in Irenaeum, pp. 263, 264) attributes to this Justin the Questiones ad Orthodoxos and the Confessio de Quaestantiali Trinitate found among the works of Justin Martyr. [G. T. S.]

JUSTINUS (12) I, emperor. On the death of the emperor Anastasius he was on July 9, A.D. 518, proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command and the people (Chron. Pasch. 331 in Patr. Gr. xcii. 858), whose choice was approved by the senate (Marcellinus, Chron.). After his elevation he assumed the additional names of Flavius Anicius, or he may have been adopted into the famous Anician house on becoming patrician. He was a man of no education, and the affairs of the state were managed chiefly by his prudent minister Proclus the quaestor, and afterwards by his nephew and successor Justinian. The most memorable event of his reign—namely, the end of the schism between the Eastern and Western churches—the long negotiations that preceded it, and its consequences, are fully narrated under HORMISDAS (3). For his relations with Persia see CHOSROES I. Vol. I. 479, 480.

In A.D. 523 Justin issued a constitution against the Manichaeans and other heretics (Codex i. tit. v. 12). The former were punished with exile or death; other heretics, Pagans, Jews, and Samaritans, were declared incapable of holding a magistracy or entering military service. The allied Goths were exempted from these provisions. In consequence of the persecution of his Arian co-religionists, Theodorice sent pope John I. in A.D. 525 to Constantinople to remonstrate with the emperor. A full account of his mission and reception is given under EPIPHANIUS (17).

In April A.D. 527 Justin caused Justinian, who had long before taken the chief part in the government, to be proclaimed emperor and crowned, and on August 1 he died of an ulcer in the foot, the effect of an old arrow wound, in his 75th year. His wife, like her husband, was of humble origin. Her original name was Lupicina, but on her coronation the people saluted her as Euphemia, to which the names of Aelia Marcia were added. She died in her husband's lifetime. [F. D.]

JUSTINUS (13) II., emperor, the nephew and successor of Justinian, was the son of his sister Vigilantia. His father's name was Dulcissimus (Corippus, de Laud. Justinii, praef. 21, Victor Tun. Chron.). He was appointed Curo-palates or Master of the Palace, by his uncle (Corip. i. 138). The night Justinian died, a deputation of the senate, headed by the patrician Callinicus, hurried to his house, and notwithstanding his real or affected reluctance persuaded him to accept the crown, and in the early morning he was saluted emperor by the populace in the hippodrome. The same day (Nov. 14, A.D. 565) he was crowned by the patriarch John (Theophanes, Chron. in Patr. Gr. cviii. 525), and received the homage of the senate and people in the hippodrome.

Justin, unlike his uncle, was perfectly orthodox, but at the same time did not enforce orthodoxy by persecution. On his accession he declared himself an adherent of the decrees of Chalcedon, and restored to their sees the bishops who had been banished by his predecessor (Venantius Fortunatus, ad Justinum, 25-26, 39-44 in Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 432). The edict is given in probably a corrupt form by Evagrius (H. E. v. 1, in Patr. Graec. lxxxvi. 2789), and also by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xvii. 33). Soon afterwards another edict was published, which is given at length by Evagrius (H. E. v. 4), in which, after setting forth the orthodox belief as to the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation, he exhorted all to return to the Catholic and Apostolic Church, which should remain firm and unchanged for ever; and that no one should for the future dispute about persons or syllables, probably referring to the person of Theodore and the writings of Theodoret and Ibas, and also to the question as to the Incorruptibility of the body of Christ. This edict met with general approval, as all parties interpreted it in favour of their own views, but none of the various schismatic sects returned to communion, in consequence of the emperor's declaration that no change was to be made in the church.

Justin also early in his reign sent Photinus, the stepson of Belisarius, with full powers to reconcile the churches of Egypt and Alexandria but his mission seems to have been fruitless.

Soon after his accession an embassy arrived from St. Rhadegund asking for a piece of the true cross for her newly founded monastery at Poitiers. He complied with her request, adding many other relics and copies of the gospels ornamented with gold and jewels (Vita S. Radegundis, ii. 18, in Patr. Lat. lxxii. 673). It was on the occasion of the arrival of this piece of the true cross at Poitiers that the famous hymn, Vexilla regis prodeunt, was composed by Fortunatus.

For the secular events of his reign see JUSTINUS II., Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography.

In May, A.D. 568, a rescript was issued to Spes-in-Deum, the archbishop of the Byzacene province in Africa, confirming the privileges of his church and synod, by which he was the sole judge of charges brought against any of the bishops or clergy within his jurisdiction, and in the following November (Clinton, Fasti, 825), a law (Nov. cxlix.) was promulgated addressed to the bishops and leading men of each province directing them to choose the governors (praesides) themselves, and to submit the names to the emperor, who would then invest them with their offices.

At the end of 570 A.D. or the beginning of the next year, Anastasius bishop of Antioch was deposed and Gregorius substituted in his place [ANASTASIUS SINAITA (1), GREGORIUS (31)].

On May 18, 572, a stringent law was passed against the Samaritans (Nov. cxliv.). They were declared incapable of inheriting either under a will or an intestacy, and in like manner were deprived of exercising testamentary powers except in favour of Christians. Otherwise the goods of the deceased were forfeited to the treasury. For the sake of agriculture farmers were exempted from these provisions. Samaritans were also declared incapable of holding any civil or military employments. Baptized Samaritans who observed the Sabbath or other of the rites of their creed were punished with perpetual exile. A Samaritan was declared incapable of having a Christian slave; if he bought one the slave ipso facto became entitled to his freedom; while a Samaritan slave became free on embracing Christianity. Justin at length was seized with madness, and died on October 5, 578, after a reign of nearly thirteen years.

JUSTINUS (14), brother-in-law of Gregory of Tours, and the subject of one of the miraculous cures ascribed by that historian to St. Martin. (Greg. Tur. Mirac. S. Martini, ii. 2.) [S. A. B.]

JUSTINUS (15), first bishop of Tarbe. His feast is fixed in the old martyrologies on May 1. But his title to be counted as bishop is somewhat doubtful; for Gregory of Tours (Gloria Confess. ch. xlix.) mentions Justin a presbyter, apparently the same, who is buried at Sers about six leagues from Tarbe (Gall. Christ. i. 1225).

[R. T. S.]

JUSTINUS (16) (JUSTUS), bishop of Capua, A.D. 554, apparently found in some authorities by Gams (Ser. Episc. 867), where Ughelli (vi. 307) and Granata (Storia Sac. di Capua, i. 107) have Rufinus. Both are omitted by Cappelletti xx. 22, 123).

[C. H.]

JUSTINUS (17), praetor of Sicily in the time of Gregory the Great. (Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 173; Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. ep. 2, in Migne, lxxvii.; Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. 33; lib. iii. indict. xi. 38; Migne, lxxvii. 571, 635.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTINUS (18), bishop of Calaris (Cagliari) who accepted the decrees of the Lateran council in 649 (Mansi, x. 1170), where the Greek list has Justinianus. (Matthaeus, Sard. Sac. 83; Cappelletti, xiii. 55, 71.)

