can assist in the realization of that purpose; such assistance consists in living as God would have us live. Jesus came to tell us, and by example to show us, how God would have us live; to make known to us God's love which forgives our failure and patiently awaits our complete success in doing his will; and to proclaim the freely given divine power which is available and sufficient for those whose supreme purpose is set toward realizing God's will in themselves. This was Jesus' mission; all that he did, all that he said, all that he was, belonged to this message. His words announced these truths, his acts embodied them, his character illustrated them. The events of his public ministry were determined by the attitude of the Jews toward him. He was rejected and crucified because the message which he brought, and which he unwaveringly taught, was distasteful to the religious leaders of his nation. He sacrificed himself that men might have the truth of religion.

If, therefore, we wish to know what the religious teaching of Jesus is, we must get the knowledge from him. The essence of Christianity is what Jesus taught, freed from the applications and elaborations of subsequent centuries. He came to make life intelligible and duty clear. His presentation of religious truths was divinely wise. He could omit nothing that was of primary importance. The relation of these truths to each other he perfectly arranged. And thus we have in his Galilean teaching, which was given to untrammelled and receptive minds, the universal presentation of the Gospel. Then can we know what this Galilean teaching was? Yes. God's providence has preserved it in our gospels. Can we trust these records to give us a true account of his teaching? Yes. The reasons for this trust are given above. We can confidently maintain, on historical grounds, that the gospels report to us with substantial accuracy what Jesus did and said and was. In them we get clear back to Jesus, and learn immediately from and of him. The gospel records have been transmitted to us by the first generation of Christians, and contain the apostolic accounts of Jesus' deeds and words. We see him through their eyes, to a certain degree; but there is every reason to think that in the main they saw him clearly and correctly. While the gospels give only excerpts of what he said and did, those sayings and acts have come down to us which most fully and perfectly show his teaching and his life. We of course recognize that the details of the incidents and the ipsissima verba of the sayings have been imperfectly preserved. Jesus spoke in Aramaic, and our records of his utterances are only in Greek, so that in every case allowance must be made for translation. Minor variation is everywhere present in the parallel accounts of originally identical incidents or sayings. But these things are unimportant. What we do need is assurance that the facts of Jesus' life and the ideas of Jesus' teaching are contained in our gospel records. And this assurance we have, not on a priori, but on strictly historical grounds.

When we endeavor to ascertain from the gospels what the teaching of Jesus was, we find that he centers it all about what he terms the Kingdom of God. This term he derives from his contemporaries, but the content of it he has to modify greatly. The Jews were right in believing in God's kingdom, but his kingdom was different from that which they had conceived it to be. In both views the Kingdom of God meant the realization of God's will in man individually and collectively. The difference lay in the conception of what God's will for man is. To the Jews it meant visible glorification of Israel, temporal power, material blessings; to Jesus it meant the reign of reverence, truth, righteousness, altruism. He set forth clearly and fully what human duty is toward God and toward man. It is to trust and revere God as a Father who loves and cares for his children, to live in dependence upon and communion with him, to lead righteous lives, to be and do good, to love and serve one's fellow men. That is, each must himself do perfectly God's will, and must as far as possible, secure that it be done by others. The outcome of this individual living according to the highest principles of being will be a transformed humanity, a perfected Kingdom of God. Jesus proclaimed this message to men, and exhorted them to accept it and live it. He asserted this to be the divine truth which God had given him to teach to men, in his office as Messiah. This, he taught, was God's answer to the question: What is life, and how shall I live it? It was a very simple and practical religion as Jesus gave it. He expressed it in language unequalled for clearness, beauty and strength, he embodied it in deeds of kindness and sympathy, he illustrated it in his own matchless character and life. Jesus' teaching is the heart of the Bible, the essence of Christianity, the norm of that which is true and useful in religion.

(5) The Jews' Rejection of Their Messiah.

The Jewish people in Jesus' day were under the religious domination of the Pharisees. This politico-religious party had arisen some two hundred years earlier to resist the threatening inroads of Hellenism. The aim of the Pharisees was to defend and perpetuate the intensely religious, peculiar and exclusive character of Judaism. They were the political opponents of the Sadducees, that party which was disposed to cooperate with the Roman officials who were their masters, and to take up with the freer life of the Gentiles who surrounded them. In their zeal to maintain the separateness of the Jews from the Gentiles, the Pharisees placed great emphasis upon the law. They extended their legislation by the addition of innumerable ceremonial distinctions and observances, until a hedge was grown about the Jew to prevent his absorption into the great empire of which they unwillingly formed a political part. They looked upon the Romans with unrelenting hatred, and lived in the hope that their long-anticipated Messiah would come to bring them freedom from the odious Gentile yoke. It followed, therefore, that the Pharisees found nothing to their liking in Jesus, for he in no manner responded to their intense, exclusive national pride and expectation. He showed no disposition to undertake the accomplishment of Jewish political independence; on the contrary, he insisted that the obligations to their Roman masters be fulfilled. All the temporal power, national glory, and material prosperity which characterized their Messianic hope, were ignored by Jesus. Generations of misinterpretation of the Old Testament prophecies, and persistent disregard of the spiritual realities of life, had led them astray, until their hearts were set, not upon things which were above, but upon things which were upon the earth. They seem even to have stumbled at the fact that Jesus came from Galilee, and therefore could not be the Messiah of promise (Matt. ii: 5, 6; John i:45, 46; vii:41, 42, 52).

Another important reason for the Pharisaic opposition to Jesus was his open transgression and criticism of their legal regulations. They had engrossed the religious life of the Jews with rules, forms and ceremonies. The general prohibitions of the Old Testament law were expanded by specific application to all phases of daily life until the individual was enmeshed with external performances. This mass of casuistical legislation was known as "the traditions of the elders" (Mark vii:1-13), and it took precedence over all else. It robbed life of all its freedom, spontaneity and joy. In Galilee little attention was paid to this type of Judaism. Jesus had not been brought up in bondage to it, and he had no sympathy with it. He publicly disregarded this Pharisaic code, and on many occasions emphatically condemned it. The outstanding conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees in this matter was over the observance of the Sabbath. Jesus refused to keep it or to countenance it in the way they demanded. They were enraged by his independence and opposition, and entered upon a course of violent hostility to him (Matt. xii:1-14; Luke xiii:10-17; xiv:1-6; John v:1-18).

But most of all the Pharisees hated Jesus because he tore off their masks, and exposed their despicable characters to the people. Many of the leading Pharisees were hypocrites. Ostentatiously pious, scrupulously observant of religious ceremonies, loud in their professions of goodness, they were in fact guilty of the worst sins. Jesus did not spare them in his denunciations (Matt. v: 20; xxiii:1-33). And there could result nothing but the bitterest enmity and conflict. The Pharisees only awaited the opportunity to get their hands upon him, and they would avenge themselves by assassination (Matt. xii:14; Mark iii:6; John viii:59; x:31, 39; xi:53, 57).

The attitude of the Jewish common people toward Jesus was of quite another sort. They were faithful to their national religion, but did not live under the bondage of Pharisaism. The influence of the Pharisees was strong in Judea, but reached only weakly into Galilee. It was from this environment that Jesus himself arose. He was one of the Galilean common people. He appreciated them and sympathized with them (Matt. ix:10-13; Luke vii:16-18; John i:9-14). His work was mainly among them, for the Pharisee-ridden Judeans would not hear him. The Galileans regarded him as a great prophet and an authoritative teacher (Matt. vii:28, 29; Mark i:27; Luke vii:16). It was from this class of the Jewish nation that Jesus drew his twelve apostles (Judas perhaps excepted). He was eagerly welcomed by the common people when he began his public ministry. Multitudes came to hear him, and he taught and healed them (Matt. v:1; xiii: 1, 2; Mark iii:7, 8; vi:32-44, 53-56). For a considerable time he worked among them, and gained many adherents. But all the time they were hoping that Jesus would proclaim himself the Messiah of their mistaken expectations. They looked anxiously from day to day for the indications that he was about to set up his temporal, visible kingdom, to the freedom and glory of his people. When they had waited until their patience failed, they undertook to force him into this action. This precipitated a crisis, for Jesus could only refuse them (John vi:14, 15). Overwhelming disappointment fell upon his enthusiastic followers, and most of them withdrew (John vi:66-68).

The doors of public teaching were closed against him. There remained the possibility of a last appeal to the nation. This he determined to make in the most impressive manner available to him. Up to this time he had not claimed to be the Messiah, except to his closest disciples, and then with strict charges of secrecy. The proclamation of it would have put a stop to his work by the excitement of false hopes and futile efforts. But now that he could accomplish no more by his public ministry, it only remained to go to Jerusalem, announce himself as Messiah to the pass-over multitude, claim the allegiance which they would not give (Matt. xxiii:37), and receive the martyrdom which he clearly saw lay at the end of such a course (Mark x:32-34).

The triumphal entry was arranged. The throngs of Galilean celebrants of the passover feast gathered about him and hailed him as Messiah, for it looked now as though their ardent hopes would at last be realized. Jesus accepted their homage, and entered Jerusalem in their company with the demonstrations of a king returning to his city in peace and victory. The enthusiasm and confidence of the multitude was at the highest pitch. The strength of the popular following was so great that both Pharisees and Sadducees became alarmed (Luke xx:6, 19; John xii:19). The Sadducees had paid little attention to Jesus up to this time, for they took small interest in anything but the politics and amenities of life. But now that Jesus seemed to threaten a popular religious uprising, they were aroused to strenuous opposition. The Sadducees were the Jewish office-holders, responsible to the Romans for civic peace in Judea; and if an anti-Roman insurrection took place, as this threatened to do, the Sadducees were liable to be deposed for negligence or inability to preserve the peace (John xi:47-50). The Sanhedrin was, therefore, united in its purpose to put Jesus to death (Matt. xxvi:3-5; John xi:53).

But in the face of the popular support, how could this be accomplished? Only by treachery. A traitor was not lacking. When once Jesus was in the hands of his enemies the people could be turned against him. In fact, the reaction had set in among his followers. For again Jesus was failing them, their Messianic programme was being forgotten. The old disappointment was settling down upon them with fatal force. It was still only a spiritual kingdom that Jesus meant. The Jewish leaders knew how to turn this disappointment into flaming indignation. And when this was done (Matt. xxvii:20-26), the multitude joined hotly in the cry, "Let him be crucified!" Pharisees, Sadducees, common people, all were lost. The rejection was final, and, with the exception of a few hundred faithful souls, complete.

(6) The Crucified But Living Christ. Fear, hatred and vengeance drove the Jewish leaders to swift action against Jesus. Once in their power, by the betrayal of Judas as they supposed, but in fact by his own voluntary surrender of himself to his enemies, the form of a trial before the Sanhedrin was hastily gone through. Prejudged and precondemned, the sentence of death for blasphemy was soon pronounced. The career of this violator of sacred things, this traitor to Judaism, this pretender to Divine honors, this turbulent revolutionist, would now be closed. But the Sanhedrin could only pass, not execute, the death sentence. Jesus, therefore, was hurried before the Roman procurator, Pilate, who alone had the power of capital punishment. Now the charge against Jesus was changed. What cared Pilate for the wrangling of the Jews over their religious superstitions? But if Jesus were an insurrectionist against the Roman government, Pilate would be concerned. This the Jewish leaders tried, but the procurator was not convinced. Indeed, the man was innocent—Pilate would not order his execution. But the Sanhedrists were insistent. If he refused them, they could secure his recall (as a few years later they did) by reporting his misdeeds to the Emperor. Why should Pilate sacrifice himself for this hunted Jew? Throwing the responsibility of the whole affair upon Jesus' Jewish accusers, he gave permission that their demand be carried out. Crucifixion was the common Roman method of executing rebels, and Jesus was put to death as such. With a cry of deep significance he expired upon the cross. It was, indeed, finished; he had been obedient even unto death; he had fulfilled his God-given mission to mankind.

Jesus had seen clearly the necessary outcome of this journey to Jerusalem. Even from the entrance upon his public ministry it must have seemed to him probable that he would ultimately be rejected and put to death (Matt. xxiii:29-37; Luke xiii:31-34). The Pharisees opposed him from the first, but when the Galileans gave up their hope and withdrew from him, Jesus saw his work nearing its end. He set about preparing his disciples for his departure. He determined upon a martyrdom for his cause at Jerusalem. He told them that he was going to be put to death by his enemies (Mark x:32-34; Luke xiii:31-34). Deliberately he planned the Jerusalem visit, and calmly he placed himself into the hands of those who sought his life. His teaching would thus be consummated and glorified. But on the other hand, it was an acknowledgment of defeat with his own nation. It was their final rejection of their Messiah (Matt. xxiii:37, 38). The heritage of the Jews was repudiated by them; it must, therefore, be taken from them and given to others (Matt. xxi:28-31, 33-41; Mark xi:12-14). God's chosen people to bear to the world his true and pure religion thus refused to perform their mission. National pride and self-seeking had unfitted them for a universal brotherhood and self-abnegating service. This was the agony of his self-sacrifice.

And yet Jesus realized that his own death at the hands of the Jews did not mean the destruction of his work nor the failure of his cause. Truth, right and goodness cannot fail because men are recreant to their opportunities and trusts. The Kingdom of God would live and triumph, notwithstanding his death—indeed, in a measure because of his death. Jesus' death became the most effective attestation of the truth of his message, and the cross which symbolized his martyrdom became the emblem of his followers. That which was written later (Tertullian, about A. D. 200) of the Christians who died for their faith was primarily and peculiarly true of Jesus himself, "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."

Nor would he by that experience which men call death lay down the work of his life. He knew that shortly, in God's own good time, he would resume it (Matt. xvi:21, 25; comp. Hos. vi:2). The soul which draws its life from God forever lives. "There is no death: what seems so is transition." The crucifixion was an incident in the life of an immortal being. What we term death is but the point at which the relation of the living soul to the physical body changes from that to which we are accustomed. Jesus lived and Jesus lives. He did not die. Shall we deny immortality to him, when we hold it for ourselves? The Christian does not die: he rises to a larger, better life. Jesus "brought life and immortality to light." He taught us that there is no death, but only transition to a higher sphere of existence. And so Jesus entered through his crucifixion into the life beyond.

The gospels transmit to us the account of his disciples that for a brief time again after the crucifixion Jesus was seen by them as of old. The empty sepulcher supports their statements, while the many evidences of this miracle of the ages are beyond any reasonable dispute and stand incontrovertible. God in his providence gave them to see in familiar outline the risen Christ. This may have been necessary on account of their imperfect apprehension of spiritual truth. Not yet have we reached the stage where we at all fully realize that the surest and best realities are the spiritual realities. How much more did the first disciples need an objective vision of their risen Master, to give them confidence and courage to carry on his work. It was a living cause; their leader still led on; they found, when they could see again through tear-dimmed eyes, Jesus' presence and power were still with them. Physical vision of him passed into spiritual vision. Invisibly now, but no less really, they felt him near. And in this assurance his disciples set about the spread and upbuilding of the kingdom which he had established, and of which they were now the visible representatives. And Jesus had given them at his departure a memorial of himself, to comfort them, to strengthen them, and to bind them together in love and service. The simple repast of bread and wine, which he had often and now for the last time shared with his disciples, was to call to their remembrance, as often as they ate it together, his own life and death (so called) that men might have religious truth, and truth expressed not only in words, but also in acts and in character. And so the Christ is ever with us, the inspiration and the guide of all who are continuing his work on earth, who are endeavoring to realize in themselves and in this great world the Kingdom of God which he came to make known and to establish among men, which he proclaimed to men in his utterances, and in his deeds, and in his life and death. One is our teacher, leader and example—the Jesus of history, and the living, exalted Christ of faith.

JESUS THE CHRIST, TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE TO.

(1) Concerning Jesus Christ, we are informed that he is, from eternity, begotten by the Father in a manner no creature is (Ps. ii:7; John i:14; Rom. viii:3, 32); that he is equal to him as a Person (Zech. xiii:7; Phil. ii:6, 7), and one with him in essence (John x:30; 1 John v:7).

(2) We find names and titles proper only to God ascribed to him, as JEHOVAH (Jer. xxiii:6, and xxxiii:16; Is. xlv:23-25, with Rom. xiv:10-12; Is. xl:3, with Luke i:76; Is. vi:1, 9, 10, with John xii:40, 41); and in hundreds of other places where mention is made of the Lord speaking to prophets or others under the Old Testament.

(3) He is called God (Matt. i:23; John i:1, 2, and xx:28; 1 Tim. iii:16; 2 Pet. i:1); the true God (1 John v:20, 21); the great and mighty God (Tit. ii:13; Is. ix:6); the only wise God (Jude 24, 25; Rom. xvi:27; 1 Tim. i:16, 17); the God of glory (Acts vii:2); the only God (Is. xlv:15-23, with Rom. xiv:11); God blessed forever (Rom. ix:5); the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Exod. iii:6, with Acts vii:30-32; Hos. xii:3-5); the Lord of hosts (Is. viii:13, 14, with 1 Pet. ii:6-8; Ps. cxviii:22, with Matt. xxi:42, and 2 Sam. vi:2, and Is. liv:5, with 2 Cor. xi:2); Lord of Lords, and King of Kings (Rev. xvii:14, and xix:13-16, with 1 Tim. vi:14, 15); the first and the last (Rev. i:17, 18, and ii:8, with Is. xli:4, and xlii:6).

(4) Divine attributes are ascribed to him; as omniscience (Col. ii:3; Rev. ii:23; John xxi:17, and ii:24, 25; John xvi:30); omnipresence (Matt. xviii:20, and xxviii:20; Col. i:17; Heb. i:3; John i:18, and iii:13); almighty power (Phil. iii:21; Rev. i:8, with chap. i:11, 17, 18; and xxii:12, 13, 20); eternity (Rev. i:11, 17, 18; Isa. xli:4; Prov. viii:23; Mic. vi:2; John i:1, and viii:56); unchangeableness (Heb. i:12, and xiii:8).

(5) Divine works of creation, providence, and redemption are ascribed unto him (John i:1, 2; Col. i:16, 17; 1 Cor. viii:6; Eph. iii:9; Heb. i:3; Acts xx:28).

(6) He is represented as the object of religious worship, without any limitation; as in baptism, by faith, prayer, praise, vows (Matt. xxviii:19; John v:23; xiv:1, and xx:28; Acts vii:5, 9; Heb. i:6; Phil. ii:9-11).

JETHER (jē'ther), (Heb. יֶתֶר, yeh'ther, surplus).

1. The father-in-law of Moses. In Exod. iv:18 called JETHRO; margin JETHER.

2. The oldest of the sons of Gideon (Judg. viii:20), who made his age an excuse when his father asked him to kill the Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna (B. C. 1326). He was slain by Abimelech (Judg. ix:24).

3. Father of Amasa, David's captain (1 Kings ii:5, 32; 1 Chron. ii:17); elsewhere the name is ITHRA.

4. Son of Jada, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii:32), B. C. after 1856.

5. A son of Ezra, of Judah (1 Chron. iv:17), B. C. about 1618.

6. A chief warrior of the tribe of Asher, and father of Jephunneh (1 Chron. vii:38). Possibly the same as ITHRAN.

JETHETH (jē'theth), (Heb. יֶתֶת, yeh-thayth', derivation uncertain).

An Edomitish "duke" in Mount Seir who came to Esau (Gen. xxxvi:40; 1 Chron. i:51).

JETHLAH (jēth'lah), (Heb. יֶתְלָה, yith-law', suspended, i. e., lofty).

A city of the tribe of Dan given between Ajalon and Elon (Josh. xix:42), therefore probably in the eastern part of the tribe; not identified.

JETHRO (jē'thro), (Heb. יֶתְרוֹ, yith-ro', excellence; superiority), a priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person.

Moses spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt with him, and married his daughter Zipporah (Exod. iii:1; iv:18), B. C. 1250.

It is said in Exod. ii:18, that the priest of Midian, whose daughter Moses married, was Reuel; afterward, in chapter iii:1, he is called Jethro, as also in chapter xviii; but in Num. x:29, "Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite," seems to be called Moses' father-in-law (comp. Judg. iv:11). The probability is that Jethro and Reuel or Raguel were but different names of Moses' father-in-law (the former being either a title or a surname showing the rank of Raguel in his tribe), and that the son, Hobab, was his brother-in-law, who may have borne one of the father's names. (See HOBAB.)

JETUR (jē'tur), (Heb. יֶטוּר, yet-oor', encircled), one of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:15; 1 Chron. i:31),

His name stands also for his descendants, the Itureans (1 Chron. v:19), living east of the northern Jordan (Luke iii:1).

JEUEL (jē'u-ēl), (Heb. יְהוּאֵל, ye-hoo-ale', protected by God), a descendant of Zerath, who, with six hundred and ninety of his kindred, dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. ix:6), (B. C. 536).

JEUSH (jē'ush), (Heb. יְהוּשׁ, ye-hoosh', collecting; strong; hasty).

1. Oldest son of Esau, by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i:35), born in Canaan, but later he became a "duke" of the Edomites B. C. after 1964.

2. The first mentioned of the sons of Bilhan; he was head of a Benjamite house during David's reign (1 Chron. vii:10, 11), B. C. before 1000.

3. A Levite, one of the four sons of Shimei, of the Gershonites. He, with his brother Beriah, not having many sons, were counted as the third branch of the family (1 Chron. xxiii:10, 11), B. C. about 1014.

4. The first named of the three sons of Rehobam, apparently by Abihail, his second wife (2 Chron. xi:19), B. C. after 973.

JEUZ (jē'uz), (Heb. יְהוּזָבָב, ye-hoots', counselor), head of a Benjamite house, apparently the son of Shabaraim and Hodesh or Baara (1 Chron. viii:10). B. C. about 1618.

JEW (jū, or jū), (Heb. יְהוּדִי, ye-hoo-dee', a Jehudite, i. e., descendant of Judah; Gr. Ἰουδαῖος, ee-oo-dah'yos').

A name formed from that of the patriarch Judah, and applied in its first use to one belonging to the tribe or country of Judah, or rather perhaps to a subject of the separate kingdom of Judah (2 Kings xvi:6; xxv:25; Jer. xxxii:12; xxxviii:19; xl:11; xli:3; lii:28). During the Captivity the term seems to have been extended to all the people of the Hebrew language and country, without distinction (Esth. iii:6, 9; Dan. iii:8, 12); and this loose application of the name was preserved after the restoration to Palestine, when it came to denote not only every descendant of Abraham in the largest possible sense, but even proselytes who had no blood relation to the Hebrews (Acts ii:5; comp. verse 10).

Rabbi D. Philipson explains the meaning of the three names applied to the Jews, as follows:

Broadly speaking, I define the three terms thus: "Hebrew" is the linguistic, "Israelite" the national, "Jew" the religious designation. If we still used the Hebrew as our language in daily life, it would be correct to call us Hebrews; if we were still a nation, the proper appellation would be Israelites, which was the distinguishing term applied to the people when they inhabited Palestine as a nation, in contrast with the surrounding peoples, Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, Edomites and the like. Since Hebrew is no longer our spoken language, since further we are not a nation, our national existence having ceased with the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, it is technically incorrect to apply either of these names to present day Jews. There remains, then, the third, "Jew"; this is primarily the religious term, the name of the professor of Judaism. The distinguishing mark of the Jewish people is their religion; they are a religious community, hence the proper name is "Jew." Our faith is called not Hebraism, nor yet Israelitism, but Judaism, and the corresponding term to Judaism is Jew. (See HEBREW LANGUAGE; ISRAEL; JUDAH.)

JEWEL (jū'ēl), (Heb. כְּלֵי יָמָא, khel-yaw', an ornament or trinket, Hos. ii:13), very general in character. (See AMETHYST; RUBY; SAPPHIRE, ETC.)

JEWESS (jū'ess), (Gr. Ἰουδαία, ee-oo-dah'yah), a woman of Hebrew birth (Acts xvi:1; xxiv:24). In the first passage it refers to Eunice, Timothy's mother; in the second to Drusilla, daughter of Herod and wife of Felix.

JEWISH (jū'y'ish), (Gr. Ἰουδαϊκός, ee-oo-dah-ee-kos', belonging to the Jews). Paul warns his younger brother against the Rabbinical legends that are designated by this epithet (Tit. i:14).

JEWISH SYNAGOGUE, THE MODERN.

The history of Judaism in America is a record of growth and development, of successive changes in custom and ritual, of large advance in educational and benevolent activity, as the Jewish settlers, chiefly of Spanish origin, coming in scattered numbers previous to the War of Independence, were strengthened by immigration from Germany, Poland, Roumania, and Russia, until at the end of 1896 the Jewish population of the United States reached fully a million.

(1) Doctrine. The customs and doctrines of Judaism which have never been reduced to iron-clad dogmas for all Israel, despite occasional codification, have always admitted of greater or less variation in different lands, according to climate and circumstance. The same conditions were to be experienced in America with similar results. The earlier immigrants of Sephardic stock who settled in the North American colonies, after harsh treatment in South America and varying fortunes in the West Indies, were conservative after the fashion of their fathers, all the memory of martyrdom giving halo and beauty to olden traditions. Many of their descendants two centuries later are no less strict observants of the Spanish and Portuguese ritual and practice. The English and earlier Polish settlers of a subsequent generation have hardly as yet lost their British and Polish conservative associations. The German immigrants of the decade of 1848 who were reared in the school of German liberation were inclined to be less scrupulous of old fashions, and adapted forms and customs to the newer-day environment. Their children have naturally developed along the same progressive lines. The still more recent Jewish landslide from Europe is Russian and Galician in its conception of Jewish doctrine and rite, including a contingent of pronounced radical views.

While, therefore, American Judaism suffers from this stratification, due to successive immigrations of different nationalities, it has never had its authoritative council or synod to promulgate opinion, to ratify or to abolish. There have been associations among rabbis and laymen, but these have not been ecclesiastical in character.

Their views have been simply individual, of interest, of course, as evidencing the trend of thought, but of no binding force. While Jewish congregations may unite and cooperate for education and charity, the autonomy of each is strictly maintained, and every pulpit is purely its own spokesman. Hence there are all shades of sentiment in American Israel, all varieties of interpretations, the two forces of stability and movement being steadily at work and developing phases of conservatism and progress. Considering, however, the essential principles of representative Jewish leaders in pulpit and press, which are practically the same, even if they differ as to observances and the authority of the rabbinical ceremonial code, these may broadly be stated as embracing the unity of God and the unity of mankind. The religious ceremonials in home and synagogue, held more or less strictly, the righteous life impelling to breadth of view, brotherly love to all, and the realization of the highest ideals of American citizenship—such are the corollaries of American Jewish principles.

(2) The Future. The heterogeneous nature of the American Jew and the lack as yet of a distinctly homogeneous class, due to his composite character, in which trait he resembles the American in general, makes it difficult to realize Jewish ideals. The great mass are still foreign, with the atmosphere of Europe and Ghetto conditions; and their Americanization is a slow process, for the parents perhaps impossible. On the other hand, there is a large body of American-born Israelites, apathetic and without sympathy for the synagogue. Yet there are hopeful signs, particularly in educational movements, a more conservative tendency among our representative men, and the awakening of the American Jew to his duty and opportunity. With co-operation, unselfish effort, and intelligent direction, American Judaism can expect to attain a high degree of usefulness and to realize under providence some of its ideals that will bless and elevate humanity.

(3) Relation to Christianity. As to the question of federal union with other churches, that is impossible so long as church remains church and synagogue, synagogue. The Jew is no propagandist and has no desire to Judaize. He rejoices that the best elements in the church aim to translate into life the ideals of the Jewish prophet. While religious federation is wholly impracticable, church and synagogue do unite for civic purposes, for general educational and charitable progress. In many cities Jew and non-Jew unite on Thanksgiving Day. The Jewish pulpit is freely open to the non-Jewish preacher. Young Men's Hebrew Associations have often called Christian clergymen to their platform. Synagogues have been freely placed at the disposal of Christian congregations whose churches were destroyed by fire, and the courtesy has been reciprocated. These indications of mutual esteem and good will cannot but spread more and more, particularly as national movements for education, charity, civic reform, and congresses of religion increase and rally the broad and thoughtful of all creeds on the same platform. But the most advanced and liberal Jew will not consent to federation, if it means extinction and absorption, and surely the more conservative will be least inclined for such a step. The mission and message of Judaism are not superfluous even in our era. So long as swords are not turned to ploughshares, and idolatries are still practiced, while the nations and creeds are competitors, not partners, the Jew must still be sentinel on the watchtower, however lonely the post, and wait for the dawn. He has survived two thousand years of crucifixion. The Arch of Titus preserves the story of what is termed his nation's fall. But Judaism awoke when the temple vanished; and the Jew, in losing Palestine, has secured the world for the law and the prophet. A. S. I.

JEWRY (יְהוּדָא), (Heb. יְהוּדָא, yeh-hood; Gr. Ἰουδαία, Luke xxiii:5; John vii:1), the Jewish nation, i. e., the kingdom of Judah, later Judea, rendered elsewhere as Judah and Judæa (Dan. v:13).

JEWS, HISTORY OF THE, AND THEIR RELIGION.

(1) From the Fall of Jerusalem to the Middle Ages. The destruction of the temple at Jerusalem meant a crisis for Judaism of even deeper significance than the failure of the Reichstag of Worms to silence the Protestant movement. The belief in the prophecies which had predicted everlasting glory for Jerusalem was shaken; but, as is the case with Adventists, when a prophecy fails to be fulfilled, practical necessity found a way out of the theoretical difficulty. The national calamity began to be considered a transitory condition, after which God's grace would restore the lost glory.

This view was taught by the Pharisaic school. The Pharisees of the first century, A. D., theoretically held the doctrine that the law would be abrogated in the Messianic era; but until then they were just as unwilling to carry this view into practice as the average Christian would be to discard the apostolic creed on the strength of the parable of the Good Samaritan.

The leader of this party was Johanan ben Zakaj. His biography is overgrown with legends. Still so much seems certain that he was a great teacher and a member of the Sanhedrin; that he left Jerusalem before the destruction and established a school in Jabneh, which came to be considered as a substitute for the Sanhedrin. He taught salvation for righteous Gentiles and advocated submission to Rome's political authority. His liturgical institutions meant to preserve as much as possible of the temple worship.

Under the Roman empire the political condition of the Jews was peculiarly sad. The tribute of the half-shekel, the annual sacred gift to the temple, had been confiscated under the name of Fiscus Judaicus—afterwards, however, remitted by Nerva (96-98). During the war of the desolation of Palestine many had been killed, many sold as slaves; great numbers of the survivors were fugitives in the remotest parts of the empire and in Babylonia, then subject to the Parthians; while under Domitian the persecution, especially of proselytes, was most severe; a relative even of the emperor, Flavius Clemens, having been put to death and his wife exiled for this cause. Hadrian (117-138) put an end to the revolution by conciliatory measures, but his despotic syncretism was the cause of another futile rebellion; that of Bar Kokba (132-135), which was the last attempt of the Jews to regain political independence by force of arms.

Their religious life during this period was a consolidation on the basis of changed conditions. Rabban Gamaliel, the Hillelite, under the title of Nassi, or Patriarch, was the recognized successor of the President of the Sanhedrin. His only tangible prerogative was the calendation. He attempted to compile a fixed ritual, but was opposed in his hierarchical tendencies by Eliezer ben Hyrkanos, who had leanings towards Christianity, and by Joshua ben Hananiah, a strict Congregationalist. Gamaliel and Joshua were united in their opposition to political aspirations, while Rabbi Akiba preached political resurrection and proclaimed Bar Kokba as the Messiah. He supervised the Greek version of the Pentateuch written by the proselyte Akylas.

The defeat of Bar Kokba's uprising was followed by severe measures against the rebels. The name of Jerusalem was changed to Aelia Capitolina, and no Jew was allowed to enter the city. On the site of Jahve's sanctuary a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was to be erected; over the gate of the city the image of a swine was placed. Circumcision, the observance of the Sabbath, and the study of the law were prohibited.

Under Antoninus (138-161) a complete change took place, and Hadrian's restrictive laws were abolished. From now on until the reign of Constantine we hear nothing of religious persecution. Still, the growing power of Christianity and the devastation of Palestine caused the Jews to emigrate in large numbers to southern Mesopotamia and to western Europe.

The religious development during the period from the Bar-Kokba Revolution up to the Christianization of the Roman empire shows a growing tendency towards legalism. Jehuda Hanassi (i. e., prince, patriarch) (135-216) won an important place in Jewish history by the compilation of the rabbinical law, called Mishna, which, originally intended as a compendium of the rabbinical interpretation of the biblical law, and of other traditional customs, by and by began to be considered part of the Sinaitic revelation.

R. Jehuda met with no serious opposition in his attempt to establish a religious authority, but soon after his death conditions changed. His son, Gamaliel III (A. C. 216-230), was a mere figure-head; and so the position of the patriarch which the son inherited from the father became a shadow, until Theodosius II (A. C. 425) abolished it altogether.

Economic and political adversities drove a great number of Jews to Babylonia, where already during the third century the schools of Sura and Pumbeditha became strong rivals of their sister institutions in Tiberias and Sepphoris. About the middle of the fourth century the last Palestinian authorities died out. Their successors gave all their attention to the edifying explanation of Scripture, called Aggada. At the same time the talmudical law was further developed in Babylonia, where the Rabbis Ashe (died 427) and Abina (died 499) compiled the Talmud of Babylonia. The Talmud consisted of two parts, the Mishna and the Gemara; the former being the law and the latter a discursive commentary on it. Both together form the Talmud. The lectures on the Mishna, compiled in the Palestinian school, formed the Talmud of Jerusalem; those compiled by R. Ashe and R. Abina, form the Babylonian Talmud. The latter always has been the more popular book and was considered a higher authority.

In the Roman empire the Jews from the time of Constantine (312) were subjected to legal discriminations. A very short interval was the reign of Julian (361-363), who, according to ecclesiastical writers, intended to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. The edict of Ravenna (Feb. 28, 380), promulgated by Theodosius I, which made Rome a Christian empire, affected the condition of the Jews very unfavorably, although the emperor protected them against occasional outbreaks of mobs, stimulated by fanatical ecclesiastics. Because of the dispersion of the Jews the last prerogative of the patriarch, the announcement of the festivals, was surrendered; Hillel II (A. C. 325) being the last to use it.

In Babylonia the Jews were politically organized under an exilarch, Resh Galutha, who was their representative at the court of the Persian king, and, later on, of the Calif. Their spiritual head was the president of one of the great schools. The religious and national revival following upon the return to power of the Parsees (226) brought great suffering upon the Jews, but their situation was more favorable than that of their brethren under the Christian rule of Rome.

The situation in the Byzantine empire was no-wise better than in the western part of the old Roman empire and in the various Germanic states which had formed on its ruins. The greatest sufferings were experienced under the Visigoths in Spain, where church councils decreed the laws which became typical for medieval legislation on the Jews, and it was only the invasion of the Arabs which changed their condition for the better.

The literary activity had from the beginning of the eighth century its seat in the schools of Sura and Pumbeditha. Our rabbinical works, especially the homiletical literature, called the Midrash, date in their present shape from this period, which extends from 750 to 1040, and is called the period of the Geonim, from Gaon, excellency, which was the title of the college-president. At the same time a number of practical guide-books, for civil, liturgical, and dietary laws were written, and the first manual for public worship was compiled by the Gaon Amram (A. C. 850). We also meet at that time the first traces of a theosophical literature (Kabala), of which probably the oldest specimen is a book of creation (Sephar Jezirah.)

The strict adherence to traditional authority which is characteristic of the Babylonian schools of this period aroused a fierce opposition, led by Anan (A. C. 760), who found a great following. The sect, originated by him, called itself Sons of the Bible, Karaites. They rejected all authority outside of the Bible. They still exist in very small numbers, chiefly in southern Russia. Their last literary authority was Abraham Firkowitsch (1786-1874), who has made for himself an unenviable reputation by extensive forgeries of tombstones and manuscripts in the interest of Karaite glory. At the same time when this schism occurred Judaism made an important conquest by the conversion of the Chazars, a Tartaric nation whose Khan Bulan, with his court and a great majority of his people, embraced the Jewish religion.

The controversy with the Karaites stimulated the neglected study of the Bible amongst the rabbinic Jews. The ablest apologete of their views was the Gaon Saadjah (892-942), who wrote the first systematic work on philosophy of religion, called "Science and Religion." From that time on the Babylonian schools declined. In 1040 the last Gaon was put to death and no successor appointed.

Babylonian Jews settled in great numbers in northern Africa. Isaac Alfasi, of Fez (1013-1103), emigrated to Spain and founded a school in Lucena. However, previous to his time there was in Cordova a famous seat of learning.

Hasdai ibn Shaprut, who occupied a high position at the court of Abderrahman III (912-961), was a patron of Jewish literature. Amongst those whom he supported are the first Jewish grammarians, Dunash ben Labrat and Menahem ben Saruk. A position similar to that of Hasdai was occupied by Samuel ibn Nagrela at the court of the Moorish Calif Habus in Granada. Samuel was not only a patron of Jewish literature, but also a scholar of considerable attainments. He supported one of the best of all New-Hebrew poets, Salomo ibn Gebirol, who also is the author of the philosophical work, "Fountain of Life," which exercised a great influence on the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas. As author of a popular work on religious ethics, "The Duties of the Heart," we have to mention Bahja ibn Pakuda.

In France and Germany the Jewish population increased under Charlemagne (768-814) and his successors. The embassy which Charlemagne sent to Harun Al-Rashid numbered a Jew among its members. With the progress of the German arms the Jews moved eastward to Austria, Bohemia, and Poland.

The literary activity of the Jews in Germany and France is limited to liturgical poetry and to talmudical codes and commentaries. In regard to the latter we mention R. Gershom, called "The Light of the Diaspora," who lived in Mayence (A. C. 960-1020) and who is famous for making monogamy, which up to his time was only a practice, a binding law.

The twelfth century shows the highest development of spiritual life in Judaism. In Spain we have the greatest of all medieval Jewish poets, Jehuda Halevi (1080-1141), who is also famous for his Kusari, an apology for Judaism in the form of a dialogue between the Khan of the Chazars and the rabbi who had converted him. Abraham ibn Esra, also a native of Spain (1092-1167), had in the school of the Karaites, acquired a critical spirit, which he used not only in dissecting and very frequently ridiculing rabbinical interpretations of the Bible, but in criticising the Bible itself. The brightest star in the Jewish literature of the age is Moses Maimonides (1135-1204). Of his numerous works we shall quote only two: Mishneh Thorah, a code of the Jewish law, comprising dogma, ritual, civil, criminal and political law, and Morch Nebuchim, The Guide of the Perplexed, a philosophical apology for Judaism based on Aristotle. His arguments were partly made use of by Thomas of Aquino and Albertus Magnus.

From the thirteenth century on we notice a decline in the intellectual life of Judaism. This decline is typified by a fierce opposition to Maimonides' philosophy. The liberals were represented by David Kimchi (1170-1235), the best known exegete and grammarian of the Middle Ages, while the orthodox party was represented by Solomon ibn Adret (1230-1310), rabbi of Barcelona. He, like the German rabbis, stood for the infallibility of the Talmud. Amongst the German rabbis the highest authority was Meir of Rothenburg (1220-1293), who died in prison because on his advice the Germans refused to pay the high ransom for the extortion of which King Rudolph had imprisoned him.

More spiritual freedom existed in Italy, where we find the poet Immanuel of Rome (1270-1340), who wrote a Hebrew sequel to Dante's Divine Commedia. A very great influence was exercised by the Jews as translators from Arabic into Latin. Persecutions on religious grounds, stimulated by Jewish converts to Christianity such as Nicholas Donin (A. C. 1240), Pablo Christiani (1260), Alfonso of Valladolid (1300), Geronimo da Santa Fe, and Paulus of Burgos (1300-1440), aroused Messianic hopes, based on Kabalistic prophecies. Abraham Abulafia (1280) played the rôle of a Messiah in Sicily and Moses ben Nahman (1200-1270) gave a considerable space to Kabala in his commentary on the Pentateuch.

Like all theosophists, Kabalists claimed to have a very ancient literature. Their fundamental work was the Zohar, Kabalistic homilies on the Pentateuch, written by Moses of Leon (1290), and ascribed to Simeon ben Johaj (2d cent.)

(2) From the Middle Ages to the Present Time.

The political condition of the Jews during the latter part of the Middle Ages was very sad, although occasionally some individuals rose to a higher rank as tax-farmers, financiers, physicians, astronomers, astrologists, and authors. The masses were frequently mobbed, not rarely expelled and always outrageously taxed. The German Jews suffered terribly from the crusaders in 1096 and 1147. Many were thrown into burning houses or hacked to pieces, and thousands were killed under the most cruel tortures. A great number were dragged to churches and baptized, but returned to Judaism in spite of the protest of ecclesiastic dignitaries. Most of the latter, especially St. Bernard, although not favorable to the Jews, condemned these persecutions, but their voices did not prevail with the mob. Similar persecutions of a local character we find all through the Middle Ages, but it would be impossible to enumerate them. Sometimes it is the accusation that they murdered a child to use his blood for their Passover cakes; another time that they perforated a consecrated host which subsequently performed some miracles that lent a semblance of justice to these acts of mob violence. Legislation sanctioned these outbreaks by establishing such discriminations against the Jews as incited passion against them. The council of the Lateran (1215), which represents the highwater mark of papal power under Innocent III, decreed the Jew badge and confirmed all laws tending to degrade the Jews. Under such conditions which, as the pope declared, were part of the divine economy to show by the humiliation of the Jews the glory of Christ, it was of no avail, when Innocent IV (1247) in a bull admonished the rulers to protect the life and property of the Jews, and even protested against the accusation that the Jews committed murder for the sake of their religion. It was also of little avail, when some princes, like Frederick II of Austria (1244), promulgated statutes by which the rights of the Jews, who through the exorbitant taxes imposed upon them were a considerable support of the treasury, were established. Other rulers wantonly disregarded these dearly bought privileges, and the mobs excited by a Good-Friday sermon on Jesus' sufferings, never respected them. Of the innumerable persecutions during the twelfth century, I shall only mention the riots at the time of the coronation of King Richard Cœur de Lion (1190) and the martyrdom of the Jews of Blois (1171) and of Bray (1191). Hundreds died at the stake, singing hymns; hundreds killed themselves with their children to escape the tortures of infuriated mobs. The great plague (1348-1350) added a new pretext for the slaughter of helpless people, who were accused of poisoning the wells. All over western Europe they were persecuted. In Strasbourg alone 1,800 Jews were burned on one pyre.

In the fifteenth century the growth of the municipalities had the effect that the Jews, formerly a welcome object for taxation, began to be considered as inconvenient competitors. At the same time the economic crisis, produced by the sudden change of economic conditions due to so many discoveries and inventions, produced the spirit of discontent and restlessness in the masses which always is the prime cause of revolutions and naturally makes the weak suffer first. Legislation and historical conditions having reduced the Jews to the business of money lending, it was only too natural that popular hatred, fomented by religious motives, saw in the Jew the usurer only, and in the usurer the sole cause of the serious economic crisis. They were expelled from almost all the larger cities in Germany, while France, where they had been expelled and called back numerous times before, expelled them peremptorily in 1394, England having done so in 1290. At the same time the increasing perturbation within the church aroused occasional outbreaks against the Jews. In Spain Ferdinand Martinez (1391) had caused a great uprising against the Jews, and a great number, in order to save their lives, professed conversion to Christianity, but secretly practiced Judaism. They formed the large class of the Marannos, whom the church considered as apostates and against whom the inquisition was created which, powerless in its attempt to make the Marannos real Christians, brought about the expulsion of the Jews from Spain (1492) and from Portugal (1495). The council of Basle (1431-43) renewed all the ecclesiastic laws against the Jews. John Capistrano, who failed in his mission to bring the Hussites back into the fold of the Catholic church, triumphed over the Jews. In Breslau he assigned over forty to the stake under the usual allegation of piercing a consecrated host (1454), and from a number of cities they were expelled through his influence. Bernhardin of Feltre, a man of the type which we would call Christian socialists in our days, proved by torture and manipulated testimony that a little boy who was drowned in the Adige had been murdered by the Jews of Trent (1475). A great number were put to death and the rest expelled. As late as 1510 the profaned host caused the death of twenty-nine Jews in Berlin.

The most important event of this epoch was the expulsion of the Jews, about 300,000 in number, from Spain (1492) and Portugal (1496). The refugees settled mostly in Turkey, in northern Africa, in Egypt and in Palestine. The many refugees from Germany turned towards Poland, so that from about 1500 the majority of the Jews lived in eastern countries, debarred from the centers of civilization. The Reformation had only a slight influence on the Jews. Their general condition was not changed. Luther, who, in the beginning of his career, had been favorably inclined to them, spoke in his later days very severely against them, recommending the confiscation of their property and their expulsion. The Renaissance, however, had its influence on the Jews, as it derived some of its impulses from their literature. Johannes Reuchlin (1455-1522), one of the foremost representatives of the Renaissance movement (1510), defended the rabbinical literature against the accusations of John Pfefferkorn, a converted Jew, and his allies, the Dominicans of Cologne, who, by the confiscation of the Talmud, expected to obtain the same power as inquisitors in Germany which their order possessed in Spain. Like many other scholars of that age, Reuchlin had studied Hebrew from Jews. Elijah Levita (1472-1549), a Hebrew teacher of Christians in Italy, came out with the important discovery that the vowel points were a later invention, and that consequently the text of the Hebrew Bible, as we possess it, is of a comparatively late origin. Azariah dei Rossi of Mantua (1511-1578) followed with a series of learned essays in which he proved that the rabbinical writings possessed no authority in scientific matters, a statement which was quite bold in those days and elicited no small amount of opposition. Meantime in Poland and in the Orient, which had become the seats of rabbinical learning, traditionalism became stronger and stronger. Joseph Karo (1488-1577) ibn. Saifed wrote a compendium of Jewish law, Shulhan Arukh, which with the annotations of Moses Isserlis in Cracow (1520-1573), was considered an authoritative guide-book, and thus became instrumental in perpetuating scholasticism and traditionalism. A rather Utopian scheme of the Maranno Salomo Molcho and his friend, David Reubeni, who posed as a prince of the lost tribes, to establish the Messianic kingdom failed ignominiously. Molcho was burned at the stake (1533), and Reubeni died in prison. A more practical scheme of Don Joseph of Naxos, a Maranno, who had obtained a high position at the court of Constantinople, to establish a Jewish state in the island of Cyprus also failed (1571). The first place where Jews enjoyed full religious freedom was Holland, where after the Netherlands had gained their freedom, Spanish Jews began to settle in considerable numbers. Amsterdam became a mother city for other colonies, which in the course of the seventeenth century settled in England, Sweden, Denmark and America, and were swelled by fugitive Marannos who were fortunate enough to escape from the dungeons of the Inquisition and also by German Jews. At the same time the Jews of Poland were terrible sufferers from the revolution of the Cossacks against their Polish masters (1648). Under their captain Chmelnicki the Cossacks attacked the Jewish settlements, because the Jews as tax-farmers had been instrumental in driving the Cossacks to desperation. Hundreds of thousands were killed, and fugitives flocked into all parts of Europe where they could find co-religionists.

The misery which Jews still endured, even in places where their lives and property were not in constant danger, fomented the Messianic hope, and in 1666 Sabbathai Zebi, a native of Smyrna, announced himself as the Messiah, and succeeded in securing followers all over Europe until, when the Sultan interfered and asked him to prove his Messianic mission by a miracle, he was converted to Islam. This ridiculous result of the Messianic movement showed its effect in a growing aversion to Kabala. At the same time we see some descendants of those who suffered the most cruel martyrdom for their faith break away from Judaism and all positive religions. Both Baruch Spinozas (1632-1677) and Uriel Acosta (1594-1640) were members of the Portuguese Congregation of Amsterdam.

The persecutions, although not as fierce as those of the fifteenth century, continued. In 1670 the Emperor, Leopold I, expelled the Jews from Vienna for no other reason than because his wife, a Spanish princess, desired it for the glory of God. The Marannos in Spain and Portugal were still the victims of the Inquisition. In 1680 Charles II, in order to duly celebrate his nuptials with a French princess, ordered a great auto da fé to be held, at which eighteen Jews were burned to death, while a great many others were sentenced to imprisonment and to disgracing acts of penitence.

In consequence of the Messianic movement under Sabbathai Zebi a mystic sect arose which had its followers in the East, who called themselves Hassidim. The Maranno Michael Cardoso (1622-1706); the Italian Mose Hajim Luzzatto (1707-1747), one of the best poets of the New-Hebrew literature, and finally Israel Besht (1696-1760), an ignorant Polish coachman, developed this doctrine. While they never severed their connection with the whole body of Judaism, their doctrinal recognition of theosophy and their belief in miracle workers formed a decided difference between them and the orthodox followers of rabbinical Judaism. The crisis was reached when, in a bitter and protracted controversy between the Rabbi of Altona, Jonathan Eibeschtz (1690-1764) and the celebrated author, Jacob Emden (1696-1776), all belief in Kabala was branded as crypto-Sabbathism. During this controversy Emden had the boldness to declare the Zohar, the canonical book of the Kabbalists, a partial forgery.

This critical view had further consequences. It produced a spiritual independence, which found its most successful exponent in Moses Menaelssohn (1729-1786), who, a consistent deist himself, advocated an amalgamation of the Jews with their surroundings by a general education, but he carefully refrained from advocating any innovations in the religious life. He translated parts of the Bible into pure German (1783), edited the first Hebrew magazine (1784) and was instrumental in the foundation of a Jewish free school. He also advocated the full right of citizenship for the Jews. This became an accomplished fact during the French revolution (1791), and was imitated by other states which, during the revolutionary period, were under French influence, but after the Vienna Congress (1815) a general reaction set in.

Meantime the Jews began to consider the necessity for changing their ritual and revising their dogma. In regard to the latter, the most important move was the declaration against the belief in a personal Messiah. In their ritual the substitution of the vernacular for the Hebrew in some parts of their Prayer Book was the decisive step taken. These reforms were first introduced in the "Tempel" of Hamburg (1817). At the same time rabbinical literature became the object of scientific treatment, and the exclusive dominion of scholasticism was broken. In this respect the merit of the initiation belongs to Leopold Zunz (1794-1886). With him we shall mention: S. L. Rappoport (1791-1867), S. D. Luzzatto (1800-1865), Zacharias Frankel (1801-1875), the representatives of modern conservatism, while Abraham Geiger (1810-1874) represents the liberal theology, within which Samuel Holdheim (1806-1860) and David Einhorn (1809-1879) represent the radical wing. The strictest orthodoxy is represented by Samson R. Hirsch (1808-1888). Of other leading scholars we mention Hirsch Graetz (1817-1891), Leopold Loew (1811-1875) and M. Steinschneider (born 1816).

The present religious condition of the Jews may be described thus: In Asia, northern Africa and Turkey we find strict medievalism, servile practice of ritual laws, superstitious fears of the rabbis, and uncritical acceptance of everything ever taught by anybody in the name of the Jewish religion. In Russia, Roumania and Galicia, strict talmudical orthodoxy is steadily losing ground, to make room for those religious views which are the rule amongst the Jews of western Europe, viz., a liberal attitude to the teachings and the practice of religion very much like that prevailing among the body of German Protestants of the type represented by Harnack and other leading theologians. Their allegiance to Judaism, however, is strengthened by consciousness of the fact that they will remain Jews no matter what their religious position and practice may become.

The revolution of 1848 brought political equality to the Jews all over western Europe, although it was not until 1858 that the first Jew, Lionel de Rothschild, was allowed to take his seat in the English Parliament. The medieval system, which leaves the Jew to the mercy of the mob in occasional outbreaks of violence, reigns still in Morocco and Persia. In Russia and Roumania the Jews are subjected to oppressive laws, such as existed in western Europe up to the eighteenth century. A similar state of affairs exists in Portugal, while in Spain the law granting them liberty of worship has never been carried into effect. In Germany, Austria, and France the anti-Semitic movement for the last twenty years is trying to obtain a repeal of the laws granting the Jews political equality. This renewed hostility, together with the unbearable conditions of Russia, has of late produced the Zionist movement, which aims to establish a Jewish state in Palestine as an asylum for the persecuted Jews all over the world.

Another notable feature of Jewish history in the nineteenth century is the participation of the Jews in all branches of art, science, literature and public life. France and Italy have had Jewish ministers, Cremieux, Fould, Raynal and Luzzati. All other civilized countries have had influential Jewish politicians. In music we may mention Meyerbeer, Halevy and Goldmark; in literature, Heine, Boerne, Auerbach, Grace Aguilar, Goldsmid (Denmark), Millaud (France), etc. Of great scientists the number is too great for this article to do justice to them.

These facts certainly prove that the admission of the Jews to participation in public life has proven a benefit not only to them, but in no small degree a benefit to the highest interests of humanity. G. D.

JEW'S LANGUAGE. This phrase is literally "Jewishly," for the Hebrew must be read as an adverb (2 Kings xviii:28; 2 Chron. xxxii:18; Is. xxxvi:11, 13; Neh. xiii:24).

JEZANIAH (jěz'a-ni'ah), (Heb. יְזַנְיָהוּ, yez-an-yaw'ho), whom Jehovah hears.

A Maachathite, who co-operated with Johanan in the pursuit of Ishmael (Jer. xl:8). They consulted with Jeremiah as to what the people should do in the disturbed times after the departure of the Babylonians (2 Kings xxv:23; Jer. xl:8; xlii:1), and probably advocated immigration into Egypt (Jer. xliii:4, 5). He is doubtless the same as Azariah (Jer. xliii:2). In 2 Kings xxv:23, the name is written Jaazaniah (B. C. 580).

JEZEBEL (jěz'e-bél), (Heb. יְזֵבֵל, ee-zeh'bel, chaste), daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, and consort of Ahab, king of Israel (B. C. 918).

(1) Induces Idolatry. This unsuitable alliance proved disastrous to the kingdom of Israel; for Jezebel induced her weak husband not only to connive at her introducing the worship of her native idols, but eventually to become himself a worshiper, and to use all the means in his power to establish them in the room of the God of Israel. This was a great enormity. The worship of the golden calves which previously existed was, however mistakenly, intended in honor of Jehovah; but this was an open alienation from him, and a turning aside to foreign and strange gods, which, indeed, were no gods. Most of the particulars of this bad but apparently highly-gifted woman's conduct have been related in the notices of AHAH and ELIJAH. From the course of her proceedings it would appear that she grew to hate the Jewish system of law and religion, on account of what must have seemed to her its intolerance and its anti-social tendencies. She hence sought to put it down by all the means she could command; and the imbecility of her husband seems to have made all the powers of the state subservient to her designs.

(2) Success of Her Policy. She had the reward of her unscrupulous decisiveness of character in the triumph of her policy in Israel, where, at last, there were but 7,000 people who had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor kissed their hand to his image. Nor was her success confined to Israel, for through Athaliah—a daughter after her own heart—who was married to the son and successor of Jehoshaphat, the same policy prevailed for a time in Judah, after Jezebel herself had perished and the house of Ahab had met its doom. It seems that after the death of her husband, Jezebel maintained considerable ascendancy over her son Joram; and her measures and misconduct formed the principal charge which Jehu cast in the teeth of that unhappy monarch before he sent forth the arrow which slew him.

(3) Death. The last effort of Jezebel was to intimidate Jehu as he passed the palace, by warning him of the eventual rewards of even successful treason. It is eminently characteristic of the woman that, even in this terrible moment, when she knew that her son was slain, and must have felt that her power had departed, she displayed herself not with rent veil and dishevelled hair, 'but tired her head and painted her eyes' before she looked out at the window, and called to Jehu as he approached: "Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" Jehu looked up at the window and said: "Who is on my side? who?" Two or three eunuchs looked out. "Throw her down," he cried, and they unhesitatingly obeyed. She fell in front of his chariot, which he intentionally drove over her, and her blood bespattered the horses and the wall. (See JEHU.) Afterward, when the new monarch bethought him that, as 'a king's daughter,' her corpse should not be treated with disrespect, nothing was found of her but the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet. The dogs had eaten all the rest (1 Kings xvi:31; xviii:4, 13, 19; xxi:5-25; 2 Kings ix:7, 22, 30-37), B. C. 884.

(4) Character. "Jezebel was a woman in whom, with the reckless and licentious habits of an oriental queen, were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phœnician people. The wild license of her life, the magical fascination of her arts or of her character, became a proverb in the nation (2 Kings ix:22). Long afterward her name lived as the byword for all that was execrable, and in the Apocalypse it is given to a church or an individual in Asia Minor, combining in like manner fanaticism and profligacy (Rev. ii:20)." (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

JEZELUS (je-zē'lus), (Gr. Ἰεζήλος, ee-ze-zay'los).

1. The same as Jahaziel (1 Esdr. viii:32).
2. Jehiel, the father of Obadiah (1 Esdr. viii:35).

JEZER (jē'zer), (Heb. יֶזֶר, yay'tser, formation), third named of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xlv:24; Num. xxvi:49; 1 Chron. vii:13), B. C. about 1656.

JEZERITES, THE (jē'zer-ites).

A family of the tribe of Naphtali descendants of JEZER (Num. xxvi:49).

JEZIAH (je-zī'ah), (Heb. יֶזְיָהוּ, yiz-zee-yaw', whom Jehovah sprinkles).

One of the "sons" of Parosh, a layman, of the Israelites who put away his foreign wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x:25), B. C. 458.

JEZIEL (jē'zi-el), (Heb. יֶזְעַל, yeh-zee-ale', assembly of God) a "son" of Azmaveth, and one of the skilled Benjamite archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:3), B. C. before 1000.

JEZLIAH (jēz-lī'ah), (Heb. יֶזְלִיָּהוּ, yiz-lee-aw', drawn out, preserved), one of the "sons" (or descendants) of Elpaal, and apparently a chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:18) B. C. probably about 590.

JEZOAR (jē-zō'ar), (Heb. יֶזְעָר, yits-khar', he will shine), the son of Helah, a wife of Ashur, the father (founder) of Tekoa (1 Chron. iv:7). See ZOAR.

JEZRAHIAH (jēz-ra-hī'ah), (Heb. יֶזְרָחִיָּהוּ, yiz-rakh-yaw', Jah will shine).

A Levite, superintendent of the choristers at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem during Nehemiah's time; properly IZRAHIAH (Neh. xii:42), B. C. about 1014.

JEZREEL (jēz're-el), (Heb. יֶזְרְעֵאל, yiz-reh-ale', sown by God).

1. A descendant of Judah, one of the family of the father, or founder, of Etam (1 Chron. iv:3). It is probable, from the association of names in this passage that he was the founder of the town in Judah by his name (Josh. xv:56), B. C. about 1612.

2. The eldest son of the prophet Hosca (Hos. i:4), so named in token of the great slaughter predicted by the prophet. He is also, with his brother Lo-ammi, and sister Lo-rubama, the symbol of the Israelites, restored after their approaching exile (Hos. i:6, 9; ii:22, 23), B. C. about 782.

3. A town in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix:18), where the kings of Israel had a palace, and where the court often resided, although Samaria was the metropolis of the kingdom. It is most frequently mentioned in the history of the house of Ahab. Here was the vineyard of Naboth, which Ahab coveted to enlarge the palace-grounds (1 Kings xviii:45, 46; xxi), and here Jehu executed his dreadful commission against the house of Ahab, when Jezebel, Joram, and all who were connected with that wretched dynasty perished (2 Kings ix:14-37; x:1-11).

These horrible scenes appear to have given the kings of Israel a distaste to this residence, as it is not again mentioned in their history. It is, however, named by Hosea (i:4, comp. i:11; ii:22); and in Judith (i:8; iv:3; vii:3) it occurs under the name of Esdraelon.

In the days of Eusebius and Jerome it was still a large village, called Esdraela, and in the same age it again occurs as Stradela (Itin. Hieros. p. 586). Nothing more is heard of it till the time of the Crusades, when it was called by the Franks Parvum Gerinum, and by the Arabs Zerim. It ceased to be mentioned by travelers till Turner, Buckingham, and others after them again brought it into notice; and it is still more lately that the identification of Zerim and Jezreel has been restored (Raumer, Paläst. p. 155; Schubert, iii:164; Elliot, ii:379; Robinson, iii:164).

Zerim is seated on the brow of a rocky and very steep descent into the great and fertile valley of Jezreel, which runs down between the mountains of Gilboa and Hermon. Lying comparatively high it commands a wide and noble view, extending down the broad valley on the east to Beisan (Bethshean), and on the west quite across the great plain to the mountains of Carmel. It is described by Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii:163) as a most magnificent site for a city, which, being itself a conspicuous object in every part, would naturally give its name to the whole region.

Zerin has at present a small number of humble dwellings, mostly in ruins, and with few inhabitants.

(1) Jezreel, Blood of ("I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu," Hos. i:4). This probably refers to the murders and outrages committed by Ahab and Jehu at this place. In 2 Kings x:30 God approved of the acts of Jehu in his extermination of the house of Ahab. But very clearly, according to 2 Kings x:29, 31, Jehu did it not for the glory of God, but for his own advancement and interests. He was, therefore, a cruel, relentless murderer, although an instrument of the Divine vengeance.

(2) Jezreel, Ditch of. An entrenchment for the protection of the city, outside of which Naboth was put to death (1 Kings xxi:23).

(3) Jezreel, Fountain of. The waters by which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxix:1). There is still a fine spring of water a little east of Zerin (Robinson, iii:168), which is probably the one mentioned in the above passage.

(4) Jezreel, Portion of. The field or country adjoining the city, where the crime of Ahab had been committed, and its retribution was to be exacted (2 Kings ix:10, 21, 36, etc.).

(5) Jezreel, Tower of. One of the fortifications of the city (2 Kings ix:17).

(6) Jezreel, Valley of (Josh. xvii:16; Judg. vi:33; Hos. i:5), situated between the ridges of Gilboa and Moreh, now called Jebel ed-Duh. It was the scene of one of the most glorious victories as well as one of the most bitter defeats by the Israelites. In the time of the Judges it was occupied by the Amalekites and Midianites (Judg. vi:33 sq.), who were driven out by Gideon (Judg. vii:1). Two hundred years later Saul was here defeated by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxix:1-11; xxxi:1-6).

4. A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:56). It was probably from this place that David took his first wife, Ahinoam (1 Sam. xxvii:3; xxx:5). Perhaps identical with the modern Zurtut (Robinson, Researches, ii:201).

JEZREELITES (jēz're-el-ites), inhabitants of JEZREEL, of Issachar, (1 Kings xxi:1, 4, 6, 7, 15, 16; 2 Kings ix:21, 25).

JEZREELITESS (jēz-re-el-'i' tess), (Heb. יֵזְרְעֵלִיָּהּ, yiz-reh-ay-leeth'), a woman of JEZREEL in Judah, one of David's wives (1 Sam. xxvii:3, xxx:5; 2 Sam. ii:2, iii:2; 1 Chron. iii:1).

JIBSAM (jīb'sam), (Heb. יִבְסָם, yib-sawm', fragrant, pleasant), one of the "sons" (posterity) of Tola, the son of Issachar, in David's army (1 Chron. vii:2), B. C. about 1000. He may possibly have been a son of Tola, with descendants in the army of David.

JIDLAPH (jīd'laph), (Heb. יִדְלָפִי, yid-lawf', tearful, weeping), the seventh named of the eight sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by Milcah (Gen. xxii:22), B. C. perhaps about 2300.

JIMNA (jīm'nà), (Heb. יִמְנָא, yim-naw', good fortune, luck), firstborn of Asher, and founder of a family by his name (Num. xxvi:44). B. C. 1874. In Gen. xlvii:17 his name is Jimnah.

JIMNAH (jīm'nah), (Heb. יִמְנָה, yim-naw', prosperity). See JIMNA.

JIMNITES, THE (jīm'nites), (Num. xxvi:44), descendants of JIMNA (which see).

JIPHTAH (jīph'tah), (Heb. יִפְתָּח, yif-takh', he will open), a city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv:43). Robinson identifies it with Jimrin (Researches, ii:342, note).

JIPHTHAH-EL (jīph'tah-ēl), (Heb. יִפְתָּח־אֵל, yif-takh-ale', opening of God).

A valley mentioned as one of the boundaries of Zebulun (Josh. xix:14, 27), separating it from Asher and Naphtali. It was probably identical with Jotapata, the city that resisted Vespasian so successfully, and the modern Jefat, in the hills of Galilee (Robinson, iii:107).

JOAB (jō'ab), (Heb. יוֹאָב, yo-awb', Jehovah his father).

1. One of the three sons of Zeruiah, the sister of David, and 'captain of the host'; generalissimo of the army during nearly the whole of David's reign.

(1) First Appearance. He first appears associated with his two brothers, Abishai and Asahel, in the command of David's troops against Abner, who had set up the claims of a son of Saul in opposition to those of David, who then reigned in Hebron. The armies having met at the pool of Gibeon, a general action was brought on, in which Abner was worsted. In his flight he had the misfortune to kill Joab's brother, the swift-footed Asahel, by whom he was pursued (2 Sam. ii:13-32). The consequences of this deed have been explained elsewhere. (See ABNER; ASAHEL.)

(2) Avenges Asahel. Joab smothered for a time his resentment against the shedder of his brother's blood; but it being whetted by the natural rivalry of position between him and Abner, he afterwards made it the instrument of his policy by treacherously, in the act of friendly communication, slaying Abner at the very time when the services of the latter to David, to whom he had then turned, had rendered him a most dangerous rival to Joab in power and influence (2 Sam. iii:22-27). That Abner had at first suspected that Joab would take the position of blood-avenger (see BLOOD-REVENGE) is clear, from the apprehension which he expressed (2 Sam. ii:22); but that he thought that Joab had, under all the circumstances, abandoned this position, is shown by the unsuspecting readiness with which he went aside with him (2 Sam. iii:26, 27); and that Joab placed his murderous act on the footing of vengeance for his brother's blood, is plainly stated in 2 Sam. iii:30; by which it also appears that the other brother, Abishai, shared in some way in the deed and its responsibilities. At the same time, as Abner was perfectly justified in slaying Asahel to save his own life, it is very doubtful if Joab would ever have asserted his right of blood-revenge, if Abner had not appeared likely to endanger his influence with David. The king, much as he reprobated the act, knew that it had a sort of excuse in the old customs of blood-revenge, and he stood habitually too much in awe of his impetuous and able nephew to bring him to punishment, or even to displace him from his command. 'I am this day weak,' he said, 'though anointed king, and these men, the sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me' (2 Sam. iii:39).

(3) Appointed to Chief Command. Desirous probably of making some atonement before David and the public for this atrocity, in a way which at the same time was most likely to prove effectual—namely, by some daring exploit, he was the first to mount to the assault at the storming of the fortress on Mount Zion, which had remained so long in the hands of the Jebusites. By this service he acquired the chief command of the army of all Israel, of which David was by this time king (2 Sam. v:6-10).

(4) Serves David Faithfully. It is not necessary to trace the subsequent acts of Joab, seeing that they are in fact the public acts of the king he served. And he served him faithfully.

Although he knew his power over David, and often treated him with little ceremony, there can be no doubt that he was most truly devoted to his interests, and sometimes rendered him good service even against his own will, as in the affair at Mahanaim (2 Sam. xix:5-8).

As Joab was on good terms with Absalom, and had taken pains to bring about a reconciliation between him and his father, we may set the higher value upon his firm adhesion to David when Absalom revolted, and upon his stern sense of duty to the king—from whom he expected no thanks—displayed in putting an end to the war by the slaughter of this favorite son, when all others shrank from the responsibility of doing the king a service against his own will (2 Sam. xviii:1-14). In like manner, when David unhappily resolved to number the people, Joab discerned the evil and remonstrated against it, and although he did not venture to disobey, he performed the duty tardily and reluctantly, to afford the king an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and took no pains to conceal how odious the measure was to him (2 Sam. xxiv:1-4).

(5) Military Exploits. His great war was that against Ammon, which he conducted in person. It was divided into three campaigns: (a) The first was against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon. He attacked and defeated the Syrians, whilst his brother Abishai did the same for the Ammonites. The Syrians rallied with their kindred tribes from beyond the Euphrates, and were finally routed by David himself. (See HADAREZER.) (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt," and celebrated by a triumphal monument (2 Sam. viii:13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory, and remained for six months, extirpating the male population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 Kings xi:15, 16). So long was the terror of his name preserved that only when the fugitive prince of Edom, in the Egyptian court, heard that "David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the host was dead," did he venture to return to his own country (ch. xi:21, 22). (c) The third was against the Ammonites. They were again left to Joab (2 Sam. x:7-19). He went against them at the beginning of the next year "at the time when kings go out to battle"—to the siege of Rabbah. The ark was sent with him, and the whole army was encamped in booths or huts round the beleaguered city (2 Sam. xi:1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Joab took the lower city on the river, and then with true loyalty sent to urge David to come and take the citadel, Rabbah, lest the glory of the capture should pass from the king to his general (2 Sam. xii:26-28). (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

(6) Ingratitude of David. David was certainly ungrateful for the service of Joab, when, in order to conciliate the powerful party which had supported Absalom, he offered the command of the host to Amasa, who had commanded the army of Absalom (2 Sam. xix:13).

(7) Murder of Amasa. But the inefficiency of the new commander, in the emergency which the revolt of Bichri's son produced, arising perhaps from the reluctance of the troops to follow their new leader, gave Joab an opportunity of displaying his superior resources, and also of removing his rival by a murder very similar to, and in some respects less excusable and more foul than, that of Abner (see AMASA). Besides Amasa was his own cousin, being the son of his mother's sister (2 Sam. xx:1-13).

(8) Joins Adonijah. When David lay on his deathbed, and a demonstration was made in favor of the succession of the eldest surviving son, Adonijah, whose interests had been compromised by the preferment of the young Solomon, Joab joined the party of the natural heir. When the prompt measures taken under the direction of the king rendered this demonstration abortive (1 Kings i:7), Joab withdrew into private life till some time after the death of David, when the fate of Adonijah, and of Abiathar—whose life was only spared in consequence of his sacerdotal character—warned Joab that he had little mercy to expect from the new king.

(9) Death. He fled for refuge to the altar; but when Solomon heard this, he sent Benaiah to put him to death; and, as he refused to come forth, gave orders that he should be slain even at the altar. His corpse was removed to his domain in the wilderness of Judah, and buried there (1 Kings ii:5, 28-34), B. C. about 960.

(10) Character. Joab was one of the most accomplished warriors and unscrupulous men that Israel ever produced. But he had no principles apart from what he deemed his duty to the king and the people, and was quite as ready to serve his master's vices as his virtues, so long as they did not interfere with his own interests, or tended to promote them by enabling him to make himself useful to the king. His ready apprehension of the king's meaning in the matter of Uriah, and the facility with which he made himself the instrument of the murder, and of the hypocrisy by which it was covered, are proofs of this, and form as deep a stain upon his character as his own murders (2 Sam. xi:14-25).

2. Son of Seraiah, and a descendant of Kenaz (1 Chron. iv:14). Jerome says that the architects of the temple were selected from among his sons, and for this reason he was called father, or prince, of the valley of Charashim, or smiths.

3. The head of one of the most numerous families which returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (Ezra ii:6; viii:9; Neh. vii:11), B. C. 445.

JOAH (jō'ah), (Heb. יוֹאָה, yo-awkh', Jehovah's brother, friend).

1. Son of Asaph and keeper of the records under Hezekiah. He was one of the embassy sent to the Assyrian general at the conduit of the upper pool (2 Kings xviii:18, 26; Is. xxxvi:3, 11, 22), B. C. 719.

2. Son or descendant of Zimmah (1 Chron. vi:21). The same as Ethan (ver. 42), unless some of the names of one list are omitted in the other (B. C. 719).

3. Son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi:4). He was a Korhite and one of those appointed by David to keep the southern gate of the Temple, and the house of Asuppim, a storehouse, or courthouse in the outer court (ver. 15), B. C. 1014.

4. A Gershonite, son of Zimmah (2 Chron. xxix:12). As a Levite he took a leading part in the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (B. C. 726).

5. Son of Joahaz and keeper of the records under Josiah. He, with Shaphan and Maaseiah, superintended the repair of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv:8), B. C. 623.

JOAHAZ (jō'a-hāz), (Heb. יוֹאָחָז, yo-aw-khawz', Jehovah holds), the father of Joah, who kept the records under Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv:8), B. C. before 623.

JOANNA (jō-ān'nā).

1. (Gr. Ἰωάννης, ee-o-an-nas', Joannas), the son of Rhesa and grandson of Zorobabel, in the lineage of Christ (Luke iii:27).

2. (Gr. Ἰωάννη, ee-o-an'nah, probably feminine of Ἰωάννης, John), wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee. She was one of those women who followed Christ and ministered to his wants and those of his disciples out of their abundance. They had all been cured of grievous diseases by the Savior, or had received material benefits from him; and the customs of the country allowed them to testify in this way their gratitude and devotedness without reproach. It is usually supposed that Joanna was at this time a widow (Luke viii:3; xxiv:10).

JOASH (jō'āsh), (Heb. יוֹאָשׁ, yo-awsh', given by Jehovah), a contraction of JEHOASH.

1. Son of Ahaziah and eighth king of Judah, who began to reign in B. C. 878, at the age of seven, and reigned forty-one years.

(1) Saved as an Infant. Joash, when an infant, was secretly saved by his aunt Jehosheba, who was married to the high-priest Jehoiada, from the general massacre of the family by Athaliah, who had usurped the throne (see ATHALIAH; JEHOIADA). By the high-priest and his wife the child was privily brought up in the chambers connected with the temple till he had attained his eighth year, when Jehoiada deemed that the state of affairs required him to produce the youthful heir of the throne to the people, and claim for him the crown which his grandmother had so unrighteously usurped.

(2) Proclaimed King. Finding the influential persons whom he consulted favorable to the design, everything was secretly, but admirably, arranged for producing Joash, and investing him with the regalia, in such a manner that Athaliah could have no suspicion of the event till it actually occurred. On the day appointed, the sole surviving scion of David's illustrious house appeared in the place of the kings, by a particular pillar in the temple-court, and was crowned and anointed with the usual ceremonies. The high-wrought enthusiasm of the spectators then found vent in clapping of hands and exulting shouts of 'Long live the king!' The joyful uproar was heard even in the palace, and brought Athaliah to the temple, from which, at a word from Jehoiada, she was led to her death.

(3) Behavior. Joash behaved well during his youth, and so long after as he remained under the influence of the high-priest. But when he died the king seems to have felt himself relieved from a yoke; and to manifest his freedom, began to take the contrary course to that which he had followed while under pupilage. Gradually the persons who had possessed influence formerly, when the house of David was contaminated by its alliance with the house of Ahab, insinuated themselves into his councils, and ere long the worship of Jehovah and the observances of the law were neglected, and the land was defiled with idolatries and idolatrous usages.

(4) Slays Zechariah. The prophets then uttered their warnings, but were not heard; and the infatuated king had the atrocious ingratitude to put to death Zechariah, the son and successor of his benefactor Jehoiada.

(5) Divine Judgments and Death. For these deeds Joash was made an example of the Divine judgments. He saw his realm devastated by the Syrians under Hazael; his armies were cut in pieces by an enemy of inferior numbers; and he was even besieged in Jerusalem, and only preserved his capital and his crown by giving up the treasures of the temple. Joash was buried in the city of David; but a place in the sepulcher of the kings was denied to his remains (2 Kings xi; xii; 2 Chron. xxiv.)

2. Son and successor of Jehoahaz on the throne of Israel, of which he was the twelfth king.

(1) Reign. He began to reign (B. C. 799), and reigned sixteen incomplete years. He followed the example of his predecessors in the policy of keeping up the worship of the golden calves; but, apart from this, he bears a fair character, and had intervals, at least, of sincere piety and true devotion to the God of his fathers. Indeed, custom and long habit had so established the views of political expediency on which the schismatical establishments at Dan and Bethel were founded, that at length the reprehension which regularly recurs in the record of each king's reign, seems rather to apply to it as a mark of the continuance of a public crime, than as indicative of the character or disposition of the reigning prince, which is to be sought in the more detailed accounts of his own conduct. These accounts are favorable to Joash.

(2) Relations to Elisha. He held the prophet Elisha in high honor, looking up to him as a father. When he heard of his last illness he repaired to the bedside of the dying prophet, and was favored with promises of victories over the Syrians, by whom his dominions were then harassed. These promises were accomplished after the prophet's death. In three signal and successive victories Joash overcame the Syrians, and retook from them the towns which Hazael had reft from Israel.

(3) War and Death. These advantages rendered the kingdom of Israel more potent than that of Judah. He, however, sought no quarrel with that kingdom; but when he received a defiance from Amaziah, king of Judah, he answered with becoming spirit in a parable, which by its images calls to mind that of Jotham (see PARABLE); the cool disdain of the answer must have been, and in fact was, exceedingly galling to Amaziah. In the war, or rather action, which followed, Joash was victorious. Having defeated Amaziah at Beth-shemesh, in Judah, he advanced to Jerusalem, broke down the wall to the extent of 400 cubits, and carried away the treasures both of the temple and the palace, together with hostages for the future good behavior of the crestfallen Amaziah. Joash himself did not long survive this victory; he died in peace, and was buried in Samaria (2 Kings xiii:9-25; xiv:1-17).

3. Father of Gideon, and a man of influence among the Abi-ezrites. During the Midianitish occupation he seems to have yielded to popular opinion, and the exigencies of the time, so far as to have an altar dedicated to Baal (Judg. vi:11, 29, 30, 31; vii:14; viii:13, 29, 32).

4. A younger son of Ahab, who either held a subordinate jurisdiction or was appointed governor while his father was making an attack on Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings xxii:26; 2 Chron. xviii:25).

5. A descendant of Shelah, son of Judah (1 Chron. iv:22).

6. Son of Shemaah of Gibeah. He was a Benjamite and one of the "helpers" who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:3), and with him probably pursued the Amalekites.

7. An officer of David, who had charge of the storehouses of oil and the products of David's possessions in the lowlands (1 Chron. xxvii:28).

8. One of the sons of Becher, and head of a Benjaminite house in the time of David (1 Chron. vii:8).

JOATHAM (jō'a-thām), (Gr. Ἰωθάμ, ee-o-ah'-tham). JOTHAM, son of Uzziah (Matt. i:9).

JOB (jōb).

I. (Heb. יֹבֵ, yobe, returning), the third named of the sons of Issachar (Gen. xlii:13), called Jashub (Num. xxvi:24; 1 Chron. vii:1).

II. (Heb. יֹבֵ, ee-yobe', persecuted), an Arabian patriarch and the hero of the book which bears his name, mentioned elsewhere only in Ezek. xiv:14, 20; Jas. v:11. The various questions relating to his history are met in the consideration of the poem itself.

1. Contents of the Book. In the land of Uz, belonging to the northern part of Arabia Deserta lived an honest, pious man, called Job.

(1) Job's Affliction. For his sincere and perfect devotedness, God had amply blessed him with worldly property and children; but on Satan obtaining leave to tempt him, he suddenly lost the good fortune of his life. Ultimately he is smitten with a severe and painful disease; but though his wife moves him to forsake God, he still continues true and stanch to the Lord. Three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar, hear of his calamities, and come to console him. His distressed state excites their heartfelt compassion; but the view which they take of its origin prevents them from at once assisting him, and they remain silent, though they are sensible that by so doing they further wound his feelings. Seven days thus pass, until Job, suspecting the cause of their conduct, becomes discomposed and breaks silence. His first observations are based on the assertion—not, indeed, broadly expressed—that God acts harshly and arbitrarily in inflicting calamity on men.

(2) Discussion. This causes a discussion between him and his friends, which is divided into three main parts, each with subdivisions, and embraces the speeches of the three friends of Job, and his answers; the last part, however, consists of only two subdivisions, the third friend, Zophar, having nothing to rejoin. By this silence the author of the book generally designates the defeat of Job's friends, who are defending a common cause. Taking a general view of the argument which they urge against him, they may be considered as asserting the following positions:

(a) No man being free from sin, we need not wonder that we are liable to calamities, for which we must account by a reference, not to God, but to ourselves. From the misery of the distressed, others are enabled to infer their guilt; and they must take this view in order to vindicate Divine justice.

(b) The distress of a man proves not only that he has sinned, but shows also the degree and measure of his sin; and thus, from the extent of calamity sustained, may be inferred the extent of sins committed; and from this the measure of impending misfortune.

(c) A distressed man may recover his former happiness, and even attain to greater fortune than he ever enjoyed before, if he takes a warning from his afflictions, repents of his sins, reforms his life, and raises himself to a higher degree of moral rectitude. Impatience and irrelevant expostulation with God serve but to prolong and increase punishment, for, by accusing God of injustice, a fresh sin is added to former transgressions.

(d) Though the wicked man is capable of prosperity, still it is never lasting. The most awful retribution soon overtakes him; and his transient felicity must itself be considered as punishment, since it renders him heedless, and makes him feel misfortune more keenly.

(3) Job's Answer. In opposition to them, Job maintains:

(a) The most upright man may be highly unfortunate—more so than the inevitable faults and shortcomings of human nature would seem to imply. There is a savage cruelty, deserving the severities of the Divine resentment, in inferring the guilt of a man from his distresses. In distributing good and evil, God regards neither merit nor guilt, but acts according to his sovereign pleasure. His omnipotence is apparent in every part of the creation; but his justice cannot be seen in the government of the world; the afflictions of the righteous, as well as the prosperity of the wicked, are evidence against it. There are innumerable cases, and Job considers his own to be one of them, in which a sufferer has a right to justify himself before God, and to repine at his decrees. Of this supposed right Job freely avails himself, and maintains it against his friends.

(b) In a state of composure and calmer reflection, Job retracts, chiefly in his concluding speech, all his former rather extravagant assertions, and says that, although God generally afflicts the wicked and blesses the righteous, still there are exceptions to this rule, single cases in which the pious undergo severe trials; the inference, therefore, of a man's guilt from his misfortunes is by no means warranted. For the exceptions established by experience prove that God does not always distribute prosperity and adversity after this rule; but that he sometimes acts on a different principle, or as an absolute lord, according to his mere will and pleasure.

(c) Humbly to adore God is our duty, even when we are subject to calamities not at all deserved; but we should abstain from harshly judging of those who, when distressed, send forth complaints against God.

(4) Elihu Appears. The interest of the narrative is kept up with considerable skill, by progressively rising and highly passionate language. At first, Job's friends charge him, and he defends himself, in mild terms, but gradually they are all betrayed into warmth of temper, which goes on increasing until the friends have nothing more to object, and Job remains in possession of the field. The discussion then seems to be at an end, when a fresh disputant, Elihu, appears. Trusting in his just cause, Job had proudly opposed God, with whom he expostulated, and whom he charged with injustice, when the sense of his calamities should have led him to acknowledge the sinfulness of human nature, and humbly to submit to the Divine dispensations. Making every allowance for his painful situation, and putting the mildest construction on his expressions, he is still substantially wrong, and could not therefore be suffered to remain the vanquisher in this high argument. He had silenced his friends, but the general issue remained to be settled. Elihu had waited till Job and his friends had spoken, because they were older than he; but when he saw that the three visitors ceased to answer, he offers himself to reason with Job, and shows that God is just in his ways.

He makes this plain. (a) From the nature of afflictions. He begins by urging that Job was very wrong in boasting of his integrity, and making it appear that rewards were due to him from God. However righteous he was, he still had no claim to reward; on the contrary, all men are sinners in God's eyes; and nobody can complain that he suffers unjustly, for the very greatest sufferings equal not his immense guilt. Then Elihu explains a leading point on which he differs from the friends of Job: he asserts that from greater sufferings inflicted on a person it was not to be inferred that he had sinned more than others afflicted with a less amount of calamity. Calamities were, indeed, under all circumstances, punishments for sins committed, but at the same time they were correctives also; and therefore they might be inflicted on the comparatively most righteous in preference to others. For he who was most loved by God, was also most in danger of forgetting the sinfulness inherent in all men, and, consequently, also in himself; the rather because sin would in him less strongly manifest itself. If the object of afflictions was attained, and the distressed acknowledged his sinfulness, he would humble himself before God, who would bless him with greater happiness than he ever before enjoyed. But he who took not this view, and did not amend his ways, would be ruined, and the blame would rest wholly with himself. Consequently, if Job made the best of his misfortune, God would render him most happy; but if he continued refractory, punishment would follow his offenses.

(b) From a clear conception of the nature of God. 'How darest thou,' says Elihu, 'instead of humbling thyself before God, defy him, and offer to reason with him? The whole creation shows forth his majesty, and evinces his justice. For a man to stand up against him, and to assert that he suffers innocently, is the greatest anthropomorphism, because it goes to deny the Divine majesty, evident in all the facts of the created world, and including God's justice. His nature being one and indivisible, it cannot on one side exhibit infinite perfection, and on the other imperfection; each example, then, of God's grandeur in the creation of the world is evidence against the rash accusers of God's justice. Thus it appears that, from the outset, there must have been a mistake in thy calculation, and thou must the rather acknowledge the correctness of my solution of the question.'

(5) God Decides. Job had, in a stirring manner, several times challenged God to decide the contest. Elihu suspects the approach of the Lord, when, towards the end of his speech, a violent thunderstorm arises and God answers Job out of the whirlwind, showing how foolishly the latter had acted in offering to reason with him, when his works proved his infinite majesty, and, consequently, his absolute justice. Job now submits to God, and humbly repents of his offense. Hereupon God addresses Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, declaring unto them his displeasure at their unmerciful dealing with their friend, the consequences of which could only be avoided by Job offering a propitiatory sacrifice. This is done, and the Lord grants unto Job ample compensation for his sufferings.

2. Design of the Book. All agree that the object of the book is the solution of the question how the afflictions of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked can be consistent with God's justice. Some assume that the problem could be satisfactorily solved only when the doctrines of immortality and retribution had been first established, which had not been done by the author of the book of Job; a perfect solution of the question was therefore not to be expected from him.

On nearer examination, however, it appears that the doctrine of retribution after death is not of itself alone calculated to lead to a solution of the problem. In contemplating the lives of the righteous, who were perfectly imbued with this doctrine, it will appear that they also struggled with doubts; that a satisfactory solution of the question is to be derived only from the fundamental doctrine on which the faith in retribution rests; and that this faith is shaken where it has not the necessary basis. The belief in a final judgment is firm and rational only when it rests on the belief in God's continued providential government of the world, and in his acting as sovereign Lord in all the events of human life. If God is holy and just, he must also have the will to manifest these qualities in our present life by his bearing toward those who represent his image on earth, as well as toward those who renounce it. If he is omnipotent, nothing can in this life prevent him from exhibiting his justice; but if this is not manifested, and if no reason can be given for which he at times defers his judgments, the belief in retribution after death would be flimsy and shallow. The New Testament holds out to the righteous promises of a future life, as well as of the present, and our Savior himself, in setting forth the rewards of those who, for his sake, forsook everything, begins with this life (Matt. xix:29). A nearer examination of the benedictions contained in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v), shows that none of them exclusively refer to future blessings, the judgment of the wicked is in his view proceeding without interruption, and therefore his examples of the distribution of Divine justice in this world, are mingled with those of requital in a future order of things. The Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their own sacrifices (Luke xiii:1), were in Christ's opinion not accidentally killed; and he threatens those who would not repent that they should in like manner perish. That sickness is to be considered as a punishment for sin we are clearly taught (John v:14; Luke v:20, 24); in the former passage it is threatened as punishment for sins committed; in the latter it is healed in consequence of punishment remitted. Nay, every patient restored by Christ, who acted not as a superior kind of Hippocrates, but as the Savior of men, is by that very act declared to be a sinner. The passage in John ix:2, 3, which is often appealed to, in proof that our Lord did not consider sickness as a punishment for sin, does not prove this, but only opposes the Jewish position—founded on the mistaken doctrine of retribution—that all severe sicknesses and infirmities were consequences of crimes. But what is, from this point of view, the solution of the problem regarding the sufferings of the righteous? It rests on two positions:

(a) Calamity is the only way that leads to the kingdom of God.

(b) Calamity, as the veiled grace of God, is with the pious never alone, but manifest proofs of Divine favor accompany or follow it. Though sunk in misery, they still are happier than the wicked, and when it has attained its object, it is terminated by the Lord.

It is this exclusively correct solution of the problem which occurs in the book of Job. All interpreters allow that it is set forth in Elihu's speeches, and, from the following observations, it will appear that they contain the opinion of the author. The leading principle in Elihu's statement is, that calamity in the shape of trial was inflicted even on the comparatively best men, but that God allowed a favorable turn to take place as soon as it had attained its object. Now this is the key to the events of Job's life. Though a righteous man, he is tried by severe afflictions. He knows not for what purpose he is smitten, and his calamity continues, but when he learns it from the addresses of Elihu and God, and humbles himself, he is relieved from the burden which oppresses him, and ample prosperity atones for the afflictions he has sustained. Add to this, that the remaining portion of Elihu's speeches, in which he points to God's infinite majesty as including his justice, is continued in the addresses of God; that Elihu foretells God's appearance; that he is not punished by God as are the friends of Job; in fine, that Job by his very silence acknowledges the problem to have been solved by Elihu; and his silence is the more significant because Elihu had urged him to defend himself (xxxiii:32), and because Job had repeatedly declared he would 'hold his peace,' if it was shown to him wherein he had erred (vi:24, 25; xix:4). This view of the book of Job has among modern authors been supported chiefly by Stüdtlin Beiträge zur Religion und Sittenlehre, vol. ii, p. 133) and Stieckel (Das Buch Hiob, Leipzig, 1842), though in both it is mixed up with much erroneous matter; and it is further confirmed by the whole Old Testament giving the same answer to the question mooted, which the speeches of Elihu offer; in its concentrated form it is presented in Ps. xxxvii, xlix, lxxiii.

The object of the book is rather to explain generally the nature and tendency of afflictions, and thereby to contribute towards the attainment of their design, to console the mind, and to cheer the drooping spirits. It is difficult for men to understand that their sufferings, however great, are still under that degree which they deserve. To consider afflictions as proofs of Divine favor, we must first learn to bring them into unison with Divine justice. Upon the doctrine of retribution after death our author does not enter, but that he knew it, may be inferred from several passages with great probability; as, for instance, ch. xiv:14, 'if a man die shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.' The if here shows that the writer had been before engaged in considering the subject of life after death; and when such is the case a pious mind will necessarily indulge the hope, or will, at least, have an obscure presentiment of immortality. The truth, also, of God's unbounded grace, on which the doctrine of immortality is based, will be found clearly laid down in ch. xix. Still the author does not recur to this hope for the purpose of solving his problem; he would not ground it on something in itself wanting support and a foundation, namely, that which is presented in this book. The doctrine of future retribution, if not sustained by the belief in retribution during this life, is truly a castle in the air. The author did not intend in his discussion to exceed the limits of what God had clearly revealed, and this was in his time confined to the vague notion of life continued after death, but not connected with rewards and punishments.

3. Character of Composition. On this subject there are different opinions.

Some contend that the book contains an entirely true history; others assert that it is founded on a true history, which has been recast; while others hold that the book contains a narrative entirely imaginary, and constructed by the author to teach a great moral truth.

The first view, taken by numerous ancient interpreters, is now abandoned by nearly all interpreters. It seems, however, to have been adopted by Josephus, for he places Job in the list of the historical books; and it was prevalent with all the fathers of the church. In its support four reasons are adduced, of which the third and fourth are quite untenable; the first and second are outweighed by other considerations, which render it impossible to consider the book of Job as an entirely true history, but which may be used in defence of the second view alluded to. It is said:

(a) That Job is (Ezek. xiv:14-20) mentioned as a public character, together with Noah and Daniel, and represented as an example of piety.

(b) In the Epistle of James (v:11), patience in sufferings is recommended by a reference to Job.

(c) In the Greek translation of the Septuagint a notice is appended to Gen. xxxvi:33, which states that Job was the King Jobab of Edom. This statement is too late to be relied on, and originates in an etymological combination; and that it must be erroneous is to a certain extent evident from the contents of the book, in which Job is not represented as a king.

(d) Job's tomb continues to be shown to Oriental tourists. Now the fact of a Job having lived somewhere would not of itself prove that the hero of our narrative was that person, and that this book contained a purely historical account. Moreover, his tomb is shown not in one place, but in six, and, along with it, the dunghill on which Job is reported to have sat!

Against this view it must be remarked generally, that the whole work is arranged on a well-considered plan, proving the author's power of independent invention. The transactions between God and Satan in the prologue absolutely require that we should distinguish between the subject matter forming the foundation of the work, and its enlargement; which can be only done when a poetical principle is acknowledged in its composition. This argument, which might be further extended without much difficulty, proves the first view above stated of the book of Job to be erroneous, and is meant to support the second; but it does not bear on the third, which contends that the narrative is an entire fiction, without any admixture of real facts; but which is contrary to the practice which anciently prevailed, when writers rarely invented the subject of a narrative and rather took the materials furnished by tradition, digesting, enlarging, and modifying them, so as to make them harmonize with the leading theme. Taking the second view, we must still abstain from undertaking to determine what the poet derived from tradition and what he added himself, since we know how far tradition had already embellished the original fact.

4. Descent, Country and Age of Author.

Opinions differed in ancient times as to the nation to which the author belonged; some considering him to have been an Arab, others an Israelite; but the latter supposition is undoubtedly preferable. For, first, we find in our book many ideas of genuine Israelite growth; the creation of the world is described, in accordance with the prevailing notions of the Israelites, as the immediate effect of Divine omnipotence; man is formed of clay; the spirit of man is God's breath; God employs the angels for the performance of his orders; Satan, the enemy of the chosen children of God, is his instrument for tempting them; men are weak and sinful; nobody is pure in the sight of God; moral corruption is propagated. There is promulgated to men the law of God, which they must not infringe, and the transgressions of which are visited on offenders with punishments. Moreover, the nether world, or Sheol, is depicted in hues entirely Hebrew.

Proceeding to the inquiry as to the age of the author of this book, we meet with three opinions:

(a) That he lived before Moses, or was, at least, his contemporary.

(b) That he lived in the time of Solomon, or in the centuries next following.

(c) That he lived shortly before, or during, or even after, the Babylonian exile. The view of those who assert the book to have been written long after the Babylonian exile, can be supported, as Hirzel justly observes, neither by the nature of its language nor by reasons derived from its historical groundwork, and is therefore now generally rejected.

Against those who refer the composition of the book to the time of the Babylonian exile, militate, first, the references to it in the Old Testament, which prove that it was before this period a generally known writing. Thus, in Ezek. xiv:14-20 are mentioned 'three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job,' as examples of righteousness. Mr. Bernstein, indeed, in defending his hypothesis, rejects this passage as spurious, but it bears every mark of genuineness. Further, in Jer. xx:14, we find evidently imitated Job's cursing of the day of his birth (Job iii). Not only the sentiments but the words are often the same; and that this coincidence is not accidental, or that the author did not imitate Jeremiah, appears from the literary character of each. Jeremiah shows himself throughout dependent on ancient writings, whereas our author is quite original and independent, as proved by Küper (see Jeremias librorum sacrorum interpres atque vindex, p. 164. sq.). There are also in the Lamentations of Jeremiah, many passages clearly alluding to our book, which must have eminently suited his taste and interested him (comp. Job xvi:9, 10, with Lam. ii:16; and Job xix:8, with Lam. iii:7, 9). In Isaiah the peculiar use of כִּפְזָא (xl:2) refers us to כִּפְזָא, keh'fel, double, in Job i (comp. x:17; xiv:14); and the double received from God's hand alludes to the end of the history of Job, who is there considered as typifying the future fate of the church. Is. lxi:7, 'In their land they shall have the double,' alludes to the same point; Isaiah li:9 depends on Job xxvi:13; and Isaiah xix:5 almost literally agrees with Job xiv:11 (see Küper, p. 166). Another example of words borrowed from Job occurs in Ps. cvii:42, where the second part of the verse agrees literally with Job v:16.

A most decisive reason against assigning the composition of Job to the period of the exile is derived from the language, since it is free from those Chaldaisms which occur in the books written about that time.

To the view which places the age of the book of Job in the time of the Babylonian exile, is most opposed that which assigns the composition of it to a period prior to Moses. In support of this latter view, only two arguments having a semblance of force can be adduced, and they will not bear the test of strict inquiry. They are: (1) 'There is in the book of Job no direct reference to the Mosaic legislation; and its descriptions and other statements are suited to the period of the patriarchs; as, for instance, the great authority held by old men, the high age of Job, and fathers offering sacrifices for their families—which leads to the supposition that when our book was written no sacerdotal order yet existed.' These points, however, are quite intelligible, if the design of the book, as stated above, is kept in view. The author intended not to rest the decision of the question at issue on particular passages of Scripture, but on religious consciousness and experience. This at once explains why he places the scene without Palestine, why he places it in the patriarchal age, and why he avoids the use of the name Jehovah; of these three items the first sufficiently accounts for no reference being made to the Mosaic legislation. (2) 'The language of the book of Job seems strongly to support the opinion of its having been written before Moses.' It has been often said, that no writing of the Old Testament may be more frequently illustrated from the Arabic than this book. Jerome observes (Præfat. in Dan.), 'Jobum cum Arabica lingua plurimam habere societatem;' and Schultens proved this so incontrovertibly that Gesenius was rather too late in denying the fact (see his Geschichte der Hebrätschen Sprache, p. 33). Now, from this character of its language we might be induced to infer that the work was written in the remotest times, when the separation of the dialects had only begun, but had not yet been completed. This inference would, however, be safe only if the book were written in prose. It is solely from works of this class that the general usage of the language prevailing at the time of the author can be seen. On the contrary, the selection of obsolete and rare words and forms, with the Hebrews, was a peculiar feature of the poetical style, and served to distinguish it from the usual, habitual way of writing. This peculiarity belongs to our book more than to any other.

The most complete statement of the reasons in support of the opinion that the book of Job was written after the age of Moses may be found in Richter's essay, De Ætate Jobi definienda, reprinted in Rosenmüller's edition of Lowth's Prælectiones De Poesi Sacra Hebræorum; in which he maintains that it was written in the age of Solomon. Most of these reasons, indeed, are either not conclusive at all, or not quite cogent. Thus it is an arbitrary assumption, proved by modern researches to be erroneous, that the art of writing was unknown previous to the age of Moses. The assertion, too, that the marks of cultivation and refinement observable in our book belonged to a later age, rests on no historical ground. Further, it cannot be said that for such an early time the language is too smooth and neat, since in no Semitic dialect is it possible to trace a progressive improvement. The evident correspondence also between our book and the Proverbs and Psalms is not a point proving with resistless force that they were all written at the same time. It is, indeed, sometimes of such a kind, that the authors of the Proverbs and Psalms cannot be exactly said to have copied our book; but it may be accounted for by their all belonging to the same class of writings, by the very great uniformity and accordance of religious conceptions and sentiments expressed in the Old Testament, and by the stability of its religious character.

Summing up the whole of our investigations, we take it to be a settled point that the book of Job does not belong to the time of the Babylonian exile; and it is nearly equally certain that it was not composed prior to the time of Moses. Could it then have been written in some age preceding Samuel and David? It is only with them that a new period of sacred literature began; and our book is related to products of that period, or enlarges on them. But it cannot have been composed later than Isaiah, who alludes to it. Thus we come to this general determination of the age of our book, that it was written, not before Samuel and David, but not later than the era of Isaiah. With this result we must rest satisfied, unless we would go beyond the indications presented. The intermediate period offers no ground on which we can safely fix the composition of the book of Job. There remains then uncertainty, but it does not concern an important point of religion.

5. Literature. E. W. H. Fry's New Translation and Exposition, 1827; Lange, Das Buch Hiob, 1831; Knobel, De Carminis Jobi, 1835; Ewald, Das Buch Hiob erklärt, 1836; Fackens, Comment. de Jobeide, 1836; Lee's Book of Job, 1837; Wemyss, Job and his Times, 1839. Jennings' Epic of the Inner Life is one of the latest and best expositions of this ancient poem; Vaihinger, Erläuter., 1842; Noyes, Notes, Boston, 1852, 1854; Hengstenberg, Hiob, 1856, 1870; Cheyne, Job and Solomon, 1887; Bradley, Lectures on Job, 1887; R. A. Watson in Expositor's Bible, 1892; also Rawlinson in Public Commentary, 1891. The section on the book of Job found in each of the chief Introductions to the O. T. should, of course, be consulted. The following may be mentioned as representative: Bleek (6th ed. by Wellhausen, 1893), Riehm (ed. Brandt, 1889), Driver (6th ed. 1897), and Cornill (3d and 4th ed. 1896); Wagner, Sermons; Davidson, Commentary, vol. 1; The Drama of Job, Rev. Chas. H. Dickinson, Bib. Sac., Jan., 1900, p. 68, sq.

There is, perhaps, no book of Scripture of which so many versions and commentaries have been published as Job, or respecting which a greater number of treatises and dissertations have been written. The above are only notable examples.

JOB'S DISEASE (jōb's dīz-ēz').

In this, as in most other Biblical diseases, there is too little distinct description of symptoms to enable us to determine the precise malady intended. But the general character of the complaint under which Job suffered bears a greater resemblance to elephantiasis than to any other disease. (See LEPROSY.) The passages which are considered to indicate this disease are found in the description of his skin burning from head to foot, so that he took a potsherd to scrape himself (ii:7, 8); in its being covered with putrefaction and crusts of earth, and being at one time stiff and hard, while at another it cracked and discharged fluid (vii:5); in the offensive breath which drove away the kindness of attendants (xix:17); in the restless nights, which were either sleepless or scared with frightful dreams (vii:13, 14; xxx:17); in general emaciation (xvi:8); and in so intense a loathing of the burden of life that strangling and death were preferable to it (vii:15).

W. A. N.

JOBAB (jō'bāb), (Heb. יֹבָב, yo-bawb'), howling, shouting, trumpet call, a desert).

1. The last of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x:29; 1 Chron. i:23). He has not left his name among the places of Southern Arabia, along with the other sons of Joktan, as far as has been discovered.

2. One of the kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi:33, 34; 1 Chron. i:44, 45). He was the son of Zerah of Bozrah, and second king on the list.

3. One of the northern chiefs who was routed by Joshua at Meron (Josh. xi:1), B. C. probably before 1210.

4. A Benjamite, and head of a house, the first-named of the sons of Shaharim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. viii:9).

5. A "son" of Elpaal, a chief of Benjamin at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:18), B. C. about 588.

JOCHED (jōk'e-bēd), (Heb. יֹכֶד, yo-keh'bed, God-glorified).

Wife of Amram and mother of Miriam, Moses and Aaron. In Exod. vi:20, Jocheb is expressly declared to have been the sister of Amram's father, and consequently the aunt of her husband. As marriage between persons thus related was afterwards forbidden by the law (Lev. xviii:12), various attempts have been made to show that the relationship was more distant than the text in its literal meaning indicates. We see no necessity for this. The example of Abraham (Gen. xx:12) shows the usage of the earlier age. Further it is stated (Exod. ii:1; Num. xxvi:59) that Jocheb was the daughter of Levi, and therefore sister of Kohath, Amram's father.

JOED (jō'ed), (Heb. יֹאֵד, yo-ade', Jehovah his witness), a Benjamite, son of Pedaiah (Neh. xi:7) and grandson of Sallu, which last was a Benjamite living at Jerusalem after the captivity (B. C. before 536).

JOEL (jō'el), (Heb. יֹאֵל, yo-ale', Jehovah his God).

1. The Son of Pethuel, a person otherwise unknown to us, prophesied in Judah, probably in Jerusalem (see Joel, Hebrew Version, i:14; ii:1, 15; English Version, ii:32; iii:1, 2, 6, 7, 16, 17, 20, 21—to some of which texts Bleek, p. 525, adds i:9, 13, 16; ii:9, 17). 'Nothing is known of the circumstances of his life. There is a controversy even as to the age in which he lived. But in any case he belonged to the most ancient of the minor prophets, not to the later portion of them. Now, as Amos not only opens his prophecy with an utterance of Joel's (comp. Amos i:2 with Joel iii:16), but also concludes with promises similar to those in Joel (comp. Amos ix:13 with Joel iii:18). Joel must have prophesied before Amos; that is, before the twenty-seven years during which Uziah and Jeroboam II reigned contemporaneously (apparently a slip of the pen, for the "twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam, in which Azariah or Uzziah began to reign," 2 Kings xv:1). We are led to assign a still higher antiquity to the prophecies of Joel by the political relations which come into view in them; since neither the Syrians nor the Assyrians had shown themselves hostile to the theocracy, but only the Phœnicians and the Philistines (iii:4), the Egyptians and the Edomites (iii:19). On the one hand, again, there is no mention of the attack upon Jerusalem by the Syrians under Hazael of Damascus, which cost Joash not only the treasures of the palace and of the temple, but also his life (2 Kings xii:18, sq.; 2 Chron. xxiv:23, sq.; yet for this Amos (i:3-5) prophesies the ruin of the Syrian kingdom, and the carrying away of the people to Assyria. On the other hand, there are the two circumstances, that the Edomites were already punished and brought anew into subjection by Amaziah (2 Kings xiv:7), on account of their revolt from Joram, and that the Philistines had to endure the same at the hands of Uziah (2 Chron. xxvi:6, 7), on account of what they had done in the same reign, plundering Jerusalem and carrying away the captive Jews (2 Chron. xxi:16, 17; comp. with Joel iii:4-6). For these two reasons we are justified in concluding that Joel prophesied between Joram's reign and the last years of King Joash. Credner and Winer place him in the time of Joash; Bertholdt, in that of Hezekiah; Cramer and Ekevnium, in Josiah's reign; Jahn, in Manasseh's, and Schröder still later.

2. The Book of Joel. (1) Occasion. The occasion of the prophecy of Joel was an entire desolation of Judah by an unheard-of plague of locusts, accompanied by a burning drought, which lasted for several years (ii:25). A calamity of this kind was not uncommon in Palestine, and, in ordinary circumstances, would not be made a subject of prophetic discourse. But the visitation described by Joel was exceptionally severe. Successive swarms of locusts swept over the country (i:4), and their devastations went on for years (ii:25). The produce of the fields, vineyards and orchards was destroyed (i:10-12). Food failed for man and beast (i:10-12, 16, 17, 18-20). The daily offering to Jehovah was suspended from lack of the necessary materials (i:9, 13; ii:14). This was equivalent to an interruption of the covenant relation between Jehovah and his people. A calamity which led to such a result was a very serious one. No prophet would have been faithful to his mission as watchman of Israel if he had failed to warn the people of the danger with which such a visitation threatened them. Joel saw in the locust invasion a special judgment from Jehovah, and used it as a text for one of the most interesting and instructive discourses contained in the prophetic books of the Old Testament.

(2) Contents. The book consists of three chapters. (The Hebrew text has four chapters, the last five verses of ch. ii in A. V. forming ch. iii in the Massoretic Text. It divides itself easily into two parts, in the first of which the prophet, and in the second Jehovah, is the speaker. The first half of it (i:2-ii:18) contains a call to repentance, urged by the prophet with ever-increasing urgency in the midst of the fearful plague on the land, which has been already threatened in the Law (Deut. xxiii:38, 39) against the transgressors as a punishment from God. The second half (ii:19-iv:21) contains the Divine promise, not only of the removal of this judgment, and of the judgment upon all nations hostile to the theocracy, but also of the glorification of the theocracy, through the bestowal of the richest natural blessings, and through the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon all flesh. The two halves are closely bound together into one whole by the historical remark which stands between them (ii:19), "And Jehovah answered, and said unto his people." Accordingly, the prediction of the future does not begin till ii:19 (though the translation in the English version seems quite defensible.

(3) Interpretation. The interpretation of the prophecy depends on the view taken of the locusts. Many of the early Fathers explained the locusts figuratively, following the Chaldee, Ephrem Syrus, Jerome and others. (Bleek, p. 526-7, names also Cyril of Alexandria, Abarbanel, Luther, Grotius and Bertholdt.)

In recent times this view has been supported in his usual fearless fashion by Hengstenberg (Christ. of O. T., Eng. tr., i:296, sq.). According to this view, the prophecy refers to future events, and the locusts, in cc. i and ii, represent the world-powers opposed to the Church—such as Jehovah judges on his great day (iii:1, 2; comp. Heb. iv:12).

So Dr. Hengstenberg, while strongly averse to the literal sense, is not disposed to limit the metaphorical meaning to any one event or class of invaders. 'The enemy,' he remarks, 'are designated only as north countries. From the north, however, from Syria, all the principal invasions of Palestine proceeded. We have therefore no reason to think exclusively of any one of them. Nor ought we to limit the prophecy to the people of the old covenant. Throughout all centuries there is but one church of God existing in unbroken connection. That this church, during the first period of its existence, was concentrated in a land into which hostile irruptions were made from the north, was purely accidental. To make this circumstance the boundary-stone of the fulfillment of prophecy were just as absurd as if one were to assert that the threatening of Amos, "by the sword shall all sinners of my people die," has not been fulfilled in those who perished after another manner.

What may be regarded as a modification of the ancient opinion of its purely figurative character has been recently proposed. According to this view the locusts are Apocalyptic—creatures of a supernatural kind, such as may fitly find a place in a vision of the last things, with which the book of Joel closes (comp. the locusts in N. T. Apocalypse).

The third and, in recent times, the most generally accepted opinion is that the locusts are real. The prophet describes an actual locust invasion and makes it the occasion of his prophecy.

Keil, Intr. to O. T., voicing this opinion, says: "The prophet does not foretell some future misfortune and some judgment still impending over the theocracy at the hands of armies of hostile nations, under the allegorical veil of a swarm of locusts laying the land waste; but he depicts a present judgment already come, the abiding frightful plague of locusts laying everything waste, in which he beholds the forerunners of the day of Jehovah which is near (i:15; ii:1, 2), though it may still be averted by thoroughgoing repentance (i:13, 14; ii:1, 12, 13, 15, sq.)."

(4) Doctrine. The prophet, after describing the approaching judgments, calls on his countrymen to repent, assuring them of the Divine placability and readiness to forgive (ii:12-17). He foretells the restoration of the land to its former fertility, and declares that Jehovah would still be their God (ii:18-26). He then announces the spiritual blessings which would be poured forth in the Messianic age (iii:1-5, Heb. text; ii:28-32, Auth. Vers.). This remarkable prediction is applied by the Apostle Peter to the events that transpired on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii:16-21). In the last chapter (iv Heb. text; iii Auth. Vers.), the Divine vengeance is denounced against the enemies and oppressors of the chosen people, of whom the Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Edomites are especially named. A minute examination of these predictions would exceed our limits; we must refer the reader for further information to the works named at the close of this article.

(5) Style and Canonicity. The style of Joel, it has been remarked, unites the strength of Micah with the tenderness of Jeremiah. In vividness of description he rivals Nahum, and in sublimity and majesty is scarcely inferior to Isaiah and Habakkuk. 'Imprimis est elegans, clarus, fusus, fluensque; valde etiam sublimis, acer, fervidus' (Lowth, De Sacra Poesi Hebr. Præl. xxi).

The canonicity of this book has never been called in question (Keil, Int. to O. T.; C. G. Cameron in Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

3. Joel, the Son of the Prophet Samuel (1 Sam. viii:2; 1 Chron. vi:33; xv:17). With his brother Abiah he was made judge of Beersheba, when old age prevented their father from longer making his circuit; but they were corrupt and their judgments disgraced both them and their father. It was this conduct that brought about the change of the constitution of Israel to a monarchy. In 1 Chron. vi:28 Vashni, mentioned with Abiah, has been substituted for Joel (B. C. 1030).

4. Joel, son of Azariah or Uzziah (1 Chron. vi:36). The name, however, is supposed to be a corruption of Shaul (ver. 24).

5. The head of one of the Simeonite families, who joined the expedition against the Hamites in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv:35), B. C. 715.

6. A descendant of Reuben, but whether through Hanoah or Carmi is a disputed point (Burrington, Geneal. i:53; 1 Chron. v:4, 8).

7. A Gadite chief of Bashan (1 Chron. v:12), B. C. about 1000.

8. Son of Izrahiah of the tribe of Issachar, and one of David's military officers (1 Chron. vii:3), B. C. about 1000.

9. Brother of Nathan and a member of David's guard (1 Chron. xi:38). In 2 Sam. xxiii:36 the name Igal is substituted (B. C. about 1000).

10. Chief of the Gershonites, who brought up the ark from the house of Obed-edom in the reign of David (1 Chron. xv:7, 11).

11. A Gershonite Levite, son of Jehiel (1 Chron. xxvi:22), having charge of the treasures of the Temple under David. Probably the same as Joel, 9.

12. Son of Pedaiah and chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the west of the Jordan in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii:20), B. C. about 1000.

13. A Kohathite Levite, one of the two representatives of his tribe in the ceremonies preceding the restoration of the Temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix:12), B. C. 719.

14. "Son" of Nebo and one of those returning with Ezra, who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x:43), B. C. 456.

15. A Benjamite, son of Zichri, commanding Judah and his own tribe at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi:9).

JOELAH (jo-ē'lah), (Heb. יוֹאֵלָה, yo-ay-law', furthermore), son of Jeroham, of Gedor, who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:7), B. C. before 1000.

JOEZER (jo-ē'zer), (Heb. יוֹזֵר, yo-eh'zer, Jehovah his help), a Korhite captain, who fought by David while he dwelt among the Philistines (1 Chron. xii:6), B. C. before 1000.

JOGBEHAH (jög'be-häh), (Heb. יוֹגְבְּהָה, yog-beh-haw', hillock), one of the "fenced cities" rebuilt by the tribe of Gad when they took possession of their territory east of the Jordan (Num. xxxii:35).

It is mentioned in the account of Gideon's victory over the Midianites (Judg. viii:11). No trace of the place has been found; but it could not have been far from the Jordan, judging from the places with which it is associated.

JOGLI (jög'li), (Heb. יוֹגְלִי, yog-lee', exiled), of Bukki, a Danite chief (Num. xxxiv:22), B. C. 1170.

JOHA (jō'hà), (Heb. יוֹחָה, yo-khaw', probably, Jehovah lives).

1. A son of Beriah, a Benjamite chief, dwelling in Ajjalon, who had driven out the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chron. viii:16). Perhaps the same encounter is referred to in viii:13, and 1 Chron. vii:21 (B. C. about 588).

2. A Tizite, and, according to Kennicott, son of Shimri. He was one of David's guard (1 Chron. xi:45), B. C. 1000.

JOHANAN (jo-hā'nan), (Heb. יוֹחָנָן, yo-khaw-nawn', God-bestowed).

1. One of the officers who came and recognized Gedaliah as governor of Judæa after the destruction of Jerusalem, and who appears to have been the chief in authority and influence among them. He penetrated the designs of Ishmael against the governor, whom he endeavored, without success, to put upon his guard. When Ishmael had accomplished his design by the murder of Gedaliah, and was carrying away the principal persons at the seat of government as captives to the Ammonites, Johanan pursued him and released them. Being fearful, however, that the Chaldeans might misunderstand the affair, and make him and those who were with him responsible for it, he resolved to withdraw for safety into Egypt, with the principal persons of the remnant left in the land. Jeremiah remonstrated against this decision; but Johanan would not be moved, and even constrained the prophet himself to go with them. They proceeded to Taphanes, but nothing further is recorded of Johanan, B. C. 588 (2 Kings xxv:23; Jer. xl:8-16; xli; xlii; xliii).

2. Son of Azariah, and grandson of Ahimaaz (1 Chron. vi:9, 10). He was high-priest, probably, in the reign of Rehoboam (Hervey, Geneal. ch. x).

3. Son of Elioenai in the line of Zerubbabel's heirs (1 Chron. iii:24), B. C. after 400.

4. Eldest son of King Josiah (1 Chron. iii:15). He must have previously died or fallen with Josiah at Megiddo (B. C. after 639).

5. A Benjamite captain, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4), B. C. 1000.

6. The eighth of the "lion faced" warriors of Gad who joined David (1 Chron. xii:12), B. C. 1000.

7. Father of Azariah, a head of the Ephraimites in the time of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii:12), B. C. about 735.

8. Son of Hakkatan, and chief of the sons of Azgad, who came back with Ezra (Ezra viii:12), B. C. about 457.

9. Son of Eliashib (Neh. xii:23). To his chamber Ezra retired and mourned over the sins of the people who had been carried away (Ezra x:6).

10. Son of Tobiah, the Ammonite, who married the daughter of the priest Meshullam (Neh. vi:18), B. C. 445.

JOHN (jön), (Gr. Ἰωάννης, ee-o-an'nace, from Hebrew Jehohanan, Jehovah favored).

1. A member of the family of the high-priest. He, with Caiaphas and Annas, heard the case brought against Peter and John for curing the lame man and preaching in the temple (Acts iv:6). Lightfoot (Cent. Chor. Matth. prof. ch. 15) identifies him with R. Johanan ben Zaccai, president of the great synagogue after its removal to Jabne.

2. Hebrew name for MARK. In Acts xii:12, 25; xiii:5, 13; xv:37, he is designated by the name under which he was known among his countrymen. (See MARK.)

3. The Apostle John, who was the son of Zebedee, a fisherman, and of Salome. It is probable that he was born at Bethsaida, on the lake of Galilee. His parents appear to have been in easy circumstances; at least, we find that Zebedee employed hired servants (Mark i:20), and that Salome was among the number of those women who contributed to the maintenance of Jesus (Matt. xxvii:56).

The Apostle John.

(1) Belonged to Wealthy Class. We also find that John received Mary into his house after the death of Jesus. Since this house seems to have been situated at Jerusalem ("from that hour," John xix:27), it would appear that he was the owner of two houses. John's acquaintance, also, with the high-priest (xviii:15) seems to indicate that he lived at Jerusalem, and belonged to the wealthier class.

(2) Religiously Inclined. We may suppose that from a tender age he nourished religious feelings, since Salome, who evinced so much love for Jesus, probably fostered at an earlier period those hopes of a Messiah which she expresses in Matt. xx:20; and we find that he entered into communion with the Baptist from pure motives. The occupation, also, of a fisherman was adapted to promote holy meditations, since it would frequently lead him to pass whole nights in stillness upon the water, amid a charming country similar to the environs of the lake of Maggiore.

(3) Called by John the Baptist. On the banks of the Jordan the Baptist directed John to Jesus, and he immediately became the Lord's disciple, and accompanied him on his return to Galilee. Having arrived there, he at first resumed his trade, but was afterwards called to remain permanently with the Redeemer (Luke v:5-10). Jesus was particularly attached to John (John xiii:23; xix:26; xx:2, xxi:7), who was one of the three who were distinguished above the other Apostles (Matt. xvii:1; xxvi:37; Mark v:37).

(4) Apostleship. After the ascension, John abode at Jerusalem, where Paul met him on his third journey, about the year 52 (Gal. ii:3-9). Since he had undertaken the care of the mother of Jesus we cannot well suppose that he left Jerusalem before Mary's death; and, indeed, we find that about the year 58, when Paul was at Ephesus, John was not living there yet. If we consider the great importance of Ephesus among the various churches of Asia Minor, and the dangers arising from false teachers, who were prevalent there as early as the days of Paul (Acts xx:29), it will appear likely that John was sent to Ephesus after Paul had left that scene, about the year 65. During the time of his activity in Asia Minor he was exiled by the Roman emperor to Patmos, one of the sporadic isles in the Ægean Sea, where, according to Revelations i:9, he wrote the Apocalypse. Irenæus (Adv. Hær. v. 30) and, following him, Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii:18) state that John beheld the visions of the Apocalypse about the close of the reign of Domitian.

(5) Exile to Patmos. If this statement can be depended upon, the exile to Patmos also took place under Domitian, who died A. D. 96. Tertullian (Præscr. adv. Hær. c. 30) relates that in the reign of Domitian, John was forcibly conveyed to Rome, where he was thrown into a cask of oil; that he was miraculously released, and then brought to Patmos. But since none of the ancient writers besides the rather indiscriminating Tertullian, relate this circumstance, and since this mode of capital punishment was unheard of at Rome, we ought not to lay much stress upon it (compare Mosheim, Dissertationes ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam, i, p. 497, sq.). It is, however, likely that John was called to suffer for his faith, since Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, writing about A. D. 200, calls him μάρτυρ (martyr) (Euseb.

Reputed Tomb of St. John.

Hist. Eccles. v. 24). According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii:20, 23), he returned from exile during the reign of Nerva.

(6) Epistles. The three epistles of John, as also the affecting account concerning his fidelity as a spiritual pastor, given by Clemens Alexandrinus (Quis Dives Salvus? ch. 52), testify that he was the pastor of a large diocese. John's second epistle, verse 12, and third epistle, verse 14, indicate that he made journeys of pastoral visitation.

(7) Death. John died at Ephesus past the age of ninety, in the reign of the Emperor Trajan. According to Jerome, he was a hundred years old, and according to Suidas, a hundred and twenty.

Jerome (Comm. ad Gal. iii, p. 314, mart.) relates that when John had attained a great age he was so feeble that he could not walk to the assemblies of the church; he, therefore, caused himself to be carried in by young men. He was no longer able to say much, but he constantly repeated the words, 'Little children, love one another.' On being asked why he constantly repeated this one saying, he replied: 'Because it is the command of the Lord; and enough is done if this is done.' (French, Life and Character of John the Evangelist; Stanley, Sermons and Essays on the Apost. Age, iv.)

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Gr. Ἰωάννης ὁ Βαπτιστής, ee-o-an'ace ho bap-tis-tacé, John the baptizer), the forerunner of Jesus Christ, or simply Ἰωάννης, John, when the reference is clear, as in Matt. iii:4; iv:12; Lat. Joannes, Tacit. Hist. v:12.

(1) Birth and Early Life. His parents were Zacharias and Elisabeth, the latter a cousin of Mary, the mother of Jesus, whose senior John was by a period of six months (Luke i). According to the account contained in the first chapter of Luke his father while engaged in burning incense, was visited by the angel Gabriel, who informed him that in compliance with his prayers his wife should bear a son, whose name he should call John—in allusion to the grace thus accorded. Zacharias is slow to believe these tidings and seeks some token in evidence of their truth. Accordingly, a sign is given which acts also as a punishment of his want of faith—his tongue is sealed till the prediction is fulfilled by the event. Six months after Elisabeth had conceived she received a visit from Mary, the future mother of Jesus. On being saluted by her relation, Elisabeth felt her babe leap in her womb, and, being filled with the Holy Spirit, she broke forth into a poetic congratulation to Mary, as the destined mother of her Lord. At length Elisabeth brought forth a son, whom the relatives were disposed to name Zacharias, after his father—but Elisabeth was in some way led to wish that he should be called John. The matter was referred to the father, who signified in writing that his name was to be John. This agreement with Elisabeth caused all to marvel. Zacharias now had his tongue loosed, and he first employed his restored power in praising God.

The parents of John were not only of a priestly order, but righteous and devout. Their influence, in consequence, in the training of their son, would not only be benign but suitable to the holy office which he was designed to fill. More than this—the special aids of God's Spirit were with him (Luke i:66). How thoroughly Zacharias was penetrated with his parental responsibility and the future dignity of his son, appears from the 'divine song' to which he gives utterance. As a consequence of the lofty influences under which he was nurtured, the child waxed strong in spirit. The sacred writer adds that 'he was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel' (Luke i:80).

(2) Beginning of Ministry. In the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius, John made his public appearance, exhibiting the austerity, the costume, and the manner of life of the ancient Jewish prophets (Luke iii; Matt. iv). His raiment was camel's hair; he wore a plain leathern girdle about his loins; his food was what the desert spontaneously offered—locusts and wild honey from the rock. The burden of John's preaching bore no slight resemblance to the old prophetic exhortations, whose last echo had now died away for centuries. He called upon the Jewish people to repent (μετανοεῖτε), to change their minds, their dispositions and affections, and thus prepared the way for the great doctrine promulgated by his Lord, of the necessity of a spiritual regeneration. That the change which John had in view was by no means of so great or so elevated a kind as that which Jesus required, is very probable; but the particulars into which he enters when he proceeds to address classes or individuals (Matt. iii:7, sq., Luke iii:7, sq.), serve fully to show that the renovation at which he aimed was not merely of a material or organic, but chiefly of a moral nature. In a very emphatic manner did he warn the ecclesiastical and philosophical authorities of the land of the necessity under which they lay of an entire change of view, of aim, and of desire, declaring in explicit and awful terms that their pride of nationality would avail them nothing against the coming wrathful visitation, and that they were utterly mistaken in the notion that Divine providence had any need of them for completing its own wise purposes (Luke iii:8, 9). The first reason assigned by John for entering on his most weighty and perilous office was announced in these words—'the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' It was his great work to prepare the mind of the nation, so that when Jesus himself came they might be a people made ready for the Lord. The reference which we have made to John's addresses to his auditors suffices to show that there was an ample and predominant moral element in his conception of this kingdom; and indeed the whole tenor of his teaching seems to our mind intended and fitted to refine, exalt, and expand the ordinary Jewish mind and so to prepare the way for the perfect day of Christ.

The doctrine and manner of life of John appear to have roused the entire of the south of Palestine, and people flocked from all parts to the spot where, on the banks of the Jordan, he baptized thousands unto repentance. Such, indeed, was the fame which he had gained, that 'people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not' (Luke iii:15). Had he chosen, John might without doubt have assumed to himself the higher office, and risen to great worldly power. But he was faithful to his trust, and never failed to declare it in the fullest and clearest manner, that he was not the Christ but merely his harbinger, and that the sole work he had to do was to usher in "the day-spring from on high."

(3) Meeting with Jesus. The more than prophetic fame of the Baptist reached the ears of Jesus in his Nazarene dwelling, far distant from the locality of John (Matt. ii:9, 11). The nature of the report—namely, that his divinely predicted forerunner had appeared in Judæa—showed our Lord that the time was now come for his being made manifest to Israel. Accordingly he comes to the place where John is, to be baptized of him, in order that thus he might fulfill all that was required under the dispensation which was about to disappear (Matt. iii:14). John's sense of inferiority inclines him to ask rather than to give baptism in the case of Jesus, who, however, wills to have it otherwise, and is accordingly baptized of John.

Immediately upon the termination of this symbolical act, a divine attestation is given from the opened vault of heaven, declaring Jesus to be in truth the long looked-for Messiah—'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (Matt. iii:17). The events which are found recorded in John i:19, sq., seem to have happened after the baptism of Jesus by John. This appears to us to be implied in the past character of the narrative. John is obviously speaking of something over and gone; for instance, "This is he of whom I said (not I say), 'after me cometh a man,'" etc.

The relation which subsisted between John and Jesus, after the emphatic testimony above recorded had been borne, we have not the materials to describe with full certainty.

It seems but natural to think, when their hitherto relative position is taken into account, that John would forthwith lay down his office of harbinger, which, now that the Sun of Righteousness himself had appeared, was entirely fulfilled and terminated. Such a step he does not appear to have taken. On the contrary, the language of Scripture seems to imply that the Baptist church continued side by side with the Messianic (Matt. xi:2; Luke vii:19; Matt. ix:14; Luke xi:1; Acts xviii:25), and remained long after John's execution (Acts xix:3). Indeed, a sect which bears the name of 'John's disciples' exists to the present day in the East, whose sacred books are said to be pervaded by a Gnostic leaven.

(4) Subsequent Ministry. Still, though it has been generally assumed that John did not lay down his office, we are not satisfied that the New Testament establishes this alleged fact. John may have ceased to execute his own peculiar work, as the forerunner, but may justifiably have continued to bear his most important testimony to the Messiahship of Christ; or he may even have altogether given up the duties of active life some time, at least, before his death; and yet his disciples, both before and after that event, may have maintained their individuality as a religious communion. It was, not improbably, with a view to remove some error of this kind that John sent the embassy of his disciples to Jesus, which is recorded in Matt. xi:3; Luke vii:19. The spiritual course which the teachings of Jesus were more and more taking, and the apparent failure or at least uneasy postponement of the promised kingdom in the popular sense, especially the fact that their esteemed master lay in prison, and was in imminent danger of losing his life, may well have led John's disciples to doubt if Jesus were in truth the expected Messiah. Appearances, to them, were purely adverse. What step so fit on the part of their master, as that he should send them to Jesus himself? No intimation is found in the record that John required evidence to give him satisfaction; and all the language that is used is proper and pertinent if we suppose that the doubt lay only in the minds of his disciples. That the terms employed admit the interpretation that John was not without some misgivings (Luke vii:23; Matt. xi:6), we are free to allow. And if any doubt had grown up in the Baptist's mind it was most probably owing to the defective spirituality of his views; for even of him Jesus has declared, 'he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Matt. xi:11). Were this the case it would of itself account not only for the embassy sent by John to Jesus, but also for the continuance and perpetuation of John's separate influence as the founder of a sect.

(5) Imprisonment and Death. The manner of John's death is too well known to require to be detailed here (Matt. iv:12; xiv:3; Luke iii:19; Mark vi:17; Joseph. Antiq. xviii, 5, 2). He reprov'd a tyrant for a heinous crime, and received his reward in decapitation.

John the Baptist is mentioned in the Koran with much honor, under the name of Jahja.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

(1) Authenticity and Credibility. During the eighteenth century and the first ten years of the nineteenth, the Gospel of John was attacked, but with feeble arguments, by some English deists and by four German theologians: Bretschneider (Probabilia de Evangelii et Epistolarum Johannis origine et indole, 1820); Strauss, (The Life of Jesus); Lützelberger (Die kirchliche Tradition über den Apostel Johannes und seine Schriften, 1840); and Schwegler (Der Montanismus und die Christliche Kirche des zweiten Jahrhunderts, 1841). However, even in Germany, the opponents of its authenticity have not met with much sympathy.

The credibility of the Gospel of St. John is open to attack on account of its differing so much, as well in substance as in form, from the three first Gospels, and on account of its apparent contradiction of them. Among the apparent contradictions may be mentioned the statements that Christ was crucified on the same day on which the Passover was to be eaten (John xviii:28), while according to the other Gospels Jesus ate the Passover with his disciples; and that Jesus, before he went to Gethsemane, offered up a prayer full of sublimity and confidence (xvii), while according to the other Gospels he endured in Gethsemane a very heavy internal conflict, respecting which John is silent. But the most striking difference is that of the speeches. This difference is, perhaps, still more apparent in the form than in the substance of them.

(2) The History and the Speeches. This difference may be accounted for by supposing that John intended to relate and complete the history of the Lord according to his own view of it. We are led to this supposition from the following circumstances; that, with the exception of the history of his passion and his resurrection, there are only two sections in which John coincides with the synoptic gospels (vi:1-21; xii:1); that he altogether omits such important facts as the baptism of Jesus by John, the history of his temptation and transfiguration, the institution of the Lord's supper, and the internal conflict at Gethsemane; and that chapters i:32; iii:24; xi:2, indicate that he presupposed his readers to be already acquainted with the Gospel history. He confined himself to such communications as were wanting in the others, especially with regard to the speeches of Jesus. The historical section in chapter vi he communicated because it is connected with the subsequent speeches of Jesus; and chapter xii:1, because it was of importance for him to relate the history of Judas, so that each event should clearly be understood to be the result of a preceding fact. The history of Christ's sufferings and resurrection, being a prominent part, could not be omitted, although, in the account of these also, John differs in his statements from the writers of the other Gospels. Clemens Alexandrinus (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi:14) relates, as he says, upon the statement of old Presbyters, that John wrote his Gospel at the request of his friends, in order to place by the side of the σωματικά εὐαγγέλια, bodily gospels, his πνευ- ματικὸν εὐαγγέλιον, spiritual gospel. The same account is confirmed by a Latin fragment of the second century preserved by Muratori, in which it is recorded that the aged apostle was solicited by his co-disciples to commit his Gospel to writing.

Now with regard to the difference of form. In the Gospel of John, Jesus seldom speaks in gnomes, sentences, and parables, but generally in longer speeches, the parts of which are not closely connected, containing frequent repetitions, and the linguistic characteristics of which strongly resemble those of John's epistles.

The gentle and feminine character of the disciple allows us to suppose that, to a certain degree, he adopted as his own the expressions of the Redeemer, and, consequently, that many terms in which the Epistles agree with the Gospel did not originate with the disciple, but with Christ himself. We find an example of the manner in which the disciple adopted the expressions of his Master in John xii:43, compared with v:41-44. We do not deny that the formation of sentences and expressions is considerably influenced by the peculiar character of the disciple, but with regard to the particular contents of the speeches, we see no reason why we should doubt their authenticity. Strauss himself makes a concession from which much results, namely, that the most characteristic speeches in John are those in which occur the antitheses of σὰρξ and πνεῦμα, flesh and spirit, φῶς and σκότος, light and darkness, ζωή and θάνατος, life and death, ἄνω and κάτω, above and below; and also the mystical expressions of ἄπρος τῆς ζωῆς, bread of life, ὕδωρ ζῶν, living water. These terms are even by Strauss (vol. i. p. 176) considered to be parts of the original speeches of Christ, and he asserts that the evangelist only developed them in the style of the Alexandrian writers.

(3) Peculiarities. It must be granted that the peculiarities of John's Gospel more especially consist in the four following doctrines:

(1) That of the mystical relation of the Son to the Father.

(2) That of the mystical relation of the Redeemer to believers.

(3) The announcement of the Holy Ghost as the Comforter.

(4) The peculiar importance ascribed to Love.

Although there can be shown in the writings of the other evangelists some isolated dicta of the Lord, which seem to bear the impress of John, it can also be shown that they contain thoughts not originating with that disciple, but with the Lord himself. Matthew (xi:27) speaks of the relation of the Son to the Father so entirely in the style of John that persons not sufficiently versed in Holy Writ are apt to search for this passage in the Gospel of John. The mystical union of the Son with believers is expressed in Matt. xxviii:20. The promise of the effusion of the Holy Ghost in order to perfect the disciples is found in Luke xxiv:49. The doctrine of Paul with respect to love, in 1 Cor. xiii, entirely resembles what, according to John, Christ taught on the same subject. Paul here deserves our particular attention. In the writings of Paul are found Christian truths which have their points of coalescence only in John, viz., that Christ is Εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου, the image of the invisible God, by whom all things are created (Col. i:15, 16). Paul considers the Spirit of God in the church, the spiritual Christ, as Jesus himself does (John xiv:16), frequently using the words εἶναι ἐν Χριστῷ, ei-nay en Chris-to', to be in Christ.

That the speeches of Christ have been faithfully reported may be seen by a comparison of the speeches of the Baptist in the Gospel of John. The Baptist speeches bear an entirely Old Testament character; they are full of gnomes, allusions to the Old Testament, and sententious expressions (John iii:27-30; i:26-36).

(4) Place, Time, and Language. The Fathers supposed that the Gospel of John was written at Ephesus. The author of a synopsis annexed to the works of Athanasius makes an observation which deserves to be noticed on account of the assurance with which it is advanced. It is, that John wrote the Gospel which bears his name in Patmos, but that it was edited by the same Gaius whom Paul in the epistle to the Romans calls ὁ ξένος μου, mine host (Athanasii Opera, vol. ii, p. 155. Venet.). One might be inclined to explain by this circumstance the postscript contained in John xxi:24, 25.

There is some internal evidence in favor of the statement that this Gospel was written at Ephesus—namely, that the author sometimes alludes to the tenets of Hellenistic theosophy, and that he has in view readers who do not live in Palestine (John ii:6, 13; iv:9; v:1, 2). In addition to this must be mentioned the command of the Hellenistic Greek evinced by the writer. It is, however, not unlikely that John acquired his knowledge of Greek in his native country. The researches of Dr. Paulus, Hug. and Credner, have rendered it highly probable that the knowledge of Greek was then widely spread in Palestine. Even James, the brother of our Lord, although he never left his native country, writes in his epistle tolerably good Greek.

The language of John's Gospel is not very periodic, but moves uniformly on between the particles δέ, but; and οὐν, moreover. This defect of style may, however, be explained by the mental characteristics of the disciple. John's mind was deficient in the dialectic element; he wanted the logical acuteness of Paul. Even where he reports the speeches of Christ, we often find a want of precision in his representation. The simplicity of John's character is also evinced by the repetition of certain leading thoughts, reproduced in the same words both in the Gospel and in the Epistles; such as μαρτυρία, testimony; δόξα, glory; ἀλήθεια, truth; φῶς, light; σκότος, darkness; ζωή αἰώνιος, eternal life; μένειν, to abide.

(5) Interpreters. Among the ancient commentators upon John's Gospel, Chrysostom deserves the first place. The two compilers, Theophylact, who died A. D. 1107, and Euthymius Zigabenus, who died after A. D. 1118, are also worthy of notice. Among the Roman Catholic interpreters, Maldonatus, who died in 1583, is distinguished by originality and accuracy. Calvin is distinguished above the other Reformers for the originality and ease of his interpretation, but his commentary on the Epistles is more carefully worked out than that on the Gospel. Beza is characterized by philological and critical learning. The most complete commentary on the Gospel of John is that of Lampe, (Commentarius Exegetico-Analyticus in Evangelium Johannis, Amstelodami, 1637, 3 vols. 4to). The style of this commentary is tasteless and stiff, but in learning the author has not been surpassed by any other interpreter. Lücke (3d ed. 1840) is the most comprehensive of the modern commentators. Shorter commentaries have been written by Tholuck (5th ed.), by Olshausen (3d ed. 1832), and by De Wette (2d ed. 1839).

As introductions to the study of the writings of John, we may mention Frommann's Johanneischer Lehrbegriff, 1831, and Neander's Abriss der Jo- hanneischen Lehre in his Geschichte der Pflanzung der Christlichen Kirche (3d ed. 1841, p. 75, sq.).

JOHN, THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF.

(1) Authenticity. For the authenticity of the first epistle very ancient testimony may be adduced. Papias, the disciple of John, quotes some passages from it. Polycarp, also, another disciple of John, quotes a passage from this epistle (ad Philipp., c:7. So, also Irenæus (Adv. Hær., iii: 16; v:8).

The author of the first epistle describes himself, at its commencement, as an eye-witness of the life of our Lord. The style and language manifestly harmonize with those of the author of the Gospel of John. The polemics, also, which in chapter ii: 18-26, are directed against the Docetic Gnostics, in chapter iv:1-3, agree with the sphere of action in Asia Minor in which the Evangelist John was placed. We may, therefore, suppose that the epistle was written to Christian congregations in Asia Minor, which were placed under the spiritual care of the apostle. It is generally admitted that chapter i:2 refers to the Gospel. If this is correct, the apostle wrote this epistle at a very advanced age, after he had written his gospel. The epistle breathes love and devotion, but also zeal for moral strictness (iii:6-8; v:16). There is a remarkable absence of logical connection in the form of separate expressions, and in the transitions from one thought to another. Some writers have been inclined to find a reason for this in the advanced age of the writer. Old age may, perhaps, have contributed to this characteristic, but it is chiefly attributable to the mental peculiarity of the apostle.

(2) Time and Place of Writing the First Epistle. On this head nothing certain can be determined. It has been conjectured by many interpreters, ancient and modern, that it was written at the same place as the Gospel. The more ancient tradition places the writing of the Gospel at Ephesus, and a less authentic report refers it to the island of Patmos. Hug (Introduction) infers, from the absence of writing materials (3 John 13), that all John's Epistles were composed at Patmos! The most probable opinion is that it was written somewhere in Asia Minor, in which was the ordinary residence of the Apostle (Euseb. Hist. Eccl., iii:23), perhaps, according to the tradition of the Greek church, at Ephesus; but for this we have no historical warrant (Lücke's Commentary).

It is equally difficult to determine the time of the writing of this Epistle, although it was most probably posterior to the Gospel, which seems to be referred to in 1 John i:4. Some are of opinion that the Epistle was an envelope or accompaniment to the Gospel, and that they were consequently written nearly simultaneously (Hug's Introd.). It has been argued by several, from chapter ii:18 (ἔρχεται ὡρα ἔσθι, it is the last time), that the Epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem.

Various, indeed, have been the hypotheses regarding the persons to whom this Epistle was written, but it is by no means improbable, from the absence of Old Testament references, that it was addressed to Gentile converts, of which there were several congregations in Asia Minor.

(3) Object and Design. The main object and design of this Epistle has been generally perceived to consist in the refutation of certain errors and heresies in the churches subject to St. John's episcopate. But opinions are divided as to who the teachers of these heresies were, whether Jews, Ebionites, Gnostics, Doceteæ, Cerinthus and his followers, or finally the disciples of John the Baptist. This polemical object appears, however, to form but a secondary part of the design of John, his main object being rather to enforce the necessity of progressive sanctification, genuine brotherly love, and the renunciation of the world. The design of the Epistle is didactic rather than polemical.

Another portion of this Epistle seems directed against a certain class of antinomian Christians, who perverted Christian liberty into antichristian licentiousness and libertinism, and decided what was sinful or otherwise, not according to the positive law of God, but by their own internal feelings—thus confounding light and darkness, God and the world. This vital error was rather to be found among the heathen than the Jewish Christians, and was probably founded on a perversion of St. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith. (See Augustine, Tractat. x., in Ep. Johannis ad Parthos; Luther's Zweifache Ausleg. ed. Walch. vol ix; Whiston's Commentary on the 3 Cath. Epist. of St. John.)

There has been no subject connected with Biblical literature which has attracted more attention than this epistle, in consequence of the controversies which have existed since the commencement of the sixteenth century, respecting the once contested but now rejected passage in 1 John v:7, 8. It is sufficient here to say that the disputed passage is found in no Greek manuscript save two, both belonging to the fifteenth century; and that it has not once been quoted by any of the Greek, Latin or Oriental fathers. It is now generally omitted in all critical editions of the New Testament, as it is in the R. V. (See Dean Turton's Vindication of the Literary Character of Professor Porson from the Animadversions of the Right Rev. Thomas Burgess, D. D., etc., published under the name of Crito-Cantabrigiensis, 1827.) The Memoir of the Controversy Respecting the Heavenly Witnesses (1830), by the Rev. W. Orme, contains interesting critical notices of the principal writers on both sides of this much agitated question. Dr. Tregelles, in Journ. Sac. Lit., April, 1858, p. 167, sq. exposes the misstatements of Dr. Turnbull; Candlish, Lectures. W. W.

JOHN, THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF.

Authenticity. Eusebius places the second and third epistles of John among the an-tee-leh-gom-eh'na, ἀντιλεγόμενα, disputed books (Hist. Eccles., iii:25).

The second epistle is addressed to a lady, called Eupla, koo-ree'ah, Kuria, Lady, which name frequently occurs in ancient writers as that of a woman (comp. Lücke's Commentar, p. 351).

The third epistle is addressed to Gaius, a person otherwise unknown. It is remarkable that the writer of this epistle calls himself ὁ πρεσβύτερος, ho-pres-bu'ter-os, the elder, or presbyter. Some writers have been inclined to ascribe these letters to the presbyter John, who is sometimes spoken of in the ancient church, and to whom even the Apocalypse has been attributed; but if the presbyter John wrote these epistles, John's Gospel also must be ascribed to the same person, of whom otherwise so little is known. This, however, is inadmissible. We may suppose that the term, πρεσβύτερος, elder, expressed in the epistles of John a degree of friendliness, and was chosen on account of the advanced age of the writer. The apostle Paul, also, in his friendly letters to Philemon, abstains from the title Apostle. The circumstances and events in the church, to which the second epistle alludes, coincide with those which are otherwise known to have happened in John's congregation. Here, also, are allusions to the dangers arising from the Gnostic heresy. The admonition, in verse 10, not to receive such heretics as Christian brethren, agrees with the ancient tradition, that John made haste to quit a public bath after Cerinthus the Gnostic entered it, declaring he was afraid the building would fall down.

A. T.

JOIADA (joi'a-dä), (Heb. יוֹדָע, yo-yaw-daw', Jehovah knows), contraction of JEHOIADA (which see).

1. A high-priest of the Jews, successor to Eliashib, or Joashib, who lived under Nehemiah, B. C. about 434 (Neh. xii:10, 11, 22; xiii:28).

2. Son of Paseah, and apparently one of the chief priests. He helped to repair the Old Gate, after the captivity (Neh. iii:6).

JOIAKIM (joi'a-kim), (Heb. יוֹיָכִים, yo-yaw-keen', Jehovah sets up), a high-priest, the son of that Jeshua who, with Zerubbabel, led the first return from Babylon. His son was Eliashib (Neh. xii:10, 12, 26). Joiakim is a contraction of Jehoia-kim. (B. C. before 445.)

JOIARIB (joi'a-rīb), (Heb. יוֹיָרִיב, yo-yaw-reeb', Jehovah will contend).

1. A Shilonite, which probably means a descendant of Shelah, the son of Judah. He is named in the genealogy of Maaseiah (Neh. xi:5), B. C. 445.

2. One of those who returned from the captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii:16).

3. Founder of one of the courses of priests (Neh. xii:6). His descendants after the captivity are given in Neh. xi:10; and xii:19, B. C. 536. The name appears also in full. (See JEHOIARIB.)

JOIN (Heb. דָּבַק, daw-bak'). (1) To knit or unite together (Job xli:17). (2) To make an alliance or league (Dan. xi:6). (3) To enter into intimacy with (Acts viii:29). (4) To be reckoned with (Job iii:6).

JOINING (join'ing), (Heb. מְחַבְּרֵית, mekh-ab-ber-oth'), binders or cramps in the wall of a building (1 Chron. xxii:3).

The term is applied (1) To things; so house is joined to house, when one is added to another under the same master (Is. v:8). (2) To persons, when they are united in marriage (Eph. v:31); in affinity (2 Chron. xviii:1); in assistance (Exod. i:10); or in church fellowship (Acts ix:26); or in battle, army fighting close with army (1 Sam. iv:2). (3) To minds, when people are united in judgment and affection. To be joined to the Lord, is to be spiritually espoused to his Son, and solemnly devoted to his service (1 Cor. vi:17; Jer. 1:5). To be joined to idols, is to be firmly intent on worshiping them (Hos. iv:17). To be joined to a harlot, is to have the affections set upon her, and to commit sin with her (1 Cor. vi:16). Brown.

JOINT (Heb. מְצוּדָה, kham-mook), a wrapping.

JOINTS are, (1) The uniting of the bones in an animal body (Dan. v:6). (2) The uniting parts of a harness (2 Chron. xviii:33). Joint is employed erroneously in the A. V. (Cant. vii:1) for drowers, "a part of the female dress, which, in the case of bridal toilet, are represented as being fringed with a worked edging like lace, or a skillfully chased jewel" (McC. and S., Cyc.) It may possibly have reference to a richly embroidered girdle.

Figurative. The joints and bands which unite Christ's mystical body, are his Spirit, ordinances, and influences and their mutual relations to him, and to one another, and their graces of faith and love fixed on him, and in him loving one another (Col. ii:19; Eph. iv:16). The joints and marrow of men's hearts, are their secret dispositions, which the convincing word of God, with no small pain to them, shows and affects them with (Heb. iv:12).

JOKDEAM (jök'de-äm), (Heb. יוֹקְדֵאִים, yo-k-de-awm', burning of people), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:56). From its connection it must have been south of Hebron.

JOKIM (jō'kim), (Heb. יוֹכִים, yo-keem'), contraction of Joiakim', son of Shelah, and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. iv:22). Nothing is positively known of his history. Jerome says he was Elim-elech, the husband of Naomi (Quæst. in Paral.).

JOKMEAM (jök'me-äm), (Heb. יוֹקְמֵאִים, yo-k-meh-awm', people will be raised), a city of Ephraim, afterwards given to the Levites of Kohath's family (1 Chron. vi:68). In the parallel list in Josh. xxi:22, Kibzaim takes its place. From its mention (1 Kings iv:12) it must have been situated in the Jordan Valley on the eastern boundary of the tribe; in this passage the A. V. incorrectly writes JOKNEAM.

JOKNEAM (jök'ne-äm), (Heb. יוֹקְנֵאִים, yo-k-neh-awm', people will be lamented), a city of Zebulun, given to the Levites of Merari's family (Josh. xxi:34; xix:11), surnamed Jokneam, of Carmel (Josh. xii:22) because adjacent to that mountain. It has been identified pretty well with the modern Tell Kaimon, below the eastern termination of Carmel. The Jokneam of 1 Kings iv:12, according to all the requirements, must be an erroneous form for JOKMEAM.

JOKSHAN (jök'shan), (Heb. יוֹקְשָׁן, yo-k-shawn'; snarer or fowler), second son of Abraham and

Keturah, whose sons Sheba and Dedan appear to have been the ancestors of the Sabæans and Denanites, who peopled a part of Arabia Felix (Gen. xxv:2, 3; 1 Chron. i:32). (See ARABIA.)

JOKTAN (jök'tan), (Heb. יֶזְרְיָאֵל, yok-tawn', small).

The second of the sons of Eber, a descendant from Shem (Gen. x:25, 26, 29; 1 Chron. i:19), and the supposed progenitor of many tribes in Southern Arabia. The Arabians call him Kahtan, and recognize him as one of the principal founders of their nation. See Pocock, Spec. Hist. Arab., pp. 3, 38.) We find traces in Arabia of the names of Joktan's sons, which is a further confirmation of this opinion. These sons were Almohad, Shaleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimeel, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab (Gen. x:26, etc.). These ancient Arabians lived here without mingling with other people, till Ishmael, son of Abraham and Hagar, and his sons, settled here, who, mixing with them, were called Mos-arabes, or Mostæ-arabes, that is, mixed Arabians.

JOKTHEEL (jök'the-el), (Heb. יְהוֹאֵל, yok-the-el', veneration of God).

1. A name given by King Amaziah to the city Sela, or Petra, the capital of Arabia Petræa, when he took it from the Edomites (2 Kings xiv:7; 2 Chron. xxv:11-13). (See PETRA.)

2. There was also a city of this name in the tribe of Judah, between Mizpeh and Lachish (Josh. xv:38), possibly preserved in the ruins of Keitulanah.

JONA (jō'nà), (Gr. Ἰωνᾶ, ee-oh-nah', father of the Apostle Peter (John i:42) and hence is addressed as Simon Bar-jona (Matt. xvi:17). In John xxi:15-17 he is called Jonas, which would have been a correct form throughout.

JONADAB (jōn'a-däb), (Heb. יוֹנָדָב, yo-naw-dawb', contraction of yeh-ho-naw-dawb', יְהוֹנָדָב, Jehovah impels).

1. A nephew of David, a crafty person, whose counsel suggested to his cousin Amnon the means by which he accomplished his abominable design upon his half-sister Tamar (2 Sam. xiii:4, 5).

2. (1) Descendant of Rechab. A son or descendant of Rechab, the progenitor of those nomadic Rechabites, who held themselves bound by a vow to abstain from wine, and never to relinquish the nomadic life. The principle on which the tribe acted may be considered elsewhere. (See RECHABITES.)

(2) Head of Tribe. Jonadab was at the head of this tribe at the time when Jehu received his commission to exterminate the house of Ahab, and is supposed to have added to its ancient austerities the inhibition of wine.

(3) Relation to Jehu. He was held in great respect among the Israelites generally; and Jehu, alive to the importance of obtaining the countenance and sanction of such a man to his proceedings, took him up in his chariot, when on his road to Samaria to complete the work he had begun at Jezreel. The terms of the colloquy which took place on this occasion are rather remarkable. Perceiving Jonadab, he saluted him, and called out, 'Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?' Jonadab answered, 'It is.' Then said Jehu, 'If it be, give me thine hand.' And he gave him his hand, and was taken up into the chariot, Jehu inviting him to 'Come and see my zeal for the Lord' (2 Kings x:15-17; Jer. xxxv:6-10).

(4) Rechabites a Branch of the Kenites. It would seem that the Rechabites were a branch of the Kenites, over another branch of whom Heber was chief in the time of Deborah and Barak (Judg. iv:11, 17); and as it is expressly said that Jonadab went out to meet Jehu, it seems probable that the people of Samaria, alarmed at the menacing letter which they had received from Jehu, had induced Jonadab to go to meet and appease him on the road. His venerated character, his rank as the head of a tribe, and his neutral position, well qualified him for this mission; and it was quite as much the interest of Jonadab to conciliate the new dynasty, in whose founder he beheld the minister of the divine decrees, as it was that of Jehu to obtain his concurrence and support in proceedings which he could not but know were likely to render him odious to the people.

JONAH (jō'nah), (Heb. יוֹנָתָן, yo-naw', a dove; Sept. Ἰωνᾶς, ee-o-nas'), the fifth in order of the minor prophets.

No era is assigned to him in the book of his prophecy, yet there is little doubt of his being the same person who is spoken of in 2 Kings xiv:25. His birthplace was Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulun. Jonah flourished in or before the reign of Jeroboam II, and predicted the successful conquests, enlarged territory, and brief prosperity of the Israelitish kingdom under that monarch's sway. The oracle itself is not extant, though Hitzig has, by a novel process of criticism, amused himself with a fancied discovery of it in chaps. xv and xvi of Isaiah. (Hitzig, Des Proph. Jon. Orakel. ueber Moab Kritisch-vindicirt, etc., Heidelberg, 1831.)

(1) Ordered to Nineveh. God ordered this prophet to go to Nineveh, and warn the inhabitants of their approaching destruction. Fearing that the merciful Lord might forbear punishing them if they repented, and so seemingly tarnish his honor, Jonah fled from the presence of the Lord and embarked at Joppa for Tarshish (whether in Cilicia, Africa, or Spain, is uncertain), that, being out of the Promised Land, the spirit of prophecy might forbear to excite him.

(2) Cast Overboard. A storm quickly pursued the ship wherein he was. The heathen mariners awaked him, and required him to call on his God for deliverance. Lots being cast, to discern for whose sake the storm rose, the lot fell on Jonah. With shame he confessed his guilt to the mariners. He desired them to cast him into the sea, that the storm might be stayed. With reluctance they were at last obliged to do it, whereon the storm immediately ceased. A large fish swallowed up Jonah, and retained him safe in her belly for three days.

(3) Ejected by the Whale. There he earnestly prayed to the Lord, at whose command the fish vomited him alive on the dry land; but whether on the east end of the Syrian sea near Scanderoon we know not, though that is most probable. His orders to warn the Ninevites of their approaching destruction were immediately renewed.

(4) Warns the Ninevites. All obedient, he hastened to that vast city. He had not traveled in it above a day's journey, denouncing their ruin, when the king, whom we cannot suppose Pul, but one about fifty or sixty years earlier, and all his people, applied themselves to solemn fasting and prayer. Hereupon God forbore to execute his vengeance upon them, which had been but conditionally threatened. Displeased with the divine mercy, Jonah angrily wished to die, rather than live and see his prediction unfulfilled.

(5) The Gourd. While he sat without the city, waiting for his desired view of Nineveh's ruin, God caused a gourd to spring up quickly, to overshadow him from the scorching heat of the sun; but next day, a worm having bitten its root, it suddenly withered. The scorching sun and blasting wind vehemently beating on Jonah, he fainted, and angrily wished to die, and averred to God himself that he was right in so doing. The Lord bid him think, if he had pity on the short-lived gourd, was there not far more reason for him and their Maker to pity the penitent inhabitants of Nineveh, where were above 120,000 infants, and much cattle (Jonah i-iv).

Figurative. Did not the fate of this prophet typify our Savior, who was to be cast into the raging sea of wrath; his lying a part of three days in the grave; his glorious resurrection from the dead; and the effectual publication of the gospel to multitudes of sinners, for their everlasting salvation? JONAH, BOOK OF.

Analysis. The book of Jonah contains an account of the prophet's commission to denounce Nineveh, and of his refusal to undertake the embassy—of the method he employed to escape the unwelcome task (see TARSHISH), and the miraculous means which God used to curb his self-willed spirit, and subdue his petulant and querulous disposition. The third and fourth chapters briefly detail Jonah's fulfillment of the Divine command, and present us with another exemplification of his refractory temper.

(1) Distraction. His attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord must have sprung from a partial insanity, produced by the excitement of distracting motives in an irascible and melancholy heart. The temerity and folly of the fugitive could scarcely be credited, if they had not been equalled by future outbreaks of a similar peevish and morbid infatuation. The mind of Jonah was dark and moody, not unlike a lake which mirrors in the waters the gloomy thunderclouds which overshadow it, and flash over its sullen waves a momentary gleam.

(2) Striking History. The history of Jonah is certainly striking and extraordinary. Its characteristic prodigy does not resemble the other miraculous phenomena recorded in Scripture; yet we must believe in its literal occurrence, as the Bible affords no indication of its being a myth, allegory, or parable.

(3) Reality. On the other hand, our Savior's pointed and peculiar allusion to it is an evidence of its reality (Matt. xii:40). The opinion of the earlier Jews (Tobit xiv:4; Joseph. Antiq. ix:10, 2) is also in favor of the literality of the adventure. It requires less faith to credit this simple excerpt from Jonah's biography, than to believe the numerous hypotheses that have been invented to deprive it of its supernatural character, the great majority of them being clumsy and far-fetched, doing violence to the language, and despite to the spirit of revelation.

(4) Vindication of Reality. In vindication of the reality of this striking narrative, it may be argued that the allusions of Christ to Old Testament events on similar occasions are to actual occurrences (John iii:14; vi:48); that the purpose which God had in view justified his miraculous interposition; that this miracle must have had a salutary effect both on the minds of the Ninevites and on the people of Israel. Neither is the character of Jonah improbable. Many reasons might induce him to avoid the discharge of his prophetic duty—fear of being thought a false prophet, scorn of a foreign and hostile race, desire for their utter destruction, a false dignity which might reckon it beneath his prerogative to officiate among uncircumcised idolaters (Jahn, Introduction to the Old Testament, translated by S. Turner, pp. 372, 373, translator's notes). Some, who cannot altogether reject the reality of the narrative; suppose it to have had a historical basis, though its present form be fanciful or mythical. Such an opinion is the evident result of a mental struggle between receiving it as a real transaction or regarding it as wholly a fiction. Grimm regards it as a dream produced in that sleep which fell upon Jonah as he lay on the sides of the ship and others regard this book as an allegory.

These hypotheses are all vague and baseless, and do not merit a special refutation. Endeavoring to free us from one difficulty they plunge us into others yet more intricate and perplexing.

(5) Profane Wit. Much profane wit has been expended on the miraculous means of Jonah's deliverance, very unnecessarily and very absurdly; it is simply said, 'The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah.' Now the species of marine animal is not defined, and the Greek kaytos, kēros sea-monster, or whale, is often used to specify, not the genus whale, but any large fish or sea-monster. All objections to its being a whale which lodged Jonah in its stomach, from its straitness of throat, or rareness of haunt in the Mediterranean, are thus removed. The Scripture thus speaks only of an enormous fish, which under God's direction swallowed the prophet, and does not point out the species to which the voracious prowler belonged. Since the days of Bochart it has been a common opinion that the fish was of the shark species, or 'sea-dog' (Bochart, Op. iii:72; Calmet's Dissertation sur Jonah). Entire human bodies have been found in some fishes of this kind. The stomach, too, has no influence on any living substance admitted into it. Granting all these facts as proof of what is termed the economy of miracles, still must we say, in reference to the supernatural preservation of Jonah, is anything too hard for the Lord?

On what portion of the coast Jonah was set down in safety we are not informed. The opinions held as to the peculiar spot by rabbins and other thaumaturgic expositors need not be repeated. The prophet proceeded, on receiving a second commission, to fulfill it.

(6) Saving of the City. The fearful menace had the desired effect. The city humbled itself before God, and a respite was vouchsafed. The king (Pul, according to Usher) and his people fasted, and their penitence was accepted. The spirit of Jonah was chafed that the doom he had uttered was not executed. He retired to a station out of the city whence he might witness the threatened catastrophe. Under the shadow of a gourd prepared by God he reclined, while Jehovah taught him by the growth and speedy death of this plant, and his attachment to it, a sublime lesson of patient and forgiving generosity.

(7) A Simple Narrative. The book of Jonah is a simple narrative, with the exception of the prayer or thanksgiving in chapter ii. Its style and mode of narration are uniform. There are no traces of compilation, as Nactigall supposed; neither is the prayer, as De Wette (Einleit. 237) imagines, improperly borrowed from some other sources. That prayer contains, indeed, not only imagery peculiar to itself, but also such imagery as at once was suggested to the mind of a reverent Hebrew preserved in circumstances of extreme jeopardy. On this principle we account for the similarity of some portions of its phraseology to Ps. lix, xlii, etc. The language in both places had been hallowed by frequent usage, and had become the consecrated idiom of a distressed and succored Israelite. The hymn seems to have been composed after his deliverance, and the reason why his deliverance is noted after the hymn is recorded may be to show the occasion of its composition.

Among the numerous commentators on Jonah may be noticed Martin, Jonah's mission; King's Commentary; Pusey's Commentary; Davidson, On Prophecy, Dis. vi. pt. 2. For further literature see HABAKKUK. J. E.

JONAN (jō'nān), (Gr. 'Ἰωνάν, ee-o-nan', Jonan), son of Eliakim, in the genealogy of Christ, about the time of Jehoram (Luke iii:30).

The name is probably only another form of Jonathan, or JONATHAN.

JONAS (jō'nās), (Gr. 'Ἰωνᾶς, ee-o-nas', from the Hebrew Jonah).

1. The form of the name of the prophet Jonah (Matt. xii:39, 40, 41; xvi:4; Luke xi:29, 30, 32).

2. (John xxi:15-17) another form of JONA, which see.

JONATHAN (jōn'a-than), (Heb. יְהוֹנָתָן, yo-naw-thawn', God-given).

1. A Levite descended from Gershom, the son of Moses (Judg. xviii:30). It is, indeed, said, in our common copies, that the Gershom from whom this Jonathan sprang was 'the son of Manasseh;' but some supposed that in the name of Moses (mo-seh') the single letter (נ) has been interpolated changing it into Manasseh.

The history of this Jonathan is involved in the narrative which occupies Judges xvii, xviii; and is one of the two accounts which form a sort of appendix to that book. The events themselves appear to have occurred soon after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who outlived him, when the government was in a most unsettled state.

Jonathan, who was resident at Bethlehem, lived at a time when the dues of the sanctuary did not afford a livelihood to the numerous Levites who had a claim upon them; and belonged to a tribe destitute of the landed possessions which gave to all others a sufficient maintenance. He, therefore, went forth to seek his fortune. In Mount Ephraim he came to 'a house of gods,' which had been established by one Micah, who wanted nothing but a priest to make his establishment complete. (See MICAH.) This person engaged Jonathan as his priest for his food, a yearly suit of clothes, and ten shekels (twenty-five shillings, about $6.00), a year in money. Here he lived for some time, till the Danite spies, who were sent by their tribe to explore the north, passed this way and formed his acquaintance. When, not long after, the body of armed Danites passed the same way while going to settle near the sources of the Jordan, the spies mentioned Micah's establishment to them; on which they went and took away not only 'the ephod, the teraphim, and the graven image,' but the priest also, that they might set up the same worship in the place of which they were going to take possession. Micah vainly protested against this robbery; but Jonathan himself was glad at the improvement in his prospects, and from that time, even down to the captivity, he and his descendants continued to be priests of the Danites in the town of Laish, the name of which they changed to Dan.

There is no reason to suppose that this establishment, whether in the hands of Micah or of the Danites, involved an apostasy from Jehovah. It appears rather to have been an attempt to localize or domesticate his presence under those symbols and forms of service which were common among the neighboring nations but were forbidden to the Hebrews. The offense here was two-fold,—the establishment of a sacred ritual different from the only one which the law recognized, and the worship by symbols, naturally leading to idolatry, with the ministrations of one who could not legally be a priest, but only a Levite, and under circumstances in which no Aaronic priest could legally have officiated. It is more than likely that this establishment was eventually merged in that of the golden calf, which Jeroboam set up in this place, his choice of which may possibly have been determined by its being already in possession of 'a house of gods.'

2. Eldest Son of Saul, king of Israel, and consequently heir apparent of the throne which David was destined to occupy (1 Sam. xiv:8; 1 Chron. viii:33; ix:39). The war with the Philistines, which occupied the early part of his father's reign, afforded Jonathan more than one opportunity of displaying the chivalrous valor and the princely qualities with which he was endowed. His exploit in surprising the Philistine garrison at Michmash, attended only by his armor-bearer, is one of the most daring which history or even romance records (1 Sam. xiv:1-14). His father came to follow up this victory, and in the ensuing pursuit of the Philistines, Jonathan, spent with fatigue and hunger, refreshed himself with some wild honey which he found in a wood through which he passed. He knew not that his father had rashly vowed to put to death any one who touched a morsel of food before night. When the fact transpired, Saul felt himself bound to execute his vow even upon his gallant son; but the people, with whom the young prince was a great favorite, interposed (1 Sam. xiv:16-52).

(1) Affection for David. The act of David in meeting the challenge of Goliath, and in overcoming that huge barbarian, entirely won his heart; and from that day forward the son of Jesse found no one who loved him so tenderly, who admired his high gifts with so much enthusiasm, or who risked so much to preserve him from harm, as the very prince whom he was destined to exclude from a throne. Jonathan knew well what was to happen, and he submitted cheerfully to the appointment which gave the throne of his father to the young shepherd of Bethlehem. In the intensity of his love and confidence he shrank not to think of David as his destined king and master; and his dreams of the future pictured nothing brighter than the day in which David should reign over Israel, and he be one with him in friendship, and next to him in place and council.

When Saul began to hate David as his intended successor, he was highly displeased at the friendship which had arisen between him and his son. This exposed Jonathan to much contumely, and even to danger of life; for, once at least, the king's passion against him on this account rose so high that he cast a javelin at him 'to smite him to the wall.'

This unequivocal act taught Jonathan that the court of Saul was no safe place for David. He told him so, and they parted with many tears. David then set forth upon those wanderings among strangers and in solitary places which lasted all the time of Saul. The friends met only once more. Saul was in pursuit of David when he was in the wilderness of Ziph; and Jonathan could not forbear coming to him secretly in the wood to give him comfort and encouragement (1 Sam. xxiii:16-18). Nothing more is related of Jonathan till both he and his father lost their lives in the fatal battle of Gilboa, combating the enemies of their country.

(2) David's Lament. There is, perhaps, nothing in Hebrew poetry more beautiful and touching than the lamentation of David for the loss of his friend—nothing more complete as a whole, or more full of fine images and tender thoughts (2 Sam. i:17, sq.).

(3) Character. Jealousy and every mean or low feeling were strangers to the generous heart of Jonathan. Valiant and accomplished himself, none knew better how to acknowledge valor and accomplishment in others. He is one of the loveliest personages in Bible history.

3. The son of Abiathar, the high-priest, who gave notice to Adonijah and his party, near the fountain of Rogel, that David had declared Solomon his successor (1 Kings i:42, 43). At the time of David's flight from Absalom he accompanied his father as far as Olivet (2 Sam. xv:36; xvii:15-21). He also appears as a swift and trusted messenger. (B. C. 1000.)

4. Jonathan, or Johanan, or John, high-priest of the Jews, son of Jehoiada, and father of Jeddo, or Jaddus, celebrated in the time of Alexander the Great (Neh. xii:11). He lived under Ezra and Nehemiah. He died, after having exercised the high-priesthood thirty-two years, and was succeeded by Jeddo, his son.

5. Son of Shammah, or Shimea, brother of Jonadab, and nephew of David, (2 Sam. xxi:21; 1 Chron. xx:7). He was gifted with both civil and military prowess, and slew a giant Philistine.

6. Son of Shage the Hararite, and one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi:34; 2 Sam. xxiii:32).

7. A son of Adin, whose representative, Ebed, returned with Ezra as the leader of fifty males (Ezra viii:6), B. C. 457.

8. Son of Asahel, and one of the four priests who assisted Ezra in the investigation of the foreign marriages that had been contracted in Babylon (Ezra x:15), B. C. 457.

9. A priest in the days of Joiakim, son of Jeshua. He represented the family of Melicu (Neh. xii:14), B. C. 549.

10. The brother of Johanan, the son of Kareah; they were associated in their intercourse with the Babylonian governor (Jer. xl:8), B. C. 588.

11. Father of Zechariah, who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:35).

12. Second of the two sons of Jada and grandson of Jerahmeel, of the family of Judah (1 Chron. ii:32, 33), B. C. after 1612.

13. A scribe and keeper of the prisons in Jerusalem under Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvii:15, 20). He was very severe to the prophet Jeremiah, who therefore earnestly desired Zedekiah that he might not be sent back into that dungeon, where his life was in danger. (B. C. 589.)

JONATH-ELEM-RECHOKIM (jō'nath-ē'lem-re-kō'kim), (Heb. יֹנָתָן־אֵלֶם־רֶחֳקִים, yo-nath'ay'lem-rekh-o-keem'), "To the tune of 'The silent dove of those afar'"), the heading of Ps. lvi. There have been many attempts to explain this title, but Aben Ezra seems to come the nearest to the meaning in his explanation that Jonath Elem Rechokim indicates the rhythm of the psalm; i. e., "after the melody of the Psalm" which begins Jonath Elem Rechokim.

JOPPA (jōp'pā), (Heb. יָוֵפָא, or יָוֵפָא, yaw-fo', beauty; Gr. Ἰόππη, ee-op'hay, which name is still preserved in the Arabic Yāfa or Jaffa), a seaport town and haven on the coast of Palestine, situated on an eminence, in a sandy soil, about forty miles northwest of Jerusalem, and nine miles west-northwest from Ramleh.

(1) Location. The place existed when the Israelites invaded the land of Canaan, and is mentioned as lying on the border of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix:46). Joppa was the only port possessed by the Israelites till Herod formed the harbor at Cæsarea; and hence it was here that the timber from Lebanon destined for both the first and second temples was landed (1 Kings v:9; 2 Chron. ii:16; Ezra iii:7). It was the place to which Jonah went in expectation of finding a ship bound on some distant voyage, and where he found one going to Tarshish (Jonah i:3). Joppa belonged to the powers which were successively dominant on this shore; and it does not again appear in Jewish history till the time of Judas Maccabæus, when the inhabitants having, contrary to the faith of treaties, thrown 200 Jews into the sea, the hero, to avenge them, surprised the haven by night, and set the shipping on fire (2 Macc. xii:3-7).

(2) Visit of Peter. It is mentioned in the New Testament only in connection with the visit of the Apostle Peter, who here raised Tabitha from the dead, and lodged in the outskirts of the town with Simon the tanner, when favored with the vision which taught him to 'call no man common or unclean' (Acts ix:36-39; x:5, 8; xi:5).

(3) History. During the Jewish war Joppa was taken by surprise by Cestius, when it was plundered and burnt, and 8,400 of the inhabitants were put to the sword (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii. 18, 10). Its ruins afterwards became the refuge of a great number of persons who had escaped from the destruction of other cities by Vespasian, and who took to piracy for a subsistence. From the first crusade down to our own day Joppa has been the landing-place of pilgrims going to Jerusalem, and is hence mentioned in almost all the innumerable itineraries and books of travels in the Holy Land which have appeared in different languages. There is still here an hospital for pilgrims, dependent on the convent of St. Salvador in Jerusalem, and occupied by Spanish monks. In 1797 the place was taken by storm by the French army under Napoleon, and was sacked without mercy; when the Turkish prisoners, to the number of 500 or 600, were carried to the neighboring sand-hills and put to death by his order.

Josephus describes the natural unfitness of Jaffa for a haven in terms very similar to those which modern travelers employ (De Bell. Jud. iii. 9, 3). The port is so dangerous, from exposure to the open sea, that the surf often rolls in with the utmost violence, and even so lately as 1842 a lieutenant and some sailors were lost in pulling to the shore from an English steamer that lay in the harbor (Stent's Egypt and the Holy Land, ii:28).

But, however bad, it was the only port which existed within reach of the important district which lay behind it inland; and the miserable state of the ancient roads, or rather perhaps the absence of any roads, made a near harbor, however inconvenient, of more immediate consequence than a good one at a greater distance.

(4) Modern Condition. The town is approached on the land side through rich and extensive gardens and orchards, and is very picturesquely situated upon an eminence or promontory, which is crowned by a castle. It chiefly faces the north; and the buildings appear, from the steepness of the site, as if standing upon one another. The most prominent features of the architecture from without are the flattened domes by which most of the buildings are surmounted, and the appearance of arched vaults. The aspect of the whole is mean and gloomy, and inside the place has all the appearance of a poor though large village. There are no public buildings to engage the eye, and the houses are mean and comfortless. No ancient ruins have been observed, nor are any expected to be in a place so often destroyed in war. There are three mosques in Joppa, and Latin, Greek and Armenian convents. The former is that in which European pilgrims and travelers usually lodge. The town still enjoys a considerable trade with the neighboring coasts. Its chief manufacture is soap, which is largely consumed in the baths of Cairo and Damascus; and its excellent fruits are exported in large quantities, especially watermelons, which are very extensively cultivated here and in other parts of the plain of Sharon. The inhabitants are said not to exceed 4,000, of whom one-fourth are reckoned to be Christians. A British consul is now resident in the place. (Raumer's Palästina; Volney, i:136, sq.; Chateaubriand, ii:103; Clarke, iv:438, sq.; Buckingham, i:227, sq.; Richter, p. 12; Richardson, ii:16; Skinner, i:175-184; Robinson, i:18; Stent, ii:27; Thomson, Land and Book, ii:273.)

JORAH (jō'rah), (Heb. יֹרָחַ, yo-raw', sprinkling), one of the descendants of Jorah, who to the number of one hundred and twelve returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra ii:18). In Neh. vii:24 their place is taken by the Bene-Hariph, which is probably only a variation caused by a slight confusion of letters (B. C. about 536).

JORAI (jō'ra-i), (Heb. יֹרָי, yo-rah'ee, rainy, same as JORAH), a Gadite who dwelt in Gilead of Bashan. His genealogies were recorded in the time of Jotham of Judah (1 Chron. v:13), B. C. about 782.

JORAM (jō'ram), (Heb. יֹרָם, yo-rarum', a shortened form of JEHORAM (which see).

1. The ninth king of Israel, son of Ahab, and successor to his elder brother Ahaziah, who died childless. He began to reign B. C. 896, and reigned twelve years (2 Kings i:17; iii:1). Joram adhered to the sinful policy of Jeroboam in the matter of the golden calves; but, although his mother Jezebel was still alive, he discontinued the dark idolatries of Baal which she had introduced and maintained at such high cost of guilt and blood to the nation.

(1) Revolt of Moabites. The Moabites had been tributary to the crown of Israel since the separation of the two kingdoms. But King Mesha deemed the defeat and death of Ahab so heavy a blow to the power of Israel that he might safely assert his independence. He accordingly did so, by withholding his tribute of '100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams, with the wool.' The short reign of Ahaziah had afforded no opportunity for any operations against the revolters; but the new king hastened to reduce them again under the yoke they had cast off. The good king of Judah, Jehoshaphat, was too easily induced to take a part in the war. He perhaps feared that the example of Moab, if allowed to be successful, might seduce into a similar course his own tributary, the king of Edom, whom he now summoned to join in this expedition. The deliverance of the allies from perishing for lack of water, and the signal overthrow of the Moabites at the word of Elisha, have been already described under ELISHA and JEHOSHAPHAT.

(2) Benhadad. After this a more redoubtable enemy, Benhadad, king of Syria, occupied for a long time the attention and strength of the king. In the sacred records the more striking events of this war seem to be recorded for the sake of showing forth the great acts of Elisha, and they have therefore been related under his name. It suffices here to indicate that they consisted in the Syrian king being constrained to terminate one campaign in consequence of all his plans being made known by the prophet to the king of Israel (2 Kings vi:1-23); and in the deliverance of Samaria, according to the prediction of the prophet, from a horrible famine, caused by the city being besieged by the Syrians (2 Kings vi:24-33; vii). An interval of the war also afforded occasion for the remarkable cure of Naaman, the Syrian leper, by the same prophet (2 Kings v), one of the striking incidents of Old Testament history. (See NAAMAN.)

(3) Hazael. After the death of Benhadad, Joram found a new and active enemy in his murderer and successor Hazael. During the illness of Benhadad, the king of Israel seems to have employed himself in strengthening his eastern frontier against the Syrians, and in fortifying Ramoth-Gilead, which had fallen into his hands, and in the attempt to recover which from the Syrians his father had perished. This strong fortress thenceforth became the headquarters of the operations beyond the river. Hazael was scarcely settled on the throne before he took arms and marched against Ramoth, in the environs of which the Israelites sustained a defeat, and the king was wounded. He returned to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds, leaving the army in charge of Jehu, one of his ablest and most active generals. It was in this interval that Jehu was anointed king of Israel by the messenger of Elisha, and immediately proceeded to Jezreel to fulfill his commission to exterminate the house of Ahab. The king, who went forth from the city to meet him when the watchman on the tower of Jezreel announced his approach, was slain under the circumstances described in the article JEHU; and Ahaziah, the king of Judah, who was at Jezreel on a visit to his sick cousin, shared his fate (B. C. 884). With Joram ended the dynasty of Ahab, which reigned forty-four years in Israel (2 Kings viii:25-29; ix:1-20).

2. King of Judah (2 Kings viii:21, 23, 24; 1 Chron. iii:11; 2 Chron. xxii:5, 7; Matt. i:8). (See JEHORAM.)

3. One of the priests sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the cities of Judah in the law of Moses (2 Chron. xvii:8).

4. A Levite, ancestor of Shelomith, who lived in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi:25).

5. A messenger sent by his father, King Toi, of Hamath, to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii:10), B. C. about 986. (See HADORAM, 2.)

JORDAN, RIVER OF (jör'dan), (Hebrew generally with article יַרְדֵּן, hah-yar-dane', the descender, probably from the rapid descent of the stream), the great river of Palestine, as the Nile is of Egypt.

(1) Name. The name "Jordan" is always joined with the article in the Old Testament, with two exceptions (Ps. xlii:6; Job xl:23). The Arabs call it esh-Sheriah, or the watering-place." A tradition as old as St. Jerome, A. D. 400, says that the Jordan derived its name from two rivers, the Jor, rising at Banias, and the Dan, rising at Tell el-Kadi. But this tradition seems to be erroneous; for, according to Gen. xiii:10, the river was known to Abraham as the Jordan long before the children of Dan gave their name to Leshem (Josh. xix:47), or Laish (Judg. xviii:29).

(2) Sources. The Jordan rises among the mountains of Anti-Lebanon, and has four sources: (1) The Hasbâny, which issues from the large fountain 'Ain Furar, near Hasbeya, at an altitude of 1,700 feet above the sea. This pool, which the natives say is 1,000 feet deep, Macgregor found to have a depth of 11 feet. (2) The Banias, which rises near the ruins of Banias (Cæsarea-Philippi), at the base of Mount Hermon, 1,140 feet above the sea-level. (3) The Leddân rising in a large fountain on the west side of the Tell el-Kadi ("hill of the judge," the site of the city of Dan). In the midst of a thicket of oleander bushes is a large pool, 50 or 60 yards wide, with the water bubbling out of the ground in a full-grown stream. This, which Josephus calls the Little Jordan, is the most copious source. (4) The Esh-Shar, a minor tributary, only one or two yards broad. Besides the above four sources, there are numerous small streams from the springs of Lebanon which find their way into the swamp above Lake Huleh, and contribute to swell the Jordan.

(3) Course of the Stream. After flowing twelve miles through the valley, it enters a dark defile of six or seven miles, thence through a marsh ten miles, and coming out into the beautiful Lake Merom or Huleh. Taking a south course twelve miles further on it enters the sea of Galilee. Issuing from its southwest corner it flows on some sixty miles till it empties into the Dead Sea.

(4) The Plains of the Jordan. The popular notion that the waters of the river do not seem to mingle with those of the lake, but pass through in a united stream, is a "fable." From the Sea of Tiberias to the Dead Sea there is one deep depression, the hills from the east and west nearly meeting in many places. This depression is filled up to a certain level with an alluvial deposit, forming a vast plain called the Jordan valley, or Ghôr (the hollow). This is the "upper plain." It varies in width from one to twelve miles. The river has cut out for itself a plain lower than the preceding by some 50 to 100 feet, and from a quarter of a mile to a mile wide. This is the "lower plain," through which the river, some 60 yards wide, winds its way. During the spring floods this lower plain is inundated. Although the distance in a straight line between Tiberias and the Dead Sea is only 66 miles, the actual distance the stream flows, on account of its many windings, is 200 miles, and the fall 667 feet. Twenty-seven threatening rapids were counted by Lieut. Lynch, besides many others of minor importance. The whole distance from the sources of the river to its mouth is not more than 136 miles in a straight line. The whole descent is 2,999 feet to the Dead Sea, which, according to the latest determination of the British survey, is 1,292 feet below sea-level, although Lynch had reported it at 1,317 feet. (See SALT SEA.) The width of the stream varies from 45 to 180 feet, and its depth from three to twelve feet.

(5) Tributaries. The only living tributaries to the Jordan noticed particularly below Gennesaret were the Yarmûk (Hieromax) and the Zerka (Jabbok). The mouth of the former of these was passed on the third day, 40 yards wide, with moderate current, while the latter, whose course became visible on the seventh day, was, on the eighth day, discovered to have two distinct outlets into the main stream, one of which was then dry. Older writers had distinguished two beds and banks of the Jordan; the first, that occupied by the river in its normal state; the second, comprising the space which it occupied during its swelling or overflow (Martiniere, Dict. Geograph. s. v). Similarly Lieut. Lynch has remarked: "There are evidently two terraces to the Jordan, and through the lower one the river runs its serpentine course. From the stream, above the immediate banks, there is, on each side, a singular terrace of low hills, like truncated cones, which is the bluff terminus of an extended table-land, reaching quite to the mountains of Hauran on the eastern and the high hills on the western side" (Narrat., April 3, and comp. what Capt. Newbold says, p. 22).

(6) Bridges and Fords. There are no bridges over the Jordan to which an earlier date has been assigned than that of the Roman occupation; and there are vestiges of Roman roads in different parts of the country—between Nâbulus and Beisân, for instance—that may well have crossed these bridges. The Saracens afterwards added to their number, or restored those which they found in ruins. Thus the bridge called el-Ghujan over the Hashbeiya has two pointed arches and one round (Newbold, p. 13), while the entire architecture of the Jisr Benât Ya'Kôb (of the daughters of Jacob), two and one-half miles to the south of Little Huleh, as well as of the khan adjacent to it on the eastern side, is pronounced to be Saracenic (same, p. 20). A Roman bridge of ten arches, Jisr Semakh, spans the Jordan near the village bearing that name, and was doubtless on the route from Tiberias and Tarichea to Gadara and Decapolis (Newbold, p. 21; Irby, p. 90). Lastly, the bridge of Mejâmich, which crosses the Jordan about six miles from the Lake of Gennesaret, was Saracenic; while that near the ford, Dâmich, was more Roman (Newbold, p. 20, and Lynch, Narr., April 16.)

There are four principal fords over the river: the lower one, opposite Jericho, near the famous bathing place of the pilgrims; another, eastward of Sakut; and two others, nearer the Sea of Galilee. At low water there are many other points at which the river might be easily forded, and the British Survey discovered evidences of various fords. During the floods the Arabs are frequently obliged to swim their horses across the river.

(7) Climate and Vegetation. The great depression of the Jordan valley gives to it a semi-tropical character. "In its natural products it stands unique, a tropical oasis sunk in the temperate zone." Under the intense heat vegetation advances with wonderful rapidity, but is as quickly scorched whenever the water supply is not abundant.

(8) Scripture Reference and History. There is no regular description of the Jordan to be met with in Holy Scripture, and it is only by putting scattered notices of it together that we can give the general idea which runs through the Bible respecting it.

The earliest of these allusions is not so much to the river itself as to the plain or plains which it traversed: "Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, . . . even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt" (Gen. xiii:10). Abram had just left Egypt (xii:10-20), and therefore the comparison between the fertilizing properties of the Jordan and of the Nile is very apposite, though it has since been pushed much too far, as we shall see. We may suppose Lot to have had his view from one of the summits of those hills that run north in the direction of Scythopolis (B. J., iv:7, Sec. 2), bounding the plains of Jordan on the west; for Lot and Abram were now sojourning between Bethel and Ai (Gen. xiii:3).

Red Sea, where the intermediate agency of a strong east wind is freely admitted (Exod. xiv:21), it is here said, in terms equally explicit, not only that the river was then unusually full of water, but that "the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap . . . while those that came down toward the sea of the plain . . . failed and were cut off," as soon as ever "the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water" (Josh. iii:15, 16). That it happened in harvest time is seen also from chapter v:10-12. Among those who crossed over the Jordan were Gideon, "faint yet pursuing" after Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. viii:4, 5); the Ammonites, invading Judah (Judg. x:9); Abner, in flight (2 Sam. ii:29); David in flight (2 Sam.

How far the plain extended in length or breadth is not said; other passages speak of "Jordan and his border" (Josh. xiii:27), "the borders of Jordan" (xxii:11), and "the plains of Jericho" (iv:13; comp. 2 Kings xxv:5); all evidently subdivisions of the same idea, comprehending the east bank equally with the west (Josh. xiii:27).

One of the fords we have mentioned undoubtedly witnessed the first recorded passage of the Jordan in the Old Testament; we say recorded, because there can be little dispute but that Abraham must have crossed it likewise. But only the passage of Jacob is mentioned, and that in remarkable language: "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands" (Gen. xxxii:10, and Jabbok in connection with it, verse 22). And Jordan was next crossed—over against Jérico—by Joshua the son of Nun, at the head of the descendants of the twelve sons of him who signaled the first passage. The magnitude of their operations may be inferred from the fact, that—of the children of Reuben and of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh only—"about 40,000 prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle." . . . (Josh. iv:12 and 13.)

The ceremonial of this second crossing is too well known to need recapitulation. It may be observed, however, that, unlike the passage of the xvii:22), and returning to his capital (xix:15, 18) (mention is here made of a ferry-boat, probably only a raft, the only time in Scripture); David, to war with the Syrians; Absalom, in pursuit of his father (2 Sam. xvii:24); Elijah and Elisha, parting the waters with the mantle (2 Kings ii:6-14). As two and a half tribes of Israel dwelt east of the river, the amount of crossing and recrossing must have been considerable, and the best fords were well known (comp. Josh. ii:7; Judg. iii:28; vii:24; xii:5, 6). The river was known to Job (Job xl:23), and Jeremiah speaks of "the swelling of Jordan" (Jer. xii:5; xlix:19; l:44). Noteworthy miracles, in addition to those already mentioned, were the curing of Naaman (2 Kings v:14), and the making the iron to swim (vi:6).

The Jordan is mentioned about 180 times in the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is mentioned 15 times. The chief events noted in connection with it in the New Testament are John's baptism of the multitudes (Matt. iii:6), and especially his baptism of Jesus (Mark i:9). In commemoration of this latter event it is the custom for Christian pilgrims in great numbers to bathe in the Jordan not far from Jericho at Easter.

The Jordan has been several times navigated in a boat in modern times—by Costigan, 1835; by

Molyncaux, 1847; by Lieut. Lynch, 1848; by J. Macgregor (Rob Roy), 1869. "The sight of the Jordan," says Schaff, "is rather disappointing. It bears no comparison in majesty and beauty to the great rivers of Europe and America. Naaman thought the clear rivers of his native Damascus far superior, yet the Abana and Pharpar could not wash away his leprosy. Its chief importance is historic. In this respect the Jordan surpasses the Hudson and the Mississippi, the Rhine and the Danube, and even the Nile. It marks the termination of the wanderings of the children of Israel from the banks of the Nile, and the beginning of their history as an independent nation in their own home. It blends the memories of the old and new Covenants as the culmination of John's testimony and the inauguration of Christ's kingdom."—Through Bible Lands, p. 209. "Surely," says Macgregor, "the Jordan is by far the most wonderful stream on the face of the earth, and the memories of its history will not be forgotten in heaven."—Rob Roy on the Jordan, p. 406. It is a sacred stream alike to Jew, Ishmaelite, Christian, and Mohammedan, and in this surpasses in interest any other river in the world (Schaff Bib. Dict.). (See PALESTINE.)

JORDAN, VALLEY OF (jôr'dan), (Heb. אֲרָבָה, ar-aw-baw'; rendered "the plain," Josh. xviii:18, marg., "the champaign," Deut. xi:30, "the desert," Ezek. xlvii:18). Its modern name is El Ghor. (See JORDAN, RIVER OF.)

JORIM (jô'rim), (Gr. Ἰωρὶμ, ee-o-rime'), given in the genealogies of Christ as the son of Matthat (Luke iii:29), in the 13th generation from David, or about the time of Ahaz. The name should probably be Joram or Jojarim.

JORKOAM (jôr'ko-âm), (Heb. יֹרְקָאִם, yor-keh-awm', scattered people), either a descendant of Caleb; or, according to Jarchi, the name of a place in the tribe of Judah, of which Raham was prince (1 Chron. ii:44).

JOSABAD (jôs'a-bäd), (Heb. יוֹזָבָד, yo-zaw-bawd', Jehovah endowed), properly JOZABAD, a Gederathite, one of the warriors of Benjamin who left Saul and came over to David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii:4), B. C. before 1,000.

JOSAPHAT (jôs'a-phät), (Gr. Ἰωσαφάτ, ee-os-ah-fat', Matt. i:8, King of Judah). See JEHOSEPHAT.

JOSE (jô'se), (Gr. Ἰωσή, ee-oh-say, Luke iii:29), an incorrect form of JOSES (which see).

JOSEDECH (jôs'e-dek), (Heb. יְהוֹסֵדֵךְ, yeh-ho-tsaw-dawk', justified by Jehovah, Zech. vi:11; Hag. i:1, 12, 14; ii:2, 4), father of Jeshua. Elsewhere the name appears as Josedec (1 Esdr. v:5, 48, etc.).

JOSEPH (jô'séf), (Heb. יוֹסֵף, yo-safe, increaser, adding).

1. Son of Jacob and Rachel, born under peculiar circumstances, as may be seen in Gen. xxx:24; on which account, and because he was the son of his old age (xxxvii:3), he was beloved by his father more than were the rest of his children, though Benjamin, as being also a son of Jacob's favorite wife, Rachel, was in a peculiar manner dear to the patriarch. The partiality evinced towards Joseph by his father excited jealousy on the part of his brethren, the rather that they were born of different mothers (xxxvii:2).

(1) Hated by His Brothers. Joseph had reached his seventeenth year, having hitherto been engaged in boyish sports, or aiding in pastoral duties, when some conduct on the part of the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives, seems to have been such as in the opinion of Joseph to require the special attention of Jacob, to whom, accordingly, he communicated the facts. This regard to virtue, and this manifestation of filial fidelity, greatly increased his brothers' dislike, who henceforth hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him' (xxxvii:4). Their aversion, however, was carried to the highest pitch when Joseph acquainted them with two dreams, which appeared to indicate that Joseph would acquire preëminence in the family, if not sovereignty; and while even his father rebuked him, his brothers were filled with envy. Jacob, however, was not aware of the depth of their ill will; so that on one occasion, having a desire to hear intelligence of his sons, who were pasturing their flocks at a distance, he did not hesitate to make Joseph his messenger for that purpose. His appearing in view of his brothers was the signal for their malice to gain head. They began to devise means for his immediate destruction, which they would unhesitatingly have effected but for his half-brother, Reuben, who, as the eldest son, might well be the party to interfere on behalf of Joseph.

(2) Cast Into a Pit. A compromise was entered into, in virtue of which the youth was stripped of the distinguishing vestments which he owed to his father's affection, and cast into a pit. Having performed this evil deed, and while they were taking refreshment, the brothers beheld a caravan of Arabian merchants, who were bearing the spices and aromatic gums of India down to the well-known and much-frequented mart, Egypt. Judah on this feels a bitter emotion arise in his mind, and proposes that, instead of allowing Joseph to perish, they should sell him to the merchants, whose trade obviously from this embraced human beings as well as spicery.

(3) Sold Into Slavery. Accordingly the unhappy young man was sold for a slave, to be conveyed by his masters into Egypt. While on his way thither, Reuben returned to the pit, intending to rescue his brother, and convey him safely back to their father. Joseph was gone. On which Reuben went to the wicked young men, who, not content with selling a brother into slavery, determined to punish their father for his partiality towards the unoffending sufferer. With this view they dipped Joseph's party-colored garment in the blood of a kid and sent it to Jacob, in order to make him believe that his favorite child had been torn to pieces by some wild beast. The trick succeeded, and Jacob was grieved beyond measure.

Meanwhile the merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the royal guard, who was a native of the country.

(4) Member of Potiphar's Household. In Potiphar's house Joseph enjoyed the highest confidence and the largest prosperity. The Hebrew race have always been remarkable for personal beauty, of which Joseph seems to have had an unusual share. This fact explains, if it cannot palliate, the conduct of Potiphar's wife, who tried every means to bring the uncontaminated and pure-minded youth to fulfill her unchaste desires. Foiled in her evil wishes, she resolved to punish Joseph, who thus a second time innocently brings on himself the vengeance of the ill-disposed. Charged with the very crime to which he had in vain been tempted, he is, with a fickleness characteristic of Oriental lords, at once cast into the state prison.

(5) Imprisonment. The narrative states, however, that Joseph was not left without special aid, in consequence of which he gained favor with the keeper of the prison to such an extent that everything was put under his direction.

Two regal officers, the chief of the butlers and the chief of the bakers, had, while in prison with Joseph, each one a dream, which Joseph interpreted correctly. The butler, whose fate was auspicious, promised the young Hebrew to employ his influence to procure his restoration to the free air of day; but when again in the enjoyment of his 'butlership,' he 'forgot' Joseph (Gen. xl). Pharaoh himself, however, had two dreams, which found in Joseph a successful expounder; for the butler remembered the skill of his prison companion, and advised his royal master to put it to the test in his own case. Pharaoh's dream, as interpreted by Joseph, foreboded the approach of a seven years' famine; to abate the evils of which Joseph recommended that some 'discreet and wise' man should be chosen and set in full power over the land of Egypt. The monarch was alarmed, and called a council of his advisers.

(6) Dictator. The wisdom of Joseph was recognized as of divine origin and supereminent value; and the king and his ministers (whence it appears that the Egyptian monarchy—at Memphis—was not despotic, but constitutional) resolved that Joseph should be made (to borrow a term from Rome) Dictator in the approaching time of need.

The highest honors were conferred upon him, and he was made ruler over all the land of Egypt. Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah ('savior of the world;' comp. Jablonski, Opusc. i:207, sq.; and he gave him to wife Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On. And 'Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt' (Gen. xli:39, sq.).

Seven years of abundance afforded Joseph opportunity to carry into effect such plans as secured an ample provision against the seven years of need. The famine came, but it found a prepared people. The visitation did not depend on any mere local causes, for 'the famine was over all the face of the earth,' 'and all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn' (verses 56, 57).

(7) Coming of the Sons of Jacob. Among these customers appeared ten brethren, sons of the Hebrew Jacob. They had of necessity to appear before Joseph, whose license for the purchase of corn was indispensable. Joseph had probably expected to see them, and he seems to have formed a deliberate plan of action. His conduct has brought on him the always ready charges of those who would rather impeach than study the Bible, and even friends of that sacred book have hardly in this case done Joseph full justice (Niemeyer, Charakt., ii:366; Heuser, Diss. non inhumaniter sed prudentissime Josephum cum fratribus fecisse, Hal. 1773). Joseph's main object appears to have been to make his brothers feel and recognize their guilt in their conduct towards him. For this purpose suffering, then as well as now, was indispensable.

Accordingly Joseph feigned not to know his brothers, charged them with being spies, threatened them with imprisonment, and allowed them to return home to fetch their younger brother, as a proof of their veracity, only on condition that one of them should remain behind in chains, with a prospect of death before him should not their words be verified.

Then it was, and not before, that 'they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul and would not hear; therefore is this disress come upon us. And Reuben said, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required' (xlii:21). On which, after weeping bitterly, he by common agreement bound his brother Simeon, and left him in custody.

(8) Second Visit. At length Jacob consents to Benjamin's going in company with his brothers, and provided with a present consisting of balm, honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds, and with double money in their hands (double, in order that they might repay the sum which Joseph had caused to be put into each man's sack at their departure, if, as Jacob supposed, 'it was an oversight'), they went again down to Egypt and stood before Joseph (xliii:15); and there, too, stood Benjamin, Joseph's beloved brother. The required pledge of truthfulness was given. If it is asked why such a pledge was demanded, since the giving of it caused pain to Jacob, the answer may be thus: Joseph knew not how to demean himself towards his family until he ascertained its actual condition. That knowledge he could hardly be certain he had gained from the mere words of men who had spared his life for the express purpose of selling him into slavery. How had these wicked men behaved towards his venerable father? His beloved brother Benjamin, was he safe? or had he suffered from their jealousy and malice the worse fate with which he himself had been threatened? Nothing but the sight of Benjamin could answer these questions and resolve these doubts.

Benjamin had come, and immediately a natural change took place in Joseph's conduct; the brother began to claim his rights in Joseph's bosom. Jacob was safe, and Benjamin was safe. Joseph's heart melted at the sight of Benjamin; 'And he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay and make ready, for these men shall dine with me at noon' (xliii:16). But guilt is always the ready parent of fear. Accordingly the brothers expected nothing but being reduced to slavery. When taken to their own brother's house, they imagined they were being entrapped. A colloquy ensued between them and Joseph's steward, whence it appeared that the money put into their sacks, to which they now attributed their peril, was in truth a present from Joseph, designed, after his own brotherly manner, to aid his family in their actual necessities. Noon came, and with it Joseph, whose first question regarded home: 'He asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? is he yet alive? And he lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son!' 'And Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother, and he sought where to weep, and he entered into his chamber and wept there.' Does this look like harshness?

(9) Egyptian Customs. The connection brings into view an Egyptian custom, which is of more than ordinary importance, in consequence of its being adopted in the Jewish polity; 'And they set on (food) for him by himself (Joseph), and for them by themselves (the brethren), and for the Egyptians which did eat with them, by themselves; because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination with the Egyptians' (verse 32). This passage is also interesting, as proving that Joseph had not, in his princely grandeur, become ashamed of his origin, nor consented to receive adoption into a strange nation; he was still a Hebrew, waiting, like Moses after him, for the proper season to use his power for the good of his own people.

Other customs appear in this interesting narrative: 'And they (the brothers) sat before him (Joseph), the first-born according to his birth-right, and the youngest according to his youth.' And he sent messes (delicacies) unto them from before him; but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs' (Gen. xliii:32, 33). Fear had now given place to wonder, and wonder at length issued in joy and mirth (comp. verses 18, 33, 34). Thus ended the second act in the drama. Another now opens.

(10) The Silver Cup. Joseph, apparently with a view to ascertain how far his brethren were faithful to their father, hit upon a plan which would in its issue serve to show whether they would make any, and what, sacrifice, in order to fulfill their solemn promise of restoring Benjamin in safety to Jacob. Accordingly he orders not only that every man's money (as before) should be put in his sack's mouth, but also that his 'silver cup, in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he divineth,' should be put in the sack's mouth of the youngest. The brethren leave, but are soon overtaken by Joseph's steward, who charges them with having surreptitiously carried off this costly and highly-valued vessel. They on their part vehemently repel the accusation, adding, 'with whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen.' A search is made, and the cup is found in Benjamin's sack. Accordingly they return to the city. And now comes the hour of trial: Would they purchase their own liberation by surrendering Benjamin? After a most touching interview, in which they prove themselves worthy and faithful, Joseph declares himself unable any longer to withstand the appeal of natural affection. On this occasion Judah, who is the spokesman, shows the deepest regard to his aged father's feelings, and entreats for the liberation of Benjamin even at the price of his own liberty. In the whole of literature we know of nothing more simple, natural, true, and impressive (xlv).

(11) Revelation of Identity. Most natural and impressive is the scene also which ensues, in which Joseph, after informing his brethren who he was, and inquiring, first of all, 'Is my father alive?' expresses feelings free from the slightest taint of revenge, and even shows how, under Divine Providence, the conduct of his brothers had issued in good—'God sent me before you to preserve a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance.' Five years had yet to ensue in which 'there would be neither earing nor harvest,' and therefore the brethren were directed to return home and bring Jacob down to Egypt with all speed. 'And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover, he kissed all his brethren and wept upon them; and after that his brethren talked with him' (xlv:14, 15).

The news of these striking events was carried to Pharaoh, who being pleased with Joseph's conduct, gave directions that Jacob and his family should come forthwith into Egypt. The brethren departed, being well provided for—'And to his father Joseph sent ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way.'

(12) Jacob Goes Down to Egypt. The intelligence which they bore to their father was of such a nature that 'Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.' When, however, he had recovered from the thus naturally told effects of his surprise, the venerable patriarch said, 'Enough; Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die' (xlv:26, 28).

Accordingly Jacob and his family, to the number of threescore and ten souls, go down to Egypt, and by the express efforts of Joseph are allowed to settle in the district of Goshen, where Joseph met his father: 'And he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.' There Joseph 'nourished his father and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families' (xlvii:12).

(13) Distress in Egypt. Meanwhile the predicted famine was pauperizing Egypt. The inhabitants found their money exhausted, and their cattle and substance all gone, having been parted with in order to purchase food from the public granaries, until at length they had nothing to give in return for sustenance but themselves. 'Buy us'—they then imploringly said to Joseph—'and our land for bread, and we and our land will be slaves unto Pharaoh.' 'And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, so the land became Pharaoh's.' The people too, 'Joseph removed to cities from one end of the borders of the land to the other end.' Religion, however, was too strong to submit to these political and social changes, and so the priests still retained their land, being supplied with provisions out of the common store gratuitously. The land, which was previously the people's own, was now let to them on a tenancy, at the rent of one-fifth of the produce; the land of the priests being exempted.

(14) Death of Jacob. Joseph had now to pass through the mournful scenes which attend on the death and burial of a father. Having had Jacob embalmed, and seen the rites of mourning fully observed, the faithful and affectionate son—leave being obtained of the monarch—proceeded into the land of Canaan, in order, agreeably to a promise which the patriarch had exacted, to lay the old man's bones with those of his fathers, in 'the field of Ephron the Hittite.' Having performed with long and bitter mourning Jacob's funeral rites, Joseph returned into Egypt. The last recorded act of his life forms a most becoming close. After the death of their father, his brethren, unable, like all guilty people, to forget their criminality, and characteristically finding it difficult to think that Joseph had really forgiven them, grew afraid now they were in his power that he would take an opportunity of inflicting some punishment on them. They accordingly go into his presence, and in imploring terms and an abject manner, entreat his forgiveness. 'Fear not'—this is his noble reply—'I will nourish you and your little ones.'

(15) Death of Joseph.* Joseph lived an hundred and ten years, kind and gentle in his affections to the last; for we are told, 'The children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees' (1:23). And so having obtained a promise from his brethren that when the time came, as he assured them it would come, that God should visit them, and 'bring them unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac,

*NOTE.—There is insurmountable difficulty in reconciling the chronology of the patriarchs and the Exodus. The Assyriologists seem to have shown that Abraham was born in the 23d century B. C., and recent research has proved that the Exodus cannot be later than the 13th century B. C. (See CHRONOLOGY.) (Chas. R. Barnes' Peop. Bib. Cyc.) and to Jacob,' they would carry up his bones out of Egypt, Joseph at length 'died, and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin' (1:26). This promise was religiously fulfilled. His descendants, after carrying the corpse about with them in their wanderings, at length put it in its final resting place in Shechem, in a parcel of ground that Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, which became the inheritance of the children of Joseph (Josh. xxiv:32).

By his Egyptian wife Asenath, daughter of the high priest of Heliopolis, Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. xli:50, sq.), whom Jacob adopted (Gen. xlviii:5), and who accordingly took their place among the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. J. R. B.

(16) Character. Joseph possessed many noble qualities. Piety, a singularly high morality, gentleness, simplicity, patience, fidelity, magnanimity, practical wisdom, firmness and tenacity of purpose were among his characteristics.

2. The Husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ (Matt. i:16). By Matthew he is said to have been the son of Jacob, whose lineage is traced by the same writer through David up to Abraham. Luke represents him as being the son of Heli, and traces his origin up to Adam. For the reconciliation of these accounts see GENEALOGY.

(1) Biblical Statements. The statements of Holy Writ in regard to Joseph are few and simple. According to a custom among the Jews, traces of which are still found, such as handfasting among the Scotch, and betrothing among the Germans, Joseph had pledged his faith to Mary; but before the marriage was consummated she proved to be with child. Grieved at this, Joseph was disposed to break off the connection; but, not wishing to make a public example of one whom he loved, he contemplated a private disruption of their bond. From this step, however, he is deterred by a heavenly messenger, who assures him that Mary has conceived under a divine influence, 'And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. i:18, sq.; Luke i:27). To this account various objections have been taken; but most of them are drawn from the ground of a narrow, short-sighted, and half-informed rationalism, which judges everything by its own small standard, and either denies miracles altogether, or admits only such miracles as find favor in its sight.

(2) An Artificer. Joseph was by trade a carpenter, in which business he probably educated Jesus. In Matt. xiii:55, we read, 'Is not this the son of the carpenter?' and in Mark vi:3, 'Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?' The Greek term employed, tech-tone, is of a general character (from tech-noh, 'I form'), and may be fitly rendered by the English word 'artificer,' or 'artisan.' Schleusner (on this subject) asserts that the universal testimony of the ancient church represents our Lord as being a carpenter's son. Hilarius, on Matthew (quoted in Simon's Dictionnaire de la Bible, i, 691), asserts, in terms which cannot be mistaken, that Jesus was a smith. Of the same opinion was the Venerable Bede; while others have held that our Lord was a mason, and Cardinal Cajetan, that he was a goldsmith.

The last notion probably had its origin in those false associations of more modern times which disparage hand labor. Among the ancient Jews all handicrafts were held in so much honor that they were learned and pursued by the first men of the nation.

(3) Tradition. Christian tradition makes Joseph an old man when first espoused to Mary (Epiphan. Hær. 78, 7), being no less than eighty years of age, and father of four sons and two daughters. The painters of Christian antiquity conspire with the writers in representing Joseph as an old man at the period of the birth of our Lord—an evidence which is not to be lightly rejected, though the precise age mentioned may be but an approximation to fact.

(4) Death. It is not easy to determine when Joseph died. That event may have taken place before Jesus entered on his public ministry. This has been argued from the fact that his mother only appeared at the feast at Cana in Galilee. The premises, however, hardly bear out the inference. With more force of argument, it has been alleged (Simon, Dict. de la Bible) that Joseph must have been dead before the crucifixion of Jesus, else he would in all probability have appeared with Mary at the cross. Certainly the absence of Joseph from the public life of Christ, and the absence of reference to him in the discourses and history, while 'Mary' and 'His brethren' not unfrequently appear, afford evidence not only of Joseph's death, but of the inferior part which, as the legal father only of our Lord, Joseph might have been expected to sustain. The traditions respecting Joseph are collected in Act. Sanct. iii, p. 4, sq.; there is a Life of Joseph written in Italian by Affaitati. (Pearson, On the Creed; Mill, On the Brethren of the Lord; Alford's Note on Matt. xiii:55.) J. R. B.

3. Father of Igal, who was the spy, sent from the tribe of Issachar to investigate the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:7), B. C. before 1657.

4. An Israelite of the family of Bani, and one of those who put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra x:42), B. C. 456.

5. A priest in the family of Shebaniah in the next generation after the return from captivity (Neh. xii:14), B. C. after 536.

6. An ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:30). He was the son of Jonan, and was in the eighth generation from David, or about contemporary with Ahaziah.

7. An ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:26). He was the son of Judah or Abiud, and grandson of Joanna or Hananiah the son of Zerubbabel.

8. Another ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:24). He was the son of Mattathias, in the seventh generation, before Joseph, Mary's husband.

9. Surnamed CALIAPHAS (which see).

10. Joseph of Arimathea. The name Arimathea denotes probably the place where Joseph was born, not that where he resided.

(1) Location of Arimathea. Arimathea lay in the territory of Benjamin, on the mountain range of Ephraim, at no great distance south of Jerusalem (Josh. xviii:25; Judg. iv:5), not far from Gibeah (Judg. xix:13; Isa. x:29; Hos. v:8).

(2) Begs the Body of Jesus. Joseph was a secret disciple of Jesus—'an honorable counsellor (βουλευτής), who waited for the kingdom of God' (Mark xv:43), and who, on learning the death of our Lord, 'came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus.' Pilate having learned from the centurion, who commanded at the execution, that 'Jesus was actually dead,' gave the body to Joseph, who took it down and wrapped his deceased Lord in fine linen which he had purchased for the purpose; after which he laid the corpse in a sepulcher which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulcher (Mark xv:43, sq.). From the parallel passages in Matthew (xxvii:58, sq.), Luke (xxiii:

50, sq.), and John (xix:38, sq.), it appears that the body was previously embalmed at the cost of another secret disciple, Nicodemus, and that the sepulcher was new, 'wherein never man before was laid;' also that it lay in a garden, and was the property of Joseph himself. This garden was 'in the place where Jesus was crucified.'

(3) Character. Luke describes the character of Joseph as 'a good man and a just,' adding that 'he had not consented to the counsel and deed of them,' i. e. of the Jewish authorities. From this remark it is clear that Joseph was a member of the Sanhedrim; a conclusion which is corroborated by the epithet 'counsellor,' applied to him by both Luke and Mark. Tradition represents Joseph as having been one of the Seventy, and as having first preached the Gospel in old England (Ittig. Diss. de Pat. Apostol., sec. 13; Assemani Biblioth. Orient. iii:1, 319, sq.). For an attempt to fix the precise spot where Jesus died and was buried, see the article G^{OL}G^OT^HA. J. R. B.

11. Joseph called Barsabas was one of the two persons whom the primitive church, immediately after the resurrection of Christ, nominated, praying that the Holy Spirit would show which of them should enter the apostolic band in place of the wretched Judas. On the lots being cast, it proved that not Joseph, but Matthias, was chosen.

Joseph bore the honorable surname of Justus, which was not improbably given him on account of his well-known probity. He was one of those who had 'compared with the Apostles all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out amongst them, beginning from the baptism of John,' until the ascension (Acts i:23, sq.). Tradition also accounted him one of the Seventy (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i:12; Heinrichs, On Acts i:23; Ullmann, in the Theolog. Stud. und Kritik, i. 377).

JOSES (jō'sēz), (Gr. Ἰωσῆς, ee-oh-sace').

1. The son of Mary and Cleopas, and brother of James the Less, of Simon and of Jude, and, consequently, one of those who are called the 'brethren' of our Lord (Matt. xiii:55; xxvii:56; Mark vi:3; xv:40, 47). (See JAMES; JUDAS.) He was the only one of these brethren who was not an apostle—a circumstance which has given occasion to some unsatisfactory conjecture. It is perhaps more remarkable that three of them were apostles than that the fourth was not.

2. Son of Eliezer in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:29). He was in the fifteenth generation from David, which was about the time of Manasseh. Jose of the A. V. is incorrect, being merely the genitive case.

3. (See BARNABAS.)

JOSHAH (jō'shah), (Heb. יוֹשָׁה, yo-shaw', Jehovah established), a prince of the house of Simeon, who attacked the Hamite Shepherds in Gedor, without provocation, and, after exterminating them, occupied their country (1 Chron. iv:34), B. C. about 711.

JOSHAPHAT (jōsh'a-phāt), (Heb. יוֹשָׁפָט, yo-shaw-fawt', Jehovah judged), a Mithne among the guards of David, who evidently came from the east of the Jordan (1 Chron. xi:43), B. C. about 1000.

JOSHAVIAH (jōsh'a-vi'ah), (Heb. יוֹשָׁבֵב, yo-shav-yaw', Jehovah sufficient), son of Elnaam and one of David's guards (1 Chron. xi:46), B. C. 1000.

JOSHBEKASHAH (josh-bēk'a-shāh), (Heb. יוֹשֵׁבֵקֶשֶׁת, yosh-bek-aw-shaw', seat in hardness), a member of the house of Heman and head of the sixteenth course of musicians (1 Chron. xxv:4, 24), B. C. about 960.

JOSHEB-BASSEBETH (jō'shēb-bās'sē-bēth), (Heb. יוֹשֵׁבֵבֶת, yo-shabe' bash-shek'beth, sitting in the council), the chief of David's three leading heroes (2 Sam. xxiii:8), called Jashobeam (1 Chron. xi:11).

JOSHUA (jōsh'u-ā), (Heb. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yeh-ho-shoo'-ak, Jehovah saves). The name is rendered by Josephus, the Septuagint, and the New Testament, Ἰησοῦς, ee-ay-soos, Jesus.

In the same manner is spelt the name of the author of the apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus. This is the name of four persons in the Old Testament, and means whose salvation is Jehovah (compare the German name Gotthilf).

1. The most distinguished of the four persons, so called, who occur in the Old Testament, is Joshua the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, the assistant and successor of Moses. His name was originally Hoshea, salvation (Num. xiii:8); and it seems that the subsequent alteration of it by Moses (Num. xiii:16) was significant, and proceeded on the same principle as that of Abram into Abraham (Gen. xvii:5), and of Sarai into Sarah (Gen. xvii:15).

(1) Commander of Israelites. In the Bible he is first mentioned as being the victorious commander of the Israelites in their battle against the Amalekites at Rephidim (Exod. xvii:8-16), B. C. 1210.

(2) On Mount Sinai. When Moses was on the mount, Joshua tarried somewhere on the side of it, and came down with him (Exod. xxiv:13; xxxii:17).

(3) In Charge of Tabernacle. After the defection of Israel and their worship of the golden calf, Moses moved the tabernacle outside of the camp, and, returning to the congregation, left it in charge of Joshua (xxxiii:11).

(4) Eldad and Medad. Zealous for Moses' honor, he was for prohibiting Eldad and Medad from prophesying. Moses rebuked him, saying, "Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them" (Num. xi:27-29).

(5) A Spy. He was one of the spies that searched the Promised Land (Num. xiii:8, 16; xiv:6, 38; xi:28, 29).

(6) Appointed Ruler. A little before Moses' death, Joshua was solemnly installed in the government of the Hebrew nation; and such honor was by Moses put upon him as tended to make them reverence and obey him (Num. xxvii:18-23; Deut. iii:21; xxxi:14-23).

(7) With Moses in the Tabernacle. It was made known to Moses that he was about to die, and that he should appear with Joshua in the tabernacle. And while in the presence of Jehovah Moses gave his devoted minister a "charge," and said, "Be strong and of good courage; for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them; and I will be with thee" (Deut. xxxi:14, 23).

(8) Takes Charge of Israel. After Moses' death, God directed and encouraged Joshua to take on him the government of the Hebrews, and promised to give him his continued presence and support. Joshua warned the Reubenites, Gadites, and eastern Manassites, who were settled by Moses, to prepare for crossing the Jordan and conquering Canaan, along with their brethren. Spies were sent to view Jericho. These, by means of Rahab, were preserved, and returned safe, though no small search had been made for them; they reported that the Canaanites were in the utmost consternation, for fear of the Hebrew invasion.

(9) Crosses the Jordan. At this time, the Jordan overflowed its banks; but, as soon as the feet of the priests, who bare the ark of the Lord, going at the distance of 2,000 cubits, or 3,648 feet, before the host, touched the brim of the waters of Jordan, they parted; those above stood like a mountain, and those below ran off into the Dead Sea, leaving an empty space of about six miles for the Hebrew tribes to pass over. The priests, with the ark, continued in the middle of the channel till all were got over.

(10) In Canaan. To commemorate this event, Joshua erected twelve large stones in the very spot where the ark had stood; and, taking twelve other stones from the mid channel of the river, erected them on the banks. Some days after he ordered that all that had been born for thirty-eight years back to be circumcised; fully assured of God's protecting them, when sore, from their foes. Next, the passover was celebrated. On the morrow after, they began to eat the old corn of Canaan, and the manna fell no more about their tents.

(11) The Angel of Jehovah. Soon after, the angel of Jehovah appeared to Joshua as a glorious man, with a drawn sword, and told him he was come, as chief commander of the Hebrew troops in their approaching wars. He fell on his face, and reverently put off his shoes (Josh. v:13-15).

(12) Capture of Jericho. Directed of God, Joshua made his troops encompass Jericho seven days, and seven times on the seventh, with the ark carried before them, and some sounding with ram's horns. When they had finished the thirteenth circuit, they gave a great shout, and the walls of Jericho, all around, fell flat to the ground. None but Rahab and her family were saved (Josh. vi). The metal found in the city was devoted to the service of God, but everything else to ruin; and a curse was denounced against the rebuilder of the city. Achan, however, coveted and took part of the spoil. (See ACHAN.)

(13) The First Defeat. Advised by some, Joshua, to ease his troops, sent no more but 3,000 to attack Ai. To punish Achan's theft, they were repulsed, and thirty-six of the number slain. This exceedingly grieved Joshua, as he thought it would make the Canaanites triumph over God and his people. After solemn prayer he was informed of the cause, and the sacrilege was punished by the death of Achan and his family (Josh. vii).

(14) Capture of Ai. Next the Lord ordered the whole Hebrew host to attack Ai, and to use stratagems beside. After it was taken, Joshua and the Hebrews seem to have marched northward to Ebal and Gerizim. On Ebal they erected stones, plastered them with plaster, and plainly inscribed thereon a copy of the Mosaic laws, or rather an abridgement, or perhaps no more than the blessings and curses mentioned in Deut. xxvii and xxviii. An altar of rough stones was raised, and the burnt-offerings and peace-offering being finished, the people feasted on the flesh of the last with joy and gladness, that they were thus the covenant people of God. The priests then went down to the valley of Moreh between two hills, and with a loud voice read the blessings and curses. Six of the tribes, descended from free women, with their wives, and the strangers among them, stood on Gerizim, and echoed Amen to the blessings. Six of the tribes, four of which were descended of bond women, and one of Reuben, who had lost his birthright, with their wives, and the strangers, stood on Mount Ebal, and echoed their Amen to the curses as they were read. After this solemn dedication of themselves to God's service, the Hebrews returned to Gilgal (Josh. vi-viii; Deut. xxvii).

(15) League with the Gibeonites. Next, Joshua and the princes entered into a league with the Gibeonites; and being convinced of his mistake, he devoted that people to the laborious part of the service of God. Enraged that the Gibeonites had made peace with Joshua, Adonizedek, and four of his neighboring princes, entered into a league to destroy them.

(16) Battle of Gibeon. Informed of this, Joshua marched to their assistance and routed the five kings. A little before sunset, Joshua brought these kings out of the cave of Makkedah, where he had shut them up, and after causing his captains to trample on their necks, he hanged them. Joshua proceeded to burn their cities, and slay the inhabitants throughout the south part of the promised land.

(17) Subsequent Conquests. This great battle was followed by the conquest of Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and Debir. In this one campaign Joshua subdued the southern half of Palestine, from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, the eastern and western limit of the southern frontier; and he led the people back to Gilgal (Josh. x:15-43). In another campaign he marched to Lake Merom, where he met and overthrew a confederacy of the Canaanitish chiefs of the north, Jabin, King of Hazor, and in the course of a protracted war he led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Zidon and into the Valley of Lebanon under Hermon. In six years, six nations, with thirty-one kings, swell the roll of his conquests, and amongst others the Anakim—the old terror of Israel—are specially recorded as destroyed everywhere except in Philistia. (Smith, Dict. of the Bible.)

(18) Dividing the Inheritance. Joshua, now advanced in years, proceeded, in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes, to complete the division of the conquered land; and when all was allotted, Timnath-serah, in Mount Ephraim, was assigned by the people as Joshua's peculiar inheritance. The tabernacle of the congregation was established at Shiloh, six cities of refuge were appointed, forty-eight cities assigned to the Levites, and the warriors of the trans-Jordanic tribes dismissed in peace to their homes.

(19) Assembles the Hebrews. After Joshua had governed the Hebrews seventeen, or perhaps twenty-five years, he, finding his end approaching, assembled the Hebrews, rehearsed to them what God had done for them, and made them renew their solemn engagements to worship and serve him at Shechem, a place already famous in connection with Jacob (Gen. xxxv:4), and Joseph (Josh. xxiv:32).

(20) Death. He died aged one hundred and ten, and was buried at Timnath-serah, his own city (Josh. xxiv:29, 30).

(21) Character. Joshua's life has been noted as one of the very few which are recorded in history with some fullness of detail. In his character have been traced, under an Oriental garb, such features as chiefly kindled the imagination of western chroniclers and poets in the Middle Ages;

the character of a devout warrior, who has been taught by serving as a youth how to command as a man; who earns by manly vigor a quiet, honored old age; who combines strength with gentleness, ever looking up for and obeying the divine impulse with the simplicity of a child, while he wields great power, and directs it calmly, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high, unselfish purpose. (Smith, Bib. Dict.) (See CANAANITES.)

Figurative. Holy Scripture itself suggests (Heb. iv:8) the consideration of Joshua as a type of Christ. Many of the Christian Fathers have enlarged upon this view. (See Bishop Pearson, who has collected their opinions On the Creed. Art. ii, pp. 87-90, and 94-96, ed. 1843).

2. A Beth-sheमितe (1 Sam. vi:14), the owner of the field into which the cart came which bore the ark on its return from the land of the Philistines. (B. C. about 1076.)

3. The governor of the city of Jerusalem at the commencement of the reign of Josiah. He gave his name to one of the city gates (2 Kings xxiii:8), B. C. 621.

4. Joshua or Jeshua, the son of JOZADAK, or JOSEDECH, was high-priest of the Jews when they returned from Babylon. He assisted Zerubbabel in rebuilding the temple. Zechariah saw him represented as standing before the Lord in filthy garments, and Satan standing at his right hand to accuse and resist him; but the Angel of Jehovah rebuked the devil, and arrayed Joshua in pure raiment. Not long after, Zechariah was directed to make a golden crown for him (Ezra iv:3; Hag. i:1; Zech. iii and vi).

Figurative. Did not he prefigure Jesus, as the High-Priest, Builder, and Savior of his church, who, though once laden with our iniquities, and in the likeness of sinful flesh, is now glorious in his apparel, and crowned with many crowns?

Brown.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF.

(1) Profane Mention of Other Books. There occur some vestiges of the deeds of Joshua in other historians besides those of the Bible. Procopius mentions a Phœnician inscription near the city of Tingis in Mauritania, the sense of which in Greek was:—'Ἡμεῖς ἔσμεν οἱ ψυγόντες ἀπὸ προσώπου Ἰησοῦ τοῦ λεητοῦ υἱοῦ Ναυῆ—'We are those who fled before the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun' (De Bell. Vandal. ii, 10). Suidas (sub verbo Καναῖται):—ἡμεῖς ἴσμεν Καναῖται οὓς ἐδῶκεν Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεηστής—'We are the Canaanites whom Joshua the robber drove away.'

A letter of Shaubech, king of Armenia Minor, in the Samaritan book of Joshua (ch. xxvi), styles Joshua lupus percussor, 'the murderous wolf'; or, according to another reading in the book Juchasin (p. 154, f. 1), and in the Shalsheleth Rakkabbalah (p. 96), lupus vesperinus, 'the evening wolf.'

(2) Name of the Book. The book of Joshua is so called from the personage who occupies the principal place in the narration of events contained therein, and may be considered as a continuation of the Pentateuch. It commences with the words now it came to pass, which may be rendered thereupon it happened. Books beginning with what Dr. Samuel Lee calls the illative van, are to be regarded as continuations of earlier works. The Pentateuch, and especially Deuteronomy, are repeatedly referred to in the book of Joshua, the narration of which begins with the death of Moses and extends to the death of Joshua, embracing a chronological period of somewhat less than thirty years. The subject of the book is thus briefly stated in ch. i:5, 6: 'There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life. As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and of a good courage; for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land which I swear unto their fathers to give them.' In these two verses is also indicated the division of the book into two principal portions, with reference to the conquest and the distribution of the land of Canaan. The conquest is narrated in the first twelve, and the distribution in the following ten chapters. In the last two chapters are subjoined the events subsequent to the distribution up to the death of Joshua.

(3) Conquest of Canaan. The history of the conquest of Canaan is a series of miracles, than which none more remarkable are recorded in any part of sacred history. The passage into the Promised Land, as well as that out of Egypt, was through water. Jericho was taken not by might, but by the falling of the walls on the blast of the trumpets of seven priests; and in the war against Gibeon the day was prolonged to afford time for the completion of the victory.

(4) First Twelve Chapters. It is generally granted that the first twelve chapters form a continuous whole; although the author in ch. x:13, refers to another work, he not merely transcribes but intimately combines the quotation with the tenor of his narration. It is certain that there sometimes occur episodes which seem to interrupt the chronological connection, as for instance the portion intervening between chs. i, ii, and iii:1.

The whole tenor of the first twelve chapters bespeaks an eye-witness who bore some part in the transactions, and the expression we passed over, in ch. v:1, bears this out, as well as the circumstantial vividness of the narrative, which clearly indicates that the writer was an eye-witness.

(5) Time of Writing. The statement that the monuments which he erected were extant to this day, indicates that he did not promulgate the book immediately after the events narrated (comp. iv:9; vii:26; viii:28, 29; x:27). The book could not have been written very long after the time of Joshua, because we find that Rahab was still alive when it was composed (vi:25). The section from chapters xiii to xxii inclusive, which contains an account of the distribution of the land, seems to be based upon written documents, in which the property was accurately described. That this was the case is likely not merely on account of the peculiar nature of the diplomatic contents by which this 'Doomsday Book' is distinguished from the preceding part of Joshua, but also on account of the statement in chapter xviii:4, where Joshua says to the children of Israel, 'Give out from among you three men from each tribe; and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land and describe it according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me.' Compare verse 6, 'Ye therefore shall describe the land into seven parts.' Compare also verses 8 and 9, 'And the men arose and went away; and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go, and walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh.'

(6) Sources. The list of towns granted to the Levites in Josh. xxi differs from that in 1 Chron. vi:39-66 so much that we must suppose the latter to contain abstracts from a source different from that in the book of Joshua. That a change of circumstances might demand changes in such lists becomes evident, if we consider the fate of individual cities. For instance, Ziklag was given to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. xix:5); nevertheless we read in 1 Sam. xxvii:6, that Achish gave Ziklag to David.

Since the book of Joshua contains also a description of the territories of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, situated on the left bank of the Jordan, which tribes entered into possession before the death of Moses, the Pentateuch itself may be considered as one of the sources from which the second part of the book of Joshua has been compiled. That the author of the book of Joshua derived part of his information from the Pentateuch is evident, if we compare Deut. xviii:1, 2, and Num. xviii:20, with Josh. xiii:14, 33; xiv:4. Compare also Num. xxxi:8, with Josh. xiii:21 and 22.

The author of the book of Joshua frequently repeats the statement of the Pentateuch in a more detailed form, and mentions the changes which had taken place since the Pentateuch was written. Compare Num. xxxiv:13 and 14, with Josh. xiv:1-4; Num. xxxii:37, with Josh. xiii:17, sq.; Num. xxxv with Josh. xxi.

(7) Similarities. There is also considerable similarity between the following passages in the books of Joshua and Judges: Josh. xiii:3; Judg. iii:3; Josh. xv:13, sq.; Judg. i:10, 20; Josh. xv:15-19; Judg. i:11-15; Josh. xv:63; Judg. i:21; Josh. xvi:10; Judg. i:29; Josh. xvii:12; Judg. i:27; Josh. xix:47; Judg. xviii. The book of Joshua seems to explain the text of the book of Judges by brief notices; as, for instance, the names Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi (Josh. xv:14), (comp. Judg. i:10), and makes use of more regular grammatical forms, instead of the more unusual forms in the book of Judges.

(8) Authentic Records. It seems to have been the intention of the author of chapters xiii-xxii to furnish authentic records concerning the arrangements made by Joshua after the conquest of Canaan. Since we do not find in the subsequent history that the tribes, after the death of Joshua, disagreed among themselves about the ownership of the land, it would appear that the object of the book of Joshua, as a 'Doomsday Book,' was fully attained. The circumstance that the book of Joshua contains many Canaanitish names of places to which the Hebrew names are added, seems also to indicate that the second part originated in an early age, when neither the Canaanitish name was entirely forgotten, nor the Hebrew name fully introduced; so that it was expedient to mention both.

(9) Authorship. In the last two chapters occur two orations of Joshua, in which he bids farewell to the people whom he had commanded. In chapter xxiv:26, we read, 'And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God.' The expression, these words, seems to refer only to his last address, and the subsequent resolution of the people to follow his example. We are here, however, expressly informed that Joshua did write this much; and consequently, we deem it the more likely that he also committed to writing the other memorable events connected with his career, such as the conquest and the distribution of the land.

Viewing all the circumstances together, we consider it highly probable that the whole book of Joshua was composed by himself up to the twenty-eighth verse of the last chapter; to which a friendly hand subjoined some brief notices, contained in verses 29-33, concerning the death, age, and burial of Joshua; the continuance of his influence upon the people; the interment, in Shechem, of the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel had brought from Egypt; and the death and burial of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, whom his son Phinehas interred in his allotment on Mount Ephraim.

(10) Authority. The authority of the book of Joshua mainly rests upon the manner in which it is treated in other parts of the Bible.

Besides the above allusions in the book of Judges, we find Joshua referred to in 1 Kings xvi:34:—'In his days did Hiel the Bethelite build Jericho; he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram, his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun.' (Comp. Josh. vi:26.) The second and third verses of Psalms xlv contain a brief summary of the whole book of Joshua:—'Thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand, and plantest them; thou didst afflict the people, and cast them out. For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them; but thy right hand and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favor unto them.' (Compare Psalm lxxviii:12-14; lxxviii:54, 55; cxiv:3 and 5, which refer to the book of Joshua.) Also, Hab. iii:11: 'The sun and moon stood still in their habitation,' etc. Heb. xiii:5: 'For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.' (Compare Josh. i:5.) Heb. xi:31: 'By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace;' and James ii:25: 'Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?' (Compare Josh. ii and vi:22-25.) Acts vii:45: 'Which (the tabernacle) also our fathers that came after brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers.' (Compare Josh. iii:14.) Heb. xi:30: 'By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.' (Compare Josh. vi:17-23.) Heb. iv:8: 'For if Jesus (Joshua) had given them rest, then would he not afterwards have spoken of another day.'

The quotation from the book of Jasher (Josh. x:13) is said to be contradicted by 2 Sam. i:18, where it appears that this book was written in the days of David. But this is by no means clear from the passage referred to; and even if it were so, it would seem that the book of Jasher was an anthologia, augmented in the days of David. Others have based upon this quotation the inference that the book of Joshua was written after the times of David. De Wette, in his Einleitung (Berlin, 1833, p. 219), asserts that the book of Joshua was written after the Babylonian captivity.

The mention of the book of Jasher has given rise to some spurious compilations under that name, as well in Hebrew as in English. (See the article JASHER, BOOK OF.)

JOSIAH (jō-si'ah), (Heb. יוֹשִׁיָּא, yo-shee-yaw, founded by Jah).

1. The sixteenth king of Judah, and son of Amon whom he succeeded on the throne (B. C. 639), at the early age of eight years, and reigned thirty-one years.

(1) Accession to the Throne. As Josiah thus early ascended the throne, we may the more admire the good qualities which he manifested. Avoiding the example of his immediate predecessors, he 'did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the ways of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left' (2 Kings xxii:1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv:1, 2).

(2) Purification of the Land. As early as the sixteenth year of his age he began to manifest that enmity to idolatry in all its forms which distinguished his character and reign; and he was not quite twenty years old when he proclaimed open war against it, although more or less favored by many men of rank and influence in the court and kingdom. He then commenced a thorough purification of the land from all taint of idolatry, by going about and superintending in person the operations of the men who were employed in breaking down idolatrous altars and images, and cutting down the groves which had been consecrated to idol worship. His detestation of idolatry could not have been more strongly expressed than by ransacking the sepulchers of the idolatrous priests of former days, and consuming their bones upon the idol altars before they were overturned.

(3) His Action Predicted. Yet this operation, although unexampled in Jewish history, was foretold three hundred and twenty-six years before Josiah was born, by the prophet who was commissioned to denounce to Jeroboam the future punishment of his sin. He even named Josiah as the person by whom this act was to be performed; and said that it should be performed in Bethel, which was then a part of the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xiii:2). All this seemed much beyond the range of human probabilities. But it was performed to the letter; for Josiah did not confine his proceedings to his own kingdom, but went over a considerable part of the neighboring kingdom of Israel, which then lay comparatively desolate, with the same object in view; and as Bethel, in particular, executed all that the prophet had foretold (2 Kings xxiii:1-19; 2 Chron. xxxiv:3-7, 32). In these proceedings Josiah seems to have been actuated by an absolute hatred of idolatry, such as no other king since David had manifested, and which David had scarcely occasion to manifest in the same degree.

(4) Temple Repaired. In the eighteenth year of his reign and the twenty-sixth of his age, when the land had been thoroughly purified from idolatry and all that belonged to it, Josiah proceeded to repair and beautify the temple of the Lord.

(5) Finding of the Law. In the course of this pious labor, the high-priest Hilkiah discovered in the sanctuary a volume, which proved to contain the books of Moses, and which, from the terms employed, seems to have been considered the original of the law as written by Moses. On this point there has been much anxious discussion and some rash assertion. Some writers of the German school allege that there is no external evidence—that is, evidence beside the law itself—that the book of law existed till it was thus produced by Hilkiah. This assertion it is the less necessary to answer here, as it is duly noticed in the article PENTATEUCH. But it may be observed that it is founded very much on the fact that the king was greatly astonished when some parts of the law were read to him. It is indeed perfectly manifest that he had previously been entirely ignorant of much that he then heard; and he rent his clothes in consternation when he found that, with the best intentions to serve the Lord, he and all his people had been living in the neglect of duties which the law declared to be of vital importance. It is certainly difficult to account for this ignorance. Some suppose that all the copies of the law had perished, and that the king had never seen one. This is very unlikely, but however scarce complete copies may have been, the pious king was likely to have been the possessor of one. The probability seems to be that the passages read were those awful denunciations against disobedience with which the book of Deuteronomy concludes, and which from some cause or other the king had never before read, or which had never before produced on his mind the same strong conviction of the imminent dangers under which the nation lay, as now when read to him from a volume invested with a character so venerable, and brought with such interesting circumstances under his notice.

The king in his alarm sent to Huldah 'the prophetess,' for her counsel in this emergency (see HULDAH); her answer assured him that, although the dread penalties threatened by the law had been incurred and would be inflicted, he should be gathered in peace to his fathers before the days of punishment and sorrow came.

(6) Renewal of the Covenant. It was perhaps not without some hope of averting this doom that the king immediately called the people together at Jerusalem, and engaged them in a solemn renewal of the ancient covenant with God. When this had been done, the Passover was celebrated with careful attention to the directions given in the law, and on a scale of unexampled magnificence. But all was too late; the hour of mercy had passed; for 'the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah' (2 Kings xxii:3-20; xxiii:21-27; 2 Chron. xxxiv:8-33; xxxv:1-19).

(7) Death. That removal from the world which had been promised to Josiah as a blessing, was not long delayed and was brought about in a way which he had probably not expected. His kingdom was tributary to the Chaldæan empire; and when Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, sought a passage through his territories, on an expedition against the Chaldæans, Josiah, with a very high sense of the obligations which his vassalage imposed, refused to allow the march of the Egyptian army through his dominions, and prepared to resist the attempt by force of arms. Necho was very unwilling to engage in hostilities with Josiah; the appearance of the Hebrew army at Megiddo, however, brought on a battle, in which the king of Judah was so desperately wounded by arrows that his attendants removed him from the war-chariot, and placed him in another, in which he was taken to Jerusalem, where he died (B. C. about 680).

(8) Character. Josiah possessed many estimable qualities. No king that reigned in Israel was ever more deeply lamented by all his subjects than he; and we are told that the prophet, Jeremiah, composed on the occasion an elegiac ode, which was long preserved among the people, but which is not now in existence (2 Kings xxiii:29-37; 2 Chron. xxxv:20-27).

2. Son of Zephaniah, whose house Zechariah was commanded to make the assembling place of the chief men of the captivity when Joshua, the high-priest, was crowned (Zech. vi:10), B. C. 519.

JOSIAS (jo-si'as), (Gr. Ἰωσίας, ee-oh-se'os), the Grecized form of Josiah, king of Judah, found Matt. i:10, 11.

JOSIBIAH (jös-i-bi'ah), (Heb. יוֹשִׁבִיָּאֵל, yo-shib-yaw', i. e. Joslibiah, dweller with Jehovah), father of Jehu, a descendant of that branch of the Simonite tribe of which Shimei was founder, and which later was the most numerous (1 Chron. iv:35), B. C. before 711.

JOSIPHIAH (jos'i-phi'ah), (Heb. יוֹשִׁפִּיָּאֵל, yo-shib-yaw', dweller with Jehovah), an ancestor, perhaps father, of Shelomith, who returned from the captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii:10), B. C. about 457.

JOT (jöt), English form of Iota, lōra, ee-oh'ta, the Greek letter so called, the same in power and place as the English i. (See IOTA.)

JOTBAH (jöt'bah), (Heb. יוֹתְבָאֵל, yot-baw', pleasantness), given as the native place of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh, and mother of Amon, King of Judah (2 Kings xxi:19). The place is not elsewhere mentioned, but it is commonly identified with JOTBATH.

JOTBATH or JOTBATHA (jöt'bäth' or jöt'bat-hah), (Heb. יוֹתְבָתָאֵל, yot-baw'thaw, pleasantness), the twenty-ninth encampment of Israel in the wilderness, between Gidgad and Ebronah (Num. xxxiii:33, 34; Deut. x:7).

JOTHAM (jō'tham), (Heb. יוֹתָם, yo-thawm', God is upright).

1. The youngest of Gideon's seventy legitimate sons; and the only one who escaped when the rest were massacred by the order of Abimelech (Judg. ix:5). When the fratricide was made king by the people of Shechem, the young Jotham was so daring as to make his appearance on Mount Gerizim for the purpose of lifting up a protesting voice, and of giving vent to his feelings. This he did in a beautiful parable, wherein the trees are represented as making choice of a king, and bestowing on the bramble the honor which the cedar, the olive, and the vine would not accept. The obvious application, which indeed Jotham failed not himself to point out, must have been highly exasperating to Abimelech and his friends; but the speaker fled, as soon as he had delivered his parable, to the town of Beer, and remained there out of his brother's reach. We hear no more of him; but three years after, if then living, he saw the accomplishment of the malediction he had pronounced (Judg. ix:5-21).

2. The tenth king of Judah, and son of Uzziah, whom he succeeded in B. C. 758, at the age of twenty-five; he reigned sixteen years. His father having during his last years been excluded by leprosy from public life (see UZZIAH), the government was administered by his son. Jotham profited by the experience which the reign of his father, and of the kings who preceded him, afforded, and he ruled in the fear of God, although he was unable to correct all the corrupt practices into which the people had fallen.

(1) Prosperous Reign. His sincere intentions were rewarded with a prosperous reign. He was successful in his wars. The Ammonites, who had 'given gifts' as a sort of tribute to Uzziah, but had ceased to do so after his leprosy had incapacitated him from governing, were constrained by Jotham to pay for three years a heavy tribute in silver, wheat, and barley (2 Chron. xxvi:8; xxvii:5, 6).

(2) Public Works. Many important public works were also undertaken and accomplished by Jotham. The principal gate of the temple was rebuilt by him on a more magnificent scale; the quarter of Ophel, in Jerusalem, was strengthened by new fortifications; various towns were built or rebuilt in the mountains of Judah; and castles and towers of defense were erected in the wilderness.

(3) Death. Jotham died greatly lamented by his people, and was buried in the sepulcher of the kings (2 Kings xv:38; 2 Chron. xxvii:3-9), B. C. about 735.

3. A descendant of Judah, son of Jahdai (1 Chron. ii:47).

JOURNEY (jâr'nÿ), (Heb. דֶּרֶךְ, deh'rek, a removal from one place to another).

A day's journey is reckoned about sixteen or twenty miles. To this distance, around the Hebrew camp, were the quails gathered for food for the people (Num. xi:31). Shaw computes the eleven days' journey from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea to be about one hundred and ten miles (Deut. i:2). A Sabbath day's journey is reckoned by the Hebrews at 2000 cubits, or nearly seven hundred and thirty paces; and it is said, that if any Jew traveled above this from the city on the Sabbath, he was beaten; but it is probable they were allowed to travel as far to the synagogue as was necessary (Acts i:12; 2 Kings iv:23). The Hebrews seem to have had fifty-two journeys or marches from Rameses to Gilgal (Num. xxxiii).

JOY (joi), (generally some form of Heb. יָיִן, gheel, to spin round, or leap with pleasure); a stronger term than יְשִׁמְחֵהוּ, sim-khaw' (Ps. xxx:5, etc.); Maw-soce' (מִשְׂשׂוֹעַ, Job viii:19, etc.), rejoicing; khar-ah' (Gr. χαρά, Matt. ii:10), gladness; the cause or occasion of joy (Luke ii:10; 1 Thess. ii:20). Joy or gladness in general, is an agreeable mental sensation arising from conscious possession of, or from hope of enjoying, something pleasant or valuable; and the expression thereof in praise, etc.

1. Natural Joy, Etc. We may discriminate between natural joy, gladness and mirth as follows: What creates joy and gladness is of a permanent nature; that which creates mirth is temporary; joy is the most vivid sensation in the soul; gladness is the same in quality, but inferior in degree; joy is awakened in the mind by the most important events in life; gladness springs up in the mind on ordinary occasions; the return of the prodigal son awakened joy in the heart of his father; a man feels gladness at being relieved from some distress or trouble; public events of a gratifying nature produce universal joy; relief from either sickness or want brings gladness to an oppressed heart; he who is absorbed in his private distresses is ill prepared to partake of the mirth with which he is surrounded at the festive board. Joy is depicted on the countenance, or expresses itself by various demonstrations; gladness is a more tranquil feeling, which is enjoyed in secret, and seeks no outward expression. (Crabbe's Synonyms.)

2. Spiritual Joy. Spiritual joy is excited by the Holy Ghost, and arises from union to, possession of, and hope to enjoy forever, a God reconciled in Christ. This joy produces an agreeable earnestness in promoting his honor (Gal. v:22). Thus the saints rejoice in Christ, or in God; they take pleasure in and boast of their connection with him; they praise him for his kindness to them, and for what he is in himself (Luke i:47).

Their rejoicing in hope, is their delightful views, holy boasting and cheerful praise, on account of their infallible perseverance and eternal happiness (Heb. iii:6). A saint's rejoicing in himself, means his inward satisfaction in the testimony of a good conscience (Gal. vi:14).

Objects and Sources of Spiritual Joy.

The ground or object of one's rejoicing, is called his joy; thus God is the joy, the exceeding joy, of his people; he, as theirs, and as enjoyed by them, is the cause and ground of their eternal and superlative joy (Ps. xliii:4). Christ's exaltation, promised to him, to encourage him in his work, is the joy set before him (Heb. xii:2). The heavenly blessedness is called the joy of the Lord. It consists in the delightful enjoyment of God in Christ, and it much resembles that pleasure he has in our redemption (Matt. xxv:21, 23). Converts are the "joy" of ministers, who are instrumental in bringing them to Christ (1 Thess. ii:20). Jerusalem and Zion were the "joy of the whole earth;" as God was there present, and peculiarly worshipped, there was more ground of joy than elsewhere; or the words may signify, that they were the joy of the whole land; as all the Jews took pleasure therein, and boasted thereof (Ps. xlviii:2; Lam. ii:15). The church is created a "rejoicing," and her people a "joy," when she is so reformed, settled, purged, and blessed, as to abound with spiritual gladness, and to rejoice the heart of every pious beholder (Is. lxxv:18). Falling into temptations, or troubles, is to be accounted "all joy;" as troubles work exceedingly for our real good (James i:2). The "joy of God's salvation," is the heart-exhilarating blessings therein contained, and the spiritual gladness that issues therefrom (Ps. li:12). Spiritual gladness is called "joy in the Holy Ghost," as it proceeds from his dwelling and working in our heart (Rom. xiv:17). Brown.

JOZABAD (jöz'a-bäd), (Heb. יְזַבָּד, yo-zaw-bawd', contraction of Jehozabad, Jehovah endowed).

1. One of the captains of Manasseh, who came over to David before the battle of Gilboa, and aided in the rout of the marauding Amalekites (1 Chron. xii:20), B. C. before 1000.

2. A Levite, who, in the reign of Hezekiah, had charge of the offerings and dedicated things in the temple, under Cononiah and Shimei (2 Chron. xxxi:13), B. C. about 719.

3. A captain of Manasseh, who, like (1) came to David (1 Chron. xii:20), B. C. before 1000.

4. A Levite, son of Jeshua. He, with Meremoth and Eleazar, made an inventory of the vessels of gold and silver in the Temple, which were brought from Babylon, and recorded their weight (Ezra viii:33), B. C. about 457.

5. A prince of the Levites, who was an overseer of the offerings and dedicated things in the Temple, and assisted in the great feast of the Passover, held at Jerusalem in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv:9), B. C. 623.

6. A priest, son of Pashur, and one of those who married foreign wives (Ezra x:22), B. C. 456.

7. A Gederathite, a famous Benjamite archer, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4), B. C. 1000. (See JOZABAD.)

JOZACHAR (jöz'a-kar), (Heb. יְזַכָּר, yo-zaw-kawr', remembered by Jehovah), the son of the Ammonitess Shimeath, and one of the murderers of Joash, king of Judah (2 Kings xii:21). In 2 Chron. xxiv:26, he is called Zabad, which according to Kennicott and others is a clerical mistake for Jozachar (B. C. 839).

JOZADAK (jöz'a-däk), (Heb. יְזַדָּק, yo-zaw-dawk', Jah is great, Ezra iii:2, 8; v:2; x:18; Neh. xii:26), a contracted form of JEHOZADAK (which see).

JUBAL (jū'bal), (Heb. יֻבָּל, yo-baw'l, stream).

One of Cain's descendants, son of Lamech and Adah. He is described as the inventor of the kinnor, and the ugab, rendered in our version 'the harp and the organ,' but perhaps more properly 'the lyre and mouth-organ,' or Pandean pipe (Gen. iv:21), B. C. 3490. (See MUSIC.)

JUBILEE (jū'bī-lē), (Heb. יְבִיאֵהוּ, yo-bale', Lev. xxv:8; Vulg. Annus Jubilei, or Jubilee).

According to some, a period of fifty years, according to others, of forty-nine years, the termination of which led to certain great changes in the condition of the Hebrews, all of which seem to have been designed and fitted to bring about from time to time a restoration of the original social state instituted by Moses, and so to sustain in its unimpaired integrity the constitution of which he was the author.

(1) Sabbatical Year. Intimately connected with the Jubilee was another singular Mosaic institution, namely, the Sabbatical year. On this account, we shall speak briefly of the latter, as preparatory to a right understanding of the former.

While yet wandering in the wilderness, and, therefore, before they had entered 'the land of promise,' the children of Israel received from the lips of their great legislator the following law—six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof; but the seventh year thou shalt let it rest; that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy maid and the stranger may be refreshed' (Exod. xxiii:10, sq.). This injunction is repeated in Lev. xxv:1-7, where it stands as proceeding immediately from the Lord. The land is to keep 'a sabbath for the Lord.'

(2) Seven Sabbaths of Years. Then in immediate sequence follows the law relating to the Jubilee (Lev. xxv:8). 'And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years, forty and nine years; then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the Jubilee to sound in the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; and ye shall return every man unto his possession and unto his family (Lev. xxv:8-24). Land might be redeemed by a kinsman or by the party who sold it; but in the Jubilee year it must return to its original proprietor. Dwelling-houses within a walled city might be redeemed within the first year; if not redeemed within the space of a full year they became the freehold of the purchaser. The houses of villages were to be counted as the fields of the country. The cities and houses of the Levites were redeemable at any time, and could never be held longer than the ensuing Jubilee; the field of the suburbs of their cities might not be sold (verses 25-38). Israelites who were hired servants (Israelitish bond-servants were not allowed) might serve till the year of Jubilee, when they returned to their possessions. A Hebrew sold as a slave to a foreigner, resident in Palestine, was redeemable by himself or relative at any time, by making payment according to the number of years to elapse before the next Jubilee; but at the Jubilee such bondsman was, under all circumstances, to be set at liberty (verses 39-55). The only exception to this system of general restitution was in the case of property set apart and devoted to the divine service—'Every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord; none devoted shall be redeemed' (Lev. xxvii:28, 29). With these scriptural details, the account given by Josephus (Antiq. iii:12, 3) substantially agrees.

The time required by the Sabbatical year and by the Jubilee to be rescued from the labors of the field, was very considerable. Strictly interpreted, the language we have cited would take out of the ordinary course of things every sixth, seventh, and eighth year, during each successive septenary, till the circle of fifty years was in each period completed. Nay, more, the old store, produced in the sixth year, was to last until the ninth year, for the sixth year was to bring forth fruits for three years.

The reader has now before him the whole of this extraordinary power of legislation, which, viewed in all its bearings—in its effects on human labor, on character, on religious institutions and observances, as well as on the general condition of society, no less than on the productiveness of the land, and the means of sustenance to its inhabitants—is wholly unparalleled by any event in the history of the world. It is, however, in perfect concord with the Mosaic economy.

(3) Restitution of Lands. The recurring periods of seven years are in keeping with the institution of the seventh day as a Sabbath for man and beast. The aim in both is similar—needful repose. The leading idea involved in the Jubilee—namely, restitution—also harmonizes with the fundamental principles of the Mosaic system. The land was God's, and was entrusted for use to the chosen people in such a way that every individual had his portion. A power of perpetual alienation would have been a virtual denial of God's sovereign rights, while the law of Jubilee was one of continued recognition of them. The conception is purely theoretical in its whole character and tendencies. The theocracy was of such a nature as to disallow all subordinate 'thrones, principalities and powers;' and consequently, to demand entire equality on the part of the people. But the power of perpetual alienation in regard to land would have soon given rise to the greatest inequalities of social condition, presenting what modern states have, alas! exhibited but too much of—splendid affluence on one side and sordid pauperism on the other.

(4) Benevolent Legislation. A passage in Deuteronomy (xv:4), when rightly understood, as in the marginal translation—'to the end that there be no poor among you'—seems expressly to declare that the aim in view, at least of the Sabbatical release, was to prevent the rise of any great inequality of social condition, and thus to preserve unimpaired the essential character of the theocracy.

Equally benevolent in its aim and tendency does this institution thus appear, showing how thoroughly the great Hebrew legislator cared and provided for individuals, instead of favoring classes. Beginning with a narrow cycle of seven days, he went on to a wider one of as many years, embracing at least seven times seven annual revolutions, seeking in all his arrangements rest for man and beast, and, by a happy personification, rest even for the brute earth; and in the rest which he required for human beings, providing for that more needful rest of mind which the sharp competitions and eager rivalries of modern society deny to ten thousand times ten thousand. The benign character and tendency of the law of the Sabbatical and Jubilee years is in accordance with the general spirit of the Mosaic legislation, and appears not unworthy of its divine origin.

Warburton adduced this law (Divine Legation of Moses) in order to show that Moses was in truth sent and sustained by God, since nothing but a divine power could have given the necessary supplies of food in the sixth year, and no unprejudiced person can well deny the force of his argument.

(5) Moses the Lawgiver. But these laws either emanated from Moses, or they did not. If they did not, they arose after the settlement in Canaan, and are of such a nature as to convict their fabricator of imposture, if, indeed, any one could have been found so daring as to bring forth laws implying institutions which did not exist, and which under ordinary circumstances could not find permanence, even if they could ever be carried into operation at all. But if these laws emanated from Moses, is it credible that he would have given utterance to commands which convict themselves of impossibility? or caused the rise of institutions, which, if unsupported of heaven, must come to a speedy termination, and in so doing act to his own discredit as a professed divine messenger?

(6) Productiveness of Land. On the possibility of the land's affording sufficient food, we find the following important passage in Palfrey's Lectures on the Jewish Scriptures, Boston, 1841, vol. i, p. 303:

'I find no difficulty arising from any inadequacy of the produce of six years to afford sustenance to the people for seven. To say that this was intended would merely be to say that the design was that the consumption of each year should only amount on an average to six-sevenths of its produce. In such an arrangement it cannot be thought that there was anything impracticable.'

There are states of the union which export yearly more than half their produce, and subsist substantially on the remainder, their imports consisting mostly of luxuries. Again, in England nearly three-quarters of the families are engaged in commerce, manufactures, professions, and unproductive pursuits; but in Judea every man was a producer of food, with the advantage of a fine climate and a rich soil.

It may be of some importance to remark that those who believe that these laws were good, and were also executed, are not therefore required to maintain that the regular and intended series of things was never interrupted.

(7) Conditional Promises. The promises of God are in all cases conditioned on human obedience. This condition is expressly laid down in the case before us (Lev. xxv:18, 36, 38). At the same time, the silence of the sacred history before the captivity looks as if the law in question was so uninterruptedly, regularly, and as a matter of course, observed from Jubilee to Jubilee, that no occasion transpired for remark. In history, as in every day life, more is said of the exceptional than the periodical and the ordinary.

(8) Execution of Laws. The tenor of these observations will probably lead the reader to consider it a somewhat surprising assertion, that these laws were not executed before the Babylonish exile; yet such is the statement of Winer (Real-wörterb. under 'Jubeljahr' and De Wette (Lehrb. der Archäol., p. 158). Some passages of Scripture are referred to, which are thought to imply the truth of this position, as 1 Kings xxi: 3; Is. v:8; 2 Chron. xxxvi:21; Lev. xxvi:34).

For the opposite view, there is, in agreement with the general tenor of this article, some positive evidence which must be briefly indicated (see Roman historian Tacitus' Hist. v. 4; Josephus Antiq. xiv, 10, 6; 1 Macc. vi:49; Ezek. xlvi:17; Is. lxi:1, 2); and since the essential element of this system of law, namely the Sabbatical year, was, as we have seen, an established institution in the days of Tacitus, Josephus, the Maccabees, Ezekiel, and Isaiah, we think the fair and legitimate inference is in favor of those laws having been long previously observed, probably from the early periods of the Hebrew republic. Their existence in a declining state of the commonwealth cannot be explained without seeking their origin nearer the fountain-head of those pure, living waters, which, with the force of all primitive enthusiasm, easily effected great social wonders, especially when divinely guided and divinely sustained.

J. R. B.

JUCAL (jū'kal), (Heb. ^{יְכָל}, yoo-kal, able), son of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxviii:1). Elsewhere the name is JEHUCAL (which see).

JUDA (jū'dā), (Heb. ^{יְהוּדָא}, yeh-hoo-daw', praise; Gr. Ἰουδᾶς, ee-oo'das, Judas; Juda is only the genitive case).

1. Son of Joseph, in the ninth generation from David in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:30), probably the same with Adaiah, the father of Maaseiah (2 Chron. xxiii:1), B. C. before 876. (See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.)

2. Son of Joanna (Luke iii:26), or Hananiah (8), and probably the same person as Abiud (Matt. i:13). (See Hervey, Genealogies, p. 118, sq.). Probably also identical with Obadiah (1 Chron. iii:21), B. C. before 406.

3. One of the brethren of Christ mentioned in Mark vi:3. In Matt. xiii:55 the name is Judas. For his identity with Jude, see article JUDAS.

4. The patriarch Judah, thus called in Luke iii:33; Heb. vii:14; Rev. v:5, vii:5.

5. Juda, City of (Luke i:39). Whether this is a town or territory, that is in Judea, is disputed. If a city, it was in the hill country, and perhaps unknown to Luke himself. (See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. ii. 493; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 536; Robinson, Bib. Res., ii. 206.)

JUDÆA (ju-dē'ā), (Gr. Ἰουδαία, ee-oo-dah'yah), the southernmost of the three divisions of the Holy Land. It denoted the kingdom of Judah as distinguished from that of Israel. But after the captivity, as most of the exiles who returned belonged to the kingdom of Judah, the name Judæa (Judah) was applied generally to the whole of Palestine west of the Jordan (Hag. i:1, 14; ii:2).

(1) Under the Romans. Under the Romans, in the time of Christ, Palestine was divided into Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria (John iv:3, 4; Acts ix:31), the last including the whole of the southern part west of the Jordan. But this division was only observed as a political and local distinction, for the sake of indicating the part of the country, just as we use the name of a county (Matt. ii:1, 5; iii:1; iv:25; Luke i:65); but when the whole of Palestine was to be indicated in a general way, the term Judæa was still employed. Thus persons in Galilee and elsewhere spoke of going to Judæa (John vii:3; xi:7), to distinguish the part of Palestine to which they were proceeding; but when persons in Rome and other places spoke of Judæa (Acts xxviii:21), they used the word as a general denomination for the country of the Jews, or Palestine. Indeed, the name seems to have had a more extensive application than even to Palestine west of the Jordan. It denoted all the dominions of Herod the Great, who was called king of Judæa; and much of these lay beyond the river. After the death of Herod, however, the Judæa to which his son Archelaus succeeded was only the southern province so called (Matt. ii:22); which afterwards became a Roman province dependent on Syria and governed by procurators, and this was its condition during our Lord's ministry. It was afterwards for a time partly under the dominion of Herod Agrippa the elder (Acts xii:1-19), but on his death it reverted to its former condition under the Romans.

(2) Province of Judæa. It is Judæa in the provincial sense only that requires our present notice, the country at large being described in the article PALESTINE. In this sense, however, it was much more extensive than the domain of the tribe of Judah, even more so than the kingdom of the same name. There are no materials for describing its limits with precision; but it included the ancient territories of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, and part of Ephraim.

In the rabbinical writings Judæa, as a division of Palestine, is frequently called 'the south,' or 'the south country,' to distinguish it from Galilee, which was called 'the north' (Lightfoot, Chorog. Cent. xii). The distinction of the tribe of Judah into 'the Mountain,' 'the Plain,' and 'the Vale,' which we meet with in the Old Testament (Num. xiii:30), was preserved under the more extended denomination of Judæa. The Mountain, or hill country of Judæa (Josh. xxi:11; Luke i:39), was that 'broad back of mountains,' as Lightfoot calls it (Chorog. Cent. xi), which fills the center of the country from Hebron northward to beyond Jerusalem. The Plain was the low country towards the seacoast, and seems to have included not only the broad plain which extends between the sea and the hill country, but the lower parts of the hilly region itself in that direction. Thus the rabbins allege that from Bethhoron to the sea is one region (T. Hieros. Shevi'ith, ix:2). The Vale is defined by the rabbins as extending from Engedi to Jericho (Lightfoot, Panergon, sec. 2).

(3) Topography. Judæa is, as the above intimations would suggest, a country full of hills and valleys. The hills are generally separated from one another by valleys and torrents, and are, for the most part, of moderate height, uneven, and seldom of any regular figure. The rock of which they are composed is easily converted into soil, which being arrested by the terraces when washed down by the rains, renders the hills cultivable in a series of long, narrow gardens, formed by these terraces from the base upwards. In this manner the hills were in ancient times cultivated most industriously, and enriched and beautified with the fig tree, the olive tree, and the vine; and it is thus that the scanty cultivation which still subsists is now carried on. But when the inhabitants were rooted out, and the culture neglected, the terraces fell into decay, and the soil which had been collected in them was washed down into the valleys, leaving only the arid rock, naked and desolate. This is the general character of the scenery; but in some parts the hills are beautifully wooded, and in others the application of the ancient mode of cultivation still suggests to the traveler how rich the country once was and might be again, and how beautiful the prospects which it offered. As, however, much of this was the result of cultivation, the country was probably anciently, as at present, naturally less fertile than either Samaria or Galilee. (See Kitto, Pictorial History of Palestine; Introduct. pp. 39, 40, 119; Olin, ii:323.)

JUDÆA, THE LAND OF (ju-dæ'á, the länd öv), indicates the country as distinguished from the capital, or Jerusalem (Mark i:5; John iii:22).

Wilderness of Judæa.

JUDÆA, THE WILDERNESS OF.

Here John the Baptist first taught (Matt. iii:1) and Christ was tempted; probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of it were not absolutely barren or uninhabited.

It lay along the eastern border of Judæa towards the Dead Sea, in which were the six cities mentioned in Josh. xv:61 sq. It was a region thinly inhabited, and used mostly as a pasture land.

JUDAH (jū'dah), (Heb. יְהוּדָה, ye-hoo-daw', celebrated).

1. The fourth son of Jacob and Leah (B. C. about 1916). The narrative in Genesis brings this patriarch more before the reader, and makes known more of his history and character than it does in the case of any other of the twelve sons of Jacob, with the single exception of Joseph. It is indeed chiefly in connection with Joseph that the facts respecting Judah transpire; and as they have already been given in the articles JACOB and JOSEPH, I, it is only necessary to indicate them shortly in this place.

(1) Relation to Joseph. It was Judah's advice that the brethren followed when they sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites, instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent actions we can see that his conduct on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them has been sometimes held to suggest an interested motive: 'What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come, let us sell him,' etc. (Gen. xxxvii:26, 27).

(2) Domestic Relations. Not long after this Judah withdrew from the paternal tents, and went to reside at Adullam, in the country which afterwards bore his name. Here he married a woman of Canaan, called Shuah, and had by her three sons. Er, Onan, and Shelah. When the eldest of these sons became of fit age, he was married to a woman named Tamar, but soon after died. As he died childless, the patriarchal law, afterwards adopted into the Mosaic code (Deut. xxv:6), required him to bestow upon the widow his second son. This he did; but as Onan also soon died childless, Judah became reluctant to bestow his only surviving son upon this woman, and put her off with the excuse that he was not yet of sufficient age. Tamar accordingly remained in her father's house at Adullam. She had the usual passion of Eastern women for offspring, and could not endure the stigma of having been twice married without bearing children, while the law precluded her from contracting any alliance but that which Judah withheld her from completing.

Meanwhile Judah's wife died, and after the time of mourning had expired, he went, accompanied by his friend Hirah, to attend the shearing of his sheep at Timnath in the same neighborhood. These circumstances suggested to Tamar the strange thought of connecting herself with Judah himself, under the guise of a loose woman. Having waylaid him on the road to Timnath, she succeeded in her object, and when the consequences began to be manifest in the person of Tamar, Judah was highly enraged at her crime, and, exercising the powers which belonged to him as the head of the family she had dishonored, he commanded her to be brought forth, and committed to the flames as an adulteress. But when she appeared, she produced the ring, the bracelet, and the staff which he had left in pledge with her, and put him to confusion by declaring that they belonged to the father of her coming offspring. Judah acknowledged them to be his, and confessed that he had been wrong in withholding Shelah from her. The result of this painful affair was the birth of two sons, Zerah and Pharez (B. C. about 1893), from whom, with Shelah, the tribe of Judah descended. Pharez was the ancestor of the line from which David, the kings of Judah, and Jesus came (Gen. xxxviii; xlvii:12; 1 Chron. ii:3-5; Matt. 1:3; Luke iii:33).

(3) Later Life. These circumstances seem to have disgusted Judah with his residence in towns; for we find him ever afterwards at his father's tents. His experience of life, and the strength of his character, appear to have given him much influence with Jacob; and it was chiefly from confidence in him that the aged father at length consented to allow Benjamin to go down to Egypt. That this confidence was not misplaced has already been shown (see JOSEPH); and there is not in the whole range of literature a finer piece of true natural eloquence than that in which Judah offers himself to remain as a bond-slave in the place of Benjamin, for whose safe return he had made himself responsible to his father. The strong emotions which it raised in Joseph disabled him from keeping up longer the disguise he had hitherto maintained, and there are few who have read it without being, like him, moved even to tears.

We hear nothing more of Judah till he received, along with his brothers, the final blessing of his father (B. C. 1856), which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xlix:8-12).

2. A Levite whose sons assisted in rebuilding the temple after the return from captivity (Ezra iii:9), B. C. 536. (Hervey, Genealogy, p. 119.)

3. A Levite who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x:23). Probably the same person is meant in Neh. xii:8, 36 (B. C. 536).

4. Son of Senuah, a Benjamite (Neh. xi:9), B. C. about 440.

5. One of those who followed half of the Jewish chiefs around the southern section of the newly-erected walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:34), B. C. 446.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF (jū'dab, king'dūm ōv).

When the territory of all the rest of Israel, except Judah and Benjamin, was lost to the kingdom of Rehoboam, a special single name was needed to denote that which remained to him.

(1) Extended Meaning. And almost of necessity the word Judah received an extended meaning, according to which it comprised not Benjamin only, but the priests and Levites, who were ejected in great numbers from Israel, and rallied round the house of David.

(2) The Term Jew. At a still later time, when the nationality of the ten tribes had been dissolved, and every practical distinction between the ten and the two had vanished during the captivity, the scattered body had no visible head, except in Jerusalem, which had been re-occupied by a portion of Judah's exiles. In consequence the name Judah (or Jcw) attached itself to the entire nation from about the epoch of the restoration. But in this article Judah is understood of the people over which David's successors reigned, from Rehoboam to Zedekiah.

(3) Revolt and Invasion. When the kingdom of Solomon became rent with intestine war, it might have been foreseen that the Edomites, Moabites and other surrounding nations would at once refuse their accustomed tribute, and become again practically independent; and some irregular invasion of these tribes might have been dreaded. It was a mark of conscious weakness, and not a result of strength, that Rehoboam fortified fifteen cities (2 Chron. xi:5-11), in which his people might find defense against the irregular armies of his roving neighbors. But a more formidable enemy came in, Shishak, king of Egypt, against whom the fortresses were of no avail (xii:4), and to whom Jerusalem was forced to open its gates; and, from the despoiling of his treasures, Rehoboam probably sustained a still greater shock in its moral effect on the Moabites and Edomites, than in the direct loss; nor is it easy to conceive that he any longer retained the commerce of the Red Sea, or any very lucrative trade.

(4) Decline. After Jehoshaphat followed the calamitous affinity with the house of Ahab, and the massacres of both families. Under Jehoiada the priest, and Jehoash his pupil, no martial efforts were made; but Amaziah, son of Jehoash, after hiring 100,000 Israelites to no purpose, made war on the Edomites, slew 10,000, and threw 10,000 more down from the top of their rock (xxv:5, 6, 11, 12). His own force in Judah, from twenty years old and upwards, was numbered at only 300,000 choice men, able to handle spear and shield. His son Uzziah had 2,600 military officers and 307,500 men of war (xxvi:12, 13). Ahaz lost, in a single battle with Pekah, 120,000 valiant men (xxviii:6), after the severe slaughter he had received from Rezin, king of Syria; after which no further military strength is ascribed to the kings of Judah.

(5) Army of Rehoboam. It perhaps deserves remark, that in the book of Kings no numbers of such magnitude are found. The army ascribed to Rehoboam (1 Kings xii:21) is, indeed, as in Chronicles, 180,000 men; but if we explain it of those able to fight, the number, though certainly large, may be dealt with historically. (See the article on STATISTICS.)

(6) External Relations. As the most important external relations of Israel were with Damascus, so were those of Judah with Edom and Egypt. Some revolution in the state of Egypt appears to have followed the reign of Shishak. Apparently the country must have fallen under the power of an Ethiopian dynasty; for the name of the Lubim, who accompanied Zerah in his attack on Asa, is generally regarded as proving that Zerah was from Sennaar, the ancient Meroë. But as this invasion was signally repulsed, the attempt was not repeated; and Judah enjoyed entire tranquillity from that quarter until the invasion of Pharaoh-necho.

(7) Favorable Reaction. In fact, it may seem that this success assisted the reaction, favorable to the power of Judah, which was already begun, in consequence of a change in the policy of Damascus.

Whether Abijah had been in league with the father of Benhadad I (as is generally inferred from 1 Kings xv:19) may be doubted; for the address cannot be rendered, 'Let there be a league between me and thee, as there was between my father and thine;' and it possibly is only a hyperbolical phrase of friendship for, 'Let us be in close alliance; let us count our fathers to have been allies.' However this may be, Asa bought, by a costly sacrifice, the serviceable aid of the Damascene king. Israel was soon distressed, and Judah became once more formidable to her southern neighbors.

(8) Edomites Made Tributary. Jehoshaphat appears to have reasserted the Jewish authority over the Edomites without war, and to have set his own viceroy over them (1 Kings xxii:47). Intending to resume the distant commerce which had been so profitable to Solomon, he built ships suitable for long voyages ('ships of Tarshish,' as they are rightly called in 1 Kings xxii:48—a phrase which the Chronicler has misunderstood and translated into 'ships to go to Tarshish' (2 Chron. xx:36); but not having the advantage of Tyrian sailors, as Solomon had, he lost the vessels by violent weather before they had sailed. Upon this, Ahaziah, king of Judah, offered the service of his own mariners, probably from the tribe of Asher and others accustomed to the Mediterranean; but Jehoshaphat was too discouraged to accept his offer, and the experiment was never renewed by any Hebrew king.

(9) Revolt of Edomites. The Edomites, who paid only a forced allegiance, soon after revolted from Jehoram, and elected their own king (2 Kings viii:20, 22). At a later time they were severely defeated by Amaziah (2 Kings xiv:7), whose son, Uzziah, fortified the town of Elath, intending, probably, to resume maritime enterprise; but it remained a barren possession, and was finally taken from them by Rezin, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi:6). The Philistines, in these times, seem to have fallen from their former greatness, their league having been so long dissolved.

(10) Jerusalem Plundered. The most remarkable event in which the Philistines are concerned is the assault on Jerusalem, in the reign of Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi:16, 17).

It is strikingly indicative of the stormy scenes through which the line of David passed that the treasures of the king and of the Temple were so often plundered or bargained away. First, under Rehoboam, all the hoards of Solomon, consecrated and common alike, were carried off by Shishak (1 Kings xiv:26). Two generations later, Asa emptied out to Benhadad all that had since accumulated 'in the house of Jehovah or in the king's house.' A third time, when Hazael had taken Gath, and was preparing to march on Jerusalem, Jehoash, king of Judah, turned him away by sending to him all 'that Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, Ahaziah and Jehoash himself had dedicated, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of Jehovah and in the king's house (2 Kings xii:18). In the very next reign Jehoash, king of Israel, defeated and captured Amaziah, took Jerusalem, broke down the walls, carried off hostages, and plundered the gold and silver deposited in the temple and in the royal palace (2 Kings xiv:11-14). A fifth sacrifice of the sacred and of the royal treasure was made by Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvi:8). The act was repeated by his son Hezekiah to Sennacherib, who had demanded '300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold.' It is the more extraordinary, therefore, to find expressions used when Nebuchadnezzar took the city, which at first sight imply that Solomon's far-famed stores were still untouched (2 Kings xxiv:13).

The severest shock which the house of David received was the double massacre which it endured from Jehu and from Athaliah (2 Kings x, xi).

(11) Rule of Jehoiada. After a long minority, a youthful king, the sole surviving male descendant of his great-grandfather, and reared under the paternal rule of the priest Jehoiada, to whom he was indebted not only for his throne but even for his recognition as a son of Ahaziah, was not in a situation to uphold the royal authority. That Jehoash conceived the priests to have abused the power which they had gained sufficiently appears in 2 Kings xii, where he complains that they had for twenty-three years appropriated the money, which they ought to have spent on the repairs of the temple. Jehoiada gave way; but we see here the beginning of a feud (hitherto unknown in the house of David) between the crown and the priestly order; which, after Jehoiada's death, led to the murder of his son Zechariah. The execution of the priest of Baal, and of Athaliah (2 Kings xi:13-18), granddaughter of a king of Sidon, must also have destroyed cordiality between the Phœnicians and the kingdom of Judah; and when the victorious Hazael had subjugated all Israel and showed himself near Jerusalem, Jehoash could look for no help from without, and had neither the faith of Hezekiah nor a prophet like Isaiah to support him.

(12) Assassination of Jehoash. The assassination of Jehoash in his bed by 'his own servants' is described in the Chronicles as a revenge taken upon him by the priestly party for his murder of 'the sons' of Jehoiada; and the same fate, from the same influence, fell upon his son Amaziah, if we may so interpret the words in 2 Chron. xxv:27.

(13) Amaziah, Uzziah, and Ahaz. 'From the time that Amaziah turned away from following Jehovah they made a conspiracy against him,' etc. Thus the house of David appeared to be committing itself, like that of Saul, to permanent enmity with the priests. The wisdom of Uzziah, during a long reign, averted this collision, though a symptom of it returned towards its close. No further mischief from this cause followed, until the reign of his grandson, the weak and unfortunate Ahaz; after which the power of the kingdom rapidly moldered away.

The struggle of the crown against priestly control was perhaps the most immediate cause of the ruin of Judah. Ahaz was probably less guided by policy than by superstition, or by architectural taste, in erecting his Damascene altar (2 Kings xvi:10-18).

(14) Ruinous Conduct of Manasseh. But the far more outrageous proceedings of Manasseh seem to have been a systematic attempt to extirpate the national religion because of its supporting the priestly power; and the 'innocent blood very much,' which he is stigmatized for shedding (2 Kings xxi:16), was undoubtedly a sanguinary attack on the party opposed to his impious and despotic innovations. The storm which he had raised did not burst in his lifetime; but two years after it fell on the head of his son Amon; and the disorganization of the kingdom which his madness had wrought is commemorated as the cause of the Babylonish captivity (2 Kings xxiii:26; xxiv:3, 4). It is also credible that the long-continued despotism had greatly lessened patriotic spirit; and that the Jewish people of the declining kingdom were less brave against foreign invaders than against kindred and neighbor tribes or civil opponents.

(15) Fatal Decline. Faction had become very fierce within Jerusalem itself (Ezek. xxii), and civil bloodshed was common. Wealth, where it existed, was generally a source of corruption, by introducing foreign luxury, tastes, manners, superstitions, immorality, or idolatry; and when consecrated to pious purposes, as by Hezekiah and Josiah, produced little more than a formal and exterior religion.

The appointment of Hilkiyah to the office of high-priest seems to mark the era at which (by a reaction after the atrocities of Manasseh and Amon) the purer priestly sentiment obtained its triumph over the crown. But the victory came too late. Society was corrupt and convulsed within, and the two great powers of Egypt and Babylon menaced it from without. True lovers of their God and of their country, like Jeremiah, saw that it was a time rather for weeping than for action; and that the faithful must resign themselves to the bitter lot which the sins of their nation had earned.

F. W. N.

JUDAH, TRIBE OF (jū'dāh, trib öv). This tribe sprang from Judah, the son of Jacob.

When the Israelites quitted Egypt, it already exhibited the elements of its future distinction in a larger population than any of the other tribes possessed.

(1) Population. It numbered 74,000 adult males, being nearly 12,000 more than Dan, the next in point of numbers, and 34,100 more than Ephraim, which in the end contested with it the superiority among the tribes. During the sojourn in the wilderness, Judah neither gained, like some tribes, nor lost like others. Its numbers had increased to 76,500, being 12,100 more than Issachar, which had become next to it in population (Num. i:27).

(2) Distribution of Lands. In the first distribution of lands, the tribe of Judah received the southernmost part of Palestine, to the extent of fully one-third of the whole country to be distributed among the nine and a half tribes for which provision was to be made. This oversight was discovered and rectified at the time of the second distribution, which was founded on an actual survey of the country, when Simeon and Dan received allotments out of the territory which had before been wholly assigned to Judah (Josh. xix:9). That which remained was still very large, and more proportioned to the future greatness than the actual wants of the tribe. When Judah became a kingdom, the original extent of territory assigned to the tribe was more than restored or compensated, for it must have included the domains of Simeon, and we know that Benjamin was included in it.

