FABLE (fā'b'l), (Gr. μῦθος, moo'thos; Lat. fabula) parable.

Fable is a form of narrative in which plants and animals, or even lifeless objects, are represented as endowed with some of the attributes of man, as the gift of speech and rational action. Sometimes the fable is designed to teach moral and practical truths, and sometimes only to interest and entertain. Neander, Life of Christ, thus distinguishes between the parable and fable: "The parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that in the latter qualities or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower, e. g., those of men to brutes; while in the former the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race."

To illustrate: What the fable relates is not real and cannot occur, as trees speaking (Judg. ix: 8); while that which the parable relates may and does take place, as the sower sowing seed in soil of various degrees of productiveness (Matt. xiii: 3). The fable was often used in ancient heathen as in modern Christian literature. In the Bible there is only one fable (Judg. ix:7-15), where Jotham represents the trees as seeking a king and asking, one by one, the olive and others to reign over them, till the bramble finally consents. This is often erroneously called a parable.

Fables are referred to in the New Testament as inventions, falsehoods (2 Pet. i:16); and in 1 Tim. i:4, etc., as "cunningly devised" or foolish systems and opinions.

FACE (fās), (Heb. פָּנִים, pa-w-neem').

(1) Face, in Scripture, is often used to denote presence in the general sense, and, when applied to the Almighty, denotes such a complete manifestation of the divine presence, by sound or sight, as was equivalent, in the vividness of the impression, to the seeing of a fellow-creature 'face to face.' The 'face of God' therefore denotes in Scripture any thing or manner by which God is wont to manifest himself to man. Thus, when it is said that Adam and Eve hid themselves from 'the face of Jehovah,' we understand that they hid themselves from his presence, however manifested; for pa-neem not only signifies presence, as well as (literally) face, but is the very word for presence, however manifested. There is no other word to denote presence in the Hebrew language. Whenever 'presence' occurs in our translation, the word in the original is the same which is rendered 'face' in other places.

(2) It was a very ancient and common opinion that our mortal frame could not survive the more sensible manifestations of the Divine presence, or 'see God face to face and live' (Gen. xxxii:30), hence, in this passage, the gratitude and astonishment of Jacob that he still lived after God had manifested himself to him more sensibly than by dreams and visions. This impression was confirmed to Moses, who was told, 'Thou canst not see my face: no man can see my face and live' (Exod. xxxiii:20); which clearly signifies that no one can in this present state of being endure the view of that glory which belongs to Him (1 Cor. xiii:12; 1 Pet. iii:12; Rev. xxii:4).

(3) The physical manifestations of the Divine presence appear to have been made through the Angel of whom it is said "My name is in him" (Exod. xxiii:21; xiv:19). We are to bear in mind that God is usually represented to us in Scripture under a human form; and it is indeed difficult for even more spiritualized minds than those of the Hebrews to conceive of Him apart from the form and attributes of the highest nature actually known to us. The Scripture sanctions this concession to the weakness of our intellect, and hence arise the anthropomorphous phrases which speak of the face, the eyes, the arm of God. The appearances of the angels in the Old Testament times were generally in the human form (Judg. xiii:6, etc); and from this cause alone it would have been natural, in the imagination, to transfer the form of the messengers to Him by whom they were sent. (See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.)

(4) God's "face" is used to express his favor and love, and the gracious displays thereof; this is always meant when his face is said to "shine," or it is represented as a mercy to behold and enjoy it or a misery to be deprived of it (2 Chron. xxx:9; Ps. xxxi:16; lxxx:7; Dan. ix:17).

It is used also to denote wrath, and the providential display thereof (Ps. xxxiv:16).

(5) Christ's "face" denotes: (1) His person and office as the image of the invisible God (2 Cor. iv:6). (2) His gracious, glorious, or terrible appearances (Rev. xx:11).

FACES, BREAD OF (fās'ēz, brēd ðv), is the shewbread which was always in the presence of God. (See SHEKINAH.)

FAIN (fān), (Gr. ἐπιθυμέω, ep-ee-thoo-meh'o, from θυμέω, to breathe hard), to be earnest longings, hence to set the heart upon, desire (Luke xv:16).