[C. H.]

JUSTINUS (19), bishop of Vicohabentia (Voghenza), signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 315; Ughelli, ii. 526.) Cappelletti (iv. 25, 224) places him fourteenth in the series.

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTINUS (20), bishop of Tyana the metropolis of the second Cappadocia, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680 (Mansi, xi. 641), and at the synod called Trullana or Quinisexta, where in the subscriptions his name is written Justinianus. (Mansi, xi. 989; Le Q. Or. Christ. i. 400.)

[L. D.]

JUSTINUS (21), bishop of Pisa, c. 748, mentioned in the will of Liutpert archdeacon of Pisa. (Troja, Codice Diplom. iv. p. 321.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTINUS (22), Aug. 1, a boy martyr at Paris. (Mart. Us.)

[G. T. S.]

JUSTINUS (23), 8th bishop of Aux or Auch, between Minervius I. and Nicetius in the fifth century. (Gall. Christ. i. 974.)

[S. A. B.]

JUSTOLFUS, bishop of Ascoli (Asculum in Picenum), c. 781 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vii. 681). In a diploma printed by Ughelli (i. 440) his name is written Tustolfus.

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (1), third bishop of Jerusalem, between Simeon and Zacchaeus, a bishop of the circumcision (Euseb. H. E. iii. 35, and Chronicle under A.D. 108). Epiphanius (Haer. lxxvi. 20) calls him Judas.

[C. H.]

JUSTUS (2) II., bishop of Jerusalem in the 2nd century; placed by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 5) eleventh in the succession of Jewish bishops.

[J. de S.]

JUSTUS (3), fifth bishop of Alexandria. According to Eusebius, he succeeded Primus in the third year of Hadrian, A.D. 120, and had an episcopate of eleven years (H. E. iv. 4, Chron. sub. ann.). The Coptic Calendar commemorates him on July 6; the Acta SS. on June 6. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 389.)

[G. S.]

JUSTUS (4), fifth bishop of Vienne, is said by Ado to have been contemporary with Photinus or Pothinus, the martyr of Lyons. But Hauréau, the editor of the last volumes of Galla Christiana, doubts the fact of Justus having been bishop at all. Baronius (ann. 166, 1) gives two letters to him from Pius I., which are undoubtedly of the false decretals. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 8; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 99; Ceillier, Aut. Eccl. vi. 82.)

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (5), second bishop of Trois Châteaux, A.D. 312 (or, according to other accounts, in 267), suffered martyrdom in the irruption of the Alemanni under Chrocod, described by Greg. Tur. Hist. i. 30. (Gall. Christ. i. 705; Gams, Ser. Episc. 619.)

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (6) I., third bishop of Avignon, according to the list of Polycarpe de la Rivière (Gall. Chr. i. 851), cir. A.D. 130. The Sammarthani (ibid. 795) reckon him second, and his period some time before 310.

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (7) II. appears in Dom Polycarpe de la Rivière's list of the bishops of Avignon (Gall. Christ. i. 858) as eighteenth bishop of that see. According to the same author, his episcopate lasted from A.D. 372 to 390. He may be the bishop Justus who was present at the first council of Valence (A.D. 374), and whose see is not appended (Mansi, iii. 494). His name does not appear in the list of the Gallia Christiana (i. 797) or in the Series of Gams (p. 503).

[S. A. B.]

JUSTUS (8), bishop of Besançon, is said to have been exiled in the time of the emperor Julian, A.D. 362, but afterwards restored. He died about A.D. 366. (Gall. Christ. xv. 6.)

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (9), fifth bishop of Calaris (Cagliari), in a list of names of uncertain date earlier than the 4th century. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 48, 70; Martini, Storia Eccles. di Sardegna, iii. 316; Matthæus, Sard. Sac. 69.)

[R. S. G.]

JUSTUS (10), bishop of Calaris (Cagliari), succeeding Lucifer, who died c. A.D. 370 (Gams, Series Episc. p. 835). He is not mentioned by Cappelletti, nor by the local writers, as Cossu, Matthæus, and Martini.

[R. S. G.]

JUSTUS (11), thirteenth bishop of Lyons. He took part in the synod of Valence, A.D. 374, and in the council of Aquileia, 381, as representing Gallia Comata. His life is compendiously given by Ado (Sept. 2, Pat. Lat. cxxiii. 344). Lyons celebrates four festivals in honour of his ordination, death, translation from Egypt, and the dedication of his church. Two letters of St. Ambrose (class i. Nos. vii. and viii.) are addressed to a Justus, who was probably our saint. (Ambrosii Opp. i. 777 sq.; Gall. Christ. iv. 15; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 373; Mansi, Concil.; Ceillier, Aut. Eccl. iv. 629; Le Blant, Inscrip. Chrét. t. i. p. 62, num. xxvii. gives the epitaph on his tomb.)

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (12), Donatist bishop of Nisiba in Numidia (Böcking, Not. Dign. Occ. p. 645), present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cogn. i. 201.)

[H. W. P.]

JUSTUS (13), Donatist bishop of Forma in Numidia, near Idicra, absent through illness from the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Collat. Carth. cogn. i. 209.) [FELIX (90).]

[H. W. P.]

JUSTUS (14), bishop of Orange mentioned in the Life of St. Eutropius his successor (§ 4 in Boll. Acta SS. 27 Mai. vi. 701). See Gall. Chr. i. 766.

[R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (15), bishop of Acufida in Mauritania Sitifensis, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notit. 60; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 67.)

[R. S. G.]

JUSTUS (16), bishop of Acheruntia (Acerenza), present at the first synod under pope Symmachus, in March 499. (Hefele, § 220; Mansi, viii. 234; Ughelli, vii. 13; Cappelletti, xx. 420, 450.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (17), bishop of Fermo, present at the 5th synod under pope Symmachus in 503. (Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209; Mansi, viii. 299; Ughelli, ii. 682; Cappelletti, iii. 588, 652.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (18), bishop of Segni (Signia), present at the third, fourth, and sixth synods of pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, Nov. 502, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209. (Mansi, viii. 252, 269, 315; Ughelli, i. 1235; Cappelletti, vi. 617, 638.)

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (19), bishop of Urgel from before A.D. 527 until after 546. He was one of four brothers, all of whom became bishops (see arts. JUSTINIANUS, NEBRIDIUS, ELPIDIUS), and is briefly noticed by Isidore in the De Vir. Ill. (cap. 33) as the author of a "libellus expositionis in cantica canticorum," which is still extant, prefaced by a letter to Sergius, metropolitan (papa) of Tarraconensis (not pope Sergius as Helfferich supposes, Westgoth. Arianismus, p. 42). Justus subscribes the acts of the second council of Toledo, held in 527 under Montanus (Aguirre-Catalani, Coll. Max. Conc. Hisp. iii. 153), and his signature is also found among those of the synod of Gerona in 546. He is commemorated on May 28 in the Roman martyrology. (AA. SS. Bolland. May, vi. 773, ed. of the Commentary on the Canticles in Migne, Patr. Lat.; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (1) 440.)