(3) History of the Judges. The history of the Judges contains fewer facts respecting this important tribe than might be expected. It seems, however, to have been usually considered that the birthright which Reuben forfeited had passed to Judah under the blessing of Jacob; and a sanction was given to this impression when, after the death of Joshua, the divine oracle nominated Judah to take precedence of the other tribes in the war against the Canaanites (Judg. i:2).

It does not appear that any tribe was disposed to dispute the superior claim of Judah on its own account, except Ephraim, although in doing this Ephraim had the support of other tribes. Ephraim appears to have rested its claims to the leadership of the tribes upon the ground that the house of Joseph, whose interest it represented, had received the birthright, or double portion of the eldest, by the adoption of the two sons of Joseph, who became the founders of two tribes in Israel.

The existence of the sacerdotal establishment at Shiloh, in Ephraim, was doubtless also alleged by the tribes as a ground of superiority over Judah. When, therefore, Judah assumed the scepter in the person of David, and when the sacerdotal establishment was removed to Jerusalem, Ephraim could not brook the eclipse it had sustained, and took the first opportunity of erecting a separate throne, and forming separate establishments for worship and sacrifice.

Perhaps the separation of the kingdoms may thus be traced to the rivalry of Judah and Ephraim. After that separation the rivalry was between the two kingdoms; but it was still popularly considered as representing the ancient rivalry of these great tribes; for the prophet, in foretelling the repose of a coming time, describes it by saying, 'The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off; Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim' (Is. xi:13).

JUDAH UPON JORDAN (jū'dah ūpōn jōr'dan), a border town of Naphtali (Josh. xix:34).

While Judah was in the south and Naphtali in the north it is entirely possible that a town in one tribe was named after the country of another.

JUDAISM (jū'dā-izm), (Gr. 'Ιουδαϊσμός, ee-oo-day-is-mos').

Judaism denotes the Jewish faith in its extravagant form of blind attachment to rites and traditions, and national exclusiveness. This must have been prevalent in the time of Christ, because of his constant exposure of their formalism and self-assumption, and because in John's Gospel "the Jews" is used as synonymous with opposers of Christ and his teachings.

In the eyes of the Jew, Judaism possessed the merit of both piety and patriotism (Gal. i, 13, 14.)

JUDAS or JUDE (jū'das), (Gr. 'Ιούδας, ee-oo-das, the Greek form of the Hebrew JUDAH).

1. The patriarch Judah (Matt. i:2, 3).
2. A man who lived in Damascus, and with whom Saul lodged after his conversion (Acts ix:11), in the street, "that is called straight." No further mention of him occurs. It is far from probable that he was a Christian, as none of Saul's company were Christians, nor did they know that he himself had become converted. The so-called "House of Judas" is still shown in an open space called "the Sheik's Place," a few steps out of the Street of Bazaars.

3. Judas, otherwise Jude, surnamed Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the Apostles at Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the ways by the Gentiles (Acts xv:22, 23, 27), A. D. 54. Some think, that this Judas was the brother of Joseph, surnamed also Barsabas, who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas (Acts i:23). Luke says that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren; and it is also believed that he was one of the seventy disciples.

4. Judas Gaulanitis, or the Gaulanite, opposed the enrollment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judæa (see CYRENIUS) and raised a very great rebellion, pretending that the Jews, being free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilean (Acts v:37) because he was a native of the city of Gamala in the Gaulanitis, which was comprised in Galilee.

5. There were two of this name among the twelve Apostles—Judas, called also Lebbæus and Thaddæus (Matt. x:3, 4; Mark iii:18, which see), and Judas Iscariot. Judas is the name of one of our Lord's brethren, but it is not agreed whether our Lord's brother is the same with the Apostle of this name (See JAMES). We are not informed as to the time of the calling of the Apostle Jude to that dignity. Indeed, the only circumstance relating to him which is recorded in the Gospels consists in the question put by him to our Lord (John xiv:22). 'Judas saith unto him (not Iscariot), Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not unto the world?' Nor have we any account given of his proceedings after our Lord's resurrection, for the traditional notices which have been preserved of him rest on no very certain foundation. It has been asserted that he was sent to Edessa, to Abgarus, king of Osroene (Jerome, Annot. in Matt.), and that he preached in Syria, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Persia; in which latter country he suffered martyrdom (Lardner's Hist. of the Apostles). Jude the Apostle is commemorated in the Western church, together with the Apostle Simon (the name, also, of one of our Lord's brethren) on the 8th of October.

St. Luke (Acts xv:22, 27-33) speaks of Judas, the son of Barsabas, in company with Silas, both of whom he styles 'prophets,' and 'chief men among the brethren.' Schott supposes that Barsabas means the son of Sabas, or Zabas, which he looks upon as an abridged form for Zebedee, and concludes that the Judas here mentioned was a brother of the elder James and of John.

JUDAS ISCARIOT (jū'das is-cār'i-ot).

The object of this article is not to elucidate all the circumstances recorded respecting this person but simply to investigate his motives in delivering up Jesus to the chief priests. The evangelists relate his proceedings, but give no opinion. The subject is consequently open to inquiry. Our conclusions must be guided by the facts of the case, and the known feelings and principles of human nature. Some hypothesis is necessarily formed by every reader.

(1) Motives. The only conceivable motives for the conduct of Judas are a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice, resentment, avarice, dissatisfaction with the procedure of Jesus, and a consequent scheme for the accomplishment of his own views.

(2) Duty. With regard to the first of these motives, if Judas had been actuated by a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice for anything censurable in his intentions, words, or actions, he would certainly have alleged some charge against him in his first interview with the chief priests, and they would have brought him forward as a witness against Jesus, especially when they were at so great a loss for evidence; or they would have reminded him of his accusations when he appealed to them after our Lord's condemnation, saying, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood'—a confession which amounts to an avowal that he had never seen anything to blame in his Master, but everything to approve. Moreover, the knowledge of the slightest fault in Jesus would have served, at least for the present, to tranquilize his own feelings, and prevent his immediate despair. The chief priests would also most certainly have alleged any charge he had made against Jesus, as a justification of their conduct, when they afterwards endeavored to prevent his apostles from preaching in his name (Acts iv:15-23; v:27-40).

(3) Resentment. The second motive supposed, namely, that of resentment, is rather more plausible. Jesus had certainly rebuked him for blaming the woman who had anointed him in the house of Simon the leper, at Bethany (comp. Matt. xxvi:8-17; John xii:4, 5); and Matthew's narrative seems to connect his going to the chief priests with that rebuke (verse 14), 'Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief-priests'; but closer inspection will convince the reader that those words are more properly connected with verse 3. Besides, the rebuke was general, 'Why trouble ye the woman?' Nor was it nearly so harsh as that received by Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Matt. xvi:23), and certainly not so public (Mark viii:32, 33).

Even if Judas had felt ever so much resentment, it could scarcely have been his sole motive; and as nearly two days elapsed between his contract with the chief priests and its completion, it would have subsided during the interval, and have yielded to that covetousness which we have every reason to believe was his ruling passion. St. John expressly declares that Judas 'was a thief, and had the bag, and bare (that is, conveyed away from it, stole, ἐβάσταζεν, eh-bas'tadz-en) what was put therein' (xii:6; comp. xx:15, in the original, and see a similar use of the word in Josephus, p. 402. 39, ed. Huds.).

This rebuke, or rather certain circumstances attending it, might have determined him to act as he did, but is insufficient, of itself, to account entirely for his conduct, by which he endangered all his expectations of worldly advancement from Jesus, at the very moment when they seemed upon the verge of being fulfilled. It is, indeed, a most important feature in the case, that the hopes entertained by Judas, and all the apostles, from their Master's expected elevation, as the Messiah, to the throne of Judæa, and, as they believed, to the empire of the whole world, were never more steadfast than at the time when he covenanted with the chief priests to deliver him into their hands. Nor does the theory of mere resentment agree with the terms of censure in which the conduct and character of Judas are spoken of by our Lord and the evangelists.

(4) Covetousness. Since, then, this supposition is insufficient, we may consider another motive to which his conduct is more commonly ascribed, namely, covetousness. But if by covetousness be meant the eager desire to obtain 'the thirty pieces of silver,' with which the chief priest 'covenanted with him' (Matt. xxvi:15), it represents scarcely a less inadequate motive. Can it be conceived that Judas would deliberately forego the prospect of immense wealth from his Master, by delivering him up for about four pounds ten shillings sterling, or twenty-two dollars of American money, upon the highest computation, and not more than double the value of a sum which he might easily have purloined from the bag? Is it likely that he would have made such a sacrifice for any further sum, however large, which we may suppose 'they promised him' (Mark xiv:11), and of which the thirty pieces of silver might have been the mere earnest (Luke xxii:5)? Had covetousness been his motive, he would have ultimately applied to the chief priests, not to bring again the thirty pieces of silver with the confession, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood' (Matt. xxvii:4), but to demand the completion of their agreement with him.

(5) Dissatisfaction with the Master. We are now at liberty to consider the only remaining motive for the conduct of Judas, namely, dissatisfaction with the procedure of his Master, and a consequent scheme for the furtherance of his own views. It seems to us likely that the impatience of Judas for the accomplishment of his worldly views, which we conceive to have ever actuated him in following Jesus, could no longer be restrained, and that our Lord's observations at Bethany served to mature a stratagem he had meditated long before. He had no doubt been greatly disappointed at seeing his Master avoid being made a king, after feeding the five thousand in Galilee.

Many a favorable crisis had Jesus seemed to lose, or had not dared to embrace, and now while at Bethany he talks of his burial (John xii:7); and though none of his apostles, so firm were their worldly expectations from their Master, could clearly understand such 'sayings' (Luke xviii:34), yet they had been made 'exceeding sorry' by them (Matt. xvii:23).

At the same time Judas had long been convinced by the miracles he had seen his Master perform that he was the Messiah (John vii:31). He had even heard him accept this title from his apostles in private (Matt. xvi:16). He had promised them that when he should 'sit upon the throne of his glory, they should sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel' (Matt. xix:28). Yet now, when everything seemed most favorable to the assumption of empire, he hesitates and desponds. In his daily public conferences, too, with the chief priests and Pharisees, he appears to offend them by his reproofs, rather than to conciliate their favor. Within a few days, the people, who had lately given him a triumphal entry into the city, having kept the passover, would be dispersed to their homes, and Judas and his fellow apostles be, perhaps, required to attend their Master on another tedious expedition through the country. Hence it seems most probable that Judas resolved upon the plan of delivering up his Master to the Jewish authorities, when he would be compelled, in self-defense, to prove his claims, by giving them the sign from heaven they had so often demanded; they would, he believed, elect him in due form as the King Messiah and thus enable him to reward his followers. He did, indeed, receive from Jesus many alarming admonitions against his design; but the plainest warnings are lost upon a mind totally absorbed by a purpose, and agitated by many violent passions. The worst he would permit himself to expect was a temporary displeasure for placing his Master in this dilemma; but as he most likely believed, judging from himself, that Jesus anticipated worldly aggrandizement, he might calculate upon his forgiveness when the emergency should have been triumphantly surmounted.

(6) Hope of a Miracle. Judas could not doubt his Master's ability to extricate himself from his enemies by miracle. He had known him to do so more than once (Luke iv:30; John viii:59; x:39). Hence his directions to the officers to 'hold him fast,' when he was apprehended (Matt. xxvi:48). With other Jews he believed the Messiah would never die (John xii:34); accordingly, we regard his pecuniary stipulation with the priests as a mere artful cover to his deeper and more comprehensive design; and so that he served their purpose in causing the apprehension of Jesus, they would little care to scrutinize his motive. All they felt was being 'glad' at his proposal (Mark xiv:11), and the plan appeared to hold good up to the very moment of our Lord's condemnation; for after his apprehension his miraculous power seemed unabated, from his healing Malchus.

Judas heard him declare that he could even then 'ask, and his father would give him twelve legions of angels' for his rescue. But when Judas, who awaited the issue of the trial with such different expectations, saw that though Jesus had avowed himself to be the Messiah, he had not convinced the Sanhedrim, and, instead of extricating himself from their power by miracle, had submitted to be 'condemned, buffeted and 'spit upon' by his judges and accusers, then it would seem he awoke to a full view of all the consequences of his conduct.

(7) Repentance and Suicide. The prophecies of the Old Testament, 'that Christ should suffer,' and of Jesus, concerning his own rejection and death, flashed on his mind in their true sense and full force, and he found himself the wretched instrument of their fulfilment. He made a last desperate effort to stay proceedings. He presented himself to the chief priests, offered to return the money, confessed that he had sinned in that he had betrayed the innocent blood, and upon receiving their heartless answer was wrought into a frenzy of despair, during which he committed suicide.

There is much significance in these words of Matt. xxvii:3. 'Then Judas, when he saw he was condemned,' not expiring on the cross, 'repented himself,' etc. If such be the true hypothesis of his conduct, then, however culpable it may have been as originating in the most inordinate covetousness, impatience of the procedure of Providence, crooked policy, or any other bad quality, he is certainly absolved from the direct intention of procuring his Master's death.

(8) Difference Between Judas and Other Apostles. 'The difference,' says Archbishop Whately, 'between Iscariot and his fellow apostles was, that though they all had the same expectations and conjectures, he dared to act on his conjectures, departing from the plain course of his known duty to follow the calculations of his worldly wisdom and the schemes of his worldly ambition.' JUDE (jüde). See JUDAS.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF (jüde, ê-pis' 'l).

(1) Authenticity. Doubts have been thrown upon the genuineness of this Epistle, from the fact that the writer was supposed to have cited two apocryphal books—Enoch and the Assumption of Moses. But, notwithstanding the difficulties connected with this point, this epistle was treated by the ancients with the highest respect, and regarded as the genuine work of an inspired writer. Although Origen on one occasion speaks doubtfully, calling it the 'reputed epistle of Jude,' yet on another occasion, and in the same work (Com. in Matt.), he says, 'Jude wrote an epistle, of few lines indeed, but full of the powerful words of heavenly grace, who at the beginning says, "Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James."' The same writer (Com. in Rom. and De Princip. iii:2, i:138) calls it the writing of Jude the Apostle.

The moderns are, however, divided in opinion between Jude the Apostle and Jude the Lord's brother, if indeed they be different persons. Hug and De Wette ascribe it to the latter.

(2) Another Brother of James. The author simply calls himself Jude, the brother of James, and a servant of Jesus Christ. This form of expression has given rise to various conjectures.

Hug supposes that he intimates thereby a nearer degree of relationship than that of an apostle.

At the same time it must be acknowledged that the circumstance of his not naming himself an apostle is not of itself necessarily sufficient to militate against his being the apostle of that name, inasmuch as St. Paul does not upon all occasions (as in Philippians, Thessalonians, and Philemon) use this title. From his calling himself the brother of James, rather than the brother of the Lord, Michaelis deduces that he was the son of Joseph by a former wife, and not a full brother of our Lord's, as Herder contends. (See JAMES; JUDAS OR JUDE.)

(3) Coincidence with Epistles of Peter. From the great coincidence both in sentiment and subject which exists between our epistle and the second of St. Peter, it has been thought by many critics that one of these writers had seen the other's work; but we shall reserve the discussion as to which was the earlier writing until we come to treat of St. Peter's Epistle.

(4) When Written. Dr. Lardner supposes that Jude's Epistle was written between the years 64 and 66, Beausohre and L'Enfant between 70 and 75 (from which Dodwell and Cave do not materially differ), and Dr. Mill fixes it at the year 90. If Jude has quoted the apocryphal book of Enoch, as seems to be agreed upon by most modern critics, and if this book was written, as Lücke thinks, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the age of our epistle best accords with the date assigned to it by Mill.

(5) To Whom Addressed. It is difficult to decide who the persons were to whom this epistle was addressed, some supposing that it was written to converted Jews, others to all Christians without distinction. Many of the arguments seem best adapted to convince the Jewish Christians, as appeals are so strikingly made to their sacred books and traditions.

(6) Design. The design of this epistle is to warn the Christians against the false teachers who had insinuated themselves among them and disseminated dangerous tenets of insubordination and licentiousness. The author reminds them, by the example of Sodom and Gomorrah, that God had punished the rebellious Jews; and that even the disobedient angels had shared the same fate. The false teachers to whom he alludes 'speak evil of dignities,' while the archangel Michael did not even revile Satan. He compares them to Balaam and Korah, to clouds without water, and to raging waves. Enoch, he says, foretold their wickedness; at the same time he consoles believers, and exhorts them to persevere in faith and love. The epistle is remarkable for the vehemence, fervor and energy of its composition and style. (See ANTILEGOMENA.)

JUDGE (jūj), (Heb. שֹׁפֵט, shaw-fat').

1. To try and determine a cause (Exod. xviii:13). The manner of giving sentence was different in different nations. The Jewish judges gave sentence by simply declaring to the accused, Thou art guilty, or Thou art innocent. The Romans did it by casting various tables into a box or urn, marked with an A, if they absolved; and with a C, if they condemned the accused. Some of the Greeks intimated the sentence of absolution, by giving a white stone; and of condemnation by giving a black one; to this allusion is made in Rev. ii:17.

2. To esteem; account, as if on trial (Acts xvi:15).

3. To rule and govern, as one having power to try and determine causes (Ps. lviii:11).

4. To punish, as in consequence of trial and sentence; and to declare and denounce such punishments (Heb. xiii:4; Ezek. vii:3-8 and xxii:2).

5. To censure rashly (Matt. vii:1).

6. To appear upon one's side, as in consequence of trial of his cause (Prov. xvii:18). (See LAW.)

JUDGES (jūj'ēs). This name is applied to fifteen persons who at intervals presided over the affairs of the Israelites during the 350 years (according to Usher's chronology) which elapsed from the death of Joshua to the accession of Saul.

(1) Rulers of the People. The term Judges, used in the English Bibles, does not exactly represent the original Heb. שֹׁפֵט, sho-phe-tim, i. e., 'rulers of the people.' The station and office of these shophetim are involved in great obscurity, partly from the want of clear intimations in the history in which their exploits and government are recorded, and partly from the absence of parallels in the history of other nations, by which our notions might be assisted.

(2) Singular Institution. In fact the government of the judges forms the most singular part of the Hebrew institutions, and that which appears most difficult to comprehend. The kings, the priests, the generals, the heads of tribes—all these offer some points of comparison with the same functionaries in other nations; but the judges stand alone in the history of the world; and when we think that we have found officers resembling them in other nations, the comparison soon breaks down in some point of importance.

(3) Nature of the Office. It remains to inquire into the nature of the office itself, and the powers and privileges which were connected with it. It is usual to consider them as commencing their career with military exploits to deliver Israel from foreign oppression; but this is by no means invariably the case. Eli and Samuel were not military men; Deborah judged Israel before she planned the war against Jabin; and of Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, it is at least uncertain whether they ever held any military command. The command of the army can therefore scarcely be considered the distinguishing characteristic of these men, or military exploits the necessary introduction to the office. In many cases it is true that military achievements were the means by which they elevated themselves to the rank of judges; but in general the appointment may be said to have varied with the exigencies of the times, and with the particular circumstances which in times of trouble would draw the public attention to persons who appeared suited by their gifts or influence to advise in matters of general concernment, to decide in questions arising between tribe and tribe, to administer public affairs, and to appear as their recognized head in their intercourse with their neighbors and oppressors.

(4) Choice of the People. In nearly all the instances recorded the appointment seems to have been by the free, unsolicited choice of the people. The election of Jephthah, who was nominated as the fittest man for the existing emergency, probably resembled that which was usually followed on such occasions; and probably, as in his case, the judge, in accepting the office, took care to make such stipulations as he deemed necessary.

(5) Divine Appointment. The only cases of direct Divine appointment are those of Gideon and Samson, and the last stood in the peculiar position of having been from before his birth ordained 'to begin to deliver Israel.' Deborah was called to deliver Israel, but was already a judge. Samuel was called by the Lord to be a prophet, but not a judge, which ensued from the high gifts which the people recognized as dwelling in him; and as to Eli, the office of judge seems to have devolved naturally, or rather ex officio, upon him; and his case seems to be the only one in which the high-priest appears in the character which the theocratic institutions designed for him.

(6) Duties and Privileges. The following clear summary of their duties and privileges is from Jahn (Biblisches Archäologie, th. ii. bd. 1, sec. 22; Stowe's translation, ii:86): The office of judges or regents was held during life, but it was not hereditary, neither could they appoint their successors. Their authority was limited by the law alone; and in doubtful cases they were directed to consult the Divine King through the priest by Urim and Thummim (Num. xxvii:21).

They were not obliged in common cases to ask advice of the ordinary rulers; it was sufficient if these did not remonstrate against the measures of the judge. In important emergencies, however, they convoked a general assembly of the rulers, over which they presided and exerted a powerful influence. They could issue orders, but not enact laws; they could neither levy taxes nor appoint officers, except perhaps in the army.

Their authority extended only over those tribes by whom they had been elected or acknowledged; for it is clear that several of the judges presided over separate tribes. There was no income attached to their office, nor was there any income appropriated to them, unless it might be a larger share in the spoils, and those presents which were made them as testimonials of respect (Judg. viii:24).

They bore no external marks of dignity, and maintained no retinue of courtiers, though some of them were very opulent. They were not only simple in their manners, moderate in their desires, and free from avarice and ambition, but noble and magnanimous men, who felt that whatever they did for their country was above all reward, and could not be recompensed; who desired merely to promote the public good, and who chose rather to deserve well of their country than to be enriched by its wealth.

(7) Exalted Patriotism. This exalted patriotism, like everything else connected with politics in the theocratical state of the Hebrews, was partly of a religious character, and those regents always conducted themselves as the officers of God; in all their enterprises they relied upon him, and their only care was that their countrymen should acknowledge the authority of Jehovah, their Invisible King (Judg. viii: 22, sq.; comp. Heb. xi).

(8) Character. Still they were not without faults, neither are they so represented by their historians; they relate, on the contrary, with the utmost frankness, the great sins of which some of them were guilty. They were not merely deliverers of the state from a foreign yoke, but destroyers of idolatry, foes of pagan vices, promoters of the knowledge of God, of religion, and of morality; restorers of theocracy in the minds of the Hebrews, and powerful instruments of Divine Providence in the promotion of the great design of preserving the Hebrew constitution, and, by that means, of rescuing the true religion from destruction.

(9) Not a Complete History. The times of the judges would certainly not be considered so turbulent and barbarous, much less would they be taken, contrary to the clearest evidence and to the analogy of all history, for a heroic age, if they were viewed without the prejudices of a preconceived hypothesis. It must never be forgotten that the book of Judges is by no means a complete history. This no impartial inquirer can ever deny. It is, in a manner, a mere register of diseases, from which, however, we have no right to conclude that there were no healthy men, much less that there were no healthy seasons; since the book itself, for the most part, mentions only a few tribes in which the epidemic prevailed, and notices long periods during which it had universally ceased.

(10) Condition of the People. Whatever may be the result of a more accurate investigation, it remains undeniable that the condition of the Hebrews during this period perfectly corresponds throughout to the sanctions of the law; and they were always prosperous when they complied with the conditions on which prosperity was promised them; it remains undeniable that the government of God was clearly manifested, not only to the Hebrews, but to their heathen neighbors; that the fulfilling of the promises and threatenings of the law were so many sensible proofs of the universal dominion of the Divine King of the Hebrews; and, consequently, that all the various fortunes of that nation were so many means of preserving the knowledge of God on the earth. The Hebrews had no sufficient reason to desire a change in their constitution; all required was, that they should observe the conditions on which national prosperity was promised them.

(11) Chronology. The chronology of the period in which the judges ruled is beset with great and perhaps insuperable difficulties. There are intervals of time the extent of which is not specified; as, for instance, that from Joshua's death to the yoke of Chushan-rishathaim (ii:8); that of the rule of Shamgar (iii:31); that between Gideon's death and Abimelech's accession

(viii:31, 32); and that of Israel's renewal of idolatry previous to their oppression by the Ammonites (x:6, 7). Sometimes round numbers seem to have been given, as forty years for the rule of Othniel, forty years for that of Gideon, and forty years also for the duration of the oppression by the Philistines. Twenty years are given for the subjection to Jabin, and twenty years for the government of Samson; yet the latter never completely conquered the Philistines, who, on the contrary, succeeded in capturing him.

Some judges, who are commonly considered to have been successive, were in all probability contemporaneous, and ruled over different districts. Under these circumstances it is impossible to fix the date of each particular event in the book of Judges; but attempts have been made to settle its general chronology, of which we must in this place mention the most successful.

The whole period of the judges, from Joshua to Eli, is usually estimated at 299 years, in order to meet the 480 years which (1 Kings vi:1) are said to have elapsed from the departure of the Israelites from Egypt to the foundation of the temple by Solomon. But St. Paul says (Acts xiii:20), 'God gave unto the people of Israel judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel, the prophet.' Again, if the number of years specified by the author of our book, in stating facts, is summed up, we have 410 years, exclusive of those years not specified for certain intervals of time above mentioned. In order to reduce these 410 years and upwards to 299, events and reigns must, in computing their years of duration, either be entirely passed over, or, in a most arbitrary way, included in other periods preceding or subsequent.

(a) Of Usher. This has been done by Archbishop Usher, whose peculiarly faulty system has been adopted in the Authorized Version of the Scriptures. He excludes the repeated intervals during which the Hebrews were in subjection to their enemies, and reckons only the years of peace and rest which were assigned to the successive judges. For example, he passes over the eight years of servitude inflicted upon the Hebrews by Chushan-rishathaim, and, without any interruption, connects the peace obtained by the victories of Othniel with that which had been conferred on the land by the government of Joshua; and although the sacred historian relates on the plainest terms possible that the children of Israel served the king of Mesopotamia eight years, and were afterwards delivered by Othniel who gave the land rest forty years, the archbishop maintains that the forty years now mentioned began, not after the successes of this judge, but immediately after the demise of Joshua. Nothing certainly can be more obvious than that in this case the years of tranquillity and the years of oppression ought to be reckoned separately.

Again, we are informed by the sacred writer that after the death of Ehud the children of Israel were under the oppression of Jabin, king of Hazor, for twenty years, and that afterwards, when their deliverance was effected by Deborah and Barak, the land had rest forty years. Nothing can be clearer than this; yet Usher's system leads him to include the twenty years of oppression in the forty of peace, making both but forty years.

(b) Of Hales. All this arises from the obligation which Usher unfortunately conceived himself under of following the scheme adopted by the Massoretic Jews, who, as Dr. Hales remarks, have by a curious invention included the first four servitudes in the years of the judges who put an end to them, contrary to the express declarations of Scripture, which represents the administrations of the judges, not as synchronizing with the servitudes, but as succeeding them.

The Rabbins were indeed forced to allow the fifth servitude to have been distinct from the administration of Jephthah, because it was too long to be included in that administration; but they deducted a year from the Scripture account of the servitude, making it only six instead of seven years. They sank entirely the sixth servitude of forty years under the Philistines, because it was too long to be contained in Samson's administration; and, to crown all, they reduced Saul's reign of forty years to two years only.

(c) The necessity for all these tortuous operations has arisen from a desire to produce a conformity with the date in 1 Kings vi:1, which, as already cited, gives a period of only 480 years from the Exode to the foundation of Solomon's temple. As this date is incompatible with the sum of the different numbers given in the book of Judges, and as it differs from the computation of Josephus and of all the ancient writers on the subject, whether Jewish or Christian, it is not unsatisfactory to find grounds which leave this text open to much doubt and suspicion. We cannot here enter into any lengthened proof; but that the text did not exist in the Hebrew and Greek copies of the Scripture till nearly three centuries after Christ, is evident from the absence of all reference to it in the works of the learned men who composed histories of the Jews from the materials supplied to them in the sacred books. This could be shown by reference to various authors, who, if the number specified in it had existed, could not fail to have adduced it. But our space forbids such reference. (See CHRONOLOGY.)

(12) Government. We find that, apart from such offices as those of Moses and Joshua, a very excellent provision existed for the government of the chosen people, both as regarded the interests of the nation generally, as well as of the several tribes. To this latter branch of the government it is important to draw particular attention, because, as it existed before the Law, and is assumed throughout as the basis of the theocratical constitution, we hear but little of it in the books of Moses, and are apt to lose sight of it altogether.

The fact is, however, that, through the perversity of the people, this settlement of the general government on theocratical principles was not carried out in its proper form and extent; and it is in this neglect we are to seek the necessity for those officers called Judges, who were from time to time raised up to correct some of the evils which resulted from it.

It is very evident, from the whole history of the judges, that after the death of Joshua the Israelites threw themselves back upon the segregative principles of their government by tribes, and all but utterly neglected, and for long periods did utterly neglect, the rules and usages on which the general government was established. There was, in fact, no human power adequate to enforce them. They were good in themselves, they were gracious, they conferred high privileges; but they were enforced by no sufficient authority. No one was amenable to any tribunal for neglecting the annual feasts, or for not referring the direction of public affairs to the Divine King. Omissions on these points involved the absence of the Divine protection and blessing, and were left to be punished by their consequences.

The people could not grasp the idea of a Divine and Invisible King; they could not bring themselves to recur to him in all those cases in which the judgment of a human king would have determined the course of action, or in which his arm would have worked for their deliverance.

(13) Reason for Judges. Therefore it was that God allowed them judges in the persons of faithful men, who acted for the most part as agents of the divine will, regents for the Invisible King; and who, holding their commission directly from him, or with his sanction, would be more inclined to act as dependent vassals of Jehovah than kings, who, as members of royal dynasties, would come to reign with notions of independent rights and royal privileges, which would draw away their attention from their true place in the theocracy. In this greater dependence of the judges upon the Divine King we see the secret of their institutions.

The Israelites were disposed to rest upon their separate interests as tribes; and having thus allowed the standing general government to remain inoperative through disuse, they would in cases of emergency have been disposed 'to make themselves a king like the nations,' had their attention not been directed to the appointment of officers whose authority could rest on no tangible right apart from character and services. This, with the temporary nature of their powers, rendered their functions more accordant with the principles of the theocracy than those of any other public officers could be. And it is probably in this adaptation to the peculiar circumstances of the Hebrew theocracy that we shall discover the reason of our inability to find any similar office among other nations. In being thus peculiar it resembled the Dictatorship among the Romans; to which office indeed that of the judges has been compared; and perhaps this parallel is the nearest that can be found. E. W. H.

JUDGES, BOOK OF (jūj'ēs, bōōk òv), the third in the list of the historical compositions of the Old Testament. It consists of two divisions, the first comprising cc. i-xvi; the second, being an appendix, cc. xvii-xxi.

(1) Plan of the Book. That the author, in composing this work, had a certain design in view, is evident from ch. ii:11-23, where he states the leading features of his narrative. He introduces it by relating (ch. i) the extent to which the wars against the Canaanites were continued after the death of Joshua, and what tribes had spared them in consideration of a tribute imposed; also by alluding (ch. ii:1-10) to the benefits which Jehovah had conferred on them, and the distinguished protection with which he had honored them.

Next he states his leading object, namely, to prove that the calamities to which the Hebrews had been exposed since the death of Joshua were owing to their apostasy from Jehovah, and to their idolatry. 'They forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtarothe' (ch. ii:13); for which crimes they were deservedly punished and greatly distressed (ch. ii:15). Nevertheless, when they repented and obeyed again the commandments of the Lord, he delivered them out of the hand of their enemies by the Shophetim whom he raised up, and made them prosper (ch. ii:16:23).

To illustrate this theme, the author collected several fragments of the Hebrew history during the period between Joshua and Eli. Some episodes occur; but in arguing his subject he never loses sight of his leading theme, to which, on the contrary, he frequently recurs while stating facts, and shows how it applied to them; the moral evidently being, that the only way to hap-pinness was to shun idolatry and obey the commandments of the Lord. The design of the author was not to give a connected and complete history of the Hebrews in the period between Joshua and the kings; for if he had intended a plan of that kind, he would also have described the state of the domestic affairs and of the government in the several tribes, the relation in which they stood to each other, and the extent of power exercised by a judge; he would have further stated the number of tribes over whom a judge ruled, and the number of years during which the tribes were not oppressed by their heathen neighbors, but enjoyed rest and peace. The appendix, containing two narratives, further illustrates the lawlessness and anarchy prevailing in Israel after Joshua's death.

(2) Author. If the first and second divisions had been by the same author, the chronological indications would also have been the same. Now the author of the second division always describes the period of which he speaks thus: 'In those days there was no king of Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (cc. xvii:6; xviii:1; xix:1; xxi:25); but this expression never once occurs in the first division. If one author had composed both divisions, instead of this chronological formula, we should rather have expected, 'In the days of the Shophetim,' 'At a time when there was no Shophet,' etc., which would be consonant with the tenor of the first sixteen chapters.

The style also in the two divisions is different, and it will be shown that the appendix was written much later than the first part. All modern critics, then, agree in this, that the author of the first sixteen chapters of our book is different from him who composed the appendix. (See L. Bertholdt, Historisch-Kritische Einleitung in die sämtlichen Schriften des A. und N. T., p. 876; Eichhorn's Einleitung in das A. T., iii, sec. 457). The authorship of the first sixteen chapters has been assigned to Joshua, Samuel, and Ezra. That they were not written by Joshua appears from the difference of the method of relating subjects, as well as from the difference of the style.

But though we cannot determine the authorship of the book of Judges, still its age may be determined from internal evidence. The first sixteen chapters must have been written under Saul, whom the Israelites made their king in the hope of improving their condition. Phrases used in the period of the judges may be traced in them, and the author must consequently have lived near the time when they were yet current. He says that in his time 'the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem' (ch. i:21); now this was the case only before David, who conquered the town and drove out the Jebusites.

Consequently, the author of the first division of the book of Judges must have lived and written before David, and under King Saul. If he had lived under David he would have mentioned the capture of Jerusalem by that monarch, as the nature of his subject did not allow him to pass it over in silence. The omission, moreover, of the history, not only of Samuel but also of Eli, indicates an author who, living in an age very near that of Eli, considered his history as generally known, because so recent. The exact time when the appendix was added to the book of Judges cannot indeed be determined, but its author certainly lived in an age much later than that of the recorded events.

(3) Character of the Book. Parts of the work are undoubtedly taken from ancient records and genealogies, others from traditions and oral information. From ancient authentic documents are probably copied the song of Deborah (ch. v), the beautiful parable of Jotham (ch. ix:8-15), and the beginning of Samson's epinicion, or triumphal poem (ch. xv:16). In their genealogies the Hebrews usually inserted also some historical accounts, and from this source may have been derived the narrative of the circumstances that preceded the conception of Samson, which were given as the parents related them to others (ch. xiii).

(4) Authority of the Book. (a) It was published at a time when the events related were generally known, and when the veracity of the author could be ascertained by a reference to the original documents. Several of its narratives are confirmed by the books of Samuel (comp. Judg. iv:2; vi:14; xi, with 1 Sam. xii:9-12; Judg. ix:53 with 2 Sam. xi:21). The Psalms not only allude to the book of Judges (comp. Ps. lxxxiii:11, with Judg. vii:25), but copy from it entire verses (comp. Ps. lxxviii:8, 9; xcvi:5; with Judg. v:4, 5). Philo and Josephus knew the book, and made use of it in their own compositions. The New Testament alludes to it in several places (comp. Luke i:13-16 with Judg. xiii:5; xvi:17; Acts xiii:20; Heb. xi:32).

(b) This external evidence in support of the authority of the book of Judges is corroborated by many internal proofs of its authenticity. All its narratives are in character with the age to which they belong, and agree with the natural order of things. We find here that shortly after the death of Joshua the Hebrew nation had, by several victories, gained courage and become valorous (Judg. i and xix); but that it afterwards turned to agriculture, preferred a quiet life, and allowed the Canaanites to reside in its territory in consideration of a tribute imposed on them, when the original plan was that they should be expelled. This changed the Hebrew character entirely; it became effeminate and indolent—a result which we find in the case of all nations who, from a nomadic and warlike life, turn to agriculture.

(c) The intercourse with their heathen neighbors frequently led the uncultivated Hebrews to idolatry; and this, again, further prepared them for servitude. They were consequently overpowered and oppressed by their heathen neighbors. The first subjugation, indeed, by a king of Mesopotamia, they endured but eight years; but the second, more severe, by Eglon, lasted longer; it was the natural consequence of the public spirit having gradually more and more declined, and of Eglon having removed his residence to Jericho with a view of closely watching all their movements (Joseph. Antiq. v:5).

When Ehud sounded the trumpet of revolt the whole nation no longer rose in arms, but only the inhabitants of Mount Ephraim (ch. iii:27); and when Barak called to arms against Sisera many tribes remained quietly with their herds (ch. v:14, 15, 26, 28). Of the 30,000 men who offered to follow Gideon, he could make use of no more than 300, this small number only being, as it would seem, filled with true patriotism and courage.

(d) Thus the people had sunk gradually, and deserved for forty years to bear the yoke of the Philistines, to whom they had the meanness to deliver Samson, who, however, loosed the cords with which he was tied, and killed a large number of them (ch. xv). It is impossible to consider such an historical work, which perfectly agrees with the natural course of things, as a fiction; at that early period of authorship no writer could have, from infancy, depicted the character of the Hebrews so conformably with nature and established facts. All in this book breathes the spirit of the ancient world. Martial law we find in it, as could not be but expected, hard and wild. The conquered people are subjected to rough treatment, as is the case in the wars of all uncivilized people; the inhabitants of cities are destroyed wholesale (cc. viii:16, 17; xx). Hospitality and the protection of strangers received as guests is considered the highest virtue (ch. xix; comp. Gen. xix).

(e) In the state of oppression in which the Hebrews often found themselves during the period from Joshua to Eli, it was to be expected that men filled with heroism should now and then rise up and call the people to arms in order to deliver them from their enemies. Such valiant men are introduced by our author, and he extols them indeed highly; but on the other hand he is not silent respecting their faults, as may be seen in the instances of Ehud, whom he reports to have murdered a king to recover liberty for his country (ch. iii:16, sq.); of Gideon, who is recorded to have punished the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel cruelly, for having refused bread to his weary troops (ch. viii:16, 17); and of Jephthah, who vows a vow that if he should return home as a conqueror of the Ammonites he would offer as a burnt-offering whatever should first come out of the door of his house to meet him (ch. xi:34); in consequence of this inconsiderate vow, his only daughter is sacrificed by a savage father, who thus becomes a gross offender against the Mosaic law, which expressly forbids human immolations. This cannot be a fiction; it is no panegyric on Israel to describe them in the manner the author has done. And this frank, impartial tone pervades the whole work. It begins with displaying the Israelites as a refractory and obstinate people, and the appendix ends with the statement of a crime committed by the Benjamites, which had the most disastrous consequences. At the same time due praise is bestowed on acts of generosity and justice, and valiant feats are carefully recorded.

(5) Authenticity of the Book. This has been questioned, because of the remarkable exploits ascribed to its heroes. But it will be easy to show that, when properly understood, they do not necessarily exceed the limits of human power. Extraordinary indeed they were; but they are not alleged by the Scripture itself to have been supernatural. Those, however, who do hold them to have been supernatural cannot reasonably take exception to them on the ground of their extraordinary character. Considering the very remote period at which our book was written—considering also the manner of viewing and describing events and persons which prevailed with the ancient Hebrews, and which very much differs from that of our age—taking, moreover, into account the brevity of the narratives, which consist of historical fragments, we may well wonder that there do not occur in it more difficulties, and that not more doubts have been raised as to its historical authority. JUDGMENT (jūj'ment), (Heb. מִשְׁפָּט, mish-pawd').

(1) Wisdom and prudence, whereby one can judge of what is proper or improper, right or wrong (Jer. x:24; Is. xxx:18; Ps. lxxii:1). (2) 'Strike equity,' such as should appear in judging (Luke xi:42). (3) The decision of a judge (1 Kings iii:28). (4) Courts for trying causes (Matt. v:21). (5) Controversies to be tried and decided (1 Cor. vi:4). (6) Sentiment, opinion, advice (1 Cor. i:10 and vii:25). (7) Chastisement inflicted on saints (1 Pet. iv:17). (8) The statutes or commandment of God, or what he has decided in his word, particularly in what relates to civil punishments (Ps. xix:7; Matt. xii:18; Exod. xxi:1). (9) The punishment inflicted for sin (Prov. xix:29; Is. liii:8; Ezek. xxx:14). (10) The power of judging the world; this God has committed to Christ (John v:22 and xvi:8). (11) The solemn trial of men at the last day, that the wicked may be condemned, and the righteous adjudged to everlasting life (Eccl. xii:14; Jude 6, 15).

Examples of Its Use. (1) God brings forth men's judgment as the noon-day, when, in his wise and righteous providence, he openly manifests and rewards them according to the goodness and equity of their cause (Ps. xxxvii:6). (2) Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, shall be delivered according to the wisdom and equity of God, and through the infliction of punishment on God's Son (Is. i:27). (3) Christ brings forth judgment to the Gentiles, and sends it forth unto victory, when he effectually reveals the truths of God, and forms a people to himself (Is. xlii:2, 3; Matt. xii:18, 20). (4) Now is the judgment of this world come; now shall the prince of this world be cast out. Now shall God separate multitudes to himself; now shall he bring down their high looks and imaginations; now shall Satan be cast out from men's hearts, and lose his authority in the world (John xii:31). (5) The Holy Ghost shall convince men of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged; by dislodging Satan from men's bodies, and casting him out of their hearts, he shall demonstrate Jesus' power and authority, and evince his future appearance to judgment (John xvi:11). (6) God's judgments are true and righteous; his conduct in delivering his people, and punishing his enemies, corresponds with the predictions and threatenings of his word, and the equity of his nature (Rev. xix:2). (7) Rash judgments are absolutely forbidden in the sacred Scriptures (Matt. vii:1). (a) We thereby authorize others to requite us in the same kind. (b) It often evidences our pride, envy, and bigotry. (c) It argues a want of charity, the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion. (d) They who are most forward in censuring others are often most defective themselves.

JUDGMENT-HALL (jūj'ment hall), (Gr. Πραιτώριον, prahee-to'ree-on, prætorium, occurs in Matt. xxvii:27; Mark xv:16; John xviii:28, 33; xix:9; Acts xxiii:35; Phil. i:13, in all which places the Vulgate has prætorium).

The English Version, however, uses prætorium once only, and then unavoidably (Mark xv:16), 'The hall called prætorium.' In all the other instances it gives an explanation of the word rather than a translation; thus (Matt. xxvii:27) 'the common hall,' margin, 'or governor's house'; John xviii:28, 33) 'the judgment hall,' margin, 'or Pilate's house'; (Phil. i:13), 'the palace,' margin, 'or Cæsar's court.'

(1) Original Signification. The word prætorium originally signified the general's tent in a camp, and came at length to be applied to the residence of the civil governor in provinces and cities (Cic. l'err. ii, v. 12); and being properly an adjective, as is also its Greek representative, it was used to signify whatever appertained to the prætor or governor; for instance, his residence either the whole or any part of it, as his dwelling-house, or the place where he administered justice, or even the large enclosed court at the entrance to the prætorian residence (Bynæus, De Morte Jes. Christ. ii:407, Amst., 1696).

(2) Pilate's Residence. Upon comparing the instances in which the evangelists mention the prætorium, it will be seen, first, that it was the residence of Pilate (John xviii:28) which seems to have been the magnificent palace built by Herod, situated in the north part of the upper city, west of the temple (Joseph. Antiq. xv:9, 3), and overlooking the temple (Joseph. xx:8, 11).

(3) A Portion of the Palace. Secondly, the word is applied in the New Testament, by synecdoche, to a particular part of the prætorian residence. Thus, Matt. xxvii:27, and Mark xv:16, 'And the soldiers led Jesus away into the hall called Prætorium, and gathered unto them the whole band, and they clothed him with purple,' etc.; where the word rather refers to the court or area in front of the prætorium, or some other court where the procurator's guards were stationed. In John xix:9, the word seems applied, when all the circumstances are considered, to Pilate's private examination room. In like manner, when Felix 'commanded Paul to be kept in Herod's prætorium' (Acts xxiii:35), the words apply not only to the whole palace originally built at Cæsarea by Herod, and now most likely inhabited by the prætor, but also to the keep or donjon, a prison for confining offenders, such as existed in our ancient royal palaces and grand baronial castles.

(4) Prætorian Camp. Thirdly, in the remaining instance of the word (Phil. i:13), 'So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the prætorium,' 'palace,' it is, in the opinion of the best commentators, used by hypallage to signify the prætorian camp at Rome, a select body of troops constituted by Augustus to guard his person and to have charge of the city, the 'cohortes prætorianæ' (Suet. Tib. 37; Claud. 10; Ner. 8; Tacitus, Annal. xii:69); so that the words of the apostle really mean, 'My bonds in Christ are manifest to all the prætorians, and by their means to the public at large.'

JUDGMENT-SEAT (jūj'ment sēt), (Gr. Bīma, bay'ma, a step; 1 Cor. vi:2, 4, Κριτήριον, Kri-tay'-rion, a court of judgment). See PRÆTORIUM; JUDGMENT-HALL.

Judgments of God are the punishments inflicted by him for particular crimes. The Scriptures give us many striking instances of the display of Divine justice in the punishment of nations, families, and individuals, for their iniquities (see Gen. vi; xix:25; Exod. xv; Judg. i:6, 7; Acts xii:23; Esther v:14, with ch. vii:10; Lev. x:1, 2; Acts v:1-10; Is. xxxi:1-5; 1 Sam. xv:9, 23; 1 Kings xii:25, 33). It becomes us, however, to be exceedingly cautious how we interpret the severe and afflictive dispensations of Providence, in the present world.

Dr. Jortin justly observes that there is usually much rashness and presumption in pronouncing that the calamities of sinners are particular judgments of God; yet, he says, if from sacred and profane, from ancient and modern historians, a collection were made of all the cruel, persecuting tyrants, who delighted in tormenting their fellow-creatures, and who died not the common death of all men, but whose plagues were horrible and strange, even a skeptic would be moved at the evidence, and would be apt to suspect that it was theion ti, that the hand of God was in it.

JUDICIAL BLINDNESS OR HARDNESS.

A term used to denote moral incorrigibility and spiritual blindness (Mark iii:5). "Being grieved for the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." So (Rom. xi:25). "Blindness—hardness—in part hath happened to Israel" (Eph. iv:18). "Because of the blindness—hardness—of their hearts" (2 Cor. iii:14). "Their minds were blinded—hardened;" and elsewhere. In other expressions God is declared to be the cause of such hardness and blindness (John xii:40). He has blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts; which seems to be contradictory to Matt. xiii:15, where the people themselves are said to have closed their own eyes; and so Acts xxviii:27. These seeming contradictions are very easily reconciled by taking the phraseology in its true import:

(a) "Set the eyes of this people"—prophesy such flowing times, such abundant jollity, that the people, devoting themselves to gormandizing, may be inebriated with the very idea; and still more with the enjoyment itself when it arrives.

(b) God, by giving plenty and abundance, affords the means of the people's abusing his goodness, and becoming both over-fat with food, and intoxicated with drink; and thus, his very beneficence may be said to make their heart fat, and their eyes heavy.

(c) While, at the same time, the people by their own act, their overfeeding, become unwieldy—indolent—bloated—over-fat at heart; and, moreover, so stupefied by liquor and strong drink that their eyes and ears may be useless to them; with wide open eyes, "staring they may stare, but not perceive; and listening they may hear, but not understand"; and in this lethargic state they will continue; preferring it to a more sedate, rational condition, and refusing to forbear from prolonging the causes of it, lest at any sober interval they should see truly with their eyes, and hear accurately with their ears; in consequence of which they should be shocked at themselves, be converted, be changed from such misconduct, and God should heal them, should cure these blinding effects of dissoluteness (comp. Is. v:11; xxviii).

JUDITH (jū'dith), (Heb. יהודית, yeh-hoo-deeth' Jewess).

I. Daughter of Beeri the Hittite and Esau's wife (Gen. xxvi:34).

II. Judith is the name of one of the apocryphal or deuterocanonical books of the Old Testament, is placed in manuscripts of the Alexandrine Version between the books of Tobit and Esther. In its external form this book bears the character of the record of an historical event, describing the complete defeat of the Assyrians by the Jews through the prowess of a woman.

1. Narrative. The following is a sketch of the narrative: Nebuchadnezzar, or, as he is called in the Greek, Nabuchodonosor, king of the Assyrians, having, in the twelfth year of his reign, conquered and taken Arphaxad, by whom his territory had been invaded, formed the design of subduing the people of Asia to the westward of Nineveh, his capital, who had declined to aid him against Arphaxad. With this view he sent his general, Holofernes, at the head of a powerful army, and soon made himself master of Mesopotamia, Syria, Libya, Cilicia, and Idumæa.

The inhabitants of the seacoast made a voluntary submission; which, however, did not prevent their territories from being laid waste, their sacred groves burned, and their idols destroyed, in order that divine honors should be paid only to Nebuchadnezzar.

(1) Holofernes. Holofernes, having finally encamped in the plain of Esdraclon (ch. i:3), remained inactive for a whole month—or two, according to the Latin version.

But the Jews, who had not long returned from captivity, and who had just restored their temple and its worship, prepared for war under the direction of their high-priest Joacim, or Eliakim, and the senate. The high-priest addressed letters to the inhabitants of Bethulia (Gr. Βεθυλοῦα) and Betomestham, near Esdraclon (ch. iv:6), charging them to guard the passes of the mountains.

The Jews at the same time kept a fast, and called upon God for protection against their enemies. Holofernes, astonished at their audacity and preparations, inquired of the Moabites and Ammonites who these people were. Achior, the leader of the Ammonites, informed him of the history of the Jews, adding, that if they offended their God he would deliver them into the hands of their enemies, but that otherwise they would be invincible.

Holofernes, however, prepares to lay siege to Bethulia, and commences operations by taking the mountain passes, and intercepting the water, in order to compel the inhabitants to surrender. Ozias, the governor of the city, holds out as long as possible; but at the end of thirty-four days' siege the inhabitants are reduced to that degree of distress from drought that they are determined to surrender unless relieved within five days.

(2) Design of Judith. Meantime Judith, a rich and beautiful woman, the widow of Manasseh, forms the patriotic design of delivering the city and the nation. With this view she entreats the governor and elders to give up all idea of surrender, and to permit the gates of the city to be opened for her. Arrayed in rich attire, she proceeds to the camp of Holofernes, attended only by her maid, bearing a bag of provisions. She is admitted into the presence of Holofernes, and informs him that the Jews could not be overcome so long as they remained faithful to God, but that they had now sinned against him in converting to their own use the tithes, which were sacred to the priests alone; and that she had fled from the city to escape the impending and inevitable destruction which awaited it.

She obtains leave to remain in the camp, with the liberty of retiring by night for the purpose of prayer, and promises that at the proper moment she will herself be the guide of Holofernes to the very walls of Jerusalem.

(3) Holofernes Charmed. Judith is favorably entertained; Holofernes is smitten with her charms, gives her a magnificent entertainment, at which, having drunk too freely, he is shut up with her alone in the tent.

(4) Death of Holofernes. Taking advantage of her opportunity, while he is sunk in sleep, she seizes his falchion and strikes off his head. Giving it to her maid, who was outside the tent door, she leaves the camp as usual, under pretense of devotion, and returns to Bethulia, displaying the head of Holofernes.

The Israelites, next morning, fall on the Assyrians, who, panic-struck at the loss of their general, are soon discomfited, leaving an immense spoil in the hands of their enemies. The whole concludes with the triumphal song of Judith, who accompanies all the people to Jerusalem to give thanks to the Lord. After this she returns to her native city Bethulia, gives freedom to her maid, and dies at the advanced age of 105 years. The Jews enjoying a profound and happy peace, a yearly festival (according to the Vulgate) is instituted in honor of the victory.

(5) Difficulties of the Story. The difficulties, historical, chronological, and geographical, comprised in the narrative of Judith are so numerous and serious as to be held by many divines altogether insuperable. Events, times, and manners are said to be confounded, and the chronology of the times before and those after the exile, of the Persian and Assyrian, and even of the Maccabæan period, confusedly and unaccountably blended.

The authorship of the book is as uncertain as its date. It is not named either by Philo or Josephus; nor have we any indication whatever by which to form a conjecture respecting its author.

The original language is uncertain. Eichhorn and Jahn (Introduction) and Seiler (Biblical Hermeneutics), with whom is Bertholdt, conceive it to have been Greek. Calmet states on the authority of Origen (Ep. ad African.) that the Jews had the book of Judith in Hebrew in his time. Jerome (Pref. to Judith) states that it is written in Chaldee, from which he translated it, with the aid of an interpreter, giving rather the sense than the words.

2. Influence. Although the book of Judith never formed part of the Jewish canon (see DEUTERO-CANONICAL), and finds no place in the ancient catalogues, its influence in the Christian church has been very great. (See APOCRYPHA.)

The book of Judith is supposed by some to be referred to by St. Paul (1 Cor. x:9, 10; comp. with Judith viii:24, 25). Judith, with the other deuterocanonical books, has been at all times read in the church, and lessons are taken from it in the Church of England in course. ("G. B.," in the Journal of Sac. Lit., July, 1856; Cowper, The Book of Judith and Its Geography, in the same journal, January 1861.) W. W.

JULIA (jū'li-à), (Gr. Ἰουλία, ee-oo-lee'ah, fem. of Julius, a name common among the Romans), a Christian woman of Rome, to whom St. Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi:15); she is named with Philologus, and is supposed to have been his wife or sister.

JULIUS (jū'li-ūs), (Gr. Ἰούλιος, ee-oo-lee-os), the centurion who had the charge of conducting Paul as a prisoner to Rome, and who treated him with much consideration and kindness on the way (Acts xxvii:1, 3, 43).

JUNIA, better JUNIAS (jū'ni-à or jū'ni-as), (Gr. Ἰουνίας, ee-oo-nee'as), a person who is joined with Andronicus in Rom. xvi:7: 'Salute Andronicus and Junias, my kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles.' They were, doubtless, Jewish Christians.

JUNIPER (jū'nī-pēr), unquestionably the original intends the rē-tem (Retama retam), a shrub of the broom family, attaining a height of about 12 feet.

This bush grows in the sandy regions of Arabia, Northern Africa, and Spain, but is especially abundant in the desert of Sinai, and is often the only possible shelter. Under its shade travelers are glad to creep on a sultry day for a noon-time nap, and thus Elijah lay and slept after his long journey (1 Kings xix:4, 5). The retem has no main trunk, but consists of many stems, mostly small. The roots are disproportionately massive and dense, and from them the Bedouins manufacture charcoal, which is sold in Cairo and other towns, where it brings the highest price, since, of all charcoal, it produces the most intense heat (Ps. cxx:4). In Job xxx:4 we read of hunger so extreme that the bitter roots of this shrub are used for food. During the wanderings of the Israelites one of their stations was named Rithmah, doubtless from the abundance of the retem at that place (Num. xxxiii:18).

JUPITER (jū'pi-ter), (Gr. Zeus, dzyooce, zeus), the Latin form of the Greek name Zeus, the national god of the Greeks, and the supreme ruler of the heathen world.

In Acts xiv:12, 13, "Jupiter, which was before their city," means that his temple was without the city. In verse 12, the Lystrians call Barnabas 'Jupiter.' Paul, the chief speaker, they thought to be Mercury, the god of eloquence, and the other they thought must be the god whom they worshiped, Jupiter.

JUSHAB-HESED (jū'shāb-hē'sed), (Heb. יְשׁוּבָה יְשׁוּבָה, yoo-shab' kkeh'sed, returner of kindness), son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:20). It is impossible to tell why the five children here mentioned are separated from the three in verse 19, unless they were born of a different mother, or in Judæa after the return from Babylon.

JUSTICE (jūs'tis) consists in an exact and scrupulous regard for the rights of others, with a deliberate purpose to preserve them on all occasions sacred and inviolate.

(1) Justice and equity may be discriminated as follows: Justice, from jus, right, is founded on the laws of society. Equity, from equitas, fairness, rightness, and equality, is founded on the laws of nature. Justice is a written or prescribed law, to which one is bound to conform and make it the rule of one's decisions; equity is a law in our hearts; it conforms to no rule but to circumstances, and decides by the consciousness of right and wrong. The proper object of justice is to secure property; the proper object of equity is to secure the rights of humanity. Justice is exclusive, it assigns to every one his own; it preserves the subsisting inequality between men; equity is communicative; it seeks to equalize the condition of men by a fair distribution.

(2) Dr. Watts gives the following rules respecting justice: (a) "It is just that we honor, reverence, and respect those who are our superiors in any kind (Eph. vi:1, 3; 1 Pet. ii:17; 1 Tim. v:17). (b) That we show particular kindness to near relations (Prov. xvii:17). (c) That we love those who love us, and show gratitude to those who have done us good (Gal. iv:15). (d) That we pay the full due to those whom we bargain or deal with (Rom. xiii:7, 8; Deut. xxiv:14). (e) That we help our fellow-creatures in cases of great necessity (Exod. xxiii:4-7).

JUSTICE OF GOD is that perfection whereby he is infinitely righteous and just in his principles and in all his proceedings with his creatures.

(1) It has been defined thus: "The ardent inclination of his will to prescribe equal laws as the Supreme Governor, and to dispense equal rewards and punishments as the Supreme Judge" (Rev. xvi:5; Ps. cxlv:7; xcvi:1, 2).

(2) It is distinguished into remunerative and punitive justice. Remunerative justice is a distribution of rewards, the rule of which is not the merit of the creature, but God's own gracious promise (James i:12; 2 Tim. iv:8). Punitive or vindictive justice is the infliction of punishment for any sin committed by men (2 Thess. i:6).

(3) That God will not let sin go unpunished is evident: (a) From the word of God (Exod. xxxiv:6, 7; Num. xiv:18.) (b) From the character of God (Is. i:13, 14; Ps. v:5, 6; Heb. xii:29). (c) From sin being punished in Christ, the surety of his people (1 Pct. iii:18). (d) From all the various natural evils which men feel in the present state.

JUSTIFICATION (jūs'ti-fi-kā'shūn), (Heb. יָצַד, tsaw-duk', to make or declare; Gr. δικαίωμα, dik-ah-yo'nee-ah), judicial sentence, declaration of right; thus, judicial acquittal, the opposite of condemnation.

1. Theological Statement. Justification may be defined, in its theological sense, as the non-imputation of sin, and the imputation of righteousness. That there is a reciprocation between Christ and believers, i. e. in the imputation of their sins unto him, and of his righteousness unto them; and that this forms the ground of the sinner's justification and acceptance with God, it will be the object of the following remarks to demonstrate.

(1) Vicarious Atonements. The vicarious nature of the Redeemer's sufferings was set forth under the Mosaic dispensation by very significant types, one of the most expressive of which was the offering of the scapegoat: 'And Aaron shall lay his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities' (Lev. xvi:21, 22). Abarbanel, in the introduction to his commentary on Leviticus (De Viel. p. 301), represents this ceremony as a symbolical translation of the sins of the offender upon the head of the sacrifice, and as a way by which the evil due to his transgression was to be deprecatd.

Nachmanides also, commenting on Lev. i, observes, respecting the burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin: 'It was right the offerer's own blood should be shed, and his body burnt, but that the Creator, in his mercy, hath accepted this victim from him as a vicarious substitute and atonement, that its blood should be poured out instead of his blood, and its life stand in place of his life.'

We are informed by Herodotus (ii:39) that the practice of imprecating on the head of the victim the evils which the sacrificer wished to avert from himself was usual also amongst the heathen. The Egyptians, he adds, would not taste the head of any animal, but flung it into the river as an abomination.

(2) Prophecy and Exposition of Atonement. If this type foreshadowed the vicarious nature of the sufferings and death of Christ—and who with the inspired comment of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews before him can doubt this?—we may with confidence appeal also to the voice of prophecy, and the expositions of apostles, for the further illustration and enforcement of the same truth.

The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is so full upon this point that Bishop Lowth says: 'This chapter declares the circumstances of our Savior's sufferings so exactly that it seems rather a history of his passion than a prophecy.' In verses 5 and 6 we are told that God 'laid upon him the iniquities of us all,' that by 'his stripes we might be healed'—that our sin was laid on him, and he bare it (ver. 11). St. Paul, re-echoing the same truth, says, 'He was made sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him' (2 Cor. v:21). This is the reciprocity spoken of above.

Again, in Rom. viii:3, 4, the Apostle informs us that God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us; that sin was made his, and he bore its penalty; his righteousness is forensically transferred to the believer, and the latter becomes a happy participator of its benefits. This, then, is the change in relation to God from which the soul of a convicted sinner can find peace. Before we notice the objections which have been, and still are, urged against this view of the question, we may inquire how far it is confirmed by the earliest and most eminently pious Fathers of the Christian church.

(3) Faith of the Fathers. Amongst these Fathers none could have been better acquainted with the mind of St. Paul than the venerable Clement of Rome, inasmuch as he is honorably recorded by the Apostle as one of his fellow-laborers in the Gospel whose names are written in the book of life (Phil. iv:3). Nothing can be more explicit than this writer is on the point of forensic justifying righteousness, and of intrinsic sanctifying righteousness (see Clem. Rom. Epist. ad Corinth. i. sec. 32, 33). Chrysostom's commentary on 2 Corinthians (ch. v. Hom. ii) is also very expressive on this subject: 'What word, what speech is this, what mind can comprehend or speak it? for he (Paul) saith, he made him who was righteous to be made a sinner, that he might make sinners righteous; nor yet doth he (Paul) say so neither, but that which is far more sublime and excellent. For he speaks not of an inclination or affection, but expresseth the quality itself. For he says not he made him a sinner, but sin, that we might be made not merely righteous, but righteousness, and that the righteousness of God, when we are justified not by works (for if we should, there must be no spot found in them), but by grace, whereby all sin is blotted out.'

(4) Roman Catholic View. It was this doctrine of justification which constituted the great ground of controversy between the reformers and the church of Rome (see Luther to Geo. Spenglein, Epist. Ann. 1516, tom. i.). That the reader may be able to see in a contrasted form the essential differences upon this head between the two churches, we subjoin what the Tridentine Fathers have stated. In sess. vi. c. xvi. p. 54, they announce the views of their church on justification in the following language:

'Jesus Christ, as the head into the members, and as the vine into the branches, perpetually causes his virtue to flow into the justified. This virtue always precedes, accompanies, and follows their good works; so that without it such good works could in nowise be acceptable to God, and bear the character of meritoriousness.

'Hence, we must believe that to the justified themselves nothing more is wanting which needs to prevent us from thinking both that they have satisfied the divine law, according to the state of this life, by those works which are performed in God, and also that, in their own time, provided they depart in grace, they truly merit the attainment of eternal life.

'Thus neither our own proper righteousness is so determined to be our own, as if it were from ourselves, nor is the righteousness of God either unknown or rejected. For that which is called our righteousness, because through its being inherent in us we are justified, that same is the righteousness of God, because it is infused into us by God through the merit of Christ. Far, however, be it from a Christian man that he should either trust or glory in himself, and not in the Lord, whose goodness to all is so great that what are truly 'his gifts he willeth to be estimated as their merits.'

(5) General Protestant View. Such, so far as the justification and acceptance of man before God are concerned, is the doctrinal scheme of the church of Rome, and nothing can be more foreign than it is from the system set forth by the Protestant church in general. In the view of the latter, justification signifies making just in trial and judgment, as sanctification is making holy; but not making just by infusion of grace and holiness into a person, according to the view of the former, thus confounding justification and sanctification together. On the Protestant principle justification is not a real change of a sinner in himself, though a real change is annexed to it; but only a relative change in reference to God's judgment. Thus we find the word used in Rom. iii:23, 24, 25, 26. In fine, the doctrine of justification by Faith may be expressed in Scriptural language thus: 'All have sinned and come short of the glory of God; every mouth must be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God; therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh living be justified in his sight. But we are justified freely by his grace through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth as a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God. Where is boasting, then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.' For a full exposition of the differences between the two churches, see Möhler's Symbolik, translated from the German by Robertson.

2. Objections. We now come to notice the objections which may be urged against this view of justification.

(1) Cruelty and Butler's Answer. It does not consist, say some, with the truth and holiness of God that the innocent should suffer for the guilty. We answer, that it is no injustice, or cruelty, for an innocent person to suffer for the guilty, as Christ did, provided there be these conditions:

(a) That the person suffering be of the same nature with those for whom he suffers.

(b) That he suffers of his own free will.

(c) That he be able to sustain all that shall be laid upon him.

(d) That a greater amount of glory redound to the divine attributes than if he had not so suffered. Now the Scriptures assure us that all these conditions were realized in the incarnate Saviour.

Bishop Butler (Analogy, ch. v.) has a striking answer to this objection. He shows that in the daily course of God's natural providence the innocent do often and constantly suffer for the guilty; and then argues that the Christian appointment against which this objection is taken, is not only of the same kind, but is even less open to exception, 'because, under the former, we are in many cases commanded, and even necessitated whether we will or no, to suffer for the faults of others; whereas the sufferings of Christ were voluntary. The world's being under the righteous government of God does, indeed, imply that, finally, and upon the whole, every one shall receive according to his personal deserts; and the general doctrine of the whole Scripture is that this shall be the completion of the Divine government.

But during the progress, and for aught we know even in order to the completion, of this moral scheme, vicarious punishments may be fit, and absolutely necessary. Men, by their follies, run themselves into extreme distress—into difficulties which would be absolutely fatal to them, were it not for the interposition and assistance of others. God commands by the law of nature that we afford them this assistance, in many cases where we cannot do it without very great pains and labor and suffering to ourselves. And we see in what variety of ways one person's sufferings contribute to the relief of another, and how, or by what particular means, this comes to pass, or follows from the constitution or laws of nature which come under our notice, and, being familiarized with it, men are not shocked by it. So that the reason of their insisting upon objections of the foregoing kind against the satisfaction of Christ is either that they do not consider God's settled and uniform appointments as his appointments at all, or else they forget that vicarious punishment is a providential appointment of every day's experience; and then, from their being unacquainted with the more general laws of nature or Divine government over the world, and not seeing how the sufferings of Christ could contribute to the redemption of it unless by arbitrary and tyrannical will, they conclude his sufferings could not contribute to it any other way. And yet, what has been often alleged in justification of this doctrine, even from the apparent natural tendency of this method of our redemption—its tendencies to vindicate the authority of God's laws, and deter his creatures from sin—this has never yet been answered, and is, I think, plainly unanswerable.

(2) Contradiction of St. Paul by St. James.

Again it is objected, if we are justified on receiving Christ by faith as the Lord our righteousness, and if this be the sole ground of salvation propounded by St. Paul, there is then a palpable discrepancy between him and St. James; for the former states, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law (Rom. iii:8; Gal. ii:16); while the latter says, 'a man is justified by works and not by faith only' (James ii:24). That there is a difficulty here there can be no question, and that it led Eusebius and Jerome, together with Luther and Erasmus, to question the authority of St. James' Epistle, is notable to every reader of ecclesiastical history.

(a) Roman Catholic View. The church of Rome builds her system of man's being justified by reason of inherent righteousness, on the assumption that when St. Paul says 'by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified,' he means the ceremonial and not the moral law. In this way she would establish her own system of human merit, and harmonize the two Apostles. But it is quite clear to the impartial reader of the Epistle to the Romans that the scope of St. Paul's argument must include both the moral and the ceremonial law; for he proves both Jew and Gentile guilty before God, and this with the view of establishing the righteousness of faith in the imputed merits of Christ as the only ground of a sinner's salvation. Leaving, then, this sophistical reconciliation, we come to that which our Protestant divines propose.

(b) Protestant View. This is of a twofold character, viz., first, by distinguishing the double sense of justification, which may be taken either for the absolution of a sinner in God's judgment, or for the declaration of his righteousness before men. This distinction is found in Scripture, in which the word justify is used in both acceptations. Thus St. Paul speaks of justification in foro Dei; St. James speaks of it in foro hominis. A man is justified by faith without works, saith the one; a man is justified by works, and not by faith only, declares the other. That this is the true solution of the difficulty appears from the fact that the two Apostles draw their apparently opposite conclusions from the same example of Abraham (Rom. iv:9-23; comp. James ii:21-24).

(c) Double Sense of Faith. Another mode of reconciling the Apostles is by regarding faith in the double sense in which it is often found in Scripture. St. Paul, when he affirms that we are justified by faith only, speaks of that faith which is true and living, working by love. St. James, when he denies that a man is justified by faith only, disputes against that faith which is false and unproductive; when the true Christian, speaking to the hypocritical boaster of his faith, asks: 'Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works.'

(3) Final Objection Considered. One objection more may be urged against this fundamental doctrine, that sinners are justified by the free grace of God through the imputed righteousness of the Redeemer, namely, that it weakens the obligations to holiness of life. This objection the Apostle himself anticipates when he asks, 'What shall we say then? shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?' To which he answers by rejecting the consequence with the utmost abhorrence, and in the strongest manner affirming it to be without any foundation. 'How shall we,' he continues, 'that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?' (Rom. vi:1-2). He who expects justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ, has the clearest and strongest convictions of the obligation of the law of God, and of its extent and purity. He sees in the vicarious sufferings of his Saviour the awful nature of sin and the infinite love of God; and this love of God, being thus manifested, constrains him to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this world. In a word, he loves much because he feels that God has forgiven him much, because the love of God is shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost which is given unto him. What a practical illustration have we of this in the life of the great Apostle of the Gentiles himself! (See Miner Raymond, Sys. Theol.; Hodge, Sys. Theol.; Martensen, Chris. Dogm.; D'Aubigne, His. of Ref.).

JUSTUS (jüs'tus), (Gr. Ἰούστος, ee-ooce'tos).

1. Surname of Barsabas (Acts i:23). (See JOSEPH.)

2. A Christian at Corinth, with whom Paul lodged (Acts xviii:7), A. D. 54.

3. A surname of Jesus, a believing Jew, who was with Paul at Rome when he wrote to the Colossians (Col. iv:11). The Apostle names him and Marcus as being at that time (A. D. 64) his only fellow-laborers.

JUTTAH (jüt'tah), (Heb. יוֹטָה, yoo-taw', inclosed), a city of Judah, (Josh. xv:55), in the neighborhood of Carmel.

It was allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi:16). Robinson (Bib. Res., ii, 195, 628), describes a place named Yutta, which doubtless represents the ancient town.

K

KABALA or KABBALAH (kăb'bă-lăh), usually anglicized Cabala (Heb. קַבָּלָה, kab-baw-law').

This word is an abstract, and means reception, a doctrine received by oral transmission; so that with mere reference to its etymological signification, it is the correlate of the Hebrew word tradition. The term Kabbalah is employed in the Jewish writings to denote several traditional doctrines: as, for example, that which constituted the creed of the patriarchal age before the giving of the law; that unwritten ritual interpretation which the Jews believe was revealed by God to Moses on the mount, and which was at length committed to writing and formed the Mishnah. Besides being applied to these and other similar traditions, it has also been used in, comparatively speaking, modern times, to denote a singular mystical mode of interpreting the Old Testament.

This Kabbalah is an art of eliciting mysteries from the words and letters of the Old Testament by means of some subtle devices of interpretation, or it is an abstruse theosophical and metaphysical doctrine containing the traditional arcana of the remotest times.

(1) Traditional Doctrine. The inartificial or dogmatical Kabbalah consists solely of a traditional doctrine on things divine and metaphysical, propounded in a symbolical form. It treats principally of the mysteries of the doctrine of emanation, of angels and spirits, of the four Kabbalistical worlds, and of the ten Sephiroth or so-called Kabbalistic tree. It is a system made up of elements which are also found in the Magian doctrine of emanation, in the Pythagorean theory of numbers, in the philosophy of the later Platonists, and in the tenets of the Gnostics; but these doctrines are here stated with enigmatical obscurity, and without the coherence and development of a single and entire scheme. Its general tenor may be conceived from the eminent prerogatives which it assigns to the law, and from the consequent latitude of interpretation.

Thus, it is argued in the book of Sohar: 'Alas for the man who thinks that the law contains nothing but what appears on its surface; for, if that were true, there would be men in our day who could excel it. But the law assumed a body; for if angels are obliged, when they descend to this world, to assume a body in order that they may subsist in the world, and it be able to receive them, how much more necessary was it that the law, which created them and which was the instrument by which the world was created, should be invested with a body in order that it might be adapted to the comprehension of man? That body is a history, in which if any man think there is not a soul, let him have no part in the life to come.' Manasseh-ben-Israel, who makes this citation from the book of Sohar, enforces this view with many arguments (Conciliator, Amstod. 1633, p. 169).

(2) Origin. The origin of the Kabbalah is involved in great obscurity. The Jews ascribe it to Adam, or to Abraham, or to Moses, or to Ezra; the last being apparently countenanced by 2 Esdras xiv:20-48. Eichhorn accounts for the origin of that important part of this Kabbalah, the system of allegorical interpretation (by which their occult doctrine was either generated, or, if not, at least brought into harmony with the law), by supposing that the Jews adopted it immediately from the Greeks.

According to him, when the Jews were brought into contact with the enlightened speculations of the Greek philosophers, they felt that their law (as they had hitherto interpreted it) was so far behind the wisdom of the Gentiles, that—both to vindicate its honor in the eyes of the scoffing heathen, and to reconcile their newly adopted philosophical convictions with their ancient creed—they borrowed from the Greek allegorizers of Homer the same art of interpretation, and applied it to conjure away the unacceptable sense of the letter, or to extort another sense which harmonized with the philosophy of the age (Bibl. Biblioth. v. 237, sq.).

KABZEEL (kăb'ze-el), (Heb. קַבְצֵאֵל, kab-tseh-ale', God has gathered), a city in the southern part of Judah (Josh. xv:21). It was the native place of the hero Benaiah-ben-Jehoiada (2 Sam. xxiii:20; 1 Chron. xi:22). In Nehemiah the name is written Jekabzeel (Neh. xi:25).

KADESH (kă'desh), (Heb. קָדֵשׁ, kaw-dashe', sanctuary), more fully KADESH - BARNEA (kă'desh-băr'ne-â), (Heb. קָדֵשׁ בַּרנָּא, kaw-dashe', and בַּרנָּא, bar-nay'ah; Simon derived the latter word from בַּר, bar, desert, and נָּא, nay'ah, wandering, rendering it "Desert of Wanderings").

(1) Name and Location. It was a site on the southeastern border of the Promised Land towards Edom, of much interest as being the point at which the Israelites twice encamped with the intention of entering Palestine, and from which they were twice sent back; the first time in pursuance of their sentence to wander forty years in the wilderness, and the second time from the refusal of the king of Edom to permit a passage through his territories.

(2) Israelites Driven Back. It was from Kadesh that the spies entered Palestine by ascending the mountains; and the murmuring Israelites afterwards attempting to do the same were driven back by the Amalekites and Canaanites, and afterwards apparently by the king of Arad, as far as Hormah, then called Zephath (Num. xiii:26; xiv:40-45; xxi:1-3; Dent. i:41-44; comp. Judg. i:7). There was also at Kadesh a fountain (En-mishpat) mentioned long before the exode of the Israelites (Gen. xiv:7); and the miraculous supply of water took place only on the second visit, which implies that at the first there was no lack of this necessary article. After this Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom, informing him that they were in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost part of his border, and asking leave to pass through his country, so as to continue their course round Moab, and approach Palestine from the East. This Edom refused, and the Israelites accordingly marched to Mount Hor, where Aaron died; and then along the Arabah (desert of Zin) to the Red Sea (Num. xx:14-29).

(3) Southern Quarter of Judea. The name of Kadesh again occurs in describing the southern quarter of Judah, the line defining which is drawn 'from the shore of the Salt Sea, from the bay that looked southward; and it went out to the south side of Akrabbim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side to Kadesh-barnea' (Josh. xv:1-3; comp. Num. xxxiv:3, 4).

From these intimations the map-makers, who found it difficult to reconcile them with the place usually assigned to Kadesh (in the desert about midway between the Mediterranean and Dead Sea), were in the habit of placing a second Kadesh nearer the Dead Sea and the Wady Arabah. It was left for Dr. Kitto (Pictorial Bible, Note on Num. xx:1) to show that one Kadesh would sufficiently answer all the conditions required, by being placed more to the south, nearer to Mount Hor, on the west border of the Wady Arabah, than this second Kadesh. According to this view Kadesh was laid down in the map (in the Illuminated Atlas) prepared under his direction, in the same line, and not far from the place which has since been assigned to it from actual observation by Dr. Robinson. This concurrence of different lines of research in the same result is curious and valuable, and the position of Kadesh will be regarded as now scarcely open to dispute.

(4) Discovery of the Fountain. It was clear that the discovery of the fountain in the northern part of the great valley would go far to fix the question. Robinson discovered a fountain called Ain el-Weibeh, which is even at this day the most frequented watering-place in all the Arabah, and he was struck by the entire adaptedness of the site to the scriptural account of the proceedings of the Israelites on their second arrival at Kadesh. 'Over against us lay the land of Edom; we were in its uttermost border; and the great Wady el-Ghuweir afforded a direct and easy passage through the mountains to the table-land above, which was directly before us; while further in the south Mount Hor formed a prominent and striking object, at the distance of two good days' journey for such a host' (Bib. Researches, ii, 538). Further on (p. 610) he adds: 'There the Israelites would have Mount Hor in the S.S.E. towering directly before them . . . in the N.W. rises the mountain by which they attempted to ascend to Palestine, with the pass still called Sufah (Zep-hath); while further north we find also Tell Arad, marking the site of the ancient Arad. To all this comes then the vicinity of the southern bay of the Dead Sea, the line of cliffs separating the Ghôr from the Arabah, answering to the ascent of Akrabbim; and the desert of Zin, with the place of the same name between Akrabbim and Kadesh, not improbably at the water of Hasb, in the Arabah. In this way all becomes easy and natural, and the scriptural account is entirely accordant with the character of the country.'

KADMIEL (käd'mi-el), (Heb. קַדְמִיֵּל, kad-mee-ale', presence of God).

1. A Levite who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and was apparently a representative of Hodaviah or Judah (Ezra ii:40; Neh. vii:43; xii:8; xii:24). In the first attempt to rebuild the wall Kadmiel and his brother were appointed by Zerubbabel to superintend the workmen and officiate in the ceremonies attending the laying of the foundation (Ezra iii:9). His house was represented in the confession of the people on the day of humiliation. (B. C. 536.)

2. A Levite who assisted in leading the devotion of the people (Neh. ix:4, 5) and with other Levites entered into the covenant to keep God's law (Neh. x:9). Probably a son of 1. (B. C. 445.)

KADMONITES (käd'mon-ites), (Heb. קַדְמוֹנִיִּם, hak-kad-mo-nee', the Kadmonite), one of the nations of Canaan, which is supposed to have dwelt in the northeast part of Palestine, under Mount Hermon, at the time that Abraham sojourned in the land (Gen. xv:19).

As the Kadmonites were "Bene-Kedcm" (Heb. בְּנֵי קַדְמוֹן, Judg. vi:33), A. V. "children of the East," i. e., "tribes who roved in the great waste tracts on the east and southeast of Palestine," they are supposed by Dr. Wells and others to be situated to the east of the Jordan. The name was a term applied collectively, like 'Easterns,' or 'Orientals,' to all the people living in the countries beyond that river. (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 242.) Bochart supposes the name to be the same as Cadmus, and identified them with the Hivites (see HIVITES), whose place they fill in the list.

KALI (kä'li), (Heb. כָּלִי, kaw-lee'). This word occurs in several passages of the Old Testament, in all of which, in the Authorized Version, it is translated parched corn. The correctness of this translation has not, however, been assented to by all commentators.

(1) Parched Meal. Some Hebrew writers maintain that flour or meal, and others, that parched meal, is intended, as in the passage of Ruth ii:14, where the Septuagint translates kali by ἀλφίτων, and the Vulgate by polenta. A difficulty, however, occurs in the case of 2 Sam. xvii:28, where the word occurs twice in the same verse. We are told that Shobi and others, on David's arrival at Mahanaim, in the further limit of the tribe of Gad, 'brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn (kali), and beans, and lentils, and parched pulse (kali), and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David and for the people that were with him to eat.'

This is a striking representation of what may be seen every day in the East; when a traveler arrives at a village, the common light beds of the country are brought him, as well as earthen pots, with food of different kinds.

(2) Corn and Pulse. The meaning of the above passage is explained by the statement of Hebrew writers, that there are two kinds of kali—one made of parched corn, the other of parched pulse.

Another principal preparation, much and constantly in use in Western Asia, is burgoul, that is, corn first boiled, then bruised in the mill to take the husk off, and afterwards dried or parched in the sun. In this state it is preserved for use, and employed for the same purposes as rice. The meal of parched corn is also much used, particularly by travelers, who mix it with honey, butter, and spices, and so eat it; or else mix it with water only, and drink it as a draught, the refrigerating and satisfying qualities of which they justly extol (Pictorial Bible, ii, p. 537).

Parched grain is also, no doubt, very common. Thus, in the bazaars of India not only may rice be obtained in a parched state, but also the seeds of the Nymphaea, and of the Nelumbium Speciosum, or bean of Pythagoras, and most abundantly the pulse called gram by the English, on which their cattle are chiefly fed. This is the Cicer Arietinum of botanists, or chick-pea, which is common even in Egypt and the south of Europe, and may be obtained everywhere in India in a parched state, under the name of chebenne. We know not whether it be the same pulse that is mentioned in the article DOVES' DUNG, a sort of pulse or pea, which appears to have been very common in Judæa.

Considering all these points, it does not appear to us by any means certain that kali is correctly translated 'parched corn,' in all the passages of scripture. Thus, in Lev. xxiii:14: 'Ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn (kali), nor green ears, until' So in Ruth ii:14, 'And he (Boaz) reached her parched corn (kali), and she did eat. 1 Sam. xvii:17: 'Take now for thy brethren an ephah of parched corn.' And again, xxv:18, where five measures of parched corn are mentioned. The name kali seems, moreover, to have been widely spread through Asiatic countries.

(3) Field Pea. The present writer found it applied in the Himalayas to the common field-pea, and has thus mentioned it elsewhere: 'Pisum arvense. Cultivated in the Himalayas, also in the plains of northwest India, found wild in the Khadie of the Jumna, near Delhi; the corra mutur of the natives, called Kullae in the hills' (Illustr. of Himalayan Botany, p. 200). Hence we are disposed to consider the pea, or the chick-pea, as more nearly correct than parched corn in some of the above passages of Scripture. (See PARCHED CORN.) J. F. R.

KALLAI (kál'lái), (Heb. קַלַּי, kal-la'h'ze frivolous), a son of Sallai, and a chief priest in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii:20), B. C. after 536.

KANAH (ká'nah), (Heb. קָנָה, kaw-naw', reediness).

1. A river which flows into the Mediterranean between Cæsarea and Joppa. It served as a boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi:8; xvii:9). It is identified by some as the river Aujeh.

2. A town in the north of Asher (Josh. xix:28). There are here colossal ruins and figures of persons which are supposed to be of Phœnician origin.

KANEH (káh'neh), (Heb. קָנֶה, kaw-neh'), occurs in several places of the Old Testament, in all of which, in the Authorized Version, it is translated reed; as in 1 Kings xiv:15; 2 Kings xviii:21; Job xl:21; Is. xix:6; xxxv:7; xxxvi:6; xlii:3; Ezek. xxix:6.

(1) Reed. The Greek word κάλamos, kal'am-os, reed, appears to have been considered the proper equivalent for the Hebrew Kaneh, being the term used by St. Matthew (xii:20), when quoting the words of Isaiah (xlii:3), 'A bruised reed (Kaneh) shall he not break.' The Greek word Latinized is well known in the forms of calamus and culmus. Both seem to have been derived from the Arabic kalm, signifying a 'reed' or 'pen,' and forming numerous compounds, with the latter signification, in the languages of the East. It also denotes a weaver's reed, and even cuttings of trees for planting or grafting.

(2) Latitude of Meaning. Such references to the meaning of these words in different languages, may appear to have little relation to our present subject; but κάλamos, reed, occurs very frequently in the New Testament, and apparently with the same latitude of meaning; thus, in the sense of a reed or culm of a grass (Matt. xi:7; Luke vii:24), 'A reed shaken by the wind;' of a pen, in 3 John 13, 'But I will not with pen (κάλamos) and ink write unto thee;' (Matt. xxvii:29), 'Put a reed in his right hand;' (ver. 30), 'took the reed and smote him on the head;'

and in Mark xv:19, it may mean a reed or twig of any kind. So also in Matt. xxvii:48, and Mark xv:36, where it is said that they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it on a reed, while in the parallel passage (John xix:29), it is said that they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth. From which it seems very probable that the term κάλamos, reed, was applied by both the Evangelists to the stem of the plant named hyssop, whatever this may have been, in like manner as Pliny applied the term Calamus to the stem of a bramble.

In most of the passages of the Old Testament the word Kaneh seems to be applied strictly to reeds of different kinds growing in water, that is, to the hollow stems or culms of grasses, which are usually weak, easily shaken about by wind or by water, fragile, and breaking into sharp-pointed splinters. Thus in 1 Kings xiv:15, 'As a reed is shaken in the water;' Job xl:21, 'He lieth in the covert of the reed' (Kaneh); Is. xix:6, 'And they shall turn the rivers far away; and the reeds and flags shall wither.' Also in ch. xxxv:7; while in 2 Kings xviii:21; Ezek. xxix:6, and Is. xxxvi:6, there is reference to the weak and fragile nature of the reed, 'Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt, whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it.'

(3) A Water Plant. From the context of the several passages of scripture in which Kaneh is mentioned, it is evident that it was a plant growing in water; and we have seen from the meaning of the word in other languages that it must have been applied to one of the true reeds; as for instance, Arundo Ægyptiaca (perhaps only a variety of A. Donax), mentioned by M. Bové as growing on the banks of the Nile; or it may have been the Arundo asiaca of Delile, which is closely allied to A. Phragmites, the Canna and Canne of the south of Europe, which is found along the banks of pools and marshes in Spain and Italy.

In the New Testament κάλamos, reed, seems to be applied chiefly to plants growing in dry and even barren situations, as in Luke vii:24; 'What went ye into the wilderness to see? a reed shaken by the wind?' To such passages, some of the species of reed-like grasses, with slender stems and light flocculent inflorescence, formerly referred to Saccharum, but now separated as distinct genera, are well suited.

Hente, as has already been suggested by Rosenmüller, the noun Kaneh ought to be restricted to reeds, or reed-like grasses, while Agmon may indicate the more slender and delicate grasses or sedges growing in wet situations, but which are still tough enough to be made into ropes. (See REED.)

KAREAH (ka-rē'ah), (Heb. קָרְאָה, kaw-ray'akh, bald), father of Johanan and Jonathan, who supported Gedaliah's authority and took vengeance on his murderers (Jer. xl:8, 13, 15, 16; xli:11, 13, 14, 16; xlii:1, 8; xliii:2, 4, 5). Elsewhere the name is CAREAH. (B. C. before 588.)

KARKAA (kār'ka-à), (Heb. קָרְכָּא, kar-kah', ground floor), a town on the southern confines of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:3) between Addar and Azmon. All trace of the place has been lost.

KARKOR (kār'kôr), (Heb. קָרְקוֹר, kar-kore', foundation), a place, probably on the east of Jordan, where the remnant of the army of Zebah and Zalmunna had encamped after their rout in the Jordan Valley, and from which Gideon dispersed them (Judg. viii:10). Its identification is very uncertain.

KARPAS (kär'pas), (Heb. קָרְפָּס, kar-pas', green), occurs in the book of Esther i:6, in the description of the hangings "in the court of the garden of the king's palace," at the time of the great feast given in the city Shushan, or Susan, by Ahasuerus, who "reigned from India even unto Ethiopia."

We are told that there were white, green (karpas), and blue hangings fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble.

(1) Leek Green. Karpas is translated green in our version, on the authority, it is said, 'of the Chaldee paraphrase,' where it is interpreted leek-green. Rosenmüller and others derive the Hebrew word from the Arabic kurufs, which signifies 'garden parsley,' apium petroselinum, as if it alluded to the green color of this plant; at the same time arguing that as 'the word karpas is placed between two other words which undoubtedly denote colors, viz., the white and the purple-blue, it probably also does the same.'

(2) Cotton. But if two of the words denote colors, it would appear a good reason why the third should refer to the substance which was colored. This, there is little doubt, is what was intended. The Hebrew karpas is very similar to the Sanscrit karpasum, karpasa, or karpase, signifying the cotton-plant. Celsius (Hierobot. i. 159) states that the Arabs and Persians have karphas and kirbas as names for cotton. These must no doubt be derived from the Sanscrit, while the word kapas is now applied throughout India to cotton with the seed, and may even be seen in English prices-current. Nothing can be more suitable than cotton, white and blue, in the above passage of Esther. Hanging curtains usually in stripes of different colors and padded with cotton, called purdahs, are employed throughout India as a substitute for doors. This kind of structure was probably introduced by the Persian conquerors of India, and therefore may serve to explain the object of the colonnade in front of the palace in the ruins of Persepolis. (See COTTON.)

KARTAH (kär'tah), (Heb. קָרְתָּה, kar-taw, city), a town in the tribe of Zebulun allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi:34). Kartah is probably identical with KATTATH (Josh. xix:15).

KARTAN (kär'tan), (Heb. קָרְתָּן, kar-tawn, double city), a city of Naphtali allotted to the Gershonite Levites, and made a city of refuge (Josh. xxi:32). The name may be a contraction of KIRJATHAIM (1 Chron. vi:76).

KATTATH (kät'tath), (Heb. קָטְתָּת, kat-tawth', littleness), the limit of the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix:15). In Judg. i:30 called Kithron, which is the same in sense. It is also probably the same as KARTAH.

The Vulgate, LXX, Syriac, and Arabic, render these names, which are from the same root, by small, trifling, insignificant things: the Chaldee to the same effect; whence the name of this city, perhaps, might be analogous to our name little-town, Littleton. It is quite possible that this is the modern Katwath, and the Caná of Galilee of the New Testament.

KEDAR (kē'dar), (Heb. קֵדָר, kay-dawr', black), a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:13; 1 Chron. i:29), and the name of the tribe of which he was the founder.

The name is sometimes used in scripture as that of the Bedouins generally, probably because this tribe was the nearest to them, and was best acquainted with them (Cant. i:5; Is. xxi:16, 17; ix:7, xlii:11). A great body of speculation founded upon the meaning of the word, namely, 'black,' may be dismissed as wholly useless. The Kedarcenes were so called from Kedar, and not because they lived in 'black' tents, or because they were 'blackened' by the hot sun of Southern Arabia; neither of which circumstances could, even if true, have been foreseen at the time that Kedar received his name. The "glory of Kedar" is recorded by Isaiah (xxi:13-17) and Ezekiel (xxvii:21; Ps. cxx:5; Jer. ii:10; xlix:28), from which we infer that the tribe was one of importance and wealth.

KEDEMAH (kēd'e-mah), (Heb. קֵדְמָה, kayd'-maw, eastward), the youngest son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:15; 1 Chron. i:31, B. C. after 2061).

KEDEMOTH (kēd'e-mōth), (Heb. קֵדְמוֹת, ked-ay-mothe'), a city in the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii:18, near the river Arnon, which gave its name to the wilderness of Kedemoth, on the borders of that river, from whence Moses sent messengers of peace to Sihon, king of Heshbon (Deut. ii:26), the southern frontier of whose kingdom, and the boundary between the kingdom of the Ammonites and the Moabites, was the Arnon.

KEDESH (kēdesh), (Heb. קֵדְשָׁה, keh'desh).

1. A city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:23). Perhaps it is identical with Kadesh-Barnea (Josh. xv:3; Num. xxxiv:4). (See KADESH.)

2. A city in the tribe of Naphtali (xix:37). It was a Levitical city, and one of the six cities of refuge (Josh. xx:7; xxi:32; 1 Chron. vi:76). Barak was a native of this place (Judg. iv:6), which was taken by Tiglath-Pileser in the reign of Pekah (2 Kings xv:29), where it is mentioned with Hazor.

3. A city of Issachar allotted to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron. vi:72). As the Kedesh, whose king was slain by Joshua, is mentioned among the cities of the north (xii:22), it was doubtless this Kedesh.

KEDRON (kē'drön). See KIDRON.

KEHELATHAH (ke-hél'a-thah), (Heb. כְּהֵלָתָא, keh-hay-law' thaw, convocation), an encampment of the Israelites in the desert of which nothing is known (Num. xxxiii:22, 23).

KEILAH (kēi'lah), (Heb. כַּיִלָּה, keh-ee-law', inclosed, a citadel), a city of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:44), about twenty miles southwest from Jerusalem.

(1) Besieged by Philistines. When this city was besieged by the Philistines, David was commissioned by God to relieve it; notwithstanding which, if he had not made his escape, the ungrateful inhabitants would have delivered him into the hands of Saul (1 Sam. xxiii:1-13). Keilah was a considerable city in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii:17, 18), and existed in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, who place it eight Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Hebron.

(2) Identification. "The site is satisfactorily identified with Khûrbet Kîla, a ruined village seven miles from Beit Jibrin. It is on low ground, which accounts for the expression 'go down,' and it was a key to the hill country, with fertile lands around it." (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dic., p. 225.)

In the time of Nehemiah Keilah was large enough to have two prefects who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:17).

KELAIAH (ke-lā'iah [yá]), (Heb. כַּלְיָאִי, kay-law-yaw', insignificance), (Ezra x:23). It is the same as KELITA.

KELITA (kél'i-tá), (Heb. כַּלְיָתָי, kel-ee-taw', maiming, dwarf), a Levite who returned from the captivity with Ezra, and had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x:23). He was associated with Nehemiah in expounding the law, and sealing the covenant to follow the law of God (Neh. viii:7; x:10), B. C. 456-410.

KEMUEL (ke-mū'el), (Heb. כַּמּוּאֵל, kem-oo-ale', assembly of God; Sept. Καμουήλ, Kamuel).

1. The third son of Abraham's brother Nahor, and father of six sons, the first of whom is named Aram, and the last Bethuel (Gen. xxii:21, 23). All these are unknown, except the last, who was the father of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. xxiv:15). Aram is manifestly no other than a proper name which Kemuel gave to his firstborn; but as it is also the Hebrew name of Syria, some commentators have most strangely conceived that the Syrians were descended from him. This is truly surprising, seeing that Syria was already peopled ere he was born, and that Laban (Gen. xxviii:5) and Jacob (Deut. xxvi:5) are both called 'Syrians,' although neither of them was descended from Kemuel's son Aram.

2. Son of Shiptan. He was prince of the tribe of Ephraim, and one of the twelve appointed by Moses to divide the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv:24). (B. C. 1170.)

3. A Levite; the father of Hashabiah, who was prince of the tribe in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii:17). (B. C. about 1000.)

KENAN (kē'nán), (Heb. כַּנָּן, kay-naw'n', fixed), the same as CAINAN, son of Enos (1 Chron. i:2; Gen. v:9, marg.).

KENATH (kē'nath), (Heb. כְּנָתַי, ken-awth', possession), a town of Manasseh, beyond Jordan (Num. xxxii:42), named Nobah, after Nobah, an Israelite, had conquered it. At a later period it was recaptured by Geshur and Aram (1 Chron. ii:23). Eusebius places it in the Trachonitis, about Bozra; and Pliny in the Decapolis, lib. v, cap. 18.

Its site has been pretty well identified with Kūnawát (Porter, Damascus, ii:87-115; Handbk. 512-514).

KENAZ (kē'náz), (Heb. כֶּנָּז, ken-az', a hunter).

1. The fifth son of Eliphaz, who was the eldest son of Esau, and one of the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. xxxvi:15, 42; 1 Chron. i:53). He was the founder of the tribe of Kenezites, and doubtless they received their name from him. Caleb and Othniel were of this family. (Josh. xiv:14).

2. The name of a place or tract of country in Arabia Petræa, named after Kenaz 1. (Gen. xxxvi:11, 15, 42).

3. The younger brother of Caleb, and father of Othniel, who married Caleb's daughter (Josh. xv:17; Judg. i:13; 1 Chron. iv:13).

4. A grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. iv:15).

KENEZITE (kēn'ez-ite), (Heb. כְּנִזִּי, hak-ken-iz-see', Num. xxxii:12; Josh. xiv:6, 14), an epithet applied to Caleb, son of Jephunneh. (See KENIZZITES.)

KENITES (kēn'ites), (Heb. כְּנִזִּי, kay-nee'), a tribe of people dwelling among the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv:6; comp. Num. xxiv:20, 21), or occupying in semi-nomadic life the same region with the latter people in Arabia Petræa.

When Saul was sent to destroy the Amalekites, the Kenites, who had joined them, perhaps upon compulsion, were ordered to depart from them that they might not share their fate; and the reason assigned was, that they 'shewed kindness to the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt.'

This kindness is supposed to have been that which Jethro and his family shewed to Moses, as well as to the Israelites themselves, in consequence of which the whole tribe appears to have been treated with consideration, while the family of Jethro itself accompanied the Israelites into Palestine, where they continued to lead a nomadic life, occupying there a position similar to that of the Tartar tribes in Persia at the present day. According to Judg. i:16; iv:11; Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite. To this family belonged Heber, the husband of that Jael who slew Sisera, and who is hence called 'Heber the Kenite' (Judg. iv:11). At a later age other families of Kenites are mentioned as resident in Palestine, among them were the Rechabites (1 Chron. ii:55; Jer. xxxv:2); but it is not clear whether these were subdivisions of the increasing descendants of Jethro, as seems most likely, or families which availed themselves of the friendly dispositions of the Israelites towards the tribe to settle in the country. It appears that the tribe of the Kenites possessed a knowledge of the true God in the time of Jethro (see HOBAB); and that those families which settled in Palestine did not afterwards lose that knowledge, but increased it, is clear from the passages which have been cited.

KENIZZITES (kēn'iz-zites), (Heb. כְּנִזִּי, ken-iz-see'), a Canaanitish tribe, mentioned in Gen. xv:10 along with others over which it was promised that the seed of Abraham should have dominion.

It is supposed that they sprung from Kenaz, the grandson of Edom, and had their dwelling somewhere in Idumæa. The chieftain was known as Kenaz from the tribe which he ruled (Gen. xxxvi:11, 15, 40-42). Individuals of the tribe, on the other hand, united with the sons of Jacob, Jephunneh the Kenizzite apparently taking to wife a woman of the tribe of Judah, and Othniel the Kenizzite becoming the first judge of Israel after the conquest. (See CALEB 2.) The Keniz-zites of Num. xxxii:12; Josh. xiv:6, appear, however, to be a different race, the origin of which may without improbability be ascribed to Kenaz. The Kenizzites are not named among the nations whom the Israelites eventually subdued; whence it may be supposed that they had by that time merged into some of the other nations which Israel overcame.

KENOSIS (kēn-ō'sis), (Gr. κένωσις, kēn'ō-sis), a Greek term signifying the act of emptying, or self-divesture. It is employed to express the voluntary humiliation of Christ. It is borrowed from the expression of Paul, "But made himself of no reputation," ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσε, emptied himself (Phil. ii:7).

The New Testament teaching upon this point may be arranged under five heads: (1) The virginal conception and birth (Matthew and Luke); (2) The pempsis, or mission from the Father (Jesus, John and Paul); (3) The parousia, or coming out of the preëxistent state of glory, into the world (Jesus and John); (4) The assumption of the flesh (John and Paul); (5) The Kenosis or self-emptying of the Logos (Paul).

It is true that these classes overlap, but the arrangement has the recommendation of clearness and convenience.

(1) The first class of passages records the Annunciation, Conception and Birth (Matt. i:18-24; Luke i:26-38; ii:1-10). There is little to add to the Biblical narratives, which are straightforward accounts of historical events. All that we can say is that the conception and birth are both (to us) miraculous, nor can human analogy help us much, as conception, the ultimate fact of human biology, is unexplained and probably unexplainable. And if we thus come—even in a matter of everyday occurrence, and of such apparent simplicity—to the limit of human knowledge, how can we explain the mysteries of a purely spiritual conception?

All that we learn from the account contained in the gospels is the fact that he was "conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." What is important for us is the fact that he whom these two gospels regard as the Son of the living God was born of woman.

This is asserted also in Paul's statement: "When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son made of a woman," etc. (Gal. iv:4).

That the Son of God in becoming the Son of man should submit himself to the regular human method of coming into the world is one of the most sublime proofs of his loving condescension to us. Yet one thing we must not forget,—that this family into which he was born was, on both sides, of royal stock, both Joseph and Mary being descendants of king David. This was a necessity, for the Messiah of prophecy was the descendant of David, born in the royal city of Bethlehem. The attendant circumstances of deep poverty serve to emphasize the humiliation of our Savior; surely he who was rich for our sakes became poor (2 Cor. viii:9).

(2) The second class of passages refers to the pempsis the Mission of the Son from and by the Father. Christ here represents his coming as an act dependent upon the will of the Father who sent him. The Father sends, the Son comes, as is attested by numerous passages in the gospel according to John (John iv:34; v:23; vi:39, etc.). The same aspect of his coming is presented in John iii:16 and the Apostle Paul tells us that, "when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son" (Gal. iv:4).

(3) The third class of passages is that large one in which Jesus refers to his coming. The most important of course are those which report his own words. "I am come in the name of my Father" (John v:43).

"For the bread of God is he that cometh down from heaven" (John vi:33). "For I am come forth from God" (John viii:42).

"And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (John xvii:5).

In the prologue to his gospel (i:1-18) John affirms both the preëxistence and the Divinity of the Logos. It is here distinctly stated the Divine Logos, who was in a preëxistent state with God (a state which, as we learned from John xvii:5, was a state of glory) when he had assumed flesh, became as one of us, making this world his temporary abiding place. Though the method of transition is not directly stated, yet this text teaches as does John xvii:5, a coming out of this preëxistent state of glory, into the earthly life with all that implies.

(4) The fourth class of passages comprises those which refer to the assumption of the flesh. The most important of these is the following: "The Logos became (was made) flesh" (John i:14). This text is the theological statement of the fact of the human birth of the Christ.

That which in the accounts of Matthew and Luke appears as a simple historical fact is by John explained as a process (or episode) within the eternal life of the Divine Logos. How the Logos became, or was made flesh, we learn just as little as we learned from Matthew and Luke, how the child Jesus was conceived and born.

The celebrated passage in Phil. ii:5-8 teaches that Christ is both Divine and human. Thus we preclude, by comparison with this text, any explanation which might possibly posit an essential change in the eternal life of the Divine Logos. Paul teaches, moreover, that this flesh which the Logos assumed, was "sinful flesh," i. e., flesh which, like our flesh, is subject to the rule of sin.

In 1 Tim. iii:16, Paul speaks of Christ as "manifest in the flesh."

(5) The last class of statements noted comprises those passages in the Epistles of Paul in which the Apostle expounds his conception of Christ's humiliation (Rom. viii:3; 2 Cor. v:21; Gal. iii:13; iv:4, 5; 2 Cor. xiii:4; Rom. viii:32; Phil. ii:5-8).

The general teaching of Paul is that Christ, who knew not sin, was made sin for our sakes; that he was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh; that he redeemed us from the curse, by becoming a curse for our sakes; that he was sent in the fullness of time of the Father, being made of a woman; that though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; that he was crucified through weakness, but liveth by the power of God; that God spared not His own Son; and that though "being in the form of God" considered it not a thing to be eagerly grasped "to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii:6-8).

We have, then, under these five heads the teaching of the New Testament on this subject. The Son of God, sent of the Father, came upon the earth being born of a woman, in the regular course of nature (yet she was a virgin, and the conception was brought about by the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit). Or, in theological language, the Divine Logos became flesh, i. e. assumed the human flesh, with all its liability to sin, having first emptied himself of equality with God, and the resultant product of this process is Jesus Christ, Son of God, and Son of man.

A careful study of the development of the child, so far as it is possible, fails to show the least trace of duality of consciousness. The boy of twelve in the Temple is just awakening to a great fact of his life, but there is no indication that he is conscious of another ego within himself: "I must be about my Father's business" (Luke ii:49).

The man Christ Jesus, also, is ever conscious of both his Divinity and his humanity. Thus he says: "I am the living bread that came down from Heaven" (John vi:51). "Before Abraham was, I am" (John viii:58). "Glorify me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (John xvii:5).

In these and many similar passages, Jesus Christ distinctly indicates the unity of his theanthropic consciousness, and the continuity of his theanthropic personality upon which the former depends. He does not seem to feel separately conscious of his Divinity and of his humanity, nor does his claim of existence before Abraham, and even before the world was, appear at all strained, but his consciousness of that preëxistence, and of the continuity of his identity, and of his personality since before the foundation of the world, is perfectly natural to him. Both natures intimately united make up the historic Christ of the New Testament records.

We have, then, arrived at the conclusion that the man Jesus Christ shared with us, in the fullest manner, our human constitution, both in the physical and in the psychical life. The gospels everywhere bear witness to his physical likeness to ourselves, and to the reality of his body, which was not exempt from the weaknesses of the flesh.

He was subject to bodily weariness and to thirst (John iv:6-7). He slept in the boat in the midst of the storm, an indication of great weariness (Matt. viii:24). He was "an hungered" (Matt. iv:2; xxi:19).

He was like us also in his soul life. He loved the young ruler who came to him to inquire the way of life (Mark x:21). He is again and again represented as "sighing," "groaning," or "troubled" in spirit (Mark viii:12; John xi:33; xii:27). He has mercy on the crowds that throng him (Matt. xiv:14). He weeps at the grave of Lazarus (John xi:35). He fiercely denounces the Scribes and Pharisees (Matt. xxiii.).

The great turning point in his eternal life of love is the point at which the Son of God, casting aside his pristine glory, and taking unto himself our human nature with all its weaknesses, becomes the Son of Man, the point at which the preëxistent Christ enters into the world's history as the man Jesus Christ for the salvation of the world (John iii:16). KERCHIEF (kēr'chīf), (Heb. כֶּרְחִיף, mis-paw-khaw', a dress for the head).

The word, as used in Ezek. xiii:18, probably means a more than usually splendid headdress, which the false prophetesses employed to attract attention to themselves, or put on the heads of such as joined them. Woe is denounced against them because "they made kerchiefs on the head of every stature, to hunt souls;" i. e. they put them on the head of the idolatrous statures; or they put them on the head of those whom they deluded, and that without respect of age; (stature in this passage probably meaning age.) It is more than likely that the prophet alludes in the whole passage to the impure worship of Ashtarte the Syrian Venus.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (kēr'en-bāp'puk), (Heb. כֶּרֶן הַפּוּחַ, keh'ren hap-pook', paint-horn, i. e., cosmetic box), the name given to Job's youngest daughter, born during his reviving fortune (Job xlii:14). Her name was probably given on account of her beauty.

KERIOTH (kēr'i-ōth), (Heb. כֶּרְיֹת, ker-ee-yoth', buildings).

1. A city of Moab, named with Dibon and other places (Jer. xlviii:24). It is supposed to be a synonym of Ar, the ancient capital of Moab, because it seems to be referred to as the capital of Moab, and because in enumerations of the towns of Moab when Keriouth is cited Ar is omitted (Jer. xlviii.; Moabite Stone) and vice versa (Is. xv; xvi; comp. Josh. xiii:16-21). Porter thinks it the modern Kureiyeh in the south of Haurān (Five Years, etc., ii. 191-198; Handbk., pp. 523-524).

2. The name of a town occurring with others in the south of Judah (Josh. xv:25). Robinson would identify it with el-Kureitain (Bibl. Res., ii, 101). Formerly Kiriouth (Amos ii:2).

KERNEL (kēr'nēl), (Heb. כֶּרֶן, khar-tsan', sharp, sour), held by the Talmudists to mean the grape stones, as opposed to the skin ("husk," Num. vi:4). The ancient versions refer it to the sour or unripe grapes themselves. (Mc. & Str. Ency.) KEROS (kēr'ros), (Heb. קֶרוֹס or קֶרוֹם, kay-roce', curved), the descendants of a man, or a place whose former inhabitants returned as Nethinim, from Babylon after the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. viii:17; Ezra ii:44), B. C. before 536.

KETTLE (kēt't'l), (Heb. דֹּוּד, dood, boiling), a vessel used for culinary or sacrificial purposes (1 Sam. ii:14). The same Hebrew word also means 'basket' (Jer. xxiv:2); 'caldron' (2 Chron. xxxv:13); 'pot' (Job xli:20).

KETURAH (ke-tū'rah), (Heb. קֶטֹרֶה, ket-oo-raw', incense), the second wife, or, as she is called in 1 Chron. i:32, the concubine of Abraham, by whom he had six sons, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak and Shuah, whom he lived to see grow to man's estate, and whom he established 'in the East country,' that they might not interfere with Isaac (Gen. xxv:1-6).

As Abraham was one hundred years old when Isaac was given to him by the special bounty of Providence when 'he was as good as dead' (Heb. xi:12) as 'he was one hundred and forty years old when Sarah died; and as he himself died at the age of one hundred and seventy-five years,—it has seemed improbable that these six sons should have been born to Abraham by one woman after he was one hundred and forty years old, and that he should have seen them all grow up to adult age, and have sent them forth to form independent settlements in that last and feeble period of his life.

If, however, God restored his youthful vigor, there is no reason why he may not afterward have become the father of six sons or even more. Through the offspring of Keturah, Abraham became "the father of many nations."

KETZACH (kě't'sak), (Heb. כֶּצַח, keh-tsakh'), written Kezach and Ketsah, occurs only in Is. xxviii:25, 27, and is translated fitches, that is, vetches, the Authorized Version.

(1) Different Plants. It is no doubt from the difficulty of proving the precise meaning of ketzach, that different plants have been assigned as its representative. But if we refer to the context, we learn some particulars which at least restrict it to a certain group, namely, to such as are cultivated. Thus, verse 25, 'When he [the ploughman] hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches (ketzach)?' And again, verse 27, 'For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod.' From which we learn that the grain called ketzach was easily separated from its capsule, and therefore beaten out with a stick. The Septuagint translates it μελάνθιον, melanthium, the Vulgate gil, and Tremellius mclanthium, while the Arabic has shoanz. All these mean the same thing, namely, a very black-colored and aromatic seed, still cultivated and in daily employment as a condiment in the East.

(2) Nigella. Melanthium is universally recognized by botanists to be the Nigella. If we consider that this appears to have been always one of the cultivated grains of the East, and compare the character of nigella with the passages in which ketzach is mentioned, we shall find that the former is applicable to them all. The fruit is composed of five or six capsules, which are compressed, oblong, pointed; sometimes said to be hornlike, united below, and divided into several cells, and enclosing numerous, angular, scabrous, black-colored seeds. From the nature of the capsules, it is evident, that when they are ripe, the seeds might easily be shaken out by moderate blows of a stick, as is related to have been the case with the ketzach of the text. (See FICHES.) J. F. R.

KETZIOTH (kětz-i-oth), (Heb. קֶצְיוֹת, kets-ee'-oth), is translated CASSIA in the Authorized Version, and is said to be derived from a Hebrew word meaning to cut off.

(1) Cassia. It therefore denotes 'pieces cut off,' or 'fragments,' and hence is applicable to cassia. But many of these derivations have often been traced out in ignorance of the names and properties of the various substances known to the nations of antiquity.

Cassia is mentioned in three places (Exod. xxx:24; Ezek. xxvii:19; and in Ps. xlv:8), in conjunction with myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, and ahalim, or eagle-wood. All these are aromatic substances, and, with the exception of myrrh, which is obtained from Africa, are products of India and its islands. It is probable, therefore, that ketziath is of a similar nature, and obtained from the same countries. Both cinnamon (see KINNAMON) and cassia (see KIDDAH) were no doubt known to the ancients. (See CASSIA.)

(2) Various Renderings. It has not been the opinion of several translators and commentators that the kiddah of Exod. xxx:24 and Ezek. xxvii:19, and the ketziath of Ps. xlv:8, both signify the same thing; the first having been variously rendered iris, stacte, costus, ginger, canna, fistula, amber, ketziah, and cassia, while ketziath, or ketziah, has been rendered cassia, acacia, amber, ginger, and aloes. Ketziath occurs only once, in Ps. xlv:8: 'All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes (ahalim), and cassia (ketziath).' It has been observed with reference to this passage that 'The garments of princes are often imbued with costly perfumes, those of the high-priests were anointed with holy ointment.'

We have seen above that ketziah has been variously translated, but no one seems to have noticed the resemblance of this word to the kooth and koost of the Arabs, of which Kooshta is said by their authors to be the Syriac name, and from which there is little doubt that the κάρρος, costus, of the Greeks, and costus of the Latins are derived.

Considering, therefore, that costus was one of the articles of ancient commerce and is mentioned by Theophrastus as employed in the composition of perfumed unguents, and considering the similarity of the Syriac kooshta, and the Arabic kast, to the ketziath of scripture, and from their correspondence in properties and uses, the latter appears more likely to be the costus of the ancients, than cassia, for which there is another name. (See KIDDAH.) J. F. R.

KEY (kē). The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were generally closed with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten those bands. Chardin says that a lock in the East is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple, and that the key is a wooden handle with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow.

Figurative. A key was a symbol of power or authority (Is. xxii:22).

1. Christ gives Peter authority in his church (Matt. xvi:19), the key of the kingdom of heaven, the power of binding and loosing; that is, of opening and shutting; for this frequently consisted only, as we have said, in tying and untying. Isaiah remarks, that Eliakim should wear his key upon his shoulder, as a mark of office, of his power to open and shut with authority.

2. Christ reproaches the scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge (Luke xi:52); that is, with reading and studying the scriptures, without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in some sort they held captive in unrighteousness (Rom. i:18).

3. He also says (Rev. i:18) that he has the key of death and hell; that is, power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death.

KEZIA (ke-zī'ā), (Heb. קֵצִיא, kets-ee-aw', cassia), the second daughter of Job, born after his recovery (Job xlii:14).

KEZIZ (kē'ziz), (Heb. קֵצִיץ, kets-eets', abrupt), a city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:21, A. V. "Valley of Keziz"), the name of which is still preserved in the Wady el Kaziz, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, southeast of the Apostles' Well.

KHAN (kān), the Arabic name for the establishments which correspond to our inn. (See INN.)

KIBROTH-HATTA AVAH (kīb'roth-hat-tā'avah), (Heb. קִבְרוֹת הַתְּהוֹמָה, kib-roth' hat-tah-av-av', graves of the longing), an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness, probably about three days' journey from Sinai (Num. xi:34), thus named because it was the burial place of many who died from overeating the preternatural supply of quail-flesh (Num. xi:35, xxxiii:16, 17; Deut. ix:22). (See WANDERING, THE.)

KIBZAIM (kīb-zā'im), (Heb. קִבְצַיִם, kib-tsah'yim, a double heap), a city of Ephraim (Josh. xxi:22), which was given up to the Kohathite Levites. In I Chron. vi, Jokmeam is substituted for Kibzaim, perhaps through a mistake owing to the similarity in the original.

KID (kīd). See GOAT; LAMB.

KIDDĀH (kīd'dah), (Heb. קִדְדָה, kid-dawkh'), as well as KETZIOTH, is rendered CASSIA in our Authorized Version.

The word occurs first in Exod. xxx:24, where cassia (kiddah) is mentioned in connection with olive oil, pure myrrh, sweet cinnamon, and sweet calamus; secondly, in Ezek. xxvii:19, where Dan and Javan are described as bringing bright iron, cassia (kiddah), and calamus to the markets of Tyre. There is no reason why the substance now called cassia might not have been imported from the shores of India into Egypt and Palestine.

Considerable confusion has, however, been created by the same name having been applied by botanists to a genus containing the plants yielding senna, and to others, as the cassia fistula, which have nothing to do with the original cassia. Cassia-buds, again, though no doubt produced by a plant belonging to the same, or to some genus allied to that producing cinnamon and cassia, were probably not known in commerce at so early a period as the two latter substances. There is, certainly, no doubt that some cassia is produced on the coast of Malabar. The name also would appear to be of Eastern origin, as kasse koronde is one kind of cinnamon, as mentioned by Burmann in his Flora Zeylonica; but it will be preferable to treat of the whole subject in connection with cinnamon. (See KINNAMON.)

1. Inward part of some animals (Lev. iii:4).

2. The kernel or substantial part of grains of wheat (Deut. xxxii:14).

Figurative. 1. The inmost powers, thoughts, and desires of the soul are sometimes called reins; these being regarded by the Jews as the very inmost parts of the body (Ps. xvi:7; Lam. iii:13; Rev. ii:23).

2. God is "far from men's reins," when they have no true knowledge, fear, love, desire of, or delight in him, and perform no true obedience to him (Jer. xii:2).

3. Men are "pricked in their reins," when their soul is wounded with disquieting thoughts, tormenting passions, envy, sorrow, anger (Ps. lxxiii:21).

4. Men's "reins instruct" them, when God, by inspiration or otherwise, stirs up instructive and directive thoughts in their minds (Ps. xvi:7).

KIDRON (kīd'ron), (Heb. קִדְרוֹן, kid-rone', dusky, gloomy). The brook or winter torrent which flows through the valley of Jehoshaphat (as it is now called), on the east side of Jerusalem.

The brook Kidron is the only name by which 'the valley' itself is known in Scripture; for it is by no means certain, nor even probable, that the name 'valley of Jehoshaphat' in Joel (iii:12) was intended to apply to this valley.

(1) Brook. The word rendered, 'brook' (2 Sam. xv:23; 1 Kings ii:37, etc.), is נַחַל, nachal, which may be taken as equivalent to the Arabic Wady, meaning a stream and its bed or valley, or properly the valley of a stream, even when the stream is dry. The Septuagint, Josephus, and the Evangelists (John xviii:1), designate it χλωρῶπος, a storm brook, or winter torrent.

The brook Kidron derives all its importance from its vicinity to the holy city, being nothing more than the dry bed of a winter torrent, bearing marks of being occasionally swept over by a large volume of water. No stream flows through it, except during the heavy rains of winter, when the waters descend into it from the neighboring hills. But even in winter there is no constant flow, and the resident missionaries assured Dr. Robinson that they had not during several years seen a stream running through the valley.

(2) Ravine. The ravine in which the stream is collected takes its origin above a mile to the northeast of the city. This ravine deepens as it proceeds, and forms an angle opposite the temple. It then takes a southeasterly direction, and, passing between the village of Siloam and the city, runs off in the direction of the Dead Sea, through a singularly wild gorge, the course of which few travelers have traced (Pictorial Palestine, Introd. p. 194). It is in this ravine that the celebrated monastery of Santa Saba is situated. Mr. Madden, who went through the valley to the Dead Sea, thus speaks of the character which it assumes as it approaches the monastery:—"After traversing for the last hour a wild ravine, formed by two rugged perpendicular mountains, the sides of which contained innumerable caverns, which once formed a sort of troglodyte city, in which the early Christians resided, the sight of the convent in this desolate place was like a glimpse of paradise."

(3) Bed of the Kidron. On leaving the convent the next day he says that he 'marched through the bed of the Kidron, along the horrible ravine which he entered the day before.' (Dr. Robinson, Biblical Researches, ii, 249), on passing along the western borders of the lake, came 'to the deep and almost impassable ravine of the Kidron, running down by Mar Saba, and thence called Wady-er-Rahib, "Monk's Valley;" but here also bearing the name of Wady en-Nar, "Fire Valley." At this place it was running east southeast, in a deep, narrow channel, between perpendicular walls of rock, as if worn away by the rushing waters between these desolate chalky hills. There was, however, no water in it then; nor had there apparently been any for a long time.' (Barclay, City of the Great King, pp. 302, sq.)

At last its dreary course brings the water (when there is any) to the precipice above the Dead Sea, into which it falls. The valley is only twenty miles long, but it has a descent of three thousand, nine hundred and twelve feet.

(4) Recent Explorations. Recent excavations have brought to light the fact that the true bed of the Kidron is about forty feet lower than its present bed, and about seventy feet nearer to the sanctuary wall.

Reference is made to it in 2 Sam. xv:23; 1 Kings ii:37; xv:13; 2 Kings xi:16; xxiii:4; 2 Chron. xxix:16.

KIKAYON (ki-kay'ōn), (Heb. קִיכַיֹּון, kee-kaw-yone'), occurs only in Jonah iv, where it is several times mentioned, as in verses 6, 7, 9, 10.

(1) Gourd. It is translated gourd in our Authorized Version, probably from the kol-o-kune'-thay, κολοκύνθη of the Septuagint, often rendered curcubita. In the margin of the English Bible, Palm-Christ is given. In the Vulgate kikayon is translated hedera, 'ivy.' Neither the gourd nor ivy is considered by modern writers to indicate the plant intended. We are told, 'The Lord God prepared a gourd (kikayon), and made it to come over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head,' etc. (verse 6). 'But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered' (verse 7). And in verse 10 it is said of the gourd that it 'came up in a night, and perished in a night.' Hence it appears that the growth of the kikayon was miraculous, but that it was probably a plant of the country, being named specifically; also that it was capable of affording shade, and might be easily destroyed.

(2) Palma Christi. The Hebrew name kikayon is so similar to the kiki of Dioscorides, that it was early thought to indicate the same plant. Dioscorides (iv, 164, πελο κικεως) states that the kiki, or croton, is called wild sesamum. It has also been called Pentadactylus and Palma Christi, from the palmate division of its leaves. Having ascertained that the kiki of the Greeks is what is now called Ricinus communis, we shall find that its characters correspond with everything that is required, except the rapidity of growth, which must be granted was miraculous. From the erect habit, and the breadth of its foliage, this plant throws an ample shade, especially when young. From the softness and little substance of its stem, it may easily be destroyed by insects, which Rumphius describes as sometimes being the case. It would then necessarily dry up rapidly. As it is well suited to the country, and to the purpose indicated in the text, and as its name kiki is so similar to kikayon, it is doubtless the plant which the sacred penman had in view. (See GOURD; JONAH.) J. F. R.

KIMOSH and KIMSHON (ki'mōsh, kim'shōn), (Heb. קִימֹשׁ, kim-moshe', nettles, and קִימְשֹׁן, kim-shone'), occur, the first in Is. xxxiv:13, and Hos.

ix:6; and the second in Prov. xxiv:31, where it is mentioned along with CHARUL, which we believe to indicate charlock.

The field of the slothful is there described as being grown over with thorns (charullim), 'and nettles (kimshon) had covered the face thereof.' In Isaiah it is said, 'And thorns (choach) shall come up in the palaces, nettles (kimosh) and brambles in the fortresses thereof.' (Hos. ix:6), 'The pleasant places for their silver, nettles (kimosh) shall possess them; thorns (choach) shall be in their tabernacles.'

Though different interpretations have been given of this word, as thorns, thistles, wild chamomile, etc., the greatest number of authors have united in adopting nettles, chiefly in consequence of the authority of Jewish writers, and because that meaning is as well suited to the passages in which it occurs as any other which has hitherto been suggested. KIN (kīn). See KINDRED.

KINAH (ki'nah), (Heb. קִינָה, kee-naw', a dirge), a town of Judah (Josh. xv:22) on the extreme south boundary of the tribe, next to Edom.

KINDNESS (kind'nēs), (Heb. קִהְיָה, kheh'sed, desire, zeal).

1. Kindness is the quality of being kind, of expressing in words and deeds good will and benevolence and of contributing to the welfare or happiness of others (Gen. xxi:23; 2 Sam. x:2). It denotes compassion for the afflicted (Job vi:14). A. V. "pity." It is an act of courtesy, good will, benignity and tenderness (Luke vi:35; 1 Cor. xiii:4; 2 Chron. x:7). Kindness and tenderness have been discriminated as follows: Kindness and tenderness are partial modes of affection, confined to those who know or are related to each other: we are kind to friends and acquaintances, tender toward those who are near and dear: kindness is a mode of affection most fitted for social beings; it is what everyone can show, and everyone is pleased to receive; tenderness is a state of feeling that is occasionally acceptable: the young and the weak demand tenderness from those who stand in the closest connection with them, but this feeling may be carried to an excess, so as to injure the object on which it is fixed. Crabbe.

2. Kindness of God towards men is shown in mercies, benefits, blessings, etc. (Ps. xxxi:21; cvii:43; cxvii:2).

KINDRED (kīn'drēd). The following are the Hebrew words thus translated in the English Bible:

1. Mish-paw-khaw' (Heb. מִשְׁפָּחָה, clan), usually rendered family (Gen. x:18; Ex. vi:14; Num. i:20; Josh. vii:17; Judg. xiii:2). It is rendered 'kindred' (Gen. xxiv:41; Josh. vi:23; Ruth ii:3; Job xxxii:2).

2. Mo-leh'deth (Heb. מוֹלֵהֶדֶת, a child, translated 'kindred' (Gen. xxviii:9; Lev. xviii:6, 17). It also means 'persons of the same family' (Gen. xiii:1; xxiv:4; xxxi:3; xliii:7; Num. x:30; Esth. ii:10; viii:6).

3. Mo-dah'ath (Heb. מוֹדַחֵת, is used to express blood relationships (Ruth iii:2).

4. Gheh-ool-law' (Heb. גְּהוֹלָלוּת, redemption), designating a relationship so close that it would impose the obligations of a kinsman (Ezek. xi:15).

5. Awkh (Heb. אָח, brother, 1 Chron. xii:29). Elsewhere used to express relationship in a wide sense. It comprises all affiliated relationships of consanguinity, affinity, or of the simplest ties.

6. The words which express collateral consanguinity are: (1) uncle; (2) aunt; (3) nephew; (4) niece (not in A. V.); (5) cousin. The terms of affinity are: (1) (a) father-in-law; (b) mother-in-law; (2) (a) son-in-law; (b) daughter-in-law; (3) (a) brother-in-law; (b) sister-in-law. The relations of kindred, expressed by few words, and imperfectly defined in the earliest ages, acquired in course of time greater significance and wider influence. (See FAMILY; MARRIAGE; INHERITANCE; BLOOD-REVENGE.)

KING (king), (Heb. and Chald. מֶלֶךְ, meh'lek, ruler; Gr. βασιλεύς, bas-il-yooce'), a chief ruler, a sovereign, one invested with supreme authority over a tribe, country or nation.

(1) General Use of the Word. In the Scriptures it is used with great latitude of meaning. The kings were local rulers over but one city or large village. Benhadad had thirty-two kings subject to him (1 Kings xx:1, 16). In Canaan, Adonibezek conquered seventy kings, and made them eat bread under his table. Joshua conquered thirty-one (Judg. i:7; Josh. xii). Nimrod of Babylon was the first king we read of; but soon after, we find kings in Egypt, Persia, Canaan, Edom, etc. (Gen. x:10; xiii, xiv, xx, xxxvi).

(2) Relation to Hebrews. Regal authority was altogether alien to the institutions of Moses in their original and unadulterated form. Their fundamental idea was that Jehovah was the sole king of the nation (1 Sam. viii:7): to use the emphatic words in Is. xxxiii:22, 'The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king.'

(3) Moses. We consider it as a sign of that self-confidence and moral enterprise which are produced in great men by a consciousness of being what they profess, that Moses ventured, with his half-civilized hordes, on the bold experiment of founding a society without a king, and that in the solicitude which he must have felt for the success of his great undertaking, he forewent the advantages which a regal government would have afforded. Such an attempt was singular and novel at a period and in a part of the world in which royalty was not only general, but held in the greatest respect, and sometimes rose to the very height of pure despotism. Its novelty is an evidence of the Divine original to which Moses referred all his polity.

(a) Patriotism. Equally honorable is the conduct of Moses in denying to his lower nature the gratifications which a crown would have imparted—we say denying himself, because it is beyond a question that the man who rescued the Jews from bondage and conducted them to the land of Canaan, might, had he chosen, have kept the dominion in his own hands, and transmitted a crown to his posterity.

Washington, at this late period of human history, after the accumulating experience of above three thousand years, is held deserving of high honor for having preferred to found a republic rather than attempt to build up a throne, and the Hebrew patriot with supreme power in his hands was content to die within sight of the land of promise, a simple, unrewarded, unhonored individual, content to do God's work regardless of self.

It is equally obvious that this self-denial on the part of Moses, this omission to create any human kingship, is in entire accordance with the import, aim, and spirit of the Mosaic institutions, as being Divine in their origin, and designed to accomplish a special work of Providence for man; and, therefore, affords, by its consistency with the very essence of the system of which it forms a part, a very forcible argument in favor of the Divine legation of Moses.

(b) Difficulties to be Met. That great man, however, well knew what were the elements with which he had to deal in framing institutions for the rescued Israelites. Slaves they had been, and the spirit of slavery was not yet wholly eradicated from their souls. They had, too, witnessed in Egypt the more than ordinary pomp and splendor which environ a throne, dazzling the eyes and captivating the heart of the uncultured. Not improbably the prosperity and abundance which they had seen in Egypt, might have been ascribed by them to the regal form of the Egyptian government. Moses may well, therefore, have apprehended a not very remote departure from the fundamental type of his institutions.

Accordingly he makes a special provision for this contingency (Deut. xvii:14), and labors, by anticipation, to guard against the abuses of royal power. Should a king be demanded by the people, then he was to be a native Israelite; he was not to be drawn away by the love of show, especially by a desire for that regal display in which horses have always borne so large a part, to send down to Egypt, still less to cause the people to return to that land. He was to avoid the corrupting influence of a large harem, so common among Eastern monarchs; he was to abstain from amassing silver and gold. He was to have a copy of the law made expressly for his own study—a study which he was never to intermit till the end of his days; so that his heart might not be lifted up above his brethren, that he might not be turned aside from the living God, but observing the Divine statutes, and thus acknowledging himself to be no more than the vicergerent of heaven, he might enjoy happiness, and transmit his authority to his descendants.

(4) Jewish Polity. The Jewish polity, then, was a sort of sacerdotal republic—we say sacerdotal, because of the great influence which, from the first, the priestly order enjoyed, having no human head, but being under the special supervision, protection, and guidance of the Almighty. The nature of the consequences, however, of that Divine influence avowedly depended on the degree of obdience and the general faithfulness of the nation. The good, therefore, of such a superintendence in its immediate results was not necessary, but contingent. The removal of Moses and of Joshua by death soon left the people to the natural results of their own condition and character. Anarchy ensued. Noble minds, indeed, and stout hearts appeared in those who were termed Judges; but the state of the country was not so satisfactory as to prevent an unenlightened people, having low and gross affections, from preferring the glare of a crown and the apparent protection of a scepter, to the invisible and, therefore, mostly unrecognized arm of Omnipotence.

(5) Demand for a King. A king accordingly is requested. The misconduct of Samuel's sons, who had been made judges, was the immediate occasion of the demand being put forth. The request came with authority, for it emanated from all the elders of Israel, who, after holding a formal conference, proceeded to Samuel, in order to make him acquainted with their wish.

Samuel was displeased; but, having sought in prayer to learn the Divine will, he is instructed to yield to the demand on a ground which we should not assuredly have found stated, had the book in which it appears have been tampered with or fabricated for any courtly purposes or any personal ends, whether by Samuel himself, or by David, or any of his successors—for they have not rejected thee (Samuel), but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them' (1 Sam. viii:7, 8). Samuel is, moreover, directed to 'protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them' (verse 9). Faithfully does the prophet depict the evils which a monarchy would inflict on the people. In vain. They said, 'Nay, but we will have a king over us.'

(6) Saul the Son of Kish. Accordingly, Saul the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was, by Divine direction, selected, and privately anointed by Samuel 'to be captain over God's inheritance:' thus he was to hold only a delegated and subordinate authority. Under the guidance of Samuel, Saul is subsequently chosen by lot from among the assembled tribes; and though his personal appearance had no influence in the choice, yet when he was plainly pointed out to be the individual designed for the scepter, Samuel called attention to those qualities which in less civilized nations have a preponderating influence, and are never without effect, at least, in supporting 'the Divinity which doth hedge a king.' 'See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people' (1 Sam. x:24), for he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward; 'and all the people shouted, God save the king.'

(7) Limited Monarchy. Emanating as the royal power did from the demand of the people and the permission of a prophet, it was not likely to be unlimited in its extent or arbitrary in its exercise. The government of God, indeed, remained, being rather concealed and complicated than disowned, much less superseded. The king ruled not in his own right, nor in virtue of the choice of the people, but by concession from on high, and partly as the servant and partly as the representative of the theocracy. How insecure, indeed, was the tenure of the kingly power, how restricted it was in its authority, appears clear from the comparative facility with which the crown was transferred from Saul to David; and the part which the prophet Samuel took in affecting that transference points out the quarter where lay the power which limited, if it did not primarily, at least, control the royal authority. We must not, however, expect to find any definite and permanent distribution of power, any legal determination of the royal prerogatives as discriminated from the Divine authority; circumstances, as they prompted certain deeds, restricted or enlarged the sphere of the monarch's action. Thus, in 1 Sam. xi:4, sq. we find Saul, in an emergency, assuming, without consultation or deliberation, the power of demanding something like a levy en masse, and of proclaiming instant war. With the king lay the administration of justice in the last resort (2 Sam. xv:2; 1 Kings iii:16, sq.).

He also possessed the power of life and death (2 Sam. xiv.). To provide for and superintend the public worship was at once his duty and his highest honor (1 Kings viii; 2 Kings xii:4; xviii:4; xxiii:1). One reason why the people requested a king was that they might have a recognized leader in war (1 Sam. viii:20).

The Mosaic law offered a powerful hindrance to royal despotism (1 Sam. x:25). The people also, by means of their elders, formed an express compact, by which they stipulated for their rights (1 Kings xii:4), and were from time to time appealed to, generally in cases of 'great pith and moment' (1 Chron. xxix:1; 2 Kings xi:17; Joseph., De Bell. Jud. ii. 1. 2). Nor did the people fail to interpose their will, where they thought it necessary, in opposition to that of the monarch (1 Sam. xiv:45).

The part which Nathan took against David shows how effective, as well as bold, was the check exerted by the prophets; indeed, most of the prophetic history is the history of the noblest opposition ever made to the viccs alike of royalty, priesthood, and people.

If needful, the prophet hesitated not to demand an audience of the king, nor was he dazzled or deterred by royal power and pomp (1 Kings xx:22, 38; 2 Kings i:15). As, however, the monarch held the sword, the instrument of death was sometimes made to prevail over every restraining influence (1 Sam. xxii:17).

(8) Transfer of the Crown to David. After the transfer of the crown from Saul to David, the royal power was annexed to the house of the latter, passing from father to son, with preference to the eldest born, though he might be a minor. Jehoash was seven years old when he began to reign (2 Kings xi:21).

This rule was not, however, rigidly observed, for instances are not wanting in which nomination of a younger son gave him a preferable title to the crown (1 Kings i:17; 2 Chron. xi:21). The people, too, and even foreign powers, at a later period, interrupted the regular transmission of royal authority (2 Kings xxi:24; xxiii:24, 30; xxiv:17).

The ceremony of anointing, which was observed at least in the case of Saul, David, and Solomon (1 Sam. ix:14; x:1; xv:1; xvi:12; 2 Sam. ii:4; v:3; 1 Kings i:34, 39, 40), and in which the prophet or high-priest who performed the rite acted as the representative of the theocracy and the expounder of the will of heaven, must have given to the spiritual power very considerable influence. And both in this particular and in the very nature of the observance directs the mind to Egypt, where the same custom prevailed, and where the power of the priestly caste was immense (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, v. 279). Indeed, the ceremony seems to have been essential to constitute a legitimate monarch (2 Kings xi:12; xxiii:30); and thus the authorities of the Jewish church held in their hands, and had subject to their will, a most important power, which they could use either for their own purposes or the common good. We have seen in the case of Saul that personal and even external qualities had their influence in procuring ready obedience to a sovereign; and further evidence to the same effect may be found in Ps. xlv:3; Ezek. xxviii:12. Such qualities would naturally excite the enthusiasm of the people, who appear to have manifested their approval by acclamations (1 Sam. x:24; 1 Kings i:25; 2 Kings ix:13; xi:13; 2 Chron. xxiii:11; see also Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i. 33, 9). Jubilant music formed a part of the popular rejoicings (1 Kings i:40); thank-offerings were made (1 Kings i:25); the new sovereign rode in solemn procession on the royal mule of his predecessor (1 Kings i:38), and took possession of the royal harem—an act which seems to have been scarcely less essential than other observances which appear to us to wear a higher character (1 Kings ii:13, 22; 2 Sam. xvi:22).

A numerous harem, indeed, was among the most highly estimated of the royal luxuries (2 Sam. v:13; 1 Kings xi:1; xx:3). It was under the supervision and control of eunuchs, and passed from one monarch to another as a part of the crown property (2 Sam. xii:8). The law (Deut. xvii:17), foreseeing evils such as that by which Solomon, in his later years, was turned away from his fidelity to God, had strictly forbidden many wives. But Eastern passions and usages were too strong for a mere written prohibition, and a corrupted religion became a pander to royal lust, interpreting the Divine command as sanctioning eighteen as the minimum of wives and concubines.

(9) Royal Revenues. In the original distribution of the land no share, of course, was reserved for a merely possible monarch; yet the kings were not without several sources of income. In the earlier periods of the monarchy the simple manners which prevailed would render copious revenues unnecessary; and a throne which was the result of a spontaneous demand on the part of the people, would easily find support in freewill offerings especially in a part of the world where the great are never approached without a present. There seems also reason to conclude that the amount of the contributions made by the people for the sustenance of the monarch depended, in a measure, on the degree of popularity which, in any particular case, he enjoyed, or the degree of service which he obviously rendered to the state (1 Sam. x:27; xvi:20; 2 Sam. viii:11; 1 Kings x:11, 25, sq.).

That presents of small value and humble nature were not despised or thought unfit for the acceptance of royalty may be learnt from that which Jesse sent to Saul (1 Sam. xvi:20), 'an ass, with bread and a bottle of wine, and a kid.' The indirect detail 'of the substance which was king David's,' found in 1 Chron. xxvii:25, sq. (comp. 1 Sam. viii:14; 2 Chron. xxvi:10, sq.), shows at how early a period the Israelitish throne was in possession of very large property, both personal and real. The royal treasury was replenished by confiscation, as in the case of Naboth (1 Kings xxi:16; comp. Ezek. xlvi:16, sq.; 2 Sam. xvi:4). Nor were taxes unknown. Samuel had predicted (1 Sam. viii:15), 'He will take the tenth of your seed and of your vineyards,' etc.; and so in other passages (1 Kings v:13; ix:21) we find that levies both of men and money were made for the monarch's purposes; and, in cases of special need, these exactions were large and rigorously levied (2 Kings xxiii:35), as when Jehoiakim 'taxed the land to give the money according to the commandment of Pharaoh; he exacted the silver and the gold of the people of the land, of every one according to his taxation.'

So long, however, as the native vigor of a young monarchy made victory easy and frequent, large revenues came to the king from the spoils of war (2 Sam. viii:2, sq.). Commerce also supplied abundant resources (1 Kings x:15).

(10) Oriental Ceremony. According to Oriental custom, much ceremony and outward show of respect were observed. Those who were intended to be received with special honor were placed on the king's right hand (1 Kings ii:19). The most profound homage was paid to the monarch, which was required not merely by common usage, but by the voice of religious wisdom (Prov. xxiv:21)—a requirement which was not unnatural in regard to an office that was accounted of Divine origin, and to have a sort of vice-Divine authority. Those who presented themselves before the royal presence fell with their face towards the ground till their forehead touched it (1 Sam. xxv:23; 2 Sam. ix:6; xix:18), thus worshiping or doing obeisance to the monarch, a ceremony from which even the royal spouse was not exempted (1 Kings i:16). A kiss was among the established tokens of reverence (1 Sam. x:1; Ps. ii:12), as were also hyperbolic wishes of good (Dan. ii:4; iii:9). Serious offenses against the king were punished with death (1 Kings xxi:10).

(11) Hebrew Kings less Despotic than Others. Deriving their power originally from the wishes of the people, and being one of the same race, the Hebrew kings were naturally less despotic than other Oriental sovereigns, mingled more with their subjects, and were by no means difficult of access (2 Sam. xix:8; 1 Kings xx:39; Jer. xxxviii:7; 1 Kings iii:16; 2 Kings vi:26; viii:3). After death the monarchs were interred in the royal cemetery in Jerusalem: 'So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David' (1 Kings ii:10; xi:43; xiv:31). But bad kings were excluded 'from the sepulchers of the kings of Israel' (2 Chron. xxviii:27). In 1 Kings iv will be found an enumeration of the high officers of state under the reign of Solomon (see also 1 Kings x:5; xii:18; xviii:3; 2 Kings viii:16; x:22; xviii:18; xix:2; 1 Chron. xxvii:25; Is. xxii:15; Jer. lli:25). The misdeeds of the Jewish crown, and the boldness with which they were reproved, may be seen exemplified in Jer. xxii:3. 'Thus saith the Lord, Execute judgment and righteousness, and do no wrong; do no violence to the stranger, the fatherless, nor the widow; neither shed innocent blood. But if ye will not hear these words, this house shall become a desolation,' etc. Reference on the subject here treated of may be made to Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, iii. 381; Maurice, Kings and Prophets of the Old Testament.

Figurative. 1. King is symbolically used in the scriptures, to men: as invested with regal authority by their fellows (Luke xxii:25; 1 Tim. ii:1; 1 Pet. ii:15, 17); to God: as the sole proper sovereign and ruler of the universe (1 Tim. i:17; vi:15, 16); and to Christ, as the Messiah, the Son of God, the King of the Jews, the sole Head and Governor of his church (1 Tim. vi:15, 16; Matt. xxvii:11; Luke xix:38; John i:49; vi:15; xviii:32-37).

2. Saints are "kings;" they have the kingdom of God within them; they are heirs of the kingdom of glory; they war against and conquer sin, Satan, and the world; they rule their own spirit, and govern their body, and have no small influence on God's government of nations and churches (Rev. i:6; v:10; xx:4).

3. Leviathan is "king" over all the children of pride, or fierce-looking monsters; in strength or bulk he exceeds all the animals (Job xli:34). (See HISTORY; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.)

KINGDOM (king-düm), (Heb. מַלְכוּת, mal-law-kaw).

(1) In General. (1) The country or countries subject to one king (Deut. iii:4). (2) The power of acting as king, or of supreme administration (1 Sam. xviii:8; xx:31).

(2) Kingdom of God. God's universal dominion over all things, is called his "kingdom;" thereby he preserves, protects, gives laws to, and regulates all his creatures, and can dispense favors or judgments as he pleaseth (1 Chron. xxix:11; Ps. cxlv:12). The saints' new-covenant state, and the work of saving grace in their heart, are called the "kingdom" of God, and the "kingdom" of heaven. Therein God erects his throne in their heart, gives laws and privileges to their souls, renders them heavenly-minded and meet to enter the heavenly glory (Matt. vi:33; xiii:31; Luke xvii:20, 21).

(3) Kingdom of Heaven. (a) The visible church, especially under the New Testament, is called a "kingdom;" Christ and his Father rule in it, and maintain order, safety, and happiness therein. It is called the "kingdom of heaven;" it is of heavenly origin, has a heavenly governor and laws; and is erected to render multitudes fit for heaven (Matt. iii:2; iv:17; xiii:47; xvi:19; Col. i:13).

(b) The state of glory in heaven is called a "kingdom." How great is its glory, happiness, and order! how ready the obedience of all the unnumbered subjects of God and the Lamb therein! (Matt. v:10; Luke xxii:16; 1 Cor. vi:9).

(4) Kingdom of Priests. The Hebrew nation and the saints are a "kingdom of priests;" they were, or are, a numerous and honored body, who have access to offer up sacrifices, prayer, praise, and good works, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ (Exod. xix:6; 1 Pet. ii:9).

(5) The Heathen. Nations are called the heathenish "kingdoms of this world;" their ends, maxims, and manner of government, are carnal and earthly (Rev. xi:15). Brown.

KINGS, BOOKS OF (kings, böoks öv). The two books of Kings formed anciently but one book in the Jewish Scriptures.

But great stress cannot always be laid on the Jewish forms of the sacred books, as they were arranged so as to correspond with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

(1) Brief Annals. The books of Kings contain the brief annals of a long period, from the accession of Solomon till the dissolution of the commonwealth. The first chapters describe the reign of Solomon over the united kingdom, and the revolt under Rehoboam. The history of the rival states is next narrated in parallel sections till the period of Israel's downfall on the invasion of Shalmaneser. Then the remaining years of the principality of Judah are recorded till the conquest of Nebuchadnezzar and the commencement of the Babylonish captivity. In the article ISRAEL, the period comprised has been exhibited under the name and reign of the kings who are mentioned there and in these books, and in the article JUDAH, KINGDOM OF, the chronology of the books has been sufficiently considered.

(2) Peculiarities. There are some peculiarities in this succinct history worthy of attention. It is very brief, but very suggestive. It is not a biography of the sovereigns, nor a mere record of political occurrences, nor yet an ecclesiastical register. King, church, and state are all comprised in their sacred relations. It is a theocratic history, a retrospective survey of the kingdoms as existing under a theocratic government.

The character of the sovereign is tested by his fidelity to the religious obligations of his office, and this decision in reference to his conduct is generally added to the notice of his accession. The new king's religious character is generally portrayed by its similarity or opposition to the way of David, of his father, or of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, 'who made Israel to sin.'

Ecclesiastical affairs are noticed with a similar purpose, and in contrast with past or prevalent apostasy, especially as manifested in the popular superstitions, whose shrines were on the 'high places.'

Political or national incidents are introduced in general for the sake of illustrating the influence of religion on civic prosperity; of showing how the theocracy maintained a vigilant and vengeful guardianship over its rights and privileges—adherence to its principles securing peace and plenty, disobedience to them bringing along with it sudden and severe retribution.

(3) Verification of Mosaic Warnings. The books of Kings are a verification of the Mosaic warnings, and the author of them has kept this steadily in view. He has given a brief history of his people, arranged under the various political chiefs in such a manner as to show that the government was essentially theocratic, that its spirit, as developed in the Mosaic writings, was never extinct, however modified or inactive it might sometimes appear.

(4) Religious Form. Thus the books of Kings appear in a religious costume, quite different from the form they would have assumed either as a political or ecclesiastical narrative. In the one case legislative enactments, royal edicts, popular movements, would have occupied a prominent place; in the other, sacerdotal arrangements, Levitical service, music and pageantry, would have filled the leading sections of the treatise.

In either view the points adduced would have had a restricted reference to the palace or the temple, the sovereign or the pontiff, the court or the priesthood, the throne or the altar, the tribute or tithes, the nation on its farms, or the tribes in the courts of the sacred edifice.

But the theocracy conjoined both the political and religious elements, and the inspired annalist unites them as essential to his design. The agency of Divinity is constantly recognized, the hand of Jehovah is continually acknowledged.

(5) Agency of the Prophets. The chief organ of theocratic influence enjoys peculiar prominence. We refer to the incessant agency of the prophets, their great power and peculiar modes of action as detailed by the composer of the books of Kings. They interfered with the succession, and their instrumentality was apparent in the schism. They roused the people, and they braved the sovereign. The balance of power was in their hands; the regal dignity seemed to be sometimes at their disposal; indeed they were his vicegerents by whom his judgments were executed.

In times of emergency they dispensed with usual modes of procedure, and assumed almost unlimited authority with which no subject in an ordinary government can safely be intrusted, executing the law with a summary promptness which rendered opposition impossible or at least unavailing. They felt their Divine commission, and that they were the custodians of the rights of Jehovah. At the same time they protected the interests of the nation, and, could we divest the term of its association with unprincipled turbulence and sedition, we would, like Winer, style them the demagogues of Israel (Winer, Realwört. art. Prophet).

The Divine prerogative was to them a vested right, guarded with a sacred jealousy from royal usurpation or popular invasion; and the interests of the people were as religiously protected against encroachments, too easily made under a form of government which had not the safeguard of popular representation or aristocratic privilege. The priesthood was in many instances, though there are some illustrious exceptions, merely the creature of the crown, and therefore it became the prophet-enthum to assert its dignity and stand forth in the majestic insignia of an embassy from heaven.

(6) Evidence as to Method, Etc. The truth of these sentiments, as to the method, design, and composition of the books of Kings, is confirmed by ample evidence.

(1) Large space is occupied with the building of the Temple—the palace of the Divine Protector—his throne in it being above the mercy-seat and between the cherubim (ch. v-viii). Care is taken to record the miraculous phenomenon of the descent of the Shekinah (ch. viii:10). The prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the house is full of theocratic views and aspirations.

(2) Reference is often made to the Mosaic Law with its provisions; and allusions to the earlier history of the people frequently occur (1 Kings ii:3; iii:14; vi:11, 12; viii:58, etc.; 2 Kings x:31; xiv:6; xvii:13, 15, 37; xviii:4-6; xxi:1-8). Allusions to the Mosaic code are found more frequently toward the end of the second book, when the kingdom was drawing near its termination, as if to account for its decay and approaching fate.

(3) Phrases expressive of Divine interference are frequently introduced (1 Kings xi:31; xii:15; xiii:1, 2, 9; and xx:13, etc.).

(4) Prophetic interposition is a very prominent theme of record. It fills the vivid foreground of the historical picture. Nathan was occupied in the succession of Solomon (1 Kings i:45); Ahijah was concerned in the revolt (xi:29-40). Shemaiah disbanded the troops which Rehoboam had mustered (xii:21). Ahijah predicted the ruin of Jeroboam, whose elevation he had promoted (xiv:7). Jehu, the prophet, doomed the house of Baasha (xvi:1). The reign of Ahab and Ahaziah is marked by the bold, rapid, mysterious movements of Elijah. Under Ahab occurs the prediction of Micaiah (xxii:8). The actions and oracles of Elisha form the marvelous topics of narration under several reigns. The agency of Isaiah is also recognized (2 Kings xix:20; xx:16). Besides 1 Kings xiii presents another instance of prophetic operation; and in xx:35, the oracle of an unknown prophet is also rehearsed. Huldah, the prophetess, was an important personage under the government of Josiah (2 Kings xxii:14). Care is also taken to report the fulfillment of striking prophecies, in the usual phrase, 'according to the word of the Lord' (1 Kings xii:15; xv:29; xvi:12; 2 Kings xxiii:15-18; ix:36; xxiv:2). So, too, the Old Syriac version prefixes, 'Here follows the book of the kings who flourished among the ancient people; and in this is also exhibited the history of the prophets who flourished during their times.'

(5) Theocratic influence is recognized both in the disposition and succession of kings (1 Kings xiii:33; xv:4, 5, 29, 30; 2 Kings xi:17, etc.). Compare on the whole of this view Hävernicks, Einleit. sec. 168; Jahn, Introduct. sec. 46; Gesenius, Ueber Jes. vol. i, p. 934. It is thus apparent that the object of the author of the Books of Kings was, to describe the history of the kingdoms, especially in connection with the theocratic element.

(7) Authorship. The authorship and age of this historical treatise may admit of several suppositions. Whatever were the original sources, the books are evidently the composition of one writer. The style is generally uniform throughout. The same forms of expression are used to denote the same thing, e. g. the male sex (1 Kings xiv:10, etc.); the death of a king (1 Kings xi:43, etc.); modes of allusion to the law (1 Kings xi:13;); fidelity to Jehovah (1 Kings viii:53, etc.; De Wette, Einleit. sec. 184, a; Hävernicks; Einleit. sec. 171). Similar idioms are ever recurring, so as to produce a uniformity of style (Monotonie der Darstellung, Hävernicks, l. c.).

(8) Sources. The sources whence this historic information has been derived have been variously named. That annals contemporary with the events which they describe were written in the early period of the Jewish state, may be at once admitted. Eichhorn supposes that the sources of 'Kings' were private historical works (Einleit. sec. 482). De Wette, from the legends related in them, cannot believe them to be official documents. Bertholdt, Hävernicks, and Movers hold that the books are extracts from the public annals (comp. Hävernicks, sec. 169). The inspired historiographer refers his readers to these sources of evidence in such frequent phrases as 'the rest of the acts.' Such a reference is made especially to the sources, when other royal acts than those narrated in the books of Kings are glanced at. These sources are styled the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah, or Israel. Similar phraseology is used in Esther x:2; vi:1, to denote the official annals of the Persian empire. Public documents are spoken of in the same way (Neh. xii:23). There is little reason to suppose that the book referred to in this last passage is that styled Chronicles in our copy of the Scriptures (Movers, Chronik, sec. 234). So we infer that the 'Book of the Chronicles of the Kings,' so often alluded to, was an authentic document, public and official. Once indeed mention is made of a work entitled 'The Book of the Acts of Solomon.'

(9) Contemporaneous Events Recorded by the Prophets. That the prophets themselves were employed in recording contemporaneous events, is evident from 2 Chron. xx:34; 1 Chron. xxix:29. In the course of the narrative we meet with many instances of description, having the freshness and form of nature, and which are apparently direct quotations from some journal, written by one who testified what he had seen (1 Kings xx:10; 2 Kings xii:15; xiv:8). Thus the credibility of the history contained in these books rests upon a sure foundation.

(10) The Compiler. Now, the compiler from these old documents—he who shaped them into the form they have in our present books of Kings—must have lived in a late age. The Second Book of Kings concludes with an account of the liberation of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from prison in Babylon—an event which, according to Jahn, happened in the twenty-sixth, or according to Prideaux, in the twenty-eighth year after the destruction of Jerusalem. Jahn and Hävernicks place the composition of 'Kings' in the reign of Evil-merodach; and De Wette, towards the end of the Captivity. Instances of later phraseology occurring in the books of Kings are given by De Wette (sec. 115, 6). Jewish tradition makes Jeremiah the author (Baba-bathra, fol. 15, 1). Calmet ascribes the authorship to Ezra. The former opinion, adopted by Grotius, and lately revindicated by Hävernicks, certainly appears the more probable. It explains the close similarity of the books of Kings and Jeremiah in spirit, style, and tendency, more easily and more satisfactorily than the supposition of De Wette, or any other conjecture of like nature.

The age of the books of Kings may be intermediate between the early work of Samuel and the later treatise of Chronicles. J. B.

KING'S DALE (kings dāle), a place where the king of Sodom met Abraham when he returned with the spoil of Sodom (Gen. xiv:17). Also mentioned as the place where Absalom had erected a pillar (2 Sam. xviii:18). It was doubtless close to Jerusalem, but the exact locality has not been agreed upon. The majority take it to be the valley of Jehoshaphat.

KING'S GARDEN (kings gār'd'n), the royal garden near the fortress of Zion (2 Kings xxi:18; xxv:4). It was near Bir Ayyūb, which is probably En-rogel. (See GARDEN.)

KING'S HOUSE (kings hous), "House of the forest of Lebanon," Solomon's palace (1 Kings vii:1-12). (See PALACE.)

KINNAMON kīn'na-mōn), (Heb. קִינָמוֹן, kin-naw-mone'), translated 'cinnamon,' occurs in three places of Scripture; first, about 1600 years before the Christian era, in Exod. xxx:23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed in the preparation of the holy anointing oil.

It is next mentioned in Prov. vii:17, 'I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes (ahalim), and cinnamon.' And again in Cant. iv:14, 'Spike-nard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes (aha- root. Many writers have doubted whether the kinnamon of the Hebrews is the same article that we now call cinnamon. If we were to put faith in all these doubts, we should be left without any substances possessed of sufficiently remarkable properties to have been articles of ancient commerce. Galen says that cassia and cinnamon are so much alike that it is not an easy matter to distinguish the one from the other. This is a difficulty that still continues to be experienced.

(2) Cassia Bark. Cassia bark, as we have seen, was distinguished with difficulty from cinnamon by the ancients. In the present day it is often sold for cinnamon; indeed, unless a purchaser specify true cinnamon, he will probably be supplied with nothing but cassia. It is made up into similar bundles with cinnamon, has the same general appearance, smell, and taste; but its substance is thicker and coarser, its color darker, its flavor much less sweet and fine than that of Ceylon cinnamon, while it is more pungent, and is followed by a bitter taste; it is also less closely quilled, and breaks shorter than genuine cinnamon. There can be no reasonable doubt, as cinnamon and cassia were known to the Greeks, that they must have been known to the Hebrews also, as the commerce with India can be proved to have been much more ancient than is generally supposed. (See CINNAMON; KIDDAH.)

KINSMAN, KINSWOMAN and KINSFOLK (kīnz'man, kīnz'wōōm'an, kīnz'fōk). Several Hebrew words are thus translated. 1. Sheh-ayr' (שֶׁהַאֵיִר), Num. xxvii:11; "kinswoman," Lev. xviii:12, 13; "kinswomen," xviii:17). Mo-dah' (מֹדָה), "kinswoman," Prov. vii:4). Kaw-robe' (קָוֹבֵי, literally, near, "kinsfolk," Job xix:14; "kinsmen," Ps. xxxviii:11). 2. Soong-ghen-ace' (Gr. συγγενής, relative, "kinsfolk," Luke ii:44; xxi:16). 3. The Hebrew word קָוֵל, go-ale', redeemer, however, denoted the nearest male blood relation living (Lev. xxv:25:28; Ruth iii:2; iv:1).

(1) Blood Avenger. One of the kinsman's most peculiar offices was that of an avenger of blood. (See BLOOD-REVENGE.)

(2) Redeemer. Another duty of the kinsman was that of kinsman redeemer. If his nearest relative had through poverty mortgaged his inheritance, the goale was to buy it back. If he had sold himself into slavery, the goale was to pay his lim), with all the chief spices. While in Rev. xviii:13, among the merchandise of Babylon, we have 'cinnamon, and odors, and ointments, and frankincense.'

(1) Sweet Cinnamon. In the earliest notice, it is called kinnamon besem, or 'sweet cinnamon.' Dr. Vincent is inclined to consider khennah besem and kinnamon besem as derived from the same ransom. If he was murdered, the goale was to avenge his blood. If he died childless, the goale might espouse his widow, and raise up seed to him; but it does not appear that he was obliged to do this, except he was an unmarried brother (Num. v:8; xxvii:11, and xxxv; Deut. xxv:1-8; Ruth iii, and iv).

Figurative. Did not this goale typify Christ's assuming our nature, purchasing our happiness, recovering our liberty, avenging our blood on Satan and his agents, and raising up to our widowed nature a seed of saints and good works? God is called a Redeemer: with mighty power and kindness, he rescued the Hebrews from their bondage and trouble, and often delivers the oppressed; and he, through the blood of his Son, saves from deep slavery and woe, under the broken law, to endless glory and happiness (Is. lxiii:19). Christ is a Redeemer: by his righteousness, he paid the price of our redemption; by his intercession, he pleads for and procures it; by his Spirit, he applies it to our souls (Is. lix:20; Job xix:25). Our redemption or deliverance from sin, and all its effects, is through his blood, and Spirit (Eph. i:13; Col. i:14; Heb. ix:12), and begins in our forgiveness, is carried on in our sanctification, and perfected in our eternal blessedness, when, at the resurrection, our very bodies shall be delivered from all the deathful effects of sin; and this entrance on eternal glory is called our redemption, as it brings the deliverance to its perfection (Luke xxi:28; Rom. viii:23).

KIPPOD (kíp-pód'), (Heb. קִפּוֹד, kíp-pode'). This name occurs but three times in Scripture (Is. xiv:23; xxxiv:11; and Zeph. ii:14), and has been variously interpreted—owl, osprey, tortoise, porcupine, otter, and in the Arabic, bustard.

(1) Various Translations. Now, in Is. xiv:23, 'I will make it a possession for the kippod (bittern), and pools of water,' etc., the words are plain and natural. Marshes and pools are not the habitation of hedgehogs, for they shun water.

(2) Bittern. In Is. xxxiv:11, it is said, 'The cormorant (Sterna caspia) and kippod (bittern) shall possess it, the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it,' etc.; that is, in the ruins of Idumæa. Here, again, the version is plain, and a hedgehog most surely would be out of place. Zeph. ii:14, 'Both the cormorant (Sterna caspia) and the kippod (bittern) shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; and their voice shall sing in the windows,' etc. Surely here kippod cannot mean the hedgehog, a nocturnal, groveling, worm-eating animal, entirely or nearly mute, and incapable of climbing up walls; one that does not haunt ruins, but earthy banks in wooded regions, and that is absolutely solitary in its habits. The Arabian bustard, Ovis houbara, might be selected, if it were not that bustards keep always in dry deserts and uplands, and that they never roost, their feet not admitting of perching, but rest on the ground.

(3) Heron. We think the term most applicable to the heron tribes, whose beaks are formidable spikes that often kill hawks; a fact well known to Eastern hunters. Of these Nycticorax europæus, or common night heron, with its pencil of white feathers in the crest, is a species, not uncommon in the marshes of Western Asia; and of several species of bittern, Ardea (botaurus) stellaris has pointed long feathers on the neck and breast, freckled with black, and a strong pointed bill.

After the breeding season it migrates and passes the winter in the south, frequenting the marshes and rivers of Asia and Europe, where it then roosts high above ground, uttering a curious note before and after its evening flight, very distinct from the booming sound produced by it in the breeding season, and while it remains in the marshes. Though not building, like the stork, on the tops of houses, it resorts, like the heron, to ruined structures, and we have been informed that it has been seen on the summit of Tauk Kesra at Ctesiphon. (See BITTERN; HERON, etc.).

KIR (kir), (Heb. כִּיר, keer, fortress), a people and country subject to the Assyrian empire, to which the conquered Damascenes were transplanted (2 Kings xvi:9; Is. xxii:6; Amos i:5), and whither also the Aramæans in the east of Syria once wandered (Amos ix:7).

This is supposed by Major Rennel to be the same country which still bears the name of Kurdistan or Kourdistan (Geog. of Herodot. 391).

Objections. There are, however, objections to this view, which do not apply so strongly to the notion of Rosenmüller and others, that it was a tract on the river Cyrus, or rather Kuros (Κῦρος and Κύρρος), in Zend Koro, which rises in the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian Seas, and runs into the latter after being joined by the Araxes. Gurjistan, or Grusia (Grusiana), commonly called Georgia, seems also to have derived its name from this river Kur, which flows through it. Furrer's identification with the district Cyrrhæstia, northwest of Antioch, lacks proof.

KIR-HARASETH (kir'hār'a-sèth), (Heb. כִּיר־חַרְשֵׁת, keer-khar-eh'seth, 2 Kings iii:25; "Kir-harseth," Is. xvi:7; "Kir-harësh," xvi:11; "Kir-heres," Jer. xlviii:31, 36; and "Kir of Moab," Is. xv:1). See KIR OF MOAB and KIR-MOAB.

KIR-HARESETH (kir'hār'e-sèth), (Heb. כִּיר־חַרְשֵׁת, keer-khar-eh'seth, Is. xvi:7). See KIR-HARASETH, KIR OF MOAB and KIR-MOAB.

KIR-HARESH (kir'hār'esh), (Is. xvi:11). See KIR-MOAB.

KIR-HERES (kir-hē'res), (Jer. xlviii:31, 36). See KIR-MOAB.

KIRIATH (kir'i-ath). See KIRJATH.

KIRIATHAIM (kir'i-a-thā'im), (Heb. כִּירְיָתַיִם, keer-yaw-thah'yim), a town beyond Jordan, ten miles from Medaba, west (Josh. xiii:19). It is the same as KIRJATHAIM (which see).

KIRIOTH (kir'i-ōth). See KERIOTH.

KIRJATH (kir'jath), (Heb. כִּירְיָת, keer-yath', city). This word means town or city, and is much used in the formation of names of places, like our own town.

It is also the name of a place in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:28). It is probably identical with Kirjath-Jearim (Josh. xv:9, 60; xviii:14).

KIRJATHAIM (kir'ja-thā'im), (Heb. כִּירְיָתַיִם, keer-yaw-thah'yim, double town).

1. One of the most ancient towns in the country east of the Jordan, as it was possessed by the gigantic Emim (Gen. xiv:5), who were expelled by the Moabites (Deut. ii:9, 10), who in their turn were dispossessed by the Amorites, from whom it was taken by the Israelites. Kirjathaim was then assigned to Reuben (Num. xxxii:37; Josh. xiii:19). But during the Assyrian exile, the Moabites again took possession of this and other towns (Jer. xlviii:1-23; Ezek. xxv:9). Eusebius places it about half an hour west of the ruins of Medeba. Burckhardt found other ruins, called El Teym, which he conjectures to have been Kiriathaim, the last syllable of the name being retained. This is somewhat doubtful, as the Καπίδα (Kapída) of Eusebius is placed ten miles west of Medeba, whereas El Teym is but two miles. Harper and others identified it with the ruins of El Kureiyát, between Medeba and Dibon.

2. There was another place of this name in the tribe of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi:76).

KIRJATH-ARBA (kír'jath-ár'bá), (Heb. קִרְיַת אַרְבָּה, keer-yath' ar-bah', city of Arbah), the ancient name of Hebron, but still in use in the time of Nehemiah (xi:25). (See HEBRON.)

Kirjath-jearim

KIRJATH-ARIM (kír'jath'á'rim), an abbreviated form of KIRJATH-JEARIM (Ezra ii:25), which see.

KIRJATH-BAAI (kír'jath-bá'al), (Heb. קִרְיַת בְּאֵל, keer-yath' bah'al, city of Baal). This city is more usually called KIRJATH-JEARIM (Josh. xv:60; xviii:14).

KIRJATH-HUZOTH (kír'jath-hū'zoth), (Heb. קִרְיַת הַחַיִּוֹת, keer-yath' khoo-tsoth', city of streets), a town in Moab (Num. xxii:39), to which Balak accompanied Balaam after his arrival in Moab. The place has not been identified, though it lay between the Arnon and Bamoth-Baal.

KIRJATH-JEARIM (kír'jath-jé'a-rím), (Heb. קִרְיַת יְעָרִים, keer-yath'yeh-aw-reem', city of forests).

One of the towns of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix:17). It was to this place that the ark was brought from Bethshemesh, after it had been removed from the land of the Philistines, and where it remained till removed to Jerusalem by David (1 Sam. vii.; 1 Chron. xiii.).

(1) Ancient Site. This was one of the ancient sites which were again inhabited after the exile (Ezra ii:25; Neh. vii:29). Eusebius and Jerome speak of it as being in their day a village nine or ten miles from Diospolis (Lydda), on the road to Jerusalem. Dr. Robinson thinks it possible that the ancient Kirjath-jearim may be recognized in the present Kuriet-el-Enab.

(2) Name and Position. So close a correspondence of name and position seems to warrant the conclusion of Dr. Robinson in favor of Kuriet-el-Enab. This place is that which ecclesiastical tradition has identified with the Anathoth of Jeremiah, which Dr. Robinson refers to 'Anat' (see ANATHOTH). It is now a poor village, its principal buildings being an old convent of the Minorites, and a Latin church. The latter is now deserted, but not in ruins, and is said to be one of the largest and most solidly constructed churches in Palestine (Robinson, ii, 109; 334-337). Conder argues for the ruins 'Erma, 11 miles west by south of Jerusalem, and two and a quarter south by west of Kesla. But contrary to his opinion Josh. xv:10 is surely against the location proposed by him. 'Erma and Jearim are also radically different, and the site is too remote from the other Gibeonite settlements.

KIRJATH-SANNAH (kír'jath-sān'nah), (Heb. קִרְיַת סַנְנַח, keer-yath' san-naw', Josh. xv:49), and

KIRJATH-SEPHER (kír'jath-sē'pher), (Heb. קִרְיַת סֵפֶר, keer-yath' say'fer, both meaning the city of books, or instruction), a city of the tribe of Judah, called also DEBIR (Josh. xv:15, 16; Judg. i:11, 12). (See DEBIR.)

It was situated among the mountains of Judah. It was captured by Joshua and was given to Caleb. It was retaken by the Canaanites only to be captured again by the Israelites, who were led in the attack by Othniel, to whom Caleb for his reward gave his daughter Achsah in marriage (Josh. xv:15; Judg. i:11).

This city was so called long before Moses; at least it would seem so by the manner of mentioning it, which proves that books were known before that legislator, and that he is not the oldest writer, as the fathers have asserted; a character which, it is to be observed, he never assumes.

It is possible that the Canaanites might lodge their records in this city, and those few monuments of antiquity which they had preserved; or it might be something like the cities of the priests in Israel, the residence of the learned; a kind of college.

This idea receives confirmation from its other name Debir, which designates an oracle; and seems to hint at a seat of learning; an establishment, probably, of priests, for the purpose of educating the younger members of their body. The circumstance is very remarkable, because it occurs so early as the days of Joshua; and is evidently an establishment by the Canaanites, previous to the Hebrew invasion.

KIR-MOAB (kīr-mō'ab), (Heb. כִּיר-מוֹאָב, keer-mo-awb', the wall, stronghold, or citadel of Moab), (Is. xv:1), called also KIR-HARESETH and KIR-HERES, meaning brick-fortress (Is. xvi:7, 11; Jer. xlviii:31), a fortified city in the territory of Moab.

Joram king of Israel took the city, and destroyed it, except the walls; but it appears from the passages here cited that it must have been rebuilt before the time of Isaiah.

(1) Fortified Town. Abulfeda describes Karak as a small town, with a castle on a high hill, and remarks that it is so strong that one must deny himself even the wish to take it by force.

(2) During the Crusades. In the time of the Crusades, and when in possession of the Franks, it was invested by Saladin; but after lying before it a month he was compelled to raise the siege (Bohaeddin, Vita Saladin, p. 55).

(3) Modern Condition. The first person who visited the place in modern times was Seetzen, who says, 'Near to Karak the wide plain terminates which extends from Rabbah, and is broken only by low and detached hills, and the country now becomes mountainous.'

'Karak, formerly a city and bishop's see, lies on the top of the hill near the end of a deep valley, and is surrounded on all sides with lofty mountains. The hill is very steep, and in many places the sides are quite perpendicular. The walls round the town are for the most part destroyed, and Karak can at present boast of little more than being a small country town. The castle, which is uninhabited, and in a state of great decay, was formerly one of the strongest in these countries. The inhabitants of the town consist of Mohammedans and Greek Christians. The present bishop of Karak resides at Jerusalem.'

(4) The Hill of Karak. 'From this place one enjoys, by looking down the Wady Karak, a fine view of part of the Dead Sea, and even Jerusalem may be distinctly seen in clear weather. The hill on which Karak lies is composed of limestone and brittle marl, with many beds of blue, black, and gray flints. In the neighboring rocks there are a number of curious grottoes; in those which are under ground wheat is sometimes preserved for a period of ten years' (Zach's Monatliche Correspond. xviii, 434). A fuller account of the place is given by Burckhardt (Travels in Syria, pp. 379-387), by whom it was next visited; and another description is furnished by Irby and Mangles (Travels, pp. 361-370). From their account it would seem that the caverns noticed by Seetzen were probably the sepulchers of the ancient town. We also learn that the Christians of Karak (which they and Burckhardt call Kerek), are nearly as numerous as the Turks, and boast of being stronger and braver. They were, however, on good terms with the Turks, and appeared to enjoy equal freedom with them.

As the Rev. J. L. Porter surveyed the country of Moab from this eminence as well as from other lofty summits he was led to exclaim: How literal and how true have the words of Jeremiah become! "O vine of Sibmah, I will weep for thee with the weeping of Jazer: . . . the spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits, and upon thy vintage. And joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab; and I have caused wine to fail from the wine-presses; none shall tread with shouting" (Jer. xlviii:32, 33). Nowhere on earth is there such a melancholy example of tyranny, rapacity, and misrule, as here. Fields, pastures, vineyards, houses, villages, cities—all alike deserted and waste. (Giant Cities of Bashan.)

KISH (kīsh), (Heb. כִּישׁ, keesh, a bow or horn)

1. Son of Ner, and father of king Saul (1 Sam. ix:1; 1 Chron. viii:33; ix:38, 39).

This genealogy may indeed merely register the fact that Kish was a descendant of Ner, without implying that he was his immediate son; and allow of the insertion of Abiel and others between Kish and Ner.

But perhaps only one Kish and one Ner descended from Jeiel. If so, the explanation of the genealogy is that Ner's descendants became two tribal houses, those of Kish and Ner. The former, the important royal family of Saul, looked to Ner's son Kish as its founder, but it was merely a younger branch of the older, but less distinguished, line of Ner. Both houses belonged to the family of Jeiel, and hence Kish as well as Ner is registered, according to the familiar principle, among Jeiel's sons (ix:36). Saul's father, Kish, and Abner's father, Ner, are mentioned as sons of Abiel also (1 Sam. ix:1; xiv:51), and either Ner or Abner is stated to have been Saul's uncle (xiv:50). Abiel may be, as some expositors suppose, or may not be, another name or the uncorrupted form of Jeiel. (B. C. about 1060.) (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

2. Son of Jeiel, and uncle of 1 (1 Chron. ix:36). (B. C. about 1060.)

3. A Benjamite, and great-grandfather of Mordecai, who was carried captive to Babylon (Esth. ii:5). (B. C. before 478.)

4. The son of Abdi, a Levite of Merari's family (2 Chron. xxix:12), and one who assisted Hezekiah in restoring the tribe religion.

5. Second son of Mahli; his sons married the daughters of his brother Eleazar (1 Chron. xxiii:21, 22). One son was named Jerahmeel (1 Chron. xxiv:29). (B. C. about 1060.)

KISHI (kīsh'i), a Merarite, father or forefather of Ethan the minstrel (1 Chron. vi:44). He is called Kushiiah (1 Chron. xv:17). (See KUSHIAH.)

KISHION (kīsh'i-ōn), (Heb. כִּישִׁיֹּן, kish-yone', hard ground), a city of the tribe of Issachar, yielded to the Levites of Gershom's family (Josh. xix:20; xxi:28). In the latter passage the A. V. has Kishon incorrectly, as the Hebrew is the same in both. It is also incorrectly called Kedesh (1 Chron. vi:72).

KISHON (ki'shon), (Heb. קִישׁוֹן, kee-shone', winding). The incorrect form of Kishion (Josh. xxi:28). In 1 Chron. vi:72, the name Kedesh appears in its place in the lists.

The most important river in Palestine next to the Jordan. After traversing the plain of Acre, it enters the bay of the same name at its southeast corner. It is celebrated in Scripture for the overthrow of the host of Sisera in its overflowing stream (Judg. iv:13; v:21).

(1) Source of the River. It has been usual to trace the source of this river to Mount Tabor; but Dr. Shaw affirms that in traveling along the southeastern brow of Mount Carmel he had an opportunity of seeing the sources of the river Kishon, three or four of which lie within less than a furlong of each other, and are called Ras el Kishon, or the head of the Kishon. These alone, without the lesser contributions near the sea, discharge water enough to form a river half as large as the Isis.

During the rainy season all the waters which fall upon the eastern side of Carmel, or upon the rising grounds to the southward, empty themselves into it in a number of torrents, at which time it overflows its banks, acquires a wonderful rapidity, and carries all before it.

It was doubtless in such a season that the host of Sisera was swept away, in attempting to ford it. But such inundations are only occasional, and of short duration, as is indeed implied in the destruction in its waters of the fugitives, who doubtless expected to pass it safely.

The course of the stream, as estimated from the sources thus indicated, is not more than seven miles. It runs very briskly till within half a league of the sea; but when not augmented by rains, it never falls into the sea in a full stream, but insensibly percolates through a bank of sand, which the north winds have thrown up at its mouth. It was in this state that Shaw himself found it in the month of April, 1722, when it was crossed by him.

Notwithstanding Shaw's contradiction, the assertion that the Kishon derives its source from Mount Tabor has been repeated by modern travelers as confidently as by their ancient predecessors.

It will probably be found that the remoter source of the river is really in Mount Tabor; but that the supply from this source is cut off in early summer, when it ceases to be maintained by rains or contributory torrents. The copious supply from the nearer springs at Ras el Kishon, with other springs lower down, keep it up from that point, as a perennial stream, even during the drought of summer. Thus during one part of the year the source of the river may appear to be in Mount Tabor, while during another part the source of the diminished stream is at Ras el Kishon.

(2) Overthrow of Sisera. The scriptural account of the overthrow of Sisera's host manifestly shows that the stream crossed the plain, and must have been of considerable size. The above arguments, to show that it did so, and still does so, notwithstanding Dr. Shaw's account, were, in substance, given several years ago in the Pictorial History of Palestine (Introd. p. cxc.); and the writer has had the satisfaction of seeing his view since confirmed by Dr. Robinson, who adds that 'not improbably, in ancient times, when the country was perhaps more wooded, there may have been permanent streams throughout the whole plain.'

(3) Priests of Baal. The transaction of the prophet Elijah, who, after his sacrifice on Carmel, commanded the priests of Baal to be slain at the river Kishon (1 Kings xviii:40), requires no explanation, seeing that it took place at the perennial lower stream. This also explains, what has sometimes been asked, whence, in that time of drought, the water was obtained with which the prophet inundated his altar and sacrifice.

The spot where the priests of Baal were slain was near the foot of Mount Carmel. The location has been almost certainly identified at the east end of the mountain. The place still bears the name El-Mahraka "the burning."

KISHUIM (kish-ū'im'), (Heb. קִישׁוּיִם, kish-shoo-iem'), is translated cucumbers in the A. V., and the correctness of this rendering has been almost universally admitted.

It first occurs in Num. xi:5, in the verse already quoted in Abattachim, where the Israelites, when in the desert, express their longings for the melons and the kishuim or cucumbers of Egypt. Reduced from the plural form, the word kisha is so similar to the Arabic kissa, that there can be very little doubt of their both meaning the same thing. All travelers in the East notice the extensive cultivation and consumption of cucumbers and other vegetables of the same tribe, especially where there is any moisture of soil, or the possibility of irrigation.

Thus even in the driest parts, the neighborhood of a well is often occupied by a field of cucurbitaceous plants, generally with a man or boy set to guard it from plunder, perched up on a temporary scaffolding, with a slight protection from the sun, where he may himself be safe from the attacks of the more powerful wild animals.

That such plants appear to have been similarly cultivated among the Hebrews is evident from Is. i:8, 'The daughter of Zion is left like a cottage in a vineyard, like a lodge in a garden of cucumbers;' as well as from Baruch vi:70, 'As a scarecrow in a garden of cucumbers keepeth nothing, so are their gods of wood.' (See ABAT-TACHIM; CUCUMBER.) J. F. R.

KISON (kī'son), an incorrect form of Kishon (Ps. lxxxiii:9). (See KISHON).

KISS (kīs), (Heb. ^{שָׁקַף}, naw-shak'; Gr. φίλημα fil'ay-mah). Kissing the lips by way of affectionate salutation was customary among near relatives of both sexes, both in patriarchal and in later times (Gen. xxix:11; Cant. viii:1).

Originally the act of kissing had a symbolical character, and, though this import may now be lost sight of, yet it must be recognized the moment we attempt to understand or explain its signification.

(1) Significance of Action. Acts speak no less, sometimes far more forcibly than words. In the early period of society, when the foundation was laid of most even of our Western customs, action constituted a large portion of what we may term human language, or the means of intercommunication between man and man. Words were then less numerous, books unknown, the entire machinery of speaking being, in its rudimental and elementary state, less developed and called into play. The Oriental character inclined men to general taciturnity, with occasional outbreaks of fervid, abrupt, or copious eloquence. In this language of action, a kiss was naturally the expression and the symbol of affection, regard, respect, and reverence; and if any deeper source of its origin were sought for, it would, doubtless, be found in the fondling and caresses with which the mother expresses her tenderness for her babe.

(2) Biblical Allusions. That the custom is of very early date appears from Gen. xxix:13, where we read—"When Laban heard of the tidings of Jacob, his sister's son, he ran to meet him, and embraced him and kissed him, and brought him to his house": the practice was even then established and recognized as a matter of course.

In Gen. xxvii:26, 27, a kiss is a sign of affection between a parent and child. It was also, as with some modern nations, a token of friendship and regard bestowed when friends or relations met or separated (Tobit vii:6; x:12; Luke vii:45; xv:20; Acts xx:37; Matt. xxvi:48; 2 Sam. xx:9).

The church of Ephesus wept sore at Paul's departure, and fell on his neck and kissed him. When Orpah quitted Naomi and Ruth (Ruth i:14), after the three had lifted up their voice and wept, she "kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her." It was usual to kiss the mouth (Gen. xxxiii:4; Exod. iv:27; xviii:7; 1 Sam. xx:41; Prov. xxiv:26) or the beard, which was then taken hold of by the hand (2 Sam. xx:9). Kissing of the feet was an expression of lowly and tender regard (Luke vii:38).

(3) Idolatrous Usage. Kissing of the hand of another appears to be a modern practice: the passage of Job xxxi:27, 'Or my mouth hath kissed my hand,' is not in point, and refers to idolatrous usages, namely, the adoration of the heavenly bodies. It was the custom to throw kisses towards the images of the gods, and towards the sun and moon (1 Kings xix:18; Hosea xiii:2; Minuc. Felix, ii, 5; Tac. Hist. iii, 24, 3; Lucian, De Salt. c. 17; Plin. Hist. Nat. xxviii, 5).

(4) Salutation of Princes. The kissing of princes was a token of homage (Ps. ii:12; 1 Sam. x:1; Xenoph. Cyrop. vii, 5, 32). Xenophon says (Agasil. v, 4) that it was a natural custom with the Persians to kiss whomsoever they honored; and a curious passage to this effect may be found in the Cyropadia (i, 4, 27). Kissing the feet of princes was a token of subjection and obedience; which was sometimes carried so far that the print of the foot received the kiss, so as to give the impression that the very dust had become sacred by the royal tread, or that the subject was not worthy to salute even the prince's foot, but was content to kiss the earth itself near or on which he trod (Is. xlix:23; Micah vii:17; Ps. lxxii:9; Dion Cass. lix, 27; Seneca, De Benef. ii, 12).

(5) Limited by the Rabbins. The Rabbins, in the meddlesome, scrupulous, and falsely delicate spirit which animated much of what they wrote, did not permit more than three kinds of kisses, the kiss of reverence, of reception, and of dismissal (Breschith Rabba on Gen. xxix:11).

(6) Custom of Primitive Church. The peculiar tendency of the Christian religion to encourage honor toward all men, as men, to foster and develop the softer affections, and, in the trying condition of the early church, to make its members intimately known one to another, and unite them in the closest bonds, led to the observance of kissing as an accompaniment of that social worship which took its origin in the very cradle of our religion. Hence the exhortation—"Salute each other with a holy kiss" (Rom. xvi:16; see also 1 Cor. xvi:20; 2 Cor. xiii:12; 1 Thess. v:26; in 1 Pet. v:14, it is termed 'a kiss of charity'). The observance was continued in later days, and has not yet wholly disappeared, though the peculiar circumstances have vanished which gave propriety and emphasis to such an expression of brotherly love and Christian friendship.

(7) Literature. Pfanner, De Osculis Christianor. Vcter.; M. Kempius, De Osculis, Francof. 1680; Jac. Herrenschmidius, Osculogia, Viteb. 1630; P. Muller, De Osculo Sancto. 1674; Boberg, De Osculis Hebr. J. R. B.

KITE (kit). See GLEDE.

KITHLISH (kith'lish), (Heb. ^{קִיִּישׁ}, kith-leesh', wall of man), a city of Judah (Josh. xv:40) in the low country. It has not been identified. Called Chillish in R. V.

KITRON (kit'ron), (Heb. ^{קִיִּרֹן}, kit-rone', figurative, knotty), a city of Zebulun, which that tribe could not take from the Canaanites (Judg. i:30). Kitron is Sippor, (Sepphoris), says Bab. Megill. (fol. 6, 1), a very strong place, and the largest city in Galilee. It is noted in the Talmuds for being a university; in which taught rabbi Judah the Holy, who died here.

KITTIM (kit'tim), (Heb. ^{קִיִּיִּם}, kit-tee', ^{קִיִּיִּם}, kit-tee-ee', an islander), son of Javan, and grandson of Noah (Gen. x:4). (See CHITIM or KITTIM.)

KNEAD (nēd), (Heb. ^{לוּשׁ}, loosh), the preparation of dough by working it into a mass with the hands. Kneading was generally performed by women (Gen. xviii:6; 1 Sam. xxviii:24; 2 Sam. xiii:8, etc.), but occasionally by men (Hos. vii:4). (See BREAD.)

KNEADING-TROUGHS (nēd-ing-trōfs), (Heb. ^{מִשְׁעָרֵי}, mish-eh'reth). In the description of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, (Exod. xii:34) we read that "the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-troughs being bound up in their clothes, upon their shoulders."

Persons who know how cumbersome kneading troughs were, and how much less important they were than many other utensils, may wonder at this statement, and find a difficulty in accounting for it. But this wonder will cease, when it is understood that the vessels which the Arabs make use of, for kneading the unleavened cakes they prepare for those who travel in the very desert through which Israel passed, are only small wooden bowls; and that they seem to use no other in their own tents for that purpose, or any other; these bowls being used by them for kneading their bread, and serving up their provisions when cooked. It will appear, that nothing could be more convenient than kneading troughs of this sort for the Israelites in their journey.

Besides, Dr. Pococke gives us a description of a round leather cover, which the Arabs lay on the ground, from which they eat. This piece of furniture has, he says, rings round it by which it is drawn together with a chain, that has a hook to it, to hang it by. It is drawn together, and in this manner they bring it full of bread, and when the repast is over, carry it away at once, with all that is left. Perhaps this utensil is rather to be understood by the word translated kneading-troughs, than the Arab wooden bowl. There is nothing, in the other three places in which the word occurs, to contradict this explanation. These places are Exod. viii:3; Deut. xxviii:5 and 17; in the last two of which places it is translated store. (See BREAD.)

KNEE (nē), (Heb. and Chald. כֶּרֶךְ, keh'rek; Gr. γόνυ, gon-oo'); KNEEL (Heb. כָּרַע, baw-rak; Gr. γονυπετέω, gon-oo-pet-eh'o, to bend the knee).

Knee not only signifies that part of the body so called, but the whole body, a part being put for the whole (Ps. cix:24). Also for persons; so weak and feeble knees denote weak and disconsolate persons (Job iv:4; Heb. xii:12; Is. xxxv:3). To bow the knee to one, imports adoration of, or prayer to him (1 Kings xix:18; Eph. iii:14); or to reverence and be in subjection to him (Gen. xli:43; Phil. ii:10). To bring up, or dandle on the knees, is affectionately to nourish, as a mother does her own child (Gen. xxx:3 and 1:23; Is. lxvi:12). The smiting of the knees one against another is expressive of extraordinary terror and amazement (Dan. v:6).

Figurative. Knees are used symbolically for persons (Job iv:4; Heb. xii:12).

KNIFE (nif), (Heb. כֶּלֶבֶת, khee-reb', sword).

(1) Uses. In their meals the Jews, like other Orientals, made little use of knives, but they were used largely in the preparation of meats and other food, also in preparation of their sacrifices (Gen. xxii:6, 10; 1 Sam. ix:24; Jer. xxxvi:23; Ezek. xxiv:4; Ezra i:9; Matt. xxvi:23). The razor was used frequently for Nazaritic purposes (Num. vi:5, 9, 19; Ezek. v:1; Is. vii:20; Jer. xxxvi:23; Acts xviii:18; xxi:24).

Pruning-hooks were probably curved knives (Is. xviii:5), while the lancets of the priests of Baal were doubtless pointed knives (1 Kings xviii:28).

(2) Material. Knives were generally made of flint (Josh. v:2) and afterwards of iron and steel. The Egyptians when embalming a corpse, used a sharp stone knife for making an incision in the body (Herod. ii:86). The Hebrew scribes sharpened the stylus with a small knife (Jer. xxxvi:23). Herod the Great was accustomed to use a knife for paring fruit, and attempted to kill himself with it (Antiq. xvii, 7, 1). These were of metal construction.

KNOCK (nōk), (Heb. כָּדַעַת, daw-fak'; Gr. κρούω, kroo'o; Cant. v:2, Judg. xix:22, "beat;" Matt. vii:7; Rev. iii:20, etc.).

Missionaries in Oriental countries state that, as in ancient times, Orientals never knock when about to enter a room, but without warning or ceremony walk in. For scriptural references to knocking in the ordinary sense, see Deut. xxiv:10; Acts xii:13, 16; Acts x:17, 18.

Figurative. Jesus knocks at the door of our hearts; by his word, Spirit, and providence, he awakens, invites, and urges us to receive himself as the free gift of God, the Savior come to seek and save that which is lost (Rev. iii:20; Cant. v:2). Our knocking at his door of mercy, is fervent and frequent prayer for his distinguished presence and favors (Matt. vii:7, 8; Luke xi:10). (Brown, Bib. Dict.)

KNOP (nōp), (Heb. כָּפֹרֶת, kaf-tore, a chaplet), that is knob, a word used to translate two terms referring to some architectural object or ornament.

1. Kaf-tore', (Heb. כָּפֹרֶת, a chaplet), (Ex. xxv:31, 36; xxxvii:17, 22), where the knops are distinguished from the shaft, branches, bowls, and flowers of the candlestick. In Amos ix:1, the same word is translated "lintel," as also in Zeph. ii:14.

2. Peh-kah'im, (Heb. כָּפֹרֶת, (1 Kings vi:18; vii:24). In the first passage it refers to the carvings on the wainscot of the Temple; in the second, to an ornament cast around the great reservoir of Solomon. The word, no doubt, signifies some round or oval shaped object used in ornamentation.

KNOW (nō), (Heb. יָדָעַת, yaw-dah'; Gr. γινώσκω, ghin-oc'e'ko, each having a great variety of meaning). Both terms denote coming to know, i. e., gaining a knowledge; and to know, i. e., to have knowledge of. The verb yawdah signifies to perceive, discern, become aware of.

Know in general signifies: (1) To understand; to perceive (Ruth iii:11). (2) To have the experience of (2 Cor. v:21). (3) To acknowledge, to take particular notice, to approve, delight in, and show distinguished regard to (Is. lv:5; 1 Cor. viii:3; John x:27; Amos iii:2; Gen. xxxix:6; 1 Thess. v:12). (4) To make known, and see discovered (1 Cor. ii:2). (5) To have carnal dealing with (Gen. iv:1 and xix:5; Judg. xix:22). I know nothing by myself, means I am not conscious of any allowed wickedness (2 Cor. iv:4). We make known our requests unto God, when directed by his Spirit, we express the desires of our hearts in prayer to him (Phil. iv:6). He that perverteth his way is known, when God exposes him to shame and punishment on account of it (Prov. x:9).

KNOWLEDGE (nōl'ej), (Heb. יָדָעַת, day-aw'). The word denotes:

1. The infinite understanding of God, by which he perfectly perceives and comprehends himself, and all things possible or real (1 Sam. ii:3).

2. A speculative knowledge, by which a man has a merely rational perception of things natural or Divine, without any faith in, or love to God produced or strengthened by it (1 Cor. viii:1; Rom. i:28; Eccl. i:18).

3. A spiritual reception of Divine things, by which, through the instruction of God's word and Spirit, we not only perceive, but are powerfully and sweetly disposed to believe in and love God in Christ as our God (2 Cor. vi:6; John xvii:3).

4. The supernatural gift of interpreting dreams, explaining hard passages of Scripture, or foreseeing things to come (Dan. v:12; 1 Cor. xiii:2).

5. Spiritual prudence, and gracious experience in the ways of God (Prov. xxviii:2).

6. The perfect and immediate views of the glory of God in heaven; in this we know God, as we are known; apprehend his existence, and glorious excellencies and work, without any mistake (1 Cor. xiii:12).

7. Instruction, whereby knowledge is communicated (Prov. xxii:17).

8. Faith is called "knowledge," as it is supposed knowledge, and is an apprehending of things invisible, on the testimony of God (1s. liii:11), but the text may also mean, that by Jesus' infinitely skillful fulfillment of his work, he shall justify many. (a) Saints are enriched with "all knowledge;" they are made wise unto salvation, and know everything important concerning it (Rom. xv:14; 1 Cor. i:5; 1 John ii:20). (b) "Through knowledge" the just shall be delivered; by the infinite wisdom of God, and by means of their faith, spiritual knowledge, and prudence, shall they escape trouble, or get out of it (Prov. xi:9).

KOA (kō'a), (Heb. כֹּא, ko'ah, perhaps cutting off). Gesenius (Heb. Lex., s. v.) says that "Koa is a he-camel, stallion, then figuratively a prince, noble."

It occurs only in Ezek. xxiii:23 and is applied to a people named between Babylonians and Assyrians, located by Friedrich Delitzsch east of the Tigris, south of the lower Zab. The passage reads: "The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod and Shoa, and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them." In the last three words "there is some obscurity, which the older theologians have almost unanimously taken to be the names of different tribes in the Chaldean empire. Ewald also adopts this view, but it is certainly incorrect" (Keil, Com. in loc.).

KOHATH (kō'hath), (Heb. כֹּהַת, keh-hawth', allied, assembly), the second son of Levi (Gen. xlv:11), and father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Num. iii:19).

He went down to Egypt with Levi and Jacob (Gen. xlv:11). His sister was Jochebed (Exod. vi:20). He lived to the age of one hundred and thirty-three years (Exod. vi:18). (B. C. about 2000.) At the first census in the wilderness, the Kohathite males from a month old and upward were 8,600 (Num. iii:28), and those from thirty to fifty years old 2,750 (Num. iv:34-37). In the subsequent allotment of cities to the family, the priests, the descendants of Aaron, had shares with the other Kohathites, the former obtaining thirteen cities out of the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, and the latter ten cities out of the tribes of Ephraim, Dan, and Manasseh (Josh. xxi:4, 5; 1 Chron. vi:61, 66-70). In the service of the tabernacle, as settled in the wilderness, the Kohathites had the distinguished charge of bearing the ark and the sacred vessels (Exod. vi:16; Num. iv:4-6).

KOHATHITES (kō'hath-ites), (Heb. כֹּהַתִּים, kaw-hawth'ee), Num. xxvi:57; 1 Chron. vi:54; ix:32; descendants of KOHATH.

KOLAIAH (kōl'a-i'ah), (Heb. כֹּלְיָאֵה, ko-law-yaw', voice of Jehovali).

1. A Benjaminite whose descendants lived in Jerusalem after the return from the captivity (2h. xi:7). (B. C. long before 445.)

2. Father of Aiah, who was burnt by the king of Babylon (Jer. xxix:21). (B. C. about 626.)

KOPH (kōf).

The nineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English Q comes from the same source; but in anglicized Hebrew names "c" or "k" represents it, as in Cain and Korah. It heads the nineteenth section of Ps. cxix., in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

KOPHER or COPHER (kō'pher), (Heb. כֹּפֶר, ko-fer), occurs twice in Canticles, and is in both places translated camphire in the Authorized Version.

(1) Camphor. Thus (i:14), 'My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire (kopher) in the vineyards of En-gedi;' and in iv:13, 'Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits, camphire (kopher), with spikenard.' It has been supposed to indicate a bunch of grapes (Botrus kopher), also camphor. The word camphire is the old mode of spelling camphor, but this substance does not appear to have been known to ancient commerce; at least we cannot adduce any proof that it was so. The word Kopher is certainly very like Kafoor, the Eastern name for camphor, but it also closely resembles the Greek κύπρος, Cypros. Indeed, as has been observed, it is the same word, with the Greek pronunciation and termination. The κύπρος of the Greeks is, no doubt, the Lawsonia inermis of botanists, and is described by Dioscorides (i, 125) and by Pliny (xii, 24). The Turks and Camphor (Lawsonia inermis).

Moors cultivate these with great care and diligence, because of their sweet-smelling flowers. They also keep their leaves all winter, which leaves they powder and mix with the juice of citrons, and stain therewith on great holidays the hair and nails of their children of a red color, which color may perhaps be seen on the manes and tails of Turkish horses.

(2) Henna. This custom of dyeing the nails and the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, of an iron-rust color, with henna, exists throughout the East, from the Mediterranean to the Ganges, as well as in northern Africa. In some parts the practice is not confined to women and children, but is also followed by men, especially in Persia. In dyeing the beard, the hair is turned to red by this application, which is then changed to black by a preparation of indigo. In dyeing the hair of children, and the tails and manes of horses and asses, the process is allowed to stop at the red color which the henna produces. Seeing, then, that the henna is so universally admired in the East, both on account of the fragrance of its flowers and the dye yielded by its leaves, and as there is no doubt that it is the κόκκος of the Greeks, and as this word is so similar to the kopher of the Hebrews, there is every probability of this last being the henna of the Arabs, Lawsonia alba of botanists.

KORAH (kō'rah), (Heb. קֹרַח, ko'rahk, ice).

1. A Levite, son of Izhar, the brother of Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron, who were therefore cousins to Korah (Exod. vi:21).

(1) Jealousy. From this near relationship we may conjecture that the source of the discontent which led to the steps afterwards taken by this unhappy man lay in his jealousy that the high honors and privileges of the priesthood, to which he, who remained a simple Levite, might, apart from the Divine appointment, seem to have had as good a claim, should have been exclusively appropriated to the family of Aaron. When to this was added the civil authority of Moses, the whole power over the nation would seem to him to have been engrossed by his cousins, the sons of Amram.

(2) Conspiracy. Under the influence of these feelings he organized a conspiracy for the purpose of redressing what appeared to him the evil and injustice of this arrangement. Dathan, Abiram, and On, the chief persons who joined him, were of the tribe of Reuben; but he was also supported by many more from other tribes, making up the number of two hundred and fifty, men of name, rank, and influence, all who may be regarded as representing the families of which they were the heads.

(3) Ostensible Object. The private object of Korah was apparently his own aggrandizement, but his ostensible object was the general good of the people; and it is perhaps from want of attention to this distinction that the transaction has not been well understood. The design seems to have been made acceptable to a large body of the nation, on the ground that the firstborn of Israel had been deprived of their sacerdotal birthright in favor of the Levites, while the Levites themselves announced that the priesthood had been conferred by Moses (as they considered) on his own brother's family, in preference to those who had equal claims; and it is easy to conceive that the Reubenites may have considered the opportunity a favorable one for the recovery of their birthright—the double portion and civil pre-eminence—which had been forfeited by them and given to Joseph.

(4) Complaint. The leading conspirators, having organized their plans, repaired in a body to Moses and Aaron, boldly charged them with their usurpations, and required them to lay down their ill-gotten power. Moses no sooner heard this than he fell on his face, confounded at the enormity of so outrageous a revolt against a system framed so carefully for the benefit of the nation. He left the matter in the Lord's hands, and desired them to come on the morrow, provided with censers for incense, that the Lord himself, by some manifest token, might make known his will in this great matter. As this order was particularly addressed to the rebellious Levites, the Reubenites left the place, and when afterwards called back by Moses, returned a very insolent refusal, charging him with having brought them out of the land of Egypt under false pretences, 'to kill them in the wilderness.'

(5) Destruction. The next day Korah and his company appeared before the tabernacle, attended by a multitude of people out of the general body of the tribes. Then the Shekinah, or symbol of the Divine presence, which abode between the cherubim, advanced to the entrance of the sacred fabric, and a voice therefrom commanded Moses and Aaron to stand apart, lest they should share in the destruction which awaited the whole congregation. On hearing these awful words the brothers fell on their faces, and by strong intercession, moved the Lord to confine his wrath to the leaders in the rebellion, and spare their unhappy dupes. The latter were then ordered to separate themselves from their leaders and from the tents in which they dwelt. The terrible menace involved in this direction had its weight, and the command was obeyed: and after Moses had appealed to what was to happen as a proof of the authority by which he acted, the earth opened and received and closed over the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (B. C. about 1190). The Reubenite conspirators were in their tents, and perished in them; and at the same instant Korah and his two hundred and fifty, who were offering incense at the door of the tabernacle, were destroyed by a fire which 'came out from the Lord;' that is, most probably, in this case, from out of the cloud in which his presence dwelt.

(6) Sons of Korah. The censers which they had used were afterwards made into plates, to form an outer covering to the altar, and thus became a standing monument of this awful transaction (Num. xvi.). On, although named in the first instance along with Dathan and Abiram, does not further appear either in the rebellion or its punishment. It is hence supposed that he repented in time: and Abendana and other Rabbinical writers allege that his wife prevailed upon him to abandon the cause.

It might be supposed from the Scripture narrative that the entire families of the conspirators perished in the destruction of their tents. Doubtless all who were in the tents perished; but as the descendants of Korah afterwards became eminent in the Levitical service, it is clear that his sons were spared. They were probably living in separate tents, or were among those who sundered themselves from the conspirators at the command of Moses. There is no reason to suppose that the sons of Korah were children when their father perished. The Korahites were appointed by David to the office of guarding the doors of the temple, and of singing praises. They, in fact, occupied a distinguished place in the choral service of the temple, and several of the Psalms (xlii, xliii, xlix, lxxxiv, lxxxv, lxxxvii, lxxxviii) are inscribed to them. Heman, the master of song under David, was of this family, and his genealogy is traced through Korah up to Levi (1 Chron. vi:31-38).

2. Third son of Esau by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i:35), born before Esau went to Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi:5-9). (B. C. about 2100.)

3. A "Duke" of Edom, grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi:16).

4. A 'son of Hebron' (1 Chron. ii:43), but whether a man or city is meant by 'Hebron' is uncertain. (B. C. long after 1191.)

KORAHITE (kō'rah-ite), that portion of the Kohathite Levites who were descended from Korah (1 Chron. ix:19, 31). (See KORAH.)

KORATHITES (ko'ra-th-ites), (Num. xxvi:58). See KORAHITE.

KORE (ko're), (Heb. קורֵי, ko-ray', crier, or a partridge).

1. A Korahite, ancestor of Shallum and Mesh-lemiah, chief porters in the time of David (1 Chron. ix:19; xxvi:1). (B. C. about 960.)

2. Son of Imnah, a Levite, appointed over the freewill offerings, and gatekeeper of the western side of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:14). (B. C. 719.)

3. The "sons of Kore" (1 Chron. xxvi:19), should probably be "the sons of the Korhite."

KORHITE (kôr'hite), (Ex. vi:24; 1 Chron. xii:8; xxvi:1; 2 Chron. xx:19). See KORAHITE.

KOTZ (kōtz). See THORNS AND THISTLES.

KOZ (kōz), (Heb. קוצ, kotse, a thorn).

1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv:8), the father of Anub and others. He may have been a son or brother of Ashur (verse 5). (B. C. before 1300.)

2. The head of the seventh division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxiv:10), where the name is translated Hak Koz. (B. C. about 960.) He is probably the same whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii:61; Neh. vii:63).

KRINON (kri'nōn). See LILY.

KUSHAI AH (ku-shá'iah), (Heb. קוּשִׁי אֵהָ, koos-haw-yaw hoo, the bow of Jah), the form of the name of Kish or Kishi, father of Ethan (1 Chron. xv:17). Ethan was appointed a chief assistant in the temple music by David, (B. C. about 900). He is called Kishi in 1 Chron. vi:44.

KUSSEMETH (küs-sē'meth), (Heb. קוּסְמֵת, koos-seh'meth), occurs in three places of Scripture.

(1) Variouly Rendered. In the Authorized Version it is translated rye in Exod. ix:32; Is. xxviii:25, and fitches in Ezek. iv:9; but its true meaning still remains uncertain. It was one of the cultivated grains both of Egypt and of Syria, and one of those employed as an article of diet. It was also sown along with wheat, or, at least, its crop was in the same state of forwardness; for we learn from Exod. ix:32, that in the seventh plague the hail-storm smote the barley which was in the ear, and the flax which was bolled; but that the wheat and the Kussemeth were not smitten, for they were not grown up. Respecting the wheat and the barley, we know that they are often sown and come to maturity in different months.

(2) Cultivated in Palestine. That kussemeth was cultivated in Palestine we learn from Is. xxviii:25, where it is mentioned along with ketzah (nigella) and cumin, wheat and barley; and sown, according to some translators, 'on the extreme border of the fields,' as a kind of fence for other kinds of corn. This is quite an Oriental practice, and may be seen in the case of flax and other grains in India, at the present day. The rye is a grain of cold climates, and is not cultivated even in the south of Europe. Korte declares (Travels, p. 168) that no rye grows in Egypt; and Shaw states (p. 351) that rye is little known in Barbary and Egypt (Rosenmüller, p. 76).

(3) Used in Making Bread. That the kussemeth was employed for making bread by the Hebrews we know from Ezek. iv:9, where the prophet is directed to 'take wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentiles, and millet, and kussemeth, and put them in a vessel, and make bread thereof.' Though it is very unlikely that kussemeth can mean rye, it is not easy to say what cultivated grain it denotes. The principal kinds of grain, it is to be observed, are mentioned in the same passages with the kussemeth. Though some circumstances seem to point to the triticum spelta, or spelt as the kussemeth of Scripture, the subject is still susceptible of further investigation, and can only be finally determined by first ascertaining the modern agriculture of eastern countries, and comparing it with the ancient accounts of the agriculture of Syria and Egypt. L

LAADAH (lā'a-dah), (Heb. לָאָדָא, lah-daw', meaning uncertain), the second son of Shelah (son of Judah), and "father" (founder) of Mareshah (1 Chron. iv:21).

LAADAN (lā'a-dān), (Heb. לָאָדָן, lah-dawn', as above).

1. An Ephraimite, the son of Tahan, and grandfather of Elishama, which latter was prince of his tribe at the Exodus (1 Chron. vii:26). (B. C. before 1210.)

2. Son of Gershon (1 Chron. xxiii:7, 8, 9; xxvi:21). Elsewhere and in the margin called Libni. Keil (Com. in loc.) is led to believe that Laadan was a later descendant of Gershon than Libni, and that the Shimei of ver. 9 was a descendant of Libni, not elsewhere mentioned.

LAANAH (lā-an'ah), (Heb. לָאָנָה, lah-an-aw'), translated wormwood, occurs in several passages of Scripture, in most of which it is employed in a figurative sense.

Thus, in Deut. xxix:18, 'Lest there be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood,' is applied to such Israelites as should worship foreign gods. Prov. v:4, 'But her end is bitter as wormwood.' Jer. ix:15, 'Behold I will feed them, even this people, with wormwood, and give them gall to drink.' So in Jer. xxiii:15, and in Lam. iii:15 and 19, 'Remember mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and gall,' where it is applied to public and private calamities, and in Amos v:7, it is said of unrighteous judges 'Ye who turn judgment to wormwood'; so in ver. 12, but here the word laanah is translated hemlock. That laanah was a plant of an extreme degree of bitterness, is evident from the various passages in which it occurs; and it has hence, as Celsius observes, been adopted to indicate both the sins and the punishments of men. (See WORMWOOD.)

LABAN (lā'ban), (Heb. לָבָן, law-bawn', white).

1. Son of Bethuel (Gen. xxviii:5), and grandson of Nahor (Gen. xxix:5), brother of Rebekah (Gen. xxiv:15, 29, 50 sq.), and father of Jacob's two wives, Leah and Rachel.

(1) Dealings with Jacob. Dreading the vengeance of Esau his brother, Jacob was compelled to flee from home. Before his departure Isaac sent for Jacob, gave him his blessing, and charged him to go to Padan-aram, and there marry one of his uncle Laban's daughters (Gen. xxviii:2, 5). When Jacob had been with Laban about a month, Laban proposed to give him wages. Jacob offered seven years' service for Rachel his younger, but most beautiful daughter; and with great cheerfulness he fulfilled his engagement, from the great love which he bore to her. When the marriage night came, God, in order to punish Jacob for deceiving his dim-eyed father, permitted Laban to conduct Leah, his elder daughter, whose beauty was far inferior, to Jacob's bed, instead of Rachel. This was easily done, as the bride, when conducted to the bridegroom, was closely veiled. Next morning the cheat was discovered; and Jacob warmly reproached his uncle for it. He pretended that it was contrary to the custom of their country to marry the younger daughter first; but told him he might have Rachel, too, for seven years' more service. This Jacob agreed to (Gen. xxix:15, 30).

Jacob's fourteen years' service for his two wives being finished, he begged that Laban, his father-in-law, would permit him to return to his country, with his family along with him, that he might provide for himself. Sensible of the advantage of his service, Laban offered him what wages he pleased if he would stay. To mark his dependence on the providence of God, Jacob moved that all the spotted cattle and brown sheep afterwards produced should be his hire. Laban, expecting these could not be many, readily consented. To prevent all disputes, and hinder as much as possible the future product of spotted cattle and brown sheep, all of these kinds were removed to the distance of three days' journey, and intrusted to the care of Laban's sons; and the rest were committed to the oversight of Jacob. Instigated by a vision, Jacob employed means by which he increased his portion, and that of the stronger and abler cattle (Gen. xxx:37-43), so that the wealth of his uncle decreased in proportion as his own was augmented. Laban, therefore, frequently changed his hire; but whatever was allotted to Jacob exceedingly increased, though he also caused Jacob to bear the loss of whatever was missing of his flocks or herds. After Jacob had served other six years, with great labor and fidelity, Laban and his sons began to behave churlishly and rudely towards him, pretending, that he had made himself rich at their expense. Meanwhile, God, in a dream, ordered him to return to Canaan. Resolving to do so, he, perhaps when he was shearing his own sheep, at a distance from those of Laban, acquainted his wives that he saw their father's deportment towards him changed, and that he intended to return to Canaan. They, being sensible of their father's injurious behavior, were glad to part with him. So Jacob, his wives and children, and servants, and flocks, moved towards Canaan, and Rachel carried off some of her father's idols. On the third day after, Laban, informed of their departure, pursued them in no small fury; but God, in a dream, charged him to beware of giving Jacob so much as an injurious word. On the seventh day he overtook them on the mountain of Gilead. Some sharp words were exchanged, and Laban heavily complained that they had carried off his gods. Jacob desired him to ransack all his store, and if his gods were found with any, let the person be put to death. Laban searched with the utmost care; but Rachel, having taken the idols and put them into the camel's furniture, sat upon them, pretending that she was in circumstances which prevented her from rising. Nothing of Laban's being found, he and Jacob made a solemn covenant of perpetual friendship, in testimony of which they reared a heap of stones, which Jacob called Galeed, or Gilead, and Laban, Jegar-sahadutha, both of which designations signified the heap of witness. After Jacob had offered sacrifice, and given an entertainment to his friends, Laban and his company affectionately parted, and returned to Padan-aram, while Jacob and his family went forward to Canaan (Gen. xxix, xxx, xxxi). (See JACOB.)

(2) Character. In their mistaken zeal to defend Jacob, Christian writers have unduly depreciated Laban, and even the ready hospitality shown by him to Abraham's servant, and the affectionate reception of his nephew (Gen. xxiv:30, 31; xxix:13, 14) have been misconstrued into the acts of a selfish man, eager to embrace an opportunity of a lucrative connection. No man, however, is wholly selfish; and even Laban was capable of generous impulses, however mean and unprincipled his general conduct.

2. A city in the desert of Arabia, on the route of the Israelites (Deut. i:1); perhaps identical with their twenty-first halting place, Libnah (Num. xxxiii:20).

LABOR (lā'bēr), (Heb. עֲבָרָה, ab-o-daw'), is the execution of a definite task.

(1) Not an Evil. In Gen. iii:19, labor is set forth as a part of the primeval curse, 'In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread'; and doubtless there is a view of labor which exhibits it in reality as a heavy, sometimes a crushing burden. But labor is by no means exclusively an evil, nor is its prosecution a dishonor.

(2) Of Herdsman. The Hebrews, like other primitive nations, appear to have been herdsmen before they were agriculturists (Gen. iv:2, 12, 17, 22); and the practice of keeping flocks and herds continued in high esteem and constant observance as a regular employment and a social condition (Judg. v:16; Jer. xxxiii:12; Luke ii:8). The culture of the soil came in course of time, introducing the discovery and exercise of the practical arts of life, which eventually led to those refinements, both as to processes and to applications, which precede, if they do not create the fine arts (Gen. v:29; xxvi:12; xxxiii:19).

(3) Agriculture. Agriculture, indeed, became the chief employment of the Hebrew race after their settlement in Canaan, lay at the very basis of the constitution, both civil and religious, which Moses gave them, was held in great honor, and was carried on by the high as well as the humble in position (Judg. vi:11; 1 Sam. xi:5; 1 Kings xix:19).

(4) Horticulture. No small care was bestowed on the culture of the vine, which grew luxuriously on the hills of Palestine (Is. v:2, 5; Matt. xxi:33; Num. xiii:24). The vintage was a season of jubilee (Judg. ix:27; Jer. xxv:30; Is. xvi:10). The hills of Palestine were also adorned with well cultured olive-gardens, which produced fruit useful for food, for anointing, and for medicine (Is. xvii:6; xxiv:13; Deut. xxiv:20; Ezek. xxvii:17; 1 Kings iv:25; Hos. xiv:6, 7). Attention was also given to the culture of the fig-tree (2 Kings xx:7; 1 Chron. xxvii:28), as well as of the date-palm (Lev. xxiii:40; Judg. i:16; iv:5; iii:13; Dent. xxxiv:3), and also of balsam (Gen. xliii:11; Ezek. xxvii:17; Jer. viii:22). For the rise and progress of various kinds of hand labor among the people of Israel, see HANDICRAFT.

LACE (lās), Heb. פָּרָה, parw-theel', from a verb "to twist," translated thread in Judg. xvi:9, line in Ezek. xl:3, wire (of gold) in Exod. xxxix:3, ribbon in Num. xv:38, and bracelets in Gen. xxxviii:18, 25, where it denotes the string by which the signet-ring was hung about the neck. (See Exod. xxviii:28.)

the plain between Adoraim and Azekah (Josh. x:3, 5, 31; xv:39).

It was rebuilt and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi:9), and seems after that time to have been regarded as one of the strongest fortresses of the kingdom of Judah, having for a time braved the assaults of the Assyrian army under Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii:17; xix:8; 2 Chron. xxxii:9). The site is found by Petrie at Tell el-Hesy, sixteen miles east by north of Gaza and eleven miles west-southwest of Beit Jibrin. Excavation has laid bare the wall of the ancient city, as well as later constructions believed to belong to the times of Rehoboam, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, Jotham, and Manasseh. The mound of Tell el-Hesy rises sixteen miles to the east of Gaza. It stands on a natural eminence about forty feet in height, on the summit of which the ruins of ten successive cities are piled sixty feet higher. The lowest is called Amorite, and is reported to be about a quarter of a mile square. It was built on a bluff, about sixty feet above the stream which flowed on the east, and forty feet above the level country on the north. Above the ruins of the primitive Lachish are found fresh walls raised upon those destroyed, and fresh buildings constructed of the old stones. (Palestine Expl., 1900.)

Professor Sayce in Higher Criticism, p. 289, says: "In the time of Amenôphis IV, or Khu-n-Aten, Lachish had been the seat of an Egyptian governor. More than one letter from him has been found among the cuneiform tablets of Tell-Amarna, and one of the dispatches of the vassal king of Jerusalem states that Lachish, Ashkelon, and Gezer had furnished the garrison of his city with food and oil." (See LACHISH, EXCAVATIONS AT; LACHISH, SIEGE OF.)

LACHISH, EXCAVATIONS AT.

The importance of the excavations at Lachish is worthy of a separate article. Nearly four thousand years after the founding of the first city the tide of warfare and the passing centuries had left only a great mound called a tell and which the Arabs called Tell el-Hesy. The identification of the locality was for a long time undecided, but Major Conder claimed that this must be the site of the original Lachish from the fact that the situation commands the only springs of water in the region except those which lie some three or four miles away, and also because its position corresponds with the account in the "Onomasticon" of the location of Lachish, which was in the district of Daroma, seven miles from Eleutheropolis, or Beit Jibrin. Between April of 1890 and January of 1893, the officers of the Palestine Exploration Fund excavated the great mound and they succeeded in restoring to the original level, a portion of it. The work was begun under the able leadership of Dr. W. M. Flinders Petrie whose "ten years' digging in Egypt" together with his profound scholarship had given him a wonderful adaptability for the work. He was enabled to largely reconstruct the history, and determine the various periods, from remains which to the inexperienced eye would seem entirely without significance. Later the work was pursued by Mr. F. J. Bliss and a portion of the remains of one city after another were slowly uncovered by Arabian workmen, while the women of the tribes carried away the dirt in baskets.

As layer after layer was removed the various forms of pottery were discovered which enabled the explorers to assign the age of each particular city with more or less certainty. In one era the decorations and ornaments indicated the luxurious days of Solomon, and the slabs bearing pilasters in low relief probably date from his time. Much of the pottery which was found belonged to the period of the Jewish kings, and certain forms of idolatrous worship seem to have originated here, for we read that Lachish was "the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion; for the transgressions of Israel were found in thee" (Micah i:13).

The first city explored was necessarily the last one built, and the scanty remains here found assigned its period to about 400 B. C. The city following this was No. X, and it was assigned to about 500 B. C., on account of the prevalence of polished Greek ware. City IX was assigned to 800 B. C., and VIII to the period between 900 and 1000 B. C.

After all traces of No. VIII had been cleared away they had again a smooth platform to explore, and below it in City VII was a fine range of rooms, but into them the people who built the town above them had dug pits for their ovens, and hence they contained several of the pit ovens which are still so common in Palestine. Below this layer the workmen found a vast amount of debris, and they dug almost ten feet before they came to City VI. It was only about four feet, however, below the foundations of these buildings that they reached the top of the walls of City V.

Still lower than this, in City IV, the walls of a large building were traced by a bed of yellow sand which lay directly under them, never extending either into the rooms or into the streets. In City III the ruins of the rooms were covered with a great bed of ashes which still remain a mystery. Petrie ascribed them to alkali-burners who may have plied their trade on the then deserted hill, while Bliss inclined to a different view based upon the furnace which was found just below. This ruined town lay about fifteen feet lower than the one above it, and covered considerably more ground; indeed the general outline of the whole Tell from this point upward was somewhat in the shape of a peak, each city covering less space than did its predecessor. This third city had evidently been sacked as well as destroyed, and the work here was almost barren of results except the few objects which were found in the debris outside of the rooms.

One of the most important of the finds here obtained was a small clay tablet which is now in the Imperial Museum of Constantinople. The finding of this tablet established the fact which had long been suspected by scholars that the pre-Israelitish Canaan possessed their clay libraries as did Babylonia and Assyria. "In size and shape," says Professor Sayce, "it resembles the tablets sent from the south of Canaan. The forms of the cuneiform characters, moreover, which appear on it, are those which we now know to have been used in southern Canaan about 1400 B. C. Lastly, the grammatical forms and formulæ are identical with those employed by the scribes of Southern Canaan when writing to the Egyptian kings. We find them in the tablets of Tell-Amarna as well as in the tablet of Lachish.

"The fact that the original was not accessible made the copying of the cuneiform text somewhat difficult. Indeed, it is sometimes impossible to tell from the impressions what exactly are the characters at the edges of the tablet or where the surface of the tablet is worn. Hence the lacunæ and indications of uncertainty which appear in my copy of the inscription. A translation of the text has been further rendered difficult by the existence in it of words which have not been met with before and which are, therefore, of doubtful meaning. Fortunately enough is clear to show us what the letter—for such it is—is about, and to what period it belongs.

"What makes this letter so particularly interesting is that we already know something about Zimrida, who is twice mentioned in it. Zimrida, or Zimridi, as he is called, was governor of Lachish in the reign of Khu-n-Aten, and a letter from the king of Jerusalem to the Egyptian Pharaoh informs us that he was murdered at Lachish by servants of the Egyptian king. One of the dispatches discovered at Tell-Amarna was sent by him to Egypt and runs thus: 'To the King, my Lord, my God, my Sun-god, the Sun-god who is from heaven, thus (writes) Zimridi, the governor of the city of Lachish, thy servant, the dust of thy feet, at the feet of the King, my Lord, the Sun-god from heaven, bows himself seven times seven. I have very diligently listened to the words of the messenger of the King, my Lord has sent to me and now I have dispatched (a mission) according to his message.'"

Thus the tablet found at Lachish may be part of a correspondence pertaining to similar subjects as that found at Tell-Amarna, or it may be a local letter sent from one Syrian city to another. The discovery of other portions of this correspondence, which we now have a right to expect, would be simply invaluable.

Below this level, in City II, Mr. Bliss made another important discovery which he calls "a sample blast furnace." If his theories concerning it are correct it proves that during the period ranging about 1400 B. C. the hot air blast was used instead of cold air. The hot air blast furnace has been considered a modern improvement in iron manufactures which was due to Neilson and was patented in 1828.

The lowest city in the mound, and the one above it, contained only one class of pottery which Professor Petrie calls "Amorite," and which is plainly distinguishable from the well-known types of Phœnician pottery which begin to appear in City II and continue through both III and IV. "Amorite pottery" is a term which covers the strongly marked types of pre-Israelitish ware, the earliest use of which has not as yet been determined, but which went "out of fashion" as the prevailing type as early as the sixteenth century B. C., although specimens of it are found much later.

Although the remains of a great tower are found in the primitive city we have no direct historical account of the fortification of Lachish until it was done by Rehoboam, king of Judah, in whose list of "fenced cities" it occurs. (See REHOBAM.) After the Rehoboam period, there was a thin wall built on the front edge of his fortification to heighten and strengthen it. Hence the older wall must by this time have been decayed down to a height of only about six feet, and this fact suggests the passage of considerable time. If the wall had been destroyed by Shishak (2 Chron. xi:9; xii:2) in his subsequent invasion (see SHISHAK) it would have been almost, if not quite, overthrown. This re-fortification may have been made under Jehoshaphat, who having subdued the Philistines and Arabians (2 Chron. xvii:11, 12) needed a fortress here. And we read that he garrisoned "all the fenced cities" (ver. 2). Amaziah fled to Lachish about 810 B. C. and was killed there (1 Kings xiv:19). When Uziah attacked the Philistines (2 Chron. xxvi:11) he doubtless needed a fort at Lachish and probably the fragment left inside the wall of Jehoshaphat may have been his work, for it is said that he built much (ver. 10) and that he raised many cattle in Shephelah; therefore a safe watering place at Lachish would be invaluable.

After this the walls were razed probably by Rezin and Pekah when they beleaguered Jerusalem about 735 B. C. (2 Kings xvi:5).

But another wall was evidently built upon the ruin of the other, and this may have been done by Ahaz, whose passion for building is recorded in Kings (2 Kings xvi:17). Behind the wall of Ahaz and on the north side of the town is the foundation of a thicker wall which had evidently been ruined soon after it was built. On the south side there is a long fortification which is some thirty feet in breadth formed of blocks of stone bedded in the earth and faced with white plaster. These and other details correspond with what we might expect at the time of the siege by Sennacherib. (See LACHISH, SIEGE OF, also SENNACHERIB.)

chish, by W. M. Flinders Petrie. Also A Mound of Many Cities, by F. J. Bliss, etc.)

LACHISH, SIEGE OF

In Old Testament times the besieging army in attacking a fortified city sought first to drive all of its defenders within the walls. They then made choice of three methods of attack. They could either make a bold assault upon the most vulnerable part of the wall, or prepare to invest the city and starve out the defenders, or they might prepare their engines of war for a long and formal siege preparatory to the final battle.

In ancient Nineveh there was an elaborate representation of the siege of Lachish upon the walls of the palace of Sennacherib, and similar bas-reliefs show us the details of the siege of Susa, or Shushan, the capital of Ahasuerus and Esther (see SHUSHAN) and other cities. It was during the siege of Lachish that Sennacherib sent his tartan or commander-in-chief to Jerusalem to demand the submission of King Hezekiah as told in 2

Assyrian Sculpture Representing the Capture of Lachish by Sennacherib.

After the destruction of Lachish by Sennacherib there does not appear to have been more than one refortifying of the site. This is the wall on the north which is thin at the east end, but thicker in the middle of the side. This can be traced around the city, and is probably the work of Manasseh, who about 660 B. C. fortified Jerusalem and put commanders in all the fenced cities of Judah. If so these must have been the walls which were besieged by Nebuchadnezzar about 590 B. C. (See Jer. xxxiv:7.) After the siege of Nebuchadnezzar we have little or no data concerning its occupation. Even after the return of the Jews they made their principal settlement in the vicinity of the later site of Umm Lakis, and since the fourth century before Christ the site appears to have been left desolate, or occupied only by the desert tribes and their cattle.

More than twenty-three centuries have passed away and the buried cities still occupy the one great mound, the surface of which was planted with barley and with beans when the spade of the explorer broke the silence of the ages in this tomb of many cities. (See Tell el-Hesi La-

Kings xviii. The besieging army consisted of the chariot force which was made up from the military aristocracy of Assyria and consisted largely of men of rank and wealth. The cavalry and infantry came next in importance and finally the great host of common soldiers coming from the tributary peoples.

At Lachish the king himself took command and fought from a chariot, while behind him were two chariots each of which carried a royal standard, the one being the figure of an archer riding a bull, and the other the emblem of the supreme god, Assur on two bulls. The chariots of the king and his standard bearers were covered with gold and silver, while bows, arrows, and battle axes were fastened to the sides. In the rear of each of these chariots was a rich red shield, while above it was a spear from which streamers were flying. The other chariots were similar in construction and general design but they did not bear the royal colors or other insignia of the king.

The cavalry was armed with bows or javelins. The armor of the men was made of scales and consisted of a jacket and greaves. The horses were also protected by a thick leather armor which was fastened around the neck and covered both back and sides. Every cavalry man had a mounted attendant who held the horse by the bridle while his master was fighting.

It appears that the Assyrian infantry also fought in pairs, each archer having a companion who like Jonathan's armor-bearer protected his master as far as possible by holding before him a shield made of wicker work or leather, and in some cases there was also a second armor-bearer whose business it was to carry the arrows.

The higher rank of infantry carried spears and large round shields ornamented with bands of metal. If it was found that no sudden attack could capture a city the besieging army established a fortified camp just outside of bowshot, and if there were danger of a desperate counter-attack this camp would also be protected by a dike. The commander in chief would then slowly move his clumsy war machines forward toward the city walls. This movement was retarded as far as possible by the defenders who threw arrows and stones among the enemy, and also used torches and balls of fire. The fortress was sometimes on the top of a rocky hill as at Susa, and in this case the attacking party must fill up the ditches and raise banks upon which their crude battering-rams could be placed. These rams were made of a beam of wood either with or without a metal covering for the head, and this was carried by a number of men who struck it with all possible force against some weak point in the wall.

A more elaborate machine of the same sort was a beam which was set upon a frame carried upon wheels, and the frame had a covering which protected the men who worked the beam. Upon the highest point of this improved battering-ram a little tower was sometimes built and filled with archers who from this position were enabled to pick off the defenders who stood upon the top of the city wall. If the wall were built of heavy stones and well protected by fighting men it might for a long time defy the attacking party, especially when, as in the case of Tyre, the besieged city had access to the seacoast, and therefore could not be starved into submission. When at last a city was taken the terrible work of slaughter and cruelty really began. The victorious Assyrians often impaled the principal men among their prisoners or skinned them alive. Great piles of the heads of their victims were made at the gates of the city while other prisoners including women and children were driven off into Assyrian slavery. If a prisoner of high degree were saved to grace the triumph of the conqueror, the king would often with his own hands pierce the eyes of his victim with a spear, and lead him oack with a thong which had been put through his lips. King Zedekiah was one of these unfortunate victims, and the Assyrian bas-reliefs give many illustrations of this and other barbarities. (William Hayes Ward, Hom. Rev., July, 1895.) (See WAR.)

1. An infant just born (Exod. ii:6; Judg. xiii:5, 7; 1 Sam. iv:21).
2. A boy not yet full grown (Gen. xxi:16; xxii:12; Is. vii:16; viii:4).
3. A youth nearly twenty years of age (Gen. xxxiv:19; xli:12; 1 Kings iii:7; 2 Sam. xviii:5, 29).

4. A girl, or maiden (Gen. xxiv:14, 16; xxxiv:3, 12; Deut. xxii:15). The A. V. sometimes translates the term "child."

LADAN (lā'dan), A. V. See LAADAN.

LADDER (lād'dēr), (Heb. מַדְבָּעַ, sool-lawm', staircase), occurs in the account of Jacob's vision at Bethel (Gen. xxviii:12). That it was a contrivance known from the earliest ages is shown by Egyptian monuments.

In Jacob's dream the foot of the ladder stood on the earth, and its top reached unto heaven; the angels of God ascended and descended on the rounds of it. Above the top of it stood the Lord God, and assured him he was the God of his fathers, Abraham and Isaac, and would give him and his seed the land of Canaan for their inheritance, render them numerous as the sand by the seashore, and render all nations blessed in him and his seed. (See JACOB.)

Figurative. This ladder represented the providence of God, administered by angels and managed by God, as a God in covenant, and Jesus Christ as the wonder and Lord of angels, and the Mediator between God and man, and the way of access to God, sprung of Jacob in his humanity, but in his divine nature the Lord from heaven, and the means of all blessings from God to sinful men.

LADY (lā'dy).

1. Gheb-eh'reth (Heb. גֵּבְעָה, mistress), a term applied to Babylon as the mistress of the nations (Is. xlvii:5, 7), a mistress in distinction from a maidservant (Gen. xvi:4, 8, 9; 2 Kings v:3; Prov. xxx:23; Ps. cxxiii:2; Is. xxiv:2).

2. Saw-raw' (Heb. שָׂרָא, a noble female) (Judg. v:29; Esth. i:18).

3. Koo-ree'ah (Gr. κωπλά, feminine of master), found only in 2 John i:1, and applied as an honorable epithet to a Christian woman.

LAEL (lā'el), (Heb. לֵאלֹהִים, law-ale', consecrated to God), father of Eliasaph, who was a prince of the Gershonites at the time of the Exodus (Num. iii:24), B. C. before 1607.

LAHAD (lā'had), (Heb. לַחַד, lah'had), son of Jahath, of the family of Zerah, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv:2), B. C. after 1612.

LAHAI-ROI, THE WELL (la-hāi'roi), (Gen. xxiv:62). See BEER-LAHA-ROI.

LAHMAM (lāh'mam), (Heb. לַחְמַם, lakh-mawm'), a town in the group with Lachish, in the plain of Judah (Josh. xv:40), probably west of the Highlands of Judæa. It is possibly Beit-Lehai, a little northeast of Gaza (Robinson, iii, append., p. 118).

LAHMI (lāh'mi), (Heb. לַחְמִי, lakh-mee', Bethlehemite), a brother of Goliath, the Gittite, slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. xx:5). The name is probably a corruption for Beth-hal-lachmi, "the Bethlehemite," which occurs in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxi:19).

LAISH (lā'ish), (Heb. לַיִשׁ, lah'yish, a lion).

1. A place in the north of Palestine (Judg. xviii:7, 14), about four miles from Paneas, at the head of the Jordan. It was taken by the Danites and included within their territory. It is called also Leshem and Dan (Josh. xix:47; Judg. xviii:7, 29; Jer. viii:16), now identified with Tell-el-Kady, "the mound of the judge," to the north of the waters of Merom (Josh. xi:5). (See DAN.)

2. A place mentioned by the prophet in his description of the Assyrian assault on Jerusalem; from its association it lay north of the city (Is. x:30). The name here translated "unto Laish," should probably be "Laishah." The passage would then read, "listen Laishah," etc. It corresponds to the modern El-isawiyeh, a village a mile and a half northeast of Jerusalem (Robinson, Researches, ii. 108).

3. A man of the town of Gallim, the father of Phalti, or Phaltiel, to whom Saul gave Michal, the wife of David (1 Sam. xxv:44; 2 Sam. iii:15). (B. C. before 1062.)

LAKE (lāk), (Gr. λίμνη, līm'nay, a pool). The term occurs only in the N. T. regarding the Lake of Gennesaret (Luke v:1, 2; viii:22, 23, 33), and the "lake of fire" (Rev. xix:20; xx:10, 14, 15; xxi:8).

LAKUM (lā'kum), (Heb. לַקוּם, lak-koom', castle, defense), a place on the boundary of Naph-tali, probably not far south of Lake Merom (Josh. xix:33).

LAMA (lā'mā), (Gr. λαμά, lam-ah'; λαμμά, lam-mah'), a term signifying why, quoted from Ps. xxii:1 by Jesus on the cross (Matt. xxvii:46; Mark xv:34).

LAMB (lām), the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. The most frequent are keh-bes' (Heb. כֶּה־בֶּשֶׂת), transposed form keh'seb (כֶּה־שֶׁבֶת), and the feminines kib-saw' (כִּיב־סַוּ), kab-saw' (כַּב־סַוּ) and kis-baw' (כִּס־בַּוּ), and respectively denote a male and female lamb from the first to the third year. In sacrifice young rams of corresponding age were offered in almost every sacrifice (Num. vi:14; Lev. iv:32). (See SACRIFICE.)

2. The equivalent Chaldee form for the above is im-mar' (Heb. יַמְרַא, Ezra vi:9, 17; vii:17).

3. Taw-leh' (Heb. טַו־לֶה, 1 Sam. vii:9; Is. lxx:25), a young sucking lamb; originally the young of any animal.

4. Kar (Heb. כָּר, plumpf), a fat ram, or more probably "wether," as the word is generally employed in opposition to ayil, which strictly denotes a "ram" (Deut. xxxii:14; Is. xxxiv:6).

5. Tseh-one' (Heb. צֶה־אֶחָד, from unused root signifying to migrate), rendered "lamb" in Exod. xii:21, is properly a collective term denoting a "flock" of small cattle, sheep, and goats, in distinction from herds of the larger animals (Eccles. ii:7; Ezek. xlv:15).

6. Seh (Heb. שֶׁה), in opposition to the above collective term, is applied to denote the individuals of a flock, whether sheep or goats (Gen. xxii:7, 8; Exod. xii:3, etc.).

7. In the New Testament we find ar-nee'on (Gr. ἀρνεον, diminutive of ἀρνη, ar-ane', which latter occurs only in Luke x:3), a lambkin. (Mc. & Str. Bib. Cyc.)

For all the principal sacrifices of ordinary occasions a lamb might be used: as a male lamb for a burnt offering (Lev. ix:3; xxiii:12, 18; Num. vi:14; vii:15), a ewe lamb for a sin offering for others than the nation or rulers (Lev. iv:32, 35; Num. vi:14), and a male or female lamb for a guilt offering (Lev. v:6; xiv:12, 21; Num. vi:12) or for a peace offering (Lev. iii:6, 7; xxiii:19; Num. vii:17). In every case the lamb must be without blemish.

Figurative. (1) All the sheep offered in the ancient sacrifices represented Christ. He resembled a lamb in his spotless purity (1 Pet. i:19), and was typified by the paschal lamb. (2) He was like a lamb also in his gentleness and in his submission to unmerited suffering without murmur or complaint (Is. liii:7 with Luke xxiii:25; Acts viii:32; 1 Pet. ii:21-23). (3) Finally, he, like a lamb, was sacrificed for guilt not his own. Hence he is called the LAMB OF GOD, which taketh away the sin of the world (John i:29, 36), the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii:8), or simply the Lamb (Rev. v:6, 8, 12; vii:14, 17; xiv:1, 4). (4) His people are likened to sheep and lambs, to represent their innocence, patience, harmlessness, usefulness, and exposure to troubles and enemies (Is. liii:7; John x:1-26, and xxi:15-17). (5) Both in the Old Testament and in the New Testament the term lamb is at times used figuratively for child (Is. xl:11; John xxi:15). (6) Men in general are compared to sheep and lambs, to denote their stupidity, their weakness, exposure to danger, and need of government (1 Kings xxii:17; Hos. iv:16; Is. xl:11), or for their innocency and harmlessness as to a particular sin (2 Sam. xxiv:17). (7) Sinners are likened to sheep, to mark their unthoughtfulness, their proneness to wander, their exposure to ruin, their inability to defend or recover themselves, and their need to be saved, led, and nourished by Jesus the great Shepherd (Ps. xlix:14; Is. liii:6; 1 Pet. ii:25; Luke xv:4-6). (8) The rams, goats, and lambs, denote the various classes of people in a country; great and powerful, or poor and weak, and less or more innocent (Is. xxxiv:6, 7, and lx:7; Ezek. xxxiv:17 and xxxix:18).

LAMB OF GOD (lām öv göd), (Gr. ἀμνός Θεοῦ, am-nos'theo-oo'), a title given to Christ Jesus our Lord (John i:29, 36; comp. Acts viii:32; 1 Pet. i:19). As the lamb was the symbol of sacrifice, Jesus Christ is called "the sacrifice of God," or the divine sacrifice (John i:29; comp. Rev. v:12; Is. liii:7, 28; Rom. ix:5; 1 Cor. v:7; 1 Peter i:19).

In the symbolic scenery of the Book of Revelation John beheld "a lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth" (Rev. v:6); i. e., invested with the attributes of God, omnipotence and omniscience, and sharing the universal empire and homage of the universe. (See LAMB.)

LAME (lām), denotes one maimed, or enfeebled in the limbs (2 Sam. iv:4). Lameness disqualified men for officiating in the priesthood, or animals for being offered in sacrifice.

A person thus afflicted might, however, eat of the sacrifices, like other priests (Lev. xxi:17-23).

Figurative. In Jesus, our great Priest and Sacrifice, there is no want of ability to perform his work, and no predisposition to be turned out of the way (Lev. xxi:18; Deut. xv:21). Persons weak in body, or in their intellect and grace, and halting between different opinions, are called lame (Is. xxxiii:23; Heb. xii:13).

LAMECH (lā'mek), (Heb. לֶמֶךְ, leh'mek'; Sept. Λάμεχ, lamech).

1. Son of Methusael, and father of Jabel, Jubal, Tubal-cain, and Naamah (Gen. iv:18, 24, etc.). (B. C. probably about 3700.) He is recorded to have taken two wives, Adah and Zillah; and there appears no reason why the fact should have been mentioned, unless to point him out as the author of the evil practice of polygamy. The manner in which the sons of Lamech distinguished themselves as the inventors of useful arts, is mentioned under their several names. (See JABAL; JUBAL; and TUBAL-CAIN.) The most remarkable circumstance in connection with Lamech is the poetical address which he is very abruptly introduced as making to his wives. This is not only remarkable in itself, but is the first and most ancient piece of poetry in the Hebrew Scriptures; and, indeed, the only example of Antediluvian poetry extant:

Wives of Lamech, receive my speech!
If I slew a man to my wounding,
And a young man—to my hurt:
If Cain was avenged seven times,
Then Lamech—seventy times seven.’

This exhibits the parallelism and other characteristics of Hebrew poetry, the development of which belongs to another article. (See POETRY, HEBREW.) It has all the appearance of an extract from an old poem, which we may suppose to have been handed down by tradition to the time of Moses. It is very difficult to discover to what it refers, and the best explanation can be nothing more than a conjecture. So far as we can make it out, it would seem to be, as Bishop Lowth explains (Praelect. iv:91), an apology for committing homicide, in his own defense, upon some man who had violently assaulted him, and, as it would seem, struck and wounded him; and he opposes a homicide of this nature to the willful and inexcusable fratricide of Cain. Under this view Lamech would appear to have intended to comfort his wives by the assurance that he was really exposed to no danger from this act, and that any attempt upon his life on the part of the friends of the deceased would not fail to bring down upon them the severest vengeance. Naamah ‘the comely one’ is fancifully supposed to be perhaps the most ancient Venus of the Pagans (Gen. iv:18-24).

2. Son of Methuselah, and father of Noah (Gen. v:25-31; 1 Chron. i:3; Luke iii:36). (B. C. 3297-2520.)

LAMENT (lă-měnt'). See MOURNING.

LAMENTATIONS (lăm'ěn-tă'shūns), this book is called by the Hebrews מְתָנִים, ey-kaw', ‘how,’ from the first word of the book; but sometimes they call it מְתָנִים, kee-noth', tears, or ‘lamentation,’ in allusion to the mournful character of the work, of which one would conceive, says Bishop Lowth, ‘that every letter was written with a tear, every word the sound of a broken heart.’ From this, or rather from the translation of it in the Septuagint, tears, comes our title of Lamentations.

(1) Ascription. The ascription of the Lamentations in the title is of no authority in itself, but its correctness has never been doubted. The style and manner of the book are those of Jeremiah, and the circumstances alluded to, those by which he is known to have been surrounded. This reference of the Lamentations to Jeremiah occurs in the introductory verse which is found in the Septuagint:—‘And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried away captive, and Jerusalem was become desolate, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said.’

It is disputed whether or not this verse existed in the Hebrew copies from which the translation of the Seventy was made. We are certainly not bound by its authority if disposed to question the conclusion which it supports. But it at least shows the opinion which prevailed as to the author, and the occasion of the book, at the time the translation was made. That opinion, as regards the author, has been admitted almost without dispute. Funeral lamentations, composed by Jeremiah upon the death of King Josiah, are mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxv:25, and are there said to have been perpetuated by an ordinance in Israel. That the lamentations thus mentioned are those which we now possess has been the opinion of many scholars of great eminence. Josephus clearly takes this view (Antiq. x:5, 1), as do Jerome (Comment. in Zech. iii:11), Theodoret, and others of the Fathers; and in more modern times, Archbishop Usher (De LXX Interpret.), Michaelis (Note on Lowth's Sac. Poet. Hebr. Praelect. xxii), who afterwards changed his opinion, Datne (Proph. Major. ed. 1), and others. De Wette (Einleit. sec. 273) is clearly of opinion that the passage in 2 Chronicles refers to the existing book of Lamentations, and that the author considered the death of Josiah as its principal subject. This daring writer uses so little ceremony with the author of the book of Chronicles on other occasions that his own opinion is not to be inferred from this admission; and we are not surprised to find from what follows that he feels at liberty to take a different view from the one which he believes the writer of Chronicles to have entertained.

(2) General View of Commentators. The received opinion, namely, that in accordance with the argument prefixed to the books in the Septuagint, is now quite generally accepted. It is adopted by nearly all commentators who, as they proceed through the book, find that they cannot follow out the details on any other supposition. Indeed, but for the reference suggested by the passage in Chronicles, no one would have been likely to imagine that such expressions as are found in ch. i:17 could point to any other circumstances than those which attended and followed the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. Besides the prophet speaks throughout the book of the city of Jerusalem and the Temple as ruined, profaned and desolated; and this was not the case during the reign of Josiah or at the time of his death. We may, under this view, regard the first two chapters as occupied chiefly with the circumstances of the siege and those immediately following that event. In the third the prophet deplores the calamities and persecutions to which he had himself been exposed; the fourth refers to the ruin and desolation of the city, and the unhappy lot of Zedekiah; and the fifth and last seems to be a sort of prayer in the name, or on behalf, of the Jews in their dispersion and captivity. As Jeremiah himself was eventually compelled to withdraw into Egypt much against his will (Jer. xliii:6), it has been suggested that the last chapter was possibly written there. Pareau refers ch. i to Jer. xxxvii:5, sq.; ch. iii to Jer. xxxviii:2, sq.; ch. iv to Jer. xxxix:1, sq., and 2 Kings xxv:1, sq.; ch. ii to the destruction of the city and temple; ch. v is admitted to be the latest, and to refer to the time after that event. Ewald says that the situation is the same throughout, and only the time different. In ch. i and ii we find sorrow without consolation; ch. iii consolation for the poet himself; in ch. iv the lamentation is renewed with greater violence; but soon the whole people, as if urged by their own spontaneous impulse, fall to weeping and hoping.

Dr. Blayney, regarding both the date and occasation of the Lamentations as established by the internal evidence, adds, 'Nor can we admire too much the flow of that full and graceful pathetic eloquence, in which the author pours out the effusions of a patriotic heart, and piously weeps over the ruins of his venerable country' (Jeremiah p. 376). 'Never,' says an unquestionable judge of these matters, 'was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts, arranged together within so small a compass, nor more happily chosen and applied (Lowth, De Sacra Poesi Hebr. Prælect. xxii.).

In the ancient copies this book is supposed to have occupied the place which is now assigned to it, after Jeremiah. Indeed, from the manner in which Josephus reckons up the books of the Old Testament (Contra Apion. i:8), it has been supposed that Jeremiah and Lamentations originally formed but one book (Prideaux, Connection, i. 332). In the Bible now used by the Jews, however, the book of Lamentations stands in the Hagiographa, and among the five Megilloth, or books of Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song. They believe that it was not written by the gift of prophecy, but by the spirit of God (between which they make a distinction), and give this as a reason for not placing it among the prophets. It is read in their synagogues on the ninth of the month Ab, which is a fast for the destruction of the holy city. (Henderson, Commentary, London, 1851; Noyes, Hebrew Prophets, Boston, 1866; Deutsch, in Kitzo's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit.)

LAMP (lämp), (Heb. לַמְּפָא , lap-peed; whence, perhaps, Gr. $\lambda\alpha\mu\pi\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$, lampas, "lamp," the μ being introduced in place of the Hebrew פ ; Lat. lampas, and our lamp).

(1) Oil Used. Lamps are very often mentioned in Scripture; but there is nothing to give any notion of their form. Almost the only fact we can gather is, that vegetable oils were burnt in them, and especially, if not exclusively, olive-oil. This, of the finest quality, was the oil used in the seven lamps of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvii:20). Although the lamp-oils of the Hebrews were exclusively vegetable, it is probable that animal fat was used, as it is at present by the Western Asiatics, by being placed in a kind of lamp, and burnt by means of a wick inserted in it. This we have often witnessed in districts where oil-yielding plants are not common.

(2) Material and Form. It is somewhat remarkable, that while the golden candlestick, or rather candelabrum, is so minutely described, not a word is said of the shape, or even the material, of the lamps (Exod. xxv:37). This was, perhaps, because they were to be of the common forms, already familiarly known to the Hebrews, and the same probably which were used in Egypt, which they had just quitted. They were in this instance doubtless of gold, although metal is scarcely the best substance for a lamp. The golden candlestick may also suggest, that lamps in ordinary use were placed on stands, and where more than one was required, on stands with two or more branches. The modern Orientals, who are satisfied with very little light in their rooms, use stands of brass or wood, on which to raise the lamps to a sufficient height above the floor on which they sit. Such stands are shaped not unlike a tall candlestick, spreading out at the top. Sometimes the lamps are placed on brackets against the wall, made for the purpose, and often upon stools. Doubtless the same contrivances were employed by the Hebrews.

From the fact that lamps were carried in the pitchers of Gideon's soldiers, from which, at the end of the march, they were taken out, and borne in the hand (Judg. vii:16, 20), we may with certainty infer that they were not, like many of the classical lamps, entirely open at top, but so shaped that the oil could not easily be spilled. This was remarkably the case in the Egyptian specimens, and is not rare in the classical. Gideon's lamps must also have had handles; but that the Hebrew lamps were always furnished with handles we are not bound to infer: in Egypt we find lamps both with and without handles.

Cotton wicks are now used throughout Asia; but the Hebrews, like the Egyptians, probably employed the outer and coarser fiber of flax (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xix:1); and perhaps linen yarn, if the Rabbins are correct in alleging that the linen dresses of the priests were unraveled when old, to furnish wicks for the sacred lamps. (See CANDLESTICK.) contrast implied in the term 'outer' is viewed with reference to the effect produced by sudden expulsion into the darkness of night from a chamber highly illuminated for an entertainment. This custom of burning lamps at night, with the effect produced by their going out or being extinguished, supplies various figures to the sacred writers (2 Sam. xxi:17; Prov. xiii:9; xx:20). And, on the other hand, the keeping up of a lamp's light is used as a symbol of enduring and unbroken succession (1 Kings xi:36; xv:4; Ps. cxxxii:17).

(3) Use at Night. It seems that the Hebrews, like the modern Orientals, were accustomed to burn lamps overnight in their chambers; and this practice may appear to give point to the expression of 'outer darkness,' which repeatedly occurs in the New Testament (Matt. viii:12; xxii:13): the force is greater, however, when the

(4) Use at Marriage Ceremonies. It appears from Matt. xxv:1, that the Jews used lamps and torches in their marriage ceremonies, or rather when the bridegroom came to conduct home the bride by night. This is still the custom in those parts of the East where, on account of the heat of the day, the bridal procession takes place in the night time. The connection of lamps and torches with marriage ceremonies, it may be observed, is still preserved in Western Asia, even where it is no longer usual to bring home the bride by night. During two or three, or more nights preceding the wedding, the street or quarter in which the bridegroom lives is illuminated with chandeliers and lanterns, or with lanterns and small lamps suspended from cords drawn across from the bridegroom's house and several others on each side to the houses opposite; and several small silk flags, each of two colors, generally red and green, are attached to other cords (Lane's Mod. Egypt. i:201). Lamps of this kind are sometimes hung over doors. There is reason to suppose that the Egyptians had lamps of glass, and if so, there is no reason why the Jews also might not have had them, especially as this material is more proper for lamps intended to be hung up, and therefore to cast their light down from above. The Jews certainly used lamps in other festivals besides those of marriage. If this custom had not been so general in the ancient and modern East, it might have been supposed that the Jews adopted it from the Egyptians, who, according to Herodotus (ii:62), had a 'Feast of Lamps,' which was celebrated at Sais, and, indeed, throughout the country at a certain season of the year. The description which the historian gives of the lamps employed on this occasion, strictly applies to those in modern use already described, and the concurrence of both these sources of illustration strengthens the probable analogy of Jewish usage. He speaks of them as 'small vases filled with salt and olive-oil, in which the wick floated, and burnt during the whole night.' It does not indeed appear of what materials these vases were made; but we may reasonably suppose them to have been of glass.

(5) Feast of Lamps. The later Jews had even something like this feast among themselves. A 'Feast of Lamps' was held every year on the twenty-fifth of the month Chisleu. It was founded by Judas Maccabæus in celebration of the restoration of the temple worship (Joseph. Antiq. xii:7, 7), and has ever since been observed by the lighting up of lamps or candles on that day in all the countries of their dispersion (Maimon. Mish. Hashanah, fol. 8). Other Orientals have at this day a similar feast, of which the 'Feast of Lanterns' among the Chinese is, perhaps, the best known (Davis' Chinese, p. 138).

Figurative. (1) God is likened to a lamp; he enlightens, comforts, and honors his people (2 Sam. xxii:29). (2) The seven lamps of the golden candlestick, figured out Jesus and his church, as possessed of the fullness of the Holy Ghost, and of Divine oracles and knowledge (Exod. xxv:37). (3) The Holy Ghost is likened to seven lamps of fire burning before God's throne, to mark the instructive, comforting, heart-warming, and sin-destroying nature of his influence (Rev. iv:5). (4) The seven lamps of the golden candlestick in Zechariah's vision, which received their oil from the bowl or fountain by pipes are a sufficient number of ministers, deriving their light, comfort, gifts, and grace, from Jesus, by the pipes of ordinances, reading the Scriptures, meditation, prayer, and by faith (Zech. iv:2). (5) Christ's eyes of infinite knowledge, and of discovered affection or wrath, are as lamps of fire, most penetrating and pure, and yet how terrible to his enemies (Dan. x:6). (6) The Word of God is a lamp and light: it discovers manifold mysteries; it directs men's course, and comforts their hearts amidst the darkness of this world (Ps. cxix:105). (7) The lamp ordained for God's anointed, is either Jesus, who is the light of the world, and the continued honor of David's family; or it is the gospel, which from age to age maintains the fame and honor of our Redeemer in the world (Ps. cxxxii:17). (8) A profession of religion is called a lamp, it renders men shining and useful, and instructors of others (Matt. xxv:3, 4). (9) Prosperity is a lamp; it renders men cheerful, noted, and glorious (Prov. xiii:9; xx:20). (10) The salvation of the church from her troubles is likened to a "burning lamp"; it is bright and visible, and its effects are instructive and comforting (Is. lxii:1).

LANCE (lâns), (Heb. לַנְּסָה, kee-dohn'), Jer. 1:42; elsewhere "spear." (See ARMS, ARMOR.)

LANCET (lân'sët), (Heb. לַנְּסָה, ro'makh, to hurl). This word is found in 1 Kings xviii:28 only; elsewhere "spear." (See ARMS, ARMOR.)

LAND (lând).

1. The whole continent of the earth, as distinguished from the sea (Matt. xxiii:15).

2. A particular country, especially parts of it which are fit to be plowed (Matt. ix:26; Gen. xxvi:12; Acts iv:37; Matt. xix:29).

3. The inhabitants of a country (Is. xxxvii:11). (See AGRICULTURE.)

Figurative. (1) Canaan is called Immanuel's land, or the Lord's land. It enjoyed the peculiar care, protection, presence, and ordinances of the Redeemer, and in it he long dwelt in our nature (Is. viii:8). It was a land of promise, as given by promise to Abraham and his seed (Heb. xi:9). It was a land of uprightness; as there, men having the oracles of God, ought to have behaved uprightly towards God and man (Is. xxvi:10). It is called a land of unvalled villages, as it seems, the Jews, at their return, in the beginning of the millennium, will not fortify their cities (Ezek. xxxviii:11). (2) Egypt is called a land of trouble and anguish, because there the Hebrews were exceedingly distressed, and it had long been a scene of terrible calamities (Is. xxx:6). (3) Babylon was a land of graven images; because idolatry mightily prevailed in it (Jer. 1:38). (4) The land of the living, is this world, wherein men are before death, and the heavenly state where no death ever enters (Ps. cxvi:9, and xxvii:13). (5) The grave is the land of darkness and of the shadow of death (Job x:21, 22); and of forgetfulness, as men are soon forgotten after they are buried (Ps. lxxxviii:12).

LANDMARK (länd'märk), (Heb. גְּבוּל, or גְּבֻלָּה, gheb-ool'), a mark to designate the boundary of land; a stone, stake, or other monument.

The Mosaic law prohibited the removal of landmarks (Deut. xix:14; xxvii:17, Prov. xxii:28; comp. Job xxiv:2). Landmarks were used in Greece before the age of Homer (Iliad xxi:405). They were held so sacred among the Romans that removal was punished with death. They are still used in Persia and in various parts of the East.

LANE (län). The Greek word πόμνη, hroo'may, street, so rendered in Luke xiv:21, means a narrow alley (comp. Matt. vi:2; Acts ix:11; xii:10), called in A. V. "street."

LANGUAGE (lä'n'gwä'j).

1. Saw-faw' (Heb. סֵפֶת, sef-eth'), a lip, and consequently speech (Gen. xi:1, 6, 7, 9; 2 Kings xviii:26, 28; Neh. xiii:24, etc.).

2. Law-shone' (Heb. לֶשׁוֹן, lesh-o-naw'), lish-shawn' (לֶשׁוֹן), the tongue, and in consequence language or speech (Esth. i:22; iii:12; viii:9; Dan. iii:29, etc.).

3. Law-az' (Heb. נִשְׂאֵה, ni-say-eh'), to speak in a foreign tongue (Ps. cxiv:1); daw-bawv' (דַּבָּר, Ps. xix:3).

4. Dee-al'ek-tos (Gr. διάλεκτος), the language peculiar to any people (Acts i:19; ii:6, 8; xxi:40; xxii:2; xxvi:14). (See TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.)

LANTERN (lä'n'tern), (Gr. φανός, fan-os', shining, hence torch).

This word occurs only in John xviii:3, where the party of men which went out of Jerusalem to apprehend Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane is described as being provided 'with lanterns and torches.' In the article LAMP it has been shown that the Jewish lantern, or, if we may so call it, lamp-frame, was similar to that now in use among the Orientals. As the streets of Eastern towns are not lighted at night, and never were so, lanterns are used to an extent not known among us. Such, doubtless, was also formerly the case; and it is therefore remarkable that the only trace of a lantern which the Egyptian monuments offer, is that in which it seems to be borne by the night watch, or civic guard, and is shaped like those in common use among ourselves. A similar lantern is at this day used in Persia, and perhaps does not materially differ from those mentioned in Scripture. More common at present in Western Asia is a large folding lantern of waxed cloth strained over rings of wire, with a top and bottom of tinned copper. It is usually about two feet long by nine inches in diameter, and is carried by servants before their masters, who often pay visits to their friends at or after supper-time. In many Eastern towns the municipal law forbids any one to be in the streets after nightfall without a lantern.

LAODICEA (la-öd-i-sē'ä), (Gr. Λαοδικεία, lah-od-ik'i-ah, justice of the people).

There were four places of this name, which it may be well to distinguish, in order to prevent them from being confounded with one another. The first was in the western part of Phrygia, on the borders of Lydia; the second, in the eastern part of the same country, denominated Laodicea Combusta; the third, on the coast of Syria, called Laodicea ad Mare, and serving as the port of Aleppo; and the fourth, in the same country, called Laodicea ad Libanum, from its proximity to that mountain. The third of these, that on the coast of Syria, was destroyed by the great earthquake of Aleppo in August, 1822, and at the time of that event was supposed by many to be the Laodicea of Scripture, although in fact not less than four hundred miles from it. But the first named, lying on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia, about forty miles east of Ephesus, is the only Laodicea mentioned in Scripture, and is that one of the 'seven churches in Asia' to which St. John was commissioned to deliver the awful warning contained in Rev. iii:14-19. The fulfilment of this warning is to be sought, as we take it, in the history of the Christian church which existed in that city, and not in the stone and mortar of the city itself; for it is not the city, but 'the church of the Laodiceans,' which is denounced.

Laodicea was the capital of Greater Phrygia, and a very considerable city at the time it was named in Scripture (Strabo, p. 578); but the frequency of earthquakes, to which this district has always been liable, demolished, some ages after, great part of the city, destroyed many of the inhabitants, and eventually obliged the remainder to abandon the spot altogether. Laodicea is now a deserted place, called by the Turks Eski-hissar (Old Castle). From its ruins, Laodicea seems to have been situated upon six or seven hills, taking up a large extent of ground. To the north and north-east runs the river Lycus, about a mile and a half distant; but nearer it is watered by two small streams, the Asopus and Caprus, the one to the west, and the other to the south-east, both passing into the Lycus, which last flows into the Mæander (Smith, p. 85). Laodicea preserves great remains of its importance as the residence of the Roman governors of Asia under the emperors; namely, a stadium, in uncommon preservation, three theaters, one of which is 450 feet in diameter, and the ruins of several other buildings (Antiq. of Ionia, pt. ii. p. 32; Chandler's Asia Minor, c. 67).

LAODICEA, CHURCH AT (la-öd-i-sē'ä, church).

From the passages, Coloss. iv:16; Rev. iii:14, it appears that a Christian church was established at Laodicea by the Apostles. From the epistle to the Colossians iv:15, 16, it would seem that St. Paul himself never visited the church.

LAODICEANS (la-öd'i-sē-anz), inhabitants of LAODICEA (Col. iv:16; Rev. iii:14).

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO (la-öd-i-sē'anz, ē-pis'tl). In Col. iv:16 Paul desires that the epistle from Laodicea "be read at Colosse." (See COL- OSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.)

LAP (läp), (Heb. לָפַד, beh'ged, 2 Kings iv:39, a garment; לָפֶת, khake, Prov. xvi:33, the bosom; לָפֶן, kho'tsen, bosom, Neh. v:13; in Is. xlix:22, the Hebrew is translated armsful). A fold of the garment used by Orientals as a pocket.

The psalmist offered the prayer, "render unto our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom their reproach" (Ps. lxxix:12). The same allusion occurs in the Savior's direction, "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom" (Luke vi:38). (See BOSOM; DRESS.)

vinous fawn color, and further embellished with a beautiful fan-shaped crest of the same color, tipped with white and black. Its appellations in all languages appear to be either imitations of the bird's voice or indications of its filthy habits; which, however, modern ornithologists deny, or do not notice. In Egypt these birds are numerous, forming, probably, two species, the one permanently resident about human habitations, the other migratory, and the same that visits Europe. The latter wades in the mud when the Nile has subsided, and seeks for worms and insects; and the former is known to rear its young so much immersed in the shards and fragments of beetles, etc., as to cause a disagreeable smell about its nest, which is always in holes or in hollow trees. Though an unclean bird in the Hebrew law, the common migratory hoopoe is eaten in Egypt, and Laodicea.

LAPPED, LAPPETH (läpt, läp'ëth), (Heb. לָפַד, law-kak', to lick up as a dog, 1 Kings xxi:19, etc.). Lapping was the test of Gideon's men (Judg. vii:5, 6), and is still in the East supposed to be an evidence of promptitude for active service. (See GIDEON.)

LAPWING (läp'wîng), in our version, is used for Heb. דוּכֵיפֶת, doo-kee-fath', a word which, occurring only in Lev. xi:19, Deut. xiv:18, affords no internal or collateral evidence to establish the propriety of the translation.

It has been surmised to mean double-crest; which is sufficiently correct when applied to the hoopoe; but less so when applied to the lapwing, or the cock of the woods, Tetrao Urogallus. The hoopoe is not uncommon in Palestine at this day, and was from remote ages a bird of mystery. The end of the augural rod is said to have been carved in the form of a hoopoe's head; and one of the kind is still used by Indian gosseins, and even Armenian bishops, attention being no doubt drawn to the bird by its peculiarly arranged black and white bars upon a delicate sometimes also in Italy; but the stationary species is considered inedible. C. H. S.

LARGE (läj), (Heb. רָחֵב, raw-khawb', roving in every direction). Assyria was a large or extensive country, or place, (Is. xxii:18; Hos. iv:16).

David was set in a large place, or room, when he had great liberty and comfort, and was advanced to extensive power and authority (Ps. xviii:19; xxxi:8, and cxviii:5).

Gr. ἰκανός, hik-an-os', (Matt. xxviii:12), an ample present of money. "They gave large money to the soldiers."

LASCIVIOUSNESS (läs-sív-ÿ-üs-nës), (Gr. ἀσελγεία, as-elg'i-a, that which excites disgust), unbridled lust, licentiousness, wantonness.

It includes everything tending to promote or fulfill fleshly lusts; and to give over one's self to it, is to delight in, and practice it, without shame or remorse (Matt. xv:19; Rom. xiii:13; Gal. v:19; Eph. iv:19). To turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, is to use his kindness declared in the gospel as an encouragement in impurity (Jude 4).

LASEA (la-sē'ā), (Gr. Λασαλα, las-ah'yah), derivation not known, a city of Crete near Fair Havens (Acts xxvii:8). The name is still given to some ruins a few miles east of Fair Havens. (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, App. iii. pp. 262, 263).

LASHA (lā'shā), (Heb. לַשָּׁה, leh'shak), a boundary town of southeast Palestine (Gen. x:19), mentioned by Moses in describing the land of Canaan.

The Chaldee and Jerome take this to be the place Callirrhœ, east of the Dead Sea, where are warm springs, but this cannot be confirmed. It may even be the city of Lasha, Lusa, or Elusa, at nearly an equal distance between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea. Ptolemy mentions this city of Lusa, as do Stephens the geographer, and Josephus. If identified with Callirrhœ as above, the stream from Callirrhœ, now called the Zerka Mæin, enters the Dead Sea at the eastern side, about eleven miles in a direct line from the mouth of the Jordan. The springs are about three miles up the stream.

LASHARON (la-shā'ron), (Heb. לַשָּׁרוֹן, lash-shaw-rone'), the plain of Sharon, a town of Canaan, whose king Joshua killed (Josh. xii:18); possibly the same as LASHA (Gen. x:19).

LAST DAY. See JUDGMENT.

LASTHENES (lās'the-nēz), (Gr. Λασθένης, Lasthen'ace, 1 Macc. xi:32), an officer who stood high in the favor of Demetrius II Nicator.

LAST TIME. See ESCHATOLOGY.

LATCHET (läch'tēt), (Heb. לַחֲשֵׁת, ser-oke', a binding together), the fastening by which the sandal was held to the foot (Is. v:27; Mark i:7; Luke iii:16; John i:27).

Figurative. It is a proverbial expression for anything of little value (Gen. xiv:23). It is expressive of tightness and durability (Is. v:27). The expression in Matt. iii:11 (comp. Mark i:7; Luke iii:16; John i:27) alludes to slaves who were employed to loosen and carry their masters' shoes.

LATIN (lät'in), the vernacular language of the ancient Romans, now a dead language, but in part employed as a medium of learned intercourse between the educated of civilized nations (John xix:20).

LATTICE (lät'tis), (Heb. לַטִּיטִים, esh-nawb'), used much in the East in windows to screen the inmates and at the same time admit the air (Judg.v:28, "casement;" Prov. vii:6; Cant. ii:9; 2 Kings i:2). (See HOUSE.)

LAUD (lad), (Gr. ἐπαινώ, ep-ahē-neh'o), to praise, extol (Rom. xv:11).

LAUGHTER (läf'tēr), (Heb. לַחֲשֵׁת, tsekh-oke'; פֶּלֶשׁ, saw-khak'; Gr. *γέλω*s, ghel'oce). Laughter in Scripture expresses as regards men:

1. Their rejoicing in the blessings promised to or possessed by them, and in their divine security from the calamities of famine, pestilence, etc. (Gen. xvii:17; xxi:6; Job v:22; Luke vi:21).

2. Their sinful mirth, their doubt of God's fulfillment of his promise, or their derision and mockery of other men (Gen. xviii:12, 13; Luke vi:25; Job xxix:24).

3. Conscious security (Job v:22).

4. When predicated of God it means that he disregards their trouble and contemns their opposition (Job ix:23; Ps. ii:4, and xxxvii:13; Prov. i:26).

5. Mockery, folly (Prov. xiv:13; Eccl. ii:2; vii:6).

LAVER (lā'vēr), (Heb. כִּיֹּר and כִּיֹּר, kee-yore', something round, a basin; Sept. λουτρόν, loo-tron'), a basin to contain the water used by the priests in their ablutions during their sacred ministrations.

Molten Sea or Great Laver.

(1) Tabernacle Laver. There was one of brass (fabricated out of the metal mirrors which the women brought from Egypt, Exod. xxxviii:8). It had a 'foot' or base, which, from the manner in which 'the laver and its foot' are mentioned, must have been a conspicuous feature, and was perhaps separable from the basin itself for the purpose of removal. We are not informed of the size or shape of this laver; but it appears to have been large. It stood between the altar of burnt-offerings and the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxx:18-21; xl:30-32). The water of this laver seems to have served the double purpose of washing the parts of the sacrifices, and the hands and feet of the priests.

(2) Temple Lavens. But in the temple of Solomon, when the number of both priests and victims had greatly increased, ten lavers were used for the sacrifices, and the molten sea for the personal ablutions of the priests (2 Chron. iv:6). These lavers are more minutely described than that of the tabernacle. So far as can be made out from the description, they consisted of a square base or stand mounted upon rollers or wheels, and adorned with figures of palm-trees, cherubim, lions, and oxen. The stand doubtless formed a hollow basin for receiving the water which fell from the laver itself, and which appears to have been drawn from it by means of cocks (1 Kings vii:27-39).

(a) Form and Capacity. The form of the lavers is not mentioned; but it is stated that each of them contained forty baths, or, according to the usual computation, about 300 English gallons.

(b) Brazen Sea. Solomon made a huge laver supported by twelve brazen or copper oxen, with their heads pointing three and three to the four cardinal points; this was for the priests to wash at, and was called the brazen sea (1 Kings vii:22-44; 2 Chron. iv.). From the manner in which the bases of the lavers are described, it is evident that they were regarded as admirable works of art; but it is difficult to follow out the details which are given. This is evinced by the great discrepancy in the different figures, drawn from the descriptions which are given by Lamy, Calmet, and Villalpandus.

(3) Second Temple Laver. In the second temple there appears to have been only one laver. Of its size or shape we have no information, but it was probably like those of Solomon's temple.

LAW (lā), (Heb. תּוֹרָה, to-rarw'; Gr. νόμος, nom'-os, custom, law), means a rule of conduct enforced by an authority superior to that of the moral beings to whom it is given.

1. Expressive of Moral Connection. The word law is sometimes also employed in order to express not only the moral connection between free agents of an inferior and others of a superior power, but also in order to express the nexus causalis, the connection between cause and effect in inanimate nature. However, the expression, law of nature, lex naturæ, is improper and figurative. In a wider sense the word νόμος, 'law,' is employed in order to express any guiding or directing power, originating from the nature of anything existing. The apostolic use of the word has been well expressed by Claudius Guiliand in his work, In Omnes Pauli Epistolas Collatio, p. 21. Law is a certain power restraining from some, and impelling to other things or actions. Whatever has such a power, and exercises any sway over man, may be called law, in a metaphorical sense.

2. Mosaical Law. If, however, the word νόμος, 'law,' alone is used, it is almost invariably equivalent to the law of Moses. The law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch. In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers there is perceptible some arrangement of the various precepts, although they are not brought into a system. In Deuteronomy the law or legislation contained in the three preceding books is repeated with slight modifications. The whole legislation has for its manifest object, to found a theocratical hierarchy. In the Mosaical hierarchy the aim is manifest, viz. to make that which is really holy (τὸ ἅγιον) prevail. In the Mosaical legislation the priests certainly exercise a considerable authority as external ministers of holiness; but we find nothing to be compared with the sale of indulgences in the Roman Catholic church.

(1) Taxation by Tithe. Almost the whole amount of taxation was paid in the form of tithe, which was employed in maintaining the priests and Levites as the hierarchical office-bearers of government, in supporting the poor, and in providing those things which were used in sacrifices and sacrificial feasts.

The taxation by tithe, exclusive of almost all other taxes, is certainly the most lenient and most considerate which has ever anywhere been adopted or proposed. It precludes the possibility of attempting to extort from the people contributions beyond their power, and it renders the taxation of each individual proportionate to his possessions; and even this exceedingly mild taxation was apparently left to the conscience of each person. This we infer from there never occurring in the Bible the slightest vestige either of persons having been sued or goods distrained for tithes, and only an indication of curses resting upon the neglect of paying them.

(2) Poll Tax. Besides the tithes there was a small poll-tax, amounting to half a shekel for each adult male. This tax was paid for the maintenance of the sanctuary. In addition to this, the first-fruits and the firstborn of men and cattle augmented the revenue. The firstborn of men and of unclean beasts were to be redeemed by money. To this may be added some fines paid in the shape of sin-offerings, and also the vows and freewill offerings.

(3) Further Development. The Mosaical legislation is the further development of the covenant between Jehovah and Abraham. It is a politico-religious institution given to a nation of freeholders. The fundamental laws of this constitution are:

(1) Jehovah alone is God, and the invisible King of the nation (comp. Josephus, Contra Apionem, ii, 16).

(2) The nation is the peculiar property of Jehovah, its King; and it is therefore bound to avoid all uncleanness, as well moral as physical defilement, which must result from intermixture with foreign nations who are not subjects of the theocracy. A confederacy with these nations is accordingly forbidden (Exod. xxiii:32; xxxiv:12).

(3) The whole territory of the state was to be so distributed that each family should have a freehold, which was intended to remain permanently the inheritance of this family, and which, even if sold, was to return at stated periods to its original owners. Since the whole population consisted of families of freeholders, there were, strictly speaking, neither citizens, nor a profane or lay-nobility, nor lords temporal. We do not overlook the fact that there were persons called heads, elders, princes, dukes, or leaders among the Israelites; that is, persons who by their intelligence, character, wealth, and other circumstances, were leading men among them, and from whom even the seventy judges were chosen, who assisted Moses in administering justice to the nation.

(4) Even the inhabitants of towns were freeholders, and their exercise of trade seems to have been combined with, or subordinate to, agricultural pursuits. The only nobility was that of the tribe of Levi, and all the lords were lords spiritual, the descendants of Aaron. The priests and Levites were ministers of public worship, that is, ministers of Jehovah the King; and as such, ministers of state, by whose instrumentality the legislative as well as the judicial power was exercised. The poor were mercifully considered, but beggars are never mentioned. Hence it appears that as, on the one hand, there was no lay nobility, so, on the other, there was no mendicity. We learn from the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews (ix:16, 17), that the Jews disposed of property by wills; but it seems that in the times of Moses, and for some period after him, all Israelites died intestate. However, the word διαθήκη, as used in Matthew, Mark, Acts, Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, and repeatedly in the Hebrews, implies rather a disposition, arrangement, agreement between parties, than a will in the legal acceptance of the term.

(5) There are no laws concerning guardians, and none against luxurious living. The inefficiency of sumptuary laws is now generally recognized, although renowned legislators in ancient times, and in the middle ages, displayed on this subject their wisdom falsely so called. Neither are there any laws against suicide. Hence we infer that suicide was rare, as we may well suppose in a nation of small freeholders, and that the inefficiency of such laws was understood.

(6) The Mosaical legislation recognizes the human dignity of women and of slaves, and particularly enjoins not to slander the deaf nor mislead the blind.

(7) The laws of Moses against crimes are severe, but not cruel. The agony of the death of criminals was never artificially protracted.

(8) Moses expressly enjoined not to reap the corners of fields, in consideration of the poor, of persons of broken fortunes, and even of the beasts of the field.

(9) Punishments were inflicted, in order specially to express the sacred indignation of the Divine Lawgiver against willful transgression of his commandments, and not for any purposes of human vengeance, or for the sake of frightening other criminals.

(10) In lawsuits very much was left to the discretion of the judges, whose position greatly resembled that of a permanent jury, who had not merely to decide whether a person was guilty, but who frequently had also to award the amount of punishment to be inflicted.

(11) In some instances the people at large were appealed to, in order to inflict summary punishment by stoning the criminal to death. This was in fact the most usual mode of execution. Other modes of execution, also, such as burning, were always public, and conducted with the cooperation of the people.

(12) In the Old Testament we do not hear of a learned profession of the law. Lawyers (νομικοί) are mentioned only after the decline of the Mosaic institutions had considerably advanced. As, however, certain laws concerning contagion and purification were administered by the priests, these might be called lawyers. They, however, did not derive their maintenance from the administration of these laws, but were supported by glebe-lands, tithes, and portions of the sacrificial offerings. It is, indeed, very remarkable, that in a nation so entirely governed by law, there were no lawyers forming a distinct profession, and that the νομ-ι-κοί, lawyers, of a later age were not so much remarkable for enforcing the spirit of the law, as rather for ingeniously evading its injunctions, by leading the attention of the people from its spirit to a most minute literal fulfillment of its letter.

(13) The present article is, of course, closely interwoven with the contents of a number of others which in this Encyclopædia have preceded, or which follow it in alphabetical order, such as ADULTERY, BLOOD-REVENGE, DECALOGUE, DEUTERONOMY, DIVORCE, EXODUS, GOSPEL, LEVITICUS, MARRIAGE, MOSES, MURDER, PENTATEUCH, ROBBERY, SABBATH, SLAVE, THEFT, etc. It is, indeed, both unnecessary and impracticable to exhaust in this place all that might with propriety be brought under the head of Law. We therefore make no such attempt, but refer our readers to the cognate articles for further information. The chief point here to be considered, is the authority ascribed in the Bible itself to law in general, and to Biblical law in particular. The misconceptions on this subject prevalent in the religious world are the more surprising, since many distinguished ecclesiastical teachers of various periods, and among these St. Augustine of the fourth and fifth, and the Reformers of the sixteenth century, have stated the Biblical doctrine respecting the law with particular clearness.

3. Authority. Christ and the apostles express themselves respecting the authority of the law so variously that in order to reconcile their apparent contradictions, the divines of various Christian denominations have usually felt themselves compelled to distinguish between different portions of the law, some of which, they assert, were abolished by Christ, while they maintain that others were established by him. Against this convenient mode of overcoming the difficulty the following observations may be adduced:

(1) Neither Christ nor the apostles ever distinguish between the moral, the ceremonial, and the civil law, when they speak of its establishment or its abolition.

(2) They even clearly indicate that the moral law is by no means excepted when they speak of the abolition of the law in general. Thus, for instance, St. Paul, after having stated that the law is not incumbent upon the righteous, guards us against misunderstanding him, as if this referred to the ceremonial law alone; for he specifies various transgressors to whom the law is given, and who are restrained by the same. The transgressors mentioned by St. Paul are not those of the ceremonial, but of the moral law (1 Tim. i:8-10).