[M. A. W.]

JUSTUS (20), 3rd bishop of Volterra, c. 553 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 215). Ughelli (i. 1427) who places him second, between Romulus and Elpidius, before 502, is corrected by Cappelletti. Justus and Clement as patrons of Volterra occur in the Acta Sanctorum (5 Jun. i. 437) with a comment by Papebroch.

[A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (21) (in one old catalogue surnamed ALMUS), ST., fifth bishop of Mâcon, succeeding Caeledonius and followed by St. Eusebius, is thought by Le Cointe to have been in occupation of the see about A.D. 574. (Le Cointe, Annal. Eccl. Franc. ii. 147, an. 574, viii.; Gall. Christ. iv. 1041.)

[S. A. B.]

JUSTUS (22), fourth archbishop of Canterbury and first bishop of Rochester. Justus was not one of the first band of missionaries who accompanied Augustine to Britain, but was sent by St. Gregory in 601, together with Mellitus, Paulinus, and Rufinians, who brought with them all things necessary for divine worship and service—sacred vessels, vestments, relics, and books (Bede, H. E. i. 29).

On the foundation of the church of St. Andrew at Rochester, the dedication of which was probably determined by Augustine in consequence of his own connexion with that of St. Andrew at Rome, Justus was consecrated as first bishop of the new see: on the occasion of the foundation Ethelbert bestowed on the church a territory called Priestfield, and all the land from the Medway to the east gate southwards, besides other lands outside the walls to the north (Ang. Sac. i. 333). The charter by which this or a similar gift was conveyed is printed by Kemble, C. D. No. 1, with the date April 28, 604. From the name of the land conveyed by this first donation it has been inferred that the church of Rochester was from its foundation intended for secular priests, and not for monks; and Justus is not called a monk by Bede, although, like Laurentius, he is claimed as such by the later Canterbury writers. His consecration took place apparently in or about 604, shortly before the death of Augustine (Bede, H. E. ii. 3). As bishop of Rochester Justus joined with Laurentius and Mellitus in the letters to the Irish and British bishops, which Bede declares to have been so futile (H. E. ii. 4). St. Boniface and pope Zachary (Bon. Epp. ed. Jaffé, pp. 114, 185) ascribe to him a share in the legislative activity of Augustine and Laurentius, and Bede describes his government of his see at Rochester during Ethelbert's life as careful and laborious (H. E. ii. 7). On the death of Ethelbert Justus joined Mellitus in his flight into Gaul, whence they returned after a year's exile; Justus resumed the government of his church, Mellitus was unable to return to London, and shortly after became archbishop of Canterbury (Bede, H. E. ii. 5, 6).

On the death of Mellitus, which occurred on April 24, 624, Justus immediately succeeded. He opened communications with pope Boniface V., who sent him a pall, thus empowering him to consecrate bishops, and a long letter in which he mentions the part which Justus had taken in the conversion of Eadbald (Bede, H. E. ii. 8). Besides this letter, which is undoubtedly genuine, another epistle of Boniface V. is preserved, in which the pope establishes the primatial see at Canterbury, and alleges that such was the intention of St. Gregory (Will. Malmesb. Gesta Pontif. lib. i. § 31, ed. Hamilton, p. 47; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 73). This letter, with others of the same series, labours under the suspicion of having been fabricated to suit the purposes of the convent of Canterbury; and, although this cannot be proved, they cannot be received implicitly. The former letter is given by Bede, and quoted by the English bishops writing to Leo III. in 805 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 559, 560). The assumption by Boniface, that without the pall the archbishops were incompetent to consecrate suffragans, may lead to the inference that as Laurentius and Mellitus are not recorded by Bede as having received the pall, therefore they abstained from consecrating, a fact which could not fail to limit the extension of the missionary church. The first act of Justus, after receiving the emblem of metropolitan authority, was to consecrate Romanus as his successor at Rochester (Bede, H. E. ii. 8). Some time after this he sent Romanus to Rome, but the unfortunate bishop was drowned in the Italian sea (Bede, H. E. ii. 20), and Paulinus did not live to appoint a successor. Honorius, the pope to whom Romanus was sent, became pope in November, 625.

Before the death of Boniface V. Justus had been called upon to take an important part in the conversion of Northumbria, where king Edwin, having married Ethelberga, the daughter of Ethelbert, allowed his newly married wife to bring a Christian bishop in her train. Paulinus, who was chosen as founder of the Northumbrian church, was consecrated by Justus on July 21, 625 (Bede, H. E. ii. 9). Justus lived to see the successful portion of Paulinus's career, which reached its climax in the spring of 627. It is probable that he also was engaged in the negotiations by which the successive kings of the East Angles were drawn towards Christianity. His archiepiscopate however was short, for he was an old man when he reached the dignity. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle he died in 627; the Canterbury chronologists assign him a period of three years (Ang. Sac. i. 287), varied however with statements that give thirteen (ib. 86). Bede furnishes no sufficient data, but in computing the dates of the East-Englian bishops (H. E. ii. 15; iii. 20) seems to throw back the appointment of Honorius, the successor of Justus, to some date between 627 and 631. The precise year has been much debated (see Wharton, Ang. Sac. i. 92; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 73); but the date 627 may be provisionally accepted. [HONORIUS.] The day of Justus's death was Nov. 10 (Bede, H. E. ii. 109). He was buried with his predecessors in the north porch of St. Augustine's (ib. i. 3). Elmham (p. 170) gives a poetical epitaph.

Tradition and legend have not busied themselves much with the life of Justus. Gotselinus, whose biography is still in MS. (Har. Cat. Mat. i. 222), could add no facts to those mentioned by Bede; Capgrave (ib. 223) only abridged Gotselinus. The poetical life of Justus (ib.) in the Lambeth MS. 159, is also still unprinted; it contains only twenty-two lines.

Elmham, following his usual plan of describing the lives of the archbishops by inferential statements, enlarges on the friendship of Justus for abbat Rufinianus at St. Augustine's. The statement of this writer that Justus took part in the foundation of St. Peter's at Westminster (pp. 271-272), seems to be a misreading of the story told by William of Malmesbury (Gesta Pontif. lib. ii. § 73).

The name of Justus appears in several charters of very questionable authenticity, besides the more respectable one in which Ethelbert endows the church of Rochester (Kemble, C. D. No. 1). Such are the documents connected with the foundation of St. Augustine's (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 4, 5, 6; Elmham, pp. 114, 119, 144; Mon. Angl. i. 127).

Besides the ancient authorities already cited, the history of Justus is worked out by Harpsfeld, p. 61; by Alford in the Annales; by Wharton in the Anglia Sacra, i. p. 92; and by Hook, Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. i. pp. 99-109.

Of the character of this archbishop, so far as it is illustrated by his acts, little more can be said than that, having, in common with Laurentius and Mellitus, no share of the martyr's spirit, he had probably more of the character of a missionary than either of his predecessors. This would appear from the fact of his return to Rochester after his flight, as well as from his dealings with Northumbria; and probably, if the date of his death were more certainly fixed, it would be found that the extension of the missionary work of the Kentish church under Honorius was partly attributable to the impulse given under Justus. [S.]

JUSTUS (23), twenty-first bishop of Clermont, early in the 7th century. See Gall. Chr. ii. 244. [S. A. B.]

JUSTUS (24), tenth bishop of Sarsina, c. 613. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 487, 518.) Ughelli (ii. 654) omits him. [A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (25), metropolitan of Toledo from early in 633 till the beginning of March 636. He subscribed the acts of the important fourth council of Toledo, fourth among the six metropolitans present, Toledo being not yet possessed of an inherent right of precedence. (Idéf. de Vir. Illustr. cap. 8; Esp. Sagr. v. 262, 478; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. de la Iglesia Española, ii. 315.) [M. A. W.]

JUSTUS (26), bishop of Taormina (Taurominium), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

JUSTUS (27), bishop of Acci from 637 till after 647. He was present at the sixth council of Toledo (A.D. 638), where his signature occurs forty-fifth among forty-eight, and he is also mentioned in an important inscription discovered at Acci (Guadix) in 1808, and printed by Hübner, no. 175, in Inscr. Hispaniae Christianae. The inscription dates from the "tertio idus Maias" in the fifteenth year of Justus's pontificate, the tenth year of Kindasvinth, and the fourth of Rekesvinth (associated with his father-in-law 649), and has been wrongly interpreted by Hübner. It may be placed with certainty on the 13th May, 652 (not 655), on which day Kindasvinth had completed nine years and five days of rule (see art. KINDASVINTH) and Rekesvinth about three years and four months. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 30; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 413.) [M. A. W.]

JUSTUS (28), bishop of Salamanca from cir. 660 till after 666. His signature appears seventh among those of eleven suffragans at the council of Merida under Rekesvinth (A.D. 666). (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 276; Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. ii.) [EULETHERIUS.] [M. A. W.]

JUSTUS (29), given by the Sammarthani as 2nd bishop of Strasburg. But Dom Calmet, in his history of the monastery in the vale of St. Gregory, contends that Justus should be transferred to the 7th century as being recorded to have been elected from among the monks of that monastery, which did not exist till A.D. 630. (Gall. Christ. v. 778.) [R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (30), tenth bishop of Agde. He was present at the council held at Narbonne in A.D. 791. [DANIEL (19).] (Mansi, xiii. 822, 824; Gall. Christ. vi. 669, 15.) [S. A. B.]

JUSTUS (31), Aug. 26, reputed martyr with Orontius and Fortunatus under Nero at Lycium in the province of Hydruntium. (Acta SS. Aug. v. 764.) [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (32), Jewish writer, a contemporary and rival of Josephus, who accuses him of misrepresentation and mendacity (Joseph. Vit. § 9, 65, 74). Photius (cod. 33) describes his works, which no longer exist, as a chronology of the kings of Judah and a history from Moses to Agrippa. He died in the third year of Trajan, where his history ends. Photius observes that he made no mention of Christ or Christian events. Jerome includes him in his De Viris Illustribus (cap. 14), where one reading calls him Justinus. He is noticed by Cave (i. 37) and by Stephanus of Byzantium (De Urb. s.v. Tripéids). [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (33), a cleric of Rome in the time of Domitian, who buried in his garden on the

Via Nomentana the body of Nicomedes (Sept. 15), martyred at the same time as Nereus and Achilles. (Mart. Adon.; Acta SS. Boll. Sept. v. 6; Mariano Armellini, Il Cemeterio di S. Agnese, p. 6.) [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (34), confessor at Cambo, near Bourges, a disciple of St. Ursinus in the 3rd century (Boll. Acta SS. 14 Jul. iii. 618-9) Du Saussay calls him martyr, associating him with St. Ursinus, but there are several others named Justus commemorated on this day. (Bollandists, ib. iii. 618, 622, 623; Usnardus, Mart. Auct. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxliii. 259, 260.) [J. G.]

JUSTUS (35), Oct. 18, a boy martyr at Beauvais in the Diocletian persecution. (Mart. Rom.; Mart. Usnard.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 338.) [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (36), Aug. 6, martyr in the Diocletian persecution, with his brother Pastor, in Spain. There is a hymn of Paulinus of Nola written on the death of his son Celsus, in which he says he had buried another child, an infant of eight days old, at Complutum, by the graves of the martyrs, and Paulinus is known to have left Spain for Nola in the spring of A.D. 394. They are commemorated on Aug. 6. (Prudentius, Peristeph. iv. 41, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lx. 364; Paulinus of Nola, Carmen 32, 599, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxi., and La Bigne, i. 233; Ildephonsus, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 199; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. iv. 598; Boll. AA. SS. Aug. ii. 143; Gams, Kirchengeschichte, i. 330 Esp. Sagr. vii. 168; Mart. Ad., Us.; Fleury, l. viii. s. 47; Till. v. 59.) [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (37), June 11, African martyr at Milevis in the persecution of Diocletian. (De Rossi, Bullett. 1875, pp. 162-174; 1876, p. 59; 1877, p. 97.) [G. T. S.]

JUSTUS (38), archdeacon of Clermont in the latter part of the 4th century. He was commemorated on Oct. 21. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 72; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. i. 40.) [R. T. S.]

JUSTUS (39), priest and disciple of St. Hilary of Poitiers. According to Du Saussay (Martyrologium Gallicanum, Nov. 25, quoted in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 785), Justus came to St. Hilary at Poitiers, and was accepted by him as his disciple and coadjutor. After Hilary's death (A.D. 367), at which he was present, he wrote a description of the things he had seen. The document was long treasured in the archives of the church of Poitiers, and quoted from by Hildebert, the most learned bishop of his age, at the council of Tours. Bollandus (ibid.) and others think that in his Life of St. Hilary Venantius Fortunatus may have only paraphrased or edited, and continued the supposed life by St. Justus. Dom. Rivet, however, arguing from the faults both of commission and omission which abound in the work, rejects the idea of its being by a disciple of St. Hilary (Hist. Litt. de la France, i. B. 219-220), though the recent editors considerably qualify this opinion (ibid., note, p. 463). St. Justus's day of commemoration is Nov. 25. [S. A. B.]

JUSTUS (40), bishop of Faventia at the Roman council of pope Hilary in 465 (Mansi, vii. 965). He was the third or fifth bishop of the see. (Ughelli, ii. 492; Cappelletti, ii. 243.)

[C. H.]