(3) In order to reconcile the apparent contradictions between the various dicta of the New Testament concerning the authority of the law, we must not commence, as is usually done, namely, by distinguishing the matter of the law, but the form of manner in which it is binding or obligatory. He who said that not a jot nor a tittle of the law should perish until all things were fulfilled, certainly could not mean that more than two-thirds of the law were abolished, but intended forcibly to express the idea that, in a certain sense, by his instrumentality, the whole law, without any exception, had obtained an increased authority. We, therefore, conceive that in order to reconcile the apparent, but merely apparent, contradictions of the New Testament, we must distinguish not so much the various materials, ritual, civil, and moral, of which the law is composed, as the various manners in which its modus obligandi may exist.

(4) The authority which other beings may exercise upon us is twofold; it is either nomothetical or didactical. The nomothetical authority, which a book, or the living voice of another moral being may exercise upon us, is either such that it precludes the exercise of our own judgment, like that which Pythagoras is said to have exercised upon his disciples, who were in the habit of settling all their disputes, as by a final reason from which there was no appeal, by αὐτὸς ἔφα, he has said so; or the authority is such as to excite the faculties of the listener, so that he perceives the necessity of the truth communicated. In this last case the authority exercised is not nomothetical, but didactical.

(5) So it was also with the human race at large: it was necessary that the law of Moses should exercise nomothetical authority by 'Cursed is he who does not continue in the words of this law.' And so it is now with a great portion of Christian religionists, who still require frightful curses and opposite benedictions somewhat similar to those formerly pronounced on the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, in order to keep them in the right direction. But the assertion of this nomothetical authority was not the ultimate aim of Christ. His most intimate disciple, whom he especially loved, states strikingly, Ὅτι ὁ νόμος διὰ Μωσέως ἐδόθη ἡ χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐγένετο, For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

(6) It is a fact that Christ did not give new laws, but only new motives for keeping the moral precepts more or less clearly known to Jews and Gentiles, by making it a prominent doctrine, that love is due to God and to men in general, even to our enemies, and that intentions are of greater moral importance than outward acts.

(7) The characteristic of the doctrine of Christ does not consist in new laws given, but rather in the forgiveness offered for past transgressions, and in the guidance of the Holy Spirit promised to his true disciples. The authority of this Holy Spirit is described in the Gospel of John, and in the Epistle to the Romans, as superior to the letter of the law. Whosoever is filled with this Spirit is not under the law, although he fulfills the holy aim and intention of the law. The true disciple of Christ, if asked, Why did you not kill such or such a person? cannot answer, Because it is written, 'Thou shalt do no murder.' Christians feel that they are filled with a spirit which prevents them from desiring the commission of crimes.

(8) It is very surprising that the clear perception of the true source of the law, which was fulfilled even by its abrogation, could have been so effectually obscured as is done by the doctrine current in the religious world concerning the abolition of its civil and ceremonial, and the establishment of its moral precepts. The whole aim and scope of the Mosaical legislation have been established as much as the aim of temporary police regulations, enacted in order to meet the emergencies of a commonwealth during a period of rebellion, is established and fulfilled by him who restores perfect peace and public tranquillity, although the natural consequence of this peace is, that those regulations cease to be in force. On the other hand, although the Christian, who is under the guidance of a spirit leading him into all truth, cannot be led by this spirit to the commission of any crime contrary to the moral precepts of Moses, it cannot be said, that by not committing murder and adultery, he obeys the Mosaical law, any more than that he obeys the injunctions of the Code Napoleon, in these particular instances.

4. Various Meanings Of. Some think that by laws, precepts, or commandments, in the books of Moses, is meant the moral law; by statutes, the ceremonial, and that by judgments the judicial laws are signified; but this observation will not always hold. It is certain, that by law, commandment, precept, statute, and judgment, used in this signification, is often meant one and the same thing. (1) The name law, or commandment, may denote a thing as the will of a superior; statute, represents it as ordained and established by high authority; judgment represents it as full of wisdom, and as the standard by which God will judge men. (2) Those passages of Scripture which require any good quality in us, or good work to be performed by us, are the law in a strict sense (John i:17). (3) The ten commandments are called the law, or commandment; nay, sometimes the last six are so called (James ii:11; Rev. xxii:14; Rom. ii:25, and vii:7, 8, xiii:8). (4) The commandment of loving one another, is old, as it was contained in the moral law ever since the creation; and it is new, as enjoined afresh by our Savior, as exemplified in his life, and enforced with the new motive of his dying love (John ii:7, 8, and xiii:14). (5) The whole constitution of the covenant between God and the Hebrews, and the rites of worship thereto belonging are called a "law," or "law of ordinances," and a "carnal commandment;" as, by the authority of God, so many rites, especially relating to carnal sacrifices, washings, and the like, were therein required (Eph. ii:15; Heb. x:1; vii:16). (6) The five books of Moses are called "the law," as they abound with the requirements and prohibitions of God (Mal. iv:4; Matt. v:17); and, for the same reason, the Old Testament is called "a law" (John x:34; xv:25; 1 Cor. xiv:21). (7) The whole word of God is called "a law," "statutes," etc., as it is the sole rule of our faith and practice (Ps. i:2; xix:7, 8). (8) The doctrines of the gospel are called "a law," and the "law of faith;" they teach and instruct men, and when believed by faith, they strongly influence to holy obedience (Is. ii:3; xlii:4; Rom. iii:27), and they are a "perfect law of liberty," proclaim a perfect deliverance and redemption to us through the blood of God's Son, and prompt to a kindly and free obedience to him; or this perfect "law of liberty" may be taken for the law as a rule in the hand of Christ, which is pleasant to his followers (James i:25; ii:12).

(9) The commandments and word of God are a "law ordained to life," and are "statutes of life." In believing and obeying these, we receive or possess life temporal and spiritual, and are prepared for life eternal (Ezek. xxxiii:15; Rom. vii:10). (10) One is "without the law," when not under the ceremonial law, or not bound by the law (1 Cor. ix:21); or when he is without the knowledge of it, and destitute of the experience of its convincing power on the conscience (Rom. ii:12; vii:8, 9); or when they have not the word of God revealed to them (Rom. ii:14). (11) Those "under the law," are either Jews under the ceremonial, or sinners under the broken covenant, or saints under the law as a rule. (12) "The law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ;" the ceremonial law pointed him out, and led to him as the end and antitype of all its rites (Gal. iii:24). "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes free from the law of sin and death," whether death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal (Rom. viii:2). (13) The principle of grace in the saints is called the "law of their mind;" influenced by the views of God in Christ, it reigns, and determines the soul to obedience. (14) The principle of corruption in men is called the "law of sin," as it is altogether sinful; and determines to sinful thoughts, words, and actions; and it is called "the law in the members," as though dislodged from its throne in the heart, it continues strongly to actuate the powers of the soul, and members of the body, to what is impure and wicked (Rom. vii:23, 25). (15) The "law" may sometimes denote men's observance of God's commandments, as that corresponds to the law imposed in the Scripture, or impressed on the heart (Rom. iii:21; Gal. iii:11; Phil. iii:6, 9).

5. Literature. Compare beside Johann David Michaelis, Mosaisches Recht, translated by Alexander Smith, under the title, Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, by the late John David Michaelis, London, 1814; Josephus, Contra Apionem, ii, 16, sq.; Mosaicarum et Romanarum legum collatio, referred usually to the fifth century; Jos. Priestley, Comparison of the Law of Moses with those of the Hindoos, etc.; Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis.

LAW, CEREMONIAL (la s'er'-e-mō'nī-al).

(1) The ceremonial law regulated the office and conduct of Priests, Levites, Nethinims, Nazarites, and of circumcision, feasts, offerings, tabernacle, temple, and utensils thereof, vows, purifications, etc. (See the articles on the above subjects.)

(2) In respect of observance, this law was a heavy yoke, and partition wall; but in respect of the signification of its ceremonies, it was an obscure gospel (Gal. v:1; Eph. ii:14; Col. ii:17). (See LAW.)

LAWFUL (Gr. ἔστω, ex'es-tee), agreeable to law.

"All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient;" the apostle means that it is lawful, simply considered, to eat any kind of provision; but to eat of meat sacrificed to idols, might, in special circumstances, be injurious to weak consciences, and ought to be avoided (1 Cor. vi:12). In his trance, Paul heard things which were not "lawful to be uttered;" so mysterious and grand, that it was not proper to declare them to men in their embodied state, as they could not be profited thereby, or more truly they were beyond the power of earthly language to express (2 Cor. xii:4).

LAWGIVER (Heb. מְשִׁיבֵי, meh-kho-kake'; Gr. νομοθέτης, nom-oth-et'ace), one who prescribes laws.

God or Christ is a "Lawgiver;" his sovereign will is the infallible rule of our conduct; and he has prescribed laws to us in his word (Is. xxxiii:22; James iv:12); and he alone is the Lord of our conscience, the simple expression of his will binds it to obedience, and his laws are subject to no examination, being absolutely supreme and infallible. Moses was a "lawgiver;" by him God gave his system of laws to the Hebrews; the law is called his, and he is said to give its commandments (Num. xxi:18; Deut. xxxiii:21). David and his successors in rule are called "lawgivers;" they had power of enacting laws for the civil government of the Hebrew nation (Gen. xlix:10; Ps. lx:7).

LAW, JUDICIAL.

(1) Regulations. The judicial law regulated the affairs of their kings, judges, fields, marriages, punishments, etc. Some laws relative to redeemers, murders, adultery, cities of refuge, malefactors, strangers, etc., seem to have been partly ceremonial and partly judicial.

(2) Preservation of the Laws. Great care was taken to preserve the knowledge of the divine law. Besides the table of the ten commandments deposited in the ark, a copy of the books of Moses was laid up somewhere in the side of the ark. The Jews say that every tribe had a copy of it. From this, other copies were taken. Every king was obliged to transcribe one for himself. The whole law was to be publicly read over at the feast of tabernacles, in the year of release, besides the reading of it on other public occasions. Nay, they were required to have it written on their hearts, and to teach it diligently unto their children (Deut. xvii and xxxi:9-19; vi and x). To this day the Jews have the utmost regard for their law, reading in the ancient manner so much of it every Sabbath, in their synagogues. The book of it publicly used, is written with the greatest exactness, and is carefully preserved from everything tending to defile it. (See LAW; TRADITION.) (W. Smith, The Pentateuch; Martensen, Christian Ethics, i, vol. i; Hodge, Sys. Theol., vol. iii.)

LAW OF MOSES (Heb. הַתּוֹרָה מֹשֶׁה, to-law' Mo-sheh'), signifies the whole body of Mosaic legislation.

The moral law was most solemnly proclaimed by God himself, after a terrible thunder, lightning, and earthquake, and from the midst of the flames of fire; and was divided into ten precepts, written by God himself upon two tables of stone. Four of these respect our duty to God, and were written on the first, which, in sum require our loving him as the Lord our God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength; six were written on the second, which in sum require our loving our neighbor as ourselves (Exod. xix, xx, xxxii and xxxiv; Matt. xxii:37-39). (1) More particularly, the first commandment requires that God alone should, both in heart and life, be acknowledged, worshiped, and glorified, as the true God, and our God; and that all Atheism, profaneness, and idolatry, be abstained from. (2) The second requires that all the ordinances of worship instituted by God in his word, should be received, observed, and kept pure and entire; and all carnal conceptions of God, all idolatry and superstition, and monuments, or occasions thereof be detested. (3) The third requires that God's names, titles, attributes, ordinances, words, and works should be, under the severest penalties, used only in a holy and reverent manner. (4) The fourth requires that whatever times God has appointed in his word, particularly one whole day in seven, be carefully observed in spiritual exercises, as holy to the Lord. (5) The fifth requires the preservation of honor, and performance of relative duties between parents and children, husbands and wives, masters and servants, magistrates and subjects, ministers and people; and, in fine, between superiors and inferiors, in age, station, gifts, or grace; and between equals, one to another. (6) The sixth requires that all lawful endeavors shall be used to promote and preserve the life of ourselves and others, temporal, spiritual, or eternal; and prohibits all malice, envy, murder, angry words, drunkenness, and every thing else tending to the hurt of soul or body. (7) The seventh prohibits all kinds of whoredom, fornication, adultery, incest, bestiality, self-defilement, and other uncleanness, and every thing in heart speech, or behavior, tending thereto. (8) The eighth requires, that every thing lawful be done to promote our own and our neighbor's outward estate; and all dishonesty, stealing, robbery, extortion, oppression, sacrilege, etc., be detested. (9) The ninth requires that the utmost care be taken to maintain and preserve truth, and our own and our neighbor's good name; and prohibits all falsehood, lying, dissimulation, flattery, railing, or reproachful language. (10) The tenth prohibits the very root of wickedness in the heart, and first motions thereof, and all discontentment, envy, and inordinate affection towards our neighbor or anything that is his. (See DECALOGUE; LAW.)

LAWYER (la'yēr), (Gr. νομικός, nom-ik-os', according to law), a term used to signify one who is conversant with the law. An interpreter of the law, a jurist, as in Tit. iii:13.

When, therefore, one is called a lawyer, this is understood with reference to the laws of the land in which he lived, or to which he belonged. Hence among the Jews a lawyer was one versed in the laws of Moses, which he taught in the schools and synagogues (Matt. xxii:35; Luke x:25; xi:45; xiv:3). The same person who is called 'a lawyer' in these texts, is in the parallel passage (Mark xii:28) called a scribe (grammatos); whence it has been inferred that the functions of the lawyers and the scribes were identical. The individual may have been both a lawyer and a scribe; but it does not thence follow that all lawyers were scribes. Some suppose, however, that the 'scribes' were the public expounders of the law, while the 'lawyers' were the private expounders and teachers of it. But this is a mere conjecture; and nothing more is really known than that the 'lawyers' were expounders of the law, whether publicly or privately, or both. Among the Jews the lawyers were generally enemies to our Savior in the days of his flesh, rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and were condemned by him for binding heavier burdens on others than they themselves chose to bear.

LAY (lā), (Heb, שָׁבַע, seem).

1. (Job xli:26). "If one lay at him with the sword," hence to lay at or to strike at; also to lay out and to lay away.

2. (Josh. ii:1). "They came into the house . . . and lay there," R. V., i. e., to lodge or dwell.

LAYING ON OF HANDS.

An act symbolizing dedication to a special purpose. The Israelites placed their hands on the heads of the Levites, dedicating them to the service of the Lord at the tabernacle in the stead of the firstborn of all the tribes. They pressed down their hands upon the heads of the Levites, doubtless with the intention of signifying thereby that with God's permission and by his authority, they transferred their own obligation to service to the Levites (Num. viii:5-20). The Israelite, who brought an animal to the sacrificial altar, placed his hands upon the victim's head, thereby dedicating it to God and making it his own representative and substitute (Lev. i:4; xvi:21). The aged Jacob laid his hands on the heads of Joseph's sons, giving them a place among his own sons, and bestowing upon them the covenant blessing, transferring it from himself as its past possessor to them (Gen. xlviii:5-20). The hands of presbytery were laid upon the head of Timothy. The young man was thereby set apart to official service and grace was bestowed (1 Tim. iv:14). Imposition of the hands of presbytery denoted not only commission, but also the bestowal, by those divinely authorized, of official spiritual grace; or at least it signified the authoritative recommendation of the candidate to God as a recipient of grace. (Davis, Bib. Dict.) (See IMPOSITION OF HANDS; PRESBYTER; PRESBYTERY.)

LAZARUS (láz'a-rūs), (Gr. Λάζαρος, lad'zar-os), an abridged form of the Hebrew name Eleazer.

1. An inhabitant of Bethany, brother of Mary and Martha, who was honored with the friendship of Jesus, by whom he was raised from the dead after he had been four days in the tomb. This great miracle is minutely described in John xi. The credit which Christ obtained among the people by this illustrious act, of which the life and presence of Lazarus afforded a standing evidence, induced the Sanhedrim, in plotting against Jesus, to contemplate the destruction of Lazarus also (John xii:10). Whether they accomplished this object or not we are not informed; but the probability seems to be that when they had satiated their malice on Christ they left Lazarus unmolested. According to an old tradition in Epiphanius (Hær., lxvi:34, p. 652), Lazarus was thirty years old when restored to life, and lived thirty years after. (See Ellicott, Life of Christ; Watson, Lazarus of Bethany.)

2. A beggar represented in the parable of Dives as abjectly poor (Luke xvi:20-25).

LEAD (léd), (Heb. לֵפָרָה, o-feh'reth), a well-known metal, the first Scriptural notice of which occurs in the triumphal song in which Moses celebrates the overthrow of Pharaoh, whose host is there said to have 'sunk like lead' in the waters of the Red Sea (Exod. xv:10).

Before the use of quicksilver was known, lead was used for the purpose of purifying silver, and separating it from other mineral substances (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxii:31). To this Jeremiah alludes where he figuratively describes the corrupt condition of the people: 'In their fire the lead is consumed (in the crucible); the smelting is in vain, for the evil is not separated' (Jer. vi:20). Ezekiel (xxii:18-22) refers to the same fact, and for the same purpose, but amplifies it with greater minuteness of detail. Compare also Mal. iii:2, 3.

Job (xix:23, 24) expresses a wish that his words were engraven 'with an iron pen and lead.' These words are commonly supposed to refer to engraving on a leaden tablet; and it is undeniable that such tablets were anciently used as a writing material (Pausan. ix:31; Plin. Hist. Nat. xiii:11). But our authorized translators, by rendering 'an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever,' seem to have entertained the same view with Rosenmüller, who supposes that molten lead was to be poured into letters sculptured on stone with an iron chisel, in order to raise the inscription.

Although the Hebrew weights were usually of stone, and are indeed called 'stones,' a leaden weight denominated anach, which is the Arabic word for lead, occurs in Amos vii:7, 8. In Acts xxvii:28, a plummet for taking soundings at sea is mentioned, and this was of course of lead.

The ancient uses of lead in the East seem to have been very few, nor are they now numerous. One may travel far in western Asia without discovering any trace of this metal in any of the numerous useful applications which it is made to serve in European countries.

We are not aware that any trace of lead has yet been found within the limits of Palestine. But ancient lead-mines, in some of which the ore has been exhausted by working, have been discovered by Mr. Burton in the mountains between the Red Sea and the Nile; and lead is also said to exist at a place called Sheff, near Mount Sinai.

LEAF, LEAVES (lēf, lēvz'), (Heb. אָלֶף, aw-leh', a coming up).

Figurative. This word is used either in the singular or plural in three different senses symbolically.

(1) Of Trees (Gen. viii:11; Is. i:30; vi:13; Matt. xxi:19; Mark xi:13; xiii:28, etc).

(2) Of Doors (Heb. צַיִל, tsay-law', a side), (1 Kings vi:32, 34), where the Hebrew means "beams," "ribs," "sides." In Ezek. xli:24 "leaves" no doubt means that the doors folded, as in our folding door.

(3) Of a Book (Heb. דֶּהֱלֵת, deh'leth'), or more properly of the page or column of a roll (Jer. xxxvi:23).

LEAGUE (lēg), (Heb. בְּרִית, ber-eeth'), a covenant, or solemn agreement, for peace, protection or assistance, or subjection between nations, or between princes and people (Josh. ix:11, 16; 2 Sam. v:3; 1 Kings v:12, and xv:19).

After the league made with Antiochus Epiphanius, he wrought deceitfully; after a covenant of friendship with Demetrius, his nephew, the true heir, he deceitfully procured the kingdom of Syria to himself; after a covenant of friendship with his other nephew, Philometer, king of Egypt, he deceitfully invaded that country to seize it for himself (Dan. xi:23). To be in league with the stones of the field, fowls, or beasts, is, by virtue of an interest in God's new covenant of peace, to be secured by God their proprietor and manager, from receiving any hurt by them (Job v:23; Ezek. xxxiv:25; Hos. ii:18). (See COVENANT.)

LEAH (lē'ah), (Heb. לֵאָה, lay-aw', weary), one of the two daughters of Laban who became the wives of Jacob (Gen. xxix:16).

She was not so beautiful as her sister Rachel, having weak eyes, which probably accounts for Jacob's preference for the younger sister. Leah bore Jacob six sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (xxix:32-35), Issachar, and Zebulun (xxx:17-20), and a daughter, Dinah (verse 21). She appears to have died in Canaan, as she is not mentioned in the migration to Egypt (xli:6), and was buried in Hebron (xlix:31).

LEANNOTH (lē-an'noth), (Heb. לֵאֲנוֹת, le-an-noth', for answering), a musical direction in the title of Ps. lxxxviii, showing that it was to be chanted in the manner indicated.

LEASING (lēz'ing), (Heb. לָזַב, kaw-zawb', "falsehood"), is retained in the A. V. of Ps. iv:2; v:6, from the old English versions. The Hebrew word is elsewhere almost uniformly translated "lies" (Ps. xl:4; lviii:3, etc.).

LEATHER (lēth'ēr), (Heb. עֹר, ōre), 2 Kings i:8; Matt. iii:4; in both these passages the reference is to a girdle. The word "skin" might be translated leather in Lev. xi:32; Num. xxxi:20; also "raiment" (Lev. xiii:48).

LEAVEN and FERMENT (lēv'n and fēr'mēt).

In Hebrew we find two distinct words, both translated leaven in the common version of the Bible. This is unfortunate, for there is the same distinction between Seh-ore', שֶׂה־ֹרֵעַ and khav-mates', חָמֵץ, in the Hebrew, as between leaven and ferment in the English. Chemically speaking, the 'ferment' or 'yeast' is the same substance in both cases; but 'leaven' is more correctly applied to solids, 'ferment' both to liquids and solids.

(1) Process of Fermentation. The organic chemists define the process of fermentation, and the substance which excites it, as follows:—'Fermentation is nothing else but the putrefaction of a substance containing no nitrogen. Ferment, or yeast, is a substance in a state of putrefaction, the atoms of which are in a continual motion.' This definition is in strict accordance with the views of the ancients, and gives point and force to many passages of Sacred Writ (Exod. xii:15; Matt. xvi:6, 11, 12; Mark viii:15; Luke xii:1; xiii:21; 1 Cor. v:5-8; Gal. v:9).

(2) Substances Prohibited. Leaven, and fermented or even some readily fermentible substances (as honey), were prohibited in many of the typical institutions both of the Jews and Gentiles. Plutarch (Rom-Quæst. cix. 6) assigns as the reason why the priest of Jupiter was not allowed to touch leaven, 'that it comes out of corruption, and corrupts that with which it is mingled.' See also Aul. Gellius, viii:15. All fermented substances were prohibited in the Paschal Feast of the Jews (Exod. xii:8, 19, 20); also during the succeeding seven days, usually called 'The Feast of Unleavened Bread,' though bread is not in the original. God forbade either ferment or honey to be offered to him in his temple (i. e. in the symbolical rites), while they were permitted in offerings designed to be consumed as food (Num. xv:20, 21). On the same principle of symbolism, God prescribes that salt shall always constitute a part of the oblations to him (Lev. ii:11). Salt prevents corruption or decay, and preserves flesh. Hence it is used as a symbol of incorruption and perpetuity. Thus St. Paul (comp. Col. iv:6; Mark ix:50) uses 'salt' as preservative from corruption, on the same principle which leads him to employ that which is unfermented (ἀζυμος) as an emblem of purity and uncorruptedness.

The usual leaven in the East is dough kept till it becomes sour, and which is kept from one day to another for the purpose of preserving leaven in readiness. Thus, if there should be no leaven in all the country for any length of time as much as might be required could easily be produced in twenty-four hours. Sour dough, however, is not exclusively used for leaven in the East, the lees of wine being in some parts employed as yeast' (Pictorial Bible, vol. i, p. 161).

To commemorate Israel's hasty departure from Egypt, without having time to leaven their dough, they were prohibited to use any leaven at the passover-feast, or to offer it on God's altar in any of their meat-offerings (Exod. xii:15-19; Lev. ii:11).

Figurative. On account of the penetrating and diffusive nature of leaven it is used symbolically of moral influence, good or bad:

(1) The gospel-church of God, which, from small beginnings, gradually spreads in the world; the gospel of Christ, which gradually prevails to reform and convert the nations of the world; and the work of inward grace, which gradually prevails in, and assimilates the hearts of men to its own likeness (Matt. xiii:33).

(2) The erroneous doctrines, corrupt glosses of the Scripture, or vain traditions of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, and their corrupt examples, whereby many were infected (Matt. xvi:6, 12).

(3) Scandal, and scandalous sinners, who infect and cast a blot on the church (1 Cor. v:6).

(4) Malice, hypocrisy, and like corruptions in the heart, which exceedingly defile us, and render us infectious to others (1 Cor. v:7).

LEBANA (lēb'a-nà), (Neh. vii:48). See LEBANAH.

LEBANAH (lēb'a-nah), (Heb. לְבָנָה, leb-aw-naw', whiteness), one of the Nethinim whose descendants were among those who returned from captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:45), B. C. before 536.

LEBANON (lēb'a-non), (Heb. לְבָנוֹן, leb-aw-nohn', white from the snow on its peaks), a famous mountain in the south of Syria, and north of Canaan. When taken at large, it is about three hundred miles in circumference, and consists of two large mountains, Lebanon or Libanus, and Antilibanus. Hills of less elevation run from it in every direction (Hos. xiv:5). Its streams rendered the rich soil of the valleys extremely productive. The lower zone was covered with vines (verses 6, 7), but the mountains were most noted for their forests of gigantic cedars. Fir trees or cypresses also abounded (1 Kings v:6-10; 2 Kings xix:23; Is. xl:16; lx:13; Zech. xi:1). Lions and leopards roamed in the woods (2 Kings xiv:9; Cant. iv:8).

Lebanon is remarkable for the grandeur and beauty of its scenery, and supplied the sacred writers with many expressive figures (Ps. lxxii:16; civ:16-18; Cant. iv:15; Is. ii:13; xxxv:2; lx:13; Hos. xiv:5). (See LIBANUS.)

Figurative. Lebanon is used to symbolize that which is strong, great and beautiful.

(1) Jesus Christ, and his church, are likened to Lebanon, for their spiritual comeliness and perpetual flourish, and for their fragrant and fruitfulness (Cant. v:15; Ps. lxxii:16; Is. xxxv:2 and lx:13; Hos. xiv:5-7). (2) Jerusalem, and the temple thereof, are called Lebanon, because much built of the cedars of Lebanon; and the houses of Jerusalem were so many and high as to resemble the forest of Lebanon (Hab. ii:17; Zech. xi:1; Ezek. xvii:3; Jer. xxii:23). (3) Sennacherib's army, and the Assyrian empire, are called Lebanon. How great was once their glory and strength! but how cut down at last by the axe of God's judgments! (Is. x:34; Ezek. xxxi:3, 15, 16). (4) "Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be esteemed a forest." The Gentile nations shall become a flourishing church, and the Jews shall be cast out, and live without God, and without Christ, and without hope in the world (Is. xxix:17 and xxxii:15). (5) To go up to Lebanon and Bashan, or Mount Gilead, and cry, signifies, that the Jews would have none to help them (Jer. xxii:23).

LEBAOTH (lēb'a-ōth), (Heb. לְבָאוֹת, leb-aw-ōth), lions), a place which formed one of the last groups of southern cities possessed by the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:32); probably the same as BETH-LEBAOTH (Josh. xix:6).

LEBBEUS or LEBBÆUS (leb-bē'us or leb-bæ'us), (Gr. Λεββαῖος, leb-bah'yos, courageous), a surname of the Apostle Judas or Jude (Matt. x:3), one of the twelve apostles. He was also called Thaddæus, which perhaps was his regular apostolic name.

LEBONAH (le-bō'nah), (Heb. לְבוֹנָה, leb-onaw', frankincense).

A landmark north of Shiloh (Judg. xxi:19). It is no doubt the modern Lubban, a little south

LEES (lēz), (Heb. שְׁמֵר, shek'mer something preserved), the dregs of wine that fall to the bottom of the vessel in which it is refined.

These lees are preserved, and new wine poured on them, and allowed to remain for a long time. It is said this process communicates both strength and flavor to the wine (Is. xxv:6).

Figurative. Men are "settled on their lees," when, through long prosperity, they have arrived at much outward strength, and are fixed in, and delighted with corrupt courses (Jer. xlviii:11; Zeph. i:12). To drink the lees of the cup of wrath means to drain the cup, enduring the punishment to the utmost (Ps. lxxv:8, rendered dregs).

of Nablus, on the road to Jerusalem (Wilson, ii, 292, sq.; Porter, p. 330; Robinson, Researches, iii, 90).

LECAH (lē'kah), (Heb. לָקַח, lay-kaw', walking, course), a name occurring only in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv:21), but whether of a place founded by Er, or his son Lecah, the son of Shelah; or whether it is the descendant of Shelah himself that is meant cannot be absolutely stated.

LEDGE (lēj), (Heb. שֵׁבַע, shaw-lawb'), an ornament covering the angles at the base of a pedestal, or the angles themselves (1 Kings vii:28, 29).

LEECH (lēch). See HORSE-LEECH.

LEEK (lēk), (Heb. קָהָל, khaw-tseer'), a bulbous vegetable like the onion, a particular species of which has been cultivated in Egypt from a very early period (Num. xi:5).

It is eaten raw with bread. In the passage cited it is supposed that lettuce, salads, or savory herbs generally may be intended, as the original word in the Old Testament is twelve times rendered "grass" and once "herb." (See CHATZIR.)

The left hand was esteemed of ill omen, hence the term sinister as equivalent to unfortunate. This was especially the case among the Greeks and Romans. That which came from the left in the auguries was regarded as sinister; "the Greek term was used euphemistically in taking auguries; that is for something sinister for which a good name was desired." (Grimm Lex.) Among other Hebrew uses this indicated the north (Job xxiii:9; Gen. xiv:15), the face being understood to be turned to the east.

LEFT-HANDED (lēft'händ'äd), (Heb. יָמֵינוּ אִטָּר, itter yād yeminō, shut, as to his right hand, Judg. iii:15; xx:16), denotes one who is unable skillfully to use his right hand, and also, perhaps, one who is ambidexter, i. e., who can use both hands equally well, although this latter meaning is a doubtful one. (See HAND.)

LEG, the limb of the body by which men and other animals walk. Several Hebrew words in the A. V. are translated by the term leg:

1. Kaw-raw' (Heb. כַּף, chaf), the lower limb, the shank (Exod. xii:9; xxix:17; Lev. i:9, 13; iv:11, etc.)

2. Shoke (Heb. שׁוֹק, shok), the shin, but used of the whole limb, e. g., of a person (Deut. xxviii:35; Ps. cxlvii:10; Prov. xxvi:7). It is also used of the "thigh" (Is. xlvii:2) in the phrase "hip and thigh" (Judg. xv:8).

3. Reh'gel (Heb. רֶהֱגֵל, properly the foot, 1 Sam. xvii:6).

4. Improperly for show'bel (Heb. שׁוֹבֵל, the train or trailing dress of a woman, Is. xlvii:2), and of tseh-aw-daw' (Heb. תְּשֵׁבֵד, an ornamental chain for the ankle).

The bones of the legs of persons crucified were broken to hasten death (John xix:31). (Mc. & Str. Bib. Cyc.) (See CRUCIFIXION.)

Figurative. (1) Men's "legs" are taken for their strength (Ps. cxlvii:10), and are called "strong men," who how themselves on becoming feeble in old age (Eccl. xii:3). (2) The "iron legs" of Nebuchadnezzar's image, and its feet and toes, partly of iron and clay, not rightly coalescing together, perhaps represented the strong Roman empire, with two consuls at its head; and, after many ages, divided into the eastern and western empires, and which at last was mingled with Goths, Huns, and Vandals, but did not rightly incorporate with them, nor retain its strength, after they had well begun their invasions; and which was divided at last into ten kingdoms (Dan. ii:33). (See DANIEL.) (3) A parable in the mouth of fools, is like the "unequal legs of the lame" (Prov. xxvi:7).

LEGERDEMAIN (lěj'ēr-dě-mān). See MAGI.

LEGION (lě'jūn), (Gr. Λεγεών, leg-ee-one', a Greek form of the Latin legio), a division of the Roman army. It always comprised a large body of men; but the number varied so much at different times that there is considerable discrepancy in the statements with reference to it.

The legion appears to have originally contained about 3,000 men, and to have risen gradually to twice that number, or even more. As all the divisions of the Roman army are noticed in scripture, we may add that each legion was divided into ten cohorts or regiments, each cohort into three maniples or bands, and each maniple into three centuries or companies of 100 each. This smaller division into centuries or hundreds, from the form in which it is exhibited as a constituent of the larger divisions, clearly shows that 6,000 had become at least the formal number of a legion.

The military standard of the Romans was at first a bunch of straw attached to a pole. Later an eagle and four other animals formed the standards of a legion, but after 104 B. C. the eagle alone was employed (Pliny, Hist. Nat. x:4). It was committed to the custody of the chief centurion. In addition to the eagle, the standard also commonly bore a small image of the emperor, and the introduction of these images into Jerusalem by Pontius Pilate caused an insurrection of the Jews (Antiq. xviii:3, 1; War ii:9, 2). But while the great standard of the whole legion was the eagle, each cohort and century had its own standard, and these minor ensigns assumed a variety of forms.

Figurative. The word legion came to be used to express a great number or multitude (Matt. xxvi:53). Thus, the unclean spirit (Mark v:9), when asked his name, answers, 'My name is Legion, for we are many' (comp. verse 15). The Rabbinical writers even apply it to inanimate objects, as when they speak of 'a legion of olives,' etc.

LEHABIM (lě'ha-bīm), (Heb. לֶהָבִים, leh-haw-beem', fiery, flaming), the third son of Mizraim (Gen. x:13; 1 Chron. 1:11). Some think that Lehabim denotes the Libyans, one of the most ancient peoples in Africa.

In Nah. iii:9, and Dan. xi:43, we find mention of the Lubim, which the Vulgate and LXX every where render Libyans; or, what comes to the same in Nahum and Daniel, they render Nubians. It is clear that this name describes colonies of Egyptians (Calmet). They are undoubtedly the Re Bu or Le Bu of the Egyptian monuments and are of Midianitish or kindred origin with the Egyptians. "The Lehabim are the fair-haired, blue-eyed Libyans, who as far back as the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties had been incorporated into the Egyptian army. At one time they occupied much the same place in Egyptian history as was subsequently occupied by the Lydians, and it is probable that the twenty-second dynasty, that of Shishak, was of Libyan extraction, and owed its rise to power to the influence of the Libyan troops." (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon. p. 135.)

LEHI (lě'hi), (Heb. לֵהִי, lekh'ee, meaning cheek or jawbone). A place in Judah where Samson, single-handed, conquered the Philistines with a jawbone (Judg. xv:9, 14, 19). It was probably on the border of the Philistine country, but the exact location has not yet been settled.

LEMUEL (lěm'ū-el), (Heb. לֵמֹּוֹאל, lem-oo-ale', and לֵמֹּוֹאל, lem-o-ale').

The maxims written in Proverbs xxxi:1, 19, were addressed to this unknown king by his mother. Most interpreters understand Solomon to be meant; but some, Hezekiah, Eichhorn, Ewald and others consider Lemuel only a poetical appellation of an imaginary king, through whom these maxims were made applicable to all kings.

LEND. See LOAN.

LENTIL (lěn-tīl), (Heb. לְבִנְיָה, aw-darush').

Lentil.

A cultivated plant, smaller than the garden pea, but of the same family. In the markets of Palestine red lentils are still sold as the best variety, and from them a pottage is made which Dr. Robinson and others who have eaten it affirm would be a savory meal for a weary hunter (Gen.

xxv:29, 34). The "piece of ground full of lentiles" (2 Sam. xxiii:11), is still common in the Holy Land, and the poor not infrequently make lentiles into bread (Ezek. iv:9). This pulse is much used in Roman Catholic countries during Lent, and from it the name of the season is said to be derived. As a crop it is cut and thrashed like wheat. (See ADASHIM.)

LEOPARD (lěp'ěrđ), (Heb. נָמֵר, naw-mar', Cant. iv:8; Is. xi:6; Jer. v:6, xiii:23; Hos. xiii:7; Hab. i:8; Dan. vii:6; Rev. xiii:2; Eclus. xxviii:23).

Though zoologists differ in opinion respecting the identity of the leopard and the panther, and dispute, supposing them to be distinct, how these names should be respectively applied, and by what marks the animals should be distinguished, nevertheless there can be no doubt that the nimr of the Bible is that great spotted feline which anciently infested the Syrian mountains, and even now occurs in the wooded ranges of Libanus. The variety of leopard, or rather panther, of Syria, is considerably below the stature of a lioness, but very heavy in proportion to its bulk. Its general form is so well known as to require no description beyond stating, that the spots are rather more irregular, and the color more mixed with whitish, than in the other pantherine felidæ, excepting the Felis Uncia, or Felis Irbis, of High Asia, which is shaggy and almost white. It is a nocturnal, cat-like animal in habits, dangerous to all domestic cattle, and sometimes even to man. In the Scriptures it is constantly placed in juxtaposition with the lion or the wolf; which last, if the hyena be intended, forms a natural association. There is in Asia Minor a species or variety of panther, much larger than the Syrian, not unfrequent on the borders of the snowy tracts even of Mount Ida, above ancient Troy; and the group of these spotted animals is spread over the whole of southern Asia to Africa. From several names of places, it appears that, in the earlier ages of Israelitish dominion, it was sufficiently numerous in Palestine. Leopard skins were worn as a part of ceremonial costume by the superiors of the Egyptian priesthood, and by other personages in Nubia; and the animal itself is represented in the processions of tributary nations. (Wood, Bible Animals, p. 29 sq.; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 156 sq.) C. H. S.

Figurative. (1) God compares himself to a "leopard;" with what patience he waits for the manifestation of his judgments (Hos. xiii:7). (2) Wicked men are likened to "leopards;" how spotted with corruptions in heart and life! how fierce and untractable to what is good, till God by his grace subdue them (Is. xi:6; Jer. xiii:23). (3) Nebuchadnezzar and his army are likened to "leopards;" with what guileful cruelty, and fierce rage, they watched over and besieged the cities of Judah, and nations around, till they took them, and murdered the inhabitants (Jer. v:

6; Hab. i:8). (4) The Grecian empire is likened to a "leopard with four wings and four heads;" it arose from small beginnings, and was founded with much craft, rapidity, and bloodshed.

LEPER (lěp'ěr), (Heb. נֶפֶץ, tsaw-rah', intransitive, smitten). See LEPROSY.

LEPROSY (lěp'rō-sý), (Heb. נֶפֶץ, tsaw-rah'-ath, a smiting; Gr. λέπρα, lep-rah, from λείψ, a scale), is a name that was given by the Greek physicians to a scaly disease of the skin.

A General Term. During the dark ages it was indiscriminately applied to all chronic diseases of the skin, and more particularly to elephantiasis, to which latter, however, it does not bear the slightest resemblance.

1. In Modern Times. The disease, as it is known at the present day, commences by an eruption of small reddish spots slightly raised above the level of the skin, and grouped in a circle. These spots are soon covered by a very thin, semi-transparent scale or epidermis, of a whitish color, and very smooth, which in a little time falls off, and leaves the skin beneath red and uneven. As the circles increase in diameter the skin recovers its healthy appearance towards the center; fresh scales are formed, which are now thicker, and superimposed one above the other, especially at the edges, so that the center of the scale appears to be depressed. The scales are of grayish white color, and have something of a micaceous or pearly luster. The circles are generally of the size of a quarter or half dollar, but they have been known to attain half a foot in diameter. The disease generally affects the knees and elbows, but sometimes it extends over the whole body; in which case the circles become confluent. It does not at all affect the general health, and the only inconvenience it causes the patient is a slight itching when the skin is heated; or, in inveterate cases, when the skin about the joints is much thickened, it may in some degree impede the free motion of the limbs. It is common to both sexes, to almost all ages, and all ranks of society. It is always difficult of treatment, and in old persons, when it is of long standing may be pronounced incurable. It is not uncommonly met with in England, in the United States and in all parts of Europe.

2. In the Time of Moses. (1) Three Species. Turning to the Mosaic account, we find three species mentioned, which were all included under the generic term of Bahret, or 'bright spot.' The first is called Bôhaq, which signifies 'brightness,' but in a subordinate degree. This species did not render a person unclean. The second was called Bahret lebandh, or a bright white Bahret. The third was Bahret kôhdh, or dusky Bahret, spreading in the skin. These last two were also called Tsoriat (i. e., properly, 'a stroke,' as if a chastisement), and rendered a person unclean. The characteristic marks of the Bahret lebandh mentioned by Moses are a glossy white and spreading scale upon an elevated base, the elevation depressed in the middle, the hair on the patches participating in the whiteness, and the patches themselves perpetually increasing.

(2) Other Slight Affections. There are some other slight affections mentioned by name in Leviticus, which the priest was required to distinguish from leprosy, such as Sett, Shaphit, Neteg, Shechin, i. e. 'elevation,' 'depressed,' etc.

(3) Examination by the Priest. If a person had any of the above diseases he was brought before the priest to be examined. If the priest found the distinctive signs of a Tsordat, or contagious leprosy, the person was immediately declared unclean. If the priest had any doubt on the subject, the person was put under confinement for seven days, when he was examined a second time. If in the course of the preceding week the eruption had made no advance, he was shut up for another seven days; and if then the disease was still stationary, and had none of the distinctive signs above noticed, he was declared clean (Lev. xiii).

(4) Exclusion. The leper was excluded from the tabernacle and the camp, and when he was healed his restoration to social intercourse with his fellow-men was twofold, performed both in the camp and in the tabernacle (Lev. xiv:3-32). A house for lepers was built outside Jerusalem on the hill of Gareb—i. e., "the hill of scraping" (Jer. xxxi:39, 40; Job ii:8).

(5) Leprosy of Houses and Clothes. With respect to the leprosy of houses and of clothes (Lev. xiv:55), the expression is only analogical, referring to the spots and disfigurements which appeared upon the walls and articles of clothing, resembling the leprous spots, and originating from a species of mold or mildew, indicating a great degree of dampness, corrupting the air, injurious to health, and often the occasion and precursor of fatal diseases. The rites ordained for cleansing and purifying this kind of "leprosy" are in their symbolical bearing strictly analogous to the laws concerning leprosy proper (Lev. xiii:47-59; xiv:33-53).

3. Elephantiasis. It may be useful here to subjoin a description of elephantiasis, or the leprosy of the middle ages, as this is the disease from which most of the prevalent notions concerning leprosy have been derived, and to which the notices of lepers contained in modern books of travels exclusively refer.

(1) Symptoms and Effects. Elephantiasis first of all makes its appearance by spots of a reddish, yellowish, or livid hue, irregularly disseminated over the skin and slightly raised above its surface. These spots are glossy, and appear oily, or as if they were covered with varnish. After they have remained in this way for a longer or shorter time, they are succeeded by an eruption of tubercles. These are soft, roundish tumors, varying in size from that of a pea to that of an olive, and are of a reddish or livid color. They are principally developed on the face and ears, but in the course of years extend over the whole body. The face becomes frightfully deformed; the forehead is traversed by deep lines and covered with numerous tubercles; the eyebrows become bald, swelled, furrowed by oblique lines, and covered with nipple-like elevations; the eyelashes fall out, and the eyes assume a fixed and staring look; the lips are enormously thickened and shining; the beard falls out; the chin and ears are enlarged and beset with tubercles; the lobe and alæ of the nose are frightfully enlarged and deformed; the nostrils irregularly dilated, internally constricted, and excoriated; the voice is hoarse and nasal, and the breath intolerably fetid. After some time, generally after some years, many of the tubercles ulcerate, and the matter which exudes from them dries to crusts of a brownish or blackish color; but this process seldom terminates in cicatrization. The extremities are affected in the same way as the face. The hollow of the foot is swelled out, so that the sole becomes flat; the sensibility of the skin is greatly impaired, and, in the hands and feet, often entirely lost; the joints of the toes ulcerate and fall off one after the other; insupportable fetor exhales from the whole body. The patient's general health is not affected for a considerable time, and his sufferings are not always of the same intensity as his external deformity. Often, however, his nights are sleepless or disturbed by frightful dreams; he becomes morose and melancholy; he shuns the sight of the healthy, because he feels what an object of disgust he is to them; and life becomes a loathsome burden to him; or he falls into a state of apathy, and after many years of such an existence he sinks either from exhaustion, or from the supervention of internal disease. The Greeks gave the name of elephantiasis to this disease, because the skin of the person affected with it was thought to resemble that of an elephant, in dark color, ruggedness, and insensibility, or, as some have thought, because the foot, after the loss of the toes, when the hollow of the sole is filled up and the ankle enlarged, resembles the foot of an elephant.

(2) Contagious or Hereditary. About the period of the Crusades elephantiasis spread itself like an epidemic over all Europe, even as far north as the Faroe Islands, and henceforth, owing to the above-named mistakes, every one became familiar with leprosy under the form of the terrible disease that has just been described. Leper or lazar houses abounded everywhere; as many as 2,000 are said to have existed in France alone. The disease was considered to be contagious possibly only on account of the belief that was entertained respecting its identity with Jewish leprosy, and the strictest regulations were enacted for secluding the diseased from society. Towards the commencement of the seventeenth century the disease gradually disappeared from Europe, and is now confined to intertropical countries. It existed in Faroe as late as 1676, and in the Shetland Islands in 1736, long after it had ceased in the southern parts of Great Britain. The best authors of the present day who have had an opportunity of observing the disease do not consider it to be contagious. There seems, however, to be little doubt as to its being hereditary. LESHEM (lē'shem), (Heb. לֶשֶׁם, leh'shem, strong, fortress), a variation of the name Laish, a city of northern Palestine (Josh. xix:47).

LET (lēt), (Heb. לֵת, law'than, to turn; Gr. κἀτέχω, kat-ekh'o). The word is expressive, (1) Of command. (Deut. v:12). (2) Of entreaty. (2 Sam. xiii:6). (3) Of permission. (Gen. xlix:21). (4) Of entrusting, or assigning by lease. (Cant. viii:11). To let, also signifies to hinder, keep back. (Is. xliiii:13; 2 Thess. ii:7).

LETHECH (lē'thēk), (Heb. לֶתֶח, leh'thek), a Hebrew measure, half an omer; containing sixteen pecks, or four bushels (Hos. iii:2, marg.).

LETTER (lēt'tēr).

1. A mark of sound used in writing.
2. A missive or epistle sent by one person to another (2 Sam. xi:14).
3. Learning, knowledge of the mysterious sense of God's word (John vii:15).

Figurative. The outside of things; so circumcision of the flesh, is called circumcision of the letter, as opposed to the spirit (Rom. ii:29; vii:6; 2 Cor. iii:6, 7). The outward observance of Moses' ceremonies, outward service of God, or walking according to our corrupt lusts, is called the oldness of the letter (Rom. vii:6).

LETUSHIM (le-tū'shim), (Heb. לֵטוּשִׁים, let-oo-sheem', have ground, sharpened).

The second son of Dedan; grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv:3), and progenitor of an Arabian tribe, which has not been traced out. (B. C. after 2024.)

LEUMMIM (le-üm'mim), (Heb. לֵעֻמִּים, leh-oom-meem', peoples).

One of the descendants of Dedan; grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv:3), and founder of an Arabian tribe, which Fresnel (Journal Asiat. iii, série, vi, 217) identifies with the Ummeiyim, a very ancient tribe. (B. C. after 2024.)

LEVI (lē'vi), (Heb. לֵוִי, lay-vee', a joining; Sept. Aeuel, Levi).

1. The third son of Jacob and Leah, born in Mesopotamia B. C. 1750 (Gen. xxix:34).

(1) Avenges Dinah. No circumstance is recorded of him save the part which he and his full brother Simeon took in the massacre of the Shechemites, to avenge the wrong done to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv:25, 26). This transaction was to his last hour regarded by Jacob with abhorrence, and he failed not to allude to it in his dying declaration.

(2) Simeon and Levi. As Simeon and Levi were united in that act, so the patriarch couples them in his prophecy: 'Accursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel! I will divide them in Jacob, and disperse them in Israel.' And, accordingly, their descendants were afterwards, in different ways, dispersed among the other tribes; although, in the case of Levi, this curse was eventually turned into a benefit and blessing.

(3) Children. He had three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, and a daughter called Jochebed; and his three sons produced three different families.

(4) Goes into Egypt. With these three sons he went down into Egypt (Gen. xlv:11) where he was probably presented to Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii:2).

(5) Blessing and Death. By the zeal of his descendants on occasion of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii:26-29), the curse pronounced by Jacob was transformed into a blessing. He died in Egypt 137 years old (Exod. vi:16). (See LEVITES.)

2. Son of Simeon and father of Matthat, in the genealogy of Christ between David and Zerubbabel (Luke iii:29). (B. C. after 876.)

3. Son of Melchi, and father of another Matthat (Luke iii:24.) (B. C. before 22.)

4. Son of Alpheus, an apostle elsewhere called Matthew (Mark ii:14; Luke v:27, 29). (See MATTHEW.)

LEVIATHAN (lē-vi'á-than), (Heb. לִוְיָתָן, liv-yaw-thawn'), Job iii:8; xli:1; Ps. lxxiv:14; civ:26; Is. xxvii:1. (See BEHEMOTH; CROCODILE; DRAGON).

Gesenius very justly remarks that this word, which denotes any twisted animal, is especially applicable to every great tenánt of the waters, such as the great marine serpents and crocodiles, and, it may be added, the colossal serpents and great monsters of the desert. In general it points to the crocodile, and Job xli is unequivocally descriptive of that saurian. Probably the Egyptian crocodile is therein depicted in all its magnitude, ferocity, and indolence, such as it was in early days, when as yet unconscious of the power of man, and only individually tamed for the purposes of an imposture, which had sufficient authority to intimidate the public and protect the species, under the sanctified pretext that it was a type of pure water, and an emblem of the importance of irrigation; though the people in general seem ever to have been disposed to consider it a personification of the desiructive principle. At a later period the Egyptians, probably of such places as Tentyris, where crocodiles were not held in veneration, not only hunted and slew them, but it appears from a statue that a sort of Bestiarii could tame them sufficiently to perform certain exhibitions mounted on their backs. The intense musky odor of its flesh must have rendered the crocodile, at all times, very unpalatable food, but breast-armor was made of the horny and ridged parts of its back. We have ourselves witnessed a periodical abstinence in the great saurians, and have known negro women, while bathing, play with young alligators; which, they asserted, they could do without danger, unless they hurt them and thereby attracted the vengeance of the mother; but the impunity most likely resulted from the period of inactivity coinciding with the then state of the young animals, or from the negro women being many in the water at the same time. The occurrence took place at Old Harbor, Jamaica.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (lěv'í-rát măr'rîj), (from Lat. Levir, a husband's brother).

A term applied to the practice among the Hebrews that when an Israelite died without leaving male issue his nearest relative should marry the widow, and continue the family of his deceased brother through the firstborn son of such union. The son thus became heir of the former husband. If the brother did not choose to marry the widow she could treat him with great contempt and expose him to ignominy. (See MARRIAGE.)

Levite.

LEVITES (lē'vites), (Heb. לֵוִיָּם, bane lay-vee', son of Levi, or simply לֵוִי, Lay-vee'; usually in the plural and with the article לֵוִיִּים, sons of Levi - Sept. Aevirai, Levitae), the descendants of Levi, through his sons Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, whose descendants formed so many sub-tribes or great families of the general body.

In a narrower sense the term Levites designates the great body of the tribe employed in the subordinate offices of the hierarchy, to distinguish them from that one family of their body—the family of Aaron—in which the priestly functions were vested.

1. Appointment to Service. While the Israelites were encamped before Mount Sinai the tribe of Levi, to which Moses and Aaron belonged, was, by special ordinance from the Lord, set specially apart for sacerdotal services, in the place of the firstborn of the different tribes and families to whom such functions, according to ancient usage, belonged; and which indeed had already been set apart as holy, in commemoration of the firstborn of the Israelites having been spared when the firstborn of the Egyptians were destroyed (Num. iii:12, 13, 40-51; Exod. xiii). When it was determined to set apart a single tribe of Levi for this service, the numbers of the firstborn in Israel and of the tribe selected were respectively taken, when it was found that the former amounted to 22,273, and the latter to 22,000. Those of the firstborn beyond the number of the Levites were then redeemed at the rate of five shekels, that is 12s. 6d., or three dollars and twenty-five cents each, and the money assigned to the priests. At the same time the cattle which the Levites then happened to possess were considered as equivalent to all the firstlings of the cattle which the Israelites had; and, accordingly, the firstlings were not required to be brought, as in subsequent years, to the altar and to the priesthood (Num. iii:41-51).

(1) Specific Service. In the wilderness the office of the Levites was to carry the tabernacle and its utensils and furniture from place to place, after they had been packed up by the priests (Num. iv:4-15). In this service each of the three Levitical families had its separate department; the Gershonites carried the hangings and cords of the Tabernacle, for which they were allowed two wains, each drawn by four oxen (Num. iii:25, 26; iv:24-28; vii:7). The Kohathites carried the ark, the table of shew-bread, the candlestick, the two altars, and such of the hangings as belonged to the sanctuary; for this they had no wains or oxen, the whole being carried upon their shoulders (Num. iii:31; iv:4-15; vii:9); the Merarites had charge of the substantial parts of the tabernacle—the boards, pillars, bars, bases, etc., and also all the ordinary vessels of service, for which they were allowed four wains and eight oxen (Num. iii:36, 37; iv:31, 32; vii:8). In this manner they proceeded in all their journeys; and when they settled in a place, and had erected the Tabernacle, the different families pitched their tents around it in the following manner: the Gershonites behind it on the west (Num. iii:23), the Kohathites on the south (iii:29), the Merarites on the north (iii:35), and the priests on the east (iii:38). They all assisted Aaron and his sons in taking care of, and attending on, the Tabernacle, when it was pitched; but they were allowed to take no part in the services of the altar (xviii:2-7).

(2) Duties Changed. This was the nature of their service in the desert: but when they entered the land of Canaan, and the Tabernacle ceased to be migratory, the range of their service was considerably altered. While part attended at the Tabernacle, the rest were distributed through the country in the several cities which were allotted to them. These cities are commonly reckoned forty-eight; but thirteen of them were reserved for the priests, so that only thirty-five belonged to the Levites. The names of these cities, and the tribes in which they were situated, are given in Josh. xxi:20-42; 1 Chron. vi:64-81. Of the forty-eight cities six were cities of refuge for the unintentional homicide, of which one, Hebron, was a priestly city (Deut. iv:41-43; Josh. xx:2-9).

(3) Further Change. In the time of David, when the number of the priests and Levites had much increased, a third and very important alteration was effected, as much, or more, with reference to the Temple, for which he made every possible preparation, as for the existing service at the Tabernacle. While the priests were divided into twenty-four courses that they might attend the Temple in rotation weekly, and only officiate about two weeks in the year, the Levites were also divided into twenty-four courses. In the book of Chronicles we have four times twenty-four courses of Levites mentioned but all their employments are not distinctly stated (1 Chron. xxiii:7-23; xxiv:20-31; xxv:1-31; xxvi:1-12).

(4) Classification and Offices. The most conspicuous classification is that of twenty-four courses of porters and servitors, and twenty-four of musicians.

The office of the porters was to open and shut the doors and gates of the Temple-courts, at which they also attended throughout the day to prevent the entrance of any harmful or unclean person or thing (1 Chron. xxvi:17, 18). They had also the charge of the treasure-chambers in their respective wards; for we find four of the chief porters holding this trust in 1 Chron. ix:26, and their names and the articles in their charge are given in 1 Chron. xxvi:20-29; 2 Chron. xxxi:12-14.

Besides acting as porters and servants during the day, we learn that they were also the guards of the Temple. Without entering into specific details, it may be remarked that the whole number of guards to the Temple, at night, is stated to have been twenty-four, of whom three were priests. These are described as having been under an overseer, called 'the man of the mountain of the house.' He went his rounds to see that the guards were at their posts: if he found any one seated who should have been standing, he said 'Peace be unto thee;' but if he found any one asleep, he struck him, and sometimes set fire to his clothes. (Maimon. Beth Habech, ch. viii.)

(5) Musicians. We have thus seen that one division of the Levites was employed as porters during the day, and another as guards during the night; a third division served as musicians. A catalogue of these is given in 1 Chron. xxi:1-9, according to their employments; and another, according to their courses, in 1 Chron. xxi:9-31. We shall have to speak of Music under that head, and need only here state that on grand occasions, when a full band was formed, the family of Heman sang in the middle (1 Chron. vi:33-38), the family of Asaph on the right hand (vi:39-43), and the family of Ethan on the left. The ordinary place for the musicians, vocal and instrumental, was at the east end of the court of the priests, between the court of Israel and the altar.

It seems that the singers could never be under twelve, because that number was particularly mentioned at their first appointment (1 Chron. xxv:9); but there was no objection to any larger number (Erachin, ut supra). The young sons of the Levites were, on such occasions only, allowed to enter the court of the priests with their fathers, that their small voices might relieve the deep bass of the men (Gemar, tit. Succah, ch. v.); and for this authority was supposed to be found in Ezra iii:9.

(6) No Sacerdotal Functions. The Levites were not at liberty to exercise any properly sacerdotal functions; but on extraordinary occasions they were permitted to assist in preparing the sacrifices, without, however, in any way concerning themselves with the blood (2 Chron. xxix:34; xxx:16, 17; xxxv:1).

(7) Age and Qualifications. In Num. iv:3 the Levites are described as commencing their actual service at thirty years of age; but in Num. viii:24, 25, twenty-five is the age mentioned; and in 1 Chron. xxiii:24, 25, and Ezra iii:8, twenty. The reason of these apparent discrepancies is, that from twenty-five to thirty they were in the state of probationers, doing some things, but excluded from others (Aben Ezra, on Num. viii). At thirty they became qualified for every part of the Levitical service. This was under the Tabernacle; but when the Temple was built, and bodily strength was less required, the age was reduced to twenty. After fifty they were no longer called upon to serve as a matter of obligation, but they might attend if they thought proper, and perform any usual service which was not considered burdensome. Thus, in the wilderness, they ceased at that age to carry any part of the burdens when the ark and Tabernacle were removed (Num. viii:25, 26).

(8) Consecration. When the Levitical body was first set apart for its sacred duties, the existing members were consecrated in the manner particularly described in Num. viii:6, 22. They, and in them their descendants, were thus inducted into their particular office; and, in later times, when any one became of age, it was sufficient for his admission to prove that he belonged to a Levitical family, and, probably, to offer some trifling sacrifice. It does not appear that the Levites, when at home, had any particular dress to distinguish them from their countrymen; nor is there any positive evidence that they had any distinctive garb, even when on actual service at the tabernacle or temple. Josephus (Antiq. xx:9) relates, that only six years before the destruction of the Temple by the Romans, the Levites were allowed by Agrippa to wear a linen tunic, like the priests—an innovation with which the latter were highly displeased. This shows that the dress of the Levites, even when on duty, had not previously been in any respect similar to that of the priests.

(9) Subsistence. The subsistence of the Levites was provided for in a peculiar manner.

(1) One-Twelfth of the Land or Forty-eight Cities. It consisted, first, of a compensation for the abandonment of their right to one-twelfth of the land of Canaan; and, secondly, of a remuneration for their services in their official capacity as devoted to the services of the sanctuary. The territorial compensation lay in the forty-eight cities which were granted to the whole tribe, including the priests. These cities were scattered among the different tribes, as centers of instruction, and had 1,000 square cubits, equal to above 305 English acres, attached to each of them, to serve for gardens, vineyards, and pasturage. It is obvious, however, that this alone could not have been an adequate compensation for the loss of one-twelfth of the soil, seeing that the produce of 305 acres could not in any case have sufficed for the wants of the inhabitants of these cities.

(2) The Tithe. The further provision, therefore, which was made for them must be regarded as partly in compensation for their sacrifice of territory, although we are disposed to look upon it as primarily intended as a remuneration for the dedication of their services to the public. This provision consisted of the tithe, or tenth of the produce of the grounds allotted to the other tribes. The simplest view of this payment is to regard it, first, as the produce of about as much land as the Levites would have been entitled to if placed on the same footing with regard to territory as the other tribes; and also as the produce of so much more land, which the other tribes enjoyed in consequence of its not having been assigned to the tribe of Levi.

In giving the produce of this land to the Levites the Israelites were therefore to be regarded as simply releasing them from the cares of agriculture, to enable them to devote themselves to the service of the sanctuary. The land which produced the tithe was just so much land held by the other tribes in their behalf; and the labor of cultivating this land was the salary paid to the Levites for their official services. The tenth was paid to the whole tribe of Levi; but as the Levites had to give out of this one-tenth to the priests, their own allowance was only nine-tenths of the tenth. A more particular account of tithes belongs to another head. (See TITHES.)

The Levites had also a certain interest in the 'second tithe,' being the portion which, after the first tithe had been paid, the cultivator set apart for hospitable feasts, which were held at the place of the sanctuary in two out of three years, but in the third year at home. This interest, however, extended no further than that the offerer was particularly enjoined to invite the priests and Levites to such feasts.

2. History, Etc. (1) Till Death of Solomon. The earliest notice we have of the numbers of the Levites occurs at their first separation in the desert, when there were 22,300, of a month old and upwards; of whom 8,580 were fit for service, or between the ages of 30 and 50 (Num. iii:22, 28, 34; iv:2, 34-49). Thirty-eight years after, just before the Israelites entered Canaan, they had increased to 23,000, not one of whom had been born at the time of the former enumeration (Num. xxvi:57, 62-65). About 460 years after the entry into Canaan (B. C. 1015) they were again numbered by David, a little before his death, and were found to have increased to 38,000 men fit for Levitical service—of whom 24,000 were 'set over the work of the Lord,' 6,000 were officers and judges, 4,000 were porters, and 4,000 were musicians (1 Chron. xxiii:3, 4, 5). If the same proportion then existed between those come of age and those a month old which existed when the tribe quitted Egypt, the entire number of the Levitical body, in the time of David, must have been 96,433.

(2) After the Revolt of the Ten Tribes. After the revolt of the ten tribes, those of the Levites who resided in the territories of those tribes, having resisted the request of Jeroboam to transfer their services to his idolatrous establishments at Dan and Bethel, were obliged to abandon their possessions and join their brethren in Judah and Benjamin (2 Chron. xi:12, 13, 14; xiii:9); and this concentration of the Levitical body in the kingdom of Judah must have had an important influence upon its condition and history. That kingdom thus actually consisted of three tribes—Judah, Benjamin, and Levi,—of which one was devoted to sacerdotal uses. This altered position of the Levites—after they had been deprived of most of their cities, and the tithes from ten of the tribes were cut off—presents a subject for much interesting investigation, into which we cannot enter. Their means must have been much reduced; for it cannot be supposed that Judah and Benjamin alone were able, even if willing, to undertake the support of the whole Levitical body on the same scale as when the dues of all Israel flowed into its treasuries. In the subsequent history of Judah the Levites appear less frequently than might have been expected. The chief public measure in which they were engaged was the restoration of the house of David in the person of young Joash (2 Chron. xxiii: 1-11); which may be regarded as mainly the work of the Levitical body, including the priests.

(3) After the Captivity. Under the edict of Cyrus, only 341 Levites, according to Ezra (ii: 40-42), or 350, according to Nehemiah (vii:43-45), returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem. This is less surprising than might at first sight appear; for if, before the captivity, the great body of them had been in straitened circumstances and without fixed possessions in Judah, it was only consistent with human prudence that those who had, in all probability, comfortably settled themselves in Babylon, should not be anxious to return in such numbers to Palestine as were likely to produce similar effects. A few more are mentioned in Neh. xii:24-26. Those who did return seem to have had no very correct notion of their obligations and duties; for there were many who formed matrimonial alliances with the idolaters of the land, and thereby corrupted both their morals and genealogies. But they were prevailed upon to reform this abuse, and, as a token of obedience, signed the national covenant with Nehemiah, and abode at Jerusalem to influence others by their authority and example (Neh. x: 9-13; xi:15-19).

(4) In New Testament. The Levites are not mentioned in the Apocryphal books, and very slightly in the New Testament (Luke x:32; John i:19; Acts iv:36); but the 'scribes' and the 'lawyers,' so often named in the gospels, are usually supposed to have belonged to them.

3. General Summary. It would be taking a very narrow view of the duties of the Levitical body if we regarded them as limited to their services at the sanctuary. On the contrary we see in their establishment a provision for the religious and moral instruction of the great body of the people, which no ancient lawgiver except Moses ever thought of attending to. But that this was one principal object for which a twelfth of the population—the tribe of Levi—was set apart, is clearly intimated in Deut. xxxii:9, 10: 'They shall teach Jacob thy judgments and Israel thy law; they shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice upon thine altar.' They were to read the volume of the law publicly every seventh year at the Feast of Tabernacles (Deut. xxxi:10-13). 'This public and solemn periodical instruction,' observes Dean Graves (Lectures, p. 170), 'though eminently useful, was certainly not the entire of their duty; they were bound from the spirit of this ordinance to take care that at all times the aged should be improved and the children instructed in the knowledge and fear of God, the adoration of his majesty, and the observance of his law; and for this purpose the peculiar situation and privileges of the tribe of Levi, as regulated by the Divine appointment, admirably fitted them.' (Michaelis, Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, sec. 52, Eng. transl.)

LEVITICAL CITIES. See LEVITES.

LEVITICUS (lê-vî't'î-kûs), in the Hebrew canon, is called כְּוִדִּי, kaw-raw', the word with which it begins; the third book of Moses.

1. Contents. Leviticus contains the further statement and development of the Sinaitic legislation, the beginnings of which are described in Exodus. It exhibits the historical progress of this legislation; consequently we must not expect to find the laws detailed in it in a systematic form. There is, nevertheless, a certain order observed, which arose from the nature of the subject, and of which the plan may easily be perceived. The whole is intimately connected with the contents of Exodus, at the conclusion of which book that sanctuary is described with which all external worship was connected (Exod. xxxv-xl).

2. Authenticity. The arguments by which the unity of Leviticus has been attacked are very feeble. Some critics have strenuously endeavored to prove that the laws contained in Leviticus originated in a period much later than is usually supposed. But the following observations sufficiently support their Mosaic origin, and show that the whole of Leviticus is historically genuine.

(1) Mosaic Vestiges. The laws in ch. i-vii contain manifest vestiges of the Mosaic period. Here, as well as in Exodus, when the priests are mentioned, Aaron and his sons are named; as, for instance, in ch. i:4, 7, 8, 11, etc. The tabernacle is the sanctuary, and no other place of worship is mentioned anywhere.

Expressions like the following constantly occur, before the tabernacle of the congregation, or the door of the tabernacle of the congregation (ch. 1:3; iii:8, 13, etc.). The Israelites are always described as a congregation (ch. iv:13, sq.), under the command of the elders of the congregation (ch. iv:15), or of a ruler (ch. iv:22). Everything has a reference to life in a camp, and that camp commanded by Moses (ch. iv:12, 21; vi:11; xiv: 8; xvi:26, 28). A later writer could scarcely have placed himself so entirely in the times, and so completely adopted the modes of thinking of the age, of Moses: especially if, as has been asserted, these laws gradually sprung from the usages of the people, and were written down at a later period with the object of sanctioning them by the authority of Moses. They so entirely befitted the Mosaic age, that, in order to adapt them to the requirements of any later period, they must have undergone some modification, accommodation, and a peculiar mode of interpretation. This inconvenience would have been avoided by a person who intended to forge laws in favor of the later modes of Levitical worship. A forger would have endeavored to identify the past as much as possible with the present.

(2) Law Against Slaughter. In ch. xvii occurs the law which forbids the slaughter of any beast except at the sanctuary. This law could not be strictly kept in Palestine, and had therefore to undergo some modification (Deut. xii). Our opponents cannot show any rational inducement for contriving such a fiction. The law (ch. xvii: 6, 7) is adapted to the nation only while emigrating from Egypt. It was the object of this law to guard the Israelites from falling into the temptation to imitate the Egyptian rites and sacrifices offered to he-goats; which word signifies also demons represented under the form of he-goats, and which were supposed to inhabit the desert (comp. Jablonski, Pantheon Ægyptiacum, i, 272, sq.)

(3) Concerning Food and Purifications. The laws concerning food and purifications appear especially important if we remember that the people emigrated from Egypt. The fundamental principle of these laws is undoubtedly Mosaic, but in the individual application of them there is much which strongly reminds us of Egypt. This is also the case in Lev. xviii, sq., where the lawgiver has manifestly in view the two opposites, Canaan and Egypt. That the lawgiver was intimately acquainted with Egypt, is proved by such remarks as those about the Egyptian marriages with sisters (ch. xviii:3); a custom which stands as an exception among the prevailing habits of antiquity (Diodorus Siculus, i, 27; Pausanias, Attica, i, 7).

3. A Prophetical Character. The book of Leviticus has a prophetical character. The lawgiver represents to himself the future history of his people. This prophetical character is especially manifest in chapters xxv, xxvi, where the law appears in a truly sublime and Divine attitude, and when its predictions refer to the whole futurity of the nation. It is impossible to say that these were vaticinia ex eventu, unless we would assert that this book was written at the close of Israelitish history. We must rather grant that passages like this are the real basis on which the authority of later prophets is chiefly built. Such passages prove also, in a striking manner, that the lawgiver had not merely an external aim, but that his law had a deeper purpose, which was clearly understood by Moses himself. That purpose was to regulate the national life in all its bearings, and to consecrate the whole nation to God. (See especially ch. xxv:18, sq.).

But this ideal tendency of the law does not preclude its applicability to matters of fact. The law had not merely an ideal, but also a real character, evidenced by its relation to the faithlessness and disobedience of the nation. The whole future history of the covenant people was regulated by the law, which has manifested its eternal power and truth in the history of the people of Israel. Although this section has a general bearing, it is nevertheless manifest that it originated in the times of Moses. At a later period, for instance, it would have been impracticable to promulgate the law concerning the Sabbath and the year of Jubilee: for it was soon sufficiently proved how far the nation in reality remained behind the ideal Israel of the law. The sabbatical law bears the impress of a time when the whole legislation, in its fullness and glory, was directly communicated to the people, in such a manner as to attract, penetrate, and command.

1. To pay, by taking a part from among the rest, as tribute is raised from the rest of the incomes of the nation.

2. An army, or number of workmen raised in a nation (1 Kings v:13, 14). The workmen were free Israelites, who to pay tribute (or tax) worked four months in the year, felling trees under the direction of subjects of Hiram. Another levy was of Canaanites, who were assigned to tributary labor (ix:15), in this case for the erection of buildings.

LEWD (lūd), (Gr. πονηρός, pon-ay-ros'), in a moral sense evil, wicked, unprincipled (Acts xvii:5).

LEWDNESS (lūd'nēs), (Gr. παειδοπραγία, hrad-eoorg'ay-mah, literally doing things easily, or boldly), a piece of knavery, rascality (Acts xviii:14). Elsewhere it is used in its proper sense of licentiousness (Heb. זָמָוּת, zam-maw'), etc., badness, (Judg. xx:6; Jer. xi:15; Ezek. xxiii:44; xxiv:13; Hos. vi:9); once (Hos. ii:10) the private parts (Heb. נֶבֶלֶת, nab-looth').

LIBANUS or LEBANON (lib'a-nus or lěb'a-non), (Heb. לִבְנוֹן, leb-aw-nohn; Gr. Λιβανος, Libanus, for the Heb. Lebanon'), the name of a long chain of mountains on the northern border of Palestine.

(1) Name and Location. The term Libanus is more convenient in use than the Hebrew form Lebanon, as enabling us to distinguish the parallel ranges of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, which have no such distinctive names in connection with the Hebrew designation. Lebanon seems to be applied in scripture to either or both of these ranges; and we shall also use it in this general sense: but Libanus means distinctively the westernmost of those ranges, which faces the Mediterranean, and Anti-Libanus the eastern, facing the plain of Damascus; in which sense these names will be used in this article. The present inhabitants of the country have found the convenience of distinguishing these parallel ranges; and give to Libanus the name of 'Western Mountain' (Jebel esh-Sharki), and to Anti-Libanus that of 'Eastern Mountain' (Jebel el-Gharbi); although Jebel Libnan (the same name in fact as Lebanon) occurs among the Arabs with special reference to the eastern range.

These two great ranges, which together form the Lebanon of Scripture, commence about the parallel of Tripoli (lat. 34° 28'), run in a general direction from northeast to southwest, through about one degree of latitude, and form, at their southern termination, the natural frontier of Palestine. These parallel ranges enclose between them a fertile and well-watered valley, averaging about fifteen miles in width, which is the Cœle-Syria (Hollow Syria) of the ancients, but is called by the present inhabitants, by way of preëminence, El-Bekaa, or 'the valley,' which is watered through the greater portion of its length by the river Litany, the ancient Leontes.

(2) Hermon. Nearly opposite Damascus the Anti-Libanus separates into two ridges, which diverge somewhat, and enclose the fertile Wady et-Teim. The easternmost of these two ridges, which has already been pointed out as the Hermon of Scripture (see HERMON), Jebel esh-Sheikh, continues its southwest course, and is the proper prolongation of Anti-Libanus. From the base of the higher part of this ridge, a low broad spur or mountainous tract runs off towards the south, forming the high land which shuts in the basin and Lake of el-Huleh on the east. This tract is called Jebel Heish, the higher portion of which terminates at Tel el-Faras, nearly three hours north of Fiek. The other ridge of Anti-Libanus takes a more westerly direction. It is long, low, and level; and continues to border the lower part of the great valley of Bekaa, until it seems to unite with the higher bluffs and spurs of Lebanon, and thus entirely to close that valley. In fact, only a narrow gorge is here left between precipices, in some places of great height, through which the Litany finds its way down to the sea, north of Tyre. The chain of Lebanon, or at least its higher ridges, may be said to terminate at the point where it is thus broken through by the Litany. But a broad and lower mountainous tract continues towards the south, bordering the basin of the Huleh on the west. It rises to its greatest elevation about Safed (Jebel Safed); and at length ends abruptly in the mountains of Nazareth, as the northern wall of the plain of Esdraelon. This high tract may very properly be regarded as a prolongation of Lebanon.

(3) Formation and Height. The mountains of Lebanon are of limestone rock, which is indeed the general constituent of the mountains of Syria. In Lebanon it has generally a whitish hue, and from the aspect which the range thus bears in the distance, in its cliffs and naked parts, the name of Lebanon (which signifies 'white') has been supposed to be derived; but others seek its origin in the snows which rest long upon its summits, and perpetually upon the highest of them.

Of the two ranges, that of Libanus is by far the higher. Its uppermost ridge is marked by a line, drawn at the distance of about two hours' journey from the summit, above which all is barren (Burckhardt, p. 4); but the slopes and valleys below this line afford pasturage, and are capable of cultivation, by reason of the numerous springs which are met with in all directions.

The average height of the Libanus mountains, from the top of which the snow entirely disappears in summer, must be considerably below 11,000 feet, probably about 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. But the higher points, particularly the Sannin, which is the highest of all, must be above that limit.

(4) Vegetation. Cultivation is, however, chiefly found on the seaward slopes, where numerous villages flourish, and every inch of ground is turned to account by the industrious natives, who, in the absence of natural levels, construct artificial terraces in order to prevent the earth from being swept away by the winter rains, and at the same time to retain the water requisite for the irrigation of the crops (Burckhardt, pp. 19, 20, 23). When one looks upward from below, the vegetation on these terraces is not visible; so that the whole mountain appears as if composed only of immense rugged masses of naked whitish rock, traversed by deep, wild ravines, running down precipitously to the plain. No one would suspect among these rocks the existence of a vast multitude of thrifty villages, and a numerous population of mountaineers, hardy, industrious, and brave (Robinson, iii, 440). Here, amidst the crags of the rocks, are to be seen the remains of the renowned cedars; but a much larger proportion of firs, oaks, brambles, mulberry-trees, fig-trees, and vines (Volney, i, 272). (Comp. Ezek. xxvii:18.) Its wines are also noticed (Hos. xiv:7); and in Cant. iv:11; Hos. xiv:7, it is celebrated for various kinds of fragrant plants.

It is not easy to determine, with certainty what can be intended by the prophet Isaiah in the phrase, "the glory of Lebanon" (chap. xxxv:2); but very likely it refers to the verdure constantly maintained on it, and to the stately trees which cover it.

LIBATION (lī-bā'shūn), a word used in sacrificial language to express an affusion of liquors, poured upon victims to be sacrificed to the Lord.

The quantity of wine for a libation was the fourth part of a hin; rather more than two pints. Among the Hebrews libations were poured on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it laid on the altar, ready to be consumed by the flames (Lev. vi:20; viii:25, 26; ix:4; xvi:12, 20; xxiii:13). (See OFFERING.)

LIBERAL (līb'ēr-al). In Is. xxxii:5, 8, the term naw-deeb' (Heb. נָדָבָה, voluntary) seems to have been applied to persons of noble character or birth. By an easy transition it means one noble in heart and action.

A liberal person is one ready to give to the poor and needy. Men stand by "liberal things," as showing kindness to the poor as an especial means of procuring and establishing one's wealth (Prov. xi:25). God giveth "liberally," with a willing and bountiful heart, and in a large abundance (James i:5).

LIBERTINES (līb'ēr-tins), (Gr. Λιβερτινος, lib-er-tee'nos, a freedman).

This occurs but once in the New Testament: "Certain of the synagogue, which is called (the synagogue) of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians," etc., are mentioned in Acts vi:9. There has been much diversity in the interpretation of this word.

The most probable opinion, and that which is now generally entertained, is, that the Libertini were Jews, whom the Romans had taken in war and conveyed to Rome, but afterwards freed; and that this synagogue had been built at their expense. Libertini is, therefore, to be regarded as a word of Roman origin, and to be explained with reference to Roman customs. Further, we know that there were in the time of Tiberius many Libertini, or 'freed-men,' of the Jewish religion at Rome (Tacit, Annal. ii, 85; comp. Suet. Tib. 36; and Philo, p. 1014; see Bloomfield, Kuinoel, Wetstein, etc., on Acts vi:9).

LIBERTY (līb'ēr-tŷ). (1) Freedom, to do or forbear a particular action, as one pleases (1 Cor. vii:39; viii:9; x:29). (2) Freedom from human slavery or imprisonment (Lev. xxv:10; Heb. xiii:23). (3) Freedom from the ceremonial and broken covenant of works (Gal. v:1). (4) The happy state of eternal glory, where one is delivered from all misery and servitude (Rom. viii:21).

LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," that is, freedom from the slavery of sin, Satan, and the broken law, and now under the gospel, from the ceremonial yoke, and great pleasure and boldness in fellowship with God (2 Cor. iii:17). It is wrong to use Christian "liberty," to the hurt of our weak brethren, or to cover a loose practice (Rom. xiv; 1 Cor. viii; 1 Pet. ii:16).

LIBNAH (līb'nah), (Heb. לִבְנָה, lib-naw', transpiration; Sept. Λεβνά, Lebna).

1. One of the royal cities of the Canaanites, taken by Joshua immediately after Makkedah (Josh. x:20-30). It lay within the territory assigned to Judah (Josh. xv:42), and became one of the Levitical towns in that tribe (Josh. xxi:13; 1 Chron. vi:57). It was a strongly fortified place. The Assyrian king Sennacherib was detained some time before it when he invaded Judæa in the time of Hezekiah; and it was before it that he sustained that dreadful stroke which constrained him to withdraw to his own country (2 Kings xix:8; Is. xxxvii:8). In the reign of King Jehoram, Libnah is said to have revolted from him (2 Kings viii:22; 2 Chron. xxi:10). Libnah existed as a village in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, and is placed by them in the district of Eleutheropolis.

2. A place in the desert between Rimmon-parez and Rissah which marked the twenty-first halting place of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii:20, 21); probably identical with Laban (Deut. i:1).

LIBNATH (lib'nath), (for the Heb. לִבְנַת, see the full form SHIHOR-LIBNATH), a stream near Carmel on the borders of Asher (Josh. xix:26). Michaelis conceives this to be the 'glass-river,' i. e., the Belus, from whose sands the first glass was made by the Phœnicians.

LIBNEH (lib'neh), (Heb. לִבְנֵה, lib-neh'), occurs in two places of Scripture, viz., Gen., xxx:37; Hos. iv:13, and is supposed to indicate either the white poplar or the storax tree.

The libneh is first mentioned in Gen. xxx:37, as one of the rods which Jacob placed in the watering troughs of the sheep; the lutz (the almond) and armon (the Oriental plane) being the two others; he 'pilled white strakes in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods.' In Hos. iv:13 reference is made to the shade of trees and the burning of incense:—'They sacrifice upon the top of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks (allon, "terebinth tree") and poplars (libneh), because the shadow of them is good.' This poplar is said to be called white, not on account of the whiteness of its bark, but of that of the under surface of its leaves. It may perhaps be so designated from the whiteness of its hairy seeds, which have a remarkable appearance when the seed covering first bursts. The poplar is certainly common in the countries where the scenes are laid of the transactions related in the above passages of Scripture.

Others, however, have been of opinion that libneh denotes the storax tree rather than the white poplar. Thus, in Gen. xxx:37, the Septuagint has ῥάβδον styracivny, 'a rod of styrax,' and the Greek translation of the Pentateuch, according to Rosenmüller, is more ancient and of far greater authority than that of Hosea. From the description of Dioscorides, and his comparing the leaves of the styrax to those of the quince, there is no doubt of the same tree being intended: especially as in early times, as at the present day, it yielded a highly fragrant balsamic substance which was esteemed as a medicine, and employed in fumigation. From the similarity of the Hebrew name libneh to the Arabic lubne, and from the Septuagint having in Genesis translated the former by styrax, it seems most probable that this was the tree intended. It is capable of yielding white wands as well as the poplar; and it is also well qualified to afford complete shade under its ample foliage, as in the passage of Hos. iv:13. We may also suppose it to have been more particularly alluded to, from its being a tree yielding incense. 'They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under the terebinth and the storax trees, because the shadow thereof is good.' (See POPLAR.) J. F. R.

LIBNI (lib'ni), (Heb. לִבְנֵי, lib-nee', white).

1. The eldest of the two sons of Gershon, son of Levi (Exod. vi:17; Num. iii:18, 21; 1 Chron. vi:17); progenitor of the Libnites. Elsewhere (1 Chron. xxiii:7; xxvi:21) he is called LAADAN. (B. C. post 1856.)

2. The Libni of 1 Chron. vi:29, is in all probability the same man, who is by some error called the son of Mahli and father of Shimei.

LIBNITES (lib'nites), (Heb. לִבְנֵי, lib-nee', white), descendants of LIBNI (Num. iii:21; xxvi:58).

LIBYA (lib'y-à), (Gr. Λιβύη, lib-oo'ay). This name in its largest acceptation, was used by the Greeks to denote the whole of Africa. But Libya Proper, which is the Libya of the New Testament (Acts ii:10), and the country of the Lubim in the Old, was a large tract, lying along the Mediterranean, to the west of Egypt.

Libya is supposed to have been first peopled by, and to have derived its name from, the Lehabim or Lubim. (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.) These, its earliest inhabitants, appear, in the time of the Old Testament, to have consisted of wandering tribes, who were sometimes in alliance with Egypt, and at others with the Ethiopians, as they are said to have assisted both Shishak, king of Egypt, and Zerah the Ethiopian in their expeditions against Judæa (2 Chron. xii:3; xvi:8; Nah. iii:9). They were eventually subdued by the Carthaginians; and it was the policy of that people to bring the nomade tribes of Northern Africa which they mastered, into the condition of cultivators, that by the produce of their industry they might be able to raise and maintain the numerous armies with which they made their foreign conquests. But Herodotus assures us that none of the Libyans beyond the Carthaginian territory were tillers of the ground (Herod. iv:186, 187; comp. Polybius, i:161, 167, 168, 177, Ed. Schweighæuser). Since the time of the Carthaginian supremacy the country, with the rest of the East, has successively passed into the hands of the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Turks. The name of Libya occurs in Acts ii:10, where 'the dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene' are mentioned among the stranger Jews who came up to Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost. (See LUBIM.)

LIBYANS (lib'y-anz), (Heb. לִבְיָנִי, lib-beem').

The word thus rendered in Dan. xi:43 should be Lubim; in Jer. xlvi:9 it is Libyans.

LICE (lic), (Heb. קִנֵּי, kin-eem'), occurs in Exod. viii:16, 17, 18; Ps. cv:31; Vulg. muscas.

The name of the creature employed in the third plague upon Egypt, miraculously produced from the dust of the land. Its exact nature has been much disputed. Those who reason from the root of the word in the Hebrew text, and assume it to be derived from the Hebrew word to fix, settle, or establish, infer lice to be meant, from their fixing themselves on mankind, animals, etc. But since it is spoken of as an Egyptian insect, the name for it may be purely Egyptian, and may have no connection with any Hebrew root (Michaelis, Suppl. ad Lex. n. 1174).

It is probable, however, that not lice but some species of gnats is the proper rendering. It is not a valid objection, that if this plague were gnats, etc., the plague of flies would be anticipated, since the latter most likely consisted of one particular species having a different destination (see FLY); whereas this may have consisted of not only mosquitoes or gnats, but of some other species which also attack domestic cattle, as the astrus, or tabanus, or zimb (Bruce's Travels, ii:315, 8vo); on which supposition these two plagues would be sufficiently distinct.

But since mosquitoes, gnats, etc., have ever been one of the evils of Egypt, there must have been some peculiarity attending them on this occasion, which proved the plague to be 'the finger of God.' From the next chapter (Ex. ix:31) it appears that the flax and the barley were smitten by the hail; that the former was beginning to grow, and that the latter was in the ear—which, according to Shaw, takes place in Egypt in March.

Hence the kineem would be sent about February, i. e. before the increase of the Nile, which takes place at the end of May, or beginning of June. Since, then, the innumerable swarms of mosquitoes, gnats, etc., which every year affect the Egyptians, come, according to Hasselquist, at the increase of the Nile, the appearance of them in February would be as much a variation of the course of nature as the appearance of the astrus in January would be in England. They were also probably numerous and fierce beyond example on this occasion; and as the Egyptians would be utterly unprepared for them (for it seems that this plague was not announced), the effects would be signally distressing.

For a description of the evils inflicted by these insects upon man, see Kirby and Spence, Introduction to Entomology, Lond. 1828, i:115, etc.; and for the annoyance they cause in Egypt, Maillet, Description de l'Égypte par l'Abbé Mascrier, Paris, 1755, xc:37; Forskal, Descript. Animal. p. 85.

LIEUTENANTS (lū-tēn'ants), (Heb. לְיָדָיו מְלָכִים, akh-ash-dar-pen-eem'), the official title of viceroys who governed the provinces of the Persian empire (Esth. iii:12; viii:9; ix:3; Ezra viii:36; called 'prince' in Dan. iii:2; vi:1).

LIFE (lif), (Heb. נֶפֶשׁ, kha'h'ee, life or lives; נְשָׁמָה, neh'fesh, breath; Gr. ζωή, dzo-ay', life activity; ψυχή, psoo-khay', breath). The word has several significations in the Scriptures.

1. Physical or animal life (Gen. vi:17; vii:15); or a natural power of acting (Job iii:20; Eccl. ii:17).

2. Spiritual life, consisting in our being reinstated in the favor of God, quickened by his Spirit, and conformed to his image; in consequence whereof, we by supernatural influence, live on God's fullness of grace, enjoy fellowship with him, and act to his glory (Rom. viii:6; Col. iii:3).

3. That eternal holiness and happiness which the saints possess in heaven (Rom. v:17).

4. It is said of Jesus Christ that he is "the life" and "our life;" he is the source, and maintainer of life to all creatures: he purchased eternal life for his people: he bestows it on them: he, dwelling in their hearts, quickens them, comforts them, and will raise them from the dead, and give them eternal blessedness (John xi:25; xiv:6; Col. iii:4; 1 John i:2). By "his life," that is, by his resurrection and intercession, we are saved, in consequence of our reconciliation unto God by his death (Rom. v:10). His "life is manifested" in his people's cheerful enduring of suffering for his sake: thereby are clearly evidenced his eternal life in heaven, his intercession for them, and his living in them, as their quickening and comforting head (2 Cor. iv:10); his words are "life," as they, through the Spirit, quicken dead souls, and preserve and restore spiritual life in the saints (John vi:63). And to possess Jesus, the Wisdom of God, is to have the true fountain of life in us (Prov. iv:13; John xvii:3).

LIFT (lift), (Heb. נָסַף, naw-saw'; Gr. ἀέλω, ah'ee-ro).

1. To raise higher (Gen. vii:17).

2. To render more honorable and conspicuous (1 Chron. xiv:2; 1 Sam. ii:7).

Figurative. (1) God lifts up himself, or lifts up his feet, when he hastens to deliver his people (Ps. lxxiv:3); when he displays his power and greatness, and overthrows his and his people's enemies (Ps. xciv:2; Is. xxxiii:3, 10). (2) Christ was lifted up, when he hung on the cross, when exalted to heaven, and when publicly offered in the gospel (John viii:28, and xii:32, 34).

(3) He and his people lift up the head, when they are filled with joy, glory, and honor (Luke xxi:28; Ps. cx:7). (4) Men lift up the eyes, when they view carefully (Gen. xiii:20; Is. xl:26); or when they pray with expectation of a gracious answer (Ps. cxxi:1). (5) The lifting up of the hands, imports swearing (Deut. xxxii:40); threatening (Ezek. xx:15); threatening and oppression (Job xxxi:21); invitation (Is. xlix:22); blessing of others (Lev. ix:22); prayer to God (Ps. xxviii:2; applying earnestly to work (Ps. cxix:48); rebelling against a sovereign (2 Sam. xviii:28); or helping, encouraging, and comforting a distressed and disconsolate neighbor (Heb. xii:12). (6) The lifting up of the heart or soul to God, imports solemn dedication to God, joy in his service, and earnest prayer to him (2 Chron. xvii:6; Lam. iii:41; Ps. xxv:1).

LIGHT (lit), (Heb. אֵשׁ, ore), is represented in the Scriptures as the immediate result and offspring of a divine command (Gen. i:3).

The earth was void and dark, when God said, 'Let light be, and light was.' This is represented as having preceded the placing of 'lights in the firmament of heaven, the greater light' to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also' (Gen. i:14, sq.). Whatever opinion may be entertained as to the facility with which these two separate acts may be reconciled, it cannot be questioned that the origin of light, as of every other part of the universe, is thus referred to the exertion of the Divine will: as little can it be denied that the narrative in the original is so simple, yet at the same time so majestic and impressive, both in thought and diction, as to fill the heart with a lofty and pleasurable sentiment of awe and wonder.

The Divine origin of light made the subject one of special interest to the Biblical nations—the rather because light in the East has a clearness, a brilliancy, is accompanied by an intensity of heat, and is followed in its influence by a largeness of good, of which the inhabitants of less genial climes can have no conception. Light easily and naturally became, in consequence, with Orientals, a representative of the highest human good. All the more joyous emotions of the mind, all the pleasing sensations of the frame, all the happy hours of domestic intercourse, were described under imagery derived from light (1 Kings xi:36; Is. lviii:8; Esth. viii:16; Ps. xcvii:11). The transition was natural from earthly to heavenly, from corporeal to spiritual things; and so light came to typify true religion and the felicity which it imparts. But as light not only came from God, but also makes man's way clear before him, so it was employed to signify moral truth, and preeminently that divine system of truth which is set forth in the Bible, from its earliest gleanings onward to the perfect day of the Great Sun of Righteousness. The application of the term to religious topics had the greater propriety because the light in the world, being accompanied by heat, purifies, quickens, enriches; which effects it is the peculiar province of true religion to produce in the human soul. Hence its symbolical use.

It is doubtless owing to the special providence under which the divine lessons of the Bible were delivered, that the views which the Hebrews took on this subject, while they were high and worthy, did not pass into superstition, and so cease to be truly religious. Other Eastern nations beheld the sun when it shone, or the moon walking in brightness, and their hearts were secretly enticed, and their mouth kissed their hand in token of adoration (Job xxxi:26, 27). This 'iniquity' the Hebrews not only avoided, but when they considered the heavens they recognized the work of God's fingers, and learnt a lesson of humility as well as of reverence (Ps. viii:3, sq.).

Figurative. (1) God is "light;" his nature is infinitely pure and glorious; he has all wisdom, excellency and usefulness; and is the author of all knowledge and comfort to his creatures (Ps. xxvii:1; Is. x:17; 1 John i:5). He is "in the light," possesses his own excellencies; is in Christ; and is clearly manifested in his word and works (1 John i:7). (2) Christ is "the light;" he is the fountain of all light and knowledge, natural, spiritual, and eternal; and in him we discern everything important (Luke ii:32). (3) The "light of God's countenance," or "light of the Lord," is the instruction given by him; the discoveries of his glory and love; the comforts of his Spirit, and joy of his salvation (Ps. iv:6; Is. ii:5). (4) God's judgments are "as the light that goeth forth;" his laws are clear and plain, and his sentences and punishments are righteous, pure, speedy, and irresistible (Hos. vi:5). (5) John the Baptist, and other inspired men, are called "light," or "lights;" they are endowed with the knowledge of divine things, and are delightful means of instructing, directing, and comforting others (Matt. v:14; John v:35). (6) Saints are compared to "light;" they have the saving knowledge of divine things, and, by their instruction and holy conversation, are agreeable means of conveying knowledge and comfort to others (Luke xvi:8; Eph. v:8). (7) Good kings are called "light," to denote their agreeable splendor, and the counsel and comfort which their subjects receive from them (2 Sam. xxiii:4). (8) A son, or successor, is called "light," as he honors, and keeps his ancestors in view (1 Kings xi:36). (9) The word of God, particularly the gospel, is a "light," or a "lamp;" it discovers to us things divine and eternal, and guides us to glory and happiness (Ps. cxix:105; Matt. iv:16). (10) The saving knowledge produced by God's word in our heart is "light;" we thereby discern the most glorious and eternal objects, and are wise unto salvation. (11) Prosperity, joy, or comfort, is called "light." How pleasant in itself, and it renders men conspicuous (Esth. viii:16; Ps. xcvi:11; Is. lviii:8). (12) The heavenly glory is called "light," and "light of life," to represent its excellency, purity, knowledge, and comfort (Col. i:12). Brown.

LIGHTEN (lit'n), (Gr. ἀποκάλυψις, ap-ok-al'oop-sis).

1. To give light to (Luke ii:32).
2. To make light by unloading (Acts xxvii:18).
3. To make to see or shine; or to fill with comfort (Ps. lxxvii:18 and xxxiv:5). (See ENLIGHTEN.)

LIGHTNING (lit'ning), (Heb. פָּרָק, haw-rawk', gleam; Gr. ἀστραπή, as-trap-ay'), flashes of fire that attend thunder. The motion thereof is quick and majestic; and it is called God's light, that is, as it were, spread along the sky, as he forms it, and it is grand and glorious (Job xxviii:26 and xxxvi:30).

Figurative. (1) The terrors of the divine wrath are often represented by thunder and lightning; and thunder, on account of its awful impression on the minds of mortals, is often spoken of in Scripture as the voice of the Lord (Exod. ix:28; Job xxviii:26; xxxvii:3, 5; xxxviii:25; xl:9). (2) Divine judgments are likened to lightning (Rev. viii:5; xvi:18 and xi:19). (3) Satan falls as lightning from heaven, when his power and interest are suddenly ruined (Luke xi:18).

LIGN ALOES (lin' al'ōz), (Heb. אֶלֶוֹת, al-haw-leem'; Gr. ἀλόη, al-o-ay'). This is doubtless the lignum aloes of the ancients, the product of Aquilaria Agallocha, and other trees of the same genus growing in India and China according to Roxburg. (See AHALIM; ALOES.)

LIGURE (lig'ūr), (Heb. לֵהֶשֶׁם, leh'shem), a precious stone in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii:19; xxxix:12). It has been best identified with the Jacinth, a hyacinthine stone, sometimes shading into yellow or brown, and sometimes into imperfect pistachio green. It is harder than the emerald; but, notwithstanding, the ancients used to engrave upon it.

LIKE (lik), (Heb. כֶּמֶס, kem-o'), likely (Jer. xxxviii:9). "He is like to die for hunger in the place where he is: for there is no more bread in the city."

LIKHI (lik'hi), (Heb. לִיכִי, lik-khee', learned), a Manassite, the third named of the sons of Shemida, the son of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii:19). He left few, if any, descendants, (B. C. after 1950).

LIKING (lik'ing), in the A. V. used both as a noun, meaning condition, flight (Job xxxix:4), "Their young ones are in good liking;" and as a participle meaning "conditioned" (Dan. i:10).

LILY (lil'y), (Gr. κρινον, kri'non). The lily is frequently mentioned in the Authorized Version of the Old Testament as the translation of שׁוֹשַׁן, (shoo-shan').

This plant is mentioned in the well-known and beautiful passage (Matt. vi:28): "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these;" so also in Luke xii:27. Here it is evident that the plant alluded to must have been indigenous or grown wild, in the vicinity of the sea of Galilee, must have been of an ornamental character, and from the Greek term κρινον being applied to it, of a lilaceous nature. Travelers in Palestine mention that in the month of January the fields and groves everywhere abound with various species of lily, tulip, and narcissus.

A species of lily (the Lilium chalcedonicum of botanists) is in flower at the season of the year when the sermon on the Mount is supposed to have been spoken, is indigenous in the very locality, and is conspicuous, even in the garden, for its remarkable showy flowers, there can now be little doubt that it is the plant alluded to by our Savior. This is much more likely to be the plant intended than some others which have been adduced, as, for instance, the scarlet amaryllis, having white flowers with bright purple streaks, found by Salt at Adowa. Others have preferred the Crown imperial, which is a native of Persia and Cashmere. Most authors have united in considering the white lily, Lilium candidum, to be the plant to which our Savior referred; but it is doubtful whether it has ever been found in a wild state in Palestine. This opinion is confirmed by a correspondent at Aleppo (Gardener's Chronicle, iii. 429), who has resided long in Syria, but is acquainted only with the botany of Aleppo and Antioch: 'I never saw the white lily in a wild state, nor have I heard of its being so in Syria. It is cultivated here on the roofs of the houses in pots as an exotic bulb, like the daffodil.' J. F. R.

LILY WORK (ליל'י wårk), (Heb. שׁוֹשַׁן, shooshan', lily; מַח-אֶשׁ, mah-as-eh', work), part of the ornamentation of the two pillars which were erected (2 Chron. iii:15), before the temple (comp. 1 Kings vii:19, 22). (See TEMPLE.)

LIME (lim), (Heb. לִימ, seed), a material named only three times in the Bible (Deut. xxvii:2, 4; Is. xxxiii:12; Amos ii:1). It is probable that the Jews learned the use of the lime-kiln and lime from the Egyptians.

LINE (lin). One Greek and several Hebrew words are thus rendered. The term is used variously in the Scriptures. It denotes:

1. A cord or instrument to measure and adjust things by (1 Kings vii:15; Is. xxxiv:17; 2 Sam. viii:2).

2. A province or course of motion (Ps. xix:4). Thus the apostles' line or voice went to the ends of the earth (Rom. x:18); and to boast in another man's line, was to go where he had labored, and pretend to have done the work accomplished by him (2 Cor. x:16).

3. A portion, which is as it were measured out by lines (Ps. xvi:6).

4. A short instruction, that might be as it were written in one line (Is. xxviii:10).

Figurative. (1) The word of God is a measuring line; as our whole conduct, and all the forms and ordinances of the church, must be adjusted thereby (Ezek. xl:3). (2) In a promise the stretching out of the line upon a place, imports the measuring of the ground to build houses on it (Jer. xxxi:39; Zech. i:16, and ii:1). (3) But to stretch the line of confusion and stones of emptiness on a place, is to render it altogether waste (Is. xxxiv:11, 17). (4) Judgments laid on according to men's deserts, and which lay cities razed on the ground, are called a line (Lam. ii:8). (5) The line of Samaria, and plummet of the house of Ahab, is such ruin as Samaria and the family of Ahab met with (2 Kings xxi:13). (6) To lay plummet to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, is to punish people according to the due desert of their deeds (Is. xxviii:17).

LINEN (lin'en). Several Hebrew and Greek words are translated linen, among them the following:

1. Pish-teh' (Heb. פִּשְׁתֵּה, carded) is rendered "linen" in Lev. xiii:47, sq.; Deut. xxii:11; Jer. xiii:1, etc.; and "flax" in Josh. ii:6; Judg. xv:14; Prov. xxxi:13; Is. xix:9; Ezek. xl:3; Hos. ii:5, 9. It was used, like our "cotton," to denote not only flax (Judg. xv:14), or raw material from which the linen was made, but also the plant itself (Josh. ii:6), and the manufacture from it. It was used for nets (Is. xix:9), girdles (Jer. xiii:1), measuring lines (Ezek. xl:3), as well as for the dress of the priests (xliv:17, 18). (See FLAX.)

2. Boots (Heb. בּוּט, from root signifying whiteness), always translated "fine linen," except in 2 Chron. v:12 ("white linen"), is apparently a late word, and probably the same with the Greek βύσσος, boos'sos. It was used for the dresses of the Levite choir in the temple (2 Chron. v:12). It is spoken of as the finest and most precious stuff worn by kings (1 Chron. xv:27). The dress of the rich man in the parable was purple and fine linen (βύσσος, Luke xvi:19). "Fine linen," with purple and silk, are enumerated in Rev. xviii:12 as among the merchandise of the mystical Babylon. It is a matter of dispute whether cotton or linen is meant by this word.

3. Shaysh (Heb. שַׁיֵשׁ, bleached), an Egyptian word referring chiefly to the Egyptian bys-sus, which was brought to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii:7), and was among the offerings brought out of Egypt by the Israelites (Exod. xxv:4; xxxv:6). The exact material of which shaysh was made is difficult to determine, our translators hesitating whether linen or silk should be used (Gen. xli:42, marg. "silk"; Prov. xxxi:22, "silk" in the text).

4. Ay-toon' (Heb. אֵיטוֹן, twisted) occurs only in Prov. vii:16, and there in connection with Egypt. It was probably a kind of thread, made of Egyptian flax, and used for ornamenting the coverings of beds with tapestry work.

5. Bad (Heb. בַּד, perhaps from its separation for sacred uses) is a word employed in describing the linen dresses worn in religious ceremonies, and may refer to the cloth made from the shaysh, or yarn. It occurs in Exod. xxviii:42; xxxix:28; Lev. vi:10; xvi:4, 23, 32; 1 Sam. ii:18; xxii:18; 2 Sam. vi:14; 1 Chron. xv:27; Ezek. ix:2, 3, 11; x:2, 6, 7; Dan. x:5; xii:6, 7. Celsius is of the opinion that bad signifies the finest and best Egyptian linen. For fuller discussion of the whole subject see Bys-sus.

Figurative. Fine white linen is in Scripture the emblem of innocence or moral purity (Rev. xv:6), though it is also mentioned as a mark of luxury (Luke xvi:19).

LINTEL (lin'tel).

1. (Heb. אֵיטוֹן, ah'yil, a pilaster or pillar in the wall), a beam forming the upper frame of a door (1 Kings vi:31), elsewhere "post."

2. (Heb. קַפְתוֹרֵה, kaf-tore', a chaplet), Amos ix:1; Zeph. ii:14. The rendering "knop" would be more correct, which is found in all other passages.

3. (Heb. מַשְׁכֹּפֶה, mask-kefe', a projecting cover), Ex. xii:22, 23. The upper door post (Ex. xii:7), which is undoubtedly the correct rendering.

LINUS (li'nus), (Gr. Λίνος, lee'nos), one of the Christians at Rome whose salutations Paul sent to Timothy (2 Tim. iv:21).

He is said to have been the first bishop of Rome after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul (Irenæus, Adv. Hæresis, iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 2, 4; v. 6). (A. D. 64.)

LION (li'un), (Heb. אֲרִי, ar-ee').

The most powerful, daring, and impressive of all carnivorous animals, the most magnificent in aspect and awful in voice. Being very common in Syria in early times, the lion naturally supplied many forcible images to the poetical language of Scripture, and not a few historical incidents in its narratives. This is shown by the great number of passages (about 130) where this animal, in all the stages of existence—as the whelp, the young adult, the fully mature, the lioness—occurs under different names, exhibiting that multiplicity of denominations which always results when some great image is constantly present to the popular mind.

(1) Different Names. Thus we have (1) gor, "a suckling," a lion's whelp, a very young lion (Gen. xlix:9; Deut. xxxiii:20; Jer. li:38; Ezek. xix:2; Nahum ii:11, 12, etc.). (2) Ke-pher, "the shaggy," a young lion, when first leaving the protection of the old pair to hunt independently (Ezek. xix:2, 3; Ps. xci:13; Prov. xix:12, etc.). (3) ar-ee', "the puller in pieces," an adult and vigorous lion, a lion having paired, vigilant and enterprising in search of prey (Nahum ii:12; 2 Sam. xvii:10; Num. xxiii:24). This is the common name of the animal. (4) Sha'chal, "the roarer," a mature lion in full strength; a black lion (Job iv:10; x:16; Ps. xci:13; Prov. xxvi:13; Hos. v:14; xiii:7). This denomination may very possibly refer to a distinct variety of lion, and not to a black species or race, because neither black nor white lions are recorded, excepting in Oppian (De Venat. iii:43); but the term may be safely referred to the color of the skin, not of the fur; for some lions have the former fair, and even rosy, while in other races it is perfectly black. An Asiatic lioness, formerly at Exeter Change, had the naked part of the nose, the roof of the mouth, and the bare soles of all the feet pure black, though the fur itself was very pale buff. Yet albinism and melanism are not uncommon in the felinæ; the former occurs in tigers, and the latter is frequent in leopards, panthers, and jaguars. (5) La'yish, "the strong," a fierce lion, one in a state of fury (Job iv:11; Prov. xxx:30; Is. xxx:6). (6) Labi-ah', "lowing," "roaring," hence a lioness (Job iv:11), where the lion's whelps are denominated 'the sons of Labiah,' or of the lioness.

(2) Size. The lion is the largest and most formidably armed of all carnassial animals, the Indian tiger alone claiming to be his equal. One full grown, of Asiatic race, weighs above 450 pounds and those of Africa often above 500 pounds. The fall of a fore paw in striking has been estimated to be equal to twenty-five pounds' weight, and the grasp of the claws, cutting four inches in depth, is sufficiently powerful to break the vertebræ of an ox. The huge laniary teeth and jagged molars worked by powerful jaws, and the tongue entirely covered with horny papillæ, hard as a rasp, are all subservient to an immensely strong muscular structure, capable of prodigious exertion, and minister to the self-confidence which these means of attack inspire. In Asia the lion rarely measures more than nine feet and a half from the nose to the end of the tail, though a tiger-skin of which we took the dimensions was but a trifle less than thirteen feet. In Africa they are considerably larger, and supplied with a much greater quantity of mane. Both tiger and lion are furnished with a small horny apex to the tail—a fact noticed by the ancients, but only verified of late years, because this object lies concealed in the hair of the tip and is very liable to drop off. All the varieties of the lion are spotted when whelps; but they become gradually buff or pale yellow. One African variety, very large in size, perhaps a distinct species, has a peculiar and most ferocious physiognomy, a dense black mane extending half way down the back, and a black fringe along the abdomen and tip of the tail; while those of Southern Persia and the Dekkan are nearly destitute of that defensive ornament. The roaring voice of the species is notorious to a proverb, but the warning cry of attack is short, snappish, and sharp. Like all the felinæ, they are more or less nocturnal, and seldom go abroad to pursue their prey till after sunset. When not pressed by hunger, they are naturally indolent, and, from their habits of uncontrolled superiority, perhaps capricious, but often less sanguinary and vindictive than is expected.

(3) Monogamous. Lions are monogamous, the male living constantly with the lioness, both hunting together, or for each other when there is a litter of whelps; and the mutual affection and care for their offspring which they display are remarkable in animals by nature doomed to live by blood and slaughter. It is while seeking prey for their young that they are most dangerous; at other times they bear abstinence, and when pressed by hunger will sometimes feed on carcasses found dead. They live to more than fifty years; consequently, having annual litters of from three to five cubs, they multiply rapidly when not seriously opposed.

(4) Numerous. In ancient times, when the devastations of Egyptian, Persian, Greek, and Roman armies passed over Palestine, there can be little doubt that these destroyers made their appearance in great numbers. The fact, indeed, is attested by the impression which their increase made upon the mixed heathen population of Samaria, when Israel was carried away into captivity (2 Kings xvii:25, 26).

(5) Scriptural Illustrations. The Scriptures present many striking pictures of lions, touched with wonderful force and fidelity; even where the animal is a direct instrument of the Almighty, while true to his mission, he still remains so to his nature. Thus nothing can be more graphic than the record of the man of God (1 Kings xiii:28), disobedient to his charge, struck down from his ass, and lying dead, while the lion stands by him, without touching the lifeless body, or attacking the living animal, usually a favorite prey. See also Gen. xlix:9; Job iv:10, 11; Nahum ii:11, 12. Samson's adventure also with the young lion (Judg. xiv:5, 6) and the picture of the young lion coming up from the underwood cover on the banks of the Jordan, all attest a perfect knowledge of the animal and its habits. Finally, the lions in the den with Daniel, miraculously leaving him unmolested, still retain, in all other respects, the real characteristics of their nature. C. H. S.

Figurative. (1) God is compared to "a lion" in his threatenings, judgments, and chastisements (Hos. v:14; Amos i:2; iii:8). (2) Christ is "the lion of the tribe of Judah," descending from Judah in respect of his manhood; he is the almighty Awakener and Conqueror of souls (Rev. v:5). (3) The church is likened to a "lion" strengthened of God; she overcomes, and is terrible to all that oppose her (Mic. v:8); her ministers, especially in the primitive ages, were like "lions," bold, courageous, and active in their work, and conquered multitudes for Christ (Rev. iv:7). (4) The saints are represented as "lions," because of their boldness and activity in the cause of God (Prov. xxviii:1). (5) The tribe of Judah is likened to "a lion," to denote its courage, activity, bravery, and conquests; the tribe of Judah had kings courageous and terrible, who attacked and subdued their enemies. (6) By Samson, the Danites as "lions," mightily mauled their enemies the Philistines (Gen. xlix:9; Deut. xxxiii:22). (7) The devil is a "roaring lion"; he furiously goes about to terrify believers and destroy mankind (1 Pet. v:8). (8) Tyrants, oppressors, such as the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian conquerors, and the last four kings of Judah are called "lions" (Is. xxi:8; Jer. iv:7; v:6; Ezek. xix; Amos iii:8; Nah. ii:12). (9) Men full of wickedness, persecution, oppression, are compared to "lions," as they terrify, tear and murder others around (Is. xi:7; Ezek. xxii:25).

LIP (lip), (Heb. ^{לִפְּי}, saw-faw', with the idea of termination).

Figurative. (1) To have the "mouth" or "lips covered," imports shame and grief (Lev. xiii:45; Ezek. xxiv:17, 22; Mic. iii:7). (2) To "refrain the lips," is to speak little and seasonably; as "the talk of the lips," vain and idle speech, and empty boasting without practice, tends only to poverty (Prov. x:19; xiv:23). (3) To "open the mouth or lips wide," is to talk rashly, boastingly, reproachfully (Ps. xxxv:21; Prov. xiii:3); or to listen with the utmost attention, earnestly desiring instruction (Job xxix:23); or earnestly to desire satisfaction and blessings to our soul (Ps. lxxxi:10). (4) "Uncircumcised of lips" (Exod. vi:12), i. e., not of ready speech, is the same as "slow of speech" (iv:10). (5) The "fruit of the lip" (Heb. xiii:15) is a metaphor for praise. (6) By a bolder figure we have "the calves of the lips" (Hos. xiv:2) for a thank offering. (7) To "shoot out the lip" (Ps. xxii:7) has always been an expression of the utmost scorn and defiance. (8) Unclean lips are such as are polluted with sinful words (Is. vi:5). (9) Burning lips denote fine language, ardent protestations, or words apparently full of love (Prov. xxvi:23).

LIQUOR or LIQUORS (lik'er), the translation of three different Hebrew words. One denotes a "tear"—i. e., the juice of the olive and grapes, (Ex. xxii:29); the second denotes "maceration"—i. e., drink prepared by steeping grapes, (Num. vi:3); the last, "mixture"—i. e., highly-flavored wine, (Cant. vii:2). (See WINE.)

LIST (list), (Gr. ^{θελω}, thel'o), to please, like, will (Matt. xvii:12; Mark ix:13; John iii:8).

LITTER (lit'ter). The word translated litter, in Is. lxvi:20, is ^{לִטְוֵב}, tsawb, and is the same which, in Num. vii:3, denotes the wains or carts drawn by oxen, in which the materials of the tabernacle were removed from place to place.

The tsawb was not, therefore, a litter, which is not drawn, but carried. This is the only place in which the word occurs in the Authorized translation. We are not, however, to infer from this that the Hebrews had no vehicles of the kind. Litters, or palanquins, were, as we know, in use among the ancient Egyptians. They were borne upon the shoulders of men, and appear to have been used for carrying persons of consideration short distances on visits, like the sedan chairs of a former day in England. We doubt if the Hebrews had this kind of litter, as it scarcely agrees with their simple, unluxurious habit; but that they had litters borne by beasts, such as are still common in Western Asia, seems in the highest degree probable.

In Cant. iii:9, we find the word aphiryon, Sept. ^{πορείον}, carriage, Vulg., ferculum, which occurs nowhere else in Scripture, and is applied to a vehicle used by King Solomon. This word is rendered 'chariot' in our Authorized Version, although unlike any other word so rendered in that version. It literally means a moving couch, and is usually conceived to denote a kind of sedan, litter, or rather palanquin, in which great personages and women were borne from place to place. The name, as well as the object, immediately suggests that it may have been nearly the same thing as the takht-ravan, the moving throne, or scat, of the Persians. It consists of a light frame fixed on two strong poles, like those of our sedan chair. The frame is generally covered with cloth, and has a door, sometimes of lattice work, at each side. It is carried by two mules, one between the poles before, the other behind. These conveyances are used by great persons, when disposed for retirement or ease during a journey, or when sick or feeble from age. But they are chiefly used by ladies of consideration in their journeys.

The popular illustrators of Scripture do not appear to have been acquainted with this and the other litters of Western Asia; and have, therefore, resorted to India, and drawn their illustrations from the palanquins borne by men, and from the howdahs of elephants. This is unnecessary, as Western Asia still supplies conveyances of this description, more suitable and more likely to have been anciently in use than any which the farther East can produce. If the one already described should seem too humble, there are other takht-ravans of more imposing appearance. In Arabia, or in the countries where Arabian usages prevail, two camels are usually employed to bear the takht-ravan, and sometimes two horses. When borne by camels, the head of the hindmost of the animals is bent painfully down under the vehicle. This is the most comfortable kind of litter, and two light persons may travel in it.

The shibreeyeh is another kind of camel-litter, resembling the Indian howdah, by which name (or rather hódaj) it is sometimes called. It is composed of a small square platform with a canopy or arched covering. It accommodates but one person, and is placed upon the back of a camel, and rests upon two square camel-chests, one on each side of the animal. It is very evident, not only from the text in view, but from others, that the Hebrews had litters; and there is little reason to doubt that they were the same as those now employed in Palestine and the neighboring countries, where there are still the same circumstances of climate, the same domestic animals, and essentially the same habits of life, as in the Biblical period.

LITTLE OWL (lit't'l owl). See OWL.

LIVELY (liv'ly), (Heb. ^{חַיִּים}, khaw-yeh', lively), Exod. i:10, full of life, vigorous, strong; (Gr. ^{ζάω}, dzah'o, living), Acts vii:38, etc. "This is he who received the lively oracles to give unto us."

LIVER (liv'er), (Heb. ^{כִּבְדָּא}, kaw-bade', meaning to be heavy), occurs in Exod. xxix:13, 22; Lev. iii:4, 10, 15; iv:9; vii:4; viii:16, 25; ix:10, 19; Prov. vii:23; Lam. ii:11; Ezek. xxi:21; it is applied to the liver, the heaviest of the viscera, as we in English use the word "lights" for lungs, the lightest.

(1) In all the instances where the word occurs in the Pentateuch, it forms part of the phrase translated in the A. V. 'the caul that is above the liver,' but which Gesenius understands to be the great lobe of the liver itself, rather than the caul over it. Jahn thinks the smaller lobe to be meant. It appears from the same passages that it was burnt upon the altar, and not eaten as sacrificial food (Jahn, Biblisches Archäol. sec. 378, n. 7). The liver was supposed by the ancient Jews, Greeks, and Romans to be the seat of the passions, pride, love, etc. Thus Gen. xlix:6, 'with their assembly let not' (literally, my liver) 'be united.' (See Heb. of Ps. xvi:9; lviii:9; cviii:2; and Anacreon, Ode iii at end; Theocritus, Idyll xi:16; Horace, Carm. i. 13, 4, 25, 15; iv. 1, 12; and the Notes of the Delphin edition; comp. also Persius, Sat. v. 129; Juvenal, Sat. v. 647). (2) Wounds in the liver were supposed to be mortal; thus the expressions in

Prov. vii:23, 'a dart through his liver,' and Lam. ii:11, 'my liver is poured out upon the earth,' are each of them a periphrasis for death itself. (3) The passage in Ezekiel contains an interesting reference to the most ancient of all modes of divination, by the inspection of the viscera of animals and even of mankind sacrificially slaughtered for the purpose. It is there said that the king of Babylon, among other modes of divination referred to in the same verse, 'looked upon the liver.' The liver was always considered the most important organ in the ancient art of Extispicium, or divination by the entrails. Philostratus felicitously describes it as 'the prophesying tripod of all divination' (Life of Apollonius, viii, 7, 5). The rules by which the Greeks and Romans judged of it are amply detailed in Adam's Roman Antiquities, p. 261, etc., London, 1834. But divination is coeval and coextensive with a belief in the divinity. We accept the argument of the Stoics, 'sunt Di: ergo est Divinatio.' We know that as early as the days of Cain and Abel there were certain means of communication between God and man, and that those means were connected with the sacrifice of animals, and we prefer to consider those means as the source of divination in later ages, conceiving that when the real tokens of the Divine interest with which the primitive families of man were favored ceased, in consequence of the multiplying of human transgressions, their descendants endeavored to obtain counsel and information by the same external observances. We believe that thus only will the minute resemblances be accounted for which we discover between the different methods of divination, utterly untraceable to reason, but which have prevailed from unknown antiquity among the most distant regions. It is further important to remark that the first recorded instance of divination is that of the teraphim of Laban, a native of Padan-aram (Gen. xxxi:19, 30), but by which teraphim both the Septuagint and Josephus understood ἡπαρ τῶν ἀγῶν, 'the liver of goats' (Antiq. vi:11, 4).

LIVING CREATURES (lit'ing krē'tūrs), (Ezek. cc. i, iii, x; Rev. iv:6-9, A. V. "beasts," but should always be translated as R. V. "living creatures"). They are identical with CHERUBIM (see CHERUB, CHERUBIM).

LIZARD (liz'ērd), (Heb. לָצָוֹד, let-aw-aw', hiding), a family term, occurring in a list (Lev. xi:30) of six, all of which are rendered in R. V. by names denoting lizards.

Under this denomination the modern zoologist places all the cold-blooded animals that have the conformation of serpents with the addition of four feet. Thus viewed as one great family they constitute the Saurians, Lacertinae, and Laceridae of authors; embracing numerous generical divisions, which commence with the largest, that is, the crocodile group, and pass through sundry others, a variety of species, formidable, disgusting, or pleasing in appearance—some equally frequenting the land and water, others absolutely confined to the earth and to the most arid deserts; and though in general harmless, there are a few with disputed properties, some being held to poison or corrode by means of the exudation of an ichor, and others extolled as aphrodisiacs, or of medical use in pharmacy; but these properties in most, if not in all, are undetermined or illusory. Of some genera, such as the crocodile and chameleon, we have already made mention. (See CHAMELEON; CROCODILE; DRAGON; LEVIATHAN.) And therefore we shall confine attention to the lizards that are inhabitants of Western Asia and Egypt, and to those more particularly noticed in the Bible.

(1) Of these, commentators indicate six or seven species. Bochart refers tsab (Lev. xi:30) to one of the group of Monitors or Varanus, the Nilotic lizard, Lacerta Nilotica, Varanus Niloticus, or Varan of the Arabs. Like the other of this form, it is possessed of a tail double the length of the body, but is not so well known in Palestine, where there is only one real river (Jordan) which is not tenanted by this species. The true crocodile frequented the shores and marshes of the coast down to a comparatively late period; and therefore it may well have had a more specific name than Leviathan—a word apparently best suited to the dignified and lofty diction of the prophets, and clearly of more general signification than the more colloquial designation. Jerome was of this opinion; and it is thus likely that tsab was applied to both, as waran is now considered only a variety of, or a young, crocodile. There is a second of the same group, Lacerta Scincus of Merrem (Varanus Arenarius), Waran-el-hard, also reaching to six feet in length; and a third, not as yet clearly described, which appears to be larger than either, growing to nine feet, and covered with bright cupreous scales. This last prefers rocky and stony situations. It is in this section of the Saurians that most of the gigantic fossil species, the real ben-nephilim, 'children of the giants,' are found to be located; and of the existing species some are reported to possess great strength. One of the last-mentioned pursues its prey on land with a rapid bounding action, feeds on the larger insects, and is said to attack game in a body, sometimes destroying even sheep. The Arabs, in agreement with the ancients, assert that this species will do fierce and victorious battle with serpents.

(2) We come next to the group of lizards more properly so called, which Hebrew commentators take to be the letaah a name having some allusion to poison and adhesiveness. The word occurs only once (Lev. xi:30), where Saurians alone appear to be indicated. If the Hebrew root were to guide the decision, letaah would be another name for the gecko or anakah, for there is but one species which can be deemed venomous; and with regard to the quality of adhesiveness, though the geckos possess it most, numerous common lizards run up and down perpendicular walls with great facility. We, therefore, take chomet, or the sand lizard of Bochart, to be the true lizard, several (probably many) species existing in myriads on the rocks in sandy places, and in ruins in every part of Palestine and the adjacent countries.

(3) We now come to the Stellianes, which have been confounded with the noxious geckos. They are best known by the bundles of starlike spines on the body. Next we place the Geckotians, among which comes the anakah, in our version denominated ferret, but which is with more propriety transferred to the noisy and venomous abu-burs of the Arabs. The particular species most probably meant is the lacerta gecko of Hasselquist, the gecko lobatus of Geoffroy, distinguished by having the soles of the feet dilated and striated like open fans, from whence a poisonous ichor is said to exude, inflaming the human skin, and infecting food that may have been trodden upon by the animal. Hence the Arabic name of abu-burs, or 'father leprosy,' at Cairo. To these we add the Chameleons, already described (see CHAMELEON); and then follows the Scincus.

Of the species of Seps, that is, viviparous serpent-lizards, having the body of snakes, with four weak limbs, a species with only three toes on each foot, the lacerta chalcides of Linn., appears to extend to Syria. C. H. S.

LOADEN (lōd'n), (Heb. ^{לָאָדַן}, aw-mas'), made a load, laden, burdened (Is. xlv:1).

LOAF (lōf), (Heb. ^{לֶחֶם}, kik-kawr', circle; Gr. ἄpros, ar'tos; occasionally ^{לֶחֶם}, lekh'em, bread), a biscuit, or round or oval cake, the usual form of bread among the orientals (Exod. xxix:23; Judg. viii:5; 1 Sam. x:3; 1 Chron. xvi:3; Matt. xiv:17; Mark vi:38, etc.). (See BREAD.)

LO-AMMI (lō'am'mī), (Heb. ^{לֹא אֲמִי}, lo-am'mee, not my people), a name of symbolical significance, given by Hosea (i:9; ii:23) to his second son to indicate that Israel had been rejected by Jehovah, in allusion to the Babylonian Captivity (B. C. 725).

LOAN (lōn), the Mosaic laws which relate to the subject of borrowing, lending, and repaying, are in substance as follows:

(1) Interest. If an Israelite became poor, what he desired to borrow was to be freely lent to him, and no interest, either of money or produce, could be exacted from him; interest might be taken of a foreigner, but not of an Israelite by another Israelite (Exod. xxii:25; Deut. xxiii:19, 20; Lev. xxv:35-38). At the end of every seven years a remission of debts was ordained; every creditor was to remit what he had lent: of a foreigner the loan might be exacted, but not of a brother. If an Israelite wished to borrow, he was not to be refused because the year of remission was at hand (Deut. xv:1-11).

(2) Pledges. Pledges might be taken, but not as such the mill or the upper millstone, for that would be to take a man's life in pledge. If the pledge was raiment, it was to be given back before sunset, as being needful for a covering at night. The widow's garment could not be taken in pledge (Exod. xxii:26, 27; Deut. xxiv:6, 17).

(3) Biblical Point of View. These laws relating to loans may wear a strange and somewhat repulsive aspect to the mere modern reader, and cannot be understood, either in their bearing or their sanctions, unless considered from the Biblical point of view. The land of Canaan (as the entire world) belonged to its Creator, but was given of God to the descendants of Abraham under certain conditions, of which this liberality to the needy was one. The power of getting loans therefore was a part of the poor man's inheritance. It was a lien on the land (the source of all property with agricultural people), which was as valid as the tenure of any given portion by the tribe or family to whose lot it had fallen. This is the light in which the Mosaic polity represents the matter, and in this light, so long as that polity retained its force, would it, as a matter of course, be regarded by the owners of property. Thus the execution of this particular law was secured by the entire force with which the constitution itself was recommended and sustained. But as human selfishness might in time endanger this particular set of laws, so Moses applied special support to the possibly weak part. Hence the emphasis with which he enjoins the duty of lending to the needy. Of this emphasis the very essence is the sanction supplied by that special providence which lay at the very basis of the Mosaic commonwealth; so that lending to the destitute came to be enforced with all the power derivable from the express will of God.

That the system of law regarding loans was carried into effect there is no reason to doubt. It formed an essential part of the general constitution, and therefore came recommended with the entire sanction which that system had on its own behalf; nor were there any predominant antagonistic principles at work which would prevent this from proceeding step by step, in its proper place and time, with the residue of the Mosaic legislation. Nor do the passages of Scripture (Job xxii:6; xxiv:3; Matt. xviii:28; Prov. xxviii:8; Ezek. xviii:8; Ps. xv:5; cix:11) which give us reason to think that usury was practiced and the poor debtor oppressed, show anything but those breaches to which laws are always liable, especially in a period when morals grow corrupt and institutions in consequence decline.

(4) Justice of the Law. While, however, the benign tendency of the laws in question is admitted, may it not be questioned whether they were strictly just? Such a doubt could arise only in a mind which viewed the subject from the position of our actual society. A modern might plead that he had a right to do what he pleased with his own; that his property of every kind—land, food, money—was his own; and that he was justified to turn all and each part to account for his own benefit. Apart from religious considerations this position is impregnable. But such a view of property finds no support in the Mosaic institutions. In them property has a divine origin, and its use is intrusted to man on certain conditions, which conditions are as valid as is the tenure of property itself. In one sense indeed, the entire land—all property—was a great loan, a loan lent of God to the people of Israel, who might well therefore acquiesce in any arrangement which required a portion—a small portion—of this loan to be under certain circumstances accessible to the destitute. This view receives confirmation from the fact that interest might be taken of persons who were not Hebrews and therefore lay beyond the sphere embraced by this special arrangement.

Had the Hebrews enjoyed a free intercourse with other nations, the permission to take usury of foreigners might have had the effect of impoverishing Palestine by affording a strong inducement for employing capital abroad; but, under the actual restrictions of the Mosaic law, this evil was impossible. Some not inconsiderable advantages must have ensued from the observance of these laws. The entire alienation and loss of the lent property were prevented by that peculiar institution which restored to every man his property at the great year of release. In the interval between the jubilees the system under consideration would tend to prevent those inequalities of social condition which always arise rapidly, and which have not seldom brought disaster and ruin on states. The affluent were required to part with a portion of their affluence to supply the wants of the needy, without exacting that recompense which would only make the rich richer and the poor more needy; thus superinducing a state of things scarcely more injurious to the one than to the other of these two parties. There was also in this system a strongly conservative influence. Agriculture was the foundation of the constitution. Had money-lending been a trade, money-making would also have been eagerly pursued. Capital would be withdrawn from the land; the agriculturist would pass into the usurer; huge inequalities would arise; commerce would assume predominance, and the entire commonwealth be overturned—changes and evils which were prevented, or, if not so, certainly retarded and abated, by the code of laws regarding loans. As it was, the gradually increasing wealth of the country was in the main laid out on the soil, so as to augment its productiveness and distribute its bounties.

(5) Teaching of Christ. These views may prepare the reader for considering the doctrine of 'the Great Teacher' on the subject of loans. It is found forcibly expressed in Luke's Gospel (vi:34, 35): 'If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again: but love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest; for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil.' But it can be justly maintained that Christ taught the justice of taking interest in the parable of the Talents and of the Pounds.

LOAVES (lōvz). See BREAD.

LOCK (lōk), (Heb. לֹקֶת, man-awl, lock of door).

The ancient Hebrews had fastenings of wood or iron for the doors of towns, prisons, and fortresses (Is. xlv:2), which were in the form of bolts. The gates of Jerusalem erected by Nehemiah had both bolts and locks (Judg. iii:23, 24, 25; Neh. iii:3). These bolts, or bars, were almost the only form of locks known. The key was a pin of iron or bronze, or sometimes of wood, to hold the bar in place.

LOCUST (lō'küst), (Heb. אֲרֵבֶה, ar-beh'), generic term; order, Hemiptera; species, Gryllus, Linnaeus.

It is an insect remarkable for numbers and voracity, and hence one of the most dreadful scourges of Eastern countries. Locusts, when mature, can fly to a considerable height, and, occasionally alighting for food and rest, they are often borne by the wind hundreds of miles. The locust is two inches or more in length. It is a winged, creeping thing. Like other insects of the order Orthoptera, it has four wings. Those of the anterior pair are narrow, while those of the posterior pair are broader, folded up when not in use, and transparent. It has six legs, on four of which it walks, while the hindmost pair, which are much longer than the others and equal to the body in length, it uses for springing (Lev. xi:21, 22). The mouth is furnished with cutting jaws, by means of which it nips off leaves and blades of grass.

There are many species of these insects found in the United States, but none precisely such as live in the Orient. The locusts most destructive and doubtless ordinarily referred to by the Bible are of two kinds, Acrydium peregrinum and Edipoda migratoria. In our English Bible seven terms probably describe this insect or allied species—viz., locust, bald locust, beetle, canker-worm, caterpillar, grasshopper, palmer-worm.

These seven terms are made to translate nine Hebrew names. The confusion of the entire subject may be seen by the fact that "locust" represents four original words, "grasshopper" two, and "caterpillar" two, while two original words have each a twofold translation. Doubtless the Jews themselves applied some of these terms as loosely and widely as we do such a word as "worm."

It is probable that several of the seven names mentioned describe locusts in their immature state. After leaving the egg this insect passes through changes answering to those of the butterfly, but is never dormant as a chrysalis. From first to last it is voracious, but when it is mature and can fly it lays its eggs and drifts away in vast clouds, perhaps to perish in the ocean. The locusts which the writer saw devastating portions of Syria were fully three inches long when their wings were closed (Lev. xi:22).

Van Lennep in writing of the destruction caused by locusts says: "The ground over which their devastating hordes have passed at once assumes an appearance of sterility and death. Well did the Romans call them 'the burners of the land,' which is the literal meaning of our word 'locust.' On they move, covering the ground so completely as to hide it from sight, and in such numbers that it often takes three or four days for the mighty host to pass by. When seen at a distance this swarm of advancing locusts resembles a cloud of dust or sand, reaching a few feet above the ground as the myriads of insects leap forward. The only thing that momentarily arrests their progress is a sudden change of weather, for cold benumbs them while it lasts. They also keep quiet at night, swarming like bees on the hedges and hedges until the morning sun warms and revives them and enables them to proceed on their devastating march (Nahum iii:17). They 'have no king' nor leader, yet they falter not, but press on in serried ranks, urged in the same direction by an irresistible impulse, and turn neither to the right hand nor to the left for any sort of obstacle (Prov. xxx:27). When a wall or a house lies in their way they climb straight up, going over the roof to the other side, and blindly rush in at the open doors and windows (Exod. x:6; Joel ii:9). When they come to water, be it a mere puddle or a river, a lake or the open sea, they never attempt to go round it, but unhesitatingly leap in and are drowned; and their dead bodies, floating on the surface, form a bridge for their companions to pass over. The scourge thus often comes to an end, but it as often happens that the decomposition of millions of insects produces pestilence and death (Joel ii:20). History records a remarkable instance which occurred in the year 125 before the Christian era. The insects were driven by the wind into the sea in such vast numbers that their bodies, being driven back by the tide upon the land, caused a stench, which produced a fearful plague, whereby 80,000 persons perished in Libya, Cyrene, and Egypt."

The passage in Lev. xi:22 describes four distinct insects of the locust order. "Beetle" is plainly a mistranslation for some one of these leapers, since whatever only crept or flew could be used for food. The locusts were ceremonially clean. John the Baptist ate them, and many others, particularly in Abyssinia, do so still; and being salted and fried, they taste like river cray fish (see as above, Lev. xi:22).

Figurative. The Assyrians were like locusts, for their number and their destructive influence, in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah

(Is. xxxiii:4, 5; Nah. iii:15, 17); and they ruined them, after they had been terribly mowed by the Syrians (Amos vii:1; comp. Joel i:6, 7; ii:2-9).

In the book of Revelation (ix:7) we have a literal description of the symbolical locust, which gives us a terrific impression of their power, and which is curiously illustrated by a passage from an Eastern traveler. An Arab from Bagdad, he says, compared the head of the locust to that of the horse; its breast to that of the lion; its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion; and so of other parts. In like manner the Italians still call locusts little horses, and the Germans call them hay-horses. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

LOD (löd), (Heb. לוד, lode, 1 Chron. viii:12; Ezra ii:33; Neh. vii:37; xi:35), is doubtless the city of Lydda (Acts ix:32, etc.). (See LYDDA.)

LO-DEBAR (lō-dē'bar), (Heb. לוד-באר, lo-deb-ar', no pasture).

A town of Gilead, named with places east of Jordan (2 Sam. xvii:27). It was the home of Machir who entertained Mephibosheth and sent food to David (2 Sam. ix:5).

LODGE, TO (lōj).

1. This word in the A. V. represents the Hebrew verb לון, loon, or לָן, leen, which usually has the force of "passing the night" (1 Kings xix:9; 1 Chron. ix:27; Is. x:29; Neh. iv:22; xiii:20, 21; Cant. vii:11; Job xxiv:7; xxxi:32, etc.). The same Hebrew word is otherwise translated in the A. V. by "lie all night" (2 Sam. xii:16; Cant. i:13; Job xxix:19); "tarry the night" (Gen. xix:2; Judg. xix:10; Jer. xiv:8); "remain" (Ex. xxiii:18).

2. In Josh. ii:1 the word in the original means "to lie," generally in allusion to sexual intercourse.

LOFT (lōft), (Heb. מַעְבָּדִים, al-ee-yaw', lofty), the upper room of a house (1 Kings xvii:19; Acts xx:9), either over the gate (2 Sam. xviii:24) or built on the roof (2 Kings xxiii:12).

LOG (lōg), (Heb. לֹג, lohg), a liquid measure, two-thirds of an imperial pint. (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

LOGOS (lōg'os), (Gr. Λόγος, logos, a word), as used in John i:1 it means the Word, symbolically referring to the creative law-giving, revealing activity of God.

(1) It designates especially the mediatorial character of our Redeemer, with special reference to his revelation of the character and will of the Father. It appears to be used as an abstract for the concrete, just as we find this same writer employing light for enlightener, life for life-giver, etc.; so that it properly signifies the speaker or interpreter, than which nothing can more exactly accord with the statement made (John i:18): "No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, hath declared him," i. e. communicated to us the true knowledge of his mind and character. (2) That the term is merely expressive of a divine attribute, a position which has been long and variously maintained by Socinians, though abandoned as untenable by some of their best authorities, is in total repugnance to all the circumstances of the context, which distinctly and expressly require personal subsistence in the subject which it describes. (3) He whom John styles the Logos, has the creation of all things ascribed to him; is set forth as possessing the country and people of the Jews; as the only begotten (son) of the Father; as assuming the human nature, and displaying in it the attributes of grace and truth, etc. Such things could never, with the least degree of propriety, be said of any mere attribute or quality. (4) Nor is the hypothesis of a personification to be reconciled with the universally admitted fact, that the style of John is the most simply historical and the furthest removed from that species of composition to which such a figure of speech properly belongs. To the Logos, the Apostle attributes eternal existence, distinct personality, and strict and proper Deity—characters which he also ascribes to him in his first epistle—besides the possession and exercise of perfections which absolutely exclude the idea of derived or created being.

LOIN (loin), (Heb. לָוֶה, kha-rats'), the part of the back and side between the ribs and hip.

The place of the girdle (Job xxxviii:3; xl:7; Is. v:27; xxxii:11); euphemistically for the seat of generation (Gen. xxxv:11; 1 Kings viii:19; 2 Chron. vi:9). Being the pivotal part of the body it was supposed to be most sensibly affected by pain or terror (Deut. xxxiii:11; Job xl:16; Ps. xxxviii:7; lxix:23; Is. xxi:3; Jer. xxx:6; Ezek. xxi:6).

Figurative. The dress of the Oriental nations being loose, it was necessary, when they were traveling or working, to gird up their garments and fasten them about their loins, hence, "to gird up the loins" (1 Kings xviii:46; Job xxxviii:3; xl:7; Prov. xxxi:17, etc.) is used as a figure for vigorous effort. In 1 Pet. i:13, it is used to denote a state of mind in which the soul is prepared to work and exert itself under the influence of divine grace.

LOIS (lō'is), (Gr. Λωΐς, lo-ee', perhaps agreeable), the grandmother of Timothy, not by the side of his father, who was a Greek, but by that of his mother.

Hence the Syriac has 'thy mother's mother.' She is commended by St. Paul for her faith (2 Tim. i:5); for although she might not have known that the Christ was come, and that Jesus of Nazareth was he, she yet believed in the Messiah to come, and died in that faith. (A. D. 69).

LONGEVITY (lōn-jēv'ī-tÿ). The lengthened ages of some of the ante and postdiluvian fathers, as given by Moses in the Hebrew text, are as follows:

		Years.
Adam.....	Gen. v:	5 930
Seth.....	"	8 912
Enos.....	"	11 905
Cainan.....	"	14 910
Mahalaleel.....	"	17 895

Infidelity has in various ages attacked revelation because of the supposed absurdity of assigning to any class of men this lengthened term of existence. In reference to this Josephus (Antiq. lib. iii.) remarks:—'Let no one upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, and with the few years which we now live, think that what we say of them is false; or make the shortness of our lives at present an argument that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life.' When we consider the compensating process which is going on, the marvel is that the human frame should not last longer than it does. Some, however, have supposed that the years above named are lunar, consisting of about thirty days; but this supposition, with a view to reduce the lives of the antediluvians to our standard, is replete with difficulties. At this rate the whole time, from the creation of man to the Flood, would not be more than about 140 years; and Methuselah himself would not have attained to the age which many even now do, whilst many must have had children when mere infants! Besides, if we compute the age of the postdiluvians by this mode of calculation—and why should we not?—we shall find that Abraham, who is said to have died in a good old age (Gen. xxv:8) could not have been more than fifteen years old! Moses must therefore have meant solar, not lunar years—not, however, exactly so long as ours, for the ancients generally reckoned twelve months, of thirty days each, to the year.

(1) St. Augustine's Explanation. But it is asked, if Moses meant solar years, how came it to pass that the patriarchs did not begin to beget children at an earlier period than they are reported to have done? Seth was 105 years old, on the lowest calculation, when he begat Enos; and Methuselah 187 when Lamech was born! St. Augustine (i:15) explains this difficulty in a two-fold manner, by supposing:

(1) Either that the age of puberty was later in proportion as the lives of the antediluvians were longer than ours.

(2) Or that Moses does not record the firstborn sons, but as the order of the genealogy required, his object being to trace the succession from Adam, through Seth, to Abraham.

(2) Josephus' Explanation. As to the probable reason why God so prolonged the life of man in the earlier ages of the world, and as to the subordinate means by which this might have been accomplished, Josephus says (Antiq. i, 3): 'For those ancients were beloved of God, and lately made by God himself; and because their food was then fitter for the prolongation of life, they might well live so great a number of years; and because God afforded them a longer time of life on account of their virtue and the good use they made of life in astronomical and geometrical discoveries, for they would not have had the time for foretelling the periods of the stars unless they had lived 600 years; for the great year is completed in that interval.'

(3) Reasons Examined. In the above passage Josephus enumerates four causes of the longevity of the earlier patriarchs. As to the first, viz., their being dearer to God than other men, it is plain that it cannot be maintained; for the profligate descendants of Cain were equally long-lived, as mentioned above, with others. Neither can we agree in the second reason he assigns; because we find that Noah and others, though born so long subsequently to the creation of Adam, yet lived to as great an age, some of them to a greater age than he did. If, again, it were right to attribute longevity to the superior quality of the food of the antediluvians, then the seasons on which this depends must, about Moses' time—for it was then that the term of human existence was reduced to its present standard—have assumed a fixed character. But no change at that time took place in the revolution of the heavenly bodies by which the seasons of heat, cold, etc., are regulated; hence we must not assume that it was the nature of the fruits they ate which caused longevity.

How far the antediluvians had advanced in scientific research generally, and in astronomical discovery particularly, we are not informed; nor can we place any dependence upon what Josephus says about the two inscribed pillars which remained from the old world (see Antiq. i, 2, 9). We are not, therefore, able to determine, with any confidence, that God permitted the earlier generations of man to live so long in order that they might arrive at a high degree of mental excellence. From the brief notices which the Scriptures afford of the character and habits of the antediluvians, we should rather infer that they had not advanced very far in discoveries in natural and experimental philosophy. (See ANTE-DILUVIANS.) We must suppose that they did not reduce their language to alphabetical order; nor was it necessary to do so at a time when human life was so prolonged that the tradition of the creation passed through only two hands to Noah. It would seem that the book ascribed to Enoch is a work of postdiluvian origin (see Jurieu, Crit. Hist., i. 41). Possibly a want of mental employment, together with the labor they endured ere they were able to extract from the earth the necessaries of life, might have been some of the proximate causes of that degeneracy which led God in judgment to destroy the old world.

If the antediluvians began to beget children at the age on an average of 100, and if they ceased to do so at 600 years (see Shuckford's Connect., i. 36), the world might then have been far more densely populated than it is now. Supposing, moreover, that the earth was no more productive antecedently than it was subsequently to the Flood, and that the antediluvian fathers were ignorant of those mechanical arts which so much abridge human labor now, we can easily understand how difficult they must have found it to secure for themselves the common necessaries of life, and this the more so if animal food was not allowed them. The prolonged life, then, of the generations before the Flood would seem to have been rather an evil than a blessing, leading as it did to the too rapid peopling of the earth. We can readily conceive how this might conduce to that awful state of things expressed in the words, 'And the whole earth was filled with violence.' In the absence of any well regulated system of government, we can imagine what evils must have arisen: the unprincipled would oppress the weak, the crafty would outwit the unsuspecting, and, not having the fear of God before their eyes, destruction and misery would be in their ways.

Still we admire the providence of God in the longevity of man immediately after the Creation and the Flood. After the Creation, when the world was to be peopled by one man and one woman, the age of the greatest part of those on record was 900 and upwards. But after the Flood, when there were three couples to repopulate the earth, none of the patriarchs, except Shem, reached the age of 500; and only the first three of his line, viz., Arphaxad, Salah, and Eber, who came in the first century after the Flood, lived nearly to that age. In the second century we do not find that any attained the age of 240; and in the third century (about the latter end of which Abraham was born), none, except Terah, arrived at 200; by which time the world was so well peopled, that they had built cities, and were formed into distinct nations under their respective kings (see Gen. xv).

That the common age of man has been the same in all times since the world was well peopled is manifest from profane as well as sacred history. Plato lived to the age of 81, and was accounted an old man; and those whom Pliny reckons up (vii:48) as rare examples of long life may, for the most part, be equalled in modern times. We cannot, then, but see the hand of God in the proportion that there is between births and deaths; for by this means the population of the world is kept up. If the fixed standard of human life were that of Methuselah's age, or even that of Abraham, the world would soon be overstocked; or if the age of man were limited to that of divers other animals, to 10, 20, or 30 years only, the decay of mankind would then be too fast. But on the present scale the balance is nearly even, and life and death keep an equal pace. In thus maintaining throughout all ages and places these proportions of mankind, and all other creatures, God declares himself to be indeed the ruler of the world. (See CHRONOLOGY.)

LONG-SUFFERING (lɔng'sūf'fēr-ɪŋ), (Heb. אַחֲזַר אֶת־אָרְזֵי, eh-reh' ap-pah-yeem', slow to anger; Gr. μακροθυμία, mak-roth-oo-mee'ah).

God's "long-suffering," is his patient bearing with manifold affronts, while he forbears to execute deserved wrath upon men, and waits to be gracious to them (Exod. xxxiv:6; Num. xiv:18; Ps. lxxxvi:15; Jer. xv:15; Rom. ii:4; ix:22; 1 Tim. i:16; 1 Pet. iii:20; 2 Pet. iii:9, 15). The saints' "long-suffering," is their unwearied firmness of mind under manifold trouble, their constant hope of the performance of God's promises, and their patient bearing with others to promote their reformation (Col. iii:12; comp. 2 Cor. vi:6; Eph. iv:2; 2 Tim. iv:2).

LOOKED (lōōkt), (Gr. προσδοκάω, pros-dok-ah'o), to expect (Acts xxviii:6).

LOOKING-GLASS (lōōk'ɪŋ glās'). What is thus translated was in fact a plate of metal polished so highly as to produce a very good reflection of objects. Usually these mirrors were of a round shape and provided with a handle (Ex. xxxviii:8; Job xxxvii:18; Is. iii:23). (See MIRROR.)

LOOP (lōōp), (Heb. לֹוּף, loo-law-aw', winding). The curtains of the tabernacle were fastened by loops to their corresponding knobs. They were probably made of goat's hair cord, and were dyed blue (Exod. xxvi:4, sq.; xxxvi:11). (See TABERNACLE.)

LORD, a Saxon word signifying ruler or governor.

In the A. V. the word Lord is used without much discrimination for all the names applied to God; which cannot be helped, as our language does not afford the same number of distinguishing titles as the Hebrew. When, however, the word represents the dread name of Jehovah, it is printed in small capitals, LORD, and is by this contrivance made a distinguishing term. As the Hebrew name Jehovah is one never used with reference to any but the Almighty, it is to be regretted that the Septuagint, imitated by our own and other versions, has represented it by a word which is also used for the Hebrew 'Adonai,' which is applied not only to God, but, like our 'Lord,' to creatures also, as to angels (Gen. xix:3; Dan. x:16, 17), to men in authority (Gen. xlii:30, 33), and to proprietors, owners, masters (Gen. xlv:8). The leading idea of the Hebrew, the Greek, and the English words is that of an owner or proprietor, whether God or man; and it occurs in the inferior application with great frequency in the New Testament. This application is either literal or complimentary: literal, when the party is really an owner or master, as in Matt. x:24; xx:8; xxi:40; Acts xvi:16, 19; Gal. iv:1, etc.; or when he is so as having absolute authority over another (Matt. ix:38; Luke x:2), or as being a supreme lord or sovereign (Acts xxv:26); and complimentary, when used as a title of address, especially to superiors, like the English Master, Sir; the French Sieur, Monsieur; the German Herr, etc., as in Matt. xiii:27; xxi:20; Mark vii:8; Luke ix:54.

It cannot but be deemed desirable that, instead of the extensive use of the word Lord which we have described, discriminating terms should be adopted in translation. Apart from the Jewish superstitions which influenced the Seventy in their translation, there can be no good reason why the name Jehovah should not be retained wherever it occurs in the Hebrew. Then 'Lord' might represent Adonai; or perhaps 'Sir,' or 'Master,' might be used when that word is applied to creatures; and God would very properly represent Elohim.

The different Hebrew words rendered for "Lord," are given, as adapted from Mc. & Str. Bib. Cyc., and Barnes' Bib. Cyc.

1. Yeh-ho-vaw' (Heb. יְהוָה, self-existent), Jehovah, the proper name of the God of the Hebrews, and should have been retained in that form by the translators instead of 'Lord.' (See JEHOVAH.)

2. Aw-done' (Heb. אֲדֹנָי, an early word denoting absolute control. It is not properly a divine title, being employed of the master of slaves (Gen. xxiv:14, 27; xxxix:2, 7; A. V. "master"); of kings as the lords of their subjects (Is. xxvi:13); of a husband as lord of the wife (Gen. xviii:12). It is applied to God as the owner and governor of the whole earth (Exod. xxiii:17; Ps. cxiv:7). It is sometimes used as a term of respect, like our sir; but with a pronoun attached ("my lord"), and often occurs in the plural.

3. Ado-nai' (Heb. אֲדֹנָי, the lord; the master), regarded by some as plural of the foregoing. It is chiefly used in the Pentateuch (Exod. iv:10, 13; Josh. vii:8); also when God is spoken of (1 Kings xiii:9; xxii:6, etc.). The Jews, out of a superstitious reverence for the name Jehovah, always, in reading, pronounce Adonai where Jehovah is written. The similar form, with the suffix, is also used of men, as of Potiphar, (Gen. xxxix:2, sq.; A. V. "master"), and of Joseph (xlii:30, 33).

4. Koo'ree-os (Gr. κύριος, supreme), the one who is supreme master whether royal or private subject; "Lord of the vineyard" (Matt. xx:8; xxi:40; Mark xii:9; Luke xx:15); the "Lord of the harvest" (Matt. ix:38; Luke x:2); the "master of the house" (Mark xiii:35); "Lord of the Sabbath" (Matt. xii:8; Mark ii:28; Luke vi:5). This title is given to God, the ruler of the universe, both with the article δ κύριος (Matt. i:22; v:33; Mark v:19; Luke i:6, sq.; Acts vii:33; 2 Tim. i:16, 18) and without the article (Matt. xxi:9; xxvii:10; Mark xiii:20; Luke ii:9; xiii:25; Heb. vii:21). It is also a title of respect (Matt. xiii:27, A. V. "sir"; Luke xiii:8; xiv:22, etc.); used by a son in addressing his father (Matt. xxi:30, A. V. "sir"); by citizens toward magistrates (Matt. xxvii:63, A. V. "sir"); by anyone wishing to honor a man of distinction (Matt. viii:2, 6, 8; xv:27; Mark vii:28; Luke v:12, etc.); by the disciples in saluting Jesus their teacher and master (Matt. viii:25; xvi:22; Luke ix:54; John xi:12, etc.). It is a title applied to the exalted and glorified Christ (Acts x:36; Rom. xiv:8; 1 Cor. vii:22; viii:6; Phil. ii:9-11).

5. Baal (Heb. בַּאֵל, bah'al, master), meaning domination, applied only to heathen deities, or to human relations, as husband, etc., or to one who was specially skilled in a trade or profession. (See BAAL.)

6. Some other and less important words in the original are translated "Lord" in the A. V. They are: Shaw-leesh' (Heb. שָׁלֵשׁ, 2 Kings vii:2, 17), an officer of the third rank; rab (רַב, Dan. ii:10), a chief, or captain; maw'-ray (מַוֵּרָא, master, Dan. ii:10), an official title; seh'-ren (שֵׁרֵן), a Philistine term found in Joshua, Judges, and 1 Samuel, where "the lords of the Philistines" are mentioned; rab-reb-awn' (רַב־רַבָּנִי, magnate), used in reference to certain Babylonish nobles (Dan. iv:36; v:1, 9, 10, 23; vi:17), and its Greek equivalent, RABBONI (which see); sar (שָׂר, a head person), title of nobility (Ezra viii:25). LORD'S DAY (lörd's dä).

(1) The expression so rendered in the Authorized English Version (ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ, on the Lord's Day) occurs only once in the New Testament, viz., in Rev. i:10, and is there unaccompanied by any other words tending to explain its meaning.

It is, however, well known that the same phrase was, in after ages of the Christian church, used to signify the first day of the week, on which the resurrection of Christ was commemorated. Hence it has been inferred that the same name was given to that day during the time of the Apostles, and was in the present instance used by St. John in this sense as referring to an institution well known, and therefore requiring no explanation.

(2) Others, however, have held that it means simply 'the day of the Lord,' the substantive being merely exchanged for the adjective, as in 1 Cor. xi:20, 'the Lord's Supper,' which would make it merely synonymous with 'the day of the Lord' (1 Thess. v:2). But upon the whole, the former interpretation is perhaps the more probable.

(3) We find that immediately after the Feast of Pentecost the disciples met together daily for prayer and communion (Acts ii:46); and this practice has been supposed by some to be implied, at a later period, in the expressions used in 1 Cor. xi:21.

But on one occasion afterwards we have it specially recorded that they 'came together on the first day of the week to break bread' (Acts xx:7), when 'Paul preached unto them, and continued his speech till midnight.' It has from this last circumstance been inferred by some that the assembly commenced after sunset on the Sabbath, at which hour the first day of the week had commenced, according to the Jewish reckoning (Jahn's Bibl. Antiq. sec. 398), which would hardly agree with the idea of a commemoration of the resurrection. The regulation addressed to the church of Corinth (1 Cor. xvi:2) with respect to charitable contributions 'on the first day of the week,' is not connected with any mention of public worship or assemblies on that day. Yet this has been inferred: and the regulation has been supposed to have a reference to the tenets of the Jewish converts, who considered it unlawful to touch money on the Sabbath (Vitringa, De Synagoga, translated by Bernard, pp. 75-167). In consideration for them, therefore, the Apostle directs the collection to be made on the following day, on which secular business was lawful.

(4) Thus far we cannot say that the evidence for any particular observance of this day amounts to much; still less does it appear what purpose or object was referred to. We find no mention of any commemoration, whether of the resurrection or any other event in the Apostolic records.

On these points we have no distinct testimony till a later period. The earliest, or Apostolic, Fathers, make no mention whatever of such an institution, unless we except one passage to which we shall presently refer, but which is at most a mere allusion.

(5) The well-known letter of Pliny to Trajan (about A. D. 100) mentions the Christians assembling together for worship on a stated day. 'They are accustomed to assemble on a stated day before light, and sing a hymn to Christ as a God' (Epist. x. 97).

But it is not till the time of Justin Martyr (A. D. 140) that we find a distinct account of the observance. His statement is clear and circumstantial, to the effect that the Christians were in the practice of assembling for public worship on the first day of the week, as being that on which the work of Creation was commenced, and on which Christ rose from the dead:—'On Sunday we all assemble in common, since that is the first day, on which God, having changed darkness and chaos, made the world, and on the same day our Savior Jesus Christ rose from the dead' (Justin Mart. Apol. i. 67).

(6) In the so-called Epistle of Barnabas, probably a forgery of the second century (see BARNABAS), the first day of the week is spoken of as observed with rejoicing in memory of the resurrection. 'We keep the eighth day with joy, on which also Jesus rose from the dead' (Barnab. Ep. i. 15).

(7) The earliest authentic instance in which the name of 'the Lord's day' is applied (after the passage in the Apocalypse) is not till A. D. 200, when Tertullian speaks of it as 'die Domini resurrectionis' (De Orat. sec. 23); again, 'Domini cum diem' (De Idol. 14); and Dionysius of Corinth (probably somewhat later), as 'the Lord's Day' (quoted by Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 23).

Thus far, also, nothing has appeared relative to any observance of the day beyond that of holding assemblies for religious worship, and a festal commemoration of the resurrection and the beginning of the creation.

(8) In the laws of Constantine (A. D. 300), cessation from ordinary work on the Lord's day was first enjoined, but with an express exception in favor of the labors of agriculture. (See Jortin's Remarks on Eccles. Hist. iii. 236).

(9) Chrysostom (A. D. 360) concludes one of his Homilies by dismissing his audience to their respective ordinary occupations. The Council of Laodicea (A. D. 364), however, enjoined Christians to rest on the Lord's day. To the same effect is an injunction in the forgery called the Apostolical Constitutions (vii:24), and various later enactments from A. D. 600 to A. D. 1100, though by no means extending to the prohibition of all secular business. In fact, in these subsequent ages of the church we find the ceremonial spirit rather displaying itself in the multiplication of religious festivals and solemnities than in any increasing precision in the observance of the Lord's day. This is exemplified in the practice of the unreformed church in modern times, and retained by most of the reformed, with the exception of those formed on the Puritanical model, who have adopted a peculiar view of the entire institution to which we shall refer in another place. (See SABBATH.) We may add, also, that as in the case of Constantine, so in some modern states, where a church has been established by law, the same policy has prevailed of passing temporal enactments for the cessation of business, and even public amusements, on the Lord's day, especially in more recent times. To those Christians who look to the written word as the sole authority for anything claiming Apostolic or Divine sanction it becomes peculiarly important to observe that the New Testament evidence of the observance of the Lord's day amounts merely to the recorded fact that the disciples did assemble on the first day of the week, and the probable application of the designation 'the Lord's day' to that day. LORD'S PRAYER (lôrd's prâr), the common title given to the only form of prayer which our Lord himself taught his disciples, and which is recorded in Matt. vi:9-13; Luke xi:2-4.

"The Lord's Prayer is the Prayer of prayers, as the Bible is the Book of books and the Apostles' Creed the Creed of creeds. It is the best and most beautiful, the simplest and yet the deepest, the shortest and yet the most comprehensive, of all forms of devotion. Only from the lips of the Son of God could such a perfect pattern proceed. An ancient Father calls it a summary of Christianity or the gospel in a nutshell. It embraces all kinds of prayer, petition, intercession, and thanksgiving, all essential objects of prayer, spiritual and temporal, divine and human, in the most suitable and beautiful order, commencing with the glory of God, gradually descending to man's needs, then rising to the final deliverance from all evil, and ending in thanksgiving and praise, as all prayer must end at last, in heaven, where all our wants shall be supplied. It accompanies the Christian from the cradle to the grave. It can never be superseded. If we have exhausted the whole extent of our religious wants and the whole vocabulary of devotion, we gladly return to this model prayer as infinitely superior to all our own effusions. It may, indeed, be abused, like every gift of God, and become a dead form—Luther called it in this respect 'the greatest martyr on earth'—but this is no argument against its proper and frequent use. It is not intended, of course, to supersede other forms or extemporaneous prayers, but it should serve as a general pattern and directory to all our devotions, and breathe into them the proper spirit." Schaff.

LORD'S SUPPER, THE (lôrd's sÿp'për).

Four distinct accounts are given in the New Testament of our Lord's institution of the Holy Communion. Three of the Gospels contain the narrative in nearly the same terms, while the Apostle Paul, in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, adds his detailed account, derived, as he emphatically tells us, not from the testimony of eyewitnesses, but from a special revelation made to him. It would seem as if there were little room for any controversy to arise as to the nature of this sacrament, when its original establishment has been so fully described. Nevertheless, the Lord's Supper, designed to be the conservator of peace and harmony, has been made a battle field of polemics.

In studying these accounts, the reader is first of all struck by the singular simplicity of the Lord's Supper. Nothing could be in more complete contrast to the gorgeous ceremonial with which a later and less pure Christianity invested this memorial rite. Not in a splendid sanctuary, but in the upper chamber of a private house in Jerusalem, was the Communion first celebrated. Christ gave to his disciples no "manual of devotion," no elaborate directions as to postures, and no instructions how to handle the bread and hold the chalice.

It is supposable that some unusual things, difficult to obtain, might have been made the emblems of our Lord's sacrifice. On the contrary, he chose as symbols of his atoning oblation of himself bread and wine, both of which were elements of the Passover, and therefore at the moment on the table at which he gathered his friends. It was an anticipation of St. Paul's language, "Whether therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." It was a simple meal in commemoration of the death of Christ. There is not even a word to indicate that a minister was necessary to its celebration.

The language used by the Savior in the institution of this sacrament was such as makes it clearly, in its primary significance, a commemorative act. He broke the bread, and gave it to them with the words, "Take, eat, this is my body." Now, setting aside for the present the Romish theory of a miraculous change by which the bread was altered in substance into the literal body of Christ, what could he have meant by such an expression?

A simple illustration affords the clearest answer. Passing through a great gallery of art, some one points to a statue, and says, "That is Washington." Or standing before a portrait he says, "That is Lincoln." The language, according to all the ordinary usages of speech, would be perfectly accurate, and no one of intelligence could mistake its significance. The marble or bronze on the one hand, and the canvas and color on the other, represent the two great statesmen. In that upper chamber in Jerusalem, with his human body visible to their eyes and tangible to their hands, Christ takes a piece of bread, and says, "This is my body." What possible meaning could those words have had to the disciples, except this, that the bread broken represented his body so soon to be broken on the cross?

Such a view of the Supper of the Lord in no way interferes with its efficacy as a means of grace. True, there is no incomprehensible "mystery" about it. The Evangelical Christian does not approach the Lord's table as if it were some magic charm in which he is to find spiritual help, as the Romanist expects to find it in touching a relic of the saints, or the wood of "the true cross." Its philosophy is as clear as the noonday. For what can rekindle the glow of love in the heart like the stirring of the memory? More than once during our Civil War a man drafted for the army was saved by a voluntary substitute, who took his place and died on the field of battle. Could that conscript, thus redeemed from death, ever behold the memento stained with the heart's blood of his substitute and not have his gratitude and love revived?

With that memorial idea another is coupled. The Lord's Supper is a visible Gospel. We cannot see these emblems of the Christ's death without their preaching of his atonement. Perhaps, then, the question might be asked if we do not satisfy all that the sacrament demands when we have looked upon the consecrated symbols of his dying love. Why eat the bread? Why drink the wine? Is not the pictorial representation of our Lord's suffering all that is needed? The answer is that our bodily life is an emblem of our spiritual life. As we sustain bodily existence by eating and drinking, so by faith do we feed upon Christ. Even the Old Testament foreshadowed this principle when the prophet, turning from Mosaic rites, cried from the watchtower of vision, "The just shall live by faith." Christ echoed that truth when, long before the night in which he was betrayed, he solemnly declared, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." That he did not here refer to Communion is clear. He thus spoke at least a year before he instituted the Lord's Supper. He was speaking to an assembly of Jews, who could by no possibility know anything of the ordinance to be established in the future. Moreover, when he found that they gave to his words a gross and unspiritual meaning, he corrected their misapprehension by telling them that in his body he was to ascend to heaven, and that his figurative allusion to his body and blood was only the teaching that the spirit is the support of all spiritual life, as food is the support of physical existence. "What and if ye shall behold the Son of man ascend up where he was before? It is the spirit which quickeneth. The flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." Nothing seems plainer than that the Communion was instituted to keep ever in mind the fact that partaking of food is not more necessary to the physical than simple faith is to the spiritual existence.

In thus entering into fellowship with his suffering Master, the believer also becomes a member of the vast brotherhood, whatever be the name they bear, who partake of Christ by faith, "the blessed company of all faithful people." By faith in Christ "they all eat the same spiritual meat and drink the same spiritual drink." That loving fellowship they symbolize and picture forth by this visible gathering around the same table, and exhibit their common love and common interest in each other by calling their memorial feast "the Communion." LO-RUHAMAH (lō rū'ha-mah), (Heb. לֹא רַחֵם, lo-roo-khaw-maw', not pitied, not favored), a symbolical name given to the daughter of Hosea the prophet (Hos. 1:6, 8). It was to indicate that the Lord would not continue to show compassion toward the rebellious nation, as he hitherto had done under Jeroboam II (2 Kings xiii: 23). It is rendered in Hos. ii:23 "her that had not obtained mercy." When God restored his favor to the people her name was changed to RUHAMAH (which see).

LOSS, LOSSES (lōs, lōs'ēs). Under the law of Moses, the following were the regulations respecting losses: If two men strove together, and as a result one should be disabled from work, the other must pay for the lost time (Exod. xxi: 19); claims for losses from trespass, or for any lost thing, were to be brought before the judges, and adverse judgment was followed by the payment of double to the other (Exod. xxii:9); a man finding any lost thing, and denying it, was obliged, when he wished to present a trespass offering, to restore the lost thing with an added fifth to the one to whom it belonged (Lev. vi:4, 5). The general principle upon which these enactments were based was that an Israelite's fellow-countrymen were his brothers; and he was always to act the brotherly part. Therefore, whenever he found anything that was lost he was commanded to care for it, and to make diligent search for its owner with a view of restoration (Deut. xxii:3). (Barnes' Bib. Dict.) (See LAW OF MOSES.)

LOT (Heb. גִּרְוֹל, go-rawl', a pebble; קֶחֶב, kheh'-bel, measuring line, portion; Gr. λαγχάνω, lang-khan'o, to cast lots, Luke 1:9; κλίρος, klay'ros, pebble, bit of wood, to cast lots with (Acts 1:26).

The use of lots among the ancients was very general. It was supposed to be employed by the gods themselves (Hom. Il. xxii. 209; Cic. De Div., i. 34; ii. 41). The Israelites sometimes had recourse to lots as a means of ascertaining the Divine will. The religious estimate of them may be gathered from Prov. xvi:33. The following are historical or ritual instances:

(1) In the division of the Promised Land among the tribes of Israel the use of the lot was expressly commanded by God himself, it being understood that the extent of territory should be proportioned to the population of each tribe (Num. xxvi:55).

(2) Choice of men for an invading force (Judg. i:1-3; xx:9).

(3) So the selection of the scapegoat on the day of atonement was to be determined by lot (Lev. xvi:8).

(4) Property was divided in the same way (Ps. xxii:18; Matt. xxvii:35).

(5) The orders of the priests and their daily service were also assigned by lot (1 Chron. xxiv: 5).

(6) The lot was used in the detection of a criminal (Josh. vii:14, 18).

(7) In the choice of the Apostle Matthias (Acts 1:26) and in the cases of Saul and Jonathan, and Jonah and his companions, to determine who had offended God (1 Sam. xiv:41, 42; Jonah 1:7). (See URIM and TRUMMIM.)

(8) That which falls to one by lot, as a portion or inheritance (Deut. xxxii:9; Josh. xv: 1; 1 Chron. xvi:18; Ps. cv:11; cxxv:3; Is. xvii: 14; lvii:6; Acts viii:21; comp. Acts xiii:19).

As to the manner of casting lots we have no certain information. It is supposed by some that the stones or marks which were used in determining the lot were thrown together into the lap or fold of a garment, or into an urn or vase, and that the person holding them shook them violently, so that there should be a perfect mingling of the whole contents, to prevent all preference by the hand of him who should draw; so that the passage (Prov. xvi:33) is paraphrased thus: "In a lot-vase the lots are shaken in all directions; nevertheless, from the Lord is the whole decision or judgment."

LOT (lōt), (Heb. לוֹט, lote, a covering).

1. Lot was the son of Haran and nephew of Abraham, who by the early death of his father had already come into possession of his property when Abraham went into the land of Canaan (Gen. xi:31). Their united substance, consisting chiefly in cattle, was not then too large to prevent them from living together in one encampment.

(1) Parting of Abraham and Lot. Eventually, however, their possessions were so greatly increased that they were obliged to separate; and Abraham with rare generosity conceded the choice of pasture-grounds to his nephew. Lot availed himself of this liberality of his uncle, as he deemed most for his own advantage, by fixing his abode at Sodom, that his flocks might pasture in and around that fertile and well-watered neighborhood (Gen. xiii:5-13). He had soon very great reason to regret this choice; for although his flocks fed well, his soul was starved in that vile place, the inhabitants of which were sinners before the Lord exceedingly. There 'he vexed his righteous soul from day to day with the filthy conversation of the wicked' (2 Pet. ii: 7).

(2) Prisoner. About eight years after his separation from Abraham, Lot was carried away prisoner by Chedorlaomer, along with the other inhabitants of Sodom, and was rescued and brought back by Abraham (Gen. xiv.), as related under other heads (see ABRAHAM; CHEDORLAOMER). This exploit procured for Abraham much celebrity in Canaan; and it ought to have procured for Lot respect and gratitude from the people of Sodom, who had been delivered from hard slavery and restored to their homes on his account. But this does not appear to have been the result.

(3) Avenging Angels. At length the guilt of 'the cities of the plain' brought down the signal judgments of Heaven. The avenging angels, after having been entertained by Abraham, repaired to Sodom, where they were received and entertained by Lot, who was sitting in the gate of the town when they arrived. While they were at supper the house was beset by a number of men, who demanded that the strangers should be given up to them, for the unnatural purposes which have given a name of infamy to Sodom in all generations. Lot resisted this demand, and was loaded with abuse by the vile fellows outside on that account. They had nearly forced the door, when the angels, thus awfully by their own experience convinced of the righteousness of the doom they came to execute, smote them with instant blindness, by which their attempts were rendered abortive, and they were constrained to disperse. Towards morning the angels apprised Lot of the doom which hung over the place, and urged him to hasten thence with his family.

(4) Escape from Sodom. He was allowed to extend the benefit of this deliverance to the families of his daughters who had married in Sodom; but the warning was received by those families with incredulity and insult, and he therefore left Sodom accompanied only by his wife and two daughters.

(5) Lot's Wife. As they went, being hastened by the angels, the wife, anxious for those who had been left behind, or reluctant to remove from the place which had long been her home, and where much valuable property was necessarily left behind, lingered behind the rest, and was suddenly involved in the destruction, by which—smothered and stiffened as she stood by saline incrustations—she became 'a pillar of salt.' The turning of Lot's wife into a pillar of salt has often been regarded as one of the difficulties of the Bible, but is not so necessarily. "We are not to suppose that she was actually turned into one, but having been killed by the fiery and sulphurous vapor with which the air was filled, and afterward incrustated with salt, she resembled an actual statue of salt" (K. and D., Com. in loco).

(6) Departure to Zoar. Lot and his daughters then hastened on to Zoar, the smallest of the five cities of the plain, which had been spared on purpose to afford him a refuge: but, being fearful, after what had passed, to remain among a people so corrupted, he soon retired to a cavern in the neighboring mountains, and there abode.

(7) Daughters' Sin. After some stay in this place, the daughters of Lot became apprehensive lest the family of their father should be lost for want of descendants, than which no greater calamity was known or apprehended in those times; and in the belief that, after what had passed in Sodom, there was no hope of their obtaining suitable husbands, they, by a contrivance which has in it the taint of Sodom, in which they were brought up, made their father drunk with wine, and in that state seduced him into an act which, as they well knew, would in soberness have been most abhorrent to him. They thus became the mothers, and he the father, of two sons, named Moab and Ammon, from whom sprang the Moabites and Ammonites, so often mentioned in the Hebrew history (Gen. xix). This circumstance is the last which the Scripture records of the history of Lot; and the time and place of his death are unknown.

(8) Palliation of Daughters' Offense. With respect to Lot's daughters Whiston and others are unable to see any wicked intention in them. He admits that the incest was a horrid crime, except under the unavoidable necessity which apparently rendered it the only means of preserving the human race; and this justifying necessity he holds to have existed in their minds, as they appear to have believed that all the inhabitants of the land had been destroyed except their father and themselves. But it is incredible that they could have entertained any such belief. The city of Zoar had been spared, and they had been there. The wine also with which they made their father drunk must have been procured from men, as we cannot suppose they had brought it with them from Sodom. The fact would therefore seem to be that, after the fate of their sisters, who had married men of Sodom and perished with them, they became alive to the danger and impropriety of marrying with the natives of the land, and of the importance of preserving the family connection. The force of this consideration was afterwards seen in Abraham's sending to the seat of his family in Mesopotamia for a wife for Isaac. But Lot's daughters could not go there to seek husbands; and the only branch of their own family within many hundred miles was that of Abraham, whose only son, Ishmael, was then a child. This, therefore, must have appeared to them the only practicable mode in which the house of their father could be preserved. Their making their father drunk, and their solicitous concealment of what they did from him, show that they despaired of persuading him to an act which, under any circumstances, and with every possible extenuation, must have been very distressing to so good a man.

(9) Character. That Lot was a good man is evinced by his deliverance from among the guilty, and is affirmed by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii:7); his preservation is alluded to by our Savior (Luke xvii:18, etc.); and in Deut. ii:9, 19, and Ps. lxxxiii:9, his name is used to designate the Moabites and Ammonites, his descendants.

2. Lot (Heb. same as foregoing) is mentioned in two passages of Scripture, in both of which it is erroneously translated myrrh in the Authorized Version.

In Gen. xxxvii:25, 'Behold a company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spicery (necoath), and balm (tzeri), and myrrh (lot), going to carry it down to Egypt.' Again, in ch. xliii:11, Jacob directs his sons to take into Egypt 'of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm (tzeri), and a little honey, spices (necoath), and myrrh (lot), nuts (botum), and almonds (shakadim).' In this enumeration, in one case, of merchandise, and in the other, of several articles intended for a present, and both destined for Egypt, at that time a highly civilized nation, it is evident that we are to look only for such substances as were likely to be acceptable in that country, and therefore not such as were produced there, or as were more easily procurable from elsewhere than from Syria, as was the case with myrrh, which was never produced in Syria, and could not have been an article of export from thence. This difficulty has been felt by others, and various translations of lot have been proposed, as lotus, chestnuts, mastiche, stacte, balsam, turpentine, pistachio nuts. Junius and Tremellius render it ladanum, which is suitable, and appears to be correct.

Ladanum, or gum ladanum, as it is often called, was known to the Greeks as early as the times of Herodotus and Theophrastus, and bore the names of ledon and ladanon, which are very closely allied to ladun, the Arabic name of the same drug. It has been well observed by Rosenmüller, that the proper root and origin of these names is led, but that the Hebrew has the hard consonant l instead of the softer d.

Tournefort, in modern times, has given a detailed description of the mode of obtaining ladanum, and relates that it is now gathered by means of a kind of rake with whip-like thongs, which is passed over the plants. When these thongs are loaded with the odoriferous and sticky resin, they are scraped with a knife. It consists of resin and volatile oil, and is highly fragrant, and stimulant as a medicine, but is often adulterated with sand in commerce. Ladanum seems to have been produced in Judæa, according to writers in the Talmud (Cels. l. c. p. 286.) It is said by Pliny, as long before by Herodotus, to be a produce of Arabia, though this has not been proved to be the case in modern times. Sufficient, however, has been adduced to show that ladanum was known to, and esteemed by, the ancients, and as its Greek and Arabic names are similar to the Hebrew, and as it is stated to have been a produce of Syria it was very likely to have been sent to Egypt both as a present and as merchandise. (See MYRRH.) J. F. R.

LOTAN (lō'tan), (Heb. לוֹטָן, lo-tawn', covering), eldest son of Seir, the Horite, and a prince of Idumæa. Through his sister, Timna, he was connected with Esau's eldest son (Gen. xxxvi:12, 20, 22, 29; 1 Chron. i:38, 39).

Love may be regarded either as the internal feeling of good-will and kindness which one intelligent being bears to another, or the expression of that benevolence in words and acts which gratifies and benefits another; but in its full and proper sense, love is the union of these two—of the internal emotion with the outward act: whence it appears that neither doing good nor wishing good to another can in strict propriety be denominated love. The definition also shows that love is restricted to intelligent beings, takes place only between persons, and cannot be predicated of things, being used in a merely derivative and secondary sense whenever we speak of loving aught but rational beings. It also appears that the emotion implies two intelligent existences; indeed, reciprocity seems an almost essential element in the idea of love. Certainly all durable love is mutual; and if love implies two, then, prior to creation, God, however good he might be, could hardly be said to love; so that love is a consequence of creation, a result of the relations in which God was pleased to place himself in regard to man; and since these relations are best declared, if they are not exclusively made known, by the sacred Scriptures, love is a doctrine which takes its source in revelation, where indeed, considered as existing between God and man, it finds at once its highest sanctions and best supports.

(1) Love of God. The New Testament speaks in its great bearings of the love of God towards Christ and towards man. The Son of God, as the most perfect image of the Heavenly Father, is represented as the special object of the divine love; as a consequence of which affection God communicates to Christ all spiritual gifts needful for the redemption of mankind: 'The Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things whatsoever he doeth' (John v:20); 'therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again' (John x:17); 'for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world' (John xvii:24), 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (John iii:16). And so, 'He that spared not his only Son, but freely gave him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?' (Rom. viii:32): accordingly 'the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us' (Rom. v:5; see the following verses). The following passages will aid the reader in pursuing this interesting subject into its Scriptural particulars, which want of space compels us to be content with pointing out, namely: Rom. viii:35; 2 Cor. xiii:11; Eph. ii:4; 2 Thess. iii:5; 1 John iv; 1 Tim. i:14, 15; Titus ii:10; John xiii:35; comp. xv:17; Mark xii:30.

(2) Love to Christ. Love to Christ is represented in Scripture as a natural consequence of Christ's love to man, and as a necessary concomitant of the love of God, with which it is kindred in nature, causes, operation, and effects. This holy affection manifests itself not in idle reveries nor warm protestations, but in meek and lowly obedience to Jesus as the Mediator between God and man; and has for its highest reward the love which God displays towards all those who honor his son; which love, springing from God, fills and sanctifies the heart of man (John viii:42; xiv:15, 21, 23, 28; xvi:27).

(3) Love to Man. Love to man ensues from the universal love of God, as the one Creator and Father of all men. The measure and test of love to others is the surrender of personal ambition and the complete abandonment of self in our devotion to others, conformable to the higher and perfect model which Jesus has given in his own life and death (Matt. xxii:39; Mark xii:31; John xv:12; comp. xiii:15; 1 Peter ii:21; 1 John ii:6).

(4) Christian Love. This general good-will and active beneficence may be enhanced and invigorated by those nearer relations which take place between kindred minds, men of 'like pre-scious faith,' whose hearts and aims are one, and who have alike received the gracious and all-prevailing influences of God's spirit; so that Christianity not only places mankind in immediate connection with God, and thus renders all equal and all worthy of each other's love, but creates a new, peculiar, and very intimate relation, making all true disciples one with each other and with the great Head of the church, and thus one, ultimately, with God (John xiii:34, 35; xv:12; Rom. xiii:8, 10; 1 Cor. xiii). And it is this specific Christian affection—the love of man as a brother, purified and enlarged by the consciousness of being an object of Divine mercy and goodness so as to become a properly Christian emotion—which is to actuate the disciples of Christ in their benevolent efforts for the good of others, and specially for their rescue from the evil that is in the world that bringeth death (2 Cor. v:14, 19, 20, 21; Acts xx:24).

LOVE FEASTS (lŭv fĕsts). See AGAPE.

LOVING-KINDNESS (lŭv'ing-kĭnd'nĕs), (Heb. ^{לְרַחֵם}, kheh'sed), desire, ardor.

In a good sense khehsed is zeal toward any one, kindness, love. Of God toward men, goodness, mercy, grace (Ps. xvii:7; xxvi:3; xxxvi:7, 10, etc.). Figuratively, it is used of God as a merciful benefactor (cxliv:2, "My goodness"). In the plural, mercies, benefits from God (lxxxix:2, "mercy;" ver. 49; xxv:6; Is. lxiii:7). (Barnes' Peop. Bib. Ency.)

LOW, LOWER, LOWEST (lŏ, lŏ'ĕr, lŏ'ĕst), (Heb. ^{תַּחְתִּי}, takh-tee'). The lower parts of the earth means:

(1) The earth itself, which is the lower region of this world (Eph. iv:9). (2) The valleys and their inhabitants; or rather, the Gentile world (Is. xlv:23). (3) The womb; in which the unborn child is hid as in a deep pit (Ps. cxxxix:15). (4) The grave, or state of the dead (Ps. lxi:9).

Figurative. To be lowly is to be meek and humble (Ps. cxxxviii:6; Zech. ix:9). Christ was made for a little while, or in a little degree, "lower than the angels," in his state of humiliation (Ps. viii:5; Heb. ii:7, 9).

LUBIM (lŭ'bim), (Heb. ^{לְבוֹיִם}, loo-beem). See 2 Chron. xii:3; xvi:8; Nah.iii:9; loob-beem', Dan. xi:43, perhaps thirsty, thence inhabitants of a dry land, the Libyans. (See LIBYA.)

LUCAS (lŭ'cas), (Gr. Λουκάς, loo-kas'), the friend and companion of St. Paul during his imprisonment at Rome (Philem. 24). He is the same as Luke, the beloved physician, who is associated with Demas in Col. iv:14, and who remained faithful to the Apostle when others forsook him (2 Tim. iv:11), on his first examination before the emperor (A. D. 64).

LUCIFER (lŭ'si-fer), (Heb. ^{הַיְלָל}, hay-lale').

A word that occurs once in the English Version in the lines—

'How art thou fallen from heaven,
Lucifer, son of the morning!
How art thou felled to the ground,
That' didst weaken the nations!

(Is. xiv:12).

The Hebrew seems to mean 'brilliant,' 'splendid,' 'illustrious,' or, as in the Septuagint, Vulgate, the Rabbinical commentators, Luther, and others, 'brilliant star;' and in this sense was the proper name among the Hebrews of the morning star. Tertullian and Gregory the Great understood this passage of Isaiah in reference to the fall of Satan; in consequence of which the name Lucifer has since been applied to Satan; and this is now the usual acceptance of the word. But Dr. Henderson, who in his Isaiah renders the line, 'Illustrious son of the morning!' justly remarks in his annotation: "The application of this passage to Satan, and to the fall of the apostate angels, is one of those gross perversions of Sacred Writ which so extensively obtain, and which are to be traced to a proneness to seek for more in any given passage than it really contains, a disposition to be influenced by sound rather than sense, and an implicit faith in received interpretations. The scope and connection show that none but the king of Babylon is meant. In the figurative language of the Hebrews a star signifies an illustrious king or prince (Num. xxiv:17; comp. Rev. ii:28; xxii:16). The monarch here referred to having surpassed all other kings in royal splendor, is compared to the harbinger of day, whose brilliancy surpasses that of the surrounding stars. Falling from heaven denotes a sudden political overthrow—a removal from the position of high and conspicuous dignity formerly occupied (comp. Rev. vi:13; viii:10).

LUCIUS (lŭ'si-ŭs) of Cyrene, (Gr. Λούκιος, loo'-kee-os, illuminative, for Lat. Lucius surnamed the "Cyrenian"), a person named along with Barnabas, Saul, and others, as 'prophets and teachers' in the church at Antioch (Acts xiii:1).

Lucius was probably one of 'the synagogue of the Cyrenians,' and was without doubt one of the men of Cyrene, who went abroad in consequence of the persecution raised on the death of Stephen (Acts vi:9; xi:20). Some suppose that he was one of the seventy disciples; and the tradition is, that he was eventually bishop of Cyrene. This is probably the same Lucius who is mentioned in Rom. xvi:21 as Paul's kinsman; and he has been supposed by some to be the same as Luke the Evangelist. (A. D. 45.)

LUD (lŭd), (Heb. ^{לֹד}, lood, Ezek. xxvii:10; xxx:5), the fourth son of Shem (Gen. x:22). For his descendants, see NATIONS, DISPERSION OF (B. C. after 2513).

LUDIM (lŭ'dim), (Heb. ^{לְוִדִים}, loo-deem'), the descendants of (Gen. x:13), concerning whom, see NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.

LUHITH (lŭ'hith), (Heb. ^{לְחִיִּת}, loo-khoth'; ^{לְחִיִּת}, loo-kheeth'), flooded).

A town in the land of Moab, between Ar and Zoar, and ravaged by the Assyrians and Chaldeans (Is. xv:5; Jer. xlviii:5). It is evident that it was an elevated station, but whether a town on a hill, or a place for prospect, does not appear. It seems to be associated with other places which we know to be towns.

LUKE (lŭke). 1. The Evangelist. The name Λουκάς, loo-kas', Lat. Lucanus, indicates that Luke was descended from heathen ancestors, and that he was either a slave or a freedman, libertus.

(1) A Physician. According to ecclesiastical tradition, the author of the gospel is the same Luke who is mentioned in Paul's Epistles (Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv:11; Col. iv:14), and who is called, in the last-mentioned passage, 'the physician.' This tradition is confirmed by the Acts of the Apostles, according to which the author of that work accompanied the Apostle Paul in his journeys (Acts xvi:10, sq.; xx:5-13). Luke accompanied Paul also in his last journeys to Jerusalem and Rome (Acts xxi:1-17; xxvii:28).

The profession of a physician harmonizes also with the condition of a freedman, indicated by the form of the name. It harmonizes with this that Paul (Col. iv:14) distinguishes Luke from the Christians of Jewish descent, whom, in verses 11 and 12, he styles 'being of the Circumcision.' Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii:4) states that Antioch in Syria was the native city of Luke. In this city there was at an early period a congregation of Christians converted from heathenism. Since Luke was a physician, we must suppose that he was a man of education.

(2) A Scholar. To those skeptics who excuse their disbelief of the miracles recorded in the gospels, by the assertion that their authors were ill-informed Jews, greedy of the marvelous, it must appear of some importance to meet in Luke a well-informed Greek skilled even in the medical sciences. The higher degree of his education is further proved by the classical style in which the prologue to his gospel, and the latter portion of the Acts, are written; and also by the explicit and learned details which he gives in the Acts on various antiquarian, historical, and geographical subjects. Tradition, since the time of Gregory of Nazianzus, makes Luke a martyr; yet not unanimously, since accounts of a natural death slip in. Where he died remains a question; certainly not in Rome with Paul, for his writings are far later.

2. The Gospel According to Luke.

(1) Written Documents Used. The classical, connected, periodic, and sustained style of the introduction to the gospel of St. Luke differs so strikingly from the Hellenistic Greek of the history itself, that we clearly perceive that he made use of written documents. The same difference exists, although in a less striking degree, between the portions of the Acts relating to transactions of which Luke himself was not an eye-witness and in which he bore no part, and those where he speaks as a companion of Paul. He did not, however, transcribe verbatim from the documents before him nor did he merely write down verbal traditions; for we find the same characteristic phraseology which belongs to St. Luke's individual style, both in the gospel and in the Acts. Compare, for instance, the peculiar use of the words καὶ ἀρβς, Luke i:17, 22; ii:28, 50; iii:23; iv:15, 51; Acts ii:27; v:1, 9, 51, etc.; ἰκὰνός, Luke vii:12; viii:27, 32; xx:9; Acts v:37; ix:23, 43; xi:24, etc.; παῖς θεοῦ, Luke i:54, 69; Acts iii:13, 16; iv:25, 27, 30, etc.

(2) Other Writers. It is important to notice what he himself says, in his introduction, of the relation borne by his writings to those of others. It is evident that even then 'many,' had attempted to compose a history of our Lord from the statements of eye-witnesses and of the first ministers of the word of God. Luke follows the example of these authors with this difference, that he writes, starting from earlier facts in the history of the Baptist and of the infancy of our Lord, and continuing the narration in uninterrupted succession. Origen, Credner, and Olshausen suppose that the "many," were heretical authors; but this is unlikely, since Luke does not express any blame of them. But it is also unsatisfactory to refer the word "many," merely to Matthew and Mark, as Hug and De Wette have done, especially since the "many" are distinguished from the eye-witnesses. We must therefore suppose that many Christians wrote brief accounts of the life of Jesus, although they had not been eye-witnesses. It is possible that Luke made use of such writings.

(3) Relation to Gospel of Matthew. It appears to be doubtful whether Luke had the gospel of Matthew before his eyes, since, had that been the case, he would probably have been more careful to avoid apparent contradictions, especially in the history of the birth of Jesus, in which he seems to have made use of documents referring to the family of Mary, while the accounts given by Matthew refer more to the family of Joseph. This is also confirmed by the aphoristic mode in which he reports the Sermon on the Mount. We can scarcely imagine that he would have communicated a relation so unusually abrupt, if he had seen the well-arranged and complete statements of Matthew.

The Gospel of St. Luke contains exceedingly valuable accounts, not extant in the books of the other evangelists; for instance, those concerning the childhood of Jesus, the admirable parables in chapters xv and xvi, the narration respecting the disciples at Emmaus, the section from chapter ix:51 to xix:27, which contains particulars mostly wanting in the other evangelists. It has been usual, since the days of Schleiermacher, to consider this portion as the report of a single journey to the feast at Jerusalem; but it is evident that it contains accounts belonging to several journeys, undertaken at different periods.

Some critics of modern times, such as D. Schulz, Schleiermacher, Sieffert, and Schneckenburger, were in the habit of ascribing to the reports of Luke a greater historical accuracy than to those of Matthew; but of late, opinions on this subject have changed, and Strauss, De Wette, and Bruno Bauer find in the reports of St. Matthew more of independent and original information than in those of Luke. There is certainly in the details of the historical account given by St. Luke, more clearness; but many discourses of our Redeemer given by St. Matthew have more of the impress of historical precision, especially the Sermon on the Mount, and the Discourse against the Pharisees in chapters xxiii and xxiv; although it seems that Matthew sometimes brings into connection similar discourses, held at various periods, concerning which we find in Luke more accurately stated the particular circumstances under which they were delivered.

(4) Historical Credibility. The statement of Luke himself, at the beginning of his gospel, must dispose us favorably with regard to its historical credibility. He states that he had accurately investigated the truth of the accounts communicated, and that following the example of the πολλοί, he had made use of the statements of eye-witnesses. Luke had frequent opportunity of meeting these eye-witnesses when he traveled with Paul. He himself reports, in Acts xxi:18, that he met James. He gives also, with greater accuracy than the other evangelists, some chronological notices, such as those at the beginning of chapters ii and iii, and in Acts vii:35, etc. Yet these very dates have been quoted by Strauss and De Wette as being quite incorrect, and as proofs that Luke was destitute of accurate historical information.

This daring assertion has induced some modern apologetical authors to examine the matter more closely, who have triumphantly vindicated the historical character of these statements of Luke.

(5) Date of the Gospel. As to the statements of the ancients concerning the date or time when the Gospel of St. Luke was written, we find in Irenæus (Adv. Har. iii:1) that Mark and Luke wrote after Matthew. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi:28), Origen stated that

Luke wrote after Matthew and Mark; but Clemens Alexandrinus, according to the same writer (Hist. Eccles. vi:14), asserted on the authority of 'the tradition of the earlier elders,' that the gospels containing the genealogies were written before the others. According to this view, Mark was written after Luke. It is however likely that this statement arose from a desire to explain why the genealogies were omitted by Mark and John. Eusebius, at least (Hist. Eccles. iii:24), in reference to the Gospel of John, says: 'John properly passed over in silence the genealogy according to the flesh, of our Savior, which was detailed by Matthew and Luke.'

Since the extreme criticism of Strauss and De Wette has been unable to produce even a plausible argument against the authenticity of the Gospel of Luke, attempts have been made to prove at least the very late date of this gospel. De Wette (Introduction to the New Testament, 4th edition, p. 176) endeavors to infer from the definiteness with which the destruction of Jerusalem is predicted, and from the circumstance that, according to ch. xxi:25, some time was to intervene between the destruction of Jerusalem and the second advent of Christ, that this gospel was written some time after the destruction of the city had taken place, and after it had become apparent from facts that the second advent was not to be immediately consequent upon that destruction.

We do not here enter into the question whether, according to St. Matthew xxiv:29, it was expected that the second advent should directly follow the destruction of Jerusalem; we merely observe that a petitio principii runs through the whole train of this argument, since it sets out with assuming the impossibility of detailed predictions.

3. The Acts of The Apostles. Besides the gospel which bears his name, Luke wrote the Acts of the Apostles. This work contains the history of the foundation of the Christian church in two great sections: the first embracing the spread of Christianity among the Jews, chiefly by the instrumentality of Peter (chapters i-xii); and the second, its spread among the heathen, chiefly by the instrumentality of Paul (chapters xiii-xxviii).

Schneckenburger has strongly endeavored, in his work Ueber den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, 1841, to prove that the Acts had an apologetical tendency, called forth by the particular circumstances of the times. He especially appeals to the manner in which Paul refutes all objections of the Judaizers, who were his enemies.

In those portions of the Acts in which Luke speaks as the companion of Paul, and, consequently, as an eye-witness, his Greek style is more classical than in the rest of the work. This circumstance supports the opinion that Luke followed some written documents in the earlier part of the Acts, as well as in the gospel.

(1) Relation to St. Paul. From the circumstance that the book of Acts leaves St. Paul a captive, without relating the result of his captivity, most critics have, with considerable probability, inferred that Luke accompanied St. Paul to Rome, that he employed his leisure while there in composing the Acts, and that he left off writing before the fate of Paul was decided. Now, since the Gospel of St. Luke was written before the Acts, it seems to follow that it was written a considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem. De Wette meets this argument merely by his petitio principii, that from the detailed nature of the predictions on that head in the gospel, it would follow that they were written after the events to which they refer, and consequently after the destruction of Jerusalem.

It is likely that Luke, during Paul's captivity at Cæsarea, employed his leisure in collecting the accounts contained in his gospel in the localities where the events to which they relate happened. The most ancient testimonies in behalf of Luke's Gospel are those of Marcion, at the beginning of the second century, and of Irenæus, in the latter half of that century.

According to Meyer's opinion, Luke terminates the Acts with Paul's captivity, because the later events were well known to Theophilus, to whom the Acts are dedicated. We do not know who this Theophilus was. Hug, however, infers, from the manner in which Luke mentions Italian localities, that they were well known to Theophilus, and that consequently it was likely he resided in Italy.

(2) Authentic Account. That the accounts of Luke are authentic may be perceived more especially from a close examination of the inserted discourses and letters. The characteristic marks of authenticity in the oration of the Roman lawyer Tertullus, in ch. xxiv, and in the official letters in ch. xxiii:26, sq.; xv:23, sq.; can scarcely be overlooked. The address of Paul to the elders of the Ephesian church is characteristically Pauline, and even so full of definite allusions and of similarity to the Epistle to the Ephesians, that it furnishes a confirmation of the authenticity of that letter, which has lately been questioned.

Characteristic also are the discourses of Stephen (ch. vii), and those of Peter, concerning which compare Seyler's Abhandlungen über die Reden des Petrus, in the Studien und Kritiken, 1832, p. 53, sq. Even De Wette, in his Introduction, sec. 115 a, admits the appropriateness of these discourses.

(3) Chronological Difficulties. It is, however, difficult to reconcile some of Luke's statements with the chronological notices in the Epistles of Paul. Very important investigations on this subject are to be found in the work of Angar, De temporum in Actis Apostolorum ratione. As for the testimonies in behalf of the authenticity of the Acts, they are the same as for Luke's Gospel. Clemens Alexandrinus, Irenæus, and Tertullian, expressly mention the Acts, and Eusebius reckons them among the Homologoumena. However, the book of Acts was not read and quoted so often in the early church as other parts of Scripture. Chrysostom, in his first homily In Actus Apostolorum, says that many Christians in Asia knew neither the book nor its author. The Manichees rejected it for dogmatical reasons (Augustinus, De utilitate credendi, ii:7). So also did the Severiani (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv:29). Since the book of Acts was not much read, it is surprising that its text is particularly corrupt. It does not, however, by any means appear that these corruptions arose from intentional alterations made for dogmatical purposes (comp. Eichhorn's Einleitung ins Neue Testament, ii, 154).

The most complete commentary on the Acts is that of Kuinoel, 2d ed., 1827. There are also some valuable manuals, as Meyer's Commentary, 1835, and that of De Wette, 2d ed., 1841. (See also Lange, Com., and Alford, Com.)

LUMP (lūmp), (Heb. לֶחֶם, leb-ee-lawh').

1. Bunch of dried figs; a round mass of any kind closely pressed together, especially figs (2 Kings xx:7; Is. xxxviii:21). It is rendered "cake" (1 Sam. xxv:18; xxx:12; 1 Chron. xii:40).

3. A mass of things mixed. In Rom. ix:21, it means "kneaded clay" for moulding; and in 1 Cor. v:6, Gal. v:9, "dough."

LUNATIC (lū'nā-tīk). See DEMONIAIC.

LUST (lūst), was not used formerly in its present restricted sense, but of any strong desire.

In the A. V. it is the translation of three Hebrew and four Greek words. "To lust" appears six times in the A. V. Corruption of nature is called "lust," as it strongly inclines us to evil (Rom. vii:7; James i:14, 15; 2 Pet. i:4). This general lust is distinguished (a) into the "lust of the flesh," such as, unclean desire of carnal pleasure, intemperate desire of liquor or food (Ps. lxxviii:18; Gal. v:17; 1 Pet. ii:11; 2 Pet. ii:10); (b) and the "lusts of the mind," such as pride, covetousness, unbelief, attachment to the law of works (Eph. ii:3; 1 Pet. iv:2).

LUST, GRAVES OF (lūst, grāvs öv). See KIBROTH-HATTA'AVAH.

LUSTY (lūst'ý), (Judg. iii:29), an old word for "stout."

LUTHERAN CHURCH, EVANGELICAL (lū'thēr-an chūrch, ē'vān-jěl'ī-kal).

1. Name. In the Great Reformation of the sixteenth century, the adherents of Luther were nicknamed "Lutherans" by the Romanist, Dr. Eck, after the Leipzig Disputation in 1519, and so spoken of by Pope Hadrian VI in 1522. They were first termed "Protestants" at the Diet of Spire in 1529. Luther strongly protested, and disapproved of his name being borne by his fellow confessors; in Europe they were and are called "The Evangelical Church;" in this country they are commonly known as "The Evangelical Lutheran Church."

2. Sources and Growth. (1) Seventeenth Century. The first Lutherans who made permanent homes in America came among the colonists from Holland, who settled (1612-1622) for traffic with the Indians on Manhattan Island and the Hudson river. Though brought by the spirit of trade, they were the first in this country to suffer persecution on account of their faith. England's supremacy in 1664 gave them religious liberty. Whilst there are no Dutch Lutheran congregations in the United States to-day, there are a number of Dutch origin, mostly along the Hudson.

Gustavus Adolphus, the king of Sweden, had projected a colony to America, both for the religious welfare of the natives and for the glory of his realm. The glorious victory at Luetzen in 1632, immortalized "The Lion of the North," and left to his great premier, Oxenstiern, the furthering of the colony. In 1638 two shiploads from the Lutheran land of Sweden purchased lands of the Indians and established themselves on the banks of the Delaware. Others followed and all prospered.

They built churches; their pastor, Campanius, translated Luther's catechism into the Delaware dialect, and also gave religious instruction to the Indians. For over forty years previous to the arrival of William Penn they had lived and labored among them in the greatest peace and prosperity, and by their good name and offices greatly promoted the success of Penn's famous treaty with the Indians under the great elm at Philadelphia in 1683. By the close of the following century, through political changes, but mainly from lack of English-speaking Lutheran pastors, these people with their church edifices came into the hands of the Episcopalians.

(2) Eighteenth Century. Not being a sea-going people, previous to the eighteenth century few Germans came to America. During this century, being compelled by persecution and suffering, or encouraged by the plans and prospects of Penn's colony, many thousand German Lutherans sought homes in the New World.

Impoverished by the Thirty Years' War, and in constant dread of invasion, many of the wretched inhabitants of the Rhenish Palatinate sought refuge in England, whence aided by the government and Queen Anne, they came as colonists to New York, Pennsylvania and North Carolina (1707-1712).

Forced into exile in midwinter, 30,000 men, women and children from the Austrian archbishopric of Salzburg went to Prussia, Holland, Sweden and England. The English, by parliamentary aid and public contributions, assisted many of the fellow believers of those who bound themselves in the "covenant of salt" to found the Lutheran colony at Ebenezer, Georgia, under the devoted pastors, Bolzen and Gronau (1731-1734).

Unscrupulous agents traversed Germany in the interests of shipping companies, and by fabulous tales of plenty, wealth, honor and titles so easily secured in the New World, lured the simple-minded people from their homes. Pennsylvania was the paradise generally sought. In the summer of 1749, 12,000 German immigrants landed at Philadelphia, many of them Lutherans, and for years the tide continued. Many died on the long voyages in the poorly-supplied and overcrowded vessels. On landing the captain advertised the arrival of those too poor to pay the passage charges, and at auction sold men, women and children for three, six, ten or more years, who were taken for service to New England, Pennsylvania and other colonies. Families were separated never again to meet. Whilst character and industry often elevated these servants to the place of masters, and maids betimes married their purchasers, yet, despite the laws for their protection, it was only to protracted slavery, with its wretchedness and abominations, that many of the "redemptorists" were doomed during their enforced labor.

From Waldoboro, Maine, to Ebenezer, Georgia, in 1735 there were but eight pastors for the whole Lutheran population. The people generally were poor, their speech alien, themselves strangers in a strange land. Some made use of devotional books brought from the Fatherland. Here and there an earnest layman assembled his countrymen and read a sermon. Churches were few; barns, mills and stable lofts, carpenter shops, or their rude cabins, were the usual places for worship; the services and ministrations of the church were seldom enjoyed. Clerical impostors, base men, devastated and deceived the congregations. The religious training of the young was sadly neglected. Distressing in the extreme was the general spiritual condition.

"The Patriarch of the Lutheran Church in America," a graduate of the University of Goettingen and sent from Halle, the Rev. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, in 1742, reached Philadelphia, Pa. His apostolic life, his faithful, untiring and blessed labors, his piety, ability, tact and sagacity, inspired the people, reduced chaos to order and laid solid foundations for the future of the church. In 1748, Muhlenberg with five other pastors and lay representatives from twenty pastoral districts, organized the Ministerium or Synod of Pennsylvania and adjacent states. In 1786 the second Synod. that of New York, was organized.

The French and Indian wars, and the War of the Revolution, destroyed churches, devastated communities and scattered congregations. Infidelity, deism and rationalism poisoned by their evil influences. Throughout the colonies religion reached a very low ebb. The German Lutheran population greatly suffered in the general spiritual degeneration and destitution. At the close of the century the New York Synod had decreased in its pastoral roll nearly one-half; in the Carolinas six pastors remained; there were less than seventy in all the United States.

(3) Nineteenth Century. As for the Church in general, so especially for the Lutheran Church has the nineteenth century proved a period of before unheard of activity. It began in troublous times. The wars of Continental Europe, as also those of our own country, had killed the missionary life of the church to a great extent. What there was left in New York State of the earlier Dutch settlers had been served and appropriated by Reformed pastors. The Swedes along the Delaware were shepherded by Episcopalians, and they, too, ceased to be Lutherans. Many of their young men studied in colleges of other denominations, which but built bridges for many of the second and third generations of Lutherans to identify themselves with the more popular churches. Yet there was a remnant left in those earlier years. The work of Mühlberg, Schaum, Brunnholz, Kurtz, Handschuh, Hartwick and others was too well done to lose its identity amid the church life of the new century. Already, in 1817, steps were taken toward the founding of a theological school, which is even now in successful operation as "Hartwick Seminary." In 1820 three of the meanwhile organized synods founded the "General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church," which established its schools, church organs and mission agencies, adding districts and losing some again, until it now comprises 24 synods, and has educational institutions at Gettysburg and Selinsgrove, Pa., Hartwick, N. Y., Springfield, Ohio, Carthage, Ill., and Atchison, Kan., with boards for church, mission and eleemosynary activity.

The second quarter of the nineteenth century began with a decided tendency toward Americanization. But during the later thirties large numbers from the Fatherland swelled the ranks of Lutheranism immensely, settling mostly in the middle and then far western states. Some little pressure against Lutherans in Germany because of their refusal to accept the union of the two Reformation churches, as decreed by King Frederick Wilhelm III of Prussia, drove a colony under Pastor Grabau to Buffalo, N. Y., where they founded churches and schools. A still larger colony from Saxony, under the lead of Pastor Stephan, followed by Pastor C. F. W. Walther, settled in Missouri and established a definite center of German influence at St. Louis, organizing themselves into a synod at Chicago in 1847. A few pastors founded the Iowa Synod, in 1854, at St. Sebald, Ia. Those immigrants, sent out and cared for by a mission society of Berlin and mainly settling in Canada and in the states of Wisconsin, Michigan and Minnesota, organized themselves successively as "State Synods" in 1850, '58, '60 and '61. The Swedes began to come during the forties, and they were organized under the lead of Professor Esbjorn, in 1860, into what is known as the Augustana Synod, with district conferences all over the United States. The Norwegians have their old synod of 1853, preceded by Hange's of 1846, and followed by the United Norwegian Church of 1890 and the Norwegian Free Church of 1891, the German synods of Texas, Wartburg, Augsburg, Nebraska; the Icelandic and Finnish are creations of the latter part of the century.

In the year 1867, the conditions of the church having changed by the vast additions from beyond the sea, there was organized the "General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church," which, after adding and again losing different synodical members, now comprises ten synods, among which are the oldest and several of the largest of our name, three of them being German, one Swedish, one mixed and five English. This general body has educational institutions at Allentown, Philadelphia, Rochester, Greenville, Pa., Chicago, Rock Island, Red Wing, Lindsborg, South Orange, N. J., and a well organized system of church work for all the various demands of local and general interests.

In 1872 the synods, withdrawn from the recently organized General Council, together with others of a more European type, organized under the lead of the German Missouri, the "Synodical Conference," now composed of five districts and owning educational institutions at Fort Wayne, St. Louis, Milwaukee, St. Paul, New Ulm, Springfield, Ill., Winfield, Kan., Seward, Neb., Addison, Ill., and Neperan, N. Y. This conference is numerically the strongest of our general bodies. It carries on a vast mission work among the Germans; also has missions among the negroes and in India. Its confessional standpoint is of the strictest cast, insisting on non-fellowship with errorists, rigid congregational discipline and parochial schools. One English district synod, with 46 congregations, coöperates with the Synodical Conference.

The eight Lutheran synods of the South, alienated from their northern associations, are organized since 1886 into the "United Synod," having in all but 400 churches, with institutions at Salem, Va., Newberry and Charleston, S. C., and Hickory, N. C. They have no negro and but small foreign membership.

Of the seventeen individual or independent synods, the Joint Synod of Ohio, dating its origin back to 1818; that of Iowa and the Norwegian United Church, have each a number of districts and are in the line of becoming "general bodies;" some of the smaller synods will be absorbed by the more vigorous ones, and like changes are going on continually in the Lutheran Church of this country. It would not be correct to speak of them as so many divisions, for all of them, together with the general bodies, cling to the historic name and subscribe to the Augsburg Confession of 1530; they use Luther's Small Catechism in their instruction for church membership, whatever language they may speak, and thus constitute one Evangelical Lutheran Church.

As to their nationalities, the statistics change rapidly in favor of the new. At present there are 4,000 German, 3,800 English, 1,950 Norwegian, 930 Swedish, 295 Danish, 45 Finnish and 25 Icelandic Lutheran churches in North America. These together report 45 colleges, 24 theological seminaries, 40 academies, 7,043 ministers, 11,605 congregations, 4,034 parochial schools, and 1,711,000 communicants. In 1830 the Lutherans had one communicant to every 234 inhabitants; in 1890 it was one to every 48, demonstrating a rapid gain on the population of this country. Their baptized membership may be estimated at about eight millions, which gives them one to every ten of population.

In Europe the church is under the control of the State, which has led to some confusion as to its historic name. Prussia ignores the difference between Lutheran and Reformed officially and calls her state church "Evangelical," yet allowing individual freedom both as to name and confession. In Austria, France and most of the southeastern countries it is known as the "Church of the Augsburg Confession." The Lutherans of Southern Germany have generally adhered to the name "Evangelical" as originally adopted, the second part, "Lutheran," not having been recognized in public documents until the Westphalian Treaty of 1648. There is a body of 922 ministers, with 1,152 congregations and 116 parochial school teachers in this country, calling itself the "German Evangelical Synod of North America." These are not counted in with the Lutheran Church, because they reject the name "Lutheran" and claim to continue the simple evangelical status of the church in most parts of Germany. They, however, adopt the Augsburg Confession and do not differ in their cult and sympathies from others who have had the same earlier training. Also the Swedish Mission Friends, who number some 500 churches in the United States, deserve recognition, as originally and practically now a part of the Lutheran Church. They have 22 congregations in the city of Chicago.

3. Polity and Organization. In its government the Lutheran Church in the United States is not Episcopalian, Congregational, Presbyterian or Methodist, though it has certain terms and usages which are akin to some existing in these ecclesiastical organizations. It is somewhat like the government of the United States.

Jesus Christ is the Supreme Head of the Church. A congregation, consisting of the pastor and his people, joined in organization, constitute the unit. From the Supreme Head the congregation has power to maintain and administer in their purity the Word of Christ and His Sacraments. With the advice and counsel of the Synod, when requested or needed, it manages its own affairs.

Synods are organizations made up of congregations, within the limits prescribed by their constitutions, as agreed upon and subscribed, for the furtherance of the duties and good of the church at large, such as education, the training of pastors, missions, home and foreign, providing books for worship, etc. In the Synod, the congregation is entitled, in addition to its pastor, to at least one lay representative from each parish; in all synodical transactions these laymen have a parity and equal rights and privileges with the pastors. The Synods plan, manage and promote what the single congregation is unable to do, the educational, eleemosynary, mission and general activities of their churches; advise and counsel with them, as constitutionally agreed upon, in some Synods, as with the Swiss referendum, the resolutions of the Synod being in force only when approved by the votes of their congregations. The Lutheran church leads in home missionary activity; she initiated among the Protestants of America and successfully promoted deaconess institutions and hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged, epileptics, etc.

4. Doctrine and Life. The Evangelical Lutheran Church, as the first-born of the German and Scandinavian Reformation, adheres more and more faithfully to the Confession set forth at Augsburg June 25, 1530. This includes an acceptance of the ecumenical creeds of Christendom and also a general consent to the later doctrinal developments as set forth in the Apology, the Smalcald Articles, the Catechisms of Luther and the Formula of Concord, which together were published in the Book of Concord, 1580. The writings of Luther, Melancthon, Chemnitz, Quenstedt, Gerhard, Arndt, Spener, Luthardt, Zöckler, Rohmert, Krauth, Walther and others, ancient and modern, are held in high esteem, as differing in non-essential phases of doctrine only. The rationalism of the eighteenth century has entirely disappeared; the Ritchelism of Germany is not affecting the Lutheran Church of America. Here all accept the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the Word of God in the form and sense as originally given, making it their rule of faith and life.

The Lutheran Church believes in the Trinity; Father, Son and Holy Ghost, three Persons, one God; and in the divine and the human nature forever united in the person of Jesus, the Christ. She teaches, with utmost emphasis, that in Him men are justified by faith alone, and demands good works as fruit of true obedience. The Lutheran Church receives the sacrament of the Holy Supper and the Sacrament of Baptism, and believes that, in a way not defined, in the Holy Supper the Lord Jesus gives His true Body and His true Blood to the communicant; and that ordinarily Baptism is "necessary to salvation and that by Baptism grace is offered." She confines the rite of Baptism to no one form, and gladly admits infants to this "washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost."

The Lutheran Church holds that the Holy Spirit ordinarily reaches and acts upon the souls of men through the Truth, and mediately, through the Word of God and the Holy Sacraments as the only and appointed means of grace. She believes in the spiritual priesthood of all true Christians; but insists that only they who have been rightly called shall teach in her pulpits and minister at her altars. The Lutheran Church in her worship is liturgical; but accords freedom, and does not teach that the unity of the Church depends upon a uniform ritual and service. The Lutheran Church teaches that through the Fall man's nature is changed and debased; that because of sin, mankind is under the sentence of Divine condemnation and spiritually dead; that only through the means of grace, the Word and the Sacraments, by the gracious help of the Holy Spirit, is it possible for man to know and accept God's offered mercy, receive spiritual life, perform acceptable service, and attain the glorious resurrection of the body and eternal salvation.

LUTHER LEAGUE OF AMERICA (lū'thēr lēg öv a-mēr-i-ka).

This organization is in connection with the Evangelical Lutheran Church, which is the oldest and largest of Protestant communions in the world. (See LUTHERAN CHURCH, EVANGELICAL.)

1. Various Young People's Societies. With the rise and spread of the "Endeavor" movement very many of the English-speaking Lutheran churches immediately followed their example, while others adopted a somewhat similar method, called the "Luther Alliance," and still others continued their young people's societies. Those organized on the line of "Christian Endeavor" have since formed a national association that meets in connection with the International United Society; those of the Synodical Conference organized the "Walther League," which allows male membership only; and a third class, notably those of the larger German churches in New York and Brooklyn, moved in the direction toward a national association that should embrace all the different young people's societies of Lutheran congregations that could at all affiliate on a common platform.

2. Organization of the Luther League of America. Years passed on before an agreement was attained. Neighboring societies and sections of states had meanwhile organized themselves into local associations, and during the year 1895 the call for a general meeting at Pittsburg was cordially responded to. On the thirty-first day of October the delegates from eastern, western, central and southern states met and effected an organization to be henceforth known as The Luther League of America.

(1) Bond of Union. As to its faith Art. II provides: "We acknowledge as the bond of our union the Word of God as the only infallible rule of faith and practice and the Unaltered Augsburg Confession as the correct exponent of that Word."

(2) Objects. Article III specifies: The objects of this League shall be to encourage the formation of the Young People's Societies in all Lutheran congregations in America, to urge their affiliation with their respective State or Territorial Leagues, and with this League to stimulate the various Young People's Societies to greater Christian activity and to foster the spirit of loyalty to the Church.

(3) Membership. The membership is regulated in the fourth article of its constitution thus: Any society of whatever name, connected with a Lutheran congregation or a Lutheran institution of learning, and all District and State organizations, whose admission shall have been in conformity with Article II of this Constitution, and recommended by the committee on credentials, are entitled to membership.

Each society admitted to membership shall be entitled to one delegate, each District Association to three delegates, and each State or Territorial organization to ten delegates in all conventions.

(4) Officers. The officers elected under this Constitution were: President, Mr. E. F. Eilert of New York; general secretary, Mr. Leander Trautman of Pittsburg; recording secretary, Mr. W. C. Stoeber of Philadelphia; assistant recording secretary, Miss Vesta E. Severinghaus of Chicago; treasurer, Mr. Cornelius Eckhardt of Washington, D. C.

(5) Meetings and Relations. The "Luther League" meets biennially, and has thus far met at Pittsburg, Chicago, New York and Cincinnati. It has not yet succeeded in absorbing all the young people's societies of the Lutheran church, partly because of its conservative character, which keeps many of the existing Endeavor Societies from joining it, and partly because of its Americanism which does not please the "Walther League." As to our synodical divisions there are represented in it most numerous the young people's societies of the General Council, the General Synod, the Norwegian United Church, the United Synod of the South, and the joint Synod of Ohio. All these cooperate in the State Leagues of New York, Pennsylvania, Kansas, New Jersey, Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana, Kentucky, North Carolina, Nebraska, South Dakota; and the District Leagues of Central Connecticut, South Carolina and South Atlantic Region.

(6) Junior League. There is also a "Junior League" provided for by a different constitution. This is composed of the younger baptized members, workers and friends of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. In name, faith, object, membership and general programme, it is similar to the former. Meetings of the Junior League may be of a devotional, educational, social, moral, physical or varied character, according to the plans adopted by the Supervising Committee.

(7) Administrative Board, Etc. In addition to the official board there is an executive committee which provides a course of topics for the weekly meetings, a general reading course and the necessary literature.

(8) Official Organ. The Luther League Review, edited by the president, Mr. E. F. Eilert, is the official organ of the Luther League of America. There is a Luther League Hymnal, a Luther League Handbook, Booklets, Pamphlets and Badges. While it is largely managed by laymen and the younger ones of the church, its executive committee has six ministers out of the ten members composing it, and in the list of State Leagues, as quoted in the "Handbook," we meet seven ministers who hold office, as also eight women.

LUZ (lüz), (Heb. לוז, looz, almond-tree), the ancient name of Bethel (Gen. xxviii:19). (See BETHEL.) The word Gen. xxx:37 is translated hazel in the A. V., and in some others it is rendered by words equivalent to 'walnut'; but 'almond' appears to be its true meaning. (See ALMOND.) It is also the name of several towns.

1. The spot to which the name of Bethel was given appears, however, to have been at a little distance in the environs of Luz, and they are accordingly distinguished in Josh. xvi:2, although the name of Bethel was eventually extended to that town.

2. A small place of the same name in the territory of the Hittites, founded by an inhabitant of Luz of Canaan, who was spared when the place was destroyed by the tribe of Benjamin. Not identified (Judg. i:26); probably the Luza of Mt. Gerizim. (Stanley, p. 231, sq.)

LYCAONIA (lyk'a-ō'ni-ā), (Gr. Λυκαονία, loo-kah-on-ee'ah', from the mythological Lycaon, or λύκος a wolf), a province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the east, Galatia on the north, Phrygia on the west, and Isauria and Cilicia on the south.

It extends in length about twenty geographical miles from east to west, and about thirteen in breadth. It was an undulating plain, involved among mountains, which were noted for the course of wild-asses. The soil was so strongly impregnated with salt that few of the brooks supplied drinkable water, so that good water was sold for money. But sheep thrived on the pasturage, and were reared with great advantage (Strabo, xii, p. 568; Pliny, Hist. Nat. viii:69). It was a Roman province when visited by Paul (Acts xiv:6), and its chief towns were Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, of which the first was the capital. 'The speech of Lycaonia' (Acts xiv:11) is supposed by some to have been the ancient Assyrian language, also spoken by the Cappadocians (Jablonski, Disquis. de Lingua Lycaonica, Opusc. iii, 3, sq.); but it is more usually conceived to have been a corrupt Greek, intermingled with many Syriac words.

LYCIA (ly'ci-ā), (Gr. Λυκία, loo-kee'ah', probably from λύκος, a wolf), a province in the southwest of Asia Minor, having Pamphylia on the east, Phrygia on the north, Caria on the west and the Mediterranean on the south.

Great part of the country, however, consists of a peninsula projecting south into the Mediterranean. It is mountainous, and is watered by numerous small rivers which flow from the mountains. Its inhabitants were believed to be descendants of Cretans who came thither under Sarpedon, brother of Minos. Lycia is named in 1 Macc. xv:23, as one of the countries to which the Roman senate sent its missive in favor of the Jews. The victory of the Romans over Antiochus (B. C. 189) gave Lycia rank as a free state, which it retained till the time of Claudius, when it was made a province of the Roman empire (Suet. Claud. 25; Vespas. 8). Lycia contained many towns, two of which are mentioned in the New Testament; Patara (Acts xxi:1, 2); Myra (Acts xxvii:5); and one, Phaselis, in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xv:23).

LYDDA (lŷd'dā), (Heb. לוד, lod; Gr. Λύδδα, lud'dah).

A town within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim, nine miles east of Joppa, on the road between that port and Jerusalem.

It bore in Hebrew the name of Lod, and appears to have been first built by the Benjamites, although it lay beyond the limits of their territory; and we find it again inhabited by Benjamites after the Exile (1 Chron. viii:12; Ezra ii:33; Neh. xi:35).

It is mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xi:34), as having been taken from Samaria and annexed to Judæa by Demetrius Nicator; and at a later date its inhabitants are named among those who were sold into slavery by Cassius, when he inflicted the calamity of his presence upon Palestine after the death of Julius Cæsar (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11. 2; xii. 6). In the New Testament the place is only noticed, under the name of Lydda, as the scene of Peter's miracle in healing Eneas (Acts ix:32, 35). Some years later the town was reduced to ashes by Cestius Gallus, in his march against Jerusalem (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii, 19, 1); but it must soon have revived, for not long after we find it at the head of one of the toparchies of the later Judæa, and as such it surrendered to Vespasian (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iii:3, 5; iv:8). At that time it is described by Josephus (Antiq. xx:6, 2) as a village equal to a city; and the Rabbins have much to say of it as a seat of Jewish learning, of which it was the most eminent in Judæa after Jabneh and Bether (Lightfoot, Parergon, sec. 8).

In the general change of names which took place under the Roman dominion, Lydda became Diospolis, and under this name it occurs in coins of Severus and Caracalla, and is often mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome. It was early the seat of a bishopric, and at the different councils the bishops are found to have subscribed their names variously, as of Lydda or Diospolis.

Lydda early became connected with the hom-age paid to the celebrated saint and martyr St. George, who was not less renowned in the east than afterwards in the west. A church was erected there in honor of him by the Emperor Justinian. This church, which stood outside the town, had just been leveled to the ground by the Moslems when the Crusaders arrived at Lydda; but it was soon rebuilt by them, and they established a bishopric of Lydda and Ramleh. The church was destroyed by Saladin in 1191; and there is no evidence that it was ever rebuilt, although there was in later centuries an unfounded impression that the church the ruins of which were then seen, and which still exist, had been built by King Richard of England. It is now known by the ancient name of Lud. (Robinson's Bib. Researches, iii, 55; Pococke, Description, ii, 58; Volney, Voyage, i, 278.)

LYDIA (lŷd'i-à), (Gr. Λυδία, loo-dee'ah, derived from Λυδός its founder).

1. A province in the west of Asia Minor, supposed to have derived its name from Lud, the fourth son of Shem (Gen. x:22). (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

It was bounded on the east by Greater Phrygia, on the north by Æolis or Mysia, on the west by Ionia and the Ægean Sea, and on the south it was separated from Caria by the Mæander. The country is for the most part level. Among the mountains that of Tmolus was celebrated for its saffron and red wine. In the palmy days of Lydia its kings ruled from the shores of the Ægean to the river Halys; and Cræsus, who was its king in the time of Solon and of Cyrus, was reputed the richest monarch in the world. He was able to bring into the field an army of 420,000 foot and 60,000 horse against Cyrus, by whom, however, he was defeated, and his kingdom annexed to the Persian empire (Herod. i, 6). Lydia afterwards formed part of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ; and it is related in 1 Macc. viii:3, that Antiochus the Great was compelled by the Romans to cede Lydia to king Eumenes. In the time of the travels of the Apostles it was a province of the Roman empire. Its chief towns were Sardis (the capital), Thyatira, and Philadelphia, all of which are mentioned in the New Testament, although the name of the province itself does not occur. The manners of the Lydians were corrupt even to a proverb (Herod. i:92).

2. A woman of Thyatira, 'a seller of purple,' who dwelt in the city of Philippi in Macedonia (Acts xvi:14, 15). Lydia was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte 'who worshiped God' (σεβουμένη τὸν Θεόν). She was converted by the preaching of Paul; and after she and her household had been baptized, she pressed the use of her house so earnestly upon him and his associates that they were constrained to accept the invitation. The Lydians were famous for the art of dyeing purple vests, and Lydia, as 'a seller of purple,' is supposed to have been a dealer in vests so dyed, rather than in the dye itself. (See Kuinoel on Acts xvi:14). (A. D. 47.)

LYDIANS (lŷd'i-anz), (Jer. xlvi:9). See LUD; LUDIM; LYDDA.

LYSANIAS (lŷ-sā'ni-as), (Gr. Λυσανίας, loo-san-ee'as, ending sadness), tetrarch of Abilene, when John commenced his ministry as the harbinger of Christ (Luke iii:1), A. D. 25.

He is supposed to have been son or grandson of another Lysanias, known in history, who was put to death by Mark Antony, and part of his territories given to Cleopatra. (See ABILENE.)

LYSIAS (lŷs'i-as), (Gr. Λυσίας, loo-see'as), or CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, chiliarch and commandant of the Roman troops who kept guard at the temple of Jerusalem, by whom Paul was secured from the fury of the Jews, and sent under guard to the procurator Felix at Cæsarea (Acts xxi:27-38; xxii:24-30; xxiii:17-30; xxiv:7, 22), A. D. 25.

LYSTRA (lŷs'trà), (Gr. Λύστρα, loos'trah), a city of Lycaonia in Asia Minor, to which Paul and Barnabas fled from the danger which threatened them at Iconium (Acts xiv:6).

Here, Paul having miraculously cured a cripple, they were both adored as gods; but afterwards, at the instigation of the Jews, Paul was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv:8-21). Timothy was a native of Lystra (Acts xvi:1; 2 Tim. iii:11). This city was east of Iconium, on the site of the modern Khatyn Serai, as proven by an inscription (Wolfe's Expedition, 142; Ramsay, Hist. Geog. 332). M.

M

MAACAH or MAACHAH (mā'a-kah), (Heb. מַעְכָּה, mah-ak-aw', depression).

1. A city and region at the foot of Mount Hermon, not far from Geshur, a district of Syria (Josh. xiii:13; 2 Sam. x:6, 8; 1 Chron. xix:7). Hence the adjacent portion of Syria is called Aram-Maacah, or Syria of Maachah (1 Chron. xix:6). The Israelites seem to have considered this territory as included in their grant, but were never able to get possession of it (Josh. xiii:13). In the time of David the small state had a king of its own, who contributed 1,000 men to the grand alliance of the Syrian nations against the Jewish monarch (2 Sam. x:6, 8). The lot of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan extended to this country, as had previously the dominion of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. iii:14; Josh. xii:5). The Gentile name is Maacathite, which is also put for the people (Deut. iii:14; Josh. xii:5; xiii:11; 2 Kings xv:29). Near, or within the ancient limits of Maacah, was the town called for that reason Abel beth-Maacah. (See ABEL.)

2. The father of Achish, king of Gath (1 Kings ii:39). (B. C. before 1010.)

3. The father of Hanan, one of David's worthies (1 Chron. xi:43). (B. C. before 1046.)

4. The father of Shephatiah, the military chief of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvii:16). (B. C. before 1014.)

5. A person whose sex does not appear; one of the offspring of Nahor's concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii:24). (B. C. about 2046.)

6. A concubine of Caleb (1 Chron. ii:48). (B. C. before 1656.)

7. Granddaughter of Benjamin, who was married to Machir, son of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii:16). (B. C. after 1856.)

8. Daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, wife of David, and mother of Absalom (2 Sam. iii:3). In 1 Sam. xxvii:8 we read of David's invading the land of the Geshurites, and the Jewish commentators allege that he then took the daughter of the king captive, and, in consequence of her great beauty, married her, after she had been made a proselyte according to the law in Deut. xxi. But this is a gross mistake, for the Geshur invaded by David was to the south of Judah, whereas the Geshur over which Talmi ruled was to the north, and was regarded as part of Syria (2 Sam. xv:8). The fact appears to be that David, having married the daughter of this king, contracted an alliance with him, in order to strengthen his interest against Ishbosheth in those parts. (B. C. 1053.)

9. Daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijam (1 Kings xv:1, 2). In verse 10 we read that Asa's 'mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom.' It is evident that here 'mother' is used in a loose sense, and means 'grandmother,' which the Maacah named in verse one must have been to the Asa of verse 10. It therefore appears to be a great error to make two persons of them, as is done by Calmet and others. The Abishalom who was the father of this Maacah is called Absalom in 2 Chron. xi:20, 21, and is generally supposed by the Jews to have been Absalom the son of David; which seems not improbable, seeing that Rehoboam's other two wives were of his father's family (2 Chron. xi:18). Asa commenced his reforms by 'removing her from being queen, because she had made an idol in a grove' (1 Kings xv:13; 2 Chron. xv:16). B. C. 973-953.

10. Wife of Jehiel and ancestress of king Saul (1 Chron. viii:29; ix:35). B. C. about 1658.

MAACATH (mā'a-kath). See MAACAH, 1.

MAACHATHI (ma-āk'a-thī), (Deut. iii:14), MAACHATHITES (ma-āk'a-thītes), (Hebrew singular with article, מַחְאֲתִית, ham-mah-ak-aw-thee', once, Josh. xiii:13, מַחְאֲתִית, mah-ak-awth').

The inhabitants of the kingdom of Maacah, of Syria, or of Beth-maacah in Naphtali (Josh. xii:5; 2 Sam. xxiii:34). Individual Maachathites are mentioned in 2 Sam. xxiii:34; Jer. xl:8; 2 Kings xxv:23; 1 Chron. iv:19.

MAADAI (ma-ād'ai), (Heb. מַעְדָּי, mah-ad-ah-ee, ornament of Jehovah).

One of the "sons" of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra x:34). (B. C. 459.)

MAADIAH (mā'a-di'ah), (Heb. מַעְדִּיָּה, mah-ad-yaw', ornament of Jehovah).

A chief priest, or one of the families of priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii:5, 7). Probably the same as Moadiah (verse 17). (B. C. 536.)

MAAI (ma-ā'i), (Heb. מַעֲוֵי, ma-ah-ee, compassionate).

A priest, son of Asaph, and one of the musicians at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:36). (B. C. 446.)

MAALEH-ACRABBIM (ma-āl'eh-a-krāb'bim), (Heb. מַעְלֵה עַרְבִּיִּים, mah-al-ay' ak-rab-beem', ascent of scorpions).

A mountain so called from the multitude of scorpions that infested it, at the southern end of the Salt Sea (Num. xxxiv:4; Josh. xv:3). Identified as the steep pass of Es Sufah.

MAARATH (mā'a-rāth), (Heb. מַעְרָת, mah-arawth', naked place, desolation).

A town of Judah, in the mountain district north of Hebron, near Halhul (Josh. xv:59), probably. It has not been identified.

MAASEIAH (mā'a-se'yā), (Heb. מַעֲשֵׂיָהוּ, mah-as-ay-yaw', or מַעֲשֵׂי הוֹי, mah-as-ay-yaw' hoo, work of Jehovah).

1. A descendant of Jeshua, the priest, who put away his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra x:18). (B. C. 459.)

2. A priest, one of the "sons" of Harim, who also divorced his foreign wife (Ezra x:21); perhaps the same as 11. (B. C. 459.)

3. A priest, one of the "sons" of Pashur, who divorced his wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x:22). (B. C. 459.)

4. A layman, one of the "sons" of Pahath-moab, who put away his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra x:30). (B. C. 459.)

5. Father of that Azariah who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:23). (B. C. 446.)

6. One of the chiefs of Israel who stood at the right hand of Ezra when the law was read to the people; perhaps he is identical with (8.) (Neh. viii:4). (B. C. about 410.)

7. A priest who assisted the Levites in instructing the people in the law as it was read by Ezra (Neh. viii:7). (B. C. about 410.)

8. One of the chiefs who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:25). (B. C. about 410.)

9. Son of Baruch, a descendant of Judah (Neh. xi:5). In 1 Chron. ix:5, he is apparently called ASAIAH. (B. C. 536.)

10. Son of Ithiel, a Benjamite, one of whose descendants lived in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi:7). (B. C. before 536.)

11. Two priests of this name were musicians and participated in the celebration of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:41, 42). (B. C. 446.)

12. Father of Zephaniah, who was priest in the time of Zedekiah (Jer. xxix:25). (B. C. before 589.)

13. Father of the false prophet Zedekiah, who was denounced by the prophet (Jer. xxix:21). (B. C. before 589.)

14. One of the Levites appointed by David as gate keeper for the ark (1 Chron. xv:18, 20). (B. C. 1043.)

15. Son of Adaiah; one of the captains of hundreds who helped Jehoiada to overthrow Athaliah and place Joash on the throne (2 Chron. xxiii:1). (B. C. 877.)

16. A military officer of the Levites, in the time of Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi:11). (B. C. 808.)

17. A prince of the royal house,—probably the son of king Jotham,—who was killed in the invasion of Judah by Zichri, of the tribe of Ephraim (2 Chron. xxviii:7). (B. C. about 738.)

18. A governor of Jerusalem in the reign of Josiah, sent by Josiah to repair the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv:8). (B. C. 623.)

19. Son of Shallum; a custodian of the Temple (Jer. xxxv:4). (B. C. 606.)

20. A priest, ancestor of Seraiah and Baruch, sons of Neriah (Jer. xxxii:12). (B. C. about 738.)

MAASIAI (ma-äs'i-äi), (Heb. מַאֲסִיָּאִי, mah-as-ah'ee, Jehovah's work).

A priest, son of Adiel, resident at Jerusalem after the return from captivity (1 Chron. ix:12). He is apparently the same as AMASHAI (Neh. xi:13). (B. C. 536.)

MAATH (mä'ath), (Gr. Μαᾶθ, mah-ath'), an ancestor of Jesus, who lived after the time of Zerubabel (Luke iii:26). The name may be an interpolation of MATTHIAS (ver. 24), as no such name as Maath occurs in the Old Testament.

MAAZ (mä'áz), (Heb. מַאֲז, mah'ats, anger), son of Ram, the firstborn of Jerahmeel of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii:27), B. C. after 1658.

MAAZIAH (mä'a-zí'ah), (Heb. מַאֲזִיָּאִה, mah-az-yaw', Jehovah's consolation).

1. One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:8). (B. C. about 410.)

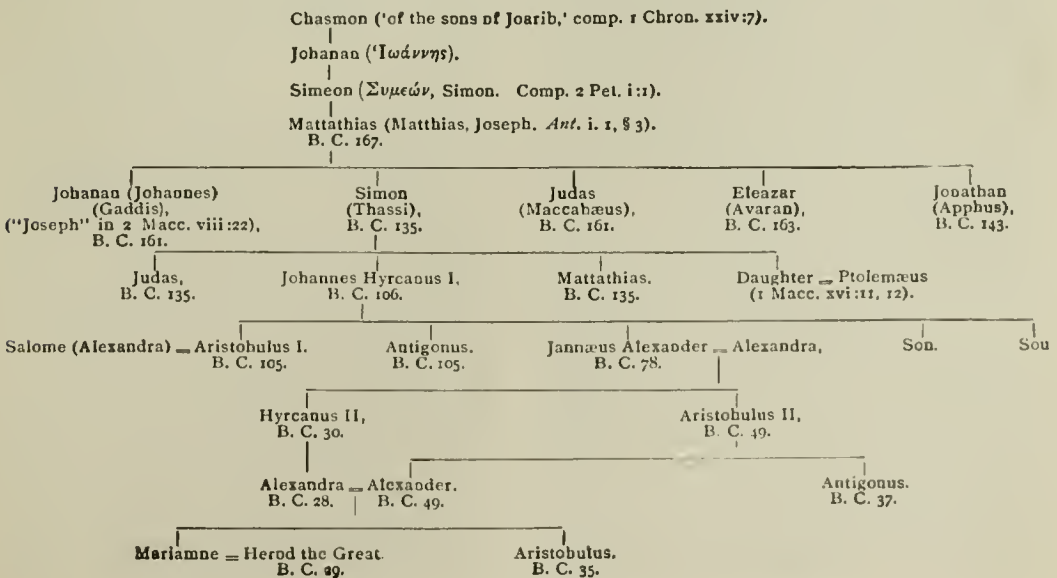

2. One of the descendants of Aaron, who was head of the twenty-fourth course of priests, as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxiv:18). (B. C. 1014.)

MACCABEES (mäk'ka-beez).

1. Name. The etymology of the name is very uncertain. Some have claimed that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters of the Hebrew sentence, "Who among the gods is like unto thee, Jehovah" (Exod. xv:11), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banner of the patriots. Another derivation has been given which may be considered as satisfactory; according to this it is formed from the Heb. mak-kaw-baw', מַכָּה, "a hammer," giving a sense not altogether unlike that in which Charles Martel derived a surname from his favorite weapon. Although the name Maccabees has gained the widest currency, that of Asmonæans, or Hasmonæans, is the proper name of the family. This name probably came from the great-grandfather of Matathias.

2. Pedigree. The connection of the several members of the family will be seen from the subjoined table:

CHASHMON—THE ASMONEAN FAMILY.

3. History. As a family, the Maccabees commenced their career of patriotic and religious heroism during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, about the year B. C. 167.

(1) Mattathias. At this time the aged Mattathias, a descendant of the Asmonæans, and his five sons, inhabited the town of Modin, to which place Antiochus sent certain of his officers with instructions to erect an altar for heathen sacrifices, and to engage the inhabitants in the celebration of the most idolatrous and superstitious rites. The venerable Mattathias openly declared his resolution to oppose the orders of the tyrant, and one of the recreant Jews approaching the altar which had been set up, he rushed upon him, and slew him with his own hand. His part thus boldly taken, he called his sons and his friends around him, and immediately fled to the mountains, inviting all to follow him who had any zeal for God and the law. A small band of resolute and devoted men was thus formed, and the governor of the district saw reason to fear that a general insurrection would be the consequence of their proceeding. By a sudden attack directed against them on the Sabbath, when he knew the strictness of their principles would not allow them to take measures for their defense, he threw them into disorder, and slew about a thousand of their number, consisting of men, women, and children.

Warned by this event, and yielding to the necessity of their present condition, Mattathias and his sons determined that for the future they would defend themselves on the Sabbath in the same manner as on other days. The mountain-hold of the little band was now guarded more cautiously than before. Fresh adherents to the holy cause were continually flocking in; and in a few months the party found itself sufficiently strong to make attacks upon the towns and villages of the neighborhood, throwing down the heathen altars, and punishing the reprobates who had taken part with the enemies of God.

(2) Judas Maccabæus. By the death of Mattathias, the leadership of the party devolved upon his son Judas Maccabæus, whose worth and heroic courage pointed him out as most capable of carrying on the enterprise thus nobly begun. Judas lost no time in attacking the enemy. He made himself master of several towns, which he fortified and garrisoned. Apollonius, general of the army in Samaria, hastened to stop the progress of the insurgents. Judas met him on the way, joined battle with him, slew him, and routed his army. The same success attended him in his encounter with Seron, general of the Syrians; and it now became evident to Antiochus that the Jewish nation would soon be delivered from his yoke, unless he proceeded against them with a more formidable force. While, therefore, he himself went into Persia to recruit his treasures, Lysias, whom he left as regent at home, sent an army into Judæa, composed of forty thousand foot and seven thousand cavalry. This powerful array was further increased by auxiliaries from the provinces, and by bands of Jews, who dreaded nothing more than the triumph of those virtuous men of their own nation, who were struggling to save it from reprobation. So unequal did the forces of Judas appear to an encounter with such an army, that in addressing his followers he urged those among them who had any especial reason to love the present world to retire at once; while to those who remained he pointed out the promises of God as the best support of their courage and fidelity. By a forced march he reached a portion of the enemy encamped at Emmaus, while utterly unprepared for his approach. Complete success attended this bold proceeding. The several parts of the hostile army were successively put to flight, a splendid booty was secured, and Judas gained a position which made even the most powerful of his opponents tremble. Another and more numerous army was sent against him the following year, but with no better success. At the head of ten thousand determined followers, Judas defeated the army of Lysias, consisting of sixty thousand. A way was thereby opened for his progress to Jerusalem, whither he immediately hastened, with the devout purpose of purifying the Temple and restoring it to its former glory. The solemn religious rites having been performed which were necessary to the cleansing of the sacred edifice, the Festival of the Purification was instituted, and added to the number of the other national festivals of more ancient date.

Judas had full occupation for his courage and ability in repelling the incursions of those numerous foes who dreaded the restoration of order and religion. But every day added to his successes. Having overthrown the Syrian commanders sent against him, he occupied Samaria, made himself master of the strong city of Hebron, of Azotus, and other important places, taking signal vengeance on the people of Joppa and Jannina, who had treacherously plotted the destruction of numerous faithful Jews.

Antiochus Epiphanes was succeeded by Antiochus Eupator. At first this prince acted towards the Jews with moderation and tolerance. But he soon afterwards invaded Judæa with a powerful army, and was only induced to make peace with Maccabæus by the fears which he entertained of a rival aspirant to the throne. His caution did not save him. He was put to death by his own uncle, Demetrius, who, obtaining the throne of Syria, made peace with Judas, but took possession of the citadel of Jerusalem, which was occupied by his general Nicanor, and a body of troops. This state of things was not allowed to last long. Demetrius listened to the reports of Nicanor's enemies, and threatened to deprive him of his command unless he could disprove the accusation that he had entered into a league with Judas, and was betraying the interests of his sovereign. Nicanor immediately took measures to satisfy Demetrius, and Judas saw it necessary to escape from Jerusalem, and put himself in a posture of defense. A battle took place in which he defeated his enemy. Another was soon after fought at Beth-horon, where he was again victorious. Nicanor himself fell in this battle, and his head and right hand were sent among the spoils to Jerusalem. But the forces of Demetrius were still numerous. Judas had retired to Laish with about three thousand followers. He was there attacked by overwhelming numbers. Only eight hundred of his people remained faithful to him on this occasion. Resolved not to flee, he bravely encountered the enemy, and was speedily slain, regarding his life as a fitting sacrifice to the cause in which he was engaged.

(3) Jonathan. After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been for a short time wholly disorganized, and it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (the wary), the youngest son of Mattathias. Jonathan proved himself a worthy successor of his heroic brother, and skillfully evaded the first attack of Bacchides, the Syrian general. For two years after this, the brothers were left in tranquillity, and they established themselves in a little fortress called Bethtasi, situated among the rocks near Jericho. The skill and resolution with which they pursued their measures rendered them formidable to the enemy; and the state of affairs in Syria some time after obliged Demetrius to make Jonathan the general of his forces in Judæa, and to invest him with the authority of governor of Jerusalem. To this he was compelled by the rivalry of Alexander Balas; but his policy was too late to secure the attachment of his new ally. Jonathan received offers from Alexander to support his interests among the Jews, and the high-priesthood was the proffered reward. The invitation was accepted; and Jonathan became the first of the Asmonæan line through which the high-priesthood was so long transmitted. Alexander Balas left nothing undone which might tend to secure the fidelity of Jonathan. He gave him a high rank among the princes of his kingdom, and adorned him with a purple robe. Jonathan continued to enjoy his prosperity till the year B. C. 143, when he fell a victim to the treachery of Trypho, who aspired to the Syrian throne.

(4) Simon. As soon as Simon, the last remaining brother of the Maccabæan family, heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemais by Tryphon, he placed himself at the head of the patriot party. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (1 Macc. v:17-23), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan, when he was intrusted with a distinct command (1 Macc. xi:59). Tryphon, after carrying Jonathan about as a prisoner for some little time, put him to death, and then, having murdered Antiochus, seized the throne. On this Simon made overtures to Demetrius II (B. C. 143), which were favorably received, and the independence of the Jews was at length formally recognized. The long struggle was now triumphantly ended, and it remained only to reap the fruits of victory. This Simon hastened to do. The prudence and wisdom for which he was already distinguished at the time of his father's death (1 Macc. ii:65) gained for the Jews the active support of Rome (1 Macc. xv:16-21), in addition to the confirmation of earlier treaties. After settling the external relations of the new state upon a sure basis, Simon regulated its internal administration to the great satisfaction of his subjects.

(5) John Hyrcanus. He was succeeded by his son the celebrated John Hyrcanus. (B. C. 135.) At first he was hard pressed by Antiochus Sidetes, and only able to preserve Jerusalem on condition of dismantling the fortifications and submitting to a tribute. (B. C. 133.) The foreign and civil wars of the Seleucidæ gave him afterwards abundant opportunities to retrieve his losses. He reduced Idumæa (Joseph. Antiq. xiii:9, sec. 1), confirmed the alliance with Rome, and at length succeeded in destroying Samaria, the hated rival of Jerusalem. (B. C. 109.) The external splendor of his government was marred by the growth of internal divisions (Joseph. Antiq. xii, 10, secs. 5, 6); but John escaped the fate of all the older members of his family, and died in peace (B. C. 106-5) after possessing the supreme authority for thirty years.

(6) Aristobulus. He was succeeded by his son, Aristobulus, who added ITURÆA—a district at the base of the Anti-Libanus—to his dominions, but died, after a short reign of one year, of remorse for the murder of his mother, Salome Alexandra, to whom the secular dominion had been bequeathed by Hyrcanus, but whom Aristobulus had cast into prison, and caused there to die of hunger.

(7) Alexander Jannæus. The son who succeeded him was Alexander Jannæus. Constantly fighting, and generally beaten, this king yet, strange to say, contrived to enlarge his territories; restless and enterprising as he was cruel and sanguinary, he gave his opponents no rest, and his opponents were all his neighbors in turn, excepting Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. Attached to the SADDUCEES (which see), like his father, and probably something of a pagan, he was disliked by the mass of his countrymen, and a civil war of six years' duration ensued. After a brief period of peace, he died (B. C. 78).

(8) Hyrcanus II followed Alexander. He did not long retain authority, for Alexander, when dying, had recommended his wife, Alexandra, to throw herself into the arms of the very party who had thwarted him all his life, the Pharisees, as the best way of retaining her authority. This she did; and governed, on the whole, prudently for nine years. The Pharisaic party, however, abused the power which fell into their hands, and a reaction took place. Aristobulus, youngest son of the queen, and a prince of great spirit, placed himself at the head of the movement, marched to Jerusalem, took possession of the city, and ejected his elder brother, Hyrcanus II, from the sovereignty. Afterwards, however, the latter, at the instigation of Antipater, the Idumean, and father of Herod the Great, fled to Aretas, king of northern Arabia, who was induced, by the promise of a cession of the territory which had been acquired by Alexander Jannæus, to take up arms on his behalf. This led to the interference of the Romans, who were then fighting both in Syria and Armenia. After several vicissitudes, Jerusalem was captured (B. C. 63) by Pompey, who had decided in favor of Hyrcanus, and Judæa made dependent on the Roman province of Syria, and Hyrcanus, appointed ethnarch and high-priest. Aristobulus, however, with his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and two daughters, were carried captive to Rome. Antigonus was put to death by the common executioner (B. C. 37). Thus ended the Maccabæan dynasty. (Smith, Bib. Dict.; Ewald, Hist. of Israel.) (See MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.)

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF (mäk'ka-beez, bööks öv). See APOCRYPHA.

1. Number of Books. The books of Maccabees are the titles of certain Jewish histories containing principally the details of the heroic exploits referred to in the preceding article. There were in all four books (to which some add a fifth) known to the ancients, of which three are still read in the eastern, and two in the western church. Of these the third is the first in order of time. We shall, however, to avoid confusion, speak of them in the order in which they are commonly enumerated.

(1) The First Book of Maccabees contains a lucid and authentic history of the undertakings of Antiochus Epiphanes against the Jews, from the year B. C. 175 to the death of Simon Maccabæus, B. C. 135. This history is confessedly of great value. Although its brevity, observes De Wette (see 1 Macc. i:6; viii:7; xii), renders it in some instances unsatisfactory, defective, and uncritical, and occasionally extravagant, it is upon the whole entitled to credit, chronologically accurate, and advantageously distinguished above all other historical productions of this period. It is the second book in order of time.

(a) Language. There is little question that this book was written in Hebrew, although the original is now lost. The Greek version abounds in Hebraisms and errors of translation.

(b) Author and Age. Of the author nothing is known; but he must have been a Palestinian Jew, who wrote some considerable time after the death of Simon Maccabæus, and even of Hyrcanus, and made use of several written, although chiefly of traditionary, sources of information. At the same time it is not impossible that the author was present at several of the events which he so graphically describes.

(2) The Second Book of Maccabees (the third in order of time) is a work of very inferior character to the first. It is an abridgment of a more ancient work, written by a Jew named Jason, who lived at Cyrene in Africa, comprising the principal transactions of the Jews which occurred during the reigns of Seleucus IV, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Antiochus Eupator. It partly goes over the same ground with the first book, but commences ten or twelve years earlier, and embraces in all a period of fifteen years. It does not appear that the author of either saw the other's work. The second book of Maccabees is divided into two unconnected parts. It commences with a letter from the citizens of Jerusalem and Judæa to the Greek Jews in Egypt, written B. C. 123 (which refers to a former letter written to the same, B. C. 143, acquainting them of their sufferings), and informs them that their worship was now restored, and that they were celebrating the Feast of Dedication. The second part (ii:18) contains a still more ancient letter, written B. C. 159, to the priest Aristobulus, the tutor of king Ptolemy, recounting, besides some curious matter, the death of Antiochus Epiphanes. The third part contains the preface, in which the author states that he is about to epitomize the five books of Jason. The work commences with the attack of Heliodorus on the Temple, and closes with the death of Nicanor, a period of fifteen years. The history supplies some blanks in the first book; but the letters prefixed to it contradict some of the facts recorded in the body of the work, and are consequently supposed to have been added by another hand. Neither are the letters themselves considered genuine, and they were probably written long after the death of Nicanor, and even of John Hyrcanus. This book gives a different account of the place and manner of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes from that contained in the first book.

The narrative abounds in miraculous adventures, historical and chronological errors, extraordinary and arbitrary embellishments, affected descriptions, and moralizing reflections.

(a) Author and Age. We are not aware when either Jason himself or his epitomizer lived. Jahn refers the age of the epitomizer to some time previous to the middle of the last century before the birth of Christ, and De Wette maintains that Jason must have written a considerable time after the year B. C. 161.

(b) Language and Versions. Jerome (Prolog. Galeat.) observes that the phraseology of this book evinces a Greek original. The elegance and purity of the style have misled some persons into the supposition that its author was Josephus.

(3) The Third Book of Maccabees, still read in the Greek church, and contained in the Alexandrian and Vatican MSS. (A. & B.) is, as has been already observed, the first in order of time. It contains an account of the persecution of the Egyptian Jews by Ptolemy Philopator, who is said to have proceeded to Jerusalem after his victory at Raphia over Antiochus the Great, B. C. 217, and after sacrificing in the Temple, to have attempted to force his way into the Holy of Holies, when he was prostrated and rendered motionless by an invisible hand. Upon his return to Egypt, he revenged himself by shutting up the Jews in the Hippodrome, and exposing them to be crushed beneath the feet of elephants. This book contains an account of their deliverance by Divine interposition. It is anterior in point of date to the Maccabæan period, and has received its designation from a general resemblance to the first two books in the heroic character of the actions which it describes. Calmet (Commentary) observes that this book is rejected as apocryphal in the Latin church; not, however, as not containing a true history, but as not being inspired, as he considers the first two books to be. It is nevertheless regarded by De Wette as a tasteless fable, and notwithstanding the relation which it contains of an annual festival, considered by him as most probably destitute of any historical foundation. Dr. Milman (Hist. of the Jews) describes it as a 'romantic story.'

Author, Age, and Versions. The author is unknown. Dr. Allix (Judgment of the Jewish Church) considers it to have been written B. C. 200, and by the author of Ecclesiasticus. There is a Syriac version in the Polyglots, but no ancient Latin translation has come down to us.

(4) The Fourth Book of Maccabees, which is also found in the Alexandrian and Vatican manuscripts, is generally supposed to be the same as the Supremacy of Reason, attributed to Josephus, with which it for the most part accords. It consists of an inflated amplification of the history of the martyrdom of Eleazar, and of the seven brothers, whose torments and death, with that of their mother, form the subject of 2 Macc. chapters vi, vii.

Calmet (Preface to the Fourth Book of Maccabees) has pointed out several contradictions between this and the second book, as well as the books of Moses, together with some opinions derived from the Stoics, such as the equality of crimes; which, he supposes, together with its tedious descriptions, have consigned it to the rank of an Apocryphal book.

(5) Fifth Book of Maccabees. What has been called the Fifth Book of Maccabees is now extant only in the Arabic and Syriac languages.

Author, Age, and Subject. It is impossible to ascertain the author, who could scarcely have been Josephus, as he disagrees in many things with that historian (Calmet's Preface).

The work consists of a history of Jewish affairs, commencing with the attempt on the treasury at Jerusalem by Heliodorus, and ending with the tragic fate of the last of the Asmonæan princes, and with the inhuman execution by Herod of his noble and virtuous wife Mariamne, and of his two sons. This history thus fills up the chasm to the birth of Christ.

Dr. Cotton has pointed out among the 'remarkable peculiarities' found in this book the phrases, 'Peace be unto thee,' and 'God be merciful to them,' showing that the practice of prayer for the dead was at this time prevalent. But the most remarkable passage in reference to this subject is 2 Macc. xii:40-45, where Judas forwards to Jerusalem 2,000, or according to the Syriac 3,000, and according to the Vulgate 12,000, drachmas of silver, to make a sin-offering for the Jews slain in action on whose persons were found things consecrated to idols, which they had sacrilegiously plundered in violation of the law of Moses (Deut. vii:25, 26). The author of the book remarks that it was a holy and good thought to pray for the dead, which, he observes, would have been superfluous had there been no resurrection. Calmet observes that, according to the notions of the Jews and some of the Christian Fathers, the pains of hell for those who died in mortal sin (as appears to have been the case of these Jews) were alleviated by the prayers and alms of the living (Augustine, De Fide, Spe, et Charitate, ch. 110), if not entirely removed; and cites a passage from a very ancient Christian liturgy to the same effect. This learned commentator supposes that the ancient and Catholic practice of prayer for the dead had its origin in this usage of the Jews, although he admits it to be a distinct thing from the doctrine of purgatory as held in the Roman Church.

2. Church Authority. The first two books of Maccabees have often been treated with a very high degree of respect in the Christian Church. Origen (apud Eusebium), professing to give a catalogue of the twenty-two canonical books, of which, however, he actually enumerates only twenty-one, adds, 'besides, there are the Maccabees.' This has given rise to the notion that he intended to include these books in the Canon, while others have observed that he has omitted the minor prophets from his catalogue. In his preface to the Psalms he excludes the two books of Maccabees from the books of Holy Scripture, but in his Princip. (ii, 1), and in his Comment. ad Rom. ch. v, he speaks of them as inspired, and as of equal authority with the other books. St. Jerome says that the Church does not acknowledge them as canonical, although he elsewhere cites them as Holy Scripture (Com. ad Isa. xxiii; ad Eccl. vii, ix; ad Dan. viii). Bellarmine (De Verbo Dei) acknowledges that these, with the other deuterocanonical books, are rejected by Jerome, as they had not been then determined by any general council. The first councils which included them in the canonical scriptures were those of Hippo and Carthage. They were received with the other books by the Council of Trent. Basnage, cited by Lardner (Credibility), thinks that the word 'Canonical' may be supposed to be used here (by the councils of Hippo and Carthage) loosely, so as to comprehend not only those books which are admitted as a rule of faith, but those which are esteemed useful, and may be publicly read for the edification of the people, in contradistinction to such books as were entirely rejected. This is also the opinion of the Roman Catholic Professor Jahn (Introd. sec. 29), who expresses himself in nearly the same words. Dr. Lardner conceives that Augustine also, unless he would contradict himself, must be understood to have used the word in the same sense. (See Cotton, The Five Books of the Maccabees.)

W. W.

MACEDONIA (mäc'e-dō'ni-ä), (Gr. Μακεδονία, mak-ed-on-ee'ä), from the mythical founder Macedon. A country lying to the north of Greece Proper, having on the east Thrace and the Ægean Sea, on the west the Adriatic and Illyria, on the north Dardania and Mæsia, and on the south Thessaly and Epirus.

The country is supposed to have been first peopled by Chittim or Kittim, a son of Javan (Gen. x:4), (see NATIONS, DISPERSION OF); and in that case it is probable that the Macedonians are sometimes intended when the word Chittim occurs in the Old Testament. Macedonia was the original kingdom of Philip and Alexander, by means of whose victories the name of the Macedonians became celebrated throughout the East, and is often used for the Greeks in Asia generally (Esth. Apoc. xviii:10, 14; 2 Macc. viii:20). The rise of the great empire formed by Alexander is described by the prophet Daniel under the emblem of a goat with one horn (Dan. viii:3-8). As the horn was a general symbol of power, and as the oneness of the horn implies merely the unity of that power, we are not prepared to go the lengths of some over-zealous illustrators of scripture, who argue that if a one-horned goat were not a recognized symbol of Macedonia we should not be entitled to conclude that Macedonia was intended. We hold that there could be no mistake in the matter, whatever may have been the usual symbol of Macedonia. It is, however, curious and interesting to know that Daniel did describe Macedonia under its usual symbol, as coins still exist in which that country is represented under the figure of a one-horned goat. There has been much discussion on this subject—more curious than valuable—but the kernel of it lies in this fact.

(1) Subdued and Divided. When subdued by the Romans under Paulus Ænilius (B. C. 168), Macedonia was divided into four provinces; but afterwards (B. C. 142) the whole of Greece was divided into two great provinces, Macedonia and Achaia. (See GREECE; ACHAIA.) Macedonia therefore constituted a Roman province, governed by a proconsul (provincia proconsularis; Tacit. Annal. i, 76; Suet. Claus 26), in the time of Christ and his apostles.

(2) Paul's Mission. The Apostle Paul being summoned in a vision while at Troas, to preach the gospel in Macedonia, proceeded thither, and founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi (Acts xvi:9), A. D. 55. This occasions repeated mention of the name, either alone (Acts xviii:5; xix:21; Rom. xv:26; 2 Cor. i:16; xi:9; Phil. iv:15), or along with Achaia (2 Cor. ix:2; 1 Thess. i:8). The principal cities of Macedonia were Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella, and Pelagonia (Liv. xlv:29); the towns of the province named in the New Testament, and noticed in the present work, are Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Neapolis, Apollonia, and Berea. (See PAUL.)

MACEDONIAN (mä's'e-dō'ni-an), an inhabitant of Macedonia (Acts xxvii:2); elsewhere rendered MACEDONIA.

MACHÆRUS (mak-ē'rus), (Gr. Μαχαίρους, the Black Fortress).

This name is not mentioned in the Bible, but is supposed to be the castle in which John the Baptist was imprisoned and beheaded (Mark vi:21-29). It was built by Alexander Jannæus as a check against Arab marauders (Josephus, Wars, vii, 6, 2), demolished by Gabinius when he made war against Aristobulus, and rebuilt by Herod. It was situated in the gorge of Callirhoc, one of the valleys east of the Dead Sea, three thousand eight hundred and sixty feet above this sea and two thousand five hundred and forty-six feet above the Mediterranean, nine miles east of the Dead Sea. "Its ruins, now called M'khaur, are still visible on the northern end of Jebel Atarús." (See JOHN THE BAPTIST.)

MACHBANAI (mäk'ba-näi), (Heb. מַכְבָּנַי, mak-ban-nah'ee, one fat, thick).

A Gadite warrior who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:13). (B. C. about 1061.)

MACHBENAH (mäk'be' nah), (Heb. מַכְבֵּנָה, mak-bay-naw', hillock, hump).

Probably a town of Judah founded by a person of the same name, son of Sheva (1 Chron. ii:49). It is supposed to be the same as Cabbon (Josh xv:40).

MACHI (mä'ki), (Heb. מַכִּי, maw-kee', pining).

The father of Geuel, the Gadite representative sent to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:15). (B. C. before 1657.)

MACHIR (ma kir), (Heb. מַכִּיר, maw-keer', sold, acquired).

1. The eldest son of Manasseh (Gen. 1:23; Josh. xvii:1) by an Aramitess mother (1 Chron. vii:14). He was the founder of the Machirites, who subjugated Gilead, and received their territory as an inheritance (Num. xxxii:39, 40; Josh. xvii:1). Machir was a name at one time applied to the whole tribe of Manasseh (Judg. v:14). (B. C. 1802.)

2. A descendant of Machir 1, and son of Ammiel, of Lo-debar (2 Sam. ix:4, 5). He supported the lame son of Jonathan, until he was provided for by David, and furnished David himself with provisions while a fugitive during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xvii:27). (B. C. 1037-1023.)

MACHIRITES (mä'kir-ites), (Heb. מַכִּירִים, ham-maw-kee-ree', "the Machirite," only in Num. xxvi:29), descendants of Machir, 1, who was son of Manasseh by an Aramite concubine.

His wife and children are named in 1 Chron. vii:16, 17; but the statement in verse 17, "These are the sons of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh," with the declaration that "Machir begat Gilead" would add Gilead to the list of Machir's sons. (See MACHIR.)

MACHNADEBAI (mäk'na-dē'bāi), (Heb. מַכְנַדְבַּי, mak-nad-bah'ee, gift of the noble, what is like the liberal?), one of the sons of Bani who divorced his foreign wife at Ezra's command after the exile (Ezra x:40). B. C. 459.

MACHPELAH (mak-pē'lah), (Heb. מַכְפֵּלָה, mak-pay-law', twofold, double).

The name of the plot of ground containing the cave which Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite for a family sepulcher (Gen. xxiii:9, 17, 19). (See HEBRON.) Here were buried Abraham (Gen. xxv:9, 10), Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah (Gen. xxxv:29; xlvii:28-31; xlix:29-33; l:12, 13). It is no doubt, the cave beneath the great mosque at Hebron. (Stanley, Jewish Ch.; Osborn, Palestine, Past and Present.)

MAD. See MADNESS.

MADAI (mäd'a-i), (Heb. מַדַּי, maw-dah'ee).

A people descended from Japhet. The name is probably Ethnic rather than personal and is only intended to indicate that the Medes were descendants of Japhet. (See GOG; NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

MADIAN (mä'di-an), (Gr. Μαδιάν, mad-ee-an', Acts vii:29). See MIDIAN.

MADMANNAH (mad-män'nah), (Heb. מַדְמָנָה, mad-man-naw', dunghill).

A city of Simeon (Josh. xv:31), very far south towards Gaza (1 Chron. ii:49), which in the first distribution of lands had been assigned to Judah. Eusebius and Jerome identify it with a town of their time, called Menois, near the city of Gaza (Onomast. p. 89). The parallel passage (Josh. xix:5) has BETH-MARCABOTH, with which it is, perhaps, identical. Van de Velde identifies this with Mikrib, southwest of the Dead Sea. (Travels, ii. 130.)

MADMEN (mäd'men), (Heb. מַדְמָנִים, mad-mane', dunghill).

A place in Moab named in Jer. xlviii:2, as threatened with destruction by the Babylonians. Not identified.

MADMENAH (mad-mē'nah), (Heb. מַדְמְנָה, mad-may-naw', dunghill).

A town a little north of Jerusalem, on the line of march of the invading Assyrians (Is. x:31). It doubtless stood between Gibrath and Nob, but has not yet been identified.

MADNESS (mäd'nēs), (Heb. מַדְוָה, shig-gaw-one', raving). The epithet mad is applied to several descriptions of persons in Scripture.

1. To one deprived of reason (Acts xxvi:24; 1 Cor. xiv:23).

2. To one whose reason is depraved, and overruled by the fury of his angry passions (Acts xxvi:11).

3. To one whose mind is perplexed and bewildered, so disturbed that he acts in an uncertain, extravagant, irregular manner (Deut. xxviii:34; Eccl. vii:7).

4. To one who is infatuated by the vehemence of his desires after idols and vanities (Jer. l:38), folly, deceit and falsehood (Hos. ix:7).

5. To one disturbed by sudden and startling intelligence (Acts xii:15).

6. To utterances of false prophets (Is. xlv:25; Hos. ix:7).

7. To the effects of inebriety (Jer. xxv:16; li:7).

8. To derision, with reference to the ecstatic utterances of the prophets when in a state of holy exaltation (2 Kings ix:11; Jer. xxix:26).

9. To idolatrous hallucination (Jer. l:38), or wicked and extravagant mirth (Eccl. ii:2).

10. To a reckless state of mind (Eccl. x:13), bordering on delirium (Zech. xii:4).

11. To overstrained mental effort (Eccl. i:17; ii:12), blind rage (Luke vi:11), or depraved tempers (Eccl. vii:25; ix:3; 2 Pet. ii:16).

It is well known that among oriental, as among most semi-civilized nations, madmen were looked upon with a kind of reverence, as possessed of a quasi-sacred character. This arises partly no doubt from the feeling that one on whom God's hand is laid heavily should be safe from all other harm; but partly also from the belief that the loss of reason and self-control opened the mind to supernatural influence, and gave it therefore a supernatural sacredness. An illustration of it may be seen in the record of David's pretended madness at the court of Achish (1 Sam. xxi:13-15), which shows it to be not inconsistent with a kind of contemptuous forbearance, such as is often manifested now, especially by the Turks, towards real or supposed madmen.

David's madness, however, says Calmet, is by many supposed not to have been feigned, but a real epilepsy or falling sickness.

MADON (mä'don), (Heb. מַדוֹן, maw-dohn', contention, strife).

A city of northern Canaan (Josh. xi:1; xii:19), captured by Joshua from its king, Jobah, who was in the confederacy with Hazor. Its site is possibly Madin, a little northwest of Tiberias.

MAGBISH (mag'bish), (Heb. מַגְבִּישׁ, mag-beesh', stiffening, gathering).

Probably the name of a place (Ezra ii:30), as all the names from Ezra ii:20 to 34, except Elam and Harim, are names of places. It is not in the corresponding list in Neh. vii. The place was doubtless in the territory of Benjamin.

MAGDALA (mäg'da-là), (Gr. Μαγδαλά, mag-dal-ah', Magdala), a town mentioned in Matt. xv:39, and the probable birthplace of Mary Magdalene, i. e., Mary of Magdala.

It must have taken its name from a tower or castle, as the name signifies. It was situated on the lake Gennesaret, but it has usually been placed on the east side of the lake, although a careful consideration of the route of Christ before he came to, and after he left, Magdala, would show that it must have been on its western shore. This is confirmed by the Jerusalem Talmud (compiled at Tiberias), which several times speaks of Magdala as being adjacent to Tiberias and Hamath, or the hot-springs (Lightfoot, Chorog. Cent. ch. lxxvi). It was a seat of Jewish learning after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Rabbins of Magdala are often mentioned in the Talmud (Lightfoot, l. c.). A small Moslem village, bearing the name of Mejdal, is now found on the shore of the lake about three miles northwest of Tiberias; and although there are no ancient ruins, the name and situation are very strongly in favor of the conclusion that it represents the Magdala of Scripture. This was probably also the Migdal-el, in the tribe of Naphtali, mentioned in Josh. xix:38 (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 559; Seetzen in Monat. Corresp. xviii, 349; Fisk, Life, p. 316; Robinson, Researches, iii, 279).

MAGDALENE (mäg'da-lé'ne), (Gr. Μαγδαληνή, mag-dah-lay-nay'), a fem. adj. form of Magdala.

A surname, indicative of the place of residence, or nativity, of one of the Marys of the New Testament, used for the sake of distinction (Matt. xxvii:56, 61; xxviii:1; Mark xv:40, 47; xvi:1, 9; Luke viii:2; xxiv:10; John xix:25; xx:1, 18).

MAGDIEL (mäg'di-el), (Heb. מַגְדִּיאֵל, mag-dee-ah', God is renown).

A descendant of Esau (Gen. xxxvi:43; 1 Chron. i:54), and chief among the Edomites in Mount Seir. (B. C. before 1619.)

MAGI (mä'ji), (Heb. מַגִּי, mag, Gr. μάγοι, mag'oi, A. V. "wise men" in Matt. ii 1, 7, 16; "sorcerer" in Acts xiii:6, 8).

The Magi were originally one of the six tribes (Herod i:101; Plin. Hist. Nat. v. 29) into which the nation of the Medes was divided, who, like the Levites under the Mosaic institutions, were intrusted with the care of religion: an office which was held in the highest honor, gave the greatest influence, and which they probably acquired for themselves only after a long time, as well as many worthy efforts to serve their country, and when they had proved themselves superior to the rest of their brethren. As among other ancient nations, as the Egyptians, and Hebrews, for instance, so among the Medes, the priestly caste had not only religion, but the arts and all the higher culture, in their charge. Their name points immediately to their sacerdotal character (from Mag or Mog, which in the Pehlevi denotes 'priest'), either because religion was the chief object of their attention, or more probably because, at the first, religion and art were so allied as to be scarcely more than different expressions of the same idea.

Little in detail is known of the Magi during the independent existence of the Median government; they appear in their greatest glory after the Medes were united with the Persians. This doubtless is owing to the general imperfection of the historical materials which relate to the earlier periods. So great, however, was the influence which the Magi attained under the united empire, that the Medes were not ill compensated for their loss of national independence. Under the Medo-Persian sway the Magi formed a sacred caste or college, which was very famous in the ancient world (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 1, 23; Ammian. Marcell. xxiii:6; Heeren, Ideen, i, 451; Schlosser, Universal Uebers., i, 278).

(1) Divination. According to Strabo (tom. ii, p. 1084, ed. Falcon.) the Magi practiced different sorts of divination—(1) by evoking the dead; (2) by cups or dishes (Joseph's divining cup (Gen. xlv:5); (3) by means of water. By the employment of these means the Magi affected to disclose the future, to influence the present, and to call the past to their aid. Even the visions of the night they were accustomed to interpret, not empirically, but according to such established and systematic rules as a learned priesthood might be expected to employ (Strabo, xvi, p. 762; Cic. De Divin. i, 41; Ælian, V. H. ii, 17). The success, however, of their efforts over the invisible world, as well as the holy office which they exercised, demanded in themselves peculiar cleanliness of body, a due regard to which and to the general principles of their caste would naturally be followed by professional prosperity, which in its turn conspired with prevailing superstition to give the Magi great social consideration, and make them of high importance before kings and princes (Diog. Laert. ix, 7, 2)—an influence which they appear to have sometimes abused, when, descending from the peculiar duties of their high office, they took part in the strife and competitions of politics, and found themselves sufficiently powerful even to overturn thrones (Herod. iii, 61, sq.).

Abuses bring reform; and the Magian religion, which had lost much of its original character, and been debased by some of the lowest elements of earthly passions, loudly called for a renovation, when Zoroaster appeared to bring about the needed change. As to the time of his appearance, and in general the particulars of his history, differences of opinion prevail, after all the critical labor that has been expended on the subject. Winer (Real-wört.) says he lived in the second half of the seventh century before Christ. He was not the founder of a new system, but the renovator of an old and corrupt one, being, as he himself intimates (Zendavesta, i, 43), the restorer of the word which Ormuzd had formerly revealed, but which the influence of Deews had degraded into a false and deceptive magic.

(2) Zoroaster. To destroy this, and restore the pure law of Ormuzd, was Zoroaster's mission. After much and long-continued opposition on the part of the adherents and defenders of existing corruptions, he succeeded in his virtuous purposes, and caused his system eventually to prevail. The Magi, as a caste, did not escape from his reforming hand. He appears to have remodeled their institute, dividing it into three great classes: (1) Herbeds, or learners; (2) Mobeds, or masters; (3) Destur Mobeds, or perfect scholars (Zendav. ii, 171, 261). The Magi alone he allowed to perform the religious rites; they possessed the forms of prayer and worship; they knew the ceremonies which availed to conciliate Ormuzd, and were obligatory in the public offerings (Herod. i, 132). They accordingly became the sole medium of communication between the Deity and his creatures, and through them alone

Ormuzd made his will known; none but them could see into the future, and they disclosed their knowledge to those only who were so fortunate as to conciliate their good will. Hence the power which the Magian priesthood possessed. The general belief in the trustworthiness of their predictions, especially when founded on astrological calculations, the all but universal custom of consulting the will of the divinity before entering on any important undertaking, and the blind faith which was reposed in all that the Magi did, reported, or commanded, combined to create for that sacerdotal caste a power, both in public and in private concerns, which has probably never been exceeded.

(3) Extent of Functions. Neither the functions nor the influence of this sacred caste were reserved for peculiar, rare, and extraordinary occasions, but ran through the web of human life. At the break of day they had to chant the divine hymns. This office being performed, then came the daily sacrifice to be offered, not indiscriminately, but to the divinities whose day in each case it was—an office therefore which none but the initiated could fulfill. As an illustration of the high estimation in which the Magi were held, it may be mentioned that it was considered a necessary part of a princely education to have been instructed in the peculiar learning of their sacred order, which was an honor conceded to no other but royal personages, except in very rare and very peculiar instances (Cicero, De Divin. i, 23; Plutarch, Themist.). This Magian learning embraced everything which regarded the higher culture of the nation, being known in history under the designation of the law of the Medes and Persians. It comprised the knowledge of all the sacred rites, customs, usages, and observances, which related not merely to the worship of the gods, but to the whole private life of every worshiper of Ormuzd—the duties which, as such, he had to observe, and the punishments which followed the neglect of these obligations; whence may be learnt how necessary the act of the priest on all occasions was. Under the veil of religion the priest had bound himself up with the entire of public and domestic life. The judicial office, too, appears to have been in the time of Cambyses, in the hands of the Magi; for from them was chosen the college or bench of royal judges, which makes its appearance in the history of that monarch (Herod. iv:31; vii:194; Esther i:13). Men who held these offices possessed this learning, and exerted this influence with the people, may have proved a check to Oriental despotism, no less powerful than constitutional, though they were sometimes unable to guarantee their own lives against the wrath of the monarch (Herod. vii:194; Dan. ii:12). If we turn to the books of scripture we find the import of what has been said confirmed, especially in the book of Daniel, where the great influence of the Magi is well illustrated.

(4) In Various Lands. The Magi were not confined to the Medes and Persians. Since they are mentioned by Herodotus as one of the original tribes of the Medes, they may have been primitively a Median priesthood. If so, they extended themselves into other lands. Possibly Magi may have been at first not the name of a particular tribe or priestly caste, but a general designation for priests or learned men; as Pharaoh denoted not an individual, but generally king or ruler. However this may be, the Chaldeans also had an organized order of Magi, a caste of sacerdotal scholars, which bore the name of 'wise men' (Jer. 1:35); 'the wise men of Babylon' (Dan. ii:12), among whom Daniel is classed (ii: 18, 24). Among the Greeks and Romans they were known under the name of Chaldeans (Strabo, xvi, p. 762; Diog. Laert. Præm. 1), and also of Magi (Diog. Laert. viii, 1, 3). They lived scattered over the land in different places (Dan. ii: 14; Strabo, xvi, p. 739), and had possessions of their own. The temple of Belus was employed by them for astronomical observations; but their astronomy was connected with the worship of the heavenly bodies practiced by the Babylonians (Diod. Sic. ii, 31; Ephraem Syr. Op. ii, 488; consult Ideler, in the Transactions of the Berlin Academy for 1824-5), and was specially directed to vain attempts to foretell the future, predict the fate of individuals or of communities, and sway the present, in alliance with augury, incantation, and magic (Is. xlvii:9, 13; Dan. ii).

It is easy to understand how the lofty science (so called) of these Magi—lofty while its scholars surpassed the rest of the world in knowledge, and were the associates, the advisers, the friends, and the monitors of great and flourishing monarchs, of indeed successively the rulers of the world—might, could indeed hardly fail, as resting on no basis of fact or reality, in process of time, to sink into its own native insignificance, and become either a mere bugbear to frighten the ignorant, or an instrument to aid the fraudulent; thus hastening on to the contempt into which all falsities are sure sooner or later to fall. The decline was indeed gradual; ages passed ere it was completed; but as soon as it ceased to have the support afforded by the mighty and splendid thrones of Asia, it began to lose its authority, which the progress of knowledge and the advent of Christ prevented it from ever regaining.

(5) In New Testament Times. The estimation, however, in which Simon Magus was evidently held, as recorded in the Acts ('some great one,' etc.), gives reason to think that Magianism still retained a large share of its influence at the commencement of our era. It seems, indeed, to have held a sort of middle position, half way between its ancient splendor and its coming degradation: whence we may understand the propriety of the visit paid by the Magi to the newborn King of the Jews (Matt. ii, 'star in the East'). For if the system had been then sunk so low as to correspond in any degree with our conception of these pretended arts, it is difficult to assign, at least to the unbeliever, a sufficient reason why the visit was made, or at any rate why it was recorded; but its credibility is materially furthered if the circumstances of the case are such as to allow us to regard that visit as a homage paid by the representatives of the highest existing influences to the rising Star of a New Day, in the fuller light of which they were speedily to vanish. (See STAR.) (Trench, Star of the Wise Men; Rawlinson, Ancient Monarch. iii, 125-136, 218, sq.; iv, 391-395.) J. R. B.

MAGIC (mäg'ik), (from Heb. כַּהֲנָיִם, kkeh'ret, to engrave, and so to draw magical lines or circles).

(1) Definition. Magic was the art of influencing future events and changing their course by dark and secret means. The magician was believed to stand in connection with demons, and even with the gods themselves, and to be able to compel them to act according to his will. Of the religion of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians, etc., magic formed an essential element, and of the Egyptian magicians, in their conflict with Moses and Aaron, Exodus gives a vivid account (vii:11, 12, 22; viii:7). Of the religion of the Jews magic did not only not form a part, but the law forbade the consulting of magicians, under penalty of death (Lev. xix:31; xx:6). Nevertheless, from their neighbors magic crept in among the Israelites too, and there were those among the people who believed in it and resorted to it.

(2) Sacrificing Children. It is remarkable that the offering of children should be mentioned in connection with magical arts. The passage in Micah, which has been supposed to preserve a question of Balak and an answer of Balaam, when the soothsayer was sent for to curse Israel, should be here noticed, for the questioner asks, after speaking of sacrifices of usual kinds, "Shall I give my firstborn [for] my transgression, the fruit of my body [for] the sin of my soul" (Micah vi:5-8). Perhaps, however, child-sacrifice is specified on account of its atrocity, which would connect it with secret arts, which we know were frequently in later times the causes of cruelty.

(3) Saul and the Witch of Endor. The account of Saul's consulting the witch of Endor is foremost among those in Scripture which refer to magic (1 Sam. xxviii:3-20). The supernatural terror with which it is full cannot however be proved to be due to this art, for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of Samuel was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of Saul, and not that it was caused by the incantations of a sorceress. As, however, the narrative is allowed to be very difficult, we may look for a moment at the evidence of its authenticity. The details are strictly in accordance with the age: there is a simplicity in the manners described that is foreign to a later time. The circumstances are agreeable with the rest of the history, and especially with all we know of Saul's character. Here, as ever, he is seen resolved to gain his ends without caring what wrong he does; he wishes to consult a prophet, and asks a witch to call up his shade. Most of all, the vigor of the narrative, showing us the scene in a few words, proves its antiquity and genuineness. We can see no reason whatever for supposing that it is an interpolation. In the New Testament we find it mentioned (Acts viii:9). (See DIVINATION; MAGI; SAUL.)

MAGICIANS (mä-jish'ans). See MAGI.

MAGISTRATE (mäj'is-trät), (Heb. שֹׁפֵט, sheh-fal', a judge, magistrate).

The word magistrate is used to express general Hebrew and Greek words, relating to a public civil officer. It had a much broader significance among the Hebrews, Greeks and Romans than with us.

1. In Old Testament.

1. In Judg. xviii:7, magistrate means governor.
2. A better translation of Ezra vii:25 would be "judges and rulers," instead of "magistrates and judges."

2. In New Testament.

1. It is used in the sense of rulers, civil officers, in Luke xii:11; Tit. iii:1 (as in the above citation from Ezra).

2. In Acts xvi:20 and following verses it refers to a civic officer or commander who may be called prefect, proctor, or consul. (See PROCONSUL.)

3. Ar'khone (Gr. ἀρχων, first), translated magistrate (Luke xii:58), signifies one first in power. Similar in derivation and meaning is ar-khay' (Gr.

ἀρχή, Luke xii:11, "magistrates," Tit. iii:1, "principalities"); ἀρχων is used of Moses as judge and leader of the Israelites. It is also used of the Messiah as supreme king (Rev. i:5).

4. It is used of magistrates of any kind, e. g., the high priest (Acts xxiii:5); of civil judges (Acts xvi:19); a ruler of the synagogue (Matt. ix:18, 23; Mark v:22; Luke viii:41); persons of influence among the sects at Jerusalem, who were also members of the Sanhedrin (Luke xiv:1; xviii:18; xxiii:13, 35; xxiv:20, etc.).

5. Satan the prince of the fallen angels (Matt. ix:34; Mark iii:22; Luke xi:15; John xii:31; Eph. ii:2, etc.).

MAGNIFICAL (mäg'nif'i-kal), (Heb. גָּדוֹל, gaw-dal', to make great), magnificent, applied to Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. xxii:5).

MAGNIFICAT (mäg'nif'i-kät), (Lat. doth magnify), the poem of the Virgin Mary (Luke i:46-55). It is called by this name because "Magnificat" is, in the Vulgate, the first word.

MAGNIFY (mäg'nif-i), (Heb. גָּדַל, gaw-dal'), to make great, or declare to be great.

(1) God "magnifies" his own mercy or name, when, by the fulfillment or powerful application of his word, he discovers the unbounded nature of his mercy and other perfections (Gen. xix:19; Acts xix:17). (2) He "magnifies" his word above all his name," when he clearly discovers his mercy and faithfulness therein contained and pledged (Ps. cxxxviii:2). (3) God "magnifies" men when he renders them honorable, wealthy, or powerful (Josh. iii:7; iv:14; 1 Chron. xxix:25; 2 Chron. xxxii:23), or even when, by afflicting them, he shows that he takes much notice of them (Job vii:17). (4) Men "magnify" God or his work when they publish and declare his greatness and glory (Job xxxvi:24; Ps. xxxiv:3).

MAGOG (mä'gög), (Heb. מָגוֹג, maw-gogue', Magog), son of Japhet (Gen. x:2).

In Ezekiel (xxxviii:2; xxxix:6 it occurs as the name of a nation, coupled with Gog, and is supposed to represent certain Scythian or Tartar tribes descended from the son of Japhet. (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

Gog and Magog have in a manner passed into a proverb, to express a multitude of powerful, cruel, barbarous and implacable enemies to God and his worship. (See GOG.)

MAGOR-MISSABIB (mä'gor-mis'sa-bib), (Heb. מַגּוֹר מִסַּבִּיב, maw-gore' mis-saw-beeb', "a terror on every side"), a name given to Pashur, who abused Jeremiah (Jer. xx:3).

MAGPIASH (mäg'pi-ash), (Heb. מַגְפֵּי אִשׁ, mag-pee-awsh', moth-killer).

One of the chiefs of the people who joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:20). (B. C. about 410.)

MAHALAH (ma-hä'lah or mä'ha-lah), (Heb. מַחְלָה, makh-law', sickness, 1 Chron. vii:18). See MAHLAH, I.

MAHALALEEL (ma-hä'la-lä'el), (Heb. מַחְלָה לֵאל, mah-hal-al-ale', praise of God).

1. Son of Canaan; fourth in descent from Adam, according to the Sethite genealogy (Gen. v:12, 13, 15-17; 1 Chron. i:2). (B. C. 3777-2881.)

2. A man of Judah, of the family of Pharez; he was father of Shephatiah and resided in Jerusalem after the captivity. (B. C. before 536.)

MAHALATH (mā'ha-lath), (Heb. מַחֲלַת, makh al-ath', harp, lyre).

1. A daughter of Ishmael and a wife of Esau (Gen. xxviii:9); also called Bashemath (Gen. xxxvi:3).

2. Daughter of Jerimoth, granddaughter of David, and probably the first of the eighteen wives of king Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi:18). (B. C. 934.)

3. The title of Psalms liii and lxxxviii indicating, perhaps, the manner in which it was to be sung.

MAHALI (mā'ha-lī), (Heb. מַחֲלִי, makh-lee', sick, infirm, Ex. vi:19). See MAHLI.

MAHANAIM (mā'ha-nā'im), (Heb. מַחֲנַיִם, makh-an-ah'yim, two hosts).

A place beyond the Jordan, north of the river Jabbok, which derived its name from Jacob's having been there met by the angels on his return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxii:2).

The name was eventually extended to the town which then existed, or which afterwards arose in the neighborhood. This town was in the territory of the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii:26, 30), and was a city of the Levites (Josh. xxi:38). It was in this city that Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, reigned (2 Sam. ii:8), probably because he found the influence of David's name less strong on the east than on the west of the Jordan. The choice, at least, seems to show that Mahanaim was then an important and strong place. Hence, many years after, David himself repaired to Mahanaim when he sought refuge beyond the Jordan from his son Absalom (2 Sam. xvii:24, 27; 1 Kings ii:8). We only read of Mahanaim again as the station of one of the twelve officers who had charge, in monthly rotation, of raising the provisions for the royal establishments under Solomon (1 Kings iv:14). The site has not yet been identified.

MAHANEH - DAN (mā'ha - neh - dān), (Heb. מַחֲנֵה דָן, makh-an-ay'dawn).

A place west of Kirjath-jearim where the Danite warriors encamped before they captured Laish (Judg. xviii:12).

MAHARAI (ma-hār'a-i), (Heb. מַחֲרָי, mah-har-ah'ee, hasty, swift).

A Netophathite, one of David's captains from the tribe of Judah (2 Sam. xxiii:28; 1 Chron. xi:30; xxviii:13), B. C. 1014.

MAHATH (mā'hath), (Heb. מַחֲאֵת, makh'ath, fire-pan, censor).

1. A Kohathite, son of Amasai (1 Chron. vi:35); apparently the same as Ahimoth (1 Chron. vi:25). (B. C. about 1375.)

2. Another Kohathite Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix:12; xxxi:13). He looked after the tithes and offerings (2 Chron. xxxi:13). (B. C. 726.)

MAHAVITE, THE (mā'ha-vite), (Heb. מַחֲוִיִּים, makh-av-eem', "the Machavites"), a designation of unknown import applied to one of King David's guard, probably Eliel. The plural is no doubt a corruption (1 Chron. xi:46).

MAHAZIOTH (ma-hā'zi-ōth), (Heb. מַחֲזִיאוֹת, makh-az-ee-oth', visions), the fourteenth son of Homan, and a Levite musician in the Temple, having charge of the twenty-third division (1 Chron. xxv:4, 30). B. C. 1014.

MAHERSHALHASHBAZ (mā'her-shāl'al-hāsh'hāz), (Heb. מַהֲרֵשׁ שָׁלַל הַשָּׁבַז, mah-hare'shaw-lawl'khawsh-baz).

Words prognostic of the sudden attack of the Assyrian army ('he hasteth to the spoil'), which the prophet Isaiah was first commanded to write in large characters upon a tablet, and afterwards to give as a symbolical name to a son that was to be born to him (Is. viii:1, 3). It is, as Dr. Henderson remarks, the longest of any of the scripture names, but has its parallels in this respect in other languages, especially in the English language during the time of Cromwell. Mahershalhashbaz lived B. C. 739.

MAHLAH (māh'lah), (Heb. מַחֲלָה, makh-law').

1. A child of Hamoleketh, a female descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii:18). (B. C. about 1658.) (See MAHALAH.)

2. The first named of the daughters of Zelophehad, of Manasseh (Num. xxvi:33; xxvii:1; xxxvi:11; Josh. xvii:3). (B. C. 1618.)

MAHLI (māh'lī), (Heb. מַחֲלִי, makh-lee', sickly, pining).

1. A Levite, son of Merari (Num. iii:20; 1 Chron. vi:19, 29; xxiii:21; xxiv:26; Ezra viii:18), called Mahali (Exod. vi:19).

2. A Levite, son of Mushi, of the family of Merari; nephew of 1 (1 Chron. vi:47; xxiii:23; xxiv:30). (B. C. before 1210.)

MAHLITES, THE (māh'lītes), (Heb. מַחֲלִיִּים, makh-lee', descendants of Mahli, Num. iii:33; xxvi:58).

MAHLON (māh'lon), (Heb. מַחֲלוֹן, makh-lone', pining).

One of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, and first husband of Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth i:2, sq.). (See RUTH.) (B. C. about 1360.)

MAHOL (mā'höl), (Heb. מַחֲוֹל, maw-khole', a dance).

Father of the four men of fame next to Solomon for wisdom, viz.:—Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda (1 Kings iv:31). If, however, these are the same as the sons of Zera (1 Chron. ii:6) the word probably denotes only their pursuit of musical composition.

MAID, MAIDEN (mād, mād'n), the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, differing in meaning beyond the mere matter of sex:

1. Nek-ay-baw' (Heb. נַעֲרָה, Lev. xii:5 only, a maid child), a female from the sexual form. Similar in meaning is nah-ar-aw' (Heb. נַעֲרָה, 2 Kings v:2, 4; Ezra ii:4, 9, 13; Prov. ix:3), corresponding to phæe-dis'kay (Gr. παιδίσκη, Mark xiv:66; Luke xxii:56), a girl from infancy to adolescence.

2. Beth-oo-law' (Heb. בְּתוּלָה, Exod. xxii:16; Judg. xix:24; Job xxxi:11; Ps. lxxviii:63; Jer. ii:32; li:22), a virgin, from the idea of separation. Similarly al-maw' (Heb. עֲלֵמָה, veiled, kept out of sight, Exod. ii:8).

3. Aw-maw' (Heb. אֲוָמָה, Gen. xxx:3; Exod. xxi:20; Lev. xxv:6, etc.); shif-khaw' (Heb. שִׁפְחָה, Gen. xxx:7, sq.; Ps. cxliii:2; Is. xxiv:2), a maidservant. (Barnes Bib. Dict.) See VIRGIN.

MAIL, COAT OF. See ARMS, ARMOR.

MAIMED (mämd), (from Heb. מַכּוּלֹס, khaw'rats, to wound, Lev. xxii:22; Gr. κωλύω, kool-los', rocking about, Matt. xv:30, 31; xviii:8; Mark ix:43; ἀνάπηρος, an-af'ay-ros, crippled, Luke xiv:13, 21), wanting some member of the body or incapacitated from its use by injury.

MAINSAIL (män-säl), (Acts xxvii:40.) See SHIP.

MAKAZ (mä'káz), (Heb. מַכַּז, maw-kats', end).

A district of Ben-Dekar, a purveyor of Solomon, whence he obtained supplies (1 Kings iv:9). It was probably in Dan; but otherwise unlocated.

MAKE (mäk), (Heb. בָּנֵה, baw-naw', to build, build up), has the sense of "do," "be occupied with,"—"What makest thou in this place" (Judg. xviii:3). The use also of "make" as signifying "pretend," "feign" (Josh. viii:15; ix:4; 2 Sam. xiii:6; Luke xxiv:28).

1. In general to cause a thing to be that did not before exist; so God at first made all things (Gen. i:31).

2. To put persons or things into such a form, office, or condition as they were not in before (Is. xlv:9).

MAKER (mäk'er), (Heb. עֹשֶׂה, aw-saw', to make in the widest sense; once only, in Job xxxvi:3, עֹשֶׂה, raw-al', to do and so make; also עֹשֶׂה, yaw-tsar', to mold), a term generally applied to God as creator (Job iv:17; xxxvi:3; Ps. xcv:6; Prov. xxii:2; Is. xvii:7, etc.; Hos. viii:14). It is used of man in Ia xxii:11 and Hab. ii:18.

MAKHELOTH (mak-hē'loth), (Heb. מַחֲלֵלוֹת, mak-hay-loth'), the twenty-sixth desert encampment of the Israelites, of which the site is unknown (Num. xxxiii:25).

MAKKEDAH (mäk-kē'dah), (Heb. מַכְדָּה, mak-kay-daw', herdsman's place).

A royal city of the ancient Canaanites (Josh. xii:16), in the neighborhood of which was the cave in which the five kings who confederated against Israel took refuge after their defeat (Josh. x:10-29). It afterwards belonged to Judah (Josh. xv:41). Makkedah is placed by Eusebius and Jerome 8 Roman miles to the east of Eleutheropolis (Onomast. s. v. Maceda).

MAKTESH (mäk'tesh), (Heb. מַכְתֵּשׁ, mak-laysh'; depression).

The name of a quarter or district in or near Jerusalem, perhaps one of the adjacent valleys Zeph. i:11), either Kidron or the one separating the Temple from the city.

MALACHI (mä'l'a-ki), (Heb. מַלְאָכִי, mal-aw-kee'; Sept. Μαλαχίας, mal-ah-kee'as).

The last of the minor prophets, and consequently the latest writer in the canon of the Old Testament. Nothing is known of his person or history. It appears that he lived after Zechariah, since in his time the second temple was already built (ch. iii:10); and it is probable that he was contemporary with Nehemiah (comp. ch. ii:11, with Neh. xiii:23-27, and ch. iii:8, with Neh. xiii:10).

(1) Meaning of Name. The name Malachi means, as some understand it, my angel; but it seems more correct to regard it as a contracted form of the Hebrew, angel of Jehovah. As the word translated 'angel,' however, means also a 'messenger,' angels being, in fact, the messengers of God; and as the prophets are often styled angels or messengers of Jehovah, it is supposed that 'Malachi' is merely a general title descriptive of this character, and not a proper name. It has been very generally supposed that it denotes Ezra, but the weight of opinion is against this.

(2) Date of Prophecy. Although it is well agreed that Malachi was the last of the prophets, the date of his prophecy has been variously determined. Usher makes him contemporary with Nehemiah, in B. C. 416; and the general opinion that this prophet was contemporary with, or immediately followed, Nehemiah, makes most of the proposed alternatives range within a few years of that date.

(3) Character of Prophecy. He censures the same offenses which excited the indignation of Nehemiah, and which that governor had not been able entirely to reform. Speaking of God's greater kindness to the Israelites than to the Edomites, he begins with declaiming against the priests for their profane and mercenary conduct, and against the people for their multiplied divorces and intermarriages with idolatrous nations; he threatens them with punishment and rejection, declaring that God would 'make his name great among the Gentiles' (ch. i:11), for that he was wearied with the impiety of Israel (ch. i, ii). From this the prophet takes occasion solemnly to proclaim that the Lord whom they sought should suddenly come to his temple, preceded by that messenger who, like a harbinger, should prepare his way; that the Lord when he should appear would purify the sons of Levi from their unrighteousness, and refine them as metal from the dross (ch. iii:1-3); that then 'the offering of Judah,' the spiritual sacrifice of the heart, 'should be pleasant to the Lord,' as was that of the patriarchs and their uncorrupted ancestors (ch. iii:4); and that the Lord would quickly exterminate the corruptions and adulteries which prevailed. The prophet then proceeds with an earnest exhortation to repentance; promising high rewards and remembrance to the righteous in that last day when the Lord shall make up his peculiar treasures, and finally establish a distinction of doom and condition between the righteous and the wicked (ch. iii:16-18), Malachi then concludes with an impressive assurance of approaching salvation to those who feared God's name from that 'Sun of Righteousness,' who should arise with healing in his wings, and render them triumphant; enjoining in the solemn close of his exhortation, when uttering as it were the last admonition of the Jewish prophets, an observance of the law of Moses, till the advent of Elijah the prophet (ch. iv:5, or John the Baptist, who came in the spirit and power of Elias, Mark ix:12; Luke i:17), who before the coming of that 'great and dreadful day of the Lord, should turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers' (ch. iv.). Thus Malachi sealed up the volume of prophecy with the description of that personage at whose appearance the Evangelists begin their gospel history.

(4) Canonicity. The claim of the book of Malachi to its place in the canon of the Old Testament has never been disputed; and its authority is established by the references to it in the New Testament (Matt. xi:10; xvii:12; Mark i:2; ix:11, 12; Luke i:17; Rom. ix:13).

(5) Style. The manner of Malachi offers few, if any, distinguishing characteristics. The style, rhythm, and imagery of his writings are substantially those of the old prophets, but they possess no remarkable vigor or beauty. This is accounted for by his living during that decline of Hebrew poetry, which we trace more or less in all the sacred writings posterior to the Captivity.

MALCHAM (mäl'kam), (Heb. מַלְכָּם, mal-kawm', thinking), fourth of the seven sons of Shaharaim, by Hodesh (1 Chron. viii:9). B. C. 1612.

MALCHIAH (mal-ki'ah), (Heb. מַלְכִּיָּהוּ, mal-khee-yaw', Jehovah's king, i. e., inaugurated by him).

1. A Levite, son of Ethni; one of the ancestors of Asaph, the minstrel (1 Chron. vi:40). (B. C. before 1014.)

2. Two residents, or sons, of Parosh, who divorced their Gentile wives after the exile (Ezra x:25). (B. C. 459.)

3. A resident or son of Harim who assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:11), and obeyed Ezra in divorcing his foreign wife (Ezra x:31). (B. C. 459.)

4. Son of Rechab, who assisted in repairing the Dung-gate of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii:14). (B. C. 446.)

5. One of those who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem. He was called "the goldsmith's son" (Neh. iii:31). (B. C. 446.)

6. One of those who stood on Ezra's left while he read the law to the people (Neh. viii:4); probably the same as the priest of that name who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:3). (B. C. about 410.)

7. A priest, father of Pashur (Neh. xi:12; Jer. xxxviii:1). The form is Melchiah (Jer. xxi:1); elsewhere MALCHIJAH (which see).

8. Son of Ham-melech (Jer. xxxviii:6). Ham-melech is translated 'king's son' (2 Chron. xxviii:7; 1 Kings xxii:26), which often means simply an officer of some sort. (B. C. 589.) Perhaps he is identical with MALCHIJAH, 1.

MALCHIEL (mäl'ki'el), (Heb. מַלְכִּיֵּל, mal-kee-ale', God's king, i. e., appointed by him).

The son of Berial, son of Ashur (Gen. xli:17). He became the "father," or founder of Birzavith (1 Chron. vii:31), and a tribal family (Num. xxvi:45). (B. C. 1856.)

MALCHIELITE (mäl'ki-el-ite), (Heb. מַלְכִּיֵּלִי, mal-kee-ay-lee'), a descendant of Malchiel (Num. xxvi:45).

MALCHIJAH (mal-ki'jah), (Heb. מַלְכִּיָּהוּ, mal-kee-yaw', Jehovah's king).

1. Father of Pashur (1 Chron. ix:12); the same as MALCHIAH, 7. (B. C. before 589.)

2. A priest, who had charge of the fifth course as appointed by David (1 Chron. xxiv:9). (B. C. 1014.)

3. An Israelite layman of Parosh who divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra x:25). (B. C. 459.)

4. (Neh. iii:11). See MALCHIAH, 3.

5. (Neh. x:3). See MALCHIAH, 6.

6. A priest among the musicians appointed to assist in the ceremonies in celebration of the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:42). (B. C. 446.)

MALCHIRAM (mal-ki'ram), (Heb. מַלְכִּירָם, mal-kee-rawm', king of exaltation).

A son of Jeconiah or Jehoiachim (1 Chron. iii:18). (B. C. after 598.)

MALCHISHUA (mäl'ki-shü'a), (Heb. מַלְכִּישׁוּעַ, mal-kee-shoo'ah, king of help).

A son of king Saul (1 Chron. viii:33; ix:39; 1 Sam. xiv:49), killed in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi:2; 1 Chron. x:2). (B. C. 1053.)

MALCHUS (mäl'kus), (Gr. Μάλκος, mal'khos).

The servant of the high-priest Caiaphas, whose right ear was cut off by Peter in the garden of Gethsemane (John xviii:10). The name is from the Hebrew melech, and corresponds to our title 'king,' or mallauch, 'counsellor.'

MALE (mäl), (Heb. זָכָר, zaw-kawr', remembered, Gen. i:27; vi:19; xxxiv:25), applied to the male of either man or beast.

MALEFACTOR (mäl'ë-fäk'tër), the translation of two Greek words (κακοποιός, kak-op-oy-os', John xviii:30; evildoers in 1 Peter ii:12, 14; iii:16; iv:15; and κακοῦργος, kak-oor'gos, Luke xxiii:32, sq.; evildoer in 2 Tim. ii:9). By the term malefactor is not meant, strictly speaking, thieves or robbers, but insurgents or rebels. (See THIEF, PENITENT, ON THE CROSS.)

MALELEEL (ma-lë'le-el), (Gr. Μαλελεήλ, mal-ele-ale', Luke iii:37). See MAHALALEEL.

MALICE (mäl'is), (Gr. κακία, kak-ee'ah, badness, 1 Cor. v:8; xiv:20; Eph. iv:31; Col. iii:8; Tit. 3:3; 1 Peter ii:1; maliciousness, Rom. i:29; 1 Peter ii:16; malicious, from Gr. πονηρός, pon-ay-ros', hurtful, 3 John 10), "wicked works."

It denotes in general violent hatred, disposing us to render evil for good, and embraces both Malevolence and Malignity. The three may be discriminated as follows: Malvolence has a deep root in the heart, and is a settled part of the character; we denominate the person malvolent, to designate the ruling temper of his mind: maliciousness may be applied as an epithet to particular parts of a man's character or conduct; one may have a malicious joy or pleasure in seeing the distresses of another: malignity is not so often employed to characterize the person as the thing; the malignity of a design is estimated by the degree of mischief which was intended to be done. (Crabbe's Synonyms.)

MALIGNITY (mä-lig'ní-tý), (Gr. κακοθelia, kak-ö-ay'thi-ah), bad character, depravity of heart; used in Rom. i:29 for malignant subtlety, malicious craftiness. (See MALICE.)

MALLOTHI (mäl'lo-thi), (Heb. מַלְלוּתִי, mal-lo'thee, Jah is speaking or splendid).

One of the fourteen sons of Heman (1 Chron. xxv:4); head of the nineteenth course of musicians, as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxv:26). (B. C. 1014.)

MALLOWS (mä'l'löz), (Heb. מלוח, mal-loo'akh, saltwort; Gr. ἄλιμα, salted, Job xxx:4 only).

Bochart contends (Hieroz, part 1, t. iii, c. 16) that the word malluach denotes a saltish plant called ah-lee-mos' by the Greeks, and which with good reason is supposed to be the Atriplex Halimus of botanists, or tall shrubby Orache. There is no doubt that species of Orache were used as articles of diet in ancient times, and, probably, still are so in the countries where they are indigenous; but there are many other plants, similar in nature, that is, soft and succulent, and usually very saline, such as the Salsolas, Salicornias, etc., which, like the species of Atriplex, belong to the same natural family of Chenopodæa, and which from their saline nature have received their respective names. Some of these are shrubby, but most of them are herbaceous, and extremely common in all the dry, desert, and saline soils which extend from the south of Europe to the north of India. Most of them are saline and bitter, but some are milder in taste and mucilaginous, and are therefore employed as articles of diet, as spinach is in Europe. Salsola indica, for instance, which is common on the coasts of the Peninsula of India, Dr. Roxburgh states, saved the lives of many thousands of the poor natives of India during the famine of 1791-2-3; for while the plant lasted, most of the poorer classes who lived near the sea had little else to eat; and indeed its green leaves ordinarily form an essential article of the food of those natives who inhabit the maritime districts. J. F. R.

MALLUCH (mä'l'luk), (Heb. מלוח, mal-luke', ruler or counselor).

1. A Levite of Merari, son of Hashabiah (1 Chron. vi:44). (B. C. before 1014.)

2. A descendant, or resident of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x:29). (B. C. 459.)

3. A descendant, or son, of Harim, who also put away his foreign wife (Ezra x:32). (B. C. 459.)

4. A priest who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:2), and perhaps identical with the one who signed the covenant in Nehemiah's reign (Neh. x:4). (B. C. between 536 and 410.)

5. One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:27). (B. C. 445.)

6. One of the families of priests who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:2), B. C. 536. Perhaps identical with (4).

MAMMON (mä'm'mün), (Gr. μαμμωνᾶς, mam-mo-nas').

A Chaldee word signifying 'wealth' or 'riches,' and bearing that sense in Luke xvi:9, 11; but also used by our Savior (Matt. vi:24; Luke xvi:13) as a personification of the god of riches: 'Ye cannot serve God and Mammon.' "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when these riches fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations:" that is, spend worldly riches, which so many get unjustly, and use as instruments of dishonesty and wickedness, in a pious and charitable manner, that the poor saints, benefited thereby, may be stirred up to pray for you; and that when your riches are no more retained by you, ye may obtain the gracious reward of your charity in heaven; and those poor saints whom you have supported, may with pleasure welcome you into the celestial abodes (Luke xvi:13). (Brown's Bib. Dict.)

MAMRE (mä'm're), (Heb. מַמְרֵי, mam-ray, fatness.)

1. An Amorithish chief, who, with his brothers Aner and Eshcol, was in alliance with Abraham (Gen. xiv:13, 24). (B. C. about 2250.)

2. In the A. V. 'The oaks of Mamre,' 'plain of Mamre' (Gen. xiii:18; xviii:1), or simply 'Mamre' (xxiii:17, 19; xxxv:27), a grove in the neighborhood of Hebron.

Here Abraham dwelt after separating from Lot (Gen. xiii:18), and near by was the cave of Macphelah (Gen. xxiii:17; 19; xxv:9). The spot is still marked by the remains of a building which once, it is said, inclosed the trunk of 'Abraham's tree.' It is about a mile northwest of Hebron. (See Porter, Handbook, i, 70.)

MAN (män). Four Hebrew words are thus translated in the English Version: אָדָם, aw-dawm'; עֶשֶׂה, esh; אֲנָשִׁי, en-oshe'; גֵּהֵל'בֵּר, geh'ber.

1. The proper name of the first man, though Gesenius thinks that when so applied it has the force rather of an appellative, and that, accordingly, in a translation, it would be better to render it the man. It seems, however, to be used by St. Luke as a proper name in the genealogy (iii:38); by St. Paul (Rom. v:14; 1 Tim. ii:13, 14); and by Jude (14). St. Paul's use of it in 1 Cor. xv:45 is remarkably clear: 'the first man, Adam.' This derivation is as old as Josephus, who says that 'the first man was called Adam, because he was formed from the red earth,' and adds, 'for the true virgin earth is of this color' (Antiq. i, 1, sec. 2).

The truer origin of the word in Gen. i:26; v:1, is likeness, because man was made in the likeness of God.

2. It is the generic name of the human race as originally created, and afterwards, like the English word man, person, whether man or woman, equivalent to the Latin homo, and Gr. an-thro-pos, ἀνθρωπος, (Gen. i:26, 27; v:2; viii:21; Deut. viii:3; Matt. v:13, 5; 1 Cor. vii:26), and even without regard to age (John xvi:21). It is applied to women only, 'the human persons or women' (Num. xxxi:35).

3. It denotes man in opposition to woman (Gen. iii:12; Matt. xix:10), though, more properly, the husband in opposition to the wife (comp. 1 Cor. vii:1).

4. It is used, though very rarely, for those who maintain the dignity of human nature, a man, as we say, meaning one that deserves the name, like the Latin vir and Greek ἀνὴρ, an'are, hero. 'One man in a thousand have I found, but a woman,' etc. (Eccles. vii:28.) Perhaps the word here glances at the original uprightness of man.

5. It is frequently used to denote the more degenerate and wicked portion of mankind: an instance of which occurs very early, 'The sons, or worshipers, of God married the daughters of men, or the irreligious' (Gen. vi:2).

6. The word is used to denote other men, in opposition to those already named, as, 'both upon Israel and other men' (Jer. xxxii:20), i. e., the Egyptians. 'Like other men' (Ps. lxxxiii:5) i. e., common men, in opposition to better men (Ps. lxxxii:7); men of inferior rank, as opposed to men of higher rank. (See Heb. Is. ii:9; v:15; Ps. xlix:3; lxii:10; Prov. viii:4).

7. The phrase 'son of man,' in the Old Testament, denotes man as frail and unworthy (Num.

xxiii:19; Job xxv:6; Ezek. ii:1, 3); as applied to the prophet, so often, it has the force of 'oh mortal!' Eesh is a man in the distinguished sense, like the Latin vir, and Greek ἄνθρωπος, 'an heroic man.'

8. It is used in all the several senses of the Latin vir, and denotes a man as distinguished from a woman (1 Sam. xvii:33; Matt. xiv:21); as a husband (Gen. iii:16; Hos. ii:16); and in reference to excellent mental qualities. A beautiful instance of the latter class occurs in Jer. v:1.

9. It is also used to designate the superior classes (Prov. viii:4; Ps. cxli:4, etc.), a courtier (Jer. xxxviii:7), the male of animals (Gen. vii:2). Sometimes it means men in general (Exod. xvi:29; Mark vi:44).

10. Enosh denotes mortals, as transient, perishable, liable to sickness, etc.: 'Let no man [margin, 'mortal man'] prevail against thee' (2 Chron. xiv:11). 'Write with the pen of the common man' (Is. viii:1), i. e. in a common, legible character (Job xv:14; Ps. viii:4; ix:19, 20; Is. li:7; Ps. ciii:15). It is applied to women (Josh. vi:25); gheh-ber', vir, man, in regard to strength, etc.

11. It is applied to man as distinguished from woman: 'A man shall not put on a woman's garment' (Deut. xxii:5), like ἄνθρωπος (male), in Matt. viii:9; John i:6; to men as distinguished from children (Exod. xii:37); to a male child, in opposition to a female (Job iii:3; Sept. ἄρσεν, male child). It is much used in poetry: 'Happy is the man' (Ps. xxxiv:8; xl:4; lii:9; xciv:12). Sometimes it denotes the species at large (Job iv:17; xiv:10, 14).

12. Thus man is also the rendering of the Gr. μηδεις (may-dice', not one, Matt. xvi:20; xvii:9, Luke x:4, etc.; of οὐδεις, oo-dice', none, nobody, Matt. xi:27; Mark iii:27; Luke viii:51, etc.; of τις, tis, some one or any, Matt. xxiv:4; John iii:5; Acts x:47, etc.); and in an inclusive sense πᾶς, (pas, all, Rom. ii:10). (See ADAM.)

Common Origin of Man. Scientists are divided into two schools on this subject, namely, Polygenists, or those who say there are more than one species, and monogenists, or those who contend for the unity of the human species. Men of unquestioned scientific repute and ability are found on both sides of the question. Among Polygenists such scholars as Kant, Buffon, Desmoulins, Haeckel, Friedrich Müller, Louis Agassiz, and Peschal; and among monogenists are Blumenbach, Prichard, De Quatrefages, Cuvier, Max Müller, Prof. Owen and Charles Darwin.

The weight of evidence seems clearly to be on the side of the monogenists.

This view is contended for in this article.

To be plain it is very important that the definition of the word species should be understood—for the solution of the whole problem hinges on the meaning of that word.

M. A. de Quatrefages gives the most concise and satisfactory definition of the word "species," as the word is used in reference to vegetables and animals, when he says "The species includes all more or less similar individuals which descend, or may be supposed to descend from a single ancestral pair in unbroken succession" (Unité de l'Espèce Humaine, p. 54). This definition when applied to a consideration of men allows room for those variations among them resulting in what are called the races of Caucasians, Mongolians, Red Men, Malays and Negroes.

With "species" defined we are prepared to consider briefly the arguments in favor of all men of all races having descended from one ancestral pair.

(1) The first argument is rooted in the facts concerning the habitat of men.

It would militate against the unity of human species were it true that one race of men could live only on a certain section of the globe.

The fact is if the transition is not made too suddenly, and proper precautions are taken, men of any nation can live in the region inhabited by any other nation.

The Chinese illustrate this, for they live on the border of Siberia and are also found on the Island of Singapore almost on the Equator.

(2) The unity of the languages of men in their primitive condition as exhibited in the identity of the roots of many words still in use among the scattered nations.

Max Müller shows by the phenomena of the three great classes of language that it is highly probable that they were originally one. Such eminent philologists as Bopp, Grimm, Klaproth, and Herder agree in this main proposition.

(3) Community of traditions among different and widely separated peoples, such as The Creation of Man; The Garden of Eden or its counterpart; man's temptation and fall; the division of time into weeks; the destruction of man by a deluge; and similar traditions are found to be current among people as widely separated in color, location, and everything else as the Dyaks of Borneo and the North American tribes of Indians.

(4) Another argument quite similar to traditions is that of a community of customs, such as sacrifices to supernatural beings—known to have been offered in all parts of the earth and by all people. Serpent worship in Asia, Africa, Europe and America. Peschal (Races of Man, p. 21, sq.) calls attention to the following customs: Almost all nations have arrived at a single and double decimal system in mathematics; skin painting, and tattooing; filing the teeth to a point occurs not only in western Africa but in Brazil. The skulls of children have been pressed between boards not only on the steppes of southern Russia but also by the aborigines of South America, by the Tshinuks of British Columbia and by the Flathead tribe of Indians in North America. Many nations have practiced circumcision—the Egyptians, Ethiopians, Hebrews, Phœnicians and tribes of Indians in South America. Greeting by rubbing noses by Eskimos and by aboriginal Australians.

Another custom has extended all over the world—namely, the building of cairns or piles of stones which grow by having additional stones thrown on them by every passer-by. They may be seen in India, Burmah, Borneo, Thibet, the Sinaitic Peninsula, Switzerland and Venezuela.

(5) All men have the same number and kind of bodily organs. The natural position of man is erect. All the nerves, muscles, bones, veins and arteries found in any man of any race are found in every other man of every race regardless of the color of complexion, the character of the hair or the degree of intelligence or culture.

The physical evidence of unity of human species which is most interesting and significant is the prevalence among men of that general law, which runs through the whole of both the vegetable and animal kingdoms, namely, the infertility of hybrids or members of different species, and the fecundity of members of the same species.

Applying this law to the case of men, observation and experiment show that the intermarriage of individuals of different races of men does not reveal sterility but the opposite.

No two races of men exist who cannot intermarry. This would not be true if the different races of men were different species of beings.

(6) The similarity of mental and moral faculties and habits is marked. Intellect, emotion and will, the mental nature of every Caucasian. The same is true of every Mongolian, every Ethiopian, every Malay and every red man. All men have conscience whereby they are sensible of right or wrong.

There are to sum up, then, varieties of men, but all men belong to one species of beings.

If all men are of the same species of being then the brotherhood of man follows. When that is appreciated slavery is not to be thought of. Yet again if all men belong to one species and not to many, then the voice of science harmonizes with that of religion, which proclaims (Gen. iii: 20), "Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living;" and Mars Hill catches up the proclamation, as Paul stands and says more confidently than science can yet say: "God . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts xvii:24-26). (See Common Origin of Man by Rev. Edward M. Deems, A. M., in Christian Thought, April 1892, p. 378.)

MANAEN (män'a-ën), (Gr. Μανᾶν, man-ah-ane').

A Christian teacher at Antioch (A. D. 44), who had been foster-brother of Herod Antipas (Acts xiii:1). He is supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples, but this is uncertain, as no particulars of his life are known.

MANAHATH (män'a-häth), (Heb. מנח'ת, maw-nakh'ath).

1. A place named in connection with the genealogies of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:6), whither the Benjamites of Geba, descendants of Ehud, seem to have migrated. The posterity of Salma, of Judah, probably made up half the population (1 Chron. ii:54).

2. Second of the five sons of Shobal, a descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen. xxxvi:23; 1 Chron. i:40). (B. C. about 1850.)

MANAHETHITES, THE (ma-nä'heth-ites), (Heb. מנח'תים, ham-men-oo-khoth', and מנח'תים, ham-maw-nakh-tee', Manahathites).

The inhabitants of a place, half of whom were descended from Selma, founder of Bethlehem, and half from Shobal, father of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii:52, 54).

MANASSEH (ma-näs'seh), (Heb. מנש'ה, men-ash-sheh', who makes forget, see Gen. xli:51).

1. The Patriarch. The elder of the two sons of Joseph, born in Egypt (Gen. xli:51; xlvii:20) whom Jacob adopted as his own (xlviii:1) —by which act each became the head of a tribe in Israel. The act of adoption was, however, accompanied by a clear intimation from Jacob, that the descendants of Manasseh, although the elder, would be far less numerous and powerful than those of the younger Ephraim. The result corresponded remarkably with this intimation. (See EPHRAIM.)

2. The Fourteenth King of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah, who began to reign in B. C. 609, at the early age of twelve years, and reigned fifty-five years.

(1) Re-established Idolatry. It appears that the secret enemies of the vigorous reforms of Hezekiah reappeared, and managed to gain much influence at court during the youth of Manasseh; and he was prevailed upon to reestablish all the idolatries and abominations which it had taken his excellent father so much pains to subvert. This bent having been unhappily given to the mind of one old enough to listen to evil counsels, but too young to see their danger, the king followed it with all the reckless ardor of youth, and without any of the prudent reservations which older sovereigns, more discreet in evincing the same inclinations, had maintained. Idolatry in its worst forms, and all the abominations connected with its observances, were practiced without stint and without shame, not only in the face of the Temple, but in its very courts, where altars to the heavenly bodies were set up, and rites of idolatrous worship performed. Under this altered state of things, the Judahites, with the sanction of the king's example, rushed into all the more odious observances of Syrian idolatry, with all the ardor which usually attends the outbreak of a restrained propensity, till they became far worse than the heathen, whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel.' In vain did the prophets raise their voice against these iniquities, and threaten Manasseh and his kingdom with awful tokens of Divine indignation. Instead of profiting by these warnings, the king vented his rage against those by whom they were uttered, and in this, and other ways, filled Jerusalem with innocent blood beyond any king who reigned before him (2 Kings xxi:1-16; 2 Chron. xxxiii:1-10).

(2) Retribution. At length the wrath of God burst over the guilty king and nation. At this time there was constant war between Assyria and Egypt, and it would seem that Manasseh adhered to the policy of his father in making common cause with the latter power. This, or some other cause not stated by the sacred historian, brought into Judæa an Assyrian army, under the generals of Esar-haddon, which carried all before it. The miserable king attempted flight, but was discovered in a thorn-brake in which he had hidden himself, was laden with chains, and sent away as a captive to Babylon, which was then subject to the Assyrians, where he was cast into prison (B. C. 677). Here, at last, Manasseh had ample opportunity and leisure for cool reflection; and the hard lessons of adversity were not lost upon him. He saw and deplored the evils of his reign, he became as a new man, he humbly besought pardon from God, and implored that he might be enabled to evince the sincerity of his contrition, by being restored to a position for undoing all that it had been the business of his life to effect. His prayer was heard. His captivity is supposed to have lasted a year, and he was then restored to his kingdom under certain obligations of tribute and allegiance to the king of Assyria, which, although not expressed in the account of this transaction, are alluded to in the history of his successors (2 Chron. xxxiii: 11-13).

(3) Reformation. On his return to Jerusalem, Manasseh exerted himself to the utmost in correcting the errors of his early reign, and in establishing the worship of Jehovah in its former purity and splendor. The good conduct of his latter reign was rewarded with such prosperity as enabled him to do much for the improvement and strengthening of his capital and kingdom. He thoroughly repaired the old walls of Jerusalem, and added a new wall on the side towards Gihon; he surrounded and fortified by a separate wall the hill or ridge on the east of Zion, which bore the name of לֵפֶל, Ophel, and he strengthened, garrisoned, and provisioned 'the fenced cities of Judah' (2 Chron. xxxiii:13-17).

(4) Death. He died in peace (B. C. about 664), at the age of sixty-eight, after having reigned longer than any other king of Judah, and was buried in a sepulcher which he had prepared for himself in his own garden (xxxiii:20).

3. In Judg. xviii:30, Manasseh is given as the father of Gershon, the father of Jonathan, the priest of the Danites at Laish. The reading is probably a corruption of "Moses."

4. An Israelite, descendant or resident of Pathath-moab, who divorced his foreign wife at the instance of Ezra (Ezra x:30). (B. C. 459.)

5. A man of Hashum, who also put away his Gentile wife (Ezra x:33). (B. C. 459.)

MANASSEH, TRIBE OF (ma-nās'seh).

When the tribe of Manasseh quitted Egypt, it numbered 32,200 adult males (Num. i:34, 35), being 8,300 less than the tribe of Ephraim, the younger son of Joseph. This was the lowest number of adult males in any tribe at that period; but if we add the two together, the tribe of Joseph, composed of these two tribes, reached to 72,700, which was more than any other tribe contained, except Judah. During the sojourn in the wilderness, the tribe of Manasseh rose to 52,700 (Num. xxvi:34), being an increase of 20,500. This gave it rank in point of population as the sixth of the tribes, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Dan, and Asher only being more numerous. In the same period Ephraim had declined to nearly the same position which Manasseh had previously occupied, its numbers being reduced to 32,500. Yet the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled, and, when settled in Canaan, Ephraim became superior in wealth, power and population, not only to Manasseh, but to all the tribes except Judah. One circumstance tending to weaken Manasseh may have been the division which took place in it on entering Palestine. The pastoral half of the tribe was allowed to establish itself with Reuben and Gad, on the east of the Jordan, where it occupied the northernmost portion, consisting of Argob and Bashan, from the Jabbok to Mount Hermon (Num. xxxii:39; xxxiv:14; Deut. iii:13; Josh. xii:6; xiii:7; 1 Chron. vi:61), while the other half was provided for with the rest of the tribes in Canaan proper, west of the Jordan, where it had a fine tract of country extending from that river to the Mediterranean, with the kindred tribe of Ephraim on the south, and Issachar on the north (Josh. xvi:9; xvii:7-11). The half-tribe west of the river was not, however, for some time able to expel the former inhabitants of the territory, so as to obtain the exclusive possession of it (Josh. xvii:12; Judg. i:27). The tribe of Manasseh makes no figure in the history of the Hebrews. (See PALESTINE.)

MANASSES (ma-nās'sēz), (Gr. Μανασσῆς, man-as-sacē, Manasses).

1. The Greek form of Manasseh which is found in Rev. vii:6.
2. The form of Manasseh, 2, found in Matt. i:10, and in the "Prayer of Manasses."

MANASSES, PRAYER OF (ma-nās'sēz, prayer öv). See APOCRYPHA.

This pseudepigraphical work has come down to us in the MSS. of the Latin Vulgate, and is found in the early printed editions of that version. Du Pin firmly asserts that the Latin fathers have often cited this prayer; but the earliest reference to it which we know of is in the Apos- tolical Constitutions (sec. 12), attributed to Clemens Romanus, but which are generally believed to be a work of the fourth century. In this work (ii:22) the prayer is cited as if it were an integral portion of the book of Chronicles, together with some traditionary accounts of the nature of his imprisonment in shackles of iron, and of his miraculous release: which are also alluded to in the Targum on Chronicles.

It is entitled 'The Prayer of Manasses, king of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon,' and had doubtless its origin from 2 Chron. xxxiii:12, 13.

This prayer, however, not being found in the Hebrew, and not being cited by the more eminent fathers, nor contained in any of the catalogues of ancient councils, has not been received in the church as genuine or canonical. It is classed in the Sixth Article of the Church of England among the 'other books read by the church for example of life and instruction of manners;' but the church of Rome classes it with 3d and 4th Esdras (see ESDRAS), removing it to the end of the Bible, and rejecting it from the deuterocanonical, as well as from the proto-canonical books.

MANASSITES (ma-nās'sites), (Heb. מְנַשִּׁי, men-ash-sheh', in Judg. xii:4; elsewhere מְנַשִּׁי, ham-men-ash-shee'), descendants of Manasseh, the eldest son of Joseph, or some members of the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iv:43; xxix:8; 2 Kings x:33; 1 Chron. xxvi:32).

MANDRAKE (män'drāk), (Heb. דָּוֵדָּה, doo-dah'-ee, love apples). Modern Bible scholars apply this name to a member of the potato family (Mandragora officinalis).

This is a stemless plant with a disk of leaves almost as long, but not nearly as broad, as those of the garden rhubarb, which it somewhat resembles, except in its blossoms. These are of a rich purple, and, appearing among the leaves very early, are followed about wheat-harvest by a round yellow pulpy fruit of the size of a large plum and of a sweet and agreeable flavor. The odor of the plant seems to be enjoyed by Orientals (Cant. vii:13), and by some Occidentals. Many strange superstitions are connected with this plant, and the idea of Rachel's time still prevails that conception is ensured by eating the fruit of this plant (Gen. xxx:14-16). For full discussion of the subject see DUDAIM.

MANEH (mä'neh), (Heb. מָנֶה, maw-neh'), a weight $\frac{1}{60}$ of a talent. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MANGER (män'jēr), (Gr. φάρον, fat'nay, crib, Luke ii:7, 12, 16).

In Luke xiii:15 it is translated "stall." While this is the classical meaning of the word, it has been pretty clearly demonstrated that in the New Testament it means the open courtyard of the inn or khan, which was inclosed by a fence of some kind where the cattle were shut up for the night. Mangers in our sense of the word are hardly known in the East.

MANNA (män'nä) or MAN, (Heb. מָן, mawn, signifying what?).

(1) Substance. The name given to the miraculous food upon which the Israelites were fed for forty years, during their wanderings in the desert. The same name has in later ages been applied to some natural productions, chiefly found in warm, dry countries, but which have little or no resemblance to the original manna. This is first mentioned in Exod. xvi. It is there described as being first produced after the eighth encampment in the desert of Sin, as white like hoar frost (or of the color of bdellium, Num. xi:7), round, and of the bigness of coriander seed (gad). It fell with the dew every morning, and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying upon the ground or the rocks round the encampment of the Israelites. 'When the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, What is it? for they knew not what it was' (Exod. xvi:15). In the authorized, and some other versions, this passage is inaccurately translated—which indeed is apparent from the two parts of the sentence contradicting each other. In the Septuagint the substance is almost always called manna instead of man. Josephus (Antiq. iii, 1, sec. 10), as quoted by Dr. Harris, says: 'The Hebrews call this food manna, for the particle man in our language is the asking of a question', What is this? (man-hu). Moses answered this question by telling them, 'This is the bread which the Lord hath given you to eat.' We are further informed that the manna fell every day, except on the Sabbath. Every sixth day, that is on Friday, there fell a double quantity of it.

(2) How Gathered. Every man was directed to gather an omer (about three quarts) for each member of his family; and the whole seems afterwards to have been measured out at the rate of an omer to each person: 'He who gathered much had nothing over, and he who gathered little had no lack.' That which remained ungathered dissolved in the heat of the sun, and was lost. The quantity collected was intended for the food of the current day only; for if any were kept till next morning, it corrupted and bred worms. Yet it was directed that a double quantity should be gathered on the sixth day for consumption on the Sabbath. And it was found that the manna kept for the Sabbath remained sweet and wholesome, notwithstanding that it corrupted at other times, if kept for more than one day. In the same manner as they would have treated grain, they reduced it to meal, kneaded it into dough, and baked it into cakes, and the taste of it was like that of wafers made with honey, or of fresh oil. In Num. xi:6-9, where the description of the manna is repeated, an omer of it is directed to be preserved as a memorial to future generations, 'that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness;' and in Joshua v:12 we learn that after the Israelites had encamped at Gilgal, and 'did eat of the old corn of the land, the manna ceased on the morrow after, neither had the children of Israel manna any more.'

(3) Supposed Existence Now. This miracle is referred to in Deut. viii:3; Neh. ix:20; Ps. lxxviii:24; John vi:31, 49, 58; Heb. ix:4. Though the manna of Scripture was so evidently miraculous, both in the mode and in the quantities in which it was produced, and though its properties were so different from anything with which we are acquainted, yet, because its taste is in Exodus said to be like that of wafers made with honey, many writers have thought that they recognized the manna of Scripture in a sweetish exudation which is found on several plants in Arabia and Persia. The name man, or manna, is applied to this substance by the Arab writers, and was probably so applied even before their time. But the term is now almost entirely appropriated to the sweetish exudation of the ash trees of Sicily and Italy (Ornus Europæa and Fraxinus rotundifolia). These, however, have no relation to the supposed manna of Scripture. Of this, one kind is known to the Arabs by the name of guzunjbeen, being the produce of a plant called guz, and which is ascertained to be a species of tamarisk. The same species seems also to be called toarfa, and is common along different parts of the coast of Arabia. It is also found in the neighborhood of Mount Sinai. In the month of June it drops from the thorns of the tamarisk upon the fallen twigs, leaves and thorns, which always cover the ground beneath the tree in the natural state. The Arabs use it as they do honey, to pour over their unleavened bread, or to dip their bread into; its taste is agreeable, somewhat aromatic, and as sweet as honey. If eaten in any quantity it is said to be highly purgative. When Lieut. Wellsted visited this place in the month of September, he found the extremities of the twigs and branches retaining the peculiar sweetness and flavor which characterize the manna. The Bedouins collect it early in the morning, and, after straining it through a cloth, place it either in skins or gourds; a considerable quantity is consumed by themselves; a portion is sent to Cairo; and some is also disposed of to the monks at Mount Sinai. The latter retail it to the Russian pilgrims. 'The Bedouins assured me that the whole quantity collected throughout the Peninsula, in the most fruitful season, did not exceed 150 wogas (about 700 pounds); and that it was usually disposed of at the rate of 60 dollars the woga' (Travels in Arabia, vol. i, p. 511).

(4) Another Kind. Another kind of manna, which has been supposed to be that of Scripture, is yielded by a thorny plant very common from the north of India to Syria, and which, by the Arabs, is called Al-haj; whence botanists have constructed the name Alhagi. The Alhagi mauro-rum is remarkable for the exudation of a sweetish juice, which concretes into small granular masses, and which is usually distinguished by the name of Persian manna. The climates of Persia and Bokhara seem also well suited to the secretion of this manna, which in the latter country is employed as a substitute for sugar, and is imported into India for medicinal use through Caubul and Khorassan. These two, from the localities in which they are produced, have alone been thought to be the manna of Scripture. But besides these, there are several other kinds of manna. Burckhardt, during his journey through El-Ghor, in the valley of the Jordan, heard of the Beiruk honey. This is described as a substance obtained from the leaves and branches of a tree called Gharb or Garrab, of the size of an olive-tree, and with leaves like those of the poplar. When fresh this grayish colored exudation is sweet in taste, but in a few days it becomes sour. The Arabs eat it like honey.

(5) Not the Manna of Scripture. One kind, called Shcer-khishit, is said to be produced in the country of the Uzbeks. A Caubul merchant informed the author of this article, that it was produced by a tree called Gundeleh, which grows in Candahar, and is about twelve feet high, with jointed stems. A fifth kind is produced on Calotropis procera, or the plant called Ashur. The sweet exudation is by Arab authors ranked with sugars, and called Shukur-al-ashur. It is described under this name by Avicenna, and in the Latin translation it is called Zuccarum-al-husar. A sixth kind, called Bed-khishit, is described in Persian works on Materia Medica, as being produced on a species of willow in Persian Khorasan. Another kind would appear to be produced on a species of oak, for Niebuhr says, 'At Merdin, in Mesopotamia, it appears like a kind of pollen, on the leaves of the tree called Ballot and Afs (or, according to the Aleppo pronunciation, As), which I take to be of the oak family. All are agreed, that between Merdin and Diarbekir manna is obtained, and principally from those trees which yield gall-nuts.' Besides these, there is a sweetish exudation found on the larch, which is called Manna brigantiaca, as there is also one kind found on the cedar of Lebanon. Indeed a sweetish secretion is found on the leaves of many other plants, produced sometimes by the plant itself, at others by the punctures of insects. It has been supposed, also, that these sweetish exudations being evaporated during the heat of the day in still weather, may afterwards become deposited, with the dew, on the ground, and on the leaves of plants; and thus explain some of the phenomena which have been observed by travelers and others. But none of these mannas explain, nor can it be expected that they should explain, the miracle of Scripture, by which abundance is stated to have been produced for millions, where hundreds cannot now be subsisted. (See Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 362; Robinson, Researches, i, 470, 550; and other Oriental travelers.) J. F. R.

Figurative. Manna is called the "corn of heaven" and "angels' food" (Ps. lxxviii:24, 25), perhaps in allusion to the mode by which it was supplied.

The phrase "hidden manna" (Rev. ii:17), figuratively describes the support which Christ furnishes to the true believer, of which the world does not and cannot partake. (Comp. John vi: 49, 51).

MANOAH (ma-nō'ah), (Heb. מָנוֹחַ, man-no'akh, rest).

A native of the town of Zorah, in the tribe of Dan, and the father of Samson, whose birth is recorded in Judg. xiii:1-23. Manoah is again mentioned (Judg. xiv:2-4) at the occasion of Samson's marriage, but seems to have died before the son, whose body was brought up from Gaza by his brethren, not, as Milton has it, by his father (Judg. xvi:31). (See SAMSON.)

MAN OF SIN. See ANTICHRIST.

MAN OF WAR. And Herod with his men of war set him at nought (Luke xxiii:11).

Man-of-war, with us, means a ship of war; but as here used it signifies just what the composition of the word denotes,—namely, a warrior, a soldier. This sense of the word is common in old English literature.

MANSERVANT (mǎn'sērv'ant). See SLAVE.

MANSIONS (Gr. μοναί, abodes, John xiv:2). The word is used in its primary meaning of "dwelling-places," "rooms."

MANSLAYER (mǎn'slā'ēr), (Heb. רָצַח, raw-tsakh', to kill; Gr. ἀνδροφόνος, an-drof-on'os), one who strikes another so as to kill.

The manslayer was one who was guilty of homicide, having accidentally and without malice slain another. According to the custom of the East, the right and indeed the obligation of revenge lay with the kinsmen of the person slain.

The avenger of blood did not require to consider whether the slaughter had been intentional or not. He was entitled wherever he found the slayer to take vengeance upon him, blood for blood. An important amelioration of this custom was introduced into the Jewish law by the appointment of six Cities of Refuge, in convenient central positions, so that in all parts of the land there might be one within reach. If one had accidentally slain another, he was required to hasten to the nearest City of Refuge and remain there till the death of the high-priest, after which he might return with safety to his home. It was enacted that the roads leading to those cities must be kept in good repair, and absolute security was guaranteed to the refugee. (See BLOOD-REVENGE.)

MAN, SON OF (Gr. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου).

This title was evidently taken from Dan. viii: 17, where everlasting dominion is ascribed to the Messiah under that title. It was assumed by Christ himself, and though occurring sixty-one times in the Gospels, is only used by Christ himself. It occurs once in the Acts (vii:56), and is employed by Stephen. It is clear that from the corresponding term, "the Son of God," this title belongs to Christ by virtue of superiority; and that both taken together decidedly prove that Christ, in some manner unknown to us, united in his person both the human and the Divine nature. "In this name there surely lies above everything actual humanity. Jesus knew himself to be a perfect personal man, and would not have been able to call himself Son of man if he only knew himself to be a manifest action of God. . . . The phrase must also signify, especially with the definite article, the opposite to imperfection and defacement, the truth of man, i. e., the realization of his idea. If he only meant to express by the name that he was a real man like others, the definite article would be inexplicable. The definite article points in that direction, that he was also conscious of his humanity not as a merely ordinary or faulty humanity, but as the perfect manifestation of its truth as well as of its realization" (Dorner, Christ. Doct., iii, 169, sq.; also Weiss, Bib. Theol. of New Testament, 144; Miley, Sys. Theol., ii p. 23, sq.; Bloomfield, Greek Test., Matt. viii:20; Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

MANTLE (mǎn't'l). The word employed in the A. V. to translate four Hebrew terms:

1. שֵׂמֶטָה, sem-ee-kaw'. This word occurs in Judg. iv:18, where it denotes the cloth with which Jael covered Sisera, and which, from all that can be gathered, was a tent-carpet.

2. מְעִיל, meh-eel', rendered "mantle" (1 Sam. xv:27; xxviii:14; Ezra ix:3, 5; Job i:20; ii:12; and Ps. cix:29); this word in other passages of the A. V. is rendered "coat," "cloak," and "robe."

3. מַעֲפָפָה, ma-at-aw-fawh', (Is. iii:22 only). Apparently an article of female apparel, perhaps an exterior tunic, longer and fuller than the internal one, and provided with sleeves.

4. אֶהָרָה, ad-deh-reth' (1 Kings xix:13, 19; 2 Kings ii:8, 13, 14); elsewhere "garment" and "robe." It denotes the cape or wrapper which, with a strip of skin or leather round his loins, formed the only garments of the prophet Elijah.

MANUSCRIPTS, BIBLICAL (mǎn'ū-skripts, bīb'li-kal). These are either Hebrew or Greek.

1. Jewish Manuscripts. Jewish MSS. are divided into (a) Synagogue rolls or sacred copies; and (b) Private or common copies.

(a) The synagogue rolls contain the Pentateuch, the appointed sections of the prophets, or the book of Esther, which last is used only at the Feast of Purim. The three are never put together; but are written on separate rolls. They are in the Chaldee or square Hebrew character, without vowels and accents, accompanied with the puncta extraordinaria, and having the unusual forms of certain consonants. The great beauty of penmanship exhibited in these synagogue copies has been always admired. They are taken from authentic exemplars, without the slightest deviation or correction. They seldom fall into the hands of Christians, since, as soon as they cease to be employed in the synagogue, they are either buried or carefully laid aside, lest they should be profaned by coming into the possession of Gentiles.

(b) Private MSS. are written partly in the square or Chaldee character, partly in the Rabbinical. They are held in far less esteem than the synagogue rolls, and are wont to be denominated profane (pesulim). Their form is entirely arbitrary. They are in folio, quarto, octavo, and duodecimo. Of those written in the square character, the greater number are on parchment, some on paper. The ink of the letters is always black, but the vowel points are usually written with ink of a different color from that of the consonants. Initial words and letters are frequently decorated with gold and silver colors. The prose parts are arranged in columns, the poetic in parallel members. Some copies are without columns. The columns are not always occupied with the Hebrew text alone; for a version is frequently added which is either written in the text after the manner of verses or in a column by itself, or in the margin in a smaller character. The number of lines is not prescribed by the Talmud. The upper and lower margins are filled with the Great Masora, and sometimes with a Rabbinical commentary; as also with prayers, psalms, and the like. The external margin is for corrections, scholia, variations, notices of the haphthoroth (sections from the prophets), parashoth (sections from the law), the commentaries of the Rabbins, etc. The inner margin, or that between the columns, is occupied with the little Masora. The single books of the Old Testament are separated from one another by spaces, except the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, which are written continuously. The sections of the law and prophets are generally marked. In the MSS. of different countries the books are differently arranged. These copies generally pass through various hands before they are finished. The consonants proceed from the sopher or scribe. When the same person writes both consonants and vowels, as is frequently the case, he never makes them at the same time; the former are finished before he begins to append the latter. The K'ris in the margin uniformly proceed from the vowel-writer. It is probable that these copies were in no instance made by Christians.

Although the square character be employed in all the MSS. of which we have spoken, yet it has varieties. The Jews themselves distinguish in the synagogue rolls, (1) the Tam letter, with sharp corners and perpendicular coronulæ, used among the German and Polish Jews; (2) the Velshe letter, more modern than the Tam, and rounder, with coronulæ, particularly found in the sacred copies of the Spanish and Oriental Jews.

The age of Hebrew MSS. is not easily determined. It is true that they often contain subscriptions giving an account of the time when they were written, and the name of the scribe, or also of the possessor. But these accounts are often ambiguous and occasionally incorrect. Where they are altogether wanting, it is still more difficult to discover the age. In the latter case, the character of the writing, the color of the ink, the quality and yellowness of the parchment, the absence of the Masora, of the vowel-points, of the unusual letters, etc., have been chiefly rested upon. Still, however, such particulars are uncertain marks of age.

The oldest Hebrew MS. at present known belongs to A. D. 1106 (No. 154 of Kennicott). It is true that some others are supposed to be older, but simply by conjecture. As far as certainty is concerned, this is certainly the oldest. Loehnis (Grundzüge der Biblischen Hermeneutik und Kritik, Giessen, 1839) affirms that some reach as far back as the eighth century, an assertion grounded merely on the conjecture of De Rossi and Kennicott. So much uncertainty attaches to the internal marks adopted by these two Hebraists, that the ages to which they assign several Hebrew MSS. are quite gratuitous. No Hebrew MS. possessing an indubitably accurate register of its antiquity, goes farther back than the twelfth century (see the third section of Tychsen's Tentamen de variis Codicum Hebraicorum Vet. Test. MSS. generibus, etc., Rostock, 1772, 8vo, in which the learned writer examines the marks of antiquity assumed by Simon, Jablonski, Wolf, Houbigant, Kennicott, and Lilienthal, and shows that the Masora alone is a certain index for determining the age and goodness of Hebrew MSS).

Private MSS. written in the Rabbinical character are much more recent than the preceding; none of them being older than 500 years. They are on cotton or linen paper, in a curstive character, without vowel-points or the Masora, and with many abbreviations.

The MSS. found among the Chinese Jews are partly synagogue rolls, partly private copies, whose text does not differ from the Masoretic. The Pentateuch of the Malabar Jews brought from India to England by the late Dr. Buchanan, and described by Mr. Yates, resembles on the whole the usual synagogue rolls of the Jews, except that it is written on red skin. Its text is the Masoretic, with a few unimportant deviations.

Eight exemplars are celebrated among the Jews for their correctness and value. They are now lost, but extracts from them are still preserved. From Jewish writings, and from the margin of some MSS., where a reference is made to them, we learn that they were highly prized for their singular accuracy. They formed the basis of subsequent copies. They are: (1) The codex of Hillel; (2) the Babylonian codex; (3) the codex of Israel; (4) an Egyptian codex; (5) codex Sinai; (6) the Pentateuch of Jericho; (7) codex Sanbuki; (8) the book Taggin. For a more copious account of Hebrew MSS. we refer to Eichhorn's Einleitung (Introduction), vol. ii.; Kennicott's Dissertatio generalis; Walton's Prolegomena to the Polyglott, which have been separately edited by Dathe and Wrangham; Tychsen's Tentamen; De Rossi's Varia Lectiones Vet. Test. etc.; and his Scholia critica in V. T. libros, etc.; De Wette, Lehrbuch der Historisch-Kritischen Einleitung; and Davidson's Lectures on Biblical Criticism, in which last the best books are pointed out.

2. Manuscripts of the Greek Testament.

Those that have descended to our time are either on vellum or paper. The oldest material was the Egyptian papyrus; but even so early as the fourth century, the New Testament was written on the skins of animals. This writing material continued in use till the eleventh century, when paper began to be employed. Till the tenth century, MSS. were usually written in capital or uncial letters; then the cursive character came into use. The most ancient copies have no divisions of words, being written in a continued series of lines. Accents, breathings, and iota subscript are also wanting.

The whole New Testament is contained in very few MSS. Transcribers generally divided it into three parts; the first containing the four gospels; the second, the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles; the third, the Apocalypse of St. John. The greatest number of MSS. are those which have the four gospels, because they were most frequently read in the churches. Those containing the Acts and epistles are also numerous. Such as have the book of Revelation alone are extremely few, because it was seldom read in public.

A. Codex Alexandrinus, presented by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Alexandria, and afterwards of Constantinople, to Charles I, now in the British Museum. It contains the whole Bible, the Septuagint version of the Old Testament in three folios, and the New Testament in one. It has various chasms. A facsimile of the New Testament portion was published by Dr. Woide, in a folio volume, London, 1786. Mr. Baber of the British Museum executed the Old Testament in the same manner, in four folio volumes, London, 1819. This MS. was probably written at Alexandria, and belongs to the fifth century.

B. Codex Vaticanus, 1209, in the Vatican Library at Rome, containing the Old and New Testaments. It is defective in several places; and portions have been supplied by a modern hand. Hug has proved that it belongs to the middle of the fourth century. In regard to the internal value of its readings, it is probably superior to the Codex Alexandrinus.

C. Codex Regius, or Ephraemi.—This is a rescript or palmpest MS., i. e. the ancient writing has been erased to make room for some other. The works of Ephrem the Syrian were over the original. In endeavoring to ascertain the character of what was first written on the parchment, and washing off the latter letters, it was found that the MS. contained originally the Old and New Testaments in Greek. In many places it is so faded as to be illegible. There are numerous chasms in it. Several forms of words seem to indicate that it was written in Egypt: it probably belongs to the sixth century, and is now in the Royal Library at Paris, where it is marked 9.

D. Codex Cantabrigiensis, or Beza.—This MS. was presented, in 1581, to the University of Cambridge, by Theodore Beza. It is a Greek-Latin MS. of the four gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, with a single fragment of the Catholic epistles. Its age is probably the seventh century, though many have assigned it to the fifth. Kipling, Hug, and Scholz think that it was written in Egypt; but Scholz has given some reasons for assigning it to the south of France, which are not without weight. Credner assents to the latter opinion, as far as the MS. is concerned, while he thinks that the text is of Jewish-Christian origin, and attributes it to Palestine. Great diversity of opinion has prevailed respecting the quality of its readings. Bishop Middleton, at the end of his work on the Greek article, depreciated it. Matthei had done so before. Both have unduly lessened its value. Dr. Kipling published a facsimile of it at Cambridge, 1793, 2 vols. folio.

D. Claramontanus, or Regius, 107, a Greek-Latin copy of Paul's epistles, marked with the same letter of the alphabet as the preceding, but containing a different part of the New Testament. It is at present in the Royal Library at Paris: it probably belongs to the eighth century.

E. Codex Basileensis.—This MS. has many chasms, and several parts of it have been written by a more recent hand than the rest. It contains the gospels, and belongs to the ninth century.

E. Laudianus, having once belonged to Archbishop Laud, and now in the Bodleian Library. It contains the Acts of the Apostles, with a Latin version, and wants from xxvi:29 to xxviii:26. This MS. belongs to the seventh or eighth century, and was published by Thomas Hearne at Oxford in 1715, octavo.

E. Sangermanensis.—This is a Greek-Latin MS. of Paul's epistles, but a copy of the Claramontanus, with various corrections. It belongs to the eleventh century.

F. Codex Boreli, containing the four gospels. It has been collated no farther than Luke x.

F. Coislinianus, a MS. containing part of the Old Testament and Acts ix:24, 25. It belongs to the seventh century.

F. Augiensis.—This is a Greek-Latin MS. of Paul's epistles, now in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. It belongs to the tenth century.

G. Harleianus, in British Museum. This is a MS. of the four Gospels, but with many chasms. It belongs to the eleventh century.

G. Angelicus.—A MS. containing the Acts of the Apostles, with the Pauline and Catholic epistles, belonging to the Anglican Library at Rome. It is as old as the ninth century. In the Pauline epistles it is marked I.

G. Bocnerianus, a Greek MS. of Paul's Epistles, with an interlinear Latin version, now in the Electoral Library at Dresden. It wants the Epistle to the Hebrews, and probably belongs to the ninth century. The characters show an approach to the cursive.

H. Wolfii B, a MS. of the four gospels, with many chasms. It belongs to the eleventh century.

H. Mutincensis.—This MS. contains the Acts of the Apostles written in the ninth century; but chapters i:1—v:28, were added in the fifteenth century, and xxvii:1 to the end, in the eleventh century. With the Catholic epistles, it contains the Pauline, written in cursive letters (179), and belongs to the twelfth century.

H. Coislinianus.—This MS. contains fragments of the Pauline epistles, which have been printed by Montfaucon in the Bibliotheca Coisliniana. According to Hug it belongs to the sixth century.

J. Cottonianus.—This codex contains fragments of Matthew's and John's gospels. It belongs to the seventh or eighth century.

K. Codex Cyprius, formerly Colbertinus, 5149, now Regius, 63, a MS. containing the gospels. It belongs to the eighth or ninth century, probably the latter, and has been fully collated and described by Scholz at the end of his Cura Critica, 4to, Heidelberg, 1820. See, however, Scholz in the prolegomena to Griesbach, vol. i.

L. Regius, 62.—This MS. contains the four gospels, with several mutilations. It is of Egyptian origin, as Griesbach has proved; and belongs to the ninth century.

M. Regius, 48, containing the gospels, and belonging to the tenth century.

N. Vindobonensis Cæsareus.—This fragmentary MS. contains only Luke xxiv:13-21 and 39-49. It belongs to the seventh century.

O. Montefalconii, a MS. containing Luke xviii.

P. Guelpherbytanus, a codex rescriptus, containing fragments of the four gospels, and belonging to the sixth century.

Q. Guelpherbytanus, also a rescript MS. containing fragments of the gospels of Luke and John, and belonging to the sixth century. These two MSS. were published and described by Knittel in 1763.

R. Tubingensis.—This fragment, containing John i:38-50, has been published by Reuss. It belongs to the seventh century.

S. Vaticanus, 354.—This MS. contains the gospels, and belongs to the tenth century.

T. The Borgian fragment, part of a Coptic-Greek MS. brought from Egypt. It contains John vi:28-67; vii:6—viii:31. It was printed by George in 1789, and belongs to the fourth or more probably the fifth century.

U. A MS. of the gospels, in St. Mark's Library, Venice. It belongs to the tenth century.

V. Mosquensis, a MS. of the four gospels, belonging to the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow. It wants some parts of Matthew, and from John vii:39 is written in cursive characters of the thirteenth century; the first part belongs to the ninth century.

W. Regius, a fragment containing Luke ix:36-47; x:12-22; and belonging to the eighth century.

X. Landshutensis.—This MS. contains the four gospels, but with numerous chasms and some supplements. It belongs most probably to the tenth century.

Y. Barberinus, a fragment in the library of Cardinal Barberini at Rome, containing John xvi:4—xix:28. It belongs to the ninth century.

Z. Dublinensis, a rescript, exhibiting the gospel of Matthew, but in a very imperfect state. It was published in facsimile by Dr. Barrett (Dublin, 1801, 4to), and belongs to the sixth century.

Γ. Vaticanus.—This fragment contains Matthew xix:6-13; xx:6-22; xx:29—xxi:19. It belongs to the seventh century.

Δ. Sangallensis.—This is a Greek-Latin MS. of the gospels, made by the monks in the monastery of St. Gallen. It was published by Rettigus at Turin, in 1836, and belongs to the ninth century.

Such are the uncial MSS. hitherto collated. Those written in the cursive character are described in the large critical editions of Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz; and in the Introduction of Michaelis, up to the period when it was published. The other Introductions contain descriptions of several, but not all the MSS.

Three Cursive MSS. deserve mention, from their connection with the much-disputed passage 1 John v:7, which they are usually quoted as containing. As they are written in cursive letters they are not older than the tenth century.

(1) The Codex Montfortianus, or Dublinensis, belonging to the library of Trinity College, Dublin. It was quoted by Erasmus, under the title of Codex Britannicus. It is written on paper in 12mo size, and could not have been made earlier than the fifteenth century. It follows the Vulgate very closely, not only in the insertion of the much-disputed verse, but in other passages of a remarkable character.

(2) The Codex Ravianus, or Berolinensis.—This MS. is generally supposed to be a forgery copied in the greater part of it from the Greek text of the Complutensian Polyglott, and the third edition of Stephens. It has even their typographical errors. It was written in the sixteenth century, and has no critical value (see Pappelbaum's Untersuchung der Ravischen Griechischen Handschrift des Neuen Testaments, Berlin, 1785, 8vo; and his subsequent treatise, entitled, Codicis Manuscripti Novi Testamenti Græci Raviani in Biblioth. Reg. Berol. publica asservati examen, quo ostenditur, alteram ejus partem majorem ex editione Complutensi, alteram minorem ex editione Rob. Stephani tertia esse descriptam, Berlin, 1796, 8vo).

(3) Codex Ottobonianus, 298, preserved in the Vatican. This MS. contains the Acts and epistles, with a Latin version. Scholz ascribes it to the fifteenth century. It has no critical value, because it has been altered in many cases to correspond with the Vulgate. In it the disputed text is found in a different form from the common reading. Instead of in heaven, it has from heaven; and instead of on earth, it has from the earth. (See Davidson, Biblical Criticism.)

3. Recent Discoveries. The following most important discoveries may be mentioned, all made within a half a century:

1. The Sinaitic manuscript of the New Testament, discovered thirty-five years ago. This is a complete manuscript of the New Testament, and belongs to the fourth century. It is a witness of the very first importance for the history of the New Testament text.

2. Fragments of very early versions of the New Testament, as the Curetonian Syriac, the earliest Syriac known, and portions of Coptic versions.

3. The "Philosophumena," or "Against all Heresies" of Hippolytus, who was martyred in the year 235. This very important work gives an account of the heretical sects of the first and second centuries, and is very valuable for the quotations it makes from such heretics as Valentinus and Basilides, who flourished A. D. 125, and from whom are given quotations from John's gospel.

4. The "Diatessaron" of Tatian. This Syrian Christian father died before A. D. 172. His famous work, discovered and brought to the knowledge of the world not less than twenty years ago, is a harmony of the four gospels, and begins with the first words of John's gospel, and uses that gospel, as well as others, very freely. It is a conclusive proof of the unquestioned acceptance of the gospel as early as the year 170.

5. The Epistle of Barnabas. A complete Greek copy of this epistle, which goes back nearly if not quite, to the beginning of the second century, was discovered in 1859 by Tischendorf. This quotes Matthew under the formula, "It is written." It is of very great value, and was early regarded as itself canonical.

6. The "Shepherd" of Hermas. The Greek text of the most of this important series of Visions and Mandates, which date from as early as the middle of the second century, is also one of the discoveries of the last forty years. It casts much light on the condition of the early church, though the long work does not quote the New Testament.

7. The Epistle of Clement of Rome, probably written A. D. 97. A second copy of this was found by Bryennios, and published several years ago. Such a manuscript cannot but be of the first importance. It gives quotations from Paul.

8. The last of these discoveries, belonging to the last two or three years, is the very important "Teaching of the Apostles," a work which probably goes back to the early years of the second century, and very likely to the last part of the first century, and which gives us the first church manual ever written, on which the so-called Syrian or Coptic Constitutions and the better known Greek Apostolic Constitutions were in considerable part founded. This work, so remarkably preserved and discovered, casts a clearer light than any other on the origin of the officers in the church, and the early character of its services and teachings. It quotes considerable portions of the Sermon on the Mount.

These great discoveries of this century, with others of less importance that might be mentioned, have thrown a full beam of light on the dark interval which separated the day of the Apostles from the days of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria. They answer most satisfactorily questions of critical doubt raised by skeptical scholars. They remove many difficulties and carry the gospel of John, as well as other portions of the New Testament, back to the very days of the Apostle John, before he died in Ephesus. The condition of the argument is much altered since Norton wrote on the genuineness of the gospels. Every discovery has only confirmed the faith of the church in its accepted Scriptures. To doubt that they are the products of the years to which they assign themselves or have been assigned by the Church, now appears to betray willful skepticism.

The father of Achish, king of Gath, to whom David fled for safety (1 Sam. xxvii:2). (B. C. before 1000.)

MAON (mā'on), (Heb. מֹאֲוִן, maw-ohn').

1. A town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:55), which gave name to a wilderness where David hid himself from Saul, and around which the churlish Nabal had great possessions (1 Sam. xxiii:24, 25; xxv:2). Jerome places it to the east of Daroma (Onomast. s. v. Maon). The name does not occur in modern times, and Dr. Robinson regards it as one of the sites first identified by himself. Irby and Mangles were in the neighborhood in 1818, but did not detect this and other ancient names. Robinson finds it in the present Tell Maân, which is about seven miles south by east from Hebron. Here there is a conical hill about 200 feet high, on the top of which are some ruins of no great extent, consisting of foundations of hewn stone, a square enclosure, the remains probably of a tower or castle, and several cisterns. The view from the summit is extensive. This is Tell Maân. The traveler found here a band of peasants keeping their flocks, and dwelling in caves amid the ruins. (Bibl. Researches, ii. 190-196.)

2. Son of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah, and founder of Beth-zur (1 Chron. ii:45). Perhaps the name is here used collectively for the inhabitants of the town of Maon.

MAONITES (mā'on-ites), (Heb. מֹאֲוִי, maw-ohn'), a tribe mentioned (Judg. x:12) along with the Amalekites, Zidonians, Philistines, etc. In 2 Chron. xxvi:7, they are called Mehunims, and are mentioned along with the Arabians.

There is still a city Maân with a castle in Arabia Petræa, south of the Dead Sea and near Wady Mousa. Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, etc., p. 437). (See MEHUNIMS, THE.)

MARA (mā'rà), (Heb. מָרָא, maw-raw', bitter), the name chosen by Naomi as symbolical of her bereavements (Ruth i:20).

MARAH (mā'rah), (Heb. מָרָה, maw-raw', bitterness).

(1) The Bitter Waters. The Israelites in departing from Egypt made some stay on the shores of the Red Sea, at the place where it had been crossed by them. From this spot they proceeded southward for three days without finding any water, and then came to a well, the waters of which were so bitter, that, thirsty as they were, they could not drink them. The well was called Marah from the quality of its waters. This name, in the form of Amarah, is now borne by the barren bed of a winter torrent, a little beyond which is still found a well called Howara, whose bitter waters answer to this description. Camels will drink it; but the thirsty Arabs never partake of it themselves; and it is said to be the only water on the shore of the Red Sea which they cannot drink. The water of this well, when first taken into the mouth, seems insipid rather than bitter, but when held in the mouth a few seconds it becomes exceedingly nauseous.

The Hebrews, unaccustomed as yet to the hardships of the desert, and having been in the habit of drinking their full of the best water in the world, were much distressed by its scarcity in the region wherein they now wandered; and in their disappointment of the relief expected from this well, they murmured greatly against Moses for having brought them into such a dry wilderness, and asked him, 'What shall we drink?' On this Moses cried to Jehovah, who indicated to him 'a certain tree,' on throwing the branches of which into the well, its waters became sweet and fit for use.

(2) Was the Change Miraculous? The question connected with this operation is—whether the effect proceeded from the inherent virtue of the tree in sweetening bad water; or that it had no such virtue, and that the effect was purely miraculous. In support of the former alternative, it may be asked why the tree should have been pointed out and used at all, unless it had a curative virtue? And to this the answer may be found in the numerous instances in which God manifests a purpose of working even his miracles in accordance with the general laws by which he governs the world, and for that purpose disguising the naked exhibition of supernatural power, by the interposition of an apparent cause, while yet the true character of the event is left indisputable, by the utter inadequacy of the apparent cause to produce, by itself, the resulting effect. This tends to show that the tree, or portion of it, need not be supposed, from the mere fact of its being employed, to have had an inherent curative virtue. It had not necessarily any such virtue; and that it positively had not such virtue seems to follow, or, at least, to be rendered more than probable by the consideration—that, in the scanty and little diversified vegetation of this district, any such very desirable virtues in a tree, or part of a tree, could scarcely have been undiscovered before the time of the history, and if they had been discovered, could not but have been known to Moses; and the Divine indication of the tree would not have been needful. And, again, if the corrective qualities were inherent, but were at this time first made known, it is incredible that so valuable a discovery would ever have been forgotten; and yet it is manifest that in after-times the Hebrews had not the knowledge of any tree which could render bad water drinkable; and the inhabitants of the desert have not only not preserved the knowledge of a fact which would have been so important to them, but have not discovered it in the thirty-five centuries which have since passed. This is shown by the inquiries of travelers, some of whom were actuated by the wish of finding a plant which might supersede the miracle. No such plant, however, can be found; and whatever the tree was, it can have had no more inherent virtue in sweetening the bitter well of Marah, than the salt had, which produced the same effect, when thrown by Elisha into the well of Jericho (Lindsay, i. 263-5).

MARALAH (mār'a-lah), (Heb. מַרְאֵלָה, mar-al-aw', earthquake, declivity).

A landmark on the southern boundary of the tribe of Zebulun, but apparently within Issachar (Josh. xix:11). Not identified.

MARAN-ATHA (mār'an-āth'ā), (Gr. μαρὰν ἀθά, mar-an' ath-ah'; Chald. מַרְאַן אֲתָהּ, our Lord cometh).

An expression used by St. Paul at the conclusion of his First Epistle to the Corinthians: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha" (xvi:22). It may have been used as a watchword, common to all believers in the first age. Connected here with an anathema, or curse, it is the Christian's reminder of the advent of the judge to execute the anathema. (See ANATHEMA.)

MARBLE (mār'b'l), (Heb. מַרְבֵּיט, shah'yish, מַרְבֵּיט, shesh), white marble or crystalline limestone, was used for columns and costly pavements (Esth. i:6; Cant. v:15), and was the material out of which Solomon's temple was constructed (1 Chron. xxix:2).

It was obtained for the most part from quarries underneath the Temple area. (See JERUSALEM.)

MARCHESHVAN (mār-kësh'vān), (Heb. מַרְחֶשְׁוָן, mar-khesh-vawn').

The Macedonian Δῖος, or Zeus, is the name of that month which was the eighth of the sacred, and the second of the civil, year of the Jews; which began with the new moon of our November. There was a fast on the 6th, in memory of Zedekiah's being blinded, after he had witnessed the slaughter of his sons (2 Kings xxv:7).

This month is always spoken of in the Old Testament by its numerical designation; except once, when it is called Bul (בּוּל, 1 Kings vi:38), supposed to be shortened form of the Hebrew 'rain.' The signification of rain-month is exactly suitable to November in the climate of Palestine. J. N.

MARCUS (mār'kus), (Col. iv:10; Philem. 24; 1 Pet. v:13). See MARK.

MARESHAH (ma-rē'shā), (Heb. מַרְשָׁה, mar-ay-shaw', summit).

1. A town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:44), rebuilt and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi:8). The Ethiopians under Zerah were defeated by Asa in the valley near Mareslah (2 Chron. xiv:9-13). It was laid desolate by Judas Maccabæus, on his march from Hebron to Ashdod (1 Macc. v:65-68; Joseph. Antiq. xii:8, 6). Josephus mentions it among the towns possessed by Alexander Jannæus, which had been in the hands of the Syrians (Antiq. xiii:15, 4); but by Pompey it was restored to the former inhabitants, and attached to the province of Syria (xiv. 4. 4). Maresa was among the towns rebuilt by Gabinius (Antiq. xiv. 5. 3), but was again destroyed by the Parthians in their irruption against Herod (xiv. 5. 3). A place so often mentioned in history must have been of considerable importance; but it does not appear that it was ever again rebuilt. The site, however, is set down by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Morasthi), as within two miles of Eleutheropolis, but the direction is not stated. Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Researches, ii. 422) found, at a mile and a half south of the site of Eleutheropolis, a remarkable tell, or artificial hill, with foundations of some buildings. As there are no other ruins in the vicinity, and as the site is admirably suited for a fortress, this, he supposes, may have been Mareslah. Conder suggested el-Marah, south of the valley of Elah, as Mareslah, but lately has accepted M'erash as the site.

2. The "father" of Hebron; in the line of Judah (1 Chron. ii:42), by which it is apparently meant that he was the progenitor of the inhabitants of Hebron. (B. C. 1190.)

3. Son of Laadah, of the family of Shelah; perhaps the founder of a place by the same name (1 Chron. iv:21). Perhaps identical with 2. (B. C. about 1612.)

MARINER (mār'ī-nēr), (Heb. מַרְיָנֵר, mal-lawkh', Ezek. xxvii:9, 27, 29; to shoot, row, xxvii. 8), a sailor. (See SHIP.)

MARISHES (mār'ish-ēs), an old form of MARSU (which see).

MARK (märk), (Gr. Μάρκος, mar'kos, from the common Latin name Marcus).

According to ecclesiastical testimonies the evangelist Mark is the same person who in the Acts is called by the Jewish name John, whose Roman surname was Marcus (Acts xii:12, 25). This person is sometimes called simply John (Acts xiii:5, 13); and sometimes Mark (Acts xv:39).

Mary, Mark's mother, had a house at Jerusalem, in which the Apostles were wont to assemble (Acts xii:12). In the Epistle to the Colossians (iv:10, 11) Mark is mentioned among the assistants of Paul, and as being one of the converts from Judaism. From this passage we learn also that Mark was a cousin of Barnabas, which circumstance confirms the opinion that he was of Jewish descent. It was probably Barnabas who first introduced him to Paul. He accompanied Paul and Barnabas on their travels as an assistant (Acts xii:25; xiii:5). When they had arrived in Pamphylia, Mark left them and returned to Jerusalem, from which city they had set out (Acts xiii:13). On this account Paul refused to take Mark with him on his second Apostolical journey, and so Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus (Acts xv:37-39). It seems, however, that Mark, at a later period, became reconciled to Paul, since, according to Col. iv:10, and Philem. 24, he was with the Apostle during his first captivity at Rome; and according to 2 Tim. iv:11, he was also with him during his second captivity. The passage in Colossians proves also that he was about to undertake for Paul a journey to Colosse.

There is a unanimous ecclesiastical tradition that Mark was the companion and interpreter of Peter and either orally or in writing communicated and developed what Peter taught. The testimony in favor of the connection between Mark and Peter is so old and respectable, that it cannot be called in question. It first occurs at the commencement of the second century, and proceeds from the presbyter John (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii:39); it afterwards appears in Irenæus (Adv. Hær. iii. 1. 1, and x. 6); in Tertullian (Contra Mart. iv. 5); in Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerome, and others.

The Gospel According to Mark.

(1) Testimony of Eusebius. The same ancient authors who call Mark a disciple and secretary of Peter, state also that he wrote his Gospel according to the discourses of that Apostle. The most ancient statement of this fact is that of the presbyter John and of Papias, which we quote verbatim from Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 39) as follows: "Mark having become secretary to Peter, whatever he put into style he wrote with accuracy, but did not observe the chronological order of the discourses and actions of Christ, because he was neither a hearer nor a follower of the Lord; but at a later period, as I have said, wrote for Peter, to meet the requisites of instruction, but by no means with the view to furnish a connected digest of the discourses of our Lord. Consequently Mark was not in fault when he wrote down circumstances as he recollected them; for he had only the intention to omit nothing of what he had heard, and not to misrepresent anything." Critics usually ascribe all these words to the presbyter. Schmidt especially observes, in his Einleitung ins Neue Testament Nachträge (p. 270), that he himself had erroneously quoted this testimony as the words of Papias; but it seems to us that the words ὡς ἔφη do not allow us to consider all this passage as belonging to the presbyter. Papias had not before his eyes a book of the presbyter, and he seems to have alluded to that passage of his own work to which Eusebius refers in his second book (ch. xv.), in which work Papias had given some account respecting the life of this evangelist. According to this view it seems that, with the words οὕτε γὰρ ἠκούσε, there begins an explanation of the words of the presbyter.

(2) Relation to Peter. It has been observed in the article GOSPEL (which see) that this passage has been made use of in order to disprove the existence of an orally fixed evangelium-tradition, since it is here stated that Peter preached as circumstances required. To this we replied that Papias considers the Gospel of Mark to be the reflex of the discourses of Peter, in which character they are described by the presbyter; and since the Gospel of Mark really contains a sketch of the life of Jesus, the account of the presbyter does not imply that the discourses of Peter could not likewise have contained a sketch of his life. The presbyter only says that Peter did not furnish a complete life of Jesus, embracing a history of his infancy, youth, etc.; and that, therefore, the account of Peter was in some respects incomplete, since he, as Papias states, omitted various circumstances. Schleiermacher, and after him Strauss, have turned this into an argument against the Gospel of Mark. They assert that this gospel is a summary, which, if not chronological, is at least a concatenation according to the subjects. Now the presbyter states that Mark wrote without order. By this expression they consider all such arrangement excluded; consequently they infer that the presbyter John, the old disciple of the Lord, spoke of another Mark. We learn, however, from what Papias adds, how Papias himself understood the words of the presbyter; and we perceive that he explains his statement by the term, writing isolated facts. Hence it appears that the words ὅ τὰς signify only incompleteness, but do not preclude all and every sort of arrangement.

It would be arbitrary, indeed, to suppose that another Mark had an existence in the earliest times of Christianity, without having any historical testimony for such a supposition. There is no indication that there was any other Mark in the early times of Christianity besides the Mark mentioned in the Acts, who is also reported to have been the author of that gospel which bears his name.

(3) Place among the Gospels. We have mentioned in the article LUKE (which see) that, according to Irenæus, the Gospels of Mark and Luke were written later than that of Matthew; and according to a tradition preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus, the Gospels of Matthew and Luke preceded that of Mark. The chronological order of the gospels is, according to Origen, the same in which they follow each other in the codices. Irenæus (Adversus Hæreses, iii. 1) states that Mark wrote after the death of Peter and Paul; but, according to Clemens Alexandrinus (Hypotypos. vi.) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi. 14), he wrote at Rome while Peter was yet living. These various data leave us in uncertainty. If the opinions concerning the relation of Mark to Matthew and Luke, which have been current since the days of Griesbach, were correct, we might be able to form a true idea concerning the chronological succession in which the first three gospels were written. Griesbach, Saunier, Strauss, and many others state it as an unquestionable fact, that the Gospel of Mark was merely an abridgment of the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. De Wette, even in the latest edition of his Einleitung, 1842, calls this opinion erwiesen 'demonstrated' (see pp. 130 and 157). The value of such demonstrations may be learned from what appears to De Wette the most certain proof of the alleged fact, viz., that the statements of Mark concerning the temptation of Christ are merely an abridgment of other sources. But we do not perceive why it should be impossible to furnish a condensed statement from oral communications. Weisse, Wolke, and Bauer, on the other hand, have, in recent times, asserted that the Gospel of Mark was the most ancient of all the gospels, that Luke amplified the Gospel of Mark, and that Matthew made additions to both. Weisse and Wolke employ some very artificial expedients in order to explain how it happened that, if Luke and Matthew transcribed Mark, there should have arisen a considerable difference both in words and contents. Wolke especially accuses Luke and Matthew of intentional misrepresentations. In the article GOSPEL we have stated our opinion concerning the relative position in which the evangelists stand to each other. We do not see any reason to contradict the unanimous tradition of antiquity concerning the dependence of Mark upon Peter. We deem it possible, and even probable, that Luke read Mark, and that he also alludes to him by reckoning him among the many who had written gospel history before him. This supposition, however, is by no means necessary or certain; and it is still possible that Mark wrote after Luke. Some of the ancient testimonies which we have quoted, namely, those of Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerome, and others, state that Mark's Gospel was written at Rome. Whether this was the case or nor, it is certain that it was written for Gentile Christians. This appears from the explanation of Jewish customs (ch. vii:2, 11; xii:18; xiii:3; xiv:12; xv:6, 42). The same view is confirmed by the scarcity of quotations from the Old Testament, perhaps also by the absence of the genealogy of Christ, and by the omission of the Sermon on the Mount, which explains the relation of Christ to the Old Testament dispensation, and which was, therefore, of the greatest importance to Matthew.

(4) Peculiarity of Mark. The characteristic peculiarity of Mark as an author is particularly manifest in two points: (1) He reports rather the works than the discourses of our Savior; (2) He gives details more minutely and graphically than Matthew and Luke; for instance, he describes the cures effected by Jesus more exactly (iv:31, 41; vi:5, 13; vii:33; viii:23). He is also more particular in stating definite numbers (v:13, 42; vi:7, 14, 30), and furnishes more exact dates and times (i:32, 35; ii:1, 26; iv:26, 35; vi:2; xi:11, 19, 20, etc.). It may be that these characteristics of Mark originated from his connection with Peter.

Most of the materials of Mark's narrative occur also in Matthew and Luke. He has, however, sections exclusively belonging to himself, viz. iii:21, 31, sq.; vi:17, sq.; xi:11; xii:28, sq.

We mention the conclusion of Mark's Gospel separately, since its genuineness may be called in question. Among the Codices Majusculi the Codex B. omits ch. xvi:9-20 altogether, and several of the Codices Minusculi mark this section with asterisks as doubtful. Several ancient Fathers and authors of Scholia state that it was wanting in some manuscripts. We cannot, however, suppose that it was arbitrarily added by a copyist, since at present all codices, except B, and all ancient versions contain it, and the Fathers in general quote it. We may also say that Mark could not have concluded his gospel with ver. 8, unless he had been accidentally prevented from finishing it. Hence Michaelis and Hug have inferred that the addition was made by the evangelist at a later period, in a similar manner as John made an addition in ch. xxi. of his gospel. Perhaps also an intimate friend, or an amanuensis, supplied the defect. If either of these two hypotheses is well founded, it may be understood why several codices were formerly without this conclusion, and why, nevertheless, it was found in most of them.

A. T.

MARK (märk). This term is variously used.

1. (Heb. מַרְקָא, bin). A sign or brand fixed on the forehead, hand or other part of the body for the purpose of identification (Ezek. ix:4, 6).

2. (Heb. מַרְקָא, othe). Whether God set a "mark" on Cain's person to distinguish him from others, or only gave him some token, as he did Gideon that he would make him conquer the Midianites, and that he would preserve him, we know not (Gen. iv:15).

3. It is used in the sense of a target (Heb.

מַרְקָא, mat-taw-raw', watched, 1 Sam. xx:20; Job xvi:12; Lam. iii:12).

In Gal. vi:17 Paul writes, "Henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ," i. e., the brand of my master, Jesus Christ. The Greek στίγμα (stig'mah) is the common word for the brand or mark with which masters marked their slaves. St. Paul's sufferings and scars were the marks or brands of Christ, his master.

The mark (Gr. χάραγμα, kh'ar-ag-mah, stamp) was stamped on the right hand or the forehead as the badge of the followers of Antichrist (Rev. xiii:16; xiv:9, 11; xvi:2; xix:20; xx:4).

MARKET (mär'kät), (Heb. מַרְקָא, mah-ar-awb'), a mercantile term found only in Ezek. xxvii (rendered "merchandise," except in verses 13, 17, 19, 25).

It appears to have been used in several senses: (1) Barter (ver. 9, 27); (2) place of trade (margin, verses 12, 13, 17, 19); (3) gain resulting from trade (ver. 27, 34). In the New Testament see Matt. xxiii:7; Mark xii:38; Luke xi:43; xx:46; Acts xvi:19, etc., and we learn from Matt. xx:3 that not only were all kinds of produce offered for sale here, but hither resorted also the laborers to find employment. The market of an ancient Greek or Roman town occupied generally one side of an area, the other sides being occupied by public buildings, temples, courts, and offices of various kinds. Laws were promulgated here, judicial investigations were instituted; questions of philosophy and public interest were discussed; and all kinds of trade and business were carried on. It was frequented by business-men and by crowds of idlers and loungers. In a strictly Oriental city, such as Jerusalem, the market had not, like the forum, this character of being the center of all public life. Still, it was always a lively place, generally situated just within the gate, and the principal scene of trade and traffic.

MARRIAGE (mär'rīj), (Heb. נֶשִׂי, o-nawh').

(1) Divine Origin. The Divine origin of marriage, and the primitive state of the institution, are clearly recorded in the instance of the first human pair (Gen. ii:18-25), whence it appears that woman was made after man to be 'a helper suited to him.' The narrative is calculated to convey exalted ideas of the institution. It is introduced by a declaration of the Lord God, that 'it is not good that the man should be alone' (ver. 18); of the truth of which Adam had become convinced by experience. In order still further to enliven his sense of his deficiency, the various species of creatures are made to pass in review before him, 'to see what he would call them;' on which occasion he could behold each species accompanied by its appropriate helper, and upon concluding his task would become still more affectingly aware, that amid all animated nature 'there was not found an help meet for himself.' It was at this juncture, when his heart was thus thoroughly prepared to appreciate the intended blessing, that a Divine slumber (Sept. ἐκστασις, ech'-sta-sis) or trance, fell upon him—a state in which, as in after ages, the exercise of the external senses being suspended, the mental powers are peculiarly prepared to receive revelations from God (Gen. xv:12; Acts x:10; xxii:17; 2 Cor. xii:2). His exclamation when Eve was brought to him shows that he had been fully conscious of the circumstances of her creation, and had been instructed by them as to the nature of the relation which would thenceforth subsist between them. 'The man said, this time, it is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; this shall be called woman, for out of man was this taken' (New Translation by the Rev. D. A. De Sola, etc. Lond. p. 8). The remaining words, 'for this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they (two) shall be one flesh,' which might otherwise seem a proleptical announcement by the historian of the social obligations of marriage, are by our Lord ascribed to the Divine agent concerned in the transaction, either uttered by him personally, or by the mouth of Adam while in a state of inspiration. 'Have ye not read that he that made them at the beginning, made them male and female, and said, for this cause,' etc. (Matt. xix:4, 5).

(2) Monogamous. It is a highly important circumstance in this transaction that God created only one female for one man, and united them—a circumstance which is the very basis of our Lord's reasoning in the passage against divorce and remarriage; but which basis is lost, and his reasoning consequently rendered inconclusive, by the inattention of our translators to the absence of the article, 'he made them ἄρσεν και θήλυ,' a male and a female, 'and said, they shall become one flesh; so that they are no more two, but one flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.' 'The weight of our Lord's argument,' says Campbell, 'lay in this circumstance, that God at first created no more than a single pair, one of each sex, whom he united in the bond of marriage, and, in so doing, exhibited a standard of that union to all generations. The apostasy introduced a new feature into the institution, namely, the subjection of the wife's will to that of her husband (Gen. iii:16; comp. Num. xxx:6-16). The primitive model was adhered to even by Cain, who seems to have had but one wife (Gen. iv:17).

(3) Polygamy. Polygamy, one of the earliest developments of human degeneracy, was introduced by Lamech, who 'took unto him two wives' (Gen. iv:19). The intermarriage of 'the Sons of God,' i. e. the worshippers of the true God, with 'the daughters of men,' i. e. the irreligious, is the next incident in the history of marriage. They indulged in unrestrained polygamy, 'they took them wives of all that they chose.' From this event may be dated that headlong degeneracy of mankind at this period, which ultimately brought on them extirpation by a deluge (Gen. vi:3-7). At the time of that catastrophe Noah had but one wife (Gen. vii:7), and so each of his sons (ver. 13). Pursuing the investigation according to chronological arrangement, Job next appears (B. C. 2130) as the husband of one wife (Job ii:9; xix:17). Reference is made to the adulterer, who is represented as in terror and accursed (xxiv:15-18). The wicked man is represented as leaving 'widows' behind him; whence his polygamy may be inferred (xxvii:15). Job expresses his abhorrence of fornication (xxx:1), and of adultery (ver. 9), which appears in his time to have been punished by the judges (ver. 11). Following the same arrangement, we find Abraham and Nahor introduced as having each one wife (Gen. xi:29). From the narrative of Abraham's first equivocation concerning Sarah, it may be gathered that marriage was held sacred in Egypt. Abraham fears that the Egyptians would sooner rid themselves of him by murder than infringe by adultery the relation of wife even to an obscure stranger. The reproof of Pharaoh, 'Why didst thou say, She is my sister? so I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way' (Gen. xii:11-19), affords a most honorable testimony to the views of marriage entertained by Pharaoh at that period, and most likely by his court and nation. It seems that Sarah was Abraham's half-sister. Such marriages were permitted till the giving of the Law (Lev. xviii:9). Thus Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron, married his father's sister (Exod. vi:20), a union forbidden in Lev. xviii:12.

(4) Concubinage. The first mention of concubinage, or the condition of a legal though subordinate wife, occurs in the case of Hagar, Sarah's Egyptian handmaid, whom Sarah, still childless, after a residence of ten years in Canaan, prevailed on Abraham, apparently against his will, to receive into that relation (Gen. xvi:1), which was however considered inviolable (Gen. xlix:4; Lev. xviii:8; 2 Sam. iii:8, 16, 21, 22; 1 Chron. v:1). The vehement desire for offspring, common to women in the East, as appears from the histories of Rebecca (Gen. xxv:21), of Rachel (xxx:1), of Leah (ver. 5), and of Hannah (1 Sam. i:6, 7), seems to have been Sarah's motive for adopting a procedure practiced in such cases in that region in all ages. The miseries naturally consequent upon it are amply portrayed in the history of the Patriarchs (Gen. xvi:4-10; xxx:1, 3, 15).

Lot does not appear to have exceeded one wife (Gen. xix:15). The second equivocation of the same kind by Abraham respecting Sarah elicits equally honorable sentiments concerning marriage, on the part of Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gen. xx:5, 6, 9, 10, etc.), who, it appears, had but one proper wife (ver. 17; see also ch. xxvi:7-11). Perhaps Abraham relied on the ancient custom, which will shortly be adverted to, of the consent of the 'brother' being requisite to the sister's marriage, and thus hoped to secure his wife's safety and his own.

(5) Marriages, How Brought About. In ancient times the parents chose wives for their children (Gen. xxi:21; xxxviii:6; Deut. xxii:16); or the man who wished a particular female asked his father to obtain her from her father, as in the case of Shechem, B. C. 1732 (Gen. xxxiv:4-6; comp. Judg. xiv:2, 3). The consent of her brothers seems to have been necessary (verses 5, 8, 11, 13, 14; comp. Gen. xxiv:50; 2 Sam. xiii:20-29). A dowry was given by the suitor to the father and brethren of the female (verses 11, 12; comp. 1 Sam. xviii:25; Hos. iii:2). This, in a common case, amounted to from 30 to 50 shekels, according to the law of Moses (comp. Exod. xxii:16; Deut. xxii:29). Pausanias considers it so remarkable for a man to part with his daughter without receiving a marriage-portion for her, that he takes pains, in a case he mentions, to explain the reason (Lacon. iii:12, 2). In later times we meet with an exception (Tobit viii:23). It is most likely that from some time before the last-named period the Abrahamidæ restricted their marriages to circumcised persons (Gen. xxviii:8; comp. Judg. iii:6; 1 Kings xi:8, 11, 16; Joseph. Antiq. xi:8, 2; xii:4, 6; xviii:9, 5).

(6) Various Marriage Accompaniments, Etc. The marriage of Isaac develops additional particulars; for beside Abraham's unwillingness that his son should marry a Canaanitess (Gen. xxiv:3; comp. xxvi:34; xxvii:46; Exod. xxxiv:16; Josh. xxiii:12; Ezra ix:2; x:3, 10, 11), costly jewels are given to the bride at the betrothal

(ver. 22), and 'precious things to her mother and brother' (ver. 53); a customary period between espousals and nuptials is referred to (ver. 55); and the blessing of an abundant offspring invoked upon the bride by her relatives (ver. 60)—which most likely was the only marriage ceremony then and for ages afterwards (comp. Ruth iv:11-13; Ps. xlv:16, 17); but in Tobit vii:3, the father places his daughter's right hand in the hand of Tobias before he invokes this blessing. It is remarkable that no representation has been found of a marriage ceremony among the tombs of Egypt (Wilkinson's Ancient Egypt, vol. ii., Lond. 1837). The Rabbins say that among the Jews it consisted of a kiss (Cant. i:2). It is probable that the marriage covenant was committed to writing (Prov. ii:17; Mal. ii:14; Tobit vii:13, 14); perhaps, also, confirmed with an oath (Ezek. xvi:8). It seems to have been the custom with the patriarchs and ancient Jews to bury their wives in their own graves, but not their concubines (Gen. xlix:31). In Gen. xxv:1, Abraham, after the death of Sarah, marries a second wife. Esau's polygamy is mentioned in Gen. xxviii:9; xxxvi:2-13. Jacob serves seven years to obtain Rachel in marriage (Gen. xxix:18-20); and has a marriage feast, to which the men of the place are invited (ver. 22; comp. Cant. v:1; viii:33). Samson's marriage feast lasts a week, B. C. 1136 (Judg. xiv:10-12; comp. John ii:1, etc.); in later times it lasted longer (Tobit viii:19). The persons invited to Samson's marriage are young men (Judg. xiv:10); called 'sons of the bridal-chamber' (Matt. ix:15). Females were invited to marriages (Ps. xlv:14), and attended the bride and bridegroom to their abode (1 Macc. ix:37); and in the time of Christ, if it was evening, with lamps and flambeaux (Matt. xxv:1-10). In later ages the guests were summoned when the banquet was ready (Matt. xxii:3), and furnished with a marriage garment (ver. 11). The father of the bride conducted her at night to her husband (Gen. xxix:23; Tobit viii:1). The bride and bridegroom were richly ornamented (Is. lxi:10). In Mesopotamia, and the East generally, it was the custom to marry the eldest sister first (Gen. xxix:26). By the deception practiced upon Jacob in that country, he marries two wives, and, apparently, without any one objecting (ver. 31). Laban obtains a promise from Jacob not to marry any more wives than Rachel and Leah (Gen. xxxi:50). The wives and concubines of Jacob, and their children, travel together (Gen. xxxii:22, 23); but a distinction is made between them in the hour of danger (Gen. xxxiii:1, 2; comp. Gen. xxv:6).

(7) Details Regarding Marriages, Etc. It would seem, from the instance of Potiphar's wife, that monogamy was practiced in Egypt (Gen. xxxix:7). Pharaoh gave to Joseph one wife (Gen. xli:45). The Israelites, while in Egypt, seem to have restricted themselves to one. One case is recorded of an Israelitish woman who married an Egyptian man (Lev. xxiv:10). The giving of the law (B. C. 1491) acquaints us with many regulations concerning marriage, which were different from the practices of the Jews while in Egypt, and from those of the Canaanites, to whose land they were approaching (Lev. xviii:3). There we find laws for regulating the marriages of bondmen (Exod. xxi:3, 4), and of a bondmaid (verses 7-12). The prohibition against marriages with the Canaanites is established by a positive law (Deut. vii:3). Marriage is prohibited with any one near of kin, 'of the remainder of his flesh' (Lev. xviii:6-19). A priest is prohibited from marrying one that had been a harlot, or divorced (Lev. xxi:7). The high-priest was also excluded from marrying a widow, and restricted to one wife (verses 13, 14). Daughters who, through want of brothers, were heiresses to an estate were required to marry into their own tribe, and if possible, a kinsman, to prevent the estate passing into another family (Num. xxvii:1-11; xxxvi:1-12). The husband had power to annul his wife's vow, if he heard it, and interfered at the time (Num. xxx:6-16). If a man had betrothed a wife, he was exempt from the wars, etc. (Deut. xx:7; xxiv:5). It was allowed to marry a beautiful captive in war, whose husband probably had been killed (Deut. xxi:10-14, etc.). Abundance of offspring was one of the blessings promised to obedience, during the miraculous providence which superintended the Theocracy (Lev. xxvi:9; Deut. vii:13, 14; xxviii:11; Ps. cxxvii:3; cxxviii:3); and disappointment in marriage was one of the curses (Deut. xxviii:18, 30; comp. also Jer. vi:12; viii:10). A daughter of a distinguished person was offered in marriage as a reward for perilous services (Josh. xv:16, 17; 1 Sam. xvii:25). Concubinage appears in Israel, B. C. 1413. (Judg. xix:1-4). The violation of a concubine is avenged (Judg. xx:5-10). Polygamy (Judg. viii:30). The state of marriage among the Philistines may be inferred, in the time of Samson, from the sudden divorce from him of his wife by her father, and her being given to his friend (Judg. xiv:20), and from the father offering him a younger sister instead (Judg. xv:2). David's numerous wives (2 Sam. iii:3-5). In Ps. xlv., which is referred to this period by the best harmonists, there is a description of a royal marriage upon a most magnificent scale. The marriage of Solomon to Pharaoh's daughter is recorded in 1 Kings iii:1; to which the Song of Solomon probably relates, and from which it appears that his mother 'crowned him with a crown on the day of his espousals' (verses 3, 11; and see Sept. and Vulg. of Is. lxi:10). It would appear that in his time females were married young (Prov. ii:17; comp. Joel i:8); also males (Prov. v:18). An admirable description of a good wife is given in Prov. xxxi:10-31. The excessive multiplication of wives and concubines was the cause and effect of Solomon's apostasy in his old age (1 Kings xi:1-8). He confesses his error in Ecclesiastes, where he eulogizes monogamy (ix:9; ii:10). Rehoboam took a plurality of wives (2 Chron. xi:18-21); and so Abijah (2 Chron. xiii:21), and Ahab (1 Kings xx:3), and Belshazzar, king of Babylon (Dan. v:2). It would seem that the outward manners of the Jews, about the time of our Lord's advent, had become improved, since there is no case recorded in the New Testament of polygamy or concubinage among them.

MARRIAGE, CHRISTIAN (mār'rij, krīs'-chan).

(1) Our Lord excludes all causes of divorce, except adultery (Matt. v:32), and ascribes the origin of the Mosaic law to the hardness of their hearts. The same doctrine concerning divorce had been taught by the prophets (Jer. iii:1; Micah ii:9; Mal. ii:14-16).

(2) The apostles inculcate the sacredness of marriage (Rom. vii:3; 1 Cor. vii:4, 10, 11, 39); yet St. Paul considers obstinate desertion by an unbelieving party as a release (1 Cor. vii:15).

(3) Our Lord does not reprehend celibacy for the sake of religion, 'those who make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake' (Matt. xix:12; comp. 1 Cor. vii:32, 36).

(4) Second marriages not condemned in case of death (1 Cor. vii:39).

(5) Mixed marriages disapproved (Deut. vii:3; 2 Cor. vi:14).

(6) Early marriage not recommended (1 Cor. vii:36). J. F. D.

Figurative. Both in the Old Testament and in the New Testament the betrothal, marriage feast, and marriage have given rise to numerous allegorical and typical allusions, the relation between Jehovah and his chosen people being the point of comparison in the Old Testament (Is. liv:5; Jer. iii:14; Hos. ii:19, etc.); that of Christ and his Church in the New Testament (Matt. ix:15; John iii:29; 2 Cor. xi:2; Rev. xix:7).

MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE (mār'rij lev'ī-rāt), the marriage of a childless widow to her husband's brother or nearest of kin, according to ancient Israelitish law.

Judah, Jacob's son by Leah, had married a Canaanitish woman (Gen. xxxviii:2). His first-born son was Er (ver. 3). Judah took a wife for him (ver. 6). Er soon after died (ver. 7), and Judah said to Onan, 'Go in unto thy brother's wife, Tamar, and marry her, and raise up seed to thy brother.' 'Onan knew that the offspring would not be his.' All these circumstances bespeak a pre-established and well-known law, and he evaded the purpose of it, and thereby, it is said, incurred the wrath of God (ver. 10). It seems from the same account, to have been well understood, that upon his death the duty devolved upon the next surviving brother. No change is recorded in this law till just before the entrance of Israel into Canaan (B. C. 1451), at which time Moses modified it by new regulations to this effect:—'If brethren dwell together (i. e. in the same locality), and one of them die, and leave no child, the wife of the dead must not marry out of the family, but her husband's brother or his next kinsman must take her to wife, and perform the duty of a husband's brother, and the firstborn of this union shall succeed in the name of his deceased father, that his name may be extant in Israel;' not literally bear his name, for Ruth allowed her son by Boaz to be called Obed, and not Mahlon, the name of her first husband (Ruth iv:17, yet see Josephus, Antiq., iv. 8, 23). In case the man declined the office, the woman was to bring him before the elders, loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in, or, as some render it, before his face, by way of contempt (Deut. xxv:9, 10; Josephus understands in the face, Antiq. v. 9. 4), and shall say, 'So shall it be done unto the man that will not build up his brother's house; and his name shall be called in Israel, the house of him that hath his shoe loosed.' It does not appear that the original law was binding on the brother, if already married; and we may well believe that Moses, who wished to mitigate it, allowed of that exception. The instance of Ruth, who married Boaz, her husband's relation, exhibits the practice of the law under the Judges. Boaz was neither the father of, nor the nearest relation to, Elimelech, father-in-law to Ruth, the wife of Mahlon, and yet he married her after the refusal of him who was the nearest relation (Ruth ii:20; iii, iv).

MARRIAGE PROCESSIONS. The procession accompanying the bride from the house of her father to that of the bridegroom was generally one of great pomp, according to the circumstances of the married couple; and for this they often chose the night. Hence, in the parable of the ten virgins that went to meet the bride and bridegroom (Matt. xxv) it is said the virgins were asleep; and at midnight, being awaked at the cry of the bridegroom's coming, the foolish virgins found they had no oil to supply their lamps; and while they went to buy, the bridegroom and his attendants passed by.

Mr. Taylor has collected very copious information relative to the marriage processions among the Oriental people, in Fragments, 49, 557, and 674. Many of the circumstances attending these will be found to contribute aid in the elucidation of two or three passages of Scripture, but their value would not justify us in appropriating to them the space they would occupy. "At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago," says Mr. Ward, (View of Hist. of Hindoos, vol. iii. p. 171, 172.) "the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, 'Behold! the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.' All the persons employed nowlighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands, to fill up their stations in the procession; some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut, and guarded by sepoys. I and others expostulated with the doorkeepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable as at this moment:—and the door was shut."

In the beautiful parable of our Lord, there are ten virgins, who took their lamps, and went in a company to meet the bridegroom. Five of them were wise, endued with prudence and discretion; the other five were foolish, thoughtless and inconsiderate. The thoughtless took their lamps, but were so foolish as to take only a little oil in them to serve the present occasion. But the prudent, mindful of futurity, and knowing that the coming of the bridegroom was uncertain, as well as filling their lamps, prudently took a quantity of oil in their vessels to supply them, that they might be ready to go forth at a moment's warning. Having waited long for the bridegroom, and he not appearing, they all, tired with long watching, and fatigued with tedious expectation, were overcome with sleep, and sunk into profound repose. But lo, at midnight they were suddenly alarmed with a cry "The bridegroom, the bridegroom cometh! Hasten to meet and congratulate him." Roused with this sudden proclamation, they all got up and trimmed their lamps. But the oil in those that belonged to the foolish virgins, being consumed, they were in the utmost confusion when they found them gone out; and having nothing in their vessels to fill them with, they began to see their mistake. In this extremity they entreated their companions to impart to them some of their oil, telling them that their lamps were gone out. To these entreaties the prudent answered, that they had only provided a sufficient quantity for their own use, and therefore advised them to go and purchase oil of those who sold it. They departed accordingly, but while absent on this errand, the bridegroom came, and the prudent virgins, being prepared for his reception, went along with him to the nuptial entertainment, and the door was shut. After some time the others returned, and, knocking loud, supplicated earnestly for admission. But the bridegroom repulsed them, telling them, Ye pretended to be my friends, and to do me honor on this occasion; but ye have not acted as friends, for which reason I know you not; I do not acknowledge you as my friends, and will not admit strangers.

From another parable, in which a great king is represented as making a most magnificent entertainment at the marriage of his son (Matt. xxii), we learn that all the guests who were honored with an invitation were expected to be dressed in a manner suitable to the splendor of such an occasion, as a token of just respect to the newly-married couple; and that after the procession, in the evening, from the bride's house was concluded, the guests, before they were admitted into the hall where the entertainment was served up, were taken into an apartment and viewed, that it might be known if any stranger had intruded, or if any of the company were appareled in raiment unsuitable to the genial solemnity they were going to celebrate; and such, if found, were expelled from the house with every mark of ignominy and disgrace. From the knowledge of this custom the following passage receives great light and luster. When the king came in to see the guests, he discovered among them a person who had not on a wedding garment. He called him and said, Friend, how came you to intrude into my palace in a dress so unsuitable to this occasion? The man was struck dumb; he had no apology to offer for this disrespectful neglect. The king then called to his servants, and bade them bind him hand and foot, to drag him out of the room, and thrust him out into the midnight darkness. Harwood.

MARROW (mär'rō), (Heb. מֵרֹךְ, mo'akh, Job xxi:24; מֵרֹחַ, maru-kharu', to mix with marrow, Is. xxv:6; Gr. μωδός, moo-el-os', Heb. iv:12; כֶּחֶלֶב, khek'leb, Ps. lxxiii:5, the richest or choice part, and שִׁקְוֹ, shik-koo'ee, Prov. iii:8, moisture).

Marrow is a soft, oleaginous, and very nourishing substance, contained in the hollow of some animal bones, and which strengthens them, and promotes their healing when broken.

Figurative. To "marrow" are compared, (1) The most secret dispositions, thoughts, designs, and desires of our soul (Heb. iv:12). (2) Christ and his fulness of righteousness, grace, and glory, and all the fulness of God in him, which are the delightful nourishment and strength of churches, saints, and their holy dispositions (Ps. lxxiii:5; Is. xxv:6). (3) The fear of the Lord, and departing from evil, which greatly promote the health and true welfare of both soul and body (Prov. iii:8). Brown.

MARSENA (mär'se-na), (Heb. מַרְסֵנָא, mar-sen-aw', worthy), a satrap, or governor of Xerxes (Esth. i:14), B. C. 483.

MARSH (märsh), (Heb. גִּבְעָה, geh'bek, a reservoir, Ezek. xlvii:11), a swamp or wet piece of land. The place referred to by Ezekiel is the "Valley of Salt," near the Dead Sea; for there the Kidron, the course of which the prophet describes the holy waters as following, empties. (Barnes, Peop. Bib. Dict.)

MARS' HILL (märz hīl), (Gr. Ἀρειος πάγος, ar-ios pag'os, Acts xvii:22). See AREOPAGUS.

MART (märt), (Heb. מַרְתָּ, saw-khar', to go about as a merchant, Is. xxiii:3. See Prov. iii:14; Is. xlv:14), a trading place or emporium.

Delitzsch says the word cannot have this meaning. (Com. in loco.)

MARTHA (mär'thà), (Gr. Μάρθα, mar'tha; Heb. מַרְתָּה, mar'thaw, perhaps lady), sister of Lazarus and Mary, who resided in the same house with them at Bethany. (See LAZARUS.)

From the house at Bethany being called 'her house,' in Luke x:38, and from the leading part which Martha is always seen to take in domestic matters, it has seemed to some that she was a widow, to whom the house at Bethany belonged, and with whom her brother and sister lodged; but this is uncertain, and the common opinion, that the sisters managed the household of their brother, is more probable. Luke probably calls it her house because he had no occasion to mention, and does not mention, Lazarus; and when we speak of a house which is occupied by different persons, we avoid circumlocution by calling it the house of the individual who happens to be the subject of our discourse. Jesus was intimate with this family, and their house was often his home when at Jerusalem, being accustomed to retire thither in the evening, after having spent the day in the city. The point which the Evangelists bring out most distinctly with respect to Martha, lies in the contrariety of disposition between her and her sister Mary. The first notice of Christ's visiting this family occurs in Luke x:38-42. He was received with great attention by the sisters; and Martha soon hastened to provide suitable entertainment for the Lord and his followers, while Mary remained in his presence, sitting at his feet, and drinking in the sacred words that fell from his lips. The active, bustling solicitude of Martha, anxious that the best things in the house should be made subservient to the Master's use and solace, and the quiet earnestness of Mary, more desirous to profit by the golden opportunity of hearing his instructions, than to minister to his personal wants, strongly mark the points of contrast in the characters of the two sisters. The part taken by the sisters in the transactions connected with the death and resurrection of Lazarus, is entirely and beautifully in accordance with their previous history. Martha is still more engrossed with outward things, while Mary surrenders herself more to her feelings, and to inward meditation. When they heard that Jesus was approaching, Martha hastened beyond the village to meet him, 'but Mary sat still in the house' (John xi:20, 22). When Martha saw Jesus actually appear, whose presence had been so anxiously desired, she exhibits a strong degree of faith, and hesitates not to express a confident hope that he, to whom all things were possible, would even yet afford relief. But, as is usual with persons of her lively character, when Christ answered, with what seemed to her a vague intimation, 'Thy brother shall rise again,' she was instantly cast down from her height of confidence, the reply being less direct than she expected; she referred this saying to the general resurrection at the last day, and thereon relapsed into despondency and grief. This feeling Jesus reproved, by directing her attention, before all other things, to that inward, eternal, and Divine life, which consists in union with him, and which is raised far above the power even of the grave. This he did in the magnificent words, 'I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?' Sorrow and shame permitted the troubled Martha, in whose heart the feeling of an unconditional and entire surrender to his will was re-awakened, to make only the general confession that he was actually the promised Messiah; in which confession she, however, comprised an acknowledgment of his power and greatness. It is clear, however, that she found nothing in this discourse with Christ, to encourage her first expectation of relief. With the usual rapid change in persons of lively susceptibilities, she had now as completely abandoned all hope of rescue for her brother, as she had before been sanguine of his restoration to life. Thus, when Jesus directed the stone to be rolled away from the sepulcher, she gathered from this no ground of hope; but rather objected to its being done, because the body, which had been four days in the tomb, must already have become disagreeable. The reproof of Christ, 'Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God?' suggests that more discourse had passed between them than the Evangelist has recorded, seeing that no such assurance is contained in the previous narrative (John xi:39, 40).

Nothing more is recorded of Martha, save that some time after, at a supper given to Christ and his disciples at Bethany, she, as usual, busied herself in the external service. Lazarus, so marvelously restored from the grave, sat with her guests at table. 'Martha served,' and Mary occupied her favorite station at the feet of Jesus, which she bathed with her tears, and anointed with costly ointment (John xii:1, 2). (See LAZARUS; MARY, 4.)

Character. There are few characters in the New Testament, and certainly no female character, so strongly brought out in its natural points as that of Martha; and it is interesting to observe that Luke and John, although relating different transactions in which she was concerned, perfectly agree in the traits of character which they assign to her. Tholuck has skillfully followed out its development in his Commentary on the eleventh chapter of St. John. See also Niemeyer, Charakt. i. 66; and Hall's Contemplations, vol. iii., b. 4. Contemp., 17, 23, 24.

MARTYR (mār'tēr), (Gr. μάρτυς, mar'toos, a witness).

This word means properly a witness, and is applied in the New Testament—(1) To judicial witnesses (Matt. xviii:16; xxvi:65; Mark xiv:63; Acts vi:13; vii:58; 2 Cor. xiii:1; 1 Tim. v:19; Heb. x:28). The Septuagint also uses it for the Hebrew מֵעֵד ed, in Deut. xvii:6; Prov. xxiv:28. (2) To one who has testified, or can testify to the truth of what he has seen, heard, or known. This is a frequent sense in the New Testament: as in Luke xxiv:48; Acts i:8, 22;

Rom. i:9; 2 Cor. i:23; 1 Thess. ii:5, 10; 1 Tim. vi:12; 2 Tim. ii:2; 1 Pet. v:1; Rev. i:5; iii:14; xi:3, and elsewhere. (3) The meaning of the word which has now become the most usual, is that in which it occurs most rarely in the Scripture, i. e., one who by his death bears witness to the truth. In this sense we find it only in Acts xxii:20; Rev. ii:13; xvii:6. This now exclusive sense of the word was brought into general use by the early ecclesiastical writers, who applied it to every one who suffered death in the Christian cause (see Suicer, Thesaurus Eccles. sub voc.). Stephen was in this sense the first martyr (see STEPHEN); and the spiritual honors of his death tended in no small degree to raise to the most extravagant estimation, in the early church, the value of the testimony of blood. Eventually a martyr's death was supposed, on the alleged authority of the under-named texts, to cancel all the sins of the past life (Luke xii:50; Mark x:39); to supply the place of baptism (Matt. x:39); and at once to secure admittance to the presence of the Lord in Paradise (Matt. v:10-12). In imitation of the family custom of annually commemorating at the grave the death of deceased members, the churches celebrated the deaths of their martyrs by prayer at their graves, and by love-feasts. From this high estimation of the martyrs, Christians were sometimes led to deliver themselves up voluntarily to the public authorities—thus justifying the charge of fanaticism brought against them by the heathen. For the most part, however, this practice was discountenanced, the words of Christ himself being brought against it (Matt. x:23; see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. i. 109, 110).

MARVEL (mār'vel), (Heb. מֵרָעָה, paw-law', to separate, to distinguish).

The word means: 1. To be struck with surprise at the sight or thought of anything strange and uncommon (Jer. iv:9).

2. To exercise a reverential regard to; or with wonder to adore and serve (Rev. xiii:13).

MARVELS OR WONDERS. 1. Things strange and astonishing, as the more rare appearances of nature (Ps. cvii:24); or the miracles which God wrought in delivering Israel out of Egypt (Ps. cv:27).

2. A token or sign; thus Isaiah was a "wonder" in Egypt and Ethiopia, as his walking without his upper robe, and barefoot, was a presage of calamities to these countries (Is. xx:3). (See MIRACLES.)

MARY (mā'ry), (Heb. מַרְיָם, meer-yawm', rebellion; Gr. Μαρία, ma-ree'a, or Μαρίας, ma-ree-am').

1. The Mother of Jesus. 'The Mother of Jesus' (Acts i:14), and 'Mary his Mother' (Matt. ii:11), are the appellations of one who has in later times been generally called the 'Virgin Mary,' but who is never so designated in Scripture. Little is known of this 'highly favored' individual, in whom was fulfilled the first prophecy made to man, that 'the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head' (Gen. iii:15). As her history was of no consequence to Christianity, it is not given at large. Her genealogy is recorded by St. Luke (ch. iii.), in order to prove the truth of the predictions which had foretold the descent of the Messiah from Adam through Abraham and David, with the design evidently of showing, that Christ was of that royal house and lineage (comp. Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 589, sq.).

Eusebius, the early ecclesiastical historian, although unusually lengthy upon 'the name Jesus,' and the genealogies in Matthew and Luke's Gospels, throws no new light upon Mary's birth and parentage. The legends respecting Anne, who is said to have been her mother, are pure fables without the slightest evidence.

(1) The Annunciation. The earliest event in her history, of which we have any notice, was the annunciation to her by the angel Gabriel that she was destined, whilst yet a pure virgin, to become the mother of the Messiah—an event which was a literal fulfilment of the prophecy given centuries before by Isaiah, that 'a virgin should conceive, and bear a son, and should call his name Immanuel,' which being interpreted, is 'God with us' (Is. vii:14; Matt. i:23). On this occasion she was explicitly informed that she should conceive by the miraculous power of God, and that her child should be 'Holy,' and be called 'the Son of God.' As a confirmation of her faith in this announcement she was also told by the angel that her cousin Elisabeth, who was the wife of one of the chief priests, and who was now far advanced in years, had conceived a son, and that the time was not far off when her reproach among women should cease (Luke i:36).

(2) Visit to Elisabeth. Almost immediately on receiving this announcement Mary hastened from Nazareth, where she was when the angel visited her, to the house of her cousin, who was then residing in the hilly district in 'a city of Judah,' supposed to be Hebron. The meeting of these two pious females, on whom such unexpected privileges had been conferred, was one of mutual congratulations, and united thanksgiving to the Author of their blessings. It was on this occasion that Mary uttered the Magnificat—that splendid burst of grateful adoration which Christians of all parties have from the earliest times delighted to adopt as expressive of the best feelings of the pious heart towards God (Luke i:39-56). After spending three months with her relative, Mary returned to Nazareth, where a severe trial awaited her, arising out of the condition in which it had now become apparent she was.

(3) Betrothed to Joseph. Betrothed (perhaps in early life) to a person of the name of Joseph, an artificer of some sort (Matt. xiii:55), probably, as our translators suppose, a carpenter, the Jewish law held her exposed to the same penalties which awaited the married wife who should be found unfaithful to the spousal vow. Joseph, however, being a right-hearted man ('one who feels and acts as a man ought to do in the circumstances in which he is placed'), was unwilling to subject her to the evils of a public exposure of what he deemed her infidelity; and accordingly was turning in his mind how he might privately dissolve his connection with her, when an angel was sent to him also to inform him in a dream of the true state of the case, and enjoin upon him to complete his engagement with her by taking her as his wife. This injunction he obeyed, and hence came to be regarded by the Jews as the father of Jesus (Matt. i:18-25).

(4) Census of the People. Summoned by an edict of Augustus, which commanded that a census of the population of the whole Roman empire should be taken, and that each person should be enrolled in the chief city of his family or tribe, Mary and her husband went up to Bethlehem, the city of the Davidic family; and whilst there the child Jesus was born.

(5) Subsequent History. After this event the only circumstances in her history mentioned by the sacred historians are her appearance and offerings in the temple according to the law of Moses (Luke i:22, sq.); her return with her husband to Nazareth (Luke ii:39); their habit of annually visiting Jerusalem at the Feast of the Passover (verse 41); the appearance of the Magi, which seems to have occurred at one of these periodic visits (Matt. ii:1-12); the flight of the holy family into Egypt, and their return, after the death of Herod, to Nazareth (verses 13-23); the scene which occurred on another of those periodic visits, when, after having proceeded two days' journey on her way homeward, she discovered that her son was not in the company, and, on returning to Jerusalem, found him sitting in the temple with the doctors of the law, 'both hearing them and asking them questions' (Luke ii:42-52); her appearance and conduct at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee (John ii:1, sq.); her attempt in the synagogue at Capernaum to induce Jesus to desist from teaching (Matt. xii:46, sq.); her accompanying of her son when he went up to Jerusalem immediately before his crucifixion; her following him to Calvary; her being consigned by him while hanging on the cross to the care of his beloved apostle John, who from that time took her to reside in his house (John xix:25, sq.); and her associating with the disciples at Jerusalem after his ascension (Acts i:14).

(6) Traditions of Death, Etc. The traditions respecting the death of Mary differ materially from each other. There is a letter of the General Council of Ephesus in the fifth century, which states that she lived at Ephesus with St. John, and there died and was buried. Another epistle of the same age says she died at Jerusalem, and was buried in Gethsemane. The legend tells that three days after her interment, when the grave was opened (that Thomas the apostle might pay reverence to her remains), her body was not to be found, 'but only an exceeding fragrance,' whereupon it was concluded that it had been taken up to heaven. The translations of Enoch and Elijah, and the ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ, took place while they were alive, and the facts are recorded by the inspiration of God; but when the dead body of Mary was conveyed through the earth, and removed thence there were no witnesses, and no revelation was ever made of the extraordinary and novel incident, which certainly has no parallel in Scripture. This miraculous event is appropriately called 'the Assumption.'

It is said that Mary died in A. D. 63. The Canon of Scripture was closed in A. D. 96, thirty-three years after her decease; which, however, is never alluded to by any of the apostles in their writings, nor by St. John, to whose care she was entrusted.

In the Roman Catholic church many facts are believed and doctrines asserted concerning the Virgin Mary, which not only are without any authority from Scripture, but many of which are diametrically opposed to its declarations.

It does not appear that Mary ever saw Christ after the resurrection; for she was not one of the 'chosen witnesses' specified in Scripture, as Mary Magdalene was. S. D.

(7) Character. "Her faith and humility exhibit themselves in her immediate surrender of herself to the Divine will, though ignorant how that was to be accomplished (Luke i:38); her energy and earnestness in her journey from Nazareth to Hebron (verse 39); her happy thankfulness in her song of joy (verse 48); her silent, musing thoughtfulness in her pondering over the shepherds' visit (ii:19), and in her keeping her Son's words in her heart (verse 51), though she could not fully understand their import. In a word, so far as Mary is portrayed to us in Scripture, she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient and loving of women, but a woman still" (Smith, Dict.).

(8) Literature. Mrs. Jameson, Legends of the Madonna (Lond. 1852); Jones, On the New Testament, vol. ii, cc. xiii, xv; Wilberforce, Rome—Her New Dogma, etc. (Oxford, 1855).

2. Mary Magdalene. (mā'ry mäg'da-lēne), (Gr. Μαγδαληνή, mag-dal-ay-nay'), probably so called from Magdala in Galilee, the town where she is supposed to have dwelt. According to the Talmudists, Magdalene signifies 'a plaiter of hair.'

(1) Name. Much wrong has been done to this individual from imagining that she was the person spoken of by St. Luke in ch. vii:39; but there is no evidence to support this opinion. There were two occasions on which Christ was anointed. The first is thus recorded in John xii:1, 3: 'Six days before the Passover Jesus came to Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead. There they made him a supper; and Martha served. Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair.' This Mary was certainly the sister of Martha. The second instance occurred in the house of Simon, 'And, behold, a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment' (Luke vii:37). How Mary Magdalene came to be identified with the person here mentioned, it is difficult to say; but such is the case and accordingly she is generally regarded as having been a woman of depraved character. For such an inference, however, there appears to be no just ground whatever.

(2) Personal History. The earliest notice of Mary Magdalene is in St. Luke's Gospel (viii:2), where it is recorded that out of her 'had gone seven devils,' and that she was 'with Joanna, the wife of Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, which ministered unto Christ of their substance.'

This is sufficient to prove that she had not been known as a person of bad character; and it also implies that she was not poor, or amongst the lower classes, when she was the companion of one whose husband held an important office in the king's household.

It is as unjust to say that she who had been so physically wretched as to be possessed by seven devils was dissolute, as to affirm that an insane person is necessarily depraved. In the Savior's last hours, and at his death and resurrection, Mary Magdalene was a chief and important witness. There had followed him from Galilee many women (Matt. xxvii:55, 56), and there stood by the cross several, of whom Mary Magdalene was one; and, after his death, she 'and Mary the mother of Jesus beheld where the body was laid' (Mark xv:47; Luke xxiii:55, 56); 'and they returned and prepared spices and ointments.' 'The first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulcher, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulcher' (John xx:1).

Then she returned to tell Peter and John that the stone was removed. Peter immediately ran to the place with the other disciple, when they saw only the napkin and linen clothes lying; and 'the disciples went away again unto their own homes' (John xx:2-11). But she 'who was last at the cross and first at the tomb' 'stood at the sepulcher weeping,' and saw two angels, who said to her, 'Woman, why weepest thou? She saith, because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' Her patient waiting was rewarded, for she had scarcely ceased speaking when Jesus himself asked her the same question, and as soon as he said 'Mary,' she turned herself, and then, seeing who it was, said unto him, 'Rabboni,' and at once acknowledged his risen person; when he not only assured her of his resurrection, but also announced his intended ascension (John xx:17). Mary Magdalene then returned and told these things to the apostles (Luke xxiv:10, 11), 'and her words seemed to them as idle tales,' 'and they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed her not' (Mark xvi:10). On every occasion Christ selected the most fit and proper persons, and on this, his first appearance from the dead, he chose Mary Magdalene to be the only witness of his resurrection; and to other women had been also vouchsafed the vision of angels (Luke xxiv:10). These persons, with the acute perception of their sex, receiving distinct evidence without captious disbelief, at once saw, believed, and 'worshiped' their risen Lord (Matt. xxviii:9); whilst the men who had been his daily companions during the whole time of his public ministry, and had heard 'the gracious words which fell from his lips,' entirely refused the testimony of eye-witnesses, to whom, 'by infallible proofs, he had shown himself alive,' and remained unconvinced until 'Jesus stood in the midst of them,' and 'showed them his hands and his feet' (Luke xxiv:36, 40); and even then 'they believed not for joy.'

But the faith of Mary Magdalene is 'in everlasting remembrance,' inasmuch as, when others were 'fools and slow of heart to believe,' she, with less evidence than they possessed, at once acknowledged that 'Christ is risen from the dead, and is become the first-fruits of them that slept,' and to her was granted the honor of being the first witness of that great event, the Resurrection, without which Christ would have died in vain (1 Cor. xv.). S. P.

"Nothing is really known to us of the subsequent history of the Magdalene. The Greek Church believed that she died at Ephesus, whither she had followed St. John, and that her relics were removed from thence to Constantinople by the Emperor Leo VI. The story, however, which took root in the West was very different. It was said that she belonged to a wealthy family possessed of great estates at Magdala and Bethany; that she abused all her admirable gifts to tempt others to sin; that after the Ascension she remained at Bethany till the disciples were scattered by the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen. She and her sister with others were placed in a boat by their persecutors, and were providentially carried without oars or sails to Massilia, where, by their preaching and miracles, they converted the heathen, and Lazarus was made bishop, while Mary retired to the wilderness and lived a life of extreme asceticism for thirty years. Finally, she was carried up to heaven in the arms of ascending angels." (J. B. Mayor, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

3. Mary, Wife of Cleophas or Alphæus, and sister of the Lord's mother (Matt. xxvii:56; Mark xv:40; John xix:25). This Mary was one of those holy women who followed Christ, and was present at the crucifixion; and she is that 'other Mary' who, with Mary Magdalene, attended the body of Christ to the sepulcher when taken down from the cross (Matt. xxvii:61; Mark xv:47; Luke xxiii:55). She was also among those who went on the morning of the first day of the week to the sepulcher to anoint the body, and who became the first witnesses of the resurrection (Matt. xxviii:1; Mark xvi:1; Luke xxiv:1). James, Joses, Jude, and Simon, who are called the Lord's brethren (see the names; also ALPHÆUS; BROTHER, 11), are very generally supposed to have been the sons of this Mary, and therefore cousins of Jesus, the term brother having been used with great latitude among the Hebrews. This is the usual alternative of those who deny that these persons were sons of our Lord's mother by her husband Joseph; although some imagine that they may have been sons of Joseph by a former wife. The fact seems to be this: Christ had four 'brethren' called James, Joses, Simon, and Jude; he had also three apostles called James, Simon, and Jude, who were his cousins, being sons of Alphæus and this Mary; and it is certainly very difficult to resist the conclusion that the three cousins and apostles are to be regarded as the same with those three of the four 'brethren' who bore the same names.

4. The Sister of Lazarus and Martha. The friendship of our Lord for this family has been explained in other articles. (See LAZARUS; MARTHA.) The points of interest in connection with Mary individually arise from the contrast of character between her and her sister Martha, and from the incidents by which that contrast was evinced. Apart from this view, the most signal incident in the history of Mary is her conduct at the supper which was given to Jesus in Bethany, when he came thither after having raised Lazarus from the dead. The intense love which distinguished her character then glowed with the highest fervor, manifesting the depth of her emotion and gratitude for the deliverance from the cold terrors of the grave of that brother who now sat alive and cheerful with the guests at table. She took the station she best loved, at the feet of Jesus. Among the ancients it was usual to wash the feet of guests before an entertainment, and with this the anointing of the feet was frequently connected. (See ANOINTING.) Mary possessed a large quantity of very costly ointment; and in order to testify her gratitude she sacrificed it all by anointing with it the feet of Jesus. We are told that the disciples murmured at the extravagance of this act, deeming that it would have been much wiser, if she had sold the ointment and given the money to the poor. But Jesus, looking beyond the mere external act to the disposition which gave birth to it—a disposition which marked the intensity of her gratitude—vindicated her deed. Always meditating upon his departure, and more especially at that moment, when it was so near at hand, he attributed to this act a still higher sense—as having reference to his approaching death. The dead were embalmed: and so, he said, have I received, by anticipation, the consecration of death (John xii:1-8; Matt. xxvi:6-13; Mark xiv:3-9).

5. The Mother of John, Surnamed Mark, had a house in Jerusalem, to which it is thought the apostles retired after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost.

This house was on mount Sion, and Epiphanius says, it escaped the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and was changed into a very famous church, which continued several ages. After the imprisonment of Peter, the faithful were assembled in this house, praying, when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the gate (Acts xii:5, 12). From Col. iv:10 we learn that she was sister to Barnabas, and they apparently gave up their land and house for the good of the church (Acts iv:37; xii:12).

6. A Christian woman at Rome greeted by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi:6). There is no further notice of her than that she had treated St. Paul with great kindness. (See Jowett, The Epistles of St. Paul.)

MASCHIL (mäs'khil), (Heb. מַשְׁכִּיל, mas-keel', titles of Ps. xxxii, xlii, xlv, xlv, lii, liii, liv, lv, lxxiv, lxxviii, lxxxviii, lxxxix, cxlii), probably implies a poem or song enforcing intelligence, wisdom, piety.

MASH (mäsh), (Heb. מַשׁ, mesh, meaning unknown), the fourth son of Aram (Gen. x:23), erroneously called Meshech in 1 Chron. i:17. Bochart believes he inhabited Mount Masius in Mesopotamia, and gave his name to the river Mazecha, whose source is there. (B. C. 2513.)

"A name corresponding with Mash is found in Assyrian inscriptions, especially the cylinder of Assur-bani-pal, who, in describing his Arabian campaign, says he marched through the desert of Mash, 'a place of thirst and fainting, whither comes no bird of the heaven, neither do asses nor gazelles feed there.' (S. A. Smith, i, pp. 67, 68; Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

MASHAL (mä'shal), (Heb. מַשָּׁל, maw-shawl', depressed, 1 Chron. vi:74). See MISHAL.

MASON (mä's'n), (Heb. מַשְׁרָף, khaw-rash').

The Egyptians were skilled in stone-work, and the Hebrews probably brought much of their knowledge from there. From 2 Sam. v:11 it has been inferred that the Hebrews were not so skilled in masonry as the Tyrians (1 Kings vi:7; vii:10). Later the Hebrews erected walls, fortresses, arches, etc. (2 Chron. xxxiii:14; Ezra iii:10); (comp. 2 Sam. v:11; 2 Kings xii:12; xxii:6; 1 Chron. xiv:1; xxii:2; 2 Chron. xxiv:12; Ezra iii:7.)

MASREKAH (mäs-rē'kah), (Heb. מַשְׁרַעַה, mas-ray-kaw', vineyard), a city in Idumæa, and the native place of Samlah, an Edomitish king (Gen. xxxvi:36; 1 Chron. i:47).

The name signifies place or plantation of vines. Site not identified.

MASSA (mäs'sä), (Heb. מַסָּא, mas-saw', burden).

A son of Ishmael, who became the founder of a tribe by the same name (Gen. xxv:14; 1 Chron. i:30). This tribe is usually identified with the Masani, on the eastern side of the Arabian desert, near the borders of Babylon.

MASSAH (mäs'sah), (Heb. מַסָּה, mas-saw', trial, temptation), a name given to the place where the Israelites murmured for want of water and tempted Jehovah (Exod. xvii:7; Deut. vi:16; ix:22; xxxiii:8); called also MERIBAH (which see).

The Arabs point to a rock called Hesy el-Hattätin, in the arid northwestern part of the Wady Feiran, as the one struck by Moses at 'Massah' (Palmer, Desert of Exodus, 159). (See MERIBAH; REPHIDIM.)

MAST (mäst). See SHIP.

MASTER (mās'tēr). The rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Bah'al (Heb. בַּח'אֵל, owner), master in the prevalent sense, e. g., "the master of the house" (Exod. xxii:8; Judg. xix:23).

2. Aw-done' (Heb. אֲדוֹנָי; Gr. κύριος, koo'ree-os), properly lord, and usually so rendered.

3. Oor (Heb. עָרַב, to wake), only so rendered in Mal. ii:12, "the master and the scholar;" marg. "him that waketh and him that answereth."

4. Rab (Heb. רַב, abundant, and so great), great or chief (Dan. i:3).

5. Sar (Heb. שָׂר, a head person), used only with reference to CHENANIAH, "the master of the song" (1 Chron. xv:27); Greek (ἐπιστάτης, ep-is-tat'ace, Luke v:5; viii:24, 45; xviii:13). (See CHENANIAH.)

6. "Master" is the translation of the Gr. κυβερνήτης, koo-ber-nay'tace (Acts xxvii:11), a sailing master; rendered "shipmaster" in Rev. xviii:17.

7. Did-as'kal-os (Gr. διδάσκαλος, "master"), in the sense of instructor, was often used of Christ, both by his disciples and others.

8. Oy-kod-es-pot'ace (Gr. οἰκοδεσπότης, "master of the house"), the head of the family (Matt. x:25; Luke xiii:25; xiv:21).

9. Ep-is-tat'ace (Gr. ἐπιστάτης, appointed over), is used of any kind of overseer or superintendent. It is termed RABBI by the disciples when addressing Jesus (Luke v:5; viii:24, 25; ix:33, 49; xvii:13). (See RABBI.)

10. Kath-ayg-ay-tace' (Gr. καθ'ἡγήτης, "one is your master," Matt. xxiii:8, 10). Here "master" is used of a leader in the scholastic sense, i. e., a teacher. (Barnes' Bib. Dict.; Strong's Concordance.)

11. Des-pot'ace (Gr. δεσπότης), a despot or sovereign master (1 Tim. vi:1, 2; Titus ii:9; 1 Peter ii:18).

12. Koo'ree-os (Gr. Κύριος, Master, Lord, and Sir). No man can serve two masters (Matt. vi:24; Mark xiii:35; Acts xvi:16; Rom. xiv:4).

Master, then, in general, is one who rules or teaches. It is a title applied (1) to Jesus Christ, who is our great lawgiver and teacher, and who alone can inwardly and powerfully instruct our soul, and in matters of faith and worship is only to be followed (Matt. xxiii:8, 10); (2) to preachers and ministers, who, to assembled congregations, declare and explain the oracles of God (Eccl. xii:11); (3) to such as more privately teach scholars or disciples (Luke vi:40); (4) to such as have and rule over servants (Eph. vi:5); (5) to such as proudly affect vain applause and a superiority above others (Matt. xxiii:10); (6) to such as judge, condemn, censure, and reprove others (James iii:1).

Master in a Christian point of view has duties which relate (1) To the civil concerns of the family. To arrange the several businesses required of servants; to give particular instructions for what is to be done, and how it is to be done: to take care that no more is required of servants than they are equal to; to be gentle in our deportment towards them; to reprove them when they do wrong, to commend them when they do right; to make them an adequate recompense for their services, as to protection, maintenance, wages, and character. (2) To the morals of servants. Masters must look well to their servants' characters before they hire them; instruct them in the principles and confirm them in the habits of virtue; watch over their morals, and set them good examples.

MATHUSALA (ma-thū'sa-lá), (Gr. Μαθουσαλα, Math-oo-sah'lah, Luke iii:37). See METHUSALAH.

MATRED (mā'tred), (Heb. מַטְרֵד, mat-rade' propelling).

Daughter of Mezahab, and mother-in-law of Hadar, an Edomitish king (Gen. xxxvi:39; 1 Chron. i:50). (B. C. before 1619.)

MATRI (mā'tri), (Heb. מַטְרֵי, mat-ree', rain of Jehovah, or Jehovah is watching).

The founder of the Benjamite family from which sprang Kish, and his son Saul (1 Sam. x:21). (B. C. about 1642.)

MATRIMONY (māt-ri-mo-ny). See MARRIAGE.

MATTAN (mät'tan), (Heb. מַתָּן, mat-tawn', a gift).

1. Son of Eleazar, father of Jacob, and grandfather of Joseph, husband to the Virgin Mary. Luke (iii:23) makes Heli, son of Mattan, to be father of Joseph; but it is thought that Heli is the same as Joachim, father of Mary, and father-in-law to Joseph. So that Matthew (i:15, 16) gives the direct genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. (Calmet.) (B. C. before 588.)

2. The priest of Baal slain by Jehoiada (2 Kings xi:18; 2 Chron. xxiii:17). This led to the death of Athaliah and the coming of Joash to the throne of Judah. (B. C. 876.)

3. Father of Shephathiah, which latter charged Jeremiah with treason (Jer. xxxviii:1). (B. C. before 589.)

MATTANAH (mät'ta-nah), (Heb. מַתָּנָה, mat-taw-naw', a gift), the fifty-third encampment of Israel (Num. xxi:18, 19), which Eusebius says was on the north side of Arnon, twelve miles from Medaba, southeast.

It was probably in the country of Moab; but the exact site is unknown, although Maschana, on the Arnon, twelve miles from Dibon, has been suggested as marking Mattanah.

MATTANIAH (mät'ta-ni'ah), (Heb. מַתָּנְיָהוּ, mat-tan-yaw', gift of Jah.)

1. A Levite, son of Heleai, and leader of the ninth course of musicians in David's time (1 Chron. xxv:4, 16). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A Levite, descendant of Asaph, and assistant to Hezekiah in the purification of the temple (2 Chron. xxix:13). (B. C. 726.)

3. The original name of King Zedekiah, which Nebuchadnezzar changed when he raised him to the throne in place of Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxiv:17).

4. A Levite, descendant of Asaph, and great-grandfather of Zechariah (Neh. xii:35). (B. C. before 446.)

5. A Levite, son of Micah, descendant of Asaph. After the exile he lived at Netophathites (1 Chron. ix:16; Neh. xii:28). He was leader of the temple choir (Neh. xi:17; xii:8, 25, 35), and a "keeper" of the "threshold" (1 Chron. xv:18, 21). Probably identical with (4). (B. C. 440.)

6. A Levite, father of Zaccur (Neh. xiii:13). (B. C. before 410.) Perhaps also identical with 5.

7-10. Four Israelites, the "sons," or residents of Elam (Ezra x:26), of Zattu (Ezra x:27), of Pahath-Moab (Ezra x:30), and of Bani (Ezra x:37), who put away their Gentile wives after the exile. (B. C. 459.)

11. Father of Jeiel, and ancestor of that Jahaziel, the Levite, who foretold the overthrow of the Moabites at the hands of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx:14). (B. C. 1014.) Perhaps identical with 1.

MATTATHA (mät'ta-thá) (Luke iii:31). See MATTATHAH, 1.

MATTATHAH (mät'ta-thah), (Heb. מַתְּתָה, mat-tat-taw', gift of Jehovah).

1. The son of Nathan, the son of David in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:31). (B. C. past 1014.)

2. An Israelite, the son of Hashum, who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x:33). (B. C. 458.)

MATTATHIAS (mät'ta-thí'as), (Gr. Marrathias, mat-tath-ec'as), from the Hebrew for MATTATHAH (which see).

1. Son of Amos, an ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:25).

2. Son of Semei in the same genealogy (Luke iii:26).

MATTENAI (mät'te-ná't), (Heb. מַתְּנַי, mat-ten-ai'ee, liberal); probably a contraction of the name MATTANIAH.

1. An Israelite of the family of Hashum, who divorced his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra x:33). (B. C. 459.)

2. One of the family of Bani, who likewise put away his Gentile wife (Ezra x:37). (B. C. 459.)

3. A priest of the house of Joiarib, in the time of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii:19). (B. C. 536.)

MATTER (mät'tēr). In James iii:5 the Greek word (ἄλγ, hoo-lay') is translated matter, i. e., affair.

MATTAN (mät'than), (Gr. Ματθάν, mat-than', Matt. i:15). See MATTAN, 1.

MATTATH (mät'that), (Gr. Ματθάρ, mat-that'), perhaps a form from MATTAN (which see).

1. A son of Levi, in the genealogy of Christ; between David and Zerubbabel (Luke iii:29). (B. C. after 623.)

2. The son of a later Levi, and grandfather of Mary, the mother of Christ (Luke iii:24). (B. C. before 22.)

MATTHEW (mäh'thu), (Gr. Ματθαῖος, mat-thah'yos, probably from the Hebrew Mattathias, "gift of Jehovah").

(1) Name and Family. According to Mark ii:14, Matthew was a son of Alphæus. It is generally supposed that Jacobus, or James, the son of Alphæus, was a son of Mary, the wife of Cleophas, who was a sister of the mother of Jesus (John xix:25). If this opinion is correct, Matthew was one of the relatives of Jesus.

(2) Collector of Customs. Matthew was a portitor, or inferior collector of customs at Capernaum, on the Sea of Galilee. He was not a publicanus, or general farmer of customs. We may suppose either that he held his appointment at the port of Capernaum, or that he collected the customs on the high road to Damascus, which went through what is now called Khan Minyeh, which place, as Robinson has shown, is the ancient Capernaum (Bibl. Res. in Palestine, vol. iii, pp. 288-295). Thus we see that Matthew belonged to the lower class of people.

(3) Also Called Levi. In Mark ii:14, and Luke v:27, he is called Levi. We hence conclude that he had two names. This circumstance is not mentioned in the list of the apostles (Matt. x and Luke vi); but the omission does not prove the contrary, as we may infer from the fact that Lebbæus is also called Judas in Luke vi:16, in which verse the name Lebbæus is omitted. In Matt. ix:9 is related how Matthew was called to be an apostle. We must, however, suppose that he was previously acquainted with Jesus, since we read in Luke vi:13, that when Jesus, before delivering the Sermon on the Mount, selected twelve disciples, who were to form the circle of his more intimate associates, Matthew was one of them. After this Matthew returned to his usual occupation; from which Jesus, on leaving Capernaum, called him away. On this occasion Matthew gave a parting entertainment to his friends. After this event he is mentioned only in Acts i:13.

(4) Abstinence from Animal Food. According to a statement in Clemens Alexandrinus (Padagog. ii, 1), Matthew abstained from animal food. Hence some writers have rather hastily concluded that he belonged to the sect of the Essenes. It is true that the Essenes practiced abstinence in a high degree; but it is not true that they rejected animal food altogether. Admitting the account in Clemens Alexandrinus to be correct, it proves only a certain ascetic strictness, of which there occur vestiges in the habits of other Jews (comp. Joseph. Vita, cap. ii and iii).

(5) Ministry. According to another account, which is as old as the first century, Matthew, after the death of Jesus, remained about fifteen years in Jerusalem. This agrees with the statement in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 24), that Matthew preached to his own nation before he went to foreign countries. Rufinus (Hist. Eccles. x, 9) and Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i, 19) state that he afterwards went into Ethiopia; and other authors mention other countries. There also he probably preached specially to the Jews. According to Heracleon (about A. D. 150), and Clemens Alex. (Strom. iv, 9), Matthew was one of those apostles who did not suffer martyrdom.

MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL OF.

The genuineness of the Gospel of St. Matthew has been more strongly attacked than that of any of the three others, as well by external as by internal arguments.

1. External Arguments Against Its Genuineness. We will first consider the external arguments. The most ancient testimony concerning Matthew's Gospel is that of Papias, who, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 39), wrote as follows: 'Matthew wrote the sayings in the Hebrew tongue, but everybody interpreted them according to his ability.' Doubts of three different kinds have been raised whether this testimony could refer to our Greek Gospel of St. Matthew.

(1) Omission by Papias. Papias, the most ancient witness, who was a disciple of John, speaks only about the λόγια of Christ, which were apparently a collection of the remarkable sayings of our Lord.

(2) Possibly Another Tongue. He speaks about a work written in the Hebrew, which here means probably the Aramæan or Chaldee tongue.

(3) Mentions No Translation. His statement seems to imply that there was no translation of this work.

These doubts were particularly brought forward by Schleiermacher in the Studien und Kritiken, 1832, Heft 4. The opinion of Schleiermacher was adopted by Schneckenburger, Lachmann, and many others. According to these critics, the apostle wrote only a collection of the remarkable sayings of Jesus; which collection was put into a historical form by a Greek translator. Papias is said to intend the explanation of the sayings of Christ by means of the addition of the historical facts.

2. Unreliability of Evidence Against. Most critics, however, have either never adopted, or have subsequently rejected, the above interpretation. It was first objected by Dr. Lücke, that Papias, in his report, followed the statements of Johannes Presbyter, who said that Peter furnished 'a collection of the sayings of our Lord,' and that Mark stated what he had heard from Peter, and that Papias nevertheless adds that Mark wrote 'as well the sayings as the doings of Christ.'

(1) Logia a Comprehensive Term. Hence it follows, according to Dr. Lücke, that λόγια is a term a parte potiori, which comprehends the history also. In addition to this, Dr. Lücke observes, that Papias himself wrote a work and that the extracts from this work which Eusebius has furnished prove that its contents were partly historical. According to this view, the testimony of Papias may be considered as referring to our Gospel of St. Matthew; but the force of the two other objections remains still unimpaired.

It has been observed by those who deny the genuineness of this gospel, that in none of the Fathers before Jerome do we find any statement from which we could infer that they had seen the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew; and that consequently we may consider as a mere conjecture the opinion of the Fathers, that our gospel is a Greek translation of a Hebrew original.

(2) Testimony of Jerome. Jerome in his Catalogue of Illustrious Men (cap. iii), reports that the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew was preserved in the library at Cæsarea, and that he took a copy of it. In his commentary on Matt. xii:13, he says that he translated this Hebrew gospel into Greek. In the same passage, and in his book Contra Pelagianos (iii, 2), Jerome states that this Hebrew copy was considered 'by most people' (a plerisque) to be the original text of St. Matthew. The cautious expression, 'a plerisque,' is considered by many critics as an indication that Jerome's statement cannot be depended upon. Indeed it appears that the Hebrew copy of St. Matthew was not the mere original of our gospel, for what motive, in that case, could Jerome have had to translate it into Greek?

(3) A Possible Apocryphal Work. The whole difficulty is cleared up if, like most modern critics, we suppose that the second Gospel to the Hebrews, about which Jerome speaks, was the Gospel of St. Matthew corrupted by apocryphal additions. This conjecture is confirmed by the fragments of it which have been preserved.

Hence many critics are led to suppose that the strictly Judaizing Christians made a translation of St. Matthew, which they endeavored to bring into harmony with their own opinions and legends. Nevertheless Jerome's statement respecting the second Gospel to the Hebrews may be taken as a confirmation of the account of Papias, that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew. If this be the fact, the question must arise whether our Greek Matthew is a correct translation of the Hebrew. The words of Papias seem to imply that in his days there was no Greek translation in existence.

(4) Account of Papias Questioned. This has induced many critics to question his account, and to suppose that the original text was Greek. Such is the opinion of Erasmus, Ecolampadius, Calvin, Beza, Lardner, Guerike, Harless, and others.

The authority of Papias has been deemed to be overthrown by the character given of him by Eusebius, according to whose statement he was 'of a very little mind.' Guerike considers also as rather incredible the addition, that "everybody interpreted that gospel according to his ability."

Papias, indeed, proves himself very credulous, by reporting, according to Eusebius, 'many rather fabulous things;' but this does not authorize us to reject his testimony in a mere matter of fact, for the perception of which no extraordinary abilities were required, especially as his account of this fact agrees with the statement of Jerome.

It is by no means improbable, that after several inaccurate and imperfect translations of the Aramæan original came into circulation, Matthew himself was prompted by this circumstance to publish a Greek translation, or to have his gospel translated under his own supervision. It is very likely that this Greek translation did not soon come into general circulation, so that Papias may have remained ignorant of its existence. It may also be, and nothing prevents us from supposing, that Papias, being acquainted with our Greek gospel, spoke, in the passage referred to, of those events only which came to pass soon after the publication of the Aramæan original. We, at least, rather prefer to confess ourselves unable to solve the objections, than to question the direct testimony of Papias; especially since that testimony is supported by other ancient authorities:

(1) By Origen (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi, 25).
 (2) By the Alexandrian Catechist Pantænus, who, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. v, 10), having, in the latter half of the second century, gone on a missionary expedition to India, found there some Christians who possessed the Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew. (3) By Irenæus (Adv. Har. iii, 1) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. v, 8).

To this it has been objected, that Origen and Irenæus probably only repeated the statement of Papias; but it is unlikely that a man of so much learning as Origen should have had no other authority for his account; and the statement of Pantænus, at least, is quite independent of that of Papias. It ought also to be considered that Matthew was not so much known in ecclesiastical antiquity that any partisanship could have prompted writers to forge books in his name.

(5) External Proof of Genuineness. On summing up what we have stated, it appears that the external testimonies clearly prove the genuineness of the Gospel of St. Matthew. The authenticity indeed of this gospel is as well supported as that of any work of classical antiquity. It can also be proved that it was early in use among Christians, and that the apostolical Fathers, at the end of the first century, ascribed to it a canonical authority (see Polycarp, Epist. c. ii, 7; Ignatius, Ad Smyrn. c. vi; Ad Rom. c. vi; Clemens Romanus, Epist. i. c. xlvi; Barnabas, Epist. c. iv).

3. Internal Arguments Against. But the external arguments against the authenticity of this gospel are less important than the doubts which have been started from a consideration of its internal qualities.

(1) The Claim That Matthew Lacks Clearness. The representations of Matthew (it is said) have not that vivid clearness which characterizes the narration of an eye-witness, and which we find, for instance, in the Gospel of John. Even Mark and Luke surpass Matthew in this respect. Compare, for example, Matt. iv:18 with Luke v:1, sq.; Matt. viii:5, sq., with Luke vii:1, sq. This is most striking in the history of his own call, where we should expect a clearer representation.

(2) Omissions. He omits some facts which every apostle certainly knew. For instance, he mentions only one journey of Christ to the pass-over at Jerusalem, namely, the last; and seems to be acquainted only with one sphere of Christ's activity, namely, Galilee. He even relates the instances of Christ's appearing after his resurrection in such a manner that it might be understood as if he showed himself only to the women in Jerusalem, and to his disciples, nowhere but in Galilee (Matt. xxvi:32 and xxviii:7).

(3) Transposition of Events. He relates unchronologically, and transposes events to times in which they did not happen; for instance, the event mentioned in Luke iv:14-30 must have happened at the commencement of Christ's public career, but Matthew relates it as late as ch. xiii:53, sq.

(4) Combines Discourses. He embodies in one discourse several sayings of Christ which, according to Luke, were pronounced at different times (comp. Matt. v-vii, and xxiii).

(5) Errors Claimed. He falls, it is asserted, into positive errors. In ch. i and ii he seems not to know that the real dwelling-place of the parents of Jesus was at Nazareth, and that their abode at Bethlehem was only temporary (comp. Matt. ii:1, 22, 23, with Luke ii:4, 39). According to Mark xi:20, 21, the fig-tree withered on the day after it was cursed, but according to Matt. xxi:19, it withered immediately. According to Matt. xxi:12, Christ purified the temple immediately after his entrance into Jerusalem; but according to Mark he on that day went out to Bethany, and purified the temple on the day following (Mark xi:11-15). Matthew says (xxi:7) that Christ rode on a she-ass and on a colt, which is impossible. The other gospels speak only of a she-ass.

These circumstances have led Strauss and others to consider the Gospel of St. Matthew as an unapostolical composition, originating perhaps at the conclusion of the first century; while some consider it a reproduction of the Aramæan Matthew, augmented by some additions; others call it an historical commentary of a later period, made to illustrate the collection of the sayings of Christ which Matthew had furnished (comp. Sieffert, Ueber die Aechtheit und den Ursprung des ersten Evangelii, 1832; Schneckenburger, Ueber den Ursprung des ersten Evangelii, 1834; Schott, Ueber die Authenticität des Ev. Matth. 1837).

4. Reply. To these objections we may reply as follows:

(1) Completeness of Narration. The gift of narrating luminously is a personal qualification of which even an apostle might be destitute, and which is rarely found among the lower orders of people: this argument therefore has recently been given up altogether. In the history of his call to be an apostle, Matthew has this advantage over Mark and Luke, that he relates the discourse of Christ (ix:13) with greater completeness than these evangelists. Luke relates that Matthew prepared a great banquet in his house, while Matthew simply mentions that an entertainment took place, because the apostle could not well write that he himself prepared a great banquet.

(2) Omissions by One Witness do not Invalidate Testimony of Others. An argumentum a silentio must not be urged against the evangelists. The raising of Lazarus is narrated only by John; and the raising of the youth at Nain only by Luke, the appearance of five hundred brethren after the resurrection, which, according to the testimony of Paul (1 Cor. xv:6), was a fact generally known, is not recorded by any of the evangelists. The apparent restriction of Christ's sphere of activity to Galilee, we find also in Mark and Luke. This peculiarity arose perhaps from the circumstance that the apostles first taught in Jerusalem, where it was unnecessary to relate what had happened there, but where the events which had taken place in Galilee were unknown, and required to be narrated: thus the sphere of narration may have gradually become fixed. At least it is generally granted that hitherto no satisfactory explanation of this fact has been discovered. The expressions in Matt. xxvi:32, and xxviii:7, perhaps only indicate that the Lord appeared more frequently, and for a longer period, in Galilee than elsewhere. In Matt. xxviii:16, we are told that the disciples in Galilee went up to a mountain, whither Christ had appointed them to come; and since it is not previously mentioned that any such appointment had been made, the narrative of Matthew himself here leads us to conclude that Christ appeared to his disciples in Jerusalem after his resurrection.

(3) Communications Grouped According to Subjects. There is no reason to suppose that the evangelists intended to write a chronological biography. On the contrary, we learn from Luke i:4, and John xx:31, that their object was of a more practical tendency. With the exception of John, the evangelists have grouped their communications more according to the subjects than according to chronological succession. This fact is now generally admitted. The principal groups of facts recorded by St. Matthew are: (1) The preparation of Jesus, narrated in ch. i-iv:16. (2) The public ministry of Jesus, narrated in ch. iv:17-xvi:20. (3) The conclusion of the life of Jesus, narrated in ch. xvi:21-xxviii.

The second of these groups is subdivided into minor groups. If we consider that Matthew, for the benefit of the Jews, describes Christ as being the promised Messiah of the old covenant, it must appear perfectly appropriate in him to narrate the Sermon on the Mount before the calling of his disciples. The Sermon on the Mount shows the relation in which the Redeemer stood to the old covenant. In cc. viii and ix are given examples of the power which Jesus possessed of performing miracles; after which, in ch. ix:36, is stated the need of 'laborers' to instruct the people. Then naturally follows, in ch. x, the admonition delivered to the apostles before they are sent out on their mission. In ch. xii is recorded how Jesus entered into conflict with the dominant party, etc. (comp. Kern's Abhandlung über den Ursprung des Evangelii Matthæi, p. 51, sq.; Köster, Ueber die Composition des Ev. Matth. in Pelt's Mitarbeiten, Heft i; Kuhn, Leben Jesu, t. i., Beilage.)

But our adversaries further assert that the evangelist not only groups together events belonging to different times, but that some of his dates are incorrect: for instance, the date in Matt. xiii:53 cannot be correct if Luke, ch. iv, has placed the event rightly. If, however, we carefully consider the matter, we shall find that Matthew has placed this fact more chronologically than Luke. It is true that the question in Matt. xiii:54, and the annunciation in Luke iv:18-21, seem to synchronize best with the first public appearance of Jesus. But even Schleiermacher, who, in his work on Luke, generally gives the preference to the arrangement of that evangelist, nevertheless observes (p. 63) that Luke iv:23 leads us to suppose that Jesus abode for a longer period in Capernaum (comp. the words κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον αὐτῶν in verse 16).

(4) Combination of Harmonious Themes. If the evangelist arranges his statements according to subjects, and not chronologically, we must not be surprised that he connects similar sayings of Christ, inserting them in the longer discourses after analogous topics had been mentioned. These discourses are not compiled by the evangelist, but always form the fundamental framework to which sometimes analogous subjects are attached. But even this is not the case in the Sermon on the Mount; and in ch. xiii it may be doubted whether the parables were spoken at different times. In the discourses recorded in ch. x and xxiii, it can be proved that several sayings are more correctly placed by Matthew than by Luke (comp. especially Matt. xxiii:37-39 with Luke xiii:34, 35).

(5) Sources of Information. It depends entirely upon the mode of interpretation, whether such positive errors as are alleged to exist are really chargeable on the evangelist. The difference, for instance, between the narrative of the birth of Christ, as severally recorded by Matthew and Luke, may easily be solved without questioning the correctness of either, if we suppose that each of them narrates what he knows from his individual sources of information. The history of Christ's childhood given in Luke, leads us to conclude that it was derived from the acquaintances of Mary, while the statements in Matthew seem to be derived from the friends of Joseph. As to the transaction recorded in Matt. xxi:18-22, and Mark xi:11, 15, 20, 21, it appears that Mark describes what occurred most accurately; and we must grant that we should scarcely have expected from an eye-witness the inaccuracy which is observable in Matthew. But we find that there are characters of such individuality that, being bent exclusively upon their main subject, they seem to have no perception for dates and localities.

5. Internal Proof of Genuineness. If these arguments should still appear unsatisfactory, they may be supported by adding the positive internal proofs which exist in favor of the apostolical origin of this gospel.

(1) Harmony of Early Writers with the Book. The nature of the book agrees entirely with the statements of the Fathers of the church, from whom we learn that it was written for Jewish readers. None of the other evangelists quotes the Old Testament so often as Matthew, who, moreover, does not explain the Jewish rites and expressions, which are explained by Mark and John.

(2) Fullness of Accounts. If there is a want of precision in the narration of facts, there is, on the other hand, a peculiar accuracy and richness in the reports given of the discourses of Jesus; so that we may easily conceive why Papias, a parte potiori, styled the Gospel of Matthew λόγια τοῦ Κυρίου, the sayings of the Lord.

Some of the most beautiful and most important sayings of our Lord, the historical credibility of which no skeptic can attack, have been preserved by Matthew alone (Matt. xi:28-30; xvi:16-19; xxviii:20; comp. also xi:2-21; xii:3-6, 25-29; xvii:12, 25, 26; xxvi:13). Above all, the Sermon on the Mount must here be considered. Even negative criticism grants that Luke's account is defective as compared with Matthew's; and that Luke gives as isolated sentences what in Matthew appears in beautiful connection. In short, the Sermon on the Mount, according to Matthew, forms the most beautiful and the best arranged whole of all the evangelical discourses. It may also be proved that in many particulars the reports of several discourses in Matthew are more exact than in the other Evangelists; as may be seen by comparing Matt. xxiii. with the various parallel passages in Luke. Under these circumstances it is surprising that the genuineness of this gospel has not yet met with more distinguished advocates. The most important work in defense of the genuineness of Matthew is that of Kern, Ueber den Ursprung des Evangelii Matthæi, Tübingen, 1834. Next in value are Olshausen's Drei Programme, 1835, and the two Lucubrationes of Harless, 1840 and 1843. Even De Wette, in the fourth edition of his Introduction, p. 170, has ascribed only a qualified value to the doubts on this head.

6. Early Date. With regard to the date of this gospel, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen state that it was written before the others. Irenæus (Adv. Har. iii. 1) agrees with them, but places its origin rather late—namely, at the time when Peter and Paul were at Rome. Even De Wette grants (Einleitung, sec. 97) that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. In proof of this we may also quote ch. xxvii:8.

A. T.

MATTHIAS (mat-thi'as), (Gr. Ματθίας, mat-thee'as, gift of Jehovah, equivalent to Matthew), one of the seventy disciples who was chosen by lot, in preference to Joseph Barsabas, into the number of the Apostles, to supply the deficiency caused by the treachery and death of Judas (Acts i:23-26).

This is the sole instance of the lot being employed in the history of the Apostolic Church, and it occurs significantly between the Ascension and Pentecost, when the disciples were 'orphans' (John xiv:18). Stier (Words of the Apostles, in loc.) regards this election as premature and unwarranted, the outcome of St. Peter's officious impetuosity. 'The lot fell: not the Lord chose.' He holds that St. Paul was the true successor of Judas, chosen, like the other Apostles, by the Lord himself. It may be granted that the appointment of Matthias stands on a somewhat lower level than that of the original Twelve and of St. Paul; but, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, the procedure was a legitimate exercise of human wisdom in dependence upon Divine guidance; and St. Luke, the 'beloved' friend of St. Paul, appears to endorse the election (representing, doubtless, the general opinion of the Apostolic Church); for after speaking of the eleven Apostles (Acts i:25) he refers (Acts vi:2) to the 'Twelve.' (H. Cowan, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

According to Grotius, the lot was taken by means of two urns. In one they placed two rolls of paper, with the names of Joseph and Matthias written within them, and in the other, two rolls, one with the word "apostle" and the other blank; and one roll was drawn from each urn simultaneously. Clarke (Com.) thinks that the selection was by ballot, the Lord directing the mind of the majority to vote for Matthias. In the case of selection by lot there was no chance, for "the lot is cast into the lap (properly urn); but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Prov. xvi:33).

Nothing sure is known of his subsequent career, although according to one tradition, he preached in Ethiopia and suffered martyrdom there; according to another, he labored in Judæa and was stoned by the Jews.

Others hold that he was a martyr—by crucifixion—in Ethiopia or Colchis. An apocryphal gospel was published under his name, and Clement of Alexandria quotes from the Traditions of Matthias.

MATTITHIAH (mät'ti-thí'ah), (Heb. מַתִּיתִיָּהוּ, mat-tith-yaw', gift of Jehovah; prolonged form, מַתִּיתִיָּהוּ הוּ, mat-tith-yaw' hoo).

1. A son of Jeduthun, the Levite, and leader of the fourteenth course of Temple musicians in the time of David (1 Chron. xxv:3, 21). (B. C. 1014.) He was probably the doorkeeper of the ark, appointed by David (1 Chron. xv:18, 21; xvi:5).

2. One of the "sons" of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x:43). (B. C. 459.)

3. Son of Shallum, a Korhite Levite, who had charge of the baked offerings of the Temple after the exile (1 Chron. ix:31). (B. C. 440.)

4. One of those who stood on Ezra's right when he read the law to the people (Neh. viii:4). (B. C. 410.)

5. Son of Semei in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:26); but the name is probably an interpolation of 6.

6. Son of Amos, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:25). (B. C. after 406.)

MATTOCK (mä't'tük). Three Hebrew words are thus translated:

1. Makh-ar-ay-shaw' (Heb. מַחֲרֵשֶׁת, 1 Sam. xiii:20, 21.

2. Kheh'reb (Heb. חֶרֶב). The expression "with their mattocks round about" (2 Chron. xxxiv:6, marg. "mauls."

3. Mah-dare' (Heb. מַעֲדָרָה, Isa. vii:25, a weeding hook or hoe.

MAUL (mə), (Heb. מַעֲדָרָה, may-feets', a breaker). It was a hammer, such as coppersmiths use, found only in Prov. xxv:18.

It is to-day a stick for striking a person on the head as a mark of disgrace, but it may also mean a club. Clubs are always carried by the shepherds of Lebanon, slung from the wrist by a thong or cord. The head of the club is round and heavy and is sometimes studded with iron spikes. Solomon compares a false witness to a "maul," he wounds the reputation, he ruins the health, and takes away the life of his neighbor (see as above Prov. xxv:18). In Jer. li:20, the Hebrew is rendered in R. V. "battle axe," and in the marg. "maul."

MAUZZIM (mäüz'zim), (marginal, Dan. xi:38).

A word meaning "the God of forces," but by some it is taken as a proper name, though it probably refers to the dedication by Antiochus Epiphanes of a temple in Antioch to Jupiter Capitolinus, or to the family god of the Seleucids to whom there was an altar in the Acropolis at Athens.

MAW (mə), (Heb. מַעֲדָרָה, kay-baw', hollow), the ventricle, or the second of the four stomachs of ruminating animals, in which the digestion of the food is completed.

It, like tripe, was esteemed a great delicacy among the ancients. This, with the shoulder and the cheeks of a sacrificial animal, was the portion of the priest (Deut. xviii:3).

MAZZAROTH (mäz'za-röth), (Heb. מַזְזָרוֹת, mazzaw-roth', only in Job xxxviii:32), the name of twelve signs of the zodiac, which were imagined as menazil, i. e., lodging houses; or burug, strongholds, in which one after another the sun lodges as it describes the circle of the year. (See STARS.)

MEADOW (mä'd'ö), the rendering of two words:

1. Aw'k'ho (Heb. אֲוֶכְחוֹ, Gen. xli:2, 18), probably an Egyptian term. In Job viii:2 this word seems to mean a reed or rush. In Judg. xx:33 the word translated 'meadow' probably means an open plain, or a region stripped of wood, a treeless portion of the country.

2. Mah-ar-eh' (Heb. מַחֲרֵשֶׁת, stripped), Judg. xx:33, "the meadows of Gibeah."

MEAH (mä'ah), (Heb. מֵאָה, may-aw', a hundred).

A tower on the eastern wall of Jerusalem, probably at the angle of the Temple inclosure (Neh. iii:1; xii:39), between the Sheep Gate and the tower of Hananeel. (See JERUSALEM; HANANEEL.)

MEAL (mä), the rendering of several words:

1. Keh'makh (Heb. כֶּהֱמַךְ, marrow), the fatness of wheat or barley, i. e., its ground substance (Gen. xviii:6; Num. v:15; 1 Kings iv:22; xvii:12, 14, 16; 2 Kings iv:41; 1 Chron. xii:40; Is. xlvi:2; Hos. viii:7).

2. Keh'makh so'leth (Heb. כֶּהֱמַךְ סֹלֶתָה, Gen. xviii:6, "fine meal"; Gr. ἀλευρον, al'yoo-ron, Matt. xiii:33; Luke xiii:21), the finest portion of flour.

Figurative. In the prophetic writings 'meal' is used in several figures. The humbling of the Daughter of Babylon was to be shown by her being reduced to the work of grinding meal as a sign of servitude (Is. xlvii:2). Hosea represents the unprofitableness of the evil works of Israel as sowing the wind, reaping the whirlwind, whose bud, having no stalk, makes no meal (Hos. viii:7).

MEAL-OFFERING (mä öf'fēr-ing) is the translation substituted by the Old Testament revision for A. V. 'meat-offering.'

The American Revisers further record their preference for 'meal-offering' in Jer. xiv:12; xvii:26; xxxiii:18; xli:5. In these passages our R. V. reads 'oblation' with 'meal-offering' in the margin.

MEALS, MEAL TIME (mäls, mä tim).

(1) When and How Served. The meals of the Israelites consisted of a simple breakfast in the morning and two other daily meals, one at midday (Gen. xviii:1; xliii:16, 25; Ruth ii:14; 1 Kings xx:16) and the other some time in the evening (Gen. xix:1; Ruth iii:2). In earlier times the midday meal as well as the evening meal was regarded as important and consisted of substantial fare. It was also customary to ask a blessing upon the food (1 Sam. ix:13; Matt. xiv:19; xv:36; Luke ix:16; John vi:11). Meat was served in a solid form, and no soups were used by the Israelites. Portions of flesh, whether boiled or roasted, were lifted by the fingers and placed on a piece of bread, which served as a plate, and also as a fork to lift to the mouth. The food of the poorer classes consisted of bread dipped in vinegar, milk, and parched corn (Ruth ii:14); those in a better position had in addition boiled flesh and a variety of vegetables and fruits; while the wealthy had roasted flesh of fatted cattle, venison and fowls. At feasts honor was shown to guests by the position assigned to them at table, by the choice pieces and the amount of the portions set before them.

(2) Seasoning of Food. It does not appear that the people were very particular in the seasoning or dressing of their food. Salt was the only seasoning of what was prepared in the temple; if we do not add the oil wherewith meat-offerings were baked. The paschal lamb was eaten with bitter herbs; salt, honey, butter, oil, and perhaps sometimes aromatic herbs were used in their common ragouts.

(3) Various Customs. People of different nations disliked to eat together. The Egyptians hated to eat with shepherds (Gen. xliii:31). The Jews abhorred eating with heathens, particularly the Samaritans (John iv:9); they reproached our Savior for eating with publicans (Matt. ix:11; Luke xv:2). The Jews washed their hands before and after they partook of their meals (Matt. xv:2; Mark vii:2; Luke xi:33). Anciently, they sat at separate tables, but in after ages they copied after the Persian, Chaldean, and Roman manner of lying on couches at their meals; hence John leaned on Jesus' bosom at his last supper (John xiii:23, 25). The different sexes feasted in different apartments, a common custom in some places of the East. Perfumes on their hair, or on their couches, together with music and dancing, were common at their feasts (Luke vii:37; xv; John xii).

(4) Effect of the Law. The abolishment of the ceremonial law, by the death of Jesus Christ, took away the legal distinction of meats; but to avoid offence of the weak Jews who turned Christians, and were hard to wean from their ancient customs, the synod of Jerusalem required their Christian brethren to abstain from meats offered to idols, and from things strangled, and from blood. This matter, especially that of eating things offered to idols, and which were sometimes, after the oblation, sold in the public markets, occasioned no small disturbance. St. Paul determines, that all food was clean and indifferent in itself; and that whatever was bought in the public market, might be eaten without any scruple of conscience; but warmly inculcates the forbearance of flesh offered to idols, if it tended to lay a stumbling-block before any person, or grieved any tender conscience; and charges such as did otherwise, with being murderers of their Christian brethren, for whom Christ died (Tit. i:15; Rom. xiv; 1 Cor. vi:11-13; viii and x). (See FOOD.)

MEAN (mēn).

1. The verb to 'mean' (from Anglo-Sax. macnan to intend, tell, and connected with 'mind,' the root being man, to think) signifies sometimes to design, intend, purpose. Gen. i:20. 'But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good;' Is. iii:15. 'What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor?' x:7. 'Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so;' Acts xxi:13. 'What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart?' Acts xxvii:2. 'We launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia'; 2 Cor. viii:13. 'For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened.'

2. The noun 'mean' in Prov. xxii:29, signifies that which is obscure. (Comp. Acts xxi:39.)

MEARAH (me-ā'rah), (Heb. מֵעָרָה, meh-ar-raw', a cave). A place on the northern boundary of Palestine (Josh. xiii:4), near Sidon. Commonly identified with a district of caves on Lebanon, to the east of Sidon, called Jezzim; also with Mogheiyeh, northeast of Sidon.

MEASURES (mēzh'ūrs). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEASURING LINE (mēzh'ūr-īng līn). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT (mēt). This word does not appear to be used in the Bible in the sense of animal food, which is denoted uniformly by "flesh."

Perhaps the following may be exceptions: "Savory meat" (Gen. xxvii:4); "corn and bread and meat" (xlv:23).

Figurative. (1) Christ's mediatorial work is represented as his meat; it was more delightful to him than his necessary food (John iv:32, 34). He in his person, righteousness, and fullness, and God in him, are represented as meat; as true and satisfying food, the receiving and enjoyment of which nourishes up men's souls to eternal life (John vi:55; 1 Cor. x:3; Ps. xxxiv:8). (2) The truths of God in the Scripture are meat; they refresh and nourish men's souls; and the deeper mysteries are strong meat, which can only edify and nourish strong Christians (Jer. xv:16; Heb. v:12, 14). (3) Ceremonial ordinances are called meats and drinks; much of them related to eatables (Heb. xiii:9; Col. ii:16). (4) The kingdom of God consists not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost: the gospel-dispensation does not relate to meats and drinks; nor does true inward religion consist in observances of these, but in applying Christ's righteousness, and studying to have fellowship with and conformity to God (Rom. xiv:17). (5) The fruit of believers is for meat and medicine; their instructions and holy examples are edifying (Ezek. xlvii:12). (6) Men are meat to others, when they are given up to be destroyed by them (Ps. xlv:11, and liii:4; Num. xiv:9, and xxiv:8). (7) Sin is meat to men; they delight in it, and promise themselves nourishment from it; but it becomes the gall of asps within them (Job xx:14). (8) Sorrowful meat, is coarse provision, which mourners ate (Job vi:7). (9) Tears are meat, when sorrow takes away all appetite for meat (Ps. xlii:3). (10) The year of release was meat for the Hebrews; they ate what grew of its own accord in it (Lev. xxv:6). (11) Israel's ordinary food, which God diminished, was their accustomed prosperity (Ezek. xvi:27).

MEAT-OFFERING (mēt ōf'fēr-īng). See OFFERING.

MEBUNNAI (me-būn'nāi), (Heb. מֵבֻנָּי, meh-oon-nah'ee, construction).

One of David's bodyguard (2 Sam. xxiii:27); elsewhere SIBBECHAI (2 Sam. xxi:18; 1 Chron. xx:4), or SIBBECAI (1 Chron. xi:29; xxvii:11).

MECHERATHITE (mēk'e-rath-īte), (Heb. מֵכֵרָתִי, mek-ay-raw-thee', from the word meaning a sword).

The appellation of Hopher, one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi:36). The place, Mecherah, is otherwise unknown, but the word may be a corruption of MAACHATHITE (2 Sam. xxiii:34).

MEDAD and ELDAD (mē'dād and ēl'dad), (Heb. מֵדָד, may-dawd', loving).

Two of the seventy elders who were nominated to assist Moses in the government of the people, but who remained in the camp, probably as modestly deeming themselves unfit for the office, when the others presented themselves at the Tabernacle. The Divine spirit, however, rested on them even there, 'and they prophesied in the camp' (Num. xi:24-29). The Targum of Jonathan alleges that these two men were brothers of Moses and Aaron by the mother's side. (B. C. 1657.)

MEDAN or MADAN (mē'dan), (Heb. מִדְּאָן, med-aww', contention; Sept. Μαδιάμ, Madiam).

Son of Abraham, by Keturah (Gen. xxv:2; 1 Chron. i:32). He and his brother Midian are supposed to have peopled the country of Midian, east of the Dead Sea. The word is probably to be identified with Madān, the god of some Arab tribe, best known through the proper name 'Abd-Al-Madān, 'worshiper of Al-Madān.' The seat of the worship of Al-Madān appears to have been Yemen (Tāj Al-'Arūs, s. v.), whereas the descendants of Keturah appear to be far away from S. Arabia.

MEDEBA (mēd'e-bā), (Heb. מֵדֵבָא, may-deb-aw', Sept. Μαδαβάν, Maedaban).

A town east of the Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii:9, 16), before which was fought the great battle in which Joab defeated the Ammonites and their allies (1 Chron. xix:7). It originally belonged to the Moabites (Num. xxi:30); and after the captivity of the tribes beyond the Jordan, they again took possession of it (Is. xv:2). The Onomasticon places it near Heshbon; and it was once the seat of one of the thirty-five bishoprics of Arabia (Reland, Palæstina, pp. 217, 223, 226). Medeba, now in ruins, still retains its ancient name, and is situated upon a round hill seven miles south of Heshbon. The ruins are about a mile and a half in circuit, but not a single edifice remains perfect. (Seetzen, in Zach's Monat. Corresp., xviii. 431; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 625; Legh. p. 245.)

MEDES (mēdes), (Heb. מֵדֵי, maw-dah'ee, a Mede). The inhabitants in ancient times of one of the most fruitful and populous countries of Asia, called Media.

MEDIA (mē'dā), (Heb. מִדְּיָא, rendered "Madai," Gen. x:2; 1 Chron. i:5; "Media," Esth. i:3, 14, 18; x:2; Is. xxi:2; Dan. viii:20; "Median," Dan. v:31; N. T. אֲמֵדִי, "Media," R. V. Ezra vi:2).

(1) Location. Media lay directly south of Armenia and was bounded on the northeast by the mountains beside the Caspian Sea. To the east and southeast were Hyrcania and Parthia. Elam or Susiana lay on the southern side, and the mighty Assyrian power was on the west.

(2) Cities. In Great Media lay the metropolis of the country, Ecbatana (Plin. Hist. Nat. vi. 17), as well as the province of Rhagiana and the city Rhagæ, with the plain of Nisæum, celebrated in the time of the Persian empire for its horses and horse-races (Herod. iii. 106; Arrian, vii. 13; Heeren, Ideen, i. l. 305). This plain was near the city Nisæa, around which were fine pasture lands producing excellent clover (Herba Medica). The horses were entirely white, and of extraordinary height and beauty, as well as speed. They constituted a part of the luxury of the great, and a tribute in kind was paid from them to the monarch, who, like all Eastern sovereigns, used to delight in equestrian display.

(3) Tribute. Some idea of the opulence of the country may be had when it is known that, independently of imposts rendered in money, Media paid a yearly tribute of not less than 3,000 horses, 4,000 mules, and nearly 100,000 sheep.

(4) Products. The horse-races, once celebrated through the world, appear to exist no more; but Ker Porter saw the Shah ride on festival occasions a splendid horse of pure white. Cattle abounded, as did the richest fruits, as pines, citrons, oranges, all of peculiar excellence, growing as in their native land. Here also was found the Silphium (probably assafœtida), which formed a considerable article in the commerce of the ancients, and was accounted worth its weight in gold. The Median dress was proverbially splendid; the dress, that is, of the highest class, which seems to have gained a sort of classical authority, and to have been at a later period worn at the Persian court, probably in part from its antiquity. This dress the Persian monarchs used to present to those whom they wished to honor, and no others were permitted to wear it. It consisted of a long white loose robe, or gown, flowing down to the feet, and enclosing the entire body, specimens of which, as now used in those countries, may be seen in plates given in Perkin's Residence in Persia, New York, 1843. The nature and the celebrity of this dress combine with the natural richness of the country to assure us that the ancient Medians had made no mean progress in the arts; indeed, the colors of the Persian textures are known to have been accounted second only to those of India. If these regal dresses were of silk, then was there an early commerce between Media and India; if not, weaving, as well as dyeing, must have been practiced and carried to a high degree of perfection in the former country (Ammian. Marcell. xxiv. 6. p. 353, ed. Bip.; Xenoph. Cyrop. i. 3, 2; Athen. xiii. pp. 512, 514, sq.; Heeren, Ideen, i. 205, 307; Herod. vi. 112; Strabo, xi. p. 525; Dan. iii:21).

(5) Religion. The religion of the Medes consisted in the worship of the heavenly bodies, more particularly the sun and moon, and the planets Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, Mercury, and Mars (Strabo, xv. p. 732). (See STARS.) The famous Median dress, comprised the miter, as well as the flowing robe. The priestly caste were denominated magi; they were a separate tribe, and had the charge not only of religion, but of all the higher culture.

(6) Language. The language of the ancient Medes was not connected with the Semitic, but the Indian; and divided itself into two chief branches, the Zend, spoken in North Media, and the Pehlvi, spoken in Lower Media and Parthia; which last was the dominant tongue among the Parthians.

(7) Early History. The Medes originally consisted of six tribes, of which the Magi were one (Herod. i:101). Being overcome by Ninus, they formed a part of the great Assyrian empire, which, however, lost in course of time the primitive simplicity of manners to which its dominion was owing, and fell into luxury and consequent weakness; then Arbaces, who governed the country as a satrap for Sardanapalus, taking advantage of the effeminacy of that monarch, threw off his yoke, destroyed his capital, Nineveh, and became himself sovereign of the Medes, in the ninth century before the Christian era (Diod. Sic., ii. 1, 2, 24, 32). According to Diodorus, this empire extended through nine monarchs, enduring 310 years, until Astyages, son of Cyaxares, was de-throned by Cyrus in the year of the world 3495, when Media became a part of the Persian empire, sinking from the same inevitable causes as those which enabled it to gain over the Assyrian power the dominion of Asia. The account given by Herodotus varies from that now set forth.

We do not propose to subject the diversities to a critical investigation, believing that little, if any, good could result, at least within our narrow space. Dates, names, and dynasties may be more or less uncertain, but the facts we have given are unimpeached.

(8) Extent. The magnitude of the Median empire is another important fact equally well ascertained. Being in their time the most valorous, as well as the most powerful nation of Asia, the Medes extended their power towards the east and the west beyond any strictly definable limits, though, like dominion generally in Oriental countries, it was of a vague, variable, and unstable kind. That they regarded the Tigris as their western boundary appears from the fact that they erected on its banks strongholds, such as Mespila and Larissa (Xenoph., Anab. iii. 4, 10); but that they carried their victorious arms still farther westward, appears from both Herodotus (i. 134) and Isaiah (xiii:17, 18). The eastern limits of the empire seem to have been different at different periods. Heeren inclines to the opinion that it may have reached as far as the Oxus, and even the Indus (Ideen, i. 142). Many, however, were the nations and tribes which were under the sway of its sovereigns.

(9) Government. The government was a succession of satrapies, over all of which the Medes were paramount; but the different nations exerted a secondary dominion over each other, diminishing with the increase of distance from the center of royal power (Herod., i. 134), to which center ultimately the tribute paid by each dependent to his superior eventually and securely came. Not only were the Medes a powerful, but also a wealthy and cultivated people; indeed, before they sank, in consequence of their degeneracy, into the Persian empire, they were during their time the foremost people of Asia, owing their celebrity not only to their valor, but also to the position of their country, which was the great commercial highway of Asia. The sovereigns exerted absolute and unlimited dominion, exacted a rigid court-ceremonial, and displayed a great love of pomp (Heeren, Ideen, 143).

(10) Under Persian Rule. Under the Persian monarchs Media formed a province, or satrapy, by itself, whose limits did not correspond with independent Media, but cannot be accurately defined.

To Media belonged another country, namely, Aria, which, Heeren says, took its name from the river Arius (now Heri), but which appears to contain the elements of the name (in the Zend language) which was common to the two, if not to other, Eastern nations who were denominated Indians by Alexander the Great, as dwellers in or near the Indus (which he also misnamed) but who were known in their own tongue as Arians (Arii, Aria, Ariana, also the name of Persia, Iran; see Ritter, Erdkunde, v. 458; Manu, 22; x. 45; Herod., vii. 62, who declares that the Medes were of old universally called Arii, Ἀριοί). Subsequently, however, from whatever cause, the Arians were separated from the Medes, forming a distinct satrapy in the Persian empire. Thus the name of a clan, or gens, became the name of a nation, and then of an individual tribe (Strabo, quoted by Heeren, Ideen, i. 190).

(11) Scriptural Mention. The Medes are not mentioned in sacred Scripture till the days of Hoshea, king of Israel, about 740 B. C., when Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, brought that monarch under his yoke, and in the ninth year of his reign took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, placing them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes. Here the Medes appear as a part of the Assyrian empire; but at a later period Scripture exhibits them as an independent and sovereign people (Is. xiii:17; Jer. xxv:25; li:11, 28). In the last passage their kings are expressly named: 'The Lord hath raised up the kings of the Medes; for his device is against Babylon to destroy it.' 'Prepare against her (Babylon) the kings of the Medes, the captains thereof, and all the rulers thereof.'

It has been conjectured that soon after the time of Arbaces they again fell under the dominion of the Assyrians; but availing themselves of the opportunity afforded by the distant expeditions which Sennacherib undertook, they gained their freedom, and founded a new line of kings under Dejoes (Winer, Realwört.). Indeed, so sudden and rapid are the changes of government, even to the present day, in Oriental monarchies, that we need not be surprised at any difficulties which may occur in arranging the dynasties or the succession of kings, scarcely in any ancient history, certainly least of all in the fragmentary notices preserved regarding the kings of Media and other neighboring empires.

(12) Medes and Persians. According, however, to other historical testimony, we find the Medes and Persians united as one people in Holy Writ (Dan. v:28; vi:15; viii:20; Esth. i:3, 18; x:2), in the days of Cyrus, who destroyed the separate sovereignty of the former. To the united kingdom Babylon was added as a province.

(13) Conquered by Alexander. After the lapse of about 200 years, Media, in junction with the entire Persian monarchy, fell under the yoke of Alexander the Great (B. C. 330); but after the death of Alexander it became, under Seleucus Nicator, the Macedonian governor of Media and Babylonia, a portion of the new Syrian kingdom (1 Macc. vi:56), and, after many variations of warlike fortune, passed over to the Parthian monarchy (1 Macc. xiv:2; Strabo, xvi. p. 745).

(14) The People. The ancient Medes were a warlike people, and much feared for their skill in archery (Herod., vii. 61; Strabo, xi. p. 525.) They appear armed with the bow in the army of the Persians, who borrowed the use of that weapon from them (Herod., ut supra). Those who remained in the more mountainous districts did not lose their valor; but the inhabitants of the cities and towns which covered the plains, in becoming commercial lost their former hardy habits, together with their bravery, and, giving way to luxury, became in process of time an easy prey to new aspirants to martial fame and civil dominion. MEDIAN (mē'di-an), (Chald. מֵדִי, maw-dah'ee), an appellation of Darius (Dan. ix:1), "the Mede" (xi:1). (See DARIUS).

MEDIATOR (mē'di-ā'tēr), (Gr. Μεσστής, mes-est-tace, mediator), is a word peculiar to the Scriptures (see Beza, Annot. in Gr. Test.), and is used, in an accommodated sense, by many of the ancient Fathers, to denote one who intervenes between two dispensations. Hence it is applied to John the Baptist, because he came, as it were, between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations. Thus Greg. Nazianzenus (Orat. xxxix. p. 633) calls him ὁ παλαίος καὶ νέος μεσστής. Theophylact, commenting on Matt. iii, gives him the same denomination.

1. Signification. Again, it signifies, in its more proper sense, an internunciatus or ambassador, one who stands as the channel of communication between two contracting parties.

Some commentators think that the Apostle Paul, in Gal. iii:19, calls Moses mediator, because he conveyed the expression of God's will to the people, and reported to God their wants, wishes, and determinations. In reference to this passage of Scripture, Basil (De Spiritu Sancto, ch. xiv) says, 'Mosen figuram representasse, quando inter Deum et populum intermedium extiterit.' Many ancient and modern divines, however, are of opinion that Christ himself, and not Moses, is here meant by the inspired Apostle, and this view would seem to be confirmed by comparing Deut. xxxiii:2 with Acts vii:38-52. Christ it was who, surrounded by angelic spirits, communicated with Moses on Mount Sinai. On this point, the words of the learned and pious Chrysostom, on Gal. iii are very express: 'Here,' says he, 'Paul calls Christ Mediator, declaring thereby that he existed before the law, and that by him the law was revealed.' This application of the passage will be the more evident if we consider the scope of the Apostle's argument, which evidently is, to point out the dignity of the law. How could he present a clearer demonstration of this than by showing that it was the second person of the ever-blessed Trinity who stood forth on the mount to communicate between God the Father and his creature man! Moreover, to contradicting Christ's mediation from that of Moses, the former is emphatically styled μεσότης κρείττονος διαθήκης (Heb. viii:6).

2. Applied to The Christ. Christ is called Mediator by virtue of the reconciliation he has effected between a justly offended God and his rebellious creature man (see Grotius, De Satisfactione Christi, ch. viii). In this sense of the term Moses was, on many occasions, an eminent type of Christ. The latter, however, was not Mediator merely by reason of his coming between God and his creatures, as certain heretics would affirm (see Cyril Alex. Dial. 1. de Sancta Trinitate, p. 410); but because he appeased God's wrath, and made reconciliation for iniquity. 'Christ is the Mediator,' observes Theophylact, commenting on Gal. iii, 'of two, i. e., of God and man. He exercises this office between both by making peace, and putting a stop to that spiritual war which man wages against God. To accomplish this he assumed our nature, joining in a marvelous manner the human, by reason of sin unfriendly, to the Divine nature.' 'Hence,' he adds, 'he made reconciliation.' Oecumenius expresses similar sentiments on the same passage of Scripture. Again, Cyril, in his work before quoted, remarks: 'He is esteemed Mediator because, the Divine and human nature being disjointed by sin, he has shown them united in his own person; and in this manner he reunites us to God the Father.'

(1) Prophet. If, in addition to the above general remarks, confirmed by many of the most ancient and orthodox Fathers of the church, we consider the three great offices which holy Scripture assigns to Christ as Savior of the world, viz., those of prophet, priest, and king, a further and more ample illustration will be afforded of his Mediatorship.

One of the first and most palpable predictions which we have of the prophetic character of Christ, is that of Moses (Deut. xviii:15): 'The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken.' That this refers to Christ we are assured by the inspired Apostle Peter (Acts iii:22).

Again, in Isaiah lxi:1, 11, Christ's consecration to the prophetic office, together with its sacred and gracious functions, is emphatically set forth: (see Luke iv:16-21, where Christ applies this passage to himself). In order, then, to sustain this part of his mediatorial office, and thus work out the redemption of the world, we may see the necessity there was that Messiah should be both God and man. It belongs to a prophet to expound the law, declare the will of God, and foretell things to come: all this was done, and that in a singular and eminent manner, by Christ, our prophet (Matt. v:21, etc.; John i:8). All light comes from this prophet. The Apostle shows that all ministers are but stars which shine by a borrowed light (2 Cor. iii:6, 7). All the prophets of the Old, and all the prophets and teachers of the New Testament, lighted their tapers at this torch (Luke xxi:15). It was Christ who preached by Noah (1 Pet. iii:19), taught the Israelites in the wilderness (Acts vii:37), and still teaches by his ministers (Eph. iv:11, 12). On this subject Bishop Butler (Analogy, part ii. ch. v.) says: 'He was, by way of eminence, the prophet, "the prophet that should come into the world" (John vi:14) to declare the Divine will. He published anew the law of nature, which men had corrupted, and the very knowledge of which, to some degree, was lost amongst them. He taught mankind, taught us authoritatively, to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, in expectation of the future judgment of God. He confirmed the truth of this moral system of nature, and gave us additional evidence of it, the evidence of testimony. He distinctly revealed the manner in which God would be worshiped, the efficacy of repentance, and the rewards and punishments of a future life. Thus he was a prophet in a sense in which no other ever was.' Hence the force of the term ὁ λόγος, by which St. John designates Christ.

But, on the other hand, had the second person of the Trinity come to us in all the majesty of his Divine nature, we could not have approached him as our instructor. The Israelites, terrified at the exhibitions of Deity, cried out that the Lord might not so treat with them again; it was then that he, in gracious condescension to their feelings, promised to communicate with them in future through a prophet like unto Moses. The Son of God, in assuming the form of an humble man, became accessible to all. Thus we perceive the connection of Christ's prophetic office—he being both God and man—with the salvation of man. On this subject Chrysostom (Homil. cxxxiv. tom. v. p. 860) remarks: 'A mediator, unless he has a union and communion with the parties for whom he mediates, possesses not the essential qualities of a mediator. When Christ, therefore, became Mediator between God and man (1 Tim. ii. etc.), it was indispensable that he should be both God and man.'

Macarius also (Homil. vi:97) on this question more pointedly observes: 'The Lord came and took his body from the virgin; for if he had appeared among us in his naked divinity, who could bear the sight? But he spoke as man to us men.'

Again, the Redeemer was not only to pro- pound, explain, and enforce God's law, but it was needful that he should give a practical proof of obedience to it in his own person. Now, if he had not been man, he could not have been subject to the law; hence it is said, Gal. iv:4, 'When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his son, made of a woman, made under the law;' and if he had not been God, he could not, by keeping the law, have merited forgiveness for us, for he had done but what was required of him. It was the fact of his being very God and very man which constituted the merit of Christ's obedience.

(2) Priest. Moreover, in working out the mighty scheme of redemption the mediator must assume the office of priest.

To this office Christ was solemnly appointed by God (Ps. cx:4; Heb. v:10), qualified for it by his incarnation (Heb. x:6, 7), and accomplished all the ends thereof by his sacrificial death (Heb. ix:11, 12); as in sustaining his prophetic character, so in this, his Deity and humanity will be seen. According to the exhibition of type and declaration of prophecy, the mediator must die, and thus rescue us sinners from death by destroying him who had the power of death. 'But we see Jesus,' says the Apostle (Heb. ii:9), 'who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man. Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the Devil.' On the other hand, had he not been God he could not have raised himself from the dead. 'I lay down my life (he says, John x:17, 18), and take it up again.' He had not had a life to lay down if he had not been man, for the Godhead could not die; and if he had not been God, he could not have acquired merit by laying it down; it must be his own, and not in the power of another, else his voluntarily surrendering himself unto death—as he did on the charge that he, being only man, made himself equal with God—was an act of suicide, and consequently an act of blasphemy against God! It was, then, the mysterious union of both natures in the one person of Christ, which constituted the essential glory of his vicarious obedience and death.

Nor are the two natures of Christ more apparent in his death than they are in the intercession which 'he ever liveth to make' in behalf of all who come unto God by him (Heb. vii:25). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches us (cc. vii, ix) how the high-priest, under the Levitical dispensation, typified Christ in his intercessory character; as the high-priest entered alone within the holiest place of the tabernacle once a year with the blood of the sacrifice in his hands, and the names of the twelve tribes upon his heart, so Christ, having offered up himself as a lamb without spot unto God, has gone into glory bearing on his heart the names of his redeemed. We may, then, ask, with the Apostle (Rom. viii:33), 'Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.' In this part of his mediatorial work God's incommunicable attributes of omniscience, omnipresence, and omnipotence are seen. He must therefore have been God, and on the ground of his being able, from personal experience, to sympathize with the suffering members of his mystical body, he must have been man; being perfect God and perfect man, he is, then, a perfect intercessor.

(3) King. We come, lastly, to notice Christ's mediatorial character as king. The limits of this article will not admit of our even alluding to the varied and multiplied passages of Scripture which delineate Christ as 'Head over all things to the church' (see Ps. ii:6; xlv; Isaiah xxxii:1; Dan. ix:25; Col. i:17, 18, etc.). Suffice it here to say that Christ could not, without the concurrence of his Divine nature, gather and govern the church, protect and defend it against all assailants open and secret, and impart to it his Holy Spirit, to enlighten and renew the minds and hearts of men and subdue Satan—all these are acts of his kingly office.

Such, then, is the work of Christ's mediatorship—salvation revealed by him as prophet, procured by him as priest, and applied by him as king—the work of the whole person wherein both natures are engaged. Hence it is that some of the ancients speaking of it, designate it 'a Divine-human operation' (see Dionys. Areopag. Epist. IV. ad Caliam, Damascenum, iii. 19). For a more ample view of this important subject see Flavel, Panstratia of Shamier, vol. iii. fol. Genev. vii. 1, in which the views of the Romish church are ably controverted. See also Brinsley (John), Christ's Mediation, 8 vols. Lond. 1657. (See JESUS CHRIST.) J. W. D.

MEDICINE or PHYSIC (mēd'ī-sīn), (Heb. מִדְּיָנָה, geh-haw'), is ascribed by Jesus, son of Sirach, to God himself (Eccles. xxxviii:1, etc.).

Scripture makes no mention of physicians before the time of Joseph, who commanded his servants, the physicians of Egypt, to embalm the body of Jacob (Gen. 1:2). The art of medicine, however, was very ancient in Egypt. They ascribed the invention of it to Thaut, or to Hermes, or to Osiris, or to Isis; and some of the learned have thought that Moses, having been instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, must also have known the chief secrets of medicine. It does not appear that physicians were common among the Hebrews, especially for internal maladies, but for wounds, fractures, bruises, and external injuries, they had physicians, or surgeons, who understood the dressing and binding up of wounds, with the application of medicaments. (See Jer. viii:22; xlv:11; Ezek. xxx:21). Asa, being diseased in his feet, and having applied to physicians, is upbraided with it, as contrary to that confidence which he ought to have had in the Lord (1 Kings xv:23; 2 Chron. xvi:12). Hezekiah, having a boil, probably a malignant one, was cured by Isaiah, on the application of figs (2 Kings xx:7; Is. xxxviii:21). The low state of the art of medicine, with the persuasion that distempers were effects of God's anger, or were caused by evil spirits, was the reason that in extraordinary maladies the sufferers applied to diviners, magicians, enchanters, or false gods. Sometimes they applied to the prophets of the Lord for cure; or, at least, to know whether they should recover or not. When Ahaziah, king of Israel, by a fall from the roof of his house, was greatly hurt, he sent to consult the false god Baal-zebub at Ekron (2 Kings i:2, etc.). Jeremiah (viii:17) speaks of enchantments used against the biting of serpents, and other venomous animals. Hazeal was sent by the king of Syria to consult Elisha the prophet as to the issue of his disease (2 Kings viii:8). Naaman the Syrian came into the land of Israel, to obtain from Elisha a cure for his leprosy (2 Kings v:5, 6). And when our Savior appeared in Palestine, although there can be no doubt that there were physicians in the country, it is evident that the people placed but little confidence in them (comp. Mark v:26; Luke viii:43). They brought to our Savior and his Apostles multitudes of diseased from all parts of the land, and he laid his hands upon them and healed them. Calmet.

MEDITATION (mĕd'y-tā'shūn), is an act by which we consider anything closely, or wherein the soul is employed in the search or consideration of any truth. In religion it is used to signify the serious exercise of the understanding, whereby our thoughts are fixed on the observation of spiritual things.

Mystic divines make a great difference between meditation and contemplation; the former consists in discursive acts of the soul, considering methodically and with attention the mysteries of faith and the precepts of morality; and is performed by reflections and reasonings which leave behind them manifest impressions on the brain. The pure contemplative, they say, has no need of meditation, as seeing all things in God at a glance, and without any reflection.

(1) A Duty. Meditation is a duty which ought to be attended to by all who wish well to their spiritual interests. It ought to be deliberate, close, and perpetual (Ps. cxix:97; Ps. i:2-6).

(2) Subjects Of. The subjects which ought more especially to engage the Christian mind are the works of creation (Ps. xix); the perfections of God (Deut. xxxii:4); the excellencies, offices, characters, and works of Christ (Heb. xii:2, 3); the offices and operations of the Holy Spirit (John xv and xvi); the various dispensations of Providence (Ps. cxvii:1, 2); the precepts, declarations, promises, etc., of God's word (Ps. cxix); the value, powers, and immortality of the soul (Mark viii:36); the noble, beautiful, and benevolent plan of the gospel (1 Tim. i:11); the necessity of our personal interest in and experience of its power (John iii:3); the depravity of our nature, and the freedom of Divine grace in choosing, adopting, justifying, and sanctifying us (1 Cor. vi:11); the shortness, worth, and swiftness of time (James iv:14); the certainty of death (Heb. ix:27); the resurrection and judgment to come (1 Cor. xv:50), etc., and the future state of eternal rewards and punishments (Matt. xxv; Rev. xix:7-9).

(3) Should Be with Prayer. To perform this duty aright, we should be much in prayer (Luke xviii:1); avoid a worldly spirit (1 John ii:15); beware of sloth (Heb. vi:11); take heed of sensual pleasures (James iv:4); watch against the devices of Satan (1 Pet. v:8); be often in retirement (Ps. iv:4); embrace the most favorable opportunities, the calmness of the morning (Ps. v:1, 3), the solemnity of the evening (Gen. xxiv:63), Sabbath days (Ps. cxviii:24), sacramental occasions, etc. (1 Cor. xi:28).

MEEKNESS (mĕk'nĕs), (Heb. from מְיָדָד, aw-naw', to be depressed; Gr. πραΰτης, prah-ol'ace, gentleness).

A state of mind not easily provoked to resentment. In the Greek language the word signifies also casiness of spirit, and thus it may be justly called; for it accommodates the soul to every occurrence, and so makes a man easy to himself, and to all about him.

(1) Specific Results. The Latins call a meek man mansuetus, or manu assuetus, used to the hand; which alludes to the taming and reclaiming of creatures wild by nature, and bringing them to be tractable and familiar (James iii:7, 8): so where the grace of meekness reigns, it subdues the impetuous disposition, and teaches it submission and forgiveness. It teaches us to govern our own anger whenever we are at any time provoked, and patiently to bear the anger of others, that it may not be a provocation to us. The former is its office, especially in superiors; the latter in inferiors, and both in equals (James iii:13).

(2) Excellence. The excellency of such a spirit appears, if we consider that it enables us to gain a victory over corrupt nature (Prov. xvi:32); that it is a beauty and an ornament to human beings (1 Pet. iii:4); that it is obedience to God's word, and conformity to the best patterns (Eph. v:1, 2; Phil. iv:8).

It is productive of the highest peace to the possessor (Luke xxi:19; Matt. xi:28, 29). It fits us for any duty, instruction, relation, condition, or persecution (Phil. iv:11, 12).

(3) How Obtained and Examples. To obtain this spirit, consider that it is a Divine injunction (Zeph. ii:3; Col. iii:12; 1 Tim. vi:11). Observe the many examples of it: Jesus Christ (Matt. xi:28); Abraham (Gen. xiii; xvi:5, 6); Moses (Num. xii:3); David (Zech. xii:8; 2 Sam. xvi:10, 12; Ps. cxxxi:2); Paul (1 Cor. ix:19). How lovely a spirit it is in itself, and how it secures us from a variety of evils! What peculiar promises are made to the meek (Matt. v:5; Is. lxvi:2). Also such give evidence of their being under the influence of Divine grace, and shall enjoy the Divine blessing (Is. lvii:15).

MEGIDDO (me-gid'do), (Heb. מִגִּדּוֹ, meg-id-do'; in Zech. xii:11, מִגִּדּוֹן, meg-id-don', place of troops).

A town belonging to Manasseh, although within the boundaries of Issachar (Josh. xvii:11). It had been originally one of the royal cities of the Canaanites (Josh. xii:21), and was one of those of which the Israelites were unable for a long time to gain actual possession. Megiddo was rebuilt and fortified by Solomon (1 Kings ix:15), and thither Ahaziah king of Judah fled when wounded by Jehu, and died there (2 Kings ix:27). It was in the battle near this place that Josiah was slain by Pharaoh-necho (2 Kings xxiii:29, 30; 2 Chron. xxxv:20-25). From the great mourning held for his loss, it became proverbial to compare any grievous mourning to it, as 'like the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon' (Zech. xii:11).

'The waters of Megiddo' are mentioned in Judg. v:19; and are probably those formed by the river Kishon. Eusebius and Jerome do not attempt to mark the situation of the place, and it appears that the name Megiddo was in their time already lost. They often mention a town called Legio, which must in their day have been an important and well-known place, as they assume it as a central point from which to mark the position of several other places in this quarter. This has been identified with the village now called Lejjun, which is situated upon the western border of the great plain of Esdraelon, where it begins to rise gently towards the low range of wooded hills that connect Carmel with the mountains of Samaria. This place was visited by Maundrell, who speaks of it as an old village near a brook, with a khan then in good repair (Journey, March 22). This khan was for the accommodation of the caravan on the route between Egypt and Damascus, which passes here. Having already identified the present village of Taannuk with the ancient Taanach, the vicinity of this to Lejjun induced Dr. Robinson to conceive that the latter might be the ancient Megiddo, seeing that Taanach and Megiddo are constantly named together in Scripture. (Conder places it at Khurbet el-Mujedda, ten miles southeast from Jezreel.)

MEGIDDON (me-gid'don), (Zech. xii:11). See MEGIDDO.

MEHETABEEL (me-hët'a-beel), (Neh. vi:10). See MEHETABEL, 2.

MEHETABEL (me-hët'a-bël), (Heb. מְהֵטָבֵאל, meh-hay-tab-ale', bettered of God).

1. Daughter of Matred, and wife of Hadad, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi:39; 1 Chron. i:50). (B. C. about 1619.)

2. Father of Delaiah and ancestor of the prophet Shemaiah, which latter was hired against Nehemiah (Neh. vi:10). (B. C. before 446.)

MEHIDA (me-hi'dä), (Heb. מְהִידָא, mekh-ee-daw', joining).

Founder of a family of Nethinim, some of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:52; Neh. vii:54). (B. C. before 536.)

MEHIR (më'h'ir), (Heb. מְהִיר, mekh-eer', price).

Son of Chelub, of the tribe of Judah, and father, or founder of Eshton (1 Chron. iv:11). (B. C. about 1618.)

MEHOLATHITE (me-höll'ath-ite), (Heb. מְהוֹלָתִי, mekh-o-law-thee'), probably a native of Abel-Meholah (1 Sam. xviii:19; 2 Sam. xxi:8).

MEHUJAEL (me-hü'ja-el), (Heb. מְהוּיָאֵל, mekh-oo-yaw-ale', smitten of God).

Son of Irad, and father of Methusael, a descendant of Cain (Gen. iv:18). (B. C. about 3840.)

MEHUMAN (me-hü'man), (Heb. מְהוּמָן, meh-hoo-maw'n', perhaps, faithful).

One of the eunuchs who served in the palace of Ahasuerus (Esth. i:10). (B. C. 483.)

MEHUNIMS, THE (me-hü'nimz, the), (Heb. מְהוּנִים, meh-oo-naw-ee'; or מְהֵעֵנֵי, meh-ee-nee').

A people, with a capital city, Maän, twelve miles southeast of Petra, against whom Uzziah was successful in war (2 Chron. xxvi:7). In the reign of Hezekiah the Mehunims (A. V. 'habitations') in the valley of the Gedor were smitten by the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv:39-41). It was probably some of their descendants who served in the Temple as Nethinim after the exile (Ezra ii:50; Neh. vii:52).

ME-JARKON (më-jär'kon), (Heb. מַי הַיַּרְקוֹן, may-hah'ee-yar-kone', waters of yellowishness).

A town of Dan, near Joppa (Josh. xix:46). Kiepert and Conder suggest a place on the river Anjah, which flows through a swamp, rendering the waters yellow, as suggested by the name. The stream empties into the Mediterranean a little north of Joppa.

MEKONAH (mëk'o-nah), (Heb. מְכֹנָה, mek-oo-naw', a base, standing place or foundation).

A town reinhabited by men of Judah after the exile (Neh. xi:28). It is mentioned with Ziklag, and therefore probably located far to the south. Not identified.

MELATIAH (mël-a-ti'ah), (Heb. מְלַחִיָּה, mel-at-yaw', Jah has delivered).

A Gibeonite who helped to repair a part of the northern wall of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii:7). (B. C. 446.)

MELCHI (mël'ki), (Gr. Μελχι, mel-khee'; Heb. מַלְכִי, mal-kee', my king).

1. Son of Addi, an ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:28), probably identical with Maasciah (2 Chron. xxxiv:8).

2. Son of Janna and father of Levi, in the latter genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:24). (B. C. before 22).

MELCHIAH (mel-kí'ah), (Heb. מַלְכִיָּהוּ, mal-kee-yaw', Jehovah's king).

A priest, father of Pashur (Jer. xxi:1). Identical with Malchiah (Jer. xxxviii:1; Neh. xi:12), and Malchijah (1 Chron. ix:12).

MELCHISEDEC (mel-kíz'e-dëk), (Heb. v-viii). See MELCHIZEDEK.

MELCHISHUA (mël-ki-shü'à), (1 Sam. xiv:49; xxxi:2). See MALCHISHUA.

MELCHIZEDEK (mel-kíz'e-dëk), (Heb. מַלְכִי־צֶדֶק, mal-kee-tseh'dek, king of righteousness).

A 'priest of the most high God,' and king of Salem, who went forth to meet Abraham on his return from the pursuit of Chedorlaomer and his allies, who had carried Lot away captive. He brought refreshment, described in the general terms of 'bread and wine,' for the fatigued warriors, and bestowed his blessing upon their leader, who, in return, gave to the royal priest a tenth of all the spoil which had been acquired in his expedition (Gen. xiv:18, 20).

This statement seems sufficiently plain, and to offer nothing very extraordinary; yet it has formed the basis of much speculation and controversy. In particular, the fact that Abraham gave a title to Melchizedek attracted much attention among the later Jews. In one of the Messianic Psalms (cx:4), it is foretold that the Messiah should be 'a priest after the order of Melchizedek'; which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (vi:20) cites as showing that Melchizedek was a type of Christ, and the Jews themselves, certainly, on the authority of this passage of the Psalms, regarded Melchizedek as a type of the regal priesthood, higher than that of Aaron, to which the Messiah should belong. The bread and wine which were set forth on the table of shewbread was also supposed to be represented by the bread and wine which the king of Salem brought forth to Abraham (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. ii. 645). A mysterious supremacy came also to be assigned to Melchizedek, by reason of his having received tithes from the Hebrew patriarch; and on this point the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii:1-10) expatiates strongly, as showing the inferiority of the priesthood represented, to that of Melchizedek, to which the Messiah belonged. 'Consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave a tenth of the spoils;' and he goes on to argue that the Aaronic priesthood, who themselves received tithes of the Jews, actually paid tithes to Melchizedek in the person of their great ancestor. This superiority is, as we take it, inherent in his typical rather than his personal character. But the Jews, in admitting this official or personal superiority of Melchizedek to Abraham, sought to account for it by alleging that the royal priest was no other than Shem, the most pious of Noah's sons, who, according to the shorter chronology, might have lived to the time of Abraham. But such conjectures do not need to be refuted in the light of the discoveries made by the monuments. Prof. A. H. Sayce in his Patriarchal Palestine has cleared up the mystery regarding Melchizedek. He says:

It is only since the discovery and decipherment of the cuneiform tablets of Tell Amarna that the story of Melchizedek has been illustrated and explained. Hitherto it had seemed to stand alone. The critics, in the superiority of their knowledge, had refused credit to it, and had denied that the name even of Jerusalem or Salem was known before the age of David. But the monuments have come to our help, and have shown that it is the critics and not the Biblical writer who have been in error.

Several of the most interesting of the Tell Amarna letters were written to the Pharaoh Amenôphis IV, Khu-n-Aten, by Ebed-Tob the king of Jerusalem. Not only is the name of Uru-salim or Jerusalem the only one in use, but the city itself is already one of the most important fortresses of Canaan. It was the capital of a large district which extended southwards as far as Keilah and Karmel of Judah. It commanded the approach to the vale of Siddim, and in one of his letters Ebed-Tob speaks of having repaired the royal roads not only in the mountains but also in the kikar or "plain" of Jordan (Gen. xiii:10). The possession of Jerusalem was eagerly coveted by the enemies of Ebed-Tob, whom he calls also the enemies of the Egyptian king.

Now Ebed-Tob declares time after time that he is not an Egyptian governor, but a tributary ally and vassal of the Pharaoh, and that he had received his royal power, not by inheritance from his father or mother, but through the arm (or oracle) of "the mighty king." As "the mighty king" is distinguished from the "great king" of Egypt we must see in him the god worshiped by Ebed-Tob, the "most high God" of Melchizedek and the prototype of the "mighty God" of Isaiah. It is this same "mighty king," Ebed-Tob assures the Pharaoh in another letter, who will overthrow the navies of Babylonia and Aram-Naharim. Here then as late as the fifteenth century before our era we have a king in Jerusalem who owes his royal dignity to his god. He is in fact a priest as well as a king. His throne has not descended to him by inheritance; so far as his kingly office is concerned, he is like Melchizedek, without father or mother.

Between Ebed-Tob and Melchizedek there is more than analogy; there is a striking and unexpected resemblance; the description given of himself by Ebed-Tob explains what has so long puzzled us in the person of Melchizedek (Patriarchal Palestine, pp. 71, sq.).

We may justly conclude that his twofold capacity of king and priest (characters very commonly united in the remote ages) afforded Abraham an opportunity of testifying his thankfulness to God in the manner usual in those times, by offering a tenth of all the spoil. This combination of character happens for the first time in Scripture to be exhibited in his person, which, with the abrupt manner in which he is introduced, and the nature of the intercourse between him and Abraham, render him in various respects an appropriate and obvious type of the Messiah in his united regal and priestly character. Salem, of which Melchizedek was king, is usually supposed to have been the original of Jerusalem (Joseph. Antiq. i, 10, 2; Jerome, Quæst. on Genes.).

Prof. Sayce also says: The origin of the name of Jerusalem also is now cleared up. It was no invention of the age of David; on the contrary, it goes back to the period of Babylonian intercourse with Canaan. It is written in the cuneiform documents Uru-Salim, "the city of Salim," the god of peace. We can now understand why Melchizedek should have been called the "king of Salem." His capital could be described either as Jeru-salem or as the city of Salem. And that it was often referred to as Salem simply is shown by the Egyptian monuments. One of the cities of Southern Palestine, the capture of which is represented by Rameses II on the walls of the Ramesseum at Thebes, is Shalam or Salem, and "the district of Salem" is mentioned, between "the country of Hadashah" (Josh. xv:37) and "the district of the Dead Sea" and "the Jordan," in the list of the places which Ramesses III at Medinet Habu describes himself as having conquered in the same part of the world.

It may be that Isaiah is playing upon the old name of Jerusalem when he gives the Messiah the title of "Prince of Peace." But in any case the fact that Salim, the god of peace, was the patron deity of Jerusalem, lends a special significance to Melchizedek's treatment of Abraham. The patriarch had returned in peace from an expedition in which he had overthrown the invaders of Canaan; he had restored peace to the country of the priest-king, and had driven away its enemies. The offering of bread and wine on the part of Melchizedek was a sign of freedom from the enemy and of gratitude to the deliverer, while the tithes paid by Abraham were equally a token that the land was again at peace. The name of Salim, the god of peace, was under one form or another widely spread in the Semitic world. Salamamu, or Solomon, was the king of Moab in the time of Tig-lath-pileser III; the name of Shalmaneser of Assyria is written Sulman-asarid, "the god Sulman is chief," in the cuneiform inscriptions; and one of the Tell Amarna letters was sent by Ebed-Sullim, "the servant of Sullim," who was governor of Hazor. In one of the Assyrian cities (Dimmen-Silim, "the foundation stone of peace") worship was paid to the god "Sulman the fish." Nor must we forget that "Salma was the father of Bethlehem" (1 Chron. ii:51). (Patriarchal Palestine, pp. 74-76.)

MELEA (mē'le-à), (Gr. Μελεᾶς, mel-eh-as', signification unknown).

Son of Menan and father of Eliakim in the genealogy of Christ, on the maternal side; but the name is of doubtful authenticity (Luke iii:31).

MELECH (mē'lek), (Heb. מֶלֶךְ, meh'lek, king).

The second of the four sons of Micah, grandson of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Chron. viii:35; ix:41). (B. C. after 1037.)

MELICU (mēl'i-ku), (Neh. xii:14.) See MALUCH.

MELITA (mēl'i-tà), (Gr. Μελίτη, mel-ee'tay, Melita), an island in the Mediterranean, on which the ship which was conveying St. Paul as a prisoner to Rome was wrecked, and which was the scene of the interesting circumstances recorded in Acts xxviii:28.

(1) Name. Melita was the ancient name of Malta, and also of a small island in the Adriatic, now called Meleda, and each of these has found warm advocates for its identification with the Melita of Scripture. The received and long-established opinion is undoubtedly in favor of Malta; and those who uphold the claims of Meleda are to be regarded as dissenting from the general conclusion. This dissent proceeds chiefly upon the ground that the ship of St. Paul was 'driven about in (the sea of) Adria,' when wrecked on Melita. But the name Adria was not, in its ancient acceptation, limited to the present Adriatic Sea, but comprehended the seas of Greece and Sicily, and extended even to Africa. This seems to have been established beyond dispute, and every one acquainted with the mass of evidence brought to bear on this point, must regard the only strong argument in favor of Meleda as having been entirely overthrown.

(2) St. Paul's Bay. The name of St. Paul's Bay has been given to the place where the shipwreck is supposed to have taken place. This, the sacred historian says, was at 'a certain creek with a shore,' i. e. a seemingly practicable shore, on which they purposed, if possible, to strand the vessel, as their only apparent chance to escape being broken on the rocks. In attempting this the ship seems to have struck and gone to pieces on the rocky headland at the entrance of the creek. This agrees very well with St. Paul's Bay, more so than with any other creek of the island. This bay is a deep inlet on the north side of the island, being the last indentation of the coast but one from the western extremity of the island. It is about two miles deep, by one mile broad. The harbor which it forms is very unsafe at some distance from the shore, although there is good anchorage in the middle for light vessels. The most dangerous part is the western headland at the entrance of the bay, particularly as there is waves. From the headland of the bay the ancient capital of Malta (now Citta Vecchia, Old City) is distinctly seen at the distance of about five miles.

The sacred historian calls the inhabitants βάρβαροι, 'barbarians':—'the barbarous people showed us no small kindness.' This is far from implying that they were savages or uncivilized men: it merely intimates that they were not of Greek or Roman origin. This description applies to the ancient inhabitants of Malta most accurately; and as it could not apply to the inhabitants of Melida, who were Greeks, this is another argument to show that not Melida but Malta is the Melita of Scripture.

(3) Location. The island of Malta lies in the Mediterranean, about sixty miles south from Cape Passaro in Sicily. It is sixty miles in circumference, twenty in length, and twelve in breadth. Near it, on the west, is a smaller island, called Gozo, about thirty miles in circumference. Malta has no mountains or high hills, and makes no figure from the sea. It is naturally a barren rock, close to it a small island (Salamone), and a still smaller islet (Salamonetta), the currents and shoals around which are particularly dangerous in stormy weather. It is usually supposed that the vessel struck at this point.

In 1810 the British frigate Lively went to pieces on those very breakers, at the point of Koura, at the entrance of the bay. The crew, like Paul's shipmen, at the distance of a quarter of a mile, could not see the land, but they saw the surf on the shore. Every ship approaching the land must here pass over twenty fathoms, and not only must this depth be close to the spot where they had the indications of land, but it must bear east by south from the fifteen fathom depth. The fifteen fathom depth is, as nearly as possible, a quarter of a mile from the shore, which is here girt with mural precipices, and on which the sea must have been breaking violently. At the bottom of the Bay of St. Paul's there is a communication with the sea outside by a channel not more than a hundred yards in breadth, formed by the separation of Salamone Island, a long rocky ridge, from the mainland. Near this channel, where "two seas meet," are two creeks, into one of which they ran the ship ashore; the forepart stuck fast in the mud and clay, while the stern was dashed to pieces by the force of the but has been made in parts abundantly fertile by the industry and toil of man.

(4) History. The island was first colonized by the Phœnicians, from whom it was taken by the Greek colonists in Sicily, about B. C. 736; but the Carthaginians began to dispute its possession about B. C. 528, and eventually became entire masters of it. From their hands it passed into those of the Romans, B. C. 242, who treated the inhabitants well, making Melita a municipium, and allowing the people to be governed by their own laws. The government was administered by a proprætor, who depended upon the prætor of Sicily; and this office appears to have been held by Publius when Paul was on the island (Acts xxviii:7). On the division of the Roman empire, Melita belonged to the western portion; but having, in A. D. 553, been recovered from the Vandals by Belisarius, it was afterwards attached to the empire of the East. About the end of the ninth century the island was taken from the Greeks by the Arabs, who made it a dependency upon Sicily, which was also in their possession. The Arabs have left the impress of their aspect, language, and many of their customs, upon the present inhabitants, whose dialect is to this day perfectly intelligible to the Arabians, and to the Moors of Africa. Malta was taken from the Arabs by the Normans in A. D. 1090, and afterwards underwent other changes till A. D. 1530, when Charles V., who had annexed it to his empire, transferred it to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, whom the Turks had recently dispossessed of Rhodes. Under the knights it became a flourishing state, and was the scene of their greatest glory and most signal exploits. The institution having become unsuited to modern times, the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, commonly called Knights of Malta, gradually fell into decay, and the island was surrendered to the French under Bonaparte when on his way to Egypt in 1798. From them it was retaken by the English with the concurrence and assistance of the natives; and it was to have been restored to the Knights of Malta by the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens; but as no sufficient security for the independence of the Order (composed mostly of Frenchmen) could be obtained, the English retained it in their hands; which necessary infraction of the treaty was the ostensible ground of the war which only ended with the battle of Waterloo. The island is still in the hands of the English, who have lately remodeled the government to meet the wishes of the numerous inhabitants.

It has been asserted that no vipers exist in Malta, but Lewin saw a serpent there which he regarded as a viper; but even if not found on the thickly-populated island now, this would not prove that they did not exist in Paul's day and have since been exterminated. MELODY (mäl'ô-dÿ). See MUSIC.

MELONS (mäl'ünz). (Heb. מֵלֹן, ab-at-tee-kheem'). (Num. xi:5.)

Melons of all kinds have ever been largely cultivated in Egypt, and during the heat of summer often form the chief food and drink of the lower classes. The muskmelon was grown there at the time of the Exodus, and perhaps the watermelon, which came from Persia. "A traveler in the East who recollects the intense gratitude which a gift of a slice of melon inspired while journeying over the hot and dry plains will readily comprehend the regret with which the Hebrews in the Arabian desert looked back upon the melons of Egypt." (See ABATTACHIM.) Kitto.

Melon.

MELZAR (mäl'zar). (Heb. מֵלְצָר, mel-tsawr', from Persian, butter; marg. "steward"). The title of the officer in the court of Babylon who had charge of Daniel and the other youths who were candidates for promotion as magi (Dan. i:11, 16).

MEMBER (mëm'bēr), (Heb. יָד, yaw-tsoor', to mold; Gr. μέλος, mel'os, a limb).

A part of an animal body, legs, hands, ears, eyes, etc. (Ps. cxxxix:16). Because our whole man, soul and body is united into one system, the faculties of the soul, as well as the parts of the body, are called "members" (Rom. vi:13, 19).

Figurative. Christ and his people being considered as "a body," the saints are called his "members," and "members of one another"; they are closely united to him as their head, and joined to one another, as his, by having the same Spirit, engagement, profession, and practice (Eph. iv:25; v:30).

MEMORIAL (me-mô'ri-al), (Heb. זִכְרוֹן, az-kaw'raw'; זִכְרוֹן, zik-roun'; Gr. μνημόσυνον, mnay-mos'oo-non), name; report (Prov. x:7; Is. xxvi:14). "Memorial" is that which tends to bring a person or thing to remembrance.

God's name, Jehovah, is his "memorial in all generations"; the name whereby he shall be remembered, called upon, and thought and spoken of (Exod. iii:15). The soul ransom-money, the part of the meat-offering burnt on the altar, and the frankincense set on the shew-bread, are called a "memorial"; they as it were put God in mind of his covenant with, and of the mercies necessary to be shown to, the Hebrews: and they put the Hebrews in mind of Jesus as a ransom, offering, and intercessor for us (Exod. xxx:16; Lev. ii:2; xxiv:7). The stones of the high-priest's breast-plate, and shoulder-piece were for a "memorial"; they tended to put him in mind to pray earnestly for the Hebrew tribes; and as it were called down mercies from God upon them (Exod. xxviii:12, 29).

MEMPHIS (mëm'phis), (Heb. מִצְרַיִם, mofe), a very ancient city, the capital of lower Egypt, standing at the apex of the Delta, ruins of which are still found not far from its successor and modern representative, Cairo.

(1) Name. Its Egyptian name, in the hieroglyphics, is Menofri; in Coptic, Memfi, Manfi. Membe, Panoufi or Mefi, being probably corrupted from Man nofri, 'the abode,' or, as Plutarch terms it (Isid. et Osir. ch. xx), 'the haven of good men.' It was called also Pthah-ei, the abode of Pthah (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii. 278). In Hebrew the city bears the name of Mofe (Hos. ix:6), or Nofe Noph (Is. xix:13). These several names are obviously variations of one, of which Meph seems to contain the essential sounds. Whether we may hence derive support to the statement that the place was founded by Menes, the first human king of Egypt, or whether we have here a very early instance of the custom which prevailed so extensively among the Greeks and Romans, of inventing founders of cities, having names correspondent with the names of the places they were said to have built, it is impossible, with the materials we possess, to determine with any fair approach to certainty.

(2) Founder. Menes, however, is universally reputed to have founded not only Memphis but Thebes; the addition of the latter may seem to invalidate his claim to the former, making us suspect that here, too, we have a case of that custom of referring to some one distinguished name great events which happened, in truth, at different and far distant eras. If, as is probable, Thebes as well as Memphis was, at any early period, the seat of a distinct dynasty, the cradle and the throne of a line of independent sovereigns, they could scarcely have had one founder.

(3) Bed of the Nile. The statement, however, is, that having diverted the course of the Nile, which had washed the foot of the sandy mountains of the Libyan chain, Menes obliged it to run in the center of the valley, and built the city Memphis in the bed of the ancient channel. This change was effected by constructing a dyke about a hundred stadia above the site of the projected city, whose lofty mounds and strong embankments turned the water to the east and confined the river to its new bed. The dyke was carefully kept in repair by succeeding kings, and even as late as the Persian invasion, a guard was always maintained there to overlook the necessary repairs; for, as Herodotus asserts, if the river were to break through the dyke, the whole of Memphis would be in danger of being overwhelmed with water, especially at the period of the inundation. Subsequently, however, when the increased deposit of the alluvial soil had raised the circumjacent plains, the precautions became unnecessary; and though the spot where the diversion of the Nile was made may still be traced, owing to the great bend it takes about fourteen miles above ancient Memphis, the lofty mounds once raised there are no longer visible.

(4) Identification of Site. The site of Memphis was first accurately fixed by Pocock, at the village of Metrahenny. According to the reports of the French, the heaps which mark the site of the ancient buildings have three leagues of circumference; but this is less than its extent in early times, since Diodorus gives it 150 stadia, or six leagues and a quarter. Memphis declined after the foundation of Alexandria, and its materials were carried off to build Cairo (Kenrick, Egypt of Herodotus, p. 129; Rennell, ii, 115; Champoll, Egypte et les Ph. i, 336).

(5) History. The kingdom of which Memphis was the capital, was most probably the Egypt of the patriarchs (in which Abraham, Jacob, and the Israelites resided. Psammethichus, in becoming sole monarch of all Egypt, raised Memphis to the dignity of the one metropolis of the entire land (Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 9), after which Memphis grew in the degree in which Thebes declined. It became distinguished for a multitude of splendid edifices, among which may be mentioned a large and magnificent temple to Vulcan, who was called by the Egyptians Phthah, the demiurgos, or creative power (Wilkinson, i, 96; Herod. ii, 136, 154; Strabo, xvii, p. 807; Plin. Hist. Nat. viii, 71; Diod. Sic. i, 57, 67). Under the dominion of the Persians, as well as of the Ptolemies, Memphis retained its preëminence as the capital, though even in the time of the former it began to part with its splendor; and when the latter bestowed their favor on Alexandria, it suffered a material change for the worse, from which the place never recovered. In the days of Strabo many of its fine buildings lay in ruins, though the city was still large and populous. The final blow was given to the prosperity of Memphis in the time of Abdollatif, by the erection of the Arabian city of Cairo.

That the arts were carried to a great degree of excellence at Memphis is proved by the most abundant evidence. Its manufacturers of glass were famed for the superior quality of their workmanship, with which Rome continued to be supplied long after Egypt became a province of the empire. The environs of Memphis presented cultivated groves of the acacia tree, of whose wood were made the planks and masts of boats, the handles of offensive weapons of war, and various articles of furniture (Wilkinson, iii, 92, 168). Memphis was also distinguished as being the place where Apis was kept, and where his worship received special honor. The city's overthrow was predicted (Is. xix:13; Jer. xlvi:19). The latest of these predictions was uttered nearly 600 years before Christ, and half a century before the invasion of Egypt by Cambyses, B. C. 525. The city never recovered from the blow inflicted by Cambyses. The rise of Alexandria hastened its decline. The caliph conquerors founded Old Cairo upon the opposite bank of the Nile, a few miles north of Memphis, and brought materials from the old city to build their new capital, A. D. 638. At length so complete was the ruin of Memphis that for a long time its very site was lost. Recent explorations have brought to light many of its antiquities, and specimens of its relics are now in museums in Europe and America. A little village, Mitrahineh, stands upon a portion of the site of ancient Memphis. "The immense necropolis at the west of Memphis, on the borders of the Libyan desert, still extends from Abu-Rosh in the north to Dashur in the south. The gigantic royal tombs, the pyramids, attract numerous visitors from the whole world. Usually, only the most remarkable group of pyramids (those of Khufu, Khafre, and Menkare of the fourth dynasty—in Herodotus, Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus) at Gizeh are visited; about fifty other pyramids of smaller size or still more dilapidated are less known (those at Sakkara, belonging to the sixth dynasty, and of Dashur of the fourth dynasty, being most remarkable). The immense sphinx at Gizeh (probably a work of Khafre—Chephren, although recently some scholars place it in the twelfth dynasty), and many private tombs, the latter much destroyed, contribute to make the site of ancient Memphis still remarkable." MEMUCAN (me-mū'kan), (Heb. מִמּוּכָן, mem-ookan').

One of the seven royal counselors at the court of Media and Persia (Esth. i:14, 16, 21), who recommended that Vashti be deposed.

MENAHEM (mën'a-hëm), (Heb. מְנַחֵם, men-akh-ame', consoler).

Sixteenth king of Israel, who began to reign B. C. 772, and reigned ten years. Menahem appears to have been one of the generals of king Zachariah. When he heard the news of the murder of that prince, and the usurpation of Shal-lum, he was at Tirzah, but immediately marched to Samaria, where Shallum had shut himself up, and slew him in that city. He then usurped the throne in his turn; and forthwith marched to Tiph-sah, which refused to acknowledge his rule. Having taken this place after a siege, he treated the inhabitants with a degree of savage barbarity, which, as Josephus remarks (Antiq. ix, 11, 1), would not have been pardonable even to foreigners. He adhered to the sins of Jeroboam, like the other kings of Israel. In his time the Assyrians, under their king Pul, made their first appearance on the borders of Palestine; and Menahem was only able to save himself from this great invading power at the heavy price of 1,000 talents of silver, which he raised by a tax of fifty shekels from every man of substance in Israel. This was probably the only choice left to him; and he is not therefore to be blamed, as he had not that resource in the treasures of the temple of which the kings of Judah availed themselves in similar emergencies. Menahem died in B. C. 761, leaving the throne to his son Pekahiah (2 Kings xv: 14-22).

MENAN (mē'nān), (Gr. Μαῖνάν, mahce-nan', meaning unknown), the son of Mattatha, a descendant of David and ancestor of Christ (Luke iii:31); the authenticity is doubtful.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (mē'ne, mē'ne, tē'kel', u-phār-sin'), (Chald. מֵנֵי, men-ay', מֵנֵי, men-ay', לְקֵל, tek-al', וּפְרָסִין, u-phar'sin).

The inscription supernaturally written 'upon the plaster of the wall' in Belshazzar's palace at Babylon (Dan. v:5-25); which 'the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers' could neither read nor interpret, but which Daniel first read, and then interpreted. The sentence reads, when translated literally, Mene, "he is numbered;" Mene, "he is numbered;" Tekel, "he is weighed;" Upharsin, "they are divided." "Peres," in the original language, is the same word with "Upharsin," but in a different case or number. It means "he was divided" (Dan. v:25).

The words, as they are found in Daniel, are pure Chaldee, and if they appeared in the Chaldee character could have been read, at least, by any person present on the occasion who understood the alphabet of his own language. To account for their inability to decipher this inscription, it has been supposed that it consisted of those Chaldee words written in another character. Dr. Hales thinks that it may have been written in the primitive Hebrew character, from which the Samaritan was formed, and that, in order to show on this occasion that the writer of the inscription was the offended God of Israel, whose authority was being at that moment peculiarly despised (verses 2, 3, 4), Jehovah adopted the sacred character in which the Decalogue had been written, which Daniel could understand, but which would be unknown to 'the wise men of Babylon' (New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i, p. 505, Lond., 1811). This theory has the recommendation that it involves as little as possible of miraculous agency. It has been supposed by some that 'the wise men' were not so much at fault to read the inscription as to explain its meaning, which, it is said, they might sufficiently understand to see its boding import to the monarch, and be unwilling to consider further—like the disciples in regard to the predictions of our Lord's death (Luke ix:45), where it is said, 'this saying was hid from them, they perceived it not, and they feared to ask him of that saying.' And certainly it is said throughout our narrative that 'the wise men could not read the writing, nor make known the interpretation of it,' phrases which would seem to mean one and the same thing; since, if they mean different things, the order of ideas would be that they could not interpret nor even read it, and Wintle accordingly translates 'could not read so as to interpret it' (Improved Version of Daniel, Lond. 1807). At all events the meaning of the inscription by itself would be extremely enigmatical and obscure. To determine the application, and to give the full sense, of an isolated device which amounted to no more than 'he or it is numbered, he or it is numbered, he or it is weighed, they are divided,' must surely have required a supernatural endowment on the part of Daniel—a conclusion which is confirmed by the exact coincidence of the event with the prediction, which he propounded with so much fortitude (verses 30, 31). MENEPTAH, INSCRIPTIONS OF.

Modern scholars agree with Manetho in the opinion that Meneptah, the son and successor of Rameses II, was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Manetho calls him "Ameneptah, the son of Rameses," and in the inscriptions found at Bubastis he is represented as the general of the infantry during the reign of his father. The view that he was the Pharaoh of the Exodus is also confirmed by an inscription which was recently discovered.

(1) Concerning the Israelites. In the winter of 1895-6, Dr. W. M. Flinders Petrie was working among the ruins of Thebes, and discovered there the remains of a temple which belonged to the Nineteenth Dynasty. Among the inscribed stones he found a large stela of black granite upon which was an inscription, which proved to be a hymn of victory, reciting the glories of Meneptah and his triumphs over his enemies. The record seems to have been made in the fifth year of his reign, and it reads as follows: "Vanquished is the land of the Libyans, and the land of the Hittites tranquilized. Captured is the land of Pa-kan'na with all violence. Carried away is the land of Ashkelon. Overpowered is the land of Gezer. The Israelites (I-s-y-r-a-e-l-u) are diminished, so that they have no seed. The land of Kharu is become like the widows of Egypt. All lands are at peace."

Kharu was the southern part of Palestine, and the name was identified by Prof. Maspero with that of the Horites of the Scriptures.

The name of Israel is most distinct, and has been accepted by Prof. Maspero, Dr. Neville, Dr. Spiegelberg and others. This alone of all the people mentioned in the inscription, had no word of explanation concerning the country to which they belonged. They must therefore have been at that time either bond slaves in Egypt, or, as is more probable, they were wanderers in the wilderness, the Exodus having already taken place when the hymn of victory was written.

The word which is here rendered "minished" has the determinative for badness or smallness attached, but it is met with here for the first time. The word which is rendered "seed" is used elsewhere in the sense of offspring. Attempts have been made to explain this statement as referring to the crops in a hypothetical land of Israel, which are supposed to have been destroyed by the Egyptians. But the Israelites were herdsmen, and not agriculturists, and the supposition is also rendered impossible by the fact that they are expressly marked out as having no land of their own upon which crops could be cultivated. The word "seed" must therefore have the meaning which it often bears in other inscriptions—"posterity."

(2) Invaders. One of the inscriptions of Meneptah also tells us that a flood of barbarians penetrated as far as Belbeis, in the southern extremity of the land of Goshen, where the country had been "handed over from old kings to foreigners as pasturage for their cattle." These "foreigners" must have been the Israelites, in whom the invaders found sympathizing friends. They are associated also with the land of the Horites, who are said to have become "widows" on account apparently of the destruction of the male seed of Israel. Therefore the author of the poem must have been aware of the fact that Israel had fled towards Edom, which was the territory of their kin.

The cutting off of the male seed lest Israel might ally themselves with an invader was the act of Rameses II, the father and predecessor of Menepthah, but in order to glorify the reigning king, the poet does not hesitate to ascribe to him the deeds of his father, and indeed this was often the custom among the Egyptian kings. They were very willing to erase the inscriptions of their predecessors and inscribe their own victories upon the same stela, or to claim the triumphs for themselves. (See RAMESSES II.)

(3) Political Conditions. The narrative in Exodus harmonizes exactly with what we know of the political condition of Egypt in the fifth year of Menepthah, and the geography of the age of Menepthah also harmonizes with the geography of Exodus. For instance, the road from Goshen to the desert at that time lay past Thuku or Succoth and the "Migdol of King Menepthah." Succoth was one of the names of the city of Pithom, and even Baal-Zephon (Ex. xiv :2) is mentioned in a papyrus of the same age. The district which included the land of Goshen appears to have been comparatively unoccupied for a time after it was evacuated by the Israelites, but we have a clay letter which was addressed to the Egyptian court in the eighth year of King Menepthah in which the writer claims that Bedouin tribes from the land of Edom had been allowed to settle and pasture their herds there.

We may therefore conclude that Egyptian tradition is correct in claiming that Menepthah was the Pharaoh of this period, but we need never expect to find any Egyptian monuments recording the escape of the Israelites. The old kings of Egypt and Assyria were enough like modern politicians to preserve a dead silence concerning their defeats and record only their victories. (See PI-BESETH; SENNACHERIB; NEBUCHADNEZZAR.) (Lectures before Univ. Coll., London, by W. M. Flinders Petrie.)

MENES (mēn'ez), RECENT DISCOVERIES CONCERNING.

In 1901 Dr. W. M. Flinders Petrie, of the University of London, wrote a most interesting account of his recent work. In a letter from Arabah, Baliana, Upper Egypt, to the London Times he says: "The continuation of the work of the Egypt Exploration Fund on the Royal Tombs of the first Egyptian dynasties has proved in some respects more surprising than that of last year. We are now able to trace out the regular development of civilization during some four hundred years, from the time when writing was but rarely used, and then only in rude pictorial stage, down to the common use of delicately figured hieroglyphs indistinguishable from those used for thousands of years after.

"We have now in our hands the beautifully wrought jewelry and gold works, the minutely engraved ivories, the toilet objects, of Menes, the founder of the monarchy, and his successor, fashioned more than 6,500 years ago.

"The following summary will give an idea of the gain of knowledge during the last three months:

"Of Menes and his predecessors there are about thirty inscriptions and labels in stone and ivory. From these we learn certainly the names of three kings,—Narmer, Ka, and a name written with a fish sign; perhaps also Det and Sam are two other names, but they are more probably word signs. Among these works of Menes are parts of four ebony tables with figures and inscriptions, one apparently showing a human sacrifice. The strangest object is one showing a massive strip of gold of unknown use with the name of Menes (Aha) upon it.

"Of Zer, the successor of Menes, the astonishing find is the forearm of his queen, still in its wrappings, with four splendid bracelets intact. One is a series of figures of the royal hawk perched upon the tomb, thirteen figures in cast and chased gold alternating with fourteen carved in turquoise. The second bracelet is of spiral beads of gold and lazuli in three groups. The third bracelet is of four groups of hour-glass beads, amethyst between gold, with connections of gold and turquoise. The fourth has a center piece of gold copied from the rosette seed of a plant, with amethyst and turquoise beads, and band of braided gold wire. This brilliant and exquisitely finished group of jewelry shows what a high level was already attained at the beginning of the First Dynasty. It is two thousand years older than the jewelry of Dahshur; the oldest yet known, and it has the great advantage of being carefully examined as found, and restrung in its exact arrangement.

"Of the same king there are some forty inscribed pieces of ivory and stone, and two lions carved in ivory. Also the great royal tombstone has been found in pieces and rejoined. About sixty private tombstones give us the names in use in the royal household; many formed from the goddess Neith, but not one from Isis."

Pertaining to the same subject, Prof. A. H. Sayce has an article in the Homiletic Review for March, 1901, entitled "The New Light from the Ancient Monuments," in which he says: "Once more the light which has come from the monuments of the past has been fatal to the pretensions of critical skepticism. The discoveries at Abydos have discredited its methods and results. They have shown that where these can be tested they prove such pretensions to be absolutely worthless.

"Menes and his dynasty were very real and historical personages, in spite of the critics, and the age in which they lived, so far from being mythical, was an age of literary culture and civilization. It is only reasonable to conclude that methods and results which thus break down under the test of monumental discovery must equally break down in other departments of history where no such test can as yet be applied.

"The principles and mode of argument which have turned the Hebrew patriarchs into creatures of myth are precisely the same as those which declared Menes to be unhistorical, and the fate which has overtaken them in the case of Menes may be expected also in the case of the Old Testament.

"It is not the discoveries of higher criticism, but the old traditions, which have been confirmed by archæological research."

MENSTEALER (mēn-stēl'ēr), (Gr. ἀνδραποδιστής, an-drap-od-is-tace'), one who decoys or kidnaps a free person into slavery, or one who steals and sells the slaves of others. St. Paul denounces it as among the highest crimes (1 Tim. i:10).

The stealing of a freeborn Israelite, either to treat him as a slave or sell him into slavery, was by the law of Moses punished by death (Exod. xxi:16; Deut. xxiv:7).

MENCHAH (mēn-ū'käh), is regarded as a proper name in the marginal reading (Judg. xx:43; Jer. li:50). If a town it was in Benjamin, on the line of retreat taken by the Benjamites at the siege of Gibeah. (See SERAIAH).

MENCHITE or MENCHOTH (men-ū'kite or men-ū'koth), (1 Chron. ii:52, 54, marg.). See MANAETHITES, THE.

MEONENIM (me-ōn'e-nīm), (Hebrew from מְנַיִן, aw-nan', oak of soothsayers, or to act covertly, i. e., to practice magic), not "plain," but an oak or terebinth (Judg. ix:37; comp. Deut. xviii:10, 14; Mic. v:12, "soothsayers").

The meaning of the name seems to connect it with some old diviners, probably of the pagan inhabitants. Conder suggests its identity with the plain of Mukhuah.

MEONOTHAI (me-ōn'o-thāi), (Heb. מְעֹנְתָי, meh-o-no-thah'ee, my dwellings), a man of Judah, the founder of Ophrah (1 Chron. iv:14), B. C. after 1612.

MEPHAATH (mēph'a-āth), (Heb. מֵפְתָחַי, mef-fah'ath), a city given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi:37; 1 Chron. vi:79), from the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii:18), but afterward coming into the possession of Moab (Jer. xlviii:21). Site not known.

MEPHIBOSHETH (me-phīb'o-shēth), (Heb. מֵפִיבֹשֶׁת, mef-ee-bo'sheth, extermination of idols); also in 1 Chron. ix:40, MERIB-BAAL.

1. Son of Jonathan and grandson of Saul (2 Sam. iv:4).

(1) Early Life. He was only five years of age when his father and grandfather were slain in Mount Gilboa; and on the news of this catastrophe, the woman who had charge of the child, apprehending that David would exterminate the whole house of Saul, fled away with him; but in her hasty flight she stumbled with the child, and lamed him for life (B. C. 1055). Under this calamity, which was very incapacitating in times when agility and strength were of prime importance, Mephibosheth was unable to take any part in the stirring political events of his early life. According to our notions, he should have been the heir of the house of Saul; but in those times a younger son of an actual king was considered to have at least as good a claim as the son of an heir apparent who had never reigned, and even a better claim if the latter were a minor. This, with his lameness, prevented Mephibosheth from ever appearing as the opponent or rival of his uncle Ishbosheth on the one hand, or of David on the other (2 Sam. ix). He thus grew up in quiet obscurity in the house of Machir, one of the great men of the country beyond the Jordan (2 Sam. ix:4; xvii:27); and his very existence was unknown to David till that monarch, when firmly settled in his kingdom, inquired whether any of the family of Jonathan survived, to whom he might show kindness for his father's sake.

(2) Befriended by David. Hearing then of Mephibosheth from Ziba, who had been the royal steward under Saul, he invited him to Jerusalem, assigned him a place at his own table, and bestowed upon him lands, which were managed for him by Ziba, and which enabled him to support an establishment suited to his rank.

(3) During Absalom's Revolt. He lived in this manner till the revolt of Absalom, and then David, in his flight, having noticed the absence of Mephibosheth, inquired for him of Ziba, and being informed that he had remained behind in the hope of being restored to his father's throne, instantly and very hastily revoked the grant of land, and bestowed it on Ziba (2 Sam. xvi:1-4). Afterwards, on his return to Jerusalem, he was met with sincere congratulations by Mephibosheth, who explained that being lame he had been unable to follow the king on foot, and that Ziba had purposely prevented his beast from being made ready to carry him; and he declared that so far from having joined in heart, or even appearance, the enemies of the king, he had remained as a mourner, and, as his appearance declared, had not changed his clothes, or trimmed his beard, or even dressed his feet, from the day that the king departed to that on which he returned. David could not but have been sensible that he had acted wrong, and ought to have been touched by the devotedness of his friend's son, and angry at the imposition of Ziba; but to cover one fault by another, or from indifference, or from reluctance to offend Ziba, who had adhered to him when so many old friends forsook him, he answered coarsely, 'Why speakest thou any more of thy matters? I have said, thou and Ziba divide the land.' The answer of Mephibosheth was worthy of the son of the generous Jonathan: 'Yea, let him take all; forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house' (2 Sam. xix:24-30).

We hear no more of Mephibosheth, except that David was careful that he should not be included in the savage vengeance which the Gibeonites were suffered to execute upon the house of Saul for the great wrong they had sustained during his reign (2 Sam. xxi:7). Another Mephibosheth, a son of Saul by his concubine Rizpah, was, however, among those who suffered on that occasion (verses 8, 9).

2. A son of Saul and his concubine Rizpah, who, with his brother Armoni, was delivered by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord (2 Sam. xxi:8, 9), B. C. 1053-1019.

MERAB (mē'rāb), (Heb. מֵרָב, may-rawb, increase); eldest daughter of king Saul, who was promised in marriage to David; but when the time fixed for their union approached, she was, to the surprise of all Israel, bestowed in marriage upon an unknown personage named Adriel (1 Sam. xiv:49; xviii:17-19). By him she had five sons, who were among those of the house of Saul that were given up to the Gibeonites, who put them to death in expiation for the wrongs they had sustained from their grandfather.

MERAI AH (mēr'a-i'ah), (Heb. מֵרַיָּהוּ, mer-aw-yaw', revelation of Jah), a chief priest of the house of Seraiah, in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii:12), B. C. after 536.

MERAIOTH (me-rā'yoth), (Heb. מֵרַיָּהוּ, mer-aw-yoth', revelations).

1. A priest of the race of Aaron, son of Zerariah, and father of Amariah, among the high-priests (1 Chron. vi:6, 7, 52; Ezra vii:3), B. C. before 1062.

2. A chief priest, father of Hilkai, a contemporary of the high-priest Joiakim (Neh. xii:15).

MERARI (mēr'-ā-ri or me-rā'ri), (Heb. מֵרָרִי, mer-aw'ree, bitter), youngest son of Levi, born in Canaan (Gen. xlvi:11; Exod. vi:16; Num. iii:17; 1 Chron. vi:1). He is only known from his name having been given to one of the three great divisions of the Levitical tribe. (B. C. 1874.)

MERARITE (mēr'a-rite), (Heb. מֵרָרִי, mer-aw'ree, bitter), descendants of Merari, making one of the three Levitical families (Num. xxvi:57). They were sub-divided into the Mahlites and Mushites (Num. iii:20, 33), at the first census they numbered 6,200 males. Four cities were assigned to them from each of the tribes of Gad, Reuben and Zebulun; of these Ramoth-gilead was a city of refuge (Josh. xxi:34, 40; 1 Chron. vi:63, 77-81). David reorganized the tribe (1 Chron. xxiii:6, 21-23).

MERATHAIM (mēr'a-thā'im), (Heb. מֵרַתַּיִם, mer-aw-thah'yim, double or rebellion, Jer. 1:21), a name given to Babylon because of the double captivity to which it had subjected the Israelites (Jer. 1:21).

MERCHANDISE, MERCHANT (mēr'chan-diz, mēr'chant). See COMMERCE.

MERCURY (mēr'cu-ry). See HERMES.

MERCY (mēr'sy), (Heb. חַסְדִּים, kheh'sed, kindness; Gr. ἔλεος, el'eh-os, compassion).

1. Affectionate pity to such as are in misery and distress, and readiness to do them good (Phil. ii:1; Col. iii:12; Tit. iii:5).

2. Kind acts proceeding from inward compassion, and desire to relieve such as are in misery and want (Ps. cxlv:9; 1 Tim. i:13, 16). (a) Mercy to the sinner is God's sovereign compassion in forgiving him (Rom. ix:15). (b) All his dealings with them are the effects of mercy and kindness to them, and are the accomplishment of his promises to them (Ps. xxv:10). (c) To "show," "have," or "give" mercy, is to discover inward pity and compassion, by acts of kindness to the distressed (Gen. xxxix:21; Exod. xx:6; Ps. i:1; 2 Tim. i:18). (d) To "find or obtain mercy," is to receive acts of kindness, and valuable blessings, proceeding from pity and compassion (Matt. v:7; Heb. iv:16). (e) To "keep mercy," is to be in constant readiness to do good freely to the distressed and miserable (Dan. ix:4). (f) To "remember mercy," is to pass injuries unresented, and do acts of undeserved kindness (Hab. iii:2). (g) To "love mercy," is to love Christ and take a pleasure in doing undeserved good to such as are in misery and want (Mic. vi:8). (h) To "follow mercy," is earnestly to seek after a share in the blessings of the new covenant, and study to exercise acts of pity towards those in mercy (Prov. xxi:21).

MERCY-SEAT (mēr'sy-sēt), (Heb. כַּפֹּת־רִחֵם, kaph'poh'reth, mercy-seat).

The Hebrew name literally denotes a cover, and, in fact, describes the lid of the ark with cherubim, over which appeared 'the glory of God' (Exod. xxv:17, sq.; xxx:8; xxxi:7, and elsewhere.) (See ARK OF THE COVENANT.) The word used in the Septuagint and New Testament to translate the term which in Hebrew means simply 'a cover,' is λασθήριον, the 'expiatory' or 'propitiatory,' in allusion to that application of the Hebrew word which we have noted; which application is in this instance justified and explained by reference to the custom of the high-priest once a year entering the most holy place, and sprinkling the lid of the ark with the blood of an expiatory victim, whereby 'he made atonement for the sins of the people.' As this was the most solemn and significant act of the Hebrew ritual, it is natural that a reference to it should be involved in the name which the covering of the ark acquired. By a comparison of the texts in which the word occurs, it will be seen that there would, in fact, have been little occasion to name the cover of the ark separately from the ark itself, but for this important ceremonial. (See TABERNACLE.)

MERED (mēr'ed), (Heb. מֵרֵד, meh'red, rebellion), second son of Ezra of Judah (1 Chron. iv:17). He is said to have married Bithiah, daughter of Pharaoh. Jehudijah, "the Jewess," was probably his second wife. (B. C. 1658). (See BITHIAH.)

MEREMOTH (mēr'e-mōth), (Heb. מְרֹמֹת, mer-ay-moht'h, heights, i. e., exaltations),

1. A priest, son of Urijah, descendant of Koz, who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:3), and had charge of the gold and silver dishes forwarded by Ezra (Ezra viii:33). He is undoubtedly the same as the one who repaired two sections of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:4, 21), B. C. 459.

2. A layman of the descendants of Bani, who divorced his foreign wife at Ezra's command (Ezra x:36), B. C. 459.

3. A priest, or, better, a family of priests, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:5), B. C. 410.

MERES (mēr'rēz), (Heb. מְרֵס, meh'res, worthy), one of the seven eunuchs or councillors of the court of Babylon (Esth. i:14), B. C. 483.

MERIBAH (mēr'i-bah), (Heb. מֵרִיבָה, mer-ee-baw', quarrel, strife).

1. One of the names given by Moses to the fountain in the desert of Sin, on the western gulf of the Red Sea, which issued from the rock that he smote by the divine command (Exod. xvii:1-17). He called the place, indeed, Massa (temptation) and Meribah, and the reason is assigned 'because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they did there tempt the Lord.' (See WANDERING, THE; EXODUS, GEOGRAPHY OF THE.)

2. Another fountain produced in the same manner, and under similar circumstances, in the desert of Zin (Wady Arabah), near Kadesh; and to which the name was given with a similar reference to the previous misconduct of the Israelites (Num. xx:13, 24; Deut. xxxiii:8). In the last text, which is the only one where the two places are mentioned together, the former is called Massah only, to prevent the confusion of the two Meribahs, 'Whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.' Indeed, this latter Meribah is almost always indicated by the addition of 'waters,' i. e., waters of Meribah, as if further to distinguish it from the other (Ps. lxxxi:8; cvi:32); and still more distinctly 'waters of Meribah in Kadesh' (Num. xxvii:14; Deut. xxxii:51; Ezek. xlvii:19). Only once is this place called simply Meribah (Ps. xcv:8). It is strange, that with all this carefulness of distinction in Scripture, the two places should rarely have been properly discriminated.

MERIB-BAAI (mēr'ib-bā'al), (Heb. מֵרִיב־בַּעַל, mer-eeb'bah'al, contender with Baal), a name given to Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, in 1 Chron. viii:34; ix:40. (See MEPHIBOSHETH.)

Of the two the latter seems the more correct form. It means 'contender against Baal.' Some think that the difference has arisen from some corruption of the text; but, from the analogy of Ishbosheth, whose original name was Esh-baal, it seems more like a designed alteration, arising probably from the reluctance of the Israelites to pronounce the name of Baal. (See ISH-BOSHETH.)

MERODACH (me-rō'dak), (Heb. מְרֹדַךְ, mer-odawk', death, slaughter).

In conformity with the general character of Babylonian idolatry, Merodach is supposed to be the name of a planet; and, as the Tsbian and Arabic names for Mars are Nerig and Mirrich, 'arrow' (the latter of which Gesenius thinks may be for Mirdich, which is very nearly the same as Merodach), there is some presumption that it may be Mars. As for etymologies of the word, Gesenius has suggested that it is the Persian mardak, the diminutive of mard, 'man,' used as a term of endearment; or, rather, that it is from the Persian and Indo-Germanic mord, or mort (which means death, and is so far in harmony with the conception of Mars, as the lesser star of evil omen), and the affix och, which is found in many Assyrian names, as Nisroch, etc.

In Jer. 1:2 we read: "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces. Her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces."

Bel Merodach is one of the Babylonian deities, which is not only spoken of in the Scriptures, but which also finds frequent mention on the tablets. According to the inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar, Marduk or Merodach was the favorite deity of that king. These inscriptions begin by declaring Nebuchadnezzar to be the "King of Babylon, the exalted prince, the worshiper of Marduk, the prince supreme, the beloved of the god Nebo."

Nebuchadnezzar is never weary of extolling his own achievements and the glories of his capital city. The thirty or forty inscriptions of this king which are now in the British Museum all reflect the spirit of the boast: "Is not this great Babylon that I have built, for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power and for the honor of my majesty?" (Dan. iv:30).

He also describes the splendid temple which he built for Marduk or Bel Merodach, with its costly woods, "its silver and molten gold, and precious stones," and "sea clay" (amber), "with its seats of splendid gold, with lapis-lazuli, and alabaster blocks"; and these have been found in the ruins of Babylon.

And the king made the great festival Lilmuku when the image of Merodach was brought into his temple (4th Col., lines 1-6, Cun. Ins. West. Asia, Rec. of the Past).

The inscription also speaks of this idol temple as receiving "within itself the abundant tribute of the kings of the nations, and of all peoples."

This portion of Nebuchadnezzar's inscription is confirmed by the following statement in the book of Daniel: "And the Lord gave the King of Judah into his (Nebuchadnezzar's) hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god" (Dan. i:2).

MERODACH-BALADAN (me-rō'dak-bāl'ā-dān), (Heb. מְרֹדַח בַּלְאֲדָן, mer-o-dak' bal-ad-awn', Merodach has given a son).

Son of Baladan and king of Babylon. He is mentioned also with the name Berodach-baladan (2 Kings xx:12), which form is due to a confusion of two Hebrew characters which are much alike in their old forms. He is represented as sending messengers to Hezekiah to congratulate him on his recovery from his severe illness, and acquainting himself through them with all the treasures of the Jewish king (2 Chron. xxxii:1; Is. xxxix:1).

Merodach-baladan was by race a Chaldean, and though the Chaldeans were almost certainly Semites, they were nevertheless quite a different people. (See CHALDÆANS.) He is identified by most modern scholars with Mardokempad, referred to in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser, Sargon and Sennacherib. He reigned B. C. 721-710.

If Hezekiah's sickness immediately followed Sargon's campaign against Ashdod (in 711 B. C.), then Merodach-baladan's embassy, nominally to congratulate Hezekiah on recovery from his sickness, but really to ascertain the possibility of an alliance against Sargon, took place in 710 B. C. This order is not impossible, for Sargon's next two or three years were spent in fully crushing all of his foes in southern Babylonia. After the conquest and organization of all his long-dreamed-of realm, Sargon sought to perpetuate his fame in another way. He established at Khorsabad, several miles above Nineveh, his royal headquarters. Here he built his enormous palace, uncovered by Botta. He entered this magnificent home in 706 B. C., and in the very next summer was assassinated by one of his own soldiers. (See ASSYRIA.)

The assassination of Sargon yielded the throne of Assyria to his son, Sennacherib (705-681 B. C.). Whether this son had anything to do with the intrigue is not known. It is at least significant that the father's name is not found in the records of the son. This king of Assyria, from his frequent mention in the Bible, is most familiar to Bible students. His records of his own campaigns, his conquests, his cruelties, modify in no important respect the character attributed to him by the books of Kings and Isaiah.

The earlier activities of Sennacherib were confined to his eastern and southern boundaries. He measured lances with the irrepressible Chaldeans of the South. His own brother, whom he had put upon the throne of Babylon, was displaced by a usurper; and this usurper, after one month, was deposed by Merodach-baladan. Sennacherib swooped down on the intriguing army of seceders and crushed them, and established his authority in lower Babylonia. To secure himself still further, he captured and pillaged 75 cities and 420 villages; 208,000 captives, with nearly a million large and small cattle, he deported to Assyria. As a kind of figure-head, he placed on the throne of Babylon Bel-ibni, while the country of Chaldæa was under a military governor. With these temporary rulers in power, Sennacherib returned to Nineveh. (Price, The Monuments and the Old Test., pp. 179-181.)

Sennacherib then attacked the west, and while thus engaged a new rebellion began in Babylonia, in which, naturally enough, Merodach-baladan was ready to participate. It was, however, of very short duration, for Sennacherib entered the land again, and again Merodach-baladan fled. He put his goods, his people, and his gods upon boats, and floated them down the Euphrates to the Persian gulf, and settled on its eastern shores in a part of Elam, whither Sennacherib dared not follow. There in exile he soon died. His career is without a parallel among his people. It was filled with contradictions. No man before him of that race has held power so great for so long a time. He had failed ultimately, but his followers would in a later day succeed far beyond his dreams. (Dr. R. W. Rogers, Barnes' Bib. Cyc.)

MEROM (mē'rom), (Heb. מְרוֹם, may-rome', height, or upper waters). The waters of Merom, of Josh. xi:5 are the lake Semechonitis, now called Huleh, the upper or highest lake of the Jordan. (See PALESTINE).

It is four miles long (some say seven) by three and a half broad, and 270 feet below the Mediterranean Sea. The Jordan passes through it. It was called by the Greeks "Semachonitis," and and by the Arabs "Huleh." Here the confederate kings of North Canaan, under Jabin, king of Hazor, were gathered together, when Joshua fell upon them suddenly, rushing down on them from the mountain slopes, and utterly destroying them. The lake is surrounded by marshes and thickets of papyrus, and abounds in wild duck, pelican, and other fowl. On the north is an impenetrable jungle, the wallowing place of buffaloes. The miasma from the marshes renders the district very unhealthy. Kedesh, an important stronghold of Napthali, lay four miles west of its northern end.

MERONOTHITE (me-rōn'o-thite), (Heb. מֵרוֹנֹתַיִת, may-ro-no-thee'), an appellation of Jehdeiah, the herdsman of David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii: 30), and of Jadon, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:7). Meronoth is not otherwise known.

MERORIM (me-rō'rīm), (Heb. מֵרוֹרִים, me-ro-rim'), occurs in two places in Scripture, and is in both translated bitter herbs in our Authorized Version, as well as in several others.

In Exod. xii:8, Moses commanded the Jews to eat the lamb of the Passover 'with unleavened bread, and with bitter herbs (merorim) they shall eat it.' So at the institution of the second Passover, in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. ix:11).

Succory or endive was early selected as being the bitter herb especially intended; and Dr. Geddes justly remarks, that 'the Jews of Alexandria, who translated the Pentateuch, could not be ignorant what herbs were eaten with the paschal lamb in their days.' Jerome understood it in the same manner; and Pseudo-Jonathan expressly mentions horehound and lettuces. Forskal informs us that the Jews at Sana and in Egypt eat the lettuce with the paschal lamb. Aben Ezra, as quoted by Rosenmüller, states that the Egyptians used bitter herbs in every meal; so in India some of the bitter Cucurbitaceæ, as kurella, are constantly employed as food. (See ΠΑΚΥΟΤΗ.) It is curious that the two sets of plants which appear to have the greatest number of points in their favor, are the endive or succory, and one of the fragrant and usually also bitter labiate plants; because we find that the term marooa is in the East applied even in the present day both to the bitter wormwood and the fragrant Ocimum. Moreover the Chaldee translator, Jonathan, expressly mentions lettuce and horehound, or marrubium, which is also one of the Labiatae. It is important to observe that the Artemisia, and some of these fragrant labiatae, are found in many parts of Arabia and Syria; that is, in warm, dry, barren regions. The endive is also found in similar situations, but requires, upon the whole, a greater degree of moisture. Thus it is evident that the Israelites would be able to obtain suitable plants during their long wanderings in the Desert, though it is difficult for us to select any one out of the several which might have been employed by them. (See BITTER HERBS.)

MEROZ (mē'rōz), (Heb. מֵרוֹז, may-roze'), a place in the northern part of Palestine, the inhabitants of which are severely reprehended in Judg. v:23, for not having taken the field with Barak against Sisera.

It would seem as if they had had an opportunity of rendering some particular and important service to the public cause which they neglected. The site is not known; Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. under subject 'Merus') fix it twelve Roman miles from Sebaste, on the road to Dohaim; but this position would place it south of the field of battle, and therefore scarcely agrees with the history. Schwarz identifies it with el-Murussus, about four miles northwest of Beth-shean (Palest. p. 168).

MESECH (mē'sēk), (Ps. cxx:5). See MESHECH.

MESHA (mē'shà), (Heb. מֵשָׁא, may-shaw', middle district).

1. A place mentioned in describing that part of Arabia inhabited by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. x:30). Mouza, east of the Red Sea; Bischa, in northern Yemen; and Massa have been suggested as the place referred to. (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

2. A king of Moab, who possessed an immense number of flocks and herds, and appears to have derived his chief wealth from them. In the time of Ahab, he being then under tribute, 'rendered unto the king of Israel 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams, with the wool' (2 Kings iii:4). These numbers may seem exaggerated if understood as the amount of yearly tribute. It is, therefore, more probable that the greedy and implacable Ahab had at some one time levied this enormous impost upon the Moabites; and it is likely that it was in the apprehension of a recurrence of such ruinous exactions that they seized the opportunity for revolt which the death of Ahab seemed to offer (2 Kings i:11; iii:5). The short reign of Ahaziah afforded no opportunity for reducing them to obedience; but after his death his brother and successor, Jehoram, made preparations for war; and induced Jehoshaphat to join him in this expedition. The result, with the part taken by Elisha the prophet, has been related under other heads. (See ELISHA; JEHORAM; JEHOSEPHAT.) King Mesha was at length driven to shut himself up, with the remnant of his force, in Areopolis, his capital. He was there besieged so closely that, having been foiled in an attempt to break through the camp of the Edomites (who were present as vassals of Judah), he was reduced to extremities, and in the madness of his despair sought to propitiate his angry gods by offering up his own son, the heir of his crown, as a sacrifice, upon the wall of the city. On beholding this fearful sight, the besiegers withdrew in horror, lest some portion of the monstrous crime might attach to their own souls. By this withdrawal they, however, afforded the king the relief he desired, and this was, no doubt, attributed by him to the efficacy of his offering, and to the satisfaction of his gods therewith. The invaders, however, ravaged the country as they withdrew, and returned with much spoil to their own land. (See MOABITES.) Mesha was the author and subject of the inscription on the famous Moabite Stone. (See DIBON; MOABITE STONE.)