JUSTUS, of Capua. [JUSTINUS (16).]

JUSTUS (41), a monk of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, under Gregory the Great. The story of his concealment of three pieces of gold and of the punishment inflicted by Gregory has been told in vol. ii. p. 779, where he is by mistake called Julius. (Greg. Mag. Dialog. iv. 55 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii.; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs Ecclés. xi. 432.)

[I. G. S.]

JUSTUS (42), adopted son of Constantine Silvanus the founder of the PAULICIANS. In the persecution of the sect under Constantine Pogonatus in 684, Justus was the first of the faithless disciples who obeyed the order of Simeon the imperial commissioner, and stoned to death the Paulician leader. A few years later Justus became informer against the converted Simeon. His information led to the persecution under Justinian II., when Simeon and many others were burnt at the stake in 690. (Pet. Sic. Hist. Manich. i. 25-27; Phot. c. Manich. i. 17-18; Neander, Ch. Hist. v. 343.)

[M. B. C.]

JUSTUS (43), ST. William of Worcester says (Itin. 426), "Sanctus Justus martir jacet in parochia sancti Ycest, distat a Pensans versus occidentem." From the situation of the parish he was probably a devotee from Ireland (Whitaker's Cornwall, i. 339; the parish feast is on the Sunday nearest to Nov. 1; St. Justus of Canterbury is celebrated Nov. 10). This parish is distinguished as St. Just in Penwith, from another St. Just, which is in Roseland, on the eastern side of Falmouth harbour. Compare W. C. Borlase, The Age of the Saints, 1878, p. 4.

[C. W. B.]

JUSTUS, Irish saint [JUSTAN]; British saint [JUST].

JUSTUS (44), martyr, commemorated with Aristo, Crescentianus, and others, July 2. (Usuard. Mart.)

JUSTUS (45), July 14, a soldier and martyr at Rome in the pagan period. (Mart. Rom.; Bas. Men.; AA. SS. Boll. Jul. iii. 651.)

[G. T. S.]

JUTHINAEUS (JUTHINALEUS, JUNE-MENUS), eleventh bishop of Dol in Brittany (Pope Nicolas, Epist. xci., Patr. Lat. cxix. 970). The letter forms some guide to Juthinaeus's date, since Adrian sat from 772 to 795. Some have believed Juthinaeus to be identical with the ninth bishop of this see, Jumaelus. (Gall. Chr. xiv. 1042.)

JUVENALIS (1), May 3, bishop and confessor, recorded by Usuard without locality or period. The Roman Martyrology assigns him to Narnia. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 3 Mai. i. 337) give a Vita "from various MSS." with a commentary by Papebroch, and from that source it appears that Juvenal was an African presbyter and physician, who came to Rome, where he was received by a matron of the imperial family named Philadelphia, through whose influence he was chosen bishop of Narnia, and received consecration from the pope. It is added that he died in peace after an episcopate of seven years, and on August 7, was buried on the Flaminian Way, fifty-five miles from Rome, his natale being observed on May 3. Papebroch addresses Jacobillus as fixing on Damasus as the pope, and A.D. 369 as the year of consecration, and therefore 376 as the date of Juvenal's death. Ughelli (Ital. Sac. i. 1008) adopts this account including the dates, and adds that Juvenal had come from Carthage. A Juvenal II. has been assumed in order to account for other statements. Thus, under May 7 in Usuard, Ado, and Vet. Rom. Mart. there occurs a Juvenal designated simply "martyr;" and again Gregory the Great in his Forty Homilies on the Gospels (Hom. xxvii. in Patr. Lat. xxvi. 1280) relates that Cassius bishop of Narnia was in the habit of celebrating the Eucharist near the tomb of the martyr Juvenal. Ughelli therefore inserts a Juvenal II., whom he assigns to the period A.D. 558-565, as the martyr of May 7, and Gregory's homily, but he places him in succession to Cassius. Cappelletti (iv. 543, 548, 570) points out the incongruity of making Cassius officiate near the tomb of his successor, and argues that the Juvenal intended by Gregory was the earlier one. Perhaps in Gregory's time tradition had made the first Juvenal a martyr, as later traditions (cited by Papebroch) appear to have done. It should be added that Gregory in another of his writings (Dial. iv. 12) refers to the martyr Juvenal as having appeared to Probus bishop of Reate.

JUVENALIS (2) succeeded Praylius as bishop of Jerusalem somewhere about 420 A.D. The exact year cannot be determined. The episcopate of Praylius, which commenced in 417 A.D., was but short, and we can hardly give it at most more than three years. The statement of Cyril of Scythopolis, in his Life of St. Euthymius (c. 96), that Juvenal died "in the forty-fourth year of his episcopate," 458 A.D., is certainly incorrect, as it would make his episcopate begin in 414 A.D., three years before that of his predecessor. Juvenal occupies a prominent position during the Nestorian and Eutychian troubles towards the middle of the 5th century. But the part played by him at the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, as well as at the disgraceful ἁποστολικὴ σύνοδος of 449, was more conspicuous than creditable, and there are few of the actors in these turbulent and saddening scenes who leave a more unpleasing impression. The ruling object of Juvenal's episcopate, to which everything else was secondary, and which guided all his conduct, was the elevation of the see of Jerusalem from the subordinate position it held in accordance with the seventh of the canons of the council of Nicaea, as suffragan to the metropolitan see of Caesarea, to a primary place in the episcopate. Not content with aspiring to metropolitan rank, Juvenal coveted patriarchal dignity, and, in defiance of all canonical authority, he claimed jurisdiction over the great see of Antioch, from which he sought to remove Arabia and the two Phoenicias to his own province. At the council of Ephesus, in 431, he asserted for "the apostolic see of Jerusalem the same rank and authority with the apostolic see of Rome" (Labbe, Concil. iii. 642). These falsehoods he did not scruple to support with forged documents ("insolenter ausus per commentitia scripta firmare," Leo, Mag. Ep. 119 [92]), and other disgraceful artifices. Scarcely had Juvenal been consecrated bishop of Jerusalem when he proceeded to assert his claims to the metropolitan rank by his acts. In the letter of remonstrance against the proceedings of the council of Ephesus, sent to Theodosius by the Oriental party, they complain that Juvenal, whose "ambitious designs and juggling tricks" they are only too well acquainted with, had ordained in provinces over which he had no jurisdiction (Labbe, Concil. iii. 728). This audacious attempt to set at nought the Nicene decrees, and to falsify both history and tradition was regarded with the utmost indignation by the leaders of the Christian church. Cyril of Alexandria shuddered at the impious design ("merito perhorrescens," Leo, u. s.), and wrote to Leo, then archdeacon of Rome, informing him of what Juvenal was undertaking, and begging that his unlawful attempts might have no sanction from the apostolic see ("ut nulla illicitis conatibus praeberetur assensio," u. s.). Juvenal, however, was far too useful an ally in his campaign against Nestorius for Cyril lightly to discard. When the council met at Ephesus, Juvenal was allowed, without the slightest remonstrance, to take precedence of his metropolitan of Caesarea, and to occupy the position of vice-president of the council, coming next after Cyril himself (Labbe, Concil. iii. 445), and was regarded in all respects as the second prelate in the assembly. The arrogant assertion of his supremacy over the bishop of Antioch, and his claim to take rank next after Rome as an apostolical see, provoked no open remonstrance, and his pretensions were at least tacitly allowed. At the next council, the disgraceful "Latrocinium," Juvenal occupied the third place, after Dioscorus and the papal legate, having been specially named by Theodosius, together with Thalassius of Caesarea (who appears to have taken no umbrage at his suffragan being preferred before him), as next in authority to Dioscorus (Labbe, Concil. iv. 109), and he took a leading part in the violent proceedings of that assembly. When the council of Chalcedon met, one of the matters which came before it for settlement was the dispute as to priority between Juvenal and Maximus bishop of Antioch. The contention was long and severe. It ended in a compromise agreed on in the Seventh Action, μετὰ πολλὴν φιλονεικίαν. Juvenal surrendered his claim to the two Phoenicias and to Arabia, on condition of his being allowed metropolitan jurisdiction over the three Palestines (Labbe, Concil. iv. 613). The claim to patriarchal authority over the bishop of Antioch put forward at Ephesus was discreetly dropped. The difficulty presented by the Nicene canon does not appear to have presented itself to the council, nor was any one found to urge the undoubted claims of the see of Caesarea. The terms arranged between Maximus and Juvenal were regarded as satisfactory, and received the consent of the assembled bishops (ibid. 618). Maximus, however, was not long in repenting of his too ready acquiescence in Juvenal's demands, and wrote a letter of complaint to pope Leo, who replied by the letter which has been already quoted, dated June 11, 453 A.D., in which he upheld the binding authority of the Nicene canons, and after commenting in the strongest terms on the greediness and ambition of Juvenal—who allowed no opportunity of forwarding his ends to be lost—declared that as far as he was concerned he would do all he could to maintain the ancient dignity of the see of Antioch (Leo Magn. Ep. ad Maximum, 119 [92]). No further action, however, seems to have been taken either by Leo or by Maximus. Juvenal was left master of the situation, and the church of Jerusalem has from that epoch peaceably enjoyed the patriarchal dignity obtained for it by such base means.