3. (Heb. as above.) Eldest son of Caleb, of Judah, family of Hezron, and founder of Ziph (1 Chron. ii:42). B. C. 1618.

4. (Heb. as above.) A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by Hodesh or Baara (1 Chron. viii:9), B. C. about 1612.

MESHACH (mē'shak), (Heb. or Chald. מֵשַׁח, may-shak'), a name given by the chief of the eunuchs in the court of Babylon to MISHAEL, who was in training for the rank of magi, and was one of the three faithful Jews saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. i:7; ii:49; iii:12-30).

MESHECH (mē'shēk), (Heb. מֵשֶׁךְ, meh'shek', possession).

Meshech in the Old Testament is nearly always mentioned in connection with his brother Tubal. In the Assyrian inscriptions the names appear as Tublā and Muskā. The classical geographers called them Tibareni and Moskhi. At this time, however, they belonged farther to the northward than they had been in the times of the Assyrian monuments.

In the time of Sargon and Sennacherib their territories still extended as far south as Cilicia and the northern half of Komagênê. Afterward they were forced to retreat northward toward the Black Sea, and it was in this region of Asia Minor that Xenophon and his Greek troops found what little remained of this people. (See Anabasis v, 5.)

In these two sons of Japheth (Meshech and Tubal) we must see representatives of the so-called Alarodian race, to which the modern Georgians belong. This people were once in possession of the highlands of Armenia, and the cuneiform inscriptions there found were evidently the work of the Alarodian princes who established a kingdom on the shores of Lake Van.

About B. C. 600 the Aryans from Phrygia entered Armenia, overthrew the old monarchy, and imposed their rule upon the indigenous population.

The majority of the Armenians still belong to the older race, although they have long since adopted the language of the invaders. (Sayce, Races of the Old Testament). (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

MESHELEMI AH (me-shēl'e-mi'ah), (Heb. מֶשֶׁלֶמִיָּא, mesh-eh-lem-yaw', friendship of Jehovah), a Korhite Levite, who with his seven sons and ten other relatives had charge of the east gate of the Temple under David (1 Chron. ix:21; xxvi:1). Called SHELEMI AH (1 Chron. xxvi:14), and apparently SHALLUM (1 Chron. ix:19). (See MESHULLAM, IO.) B. C. 1014.

MESHEZABEEL (me-shēz'a-beel), (Heb. מֶשֶׁזַבְעֵל, mesh-ay-zab-ale', delivered by God).

1. Apparently a priest, the father of Berechiah and ancestor of Meshullam (Neh. iii:4).

2. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:21), B. C. about 410.

3. Father of Pethahiah, of Judah (Neh. xi:24), B. C. 410.

MESHILLEMITH (me-shil'le-mith), (1 Chron. ix:12).

MESHILLEMOTH (me-shil'le-möth), (Heb. מֶשֶׁלֶמֹת, mesh-il-lay-moth', reconciliation).

1. An Ephraimite, father of the Berechiah, who opposed reducing his captive brethren of Judah to slavery (2 Chron. xxviii:12), B. C. before 735.

2. A priest, son of Immer (Neh. xi:13), B. C. before 440.

MESHOBAB (me-shö'bäb), (Heb. מֶשֶׁבַב, mesh-o-bawb', returned), a chief Simeonite who migrated to Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv:34), B. C. about 711.

MESHULLAM (me-shül'lam), (Heb. מֶשֶׁשׁוּלָם, mesh-ool-lawm', allied).

1. A chief Gadite, resident at Jerusalem in the reign of Jotham (1 Chron. v:13), B. C. 781.

2. Grandfather of Shaphan, the scribe (2 Kings xxii:3), B. C. about 623.

3. A priest, son of Zadok, and father of Hilkiah (1 Chron. ix:11; Neh. xi:11). The same as SHALLUM (1 Chron. vi:13; Ezra vii:2).

4. A Kohathite Levite who helped to oversee the repairing of the Temple in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv:12), B. C. 623.

5. A Benjamite, descendant of Elpaal, living at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:17), B. C. 589.

6. Father of Sallu (1 Chron. ix:7), and son of Joed (Neh. xi:7).

7. Eldest son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:19), B. C. about 536.

8. A chief priest, of the house of Ezra, in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii:13), B. C. after 536.

9. Another chief priest, son of Ginnethon, contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. xii:16), B. C. after 536.

10. A chief Israelite, sent with others by Ezra to accompany his party of Levites to Jerusalem (Ezra viii:16). He seems also to have assisted in finding out those who had married foreign wives (Ezra x:15), and possibly identical with the Temple warden (Neh. xii:25), B. C. about 440. The last mentioned Meshullam is called Meshelemiah (1 Chron. xxvi:1), Shelemiah (1 Chron. xxvi:14), and Shallum (Neh. vii:45).

11. One of the "sons" of Bani who divorced his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra x:29), B. C. 459.

12. A priest, son of Meshillemith, descendant of Immer (1 Chron. ix:12), B. C. after 440.

13. Son of Berechiah. He helped to repair two sections of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:4, 30). His daughter married Johanan, the son of Tobiah (Neh. vi:18), B. C. 446.

14. Son of Besodeiah, who helped Jehoiada repair the old gate of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:6), B. C. 446.

15. One of the princes of Judah who joined in the procession around the walls of Jerusalem at their completion (Neh. xii:33), B. C. 446.

16. A chief Benjamite, dwelling in Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chron ix:8), B. C. about 440.

17. One of the chief Israelites, who stood on Ezra's left when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii:4), B. C. about 410. Perhaps identical with 10, 13, 14, 15, or 16. Probably identical with the one who sealed the covenant (Neh. x:20).

18. A priest, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:7), B. C. about 410. Perhaps identical with 7 or 8.

MESHULLEMETH (me-shül'le-mëth), (Heb. מֶשֶׁשׁוּלֵמֶת, mesh-ool-leh'meth, friend), the wife of Manasseh, and mother of Amon (2 Kings xxi:19).

She was the daughter of Haruz of Jotbali. (B. C. 664-642.)

MESOBABITE (mes'o-bä'ite), (Heb. מֶשֶׁבַבִּי, mesh-o-baw-yaw' found of Jah), a title given to Jasiel, one of David's guard (1 Chron. xi:47). If it indicates a place there is no other notice of it.

MESOPOTAMIA (mës'o-po-tä'mi-ä), (Gr. Μεσοποταμία, mes-op-of-am-ee'ah, the country between the two rivers), the ordinary Greek rendering of the Heb. אֶרֶץ מֶשֶׁן נָהָרִים, ar'am nah-har-ah'yim, the Greek name given after the conquests of Alexander to the region between the Euphrates and the Tigris, excluding the northern part which continued to be known as Babylonia.

The name for this district in the Old Testament is Aram-Naharaim, or "Aram or Syria of the two rivers" (Gen. xxiv:10; Deut. xxiii:4; Judg. iii:8, 10; 1 Chron. xix:6), and Padan-aram or "Plain of Syria" (Gen. xxv:20; xxviii:2-7; xlv:15; also Aram or "Syria" (Num. xxiii:7; Gen. xxxi:20, 24; comp. Acts ii:9; vii:2). Under the former name it is referred to as the kingdom of Chushan-Rishathaim, who was conquered by Othniel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's brother (Judg. iii:8). Two great thoroughfares of trade led through Mesopotamia, both starting from Aleppo in Syria and passing, the one to Edessa on the Euphrates, and the other to Carchemish on the same river. This latter road is continued on the east of the Euphrates through Harran to the Tigris. It would therefore be along it, or in that line, that Abraham journeyed on his migration from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan. From about B. C. 800 Mesopotamia was subject to Assyria and the cities Gozan, Haran, and Rezepi, and Thelasar, are spoken of as among the conquests of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix:12). Jews from Mesopotamia were at Jerusalem at the great Pentecost (Acts ii:9), and

Stephen uses the name in his speech (Acts vii:2). (See ARAM.)

MESS (mēs), (Heb. מָשַׁח, mas-ayth', a raising, as of the hands in prayer, Ps. cxli:2; or of flame, Judg. xx:38, 40), a portion of food (Gen. xliii:34; 2 Sam. xi:8).

MESSIAH (mes-sī'ah), (Heb. מָשִׁיחַ, maw-sheeh-akh; Sept. Χριστός, anointed).

(1) The Anointed. In both languages this word signifies the same thing, viz., anointed. Hence Gr. Khris-tos', χριστός, the anointed priest, for the Hebrew, the high priest (Lev. iv:3, 5, 16). In order to have an accurate idea of the scriptural application of the term, we must consider the custom of anointing which obtained amongst the Jews. That which was specifically set apart for God's service was anointed, whether persons or things. (See ANOINTING.) Thus we read that Jacob poured oil upon the pillar (Gen. xxviii:18, 22). The tabernacle also and its utensils were anointed (Lev. viii:10), being thereby appropriated to God's service.

But this ceremony had, moreover, relation to persons. Thus priests, as Aaron and his sons, were anointed that they might minister unto God (Exod. xl:13, 15).

Kings were anointed. Hence it is that a king is designated the Lord's anointed in the Hebrew, and in the Greek the anointed of the Lord. Saul and David were, according to the divine appointment, anointed by Samuel (1 Sam. x:1; xv:1; xvi:3, 13). Zadok anointed Solomon, that there might be no dispute who should succeed David (1 Kings i:39).

We cannot speak with confidence as to whether the prophets were actually anointed with the material oil. We have neither an express law nor practice to this effect on record. True it is that Elijah is commanded to anoint Elisha to be prophet in his room (1 Kings xix:16); but no more may be meant by this expression than that he should constitute him his successor in the prophetic office; for all that he did, in executing his divine commission, was to cast his own garment upon Elisha (1 Kings xix:19); upon which he rose and ministered unto him (verse 21). For kings and priests the precept and practice are unquestionable.

(2) Redeemer of Humanity. But the name Messiah is, par excellence, applied to the Redeemer of man in the Old Testament (Dan. ix:25; Ps. ii:2). The words of Hannah, the mother of Samuel, at the close of her divine song, are very remarkable (1 Sam. ii:10): 'The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken in pieces; out of heaven shall He thunder upon them; the Lord shall judge the ends of the earth; and he shall give strength unto his king, and exalt the horn of his Messiah.' The Hebrews as yet had no king; hence the passage may be taken as a striking prophecy of the promised deliverer. In various parts of the New Testament is this epithet applied to Jesus. St. Peter (Acts x:36, 38) informs Cornelius the centurion that God had anointed Jesus of Nazareth to be the Christ, and our Lord himself acknowledges to the woman of Samaria that he is the expected Messiah (John iv:25). This term, however, as applied to Jesus, is less a name than the expression of his office.

Thus the Jews had in type, under the Mosaic dispensation, what we have in substance under the Christian system. The prophets, priests and kings of the former economy were types of Him who sustains these offices as the head of his mystical body, the Church. (See MEDIATOR.) As the priests and kings of old were set apart for their offices and dignities by a certain form prescribed in the law of Moses, so was the blessed Savior by a better anointing (of which the former was but a shadow), even by the Holy Ghost. Thus the apostle tells us that God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power (Acts x:38). He was anointed:

First, at his conception; the angel tells Mary, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God' (Luke i:35).

Second, at his baptism at the River Jordan (Matt. iii:13; Mark i:9, 10, 11, 12). St. Luke moreover records (Luke iv:17, 21) that our Lord being at Nazareth, he had given unto him the book of the prophet Isaiah; and on reading from ch. lxi:1, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me,' etc., he said to his hearers, 'This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.'

(3) Prophecy. But as the Jews will not acknowledge the right of either Jesus or his apostles to apply the prophetic passages which point to the Messiah to himself, it now remains for us to show—

First, That the promised Messiah has already come.

Second, That Jesus of Nazareth is unquestionably the Messiah who has come.

(a) To prove our first assertion, we shall confine our remarks to three prophecies. The first occurs in Gen. xlix:8, 10, where Jacob is giving his sons his parting benediction, etc. When he comes to Judah he says: 'The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.' It is evident that by Judah is here meant, not the person but the tribe; for Judah died in Egypt, without any preëminence. By scepter and lawgiver, are obviously intended the legislative and ruling power, which did, in the course of time, commence in David, and which, for centuries afterwards, was continued in his descendants. Whatever variety the form of government—whether monarchical or aristocratical—might have assumed, the law and polity were still the same. This prediction all the ancient Jews referred to the Messiah. Now, that the scepter has departed from Judah, and, consequently, that the Messiah has come, we argue from the acknowledgments of some most learned Jews themselves. The precise time when all authority departed from Judah is disputed. Some date its departure from the time when Herod, an Idumæan, set aside the Maccabees and Sanhedrim. Others think that it was when Vespasian and Titus destroyed Jerusalem and the Temple, that the Jews lost the last vestige of authority. If, therefore, the scepter has departed from Judah—and who can question it who looks at the broken-up, scattered, and lost state of that tribe for ages?—the conclusion is clearly irresistible, that the Messiah must have long since come. The tribe of Judah was in a most prosperous state.

The next proof that the Messiah has long since come, we adduce from Dan. ix:25, 26, 27. It is evident that the true Messiah is here spoken of. He is twice designated by the very name. And if we consider what the work is which he is here said to accomplish, we shall have a full confirmation of this. Who but He could finish and take away transgression, make reconciliation for iniquity, bring in everlasting righteousness, seal up the vision and prophecy, confirm the covenants with many, and cause to cease the sacrifice and oblation? If then it be the true Messiah who is described in the above prophecy, it remains for us to see how the time predicted for his coming has long since transpired. This is expressly said to be seventy weeks from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. That by seventy weeks are to be understood seventy sevens of years, a day being put for a year, and a week for seven years, making up 490 years, is allowed by Kimchi, Jarchi, Rabbi Saadias, and other learned Jews, as well as by many Christian commentators. This period of time then must have long since elapsed, whether we date its commencement from the first decree of Cyrus (Ezra i:1, 2), the second of Darius Hystaspes (ch. vi:15), or that of Artaxerxes (ch. viii:11). See Grotius De Veritat. v; Josephus, De Bell. Jud. vii, 12, 13.

We can only barely allude to one more remarkable prediction, which fixes the time of the Messiah's advent, viz., Hag. ii:7-9: 'I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations (or the desirable things of all nations shall come—R. V.): and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts. The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts.' The glory here spoken of must be in reference to the Messiah, or on some other account. It could not have been said that the second Temple exceeded in glory the former one; for in many particulars, according to the acknowledgment of the Jews themselves, it was far inferior both as a building (Ezra iii:3, 12), and in respect of the symbols and tokens of God's special favor being wanting (see Kimchi and R. Salomon on Hag. i:8). The promised glory, therefore, must refer to the coming and presence of him who was promised to the world before there was any nation of the Jews, and who is aptly called the 'Desire of all nations.' This view is amply confirmed by the prophet Malachi (iii:1). Since, then, the very Temple into which the Savior was to enter has for ages been destroyed, he must, if the integrity of this prophecy be preserved, have come. That there was, at the time of our Lord's birth, a great expectation of the Messiah, both amongst Jews and Gentiles, may be seen from three celebrated historians, as well as from the sacred Scriptures. We may just add that as there was a general expectation of the Messiah at this time, so there were many impostors who drew after them many followers (Joseph. Antiq. xx:2, 6; De Bell. Jud. lvii:31). See also a full account of the false Christs who appeared by John à Lent Schediasm, c:2; Maimon, Ep. ad Judæos Marsilienses; Christ prophesies of such persons (Matt. xxiv:24, 29).

(b) The limits of this article will admit of our only touching upon the proofs that Jesus of Nazareth, and none other, is the very Messiah who was to come.

(1) What was predicted of the Messiah was fulfilled in Jesus. Was the Messiah to be of the seed of the woman (Gen. iii:15), and this woman a virgin? (Is. vii:14). So we are told (Gal. iv:4; Matt. i:18, 22, 23) that Jesus was made of a woman, and born of a virgin. Was it predicted that he (Messiah) should be of the tribe of Judah, of the family of Jesse, and of the house of David? (Mic. v:2; Gen. xlix:10; Is. xi:10; Jer. xxiii:5). This was fulfilled in Jesus (Luke i:27, 69; Matt. i:1). (See GENEALOGY.)

(2) If the Messiah was to be a prophet like unto Moses, so was Jesus also (Deut. xviii:15; John vi:14). If the Messiah was to appear in the second Temple, so did Jesus (Hag. ii:7, 9; John xviii:20).

(3) Was the Messiah to work miracles? (Is. xxxv:5, 6; comp. Matt. xi:4, 5).

(4) If the Messiah was to suffer and die (Is. liii), we find that Jesus died in the same manner, at the very time, and under the identical circumstances, which were predicted of him. The very man who betrayed him, the price for which he was sold, the indignities he was to receive in his last moments, the parting of his garments, and his last words, etc., were all foretold of the Messiah, and accomplished in Jesus.

(5) Was the Messiah to rise from the dead? So did Jesus. How stupendous and adorable is the Providence of God, who, through so many apparent contingencies, brought such things to pass! J. W. D.

METALS (mēt'als). The principal metals are in this work considered separately under their several names; and a few general observations alone are necessary in this place.

(1) Native Minerals. The mountains of Palestine contained metals, nor were the Hebrews ignorant of the fact (Deut. viii:9); but they do not appear to have understood the art of mining. They therefore obtained from others the superior as well as the inferior metals, and worked them up. They received also metal utensils ready made, or metal in plates (Jer. x:9), from neighboring and distant countries of Asia and Europe. The metals named in the Old Testament are (Heb. ^{בַּרְזֶל} barzel, iron steel, (Jer. xv:12) ^{נֶחֱשֶׁת} nekh-o'sheth (Heb. ^{כֶּסֶף} kef-sef), rendered brass, included copper, copper ore, and bronze, and also brass if zinc was then known; tin, (^{בַּדְּעֵל} bed-eel') and lead (Heb. ^{עִפְרַיִם} o-feh'reth); (Heb. ^{כֶּהֶסֶף} keh'sef, silver; (Heb. ^{זָהָב} zaw-hawb', gold. The trade in these metals was chiefly in the hands of the Phœnicians (Ezek. xxvii:12), who obtained them from their colonies, principally those in Spain (Jer. x:9; Ezek. xxvii:12). Some also came from Arabia (Ezek. xxvii:19), and some apparently from the countries of the Caucasus¹ (Ezek. xxvii:13). A composition of several metals is expressed by the Hebrew word chasmil. (See CHASMIL.)

(2) Metallic Compositions. In general the ancients had a variety of metallic compositions, and that which the word chasmil describes appears to have been very valuable. Whether it was the same as that precious compound known among the ancients as Corinthian brass is uncertain, but it is likely that in later times the Jews possessed splendid vessels of the costly compound known by that name. Indeed, this is distinctly affirmed by Josephus (Vita, 13).

The vast quantity of silver and gold used in the temple in the time of Solomon, and which was otherwise possessed by the Jews during the flourishing time of the nation, is very remarkable, under whatever interpretation we regard such texts as 1 Chron. xxii:14; xxix:4, etc. In like manner, we find among other ancient Asiatic nations, and also among the Romans, extraordinary wealth in gold and silver vessels and ornaments of jewelry. As all the accounts, received from sources so various, cannot be founded on exaggeration, we may rest assured that the precious metals were in those ancient times obtained abundantly from mines—gold from Africa, India, and perhaps even then from Northern Asia; and silver principally from Spain.

(3) Metallic Manufactures. The following are the metallic manufactures named in the Old Testament:—Of iron, axes (Deut. xix:5; 2 Kings vi:5); saws (2 Sam. xii:31); stone-cutters' tools (Deut. xxvii:5); sauce-pans (Ezek. iv:3); bolts, chains, knives, etc., but especially weapons of war (1 Sam. xvii:7; 1 Macc. vi:35). Bedsteads were even sometimes made of iron (Deut. iii:11); 'chariots of iron,' i. e., war-chariots, are noticed elsewhere. (See CHARIOTS.) Of copper we find vessels of all kinds (Lev. vi:28; Num. xvi:39; 2 Chron. iv:16; Ezra viii:27); and also weapons of war, principally helmets, cuirasses, shields, spears (1 Sam. xvii:5, 6, 38; 2 Sam. xxi:16); also chains (Judg. xvi:21); and even mirrors (Exod. xxxviii:8). (See COPPER.) Gold and silver furnished articles of ornament, also vessels, such as cups, goblets, etc. The holy vessels of the temple were mostly of gold (Ezra v:14). Idolaters had idols and other sacred objects of silver (Exod. xx:23; Is. ii:20; Acts xvii:29; xix:24). Lead is mentioned as being used for weights, and for plumb-lines in measuring (Amos vii:7; Zech. v:8).

(4) Tools of the Workers. Some of the tools of workers in metal are also mentioned: Paam, anvil (Is. xli:7); makkabah (Is. xlii:12); pat-tish, hammer (Is. xli:7); mal kachim, pincers; and mappuach, bellows (Jer. vi:29); matzreph, crucible (Prov. xvii:3); cur, melting-furnace (Ezek. xxii:18).

There are also allusions to various operations connected with the preparation of metals. (1) The smelting of metal was not only for the purpose of rendering it fluid, but in order to separate and purify the richer metal when mixed with baser minerals, as silver from lead, etc. (Is. i:25; comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvii:47; Ezek. xxii:18-20). The dross separated by this process is called sgim, although this word also applies to metal not yet purified from its dross. For the actual or chemical separation other materials were mixed in the smelting, such as alkaline salts, bor (Is. i:25), and lead (Jer. vi:29; comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii:31). (2) The casting of images (Exod. xxv:12; xxvi:37; Is. xl:19); which are always of gold, silver, or copper. The casting of iron is not mentioned, and was perhaps unknown to the ancients (Hausmann, in Commentatt. Soc. Goett. iv:53; sq.; Müller, Archäol. p. 371.) (3) The hammering of metal and making it into broad sheets (Num. xvi:38; Is. xlii:12; xl:19). (4) Soldering and welding parts of metal together (Is. xli:7). (5) Smoothing and polishing metals (1 Kings vii:45). (6) Overlaying with plates of gold and silver and copper (Exod. xxv:11-24; 1 Kings vi:20; 2 Chron. iii:5; comp. Is. xl:19). The execution of these different metallurgic operations appears to have formed three distinct branches of handicraft before the exile; for we read of the blacksmith, by the name of the 'worker in iron' Is. xlii:12; the brass founder (1 Kings vii:14); and the gold and silver smith (Judg. xvii:4; Mal. iii:2).

The invention of the metallurgic arts is in Scripture ascribed to Tubal-cain (Gen. iv:22). In later times the manufacture of useful utensils and implements in metals seems to have been carried on to a considerable extent among the Israelites, if we may judge from the frequent allusions to them by the poets and prophets. But it does not appear that, in the finer and more elaborate branches of this great art, they made much, if any, progress during the flourishing times of their commonwealth; and it will be remembered that Solomon was obliged to obtain assistance from the Phœnicians in executing the metal work of the temple (1 Kings vii:13, 14).

The Hebrew workers in iron, and especially such as made arms, were frequently carried away by the different conquerors of the Israelites (1 Sam. xiii:19; 2 Kings xxiv:14, 15; Jer. xxiv:1; xxix:2); which is one circumstance among others to show the high estimation in which this branch of handicraft was anciently held.

METEYARD (mēt'yārd), (Heb. מֵטָרָה, mid' daw, extension, Lev. xix:35), a yard measure. (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

METHEG-AMMAH (mē'theg-ām'mah), (Heb. מֵתֵג עַמָּה, meh'theg haw-am-maw', bridle of the mother, i. e., curb of the city), a figurative term applied to a city, probably Gath, taken by David from the Philistines (2 Sam. viii:1). A. V. "bit of the metropolis."

METHODISM, EPISCOPAL, IN THE UNITED STATES.

1. The Methodist Episcopal Church.

Small, indeed, the beginnings, but steady the growth and mighty the present stature, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Figures gathered nearly two years ago (the latest accessible) make the total ministry and lay membership of the church at that time 2,925,629. The same authority (Methodist Year Book, 1901) makes the total value of church and parsonage property $145,759,844, or in round numbers, at the present time, $150,000,000 for these two items alone.

(1) Introduction to America. This is certainly a sizable tree. From what sort of a seed did it spring, and how did it get rooted? A young Irish carpenter, Philip Embury, is believed to have delivered what may be fairly called the first Methodist sermon in America, to a congregation of five persons in his own humble house in New York. He had been licensed as a local preacher among the followers of Wesley in Ireland, but had made no move religiously during the six years of his residence in the New World, until stirred thereto in 1766 by the strong exhortations of a fellow immigrant, Mrs. Barbara Heck. The start proved to be timely, and in the order of God. The numbers soon increased, a more commodious room was hired, and the excitement rapidly spread. Early in 1767 another Wesleyan local preacher, Capt. Thomas Webb, of the British army, recently appointed barrackmaster at Albany, hearing of the struggling society at New York, hastened to its aid. A stone chapel, the first Methodist meeting-house in America, was dedicated October 30, 1768, and soon crowded with hearers. Thus the movement grew.

(2) Francis Asbury. And now most naturally the eyes of the little company looked for aid to their great father over the sea. Wesley being appealed to sent a couple of preachers, October, 1769, and eight more came in the five years following, but none of them stayed long or were very successful except Francis Asbury. His name is the greatest in the history of Methodism on this side of the water. Dr. Leonard Woolsey Bacon, writing "A History of American Christianity" this year, says of him: "It may reasonably be doubted whether any one man from the founding of the church [meaning the Church of Christ] in America until now has achieved so much in the visible and traceable results of his work." Though only a peasant boy, without education, he proved to be a general of consummate ability, invincible energy and wide-reaching plans. He kept the preachers on the march, and wonderfully aroused the people. Under his wise guidance Methodism passed through the troubled years of the Revolutionary War without a check to its progress, and in 1784 there were 15,000 members, 84 itinerant preachers and probably not less than 200,000 attendants on worship.

(3) Independence Gained. The Methodist Episcopal Church, strictly speaking, in its distinctive organized form as an American institution, began in the closing week of the year 1784. Up to that time the Methodists here had been an offshoot of British Methodism, more or less subject to the control of its founder, John Wesley, and the societies which had been established were in no proper sense a church. This inchoate and unsatisfactory condition of things had been endured with exemplary patience, though not without agitation, until the securing of the independence of the republic. This brought matters to a crisis. Wesley took the right steps. He clearly discerned the signs of the times and believed he had the guidance of the Spirit. He dispatched his right-hand man, Dr. Thomas Coke—having first, in connection with two other presbyters, ordained or set him apart as general superintendent or bishop—to arrange matters. The American Methodist ministers assembled in conference at Baltimore, proceeded, in accordance with the counsel of Wesley, to form themselves into an episcopal church, with superintendents or bishops, elders or presbyters, and deacons, the episcopal office being elective and the elected bishops being amenable to the body of ministers. Coke and Asbury were unanimously elected first incumbents of the office. General rules were adopted, twenty-five Articles of Religion, abridged by Mr. Wesley from the thirty-nine of the Church of England, were accepted, a variety of minor regulations were passed, and the shaping of the new ecclesiastical edifice was, for the time, finished, with remarkable oneness of spirit and great practical wisdom.

(4) The Doctrines. The doctrines of the new church cannot, of course, be stated here with any fullness, yet since they have been one of the main elements, if not chief of all, in its growth, a paragraph must be devoted to them. Calvinism was vigorously repudiated from the start. The doctrines of election, predestination, limited atonement, irresistible grace, and final perseverance of the Saints as set forth by those who accounted themselves the only orthodox, were stoutly opposed in every Methodist pulpit, and the common-sense of the people soon ranged itself with them. On the positive side Methodism gave emphasis in its preaching to the doctrines having closest connection with the spiritual life, and this also powerfully appealed to the people, meeting their needs and capturing their assent. It promoted revivals by preaching strongly the lost condition of humanity without Christ, the freedom of his grace to all who seek and the assurance of present salvation by simple faith in the Savior. It secured thoroughness of religious experience in vast numbers of cases by urging its converts on to complete consecration, which they were taught would be accompanied by a corresponding purification from sin. A bright, joyous, active type of religion was thus produced, very attractive to the multitudes and very effective as a means of church advancement. A free, a full, and a present salvation, which was the early rallying-cry of the Methodist hosts, proved amazingly productive of extensive as well as permanent results. A reasonable religion, being joined with a very earnest religion, swept the country. The freedom of the human will was emphasized rather than the absolute sovereignty of God. God's love was dwelt upon rather than his justice, though by no means to the exclusion of the latter. The depravity of man was not regarded as being total in any ordinary sense of that word, since God's spirit works in all and gracious ability to accept the offers of mercy is freely supplied to all. Methodism is not sacramentative or sacerdotal, but takes a moderate view of the ordinances. It believes that the baptism of infants should be retained in the church, and it offers in theory to all its converts who have not been baptized in infancy their choice as to sprinkling, pouring or dipping; but in practice nearly all are sprinkled.

(5) The Polity. Another large element in the growth of Methodism has been its form of church government. This, therefore, must be briefly sketched. It has a marvelous system of conferences and a complete set of officials carefully graded, all interlocking in a way to secure close supervision and great efficiency of movement, without seriously or needlessly infringing personal liberty. The General Conference, which has supreme jurisdiction over the entire denomination, and is the only legislative body in it, meets on the first Wednesday of May in every fourth year and continues in session about a month. Since 1812 it has been a delegated body, at first wholly of ministers, but since 1872 a part of the delegates have been laymen. It makes such laws, rules and regulations as the interests of the church seem to require, elects the Bishops and other general officers, such as publishing agents, editors and secretaries, supervises all the connectional societies and maintains fraternal relations with other churches. Its powers are somewhat restricted by a constitution, but in most matters it has a free hand. The annual conferences, meeting once a year, are next in order of importance. Including mission conferences and missions, they number now one hundred and forty-five, and are in almost all parts of the world. They are composed entirely of traveling preachers, have only administrative functions, and are presided over by the Bishops. In most Annual Conferences there are several District Conferences, held by the Presiding Elders and composed of the preachers and lay officials of all churches in the districts. Finally, each church or pastoral charge (where several small churches are under one man) has its own Quarterly Conference (consisting of local preachers, exhorters, class leaders, stewards, trustees, Sunday-school superintendents and presidents of Epworth Leagues), which supervises the interests of the charge. The duties of these various lay officers cannot be here specified; but since the most distinctive characteristic of the Methodist economy is the itinerancy of its ministers, a word should be said as to this feature. It sprang up providentially through the necessities of the early days, but it has proved a marvelous labor-saving arrangement. At first the preachers were moved, as a rule yearly, in some instances every six months, though there was no law against their indefinite reappointment to the same place. Then (in 1804) a rule was made that no preacher should be allowed to remain in one station more than two years successively; in 1864 it was changed to three years; in 1888 to five years; and at the General Conference held in Chicago in 1900 the time limit was removed. The Bishop presiding at the annual conference is authorized to fix the appointments, but he is aided in this arduous duty by information furnished him from both churches and ministers, chiefly through the Presiding Elders, whose business it is to travel all the year, having general oversight, each one of a District comprising from twenty to seventy churches. This system distributes evenly, with very little friction, the talents of the ministry, and supplies every church with a preacher and every preacher with a church all the time.

(6) Growth. After being fully organized, as described, the church proceeded on its widening way, not without difficulties, perplexities, and occasional dissensions, but on the whole with marvelous success. In 1789, Methodism, under the leadership of Jesse Lee, was introduced into New England, it having previously been confined to the Middle and Southern States. It pushed westward with great vigor, by means of its itinerant, circuit-riding preachers, with their headquarters in the saddle, who kept pace with the advancing tide of emigration. It was the first religious body to congratulate Washington on his inauguration to the presidency in 1789. It was the first to establish, develop and recognize the vast importance of Sunday-schools. It very early laid great emphasis on camp-meetings, and has been more largely identified with this useful means of grace than any other church. Its first literary institution, Cokesbury College, in Maryland, opened in 1787, was burned down in 1795. It was some time before the church, in its poverty, rallied from this blow, but after a while attention was turned anew in this direction, colleges and academies began to be founded, and in the last fifty years (especially the last thirty years) great strides have been made. There are now not far from one hundred and fifty high-class institutions in this country under the various names of university, college, institute, seminary, academy, together with about eighty more of diverse grades in the foreign mission fields. The total value of grounds, buildings and endowments is put in the last reports at $31,385,920, with 46,545 students in attendance. Chief among these institutions are the American University at Washington, the Northwestern University at Chicago, the Boston University at Boston, the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., the Syracuse University at Syracuse, N. Y., the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio, De Pauw University at Greencastle, Ind., and Dickinson College at Carlisle, Pa. A general Board of Education, chartered in 1860, looks after this interest.

(7) Missions. The Methodist Episcopal Church has been thoroughly missionary from the start so far as the evangelization of this country is concerned, and has expended immense sums on the frontiers, in the cities, among the colored people of the South, the Indians of the West, and the various foreign races that have come to our shores. Its Missionary Society was not regularly organized till 1819, and its first foreign mission, that to Liberia, was not entered upon till 1833. Next it went to South America, 1836; to China in 1847; to Germany in 1849; to India in 1856. It is working now in many parts of Europe (including Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark, Russia, Bulgaria, Italy, Switzerland, Germany) in East Africa and Central Africa, as well as Liberia; in Peru, Chili, Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil and Argentine; in Mexico, Japan, Korea, Malaysia; besides five missions in China and five in India. And in these various fields it has about one hundred and eighty thousand communicants, besides nearly as many adherents. Nearly a million and a quarter of dollars (sometimes more) have been for a few years past annually raised by this society, which covers both foreign and domestic missions. There is in addition a Woman's Foreign Mission Society, begun in 1869, which raises over $300,000 a year, and a Woman's Home Missionary Society, organized in 1880. The total missionary disbursements of the Methodist Episcopal Church through these three societies are about a million and three-quarters a year, and another quarter of a million is expended by the City Missionary Societies.

(8) The Book Concern. The publishing agency of the church (technically called the "Book Concern") was set in motion as early as 1789, and has wonderfully prospered until now it has magnificent headquarters in New York and Cincinnati, and Chicago, with agencies or depositories of large importance at Kansas City, San Francisco, Detroit, Pittsburg and Boston. It publishes a large number of periodicals and papers, makes annual sales of two million dollars, and has a capital of nearly three and a half millions. It has passed all financial panics without the slightest interruption or danger; has cleared profits of six million dollars in the last fifty years and has paid out half of this for various church objects.

(9) Societies. Other organizations dear to the church and employed by it as instrumentalities of wide usefulness are the Sunday School Union (begun in 1827), the Tract Society (organized in 1852), the Board of Church Extension (incorporated in 1865), the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society (started in 1866), and the Epworth League (formed in 1889 by the junction of several young people's societies). This latter has at the present time over twenty thousand senior chapters and over seven thousand junior chapters, or about two million members. The Freedmen's Aid Society has expended nearly $4,500,000 in the South since the war. The Church Extension Board has, during the last twelve years, aided in building nearly twelve thousand new churches, and has a Loan Fund of over $2,500,000. The Hospital and Deaconess work has greatly extended during the past few years.

(10) Secessions. Such are a few of the results which exhibit themselves after something more than a hundred years of effort. The detailed history cannot be given here. As already intimated, it has not been entirely peaceful. This would be too much to expect considering the frailty of human nature. There have been a variety of secessions, none of them, it is worthy of notice, arising from strife over doctrines, but all springing out of differences of opinion over administration. James O'Kelley, a flaming Irishman of great ability and extensive influence in Virginia, led off a small following in 1792, because the Conference refused to restrict the power of the bishops in the appointment of the ministers. In 1816 the colored members of Philadelphia and vicinity withdrew and organized the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and a secession from it in 1820 formed the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. In 1830 the Methodist Protestant Church was organized by those who were restive under the power of the bishops, presiding elders and ministers, and had been defeated in their strenuous demand for the incorporation of the lay element in the General Conference. In 1843, many preachers and members, who were dissatisfied with what they deemed the too favorable attitude of the Church toward slavery, withdrew and constituted the American Wesleyan Church. And in 1845 there was organized at Louisville, Ky., the Methodist Episcopal Church South, embracing nearly all the ministers and members in the slave-holding states (about five hundred thousand) who were dissatisfied with the hostile attitude toward slavery exhibited by the General Conference of 1844. These are all the departures of any consequence. For the last fifty years matters have moved on smoothly. There has been agitation looking towards various changes in polity, some of it successful, some unsuccessful, but there has been no further split, and is not likely to be. The most recent conflicts have been for the purpose of changing the composition of the General Conference so that the laymen shall be as numerous as the ministers, and women delegates may be admitted as well as men. The former has already been won and the last General Conference was composed of an equal number of lay and ministerial delegates. Prevailing sentiment favors the admission of women delegates.

(11) The Last Half Century. The progress in the last half century has been uniform and great. In 1848 there were but six hundred and forty-two thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven communicants lay and ministerial. There are now, as before said, just about three million. And the encouraging feature about it is that the latest years have shown the most rapid advance. In 1883, eighteen years ago, we had eighteen thousand seven hundred and forty-one churches; there are now about twenty-seven thousand. In 1883 our total membership was one million seven hundred and sixty-nine thousand five hundred and thirty-four; we had in our foreign missions forty-three thousand one hundred communicants; the total value of church and parsonage property was $79,238,085. It will be seen from these figures, compared with those given before for the present, that the Church seems to be just beginning to grow.

Nor do we find on examination that this outward prosperity has been won by any sacrifice of spiritual life or any criminal conformity to worldly folly. Outward methods and habits are different but the heart is no less sound and true. Revivals are still of constant occurrence, and there is very deep interest on all subjects pertaining to the higher Christian life. There has been no lowering of the rigid standard of morals for which from the start Methodism has been nobly conspicuous. It still occupies the foremost position on the temperance question, it still pronounces strongly against demoralizing worldly amusements. Dr. Buckley, one of the latest historians of the church, asking at the close of his volume, "Has Methodism lost to a dangerous degree its original vital impulse?" finds himself able to answer it in the negative. He says, "The flames of pure devotion burn upon many an altar, accessions by conversion are numerous, many preachers deliver truth in the power of the Holy Ghost, and every society contains those who cry continually, 'Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee?'" He thinks that the many institutions which have been superadded to the simpler methods and forms of the fathers are being made tributary to the great work for which Methodism was established. We are quite certain that this is the case, and that the original purposes of the Methodist Episcopal Church are still being carried out under changed conditions. It started, in the language of the Discipline, "to evangelize the continent and spread spiritual holiness over these lands." It is still doing this, and is likely to continue it with unabated efficiency. Its sources of strength, under God, are in itself, its record has been every way creditable, and its future seems bright. Its progress has not been due to any government aid, nor to members received from emigration, nor to prestige on account of great wealth, social position or superior educational facilities. All these things have been against it. It has been the church of the masses. Its growth has been due to its reasonable doctrines, its earnest piety, its military form of church government. It has been, and still is, a church thoroughly missionary in its organization and well adapted to avail itself promptly of all favorable openings, filled with reverent fire and burning with a zeal to bring men to God, brotherly and social in its spirit, identifying itself with all classes and making them feel at home within its walls, liberal in its opinions yet high-toned in its spiritual life, and admirably adapted every way to the wants of the new nation in which Providence placed it. How could it, being thus, do anything else but thrive as church never throve before.

Dr. J. M. Buckley says, "The most potent forces which account for the numerical increase of Methodism, the mutual labors of pastors and people in the local societies, are incapable of historic description. Yet without them the visible fabric of Methodism would be as the log-hut in which the fathers preached compared with the elaborate ecclesiastical structures which prosperity has made possible."

Bishop Charles H. Fowler says, "What does Methodism mean? It has the fecundity of the acorn. It shall wave on the mountains like the forests of Lebanon. It shall whiten all seas and all worlds with the sails of its spiritual commerce. It has the enlightening power of the school; it shall shine into every dark corner, driving all superstitions and all goblins from the earth's surface. It has the vigilance of the invisible police; it shall expose with the glare of its searchlight every stealthy criminal. It has the compact organization of an army, it shall march with its swing of conquest through every known valley and plain, and plant the cross of the Redeemer on every hilltop and mountain peak."

Dr. Abel Stevens, the principal historian of Methodism in this country, at the close of the last of the four volumes in which he narrates the rise and development of the Methodist Episcopal Church, says: "This lowly Methodistic story is but the reproduction in substance, of the apostolic history, and presents, in full vitality, that original, that only example of evangelical propagandism, which, when all dogmatic conflicts and hierarchical pretensions, with their wasted passions and pomps, are recorded as historical failures, will bear forward to universal triumph the ensign of the cross by a catholic, living, working church of the common people." J. M.

2. The Methodist Episcopal Church South.

The movement called Methodism originated one hundred and fifty years ago in England, when the Wesleys and Whitfield began their evangelical preaching to the masses. "The field preaching of Wesley and Whitfield, in 1739," says Isaac Taylor, "was the event whence the religious epoch, now current, must date its commencement." The first Methodist Conference was held in the Foundry, London, beginning June 25, 1744. In 1760 Robert Strawbridge came to America, and settled at Sam's Creek, Maryland. Soon after he built the first Methodist church in the United States. In 1766, Philip Embury, a local preacher, organized a Methodist society in New York, being assisted by Barbara Heck. From these beginnings Methodism continued to grow until 1773, when the first annual conference in America was held in the city of Philadelphia. In December, 1784, in Baltimore, at Lovely Lane Chapel, the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury were elected and ordained bishops. The Methodist Episcopal Church prospered and grew until 1844, when the agitation on the subject of slavery, which had been going on for some years, culminated in the division of the church. A short time previous to the General Conference of 1844, Bishop James O. Andrew, of Georgia, had married a lady possessed of slaves. Soon after their marriage, in order to free himself from any ownership in these slaves, he had secured them to her by a deed of trust. But the sentiment against his position was so strong among the delegates from the Northern Conferences that when the General Conference met, by a vote of 110 to 68, they passed a resolution that "It is the sense of this General Conference that he [Bishop Andrew] desist from the exercise of this office so long as this impediment remains." The result was a protest from the southern delegates, followed by a long discussion, which resulted in the adoption of a "Plan of Separation." Under the provisions of this plan the delegates from the Southern Conferences met in Louisville, Ky., in May, 1845, and organized the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Since that time this church has gone forward with its work, being faithful to the traditions and principles of Methodism, until now it numbers nearly a million and a half communicants, and 6,000 traveling preachers.

(1) Condition of Membership. While Methodism accepts the great cardinal doctrines of Christianity, such as are crystallized in the Apostles' Creed, there are several distinctive features in her doctrine and polity. Perhaps the most noticeable thing in Methodism is the broad condition of its membership, including all those who desire to flee from the wrath to come. This is the only condition required for admission into the M. E. Church South, the pastor being authorized to receive candidates as soon as he is satisfied of their sincerity.

(2) Witness of the Spirit. Methodism places emphasis on a personal experience and teaches that it is the privilege of every Christian to have a conscious knowledge of the pardon of sin. This doctrine of a conscious conversion, and of a direct witness of the Spirit testifying to the heart of the believer that he is a child of God is, as has been said, "the true key" to Methodist theology.

(3) Free Will. The doctrines of universal redemption and of the freedom of the human will are cardinal principles in Methodism. The M. E. Church South, in common with all other branches of Methodism, teaches that the sacrifice of Christ derived infinite value from the divinity of his person, and is therefore intrinsically sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole human race; that he "died for all men," and that salvation does not depend on an arbitrary decree, but upon the willingness or unwillingness of each man to comply with the gospel conditions of salvation. A natural inference from this is the absolute freedom of the human will. Methodists believe in justification by faith. "Justification is the divine judicial act which applies to the sinner believing in Christ the benefit of the atonement, delivering him from the condemnation of his sin, introducing him into a state of favor, and treating him as a righteous person." It is a judicial act, something done for the sinner because of his faith, as regeneration is something done in him, the two being part of the one work of conversion. The originating cause of justification is the love of God; the meritorious cause is the atonement of Christ; the instrumental cause is the personal faith of the believer.

(4) The New Birth. Regeneration is an important Methodist doctrine, and is the new birth, a change of heart. All Methodists teach that "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." It is the work of the Holy Spirit and is a conscious change in the heart and the life.

(5) The Sacraments. Methodism teaches that there are but two sacraments—baptism and the Lord's supper. The Methodist Church holds that the three modes of baptism—pouring, sprinkling, and immersion—are equally valid, but that the vast preponderance of evidence is in favor of pouring or sprinkling. Methodism also teaches the baptism of infants.

(6) The Itinerancy. The chief feature of the Methodist polity is the itinerant system. Every itinerant Methodist preacher is a member of some annual conference, and the bishop presiding over each conference appoints every preacher to some pastoral charge for one year. No preacher can be appointed to the same pastoral charge for more than four consecutive years in the M. E. Church South. From fifteen to twenty pastoral charges constitute a district, over which a presiding elder is appointed, whose duty it is "To travel through his appointed District, in order to preach and to oversee the spiritual and temporal affairs of the Church." No presiding elder can be appointed for more than four years to the same District.

(7) The Conferences. In every pastoral charge a quarterly conference, composed of the official board and local preachers, is held every three months; a conference of all the members of a church may be held monthly; a District Conference, composed of the preachers and delegated laymen of a district is held annually; an Annual Conference, composed of all the preachers and lay delegates in the bounds of that conference, is held once a year, and a General Conference, composed of one preacher and one layman for every forty-eight clerical members of an Annual Conference, is held every four years. The business of the General Conference is: (1) The election of bishops when deemed necessary; (2) To create and readjust the boundaries of the Annual Conference; (3) To revise the laws and rules of Discipline; (4) To superintend the interests of foreign missions; (5) To elect the various connectional officers of the Church.

(8) Principles. The principles and polity of Methodism have borne the test of one hundred and fifty years, and no branch of Methodism has grown more rapidly than the M. E. Church South. She stands to-day for a pure and aggressive Christianity, and claims that her mission is to "Spread scriptural holiness over this land." W. F. B.

3. The African Methodist Episcopal Church.

(1) Historic Period. The African Methodist Episcopal Church is the oldest and largest organization among the negroes. It has grown up in four distinct periods. The heroic period, beginning in 1787 and continuing until 1816. The organic period, from 1816 to 1868. The developing period, extending from 1868 to 1892, and from 1892 to 1900 has been an expansion period, the borders of the church having extended to the uttermost parts of the earth.

The originating cause of the existence of the African Methodist Episcopal Church was the in-treatment of the negro members of St. George's Methodist Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, Pa., by the white members of the same in the years 1785, 1786 and 1787.

Richard Allen was a local preacher in the church, and his brethren were denied their rights and were insulted. He organized a class of forty-two persons. This class continued under the care of St. George's Church for several years, but there was much friction between the class and church, which resulted in a call for a convention of all persons and churches having grievances because of ill-treatment received in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The convention was held in Philadelphia, April 9, 1816. The following persons were present: Richard Allen, Jacob Tapsico, Clayton Durham, James Champion and Thomas Webster, all of Philadelphia, Pa.; Daniel Coker, Richard Williams, Henry Harding, Stephen Hill, Edward Williams and Nicholson Gilliard, of Baltimore, Md.; Peter Spencer, of Wilmington, Del.; Jacob Marsh, Edward Jackson, and William Andrews, of Attleboro, Pa., and Peter Cuff, of Salem, N. J.

(2) Growth and Statistics. Up to the present time thirty bishops have been elected and sixty-eight annual conferences have been organized. Nearly all of these are found upon American soil, but this church also has active forces in Sierra Leone and Liberia, in the Transvaal and South Africa, conferences having been organized in those distant lands during the last ten years.

In the year 1900 there were 5,832 ministers in this connection, and $984,462.84 was devoted to their support, the average annual amount paid to each working pastor being only about $168.20. The membership that year was 672,220, there having been a constant annual increase since the first organization, with only forty-two members, was effected in 1787. Beginning thus in the latter part of the eighteenth century, with only one church, they now have 5,630 churches, and the value of their church property is estimated at $10,310,993.

(3) Educational Work. The first school planted by the A. M. E. Church was in 1847, at Columbus, Ohio. The Rev. John M. Brown was the principal, and Mrs. Frances Allen-Watkins was the assistant principal. It was a manual labor or industrial school. It remained the only school of the church until 1863, when Bishops Daniel Payne and James A. Shorter and Dr. John G. Mitchell purchased Wilberforce University.

The following are the schools now under the control of the A. M. E. Church.

Wilberforce University and Payne Seminary, Wilberforce, Ohio.

Kittrell College, Kittrell, N. C.

Western University, Quindaro, Kan.

Morris Brown College, Atlanta, Ga.

Payne University, Selma, Ala.

Allen University, Columbia, S. C.

Flegler High School, Marion, S. C.

Edward Waters College, Jacksonville, Fla.

Shorter University, North Little Rock, Ark.

Campbell-Stringer College, Jackson, Miss.

Turner N. and T. Institute, Shelbyville, Tenn.

Wayman Institute, Harrodsburg, Ky.

Paul Quinn College, Waco, Texas.

Delhi Institute, Delhi, La.

Sissons High School, South McAlister, I. T.

Total amount of money raised for school purposes during the last quadrennium was $208,598.28.

There are twenty-eight students from South and West Africa, and South America, who are being educated and making preparations to return to their homes to begin the work of redeeming their race.

The work of educating the ministry of the Church has long had a special place in the hearts of the leaders. Bishop Daniel A. Payne labored very hard to develop this department of her educational system.

In 1891 Bishop B. W. Arnett promoted the idea of separating the theological department from Wilberforce University by organizing Payne Theological Seminary as a distinct organization.

The school had fifty-eight students the last quadrennium, and is presided over by Bishop Benjamin T. Tanner, as the dean. It is destined to do a good work for the ministers of the A. M. E. Church and other denominations, for the school makes no distinction as to ministerial students.

4. African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church.

(1) Organization. The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church was organized in 1796 in New York City by James Varick and a few others, because of proscription on the part of their white brethren in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Twenty-eight years previous (1768) the first Methodist church in America was established in John street, New York; white and colored members contributed of their means to the building and support of the church. As years passed on the colored membership increased, and caste prejudice, the outcome of slavery, began to appear. When the church became rich and influential the color line began to be drawn, and the black members were restricted in their religious privileges until the yoke became unbearable, resulting in the colored members obtaining permission from Bishop Francis Asbury to hold meetings by themselves. In 1796 a cabinetmaker's shop on Cross street, New York City, was hired and fitted up as a house of worship. There services were held until the year 1799, when the membership had so largely increased that a meeting of the colored men of New York was called for the purpose of incorporating themselves into a separate body from the white church. They decided to call their organization the African Methodist Episcopal Church. The word Zion was added some years afterward to distinguish it from the denomination now known as the A. M. E. Church. Nine trustees were appointed to secure a house of worship; two lots were purchased on the corner of Church and Leonard streets, and a small frame building was erected in the year 1800. In 1801 the church was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. The first annual conference was held in this church June 21, 1821. At this conference a form of limited episcopacy was established and James Varick was elected the first bishop (then called superintendent). This form was continued till 1868, when it was changed to an unlimited (or lifetime) episcopacy.

The first discipline of the Church was adopted October 25, 1820, and in it she declared against slavery; this declaration was the means of keeping her out of the South till 1862.

(2) Growth. During the 105 years of her existence this church has grown to over half a million communicants. She had at the last General Conference nine Bishops, besides other general officers.

(3) Institutions. The church has her own publishing house, located at Charlotte, N. C. The plant is fitted with modern appliances and valued at $30,000. It is controlled by the Bishops and one member from each Episcopal district.

The principal educational institution of the Church is Livingstone College, Salisbury, N. C. It is well equipped with buildings. Among its departments is an industrial school. This institution is a monument of negro skill and industry. The Church has a missionary department which sustains missions in Africa and the West Indies.

(4) Statistics and Literature. The latest statistics of the A. M. E. Zion Church are as follows:

Number of Ministers	3,155
Number of Churches	2,906
Number of Members	536,271
Number of Sunday Schools.....	3,200
Number of Pupils	225,000
Value of Property	$6,000,000

A large number of the ministers of this denomination are graduates of some of the best universities of the land. Among the literary productions are: Rise and Progress of the Zion Church in America, by Bishop Christopher Rush; a brief History of the Zion Church, by Bishop J. J. Moore; Book of Sermons, by Bishop S. T. Jones; a Book of Sermons, and A Code on Discipline, by Bishop J. B. Small; History of the A. M. E. Zion Church, by Bishop J. W. Hood, senior bishop of the church. A. W.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

See article on page 1758.

METHUSAEL (me-thū'sa-ël), (Heb. מֵתוּשָׁאֵל, meth-oo-shaw-ale', man of God), son of Mehujael, of the race of Cain (Gen. iv:18).

METHUSELAH (me-thū'se-lah), (Heb. מֵתוּשֶׁלַח, meth-oo-sheh'lakh, man of the dart), son of Enoch, and remarkable as being the oldest of those antediluvian patriarchs whose great ages are recorded in Gen. v:21, 22, 25, 27; 1 Chron. i:3. At the age of 187 years he begat Lamech (the father of Noah); after which he lived 782 years, making altogether 969 years. (See LONGEVITY.)

METROLOGY (mê-trôl'ô-jÿ). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEUZAL (me-û-zäl), in the margin of Ezek. xxvii:10, means perhaps "from Uzal," the later Sanaa, the metropolis of Yemen.

MEZAHAB (mêz'a-häb), (Heb. מַיִן זָהָב, may-zaw-hawb', waters of gold), father of Matred and grandfather of MEHETABEL, 1, who was the wife of Hadad or Hadar, an Edomite king (Gen. xxxvi:39; 1 Chron. i:50), B. C. before 1619.

MEZUZOTH (mêz-û-zôth'), (Heb. מְזוּזוֹת, mez-zu-zoth'). This word is found in Exod. xii:7, 22; Deut. vi:9; and in other places, in all of which it signifies 'doorposts.' It has no other meaning in Scripture. In the texts now referred to, the word occurs in the injunction, 'Thou shalt never forget the laws of the Lord thy God; but shalt write them on the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.' This, contrary to most Christian interpreters, the Jews understand in the literal sense; and in this sense it might have been followed in the East, where it is at this day not unusual for the Moslems to inscribe on or over the gates, and on other parts of buildings, passages from their sacred book, the Koran. If therefore the Jews, before their dispersion, interpreted this precept literally, they probably applied it in the same manner. But when they came into western countries, where such was not the custom, and where oft-times it might have proved inconvenient thus to point out their houses as those belonging to Jews, they adopted the custom of writing the precepts on scrolls of parchment, which they inclosed in a case and attached to the doors of their houses and chambers. To the scrolls thus inclosed the name of mezuzoth is, not very properly, given. Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. p. 482; Leo Modena, Rites and Customs, pt. 1, chapter ii, sec. 3; Allen's Modern Judaism, pp. 327-329. (See DOORPOST.)

MIAMIN (mi'a-mîn), (Heb. מִיָּמִין, me-yaw-meen', from the right hand).

1. A chief priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:5), B. C. 536. Probably identical with Miniamin (Neh. xii:17), and perhaps with the one who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:7).

2. "Son" of Parosh who put away his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra x:25), B. C. 459.

MIBHAR (mîb'här), (Heb. מִיבְּהָר, mib-khawr', choice), one of the "sons" of Haggeri and a mighty man of David (1 Chron. xi:38); probably the same as Bani (2 Sam. xxiii:36), B. C. 1046.

MIBSAM (mîb'sam), (Heb. מִיבְּשָׁם, mib-sawm', sweet odor).

1. The fourth of the twelve sons of Ishmael, who founded an Arabian tribe of the same name (Gen. xxv:13; 1 Chron. i:29), B. C. after 2061.

2. The son of Shallum, a Simeonite (1 Chron. iv:25), B. C. before 1658.

MIBZAR (mîb'zär), (Heb. מִיבְּצָר, mib-tsawr', fortress), one of the petty chiefs of Edom, a descendant of Esau (Gen. xxxvi:42; 1 Chron. i:53), B. C. after 1905.

MICAH (mi'kah), (Heb. מִיכָה, mee-kaw', who is like Jehovah).

1. One of the twelve Minor Prophets who, according to the inscription of the book, prophesied during the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (B. C. 759-699), and was consequently contemporary with Isaiah. It is, however, doubtful whether any accurate separation of the particular prophecies of Micah can be ascertained. He was a native of Moresheth of Gath (i:14,15), so called to distinguish it from another town of the same name, in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv:44; 2 Chron. xiv:9, 10). Micah is to be distinguished from a former prophet of the same name, called also Micaiah, mentioned in 1 Kings xxii:8 (B. C. 897).

2. An Ephraimite, apparently contemporary with the elders who outlived Joshua. He secretly appropriated 1,100 shekels of silver which his mother had saved; but being alarmed at her imprecations on the author of her loss, he confessed the matter to her, and restored the money. She then forgave him, and returned him the silver, to be applied to the use for which it had been accumulated. Two hundred shekels of the amount were given to the founder, as the cost or material of two teraphim, the one molten and the other graven; and the rest of the money served to cover the other expenses of the semi-idolatrous establishment which was formed in the house of Micah, of which a wandering Levite became the priest, at a yearly stipend; till the Danite army, on their journey to settle northward in Laish, took away both the establishment and the priest, which they afterwards maintained in their new settlement (Judg. xviii:18). (See DAN; JONATHAN, 1). The establishments of this kind, of which there are other instances—as that of Gideon at Ophrah—were, although most mistakenly, formed in honor of Jehovah, whom they thus sought to serve by means of a local worship, in imitation of that at Shiloh. This was in direct contravention of the law, which allowed but one place of sacrifice and ceremonial service; and was something of the same kind, although different in extent and degree, as the service of the golden calves, which Jeroboam set up, and his successors maintained, in Dan and Bethel. The previous existence of Micah's establishment in the former city no doubt pointed it out to Jeroboam as a suitable place for one of his golden calves.

3. Son of Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii:34, 35; ix:40, 41), B. C. after 1037. He is called MICHA (2 Sam. ix:12).

4. A Kohathite Levite of the house of Uzziel, and the first in rank according to the arrangement of David (1 Chron. xxiii:20), B. C. 1014. (See MICAH.)

5. A Reubenite, son of Shimei (1 Chron. v:5), B. C. before 782.

6. A Levite, descendant of Asaph (1 Chron. ix:15). Elsewhere (Neh. xi:17, 22) called MICHA.

7. Father of Abdon (2 Chron. xxxiv:20; 2 Kings xxii:12). In the latter place the form is MICHAIAH, father of Achior.

MICAH, BOOK OF (mi'kah, böök öv).

In the book of Micah we do not have the individual discourses which the prophet uttered at different times, but their essential contents united in a collected form and divided into three sections, mutually connected, and referring to one another (cc. i and ii, iii-v, vi and vii). In the form of prophetic discourses they threaten judgments on the theocracy,—namely, the destruction of Samaria and Jerusalem, together with the Temple, and the carrying of the people away captive, on account of the prevalent sins of idolatry, and the covetousness of the powerful classes, the injustice of the judges, and the lying spirit of the false prophets; but they also announce, as coming after the judgment, redemption from the misery, gathering of the delivered remnant of Israel, and glorification of Zion by the Messiah. It follows from the internal unity of the book, that the prophet composed it in the reign of Hezekiah. On account of the frequent rebukes of idolatry (i:5; v:11-13; vi:16), it appears to have been composed before the extermination of idolatry throughout the land, which followed the solemn celebration of the Passover (2 Chron. xxx, xxxi), and before the overthrow of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, on account of the announcement of the destruction of Samaria (i:6, 7). It is therefore to be dated in the period B. C. 728-722. (Keil, Int. to O. T.)

Micah is the third of the minor prophets according to the arrangement of the Septuagint, the sixth according to the Hebrew, and the fifth according to the date of his prophecies.

(1) Analysis. Jahn (Introd.) points out the following predictions as contained in the prophet Micah: (1) The destruction of the kingdom of Israel, which was impending when the prophecy was delivered, and which was fulfilled in the taking of Samaria by Shalmaneser, in the sixth year of Hezekiah (2 Kings xvii), and then that of the kingdom of Judah, with the destruction of Jerusalem (iii:12; vii:13). (2) The Babylonian captivity (iv:10, 11; vii:7, 8, 13). These predictions were delivered 150 years before the event, when the Chaldeans, by whom they were accomplished, were scarcely known as a people. (3) The return from the exile, with its happy effects, and the tranquillity enjoyed by the Jews under the Persian and Grecian monarchies, which referred to events from 200 to 500 years distant (iv:18; vii:11; xiv:12). (4) The heroic deeds of the Maccabees, and their victories over the Syrians or Syro-Macedonians, called Assyrians in Micah v, as well as in Zechariah x:11. (5) The establishment of the royal residence in Sion (iv:8). (6) The birth and reign of the Messiah (v:2). The last three prophecies, observes this learned writer, are more obscure than the others, by reason of the remote distance, in point of time, of their accomplishment from the period of their being delivered.

(2) Bethlehem. There is no prophecy in Micah so interesting to the Christian as that in which the native place of the Messiah is announced. 'But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah (though) thou be little among the thousands of Judah (yet) out of thee shall he come forth unto me (that is) to be ruler in Israel' (Eng. Authorized Version). It is thus translated by the Sept.: 'And thou, Bethlehem, house of Ephratah, although thou be least among the thousands of Judah, out of thee shall come unto me one that shall be a ruler of Israel.' The citation of this passage by the Evangelist differs both from the Hebrew and the Septuagint. 'And thou, Bethlehem (in) the land of Judah, are not the least among the princes of Judah; for out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule (Gr. feed) my people Israel' (Matt. ii:6). The difference, however, is but verbal. Some suppose that the negative (ὀδδαμὸς) originally belonged to the Hebrew, and others to the Greek, while many read the Hebrew interrogatively, 'art thou little?' etc. Eichhorn supposes that the Greek translator of St. Matthew's Gospel interchanged thousands with rulers. Of more importance is the application of the prophecy. It is evident that the Jews in the time of Jesus interpreted this passage to mean the birthplace of the Messiah (Matt. ii:5; John vii:41, 42). The later Rabbinical writers, however, such as Kimchi, Aben Ezra, Abarbanel, etc., have maintained that it had only an indirect reference to the birthplace of the Messiah, who was to be a descendant of David, a Bethlehemite, but not of necessity himself born in Bethlehem. Others, however, as David Ganz (B. Zemach David), expressly mention Bethlehem as the birthplace of the Messiah. The interpretation which considered this prophecy as intimating only that the Messiah was to be a descendant of David, was that current among the Jews in the time of Theodoret, Chrysostom, Theophylact and Euthymius Zigabenus, from whom we learn that it was maintained to have been fulfilled in Zerubbabel, the leader of the Jews on their return from Babylon, of which, and not of Bethlehem, he was a native. This interpretation was held among Christians by the celebrated Theodore of Mopsuestia (as we learn from his condemnation by the council at Rome under Pope Vigilius), and afterwards by Grotius (Comment.), who, however, regarded Zerubbabel as a type of Christ, and considered Christ's birthplace at Bethlehem as an outward representation of his descent from the family of David. 'Natus ex Bethlehemmo Zerubbabel recte dicitur, quod ex Davidis familia esset, qua orta Bethlehem.' Many of the moderns have been attached to this interpretation of the prophecy, referring it to the general idea of the Messiah rather than to Zerubbabel, while some among them have, after the example of some Jews, ventured to assert that the account of the birth of Christ at Bethlehem was not to be depended on. Some have asserted after Jerome (Comm. in Mic.), that the citation in Matt. ii:6 is that of the Sanhedrim only, not of the Evangelist (Hengstenberg's Christology). Jahn (Append. Hermeneut.) observes that it is evident that the Jews in the time of Christ expected the Messiah's birth to take place at Bethlehem; and although he admits that the prophecy may be understood tropically in the sense applied to it by Grotius, he contends that the context will not admit of its applicability either to Hezekiah or any other monarch than the Messiah; nor is it possible to apply the prophecy fully and literally to any but him who was not only of the house and lineage of David, but was actually born at Bethlehem, according to the direct testimony of both St. Matthew's and St. Luke's gospels.

(3) Style. The style of Micah is sublime and vehement, in which respects he exceeds Amos and Hosea. De Wette observes that he has more roundness, fullness, and clearness in his style and rhythm than the latter prophet. He abounds in rapid transitions and elegant tropes, and piquant plays upon words. He is successful in the use of the dialogue, and his prophecies are penetrated by the purest spirit of morality and piety. (See especially chapters vi:6-8; and vii:1-10.)

See, besides the works on the minor prophecies collectively in De Wette's Introduction, Pococke's Commentary on Micah; Groschopp's Micah Uebersetzt; and Jahn's, Eichhorn's and Keil's Introductions. W. W.

MICAIAH (mī-kā'iah) (-yá), (Heb. מִיכָיָהוּ, mee-haw-yaw', who like Jehovah?), a prophet of the time of Ahab.

He was absent from the mob of false prophets who incited the kings of Israel and Judah to march against the Syrians in Ramoth-gilead; for Ahab, having been offended by his sincerity and boldness, had not called for him on this occasion. But he was sent for at the special desire of Jehoshaphat; and as he declared against the enterprise, which the other prophets encouraged, Ahab commanded him to be imprisoned, and allowed only 'bread and water of affliction' till he returned from the wars in peace. To which the prophet ominously answered, 'If thou return at all in peace, then the Lord hath not spoken by me' (1 Kings xxii:8-28). The event corresponded with this intimation (see AHAB); but we have no further information concerning the prophet.

MICE (mis). See MOUSE.

MICHA (mī'ka), (Heb. מִיכָאֵל, mee-kaw', who is like Jehovah?).

1. 2 Sam. ix:12. See MICAH, 3.

2. A Levite, or family of Levites, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:11), B. C. 410.

3. Neh. xi:17, 22. See MICAH, 6.

MICHAEL (mī'ka-el), (Heb. מִיכָאֵל, mee-kaw'-ale', who is like God?).

1. The name given to one of the chief angels, who, in Dan. x:13-21, is described as having special charge of the Israelites as a nation; and in Jude 9, as disputing with Satan about the body of Moses, in which dispute, instead of bringing against the arch enemy any railing accusation, he only said, 'The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan!' Again, in Rev. xii:7-9, Michael and his angels are represented as warring with Satan and his angels in the upper regions (ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ), from which the latter are cast down upon the earth. This is all the reference to Michael which we find in the Bible.

The passages in Daniel and Revelation must be taken as symbolical, and in that view offer little difficulty. The allusion in Jude 9 is more difficult to understand, unless, with Vitrina, Lardner, Macknight, and others, we regard it also as symbolical; in which case the dispute referred to is that indicated in Zech. iii:1; and 'the body of Moses' is a symbolical phrase for the Mosaic law and institutions. (See JUDAS OR JUDE.) A comparison of Jude 9 with Zech. iii:1 gives much force and probability to this conjecture.

2. A man of Asher and father of Sethur, who was sent to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:13), B. C. before 1657.

3. Son of Izrahiah, a descendant of Issachar, of the house of Uzzi (1 Chron. vii:3), B. C. after 1618.

4. A Benjamite, descendant of Elpaal through Beriah (1 Chron. viii:16), B. C. after 1612.

5. A chief Gadite, son of Abihail, who settled in Bashan (1 Chron. v:13), B. C. after 1093.

6. A Gadite ancestor of Abihail (1 Chron. v:14), B. C. before 782.

7. One of the captains of Manasseh who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:20), B. C. 1053.

8. A Levite, father of Shimea, of the house of Gershon, and an ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron. vi:40), B. C. before 1014.

9. Father of Omri, which latter was captain of the people of Issachar in the reign of David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii:18), B. C. before 1014.

10. Son of Jehoshaphat, slain by Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi:2), B. C. 887.

11. A descendant of Shephatiah; his son, Zebadiah, returned from Babylon with a company of eighty males (Ezra viii:8), B. C. 459.

MICHAH (mī'kah), (1 Chron. xxiv:24,25). See MICAH, 4.

MICHAIAH (mī-kā'yā), another form of MICAIAH (which see).

1. Daughter of Uriel, wife of Rehoboam and mother of Abijah (2 Chron. xiii:2). The name is doubtless a corruption of Maacah (2 Chron. xi:20).

2. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to 'teach in the cities of Judah' (2 Chron. xvii:7), B. C. 910.

3. 2 Kings xxii:12. See MICAH, 7.

4. Son of Gemariah, who, after having heard Baruch read the terrible predictions of Jeremiah in his father's hall, went, apparently with good intentions, to report to the king's officers what he had heard (Jer. xxxvi:11-13), B. C. 605.

5. Neh. xii:35. See MICAH, 6.

6. One of the priests who played on the trumpet at the celebration of the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:41), B. C. 446.

MICHAL (mī'kal), (Heb. מִיכָל, me-kaw', brook), youngest daughter of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv:49).

(1) Marriage. She became attached to David, and made no secret of her love, so that Saul, after he had disappointed David of the elder daughter (See MERAB), deemed it prudent to bestow Michal in marriage upon him (1 Sam. xviii:20-28). Saul had hoped to make her the instrument of his designs against David, but was foiled in his attempt through the devoted attachment of the wife to her husband. Of this a most memorable instance is given in 1 Sam. xix:11-17.

(2) Saves David's Life. When David escaped the javelin of Saul he retired to his own house, upon which the king set a guard over night, with the intention to slay him in the morning. This being discovered by Michal, she assisted him to make his escape by a window, and afterwards amused the intended assassins under various pretences, in order to retard the pursuit. When they were detected Michal pretended to her father that David had threatened her with death if she did not assist his escape.

(3) Second Marriage. Saul probably did not believe this; but he took advantage of it by canceling the marriage, and bestowing her upon a person named Phalti (1 Sam. xxv:44).

(4) Restored to David. David, however, as the divorce had been without his consent, felt that the law (Deut. xxiv:4) against a husband taking back a divorced wife could not apply in this case; he therefore formally reclaimed her of Ishbosheth, who employed no less a personage than Abner to take her from Phalti and conduct her with all honor to David. It was under cover of this mission that Abner sounded the elders respecting their acceptance of David for king, and conferred with David himself on the same subject at Hebron (1 Sam. iii:12-21).

(5) Reunion Unhappy. The reunion was less happy than might have been hoped. On that great day when the ark was brought to Jerusalem, Michal viewed the procession from a window, and the royal notions she had imbibed were so shocked at the sight of the king not only taking part in, but leading, the holy transports of his people, that she met him on his return home with a keen sarcasm on his undignified and unkingly behavior. This ill-timed sneer, and the unsympathetic state of feeling which it manifested, drew from David a severe but not unmerited retort; and the Great King, in whose honor David incurred this contumely, seems to have punished the wrong done to him, for we are told that 'therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child to the day of her death' (2 Sam. vi:16-23). It was thus, perhaps, as Abarbanel remarks, ordered by Providence that the race of Saul and David should not be mixed, and that no one deriving any apparent right from Saul should succeed to the throne.

MICHMAS, MICHMASH (mīk'mas, mīk'mash), (Heb. מִיכְמָשׁ, mik-mash', something hidden; מִיכְמָשׁ, mik-masv'), a town of Benjamin (Ezra ii:27; Neh. xi:31; comp. vii:31), east of Beth-aven (1 Sam. xiii:5), and south from Migron, on the road to Jerusalem (Is. x:28).

The words of 1 Sam. xiii:2; xiv:4, and Is. x:29, show that at Michmas was a pass where the progress of a military body might be impeded or opposed. It was perhaps for this reason that Jonathan Maccabæus fixed his abode at Michmas (1 Macc. ix:73); and it is from the chivalrous exploit of another hero of the same name, the son of Saul, that the place is chiefly celebrated (1 Sam. xiii; xiv:4-16). Eusebius describes Michmas as a large village nine Roman miles from Jerusalem on the road to Ramah (Onomast, s. v. Μαχμα). Travelers have usually identified it with Bir or El-Bireh; but Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii:117) recognizes it in a place still bearing the name of Mukhmas, at a distance and position which correspond well with these intimations. This is a village situated upon a slope to the north of a valley called Wady es-Suweinit. It is small, and almost desolate, but bears marks of having been once a place of strength and importance. There are many foundations of huge stones, and some columns lie among them. The valley es-Suweinit, steep and precipitous, is probably the 'passage of Michmas' mentioned in Scripture. 'In it,' says Dr. Robinson, 'just at the left of where we crossed, are two hills of a conical, or rather spherical, form, having steep rocky sides, with small wadies running up between each so as almost to isolate them. One of them is on the side towards Jeba (Gibeah), and the other towards Mukhmas. These would seem to be the two rocks mentioned in connection with Jonathan's adventure (1 Sam. xiv:4, 5). They are not, indeed, so "sharp" as the language of Scripture would seem to imply; but they are the only rocks of the kind in this vicinity. The northern one is connected towards the west with an eminence still more distinctly isolated.'

MICHMETHAH or MACHMETHATH (mīk'me-thah), (Heb. מִיכְמֶתָחַ, mik-meth-awth', hiding place), a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the frontiers of Ephraim and Manassch; over against Shechem (Josh. xvi:6; xvii:7). The site is perhaps indicated by a village called El-Makhua, south of Nablús (De. Sauley, Narrative, i:93).

MICHRI (mīk'ri), (Heb. מִיכְרִי, mik-rec', prize of Jehoval), a Benjamite, father of Uzzi (1 Chron. ix:8), B. C. before 440.

MICHTAM (mīk'tām), (Heb. מִיכְתָּם, mik-tawm', a writing, especially a psalm), a word occurring in the title of Psalms xvi, lvi, lvii, lviii, and lx, which means a writing, poem or song. Some translate it golden; and Ewald, secret, concealed, that is, a new composition. The best rendering is perhaps epigram, a poem intended to record memorable thoughts.

MIDDAY (mīd'dā), (Heb. יוֹם הַיּוֹם, iso'har yome, double light, 1 Kings xviii:29; מַכְחָטִים, makhats-ech' hay-yome', half of the day, Neh. viii:3; Gr. ἡμέρα μέσος, hay-mer'ah mes'os, middle day, Acts xxvi:13). See TIME.

MIDDIN (mīd'din), (Heb. מִידִן, mid-deen', extension), a village in the desert of Judah (Josh. xv:61), probably near the Dead Sea.

MIDDLE WALL (mīd'd'l wal), (Gr. μεστοιχον, mes-of-oy-khon, middle), the chel, or sacred partition between the Court of the Gentiles and the inner sanctum of the temple (Eph. ii:14). (See TEMPLE.)

MIDIAN (mīd'i-an), (Heb. מִדְיָן, mid-yawn' strife), fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, and progenitor of the Midianites (Gen. xxv:2; 1 Chron. i:32), B. C. after 2024.

MIDIANITES (mīd'i-an-ites), (Heb. מִדְיָנִים, mid-yaw-ncem').

(1) A tribe of people descended from Abraham's son Midian. His descendants must have settled in Arabia, and engaged in trade at an early period, if we identify them with those who in the time of Jacob appear, along with the Ishmaelites, as merchants traveling from Gilead to Egypt, and who, having in their way bought Joseph from his brethren, sold him to the latter country (Gen. xxxvii:28, 36). It is, however, very difficult to conceive that the descendants of a son of Abraham, born so many years after Isaac, had become a tribe of people at the time when the descendants of Isaac himself were so few. One is therefore much inclined to suppose that these Midianites were different and distinct from those descended from Abraham's son; and there appears the more ground for this when at a later period we find two tribes of Midianites, different in locality and character, and different in their feelings towards the Israelites.

(2) If this distinction be admitted, then it would be necessary to seek the earlier Midianites in those dwelling about the eastern arm of the Red Sea, among whom Moses found refuge when 'he fled from Egypt,' and whose priest or sheik was Jethro, who became the father-in-law of the future lawgiver (Exod. iii:1; xviii:5; Num. x:29). These, if not of Hebrew, would appear to have been of Cushite origin, and descended from Mid-ian, the son of Cush. We do not again meet with these Midianites in the Jewish history, but they appear to have remained for a long time settled in the same quarter, where indeed is the seat of the only Midianites known to Oriental authors.

(3) The other Midianites, undoubtedly descended from Abraham and Keturah, occupied the country east and southeast of the Moabites, who were seated on the east of the Dead Sea; or rather, perhaps, we should say that, as they appear to have been a semi-nomad people, they pastured their flocks in the unsettled country beyond the Moabites, with whom, as a kindred, although more settled tribe, they seem to have been on the most friendly terms, and on whose borders were situated those 'cities and goodly castles which they possessed' (Num. xxxi:10). These Midianites, like the other tribes and nations who had a common origin with them, were highly hostile to the Israelites. In conjunction with the Moabites, they designedly enticed them to idolatry as they approached Canaan (Num. xxxi:2, 5; xxv:6, 14-18); on which account Moses attacked them with a strong force, killed all their fighting men, including their five princes or emirs, and made the women and children captives or servants (Num. xxxi). (See SERVICE; SERVANT, etc.) The account of the spoil confirms the view which we have taken of the semi-nomad position of the Midianites—namely, 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, 61,000 asses, 32,000 persons. This was only the 'prey,' or live stock; but besides this there was a great quantity of 'barbaric pearl and gold,' in the shape of 'jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, earrings, and tablets.'

(4) Some time after the Israelites obtained possession of Canaan, the Midianites had become so numerous and powerful, that, for seven successive years, they made inroads into the Hebrew territory in the time of harvest, carrying off the fruits and cattle, and desolating the land. At length Gideon was raised up as the deliverer of his country, and his triumph was so complete that the Israelites were never more molested by them (Judg. vi:1-7; vii, viii). To this victory there are subsequent allusions in the sacred writings (Ps. lxxxiii:9, 12; Is. ix:4; x:26); but the Midianites do not again appear in sacred or profane history.

MIDNIGHT (mīd'nīt'). See TIME.

MIDWIFE (mīd'wif'), (Heb. מַיְבֵּוֹת, yaled).

The two midwives mentioned in Exod. i:15 are probably representatives or superintendents of a whole class, as such a number seems to stand in a decided disproportion to the needs of the Jewish nation at that time. The expression "upon the stools," in the following verse, refers to a kind of chair in which the patient sat during the birth, and which is still in use in modern Egypt.

MIGDAL-EL (mīg'dal-ēl), (Heb. מִגְדַּל־אֵל, migdal-ale', tower of God), a fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix:38).

Robinson thinks it may be the modern Mejdel or Mujeidil, ancient ruins being found on the seashore, three miles north of Tiberias.

It lies about twelve miles from Hurah, or Horem, and the same distance from Yarūn or Iron.

MIGDALGAD (mīg'dal-gād), (Heb. מִגְדַּל־גַּד, mig-dal-gawd', tower of fortune), a city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv:37). Probably El-Mejdel, about two miles north of Ascalon (Schwarz, Palest. p. 103; Van de Velde, Mem., p. 334).

MIGDOL (mīg'dol), (Heb. מִגְדֹּל, mig-dole', tower), a place between which and the Red Sea the Israelites were commanded to encamp on leaving Egypt (Exod. xiv:2; Num. xxxiii:7). (See EXODUS, THE).

The name, which means a tower, appears to indicate a fortified place. In Jer. xlv:1; xlv:14, it occurs as a city of Egypt, and it would seem to have been the last town on the Egyptian frontier, in the direction of the Red Sea; hence 'from Migdol to Syene,' in Ezek. xxix:10; xxx:6. Among other sites Ebers favors the southern end of Bitter Lakes, where the Gulf of Suez was narrow and liable to be blown back by an east wind. (See EXODUS, GEOGRAPHY OF THE.)

MIGHTIES (mīt'iz), (Heb. גִּבּוֹרִים, ghib-bore', powerful, 1 Chron. xi:12, 24), the term used to denote the three great captains of David, elsewhere called "mighty men" (2 Sam. xxiii:8), and meaning leaders in war, warriors.

MIGRON (mīg'ron), (Heb. מִיגְרוֹן, mig-ron', precipice), a town which, from the historical indications, must have been south or southwest of Ai, and north of Michmas (Is. x:28).

From Michmas northward a narrow valley extends out of and at right angles with that which has been identified as the pass of Michmas. (See MICHMAS.) The town of Migron seems to have been upon and to have commanded the pass through this valley, but the precise situation has not been determined. Saul was stationed at the further side of Gibeah, 'under a pomegranate tree which is by Migron' (1 Sam. xiv:2), when Jonathan performed his great exploit at Michmas; and this is to be explained on the supposition that Migron was on the border, towards Michmas, of the district to which Gibeah gave its name.

MIJAMIN (mīj'a-mīn), (Heb. מִימִינֵי, me-yawmeen', fortunate, or on the right hand).

1. The head of the sixth course of priests as established by David (1 Chron. xxiv:9), B. C. 1014.

2. A family of priests who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:7); probably descended from 1, and identical with MIAMIN, 1, and MINIAMIN, 2.

MIKLOTH (mīk'loth), (Heb. מִיקְלוֹת, mik-loth', twigs, sticks or rods).

1. An officer of the second division of David's army, under Dodai, the Ahohite (1 Chron. xxvii:4), B. C. 1014.

2. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel and father of Shimeah or Shimeam, of the family of Saul (1 Chron. viii:32; ix:37, 38), B. C. about 536.

MIKNEIAH (mīk-nē'iah (-yā)), (Heb. מִיכְנֵיָהוּ, mik-nay-yaw' hoo, possession of Jehovah), a Levite doorkeeper of the Temple, and musician appointed by David (1 Chron. xv:18, 21), B. C. 1014.

MILALAI (mīl'a-lā'i), (Heb. מִלְאֵי, mee-lal-ah' ee, eloquent), a Levite musician who joined the procession about the walls of Jerusalem at their completion after the exile (Neh. xii:36), B. C. 536.

MILCAH (mīl'kah), (Heb. מִלְכָּה, mil-kaw', advice).

1. Daughter of Haran, and sister of Lot. By her husband Nahor she had eight sons (Gen. xxii:20, 23). She was the grandmother of Rebekah (Gen. xxiv:15, 24), B. C. about 2047.

2. Daughter of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi:33), who became an heiress, as did her sisters (Num. xxvii:1; xxxvi:11; Josh. xvii:3), B. C. 1170.

MILCOM (mīl'kom). See MOLECH.

MILDEW (mil'dū), (Heb. מִלְדָּה, yay-raw-kone', pale), is properly a species of fungus or parasite which, settling on plants, destroys their leaves, and causes them to wither. Its origin is uncertain. God threatens and sends mildew as a judgment (Deut. xxviii:22; Amos iv:9; Hag. ii:17).

MILE (mil), (Gr. μίλιον, mil'ee-on, the Greek form of the Lat. milliarium).

This word is only mentioned in Matt. v:41, where Christ says, 'If any one compel thee to go with him one mile, go with him two.' The mile was originally (as its derivation from mille, 'a thousand,' implies) a Roman measure of 1,000 geometrical paces (pussus) of five feet each, and was therefore equal to 5,000 Roman feet. Taking the Roman foot at 11.6496 English inches, the Roman mile would be 1,618 English yards, or 142 yards less than the English statute mile. By another calculation, in which the foot is taken at 11.62 inches, the mile would be little more than 1,614 yards. The number of Roman miles in a to have had four havens, one of which was capable of holding a fleet.

It was noted for a famous temple of Apollo, the oracle of which is known to have been consulted so late as the fourth century (Apollodorus, De Orig. Deor. iii:130). There was, however, a Christian church in the place, and in the fifth, seventh and eighth centuries we read of bishops of Miletus, who were present at several councils (Magdeburg, Hist. Eccles. ii:192; iv:86; v:3; vii:254; viii:4). The city fell to decay after its conquest by the Saracens.

Some take the Miletus where Paul left Trophimus sick (2 Tim. iv:20) to have been in Crete, and therefore different from the above; but there seems no need for this conclusion.

Near the site of the ancient city is a small Turkish village called Melas. The most noteworthy ruins of former grandeur are the theater, with its many tiers of seats in good preservation, and the temple of Apollo, of which a few columns are yet standing. The wandering channels of the degree of a large circle of the earth is very little more than 75. The Roman mile contained eight Greek stadia (see Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq., art. 'Milliare'). The Greek stade hence bore the same relation to the Roman mile which the English furlong does to the English mile.

MILETUM (mī-lē'tum), (Gr. Μίλητος, mil'ay-tos, 2 Tim. iv:20). See MILETUS.

MILETUS (mī-lē'tus), (Gr. Μίλητος, mil'ay-tos), a city and seaport of Ionia in Asia Minor, about thirty-six miles south of Ephesus.

St. Paul touched at this port on his voyage from Greece to Syria, and delivered to the elders of Ephesus, who had come to meet him there, a remarkable and affecting address (Acts xx:15-38). Miletus was a place of considerable note, and the ancient capital of Ionia and Caria. It was the birthplace of several men of renown—Thales, Timotheus, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Democritus (Pomp. Mela, i:17; Diog. Laert. Vit. Philosoph. pp. 15, 88, 89, 650). Ptolemy (Geog. v:2) places Miletus in Caria by the sea, and it is stated Meander are near by, although the mouth of the river is ten miles away.

MILK (milk). The Hebrew word for milk, חָלָב, khaw-lawb', is from the same root as חֵלֶב, kheleb', 'fatness,' and is properly restricted to new milk, there being a distinct term, חֵמָה, khem'aw, for milk when curdled.

(1) Frequent Mention. Milk, and the preparations from it, butter and cheese, are often mentioned in Scripture. Milk, in its fresh state, appears to have been used very largely among the Hebrews, as is usual among people who have much cattle, and yet make but sparing use of their flesh for food. The proportion which fresh milk held in the dietary of the Hebrews must not, however, be measured by the comparative frequency with which the word occurs.

(2) Milch Animals. In reading of milk in Scripture, the milk of cows naturally presents itself to the mind of the European reader; but in Western Asia, and especially among the pastoral and semi-pastoral people, not only cows, but goats, sheep, and camels, are made to give their milk for the sustenance of man. That this was also the case among the Hebrews may be clearly inferred even from the slight intimations which the Scriptures afford. Thus we read of 'butter of kine, and milk of sheep' (Deut. xxxii:14); and in Prov. xxvii:27, the emphatic intimation, 'Thou shalt have goats' milk for food,' seems to imply that this was considered the best for use in the simple state. 'Thirty milch camels' were among the cattle which Jacob presented to his brother Esau (Gen. xxxii:15), implying the use of camel's milk.

(3) Curdled Milk. The word for curdled milk חֶמְאַו, (khem'aw) is always translated 'butter' in the A. V. It seems to mean both butter and curdled milk, but most generally the latter; and the context will, in most cases, suggest the distinction, which has been neglected by our translators. It was this curdled milk, highly esteemed as a refreshment in the East, that Abraham set before the angels (Gen. xviii:8), and which Jael gave to Sisera, instead of the water which he asked (Judg. v:25). In this state milk acquires a slightly inebriating power, if kept long enough. Is. vii:22, where it is rendered 'butter,' is the only text in which the word is coupled with 'honey,' and there it is a sign of scarcity, not of plenty as when honey is coupled with fresh milk. It means that there being no fruit or grain, the remnant would have to live on milk and honey; and, perhaps, that milk itself would be so scarce that it would be needful to use it with economy; and hence to curdle it, as fresh milk cannot be preserved for sparing use. Although, however, this word properly denotes curdled milk, it seems also to be sometimes used for milk in general (Deut. xxxii:14; Job xx:17; Is. vii:15).

(4) Idolatrour Use of. The most striking Scriptural allusion to milk is that which forbids a kid to be seethed in its mother's milk, and its importance is attested by being three repeated (Exod. xxiii:19; xxxiv:26; Deut. xiv:21). There is, perhaps, no precept of Scripture which has been more variously interpreted than this; it is possible that this was not a common act of cookery, but an idolatrous or magical rite. Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, urges this opinion. He says, 'Flesh eaten with milk, or in milk, appears to me to have been prohibited, not only because it affords gross nourishment, but because it savored of idolatry, some of the idolaters probably doing it in their worship, or at their festivals.' This is confirmed by an extract which Cudworth (Discourses concerning the True Notion of the Lord's Supper, p. 30) gives from an ancient Karaite commentary on the Pentateuch. 'It was a custom of the ancient heathen, when they had gathered in all their fruits, to take a kid, and boil it in the dam's milk, and then in a magical way to go about and besprinkle with it all their trees, and fields, and gardens, and orchards, thinking that by this means they should make them fructify, and bring forth more abundantly the following year.' Some such rite as this is supposed to be the one interdicted by the prohibition.

(5) Butter. Butter is not often mentioned in Scripture, and even less frequently than our version would suggest; for, as already intimated, the word khem'aw must sometimes be understood curdled milk. Indeed, it may be doubted whether it denotes butter in any place besides Deut. xxxii:14, 'butter of kine,' and Prov. xxx:33, 'the churning of milk bringeth forth butter,' as all the other texts will apply better to curdled milk than to butter. Butter was, however, doubtless much in use among the Hebrews, and we may be sure that it was prepared in the same manner as at this day among the Arabs and Syrians. The milk is put into a large copper pan over a slow fire, and a little leben or sour milk (the same as the curdled milk mentioned above), or a portion of the dried entrails of a lamb, is thrown into it. The milk then separates, and is put into a goatskin bag, which is tied to one of the tent poles, and constantly moved backwards and forwards for two hours. The buttery substance then coagulates, the water is pressed out, and the butter put into another skin. In two days the butter is again placed over the fire, with the addition of a quantity of burgoul (wheat boiled with leaven, and dried in the sun), and allowed to boil for some time, during which it is carefully skimmed. It is then found that the burgoul has precipitated all the foreign substances, and that the butter remains quite clear at the top. This is the process used by the Bedouins, and it is also the one employed by the settled people of Syria and Arabia. The chief difference is that in making butter and cheese the townspeople employ the milk of cows and buffaloes, whereas the Bedouins, who do not keep these animals, use that of sheep and goats. The butter is generally white, of the color and consistence of lard, and is not much relished by English travelers. It is eaten with bread in large quantities by those who can afford it, not spread out thinly over the surface, as with us, but taken in mass with the separate morsels of bread. (See BUTTER.)

Figurative. In the greater number of examples it is employed figuratively to denote great abundance, and in many instances it is used as a general term for all or any of the preparations from it.

(1) In its figurative use, the word occurs sometimes alone, as the sign of abundance (Gen. xlix:12; Ezek. xxv:4; Joel iii:18, etc.); but more frequently in combination with honey—'milk and honey' being a phrase which occurs about twenty times in Scripture. Thus a rich and fertile soil is described as a 'land flowing with milk and honey'; which, although usually said of Palestine, is also applied to other fruitful countries, as Egypt (Num. xvi:13). Hence its use to denote the food of children.

(2) Milk is also constantly employed as a symbol of the elementary parts or rudiments of doctrine (1 Cor. iii:2; Heb. v:12, 13); and from its purity and simplicity it is also made to symbolize the unadulterated word of God and the blessings of the Gospel. (1 Pet. ii:2; comp. Is. lv:1).

MILL (míl), Heb. מִלּוֹן, ray-kheh', to pulverize; Gr. μύλων, moo'lon, grinder).

The mill for grinding corn had not wholly superseded the mortar for pounding it in the time of Moses. The mortar and the mill are named together in Num. xi:8. But fine meal, that is, meal ground or pounded fine, is mentioned so early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xviii:6); hence mills and mortars must have been previously known. The mill common among the Hebrews differed little from that which is in use to this day throughout Western Asia and Northern Africa. It consisted of two circular stones two feet in diameter, and half a foot thick. The lower is called the 'nether millstone' (Job xli:16, 24), and the upper the 'rider,' רִיִּד (Judg. ix:53; 2 Sam. xi:21). The former was usually fixed to the floor, and had a slight elevation in the center, or, in other words, was slightly convex in the upper surface. The upper stone had a concavity in its under surface fitting to, or receiving, the convexity of the lower stone. There was a hole in the top, through which the corn was introduced by handfuls at a time. The upper stone had an upright stick fixed in it as a handle, by which it was made to turn upon the lower stone, and by this action the corn was ground, and came out at the edges. As there were neither public mills nor bakers, except the king's (Gen. xl:2; Hos. vii:4-8), each family possessed a mill; and as it was in daily use, it was made an infringement of the Law for a person to take another's mill or millstone in pledge (Deut. xxiv:6).

The mill was, as now, commonly turned by two persons, usually women, and these, the work being laborious, the lowest maid-servants in the house. They sat opposite each other. One took hold of the mill-handle, and impelled it half way round; the other then seized it, and completed the revolution (Exod. xi:5; Job xxxi:10, 11; Is. xlvii:2; Matt. xxiv:41). As the labor was severe and menial, enemies taken in war were often condemned to perform it (Judg. xvi:21; Lam. v:13). (Jahn, Biblisches Archaeol. ix:139.) It will be seen that this millstone does not materially differ from the Highland quern; and is, indeed, an obvious resource in those remote quarters, where a population is too thin or too scattered to afford remunerative employment to a miller by trade. In the East this trade is still unknown, the hand-mill being in general and exclusive use among the corn-consuming, and the mortar among the rice-consuming, nations. (See BREAD; CORN.)

Figurative. (1) Both the millstones were hard, and it seems especially the nethermost, which was fixed; and so the heart of leviathan is likened to a piece of it, to represent his undaunted courage and obstinacy (Job xli:24). (2) The ceasing of the sound of the millstones was a sure sign that a place had been turned into a desolation (Jer. xxv:10; Rev. xviii:22). (3) Christ's falling on men, and grinding them to powder, denotes the final, complete and terrible destruction of those who refuse to yield their wills to him (Matt. xxi:44; Luke xx:18). (4) To "grind the faces of the poor," is cruelly to oppress and afflict them (Is. iii:15). (5) "Let my wife grind to another"; let her become the property of another man, and his slave to work at the mill (Job xxxi:10). Our jaw teeth, which chew our food, are called our "grinders"; and their sound is brought low when they are lost by old age (Eccl. xii:3, 4).

MILLENNIUM (mil-lën'nî-üm), (Lat. mille, a thousand, and annus, a year).

This word is not found in Scripture; but as it refers to ideas founded on Scripture, a treatment of the doctrine is required. The word denotes the term of a thousand years, and, in a theological sense, that thousand years mentioned in Rev. xx:2, 3, 4, 6, during which Satan is there described as being bound, Christ as reigning triumphant, and the saints as living and reigning with him. The doctrine involved in this view is usually called Millenarianism, but in ecclesiastical history more usually Chiliasm, from the Greek word χίλιοι, 'a thousand.' As the world was made in six days, and as, according to Ps. xc:4, 'a thousand years are as one day' in the sight of God, so it was thought the world would continue in the condition in which it had hitherto been for 6,000 years; and as the Sabbath is a day of rest, so will the seventh period of a thousand years consist of this millennial kingdom, as the close of the whole earthly state.

The Jews supposed that the Messiah at his coming would reign as king upon the earth, and would reside at Jerusalem, the ancient royal city. The period of his reign they thought would be very long, and it was therefore put down as a thousand years, which was at first understood only as a round number. This period was conceived by the Jews as a sort of golden age to the earth, and every one formed such a picture of it as agreed with his own disposition, and with the views concerning the highest felicity which were dictated by the degree of intellectual and moral culture to which he had attained. With many these views were very low, being confined to sensual delights, while others entertained better and more pure conceptions of that happy time (Wetstein, Comment. in Rev. xxii:2; Knapp, Christ. Theolog., translated by Leonard Woods, Jun. D.D., sec. 154).

This notion was taken up by many of the Judaizing Christians: Jesus had not yet appeared as an earthly king, and these persons were unwilling to abandon an expectation which seemed to them so important. They therefore allowed themselves to hope for a second advent of Christ to establish an earthly kingdom, and to this they transferred most if not all of that which in their unconverted state they had expected of the first. The Apostles generally seem to have entertained this notion till after the ascension of Christ and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, whereby they were instructed in the higher verities and mysteries of the Gospel; but that they then abandoned it, and expected no other coming of Christ than that at the judgment of the world, appears clear from 1 Cor. xv and other passages. The fact that these Jewish notions had taken deep root in the minds of many Christians, even in the Apostolic age, is, however, manifest from 1 Thess. iv:13, sq., v; and 2 Thess. ii.

The following views are epitomized from The Scer of Patmos, by Sir Wm. Dawson:

The millennium which is described in chapter xx of Revelation has attracted much attention from scholars and has become the subject of much controversy, the two centers of criticism being ranged under the heads of "pre-millennial" and "post-millennial" return of our Lord. If, with many able men of our time, we connect the second advent of the Messiah and the resurrection of the saints with the beginning of the millennium, we find these stupendous events very near as indicated by the position which we have reached along the line of events which were foretold by the prophets.

If, on the other hand, we regard the second advent of the Christ as post-millennial, the great event is postponed by the duration of the thousand years and also by the period which is covered by the loosing of Satan, and it is thus connected with the general resurrection and judgment described in chapter xxi and with the New Jerusalem of the closing chapter.

(1) Nearing Millennial Period. In either case it would seem that we are now very near the opening of the millennial period. According to the prophecies of Daniel and the statements of the Christ this period is to follow as the next great event after the four successive empires which occupy "the times of the Gentiles."

In order to understand the millennium we must remember that it forms a part of the subject of the prophecies of the things that follow the last septenary of God's judgments on the apostasy and its abettors which are represented by the vials. In the end of chapter xvi these are spoken of as the last plagues, and it is said that men blaspheme God because of them, but the two chapters following contain explanations of this and announce the downfall of the apostasy. Then in chapter xix we have a picture of the marriage of the Lamb and of the bride, the Lamb's wife with her spotless garments.

(2) Final Triumph of the Word. Again the heavens are opened "and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, . . . and on his head were many crowns; . . . and his name is called The Word of God. . . . And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords."

Here the Lord appears as the "Word of God" and may be considered as representing the final triumph of the "Word" over the three unclean spirits in the sixth vial who have hitherto been going forth "unto the kings of the earth, and to the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty," but they are now driven from the field, and their final overthrow, together with that of the beast and the false prophet, is described in unmistakable terms at the close of the chapter.

(3) Binding of the Dragon. In the beginning of chapter xx the angel "laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years." Thus that Satan which has been the instigator of all opposition to God in all ages of the world is shut out from his deceitful work in influencing mankind. The "bottomless pit" or abyss may be a part of the earth, for in a previous passage pertaining to the fifth trumpet, the locusts which typify the Saracen invaders are said to come from the pit or abyss, thus representing the outlying parts of the world—those which are beyond the limits of Christendom.

(4) Revival of the Pure Faith. The description of the millennium plainly indicates a revival of the pure faith and practice of primitive Christianity. It is to be remembered that the Protestant Reformation did not effect this. During the millennial period these will be brought back to their best estate and become dominant, and this state of things will continue during the thousand years. Seated upon the thrones of judgment there are two bodies of judges, the one being "the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the Word of God," and the others are those who "had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark in their foreheads, or in their hands, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

(5) A New Heaven and New Earth. At present we are unable to fully comprehend the conditions and details which are connected with any judgment scene, but there must surely be "a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away."

The book closes with a description of the New Jerusalem, and its last thought is the promise of the coming of the Christ and John's loving response, "Even so, come Lord Jesus." This is the thought which is presented throughout the New Testament as the sustaining hope of the church, and here it is placed side by side with her final blessedness as the fulfillment of her hopes and prayer and faith. During all her pilgrimage it has been one of the incentives to her loyalty and courage in time of trial, and in the final picture she is reaping the reward of her faith and her patience.

Surely we may well join in the fervent invitation, "Even so, come Lord Jesus."

MILLENNIUM, VIEWS ON THE, CONTRASTED.

Two contrasted articles are herein given on the Pre-Millennium and Post-Millennium beliefs.

1. Pre-Millennial View. Millenarian doctrine, known in former years as Chiliasm, has since the foundation of the Church, been the Christian's blessed hope. Throughout her variable history, even when she was seemingly eclipsed, the Church of God never lost sight of this brilliant star in her eschatological sky.

In comparatively recent years, Whitbyism assumed that the millennial era would constitute the period of Christ's spiritual reign, as opposed to literal, and therefore predicated, universal salvation in this age. Accordingly, a conquered world, and an enthroned church, were to be the harbingers of our Lord's return. * Pre-millennialists consider Whitby's mode of interpretation akin to Origen's fanciful method of exegesis, and therefore unreliable.

Pre-millennialism is a term of comparative newness. It was not needed in theological discussion for centuries. Post-millennialism having become popularized, it must needs be employed, in order to define the view held by the primitive church, that Christ will literally return from the heavens in order to effect the restitution foretold by the holy prophets (Acts iii:19-21). The re-gensis of nature and restoration of nations included in the promised restitution will occupy one thousand years, the duration of Earth's antitypical Sabbath, including the resurrection of all believers, the imprisonment of Satan, with the destruction of the Antichrist. This hope, as ever imminent, was the strong consolation of early believers, while martyrs in their sufferings were sustained through its constant expectation.

Pre-millennialism has a notable history. During dark days, oft-recurring, when superstition and superficial views of religious life prevailed; when worldliness came in like a flood, and idolatrous practices abounded, this polestar of the church grew dim to the point of evanishment. But yet again its brightness grew apace, until now, when its intensified light shines afar. During the century just ended it was brought into prominent recognition. The highest Biblical scholarship has emphatically indorsed pre-millennialism as an integral part of the gospel scheme, and its profound literature has taken rank among essential theological disquisitions. Many of its living advocates are foremost in Biblical research, are identified with aggressive, world-wide evangelism, and also intensely loyal to orthodox evangelicalism and to inerrant Biblical inspiration.

Pre-millennialism does not base its claims on any single proof-text, or series of texts, but rather on the whole trend of Scripture revelation. The much controverted passage in the Apocalypse (ch. xx:1-6) they explain in the glowing light of multiplied predictions. The learned Alford declared that the whole church for three hundred years understood the above verses in a plain, literal sense. John Albert Bengel, first of exegetes, gave unequivocal testimony to the view that Christ would come before the millennium, and in this hope John Wesley, who was taught it by Bengel, exulted. Prof. Hackett, interpreting Acts iii:19-21, voiced the conviction of many Christian scholars, that the Coming of Christ "was the great consummation on which the strongest desires of their souls (the first believers) were fixed . . . they lived in expectation of it; they labored to be prepared for it."

Pre-millennialism protests against the application of those parables and discourses of our Lord which clearly point to a new kingdom, introduced and established on his return, to natural phenomena, such as death, war, national calamities and natural convulsions. These frequently recurring events are too superficial as adequate fulfillment of divine prophecy.

Pre-millennialists believe that those Old Testament predictions of the sufferings and glories of Messiah bound the present age. They are as mountain peaks between which lie the Church, and beyond the Millennial Kingdom.

Pre-millennialists believe that the Bible given in the language of men must be interpreted by such rules as govern that language; that the literal meaning of a word be retained until it be determined that the language is figurative. Prophecy frequently appears in symbolic form, but most Scripture symbols are explained in the Scriptures.

In addition to Old Testament predictions is New Testament promise inciting millennial expectation. Several hundred texts emphatically and inferentially teach that our Lord will return visibly, bodily, audibly, gloriously, and that the world's condition at the time of his arrival precludes all possibility of a millennium prior to that event. The age of Noah and the days of Lot prefigure our time-end, thereby harmonizing with parabolic and didactic teaching. The field of wheat and tares, the flock of sheep and goats, the net of good and bad fish prove that evil is not minimized as the age approaches its consummation. Accordingly, the last days, and the latter times are vividly sketched in their woeful degeneracy (1 Tim. iv:1-3; 2 Tim. iii:1-5). Therefore, pre-millennialism holds out no hope of a converted world before the Parousia. Results of the Advent will include the resurrection of believers unto glory, life to dead Israel, and liberty for groaning creation. The new kingdom will be clean from Satan's presence when the glory of Jehovah will be revealed, and the will of God be done on the earth, even as it is done in heaven. The shekinah will again appear in the Holy Land when the pierced feet of our glorious Lord shall stand on the Mount of Olives (1 Thess. iv:15-18; Rom. viii:15, 22-23; Rev. xx:1-3; Is. iv:5; Zech. xiv:4).

2. Post-Millennialism. Ever since the days of the Apostles the Church has looked forward to a better day, when the reigning powers of idolatry and superstition, and all forms of false religion, shall give place to the kingdom of God, and when Jesus Christ will be confessed as Lord among all the nations of the earth. It is impossible to interpret the Scriptures without anticipating a universal diffusion of the knowledge of God and of his Son Jesus Christ, to the extent that the religion of the Bible shall become the religion of mankind throughout the earth. But when shall this better day dawn? By what agencies shall it be brought about?

(1) Difference of Opinion. The great division of the Church is into classes known as Pre-millennialians and Post-millennialians—a division which does not follow denominational lines or imply serious differences upon evangelical doctrines or on questions of vital piety and practical godliness. It is a difference in belief as to whether Christ's second coming will take place at the beginning or the ending of the millennial period; and, of course, it involves different ideas of the character of the millennium—for a millennium with Christ present in person, with the saints of all ages living in the resurrection state, is widely different from one where Christ reigns spiritually in the hearts of his people, who yet live in their mortal bodies while he remains in heaven. It is to this division of sentiment our minds are turned in considering the second coming of the Son of man. Will he come in person and raise the righteous dead, and establish a literal kingdom in this world, and reign a thousand years, and thus subdue the world to himself? Or will he come at the end of time and raise the dead and judge the world, and thus finish the history of earthly life by introducing the eternal state of retribution? Pre-millennialists assert the former, and Post-millennialists the latter.

(2) Basis of Pre-millennial Theory. The Pre-millennial advent theory is based entirely upon a Scripture which is acknowledged by all to be very obscure, in addition to being found in the book of Revelation, in the midst of symbols extremely difficult of explanation and application (Rev. xx:1, 8).

It is assumed by some that the "angel" which had "the key of the bottomless pit, and the great chain in his hand," was none other than Christ himself. But there is absolutely no intimation whatever in this celebrated passage of Scripture, that Christ descends from heaven at the beginning of this "thousand years."

(3) Condition of the World. But what of the millennium, if the idea of the coming of Christ at the imprisonment of Satan be abandoned? To state precisely the condition of the world at the coming of Christ, whether that coming be at the beginning or ending of the millennium in question, is one of the most difficult tasks the expositor of the Scriptures is called to perform. Turn as he will, there are seeming contradictions to be encountered. To admit this is due to candor, and where it is not admitted we suspect the presence of prepossessions unfavorable to impartial exegesis.

(4) Two Classes of Texts. There are two classes of Scripture to be considered—those passages that represent the carelessness and worldliness of the unbelieving and unready, and those that describe the universal triumph of the Gospel, and the prosperity of the Church in the latter days. By looking only at one class we get distorted views.

(1) First Class. Some of the first class look as if the world were never darker or more forgetful of God than in the hour when the Son of man shall come "as a thief in the night." "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." "Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left." This shows that some will be going on in the ordinary pursuits of life, forgetful of spiritual things, as at the present time, and as in the time before the Flood. And that question in the parable of the widow and the unjust judge, "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" looks in the same direction, and seems to suggest a doubt whether any will be found faithful. But these relate to the unbelieving. They give the worldly side of the picture. There is no doubt that "the day of the Lord" will come unawares upon many, and surprise them in their sins.

(2) The Other Side. But there is another side. The Church is to grow, and spread far and wide her holy influences, so as to leave the unthinking worldliness of the age without excuse. "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." "The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and all nations shall flow unto it." The name of Christ shall be known from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. The knowledge of God shall cover the earth. "For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." The time will come when it shall be said, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." What, then, must be the conclusion from this seeming contrariety of description?

In all probability, some of the passages relating to the glory of the latter days, in their ultimate meaning, look to the condition of things in the regenerated earth, beyond the conflagration.

(5) Better Things. And yet, as we have said, we cannot explain the Scriptures without anticipating a day of better things for the Church than has been realized. The imprisonment of Satan denotes curtailment of his power, and increased restraint upon his actions, possibly to the extent of hindering his access to men in this world. This will be great gain in advantage for the truth. It will give the Gospel access to the heart, impeded only by the opposition of the depravity within. Under such conditions, the relative power of the Gospel will increase; the accumulated evidences of its divinity will shine out with a luster unseen before; and the quickened activities of Christian people will add to its efficiency, as its conquests are extended, and its victories multiplied. But will every living soul be converted? We dare not assume this. The universal spread of the Gospel neither implies the removal of depravity from human nature nor the submission of every sinner to the sway of divine grace. Men will still be descended from Adam, born after the flesh, and need to be "born again." But Christian intelligence will banish superstition. Idolatry will cease. Apostate churches will be reformed or destroyed. False religions will be overthrown. Enlightened governments, permeated with Christian principles, will displace tyrannies, and religious liberty will become the heritage of all the nations. This much may be expected, and such a millennium will be indescribably glorious. But the old fight with inward corruption will go on. Carnality, and selfishness, and pride, and love of the world, and love of power, will struggle for the mastery, calling for watchfulness and self-denial, and keeping up all the conditions of a real probation. And some will be overborne. Infidelity will find votaries. Men of evil passion will love darkness rather than light. Such will shut their eyes to the brightest beams of the brightest day of Gospel light, and when Satan is loose, they will be ready to join in the battle against the truth. Thus, in the final day of the Lord's coming, will worldliness and sin be found in the earth. So we read the prophecies. But we "see through a glass darkly." The best lights that reach our vision disclose only the mountain peaks of the land ahead. The valleys and plains of the landscape lie beneath the mists. We must wait till prophecy materializes into history, and then the morning star shall give place to the risen sun. S. M. M.

MILLET (mīl'let). See DOKHAN.

MILLO (mīl'lo), (Heb. with the article, מִלּוֹ הָאָרֶץ ham-mil-lo', heights).

This word denotes 'fullness,' and is applied to a mound or rampart, probably as being filled up with stones or earth. Hence it is the name given to

1. Part of the citadel of Jerusalem, probably the rampart (2 Sam. v:9; 1 Kings ix:15, 24; xi:27; 1 Chron. xi:8; 2 Chron. xxxii:5). In the last of these texts, where David is said to have restored or fortified Millo 'of' (not 'in') the city of David, the Sept. has τὸ ἀνάστημα τῆς πόλεως, 'the fortification of the city of David.'

2. The fortress in Shechem. 'All the men of Shechem, and all that dwell in the house of Millo;' that is, in the castle or citadel (Judg. ix:16, 20), probably, the place where Joash was killed (2 Kings xii:20).

MILLSTONE (mīl'stōn'). See MILL.

MINA (mī'na), so rendered in the margin (Luke xix:13) of the Greek μνα, but in the text as "pound." (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

MINCHAH (mīn'kah), the Hebrew name of the bloodless offerings (meal, cakes, etc.), presented in the Temple. (See OFFERING.)

MINCING (mīn'sing), (Heb. מִנְצֵף, taw-faf', Is. iii:16), to take short steps, just putting the heel of one foot against the toe of the other. The prophet condemns the effort of women old in years and sin to imitate the movements of children.

MINES, MINING (mīns, mīn'ing), (Job xxviii:1-11 R. V.). See COPPER; IRON; and other metals.

MINGLED PEOPLE (mīn'g'ld pē'p'l), (Heb. מִצְרָיִם, ay'reb, mixture).

"Mingled people" are such as originally belonged to different tribes or nations (Jer. xxv:20, 24; 1:37; Ezek. xxx:5). The "mixed multitude" that attended the Hebrews in their departure from Egypt were Arabs, Egyptians, Lybians, etc. They first tempted the Hebrews to despise the manna (Num. xi:4). They generally either died in the wilderness, returned to Egypt, or settled in Arabia. The mixed multitude which Nehemiah separated from the Jews were the Philistines, Ammonites, Moabites, and others who had come and intermarried among them (Neh. xiii:3).

God "mingled" the Jews' adversaries when he raised up many at once (Is. xix:11). His "mingling the Egyptians with the Egyptians", and "mingling a perverse spirit among them," denotes his kindling of civil wars among them (Is. xix:2, 14). The Romans "mingled themselves with the seed of men," but did not cleave to them; they dwelt in the same countries with the Goths, Huns, and other invaders of the empire; but they never had a heartiness of affection for them (Dan. ii:43).

MINIAMIN (mīn-i-a'mīn), (Heb. מִיָּמִינֵי, min-yaw-meen', from the right hand).

1. A Levite who had charge of the free-will offerings in the Temple and distributed them among the families of the sacerdotal order in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:15), B. C. 726.

2. A priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, and joined in the celebration over the completion of the walls (Neh. xii:17, 41). The name is elsewhere given as Miamin (xii:5), or Mijamin (x:7).

MINISTER (mín'is-tēr), one who acts as a lesser (from minus or minor) or inferior agent, in obedience or subservience to another, or who serves, officiates, etc., as distinguished from the master, magister (from magis), or superior.

1. The words so translated in the Old Testament are מֵשֵׁרָיִם, mesh-aw-rayth', and פֶּל־אֲחִי, (Chald.), and in the New, διάκονος, dee-ak'o-nos, servant, and ὑπηρέτης, hoop-ay-rel'ace, under-laborer. Moses and his minister, Joshua, are mentioned in Exod. xxiv:13.

2. It is applied to Elisha as minister to Elijah (2 Kings vi:15; Sept. lei-toor-gos', λειτουργός, public servant; comp. 2 Kings iii:11; 1 Kings xix:21). Persons thus designated sometimes succeeded to the office of their principal, as did Joshua and Elisha. The word is applied to the angels (Ps. ciii:21, public servants; comp. Ps. civ:4; Heb. i:7; and see Stuart's Comment. in loc.). Both the Hebrew and Sept. words are applied to the Jews in their capacity as a sacred nation, 'Men shall call you the ministers of our God' (Is. lxi:6); to the priests (Jer. xxxiii:21; Ezek. xliv:11; xlv:4; Joel i:9).

The Greek word is continued in the same sense in Luke i:23, and applied to Christian teachers (Acts xiii:2; Rom. xv:16; and to Christ, Heb. viii:2); to the collectors of the Roman tribute, in consequence of the divine authority of political government, 'they are God's ministers' (λειτουργοί). It was applied by the Athenians to those who administered the public offices (λειτουργία) at their own expense (Bœckh).

3. (1) The word διάκονος, dee-ak'on-os, 'minister,' is applied to Christian teachers (1 Cor. iii:5; 2 Cor. iii:6; vi:4; xi:23; 1 Thess. iii:2); (2) to false teachers (2 Cor. xi:15); to Christ (Rom. xv:8, 16; Gal. ii:17); (3) to heathen magistrates (Rom. xiii:4); in all which passages it has the sense of a minister, assistant, or servant in general, as in Matt. xx:26; but it means a particular sort of minister, 'a deacon,' in Phil. i:1; 1 Tim. iii:8, 12). The term διάκονοι, dee-ak-on-oi, ministers, denotes among the Greeks a higher class of servants than the δούλοι, δούλοι, slaves (Ahen. x:192; B. comp. Xen. l. c. Butt. Lexic. i:220; comp. Matt. xxii:13, and Esth. i:3; ii:2; vi:3). (4) ὑπηρέτης, hoop-ay-rel'ace, helper, is applied to Christian ministers (Luke i:2; Acts xxvi:16; 2 Cor. iv:1). Josephus calls Moses τὸν ὑπηρέτην Θεοῦ, God's helper, Antiq. iii:1-4. Kings are so called in Wisd. vi:4. (5) The word denotes, in Luke iv:20, the attendant in a synagogue who handed the volume to the reader, and returned it to its place. (6) In Acts xiii:5 it is applied to 'John whose surname was Mark,' in his capacity as an attendant or assistant on Barnabas and Saul. It primarily signifies an under-rower on board a galley, of the class who used the longest oars, and consequently performed the severest duty, as distinguished from the θραν-ε'ταξ θρανήτης, the rower upon the upper bench of the three, and from the hoi-naw'tay, οἱ ναῦται, sailors, or the ep-ee-bal'ay, ἐπιβάται, marines (Dem. 1200, 11, 14; comp. also 1208, 20; 1214, 23; 1216, 13; Pol. i, 25, 3); hence in general a hand, agent, minister, attendant, etc. J. F. D.

MINNI (mín'ni), (Heb. מִנִּי, min-nee', division) See ARMENIA.

MINNITH (mín'nith), (Heb. מִנְיָתַיִם, min-neeth', distribution), a town in the country of the Ammonites (Judg. xi:33), celebrated for the excellence of its wheat, which was exported to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii:17).

It still existed in the age of Eusebius four Roman miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia. The Sept. seem to have found difficulty in this name. In Judg. xi:33 they substitute the name of the Arnon, and in Ezek. xxvii:17 they render it by μύρον, 'myrrh.'

It was probably located about four Roman miles east of Heshbon, now thought to be Mineh, where there are traces of terraces and walls.

MINSTREL (mín'strél), (Heb. מְנַגְּגַיִם, men-ag-gayn', one striking the harp; Gr. ἀλλήτης, ow-lay-tace', a musician).

Perhaps the minstrel which Elisha called for, to allay his ruffled spirit with a tune, might be one of the singers of the Temple, who played to him one of David's Psalms (2 Kings iii:15). From minstrels playing at the death of Jairus's daughter, it seems, that the Jews had introduced the heathenish custom of diverting themselves on occasion of mortality; and which still appears in foolish light-wakes and reveling dirges (Matt. ix:23). Brown.

MINT (mínt). See HEDUOSMON.

MIHKAD (míph'kád), (Heb. מִיפְקָדַיִם, mif-kawd', appointment, census), a gate at Jerusalem (Neh. iii:31), probably identical with the prison gate (Neh. xii:39), under the bridge over the Tyropæon valley.

MIRACLES (mír'á-k'ls), (Lat. miraculum, from mirari, to wonder).

God sees fit to carry on his common operations on established and uniform principles.

(1) The Laws of Nature. These principles, whether relating to the physical or moral world, are called the laws of nature. And by the laws of nature the most enlightened philosophers and divines have understood the uniform plan according to which, or the uniform manner in which, God exercises his power throughout the created universe.

This uniform method of divine operation is evidently conducive to the most important ends. It manifests the immutable wisdom and goodness of God, and, in ways too many to be here specified, promotes the welfare of his creatures. Without the influence of this uniformity, rational beings would have no effectual motive to effort, and the affairs of the universe, intelligent and unintelligent, would be in a state of total confusion. And this general fact may be considered as a sufficient reason why God, in the common course of his providence, has adopted a uniform method of operation in preference to any other.

(2) Divine Interposition. But if, in conducting the affairs of his great empire, God sees, in any particular case, as good a reason for a deviation from this uniform order, as there is generally for uniformity, that is, if the glory of his attributes and the good of his creatures require it—and no one can say that such a case may not occur—then, unquestionably, the unchangeable God will cause such a deviation; in other words, will work miracles.

It is admitted that no man, apart from the knowledge of facts, could ever, by mere reasoning, have arrived at a confident belief, that the conjuncture supposed would certainly occur. But to us, who know that mankind are so deprived and wretched, and that the efforts of human wisdom to obtain relief have been in vain, the importance of a special divine interposition is very apparent. And being informed what the plan is, which a merciful God has adopted for our recovery to holiness and happiness, and being satisfied that this plan, so perfectly suited to the end in view, could never have been discovered by man, and never executed, except by a divine dispensation involving miracles, we conclude that the introduction of a new and miraculous dispensation was in the highest degree an honor to God and a blessing to the world.

(3) Revelation. The method of divine appointment, as set forth in the sacred volume, is that of making a revelation to a number of individuals, who are to write and publish it for the benefit of the world. This revelation to individuals is made in such a manner as renders it certain to their minds, that the revelation is from God. But how can that revelation be made available to others? It will not answer the purpose for those who receive it merely to declare that God has made such a revelation to them, and authorized them to proclaim it to their fellow creatures. For how shall we know that they are not deceivers? Or if their character is such as to repel any suspicion of this kind, how shall we know that they are not themselves deceived?

(4) Attestation. Have we not a right, nay, are we not bound in duty, to ask for evidence? But what evidence will suffice? The reply is obvious. The revelation, in order to be of use to us, as it is to those who receive it directly from God, must not only be declared by them to us, but must have a divine attestation. In other words, those who declare it to us must show, by some incontestable proof, that it is from God. Such proof is found in a miracle. If an event takes place which we know to be contrary to the laws of nature, we at once recognize it as the special act of him who is the God of nature, and who alone can suspend its laws, and produce effects in another way. The evidence of a direct interposition of God given in this way is irresistible. No man, no infidel, could witness an obvious miracle, without being struck with awe, and recognizing the finger of God.

It is clear that no event which can be accounted for on natural principles, can prove a supernatural interposition, or contain a divine attestation to the truth of a prophet's claim. But when we look at an event which cannot be traced to the laws of nature, and is clearly above them, such as the burning of the wood upon the altar in the case of Elijah's controversy with the false prophets, or the resurrection of Lazarus, we cannot avoid the conviction, that the Lord of heaven and earth does, by such a miracle, give his testimony, that Elijah is his prophet, and that Jesus is the Messiah. The evidence arising from miracles is so striking and conclusive, that there is no way for an infidel to evade it, but to deny the existence of miracles, and to hold that all the events called miraculous may be accounted for according to the laws of nature.

(5) Uniform Experience. Hume arrays uniform experience against the credibility of miracles. But the shallow sophistry of his argument has been fully exposed by Campbell, Paley and many others. We inquire what and how much he means by uniform experience. Does he mean his own experience? But because he has never witnessed a miracle, does it follow that others have not? Does he mean the uniform experience of the greater part of mankind? But how does he know that the experience of a smaller part has not been different from that of the greater part? Does he mean, then, the uniform experience of all mankind in all ages? How, then, does his argument stand? He undertakes to prove that no man has ever witnessed or experienced a miracle, and his real argument is, that no one has ever witnessed or experienced it. In other words, to prove that there has never been a miracle, he asserts that there never has been a miracle. This is the nature of his argument—an instance of petitio principii, to which a man of Hume's logical powers would never have resorted, had it not been for his enmity to religion.

(6) Genuineness. The miraculous events recorded in the Scriptures, particularly those which took place in the times of Moses and Christ, have all the marks which are necessary to prove them to have been matters of fact, and worthy of full credit, and to distinguish them from the feats of jugglers and impostors. This has been shown very satisfactorily by Leslie, Paley, Douglas, and many others. These miracles took place in the most public manner, and in the presence of many witnesses; so that there was opportunity to subject them to the most searching scrutiny. Good men and bad men were able and disposed to examine them thoroughly, and to prove them to have been impostures, if they had been so.

A large number of men of unquestionable honesty and intelligence constantly affirmed that the miracles took place before their eyes. And some of these original witnesses wrote and published histories of the facts, in the places where they were alleged to have occurred, and near the time of their occurrence. In these histories it was openly asserted that the miracles, as described, were publicly known and acknowledged to have taken place; and this no one took upon him to contradict, or to question. Moreover, many persons who stood forth as witnesses of these miracles passed their lives in labors, dangers, and sufferings, in attestation of the accounts they delivered, and solely in consequence of their belief of the truth of those accounts; and, from the same motive, they voluntarily submitted to new rules of conduct; while nothing like this is true respecting any other pretended miracles. (See Paley's Evidences.)

(7) Wicked Spirits. It has been a long agitated question, whether miracles have ever been wrought, or can be consistently supposed to be wrought, by apostate spirits.

It is sufficient to say here, that it would be evidently inconsistent with the character of God to empower or to suffer wicked beings to work miracles in support of falsehood. And if wicked spirits in the time of Christ had power to produce preternatural effects upon the minds or bodies of men, and if those effects are to be ranked among real miracles (which, however, we do not affirm), still the end of miracles is not contravened. For those very operations of evil spirits were under the control of divine providence, and were made in two ways to subserve the cause of Christ. First, they furnished an occasion, as doubtless they were designed to do, for Christ to show his power over evil spirits, and, by his superior miracles, to give a new proof of his Messiahship. Secondly, the evil spirits themselves were constrained to give their testimony, that Jesus was the Christ, the Holy One of Israel.

(8) Close of Dispensation. As to the time when the miraculous dispensation ceased, we can only remark that the power of working miracles, which belonged preëminently to Christ and his apostles, and, in inferior degrees, to many other Christians in the apostolic age, subsided gradually. After the great object of supernatural works was accomplished in the establishment of the Christian religion, with all its sacred truths, and its divinely appointed institutions, during the life of Christ and his apostles, there appears to have been no further occasion for miracles, and no satisfactory evidence that they actually occurred. MIRAGE (mê'râzh'), an optical illusion frequently witnessed in the East (Heb. שָׂרָף, shaw-rawb', "parched ground," Is. xxxv:7; "heat," xlix:10). (See PARCHED GROUND.)

MIRIAM (mír'i-am), (Heb. מִרְיָם, meer-yawm', bitterness; Sept. Μαριάμ, Mariam; Josephus, Μαριάμη, Mariamne).

1. Sister of Moses and Aaron, and supposed to be the same that watched her infant brother when exposed on the Nile; in which case she was probably ten or twelve years old at the time (Exod. ii:4, sq.). When the Israelites left Egypt, Miriam naturally became the leading woman among them. She is called 'a prophetess' (Exod. xv:20). After the passage of the Red Sea, she led the music, dance and song, with which the women celebrated their deliverance (Exod. xv:20-22). The arrival of Moses' wife in the camp seems to have created in her an unseemly dread of losing her influence and position, and led her into complaints of and dangerous reflections upon Moses, in which Aaron joined. For this she was smitten with leprosy, and, although healed at the intercession of Moses, was excluded for seven days from the camp (Num. xii; Deut. xxiv:9). Her death took place in the first month of the fortieth year after the Exodus, at the encampment mirrors used in ancient times were of metal; and as those of the Hebrew women in the wilderness were brought out of Egypt, they were doubtless of the same kind as those which have been found in the tombs of that country, and many of which now exist in our museums and collections of Egyptian antiquities. These are of mixed metals, chiefly copper, most carefully wrought and highly polished; and so admirably did the skill of the Egyptians succeed in the composition of metals that this substitute for our modern looking-glass was susceptible of a luster which has even been partially revived at the present day in some of those discovered at Thebes, though buried in the earth for so many centuries. The mirror itself was nearly round, and was inserted in a handle of wood, stone, or metal, the form of which varied according to the taste of the owner. (See Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii:384-386.)

The metal of which the mirrors were composed, being liable to rust and tarnish, required to be constantly kept bright (Wisd. vii:26; Ecclus. xii:11). This was done by means of pounded pumice-stone, rubbed on with a sponge, which was generally suspended from the mirror. The obscure image produced by a tarnished or imperfect mirror appears to be alluded to in 1 Cor. xiii:12. (Smith, Bib. Dict.) (See GLASS; LOOKING-GLASS.)

MISCHIEF. Several words in the Scriptures are thus rendered:

1. Rah (Heb. רָע, bad, evil, sorrow, adversity, affliction, etc. (Exod. xxxii:12, 22; 1 Sam. xxiii:9; 2 Sam. xvi:8; 1 Kings xi:25, etc).

2. Aw'ven (Heb. אָוֵן, perhaps panting), to apply oneself in vain, and applied to idolatry, wickedness, injustice, etc. (Ps. lv:10; lxiii:3; Ezek. xi:2).

3. Aw-sonē' (Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה, meaning harm, hurt), (Gen. xlii:4, 38; Exod. xxi:22, 23; xxxii:12, 22).

4. Aw-mawl' (Heb. אֲמַל, toil, wearing effort), worry of mind, undue strain of the body, or wrongdoing as resulting in sorrow, trouble, etc. (Ps. vii:14, 16; xciv:20; Prov. xxiv:2; Is. lix. 4).

5. Hrad-ee-oorg-ee'a (Gr. ῥαδιουργία, ease in doing, cunning, overreaching, unscrupulousness (Acts xiii:10, R. V. "villainy").

Figurative. (1) To imagine mischievous against God is to contrive methods of dishonoring him (Hos. vii:15). (2) Wicked men have mischievous under their tongue, in their heart, and are in readiness to utter words, tending to their own or others' hurt (Ps. x:7). (3) They sleep not except they have done mischievous, and caused some to fall; they daily hurt somebody, and are never more delighted than when so employed (Prov. iv:16 and vi:18 and x:23 and xxiv:2). (4) Their mischievous returns on their head, and the mischievous of their lips consumes them, when their purposes, endeavors, and speeches, designed for the hurt of others, turn to their own ruin, as happened in the case of Haman (Ps. vii:16 and lii:2). Mischievous, is what tends or intends to hurt (Ps. xxi:11; Prov. xxiv:8).

MISGAB (mīs'gāb), (Heb. מִשְׁגַּב, mis-gawb', height), a city of Moab, on the line of march of the invading Assyrians (Jer. xlvi:1), but not identified.

MISHAEL (mīsh'a-el), (Heb. מִישַׁאֵל, mee-shaw-ale', who is like God?)

1. One of the three companions of Daniel, who were cast into the burning furnace by Nebuchadnezzar, and were miraculously delivered from it (Dan. iii:13-30). The Chaldaean name was MESHACH (Dan. i:7). B. C. about 580.

2. One of those who stood at Ezra's left when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii:4), B. C. 410.

3. A Levite, son of Uzziel, and grandson of Kohath (Exod. vi:22). He, with his brother Elzaphan, were ordered by Moses to bury the bodies of the two men who were struck dead for offering strange fire (Lev. x:4), B. C. 1657. Perhaps the same two are intended in Num. ix:6.

MISHAL (mī'shal), (Heb. מִשְׁאָל, mish-awl', depression).

A city of Asher, yielded to the Levites of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi:74), is said by Eusebius to have been in the vicinity of Mount Carmel near the sea. In Josh. xix:26, it is called Misheal, and in xxi:30, Mishal. Not identified.

MISHAM (mī'sham), (Heb. מִשְׁאָם, mish-awm', purification or swift going), a Benjamite, son of Elpaal, and one of the restorers of Ono and Lod (1 Chron. viii:12), B. C. after 1612.

MISHEAL (mī'she-al), (Josh. xix:26). See MISHAL.

MISHMA (mīsh'mā), (Heb. מִשְׁמָא, mish-maw', fame or report).

1. A Simeonite, son of Mibsam (1 Chron. iv:25, 26), B. C. before 1053.

2. Fifth son of Ishmael, and head of an Arabian tribe (Gen. xxv:14; 1 Chron. i:30). A trace of the name is perhaps to be found in the Jebel Misma, between Damascus and Jarif, or the one 150 miles east of Taima.

MISHMANNAH (mish-mān'nah), (Heb. מִשְׁמַנָּה, mish-man-naw', strength, fatness, vigor), a Gadite who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:10) B. C. about 1061.

MISHNAH (mīsh'nah). See TALMUD.

MISHRAITES (mīsh'ra-ites), (Heb. מִשְׁרָאִי, ham-mish-raw-ee'), the inhabitants of a place founded by one of the families of Kirjath-jearim, but not otherwise mentioned (1 Chron. ii:53).

MISPERETH (mīs'pe-reth), (Heb. מִסְפֵּרֶת, mis-peh-reth', writing), one of those who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii:7); elsewhere (Ezra ii:2) MIZPAR.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM (mīs're-phōth-mā'im), (Heb. מִסְרֵפּוֹת מַיִם, mis-ref-oth' mah'yim, burning of waters), a place or district near Sidon (Josh. xi:8; xiii:6). The name means 'burnings of water,' which Kimchi understands of warm baths; but more probably it means burnings by or besides the water—either lime kilns or smelting furnaces, situated near water (Gesenius). It is probably correctly identified with el Musheirifeh, about eleven miles north of Acre, near the sea.

MIST (mīst), (Heb. אֶדָה, ade, Gen. ii:6), an ascending vapor, fog or cloud suspended in the atmosphere (Job xxxvi:27).

MITE (mīt), (Gr. λεπτόν, lep-ton', thin, scale-like). A small piece of money, two of which made a κοδράντης, a quadrans—four of the latter being equal to the Roman as. The as was of less weight and value in later than in early times. Its original value was 3.4 farthings, and afterwards 2½ farthings. The latter was its value in the time of Christ, and the mite being one-eighth of that sum, was little more than one-fourth of an English farthing, or an eighth of a cent. It was the smallest coin known to the Hebrews (Luke xii:59). (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

MITER (mī'tēr).

1. Mits-neh'feth (Heb. מִצְנֵהֶת, tiara, Exod. xxviii:4, 37, 39; xxix:6, etc.). The turban or head-dress of the high priest.

2. Tsaw-nee' (Heb. צָוֵה, headdress, Zech. iii:5 only); translated "diadem," (Job xxix:14), "hood," (Is. iii:23). (See CROWN; DRESS.)

MITHCAH (mīth'kah), (Heb. מִיתְכָּה, mith-kaw', sweet place, or sweetness), one of the encampments of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii:28, 29). See WANDERING, THE.

MITHNITE (mīth'nite), (Heb. מִיתְנֵה, mith-nee'), the appellation of Joshaphat, one of David's body-guard (1 Chron. xi:43), probably meaning the inhabitant of a place or member of a tribe by the name of Methen of which there is no other notice.

MITHREDATH (mīth're-dāth), (Heb. מִיתְרֵדָת, mith-red-awth', given by Mithra, the sun god).

1. The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, who was ordered to return the sacred vessels of the Jews to the chief Sheshbazzar (Ezra i:8), B. C. 536.

2. A Persian governor of Samaria, who joined in urging Artaxerxes Longimanus to prevent the Jews from rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra iv:7), B. C. 522.

MITYLENE (mī't'y-lē'ne), (Gr. Μιτυλήνη, mit-oo-lay'nay).

The capital of the isle of Lesbos, in the Ægean Sea, about seven miles and a half from the opposite point on the coast of Asia Minor. It was a well-built town, but unwholesomely situated. It was the native place of Pittacus, Theophrastus, Theophrastus, Sappho, Alcæus, and Diophanes. St. Paul touched at Mitylene in his voyage from Corinth to Judæa (Acts xx:14). It does not appear that any Christian church was established at this place in the apostolic age. No mention is made of it in ecclesiastical history until a late period; and in the second century heathenism was so rife in Mitylene that a man was annually sacrificed to Dionysus. In the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth centuries, we, however, find bishops of Mitylene present at several councils (Magdeburg, Hist. Eccles. Cent., ii:195; v:6; vi:6; vii:4, 253, 254; viii:6). Mitylene still exists, and has given its name, in the form of Mytilni, or Metelin, to the whole island; but it is now a place of no importance under Turkish rule. The people are chiefly Greek. (See Harper, Class Dict.)

MIXED MARRIAGES, i. e., between Jews and Gentiles, were strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law. (See MARRIAGE.)

MIXED MULTITUDE (Heb. מִצְרַיִם, ay'reb, mixture). See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MIZAR (mī'zar), (Heb. מִצְרַיִם, mits-ar', little, small); probably a summit of Lebanon, east of the Jordan, where David retreated from the rebellion of Absalom (Ps. xlii:6). Site not known.

MIZPAH (mīz'pah), (Heb. מִצְפָּה, mits-paw', watch-tower), is the name of several towns and places in lofty situations whether furnished with a watch-tower or not.

1. A town or city in Gilead (Judg. x:17; xi:11, 34; Hos. v:1). The place originated in the heap of stones set up by Laban, and to which he gave his name (Gen. xxxi:49). Some confound this with the Mizpeh of Gilead in Judg. xi:29; but it is better to distinguish them (see MIZPEH, 3).

2. A city of Benjamin, where the people were wont to convene (Josh. xviii:26; Judg. xx:1, 3; xxi:1; 1 Sam. vii:5-16; x:17, sq.). It was afterwards fortified by Asa, to protect the borders against the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xv:22; 2 Chron. xvi:6). In later times it became the residence of the governor under the Chaldeans (Jer. xl:6, sq.; comp. Neh. iii:7, 15, 19). In one place the name occurs with e, Mizpeh (Heb. מִצְפֵּה, mits-peh'). Its position is nowhere mentioned in Scripture or by Josephus, but it could not have been far from Ramah, since King Asa fortified it with materials taken from that place; and that it was situated on an elevated spot is clear from its name—Neby Samwil (Prophet Samuel)—which, although somewhat distant from Er-Ram, Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii:144) inclines to regard as the probable site of Mizpah, especially as in 1 Macc. iii:46 it is described as 'over against Jerusalem,' implying that it was visible from that city, which is true of Neby Samwil. This place is now a poor village, seated upon the summit of an elevated ridge. It contains a mosque, now in a state of decay, which, on the ground of the apparently erroneous identification with Ramah, is regarded by Jews, Christians and Moslems as the tomb of Samuel.

"Grove, Stanley, Bonar, Major Wilson and others would identify Mizpah with Mount Scopus, one of the summits just north of Jerusalem, in the continuation of the Olivet range. From this place the traveler gets a very complete view of the Holy City, and from there the emperor Titus looked down upon it. Not far away is the modern village of Shafat. Conder notes that a part of the ridge is called Arkub es-Siffa, or, "the ridge of the view." Eusebius and Jerome located Mizpah near Kirjath-jearim, and Conder notes a Shiffa immediately south of Kuryet el-Anab (Kirjath-jearim), a name having exactly the same meaning with Mizpah—viz., "place of view." Conder also says that there is a place called Umni Siffa, equivalent to the Hebrew Mizpah, existing on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem, which would be a suitable position for the Mizpah of Jeremiah (xl, xli), which is not necessarily the Mizpah of Samuel (Quarterly, 1876, p. 171). But his final conclusion is that Mizpah and Nob are identical. Whether the Mizpah of Hosea (v:1) was in Benjamin or in Gilead is uncertain" (Schaff, Bib. Dict.). (See MIZPEH.)

MIZPAR (mīz'par), (Ezra ii:2). See MISPERETH.

MIZPEH (mīz'peh), (Heb. מִצְפֵּה, mits-peh, feminine form).

This name has the same meaning and application as Mizpah, and is borne by several places mentioned in Scripture.

1. A town in the plains of Judah (Josh. xv:38). Eusebius and Jerome identify it with a place which, in their time, bore the name of Mapha, on the borders of Eleutheropolis southward, on the road to Ælia or Jerusalem; perhaps the modern Tell es-Safch (Robinson, Researches, ii:362 ff.).

2. The place more usually called Mizpah, in the tribe of Benjamin, is once called Mizpeh (Josh. xviii:26). (See MIZPAH 2.)

3. Mizpeh of Galilee, through or by which Jephthah passed in his pursuit of the Ammonites Mizpeh (The Watch-Tower of Benjamin).

(Judg. xi:29). Some think it the same with MIZPAH, 1; and it is possibly the same with the Ramath-mizpeh of Josh. xiii:26.

4. A valley in the region of Lebanon (Josh. xi:8; comp. xi:3). Not identified.

5. A town of Moab, to which David took his parents that they might avoid the persecutions of Saul (1 Sam. xxii:3).

MIZRAIM (mīz'ra-īm), (Heb. מִצְרַיִם, mits-rah'-yim, or Land of Mizraim), the name by which, in Scripture, Egypt is generally designated, apparently from its having been peopled by Mizraim, the son of Ham (Gen. x). This ancient title is still preserved in Misr, the existing Arabic name of the country. (See EGYPT.)

MIZZAH (miz'zah), (Heb. מִיזָה, miz-zaw', fear), son of Reuel, son of Esau by Bashemath; a chief of an Edomite tribe (Gen. xxxv:3, 4, 13, 17; 1 Chron. i:37). B. C. after 1927.

MNASON (nā'son), Gr. Μνάσων, mnah'sohn, reminding), an 'old disciple' with whom St. Paul lodged when at Jerusalem in A. D. 58 (Acts xxi:16).

He seems to have been a native of Cyprus, but an inhabitant of Jerusalem, like Joses and Barnabas. Some think that he was converted by Paul and Barnabas while at Cyprus (Acts xiii:9); but the designation 'an old disciple,' has more generally induced the conclusion that he was converted by Jesus himself, and was perhaps one of the seventy.

MOAB (mō'ab), (Heb. מוֹאָב, mo-awb', from father), son of Lot and his eldest daughter (Gen. xix:30-38). He was born about the same time as Isaac, and became the founder of the Moabites.

MOABITES (mō'ab-ites), (Heb. מוֹאָבִיִּם, mo-aw-bee'; מוֹאָבִיִּים, mo-aw-beem'), a tribe descended from Moab, the son of Lot, and consequently related to the Hebrews (Gen. xix:37).

(1) Territory. Previous to the exodus of the latter from Egypt, the former, after expelling the original inhabitants, called Emims (Gen. xiv:5; Deut. ii:11), had possessed themselves of the region on the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, as far north as the river Jabbok. But the northern, and indeed the finest and best, portion of the territory, viz., that extending from the Jabbok to the Arnon, had passed into the hands of the Amorites, who founded there one of their kingdoms, with Heshbon for its capital (Num. xxi:26). Og had established another at Bashan. Hence at the time of the Exodus the valley and river Arnon constituted the northern boundary of Moab (Num. xxi:13; Judg. xi:18; Joseph. Antiq. iv:5, 1). As the Hebrews advanced in order to take possession of Canaan, they did not enter the proper territory of the Moabites (Deut. ii:9; Judg. xi:18), but conquered the kingdom of the Amorites (a Canaanitish tribe), which had formerly belonged to Moab; whence the western part, lying along the Jordan, frequently occurs under the name of 'plains of Moab' (Deut. i:5).

(2) Moab and Israel. The Moabites, fearing the numbers that were marching around them, showed them at least no kindness (Deut. xxiii:4); and their king (Balak) hired Balaam to utter prophetic curses, which, however, were converted into blessings in his mouth (Num. xii sq.). The Gadites now took possession of the northern portion of this territory, which the Amorites had wrested from the Moabites, and established themselves there; while the Reubenites settled in the southern part (Num. xxxii:34; comp. Josh. xiii, which, however, differs somewhat in the designation of particular towns).

We see the first hostilities breaking out in the beginning of the period of the Judges, when the Hebrews had been for a long time tributary to the Moabites, but threw off their yoke under Ehud (Judg. iii:12-30). Towards the end of this period, however, peace and friendship were restored, mutual honors were reciprocated (as the history of Ruth shows), and Moab appears often to have afforded a place of refuge to outcasts and emigrant Hebrews (Ruth i:1; comp. 1 Sam. xxii:

3, 4; Jer. xl:11; Is. xvi:2). After Saul had waged successful war against them (1 Sam. xiv:47), David made them tributary (2 Sam. viii:2, 12; xxiii:20). The right to levy this tribute seems to have been transferred to Israel after the division of the kingdom; for upon the death of Ahab (about B. C. 896) they refused to pay the customary tribute of 100,000 lambs and as many rams (2 Kings i:1; iii:4; comp. Is. xvi:1). Jehoram (B. C. 896), in alliance with Judah and Edom, sought indeed to bring them back to their subjection. The invading army, after having been preserved from perishing by thirst through the intervention of Elisha, defeated the Moabites and ravaged the country; but, through the strange conduct of the king, in offering up in sacrifice his son (MESHA), were induced to retire without completing the object of the expedition. The Moabites deeply resented the part which the king of Judah took in this invasion, and formed a powerful confederacy with the Ammonites, Edomites, and others, who marched in great force into Judæa, and formed their camp at Engedi, where they fell out among themselves and destroyed each other through the special interposition of Providence, in favor of Jehoshaphat and his people (2 Kings iii:4, sq.; comp. 2 Chron. xx:1-30). (See ELISHA; JEHOAM; JEHOSEPHAT.) Under Jehoash (B. C. 849) we see them undertake incursions into the kingdom of Israel, and carry on offensive war against it (2 Kings xiii:20).

Though the subsequent history of Israel often mentions the Moabites, yet it is silent respecting a circumstance which, in relation to one passage, is of the greatest importance, namely, the reconquest of the territory between the Arnon and the Jabbok, which was wrested from the Moabites by the Amorites, and afterwards of the territory possessed by the tribes of Reuben and Gad. This territory in general we see, according to Is. xvi, in the possession of the Moabites again. Even Selah, the ancient capital of the Edomites, seems likewise, from Is. xvi:1, to have belonged to them, at least for a time. The most natural supposition is that of Reland (Palästina, p. 720), Paulus (Clavis, p. 110), and Rosenmüller (in loc.), that, after the carrying away of those tribes into captivity, the Moabites occupied their territory; as it is expressly stated (Jer. xlix:1-5) that the Amorites intruded themselves into the territory of the captive Gadites, as the Edomites did in respect to the Jews at a later period (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. v. 79).

(3) Under Nebuchadnezzar. Still later, under Nebuchadnezzar, we see the Moabites acting as the auxiliaries of the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxiv:2), and beholding with malicious satisfaction the destruction of a kindred people (Ezek. xxv:8-11); yet, according to an account in Josephus (Antiq. x:9, 7), Nebuchadnezzar, when on his way to Egypt, made war upon them, and subdued them, together with the Ammonites, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

(4) National Hostility. That continual wars and contentions must have created a feeling of national hostility between the Hebrews and the Moabites, may be readily conceived. This feeling manifested itself on the part of the Hebrews, sometimes in bitter proverbs, sometimes in the denunciations of the prophets; on the part of the Moabites in proud boastings and expressions of contempt (Is. xvi:6).

Among the prophecies, however, that of Balaam (Num. xxii-xxiv) is, above all, remarkable, in which this ancient prophet (who withal was not an Israelite), hired by Moab to curse, is impelled by the Divine Spirit to bless Israel, and to announce the future destruction of Moab by a mighty hero in Israel (Num. xxiv:17). It is a genuine epic representation worthy of the greatest poet of any age. Nor should we overlook the song of triumph and scorn respecting Moab, suggested by Heshbon, and obscure only as to its origin (Num. xxi:17-30). Among the later prophets, Amos (ii:1-3) predicts their destruction in consequence of their cruelty to the king of Edom; probably with reference to the war recorded in 2 Kings iii, when the Edomites were confederate with the Hebrews; although the particular instance of cruelty is not there specified. Zephaniah (ii:8-10) condemns them to punishment for their scorn and contempt of Israel. Jeremiah repeats the denunciation of evil predicted by Zephaniah, for the most part in the words of Numbers and Isaiah (Jer. xlviii; comp. also ix:26; xxv:21); and Ezekiel threatens them with punishment for their malicious joy at the overthrow of Judæa (xxv:6-11). Moreover, the subjection of Moab finds a place in every ideal description of splendid wars and golden ages predicted for Israel (Is. xi:14; xxv:10; Ps. lx:8). 'Moab is my wash-pot' (Ps. lxxxiii:6).

(5) After the Exile. After the Exile, an intimate connection between the two nations had found place by means of intermarriages (Ezra ix:1, sq.; Neh. xiii:1), which, however, were dissolved by the theoretic zeal of Ezra. The last (chronologically) notice of the Moabites which occurs in Scripture is in Dan. xi:41, which contains an obscure intimation of the escape of the Moabites from the overthrow with which neighboring countries would be visited; but Josephus, in the history of Alexander Jannæus, mentions the cities between Arnon and Jabbok under the title of cities of Moab (Antiq. xiii:15). Thenceforth their name is lost under that of the Arabians, as was also the case with Ammon and Edom.

From Burckhardt (Travels in Syria), Robinson and others, we learn that in the land of Moab, which lay to the east and southeast of Judæa, and which bordered on the east, northeast and partly on the south of the Dead Sea, the soil is rather more diversified than that of Ammon; and, where the desert and plains of salt have not encroached upon its borders, of equal fertility. There are manifest and abundant signs of its ancient importance. The whole of the plains are covered with the sites of towns on every eminence or spot convenient for the construction of one; and as the land is capable of rich cultivation, there can be no doubt that the country now so deserted, once presented a continued picture of plenty and fertility (Irby and Mangles, p. 378). The form of fields is still visible, and there are remains of Roman highways which are in some places completely paved, 'and on which there are milestones of the times of Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, and Severus, with the numbers of the miles legible upon them. Wherever any spot is cultivated the corn is luxuriant; and the frequency and in many instances the close vicinity of the sites of ancient towns prove that the population of the country was formerly proportioned to its fertility (Irby and Mangles, pp. 377, 378, 456, 460).

(6) Prophecies Fulfilled. It was in its state of highest prosperity that the prophets foretold that the cities of Moab should become desolate, without any to dwell in them; and accordingly we find, that although the sites, ruins and names of many ancient cities of Moab can be traced, not one of them exists at the present day as tenanted by man. Porter indicates how completely those various prophecies have been fulfilled, but some of his statements require confirmation. From Salcah he saw upward of thirty deserted towns (Jer. xlviii:15-24). The neglected and wild vineyards and fig trees are rifled by the Bedouins every year in their periodical raids (verses 32, 33). The inhabitants hide themselves in the mountain-fastnesses, oppressed by the robbers of the desert on the one hand and the robbers of the government on the other (verses 28, 44). Cyril Graham, who explored this region, found cities with buildings in a good state of preservation, yet everywhere uninhabited. "In the whole of these vast plains, north and south, east and west, desolation reigns supreme." The long-predicted doom of Moab is now fulfilled, and the forty-eighth chapter of Jeremiah is verified on the spot by the traveler. There are twenty-seven references to Moab in this chapter, and one hundred and twenty-one in the Scriptures.

The argument for the inspiration of the sacred records deducible from this, among other facts of the same kind, is produced with considerable force by Dr. Keith in his work on Prophecy. Gesenius, Comment. on Is. xv, xvi; Introduct. translated by W. S. Tyler, with Notes by Moses Stuart, in Biblical Repos. for 1836, vol. vii, pp. 107-124; Keith's Evidence from Prophecy, pp. 153-165; and Land of Israel, 279-295; Pictorial Bible, Notes to Deut. ii:2; Is. xvi, xvii; Jer. xliii. MOABITNESS (mō'abi-tess), (Heb. מואביטס, mo-aw-bee', feminine of Moabite), a Moabitiish woman (Ruth i:22; ii:21; iv:5, 19; 2 Chron. xxiv:26).

MOABITE STONE (mō-ab-ite stōn).

(1) How Discovered. This wonderful monument of the times of the events recorded in the

The Moabite Stone.

Book of Kings was discovered by a missionary by the name of F. Klein, in August, 1868. When on his way to the Bekka, a friendly sheik drew his attention to a black basalt stone in the vicinity of his tent at Dibon.

(2) Dimensions. This stone was about three feet and ten inches in height, two feet in breadth, and fourteen and a half inches in thickness. It was rounded both at the top and bottom to nearly the shape of a semicircle, and contained an inscription on one side consisting of thirty-four lines.

(3) Inscription Secured. Mr. Klein tried to obtain it for the museum of Berlin, but negotiations progressed slowly, and in the meantime squeezes were taken of the inscription. This was most fortunate, for the Bedouins of the country, rather than give it up, broke the stone by building a fire under it, and then pouring cold water upon it, after which they distributed the fragments among themselves, to be used as amulets and charms. Happily, however, more than half of the inscription remained intact, and the squeezes and copies which had been obtained nearly supply the lacunæ in the text, as may be seen from an inspection of the original monument now in the museum of the Louvre.

(4) Language. The language of the inscription is almost identical with the ancient Hebrew, and shows that in the tenth century before Christ (the period to which it belongs) the Israelites and Moabites had a common language. This indicates that they sprang from a common ancestry. There was, however, considerable dissimilarity between the characters in which this language was inscribed by the two nations, in consequence of their long separation from each other. Still they bear an essential relationship which may be readily recognized.

(5) By Whom Erected. The tablet tells its own story, and shows that it was erected by MESHU, king of Moab, in order to recount a victory which he obtained over the Israelites. Many of Meshu's exploits are recounted, and the names of various places are given which he claimed to have either built or destroyed (B. C. 900). The Moabites fought many a battle with Israel, but Meshu, like the other heathen kings, records only his victories. This record, however, fills up a gap in the brief account we have in the Books of the Kings concerning the wars between Meshu and Israel especially during the reign of King Omri.

The Moabites had been reduced to subjection by David, but after the separation of the kingdoms, they apparently regained their independence. During the reigns of Jeroboam and Ahab they were again tributaries. But after the death of Ahab, they again rebelled against the king of Israel, as we learn from 2 Kings iii:4. The successful insurrection here referred to, in Biblical history, is recorded by Meshu himself on the Moabite stone, and his victory is ascribed to Chemosh, who is called "the god of Moab," and referred to in 1 Kings xi:7 as "Chemosh the abomination of Moab."

(6) Names Recorded. The stone record gives the names of persons, places and events, which are also given in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, together with others which are supplementary. Jehovah is recognized as the God of Israel. Chemosh is worshiped as the god of Moab, and we find also the names of Dibon (Num. xxxii:34), Nebo, Baal-Meon (Josh. xiii:17), Ataroth (Num. xxxii:34), and others, besides Horonaim (Is. xv:5) and the River Arnon (Josh. xiii:16).

This monument has attracted much attention in the world of scholars, and the literature connected with it is very extensive, there being eight or more volumes devoted to the subject, besides a multitude of papers which have been contributed to various periodicals published in English, French, Italian, German, Hebrew and Greek.

Hopes were entertained that other tablets of that character might be found, but Palmer, who investigated every written stone reported by the Arabs, came to the conclusion that there does not remain above ground a single inscribed stone of any importance.

(7) Bibliography. The bibliography connected with the Moabite stone is very extensive. A full translation of the inscription, except the two broken lines, has been made by Dr. A. Neubauer and published in Records of the Past, vol. ii (Bagster & Sons, London). See also Higher Criticism and the Monuments, by A. H. Sayce. There are books published upon this subject by Clermont, Ganneau, Ginsburg, Hitzig, Kaempf, Schlottman, Vogüé and others, besides an enormous number of contributions by various authors to periodicals in English, French, Italian, German, Greek and Hebrew.

MOABITISH (mō'ab-i'tish), pertaining to Moab (Ruth ii:6).

MOADIAH (mō'a-dī'ah), (Heb. מוֹדִיָּהּ, moh-ad-yaw, festival of Jah; Neh. xii:17). (See MAADIAH).

MOCK, MOCKING (mōk, mō'king). Several Hebrew and Greek words are thus translated.

1. Haw-thal' (Heb. הָלַץ, to deceive; Judg. xvi:10, 15; Job xiii:9).

2. Kaw-las' (Heb. סָבַח, to laugh in scorn or contempt; 1 Kings xviii:27; 2 Kings ii:23; Ezek. xxii:5).

3. Loots (Heb. שָׂדַח; Gr. μωκταγίζω, mook-tay-rid-za; to scoff, deride, to mock at any one; Prov. xiv:9; xx:1; Gal. vi:7).

4. Tsaw-khak' (Heb. שָׂחַח, to jest with or play with females, Gen. xix:14; to toy, caress, ravish, or abuse, Gen. xxxix:14, 17).

5. Law-ag' (Heb. לָצַח, to scoff, scorn, etc., 2 Chron. xxx:10; Job xxi:3; Prov. i:26).

6. Aw-lal' (Heb. לָלַץ, to abuse or insult another; Num. xxii:29; Jer. xxxviii:19).

7. Saw-khak' (Heb. שָׂחַח, derision, scorn, derisive laughter; Lam. i:7).

8. Emp-ahead'zo (Gr. ἐμπαίζω, to trifle with; Matt. ii:16; xx:19; xxvii:29; Luke xviii:32; xxiii:11, 36).

9. Khlyoo-ad'zo (Gr. κληυάζω, to shoot out the lip; Acts xvii:32).

Figurative. (1) God "mocks at men's fear" when he brings judgment upon them (Prov. i:26).

(2) God is "not mocked," he will not be deceived or jested with (Gal. vi:7). (3) Men "mock" God, when in words or behavior they jest at his being, his purposes, words, works, ordinances, ministers or people (Job. xiii:9). (4) Wine is a "mockery," and strong drink is "raging;" if drunk to excess, it deceives men, promising them enjoyment, while it lands them in disgrace and violence (Prov. xx:1).

MODERATE, MODERATION (mōd'er-āt, mōd'er-a'shūn), (Gr. ἐπιεικής, ep-ee-i-kace', fairness, gentleness, Phil. iv:5; translated "patient," 1 Tim. iii:3; "gentle," Tit. iii:2; 1 Peter ii:18); moderate, in general, is to abate; to keep in due bounds. To "moderate threatening," is to restrain it within due bounds (Eph. vi:9). Our "moderation should be known to all men, because the Lord is at hand;" we should exercise tenderness and gentleness toward all men, and treat them with kindness and respect; and bear injuries (Phil. iv:5).

MOLADAH (mōl'a-dah), (Heb. מולדה, mo-law-daw', birth).

A city first given to Judah, and afterward to Simeon (Josh. xix:2; 1 Chron. iv:28). It was in the southerly part of Judah. The place was re-occupied after the exile (Neh. xi:26). It is identified with Milh (Robinson, ii:621), seven and a half miles southwest of Arad, and fourteen south-east of Beersheba. (Stewart, Tent and Khan, p. 217). There are ruins of a fortified town, two wells, one with water at the depth of forty feet; and the wells are surrounded with marble troughs. Arab tradition says that Abraham dug these wells and watered his flocks here.

MOLE (mōl), (Heb. מול, khafore', Arabic, khuld, Lev. xi:30, in our version 'weasel').

Although the similarity of sound in names is an unsafe ground to depend upon when it is applied to specific animals, still, the Hebrew and Syriac appearing likewise to imply creeping into, creeping underneath by burrowing—characteristics most obvious in moles—and the Arabic denomination being undoubted, chaled may be assumed to indicate the above animal, in preference to chusemeth, which, in conformity with the opinion of Bochart, is referred to the chameleon. This conclusion is the more to be relied on as the animal is rather common in Syria, and in some places abundant. Zoölogists have considered the particular species to be the Talpa Europæa, which, under the name of the common mole, is so well known as not to require a more particular description. The ancients represented the mole to have no eyes; which assertion later scientific writers believed they had disproved by showing our species to be possessed of these organs, though exceedingly small. Nevertheless, recent observations have proved that a species, in other respects scarcely, if at all, to be distinguished from the common, is totally destitute of eyes, and consequently has received the name of Talpa caeca. It is to be found in Italy, and probably extends to the East, instead of the Europæa. Moles must not, however, be considered as forming a part of the Rodent order, whereof all the families and genera are provided with strong incisor teeth, like rats and squirrels, and therefore intended for subsisting chiefly on grain and nuts; they are on the contrary supplied with a great number of small teeth, to the extent of twenty-two in each jaw—indicating a partial regimen; for they feed on worms, larvæ, and underground insects, as well as on roots, and thus belongs to the insectivorous order; which brings the application of the name somewhat nearer to carnivora and its received interpretation 'weasel.'

C. H. S.

MOLECH (mō'lek), (Heb. מלך, ha-mō'lek, the ruler), always with the article, except in 1 Kings xi:7.

Molech is chiefly found in the Old Testament as the national god of the Ammonites, to whom children were sacrificed by fire. There is some difficulty in ascertaining at what period the Israelites became acquainted with this idolatry; yet three reasons render it probable that it was before the time of Solomon, the date usually assigned for its introduction. Nevertheless, it is for the first time directly stated that Solomon erected a high-place for Molech on the Mount of Olives (1 Kings xi:7); and from that period his worship continued uninterrupted there, or in Tophet, in the valley of Hinnom, until Josiah defiled both places (2 Kings xxiii:10, 13). Jehoahaz, however, the son and successor of Josiah, again 'did what was evil in the sight of Jehovah, according to all that his fathers had done' (2 Kings xxiii:32). The same broad condemnation is made against the succeeding kings, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah; and Ezekiel, writing during the captivity, says, 'Do you, by offering your gifts, and by making your sons pass through the fire, pollute yourselves with all your idols until this day, and shall I be enquired of by you?' (xx:31). After the restoration all traces of this idolatry disappear.

It has been attempted to explain the terms in which the act of sacrificing children is described in the Old Testament so as to make them mean a mere passing between two fires, without any risk of life, for the purpose of purification. This theory—which owes its origin to a desire in some Hebrew writers to lessen the mass of evidence which their own history offers of the perverse idolatries of the Jews—is effectually declared untenable by such passages as Ps. cvi:38; Jer. vii:31; Ezek. xvi:20; xxiii:37; the last two of which may also be adduced to show that the victims were slaughtered before they were burnt.

The Rabbins tell us that the idol was made of brass and placed on a brazen throne, and that the head was that of a calf with a crown upon it. The throne and image were made hollow, and a furious fire was kindled within it. The flames penetrated into the body and limbs of the idol; and when the arms were red-hot, the victim was thrown into them, and was almost immediately burned to death, while its cries were drowned by drums.

MOLID (mō'lid), (Heb. מוליד, mo-lead', begetter), a man of Judah, son of Abishur and Abihail (1 Chron ii:29), B. C. after 1612.

MOLOCH (mō'lök), (Amos v:26; Acts vii:43). See MOLECH.

MOLTEN IMAGE (mōl't'n ÿm'áj). See CALF; IMAGE.

MOLTEN SEA (mōl't'n sē). See LAVER.

MOMENT (mō'ment), (Heb. רגע, reh'gah, wink, Num. xvi:21, 45; Job xx:5; Ps. xxx:5, etc.; Gr. άτομος, at'om-os, indivisible, 1 Cor. xv:52; παραβήτω, par-ar'hrōo-el'ō, to flow by, 2 Cor. iv:17; στιγμή, stig-may', a point, Luke iv:5), an instant, the smallest interval of time.

MONEY (mūn'ÿ), (Heb. כסף, keh-sef', silver).

This term is used to denote whatever commodity the inhabitants of any country may have agreed, or are compelled to receive as an equivalent for their labor and in exchange for other commodities. Etymologists differ respecting its derivation. Bouteroue contends that it is derived from monere, because the stamp impressed on the coin indicates its weight and fineness (Recherches sur les Monnoyes de France); and Suidas (s. v. Μονήτρα), that it originated in the circumstance of silver having been first coined at Rome in the temple of Juno Moneta.

(1) Various Commodities. Different commodities have been used as money in the primitive state of society in all countries. Those nations which subsist by the chase, such as the ancient Russians and the greater part of the North American Indians, use the skins of the animals killed in hunting as money (Storch, Traité d'Économie Politique, tome i). In a pastoral state of society cattle are chiefly used as money. Thus, according to Homer, the armor of Diomedes cost nine oxen, and that of Glaucus one hundred (Iliad, vi:235). The etymology of the Latin word pecunia, signifying money, and all of its derivatives, affords sufficient evidence that cattle (pecus) were the first money of the Romans. They were also used as money by the Germans, whose laws fix the amount of penalties for particular offenses to be paid in cattle (Storch, l. c.). In agricultural countries corn would be used in remote ages as money, and even at the present day it is not unusual to stipulate for corn rents and wages. Various commodities have been and are still used in different countries. Smith mentions salt as the common money of Abyssinia (Wealth of Nations, i:4). A species of cypræa called the cow-ree, gathered on the shores of the Maldivé Islands, and of which 6,400 constitute a rupee, is used in making small payments throughout India, and is the only money of certain districts in Africa. Dried fish forms the money of Iceland and Newfoundland; sugar of some of the West India Islands; and among the first settlers of America corn and tobacco were used as money (Holmes' American Annals). Smith mentions that, at the time of the publication of the Wealth of Nations, there was a village in Scotland where it was customary for a workman to carry nails as money to the baker's shop or the alehouse (i:4).

(2) Commerce. A long period of time must have intervened between the first introduction of the precious metals into commerce, and their becoming generally used as money. The peculiar qualities which so eminently fit them for this purpose would only be gradually discovered. They would probably be first introduced in their gross and unpurified state. A sheep, an ox, a certain quantity of corn, or any other article, would afterwards be bartered or exchanged for pieces of gold or silver in bars or ingots, in the same way as they would formerly have been exchanged for iron, copper, cloth, or anything else.

Weighing Money.

(3) Values Estimated by Weight. The merchants would soon begin to estimate their proper value, and, in effecting exchanges, would first agree upon the quality of the metal to be given, and then the quantity which its possessor had become bound to pay would be ascertained by weight. This, according to Aristotle and Pliny, was the manner in which the precious metals were originally exchanged in Greece and Italy. The same practice is still observed in different countries. In many parts of China and Abyssinia the value of gold and silver is always ascertained by weight (Gouget, De l'Origine des Loix, etc.). Iron was the first money of the Lacedæmonians, and copper of the Romans.

In the sacred writings there is frequent mention of gold, silver, and brass, sums of money, purchases made with money, current money, and money of a certain weight. Indeed, the money of Scripture is all estimated by weight. 'Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant' (Gen. xxiii:16). The brethren of Joseph carried back into Egypt the money 'in full weight' which they had found in their sacks (Gen. xliii:21). The golden earring presented by Abraham's steward to Rebekah weighed half a shekel, and the two bracelets for her hands were ten shekels weight of gold' (Gen. xxiv:22). In paying for the field of Hanameel, Jeremiah 'weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver' (Jer. xxxii:9). Amos represents the merchants of Israel as 'falsifying the balances by deceit' (viii:5). The shekel and the talent do not appear to have been originally fixed and stamped pieces of money, but simply weights used in traffic. Hence, 'thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small' (Deut. xxv:13). It was customary for the Jews to have scales attached to their girdles for weighing the gold and silver they received; but the Canaanites carried them in their hands.

(4) Pieces of Money. There is no direct allusion in the sacred writings to coined money as belonging to the Jewish nation. In Gen. xxxiii:19 Jacob is said to have bought a part of a field 'for an hundred pieces of money,' and the friends of Job are said to have given him each 'a piece of money' (Job xlii:11). The term in the original is kesitoh, and is by some thought to denote 'sheep' or 'lamb;' by others a kind of money having the impression of a sheep or lamb; and by others again a purse of money. The most correct translation may be presumed to be that which favors the idea of a piece of money bearing some stamp or mark indicating that it was of the value of a sheep or lamb. The name shekel, first used to indicate a weight, might afterwards be applied to a piece of money. According to Arbuthnot 3,000 of these shekels were equal to a talent. Some allegorical device would naturally suggest itself as the most appropriate for being impressed upon pieces of gold or silver of a given weight and fineness; and as in the patriarchal ages property consisted chiefly of flocks and herds, no better emblem could be used than that of a lamb, with which it is imagined the pieces of money alluded to may have been impressed.

(5) Early Coins. Maurice, in his Antiquities of India (vol. vii), bears testimony to the fact that the earliest coins were stamped with the figure of an ox or sheep. In the British Museum there is a specimen of the original Roman As, the surface of which is nearly the size of a brick, with the figure of a bull impressed upon it. Other devices would suggest themselves to different nations as arising out of, or connected with, particular places or circumstances, as the Babylonish lion, Ægina's tortoise, Bœotia's shield, the lyre of Mytilene, the wheat of Metapontum. On some of the reverses of the Roman large brass may be deciphered, 'Valor standing full armed; Honor robed and chapleted; Happiness crowned with obliscent poppies; Concord with extended hand, and the horn of plenty in her bosom; Hope tripping lightly, and smiling on a flower-bud; Peace offering the olive branch; Fortune resting on a rudder; Military Faith stretching forth his consecrated standard; Abundance emptying her cornucopia; Security leaning on a column; Modesty veiled and sitting; Piety taking her gift to the altar; Fruitfulness in the midst of her nurse-lings; Equity adjusting her scales; Victory with wings and coronal and trumpet; Eternity holding the globe and risen phoenix; or better, seated on a starry sphere; Liberty with cap and staff; National Prosperity sailing as a good ship before the favoring gale; and Public Faith with joined hands clasping between them the palms of success, and the caduceus of health' (Quarterly Review, vol. lxxii, p. 358). Religion would also at an early period claim to be distinguished, and accordingly the effigies of Juno, Diana, Ceres, Jove, Hercules, Apollo, Bacchus, Pluto, Neptune, and many other of the heathen deities are found impressed upon the early coins. The Jews, however, were the worshippers of the one only true God; idolatry was strictly forbidden in their law; and therefore their shekel never bore a head, but was impressed simply with the almond rod and the pot of manna.

(6) Roman Coinage. The first Roman coinage took place, according to Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxiii:3), in the reign of Servius Tullius, about 550 years before Christ; but it was not until Alexander of Macedon had subdued the Persian monarchy, and Julius Cæsar had consolidated the Roman empire, that the image of a living ruler was permitted to be stamped upon the coins. Previous to that period heroes and deities alone gave currency to the money of imperial Rome.

Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, is represented to have granted to Simon Maccabæus the privilege of coining money in Judæa (1 Macc. xv:6). This is considered to be the first mention of Hebrew money, properly so called. It consisted of shekels and demi-shekels, the third part of a shekel, and the quarter of a shekel, of silver.

From the time of Julius Cæsar, who first struck a living portrait on his coins, the Roman coins run in a continued succession of so-called Cæsars, their queens and crown-princes, from about B. C. 48 down to Romulus Augustulus, emperor of the West, who was dethroned by Odoacer about A. D. 475 (Quarterly Review, ut supra).

After its subjugation by Rome much foreign money found its way into the land of Judæa. The piece of tribute money, or coin mentioned in Luke xx:24, as presented to our Savior, bore the image and superscription of the Roman emperor, and it is reasonable to suppose that a large quantity of Roman coins was at that time in circulation throughout Judæa. MONEY CHANGER (mũn'ÿ chãn'jēr), Gr. κολλυβιστής, kol-loo-bis-tace', dealer in coin; κερματιστής, ker-mat-is-tace', money broker, from κέρμα, ker'mah, a small coin.

It is mentioned by Volney that in Syria, Egypt and Turkey, when any considerable payments are to be made, an agent of exchange is sent for, who counts paras by thousands, rejects pieces of false money, and weigh all the sequins either separately or together. It has hence been suggested that the 'current money with the merchant,' mentioned in Scripture (Gen. xxiii:16), might have been such as was approved of by competent judges whose business it was to detect fraudulent money if offered in payment. The Hebrew word socher signifies one who goes about from place to place, and is supposed to answer to the native exchange-agent or money-broker of the East, now called shroff. It appears that there were bankers or money-changers in Judæa, who made a trade of receiving money in deposit and paying interest for it (Matt. xxv:27). Some of them had even established themselves within the precincts of the temple at Jerusalem (xxi:12), where they were in the practice of exchanging one species of money for another. Persons who came from a distance to worship at Jerusalem would naturally bring with them the money current in their respective districts, and it might therefore be a matter of convenience for them to get this money exchanged at the door of the temple for that which was current in Jerusalem, and upon their departure to receive again that species of money which circulated in the districts to which they were journeying. These money-changers would, of course, charge a commission upon all their transactions but from the observation of our Savior, when he overthrew the tables of those in the temple, it may be inferred that they were not distinguished for honesty and fair dealing: 'It is written, my house shall be called the house of prayer, but, ye have made it a den of thieves' (verse 13). MONOTHEISM (mõn'ò-thē-'iz'm).

(1) The worship of the one God was a primeval principle beginning with the very dawn of human history. As surely as God was first, so surely must the pure worship have preceded the various forms of idolatry. It was man's recognition of a higher Power when dominion was given "over all the earth." But man sinned and went away from God; it was disobedience first, and then murder. Polygamy came next and polytheism was not far behind the other transgressions. There is no instance in the world's history where monotheism has been evolved from polytheism or idol worship. Dr. Frank B. Jevons says: "Indeed, if we base ourselves upon evolutionary principles, we may safely say that whatever may have been the genesis and history of monotheism, one thing is certain, namely, that it cannot have been developed out of polytheism" (Introduction to the History of Religion, p. 387).

The further we go back among the earliest mythologies, the nearer we come to the primitive principle. When the Hindus first come within the range of history their devotions are paid to earth and air and sea, the sun is praised, and the rain implored; their gods are few in number. In the early Vedic age there were only seven prominent deities, but polytheism rapidly developed upon the soil of India until her pantheon contained millions of gods.

(2) The more modern polytheism of Rome or even of ancient Greece need hardly be examined, but in Egypt there was at first only one Horus. In later periods, however, this one deity had developed into twelve, each one representing a different conception, but all of them having been evolved from the first. Dr. Wiedmann gives the names of twelve or more different Horuses who were worshipped in different localities, and sometimes several of them were adored in the same temple.

Many eminent Egyptologists, including Mariette, Brugsch, and Renouf, claim that the earliest monuments show the primitive religion of the Nile valley to have been monotheism. It is claimed that when the Egyptians moved into the Nile a thousand years before Menes, they had only one God, and that was Nu. Surely this name is very nearly akin to Ann, who is described upon the tablets as the supreme God of ancient Accad.

Maspero and others take exceptions to the monotheistic theory, but all Egyptologists agree that there are comparatively few divinities mentioned in the beginning of monumental history, and that the number steadily increases, until during the Roman era they became almost numberless. All agree that in the earliest forms of worship among the Egyptians there are no such traces of superstition as in the later eras.

Maspero writes as follows: "Ancient tradition affirms that the earliest Egyptian temples contained neither images nor inscriptions, and, in point of fact, the temple of the Sphinx is bare" (Maspero, Archæology, p. 86).

Up to this time the temple of the Sphinx was the only one of that earliest time which had been uncovered, but at Medum, in 1891, Dr. Petrie dug up a temple which was even more ancient, and it is a very suggestive fact that in this early sanctuary, so simple and massive in its construction, "no sign of an idol, or statue, or magical text, was discovered." (Petrie, Medum, London, 1892.) It is also true that the earliest writings of the Egyptians, as "The Precepts of Phath Hotep," are much higher in moral tone than the mass of their later productions.

That the people of Egypt were at one time worshippers of the true God is evident from the prophecy of Isaiah. He says: "And the Lord shall smite Egypt and heal it, and they shall return even to the Lord, and he shall heal them" (Is. xix:22). The Hebrew word which is here rendered "return" is translated by the word return, or its equivalents, 815 times in the Old Testament, so there is no room for philological dispute on this important point.

In the valley of the Euphrates the same rule obtains in relation to the multiplication of deities.

(3) It is thought that the worship of Hea, "the god who determines destinies," is a corruption of the worship of the God of Abraham, for Ea is another form of El, and the followers of Ea were evidently monotheists. In relation to monotheism in the valley of the Euphrates, Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, the eminent archæologist, who is a native of Assyria, claims that the early Assyrians were worshippers of the true God, and he bases his claim largely upon his own discoveries. (Trans. Vic. Inst., vol. xiii, pp. 190, 214; also vol. xxv, p. 121.)

This early worship, however, as in the case of the Egyptians, was soon corrupted, and at length the Assyrians counted no less than 300 spirits of heaven and 600 of earth.

These examples among the oldest systems of polytheism show how "development" is related to this subject.

(4) In the American Journal of Theology G. M. Grant calls attention to the valued work by Dr. Jevons, above cited, and says: "Totemism, that is, the belief which identified with the divine a species of animals or plants which was regarded as the ancestor of the tribe, is the earliest form of religion known to science. It may be added that the worship originally accorded to the whole species was, after a time, appropriated to one individual of the species. As to this faith, while no authority now accepts Mr. Spencer's theory that it originated in the worship of ancestors, it is admitted that the religious belief in the pre-totemistic stage is entirely a matter of conjecture."

(5) Dr. Jevons, however, argues with great ability that pre-totemism must have been a simple monotheism. He takes issue with those who maintain that, as monotheism is the highest form of belief, it must have developed from the lower forms of totemism and polytheism through intermediate stages.

He strongly insists that the highest must have been implicit in consciousness from the beginning, and also that evolution and progress are two very different things; that evolution is constant but progress very rare. Indeed, "evolution may well be, from a religious point of view, one long process of degeneration." Progress is certainly as exceptional in religion as in other things, and where it takes place it must be due to exceptional causes. "If evolution takes place, something must be evolved; and that something, as being continuously present in all the different stages, may be called the continuum of religion."

(6) Again he says. "We must remember that the facts of consciousness were the same for early as for civilized man, but they were not yet discriminated. They swam before man's untrained eye, and ran into one another. But, even so, all was not untrained chaos for man. In the outer world of his experience the laws of nature, which are God's laws, worked with the same regularity then as now. In the world of his inner experience, God was not far from him at any time. If his spiritual vision was dim, his consciousness of God was at least so strong, to start with, that he has never since ceased seeking after Him. The law of continuity holds of religions as of other things."

(7) Dr. Jevons argues that polytheism was developed, not from monotheism, but from totemism. When man realized that the union of the human with the divine had been broken, it was felt that some outward act was needed which would re-establish the connection, and totem animals were offered in sacrifice. The totem being supposed to share the common life of both parties, and to be capable of exercising an influence over both, and the blood covenant being the only means known of effecting a union with any one external to the tribe, the sacrifice of the totem and the common sacramental meal were originated. The universality of the practice is the most conclusive testimony of the ineradicable craving of man's heart for union and communion with God, and to the consciousness that on such union alone can right relations with our fellows be based. Dr. Jevons says: "The whole human race for thousands of years has been educated to the conception that it was only through a divine sacrifice that perfect union with God was possible for man. At times the sacramental conception of sacrifice appeared to be about to degenerate entirely into the gift theory; but then, in the sixth century before Christ, the sacramental conception woke into new life, this time in the form of a search for a perfect sacrifice—a search which led Clement and Cyprian to try all the mysteries of Greece in vain. But of all the great religions of the world, it is the Christian church alone which is so far heir of all the ages as to fulfill the dumb, dim expectation of mankind; in it alone the sacramental meal commemorates by ordinance of its founder the divine sacrifice which is a propitiation for the sins of all mankind."

(8) Dr. Jevons' argument against the derivation of monotheism from polytheism is very forcible, and even those who dissent from it are forced to acknowledge that Jewish monotheism was due to a peculiar cause, whether that cause be called a special revelation or greater power of insight on the part of the prophets of Israel.

Among this people there was no real development of polytheism, although there were transgressions of God's law by their falling into the customs of the heathen around them; we find evidence of the occasional worship of the powers of nature side by side with the spiritual faith of their fathers. This was Syncretism, or the attempted union of such opposite forces as the worship of God and Baal. Faith in Jehovah as the God of Israel was pure monotheism, and it was connected with that perfect conception of God which was afterwards revealed in the Christ.

Dr. Jevons says: "The monotheism of the Jews is a unique and solitary phenomenon in the history of religion. Nowhere else in the world has the development of religion culminated in monotheism" (p. 388).

"The tendencies which have been supposed in polytheism to make for monotheism have always been purely pantheistic; speculative rather than practical, metaphysical rather than religious; and as being metaphysical speculations have always been confined to the cultured few, and have never even leavened the polytheism of the masses" (p. 389).

"Pantheism is the philosophical complement of first extending until the Babylonian captivity; the second until one or two centuries after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; and the third from the adoption of the calendar of Rabbi Hillel the younger (i. e. from about the middle of the fourth century of our era) until the present time.

(1) First Period. In the first period the months are, as a rule, mentioned by their numerical designation only—as 'the first month,' 'the second,' etc. We have no explicit indication of the number of days in a month, nor of the number of months in a year; the 27th day and the 11th month being respectively the highest mentioned (Gen. viii:14; Deut. i:3); unless 1 Kings iv:7 be considered to prove that the year had 12 months. Nevertheless, the two Hebrew terms for month—literally new moon, thence month, from a root signifying to be new; and moon, and thence month—afford some proof that the months were measured by the moon (comp. Ps. civ:9).

(2) Second Period. In the second period we find, in part, a continuation of the previous method, with somewhat more definite statements (for instance, 1 Chron. xxvii clearly proves that the year had twelve months), and, in part, the adoption of new names for the months; but the co-existence of both these systems is not easily explained. For, whereas Zechariah, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, introduce the seven new names—Shebat, Chisleu, Adar, Nisan, Elul, Tebeth, and Sivan—all the other canonical books written after the restoration do nothing more than enumerate the months, without any name, in the order of their succession. Although only the above-mentioned seven names occur in the Old Testament, yet there is no manner of doubt that the Jews at the same time adopted the entire twelve names, of which the following is a table:

Civil.	Sacred.	Beginning with the New Moon.
VII.....	I. Nisan, or Abib.....	March, or April. Neh. ii:1.
VIII.....	II. Zif, or Ziv.....	April, or May. 1 Kings vi:1.
IX.....	III. Sivan.....	May, or June. Esth. viii:9.
X.....	IV. Tammuz.....	June, or July.
XI.....	V. Ab.....	July, or August.
XII.....	VI. Elul.....	August, or September. Neh. vi:15.
I.....	VII. Tishri, or Ethanim.....	September, or October. 1 Kings viii:2.
II.....	VIII. Bul.....	October, or November. 1 Kings vi:38.
III.....	IX. Kisleu or Chisleu.....	November, or December. Neh. i:1.
IV.....	X. Tebeth.....	December, or January. Esth. ii:16.
V.....	XI. Shebat.....	January, or February. Zech. i:7.
VI.....	XII. Adar.....	February, or March. Esth. iii:7.

a pantheon; but the spirit which produced the monotheism of the Jews must have been something very different" (p. 390).

Those who claim that monotheism did generally develop from polytheism will be obliged to reckon with the arguments and with the stubborn facts which are presented by Dr. Jevons and other competent scholars. (See An Introduction to the History of Religion, by Frank Byron Jevons, M. A., Litt. D., London, Methuen & Co., 1897; see, also, The Am. Jour. of Theol., p. 1,002, sq.) (See SEMITIC RELIGION.)

MONSTERS (mön'stërs), (Heb. תַּנִּינִים, tan-neen', stretched out), perhaps the sea serpent or other formidable sea animal. Others suppose it to be the jackal from its running with outstretched neck and body (Lam. iv:3, R. V. "jaekal.")

MONTH (münth), (Heb. חֹדֶשׁ, khô'desh, the new moon).

It is expedient to distinguish three periods in the Jewish mode of denoting dates by months; the

In the same manner as the Old Testament contains no indication of the mode of intercalation, when yet it is certain that some mode must have been used, so also it does not mention by what method the commencement and conclusion of every month were ascertained in either of these periods. According to the Talmud, however, it is certain that, in the second period, the commencement of the month was dated from the time when the earliest visible appearance of the new moon was announced to the Sanhedrim, that, if this happened on the 30th day of the current month, that month was considered to have ended on the preceding 29th day, and was called deficient; but, if no announcement was made on the 30th day, that day was reckoned to the current month, which was in that case called full, and the ensuing day was at once considered to be the first of the next month. Further, as the cloudy state of the weather sometimes hindered the actual sight of the new moon, it was an established rule that no year should contain less than four, and more than eight, full months. It is generally assumed, although without express warrant, that the commencement of the month was determined in the same way in the first period; but it is very probable, and the Mosaic festivals of the new moon seem to be some evidence for it.

(3) Third Period. With regard to the third period, it is not necessary to say more here than that, as the dispersion of the Jews rendered it impossible to communicate the intelligence of the visible appearance of the new moon, they were obliged to devise a systematic calculation of the duration of their months; but that they retained the above-mentioned names for the months, which are still lunar months, of the mean duration of 29 days, 12 hours, 44 seconds; and that when they were no longer able to regulate the epochs of their festivals by the agricultural year of Palestine, they came, for some such reasons as those assigned by Michaelis, to place every month earlier by one lunation than it had been in the first two periods, so that their Nisan now most nearly coincided with March. The rabbinical writers, therefore, who maintained that the ancient Nisan likewise began with the new moon of March, were mainly led into that opinion by the practice existing in their own time. (See YEAR.) J. N.

MONUMENTS (mōn'ū-ments), (Heb. מִצְבֵּי, so'bek, copse), the incorrect translation in Is. lxxv:4, for "secret places," as in the R. V.

In general, they denote anything that brings the past to remembrance. The monuments among which idolaters lodged were either tombs or idol temples, by sleeping in which they hoped to have fellowship with the idol or the departed spirit in dreams and visions (Is. lxxv:4).

MOON (mōōn), (Heb. יָרֵחַ, yaw-ray'akh, paleness; לֵב-אָו-נָאוּ, leb-aw-naw', used figuratively in Is. xxiv:23; xxx:26; Gr. σελήνη, sel-ay'nay).

The worship of the heavenly bodies was among the earliest corruptions of religion, which would naturally take its rise in the eastern parts of the world, where the atmosphere is pure and transparent, and the heavens as bright as they are glowing. In these countries the moon is of exceeding beauty. If the sun 'rules the day,' the moon has the throne of night, which, if less gorgeous than that of the sun, is more attractive, because of a less oppressively brilliant light, while her retinue of surrounding stars seems to give a sort of truth to her regal state, and certainly adds not inconsiderably to her beauty.

(1) Early Worship. The moon was therefore worshiped as a goddess in the East at a very early period; in India under the name of Maja; among the Assyrians as Mylitta; with the Phœnicians she was termed Astarte or Ashteroth, who was also denominated the Syrian mother. The Greeks and Romans worshiped her as Artemis and Diana. Job (xxxi:26) alludes to the power of the moon over the human soul: 'If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand; this also were an iniquity, for I should have denied the God that is above.'

The moon, as being mistress of the night, may well have been considered as the lesser of the two great lights of heaven (Gen. i:16). It was accordingly regarded in the old Syrian superstition as subject to the sun's influence, which was worshiped as the active and generative power of nature, while the moon was revered as the passive and producing power. The moon, accordingly, was looked upon as feminine. Herein Oriental usage agrees with our own. But this usage was by no means universal.

(2) Egyptian Conception. The Egyptians represented their moon as a male deity, Ihoth; and Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt. v:5) remarks that 'the same custom of calling it male is retained in the East to the present day, while the sun is considered feminine, as in the language of the Germans. Ihoth, in the character of Lunus, the moon, has sometimes a man's face, with the crescent of the moon upon his head supporting a disk. Plutarch says the Egyptians 'call the moon the mother of the world, and hold it to be of both sexes; female, as it receives the influence of the sun; male, as it scatters and disperses through the air the principles of fecundity.' In other countries also the moon was held to be hermaphrodite. Another pair of dissimilar qualities was ascribed to the moon—the destructive and the generative faculty—whence it was worshiped as a bad as well as a good power.

(3) Queen of Heaven. The epithet 'queen of heaven' (Horace, siderum regina) appears to have been very common. Nor was it, any more than the worship of the moon, unknown to the Jews, as may be seen in a remarkable passage in Jeremiah (xlv:17), where the Israelites (men and women, the latter exert most influence) appear given over to this species of idolatry: 'We will certainly burn incense to the queen of heaven, and pour out drink-offerings unto her, as we have done, we and our fathers; for then had we plenty of victuals, and we were well, and saw no evil. But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, we have wanted all things.' The last verse of the passage adds to the burnt-offerings and drink-offerings, 'cakes to worship her.' Vows were also made by the Jews to the moon, which superstition required to be fulfilled (verse 25).

(4) Baneful Influence. The baneful influence of the moon still finds credence in the East. Moonlight is held to be detrimental to the eyes. In Ps. cxxi:6 we read, 'The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night;' so that the impression that the moon may do injury to man is neither partial nor vague. Rosenmüller (Morgenland. iv, 108) refers this to the cold of night, which, he says, is very great and sensible in the East, owing, partly, to the great heat of the day. If this extreme (comparative cold is considered in connection with the Oriental custom of sleeping sub divo, out of doors, a la belle étoile, on the flat roofs of houses, or even on the ground, without in all cases sufficient precautionary measures for protecting the frame, we see no difficulty in understanding whence arose the evil influence ascribed to the moon.

On the influence of the moon on man, see Hayn, De Planetar. in Corp. hum. influxu; and Kretschmar, De Astror. in Corp. hum. Imperio, Jena, 1820; also Carne, Leb. und Sitten im Morgenl. i, 73. J. R. B.

Figurative. In the figurative language of Scripture the moon is frequently noticed as pre-saging events of the greatest importance through the temporary or permanent withdrawal of its light (Is. xlii:10; Joel ii:31; Matt. xxiv:29; Mark xiii:24. The church is likened to the moon; how comely, useful, and illuminating to the world in the dark night of time! how only illuminated by Jesus the Sun of righteousness shining on her! and how changing her militant state and condition! (Cant. vi:10; Is. lx:20). It is symbolical of coming judgments, becoming as blood (Rev. vi:12). In the passage, "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars" (Rev. xii:1), the meaning appears to be that she is clothed with light from head to feet. The whole then becomes the figure of the Church illuminated with the truth and glory of God.

MOON, NEW (mōōn nū). See FESTIVALS.

MOR (mōr), (Heb. מֹר, mōr, distilling), sometimes written Mur, is the well-known substance MYRRH.

(1) It is the exudation of a little known tree found in Arabia, but much more extensively in Abyssinia. It formed an article of the earliest commerce, was highly esteemed by the Egyptians and Jews, as well as by the Greeks and Romans, as it still is both in the East and in Europe. The earliest notice of it occurs in Exod. xxx:23, 'Take thou also unto thee principal spices, of pure myrrh (morderor) 500 shekels.' It is afterwards mentioned in Esther ii:12, as employed in the purification of women; in Ps. xlv:8, as a perfume, 'All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia;' also in several passages of the Song of Solomon, 'I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense' iv:6; 'My hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet smelling myrrh' v:5). We find it mentioned in Matt. ii:11, among the gifts presented by the wise men of the East to the infant Jesus—'gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.' It may be remarked as worthy of notice, that myrrh and frankincense are frequently mentioned together. In Mark xv:23, we learn that the Roman soldiers 'gave him (Jesus) to drink wine mingled with myrrh; but he received it not.' The Apostle John (xix:39) says, 'Then came also Nicodemus, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes (see AHALIM), about an hundred pound weight,' for the purpose of embalming the body of our Savior.

(2) Though myrrh seems to have been known from the earliest times, and must consequently have been one of the most ancient articles of commerce, the country producing it long remained unknown. It is collected in small kid-skins, and taken to Errur, whence the Hurrah merchants, on their way from Shoa, convey it to the great annual market at Berberah from whence great quantities are shipped for India and Arabia.' When the Portuguese first entered these seas, gold dust, ivory, myrrh, and slaves formed the staple commerce of Adal. Though there is no doubt that the largest quantity of myrrh has always been obtained from Africa, yet it is equally certain that some is also procured in Arabia. Mr. Johnson, in his recently published Travels in Abyssinia (i. 249), mentions that 'Myrrh and mimosa trees abounded in this place' (Koranhedudah in Adal). The former he describes as being a low, thorny, ragged-looking tree, with bright-green trifoliate leaves; the gum exudes from cracks in the bark of the trunk near the root, and flows freely upon the stones immediately underneath. Artificially it is obtained by bruises made with stones. The natives collect it principally in the hot months of July and August, but it is to be found, though in very small quantities, at other times of the year.

(3) Several kinds of myrrh were known to the ancients, and in modern commerce we have Turkish and East Indian myrrh, and different names used to be, and are still applied to it, as red and fatty myrrh, myrrh in tears, in sorts, and myrrh in grains. In the Bible also several kinds of myrrh are enumerated, respecting which various opinions have been entertained.

(4) Myrrh, it is well known, was celebrated in the most ancient times as a perfume, and a fumigant, as well as for its uses in medicine. Myrrh was burned in their temples, and employed in embalming the bodies of the dead. It was offered in presents, as natural products commonly were in those days, because such as were procured from distant countries were very rare. The ancients prepared a wine of myrrh, and also an oil of myrrh, and it formed an ingredient in many of the most celebrated compound medicines, as the Theriaca, the Mithridata, Manus Dei, etc. Even in Europe it continued to recent times to enjoy the highest medicinal reputation, as it does in the East in the present day. From the sensible properties of this drug, and from the virtues which were ascribed to it, we may satisfactorily account for the mention of it in the several passages of Scripture which have been quoted. (See MYRRH.)

MORASTHITE (mō'ras-tithe), (Heb. מֹרֶשֶׁת, mō rash-tee'), an inhabitant of Moresheth-Gath (Jer. xxvi:18; Mic. i:1).

MORAVIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

(1) Founding and Characteristics. This church was known as the United Brethren before the term Moravian Church came into vogue. The latter appellation is derived from the land in which the church in question was formerly the chief representative of the evangelical faith, and from which refugees came to Saxony in 1722, to accomplish its resuscitation after it had been almost extirpated by persecution. Evangelical loyalty to the essentials of the Christian faith, combined with an unwillingness to bind men's consciences to the exact phraseology of a humanly constructed creed in reference to mysteries of the truth, and an exaltation of the value of devout Christian life above professed adherence to symbols apprehended by the intellect, have been characteristic of the Moravian Church from the first, and, since 1732, it has realized that its special calling is to carry the gospel to the neglected heathen, whilst in home lands its members fraternize with all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity.

In accordance with these characteristics and purposes the Moravian Church has consistently shunned every effort at proselytism in Christian lands, though it has freely expended men and means to foster vital religion within state churches in Europe, without seeking to withdraw members from fellowship in those churches.

Founded by spiritual descendants of John Hus in Bohemia in 1457, the Moravian Church was almost extirpated in consequence of the Thirty Years' War, although it had previously spread widely throughout Bohemia, Moravia, Poland and Prussia.

Provisionally resuscitated in Saxony during the years from 1722 to 1727 by refugees who were harbored on the estates of Count Zinzendorf, himself destined to become identified with it as a future bishop, its attention was turned to America by two causes. Persecutions at home suggested the wisdom of securing an asylum where religious liberty might be enjoyed; the possibility of inaugurating missions amongst the Indians and the negro slaves became a call of duty. "From the trustees of Georgia Count Zinzendorf obtained a grant of 500 acres of land on the Ogeechee River, and Spangenberg another of fifty acres, forming part of the present site of Savannah. In the spring of 1735, the latter began a settlement, on his tract, with a number of Moravians." (Moravian Manual, pp. 38, 39.) This settlement proved a failure, largely owing to the war between England and Spain. The remnant of the Moravian colonists in Georgia, in 1740, came to Philadelphia as passengers in George Whitefield's sloop. "At the invitation of Whitefield they proceeded in May to the Forks of the Delaware, the present Northampton County, where he had purchased a domain of 5,000 acres, embracing what is now Upper Nazareth Township, and began to build a large house destined to be a school for negro children. Ere long, however, doctrinal differences, fostered by the inhabitants of the Scotch-Irish settlements, produced an open rupture between the Moravians and Whitefield, who ordered them to leave his land forthwith. In this extremity Bishop Nitschmann came from Europe commissioned to begin a settlement in Pennsylvania. Ten miles to the south of Whitefield's domain, he purchased an extensive tract, on the Lehigh River." (Moravian Manual, p. 40.) The settlement founded here was named Bethlehem. "It was originally intended as a center for the Indian Mission"—began in 1740 at Shekomoko near the Stissik Mountains, between New York and Connecticut. "But other immigrants having arrived from Germany, a church settlement was organized, June 25, 1742, strictly on the plan of those established by Zinzendorf in his native land, with all their appliances of exclusivism." (Moravian Manual, p. 40.) In addition to maintaining an Indian mission, which spread in New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and later in Ohio, an extensive itineracy was undertaken amongst white settlers—Germans, Swedes and English, as well as amongst the negro slaves; but no effort was made to extend the Moravian Church as such amongst those who had not been identified with it in Europe. Rather were applicants for admission to fellowship discouraged, it being the aim of the Moravian evangelists to promote vital Christianity and not to build up a sect. Just here the Moravians failed to recognize the difference between the religious characteristics of this land free from the trammels of a state church and their old conditions of operation in Europe; and this feature largely accounts for the numerical weakness of the Moravian Church in America to-day. Between the years 1742 and 1748 the Moravians in Pennsylvania devoted themselves, aside from their mission amongst the Indians, to an effort to bring about an organic union amongst the German-speaking Christians of the colony, no German denomination having as yet effected actual organization. But this laudable effort failed.

(2) Denominational Form. Accordingly, the Moravian Church in America was compelled to recognize the leadings of Providence and assume definite denominational form. Its leaders chose to bring the groups of affiliated persons in seven of the original thirteen states into as close an affinity as possible with the German congregations of the church in Europe, and to model their life after the pattern of the exclusive settlements of the Unity there, so as to constitute the Moravian villages spiritual retreats cut off from the rest of the world, where pious souls might cultivate their own Christian life and be mutually helpful in promoting growth in grace. In 1753 a tract was purchased in North Carolina, and here, too, the life in Pennsylvania was duplicated, the chief centers now being Bethlehem, Nazareth and Lititz in Pennsylvania, and after 1766 Salem in North Carolina.

(3) Moravian Villages. The following were the characteristics of the Moravian villages: "None but members were allowed to hold real estate, although others might lease houses. In each settlement there was a public inn and one or more mercantile establishments or trades, belonging to the church, the profits of which went towards its support. This arrangement did not exclude private enterprise and trades, of which there were many. The settlements were governed by a council called the "Board of Overseers," elected by the adult male members of the church. At the head of a council stood a Deacon, who bore the title of 'Warden,' and was its executive officer. On business of importance a general meeting of the adult male members was convened. The purpose of this exclusive system was to keep out of the congregation, as much as possible, the follies and sins of the world, and to promote sober, righteous and holy living. By the blessing of God this was accomplished in a great degree. The peculiar institutions belonging to a settlement were the Brethren's, Sisters' and Widows' Houses. In a Brethren's House unmarried men lived together, and carried on various trades and professions, the profits of which were applied to the support of the establishment and of the church in general. A Sisters' House was inhabited by unmarried women who engaged in different kinds of work. In each house there was a common refectory, dormitory and prayer-hall. Daily religious services were held. There was nothing monastic in the principles underlying these establishments, or in the regulations by which they were governed. The inmates were almost invariably such as had no other homes, and stayed in them at their own option, gaining an honest and decent livelihood, and enjoying the advantage of regular religious instructions. In many instances they were training schools for missionaries. A Widows' House was a home for indigent or other widows, supplying the inmates with all the comforts which they needed at moderate charges, and enabling the poorest to live in a respectable manner. Each house had a spiritual and temporal superintendent—females in the case of Sisters' and Widows' Houses." (Moravian Manual, pp. 55 and 56.)

(4) Independence of American Province.

Up to the middle of the present century, when this whole system was abolished, the Moravian Church in America practically formed merely an outpost of the Moravian Church in Germany. Constitutional changes were effected in 1857. Since then the American province of the church is independent so far as its own internal administration is concerned, and has pursued a natural policy of church extension. It now has congregations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, North Carolina, Virginia, Indian Territory, and Alberta Territory, Canada. The entire membership in America numbers 22,345. There are two provincial synods in America, which elect "provincial elders" as the executive boards, having headquarters at Bethlehem, Pa., and Salem, N. C. But the American Moravian Church forms an organic whole in union with the Moravian bodies in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. The highest legislative body is the General Synod, meeting once in ten years, and constituted of representatives of the three provinces and of the missions among the heathen which constitute the joint enterprise of the entire Moravian Church. The General Synod reviews the life, regulates the statements of doctrine, orders the ritual—liturgical in form, elects bishops, receives a report of the entire management of the missions, and elects the mission board, which has its headquarters at Berthelsdorf.

(5) Missions. The missions amongst the heathen, with an entire membership of about 95,000, are divided into the following missionary provinces: Greenland, Labrador, the Indian mission in North America, Alaska, Jamaica, the eastern islands of the West Indies, Nicaragua, Demerara, Surinam, Cape Colony, Kaffraria, German East Africa, Victoria, North Queensland, the Western Himalayan, and the Leper Hospital in Jerusalem. More than 400 missionaries, foreign and native, are employed. Last year the cost was $404,282.50. In addition a work of evangelization is carried on in Bohemia and Moravia, in which all the "provinces" participate.

(6) Doctrines. The doctrinal standpoint of the Moravian Church is thus set forth by the General Synod:

(1) The Doctrines of the Moravian Church. We esteem every truth revealed to us by God as a precious treasure, and heartily believe that such a treasure dare not be let go, even though we could thereby save our body or our life (Luke ix:24). But most especially do we affirm this of that one doctrine which the Renewed Brethren's Church has from the beginning regarded as her chief doctrine, and over which she has hitherto, by God's grace, kept guard as a priceless jewel: That "Jesus Christ is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (1 John ii:2). For "Him who knew no sin, God made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. v:21); or, as we sing in one of our hymns:

Whosoever believeth in Christ's redemption,
Will find free grace and a complete exemption
From serving sin!

(2) With this our leading doctrine, the following facts and truths, clearly attested by Holy Scripture, are linked in essential connection, and therefore constitute, with that leading doctrine, the most prominent and main features of our understanding and our proclamation of the way of salvation:

(a) The doctrine of the total depravity of our human nature; i. e., that since the Fall there is no health in man, and that he has no powers left by which to save himself (John iii:6; Rom. iii:23; vii:18; i:18-32; iii:9-18; Eph. ii:8-13).

(b) The doctrine of the love of God, the Father, to the fallen human race, according to which he "chose us in Christ, before the foundation of the world," and "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life" (Eph. i:3, 4; ii:4; John iii:16; 1 John iv:9).

(c) The doctrine of the real Godhead and the real humanity of Jesus Christ; i. e., that the only begotten Son of God, he by whom all things in heaven and earth were created, forsook the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, and took upon him our flesh and blood, that in all things he might be made like unto his brethren, yet without sin (John i:1-3; i:14; xvii:5; Phil. ii:6, 7; Heb. ii:14, 17; iv:15; Col. i:17-19; 1 John v:20).

(d) The doctrine of our reconciliation to God and our justification before him through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, i. e., that Christ "was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification," and that alone by faith in him "we have through his blood forgiveness of sin," "peace with God," and freedom from the service of sin (Rom. iii:24, 25; v:1; 1 Cor. i:30; Heb. ii:17; ix:12; 1 Peter i:18, 19; 1 John i:9; 2 Cor. v:18, 19).

(e) The doctrine of the Holy Ghost and the operations of his grace, i. e., that without him we are unable to know the truth; that it is he who leads us to Christ, by working in us the knowledge of sin and faith in Jesus, and that he "beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God" (John xvi:8-11, 13, 14; 1 Cor. xii:3; Rom. viii:16).

(f) The doctrine of good works as the fruit of the Spirit, i. e., that in them faith manifests itself as a living acting power, which induces us, out of love and gratitude to him who died for us, willingly to follow the commandments of God (John xiv:15; Rom. vi:11-14; 1 Cor. vi:20; Gal. v:6, 22-24; 1 John v:3-5; Eph. ii:8-10; James ii:17).

(g) The doctrine of the fellowship of believers one with another, i. e., that they are all one in Christ Jesus, the Head of his body, and are all members one of another (John xvii:21; Matt. xxiii:8; Eph. iv:4).

(h) The doctrine of the second coming of the Lord in glory, and of the resurrection of the dead, unto life or unto judgment (Acts i:11; John vi:40; xi:25, 26; iii:36; v:25-29; 1 Thess. iv:14-17).

(3) Whilst we do not draw up and set forth these truths and our acceptance of them in a strictly formulated creed, our apprehension of the chief substance of Christian doctrine has found in a special way its expression in what has been solemnly declared by our church, year by year, for more than 100 years past, in our Litany on Easter morning.—Results of the General Synod of the Brethren's Unity, 1889, pp. 13-15.

(7) No Organic Union. That the American Moravian Church will in the near future unite organically with any other American church is very unlikely. She cannot do so without detriment to her chief form of usefulness, which she shares with the European divisions of the Moravian Church—the work of evangelization amongst the heathen. At the same time she is ready to fellowship with evangelical believers of every name.

MORDECAI (môr'de-kāi), (Heb. מֹרְדֵכַי, mordék-ah'ce, supposed to come from the Persian word, meaning little man, mannikin; or, according to others, from the idol Merodach, thus signifying a votary of Merodach, or a worshiper of Mars. The last supposition is not unlikely, seeing that Daniel had the Chaldean name of Belshazzar; Sept. Μαρδοχάϊος, mar-doh-kai'os).

1. Esther's uncle. He was the son of Jair, of the tribe of Benjamin, descended from one of the captives transported to Babylon with Jehoiachin (Esth. ii:5). He was resident at Susa, then the metropolis of the Persian empire, and had under his care his niece Hadessa, otherwise Esther, at the time when the fairest damsels of the land were gathered together, that from among them a fitting successor to queen Vashti might be selected for king Ahasuerus. Among them was Esther, and on her the choice fell; while, by what management we know not, her relationship to Mordecai, and her Jewish descent, remained unknown at the palace. The uncle lost none of his influence over the niece by her elevation, although the seclusion of the royal harem excluded him from direct intercourse with her.

(1) In the King's Service. He seems to have held some office about the court; for we find him in daily attendance there, and it appears to have been through this employment that he became privy to a plot of two of the chamberlains against the life of the king, which through Esther he made known to the monarch. This great service was however suffered to pass without reward at the time.

(2) Jews Threatened. On the rise of Haman to power at court, Mordecai alone, of all the nobles and officers who crowded the royal gates, refused to manifest the customary signs of homage to the royal favorite. It would be too much to attribute this to an independence of spirit, which, however usual in Europe, is unknown in Eastern courts. Haman was an Amalekite; and Mordecai brooked not to bow himself down before one of a nation which from the earliest times had been the most devoted enemies of the Jewish people. The Orientals are tenacious of the outward marks of respect, which they hold to be due to the position they occupy; and the erect mien of Mordecai among the bending courtiers escaped not the keen eye of Haman. He noticed it, and brooded over it from day to day; he knew well the class of feelings in which it originated, and—remembering the eternal enmity vowed by the Israelites against his people, and how often their conquering sword had all but swept his nation from the face of the earth—he vowed by one great stroke to exterminate the Hebrew nation, the fate of which he believed to be in his hands. The temptation was great, and to his ill-regulated mind irresistible. He therefore procured the well-known and bloody decree from the king for the massacre of all the Israelites in the empire in one day. When this decree became known to Mordecai, he covered himself with sackcloth and ashes, and rent the air with his cries. This being made known to Esther through the servants of the harem, who now knew of their relationship, she sent Hatach, one of the royal eunuchs, to demand the cause of his grief; through that faithful servant he made the facts known to her, urged upon her the duty of delivering her people, and encouraged her to risk the consequences of the attempt. She was found equal to the occasion. She risked her life by entering the royal presence uncalled, and having by discreet management procured a favorable opportunity, accused Haman to the king of plotting to destroy her and her people. His doom was sealed on this occasion by the means which in his agitation he took to avert it; and when one of the eunuchs present intimated that this man had prepared a gallows fifty cubits high on which to hang Mordecai, the king at once said, 'Hang him thereon.'

(3) Exaltation. This was, in fact, a great aggravation of his offense, for the previous night, the king, being unable to sleep, had commanded the records of his reign to be read to him; and the reader had providentially turned to the part recording the conspiracy which had been frustrated through Mordecai. The king asked what had been the reward of this mighty service, and being answered 'nothing,' he commanded that any one who happened to be in attendance without, should be called. Haman was there, having come for the very purpose of asking the king's leave to hang Mordecai upon the gallows he had prepared, and was asked what should be done to the man whom the king delighted to honor. Thinking that the king could delight to honor no one but himself, he named the highest and most public honors he could conceive, and received from the monarch the astounding answer, 'Make haste, and do even so to Mordecai that sitteth in the king's gate!' Then was Haman constrained, without a word, and with seeming cheerfulness, to repair to the man whom he hated beyond all the world, to invest him with the royal robes, and to conduct him in magnificent cavalcade through the city, proclaiming, 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor.' After this we may well believe that the sense of poetical justice decided the, perhaps till then, doubtful course of the king, when he heard of the gallows which Haman had prepared for the man by whom his own life had been preserved.

Mordecai was invested with power greater than that which Haman had lost, and the first use he made of it was, as far as possible, to neutralize or counteract the decree obtained by Haman. It could not be recalled, as the kings of Persia had no power to rescind a decree once issued; but as the altered wish of the court was known, and as the Jews were permitted to stand on their defense, they were preserved from the intended destruction, although much blood was, on the appointed day, shed even in the royal city. The Feast of Purim was instituted in memory of this deliverance, and is celebrated to this day (Esth. ii:5; x). (See PURIM). B. C. 479.

2. A Mordecai, who returned from the exile with Zerubbabel, is mentioned in Ezra ii:2 and Neh. vii:7; but this cannot well have been the Mordecai of Esther, as some have supposed. (B. C. 536.)

MOREH (mō'reh), (Heb. מֹרֵה, mo-reh', teaching).

1. A name, perhaps derived from a Canaanitish chief, and given to the oak tree or grove near Shechem, where Abraham halted when he entered Canaan (Gen. xii:6; Deut. xi:29, 30). He erected an altar to Jehovah, who appeared to him here. No doubt Jacob here buried the amulets and idols which his family brought from Haran; and here Joshua erected a monument commemorating the covenant which the people renewed there. Here, too, the men of Shechem came to make Abimelech king (Gen. xxxv:4; Josh. xxiv:26).

2. A hill in the valley of Jezreei where the Midianites and Amalekites encamped before the attack by Gideon (Judg. vii:1). It is perhaps the same as Little Hermon, eight miles northwest of Mount Gilboa.

MORESHETH-GATH (môr'esb-eth-gäth), (Heb. מוֹרֶשֶׁת גַּת, mo-reh'sheth gath, possession of Gath), a place named with towns in the low country of Judah, where Micah, the prophet, was born or lived (Mic. i:14; i:1; i:13-15; Jer. xxvi:18). Jerome locates it near Eleutheropolis. (See Robinson ii, 423).

MORIAH (mo-ri'ah), (Heb. מוֹרְיָה, mo-ree-yaw', seen or chosen of Jehovah), one of the hills of Jerusalem, on which the temple was built by Solomon (2 Chron. iii:1).

The name seldom occurs, being usually included in that of Zion, to the northeast of which it lay, and from which it was separated by the valley of Tyropæon (Joseph. Antiq. viii, 3-9). (See JERUSALEM.) The Land of Moriah, whither Abraham went to offer up Isaac (Gen. xxii:2), is generally supposed to denote the same place, and may at least be conceived to describe the surrounding district. The Jews themselves believe that the altar of burnt-offerings in the temple stood upon the very site of the altar on which the patriarch purposed to sacrifice his son. (See KING; JERUSALEM, 8.)

MORNING (môr'n'ing), (Heb. בֹּקֶר, bo'ker, Gen. i:5, sq., Gr. πρωτα, pro-ee'ah, Matt. xxi:18), the early part of the day immediately following sunrise. (See DAY.)

Figurative. (1) The morning is represented as having eyelids, to represent the first appearance of the rising light in the reddish sky (Job xli:18); as having wings, to denote the quick spread of light (Ps. cxxxix:9); and as having a womb from which the dew is produced (Ps. cx:3). (2) "Every morning," is daily; often (Ps. lxxiii:14). (3) "In the morning," is early; seasonably; earnestly; suddenly (Ps. v:3; xxx:5). (4) To execute judgment "in the morning," is to do it readily, and as seasonably and speedily as possible (Ps. ci:8; Jer. xxi:12). (5) To "eat in the morning," denotes unseasonable and intemperate eating and drinking; luxury (Eccl. x:16; Jer. v:8). (6) The church is likened to the "morning" (Cant. vi:10). (7) A state of grace is called a "morning." It comes after a sad night of sin and misery; and how happily is one awakened, enlightened and refreshed by the gradual increase of its spiritual discoveries, and application of heart-warming love, till it issue in the high day of eternal happiness! (Is. viii:20). (8) A season of prosperity or gospel opportunity, is called a "morning;" it comes after a night of distress, or dark ignorance; and how delightful and refreshing! (Is. xxi:12). (9) The general resurrection is called a "morning;" after a night of darkness and deathful sleep, how shall men be awakened by the last trumpet, enlightened by the glory of, and manifold discoveries made by, the Son of man! and into what an everlasting day it ushers the saints! (Ps. xlix:12). (10) Fearful judgments are likened to the "morning" (Ezek. vii:7, 10).

MORNING SACRIFICE (môr'n'ing sak'r'i-fiz). See PRIEST, HEBREW PRIESTHOOD.

MORNING STAR (môr'n'ing stâr). See ASTRONOMY.

MORNING WATCH (môr'n'ing wöch). See WATCH.

MORROW (môr'rô). The translation of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Maw-khar' (Heb. מָחָר), deferred (Exod. viii:10, sq.; ix:6; xix:10; Num. xvi:7, 16; Josh. v:11, 12, etc.).

2. Bo'ker (Heb. בֹּקֶר), early dawn, break of day (Lev. xxii:30; Num. xvi:5; xxii:41, etc.).

3. Hex-ace' (Gr. ἕξῆς), successive (Acts xxv:17).

4. Ow'ree-on (Gr. ὄριον), breeze, i. e., morning air (Matt. vi:30, 34; Luke x:35; xii:28; xiii:32, 33; Acts xxv:17, 22, etc.).

5. Ep-ow'ree-on (Gr. ἐπαύριον), the following day (Mark xi:12; Acts x:9, 23; xxiii:32; xxv:23). (See DAY.)

MORSEL (môr'sël), (Heb. פֶּת, path, bit; Gr. βρώσις, bro'sis, eating, either the act or that which is eaten).

1. A small piece of bread (Ps. cxlvii:17); comp. Judg. xix:5; Ruth ii:14; 1 Sam. xxviii:22; 1 Kings xvii:11).

2. A meal of meat (Heb. xii:16). "Better is a dry morsel with quietness than a house full of sacrifices with strife." Better is the meanest fare, in a state of peace with God, and in the enjoyment of peace of conscience, and of true peace with men, than the most abundant and delicate provision without it (Prov. xvii:1).

MORTAL (môr'tal), (Heb. מוֹתָן, en-oshe'), a term employed to denote a human being (Job iv:17). The Greek θνητός (thnay-tos', liable to die) is applied to man's natural body as compared with the body hereafter to be assumed (Rom. vi:12; 1 Cor. xv:53, 54; 2 Cor. iv:11).

MORTALITY (môr-täl't'y), (Gr. θνητός, thnay-tos', 2 Cor. v:4), subjection to death.

It is the wish of St. Paul that death may be annihilated by life (comp. 2 Tim. i:10). "The appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel."

MORTAR (môr'tër).

1. (Heb. מַעֲרָב, aw-faw'r'), properly dry earth or dust; from a root מַעֲרָב, aw-far', to be pale or whitish (Lev. xiv:42, 45). It may be either a cement of lime and sand (Gen. xi:3; Ex. i:14), or mud or clay used like cement for building purposes (Lev. xiv:42, 45). In Ezek. xiii:10, "untempered mortar" means mortar without straw. In Babylon where clay and lime were scarce bitumen was used in place of mortar.

2. (Heb. מַעֲרָב, med-o-kaw', Num. xi:8; מַעֲרָבִים, mak-taysh', hollow, Judg. xv:10; Prov. xxvii:22), a hollow vessel of wood, stone, or metal, used for reducing grain and spices by means of a pestle (Num. xi:8; Prov. xxvii:22). The Arabs of the present day use the stone mortar for grinding grain.

MORTGAGE (môr'gâj), (Heb. מַעֲרָב, aw-rab', to give security, to pawn, Neh. v:3), a lien upon real estate for debt. In 1 Sam. xvii:18 it is translated "pledge," and in Prov. xvii:18 "surety."

MORTIFICATION (môr't'i-fi-kä'shün), any severe penance observed on a religious account.

The mortification of sin in believers is a duty enjoined in the sacred Scriptures (Rom. viii:13; Col. iii:5). It consists in breaking the league with sin; declaration of open hostility against it; and strong resistance of it (Eph. vi:10, etc.; Gal. v:24; Rom. viii:13). The means to be used in this work are not macerating the body, seclusion from society, our own resolutions; but the Holy Spirit is the chief agent (Rom. viii:13), while faith, prayer and dependence are subordinate means to this end. The evidences of mortification are not the cessation from one sin, for that may be only exchanged for another; or it may be renounced because it is a gross sin; or there may not be an occasion to practice it; but if sin be mortified, we shall not yield to temptation; our minds will be more spiritual; we shall find more happiness in spiritual services and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit.

MOSERA (mo-sē'rà), (Heb. מוֹסֵרָה, mo-say-raw', chastisement), a station of the Israelites near Mount Hor (Num. xxxiii:30; Deut. x:6). In the last passage the name appears in the plural, Mose-roth. (See WANDERING, THE.)

MOSEROTH (mo-sē'roth), (Heb. מוֹסֵרוֹת, moser-oth', correction), a station of the Israelites named between Hashmonah and Bene-jaaken (Num. xxxiii:30, 31); same as MOSERA.

MOSES (mō'zez), (Heb. מֹשֶׁה, mo-sheh').

1. Name and Family. The lawgiver of Israel. He belonged to the tribe of Levi, and was a son of Amram and Jochebed (Exod. vi:20). According to Exod. ii:10, the name מֹשֶׁה, Mosheh, means drawn out of water. Even ancient writers knew that the correctness of this interpretation could be proved by a reference to the Egyptian language (comp. Joseph. Antiq. ii, 9, 6; contra Apionem, i, 31; Philo, ii, 83, etc., ed. Mang). The name contains also an allusion to the verb to be, extracted, pulled out. Hence it appears that Mosheh is a significant memorial of the marvelous preservation of Moses when an infant, in spite of those Pharaonic edicts which were promulgated in order to lessen the number of the Israelites. It was the intention of divine Providence that the great and wonderful destiny of the child should be from the first apparent; and what the Lord had done for Moses he intended also to accomplish for the whole nation of Israel.

This table shows the pedigree of Moses:

2. Personal History. His life falls naturally into three divisions, of forty years each, according to the account preserved in Stephen's speech (Acts vii:23, 30, 36).

(1) Birth. Moses was born in the dark hour of Hebrew story when a son was an object of the murderous search of the Egyptian spies. His father was Amram, his mother Jochebed; his tribe was Levi, and this fact may have determined the choice of Levi for the priesthood. Moses was the youngest child of the family; Miriam was the oldest, and Aaron came between. For three months his parents hid the babe, but at last it was no longer possible, and Jochebed, with a trembling heart, but it may be with a dim consciousness that God had great things in store for him, laid him in the little basket of papyrus she had defly woven, pitched with bitumen within and without, and, carrying it down to the brink of one of the canals of the Nile, she hid it among the flags. The child was tenderly watched "afar off" by Miriam, who, less open to suspicion than the mother would be, stood to see what would be done to him. The daughter of the Pharaoh, the oppressor, came to the sacred river to bathe, attended by her maidens, who, surprised to find the basket, which had providentially floated down to the princess' bathing place—or had Jochebed purposely put it there?—call the attention of their mistress to the discovery. The basket is fetched by one of them, and when opened a little babe, evidently one of the Hebrews' children, but exceedingly fair, is revealed to view. The woman-heart of the princess, who was a childless wife according to tradition, yearned over the little one. Her yearning was of God. Then Miriam drew near, gathered from the conversation that the child's life was to be spared, proposed to get a nurse for him among the Hebrew women, and thus it came to pass that Jochebed again had her child at her breast, but this time as his hired nurse.

Pharaoh's daughter called him Mosheh, because she drew him out of the water. She took care to have him instructed in all the sciences then known in Egypt. In his earliest years, Jochebed and Amram, no doubt, took care to instruct him in the Hebrew language, and in the principles of the true religion, and in the knowledge of the promises that God had made concerning Israel.

(2) Life in Egypt. The second division of Moses' life was totally different in its character from the first. Moses, at the age of forty, is learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. The adopted grandson of the Pharaoh, initiated in the secrets of the priests, to whose order he belonged, he had a brilliant and useful worldly career before him. Had he remained in his advantageous surroundings, he would have been one of the great Egyptian sages—probably the greatest of them all. But God intended him to occupy a much more exalted position. There was needed by him a period of meditation. He must be cut off from books, and by direct contact with nature in all her moods learn what books cannot give. Being divinely instructed that he was to be the deliverer of Israel, he went to visit his brethren at their hard labor. Observing an Egyptian cruelly abusing a Hebrew, and going to murder him, he hastened to them, assisted the Hebrew, killed the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. Next day he observed two Hebrews at variance, and begged the faulty person not to hurt his brother. The fellow insolently replied, "Who made you a ruler or judge over us? will you kill me, as you did the Egyptian yesterday?" Finding that his slaughter of the Egyptian was divulged, he fled into the country of Midian, on the Red Sea. It is probable that the murder was intended to impress upon the Hebrews his desire to help them—that he, the king's son, would be their deliverer; for it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that the pious teachings of his mother had not been forgotten, and that many prayers had been put up by him, as he determined to be his brethren's savior. But we see now that it was no wonder that this attempt at an insurrection proved abortive, and likewise that Moses had much to learn before he could properly lead the great Exodus.

(3) In the Wilderness. Moses fled from the prominence, the refinement, and the luxury of the court to the obscurity, the roughness, and the poverty of the wilderness. Sitting down by a well, the seven daughters of Jethro came up to it with their flocks; they had scarcely filled the troughs with the water which they drew, when some barbarous fellows came up, and would have the water to their flocks. Moses assisted the damsels, and drove away the injurious shepherds. Jethro had no sooner heard of his kindness to his daughters, than he ordered him to be called in, and get a refreshment. Moses hired himself to feed Jethro's flock, and received his daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons. The first he called Gershom, to denote his being a stranger in that place; the other he called Eliezer, to denote that his God was his help (Exod. ii; Acts vii:20-29; Heb. xi:24, 25, 26).

At last the king of Egypt, by whose daughter Moses had been educated, was dead; but the bondage of the Hebrews still continued under their new tyrant.

(4) The Burning Bush. As Moses one day led his flocks near to the north or west side of Sinai, the Lord appeared to him in a bush burning, but not consumed. Moses, astonished, went near to see the miracle. The Lord spake to him out of the bush, and bade him put off his shoes before he came any nearer, as the spot was sacred by the presence of God. He then declared himself to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and that from regard to his promise, and to the groans of his oppressed people he now intended to deliver them, and bring them into Canaan, by Moses as the instrument. Moses began to excuse himself, as the Hebrews would not believe that he had a mission. God promised him his presence, and bade him tell the Hebrews that the GREAT I AM, who is being itself, and gives being to his creatures, and fulfills every promise, had sent him to inform them of their approaching deliverance; and assured him that they then would believe him. He ordered him to go to Pharaoh, and, in the name of Jehovah, to require him to let the Hebrews go three days' journey into the Arabian Desert, to offer a solemn sacrifice to the Lord. Meanwhile he told him that Pharaoh would not grant this request, till he and his country should be almost ruined by fearful plagues. Moses still excusing himself, God encouraged him by a four-fold sign: His rod was turned into a serpent, to signify what plagues it would bring on the Egyptians. It was returned to a rod, to mark how useful it would prove for the support of the Hebrews. To mark how easily God would weaken the power of the Egyptians, and strengthen the Israelites, Moses' hand, being put into his bosom, became leprous, white as snow; and again returned into his bosom, became sound as the other. These miracles he was ordered to repeat before the Hebrews, for the confirmation of his mission; and if necessary, to add the taking of water out of the river, and it should become blood. Moses then urged that he had not a ready utterance of speech, and begged to be excused, and urged the Lord would send some more proper person. Offended with his unbelief, God told him that he could qualify him with speech; and that Aaron, who was just coming to meet him, should be his assistant and spokesman. Moses being at last persuaded, went and obtained the leave of his father-in-law to go and visit his parents in Egypt. He took his wife and children along with him. As they were in an inn by the way, an angel threatened to slay Moses, it is supposed on account of his neglect to circumcise his child, or children. To prevent his death, Zipporah took a sharp stone, and having cut off her child's foreskin, cast or laid it at the feet either of her husband or of the child, and said that now she had preserved his life by bloodshed, and he or his son was now her bloody bridegroom. Zipporah and her children returned to her father; but Moses pursued his course into Egypt, and was met by Aaron his brother. They told the Hebrews what God had said, and showed them the signs; the people believed and were filled with joyful expectation of deliverance (Exod. iii, iv).

(5) In Goshen. Arrived at Goshen, Moses and Aaron at once began the discharge of their commission. But their primary efforts only increased the subject people's burdens, and the two brothers were wellnigh in despair. Then began the series of miraculous visitations recounted in Exod. vii-xii. The last of the plagues when the firstborn of the Egyptians were slain caused Pharaoh's servants to influence him to give the Hebrews their dismissal. By the sprinkling of the blood of the Passover lambs on the doorposts and upper lintels, they had their families protected from the destroying angel (Exod. v-xii; Deut. iv:34, and xi:3; Heb. xi:23-29).

3. The Exodus. The third period begins with the Exodus. The Hebrews having taken their departure from Egypt in great haste, and having carried along with them a good part of the wealth of the Egyptians, took their journey to the south-east. Pharaoh and his people repented of letting them go; and with a mighty army pursued them, and almost overtook them on the west of the Red Sea. The Hebrews murmured against Moses, for bringing them out of Egypt. Moses prayed to the Lord for deliverance. By God's direction, he stretched his rod over the Red Sea, and it (where perhaps about eighteen miles broad), parted asunder, and gave the Hebrews an easy passage. By taking off the wheels of their chariots, and darkening their way, the Lord retarded the march of the Egyptians; and when the Hebrews were all over, and the Egyptians all in the channel, Moses, at God's direction, stretched his rod to the sea, and it, moved by a strong wind, suddenly returned, and drowned the host. (See MENEPTAH, INSCRIPTIONS OF.) On the east side of the sea, Moses and the men, and Miriam and the women of Israel, sung a song of praise for their miraculous deliverance.

(1) Waters of Marah. Directing their course to the southeast, the Hebrews were three days without water; and when they found some in Marah, it was so bitter they could not drink it, they murmured against Moses, saying he had brought them into the wilderness to kill them with thirst. Moses cried to God for their relief; and God showed him a tree (perhaps the bitter Ardiphine), and he cast it into the waters and they became sweet. Marching thence, they came to Elim, where were twelve fountains of excellent water, and seventy palm-trees.

(2) Quails and Manna. On the fifteenth day of the second month, which was the thirty-first from their departure, they came to the wilderness of Sin; their food was quite spent, and now they murmured again, saying that Moses had brought them into the wilderness to kill them with hunger. Moses cried to the Lord. That very night a multitude of quails fell about their tents; and next morning the manna, which continued with them forty years, began to fall.

(3) Rephidim. When they came to Rephidim, Moses, by God's direction, smote a rock with his rod, and thence came water, whose streams seem to have followed them about thirty-nine years. Here, chiefly by Moses' intercession, and by his holding up the rod of God in his hand, the Amalekites were defeated; and to commemorate the victory, Moses reared up an altar, and called it Jehovah-nissi, that is The Lord is my banner. While they tarried here, Jethro brought Moses his wife and children; and to ease him of his great burden in judging the people, advised him to appoint heads of thousands, hundreds, and fifties, and tens; and let these judge all the lesser causes. This measure, being approved by God, was immediately put in execution (Exod. xiii-xviii; Deut. xi:4; Josh. xxiv:5-7; Neh. ix:9-15; Ps. lxxviii:11-29; cv:26-43; cvi:7-14; cxxxv: 8, 9, and cxxxvi:11-15).

(4) Mount Sinai. On the first day of the third sacred month, the Hebrews came to Sinai. On this mount, God had told Moses the Hebrews would serve him. When Moses first ascended the mount, God told him his intention to enter into a covenant with the people. When Moses rehearsed this to the people, they professed their readiness to do whatsoever the Lord should command them. When Moses returned to the mount, and represented their ready compliance with the divine will, God ordered him down to direct the people to sanctify themselves, and wash their clothes, as, on the third day, God would descend on the mountain, and enter into covenant with them. After they had purified themselves, flames from the top of the mount, and terrible claps of thunder, made all the congregation, Moses not excepted, to tremble and quake; and all the country about shook and was illuminated. Boundaries were fixed around the mount, that neither man nor beast might touch it; and all were commanded not to gaze, as if curious to behold any corporeal similitude of God amidst the fire. With an audible voice, that all Israel might hear, God proclaimed the covenant relation between him and them, and the ten summary precepts of the moral law, in a manner adapted to every particular person. The terrible thunders so frightened the Hebrew assembly that they begged the Lord would speak his mind only to Moses, and Moses declare it to them. Moses returned to the mount, and there received a variety of political and ceremonial laws.

Descending, he erected twelve pillars for the twelve tribes, and offered by the hands of some young men, burnt-offerings and peace offerings on an altar erected of rough stones. The half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar; with the other half he sprinkled the book in which he had written the laws he had received, and the people. After which, he and Aaron, and his sons, and seventy of the elders of Israel, went a little way up the mount, and feasted before the symbols of the presence of God. Thus was the covenant solemnly ratified (Exod. xix-xxiv; Deut. iv-v).

(5) Divine Directions. Leaving Aaron and Hur, and the seventy elders, to govern the people, Moses took Joshua along with him, at least part of his way, and went up to the mount, where they continued without any food for the space of forty days. God then gave Moses directions concerning the formation of the ark, altars, veils, curtains, candlestick, and other things pertaining to the tabernacle; and concerning the priests' garments, and their consecration, and concerning burnt-offerings, incense, and perfume, and concerning the Sabbath; and ordered Bezaleel and Aholiab to frame the work of the tabernacle.

(6) The Golden Calf. After giving to him the two tables of stone, on which the ten commandments had been divinely inscribed, he made him go down hastily, as the Hebrews had already broken their engagements, and were worshipping a golden calf. He offered to make Moses' family a great nation, if he would but forbear interceding for his guilty brethren. Moses fell on his face before the Lord, and begged he would not destroy them, as they were his covenant people. When he came down from the mount, and observed their idolatry, his holy zeal was so excited, that he threw down the tables of the law, and broke them to pieces before them, as a token of their breaking God's covenant, and exposing themselves to be broken in his wrath. He took their idol-calf and reduced it to powder, and caused the idolaters to drink the water, with the dust mixed with it, as a token that their guilt should be punished.

(7) Destruction of Idolaters. After sharply rebuking Aaron, his brother, for his part in their sin, he placed himself at the door of a tent, which he erected without the camp, and bade all that detested this idolatry to come to him. Three thousand Levites quickly joined him. These he ordered to go through the camp, and slay every man his friend, or near kinsman, who had been active in the idolatry. After representing to the people the greatness of their sin, he returned to the mount, and fasted and prayed for the space of forty days. He begged that if God would not forgive the Hebrews' sin, he himself might be blotted out of the book of providential preservation, and not live to see them ruined, or have the honor of his family established on their ruin. God replied, he would only cut off from life in that quarrel, such as had offended; Moses continued his intercession, till God promised his presence; promised, and gave him a signal manifestation of his mercy, goodness, and equity. Whereupon Moses begged that God would glorify the exceeding riches of his grace, in going up with them, though they were a most rebellious and stiff-necked people.

After hewing two new tables of stone, Moses returned again to the mount; and continuing there forty days, came down with the moral law divinely inscribed on the tables. His face shone with the reflection of the divine glory. When he knew this, he covered his face with a veil, that the Hebrews might converse with him (Exod. xxv-xxxiv; Deut. xi-x).

(8) The Tabernacle. The tabernacle was now to be reared by voluntary contribution. The people brought materials, till Moses restrained them. Every male paid half a shekel as the ransom money of his soul. After six months' work the tabernacle was finished, everything being exactly according to the direction of God by Moses. After divine directions issued therefrom concerning the various offerings, Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the service of it, and then a number of other ceremonial laws were by God uttered therefrom. (See LEVITICUS.)

An account of the Hebrews was then taken, and all were directed in their station and work, and their princes offered the oblations for the dedication of the tabernacle.

(9) Subsequent History. He then received the "spiritual statute book" of Israel as the congregation of Jehovah (Lev. ch. i-vii), and consecrated Aaron and his sons for the priesthood (Lev. ch. viii-ix). Judgment was executed upon Nadab and Abihu (ch. x) and further regulations promulgated (ch. xi-xxvii). After this Moses numbered the people (Num. ch. i), arranged the order of the tribes in the camp and on the march (ch. ii), numbered the Levites and arranged for their special calling (ch. iii-iv), gave directions respecting unclean persons, trespass, Nazarites, etc. (ch. v-vi), received the dedicatory gifts from the princes of the tribes (ch. vii), consecrated the Levites (ch. viii), and prepared for the onward journey (ch. ix-x:10).

Mention is made of Moses securing, by prayer, the quenching of the fire at Taberah (xi:1-3); Moses' complaint of the burden of his charge and the appointment of seventy elders (xi:10-30); the sedition of Miriam and Aaron (ch. xii); the sending out of the spies (ch. xiii-xiv); the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (ch. xvi); the death of Miriam and Aaron, and the smiting of the rock at Meribah (ch. xx); the plague of serpents (ch. xxi); the appointment of Joshua by Moses as his successor (ch. xxvii); the assignment of their inheritance to the Reubenites and Gadites (ch. xxxii); the appointment of commissioners to divide the Promised Land.

(10) Final Instructions. The eleventh month of the fortieth year of the Hebrews' travels was now begun. Moses finding that no intercession with God could procure for him an entrance into the Promised Land, and knowing that his end drew near, rehearsed to the Hebrews a summary of what God had done for them, and a number of the laws he had given them, with some additional ones, and caused them to renew their solemn covenant with God. He also set before them the manifold blessings which would attend their obedience, and the curses that would follow on their disobedience. He left a written copy of his law, to be placed at the side of the ark; and ordered the reading of it to the people at their public meetings, especially on the year of release. After giving Joshua a solemn charge with respect to his behavior, he composed a sublime ode that represented the excellency of God, their duty to him, and their danger if they apostatized from it. He then blessed the tribes of Israel; that of Simeon (perhaps because it was the most guilty in the Midianitish whoredom and idolatry) only excepted, and concluded with a lofty commendation of God, as the source of true happiness.

(11) Death. This finished, he went up to the top of Pisgah, where God strengthened his sight to take a clear view of the whole of the western Canaan. His natural strength was no way abated, but, perhaps, in a trance of wonder at the goodness of God, he breathed out his last. To intimate the future burial of his ceremonial law, and to hinder the Hebrews from idolizing his relics, the Lord buried him in the valley over against Bethpeor; but his grave could never be found.

As Thomas Fuller quaintly says, "God buried also his grave." The familiar lines of Mrs. C. F. Alexander's ode, "The Burial of Moses," may be appropriately quoted here:

"And had he not high honor?
The hillside for his pall,
To lie in state while angels wait,
With stars for tapers tall;
And the dark rock-pines, like tossing plumes,
Over his bier to wave;
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in his grave."

4. Character. Three qualities give him immortal interest and prominence.

(1) Faith. By faith he esteemed "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt" (Heb. xi:26). "Never more alluring prospects opened up before any man than those which the world held out to him. The throne of the greatest monarchy of his age was within his reach. All that wealth could procure, or pleasure bestow, or the greatest earthly power command, was easily at his call. But the glory of these things paled in his view before the more excellent character of those invisible honors which God set before him. This faith sustained him in the solitudes of Midian and animated him amidst all the conflicts attendant on the Exodus and all the difficulties that confronted him in the wilderness. This faith gave him courage in the hour of danger and calmness in the time of trial."

(2) Prayerfulness. "In every time of emergency his immediate resort was to Jehovah. He was not speaking to a stranger, but was like a son making application to his father, and so he never pleaded in vain." His was the prayer of faith.

(3) Humility. "He coveted no distinction and sought no prominence; his greatness came to him, he did not go after it. And his humility was allied with or flowed naturally out into two other qualities, disinterestedness and meekness. (See Num. xi:29 and xii:3 for striking illustrations). He gave up his own ease and comfort to secure the emancipation of his people; and while laboring night and day for them, he had no thought whatever of his own interests. His office brought him no emolument." In this he was like Nehemiah. He was free from all charge of nepotism. His meekness was shown in silently listening to complaints against himself. He appealed unto God for vindication and approval.

In addition must be mentioned his eminent services as lawgiver. It is indeed a vexed question how much credit should be given to him as the publisher of a code marked throughout by "Thus saith the Lord." We are safe in saying that the Law, as we have it recorded in the Scriptures, was divinely inspired, and that Moses made the record as directed of the Lord. The Decalogue is a moral miracle in ancient legislation, and retains its power to this day in all Christian lands. (See Law.)

The only blot upon this beautiful character is a lack of patience or self-control, but this was more evident in the earlier portion of his life, nor was it prominent enough to belie his eulogy.

Dr. Wm. W. Taylor.

5. Writings. To Moses we owe that important portion of Holy Scripture, the Pentateuch, which makes us acquainted with the creation of the world, the entrance of sin and death, the first promises of redemption, the flood, the peopling of the postdiluvian earth, and the origin of nations, the call of Abraham, and the giving of the law. We have, indeed, in it the early history of religion, and a key to all the subsequent dispensations of God to man. The genuineness and authenticity of these most venerable and important books have been established by various writers; but the following remarks upon the veracity of the writings of Moses have the merit of compressing much argument into few words:

(1) Minuteness of Detail. There is a minuteness in the details of the Mosaic writings, which bespeaks their truth; for it often bespeaks the eye-witness, as in the adventures of the wilderness; and often seems intended to supply directions to the artificer, as in the construction of the tabernacle.

(2) Touches of Nature. There are touches of nature in the narrative which bespeak its truth, for it is not easy to regard them otherwise than as strokes from the life; as where "the mixed multitude," whether half-castes or Egyptians, are the first to sigh for the cucumbers and melons of Egypt, and to spread discontent through the camp

(Num. xi:4); as the miserable exculpation of himself which Aaron attempts, with all the cowardice of conscious guilt: "I cast into the fire, and there came out this calf;" the fire, to be sure, being in the fault (Exod. xxxii:24).

(3) Unexpected Incidents. There are certain little inconveniences represented as turning up unexpectedly, that bespeak truth in the story; for they are just such accidents as are characteristic of the working of a new system and untried machinery. What is to be done with the man who is found gathering sticks on the Sabbath day? (Num. xv:32). (Could an impostor have devised such a trifle?) How is the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad to be disposed of, there being no male heir? (Num. xxxvi:2)—either of them inconsiderable matters in themselves, but both giving occasion to very important laws; the one touching life, and the other property.

(4) Simplicity of Story. There is a simplicity in the manner of Moses, when telling his tale, which bespeaks its truth; no parade of language, no pomp of circumstance even in his miracles, a modesty and dignity throughout all. Let us but compare him in any trying scene with Josephus; his description, for instance, of the passage through the Red Sea (Exod. xiv), of the murmuring of the Israelites and the supply of quails and manna, with the same as given by the Jewish historian, or rhetorician we might rather say, and the force of the observation will be felt.

(5) Candor. There is a candor in the treatment of his subject by Moses, which bespeaks his truth; as when he tells of his own want of eloquence, which unfitted him for a leader (Exod. iv:10), his own want of faith, which prevented him from entering the Promised Land (Num. xx:12), the idolatry of Aaron his brother (Exod. xxxii:21), the profaneness of Nadab and Abihu, his nephews (Lev. x), the disaffection and punishment of Miriam, his sister (Num. xii:1).

(6) Disinterested Conduct. There is a disinterestedness in his conduct, which bespeaks him to be a man of truth; for though he had sons, he apparently takes no measures during his life to give them offices of trust or profit; and at his death he appoints as his successor one who had no claims upon him, either of alliance, of claniship, or of blood.

(7) Prophetic Passages. There are certain prophetic passages in the writings of Moses, which bespeak their truth; as, several respecting the future Messiah, and the very sublime and literal one respecting the final fall of Jerusalem (Deut. xxviii).

(8) Key to Tradition. There is a simple key supplied by these writings, to the meaning of many ancient traditions current amongst the heathens, though greatly disguised, which is another circumstance that bespeaks their truth; as, the golden age; the garden of the Hesperides; the fruit-tree in the midst of the garden which the dragon guarded; the destruction of mankind by a flood, all except two persons, and those, righteous persons; the seventh day a sacred day; with many others, all conspiring to establish the reality of the facts which Moses relates, because tending to show that vestiges of the like present themselves in the traditional history of the world at large.

(9) Concurrence with New Testament. The concurrence which is found between the writings of Moses and those of the New Testament bespeaks their truth, the latter constantly appealing to them, being indeed but the completion of the system which the others are the first to put forth. Surely it is a very improbable thing that two dispersations, separated by an interval of some fifteen hundred years, each exhibiting prophecies of its own, since fulfilled, each asserting miracles of its own, on strong evidence of its own, and each with such individual claims to belief, should also be found to stand in the closest relation to one another, and yet both turn out impostures after all.

(10) Purity. Above all, there is a comparative purity in the theology and morality of the Pentateuch, which argues not only its truth, but its high origin; for how else are we to account for a system like that of Moses, in such an age and amongst such a people; that the doctrine of the unity, the self-existence, the providence, the perfections of the great God of heaven and earth should thus have blazed forth (how far more brightly than even in the vaunted schools of Athens at its most refined era!) from the midst of a nation of themselves, ever plunging into gross and groveling idolatry; and that principles of social duty, of benevolence, and of self-restraint, extending even to the thoughts of the heart, should have been the produce of an age, which the very provisions of the Levitical law itself show to have been full of savage and licentious abominations? (See Exod. iii:14; xx:3-17; Lev. xix:2, 18; Deut. vi:4; xxx:6.) Such are some of the internal evidences for the veracity of the books of Moses. (See PENTATEUCH.)

6. Later Scripture Allusions. (1) Moses was a type of Christ. The parallel is readily traced, "As Moses, in the early part of his career, refused the Egyptian monarchy because it could be gained to him only by disloyalty to God, Jesus turned away from the kingdoms of the world because they were offered on condition that he would worship Satan; as Moses became the emancipator of his people, so was Jesus; as Moses, penetrating to the soul of the symbolism of idolatry, introduced a new dispensation wherein symbolism was allied to spirituality of worship, so Jesus, seizing the spirituality of the Mosaic system, freed it from its national restrictions, and ushered in the day when the true worshiper would worship the Father anywhere; as Moses was preëminently a lawgiver, so Jesus, in his Sermon on the Mount, laid down a code which not only expounds but fulfills the Decalogue; as Moses was a prophet, so Jesus is the great Prophet of his Church; as Moses was a Mediator, so Jesus is the Mediator of the new covenant, standing between God and man, and bridging, by his atonement and intercession, the gulf between the two. We cannot wonder, therefore, that in the vision of the Apocalypse they who have gotten the victory over the beast and his image are represented as singing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb (Rev. xv:3." (2) In Jude 9 is an allusion to an altercation between Michael and Satan over the body of Moses. It probably refers to a lost apocryphal book, mentioned by Origen, called the 'Ascension, or Assumption, of Moses' (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

MOSES, SONG OF.

This wonderful ode celebrates more fitly the miraculous deliverance of the children of Israel from Egyptian bondage. It is the national anthem, the Te Deum of the Hebrews. It sounds through the psalms of Israel, through the thanksgiving hymns of the Christian Church, through the touching songs of liberated slaves, and it will swell the harmony of the saints in heaven. Allusion to it is made in Rev. xv:2, 3: "They stand on the sea of glass mingled with fire . . . and sing the song of Moses the servant of God."

MOST HIGH (mōst hi), (Heb. מֵאֲלֹהִים, el-yone', lofty), a name given to Jehovah as supreme and all-glorious (Gen. xiv:10; Ps. vii:17; ix:2, etc.).

MOST HOLY (mōst hōly). See HOLINESS.

MOTE (mōt), a particle of dust, or other matter. Small sins are likened to "motes in the eye"; they are very troublesome to an awakened and tender conscience, and greatly mar our looking on God as our sun and shield (Matt. vii:3).

MOTH (mōth), (Heb. אַוֶשֶׁת, awsh), occurs in Job iv:19; xiii:28; xxvii:18; Is. i:9; li:8; Hosea v:12; Matt. vi:19, 20; Luke xii:33; Eccclus. xix:3, xlii:13.

There is no Biblical insect whose identity is better ascertained. The following allusions to the moth occur in Scripture: To its being produced in clothes, 'for from garments cometh a moth' (Eccclus. xlii:13); to its well-known fragility, 'mortal men are crushed before the moth' (Job iv:19), literally, 'before the face of the moth,' but which words really mean 'like as the moth is crushed.' The allusion to 'the house of the moth' (Job xxvii:18) seems to refer plainly to the silky spindle-shaped case, covered with detached hairs and particles of wool, made and inhabited by the larva of the Tinea sarcitella; or to the felted case or tunnel formed by the larva of the Tinea pel-lionella; or to the arched gallery formed by eating through wool by the larva of the Tinea tapet-zella. References occur to the destructiveness of the clothes-moth: 'As a garment that is moth-eaten' (Job xiii:28); 'the moth shall eat them up' (Is. i:9); 'the moth shall eat them up like a garment' (li:8); 'I will be to Ephraim as a moth,' i. e., will secretly consume him (Hos. v:12); comp. Matt. vi:19, 20; Luke xii:33; James v:2, metaphorically; and Eccclus. xix:3. 'Moths and worms shall have him that cleaveth to harlots,' but the better reading is σήθη, 'rottenness.' Since the 'treasures' of the Orientals, in ancient times, consisted partly of 'garments, both new and old' (Matt. xiii:52; and comp. Josh. vii:21; Judg. xiv:12), the ravages of the clothes moth afforded them a lively emblem of destruction. Their treasures also consisted partly of corn laid up in barns, etc. (Luke xii:18, 24); and it has been supposed that the Greek word, translated 'rust,' joined with the σής, sayce, moth, in Matt. vi:19, 20, refers also to some species of moth, etc., probably in the larva state, which destroys corn. Kuinoel says the 'curculio, or korn-wurm,' the larva of the Tinea granella, is injurious to corn.

Moths, like fleas, etc., amid other more immediate purposes of their existence, incidentally serve as a stimulus to human industry and cleanliness; for, by a remarkable discrimination in her instinct, the parent moth never deposits her eggs in garments frequently overlooked or kept clean. Indeed, the most remarkable of all proofs of animal intelligence is to be found in the larvæ of the water-moth, which get into straws, and adjust the weight of their case so that it can always float; when too heavy they add a piece of straw or wood, and when too light a bit of gravel (Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, vol. i, p. 42). J. F. D.

Figurative. (1) Secret influences that insensibly consume men's character or estate are likened to a "moth" (Is. i:9; li:8). (2) God likens himself to a "moth and rottenness," because by his judgments he gradually and insensibly weakened the Jews, and rendered them contemptible (Hos.

v:12). (3) The wicked man builds his house "as a moth"; he builds it by covetousness and anxious care; imagines his lot agreeable but how easily do the judgments of God burn or shake him out of it! (Job xxvii:18). (4) Man's beauty, glory and wealth waste like "a moth," are secretly and insensibly, but quickly, consumed (Ps. xxxix:11).

MOTHER (mūth'ēr), (Heb. אִמָּה, ame; Gr. μήτηρ, may'lare), the name regarded by many lexicographers as a primitive, imitating the earliest lisping of an infant; they compare it with the Greek μάμα, mama; Sanscrit, mā, ambā; Copt., mau; English and French, mama; German, amme, (nurse), etc.

The ordinary applications of the word require no illustration; but the following points of Hebrew usage may be noticed: When the father had more than one wife, the son seems to have confined the title of 'mother' to his real mother, by which he distinguished her from the other wives of his father. Hence the source of Joseph's peculiar interest in Benjamin is indicated in Gen. xlii:29, by his being 'his mother's son.' The other brethren were the sons of his father by other wives. Nevertheless, when this precision was not necessary, the stepmother was sometimes styled mother. Thus Jacob (Gen. xxxvii:10) speaks of Leah as Joseph's mother, for his real mother had long been dead. The stepmother was, however, more properly distinguished from the womb-mother by the name of 'father's wife.' The word 'mother' was also, like father, brother, sister, employed by the Hebrews in a somewhat wider sense than is usual with us. It is used of a grandmother (1 Kings xv:10), and even of any female ancestor (Gen. iii:20). (See WOMAN.)

Figurative. The designation of mother is symbolically applied: (1) To the true church; she is Christ's "mother," as he assumed our nature in connection with her, and was one of her members (Cant. iii:11). She is the "mother" of believers; in her, and by her ordinances, they are spiritually born, nourished, protected, and directed (Cant. i:6; iii:4). She "is free," now delivered from the bondage of ceremonies; and her true members are freed from the broken Law, and the slavery of sin and Satan. She is "from above"; is of a heavenly origin, frame and tendency; and her true members have their conversation in heaven (Gal. iv:26; Phil. iii:20). (2) To the kingdom of Judah, or family of David, which produced these wicked oppressors, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (Ezek. xix). (3) To a metropolis, or capital city of a country or tribe; and then the inhabitants, villages, or lesser cities, are called "daughters" (2 Sam. xx:19; Jer. l:12). (4) 'The parting of the way, at the head of two ways' (Ezek. xxi:21) is in the Hebrew 'the mother of the way,' because out of it the two ways arise as daughters. (5) In Job i:21, the earth is indicated as the common 'mother to whose bosom all mankind must return.' (6) To any female superior in age, station, gifts, or grace, or who deals tenderly with one. Deborah was a "mother in Israel;" with tenderness and valor she judged, instructed, and governed that people (Judg. v:7). The mother of Rufus was a mother to Paul; kindly cared and provided for him (Rom. xvi:13). (7) The saints are Christ's "mother," "sisters," and "brethren"; he is formed in their hearts, by their spiritual union to him, and their receiving out of his fullness; and there is a dearer intimacy and relation between him and them than between the nearest relatives on earth (Matt. xii:49, 50).

MOTIONS (mō'shūns), (Gr. πάθημα, path'ay-mah).

This word signifies suffering, sorrow, misfortune, calamity (Rom. viii:18; 2 Cor. i:6; Col. i:24, etc.), also an affection, passion. The "motions of sin" (Rom. vii:5) are the inward passions of which the sins are the actual consequence.

MOULDY (mōld'y), (Heb. נִקְוָה, nik-kood', crumpled), Josh. ix:5, 12, refers rather to the crumbling of bread.

MOUNT (mounnt), (Heb. רֹמֵם, moots-tsawb', a station, Is. xxix:3; סֹלֶל־אָוֶר, so-lel-aw', Jer. vi:6), a mound or rampart thrown up for a siege.

MOUNTAIN (moun'tin).

(1) Dean Stanley gives (Sinai and Palestine) the following list, quoted in Ayre's Treasury of Bible Knowledge, of Hebrew words used in reference to mountains or hills. It will be noticed the majority are in common use with us:

"Head, rōsh (Gen. viii:5; Ex. xix:20; Deut. xxxiv:1; 1 Kings xviii:42; A. V. 'top'). Of a hill, Gibeah (Ex. xvii:9, 10).

"Ears, aznoth, Aznoth-tabor (Josh. xix:34); possibly in allusion to some projection on the top of the mountain.

"Shoulder, chitēph (Deut. xxxiii:12; Josh. xv:8; xviii:16, 'side'), all referring to the hills on which Jerusalem is placed. Josh. xv:10, 'the side of Mount Jearim.'

"Side, tzad (see the word for the 'side' of a man in 2 Sam. ii:16; Ezek. iv:4, etc.). Used in reference to a mountain in 1 Sam. xxiii:26; 2 Sam. xiii:34.

"Loins or flanks, chislōth, Chislōth-tabor, Josh. xix:12, and occurs also in the name of a village, probably situated on this part of the mountain, Ha-chesulloth, i. e., the 'loins' (Josh. xix:18).

"Rib, tzēlah. Only used once, in speaking of the Mount of Olives (2 Sam. xvi:13), and there translated 'side.'

"Back, shechem. Probably the root of the name of the town Shechem, which may be derived from its situation, as it were, on the back of Gerizim.

"Elbow, ammah. The same word as that for 'cubit.' It occurs in 2 Sam. ii:24 as the name of a hill near Gibeon.

"Thigh, yarchāh (see the word for the 'thigh' of a man in Judg. iii:16, 21). Applied to Mount Ephraim (Judg. xix:1, 18), and to Lebanon (2 Kings xix:23; Is. xxxvii:24). Used also for the 'sides' of a cave (1 Sam. xxiv:3).

"The word translated 'covert' in 1 Sam. xxv:20 is sēther, from sāthar, to hide, and probably refers to the shrubbery or thicket through which Abigail's path lay. In this passage 'hill' should be 'mountain.'

(2) The mountains mentioned in Scripture are noticed under their different names, and a general statement with reference to the mountains of PALESTINE is given under that head.

The most famous mountains mentioned in Scripture are, Seir, in Idumæa; Horeb, near Sinai, in Arabia Petræa; Sinai, in Arabia Petræa; Hor, in Idumæa; Gilboa, south of the valley of Jezreel; Nebo, a mountain of Abarim; Tabor, in Lower Galilee; En-gedi, near the Dead sea; Libanus and Anti-Libanus; Gerizim, in Samaria; Ebal, near to Gerizim; Gilead, beyond Jordan; Amalek, in Ephraim; Moriah, where the temple was built; Paran, in Arabia Petræa; Gahash, in Ephraim; Olivet; Pisgah, beyond Jordan; Hermon, beyond Jordan, near Libanus; Carmel, near the Mediterranean sea, between Dora and Ptolemais.

Figurative. In Scripture the governing part of the body politic appears under symbols of different kinds. If the allegory or figurative representation is taken from the heavens, the luminaries denote the governing body; if from an animal, the head or horns; if from the earth, a mountain or fortress; and in this case the capital city or residence of the governor is taken for the supreme power. These mutually illustrate each other. For a capital city is the head of the political body; the head of an ox is the fortress of the animal; mountains are the natural fortresses of the earth; and therefore a fortress or capital city, though seated in a plain, may be called a mountain. Thus the words head, mountain, hill, city, horn, and king are used in a manner as synonymous terms to signify a kingdom, monarchy, or republic, united under one government, with only this difference, that it is to be understood in different respects; for the term head represents it in respect of the capital city; mountain or hill in respect of the strength of the metropolis, which gives law to, or is above, and commands, the adjacent territory. When David says, 'Lord, by thy favor thou hast made my mountain to stand strong' (Ps. xxx:7), he meant to express the stability of his kingdom.

The detailed symbolical allusions are herewith given: "Mountains" and "hills" are used to represent: (1) The people that dwell in a mountainous and hill country (Ezek. vi:2, 3). (2) The temple which was built on the top of a hill (Is. xxx:29; Jer. xvii:3, 26). (3) The church of God, typified by Mount Zion, and which is firmly settled, conspicuous, and useful in the world (Ps. ii:6; Is. ii:2); and which, as a great "mountain," shall fill the whole earth, when all nations shall be gathered to Christ (Dan. ii:35, 45). (4) The ordinances of Christ, which elevate his people heavenward, and afford them much rich and medicinal provision for their soul (Cant. ii:8; iv:6; Joel iii:18). (5) Men high in station, power and authority, as magistrates in the state, and apostles and ministers in the church (Ps. lxxii:3; Is. xlv:23; lv:12). (6) Powerful hindrances and provocations, and enemies of gospel influence, and of the people of Christ (Is. xl:4; xli:15; xlix:11). (7) The places where idols were worshiped, which were often on hills and high places (Ezek. xviii:6, 11). (8) Idols worshiped in these places, or anything we trust in instead of God (Jer. iii:23). (9) The heavens, which are higher than mountains (Ps. cxxi:1). (10) God, who is likened to the "mountains round about Jerusalem," as he is the sure defense and protector of his people, and the source of all their consolation (Ps. cxxv:2). (11) Samaria is called a "mountain," because built on a hill (Amos iv:1; vi:1). (12) Babylon, or the Chaldean monarchy, is also called a "mountain" because of its lofty building and great power; "a destroying mountain," because it overwhelmed and destroyed the nations around; and a "burning mountain," because at last burnt with fire, and the debris looked like a burnt "mountain" (Jer. li:25; Is. xiii:2). (See BABYLON.)

MOUNTAIN OF THE AMORITES (moun'-tin ōv thē am'o-rites), (Heb. הַר הַחַוְּמָה, har haw-em-o-ree'), a place mentioned (Deut. i:19, 20) in connection with the WANDERING. It is probably the place now called Nukb es-Sufeh in the range of hills that borders the plateau et-tih.

MOUNT EPHRAIM. See EPHRAIM.

MOUNT OF BEATITUDES (moun't ōv bē-āt'-i-tūds).

The mount upon which the great sermon was delivered (Matt. v) may be the heights which are now known as the "Horns of Hattin," Kurun Hattin, near Capernaum, and on the west of the Lake of Galilee.

MOUNT OF CONGREGATION (mount öv kón'grē-gā'shūn), (Heb. ^{הַר מוֹאֵד} har mo-ade'), mentioned (Is. xiv:13) in connection with the King of Babylon. It probably corresponds to the Persian el-Burj, or the Greek Olympus as the home of the gods. (See CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF THE.)

MOUNT OF CORRUPTION (mount öv kör-rüp'shūn). See CORRUPTION.

MOUNT OF THE AMALEKITES (mount öv thē äm'a-lek-ites), (Heb. ^{הַר חַוִּילֵי} har haw-am-aw-lay-kee'), a place in the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. xii:15) where a branch of that clan apparently settled.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY (mount öv thē vāl'l), (Heb. ^{הַר חַוִּילֵי} har haw-ay'mek), a district in the tribe of Reuben east of the Jordan (Josh. xiii:19), in the "valley" of Ghor or the Jordan.

MOURNING (mōrn'ing), (Heb. ^{אָבֵל} aw-bal', lament, mourn).

This head embraces both the outward expressions of sorrow for the dead, referred to in the Scriptures, and those expressions which were intended to exhibit repentance, etc. These subjects will be pursued according to Townsend's chronological arrangement, and since they nearly approximate, will be pursued together.

(1) Occasions. The earliest reference to any kind of mourning is that of Job, who, being informed of the destruction of his children as the climax of his calamities, 'arose, rent his mantle, shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground and worshiped' (Job i:20), and uttered sentiments of submission (ver. 21), and sat down among the ashes (ch. ii:8). His friends came to him by an appointment among themselves to mourn with him and comfort him (ver. 11); they lifted up their voices and wept upon seeing his altered appearance; they rent every man his mantle and sprinkled dust upon their heads towards heaven (ver. 12), and sat down with him on the ground seven days and seven nights, waiting till his grief should subside before they commenced their office as mourners. Job then bewails aloud his unhappy condition (ch. iii). In ch. xvi:15, 16, reference is made to the customs of placing sackcloth next the skin, defiling the head with dust, and suffering the face to be begrimed with weeping. Clamor in grief is referred to (ii:12, 13; xix:7); it is considered a wicked man's portion that his widows shall not weep at his death (xxvii:15). Upon Job's recovery from his afflictions all his relatives and acquaintances bemoan and comfort him concerning his past sufferings; which seems to have been a kind of congratulatory mourning, indulged in order to heighten the pleasures of prosperity by recalling associations of adversity (ch. xlii:11). Indeed, the expressions of affectionate joy and grief nearly coincide. Joseph fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept (Gen. xlv:14; comp. Acts xx:37, 38, and Gen. 1:1). However it is to be accounted for, in the course of the book of Job nearly all the chief characteristics of Eastern mourning are introduced. This will appear as we proceed. The next instance is that of Abraham, who came to mourn and weep for Sarah (B. C. 1871), words which denote a formal mourning (Gen. xxiii:2). Days of mourning are referred to in regard to the expected death of Isaac (Gen.

xxvii:41). These appear generally to have consisted of seven, as for Saul (1 Sam. xxxi:13; see Judith xvi:24; comp. Eccles. xxii:12).

(2) Modes. Weeping appears either as one chief expression of mourning or as the general name for it. Hence when Deborah, Rebecca's nurse, was buried at Bethel under an oak, at this period, the tree was called Allon-bachuth, the oak of weeping (Gen. xxxv:8). The children of Israel were heard by Moses to weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent (Num. xi:10; comp. xiv:1; xxv:6). So numerous are the references to tears in the Scriptures as to give the impression that the Orientals had them ever ready at command (comp. Ps. vi:6). The woman washed our Lord's feet with tears (Luke vii:38; comp. Eccles. xxviii:17). Weeping, with lifting up of the voice, occurs in Ruth i:9; 1 Sam. xi:4; 2 Sam. iii:31; xiii:36. Their excitableness appears otherwise; they shout for joy and howl for grief, even the ministers of the altar (Joel i:13; Micah i:8, etc.).

Reuben rends his clothes upon finding Joseph gone (Gen. xxxvii:29) and uttered lamentations (ver. 30). Jacob rends his clothes and puts sackcloth upon his loins, and mourns for his son many days; his sons and his daughters rise up to comfort him, and he gives utterance to his grief; 'thus his father wept for him' (Gen. xxxvii:34, 35). Joseph's brothers rend their clothes (Gen. xlv:13); and this act, as expressive of grief or horror, occurs in multitudes of passages down to the last age of the Jewish empire (Acts xiv:14).

Scarcely less numerous are the references to sackcloth on the loins as an expression of mourning; we have even lying in sackcloth (1 Kings xxi:27), and sackcloth upon both man and beast at Nineveh (Jonah iii:8).

Joseph's brethren fell to the ground before him in token of grief (Gen. xlv:14); and this, or lying, or sitting on the ground, was a common token of mourning (comp. Ps. xxxv:14; 1 Sam. xxv:24; Is. iii:26; xlvii:1; Ezek. xxvi:16, etc.).

The next incident in the history of the subject is the mourning for Jacob by the Egyptians, which was conducted, no doubt, by professional mourners during threescore and ten days (Gen. l:3), called the days of mourning (ver. 4), though most likely that computation includes the process of embalming (Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, v. 454, 459). It seems to have amounted to royal mourning, doubtless out of regard to Joseph. The mourning for Joseph's father was renewed by Joseph's command, with a very great and sore lamentation, upon the funeral cavalcade having arrived in Canaan, and continued seven days (ver. 10). The vehemency of that mourning seems to have surprised even the Canaanites, who in consequence named the place where it was held Abel-mizraim, or the mourning of the Egyptians (ver. 11). When the children of Israel mourned under the threat of the Divine displeasure, they did not put on their ornaments (Exod. xxxiii:4; comp. Joel. ii:16; Ezek. xxiv:17). At the giving of the law the modes of mourning were regulated by several enactments. The prophet Joel commanded a fast as part of a national mourning. A fast is proclaimed to all the inhabitants or visitors at Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvi:9; comp. Zech. vii:5). Fasting is practiced at Nineveh as part of a public humiliation (Jonah iii:5). In our Lord's language, 'to fast' and 'to mourn' are the same thing (Matt. ix:15). Public humiliations attended with religious assemblies and prayers (Joel ii:16, 17); with fasts (Is. lviii:3); see all these united (1 Macc. iii:44, 47, 48). The first complete description of mourning for the dead occurs in 2 Sam. iii:31, 35.

(3) Forbidden Modes. It was forbidden the Jews to make cuttings in their flesh for the dead (Lev. xix:28). The ancient Egyptians, according to Herodotus, did not cut themselves (ii:61); it was a Syrian custom, as appears from the votaries of Baal (1 Kings xviii:28); nor were the Jews allowed to make any baldness between their eyes for the dead (Deut. xiv:1). The priests were forbidden to uncover the head in mourning (Lev. x:6), or to rend their clothes, or to contract the ceremonial defilement involved in mourning except for their nearest kindred (Lev. xxi:1, 4); but the high-priest was entirely forbidden to do so even for his father or his mother (ver. 11), and so was the Nazarite (Num. vi:7). These prohibitions respecting the head and the beard (Lev. xix:27) seem to have been restricted to funeral occasions, as the customs referred to were lawfully practiced on other sorrowful events (comp. Ezra ix:3; Job i:20; Is. xxii:12; Jer. vii:29; Micah i:16). Even the food eaten by mourners was considered unclean (comp. Deut. xxvi:14, with Hos. ix:4; Ezek. xxiv:17).

(4) Days of Mourning. The Jews were commanded to afflict their souls on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xxiii:27), and at the Feast of Trumpets (Num. xxix:7). All the house of Israel mourned for Aaron thirty days (Num. xx:29). The beautiful captive, whom the law permitted occasions (Ezek. xxvi:1-18; xxvii:1-36; Amos v:1, etc.). In Ps. xxxv, which is ascribed to David, there is a description of the humiliations practiced by the friends of the sick, in order to procure their recovery. Samuel was honored with a public mourning by the Israelites (1 Sam. xxv:1), B. C. 1058. Upon the death of Saul, David wrote an elegy (2 Sam. i:17-27). This, like that upon the death of Abner, seems to be a poetical description of the character of the departed, like the dirge for an Egyptian king.

(6) Various Expressions of Grief. Lifting up hands seems to have been an expression of grief (Ps. cxli:2; Lam. i:17; Ezra ix:5). Messengers were sent to condole with survivors; thus David sent such to Hanun, king of Ammon, upon the death of his father (2 Sam. x:1,2); 'Many of the Jews came to comfort Martha and Mary' (John xi:19); 'A great company of women attended our Lord to the cross, bewailing and lamenting him' (Luke xxiii:27); 'Much people' were with the widow of Nain (Luke vii:12). Indeed, if persons met a funeral procession they were expected to join it—a custom which is thought to illustrate St. Paul's words, 'Weep with them that weep' (Rom. xii:15). Bathsheba mourned for Uriah (2 Sam. xi:26). David, in deprecation of the death of his son by her, prayed to God for the child, fasted, and lay all night upon the earth. Ashes were often laid on the head in token of mourning; thus 'Tamar put ashes on her head, rent her garment, and laid her hand upon her head, and went on crying' (2 Sam. xiii:19, 20; comp. Is. lxi:3; Esdras ix:38). They even wallowed in ashes (Ezek. xxvii:30). Mourning apparel is first mentioned in 2 Sam. xiv:2, where it appears that the wearer did not anoint himself with oil (comp. Matt. vi:17).

(7) Hired Mourners. The first reference to hired mourners occurs in Eccles. xii:5. "The mourners go about the street." They are certainly alluded to in Jer. ix:17-20, 'the mourning women' (probably widows, comp. Ps. lxxviii:64; Acts ix:39), answering to the Præfæ of the Romans (comp. Hor. Ars Poet. 429). Another reference to them occurs in 2 Chron. xxxv:25; comp. Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iii:9, 5. The greater number of the mourners in ancient Egypt were women, as in the modern East. Mourning for the dead was conducted in a tumultuous manner; they also wept and wailed greatly (Mark v:38). Even devout men made great lamentations (Acts viii:2).

(8) Other Signs of Mourning. Among other signs of mourning they shaved the head, and even tore off the hair (Amos viii:10; Micah i:16; Is. xv:2; xxii:12; Jer. vii:29). Ezra plucked off the hair of his head and of his beard (Ezra ix:3; to marry, was required first to bewail her father and mother a full month, and the requisitions that she should shave her head and pare her nails have been by some considered signs of mourning (Deut. xxi:11, 13). The Israelites wept for Moses thirty days, called the days of weeping and mourning for Moses (Deut. xxxiv:8), B. C. 1451. Joshua and the elders of Israel put dust upon their heads at the defeat of Ai, and fasted (Josh. vii:6), as did the eleven tribes after the defeat at Gibeah, and wept (Judg. xx:26), as did all the Israelites at the command of Joshua, on which occasion it is said 'they drew water and poured it out before the Lord' (1 Sam. vii:6; comp. Ps. xxii:14).

Mourning at Grave.

(5) Elegies by the Prophets. Elegies were composed by the prophets on several disastrous Wailing with Tabrets.

Joseph. Antiq. xvi:7, 5). The Jews went up to the housetops to mourn (Is. xv:2, 3; xxii:1); and so did the Moabites (Jer. xlviii:37, 38; Judith viii:5).

They also made cuttings in their hands (Jer. xviii:37, 38); they smote upon the thigh (Jer. xxxi:19; Ezek. xxi:12); on the breast (Nahum ii:7; Luke xviii:13; xxiii:48; they smote both hands together (Num. xxiv:10), stamped with the foot (Ezek. vi:11), bowed down the head (Lam. ii:10), covered the lips (Micah iii:7), the face (2 Sam. xix:4), and the head (2 Sam. xv:30), and went barefoot (2 Sam. xv:30). Neighbors and friends provided food for the mourners (2 Sam. iii:35; Jer. xvi:7; comp. Ezek. xxiv:17): this was called 'the bread of bitterness,' 'the cup of consolation.' In later times the Jews had a custom of giving bread to the poor, at funerals, and leaving it for their use at tombs, graves, etc., which resembles the Roman visceratio (Tobit iv:17; Ecclus. xxx:8). Women went to tombs to indulge their grief (John xi:31). J. F. D.

MOUSE (mous), (Heb. מִשְׁעָה, ak-bawr', the corn eater), perhaps generically including aliarbai or jerboa, or parah of the Arabs.

The word occurs where, it seems, the nomenclature in modern zoölogy would point out two species of distinct genera (Lev. xi:29; 1 Sam. vi:4, 5, 11, 18; Is. lxvi:17). It is likely that the Hebrews extended the acceptation of the word ak-bawr, in the same manner as was the familiar custom of the Greeks, and still more of the Romans, who included within their term mus, insectivora of the genus sorex, that is 'shrews'; carnivora, among which was the Mustela erminea, 'stoat' or 'ermine,' their Mus ponticus; and in the systematic order Rodentia, the murida, containing Myoxus glis or fat dormouse, Dipus jaculus or Egyptian jerboa; Mus, rats and mice properly so called, constituting several modern genera; and criceus or hamster, which includes the marmot or Roman Mus Alpinus.

Mouse.

In the above texts, all in 1 Sam. vi apparently refer to the short-tailed field-mouse, which is still the most destructive animal to the harvests of Syria, and is most likely the species noticed in antiquity and during the Crusades; for, had they been jerboas in shape and resembled miniature kangaroos, we would expect William of Tyre to have mentioned the peculiar form of the destroyers, which was then unknown to Western Europe; whereas, they being of species or appearance common to the Latin nations, no particulars were required. But in Leviticus and Isaiah, where the mouse is declared an unclean animal, the species most accessible and likely to invite the appetite of nations who, like the Arabs, were apt to covet all kinds of animals, even when expressly forbidden, were, no doubt, the hamster and the dormouse; and both are still eaten in common with the jerboo, by the Bedouins, who are but too often driven to extremity by actual want of food. C. H. S.

MOUTH (mouth), (Heb. פֶּה, pek).

The ordinary applications of this word, common to all languages, require no explanation; but the following somewhat peculiar uses may be noted: 'Heavy-mouthed,' that is, slow of speech, and so translated in Exod. iv:10; 'smooth mouth' (Ps. lv:21), that is, a flattering mouth; so also 'a mouth of deceit' (Ps. cix:2). The following are also remarkable phrases: 'To speak with one mouth to mouth,' that is, in person, without the intervention of an interpreter (Num. xii:8; comp. 1 Kings viii:15; Jer. xxxii:4). 'With one mouth,' that is, with one voice or consent (Josh. ix:2; 1 Kings xxii:13; 2 Chron. xviii:12). 'With the whole mouth,' that is, with the utmost strength of voice (Job xix:16; Ps. lxvi:17). 'To put words into one's mouth,' that is, to suggest what one shall say (Exod. iv:15; Num. xxii:38; xxiii:5, 12; 2 Sam. xiv:19, etc.). 'To be in one's mouth,' is to be often spoken of, as a law, etc. (Exod. xiii:9; comp. Ps. v:10; xxxviii:15). The Hebrew also says, 'upon the mouth,' where we say, and indeed our translation says, in or into the mouth (e. g. Nahum iii:12); that which is spoken is also said to be 'upon the mouth,' where we should say, 'upon the lips' (as in 2 Sam. xiv:3). 'To lay the hand upon the mouth' is to be silent (Judg. xviii:19; Job xxi:5; xl:4; comp. Prov. xxx:32), just as we lay the finger on the mouth to enjoin silence. 'To write from the mouth of any one' is to do so from his dictation (Jer. xxxvi:4, 27, 32; xlv:1).

The mouth, as the organ of speech, also signifies the words that proceed out of it, which in the sacred style are the same as commands and actions. Hence, for a person or thing to come out of the mouth of another is to be constituted or commanded to become an agent or minister under a superior power; this is frequent in the Revelation (Rev. xvi:13, 14; i:16; xi:4, 5; xii:15; ix:19). The term mouth is not only applied to a speech or words, but to the speaker (Exod. iv:16; Jer. xv:19), in which sense it has a near equivalent in our expression 'mouth-piece.'

MOWING (mō'ing), (Heb. גָּזַע, gaze; literally, fleece, something cut; rendered 'mown grass' in Ps. lxxii:6). On account of the heat haymaking, as we understand it, is not known in Palestine. The "King's mowings" (Amos vii:1) probably refers to some rights of pasturage. The term "mower" (Heb. קָטַף, kaw-tsar', to dock off, Ps. cxxix:7) is usually rendered in the A. V. "reaper." (See Shaw's Travels, p. 138.)

MOZA (mō'zà), (Heb. מֹצָא, mo-tsaw', going forth).

1. The second mentioned of the three sons of Caleb by a concubine Ephah (1 Chron. ii:46), B. C. after 1037.

2. Son of Zimri, a descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii:36, 37; ix:42, 43), B. C. after 1037.

MOZAH (mō'zāh), (Heb. מֹצָה, mo-tsaw', an issuing of water).

One of the cities given to Benjamin (Josh. xviii:26). Hac-Chephirah, with which the place is mentioned, has been identified with Kefir, two miles east of Zalo; but no more accurate location of Mozah has been made.

MUFFLER (mūf'flēr), (Heb. מַחְשֵׁי רָאחַ, rah-al-aw'), long veils, more costly than the ordinary veils (Is. iii:19), covering the whole face except the eyes.

MULBERRY-TREE (mūl'bēr-rŷ-trē), (Heb. בָּאֵרֵי, baw-kaw', baka tree). (See BACA.)

MULE (mūl), (Heb. פֶּה־רֵד, peh'rad). Two other words are so translated in the A. V., viz.: מֶרְקֶשׁ, reh'kesh (marg., 1 Kings iv:28, R. V., "swift steeds"), and יַחְמֵם, yeh'meem (Gen. xxxvi:24, R. V., "hot springs").

A granivorous animal, the offspring of the horse and the ass. It was used for transportation (2 Sam. xiii:29; 2 Kings v:17; 1 Chron. xii:40). Asses were exported by the Armenians and purchased by the Tyrians (Ezek. xxvii:14).

MUNITION (mū-nīsh'ūn), (Heb. מַוְטֵד, maw-tsode', spying).

1. A watch-tower (Is. xxix:7); spoken symbolically of Mount Zion (verse 8).

2. A stronghold, fortress (Is. xxxiii:16; Heb. מַעֲזֵבֶת, meis-ad', a mountain fastness).

3. A fortress (Nah. ii:1; Heb. מַוְטֵרֶת, maw-tsore', something surrounded or hemmed in).

MUPPIM (mūp'pim), (Heb. מִפְּעֵי, moop-peem', wavings), according to Gen. xlvi:21, a son of Benjamin, but from parallel accounts he seems to be the son of Becher, son of Benjamin. Probably the same as SHEPHUPHAN (1 Chron. viii:5), SHUPHAM (Num. xxvi:30), and SHUPPIM (1 Chron. vii:12).

MURDER (mūr'dēr), (Heb. רָצַח, raw-tsakh', to kill).

1. The unlawful taking away of a person's life (Mark xv:7).

2. Hatred of, and cruelty to our neighbor, in thought, word, or deed (Matt xix:18; 1 John iii:15). The voluntary killing of any person, except in lawful war, execution of public justice, or necessary self-defense, hath been peculiarly marked out by the vengeance of God. Cain, the first murderer, was preserved as a monument of the divine indignation (Gen. iv:15). No sacrifice was accepted for this sin; no money was to ransom the life of the guilty. Suppose he fled to God's altar for protection, he was to be dragged thence and executed (Gen. ix:6; Num. xxxv:27-31; Ps. li:16).

If a man had ever so involuntarily and accidentally slain his neighbor, the law demanded that the involuntary manslayer be banished from his native abode, and confined to a city of refuge till the death of the high-priest; and if found without it by the slain person's friend, might he put to death (Num. xxxv; Deut. xix). If a body was found murdered in the field, and the murderer unknown, the rulers of the next city slew a heifer, and with washing of hands, solemnly protested their innocence of the crime and their ignorance of the actor; and with the priests or Levites present, begged that the Lord would not lay the sin to the charge of the land (Deut. xxi:1-8).

In regal times the duty of execution of justice on a murderer seems to have been assumed to some extent by the sovereign, as well as the privilege of pardon (2 Sam. xiii:30; xiv:7, 11; 1 Kings ii:34). It was lawful to kill a burglar taken at night in the act, but unlawful to do so after sunrise (Exod. xxii:2, 3), (Smith, Bib. Dict.; Jahn, Arch.; Keil, Arch.; Brown, Bib. Dict.).

MURRAIN (mūr'rīn). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

MUSE (mūz), (Heb. מִשָּׁה, see'akh, to dwell in memory upon the past; to ponder, Ps. cxliii:5), to meditate, reflect. In Luke iii:15 the Greek term διαλογίζομαι (dee-al-og-id' zom-ahēe) means to judge, reason, deliberate. (See MUSING.)

MUSHI (mū'shī), (Heb. מוֹשֵׁה, moo-shee', sensitive), a Levite, second son of Merari, and founder of a house by his name (Ex. vi:19; Num. iii:20; 1 Chron. vi:19, 47; xxiii:21; xxiv:26), through his three sons (1 Chron. xxiii:23; xxiv:30; Num. iii:33; xxvi:58), B. C. after 1856.

MUSHITE (mū'shīte), (Heb. moo-shee', as above), a descendant of MUSHI (Num. iii:33; xxvi:58).

MUSIC (mū'zīk), (Heb. זֶה־מַּוְר', zeh-mawr').

It seems probable that music is the oldest of all the fine arts. It is more than any other an immediate work of nature. Hence we find it among all nations, even those which are totally ignorant of every other art.

(1) Early Inventions. Some instruments of music are named in Scripture even before the deluge, as being invented by Jubal, one of Cain's descendants (Gen. iv:21); and some will regard this as confirmed by the common opinion of the Orientals. Chardin relates that the Persians and Arabians called musicians and singers Kayne, or 'descendants from Cain.' The instruments invented by Jubal seem to have remained in use after the flood, or at least the names were still in use, and occur in the latest books of the Old Testament. Music, in practical use, is almost constantly mentioned in connection with the song and the dance (Gen. xxxi:27; Exod. xv:20), and was doubtless employed to elevate the former and regulate the latter. Women especially are seen to have employed it in this connection from the earliest times (Exod. xv:20; Judg. xi:34; 1 Sam. xviii:6). At a later period we trace the appearance of foreign girls in Palestine, as in Greece and Italy, who visited the towns like the Bayaderes of the present day (Is. xxiii:16). Music was also through all periods used in social meetings, and in public rejoicings (1 Kings i:40; Is. v:12; xiv:11; xxiv:8; Amos vi:5; Amos v:23; 1 Macc. ix:39; Judith iii:8).

(2) Connected with Worship. By David music was variously and conspicuously connected with the temple worship (1 Chron. xxv:1); in particular, the Levites, in their several choirs, performed their music divided into different classes at the great sacrifices (2 Chron. xxix:25; xxx:21; xxxv:15). The prophets also appear to have regarded music as necessary to their services (1 Sam. x:5); and they used it sometimes for the purpose, apparently, of bringing their minds into the frame suited for prophetic inspirations (2 Kings iii:15). In the case of David playing before Saul, we have marked an interesting evidence that the effect of music in soothing the perturbations of a disordered intellect, was well known among the Hebrews (1 Sam. xvi:16).

With respect to the nature of the Hebrew music, it was doubtless of the same essential character as that of other ancient nations, and of all the present Oriental nations; consisting not so much in harmony (in the modern sense of the term), as in unison or melody.

(3) Melody. The old, the young, maidens, etc., appear to have sung one part. The beauty of their music consisted altogether in melody. The instruments by which, in singing, this melody was accompanied, occupied the part of a sustained base; and, if we are disposed to apply in this case what Niebuhr has told us, the beauty of the concerts consisted in this—that other persons repeated the music which had just been sung, three, four, or five notes, lower or higher. Such, for instance, was the concert which Miriam held with her musical fellows, and to which the 'toph,' or tabret, furnished the continued base; just as Niebuhr has also remarked of the Arabian women of the present day, 'that when they dance or sing in their harem, they always beat the corresponding time upon this drum (Reiseb. i: 181). To this mode of performance belongs the 24th Psalm, which rests altogether upon the varied representation; in like manner, also, the 20th and 21st Psalms. This was all the change it admitted; and although it is very possible that this monotonous, or rather unisonous music, might not be interesting to ears tuned to musical progressions, modulations, and cadences, there is something in it with which the Orientals are well pleased.

Music of this description could easily dispense with the compositions which mark the time by notes; and the Hebrews do not appear to have known anything of musical notation; for that the accents served that purpose is a position which yet remains to be proved. At the best, the accent must have been an very imperfect instrument for this purpose, however high its antiquity.

The Hebrew music is judged to have been of a shrill character; for this would result from the nature of the instruments—harps, flutes, and cymbals—which were employed in the temple service.

The manner of singing single songs was, it seems, ruled by that of others in the same measure, and it is usually supposed that many of the titles of the Psalms are intended to indicate the names of other songs according to which these were to be sung. (See PSALMS, BOOK OF.)

The allusions to music in the Scriptures are so incidental and concise that it will never be possible to form out of them a complete or connected view of the state of musical science among the ancient Hebrews. The little knowledge which has been realized on the subject has been obtained chiefly through the patient labors and minute investigation of Calmet, Forkel, Pfeiffer, Jahn, Winer, De Wette and others.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (mū'zī-kal In'struments).

It is less difficult to determine the general character of the Hebrew instruments of music, than to identify the particular instruments which are named in the Hebrew Scriptures. We see certain instruments different from our own in use among the modern Orientals, and we infer that the Hebrew instruments are probably not unlike these. When, however, we endeavor to identify with these a particular instrument named by the Hebrews, our difficulty begins; because the Hebrew names are seldom to be recognized in those which they now bear, and because the Scripture affords us little information respecting the form of the instruments which it mentions.

The matter naturally arranges itself under the following heads—

I. Stringed Instruments.

II. Wind Instruments.

III. Instruments of Percussion.

1. Stringed Instruments. At the head of the stringed instruments we must place the כִּנּוֹר kin-nore, which is rendered 'harp' in the Authorized Version.

(1) The Harp. The invention and first use of this instrument are ascribed to Jubal (Gen. iv: 21); and Laban names it among the instruments which should have celebrated the departure of his son-in-law (Gen. xxxi:27). In the first ages the kinnor was consecrated to joy and exultation; hence the frequency of its use by David and others in praise of the Divine Majesty. It is thought probable that the instrument received some improvements from David (comp. Amos vi:5). In bringing back the ark of the covenant (1 Chron. xvi:5), as well as afterwards, at the consecration of the temple, the kinnor was assigned to players of known eminence, chiefly of the family of Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv:3).

The sorrowing Jews of the captivity, far removed from their own land and the shadow of the sanctuary, hung their kin-norés upon the willows by the waters of Babylon, and refused to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land (Ps. cxxxvii:2). Many other passages of similar purport might be adduced in order to fix the uses of an instrument, the name of which occurs so often in the Hebrew Scriptures. They mostly indicate occasions of joy, such as jubilees and festivals. Of the instrument itself the Scripture affords us little further information than that it was composed of the sounding parts of good wood, and furnished with strings. David made it of the berosh wood (see Βεροση); Solomon of the more costly algum (2 Sam. vi:5; 1 Kings x:12); and Josephus mentions some composed of the mixed metal called electrum. He also asserts that it was furnished with ten strings, and played with a plectrum (Antiq. vii:12, 3); which, however, is not understood to imply that it never had any other number of strings, or was always played with the plectrum. David certainly played it with the hand (1 Sam. xvi:23; xviii:10; xix:9), and it was probably used in both ways, according to its size.

That this instrument was really a harp is now very generally denied; and Pfeiffer, Winer, and other writers on the subject conclude that it was a kind of guitar, and there is therefore little room to doubt that the guitar was known to the Hebrews and probably in use among them. Notwithstanding this kind of evidence, the editor of the Pictorial Bible (on Ps. xliii:4) ventured to suggest the greater probability that the lyre, in some of its various kinds, was denoted by the word kin-noré; and subsequent inquiry has tended to establish this conclusion as firmly perhaps as the nature of the subject admits.

(2) Psaltery. Nay'-bel (Heb. נַיִבֵּל) is the next instrument which requires notice. The word is rendered 'psaltery' in the Authorized Version. As to when this instrument was invented, and when it came into use among the Hebrews, nothing can be determined with certainty. The first mention of it is in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. x:5), and from that time forward we continue to meet with it in the Old Testament. The use of the instrument prevailed particularly in the public worship of God. David's own instrument was the kin-noré; but he neglected not the nay'-bel. It was played upon by several persons in the grand procession at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. xv:16; xvi:5); and in the final organization of the temple music it was entrusted to the families of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv:1-7).

Out of the worship of God, it was employed at festivals and for luxurious purposes (Amos vi:5). In the manufacture of this instrument a constant increase of splendor was exhibited. The first we meet with were made simply of the wood of the berosh (2 Sam. vi:5; 1 Chron. xiii:8), others of the rarer algum tree (1 Kings x:12; 2 Chron. ix:11); and some perhaps of metal (Joseph. Antiq. i:8, 3), unless the last is to be understood of particular parts of the instrument.

Conjectures respecting the probable form of this instrument have been exceedingly various. Passing by the eccentric notion that the nay'-bel was a kind of bagpipe, we may assume from the evident tendency of the Scriptural intimations, and from the general bearing of other authorities, that it was composed of strings stretched over a wooden frame. This being assumed or granted, we must proceed to seek some hint concerning its shape; and we find nothing more tangible than the concurrent testimony of Jerome, Isidorus, and Cassiodorus, that it was like the Greek letter Δ inverted γ.

We are, however, far from thinking that the nay'-bel was always of this shape. It appears to us to be a general name for various of the larger stringed instruments of the harp kind, and also to denote, in a more special sense, one particular sort; in other words, that the nay'-bel was an instrument of a principal species, the name of which was applied to the whole genus. In fact, we have the names of several instruments which are generally conceived to be different varieties of the nay'-bel. Before proceeding to these, we must express an opinion that one of these kinds, if not the principal kind, or the one most frequently denoted by the word, was the ancient harp, agreeing more or less with that represented in the Egyptian monuments.

(3) Awsore (אָוְסוֹרֵי), occurs as an instrument in only a few places, and never but in connection with the nay'-bel, except in Ps. xxxiii:2; Ps. cxliv:9.

(4) Stringed Instruments (גִּילְתִּיחַ, gil'tith), a word which occurs in the titles to Ps. viii, lxxxii, lxxxiv, and is generally supposed to denote a musical instrument. From the name it has been supposed to be an instrument which David brought from Gath; and it has been inferred from Is. xvi:10 that it was in particular use at the vintage season. If an instrument of music, it is remarkable that it does not occur in the list of the instruments assigned by David to the temple musicians; nor even in that list which appears in verses 1 and 2 of Ps. lxxxii, in the title of which it is found. The supposition of Gesenius, that it is a general name for a stringed instrument, obviates this difficulty.

(5) Strings (מִנְנֵם, min-neem'), which occurs in Ps. cl:4 only, is supposed by some to denote a stringed instrument, but it seems merely a poetical allusion to the strings of any instrument.

(6) Sackbut (סַבְבֻּתַיִם, sab-bek-aw'), an instrument rendered 'sackbut,' and which occurs only in Dan. iii:5, 7, 10, 15. It seems to have been a species of harp or lyre, and, as some think, was only a species of the nay'-bel, distinguished by the number of its strings.

(7) Greek Psaltery (פְּסַלְטֵרִיּוֹן, pes-an-tay-reen'), the ψαλτήριον or psaltery of the Greeks; it occurs only in Dan. iii:7, 10, 15, where it is supposed to represent the Hebrew nay'-bel.

(8) Lute (מַחְלֵאֶת, makh-al-ath'), which occurs in the titles of Ps. liii and lxxxviii, is supposed by Gesenius and others to denote a kind of lute or guitar, which instrument others find in the minnim above noticed. We should not like to affirm that instruments of this kind are represented by either of these words—not that we doubt whether the Hebrews had such instruments, but because we are not satisfied that these are the precise words by which they were denoted.

2. Wind Instruments. There is, happily, less difficulty with respect to instruments of this class than with respect to stringed instruments. The most ordinary division of these is into trumpets and pipes, of which the Hebrews had both, and of various kinds.

(1) Horn (קֶרֶן, keh'ren, 'horn'), sometimes, but not often, occurs as the name of a musical instrument (Josh. vi:5; 1 Chron. xxv:5; Dan. iii:5, 7, 10, 15). Of natural horns, and of instruments in the shape of horns, the antiquity and general use are evinced by every extensive collection of antiquities. It is admitted that natural horns were at first used, and that they at length came to be imitated in metal, but were still called horns. This use and application of the word are illustrated in our 'cornet.' It is generally conceived that rams' horns were the instruments used by the early Hebrews, and these are, indeed, expressly named in our own and many other versions, as the instruments used at the noted siege of Jericho (Josh. vi:5); and the horns are those of the ram, which Josephus assigns to the soldiers of Gideon (Antiq. v:6, 5; comp. Judg. vii:16).

(2) Trumpet (רָפָאֵץ, sho-fawr'), which is a far more common word than keren, and is rendered 'trumpet' in the Authorized Version.

This word seems, first, to denote horns of the straighter kind, including, probably, those of neat Ancient Horns and Curved Trumpets.

cattle, and all the instruments which were eventually made in imitation of and in improvement upon such horns. It is, however, difficult to draw a distinction between it and the kehren, seeing that the words are sometimes used synonymously. Thus that which is called 'a jobel-horn' in Josh. vi:5, is in the same chapter (verses 4, 6, 8, 13) called 'a jobel-horn trumpet.' Upon the whole, we may take the sho-fawr', however distinguished from the keh'ren, to have been that kind of horn or horn-shaped trumpet which was best known to the Hebrews. The name sho-fawr' means bright or clear, and the instrument may be conceived to have been so called from its clear and shrill sound, just as we call an instrument a 'clarion,' and speak of a musical tone as 'brilliant' or 'clear.' In the service of God this sho-fawr' or trumpet was employed only in making announcements, and for calling the people together in the time of the holy solemnities, of war, of rebellion, or of any other great occasion (Exod. xix:13; Num. x:10; Judg. iii:27; 1 Sam. xiii:3; 2 Sam. xv:10; 2 Chron. xv:14; Is. xviii:3).

(3) Straight Trumpet. Another instrument was khats-o-tser-aw', חַצְצֵרָא. This was the straight trumpet, different from the sho-fawr', which was more or less bent like a horn. There has been various speculation on the name; but we are disposed to assent to the conclusion of Gesenius that it is an onomatopoeic word, imitating the broken pulse-like sound of the trumpet, like the Latin taratantara, which this word would more resemble if pronounced as in Arabic, hadá-derah. Among the Israelites these trumpets were a divine regulation, Moses having been expressly directed how to make them (Num. x:2). They were of pure beaten silver, but the particular form does not appear in Scripture. When, however, riches departed from Palestine, trumpets of baser metal were used (2 Kings xii:13), although probably a certain number of silver were still preserved. They were used in calling the congregation together for sacrifices, and in battle (Hos. v:8). The tone of this trumpet, or rather the noise made by blowing on it, was very variable, and is distinguished by different terms in Scripture.

(4) Jubilee Trumpet. Yo-bale' (Heb. יְבֻבִי).

There has been much speculation concerning this term, which the reader may find in ample abundance in Bochart (Hieroz. i:436). It seems now to be agreed that the word does not denote a separate instrument, but is an epithet applied to the trumpets with which the jubilees were proclaimed, i. e., the 'jubilee-trumpet'; and as the same trumpets were used for signals and alarms, 'the alarm-trumpet, the alarm-horn.' This name for the sound of music is supposed to be derived from Jubal, the inventor of instruments of music.

Wind instruments of softer sound next require attention. The first and principal of these is the

(5) Pipe (כִּנֹּר, khaw-leel'), the meaning of which is bored through, and denotes a pipe, perforated and furnished with holes. There are but five places where it occurs in the Old Testament

(1 Sam. x:5; 1 Kings i:40; Is. v:12; xxx:29; Jer. xlviii:36); but the Greek αὐλός occurs in the New Testament (Matt. ix:23), and in the Apocryphal books (1 Macc. iv:54; ix:39; Judith iii:8). It would seem to have come rather late into use among the Hebrews, and probably had a foreign origin. The passages to which we have referred will indicate the use of this instrument or class of instruments; but of the form we can only guess by reference to those of the ancient Egyptians, which are very similar to those still in use in Western Asia. The pipe is, however, rarely introduced in the Egyptian sculptures, and does not seem to have been held in much estimation. The principal are the single and double pipes. The single pipe of the Greeks is allowed to have been introduced from Egypt (J. Pollux, Onom. iv:10; Athenæus, Deipnos, iv), from which the Jews probably had theirs. It was a straight tube, without any increase at the mouth, and when played was held with both hands. It was usually of moderate length, about eighteen inches, but occasionally less, and sometimes so exceedingly long and the holes so low that the player was obliged to extend his arms to the utmost. Some had three holes, others four, and actual specimens made of common reed have been found (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii:399).

The double pipe was formed with two of such tubes, of equal or unequal lengths, having a common mouth-piece, and each played with the corresponding hand. They were distinguished as the right and left pipes, and the latter, having but few holes and emitting a deep sound, served as a base; the others had more holes and gave a sharp sound (Plin. Hist Nat. xvi:36). This pipe is still used in Palestine.

From the references which have been given it will be seen that the pipe was, among the Jews, chiefly consecrated to joy and pleasure. So much was this the case that in the time of Judas Maccabæus the Jews complained 'that joy was taken from Jacob, and the pipe with the harp (κithára) ceased' (1 Macc. iii:45). It was particularly used to enliven the periodical journeys to Jerusalem to attend the great festivals (Is. xxx:29); and this custom of accompanying traveling in companies with music is common in the East at this day (Harmer, Observatt. ii:197; to which add Tournefort, Voyage du Levant, iii:189). Athenæus iv:174 tells us of a plaintive pipe which was in use among the Phœnicians. This serves to illustrate Matt. ix:23, where our Savior, finding the flute-players with the dead daughter of the ruler, orders them away, because the damsel was not dead; and in this we also recognize the regulation of the Jews, that every one, however poor he might be, should have at least two pipes at the death of his wife (Lightfoot Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. ix:23). (See MOURNING.)

(6) Flute (Chaldee, מִשְׁרָפָה, mash-ro-kee'; a musical pipe). This word occurs four times in Daniel (ch. iii:5, 7, 10, 15), but nowhere else, and appears to be of the Chaldæan name for the flute with two reeds, of which we have already spoken.

Ancient Organ.

(7) Organ (Heb. גַּבְבִּי, oo-gawb'), is the word rendered 'organ' in our version. This and the kinnor are the instruments whose invention is ascribed to Jubal (Gen. iv:21), and higher antiquity cannot therefore be claimed for any instrument. There are only three other places in which it is mentioned in the Old Testament—two in the book of Job (xxi:12, xxx:31), and one in the Psalms (cl:4). The organon simply denotes a double or manifold pipe; and hence in particular the Pandæan or shepherd's pipe, which is at this day called a 'mouth-organ' among ourselves. Formerly it was called simply 'organ,' and 'mouth' has been added to distinguish it from the comparatively modern instrument which has usurped the more simple designation of 'organ.' Our translators are thus not chargeable with the obscurity which has since arisen, for they, by the word 'organ,' intended to indicate no other instrument than this.

This antiquity corresponds with the Scriptural intimation concerning the ugab, and justifies us in seeking for the syrix among the more ancient instruments of the Orientals, especially as it is still common in Western Asia. Niebuhr saw it in the hands of a peasant at Cairo (Reisebeschr. i:181); and Russell, in his Nat. Hist. of Aleppo (i:155, 156), says that 'the syrix or Pan's pipe is still a festival instrument in Syria; it is known also in the city, but very few performers can sound it tolerably well. The higher notes are clear and pleasing, but the longer reeds are apt, like the dervise flute, to make a hissing sound, though blown by a good player. The number of reeds of which the syrix is composed, varies in different instruments from five to twenty-three.' The classical syrix is usually said to have had seven reeds (Virg. Ecl. ii), but we find some in the monuments with a greater number, and the shepherd of Theocritus (Id. viii) had one of nine reeds.

3. Instruments of Percussion. Instruments of percussion, or such as give forth their sounds on being struck or shaken.

(1) Timbrel (תֹּפֶת, toph, or tofe), seems to have denoted primarily the tambourine, and generally all instruments of the drum kind which were in use among the Israelites. There is not the slightest doubt about this instrument. All the translations and lexicons agree in this one point, and we have, besides, the actual evidence of existing instruments of this kind among the Arabians, bearing the same name in the forms of doff and adufe. The toph was known to the Jews before they quitted Syria (Gen. xxxi:27); it is also mentioned by Job (xxi:12), and it is the first instrument named after the exode, being that with which Miriam led the dances with which the daughters of Israel celebrated the overthrow of Pharaoh (Exod. xv:20). It was employed by David in all the festivities of religion (2 Sam. vi:5). Isaiah adduces it as the instrument of voluptuaries, but left in silence amid wars and desolations (Is. xxiv:8). The occasions on which it was used were mostly joyful, and those who played upon it were generally females (Ps. lxxviii:25), as was the case among most ancient nations, and is so at the present day in the East. It is nowhere mentioned in connection with battles or warlike transactions.

Whether the Israelites had drums or not does not clearly appear, and in the absence of evidence pro or con it is useless to speculate on the subject. If they had, they must be included under the general name of toph. The ancient Egyptians had a long drum, very similar to the tom-toms of India. It was about two feet or two feet and a half in length, and was beaten with the hand. The case was of wood or copper, covered at both ends with parchment or leather, and braced with cords extended diagonally over the exterior of the cylinder. It was used chiefly in war. There was another larger drum, less unlike our own; it was about two feet and a half long by about two feet broad, and was shaped much like a sugar-cask. It was formed of copper, and covered at the ends with red leather, braced by catgut strings passing through small holes in its broad margin. This kind of drum was beaten with sticks. It does not appear on the monuments, but an actual specimen was found in the excavations made by D'Athanasia, in 1823, and is now in the museum at Paris.

Another species of drum is represented in the Egyptian paintings, and is of the same kind which is still in use in Egypt and Arabia, under the name of the darabooka drum. It is made of parchment stretched over the top of a funnel-shaped case of metal, wood, or pottery. It is beaten with the hand, and when relaxed, the parchment is braced by exposing it for a few moments to the sun, or the warmth of a fire. This kind of drum claims particular attention from its being supposed to be represented on one of the coins ascribed to Simon Maccabæus.

(2) Bells. Pah-am-one' (Heb. פְּאָמֹנֵי). This name nowhere occurs but with reference to the small golden appendages to the robe of the high-priest (Exod. xxviii:33; xxxix:25), which all versions agree in rendering 'bells,' or 'little bells.'

(3) Cymbals. Three Hebrew words are translated cymbals in most versions, except in Zech. xiv:20, where they are rendered 'bells'—the 'bells of the horses.' If the words, however, denote cymbals in other places, they cannot well denote a different thing here.

There is an important passage (Ps. cl:5), 'Praise him with the clear cymbal, praise him with the resounding cymbal,' which clearly points to two instruments under the same name, and leaves us to conclude that the Hebrews had both hand-cymbals and finger-cymbals (or castanets), although it may not in all cases be easy to say which of the two is intended in particular texts. Cymbals figure in the grand procession at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. xiii:8); other instances occur of their being used in the worship of God (Neh. xii:27; Ps. cl:5; 1 Chron. xv:16); and the illustrious Asaph was himself a player on the cymbal (1 Chron. xvi:5). The sound of these instruments is very sharp and piercing, but it does not belong to fine, speaking, expressive music. Hence Paul could describe it by the word ἀλαλάζον, 'clanging' (1 Cor. xiii:1).

(4) Triangle (Heb. שַׁוִּיִּם, shawt-ish'im). This word occurs but once, viz., in 1 Sam. xviii:6, and is there uncertainly rendered, in the Authorized Version, 'instruments of music,' and in the margin 'three-stringed instruments.' The word is plural, and means 'threes.' Most writers, proceeding upon this interpretation, identify it with the triangle, which Athenæus (iv:23) alleges to have been a Syrian invention.

(5) Sistrum (סִסְטְרוֹן, men-ah-an-eem'). This is another word which occurs but once in Scripture (2 Sam. vi:5), where our version translates it by 'cymbals,' although it has appropriated another word to that instrument. It is now more inches in length, and entirely of bronze or brass. It was sometimes inlaid with silver, gilt, or otherwise ornamented, and being held upright was shaken, the rings moving to and fro upon the bars. The last were frequently made to imitate snakes, or simply bent at each end to secure them from slipping through the holes. Several actual specimens of these instruments have been found, and are deposited in the British, Berlin and other museums. They are mostly furnished with sacred symbols, and were chiefly used by the priests and priestesses in the ceremonies of religion, particularly in those connected with the worship of Isis.

MUSING (müz'ing), (Heb. מִשֵּׁג, haw-gheeg', Ps. xxxix:3), a figure borrowed from the fermentation or spontaneous combustion of certain articles. In general it denotes to think, to consider (Ps. cxliii:5).

MUSTARD TREE (müs'têrd trê), (Gr. σινάπι, sin'ap-ee). See SINAPI.

MUTHLABBEN (müth-läb'ben), (Heb. מִוְלַבֵּן, mooth-lab-bane'). This word occurs in the title of Ps. ix, and perhaps the most generally accepted meaning is "with the voice of virgins," indicating that it was to be sung by boys (Ps. ix; title).

MUTTER (müt'têr), (Heb. מִוְלַבֵּן, haw-gaw', Is. viii:10, to speak softly). It seems that anciently wizards muttered or talked in a whispering tone, and peeped to their familiar spirits. (See MAGIC.)

MUZZLE (müz'z'l), (Heb. מִמְצָה, khaw-sam'; Gr. φιμώ, fee-mo'o, to stop the mouth).

In the East the grain was thrashed by oxen trampling upon it; and the command was not to put anything in or on the mouth of a beast to restrain it from eating (Deut. xxv:4). St. Paul used it to denote (1 Cor. ix:9; 1 Tim. v:18) that a laborer was not to be deprived of his wages.

MYRA (mý'râ), (Gr. Μύρα, moo'rah, ointments), one of the chief towns of Lycia, in Asia Minor.

It lay about a league from the sea (in N. lat. 36° 18'; E. long. 30°), upon a rising ground, at the foot of which flowed a navigable river with an excellent harbor at its mouth (Strabo. xiv, p. 665; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxii:8). The town now lies desolate amid magnificent ruins. When Paul was on his voyage from Cæsarea to Rome he and the other prisoners were landed here, and were embarked in a ship of Alexandria bound to Rome (Acts xxvii:5).

MYRRH (mêr), a gum, the thickened sap of a low thorny tree (Balsamodendron opsobalsamum), which grows chiefly in Arabia.

Myrrh is sold for medical purposes in small globules of a white or yellow color, of a strong and agreeable smell, but a bitter taste. It was an ingredient of the holy ointment (Ex. xxx:23), and of the embalming substance (John xix:39). It was also used as an agreeable perfume (Esth. ii:12; Ps. xlv:8; Prov. vii:17), and a valuable gift (Matt. ii:11). In Matt. xxvii:34 it is said that they gave Jesus to drink vinegar mixed with gall, which, in Mark xv:23, is called wine mingled with myrrh. It was probably the sour wine which the Roman soldiers used to drink mingled with myrrh and other bitter substances, very much like the bitters of modern times. (See MOR.)

MYRTLE (mêr't'l). See HADAS.

MYSIA (mý'si-ä) (mízh'y-ä), (Gr. Μυσία, moo-see-ah), a province occupying the northwest angle of Asia Minor, and separated from Europe only by the Propontis and Hellespont; on the south it joined Æolis, and was separated on the east from Bithynia by the river Æsopus. Paul passed through this province and embarked at its chief port, Troas, on his first voyage to Europe (Acts xvi:7, 8).

MYSTERY (mís'têr-ÿ), (Gr. μυστήριον, moos-tay-ree-on, secret doctrine). The etymology of this Greek word, which seems to be the simplest and most illustrative of its meaning, is that from the Hebrew to 'hide' or 'conceal,' whence a covert or secret place, a secret.

(1) A Revelation. A most unscriptural and dangerous sense is but too often put upon the word, as if it meant something absolutely unintelligible and incomprehensible; whereas, in every instance in which it occurs in the Septuagint or New Testament, it is applied to something which is revealed, declared, explained, spoken, or which may be known or understood. This fact will appear from the following elucidation of the passages in which it is found. First, it is sometimes used to denote the meaning of a symbolical representation, whether addressed to the mind by a parable, allegory, etc., or to the eye, by a vision, etc. Thus our Lord, having delivered to the multitude the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii:3-9), when the disciples asked him (verse 10) why he spoke to them in parables, replied, 'Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but unto them which are without it is not given' (Mark iv:11).

(2) Mystery of the Woman. Again, 'the mystery or symbolical representation of the woman upon a scarlet colored beast' (Rev. xvii:3-6), is also explained, 'I will tell thee the mystery of the woman,' etc. (xvii:7). When St. Paul, speaking of marriage, says 'this is a great mystery' (Eph. v:32), he evidently treats the original institution of marriage, as affording a figurative representation of the union betwixt Christ and the church (Campbell, Dissertation, p. 10, part iii, sec. 9). The word is also used to denote anything whatever which is hidden or concealed, till it is explained.

(3) Doctrines. Thus the word is used in the New Testament to denote those doctrines of Christianity, general or particular, which the Jews and the world at large did not understand, till they were revealed by Christ and his apostles, 'Great is the mystery of godliness,' i. e., the Christian religion (1 Tim. iii:16), the chief parts of which the apostle instantly proceeds to adduce—'God was manifest in the flesh, justified by the Spirit, seen of angels,' etc.—facts which had not entered into the heart of man (1 Cor. ii:9) until God visibly accomplished them, and revealed them to the apostles by inspiration (verse 10). The apostle is generally thought here to compare the Gospel with the greater Eleusinian mysteries.

(4) Mystery of Faith. Thus also the Gospel in general is called 'the mystery of the faith,' which it was requisite the deacons should hold with a pure conscience' (1 Tim. iii:9). The same word is used respecting certain particular doctrines of the Gospel, as, for instance, 'the partial and temporary blindness of Israel,' of which mystery 'the apostle would not have Christians' ignorant (Rom. xi:25), and which he explains (verses 25-32). He sty's the calling of the Gentiles a mystery which, in other ages, was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now revealed unto the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit' (Eph. iii:4-6; comp. i:9, 10, etc.). To this class we refer the well-known phrase, 'Behold, I show you a mystery (1 Cor. xv:51), we shall all be changed;' and then follows an explanation of the change (verses 51-55). Even in the case of a man speaking in an unknown tongue, in the absence of an interpreter, and when, therefore, no man understood him, although 'by the Spirit he was speaking mysteries,' yet the Apostle supposes that the man so doing understood what himself said (1 Cor. xiv:2-4).

(5) Mystery of Iniquity. And in the prophetic portion of his writings 'concerning the mystery of iniquity' (2 Thess. ii:7), he speaks of it as being ultimately 'revealed' (verse 8); and to complete the proof that the word 'mystery' is used in the sense of knowable secrets, we add the words, 'Though I understand all mysteries' (1 Cor. xiii:2). The Greeks used the word in the same way. Thus Menander, 'Tell not your secret to a friend' (p. 274, line 671, ed. Clerici).

N

NAAM (nā'am), (Heb. נָאֵם, nah'am, pleasantness), one of the three sons of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv:15), B. C. about 1618.

NAAMAH (nā'a-mah), (Heb. נָאֵמָה, nah-am-aw', pleasant).

1. A daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. iv:22), B. C. about 3549.

2. An Ammonitess, one of the wives of Solomon, and mother of Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv:21).

3. A town in the low country of Judah, which has not been fully identified. It is proposed, however, to identify Naamah with Nā-neh, which is a small mud village on low ground six miles south of Ludd, (Lydda). (C. Warren in Hastings' Dict. of Bib.)

NAAMAN (nā'a-man), (Heb. נָאֵמָן, nah-am-awn', pleasantness; Sept. Ναυμάν, naiman).

1. (1) Commander of Syrian Armies. He was the commander of the armies of Damascene Syria, in the time of Joram, king of Israel. Through his valor and abilities Naaman held a high place in the esteem of his king Benhadad.

(2) A Leper. Although he was afflicted with leprosy, it would seem that this did not, as among the Hebrews, operate as a disqualification for public employment. Nevertheless the condition of a leper could not but have been in his high place both afflicting and painful; and when it was heard that a little Hebrew slave-girl, who waited upon Naaman's wife, had spoken of a prophet in Samaria who could cure her master of his leprosy, the faint and uncertain hope thus offered was eagerly seized; and the general obtained permission to visit the place where this relief was to be sought. Benhadad even furnished him with a letter to his old enemy, King Joram. But this letter merely stated that Naaman had been sent for him to cure, and the king of Israel rent his clothes in astonishment and anger, suspecting that a request so impossible to grant involved a studied insult or an intention to fix a quarrel upon him with a view to future aggressions.

When tidings of this affair reached the prophet Elisha, he desired that the stranger might be sent to him. Naaman accordingly went, and his splendid train of chariots, horses, and laden camels filled the street before the prophet's house. As a leper, Naaman could not be admitted into the house; and Elisha did not come out to him as he expected, and as he thought civility required; but he sent out his servant to tell him to go and dip himself seven times in the Jordan, and that his leprosy would then pass from him. He was, however, by this time so much chafed and disgusted by the apparent neglect and incivility with which he had been treated, that if his attendants had not prevailed upon him to obey the directions of the prophet, he would have returned home still a leper.

(3) The Jordan. But he went to the Jordan, and having bent himself seven times beneath its waters, rose from them clear from all leprous stain. His gratitude was now proportioned to his previous wrath, and he drove back to vent the feelings of his full heart to the prophet of Israel.

(4) Converted to the God of Israel. He avowed to him his conviction that the God of Israel, through whom this marvelous deed had been wrought, was great beyond all gods; and he declared that henceforth he would worship him only, and to that end he proposed to take with him two mules' load of the soil of Israel wherewith to set up in Damascus an altar to Jehovah. This shows he had heard that an altar of earth was necessary (Exod. xx:24); and the imperfect notions which he entertained of the duties which his desire to serve Jehovah involved, were natural in an un instructed foreigner. He had also heard that Jehovah was a very jealous God, and had forbidden any of his servants to bow themselves down before idols; and therefore he expressed to Elisha a hope that he should be forgiven if, when his public duty required him to attend his king to the temple of Rimmmon, he bowed with his master. The grateful Syrian would gladly have pressed upon Elisha gifts of high value, but that holy man resolutely refused to take anything, lest the glory redounding to God from this great act should in any degree be obscured.

(5) Gehazi. His servant, Gehazi, was less scrupulous, and hastened with a lie in his mouth to ask in his master's name for a portion of that which Elisha had refused. The illustrious Syrian no sooner saw the man running after his chariot than he alighted to meet him, and, happy to relieve himself in some degree under the sense of overwhelming obligation, he sent him back with more than he had ventured to ask (2 Kings v), B. C. about 850. Nothing more is definitely known of Naaman. According to the Midrash, Naaman was the man who 'drew his bow at a venture' at the battle of Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings xxii:34).

(6) Character. "Naaman's appearance throughout the occurrence is most characteristic and consistent. He is every inch a soldier, ready at once to resent what he considers a slight cast either on himself or the natural glories of his country, and blazing out in a moment into sudden 'rage,' but calmed as speedily by a few good-humored and sensible words from his dependents, and after the cure has been effected evincing a thankful and simple heart, whose gratitude knows no bounds, and will listen to no refusal" (McC. and S. Cyc.).

2. The second son of Bela, son of Benjamin (Gen. xlv:21). He was apparently exiled by Bela (1 Chron. viii:4, 7), though head of the family of Naamites (Num. xxvi:40); perhaps the same as Uzzi (1 Chron. vii:7), B. C. after 1856.

NAAMATHITE (nā'a-ma-thite), (Heb. נָאֵמָתִי, nah-am-aw-thee'), an epithet of Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job ii:11; xi:1; xx:1; xlii:9). The name is unknown elsewhere. The place was probably situated in Arabia. It indicates a town in the Shephelah in Josh. xv:41.

NAAMITES (nā'a-mītes), (Heb. נָאֵמִי, nah-am-ee'), the Naami, the name given to the family descended from Naaman son of Bela (Num. xxvi:40; 1 Chron. viii:4).

NAARAH (nā'a-rah), (Heb. נָאֵרָה, nah-ar-aw', a girl), the wife of Ashur, of the tribe of Judah, by whom he had four sons (1 Chron. iv:5, 6), B. C. 1618. (See NAARAN and NAARATH.)

NAARAI (nā'a-rāi), (Heb. נַאֲרַי, nah-ar-ah'ee, boyish), son of Ezbai, and one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. xi:37), B. C. about 1015. The name is probably incorrectly written Paarai (2 Sam. xxiii:35).

NAARAN (nā'a-rān), (Heb. נַאֲרָן, nah-ar-awn', boyish, juvenile, puerile), a town on the south-eastern border of Ephraim, between Bethel and Jericho (1 Chron. vii:28). The name is Naarath (Josh. xvi:7).

NAARATH (nā'a-rāth), (Heb. נַאֲרָת, nah-ar-aw', a girl, handmaid).

A city of Ephraim (Josh. xvi:7), about five miles distant from Jericho, the Naaran of 1 Chron. vii:28. Eusebius speaks of it as Oorath, a village five miles from Jericho, and Josephus mentions that Herod drew off part of the waters from the village of Neara to water the palm trees he had planted. Conder, therefore, suggests that the site of Naarath is to be found in el'Ajeh, near Jericho, where are a ruin and remains of an ancient aqueduct.

NAASHON (na-āsh'on), (Heb. נַאֲשׁוֹן, nakh-shone', oracle), (Ex. vi:23). See NAHSHON.

NAASSON (na-ās'son), (Gr. Ναασών, nah-assone'), Matt. i:4; Luke iii:32; the Greek form of the name NAHSHON.

NAAZUZ or NAATZUTZ (nā'az-uz or nā-atz-utz), (Heb. נַאֲזֻז, nah-ats-oots'), occurs only in two passages of Isaiah, in both of which it is translated 'thorn' in the Authorized Version.

Thus (chap. vii:18, 19), 'Jehovah shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria; and they shall come, and shall rest all of them, in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all the thorns (naazuzim). By some this has been translated crevices; but that it is a plant of some kind is evident from chap. lv:13—'Instead of the thorn (naazuz) shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle-tree.' This might be a species of acacia, of which many species are well known to be abundant in the dry and barren parts of Syria, Arabia and Egypt. (See THORNS AND THISTLES.) J. F. R.

NABAL (nā'bal), (Heb. נַבָּל, naw-bawl', stupid, foolish; Sept. Ναβάλ, nabal').

A descendant of Caleb, dwelling at Maon, and having large possessions near Carmel of Judah, in the same neighborhood. He had abundant wealth, being the possessor of 3,000 sheep and 1,000 goats, but his churlish and harsh character had not been softened by the prosperity with which he had been favored. He was holding a great sheep-shearing of his numerous flocks at Carmel—which was a season of great festivity among the shepherds of Israel—when David sent some of his young men to request a small supply of provisions, of which his troop was in great need. He was warranted in asking this, as, while Nabal's flocks were out in the desert, the presence of David and his men in the neighborhood had effectually protected them from the depredations of the Arabs. But Nabal refused this application, with harsh words, reflecting coarsely upon David and his troop as a set of worthless renegades. On learning this, David was highly incensed, and set out with his band to avenge the insult. But his intention was anticipated and averted by Nabal's wife Abigail, who met him on the road with a most acceptable supply of provisions, and by her consummate tact and good sense mollified his anger, and indeed caused him in the end to feel thankful that he had been prevented from the bloodshed which would have ensued. When Nabal, after recovering from the drunkenness of the feast, was informed of these circumstances, he was struck with such intense terror at the danger to which he had been exposed that 'his heart died within him, and he became as a stone;' which seems to have been the exciting cause of a malady that carried him off about ten days after. David, not long after, evinced the favorable impression which the good sense and comeliness of Abigail had made upon him by making her his wife, B. C. 1061 (1 Sam. xxv). (See ABIGAIL.)

NABATHÆANS (nāb'a-thē'an), (1 Macc. v:25, ix:35). See NEBAIOTH.

NABOTH (nā'bōth), (Heb. נַבֹּת, naw-both', fruit, produce).

An inhabitant of Jezreel, who was the possessor of a patrimonial vineyard adjoining the garden of the palace which the kings of Israel had there. King Ahab had conceived a desire to add this vineyard to his ground, to make of it 'a garden of herbs,' but found that Naboth could not, on any consideration, be induced to alienate a property which he had derived from his fathers. This gave the king so much concern that he took to his bed and refused his food; but when his wife, the notorious Jezebel, understood the cause of his trouble, she bade him be of good cheer, for she would procure him the vineyard. Some time after Naboth was, at a public feast, accused of blasphemy, by an order from her under the royal seal, and, being condemned through the testimony of false witnesses, was stoned to death, according to the law, outside the town (Lev. xxiv:16; Num. xv:30). By a custom, which had grown up, his estate was forfeited to the crown.

When Ahab heard of the death of Naboth—and he must have known how that death had been accomplished, or he would not have supposed himself a gainer by the event—he hastened to take possession. But he was speedily taught that this horrible crime had not passed without notice by the all-seeing God, and would not remain unpunished by his justice. The only tribunal to which he remained accountable pronounced his doom through the prophet Elijah, who met him on the spot, 'In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine' (1 Kings xxi; xxii:34-38; 2 Kings ix:30-37).

NACHON (nā'chōn), (Heb. נַחֲוֹן, naw-kone', prepared).

The floor of Nachon is the name given to the threshing-floor near which Uzzah was slain, for laying his hand upon the ark (2 Sam. vi:6). It is doubted whether this be a proper name, denoting the owner of the floor, or merely an epithet applied to it, i. e., 'the prepared floor,' which in that case it would signify.

NACHOR (nā'chōr), (Gr. Ναχώρ, nay-kore, an ancestor of Jesus, Luke iii:34; Josh. xxiv:2). (See NAHOR.)

NADAB (nā'dāb), (Heb. נָדָב, naw-dawb, liberal; Sept. Ναδάβ, nah-dab', Nadab).

1. The eldest son of Aaron, who, with his brother Abihu, was slain for offering strange fire to the Lord (Exod. vi:23). (See ABIHU.)

2. Son of Jeroboam, and second king of Israel. He ascended the throne upon the death of his father (B. C. 913), whose deep-laid, but criminal and dangerous policy, he followed. He was engaged in the siege of Gibbethon, a city of the Levites (of which the Philistines had obtained possession), when he was slain in the camp in a conspiracy formed against him by Baasha, one of his officers, who mounted the throne in his stead. He reigned two years (1 Kings xiv:20; xv:25-28).

3. The first of the two sons of 'hammai, of Judah (1 Chron. ii:28, 30), B. C. after 1618.

4. One of the eight sons of Jehiel, founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. viii:30; ix:36), B. C. about 1013.

NADABATH (nād'ā-hāth), an unidentified place east of the Jordan (1 Macc ix:37).

NAGGE (nag'ge), (Gr. Naggal, nang-gah-ee', for Heb. נגג, no'gah, 1 Chron. iii:7), son of Maath, an ancestor of Christ in the maternal line (Luke iii:25), corresponding to Neariah of 1 Chron. iii:22, 23. (B. C. 350.)

NAHALAL (nā-ha'lāl) (Heb. נחלל, nah-hal-aw'), a town in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh xix:15), which was assigned to the Levites (Josh xxi:35), but of which Zebulun was slow in dispossessing the Canaanites (Judg. i:30). It has been identified with Mahlul and 'Ain Māhil, four miles northeast of Nazareth.

NAHALIEL (na-hā'li-el), (Heb. נחליאל, nakh-al-ee-ale', valley of God), an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxi:19), probably on one of the northern tributaries of the Arnon. Not identified. (See WANDERING, THE).

NAHALLAL (na-hāl'lal), (Josh. xxi:35). See NAHALAL.

NAHALOL (nā-ha'lōl), (Heb. נחלול, nah-hal-ole'), a form of Nahalal (Judg. i:30). A Levitical city in Zebulun, retained by the Canaanites, near Kattath and Dimnah. Now called Mahlul.

NAHAM (nā'hām), (Heb. נחם, nakh'am, consolation), according to the A. V. a brother of Hodiah, the second wife of Mered (1 Chron. iv:10). B. C. after 1612, or else the father of Keilah, the Garmite.

NAHAMANI (na-hām'a-ni) (Heb. נחמני, nakh-am-aw-nee, comforter or compassionate), one of the Jews or twelve heads of the Jewish community who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii:7), B. C. 536.

NAHARAI (na-hār'a-i), (1 Chron. xi:39). See NAHARI.

NAHARAIM (nā'ha-rā'im). See ARAMNAHARAIM.

NAHARI (nā'ha-rī), (Heb. נהרי, nakh-ar-ah'ee, snorer), a Berothite chieftain under David, and Joab's armor-bearer (2 Sam. xxiii:37; 1 Chron. xi:39), B. C. 1013.

NAHASH (nā'hāsh), (Heb. נחש, naw-khawsh, a serpent).

1. A person named only in 2 Sam. xvii:25; and as he is there described as the father of Abigail and Zeruiah, who are elsewhere called the sisters of David, this must have been either another name for Jesse, or, as some suppose, of a former husband of David's mother. Three answers may be given to the puzzling question: (1) The universal tradition of the rabbis, that Nahash and Jesse were identical. (2) The explanation first put forth by Dr. Stanley, that Nahash was the king of the Ammonites, and that the same woman had first been his wife or concubine—in which capacity she had given birth to Abigail and Zeruiah—and afterward wife to Jesse, and the mother of his children. (3) A third possible explanation is that Nahash was the name, not of Jesse, nor of a former husband of his wife, but of his wife herself (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

2. King of the Ammonites, noted for the barbarous terms of capitulation which he offered to the town of Jabesh-Gilead, and for his subsequent defeat by Saul. (See JABESH.) It was natural that the enemy of Saul should be friendly to David; and we find that he did render to the latter, during his persecutions, some acts of kindness, which the monarch did not forget when he ascended the throne of Israel (2 Sam. x:2; 1 Chron. xix:2).

NAHATH (nā'hāth), (Heb. נחא, nakh'ath, rest, quiet).

1. The first of the four sons of Reuel, son of Esau, and an Edomite duke or prince (Gen. xxxvi:13, 17), B. C. 1890.

2. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Chron. vi:26), B. C. 1280. The same as Tohu (1 Sam. i:1) and Toah (1 Chron. vi:34).

3. A Levite who had charge of the sacred tithes and offerings under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:13). B. C. 725.

NAHBI (nā'h'bi), (Heb. נבוי, nakh-bee', hidden), a son of Vophsi, sent as a representative of the tribe of Naphtali to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:14), B. C. 1657.

NAHOR (nā'hôr), (Heb. נחור, naw-khore', snorting).

1. The better form is Nachor, as in Luke iii:34, son of Serug, and father of Terah, the father of Abraham (Gen. xi:22-25). He lived 148 years (B. C. before 2300).

2. Grandson of the preceding, being one of the sons of Terah, and brother of Abraham. Nahor espoused Milcah his niece, daughter of his eldest brother Haran (Gen. xi:27-29). Nahor did not quit his native place, 'Ur of the Chaldees,' when the rest of the family removed to Haran (Gen. xi:30); but it would appear that he went thither afterwards, as we eventually find his son Bethuel, and his grandson Laban, established there (Gen. xxvii:43; xxix:5).

NAHOR, CITY OF.

To Biblical students, Haran is best known as the city of Nahor, the designation which it receives in Gen. xxiv:10. It was the city where Abraham's brother Nahor lived with his son Laban, where Terah and Abraham made their home after they left the land of the Chaldees, where Terah died, and whence Abraham was called to go into Canaan. As the city of Abraham's sojourn, it has interest by no means second to Ur of the Chaldees. Assyrian studies have given great interest to this country, and Schrader, Hommel, Delitzsch and Winckler have, during the last few years, devoted much investigation to this region. A paper on Haran, published this year by the latter scholar, is especially important.

Haran is called Charran in the Septuagint, and Harran with the rough H in the Babylonian inscriptions. It was evidently an important place commercially, as its hieroglyph is made by two roads crossing, implying that it was the crossing-place of two caravan routes. It was the chief city of what was called Mesopotamia, not so much because it lay between the Tigris and the Euphrates, as because it was included in the angle between the two rivers, Euphrates and Habor, the principal affluent of the Euphrates. In its widest extent Mesopotamia did not include the whole of the region between the Tigris and the Euphrates, only this northern, or rather middle part, while the southern part was Babylonia, and we might call Padan-Aram, North Mesopotamia.

We are apt to think of Nineveh and Babylon as the two great capitals of the East, and to suppose that in old times there were no great kingdoms but the two of which they were the capitals. This is a great mistake. Assyria was of importance only for some six or eight hundred years, before and after which it did not exist, nor did its capital city. We now know that, for at least a thousand years before there was any Nineveh, Harran, a more correct form than Haran, was one of the most powerful capitals of the East.

The oldest capital of Southern Babylonia was Ur. Its age goes back perhaps 4000 years B. C. It was nearly or quite 4000 B. C. when the Southern Babylonian power arose, and it extended its power and culture all the way to the Phœnician Coast. Seals belonging to this chiliarad have been found even in Cyprus. The astrological tablets ascribed to the ancient Sargas I, whose date is put at 3800 B. C., mention the lands of the West and distinctly refer to Harran. Cedar wood was rafted down the Euphrates in the time of Gudea, about 3500 B. C., brought from the region of Mount Lebanon or Amanus.

From its own monuments we know nothing of the history of Mesopotamia, and its chief city, Harran. None of the mounds in this region have as yet been excavated; what we know of these important sites is wholly from the records of the neighboring kingdoms.

From these we learn that the title "Kings of the World," the favorite designation of the kings of Assyria, was first assumed by the kings of Harran and adopted by Ramman-Nirari I, about 1400 B. C. on his conquest of what had been the much more powerful kingdom whose capital was Harran. This was a chiliarad of great importance in eastern history. It was between 2000 and 1000 B. C. that the Kassites conquered and held Babylonia, that the Hittites and the Aramians took possession of Syria, that the Assyrian empire was established, and that the Egyptians made their great campaigns in Asia. It was in the latter part of this period that Assyria finally conquered the earlier kingdom of Mesopotamia and took Harran.

To Sin, the moon god of Harran, the Assyrians gave the second place of honor in their pantheon, next after their own god, Assur. This shows the influence of Harran and the honor in which it was held.

When Shalmaneser II (800 B. C.) wished to restore the kingdom of Assyria to the power it had held 500 years before under Shalmaneser I, he rebuilt the temple of Sin at Harran, regarding it as a royal city. A curious illustration of the honor in which Harran was held is supplied by an inscription of the time of Assur-bani-pal, the last great king of Assyria. A scribe, Marduksum-usser, writes to the king:

"When the father of the king, my lord, made an expedition into Egypt, he went to the temple in Harran, built of cedar wood. Sin was sitting on his throne with his head bowed. Two royal crowns were on his head. Nusku waited upon him. The father of the king, my lord, entered in.

"Sin raised his head and spoke: 'Go forward, and thou shalt conquer the land.'

"He went forward, and he conquered Egypt. The remaining lands which Assur and Sin have not conquered will the king, the lord of kings, conquer. By the command of Assur, Sin, Shamas (Chemosh) and the other gods shall he sit on a throne of generations."

If Assur, the god of Assur, the first capital of Assyria, was put at the head of the Assyrian pantheon, Sin was put next, because Assyria did not become a kingdom until it had incorporated Mesopotamia, with its capital city, Harran, and adopted its god Sin.

After the fall of Assyria, Mesopotamia, of course, fell to Babylonia. When the last king of Babylon, Nabonidus, was in danger of losing Mesopotamia by the inroad of the Scythians, who had already invaded Media and Assyria, he attempted to propitiate the gods by rebuilding the temple of Sin in its old glory.

We find, then, that in the very oldest times known to us there was in Mesopotamia, or that northern part of Mesopotamia included in the angle of the Euphrates and the Habor valleys, called in Genesis Padan-Aram, or Plain of Aram, a kingdom whose capital city was Harran, the Biblical Haran. The difference in spelling comes from the fact that the Hebrew language cannot double the letter r. We find its tutelary god worshiped in Babylonia as early as 3500 B. C. We find it mentioned several times in an astrological work which was in existence in the second chiliarad B. C. When the Assyrian power arose it became united with the latter, and was so in the time of Shalmaneser I, about 1300 B. C. The advance of the Hittite and other powers reduced the realm of Assyria, but Tiglath-pileser I (about 1100 B. C.) again extended his limits so that Mesopotamia was permanently incorporated with Assyria until the overthrow of the empire by Nabopolassar.

Assyria gave no especial culture to the world, but borrowed what she had from Babylonia and Padan-Aram, both older kingdoms, with established art and religion, and it was by union with the latter and by its help that Assyria conquered all the regions about, north to the Black Sea and west to the Mediterranean. (See ASSYRIA, Literature; ASSYRIAN AND BABYLONIAN LIBRARIES.)

This gives us a new point of view to consider the development of civilization in the entire region occupied by the Phœnicians, Syrians and Hittites, including the descendants of Abraham.

We see what a distinguished political ancestry the Hebrew had, coming first from Ur of the Chaldees, the capital of the earliest South Babylonian kingdom, and then from Harran, the capital of the nearly equally old and powerful Mesopotamian kingdom. From these two cities he brought the best education and civilization of the ancient world; and we can see how reasonable it was for Abraham, Isaac and Jacob to seek wives for their sons among their own kindred, instead of among the inferior races around them. (City of Nahor, by William Hayes Ward, D. D., Hom. Rev., Oct., 1894.) (See HARAN.)

NAHSHON (näh'shon), (Heb. נַחֲשׁוֹן, nakh-shone', enchanter), from which he is called Naason in the genealogies of Christ in Matt. i:4; Luke iii:32, son of Aminadab, and prince or chief of the tribe of Judah, at the time of the exode (Num. i:7; ii:3; vii:12, 17; x:14).

The chiefs of tribes, of which Nahshon was one, took an important and leading part in the affairs of the Israelites, as described in the article TRIBES. (B. C. 1657.)

NAHUM (nā'hum), (Heb. נָחֻם, nakh-oom', consolation), the seventh of the minor prophets, according to the arrangement of both the Greek and Hebrew, but the sixth in point of date, was a native of Elkosh, a village of Galilee (Jerome's Prof. to his Comment.).

He prophesied in Judah after the deportation of the ten tribes, and soon after the unsuccessful irruption of Sennacherib (ch. i:11-13; ii:1, 14), consequently towards the close of the reign of Hezekiah. Attempts have been made to fix the date with precision, from the allusion to the destruction of No-Ammon or Thebes in Egypt (ch. iii:8); but as it is uncertain when this event took place, Eichhorn and others have conjectured that it was near the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, or about B. C. 735, as about this time Sargon, king of Assyria, waged an unsuccessful war for three years against Egypt (Is. xx). (See EGYPT.)

NAHUM, PROPHECY OF.

(1) Contents. The contents of the prophecy of Nahum are as follows: Chap. i:2-7. The destruction of Nineveh and of the Assyrian monarchy is depicted in the liveliest colors, together with the relief of Judah from oppression. The destruction of Nineveh is detailed with still greater particularity in the third chapter; which has induced some to suppose that the prophet refers to two different events—the sack of Nineveh by the Medes, B. C. 867, in the reign of Sardanapalus, and its second and final destruction, under Chyniladan, by Cyaxares the First and Nabopolassar (B. C. 606). Those who suppose that two events are here alluded to, conclude that Nahum must have prophesied before the first destruction of Nineveh, or about B. C. 877. It is, however, observed by Jahn (Introd.) that it is evident from ch. i:9-11, 14; ii:1, 14, where the Hebrews are represented as oppressed by the Assyrians, and the irruption of Sennacherib is mentioned as having already taken place, that there is but one event referred to, namely, the last destruction of Nineveh. De Wette remarks that Nahum could not have alluded to the historical circumstances under which Nineveh was taken by Cyaxares and Nabopolassar (B. C. 625, 603, or 600), as at that time Babylon, not Assyria, was formidable to the Jews, but that perhaps he was led to prophesy by the liberation of the Medes (from the Assyrians), and 'their election of a king, in the person of De-joces.'

The beauty of the style of Nahum has been universally felt. It is classic, observes De Wette, in all respects. It is marked by clearness, by its finished elegance, as well as by fire, richness and originality. The rhythm is regular and lively.

(2) Style. The whole book is remarkably coherent, and the author only holds his breath, as it were, in the last chapter. Jahn observes that the language is pure, with a single exception (ch. iii:17), that the style is ornate, and the tropes bold and elegant (rendering it, however, necessary for the reader to supply some omissions; see ii:8; iii:3, 16); and that the descriptions of the divine omnipotence, and of the destruction of Nineveh, are resplendent with all the perfection of oratory. No one, however, has entered more fully into the beauties of the prophet Nahum than the accomplished Eichhorn, who conceives that the most striking characteristic of his style is the power of representing several phases of an idea in the briefest sentences, as in his description of God, the conquest of Nineveh, and the destruction of No-Ammon. 'The variety in his manner of presenting ideas discovers much poetic talent in the prophet. The reader of taste and sensibility will be affected by the entire structure of the poem, by the agreeable manner in which the ideas are brought forward, by the flexibility of the expressions, the roundness of his turns, the delicate outline of his figures, by the strength and delicacy, and the expression of sympathy and greatness, which diffuse themselves over the whole subject. He does not come upon you roaring and violent, nor yet softly and lightly. Here there is something sonorous in his language, there something murmuring; and with both there alternates somewhat that is soft, delicate and melting, as the subject demands. This is not possible for a poet of art, but only for the poet of nature' (De Wette's Introd. English transl.). (Edwards, Notes in Bib. Sacr. 1848, p. 551 sq.; Keil, Inter. O. T.)

NAIL (nāil). There are two Hebrew words thus translated in the Auth. Vers., which it may be well to distinguish:

1. (נָוִי, yaw-thade'), which usually denotes a peg, pin, or nail, as driven into a wall (Ezek. xv:3; Is. xxii:25); and more especially a tent pin driven into the earth to fasten the tent (Exod. xxvii:19; xxxv:18; xxxviii:31; Is. xxxiii:20; liv:2). Hence, to drive a pin, or to fasten a nail, presents among the Hebrews an image of a fixed dwelling, a firm and stable abode (Is. xxii:23). It was a tent pin which Jael drove into the temples of Sisera (Judg. iv:21, 22).

2. (מַסְמָרֵי, mas-mare'), which, with some variations of form, is applied to ordinary and ornamental nails. It always occurs in the plural, and is the word which we find in 1 Chron. xxii:3; 2 Chron. iii:9; Is. xli:7; Jer. x:4; Eccles. xii:11. Nails are mentioned in the accounts of the crucifixion (John xx:25; Col. ii:14).

Figurative. (1) Eliakim, and Jesus Christ, as prefigured by him, are likened to a "nail in a sure place, for hanging of vessels on," which is typical of something firm and strong. God made Eliakim the Jewish minister of state, and on him did the subordinate rulers and the people depend. God established Jesus in the office of Mediator, and on him do all the persons of the elect, and all their privileges, graces, and duties, and all the oracles of God, and ordinances and government of the church depend (Is. xxii:23-25). (2) The "nail" that came forth of Judah is either Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, or the Maccabees, who established the Jewish state; or rather Jesus Christ, who connects and establishes his church, and bears her and all her concerns (Zech. x:4). (3) The words of the wise are as "nails fastened;" the truths of God fixed in the heart remain there perpetually, and make the soul cleave to Jesus, and his church and ordinances (Eccles. xii:11). (4) The "nails of brass," which Daniel's fourth beast had, denotes the covetous robbery and ravage of the Romans, and their power to retain their conquered provinces (Dan. vii:19). (5) Christ's "nailing" of the ceremonial law to his cross imports, that by his death he fulfilled the signification thereof, and has abolished its binding force (Col. ii:14).

NAIL OF THE FINGER (nāil öv the ün'gër,) (Heb. נִסְפוֹרֵן, tsip-po'ren, Deut. xxi:12), like cutting the hair, the paring of the nails—both signs of purification—was a symbol of a captive slave passing out of servitude and being received into communion with the covenant nation.

In Jer. xvii:1 (marg.) "nail" is the rendering of the same Hebrew word, and means the "point" of a stylus or a metallic pen. In Dan. iv:33; vii:19 (Chald. ܬܝܦܐ, tef-ar'), occurs of the claws of a bird or beast (Mc. & S. Bib. Cy.; Barnes, Bib. Dict.).

NAIN (nā'in), (Gr. Nalv, nah-in', pleasantness, beauty), a town of Palestine, mentioned only in the New Testament, as the place where Jesus raised the widow's son to life (Luke vii:11-17).

Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. title "Nain") describe it as not far from Endor. As its name has always been preserved, it was recognized by the crusaders, and has been often noticed by travelers up to the present day. It has now dwindled to a small hamlet called Nein, which is situated about three miles south by west from Mount Tabor. Another Nain in the south of the land east of the Jordan was fortified by Simon Bar Giora (Joseph. Wars of the Jews, iv:9, 4).

"The story of Nain has been told in the simplest and most touching manner by the evangelist. Every word is a picture." (Hugh MacMillan, Hastings' Bib. Dict.). The place where the young man was raised to life is beautiful, overlooking the great plains of Esdraelon, the wooded hills of Galilee. The snow-capped Hermon and Lebanon ranges are in full view. A small modern church has been built on the site of the old city.

NAIOTH (nā'yoth), (Heb. נַיֹּוֹת, nev-aw-yoth', dwellings).

A place in or near Ramah, where Samuel abode with his disciples (1 Sam. xix:18, 19, 22, 23; xx:1). Naioth does not appear to have been a distinct town or village; and we are willing to accept the explanation of R. Isaiah and other Jewish commentators, who state that Ramah was the name of a hill, and Naioth of the place upon it.

NAKED (nā'kēd), (Heb. עָרְוָה, er-vaav', nudity; Gr. γυμνος, goom'nos), 'naked' in our Bibles, does not in many places mean absolute nakedness.

(1) Nudity. It has this meaning in such passages as Job i:21; Eccles. v:15; Mic. i:8; Amos ii:16).

(2) Ragged or Poorly Clad. But in other places it means one who is ragged or poorly clad (John xxi:7; Is. lviii:7), in the same sense as γυμνός in James ii:15; which does not indeed differ from a familiar application of the word 'naked' among ourselves.

(3) Slightly Clad. A more peculiar and Oriental sense of the word is that in which it is applied to one who has laid aside his loose outer garment, and goes about in his tunic. When, therefore, Saul is described as having lain down 'naked' (1 Sam. xix:24), we are to understand that he had laid aside his flowing outer robe, by which his rank was most indicated, and was therefore a king 'naked' or undressed.

(4) Naked and Barefoot. It was thus that Isaiah went 'naked' and barefoot (Is. xx:2; comp. John xxi:7). The point of the expression may be the better apprehended when we mention that persons in their own houses freely lay aside their outer garment, and appear in their tunic and girdle; but this is undress, and they would count it improper to appear abroad, or to see company in their own house, without the outer robe.

Figurative. (1) Destitute of innocence, holiness and righteousness, inherent or imputed, and hence exposed to shame and misery (Rev. iii:17, 18). (2) Deprived of the divine favor and protection, and ready to be a prey to their enemies (Exod. xxxii:25; 2 Chron. xxviii:19). Before the fall there was no sinful, shameful, or hurtful nakedness; as there were no sinful dispositions, no part of the human body was improper for view; but sin entering, they knew they were naked, that they were become unholy and unrighteous; and they needed a covering for those parts of their body afterwards called "nakedness" (Gen. iii:7, 10, 11; ix:22). (3) The "nakedness" of the soul lies in being without holiness and righteousness, but sinful before God (Rev. iii:18). (4) The "nakedness" of a land, is the poverty, weakness and ruinous condition thereof; or its shameful wickedness (Ezek. xvi:8, 36, 37). (5) Going "naked," or almost so, was an emblem of distress and deprivation of comfort (Is. xx:3; Mic. i:8).

NAMES (nāms), (Heb. שֵׁם, shame; Gr. ὄνομα, on-on-ah).

It is so interesting, as well as useful, to know the original signification of proper names, that a careful investigation of their nature has many advantages. The chief use, however, which accrues from an accurate knowledge of them is, that we are by their means enabled to attain a more lively apprehension of the truth of ancient history.

1. Two Classes. There are two chief classes of proper names, those of men, and those of everything besides man, as beasts, places and festivals. Those of the latter class are much more durable in their form, as man alone is always changing; they are also important for history, and it is desirable to ascertain, as far as possible, their original signification. But the proper names of the changeable races of men are in a much higher degree those in which history reflects itself in its vicissitudes; they also constitute the more numerous class. For these reasons we confine ourselves at present to the proper names of men, as it is beyond our present scope to treat the entire subject.

2. Simplicity in Use of Names. The first fact that strikes us, on a general view of them all, is that the ancient Hebrews always retained the greatest simplicity in the use of names. In reality, there is always only one single name which distinguishes a person. Where it is necessary, the name of the father is added; sometimes that of the mother instead, in case she happens to be more celebrated; or the line of descent is traced farther back, often to the fourth generation, or even farther. Mere epithets, like 'David the king,' 'Isaiah the prophet,' always express the actual and significant dignity of a man. The instances in which a person receives two names alternately, as Jacob-Israel, Gideon-Jerubbaal (Judg. vi-ix), are casual and rare, and are not to be ascribed to a general custom of the people.

3. Three Periods. When we, then, consider proper names with reference to the grand distinction of times, we are able to discover in their varying use nearly the same three periods as those which mark the history of this people in all other respects. These are the three periods which are most simply defined by the three different names of the nation which prevailed in each—the Hebrews, as they were called in early times, gradually adopted the name of Israelites in the middle period, and exchanged this name, in the third, for that of Jews. It is a remarkable, but nevertheless true, coincidence that, just as the name of the nation varies in these three periods, the color of the names of individuals changes in like manner, according to the different tendencies characterizing the times.

(1) First Period. In the first period, which, for reasons adduced below, we here limit by the commencement of the Mosaic religion, we are able to see the whole process according to which names are formed among this people; the distinct character of the formation of names which was established in this primitive time, continues essentially the same in the succeeding period, while the elements of which names are formed undergo a partial change. For this reason we may explain the laws of this formation in terms of merely general application. Now names are either simple or compound words, or also words which arise from either of these kinds by derivation.

(a) The simple names exist in great abundance, and their signification as to the mere word itself, is generally evident; as 'judge,' the Latin dexter, an ancient name, according to Gen. xlvi:10; 1 Chron. ii:27; 'desired,' also an ancient name according to Gen. xlvi:10; comp. xxxvi:37; 'hero,' 1 Kings iv:19. Thus most of them express an honorable sense; although examples are not wanting of the direct contrary, as 'crooked' (2 Sam. xxiii:26).

(b) The compound names, however, are more important for history, because they express more complete and distinct ideas than the simple names. Some of them are altogether isolated, as properly 'serpent's mouth,' the grandson of Aaron; the son of Jacob; Oholiab (Exod. xxxi:6), 'father's tent,' a name resembling the Greek Patrocles. But most of them bear a general resemblance to each other, and follow in shoals certain dominant opinions and customs; and these last are what we must particularly consider here.

A great number of them owe their origin to the relations of the house, as the sense of the first word of the compound shows. Most of these have the word abi, 'father,' for their first member, as Abiezer, Abital, Abigail. The prevalent opinion among modern scholars respecting this class is that they are really epithets, which have afterwards, as it were casually, become proper names; that Abigail, for example, is literally 'father of joy,' or 'whose father is joy,' that this means cheerful, and thus became a proper name.

Another but a smaller class consists of names compounded with אָמ, am, 'people,' resembling the many Greek compositions with λαός lah-os, 'people,' and δῆμος, day'mos; and just as in Greek δῆμος, deme, is placed first or last (Demosthenes, Aristodemos), so also אָמ is at one time found in the first, and at another in the last place; only that, according to the laws of the Semitic language, the sense of one of these positions is exactly the reverse of the other.

Most of the compound names, however, rather endeavor to express a religious sense, and therefore often contain the divine name. As compound names evidently became very general, it is not surprising that, in the infinite multiplication of names to correspond with the infinite multitude of persons, some proper names were at length formed which solely consist of two names of God himself, expressing, as it were, the ineffably holy name to which the person dedicates himself, as Abiel and Eliab, nay, even Eliel (1 Chron. v:24; viii:20; 2 Chron. xxxi:13).

Lastly, many proper names have assumed the derivative syllable i, or ai (which appears to be only dialectically different from i, and is chiefly frequent in the later periods); and we must certainly consider that, in some cases, this syllable may possibly form mere adjectives, and therewith simple names, as 'true man,' from 'truth,' and Barzillai, 'Iron,' or 'Ironman,' the name of a celebrated Gileadite family (Ezra ii:61; 2 Sam. xvii:27).

(2) Second Period. This is the whole principle which regulates the formation of Hebrew names, both as it manifests itself in the earliest times, and as it extends into the succeeding periods, in which it receives new impulses, and undergoes modifications of color but not of substance.

For if we inquire what new element the Mosaic period introduced into names, we find that, on the whole, it is only the influence of the new religion which manifests itself in the strongest characters, and causes extraordinary innovations. It is not in the Psalms only and other books that we discover how deeply this religion affected men; we may also infer it from the names which became current in that period. Nay, it is only these words of common life which render it evident to our senses with what a power this religion penetrated all the depths of the national mind, and how zealously every man in Israel endeavored 'to glory in the name of Jahve,' according to the words of the prophet (Is. xlv:5; comp. Ps. cv:3).

As the whole national life was renovated by so influential a new religion, the mode of giving names returned to its primitive state, since not only were new names created, but entire sentences, of the shortest compass, expressing the mighty thoughts which agitated the times, were also applied as names.

(3) Third Period. This is the type and fashion of the names as late as the times after the first destruction of Jerusalem. The influence of the dispersion among foreign nations may, indeed, be immediately traced in the new names which allude to the captivity, as the name of Zerubbabel (the leader of the restoration), which is a contraction of זְרֻבָבֶל, zer-oo-baw-bel, means 'scattered to Babylon.' Yet this foreign influence is but transient; and in the centuries immediately succeeding the Exile, in which the last books of the Old Testament were written, we find, on the contrary, that the ancient mode of giving names is preserved almost unchanged.

In this respect, however, there is a total difference in the times between the close of the Old and the beginning of the New Testament. For after a purely learned study of the Old Testament had sprung up, and the whole nation only continued to exist in its sacred books, they delighted to give their children the ancient Scriptural names; nay, they sought out such names as had only been common in the times before Moses, and had become obsolete in the long interval: names like Jacob, Joseph, Maria. But while these dead names were revived and zealously sought out, the capability for forming new ones became gradually weaker. And, as the love of novelty still operated, and as the people lost their independence more and more, many foreign names became favorites, and were used equally with the old Biblical names. In this manner the form of names had, by the time of the New Testament, reached a state of development which nearly resembles that prevalent among ourselves.

Lastly, with regard to the Biblical names of individuals belonging to the less eminent nations with which the Israelites were surrounded, such as the Edomites, Phœnicians, Damascenes, etc., their formation indeed is generally very like that of the Hebrew names, inasmuch as all these nations spoke a Semitic language; but the materials of which they are formed are so different, that one can almost recognize these foreign nations by their mere names. Thus names like Hadad, Benhadad, Hadad-ezer, are quite strange to the Israelites, and refer to the tribes to the east of Palestine, where a god named Hadad was worshipped.

G. H. A. v. E.

4. Words Most Frequently Compounded.

There are some words which appear more frequently in compounds of proper names than others, and to which we will refer in passing. Beer means "well" (Beersheba) "well of the oath" (Gen. xxi:31); Beth means "house" (Bethlehem, "house of bread"); En means "fountain" (En-gedi, "fountain of the kid"); El means "God" (Samuel "asked of God," 1 Sam. i:20; Elisha, "God is salvation"). On the other hand, Bath means "daughter" (Bathsheba), while Ben and Bar mean "son" (Benjamin, Barjonas).

5. Name of God. The Name of God was held in a peculiar reverence. To such an extent of superstition is this carried that the modern Jews never pronounce the word "Jehovah," it being considered too sacred. In reading the Old Testament they substitute "Adonai" for it. They misunderstand the passage in Lev. xxiv:16, which forbids the cursing use of "Jehovah," as forbidding the mere naming. An abuse of the name of God is expressly forbidden in the Decalogue (Exod. xx:7; Lev. xix:12). In the New Testament miracles are performed in the name of Jesus (Acts iii:6; iv:10), and they who are baptized are baptized in the name of the Trinity (Matt. xxviii:19).

The two special terms used for God by the Hebrews were "Elohim" and "Jehovah" (or "Javch"). The first contains an allusion to majesty and power; the second refers to God's absolute existence, his eternity and unchangeableness, and means "I am" (Exod. iii:14). God had not been known by this name to Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob (Exod. vi:3).

6. Names of Christ. The many names used of our Lord are all highly significant. Emmanuel ("God with us") points to his incarnation; Jesus ("Savior") to his mission of salvation; Christ ("Anointed") to his appointment as the promised Messiah; Son of Man to his humility; Son of God to his divine origin and character. Amongst the many other names and titles of Christ are Shiloh (Gen. xli:10), the Wonderful, etc. (Is. ix:6), Prophet, High Priest, King, the Word (John i:1, etc.). (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) (See article on JESUS CHRIST; JESUS; GOD.)

7. Names in General. In general the names of men denote: (1) That particular designation by which they are usually called; (2) The persons themselves (Luke x:20; Rev. iii:4; xiii:8); (3) Reputation, good or evil (Deut. xxii:14; Prov. xxii:1); (4) Honor, glory, renown (Deut. xxvi:19; 2 Chron. xxvi:8, 15; Zeph. iii:20); (5) Memory or remembrance (Deut. xxix:20); (6) Posterity, which keeps up one's name or renown (Deut. xxv:7; Is. lxvi:22).

Figurative. "Name," when ascribed to God or Christ, comprehends whatever he makes himself known by. The name of God signifies: (1) himself (Ps. xxix:2; xxxiv:3; lxi:5); (2) his titles (Exod. iii:13, 14; vi:3); (3) his attributes or properties (Exod. xxxiii:19; xxxiv:6, 7); (4) his word (Ps. v:11; Acts ix:15); (5) his worship and service (1 Kings v:5; Mal. i:6); (6) his will and purpose concerning our salvation, and his grace and mercy therein displayed (Ps. xxii:22; John xvii:6, 26); (7) his power, help, and favorable assistance (1 Sam. xvii:45; Ps. xx:1, 7); (8) his wisdom, power, and goodness, displayed in the works of creation and providence (Ps. viii:1, 9); (9) his authority, commission (Mic. v:4); (10) his honor, glory, and renown (Ps. lxxvi:1). The name of Christ denotes: (1) himself, what he really is, Wonderful, mighty God, God with us (Is. vii:14; ix:6); (2) his titles, as Savior, Prophet, Priest, King, etc. (Matt. i:21; Rev. xix:16); (3) his authority and commission (Matt. vii:22; Acts iv:7); (4) his word and gospel, and the profession thereof (Matt. x:22; xix:29; Acts ix:15; Rev. ii:13); (5) his exaltation to the highest honor, power and glory, as our Mediator (Phil. ii:9, 10).

Other Uses. God's "name" is in Christ; his nature and authority are in him; he has sent him to be our Redeemer; and by his execution of his office is his honor chiefly exalted (Exod. xxiii:21). To be baptized "in the name" of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or of Jesus, is to be baptized by the warrant and authority, and into the profession, faith, and obedience of these divine persons, as one God (Matt. xxviii:19; Acts xix:5). To trust or believe "in the name of God" or "Christ," is to credit his word, and rely on his perfections, titles, and relations, as a certain ground of our receiving all blessings and salvation from him (John iii:18). To "name the name of Christ," is openly to profess that we are his, and to regard his honor and service (2 Tim. ii:19). The "new name" that Christ gives, and writes on his people, is the "redeemed of the Lord," the "righteousness of God in him," etc., which answers to their new covenant state, and their new nature; and in heaven their character is made gloriously to appear (Rev. ii:17; comp. Is. lxi:6). God's changing the "name of his church" denotes his changing her condition from distress and grief, to happiness and joy (Is. lxii:3, 4). The saints pray and do all "in the name of Christ" when they do it in the faith of his promise, in obedience to his command, and with a total dependence on his righteousness and intercession for acceptance (John xiv:13; Col. iii:17).

NAOMI (na-ō'mi), (Heb. נָאוֹמִי, nō-om-ee', my pleasantness, delight), wife of Elimelech of Bethlehem, and mother-in-law of Ruth, in whose history hers is involved. (B. C. about 1322-1312.)

Her two sons were Mahlon and Chilion. With her husband and sons, because of a famine in her own country, she went to Moab, where they died. Returning to her native land, she was accompanied by Ruth, who became the wife of Boaz. Upon her return she replied to those asking her, "Is this Naomi?" "Call me not Naomi; call me Mara; for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me." (See RUTH.)

NAPHISH (nā'phish), (Heb. נַפִּישׁ, naf-feesh' refreshed), one of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:15; 1 Chron i:31), B. C. after 1077. The clan which he founded is classed among the Hagarites, who were defeated by the tribes east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v:18-22).

"In all probability it is the descendants of this clan who are mentioned among the Netthinim in Ezra ii:50, as 'the children of Nephusim,' and the Nephishesim" (Neh. vii:52). (J. A. Selbie, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) NAPHTALI (nāph'ta-li), (Heb. נַפְתָּלִי, naf-taw-lee', my wrestling).

1. The sixth son of Jacob, and his second by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, born B. C. 1747, in Padan-Aram; also the tribe of Israel descended from him. Nothing of his personal history is recorded. In the testamentary blessing of Jacob Naphtali is described (Gen. xlix:21), as translated in the Auth. Vers., 'a hind let loose, he giveth goodly words.' The Sept. translators, however, must have found the words rendered 'hind' and 'words' different, for they render the verse, 'Naphtali is a goodly tree (terebinth or oak) that puts forth lovely branches.' We certainly incline to this view of the text; the metaphor which it involves being well adapted to the residence of the tribe of Naphtali, which was a beautiful woodland country, extending to Mount Lebanon, and producing fruits of every sort. With this interpretation, better than with the other, agrees the blessing of Moses upon the same tribe: 'O Naphtali, satisfied with favor, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the west and the south' (Deut. xxxiii:23). When the Israelites quitted Egypt, the tribe of Naphtali numbered 53,400 adult males (Num. i:43), ranking sixth in population among the tribes; but at the census taken in the plains of Moab it counted only 45,400 (Num. xxvi:50), being a decrease of 8,000 in one generation, whereby it became the seventh in point of numbers. The limits of the territory assigned to this tribe are stated in Josh. xix:32-39, which show that it possessed one of the finest and most fertile districts of Upper Galilee, extending from the Lake Gennesareth and the border of Zebulun, on the south, to the sources of the Jordan and the spurs of Lebanon on the north, and from the Jordan, on the east, to the borders of Asher on the west. But it was somewhat slow in acquiring possession of the assigned territory (Judg. i:33). The chief towns of the tribe were Kedesh, Hazor, Harosheth, and Chinnereth, which last was also the name of the great lake afterwards called Gennesareth. In the Hebrew history Naphtali is distinguished for the alacrity with which it obeyed the call to arms against the oppressors of Israel when many other tribes held back (Judg. iv:10; v:18; vi:35; vii:23). In the time of David the tribe had on its rolls 37,000 men fit for military service, armed with shields and spears, under a thousand officers (1 Chron. xii:34).

2. The mountainous district which formed the main part of the territory of Naphtali (Josh. xx:7); answering to "Mount Ephraim" and "Mount Judah."

NAPHTUHIM (naph'tu-him), (Heb. נַפְתּוּחִים, naf-too-kheem', Gen. x:13), a Hamitic race, named third among the seven peoples descended from Mizraim, the second son of Ham (1 Chron. i:11).

NAPKIN (năp'kin), is the translation of the Gr. συνδάριον, sou-dar'ee-on, Luke xix:20; John xi:44; xx:7. It is rendered handkerchief in Acts xix:12, which see.

NARCISSUS (nar-cis'sus), (Gr. Νάρκισσος, nar'-kis-sos), a person of Rome, apparently of some consequence, to the believers of whose household St. Paul sent his greetings (Rom. xvi:11).

Many commentators have supposed this person the same Narcissus who was the freedman and favorite of the Emperor Claudius (Suet. Claud. 28; Tacit. Annal. xii:17). A. D. 55. He was said by Pseudo-Hippolytus to be bishop of Athens, but without foundation.

NARD (nărd). See NERD; SPIKENARD; STACTE.

NATAF (nă-taf), (Heb. נַטַף, naw-tawf'), occurs only once in Scripture, and is translated 'stacte' in the Authorized Version (Ex. xxx:34).

The Greeks called stakte a species of Storax gum, which Dioscorides describes as transparent like a tear and resembling myrrh. This agrees well with the Hebrew name. But Storax does not appear to us to be more satisfactorily proved to be nataf than the former; Stacte is probably myrrh, and its Hebrew original in the above passage, naw-tawf', signifying drops, probably refers to myrrh in tears. The same word (Job xxxvi:27) is used for drops of water.

NATHAN (nă'than), (Heb. נָתָן, naw-thawn', given).

1. A Prophet of the Time of David. When that monarch conceived the idea of building a temple to Jehovah, the design and motives seemed to Nathan so good that he ventured to approve of it without the divine authority; but the night following he received the divine command, which prevented the king from executing this great work (2 Sam. vii:2, sq.; 1 Chron. xvii).

(1) Nathan and David. Nathan does not again appear in the sacred history till he comes forward in the name of the Lord to reprove David, and to denounce dire punishment for his frightful crime in the matter of Uriah and Bath-sheba. This he does by exciting the king's indignation, and leading him to condemn himself, by reciting to him the very striking parable of the traveler and the lamb. Then, changing the voice of a suppliant for that of a judge and a commissioned prophet, he exclaims, 'Thou art the man!' and proceeds to announce the evils which were to embitter the remainder of his reign (2 Sam. xii:1, sq.; comp. Ps. li). The lamentations of the repentant king drew forth some mitigation of punishment; but the troubled history of the remainder of his reign shows how completely God's righteous doom was fulfilled. The child conceived in adultery died; but when Bath-sheba's second son was born, the prophet gave him the name of Jedidiah (beloved of Jehovah), although he is better known by that of Solomon (2 Sam. xii:24, 25). He recognized in this young prince the successor of David; and it was in a great measure through his interposition that the design of Adonijah to seize the crown was unsuccessful (1 Kings i:8, sq.).

(2) Death. Nathan probably died soon after the accession of Solomon, for his name does not again historically occur. It is generally supposed that Solomon was brought up under his care. His sons occupied high places in this king's court (1 Kings iv:5). He assisted David by his counsels when he reorganized the public worship (2 Chron. xxix:25); and he composed annals of the times in which he lived (1 Chron. xxix:29; 2 Chron. ix:29); but these have not been preserved to us. In Zechariah (xii:12) the name of Nathan occurs as representing the great family of the prophets.

2. Son of Attai, of the house of Jerahmeel of Judah (1 Chron. ii:36), B. C. after 1612.

3. A man of Zobah of Syria, and father of one and brother of another of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii:36; 1 Chron. xi:38).

4. The third child born to David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v:14). Through him Mary, the mother of Jesus, was descended from David (Luke iii:31). He was perhaps the father of Solomon's officers, Azariah and Zabud (1 King iv:5), B. C. 1032.

5. A chief man in the company which returned from captivity with Ezra on his second expedition (Ezra viii:16), B. C. 459.

6. A son of Bani, who divorced his foreign wife (Ezra x:39).

NATHANAEL (na-thăn'a-el), (Gr. Ναθανάηλ, nath-an-ah-ale', given of God), a person of Cana in Galilee, who, when informed by Philip that the Messiah had appeared in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, asked, 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?'

But he nevertheless accepted Philip's laconic invitation, 'Come and see!' When Jesus saw him coming he said, 'Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile.' Astonished to hear this from a man to whom he supposed himself altogether unknown, he asked, 'Whence knowest thou me?' And the answer, 'Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee, wrought such conviction on his mind that he at once exclaimed, 'Rabbi, thou art the son of God, thou art the king of Israel' (John i:45-51). It is clear, from the effect, that Nathanael knew by this that Jesus was supernaturally acquainted with his disposition and character, as the answer had reference to the private acts of devotion, or to the meditations which filled his mind, when under the fig-tree in his garden. It is questioned whether Jesus had actually seen Nathanael or not with his bodily eyes. It matters not to the result; but the form of the words employed seems to suggest that he had actually noticed him when under the fig-tree, and had then cast a look through his inward being. All the disciples of John the Baptist named in the first chapter of St. John became apostles; and St. John does not name Bartholomew, nor the other evangelist Nathanael in the lists of the apostles (Matt. x:3; Mark iii:18; Luke vi:14); besides, the name of Bartholomew always follows that of Philip; and it would appear that Bartholomew (son of Tholmai) is no more than a surname. (See BARTHOLOMEW.)

NATHAN-MELECH (nā'than-mē'lech), (Heb. נְתַנְמֶלֶךְ, neth-an't meh'lek, the king is giver), a eunuch in the court of Josiah dwelling in the precincts of the temple (2 Kings xxiii:11), B. C. 628.

NATIONS, DISPERSION OF (nāshūns, dis-pēr-shun ōv).

Under this or some similar designation, it has been the prevalent opinion that the outspreading, which is the entire subject of Genesis, ch. x, and the scattering narrated in ch. xi:1-9, refer to the same event, the latter being included in the former description, and being a statement of the manner in which the separation was effected. From this opinion, however, we dissent.

1. Two Accounts. An unbiased reading of the text appears most plainly to mark the distinctness, in time and character, of the two narratives. The first was universal, regulated, orderly, quiet, and progressive: the second, local, embracing only a part of mankind, sudden, turbulent, and attended with marks of the divine displeasure.

(1) Of Noah's Sons. The former is introduced and entitled in these words:—'Shem, and Ham, and Japheth;—these are the three sons of Noah; and from them was the whole earth overspread.' After the mention of the sons of Japheth it is added, 'From these the isles of the nations were dispersed, in their lands, each to its language, to their families in their nations.' A formula somewhat differing is annexed to the descendants of Ham: 'These are the sons of Ham, (according) to their families, to their tongues, in their lands, in their nations.' The same phrase follows the enumeration of the house of Shem: and the whole concludes with, 'These are the families of the sons of Noah, (according) to their generations, in their nations; and from these the nations were dispersed in the earth after the Flood' (Gen. ix:19; x:5, 20, 31, 32).

(2) After the Confusion of Tongues. The second relation begins in the manner which often, in the Hebrew Scriptures, introduces a new subject. We shall present it in a literality even servile, that the reader may gain the most prompt apprehension of the meaning. 'And it was (col-ha-aretz) all the earth (but with perfect propriety it might be rendered the whole land, country, region, or district); lip one and words one (i. e. the same, similar). And it was in their going forwards that they discovered a plain in the country Shinar; and they fixed (their abode) there.' Then comes the narrative of their resolving to build a lofty tower which should serve as a signal-point for their rallying and remaining united. The defeating of this purpose is expressed in the anthropomorphism, which is characteristic of the earliest Scriptures, and was adapted to the infantile condition of mankind. 'And Jehovah scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth (or land), and they ceased to build the city' ch. xi:2-9. (See ANTHROPOMORPHISM; BABEL, TOWER OF. Also J. Pye Smith's Scripture and Geology, lect. vii, where this characteristic of primeval style is investigated).

2. Ancient History. 'The most ancient history of the human race, perhaps in the world, is a work in Hebrew;' of which the initial portions (Gen. i, ii) are 'a preface to the oldest civil history now extant; we see the truth of them confirmed by antecedent reasoning, and by evidence in part highly probable, and in part certain; but the connection of the Mosaic history with that of the gospel, by a chain of sublime predictions unquestionably ancient, and apparently fulfilled, must induce us to think the Hebrew narrative more than human in its origin, and consequently true in every substantial part of it; though possibly expressed in figurative language (referring to the accounts of the creation and the fall). It is no longer probable only, but it is absolutely certain, that the whole race of man proceeded from Iran (the proper and native name of Persia and some connected regions), as from a center, whence they migrated at first in three great colonies; and that those three branches grew from a common stock, which had been miraculously preserved in a general convulsion and inundation of this globe (Sir William Jones, On the Origin and Families of Nations, Works, ed. by Lord Teignmouth, 8vo. iii:191-196).

From the study of this interesting fragment of antiquity, the following observations have presented themselves:

(1) Nations in Time of Moses. The enumeration comprises only nations existing in the age of Moses, and probably of them only the most conspicuous, as more or less connected with the history of the Israelites. Many nations have been formed in subsequent times, and indeed are still forming, by separation and by combination; these can be considered only as included on the ground of long subsequent derivation. Such are the populations of Eastern Asia, Medial and South Africa, America and Australasia.

(2) Partial Table of Nations. It cannot be affirmed with certainty that we are here presented with a complete Table of Nations, even as existing in the time of Moses. Of each of the sons of Noah, it gives the sons; but of their sons (Noah's great-grandsons) it is manifest that all are not mentioned, and we have no possible means of ascertaining how many are omitted. Thus, of the sons of Japheth, the lines of Gomer and Javan only are pursued; Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras are dropped without any mention of their issue; yet we have evidence that nations of great importance in the history of mankind have descended from them. Ham had four sons; of three of them the sons, or rather clannish or national descendants, are specified; but to Phut, the fourth, no posterity is assigned. Shem had five sons, but the descendants of only two of them are recorded. It cannot be supposed that those whose sequence is thus cut off, died without children; for, as we shall presently see, nations of great historical interest may be traced up to them.

(3) Tribes or Countries. The immediate descendants of Japheth, Ham, and Shem are, except in the instance of Nimrod and a few more, some of which are doubtful, given by names not personal, but designative of tribes or nations, or their countries. Thus, all those terminating in the plural im, and those specified by the gentilial adjective, the Jebusite, the Hivite, etc.

(4) Uncertainty of Names. In attaching the names of nations to those here given, there is sometimes a deep uncertainty. Resemblances in orthographical appearance, or in similarity of sound, are not to be relied on alone; there must be accessory and confirmatory evidence.

(5) Reasons for Migration. We are not warranted in supposing that the families, or clans, or tribes, or however the groups might have been formed, migrated immediately to their respective seats, by any sort of general breaking up. This would presuppose some kind of compulsory enforcement, which neither the nature of the case, nor any intimation in the narrative, warrants us to assume. We may rather conceive that a diversity of movements took place, excited by general conviction of duty and utility; guided in a great measure by patriarchal directions, and strengthened by circumstances which would inevitably occur; such, on the one hand, as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, local inundations, landslips, proof of unwholesomeness in marshy districts, the annoyance of winged insects or other noxious animals—urging to depart from disagreeable or dangerous places; and, on the other hand, attractive peculiarities, new and more convenient situations for pasturage, better soils for the various kinds of agriculture, more pleasing sites for dwellings, the formation of towns, and the security of their inhabitants.

(6) Various Results. The acts of separation and journeying would have specific differences of impulse and performance; they would affect one party and another, more or less, as to time, numbers and rapidity of movement.

3. Enumeration of Nations. The enumeration of the nations is as follows:

(1) Sons of Japheth, the Iapetus of the Greeks.

I. GOMER. This name is traced in the Kimmerii of Homer and Herodotus; the Gomares (Γομαρείς, Josephus, Antiq. i:6), whence Kelts, Gauls, Galatians; the Kymry; all the Celtic and Iberian tribes, Welsh, Gaelic, Irish, Breton; the Cimmeric Bosphorus, Crimea.

Sons of Gomer:

(1) Ashkenaz, Axeni, inhabitants of the southern coasts of the Euxine Sea, where we find a country Askania, and a river Askanian, and a large part of Armenia; the Basques in the north of Spain; the Saxons, as the Jews interpret Ashkenaz, in Jer. li:27, to be Germany.

(2) Riphath (Diphath, 1 Chron. i:6, a permutation of D and R, not unexampled). Rifon, east of the Euxine; Tobata and other parts of Paphlagonia; Croatia; the Riphæan mountains, a very obscure name in ancient geography (Strabo, Virgil, Pliny, Mela), referring probably to the great chains of mountains from the north of Asia westwards (Hyperboræans, Steph. Byzant.), and therefore including vague knowledge of the Uralian, Hartz, and Alpine regions.

(3) Togarmah. Peoples of Armenia and other parts of the Caucasian region. The Armenian traditions assign as their ancestor Haik, the son of Torgon and grandson of Noah.

II. MAGOG. In Ezekiel this seems to be used as the name of a country, and Gog that of its chieftain. The Mongoles, Moguls; the great Tartar nation.

III. MADAI. The Medes; people of Iran, to whom the Sanscrit language belonged; primeval inhabitants of Hindustan.

IV. JAVAN. The Greeks, Asiatic and European. Jaones (Homer, Iliad, xiii:685).

Sons of Javan:

(1) Elisha. Greeks especially of the Peloponnesus; Hellas; Elis, in which is Alisium (Ἀλιεῖον, Iliad, ii, 617).

(2) Tarshish. The east coast of Spain, where the Phœnician Canaanites afterwards planted their colony.

(3) Kittim. Inhabitants of the isles and many of the coasts of the Mediterranean, particularly the Macedonians and the Romans, and those farther to the west.

(4) Dadanim (Rhodanim, 1 Chron. i:7). Dodona, a colony from which probably settled at the mouths of the Rhone, Rhodanus.

To this Javanian (Ionian) branch is attributed the peopling of 'the isles of the nations' (verse 5), a frequent Hebrew denomination of the western countries to which the Israelites, Tyrians, Egyptians, etc., had access by sea.

(2) Sons of Ham. The word signifies heat or hot, alluding to the climes which the most of his posterity were to occupy; it was also an indigenous name of Egypt.

I. CUSH. The Ethiopians, first on the Arabian side of the Red Sea, then colonizing the African side, and subsequently extending indefinitely to the west, so that Cushite (Jer. xiii:23) became the appellation of a negro.

Sons of Cush:

(1) Seba. Joined with Mizraim and Cush (Is. xliii:3), evidently denoting contiguity and affinity. This tribe or class is probably referred to Suba, a native name of Meroe upon the Nile, in the farthest south of Egypt, or the beginning of Ethiopia.

(2) Havilah. Of this word vestiges are found in various names of places in Western Arabia, and the adjacent parts of Africa. It is quite distinct from the Havilah (Gen. ii:11) in or near Armenia, and probably from another (verse 29) in Arabia, unless we suppose a union of tribes, or one succeeded by the other.

(3) Sabtah. Sabota or Sabbathata is the name of an ancient trading town of Arabia.

(4) Raamah. Sept. Rhegma (Alex. Rheghma), which, changing ε into η, is the name of a port which the Ægypto-Greek geographer Claudius Ptolemy (who flourished in the earlier part of the second century) places on the Arabian coast of the Persian Gulf. To this place Dr. Baumgarten (Kiel, 1843) refers the name; others take it to be Reama, a town of considerable importance in the southwestern part of Arabia the Happy, whose inhabitants are remarkably black; mentioned along with Sheba in Ezek. xxvii:22, as a place of rich Oriental traffic.

Two sons of this Raamah are mentioned, Sheba and Dedan. We find these in the subsequent Scriptures distinguished for trade and opulence (Ps. lxxii:10, 15; 1 Kings x:1; Is. lx:6; Ezek. xxvii:15, 20, 22). They both lie in the western part of Arabia. The queen of Sheba came to the court of Solomon. Dedan is not improbably considered as the origin of Aden, that very ancient seaport and island at the mouth of the Arabian Gulf or Red Sea, which has very recently risen into new importance.

(5) Nimrod, an individual (See NIMROD). He built, besides Babel, his metropolis, three cities or towns in the great plain of Shinar—Erech, Accad, and Calneh. These were probably Aracca, or Arecha, on the Tigris; (some think Edessa); Sacada, near the confluence of the Lycus and the Tigris; and the third (Calno, Is. x:9) Chalonitis of the Greeks, afterwards called Ctesiphon, but much obscurity lies upon these conjectures.

II. MIZRAIM, literally the two Egypts, the upper and the lower; each was called Misr, a word even now vernacular in that country. Of his descendants seven are specified under plural national names, some of which are well ascertained.

(1) Ludim. Ludites, celebrated as soldiers and archers (Is. lxvi:19; Jer. xlvi:9; Ezek. xxvii:10; xxx:5), and in those passages connected with other peoples known to be African. The Ludim probably lay towards Ethiopia. They must not be confounded with the Lydians of Asia Minor (ver. 22).

(2) Ananim. Very uncertain. Bochart supposes them to have been wandering tribes about the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where was an ancient people called Nasamones.

(3) Lehabim. Perhaps inhabitants of a coast-district immediately west of Egypt. Probably the Lubim of 2 Chron. xii:3 and Nahum iii:9.

(4) Pathrusim. The people of the Thebaid (Pathros) in Upper Egypt.

(5) Casluhim, out of whom came Philistim. A people on the northeast coast of Egypt, of whom the Philistines were a colony, probably combined with some of the Caphtorim.

(6) Caphtorim. Inhabitants of the island Cyprus.

III. PHUT. This word occurs in several Scripture passages, always in connection with Africa. Josephus and Pliny mention an African river, Phutes. The great modern archaeologist geographer, Ritter, says that hordes of people have been poured out of Futa, in the interior of Africa.

IV. CANAAN. His descendants came out of Arabia, planted colonies in Palestine, and gradually possessed themselves of the whole country.

His children or posterity:

(1) Sidon, his firstborn, founded the city of that name.

(2) Heth, the ancestor of the Hittites. The remaining nine are well known, and are here laid down in the singular of the patronymic, or patrilial adjective—the Jebusite, the Emorite (Amorite), the Girkashite, the Hivite, the Arkite, the Sinite, the Arvadite, the Zemarite, and the Hamathite. All are assigned to Palestine, and the boundaries of the country are precisely laid down.

(3) Shem, though here introduced last, is declared to be the eldest of the three brothers. The reason of this order evidently is the design of the historian to pursue the line of the favored people which the Divine Sovereign would raise up in the posterity of Shem, and in which, 'when the fullness of the time should come,' 'all the families of the earth should be blessed.'

Children of Shem embrace:

I. ELAM. The ancestor of the Elamites, or Elymæans, who possessed Elymais, a region between Susiana and Media, now called Khusistan. The Japhethian Persians afterwards entered that region and gained the ascendancy, and subsequently they were comprehended under the name of Elam.

II. ASHUR, the ancestor of the Assyrians.

III. ARPHAXAD, a personal name in the Abrahamic line. The word, a remarkable compound, probably denotes Neighboring to the Chasdim, i. e., Chaldæans. The name appears in Arrhaphachitis, a province in Northern Assyria, the primitive seat of the Chasdim, and near to which, or in it, Abraham was born.

Children of Arphaxad are named below.

These are chiefly personal, and contribute to form the sacred pedigree which leads to the Messiah. In this line are mentioned two grandsons:

(1) Peleg, of whom we have treated before, and

(2) Eber. The only circumstance that we can attach to him is the very important one (which seems therefore to imply something extraordinary in his personal history) of being the origin of the name Ebrew, or as it is commonly written, on account of the ו, Hebrew, the 'ancient and universal name of the nation, including Abraham himself (see Ewald's Hebr. Gramm., translated by Dr. Nicholson, p. 2, and our article HEBER).

Eber's son, Joktan, is recognized as the father of the numerous tribes of Arabs in Yemen, Arabia the Happy, so called on account of its spices and other rich products, and to distinguish it from the Rocky and the Desert. Of the founders of those tribes thirteen are specified. The first is evidently Modad, with the Arabic article; the second is Shaleph; and Ptolemy mentions a people of interior Arabia, the Salapeni. Hatzarmaveth is a fruitful district on the south coast, which still bears exactly the same name. That name signifies the Enclosure, Gate, or Court of Death, on account of its insalubrity, arising from the great abundance and mixture of powerful odors. Jerach signifies the moon; and on the west of this region is a gold-producing tract, in which are the Mountains of the Moon, which yet must be distinguished from a group in East Africa, very imperfectly known, and called also by Orientals the Backbone of the World. Hadoram, the Adramites of Ptolemy and Pliny, on the south coast. Uzal, mentioned in Ezek. xxvii:19, which should be translated 'Vedan and Javan (perhaps Yemen?) from Uzal.' The ancient name of a principal city of Yemen, now Sanaha. Obal (Ebal in 1 Chron. i:22), unknown. Abimael, unknown; the meaning is, my father Mael, and Bochart adduces the Mali of Theophrastus and the Minæi of Strabo, a tribe or tribes in Arabia, as possibly intended. Sheba, probably indicating an invasion of this tribe upon the Cushite Sheba and Dedan (Gen. x:7, and see xxv:3). From such mixtures much embarrassment often arises in ethnography. Sheba and Seba (x:7) are often mentioned in the Old Testament as seats of great riches and traffic. Ophir, undoubtedly referring to the seaport in South Arabia so celebrated for its traffic in gold, jewelry, and fine woods. The same name was probably given to places in India and East Africa, to which the mercantile ships of this Arabian Ophir resorted. A part of the south coast of Arabia is called Oman, and in it is a town called El-Ophir, with the article, Havilah; perhaps the Cushite settlers were invaded by this Joktanite tribe. Jobab; Ptolemy mentions a people, Iobarita, on the east coast of Arabia. The r may be a mistake, or a dialectic variety, for b.

These thirteen tribes seem to have formed the confederacy of the independent and unconquerable Arabs, whose peninsular, desert, and mountainous country defended them from invasion; Ishmael and his descendants were united with them.

Our text concludes with describing a boundary line for the country of these tribes 'from Mesha to Sephar.' The former is probably the country Maishon or Mesene, at the northwest head of the Persian Gulf; and the latter, on the southwest coast of Arabia, where is found a Mount Sabber.

IV. LUD. From him the Lydians in Asia Minor derived their name.

V. ARAM. From him the inhabitants of Syria, Chalonitis, and a considerable part of Mesopotamia were descended.

Children or posterity of Aram:

(1) Uz. In the northern part of Arabia, bordering upon Chaldæa; the land of Job.

(2) Hul. The large flat district in the north of Palestine, through which lies the initial course of the Jordan, even now called the land of Hüleh, and in which is the Lake Hüleh, anciently Merom, amply illustrated by Dr. Robinson, Researches, iii:339-357.

(3) Gether. East of Armenia; Carthara was a city on the Tigris.

(4) Mash. A mountain region branching eastward from the great Taurus ridge; the Masian mountains of the Greeks and Romans.

It seems to follow that the only human family after the flood established themselves in the northern parts of Irân; that, as they multiplied, they were divided into three distinct branches, each retaining little at first, and losing by degrees the whole of their common primary language, but agreeing severally on new expressions for new ideas; that the branch of Yafet was enlarged in many scattered shoots over the north of Europe and Asia, diffusing themselves as far as the western and eastern seas, and at length, in the infancy of navigation, beyond them both; that they cultivated no liberal arts, and had no use of letters, but formed a variety of dialects, as their tribes were variously ramified. The children of HAM, who founded in Iran itself the monarchy of the first Chaldeans, invented letters, observed and named the luminaries of the firmament, calculated the known Indian period of 432,000 years, or 120 repetitions of the saros, and contrived the old system of mythology, partly allegorical and partly grounded on idolatrous veneration for their sages and lawgivers; and they were dispersed at various intervals and in various colonies, over land and ocean. The tribes of Misr, Cush and Rama settled in Africa and India, while some of them, having improved the art of sailing, passed from Egypt, Phœnicia and Phrygia, into Italy and Greece, which they found thinly peopled by former emigrants (Japhetians?), of whom they supplanted some tribes and united themselves with others; whilst a swarm from the same hive moved by a northerly course into Scandinavia, and another, by the head of the Oxus and through the passes of the Imaus, into Cashgar and Eighûr, Khatá and Khoten, as far as the territories of Chin and Tancût (an ancient division of China), where letters have been used and arts immemorially cultivated; nor is it unreasonable to believe that some of them found their way from the eastern isles into Mexico and Peru, where traces were discovered of rude literature and mythology analogous to those of Egypt and India. The old Chaldean empire being overthrown by the Assyrians under Cayûmers, other migrations took place, especially into India, while the rest of Shem's progeny, some of whom had before settled on the Red Sea, peopled the whole

Arabian peninsula, pressing close on the nations of Syria and Phœnicia. From all the three families were detached many bold adventurers of an ardent spirit and a roving disposition, who disdained subordination, and wandered in separate clans till they settled in distant isles or in deserts and mountainous regions. NATIVITY OF CHRIST (nâ-tiv'î-tÿ). See CHRISTMAS; JESUS CHRIST.

NATURAL (nât'û-ral).

1. (Heb. טָהוֹר, lay'akh, freshness; Gr. ψυχικός, psoo-khee-kos'), having the nature and characteristics of the principle of animal life. It is that which proceeds from birth and natural causes (1 Cor. xv:44).

2. (Gr. φυσικός, foo-see-kos', produced by nature). That which is agreeable to natural design, form, or inclination (Rom. i:26, 27).

It is recorded of Moses that at his death "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated" (Deut. xxxiv:7). The meaning is his vigor or strength was fully preserved.

NATURAL HISTORY (nât-yu'ral his-to'ry). See various articles on TREE; PLANT; SHRUBS, etc., treated under specific heads.

NATURAL MAN, THE. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. ii:14). (a) Here it is plain that by "the natural man" is not meant a person devoid of natural judgment, reason, or conscience, in which sense the expression is often used among men. (b) Nor does it signify one who is entirely governed by his fleshly appetites, or what the world calls a voluptuary, or sensualist. (c) Neither does it signify merely a man in the rude state of nature, whose faculties have not been cultivated by learning and study, and polished by an intercourse with society. The apostle manifestly takes his "natural man" from among such as the world hold in the highest repute for their natural parts, their learning and their religion. He selects him from among the philosophers of Greece, who sought after wisdom, and from among the Jewish scribes, who were instructed in the revealed law of God (1 Cor. i:22, 23). These are the persons whom he terms the wise, the scribes, the disputers of this world—men to whom the gospel was a stumbling-block and foolishness (1 Cor. i:20, 23). The natural man is here evidently opposed to δ πνευματικός, "him that is spiritual," (1 Cor. ii:15), even as the natural body which we derive from Adam is opposed to the spiritual body which believers will receive from Christ at the resurrection, according to 1 Cor. xv:44, 45. Now the spiritual man is one who has the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him (Rom. viii:9), not merely in the way of miraculous gifts, as some have imagined (for these were peculiar to the first age of the Christian Church, and even then not common to all the saints, nor inseparably connected with salvation, 1 Cor. xiv:1-4), but in his saving influences of light, holiness and consolation, whereby the subject is made to discern the truth and excellency of spiritual things, and so to believe, love and delight in them as his true happiness. If therefore a man is called "spiritual" because the Spirit of Christ dwells in him, giving him new views, dispositions and enjoyments, then the "natural man," being opposed to such, must be one who is destitute of the Spirit, and of all his saving and supernatural effects, whatever may be his attainments in human learning and science. It is obviously upon this principle that our Lord insists upon the necessity of the new birth in order to our entering into the kingdom of heaven (John iii:3, 5). (Watson, Theol. Dict.)

NATURE (nāt'ūre), (Gr. γενεσις, ghen'es-is; φύσις, foo'sis, genus; Lat. nascor, to be born).

1. Philosophical View. According to its derivation, nature should mean that which is produced or born; but it also means that which produces or causes to be born. The word has been used with various shades of meaning, but they may all be brought under two heads—Natura Naturans, Natura Naturata.

(1) Natura Naturans. (a) The Author of nature, the uncreated Being who gave birth to everything that is. (b) The plastic nature or energy subordinate to that of the Deity, by which all things are conserved and directed to their ends and uses. (c) The course of nature, or the established order according to which the universe is regulated.

(2) Natura Naturata. (a) The works of nature, both mind and matter. (b) The visible or material creation, as distinct from God and the soul, which is the object of natural science. "The term nature is used sometimes in a wider, sometimes in a narrower extension. When employed in its most extensive meaning, it embraces the two worlds of mind and matter. When employed in its more restrictive signification, it is a synonym for the latter only, and is then used in contradistinction to the former. In the Greek philosophy, the word φύσις was general in its meaning; and the great branch of philosophy styled 'physical or physiological' included under it not only the sciences of matter, but also those of mind. With us, the term nature is more vaguely extensive than the terms physics, physical, physiology, physiological, or even than the adjective, natural; whereas, in the philosophy of Germany, natur and its correlatives, whether of Greek or Latin derivation, are, in general, expressive of the world of matter in contrast to the world of intelligence." (Sir Wm. Hamilton, Reid's Works, p. 218, note.) (c) Nature as opposed to art, all physical causes, all the forces which belong to physical beings, organic or inorganic. (d) The nature or essence of any particular being or class of beings; that which makes it what it is.

2. Nature Used in Two Senses. "The word nature has been used in two senses—viz., actively and passively; energetic (forma formans) and material (forma formata).

(1) In the first it signifies the inward principle of whatever is requisite for the reality of a thing as existent; while the essence, or essential property, signifies the inner principle of all that appertains to the possibility of a thing. Hence, in accurate language, we say the essence of a mathematical circle or geometrical figure, not the nature, because in the conception of forms, purely geometrical, there is no expression or implication of their real existence.

(2) In the second or material sense of the word nature, we mean by it the sum total of all things, as far as they are objects of our senses, and consequently of possible experience—the aggregate of phenomena, whether existing for our outer senses, or for our inner sense. The doctrine concerning nature would therefore (the word physiology being both ambiguous in itself, and already otherwise appropriated) be more properly entitled phenomenology, distinguished into its two grand divisions, somatology and psychology.

3. Course of Nature. "There is no such thing as what men commonly call the course of nature, or the power of nature. The course of nature, truly and properly speaking, is nothing else but the will of God producing certain effects in a continued, regular, constant, and uniform manner; which course or manner of acting, being in every movement perfectly arbitrary, is as easy to be altered at any time as to be preserved. And if (as seems most probable) this continual acting upon matter be performed by the subserviency of created intelligences appointed for that purpose by the Supreme Creator, then it is easy for any of them, and as much within their natural power (by the permission of God) to alter the course of nature at any time, or in any respect, as it is to preserve or continue it" (Fleming, Vocab. of Phil.).

4. Ambiguity in Use of the Term "Nature." "The word nature only gives rise to ambiguity when we are using it in reference to questions which touch theology. It then becomes necessary to ask whether we employ it or understand it in the sense (1) as the complex of the mechanical and chemical forces of the cosmos, or in the sense (2) which reckons man's will and reason as a part of his φύσις, foo'sis), or in the sense (3) of the true religious conception which ultimately refers every operation of phenomenal force to the Agency of the Supreme Mind directing and ordering it in wisdom" (J. H. Bernard, Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

5. Scriptural Reference. (1) Nature denotes the ordinary course of things which God has ordained in the world (Rom. i:26, 27).

(2) The light of reason naturally implanted in our minds (Rom. ii:14).

(3) Common sense, or the general consent of nations (1 Cor. xi:14).

(4) The substance or essential parts and properties (Heb. ii:16). "For every kind (marg. 'nature') of beasts," etc., "is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind" (marg. "nature of man") (James iii:7).

(5) Birth, or natural descent (Gal. ii:15).

St. Paul in 1 Cor. xiv:10 says: Doth not even nature itself teach you that, if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering.

In 4 Macc. v:7 Antiochus recommends Eleazar to eat swine's flesh on the ground that it is given us by nature. In both of these cases nature is spoken of as a unity and is personified.

In Eph. ii:3 it is said: We are "by nature" children of wrath. Through the gospel promises, we are made "partakers of a divine nature"; we have fellowship with the divine nature, and have divinely implanted in our souls a principle or habit of grace, conformed to God, in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, and holiness (2 Pet. i:4). Idols are "by nature no gods"; they have no self-existence, nothing of the essential perfections of godhead in them (Gal. iv:8).

NATURE or FORCE PLASTIC (nāt'ūre ôr fôrce plās'tic), (Gr. πλασσω, plás'so, to form), was the name given by ancient physiologists to a power to which they attributed the formation of the germs and tissues of organized and living beings.

In opposition to the doctrine of Democritus, who explained all the phenomena of nature by means of matter and motion, and in opposition to the doctrine of Strato, who taught that matter was the only substance, but in itself a living and active force, Cudworth maintained that there is a plastic nature, a spiritual energy, intermediate between the Creator and his works, by which the phenomena of nature are produced. To ascribe these phenomena to the immediate agency of the Deity would be, he thought, to make the course of nature miraculous; and he could not suppose the agency of the Deity to be exerted directly, and yet monstrosities and defects to be found in the works of nature. How far the facts warrant such an hypothesis, or how far such an hypothesis explains the facts, may be doubted. But the hypothesis is not much different from that of the anima mundi, or soul of matter, which had the countenance of Pythagoras and Plato, as well as of the school of Alexandria, and later philosophers.

In opposition to this view Boyle maintained that it was absurd to believe that any subordinate energy existed between the Creator and his works.

NAUGHTINESS (nā'ti-nēs).

1. Heb. רָעָה, ro'ah, badness, 1 Sam. xvii:28, wickedness of heart.

2. רָעָה, hav-vaw' (Prov. xi:6), eagerly desiring. It denotes "nothing, nothingness;" meaning in the A. V., "wicked, wickedness" (Prov. vi:12).

NAUM (nā'um), (Gr. Ναούμ, nah-oom'; for the Hebrew see NAHUM), son of Esli in the maternal ancestry of Christ (Luke iii:25).

NAVE (nāv), (Heb. גַב, gab, hollow or curved), anything curved or arched. It is applied to the back of an animal (Ezek. x:12); to a shield (Job xv:26); to the rim of a wheel (1 Kings vii:33).

NAVEL (nā'v'l), (Heb. שֵׁבֶט, shore, שֵׁבֶט, shaw-ree'r, twisted, as a string). The place of attachment of the umbilical cord (Ezek. xvi:4), and used in general for the abdomen (Job xl:16; Prov. iii:8).

Figurative. The bodice or vestment of a woman (Cant. vii:2); so the passage is understood by some commentators.

NAVIGATION (nāv-i-gā-shun). See SHIP.

NAVY (nā'vŷ), (Heb. אֵלֶּה, ēn ee', conveyance, 1 Kings ix:26, etc.) is used in the sense of fleet. (See SHIP.)

NAZARENE (nāz-a-rēne'), (Gr. Ναζαρηνός, nāz-ar-ay-nos').

An epithet constituting a part of one of the names given to our Lord. From the number of times that the epithet is employed, it appears that it became at the very first an appellation of our Lord, and was hence applied to designate his followers. Considering that the name was derived from the place where Jesus resided during the greater part of his life, we see no reason to think that at first it bore with it, in its application to him or his followers, anything of an offensive nature. Such a designation was in this case natural and proper. In process of time, however, other influences came into operation. Nazareth was in Galilee, a part of Palestine, which was held in low esteem for several reasons—its dialect was provincial; lying remote from the capital, its inhabitants spoke a strange tongue, which was rough, harsh and uncouth, having peculiar combinations of words, and words also peculiar to themselves (Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud; Mark xiv:70); its population was impure, being made up not only of provincial Jews, but also of heathens of several sorts, Egyptians, Arabians, Phœnicians (Strabo, Geog. xvi:523); its people were in an especial manner given to be seditious, which quality of character they not rarely displayed in the capital itself on occasion of the public festivals (Josephus, Wetstein, as cited in Schleusner, s. v. Γαλιλαῖος); whence may be seen the point of the accusation made against Paul as 'ringleader of the sect of Nazarenes' (Acts xxiv:5). As Galilee was a despised part of Palestine, so was Nazareth a despised part of Galilee, being a small, obscure, if not mean, place. Accordingly its inhabitants were held in little consideration by other Galileans, and, of course, by those Jews who dwelt in Judæa. Hence the name Nazarene came to bear with it a bad odor, and was nearly synonymous with a low, ignorant and uncultured, if not un-Jewish person (Kuinoel, in Matt. ii:23). It became accordingly a contemptuous designation and a term of reproach (Wetstein, in Matt. ii:23, 26, 71), and as such, as well as a mere epithet of description, it is used in the New Testament. J. R. B.

NAZARETH (naz'a-rēth), (Gr. Ναζαρέθ, nāz-ar-eth').

A town in Galilee, in which the parents of Jesus were resident, and where in consequence he lived till the commencement of his ministry. It derives all its historical importance from this circumstance, for it is not even named in the Old Testament or by Josephus; which suffices to show that it could not have been a place of any consideration, and was probably no more than a village.

(1) History. Nazareth is not mentioned in the Old Testament nor by any classical author, nor by any writer before the time of Christ. It was for some unknown reason held in disrepute among the Jews of Judæa (John i:46). It was situated in a mountain (Luke iv:29) within the province of Galilee (Mark i:9), and near Cana, as John ii:1, 2, 11 seems to imply. There was a precipice near the town, down which the people purposed to cast Jesus (Luke iv:29). It is mentioned twenty-nine times in the New Testament. At Nazareth the angel appeared to Mary at the home of Joseph (Luke i:26; ii:39), and to that place Joseph and Mary returned after their flight into Egypt (Matt. ii:23). The hills and places about the town possess a deep and hallowed interest to the Christian as the home of Jesus during his childhood and youth, until he entered upon his ministry, and had preached in the synagogue, and was rejected by his own townspeople. Even after Capernaum became "his own city" he was known as "Jesus of Nazareth" (Matt. xxvi:71-73; Mark xvi:1-6; Acts ii:22; iii:6; iv:10; vi:14), and his disciples were called "Nazarenes." In the days of Constantine, Nazareth was peopled by Samaritan Jews, but in the sixth century Christian pilgrimages began to be made to the town. In 1109, Tancred held Galilee, and Nazareth became the seat of a Christian bishopric. In 1160 a council was held at Nazareth, which made Alexander III pope of Rome. During the Middle Ages Christian pilgrims frequently visited Nazareth. When the Turks conquered Palestine, in 1517, the Christians were driven from the town. In 1620 the Franciscan monks gained a foothold there, and began to rebuild the village. At the battle of Mount Tabor, in 1799, Napoleon with his army encamped near Nazareth.

(2) Present Conditions. The town is now called En-Nāsīrah, or Nasrah, and has from 5,000 to 6,000 population, though the Turkish officials estimate it at 10,000. There are about 2,000 Mohammedans, 2,500 Greeks, 800 Latins, and 100 Protestants. The inhabitants pursue farming, gardening and various handicrafts, and the village is quite a center of trade for the adjoining districts. The houses are well built. There are a large Latin church and monastery, a synagogue, a Greek church, a fine Protestant church under the care of the English Church Missionary Society, a Protestant hospital, and a large female orphanage (completed 1874). The synagogue is claimed by tradition to be the one in which Christ taught, but cannot be traced to a date earlier than A. D. 570. Near the Greek Church of the

A Carpenter's Shop in Nazareth.

Annunciation is a spring called "Mary's Well," to which the women resort every evening with their water-jars for their daily supply, and to which Mary with her holy Child may have gone. The women of Nazareth, like those of Bethlehem, are distinguished for beauty above their sisters in the East. The brow of the hill over which the enraged Nazarenes threatened to cast Jesus is probably near the Maronite church, though tradition places it at the "Mount of Precipitation," two or three miles south of the town (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) The streets are narrow and crooked, and after rains are often choked with mud and filth. From the top of the hill behind the town a most wonderful panorama of Northern Palestine may be seen. To the north is Lebanon, and high above all, the white tops of Hermon. In the west may be seen Carmel and glintings of the Mediterranean Sea, the bay and the town of Akka; east and south are Gilead, Tabor, Gilboa and the great plain of Esdraelon.

NAZARITE (nāz'a-rīte).

(1) Name. (Heb. נָזִיר, naw-zeer', and נָזִירֵי אֱלֹהִים, neh-zeer' el-o-heem', Nazarite of God).

The term comes from the verb נָזַר, naw-zar', to separate; and as such separation from ordinary life to religious purposes must be by abstinence of some kind, so it denotes 'to refrain from anything.' Hence the import of the term Nazarite—one, that is, who, by certain acts of self-denial, consecrated himself in a peculiar manner to the service, worship, and honor of God.

We are here, it is clear, in the midst of a sphere of ideas totally dissimilar to the genius of the Christian system; a sphere of ideas in which the outward predominates, in which self-mortification is held pleasing to God, and in which man's highest service is not enjoyment with gratitude, but privation with pain.

(2) Origin. It may be questioned if at least so much of this set of notions as supposes the Deity to be gratified and conciliated by the privations of the creature is in harmony with the ideas of God which the books of Moses exhibit, or had their origin in the law he promulgated. The manner in which he speaks on the subject (Num. vi:1-21) would seem to imply that he was not introducing a new law, but regulating an old custom; for his words take for granted, that the subject was generally and well known, and that all that was needed was such directions as should bring existing observances into accordance with the Mosaic ritual. Winer, indeed, sees, in the minuteness and particularity of the Mosaic regulations, a proof that the Nazarite vow was of home origin in Mosaism; an argument whose force we cannot discern, for a foreign practice, once introduced, must of necessity be conformed to its new abode.

(3) Meaning of the Vow. It is not least among the merits of Judaism that in general it is eminently of a practical character. Though admitting a multitude of observances, some of which, being of a very minute kind, and relating to everyday life, must have been troublesome, if not vexatious, yet the ordinary current of existence was allowed to run on unimpeded; energy was not directed from its proper channel; and life was spent in the active discharge of those offices which human wants require, and by which human happiness may be best advanced. There was no Indian self-renunciation; there was no monkish isolation; yet the vow of the Nazarite shows that personal privations were not unknown in the Mosaic polity. This vow we regard as an instance and an exemplification of that asceticism which, wherever human nature is left free to develop itself, will always manifest its tendencies and put forth its effects. No age, no nation, no religion has been without asceticism. Self-mortification is, with some minds, as natural as self-enjoyment with others. The proneness to ascetic practices is a sort of disorder of temperament. It is in part a question of original constitution. As some individuals are inclined to melancholy, to brood over their own states of mind, so they tend to become morbid in their feelings, intensely self-dissatisfied, over-thoughtful, full of personal solitudes; then gloomy; then still more dissatisfied with themselves, till at length they are led to think that nothing but severe mortifications and self-inflicted penalties can atone for their guilt, and placate a justly offended God. This general tendency of a certain physical temperament may be checked or encouraged by religious opinions or social institutions, as well as by the peculiar hue which the fortune of an age or a country may bear. The disease, however, is eminently contagious; and if, owing to unknown circumstances, there was in the days of Moses a tendency, whether borrowed from Egypt or merely strengthened by Egyptian practices, which threatened, in its excess, to become in any degree epidemic, it was wise and patriotic in that lawgiver to take the subject into his own remedial hands, and to restrain and limit to individuals that which might otherwise infect large classes, if not reach and so weaken the national mind.

(4) Law of the Nazarite. The law of the Nazarite, which may be found in Num. vi, is, in effect, as follows: Male and female might assume the vow; on doing so a person was understood to separate himself unto the Lord; this separation consisted in abstinence from wine and all intoxicating liquors, and from everything made therefrom: 'From vinegar or wine, and vinegar of strong drink; neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes or dried'; he was to 'eat nothing of the vine-tree, from the kernels even to the husks.' Nor was a razor to come upon his head all the time of his vow; he was to 'be holy, and let the locks of the hair of his head grow.' With special care was he to avoid touching any dead body whatever. Being holy unto the Lord, he was not to make himself unclean by touching the corpse even of a relative. Should he happen to do so, he was then to shave his head, and offer a sin-offering and a burnt offering; thus making an atonement for himself, 'for that he sinned by the dead.' A lamb, also, of the first year, was to be offered as a trespass-offering. The days, too, that had gone before his defilement were to be lost, not reckoned in the number of those during which his vow was to last. On the termination of the period of the vow the Nazarite himself was brought unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, there to offer a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, a peace-offering, and a meat and a drink offering. The Nazarite also shaved his head at the door of the tabernacle, and put the hair grown during the time of separation into the fire which was under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings. 'And the priest shall take the sodden shoulder of the ram and one unleavened cake out of the basket, and one unleavened wafer, and shall put them in the hands of the Nazarite after the hair of his separation is shaven; and the priest shall wave them for a wave-offering.' 'After that the Nazarite may drink wine.'

(5) Illustrations. There are not wanting individual instances which serve to illustrate this vow, and to show that the law in the case went into operation. Samson's mother took the vow of a Nazarite that she might have a son. Samson himself was a Nazarite from the time of his birth (Judg. xiii). In his history is found a fact which seems to present the reason why cutting the hair was forbidden to the Nazarite. The hair was considered the source of strength; it is, in fact, often connected with unusual strength of body, for the male has it in greater abundance than the female. Delilah urged Samson to tell her where his strength lay. After a time, 'he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head, for I have been a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb; if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man' (Judg. xvi:15, sq.). The secret was revealed; Samson was shorn and accordingly lost his strength and his life.

From the language employed by Samson, as well as from the tenor of the law in this case, the retention of the hair seems to have been one essential feature in the vow. It is, therefore, somewhat singular that any case should have been considered as the Nazaritic vow in which the shaving of the head is put forth as the chief particular. St. Paul is supposed to have been under this vow, when (Acts xviii:18) he is said to have 'shorn his head in Cenchrea, for he had a vow' (see also Acts xxi:24). The head was not shaven till the vow was performed, when a person had not a vow.

Figurative. The vow of the Nazarites indicates an entire consecration of the body to the Lord, and is in the spirit of St. Paul's exhortation to present the body a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable, unto God (Rom. xii:6). It is expressly said that during the days of his separation the Nazarite "is holy unto the Lord" (Num. vi:8).

(1) Were not these Nazarites typical of Jesus Christ? Altogether holy, he was solemnly devoted to the service of God. Never was he defiled with carnal pleasures, nor intoxicated with sinful lusts or earthly cares; never was he defiled by irregular affections towards his nearest relations, nor polluted by his gracious connections with men. His graces and good works increased more and more, and his people rooted in him, grow up and flourish in God's holy place. Never did he break his vow, but finished it in giving himself for an all-comprehensive offering for us; and in his resurrection, laid aside every token of continued subjection to an angry God or broken law, and purges and inflames the hearts of his people, by his bleeding love. (2) Were not these Nazarites emblems of ministers and saints, who, denying themselves, and mortifying the deeds of the body, consecrate themselves to God, renounce this world, and the pleasures of sin? (Brown, Bib. Dict.)

NEAH (nē'ah), (Heb. נֵאָה, nay-aw', the shaking or settlement), a town of Zebulun on the southern boundary of Rimmon (Josh. xix:13). Porter suggests 'Ain, about three miles northwest of Nazareth, as its site, but the site is not known.

NEAPOLIS (ne-āp'o-lis), (Gr. Νεάπολις, neh-āp'o-lis, new city), a maritime city of Macedonia, near the borders of Thrace, now called Napoli.

Paul landed here on his first journey into Europe (Acts xvi:11). It was situated on a rocky eminence, the most conspicuous object being a temple of Diana, which crowned the top of the hill. The great Roman road Via Egnatia, from Macedonia to Thrace, passed through Neapolis, which was eight or ten miles from Philippi. It is now a Turco-Grecian town of 5,000 or 6,000 population, and called Kavalla; it has numerous ruins. Another site has been proposed (Esqui) for Neapolis, but the arguments for it are unsatisfactory. The Roman name of Shechem was also Neapolis, but it is not so named in Scripture.

NEARIAH (nē'a-ri'ah), (Heb. נְהָרְיָהּ, neh-aryaw', servant of Jehovah).

1. A son of Ishi, and captain of 500 Simeonites in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv:42), B. C. 715.

2. A son of Shemiah, and descendant of David (1 Chron. iii:22, 23), B. C. 350.

NEBAI (nēb'a-i), (Heb. נְבַי, nay-baw', fruitful), one of the chiefs of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:19), B. C. 410.

NEBAIOTH or NEBAJOTH (ne-bā'yoth), (Heb. נְבַיּוֹת, neb-aw-yoth', fruitfulness).

1. The Firstborn Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:13; 1 Chron. i:20) and the prince or sheik (rendered by Jerome φύλαρχος) of one of the twelve Ishmaelitic tribes, which, as well as the territory they occupied, continued to bear his name in after times (Gen. xxv:16; comp. xvii:20). One of Esau's wives, Mahalath, otherwise called Basemath, is expressly designated as 'the sister of Nebaioth' (Gen. xxviii:9; xxxvi:3); and by a singular coincidence the land of Esau, or Edom, was ultimately possessed by the posterity of Nebaioth. In common with the other Ishmaelites, they first settled in the wilderness 'before' (i. e., to the east of) their brethren, the other descendants of Abraham; by which we are probably to understand the great desert lying to the east and south-east of Palestine (Gen. xxv:18; xxi:21; xvi:12; and see the article ARABIA.) From the references of Scripture it is evident that the tribe of Nebaioth followed for ages the nomadic life of shepherds.

2. Nabathæans. This people included a variety of Arab races taking their common name from the progenitor of the largest or most influential tribe, Nebaioth, the firstborn of Ishmael.

(1) Invasion of Western Asia. The successful invasion of Western Asia, first by the Assyrians and afterwards by the Chaldæans, could not but affect the condition of the tribes in Northern Arabia, though we possess no record of the special results. The prophet Isaiah, after his obscure oracle regarding Dumah (ch. xxi:11, 12), introduces a 'judgment upon Arabia,' i. e., Desert Arabia, which some suppose to have been fulfilled by Sennacherib, while others think it refers to the later events that are foretold by Jeremiah (xlix:28-33) as befalling 'Kedar and the kingdoms of Hazor,' in consequence of the ravages of Nebuchadnezzar. Be this as it may, we know that when the latter carried the Jews captive to Babylon, the Edomites made themselves masters of a great part of the south of Palestine (see IDUMÆA), while either then or at a later period they themselves were supplanted in the southern part of their own territory by the Nabathæans.

The territory occupied by the Nabathæans in its widest sense included the whole of Northern Arabia from the Euphrates to the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea; but more strictly taken it denoted (at least in later times) only a portion of the southern part of that vast region (Josephus, Antiq. i:12, 4; St. Jerome, Quest. on Is. xxv:13; Ammianus Marcellinus, xiv:8). We first hear of the Nabathæans in history in the reign of Antigonos, who succeeded Alexander the Great in Babylon, and died in the year B. C. 301. He sent two expeditions against them; both were unsuccessful.

(2) Agriculture and Commerce. The Nabathæans were as yet essentially a pastoral people, though they were likewise engaged in commerce, which they afterwards prosecuted to a great extent, and thereby acquired great riches and renown. It was in this way that they gradually became more fixed in their habits; and, living in towns and villages, they were at length united under a regular monarchical government, constituting the kingdom of Arabia, or, more strictly, Arabia Petræa, the name being derived not, as some suppose, from the rocky nature of the country, but from the chief city, Petræa.

(3) Kings of Arabia Petræa. The common name of the kings of Arabia Petræa was either Aretas or Obodas. Even in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (about B. C. 166), we read in 2 Macc. v:8, of an Aretas, king of the Arabians; and from that period downwards they came frequently into contact both with the Jews and Romans, as may be seen in the books of the Maccabees and the writings of Josephus. When Judas Maccabæus and his brother Jonathan had crossed the Jordan, they reached after a three days' march the country of the Nabathæans, who gave them a very friendly reception (1 Macc. v:24, 25; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 3; comp. xiii. 13. 5. 15, and De Bell. Jud., i. 4. 4. 7). Long before the kingdom of Arabia was actually conquered by the Romans, its sovereigns were dependent on the Roman power. An expedition was sent thither by Augustus, under Ælius Gallus, governor of Egypt, and a personal friend of the geographer Strabo, who has left us an account of it. After various obstacles he at last reached Λευκή Κώμη or Albus Pagus, the emporium of the Nabathæans, and the port of Petra, which was probably at or near Elath (Strabo, xvi:4, 22, 24; Dion Cassius, liii:27; Arrian, Periplus Maris Eryth.). Another friend of Strabo, the Stoic philosopher Athenodorus, had spent some time in Petra, and related to him with admiration how the inhabitants lived in entire harmony and union under excellent laws. The kingdom was hereditary; or at least the king was always one of the royal family and had a prime minister or vizier, ἐντροπος, who was styled the king's brother.

Pliny also repeatedly speaks of the Nabathæans (Hist. Nat. v:11; vi:28; xii:27); and classes along with them the Cedrei, exactly as Kedar and Nebaioth are placed together in Is. lx:7. Another Arabian king of the name of Aretas is the one mentioned by St. Paul (2 Cor. ii:32; comp. Acts vii:24, 25; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 1). We find that a former Aretas had been invited to assume the sovereignty by the inhabitants of Damascus (Joseph. De Bell. Jud., i. 4. 7; Antiq. xiii. 15. 1); and now, during the weak reign of Caligula, the same city is seized by another Aretas, and governed through an ethnarch, as related by Paul. The kingdom of Arabia Petræa maintained its nominal independence till about A. D. 105, in the reign of the Emperor Trajan, when it was subdued by Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, and annexed to the vast empire of Rome.

(4) Under the Romans. The Nabathæans had, as we have seen, early applied themselves to commerce, especially as the carriers of the products of Arabia, India, and the far-distant East, which, as we learn from Strabo, were transported on camels from the above-mentioned Λευκή Κώμη to Petra, and thence to Rhinocoloura (El 'Arish) and elsewhere. 'But under the Roman dominion the trade of these regions appears to have widely extended itself, and to have flourished in still greater prosperity; probably from the circumstance that the lawless rapacity of the adjacent nomadic hordes was now kept in check by the Roman power, and particularly by the garrisons which were everywhere established for this specific purpose. The country, too, was now rendered more accessible, and the passage of merchants and caravans more practicable, by military ways.'

From Elath, or Ailah, one great road had its direction northwards to the rich and central Petra; thence it divided, and led on one side to Jerusalem, Gaza, and other ports on the Mediterranean; and on the other side to Damascus. Another road appears to have led directly from Ailah along the Ghor to Jerusalem. Traces of these routes are still visible in many parts.

These facts are derived not from the testimony of historians, but from the specifications of the celebrated Tabula Theodosiana, or Peutingeriana, compiled in the fourth century. According to this, a line of small fortresses was drawn along the eastern frontier of Arabia Petræa, towards the desert, some of which became the sites of towns and cities, whose names are still extant.

But as the power of Rome fell into decay, the Arabs of the desert would seem again to have acquired the ascendancy. They plundered the cities, but did not destroy them; and hence those regions are still full of uninhabited, yet stately and often splendid, ruins of ancient wealth, and taste, and greatness.

(5) Petra. Even Petra, the rich and impregnable metropolis, was subjected to the same fate; and now exists, in its almost inaccessible loneliness only to excite the curiosity of the scholar, and the wonder of the traveler, by the singularity of its site, its ruins, and its fortunes.

In the course of the fourth century this region came to be included under the general name of 'Palestine'; and it then received the special designation of Palastina Tertia, or Salutaris. It became the diocese of a metropolitan, whose seat was at Petra, and who was afterward placed under the patriarch of Jerusalem.

With the Mohammedan conquest in the seventh century its commercial prosperity disappeared. Lying between the three rival empires of Arabia, Egypt, and Syria, it lost its ancient independence; the course of trade was diverted into new channels; its great routes were abandoned.

(6) Syria Sobal. At length the entire country was quietly yielded up to the Bedawees of the surrounding wilderness, whose descendants still claim it as their domain. During the twelfth century it was partially occupied by the Crusaders, who gave it the name of Arabia Tertia, or Syria Sobal. From that period it remained unvisited by Europeans, and had almost disappeared from their maps, until it was partially explored, first by Seetzen in 1807, and more fully by Burckhardt in 1812; and now the wonders of the Wady Mûsa are familiarly known to all. (Vincent's Commerce of the Ancients; Forster's Mohammedanism Unveiled, and Geography of Arabia; Robinson's Sketches of Idumæa, in 'Amer. Bib. Repos.', 1833; and Bibl. Recherches, vol. ii.) N. M.

NEBALLAT (ne-bäl'lat), (Heb. נֶבֶלָט, neb-awl', hard, firm, or secret wickedness), a town of Dan, occupied by Benjamites after the captivity (Neh. xi:34). It is now probably Beit Nebala, four miles northeast of Lydda (Van de Velde, Memoir p. 336).

NEBAT (nē'bāt), (Heb. נֶבֶט, neb-awl', regard), a descendant of Ephraim, of the race of Joshua, and father of Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes (1 Kings xi:26; 2 Chron. ix:29), B. C. about 1000.

NEBO (nē'bo), (Heb. נֶבֹ, neb-o', height; Sept. Νεβώ, nab-boh'; Nabium, contracted nabu 'the prophet').

1. The interpreter of the will of Bel-Merodach of Babylon. He had a shrine at E-saggilla, the great temple of Bel at Babylon. But his own temple was E-Zida (now Birs-i-Nimrud), in Borsippa, the suburb of Babylon. He was the son of Merodach and Zarpanit, and the husband of Tasmit, 'the hearer' (A. H. Sayce, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

In later days he was identified with Nusku, a solar deity of fire. He is mentioned in Is. xlvi:1, and supposed to have been the symbol of the planet Mercury, the celestial scribe and interpreter of the gods, answering to the Hermes and Anubis of the Egyptians. He was likewise worshiped by the Sabians in Arabia (Norberg, Onomasi, p. 95). Gesenius traces the name in the Hebrew word prophet, an interpreter of the divine will. The divine worship paid to this idol by the Chaldeans and Assyrians is attested by many compound proper names of which it forms a part, as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Nebushasban; besides others mentioned in classical writers—Nabonedus, Nabonassar, Naburiannus, Nabonabus, Nabopolassar. (Gesenius and Henderson on Is. xlvi:1.) (See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.)

2. A mountain of Moab "over against Jericho," from which Moses beheld the Land of Canaan (Deut. xxxii:49). "And Moses went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah. . . and the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan" (Deut. xxxiv:1). Nebo was a mountain in the range of mountains called Abarim. Eusebius says it was shown in his day on the other side of Jordan, six miles to the west of Heshbon. If then definitely known, its location was afterward lost. Of the peaks in the Abarim range which have been suggested as Nebo are: Jebel Attarus, but this is not "over against Jericho," and is too far south; Jebel Jil'ad fifteen miles farther north than Jericho, and therefore not answering to the Scriptural narrative.

The explorations of De Saulcy, Duc de Luynes, Tristram, Warren, Paine, and Merrill have led to the conclusion that Nebo was at the northern end of the Abarim range of mountains, i. e., Jebel Nebi. This mountain was five or six miles southwest of Heshbon, is about 2,700 feet high, and commands a fine view of the country. Paine appears to apply Jebel Nebá to the eastern portion of the northern group of peaks, and Jebel Siaghah to the western portion; Dr. Merrill claims that the Arabs use Jebel Nebá, Jebel Musa, and Jebel Siaghah indiscriminately for this group. While the discussions respecting Pisgah have been sharp, the majority of explorers and scholars agree in identifying Nebo with the northern end of the Abarim range, Jebel Nebá (Schaff, Bib. Dict.). With this identification A. T. Chapman, in Hastings' Bib. Dict., agrees. He says: "It has been questioned whether all the places mentioned in Deut. xxxiv:1 can be seen from any point of the ridge. The 'hinder sea' in this passage probably means the Dead Sea, as being behind Moses when he began his survey, and not the Mediterranean Sea. (The Prospect from Pisgah, by W. F. Birch.) (See PISGAH.)

3. A town in the tribe of Judah (Ezra ii:29); or, more fully, in order to distinguish it from the preceding, 'the other Nebo' (Neh. vii:33). The name may have, as in the preceding instance, been derived from that of the idol Nebo; but more probably from the Hebrew word 'to be high.' The site of Nebo has been fixed at Beit Nubá, twelve miles northwest of Jerusalem and eight from Lydda, or at Nuba, four miles south of Adullam (Armstrong, Names and Places, etc.; W. H. Bennett, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

4. A city of Reuben (Num. xxxiii:38), taken by the Moabites, who held it in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. xlviii:1). The Moabite stone has an inscription relating to this town. It was eight miles south of Heshbon; perhaps el Hábis.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (něb-u-kad-něz'zar), (Heb. נְבוּצַדְנֶצַּר, neb-oo-kad-nets-tsar'; and also נְבוּצַדְנֶצַּר, neb-oo-kad-rets-tsar'. Gr. Νεβουχοδνεζαρ, Nabouchodnosor; and also Νεβουκοδρσορος, Naboukodrosoros; Kings, Chronicles, and Daniel; Jer. xxvii; xxviii; xxxiv:1; xxxix:1; Ezek. xxvi:7; and Ezra v:12; written also נְבוּצַדְנֶצַּר, neb-oo-kad-rets-tsar', Nebuchadrezzar, generally in Jeremiah, and in Ezek. xxx:10).

(1) King of Babylon. The name of the Chaldean monarch of Babylon by whom Judah was conquered, and the Jews led into their seventy years' captivity. In the Septuagint version he is called Ναβουχοδονσορ, Nabuchodonosor. This name, Nabuchodonosor, has passed from the Septuagint into the Latin Vulgate, and into the authorized English version of the books of Judith and Tobit. Nabu or Nebo (Is. xlv:1) was the name of a Chaldean deity, supposed to be Mercury, and enters frequently into the composition of Chaldean proper names, as Nabopolassar (Can. Ptol); Nabuzar-adan (2 Kings xxv:8, etc.); Samgar-Nebo and Nebushasban (Jer. xxxix:13, 14). The name Nebuchadnezzar has been commonly explained to signify the treasure of Nebo, but, according to Lorschach (Archiv. f. Morgenl. Literatur), it signifies Nebo, the prince of gods.

The only notices which we have of this monarch in the canonical writings are found in the books of Kings, Chronicles, Daniel, and Ezra, and in the allusions of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

From 2 Kings xxiii:29, and 2 Chron. xxxv:20, we gather that in the reign of Josiah (B. C. 610), Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, having approached by sea the coast of Syria, made a friendly application to King Josiah to be allowed a passage through his territories to the dominions of the Assyrian monarch, with whom he was then at war. The design of Pharaoh-necho was to seize upon Carchemish (Circesium or Cercusium), a strong post on the Euphrates; but Josiah, who was tributary to the Babylonian monarch, opposed his progress at Megiddo, where he was defeated and mortally wounded. (See JOSIAH.) Necho marched upon Jerusalem, and the Jews became tributary to the King of Egypt.

(2) In the Field. Upon this, Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon (2 Kings xxiv:1; 2 Chron. xxxvi:6, where this monarch's name is for the first time introduced), invaded Judah, retook Carchemish, with the territory which had been wrested from him by Necho, seized upon Jehoiakim, the vassal of Pharaoh-necho, and reduced him to submission (B. C. 607). Jehoiakim was at first loaded with chains, in order to be led captive to Babylon, but was eventually restored by Nebuchadnezzar to his throne, on condition of paying an annual tribute. Nebuchadnezzar carried off part of the ornaments of the temple, together with several hostages of distinguished rank, among whom were the youths Daniel and his three friends, Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael (Dan. i). These were educated at court in the language and sciences of the Chaldeans, where they subsequently filled offices of distinction. The sacred vessels were transferred by Nebuchadnezzar to his temple at Babylon (Is. xxxix; 2 Chron. xxxvi:6, 7). (See BABYLON.)

(3) Opposes Egypt. After the conquest of Judæa, Nebuchadnezzar turned his attention towards the Egyptians, whom he drove out of Syria, taking possession of all the land between the Euphrates and the river (2 Kings xxiv:7); which some suppose to mean the Nile, but others a small river in the desert, which was reckoned the boundary between Palestine and Egypt (Prideaux's Connection).

(4) Capture of Jerusalem. The fate of Jerusalem was now rapidly approaching its consummation. After three years of fidelity Jehoiakim renounced his allegiance to Babylon, and renewed his allegiance with Necho, when Nebuchadnezzar sent incursions of Ammonites, Moabites and Syrians, together with Chaldeans, to harass him. At length, in the eleventh year of his reign, he was made prisoner, and slain (Jer. xxii). (See JEHOIAKIM.) He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, who, after three months' reign, surrendered himself with his family to Nebuchadnezzar, who had come in person to besiege Jerusalem, in the eighth year of his reign (2 Kings xxiv:10-12). (See JEHOIACHIN.) Upon this occasion all the most distinguished inhabitants, including the artificers, were led captive. (See CAPTIVITY.) Among the captives, who amounted to no less than 50,000, were Ezekiel (Ezek. i:1) and Mordecai. (See ESTHER.) The golden vessels of Solomon were now removed, with the royal treasures, and Mattaniah, the brother of Jehoiachin, placed on the throne by Nebuchadnezzar, who gave him the name of Zedekiah, and bound him by an oath not to enter into an alliance with Egypt. Zedekiah, however, in the ninth year of his reign, formed an alliance with Pharaoh-hophra, the successor of Necho. Hophra, coming to the assistance of Zedekiah, was driven back into Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, who finally captured Jerusalem in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign (B. C. 588). (See ZEDEKIAH.) The Temple, and the whole city, with its towers and walls, were all razed to the ground by Nebuzaradan, Nebuchadnezzar's lieutenant, and the principal remaining inhabitants put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. Jeremiah was, however, spared, and Gedaliah appointed governor. He was shortly after murdered by Ishmael, a member of the royal family, who was himself soon obliged to take refuge among the Ammonites. Many of the remaining Jews fled into Egypt, accompanied by Jeremiah; those who remained were soon after expatriated by Nebuchadnezzar, who depopulated the whole country.

(5) Siege of Tyre. He next undertook the siege of Tyre (see TYRE), and after its destruction proceeded to Egypt, now distracted by internal commotions, and devastated or made himself master of the whole country from Migdol to Syene (according to the reading of the Seventy, Ezek. xxix:10; xxx:10), transferring many of the inhabitants to the territory beyond the Euphrates.

(6) The Prophet Daniel. We have referred to the captivity of the prophet Daniel, and have to turn to the book which bears his name for the history of this prophet, who, from an exile, was destined to become the great protector of his nation. In the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel, who was found superior in wisdom to the Chaldean magi, was enabled not only to interpret, but to reveal a dream of Nebuchadnezzar, the very subject of which that monarch had forgotten. (See DREAM.)

This was the dream of the statue consisting of four different metals, which Daniel interpreted as four successive monarchies, the last of which was to be the reign of the Messiah. Daniel was elevated to be first minister of state, and his three friends were made governors of provinces.

The history of these events (Dan. ii:4, 8, 9) is written in the Chaldee language, together with the narrative which immediately follows (ch. iii), of the golden statue erected by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura, for refusing to worship which Daniel's three friends were thrown into a furnace, but miraculously preserved.

(7) Judgment Upon Nebuchadnezzar. The fourth chapter, also written in Chaldee, contains the singular history of the judgment inflicted on Nebuchadnezzar as a punishment for his pride, and which is narrated in the form of a royal proclamation from the monarch himself, giving an account to his people of his affliction and recovery.

This affliction had been, by the monarch's account, predicted by Daniel a year before, in the interpretation of his fearful dream of the tree in the midst of the earth. While walking in his palace, and admiring his magnificent works, he uttered, in the plenitude of his pride, the remarkable words recorded in verse 30: 'Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?'

He had scarce uttered the words, when a voice from heaven proclaimed to him that his kingdom was departed from him; that he should be for seven times (generally supposed to mean years, although some reduce the period to fourteen months; Jahn, Intrad.) driven from the habitations of men to dwell among the beasts of the field, and made to eat grass as an ox, until he learned 'that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.'

The difficulties attending the nature of the disease and recovery of Nebuchadnezzar have not escaped the notice of commentators in ancient as well as modern times. Origen's supposition that the account of Nebuchadnezzar's metamorphosis was merely a representation of the fall of Lucifer, is not likely to meet with many supporters. Besides Origen's, there have been no less than five different opinions in reference to this subject. Bodin (in Demonol.) maintains that Nebuchadnezzar underwent an actual metamorphosis of soul and body, a similar instance of which is given by Cluvier (Append. ad Epitom. Hist.) on the testimony of an eye-witness. Tertullian (De Punit.) confines the transformation to the body only, but without loss of reason, of which kind of metamorphosis St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xviii:18) reports some instances said to have taken place in Italy to which he himself attaches little credit; but Gaspard Peucer asserts that the transformation of men into wolves was very common in Livonia. Some Jewish Rabbins have asserted that the soul of Nebuchadnezzar, by a real transmigration, changed places with that of an ox (Medina, De rectâ in Deum fid.); while others have supposed not a real, but an apparent or docetic change, of which there is a case recorded in the life of St. Macarius, the parents of a young woman having been persuaded that their daughter had been transformed into a mare. The most generally received opinion, however, is that Nebuchadnezzar labored under that species of hypochondriacal monomania which leads the patient to fancy himself changed into an animal, or other substance, the habits of which he adopts. Jerome probably leaned to this opinion. 'Who does not see,' he observes, 'that madmen live like brute beasts in the fields and woods, and in what is it wonderful that this punishment should be inflicted by God's judgment to show the power of God, and so humble the pride of kings? Greek and Roman histories relate much more incredible things, as of men changed into Scylla, the Chimæra, and the Centaurs, into birds and beasts, flowers, trees, stars, and stones?' (in Dan. iv:4). To this disease of the imagination physicians have given the name of Lycanthropy, Zoanthropy, or Insania Canina. (See DISEASES OF THE JEWS, 8.)

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, INSCRIPTION OF.

The famous inscription of Nebuchadnezzar which was recovered from the ruins of Babylon is now in the India House in London.

(1) Carved Upon Stone. This long record of his triumphs has been written upon ten stone columns and it contains in all five hundred and eight lines. It was graven apparently by the king's orders, and it is a wonderful exemplification of his boast, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built?"

We have here an authentic relic of the times of this king, and of the period of the fall of the Jewish monarchy.

It gives us a wonderful picture of Nebuchadnezzar with all his pride of position and power, his passionate devotion to his gods, and his untiring labors in the building of his beautiful capital. We now have a corroboration of the statements of Jeremiah and Daniel concerning the gods he worshiped and the city he built, but it is like the records of Sennacherib and other kings, in that it omits the story of royal humiliation, and gives no hint of that severe lesson in which Nebuchadnezzar was taught that: "The Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men and giveth them to whomsoever he will."

(2) Contents. We have here only the assertion of his greatness and the wonder of his achievements. The following extract will give a general idea of the whole inscription:

"Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, the prince exalted, the favorite of Merodach, the pontiff supreme, the beloved of Nebo . . . the chiefest son of Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, am I. . . . When Merodach, the great lord, lifted up the head of my majesty, and Nebo, the overseer of the multitude of heaven and earth, a righteous scepter placed in my hands; himself, the leader glorious, the open eyes of the gods, the prince Merodach, my supplications heard and received my prayers. "I worshiped his lordship. In his high trust, to far-off lands, a road of hardships I pursued, and the unyielding I reduced, I fettered the rebels. The land I ordered aright, and the people I made to thrive, bad and good among the people I removed (or deported).

Silver, gold, precious stones, whatsoever things are precious, a large abundance, a rich present to my city of Babylon, into his presence I brought.

In E-sagilla (the temple of Bel-Merodach) the palace of his lordship, I wrought repairs. Ekua, the cell of the lord of the gods, Merodach, I made to glisten like suns the walls thereof. . . . The great ramparts of Babylon I finished; beside the scarp of its moat, the two strong walls with bitumen and burnt brick I built, and with the wall which my father had constructed I joined them and the city. I carried them round. . . . I beautified the road of Ishtar (See ASHTORETH), that hurleth down them that assail her. . . . Strong bulls of copper, and dreadful serpents, standing upright on their thresholds, I erected. Those portals for the gazing of the people, with carven work I caused to be filled. As an outwork, the wall of Babylon, unapproachable, a mighty rampart, at the ford of the sun rising, Babylon I threw around."

There are many glowing descriptions of the work which he did in beautifying his capital city and rebuilding the temples of the gods.

"The cedar of the roofing of the cells of Nebo with gold I overlaid. The silver of the roofing of the gate of Nana, I overlaid with shining silver. The bulls, the leaves of the gate of the cell, with silver I made bright. . . . The house I made gloriously bright, and with carved work I had it filled. The temples of Borsippa I made and filled." (Ball's Translation.) (See Records of the Past vol. iii, pp. 102-123.)

NEBUCHADREZZAR (něb-u-kad-rěz'zar). See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

NEBUSHASBAN (něb-u-shās'ban), (Heb. נְבוּשַׁשְׁבַן, neb-oo-shaz-baw'n, Nebo saves me), Jer. xxxix:13, a follower of Nebu.

The name of one of the Babylonian officers sent by Nebuzar-adan to take Jeremiah out of prison (B. C. 588). W. W.

"The name Nebushasban occurs in the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions under the form of Nabū-Swabanni, "Nebo Save Me." (T. G. Pinches, Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

NEBUZAR-ADAN (něb'u-zār-ā'dan), (Heb. נְבוּזַרְאֲדָן, neb-oo-zar-ad-awn', Nebo sends posterity, 2 Kings xxv:8; Jer. xxxix:9; xl:1; lii:12, etc.).

'Nebo is the Lord,' according to the Hebrew; or, according to the Persian, 'Nebo is wise.' The name of the captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard, who conducted the siege of Jerusalem to a successful issue, the particulars of which are given in 2 Kings xxv:8-21. He treated Jeremiah with generous consideration, as Nebuchadnezzar commanded (Jer. xxxix:11; xl:1). His speech to Jeremiah is preserved in Jer. xl:2, sq. When Nebuchadnezzar, five years later, besieged Tyre, Nebuzar-adan came again to Jerusalem, and carried off seven hundred and forty-five Jews more into captivity (Jer. lii:30).

NECHO (ně'ko), (Heb. נֶכֶח, nek-o'), an Egyptian king, son and successor (according to Herodotus, ii:158) of Psammetichus, and contemporary of the Jewish king, Josiah (B. C. 610).

(1) Army and Fleet. The wars and success of Necho, in Syria, are recorded by sacred as well as profane writers. Studious of military renown, and the furtherance of commerce, Necho, on ascending the throne of Egypt, applied himself to reorganize the army, and to equip a powerful fleet. In order to promote his purposes, he courted the Greeks, to whose troops he gave a post next to his Egyptians. He fitted out a fleet in the Mediterranean, and another in the Red Sea. Having engaged some expert Phœnician sailors, he sent them on a voyage of discovery along the coast of Africa. The honor, therefore, of being the first to equip an expedition for the purpose of circumnavigating Africa belongs to Pharaoh-necho, who thereby ascertained the peninsular form of that continent, twenty-one centuries before the Cape of Good Hope was seen by Diaz, or doubled by Vasco da Gama.

Before entering on this voyage of discovery, Necho had commenced reopening the canal from the Nile to the Red Sea, which had been cut many years before by Sesostris or Rameses the Great. The work, however, if we may believe Herodotus, was abandoned, an oracle warning the Egyptian monarch that he was laboring for the barbarian (Herod. ii:158).

(2) Enters Palestine. Necho also turned his attention to the Egyptian conquests already made in Asia; and, fearing lest the growing power of the Babylonians should endanger the territories acquired by the arms of his victorious predecessors, he determined to check their progress, and to attack the enemy on his own frontier. With this view he collected a powerful army, and entering Palestine, followed the route along the sea-coast of Judæa, intending to besiege the town of Carchemish on the Euphrates. But Josiah, king of Judah, offended at the passage of the Egyptian army through his territories, resolved to impede, if unable to prevent, their march. Necho sent messengers to induce him to desist, assuring him that he had no hostile intentions against Judæa, 'but against the house wherewith I have war; for God commanded me to make haste.' This conciliatory message was of no avail. Josiah posted himself in the valley of Megiddo, and prepared to oppose the Egyptians. Megiddo was a city in the tribe of Manasseh, between forty and fifty miles to the north of Jerusalem, and within three hours of the coast. It is called Magdolus by Herodotus. In this valley the feeble forces of the Jewish king, having attacked Necho, were routed with great slaughter.

(3) Death of Josiah. Josiah being wounded in the neck with an arrow, ordered his attendants to take him from the field. Escaping from the heavy shower of arrows with which their broken ranks were overwhelmed, they removed him from the chariot in which he had been wounded, and placing him in a 'second one that he had,' they conveyed him to Jerusalem, where he died (2 Kings xxiii:29, sq.; 2 Chron. xxxv:20, sq.). (See JOSIAH.)

Intent upon his original project Necho did not stop to revenge himself upon the Jews, but continued his march to the Euphrates.

(4) Overthrow of His Successor. Three months had scarcely elapsed, when, returning from the capture of Carchemish and the defeat of the Chaldeans, he learned that, though Josiah had left an elder son, Jehoahaz had caused himself to be proclaimed king on the death of his father, without soliciting Necho to sanction his taking the crown. Incensed at this, he ordered Jehoahaz to meet him 'at Riblah, in the land of Hamath'; and having deposed him, and condemned the land to pay a heavy tribute, he carried him a prisoner to Jerusalem. On arriving there, Necho made Eliakim, the eldest son, king, changing his name to Jehoiakim; and taking the silver and gold which had been levied upon the Jewish nation, he returned to Egypt with the captive Jehoahaz, who there terminated his short and unfortunate career. Herodotus says that Necho, after having routed the Syrians (the Jews) at Magdolus, took Cadytis, a large city of Syria, in Palestine, which, he adds, is very little less than Sardis (ii:159; iii:5). By Cadytis there is scarcely a doubt he meant Jerusalem; the word is only a Greek form of the ancient, as well as the modern, name of that city. (See PHARAOH.) It is, however, to be regretted that the mural sculptures of Egypt present no commemoration of these triumphs on the part of Necho; the sole record of him which they give being the name of Necho, found among the hieroglyphics in the great hall of Karnak. His oval also occurs on vases, and some small objects of Egyptian art.

(5) Defeated by Babylonians. Pleased with his success, the Egyptian monarch dedicated the dress he wore to the deity who was supposed to have given him the victory. He did not long enjoy the advantages he had obtained. In the fourth year after his expedition, being alarmed at the increasing power of the Babylonians, he again marched into Syria, and advanced to the Euphrates. The Babylonians were prepared for his approach. Nebuchadnezzar completely routed his army, recovered the town of Carchemish, and, pushing his conquests through Palestine, took from Necho all the territory belonging to the Pharaohs, from the Euphrates to the southern extremity of Syria (2 Kings xxiv:7; Jer. xlv:6; 2 Chron. xxxvi:9; 2 Kings xxiv:8).

(6) Death. Nebuchadnezzar deposed Jehoiachim, who had succeeded his father, and carried the warriors and treasures away to Babylon; a short time previous to which Necho died, and was succeeded by Psammetichus II. Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, vol. i:157, sq.).

According to Manetho (Euseb. Chron. Armen., i:219), Necho was the sixth king in the twenty-sixth dynasty, successor to Psammetichus I., and as there had been another of the same name, he was properly Necho the Second. The period of his reign was, according to Manetho, six, according to Herodotus sixteen, years (consult Gesenius, Isaiah i:596). J. R. B.

NECK (nĕk). (Hebrew usually נֶקֶף, o-ref, as Gen. xlix:8, Lev. v:8, nape; נֶקֶף, tsav-vaur, as Gen. xxvii:16; נֶקֶף, gaw-rone, properly throat, Is. iii:16). That part of an animal body between the head and shoulders (Judg. v:30); both head and neck (Deut. xxi:4).

Figurative. It denotes the heart; and so a "hard," "stiff" or "iron neck," signifies men's obstinacy in their love to, and practice of sin (Neh. ix:29; Ps. lxxv:5; Is. xlviii:4).

(1) It stands for the whole man; and so to have a "yoke" or bands on the neck signifies being in slavery and bondage (Deut. xxviii:48; Is. lii:2; Jer. xxvii:2). (2) Transgressions come upon, or are wreathed about, the "neck," when they are punished with bondage and slavery (Lam. i:14). (3) The Assyrians "reached even to the neck"; they almost totally overflowed and ruined Judah, taking all the cities thereof, but Jerusalem the capital (Is. viii:8; xxx:28). (4) The Ammonites "came upon the necks of the slain" Jews, when they were murdered in like manner by the Chaldeans (Ezek. xxi:29). (5) To "lay down the neck," is to be ready to suffer slavery or death (Rom. xvi:4). (6) God "discovers the foundations unto the neck," when he utterly unsettles and almost utterly destroys his enemies (Hab. iii:13). Brown.

NECKLACE (nĕk'lāce), (Heb נֶקֶף raw-beed', binding) is a word which does not occur in the A. V., but was in early times, as now, common in the East.

Necklaces were sometimes made of gold or silver (Exod. xxxv:22), sometimes of pearls or jewels, strung on a ribbon (Cant. i:10), hanging to the breast or girdle. To these were attached golden crescents (Is. iii:18; Judg. viii:21), and amulets (Is. iii:18).

The modern Egyptian ladies are very fond of wearing necklaces of the richest character (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i, 339, sq.) (See PRECIOUS STONES.)

NECOTH (nĕk-oth'), (Heb נֶקֶף, nek-ot'i'), this word occurs twice in the book of Genesis.

(1) A Syrian Product. It indicates a product of Syria, for in one case we find it carried into Egypt as an article of commerce, and in another sent as a present into the same country. It occurs in the same passage as ladanum, which is translated myrrh in the Authorized Version. Many of the same general observations will therefore apply to both. Necoth has unfortunately been rendered spicery. This it is not likely to have meant, at least in the present sense of the term, for such commodities were not likely to be transported into Egypt from Gilead, though many Eastern products were, no doubt, carried north by caravans into Asia Minor, up the Euphrates, and by Palmyra into Syria. In the present case, however, all the articles mentioned seem to be products indigenous in Syria. But it is necessary to attend strictly to the original names, for we are apt to be misled by the English translation. Thus, in Gen. xxxvii:25, we read, 'Behold a company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead with their camels, bearing spicery (necoth), and balm (tzeri), and myrrh (loth), going to carry it down to Egypt.' To these men Joseph was sold by his brethren, when they were feeding their flocks at Dothan, supposed to be a few miles to the north of Sebaste, or Samaria. It is curious that Jacob, when desiring a present to be taken to the ruler of Egypt, enumerates nearly the same articles (Gen. xliii:11), 'Carry down the man a present, a little balm, (tzeri), and a little honey (debash), spices (necoth) and myrrh (loth)

Bochart (Hierozoicon, ii Bk. iv. c. 12) enters into a learned exposition of the meaning of necoth, of which Dr. Harris has given an abridged view in his article on spices.

(2) Various Interpretations. Bochart shows that the true import of necoth has always been considered uncertain, for it is rendered wax by the paraphrast Jonathan, in the Arabic version of Erpenius, and in Beresith Rabba (sect. 91, near the end). Others interpret it very differently. The Septuagint renders it Θυψαυα, perfume, Aquila storax, the Syrian version resin, the Samaritan balsam, one Arabic version khurnoob or carob, another sumugha (or gum), Kimchi a desirable thing. Rabbi Selomo a collection of several aromatics. Bochart himself considers it to mean storax. Rosenmüller, in his Bib. Bot. p. 165, Eng. transl., adopts tragacanth as the meaning of necoth, without expressing any doubt on the subject. Tragacanth is an exudation from several species of the genus Astragalus, and subdivision tragacantha, which is produced in Crete, but chiefly in Northern Persia and in Koordistan in the latter province. Dr. Dickson, of Tripoli, saw large quantities of it collected from plants, of which he preserved specimens, and gave them to Mr. Brant, British consul at Erzeroum, by whom they were sent to Dr. Lindley. One of these, yielding the best tragacanth, proved to be A. gummifer of Labillardière. It was found by him on Mount Lebanon, where he ascertained that tragacanth was collected by the shepherds. It might therefore have been conveyed by Ishmaelites from Gilead to Egypt. It has in its favor, that it is a produce of the remote parts of Syria, is described by ancient authors, as Theophrastus, Dioscorides, etc., and has always been highly esteemed as a gum in Eastern countries; it was, therefore, very likely to be an article of commerce to Egypt in ancient times. NECROMANCER (nĕk-rō-mān'sēr), (from Gr. νεκρός, nek-ros', the dead, and μαντεία, man-tee'ah, divination; Heb. נֶקֶף אֱלֹהִים, do'rashe el-ham-may' them', one who inquires of the dead). (See DIVINATION.)

NEDABIAH (nĕd'a-bī'ah), (Heb. נְדַבְיָה, ned-ab-yaw', largess of Jah), the eighth son of Jeconiah, in the line of David (1 Chron. iii:18), B. C. about 560.

NEEDLE (nĕd'l), (Gr. βελός, hraf-ec'e'), occurs in Scripture only in the proverb, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle," etc. (Matt. xix:24; Mark x:25; Luke xviii:25). G. M. Mackie, Hastings' Bib. Dict., says:

"An attempt is sometimes made to explain the needle's eye as a reference to the small door, a little over 2 feet square in the large heavy gate of a walled city. This mars the figure without materially altering the meaning. There is no custom of calling this small opening 'the eye'; it is usually named 'the small door' 'hole' or 'window.'" (See CAMEL.)

NEEDLEWORK (nē'd'lwûrk), (Heb. רִיקְמָוּ, rik-maw', finely embroidered or variegated work; רוֹק־אָמֶה, rok-ame', Exod. xxvi:36; xxvii:16; xxviii:39; xxxvi:37; xxxviii:18; Judg. v:30; Ps. xlv:14, a species of weaving). (See EMBROIDERER; WEAVING.)

NEEDY (nē'dý). See POOR.

NEESING (nēz'ing), (Heb. נִישָׁנִים, at-ee-shaw'). Job xli:18, "By his neesings a light doth shine." Neesing is the older form of the word now written sneezing. The Anglo-Saxon verb was niesan, so that the old form is really nearer the original.

"And waxen in their mirth to neese and swear
A merrier hour was never wasted there."
Shakespeare.

"What a neesing brake
From my Telemachus."
(Chapman, Odyssey, xix:732, 736.)

NEGINAH (nĕg'in-ab), (Ps. lxi). See NEGIN-IOTH.

NEGINIOTH (nĕg-in'y-oth), (Heb. נֶגִינוֹת, neg-ee-nawth'), a word which occurs in the titles of several Psalms. It is a plural form of Neginah, and signifies stringed instruments of music, to be played on by the fingers. The titles of these Psalms may be translated, A Psalm of David to the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments. (See PSALMS, BOOK OF.)

NEHELAMITE (ne-hĕl'a-mite), (Heb. נְהֻלְמִי, han-nekh-el-aw-mee', dreamed), a designation of the false prophet Shemaiah (Jer. xxix:24, 31, 32), derived from his native place or from an ancestor.

NEHEMIAH (nĕ-he-mi'ah), (Heb. נְחֵמְיָהוּ, nekh-em-yaw', comforted of Jehovah).

1. The Jewish patriot, whose genealogy is unknown, except that he was the son of Hachaliah (Neh. i:1), and brother of Hanani (Neh. vii:2). Some think he was of priestly descent, because his name appears at the head of a list of priests in Neh. x:1-8; but it is obvious, from Neh. ix:38, that he stands there as a prince, and not as a priest; that he heads the list because he was head of the nation. Others with some probability infer, from his station at the Persian court and the high commission he received, that he was, like Zerubbabel, of the tribe of Judah and of the house of David (Carpzov, Introductio, etc., P. i, 339).

(1) Appointed Governor. While Nehemiah was cupbearer in the royal palace at Shushan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or 444 years B. C., (see ARTAXERXES), he learned the mournful and desolate condition of the returned colony in Judæa. This filled him with such deep and prayerful concern for his country, that his sad countenance revealed to the king his 'sorrow of heart'; which induced the monarch to ascertain the cause, and also to vouchsafe the remedy, by sending him, with full powers, to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, and 'to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.' Being furnished with this high commission, and enjoying the protection of a military escort (chapter ii:9), Nehemiah reached Jerusalem in the year B. C. 444, and remained there till B. C. 432, being actively engaged for twelve years in promoting the public good (chapter v:14). The principal work which he then accomplished was the rebuilding, or rather the repairing, of the city wall, which was done 'in fifty and two days' (chapter vi:15), notwithstanding many discouragements and difficulties. These were caused chiefly by Sanballat, a Moabite of Horonaim, and Tobiah, an Ammonite, who were leading men in the rival and unfriendly colony of Samaria (chapter iv:1-3). These men, with their allies among the Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites (chapter iv:7), sought to hinder the re-fortifying of Jerusalem, first by scoffing at the attempt; then by threatening to attack the workmen—which Nehemiah averted by 'setting a watch against them day and night,' and arming the whole people, so that 'every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon' (chapter iv:7-18); and finally, when scoffs and threats had failed, by using various stratagems to weaken Nehemiah's authority, and even to take his life (chapter vi:1-14).

(2) Meets Hindrances. But in the midst of these dangers from without, our patriot encountered troubles and hindrances from his own people, arising out of the general distress, which was aggravated by the cruel exactions and oppression of their nobles and rulers, (chapter v:1-5). These popular grievances were promptly redressed on the earnest and solemn remonstrance of Nehemiah, who had himself set a striking example of retrenchment and generosity in his high office (chapter v:6-19). It appears also (chapter vi:17-19) that some of the chief men in Jerusalem were at that time in conspiracy with Tobiah against Nehemiah. The wall was thus built in 'troublesome times' (Dan. ix:25); and its completion was most joyously celebrated by a solemn dedication under Nehemiah's direction (chapter xii:27-43).

(3) Reforms. Having succeeded in fortifying the city, our reformer turned his attention to other measures in order to secure its good government and prosperity. He appointed some necessary officers (chapter vii:1-3; also chapter xii:44-47), and excited among the people more interest and zeal in religion by the public reading and exposition of the law (chapter viii:1-12), by the unequalled celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (chapter viii:13-18), and by the observance of a national fast, when the sins of the people and the iniquities of their fathers were publicly and most strikingly confessed (chapter ix), and when also a solemn covenant was made by all ranks and classes 'to walk in God's law' by avoiding intermarriages with the heathen, by strictly observing the Sabbath, and by contributing to the support of the temple service (chapter x). But the inhabitants of the city were as yet too few to defend it and to ensure its prosperity; and hence Nehemiah brought one out of every ten in the country to take up his abode in the ancient capital which then presented so few inducements to the settler, that 'the people blessed all the men that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem' (chapter vii:4; also chapter xi:1-19).

(4) Assisted by Ezra. In these important public proceedings, which appear all to have happened in the first year of his government, Nehemiah enjoyed the assistance of Ezra, who is named on several occasions as taking a prominent part in conducting affairs (chapters viii:1, 9, 13; xii:36). Ezra had gone up to Jerusalem thirteen years before according to some, or thirty-three years according to others; but on either reckoning, without supposing unusual longevity, he might well have lived to be Nehemiah's fellow-laborer. (See EZRA).

(5) Return to Babylon. Nehemiah, at the close of his successful administration, 'from the twentieth year even to the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes the king' (chapter v:14), returned to Babylon (B. C. 432), and resumed, as some think, his duties as royal cupbearer.

(6) Again at Jerusalem. He returned, however, after a while, to Jerusalem, where his services became again requisite, in consequence of abuses that had crept in during his absence. His stay at the court of Artaxerxes was not very long (certainly not above nine years); 'for after certain days he obtained leave of the king and came to Jerusalem' (chapter xiii:6, 7).

After his return to the government of Judæa, Nehemiah enforced the separation of all the mixed multitude from Israel (chapter xiii:1-3); and accordingly expelled Tobiah the Ammonite from the chamber which the high-priest, Eliashib, had prepared for him in the temple (chapter xiii:4-9). Better arrangements were also made for the support of the temple service (chapter xiii:10-14), and for the rigid observance of the Sabbath (chapter xiii:15-22). One of the last acts of his government was an effort to put an end to mixed marriages, which led him to 'chase' away a son of Joiada the high-priest, because he was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite (chapter xiii:23-29). The duration of this second administration cannot be determined; only it is evident that Joiada was high-priest during that period. Now Joiada, according to some chronologists, succeeded his father Eliashib in the year B. C. 413; and hence we may gather that Nehemiah's second rule lasted at least ten years, namely, from B. C. 424 to 413. It is not unlikely that he remained at his post till about the year B. C. 405, towards the close of the reign of Darius Nothus, who is mentioned in chapter xii:22. (See DARIUS.)

(7) Death. At this time Nehemiah would be between sixty and seventy years old, if we suppose him (as most do) to have been only between twenty and thirty when he first went to Jerusalem. That he lived to be an old man is thus quite probable from the sacred history; and this is expressly declared by Josephus, who (Antiq. xi:5, 6) states that he died at an advanced age. Of the place and year of death nothing is known.

(8) Character. Few men in any age of the world have combined in themselves a more rigid adherence to duty, a sterner opposition to wrong, private or public, a more unswerving faith in God, or a purer patriotism, than Nehemiah. His character seems almost without a blemish.

2. The son of Azbuk (Neh. iii:16), respecting whom no more is known than that he was ruler in Beth-zur (B. C. 445), and took a prominent part in repairing the wall of Jerusalem. (See BETH-ZUR.)

3. Another Nehemiah is mentioned (Ezra ii:2; Neh. vii:7) among those who accompanied Zerubbabel on the first return from captivity (B. C. 445). Nothing further is known of this man, though some writers (see Carpzov, Introd. ad Lib. Bib. Vet. Testamenti, P. i, 340, sq.) hold him, without valid reasons, to be the same with the well-known Jewish patriot.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF (nē-he-mī'ah bōōk ðv), the sixteenth in the order of books in the Old Testament.

(1) Name. It bears the title Nehemiah's Words, and was anciently connected with Ezra, as if it formed part of the same work (Eichhorn, Einleitung, ii, 627). This connection is still indicated by its first words, 'And it came to pass.' It arose, doubtless, from the fact that Nehemiah is a sort of continuation of Ezra. (See EZRA.)

(2) Contents. The work can scarcely be called a history of Nehemiah and his times. It is rather a collection of notices of some important transactions that happened during the first year of his government, with a few scraps from his later history. The contents appear to be arranged in chronological order, with the exception perhaps of ch. xii:27-43, where the account of the dedication of the wall seems out of its proper place; we might expect it rather after ch. vii:1-4, where the completion of the wall is mentioned.

The book is concerned with Nehemiah's great work of rebuilding Jerusalem and the reclamation of the customs and laws of Moses, which had fallen into desuetude. It gives the whole history of this movement in the circumstances which led to it, the elements of opposition which threatened to defeat it, and the complete success which crowned it. Incidentally we are admitted to a glance at the condition, moral and political, of the Jews, at the growing bitterness between them and the Samaritans, and at some scenes in Assyrian life. The account of the walls and gates in ch. iii is among the most valuable documents for the settlement of the topography of ancient Jerusalem. The registers and lists of names are also of value.

(3) Date. As to the date of the book, it is not likely that it came from Nehemiah's hand till near the close of his life. Certainly it could not have been all written before the expulsion of the priest, recorded in ch. xiii:23-29, which took place about the year B. C. 413.

(4) Authorship. While the book, as a whole, is considered to have come from Nehemiah, it consists in part of compilation. He doubtless wrote the greater part himself, but some portions he evidently took from other works. It is allowed by all that he is, in the strictest sense, the author of the narrative from ch. i to ch. vii:5 (Hävernick, Einleitung, ii, 304). The account in ch. vii:6-73 is avowedly compiled, for he says in ver. 5, 'I found a register,' etc. This register we actually find also in Ezra ii:1-70; hence it might be thought that our author borrowed this part from Ezra; but it is more likely that they both copied from public documents, such as 'the book of the chronicles,' mentioned in Neh. xii:23.

Chapters viii-x were probably not written by Nehemiah, since the narrative respecting him is in the third person (ch. viii:9; x:1), and not in the first as usual (ch. ii:9-20). Hävernick, indeed, (Einleitung, ii:305-308) makes it appear, from the contents and style, that Ezra was the writer of this portion. The remaining chapters (xi-xiii) also exhibit some marks of compilation (ch. xii:26, 47); but there are, on the contrary, clear proofs of Nehemiah's own authorship in ch. xii:27-43, and in ch. xiii:6-31; and hence Hävernick thinks he wrote the whole except ch. xii:1-26, which he took from 'the book of the chronicles,' mentioned in verse 23.

The mention of Jaddua as a high-priest, in ch. xii:11, 22, has occasioned much perplexity. This Jaddua appears to have been in office in B. C. 332, when Alexander the Great came to Jerusalem (Joseph. Antiq. xi:8); how then could he be named by Nehemiah? The common, and perhaps the readiest, escape from this difficulty is to regard the naming of Jaddua as an addition by a later hand. Yet it is just credible that Nehemiah wrote it, if we bear in mind that he lived to be an old man, so as possibly to see the year B. C. 370; and if we further suppose that Jaddua had at that time entered on his office, so that he filled it for about forty years, i. e. till B. C. 332. In support of this conjecture, see especially Hävernick's Einleitung, ii:320-324.

L. W. Batten, in Hastings' Bib. Dict., says: "There can be little doubt that the final editor of Ezra-Nehemiah was the author of the Book of Chronicles. He gathered material and prepared a history written according to his own point of view from Adam to Nehemiah. His work was one long piece, Ezra-Nehemiah being a part of Chronicles. But the latter had a considerable struggle to get into the canon."

NEHILOTH (nē'hi-lōth), (Ps. v), (Heb. נְהִילוֹת, neh-ee-loth', means wind instruments).

The title of the fifth Psalm may be thus translated, "A Psalm of David, addressed to the master of music presiding over the wind instruments." (See PSALMS, BOOK OF.)

NEHUM (nē'hum), (Heb. נְהוּם, neh-khoom', consoled).

One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community and one of those who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii:7), B. C. about 445. The name appears in 1 Esdras v:8, as Roimus.

NEHUSHTA (ne-hūsh'tā), (Heb. נְחֻשְׁתָּא, nekh-oosh-taw', brass), the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem and the mother of King Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxiv:8), B. C. about 616.

NEHUSHTAN (ne - hūsh ' tan), (Heb. נְחֻשְׁתָּן, nekh-oosh-tawn', made of copper), a name given by Hezekiah, king of Judah, to the brazen serpent that Moses had set up in the wilderness (Num. xxi:8), and which had been preserved by the Israelites to that time.

The superstitious people having made an idol of this serpent, Hezekiah caused it to be burnt, and in derision gave it the name of Nehushtan—this little brazen serpent (2 Kings xviii:4).

NEIEL (ne-i'el), (Heb. נְעִיֵל, neh-ee-ale', dwelling-place of God), a village of Asher near the southeastern boundary (Josh. xix:27). Not identified.

NEIGH (nā), (Heb. נִיחַ, tsaw-hal', to sound clear), Jer. viii:16; xiii:27; 1:11, A. V., "bellow as bulls"; marg. neigh as steeds; R. V., neigh as strong horses.

Figuratively used to indicate lustful desire in Jer. v:8, of one who "neighed after his neighbor's wife."

NEIGHBOR (nā'bēr), (Heb. רֵעִי, ray'ah, associate; Gr. πλησιον, plai-see'on, near), signifies a near relation, a fellow countryman, one of the same tribe or vicinage; and generally, any man connected with us by the bonds of humanity, and whom charity requires that we should consider as a friend and relation (Deut. v:20).

At the time of our Savior, the Pharisees had restrained the meaning of the word neighbor to those of their own nation, or to their own friends; holding, that to hate their enemy was not forbidden by the law (Matt. v:43; Luke x:27). But our Lord informed them, that the whole world were neighbors, and illustrated the proposition in the parable of the Good Samaritan who helped the wounded Jew in spite of the bitter feeling existing between the Samaritans and the Jews.

It was because neighborhood was almost exclusively the condition of social contact that the neighbor was specified in connection with the Mosaic provisions of mercy, truth and justice. The stranger was guarded by the law of hospitality. (G. M. Mackie, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

NEKEB (nē'keb), (Heb. נֶקֶב, neh'keb, a cavern), a town on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix:33).

The R. V. joins the name with the word preceding, making it Adami-nekeb. This name is found, in a corrupt form, of a ruin about three miles north-west of the outlet of the Sea of Galilee.

NEKODA (ne-kō'dā), (Heb. נְקוֹדָא, nek-o-daw', distinguished).

1. The founder of a family of Temple servants, who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:48; Neh. vii:50), B. C. 535.

2. A progenitor of certain persons who after the return from captivity had lost their pedigree (Ezra ii:60; Neh. vii:62), probably the same as 1.

NEMUEL (ne-mū'el), (Heb. נְמוּאֵל, nem-oo-ale', God is spreading, or day of God).

1. A son of Simeon and head of the Nemuelites (Num. xxvi:12), called JEMUEL (Gen. xlv:10).

2. A Reubenite, son of Eliab and brother of Dathan and Abiram (Num. xxvi:9), B. C. about 1619.

NEMUELITES (ne-mū'el-ites), (Heb. נְמוּאֵלִים, nem-oo-ale-ee'), descendants of Nemuel, son of Simeon (Num. xxvi:12).

NEPHEG (nē'phæg), (Heb. נֶפֶג, neh'fæg, sprout).

1. One of the sons of Izhar, the son of Kohath (Exod. vi:21).

2. The ninth of David's sons, born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v:15; 1 Chron. iii:7; xiv:6), B. C. after 1000.

NEPHEW (nēf'ū), is the rendering of Heb. נֶכֶד, bane, Judg. xii:14; נֶכֶד, neh'ked, offspring, Job xviii:19; Is. xiv:22; Gr. ἐκγονον, ek'gon-on, 1 Tim. v:4; in the old English sense of grandson or descendant.

"If any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home, and to requite their parents" (1 Tim. v:4).

In our present use the word nephew is confined to the son of a brother or of a sister; but formerly it had a less strict meaning, and might denote a grandson or even a more remote relation. In the above passage 'children or nephews' means, 'children or grandchildren'.

Nephew comes to us through the French neveu, from the Latin nepos.

In the Augustan age nepos meant 'grandson'; in the post-Augustan age, sister's or brother's son.

Our word nepotism, from nepas, and meaning family favoritism, retains the original wide signification.

"The warts, black moles, spots and freckles of fathers, not appearing at all upon their children's skin, begin afterwards to put forth and show themselves in their nephews, to-wit, the children of their sons and daughters" (Holland's Translation of Plutarch's Morals.) (See Swinton's Bib. Word Book; Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

NEPHILIM (nē'phil-īm), (Heb. נְפִילִים, nef-ee-leem', Gen. vi:4; Num. xiii:33). See GIANTS.

NEPHISH (nē'phish), (1 Chron. v:19). See NAPHISH.

NEPHISHESIM (ne-phish'e-sīm), (Heb. נְפִישִׁים, nef-oo-shes-eem', Neh. vii:52). See NEPHUSIM.

NEPHTALIM (nepht'a-īm), (Gr. Νεφθαλιμ, nef-thal-eim'), the country and tribe of Naphtali (Matt. iv:13, 15; Rev. vii:6). (See NAPHALI).

NEPHTOAH (nēph'to-ah), (Heb. נְפִתּוֹאֵה, nef-to-akh, opened).

The name of a place with a fountain and stream of water on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin, west of Jerusalem (Josh. xv:9; xviii:15). It is commonly located at 'Ain Lifta, two miles northwest of Jerusalem, though Porter (Handbook, p. 232) places it at 'Ain Yalo, three miles southwest of Jerusalem.

NEPHUSIM (ne-phū'sim), (Heb. נֶפְתִּישִׁים, nef-see-seem), expansions, founder of a family of Temple servants who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:50), B. C. about 535. In Neh. vii:52 the form is Nephtishesim.

NER (nēr), (Heb. נֵר, nare, a light; Sept. Nḗp, nare), grandfather of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv:50, 51; xxvi:5. 1 Chron. viii:33). The statement in 1 Chron. ix:36, that Kish and Ner were both sons of Jeiel (A. V. Jehiel), is explained by the supposition of an elder Kish, uncle of Saul's father, or, rather, Ner's grandfather (B. C. 1140).

J. F. Stenning, Hastings' Bib. Dict., makes Ner the son of Abiel, the father of Abner, and therefore the uncle of Saul (1 Sam. xiv:50, 51). We must render the passage, 'And Kish, the father of Saul, and Ner, the father of Abner, were sons of Abiel.'

NERD or NARD (nērd ōr nārd), (Heb. נֵרְד, nayrd), is mentioned in three places in the Song of Solomon, and by Mark and John in the New Testament, under the name of vápōos, nardos, spikenard or nerd.

(1) Spikenard. Both are translated in the Authorized Version by the word spikenard, which indicates a far-famed perfume of the East, that has often engaged the attention of critics, but the plant which yields it has only been ascertained in very recent times. That the nerd of Scripture was a perfume is evident from the passages in which it occurs. Cant. i:12: 'While the king sitteth at his table, my spikenard (nard) sendeth forth the smell thereof.' So in Cant. iv:14: 'Spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices.' Here we find it mentioned along with many of the most valued aromatics which were known to the ancients, and all of which, with the exception perhaps of saffron, must have been obtained by foreign commerce from distant countries, as Persia, the east coast of Africa, Ceylon, the northwest and the southeast of India, and in the present instance even from the remote Himalayan mountains. Such substances must necessarily have been costly when the means of communication were defective, and the gains of the successful merchant proportionately great.

(2) Costly. That the nard or vápōos was of great value we learn from the New Testament (Mark xiv:3). When our Savior sat at meat in Bethany, 'there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of (vápōos) spikenard very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head.' So in John xii:3: 'Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair; and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment.' On this Judas, who afterwards betrayed our Savior, said (verse 5), 'Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?' This spikenard probably cost the devoted woman about £12, or $62.50.

(3) Possible Identification. The nard, vápōos, was known in very early times, and is noticed by Theophrastus, and by Hippocrates. There can be no doubt that the jatamansi of the Hindoos is the sunbul hindee of the Arabs, which they compare to the tail of an ermine. This would almost be sufficient to identify the drug. As many Indian products found their way into Egypt and Palestine, and are mentioned in Scripture, indeed in the very passage with nard we have calamus, cinnamon, and aloes (ahalim), there is no reason why spikenard from the Himalayas could not as easily have been procured. The only difficulty appears to arise from the term vápōos, nard, having occasionally been used in a general sense, and therefore there is sometimes confusion between the nard and the sweet cane (Kaneh-bosem), another Indian product. Some difference of opinion exists respecting the fragrance of the jatamansi; it may be sufficient to state that it continues to be highly esteemed in Eastern countries in the present day, where fragrant essences are still procured from it, as the unguentum nardinum was of old. NEREUS (nē'reūs), (Gr. Nḗpevs, nare-yoos), wet, a Christian living at Rome, to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. xvi:15), A. D. 55.

The name is found in the inscriptions of the imperial household and is well known in the legends of the Roman church. (Acta Sanctorum Bull. Arch. Christ. 1874, p. 20; 1875, p. 8; Lightfoot, Clement, i, p. 51; A. C. Headlam, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) NERGAL (nē'gal), (Heb. נֵרְגַל, nare-gal), a great hero), a deity of the Cushites (2 Kings xvii:30).

The Rabbinical commentators believe that this idol was in the form of a cock; founding their not very happy conjecture apparently upon the fact that in the Talmud the similar word tarnegal means a cock. The more measured researches of Norberg, Gesenius, and other inquirers into the idolatry of the Assyrians and Chaldeans, lead to the conclusion that nare-gal is the same as the Zabian name for the planet Mars. This name of the planet, both among the Zabians and Arabians means ill-luck, misfortune; and it was by no means peculiar to the mythology of the West to make it the symbol of bloodshed and war. Among the people first named, the planet Mars was typified under the figure of a man holding in one hand a drawn sword, and in the other a human head just cut off; and his garments were also red, which, as well as the other ideas attached to this idol, were no doubt founded on the reddish hue which the body of the planet presents to the eye. Among the southern Arabs his temple was painted red; and they offered to him garments stained with blood, and also a warrior (probably a prisoner), who was cast into a pool.

NERGAL-SHAREZER (nēr'gal-sha-rē'zer). (Heb. נֶרְגַל־שָׂרֵזֶר, nare-gal'shar-eh-tser', perh, Nergal, prince of fire).

1. A military chieftain under Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxix:3).

2. The chief of the magi (Rab-mag) under the same king, and present in the same expedition (Jer. xxxix:3, 13).

He is generally identified with Neriglissar of profane history, who married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, and ascended the throne two years after that monarch's death. A palace built by him has been discovered among the ruins of Babylon, and his name found on bricks.

In the Biblical description of the end of the reign of Sennacherib he is said to have been killed by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix:37; Is. xxxvii:38). There is little doubt that this name Sharezer is simply the latter part of the name Nergal-sharezer.

The name is given by Abydemus as Nergilos, so that the Old Testament has preserved the latter half of his name and the Greek historian the first half. Abbreviations of names in this manner are common among Assyrians and Babylonians. The Assyrian story of the death of Sennacherib is much more brief in its details, and does not mention the names of his murderers. It is as follows: "On the twentieth day of Tebet, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was killed by his son during an insurrection. . . . From the twentieth day of Tebet to the second day of Adar, the insurrection continued, and on the eighteenth day of Sivan (of the following year) Esarhaddon ascended the throne." It will be observed that in this account the death of Sennacherib is ascribed to the act of one son, and not to two, as in the Old Testament. There has not yet been found any further allusion to the matter in the inscriptions. It is a probable conjecture that the death of the Assyrian king was due to the jealousy felt for his son Esarhaddon, who succeeded him (Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

A. H. Sayce, Hastings' Bib. Dict., inclines to the belief that the supposed two persons are the same individual. He says: "It is hardly doubtful that the Nergal-sharezer who, in Jeremiah, occupies a place so near Nebuchadnezzar, is the Nergal-sharezer who subsequently became king of Babylon. Nergal-sharezer was the son of Belsum-iskum, to whom, in one of his son's inscriptions, is erroneously given the title of king. In B. C. 559 Evil merodach was murdered and Nergal-sharezer seized the throne, which he held for four years."

NERI (nē'ri), (Gr. Νῆρι, nay-ree'), son of Melchi and father of Salathiel in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:27, 28); probably the same as NERIAH (which see) (Jer. li:59).

NERIAH (ne-ri'ah), (Heb. נֶרְיָהוּ, nay-ree-yah', Jah is light). The son of Maaseiah and father of Seraiah and Baruch (Jer. xxxii:12; xxxvi:4; li:59); probably identical with NERI (Luke iii:27, 28), B. C. about 620.

NERO (nē'rō), (2 Tim., subscription), a Roman emperor, born at Antium, probably December 15, A. D. 37 was the son of Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus by Agrippina, the sister of Caligula, his original name being Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus.

In the first part of his reign he showed great clemency and justice, pretending to copy after Augustus. In the end of it he became one of the most tyrannical and licentious wretches that ever breathed. He murdered his mother, and almost all his friends and principal subjects. He was the great patron of all fooleries and debaucheries. He is not named in Scripture; but he is indicated by his title of emperor, and by his surname Cæsar. To him St. Paul appealed after his imprisonment by Felix, and his examination by Festus, who was swayed by the Jews. St. Paul was therefore carried to Rome, where he arrived A. D. 61. Here he continued two years, preaching the gospel with freedom, till he became famous even in the emperor's court, in which were many Christians; for he salutes the Philippians in the name of the brethren who were of the household of Cæsar, that is, of Nero's court (Phil. i:12, 13; iv:22). We have no particular information how he cleared himself from the accusations of the Jews, whether by answering before Nero, or whether his enemies dropped their prosecutions, which seems probable (Acts xxviii:21). However, it appears that he was liberated in the year 63.

Nero, the most cruel and savage of all men, and also the most wicked and depraved, began his persecution against the Christian church A. D. 64, on pretense of the burning of Rome, of which some have thought himself to be the author. He endeavored to throw all the odium on the Christians; those were seized first that were known publicly as such, and by their means many others were discovered. They were condemned to death, and were even insulted in their sufferings. Some were sewed up in the skins of beasts, and then exposed to dogs to be torn in pieces; some were nailed to crosses; others perished by fire. The latter were sewed up in pitched coverings, which, being set on fire, served as torches to the people, and were lighted up in the night. Nero gave leave to use his own gardens as the scene of all these cruelties. From this time edicts were published against the Christians, and many martyrs suffered, especially in Italy. St. Peter and St. Paul are thought to have suffered martyrdom, consequent on this persecution, A. D. 65.

The revolt of the Jews from the Romans happened about A. D. 65 and 66, in the twelfth and thirteenth of Nero. The city of Jerusalem making an insurrection, A. D. 66, Florus there slew 3,600 persons, and thus began the war. A little while afterwards, those of Jerusalem killed the Roman garrison. Cestius on this came to Jerusalem to suppress the sedition; but he was forced to retire after having besieged it about six weeks, and was routed in his retreat, A. D. 66. About the end of the same year, Nero gave Vespasian the command of his troops against the Jews. This general carried on the war in Galilee and Judea during A. D. 67 and 68, the thirteenth and fourteenth of Nero. But Nero killing himself in the fourteenth year of his reign, Jerusalem was not besieged till after his death, A. D. 70, the first and second years of Vespasian's reign.

NESER (nē'ser). See EAGLE.

NEST (nĕst), (Heb. כֵּנֶס, kane, from כָּנַס, kaw-nan', to build; Gr. κατασκήνωσις, kat-as-kay'no-sis, encampment, a perch).

1. A small lodgment, where fowls hatch their young (Deut. xxii:6).

2. The eggs or young birds in a nest (Deut. xxxii:11; Is. x:14).

Figurative. (1) A habitation seemingly very secure and undisturbed (Jer. xlix:16; Obad. 4; Hab. ii:9). (2) "To die in one's nest" (Job xxix:18) seems to mean in the bosom of one's family, with children to succeed him. (3) The Assyrians, Amorites, and other nations are likened to cedars in whose boughs all the fowls of heaven made their nests to mark their great strength, pride, and prosperity (Ezek. xxxi:6). (4) A 'nest in cedars,' is houses built of cedar wood (Jer. xxii:23). (5) The figure of the partridge "gathering young which she hath not brought forth" (Jer. xvii:11, marg.) is applied to one who wrongfully gathers riches. (6) The robbing of a nest in the absence of the parent birds is symbolical of an easy victory (Is. x:14).

NET (nēt), (Heb. רֶמֶשׂ, kkeh-rem', a net, snare, harm).

There are in Scripture several words denoting different kinds of nets, and this, with the frequency of images derived from them, shows that nets were much in use among the Hebrews for fishing, hunting, and fowling. Indeed, for the two latter purposes, nets were formerly used to an extent of which now, since the invention of firearms, a notion can scarcely be formed.

(1) Fishing Nets. We have no positive information concerning the nets of the Hebrews, and can only suppose that they were not materially different from those of the ancient Egyptians, concerning which we now possess very good information. Indeed, the nets of Egypt, the fishers who used them, and the fish caught by them, are more than once mentioned in Scripture (Is. xix:8). The usual fishing net among this people was of a long form, like the common drag-net, with wooden floats on the upper, and leads on the lower side. It was sometimes let down from a boat, but those who pulled it usually stood on the shore, and landed the fish on a shelving bank. This mode, however, was more adapted to river than to lake fishing; and hence, in all the detailed examples of fishing in the New Testament, the net is cast from and drawn into boats, excepting in one case where, the draft being too great to take into the boat, the fishers dragged the net after their boats to the shore (John xxi:6, 8). Sometimes use was made of a smaller net for catching fish in shallow water, furnished with a pole on either side, to which it was attached; and the fisherman, holding one of the poles in either hand, thrust it below the surface of the water, and awaited the moment when a shoal of fish passed over it.

It is interesting to observe that the fishermen in the boat, excepting the master, are almost naked, as are also those who have occasion to wade in the water in hauling the net to the shore. Such seems also to have been the practice among his Hebrew fishermen; for Peter, when he left the boat to hasten on shore to his risen Lord, 'girt his fisher's coat unto him, for he was naked' (John xxi:7); although, in this case, the word 'naked' must be understood with some latitude. (See NAKED.)

(2) Nets for Birds. Nets were also used in taking birds, to an extent of which we can scarcely form an adequate conception. A clap net was usually employed. This was of different kinds. It consisted of two sides or frames, over which the net work was spread; at one end was a short net, which they fastened to a bush, or a cluster of reeds, and at the other was one of considerable length, which, as soon as the birds were seen feeding in the area within, was pulled by the fowlers, causing the instantaneous collapse of the two sides. In hunting, a space of considerable size was sometimes enclosed with nets, into which the animals were driven by beaters. The spots thus enclosed were usually in the vicinity of the water brooks to which they were in the habit of repairing in the morning and evening; and having awaited the time when they went to drink, the hunters disposed their nets, occupied proper positions for observing them unseen, and gradually closed in upon them. These practices are obviously alluded to in such passages as Job xix:6; Ps. cxl:5; Is. li:20.

Figurative. (1) God's "net," is the entangling afflictions wherewith he chastises or punishes men (Job xix:6). Or the church; or the dispensation of the gospel, whereby many are drawn to Christ. This is cast into the sea of this world, and many are either really, or in appearance drawn by it. At last it will be emptied into the eternal state (Matt. xiii:47-50). (2) The "net" of wicked men wherewith they ensnare others, and draw wealth and power to themselves, is their crafty plots, and vigorously executed purposes of mischief (Ps. ix:15; cxl:5; Mic. vii:2; Hab. i:16). (3) The Jewish rulers and priests were a "net," a means of drawing others into sin and ruin (Hos. v:1). 'In vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird,' without cause, traps are laid to ensnare and destroy innocent persons (Prov. i:17). (See FISHHOOK.)

NETER (nē'tēr), (Heb. נֵתֵר, neh'ther; Sept. and Symmachus, νίτρον, nit'ron; Vulg. nitrum; English version 'niter'), occurs in Prov. xxv:20; Jer. ii:22; where the substance in question is described as effervescing with vinegar, and as being used in washing; neither of which particulars applies to what is now, by a misappropriation of this ancient name, called 'niter,' and which in modern usage means the saltpeter of commerce, but they both apply to the natron or true nitrum of the ancients.

The similarity of the names which is observable in this case is considered by Gesenius of great weight in a production of the East, the name of which usually passed with the article itself into Greece. Both Greek and Roman writers describe natron by the words given in the Sept. and Vulgate. Jerome, in his note on Prov. xxv:20, considers this to be the substance intended. Natron, though found in many parts of the East, has ever been one of the distinguishing natural productions of Egypt. This substance, according to Herodotus, was used by the Egyptians in the process of embalming (ii:76, 77). The principal natron lakes now found in Egypt, six in number, are situate in a barren valley about thirty miles westward of the Delta, where it both floats as a whitish scum upon the water, and is found deposited at the bottom in a thick incrustation, after the water is evaporated by the heat of summer. It is a natural mineral alkali, composed of the carbonate, sulphate, and muriate of soda, derived from the soil of that region. Forskal says that it is known by the name atrun, or natrun, that it effervesces with vinegar, and is used as a soap in washing linen, and by the bakers as yeast, and in cookery to assist in boiling meat, etc. (Flora Aegyptiaco-Arabica, Hauniae, 1775, pp. 45, 46). Combined with oil it makes a harder and firmer soap than the vegetable alkali. (See BORITII.) The application of the name niter to saltpeter seems accounted for by the fact that the knowledge of natron, the true niter, was lost for many centuries in this country, till revived by the Hon. R. Boyle, who says he 'had had some of it brought to him from Egypt.' (See NITER.) J. F. D.

NETHANEEL (ne-thān'e-el), (Heb. נֶתְנָאֵל, neth-an-ale', God gives).

1. Son of Zuar and prince of the tribe of Is-sachar at the time of the exodus (Num. i:8; ii:5; vii:18, 23; x:15), B. C. 1657.

2. Brother of David and the fourth son of Jesse (1 Chron. ii:14), B. C. about 1070.

3. A priest who blew trumpets when David brought up the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv:24), B. C. 1043.

4. A Levite, father of Shemaiah, the scribe (1 Chron. xxiv:6), B. C. before 1014.

5. Son of Obed-edom, and a porter in the Temple in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi:4), B. C. about 1014.

6. One of the five whom Jehoshaphat sent to instruct the cities of Judah in the law (2 Chron. xvii:7), B. C. 912.

7. One of the chief Levites in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv:9), B. C. 628.

8. A son of Pashur, who put away his foreign wife (Ezra x:22), B. C. 458.

9. A priest, head of the father's house in the time of Joiakim, the high priest (Neh. xii:21), B. C. about 446.

10. A son of a priest and brother of Zechariah, who blew a trumpet at the celebration dedicating the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:36), B. C. 446. Perhaps the same as 9.

NETHANIAH (něth'a-ni'ah), (Heb. נְתַנְיָהוּ, nethan-yaw', given of Jehovah).

1. A son of Asaph, and head of the fifth division of Temple singers (1 Chron. xxv:2, 12), B. C. about 961.

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the cities of Judah in the law (2 Chron. xvii:8), B. C. about 869.

3. Son of Shelamiah and father of Jehudi (Jer. xxxvi:14), B. C. about 606.

4. A man of the family of Judah and father of the Ishmael who killed Gedaliah (2 Kings xxv:23, 25; Jer. xl:8, 14, 15; xli:1, 2, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 18), B. C. about 620.

NETHINIM (něth'i-nim), (Heb. נְתִינִים, naw-theen', one given).

(1) Servants of the Temple. This name, which means 'the given,' or 'the devoted,' was applied to the servants of the temple, or temple slaves, who were under the Levites in the ministry of the tabernacle and temple.

(2) Origin and Duties. The first servants whom the Levites obtained were the Gibeonites, on whom devolved the very laborious services of fetching water and collecting wood (Josh. ix:3-27). The number of such servants appears to have been increased by David; and it seems to have been then, when these servants ceased to be wholly Gibeonites, that Nethinim came into use as a proper name for the whole class (Ezra viii:20). From that time forward they appear to have been no longer regarded or treated as slaves, but as the lowest order of the servants of the sanctuary; who, although in their origin foreigners and heathen, had doubtless embraced the Jewish religion. These did not all forget their relationship to the sanctuary during the Captivity. Some of them returned to their duties under the decree of Cyrus, and were placed in cities with the Levites (Neh. xi:3; Ezra ii:70; 1 Chron. ix:2).

(3) Number and Position. It was not to be expected that many of them would return to this humble station in Palestine, but 220 accompanied Ezra (Ezra viii:20), and 392 Zerubbabel (ii:5, 8). The voluntary devotedness which was thus manifested by these persons considerably raised the station of the Nethinim, which was thenceforth regarded rather as honorable than degrading. Their number was, however, insufficient for the service of the temple; whence, as Josephus tells us (De Bell. Jud. ii. 17, 6), a festival, called Ξυλοφορία, Xylophoria, was established, in which the people, to supply the deficiency, were obliged to bring a certain quantity of wood to the temple for the use of the altar of burnt-offering.

NETOPHAH (ne-tō'phah), (Heb. נְטוֹפָא, net-ot-faw', distillation), a town, apparently in Judah, the name of which occurs only in the catalogue of those who returned with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (Ezra ii:22; Neh. vii:26; 1 Esdr. v:18).

Netophah was really an old place. Two of David's guard, Maharai and Heldai (1 Chron. xxvii:13, 15) were Netophathites. The "villages of the Netophathites" were the residence of the Levites (1 Chron. ix:16). Levites who inhabited these villages were singers (Neh. xii:28). From Neh. vii:26, the town seems to have been in the neighborhood, or closely connected with, Bethlehem. Van de Velde suggests Antubeh, two miles north-east of Bethlehem, as the site of Netophah. The Palestine Memoirs note ruins northeast of Bethlehem that were called Metoba, or Khurbet Umm Tōba, probably the same as Antubeh of Van de Velde, and Conder identifies them as ancient Netophah.

NETOPHATHI (ne-tōph'a-thi), (Heb. נְטוֹפָאִי, net-ot-faw'thee, inhabitant of Netophah), an inhabitant of Netophah, called the son of Salma (Neh. xii:28), who probably founded the village (2 Sam. xxiii:28, 29; Jer. xl:8).

NETOPHATHITE (ne-tōph'a-thite), (Heb. נְטוֹפָאִי, han-net-ot-faw-thee', 1 Chron. ii:54). See NETOPHATHI.

NETTLE (net'fl). See THORNS AND THISTLES.

NETWORK (nět'wŭrk').

1. (Heb. רֶהֶשֶׁת, reh'sheth, net), a broad plate of brass, full of holes, in the manner of a sieve, that was fixed below the fire of the altar, and through which the ashes fell down.

2. (Heb. שֵׁבִיבֹת, seb-aw-kaw'), the plaited work around the two court pillars of the temple (1 Kings vii:18, 20, 42). (See TEMPLE.)

3. (Heb. כְּוֵר, khore, white, Is. xix:9, marg. "white works"), the general name for cotton fabrics, or the different kinds of byssus that were woven in Egypt. (See BYSSUS.)

NETZ (nětz). See HAWK.

NEVER (něv'ēr), (Gr. οὐδέ, oo-deh', Matt. xxvii:14). "He answered him to never a word," i. e., not at all, in any manner.

NEW, NEWNESS (nū, nū'nēs), (Gr. καινότης, kai-ee-not'ace). New things or innovations were abhorrent to the people of the Orient, among whom many tendencies converge towards the veneration of use and wont. Of these the following are the most noteworthy:

(1) The uniformity of the rotation in seasons with corresponding climatic changes (Gen. viii:22; 1 Sam. xii:16-18). (Unseasonable weather was an innovation.)

(2) The conservative influence of the patriarchal government.

(3) The transmission of the same handicraft from father to son, etc.

(4) The remaining upon the land of the inhabitants when it is sold.

(5) The religious conviction that whatever exists is by the will of God. Hence Orientals came to regard Custom as a principle of high authority and to regard whatever is new with profound surprise, etc. (G. M. Mackie, Hastings' Bib. Diet.).

Newness in general means different from or more excellent than what went before. Thus are new creatures, and have a new spirit, a new heart, and all things new; instead of the old corrupt and carnal views, and dispositions, and manner of life, they have spiritual knowledge, holy dispositions, and pious lives, springing from a conscience purified by the blood of Christ, and a heart actuated by his Spirit, excited by his love, and directed to his glory (Rom. vi:4; vii:6; Gal. vi:15; 2 Cor. v:17; Ezek. xi:19; and xxxvi:26; Rev. xxi:1).

NEW BIRTH (nū bērh). See REGENERATION.

NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH.

The New Jerusalem Church originated in the doctrines of the opened Word revealed to mankind in the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg.

(1) The Founder. Emanuel Swedenborg was the son of a Swedish Lutheran Bishop, a scholar, a practical engineer, intrusted with a high official position, a member of the Swedish diet, a man of science, a philosopher, a theologian, and a seer, who lived between 1688 and 1772. This life of over four-score years of untiring energy divides itself upon superficial observation into two periods. The first fifty years of it were devoted to the pursuit of natural learning and independent investigation in science and philosophy; the remaining years to an equally diligent discharge of the "holy office" to which he was called by the Lord Himself. With a thorough academic training, he began with the cultivation of the mathematical and physical sciences, and showed such ability in theoretical science, that he was entrusted with a position in the college of mines that gave him practical control of the development of the mineral wealth of Sweden. While in the faithful discharge of his official affairs he was elaborating in private and publishing from time to time the most sublime and extensive philosophical attempts upon which any single mind ever ventured. Of his philosophical writings, beginning with the Principia, devoted to a complete natural philosophy of the elemental world, and continuing with his works on the Animal Kingdom or the kingdom of the Anima, including a rational physiology as the basis of a rational psychology, it is not enough to say that he anticipated by the application of his analytical and synthetic processes, many of the results of subsequent experimental discovery in every realm of science; it must rather be said that he announced philosophical doctrines, which are far more masterful in explaining the larger field of facts awaiting explanation to-day, than they were appreciable to his own generation.

He was during this entire period the precise type of man which this generation delights to honor; strong, keen, self-reliant, practical. Endowed with a hardy constitution, he had a calm, placid disposition; led an active, laborious, cheerful life, traveling continually and keeping himself posted in the developments of science and contributing to its theoretical and practical achievements; composing his works and conducting his literary business unaided; enjoying the confidence of his king and fellow statesmen; discussing politics in the senate and memorializing the government on finance and other weighty matters; while he was elaborating and publishing a system of universal philosophy, more complete and probably more enduring and controlling than any which bears the name of a human author, and to which the logic of events is compelling the attention of the learned after a century and a half of marvelous experimental research. Such was Swedenborg the assessor. A more penetrating and practical, and at the same time laborious and comprehensive man of thought never lived.

At the age of fifty-six, in the full maturity of his powers, he was called, as he declares, "to a holy office by the Lord, who most graciously manifested himself to me in person, and opened my sight to a view of the spiritual world, and granted me the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels." "From that day forth," he says, "I gave up all worldly learning and labored only in spiritual things according to what the Lord commanded me to write." Rightly considered, his whole previous career appears to have been a preparation for this work. When he had run the whole circuit of the sciences, he was introduced to a new world of facts and laws by the opening of his spiritual senses, and thus to a spiritual science and philosophy which could never have been discovered without these facts, and can never be understood apart from them.

(2) Doctrines. The fundamental doctrine of his theological writings is the doctrine of the second coming of the Lord. He teaches that the end of God in the creation of the human race is a heaven of angels; and He provides for this by means of the church. It requires three things to constitute a living church: revelation of divine truth adapted to man's reception; understanding on man's part of the truth revealed; and a life in accordance with it. The Lord provides that there shall always be a church with man. He institutes the church by revealing such divine truths as men need to know and can obey in life. When in process of time they pervert this truth and lose the understanding of the revelation committed to them, the Lord makes a new revelation and begins a new church. There have been four such general churches, and a fifth is foretold which is to be the crown of all the churches and is to endure forever. The first great church which was before the flood is called the most ancient, and in the Scriptures Adam, and its consummation is described by the flood. The second, which is called the ancient, and in the Scriptures Noah, was in Asia and partly in Africa, and was consummated by idolatries. The third was the Israelitish, which is historical. The fourth is the Christian, which the Lord established by the Evangelists and Apostles. This church had two epochs; one from the time of the Lord to the Council of Nice, and the other from that council to the year 1757, when the last judgment was effected in the spiritual world, by means of the new revelation of the interiors of the Word, by which at the same time the Lord made his second advent and institutes a new dispensation or church, which is meant by the New Jerusalem, the glorious hope of the apostles and the expectation of Christians from the beginning—the "day of the Lord," which shall have no end.

The second coming of the Lord, therefore, is not in person, as at his first advent; for then he assumed a human nature and glorified it for reasons of redemption and salvation, that he might become in His Humanity the visible God, and acquire to His Humanity "all power in heaven and in earth." What he came to do he perfectly accomplished and needed not to do again; but what was needed was such a revelation of the whole meaning of his Word, as would bring his divine mind spiritually present in power and glory. The Lord, who is the Word, made his second advent by revealing the spiritual sense and genuine meaning of his written Word, in which the divine truth is in its light, and in which he is continually present. This is his coming "in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory;" for the literal sense of the Word is as a cloud, and the spiritual sense as the glory by which the Lord as the Son of Man is revealed in all things of the Word. The Lord has made this revelation by means of a man whom he had prepared for this purpose from his childhood, and whom he filled with his spirit to teach the doctrines of the New Church from the Word. This is Swedenborg's claim, and the writings which contain the doctrines of the Word revealed for the New Church, he published between the years 1749 and 1771. These doctrines may be summarized as follows:

(3) Summary. (1) That Jehovah God, the creator and preserver of the universe, is Love itself and Wisdom itself; that he is one both in essence and in person, in whom nevertheless is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which are the essential divinity, the divine humanity, and the divine proceeding, answering to the soul, the body, and the operative energy in man; and that the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is that God. The Father is in Him, and the Holy Spirit is from Him.

(2) That the Lord from eternity, who is Jehovah, came into the world and took our nature upon Him; He endured temptations, even to the passion of the cross; He overcame the hells and so delivered man; He glorified His humanity, uniting it with the divinity of which it was begotten; so He became the redeemer of the world, without whom no mortal can be saved; and they are saved who believe in Him and keep the Commandments of His Word.

(3) That the Sacred Scripture, or Word of the Lord, is divine truth itself; containing a spiritual sense, hitherto unknown, whence it is divinely inspired, and holy in every syllable; as well as a literal sense which is the basis of the spiritual sense and in which divine truth is in its fullness, holiness and power. The spiritual and natural senses of the Word are united by correspondence like soul and body, every natural expression and image including a spiritual and divine idea; and thus the Word is the medium of communication with heaven, and of conjunction with the Lord.

(4) That the Lord saves man by the operation of His spirit; but not without man's consent and coöperation. The Lord operates and gives to man to coöperate, that there may be conjunction of the Lord with man and of man with the Lord, and thus salvation. There are two means to this conjunction: the good of love which flows in by an internal way, and the truth of faith which is presented outwardly by means of revelation and instruction. So far as man can be led to accept and live according to the truths of faith as from the Lord, He by an inward and unperceived operation of His spirit conjoins the good of love with those truths, and thus reforms, regenerates and saves.

(5) That charity, faith and good works are unitedly necessary to man's salvation, since charity without faith is not spiritual but natural, and faith without charity is not living but dead, and both charity and faith without good works are perishable, because without use or fixedness.

(6) That immediately after death, which is only a putting off of the material body, never to be resumed, man rises again in a substantial spiritual body in the spiritual world, in which he continues to live to eternity; in heaven if his ruling affections and thence his life have been good, and in hell if his ruling affections and life have been evil.

These doctrines and the whole government of divine love and wisdom in creation and providence, are opened philosophically to the rational faculty from the interiors of the Word and from the facts and laws of the spiritual world, to the end, as Swedenborg affirms, that the man of the church may enter intellectually into the mysteries of faith and by living according to the light of intelligence be conjoined with heaven and the Lord.

Although Swedenborg affirmed a New Church it was no part of his mission to institute an external ecclesiastical body. Those of his own time who understood or cared to read what he had written, were very few. In 1783 a society was formed in London, England, for the study of his works. His books, which were written in Latin, were translated, and the number of believers increased more rapidly, but at first entertained no thought of separate organization. In process of time, however, theological controversies with their old ecclesiastical associates, and the longing for association with those agreed in faith and life, led to the organization of a church. The first society of this kind was formed in London in 1787 and was quickly followed by others in various parts of the kingdom. The name selected was "The Church upon Earth Signified in the Revelation by the New Jerusalem Descending from God Out of Heaven." This cumbersome title has been shortened to "The Church of the New Jerusalem," or "The New Jerusalem Church."

The doctrines were first introduced into America in 1784, and the societies organized from time to time are now grouped into State Associations, and these into a General Convention. The government is practically congregational, with a sort of episcopal advisory supervision. The worship in this country and England, and where the church has a foothold in the continent of Europe, is liturgical.

The church is of the least as to actual membership, but is acknowledged as a formative power by virtue of the rationality and virility of the faith of its members, and by the astonishing activity of its publishing societies in printing and distributing the literature of its doctrinal teaching.

NEW MOON (nū mōōn), (Heb. ^{כֶּהָן}, khoh-desh', new moon, month). See FESTIVALS; MOON.

NEW TESTAMENT (nū tes'ta-ment See BIBLE; SCRIPTURE, HOLY.

NEW YEAR (nū yēr). See YEAR.

NEZIAH (ne-zī'ah), (Heb. ^{נִזְיָה}, nets-ee'akh, preëminent), the progenitor of a family of Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:54; Neh. vii:56), B. C. 536.

NEZIB (ne'zib), (Heb. ^{נִזְיָב}, nets-eeb', a statue or idol), a city in the low country of Judah (Josh.xv:43).

Beit Nusib, a little northwest of Hebron, has commonly been thought to represent this place (Robinson, ii:343 sq.); but it can scarcely be the place as it is in the hill country.

NIBHAZ (nib'hāz), (Heb. ^{נִבְחָז}, nib-chāz', barker), an idol of the Avites (2 Kings xvii:31).

In the Zabian books the corresponding name is that of an evil demon, who sits on a throne upon the earth, while his feet rest on the bottom of Tartarus; but it is doubtful whether this should be identified with the Avite Nibhaz. It is supposed that the god was represented by the figure of a dog. It would therefore be allied to Anubis of the Egyptians. A large figure of a dog was found on the road from Beirut to Tripolis.

NIBSHAN (nib'shān), (Heb. נִבְשָׁן, nib-shawn', fertile, light, soft soil), a city of the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv:62); site not known.

NICANOR (ni-kā'nor), (Gr. Νικάνωρ, nik-an'ore, conqueror), one of the seven men appointed by the church at Jerusalem to look after the poor, and in particular the Greek-speaking widows (Acts vi:5), A. D. 29.

NICODEMUS (nik'o-dē'mus), (Gr. Νικόδημος, nik-od'ay-mos, conqueror of the people), a Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrim, who was impressed by what he had heard concerning Jesus, but being unwilling, on account of his station, to commit himself without greater surety than he possessed, repaired by night to the house in which Christ dwelt, and held with him that important discourse which occupies the third chapter of John's Gospel.

(1) Defends Jesus. The effect which was then produced upon his mind may be collected from the fact that subsequently, at one of the sittings of the venerable body to which he belonged, he ventured to let fall a few words in favor of Jesus, whose proceedings were then in question (John vii:50).

(2) At Christ's Burial. He also took part with his colleague, Joseph of Arimathea, in rendering the last honors to the body of the crucified Redeemer (John xix:39). Nothing further is known of Nicodemus from Scripture. Tradition, however, adds that after he had thus openly declared himself a follower of Jesus, and had been baptized by Peter, he was displaced from his office, and expelled from Jerusalem (Phot. Cod. p. 171). It is added that he found refuge in a country house of his cousin Gamaliel, and remained there till his death.

(3) Character. Too strong an appreciation of the world's good opinion seems to have been the failing of Nicodemus, although Niemeyer (Charakt. i. 113) has lately made a strong effort to clear him from this imputation. We do not lay much stress upon what he ventured to say in the Sanhedrim; for he suffered himself to be easily put down, and did not come forward with any bold avowal of his belief. Winer calls attention to the fact, that although he took part in the sepulchral rites of Jesus, he did not join Joseph in his application to Pilate for the body of his crucified Lord; and justly remarks that such characters usually require a strong external impulse to bring them boldly forward, which impulse was probably in this case supplied by the resurrection of Jesus.

NICOLAITANS (nik'o-lā'i-tanz), (Gr. Νικολαῖται, nikh-ol-ah-ee-tah-ee', followers of Nicolas), occurs twice in the New Testament (Rev. ii:6, 15).

(1) Conduct and Doctrine Condemned. In the former passage the conduct of the Nicolaitans is condemned; in the latter, the angel of the church in Pergamos is censured because certain members of his church held their doctrine.

(2) Practices. Various traditionary accounts have been given by the fathers of the origin and practices of this sect. Many of the primitive writers believed that Nicholas was rather the occasion than the author of the infamous practices of those who assumed his name, who were expressly condemned by the Spirit of God himself (Rev. ii:6). And, indeed, their opinions and actions were highly extravagant and criminal. They allowed a community of wives, and made no distinction between ordinary meats and those offered to idols. According to Eusebius, they subsisted but a short time; but Tertullian says, that they only changed their name, and that their heresies passed into the sect of the Cainites

(3) Gnostics. It is evident from these accounts that the Nicolaitans with whom they were acquainted were Gnostics; since they impute to them the distinctive tenets and practices of the Gnostics. But in the short allusion in Rev. ii:6, 15, there is nothing to identify the tenets or conduct alluded to with Gnosticism, even supposing that Gnosticism, properly so called, existed in the Apostolic age, which to say the least, has not been proved to be the case. So that the conjecture mentioned by Mosheim, and which Tertullian appears to favor, may be regarded as probable, that the Nicolaitans mentioned in Revelation had erroneously been confounded with a party of Gnostics formed at a later period by one Nicolas.

The ingenious conjecture of Michaelis is worthy of consideration, who supposes that by Nicolaitans (Rev. ii:6, 15) the same class of persons is intended whom St. Peter (2 Pet. ii:15) describes as followers of the way of Balaam; and that their name, Nicolaitans, is merely a Greek translation of their Hebrew designation. The only objection which occurs to us against this very ingenious and probable supposition arises from the circumstance that, in the passage in Rev. ii:14, 15, both 'they that hold the doctrine of Balaam,' and 'the Nicolaitans,' are specified, and are distinguished from each other: 'So hast thou also,' the Nicolaitans, as well as the Balaamites, mentioned in the previous verse. So that whatever general agreement there might be between those two classes of heretics—and their collocation in the passage before us seems to imply that there was such agreement—it appears equally evident that some distinction also must have separated them the one from the other. R. L.

NICOLAS (nik'o-las), (Gr. Νικόλαος, nik-ol'ah-os, conqueror of the people), a proselyte of Antioch, and one of the seven deacons (Acts vi:5), A. D. 29. Nothing further is known of him; but a large body of unsafe tradition has been connected with his name, under the supposition that he was the founder of the heresy of the Nicolaitans, stigmatized in Rev. ii:6, 15. (See the preceding article).

NICOPOLIS (ni-kōp'o-lis), (Gr. Νικόπολις, nik-op'o-lis, city of victory), a city of Thrace, supposed to be Nicopi, on the river Nessus, now Karason, which was here the boundary between Thrace and Macedonia; and hence the city is sometimes reckoned as belonging to the latter.

In Titus iii:12, Paul expresses an intention to winter at Nicopolis, and invites Titus, then in Crete, to join him there. There has been some uncertainty in respect to the city intended, as there were four of this name in Asia, five in Europe, and one in Africa. It must have been one of three cities: (1) Nicopolis in Thrace; (2) in Cilicia; or (3) in Epirus. The subscription to the Epistle to Titus calls it "Nicopolis of Macedonia"—i. e. Thrace. This subscription, however, is no part of the inspired text, and there is little doubt that the view of Jerome was correct, which identifies the Pauline Nicopolis with the noted city of that name in Epirus. It was built by Augustus Cæsar to commemorate his victory over Antony and Cleopatra at the battle of Actium (B. C. 31). Its modern name is Paleoprevesa, or "old Prevesa." The place has extensive ruins of temples, theaters, aqueducts, and a small building in the form of a pagan temple, which tradition says was used by Paul as a house of prayer. Some suppose that Paul was arrested here, and taken to Rome for his final trial. (Kitto and Schaff.) Between A. D. 64-65, or 65-66, or 66-67.

The later history of Nicopolis is short. After falling into decay, it was restored by Julian about 362; and afterwards it was captured by the Goths and destroyed, but again was restored by Justinian, as Procopius, de Aedif. iv:2, describes. It is mentioned as the metropolis of Old Epirus by Hierocles about A. D. 530, and retained that position in the ecclesiastical organization; but a late mediæval list of cities that changed their names implies that Prevesa had taken its place and dignity. There are many remains of the ancient city, on which the guide-books of Murray, Baedeker, etc., may be consulted." (W. M. Ramsay, Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

NIGER (ni'jer), (Gr. Νίγερ, neeg'er, Acts xiii:1).

Surname of Simeon, one of the prophets and teachers of Antioch when Paul and Barnabas returned thither after carrying the contributions of the brethren to the poor saints at Jerusalem. (See SIMEON.)

NIGHT (nīt), (Heb. לַיְלִי, lah'yil; לַיְלִיָּה, lah'yel-aw; Gr. νύξ, nooks).

Besides representing these properly equivalent Hebrew and Greek words, 'night' stands in A. V. once for 'darkness' (Job xxvi:10; R. V. 'darkness'); thrice for 'twilight' (Is. v:11, R. V. 'night'; Is. xxi:4; lix:10, R. V. 'twilight'); and four times for 'evening' (Gen. xlix:27, R. V. 'even'; Lev. vi:20, R. V. 'evening'; Job vii:4, R. V. 'night'; Ps. xxx:5, R. V. 'night'; R. V. marg. 'even'); 'night season' (Job xxx:17), and 'night seasons' (Ps. xvi:17); 'to pass the night' occurs Dan. vi:18, and in the New Testament we have 'midnight' (Mark xiii:35; Luke xi:5; Acts xvi:25; xx:7); 'to continue all night' (Luke vi:12); 'a night and a day' (2 Cor. xi:25). R. V. omits 'night' on textual grounds from four passages where the word appears in A. V., viz., Matt. xxvii:64; Mark xiv:27; John vii:50; 2 Pet. iii:10. (James Patrick, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See DAY; TIME.)

Figurative. The term of human life is usually called a day in Scripture; but in one passage it is called night, to be followed soon by day, 'the day is at hand' (Rom. viii:12). Being a time of darkness, the image and shadow of death, in which the beasts of prey go forth to devour, it was made a symbol of a season of adversity and trouble, in which men prey upon each other, and the strong tyrannize over the weak (Is. xxi:12; Zech. xiv:6, 7). Hence continued day, or the absence of night, implies a constant state of quiet and happiness, undisturbed by the vicissitudes of peace and war. Night is also put, as in our own language, for a time of ignorance and helplessness (Mic. iii:6). In John ix:4 night represents death, a necessary result of the correlative usage which makes life a day. In the beautiful passage, "There shall be no night there" (Rev. xxi:25; xxii:5), the meaning is that heaven is a place where no sorrow or sin or death finds entrance.

NIGHT HAWK (nīt hāk). The Heb. תַּחֲמָשִׁית, takh-mawce', is uncertain in meaning. Some have rendered it "ostrich," others "owl" (Lev. xi:16; Deut. xiv:15). (See OSTRICH; OWL.)

NIGHT MARCHES (nīt mārč'es), (Num. ix:21, "whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up they journeyed"). They made night marches doubtless to escape their enemies.

NIGHT MONSTER (nīt mōn'stēr), (Heb. לַיְלִיָּה, lee-leeth', Is. xxxiv:14, marg.). The text has screech owl, but the marginal reading is preferable. "The reference is to a nocturnal specter similar to the Shul of the Arabs. All nations have similar apparitions in their legends." (See OWL; NIGHT HAWK.)

NIGHT VISION (nīt vīzh'ūn), (Heb. לַיְלִיָּה, khar-zone' lah'yel-aw, Is. xxix:7; Chald. מַוְיָא, khez-vaw' lay'leh-yaw, Dan. ii:19, etc.).

NIGHT WATCH (nīt wōch). Before the Captivity the night was divided into three parts, or watches, the first extending to midnight, the second to the crowing of the cock, the third to sunrise. During the time of Christ the night was divided into four watches of three hours each.

NILE (nīl). The name Nile, although not occurring in the A. V., is often referred to under different names and titles.

1. Shee-khore' (Heb. שִׁיחֹר, dark turbid), seems to be indicative of a very dark color (Is. xxiii:3; Josh. xiii:13; 1 Chron. xiii:5; comp. Gen. xv:18).

2. Yeh-ore' (Heb. יָאֵר, channel; the same as the ancient Egyptian Atur, Aur, and the Coptic ciere or iaro (Ps. lxxviii:44; Ezek. xxix:3, sq.; xxx:12; comp. Is. xxxii:21; Job xxviii:10).

3. "The Nachal of Egypt" (Heb. נַחַל מִצְרַיִם, nakh'al mits-rah-yim, stream of Egypt "has generally been understood to mean 'the torrent' or 'brook of Egypt,' and to designate a desert stream at Rhinocorura, now El-Areesh, on the eastern border. This name must doubtless signify the Nile, for it occurs in cases parallel to those where Shihor is employed (Num. xxxiv:5; Josh. xv:4, 47; 1 Kings viii:65; 2 Kings xxiv:7; Is. xxvii:12), both designating the easternmost or Pelusiac branch of the river as the border of the Philistine territory, where the Egyptians equally put the border of their country toward Kanaan or Kanana (Canaan). It remains for us to decide whether the name signifies the 'brook of Egypt,' or whether Nachal be a Hebrew form of Nile. The Hebrew word nachal might have been adopted as very similar in sound to an original proper name" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

4. "The rivers of Cush" (Heb. נַהַרֵי קוּשׁ, nah'-ar-ay koosh), are mentioned only in the perplexing prophecy contained in Is. xviii. By it we must probably conclude "the rivers of Ethiopia" to be the confluent or tributaries of the Nile.

5. "The river of Egypt" (Heb. נַהַר מִצְרַיִם, nah'-or mits-rah-yim), mentioned with the Euphrates (Gen. xv:18).

6. The Nile is sometimes poetically called "The Sea" (Heb. יָם, yawm, Is. xviii:2; Nah. iii:8; Job xli:31, and perhaps Is. xix:5), so known among the Arabs at the present time. "The river" clearly applies to the Nile in Is. xix:5, and there, also, in a parallelism with the Nile as 'the sea.' And the Nile has been smitten in that portion of it which is known as 'the seven streams,' five of those streams being now closed from sight" (Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, p. 348, sq.). (Mc. & Str. Cyc.; Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

This great river of Egypt and of Africa, is probably the second longest river in the world, its entire length being estimated at 4,000 miles. It is connected with the earliest history of the Egyptian and the Israelitish nations (Exod. ii:3; vii:20, 21; Num. xi:5; Ps. cv:29; Jer. xlvi:7, 8; Zech. xiv:17, 18). The Nile is not named in the New Testament. The discovery of the true source of the Nile, and the reason for its annual overflow, are two scientific problems which have been discussed for upward of 2,000 years. The course of the stream is now known for about 3,300 miles, and with two interruptions—the cataract of Syene (Assouan) and the Upper Cataract—it is claimed by Bædeker's Handbook on Lower Egypt to be navigable throughout nearly the whole of that distance. But as there are many other cataracts, this statement cannot be correct. The principal stream is now known to be the White Nile, while the Blue or Black Nile is of greater importance in contributing to the annual inundation of the lower river. The two streams unite at the town of Khartoom, the capital of Nubia, and from this point to the mouths of the stream at Damietta and Rosetta, upward of 1,800 miles, it falls 1,240 feet, and attains its greatest width a little below Khartoom and a little above Cairo, at each of which places it is about 1,100 yards wide. The source of the White Nile is doubtless Lake Victoria Nyanza, the largest part of which lies south of the equator, and from 3,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. The White Nile is so named from the color of the clay with which its waters are stained. The Blue Nile resembles a mountain torrent, being liable to rise suddenly with the Abyssinian rains and sweep away whatever it encounters in its rapidly descending course. The source of the Blue Nile is high up in the Abyssinian mountains, from 6,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea level, and in springs which are regarded with superstitious veneration by the neighboring people. A number of festivals were celebrated in connection with the annual rise of the Nile, which appear from the monuments to have been common as early as the fourteenth century B. C. The height of the Nile was measured by the Nilometer, a square well having in its center an octagonal column, on which were inscribed the ancient Arabic measures and Cufic inscriptions. This was erected in A. D. 716, and was used to determine the height of the overflow, upon which was based the rate of taxation. The government, however, cheated the poor people by false statements of the overflow, indicated by this measurement. The papyrus reeds—whence paper is designated—the flags, the lotus, and the various colored flowers formerly beautifying the banks of the river have nearly all disappeared, thus fulfilling prophecy (Is. xix:6, 7). This river, so intimately associated with the early history of the human race, is a favorite resort for tourists, who can go in steamers as far as the First Cataract, near Assouan (Syene), where were the great quarries which supplied stone for ancient Egyptian monuments, and from Philæ up to Aboo-Simbel and the Second Cataract. The Nile voyage, broken by donkey rides and visits to the pyramids, tombs, and ruins of temples and palaces of the Pharaohs, is one of the greatest enjoyments and best recreations of body and mind. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

"A curious legend in the Targum describes the burial of Joseph's coffin in the Nile and its rediscovery by Moses; the Egyptians never, of course, used the river in this way."

NIMRA (nim'ra), (Heb. נִמְרָא, nim-raw', limpīd). See BETH-NIMRAH and NIMRIM.

NIMRIM (nim'rim), (Heb. נִמְרִים, nim-ream', a stream of the leopards, or limpīd, pure), a small stream in the territory of Moab (Is. xv:6; Jer. xlviii:34.)

Its location is not certain. Some identify it with Beth-nimrah in the valley of the Jordan, others with Wady Nemeirah at the south end of the Dead Sea. Tristram places it higher up the valley, where there exists an old Moabite city. Springs of Nemeirah, by name, with many well watered gardens still in cultivation.

NIMROD (nim'röd), (Heb. נִמְרֹד, nim-rod'e', Sept. Νεβρωδ, nee-brode'), a son of Cush, the eldest son of Ham (Gen. x:8-10).

Five sons of Cush are enumerated in verse 7 in the more usual manner of this chapter; but a change of phrase introduces Nimrod.

(1) Personal Name. This difference may indicate that while, in relation to the other five, the names have a national and geographical reference, this appellation is exclusively personal. It denotes intensively, the extremely impious rebel. Hence we conceive that it was not his original proper name, but was affixed to him afterwards, perhaps even after his death, as a characteristic appellation.

No other persons connected with this work must be considered as answerable for the opinion which the writer of this article thinks to rest upon probable grounds, that the earlier part of the book of Genesis consists of several independent and complete compositions, of the highest antiquity and authority, marked by some difference of style, and having clear indications of commencement in each instance. If this supposition be admitted, a reason presents itself for the citation of a proverbial phrase in ch. x:9. The single instance of minute circumstantiality, in so brief a relation, seems to imply that the writer lived near the age of Nimrod, while his history was still a matter of traditional notoriety, and the comparison of any hero with him was a familiar form of speech. It is also supposed that those, not fragments, hut complete, though short and separate compositions (of which eight or more are hypothetically enumerated in J. Pye Smith's Scripture and Geology, p. 202), were, under divine authority, prefixed by Moses to his own history. Their series has a continuity generally, but not rigorously exact. If we place ourselves in such a point of time, suppose the age succeeding Nimrod, which might be the third century after the Deluge, we may see how naturally the origination of a common phrase would rise in the writer's mind; and that a motive of usefulness would be suggested with it. But both these ideas involve that of nearness to the time; a period in which the country traditions were yet fresh, and an elucidation of them would be acceptable and consonant to general feeling. The following is a close translation of the passage in which Nimrod is mentioned: 'And Cush begat Nimrod: he began [opened a course of action, led the way] to be a hero in the earth [or in the land]: he was a hero at the chase in the presence of Jehovah; on which account the saying is, Like Nimrod, the hero of the chase, in the presence of Jehovah. And the chief [city] of his dominion was Babel; and [he founded] Ezek and Akkad, and Kalneh, in the land of Shinar.'

(2) Strength and Courage. Interpreters, with scarcely an exception, from the Septuagint and the Targums down to our own times, understand the whole case thus: that Nimrod was a man of vast bodily strength, and eminent for courage and skill in the arts of hunting down and capturing or killing the dangerous animals, which probably were both very numerous, and frequently of enormous size; that, by these recommendations, he made himself the favorite of bold and enterprising young men, who readily joined his hunting expeditions; that hence he took encouragement the same reason that so many places there are named after him. Thus we have the Birs Nimroud, the ancient Borsippa, near the ruins of Babylon, Tel Nimroud, near Baghdad, the dam Suhr el-Nimroud, across the Tigris near Mosul, and the mound of Nimroud, the ancient Calah. To all appearance, he was regarded in later times in his native country as a great builder also. He seems to have been looked upon by the Babylonians as the builder of Babylon, and the bilingual Creation story apparently attributes to him the completion of the Ê-sagila, the great temple tower in that city, which was certainly of the type of the Tower of Babel, even if it were not that erection itself. This may account for the connection of Nimrod with the catastrophe of the confusion of tongues, ascribed to him in the East both in comparatively ancient and in more recent times."

NIMSHI (nīm-shī), (Heb. נִימְשִׁי, nim-shee', saved), the grandfather of Jehu (2 Kings ix:2, 14, 20); commonly called "father" (1 Kings xix:16; 2 Chron. xxii:7), B. C. about 950.

The Great Mound of Nimrod.

to break the patriarchial union of venerable and peaceful subordination to set himself up as a military chieftain, assailing and subduing men, training his adherents into formidable troops, by their aid subduing the inhabitants of Shinar and its neighboring districts; and that, for consolidating and retaining his power, now become a despotism, he employed his subjects in building forts, which became towns and cities, that which was afterwards called Babel being the principal.

(3) Fables and Legends. As a great part of the ancient mythology and idolatry arose from the histories of chiefs and sages, decorated with allegorical fables, it is by no means improbable that the life and actions of Nimrod gave occasion to stories of this kind. Hence, some have supposed him to have been signified by the Indian Bacchus, deriving that name from Bar-Chus, 'son of Cush'; and, it is probable, by the Persian giant Gibber (answering to the Hebrew Gibbor, 'mighty man,' 'hero,' in Gen. x:8, 9); and by the Greek Orion, whose fame as a 'mighty hunter' is celebrated by Homer, in the Odyssey, xi:571-4. The Persian and the Grecian fables are both represented by the well-known and magnificent constellation.

Prof. T. G. Pinches, Hastings' Bib. Dict., says: "The legends that have been preserved concerning Nimrod would seem to show that his fame in the country of his exploits rests more upon what was known of him there than upon the somewhat meager account in Genesis, and it is probably for NINEVE (nīn'e-ve), (Gr. Nivev, nin-yoo-ee'), the Greek form of NINEVEH (Luke xi:32).

NINEVEH (nīn'e-veh), (Heb. נִינְוֵה, nee-nev-ay'; Gr. Nivev, nin-yoo-ay'; also Nivev, nin-yoo-ee'), meaning the dwelling of Ninus.

(1) Location. A famous city of the ancient world, capital of the great Assyrian empire, which stood on the eastern bank of the river Tigris, opposite to the present Mosul; its actual site being most probably the same with that of Nunia and the tomb of Jonah, about three-fourths of a mile from the river, in the midst of ruins, north latitude 36° 20' 17"; east longitude 43° 10' 17".

(2) Name. The Bible makes the city a sort of colony from Babylon or Babel, Shinar (see BABEL, TOWER OF), stating (Gen. x:11), 'out of that land (Babel, etc., in the land of Shinar) went forth Asshur and builded Nineveh.' A similar tradition is indicated in Micah v:6. The native monuments show that the tradition is correct, and that Nineveh was once included in the boundaries of the Babylonian empire. (See Driver in Hogarth's Authority and Archaeology, pp. 29, sq.) In fact it seems to have taken its name from the Babylonian city of Ninâ on the Euphrates, which is mentioned by Diodorus (ii:3, 7), quoting probably from Ctesias.

The name of Nineveh is written Ninuâ and Nindâ in the cuneiform inscriptions. A popular etymology connected it with the Assyrian nunu, 'fish,' at a very early date, since the name is ideographically represented by the picture of a fish inside the enclosure of a city. But it seems really to have been derived from the title of the Babylonian goddess Ninā, the daughter of Ea, who was identified with the Semitic Istar. Ninā is the original of the Greek form Ninos." (A. H. Sayce, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

(3) History. After the simple statement in Genesis, the sacred record is for a long time entirely silent respecting Nineveh, which, we may therefore presume, remained inconsiderable for many generations. At length, some fifteen hundred years after the first mention of the place, in the days of Jeroboam II, king of Israel (B. C. 825), Nineveh again enters by name on the biblical record, having meanwhile grown into a mighty power. This reappearance of Nineveh is accidental, and shows that the Bible does not profess to give any orderly and systematic history of the world. Other countries come on the scene and disappear, just as the course of events in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel seem to require or may chance to occasion.

Nineveh is described in the book of Jonah as 'that great city,' 'an exceeding great city of three days' journey,' probably in a straight line through the place, as the large cities of Asia stood on a great extent of country, having gardens, and even fields, in the midst of them; and Jonah is said to 'enter into the city a day's journey' (ch. iii:4) before he began to foretell its overthrow; that is, as is most likely, he penetrated into the heart of the place, as being that which was most suitable for delivering his burden. The magnitude of the place may also be gathered from what is said in the last verse of the book: 'That great city, wherein are more than six score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand, and also much cattle' (grazing). The population of a place must have been immense in which there were no fewer than 120,000 children—young children, the language employed seems to denote. It also appears from the same book that the state of society was highly complex, organized in divers ranks from the king and the noble to the peasant; and, if we may argue from the exactness with which the number of children is given, we should be justified in asserting that the people were in an advanced stage of civilization, seeing that their social statistics were well attended to and carefully preserved. Civilization, however, had brought luxury, and luxury corruption of morals, for 'their wickedness had gone up before God' (ch. i:2). Yet was not their iniquity of the lowest kind, for the Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonah.

(4) Prophecies Against Nineveh. A few years later we find the prophet Nahum (B. C.

735) entrusted with 'the burden of Nineveh.' From this book it would appear that the repentance of the city, if sincere, was not durable. Therefore was the anger of Jehovah about to fall upon it and make it a perpetual waste. (See SENNACHERIB.)

Expressions that are employed tend to give a high idea of the size and splendor of the place; it had many strongholds, and many gates with bars, probably of brass; its inhabitants were 'many as the locusts;' it had multiplied its merchants above the stars of heaven; its crowned (princes) were as the locusts, and its captains as the great grasshoppers (ch. iii:12-17). So her wealth was prodigious: 'There is none end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture.' The reason assigned for the destruction of the city shows how great was its wickedness: 'Out of the house of thy gods will I cut off the graven image and the molten image; I will make thy grave; for thou art vile' (ch. i:14). 'Woe to the bloody city! It is all full of lies and robbery' (ch. iii:1). Shortly after (B. C. 713) the delivery of this prophecy Sennacherib, king of Assyria, having invaded Judæa, suffered a signal defeat by the special act of God: 'So Sennacherib departed, and went and returned and dwelt at Nineveh' (2 Kings xix:36). Very brief, however, was his dwelling there, for as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch, his god, Adrammelech and Shazzer, his sons, smote him with the sword; and Esarhaddon, his son, reigned in his stead (2 Kings xix:37). The predicted punishment of the city was now approaching. Zephaniah gave his authority that it would come (ch. ii:13). (See also Is. xiv:24, sq.): 'The Lord will stretch out his hand against the north and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness.' The language which immediately ensues goes to confirm the view which has been given of the commercial greatness (it was the entrepôt for the trade of Eastern and Western Asia), the surpassing opulence, the high culture, the immense population, and the deep criminality of the city of Nineveh.

Winged Deity.

From Strabo (xvi. p. 737), the place appears to have been much greater than even Babylon; and from Diodorus Sic. (ii:3), that it measured 480 stadia in circumference, having very high and broad walls, which, aided by the river, rendered it impregnable.

This safety was, however, merely imaginary. Sardanapalus, who had a full share of the vices of his subjects, endured in the eighth century before Christ a siege of three years' duration at the hands of the Medes, under Arbaces, which led to the overthrow of the city (Diod. Sic. ii:26). But so large and so powerful a capital was not easily destroyed. Nineveh was the seat of an Assyrian kingdom till the year B. C. 625, when it was taken by Nabopolassar of Babylon and Cyaxares, king of the Medes, which led to the destruction of the Assyrian kingdom (Herod. i:106). Nineveh flourished no more. Strabo (xvi p. 737) represents it as lying waste; though in the times of the Roman emperors some remains of it seem to have survived, as a Nineveh on the Tigris is mentioned in Tacitus (Annal. xii:13), and is characterized as a castellum, or fort, probably some small fortification raised out of the ruins of the city for predatory purposes. Something of the kind was found there at a later period, for in the thirteenth century Abulfaragius makes mention of a castellum there.

(5) Ruins. The present remains comprise a rampart and foss, four miles in circuit, with a moss-covered wall about twenty feet in height.

Mosul, with which Nineveh is commonly identified, stands on the opposite, or western bank of the Tigris, and lies so near the river that its streets are often flooded—a circumstance which calls to mind some of the terms employed by the prophetic writers before referred to. This place, like its great prototype, carries on a trade (though to a small extent) between the East and the West. The climate is stated to be very healthy; the average temperature of summer not exceeding 66° Fahr.; but in spring, during the floods, epidemics are common, though not fatal.

See Niebuhr, Reiseb. ii. 353, 368; Ives, Voyage, pp. 327, sq.; Rosenmüller, Alterth. i:2,116; Bruns, Erdbeschreibung, ii. 1, 199, sq.; Mannert, v, 440, King Feasting (from Bas-relief).

The ruins at first sight present a range of hills. From these hills large stones are constantly dug out, from which probably a bridge over the Tigris has been built. Vast libraries have been found, and records of a civilization extending far back into the dawn of history.

Jonah's connection with the city is still preserved in a tomb which bears his name; but how far back in antiquity this building runs, it is now impossible to say. The tomb stands on a hill, and is covered by a mosque which is held in great veneration. Bricks, partly whole, partly in fragments, and pieces of gypsum with inscriptions in the arrow-head character, are found from time to time. Landseer, in his Sabaan Researches, gives an engraving of cylinders dug up at Nineveh, which he states to be numerous in the East, and supposes to have been employed as signets; they NINEVITE (nĭn'e-vĭte), (Gr. Ninevĭtes, nĭn-yoo-ee'tace, Ninevite), an inhabitant of Nineveh (Luke xi:30).

NISAN (nĭ'san), (Heb. נִסָּן, nee-sawn), the first month of the Hebrew civil year Abib, by which name this month is called in the Pentateuch (Exod. xiii:4; xxiii:15; Deut. xvi:1), means an ear of grain, a green ear; and hence 'the month Abib,' is 'the month of green ears.' It thus denoted the condition of the barley in the climate of Egypt and Palestine in this month. Nisan, otherwise Abib, began with the new moon of April or, according to the Rabbins, of March. It is mentioned by name twice only (Neh. ii:1; Esth. iii:7).

NISROCH (nĭs'rōk), (Heb. נִסְרוֹךְ, nis-roke').

The Hebrew form of the name of a deity of the Assyrians, in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipping when slain by his sons (2 Kings xix:37; Is. xxxvii:38).

There has been much speculation as to the identity of this deity, and many wild theories have been put forward concerning him. Some suggest that the word refers to Noah's dove, which had been made an object of worship. The word is now usually supposed to mean great eagle. This bird was held in peculiar veneration by the ancient Persians; and was likewise worshiped by the Arabs before the time of Mohammed. But the word refers to a divinity represented in the Assyrian tablets by a human form with the wings and head of an eagle, in whose temple at Nineveh Sennacherib was murdered by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (NERGAL-SHAREZER, which see) (2 Kings xix:37; Is. xxxvii:38). The etymology of the name, even the Shemitic origin of the word, is doubtful, and nothing definite is known of this deity.

Prof. T. G. Pinches, however, states in Hastings' Bib. Dict. that "with regard to the form, Nisroch, there are two possible explanations: Nisroch (the same as Esorach) may be for Asuraku, a lengthened form of Asur by the addition of aku—the same termination as appears in Amaruduk (u), the Marduku (a personal name) of the later contract tablets, in which case the presence of the ending would seem to imply Accadian influence. On the other hand, the name may be really a compound one, i.e. the well-known appellation of the god Asur with the Accadian name of the moon-god Aku (compare Eri-Aku, 'servant of the moon-god' = Arioch) attached to it. In support of this second etymology may be cited the fact that Sennacherib's name contains the element Sin, the common name of the moon-god in Babylonia and Assyria, and the expression 'his god' may refer to some such compound deity as Asur-Aku, whom Sennacherib specially worshiped."

NITER (nī'tēr), (Heb. נִיֶּרֶת, neh'ther; Gr. νίτρον, nee'tron).

Now denotes salt-peter, nitrate of potash, but the νίτρον or nitrum of the ancients was a different substance, natron, carbonate of soda. It occurs as an incrustation on the ground in Egypt, Persia, and elsewhere, and is also a constituent in the water of certain saline lakes. The most famous of the latter are the 'natron lakes' in Egypt. They lie in the 'natron valley' about 60 miles W.N.W. of Cairo. The deposit of these lakes includes an upper layer of common salt and a lower one of natron (Wilkinson, Modern Egypt, i. 382, sq.). Strabo mentions these Egyptian lakes (Geog. xvii, i. 23), and also a similar lake in Armenia (ib. xi. xiv:8). See also Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxi:10.

It is found in many other parts of the East. Vinegar has no effect upon common niter, and of course this could not be meant by the wise man, who in Prov. xxv:20 says, "As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon niter, so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart." Now, as vinegar has no effect upon niter, but upon natron or soda its action is very obvious, it seems the English translation should have been "natron." In Jer. ii:22 the same word again is improperly used: "For though thou wash thee with niter, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." The alkaline earth natron is obviously designed in this passage. It is found as an impure carbonate of soda on the surface of the earth in Egypt and Syria, and is also native in some parts of Africa in hard strata or masses, and is called trona, being used for the same purposes as the barilla of commerce. (See NETER.)

NO (nō). See NO-AMON; THEBES.

NOADIAH (nō'ā-dī'ah), (Heb. נֹאֲדִיָּה, no-ad-yaw', Jehovah convenes, Jah assemblies).

1. A Levite, who had charge of the gold and silver vessels brought back by Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii:33), B. C. about 459.

2. A prophetess, who attempted to frighten Nehemiah from his purpose of building the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. vi:14), B. C. about 445.

NOAH (nō'ah), (Heb. נֹחַ or נֹחִי, no'akh, rest, quiet), the second father of the human race.

1. He was the son of the second Lamech, the grandson of Methusaleh, and the tenth in descent from Adam.

The father of Noah must not be confounded with the Lamech who was the fourth in descent from Cain. There is another instance of the same name in each line, Enoch; but the periods of each of the two couples must have been very different, though we cannot exactly compare them, for the history does not give the years of life in the line of Cain. The two Lamechs, however, have one remarkable circumstance in common; to each of them a fragment of inartificial poetry is attached as his own composition. That of the Cainitic Lamech is in Gen. iv:23, 24. That of the Sethite now comes before us in ch. v:29, 30: 'Lamech lived 182 years, and then begat a son, and he called his name Noah, saying:

This shall comfort us
From our labor,
And from the sorrowful toils of our hands,
From the ground,
Which Jehovah hath cursed.'

The allusion is undoubtedly to the penal consequences of the fall in earthly toils and sufferings, and to the hope of a Deliverer excited by the promise made to Eve. That this expectation was grounded upon a divine communication we infer from the importance attached to it, and the confidence of its expression. (See this subject well argued in Bishop Sherlock's Use and Intent of Prophecy, Disc. iv.)

"In Gen. ix:17, Noah appears as the hero of the Flood; in ix:20-29, as the first discoverer of the art of making wine. That these two stories come from different sources is probable, because in the earlier Accadian history of the Flood that event is immediately followed by the translation of Sitnapisti (Noah), perhaps referred to in chap. vi:9; comp. v:24.

"Amongst the Talmudists (e. g., Aboda Zara 64b, Sanhedrin 56b) it was customary to speak of 'the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, by which they meant those precepts that were supposed to be already binding upon mankind at large before Abraham and outside of his family. Other enumerations besides seven are also found." (F. H. Woods, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

(1) Sons of God. The descendants of Seth had become designated as 'the sons of God,' faithful and obedient; the women of the Cainite race were called by a term evidently designed to form an appellation of the contrary import, 'daughters of men,' of impious and licentious men. These women possessed beauty and blandishments, by which they won the affections of unwary men, and intermarriages upon a great scale took place. As is usual in such alliances, the worse part gained the ascendancy. The offspring became more depraved than the parents, and a universal corruption of minds and morals took place. Many of them became 'giants, the mighty men of old, men of renown' (nephilim), apostates (as the word implies), heroes, warriors, plunderers, 'filling the earth with violence.'

(2) Noah as a Preacher. God mercifully afforded a respite of 120 years (ch. vi:3; 1 Pet. iii:20; 2 Pct. ii:5), during which Noah sought to work salutary impressions upon their minds, and to bring them to repentance. Thus he was 'a preacher of righteousness,' exercising faith in the testimony of God, moved with holy reverence, obeying the divine commands, and, by the contrast of his conduct, condemning the world (Heb. xi:7); and probably he had during a long previous period labored in that benevolent and pious work.

(3) In the Ark. At last the threatening was fulfilled. All humankind perished in the waters, except this eminently favored and righteous man, with his three sons (born about 100 years before) and the four wives. (See DELUGE.)

(4) Noah's Sacrifice. At the appointed time this terrible state of the earth ceased, and a new surface was disclosed to the occupation and industry of the delivered family. In some places that surface would be washed bare to the naked rock, in others sand would be deposited, which would be long uncultivable; but by far the larger portion would be covered with rich soil. With agriculture and its allied arts the antediluvians must have been well acquainted. (See ADAM.) The four men, in the vigor of their mental faculties and bodily strength, according to the then existing scale of human life, would be at no loss for the profitable application of their powers. Immediately after the desolating judgment the merciful Jehovah gave intimations of his acceptance of the sacrifice and thanksgivings of Noah and his family, and of his gracious purposes revealed in the form of a solemn covenant for the continual benefit of them and their posterity. The beautiful phenomenon of the rainbow was put to a new and significant use. As infallibly certain as is the production of a rainbow under certain conditions of the atmosphere, so certain and sure of fulfillment are the promises of Jehovah.

(5) Story of the Flood Preserved. As the flood affected equally the common ancestry of mankind, all nations that have not sunk into the lowest barbarism would be likely to preserve the memory of the chief person connected with it; and it would be a natural fallacy that every people should attach to itself a principal interest in that catastrophe, and regard that chief person as the founder of their own nation, and belonging to their own locality. Hence, we can well account for the traditions of so many peoples upon this capital fact of ancient history, and the chief person in it; the Xisuthrus of the Chaldaeans, with whom is associated a remarkable number of precise circumstances, corresponding to the Mosaic narrative (Alex. Polyhist. in the Chronicle of Eusebius, so happily recovered by Mr. Zohrab, in the Armenian Version, and published by him in 1818); the Phrygian Noë of the celebrated Apamean medal, which, besides Noah and his wife with an ark, presents a raven, and a dove with an olive-branch in its mouth (figured in Bryant's Anc. Myth., vol. iii.); the Manes of the Lydians (Mr. W. J. Hamilton's Asia Min., iii. 383; see NATIONS, DISPERSION OF); the Deucalion of the Syrians and the Greeks, of whose deluge the account given by Lucian is a copy almost exactly circumstantial of that in the book of Genesis (Dea Syria; Lucian's Opp. iii:457, ed. Reitz; Bryant iii:28); the many coincidences in the Greek mythology in respect of Saturn, Janus, and Bacchus; the traditions of the aboriginal Americans, as stated by Clavigero, in his History of Mexico; and many others. (See DELUGE.) J. P. S.

(6) Character. That the conduct of Noah corresponded to the faith and hope of his father we have no reason to doubt. The brevity of the history satisfies not human curiosity. He was born 600 years before the Deluge. We may reasonably suppose that through that period he maintained the character given of him: 'Noah found favor in the eyes of the Lord. Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations. Noah walked with God' (Gen. vi:8, 9). These words declare his piety, sincerity, and integrity, that he maintained habitual communion with the Father of Mercies, by the exercises of devotion, and that he was an inspired instrument of conveying the will of God to mankind. The wickedness of the human race had long called upon the wisdom and justice of God for some signal display of his displeasure, as a measure of righteous government and an example to future ages.

2. (Heb. נֹחַ, no-aw', motion), one of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi:33; xxvii:1; xxxvi:11; Josh. xvii:3), B. C. about 1170. She, with her sisters, obtained an inheritance in the Promised Land, as her father had no sons.

NO-AMON (נֹחַ-אֲמוֹן, no, the home of Amon, place or portion of Amon).

A populous and celebrated city of Egypt, and the capital of Upper Egypt, named after the god Amon, and called by the Greeks Diospolis, or "city of Zeus;" but better known by the name of "Thebes." It was situated on both sides of the Nile, from 400 to 500 miles from its mouth. The only mention of the city in the Bible occurs in the prophecies. It is called No (Ezek. xxx:14-16; Jer. xlvi:25), and, margin, No-amon, rendered 'populous No' (Nah. iii:8).

The Nile valley at Thebes resembles a vast amphitheater, enclosed by the grand forms of the Arabian and Libyan mountains, the river running through nearly the center of this space. The area surrounded by these mountain-bulwarks is filled with ruins—avenues of sphinxes and statues, miles in length, at the end of which were massive columnar structures, the entrances to immense temples and palaces, and colossal images of the ancient Pharaohs, relics of regal magnificence so extensive and stupendous that the beholder might well imagine all the grandest ruins of the Old World had been brought together on this Theban plain. The extent of the city has been variously given by historians. According to Strabo, it covered an area five miles in length and three miles in breadth, and Diodorus makes its circuit about the same. Wilkinson also infers from its ruins that its length must have been about five and a fourth miles and its breadth three miles. Others suppose that the ancient city of Thebes, or No-amon, included the three sites of Luxor, Karnak, and Thebes, and that in the days of its glory, from B. C. 1600 to B. C. 800, it stretched thirty-three miles on both banks of the Nile. Its ruins are the most notable on the banks of that historic river. It became celebrated in the eleventh dynasty, and suffered in the thirteenth because of the invasion of the Hyksos. In the seventeenth century B. C. Amosis liberated the country and it reached its height of magnificence. The splendor of the city departed with the removal of the residence of the Pharaohs to the Delta. In its ruins it is great. Its temple of Karnak is a marvel. Its architecture is a problem of mechanical skill. Its great hall contains 134 columns, the loftiest 75 feet in height and 12 feet in diameter; the hall itself is 175 feet wide by 329 feet long. Every stone a book and every column a library in itself. The R. V. corrects some terms of reference to this place. In Jer. xlvi:25, the "multitude of No" is rendered "Amon of No;" in Nah. iii:8, the "populous No" is changed to "No-Amon." (See THEBES.)

NOB (nōb), (Heb. נוב, nobe; Sept. Νοβᾶ, nomba), a city of Benjamin, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, belonging to the priests, and where the tabernacle was stationed in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxi:2; xxii:9, 11, 19; Neh. xi:32; 1s. x:32).

From the last of these texts it would appear that Jerusalem was visible from Nob, which, therefore, must have been situated somewhere upon the ridge of the Mount of Olives, northeast of the city. Dr. Robinson states that he diligently sought along the ridge for some traces of an ancient site which might be regarded as that of Nob, but without the slightest success (Bibl. Researches, ii:150). Kiepert's Map places Nob at El-Isâ-wich, not far from Anâtû, about a mile northwest of Jerusalem. Lieutenant Conder argues (Quar. Statement of the "Palestine Exploration Fund," January, 1875, p. 34, sq.) that Nob is identical with ΜΙΖΡΕΗ, and both with the modern Neby Samwil.

NOBAH (nō'bah), (Heb. נבא, no'bahk, a bark).

1. A warrior, probably of Manasseh, who during the wars east of the Jordan captured Kenath on the western side of Jebel Hauran and gave the town his own name (Num. xxxii:42), B. C. about 1617.

2. A city mentioned in connection with Jogbehah, of Gad (Judg. viii:11). From the connection its site must be on the boundary between Gad and the Arabian desert.

NOBLE (nō'b'l), the translation of three Hebrew and two Greek words:

1. Yak-keer' (Heb. יקקר, dear, rare), a term applied (Ezra iv:10) to ASNAPPER (which see).

2. Par-tam' (Heb. פרם; Lat. primus), a noble, or prince among the Persians (Esth. i:3; iii:1, A. V. "princess"), and the Jews (Exod. xxiv:11; 1 Kings xxi:8, etc.).

3. So-rake' (Heb. קרש, reddish), a vine of a finer and richer kind, probably so called from purple grapes (Jer. ii:21).

4. Yoog-en'ace (Gr. εὐγένης, well-born), noble minded, nobly disposed, and thus inclined to tolerance, spoken of the Bereans (Acts xvii:11); well-born, of noble race (1 Cor. i:26).

5. Krat'is-tos (Gr. κράτιστος, strongest), a term used in addressing men of high rank or office (Acts xxiv:3; xxvi:25; comp. Neh. vi:17).

NOBLEMAN (nō'b'l-man).

The word so rendered in John iv:46 is the Greek βασιλεύς, bas-il-ee-kos, which is somewhat varied in signification. It may mean: (1) Descended from a king. (2) ἑπὶ τῆς βασιλείας, hoopay-rel'ace too bas-il-eh'oce, one belonging to the court. (3) Strat-ee-oh'tace bas-il-eh'oce, στρατιώτης βασιλέως, a soldier of the king, in which latter sense it often occurs in Josephus. (4) Yoog-en'ace (Gr. εὐγένης, well-born, and ἄνθρωπος, anth'ro-pos, man), used in the parable of the talents (Luke xix:12) as a title of the person who placed his servants in charge of certain amounts, for which they were to be held accountable, thus testing their fidelity and ability.

This person was, therefore, probably of the court of Herod Antipas, who reigned over Galilee and Peræa (Tholuck, Commentar zum Johan. iv:46). He has been identified with Chuza, Herod's steward (Luke viii:3), and with Manaen, Herod's foster brother (Acts xiii:1). These, of course, are mere conjectures. He was presumably a Jew, and is certainly not to be identified, as he has sometimes been, with the centurion whose servant Jesus healed (Matt. viii:5; Luke vii:2-10).

NOD (nōd), (Heb. נוד, node), the land to which Cain withdrew, and in which he appears to have settled (Gen. iv:16).

While the site of Paradise itself remains undetermined, it is useless to seek for that of the land of Nod. This land, wherever it was, could not have had a name till Cain went to it; and it was doubtless called Nod (which signifies flight, wandering, from the circumstance that Cain fled to it. Von Bohlen identifies it with India. Sayce sees in it the Manda of the cuneiform inscriptions. To the Rabbis it was sufficient that it lay somewhere in the east and away from Eden, whither Adam had been banished.

NODAB (nō'dāb), (Heb. נודב, no-dawb', nobility), an Arab tribe, probably belonging to the Syrian desert (1 Chron. v:19).

Delitzsch (New Com. on Gen. xxv:15), connects it with Nudébe in the Wady el-butin of the Hauran. But it is more likely that we have here a transcription of Nabatean. It would be strange that a powerful kingdom like Nabatea should not have proved a formidable neighbor to the trans-Jordanic Israelites. (See NABAOTH.)

NOE (nō'e), (Gr. Νόε, no'eh), the Greek form of NOAH (Matt. xxiv:37, 38; Luke iii:36; xvii:26, 27).

NOGAH (nō'gah), (Heb. נגה, no'gah, a shining), the fourth son born to David in Jerusalem, by other wives than Bathsheba (1 Chron. iii:7; xiv:6), B. C. cir. 1040. The name is wanting in the parallel list (2 Sam. v).

NOHAH (nō'bah), (Heb. נוח, no-khaw', rest), a son of Benjamin and head of a family in the tribe (1 Chron. viii:2), B. C. about 1850.

He is not mentioned among those who went down with Jacob into Egypt, and was, therefore, probably born after that migration. He is perhaps the same as BECHER (Gen. xlvi:21), or 1R (1 Chron. vii:12).

NOISE, NOISED (noiz), (Heb. תרושה, ter-oo-aw'; Gr. ἀκούω, ak-oo'o).

This term is no longer used of music in a good or neutral sense, as we find it in Ps. xxxiii:3, 'Play skillfully with a loud noise.' Comp. Bunyan, p. 206: 'Mercy—Hark, don't you hear a Noise? Chris.—Yes, 'tis, as I believe, a Noise of Musick, for joy that we are here.' Ps. xlvii:5, Prayer Book, 'God is gone up with a merry noise'; and Milton, At a Solemn Music, line 18—

'That we on earth with undiscording voice
May rightly answer that melodious noise.'

Nor is it used of a company or set of musicians, or of a band.

"The king has his noise of gypsies as well as of beardwars and other minstrels." Ben Jonson.

(See article in Hastings' Bib. Cyc., by J. Hastings.)

The verb "to noise," Dr. Hastings says, is no longer in use. But the term in its participle form has not become entirely obsolete, and will again come into active use from its expressiveness, in the sense of "to spread by rumor or report."

It occurs five times in A. V.: Josh. vi:27, 'His fame was noised throughout all the country' (R. V. 'his fame was in all the land'); Judith x:18, 'Her coming was noised among the tents;' Mark ii:1, 'It was noised that he was in the house;' Luke i:65, 'All these sayings were noised abroad;' Acts ii:6, 'When this was noised abroad' (R. V. 'when this sound was heard').

NOISOME (noi'sūm), (Gr. βλαβερός, blab-er-os', Rev. xvi:2; comp. Ps. xci:3; Ezek. xiv:15, 21; "harmful" in 1 Tim. vi:9), in the early translations was equivalent to noxious, injurious or hurtful. "Foul breath is noisome," Shakespeare.

NON (nōn), (Heb. נון, nōhn, continuation).

1. An Ephraimite through Beriah, who was born to Ephraim after the men of Gath had slain some of his sons (1 Chron. vii:27).

2. A form of Nun, which was the name of the father of Joshua. (See NUN.)

NOON (nōōn). See TIME.

NOPH (nōf), (Heb. נֹפֶה, nofe). See MEMPHIS.

NOPHAH (nō'phah), (Heb. נֹפֶחַ, no'fakh, blast, windy place), a place in Moab mentioned only in Num. xxi:30. It is possibly the Moabitish form of Mobah.

NOPHECH (nō'fēk), (Heb. נֹפֶךְ, no-fekh), a precious stone, named in Exod. xxviii:18; xxxix:11; Ezek. xxvii:16; xxviii:13; in all which places it is rendered 'Emerald' in the Authorized Version.

The Sept. and Josephus render it by an-athrax, ἀναθραξ, or carbuncle, this name denoting a live coal, the ancients gave to several glowing red stones resembling live coals (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxii:25; comp. Theophrast. De Lapid. 18), particularly rubies and garnets. The most valued of the carbuncles seems, however, to have been the Oriental garnet, a transparent red stone, with a violet shade, and strong vitreous luster. It was engraved upon (Theophrast., 31), and was probably not so hard as the ruby, which, indeed, is the most beautiful and costly of the precious stones of a red color, but is so hard that it cannot easily be subjected to the graving-tool. The Hebrew nophech, in the breast-plate of the high-priest, was certainly an engraved stone; and there is no evidence that the ancients could engrave the ruby, although this has in modern times been accomplished. Upon the whole, the particular kind of stone denoted by the Hebrew word must be regarded as uncertain (Rosenmüller, Biblical Mineralogy, pp. 32, 33). (See CARBUNCLE; EMERALD; RUBY.)

NORTH (nōrth), (Heb. צָפוֹן, mez-aw-reh', scatterer, Job xxxvii:9).

The Shemite, in speaking of the quarters of the heavens and of the earth, supposes his face turned towards the east, so that the east is before him, the west behind, the south on the right hand, and the north on the left. Hence the words which signify east, west, north, and south signify also that which is before, behind, on the right hand, and on the left. The Hebrew word translated north occurs in the five following senses:

(1) A Particular Quarter of the Heavens. It denotes a particular quarter of the heavens; thus, 'fair weather cometh out of the north' (Job xxxvii:22).

(2) Quarter of the Earth. It means a quarter of the earth (Ps. cvii:3; Is. xliii:6; Ezek. xx:47; xxxii:30; comp. Luke xiii:29).

(3) A Northern Aspect. It occurs in the sense of a northern aspect or direction, etc.; thus, 'looking north' (1 Kings vii:25; 1 Chron. ix:24; Num. xxxiv:7); on 'the north side' (Ps. xlviii:2; Ezek. viii:14; xl:44; comp. Rev. xxi:13).

(4) Name for Countries. It seems used as the conventional name for certain countries, irrespectively of their true geographical situation, namely, Babylonia, Chaldaea, Assyria, and Media, which are constantly represented as being to the north of Judæa, though some of them lay rather to the east of Palestine. Thus Assyria is called the north (Zeph. ii:13), and Babylonia (Jer. i:14; xlv:6, 10, 20, 24; Ezek. xxvi:7; Judith xvi:4).

(5) North Wind. The Hebrew word is applied to the north wind. In Prov. xxvii:16, the impossibility of concealing the qualities of a contentious wife, is illustrated by comparing it to an attempt to bind the north wind. The invocation of Solomon (Cant. iv:16), 'Awake, oh north, and come, thou south, blow upon my garden that the spices may flow out,' and which has occasioned much perplexity to illustrators, seems well explained by Rosenmüller, as simply alluding to the effect of winds from opposite quarters, in dispersing the fragrance of aromatic shrubs (verses 13, 14) far and wide, in all directions. J. F. D.

NORTH COUNTRY (nōrth kün'tr'y), a term applied to the countries lying north of Palestine, whence came invaders and foes (Is. xli:25; Jer. i:14, 15; Ezek. xxvi:7). (See NORTH.)

NOSE, NOSTRILS (nōz, nos'trils), (Heb. אֶפְסָרוֹת, af; dual אֶפְסָרוֹת, ap-pah-yeem', properly, breathing place, Num. xi:20). The Hebrews commonly place the seat of anger in the nose; since the effect of anger is often hard breathing, and in animals, snorting, "There went up a smoke out of his nostrils" (2 Sam. xxii:9; Ps. xviii:8).

Figurative. (1) "Lo, they put the branch to their nose" (Ezek. viii:17) appears to be a proverbial expression variously interpreted. Some understand it as the barsom, which the Pharisees held in their hand while praying, or rather in front of the mouth as a magical mode of driving demons away. Two other explanations may be given—that it is a proverbial expression, "to apply the twig to anger," in the sense of adding fuel to the fire. The second, that of Hitzig, "They apply the sickle to their nose," i. e., by seeking to injure me they injure themselves (Keil, Com., in loc.).

(2) The words "they take away thy nose and ears" (Ezek. xxiii:25) are not to be interpreted, as the earlier expositors suppose, from the custom prevalent among the Egyptians and other nations of cutting off the nose of an adulteress, but depict, by one particular example, the mutilation of prisoners captured by their enemies.

(3) As the Hebrews employed the term signifying nose to denote anger, "nose" and "nostrils," ascribed to God, denote his discernment of provocation, and his wrath to be executed on account thereof (Exod. xv:8; Ps. xviii:8; Is. lxy:5).

"The anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man" (Deut. xxix:20). "Out of his nostrils goeth smoke" (Job xli:20). Camels and oxen were managed by iron rings in their nostrils, and thereto the allusion is made (2 Kings xix:28; comp. Job xli:2; Is. xxxvii:29).

NOSE JEWELS (nōz jū-ēls), mentioned in Is. iii:21, consisted of a ring of gold or other metal upon which jewels were strung. The nose-rings now worn by the lower classes in Egypt are from one to one and a half inches in diameter and are passed through the right nostril (Schaff).

NOTABLE (nōt'ā-b'l), the translation of several words in the Scriptures.

1. (Heb. מְצֻיָּה, khaw-zooth'), meaning prominent, conspicuous (Dan. viii:5).

2. (Gr. ἐπιφανής, ep-if-an-ace', Acts ii:20), well-known, conspicuous, clearly seen, illustrious.

3. Notorious (Gr. ἐπίτομος, eh-pis'ay-mos, Matt. xxvii:16), 'And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas.'

4. Unmistakable, well known (Gr. γνωστός, noctos', Acts iv:16), 'a notable miracle.'

NOTE (nōt).

1. (Heb. חָקַק, khaw-kak', to engrave), to write (Is. xxx:8).

2. "Who are of note" (Gr. ἐπίσημος, ep-is'ay-mos, having a mark) is spoken of Andronicus and Junia, as being highly esteemed by the apostles (Rom. xvi:7).

3. (Gr. σημειῶν, say-mi-ō'o, to distinguish), to mark a man by shunning him (2 Thess. iii:14).

NOTHING, NOUGHT (nūth'ing), (Heb. כֹּלֵ, kole).

1. Not anything at all (Gen. xix:8).

2. For no good purpose or end (Matt. v:13).

3. No works truly good and acceptable to God (John xv:5).

4. Of no binding force (Matt. xxiii:16, 18).

5. Entirely false, and without ground (Acts xxi:24).

6. No other means (Mark ix:29).

7. No reward or wages (3 John 7).

8. No new doctrine relative to men's salvation; no new knowledge or authority (Gal. ii:6).

9. No guilt or corruption to work upon (John xiv:30).

Nothing is sometimes taken comparatively: thus our age is nothing before God, bears no proportion to his eternal duration (Ps. xxxix:5). All nations are nothing, and less than nothing, and vanity; i. e., they bear no proportion to his unbounded excellency and greatness (Is. xl:17). Sometimes it is taken relatively: so Paul was nothing valuable in his own estimation of himself (2 Cor. xii:11). Circumcision, or uncircumcision, is nothing; is of no avail to render us accepted with God (1 Cor. vii:19). To come to nought, is to be ruined, turn out to no good purpose (Job viii:22; Is. viii:10). To bring to nought, is to render unsuccessful, base, and contemptible (Ps. xxxiii:10; 1 Cor. i:28). To set at nought, is to undervalue, despise (Prov. i:25).

In the phrase nothing worth it is probable that 'nothing' is again adverbial, though we have but to transpose the words to find it a substantive. It occurs in Job xxiv:25, 'who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth?'

NOVICE (nōv'is) or NEOPHYTE (Gr. Νεόφυτος, nee-oh'foo-tos, one newly converted), (literally newly planted), not yet matured in Christian experience (1 Tim. iii:6). The ancient Greek interpreters explain it by 'new-baptized,' νεοβαπτιστος, nee-oh'hap'tis-tos, 'proselyte,' προσήλυτος, pros-ay'lu-tos, etc.