We must now return to the part taken by Juvenal in the council of Ephesus and the succeeding councils of the church. Celestine of Rome, having held a synod which had pronounced the dogmas published by Nestorius heretical, wrote to the leading bishops of the Christian world, including Juvenal, informing them that he had excommunicated Nestorius and all who thought with him. This letter is dated Aug. 10, 430 A.D. At the same time Celestine wrote to the same effect to Cyril (Baluz. Concil. Nov. Coll. c. 15, p. 438). On the receipt of the pope's letters Cyril at once wrote to Juvenal, John of Antioch, and others, calling upon them to join him in defence of the common faith. He begged Juvenal to make common cause with him, and send a communitary letter to Nestorius, warning him of the consequences of his obstinacy, and also to write to the emperor, to the officers of the court, and the people of Constantinople, to dispose them to consent to the deposition of Nestorius if he should refuse to yield (Labbe, Concil. iii. 386, Baluz. p. 443, c. 19). On the opening of the council at Ephesus, June 22, 431, Juvenal, as has been mentioned, occupied the second place after Cyril, and took a prominent part in the condemnation of Nestorius. At a later period Juvenal was one of the eight legates deputed by the council, together with the same number from the Orientals in compliance with the orders of Theodosius, and aided in the consecration of Maximian in Nestorius's room, Oct. 25, 431 (Labbe, iii. 780; Baluz. 571 sq.). As an act of retaliation, John of Antioch and the Orientals on their way back from Ephesus held a synod at Tarsus, which condemned and excommunicated Cyril, and the deputies of the council, Juvenal at their head (Baluz. 939).

When, in 449, the council stigmatized as the "Latrocinium" met at Ephesus, we find Juvenal again playing an officiously prominent part. For this the letter of Theodosius to Dioscorus assigning the presidency of the council to him, τὴν ἀθεύτην καὶ τὰ πρωτεία, and naming Juvenal and Thalassius of Caesarea as second in authority, afforded a sufficient warrant (Labbe, iv. 109). On the opening of the council on Aug. 8, Juvenal occupied the third place after Dioscorus, and Julius of Puteoli, the papal legate. In the shameful acts directed against the venerable Flavian, by which Dioscorus followed up his triumph, Juvenal was the first to sign the instrument of his deposition for having added to and taken from the Nicene faith (ibid. 306), and helped to force the unhappy bishops, by threats of deposition as heretics, to sign a blank paper on which the sentence was to be recorded (ibid. 129). The natural consequence of this open patronage of heresy of the deepest dye was that the name of Juvenal, together with those of his violent and tyrannical leader Dioscorus and the other bishops of the "latrocinium," was removed from the diptychs of Rome and other orthodox churches (Leo Magn. Ep. ad Anatolium, 80 [60]). This sentence was confirmed in a second letter, June 19 of the same year (ibid. 85 [112]). This decided action on the part of the leading prelate of Christendom alarmed Juvenal, and questions of orthodoxy and heterodoxy being completely secondary with him to his own interest, we are not surprised to find him facing completely round at Chalcedon in 451, and denouncing the doctrines he had supported two years before at Ephesus. The place he occupied in the council indicated that he had been compelled to abate somewhat of his overweening pretensions. Anatolius of Constantinople and Maximus of Antioch both took precedence of him, as did the Roman legates and Dioscorus (Labbe, iv. 79 et passim). The proceedings had not advanced far when Juvenal, seeing clearly what course events were taking, rose up with the bishops of Palestine in his train, and crossed over from the right, where he had been sitting with the Alexandrine prelates, to the Orientals on the left amid shouts of "Welcome, orthodox one! It is God who has brought thee over here" (ibid. 178). This desertion of his old friends barely saved him. Evidence being read as to the violence with which Flavian's condemnation had been enforced, and the brutality with which he had been treated, the imperial commissioners at once proposed Juvenal's deposition, together with Dioscorus, Eusebius, and the others who had taken a leading part in these disgraceful transactions (ibid. 323). Juvenal evidently felt that consistency must now be sacrificed to the maintenance of his position, and having given his vote and signature to the deposition of Dioscorus (ibid. 458) and signed the tome of Leo (ibid. 798), the objections of the commissioners were overruled, and by the desire of the bishops who were disposed to deal indulgently with their erring brethren, Juvenal and his four companions were allowed to resume their seats, amid a shout of welcome, "This is the Lord's doing." "Many years to the orthodox. This is the peace of the churches" (ibid. 509). He subsequently took part in drawing up the declaration of faith (ibid. 559-562), and signed the letter sent to Leo (Baluz. 1370). We have a Latin translation of a synodical letter written in his own name and that of the bishops of Palestine, A.D. 453, to the Archimandrites, presbyters, and monks of the province confirming the decrees of Chalcedon (Labbe, iv. 889).