The word continued to be in use in the early church; but it gradually acquired a meaning somewhat different from that which it bore under the Apostles, when 'newly converted' and 'newly baptized' described, in fact, the same condition, the converted being at once baptized. For when, in subsequent years, the church felt it prudent to put converts under a course of instruction before admitting them to baptism and the full privileges of Christian brotherhood, the term Νεόφυτοι, Novitii, Novices, was sometimes applied to them, although more usually distinguished by the general term of Catechumens.

NUMBER (nūm'bēr). The following numbers were understood by the Hebrews to have a symbolical or representative significance:

(1) Three was deemed to have a peculiar mystic meaning. It is the number of the Deity (the Trinity), of the thrice-repeated "Holy" (Is. vi:3), of the threefold priestly blessing (Num. vi:23-26), Daniel's three hours of prayer (Dan. vi:10), etc.

(2) Four symbolizes the world or humanity. There are four winds (Ezek. xxxvii:9), four beasts (Rev. iv:6), and four living creatures with four faces, four wings, and four sides (Ezek. i:5-10, etc.).

(3) Five, appears in the tables of requirements and punishments, as Exod. xxii:1; Lev. v:16. Also, five empires (Dan. ii). In the New Testament, five wise and five foolish virgins, etc.

(4) Seven, the union of three and four, is the number of the covenants between God and man. It implies perfection. The number occurs very frequently in connection with both holy things and things unholy. For example, the seven-branched candlestick (Exod. xxv:37; 1 Kings vii:17; Zech. iv:10; comp. Is. xi:2); the sprinkling of the blood seven times (Lev. iv:6; viii:11; xiv:7; xvi:14; Num. xix:4; 2 Kings v:10); seven lambs (Num. xxviii:11; Ezek. xlv:23; 2 Chron. xxix:21); comp. the seven sons of Saul who were hanged before the Lord (2 Sam. xxi:9); the seven locks of the Nazarite Samson (Judg. xvi:13, 19); the seven priests that carried seven trumpets seven times in front of the ark and around the walls of Jericho (Josh vi:4); the seven days in the week, the seven churches (Rev. i:4), the seven years of plenty in Egypt (Gen. xli:26), the seven angels with seven golden vials (Rev. xv:1); but also the seven heads and seven crowns of the dragon (Rev. xii:3).

(5) Ten, the number of fingers (two hands), symbolizes harmony and completeness. It is the number of the fundamental commandments.

(6) Twelve, the multiple of three and four, is also a covenant number, like seven. Hence we have the twelve tribes, the twelve stones in the high-priest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii:21), twelve apostles, twelve gates in the New Jerusalem, etc.

(7) Forty, four multiplied by ten; as the forty days of our Lord's temptation (Matt. iv), the forty years in the wilderness, etc.

(8) Seventy, seven multiplied by ten; as the seventy elders of Israel (Num. xi:16), the seventy disciples of our Lord (Luke x:1).

It is very difficult, if indeed at all possible, to get the exact and definite meaning of these numbers, and we must not carry the search too far. But that they had a special meaning for the Hebrews there can be little doubt (compare the extended and ingenious treatment of Lange, Com. on Revelation, pp. 14, sq.). (Schaff, Bib. Dict.; Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

NUMBERS, BOOK OF (nūm'bērs), is the appellation given to the fourth book of Moses, which in the Septuagint is called Ἀριθμοί, ar-it-hmoi, numbers, and in the Hebrew canon be-mid-bar, 'in the desert.'

1. Contents. This book embraces more especially the continuation of the Sinaitic legislation, the march through the wilderness, the rejection of a whole generation, and the commencement of the conquest of Canaan. Thus we see that it treats on very different subjects, and on this account it has frequently been attempted to resolve it into separate fragments and documents, and to represent it as being composed of the most heterogeneous materials. We will endeavor to refute this opinion, by furnishing an accurate survey of its contents, and by describing the internal connection of its component parts, so that the organization of the book may be clearly understood.

(1) Arrangements for Order. The sum and substance of the law having been stated in the preceding books, that of Numbers commences with the arrangements requisite for preserving good order in the camp of the Israelites. The people are numbered for the express purpose of separating the Levites from those Israelites who had to bear arms, and of thus introducing into practice the law concerning the firstborn, for whom the tribe of Levi became a substitute. For this reason the people are not merely numbered, but also classed according to their descent; the order which each tribe should occupy in the camp is defined; and the Levites are introduced into their respective functions (chapters i-iv).

The camp, having been consecrated, was to be kept pure according to the law of Levitical cleansings; consequently all persons were excluded from it who were afflicted with leprosy, who had become unclean by a flux, and who had touched a corpse (ch. v:1-4).

(2) Authority of Priests. Thus, after civil and sacerdotal life had been brought into a definite form, other laws based upon this form came into force, especially those laws which regulated the authority of the priests in civil affairs (ch. v:5; vi:27). These regulations conclude with the beautiful form of benediction which indicates the blessing to be expected from the true observance of the preceding directions. The people are impressed with this fact; the hearts of the Israelites are willing to offer the required gifts, and to entrust them to the Levites.

(3) Lamps. Jehovah is faithful to his promise, and gloriously reveals himself to his people (ch. vii). Before the Levites enter upon the discharge of their sacred functions, the law concerning the lamps to be lighted in the sanctuary is significantly repeated (ch. viii). These lamps symbolize the communication of the Holy Spirit and bring to the recollection of the nation the blessings of theocracy to be derived from setting apart the tribe of Levi, which had recently been separated from the rest of the people.

(4) Celebration of Passover. Then follows a description of the celebration of the Passover, preparatory to the departure of the people from Mount Sinai (ch. ix:1-14). Some regulations are connected with the celebration of the Passover, and the whole miraculous guidance of the people is described (ch. ix:15-x).

(5) Entrance Into Canaan. Thus the entrance of Israel into the Holy Land seemed to be fully prepared; and it was of great importance to show how they were prevented from entering it. Accurate details are therefore given of the spirit which pervaded the nation; a spirit which, in spite of the forbearance of God, manifested itself in daring rebellions against the divine authority (chapters xi and xii).

(6) Turning Point of History. Now comes the turning point of the history. Everything seems externally prepared for the conquest of the country, when it appears that the nation are not yet internally ripe for the performance of so important an act (chapters xiii, xiv).

In immediate connection with this are some laws which were given in the desert; the intention of which was to recall to the recollection of the rejected race, which had been justly condemned to suffer severe punishment, that nevertheless they had not ceased to be the people of the covenant, and the depository of divine revelation (comp. ch. xv:2, 13-16, 22, 23, 37, sq.). In this respect the facts mentioned in ch. xv:32-36 and ch. xvi are also of great importance. They show, on the one hand, the continuance of an evil disposition in the people, and, on the other, the majesty of God watching over his holy law.

The contents of chapters xv-xix are of a similar character. The facts there recorded relate to a period of thirty-eight years. The conciseness with which they are stated significantly indicates the strictly legal and theocratical principles of the Mosaical legislation.

(7) Period of Israel's Rejection. The period of Israel's rejection is characterized by the circumstance, that the historian is almost silent respecting it, as being a period not strictly belonging to theocratical history. During this period the striking deeds of God, his miracles and signs, the more prominent operations of his grace, and his peculiar blessings, cease. The rejection of the nation consisted in this suspension of the divine operations. During this period God, as it were, ignored his people. Consequently, the historian also almost ignores the rebellious race. But the period in which the divine promises were to be fulfilled again forms a prominent portion of the history.

(8) Termination of Penal Period. The termination of the penal period is the commencement of the most important era in the Mosaical history. It brings the legislation to a splendid conclusion. The most glorious facts here follow each other in close succession; facts which were intended clearly to demonstrate that the chosen people entered into the land of promise, not by their own power and might, but that this land was given into their hands by the God of promise.

(9) Subsequent History. Miriam was already dead; and the forty years of wandering in the wilderness were accomplished. Israel was again in sight of the Holy Land on the borders of Edom. Then Moses and Aaron also sinned; soon after, Aaron died, and was succeeded by Eleazar. Israel sent ambassadors to the king of Edom to obtain permission to pass through his territory, but was haughtily refused (ch. xx). Everything seemed to be prepared by preceding events already recorded. The dying off of the real emigrants from Egypt might be expected, after the divine decree that this should come to pass, had been mentioned; the unbelief of Moses arose from the protracted duration of the time of punishment, which at length broke his courage; the spirit of Edom arose in overbearing animosity, because it seemed that Jehovah had forsaken his people. It was appointed that Israel should undergo all this in order that they might grow strong in the Lord. Their strength was soon proved against Arad. They vowed to devote all the cities of the Canaanites to Jehovah, who gave them the victory. They were directed to avoid the boundaries of Edom, and to have Canaan alone in view. The people murmured, and the significant symbol of the serpent was erected before them, reminding them of their ancient sin, and how it had been healed and overcome by Jehovah. In all this Israel is constantly directed to Canaan. They march courageously to the boundaries of the Amorites, singing praises to Jehovah, and, by the power of the Lord, defeat the kings of Heshbon and Bashan (ch. xxi).

In the plains of Moab still greater glory awaits the chosen people. The pagan prophet of Mesopotamia, being hired by the king of the Moabites, is overpowered by Jehovah, so that he is compelled to bless Israel instead of cursing them; and also directs them to the ancient blessings granted to the patriarchs. The bitterest enemies of the theocracy are here most deeply humbled, being themselves compelled to contribute to the glory of Jehovah (chapters xxii-xxiv). Not the God, but the people of Israel, were dishonored through the devices of Balaam.

The subsequent account concerning the idolatry into which the people were led, forms a striking contrast with the preceding chapters, and evinces the impotence of the Israelites, whose first attack, therefore, was to be directed against their seducers. This was to be the beginning of the conquest of Canaan, which was essentially a combat against idolatry, and the victory of the kingdom of God over paganism. The conquered country was granted to separate tribes, and for this purpose the people were once more numbered, and Joshua appointed their leader.

Jehovah reserves his own rights in the distribution of the country, and Israel is directed not to forget the sacrifices to the Lord, the sabbaths, festivals, and vows; the ordinances concerning which are here briefly repeated, inculcated, and completed.

The people shall certainly gain the victory, but only in strict communion with Jehovah. Thus begins the combat against Midian, according to the directions of the law, and forming as it were a prototype of the later combats of Israel against pagan powers (chapters xxv-xxxii).

This was the last external work of Moses. Henceforth his eye is directed only to the internal affairs of his people. An entrance has been effected into the country, and the conquered territory is divided among two tribes and a half-tribe (ch. xxxii).

Moses reminds the people of Jehovah's guidance in the wilderness, and of the manner in which the whole land was to be conquered. He commands the destruction of the Canaanites and of their idolatry. He appoints to what extent the land is to be conquered, and in what manner it should be divided; also the towns to be granted to the Levites, and the cities of refuge. He establishes also the statute, which was of great importance for the preservation of landed property, that an heiress should marry only within her own tribe (chapters xxxiii-xxxvi).

2. Credibility. There have frequently been raised strong doubts against the historical credibility of the book of Numbers, although it is impressed with indubitable marks of the age to which it refers, and of perfect authenticity.

(1) Author Acquainted with Egypt. The author of the book of Numbers proves himself to be intimately acquainted with Egypt. The productions mentioned in chapter xi:5 are, according to the most accurate investigations, really those which in that country chiefly served for food.

Narratives like the history of Balaam (xxii, xxiv) furnish also numerous proofs of their high antiquity. These confirmations are of the greatest importance, on account of the many marvelous and enigmatical points of the narrative.

(2) Accurate Geographical Statements. Compare, for instance, the geographical statements, which are uncommonly accurate, in chapters xxii:1, 36, 39; xxiii:14, 15, 27, 28. (See Hengstenberg's Geschichte Bilcam's, Berlin, 1842, p. 221, sq.)

The list of stations in chapter xxxiii is an important document, which could not have originated in a poetical imagination. This list contains a survey of the whole route of the Israelites, and mentions individual places only in case the Israelites abode there for a considerable period. It is not the production of a diligent compiler, but rather the original work of an author well versed in the circumstances of that period. A later author would certainly have avoided the appearance of some contradictions, such as that in Num. xxxiii:30, 31, comp. with Deut. x:6. This apparent contradiction may best be removed by observing that the book of Numbers speaks of the expedition of the Israelites in the second year of their wanderings, and the book of Deuteronomy of their expedition in the fortieth year. (See DISCREPANCIES, BIBLICAL.) The list of stations contains also important historical notices; those, for instance, in chapter xxxiii:4, 9, 14, 38. These notices demonstrate the accurate historical information of the author. H. A. C. H.

NUN (nūn), (Heb. נ, noon, in Syr. and Arab., a fish), the father of Joshua, who is hence constantly called Joshua ben-Nun (Exod. xxxiii:11; Num. xi:28; xiii:8, 16; xiv:6, 30, 38; xxvi:65; xxvii:18; xxxii:12, 28, etc.), B. C. before 1210. 'Joshua the son of Nun.' Nothing is known of the person who bore this name.

NURSE, NURSING (nûrs, nûrs'ing), (Heb. נָוּן, yaw-nak', to give milk; once נָוּן, aw-man', to foster, support, Ruth iv:16).

The position of nurse was one of much importance and honor. Rebekah's nurse accompanied her mistress to Canaan, and was hurried with much mourning at Allon-bachuth (Gen. xxiv:59; xxxv:8). The tenderness of a nurse is not infrequently referred to (Is. xlix:23; 1 Thess. ii:7).

NURSING FATHER (nûrs'ing fâ'hēr), (Is. xlix:23). A nursing father is a foster father.

NURTURE (nûr'tûr), (Gr. παιδα, pahee-di'ah, Eph. vi:4. Training in mind and soul for the duties and responsibilities of life.

Both in LXX and New Testament παιδα and παιδεύω describe, not 'nurture' in the modern use of that word, but training, especially such training or discipline as involves restraint and even chastisement. Chastise and chastening or chastisement are often the best translation, as in Heb. xii:5, 7, 10. In Luke xxiii:16, 22, the verb is used of the scourging of a malefactor; it is rendered 'chastise' in A. V.

NUTS (nûts), (Heb. בָּוֹתֵן, bo'ten).

Those mentioned in Gen. xliii:11 are doubtless pistachio-nuts, which were produced in Syria, but not in Egypt. The pistachio tree (Pistacia vera) resembles the sumac, to whose family it belongs. It is still cultivated in the Levant, and produces thin-shelled nuts resembling almonds, but smaller and with a green meat tasting like that of the walnut. The nuts of Cant. vi:11 (אֶמְנִי, eg-oze') are walnuts. They are universally cultivated and greatly esteemed in Bible lands.

NYMPHAS (nÿm'phas), (Gr. Νυμφῆς, noom-fas', nymph-given), a Christian of Laodicea or Colossæ, to whom Paul sent salutations (Col. iv:15).

O

OAK (ֹק). Four Hebrew words are translated oak. Of these, three, אֵילִים (ah'yil), אֵילָנִים (ay-law'), and אֵילֹנִים (al-lone'), are uncertain in meaning, and are either oak or terebinth. The other, אֵילָנָה (al-law'), probably refers definitely to the oak. They are always so translated in A. V. and R. V.

(1) In the following passages, at least, the word probably denotes the terebinth, or the elm of Hos. iv:13 (see TEIL TREE); Gen. xxxv:4, 8; Judg. vi:11, 19; 2 Sam. xviii:9, 10, 14; 1 Kings xiii:14; 1 Chron. x:12; Is. i:30; Ezek. vi:13. In other instances "oak" may denote any strong flourishing tree (Amos ii:9), or a grove of such trees.

(2) Botanists find three species of this tree in Palestine. One of the most universal and characteristic bushes of the country is the prickly evergreen-oak (Quercus pseudo-coccifera), which has a leaf like the holly, but smaller. This oak now rarely exceeds twelve feet in height, but when the destruction of trees was less universal it doubtless attained great size and age. "Abraham's Oak," in the field of Mamre, near Hebron, the noblest tree of southern Palestine, is of this species, and is twenty-three feet in girth; and there are said to be still finer specimens in the north and east.

The Valonia oak (Q. agrilops) sheds its leaves and more resembles some of our own species. The trunk is unusually massive, and the tree often grows to a magnificent size. It is not seen in the south, but abounds in the north, especially about Mount Tabor and also east of the Jordan, and is doubtless the "oak of Bashan" (Is. ii:12, 13; Zech. xi:2). It produces very large acorns, which are eaten by the poor, while their cups are employed by tanners under the name of valeria, and exported from many parts of the Turkish empire.

Another kind (Q. infectoria) sometimes occurs in Samaria and Galilee as a small tree with deciduous leaves, white beneath. Travelers through the uninhabited districts of Gilead and Bashan have found there magnificent forests of all three species.

(3) In the Bible we find these noble trees often mentioned for the purpose of designating the locality of important events as in Gen. xxxv:8; Josh. xxiv:26. Oak wood was used for idols (Is. xlv:14) and idolatry was practiced under oaks (Is. i:30; lvii:5; Ezek. vi:13).

(4) The word translated "plains" in several passages (Gen. xii:6; xiii:18; xiv:13; xviii:1; Deut. xi:30; Judg. iv:11; ix:6, 37; 1 Sam. x:

Abraham's Oak in the Plains of Mamre.

3) means places noted for one or more oaks. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

(5) It will thus be seen that the several species of oak are among the most widely disseminated trees of Syria and Palestine. The mountains of Haurân (Bashan, Is. ii:13; Ezek. xxvii:6; Zech. xi:2) have many oak trees still, mostly Quercus Coccifera, Quercus Agrilops, and Quercus Lusitanica. Oak trees were planted by tombs (Gen. xxxv:8). Few objects in Palestine or Syria are more striking than the immense oak trees, solitary or grouped near the Welies or tombs of the prophets. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

The Tyrians made their oars for rowing their ships of the fine "oaks of Bashan" (Ezek. xxvii:6). (See ALLON.)

Figurative. (1) The Hebrews were like an "oak whose leaf fadeth"; stripped of their confidence in themselves and others, and bereaved of their honor, wealth, prosperity, and pleasure (Is. i:30), yet like an "oak or teil-tree," whose substance or life is in it though bare of foliage, could never be utterly destroyed by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, or Romans (Is. vi:13). (2) Governors and great and valiant men, are compared to the tall and strong "oaks of Bashan," to mark their apparent power, strength, and firmness, and their fitness to protect others (Is. ii:13; Zech. xi:2).

OAK, WORSHIP OF (ōk, wâr-shĭp ōv). Oak groves in ancient times were used as places of religious assembly; altars were set up in them (Josh. xxiv:26); Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak, which, as a sacred tree, would free them from disturbance (Gen. xxxv:4). (See OAK.)

OATH (ōth), (Heb. שְׁבֻעָה, sheb-oo-aw'), an appeal to God in attestation of the truth of what you say, or in confirmation of what you promise or undertake.

The Latin term is jusjurandum, or juramentum. Cicero (De Officiis, iii, 29) correctly terms an oath a religious affirmation; that is, an affirmation with a religious sanction. This appears from the words which he proceeds to employ: that an oath is an appeal to God, as the source and the indicator of justice and fidelity.

(1) Elements. Hence it appears that there are two essential elements in an oath: first, the human, a declared intention of speaking the truth, or performing the action in a given case; secondly, the Divine, an appeal to God, as a Being who knows all things and will punish guilt. According to usage, however, there is a third element in the idea which 'oath' commonly conveys, namely, that the oath is taken only on solemn, or, more specifically, on juridical occasions. The canon law gives all three elements when it represents judicium, veritas, justitia, as entering into the constitution of an oath—judicium, judgment or trial on the part of society; veritas, truth on the part of the oath-taker; justitia, justice on the part of God. An oath is accordingly a religious undertaking either to say (juramentum assertorium), or to do (juramentum promissorium) something entered into voluntarily with the customary forms. Being a religious undertaking, the appeal will vary according to the religious opinions of the country in which the oath is taken. In some instances it will be an appeal immediately to God; in others, to objects supposed to have Divine power; and by a natural declension, when men have left the only true God, they may appeal in their oaths even to stocks and stones. Accordingly the Roman swore, 'per caput suum vel suorum filiorum,' or 'per genium principis;' that is, by his own head or those of his children, or by the genius of the emperor. We shall have by and by to notice similar errors and abuses among the Jews.

(2) Essence. The essence of an oath lies obviously in the appeal which is thereby made to God, or to Divine knowledge and power. The customary form establishes this, 'So help me God.' The Latin words (known to have been used as early as the sixth century), whence our English form is taken, run thus: 'Sic me Deus adjuvet et hæc sancta Evangelia;' so may God and these holy Gospels help me; that is, 'as I say the truth.' The present custom of kissing a book containing the gospels has in England taken the place of the latter clause in the Latin formula.

If, then, an appeal to God is the essence of an oath, oath-taking is a practice which cannot be justified. Such an appeal is wrong, because it is a mere act of a creature's will, being unrequired and unsanctioned by God, in a case in which God is made a party to a certain course, which course may or may not be agreeable to his mind (because a wish on the part of the oath-taker for punishment, should he fail in his undertaking, or any part of the same, is an act unbecoming a frail man; unseemly in its very nature, and awful to think of when man's sinfulness and God's power are rightly apprehended); because it relaxes the general bonds of religion, and morality, and truth; (for in establishing an occasion when justice must be done, it authorizes the idea that its observance is not imperative on other occasions); and because it is founded on an essentially false view of religious obligation; for as God sees, knows, and governs all things, and as all things so each thing, so man is bound universally to speak the truth and perform what he undertakes, bound as much in each and in all the actions of his life, as his dependence and God's sovereignty can bind a rational and accountable being; so that it is radically false to suppose that there is or can be anything special in the obligation of an oath; the tendency of which falsity is not to raise, but to degrade the character, to reduce the general standard of truth and rectitude, to weaken the moral sense, by encouraging the idea that on special occasions, and of course on special occasions only, truth is to be spoken and promises performed.

(3) Early Use. It is one among those numerous accordances, small when compared with the dictates of right reason, which will be found to prevail in the Bible the more minutely it is investigated, and which, though now, after a revelation has enlightened the mind, are discoverable thereby, nevertheless are so far beyond its reach, when left to its own resources, that the practice of antiquity bears in the opposite direction—it is one of those very important accordances with truth, that the Mosaic legislation is not answerable for the practice of taking oaths, which existed before the time of Moses. It is found as early as the days of Abraham, who made the oldest servant of his family swear he would select for Isaac a wife of his own kindred (Gen. xxiv:2, 3, 37). It is here observable that the oath is a private, not a judicial one; only that the rectoral authority of Abraham, as patriarch, must be taken into account. The form observed is found in these words: 'Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh; and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven and the God of earth, that,' etc.

(4) Occasions. An oath was sometimes a public and general bond, obliging the parties who took it to certain course—a case in which it appears to have been spontaneous and voluntary; as when, in Judg. xxi, the men of Israel swore, saying, 'There shall not any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife' (comp. verse 5). From 1 Kings xviii:10, it appears to have been customary to require on occasions of great concern a public oath, embracing even an entire 'kingdom and nation;' but whether taken individually or by some representative, we have no means of ascertaining. Such a custom, however, implying, as it does, a doubt of the public faith of a people, would hardly be submitted to, unless on the part of an inferior.

Oaths did not take their origin in any Divine command. They were a part of that consuetudinary law which Moses found prevalent, and was bound to respect, since no small portion of the force of law lies in custom, and a legislator can neither abrogate nor institute a binding law of his own mere will. Accordingly, Moses made use of the sanction which an oath gave, but in that general manner, and apart from minute directions and express words of approval; which shows that he merely used, without intending to sanction, an instrument that he found in existence and could not safely dispense with. Examples are found in Exod. xxii:11, where an oath is ordered to be applied in the case of lost property; and here we first meet with what may strictly be called a judicial oath (Lev. vi:3-5).

(5) Forms of Oaths. The forms of adjuration found in the Scriptures are numerous. Saul swore unto Jonathan, 'As the Lord liveth' (1 Sam. xix:6). 'A heap and a pillar' were for a witness between Laban and Jacob, with the ensuing for a sanction, 'The God of Abraham and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge betwixt us. And Jacob swore by the fear of his father Isaac' (Gen. xxxi:52, sq.). A common formula is, 'The Lord do so to me and more also' (Ruth i:17; 1 Sam. iv:44), which approaches nearly to our modern form, 'So help me God,' and is obviously elliptical. Reference appears to be had to the ancient custom of slaying some animal in confirmation of a treaty or agreement. The animal thus slain and offered in a burnt offering to God became an image or type, betokening the fate which would attend that one of the two contracting parties who failed in his engagement; and the words just cited were intended to be a voluntary assumption of the liability thus foreshadowed on the side of those who joined in the covenant: subsequently the sacrifice was in ordinary cases omitted, and the form came in itself, to have the force of a solemn asseveration.

(6) Sanctity. An oath, making an appeal to the Divine justice and power, is a recognition of the Divinity of the being to whom the appeal is made. Hence to swear by an idol is to be convicted of idolatry. Such an act is accordingly given in Scripture as a proof of idolatry and a reason for condign punishment. 'How shall I pardon thee for this? Thy children have forsaken me, and sworn by them that are no gods' (Jer. v:7; xii:16; Amos viii:14; Zeph. i:5).

Other beings besides God are sometimes added in the form of an oath: Elijah said to Elisha, 'As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth' (1 Kings ii:2; 1 Sam. xx:3). The party addressed is frequently sworn by, especially if a prince: 'As thy soul liveth, my lord, I am the woman,' etc. (1 Sam. i:26; xvii:55; xxv:26; 2 Sam. xi:11). The Hebrews, as well as the Egyptians, swore also by the head or the life of an absent as well as a present prince: 'By the life of Pharaoh' (Gen. xlii:15). Hanway says that the most sacred oath among the Persians is 'by the King's head.' The oath-taker swore sometimes by his own head (Matt. v:36; see Virg. Æn. ix, 300; Ovid, Trist. iv, 4, 45; Juven. vi, 17); or by some precious part of his body, as the eyes (Ovid, Amor. iii, 3, 13; Tibull. iii, 6, 47); sometimes, but only in the case of the later Jews, by the earth, the heaven, and the sun (Matt. v:34, 35; Eurip. Hippol. 1029; Virg. Æn. xii, 176); as well as by angels (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii, 16, 4); by the temple (Matt. xxiii:16; comp. Lightfoot, p. 280); and even by parts of the temple (Matt. xxiii:16; Wetstein). They also swore by Jerusalem, as the holy city (Matt. v:35; Lightfoot, p. 281). The Rabbinical writers indulge in much prolixity on the subject of oaths, entering into nice distinctions, and showing themselves exquisite casuists.

The levity of the Jewish nation in regard to oaths, though reproved by some of their doctors (Othon. Lex. p. 351; Philo, ii, 194), was notorious; and when we find it entering as an element into popular poetry (Martial, xi, 9), we cannot ascribe the imputation to the known injustice of heathen writers towards the Israelites. This national vice, doubtless, had an influence with the Essenes (see ESSENES), in placing the prohibition of oaths among the rules of their reformatory order. J. R. B.

(7) Attitude. It was usual to put the hand under the thigh (Gen. xxiv:2; xlvii:29). The more usual employment of the hand was to raise it towards heaven; designed, probably, to excite attention, to point out the oath-taker, and to give solemnity to the act (Gen. xiv:22, 23). In the strongly anthropomorphic language of parts of the Scripture, even God is introduced saying, 'I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live for ever' (Deut. xxxii:40). It can only be by the employment of a similar license that the Almighty is represented as in any way coming under the obligation of an oath (Exod. vi:8; Ezek. xx:5). Instead of the head, the phylactery was sometimes touched by the Jews on taking an oath (Maimon. Schebhuth, c. xi).

(8) Christian. Our Lord condemned the use of oaths, even when taken with the best intention, declaring that whatever went beyond "yea, yea, or nay, nay," was of the evil one (Matt. v:33-37). He was delivering the Sermon on the Mount and correcting various perversions of the law which the scribes had introduced; and among other evils, he condemned swearing in ordinary communications between man and man. But the judicial oath is lawful; for it was enjoined by God (Exod. xxii:11), and Christ himself did not hesitate to answer when he was put upon his oath by the high-priest (Matt. xxvi:63). The oath was recognized as lawful by the apostles also, for they called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (2 Cor. xi:31; Gal. i:20). The mischief which may arise from a rash oath was well illustrated in that of Herod the tetrarch, which made him, against his will, the murderer of John the Baptist (Matt. xiv:3-12; comp. James v:12). (Davis, Bib. Dict.; Raymond, Sys. Theol., vol. iii, p. 161-2.)

OBADIAH (ô-ba-dî'ah), (Heb. עֲבַדְיָהוּ, o-bad-yaw, servant of Jehovah), the name of several persons mentioned in the Scripture

1. The governor of king Ahab's household, and high in the confidence of his master, notwithstanding his aversion to the idolatries which the court patronized. In the persecution raised by Jezebel, Obadiah hid one hundred of the Lord's prophets in caves, and supplied them secretly with nourishment during the famine. It was this person, when sent out to explore the country in the vain search of pasture unconsumed by the drought, whom Elijah encountered when about to show himself to Ahab, and who was reluctantly prevailed upon to conduct the prophet to his master (1 Kings xviii:4-16). (B. C. 906.)

2. One of the heroes of the tribe of Gad, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:9). (B. C. 1014.)

3. One of the nobles whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii:7). (B. C. 909.)

4. One of the Levites who presided over the restoration of the temple under Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv:12). (B. C. 623.)

5. The head of a party, consisting of 218 males, with females and children in proportion, who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii:9).

6. One of the priests, who sealed the written covenant which Nehemiah caused the people to enter into (Neh. x:5).

7. A man of Issachar of the house of Uzzi (1 Chron. vii:3). (B. C. 1014.)

8. The father of Ishmaiah, which latter was chief of the Zebulunites in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii:19). (B. C. 1014.)

9. Son of Azel and a descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii:38; ix:44). (B. C. about 720.)

10. A descendant of David and founder of a family (1 Chron. iii:21). (B. C. about 870.) Probably he is the same as JUDA (Luke iii:26) and AVIHUD (Matt. i:13).

11. A Levite, descendant of Jeduthun, and apparently the founder of a family of porters (1 Chron. ix:16). (B. C. about 446.)

12. The Prophet Obadiah. He was the fourth of the minor prophets according to the Hebrew, the fifth according to the Greek, and the eighth according to chronological arrangement, is supposed to have prophesied B. C. about 599. (Jahn's Introd.) We have, however, but a small fragment of his prophecies, and it is impossible to determine anything with certainty respecting himself or his history. Several persons of this name occur about the same period, one of whom presided at the restoration of the temple in the reign of Josiah (B. C. 624), and is considered by many to have been the author of the prophecy. Another, who was governor of the house of Ahab, was regarded by the ancient Jews as the author of the book: which opinion is followed by Jerome (Hieron. Comm. in Abdiam; Sixtus Senens, Bib. Sanct.). Others place the author in the reign of Ahaz (B. C. 728-699); while some think him to have been a contemporary of Hosea, who prophesied B. C. 722.

13. Obadiah, Prophecy of.

(1) Time of Prophecy. It is observed by Jahn, Newcome, and others, that it is evident from verse 20 that Obadiah prophesied while Jerusalem was subjected to the yoke of the Chaldeans, and after the expatriation of several of the citizens—which refers him to the period after the seventh year of the Captivity, B. C. 599. Jahn maintains, from the warnings to the Edomites, verses 12-14, that Obadiah prophesied before the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, while De Wette infers from the mention of the 'captivity of the children of Israel,' and the 'captivity of Jerusalem' in verse 20, that the composition of the book must be placed after the destruction of that city. From a comparison of Obad. verses 1-4, with Jer. xlix:14-16; Obad. verse 6, with Jer. xlix:9, 10; and Obad. verse 8, with Jer. xlix:7, it is evident that one of these prophets had read the other's work.

(2) Against Whom Directed. His prophecies are directed against the Edomites, and in this respect correspond with Amos i:11; Jer. xlix:22; Ezek. xxv:12-14, and Ps. cxxxvii:7 (Jahn's Introd.). He menaces Edom with destruction for their hostile feeling towards Judah, and their insulting conduct towards the Hebrews when Jerusalem was taken (verses 11, 12); but consoles the Jews with a promise of restoration from their captivity, when the Hebrews and the Ten Tribes (Jahn's Introd.) shall repossess both their land and that of Edom and Philistia—a prophecy which was fulfilled in the time of the Maccabees, under John Hyrcanus. (B. C. 125.) (Jahn, l. c.)

(3) Style, Etc. The language of Obadiah is pure; but Jahn and others have observed that he is inferior to the more ancient prophets in his too great addiction to the interrogatory form of expression (see verse 8). His sentiments are noble, and his figures bold and striking (De Wette's Introd., Eng. transl.). De Wette's translator observes that his hatred towards other nations is not so deep and deadly as that of some of his younger contemporaries. W. W.

Cornill considers that the late prophecies (Is. xxxiv:35), in which, as in Obadiah, eschatological hopes are connected with the downfall of Edom, were certainly known to the author of Obadiah. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

OBAL (ō'bal), (Heb. ^{בַּל}וּבַל, o-bawl', bare), a son of Joktan, and founder of an Arabian tribe (Gen. x:28). (B. C. before 2060.)

Bochart, who refers to the fact that Pliny mentions the Avalitæ of the African coast, identifies them with the descendants of Obal.

OBED (ō'bed), (Heb. ^{בַּד}וּבַד, o-bad', serving; Sept. ^{בַּד}וּבַד, oh-bade').

1. The son of Boaz and Ruth, and father of Jesse the father of David, according to the apparently incomplete genealogical list (Ruth iv:17; 1 Chron. ii:12). The name occurs in the genealogies of Matthew (i:5) and Luke (iii:32).

2. One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi:47). (B. C. about 1046.)

3. Son of Ephlal and father of Jehu; a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii:37). (B. C. after 1014.)

4. A son of Shemaiah and gate-keeper of the temple (1 Chron. xxvi:7). (B. C. 1017.)

5. Father of Azariah, who lived in the time of Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii:1). (B. C. before 876.)

OBED-EDOM (ō'bed-ēd'om), (Heb. ^{בַּד}וּבַד עֲדוֹם, o-bade' ed-ome', serving Edom).

1. A Levite in whose premises, and under whose care, the ark was deposited, when the death of Uzzah caused David to apprehend danger in taking it farther. It remained here three months, during which the family of Obed-edom so signally prospered, that the king was encouraged to resume his first intention, which he then happily carried into effect (2 Sam. vi:10-12). We learn from 1 Chron. xvi:38, that Obed-edom's connection with the ark did not then terminate, he and his brethren having charge of the doors of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xv:18, 24).

2. Son of Jeduthun, and warden of the temple (1 Chron. xvi:38). (B. C. 1043.)

3. One of those who had charge of the sacred vessels in the time of Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv:24). (B. C. 835.)

OBEDIENCE (ō-be'di-ens), (Heb. ^{שָׁמַע}וּבַד, shawmah', to hear intelligently), the fulfillment of a superior's command from regard to his authority.

(1) Characteristics, Etc. (1) Believers' "obedience" lies in believing the truths of the gospel, and therein receiving Jesus and his fullness, as the free gift of God; and, in consequence thereof, sincerely studying conformity to his image, and cheerful fulfillment of his whole law (Rom. vi:16). This is called "obedience to the faith," because it begins in embracing the truths of the gospel, and is a fulfillment of the Divine law as revealed in the Scripture (Acts vi:7; Rom. i:5). It is an "obedience of faith;" it corresponds with the principles received by faith in the Scripture (Rom. xvi:26). (2) It is an "obedience of Christ;" it flows from his dwelling in, and actuating our heart (2 Cor. x:5). (3) It is an "obedience unto righteousness" (Rom. vi:16). (4) It must spring from a heart renewed, and actuated by his indwelling Spirit (Ezek. xxxvi:26, 27; Matt. vii:18; Gal. i:16; 1 Tim. i:5; Heb. ix:14). (5) It must be sincere (Ps. li:6; 1 Tim. i:5). (6) Affectionate, springing from love, and not from terror (1 John iv:19; 1 John ii:5; 2 Cor. v:14). (7) Diligent, not slothful (Heb. vi:12; Ps. xviii:44; Rom. xii:11). (8) Conspicuous and open (Phil. ii:15; Matt. v:16). (9) Universal: not one duty, but all must be performed (2 Pet. i:5, 10). (10) Perpetual, at all times, places, and occasions (Rom. ii:7; Gal. vi:9).

(2) Advantages. (1) It adorns the gospel (Tit. ii:10). (2) It is evidential of grace (2 Cor. v:17). (3) It rejoices the hearts of the ministers and people of God (3 John 2, 3; 1 Thess. ii:19, 20). (4) It silences gainsayers (Titus, i:9). (5) Encourages believers, while it reproves the lukewarm (Matt. v:16). (6) Affords peace to the subject of it (Ps. xxv:12, 13; Acts xxiv:16). (7) It strongly recommends religion, as that which is both delightful and practicable (Col. i:10). (8) It is the forerunner and evidence of eternal glory (Rom. vi:22; Rev. xxii:14.) (Buck, Bib. Dict.; Brown, Bib. Dict.)

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what he did; his passive what he suffered. Some divines distinguish these. They refer our pardon to his passive, and our title to glory to his active obedience; though, Dr. Owen observes, that it cannot be clearly evinced that there is any such thing in propriety of speech as passive obedience; obeying is doing, to which passion or suffering does not belong. Of the active obedience of Christ the Scriptures assure us that he took upon him the form of a servant, and really became one (Is. xlix:3; Phil. ii:7; Heb. viii). He was subject to the law of God. "He was made under the law;" the judicial or civil law of the Jews: the ceremonial law, and the moral law (Matt. xvii:24, 27; Luke ii:22; Ps. xl:7, 8). He was obedient to the law of nature; he was in a state of subjection to his parents; and he fulfilled the commands of his heavenly Father as it respected the first and second table. His obedience (1) was voluntary (Ps. xl:6); (2) complete (1 Pet. ii:22); (3) wrought out in the room and stead of his people (Rom. x:4; Rom. v:19); (4) well pleasing and acceptable in the sight of God. (Buck, Bib. Dict.) (See Martensen, Christ. Eth. vol. i, p. 260, sq.; Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

OBELISK (öb-ë-lisk), (Hos. iii:4. R. V.) See PILLAR.

OBETH (ö'bëth). (1 Esdras viii:32. Same as EBED, Ezra viii:6).

OBIL (ö'bil), (Heb. בִּילִי, o-beel', chief of the camels), Sept. Ἀβίας, a-bee'as, an Ishmaelite, or Arab, doubtless of the nomad tribes, who had charge of the royal camels in the time of David—an exceedingly fit employment for an Arab (1 Chron. xxvii:30).

As Obil means in Arabic 'a keeper of camels' Hieron. (ii, 2), reasonably infers that the person had his name from his office, which has always been a very common circumstance in the East.

OBJECT (öb-jëkt), (Gr. κατηγορώ, kat-ay-gor-eh'-o; to be a plaintiff, to charge with some offense).

This word is rendered accuse (Acts xxiv:19); a public accusation (Mark xiv:60).

OBLATION (öb-lä'shün), (Heb. מִנְחָה, min-khaw', a donation). See OFFERING and SACRIFICE.

OBOth (ö'both), (Heb. מִשְׁנֵה, o-both'), a station of the Israelites near Moab (Num. xxi:10, 11; xxxiii:43, 44). (See WANDERING, THE.)

OBSCURE (ob-skür'), (Heb. עֵשֶׁן, ee-shone', the little man of the eye, i. e., the pupil or ball); what is dark, little known; and so "obscure darkness," may denote a lone condition of sorrow and misery (Prov. xx:20).

Figurative. (1) Obscurity is much the same as darkness, and denotes what is opposite to the light of knowledge or prosperity, namely, ignorance and misery, calamities (Is. lix:9). (2) The blind "see out of obscurity, and out of darkness," when their natural sight is miraculously given them, or rather when their ignorant minds are enlightened by the spiritual knowledge of Christ, and his truth (Is. xxix:18). (3) Light rises in "obscurity and darkness, and is made as the noon-day," when great ignorance and distress are put away, and knowledge, prosperity, and joy, come in their room; or when believers, amidst their outward distress, have fellowship with, and joy in their God; and the church grows greatly amidst distress and persecution (Is. lviii:10).

OBSERVATION (öb-zër-vä'shun), (Gr. παρατήρησις, par-at-ay'ray-sis, that which may be seen) with outward show.

"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation" (Luke xvii:20), i. e. it must be viewed as a spiritual development and not as a visible unfolding as in the case of the kingdoms of men. It must come by waiting and watching.

OBSERVER OF TIMES (öb-zër-v'ër öv tims). See MAGIC.

OBSTINACY (öb'st'ä-nä-cy). See HARD, Figurative.

OCCUPY (ök'kü-pi), (Heb. אָוֹרָה, aw-saw', Judg. xvi:11), to make use of, to employ.

"If they bind me fast with new ropes that never were occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man" (Judg. xvi:11).

Occupy now means to be in present possession, to hold,—thus one occupies a house, a station, etc. But formerly it had a wider sense, and meant not only to have the use of, but to use in general. "Ropes that never were occupied," means ropes that never were used. (See also Exod. xxxviii:24).

Its more frequent meaning in our version of the Bible is, to use in trade, as money, or to deal in, as merchandise (Ezek. xxvii:9); hence, intransitively, to trade or traffic (Ezek. xxvii:16, 19, 21, 22). In this sense it occurs in Luke xix:13, "occupy till I come." Compare occupier.

Eumenes made as though he had occasion to occupy money (that is, to make use of money), and so borrowed a great sum.

—North's Plutarch.

But now must men occupy their goods otherwise.

—Latimer's Sermons.

(Swinton, Bib. Word Book.)

OCCURRENT (ök kü'r'ent), (Heb. פְּהִיגָה, peh'-gah), an occurrence.

"But now the Lord my God hath given me rest on every side, so that there is neither adversary nor evil occurent" (1 Kings v:4). Occurent was the earlier form of the word now written occurrence.

OCHIM (ō'kīm), a species of animal (Is. xiii:21, R. V. "doleful creatures").

OCRAN (ōk'ran), (Heb. אֲרָנָא, ok-ravn', muddler), father of the Pagiel who was chief of Asher about the time of the Exodus (Num. i:13; ii:27; vii:72; x:26), B. C. before 658.

ODED (ō'ded), (Heb. אֲדָדָא, o-dade', erecting).

1. The prophet who remonstrated against the detention as captives of the persons whom the army of King Pekah had brought prisoners from Judah, and at whose suggestion they were handsomely treated, and conducted back with all tenderness and care to their own country (2 Chron. xxviii:9). (B. C. 739.)

2. Father of Azariah the prophet, who was commissioned to meet and encourage Asa on his return from defeating the Ethiopians (2 Chron. xv:7-8). It curiously happens that the address which, at the commencement, is ascribed to Azariah, the son of Oded, is at the end ascribed to Oded himself (xv:8). But this is supposed to have been a slip of copyists, and the Alex. MS., the Vulgate and the Peshito-Syriac versions read the latter verse like the former. (B. C. before 953.)

ODEM (ō'dēm), (Heb. אֲדָמָא, o'dem; Sept. σάρδιον, sar'dee-on), sardius, one of the precious stones in the breastplate of the high-priest (Exod. xxviii:17; xxxix:10, and also mentioned in Ezek. xxviii:13).

In all these places it is rendered 'sardius' in the Authorized Version, following the Septuagint and Josephus (De Bell. Jud., v, 5, 7), who, however, in Antiq. iii, 7, 6, makes it the sardonix (σαρδόνιξ). The sardius is the stone now called the carnelian, from its color (a carne), which resembles that of raw flesh. The Hebrew name is derived from a root which signifies being red. The sardius or carnelian is of the flint family, and is a kind of chalcedony. The more vivid the red in this stone, the higher is the estimation in which it is held. It was anciently, as now, more frequently engraved on than any other stone. The ancients called it sardius, because Sardis in Lydia was the place where they first became acquainted with it; but the sardius of Babylon was considered of greater value (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvii:7). The Hebrews probably obtained the carnelian from Arabia.

ODOR (ō'dēr), (Heb. רֵיחַ, ree-kho'akh, restful, Lev. xxvi:31; Dan. ii:46), relating to INCENSE (which see).

It denotes fragrance, a sweet smelling odor and the like (2 Chron. xvi:14; Esth. ii:12; Jer. xxxiv:5; John xii:3; Phil. iv:18).

"The odors of the groves of Lebanon were anciently very famous (Hos. xiv:7; Cant. iv:11); flowers, even exotics, were cultivated in pleasure gardens for this purpose (Cant. i:12; iv:6, 14). Odorous extracts were used sometimes in the form of incense, sometimes as ointments (i:3; iv:10); sometimes in water, with which clothing, bed furniture, etc., was sprinkled (Prov. vii:17)" (McC. & S., Cyc.)

Figurative. The prayers and praises of the saints, and their cheerful contributions to fellow-Christians, when in need, are likened to odors, to represent how delightful and acceptable they are to God (Rev. v:8; Phil. iv:18).

OF (ōv), the most frequent preposition in the English language. "And should have been killed of them" (Acts xxiii:27), where we should now use by, as in Luke xiv:8; 1 Cor. xi:32, and numerous other passages.

Other peculiar uses are, "of purpose" (Ruth ii:16), where we should say, on purpose; "zeal of thine house" (Ps. lxxix:9; John ii:17), for zeal for thine house; "zeal of God" (Rom. x:2), for zeal for God.

OFFENSE (ōf-fens'), three Hebrew words are translated in the A. V. "offenses:"

1. Mik-shole' (Heb. מִכְשָׁלָא, an obstacle, or enticement (1 Sam. xxv:31; Is. viii:14).

2. Khale (Heb. חָלָא, crime, or its penalty (Eccles. x:4).

3. Aw-sham' (Heb. אָשָׁם, to acknowledge guilt (Hos. v:15).

The Greek words rendered "offense" are: παράπτωμα, par-ap'to-mah, to fall beside or near, a lapse, or deviation from the truth; a sin, or misdeed (Rom. v:15-20; iv:25, xvi:17; σκάνδαλον, skan-dal-on, the movable stick of a trap, any impediment (Matt. xviii:7; Rom. ix:33; Luke xvii:1).

Figurative. In the figurative and moral sense, as an occasion of falling into sin, it means to cause to offend, as the Greek word is correctly translated (1 Cor. viii:13), "if meat make my brother to offend." So in Matt. v:29, 30, "if thy right eye offend thee," stumble thee, cause thee to offend, as correctly rendered in the Geneva version, 1560. Luke xvii:2 (Matt. xviii:6; Mark ix:42), "should offend one of these little ones," should cause one of them to offend, to fall into unbelief; and in the passive, be made to offend or stumble at unlooked-for difficulties and dangers, and fall away from the truth or from duty, as in Matt. xiii:21; xxiv:10; xxvi:31, 33; Mark iv:17; xiv:27, 29; John xvi:1. Rom. xiv:21, "stumbles or is offended," is made to offend, led into sin. Thirdly, in the sense of a ground or object of offense, of dissatisfaction and aversion, it means to displease, to give offense; as in Matt. xv:12, "the Pharisees were offended after they heard this saying;" xvii:27, "lest we should offend them." So in Matt. xiii:57, "were offended in him," found in him (in his humble birth and connections) ground of disapproval and rejection (John vi:61; 2 Cor. xi:29). (Swinton, Bib. Word Book.)

OFFERING (ōf'fēr-īng), (the general name for which in Hebrew is קָרְבָּן, kor-bavn') is anything offered to God as a means of conciliating his favor; which being in the Jewish, as well as in all other religions, considered as the one thing needful, offerings accordingly have always constituted an essential part of public worship and private piety.

Offerings have been divided into three kinds; those which are designed to procure some favor or benefit; the second, those which are expressive of gratitude for bounties or mercies received; the third, those which are meant to atone for sins and propitiate the Deity. Among the Hebrews we find a complex and multiform system of offerings extending through the entire circle of Divine worship, and prescribing the minutest details. A leading distinction separates their offerings into unbloody and bloody.

(1) Meaning and Objects Used. Used in its widest sense the term offering, or oblation, indicates in the Hebrew ritual a very great number of things—as the firstlings of the flock, first fruits, tithes, incense, the shew-bread, the wood for burning in the Temple (Neh. x:34). The objects offered were salt, meal, baked and roasted grain, olive-oil, clean animals, such as oxen, goats, doves, but not fish. The animals were required to be spotless (Lev. xxii:20; Mal. i:8), and, with the exception of the doves, not under eight days old (Lev. xxii:27), younger animals being tasteless and ininnutious. The smaller beasts, such as sheep, goats, and calves, were commonly one year old (Exod. xxix:38; Lev. ix:3; xii:6; xiv:10; Num. xv:27; xxviii:9, sq.). Oxen were offered at three years of age; in Judges (vi:25) one is offered which is seven years old. As to sex, an option was sometimes left to the offerer, as in peace and sin-offerings (Lev. iii:1, 6; xii:5, 6); at other times males were required, as in burnt sacrifices, for, contrary to classical usage, the male was considered the more perfect. In burnt-offerings and in thank-offerings the kind of animal was left to the choice of the worshiper (Lev. i:3), but in trespass and sin-offerings it was regulated by law (Lev. iv:5). If the desire of the worshiper was to express his gratitude, he offered a peace or thank-offering; if to obtain forgiveness, he offered a trespass or sin-offering.

(2) Burnt-Offerings. Burnt-offerings were of a general kind (Num. xv:3; Deut. xii:6; Jer. xvii:26). Hecatombs or large numbers of cattle were sacrificed on special occasions. In 1 Kings viii:5, 63, Solomon is said to have 'sacrificed sheep and oxen that could not be told or numbered for multitude,' 'two and twenty thousand oxen and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep' (see also 2 Chron. xxix:32, sq.; xxx:24; xxxv:7, sq.; comp. Herod. vii:43; Xenoph. Hellen., vi:4; Sueton. Calig. 14). Offerings were also either public or private, prescribed or free-will. Sometimes they were presented by an individual, sometimes by a family; once, or at regular and periodic intervals (1 Sam. i:24; Job i:5; 2 Macc. iii:32).

Foreigners were permitted to make offerings on the national altar (Num. xv:14; 2 Macc. iii:35; xiii:23; Philo. Legat. p. 1014; Joseph. c. Apion. ii, 5). Offerings were made by Jews for heathen princes (1 Macc. vii:33; Joseph. Antiq. xii, 2, 5).

In the case of bloody offerings the possessor, after he had sanctified himself (1 Sam. xvi:5), brought the victim, in case of thank-offerings, with his horns gilded and with garlands, etc., (Joseph. Antiq. xiii:8, 2; Winer, Real-wörterb. ii, 212, note 5) to the altar (Lev. iii:1; xii:4; xiv:17), where laying his hand on the head of the animal (Lev. i:4; iii:2; iv:4), he thus, in a clear and pointed way, devoted it to God. Having so done he proceeded to slay the victim himself (Lev. iii:2; iv:4); which act might be, and in later times was, done by the priests (2 Chron. xxix:24), and probably by the Levites.

The blood was taken, and, according to the kind of offering, sprinkled upon the altar, or brought into the temple and there shed upon the ark of the covenant and smeared upon the horns of the altar of incense, and then the remainder poured forth at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings. Having slain the animal, the offerer struck off its head (Lev. i:6), which when not burnt (Lev. iv:11) belonged either to the priest (Lev. vii:8), or to the offerer (comp. Mishna, Lebach. xii:2). The victim was then cut into pieces (Lev. i:6; viii:20), which were either all, or only the best and most tasty, set on fire on the altar by the priests or the offerer, or must be burnt outside the precincts of the holy city. The treatment of doves may be seen in Lev. i:14, sq.; v:8. In some sacrifices heaving and waving were usual either before or after the slayings.

(3) Place of Offerings. The place where offerings were exclusively to be presented was the outer court of the national sanctuary, at first the Tabernacle, afterwards the Temple. Every offering made elsewhere was forbidden under penalty of death (Lev. xvii:4, sq.; Deut. xii:5, sq.; comp. 1 Kings xii:27). The precise spot is laid down in Lev. i:3; iii:2, 'at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord.' The object of these regulations was to prevent any secret idolatrous rites from taking place under the cloak of the national ritual; and a common place of worship must have tended considerably to preserve the unity of the people, whose constant disagreements required precautions of a special kind (1 Kings xii:27). The oneness, however, of the place of sacrifice was not strictly preserved in the troubled period of the Judges, nor indeed till the time of David (1 Kings iii:2, 3). Offerings were made in other places besides the door of the Tabernacle (1 Sam. vii:17; Judg. ii:5). High places, which had long been used by the Canaanites, retained a certain sanctity, and were honored with offerings (Judg. vi:26; xiii:19). Even the loyal Samuel followed this practice (1 Sam.), and David endured it (1 Kings iii:2). After Solomon these offerings on high places still continued. In the kingdom of Israel, cut off as its subjects were from the holy city, the national temple was neglected.

(4) Formalism. Under the load and the multiplicity of these outward oblations, however, the Hebrews forgot the substance, lost the thought in the symbol, the thing signified in the sign; and, failing in those devotional sentiments and that practical obedience which offerings were intended to prefigure and cultivate, sank into the practice of mere dead works. Hereupon began the prophets to utter their admonitory lessons, to which the world is indebted for so many graphic descriptions of the real nature of religion and the only true worship of Almighty God (Is. i:11; Jer. vi:20; vii:21, sq.; Hos. vi:6; Amos v:22; Micah vi:6, sq.; comp. Ps. xl:6; li:17, sq.; Prov. xxi:3). All these offerings were typical in various forms of the "full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world."

The Jewish doctrines on offerings may be found in the treatises Sebachim, Menachoth, and Temura; a selection from which, as well as from the Rabbins, is given in that useful little work, Othon. Lex. Talmud. p. 621, sq. J. R. B.

OFFICER (öf'fī-sēr).

The Hebrew and Greek words translated officer are very numerous and indefinite. They are synonymous terms for functionaries known under other and more specific terms, as "eunuch," "scribes," etc.

1. Saw-reece' (Heb. שָׂרֵף, to castrate, Gen. xxxvii:36; xxxix:1; xl:2), usually rendered EUNUCH (which see).

2. Sh'taru (Heb. שֹׁטְרֵי, properly a writer), from the use of writing in judicial administration, a magistrate or prefect; the officers set over the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. v:6-19), those appointed with the elders to administer public affairs among the Israelites (Num. xi:16; Deut. xx:5, 8, 9; xxix:10; Josh. i:10, etc.), magistrates in the cities and towns of Palestine (Deut. xvi:18; 1 Chron. xxiii:4; xxvi:29, etc.), and apparently a military chief (2 Chron. xxvi:11, A. V. "ruler," R. V. "officer").

3. Nits-tsaub (Heb. נִיטְסָאֹב, fixed, 1 Kings iv:5, 7; v:16; ix:23, etc.). genera' receivers of taxes, or chief tax collectors

4. Paw-keed' (Heb. פָּקִיד, Gen. xli:34; Judg. x:28; Esth. ii:3, etc.), a superintendent, either civil, military, or ecclesiastical. (McC. & Str. Bib. Cyc.)

5. In the New Testament in the case of ὑπηρέτης (hoop-ay-rel'ace), the word means bailiffs (Matt. v:25; John vii:32, 45; Acts v:22).

In the case of ἱπράκτορες (prak'tor-es) it denotes those who register and collect the fines imposed by courts of justice (Luke xii:58).

OFFICER THAT STRUCK JESUS. This man struck Jesus on the cheek with his hand or rod, perchance with both. It was the first overt act of personal violence (Luke xxii:63, 64). He was doubtless informed of a Jewish law found in Exodus xxii:28, "Thou shalt not revile God, nor curse a ruler of thy people." But this fellow had a bigoted veneration for the high-priest, and applied this punishment with indiscretion and severe brutality. The blows must have been severe. Jesus had done nothing that merited such a painful insult.

OFFICES OF CHRIST (ōf'fīsēs ōv krīst), are generally considered as threefold.

(1) A prophet to enlighten and instruct (John vi:14; John iii:2). (2) A priest to make atonement for his people (Is. liii; Heb. vii). (3) A king to reign in, and rule over them (Zech. ix:9; Ps. ii:6).

(1) Prophet. Christ is Prophet because more than all others he has declared to men the truth and will of God. He is himself the revelation of God (see John xiv:9; xvii:25, 26; Heb. i:1, 2, et al.).

(2) High Priest. Christ is the great High Priest. He is the first begotten, an elder brother of God's spiritual family of chosen priests. He directs his people, offers sacrifice for them, and by his blood and Spirit consecrates them to God. How transcendent his unction to, and preparation for his work! He wears his manhood, and executes his office, in the double estate of debasement and glory. How shining his robes of righteousness and garments of salvation! and how fixed forever, as on his shoulder and heart, are all the Israelites indeed! As he espoused a pure and virgin nature into personal union with himself none but virgin saints and churches are really his people. On his head are many crowns; and by him, as our righteousness and sanctification, are we sanctified, and made holiness to the Lord. He is the great High Priest of our profession, and of good things to come. His person, as God-man, is infinitely dignified in his sacrificial and intercessory work: his priesthood is the great foundation and object of our gospel-profession, and the cause of all the precious blessings that come upon us in time and eternity (Heb. iii:1, and viii:1). If Christ had remained on earth, he could not have been a priest: being descended of the tribe of Judah, he had no right to officiate in the sacerdotal work of the earthly tabernacle or temple; and if he had remained on earth after his oblation of himself, he could not have shewed himself the true Messiah, nor by his intercession finished his work, and rendered the shedding of his blood effectual (Heb. viii:4). (See ATONEMENT.)

(3) King. Christ is king; King of kings; Lord of lords; and King of saints. By his Father's appointment, he subdues, governs, and defends his church; and has all power in heaven and earth given him for the promoting of her welfare: he restrains and conquers her enemies; and at the last day, he will pass an irreversible sentence of judgment on the whole world (Ps. ii:6, and xlv:1; Matt. xxv:34; Rev. xvii:14, and xix:16). (See JESUS CHRIST; KING; MESSIAH; MEDIATOR.)

OFFSCOURING (ōf'skour'ing), (Heb. יָרַף, shekhee', refuse, as swept off, Lam. iii:45; Gr. περιψύμα per-ip'say-mah, 1 Cor. iv:13, brushed off), used figuratively to express something vile, worthless, as the apostles were looked upon by very many in their day.

OFTEN (ōf'n), (Gr. πικνός, pick-nos', 1 Tim. v:23), an old English term for frequent. "Often messengers."—Shakespeare.

OG (ōg), (Heb. אֹג, ogue, giant or long-necked), an Amoritish king of Bashan (Num. xxi:33; xxxii:33; Deut. iv:47; xxxi:4).

In form he was a giant, so that his bedstead was preserved as a memorial of his huge stature (Deut. iii:11; Josh. xii:12). (See BED.) He was defeated by the Israelites under Moses (Num. xxi:33; Deut. i:4; iii:3); and his country, which contained many walled cities (Deut. iii:4-10), was assigned to the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii:13; Josh. xiii:30). (See AMORITES; BASHAN; GIANTS.)

OHAD (ō'hād), (Heb. אֹהַד, o'had, unity), third son of Simeon and head of a family (Gen. xli:10; Ex. vi:15), B. C. 1870.

OHEL (ō'hel), (Heb. אֹהֶל, o'hel, tent), the fifth child of Zerubbabel, of the house of David (2 Chron. iii:20), B. C. after 600.

OIL (oil). The Hebrew and Greek words translated oil in the A. V. are as follows: (1) Heb. שֶׁה'מֵן, sheh'men, grease, sometimes in A. V. "ointment." (2) Heb. יַיִטְהָר, yits-hawr', shining, clear olive oil (Num. xviii:12; Deut. vii:13; xi:14; xii:17; 2 Kings xviii:32, etc.). (3) Chald. מֶשְׁחָא, mesh-akh' an unguent (only in Ezra vi:9; vii:22). (4) Gr. ἔλαιον, el'ah-yon, neuter of word meaning "olive."

Oil amongst the Hebrews, was made from olive berries and from spices (Exod. xxv:6). It was used: (1) in the preparation of food, much as butter and lard are used to-day (1 Kings xvii:12-15; Exod. xxix:2; Lev. ii:4, etc.); (2) as a cosmetic for anointing the body, the beard, and the head (2 Sam. xiv:2; Ps. xxiii:5; Luke vii:46, etc.) (see PERFUME); (3) for illuminating purposes in lamps (Exod. xxv:6; xxvii:20; Matt. xxv:3, etc.) (see LAMP); (4) in worship. The first-fruits (Num. xviii:12), and the tithes were dedicated to the Lord (Neh. xiii:5). The meat-offerings were also dipped in oil (Lev. ii:7; vii:10, etc.) (see OFFERING); (5) in the ritual of consecration of kings and high-priests (1 Sam. x:1; Lev. viii:12, etc.); (6) for medicinal purposes (Mark vi:13; Luke x:34; Is. i:6; James v:14); (7) for anointing the dead (Matt. xxvi:12; Luke xxiii:56) (see ANOINTING).

The practice in the early Church of anointing the bodies of persons whose lives were despaired of was derived from Jas. v:14. The Roman Catholic Church has placed the practice among the sacraments, denominating it "extreme unction."

Figurative. (1) As an ordinary cosmetic, the use of oil is significant of joy and gladness (Ps. xcii:10), and the omission of it betokens sorrow (2 Sam. xiv:2; Matt. vi:17). (2) Oil represents the Holy Ghost's precious and diversified operations and graces, whereby Jesus and his people, and none other, are anointed to the service of God (Exod. xxx:23-33; Cant. i:3; iv:10). (3) Persons "receive the oil of joy for mourning," when, by the comforting gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost, their hearts are healed, purified, invigorated, and honored (Is. lxi:3); but Jesus is "anointed with the oil of gladness" above them, having an unmeasurable fullness of the graces and comforts of the Holy Ghost (Ps. xlv:7). And his name, character, office, and works, are like ointment poured forth, most healing, refreshing, invigorating, and adorning to our soul (Cant. i:3). (4) The "golden oil emptied" out of the two olive trees which stand before the Lord, is not the comfort arising to the Hebrews, from the management of Zerubbabel and Joshua, or of Ezra and Nehemiah; but the gracious endowments of the saints, proceeding from Jesus' two natures, or execution of his prophetic and kingly office on and in them (Zech. iv:12); this poured into their wounds, heals them (Luke x:34). (5) The "oil" which true saints have in their lamps, is real grace which abides in them, and makes them shine as lights in the world (Matt. xxv:4). (6) Prosperity, spiritual or temporal, is likened to "oil;" it comforts, invigorates, and renders men noted and useful (Ps. xxiii:5). Christian reproof is like "oil;" it tends to heal spiritual diseases, restore the character, and render men who regard it honored and agreeable (Ps. cxli:5). (7) Unity among brethren, is like "ointment;" it procures delight, honor, cheerfulness, and activity to all concerned (Ps. cxxxiii:2). (8) God made the river of Egypt run "like oil," that is, very slowly, as in mourning; and when it was so dried up, that it did not make the country fruitful (Ezek. xxxii:14).

OIL, HOLY ANOINTING (oil, hō'ly ā-noint'-ing). The mode of preparing this oil is prescribed (Exod. xxx:22-25). (See ANOINTING).

OIL-PRESS (oil-prēs).

"The oil of Palestine is expressed in a rude way. The olive is subjected to pressure in a mill consisting of a great millstone with a hole in its center; this stone is laid on one of its flat surfaces, and a beam of wood fastened upright in the axis. The upper surface of the stone is slightly depressed, except at its margin and around the central hole. Another millstone is set up on its edge in the depression of the upper surface of the lower stone. Through the axis of this stone passes a long beam, which is fastened at one end by a pin to the axis of the horizontal stone, and at the other to a whiffletree, to which a horse or ox is geared when the mill is in operation. The upright stone is moved around the axis of the lower, and crushes the olives by its great weight. The oil which is expressed by this crushing mill is incorporated with the crushed mass, which is then transferred to baskets of flexible structure, eighteen inches wide and six inches deep. A pile of these baskets, eight feet or more in height, is raised within a hollow erect cylinder of stone, which is open in front by a slit, four inches in width, from top to bottom of the cylinder. Into the top of this cylinder passes a piston, which is connected with a lever, to which are attached heavy stones, and by means of the piston the baskets of olives are subjected to as much pressure as is necessary to extract the oil. The quality of oil thus made is quite inferior to that imported from Italy and France. It is largely used in making soap, and was formerly much more used for burning than now." (Dr. Post, of Beirut, in Schaff's Bib. Dict.) (See OLIVE.)

OIL TREE (oil tre), (Heb. שֵׁן שֵׁן, ates sheh'men), possibly tree of oil (Is. xli:19).

In 1 Kings vi:23, 31, 32, 33 these words are rendered "olive tree," and represent the material of the cherubim, doors, and posts of Solomon's temple. They are translated "pine" in Neh. viii:15. But the olive tree is also unmistakably mentioned in this verse. If the oil tree was not the olive tree, what was it? Tristram and others believe it to be the oleaster (Eleagnus angustifolius). This shrub has no affinity to the olive, though resembling it in leaf and general appearance and yielding from its berries an inferior oil. It is found plentifully on the highlands of Palestine and about Jerusalem, thus meeting the direction of Neh. viii:15, as the Balanites Aegyptiaca, a shrub of the Jordan valley, does not. Dr. Tristram therefore suggests in one place (under "Oil Tree") that its "fine hard wood" was the wood of the cherubim, but in another place (under "Olive") states that material to have been olive wood (as the A. V. reads). The latter opinion has a strong probability in its favor, and it does not appear that the oleaster is more than a large shrub, though the author cited calls it, as compared with the olive, "a smaller tree." For the passage in Nehemiah there would then be no present explanation unless we believe, as is very possible, that the term "oil tree," in later times at least, was extended or restricted to the oleaster.

G. E. Post, Hastings' Bib. Dict., says: "The only trees which fulfill all the necessary conditions are the fatwood trees. The genus Pinus furnishes three species, Pinus Pinca, L., the stone or maritime pine, Pinus Halepensis, Mill., the Aleppo pine, and Pinus Bruttia, Ten., which is perhaps only a variety of the last. Any of these would furnish foliage suitable for booths, and all are constantly used for this purpose in the East. Their massive trunks could easily furnish the log required for the carved image, and the doors and doorposts. They are constantly used in house carpentry. Their heartwood is fat enough to entitle them to be called 'trees of fatness.' They are spontaneous, growing in the wilderness (i. e. uncultivated places, and so fit to be associated with the other trees mentioned with them. Is. xli:19). We are inclined with Celsius (Hierob. i, 309) to translate 'ez-shemen, 'fatwood trees,' and to suppose that the reference is to the pines."

OINTMENT (oint'ment).

(1) Name. Ointment is the rendering of the following words in the original: (1) Heb. שֵׁן שֵׁן, sheh'men (2 Kings xx:13; Ps. cxxxiii:2; Prov. xxvii:16; Eccles. vii:1; ix:8; x:1; Is. i:6, etc.), probably oil (and so elsewhere rendered, except "olive" in 1 Kings vi:23, sq.; "pine," in Neh. viii:15; "fatness," in Ps. cix:24; "fat things," in Is. xxv:6; "fruitful," in Is. v:1). (2) Hebrew form רֹקַח, ro'kakh, an aromatic (Exod. xxx:25), an odorous compound ("confection," Exod. xxx:35; 2 Chron. xvi:14; "pot of ointment," Job xli:31, etc.). (3) Gr. μύρον, moo'ron, myrrh (invariably rendered "ointment"). (McC. & Str. Bib. Cyc.)

(2) Nature and Preparation. The holy anointing oil made by Bezalel for Moses (Exod. xxx:23, sq.) consisted of one hin of olive oil (about 10 lbs.), 500 shekels of flowing myrrh (about 15 lbs.), 250 shekels of sweet cinnamon (about 7½ lbs.), 250 shekels of sweet calamus, and 500 shekels of cassia (or costus). The Jewish authors who regard the 'shekel of the sanctuary' as twice the ordinary shekel, double these weights. This was to be compounded after the art of the perfumer. Probably these scented substances, or some of them, were brought into the market in powder, as in Cant. iii:6, these spices are called 'the powders of the merchant.' There are different descriptions given by Rabbinical writers of the process whereby the anointing oil was compounded, but most probably it was simple pulverization of the ingredients, and boiling them in the oil; for, as Pliny has remarked, the strength of the ointment is greater when the ingredients are boiled together (xiii:2); but see Otho's Lexicon, under the word 'Oleum.' The making of ointment in this way was recognized by Hebrew writers (see Job xli:31). (A. Macalister, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

(3) Uses. Ointment was used among the Hebrew and other nations for cosmetics, for funeral, medicinal and ritual purposes. (See ANOINTING; OIL.)

OLD (ôld). See AGE.

OLD GATE (ôld gât), a name (Neh. iii:6; xii:9) of a Jerusalem gate; Kitto says probably the gate on the northeast corner. (See JERUSALEM.)

OLD MAN. See REGENERATION.

OLD PROPHET, THE. This prophet lived in Bethel at the commencement of the reign of Jeroboam I. A single incident in his life is narrated (1 Kings xiii:11-32; 2 Kings xxiii:16-18). He desired to entertain as his guest a certain 'man of God' from Judah, who had appeared in Bethel to denounce the royal sanctuary (Possibly on the day of its inauguration?). The stranger was already departing when the prophet overtook him and offered his hospitality. It was refused on the ground that Jehovah had forbidden him to take food in the city. The prophet then falsely declared that he gave his invitation in accordance with a message from Jehovah, and the stranger returned and partook of a meal. He never reached his home again. News came to Bethel that a lion had slain him a short distance from the city. The old prophet recognized this as Jehovah's punishment, saddled his ass, brought in the body, held lamentation over it, and buried it in his own grave. By this he showed his sympathy and respect. (W. B. Stevenson, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

The punishment came upon the old prophet in the way of retribution for not obeying implicitly Jehovah's command. (See The Speaker's Commentary. Adam Clarke's Commentary. Lange's Commentary. The Expositor's Bible, Farrar.)

OLD TESTAMENT (ôld tês'tâ-ment). See BIBLE.

OLIVE (ôl'iv).

1. From ancient times this has been one of the most common fruit trees of Palestine (Deut. vi:11). As the olive stands in the orchard it resembles the apple tree in shape, size, and mode of cultivation. Its leaves are narrow, dull above and silvery beneath, so that the resulting gray-green of these trees becomes beautiful by association (Hos. xiv:6). The white flowers, produced in the greatest profusion, are like those of the lilac, to which the tree is botanically allied; and, though millions are prematurely scattered by the breezes (Job xv:33), enough remain to load down the trees with fruit. This latter is like a plum in shape and color, being first green, then pale, and, when ripe, nearly black. Olives are sometimes plucked in an unripe state and put into some pickle or other preserving liquid and exported. For the most part, however, they are valuable for the oil they produce, which is expressed from the fruit in various ways, and constitutes an important article of commerce and luxury (Job xxiv:11; Ezek. xxvii:17). The fruit is gathered by beating (Deut. xxiv:20), or shaking the tree (Is. xvii:6); and by Jewish law gleanings were to be left for the poor.

2. The aged olive tree is often surrounded by young and thrifty shoots (Ps. cxxviii:3). Women sometimes adorned themselves with garlands of olives on festal occasions (Judith xv:13), and at the Olympic games in Greece the victor's crown was composed of olive leaves. The olive is still cultivated through nearly every part of Palestine. (See ZAIT OR SAIT.)

Figurative. (1) As olives were emblems of peace, the olive-leaf brought to Noah by his dove might mark God's being reconciled to men, and the intimation thereof by the Holy Ghost (Gen. viii:11). (2) To pre-figure Jesus as the peaceful means of our access to God, and supporter of the church, the door and posts of the entrance to the holy of holies, and the posts of the door of the temple were of "olive-wood;" and to mark the peaceful illuminating ministrations of angels and ministers to the church, Solomon made his two large cherubim, for covering the ark, of "olive-trees" (1 Kings vi:23, 31, 33). (3) The "two anointed olive-trees" before the Lord, may denote Jesus in his two natures, or in his offices of prophet and priest; or him and his Spirit (Zech. iv:3, 11, 12). (4) Believers and ministers are like "olive-trees" for the enlightening, beautifying, softening, and healing of others (Judg. ix:8, 9; Ps. lli:8; Rev. xi:4). (5) The Jews are likened to green, flourishing, and cultivated "olives" (Jer. xi:16; Hos. xiv:6). (6) The Gentiles were "wild olives," grafted upon the root of a cultivated olive-tree, while the natural branches were broken off (Rom. xi:17, 24). The apostle does not teach that a wild twig grafted upon a good stock will produce good fruit, for this is not the fact. St. Paul refers rather to the adoption of the Gentiles among God's people as a process "contrary to nature," but accomplished by grace. (7) Wicked men are like "olives," which cast their leaves before their season, and so bear no fruit; their apparent piety and their prosperity come quickly to an end (Job xv:33). (8) Children are like "olive-plants," about their parents' table; how quick their growth! how delightful and fresh their beauty! and what an extensive prospect of their usefulness (Ps. cxxviii:3). OLIVES, MOUNT OF; OLIVET (ôl'ivs, mount ôv; ôl'i-vêt), a noted mountain or range of hills east of Jerusalem.

(1) Name. Its descriptive appellation is "the Mount of Olives" (Heb. הַר הַזַּיִת, har haz-zaythem', only in Zech. xiv:4; Gr. τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν)

The mountain derives its name from the olive trees which formerly abounded on its sides, some of which are still found thereon. It is called "Olivet" and "Mount of Olives" in the Old Testament (2 Sam. xv:30; Zech. xiv:4), and is also alluded to as the "mount" (Neh. viii:15), the mount facing Jerusalem (1 Kings xi:7), the "mountain which is on the east side of the city" (Ezek. xi:23); and the "mount of corruption" probably refers to a portion of Olivet (2 Kings xxiii:13). The modern Arabic name is sometimes Jebel es-Zeitun, or "mount of olives," but more usually it is Jebel et-Tir, or "mount of the summit."

(2) Physical Features. It faces Jerusalem, lying directly east, is two thousand six hundred and sixty-five feet above sea level, has many beautiful olive trees on its sides, and from these has received its name. It is not a mountain so much as a rounded crown of the broad ridge which runs longitudinally through Palestine. It is the highest spot near the city. Osborn describes six prominent heights in the Olivet range, but he includes Scopus, on the north, and the hill of "Evil Counsel," on the extreme south, of the ridge.

The Olivet range extends north without any marked depression to the portion called Scopus, and the general elevation of the ridge is a little less than 3,000 feet above the sea level. It lies directly east of Jerusalem, and is separated from the city by the valley of the Kedron. The four chief peaks south of Scopus are: (1) The northern summit, called Viri Galilai, from a tradition that the angels stood upon it when they spoke to the disciples (Acts i:11). It is about half a mile northeast from the city, and is 2,682 feet above the sea. (2) The central summit, or the "Mount of Ascension," 2,665 feet in height, is situated directly east of the temple-area, and is the Mount of Olives proper. Three paths lead to this summit—one by a nearly direct ascent, another winding around the southern shoulder, and a third path leading around the northern shoulder. On the top of this peak is a chapel built upon the site of a church erected by Helena, the mother of Constantine, since tradition points out this spot as the place of the ascension of Christ. The monks point out even the footprint made by the ascending Lord, and the spot, a little south of this, where Christ is said to have taught the disciples the model, or Lord's prayer. The true place of the ascension, however, was beyond the summit of Olivet, and near Bethany (Luke xxiv:50). (3) The third summit, about 600 yards southwest of the former, and three-fourths of a mile from Bethany, is called "the Prophets," from a curious catacomb called the "Prophets' Tombs" on its side. (4) The fourth summit, about 1,000 yards from No. 3, is the "Mount of Offense," so-called from the idol-worship which Solomon established there. None of the depressions which separate these summits are very deep; some are to be regarded as quite slight. It is evident that in ancient times this mountain ridge was covered with olives, myrtles, figs, cypresses, and some species of the terebinth or oak, and also abounded in flowers. "The olives and olive-yards," says Stanley, "from which it derived its name must in earlier times have clothed it far more completely than at present, where it is only in the deeper and more secluded slopes leading up to the northernmost summit that these venerable trees spread into anything like a forest. And in those times, as we see from the name of Bethany ('house of dates'), and from the allusions after the Captivity and in the gospel history, myrtle-groves, pines, and palm trees—all of which have now disappeared—must have made it a constant resort for pleasure and seclusion. Two gigantic cedars, probably amongst the very few in Palestine, stood near its summit, under which were four shops where pigeons were sold for purification. The olive and fig alone now remain—the olive still in more or less abundance, the fig here and there on the roadside, but both enough to justify the Mussulmans' belief that in the oath in the Koran, 'By the olive and the fig,' the Almighty swears by his favorite city of Jerusalem, with this adjacent mountain." (Sinai and Palestine, p. 184.) (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

The slopes of Olivet are terraced and cultivated, but the vegetation is not luxuriant. The principal trees now are the olive, fig, and carob, with here and there a few apricot, almond, terebinth, and hawthorn. At the western base of the mountain is Silwan, a miserable little village. Jewish tradition declares that the shekinah, or Divine presence, after retiring from Jerusalem, dwelt three years and a half on Olivet, to see whether the Jews would repent, but when they would not, retired to his own place.

(3) Special Scriptural Notices. On the summit of Olivet God was wont to be worshipped (2 Sam. xv:32). The glory of the Lord appeared there to Ezekiel in a vision (Ezek. xi:23), and Zechariah prophetically portrayed Jehovah standing on the mountain to interpose in behalf of his people (Zech. xiv:4). The mountain is first mentioned in connection with David's flight from Jerusalem to escape from Absalom (2 Sam. xv:30, 32; xvi:1). Upon it Solomon built high places for the gods of his numerous wives, but these idolatrous places were destroyed by King Josiah (1 Kings xi:7; 2 Kings xxiii:13, 14). When the captive Jews celebrated the feast of tabernacles, the olive, pine, myrtle, and palm branches used in building their booths were brought from this mountain (Neh. viii:15). It is also called, in the New Testament, "Mount of Olives" and "Olivet," and was a scene of several of the most interesting events in the life of our Lord. Jesus went often to this mount (Luke xxi:37; xxii:39; John viii:1). He was descending its slope when the multitude welcomed him to the city with hosannas (Luke xix:37, 38). He had rounded its shoulder when Jerusalem burst into full view, and he wept over the fate which he knew awaited the city (41-44). He was sitting on the mount with his disciples gazing across the valley at the splendid temple and the city, when he prophesied the destruction of both (Matt. xxiv:3; Mark xiii:3). After his last passover he retired to the mount of Olives (Matt. xxvi:30; Mark xiv:26). The garden of Gethsemane was to the west of it, either at its base or some small distance up its ascent. Bethany and Bethphage were on the eastern side (Matt. xxi:1; Mark xi:1; Luke xix:29). It was near the former of these villages that our Lord's ascension took place (xxiv:50).

(4) Present Appearance, Etc. Of late Olivet has attracted special attention from the Russians. Besides the beautiful temple built on the western slope a large Russian monastery has been erected on the summit, in which are many attractions. "The Pater Noster Chapel, south of the church of the Ascension, was erected in 1865 by the Princess de la Tour d'Anvergne, and is supposed to stand on an old traditional site of the Middle Ages. The intention of the Princess was to have within twenty-four small chambers, in which the 'Lord's Prayer' should be written up in twenty-four different languages, so that pilgrims of all nationalities and all creeds, might unite there in repeating the Lord's Prayer." (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

OLIVE TREE (Heb. זית, zah'yith, olive berry, tree, yard). (See OLIVE; ZAIT OR SAIT.)

OLIVE YARD (öl'iv yärd), (Heb. זית, zah'yith, Exod. xxiii:11; Josh. xxiv:13; 1 Sam. viii:14; 2 Kings v:26; Neh. v:11; ix:25), an orchard or grove of olive trees. (See OLIVE; ZAIT OR SAIT.)

OLIVET (ô'lî-vět). See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

OLYMPAS (o-lým'pas), (Gr. 'Ολυμπᾶς, ol-oom-pas'), a Christian at Rome, whom Paul salutes in his Epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi:15), A. D. 55.

OMAR (ô'mar), (Heb. אֹמָר, o-maw'r', talkative), son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi:15; 1 Chron. i:36). He was head of a tribe of Edomites (B. C. about 1900).

OMEGA (ô-mē'gà or ô'mē-gà), (Gr. ω, fully 'Ομέγα, i. e., the long o, in distinction from the short o), the last letter of the Greek alphabet, as Alpha is the first.

Figurative. Omega is used metaphorically to denote the end of anything. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending . . . the first and the last" (Rev. i:8, 11; comp. xxi:6; xxii:13, and Is. xli:4; xlv:6). (See ALPHA AND OMEGA.)

OMER (ô'mēr), (Heb. אֹמֶר, oh-mer', tenth of an ephah, a Hebrew dry measure). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

OMNIPOTENCE OF GOD (ôm-nip'ô-tens òv Gód) is his Almighty power. This is essential to his nature as an infinite, independent, and perfect being. The power of God is divided into absolute and ordinate or actual. Absolute is that whereby God is able to do that which he will not do, but is possible to be done. Ordinate is that whereby he does that which he had decreed to do. The power of God may be more especially seen: (1) In creation (Rom. i:20; Gen. i). (2) In the preservation of his creatures (Heb. i:3; Col. i:16, 17; Job xxvi). (3) In the redemption of men by Christ (Luke i:35, 37; Eph. i:19). (4) In the conversion of sinners (Ps. cx:3; 2 Cor. iv:7; Rom. i:16). (5) In the continuation of the gospel in the world (Matt. xiii:41-43). (6) In the final perseverance of the saints (1 Pet. i:5). (7) In the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. xv.). (8) In making the righteous happy forever, and punishing the wicked (Phil. iii:21; Matt. xxv:34), etc.

OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD (ôm'ni-préz'ens òv Gód), is his ubiquity, or his being present in every place.

This may be argued from his being infinity (Ps. cxxxix) his power, which is everywhere (Heb. i:3); his providence (Acts xvii:27, 28), which supplies all. As he is a spirit, he is so omnipresent as not to be mixed with the creatures, or divided part in one place, and part in another; nor is he multiplied or extended, but is essentially present everywhere. From the consideration of this attribute we should learn to fear and reverence God (Ps. lxxxix:7). To derive consolation in the hour of distress (Is. xliii:2; Ps. xlv:1). To be active and diligent in holy services (Ps. cxix:168).

OMNISCIENCE OF GOD (ôm-nîsh'ens òv Gód)

It is that perfection by which he knows all things, and is (1) Infinite knowledge (Ps. cxlvi:5). (2) Eternal, generally called fore-knowledge (Acts xv:18; Is. xlvi:10; Eph. i:4; Acts ii:23). (3) Universal, extending to all persons, times, places, and things (Heb. iv:13; Ps. cxxxix:12). (4) Perfect, relating to what is past, present, and to come. He knows all by his own essence, and not derived from any other; not successively, as we do, but independently, distinctly, infallibly (Jer. x:6, 7; Rom. xi:33). (5) This knowledge is peculiar to himself (Mark xiii:32; Job xxxvi:4), and not communicable to any creature. (6) It is incomprehensible to us how God knows all things, yet it is evident that he does; for to suppose otherwise is to suppose him an imperfect being, and directly contrary to the revelation he has given of himself (Ps. cxxxix:6; 1 John iii:20; Job xxviii:24; xxi:22).

This attribute of God is constantly connected in Scripture with his omnipresence, and forms a part of almost every description of that attribute; for, as God is a Spirit, and therefore intelligent, if he is everywhere, if nothing can exclude him, not even the most solid bodies, nor the minds of intelligent beings, then are all things naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Where he acts, he is; and where he is, he perceives. He understands and considers things absolutely, and as they are in their own natures, powers, properties, differences, together with all the circumstances belonging to them. "Known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world," rather (ap'eye-oh'nos, ap' aionos), from all eternity known, before they were made, in their possible, and known, now they are made, in their actual existence.

OMRI (ôm'ri), (Heb. אֹמְרִי, om-ree, God taught).

1. The sixth king of Israel, who reigned twelve years. He was raised to the throne by the army, while it was engaged in the siege of Gibbethon, a Levitical city in Dan, of which the Philistines had gained possession, when the news came to the camp of the death of Elah, and the usurpation of Zimri. On this, the army proclaimed their general, Omri, king of Israel. He then lost not a moment, but leaving Gibbethon in the power of the infidels, went and besieged his competitor in Tirzah. But he was no sooner delivered of this rival (see ZIMRI), than another appeared in the person of Tibni, whom a part of the people had raised to the throne, probably from unwillingness to submit to military dictation. This occasioned a civil war, which lasted six years, and left Omri undisputed master of the throne (B. C. 882). His reign lasted six years more, and its chief event was the foundation of Samaria, which thenceforth became the capital city of the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xvi:15-28). (See SAMARIA.)

There is a difference between the biblical chronology and that of the Moabite stone regarding the length of Omri's reign. The latter makes the reign of Omri and half of his son Ahab's reign to extend over forty years. The biblical chronology "ascribes to Omri a reign of only twelve years, and to Ahab's entire reign twenty-two years, making the total length of both reigns only thirty-four years. From these data of the Moabite Stone it is evident that we must extend considerably the reign of Omri. In the scheme set forth in Schrader's cuneiform Insc. and the Old Testament, ii, p. 322, sq., Omri's reign is reckoned to be twenty-five years (B. C. 900-875), ten years being deducted from the reign of Baasha."

Owen C. Whitehouse, Hastings' Bib. Dict., says: "These dates harmonize better with (1) the results of Assyriology, (2) with the deep impression which Omri had produced in western Asia by his military prowess. This impression was no fleeting one, but extended over a very long period. We have clear indication of this in the fact that Palestine was called (mât) Bit Humri, or 'land of the house of Omri,' from the time of Sha'manaser II. (860) to that of Sargon (722-705). The usurper Jehu is called on Shalmanaser's black obelisk Ja'ua abal Humri, 'Jehu son of Omri.' And no less deep was the impression produced in Israel and Judah. The reference to the 'statutes of Omri' (Mic. vi:16), is an indication of this, his name being coupled with that of his son Ahab."

2. A Benjamite of the family of Becher (1 Chron. vii:8). (B. C. about 1618.)

3. Son of Imri of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ix:4). (B. C. after 1618.)

4. Son of Michael and a captain in the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvii:18). (B. C. about 1017.)

ON (օן), (Heb. ֹן, one, strength).

1. A chief of the tribe of Reuben, who was one of the accomplices of Korah in the revolt against the authority of Moses and Aaron. He is mentioned among the leaders of this conspiracy in the first instance (Num. xvi:1), but does not appear in any of the subsequent transactions, and is not by name included in the final punishment. The Rabbinical tradition is, that the wife of On relates that the holy family once rested (Robinson's Biblical Researches, i, 36). Heliopolis was the capital of a district or nemos bearing the same name (Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 9; Ptolem. iv, 5. The place is mentioned in Gen. xli:45, where it is said that Pharaoh gave to Joseph a wife, Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On (verse 50).

(2) Sun Worship. From the passage in Jeremiah (as above) it may be inferred that it was distinguished for idolatrous worship: 'He shall break also the images of Beth-shemesh that is in the land of Egypt, and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall be burn with fire.' The names, 'City of the Sun,' 'Temples of the Sun,' connected with the place, taken in con-persuaded her husband to abandon the enterprise. It has been held by some critics that the mention of On is due to a textual corruption.

2. One of the oldest cities in the world, situated in Lower Egypt, about two hours north-northeast from Cairo. The Septuagint translates the name On by Heliopolis, which signifies 'city of the sun;' and in Jer. xliii:13, it bears a name, Beth-shemesh (oppidum solis, Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 11), of equivalent import. On is a Coptic and ancient Egyptian word, signifying light and the sun (Ritter, Erdk. i, 822).

(1) Location. The site is now marked by low mounds, enclosing a space about three quarters of a mile in length by half a mile in breadth, which was once occupied by houses and by the celebrated Temple of the Sun. This area is at present a plowed field, a garden of herbs; and the solitary obelisk which still rises in the midst of it is the sole remnant of the former splendors of the place. In the days of Edrisi and Abdalatif the place bore the name of Ain Shems; and in the neighboring village, Matariyeh, is still shown an ancient well bearing the same name. Near by it is a very old sycamore, its trunk straggling and gnarled, under which legendary tradition with the words just cited from the prophet, seem to refer the mind to the purer form of worship which prevailed at a very early period in Egypt, namely, the worship of the heavenly bodies, and thence to carry the thoughts to the deteriorations which it afterwards underwent in sinking to the adoration of images and animals.

"The Sun-god was worshiped at Heliopolis first in the form of Ra; secondly, as Tum, the setting sun; thirdly, as Harakhti, the hawk of the horizon, called by the Greeks Harmakhis; fourthly, as Khepera, figured by a scarabæus, and symbolizing the vivifying and reproductive force of the sun. Of sacred animals here the bull Mnevis was the most important; and the heron, called bnw, was the original of the famous phoenix. From the earliest times obelisks were connected with the Sun worship (Jer. xliii:13 [Beth-shemesh]). There was also a sacred pool or spring, mentioned especially by Piankhi, 'in which Ra was wont to wash his face;' hence the Arabian name for this locality is 'Ain esh-shems,' 'spring of the sun.' In Christian story this is the spring in which the Virgin washed her son while resting in the shade of an acacia tree on her journey into Egypt. The latest successor to the tree is still shown in an enclosure at Matariyeh.' (Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See EGYPTIANS, RELIGION OF ANCIENT.)

(3) Research. The traces of this city which are found in classic authors correspond with the title of it that we know from the brief intimations of Holy Writ. According to Herodotus (ii. 59), Heliopolis was one of the four great cities that were rendered famous in Egypt by being the centers of solemn religious festivals, which were attended by splendid processions and homage to the gods. In Heliopolis the observance was held in honor of the sun. The majesty of these sacred visits may be best learned now by a careful study of the temples (in their ruins) in which the rites were performed (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians). Heliopolis had its priesthood, a numerous and learned body, celebrated before other Egyptians for their historical and antiquarian lore; it long continued the university of the Egyptians, the chief seat of their science (Kenrick's Herod. ii, 3; Wilkinson); the priests dwelt as a holy community in a spacious structure appropriated to their use. In Strabo's time the halls were to be seen in which Eudoxus and Plato had studied under the direction of the priests of Heliopolis. A detailed description of the temple, with its long alleys of sphinxes, obelisks, etc., may be found in Strabo (xvii; Joseph. c. Apion. ii, 2), who says that the mural sculpture in it was very similar to the old Etruscan and Grecian works. In the temple a bullock was fed—a symbol of the god of Mnevis. The city suffered heavily by the Persian invasion. From the time of Shaw and Pocock, the place has been described by many travelers. At an early period remains of the famous temple were found. Abdallatif (A. D. 1200) saw many colossal sphinxes, partly prostrate, partly standing. He also saw the gates or propylæa of the temple covered with inscriptions; he describes two immense obelisks whose summits were covered with massive brass, around which were others one-half or one-third the size of the first, placed in so thick a mass that they could scarcely be counted; most of them thrown down. An obelisk which the Emperor Augustus caused to be carried to Rome, and placed in the Campus Martius, is held by Zoega (De Orig. et Usu Obelisci) to have been brought from Heliopolis, and to have owed its origin to Sesostris. This city furnished works of art to Augustus for adorning Rome, and to Constantine for adorning Constantinople. Ritter (Erdkunde, i, 823) says that the sole remaining obelisk is from sixty to seventy feet high, of a block of red granite, bearing hieroglyphics which remind the beholder of what Strabo terms the Etruscan style. 'The figure of the cross which it bears (crux ansata) has attracted the special notice of Christian antiquaries' (Ritter). J. R. B.

ONAM (ō'nam), (Heb. נָאֵם, o-nawm', strong).

1. A Horite, son of Shobal (Gen. xxxvi:23; 1 Chron. i:40). (B. C. about 1964.)

2. Son of Jerahmeel and Atarah of the house of Judah (1 Chron. ii:26, 28). (B. C. before 1658.)

ONAN (ō'nan), (Heb. נָאֵן, o-nawn', strong, stout), second son of Judah by the daughter of Shuah the Canaanite (Gen. xxxviii:4; xlvii:12; Num. xxvi:19; 1 Chron. ii:3), B. C. about 2000.

Being constrained by the obligations of the ancient Levirate law to espouse Tamar, his elder brother's widow, he took means to frustrate the intention of this usage, which was to provide heirs for a brother who had died childless. This crime, rendered without excuse by the allowance of polygamy, and the seriousness of which can scarcely be appreciated but in respect to the usages of the times in which it was committed, was punished by premature death (Gen. xxxviii: 4. sq.)

ONE AND OTHER (Heb. אֶחָד וְאֶחָד, eesh, Jer. xxxvi:16), each, individually, both.

ONESIMUS (o-nēs'i-mūs), (Gr. Ὀνήσιμος, on-ay'-sim-os, profitable).

A slave belonging to Philemon of Colossæ, who fled from his master, and proceeded to Rome, where he was converted by St. Paul, who sent him back to his master, a friend and convert of the apostle, with an eloquent letter, the purport of which is described in the article PHILEMON. Onesimus, accompanied by Tychicus, left Rome with not only this epistle, but with those to the Ephesians and Colossians (Col. iv:9). It is believed that Onesimus, anxious to justify the confidence which Paul reposed in him, by appearing speedily before his master, left Tychicus to take the Epistle to the Ephesians; and hastened to Colossæ, where he doubtless received the forgiveness which Paul had so touchingly implored for him as 'a brother beloved' (Canon. Apost. 73). The part which St. Paul took in this difficult and trying case is highly honorable to him; while for Onesimus himself, the highest praise is, that he obtained the friendship and confidence of the apostle. (A. D. 58.) An uncertain tradition makes Onesimus to have been bishop of Beræa, where he is said to have suffered martyrdom (Const. Apostol. vii, 46).

It is probable that various Onesimi have been confused, and it is impossible to extricate any certain fact. His memory was observed by the Latin Church on Feb. 16, by the Greek Church on Feb. 15, and also in conjunction with Philemon, Appia, and Archippus, on Nov. 22; the various traditions will be found in the Acto Sanctorum (ii, 855-859) and the Greek Menæa (pp. 89-92) for those days. A most interesting modern romance of his life will be found in Onesimus, by the author of Philochristus (London, 1882). (W. Locke, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

ONESIPHORUS (ōn'ē-sif'ō-rūs), (Gr. Ὀνήσιφορος, on-ay-sif'or-os, profit-bringer), a believer of Ephesus, who came to Rome during the second captivity of St. Paul in that city (A. D. about 64).

And having found out the apostle, who was in custody of a soldier, to whose arm his own was chained, was not ashamed of his chain, but attended him frequently, and rendered him all the services in his power. This faithful attachment, at a time of calamity and desertion, was fully appreciated and well remembered by the apostle, who, in his Epistle to Timothy, carefully records the circumstance; and, after charging him to salute in his name 'the household of Onesiphorus,' expresses the most earnest and grateful wishes for his spiritual welfare (2 Tim. i:16-18). It would appear from this that Onesiphorus had then left Rome.

"It is not perfectly clear whether, at the time when St. Paul wrote, Onesiphorus was alive or dead; but the references to his 'house' rather than to himself in 2 Tim. i:16; iv:19, and still more the words of the prayer in 2 Tim. i:18, 'The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day,' make it most probable that he was now dead (so De Wette, Huther, Alford, Ellicott, Fairbairn, v. Soden). If so, the passage gains an additional interest from the use that has been made of it in connection with the argument for prayers for the dead. Thus it is appealed to in support of such a practice by Bishop Archibald Campbell in his anonymously published book on The Intermediate or Middle State of Departed Souls, 1713, p. 72; and amongst more recent writers by Plumtre (The Spirits in Prison, pp. 128, 266) and Luckock (After Death, p. 77, The Intermediate State, p. 211). Others, as Barrett (The Intermediate State, p. 113), find in the words no more than 'a pious wish.' (W. Locke, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

ONION (ün'yün), (Heb. ^לב^של, beh'tsel, peeled).

A plant, the bulbous root of which was much used in Egypt as an article of food (Num. xi: 5; Herod. ii, 125). It is Allium cepa, called in Hebrew besel, in Arabic basal. It has been cultivated from an early period in Egypt and other parts of the East. (See CHATZIR.)

ONLY BEGOTTEN (ōn'yī bē-gōt't'n), (Gr. μονογενής, mon-og-en-ace', single of its kind), an expression used of Jesus Christ (John i:14, 18, etc.) to denote that in the sense in which he is the son of God he has no brethren. (See SONSHIP OF CHRIST.)

ONO (ō'no), (Heb. ^ונ^ו, o-no', strong), a city of Benjamin; built or rebuilt by the family of Elpaal, of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:12).

It was five miles from Lod, or Lydda, also built by Benjamites. In Neh. vi:2, we have mention of "The Plain of Ono," which probably was not far from the city. Ono is the modern Kefr'Anā, north of Ludd (the ancient Lod or Lydda). Its antiquity is shown by its being noticed, along with the last-named place, in the lists of Tahutmes III. c. (B. C. 1600.)

ONYCHA (o-n'y'ka), (Heb. ^שח^ול, shekh-ay'leth, a scale), a substance mentioned as an ingredient of the holy perfume (Exod. xxx:34).

It is believed to have been the operculum (lid) of a shell mollusk called stromb or wing-shell, which being burnt gave out a certain perfume.

ONYX (ō'nīks), (Gr. ὄνυξ, on'ooks generally for Heb. ^שח^ול, sho'ham, the leek green beryl).

One kind of chalcedony; a precious stone (Exod. xxv:7; Ezek. xxviii:13), exhibiting two or more colors disposed in parallel bands or layers. The Hebrew word shoham is uniformly so translated in the Bible. Opinion is divided as to the exact meaning of the term. Josephus says the onyx is meant. It was found in the land of Havilah (Gen. ii:12), and was evidently of high value, as it is mentioned among precious stones and metals (Job xxviii:16; Ezek. xxviii:13). It adorned the breastplate of the high priest and the two shoulders of his ephod (Exod. xxviii:9-12, 20). David also gathered such stones for the service of the future temple (1 Chron. xxix:2). The onyx is a cryptocrystalline variety or sub-variety of quartz. It is in layers of different colors, which alternate with each other and bear some resemblance to the white and flesh-colored bands of the finger nail.

OPEN (ō'p'n), (Gr. διανοίγω, dee-an-oy'go, Luke xxiv:32, to explain, expound, make known, disclose).

Thus Jer. xx:12, 'But, O Lord of hosts, that triest the righteous, and seest the reins and the heart, let me see thy vengeance on them: for unto thee have I opened my cause.' Acts xvii: 3, 'Paul . . . reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered.'

OPEN PLACE (ō-p'n plās), in Gen. xxxviii:14, A. V.

Tamar is said to have taken her seat 'in an open place,' but undoubtedly the correct translation is in the gate of Enaim, R. V.

OPHEL (ō'fel), (Heb. ^פל^ה, haw-ō-fel, with the article).

1. A place or quarter of Jerusalem near the walls (2 Chron. xxvii:3; xxxiii:44), on the east side (Neh. iii:26; xi:21). Ophel, or, as he calls it, Ophla (Ὀφλά Ὀφλάς), is often mentioned by Josephus as adjoining the valley of the Kidron and the temple mount (De Bell. Jud. v, 6, 1; vi, 6, 3). He explains himself more precisely in v, 4, 2, where he makes the first wall of the city to extend from the tower of the Essenes over Siloam and the pools of Solomon to Ophel. From these intimations Winer collects that Ophel was a high or ascending place, built over (in the ancient city) with houses. This view is confirmed by Dr. Robinson, who identifies it with the low ridge which extends southward from the temple mount to Mount Zion, between the exterior valley of Jehoshaphat and the interior valley of Tyropæon. The top of this ridge is flat, descending rapidly towards the south, sometimes by offsets of rocks; and the ground is now tilled and planted with olive and other fruit trees. This ridge is considerably below the level of Mount Moriah; its length is 1,550 feet, and its breadth in the middle part, from brow to brow, 290 feet (Winer, title, 'Ophel,' Robinson, ii, 349). (See JERUSALEM.)

2. A place of middle Palestine where Gehazi stowed in a house the presents he took from Naaman (2 Kings v:24). In the A. V. it is rendered wrongly "the tower."

OPHER (ō'fer), (Heb. ^פר^ו, o'fer), in Cant. iv:5 it denotes the calf or fawn of a stag (ail).

The term occurs in no other book of Scripture, is unknown in the Syriac and Chaldee, and appears to be only a poetical application of a term more strictly belonging to fawn-like animals; for in the above passage it is applied to couples feeding in a bed of lilies—indications not descriptive of young goats or stags, but quite applicable to the Antilopine groups which are characterized in Griffith's Cuvier, in subgenus X. Cephalophus, and XI. Neotragus; both furnishing species of exceeding delicacy and graceful diminutive structures, several of which habitually feed in pairs among shrubs and geraniums on the hilly plains of Africa. They have always been and still are in request among the wealthy in warm climates for domestication, therefore we may conjecture that a species designated by the name of Opher (perhaps, alluding to Ophir, or even Africa), was to be found in the parks or royal gardens of Solomon and from the sovereign's own observation were alluded to in the truly apposite imagery of his poetical diction (Cant. iv:12). (See ANTELOPE; ROE; ROEBUCK.) C. H. S.

OPHIR (ō'phir), (Heb. ^פה^ר, o-feer', fat, rich). 1. The proper name of one of the thirteen sons of Joktan, the son of Eber, a great-grandson of Shem (Gen. x:26-29; Vulg. Ophir). Many Arabian countries are believed to have been peopled by these persons, and to have been called after their respective names, as Sheba, etc., and among others Ophir (Bochart, Phaleg, iii, 15).

2. The name of a place, country, or region, famous for its gold, which Solomon's ships visited in company with the Phœnician. The difficulty is to ascertain where Ophir was situated. The first theory which appears to be attended with some degree of evidence not purely fanciful is that Ophir was situated in Arabia. In Gen. x:29, Ophir stands in the midst of other Arabian countries. Still, as Gesenius observes, it is possibly mentioned in that connection only on account of its being an Arabian colony planted abroad. Though gold is not now found in Arabia (Niebuhr, Description de l'Arabie, Copenhagen, 1773, p. 124), yet the ancients ascribe it to the inhabitants in great plenty (Judg. viii:24, 26; 2 Chron. i; 1 Kings x:1, 2; Ps. lxxii:15). This gold, Dr. Lee thinks, was no other than the gold of Havilah (Gen. ii:11), which he supposes to have been situate somewhere in Arabia, and refers to Gen. x:7, 29; xxv:18; 1 Sam. xv:7; 1 Chron. i:9 (Translation of the Book Job, etc., Lond. 1837, p. 55). But Diodorus Siculus ascribes gold mines to Arabia (ii, 50). He also testifies to the abundance of 'precious stones' in Arabia (ii, 54), especially among the inhabitants of Sabas (iii, 46; comp. Gen. ii:12; 2 Chron. ix:1; 1 Kings x:1, 2). Pliny also speaks of the 'Sabai ditissimi auri metallis' (Hist. Nat. vi, 32). Again, 'Littus Hammæum, ubi auri metalla' (ib.). Others suppose that though Ophir was situate somewhere on the coast of Arabia, it was rather an emporium, at which the Hebrews and Tyrians obtained gold, silver, ivory, apes, almug-trees, etc., brought thither from India and Africa by the Arabian merchants, and even from Ethiopia, to which Herodotus (iii, 114) ascribes gold in great quantities, elephants' teeth, and trees and shrubs of every kind. In behalf of the supposition that Ophir was the Arabian port Aphar already referred to, it may be remarked that the name has undergone similar changes to that of the Sept. of Ophir; for it is called by Arrian Aphar, by Pliny Saphar, by Ptolemy Saphera, and by Stephanus Saphirini. Grotius thinks his to be Ophir. The very name El Ophir has been lately pointed out as a city of Oman, in former times the center of a very active Arabian commerce (Seetzen, in Zachs. Monatl. Correspond. xix, 331, sq.). In favor of the theory which places Ophir in Africa, it has been suggested that we have the very name in afri, Africa. Origen also says, on Job xxii:24, that some of the interpreters understood Ophir to be Africa. Michaelis supposes that Solomon's fleet, coming down the Red Sea from Ezion-geber, coasted along the shore of Africa, doubling the Cape of Good Hope, and came to Tarshish, which he, with many others, supposes to have been Tartessus in Spain, and thence back again the same way; that this conjecture accounts for their three years' voyage out and home; and that Spain and the coasts of Africa furnished all the commodities which they brought back. Strabo indeed says that Spain abounded in gold, and immensely more so in silver (see 1 Macc. viii:3). Others have not hesitated to carry Solomon's fleet round from Spain up the Mediterranean to Joppa. In behalf of the conjecture that Ophir was in India, the following arguments are alleged: that it is most natural to understand from the narrative that all the productions said to have been brought from Ophir came from one and the same country, and that they were all procurable only from India. The Sept. translators also appear to have understood it to be India. Josephus also gives to the sons of Joktan the locality from Cophen, an Indian river; and in part of Asia adjoining it (Antiq. i, 6, 4). He also expressly and unhesitatingly affirms that the land to which Solomon sent for gold was 'anciently called Ophir, but now the Aurea Chersonesus, which belongs to India' (Antiq. viii, 6, 4). There are several places comprised in that region which was actually known as India to the ancients (see INDIA), any of which would have supplied the cargo of Solomon's fleet: for instance, the coast of Malabar. Perhaps the most probable of all is Malacca, which is known to be the Aurea Chersonesus of the ancients. It is also worthy of remark that the natives of Malacca still call their gold-mines ophirs. Prof. Lassen considers it unnecessary to examine conjectures concerning other localities from the fact that products which are said to come from Ophir have Indian names, even in the Hebrew text when they are destitute of genuine Hebrew names. Ritter and Max Müller favor India as the location of Ophir.

On the other hand, some writers give a wider extent to the country in question. Heeren observes that 'Ophir, like the name of all other very distant places or regions of antiquity, like Thule, Tartessus, and others, denotes no particular spot, but only a certain region or part of the world, such as the East or West Indies in modern geography. Hence Ophir was the general name for the rich countries of the south lying on the African, Arabian, or Indian coasts, as far as at that time known' (Historical Researches, translated from the German, Oxford, 1833, vol. ii, pp. 73, 74). It remains to be observed, that in Jer. x:9 we have 'the gold from Uphaz,' and in Dan. x:5, 'the fine gold of Uphaz,' and see the Heb. of 1 Kings x:18. In these instances Uphaz is, by a slight change of pronunciation, put for Ophir.

OPHNI (ōph'ni), (Heb. ֹפְנִי, of-nee', moldy), a city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:24) and thought to be the same as Goplini, or Gophna, now Jufnah, 2½ miles northwest of Bethel.

OPHRAH (ōph'rah), (Heb. ֹפְרָה, of-raw', a fawn).

1. A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:23), seemingly in the northeast of that tribe's domain (1 Sam. xiii:17). Accordingly it is placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. title, Aphia) five Roman miles east of Bethel. This corresponds with the position of a place called et-Taiyibeh, which was visited by Dr. Robinson in his excursion to Bethel (Bibl. Researches, ii, 120-123). It is now a small village, curiously situated upon a conical hill, on the summit of which is an old tower, whence is commanded a splendid view of the valley of the Jordan, the Dead Sea, and the eastern mountains.

2. A town in the tribe of Manasseh, to which Gideon belonged, and where he continued to reside after he had delivered Israel from the Midianites, establishing there his ephod, which became a snare to Israel (Judg. vi:11-24; viii:27). Josephus calls the place Ephra (Antiq. v, 6, 5). It cannot be positively determined from the narrative, whether this Ophrah was in the territory of Manasseh east or west of the Jordan; and no satisfactory attempt to fix the site has yet been made.

3. A son of Meōnothai, of Judah (1 Chron. iv:14). (B. C. after 1614.) Probably "father" here should read founder, in which case the name would be that of a town. There are certainly names of towns in this list of the Chronicles and this may be one, the Judæan Ephron or even the Benjamite Ophrah. Border towns may be counted at one time to Benjamin, at another to Judah.

ORACLE (ôr'â-k'l), (Heb. ^{אָרָאָה}, deb-eeer', from ^{דַּבַּר}, daw-bar', to speak); (Gr. λόγιον, log'ee-on, utterance of God). Among the Jews several sorts of oracles are distinguished.

1. Those delivered vivâ voce; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend speaks to another (Num. xii:8).

2. Prophetic dreams; as those which God sent to Joseph, foretelling his future greatness (Gen. xxxvii:5, 6).

3. Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy had supernatural revelations (Gen. xv:1; xlv:2).

4. The response of Urim and Thummim, which accompanied the ephod, or the pectoral worn by the high-priest (Num. xxvii:21; Joel ii:28). This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often used, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem (1 Sam. xxiii:9; xxx:7) after which they generally consulted the prophets.

5. Some of the Jews claimed that upon the ceasing of prophecy, God gave them what they call Bath-kol, the daughter of the voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the Divine will, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or by a sensible and external voice, heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it; such as the voice heard at the baptism of Christ.

6. The most ancient oracle on record, probably, is that given to Rebekah (Gen. xxv:23), but the most complete instance is that of the child Samuel (1 Sam. iii). The place was the residence of the ark, the regular station of worship. The manner was by an audible and distinct voice.

7. The highest instances of oracles are those voices which, being formed in the air by a power superior to nature, bore testimony to the celestial character of the Divine Messiah; as at his baptism (Matt. iii:17; Mark i:11; Luke iii:22), and again at his transfiguration (Matt. xvii:5; Luke ix:35). "And this voice that came from heaven," says St. Peter, "we heard" (2 Pet. i:18). Nothing can exceed the grandeur and majesty of these oracles; and they could not but forcibly impress the minds of all who witnessed them.

8. By the oracles, in the heathen world, were understood the shrines where utterances concerning the future were given and the utterance itself. The Greeks had many such oracles, of which the most famous was the oracle of Delphi. The priestess, sitting on a tripod over a chasm from which an intoxicating vapor was said to ascend, uttered incoherent words, which were then interpreted by a prophet. These oracles at one time stood in high repute and were consulted by kings. They did not, however, withstand very long the corruptive power of money and bribery.

ORATION (ô-râ'shûn). See ORATOR.

ORATOR (ôr'a-têr), (Heb. ^{שֹׁפֵר}, law-khash', a whisper, Is. iii:3).

1. The rendering of the Hebrew word, as given above is an incantation, preceded by n'bou, i.e. skillful in enchantment (Is. iii:3). The R. V. accurately translates the phrase by "skillful enchantment."

2. The rendering of the Greek Hray'tore (Gr. ^{ῥήτωρ}), is that of a public speaker, pleader. In Acts xxiv:1 it is applied to Tertullus. He was a professional advocate engaged by Paul's Jewish enemies to prosecute the apostle before the Roman procurator.

ORCHARD (ôr'chêrd), (Heb. ^{פָּרְדֵּס}, par-dace', park), a garden planted with trees (Eccles. ii 5; Cant. iv:13; rendered "forest" in Neh. ii:8).

It is applied by Diodorus Siculus (ii, 10) to the hanging gardens of Babylon. Xenophon (Anab. i, 287) describes a park, belonging to Cyrus, like the game preserves of Europe, under this name.

ORDAIN (ôr-dân'), the same as appoint. Ordinances of God are:

1. His fixed purpose and appointment concerning the state and motions of irrational creatures, whether the luminaries of heaven, etc. (Ps. cxix:91; Job xxxviii:33; Jer. xxxi:35).

2. His commandments in general (Lev. xviii:4).

3. His rules and directions relative to his worship (Heb. ix:10; 1 Cor. xi:2).

4. An office appointed by him (Rom. xiii:2). Forms of magistracy, or their laws for regulating the commonwealth, are called an ordinance of man (1 Pet. ii:13; 1 Sam. xxx:25). "A peculiar use of the word is in the rendering of the Hebrew ^{פָּאָה}, paw-al, in the passage 'he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors' (Ps. vii:13), which Gesenius translates 'he maketh his arrows burning,' literally into or for burning, from a meaning of the Hebrew to forge." (Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

ORDER (ôr'dêr), a word with many varieties of meaning, as it is the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. It is most frequently the rendering of the Heb. ^{רָצָה}, aw-rak', to set in a row.

1. It denotes position or proper place, (Ezek. xli:6) 'One over another, and thirty in order;' (1 Cor. xv:23) 'Every man in his own order;' (Luke i:8) 'He executed the priests' office before God in the order of his course;' (1 Cor. xiv:40) 'Let all things be done decently and in order.'

2. Position in office, rank. This is the meaning of Ps. cx:4 'Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek.' (See Heb. v:6, 10; iii:20).

3. Arrangement or orderly array (Job x:22). 'A land of darkness . . . without any order.'

4. Prescribed custom (1 Chron. vi:32; xv:13). 'we sought him not after the due order' (1 Chron. xxiii:31; 2 Chron. viii:14); 'He appointed, according to the order of David his father, the courses of the priests to their service.'

Figurative. (1) God sets men's sins in order before them; he presents them as so many witnesses, or as a well-stated charge against them (Ps. l:21). (2) Men order their cause before God, and fill their mouth with arguments, when they represent it to him truly as it is, and produce and plead manifold reasons for his shewing them favor (Job xxiii:4). (3) To walk orderly, or to order one's conversation aright, is to endeavor earnestly to perform every duty relative to God or men, in the proper place, time, and manner thereof (Acts xxi:24; Ps. l:23).

ORDINANCES OF THE GOSPEL (ôr'di-nans-ës òv thê gôs'pêl), are institutions of Divine authority relating to the worship of God; such as: (1) baptism (Matt. xxviii:19); (2) the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. xi:24, etc.); (3) public ministry, or preaching and reading the word (Rom. x:15; Eph. iv:11; Mark xvi:15); (4) hearing the gospel (Mark iv:24; Rom. x:17); (5) public prayer (1 Cor. xiv:15, 19; Matt. vi:6; Ps. v:1, 7); (6) singing of psalms (Col. iii:16; Eph. v:19); (7) fasting (James iv:9; Matt. ix:15; Joel ii:12); (8) Solemn thanksgiving (Ps. l:14; 1 Thess. v:18). (See these different articles.)

ORDINATION (ôr'dî-nâ'shûn), the act of conferring holy orders; of initiating a person into the ministry, or of publicly recognizing the relation which has been entered into, by mutual agreement, between a minister and the church.

In Episcopal churches ordination has always been esteemed the principal prerogative of bishops, and they still retain the function as a mark of their spiritual sovereignty in their diocese or jurisdiction.

1. Bible Usage. (1) Old Testament Ordination was practiced early in Bible times. The Hebrew priests, Levites, prophets, and kings were solemnly ordained for their several offices (see under their several articles). Moses thus, i. e., by laying on of hands, appointed JOSHUA (which see) as his successor (Num. xxvii:18; Deut. xxxiv:9).

(2) Example of Christ. It is said of Christ, that he ordained twelve (Mark iii:14), that is, he chose them to the office of apostleship, as he himself explains it (John vi:70).

2. In the Apostolic Church. (1) Deacons. The first ordination was that of deacons. They were of the lowest order of ministering servants in the church. In character grave, not double tongued, not given to wine (Phil. i:1; 1 Tim. iii:10, 12, 13).

The office of deacons originally was to serve tables, the Lord's table, the table of the minister, and of the poor. They took care of the secular affairs of the church, received and disbursed moneys, kept the church's accounts, and provided everything necessary for its temporal good. Thus, while the bishop attended to the souls, the deacons attended to the bodies of the people; the pastor to the spiritual, and the deacons the temporal interests of the church (Acts vi). St. Paul was ordained by the action of the whole church (Acts xiii:1-3).

(2) Elders. Paul and Barnabas are said to ordain elders in every church (Acts xiv:23) or to choose them; that is, they gave orders and directions to every church as to the choice of elders over them. The word that is used in Acts xiv:23, is translated chosen in 2 Cor. viii:19, where the apostle speaks of a brother who was chosen of the churches to travel with us, and is so rendered when ascribed to God (Acts x:41). For further information see EPISCOPACY; PRESBYTER; PRESBYTERY.

OREB (ô'reb), (Heb. אֹרֵב, o-rabe'), written also Arab and Arabim, occurs in several passages of Scripture, in all of which it is translated willow in the Authorized, and most other modern versions.

There is little doubt of this being the correct interpretation, from its suitability to all the passages. Thus in Job xl:22, referring to behemoth it is said, 'The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows (orabim) of the brook compass him about.' So the Jews when in captivity sang, 'By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down; we hanged our harps upon the willows (orebim) in the midst thereof' (Ps. cxxxvii). And again, in Is. xlv:4, 'And they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows (orebim) of the water-courses.' The willow is as applicable as any other plant to the other passages, quoted above, in which orebim is mentioned. (See WILLOWS.) J. F. R.

OREB, ROCK OF (ô'reb, rôk ôv), (Heb. אֹרֵב, aw-robe', the raven's crag), the place at which Gideon slew Oreb (Judg. vii:25; Is. x:26), thought by some to be east of Jordan.

Keil and Delitzsch say (Com., in loc.) that it was "west of Jordan, where the Ephraimites had taken possession of the waters of the Jordan in front of the Midianites." It was, perhaps, near the point where the Wady Fârah in Ephraim falls into the Jordan (Moore); Osh el-Ghurab in Judah (Conder) seems too far south.

OREB and ZEEB (ô'reb and zē'eb), (Heb. אֹרֵב, o-rabe', raven; זֵעֵב, zeh-abe', wolf), the remarkable names (raven and wolf) of two emirs of the Midianites, who were made prisoners by the Ephraimites in attempting to recross the Jordan after the victory of Gideon.

They were put to death by the captors, and their heads carried as a trophy to the conqueror, who was then on the other side the Jordan (Judg. vii:25; viii:3). The first of these princes met his death near a rock, which thenceforth bore his name (Is. x:26); the other seems to have at first sought refuge in one of those excavations in which wines were preserved, and which was thenceforth called the winepress of Zeeb (Judg. vii:25).

"It is noticeable that Oreb and Zeeb are animal names, such as occur in the totem stage of society. In times when totemism prevailed, clans were often named after animals; so it has been suggested that Oreb and Zeeb were names of Midianite clans (Stade, GVI i. 189): if they were individuals, the names would belong to the stage when the totem tribe was passing into a national organization of society (Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 114)." (G. A. Cooke, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

OREN (ôren), (Heb. אֹרֵן, ô'ren, ash tree).

1. This word is variously translated; but from the manner in which it is introduced, it is impossible to determine whether any of the translations are correct. The oren is mentioned with other trees, of whose timber idols were made, in Is. xlv:14: 'He heweth him down cedars (cres) and taketh the cypress (tirshah), and the oak (allon), which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest; he planteth an ash (oren), and the rain doth nourish it.' Though the English version renders it ash, others consider pine-tree to be the correct translation; but for neither does there appear to be any decisive proof, nor for the rubus or bramble, adopted for oren in the fable of the Cedar and Rubus, translated from the Hebrew of R. Berchia Hannakdan, by Celsius (Hierobot., i. 186). (See CYPRESS; OAK.) J. F. R.

2. Third son of Jerahmeel, of the house of Judah (1 Chron. ii:25). (B. C. before 1658.)

OR EVER (Heb. אֶרֶב, law), (Dan. vi:24), before, ere, (Ps. xc:2) "before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world."

It is used also in the sense of either. 1 Sam. xxvi:10. "or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish." It is now obsolete except in poetry.

ORGAN (ôr'gan), (Gen. iv:21; Job xxi:12; xxx:31; Ps. cl:4). This word is from the Heb. אֹרְגָן, o-orgawb', which means that which is inflated or blown, and is applied to the reed, either simple or complex. (See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.)

ORION (ô-rî'ôn), (Heb. אֹרְיֹן, kes-cel', strong), the southern constellation seen in November. (See ASTRONOMY.)

ORNAMENT (ôr'nâ-ment), (Hebrew generally זָרָה , ad-ee', trapping).

1. The fondness which the human race in general, and Oriental nations in particular, have for personal ornaments was shared in by the ancient Hebrews. The Bible abounds in references to the appreciation of ornaments. The first mention of jewelry is in Gen. xxiv:22, where Abraham's servant presented Rebekah with earrings and bracelets. The weakness of Hebrew women for jewelry is well brought out (Jer. ii:32): "Can a maid forget her ornaments?" The ornaments worn by the Hebrews consisted of bracelets, necklaces, earrings, noserings (Ezek. xvi:11, 12, etc.; Is. iii:16-25), gives a graphic picture of the fashionable woman of his day and her ornaments.

2. One of the eminent services rendered by Assyrian and Egyptian archæology has been the revelation of the wonderful proficiency to which these nations had attained in the cutting and setting of gems, and in the designing of gold and silver ornaments. In the Arabian Nights there is constant allusion to the beautiful clothes worn by the heroes and heroines whose exploits are recorded. Lucian, in his Dialogues of the Dead ('The Pagan Olympus'), contrasts the gorgeous appearance of the Oriental divinities with the simple elegance of the Greek images. The tendency to excess in ornament led Milton to describe the East as the home of 'barbaric pearl and gold' (Par. Lost, ii. 4). (G. M. Mackie, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

3. The laying aside of ornaments appears as a sign of mourning in Exod. xxxiii:4.

Figurative. (1) The laws, religion, and prosperity, which God gave the Hebrews, are called "excellent ornaments;" they rendered their nation distinguished from, and more glorious than others (Ezek. xvi:7, 11). (2) Useful instruction and faithful reproof are "an ornament;" they ought to be highly prized, readily received and complied with; and so will render one truly honorable and respected (Prov. i:9; xxv:12). (3) The apostles exhort the women of their day to adorn themselves with good works (1 Tim. ii:10), and with a meek and quiet spirit rather than with the wearing of gold (1 Pet. iii:4).

ORNAN (ôr'nân), (Heb. אֲרָנָן , or-nân', strong), a form of the name ARAUNAH OR ORNAN (1 Chron. xxi:15, 18, 20-25, 28; 2 Chron. iii:1).

OROR, or ARAR (ôr'or, or ar'ar), (Heb. אֲרָר , ar-o-ayr'), occurs in two or three places of Scripture, and has been variously translated, as myrica, tamarisk, and tamarin.

As far as the context is concerned, some of these plants, as the retam and tamarisk, would answer very well; but the Arabic name, arar, is applied to a totally different plant, a species of juniper, as has been clearly shown by Celsius (Hierobot. p. ii, p. 195), who states that Arias Montanus is the only one who has so translated the Hebrew arar or oror (Jer. xvii:6). Several species of juniper are no doubt found in Syria and Palestine, as has already been mentioned under the head of ERES. Robinson met with some in proceeding from Hebron to Wady Musa, near the romantic pass of Nemela.

It is mentioned in the same situations by other travelers, and is no doubt common enough, particularly in wild, uncultivated, and often inaccessible situations, and is thus suitable to Jer. xlviii:6: 'Flee, save your lives, and be like the heath (oror) in the wilderness.' (See HEATH; JUNIPER.) J. F. R.

OROTH (ôr'oth), (Heb. אֲרוֹת , o-raw'), is translated herb in the Authorized Version; it is generally supposed to indicate such plants as are employed for food.

With respect to the meaning of oroth, Rosenmüller says that it occurs in its original and general signification in Is. xxvi:19, viz.: green herbs. The future restoration of the Hebrew people is there announced under the type and figure of a revival of the dead. 'Thy dew is a dew of green herbs,' says the prophet, i. e. as by the dew, green herbs are revived, so shalt thou, being revived by God's strengthening power, flourish again. The passage, however, appears an obscure one, with respect to the meaning of oroth Celsius has, with his usual learning, shown that mallows were much employed as food in ancient times. Of this there can be no doubt, but there is no proof adduced that oroth means mallows.

But it appears to us that oroth should be considered only in conjunction with pakyoth; for we find in 2 Kings iv that when Elisha came again to Gilgal, and there was a dearth in the land, he said unto his servant, 'Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets (verse 39); and one went out into the field to gather herbs (oroth), and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds (pakyoth) his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage, for they knew them not.' From this it would appear that pakyoth had been mistaken for oroth; and as the former is universally acknowledged to be the fruit of one of the gourd tribe, so it is not unreasonable to conclude that oroth also was the fruit of some plant, for which the pakyoth had been mistaken. (See GRASS; HERBS, BITTER; LENTIL.) J. F. R.

ORPAH (ôr'pah), (Heb. אֲרָפָה , or-paw', fawn, or mane), daughter-in-law of Naomi, who remained behind among her kindred in Moab, when Ruth returned with Naomi to Bethlehem (Ruth i:4-14). (See RUTH.)

ORPHAN (ôr'fan), (Heb. יָתוּם , yaw-thome', lonely, Lam. v:3), one deprived of one or both parents.

Special privileges were accorded to the orphan by the Mosaic Law, as well as to the widow and stranger (Deut. xxiv:21), and special kindness and leniency enjoined toward them (Deut. xxiv:17). Job adduced it as one of his merits that he had helped the fatherless (ch. xxix:12, etc.). James, ch. i:27, classes the visitation of orphans amongst the acts of pure and undefiled religion. The word (John xiv:18), translated "comfortless" is "orphans" in the Greek.

OSEE (ô'zee), (Gr. Ὠσή , oh-say-ee'), a form of HOSEA (Rom. ix:25).

OSHEA (o-shê'à), (Heb. אֲשֵׁיָהוּ , ho-shay'ah, deliverer), a form of JOSHUA, son of Nun (Num. xiii:8).

OSPREY (ôs'prâ), (Heb. אֲרָפָה , oz-nee-yaw'), the fish eagle, Pandion haliaetus, L., an unclean bird; the breaker, bone breaker. (See AZANIAH.)

OSSIFRAGE (ôs'sî-frâj), (Heb. פֶּה'רֵס , peh'res), the lammergeier, Gypætus barbatus, L., the largest of the vultures of the Holy Land.

The original word well suits the remarkable habits of the lammergeier, or bearded vulture, known also among the Alps, and one of the most formidable birds of its tribe. It is mentioned with the osprey, as above. The propriety of the name "ossi-frage"—i. e., "bone-breaker"—is seen from the following description: "Marrow-bones are the dainties he (the lamuergcier) loves the best; and when the other vultures have picked the flesh off any animal, he comes in at the end of the feast and swallows the bones, or breaks them and swallows the pieces if he cannot get the Ossifrage (Gypsetus barbatus).

marrow out otherwise. The bones he cracks by taking them to a great height and letting them fall upon a stone. This is probably the bird that dropped a tortoise on the bald head of poor old Æschylus. Not, however, that he restricts himself, or the huge black infant that he and his mate are bringing up in one of the many holes with which the limestone precipice abounds, to marrow, turtle, bones, and similar delicacies; neither lamb, hare, nor kid comes amiss to him, though, his power of claw and beak being feeble for so large a bird, he cannot tear his meat like other eagles. To make amends for this, his powers of deglutition are enormous." (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

N. H. Simpson.

It is diffused throughout the mountains of northern Europe, Asia, and northern Africa. It breeds on inaccessible cliffs. The female lays one egg, which is hatched in February. (See VULTURE.)

OSTRICH (ôs'trîch), (Heb. אֲרָנָה, yaw-ane', also אֲרָנָה, no-tsaw' flying, Job xxxix:13).

The ostrich is frequently mentioned in the Bible in terms of great beauty and precision; which commentators, perhaps more conversant with the exploded misstatements of the ancients than with the true physiological history of the bird in question, have not been happy in explaining, sometimes referring it to wrong species, such as the peacock, or mistaking it for the stork, the eagle, or the bustard (Lev. xi:19; Deut. xiv:15; Job xxx:29; xxxix:13; Is. xiii:21; xxxiv:13; xliii:20; Jer. l:39; Lam. iv:3; Micah i:8). In several of these passages 'owls' has been used in our version for yaw-ane', now generally admitted to mean 'ostriches.'

(1) Two Varieties. There are two varieties, if not two species, of the ostrich; one never attaining seven feet in height, and covered chiefly with gray and dingy feathers; the other sometimes growing to more than ten feet, and of a glossy black plumage; the males in both having the great feathers of the wings and tail white, but the females the tail only of that color. Their dimensions render them both the largest animals of the feathered creation now existing. They appear promiscuously in Asia and Africa, but the troops or coveys of each are always separate; the gray is more common in the south, while the black, which grows largest in Caffraria, predominates to the north of the Equator. The common-sized ostrich weighs about eighty pounds.

(2) Habits. Ostriches are gregarious—from families consisting of a male with one or several female birds, and perhaps a brood or two of young, up to troops of nearly a hundred. They keep aloof from the presence of water in the wild and arid desert, mixing without hesitation among herds of gnu, wild asses, quaggas, and other striped Equidae, and the larger species of Antilopidae. From the nature of their food, which consists of seeds and vegetables, although seldom or never in want of drink it is evident that they must often approach more productive regions, which, by means of the great rapidity of motion they possess, is easily accomplished; and they are consequently known to be very destructive to cultivated fields. As the organ of taste is very obtuse in these birds, they swallow with little or no discrimination all kinds of substances, and among others stones; it is also probable that, like poultry, they devour lizards, snakes, and the young of birds that fall in their way.

Ostrich.

(3) The Nest. It is not yet finally decided whether the two species are polygamous, though concurrent testimony seems to leave no doubt of the fact: there is, however, no uncertainty respecting the nest, which is merely a circular basin scraped out of the soil, with a slight elevation at the border, and sufficiently large to contain a great number of eggs; for from twelve to about sixty have been found in them, exclusive of a certain number, always observed to be outlying, or placed beyond the raised border of the nest, and amounting apparently to nearly one-third of the whole. These are supposed to feed the young brood when first hatched, either in their fresh state, or in a corrupted form, when the substance in them has produced worms. These eggs are of different periods of laying, like those within, and the birds hatched form only a part of the contents of a nest, until the breeding season closes. The eggs are of different sizes, some attaining to seven inches in their longer diameter, and others less, having a dirty white shell, finely speckled with rust color; and their weight borders on three pounds. Within the tropics they are kept sufficiently warm not to require incubation, but in colder climates one or more females sit constantly, and the male bird takes that duty himself after the sun is set. It is then that the short roar may be heard during darkness; and at other times different sounds are uttered, likened to the cooing of pigeons, the cry of a hoarse child, and the hissing of a goose; no doubt expressive of different emotions.

(4) Uses. Though at first sight useless, except for their beautiful plumes, we may be assured that Providence has not appointed their abode in the desert in vain; and they still continue to exist, not only in Africa, but in the region of Arabia, east and south of Palestine beyond the Euphrates; but it may be a question whether they extend so far to the eastward as Goa, although that limit is assigned them by late French ornithologists.

The flesh of a young ostrich is said to be not unpalatable; but its being declared unclean in Mosaic legislation may be ascribed to a twofold cause. The first is sufficiently obvious from its indiscriminate voracity already mentioned, and the other may have been an intention to lay a restriction upon the Israelites in order to wean them from the love of a nomad life, which hunting in the desert would have fostered; for ostriches must be sought on the barren plains, where they are not accessible on foot, except by stratagem. When pursued, they cast stones and gravel behind them with great force; and though it requires long endurance and skill, their natural mode of fleeing in a circular form enables well mounted Arabs to overtake and slay them.

C. H. S.

Figurative. (1) The Arabs sometimes discover whole nests of ostrich eggs undisturbed: some of them are sweet and good, others are addled and corrupted; others again contain young ones of different growth, according to the time, it may be presumed, they have been forsaken by the dam. The Arabs often find little ostriches no bigger than well-grown pullets, half-starved, straggling about and moaning like so many distressed orphans for their mother. In this manner the ostrich may be said to be hardened against her young ones as though they were not hers. This want of affection is recorded in Lam. iv:3: 'the daughter of my people is become cruel, like ostriches in the wilderness;' that is, by deserting their own, and receiving others instead. (2) As to companionship the ostrich (Job xxx:29, marg.) is a figure of extreme desolation; taken from the isolated life of that bird in the desert.

OTHNI (ōth'nī), (Heb. אֹתְנִי, oth-nee', forcible), the first of the six sons of Shemaiah, and a porter in the tabernacle (1 Chron. xxvi:7). B. C. about 1013.

OTHNIEL (ōth'nī-el), (Heb. אֹתְנִיֵּל, oth-nee-ale', lion of God), first judge of Israel, son of Kenaz, the younger brother of Caleb, whose daughter Achsah he obtained in marriage by his daring valor at the siege of Debir (Josh. xv:17; Judg. i:13; 1 Chron. iv:13).

Rendered famous among his countrymen by this exploit, and connected by a twofold tie with one of the only two Israelites of the former generation who had not died in the desert, we are prepared for the fact that on him devolved the mission to deliver Israel from the Mesopotamian oppression under which, in punishment for their sins, they fell after the death of Joshua and of the elders who outlived him (Judg. iii:9). This victory secured to Israel a peace of forty years. For the chronology, etc., of this period see JUDGES.

OUCHES (ouch'es), (Heb. אֲבָבִים, mish-bets-aw', twisting), sockets for fastening the precious stones in the shoulder-piece of the high-priest's ephod.

These ouches, with their stones, served for buttons to fasten the golden chains whereby the breastplate was hung (Exod. xxviii:11, 25). (See PRIEST, HEBREW PRIESTHOOD.)

OUTCASTS (out'kăsts), (Heb. אֲבָבִים, daw-khaw').

Figurative. (1) The "outcasts" of Israel and Judah needed shelter and pity in the land of Moab, when they were driven out of their country by the Assyrian ravages (Is. xvi:3, 4). (2) The "outcasts" of the Persians wandered far and wide, when they were carried or driven from their country by the Chaldeans (Jer. xlix:36). (3) God "gathereth the outcasts of Israel;" he gathered the Jews after Sennacherib and Esarhaddon had scattered them; he brought them back from their Chaldean captivity; he will bring them from their present dispersion; he gathers the "outcast" Gentiles, and joins them unto his church, with all the true Israel of God (Is. lvi:8, 11, 12). (Brown, Bib. Dict.)

OUTGOINGS (out'gō-ings), the utmost borders, Josh. xvii:9, 18.

Figurative. God makes the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, when he bestows and renders agreeable the earliest and latest parts of the day; or when he gives heart-cheering blessings to the inhabitants of the remotest eastern and western nations (Ps. lxxv:8).

OUTLANDISH (out-lănd'ish), (Heb. נֹכְרִי, no-ree', Neh. xiii:26), foreign, pertaining to another country or nation, as the women of other nations who caused Solomon to sin.

OUTMOST (out'mōst), (Heb. אֲחֵרִית, kay'tseh, Deut. xxx:4), uttermost.

OUTRAGEOUS (out-ră'jūs), (Heb. שָׁוֵא, shaw-taf', to gush out, Prov. xxvii:4), hence the metaphorical saying: "Anger is an outpouring."

OVEN (ūv'n), (Heb. כִּיּוּן, tan-noor', fire pot; Greek κλίβανος, klib-an-os, earthen pot).

The Bedouin Arabs use three or four different ovens, the description of which may throw some light upon the oven of the Bible.

(1) Sand Oven. This is nothing more than the sand of the earth, upon which a fire is made until it is supposed to be sufficiently heated. The fuel and fire are then cleared away, and the dough is laid on the hot sand in flat pieces about the thickness of a plate (Is. xlv:15, 19). These are the "ash-cakes" (Gen. xviii:6; 1 Kings xvii:13; xix:6). (See BREAD.)

(2) Earth Oven. The earth oven is a round hole in the earth. Stones are first put into this, and a fire is kindled upon them. When the stones have become thoroughly hot, the fire is removed and the dough spread in thin flakes upon the heated stones, and turned as often as may be necessary. The ovens used in Persia are about two and a half feet wide and not less than five or six feet deep. They resemble pits or wells, and sheep are hung lengthwise in them and cooked whole. These may be what are rendered in our version "ranges for pots" (Lev. xi:35).

Portable Oven.

(3) Portable Oven. This is an earthen vessel without a bottom, about three feet high, smeared outside and inside with clay and placed upon a frame or support. Fire is made within it or below it. When the sides are sufficiently heated thin patches of dough are spread on the inside, and the top is covered without removing the fire, as in the other cases, and the bread is quickly baked. To this we may refer the phrase "baked in the oven" (Lev. ii:4). Convex plates of iron, pans or plates, flat stones, etc., are often used for baking. (See BREAD; FURNACE.) (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

Figurative. (1) God makes his enemies a "fiery oven," and his judgments "burn as an oven" (Ps. xxi:9; Mal. iv:1). (2) Hosea compares adulterers and unclean persons to a heated oven (chapter vii:4, 6, 7). (3) "Ten women shall bake your bread in one oven" (Lev. xxvi:26) is a figurative expression for scarcity; for in ordinary times each woman would have enough baking for an oven of her own. (4) "Our skin was black like an oven" (Lam. v:10). As an oven is scorched and blackened with fire, so hunger dries, shrivels the skin until it becomes as if scorched by the sun.

OVERCHARGED (ō-vēr-chärjd'), (Greek, βαρύνω, bar-oo'no, Luke xxi:34; 2 Cor. ii:5), overburdened.

Thus, excessive sorrow, immoderate eating and drinking, or worldly care, overload men's souls, that they cannot desire or attain heavenly things (Luke xii:34; 2 Cor. ii:5).

OVERLIVE (ō-vēr-liv'), (Heb. אָרַק, aw-rak', Josh. xxiv:31), to outlive, survive.

OVERPASS (ō-vēr-päs'), (Heb. אָבַר, aw-bar', Jer. v:28), to pass over, neglect.

Professors of the true religion "overpass the deeds of the wicked," when they do worse than unbelievers. Judges do it, when they allow themselves to be worse than the criminals they condemn at the bar (Jer. v:28).

OVERPLUS (ō-vēr-plüs), (Heb. אָדַף, aw-daf', surplus), the difference of value between things exchanged (Lev. xxv:27). "Our overplus of shipping we will burn."—Shakespeare.

OVERRUN (ō-vēr-rün), (Heb. אָבַר, aw-bar', 2 Sam. xviii:23), to outrun.

OVERSEERS (ō-vēr-sē'ērs), (Gr. ἐπισκοπος, epi-skop-os, Acts xx:28).

This term denotes the pastor of a congregation of Christians, and is identical with presbyter or elder (comp. verse 17). The same Greek word is elsewhere translated "bishop." (See BISHOP; EPISCOPACY.)

OWL (oul), (Heb. לַיְלִי, lee-leeth', and כּוֹעַ, kocē).

Two other Hebrew names have been likewise assigned in our versions to presumed species of owls; namely, יָנֹשֶׁף, yan-shofe' (twilight), which, although it must be confessed that in common Hebrew it indicates the owl, we have endeavored to show is applied more particularly to the night-heron, Ardea nicticorax (see IBIS); and קִפּוֹד, kip-pocē', either the same or confounded, as it appears, with kip-pod, which has led to much controversy, and caused one or the other to be referred to six or seven animals, all widely different, for they include owl, osprey, bittern, hedgehog or porcupine, otter (?), and tortoise. Our reasons for applying kip-pod to the bittern will be found in KIPPOD.

Eagle Owl (Bubo Maximus).

There are noticed in Egypt and Syria three well-known species of the genus Strix, or owl:—Strix bubo, 'the great-eared owl'; Strix flammea, the common barn owl; and Strix passerina, the little owl. In this list Strix otus, the long-eared owl, Strix brachyotus or ulula, the short-eared owl, known nearly over the whole earth, and Strix orientalis of Hasselquist, are not included, and several other species of these wandering birds, both of Africa and Asiatic regions, occur in Palestine. The barn owl is still sacred in Northern Asia. The eagle-owl, or great-eared owl, Strix bubo, we do not find in ornithological works as an inhabitant of Syria, though no doubt it is an occasional winter visitant; nor the smaller species, Bubo Atheniensis of Gmelin, which may be a rare but permanent resident, probably also visiting Egypt. It is not, however, we believe, that species, but the Otus ascalaphus of Cuvier, which is common in Egypt, and which in all probability is the type of the innumerable representations of an eared owl in hieroglyphical inscriptions.

Next we have Strix ulula, Strix brachyotus, or short-eared owl, likewise found in Egypt and Arabia, as well as to the north of Syria, a bold pugnacious bird, residing in ruined buildings, mistaken by commentators for the screech-owl, Strix stridula, and most probably the lecleth, or screech owl, of the Bible (Is. xxxiv:14). The spectral species, again, confounded with the goatsucker, is, we believe, Strix coromanda (see NIGHT HAWK, and the same as Strix orientalis of Hasselquist. C. H. S.

Athene Meridionalis.

OX (ֶֹ), (Heb. שׁוֹר, shore, in a collective sense, cattle). The rendering of Heb. שׁוֹרֵי, baw-kaww', which is also generic for bovines; bak-aw-raw', with the feminine ending, signifies the cow.

Having already noticed the domestic beeves under BULL (to which article we refer), the few words added here will apply to the breeds of Western Asia and the manner of treating them.

(1) Early Uses. The earliest pastoral tribes appear to have had domesticated cattle in the herd; and judging from the manners of South Africa, where we find nations still retaining in many respects primeval usages, it is likely that the patriarchal families, or at least their moyables, were transported on the backs of oxen in the manner which the Kaffirs still practice, as also the Gwallahs and grain-merchants in India, who come down from the interior with whole droves bearing burdens.

(2) Various Breeds. The breeds of Egypt were various, differing in the length and flexures of the horns. There were some with long horns, others with short, and even with none, while a hunched race of Nubia reveals an Indian origin, and indicates that at least one of the nations on the Upper Nile had come from the valleys of the Ganges; for it is to the east of the Indus alone that that species is to be found whose original stock appears to be the mountain yak (Bos grunniens).

The domestic buffalo was unknown to Western Asia and Egypt till after the Arabian conquest; it is now common in the last-mentioned region and far to the south, but not beyond the equator; and from structural differences it may be surmised that there was in early ages a domesticated distinct species of this animal in Africa. In Syria and Egypt the present races of domestic cattle are somewhat smaller than the large breeds of Europe, and those of Palestine appear to be of at least two forms, both with short horns and both used to the plow, one being tall and lanky, the other more compact; and we possess pictures of the present Egyptian cattle with long horns bent down and forwards. From Egyptian pictures it is to be inferred that large droves of fine cattle were imported from Abyssinia, and that in the valley of the Nile they were in general stall-fed, used exclusively for the plough, and treated humanely. In Palestine the Mosaic law provided with care for the kind treatment of cattle; for in treading out corn—the Oriental mode of separating the grain from the straw—it was enjoined that the ox should not be muzzled (Deut. xxv:4), and old cattle that had long served in tillage were often suffered to wander at large till their death—a practice still in vogue, though from a different motive, in India. But the Hebrews and other nations of Syria grazed their domestic stock, particularly those tribes which, residing to the east of the Jordan, had fertile districts for that purpose. Here, of course, the droves became shy and wild; and though we are inclined to apply the passage in Ps. xxii:12, to wild species, yet old bulls, roaming at large in a land where the lion still abounded, no doubt became fierce; and as they would obtain cows from the pastures, there must have been feral breeds in the woods, as fierce and resolute as real wild Uri—which ancient name may be a mere modification of Reem. (See REEM.) C. H. S.

Most of the cattle of the Holy Land at present are of inferior breeds. Probably this is but a part of the degeneracy of the country. The best races of animals would thrive there, and even now one sometimes sees fine specimens of horned cattle. (See BEASTS; BULL.)

Figurative. (1) To "send forth the feet of the ox and the ass" (Is. xxxii:20) to let the feet of the ox and the ass go to and fro in freedom, is a figure of great plenteousness, inasmuch as the cattle would not have to be watched lest they should stray into the fields of grain. (2) Where no oxen are, the crib is clean; i. e. there is food for neither man nor beasts. But the words, the crib, etc., might be rendered, there is no wheat or corn on the thrashing-floor (Prov. xiv:4). (3) In Cor. ix:9, the oxen not muzzled in treading out the corn is figurative of a minister's right to support. (4) A rash youth is like an ox led to the slaughter; he is thoughtlessly and easily decoyed, and tempted to that which ruins him (Prov. vii:22); or it may signify the saints under persecution (Jer. xi:19). (5) A stalled and fatted ox is used to express the most sumptuous and delicate provision (Prov. xv:17). (6) "As the ox licketh up the grass" (Num. xxii:4) is a figure of easy victory. (7) For an "ox to low over his fodder" (Job vi:5) is to complain without cause.

OXGOAD (ֶֹ'gōd). See GOAD.

OZEM (ֶֹ'zem), (Heb. זֶמֶן, o'tsem, strength).

1. Son of Jesse (1 Chron. ii:15).

2. The son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii:25).

OZIAS (ֶֹ'zi'as), (Gr. Ὀζίας, od-zee'as), a Greek form of UZZIAH (Matt. i:8, 9).

OZNI (ֶֹ'ni), (Heb. זְנִי, oz-nee', eared, i. e., attentive), the fourth son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi:16). He is called EZBON (Gen. xlv:16).

OZNITES (ֶֹ'nites), (Heb. זְנִיָּם, oz-nee'), members of the family founded by Ozni (Num. xxvi:16).

P

PAARAI (pā'a-rāi), (Heb. פֶּאֵרַי, pah-ar-ah'ee, yawning), an "Arbite," and one of David's mighty warriors (2 Sam. xxiii:35), more correctly called Naarai (1 Chron. xi:37).

PACATIANA (pāk'a-ti'an-ā), (Gr. πακατιανή, pak-at-ee-an-ay'), subscription to 1 Tim.

In the fourth century before Christ Phrygia was divided into Phrygia Salutaris and Phrygia Pacatiana (later Capatiana); Laodicea was the metropolis of the latter. (Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

PACE (pās), (Heb. פֶּסַע, tsah'ad, a step), an approximate measure of length, a stride (2 Sam. vi:13). (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

PADAN (pā'dan), (Heb. פֶּדָן, pad dawn, field), a form of Padan-aram (Gen. xlviii:7). (See ARAM.)

PADAN-ARAM (pā'dan-ā'ram), (Heb. פְּדָן אֲרָם, pad-dawn' ar-awm', the table-land of Aram), the name given to the country from which Isaac obtained Rebekah (Gen. xxv:20). (See ARAM.) Gen. xxv:20; xxviii:2, 5, 7, from whence Jacob secured his wives, and where Laban lived; Gen. xxxi:18; xxxiii:18; xxxv:9, 26; xli:15.

Padan-aram has usually been identified with Mesopotamia, the region between the two great rivers Euphrates and Tigris, and is believed more particularly to designate the plain, in distinction from the mountainous district, in the north of Mesopotamia. Another theory in respect to the location of Padan-aram has been advocated at various periods, to which attention has been directed of late by Dr. Merrill and Prof. Paine. They suggest that Milton places Haran (and of course Padan-aram) south or west of the Euphrates, and Dr. Beke (1845) wrote a learned work to prove that Padan-aram was in the vicinity of Damascus. This view, however, is opposed by the great majority of the most eminent scholars, and has too few facts in its favor to give it much importance. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) (See ARAM; MESOPOTAMIA AND SYRIA.)

PADDLE (pād'dl), (Heb. פֶּדַי, yaw-thade', peg, a tentpin, Judg. iv:21; a small spade, Deut. xxiii:13).

PADON (pā'don), (Heb. פֶּדוֹן, padw-done, deliverance).

The founder of a family of Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:44; Neh. vii:47). (B. C. before 520.)

PAGIEL (pā'gi-el), (Heb. פַּגְיֵל, pag-ee-ale', God meets).

Son of Ocran and chief of the tribe of Asher in the wilderness (Num. i:13; ii:27; vii:72, 77; x:26). (B. C. 1658.)

PAHATH-MOAB (pā'hath-mō'ab), (Heb. פַּחַת מוֹאָב, pakh'ath mo-awb', pit or governor of Moab).

The founder of a family which returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:6; viii:4; Neh. vii:11). (B. C. 410.) Some of them had married foreign wives, whom they divorced (Ezra x:30). The family was represented in the sealing of the covenant with Nehemiah, and Hashub, one of the family, helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. x:14; iii:11, 23).

PAI (pā'i), (Heb. פֶּי, pa-w-ee', bleating, 1 Chron. i:50). (See PAU.)

PAIN, PAINED (pān, pānd), (Gr. βασανίζω, bas-an-id'zo, Rev. xii:2), suffering in labor, pain or sorrow.

Pain, or pang, denotes the uneasiness arising to body or mind from what hurts it. When it is very violent, it is called torment (Job xxxiii:19; Ps. xxv:18; lv:4; Jer. xxii:23; Ezek. xxx:4; Matt. iv:24). Figuratively, to "travel in pain" all one's day, is to live in sore trouble, inward disquiet, and terror of mind (Job xv:20).

PAINFULNESS (pān'ful - nēs), (Gr. μόχθος, mokh'phos, 2 Cor. xi:27), difficult labor, hardship, toilsomeness, distress. In Job xvi:2 the Heb. פֶּמֶל, aw-mawl', is connected with comforters. In 1 Thess. ii:9; 2 Thess. iii:8 it is rendered 'travail,' and that is accordingly the rendering of R. V. here also.

PAINT (pānt), (Heb. פֶּוֹק, fook, dye), (Jer. xxii:14), a mixture of antimony, zinc and oil for making a black ring around the eyelids.

The Jews seem to have looked upon the custom as unbecoming a woman of high reputation (2 Kings ix:30; Jer. iv:30; Ezek. xxiii:40). (See EYE.)

Painting as a decoration was much practiced. In the houses the walls and beams were colored (Jer. xxii:14); also idols, either in the form of sculptures or in the form of drawings on the walls of temples, were colored (Wisd. xiii:14; Ezek. xxiii:14). But pictures, in the modern sense of the word, as products of free art, were unknown to the ancient Jews, and would perhaps have been regarded as violations of the second commandment. The drawings upon mummy cases were, however, doubtless familiar to them.

PAKYOTH (pak'y-ōth), (Heb. פַּקְיוֹת, pak-koo-aw').

It is related in 2 Kings iv:38-40, that Elisha having come again to Gilgal, when there was a famine in the land, and many sons of the prophets were assembled there, he ordered his servant to prepare for them a dish of vegetables: 'One went out into the field to gather herbs (oroth), and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds (pakyoth sadeh) his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage, for they knew them not.' 'So they poured out for the men to eat; but as they were eating of the pottage, they cried out, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot; and they could not eat thereof.' From this it appears that the servant mistook the fruit of one plant, pakyoth, for something else, called oroth, and that the former was vine-like, that is, with long, weak, slender stems, and that the fruit had some remarkable taste, by which the mistake was discovered whenever the pottage was tasted. Though a few other plants have been indicated, the pakyoth has almost universally been supposed to be one of the family of the gourd or cucumber-like plants, several of which are conspicuous for their bitterness, and a few poisonous, while others, it is well known, are edible. The name is supposed to be derived from paka, 'to crush,' or 'to burst;' and this is the characteristic of the species called the wild cucumber by the ancients.

The bitterness which was probably perceived on eating of the pottage, and which disappeared on the addition of meal, is found in many of the cucumber tribe, and conspicuously in the species which have been usually selected as the pakyoth, that is, the Colocynthis (Cucumis Colocynthis). In the Arabic version, honzal (which is the Colocynthis) is used as the synonym for pakyoth in 2 Kings iv:39. The Globe cucumber derives its specific name (Cucumis prophetarum) from the notion that it afforded the gourd which "the sons of the prophets" shred by mistake into their pottage, and which made them declare, when they came to taste it, that there was "death in the pot." This plant is smaller in every part than the common melon, and has a nauseous odor, while its fruit is to the full as bitter as the Coloquintida. The fruit has a rather singular appearance, from the manner in which its surface is armed with prickles, which are, however, soft and harmless (Pictorial Palestine; Physical Geog. p. cclxxxix). But this plant, though it is nauseous and bitter as the Colocynthis, yet the fruit not being bigger than a cherry, does not appear likely to have been that which was shred into the pot. Celsius, however, was of opinion that the Cucumis agrestis of the Ancients, and which was found by Belon in descending from Mount Sinai, was the plant. This, he says, is the Olera asini of the Hebrews, the Chate al hemar of the Arabs, and the Cucumis asininus of the druggists of his day. This plant is now called Momordica elaterium, or Squirting Cucumber, and is a well known drastic purgative, violent enough in its action to be considered even a poison. Its fruit is ovate, obtuse, and scabrous. But it is not easy to say whether this or the Colocynthis is most likely to have been the plant mistaken for oroth; but the fruit of this species might certainly be mistaken for young gherkins. Both are bitter and poisonous. (See CUCUMBER; GOURD; POTTAGE.) J. F. R.

PALACE (pāl'ās), (Heb. אֶרְמוֹן, ar-mone', to be elevated), a citadel; (Heb. בֵּרֶזֶל, bee-raw', a fortified palace, fortress).

In Scripture, it denotes what is contained within the outer enclosure of the royal residence, including all the buildings, courts, and gardens (2 Chron. xxxvi:19; comp. Ps. xlviii:3; cxvii:7; Prov. ix:3; xxx:28; Is. xxiii:13; xxv:2; Jer. xvii:27; Amos i:4, 7, 12; Nah. ii:6). In the New Testament the term palace (αὐλή) is applied to the residence of a man of rank (Matt. xxvi:3; Mark xiv:66; Luke xi:21; John xviii:15). The specific allusions are to the palace built by Herod, which was afterwards occupied by the Roman governors, and was the pretorium, or hall, which formed the abode of Pilate when Christ was brought before him (Mark xv:16); the other passages above cited, except Luke xi:21, refer to the residence of the high-priest.

The particulars which have been given under the article HOUSE (which see) require only to be aggrandized to convey a suitable idea of a palace; for the general arrangements and distribution of parts are the same in the palace as in the house, save that the courts are more numerous, and with more distinct appropriations, the buildings more extensive, and the materials more costly. The palace of the kings of Judah in Jerusalem was that built by Solomon, called 'the house of the forest of Lebanon,' of which some particulars are given in 1 Kings vii:1-12; and if read along with the description which Josephus gives of the same 'pile' (Antiq. v, 5), a faint idea may be formed of it, as a magnificent collection of buildings in adjoining courts, connected with and surrounded by galleries and colonnades.

Figurative. (1) The children of the righteous are compared to a palace (Ps. cxlvii:12). (2) Heaven is "the palace" of God and Christ; how glorious its structure! how rich its furniture! and there God, angels, and redeemed men forever reside (Ps. xlv:15).

PALAL (pā'la), (Heb. פָּאֵל, paw-law', a judge), a son of Uzar, who rebuilt a part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:25), B. C. 446.

PALESTINA (pāl'es-ti'nā), (Exod. xv:14; Is. xiv:29, 31). See PALESTINE.

PALESTINE (pāl'es-tīne). This name, usually applied to the country formerly inhabited by the Israelites, occurs only once (Joel iii:4) in the Old Testament. It is, however, derived from Philistia (Heb. פְּלִשְׁתִּים, pel-aw-sheth), or the country of the Philistines, which comprised the southern part of the coast plain of Canaan along the Mediterranean.

The word Philistia occurs in Exod. xiii:17; Ps. lx:8; lxxxiii:7; lxxxvii:4; cviii:9; Is. xiv:29, 31. From this arose the name Palestine (Παλαιστίνη), which was applied by most ancient writers, and even by Josephus (Antiq. i, 6, 2; ii, 15, 2; viii, 10, 3), to the whole land of the Israelites (see Reiland's Palestina, p. 38, sq.).

1. Names. The other names of the country may be given in the order of their occurrence in Scripture.

(1) Canaan. From Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, from whom the first inhabitants were descended. It is the most ancient name of the country, and is first found as such in Gen. xi:31. This denomination was confined to the country between the Mediterranean and the Jordan; for Exod. xvi:35 (comp. Josh. v:11, 12) shows that the Jordan was the eastern boundary of Canaan. This is also seen in Num. xxxiii:51; xxxiv:11, 12; (comp. Exod. xv:15). When the name Canaan was thus used with reference to the country west of the Jordan, the region east of that river was called the Land of Gilead (Deut. xxxiv:2; Josh. xxii:9, 11). In later times the term Canaan was understood to include Phœnicia (Is. xxiii:11; Matt. xv:21-22), and also the land of the Philistines.

(2) Land of Israel. This name was given to the whole country as distributed among and occupied by the tribes of Israel. The designation, Land of Israel, was never applied but to the aggregate possessions of the tribes as defined by the limits laid down when the distribution was made in the time of Joshua (Judg. xix:29; 1 Sam. xiii:19; Ezek. vii:2; Matt. ii:20, 21; γῆ Ἰσραήλ, land of Israel). In Ezek. xxvii:17, and other places, the land of Israel is considered as the territory of the ten tribes, forming the separate kingdom of Israel, as distinct from that of Judah. (See ISRAEL.)

(3) Land of Promise. So called as the land which God promised to the patriarchal fathers to bestow on their descendants (Gen. xv:18; I:24; Num. xxxii:1; comp. Heb. xi:9).

(4) Land of Jehovah. So called as being in a special and peculiar sense the property of Jehovah, who, as the sovereign proprietor of the soil, granted it to the Hebrews (Lev. xxv:23; Ps. lxxxv:1; Is. viii:8).

(5) The Holy Land. This name occurs only in Zech. ii:12. The land is here called 'Holy,' as being the Lord's property, and sanctified by his emple and worship: but Christians, in applying to it the same title, probably regard it more as the scene of the life, the travels, and the sufferings of Christ.

(6) Judah, Judæa. This name belonged at first to the territory of the tribe of Judah alone. After the separation of the two kingdoms, one of them took the name of Judah, which contained the territories both of that tribe and of Benjamin. After the Captivity, down to and after the time of Christ, Judæa was used in a loose way as a general name for the whole country of Palestine; but in more precise language, and with reference to internal distribution, it denoted nearly all the territories of the ancient kingdom, as distinguished from Samaria and Galilee on the west of the Jordan, and Peræa on the east. (See JUDAH.)

2. Divisions. The divisions of Palestine were different in different ages.

(1) In Patriarchal Times. In the time of the patriarchs the country was divided among the tribes or nations descended from the sons of Canaan. The precise locality of each nation is not, in every case, distinctly known; but our map exhibits the most probable arrangement.

(2) In the Time of Moses. When the Israelites were preparing to enter Canaan, the distribution of the nations on the west of the Jordan had undergone very little change; but, on the east of that river, we find the three principal territories to have been Bashan, in the north—that is to say, east and northeast of the lake Gennesareth; Gilead, in the middle; and, in the south, on the east of the Dead Sea, the Land of Moab. (See MOABITES.)

(3) After the Conquest the land was distributed by lot among the tribes. The particulars of this distribution will be best seen by reference to the map.

(4) After the Captivity. After the Captivity we hear very little of the territories of the tribes, for ten of them never returned to occupy their ancient domains.

(5) In the Time of Christ. In the time of Christ the country on the west of the Jordan was divided into the provinces of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. Galilee is a name which occurs repeatedly in the book of Joshua (xxi:32); and very often in the later history. It was applied to that part of Palestine north of the plain of Esdraelon or Jezreel. This province was divided into Lower or Southern, and Upper or Northern Galilee. The latter section was also denominated Galilee of the Gentiles (Matt. iv:15). Samaria occupied nearly the middle of Palestine; but, although it extended across the country, it did not come down to the seashore. Judæa, as a province, corresponded to the northern and western parts of the ancient kingdom of that name; but the southeastern portion formed the territory of Idumæa. On the other side of the Jordan the divisions were, at this time, more numerous and less distinct.

3. Peræa. The whole country, generally, was called Peræa, and was divided into eight districts or cantons, namely: (1) Peræa, in the more limited sense, which was the southernmost canton, extending from the river Arnon to the river Jabbok. (2) Gilead, north of the Jabbok, and highly populous. (3) Decapolis, or the district of ten cities, which were Scythopolis or Bethshan (on the west side of the Jordan), Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia (formerly Rabbath), Dium, Canatha, Gerasa, Raphana, and, perhaps, Damascus: but there is not much certainty with regard to the ten cities from which the region had its name. (4) Gaulonitis, extending to the northeast of the Upper Jordan and of the lake of Gennesareth. (5) Batanæa, the ancient Bashan, but less extensive, east of the lake of Gennesareth. (6) Auranitis, also called Ituræa, and known to this day by the old name of Hauran (Ezek. xlvii:16-18), to the north of Batanæa and the east of Gaulonitis. (7) Trachonitis, extending to the north of Gaulonitis, and east from Paneas (Cæsarea Philippi), and the sources of the Jordan, where it was separated from Galilee (Luke iii:1). (8) Abilene, in the extreme north, among the mountains of Anti-Libanus, between Baalbec and Damascus. The more important of these names have been noticed under their several heads.

4. Situation and Boundaries. Palestine is the southwestern part of Syria, extending from the mountains of Lebanon to the borders of Egypt.

(1) Location. It lies about midway between the equator and the polar circle, to which happy position it owes the fine medium climate which it possesses. Its length is embraced between 30° 40' and 33° 32' of north latitude, and between 33° 45' of east longitude in the southwest, and 35° 48' in the northeast. The breadth may be taken at an average of sixty-five miles, the extreme width being about 100 miles. The length, from Mount Hermon in the north, to which the territory of Manasseh beyond the Jordan extended (Josh. xiii:11), to Kadesh-barnea in the south, to which the territory of Judah reached, was 180 miles.

Palestine may be regarded as embracing an area of almost 11,000 square miles, which is somewhat more than is usually given to it. But the real surface is much greater than this estimate and these comparisons would imply; for Palestine being essentially a hilly country, the sides of the mountains and the slopes of the hills enlarge the available surface to an extent which does not admit of calculation (Physical Geog., p. xxviii: in Kitto's Pictorial Hist. of Palestine). The clearest description of its boundary lines is that contained in Num. xxxiv.

(2) The Southern Boundary. The text (Num. xxxiv:3, 5) we read thus: 'Your south border shall be at the wilderness of Zin adjoining to Edom, and your south border shall be at the utmost point of the great sea southward.' There is here a general description of the line, namely, that it extends from the desert of Zin (Wady Arabah), at a point not stated, to the Mediterranean, at a point also not stated. Then in the following verses the writer returns to state the particulars of this same boundary line: 'Your south border shall wind by the ascent of Akrabim' (at the end of the Dead Sea), and pass on (down the Arabah) to Zin; and thence extending (still southward down the Arabah), to the south of Kadesh-barnea, it shall go on to Hazar-addar, and pass on to Azmon. And from Azmon the boundary shall wind about to the river of Egypt, and its termination shall be at the sea.' What is here said respecting Hazar-addar and Azmon we do not understand, as the sites have not been determined; but without this, it is clear that the writer, after prolonging the eastern boundary line from the end of the Dead Sea down the edge of the Arabah, to a point somewhere south of Kadesh-barnea, then turns off westward to form the southern line, which he extends to the Mediterranean, at a point where 'the river of Egypt' falls into the sea. This river of Egypt is usually, and on very adequate grounds, supposed to be the stream which falls into the sea near El-Arish.

(3) The Western Border. In the sixth verse of the same chapter (Num. xxxiv) the western border is stated as defined by the Mediterranean coast. This was the boundary of Palestine; but the Hebrews never possessed the whole of it. The northern part of the coast from Sidon to Akko (Acre) was in the hands of the Phœnicians, and the southern part, from Azotus to Gaza, was retained by the Philistines, except at intervals, in and after the time of David, when they were subject to the Hebrew scepter (see PHILISTINES); and a central portion, about one-third of the whole, from Mount Carmel to Jabneh (Jamnia) was alone permanently open to the Israelites.

(4) The Northern Border is as difficult to define as the southern. The verses in which it is described we read thus: 'This shall be your north boundary; from the great sea ye shall draw a line to the great mountain (Lebanon); from the great mountain ye shall draw your border to the entering in of Hamath; and the boundary shall pass on to Zedad, and the boundary shall go on to Ziphron, and its termination shall be at Hazarenan' (Num. xxxiv:7-9). This only refers to the northern boundary of the western territory, or Canaan Proper, and we may therefore extend it in the same direction to Mount Hermon, for the purpose of completing the northern boundary. The Authorized Version of this text has created some confusion by translating הַר הַהֹר, hor ha-hor by 'Mount Hor'; but the phrase which literally means 'mountain of the mountain' that is, 'the great mountain,' obviously denotes Lebanon. We think that we cannot be mistaken in understanding that the line commenced at the sea somewhere not far to the south of Sidon, whence it was extended to Lebanon, and crossing the narrow valley (here called 'the entering in of Hamath'), which leads into the great plain enclosed between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, terminated at Mount Hermon, in the latter range. This arrangement of the northern line of boundary seems to us to meet all the difficulties arising from deficient knowledge, which have hung like a dense mist over the northern boundary of Palestine.

(5) The Eastern Boundary, as respects Canaan Proper, was defined by the Jordan and its lakes; but as respects the whole country, including the portion beyond the Jordan, it is not so easily determined; yet it may be made out with close attention. Salchah was a town on the eastern limits of Bashan, and also, therefore, of the Hebrew territory (Deut. iii:10; Josh. xii:5). From this point, however, the line must have inclined somewhat sharply to the southwest, and it would be best to bring it to the point where the Wady-ed Deir enters the Zerka, and thence extend it almost due south to the Arnon, which was the southern limit of the eastern territory.

5. Mineralogy. (1) Chalk. The mountains on the west of the Jordan consist chiefly of chalk, on which basalt begins to occur beyond Cana (northward), as is manifestly exhibited in the heights of Hattin, and in the western descent to the lake of Tiberias, in such large quantity and great extent as I have never before observed. That the so-called white limestone, which is met with around Jerusalem and thence to Jericho, which covers the summit and forms the declivities of the Mount of Olives, and which is also found at Mount Tabor and around Nazareth, is a kind of chalk, is obvious to any one but slightly acquainted with mineralogy. Layers and detached masses of 'flint,' Schubert continues, 'are very commonly seen in it; and these mountains preserve the character of their formation, as well in their more solid condition, resembling Alpine limestone and Schnürl-limestone, as in their softer organization, which has a likeness to chalk-marl. Besides this indurated chalk, a stone is found in the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem, chiefly towards the north, as well as towards Safet, and in other parts of the country, which, together with the dolomite formation occasionally met with, I could not but consider to be of what in Germany is called the Jura formation.'

(2) Salt. Palestine may be most emphatically called the country of salt, which is produced in vast abundance, chiefly, in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, which deserves to be regarded as one of the great natural salt-works of the world.

Under this head it may be noted that the fine impalpable desert-sand, which proves so menacing to travelers, and even to inhabitants, is scarcely found in Palestine Proper; but it occurs beyond Lebanon, near Beirut, and in the neighborhood of Damascus.

(3) Caverns. Palestine is eminently a country of caverns, to which there is frequent allusion in Scripture (see CAVES), and which are hardly so numerous in any country of the same extent. Many of them were enlarged by the inhabitants, and even artificial grottoes were formed by manual labor. In these the inhabitants still like to reside; as in summer they afford protection from the heat, and in winter from cold and rain. Even now, in many places, houses are observed built so near to rocks, that their cavities may be used for rooms or sheds suited to the condition of the seasons. Though the country is not unfrequently visited by earthquakes, they leave behind no such frightful traces as those of Asia Minor; as the vaults of limestone offer more effectual resistance than the sandstone of the latter country.

(4) Fertility. The ridge of chalk mountains, chiefly those containing marl, is in most places so irrigated by water, and so acted upon by the sun, as to be remarkable for the luxuriant growth of the great variety of plants with which they are adorned. The basalt mountains give birth to numerous springs. No soil could be naturally more fruitful and fit for cultivation than that of Palestine, if man had not destroyed the source of fertility by annihilating the former green covering of the hills and slopes, and thereby destroying the regular circulation of sweet water, which ascends as vapor from the sea to be cooled in the higher regions, and then descends to form the springs and rivers, for it is well known that the vegetable kingdom performs in this circulation the function of capillary tubes. But although the natives, from exasperation against their foreign conquerors and rulers (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii, 54), and the invaders who have so often overruled this scene of ancient blessings, have greatly reduced its prosperity, still I cannot comprehend how not only scoffers like Voltaire, but early travelers, who doubtless intended to declare the truth, represent Palestine as a natural desert, whose soil never could have been fit for profitable cultivation. Whoever saw the exhaustless abundance of plants on Carmel and the border of the desert, the grassy carpet of Esdraelon, the lawns adjoining the Jordan, and the rich foliage of the forests of Mount Tabor; whoever saw the borders of the lakes of Merom and Gennesareth, wanting only the cultivator to entrust to the soil his seed and plants, may state what other country on earth, devastated by two thousand years of warfare and spoliation, could be more fit for being again taken into cultivation. The bountiful hand of the Most High, which formerly showered abundance upon this renowned land, continues to be still open to those desirous of his blessings.

There are some very excellent remarks on this subject in Dr. Olin's Travels (ii, 235-240), to which we must be content to refer the reader, being prevented by want of room from introducing them in this place.

6. Levels. Annexed to the additions to his Palästina, which Raumer published, under the title of Beiträge zur Biblischen Geographie, 1843, there is an engraved scale of levels in Palestine. We copy the results in the subjoined table, and then offer some remarks upon them.

Some of these results are so extraordinary, that one might occupy whole pages in discussing them. The most important of them will be considered under their proper heads; and it is here only necessary to indicate a few of the more marked results. First, here is the remarkable fact, that the Mount of Olives and the Kidron, and consequently Jerusalem, stand 700 feet higher than the top of Mount Tabor, and about 2,500 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. More to the south, Hebron stands on still higher ground; and while it is 2,700 feet above the sea on the one hand, the Asphaltic Lake lies 4,000 feet below it on the other. This fact has no known parallel in any other region, and within so short a distance of the sea: and the extraordinary depression of the lake (1,337 feet below the sea level) adequately accounts for the very peculiar climate which its remarkable basin exhibits. The points at Tiberias to the north, and Kadesh to the south of the Dead Sea, are both, and nearly equally, below the Mediterranean level, and, taken together, they show the great slope both from the north and from the south towards the Dead Sea, confirming the discovery of Dr. Robinson, that the water-shed to the south of the Asphaltic Lake is towards its basin, and that, therefore, the Jordan could not at any time, as the country is at present constituted, have flowed on southward to the Elanitic Gulf, as was formerly supposed.

7. Mountains. As all the principal mountains of Palestine are noticed in this work under their respective names, a few general observations are all that here seem necessary. Schubert's remarks, given in this article under the heads Mineralogy and Levels, still further limit the scope of the observations to be offered, which will consist of a bird's-eye view over the country from north to south.

To Lebanon, which forms the northern boundary of the land (see LEBANON), succeeds the high table-land of Galilee, which extends to the plain of Esdraelon, and the general height of which above the sea may, by a comparison of levels, be estimated at between 900 and 1,000 feet. The elevated situation of this region is evinced by the gradual declivity which it exhibits on all sides but the north—sloping on the east towards the Jordan and its upper lakes, on the west to the plain of the Acre, and on the south to the plain of Esdraelon. Travelers express surprise at the deep descent from the comparatively level plains of Galilee to the lake of Tiberias, which, as we have seen, is 905 Paris feet below the level of Nazareth. This table-land is not without its eminences. The chief of these is Jebel Safet, which stands isolated and is plainly seen from every point except the north. This is one of the highest summits in Palestine (2,500 Paris feet). Although being merely a peak of the high table-land from which it rises, it does not seem to exceed elevations rising from lower levels, which are scarcely inferior. Still it is very high, even in apparent altitude. The summit of this lofty and steep mountain is crowned by a castle, and a little below the summit there is a city. This city is supposed to be that which our Savior had in view, as 'a city set on a hill,' in his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v:4); but it is doubtful if any city existed there so early, although modern ecclesiastical tradition has been disposed to regard this as the Bethulia of Judith. (See BETHULIA.) The mountain itself is not named in Scripture, unless, as is probable, it be the 'mountain of Naphtali,' mentioned in Josh. xx:9. Among the swells of this table-land are the Khurun Hattin (Horns of Hattin). This is a ridge about a quarter of a mile in length, and thirty or forty feet high, terminating at each end in an elevated peak, which gives the ridge the shape of a saddle. This is alleged to have been the place from which our Lord delivered his famous Sermon on the Mount to the multitude standing in the adjacent plain. The authority for this is very doubtful; and in the neighborhood, towards Tiberias, there are at least a dozen other eminences which would just as well answer to the circumstances of the history. One of these, nearly three miles southeast of this, is by similarly uncertain tradition alleged to be the spot where the five thousand were fed with five loaves, although that miracle probably took place on the east side of the lake of Tiberias (Matt. xiv:13-21).

If we consider the difference of elevation between the highland of Galilee and the low plain of Esdraelon, we shall see reason to regard the mountains and ridges of the border between them, and which form as it were the boundaries of the low plain, as merely detached or connected recesses, or peaks of the highland. The mountains of Gilboa and Hermon, which bound the plain of Esdraelon on the east, are certainly no other than portions of this high land, though they become mountains from the lower level of the Great Plain. Tabor itself seems but as one advanced peak or promontory of the high lands of Galilee. (See TABOR.) On the west the Great Plain is bounded by Carmel, which may be either regarded as a detached ridge, or as connected with the mountains of Samaria, which rise beyond the plain on the south. (See CARMEL.)

Southward of the plain of Esdraelon, throughout to the borders of the eastern desert, is an almost unbroken mountainous country, or ridge of mountains, extending north and south. It offers few conspicuous points, but its general elevation in the center may be determined by that of Gerizim in the north (2,400 Paris feet), of Olivet in the center (2,536 Paris feet), and of Hebron in the south (2,700 Paris feet). The ascent to the higher and central region from the plain of the coast on the west is gradual, by a succession of natural terraces; but eastward, in the direction of the Jordan and Dead Sea, the descents are comparatively abrupt and precipitous.

There is no distinct natural boundary between the mountains of Samaria and Judæa. The hills of Samaria exhibit scenery very different from those of Galilee. They are often beautifully wooded, and the region is more populous and better cultivated than any other part of Palestine. Among numerous venerable olive woods towns and villages are scattered in every direction, and some of the views rival those of Switzerland. The principal mountains of Samaria are those of Ebal and Gerizim, which have been described under the proper heads (Morison, ii. 10; Buckingham, Palestine, ch. xcii; Elliot, ii. 380; Olin, ii. 354).

The mountains of Judæa, although of greater historical celebrity, are now less attractive than those of Samaria, but apparently for no other reason than that their cultivation has been more neglected. The hills are generally separated from each other by valleys and torrents, and are for the most part of moderate height, uneven, and seldom of any regular figure. The rock of which they are composed is easily converted into mold, which, being arrested by terraces when washed down by the rains, renders the hills cultivable, in a series of long, narrow gardens, formed by these terraces, from the base upwards. Thus the hills were clad in former time most abundantly, and enriched and beautified with the fig-tree, the olive, and the vine; and it is in this way that the limited cultivation which survives is still carried on. But when the inhabitants were thinned out, and cultivation abandoned, the terraces fell to decay, and the soil which had collected on them was washed down into the valleys, leaving only the arid rock, bare and desolate. This is the general character of the hills of Judæa; but in some parts they are beautifully wooded, and in others the application of the ancient mode of culture suggests to the traveler how productive the country once was, and how fair the aspect which it offered (Kitto's Palestine, Phys. Geog. p. 39; comp. Mariti, ii. 362; Elliot, ii. 407, 408; Olin, ii.; Raumer, Palästina, p. 47, sq.).

The characteristics of desolation which have been indicated apply with peculiar force to the northern part of Judæa, forming the ancient territory of Benjamin. Its most favorably situated mountains are wholly uncultivated; and perhaps in no other country is such a mass of rock exhibited without an atom of soil. In the east, towards the plain of Jericho, it takes a naturally stern and grand character, such as no other part of Palestine offers. It is through this wild and melancholy region that the roads from Jerusalem to Jericho, and (by way of Wady Saba) to the Dead Sea lie. It has hence, by the former route, often been passed by travelers in their pilgrimages to the Jordan; and they unite in depicting it in the most gloomy hues. 'The road,' says Dr. Olin, 'runs along the edge of steep precipices and yawning gulfs, and in a few places is overhung with the crags of the mountain. The aspect of the whole region is peculiarly savage and dreary, yying in these respects, though not in overpowering grandeur, with the wilds of Sinai. The mountains seem to have been loosened from their foundations, and rent in pieces by some terrible convulsion, and there left to be scathed by the burning rays of the sun, which scorches the land with consuming heat' (Travels, ii. 197). These characteristics became more manifest on approaching the Jordan; and the wild region extending north of the road is believed, with sufficient probability, to form 'the wilderness' where, after his baptism, Jesus 'was led up of the Spirit, to be tempted of the devil,' and where 'he fasted forty days and forty nights' (Matt. iv.:1, 2). The lofty ridge which extends north of the road, and fronts the plain of Jericho, is called Quarantana, with reference to this event, and the particular summit from which Satan is supposed to have displayed to the Savior 'the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them' is crowned by a chapel, still occasionally resorted to by the devout pilgrims, while the eastern face which overhangs the plain is much occupied with grotts and cells, once the favorite abode of pious anchorites. The Quarantana forms apparently the highest summit of the whole immense pile, and is distinguished for its sere and desolate aspect, even in this gloomy region of savage and dreary sights. It has not, that we know, been measured, but Dr. Olin computes its height at nearly 2,000 feet in perpendicular height (Travels, ii. 119; Kitto's Palest.; Phys. Geog. p. 39; Robinson, ii. 289; Hasselquist, p. 128; Maundrell, p. 79; Morison, p. 523; Nau, p. 403).

In the southern region, usually called in Scripture 'the hill country of Judah' (Matt. iii.:1), there are few mountains of a marked character; the peaks of the general ridge being of little apparent elevation, although actually much elevated above the sea-level. The most remarkable of the whole of this wild region seems to have been distinguished as 'the wilderness of Judah' (Luke i.:39, 65), while 'the mountains of Judah,' or 'the hill country of Judæa,' applies to the mountainous region south of Jerusalem towards Hebron (Josh. xi.:21; 2 Chron. xxvii.:4, etc.). To this district belongs the wilderness of Tekoa (2 Chron. xx.:20), and beyond it eastward, 'the wilderness of Engeddi' (1 Sam. xxiv.:2), Maon (1 Sam. xxiii.:24, 25), and Ziph (1 Sam. xxiii.:14, 15), names made familiar to us by the history of David. Here also is the Frank Mountain near Tekoa, which has already been described (see BETHULIA), as well as the Carmel mentioned in the history of Nabal (Josh. xv.:55; 1 Sam. xxv.). It would seem that the hills of southernmost Judæa were, before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews, called 'the mountains of the Amorites' (Deut. i.:7, 19, 20, 43, 44). This tract has only of late been explored by travelers on the new route from Petra to Hebron, except by Scetzen, at the beginning of the present century. To obtain a clear notion of it, we should view it from the great Arabah, beyond the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, whence it was surveyed by the Israelites, when they contemplated entering the Promised Land from the southeast. The two terraces which towards the south end of the Dead Sea on the east side form the descent to its deep basin from the high lands of Judæa, stretch off to the southwest, and the ascents from the plain to the first, and from the plateau of the first to the top of the second, which forms the general level of Judæa, present to him who approaches from the lower region of the Arabah, high mountain barriers, which he has to ascend by gorges or passes of more or less difficult ascent. After ascending from the great valley the traveler passes over a wild district covered with rocky hills, till he comes to the frontier wall of the first terrace or step, and which was probably pre-eminently 'the mountain of the Amorites.' There are in this three principal passes; the southernmost being that of Nubeh-es-Sufah, the Zephath of Scripture, called also Hormah, which we know to have been the pass by which the Israelites attempted to enter Palestine from Kadesh, when they were driven back (Deut. i:44; Num. xiv:45; Judg. i:17). The top of this pass is given in the table of Levels, on the authority of Schubert, as 1,434 feet above the level of the sea. A particular description of this 'vast inclined plane of rock' may be seen in Robinson's Researches (ii. 590). On reaching the top a journey of three hours among hills of chalky limestone brings the traveler to the second great ascent to the general level of the hill country of eastern Judæa. This second ascent is similar to the first, but not more than half as high. This statement will convey some idea of that difficulty of military access to the country in this direction which eventually induced the invading Hebrews to take another and more circuitous route.

In the direct south of Judah the approach is marked by an ascent more gradual, over a succession of less elevated plateaus, from the desert regions of sand and rock to the hills of Judah. Recent discoveries in that quarter, chiefly those of Dr. Robinson, have shown that much of the south border country, which was formerly regarded as desert, is in fact a variegated region affording good pastures, into which the shepherds of Judah doubtless sent their flocks of old. Concerning the mountains of Palestine generally, see Raumer's Palästina, pp. 29-84; Winer's Real-wörterb., art. 'Gebirge'; Kitto's Palest., Phys. Geog., ch. ii.

8. Plains and Valleys. The most important are those of Lebanon, of the Jordan, of Jericho, of Esdraelon, and of the coast.

(1) The Plain of Lebanon may be described as the valley which is enclosed between the parallel mountain ranges of Libanus and Anti-Libanus. Although the greater part of it must have been within Solomon's dominion, it can scarcely be deemed to belong to Palestine proper; but its geographical and historical connection with that country requires its introduction. This enclosed plain is the Cœle-Syria of the ancients, and now bears the name of El-Bekka (the valley.) It is about ninety miles in length from north to south by eleven miles in breadth, nearly equal throughout, except that it widens at the northern end and narrows at the southern. This plain is, perhaps, the most rich and beautiful part of Syria. (See LEBANON.) The soil is good, and the water abundant from the numerous mountain springs on each side, but the concentration of the sun's rays renders the summer heat excessive. These are the sources of that fertility for which the valley has, in all ages, been renowned; but only a small portion is now cultivated, the rest being left in pasture to the Arab tribes. (La Roque,

i. 115-120; Volney, i. 271; Burckhardt, pp. 4-18, 31; Addison, ii. 48-50; Modern Syrians, p. 124).

(2) The Plain of the Jordan. By this name we understand the margin of the lakes, as well as the valley watered by the river. Here the heat is still greater than in the valley of Lebanon, and, in consequence, palm-trees and the fruits of more southern climes than Palestine, will grow freely wherever there are soil and water. But the latter is usually wanting, and, therefore, except on the immediate borders of the river, of the lake of Gennesareth, and of the lesser streams, the whole plain is barren and desolate. (See JORDAN.)

(3) The Plain of Jericho is but an opening or expansion in the plain of the Jordan, towards the Dead Sea. The whole expansion takes in the plains of Moab on the east side of the river, and the plains of Jericho on the west, the breadth across being from ten to twelve miles. In fact, the plain of the Jordan is in no other part so wide. The large plain of Jericho is partly desert, but, from the abundance of water and the heat of the climate, it might be rendered highly productive; indeed, the fertility of this plain has been celebrated in every age. Josephus describes it as the most fertile tract of Judæa, and calls it a 'divine region.' He speaks also of its beautiful gardens, and its groves of palm-trees; and his description is borne out by Scripture, in which Jericho is described as 'The city of palm-trees' (Deut. xxxiv:3; Judg. i:16). This region also produced honey, opobalsam, the cypress-tree (or el henna), and myrobalanum, as well as the common fruits of the earth in prolific abundance. The Scripture adds the sycamore tree to the number of its products (Luke xix:4). Of all these productions which so distinguished the climate of Jericho, and the greater part of which it enjoyed in common with Egypt, very few now remain. (See JERICO.)

(4) The Plain of Esdraelon is often mentioned in sacred history (Judg. iv:13, 15, 16; v:19; 2 Kings xxiii:29; Zech. xii:11; Judith i:8), as the great battle-field of the Jewish and other nations, under the names of the Valley of Megiddo and the Valley of Jezreel; and by Josephus as the Great Plain. This extensive plain, exclusive of three great arms which stretch eastward towards the valley of the Jordan, may be said to be in the form of an acute triangle, having the measure of thirteen or fourteen miles on the north, about eighteen on the east, and above twenty on the southwest. In the western portion it seems perfectly level, with a general declivity towards the Mediterranean; but in the east it is somewhat undulated by slight spurs and swells from the roots of the mountains: from the eastern side three great valleys go off to the valley of the Jordan. These valleys are separated by the ridges of Gilboa and Little Hermon, and the space which lies between these two ridges, is the proper valley of Jezreel, which name seems to be sometimes given to the whole plain of Esdraelon. The valley of Jezreel is a deep plain, and about three miles across. Before the verdure of spring and early summer has been parched up by the heat and drought of the late summer and autumn, the view of the Great Plain is, from its fertility and beauty, very delightful. In June, yellow fields of grain, with green patches of millet and cotton interspersed, check the landscape like a carpet. The plain itself is almost without villages, but there are several on the slopes of the enclosing hills, especially on the side of Mount Carmel. (Robinson, ii. 160-162; Olin, ii. 376; Schubert, iii. 163; Clarke, iv. 356-360; Jowett, ii. 192; Stephens, ii. 307; Elliot, ii. 360.)

(5) The Plain of the Coast is that tract of land which extends along the coast, between the sea and the mountains. In some places, where the mountains approach the sea, this tract is interrupted by promontories and rising grounds; but, taken generally, the whole coast of Palestine may be described as an extensive plain of various breadth. Sometimes it expands into broad plains, at others it is contracted into narrow valleys. With the exception of some sandy tracts the soil is throughout rich, and exceedingly productive. The climate is everywhere very warm, and is considered rather insalubrious as compared with the upland country. It is not mentioned by any one collective name in Scripture. The part fronting Samaria, and between Mount Carmel and Jaffa, near a rich pasture ground, was called the Valley of Sharon; and the continuation southward, between Jaffa and Gaza, was called The Plain, as distinguished from the hill-country of Judah. A minute description of this plain throughout its extent is given in Kitto's Palestine, Phys. Geog. p. 100-105.

9. Rivers. The Jordan is the only river of any note in Palestine, and besides it there are only two or three perennial streams. The greater number of the streams which figure in the history, and find a place in the maps, are merely torrents or water-courses.

(1) The Jordan. We should like to consider this river simply as the stream issuing from the reservoir of the lake Huleh, but custom requires its source to be traced to some one or more of the streams which form that reservoir. The two largest streams, which enter the lake on the north, are each formed by the junction of two others. It is usual to refer the origin of a river to its remotest sources; but in this case the largest and longest, being the most easterly of the two streams, does not appear to have been at any time identified with the Jordan—that honor having for ages been ascribed to the western stream; this river has distinct sources, at Banias and at Tel-el-Kâdi. At Banias (anciently Paneas, from the worship of Pan) a stream issues from a spacious cavern, under a wall of rock, at the base of the Heish mountains. Directly over the cavern, and in other parts, in the face of the perpendicular rock, niches have been cut to receive statues. Here Herod built a temple in honor of Augustus; and there was a town somewhat below, traces of which still remain. This is, undoubtedly, that place and cavern, at the foot of a mountain, which Josephus describes as the main source of the Jordan (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 10. 3; De Bell. Jud. i. 21. 3).

The true Jordan—the stream that quits this lake—passes rapidly along the narrow valley, and between well-shaded banks, to the lake of Gennesareth: the distance is about nine miles. Nearly two miles below the lake is a bridge, called Jacob's bridge; and here the river is about eighty feet wide, and four feet deep.

On leaving the lake of Gennesareth the river enters a very broad valley, or Ghor, by which name the natives designate a depressed tract or plain between mountains. This name is applied to the plain of the Jordan, not only between the lake of Gennesareth and the Dead Sea, but quite across the Dead Sea, and to some distance beyond. The valley varies in width from five to ten miles between the mountains on each side. The river does not make its way straight through the midst of the Ghor; it flows first near the western hills, then near the eastern, but advances to the Dead Sea through the middle of the valley. Within this valley there is a lower one, and within that, in some parts, another still lower, through which the river flows; the inner valley is about half a mile wide, and is generally green and beautiful, covered with trees and bushes, whereas the upper or large valley is, for the most part, sandy or barren. The distance between the two lakes, in a direct line, is about sixty miles. In the first part of its course the stream is clear, but it becomes turbid as it advances to the Dead Sea, probably from passing over beds of sandy clay. The water is very wholesome, always cool, and nearly tasteless. The breadth and depth of the river varies much in different places and at different times of the year. Dr. Shaw calculates the average breadth at thirty yards, and the depth at nine feet. In the season of flood, in April and early in May, the river is full, and sometimes overflows its lower banks, to which fact there are several allusions in Scripture (Josh. iii. 15; 1 Chron. xii. 15; Jer. xii. 5; xlix. 19; 1:44; Eccles. xxiv. 26). (Nau, p. 272; Shaw, ii. 156; Paxton, p. 158; Stephens, ii. 361-363; Burckhardt, pp. 39-43; 314. 345. 514; Irby and Mangles, pp. 283-290; 304. 326; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, pp. 401-406; Palestine, i. 90, 93; Robinson, ii. 255-267; iii. 309-312; 347, 355; Olin, ii. 229-334; Schubert, iii. 80-84; Pocock, ii. 71; Richardson, ii. 425, 445, 446; Lindsay, ii. 65, 91; Elliot, i. 74-77.) (See JORDAN.)

(2) The Kishon, that 'ancient river,' by whose wide and rapid stream the hosts of Sisera were swept away (Judg. iv. 13; v. 21), has been noticed under the proper head. (See KISHON.)

(3) The Belus, now called Nahr Kardanus, enters the bay of Acre higher up than the Kishon. It is a small stream, fordable even at its mouth in summer. It is not mentioned in the Bible, and is chiefly celebrated for the tradition, that the accidental vitrefaction of its sands taught man the art of making glass.

(4) Other Streams. The other streams of note enter the Jordan from the east; these are the Jarmuth, the Jabbok, and the Arnon, of which the last two have been noticed under their proper heads. The Jarmuth, called also Sheriat-el-Mandhour, anciently Hieromax, joins the Jordan five miles below the lake of Gennesareth. Its source is ascribed to a small lake, almost a mile in circumference, at Mezareib, which is thirty miles east of the Jordan. It is a beautiful stream, and yields a considerable body of water to the Jordan. (See ARNON; JABBOK.)

10. Lakes and Seas. The river Jordan in its course forms three remarkable lakes, in the last of which, called the Dead Sea, it is lost:

(1) The Lake Merom (Joseph. Antiq. xi. 5. 7), or Samoehonitis (Antiq. v. 5. 1), now called Hulch, the first of these, serves as a kind of reservoir to collect the waters which form the Jordan, and again to send them forth in a single stream. In the spring, when the waters are highest, the lake is seven miles long and three and a half broad; but in summer it becomes a mere marsh. In some parts it is sown with rice, and its reeds and rushes afford shelter to wild hogs. (Pocock ii. 71; Burckhardt, p. 316; Irby and Mangles, p. 290; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 309; Richardson, ii. 450, 451; Robinson, ii. 339-342.)

(2) The Lake of Gennesareth, called also the Sea of Galilee, and the Lake of Tiberias. After quitting the lake Merom, the river Jordan proceeds for about thirteen miles southward, and then enters the great lake of Gennesareth. This lake lies very deep, among fruitful hills and mountains, from which, in the rainy season, many rivulets descend; its shape will be seen from the map. Its extent has been greatly over-rated: Professor Robinson considers that its length, in a straight line, does not exceed eleven or twelve geographical miles, and that its breadth is from five to six miles. From numerous indications, it is judged that the bed of this lake was formed by some ancient volcanic eruption, which history has not recorded. Its waters are very clear and sweet, and contain various kinds of excellent fish in great abundance. It will be remembered that several of the Apostles were fishermen of this lake, and that it was also the scene of several transactions in the life of Christ: it is thus frequently mentioned in the New Testament, but very rarely in the Old, where it is called the Sea of Cinnereth, of which Gennesareth is a corruption. The borders of the lake were in the time of Christ well peopled, being covered with numerous towns and villages; but now they are almost desolate, and the fish and water-fowl are but little disturbed. (Robinson, iii. 253, 264, 312, 314; Schubert, iii. 235-243; Olin, ii. 406-408; D'Arvieux, ii. 176, 177; Clarke, iv. 119-225; Burckhardt, p. 332; Buckingham, Palest. ch. xxv.; Irby and Mangles, p. 295; Jowett, pp. 172-176; Hardy, pp. 237-241; Elliot, ii. 342-350.)

(3) The Dead Sea, called also the Salt Sea, the Sea of Sodom, and the Asphaltic Lake (Lacus Asphaltites), is from its size the most important, and from its history and qualities the most remarkable, of all the lakes of Palestine. It was long assumed that this lake did not exist before the destruction of Sodom and the other 'cities of the plain' (Gen. xix); and that before that time the present bed of the lake was a fertile plain, in which these cities stood. It was also concluded that the river Jordan then flowed through this plain, and afterwards pursued its course, through the great valley of Arabah, to the eastern arm of the Red Sea. The careful observations of Professor Robinson have now, however, rendered it more probable that a lake which, as now, received the river Jordan, existed here before Sodom was destroyed; but that an encroachment of the waters, southward, then took place, overwhelming a beautiful and well-watered plain which lay on the southern border of the lake, and on which Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar were situated.

The Dead Sea is about thirty-nine or forty geographical miles long from north to south, and nine or ten miles wide from east to west; and it lies embedded very deep between lofty cliffs on the western side, which are about 1,500 feet high, and mountains on the eastern shore, the highest ridges of which are reckoned to be from 2,000 to 2,500 feet above the water. The water of the lake is much saltier than that of the sea. From the quantity of salt which the water holds in solution it is thick and heavy, and no fish can live, or marine plants grow in it. The old stories about the pestiferous qualities of the Dead Sea and its waters are mere fables or delusions; and actual appearances are the natural and obvious effects of the confined and deep situation, the intense heat, and the uncommon saltiness of the waters. Lying in its deep caldron, surrounded by lofty cliffs of naked limestone rock, exposed for seven or eight months in the year to the unclouded beams of a burning sun, nothing but sterility and solitude can be looked for upon its shores; and nothing else is actually found, except in those parts where there are fountains or streams of fresh water; in all which places there is a fertile soil and abundant vegetation. Birds also abound, and they are observed to fly over and across the sea without being, as old stories tell, injured or killed by its exhalations.

On the borders of this lake is found much sulphur, in pieces as large as walnuts, and even larger. There is also a black shining stone, which will partly burn in the fire, and which then emits a bituminous smell: this is the 'stink-stone' of Burckhardt. At Jerusalem it is made into rosaries and toys, of which great quantities are sold to the pilgrims who visit the sacred places. Another remarkable production found here, from which, indeed, the lake takes one of its names, is asphaltum, or bitumen. Josephus says, that 'the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum, which float upon the surface, having the size and shape of headless oxen' (De Bell. Jud. iv. 8, 4). From recent information it appears that large masses are rarely found, and then generally after earthquakes. The substance is doubtless produced from the bottom of the sea, in which it coagulates, and rises to the surface; or possibly the coagulation may have been ancient, and the substance adheres to the bottom until detached by earthquakes and other convulsions, when its buoyancy brings it to the surface. We know that 'the vale of Siddim' (Gen. xiv:10) was anciently 'full of slime pits' or sources of bitumen; and these, now under the water, probably supply the asphaltum which is found on such occasions. It has just been stated (June, 1901) that a marked rise in the level of the Dead Sea has been noted. A broad lagoon has been formed on the north side of the Jordan delta. The water does not sink as usual and it is surmised that the whole bottom of the sea has been raised by volcanic action (Nau, pp. 577, 578; Morison, ch. xxx; Shaw, ii. 157, 158; Hasselquist, pp. 130, 131, 284; Irby and Mangles, pp. 351-356; 346-359; Hardy, pp. 201, 204; Monro, i. 145-148; Elliot, ii. 479-486; Wilde, ii.; Lindsay, ii. 64-66; Stephens, ii. ch. 15; Paxton, pp. 159-163; Robinson, ii. 204-239, 601-608; 661-677; Schubert, iii. 84-92; Olin, ii. 234-245). (See DEAD SEA, THE.)

11. Climate and Seasons. The variations of sunshine and rain, which with us extend throughout the year, are in Palestine confined chiefly to the latter part of autumn and the winter. During all the rest of the year the sky is almost uninterruptedly cloudless, and rain very rarely falls.

The autumnal rains usually commence at the latter end of October, or beginning of November, not suddenly, but by degrees; which gives opportunity to the husbandman to sow his wheat and barley. The rains come mostly from the west (Luke xii:54) and southwest, and continue for two or three days at a time, falling chiefly in the night; the wind then changes to the north or east, and several days of fine weather succeed. During the months of November and December the rains continue to fall heavily; afterwards they return at longer intervals, and are not so heavy; but at no period during the winter do they entirely cease to occur. Rain continues to fall more or less during the month of March, but is afterwards very rare. Morning mists occur as late as May, but rain almost never. Rain in the time of harvest was as incomprehensible to an ancient Jew as snow in summer (Prov. xxvi:1; 1 Sam. xii:17; Amos iv:7). The 'early' and the 'latter' rains, for which the Jewish husbandmen waited with longing (Prov. xvi:15; James v:7), seem to have been the first showers of autumn, which revived the parched and thirsty soil, and prepared it for the seed; and the later showers of spring, which continued to refresh and forward the ripening crops and the vernal products of the fields.

The cold of winter is not severe, and the ground is never frozen. Snow falls more or less. In the low-lying plains but little falls, and it disappears early in the day; in the higher lands, as at Jerusalem, it often falls, chiefly in January and February, to the depth of a foot or more; but even there it does not lie long on the ground. Thunder and lightning are frequent in the winter.

In the plains and valleys the heat of summer is oppressive, but not in the more elevated tracts, as at Jerusalem, except when the south wind, sirocco, blows (Luke xii:55). In such high grounds the nights are cool, often with heavy dew. The total absence of rain in summer soon destroys the verdure of the fields, and gives to the general landscape, even in the high country, an aspect of drought and barrenness. No green thing remains but the foliage of the scattered fruit-trees, and occasional vineyards and fields of millet. In autumn the whole land becomes dry and parched; the cisterns are nearly empty, and all nature, animate and inanimate, looks forward with longing for the return of the rainy season.

In the hill country the season of harvest is later than in the plains of the Jordan and of the seacoast. The barley harvest is about a fortnight earlier than that of wheat. In the plain of the Jordan the wheat harvest is early in May; in the plains of the coast and of Esdraelon it is towards the latter end of that month; and in the hills, not until June. The general vintage is in September, but the first grapes ripen in July, and from that time the towns are well supplied with this fruit.

In the Biblical narrative only two seasons of the year, summer and winter, are directly mentioned. Among many Oriental nations, as the Hindus and Arabians, the year has six seasons. The Talmud (Bava Mezia, p. 106. 2) exhibits a similar arrangement, which in this case appears to have been founded on Gen. viii:22, 'While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, shall not cease.' This is the only passage of Scripture which can be construed to have reference to any such division of the seasons, and in this it is not very clear. But if such a distribution of the seasons ever existed, the following would seem to have been its arrangement:

- (1) Seedtime; 15th October to 15th December.
- (2) Winter; 15th December to 15th February.
- (3) Cold; 15th February to 15th April.
- (4) Harvest; 15th April to 15th June.
- (5) Heat; 15th June to 15th August.
- (6) Summer; 15th August to 15th October.

The climate of Palestine has always been considered healthy, and the inhabitants have for the most part lived to a good old age (Tacit. Hist. v. 6). Jerusalem, in particular, from its great elevation, clear sky and invigorating atmosphere, should be a healthy place, and so it is generally esteemed; but the plague frequently appears among its ill-fed and uncleanly population; and bilious fevers, the result of great and sudden vicissitudes of temperature, are more common than might be expected in such a situation. (Schubert, Morgenland, iii. 106; Olin, ii. 333; Robinson, ii. 96-100; Kalthoff, Hebr. Alterthum, pp. 42-46; Bibliotheca Sacra, Feb. 1844, pp. 221-224.)

12. Inhabitants. Under this head we present the reader with the following observations of Dr. Olin (Travels, ii, 438, 439): "The inhabitants of Palestine are Arabs; that is, they speak the Arabic, though, with slight exceptions, they are probably all descendants of the old inhabitants of Syria. They are a fine, spirited race of men, and have given Mohammed Ali much trouble in subduing them, and still more in retaining them in subjection. They are said to be industrious for Orientals, and to have the right elements for becoming, under better auspices, a civilized, intellectual nation. I believe, however, it will be found impracticable to raise any people to a respectable social and moral state under a Turkish or Egyptian, or any other Mohammedan government. The inherent vices of the religious system enter, and, from their unavoidable connections must enter, so deeply into the political administration that any reform in government or improvement in the people, beyond temporary alleviations of evils too pressing to be endured, cannot reasonably be expected. The Turks and Syrians are about the maximum of the civilization possible to Mohammedans of the present time. The mercantile class is said to be little respected, and generally to lack integrity. Veracity is held very lightly by all classes. The people are commonly temperate and frugal, which may be denominated Oriental virtues. Their situation, with regard to the physical means of comfort and subsistence, is, in many respects, favorable, and under a tolerable government would be almost unequalled. As it is, the Syrian peasant and his family fare much better than the laboring classes of Europe. The mildness of the climate, the abundance of land and its fertility, with the free and luxuriant pasturage that covers the mountains and the plains, render it nearly impossible that the peasant should not be well supplied with bread, fruit, meat, and milk. The people almost always appear well clothed. Their houses, too, though often of a slight construction and mean appearance, must be pronounced commodious when compared with the dark, crowded apartments usually occupied by the corresponding classes in Europe. Agricultural wages vary a good deal in different parts of the country, but I had reason to conclude that the average was not less than fourteen to eighteen cents per day." With all these advantages population is on the decline, arising from polygamy, military conscription, unequal and oppressive taxation, forced labor, general insecurity of property, the discouragement of industry, and the plague.

13. Botany. (1) The Olive. The olive certainly was, and still continues to be, the chief of all the trees of Palestine, which seems to be its natural home. 'Never,' says Schubert, 'have I anywhere beheld such ancient olive trees as here. But the plantations might be more extensive, and the produce more profitable, were they tended by such careful and diligent hands as those of Provence. Excellent oil is obtained from the fruit.'

(2) Figs. But although the pre-eminence among the trees of Palestine must be assigned to the olive, fig trees also occur in great numbers, and the plantations sometimes cover large tracts which the eye can scarcely embrace. This sight is most common in the neighborhood of Jabrut, in the hills between Bir and Sinjil. The fruit has a peculiarly pleasant flavor, and an aromatic sweetness, but is generally smaller than that of Smyrna.

(3) Grapes. As to the vine, which is now only found in some districts of Palestine, it is not surpassed by any on earth for the strength of its juice, and—at least in the southern mountains—for the size and abundance of the grapes.

(4) Other Fruits. The first tree whose blossoms appear prior to the period of the latter rains, and open in the very deep valleys before the cold days of February set in, is the Luz or almond tree. In March the fruit trees are in blossom, among which are the apricot, the apple, and the pear.

(5) Flowers. In April the purple of the pomegranate flowers combines with the white of the myrtle blossoms; and at the same period the roses of the country, and the variegated ladanus (Cistus), the zukkim tree (Elaeagnus angustifolius), the storax tree, whose flowers resemble those of the German jasmine (Philadelphus coronarius), emit their fragrant odors.

(6) Trees. The palm-tree, the symbol of victory, has been removed from its place; and of the famous palm groves of Jericho very few traces now remain.

The tall cypress exists in Palestine only as cultivated by man, in gardens, in cemeteries, and other open places of towns. But as the spontaneous growth of the country, we find upon the heights and swelling hills the azarole (Crataegus azarolus), the walnut tree, the arbutus, or strawberry tree, the laurel tree, the laurustinus, species of the pistachio and terebinth trees, of evergreen oaks, and of the rhamnus of the size of trees and shrubs, the cedrine juniper tree, and some sorts of thymelæus; while on the formerly wooded heights various kinds of pine trees, large and small, still maintain their ground. The sycamore, the carob trees, and the opuntia fig trees, are only found as objects of cultivation in or near towns; and orchards of orange and lemon trees occur chiefly in the neighborhood of Nabulus. (See SHECHEM.)

(7) Grains. The various kinds of grain grow spontaneously in great plenty in many districts, chiefly in the plains of Jezreel and the heights of Galilee, being the wild progeny of formerly cultivated fields, and bearing testimony by their presence to the fitness of the soil for the production of grain. In addition to wheat and barley, among this wild growth, the common rye was often seen. The present course of agriculture, which is but carelessly practiced, comprises nearly the same kinds of grain which are grown in Egypt. Fields are seen covered with summer dhurah (dhurah gaydi), the common dhurah (dhurah sayfeh), and the autumnal dhurah (dhurah dimiri), all of which are varieties of the Holcus sorghum. Maize (kumh), spelt, and barley (schayir), thrive everywhere; and rice (aruz) is produced on the Upper Jordan and the marshy borders of the lake Merom. Upon the Jordan, near Jacob's bridge, may be seen fine tall specimens of the papyrus reed.

(8) Vegetables. Of pulse the inhabitants grow the hommos or chick pea (Cicer arictanum), the fool or Egyptian bean (Vicia faba), the gishrun-gayga (Phaseolus Munga), the gilban (Lathyrus sativus), together with the ads or lentil, and the bisilleh or peas (Pisum arvense). Of esculent vegetables, the produce of the various species of hibiscus are much liked and cultivated, particularly the bamia towleh (Hibiscus esculentus), the bamia beledi, or wayka (Hibiscus pracox). In some places the Christian inhabitants or Franks are endeavoring to introduce the potato, which the natives call kolkas Franschii. In the garden of the monasteries the kharschuf or artichoke is very common, as is also the khus or salad; in most districts, as about Nabulus (Shechem), the watermelon (batikh) and cucumber (khlar) are common.

(9) Textiles. Hemp (bust) is more commonly grown in Palestine than flax (kettan); and in favorable localities cotton (kotu) is cultivated, and also madder (fuah, Rubia tinctorum) for dyeing.

14. Zoölogy. Herds of black cattle are now but rarely seen in Palestine.

(1) The Ox. The ox in the neighborhood of Jerusalem is small and unsightly, and beef or veal is but rarely eaten. But on the Upper Jordan, and in the vicinity of Tabor and Nazareth, and to the east of the Jordan on the way from Jacob's bridge to Damascus, the ox thrives better and is more frequently seen. The buffalo thrives upon the coast, and is there equal in size and strength to the buffalo of Egypt.

(2) Sheep and Goats. Sheep and goats are still seen in great numbers in all parts of the country: their flesh and milk serve for daily food, and their wool and hair for clothing. The common sort of sheep in Palestine manifest the tendency to form a fat and large tail. The long-eared Syrian goat is furnished with hair of considerable fineness, but seemingly not so fine as that of the same species of goat in Asia Minor.

(3) Fallow Deer. Of animals of the deer kind, Schubert saw only the female of the fallow deer, and this was in the same district in which Hasselquist also met with fallow deer, namely, on Mount Tabor.

(4) Antelope. On another occasion Schubert thought that he discovered deer upon the mountain top; but, on a closer view, deemed it more probable that they were the native brown antelope (A. himuleus); for of the antelopes several species are met with in the country. Camels are not reared to any extent worth mentioning.

(5) Horses and Mules. Palestine cannot boast of its native breed of horses, although fine animals of beautiful shape, and apparently of high Arabian race, are not unfrequently seen. The ass of the country scarcely takes higher relative rank than the horse; asses and mules are still, however, much used for riding, as they afford a means of locomotion well suited to the difficult mountain paths of the country.

(6) Other Animals. Boars (khanzie) are very often observed upon Mount Tabor and the Lesser Hermon, as well as on the woody slopes of Mount Carmel. Among indigenous animals of the genus felis, we may however name the common panther (nimr) which is found among the mountains of central Palestine; and in the genus canis there is the small Abul Hhosseyn, or Canis famelicus, and a kind of large fox (Canis Syriacus), which our traveler did not himself see, but supposed to be denoted by the word talcb. In addition to these is the jackal (dibb), which is very injurious to the flocks. The hyena (zabue) is found chiefly in the valley of the Jordan, and in the mountains around the lake of Tiberias, but is also occasionally seen in other districts of Palestine.

Bears have been killed in the Anti-Libanus, not far from Damascus. The hides had more resemblance to that of the common brown bear than to that of the bear described by Ehrenberg under the name of Ursus Syriacus. A hedgehog was procured near Bethlehem, which was found to resemble the common European animal, and not to be the long-eared Egyptian species. The native arneh or hare is the same as the Arabian. The porcupine is frequently found in the clefts of the rocks.

(7) Birds. Among the larger birds of prey Schubert often saw the common cathartes or vulture (C. percnopterus), and the hedy or kite. The native wild dove, called kinri, differs not perceptibly from our own species, which is also the case with the shrikes, crows, rollers, and other species found in Palestine.

(8) Serpents. Serpents are rare, and none of those which have been observed are poisonous.

(9) Insects. Among the insects the bee is the most conspicuous. Mosquitoes are somewhat troublesome, but not at the time of the year in which Schubert traveled. Beetles are abundant, and of various species, which our traveler does not enumerate, but which are illustrated and described in Ehrenberg's Symbolæ Physicæ.

15. Literature. From the almost innumerable works on Palestine a few of the more prominent are herewith subjoined: Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, by Burckhardt (1822); Egypt, Nubia, Syria, and Asia Minor, by Irby and Mangles (1822); Biblical Researches, by Robinson (1838-1841, and 1856); Lands of the Bible Visited and Described, by John Wilson (1847); Physical Geography of Palestine, by Robinson (1865); Expedition to the Dead Sea and Jordan, by Lynch (1849); Smai and Palestine, by Stanley (1857); The Land and the Book, by Thomson (1859, and new edition, 1880); Narrative of a Journey through Syria and Palestine, by Van de Velde (1858 and 1865); Rob Roy on the Jordan, by Macgregor (1870); Land of Israel, by Tristram (1865); Natural History of the Bible, by Tristram (1867); Land of Moab, by Tristram (1873); Geography of Palestine, Ritter, translated by Gage (1866); Damascus and Giant Cities of Roshan, by Porter (1855-1865); Handbook of Syria and Palestine, by Murray (1875); Bible Educator, by Plumtre (1873-1875); Handbook of Syria and Palestine, by Baedeker (1876); Bible Lands, their Modern Customs, etc., by Van Lennep (1875); Quarterlies Palestine Exploration Fund (organized, 1865-1880); American Palestine Exploration Society's Statements (1871-1877); Our Work in Palestine (1875); Through Bible Lands, by Schaff (1878); Tent-work in Palestine, by Conder (1878); From Egypt to Palestine, by Bartlett (1879); Handbook to the Bible, by F. R. and C. R. Conder (1879); Sheet Maps and Memoirs of the Palestine Exploration Fund (1880); Kitto's Pictorial History and Physical Geography of Palestine (1841); Schwarz, A Descriptive Geog. of Palestine (1850); De Saulcy, Narrative of a Journey (1854).

PALLU (pāl'lu), (Heb. פָּלְלוּ, pal-loo', distinguished, wonderful), second son of Reuben, and head of a family (Gen. xlvii:9; Ex. vi:14; Num. xxvi:5, 8; 1 Chron. v:3), B. C. about 870.

PALLUITES (pāl'lu-ites), (Heb. פָּלְלוּיִתִּים, ha-pal-loo-ee', the Pallui), descendants of Pallu, of the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxvi:5).

PALM (pām), (Heb. קָפַח, kaf, hollow or curved; Gr. πάπισμα, hraf'is-mah, a blow with the palm), a general term for the hand, both literally and figuratively (Ezek. xxi:16; Is. xlix:16), as well as for the palms only (Lev. xiv:26; Dan. x:10). It is used also in the accounts of our Lord's trial before the high-priest (Matt. xxvi:67; Mark xiv:65; John xviii:22).

PALMER-WORM (pām'ēr-wûrm'), (Heb. גַּוְזָאֵם, gaw-zawm', palmer-worm, caterpillar, creeping locust)

Probably a kind of locust which devoured vines, fig trees, and green things generally. The Hebrew word as above is gaw-zawm' (Joel i:4; ii:25; Amos iv:9). Its root signifies to cut off. It has not been identified. (See Locust.)

PALM TREE (pām' trē'), (Heb. תַּמָּר, taw-mawr', erect; Gr. φοινίξ, foy'nix). For botanical treatment see article TAMAR.

Figurative. (1) As "palm trees" were accounted symbols of victory, branches of palm were carried before conquerors in their triumphs; and, in allusion hereto, the saints are said to have "palms in their hands" to denote their victory over sin, Satan, the world, the persecutions of Antichrist, etc. (Rev. vii:9). (2) To mark their constant perseverance, heavenly and upright disposition, their necessity of fellowship with Christ, their spiritual beauty, and fruitfulness in good works, and their certain victory over all enemies, they are compared to "palm trees" (Ps. xcii:12; Cant. vii:7). (3) To represent them in their connections with angels and ministers, there were figures of "palm trees," and cherubims alternately mingled in Solomon's temple, and in Ezekiel's visionary one (1 Kings vi:29; Ezek. xl:16). (4) Idols were upright as the "palm tree"; they could make no motion; but merely stand, like so many erect logs of wood (Jer. x:5). (5) The primitive Church used the palm to express the triumph of the Christian over death through the resurrection; and on the tombs the palm is generally accompanied by the monogram of Christ, signifying that every victory of the Christian is due to this Divine name and sign. The palm is especially the sign of martyrdom, as this was considered in the light of victory.

Date Palm Tree.

PALSY (pal'zÿ), (Gr. παραλύομαι, par-a-loo'om-ai, to be paralytic, paralyzed).

A disease, or rather a series of morbid symptoms, distinguished by partial or total loss of sensibility, motion, or both, in one or more parts of the body (Mark ii:3, 9-12; Acts ix:33-35). It is produced by disease of the brain, the spinal cord, or particular nerves. (See PLAGUE.)

PALTÍ (päl'ti), (Heb. פַּלְתִּי, pal-tee', Jah delivers).

1. Son of Raphu, and a spy representing the tribe of Benjamin in the investigation of the Promised Land (Num. xiii:9). (B. C. 1657.)

2. A man to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife. She was later restored to David (1 Sam. xxv:44; 2 Sam. iii:15).

PALTIEL (päl'ti-el), (Heb. פַּלְתִּיֵּל, pal-tee-ale', God delivers).

A son of Azzan, and chief of the tribe of Issachar. He was one of those appointed to apportion the Promised Land among the tribes (Num. xxxiv:26). B. C. 1618. (See PHALTIEL.)

PALTITE (päl'tite), (Heb. פַּלְתִּיִּת, ha-pal-tee', the Palti).

The appellation of Helez, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii:26). He is called the "Pelonite" (1 Chron. xi:27), which is probably the correct reading.

PAMPHYLIA (päm-phýl'i-à), (Gr. Παμφυλία, pan-fool-ee'ah, of every race), a province in the southern part of Asia Minor, having the Mediterranean on the south, Cilicia on the east, Pisidia on the north and Lycia on the west.

It was nearly opposite the island of Cyprus; and the sea between the coast and the island is called in Acts the sea of Pamphylia. The chief cities of this province were Perga and Attalia. Christianity was probably first preached in this country by some of the Jewish proselytes who were converted on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii:10; xv:38). It was afterwards visited by Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii:13).

PAN (pän). Several words in the original are translated pan.

1. Kee-yore' (Heb. קִיּוֹר or קִיּוֹרָה), a basin of metal used for boiling or stewing (1 Sam. ii:14), translated laver (Exod. xxx:18). It was also used as a brazier for carrying fire (Zech. xii:6, A. V. hearth).

2. Makh-ab-ath' (Heb. מַחְבַּת), a frying pan, (Lev. ii:5, vi:21; vii:9; 1 Chron. xxiii:29), probably a shallow pan, griddle or plate such as are used by the Bedouins and Syrians for baking or dressing rapidly their meal cakes.

3. Mas-rayth' (Heb. מַסְרַיִת), scooped or hollowed out), a frying or saucepan (2 Sam. xiii:9), (etymology uncertain).

4. Seer (Heb. סֵיִר), a large pot, (2 Kings iv:38; comp. Exod. xxvii:3). See FOOD.

PANNAG (pän'näj), (Heb. פַּנָּג, pan-nag'), occurs only once in Scripture, but so much uncertainty exists respecting the meaning of the word, that in many translations, as, for instance, in the Authorized English Version, the original is retained.

Thus in the account of the commerce of Tyre, it is stated in Ezek. xxvii:17, 'Judah and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants; they traded in thy markets wheat of Minnith, and Pannag. and oil, and honey, and balm' (tzeri, translated also rosin in the margin of the English Bible). From the context it is evident that wheat, oil, and honey, that is, the products of their country as an agricultural territory, were conveyed by Judah and Israel as articles of traffic to the merchants and manufacturers of Tyre, who, it is certain, must, from their insular position, have obtained their chief articles of diet from the neighboring land of Syria. It is probable, therefore, that panmag and tzeri, whatever they may have been, were the produce of Palestine, or at least of Syria. Some have considered panmag to indicate balsam, others cassia, and some again sweetmeats, or confections. The Syrian version, however, translates panmag by the word dokhon, which signifies 'millet.' From the conflicting character of these opinions it seems that panmag must still be considered undetermined. J. F. R.

PAP (päp), (Heb. שֶׁד, shad, bulging, swelling out; Gr. μαστός, mas-tos'), the breast, especially of a woman (Ezek. xxiii:21; Luke xi:27, xxiii:29; Rev. i:13).

PAPER (pä'pēr), (Gr. χαρτης, khari'tace). See WRITING.

PAPER REED ((pä'pēr rēd), (Heb. אֲרָחִים, aw-rarw', naked), an erroneous rendering in the A. V. of 'aräh, nakedness, probably referring to the open spaces or grassy tracts where reeds grow (Is. xix:7). The PAPHOS is doubtless what is intended.

PAPHOS (pä'phos), (Gr. Πάφος, phaph'os), a city of Cyprus, at the western extremity of the island, and the seat of the Roman governor.

That officer, when Paul visited the place, was named Sergius Paulus, who was converted through the preaching of the Apostle and the miracle performed on Elymas (Acts xiii:6-13). Paphos was celebrated for a temple of Venus, whose infamous rites were still practiced here 400 years afterwards, notwithstanding the success of Paul, Barnabas, and others in preaching the gospel. Paphos is now a poor and inconsiderable place, but gives its name to a Greek bishopric. (Howson, Life and Letters of St. Paul; Smith, Classical Dict.; Harper's Classical Dict.)

PAPYRUS (pä-pi'rūs), (Heb. גֹּמֵה, go'meh), probably includes the papyrus, bulrushes, club rushes, and twig rush, i. e., plants of the orders Juncacea and Cyperacea. (See WRITING.)

PARABLE (pär'a-b'l). The word parable is derived from παραβολή, par-ab-oh-lay', a comparison which comes from παραβάλλειν, to compare, to collate.

1. Definition and Distinctions. In the New Testament it is employed by our translators as the rendering of παραβολή; in the Old it answers to מַשְׁלָל, maw-shaw'l'. (See PROVERB.)

(1) Enigmatical Saying. It denotes an obscure or enigmatical saying, e. g., Ps. xlix:4.

(2) Fictitious Narrative. It denotes a fictitious narrative, invented for the purpose of conveying truth in a less offensive or more engaging form than that of direct assertion. Of this sort is the parable by which Nathan reproved David (2 Sam. xii:2, 3), that in which Jotham exposed the folly of the Shechemites (Judg. ix:7-15), and that addressed by Jehoash to Amaziah (2 Kings xiv:9, 10). To this class also belong the parables of Christ.

(3) Figurative Discourse. Any discourse expressed in figurative, poetical, or highly ornamented diction is called a parable. Thus it is said, 'Balaam took up his parable' (Num. xxiii:7); and, 'Joh continued his parable' (Job xxvii:1). In the New Testament the word seems to have a more restricted signification, being generally employed in the second sense mentioned above, viz., to denote a fictitious narrative, under which is veiled some important truth.

(4) Essentially True Narratives. It has been supposed, indeed, that some of the parables uttered by our Savior narrate real and not fictitious events; but whether this was the case or not is a point of no consequence. Each of his parables was essentially true; it was true to human nature, and nothing more was necessary. Another meaning which the word occasionally bears in the New Testament is that of a type or emblem, as in Heb. ix:9, where παραβολή is rendered in our version figure.

(5) Excellence of the Parable. The excellence of a parable depends on the propriety and force of the comparison on which it is founded; on the general fitness and harmony of its parts; on the obviousness of its main scope or design; on the beauty and conciseness of the style in which it is expressed; and on its adaptation to the circumstances and capacities of the hearers. If the illustration is drawn from an object obscure or little known, it will throw no light on the point to be illustrated. If the resemblance is forced and inobvious, the mind is perplexed and disappointed in seeking for it. We must be careful, however, not to insist on too minute a correspondence of the objects compared. It is not to be expected that the resemblance will hold good in every particular; non enim res tota rei toti necesse est similis sit, says Cicero; but it is sufficient if the agreement exists in those points on which the main scope of the parable depends. If we test the parables of the Old Testament by the rules above laid down, we shall not find them wanting in any excellence belonging to this species of composition. What can be more forcible, more persuasive, and more beautiful than the parables of Jotham (Judg. ix:7-15), of Nathan (2 Sam. xii:1-14), of Isaiah (v:1-5), and of Ezekiel (xix:1-9)?

2. Parables of Christ. But the parables uttered by our Savior claim preëminence over all others on account of their number, variety, appositiveness, and beauty. Indeed it is impossible to conceive of a mode of instruction better fitted to engage the attention, interest the feelings, and impress the conscience, than that which our Lord adopted. Among its advantages may be mentioned the following:

(1) Secured Attention. It secured the attention of multitudes who would not have listened to truth conveyed in the form of abstract propositions.

(2) Familiar Method. This mode of teaching was one with which the Jews were familiar, and for which they entertained a preference.

(3) Tactful. Some truths which, if openly stated, would have been opposed by a barrier of prejudice, were in this way insinuated, as it were, into men's minds, and secured their assent unawares.

(4) Hidden Truth. The parabolic style was well adapted to conceal Christ's meaning from those who, through obstinacy and perverseness, were indisposed to receive it. This is the meaning of Isaiah in the passage quoted in Matt. xiii:13. Not that the truth was ever hidden from those who sincerely sought to know it; but it was wrapped in just enough of obscurity to veil it from those who 'had pleasure in unrighteousness,' and who would 'not come to the light lest their deeds should be reprovèd.' In accordance with strict justice, such were 'given up to strong delusions, that they might believe a lie.' With the upright man thou wilt show thyself upright; with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward.'

(1) Scope of Christ's Parables. The scope or design of Christ's parables is sometimes to be gathered from his own express declaration, as in Luke xii:16-20; xiv:11; xvi:9. In other cases it must be sought by considering the context, the circumstances in which it was spoken, and the features of the narrative itself, i. e. the literal sense. For the right understanding of this, an acquaintance with the customs of the people, with the productions of their country, and with the events of their history, is often desirable. Most of our Lord's parables, however, admit of no doubt as to their main scope, and are so simple and perspicuous that 'he who runs may read,' 'if there be first a willing mind.' To those more difficult of comprehension more thought and study should be given, agreeably to the admonition prefixed to some of them by our Lord himself, 'Whoso heareth, let him understand.'

(2) The Number of Parables in the gospels differs according to the range given to the application of the term. Greswell reckons 27; Trench, 30; Plumtre, 31; others 50.

Matthew and Luke give us most of the parables. Mark dwells more on the acts than the discourses of Christ. John has no parables proper. He took them for granted from the earlier gospels, and gives us instead those higher discourses of our Lord respecting his relation to the Father. For PARABLES OF JESUS CHRIST, see Appendix, p. 55.

The following are among the principal works on the parables: Gray, Delineation of the Parables, 1777; Bulkley, Discourses on the Parables, 1771; Collyer, Discourses on the Parables, 1815; Kromm, Homilien über die Parabeln Jesu, 1823; Unger, De Parabolis Jesu, 1828; Bailey, Exposition of the Parables, 1829; Schultze, De Parabolis Jesu Christi, 1827; Lisco, Die Parabeln Jesu, 1832; Stevens, Parables, 1855; Kirk, Lectures, 1856; Oxenden, Parables, 1866; Machlachan, Notes, 1870; De Teissier, Parables, 1870.

See also Greswell, Trench, Arndt, Arnot, Stier. Our Lord has himself explained the parable of the Sower and the parable of the Wheat and the Tares. His explanation must be the standard by which our interpretations are to be regulated and measured.

PARACLETE (par'a-klēte), (Gr. παράκλητος, paraklētōs, summoned, called to one's side), one who pleads another's cause before a judge, an advocate, as in 1 John ii:1, where it is applied to Christ.

In the A. V. the word is translated 'Comforter' in the Gospel, and 'Advocate' in the Epistle, without any marginal alternative. In the R. V. these translations are retained, but at each occurrence in the Gospel there is found the marg. note 'Or Advocate, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete'; and in John ii:1, the note 'Or Comforter, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete.' These translations reflect the history of the interpretation of the word in the New Testament. In its reference to Christ the meaning of 'Advocate' has been generally acquiesced in; but, in its references to the Holy Spirit, it has all along been disputed whether the meaning is Advocate (taken by most in the largest sense, not only Pleader or Defender, but Helper) or Comforter (in the sense of Consoler). (J. Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See HOLY GHOST.)

PARADISE (pär'a-dīs), (Gr. παράδεισος, paradēi-sos; from Heb. פַּרְדֵּס, par-dace), rendered "forest," Neh. ii:8; also "orchard," Eccles. ii:5; צַנַּן, iv:

13), the term which by long and extensive use has been employed to designate the Garden of Eden, the first dwelling place of human beings.

(1) Early Use of Term. Of this word paradeisos, the earliest instance that we have is in the Cyropædia and other writings of Xenophon, nearly 400 years before Christ; but his use of it has that appearance of ease and familiarity which leads us to suppose that it was current among his countrymen. We find it also used by Plutarch, who lived in the first and second century of our era. It was by those authors evidently employed to signify an extensive plot of ground, enclosed with a strong fence or wall, abounding in trees, shrubs, plants, and garden culture, and in which choice animals were kept in different ways of restraint or freedom, according as they were ferocious or peaceable; thus answering very closely to our English word park, with the addition of gardens, a menagerie, and an aviary.

From its original meaning the term came to be used as a metaphor for the abstract idea of exquisite delight, was transferred still higher to denote the happiness of the righteous in the future state. The origin of this application must be assigned to the Jews of the middle period between the Old and the New Testament. In the Chaldee Targums, 'the Garden of Eden' is but as the exposition of heavenly blessedness (Ps. xc. 17, and other places). The Talmudical writings, cited by the elder Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. et Talm., p. 1802), and John James Wetstein (New Testament Greek, vol. i, p. 819), contain frequent references to Paradise as the immortal heaven, to which the spirits of the just are admitted immediately upon the liberation from the body. The book Sohar speaks of an earthly and a heavenly Paradise, of which the latter excels the former 'as much as darkness does light.' (Schœtgen. Hor. Hebr. vol. i. p. 1096.)

Hence we see that it was in the acceptance of the current Jewish phraseology that the expression was used by our Lord and the Apostles: 'To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise;' 'He was caught up into Paradise;' 'The tree of life, which is in the Paradise of my God' (Luke xxiii: 43; 2 Cor. xii: 4; Rev. ii: 7).

(2) Eden is the most ancient and venerable name in geography, the name of the first district of the earth's surface of which human beings could have any knowledge. All that is related about it goes to show that Eden was a tract of country; and that in the most eligible part of it was the Paradise, the garden of all delights, in which the Creator was pleased to place his new and pre-eminent creature with the inferior beings for his sustenance and solace.

(3) Conjectures Concerning Location of Eden. (a) Upon the question of its exact geographical position dissertations innumerable have been written. Many authors have given descriptive lists of them, with arguments for and against each. The most convenient presentation of their respective outlines has been reduced to a tabulated form, with ample illustrations, by the Rev. N. Morren, annexed to his Translation of the younger Rosenmüller's Biblical Geography of Central Asia, pp. 91-98; Edinb, 1836. He reduces them to nine principal theories. But the fact is that not one of them answers to all the conditions of the problem. We more than doubt the possibility of finding any locality that will do so.

(b) That Phrat is the Euphrates, and Hiddeke, the Tigris, is agreed, with scarcely an exception; but in determining the two other rivers, great diversity of opinion exists; and, to our apprehension, satisfaction is and must remain unattainable, from the impossibility of making the evidence to cohere in all its parts. It has been remarked that this difficulty might have been expected, and is obviously probable, from the geological changes that may have taken place, and especially in connection with the Deluge. This remark would not be applicable to the extent that is necessary for the argument, except upon the supposition before mentioned, that the earlier parts of the book of Genesis consist of primeval documents, even antediluvian, and that this is one of them. There is reason to think that since the Deluge the face of the country cannot have undergone any change approaching to what the hypothesis of a postdiluvian composition would require. But we think it highly probable that the principal of the immediate causes of the Deluge, the 'breaking up of the fountains of the great deep,' was a subsidence of a large part or parts of the land between the inhabited tract (which we humbly venture to place in east longitude from Greenwich, 30° to 90° and north latitude 25° to 40°) and the sea which lay to the south; or an elevation of the bed of that sea. (See DELUGE.)

(c) Either of these occurrences, produced by volcanic causes, or both of them conjointly or successively, would be adequate to the production of the awful Deluge, and the return of the waters would be effected by an elevation of some part of the district which had been submerged; and that part could scarcely fail to be charged with animal remains. The geological researches of Dr. Falconer and Captain Cautley have brought to light bones, more or less mineralized, of the giraffe (camelopardalis), in the Sewalik range of hills, which seems to be a branch of the Himalayas, westward of the river Jumna. But the giraffe is not an animal that can live in a mountainous region, or even on the skirts of such a region; its subsistence and its safety require 'an open country and broad plains to roam over.' (Falconer and Cautley, in Proceed. Geol. Soc., Nov. 15, 1843). The present position, therefore, of these fossil remains—'of almost every large pachydermatous genus, such as the elephant, mastodon, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, sus (swine), horse, etc.,' also deer and oxen—lodged in ravines and vales among the peaks, at vast elevations, leads to the supposition of a late elevation of extensive plains.

(d) Thus we seem to have a middle course pointed out between the two extremes; the one, that by the Deluge the ocean and the land were made to exchange places for permanency; the other, that very little alteration was produced in the configuration of the earth's surface. Indeed, such alteration might not be considerable in places very distant from the focus of elevation; but near that central district it could not but be very great. An alteration of level, five hundred times less than that effected by the upthrow of the Himalayas, would change the beds of many rivers, and quite obliterate others.

(e) From all that can be ascertained it seems to have been a tract of country, the finest imaginable, lying probably between the 33d and the 37th degree of north latitude, of such moderate elevation, and so adjusted, with respect to mountain ranges and water-sheds and forests, as to preserve the most agreeable and salubrious conditions of temperature and all atmospheric changes. Its surface must therefore have been constantly diversified by hill and plain. From its hill-sides, between the croppings out of their strata, springs trickled out, whose streamlets, joining in their courses, formed at the bottom small rivers, which again receiving other streams (which had in the same way flowed down from the higher grounds), became, in the bottom of every valley, a more considerable river. These valleys joined together, as must consequently the streams contained in them; wider valleys or larger plains appeared; the river of each united itself with that of its next neighbor; others contributed their waters as the augmenting stream proceeded; and finally it quitted the land of Eden, to continue its course to some sea, or to lose its waters by the evaporation of the atmosphere or the absorption of the sandy desert. In the finest part of this land of Eden the Creator had formed an enclosure, probably by rocks and forests and rivers, and had filled it with every product of nature conducive to use and happiness. Due moisture, of both the ground and the air, was preserved by the streamlets from the nearest hills, and the rivulets from the more distant; and such streamlets and rivulets, collected according to the levels of the surrounding country ('it proceeded from Eden') flowed off afterwards in four larger streams, each of which thus became the source of a great river.

After the explication given, it may seem the most suitable to look for the object of our exploration, the site of Paradise, in the south of Armenia. J. P. S.

For a learned and ingenious work on the subject see Paradise at the North Pole, by Pres. Warren, Boston Univ. (See EDEN; PARADISE, RIVERS OF.)

PARADISE, RIVERS OF (pär'â-dis, rîv'êrs ôv).

The old question, "Where was the garden of Eden?" is a fascinating one, but it is one of those which the monuments have not yet elucidated, although they do provide some illustrative material concerning it. Where it was must be settled from the description of the four rivers, although after the rivers are settled or conjectured, it remains to decide whether their head waters or their mouths are to be regarded as making the "four heads" spoken of as the locality of the garden. We may dismiss the conjectures which put Paradise in America or at the north pole, and consider the theories which suppose the four rivers to be somewhere about Southern Babylonia.

Of these, the one which has of late had the most currency is one which has been developed at length by the younger Delitzsch in his work entitled "Wo lag das Paradies?" He begins with the certainty about the two rivers Euphrates and Tigris (Hiddekel) and makes the other two to be the two great canals of Southern Babylonia the volume of whose water was nearly as great as that of the two main rivers—the Pallakopas Canal, which runs along under the Arabian hills west of the Euphrates, being the Pison, and the Shatt-eu-Nil which runs, or ran, between and parallel to the Euphrates and Tigris, being the Gihon. But it is not easy to show that the Pallakopas "compasseth the whole land of Havilah" which ought to be Arabia where are found gold, onyx, and the bdellium.

Neither can the Shatt-eu-Nil be supposed to "compass the whole land of Ethiopia."

The latest considerable discussion of the four rivers is that by Professor Haupt in a paper read before the American Oriental Society. Of course the Tigris and the Euphrates are perfectly clear, and he supposes that the author meant to describe the imaginary upper course of the Nile in the Asiatic region as the Gihon. The river Pison is in the extreme east, most distant from the writer and so named first and most fully described. It flows around Havilah (Arabia) whose products are pure gold, the gum bdellium, and the shoham stone—translated onyx in the English version, but really the pearl, literally, the "gray gem," as its Assyrian name indicates.

This can be nothing but the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, conceived of as one river flowing around Arabia, but originating from the same source as the Tigris and Euphrates. The Palestinian writer would have conceived of the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea as much narrower than they now are. We must remember that the Assyrians called the Persian Gulf naru marratu—the bitter or salt river. There is no sharp distinction between river and sea in Semitic languages, and it is quite a modern thought to distinguish different bodies of water, such as a river, bay, sea, and ocean.

So far as the Pison is concerned, this identification is very much like that of Dr. Taylor Lewis in his translation of Lange's "Commentary on Genesis," published as long ago as 1868. He placed Eden at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates in Lower Babylonia; and then taking this same idea of the ocean as a river, which is familiar to every reader of Homer, Pindar, or Strabo, he supposed the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf surrounding Arabia to be the Gihon, while the Indian Gulf and the Indian Ocean washing the shores to the end as far as India, along which he places Havilah, he supposed to be the Pison. It will be seen that he makes both rivers to be ocean streams, one tending eastwardly and the other westwardly, from Eden.

It will seem strange to many to think of the broad ocean as we know it as only a river. But we must get out of our modern conceptions, to be in a condition to understand ancient ways of conceiving of the earth and the ocean.

In the Old Testament the word nahar, river, is applied to floods, which lift their waves or voices. In Ps. lxxvi:6 it is applied to the Red Sea. Jonah says (ii:4), "The river (translated flood) went round me," referring to the Mediterranean. Equally rivers like the Nile are called "sea." So Homer frequently speaks of the ocean as a river, and the Greek geographer, Strabo, also speaks of the four great bays, or sinuses—the Caspian and the Pontus on the north, and the Persian and the Arabian seas on the south—as inlets from the ocean streams. The question of the location of the Garden of Eden is one which we can hardly answer satisfactorily, and it is only in minor points that anything can yet be added to guide a conclusion as to the site of Eden or the identity of the two disputed rivers, Pison and Gihon. PARAH (pā'reh), (Heb. פָּרָה, par-rah', the neifer).

A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:23). Identified with the ruins of Fârah, about five miles northeast of Jerusalem. (Buckingham, Travels, p. 312.)

PARALYTIC (pär'â-lit'îk). See PALSY.

PARAMOUR (pär'â-moor), (Heb. פְּרִימֹר, pelel'ghesh), in Ezek. xxiii:20 applied to the male lover, but elsewhere translated concubine. (See CONCUBINAGE.)

PARAN (pā'ran), (Heb. פָּרָן, par-ran'; Sept. φάρων, pha-ran').

A name which seems to be applied in Scripture to the whole of the desert region extending from the frontiers of Judah to the borders of Sinai. At least, as we find it in the south of this region, bordering Sinai (Num. x:12; xii:16), and in the north bordering on Kadesh (Num. xiii:3, 26; xx:1), it seems easier to suppose that Paran was the name of the whole region marked by these limits than that there were two opposite districts bearing the same name.

The name is still preserved in that of Wady Feiran, a valley of the lower Sinai, through which lay the road which appears to have been taken by the Israelites in their march to the upper region. In this valley there are ruins of a town, and indeed of more than one, with towers, aqueducts, and sepulchral excavations; and here Ruppel found the remains of a church, which he assigns to the fifth century (Reise in Nubien, p. 263; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 616). This was the Pharan or Faran which had a Christian population, and was the seat of a bishopric so early as A. D. 400 (Oriens Christ., col. 735; Reland, Palæst. pp. 219, 220, 228).

Paran is first mentioned in connection with the conquest of the confederate kings, when it appears to have been the home of the Horites (Gen. xiv:6). Hagar and Ishmael, after being driven away by Abraham, went into the wilderness of Paran (Gen. xxi:21); the Israelites entered it soon after leaving Sinai (Num. x:12, 33; xi:3, 34, 35; xii:16); the spies were sent up to Canaan and returned from this region; and eighteen stations of the Israelites' journey are noted in this wilderness (Num. xiii:3, 26; xxxiii:17-36; comp. Deut. i:1). Probably, during their thirty-eight years of sojourn in the wilderness, the people were scattered over a wide extent of territory, like the modern Bedouin tribes. David found refuge in this wilderness (1 Sam. xxv:1), and Hadad passed through it when escaping to Egypt (1 Kings xi:18).

PARAN, MOUNT OF (pā'ran mount òv), occurs only in two passages, denoting the place where the Lord is said to have shined forth (Deut. xxxiii:2; Hab. iii:3).

It was probably the most southern portion of the mountain-plateau in the northeastern part of the wilderness of Paran, now Jebel Magra'h. In this region is situated Ain Gadis, which some identify with Kadesh, and the one encampment in the wilderness of Kadesh. Jebel Magra'h would always be the most conspicuous object, and would completely shut out from view the more fertile mountains beyond.

PARBAR (pār'bar), (Heb. פַּרְבָּר, par-bar', suburb).

A precinct or colonnade on the west side of the temple inclosure (1 Chron. xxvi:18). It contained rooms occupied by officials and divisions for stock (2 Kings xxiii:11).

PARCEL (pār'sēl), (Heb. כְּהֵל־כָּאֵר, khel-kaw', Gen. xxxiii:19; Josh. xxiv:32), portion, lot, piece.

Still employed as a law term for a piece or parcel of ground. Lord Bacon uses the expression "no parcel" (i. e. no portion) "of the world."

PARCHED CORN (pärcht kôrn), (Heb. כָּאֵר־לֵעָ, kaw-lee', roasted).

Grain roasted on the stalk over a blaze, which burned off the chaff and left the kernels cooked ready for eating (Lev. xxiii:14; Ruth ii:14; 1 Sam. xvii:17).

"Harvest is the time for parched corn—not what we lads in Ohio meant by the words. It is made thus; a quantity of the best heads, not too ripe, are plucked with the stalks attached. These are tied into small parcels, a blazing fire is kindled with dry grass and thorn bushes, and the grain-heads are held in it until the chaff is mostly burned off. The grain is thus sufficiently roasted to be eaten, and it is a favorite article all over the country. When traveling in harvest time, my muleteers have very often thus prepared parched corn in the evenings after the tent has been pitched. Nor is the gathering of this green grain for parching ever regarded as stealing. After it has been roasted, it is rubbed out in the hand and eaten as there is occasion." (Thomson, Land and Book, vol. ii. 510.)

PARCHED GROUND (pärcht ground), (Heb. שָׁוְיָ, shaw-rawb', to glare).

The Hebrew word thus rendered (Is. xxxv:7), denotes that optical delusion known by the name of "mirage," and frequently occurring in the African and Asiatic deserts. On account of the different refraction of the solar rays in the various layers of the atmosphere, the white, barren sand-waste suddenly assumes the aspect of a beautiful lake surrounded by trees and a most luxuriant vegetation. Schaff.

Figurative. The Gentile world, and unregenerate men, are likened to "parched ground"; how destitute of the sap of divine truth, and gracious habits and influences; how barren of good works; how scorched with the power of temptation, with corrupt inclinations and customs (Is. xxxv:7). Brown.

PARCHED PLACES (pärcht pläs'ēs), (Heb. חֲרָבָה, khaw-rare', arid, Jer. xvii:6). Here parched is employed in the usual sense of dry, arid.

Figurative. To inhabit "parched places" is to be in a most wretched and destitute condition (Jer. xvii:6).

PARCHMENT (pärch'ment), (Gr. μεμβράνα, mem-brah'nah, a thin skin of parchment). Parchment was used for the manuscripts of the Pentateuch in the time of Josephus, and the μεμβράνας of 2 Tim. iv:13, were skins of parchment. (See WRITING.)

PARDON (pär'd'n), (Heb. פָּרַד, kaw-far', to cover, to hide, to purge, Ps. xxv:11).

The Scriptural import of this term is very imperfectly indicated by the common acceptance of it among men. In the dispensation of grace pardon is inseparably connected with justification. Hence it is spoken of as the covering of sin (Ps. lxxxv:2); the non-imputation of it (Ps. xxxii:2); a blotting out (Ps. li:1, 9; Is. xlili:25); forgetting it (Heb. viii:12); passing by it or removing it to an immeasurable distance from us (Ps. ciii:12; Mic. vii:19).

It is evident that God only has power to bestow pardon (Mark ii:7, 10-12), and that it proceeds from free sovereign grace (Eph. i:6, 7), through the mediation and atonement of Jesus Christ (Heb. ix:9-28; 1 John i:7).

Men are commissioned to preach pardon and salvation through the blood of Christ. (See FORGIVENESS; JUSTIFICATION.)

"PARE HER NAILS." See NAIL OF THE FINGER.

PARENT (pär'ent), (Gr. γονεύς, gon-yooce', begetter), a name properly given to a father or a mother, but extended also to relations by blood, especially in a direct line, upward.

Scripture commands children to honor their parents (Exod. xx:12) i. e. to obey them, to succor them, to respect them, to give them all assistance that nature, and their and our circumstances require. Christ (Matt. xv:5, 6) condemns that corrupt explication which the doctors of the law gave of this precept; by teaching that a child was disengaged from the obligation of supporting and assisting his parents. (See FAMILY.)

PARLOR (pär'lër), the translation of three Hebrew words:

1. Kheh'der (Heb. כְּהֵדֵר, an enclosed place, an apartment), the inner rooms of the temple porch and Holy Place (1 Chron. xxviii:11); generally "chamber."

2. Lish-kaw' (Heb. לִישָׁה, a corner cell or "chamber," as generally rendered, in a courtyard (1 Sam. ix:22).

3. Al-ee-yaw' (Heb. עֲלֵיָהּ, lofty), an upper room of coolness, or chamber, as the words imply (Judg. iii:20-28).

This was a room upon the flat roof of a house, which was open to currents of air, and so offered a cool place, such as are still met with in the East. (McC. & Str. Cyc.)

Kitto thinks it was a chamber or apartment detached from the main rooms of the house. (See HOUSE.)

PARMASHTA (par-mäsh'tä), (Heb. פַּרְמַשְׁתָּא, par-mash-taw'), the seventh son of Haman, slain by the Jews at Shushan (Esth. ix:9), B. C. 473.

PARMENAS (pär'mē-näs), (Gr. Παρμενάς, par-men-as', probably, constant).

One of the first seven deacons of the church formed at Jerusalem (Acts vi:5). Nothing more is known of him; but the Roman martyrologies allege that he suffered martyrdom under Trajan. (A. D. 29.)

PARNACH (pär'näk), (Heb. פַּרְנַחִי, par-nak'), perhaps swift), a Zebulunite, father of Elizaphan (Num. xxxiv:25), B. C. before 1618.

PAROSH (pä'rösh), (Heb. פַּרְעִישֵׁי, par-oshe', a flea).

The founder of a family, 2,172 of whose members returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:3; Neh. vii:8), and 150 males with Ezra (Ezra viii:3). Seven of the family married Gentile wives (Ezra x:25). They helped in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem and were represented in signing the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. iii:25; x:14). (B. C. before 535-445.)

PARSHANDATHA (par-shän'da-thä), (Heb. פַּרְשַׁנְדָּתָה, par-shan-daw-thaw', perhaps, given to Persia), the eldest son of Haman, put to death with his father (Esth. ix:7), B. C. 437.

PARTHIA (pär'thi-a), (Gr. Παρθία, par-thee'ah), the country of the Parthians (Πάρθοι), mentioned in Acts ii:9, as being with their neighbors, the Medes and Elamites, present at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost.

The persons referred to were Jews from Parthia, and the passage is a strong evidence showing how widely spread were members of the Hebrew family in the first century of our era. The term originally referred to a small mountainous district lying to the northeast of Media. Afterwards it came to be applied to the great Parthian kingdom, into which this province expanded. Parthia proper, or ancient Parthia, lying between Aria and Hyrcania, the residence of a rude and poor tribe, and traversed by bare mountains, woods, and sandy steppes, formed a part of the great Persian monarchy, being a dependency on the satrapy of Hyrcania. Its inhabitants were of Scythian origin. They formed a part of the army of Xerxes, and were found in that of the last Darius. In the breaking up of the kingdom of Alexander the Parthians took sides with Eumenes, and became subject to Antigonos and the Seleucidæ.

But Arsaces arose against the Syro-Macedonian power, and commenced a new dynasty in his own person, designated by the title of Arsacidæ. This was the beginning of the great Parthian empire, which extended itself in the early days of Christianity over all the provinces of what had been the Persian kingdom, having the Euphrates for its western boundary, by which it was separated from the dominions of Rome. It was divided into eighteen provinces. Now at peace, now in bitter hostilities with Rome, now the victor and now the vanquished, the Parthians were never subjugated by the Romans. At length Artaxxerxes defeated the Parthians in a great battle, succeeded to all the dominions of the Parthian kings, and founded the new Persian empire, to the rulers of which is commonly given the name of the Sassanidæ. The government of Parthia was monarchical; but as there was no settled and recognized line of succession, rival aspirants were constantly presenting themselves, which weakened the country with internal broils, especially as the Romans saw it to be to their interest to foster dissensions and encourage rivalries, and this led eventually to the overthrow of the dynasty by the successful aspirant, Artaxerxes. During the Syro-Macedonian period the Parthian and Jewish history kept apart in separate spheres, but under the Romans the Parthians defended the party of Antigonos against Hyrcanus, and even took and plundered Jerusalem (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13. 3; De Bell. Jud. i. 13). The geography of Parthia may be studied, besides in the ancient authorities, in Cellar. Notit. ii. 700; Mannert, v. 102.

PARTIALITY (pär'sh'i-äl'y-tÿ).

1. Pros'klis-is (Gr. πρόσκλισις, 1 Tim. v:21) is an inclination of mind. The exhortation of the apostle is that nothing should be done under an undue tendency towards one or another party.

2. Ad-ee-ak'-ree-tos (Gr. ἀδιάκριτος, James iii:17) means without uncertainty or ambiguity; and so Divine wisdom is reliable, not being uncertain or variable in its operations.

PARTICULAR, PARTICULARLY (pär-tik'-û-lër, pär-tik'-û-lër-lÿ), one by one. St. Paul could not in an epistle enlarge "particularly," in explaining the signification of every individual utensil of the temple (Heb. ix:5). In 1 Cor. xii:27, he says: 'Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular' (μελέη ἐκ μέρους, R. V. 'severally members thereof,' R. V. marg. 'members each in his part'); Eph. v:33 'Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself' (καὶ ὑμεῖς ὡς καθ' ἑνα, ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα οὕτως ἀγαπᾷ ὡς ἑαυτόν; R. V. 'Do ye also severally love each one his own wife even as himself'.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF (pär-tish'ün, mid'd'l wal öv), (Gr. μεσότοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ), the expression (Eph. ii:14) employed by St. Paul to designate the Mosaic law as the dividing line between the Jews and Gentiles. (See TEMPLE.)

PARTRIDGE (pär'trij), (Heb. קָרַי, ko-ray', a caller, from its cry).

(1) The word occurs but twice in the Old Testament (1 Sam. xxvi:20; Jer. xvii:11; Sept. περδικῆ, par'diks, Vulg. perdix, Ecclus. xi:31). Late commentators state that there are four species of the Tetrao (grouse) of Linnæus abundant in Palestine; the francolin (T. francolinus), the katta (T. alchata), the red-legged or Barbary partridge (T. petrosus), and the Greek partridge (T. saxatilis). In this now obsolete classification there are included not less than three genera, according to the more correct systems of recent writers, and not one strictly a grouse occurs in the number, though the real T. Urogallus, or cock of the woods, is reported to frequent Asia Minor in winter, and in that case is probably no stranger in Libanus. There is, however, the genus Pterocles, of which the P. alchata is the katta, ganga, cata, and pin-tailed grouse of authors, a species very common in Palestine, and innumerable in Arabia; but it is not the only one, for the sand-grouse of Latham (P. arenarius) occurs in France, Spain, Barbary, Arabia, Persia, and on the north side of the Mediterranean, or all round Palestine. These are distinguished from other genera of Tetraonide by their long and powerful wings, enabling them to reach water, which they delight to drink in abundance; and by this propensity they often indicate to the thirsty caravan in what direction to find relief. They feed more on insects, larvæ, and worms than on seeds, and none of the species having a perfect hind toe that reaches the ground, they run fast: these characteristics are of some importance in determining whether they were held to be really clean birds, and consequently could be the selav of the Israelites, which our versions have rendered 'quail.' (See QUAIL; UNCLEAN BIRDS.)

(2) The Francolin forms a second genus, whereof F. vulgaris, or the common tree partridge, is the Syrian species best known, though most likely not the only one of that country. It is larger than the ganga; the male is always provided with one pair of spurs (though others of the genus have two), and has the tail longer than true partridges. This species is valued for the table, is of handsome plumage, and common from Spain and France, on both sides of the Mediterranean.

(3) The partridge is a third genus, reckoning in Syria the two species before named, both red-legged and furnished with orange and black crescents on the sides; but the other markings differ, and the Barbary species is smaller than the Greek. They are inferior in delicacy to the common partridge, and it is probable that Perdix rufa, and the Caspian partridge, both resembling the former in many particulars, are no strangers in Syria.

(4) The expostulation of David with Saul, where he says, 'The king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge on the mountains,' is perfectly natural; for the red-legged partridges are partial to upland brushwood, which is not an uncommon character of the hills and mountains of Palestine; and the partridge sitting on her eggs and not hatching them (Jer. xvii:11) we take to allude to the liability of the nest being trodden under foot, or robbed by carnivorous animals, notwithstanding all the care and interesting manœuvres of the parent birds to save it or the brood; for this genus is monogamous, nestles on the ground, and both male and female sit, and anxiously watch over the safety of their young. C. H. S.

PARUAH (pär'yū-ah), (Heb. פָּרוּאָה, par-oo'akh, blossoming).

The father of Solomon's purveyor, Jehoshaphat, in Issachar (1 Kings iv:17). (B. C. about 1012.)

PARVAIM (par-vā'im), (Heb. פָּרְוַיִם, par-vah'yim, eastern).

A region producing the finest gold (2 Chron. iii:6). There is very strong reason to conclude, with Bochart, that it is the same with Ophir. Castell, however, identifies it with Barbatia on the Tigris, which is named by Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi. 32); and Gesenius, seeking the root of the name in the Sanskrit parva, 'before,' i. e. 'eastern,' concludes it to be a general term, corresponding to our Levant, meaning east country; so that 'gold of Parvaim' means Eastern gold.

PASACH (pā'sak), (Heb. פָּסַח, par-sak', to divide), the first of the three sons of Japhlet, of Asher (1 Chron. vii:33), B. C. about 1618.

PAS-DAMMIM (pās-dām'mim), (Heb. פַּסְדָּמִים, pas'dam-mem', the border of blood), a place in the tribe of Judah, (1 Chron. xi:13) called Ephes-dammim (1 Sam. xvii:1).

PASEAH (pa-se'ah), (Heb. פָּסְעָה, par-say'akh, lame).

1. A son of Eshton, descendant of Judah, and one of the "men of Rechah" (1 Chron. iv:12). (B. C. after 1618.)

2. The head of a family of Nethinim who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:49). The name is Phaseah (Neh. vii:51). Jehoida, a "son," assisted in rebuilding the old gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:6). (B. C. before 446.)

PASHUR (pāsh'ur), (Heb. פֶּשֶׁר, phash'khor, liberation). (See PHASSUR.)

1. The son of Immer, a priest, and chief overseer of the temple, who smote Jeremiah and put him in the stocks for his prophecies of captivity and ruin; on which the prophet was commissioned to declare that he should be one of those to go into exile, and that he and all his friends should die in Babylon, and be buried there (Jer. xx:1-6). (B. C. 607.)

2. The son of Melchiah, a high officer of king Zedekiah, and one of those at whose instance Jeremiah was cast into prison (Jer. xxi:1; xxxviii:1-6). A descendant of his is mentioned among the new colonists of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. xi:12). (B. C. 589.)

3. The father of the Gedaliah who assisted Pashur in accusing and imprisoning Jeremiah (Jer. xxxviii:1). (B. C. 589.)

4. The founder of a family who returned from the captivity (Ezra ii:38; Neh. vii:41). Some of the family married Gentile wives (Ezra x:22), whom they divorced.

PASS (pās), (Gr. ὑπερβάλλω, hoop-er-bal'lo, Eph. iii:10; Phil. iv:7), to exceed, go beyond, surpass.

PASSAGE (pās'sāj), (from Heb. פָּסַג, aw-bar', to cross).

A passage of a river is a ford or bridge (Judg. xii:6). In a country a "passage" often signifies a narrow way between mountains, lakes, etc., such as the "passages" of Michmash and Abarim, that were rendered narrow by the hills or rocks on each side (1 Sam. xiii:23; Jer. xxii:20).

PASSENGER (pās'sēn-jēr), (Prov. ix:15; Ezek. xxxix:11, 14, 15) is used in the A. V. in the sense of a passer-by, not, as now, one "ticketed for a journey."

PASSION (pāsh'ūn), (Gr. πάσχω, pas'-kko).

This word has several very different significations. 1. It signifies the passion or suffering of Christ: "To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion" (Acts i:3). For the chief points of the history of the event, see JESUS CHRIST. 2. It signifies feeling, emotion, or wicked desires (Rom. i:26), to which those are given up whom God abandons to their own impulses (Rom. vii:5; 1 Thess. iv:5).

PASSIONS, LIKE (pāsh'ūns lik), (Gr. ὁμοιοπαθής, hom-oy-of-ath-acc'), used in the expressions "men of like passions with you" (Acts xiv:15) and "a man subject to like passions as we are" (James v:17) having the sense (1) of suffering the like with another, (2) having like feelings or affections.

PASSOVER (pās'ō-vēr), (Heb. פֶּח'סַח, feh'sakh; Gr. πάσχα, pas'-kakh), a passing over, sparing or protection.

(1) Twofold Reference. The Passover, like the Sabbath and other institutions, had a twofold reference—historical and typical. As a commemorative institution it was designed to preserve amongst the Hebrews a grateful sense of their redemption from Egyptian bondage, and of the protection granted to their firstborn on the night when all the firstborn of the Egyptians were destroyed (Exod. xii:27); as a typical institute its object was to shadow forth the great facts and consequences of the Christian Sacrifice (1 Cor v:7).

(2) Three Acceptations. The word Passover has three general acceptations in Scripture. (1) It denotes the yearly solemnity celebrated on the 14th day of Nisan or Abib, which was strictly the Passover of the Lamb, for on that day the Israelites were commanded to roast the lamb and eat it in their own houses. (2) It signifies that yearly festivity, celebrated on the 15th of Nisan, which may be called the Feast of the Passover (Deut. xvi:2; Num. xxviii:16, 17). (3) It denotes the whole solemnity, commencing on the 14th, and ending on the 21st day of Nisan (Luke xxii:1), though, in strictness of speech, the Passover and the feast of unfermented things, are distinct institutions. The paschal lamb, in the age following the first institution of the Passover in Egypt, and after the settlement of the Hebrews in Palestine, could only be killed by the priests in the court of the temple (Deut. xvi:5-7; 2 Chron. xxxv:1-11; Lev. xvii:3-6), whence the owner of the lamb received it from the priests and brought it to his house in Jerusalem, and roasted it, and ate it in the evening (Maimonides, Corban Pesach, c. i. sec. 6); and it was thus that Christ kept the Passover, eating it in a chamber within Jerusalem (Luke xxii:7-11); but the feast of unfermented things (Exod. xii:15) the Jews thought themselves bound to keep in every place in which they might dwell, if they could not visit Jerusalem; 'the eating of it,' says Maimonides, 'depended not upon the Passover, for it was a commandment by itself' (Chometz Vematzah, sec. 6). As, however, from the evening of the 14th to the 21st day of Abib or Nisan (April), all ferment was banished from the habitations of the Hebrews, both institutions thus received a common name (1 Cor. v:5, 7, 8, 13).

(3) How and When Prepared. On the 10th of the month Abib, the master of a family separated a ram or a goat of a year old, without blemish (Exod. xii:1-6; 1 Pet. i:19), which was slain on the 14th day, between the two evenings, before the altar (Deut. xvi). The Jewish day had twelve hours (John xi:9), counting from sunrise, about six of the clock of our time. The ninth hour (or three in the afternoon) was the hour of prayer, when they went into the temple, at the daily evening sacrifice (Acts iii:1). This was the ordinary time for the Passover, as appears from the Babylonian Talmud. The daily evening sacrifice was killed at the eighth hour and a half, and it was offered up at the ninth hour and a half. In the evening of the Passover it was killed at the seventh hour and a half, and offered at the eighth hour and a half (Pesachim, c. 5). The reason of this obviously is, because the priests had first to kill the daily sacrifice, and then to slay the Passover and eat it; and also to rest on the evening prior to the Sabbath. Thus in the evening of time (Heb. i:2; 1 Pet. i:19-20), or last days, about the same hour of the day when the paschal lamb was offered in the temple, did Christ die on Calvary, so that the substance and the shadow corresponded (Mark xv:25-33).

(4) How Observed. Originally the blood was sprinkled on the posts of the door (Exod. xii:7), but afterwards the priests sprinkled the blood upon the bottom of the altar (comp. Deut. vi:9; 1 Pet. i:2; Heb. viii:10; ix:13, 14).

(5) Animal Roasted with Fire. The ram or kid was roasted in an oven whole, with two spits made of pomegranate wood thrust through it, the one lengthwise, the other transversely (crossing the longitudinal one near the fore-legs), thus forming a cross (Pesachim, ch. 3). Thus roasted with fire, as an emblem of purification, it was served up with a bitter salad (Merorim) unpickled, indicative of the bitterness of their bondage in Egypt, and with the flesh of the other sacrifices (Deut. xvi:2-6). What of the flesh remained uneaten was to be consumed with fire, lest it should see corruption (comp. Exod. xii:10; Ps. xvi:10; Acts ii:27). Not fewer than ten, nor more than twenty persons, were admitted to this sacred solemnity. At its first observance the Hebrews ate the Passover with loins girt about, sandals on their feet, staves in their hands, and in haste, like travelers equipped and prepared for immediate departure (Exod. xii:11); but subsequently the usual mode of reclining was adopted, in token of rest and security (John xiii:23). Several of these rites are therefore omitted by Moses in repeating the laws of the Passover (Lev. xxiii:5-8; Num. ix:2-11; xxviii:16, 17; Deut. xvi).

(6) Particulars by Rabbins. The Rabbins enumerate the following particulars as peculiar to its original observance: (1) The eating of it in their houses dispersed in Egypt; (2) the taking up of the paschal lamb from the tenth day; (3) the charge to strike the blood on the doorposts; (4) the eating of it in haste (Bab. Talmud, Pesachim, ch. 9; Maim. Carban Pesach, ch. 10, sec. 15). But the command not to break a bone of the offering was always observed (John xix:36). F. R. L.

PASTORS or SHEPHERDS (pàs'tērs òr shēp'ērdz), (Heb. רֹעֵה, ro-eh', shepherd), were men who watched over flocks of sheep or cattle, directing them to their right pasture, affording them water, gathering them, when proper, to their fold, and protecting them from hurt.

It seems that their flocks often followed them (John x:1-27). As of old great men's wealth consisted chiefly in their flocks and herds, the office of feeding them was accounted very honorable. Abel, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, nay, the young ladies, as the daughters of Laban and Jethro, employed themselves in feeding flocks. (See SHEPHERD.)

Figurative. (1) God is compared to a Shepherd; with what tender care did he lead, provide for, protect, and govern the Hebrews in the desert, and in Canaan! With what tender care he gathers, governs, protects, heals, and provides for the welfare of his church and people! (Gen. xlix:24; Ps. xxiii:1; lxxx:1; Is. xl:11). (2) Christ is God's Shepherd, because his Father hath given him his flock of chosen men, and appointed him to die for, call, and feed them (Zech. xiii:7). (3) He is called the One Shepherd; because he alone owns the sheep, and can in every respect answer and supply all their wants (Ezek. xxxiv:23; John x:16). (4) He is called the great and chief Shepherd; he is infinitely great in himself; he is highly exalted as our Mediator; he has the supreme management of the church in his hand; and ministers and magistrates are but instruments subject to him (Heb. xiii:20; 1 Pet. v:4). (5) He is the Good Shepherd; in infinite kindness he redeemed his sheep from ruin, by the price of his blood; kindly he sympathizes with them, and gives them his own flesh and blood for their provision; and nothing good will he withhold from them (John x:14). (6) He is the Shepherd and Bishop of souls; it is men's souls he leads, restores, and satisfies; and their spiritual and eternal interests are the great objects of his care (1 Pet. ii:25; Ps. xxiii:2, 3; Jer. xxxi:10). (7) The "shepherd and stone of Israel" signifies God, the source of all blessings (Gen. xlix:24). (8) Political rulers in the state, and captains in the army, are called "pastors and shepherds:" their office requires them to gather, lead, protect, and provide for the welfare of their subjects and armies, which are their flocks; although they often act the contrary (Is. xlv:28; lxiii:11; Jer. xii:10; xxiii; xxv:34; Ezek. xxxiv; Nah. iii:18). (9) The Chaldean princes and their armies were the "shepherds and flocks" that ruined Judah (Jer. vi:3; xii:10).

PASTORS, CHRISTIAN (pàs'tērs, krīs'chan).

Ministers are "shepherds;" it is their work to gather, lead, watch over, feed with sound doctrine, and in every way endeavor to promote the spiritual life, safety, growth, health, and comfort of their people (Jer. xvii:16; Eph. iv:11; 1 Pet. v:1-4). The pastoral or ministerial office and work is described in Scripture as inexpressibly important and solemn (John xiv:16, 17, 26; xv:26, 27; xvi:13, 14, 15; xx:22; 1 Cor. ii:10-16; 2 Cor. iv:14; v:17; Gal. i:15, 16; Phil. iii:3, 7-14; 1 John i:3). They must have a real call and mission from Jesus Christ to their work, otherwise they cannot expect to have any true success therein (Is. vi:8, 9; xlix:1, 2; Jer. i; xxiii:21, 22, 32; Ezek. ii, iii, xxxiii; Matt. x; Luke x; John x; Acts i; xxvi:17, 18; Rom. x:15; Heb. v:4). Their ends ought to be single and disinterested, not seeking great things for themselves, coveting no man's silver, gold, or apparel, but seeking to gain men to Christ, and salvation through him; not looking or aiming at their own ease, profit, or honor, but at the things of Christ and his people; not seeking glory of men, but the honor of Christ, and his Father, in the eternal salvation of souls (1 Sam. xii:3; Jer. xlv:5; John vii:18; Acts xx:33; 1 Cor. ix:12, 16; 2 Cor. vi:4-10; vii:2; xi:9; xii:13, 14; Phil. ii:21; 1 Thess. ii:4-9).

PASTURAGE (pàs'tūr-āj), (Heb. קָר, kar, fat pasture).

In the first period of their history the Hebrews led an unsettled pastoral life, such as we still find among many Oriental tribes. One great object of the Mosaical polity was to turn them from this condition into that of fixed cultivators of the soil. Pasturage was, however, only discouraged as a condition of life unfriendly to settled habits and institutions, and not as a pursuit connected with agriculture. Hence, although in later times the principal attention of the Hebrews was given to agriculture, the tending of sheep and cattle was not at any time neglected.

(1) Nomads. The shepherds who move about with their flocks from one pasture-ground to another, according to the demands of the season, the state of the herbage, and the supply of water, are called nomads—that is, not merely shepherds, but wandering shepherds. They feed their flocks on the 'commons,' or the deserts and wildernesses, which no settled or cultivating people have appropriated. At first, no pastoral tribe can have any particular property in such tracts of ground in preference to another tribe; but, in the end, a particular tract becomes appropriated to some one tribe, or section of a tribe, either from long occupation, or from digging wells therein.

(2) Rights Acquired. According to the ideas of the East, the digging of a well is so meritorious an act, that he who performs it acquires a property in the waste-lands around. In the time of the patriarchs, Palestine was but thinly peopled by the Canaanites, and offered many such tracts of unappropriated grounds fit for pasturage. In these they fed their flocks, without establishing any exclusive claims to the soil, until they proceeded to dig wells, which, being considered as an act of appropriation, was opposed by some of the inhabitants (Gen. xxi:25, 26). After the conquest of Canaan, those Israelites who possessed large flocks and herds sent them out, under the care of shepherds, into the 'wildernesses,' or commons, of the east and south, where there are rich and juicy pasturages during the moist seasons of the year (1 Sam. xvii:28; xxv:4-15; 1 Chron. xxvii:29-31; Is. lxxv:10; Jer. 1:39).

(3) Succession of Occupancy. The nomads occupy, successively, the same stations in the deserts every year. In summer, when the plains are parched with drought, and every green herb is dried up, they proceed northwards, or into the mountains, or to the banks of rivers; and in winter and spring, when the rains have re-clothed the plains with verdure, and filled the water-courses, they return. When these pastors remove, they strike their tents, pack them up, and convey them on camels to the next station. Nearly all the pastoral usages were the same, anciently, as now. The sheep were constantly kept in the open air, and guarded by hired servants, and by the sons and daughters of the owners. Even the daughters of emirs, or chiefs, did not disdain to tend the sheep (Gen. xxiv:17-20; xxix:9; Exod. ii:16).

(4) Duty of Shepherds. The principal shepherd was responsible for the sheep intrusted to his care, and if any were lost he had to make them good, except in certain cases (Gen. xxxi:39; Exod. xxii:12; Amos iii:12). Their services were often paid by a certain proportion of the young of the flock (Gen. xxx:30). On the more dangerous stations, towers were erected, from which the approach of enemies might be discovered. These were called the Towers of the Flock (Gen. xxxv:21; 2 Chron. xxvi:10; Micah iv:8). (See PASTORS OR SHEPHERDS.)

PASTURE (pàs'tūr). See PASTORS OR SHEPHERDS.

PATARA (pät'a-rà), (Gr. Πάταρα, pat'ar-ah).

A port of Lycia in Asia Minor, where Paul, on his voyage to Jerusalem, changed his ship for one bound to Phœnicia (Acts xxi:1, 2). Patara was about sixty stadia southeast from the mouth of the river Xanthos, at the modern village Gelemlish.

The name of Patara in ancient times was closely connected with the cultus and the oracle of Apollo; and its later coins show Apolline types, though on its earlier coinage Athena and Hermes (Greek ideals of art and trade) are the prominent figures. The Roman poets, and the later Greeks like Lykophron, associate the epithet Pataraean with Apollo, just as they call the god Delphian. The oracle spoke only during part of the year, viz., the six winter months. (Strabo, xiv, 665; Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 28; Mela, i, 15; Herod. i, 182.)

Patara is now in ruins, but retains its ancient name. The remains prove it to have been a city of considerable importance. Among them are a theater, some massive walls and arches, a gate of the city with three arches nearly perfect, and numerous sarcophagi. Near the theater is a deep circular pit, and a square pillar rising above it, which Lewin thinks was the seat of the oracle of Patareus Apollo. The port is completely filled with sand, and is a malarious swamp; all communication with the sea is cut off by a sand-beach, and the sand is also gradually encroaching upon the ruins. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

In the history of Christianity Patara was of small consequence. Lycia, like Pamphylia, seems to have been slow in adopting the new religion. Patara was a bishopric, and is mentioned as such in all the Notitia. There are still considerable ruins of the city, on which see Beaufort, Texier, Fellows, Spratt, and Forbes, and, above all, the splendid work of Benndorf-Niemann on Lykia. (W. M. Ramsay, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

PATE (pät), (Heb. כֹּדֶקֶד, kod-kode', crown of the head), formed by loss of l from "plate," which came to be applied to the crown of the head, especially the bald crown, from its appearance: comp. Germ. Platte, 'a plate,' 'bald head,' and vulgarly 'the head' occurs once in the A. V. (Ps. vii:16, 'His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate'). (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

PATH (pâth), (Heb. רַחֵם, o'rakh).

Figurative. (1) God's "paths" are his works of creation (Job xl:19), the dispensations of his providence, wherein he walks towards his creatures (Ps. xxv:10; Is. lv:8, 9), or the clouds which distil his rain (Ps. lxxv:11); or his truths and precepts, in which he requires men to walk (Ps. xvii:4). (2) The paths of the righteous are "paths of judgment," of uprightness, and of life; his religious course is judiciously chosen, he is candid and upright in following it out; in his present walk he has life spiritual here, and shall attain life eternal hereafter (Is. xl:14; Prov. ii:13; v:6). (3) God makes a "straight way" or "path," when he removes every thing tending to the hindrance of his glory and gospel (Is. xlii:16; xl:3, 4); and of his people's happiness (Jer. xxxi:9). (4) Christ's "paths" are made straight, when things are prepared for his public appearances on earth (Matt. iii:3). (5) Men make "straight paths" for their feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way, when they take care of adding to, or taking from, the rules of God's word, and study to walk exactly according to it, lest some should stumble at religion on their account (Heb. xii:13). (6) Men do not "find their paths" when they cannot get their purposes fulfilled (Hos. ii:6).

PATHROS (pâth'ros), (Heb. פְּתָרוֹס, path'roce, region of the south).

A district of Egypt near Thebes; named, as some suppose, from a town called Ha-hathor, or "the abode of Hathor," the Egyptian Venus. Originally it was ruled by its own kings, independent of Egypt. It was probably the Thebaid of the Greeks and the Said of the Arabs. The country is mentioned in the Prophets, and nearly always in connection with Egypt (Is. xi:11; Ezek. xxx:14; Jer. xliv:1-15). Its inhabitants were known as the Pathrusim, the descendants of Ham through Mizraim (Gen. x:14; 1 Chron. i:12).

After Egypt had been desolate for forty years and its inhabitants exiled, Ezekiel said (chap. xxix:14), 'I will bring back the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into (LXX, 'will cause them to dwell in,' perhaps better) the land of Pathros, into the land of their birth, and they shall be there a base kingdom.' It is very remarkable to find in Ezekiel a knowledge of the correct Egyptian tradition concerning the priority of the southern country over the north. The earliest known dynasties of kings resided in Memphis on the border of Upper and Lower Egypt, but the first historical king, Menes, came from This (Thinis) near Abydos in Upper Egypt. Therefore the inscriptions always place the south as the aboriginal country before the north. The issue of that prophecy is not quite clear. (W. Max Müller, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

PATHRUSIM (path-ru'sim), (Heb. פֶּתְרוּסִים, path-roo-seen').

The fifth in order of the tribes descended from Mizraim, who settled Egypt (Gen. x:14; 1 Chron. i:12).

PATIENCE (pā'shens), (Gr. μακροθυμία, mak-roth-oo-mee'ah), constancy, endurance, forbearance, long-suffering, resignation.

1. Patience and resignation are thus discriminated: Patience applies to any troubles or pains whatever, small or great; resignation is employed are opposed and which we are called to maintain and suffer for (Rev. iii:10).

PATIENCE OF GOD (pā'shens óv gód). God's "patience" is his bearing long with offenders without punishing them (Matt. xviii:26-29; Rom. ii:4). The "God of patience" (ὑπομονή, hu-pom-on-ay') means that God is the author of patience in his servants (Rom. xv:5).

PATMOS (pät'mos), (Gr. Πάτμος, pat'mos).

A rocky and bare island of the Ægean Sea, about fifteen miles in circumference, and reckoned as one of the Sporades (Plin. Hist. Nat. iv, 23; Strabo, x, 480). On account of its stern and desolate character, the island was used, under the Roman empire, as a place of banishment, which accounts for the exile of John thither 'for the testimony of Jesus' (Rev. i:9). (See JOHN, 3.) He was here favored with those visions which are contained in the Apocalypse, and to which the place owes its Scriptural interest.

Patmos, Harbor, etc.

only for those of great moment, in which our dearest interests are concerned: patience, when compared with resignation, is somewhat negative; it consists in the abstaining from all complaint or indication of what one suffers: but resignation consists in a positive sentiment of conformity to the existing circumstances, be they what they may. There are perpetual occurrences which are apt to harass the temper, unless one regards them with patience; the misfortunes of some men are of so calamitous a nature, that if they have not acquired the resignation of Christians, they must inevitably sink under them. Patience applies only to the evils that actually hang over us; but there is a resignation connected with a firm trust in Providence which extends its views to futurity, and prepares us for the worst that may happen. (Crabbe's Synonyms.)

2. The "patience" of the saints is that grace whereby they meekly endure injuries and with a continued calmness of temper, and submission of spirit to the will of God, bear afflictions, and humbly wait for the accomplishment of his promises (Rom. v:3; viii:25). It is called the "patience" of Jesus Christ, as he exemplifies it and bestows it: it is exercised in the way of waiting, and honoring him, and in a patient waiting for his coming in the power of his Spirit, and to judge the world (2 Thess. i:4; Rev. i:9); and the "word of his patience," are those truths which

On approaching the island the coast is found to be high, and to consist of a succession of capes, which form so many ports, some of which are excellent. The only one in use is, however, a deep bay, sheltered by high mountains on every side but one, where it is protected by a projecting cape. The town attached to this port is situated upon a high rocky mountain, rising immediately from the sea; and this, with the Scala below upon the shore, consisting of some shops and houses, forms the only inhabited site of the island.