Juvenal's enjoyment of his newly acquired dignity was speedily disturbed. The decrees of Chalcedon were not at all acceptable to a large number of the archimandrites and monks of Palestine, who generally held Eutychian views, and they, in 452, addressed letters to Marcian and to Pulcheria, remonstrating against the conduct of their bishop and the proceedings of the council generally. Both the emperor and empress administered severe rebukes to the remonstrants in their replies (Labbe, iv. 874, 879). The imperial displeasure, however, failed to repress the turbulence of the malcontents, and, under the leadership of Theodosius, a fanatical Monophysite monk, patronised by the empress dowager Eudocia, who had made Jerusalem her home, they threw the whole province into confusion. Juvenal's life was threatened. The walls and gates were guarded to prevent his escape. But he contrived to conceal himself from his enemies, and, together with Domnus, managed to make his way to the desert, whence he fled to Constantinople, and laid his complaints against Theodosius and his partisans before the emperor (Labbe, iv. 858; Cyrill. Scythop. Euthym. Vit. 82; Evagr. H. E. ii. 5; Theophan. p. 92). Marcian took decided measures for the restoration of order. After holding possession for two years, Theodosius was expelled from Jerusalem, 453 A.D., and Juvenal was restored; "non jam resultante populo sed desiderante" are Leo's perhaps too sanguine words in his letter of thanks to Marcian for his intervention. Jan. 9, 454 (Ep. 126 [157]). Eudocia, also, at the desire of Euthymius and by the persuasions of Simeon Stylites, returned to Jerusalem, and renewed communion with Juvenal, her example proving influential to bring back the large majority both of monks and laity to the cathedral church (Euthym. Vit. 86). One of the first acts of Juvenal on his restoration was to hold a council which issued a synodical letter to the two Palestines, declaring the perfect orthodoxy of the decrees of Chalcedon, and denying that anything had there been altered in, or added to, the Nicene faith (Labbe, iv. 889). Peace, however, was not speedily restored. However, mutual illwill and suspicion continued to embitter the relations of Juvenal to his province, and Evagrius complains of the evils which had followed his return (Evagr. H. E. ii. 5). On his restoration to his see, Juvenal wrote to apprise Leo of the happy turn his fortunes had taken. Leo, in reply, Sept. 4, 454 A.D., offered him his congratulations, but told him plainly that he had brought his troubles on his own head by his condemnation of Flavian and admission of the errors of Eutyches, and that having favoured heretics he cannot now blame them. He expressed his satisfaction that he had repented and come to a better mind, and advises him to study his tome to confirm him in the faith (Leo Magn. Ep. 139 [171]). A letter similar in tone had been written by Leo, two years before, at the commencement of the troubles, to Julian bishop of Cos, Nov. 25, 452 A.D., in which he expresses his sympathy with Juvenal, but says that he has only himself to thank for his troubles, through having embraced the impieties of Dioscorus and Eusebius, and led many to follow his example, who had drunk deeper of the poison than himself, and from disciples become enemies, "facti sunt ejus adversarii cujus antea fuerunt discipuli" (Ep. 109 [138]). Once again, in 457 A.D., Leo addressed Juvenal among the other metropolitans of the East, with reference to the troubles at Alexandria, which had culminated in the murder of Proterius, urging him to resist the requisition to summon another council and to defend the faith as declared at Chalcedon, and communicate his letter to his suffragan bishops (Ep. 150 [119]). His name is also found among the bishops to whom the emperor Leo wrote, desiring them to give their opinions as to the pretensions of Aelurus (Labbe, iv. 890).

The statement of Basil of Seleucia that Juvenal first "began to celebrate the glorious and adorable salvation-bringing nativity of the Lord" (Patrol. Græc. lxxxv. 469) must be interpreted to mean that he separated the celebration of the Nativity and the Epiphany, which, up to that time, had been kept on the same day, January 6. We may gather from a letter professing to be addressed by the bishop of Jerusalem to the bishop of Rome, which, though found to be a late forgery by the gross confusion of names and dates (cf. Dict. Ch. Antiq. Vol. I. p. 359, CHRISTMAS), affords interesting evidence as to the original combination of those festivals, that this change was initiated by Juvenal in accordance with the Western practice. Basil of Seleucia, being a contemporary of Juvenal, and associated with him in his public acts, may be regarded as trustworthy evidence for the fact. According to Basil, Juvenal was the builder of a basilica in honour of St. Stephen on the site of his martyrdom, for which the empress Eudocia furnished the funds.

The death of Juvenal may be most probably placed in 458 A.D. But there is no certainty as to either the commencement or the termination of his episcopate (cf. Tillemont, Note sur Juvenal, xv. 867). He was succeeded by Anastasius. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xv.; Ceillier, xiii. 247; Cave, Script. Eccl. i. 419; Oudin, i. 1270.) [E. V.]

JUVENALIS (3), bishop of Albano, signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, sent in 680, to the council of Constantinople (Mansi, xi. 302; Ughelli, i. 250; Cappelletti, i. 658, 678; Hefele, § 314). Cappelletti makes him seventh bishop of the see. [A. H. D. A.]

JUVENCUS, C. VETTIVS AQUILINUS, a Christian poet of the 4th century. Of his life little is known; he was by birth a Spaniard, descended from a noble family; perhaps, as his name would suggest, connected with Q. Vettius Aquilinus, consul 125 A.D.; C. Vettius Aquilinus, consul 162 A.D.; Vettius Aquilinus, consul 286 A.D. (cf. Migne, Prolegg. ad in.). He was a presbyter in the Christian church, and composed his poem on the Gospels during the reign of peace established by Constantine (Hist. Ev. iv. 808 sqq.; S. Jerome, de Vir. III. c. 84; Ep. lxx. Chronica ad 332 A.D.).

These statements exhaust our certain knowledge about the poet's life. His works shew an acquaintance with the chief Latin poets, and it is perhaps this learning which earned for him the title of "Scholasticus," which is applied to him by Alcuin. Perhaps it may mean more definitely a teacher of rhetoric, and he is called "rhetor" by Trithemius. Tamayus de Salazar in the Martyrol. Hisp., and Peter de Natalibus say that he was honoured as a confessor in the Spanish church on Sept. 12, but there is no earlier authority for the statement, and his name is not found in any Spanish breviary (v. Acta Sanctorum ad Sept. 12).