Patmos is deficient in trees, but abounds in flowering plants and shrubs. Walnuts and other fruit trees are grown in the orchards; and the wine of Patmos is the strongest and best flavored of any in the Greek islands. Maize and barley are cultivated, but not in a quantity sufficient for the use of the inhabitants, and for the supply of their own vessels and others which often put in at the great harbor for provisions. The island now bears the names of Patino and Palmosa, and the inhabitants do not exceed 4,000 or 5,000, many of whom are emigrants from the neighboring continent. Kitto.

The monastery of St. John's contains a poor remnant of the valuable library which was once there. Mai, in his Nova Bibliotheca, VI, ii, 537, has published from a Vatican MS. a list of the books preserved there in the 13th century. It was here that the English traveler, E. D. Clark, purchased of the monks, in October, 1814, the great 9th century codex of Plato now in the Bodleian. It remains to add that, according to an uncertain tradition preserved in Irenæus, v, 30, Eusebius, HE iii. 18, Hieronymus, de Scr. Ill. ch. 9, and others, St. John was exiled to Patmos in the 14th year of the emperor Domitian, and returned thence to Ephesus A. D. 96 under Nerva. A modern traveler, Mr. Theodore Bent, has suggested that the natural scenery of the island determined some features of the imagery of the Apocalypse: a suggestion which Dean Stanley in his Sermons in the East had already made. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

PATRIARCH (pā'trī-ārk), (Gr. πατριάρχης, pātrē-arkh'ace), a progenitor, the founder of a tribe (Acts ii:29).

1. In the early history of the Jews we find the ancestor or father of a family retaining authority over his children and his children's children so long as he lived, whatever new connections they might form. When the father died the branch-families did not break off and form new communities, but usually united under another common head. The eldest son was generally invested with this dignity. His authority was paternal. He was honored as the central point of connection, and as the representative of the whole kindred. Thus each great family had its patriarch or head, and each tribe its prince selected from the several heads of the families it embraced. These princes were called "elders of Israel." (See ELDERS.)

2. The word "patriarch" is also applied to the founder of a family or to any illustrious ancestor (Acts ii:29).

3. In later ages of the Church the same title is found, but is applied to ecclesiastical dignitaries, and denotes the supposed paternal character of their authority.

4. The sons of Jacob, as the progenitors of the Jewish nation, are called, by way of distinction, "the twelve patriarchs" (Acts vii:8). (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

PATRIMONY (pā'trī-mō-nŷ), (Heb. אֲבוֹתָיוּתָא, al, of or from; haw-aw-both', the fathers), the produce of the property which a Levite possessed according to his family descent (Deut. xviii:8).

PATROBAS (pāt'ro-bās), (Gr. Πατρόβας, pātrobas, life of his father).

A Christian in Rome to whom St. Paul sent greetings (Rom. xvi:14). (A. D. 55.) According to an uncertain tradition he was one of the seventy disciples.

PATTERN (pāt'tērŋ).

1. Tab-neeth' (Heb. תְּבִינָה, figure, form), literally a structure, then a figure of anything, a copy or representation (Exod. xxv:9, 40; Josh. xxii:28; 1 Chron. xxviii:11, 12, 18, 19).

2. Tok-neeth' (Heb. תְּבִינָה, Ezek. xlili:10, only), an arrangement.

3. Mar-eh' (Heb. מַרְאֵה, an appearance, Num. viii:4, only), a pattern, a view.

4. Hoop-od' igue-mah' (Gr. ὑπόδειγμα, Heb. ix:23), signifies properly a sketch, a model, as of the tabernacle, an exemplar.

5. Hoop-ot-ooŋ'o-sis (Gr. ὑποτύπωσις, outline, sketch), an example or pattern (1 Tim. i:16).

6. Too'pos (Gr. τύπος, the mark of a stroke, print). In Tit. ii:7 it means example to be copied; while it has the meaning (Heb. viii:5) of type, pattern.

PAU (pā'u), (Heb. פָּא, paw-ee', bleating), the capital city of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi:39); called PAI (1 Chron. i:50). Site is not known.

PAUL (paul), (Gr. Παῦλος, Paulus, originally Saul, (Heb. שָׁאוּל, shaw-ool', asked, Σαῦλος, Saulos, asked for).

1. Name and Personal History. He was a native of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia (Acts xxii:3, etc.), and was of Jewish descent, of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. iii:5). From his father he inherited the rights of Roman citizenship, which had probably been earned by some of his ancestry through services rendered to the Roman state (Lardner, Works, i, 228, ed. 1788, 8vo; Grotius, ad Act. xxii:28). The supposition that he enjoyed them in virtue of being a native of Tarsus is not well founded.

At that time Tarsus was the rival of Athens and Alexandria as a place of learning and philosophical research (Strabo, xiv, 5); but to what extent the future 'Apostle of the Gentiles' enjoyed the advantage of its schools we have no means of accurately determining. It must be allowed, however, that the mere circumstance of having spent his early years in such a city as Tarsus could not but exert a very powerful influence on the mind of such a man as Paul, in the way of sharpening his faculties, refining his tastes, and enlarging the circle of his sympathies and affections. (See TARSUS.)

(1) Early Life. But whatever uncertainty may hang over the early studies of the Apostle in the department of Greek learning, there can be no doubt that, being the son of a Pharisee, and destined, in all probability, from his infancy to the pursuits of a doctor of Jewish law, he would be carefully instructed from his earliest years in the elements of Rabbinical lore. It is probable also that at this time he acquired his skill in that handicraft trade by which in later years he frequently supported himself (Acts xviii:3; 1 Cor. iv:12, etc.); for it was a maxim among the Jews, that 'he who does not teach his son a trade, teaches him to steal.'

At the proper age (supposed to be after he was fourteen years old), the Apostle proceeded to Jerusalem, to prosecute his studies in the learning of the Jews. Here he became a student under Gamaliel, a distinguished teacher of the law, and who is supposed to be the person of that name who is celebrated in the writings of the Talmudists as one of the seven teachers to whom the title 'Rabban' was given (Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. in Act. v, 34; Neander, Apostol. Zeitalter. u. s. w. s. 62; Otho, Lex. Rabbinico-Phil. title 'Rabbi'). Besides acquaintance with the Jewish law, and a sincere conviction of the supreme excellence of Judaism, Gamaliel appears to have possessed a singularly calm and judicious mind, and to have exercised a freedom of thought as well as pursued a range of study very unlike what was common among the party to which he belonged (Acts v:34-39; comp. Neander, loc. cit.). How much the instructions and the example of such a teacher may have influenced the mind of Paul in a direction favorable to the course he was subsequently called to pursue, it is easy for us to imagine.

We now approach the period in Paul's history when he becomes a prominent figure on the page of the sacred historian, and when, consequently, the facts of his life can be more confidently narrated. He is introduced to our notice by the sacred historian for the first time in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen, in which transaction he was, if not an assistant, something more than a mere spectator.

He is described as at this time 'a young man' (νεανίας); but this term was employed with so much latitude by the Greeks that it is impossible, from the mere use of it, to determine whether the person to whom it was applied was under thirty or between that and forty. The probability is that Paul must have reached the age of thirty at least; for otherwise it is not likely that he would have shared the counsels of the chief priests, or been intrusted by them with the entire responsibility of executing their designs against the followers of Jesus, as we know was the case (Acts xxvi:10, 12). For such a task he showed a painful aptitude, and discharged it with a zeal which spared neither age nor sex (Acts viii:1-3; xxvi:10, 11). But while thus, in his ignorance and unbelief, he was seeking to be 'injurious' to the cause of Christ, the great Author of Christianity was about to make him a distinguished trophy of its power, and one of the most devoted and successful of its advocates.

(2) Conversion. While journeying to Damascus (see DAMASCUS), with a commission from the high-priest, to arrest and bring back as prisoners to Jerusalem the Christians who had escaped thither from the fury of their persecutors, and when he had almost completed his journey, he was suddenly arrested by a miraculous vision of Christ, who addressing him from heaven, demanded the reason of his furious zeal, in the remarkable words, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' Struck to the ground by the suddenness and overwhelming splendor of the vision, and able only to ask by whom it was he was thus addressed, he received for answer, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest; but arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what to do.' This command the confounded and now humble zealot immediately rose to obey, but as the brilliancy of the light which had shone around him had dazzled him to blindness, he had to be led into the city by his attendants. Here he remained for three days and nights in a state of deep mental conflict and dejection, tasting neither meat nor drink, until a person of the name of Ananias appeared at the command of Christ to relieve his distress, and to admit him into the Christian fraternity by baptizing him into the name of the Lord (Acts ix:1-18; comp. 1 Cor. xv:8; ix:1; Gal. i:1; Neander, Apostol. Zeitalter, section 111, sq.; Olshausen, on Acts ix:1-19; Lyttleton's Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul).

Immediately on his conversion to Christianity Saul seems to have gone into Arabia (see ARABIA), where he remained three years (Gal. i:11-17); and where he, in all probability, was chiefly occupied, by meditation and study, in preparing himself for the great work to which he had been called. Here also we may venture to suppose he received that gospel which afterwards he preached 'by revelation' from Christ (Gal. i:12).

Returning from Arabia to Damascus the Apostle commenced his public efforts in the service of Christ, by boldly advocating in the synagogues of the Jews the claims of Jesus to be venerated as the Son of God. At first astonished, the Jews were afterwards furiously incensed at this change in the opinions and conduct of Saul, and in consequence of their attempts upon his liberty and life, he was obliged to make his escape from Damascus. This he effected with difficulty by the aid of the Christians, some of whom let him down in a basket from the window of a dwelling erected upon the outer wall of the city (Acts ix:21, etc.; 2 Cor. xi:32).

(3) First Visit to Jerusalem. After his conversion, where, on the testimony of Barnabas, he was acknowledged as a Christian brother, and admitted by the Apostles to that place in their fraternity which had been assigned to him by Christ. From Jerusalem he was soon driven by the hostility of the Jews; when, after visiting Cæsarea, he went to his native town Tarsus, where he abode several years (Acts ix:26-30). From this retreat he was summoned by Barnabas, who, having been appointed by the Apostles at Jerusalem to visit the church at Antioch, where accessions had been made to the number of the followers of Jesus from among the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and finding the need of counsel and co-operation in his work, went to Tarsus to procure the assistance of Saul (Acts xi:22-25).

(4) Second Visit to Jerusalem. After residing and laboring for a year in Antioch, these two distinguished servants of Christ were sent up to Jerusalem with certain contributions which had been made among the Christians at Antioch (see ANTIOCH), on behalf of their brethren in Judæa, who were suffering from the effects of a dearth (Acts xi:27-30). This, as commonly received, was the Apostle's second visit to Jerusalem after his conversion.

(5) First Missionary Journey. Having discharged this commission they returned to Antioch, accompanied by John Mark, the nephew of Barnabas, and were shortly afterwards despatched by that church, in obedience to an injunction from heaven, on a general missionary tour. In the course of this tour, during the earlier part only of which they were accompanied by Mark, in consequence of his shrinking from the toils and dangers of the journey and returning to Jerusalem, they visited Seleucia, Cyprus, Perga in Pamphylia, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia (in the former of which the fickle populace, though at first they had with difficulty been prevented from offering them divine honors, were almost immediately afterwards, at the instigation of the Jews, led to stone the Apostle until he was left for dead); and then they returned by way of Attalia, a city of Pamphylia, by sea to Antioch, where they rehearsed to the church all that God had done by them (Acts xiii-xiv). This formed the Apostle's first great missionary tour.

In the narrative of this journey, given by Luke, the historian, without assigning any reason for so doing, drops the name Saul, and adopts that of Paul, in designating the Apostle. It is probable from this, that it was during this journey that the Apostle's change of name actually took place. What led to that change we can only conjecture; and of conjectures on this point there has been no lack. The most probable opinion is that of Beza, Grotius, Doddridge, Kuinoel, etc., that as the Romans and Greeks were in the habit of softening the Hebrew names in pronunciation, and accommodating their form to that of the Latin or Greek (comp. Jason for Jesus, Silvanus for Silas, Pollio for Hillel, etc.), they substituted Paulus for פּאָל, and the Apostle henceforward adopted the substituted name as his usual designation.

(6) The Council at Jerusalem. Not long after Paul and Barnabas had returned to Antioch, they were deputed by the church there again to visit Jerusalem, to consult the Apostles and elders upon the question, which certain members of the church at Jerusalem had raised in that at Antioch, whether converts from heathenism required to be circumcised, and so become Jews before they could be saved? (See BARNABAS.) The Apostle on this occasion visited Jerusalem for the third time after his conversion; and after the question had been settled by the parties in that city with whom the power to do so lay, he and his companion returned to Antioch.

(7) Second Missionary Journey. After restoring peace to the church there Paul proposed to Barnabas to undertake another missionary tour, to which the latter cordially assented; but, unhappily, on the very eve of their departure, a contention arose between them, in consequence of Barnabas being determined to take with them his nephew John Mark, and Paul being equally determined that one, who had on a former occasion ingloriously deserted them, should not again be employed in the work. Unable to come to an agreement on this point they separated, and Paul, accompanied by Silas, commenced his second missionary journey, in the course of which, after passing through Syria and Cilicia, he revisited Lystra and Derbe. At the former of these places he found Timothy, whom he associated with Silas, as the companion of his further travels, after he had been ordained by the Apostle and the presbytery of the church of which he was a member (1 Tim. iv:14). Paul then passed through the regions of Phrygia and Galatia, and, avoiding Asia strictly so-called, and Bithynia, he came with his companions by way of Mysia to Troas, on the borders of the Hellespont. Hence they crossed to Samothracia, and thence to Neapolis, and so to Philippi, whither he had been summoned in a vision by a man of Macedonia saying, 'Come over and help us.' After some time spent in this city they passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, cities of Macedonia (see MACEDONIA), and came to Thessalonica, where, though they abode only a short time, they preached the gospel with no small success. Driven from that city by the malice of the Jews, they came by night to Berea, another city of Macedonia, where at first they were favorably received by the Jews, until a party from Thessalonica, which had followed them, incited the Bereans against them. Paul, as especially obnoxious to the Jews, deemed it prudent to leave the place, and accordingly retired to Athens, where he determined to await the arrival of Silas and Timothy. Whilst residing in this city, and observing the manners and religious customs of its inhabitants, his spirit was stirred within him, when he saw how entirely they were immersed in idolatry; and unable to refrain, he commenced in the synagogues of the Jews, and in the market-place, to hold discussions with all whom he encountered. This led to his being taken to the Areopagus, where, surrounded by perhaps the shrewdest, most polished, most acute, most witty, and most scornful assemblage that ever surrounded a preacher of Christianity, he, with exquisite tact and ability, exposed the folly of their superstitions, and unfolded the character and claims of the living and true God. For the purpose of more effectually arresting the attention of his audience, he commenced by referring to an altar in their city, on which he had read the inscription ἐν ᾧ τινεθεῖ, to an unknown God; and, applying this to Jehovah, he proposed to declare to them that Deity, whom thus, without knowing him (ἀγνωστῆς), they were worshipping.

On being rejoined by Timothy (1 Thess. iii: 1), and perhaps also by Silas (comp. Greswell's Dissertations, ii, pp. 31, 32), the Apostle sent them both back to Macedonia, and went alone to visit Corinth, whither they soon after followed him (Acts xviii:5). Here he abode for a year and a half preaching the gospel, and supporting himself by his trade as a tent-maker, in which he was joined by a converted Jew of the name of Aquila, who, with his wife Priscilla, had been expelled from Rome by an edict of the emperor, forbidding Jews to remain in that city. Driven from Corinth by the enmity of the Jews, he, along with Aquila and Priscilla, betook himself to Ephesus, whence, after a residence of only a few days, he went up to Jerusalem, being commanded by God to visit that city, at the time of the approaching passover. His visit on this occasion—the fourth since his conversion—was very brief; and at the close of it he went down to Antioch, thereby completing his second great apostolic tour.

(8) Third Missionary Journey. At Antioch he abode for some time, and then, accompanied, as is supposed, by Titus, he commenced another extensive tour, in the course of which, after passing through Phrygia and Galatia, he visited Ephesus. The importance of this city, in relation to the region of Hither Asia, determined him to remain in it for a considerable time; and he accordingly continued preaching the gospel there for three years, with occasional brief periods of absence, for the purpose of visiting places in the vicinity. With such success were his efforts crowned, that the gains of those who were interested in supporting the worship of Diana, the tutelary goddess of the city, began to be seriously affected; and at the instigation of one of these, by name Demetrius, a silversmith, who had enjoyed a lucrative traffic by the manufacture of what appear to have been miniature representations of the famous temple of Diana (ναοὺς ἀργυροῦς Ἀρτέμιδος, comp. Kuinoel, in Act. xix:24; Neander, Apost. Zeit. § 350), a popular tumult was excited against the Apostle, from the fury of which he was with difficulty rescued by the sagacity and tact of the town-clerk, aided by others of the chief men of the place, who appear to have been friendly towards Paul. By this occurrence the Apostle's removal from Ephesus, on which, however, he had already determined (Acts xix:21), was in all probability expedited; and, accordingly, he very soon after the tumult went by way of Troas to Philippi, where he appears to have resided some time, and from which, as his headquarters, he made extensive excursions into the surrounding districts, penetrating even to Illyricum, on the eastern shore of the Adriatic (Rom. xv:19). From Philippi he went to Corinth, where he resided three months, and then returned to Philippi, having been frustrated in his design of proceeding through Syria to Jerusalem by the malice of the Jews. Sailing from Philippi, he came to Troas, where he abode seven days; thence he journeyed on foot to Assos; thence he proceeded by sea to Miletus, where he had an affecting interview with the elders of the church at Ephesus (Acts xx:17, sq.); thence he sailed for Syria, and, after visiting several intermediate ports, landed at Tyre; and thence, after a residence of seven days, he traveled by way of Ptolemais and Cæsarea to Jerusalem. This constituted his fifth visit to that city after his conversion.

(9) Arrest at Jerusalem. On his arrival at Jerusalem he had the mortification to find that, whilst the malice of his enemies the Jews was unabated, the minds of many of his brother Christians were alienated from him on account of what they deemed his too lax and liberal notions of the obligations of the Mosaic ritual. To obviate these feelings on their part, he, at the suggestion of the Apostle James, joined himself to four persons who had taken on them the vows of a Nazarite, and engaged to pay the cost of the sacrifices by which the Mosaic ritual required that such should be absolved from their vows. With what success this somewhat questionable act of the Apostle was attended, as respects the minds of his brethren, we are not informed, but it had no effect whatever in securing for him any mitigation of the hatred with which he was regarded by the unconverted Jews; on the contrary, his appearance in the temple so much exasperated them, that, before his vow was accomplished, they seized him, and would have put him to death had not Lysias, the commander of the Roman cohort in the adjoining citadel brought soldiers to his rescue. Under the protection of Lysias, the Apostle addressed the angry mob, setting forth the main circumstances of his life, and especially his conversion to Christianity, and his appointment to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. Up to this point they heard him patiently; but no sooner had he insinuated that the Gentiles were viewed by him as placed on a par with the Jews, than all their feelings of national bigotry burst forth in a tempest of execration and fury against the Apostle. Lysias, ignorant of what Paul had been saying, from his having addressed the people in Hebrew, and suspecting from these vehement demonstrations of the detestation in which he was held by the Jews that something flagrantly vicious must have been committed by him, gave orders that he should be examined, and forced by scourging to confess his crime. From this indignity Paul delivered himself by asserting his privileges as a Roman citizen, whom it was not lawful to bind or scourge.

Next day, in the presence of the Sanhedrim, he entered into a defense of his conduct, in the course of which, having avowed himself a believer in the doctrine of a bodily resurrection, he awakened so fierce a controversy on this point between the Pharisees and the Sadducees in the council that Lysias, fearing he might be torn to pieces among them, gave orders to remove him into the fort. From a conspiracy into which above forty of the Jews had entered to assassinate him he was delivered by the timely interposition of his nephew, who, having acquired intelligence of the plot, intimated it first to Paul, and then to Lysias. Alarmed at the serious appearance which the matter was assuming, Lysias determined to send Paul to Cæsarea, where Felix the procurator was residing, and to leave the affair to his decision. At Cæsarea Paul and his accusers were heard by Felix; but though the Apostle's defense was unanswerable, the procurator, fearful of giving the Jews offense, declined pronouncing any decision, and still retained Paul in bonds. Some time after he was again summoned to appear before Felix, who, along with his wife Drusilla, expressed a desire to hear him 'concerning the faith in Christ;' and on this occasion the faithful and fearless Apostle discoursed so pointedly on certain branches of good morals, in which the parties he was addressing were notoriously deficient, that Felix trembled, and hastily sent him from his presence.

Shortly after this Felix was succeeded in his government by Porcius Festus, before whom the Jews again brought their charges against Paul; and who, when the cause came to be heard, showed so much of a disposition to favor the Jews that the Apostle felt himself constrained to appeal to Cæsar. To gratify King Agrippa and his wife Bernice, who had come to Cæsarea to visit Festus, and whose curiosity was excited by what they had heard of Paul, he was again called before the governor and 'permitted to speak for himself.' On this occasion he recapitulated the leading points of his history, and gave such an account of his views and designs that a deep impression was made on the mind of Agrippa favorable to Christianity and to the Apostle; so much so that, but for his having appealed to Cæsar, it is probable he would have been set at liberty.

(10) Voyage to Rome. His cause, however, having by that appeal been placed in the hands of the emperor, it was necessary that he should go to Rome, and thither accordingly Festus sent him. His voyage was long and disastrous. Leaving Cæsarea when the season was already considerably advanced, they coasted along Syria as far as Sidon, and then crossed to Myra, a port of Lycia; thence they sailed slowly to Cnidus; and thence, in consequence of unfavorable winds, they struck across to Crete, and with difficulty reached a port on the southern part of that island called 'The Fair Haven,' near the town of Lasea.

There Paul urged the centurion, under whose charge he and his fellow-prisoners had been placed, to winter; but the place not being very suitable for this purpose, and the weather promising favorably, this advice was not followed, and they again set sail, intending to reach Phœnice, a port in the same island, and there to winter. Scarcely had they set sail, however, when a tempest arose, at the mercy of which they were driven for fourteen days in a westerly direction, until they were cast upon the coast of Malta, where they suffered shipwreck, but without any loss of life. Hospitably received by the natives, they abode there three months, during which time Paul had a favorable opportunity of preaching the gospel, and of showing the power with which he was endued for the authentication of his message by performing many miracles for the advantage of the people.

On the approach of spring they availed themselves of a ship of Alexandria which had wintered in the island, and set sail for Syracuse, where they remained three days; thence they crossed to Rhegium, in Italy; and thence to Puteoli, from which place Paul and his companions journeyed to Rome.

(11) At Rome. Here he was delivered by the centurion to the captain of the guard, who permitted him to dwell in his own hired house under the surveillance of a soldier. And thus he continued for two years, 'receiving all that came to him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him' (Acts xxi:17; xxviii:31).

(12) Martyrdom. At this point the evangelist abruptly closes his narrative, leaving us to glean our information regarding the subsequent history of the Apostle from less certain sources. Tradition steadfastly affirms that he suffered martyrdom at Rome, and that the manner of his death was by beheading (Tillemont, Mémoires, i, p. 324); but whether this took place at the close of the imprisonment mentioned by Luke, or after a second imprisonment incurred subsequent to an intervening period of freedom and active exertion in the cause of Christianity, has been much discussed by modern writers. If, on the evidence furnished by the allusions in the Second Epistle to Timothy, we adopt the supposition above stated, it will follow that Paul, during the interval between his first and second imprisonments, undertook an extensive apostolic tour, in the course of which he visited his former scenes of labor in Asia and Greece, and perhaps also fulfilled his purpose of going into Spain (Rom. xv:24-28). He probably also visited Crete and Dalmatia (comp. Greswell, vol. ii, pp. 78-100).

2. Credibility of His Writings. In some directions there has arisen a tendency to discredit the testimony of Paul as well as that of many other Biblical writers. It has been claimed that in order to learn precisely what were the teachings of the apostles in reference to the Christ we must confine ourselves to the first three gospels; that the book of the Acts does not give an account of things as they actually occurred; and that no doctrine of the New Testament should be emphasized unless it is clearly taught in the books of Matthew, Mark, or Luke. We are asked to reject, or consider of doubtful authority, those special themes which seem to have appealed very strongly to the minds of Peter, Paul and John.

(1) A Radical Change. Whether or not men reject the account of his conversion, there is no avoiding the conclusion that during his early manhood he met with a radical change, not only of opinion but also of character. Certain it is that his whole mental attitude toward the Christ was changed. It appears that he himself abandoned the title of Saul and chose the name of Paul, which means "the little one;" whether or not this name was taken on account of his bodily size, which is said to have been small, it was certainly illustrative of the change which had passed over the man, who now called himself "the least of the apostles."

Here was a man of education and ability, whose convictions became so strong that he willingly—nay gladly—forfeited the good will of all his old friends, forfeited his social position and all of his worldly prospects, by espousing the cause and the name of the Christ. This converted Jew flung the banner of the cross in the faces of the very men with whom he had been associated in the work of persecution. No wonder he could assert that "I have been crucified with Christ yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God who loved me and gave himself up for me" (Gal. ii:20, R. V.) Having perceived the full power of the cross as a means of redemption from the power of the law, he testified that: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal. iii:11-13). There is much similar testimony in this single Epistle, and the Galatians accepted the doctrine. They knew it must be true, for the man who preached it wrote to them out of his own experience, and they knew that he had given up a life of ease for one of hardship, loss, and suffering, for the sake of the truth which he advocated.

His Epistle to the Romans is no less emphatic. In the very first chapter he affirms that Jesus is the Son of God; "Promised afore by his prophets in the Holy Scriptures concerning his Son who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, who was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. i:2-4).

Paul's message pertains to life and death, and the resurrection from the dead, and this is the gospel which he advocates, not as his own but as "the gospel of his Son." This gospel "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek. This gospel is for all: "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God" (Rom. iii:22-24). The same thought is repeatedly expressed, for he preached the justification by faith, as a means of "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." "While we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son . . . and not only so, but we rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have received the reconciliation" (Rom. v:8-11, R. V.)

(2) Apostle to the Gentiles. Although "a Hebrew of the Hebrews" Paul became in a peculiar sense "the Apostle to the Gentiles." He taught both Jews and Gentiles that men are justified by faith and not by obedience to the law, and that the circumcision which God required under the new covenant was the circumcision of the heart and not of the flesh.

He freely taught that all men are sinners; that they cannot be justified before God by an obedience rendered in their own strength, or by obedience to the Jewish law. Freedom from condemnation must come through faith in the Christ, who as the descendant of David, and as the Son of God, came into the world as an offering for sin, that as many as believe in him may have eternal life.

His assertions are in perfect harmony with Matthew, who says: "This is the blood of my covenant which is shed for many unto remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi:28). In the letters to the Corinthians references to the death of Christ are not so frequent, but they are no less emphatic. His theme was still "Christ crucified."

In the fifteenth chapter, in which the resurrection of believers is taught so forcibly, it is connected always with the resurrection of him who hath broken the tomb, and illumined the sepulcher by passing through its portals.

Paul's testimony concerning the death, burial, resurrection and ascension of our Lord is as emphatic as that of Matthew, Mark and Luke. He believed it with all his heart and taught it unflinchingly in the face of imprisonment and privation. In heat and cold, under the repeated stripes of cruel scourging, he never shrinks in the proclamation of that gospel whose truth was so convincing that for it he had renounced everything that the world could offer him.

(3) Requisites of a Witness. The credibility of a witness requires that he should be conscientious, and all of Paul's history shows him to have been so; whether he was persecuting the saints or flinging the banner of the cross in the face of the polished Athenians he was always sternly uncompromising. (a) The credibility of a witness also requires that he shall know whereof he affirms; that he shall be personally acquainted with the facts in regard to which he testifies; and this was eminently true of the great Apostle to the Gentiles. (b) Also that he shall have moral courage enough to tell the truth even in face of opposition, and if need be of persecution also. The apostle Paul at last sealed his testimony with his blood. (c) Such credibility is greatly increased in value if he has been convinced against his will and in the face of preconceived opinions. Not only is this true of Paul, but the truth to which he testifies is one to which his former attitude was of uncompromising hostility. After being the persecutor he accepted of persecution.

"Are they ministers of Christ? I am more; in labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons frequent, in deaths oft. . . . In perils by waters, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen. . . . in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often" (2 Cor. xi:23-27). When a man will lead a life like this for the sake of the truth which he loves shall we not accept his testimony? (See Art. in Bib. Sacra. by Rev. Edward F. Williams, 1899, pp. 657, 59.)

3. Epistles of Paul. The Epistles of Paul are thirteen, or, if we count the Hebrews (as the product of Paul's mind, though probably not of his pen), fourteen, in number. They are the most remarkable body of correspondence in the history of literature. They are tracts for the times, and yet tracts for all times. They will be found separately considered under their titles. Here some general remarks only are given. They may be arranged differently.

1 and 2 Thessalonians, written A. D. 52, 53, from Corinth.

Galatians, written A. D. 56-57, from Ephesus.

1 Corinthians, written A. D. 57, from Ephesus.

2 Corinthians, written A. D. 57, from Macedonia.

Romans, written A. D. 58, from Corinth.

Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Philemon, written A. D. 61-63, from Rome.

Hebrews, written A. D. 64 (?), from Italy.

1 Timothy and Titus, written A. D. 65 or 57 (?), from Macedonia.

2 Timothy, written A. D. 67 or 64 (?), from Rome.

The time of the composition of the Pastoral Epistles depends upon the question of the second Roman captivity. The Second Epistle to Timothy was at all events the last, whether written in the first or second captivity.

(b) Topically.

Romans and Galatians: doctrines of sin and grace. 1 and 2 Corinthians: moral and practical questions.

Colossians and Philippians: person of Christ.

Ephesians: the Church of Christ.

1 and 2 Thessalonians: the second advent.

1 and 2 Timothy and Titus: church government and pastoral care.

Philemon: slavery.

Hebrews: the eternal priesthood and sacrifice of Christ.

(c) As to Importance, the order in our Bible is pretty correct. The epistles are all important, but were not equally well understood in all ages of the church. Thus the Galatians and Romans were more appreciated in the time of the Reformation than in any preceding century; they are the stronghold of the evangelical doctrines of total depravity and salvation by free grace. Paul's epistles give us the most complete exhibition of the various doctrines of Christianity and of the spiritual life of the apostolic church, and are applicable to all ages and congregations. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) (See ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; EPISTLES; and the various Epistles specifically treated.)

PAULUS (pau'lus). See SERGIUS PAULUS.

PAVEMENT (pav'ment), (Heb. פָּזֶז, rits-paw', hot stone; once, 2 Kings xvi:17, מַרְטֶשֶׁת, mar-tseh-feth). Originally a stone heated for baking purposes, hence a tessellated pavement (2 Chron. vii:3; Esth. i:6; Ezek. xl:17, 18).

PAVILION (pav'il'yün), (Heb. סֹכֶה, soke'). See TENT.

PAW (pā), (Heb. יָד, yawd, hand).

1. Paw of a lion, or of a bear (1 Sam. xvii:37).

2. The palm or hollow hand, as the Hebrew is elsewhere rendered (Lev. xi:27). (Comp. Job xxxix:21.)

PEACE (pēs), (Heb. שָׁלוֹם, shaw-lome, safety, familiar; Gr. εἰρήνη, i-ray'nay, unity, concord).

Peace is that state of mind in which persons are exposed to no open violence to interrupt their tranquillity. (1) Social peace is mutual agreement one with another, whereby we forbear injuring one another (Ps. xxxiv:14; cxxii:6). (2) Ecclesiastical peace is freedom from contentions and rest from persecutions (Is. xi:13; xxxii:17; Rev. xii:14). (3) Spiritual peace is deliverance from sin, by which we were at enmity with God (Rom. v:1); the result of which is peace in the conscience (Heb. x:22). This peace is the gift of God through Jesus Christ (2 Thess. iii:16). It is a blessing of great importance (Ps. cxix:165). It is denominated perfect (Is. xxvi:3), inexpressible (Phil. iv:7), permanent (Job xxxiv:22; John xvi:22), eternal (Is. lvii:2; Heb. iv:9; Ps. lv:20; John xiv:27).

PEACEMAKERS (pēs'māk'ērs), (Gr. εἰρηνοποιός, i-ray-nōf-oy-os', worker of peace).

The term includes the peace lovers and the founders of peace. They who heal up breaches and restore harmony and good fellowship (comp. Matt. v:9; Col. i:20; Rom. xvi:20; 2 Cor. xiii:11; also Luke ii:14; John xvi:33; Eph. ii:14).

PEACE OFFERING (pēs'ōf'fēr-īng). See OFFERING.

PEACOCK (pē'kōk), (Heb. תְּכַיִם, took-kee').

It is a question perhaps more of geographical and historical than of Biblical interest to decide whether thūkyim (1 Kings x:22), and thūkyim (2 Chron. ix:21) denote peacocks strictly so called, or some other species of animal or bird. There are only two species of true peacocks, viz., that under consideration, which is the Pavo cristatus of Linn.; and another, Pavo Muticus, more recently discovered, which differs in some particulars, and originally belongs to Japan and China. Peacocks bear the cold of the Himalayas: they run with great swiftness, and where they are, serpents do not abound, as they devour the young with great avidity, and, it is said, attack with spirit even the Cobra di Capello when grown to considerable size, arresting its progress and confusing it by the rapidity and variety of their evolutions around it, till exhausted with fatigue it is struck on the head and dispatched.

This singular and beautiful bird is mentioned among the articles imported by Solomon from Tharshish, the modern Ceylon or Malabar coast of India, where the peacock is indigenous. In Job xxxix:13 another Hebrew word is found, better rendered "ostriches," and the word "ostrich" should be translated (as it is elsewhere) "stork." The wings of the ostrich cannot raise it from the ground; yet in running it catches (or, as the word rendered "goodly" imports, "drinks in") the wind. The construction of the ostrich and that of the stork are thus contrasted, as are also their habits; for the stork is as proverbial for her tenderness to her young as is the ostrich for her seeming indifference (Job xxxix:14-16). (See OSTRICH; STORK.)

PEARLS (pērls), (Heb. יָבֵשֶׁת, gaw-beesh'). It is doubtful that pearls are mentioned in the Old Testament. The word gabish, rendered 'pearl' in Job xxviii:18 appears to mean crystal; and the word יָבֵשֶׁת, pen-ee-neem, which our version translates by 'rubies' is now supposed to mean coral (See CORAL). But in the New Testament the pearl is repeatedly mentioned.

In Matt. xiii:45, 46, a merchant (traveling jeweler) seeking goodly pearls, finds one pearl of great price, and to be able to purchase it sells all that he has—all the jewels he had previously secured. In 1 Tim. ii:9, and Rev. xvii:4, pearls are mentioned as the ornaments of females; in Rev. xviii:12-16, among costly merchandise; and Rev. xxi:21, the twelve gates of the heavenly Jerusalem are 'twelve pearls.'

These intimations seem to indicate that pearls were in more common use among the Jews after than before the captivity, while they evince the estimation in which they were in later times held (Plin. Hist. Nat. ix, 54; xii, 41; Ælian, Anim. x, 13; comp. Ritter Erdkunde, ii, 164). The island of Tylos (Bahrein) was especially renowned for its fishery of pearls (Plin. vi. 32; comp. Strabo, xvi. p. 767; Athen. iii. 93); the Indian ocean was also known to produce pearls (Arrian, Indica, p. 194; Plin. ix. 54; xxxiv. 48; Strabo, xv. p. 717). Heeren feels assured that this indication must be understood to refer to the strait between Taprobana, or Ceylon, and the southernmost point of the mainland of India, Cape Comorin, whence Europeans, even at present, derive their principal supplies of these costly natural productions. This writer adds, 'Pearls have at all times been esteemed one of the most valuable commodities of the East. Their modest splendor and simple beauty appear to have captivated the Orientals, even more than the dazzling brilliancy of the diamond, and have made them at all times the favorite ornament of despotic princes. In the West, the passion for this elegant luxury was at its height about the period of the extinction of Roman freedom, and they were valued in Rome and Alexandria as highly as precious stones. In Asia this taste was of more ancient date, and may be traced to a period anterior to the Persian dynasty; nor has it ever declined. A string of pearls of the largest size is an indispensable part of the decorations of an Eastern monarch. It was thus that Tippoo was adorned when he fell before the gates of his capital; and it is thus that the present ruler of the Persians is usually decorated' (Ideen, i. 2. 224).

Figurative. Pearl is used to signify a thing of great value and as a symbol of the kingdom of God (Matt. xiii:45, 46). To "cast pearls before swine," is to preach the gospel to malicious persecutors; apply the promises and privileges proper to saints, to men really wicked; to dispense sacraments to persons notoriously profane; or to administer reproof to obstinate scoffers (Matt. vii:6). (Brown, Bib. Dict.)

PECULIAR (pē-kul'yēr), (Heb. סְגוּלָה, seg-oolaw, wealth), (Gr. περιποίησις, per-ee-poy'ay-sis), that which is separated to one's special use.

God's people are called "peculiar;" they are separated from the rest of the world to his honor and service; they share in special privileges, and are carefully preserved and highly regarded by him (Exod. xix:5; 1 Pet. ii:9).

PEDAHEL (pēd'a-hēl), (Heb. פְּדַהֵל, ped-ahale', God delivers).

Son of Ammihud, and chief of the tribe of Naphtali in the wilderness. Moses designated him as the representative of his tribe to divide western Palestine (Num. xxxiv:28). (B. C. 1618.)

PEDAHZUR (pe-dāh'zur), (Heb. פְּדַחְצוּר, ped-aw-tsoor', the rock delivers).

The head of a family in the tribe of Manasseh, and father of Gamaliel, who assisted Moses in numbering the people (Num. i:10; ii:20; vii:54, 59; x:23). (B. C. about 1657.)

PEDAIAH (pe-dā'iah, yā), (Heb. פְּדַיָּה, ped-aw-yah', Jah has ransomed).

1. The father of Joel, who was prince of the half tribe of Manasseh in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvii:20). (B. C. before 1013.)

2. Father of Josiah's wife, Zebudah, and a citizen of Rumah (2 Kings xxiii:36). (B. C. before 648.)

3. Father of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:18), by the widow of Salathiel, his brother. (B. C. before 536.)

4. A descendant of Parosh, who aided in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:25). (B. C. 446.)

5. A son of Kolaiah, a Benjamite, of the family of Jeshaiiah (Neh. xi:7).

6. A Levite who was treasurer, or disburser under Nehemiah (Neh. xiii:13), and no doubt the same who stood at the left of Ezra when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii:4). (B. C. 445.)

PEDIGREE (péd-ĭ-grē), (Heb. יָדוּ, yaw-lad, to show lineage).

Early in the second year after leaving Egypt Moses mustered all the tribes except Levi, and had the people enrolled in genealogical registers by the heads of the tribes. According to these genealogical divisions they marched, pitched their tents, and made their offerings. (See GENEALOGY.)

PEELED (pæld), (Heb. טָרַף, maru-rat', Is. xviii:2,7; Ezek. xxix:18), stripped or bereft of hair.

PEEP (pēp), (Heb. צִפֵּץ, tsaw-faf, to coo or chirp as a bird). Noises made by necromancers who pretended to communicate with the dead (Is. viii:19).

PEGANON (pég'-à-nōn), (Gr. πηγάνον, pay-gah'-non). The word rue occurs only in Luke xi:42. 'But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe the mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment,' etc. In the parallel passage (Matt. xxiii:23), dill (an'ay-thon), translated anise in the English Version, is mentioned instead of rue. Both dill and rue were cultivated in the gardens of Eastern countries in ancient times as they are at the present day. That rue was employed as an ingredient in diet, and as a condiment, is abundantly evident from Apicius, as noticed by Celsus, and is not more extraordinary than was the fondness of some Eastern nations for assafoetida as a seasoning to food. That one kind was cultivated by the Israelites is evident from its being mentioned as one of the articles of which the Pharisees paid their tithes, though they neglected the weightier matters of the law. Rosenmüller states that in the Talmud (Tract Shebūth ch. ix, sec. 1) the rue is indeed mentioned amongst kitchen herbs; but at the same time it is there expressly stated that it is tithe free, it being one of those herbs which are not cultivated in gardens, according to the general rule established in the Talmud. (See RUE.) J. F. R.

PEKAH (pē'kah), (Heb. פֶּכַח, peh'kakh, open-eyed; Sept. Φακέ, phay-kee'), the officer who slew Pekahiah and mounted the throne in his stead (B. C. 724), becoming the eighteenth king of Israel. He reigned twenty years.

Towards the close of his life (but not before the seventeenth year of his reign) he entered into a league with Rezin, king of Damascus-Syria, against Judah; and the success which attended their operations induced Ahaz to tender to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, his homage and tribute, as the price of his aid and protection. The result was that the kings of Syria and Israel were soon obliged to abandon their designs against Judah in order to attend to their own dominions, of which considerable parts were seized and retained by the Assyrians. Israel lost all the territory east of the Jordan, and the two and a half tribes which inhabited it were sent into exile. These disasters seem to have created such popular discontent as to give the sanction of public opinion to the conspiracy headed by Hoshea, in which the king lost his life (2 Kings xv:25, sq.; xvi:5, sq.; Is. vii).

PEKAHIAH (pék'a-hi'ah), (Heb. פֶּכַח יָאוּ, pek-akh-yaw', Jehovah has opened his eyes), son and successor of Menahem, king of Israel, who began to reign B. C. 760.

He patronized and supported the idolatry of the golden calves; and after an undistinguished reign of two years, Pekah, one of his generals, conspired against him, and with the aid of Argob and Arish, and fifty Gileadites, slew him in the harem of his own palace (2 Kings xv:22-25).

PEKOD (pē'kōd), (Heb. פֶּקֹד, pek'ode, visitation or punishment), a locality of Babylonia (Jer. l:21; Ezek. xxiii:23).

PELAI AH (pēl'a-i'ah), (Heb. פֶּלִיאָה, pe-law-yaw', distinguished by Jehovah).

1. A Levite who assisted Ezra in instructing the people in the law, and who joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. viii:7; x:10). (B. C. 445.)

2. Son of Eleonai, of Judah (1 Chron. iii:24), (B. C. after 400).

PELALIAH (pēl'a-li'ah), (Heb. פֶּלִיאִי, pel-ah-yaw', jah judges).

A priest, descendant of Malchijah, and father of Jeroham (Neh. xi:12). (B. C. before 445.)

PELATIAH (pēl'a-ti'ah), (Heb. פֶּלַטִּיָּהוּ, pel-at-yaw', יְהוָה יִשְׁלַח, pel-at-yaw' hoo, Jah delivers).

1. A captain of the Simeonites in their successful war with the Amalekites of Mt. Seir in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv:42). (B. C. about 700.)

2. Son of Benaiah and a prince of Israel. Ezekiel prophesied against him, and the prophecy was realized in Pelatiah's sudden death (Ezek. xi:1-13). (B. C. about 592.)

3. The first named son of Hananiah, and a descendant of David (1 Chron. iii:21). (B. C. after 536.)

4. One of those who joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:22). (B. C. 440.)

PELEG (pē'leg), (Heb. פֶּלֶג, peh'leg, division), son of Eber, and fourth in descent from Shem.

His name peh'-leg, means division or separation, and is said to have been given him 'because in his days the earth was divided' (Gen. x:25; xi:16); concerning which see NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.

PELET (pē'let), (Heb. פֶּלֶט, peh'let, escape).

1. Fourth son of Jahdai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii:47). (B. C. after 1612.)

2. A descendant of Aznaveth, a Benjamite, and one of those who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:3). (B. C. about 1015.)

PELETH (pē'leth), (Heb. פֶּלֶת, peh'leth, flight, haste).

1. Father of On, of the tribe of Reuben (Num. xvi:1). (B. C. before 1657.)

2. Son of Jonathan, of Judah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chron. ii:33). He was a descendant of Jerahmeel through Onam. (B. C. about 1618.)

PELETHITES (pē'leth-ites), (Heb. פֶּלֶתִּים, peh'-the', runner).

The Pelethites and the Cherethites were famous under the reign of David, as the most valiant men of his army, and the guards of his person (2 Sam. xv:18-22; xx:7). Their name is supposed to indicate their duties, or it is perhaps a Gentile name. (See CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.)

PELICAN (pēl'i-kan), (Heb. קַוֵּאת, kaw-ath'). Arabic and Talmuds, kuk and kik.

The name kaw-ath is supposed to be derived from the action of throwing up food, which the bird really effects when discharging the contents of the bag beneath its bill. But it may be suggested, as not unlikely, that all the above names are imitative of the voice of the pelican, which, although seldom heard in captivity, is uttered frequently at the periods of migration, and is compared to the braying of an ass. It may be likewise that this characteristic has influenced several translators of the Hebrew text in substituting on some, or on all, occasions where kaath occurs, bitter for pelican, but we think without sufficient reason. (See KEPHOD; BITTERN). Kaath is found in Lev. xi:18; Deut. xiv:17; Ps. cii:6; Is. xxxiv:11; Zeph. ii:14.

Pelicans are chiefly tropical birds, equal or superior in bulk to the common swan: they have powerful wings; fly at a great elevation; are partially gregarious; and though some always remain in their favorite subsolar regions, most of them migrate in our hemisphere with the northern spring, occupy Syria, the lakes and rivers of temperate Asia, and extend westward into Europe up the Danube into Hungary, and northward to some rivers of southern Russia. They likewise frequent salt-water marshes, and the shallows of harbors, but seldom alight on the open sea, though they are said to dart down upon fish from a considerable height. C. H. S.

PELONITE (pěl'o-nite), (Heb. פֶּלוֹנִית, pel-o-nee', separate).

The appellation of Helez and Ahijah, two of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi:27, 36; xxvii:10). No place or person is mentioned from which this adjective could be derived, and it is possibly a corruption.

PEN (pēn), (Heb. פֶּן, ate, pen).

The instruments with which the characters were formed in the writing of the ancients varied with the materials upon which the letters were to be traced. Upon hard substances, such as stone or metallic plates, a graver of steel was used, the same which Job calls "an iron pen" (Job xix:24).

Upon tablets of wax a metallic pen or stylus was employed, having one end pointed to trace the letters, the other broad and flat to erase any erroneous marks by smoothing the wax.

Upon paper, linen, cotton, skins, and parchments it was in very early times common to paint the letters with a hair-pencil brought to a fine point. The reed pen was introduced afterward, and at first used without being split at the point. The reed pen is used by the modern Turks, Syrians, Persians, Abyssinians, Arabs, and other Orientals, as their languages could not be written without difficulty with pens made from quills. A particular kind of knife is used to split the reed (Jer. xxxvi:23). (See WRITING.)

Figurative. (1) It is possible that an instrument pointed with diamond, such as glaziers now use, was not unknown, as "the sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond; it is graven upon the table of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars" (Jer. xvii:1). (2) Isaiah wrote "with a man's pen," in characters easy to be read, not like those written by the angel on Belshazzar's wall (Is. viii:1). (3) The saints' tongues are like "the pen of a ready writer," when their hearts promptly conceive and their mouths in an agreeable manner proclaim the praises of God (Ps. xlv:1).

PENCE (pēns), (Gr. δηνάριον, day-nar'ee-on, Matt. xviii:28; xx:2, 9, 13; xxii:19; Mark vi:37; xii:15; xiv:5; Luke vii:41; x:35; xx:24; John vi:7; xii:5; Rev. vi:6), a Roman silver coin, in the time of our Savior and the apostles.

PENIEL (pe-ní'el), (Heb. פְּנֵי־אֵל, pen-i-ale', face of God), Peniel or Penuel, a place beyond the Jordan, where Jacob wrestled with the angel, and 'called the name of the place Peniel; for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved' (Gen. xxxii:31).

There was in after times a fortified town in this place, the inhabitants of which exposed themselves to the resentment of Gideon, for refusing succor to his troops when pursuing the Midianites (Judg. viii:8). The site is not known; but it must have been at some point on or not far from the north bank of the Jabbok. Men of this name occur in 1 Chron. iv:4; viii:25. (See PENUEL.)

PENINNAH (pe-nín'nah), (Heb. פְּנִינָה, pen-in-naw, coral), one of the two wives of Elkanah, the father of Samuel (1 Sam. i:2), B. C. about 1125.

PENKNIFE (pēn'nif'), (Heb. טַחְרָר, tah'ar, Jer. xxxvi:23), a scrivener's knife for sharpening the point of the writing-reed.

PENNY (pēn'ný). See DRACHMA; DENARIUS; MONEY; PENCE; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

PENTATEUCH (pēn'tá-tük), (Gr. πεντάτευχος, pen-tat'yoo-khos, fivefold book, in the first five books). The title given to the five books of Moses. The Jews usually call the Pentateuch חַמֵּשׁ הַסֵּפֶרִים, hat-to-raw', the law; or, more fully, the law of Jehovah (Heb. חֻמְשַׁת מֹשֶׁה, Ps. xix:8; xxxviii:31; Is. v:24; xxx:9).

(1) Authorship. In considering the Pentateuch, the first question which arises is—Who was its AUTHOR? It is of great importance to hear first what the book itself says on this subject. The Pentateuch does not present itself as an anonymous production. It is manifestly intended and destined to be a public monument for the whole people, and it does not veil its origin in a mysterious obscurity; on the contrary the book speaks most clearly on this subject.

(2) Moses Commanded by God. According to Exod. xvii:14, Moses was commanded by God to write the victory over the Amalekites in the book. This passage shows that the account to be inserted was intended to form a portion of a more extensive work, with which the reader is supposed to be acquainted. It also proves that Moses, at an early period of his public career, was filled with the idea of leaving to his people a written memorial of the divine guidance, and that he fully understood the close and necessary connection of an authoritative law with a written code, or חֻמְשַׁת מֹשֶׁה. It is, therefore, by no means surprising that the observation repeatedly occurs that Moses wrote down the account of certain events (Exod. xxiv:4, 7; xxxiv:27, 28; Num. xxxiii:2). Especially important are the statements in Deut. i:5; xxviii:58. In Deut. xxxi:9, 24 (30) the whole work is expressly ascribed to Moses as the author, including the poem in Deut. xxxii. It may be made a question whether the hand of a later writer, who finished the Pentateuch, is perceptible from ch. xxxi:24 (comp. xxxiii:1, and xxxiv.), or whether the words in xxxi:24-30 are still the words of Moses. In the former case we have two witnesses, viz. Moses himself and the continuator of the Pentateuch; in the latter case, which seems to us the more likely, we have the testimony of Moses alone.

(3) Objections. Modern criticism has raised many objections against these statements of the Pentateuch relative to its own origin. Many critics suppose that they can discover in the Pentateuch indications that the author intended to make himself known as a person different from Moses. The most important objection is the following: that the Pentateuch, speaking of Moses, always uses the third person, bestows praise upon him, and uses concerning him expressions of respect. The Pentateuch even exhibits Moses quite objectively in the blessing recorded in Deut. xxxiii:4, 5.

To this objection we reply that the use of the third person proves nothing. The later Hebrew writers also speak of themselves in the third person. We might adduce similar instances from the classical authors, as Cæsar, Xenophon, and others. The use of the third person, instead of the first, prevails also among Oriental authors. In addition to this we should observe that the nature of the book itself demands the use of the third person, in reference to Moses, throughout the Pentateuch. This usage entirely corresponds with the character both of the history and of the law contained in the Pentateuch. By the use of the word I, the objective character of this history would have been destroyed, and the law of Jehovah would have been brought down to the sphere of human subjectivity and option. If we consider that the Pentateuch was destined to be a book of divine revelation, in which God exhibited to his people the exemplification of his providential guidance, we cannot expect that Moses, by whom the Lord had communicated his latest revelations, should be spoken of otherwise than in the third person. In the poetry contained in Deut. xxxiii:4, Moses speaks in the name of the people, which he personifies and introduces as speaking. The expressions in Exod. xi:3, and Num. xii:3 and 7, belong entirely to the context of history, and to its faithful and complete relation; consequently it is by no means vain boasting that is there expressed, but admiration of the divine mercy glorified in the people of God. In considering these passages we must also bear in mind the far greater number of other passages which speak of the feebleness and the sins of Moses.

(4) Author Claims to be Moses. It is certain that the author of the Pentateuch asserts himself to be Moses. The question then arises whether it is possible to consider this assertion to be true—whether Moses can be admitted to be the author. In this question is contained another, viz. whether the Pentateuch forms such a continuous whole that it is possible to ascribe it to one author? This question has been principally discussed in modern criticism. Various means have been employed to destroy the unity of the Pentateuch, and to resolve its constituent parts into a number of documents and fragments (comp. here especially the article GENESIS). Eichhorn and his followers assert that Genesis is composed of several ancient documents only. This assertion is still reconcilable with the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch. But Vater and others allege that the whole Pentateuch is composed of fragments; from which it necessarily follows that Moses was not the author of the whole. Modern critics are by no means unanimous in their opinions. A representative writer on this subject, Ewald, in his history of the people of Israel (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. i. Göttingen, 1843), asserts that there were seven different authors concerned in the Pentateuch. On the other hand, the internal unity of the Pentateuch has been demonstrated in many able essays. The attempts at division are especially supported by an appeal to the prevailing use of the different names of God in various portions of the work; but the arguments derived from this circumstance have been found insufficient to prove that the Pentateuch was written by different authors (comp. again the articles GENESIS, EXODUS, LEVITICUS, NUMBERS, and DEUTERONOMY.)

(5) Unity of the Work. The inquiry concerning the unity of the Pentateuch is intimately connected with its historical character. If there are in the Pentateuch decided contradictions, or different contradictory statements of one and the same fact, not only its unity but also its historical truth would be negated. On the other hand, if the work is to be considered as written by Moses, the whole style and internal veracity of the Pentateuch must correspond with the character of Moses. Considerate critics, who are not under the sway of dogmatic prejudices, find that the passages which are produced in order to prove that the Pentateuch was written after the time of Moses by no means support such a conclusion, and that a more accurate examination of the contents of the separate portions discovers many vestiges demonstrating that the work originated in the age of Moses (compare here again the articles on the separate books).

(6) Quoted by Prophets, Apostles, and Christ. It is certain that Joshua, who was the contemporary of Moses, believed him to be the author of "the book of the law" (Josh. i:7, 8; viii:31, 34; xxiii:6). (See also 2 Chron. xxxiv:15, 21.)

In the book of Ezra the authorship was ascribed to Moses (Ezra iii:2; vi:18; vii:6). Nehemiah says that Ezra used "the book of the law of Moses" as a text book in preaching to the people (Neh. viii:1, 5, 14; xiii:1).

During the captivity Daniel ascribed "the book of the law" to Moses (Dan. ix:11, 13).

These books are also quoted and ascribed to Moses by Christ and the apostles (Matt. xix:8; Mark x:3, xii:26; Luke xvi:29, xxiv:44; John vii:19, viii:5; Acts xxviii:23; 1 Cor. ix:9; 2 Cor. iii:15).

(7) Later Testimony. In the remote times of Jewish and Christian antiquity, we find no vestiges of doubt as to the genuineness of the Mosaic books, even the enemies of the Jews admitting their authenticity. (See Josephus against Apion, Whiston's Josephus, p. 581.) The Gnostics, indeed, opposed the Pentateuch, but attacked it merely on account of their dogmatical opinions concerning the Law, and Judaism in general; consequently they did not impugn the authenticity, but merely the divine authority, of the Law. Heathen authors alone, as Celsus and Julian, represented the contents of the Pentateuch as being mythological, and paralleled them with Pagan mythology.

(8) First Doubts Belong to the Middle Ages. In the middle ages, but not earlier, we find some very concealed critical doubts in the works of some Jews—as Isaac Ben Jasos, who lived in the eleventh century, and Aben Ezra. After the reformation, it was sometimes attempted to demonstrate the later origin of the Pentateuch. Such attempts were made by Spinoza, Richard Simon, Le Clerc, and Van Dale; but these critics were not unanimous in their results. Against them wrote Heidegger (Exercitationes Biblicæ, i, 246, sq.).

Witsius (Miscellanea Sacra, i, 103, sq.) and Carpov (Introductio, i, 38, sq.).

In the period of English, French, and German deism, the Pentateuch was attacked rather by jests than by arguments. Attacks of a more scientific nature were made about the end of the eighteenth century. But these were met by such critics as John David Michaelis and Eichhorn, who energetically and effectually defended the genuineness of the Pentateuch. These critics, however, on account of their own false position, did as much harm as good to the cause of the Pentateuch.

A new epoch of criticism commences about the year 1805. This was produced by Vater's Commentary and De Wette's Beiträge zur Einleitung in das alte Testament. Vater embodied all the arguments which had been adduced against the authenticity of the Pentateuch, and applied to the criticism of the sacred books the principles which Wolf had employed with reference to the Homeric poems. He divided the Pentateuch into fragments, to each of which he assigned its own period, but referred the whole generally to the age of the Assyrian or Babylonian exile. Since the days of Vater, a series of the most different hypothesis has been produced by German and other critics about the age of the Pentateuch, and that of its constituent sections. No one critic seems fully to agree with any other; and frequently it is quite evident that the opinions advanced are destitute of any sure foundation. (See MOSES.)

(9) Literature. The critical doubts respecting the authenticity of the Pentateuch have produced in modern times several works in defense of its genuineness; such as Kanne's Biblischer Untersuchungen, 2 vols., 1820; the observations by Jahn, Rosenmüller, and Bleek; Ranke's Untersuchungen über den Pentateuch, 2 vols.; Hengstenberg's Beiträge zur Einleitung, vols. 2 and 3; Hävernick's Int. to Old Testament; Kerl, Int. to Old Testament; Drechsler, Ueber die Einheit und Authentie der Genesis; König's Alt-testamentliche Studien, 2d number; Sack's Apologetik, etc.; Ainsworth, Annotations on the Five Books of Moses, 1699; Kidder, Commentary on the Five Books of Moses, 1713; Parker, Bibliotheca Biblica, 1720, 1735; Jamieson, Critical and Practical Exposition of the Pentateuch, 1748; Robertson, Clavis Pentateuchii, 1770; Graves, Lectures on the Pentateuch, 1815; Macdonald, Introd. to the Penta., 1861; Bartlett, Character and Authorship of the Penta. (Bibliotheca Sacra., Apr., July, 1863, July, Oct. 1864); Smith, Authorship of the Penta., 1868; Norton, The Penta., etc., 1870; J. PENTATEUCHAL OBJECTIONS (pën'tä-tük-al öb-jäk'shüns).

It has been claimed that all the Pentateuchal laws could not have been given through Moses because the same legislator would not give three different codes to the same people during forty years and under nearly related conditions.

But in order to make out three codes the objector is obliged to include those scattered groups of laws which are chiefly found in Lev. xvi, xxv, and are found also occasionally in Numbers and sometimes called "The Law of Holiness," although this is not a Biblical term.

It may be shown, however, that the teaching (Torah) of the wilderness forms one progressive whole, and modern critics are not always qualified to fix the limits within which its progress was possible.

(1) Early. Even before the covenant at Horeb, there was an early stratum of "Judgments" or precedents which Moses was commanded to "set before" the people in connection with the code which was given on Sinai or Horeb. These "judgments" are found in Exod. xxi., and this older and pre-Mosaic section is incorporated into the Sinaitic laws proper at or about Exodus xxii: 20. Beginning with the twenty-first chapter of Exodus we have a very ancient corpus juris which is written with a few exceptions in the third person, whereas from verse 20 of chap. xxii the style changes and "thou" or "ye" is the uniform mode of address. The older method has a spirit of its own, besides a strong local color.

The "judgments" here given are evidently legal decisions, and they give us a series of pictures which illustrate a very primitive mode of life.

Sir Henry Maine says: "Parities of circumstances were probably commoner in the simple mechanism of ancient society than they are now, and in the succession of similar cases, awards are likely to follow and resemble each other. Here we have the germ or rudiment of a custom, a conception posterior to that of thémistes (themistes) or judgments. However strongly we, with our modern associations, may be inclined to lay down a priori that the notion of a custom must precede that of a judicial sentence, and that a judgment must affirm a custom or punish its breach, it seems quite certain that the historical order of ideas is that in which I have placed them . . .

Law has scarcely reached the footing of custom, it is rather a habit . . . The only authoritative statement of right and wrong is a judicial sentence after the facts, not one supposing a law which has been violated, but one which is breathed for the first time by a higher power into the judge's mind at the moment of adjudication." (Ancient Law, p. 8.)

This last idea is forcibly illustrated by the use of the term Elohim for Judges as in Exodus xxi: 6, also xxii: 8.

Each of these early judgments represents a scene in pastoral life, while agriculture is also shown in the vineyard and harvest field.

Master and slave are alike Hebrews: "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve:

and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing" (Exod. xxi:2).

These old judgments contain also constant reminders of patriarchal life; for instance in Exod. xxii:10-13 we read: "If a man deliver unto his neighbor" any animal "to keep, and it die or be hurt . . . If it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution to the owner . . . If it be torn in pieces let him bring it for a witness," etc.

This reminds one forcibly of Jacob's reproach to Laban, "That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss. Of my hand didst thou require it . . . stolen by day or by night" (Gen. xxxi:39).

There is a glimpse of the future cities of refuge where it is said of the man who accidentally kills another: "Then will I appoint thee a place whither he shall flee" (Exod. xxi:13).

There is nowhere here any retrospect to a state of earlier bondage, but a little later we find: "Ye were strangers in the land of Egypt," and then follows the angel guide and the promise of "the place which I have prepared."

All of these conditions exactly suit only one stage of Israel's history. Nearly all of them are inconsistent with the life in Canaan, and still less are they appropriate to the conditions which obtained in the wilderness. The one stage to which they do apply is the life in Goshen, when the people were "increasing abundantly and multiplying" in that region until "the land was filled with them" (Gen. xlvii:27; Exod. i:7).

In this section there is a disparity in social conditions as compared with those which we find in Deuteronomy, but the laws of the earlier section are largely incorporated into those of Deuteronomy. (Compare Exod. xxii:20 and xxiii:19 with Deut. xiv:21.) Therefore the difficulty of codes so widely differing from each other that forty years cannot cover them ceases to exist. These early Goshen "judgments" precede Moses probably a hundred years, and they were apparently included in the "Sinaitic covenant laws in order to preserve the continuity which had been stamped upon institutions, but the more especial motive seems to be that pertaining to the judicature."

When Moses appoints the subordinate judges, he is to "teach them ordinances and laws, and show them the work they must do." And with these old laws many of them would be familiar; not only this, but until the promulgation from Sinai these "judgments" were the only legal material available for this purpose. Hence their preservation among the traditions of the race; for it is possible that some of them may have been the decisions of Joseph, who would naturally act as the chief of his own community, and by controlling their customs prevent amalgamation with an alien race.

(2) The Middle Pentateuchal Laws. The legislation concerning the sanctuary and its furniture, together with the priestly duties and privileges, deals with a limited class, therefore its arrangement is more orderly than that of much which follows; but even here there is more or less mingling of moral and religious with civil ordinances. According to Sir Henry Maine these conditions "show that the severance of law from morality, and of religion from law, belongs very distinctly to the later stages of mental progress." (Ancient Law, p. 16.)

This mixture is traceable everywhere in Pentateuchal law except in the precepts pertaining to the ritual. "The Law of Holiness" cannot properly be called a code although it contains a mass of regulations for the conduct of the people. To this belong many texts pertaining to the toroth or teaching concerning the Sabbath.

A torah is properly a text for teaching, and the teachers were the priests or Levites. In that early day, the judges who aided Moses were also teachers, hence he may have issued the toroth or teaching texts to the judge and to the Levite. The teaching concerning the keeping of the Sabbath is a good illustration of the repetition which is everywhere employed to enforce the keeping of the law. So also the law against "eating with the blood."

Again in Leviticus xi:43, we have a law against certain heathen defilements, and there are many others.

In Exodus, Leviticus and Deuteronomy there is a multitude of such commands as follows: "These are the commandments, the statutes and the judgments which the Lord your God commanded to teach you." "Hear O Israel! the Lord our God is one God," "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," "Thou shalt not take His name in vain"; and many others.

It would appear that the great host of Israel was divided up into many congregations, and that the Levites or teachers were probably taught from the outlines of a lesson which had been inscribed on a clay tablet, perhaps at first, and later on a skin or scroll. In many of the houses of the priests these writings would be preserved, and in a multiplicity of them, the toroth would probably be presented in every stage of development; it might be a mere "skeleton", such as we have in Lev. xix:3, 4, 11-19, 26, 33, and other places, or with the thought of the discourse or lesson more fully wrought out.

There came a time when these original toroth in whatever form they existed were collected and put together. They were doubtless genuine but they were compiled without any regular arrangement such as a code would require. It is probable that only a small percentage of them were saved, but it seems likely that all of the Sinaitic injunctions became teaching toroth.

(3) Genesis of the Mosaic Law. A recognition of these facts seem to explain the genesis of the Mosaic law and especially the lack of systematic arrangement which obtains in this department of it.

We find however that the starting point are the Goshen "judgments" and these stand connected with the Sinaitic laws proper. In Deuteronomy there is more or less of method, but the very lack of orderly completion here is an unanswerable argument against the claim that this portion was formulated at a comparatively modern period. No one can imagine for a moment that a priestly committee in Babylon, with all the leisure of two generations or more, would have left this department of the law in such a disconnected condition if it had originated with them.

Neither can we imagine that in the period of the decline of the Asiatic monarchy when the national mind had for hundreds of years been hardened in opposite views, the broad basis of this law could have been formulated. We cannot suppose this class of men as organizing a system whose judges and officers were chosen by the citizens "in all thy gates," a system whose administration and executive reposed everywhere on the support of spontaneous patriotism.

The work of the "Higher Critics" especially in this department of the law has resulted in much confusion, for they reduce the whole of Deuteronomy to anachronism and more or less absurdity.

(4) The Covenant. In the covenant "which the Lord commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, besides the covenant which He made with them in Horeb," there is no new doctrine taught, no new moral precept enforced. It was rather a renewal with that generation of the covenant which had been made with their fathers—with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: "Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God . . . that thou shouldst enter into covenant with the Lord thy God and into His oath . . . that He may establish thee to-day for a people unto Himself, and that He may be unto thee a God, as He hath said unto thee, and as He hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob."

It was a setting forth before that generation of life and good, of death and evil to enforce the great duty of loyalty upon them.

It was a renewed admonition for the keeping of the old "commandments and statutes and judgments." "In that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God and to walk in His ways, and to keep His commandments, and His statutes, and His judgments, and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it" (Deut. ch. xxix-xxx).

It was an enforcement of the whole law, and in relation to the Lawgiver it was his last will and testament—a part of his farewell words. He afterwards blessed his people, and then Moses went up unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, and the Lord showed him the land. There he lay down upon his armor and the angels of God buried him in the land of Moab "and no man knoweth of his sepulcher unto this day." (See article by the Rev. Henry Hayman, D. D., on "The Great Pentateuchal Difficulty Met." Bib. Sacr. Oct. 1896, pp. 45, sq.)

PENTATEUCH, THE, ILLUSTRATED BY EGYPTOLOGY.

Very little of the papyrus literature of Egypt has survived, and that pertains mostly to their theology and was preserved in their tombs, and yet it may be said that the later chapters of Genesis as well as the whole of the book of Exodus have an Egyptian background. While we cannot expect to find direct records concerning a foreign people, we must examine the local coloring to see if it accords with the recited facts.

While many others are equally forcible we may suggest the history of Joseph for instance as the history of an Egyptian official, and if it be true we shall find it correct in local color. The scholar who studies the history of Joseph is forced to conclude at least that the author was well acquainted with early Egyptian life. For instance the "chiefs" of the bakers and butlers are mentioned in a list of the officials at court; the "seven kine" seen in the dream of Pharaoh represent the seven forms of the cow-headed goddess Hathor who symbolized the Nile; the marks of favor which were shown to Joseph were those pertaining to his time, and even his change of name was in strict accordance with Egyptian usage. Joseph's action in obtaining for the king the real estate of the country is illustrated by the facts shown by the study of the monuments.

It appears that Joseph belonged to the age of the Hyksos kings, and before that time the land was held by feudal princes and other private owners, the crown lands being of very small extent, while during the 18th and the following dynasties the land is divided between the kings and the priests, individual ownership having become a thing of the past. It is only in the book of Genesis that the change is explained.

Prof. Sayce says: "The plagues which preceded the Exodus appear to have been an accentuation of natural conditions; for instance every year the Nile becomes the color of blood and the water is foul and injurious. This phenomena takes place however only when the river begins to rise and not in the early spring. Every summer the frogs become a nuisance and lice cover the bodies of the unclean natives, while flies are abundant, and boils are a common trouble. The cattle often die of murrain and the southwest wind brings a cloud of locusts over the country. As late as the spring of 1895 a thunderstorm destroyed the crops on three thousand acres of cultivated land. We have, it is true, only one record of 'darkness which might be felt' but the dust storms which accompany the spring winds obscure the sunlight and fill the land with gloom." (See "Fresh Light from Monuments." etc.)

No records of the extraordinary phenomenon of this sort would be kept, for the Pharaohs like the Assyrian kings did not place the story of their defeats upon their monuments. But bits of local color show the truth of the various narratives, and we have occasional admissions even upon the monuments, as in the case of the stone recording the destruction of the firstborn of the Egyptians, and mentioning the name of Israel.

PENTECOST (pĕn'tĕ-kōst), (Greek Πεντηκοστή, Pen-tay-kos-tay', fiftieth, i. e., day), the name given in the New Testament to the Feast of Weeks, or of Ingathering, which was celebrated on the fiftieth day from the festival of unleavened bread, or the Passover; or seven weeks from the 16th day of Nisan.

It was a festival of thanks for the harvest, and commenced immediately after the Passover. (See FESTIVALS.) It was one of the three great yearly festivals, in which all the males were required to appear before God at the place of his sanctuary. Josephus states that in his time great numbers of Jews resorted from every quarter to Jerusalem to keep this festival (Antiq. xiv. 13, 4; xvii. 10, 2; De Bell. Jud. ii. 3, 1). This testimony affords interesting corroboration of Acts ii:1, 9-11; xx:16; 1 Cor. xvi:8, in which the same fact appears. The commencement of the Christian church on the day of Pentecost, preceded as it was by our Lord's ascension, attached a peculiar interest to this season, and eventually led to its being set apart for the commemoration of these great events. It was not, however, established as one of the great festivals until the fourth century. The combination of two events (the Ascension and the descent of the Holy Ghost) in one festival has a parallel in the original Jewish feast, which is held to have included the feast of first-fruits, and of the delivering of the law (Exod. xxiii:16; Lev. xxiii:14-21; Num. xxviii:26). Indeed, this festival in some respects bears a close analogy to the Jewish one; and is evidently little more than a modification of it. The converts of that day, on which the Holy Ghost descended, were the first fruits of the Spirit. This festival became one of the three baptismal seasons (Tertull. De Baptis. c. 19; Hieron. in Zach. xiv:8); and it derives its name of Whitsunday, or white-Sunday, from so many being clad in white on this day of their baptism.

PENUEL (pe-nū-el'), (Heb. ^{בְּנֵי אֵל}, pen-oo-ale', face of God).

1. A son of Hur, the son of Judah (1 Chron. iv:4). (B. C. after 1658.) He was an ancestor of the inhabitants of Gedor.

2. A Benjamite resident at Jerusalem, and the son of Shashak, son of Beriah (1 Chron. viii:25). (B. C. after 1612.) (See PENIEL.)

PEOPLE (pē'p'l) (Heb. ^{עַם}, am, a host, a multitude), (Greek ^{λαός}, lah-os', races or tribes, Rev. vii:9).

The word denotes: (1) The fathers of particular nations (Gen. xxv:13); and so one is made a "great nation," when his seed are multiplied into one (Exod. xxxii:10). (2) The persons that compose a kingdom or nation, whether poor or rich (1 Sam. xv:30). (3) The common populace in a city or nation (Matt. xii:23; Luke xxiii:4). (4) The Gentiles (Gen. xlix:10; Ps. cxvii:1). (5) Both Jews and Gentiles (Luke ii:10). (6) The ants and conies are called people in Prov. xxx:25, 26.

PEOR (pē'or), (Heb. ^{פְּעוֹר}, peh-ore', opening, cleft).

1. A mountain in the land of Moab (Num. xxiii:28).

Eusebius places it between Livias and Esbus, over against Jericho; which shows that it was not supposed to be east of the Dead Sea, as usually stated (Onomast. under ^{Ἀραβὼθ Μωάβ}). It has not in modern times been recognized.

2. An idol (Num. xxv:18; xxxi:16; Josh. xxii:17). Called Bael-peor in Num. xxv:3.

PERADVENTURE (pēr'ad-vēn'tūr), (Heb. ^{פְּרָצָה}, pane, Gen. xxxi:31), perhaps, perchance.

PERAZIM, MOUNT (pēr'a-zīm, mount), (Heb. ^{פְּרָצִים}, per-aw-tseem', mount of breaches, Is. xxviii:21). See BAAL-PERAZIM.

PERDITION (pēr-dīsh'ūn), (Gr ^{ἀπώλεια}, ap-ō-li-a), a perishing, a destruction.

This word occurs only in the New Testament, and in that rarely. In the Greek it means a perishing, destruction, as "let thy money perish with thee" (Acts viii:20); with the included idea of misery (1 Tim. vi:9). In particular it is the destruction which consists in the loss of eternal life, the lot of those excluded from the kingdom of God (John xvii:12; 2 Thess. ii:3; Heb. x:39; 2 Pet. iii:7; Rev. xvii:8, 11). (McC. & Str., Cyc., Barnes, Bib. Dict.) (See HELL; PUNISHMENTS.)

PERDITION, SON OF (pēr-dīsh'ūn, sōn ōv), (Gr. ^{ὁῦος τῆς ἀπώλεια}).

Applied to Judas (John xvii:12). Comment by Peter (Acts i:20). "Man of sin" is also thus called (2 Thess. ii:3).

PERES (pē'res), (Heb. ^{פְּרֵס}, peh'res). In A. V. 'ossifrage' (Lev. xi:13; Deut. xiv:12).

Although Neser is unquestionably the Hebrew name of the eagle, a genus so conspicuous, and to this moment so common, in Palestine probably possessed more than one designation in the national dialects of the country, and under the term ossifrage it would indicate the great sea eagle. But Percs is by other translators referred to a hawk, which they denominate Accipiter.

Their scientific application, however, has been referred to two birds; osprey being the Pandion Haliaetus, 'the fishing hawk,' and ossifrage the Aquila Ossifraga of Brisson, or 'great sea eagle' of Pennant; authors having even pretended that fragments of bones have been found in the stomach of the last mentioned. If this fact were proved, it would justify the denomination of ossifrage, or 'bone-breaker;' but the dispensation of faculties in nature always indicates a purpose, which in the case of the Pandion, living as it does exclusively upon fish, appears inapplicable; for theirs are not the bones understood by the name, and such as the bird accidentally swallows are small and without nutriment. When we place together Percs, a name derived from a root denoting 'to crush' or 'break,' and find that by the Greek name ^{φήνη} (Phene) the Hellenic nations called the Lämmer Geyer of the Swiss, which Savigny (Oiseaux d'Égypte et de Syrie) has proved to be the ossifrage of the Romans, then it becomes an immediate question why such a denomination should have been bestowed. The answer is, we think, satisfactory; for constituting the largest flying bird of the old continent, and being a tenant of the highest ranges of mountains in Europe, western Asia, and Africa, though sometimes feeding on carrion, and not appearing to take up prey like eagles in the talons, it pursues the chamois, young ibex, mountain deer, or marmot, among precipices, until it drives, or by a rush of its wings forces, the game over the brink, to be dashed to pieces below. It thus deservedly obtained the name of bone-breaker.

The species in Europe is little if at all inferior in size to the Condor of South America, measuring from the point of the bill to the end of the tail four feet two or three inches, and sometimes ten feet in the expanse of wing; the head and neck are not, like those of vultures, naked, but covered with whitish narrow feathers; and there is a beard of bristly hair under the lower mandible: the rest of the plumage is nearly black and brown, with some whitish streaks on the shoulders, and an abundance of pale rust color on the back of the neck, the thighs, vent, and legs; the toes are short, and bluish, and the claws strong. In the young the head and neck are black, and the species or variety of Abyssinia appears to be rusty and yellowish on the neck and stomach. It is the griffon of Cuvier, Gypaetos barbatus of nomenclators. (See OSSIFRAGE.) C. H. S.

PERESH (pē'resh), (Heb. ^{פְּרֵשׁ}, peh'resh, separate, excrement), one of the two sons of Machir of Manasseh, by Maacliah (1 Chron. vii:16). B. C. about 1658.

PEREZ (pē'rez), (Heb. ^{פְּרֵצַה}, peh'rets, bursting through; 1 Chron. xxvii:3). See PHAREZ.

PEREZ-UZZAH or PEREZ-UZZA (pē'rez-ūz'-zah ōr pē'rez-ūz'zà), (Heb. ^{פְּרֵצַה וּצְזָה}, peh'rets-ooz-zaw', the breach of Uzzah), a place in the neighborhood of Jerusalem which obtained this name from the judgment inflicted upon Uzzah for rashly handling the ark (2 Sam. vi:8; 1 Chron. xiii:11).

PERFECTION, PERFECT (pēr fēk'shūn, pēr'-fēkt).

The fundamental idea of the Hebrew and Greek words which are thus rendered is completeness. If the Great Captain of our salvation was made "perfect through suffering" (Heb. ii:10; Luke xiii:22) it certainly indicated no defect in his character, but the completion of his sublime attributes and mission. Absolute completion and perfection is the attribute of God (Job xxxvi:4; xxxvii:16; Matt. v:48).

Perfection is that state or quality of a thing in which it is free from defect or redundancy. According to some, it is divided into physical or natural, whereby a thing has all its powers and faculties; moral, or an eminent degree of goodness and piety; and metaphysical or tran- scendent is the possession of all the essential attributes or parts necessary to the integrity of a substance; or it is that whereby a thing has or is provided of everything belonging to its nature; such is the perfection of God.

The term perfection, says the great Witsius, is not always used in the same sense in the Scriptures. (1) There is a perfection of sincerity, whereby a man serves God without hypocrisy (Job i:1; Is. xxxviii:3). (2) There is a perfection of parts, subjective with respect to the whole man (1 Thess. v:23), and objective with respect to the whole law, when all the duties prescribed by God are observed (Ps. cxix:128; Luke i:6). (3) There is a comparative perfection ascribed to those who are advanced in knowledge, faith, and sanctification, in comparison of those who are still infants and untaught (1 John ii:13; 1 Cor. ii:6; Phil. iii:15). (4) There is an evangelical perfection. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to the believer, he is complete in him, and accepted of God as perfect through Christ (Col. ii:10; Eph. v:27; 2 Cor. v:21). (5) There is also a perfection of degrees, by which a person performs all the commands of God with the full exertion of all his powers without the least defect. This is what the law of God requires, but what the saints cannot attain to in this life, though we willingly allow them all the other kinds above mentioned (Rom. vii:24; Phil. iii:12; 1 John i:8). (See SANCTIFICATION; SIN.) (Buck, Theol. Dict.) fore formed a particular profession. The rokechim of Exod. xxx:25, 35; Neh. iii:8; Eccles. x:1, called 'Apothecary' in the Auth. Vers., was no other than a maker of perfumes. So strong were the better kinds of ointments, and so perfectly were the different component substances amalgamated, that they have been known to retain their scent several hundred years. One of the alabaster vases in the museum at Alnwick Castle contains some of the ancient Egyptian ointment, between two and three thousand years old, and yet its odor remains (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii. 314).

Perga.

The 'holy anointing oil,' employed in the sacerdotal unction, was composed of two parts 'myrrh' (see MOR), two parts 'cassia' (see KIDDAH), one part 'cinnamon' (see KINNAMON), one part 'sweet calamus' (see the article on KANEH), compounded 'according to the art of the perfumer,' with a sufficient quantity of the purest olive oil to give it the proper consistence (Exod. xxx:

23, 25). It was strictly forbidden that any perfume like this, that is, composed of the same ingredients, should be used for common purposes, or indeed made at all (xxx:32, 33). (See ANOINTING.)

The prodigious quantity of this holy ointment made on the occasion which the text describes, being no less than 750 ounces of solids compounded with five quarts of oil, may give some idea of the profuse use of perfumes among the Hebrews. We are, indeed, told by the Psalmist (cxxxiii:2) that when the holy anointing oil was poured upon the head of Aaron it flowed down over his beard and dress, even to the skirts of his garments.

PERFUME (pēr'fūm), (Heb. קֶטֶרֶת, ket-o'reth, fumigation, Exod. xxx:35, 37; Prov. xxvii:9; רַק־קוֹאֲכָה, rak-koo'akh, Is. lvii:9).

The ointments and oils used by the Israelites were rarely simple, but were compounded of various ingredients (Job xli:31; comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxix:8). Olive oil, the valued product of Palestine (Dent. xxviii:40; Mic. vi:15), was combined with sundry aromatics, chiefly foreign (1 Kings x:10; Ezek. xxvii:22), particularly besem, myrrh and nard (see MYRRH; NERD). Such ointments were for the most part costly (Amos vi:6), and formed a much-coveted luxury. The ingredients, and often the prepared oils and resins in a state fit for use, were obtained chiefly in traffic from the Phœnicians, who imported them in small alabaster boxes (ALABASTER), in which the delicious aroma was best preserved. A description of the more costly unguents is given by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xiii:2). The preparation of these required peculiar skill, and there-

PERGA (pēr'gà), (Gr. Πέργη, perg'ay, citadel), a town of Pamphylia, in Asia Minor, situated upon the river Cestrus, sixty stades from its estuary.

On a hill near the town stood a celebrated temple of Artemis, at which the inhabitants of the surrounding country held a yearly festival in honor of the goddess. Perga was originally the capital of Pamphylia; but when that province was divided into two, Side became the chief town of the first, and Perga of the second Pamphylia. (Strabo, xiv. p. 667; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 26; Pomp. Mela, i. 14; Cic. Verr. i. 30).

The apostle Paul was twice at this place (Acts xiii:13; xiv:25). In the first instance he seems to have landed at Perga, and the Cestrus was then, in fact, navigable to the town, although the entrance to the river is now impassable, having long been closed by a bar. The site has been established by Col. Leake as that where extensive remains of vaulted and ruined buildings were observed by General Köhler on the Cestrus, west of Stavros. It is called by the Turks Eski-kalesi.

PERGAMOS (pēr'ga-mós), (Gr. Πέργαμος, pēr-gam-os, citadel, burg), or PERGAMUM, a town of the Great Mysia, the capital of a kingdom of the same name, and afterwards of the Roman province of Asia Propria.

(1) Location. The river Caicus, which is formed by the union of two branches meeting thirty or forty miles above its mouth, waters an extensive valley not exceeded in natural beauty and fertility by any in the world. In this valley, in N. lat. 30° 4', E. long. 27° 12', stood Pergamos, at the distance of about twenty miles from the sea. It lay on the north bank of the Caicus, at the base and on the declivity of two high and steep mountains, on one of which now stands a dilapidated castle. About two centuries before the Christian era, Pergamos became the residence of the celebrated kings of the family of Attalus, and a seat of literature and the arts.

(2) Library. King Eumenes, the second of the name, greatly beautified the town, and increased the library of Pergamos so considerably that the number of volumes amounted to 200,000. As the papyrus shrub had not yet begun to be exported from Egypt, sheep and goat skins, cleaned and prepared for the purpose, were used for manuscripts; and as the art of preparing them was brought to perfection at Pergamos, they, from that circumstance, obtained the name of pergamena, or parchment. The library remained at Pergamos after the kingdom of the Attali had lost its independence, until Antony removed it to Egypt, and presented it to Queen Cleopatra. (Pliny, Hist. Nat. iii. 2; Plutarch, Anton.) The valuable tapestries, called in Latin aulæa, from having adorned the hall of King Attalus, were also wrought in this town. The last king of Pergamos bequeathed his treasures to the Romans, who took possession of the kingdom also, and erected it into a province under the name of Asia Propria (Martial, Epig. ix:17).

(3) Under the Romans. Pergamos retained under the Romans that authority over the cities of Asia which it had acquired under the successors of Attalus, and it still preserves many vestiges of its ancient magnificence. Remains of the Asclepium, and of some other temples, of the theater, stadium, amphitheater, and several other buildings, are still to be seen. Even now Pergamos, under the name of Bergamo, is a place of considerable importance, containing a population estimated at 14,000, of whom about 3,000 are Greeks, 300 Armenians, and the rest Turks (Macfarlane's Visit).

(4) Present Condition. The town consists for the most part of small and mean wooden houses, among which appear the remains of early Christian churches, showing 'like vast fortresses amid vast barracks of wood.' None of these churches have any Scriptural or Apocalyptic interest connected with them, having been erected 'several centuries after the ministry of the apostles, and when Christianity was not a humble and despised creed, but the adopted religion of a vast empire.' The Pagan temples have fared worse than these Christian churches.

(5) One of the Seven Churches. In Pergamos was one of 'the Seven Churches of Asia,' to which the Apocalypse is addressed. This church is commended for its fidelity and firmness in the midst of persecutions, and in a city so eminently addicted to idolatry. 'I know,' it is said, 'thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is' (Rev. ii:13). Now there was at Pergamos a celebrated and much frequented temple of Æsculapius, who probably there, as in other places, was worshiped in the form of a living serpent, fed in the temple, and considered as its divinity. Hence Æsculapius was called the god of Pergamos, and on the coins struck by the town, Æsculapius appears with a rod encircled by a serpent (Berger, Thesaur., i. 492). As the sacred writer mentions (Rev. xii:9) the great dragon and the old serpent, there is reason to conclude that when he says in the above passage that the church of Pergamos dwelt 'where Satan's seat is,' he alludes to the worship of the serpent, which was there practiced (Rosenmüller, Bib. Geog. iii, 13-17; Macfarlane, Visit to the Seven Apocalyptic Churches, 1832; Arundell's Asia Minor, ii. 302-7; Leake's Geog. of Asia Minor, pp. 265, 266; Richter, Wallfahrten, p. 488, sq.; Schubert, Reise ins Morgenland; Missionary Herald for 1839, pp. 228-30; Smith, Dict. Class. Geog.)

PERIDA (pe-rī'dà), (Neh. vii:57). See PERUDA.

PERIZZITE (pēr'iz-zite), (Heb. with the art. פְּרִיזִי, hap-per-is-see'), "the Perizzite."

A tribe inhabiting the mountainous region which they eventually yielded to Ephraim and Judah (Josh. xi:3; xvii:15; Judg. i:4, 5). They were kindred to the Canaanites strictly so called (Exod. xxiii:23; Judg. i:4, 5); sometimes Canaanites and Perizzites are put for all the other tribes of Canaan (Gen. xiii:7; xxxiv:30); while in other places the Perizzites are enumerated with various other tribes of the same stock (Gen. xv:20; Exod. iii:8, 17; Deut. vii:1, etc.). A residue of the Perizzites still remained in the time of Solomon, and were by him subjected to bond-service (1 Kings ix:20).

PERJURY (pēr'jū-rĭ), swearing falsely or breaking a lawful oath. See OWATH

PERSECUTE (pēr'sē-kūt), (Heb. פָּרַעַד, rao-daf'), (Ps. vii:1, 5; lxxi:11).

To pursue with hostile intentions, to seek after and improve all occasions of doing one hurt, especially on account of his steadfast cleaving to the truths and ways of God (Job xix:22; Matt. v:11 Ishmael persecuted Isaac, by mocking and reproaching him (Gal. iv:29). God persecutes men when he pursues them with his judgments in every place and condition they are in (Lam. iii:66; Ps. xxxv:6). Christ is persecuted when his people, who are united with and dear to him, are for his cause reproached, harrassed, and murdered (Acts ix:4). Though persecution for conscience's sake is contrary to the genius of Christianity, yet pretenders to it have very often, for their own selfish ends, persecuted their fellow-professors.

PERSECUTION (pēr'sē-kū'shūn), (Gr. διωγμός, dee-ogue-mos', a pursuing), the active opposition which Christians meet from their enemies.

(1) Character of Persecution. Persecution is threefold. (1) Mental, when the spirit of a man rises up and opposes another. (2) Verbal, when men give hard words and deal in uncharitable censures. (3) Actual or open, by the hand, such as the dragging of innocent persons before the tribunal of Justice (Matt. x:18). The unlawfulness of persecution for conscience's sake must appear plain to every one that possesses the least degree of thought or of feeling. "To banish, imprison, plunder, starve, hang, and burn men for religion," says the shrewd Jortin, "is not the gospel of Christ; it is the gospel of the devil.

Christ never used anything that looked like force or violence, except once; and that was to drive bad men out of the temple, and not to drive them in."

We know the origin of it to be from the prince of darkness, who began the dreadful practice in the first family on earth, and who, more or less, has been carrying on the same work ever since, and that almost among all parties. "Persecution for conscience' sake," says Dr. Doddridge, "is every way inconsistent, because (1) it is founded on an absurd supposition that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion. (2) It is evidently opposite to that fundamental principle of morality. Persecution is so far from being required or encouraged by the gospel that it is most directly contrary to many of its precepts, and indeed to the whole of it." The chief victims of this diabolical plot have been Christians.

(2) Persecution by the Jews. The New Testament will inform the reader more particularly how the first Christians suffered for the cause of truth. Jesus Christ himself was exposed to it in the greatest degree. The four Evangelists record the dreadful scenes, which need not here be dwelt upon.

(3) Persecution by Pagans. There were ten persecutions waged by Pagan authorities against the Christians: (1) Under Nero A. D. 64. He inflicted upon the Christians the most horrible tortures, so that his name is the very synonym of all that is monstrous and repulsive. (2) The second general persecution was under Domitian (A. D. 95), when 40,000 were supposed to have suffered martyrdom. (3) The third began in the third year of Trajan (A. D. 100), and was carried on with great violence for several years. (4) The fourth was under Antonius, when the Christians were banished from their houses, forbidden to show their heads, reproached, beaten, hurried from place to place, plundered, imprisoned, and stoned. (5) The fifth began A. D. 127, under Severus, when great cruelties were committed. In this reign happened the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, and their companions. Perpetua had an infant at the breast, and Felicitas was just delivered at the time of their being put to death. These two beautiful and amiable young women, mothers of infant children, after suffering much in prison, were exposed before an insulting multitude, to a wild cow, who mangled their bodies in a most horrid manner: after which they were carried to a conspicuous place, and put to death by the sword. (6) Under Maximinus (A. D. 235). (7) Of great severity under Decius (A. D. 249). (8) Under Valerian (A. D. 257). (9) Under Aurelian (A. D. 274), and (10) under Diocletian (A. D. 303).

PERSEVERANCE (pēr'sē-vēr'ans), (Gr. προσκαρτέρησις, pros-kar-ter'ay-sis, persistency, enduring constancy), the continuance in a state, or in a course of action, notwithstanding much opposition (Eph. vi:18).

From the Calvinistic point of view whatever partial decays of grace the saints really have; and though, if left to themselves, they would lose their whole stock of grace; and though the use of watchfulness, and of other means of steadfastness, is necessary to their perseverance in their gracious state, nature, and course; yet their total or final fall from the same is evidently inconsistent with a multitude of Scriptures; inconsistent with the unchangeable love, the justice, the wisdom, and faithfulness of God; inconsistent with his unchangeable purposes, προμίσξ covenant, and oath; inconsistent with the honor of the Father as their chooser, as the giver of them to Christ for his reward, and as their establisher and keeper; inconsistent with the honor of the Son as their purchaser, advocate, builder, shepherd, husband, life, and one body and spirit with them; inconsistent with the honor of the Holy Ghost, who is in them as a perpetual inhabitant, worker, comforter, fountain springing up to everlasting life, the seal of redemption, and earnest of their glory (Job xvii:9; Prov. iv:18, and x:25; Ps. ii:8; cxv:2, and cii:28; Is. xlvi:10; liv:8-10; lix:20, 21, and liii:10; Jer. xxxii:39-42; Hos. ii:19, 20; Matt. xvi:18, and xxiv:24; Luke xxii:32; John iv:14; vi:27, 35, 39, 40, 54-58; x:10, 28, 29; xiii:1; xiv:16, 17, 19, and xvii:6, 12, 15, 20, 24; Acts xiii:48; Rom. v:21; viii:28-39; ix:23, and xi:23; 1 Cor. i:8, 9; vi:15-19; x:13; 2 Cor. i:21, 22, and iii:3; Gal. ii:20; Eph. i:13, 14; iv:30, and v:25-30; Phil. i:6, and ii:3; Col. iii:1; 1 Thess. v:8, 9, 23, 24; 2 Thess. iii:3; 2 Tim. ii:19; Tit. ii:14; Heb. iii:3; vi:17-19; 1 Pet. i:5, and ii:9; 1 John ii:19, and iii:9). PERSIA (pēr'shā), (Heb. פָּרַס, par-ras', a horse). See PERSIAN.

PERSIAN (pēr'shan), (Heb. פָּרְסִי, par-see', a Parsite). Its modern name of Fars, or Farsistan, is considered a corruption of its original appellation.

It is the name of a people and nation not found in the older records of the Bible, but after the Babylonish period it occurs frequently (2 Chron. xxxvi:20, 22; Ezra iv:5, sq.; vi:14, sq.; Esth. i:3; Dan. vi:8; 1 Macc. i:1), meaning the great Persian kingdom founded by Cyrus, which in the period of its highest glory comprised all Asiatic countries from the Mediterranean to the Indus, from the Black and Caspian Sea to Arabia and the Indian Ocean. In the later periods of the Biblical history it is not referred to for the most part except in conjunction with the Medes (see MEDES)—a conjunction which tends to confirm the truth of the sacred records, since the most respectable historical authorities have found reason to conclude that the Medes and Persians were in truth but one nation, only that at an earlier period the Medes, at a later period the Persians, gained the upper hand and bore sway. This ascendancy, in the case of the Persians, as generally in the ancient Asiatic governments, was owing to the corrupting and enervating influence of supreme and despotic power on the one side, and on the other to the retention on the part of mountaineers, or of tribes seated remotely from the center of the empire, of primitive simplicity,—in laborious lives, hard fare, and constant exposure, which create patient endurance, athletic strength, manly courage, independence: qualities which in their turn refuse or throw off a yoke, and convert a subject into a conquering and ruling nation. At what precise time this great change was brought about in regard to the Medes and Persians, we are not in a condition to determine historically.

(1) Domination of Persian Dynasty. With Cyrus the elder, however, begins (B. C. 558) the domination of the Persian dynasty which held rule over Media as well as Persia. Whether Cyrus came to the throne by inheritance, as the son-in-law of Cambyses II, according to Xenophon, or whether he won the throne by vanquishing Astyages, the last Median king, agreeably to the statements of Herodotus, is one of those many points connected with early eastern history which, for want of documents, and in the midst of historical discrepancies, must remain probably forever uncertain.

(2) Return of Captives. The most interesting event to the theologian in the history of Cyrus, is the permission which he gave (B. C. 536) to the captive Jews to return to their native land. After a prosperous reign of the unusual length in Asiatic monarchies of thirty years, Cyrus was gathered to his fathers (B. C. 529). He was succeeded by Cambyses (B. C. 529), who, according to Herodotus, reigned seven years and five months. Then came (B. C. 522) Smerdis, nominally brother of Cambyses, but in reality a Magian; and as the Magi were of Median blood, this circumstance shows that, though the Medes had lost the sovereignty, they were not without great power.

(3) Darius. Smerdis being assassinated, Darius Hystaspis was elected king. He favored the Jews, and permitted them to resume and complete the building of their temple, which had been broken off by reason of jealousy on the part of the heterogeneous populations of Samaria (Ezra iv: 2; 2 Kings xvii:24), and the influence which they exerted at the Persian court (Ezra iv:11). (See the article DARIUS.) The last monarch had for successor Xerxes, who is probably the Ahasuerus of Esther and Mordecai. (See AHASUERUS.) After a reign of twenty years, Xerxes was murdered by Artabanus, who, however, enjoyed his booty only for the short period of seven months. The next in order was Artaxerxes (I) Longimanus, who enjoyed his power for the surprisingly long period of forty years, and then quietly handed the scepter over to his son Xerxes II (B. C. 424), who reigned but two months. (See ARTAXERXES.) He was followed by his stepbrother Sogdianus (B. C. 424), whose rule came to an end in seven months; thus making way for Darius Nothus, whose reign lasted nineteen years. Artaxerxes (II) Mnemon next took the throne, and is reported to have reigned forty or forty-three years (Diod. Sicul. xiii, 108; xv, 93). His successor was Artaxerxes Ochus (B. C. 364), who occupied the throne for twenty-six years. Then came Arses (B. C. 338), reigning three years. At last Darius Codomannus (B. C. 335) ascended the throne.

(4) Decline. But the valor, hardihood, and discipline which had gained the dominion, and which, as the length of several reigns in the succession shows, had sustained it with a firm and effectual hand, were almost at an end, having been succeeded by the effeminacy, the luxuriousness, and the vices which had caused the dissolution of earlier Asiatic dynasties, and among them that of the Medes, which the Persians had set aside. When this relaxation of morals has once taken place, a dynasty or a nation only waits for a conqueror. In this case one soon appeared in the person of Alexander, misnamed the Great, who assailing Darius on several occasions, finally overcame him at Arbela, and so put a period to the Persian monarchy after it had existed for 219 years. On this the country shared the fate that befell the other parts of the world which the Macedonian madman had overrun; but, more fortunate than that of other eastern nations, the name of Persia and of Persians has been preserved even to the present day, as the representative of a people and a government.

(5) Recapitulation. The events which transpired during this succession of Persian kings, so far as they are connected with the Biblical history, may be thus briefly narrated: Cyrus, having conquered Babylon, permitted the Jews to quit their captivity and return into Palestine, affording them aid for the reconstruction of their national house of worship. Under Cambyses, who invaded Egypt and became master of the land, adversaries of the Jews tried to render them objects of suspicion at the court; which intrigues, however, had full effect only in the reign of his successor, Smerdis, who issued a decree expressly commanding the building of the temple to cease (Ezra iv:21); in which prohibition Smerdis, as he was of the Magian tribe, and therefore of the priestly caste, may have been influenced by religious considerations. A milder and more liberal policy ensued. Darius, having by search in the national records ascertained what Cyrus had done towards the Jews, took off the prohibition, and promoted the rebuilding of the temple. Darius Hystaspis was distinguished for great enterprises, as well as liberal ideas. He carried the renown of the Persian arms to India, Libya, and Europe, and began the Persian attempt to subjugate Greece. What Xerxes undertook, and what success he had in his warlike undertakings against Greece, is known to all. His conduct towards the Jews, as well as his own despotism and luxuriousness, are exhibited in the book of Esther with great force as well as truth. Artaxerxes Longimanus led an army into Egypt, which had rebelled against its Persian masters. He was compelled to make peace with the Greeks. Palestine must have suffered much by the passage of troops through its borders on their way from Persia to Egypt; the new colony at Jerusalem began to sink, when the monarch permitted Nehemiah to proceed with full powers to the Jewish capital, in order to strengthen the hands of his brethren. Darius Nothus had to fight on all sides of his kingdom, and made Phœnicia the scene of a war against the combined forces of Egypt and Arabia. Even Artaxerxes Mnemon, though long busied with his arms in other parts, did not lose sight of Egypt, which had thrown off his yoke, and sent new Persian armies into the vicinity of Palestine. In consequence, the Jews had much to endure from the insolence of a Persian general, namely, Bagoses, who polluted the temple, and 'punished the Jews seven years' (Joseph. Antiq. xi, 7, 1). Ochus followed the plan of his father, subdued the revolted Phœnicians, and again fell upon Egypt. The remaining period of the Persian dominion over the Jews passed away peaceably (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi; Jahn, Archæol. ii, 1, 231-312).

The Biblical books, Daniel, Esther, Nehemiah, and Ezra, combine to present a true as well as high idea of the Persian court and government.

(6) The Empire. The extent of the government was from India to Ethiopia, including one hundred and twenty-seven provinces. The empire was under the control of vassal princes and nobles, 'the power of Persia and Media,' under whom were governors of various ranks, and officers for every species of duty. It was specially the duty of seven ministers of state ('chamberlains') to serve in the immediate presence of the monarch. Other officers, however high in rank, were admitted to the royal person only through the barriers of a strictly-observed ceremonial. Even the prime minister himself, and the favored concubine who was honored with the title of queen, durst come no nearer than the outer court, unless, on making their appearance, the king extended towards them his scepter of gold. The gorgeousness of the court dazzles the mind, and surpasses imagination. Though the monarch was despotic, he was not strictly arbitrary. Aided by a council, controlled by a priesthood, guided by the past as well as influenced by the present, the inary picture of a perfect prince, according to Oriental conceptions, drawn in the person of Cyrus the elder. (Hutchinson, Two Years in Persia; Markham, Hist. of Pers.; Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, vol. iii.) J. R. B.

PERSIAN LITERATURE, ANCIENT. The literature of Persia rightly claims a place of recognition among the literatures of the world, not alone for the long period which its history covers, but also for the real merit of its literary productions. Younger, indeed, in point of antiquity, and less in compass than the great body of its cousin literature, the Sanskrit of India, and not so ancient as the Egyptian or the Old Babylonian, nor again so early as portions of the Hebrew, its claims, nevertheless, to consideration are hardly inferior to any one of the four. In point of form and in classic finish, it is true that the ancient and mediæval productions of Persia fall far below the Greek; but this is true of other Oriental literatures as well. The later and more modern development of Persian literature, whether it be in the realm of the epic, the lyric, or in narrative poetry, deserves a high rank even when judged by present standards. So much by way of general estimate. A few words may now be added with reference to the history in outline of Iranian literary epochs.

In its broadest sense the title, Literature of Persia, is conveniently used to comprise all the literary monuments of Iran conceived of as a great nationality. The long line of descent covers a period of nearly two thousand five hundred years. From the fact that "the book of records of the chronicles" was brought to Ahasuerus and read before the king (Esther vi:1), we may infer the existence of annals, chronicles, legendary and historical accounts, which were written and kept, long before the days of King Xerxes; nor has the stream since ceased flowing, that could produce, within the last thousand years, poets such as Firdausi, Omar Khayyam, Sa'di and Hafiz. And the sweet-voiced nightingale still flutes in the modern Persian minstrel's throat. A glance, next, at the national development of Iran may render clearer the life of Persia's literary history.

1. Historical and Literary Periods. The historical beginnings of Iran are lost in the darkness of receding antiquity, but we know from history that two Iranian empires, the kingdom of Media and the dominion of Bactria, existed before Persia proper rose above the horizon under the first great Achaemenian monarchs. It was the conquering sword of Cyrus and the organizing hand of Darius that founded the Achaemenian or third empire (B. C. 559-338). The throne of the Achaemenidæ crumbled before the world conqueror, Alexander the Great (B. C. 336-323), and then the fourth rule, the Seleucid government, became established for about seventy years. Fifth came the Parthian dynasty. This power for five centuries ruled the fate of Iran (B. C. 250-A. D. 226); but it gave way and fell before the triumphant ascendancy of the Iranian house of the Sassanids (A. D. 226-651), whose dynasty lasted until the seventh century of our era, when the conquest of Persia by the Mohammedan Arabs altered the entire face of events. This latter event, as may be added, wrought a mighty change in the history of Persia as an Iranian nation. By way of summary it should be stated that each of these great eras has had its literary bearing as well as its national and religious significance.

king, much as he may have been given up to his personal pleasures, must yet have had a difficult office to fill, and heavy duties to discharge. Rulers are generally insecure in proportion to the degree of their despotism; and so we find, from the plot against the life of Ahasuerus (Xerxes, B. C. 485-465), which Mordecai discovered and made known, that even the recesses of a palace did not protect the kings of Persia from the attempts of the assassin. In the punishment, however, which fell upon the wicked Haman, we see the summary means which the Persian monarchs employed for avenging or defending themselves, as well as the unshared and unqualified power which they held over the life of their subjects even in the highest grades. Indeed it is not possible to read the book of Esther without fancying more than once that you are in the midst of the court of the Grand Seignior. Not least among the causes of this illusion is what is narrated in regard to the harem of Xerxes. The women, it seems, had a palace of their own, and dwelt there apart from the king, who paid them visits of ceremony.

Persian Warriors.

The greatness of the power of the chief viziers of the Persian monarchy is illustrated in the recorded acts of Haman and Mordecai. The mode of delegating power was by presenting to the entrusted person the royal signet, which appears to have licensed him to do what he would, by such means as he pleased.

Xenophon presents us with the fullest materials, namely, in his Anabasis, his Hellenica, and especially in his Cyropædia, which is an imag-

Roughly corresponding to the influences of the great epochs mentioned, we can distinguish three more or less marked eras in the development of Persian literature: (1) Old Iranian Literature, extending from at least the 6th century B. C. to the first centuries A. D., and including (a) the Yezdikbast.

Avesta or Bible of Zoroaster, and (b) the Ancient Persian Inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings. (2) Middle Persian Literature or Pahlavi literary remains, running from the third century A. D. to the 9th or 10th centuries A. D. (3) New Persian Literature, beginning with Firdausi's Shah Namah, or extending from about the 10th century to the present. Chief in interest and importance are the first and the last of these great literary eras. The strictly sacerdotal character of the mediæval Iranian or Pahlavi literature tends to circumscribe its artistic and esthetic value. The first division only is treated here, as that alone is pertinent to Bible study.

2. Old Iranian Literature. From the earliest times of Iranian independence there must have been some sort of a national literature, whether in annals or chronicles, lays or ballads, legends or mythical stories, traces of which survive perhaps in the New Persian Shah Namah, or Book of Kings, and in epic passages of the Avesta. But so far as our direct knowledge is concerned, Old Iranian Literature is represented by two ancient monuments, one the Zoroastrian Scriptures, the other, the royal Achaemenian inscriptions. The first of these is the Avesta; the second is the monument of the Ancient Persian Inscriptions of the Achaemenian dynasty.

(1) The Avesta. The date of the great rock-records is fixed as contemporaneous with the monarchs who had them carved (B. C. 521-338), but the date of the Avesta is hard to determine. Like our own Holy Scriptures, this book of early Iran represents a growth and development, and it gives evidence of the presence of different stages and strata. Standing in some degree as a remnant of the power of ancient Media and more especially of the Bactrian empire, certain parts of it must be old. The Gathas, or "Psalms" (1) of Zoroaster, for example, can hardly be later in origin than the sixth century B. C.; on the other hand some portions of the Avesta, like late passages in Vendidad or bits of formulas in the Yasna, may be as late as our own era. If we knew the exact date of Zoroaster we could speak with more surety regarding the seventeen Gathas or Psalms, for in general tone, language and composition they represent his epoch, which may perhaps with best ground be placed between the seventh and sixth century before the Christian era; although some extravagant statements in the classics claim B. C. 6000 as the time of his appearance.

The meaning of the name Avesta is not absolutely certain; possibly it is "Law," "Knowledge," or more likely "Text" (as Scriptures). The title Zend-Avesta is not accurate; zend or zand signifies "commentary, explanation" and refers to the Pahlavi version or comment on the text. If used at all the phrase should rather be Avesta-Zand, i. e., Scriptures and commentary.

Extent of the Zend-Avestan Literature. The Avesta itself is but a fragment of a once great literature, encyclopedic in its character, which tradition has connected with the prophet Zoroaster's name. Pliny speaks of 2,000,000 verses as composed by Zoroaster; Persian tradition claims that the original Zoroastrian works comprised twenty-one Nasks or books. Although by no means all these were composed by the prophet, they were at least regarded as canonical. It is further asserted, on Persian authority, that most of them were destroyed by Alexander the Great, when in his drunken frenzy he allowed the palace at Persepolis to be burned. A great part of the Scriptures without question survived, but the dark period of five centuries between the fall of the Achaemenian power and the rise of the Persian house of Sasan (3d century A. D.) was not conducive to preserving ancient texts in their entirety. It was under the Sasanian monarchs, in the third century A. D., that a renaissance of Zoroastrianism occurred; all that could be gathered of the Holy Scriptures was then collected, edited and codified into a sacred canon. In the sixth century, however, with the fall of the Zoroastrian Creed before the faith of Islam, the literature was again scattered, which accounts for its present fragmentary condition. The remnant that has survived such troublous times, has been preserved chiefly through the loyal efforts of faithful Parsis who left Persia on account of the fanatical Mohammedan persecution and sought refuge and safety in India, settling especially in the neighborhood of Bombay. The Indian Zoroastrians to-day number nearly 90,000 believers, whereas their Iranian cousins have dwindled down to less than 10,000 souls. The story of how the Avesta was introduced into Europe toward the close of the last century, by Anquetil du Perron, who went to the Orient for the purpose of gaining a knowledge of the sacred books of Zoroaster, is a narrative that reads like a romance; but there is not room to give it here.

According to the estimate of West, the original great Avesta of twenty-one Nasks must have contained about 345,700 words. Our present Avesta contains about 83,000 words (Geldner); that is to say, about one-fourth of the original work, and in extent it equals perhaps one-tenth of our Bible (810,697 words). Like our own Sacred Scriptures the Avesta is divided into several divisions or books. (a) The Yasna, (Skt. yajña) lit. "sacrifice," the chief liturgical work of the canon, is a collection of texts relating for the most part to the ritual of the haoma or sacred juice partaken of in the celebration of the solemn Izashne ceremony. In the midst of the Yasna are inserted the Gathas lit. "hymns, psalms." These Psalms of Zoroaster are his metrical sayings, sermons or teachings, and they are the oldest, the most sacred, and the most interesting part of the Avesta, although they cover less than a hundred pages of text. (b) The Visperad (Av. vispe ratavo "all the lords") is a collection of minor litanies, invocations and offerings to various deified objects, divinities, or spiritual heads of the faith. (c) The Vendidad (Av. data vidæva, "law against the Demons") is a sort of Iranian Pentateuch and priestly code; it forms with the Yasna and the Visperad, a kind of ancient Persian missal or prayer-book. (d) The Yashts (Av. yeshiti "worship by praise") is a book of hymnic compositions in adoration of the pre-Zoroastrian divinities and mythical heroes. (e) Minor texts, like the Nyaishes, Gahs Sirozahs, Afringans are often put together as a Khordah Avesta, "little Avesta," a species of manual of daily devotion. (f) Fragments of greater or less extent have been preserved, like a portion of the Hadokht Nask, the Nirangistan, Aogemadacca, some glosses and an old Zand-Pahlavi Glossary.

The language of the Avesta belongs to the Indo-Germanic family, and is a cousin to the Sanskrit, but it is not so difficult to master as the Sanskrit. In style, much of the text of the Avesta is easy and simple and without rhetorical coloring; but the Gathas are extremely difficult in form and in substance. The key-note of their thought is found in the preaching of another and better life, in the struggle that goes on in the world between Ormazd and Ahriman, in the eternal reward of the righteous and the damnation of the wicked. The meters in which they are written resemble the Vedic meters. Many other parts of the Avesta are composed in rhythm somewhat akin to the Kalevala verse of Hiawatha; but much of the Avesta is in plain prose. The rhythmical parts as a rule are older, and they have poetic merit; the prose portions are generally later (excepting the Yasna Haptang-haiti, Ys. 35-42), and often consist of stupid repetitions. This distinction must clearly be kept in mind: unfortunately it has been frequently overlooked.

(2) Ancient Persian Inscriptions. The ancient Persian inscriptions, which form the second monumental record of ancient Iran, comprise about a thousand lines of cuneiform texts inscribed on the face of mountain rocks, on stone tablets, or other hard surfaces; and they record for the most part the deeds of the great Achaemenian kings, Darius and his followers, since the old-time sovereignty of Media, and also of Bactria, has now passed to Persis proper. The most important inscription is the one which Darius (Darayavaush) caused to be chiseled upon the granite face of the Behistan Mount in Persia. This mountain elevation rises sheer from the plain to the height of nearly seventeen hundred feet. A portion of its rocky side the king caused to be smoothed off to receive a royal document of eternal character, narrating how, by divine right and by his own prowess, he had become king. It tells of the battles he had fought and the victories he had won, the rebellions he had crushed and the triumphs he had achieved in organizing his far-reaching empire. This inscription is written in three languages: the first, the one that is of direct interest in the present connection, is ancient Persian; the second inscription is sculptured in a tongue now generally termed Neo-Susian; the third is engraved in Neo-Babylonian. The style of the inscription is marked by a calm dignity and simplicity suited to such a record, and it is still effective when read to-day, even though the inevitable baldness of an official style, and the necessity of repetition that characterizes an Oriental document allow no scope for real literary merit. "I am Darius, the great King, the King of Kings, the King of Nations, the son of Vishtaspa, the grandson of Arshama, the Achaemenian"—such are the opening lines of the record. The oft-recurring introductory phrase, "Thus saith Darius, the King" (thatiy Darayavaush khshayathiya), is not without a certain majesty. The confiding trust in Auramazda (Ormazd), who gave to Darius the kingdom, the assurances that in all this edict the great king is speaking the truth and nothing but the truth, the blessings he invokes upon those who read and publish abroad the contents of the inscription, and the curses which he calls down upon those who conceal or destroy it, are in a spirit that lends the subject interest for modern readers quite apart from the acknowledged historic importance of the monument. With his love of truth, and perhaps also with a purpose, Darius does not hesitate to describe, even in detail, the cruel punishments he has inflicted upon traitors, rebels, and offenders.

It cannot be said, in giving an estimate of the edicts of his successors, Xerxes and Artaxerxes I, II, III, that they are fired by the same power and vigorous spirit as those of Darius. Their inscriptions are much shorter, and are more mechanical and formulaic; they are modeled in part upon those preceding them. It is not without interest to the philologist, however, to watch the phonetic decay in language that is evidenced in their style. The glory of the inscriptions belongs to Darius alone.

The story of the deciphering of these rock-records in wedged-shaped characters which begins with the first successful attempts of Grotefend, in 1802, and continues with his gifted successors, is one of the most instructive chapters in the lessons taught by the science of philology. Darius, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Cyrus (whether Cyrus the Great or Cyrus the Younger is not quite established) have to-day been made to speak through the untiring zeal and skill of modern scholarship, which has opened to our ears these sermons in stone from the ages past.

PERSIAN RELIGION, ANCIENT.

(1) Zoroaster. The religion of ancient Persia, in the broadest sense of the word, is the religion that was founded by Zoroaster, and it is therefore best called Zoroastrianism. The faith has been designated under various other names, as Mazdaism, Magism, Fire-worship, Dualism or Parsism, according to certain of its prominent features. Its sacred book is the Avesta, the oldest portions of which, the Gathas, are attributed to Zoroaster himself. It is supplemented by the Pahlavi Texts and by Parsi tradition.

It is now no longer doubted by scholars that Zoroaster was a real historical personage. The sources of information concerning his life are either Iranian or non-Iranian. Foremost among the Iranian is the Avesta, especially its oldest metrical portions, the Gathas. Of great importance also is the information given by the Pahlavi writings and by Parsi tradition (see Progress, vol. ii, No. 1, p. 44). Various ancient classical writers also allude to the prophet; mention may be made especially of Theopompus, Aristotle, Pliny, and Plutarch, while lastly, occasional references are found in Arabic, Syriac and Armenian writers.

The name Zoroaster was taken from the Greek form Ζωροάστρης, Zoh-oh-as'trace; in the Avesta the form is always Zarathushtra; the Pahlavi texts write Zartusht; the modern Persian, Zardusht. The meaning of the name Zarath-ushtra is very doubtful and many etymologies have been suggested. The second part of the name—ushtra—certainly means "camel." The first part has been translated in various ways as "lively, teasing, old, golden," etc.

The era when the prophet flourished has been a subject of much dispute. Persian tradition is probably nearly right when it claims as his era the latter half of the seventh and the beginning of the sixth century B. C. (or more exactly B. C. 660-583). The Greek and Latin classical writers claim for him an extravagant antiquity, anywhere from B. C. 6000 to 1000. For a full discussion of this question we refer to the article by Jackson in J. A. O. S., vol. XVII, and to West's Introduction to "Marvels of Zoroastrianism," Sacred books of the East, vol. XLVII.

The question of the birthplace of Zoroaster is also open to debate; but Western Iran, probably Atropatene, is commonly believed to be the region in which he arose. Thence he seems to have gone to the Median Ragha, where, however, he did not meet with the wished-for success, and from Ragha he turned eastward to Bactria. There he found a generous patron in King Vishtaspa, whose strong arm helped to establish the new religion. From Bactria the religion, now on a firm footing, presumably came back to Media, whence it was carried into Persia and became in all probability the religion of the great Achaemenian kings. (See J. A. O. S., vol. XV.)

The facts that we have of Zoroaster's life often rest on doubtful or legendary authority. The outline, however, is clear. At the age of thirty he is said to have begun his ministry, and at the age of forty-two he converted King Vishtaspa, the Constantine of the Iranian faith. According to a tradition he was slain at the age of seventy-seven. There seem to be grounds for believing with Firdausi that this happened when Balkh was stormed by the fierce Turanians. The Pahlavi texts always mention one Bratar-i Vakhsh as the slayer of the prophet.

The religion which Zoroaster founded was carried to triumphant ascendancy by the victorious arms of the great Persian kings, and became one of the chief religious systems of the ancient Orient. But it also shared the reverses of its adherents, when Alexander, the youthful hero of Macedon, overthrew the power and glory of the great Persian monarchy. Under the Seleucid government, and still more during the five centuries of Parthian rule, it fell into neglect. With the overthrow of the Parthian dynasty and the accession of the Sassanian empire (A. D. 226) came the Zoroastrian renaissance. The old texts were again collected, codified, translated into Pahlavi, and explained. The religion now flourished even more than during the Achaemenian period and continued to do so until it succumbed to the fanatic assaults of all-conquering Islam.

Fire-Altars in Persia.

The battle of Nehavend (A. D. 641) sealed the fate of Persia and of its religion. Most of its followers accepted the faith of the victor; of those who refused to forsake their ancient belief, some remained scattered throughout their native country, oppressed and despised by the proud conqueror, but most of them sought refuge in India, where they established flourishing communities, and where their descendants, the Parsees, are found even at the present day. The most numerous of these communities is at Bombay, containing upwards of ninety thousand souls. About ten thousand are scattered throughout Persia, so that the entire number of modern Zoroastrians is not more than one hundred thousand.

During its golden age under the Sassanian Empire, Zoroastrianism was not free from sects, or from heretical movements. The heresy of Mazdak shook for a moment the union of church and state; the powerful movement of Manichæism is familiar to every student of philosophy.

When we now come to examine the teachings of the Avesta, we are struck by their exalted character. If we except our own Bible, it would not be easy to find other sacred writings containing a more clear idea of right and wrong, a more strenuous insistence on purity of body and soul, a nobler conception of a resurrection and a life hereafter, and a firmer faith in the coming of a Savior. For these reasons the Zoroastrian writings merit the attention, not only of the biblical or philological student, but also of everyone interested in the history of ethics and of religion.

In the development of the old Iranian faith, three stages are discernible. First, there was the pre-Zoroastrian stage, when nature and ancestor worship prevailed. The worship of the sun-god Mithra, the moon-god Mah, the star-god Tishtrya, of the sacred Haoma-plant, and probably also the worship of the Fravashis, or souls of the departed, goes back to this stage. Then came the second or Zoroastrian stage, when these elements were thrown into the background, and the faith became more spiritual, especially through the ideal conception of Dualism. The third or post-Zoroastrian stage exhibited a tendency to restore some of those primitive elements to their old position without degrading the new ones brought in by the great reformer. The Avesta shows these stages clearly, the faith in its purity being best represented by the Gathas, of which Zoroaster himself was the author.

(2) Dualism—Angels and Demons. From the beginning of time two principles, good and evil, have existed. Ormazd represents the good, Ahriman the evil. Unceasing warfare goes on between these two principles. Ormazd makes, Ahriman mars; the one dwells in endless light, the other in eternal darkness. But although the teaching of Zoroaster is dualistic in this respect, it is monotheistic in so far as it postulates the ultimate triumph of the good and the disappearance of evil from the regenerated world. It also foretells the advent of the Kshathra Vairya, the "Wished-for Kingdom," and exhorts man, a free agent, to contribute to its coming by deliberately choosing the good in preference to the evil.

At the head of all the celestial host stands Ahura Mazda. The form of the name here given is that of the Avesta. In modern Persian it appears as Ormazd, in the ancient Persian inscriptions as Auramazda, in Pahlavi as Auharmazd. Ahura probably means "lord," and Mazda, Skt. Medhas (compare Greek root $\mu\alpha\theta$), according to Pahlavi tradition, means "great wisdom."

Herodotus tells us that the Persians had no images of the deity, and this is in keeping with the spiritual character of the religion. The solitary picture Auramazda which is found on the rock-inscriptions of Behistan is really not Iranian, but is borrowed from Babylonian art. In the "Ardā-ī Virāf," the "Divina Commedia" of Iran, Ormazd is described as appearing in the majesty of flame, but no definite concrete description of him is ever attempted.

Image of Auramazda.

Ahura Mazda is invested with lofty titles and attributes. Wisdom and power are implied in his name; he is described also as promoting growth and progress, as beneficent and holy, as radiant, glorious and righteous, most great, most good and most fair. He is the keeper or guardian, watchful, infallible, all knowing. His most prominent title in the Avesta is datar, "creator." All the good in the world has been created by him; it is he also who created the light, the earth and the plants. Ormazd's creation is preëminently an intelligent one, and his creative wisdom is personified as Khratu, "Wisdom." Nor is it in the Avesta alone that the creator idea is emphasized. In the ancient Persian inscriptions the kings thankfully acknowledge Auramazda as their Creator and Preserver. All through the Pahlavi writings we meet with the epithet datar, and passages from the Greek authors may be adduced in confirmation of the creator-idea.

In many respects Ahura Mazda offers striking parallels to the God of Judaism and Christianity. In one point, however, there is a great difference: Jehovah is omnipotent, but Ormazd is opposed and limited in his activity by Ahriman.

An elaborately developed system of angelology is one of the most striking features of the faith.

The immediate ministers of Ahura Mazda are the Amesha Spentas, "Immortal Holy Ones" (the Persian Amshashpands), corresponding most nearly to our archangels. Of these there are six, and their names are personifications of abstract virtues. They are: (1) Vohu Manah, "Good Mind," Ahura Mazda's good spirit personified, and the mediator between him and man; (2) Asha Vahishta, "Best Righteousness," a personification of order in the world; (3) Kshathra Vairya, "the Wished-for Kingdom," represents the "Good Kingdom;" (4) Spenta Armaiti, "Holy Harmony," represents peace and concord among men; (5) Haurvatat, "Wholeness," and (6) Ameretat, "Immortality," are invariably mentioned together.

In addition to these we must also mention Sraosha, "Obedience," although he is not reckoned among the Amesha Spentas proper. He is the special foe of the daevas and drujes, a sort of Iranian St. Michael.

Besides the Amesha Spentas the Avesta mentions some minor divinities, ordinary angels, such as the Yazatas, "Worshipful Ones." The most important of these are Mithra, the Angel of Light, and Rashnu, the Angel of Justice. These two, together with Sraosha, judge the soul immediately after death. The other deities are merely abstractions, such as Arshat, "Truthfulness;" Parenti, "Riches;" Ashi, "Rectitude;" Vcrethraghna, "Victory;" Hvar, "Sun;" Mah, "Moon;" Tishtrya, "Star;" and Atar, "Fire."

At the head of the demons stands Angra Mainyu or Ahriman. He is a distinctively Zoroastrian conception, but his name does not occur in the old Persian inscriptions. The etymology of the name is somewhat obscure, mainyu means "spirit;" angra probably means "hostile." He is the inveterate opponent of Ahura Mazda and of his creation. His most frequent epithets are such as pourumahrka, "full of death," and dushdao, "evil-knowing, malign." He is the seed of darkness, and he dwells in infinite night. In contrast to the omniscience of Ormazd we have the ignorance of Ahriman. He knows what was and what is, but he does not know what will be. He is coeval with Ormazd, but not coeternal; with the advent of the "Good Kingdom," he will be banished from the world.

To carry out consistently the dualistic idea each Amashspand has for an opponent some Arch-Fiend. So we find also seven of these fiends: (1) Aka Manah, "Evil Mind," is the antagonist of Vohu Manah; (2) Andra, probably not identical with the Vedic Indra, has no special attributes; (3) Saurva, rather indistinct, is explained as the demon of misrule and of headache; (4) Taromaiti, "Presumption," is opposed to Aramaiti; (5 and 6) Tauru and Zairica are opposed to Haurvatat and Ameretat. They are the demons respectively of fever and thirst, and of drought. Lastly, there is Aeshma, "Wrath," the biblical Asmodeus, who is the special foe of Sraosha.

Below these Arch-Fiends stand the Daevas, of whom we mention Buiti, the tempter; Kunda, drunkenness; Astovidhotu, bone-divider—death; Drivi, poverty; Zemaka, winter; and Apaosha, drought.

Next to the daevas stand the drujes, for the most part subordinate female demons, such as Nasu, demon of corpses; Jahi, demon of lust; the long-handed yellow Bushyryasta, who puts men to sleep; Agha Doithra, evil eye, and others.

In addition to the daevas and drujes there are also pairikas, fairies; jainis (jinns?); and yatus, sorcerers; and lastly, three evil monsters, Azhi

Dahaka, a dragon; Sruvara, a dragon; and Gandarewa, an evil being of indefinite description.

(3) Ethics and Eschatology. Unlike Buddhism, of which the highest ideal is quietism, Zoroastrianism is a religion of struggle and exertion. Its leading article of faith is the doctrine of free will and moral responsibility. Man is free to choose either the good or the evil, but he should choose the former. Every good action increases the power of Good, every evil action the power of Evil. At the final judgment, man must give an account of himself, and eternal happiness is the reward of the righteous, while eternal punishment awaits the wicked. Purity of body and soul is enjoined on all, as are also uprightness, charity, generosity and, with particular emphasis, truthfulness. The moral teachings of the prophet may be summed up in the oft-recurring triad, "humata, hukhta, hvarshta," "good thoughts, good words, good deeds." Some physical duties are also imposed. Thus the youth are exhorted to take outdoor exercise; chastity and sobriety are insisted upon, although the existence of polygamy and concubinage, in antiquity, cannot be denied. Asceticism, as it was practiced by the Brahmins of India, has no place in the Persian religion, which does not oppose a wholesome indulgence in the joys of life. Patriotism was cultivated, and respect for civil and religious authority was inculcated. In general, the ethical code of Zoroastrianism does not differ very much from our own. (See article in International Journal of Ethics, October, 1896.)

Combat Between King and Evil Spirit, Persepolis.

Great stress was laid on prescriptions designed to preserve the purity of the elements, earth, water, fire. Dead matter was not allowed to come into contact with these; hence arose those peculiar funeral rites that characterize Parsism even at the present day. Special structures, the "towers of silence," were erected, on which the dead bodies were placed to be devoured by vultures.

Lastly, agriculture was strongly supported, the Avesta giving special praise to those that practiced the good deeds of husbandry.

But in order to arrive at a correct estimate of the ethical side of the faith, we must also mention some of its evil features. Of these the most repulsive to us is the hvaetvadatha or next-of-kin marriage, the occurrence of which among the ancient Iranians is undeniable. Unpleasant customs, originating in stupid superstitions, were likewise prevalent, while the ancient Persian inscriptions tell of horrible punishments inflicted on rebels and traitors.

It is in its doctrine of a resurrection, and in its views of a life hereafter, that Zoroastrianism appears in its best light. Only an outline of the remarkable doctrines bearing on this subject can here be presented.

Immediately after death the soul is brought for individual judgment before the angels, Mithra, Sraosha and Rashnu. Its good and evil deeds are weighed in the balance, and the turn of the impartial scales irrevocably decides its fate. Then this soul must cross the Chinvat Bridge, which becomes broad for the good spirit, but narrow for the evil one. Onward the good spirit passes through the regions of the stars (paradise of good thoughts), of the moon (paradise of good words), and of the sun (paradise of good deeds), and at last enters Garinmāna, "House of Song," the place of "Eternal Light." On the other hand, the wicked spirit descends through the grades of evil thoughts, evil words and evil deeds, down to a hell of darkness. A third place, Homistakan "Ever Stationary," an Iranian purgatory, is also recognized. Thither go the souls of those whose good and evil deeds counterbalance. They suffer no distress except the changes of heat and cold, and there they abide until the day of doom.

In the Avesta and the Pahlavi Texts the doctrine of a resurrection of the dead, a regeneration of the world, and of the coming of a savior is distinctly recognized. According to tradition the world is to last 12,000 years, and in the last 3,000 years of this aeon Aushetar and Aushetarmāh, born from the seed of Zoroaster, will appear as the forerunners of the great Saoshyant or savior, who is to preside at the general resurrection. This Savior will be conceived in a supernatural manner by a virgin bathing in Lake Kan-savaya. Coincident with his advent is the resurrection of the dead, when each soul assumes again its body and recognizes relatives and friends. All the dead are assembled and the righteous are separated from the unrighteous. Then follows the ordeal of molten metal, which cleanses and purifies all men and prepares them for the everlasting joys of heaven.

The last great conflict is at hand. The powers of evil gather into a mighty host and assail the good kingdom, and after a terrible battle the Good triumphs and Evil is banished from the world. The dragon Azhi perishes in the molten metal, hell is brought back by Ormazd to enlarge the world, which is now made immortal, and all men with one voice sing the praise of Ormazd, through whom the wicked are rescued from hell and the creation is restored to purity.

PERSIS (pēr-sis), (Gr. Περσις, per-sece'), a Christian woman at Rome, to whom St. Paul sends greetings (Rom. xvi:12), A. D. 55. Paul commends her for her diligence in a certain work.

PERSON (pēr's'n). A self-determining intelligence possessed of understanding and will, as contrasted with thing. One who can propose his own aims and be his own aim, and is responsible for his acts. God is therefore a person.

PERSONALITY (pēr's'n-āl'ī-tē).

(1) Regarding the personality of God we affirm that he is the one eternal, self-conscious Being, and not merely substance or principle.

(2) Some have objected to the term persons as applied to the Trinity, as unwarrantable. The term person, when applied to Deity, is certainly used in a sense somewhat different from that in which we apply it to one another; but when it is considered that the Greek words (ὑποστάσις, hypostasis, and ἰσώσωρον, prosohpon, to which it answers, are, in the New Testament, applied to the Father and Son (Heb. i:3; 2 Cor. iv:6), and that no single term, at least, can be found more suitable, it can hardly be condemned as unscriptural and improper. There have been warm debates between the Greek and Latin churches about the words hypostasis and persona; the Latin concluding that the word hypostasis signified substance or essence, thought that to assert that there were three divine hypostases was to say that there were three gods. On the other hand, the Greek church thought that the word person did not sufficiently guard against the Sabellian notion of the same individual Being sustaining three relations; whereupon each part of the church was ready to brand the other with heresy, till by a free and mutual conference in a synod at Alexandria (A. D. 362), they made it appear that it was but a mere contention about the grammatical sense of a word; and then it was allowed by men of temper on both sides, that either of the two words might be indifferently used. (See TRINITY; IMAGE OF GOD.)

PERUDA (pe-ru'dā), (Heb. פֶּרוּדָא, per-oo-daw', kernel), a servant of Solomon whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra ii:55; Neh. vii:57), B. C. before 536.

PESTILENCE (pēs'tī-lens), (Heb. דֵּבִיר, deh'ber, plague or pestilence).

The terms pestilence and plague are used with much laxity in our Authorized Version. The latter, however, which generally represents the Hebrew word is by far the wider term, as we read of 'plagues of leprosy,' 'of hail,' and of many other visitations. Pestilence is employed to denote a deadly epidemic, and is the word by which deh'ber, דֵּבִיר, (Sept. than'ah-tos, thavatos, death, and occasionally loy-mos, loumós), plague is translated. In our time, however, both these terms are nearly synonymous; but plague is, by medical writers at least, restricted to mean the glandular plague of the East. There is indeed no description of any pestilence in the Bible, which would enable us to form an adequate idea of its specific character. Severe epidemics are the common accompaniments of dense crowding in cities, and of famine; and we accordingly often find them mentioned in connection (Lev. xxvi:25; Jer. xiv:12; xxix:18; Matt. xxiv:7; Luke xxi:11). But there is no better argument for believing that 'pestilence' in these instances means the glandular plague, than the fact of its being at present a prevalent epidemic of the East. It is also remarkable that the Mosaic law, which contains such strict rules for the seclusion of lepers, should have allowed a disease to pass unnoticed, which is above all others the most deadly, and, at the same time, the most easily checked by sanitary regulations of the same kind. The destruction of Sennacherib's army (2 Kings xix:35) has also been ascribed to the plague. (Hecker's Hist. of the Epidemics of the Middle Ages; Dr. Brown, art. 'Plague,' in Cyclop. of Pract. Med.; Dr. Russell, Hist. of Aleppo.) W. A. N.

PESTLE (pēs'l), (Heb. מִטְּבֵל, el-ee', lifted) (Prov. xxvii:22), an instrument used for grinding in a mortar.

PETER (pē'ter), (Gr. Πέτρος, pet'ros, a rock), originally SIMEON or SIMON.

1. Name and Family. He was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was the son of a certain Jonas, or John; whence he is named on one occasion in the Gospel history Simon Barjona, that is, son of Jona (Matt. xvi:17).

2. Personal History. Along with his brother Andrew, he followed the occupation of a fisherman on the sea of Galilee. It is probable that, before they became known to Christ, they were both disciples of John the Baptist. That Andrew was such we are expressly informed by the Evangelist John; and as his brother seems to have been much of the same mind with him on religious matters, it is extremely likely that he was so likewise. Their becoming known to Christ was owing to John's pointing him out on the day after his baptism to Andrew and another disciple (probably the evangelist John), as 'the Lamb of God;' on which they immediately followed Christ, and spent some time in receiving his instructions.

(1) Meets Jesus. Shortly after this, Andrew finding Simon, carried him to Christ, who, on receiving him as his disciple, bestowed upon him that surname by which he has since that time been most commonly designated: 'When Jesus beheld him he said, Thou art Simon the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a stone, pet'ros (πέτρος).

(2) The Call. After this interview the two brothers seem to have returned to their usual occupation for a season, as we have an account in Matthew (iv:18-20) of their being summoned from that occupation by Christ on a subsequent occasion, posterior to his temptation in the wilderness, and to the commencement of his public ministry as a religious teacher. From this time forward they were his devoted and admiring followers. In the course of the evangelical history several anecdotes of Peter are incidentally recorded, for the purpose, doubtless, principally of illustrating the character and teaching of our Lord, but which tend also to throw light upon the history and character of his attached disciple.

(3) Chief Incidents in the Gospels. Such are the accounts furnished by the Evangelists of his walking upon the agitated waters of the sea of Galilee to meet his master (Matt. xiv:22, sq.; Mark vi:45, sq.); of his bold and intelligent avowals of the undoubted Messiahship of Jesus, notwithstanding the difficulties which he, along with the rest of the disciples, felt in reconciling what they saw in him with what they had fondly expected the Christ to be (Matt. xvi:13-20); of his rash but affectionate rebuke of his Lord for speaking of suffering and death as in prospect for him, and as forming a necessary part of his mediatorial work (Matt. xvi:21-23); of his conduct in first rejecting, with an earnestness bordering on horror, the offer of Christ to wash his feet, and then, when the symbolical nature of that act had been explained to him, his over-ardent zeal that not his feet only, but also his hands and his head, might be washed (John xiii:9, sq.); his bold and somewhat vaunting avowal of attachment to his Master, and his determination never to forsake him, followed by his disgraceful denial of Jesus in the hour of trial (John xiii:36, 37; Mark xiv:29, etc.); of his deep and poignant contrition for this sin (Matt. xxvi:75); and of his Lord's ample forgiveness for his offense, after he had received from him a profession of attachment as strong and as frequently repeated as his former denial of him (John xxi:15-18). These are all indicative of his impulsive nature.

(4) Subsequent History. In the subsequent Scripture history he is presented to us as the courageous herald of the kingdom of Christ, by whose mouth the first public declaration of salvation through the crucified Jesus was made to the people; by whose advice and counsel the early churches were planted and governed; and by whom the prejudices of Judaism were first fairly surmounted, and the Gospel preached in all its universal freeness to the Gentile world.

The Acts of the Apostles contain recitals of many interesting incidents which befell him whilst engaged in those efforts. Of these, the chief are his imprisonment and trial before the Sanhedrim for preaching Christ, and his bold avowal of his determination to persist in that work (Acts iv:1-22); his miraculously inflicting the punishment of death on the infatuated couple who had dared to try an experiment upon the omniscience of the Holy Ghost (v:1-11); his visit to Samaria, and rebuke of Simon Magus, who deemed that the miracles of the apostle were the result of some deep magic spell of which he had not yet become possessed, and which, consequently, he was desirous of purchasing from Peter (viii:14-24); the vision by which he was taught that the ancient ritual distinctions between clean and unclean had been abolished, and thereby prepared to attend on the summons of Cornelius, to whom he preached the Gospel (x:1-48); his apprehension by Herod Agrippa, and his deliverance by the interposition of an angel, who opened for him the doors of his prison, and set him free (xii:3-19); and his address to the council at Jerusalem, on the occasion of a request for advice and direction being sent to the church there by the church in Antioch, in which he advocated the exemption of Gentile converts from the ceremonial institutes of the law of Moses (xv:6-11).

In all these incidents we trace the evidences of his mind having undergone an entire change, both as to its views of truth and impressions of duty, from what is displayed by the earlier events of his history.

On one occasion only do we detect something of his former weakness, and that, strangely enough in regard to a matter in which he had been the first of the apostles to perceive, and the first to recommend and follow, a correct course of procedure. The occasion referred to was his withdrawing, through dread of the censures of his Jewish brethren, from the Gentiles at Antioch, after having lived in free and friendly intercourse with them, and his timidly dissembling his convictions as to the religious equality of Jew and Gentile. For this Paul withstood him to the face, and rebuked him sharply, because of the injury which his conduct was calculated to produce to the cause of Christianity. With this single exception, however, his conduct seems to have been in full accordance with the name which his Master had prophetically bestowed on him when he called him Simon the Rock, and with the position which Paul himself assigns to him, at the very time that he recounts his temporary dereliction, as one of 'the Pillars of the Church' (Gal. ii:9, 14).

Thus far we are enabled, from the inspired documents, to trace the history of this apostle; but for what remains we must be indebted to evidence of a less explicit and certain character.

(5) Traditions. Ecclesiastical tradition asserts that he performed an extensive missionary tour throughout those districts in which the converts to whom his epistles are addressed abode. 'Peter,' says Origen, 'appears to have preached to the Jews in the dispersion, in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia' (In Genesis, tom. iii; Euseb. Hist. Eccles., iii, 1, 4). This tradition, however, though deriving some countenance from 1 Pet. v:13, is very uncertain. The fact that no allusion appears in his epistles to any personal acquaintance on the part of the apostle with those to whom they are addressed, militates strongly against its authenticity. Another tradition reports the apostle as having towards the close of his life visited Rome, become bishop of the church in that city, and suffered martyrdom in the persecution raised against the Christians by Nero. The importance of these points in connection with the claims urged by the Catholics on behalf of the supremacy of the pope has led to a careful and sifting examination of the accuracy of this tradition; the result of which seems to be that, while it is admitted as certain that Peter suffered martyrdom, in all probability by crucifixion (Tertullian, De Præscript., 38; Lactantius, De Mortibus Persecutorum, c. ii), and as probable that this took place at Rome, it has, nevertheless, been made pretty clear that he never was for any length of time resident in that city, and morally certain that he never was bishop of the church there. (See PETER IN ROME.) (Barrow, On the Pope's Supremacy, Works, vii, 207, sq., Lond. 1831; Cave's Life of St. Peter, sec. 11; Campbell, Eccles. Hist. lect. xii; Neander.)

3. Character. He seems to have been a man of undoubted piety, of ardent attachment to his Master, and of great zeal for what he deemed his Master's honor; but, at the same time, with a mind rather quick than accurate in its apprehensions, and with feelings rather hasty in their impulse than determined and continuous in their exercise. Hence his readiness in avowing his opinions, and his rashness in forming them; and hence also the tendency which beset his honest openness to degenerate into bravado, and his determinations of valor to evaporate into cowardice at appalling forms of danger. His fall, however, and his subsequent restoration, connected as these were with the mysterious events of his Master's crucifixion and resurrection, and with the new light which had by them been cast around his character and work, produced a powerful change for the better upon the apostle's mind. From this time forward he comes before us under a new aspect. A sober dignity and firmness of purpose have displaced his former hasty zeal; sagacity and prudence characterize his conduct; and whilst his love to his Master shows no symptom of abatement, it displays itself rather in active labor and much-enduring patience in his service, than in loud protestations or extravagant exhibitions of attachment.

PETER IN ROME.

(1) Roman Catholic Teaching. The teaching of the Roman Catholic church is as follows: "If any one should deny that it is by the institution of Christ, the Lord, or by Divine Right, that blessed Peter should have a perpetual line of successors in the primacy over the Universal Church, or that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of blessed Peter in the Primacy, let him be anathema!"

Portraits of Peter and Paul.

(From a gilded glass cup found in the Catacombs of Rome.)

Decree of Vatican Council, 1870: "He that acknowledgeth not himself to be under the Bishop of Rome, and that the Bishop of Rome is ordained of God to have Primacy over all the world, is a heretic and cannot be saved, nor is of the flock of Christ."

Canon Law Church of Rome.

Creed of Pope Pius IV, 1564: "I acknowledge the holy catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church, for the mother and mistress of all Churches and I promise true obedience to the Bishop of Rome—successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ."

Catechismus Romanus II, VII, XVII: "The Roman Bishop . . . occupying as he does the chair of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, who most assuredly himself occupied it till his death, is, in it, entitled to the highest honors, the most unbounded jurisdiction, as having been conferred on him, not by the decrees of any council or any other human authority, but by God himself."

Decree of Boniface VIII ed. Gregory XII, 1648: "There are one Body, one Head of the one and sole church, viz., Christ and Christ's vicar, Peter and the successors of Peter . . . Moreover we say, determine and pronounce, that every human creature is subject to the Roman Pontiff, as of absolute necessity to salvation."

"After the death of St. Peter, the Pope, the Bishop of Rome, has always been taken as the visible head of Christ's church, because St. Peter established his See at Rome and consecrated it with his blood."

Fam. Ex. Cath. Doctrine, p. iii, 1888.

Imprimatur; Cardinal Gibbons: "Whoever would seek salvation must adhere to this unity; to this authority of St. Peter and his successors." Barras, Gen. Hist. Cath. Church, i, 24. Imprimatur; Archbishops McCloskey, Spalding, and Purcell.

Cardinal Perroul in the year 1864 says: "None but an apostate Catholic could assert that Peter was not at Rome; for the reason of that fact is the coming of St. Peter to Rome, and the seat there established by him is connected with an article of our faith—that is, the Primacy of Order and Justification belonging of Divine Right to the Roman Pontiff. Hence it follows that he cannot be a Catholic who does not believe in the coming to, and the episcopate and death of St. Peter in Rome."

The whole fabric of the Roman Catholic Church and its foundations are therefore overthrown unless this statement concerning St. Peter at Rome can be established. The most thorough investigation of noted scholars has shown—that there is not even a remote tradition (after Peter's death) for the first century—to prove that he was ever in Rome. In fact there are no such assertions until after the beginning of the third century, in any document of authentic note.

(2) Roman Catholic Admissions. Charles Du Moulin, the great ecclesiastical lawyer (A. D. 1566), whom Father Calmet speaks of as a steadfast Roman Catholic, has unequivocally stated it as his opinion there never was even a vague tradition among the ancients about Peter's having been in Rome. Du Moulin also says: "Even when, after the breaking up of the empire, the Bishops of Rome began to extend their authority over other Churches, they never alleged or put forth this story of Peter's being at Rome; the story, I suppose, not having yet been invented." Mission and Martyrdom of St. Peter (Vol. iv. p. 460.)

Father Hardouin, a French Jesuit (A. D. 1729), likewise in very high repute in Rome, says: "We Roman Catholics hold that at least Peter's head was brought to Rome after his crucifixion, and that it ought to be worshiped there; but that the Pope is Christ's substitute and Peter's successor is clear enough without our being bound to suppose that Peter himself ever came to Rome."

De Cormenin, a Roman Catholic, Hist. Popes, pp. 17, 18, says "There is no proof that Peter's blood was shed in Rome."

Ellendorf, Roman Catholic professor at Berlin, Bib. Sac., Jan. 1859, 105, says: "Peter's abode at Rome can never be proved." Frances Turretin, Op., p. 144, and many other Roman Catholics deny the visit of Peter to Rome.

(3) The Verdict of Protestant Scholarship. George Stanley Faber, among England's ablest writers, refers to the learned Scaliger as saying: "As for the coming of Peter to Rome, his episcopate of twenty years, and his final martyrdom, no man with a grain of common sense will believe a single syllable." Facts and Assertions, etc., p. 58.

Spanheim and Salmasius also deny the fact. F. Turretin, Op. iii, 148 Am. ed.: "That Peter was at Rome is doubtful and uncertain; it is far more certain that he never saw Rome."

Ranke also in Ref. C. II. Chap. 3, p. 472, says: "Historical criticism has shown that it is a matter of doubt whether the Apostle was ever at Rome at all."

Lipsius, a great German critic, asserts: "The Roman Peter Legend proves itself to be from beginning to end a fiction, and thus our critical judgment is confirmed. The feet of Peter never trod the Streets of Rome."

Pres. Quar., Apr., 1876.

(4) Views of British Scholars. Taking the Reformation writers we have Cranmer and Coverdale, Bishop Hooper, Bradford and Willet, who argue strongly against Peter's ever having visited Rome.

The Orientalist, Lightfoot, denies it.

John Owen asserts his belief that Peter was never in Rome.

Bishop Bull says: "St. Clement, Bishop of Rome in the Apostolic age, speaking of the labors of St. Peter and St. Paul, briefly touches on the former, but dwells on praises of the latter, not so much as mentioning St. Peter's coming to Rome."

J. H. Browne in Peter the Apostle never at Rome, p. 45: says: * * * "the conclusion of Bishop Bull, as it seems to me, must be assented to, and the testimony accepted, which he considers must be drawn from the silence of Clement of Rome, that the Apostle Peter was never in that city."

Of modern scholars we have Adam Clarke, who asserts: "I am of the opinion that St. Peter did not write from Rome—that he was neither Bishop of Rome nor martyred at Rome—in a word, that he never was at Rome."

Dr. Kitto declares in his Cyclopædia: "There is no sufficient reason for believing that Peter was ever even so much as within the walls of Rome."

Dick in his Theology denies it. Hill, Divinity, page 70, calls it extremely doubtful. Robert Hall writes "That Peter was ever at Rome, we have no evidence but vague uncertain traditions."

Bishop Copleston in his Errors in Romanism says: "There is no historical evidence of the fact, and there is much probability against it."

Along these same lines in denial, the following authors are found:

Greenwood in Cathedra Petri; Edgar, Var. Popery, p. 68; Timpson Ch. Hist. p. 35; Powell on Succession, p. 119; Alex. Bishop, Two Babylons; McGavin's Protestant; Arrowsmith, Geog. Dict. Scrip.; J. A. Wylie, The Papacy, p. 233.

Littledale, in Plain Reasons, says: "That St. Peter was ever at Rome at all, there is no first hand or contemporaneous testimony to the opinion, whether in Scripture or elsewhere; whence it is clear that God has not considered it important enough to be certified for as being a matter of faith."

Davidson.—Intr. N. T. i, 142: says: "The connection of Peter with Rome, though it appears in early ecclesiastical literature, rests on an insecure basis. Distinguished critics reject it, not without reason."

Kennard affirms, Controv. with McLachlan, p. 49: "I boldly and advisedly assert there is no evidence to show that St. Peter was ever at Rome."

The chain of testimony fails for the want of connecting links between the first witnesses and the facts alleged. Nothing is accomplished by adding a thousand links to the other end of the chain."

Dr. Chas. Hodge, Intr. Com. Epist. Rom. says: "The tradition rests on very uncertain authority." Dr. John Owen describing the untrustworthiness of the Patristic writings says: "The truth is, the corruption and fiction of the epistolical writings in the first ages was so intolerable as that very little of that kind is preserved sincere and unquestionable. Hence Dionysius, the Bishop of Corinth, complained that in his own time his own epistles were so corrupted by additions and subtractions that it seems he would have them no more esteemed as his. He said: 'As the brethren desired me to write epistles, I wrote them, and these the Apostles of the devil have filled with tares, exchanging some things and adding others, for whom there is a woe reserved.'" PETER, THE EPISTLES OF.

Of the seven Catholic Epistles, there are two ascribed to St. Peter. The first of these is one of the ὁμολογούμενα, or those universally received in the early church. The second ranks among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, or controverted books. (See ANTI-LEGOMENA.)

1. Genuineness of First Epistle. (1) External Evidence. The external evidence in favor of the genuineness of this Epistle is complete. 'One Epistle of Peter,' says Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 3), 'called the first, is universally received;' and Origen had before this time observed that 'Peter . . . has left one Epistle acknowledged to be his.' It is cited by Irenæus (Adv. Har. iv, 9, 2): 'Peter says in his Epistle. In whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory' (i, 8, and again he cites 1 Pet. ii:16). Also, by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i, 3): 'Peter in the Epistle says,' etc. And by Tertullian (Scorp. c. 12): 'Peter says to the inhabitants of Pontus' (comp. 1 Pet. ii:20). Dr. Lardner observes (Hist. Apost. c. ix.) that 'it seems to be referred to by Clement of Rome in his first Epistle.' Eusebius notices his citation by Polycarp (comp. Polycarp, c. i with 1 Pet. i:8); and also by Papias (Hist. Eccles. iii:39). 'In fact,' says De Wette (Einleitung, sec. 173), 'if we except its omission in the ancient catalogue in Muratori, and its rejection by the Paulicians, it has never been called in question.' De Wette himself, who never omits an opportunity of raising a doubt, contents himself with observing that 'as its contents are really apostolic, any doubts arising from the absence of any known personal relationship between the author and those to whom the Epistle was addressed, or any peculiarity of doctrinal phraseology, find no favor or recognition.' He adds that the second Epistle, even though not genuine, bears testimony (iii:1) to the genuineness of the first.

(2) Internal Evidence. The internal evidence is equally complete. The author calls himself the Apostle Peter (ch. i:1), and the whole character of the Epistle shows that it proceeds from a writer who possessed great authority among those whom he addresses, who were most probably composed chiefly of Jewish Christians. The writer describes himself as 'an elder,' and 'a witness of Christ's sufferings' (v:1). The vehemence mence and energy of the style are altogether appropriate to the warmth and zeal of Peter's character, and every succeeding critic, who has entered into its spirit, has felt impressed with the truth of the observation of Erasmus, 'that this Epistle is full of apostolical dignity and authority, and worthy of the prince of the apostles.'

The only indication as to the place from whence this letter was addressed to the five provinces is contained in chapter v. verse 13: 'She in Babylon, elected with you (ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή), saluteth you.' For whether 'she in Babylon' refers to the church or to an individual (in which latter case Peter's wife is the person generally believed to be referred to), the letter must have been written in, or at least in the neighborhood of, Babylon. But where Babylon was, or whether it was the celebrated city of that name on the Euphrates, as has been maintained by Beza, Lightfoot, Basnage, De Wette, Neander, and a host of learned men, is a question which has never been, and probably never will be, decided.

It has been maintained, as an objection to the supposition that Babylon on the Euphrates was meant, that there were no Jews residing there at the date of this Epistle, inasmuch as they had all been expelled from that city in the latter part of the reign of Caligula, with the exception of such as were permitted to remain on account of connection, or other special reasons (Hug's Introduction); while those in Seleucia, or New Babylon, were soon after massacred, or fled to Ctesiphon, on the other side of the river. Hug, who still maintains that Babylon on the Euphrates is intended, conceives that the σεβόμενοι, or 'pious,' were the persons to whom the apostle's injunctions were addressed, and who were numerous in the East. There is certainly no authority from ecclesiastical history for supposing that Peter was ever at Babylon; but this silence proves nothing, for there are fourteen years of the apostle's life concerning which we have no information. But this mention of Babylon by St. Peter has led to the belief that he may have paid a visit to the Parthians (De Wette, l. c.), of which, however, there is no other indication among the ancients.

Babylon in Egypt, near Memphis, has been conjectured by Pearson, Le Clerc, and others, to have been the scene of Peter's labors; but neither for this is there any evidence, and it seems to have been a very insignificant place, for Strabo describes it only as a frontier garrison, occupied by one of the Roman legions quartered in Egypt.

Although the ancient Syrian writers conceived the Babylon mentioned by St. Peter to have been a city in the East, the Greek and Latin fathers held the name of Babylon here to have been, as in the Apocalypse, a metonymy for Rome. This was the prevailing opinion in the time of Eusebius, who observes (Hist. Eccles. ii, 15) that Peter 'is said to have composed his first Epistle at Rome, which he indicates in calling it figuratively Babylon.' This opinion is repeated by Jerome (De Vir. Illustr., ch. viii) Eucumenius (ii, p. 256), and Bede (Expos. 1 Pet. v:13). It has been, as is observed by Lardner and Michaelis, received by most members of the church of Rome, but certainly not, as Mr. Horne supposes (Introd. vol. ii, c. iv, sec. 3, after Macknight On the Epistles), by all the learned of that communion; for, among others, Erasmus (Comment.), Du Pin (Canon of Scripture), and Hug (Introd.), contend against Rome in favor of Babylon in Mesopotamia. That Rome was meant has been maintained also by Grotius, Whitby, Macknight, and Lardner. Perhaps the strongest objection to this hypothesis arises from the consideration that the use of a mystical name is unsuited to the character of an epistolary writing, although adapted to the symbolical and poetical style of the Apocalypse. It is, however, certain that arcana nomina were sometimes used by the early Christians. Louis Capell favors the idea of a mystical name, but he stands alone in considering Jerusalem to be the place indicated. It may be added that there is independent authority for believing that Peter was at Rome, but none that he was ever either in Assyria or Egypt.

2. Age of the Epistle. The Epistle must have been written before A. D. 67-68, the year of St. Peter's martyrdom. Lardner places the date in A. D. 63 or 64, chiefly from the fact that an earlier date than A. D. 63 cannot be assigned for his arrival at Rome. Hug and De Wette (Introductions), and Neander (Hist. of the Planting of the Christian Church), find an indication of the true date in the Neronian persecution, to which the Epistle manifestly refers. The Christians were now suffering persecutions as Christians, and according to the popular belief, of which Tacitus informs us Nero took advantage, they were punished as evildoers (malifici, Tacitus; κακοποιοί, 1 Peter ii:12.)

Hug fixes the date in the eleventh year of Nero's reign, or A. D. 65, a year after the conflagration of the city, and five before the destruction of Jerusalem. Lardner supposes that Peter's first Epistle could not have been written from Rome before the death of St. Paul (A. D. 66), as it is difficult to account for St. Paul's silence respecting him if Peter was at Rome at the date of any of his epistles from that city. Others, however, as Bishop Sherlock, consider that the first Epistle was written about A. D. 60. It is at the same time certain that Peter had read several of St. Paul's Epistles, as he adopts expressions, and sometimes whole phrases, from the Epistles to the Romans, Ephesians, Colossians, Galatians, Thessalonians, 1 Corinthians, and 1 Timothy (comp. especially 1 Pet. ii:13, with 1 Tim. ii:2-4; ii:18, with Eph. vi:5; 1 Pet. i:1, with Eph. i:4-7; i:3, with Eph. i:3; i:14, with Rom. xii:2; ii:1, with Col. iii:8, and Rom. xii:1; ii:6-10, with Rom. ix:32; ii:13, with Rom. xiii:1-4; ii:16, with Gal. v:13; ii:18, with Eph. vi:5; iii:1, with Eph. v:22; iii:9, with Rom. xii:17; iv:9, with Philipp. ii:14; iv:10, with Rom. xii:6, etc.; v:1, with Rom. viii:18; v:5, with Eph. v:21; v:8, with 1 Thess. v:6; v:14, with 1 Cor. xvi:20). There is, observes Hug (Introd.), evidence of more than accidental relationship even in the deviation of expression, in which, however, there is no essential difference. The similarity in thought and expression, and even in their very plan (Hug, l. c.), are indeed most striking, and this circumstance has been well accounted for by the fact that Peter had not himself visited the Asiatic provinces, and had, therefore, reference to the Epistles of his esteemed colleague for the general condition of the inhabitants, their manner of life, their virtues and their failings, and their civil and domestic relations. There are also some passages identical with those in the Epistle of St. James (comp. 1 Pet. i:6, 7, with James i:2, 3; i:24, with James i:10; ii:1, with James i:21; iv:8, with James v:20; and v:5, with James iv:6). This latter passage, is, indeed, a citation from Prov. iii:34; but the identity of the conclusions drawn by each renders it improbable that here was a merely accidental coincidence. It is also remarkable that in 1 Pet. iv:8, and James v: 20, there occurs (in each) the same citation from Prov. x:12. These resemblances, however, involve important consequences. If the Epistle of James was the first in order of time (see JAMES, EPISTLE OF) its right to a place in the canon is provisionally confirmed by the high and unexceptionable authority of St. Peter.

3. Objects and Contents. To afford consolation to the persecuted appears to have been the main object of this Epistle. To this the moral instructions are subsidiary (Hug's Introd.). The exhortations to a pure conscience, to rebut the calumnies of the time by their innocence, to abstain from violent disputes, to pay respect to the existing authorities, to exercise increasing love and fidelity, were exhortations all given with a view to alleviate their fate, or enable them to bear it. The repeated references to the example of Jesus in his death and sufferings, are designed to strengthen them for the endurance of calamities. The exhortation to the slaves, too, has reference to the unhappy days, in which, for real or imaginary wrongs and hardships, they frequently became the accusers and betrayers of their masters. The following is a summary of the contents:—

The salutation and introduction, in which the inhabitants of the five provinces who were purchased by the sufferings of Christ, are exhorted to prepare themselves for a reward higher than the enjoyments of this fleeting life (i:1-13). They are, therefore, recommended to lay aside anything which could render them unworthy of Christ, the center of their hopes, their pattern and their Savior, and so to regulate their conduct to their superiors that none should be able to reproach them as 'evildoers.' These precepts were to extend to slaves, to whom the meek and suffering Jesus should be an example. Women, too, were to render their submissive noiseless virtue as their chiefest ornament, and men should cherish and honor them. All should be full of sympathy and love, and mutual indulgence. Their innocence should be so marked as to shame the calumniator, and they should make preparation for the approaching catastrophe, when they should have an opportunity of imitating Jesus in their sufferings: hoping for them all to have no other reproach than that of being his disciples. The presbyters are enjoined to watch over their flocks, and the subordinate to pay them respect, and all should be on the watch, and lay aside their worldly cares. All these exhortations are enforced by the example of Christ, and by the punishment of the disobedient in the days of Noah, those spirits in prison to whom Christ went and preached (iii:19, 20).

4. The Second Epistle (see ANTILEGOMENA) has been the subject of more discussion than any other book in the New Testament, and its genuineness has been contested by not a few of the ablest critics. Our space will not allow us to notice in detail all the objections which have been raised against it, but it will be our duty to state the most important. Its genuineness, the date of its composition, and its characteristics, are so intimately connected, that we shall pursue a different method in treating of this Epistle from that which we have adopted in regard to other books.

The author of the first epistle refers (1 Pet. v:12) to a former letter, now no longer extant, which has been generally concluded to be a private communication, as the present is expressly called the Second Epistle (2 Pet. iii:1).

(1) Early Testimony. The first writer who has expressly named it is Origen (Homily on Joshua), who speaks of the two Epistles of Peter. He also cites the second epistle in his fourth homily on Leviticus, 'Petrus dicit, consartes, inquit, facti estis divina natura' (2 Pet. i:4), and gives it the name of Scripture ('as the Scripture says in a certain place, the dumb ass, replying with a human voice, reproved the madness of the Prophet,' alluding to 2 Pet. ii:16; Opp. ii, p. 32). At the same time he observes (ap. Euseb. vi:25) that 'Peter has left one acknowledged Epistle, and perhaps a second, for this is contested.' Firmilian, Bishop of Cappadocia, also (Ep. ad Cyprian.) speaks of Peter's epistles in a passage referring evidently to the second. Earlier allusions have been supposed to exist in the Shepherd of Hermas (Vision iii, 7), 'reliquerunt viam suam veram' (2 Pet. ii:15), and Vision iv:3, 'c/fugistis seculum hoc' (2 Pet. ii:20). Clemens Romanus has also been thought by some to have referred to this epistle in the passages, 'saved Noah, the eighth preacher of righteousness' (see 2 Pet. ii:6), and 'by hospitality and piety Lot was delivered from Sodom, when the whole region was destroyed by fire and brimstone, the Lord thereby making it manifest that he does not forsake those who trust in him, but those that turn aside he appoints to punishment and torment' (2 Pet. ii:6, 7, 9).

Irenæus (A. D. 178) is supposed by some to allude to 2 Pet. iii:8, 'The day of the Lord is as a thousand years;' as is also Justin Martyr, who cites the same passage in an earlier part of the same century. But others have supposed that the allusion here is to Ps.: xc:4. Eusebius observes (Hist. Eccles. vi, 14) that 'Clement of Alexandria (A. D. 192-217) wrote in his Ἐπιτομῆς ('Adumbrations'), commentaries on the canonical epistles, and also on the antilegomena, that is, Jude and the other Catholic epistles, together with that of Barnabas, and the so-called Revelation of Peter.' Cassiodorus, however, who published a Latin translation of the Adumbrations (De Instit. div. leg. c. 8), seems to confine the explications of Clement to 1 Peter, 1 and 2 John, and James.

(2) Catholic Epistles. Although we do not know by whom the collection of Catholic Epistles, as distinct from the Pauline, was made, yet there can be no reasonable doubt that such collection, including all the Antilegomena, existed before the close of the second century. It was well known in the time of Origen, and is referred to by Eusebius as generally received in his time (Hist. Eccles. ii, 23), for he expressly calls St. James' 'the first of the seven Catholic Epistles.'

(3) Doubts. Eusebius at the same time informs us of the doubts which had been raised before his time in regard to our epistle:—'That called the Second Epistle of Peter, as we have been informed, has not been received as a part of the New Testament. Nevertheless, appearing to many to be useful, it has been carefully studied with the other Scriptures' (Hist. Eccles. iii, 3).

The next writers who refer to the doubts respecting our epistle, are Didymus, the blind teacher of Alexandria, in the fourth century, and his pupil St. Jerome. The former acquaints us (Comment.) that 'it should not be concealed that the present epistle was considered spurious (falsatam esse), and that although published, it was not in the Canon.' And Jerome observes (De Vir. Illustr.) that 'Peter wrote two epistles called Catholic, the second of which had been denied by many (or most, plerique) to be his, because of the difference of style.' And again, 'Paul had for his interpreter Titus, and Peter had Mark, . . . the two epistles attributed to Peter differ in both style and character, and the structure of their language; from which we must of necessity suppose that he made use of two different interpreters.'

It may be here observed that the Fathers supposed that such of the sacred writers as did not understand Greek (among whom they reckoned St. Peter) dictated in their native language to an amanuensis, who wrote down in Greek what they had uttered in Hebrew. Silas, or Silvanus, has been conjectured to have acted in this capacity to St. Peter in the writing of his first epistle (1 Pet. v:2). Finally, St. Gregory the Great observes, towards the close of the sixth century, that there were some who asserted that Peter's second epistle, in which Paul's epistles were commended, was not his. 'Before the fourth century,' observes the Roman Catholic Professor Hug, 'Christian writers with perfect freedom advocated or denied the authority of certain writings of the New Testament according as their judgment dictated.'

(4) Received as Genuine in the Fourth Century. We find, however, that before the close of the fourth century the doubts had subsided, and this epistle was received as genuine by St. Athanasius, St. Cyril, St. Epiphanius, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine, and by Rufinus. Gregory Nazianzen alone considers it doubtful whether three or seven Catholic epistles ought to be used. The only dissentient voices, after this period, were probably Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Cosmas Indicopleustes (see ANTILEGOMENA), the latter on dogmatical rather than critical grounds, as the destruction of the world by fire clashed with his opinions. It is enumerated in the canon of Laodicea (A. D. 360?) and in the eighty-fifth apostolical canon, and was finally adopted by the councils of Hippo and Carthage, which included among the canonical books all those which are now commonly received, making no distinction, however, between the acknowledged and controverted books of the New Testament, or between the canonical and deuterocanonical of the Old.

(5) The Reformation. Although before this period certain books were rejected from the defect of historical evidence, or from internal grounds of suspicion, an undeviating uniformity now took place, and no controversy was raised respecting any of the books of the New Testament until the inquiring age which ushered in the Reformation. We now find Erasmus denying the genuineness of our epistle. Although Luther does not appear to have had any doubts of its genuineness, he revived the ancient distinction in regard to the books both of the Old and New Testament, — separating the apocryphal books of the Old Testament from the canonical, and in the enumeration of the books leaving the antilegomena of the New without any numbers attached to them: and in the Lunenberg edition of Luther's Bible, published in 1614 (68 years after Luther's death), these books are headed by the words, 'Apocrypha of the New Testament.' (See ANTILEGOMENA.)

Our epistle was called in question by Calvin (Comm. in Ep. Cath.), who observes that, 'notwithstanding some affinity in style, the discrepancies between it and the former are such as to indicate that they had not the same author.' It was, however, received by all the Reformed Confessions, as well as by the Council of Trent. It has been since that period rejected by Grotius (Annot.), Scaliger (Scaligeriana, ii, p. 22), Salmasius (De Episc. p. 145), Semler (Præf.), Eichhorn (Einleit.), Schmidt (Einleit.), Walker (Clavis), Schott (Isag.), Guericke (Beitrag, p. 176, note), Credner (Einleit.), De Wette (Einleit.), Ullman, to some extent (Der 2 Brief Pet.), and Neander (Hist. of the Planting, etc.). Among its numerous defenders it will be sufficient to mention the names of Michaelis (Marsh's transl., vol. vi); Lardner Pott. (Proleg.); Augusti (Einleit.); Flatt (Progr.); Dahl (Dissert.); Bertholdt (Einleit. vol. vi), who, however, rejects the second chapter; Nietzsche (Dissert.); and Olshausen (Opusc. Academ.), with the learned Roman Catholics, Hug (Introd.) and Feilmoser. The latter, however, fluctuates in his opinion (Einleit., p. 527).

Before proceeding to consider the grounds for and against the rejection of this epistle, it may be useful to inquire into its internal structure and contents.

(6) Contents. The writer designates himself here as the Apostle Peter (Simon, or, according to some MSS., Symeon Peter, 2 Pet. i:1; comp. Acts xv:14; John's Gospel passim) more clearly than in the first epistle; as personally known to Jesus (i:14); as a beloved brother of Paul (iii:15); and as the author of the first epistle (iii:1).

(1) Addressed to the Same People. It is addressed to the same persons with the first, whom he presupposes to be acquainted with the writings of St. Paul (iii:15; comp. Rom. ii:4). Neander (Planting of the Church) asserts that the readers appear to have been personally instructed by the apostle, which implies a relationship in which the author did not stand to the readers of the first epistle. He refers to his approaching death (i:14). The main object is the refutation of erroneous teachers.

(2) An Eyewitness. He, therefore, as an eyewitness of the acting and teaching of Jesus, is enabled to give them more accurate instruction than those who would mislead them. He exhorts them to advance in the knowledge and doctrine of Jesus, by adding to their faith fortitude (ἀρετή), and every other excellent quality. He denounces (ch. ii.) punishment against false teachers, by examples drawn from the disobedient angels, the world before the Flood, and Sodom and Gomorrah. He inveighs against those teachers for resigning themselves to impurity, and speaking evil of God and angels, whereas angels have not ventured to do this even of Satan. He compares them to the false prophet Balaam, and to clouds filled with wind. He rebukes those mockers who doubted of the coming of Christ, which was only delayed in mercy, but predicts the dissolution of the world by fire, and warns them to keep themselves in readiness for the new heavens and the new earth.

(3) Difference in Style. We have already seen that the main reasons which induced many of the ancients to reject this epistle arose from the difference in style and structure between the first and second epistle. The ancients have, however, not entered into detail in the examination of this subject, a task which has been left to their more critical successors. It is said, for instance, to be distinguished by a different usus loquendi, as by the word sotar frequently applied to our Lord, parousia, day of the Lord, or of judgment; and instead of 'revelation,' knowledge (gnosis and epignosis) is said to be enforced with peculiar prominence. The Christian religion is called 'the way of truth, and of righteousness' (ii:2, 21). It contains a surprising multitude of hapaxlegomena, instead of the very few found in the first epistle.

A remarkable difference has been observed in respect to the appellations of our Savior, who is in the first epistle generally called simply Christ or Jesus Christ; but the word Kύριος, which in the first epistle often occurs, and is always applied (with one exception only, i:3) to God the Father, is applied in the second in almost every place to Christ. Its application in all other passages in the first epistle is confined also to citations from the Old Testament, except in ii:13, where the Vulgate reads Deum. It is peculiar to the first epistle to subjoin to the terms God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit, epithets designed to exalt the glory of the divinity. The second epistle has no quotations from the Old Testament—in which the first abounds, and is remarkable for clothing its sentiments in the language of the Old Testament. De Wette furnishes as instances of repetition, indicating a carelessness of style in the author of the second epistle (2 Pet. i:3, 4), where occur dedoramentos, and dedoratai and dia is several times repeated (2 Pet. ii:1-3), in which apoleia occurs three times; 2 Pet. ii:7, 8, in which dikaïos occurs as many times; and 2 Pet. iii:12-14, in which there is a similar repetition of poosdokein. The first epistle is also said to be remarkable for a frequent and peculiar use of the particle hos, of which the second furnishes but one example (i:19). Olshausen adds, that in the second epistle the subjects proceed in regular order, and uninterruptedly, while the first is remarkable for detached and independent sentences (see 1 Pet. i:3-12).

(4) Resemblances. But in compensation for these differences, the resemblances are remarkably striking. One of the most obvious of these is the reference in both to the deluge, and the number of persons saved, the first epistle mentioning eight persons (1 Pet. iii:20), and the second speaking of Noah the eighth (2 Pet. ii:5). Some, however, here connect Noah with the following words, viz., Noah, the eighth preacher of righteousness, comparing it with the parallel passage in Jude, 'Enoch, the seventh from Adam,' the Jews having various ways of enumerating the good men who lived before Abraham (Ullmann, Der zweite Brief P.).

There are some words used in a peculiar sense by the author of each epistle, as apothesis (1 Pet. iii:21; 2 Pet. i:14); areta (1 Pet. ii:9; 2 Pet. i:3); anastrophesthai (1 Pet. i:17); anastrophia (1 Pet. i:15; ii:12; iii:1, 17); amomos and aspilos (1 Pet. i:19; 2 Pet. ii:13); poruesthai (1 Pet. iv:3; 2 Pet. ii:10; iii:3); epithimna (1 Pet. i:14; 2 Pet. ii:10; iii:3); ho kalesas (1 Pet. i:15; ii:9, 21); and idios (1 Pet. iii:1, 5; 2 Pet. i:20; ii:16, 22; iii:16). Some critics have, indeed, vindicated the genuineness of the epistle principally on the ground of resemblance in both sentiment and diction. Of these it will be sufficient for our purpose to refer to Hug and Michaelis. The former of these observes that the resemblance between the two is 'so thorough as to denote an identity of authorship' (Fosdick's transl.); and Michaelis had before this asserted (l. c.) that the agreement between them appeared to him to be such, 'that if the second was not written by St. Peter, the person who forged it not only possessed the power of imitation in a very unusual degree, but understood likewise the design of the first epistle, with which the ancients do not appear to have been acquainted.' The principal difference of style, however, is found in the second chapter, the character, of which is totally unlike anything contained in the first epistle. The resemblance, indeed, between this chapter and the short epistle of St. Jude, is so striking, that it has been at all times perceived that one must have at least read, if not copied from the other.

(5) Resemblance to Jude. All those theologians who have disputed the genuineness of Peter's second epistle have maintained that its writer adopted the sentiments and language of Jude, and this opinion is favored even by many of the modern advocates of its genuineness, including Olshausen and Hug. But which of the two wrote first is, notwithstanding, a question impossible to decide. 'St. Jude's Epistle is so like the second chapter of St. Peter's Second Epistle,' says Bishop Sherlock, 'the figures and images in both are so much the same . . . that it has been commonly thought that St. Jude copied after St. Peter's Epistle.' This was the more generally received opinion, and was held among the ancients by Eusebius (ii, p. 633), and maintained at the time of the Reformation by Luther, who observes, in his Preface, that 'no one can deny that Jude's Epistle is an extract or copy from St. Peter's Second Epistle, as the very words are nearly the same . . . and allegeth stories which have no place in Scripture' (see ENOCH, BOOK OF; JUDE, EPISTLE OF; see also Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1834, and the extract from it in Mr. Ward's Ideal of a Christian Church, 1844, p. 175, where Luther is reproached for maintaining this opinion). It was however, adopted by Mill (Proleg.), Michaelis (Introd.), Storr (Opusc.), Haenlein (Einleit.), Dahl (De æthiæ Ep. Petr. paster, et Jud.), Wetstein (Test. Nav.), and among the Roman Catholics by Du Pin and Calmet. One set of critics have supposed that one of the writers of these epistles had intended to illustrate at large what the other had briefly stated; others, that one sought to abridge what the other had stated diffusely. The former of these views is maintained by Hug and Olshausen. The latter writer founds his view on the fact that Peter does not give the minute statements found in Jude, especially in regard to the history of angels, in which passages Jude alone goes into details, while Peter advances a general historical fact,—which he conceives to be characteristic of a later composition.

(6) Bishop Sherlock's View. Dr. Sherlock, bishop of London, adopted a middle course. Perceiving that the argument from the style affected only the second chapter, which 'abounds in pompous words and expressions,' and that the style of this chapter differed as much from the rest of the second epistle as it does from the first, he conceived that neither writer borrowed from the other, but that each made use of a common document. The explanation of St. Jerome, that Peter used two different interpreters, the bishop entirely rejects, as, if this were the case, the difference of style would have appeared in the whole epistle, and not in the second chapter only. The bishop conceives that notwithstanding the remarkable resemblance between both, there is sufficient variation to prove that the one was not a mere transcriber of the other's thoughts or language. 'St. Peter has an instance not to be found in Jude; and St. Jude has an instance not to be found in Peter: St. Jude quotes the prophecy of Enoch, of which St. Peter says nothing; St. Peter refers to the preaching of Noah, of which St. Jude says nothing, although both relate to one and the same thing, the destruction of the old world.' The circumstance that each quotes from a common Hebrew document will, in his lordship's judgment, account not only for the difference in style between Peter's two epistles, but for that which exists between the second chapter and the first and third of Peter's second epistle. The bishop at the same time admits that there are some instances of agreement which cannot possibly be drawn from any Jewish book (as 2 Pet. ii:1-13, comp. with Jude 4-12; and 2 Pet. iii:2, 3, with Jude 17, 18). He therefore supposes that Jude had both the Second Epistle of Peter and the old Jewish book before him. Herder supposes this lost book to have been the Zendavesta of Zoroaster. The strongest objection to Bishop Sherlock's ingenious conjecture will be found in the fact that the resemblance to the epistle of St. Jude is not confined to the second chapter of Peter's Second Epistle, but will be found equally striking in the third chapter, amounting, in the originals, although not in the English Authorized Version, nearly to identity of expression.

(7) Other Views. A late eminent critic, perceiving that the opponents of the epistle were induced by this resemblance of the second epistle to St. Jude to deny its genuineness, maintained that this resemblance was accidental, and has endeavored to show that the second chapter is an interpolation, and that without it there is a closer connection between the first and third chapters (Bertholdt, Einleitung in die Schriften des A. und N. Test.). But it has been satisfactorily shown in reply that, though the second chapter has no necessary connection with either the first or third, yet there are references in the third chapter to matters propounded in the second.

(a) Bertholdt conceives that the argument against the epistle founded on the difference of style is met by adopting his view, as the first and third chapters agree in style with the first epistle. Olshausen maintains, in reply to this, that the circumstance of Peter's having appropriated a great part of Jude's epistle will of itself account for the difference of style in the second chapter; and that there is no discrepancy between the style of the first and second epistles of Peter, which is not common to every part of the second epistle, or strikingly peculiar to the first and third chapters. The hypothesis of Bertholdt, even if true, would not remove the difficulties, as many of the circumstances which have been supposed to militate against the genuineness of the epistle are found in the first, and still more in the third chapter. It would be doing an unnecessary violence to our epistle, in direct opposition to all external testimony.

(b) Ullmann proceeded one step further. 'Not long since,' says Hug, 'the Second Epistle of Peter met with an opponent, who menaced its dismemberment, and maintained his right to do this violence with learning and acuteness.' He separates it into three distinct portions, which happen to correspond with the present division into chapters. The first chapter he ascribes to Peter, and considers it to be one of his epistles, the conclusion of which was early lost. To this precious relic some unknown person, to effect a well-meant purpose, has added the next two chapters, for which the Epistle of Jude afforded him materials. The object of this writer, as well as of Bertholdt, is to vindicate the genuineness of part of the epistle, by rejecting those parts which are beset with greatest difficulties. But while Ullmann, as above alluded to (Der zweite Brief Pet. krit. untersucht, 1821), clearly shows that Bertholdt's hypothesis merely lessens, without removing the difficulty, his own solution of the remaining objections, which consists simply in cutting the knot, has not been such as to satisfy any reasonable mind. He argues from a resemblance in style between St.

Peter's first epistle, and the first chapter of the second, and particularly from the use in each of certain words in a peculiar sense, as ἀπερὶ, ἀπόθεσις, etc., that these portions emanated from the same writer, and further maintains that there is no coherence between the first chapter and the remaining portions of the epistle. But it has been shown that this incoherence exists only in the fancy of the learned German, as the first chapter (4, 16, 17), is but a preface to the refutation of erroneous opinions in the second (Hug's Introd.); and, further, from a comparison of the first with the third chapter, that there are sufficient resemblances of expression to show that the whole epistle had an identical origin (Olshausen.)

But although neither these resemblances between the Epistles of Peter and Jude, nor the difference in style between the First and Second Epistles of St. Peter, are of themselves sufficient to destroy the genuineness of St. Peter's epistle yet they would doubtless have some weight in affecting it, if supported by other internal marks of spuriousness. We shall therefore now consider whether such marks actually exist, and shall mention the principal indications which have had weight in the minds of some learned men against the authority of our epistle. In the first place, anachronisms have been pretended to be discovered which remove the epistle from the apostolic age and place it in the second century.

(c) The first who imagined that he discovered an indication of this nature was the illustrious Grotius, who, conceiving that the errors of the Carpocratians, a sect which originated in the second century, were those against which the second and third chapters were directed, ascribed the authorship of the epistle, not to Simon or Simeon Peter, but to Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, the successor of St. James. This opinion, however, which assumes upon mere conjecture that the name Peter (i:1), the words our beloved brother (iii:15), and the 16th, 17th, and 18th verses of the first chapter, were interpolated by those who wished to have the epistle pass for Peter's, has been long exploded. Neitzch has shown that the representation of the heretics described by Peter does not accord with the Carpocratians. It is as probable that the Gnostics were the heretics aimed at, the seeds of whose heresies were doubtless sown in the apostolic age. 'This second Epistle' (iii:1), in the opinion of Grotius, refers to the third chapter only, the two former chapters forming a distinct and previous letter.

(7) Anachronisms, Etc. (a) The doubts respecting the coming of Christ expressed in 2 Pet. iii:4, have also been considered as indicating a later age than the apostolic, and it has been asserted by the opponents of the genuineness of our epistle that sufficient time had not elapsed during St. Peter's lifetime for the application of the expression 'our fathers have slept.' This passage is also one of those adduced by Ullman (l. c.) against the genuineness of the third chapter. Olshausen has replied to this objection by maintaining that the scoffers referred to were not believers, but gnostic heretics, who ridiculed the faith of true Christians in relation to the return of Christ.

(b) But a still more remarkable anachronism has been pretended to be discovered in 2 Pet. iii:15, 16, where Paul is said 'in all his epistles . . . which the unlearned and unstable do wrest as they do the other Scriptures,' etc.—thus both attributing a collection of the Pauline epistles to a period within the lifetime of their author, and applying the term Scriptures, which is exclusively applied by the New Testament writers to the Scriptures of the Old Testament, to the Epistles of St. Paul. Now it is well known that there was no collection of St. Paul's epistles completed before the second century, and that to no part of the New Testament was the term Scriptures applied until near its close. (See SCRIPTURE, HOLY.) In respect to the former part of this objection, however, it has been well shown by Augusti (Commentar über die Cathol. Brief.) that Peter does not here refer to all the epistles of St. Paul, but that the word all is to be taken relatively, and referred to the more important epistles, which were most probably widely diffused in the lifetime of the apostle. To the reasoning derived from the phrase 'the other Scriptures,' wherein the word λοιπὰς with the article is said by Ullmann to indicate things of a like nature, more than one reply has been given. It has been shown that things of a different nature are sometimes referred to by this phrase (comp. Luke xviii:9; Acts v:13; Ephes. ii:3; and iv:17, if the reading be correct). Another interpretation of the words has therefore been proposed, viz., that the word 'Scriptures' here has no reference to the sacred writings, but to books in general, or such writings as were used by the parties referred to. Olshausen, however, has given an interpretation, by which he conceives the serious difficulties by which this passage is beset may be wholly removed. He supposes that the words, 'in which are some things hard to be understood,' relate to the epistles which Paul had sent to the readers of Peter's epistle, and that the other Scriptures are the other epistles of St. Paul, just before named (all his epistles). This explanation seems much more satisfactory than that of Storr (De Cath. Epist. Occas. et Consil.), who conceives that 'other Scriptures' mean other passages in the same epistles of St. Paul, as γραφή signifies a passage in Mark xv:28, Luke iv:21, where, however, it means a particular passage, but not any passage indiscriminately.

(c) An objection of quite a different character has been derived from 2 Pet. iii:2, already referred to; in our English Version, 'the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord.' But the order of the words in our Greek copies will not bear this rendering: to answer our Version, we must read ἡμῶν τῶν Ἀποστόλων. These words therefore, 'our apostles,' as the words must be translated, would seem to separate the writers from the apostles. Bishop Sherlock proposes that the sentence be transposed, and that the word ἡμῶν be placed after κυρίου, as in the parallel passage in Jude 17, when the whole sentence would run thus, 'the commandment of the apostles of our Lord and Savior;' a reading supported by the Æthiopic, and which Olshausen also favors, observing that 'there are as many genitives as there are words, and these not following each other in proper order.' But there is no necessity for having recourse to conjecture, if we adopt the reading of the Alexandrine, the Vatican, the Ephrem, and other manuscripts of ἡμῶν have ὑμῶν. According to this reading there is no further difficulty, and the sentence will stand thus: 'the word spoken by the holy prophets and your apostles, the commandment of the Lord and Savior.' This reading is also confirmed by the Vulgate, which has 'et apostolorum vestrorum, preceptorum Domini et Salvatoris.' The Syriac also reads, 'the commandment of our Lord and Savior, which through the apostles.'

(d) On another alleged anachronism, brought forward by Neander (Hist. of the Planting, etc.), founded on the phrase 'the holy mount' (2 Pet.

i:18), we shall merely observe that this might with as much force be adduced as an argument against our epistle being a work of the second century.

(e) An objection has been also taken from Peter's referring to the aqueous origin of the earth and its destruction by fire, which Ullmann and others consider mythical in their character. But so far from this being the case in regard to the origin of the earth, it completely coincides with the Mosaic cosmogony. (See COSMOGONY.) And as to the destruction of the world by fire, although nowhere else alluded to in the New Testament, it is not only intimated by the prophets, but is in strict accordance with the physiological conclusions of the science of modern geology.

(8) Genuineness. If Wetstein's interpretation be well founded, and if the writer made use of these strong figures to indicate the Roman war, and the destruction of the Jewish state and city, instead of forming an objection, they will furnish an additional and powerful argument in favor of the early date, and consequently of the genuineness of our epistle.

It is fully conceded that there is no other book in the New Testament against whose authority so many arguments can be adduced as against this epistle. One of the most impartial as well as ablest critics of modern times, after weighing them all, comes to the conclusion that neither its genuineness nor its spuriousness can be demonstrated by undoubted arguments; but, while he admits that unfriendly critics will see occasion for doubt, yet, relying on subjective grounds, he is persuaded of the authenticity of the epistle, and that the arguments which go to disprove its genuineness are not of sufficient weight to establish its spuriousness, or cause it to be 'stricken from the number of inspired books.' This is in accordance with the decision which he has formed of the sacred books, and which consists (1) of those whose genuineness and authorship can be determined; (2) of those whose spuriousness can be shown, of which there are none; (3) of those whose author is uncertain, but whose authenticity is clear, viz., Hebrews, James, 2 and 3 John, and Jude; and (4), those whose authenticity or spuriousness cannot be positively ascertained. These are, in his estimation, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and 2 Peter. To these he adds the Apocalypse, as being a work of a peculiar kind, but of whose genuineness he entertains no doubt (Olshausen, ut supra).

The authorship of other portions of the sacred writings may indeed be rendered uncertain, without throwing any doubts on their right to a place in the canon, as in the instance of the Epistle to the Hebrews. No one contests the right of the Epistles of Jude or of James to their present position in the canon, although it is uncertain whether their authors were the apostles of those names or the brethren of our Lord. But it is far otherwise with the Epistle of St. Peter. As Calvin has observed, 'If it is to be received as canonical, Peter must have been its author . . . for any other one to have personated the apostle would have been a deception unworthy the Christian name.' It has been indeed maintained that some well-meaning individual may have personated Peter, either to intimate that a reconciliation had taken place between him and St. Paul, to strengthen the minds of the Gentiles who doubted the coming of Christ, or the more easily to gain advantage over the heretics. But although it may be true that some writers have through modesty (see Lee's Dissertation upon a *Esdra*s; Laurence's Ascensio Vatis Isaiae, p. 178; and the Rev. W. Mascal's Preface to the Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, 1844) used another's name and prefixed it to their work, we are convinced, with Olshansen, from the internal structure of our epistle, that it would not have been possible to have found a pious man the bold and unblushing inventor of a literary artifice so manifest as the author in question must have been if he had dishonestly assumed the character of Peter. We must also bear in mind how cautious and discriminating were the Fathers of the Church, who first admitted this book into the canon. Nor were they strangers to the application of the higher criticism, while they had opportunities of adducing external evidence which is not within our reach. 'Higher criticism,' says Hug, is still open to us, and I even entertain agrees with the time assigned by Dr. Lardner, between 64 and 66 (see JUDE, EPISTLE OF). But if Jude certainly quoted the book of Enoch, and if the result of the investigation of Lücke, who concludes that this book was written in the first century, at the time of the Jewish war, and probably after the destruction of Jerusalem, be correct, this circumstance would of itself, ceteris paribus, settle the question in favor of the priority of St. Peter's second epistle. Bishop Sherlock maintains that there are no less than five years intervening between the date of the two epistles of Peter (see Dissertation on the Authority of the Second Epistle of St. Peter).

the hope of drawing from it manifest proofs of the genuineness of some of these epistles, particularly those of James and Jude, and the Second of St. Peter.' Its apostolical character is confessed. 'In the two epistles of Peter,' says Priestley, 'many attentive readers have observed that . . . there is a peculiar dignity and energy, exceeding anything in the writings of Paul, and worthy of the prince of the apostles' (Hist. of Christian Church, i, 141; see also Wright's Seiler, p. 543).

By those who acknowledge its genuineness its date is generally fixed about the year A. D. 65, or not long before Peter's death, which they deduce from 2 Pet. i:14. Wetstein concludes from 2 Pet. iii that it must have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, in which case none will allege that any but Peter could have been its author. If it were proved that Peter had Jude's epistle before him, this must have been written not long before the same period, which

2. A Levite who put away his Gentile wife and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ezra x:23; Neh. ix:5). (B. C. about 458.)

3. Son of Meshezabeel, of Judah, and Artaxerxes' counsellor in matters concerning the Jews (Neh. xi:24). (B. C. 446.)

PETHOR (pè'thòr), (Heb. פֶּתוֹר, peth-ore', extension). The place in Mesopotamia to which Balak sent Balaam to curse Israel (Num. xxii:5; Deut. xxiii:5). It was north of Palestine, on the Euphrates near the river now called Sajur, a few miles from the ancient Hittite capital, Carchemish.

PETHUEL (pe-thū'el), (Heb. פֶּתוּאֵל, peth-oo-ale', enlarged of God), father of Joel, the prophet (Joel i:1), B. C. before 800.

PETRA (pētrā), (called by the earlier Greek writers Πέτρα, pee'trah), was the capital of the Nabathæan Arabs in the land of Edom, and seems to have given name to the kingdom and region of Arabia Petraea.

As there is mention in the Old Testament of a stronghold which successively belonged to the Amorites (Judg. i:36), the Edomites (2 Kings xiv:7) and the Moabites (Is. xvi:1, comp. in Heb. ch. xlii:11), and bore in Hebrew the name of פֶּטֶרָה, Selah, which has the same meaning as Petra in Greek, viz., 'a rock,' that circumstance has led to the conjecture that the Petra of the Nabathæans had been the Selah of Edom. But the consideration of that point in a work of this nature falls more naturally under the Bible head of SELA, to which article accordingly the reader is referred; and there likewise the question will be disposed of as to whether (on the supposition of Petra being the Selah of Scripture) its site is to be identified with that of the modern Kerek, or with the locality of the far-famed Wady Musa. (See ARABIA; IDUMÆA; NEBAIOTH.) N. M.

PEULTHAI (pe-ül'thāi), (Heb. פֶּלְטָיִם, peh-ool-leh-thah'ee, my wages).

The last mentioned of the eight sons of Meshelah. He was a Levite, and a doorkeeper in the tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi:5). (B. C. about 1020.)

PHALEC (phā'lek), (Gr. φάλεκ, fal'ek, Phalec), a Greek form of PELEG (Luke iii:35).

PHALLU (phāl'lu), (Gen. xlvii:9). See PALLU.

PHALTI (phāl'ti), (Heb. פַּלְתִּי, pal-tee', delivered). Son of Laish, who was given Michal in marriage by Saul, after David had been driven away as an outlaw (1 Sam. xxv:44). (B. C. about 1061). He is called Phaltiel (2 Sam. iii:15).

PHALTIEL (phāl'ti-el), (Heb. פַּלְתִּיאֵל, pal-tee-ale', deliverance of God), the son-in-law of Saul (2 Sam. iii:15). (See PHALTI; PALTi).

PHANUEL (pha-nū'el), (Gr. Φανούηλ, fan-oo-ale', probably from Penuel, face of God), a man of Asshur, and father of Anna the prophetess (Luke ii:36). B. C. about 80.

PHARAOH (fā'ro or fā'ra-o), (Heb. פַּרְוֹ, par-o', the sun), the general title of the kings of Egypt in the Old Testament, and found only there and in the writers who have drawn from that source.

It often stands simply like a proper name (Gen. xii:15; xxxvii:36; xl:2, sq.; xlv:1, sq.; and so generally throughout the Pentateuch, and also in Cant. i:9; Is. xix:11; xxx:2). 'King of Egypt' is sometimes subjoined to it (1 Kings iii:1; 2 Kings xvii:7; xviii:21); and sometimes also the more specific designation, or real proper name of the monarch is indicated, as Pharaoh Necho (2 Kings xxiii:33), Pharaoh Hophra (Jer. xlv:30). Josephus intimates that the word signifies 'the king' in the Egyptian language (Antiq. viii, 6, 2). This is apparently confirmed by our finding the word 'king' written in the dialect of Memphis, ouro, and with the masculine article piouro (Jablonski, Opusc. i, 374; Peyron, Lex. Copt., p. 150). The idea has, however, been more recently started that Pharaoh corresponds to the Egyptian phra, 'the sun,' which is written as an hieroglyphic symbol over the titles of kings (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iv, 287). It seems to us that this explanation might be admitted without contradicting the other, seeing that it is not only possible, but highly probable, that the Egyptians should make the name of the sun a royal title, and that at length custom rendered it equivalent to 'king.' The practice of ancient, and indeed modern, Oriental kings, of associating the idea of their own dignity with the glory of the sun, is well known.

Modern Egyptologists (De Rougé, Brugsch, and Ebers) define its meaning as "the great house," and its application would thus be equivalent to our "the sublime porte." On account of the great uncertainty which still surrounds Egyptian chronology, it has proved very difficult to identify the different Pharaohs mentioned in the Bible, but, in many points, the investigations of Egyptologists and Biblical scholars have reached pretty certain conclusions. Ten Pharaohs are mentioned in the Old Testament.

(1) The Pharaoh of Abraham. The Pharaoh of the time of Abraham (Gen. xii:15) is most probably identical with Salatis, the head of the fifteenth dynasty, one of the Shepherd-kings (Hyksos), foreigners of the Semitic race, who conquered Egypt and, having become Egyptianized, ruled it for several centuries. The date of Abraham's visit to Egypt is most probably fixed at about B. C. 2080.

(2) The Pharaoh of Joseph. The Pharaoh of Joseph (Gen. xli) was the last, or the last but one, of the fifteenth dynasty; probably identical with Apophis, who reigned at least twenty-six years. (B. C. 1876-1850.) Bunsen identifies him with Osirtesen III, the Sesostris of classical writers.

(3) The Pharaoh of the Oppression. "The new king over Egypt who knew not Joseph" (Exod. i:8), and under whose reign Moses was born—is now by most Egyptologists identified with Rameses II, the third sovereign of the nineteenth dynasty (the Sesostris of the Greeks), the most prominent of the Pharaohs, a conqueror of many lands, the master builder of Egypt, whose statues and temples in ruins are found all over the Nile valley from Zoan (Tanis) to Karnak. It was his daughter who found and adopted Moses (Exod. ii:5-10). His mummied body was taken from the tomb in 1881 and unwrapped in the Boulak museum. That this Pharaoh was Aahmes I (the Amosis of Josephus), the first sovereign of the eighteenth dynasty, is now pretty generally abandoned. (See EGYPT.)

(4) The Pharaoh of the Exodus. The Pharaoh of the Exodus (Exod. v:1), before whom Moses wrought his miracles, and who perished with his army in the pursuit of the Israelites, was Menepthah, the thirteenth son of Rameses II, who began to rule B. C. 1728. His reign was inglorious and marked a period of decline. He did not even finish his father's tomb. On a monument of Tanis mention is made of the fact that he lost a son, and Dr. Brugsch connects this with the death of the firstborn, the last of the plagues.

(5) The Father-in-Law of Mered. The Pharaoh whose daughter, Bithiah, was given in marriage to Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv:18). The date of this marriage cannot be ascertained, being fixed by some at the time of the exode, while others bring down this event to near the time of David. "The most interesting feature connected with this transaction is the name Bithiah (daughter of Jehovah), given to the war with Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii:21). He may be reasonably supposed to be Sethos or the Zet of Manetho, the last king of the twenty-third dynasty. He reigned in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (B. C. about 711), and was the contemporary of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, and of Sennacherib, king of Assyria (Is. xxxvi:6).

PHARAOH-HOPHRA (fā'ro-hōph'rā), (Heb. פָּרֹעַ הַחֹפְרָא, par'o hof'ra, priest of the sun). See HOPHRA.

PHARAOH-NECHO (fā'ro-nē'koh), (Heb. נֶכְחֹ, nek-o'), also called simply Necho, was the fifth or sixth ruler of the Saite dynasty, and reigned from B. C. 610 to 594.

He made an expedition against Assyria, but was encountered by Josiah, king of Judah, who sided with Assyria, and who was defeated and killed at Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxv:20-24; 2 Kings xxiii:29, 30). The Jews then raised Jehoahaz, the younger son of Josiah, to the throne, but he was deposed by Necho, who gave the scepter to Jehoiakim, the elder son of Josiah. Necho's army was afterward defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, and he lost all his Asiatic possessions (2 Kings xxiv:7). (See NECHO.)

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER (fā'ro's dā'tēr).

1. The daughter of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites and who saved Moses' life (Exod. ii:5-10). (See PHARAOH, 3.)

2. Bithiah, wife of Mered, was a daughter of one of the Pharaohs probably reigning about the time of the Exodus. (See PHARAOH, 5.)

3. A wife of Solomon, and probably the daughter of a ruler of the twenty-first dynasty (1 Kings iii:1; vii:8; ix:24). (See PHARAOH, 7.)

PHARES (phā'rēz), (Gr. Φάρης, fah-rehs'), a Greek form of PHAREZ (Matt. i:3; Luke iii:33).

PHAREZ (phā'rez), (Heb. פָּרִיז, feh' rets, breach). A son of Judah by Tamar, and twin of Zarah or Zerah (Gen. xxxviii:29, 30). (B. C. about 1890.) He founded a tribal family named for him. Two more such families sprang from his sons, and bore their names (Num. xxvi:20, 21; 1 Chron. ii:4, 5). He was an ancestor of David and Christ (Ruth iv:12-18; Matt. i:3).

PHARISEES (phār'i-seez), (Gr. φαρισαῖος, far-is-ah'yos, a separatist, from Heb. פָּרָשׁ, par-rash', to separate).

(1) Name. The name denotes those who are separated, i. e. from ordinary persons, of course, by the correctness of their opinions and the holiness of their lives. They were a Jewish sect who had the dominant influence in the time of our Lord, to whose faults the overthrow of the state may be attributed, and who have to bear the awful burden of having crucified the Lord and giver of life.

(2) Origin. The precise period when the Pharisees appeared as a sect, history does not supply us with the means of determining. That they, however, as well as their natural opponents, the Sadducees, existed in the priesthood of Jonathan, in the interval, that is, between 159 and 144 before Christ, is known from Josephus, who (Antiq. xiii, 5) makes mention of them as well as of the sect of the Essenes. The terms he employs warrant the conviction that they were then no novelties, but well known, well defined, and two established religious parties. But from the time of Jonathan to that of Ezra (about 460 B. C.), there had taken place no great formative daughter of Pharaoh. It exhibits the true faith of Israel as exerting its influence abroad, and gathering proselytes even in the royal house of idolatrous Egypt."

(6) The Brother-in-Law of Hadad. The Pharaoh who gave the sister of his queen in marriage to Hadad, an Edomite of royal blood, who escaped the massacre of Joab and fled to Egypt (1 Kings xi:18-20). Osochor is probably the Pharaoh in question, although according to Africanus he would be Psusennes I.

(7) The Father-in-Law of Solomon. The Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married and brought "into the city of David until he had made an end of building his own house, and the house of the Lord" (1 Kings iii:1), consequently before the eleventh year of his reign, in which year the temple was finished (1 Kings vi:37, 38). This Pharaoh afterward made an expedition into Palestine, took Gezer, slew the Canaanites who dwelt in the city, and gave it to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 Kings ix:16).

(8) The Pharaoh of Hezekiah. The Pharaoh in whom King Hezekiah put his confidence in his event such as could of itself cause so great a change in the Hebrew system as was the rise of these sects; whereas the influences to which the Israelites had been subject in the Medo-Persian dominions, and the necessarily somewhat new direction which things took on the rebuilding of the temple and the restoration of the civil and religious polity, could hardly fail, considering the distance from Moses at which these changes happened, and the great extent to which the people had lost even the knowledge of the institutions and language of their forefathers, to lead to diversities of views, interests, and aims, whence sects would spring as a natural if not inevitable result. There is, therefore, good reason to refer the origin of the Pharisees to the time of the return from the Babylonish captivity, a period which constitutes a marked epoch, as dividing the Hebraism of the older and purer age from the Judaism of the later and more corrupt times. Nor, did our space allow, should we find it difficult to trace the leading features of the Pharisæic character back to those peculiar opinions and usages with which the old Israelitish type of mind had been made familiar, and at the same time corrupt, in the Persian empire.

(3) Characteristics. But as we think it more for the reader's instruction to lay before him the very words in which this sect is described, than to give a philosophical account of the rise and connection of their principles, to which of necessity our own views would impart a coloring, we shall proceed to transcribe a nearly literal translation of the most important passages in question.

'The Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses, and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written word, but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers. Hence great disputes. The Sadducees are able to persuade none but the rich, and have not the populace obsequious to them, but the Pharisees have the multitude on their side.' 'The Pharisees are not apt to be severe in punishments' (Joseph. Antiq. xiii:10, 5 and 6; Epiphan. Har. 15).

'The Pharisees live meanly and despise delicacies in diet: and they follow the conduct of reason, and what that prescribes to them as good they do. They also pay respect to such as are in years; nor are they so bold as to contradict them in anything which they have introduced; and when they determine that all things are done by fate, they do not take away from men the freedom of acting as they think fit, since their notion is that it hath pleased God to make a constitution of things whereby what he wills is done, but so that the will of man can act virtuously or viciously.'

(4) Belief. 'They also believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as men have lived virtuously or viciously in this life. The latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison; but the former shall have power to revive and live again: on account of which doctrine they are able greatly to persuade the body of the people: and whatsoever is done about divine worship, prayers, and sacrifices, is performed according to their directions, insomuch that the cities gave great attestations to them on account of their entire virtuous conduct' (Joseph. Antiq. xviii, 1, 3).

'The bodies of all men are mortal, and are created out of corruptible matter; but the soul is ever immortal, and is a portion of the divinity that inhabits our bodies' (De Bell. Jud. iii, 8, 5). They say that all souls are incorruptible, but that the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies, and that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment.

'The Pharisees are those who are esteemed most skillful in the exact interpretation of the laws. They ascribe all to Fate (or Providence) and to God, and yet allow that to act what is right or the contrary is for the most part in the power of man.

'The Pharisees say that some actions, but not all, are the work of fate, that some of them are in our own power, and that they are liable to fate, but are not caused by fate' (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 5, 9).

(5) Political Power, Etc. 'The Pharisees are a sect of Jews which appear to be more pious than others, and to expound the laws more accurately. These Pharisees artfully insinuated themselves into her (Queen Alexandra's) favor by little and little, and became the real administrators of public affairs; they banished and restored whom they pleased; they bound and loosed at their pleasure; they had the enjoyment of the royal authority, whilst the expenses and the difficulties of it belonged to Alexandra. She was a sagacious woman in the management of great affairs, and became not only very powerful at home, but terrible also to foreign potentates: while she governed other people, the Pharisees governed her. She was so superstitious as to comply with their desires, and accordingly they slew whom they pleased' (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i, 5, 2, 3).

'There was a certain sect that were Jews, who valued themselves highly upon the exact skill they had in the law of their fathers, and made men believe they were highly favored by God, by whom this set of women were inveigled. These are those that are called the sect of the Pharisees, who were able to make great opposition to kings; a cunning sect they were, and soon elevated to a pitch of open fighting and doing mischief. Accordingly, when all the people of the Jews gave assurance of their good will to Cæsar and to the king's government, these men did not swear, being about 6,000; and when the king imposed a fine upon them, Phreroras' wife paid it. In order to requite this kindness, since they were believed to have a foreknowledge of things to come by divine inspiration, they foretold how God had decreed that Herod's government should cease, and that the kingdom should come to her and Phreroras, and to their children; so the king Herod slew such of the Pharisees as were principally accused, and all who had consented to what the Pharisees had foretold' (Joseph. Antiq. xvii, 2, 4).

'The sect of the Pharisees are supposed to excel others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country' (Joseph. Vita, sec. 38).

'The Pharisees have so great a power over the multitude that when they say anything against the king or against the high-priest, they are generally believed' (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 10, 5).

'Moreover the Pharisees are friendly to one another, and are for the exercise of concord and regard for the public' (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii, 8, 14).

(6) Character as Found in the Gospels. There is another source of our knowledge of the Pharisees—the books of the New Testament. The light in which they here appear varies, of course, with the circumstances to which its origin is due,

The reader has just had before him the account of a friend and an adherent, an account which, therefore, we may believe, is conceived and set forth in the most favorable manner. The gospels present the character of the Pharisees in a darker hue, inasmuch as here a higher standard is brought into use, a loftier morality is the judge. To pass on to the views given in the New Testament. The high repute in which the Pharisees were held, as expositors of the national laws, whether civil or religious, may be seen in John vii:48; Acts xxii:3; the casuistry which they employed in expounding the Scriptures, in Matt. ix:34; xv:5; xxiii:16; Mark vii:7, sq.; their excessive zeal in proselytism (Matt. xxiii:15); yet their concealment of light and hindrance of progress (Matt. xxiii:13); their inordinate regard for externals, and oppressive but self-sparing rule (Matt. xxiii:3, sq., 25); their affectation of grandeur and distinction (Matt. xxiii:5, sq.); their shocking hypocrisy (Matt. xxiii:14, 27, sq.); their standing on inconsiderable points, while they neglected such as were of consequence, preferring ceremonial rites to justice and charity (Matt. xxiii:24; xii:2-7; Luke vi:7; John ix:16, sq.; Mark vii:1); the display which they affected even in works of religion (Matt. vi:1, sq.; xxiii:5); their pride and self-gratulation as assuredly, and before others, religious men (Luke xviii:9, sq.); their regard to tradition (Matt. xv:2; Mark vii:3); they formed schools, which had masters and disciples (Matt. xxii:16; Luke v:33); agreeably with their general doctrines, they regarded the act rather than the motive (Luke xi:39; xviii:11, sq.); and were given to fasts, prayers, washing, paying of tithes, alms, etc. (Matt. ix:14); xxiii:15, 23; Luke xi:39, sq.; xviii:12); exhibiting themselves to the people, in order to gain their favor, as self-denying, holy men, zealous for God and the law, a kind of Jewish stoics (Matt. ix:11; Luke v:30; vi:2; Matt. xxiii:5, 15, 29); while in reality they were fond of the pleasures of sense, and were men of lax morals (Matt. v:20; xv:4, 8; xxiii:3, 14, 23, 25; John viii:7). At an early period they determined in the Sanhedrim to withstand and destroy Jesus, instigated doubtless by the boldness with which he taught the necessity of personal righteousness and pure worship (Matt. xii:14).

In regard to the opinions of the Pharisees, the New Testament affords only fragments of information, which are, however, in accordance with the fuller particulars furnished by Josephus. From Acts xxiii:6, 8, we learn that they believed in the existence of higher created beings than man, doubtless the good and bad spirits of the Chaldee philosophy. The same places also instruct us that they held a resurrection of the dead (comp. Matt. xxii:24, sq.).

It thus appears that the Pharisees were in general a powerful religious party, or rather the predominant influence, in the Jewish state, who aspired to the control of the civil and religious institutions, affected popularity among the people, exerted influence in the councils of kings, queens, and people of rank; were the recognized teachers and guides of the national mind, proud of their orthodoxy, pluming themselves on their superior sanctity, practicing austerities outwardly, but inwardly indulging their passions and descending to unworthy and shameful acts; and withal of narrow spirit, contracted views, seeking rather their own aggrandisement than the public good, of which they used the name merely as a pretext and a cover.

We are not to suppose that there were no individuals in the body free from its prevailing vices. There did not fail to be upright and pure-minded men, who united inward piety to outward correctness of conduct, and were indeed superior to the principles of their sect; such was Nicodemus (John iii:1); such also Gamaliel may have been (Acts v:34; comp. Berach. xiii, 2; Sota, xx, 3; Babyl. Sota, xxii, 2). Of men of this kind many were led to embrace the Gospel (Acts xv:5).

In general, however, their power was all directed against Jesus and his work. With what force they must have acted appears obvious from the preceding remarks. Nor is the reader to imagine that they were merely a few learned men, congregated together in the capital, engaged in learned pursuits or religious practices, and in consequence leaving our Lord at liberty to pursue his ordinary duties up and down the land. The capital was doubtless their headquarters, but they pervaded the entire country in considerable numbers (six thousand are referred to above), and were therefore present in all parts to withstand the publication of the Gospel of that kingdom every feature of which they hated (Luke v:17); and as they constituted a large portion of the Sanhedrim (Acts v:34; xxiii:6, sq.), and had an almost unlimited influence with the people, great indeed was the power which they wielded in their conflict with the infant church. Perhaps there never was an instance in any social condition in which the elements of power supplied by religion, politics, high life, and humble condition were more thoroughly or more densely combined in order to oppose and destroy the growing power of new ideas and lofty aims. The victory, however, was for man, because it was also of God. Darkness, indeed, prevailed for three days, covering the land, and casting a thick shadow over the world. But the Sun of Righteousness arose, and still shines.

Pharisaism, how compact soever might be its appearance outwardly, and as against a common enemy, had its own internal dissensions. The question of more or less of moderate or extreme views, of what on one side would be called temporizing and on the other consistency, agitated this school as it has agitated most others. In the age of our Lord there were two leading parties, that of Hillel and that of Schammai, the former representing a moderate Pharisaism, the latter 'the strictest sect,' to which Paul had probably belonged.

Some of the extracts from Josephus show clearly that the Greek philosophy had an influence on the doctrines of the Pharisees. (Milman, Hist. of the Jews; Edersheim, Life of Jesus; Farrar, Life of Christ; Geike, Life of Christ.)

PHARPAR (phār'par), (Heb. פַּרְפַּר, par'par, swift), one of the rivers of Damascus (2 Kings v:12). See ABANA.

It is commonly identified with A'waj, formed by the junction of several streams rising in Hermon.

PHARZITES (phār'zītes), (Heb. פַּרְזִי, hap-par-tsee', with the article, the Partsi), the descendants of Pharez (Num. xxvi:20). (See PEREZ.)

PHASEAH (pha-sē'ah), (Neh. vii:51). See PASEAH.

PHEBE (phē'be), (Gr. Φοίβη, foy'bay). See PHOEBE.

PHENICE (phe-ni'se), (Gr. Φοινίκη, foy-nee'kay, a palm tree; Acts xi:19; xv:3; in xxvii:12 Φοινίξ, foy-nix), a city on the southeast of Crete, with a harbor, in the attempt to reach which the ship in which Paul voyaged as a prisoner to Rome, was driven out of its course, and eventually wrecked (Acts xxvii:12).

Both Ptolemy and Strabo mention a town named Phœnix. Phenice or Phœnix has been identified with the harbor of Lutro, about thirty-five miles west-northwest from Cape Matala. It has lately been shown that this place has an admirable harbor with a good depth of water, and sheltered from the winter winds.

PHENICIA (phe-nish-à). See PHENICIA.

PHIBESETH (phĭb'e-sĕth), (Heb. פִּבְּסֵת, pee-bel'seth, the cat goddess Basht, Ezek. xxx:17). See PI-BESETH.

PHICHOL (phĭ'kol), (Heb. כֹּלֵל, pee-kole', mouth of all, i. e. all-commanding), the proper, or more probably, the titular name of the commander of the troops of Abimelech, the Philistine king of Gerar.

Philadelphia

If the Abimelech of the time of Isaac was the son of the Abimelech of the time of Abraham, we may conclude that the Phichol who attended on the second Abimelech was the successor of the one who was present with the first at the interview with Abraham (Gen. xxi:22; xxvi:26). But the whole subject of these interviews is beset with difficulties. (See ABIMELECH; ABRAHAM; ISAAC.)

PHILADELPHIA (phĭl'a-dĕl'phi-à), (Gr. Φιλὰδελφία, fil-ad-el'fee-ah, brotherly love), a city of Lesser Asia, and one of the seven containing the Christian churches to which the Apocalyptic admonitions were addressed.

The town stood about twenty-five miles southeast from Sardis, in north latitude 32° 28', east longitude 28° 30', in the plain of Hermus, about midway between the river of that name and the termination of Mount Tmolus. It was the second in Lydia (Ptolem. v. 2; Plin. Hist. Nat. v. 30), and was built by King Attalus Philadelphus, from whom it took its name. In B. C. 133 the place passed, with the dominion in which it lay, to the Romans. The site is reputed by Strabo (xiii. p. 628) to have been very liable to earthquakes; but it continued a place of importance and of strength down to the Byzantine age; and of all the towns in Asia Minor it withstood the Turks the longest. It was taken by Bajazet I in A. D. 1392.

Philadelphia still exists as a Turkish town, under the name of Allah Shehr, 'city of God,' i. e. High-town. It covers a considerable extent of ground, running up the slopes of four hills, or rather of one hill with four flat summits. The country, as viewed from these hills, is extremely magnificent—gardens and vineyards lying at the back and sides of the town, and before it one of the most extensive and beautiful plains of Asia. The town itself, although spacious, is miserably built and kept, the dwellings being remarkably mean, and the streets exceedingly filthy. Across the summits of the hill behind the town and the small valleys between them runs the town wall, strengthened by circular and square towers, and forming also an extensive and long quadrangle in the plain below. There are about 10,000 inhabitants, mainly Turks. It is stated that there are five churches in the town, besides twenty others which were too old or too small for use. Six minarets, indicating as many mosques, are seen in the town; and one of these mosques is believed by the native Christians to have been the church in which assembled the primitive Christians addressed in the Apocalypse. There are few ruins; but in one part there are still found four strong marble pillars, which supported the dome of a church. The dome itself has fallen down, but its remains may be observed, and it is seen that the arch was of brick. On the sides of the pillars are inscriptions, and some architectural ornaments in the form of the figures of saints. One solitary pillar of high antiquity has been often noticed, as reminding beholders of the remarkable words in the Apocalyptic message to the Philadelphian church: 'Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God; and he shall go no more out' (Rev. iii:12). (Arundell, Seven Churches; Arundell, Discoveries in Asia.)

PHILEMON (phĭ-lĕ'mon), (Gr. Φιλήμων, fil-ay'mone, affectionate).

A rich citizen of Colosse, in Phrygia, who was converted to the Christian faith, with Apphia his wife, by Epaphras, a disciple of Paul; but it would appear from the expression in Philem. verse 19, 'that Philemon was really a convert of Paul; unless we could admit that the apostle had formerly been the means of saving his life; for which we have no warrant. (A. D. 57.) Some have supposed that Archippus was son to Philemon; and as the apostle terms him, "our fellow soldier," it is possible, that the connection had been of long standing, and consequently, much intercourse might have taken place between Paul and Philemon, distinct from any reference to Philemon's situation at Colosse.

Though it is usually said that Paul had converted and baptized Onesimus, the runaway slave of Philemon (see ONESIMUS), at Rome, yet from the phrase (Col. iv:9) "who is one of you," it is natural to infer that Onesimus had professed Christianity before his elopement (so Epaphras is called one of themselves, chap. i:7.); otherwise, he could be no member of the church at Colosse: and very likely, this transgression of a professor had not only mortified Philemon extremely, but had scandalized the church, and had become publicly notorious among the heathen also.

Philemon was undoubtedly a man of property; and like Gaius, the lady Eclecta, and Phœbe, he exercised great hospitality towards Christian brethren, especially evangelists. But from the direction of the apostle "to prepare him a lodging" (comp. Macknight, et al, in loc.) in a hired house, in the city, where he might receive all visitors, it would appear that Philemon's premises were not very extensive.

Philemon might have been a deacon in or of the churches at Colosse, but the term "fellow laborer" is not sufficient to prove that he was a bishop; though it implies a previous personal knowledge, and perhaps much confidential communication, between the parties. If we might add a personal knowledge of Philemon, by those also who salute him in Paul's letter,—Timothy, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke,—it would greatly heighten our conception of this good man's character, and suggest a variety of occasions on which he might have rendered the brethren services equally extensive and important. His house at Colosse was shown in the time of Theodoret and tradition represents him as bishop of that city and as having suffered martyrdom.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO

(1) Authorship. That this epistle was written by the apostle Paul is the constant tradition of the ancient Church. It is expressly cited as such by Origen (Homil. XIX, in Jerem., tom. i, p. 185, ed. Huet.); it is referred to as such by Tertullian (Nov. Marc. v, 21); and both Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 25) and Jerome (Proem. in Ep. ad Philem. tom. iv, p. 442) attest its universal reception as such in the Christian world. The latter, indeed, informs us that some in his day deemed it unworthy of a place in the canon, in consequence of its being occupied with subjects which, in their estimation, it did not become an apostle to write about, save as a mere private individual; but this he, at the same time, shows to be a mistake, and repudiates the legitimacy of such a standard for estimating the genuineness or authority of any book. It was also admitted as canonical by Marcion (Hieronym. l. c.). That this epistle should not have been quoted by several of the Fathers who have quoted largely from the other Pauline epistles (c. g., Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Cyprian), may be accounted for partly by the brevity of the epistle, and partly by their not having occasion to refer to the subjects of which it treats. Paley has adjoined the undesigned coincidences between this epistle and that to the Colossians with great force, as evincing the authenticity of both (Horæ Pau- lina, c. 14); and Eichhorn has ingeniously shown how a person attempting, with the epistle to the Colossians before him, to forge such an epistle as this in the name of Paul, would have been naturally led to a very different arrangement of the historical circumstances and persons from what we find in the epistle which is extant (Einleit. ins Neu Testament iii, 302).

(2) Time of Writing. This epistle was evidently written during the apostle's imprisonment (verses 9, 10), and as we have already endeavored to show (see COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE), during his two years' imprisonment at Rome.

(3) Occasion. It was occasioned by his sending back to Philemon his runaway slave Onesimus, who, having found his way to Rome, was there, through the instrumentality of the apostle, converted to Christianity; and, after serving Paul for a season, was by him restored to his former master, without whose consent the apostle did not feel at liberty to retain him.

(4) Contents. The epistle commences with the apostle's usual salutation to those to whom he wrote; after which he affectionately alludes to the good reputation which Philemon, as a Christian, enjoyed, and to the joy which the knowledge of this afforded him (verses 1-7). He then gently and gracefully introduces the main subject of his epistle by a reference to the spiritual obligations under which Philemon lay to him, and on the ground of which he might utter as a command what he preferred urging as a request. Onesimus is then introduced; the change of mind and character he had experienced is stated; his offense in deserting his master is not palliated; his increased worth and usefulness are dwelt upon, and his former master is entreated to receive him back, not only without severity, but with the feeling due from one Christian to another (verses 8-16). The apostle then delicately refers to the matter of compensation for any loss which Philemon might have sustained either through the dishonesty of Onesimus or simply through the want of his service; and though he reminds his friend that he might justly hold the latter his debtor for a much larger amount (seeing he owed to the apostle his own self), he pledges himself, under his own hand, to make good that loss (verses 17-19). The epistle concludes with some additional expressions of friendly solicitude; a request that Philemon would prepare the apostle a lodging, as he trusted soon to visit him; and the salutations of the apostle and some of the Christians by whom he was surrounded at the time (verses 20-25).

(5) Felicity of Expression. This epistle has been universally admired as a model, graceful, delicate, and manly writing. 'It is a voucher,' says Eichhorn, 'for the apostle's urbanity, politeness, and knowledge of the world. His advocacy of Onesimus is of the most insinuating and persuasive character, and yet without the slightest perversion or concealment of any fact. The errors of Onesimus are admitted, as was necessary, lest the just indignation of his master against him should be roused anew; but they are alluded to in the most admirable manner: the good side of Onesimus is brought to view, but in such a way as to facilitate the friendly reception of him by his master, as a consequence of Christianity, to which he had, during his absence, been converted; and his future fidelity is vouched for by the noble principles of Christianity to which he had been converted. The apostle addresses Philemon on the softest side: who would willfully refuse to an aged, a suffering, and an unjustly imprisoned friend a request? And such was he who thus pleaded for Onesimus. The person recommended is a Christian, a dear friend of the apostle's, and one who had personally served him; if Philemon will receive him kindly, it will afford the apostle a proof of his love, and yield him joy. What need, then, for long urgency? The apostle is certain that Philemon will, of his own accord, do even more than he is asked. More cogently and more courteously no man could plead.'

W. L. A.

PHILETUS (phi-lē'tus), (Gr. Φιλέτος, fil-ay-tos', beloved), an apostate Christian, mentioned by Paul, in connection with Hymenæus (2 Tim. ii:17), (see HYMENÆUS), and is named with him in 1 Tim. i:20. (A. D. 58-64.)

PHILIP (phil'ip), (Gr. Φίλιππος, fil'ip-pos, lov'r of horses).

1. The Apostle.

One of the twelve apostles. He was of Bethsaida, 'the city of Andrew and Peter' (John i:44). He became one of the disciples of John the Baptist, and was in the neighborhood where John was baptizing, at the time of our Lord's baptism. (A. D. 25-28.) Andrew and John, who were also disciples of the Baptist, heard the testimony concerning Jesus which the latter gave, and thenceforth attached themselves to him as the promised Messiah.

(1) The Call. Through Andrew his brother, Simon (Peter) was brought to Christ; and as on the next day Philip unhesitatingly accompanied Jesus when called to follow him, it is probable that his townsmen had previously spoken to him of Jesus as the long-expected Savior (John i:35-44). Philip was thus the fourth of the apostles who attached themselves to the person of Jesus—of those 'who left all and followed him.'

(2) Invites Nathanael. The first act of Philip was to bring to the Lord Nathanael, who is supposed to have also become an apostle under the name of Bartholomew (John i:45-51). (See NATHANAEL.)

(3) The Loaves and Fishes. Little more is recorded of Philip in the Scriptures; but it is remarkable that when Christ beheld the five thousand people whom he afterwards fed with five loaves and two fishes, he singled out Philip for the question, 'Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?' It is added, 'This he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do.' Bengel and others suppose that this was because the charge of providing food had been committed to Philip, while Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia rather suppose it was because this apostle was weak in faith. The answer of Philip agrees well enough with either supposition, 'Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little' (John vi:1-7). But it is well to compare this with John xiv:8, where the inappropriate remark of Philip, 'Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us,' evinces that he experienced in a degree beyond his brother apostles, the difficulty which they generally felt in raising themselves above the things of sense.

(4) Application of Greeks. Intermediately, we find recorded the application to Philip of certain 'Greeks' (proselytes of the gate) at Jerusalem, who wished to be introduced to Jesus, of whom they had heard so much. Knowing that his master was not forward to gratify mere curiosity, Philip was uncertain whether to comply with their wish or not, but first consulted Andrew, who went with him to mention the circumstance to Jesus (John xii:21, 22). This incident, although slight, is indicative of character, as we feel sure that some of the other apostles, Peter for instance, would at once have complied with or declined this application on their own responsibility. The sacred history only adds to these facts, that Philip was present with the other apostles at the religious assembly following the Lord's resurrection (Acts i:13).

(5) Later Tradition. The later traditions concerning this apostle are vague and uncertain; but there is nothing improbable in the statement that he preached the Gospel in Phrygia (Theodoret, in Ps. cxvi; Niceph. Hist. Eccles. ii, 39), and that he met his death at Hierapolis in Syria (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii, 31; v:24). The further statement, that Philip was married and had daughters (Euseb. as above, Clem. Alex. Strom. iii, 192; Niceph. ii, 44), very probably arose from confounding him with Philip the Evangelist (Acts xxi:8).

2. The Evangelist. (1) As Deacon. One of the first seven deacons (Acts vi:5); also called an 'Evangelist' (xxi:8), which denotes one of those ministers of the primitive church, who, without being attached to any particular congregation, preached the Gospel from place to place (Eph. iv:11; 2 Tim. iv:5). (A. D. 29.) Being compelled to leave Jerusalem by the persecution which ensued on Stephen's death, Philip was induced to take refuge in Samaria.

(2) Meets Simon Magus. He there came to a city where Simon Magus was held in high reverence through the wonders which he wrought. But the substantial and beneficent miracles which were performed by Philip in the name of Jesus, drew away their attention from the imposter, and prepared their minds for the reception of the Gospel. Simon himself seems to have regarded him as in league with some superhuman being, and looking upon baptism as the initiatory rite of a compact through which he might obtain the same powers, he solicited and obtained baptism from the Evangelist. (See SIMON, 10.)

(3) Instructs the Eunuch. After Peter and John had come to Samaria to complete and carry on the work which Philip had been the means of commencing, the Evangelist himself was directed by a divine impulse to proceed towards Gaza, where he met the treasurer of Candace, queen of Ethiopia (see CANDACE; ETHIOPIA), by whose conversion and baptism he became the instrument of planting the first seeds of the Gospel in Ethiopia (Acts viii:1-39). Philip then retraced his steps, and after pausing at Azotus, preached the Gospel from town to town till he came to Caesarea (verse 40).

(4) Later Events. At this place he seems to have settled; for when Paul was on his last journey to Jerusalem, he and his party were entertained in the house of Philip, on which occasion it is mentioned that he had 'four daughters, virgins, who did prophesy' (Acts xxi:9), or, who were endued with the faculty of speaking under divine inspiration, and of predicting future events, together with other supernatural gifts vouchsafed to the primitive Christians, in accordance with the prophecy in Acts ii:18. With this fact the Scriptural history of Philip closes, and the traditions which refer to his subsequent proceedings are uncertain and conflicting. The Greek martyrologies make him to have been bishop of Tralles, in Lydia; but the Latins make him end his days in Caesarea (Acta Sanct. ad 6 Junii); but in all old accounts Philip the Apostle and Philip the Evangelist are much confounded.

3. Son of Herod the Great, and tetrarch of Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis (Luke iii: 1). (See HERODIAN FAMILY.) He ruled from B. C. 4 to A. D. 34.

4. Another Son of Herod the Great called by Josephus Herod, and first husband of Herodias (Matt. xiv:3; Mark vi:17; Luke iii:19). (A. D. before 25.) (See HERODIAN FAMILY.)

PHILIPPI (phī-līp'pī), (Gr. Φίλιπποι, fil'ip-poi, a plural form of Philip), a city of the proconsular Macedonia (see MACEDONIA) situated eastward of Amphipolis, within the limits of ancient Thrace (Acts xvi:12; xx:6; Phil. i:1.)

It was anciently called Kray-nee'dez, Krynides, Fountains, but having been taken and fortified by Philip of Macedon, he named it, after himself, Philippi. In the vicinity were mines of gold but ruins—heaps of stone and rubbish, overgrown with thorns and briars; but nothing of the innumerable busts and statues, thousands of columns, and vast masses of classic ruins, of which the elder travelers speak. Ruins of private dwellings are still visible; also something of a semi-circular shape, probably a forum or market-place, 'perhaps the one where Paul and Silas received their undeserved stripes.' The most prominent of the existing remains is the remainder of a palatial edifice, the architecture of which is grand, and the materials costly. The pilasters, chapiters, etc., are of the finest white marble, and the walls were formerly encased with the same stone. These marble blocks are gradually knocked down by the Turks, and 'wrought into their silly grave-stones.' The travelers were informed that many of the ruins are now covered by stagnant water, at the

and silver: and the spot eventually became celebrated for the battle in which Brutus and Cassius were defeated. Paul made some stay in this place on his first arrival in Greece, and here founded the church to which he afterwards addressed one of his epistles. It was here that the interesting circumstances related in Acts xvi occurred; and the city was again visited by the Apostle on his departure from Greece (Acts xx: 6). In the former passage (xvi:12) Philippi is called a colony ko-loh-nee'ah (κολωνία), and this character it had in fact acquired through many of the followers of Antony having been colonized thither by Augustus (Dion. Cass. xvii: 432). The fact that Philippi was a colony was formerly disputed; but its complete verification has strongly attested the minute accuracy of the sacred narrative.

The plain in which the ruins of Philippi stand is embraced by the parallel arms of mountains extended from the Necropor, which pour into the plain many small streams, by which it is abundantly watered and fertilized. The acropolis is upon a mount standing out into the plain from the northeast, and the city seems to have extended from the base of it to the south and southwest. The remains of the fortress upon the top consist of three ruined towers and considerable portions of walls, of stone, brick, and very hard mortar. The plain below does not now exhibit anything bottom of which they may be seen; but they did not visit this spot.

PHILIPPIANS (phī-līp'pī-anz), (Gr. Φιλιππησίου, fil'ip-pai'see-oi, Philippians), the patrial title of the inhabitants of Philippi (Phil. iv:15).

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE (phī-līp'pī-anz, ē-pīs'tl tōō thē).

1. Authenticity. Of this part of the Apostle Paul's writings the authenticity has never been questioned. Professing to be written by that distinguished servant of Christ, it bears on every part of it the impress of his peculiar style, manner of thought, and form of doctrine; and the internal evidence of authenticity arising from the incidental allusions in it to persons and circumstances is very strong (Horæ Paulinæ c. 7). It is referred to formally and expressly by Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians (sec. 3, sec. 11), besides being repeatedly quoted by him. It is quoted by the churches at Vienne and Lyons, in their letter to the churches in Asia and Phrygia, preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., v. 2); by Irenæus (Cont. Hær., iv, 18, sec. 4); by Clement of Alexandria (Pædag. lib. i, p. 107; Strom., iv, p. 511; Admon. ad Gentes, p. 56); by Tertullian (De Resur. Carnis, c. 23); by Origen (Cont. Cels., lib. iii, p. 122, ed. Spencer; et sapiss.); by Cyprian (Lib. Testim., iii, 39); and by many of the later Fathers.

(1) When Written. From allusions in the epistle itself, it is evident that it was written at Rome during the period of the apostle's two years imprisonment in that city, and in all probability towards the close of that period (i:13, 14, 23, 26; ii:18, 25).

(2) Occasion. It seems to have been composed on the occasion of the return to Philippi of Epaphroditus, a member of the church in that place, who had been deputed to Rome with a pecuniary contribution from the church in aid of the apostle. Full of gratitude for this work of friendly remembrance and regard, Paul addressed to the church in Philippi this epistle, in which, besides expressing his thanks for their kindness, he pours out a flood of eloquence and pathetic exhortation, suggested partly by his own circumstances, and partly by what he had learned of their state as a church. That state appears to have been on the whole very prosperous, as there is much commendation of the Philippians in the epistle, and no censure is expressed in any part of it either of the church as a whole, or of any individuals connected with it.

2. Contents. At the same time the apostle deemed it necessary to put them on their guard against the evil influences to which they were exposed from Judaizing teachers, and false professors of Christianity. These cautions he interposes between the exhortations suggested by his own state and by the news he had received concerning the Philippians, with which his epistle commences and with which it closes.

(1) Part First. We may thus divide the epistle into three parts. In the first of these (i. ii), after the usual salutation and an outpouring of warm-hearted affection towards the Philippian church (i:1-11), the apostle refers to his own condition as a prisoner at Rome; and lest they should be cast down at the thought of the unmerited indignities he had been called upon to suffer, he assures them that these had turned out rather to the furtherance of that great cause on which his heart was set, and for which he was willing to live and labor, though, as respected his personal feelings, he would rather depart and be with Christ, which he deemed to be 'far better' (12-24). He then passes by an easy transition to a hortatory address to the Philippians, calling upon them to maintain steadfastly their profession, to cultivate humanity and brotherly love, to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, and concluding by an appeal to their regard for his reputation as an apostle, which could not but be affected by their conduct, and a reference to his reason for sending to them Epaphroditus instead of Timothy, as he had originally designed (i:25; ii:30).

(2) Part Second. In part second he strenuously cautions them, as already observed, against Judaizing teachers, whom he stigmatizes as 'dogs' (in reference probably to their impudent, snarling, and quarrelsome habits), 'evilworkers,' and 'the concision;' by which latter term he means to intimate, as Theophylact remarks (in loc.), that the circumcision in which the Jews so much gloried had now ceased to possess any spiritual significance, and was therefore no better than a useless mutilation of the person. On this theme he enlarges, making reference to his own standing as a Jew, and intimating, that if under the Christian dispensation Jewish descent and Jewish privileges were to go for anything, no one could have stronger claims on this ground than he; but at the same time declaring that however he had once valued these, he now counted them

'all but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ' (iii:1-12). A reference to his own sanctified ambition to advance in the service of Christ leads him to exhort the Philippians to a similar spirit; from this he passes to caution them against unnecessary contention, and against those who walk disorderly, concluding by reminding them of the glorious hopes which, as Christians, they entertained (ver. 13-21).

(3) Part Third. In the third part we have a series of admonitions to individual members of the church at Philippi (iv:1-3), followed by some general exhortations to cheerfulness, moderation, prayer, and good conduct (ver. 4-9); after which come a series of allusions to the apostle's circumstances and feelings, his thanks to the Philippians for their seasonable aid, and his concluding benedictions and salutations (ver. 10-23).

Heinrichs has advanced the opinion, that of these three parts of this epistle the first belongs to a different composition from the other two (Nov. Test. Koppan, vol. vii. pt. ii. p. 31). It is not worth while to recapitulate his reasonings in support of this notion; they have been fully examined and sufficiently refuted by Krause (An Epist. Pauli ad Phil. in duas Epistolas . . . dispendenda sit? Dis. crit. exeget. Regiom. 1811), and Schott (Isagoge in New Testament sec. 70).

3. Style. This epistle is written throughout in a very animated and elevated style. It is full of the most sublime thoughts and the most affectionate exhortations. It resembles more the production of a father addressing his children than that of an apostle laying down authoritatively what is to be received and followed. The whole of it shows, as Theophylact observes, how very much he loved and estimated those to whom it was addressed. (Proem. in Ep. ad Phil.)

W. L. A.

PHILISTIA (phī-līs'ti-ā), (Heb. פְּלִשְׁתִּים, pel-eh'-sheth, migration), or a land of sojourners.

A poetical Scriptural word for the prose form, "land of the Philistines" (Ps. 1x:8; lxxxvii:4; Is. xiv:29; R. V.). It comprised the southwestern portion of Canaan, which was low and unhealthy in autumn, but fertile. The chief cities were Gaza, Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gath.

PHILISTIM (phī-līs'tim), (Gen. x:14). See PHILISTINES.

PHILISTINES (phī-līs'tines), (Heb. פְּלִשְׁתִּים, pel-ish-teen', 1 Chron. xiv:10; פְּלִשְׁתִּיָּם, pel-ish-tee-yeem', Amos ix:7; comp. the Gr. φιλισταίμω of the Sept.).

(1) Name. A strong tribe southwest of the land of Israel, to which they gave the name פְּלִשְׁתִּים, (pel-eh'-sheth), Παλαιστίνη (pal-acc-tee'nay), Palestine, Palestine.

(2) Country. It occupied only a portion of the southern coast, namely, that which was bounded on the west by the hill country of Ephraim and Judah, and on the south extended from Joppa to the borders of Egypt, thus touching on the Israelite tribes Dan, Simeon, and Judah. Indeed the portions of Simeon and Dan covered a large part of Philistia, but its possession by the Israelites was disputed, and was never entirely achieved. This country was originally held by the Avims, who were destroyed and their land seized by the Caphtorims, coming forth out of Caphtor (Deut. ii:23). In Jer. xlvii:4 the Philistines are denominated 'the remnant of the country (or isle) of Caphtor.' In Amos ix:7, the Divine Being asks,

'Have I not brought the Philistines from Caphtor?' The Caphtorim and the Philistim are also associated together as kindred tribes in the genealogical list of nations given in Gen. x:14, both being descendants of Mizraim. Caphtor has been thought to be Cappadocia. Others hold that the Philistines being a part of the great Semitic family, went westward, under pressure from the wave of population which came down from the higher country to the sea-coast, but afterwards returned eastward, back from Crete to Palestine; so that in Amos. ix:7 it is to be understood that God brought them up to Palestine, as he brought the Israelites out of Egypt—back to their home. But in Gen. x:13, 14, the Philistines are derived from Mizraim, that is, from Egypt. Therefore it has been held that Phœnician invaders were the Hyksos of Egyptian history, whence the Philistines would, in relation to their stay and dominion in Egypt, be spoken of as of Egyptian origin.

(3) History. If now we follow the Biblical accounts we find the history of the Philistines to be in brief as follows. They had established themselves in their land as early as the time of Abraham, when they had founded a kingdom at Gerar (Gen. xxi:32; xxvi:1). When the Israelites left Egypt they were deterred by fear of the power of the Philistines from returning by the shortest road—that which the caravans still take—because it lay through the country of the Philistines (Exod. xiii:17). In the time of Joshua (xiii:3) the Philistines appear in a league of five princes, or governors of so many tribes or petty states—'all the borders of the Philistines from Sihor which is before Egypt even unto the borders of Ekron northward counted to the Canaanites.' Joshua appears to have thought it prudent to attempt nothing for the dispossession of the Philistines, and he therefore had no hostile relations with them, for the division of Philistia among the tribes was nothing more than a prospective but unfulfilled arrangement (Josh. xv:45; xix:43). The days of the Judges, however, brought conflicts between the Israelites and the Philistines, who dwelt wide over the land, and even exercised dominion over their Hebrew neighbors (Judg. iii:31; x:7; xiii:1; xiv:2, 4, 5; xv:11).

In the time of Eli the Philistines succeeded in getting the ark into their possession (1 Sam. iv); but a defeat which they suffered under Samuel put an end to their dominion, after it had lasted forty years (1 Sam. vii). This subjection of the Israelites began after the death of Jair, and continued to the termination of the period embraced in the book of Judges. Within this space of time fall the life and the heroic actions of Samson. Notwithstanding the total defeat which the Philistines had undergone, and the actual termination of their political supremacy, they continued to be troublesome neighbors. 'There was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul' (1 Sam. xiv:52); a conflict which was carried on with various success, and in which the king found great support in the prudent bravery of his son Jonathan and the high courage of David (1 Sam. xiii:4; xiv; xvii:18; xix:8; xxiii:28). Even after his separation from Saul David inflicted many blows on the Philistines (1 Sam. xxiii), but soon saw himself obliged to seek refuge in Gath (1 Sam. xxvii), and was in consequence near making common cause with them against Saul (1 Sam. xxix), who met with his death at their hands while engaged in battle (1 Sam. xxxi).

They also raised their arms against David, when he had become king of all Israel, but were several times beaten by that brave monarch (2 Sam. v:17, sq.; viii:1). 'Mighty men,' performing valorous deeds in imitation of David's rencontre with Goliath, gave the king their support against this brave and persevering enemy (2 Sam. xxiii:8, sq.).

Solomon appears to have been undisturbed by the Philistines, but they had settlements in the land of Israel under the early Ephraimitic kings (1 Kings xv:27; xvi:15). To Jehoshaphat they became tributary (2 Chron. xvii:11).

Under Jehoram, however, they, in union with the Arabians, fell on Jerusalem, and carried off the king's substance, as well as his wives and children (2 Chron. xxi:16).

On the other hand, in the reign of king Jehoash, their city Gath was taken by Hazael, king of Syria, who also threatened Jerusalem (2 Kings xii:17).

But in the time of Ahaz they revolted, and carried with them a part of western Judah, having 'invaded the cities of the low country and of the south of Judah, and taken Bethshemesh and Ajalon,' etc. (2 Chron. xxviii:18; comp. Is. xiv:29).

Hezekiah in the first years of his reign obtained some advantages over them (2 Kings xviii:8). Soon, however, Assyrian armies went against Philistia, and, with a view to an invasion of Egypt, got into their power the strong frontier-fortress of Ashdod (Is. xx:1), which at a later time Psammetichus took from them, after a siege of twenty-nine years (Herod. ii. 157).

In consequence of the hostile relations between Assyria and Egypt, Philistia suffered for a long period, as the troops of the former power took their way through that land, and Pharaoh-Necho captured the stronghold Gaza (Is. xlvii:1). The same was done by Alexander the Great in his expedition to Egypt.

On the destruction of the Jewish state, the Philistines, like other neighboring peoples, acted ill towards the Jews, having 'taken vengeance with a despiteful heart' (Ezek. xxv:15). Many of those who returned from the captivity 'had married wives of Ashdod, and their speech spoke half in the speech of Ashdod' (Neh. xiii:23, sq.).

In the Maccabæan period the Philistines were Syrian subjects, and had at times to suffer at the hands of the Jews (1 Macc. x:86; xi:60, sq.). King Alexander (Balas) gave Jonathan a part of their territory, Accaron, with the borders thereof in possession (1 Macc. x:89).

The Jewish monarch Alexander Jannæus overcame and destroyed Gaza (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 3. 3; De Bell. Jud. i. 4. 2). By Pompey Ænotus, Jammia and Gaza were united to the Roman province of Syria (Antiq. xiv. 4. 4); but Gaza was given by Augustus to King Herod (Antiq. xv. 7. 3).

(4) Cities. The Philistine cities were greatly distinguished. Along the whole coast from north to south there ran a line of towns—in the north the Phœnician, in the south the Philistine—which were powerful, rich and well peopled.

The chief cities of the Philistines were five—Gaza, Ashdod, Askalon, Gath, and Ekron (Josh. xiii:3; Judg. iii:3). Several of these Palestinian cities flourished at the same time; and though now these, now those cities gained at different periods pre-eminence in power, wealth, and population, and though some did not rise till others had declined or perished, yet is it true that from the earliest times till the century after Christ a number of important towns existed on the narrow strip of land which borders the Mediterranean sea, such as was never seen in any other part of the world, the Ionian coast of Asia Minor not excepted.

The greatness of these cities was mainly owing to commerce, for the coast of Palestine was in the earliest ages exclusively in possession of the trade which was carried on between Europe and Asia. Besides a great transit trade, they had internal sources of wealth, being given to agriculture (Judg. xv:5). In the time of Saul they were evidently superior in the arts of life to the Israelites; for we read (1 Sam. xiii:20) that the latter were indebted to the former for the utensils of ordinary life.

(5) Religion. Their religion was not essentially different from that of the Phœnicians. The idol which they most revered was Astarte, the Assyrian Semiramis, or Derketo, who was also honored as Dagon, in a very ancient temple at Askalon and at Gaza, also at Ashdod (Movers, p. 589, sq.; Lengerke, Kanaan, p. 200; Herod. i, 105; Judg. xvi:23; 1 Sam. v:1, sq.; 1 Macc. x:83). This was a species of fish-worship, a remnant of which may still be found in the special care taken of certain holy fish in some parts of Syria (Niebuhr, Reise, ii. 167; Burckhardt, i. 278, 521). In Ekron Baal-zebub had his chief seat. Priests and soothsayers were numerous (1 Sam. vi:2). Their magicians were in repute (Is. ii:6), and the oracle of Baal-zebub was consulted by foreigners (2 Kings i:2). They had the custom of carrying with them in war the images of their gods (2 Sam. v:21). Tradition makes the Philistines the inventors of the bow and arrow.

(6) Present Condition. It is a remarkable fact that the principal towns of Philistia, Gaza, Ashkelon, Joppa, Ashdod, Lachish, and Gath have never once disappeared from history, but exist at the present day under the names of Gazzeh, Askalûn, Yafa, Esdud, Umm Lakis, and Beit Jibrin—that is, Beth-geborim, "the house of the giants." Many other of the modern names also preserve the memory of the old Philistine history and worship. Low mounds at intervals show the sites of former cities. Four and a half miles from Gaza a colossal marble statue has recently been discovered (1879). The total height of the figure is 15 feet. The hair hangs in long ringlets down upon the shoulders, and the beard is long, indicating a man of venerable age. The right arm is broken in half, while the left arm is crossed over the breast to the right shoulder, the hand being hidden by the drapery of a cloth covering the shoulders. There is no inscription on the figure or the pedestal, which is a huge block carved in one piece with the figure. The statue was found in a recumbent position, buried in the sand, on the top of a hill near the sea. It had evidently been removed from its original site, which is unknown. Its estimated weight is 12,000 pounds. Licut. Conder thinks it is the statue of Marnas (the Cretan Jupiter), the god of Gaza, which once stood in the principal temple of Gaza, but which had been buried, perhaps at the time of the destruction of the temple, by Porphyrius (A. D. 406). (See Palestine Exploration Fund's Quarterly Statement for January, 1880.)

The inhabitants are a race distinct from the rest of the inhabitants of Palestine, and it has been suggested that the fellahin, or peasantry, are of Canaanite origin, though no doubt a mixed race as now constituted. Schaff, Bib. Dict.

PHILOLOGUS (φιλόλογος), (Gr. φιλόλογος, fil-o'log-os, fond of talk).

One of the Christians at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi:15). Dorotheus makes him one of the seventy disciples, and alleges that he was placed by the apostle Andrew as bishop of Sinope, in Pontus. But this seems altogether improbable. (A. D. 55.)

PHILOSOPHY (φιλοσοφία, fil-os-of-ee'ah, love of wisdom), used by the Greeks to denote skill in, or zeal for, any art or science or any branch of knowledge.

During his visit to Athens, St. Paul was encountered by certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics (Acts xvii:18), the two great moral schools of Greek philosophy. This is the only instance related in the New Testament of an encounter between Christianity and Western speculation. But Eastern speculation, in many ways and under many forms, tried from the earliest times to penetrate into the mysteries of Christianity, and in the philosophy against which Paul warned the Colossians (Col. ii:8 et seq.), we recognize not only an outgrowth of Eastern speculation, but the prototype of that fantastic mysticism which afterward played so conspicuous a part in the history of the Eastern Church under the name of Gnosticism (comp. 1 Tim. vi:20). Schaff, Bib. Dict.

1. Value of Knowledge of Greek Philosophy. In the articles on Gnosticism and Logos it has been shown that a knowledge of Greek philosophy throws light on one of the most recondite doctrines of Christianity, bringing us acquainted with expressions and opinions current throughout the civilized world during the rise and progress of Christianity, and showing how these modes of expression came to be adopted by the first converts to Christianity, and afterwards to be employed by St. John in his Gospel. Indeed, if a knowledge of the sacrificial language of the Jews throws light upon Christ's mission, in so far as its object was to put an end to the numerous sacrifices and ceremonial ministrations of the Jewish priesthood, it is not less evident that a knowledge of the philosophical language of the Greeks will throw light upon the first use amongst the Christian converts, and upon the subsequent adoption by St. John into his Gospel, and by St. Paul into his Epistles, of the remarkable language employed to describe the mission and the nature of Christ. But not only may a knowledge of ancient learning, and more especially of ancient philosophy, supply valuable assistance for the better understanding of Christian doctrines; but we may derive from such knowledge the fullest and clearest proofs of the benefit conferred by Christianity on the progress of principle and civilization: and we may add, that we have a direct warrant from St. Paul to employ ancient learning, and more especially Greek philosophy, in rendering to the Christian religion the services we have specified.

2. St. Paul's Denunciation of Moral Evils.

(1) Vices and Crimes. Perhaps there does not occur in the Christian record a more striking and important passage than that which we shall quote from the Epistle to the Romans: that Epistle which, for its general and paramount interest (being equally addressed to Gentile, Jew, and Christian), has been placed first of the Epistles. Indeed, the Epistle to the Romans proves, by the plainest facts, that Christianity was absolutely necessary for the removal of the most intolerable evils that ever oppressed the world. The Apostle of the Gentiles, having in the opening chapter given a fearful picture of the vices and crimes of Rome, the truth of which is fully established by the writings of Tacitus and Suetonius, Martial and the Roman satirists (and in the next chapter, ii:17, he charges the same neglect of moral duty, under pretense of a sounder faith, upon the Jews), proceeds to address Gentile and Jew in a strain of manly and noble eloquence, which, if we estimate the magnitude of the interests, individual and domestic, private and public, religious, moral, and political, which then depended and still depends on the understanding and reception of Christianity in its truth and power, must be allowed to leave every other example of reasoning and eloquence far behind it. The words of St. Paul, following his exposure of the wickedness of Rome (of heathen vices as the direct consequences of heathen superstitions) are contained in Rom. i:21, 24-26, 28, 29, etc.

(2) Necessity of Religious Change. In the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, the necessity of a great religious change, preparatory to a great moral change—a change of faith and worship, preparatory to a change in principles and conduct—is fully and plainly made out. The Apostle to the Gentiles was about to build upon the Jewish Scriptures, but for the edification of the whole world, a purer faith and a more reasonable service than Jew or Gentile had yet known. The moral ruin of the Jewish temple had already taken place.—‘Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast of God; and knowest his will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law; and art confident that thou thyself art a guide to the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes; which hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law. Thou, therefore, which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preachest, A man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest, A man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God?’ (Rom. ii:21). On the other hand, the ruins of Gentile temples, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman, still witness the truth of St. Paul’s words to the same effect.—‘When they knew God, they glorified him not as God, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness.’

In the Epistle to the Romans, it is the object of St. Paul to prove, both to Jew and Gentile, that the moral world, though it had the law of Moses and the philosophy of Greece, was so sunk in superstition, sin, and crime, that the whole body of society was corrupt, and that there was not a hope of cure till the sources of corruption, whether in the pharisaical observances of the Jew, or in the profligate superstitions of the Gentile, were superseded by a purer faith and a sounder worship. St. Paul contends that neither the law of Moses, nor the philosophy of Greece, was able to raise Jew or Gentile from the bondage of sin and death; and he challenges the religious and the moral, and, we may add, the political facts of those times, to prove the truth of his assertion. His object was not to depreciate either the Mosaic law or the Greek philosophy, the authority of the one, or the morality of the other, but to show that so long as the pharisaical observances of the Jew, and the profligate superstitions of the Gentile, remained in force, neither religion nor philosophy could prevent the world from sinking deeper and deeper into pollution. The Apostle of the Gentiles allows that ‘they knew God,’ but he contends that ‘they glorified Him not as God;’ and, therefore, he asserts, ‘God gave them up to lasciviousness; he allows, that some amongst them though they had not the law, did by nature the things contained in the law;’ but he contends that the principles and conduct of such men were but an oasis in the midst of a howling wilderness, for that the mass of men were given up ‘to vile affections.’

(3) Speculative Knowledge of God. It is impossible to deny that in the Greek philosophy we find the rise and progress of a speculative knowledge of God of no common character or measure; but it is just as impossible to deny that though the nations, amongst which a few such burning and shining lights had arisen, might be said ‘to know God,’ it was notorious that ‘they glorified Him not as God.’ It is by following out St. Paul’s argument, and by examining the truth of his statements, that we feel all the necessity of an abolition of heathen superstitions, and the establishing of a better faith, before sound principles and right conduct could be understood and practiced by the mass of mankind, though they had been conceived by a few philosophers.

(4) Necessity of Change in Faith and Worship. If to this evidence of the necessity of a change of faith and worship for the salvation of the ancient world, proving that without such change the religious, and moral, and political reformations which were required, were quite unattainable,—if, to this evidence, we add proofs of the religious, moral, and political reformation which Christianity actually introduced,—and if, to this two-fold evidence respecting the necessity of a change of faith, and the efficacy of the change to Christianity, we add the evidence of the actual effects of Christianity in our own times, freedom to the slave, knowledge to the ignorant, and civilization to the heathen (for though these benefits have been wrought by politicians, it has been in compliance with a motive and a zeal which assuredly were not supplied by worldly wisdom or worldly justice).—and if, to this three-fold evidence, we add present indications, that still higher religious, and moral, and political effects will be wrought out by Christianity—we have in this four-fold evidence a body of proof respecting the usefulness of Christianity exactly fitted for the wants of the time. PHINEHAS (phīn’e-has), (Heb. פִּינְחָס, pe-nekh-aws', mouth of brass).

1. A son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron the high priest. An incident which illustrates the zealous and somewhat passionate character of Phinehas occurred before the Israelites entered the Promised Land. The Israelites were encamped in the plains of Moab, and were lamenting the sin into which they had been seduced by the Midianites, when a prince of Judah named Zimri was beheld conducting a woman of Midian named Cozbi to his tent. The licentious effrontery of this act kindled the wrath of Phinehas, who hastened after them into the tent, and transfixing them both with his javelin (Num.

xxv:7, sq.). (B. C. 1619.) This bold act pointed out Phinehas to Moses as a proper person to accompany as priest the expedition which was immediately after sent forth, under the command of Joshua, against the Midianites, and by which the cause of the deluded Israelites was abundantly avenged (Num. xxxi:6, sq.). After the conquest of the Promised Land, when the warriors of the two and half tribes beyond the Jordan were permitted to return to their homes, Phinehas was at the head of the deputation sent after them to inquire and remonstrate concerning the altar which, on their way, they had set up on the bank of the Jordan; and it was he doubtless who pronounced the forcible address to the supposed offenders. He was certainly the first to express his satisfaction and joy at the explanation which was given, and which, with a lightened heart, he bore back to the tribes assembled at Shiloh (Josh. xxii:5, sq.).

It appears that while his father lived Phinehas filled the post of superintendent or chief of the Levites, probably after Eleazar became high priest (Num. iii:32; 1 Chron. ix:20). At the death of his father, he succeeded to the pontificate (Josh. xxiv:33); but the only case in which he appears officially in the Bible is in connection with the unhappy circumstances recorded at the end of the book of Judges, in which he comes forward as high priest to consult Jehovah. This mention of his name enables us to conclude that the chronological place of these occurrences would be rather towards the beginning than at the latter end of the book in which they are found. (See JUDGES; PRIEST, HEBREW PRIESTHOOD.)

2. A Levite, father of the Eleazar who aided Meremoth in weighing the sacred vessels of the Temple (Ezra viii:2). (B. C. before 458.)

3. The son of Eli the high priest, and brother of Hophni (1 Sam. i:3; ii:34; iv:11, 19-22; xiv:3). (B. C. 1125.) (See ELI; HOPHNI; SAMUEL.)

PHLEGON (phlĕ'gon), (Gr. Φλέγων, fleg'one, burning), one of the Christians of Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi:14). The legend (ap. Doretheus) makes him to have been one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Marathon. (A. D. 55.)

PHŒBE (fĕ'be), (Gr. Φοβη, foy'bay, radiant), a deaconess of the church in the eastern port of Corinth, Cenchrea.

It is most likely, from what the apostle says of Phœbe, that "she had been a succorer of many, and of myself also" (Rom. xvi:1, 2), that she was a woman of property, not to say of distinction. Cenchrea was a port of considerable commerce; and as it is clear that Phœbe went to Rome on important business in which the faithful at Rome might assist her, it is probable also, that she was engaged in trade on her own account; something like Lydia of Philippi. That she was much in the confidence of the apostles cannot be doubted; and, we think, from the import of the term rendered succorer (patroness), she may be taken for the counterpart of the hospitable Gaius, "mine host (says St. Paul), and the host of the whole church." (A. D. 55.)

PHENICE (phĕ'nise). See PHENICE.

PHENICIA AND THE PHENICIANS (fĕ-nĭsh-a and the fĕ-nĭsh-anz).

(1) Name. The Greeks called those merchants who came from that coast of the Mediterranean Sea which runs parallel with Mount Lebanon, Φοινικες, foy'nee-keh's. This name probably arose from the circumstance that the chief article of the commerce of these merchants was φουόβς, purple.

The name "Phœnicia" does not occur in the Old Testament; in the New Testament it appears once as "Phœnicia" and twice as "Phenice" (Acts xxi:2; xi:19; xv:3). There are numerous prophecies in the Old Testament, however, concerning the overthrow of cities in this country, which have been signally fulfilled. (See TYRE AND SIDON.)

(2) Country. The country inhabited by the Phœnicians was called by the Greeks foy'nee'-kay, Φοινίκη, and by the Romans Phœnicæ. In Cicero (De Fin. iv. 20) there occurs the doubtful reading Phœnicia. (Compare the Vulgate in Num. xxxiii:51.) However, this latter form of the name has come into general use.

This name was used by the ancients sometimes in a wider, sometimes in a narrower sense. Phœnicia, in its widest signification, embraces the whole coast of the Mediterranean situated between the river Orontes and Pelusium (comp. Strabo xvi p. 754, sq.). When Ptolemæus and Strabo speak of Phœnicia in a more restricted sense, they mention the river Eleutheros as the northern boundary; and Ptolemæus states also that Dora, situated to the south of the promontory Carmel, and north of the river Chorseus, was the most southern of the maritime towns of Phœnicia.

Phœnicia is situated between about lat. 33° and 35° N., and under long. 33° E. The whole of Phœnicia is situated at the western declivity of Mount Lebanon. (Compare the article LIBANUS OR LEBANON.)

(3) Vegetable Productions. Phœnicia was distinguished by the variety of its vegetable productions. This variety was occasioned by the great diversity of climate produced by the diversity in the elevation of the soil. The Lebanon is said to bear winter on its head, spring on its shoulders, autumn in its lap, and to have summer at its feet. The fertility of Phœnicia is increased by the numerous streams whose springs are in Mount Lebanon. Even in the Song of Solomon we read the praises of the spring of living waters which flows down from Lebanon. The dense population assembled in the great mercantile towns greatly contributed to augment by artificial means the natural fertility of the soil.

The population of the country is at present very much reduced, but there are still found aqueducts and artificial vineyards formed of mold carried up to the terraces of the naked rock. Ammianus Marcellinus says, Phœnicæ regio plena gratiarum et venustatis, urbibus decorata magnis et pulchris—Phœnicia is a charming and beautiful country, adorned with large and elegant cities.

Even now this country is among the most fertile in Western Asia. It produces wheat, rye, and barley, and, besides the more ordinary fruits, also apricots, peaches, pomegranates, almonds, citrons, oranges, figs, dates, sugar-cane, and grapes, which furnish an excellent wine. In addition to these products, it yields cotton, silk, and tobacco. The country is also adorned by the variegated flowers of oleander and cactus.

The higher regions are distinguished from the bare mountains of Palestine by being covered with oaks, pines, cypress trees, acacias, and tamarisks; and above all by majestic cedars, of which there are still a few very old trees, whose stems measure from thirty to forty feet in circumference. The inhabitants of Sur still carry on a profitable traffic with the produce of Mt. Lebanon, namely, wood and charcoal.

(4) Animal Productions. Phœnicia produces also flocks of sheep and goats; and innumerable swarms of bees supply excellent honey. In the forests there are bears, wolves, panthers, and jackals. The sea furnishes great quantities of fish, so that Sidon, the most ancient among the Phœnician towns, derived its name from fishing. Concerning the natural geography of Phœnicia, compare especially the works of Forbiger, Raumer, and Robinson; also Winer, vol. ii. p. 30.

(5) Inhabitants. The inhabitants of Phœnicia might at the first view appear to have derived their origin from the same source (pre-Abrahamite) as the Hebrews, for they spoke the same language.

In the Old Testament the Phœnicians and Canaanites are, however, described as descending, not from Shem, but from Ham. Herodotus, also, on the authority of some Persian historians, states that the Phœnicians came as colonists to the Syrian coasts from the Erythræan Sea. The first Phœnician colony was Sidon, which is therefore called in Genesis (x:15) the first-born of Canaan. But soon other colonies arose, like Arka (Gen. x:17), Aradus, and Smyrna (Gen. x:18), etc., whose power extended beyond the Jordan, and who drove out before them the earlier inhabitants of Palestine. Hence it arose that the appellation, 'the land of Canaan,' was transferred to the whole of Palestine, although it is by no means a country of a low level, but is full of high elevations. However, the Canaanites, in a stricter sense, were the people who resided in the lower regions along the coast, and on the banks of the Jordan.

When the Israelites conquered the country, the Canaanites on the Phœnician coast, who resided in powerful maritime towns, preserved their independence, and were called Canaanites in particular. Thus we read, in Is. xxiii:11, the term Canaan, in the signification of Phœnicia. The same word has also this meaning in the inscriptions on the Phœnician coins. In the Septuagint the Hebrew word is frequently translated foi-nix, Φοινίξ. In Job xl:30, A. V. xli:6, the Hebrew word means a merchant, because the Phœnicians were the most important of all mercantile nations.

The Carthaginians, as Phœnician colonists, maintained, even in the days of St. Augustine, that they were Canaanites.

(6) Cities. During the period of the conquest of Canaan (see CANAAN), by the Israelites, the Phœnicians possessed the following towns, which we will enumerate successively, in the direction from south to north:—Dora (Josh. xi:2; xvii:11, sq.); Ptolemais (Judg. i:33); Ecdippa (Josh. xix:29); Tyre (Josh. xix:29); Sarepta (1 Kings xvii:9, sq.; Luke iv:26); Sidon (Gen. x:15); Berytus (Ezek. xlvi:16; 2 Sam. viii:8); Byblus (Josh. xiii:5); Tripolis, Simyra (Gen. x:18); Arka (Gen. x:17); Simna (Gen. x:17); Aradus (Gen. x:18). Compare the respective articles on these towns. Sidon is the only Phœnician town mentioned in Homer (see Iliad, vi. 239; xxiii. 743; Odys. xv. 415; xvii. 424). Heeren, in his work, On the Commerce and Politics of the Ancients, vol. i. part ii. p. 9, Göttingen, 1824, justly observes that the numerous towns which were crowded together in the narrow space of Phœnicia covered almost the entire coast, and, together with their harbors and fleets, must have presented an aspect which has scarcely ever been equaled, and which was calculated to impress every stranger on his arrival with an idea of wealth, power, and enterprise.

(7) Commerce. As the annals and public documents of the Phœnicians have all been lost, our knowledge of their history is consequently confined to occasional notices in the Hebrew and classical authors of antiquity. This deficiency of historical information arises also from the circumstance that the facts of Phœnician history were less connected than the events in the history of other nations. The Phœnicians never formed one compact body politic, and consequently did not always gradually advance in their political constitution and in the extent of their power. Every town endeavored to advance its commerce in its own way. Thus there constantly entered into the life of the Phœnicians new elements, which disturbed a gradual historical progress. Phœnicia was a country favorable to the growth of maritime towns, but did not afford room for great political events. The history of the Phœnicians is that of their external commerce.

A mercantile nation cannot bear despotic government, because the greatest external liberty is requisite in order constantly to discover new sources of gain, and to enlarge the roads of commerce. The whole of Phœnicia consisted of the territories belonging to the various towns. Each of these territories had its own constitution, and in most of them a king exercised supreme power. We hear of kings of Sidon, Tyre, Aradus, and Byblus.

It seems that after Nebuchadnezzar had besieged Tyre in vain, the royal dignity ceased for some time, and that there existed a kind of republican administration, under suffetes or judges. The regal power was always limited by the magistracy and the priesthood. The independent Phœnician states seem to have formed a confederation, at the head of which stood for some time Sidon, and at a later period Tyre. (See TYRE.) Tripolis was built conjointly by the various states in order to form the seat of their congress. The smaller states were sometimes so much oppressed by Tyre, that they preferred rather to submit to external enemies.

The position of Phœnicia was most favorable for the exchange of the produce of the East and West. The Libanus furnished excellent timber for ships. Corn was imported from Palestine. Persians, Lydians, and Lycians frequently served as mercenaries in the Phœnician armies (Ezek. xxvii:10, 11). Phœnicia exported wine to Egypt (Herod. iii:5, 6). Purple garments were best manufactured in Tyre. Glass was made in Sidon and Sarepta.

In Phœnicia was exchanged the produce of all known countries. After David had vanquished the Edomites and conquered the coasts of the Red Sea, King Hiram of Tyre entered into a confederacy with Solomon, by which he ensured for his people the right of navigation to India. The combined fleet of the Israelites and Phœnicians sailed from the seaports of Ezion-geber and Elath. These ports were situated on the eastern branch of the Red Sea, the Sinus Ælaniticus, or Gulf of Akaba. Israelitish-Phœnician mercantile expeditions proceeded to Ophir, perhaps Abhira, situated at the mouth of the Indus.

It seems, however, that the Indian coasts in general were also called Ophir. Three years were required in order to accomplish a mercantile expedition to Ophir and to return with cargoes of gold, albug-wood, ivory, silver, monkeys, peacocks, and other Indian produce. Some names of these products are Indian transferred into Hebrew, as almuggim; Sanscrit valgu, or, according to the Decanic pronunciation, valgum; shen-habbim (ivory); Sanscrit ibha; kokh (ape); Sanscrit kapi; tukkiyim (peacock); Sanskrit cikki, ac-ording to the Decanic pronunciation (compare 1 Kings ix:27; x:11, 22). (See COMMERCE; OPHIR.)

It seems, however, that these mercantile expeditions to India were soon given up, probably on account of the great difficulty of navigating the Red Sea. King Jehoshaphat endeavored to recommence these expeditions, but his fleet was wrecked at Ezion-geber (1 Kings xxii:49). About B. C. 616 or 601, Phœnician seamen undertook, at the command of Pharaoh-Necho, a voyage of discovery, proceeding from the Red Sea round Africa, and returning after two years through the columns of Hercules to Egypt (Herod. iv, 42). The 27th chapter of Ezekiel mentions the commerce by land between India and Phœnicia.

The names of mercantile establishments on the coasts of Arabia along the Persian Gulf have partly been preserved to the present day. In these places the Phœnicians exchanged the produce of the west for that of India, Arabia, and Ethiopia. Arabia especially furnished incense, gold, and precious stones. The Midianites (Gen. xxxvii:28) and the Edomites (Ezek. xxvii:16) effected the transit by their caravans. The fortified Idumæan town Petra contained probably the storehouses in which the produce of southern countries was collected. From Egypt the Phœnicians exported especially byssus (Ezek. xxvii:7) for wine. According to an ancient tradition, the tyrant of Thebes, Busiris, having soiled his hands with the blood of all foreigners, was killed by the Tyrian Hercules. This indicates that Phœnician colonists established themselves and their civilization successfully in Upper Egypt, where all strangers usually had been persecuted.

At a later period Memphis was a place where most of the Phœnicians in Egypt were established. Phœnician inscriptions found in Egypt prove that even under the Ptolemies the intimate connection between Phœnicia and Egypt still existed.

From Palestine the Phœnicians imported, besides wheat, especially from Judæa, ivory, oil, and balm; also wool, principally from the neighboring nomadic Arabs. Damascus furnished wine (Ezek. xxvii:5, 6, 17, 18, 21), and the mountains of Syria wood. The tribes about the shores of the Caspian Sea furnished slaves and iron: for instance, the Tibareans (Tubal), and Moschi (Meshech). Horsemen, horses, and mules came from the Armenians (Togarmah).

The treasures of the East were exported from Phœnicia by ships which sailed first to Cyprus, the mountains of which are visible from the Phœnician coast. Citium was a Phœnician colony in Cyprus, the name of which was transferred to the whole of Cyprus, and even to some neighboring islands and coasts (Gen. x:4; Is. xxiii:1, 12). Cyprus was subject to Tyre up to the time of Alexander the Great. There are still found Phœnician inscriptions which prove the connection of Cyprus with Tyre. At Rhodes also are found vestiges of Phœnician influence. From Rhodes the mountains of Crete are visible. This was of great importance for the direction of navigators, before the discovery of the compass. In Crete, and also in the Cycladic Isles, are vestiges of Phœnician settlements. On the Isle of Thasos, on the southern coast of Thrace, the Phœnicians had gold mines; and even on the southern shores of the Black Sea, they had factories. However, when the Greeks became more powerful, the Phœnicians sailed more in other directions. They occupied also Sicily and the neighboring islands, but were, after the Greek colonization, confined to a few towns, Motya, Soloes, Panormus (Thuc. vi. 2). The Phœnician mercantile establishments in Sardinia and the Balearic Isles could scarcely be called colonies.

Carthage was a Phœnician colony, which probably soon became important by commerce with the interior of Africa, and remained connected with Tyre by means of a common religion. After Phœnicia had been vanquished by the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, the settlements in Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain came into the power of Carthage. The Phœnicians had for a long period exported from Spain gold, silver, tin, iron, lead (Ezek. xxxviii:13), fruit, wine, oil, wax, fish, and wool. Their chief settlement was Tarshish, which means subjection.

There are other names of towns in Spain which have a Phœnician derivation: Gades and Malaga, on account of much salt fish thence exported. The voyage to Tarshish was the most important of those undertaken by the Phœnicians. Hence it was that their largest vessels were all called ships of Tarshish, although they sailed in other directions (1 Kings x:22).

It appears, also, that the Phœnicians exported tin from the British Isles, and amber from the coasts of Prussia. Their voyages on the western coasts of Africa seem to have been merely voyages of discovery, without permanent results. The Spanish colonies were, probably, the principal sources of Phœnician wealth, and were founded at a very remote period. The migration of the Phœnician, Cadmus, into Bœotia, likewise belongs to the earlier period of Phœnician colonization. Phœnicia flourished most in the period from David to Cyrus (B. C. 1050-550).

(8) Colonies. In this period were founded the African colonies, Carthage, Utica, and Leptis. These colonies kept up a frequent intercourse with the mother country, but were not politically dependent. This preserved Phœnicia from the usual stagnation of Oriental states. The civilization of the Phœnicians had a great influence upon other nations. Their voyages are described in Greek mythology as the expeditions of the Tyrian Hercules. The course of the Tyrian Hercules was not marked like that of other conquerors—viz. Medes and Assyrians—by ruined cities, and devastated countries, but by flourishing colonies, by agriculture, and the arts of peace.

(9) Religion. According to the Phœnician religion the special object of worship was the vital power in nature, which is either producing or destroying. The productive power of nature, again, is either procreative, masculine, or receptive, feminine. These fundamental ideas are represented by the Phœnician gods, who appear under a great variety of names, because these leading ideas may be represented in many different ways.

We need not here enter into details concerning the Phœnician gods, as the principal of them have been noticed under their names. (See BAAL; ASHTORETH.) It suffices to state generally, that the procreative principle was worshiped as Baal, lord, and as the sun. The rays of the sun are, however, not only procreative, but destructive; and this destructive power is especially represented in the Ammonitish fire-god Moloch. Thus Baal represented both the generative and the destructive principles of nature; in which latter capacity the Hebrews worshiped him by human sacrifice (1 Kings xviii:28; Jer. xix:5). He was the tutelary god of Tyre, and hence had the name of Melkar, equivalent to Melech-kereth, 'king of the city,' whom the Greeks called the Tyrian Hercules.

Of Baaltis or Astarte, which are usually identified, although they seem to have been originally different, we shall here add nothing to what has been already stated under ASHTORETH.

Besides these principal deities, the Phœnicians worshiped seven kabirim, mighty ones, whose numbers corresponded with the seven planets. These kabirim were considered as protectors of men in using the powers of nature, especially navigation. With these seven kabirim was associated Esmun (the eighth), representing the sky full of fixed stars, surrounding the seven planets, the refreshing air and the warmth of life. Many Phœnician names are compounded with Esmun. Hence we infer that he was frequently worshiped (comp. Gen. Mon. Phœn. p. 136, sq.). G. B.

(10) Present Condition. Phœnicia is now a land of ruins, the whole shore from the "Ladder of Tyre" northward, according to Porter, being strewn with them. "Heaps of hewn stones and quantities of marble tesserae lay in my path, while broken shafts and mounds of rubbish were seen to the right and left, here crowning a cliff, there washed by the waves. One thing I specially noticed: from the time I left Achzib till I reached the fountains (of Tyre) I did not see a human being; a mournful and solitary silence reigns along Phœnicia's coast." (Giant Cities, p. 277.) Stanley writes in a similar strain: "There is one point of view in which this whole coast is specially remarkable. 'A mournful and solitary silence now prevails along the shore which once resounded with the world's debate.' This sentence, with which Gibbon solemnly closes his chapter on the Crusades, well sums up the general impression still left by the six days' ride from Beirut to Ascalon; and it is no matter of surprise that in this impression travelers have felt a response to the strains in which Isaiah and Ezekiel foretold the desolation of Tyre and Sidon. In one sense, and that the highest, this feeling is just. The Phœnician power which the prophets denounced has entirely perished." (Sinai and Palestine, p. 266.)

PHRAT (phrát). See EUPHRATES.

PHRYGIA (phrýj'i-à), (Gr. Φρυγία, fröog-ee'ah, barren, parched), was the largest kingdom of Asia Minor; it had Bithynia north, Pisidia and Lycia south, Galatia and Cappadocia east, and Lydia and Mysia west. Christianity was planted in this country by Paul (Acts xvi:6; xviii:23).

Jews from Phrygia were present in Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost (Acts ii:10). The cities Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossæ mentioned in the New Testament belonged to Phrygia, as well as Antioch of Pisidia. (See Smith, Dict. of Classical Geog.)

PHURAH (phū'rah), (Heb. פֹּוֹרָה, phoo-raw', bough). A servant who accompanied Gideon, when he went by night as a spy to the camp of the Midianites (Judg. vii.10-11). (B. C. 1362.)

PHURIM (phū'rim), (Esth. xi:1). See PURIM.

PHUT (phüt), (Heb. פֹּוֹת, photh, bow).

A son of Ham (Gen. x:6), progenitor of an African people of the same name, sometimes rendered 'Libya' (Jer. xlvi:9; Ezek. xxvii:10; xxx:5; xxxviii:5; Nah. iii:9).

PHUVAH (phū'vah), (Heb. פֹּוֹהַב, phoo-vaw', mouth, blast). The second son of Issachar (Gen. xli:13). (B. C. 1900.) The name is PUA (A. V. Num. xxvi:23), and PUAH (1 Chron. vii:1). The descendants of Phurah were called Punites (Num. xxvi:23).

PHYGELLUS (phÿ-jël'lus), (Gr. Φύγελλος, foog'-el-los, a fugitive), a Christian of Asia, who, being at Rome while St. Paul was there in prison (A. D. 64), forsook him with Hermogenes, in his necessity (2 Tim. i:15).

It is not certain whether this forsaking of the apostle was accompanied with a declension from the faith or not. Phygellus may have left (see 2 Tim. iv:16) the apostle at some critical time when his support was expected; or he may have been a leader of some party of nominal Christians at Rome, such as the apostle describes at an earlier period (Phil. i:15, 16) opposing him there (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

PHYLACTERY (fi-läk'tēr-y).

(1) Name. (Gr. φυλακτήριον, foo-lak-tay'ree-on, a station for a guard; in Rabbinical Hebrew פְּתִילֵי, tep-ee-leen', prayer fillets).

(2) Form and Use. The Phylactery was a piece of parchment inscribed with particular passages of Scripture (Deut. vi:4-9; xi:13-21; Exod. xiii:1-10, 11-16). They were folded up and enclosed in a small leather box, generally one and a half inches square, and worn upon the forehead nearly between the eyes, or upon the left arm near to the heart, being attached by straps of leather (Joseph. Antiq. iv. 8, 13; Hieron. in Ezek. xxiv:17). They were considered as thus reminding the wearers to fulfill the law with the head and heart, and they were also regarded as amulets, protecting the wearer from the powers of evil, specially demons (Targ. in Cant. viii:3). On this notion was founded the Greek name of φυλακτήριον, which means a 'safeguard.'

These appendages were used during the stated prayers, and only by men. The whole observance is founded on the authority of the texts which are written on the strips of parchment, as Exod. xiii:16: 'It shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets (bands, fillets) between thine eyes,' which, although in all probability only figurative expressions, have been literally understood, and acted upon by the Jews since the Exile. In existing usage the skin employed in making the phylacteries is prepared with much care, and the writing traced with minute accuracy and neatness. The Hebrew ritualists give very exact and numerous directions on this subject, which are required to be closely observed. The case itself is composed of several layers of parchment or of black calf-skin. The phylacteries for the head have four cavities, in each of which is put one of the four texts to which we have referred; but the phylacteries for the arm have only one cavity, containing the same texts all written on one slip of parchment. Lightfoot thinks it not unlikely that our Savior himself wore the Jewish tephelin or phylacteries, as well as the zizith or fringes, according to the custom of his nation; and that in Matt. xxiii:5, our Lord condemns not the wearing of them, but the pride and hypocrisy of the Pharisees in making them broad and visible; to obtain respect and reputation for wisdom and piety. (Townley, Reasons for the Laws of Moses, p. 250.)