Works.—(i.) Historia Evangelica. This is the only extant work that is attributed to him on the authority of St. Jerome. It is an hexameter poem on our Lord's life, based upon the Gospels. The special interest of it lies in the fact that it is the first Christian epic, the first effort to tell the Gospel story in a metrical form. From the preface and the epilogue we may perhaps gather that it was the author's aim, not only to gain immortality for himself, but also to attract heathen readers by the form in which the story was told. The chief merit of the poem lies in its literal adherence to the text. Commencing with the events of St. Luke i. ii. (i. 1–258), the author passes to the account of St. Matthew (i. 18), and follows that to the end, omitting only a few short passages (xiii. 44–53, xx. 28–34, xxi. 10–13, xxiii. 15–26, 29–36, xxiv. 28), rarely supplementing his account from the other Synoptists (v. i. 355, ii. 43), but inserting large extracts from St. John, viz. i. 43–iv. (lib. ii. 99–348), v. 19–47 (ii. 659 sqq.), xi. (iv. 306–404). While the translation is very literal, it is saved from baldness by a clear fluent style, which shews a knowledge of Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, &c., and gains variety and ornament by frequent periphrases, by alliteration, by the frequent use of compound words, many of which seem to be of original formation, and by the revival of many archaic words. At times the author adds explanatory comment; cf. i. 408, 517; ii. 350, 579; iii. 241, 265, 475; iv. 571. The prosody is fluent and fairly correct, frequently lengthening short syllables in arsi or before double letters. Good specimens of the style will be found in the Preface, i. 626 sqq. (the Lord's Prayer); ii. 25 (the Stilling of the Storm), ii. 550 sqq.

The text used is a pre-vulgate version, following the African revision, cf. xx. 28, xxi. 31, and perhaps iii. 16.

The book seems to have been widely known from the first. It is quoted with approval by St. Jerome (ad Mt. ii. 11), by pope Gelasius, Venantius Fortunatus (de Vita S. Martini, 1), Isidore, Jonas Scotus, Bede, Alcuin, &c. (v. Migne, Prolegg. col. 42 sqq.), and it has been edited no less than thirty times. The best separate editions are those of Reusch, Frankfort, 1710; and Areal, Rome, 1792 (reprinted in Migne). Cf. also Gebser, de C. Vetti. Aq. Vita et Scriptis (lib. i. with introduction and notes), Jena, 1827. It will be found in Gallandi, iv., Migne, xix., Ceillier, iii., and the other collections. Cf. Kritische Beiträge zur Historia Evangelica des Juvenicus von Dr. J. Huemer in Wiener Studien, Wien, 1880, pp. 81–112.

(ii.) St. Jerome (ubi supra) attributes to him "nonnulla eodem metro ad sacramentorum ordinem pertinentia," but these are not extant. Trithemius mentions that he had seen two books "de Sacramentis." He also refers to some elegiac poem which he had himself read, though he does not give its name, and adds that Juvenicus composed many works both in prose and poetry, which he had not seen.

(iii.) Historia Vet. Testamenti. This is only extant in parts, and its authorship is doubtful. For some time only 350 lines of the Liber in Genesim were known, and were attributed to Cyprian or Tertullian. The whole of Genesis was afterwards found attributed to Juvenicus in a codex (of 7th century) at Corvey, and published by Martene in 1724. More recently Pitra has published 3266 additional lines from MSS. at Cambridge and Laon, containing the whole of Exodus and Joshua, and fragments of the rest of the Pentateuch. The songs of Moses (Exod. xv.; Deut. xxxii.) and the hymn in Numb. xxi. are in Phalaecean hendecasyllabics. There are further traces in quotations by grammarians of a translation of the whole of the historical books (Rheinisches Museum, xxi. 123 sqq., 266 sqq.). In favour of attributing this poem to Juvencus may be urged the general similarity of style shewn in the usage of particular words, the fondness for compound epithets, the imitation of Virgil (cf. Genesis, 121, 1139, Exod. 248), the addition of explanatory comment to the narrative (cf. Exod. 468), and the use of a prevulgate version (cf. Genesis, 75, 1380). On the other hand, the style is less varied, exaggerates the love of archaic words, and takes greater licences in prosody; the treatment of the Evangelical canticles in the Hist. Evang. is not analogous to the lyrical translation of the Songs of Moses, and it is strange that St. Jerome, to whom the work would have been of great interest, should not have known it or not mentioned it, and that Bede, who does quote it, should never attribute it to Juvencus (cf. Ebert, Christl.-Lat. Lit. p. 115, note).

The Liber in Genesis may be found in Martene, Collect. Vet. Script. 1724, and Gallandi and Migne (ubi supra); the rest in Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. i. p. 171 sqq.

(iv.) Some later writers attribute hymns to Juvencus, but there is no trace of any except the canticles in the Historia Evangelica and Hist. Vet. Test. Migne also attributes to him a poem published without an author by Fabricius, and entitled "De Laudibus Domini." Beginning with the description of a miracle which had lately happened, it passes on to a praise of God's work in the Creation and in the Life and Resurrection of Jesus. It resembles Juvencus somewhat in style, and professes to have been written in the time of Constantine, but there is no external evidence to connect it with him. Migne also prints a short poem, "Triumphus Christi Heroicus," a fanciful description of Christ's Descent into Hell, and of the trophies won by the Cross. It is much more pagan in form than anything in Juvencus, and Migne himself regards it as of a later date, intended as a supplement to the Historia Evangelica. [W. L.]

JUVENTINUS (1) (JUVENTIUS, Mart. Rom.), Jan. 25. Martyr at Antioch, with Maximus, under Julian. St. Chrysostom celebrated them in his homily, In Juventinum et Maximinum Martyres (in Pat. Gr. l. 571). The Basilian menology mentions him under Oct. 9. (Theodor. H. E. iii. 15; Boll. Acta SS. 25 Jan. ii. 619; Fleury, H. E. i. xv. s. 22; Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

JUVENTINUS (2), bishop of Marona or Marovana, in Mauritania Sitifensis, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 60; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 214.) [R. S. G.]

JUVENTIUS (Ughelli, i. 1077; Cappell. xii. 398, 515; Boll. Acta SS. 8 Feb. ii. 152, Mart. Rom. Feb. 8, Sept. 12), reputed second bishop of Pavia, cir. 100-139. [INVENTIUS.]

JUVENTIUS (VIVENTIUS), prefect of the city, at Rome, when Damasus was elected pope in A.D. 366; he was also prefect in the earlier months of 367, and was succeeded by Praetextatus (Amm. Marcell. Res Gest. Rom. xvii. 3, 11-13; Clinton, Fest. Rom. i. 467; Fleury, Hist. du Christ. xvi. 8; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, iv. 608; Baronius, Annal. A.D. 366). In Cod. Theod. iii. he is called VIVENTIUS. In Corsini (Series Praefect. p. 237) he is named Jubentius Pannonius. [J. G.]

JUVIANUS, bishop. [JOVIANUS (5).]

JUVINIUS (JUVENIUS), bishop of Vence, mentioned in a manuscript life of St. Veranus the fourth bishop, referred to by the Sammarthani, who place him cir. 410, the second bishop (Gall. Chr. iii. 212.) [C. H.]