It thus properly means glad or gladly, as John xii:21; Tyndale, "We wolde layne se Jesus." But the commonest meaning has always been 'glad under the circumstances,' and that is its meaning in A. V.; Job xxvii:22 'he would fain flee out of his hand.' (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

FAIR (fār), (Heb. טָהוֹר, tau'hore, Zech. iii:5), pure; clean in a physical, ceremonial or moral sense.

It also is used for beautiful (Acts vii:20) and for plausible (Gal. vi:12).

FAIR HAVENS (fār hā'v'nz), (Gr. Καλοί Λιμένες, kal-oy' lee-men'es, good harbors), a harbor or roadstead of Crete, the unsafeness of which to winter in occasioned that attempt to make for Phenice, on the other side of the island, which led to the eventual loss of the vessel in which Paul sailed for Rome (Acts xxvii:8).

As the name of Kaloi Limenes is still preserved, there is no difficulty in fixing the situation to a small bay a little to the northeast of Cape Leon, the present Cape Matala. (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 2d Ed., pp. 80 ff.; Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii:320).

FAIRS (fārz), (Heb. יֵצֵה בֹו־נֵעַם, iz-zeh-bov-neem', Ezek. xxvii:12, 33).

This word is found only in Ezekiel, and does not mean fairs, but wares, as the R. V. renders it, and as the A. V. has it in verse 33.

FAITH (tath), (Gr. πίστις, pístis), belief, trust—especially in a higher power.

(1) General. Faith in every language, spoken by Christian, Jew, or Mohammedan, seems everywhere to convey the fundamental ideas of 'fixedness, stability, steadfastness, reliability.' What the ultimate conception is which underlies these ideas remains somewhat doubtful, but it would appear to be rather that of 'holding' than that of 'supporting' (although this last is the sense adopted in Oxf. Heb. Lex.).

(2) Old Testament. The extreme rarity of the noun 'faith' in the Old Testament may prepare us to note that even the verb 'to believe' is far from common in it. In a religious application it occurs in only some thirteen Old Testament books, and less than a score and a half times. But the prin-was a religion of faith in a far more specific sense than this, and that not merely because faith was more consciously its foundation, but because its very essence consisted in faith, and this faith was the same radical self-commitment to God, not merely as the highest good of the holy soul, but as the gracious Savior of the sinner, which meets us as the characteristic feature of the religion of the New Testament. Between the faith of the two Testaments there exists, indeed, no further difference than that which the progress of the historical working out of redemption brought with it.

(3) New Testament. The word in the New Testament denotes: (1) The truth of the gospel of Christ and the kingdom of God (Acts vi:7; xxiv:24; Rom. i:5; Gal. i:23; Phil. i:27; 1 Tim. iii:9; Jude, ver. 3), "the faith which was once delivered to the saints," for the truth and faithfulness of God (Rom. iii:3), and for the persuasion

ciple is there designated by other terms, such as to "look" to God (Is. xlv:22), to "wait on" him (Ps. xxvii:14), and to "trust" in him (Nah. i:7).

Abraham is "the father of the faithful," because unbounded trust in God was the very essence of his piety. (Comp. Rom. iv:1). Paul derives the theme of his Epistle to the Romans from the passage of Habakkuk: "The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i:17; comp. Hab. ii:4). The Epistle to the Hebrews gives a bright catalogue of the heroes of faith under the old dispensation (xi:1 ff).

To believe in God, in the Old Testament sense, is thus not merely to assent to his word, but with firm and unwavering confidence to rest in security and trustfulness upon him.

Despite the infrequency of the occurrence on its pages of the terms 'faith,' 'to believe,' the religion of the Old Testament is thus obviously as fundamentally a religion of faith as is that of the New Testament. There is a sense, to be sure, in which all religion presupposes faith (Heb. xi:6), and in this broad sense the religion of Israel, too, necessarily rested on faith. But the religion of Israel of the mind as to the lawfulness of things indifferent (Rom. xiv:22, 23).

(2) The act by which we lay hold of and appropriate the truths of the gospel and Jesus Christ, and rely for salvation upon the work done by him in our stead. This is the prevailing sense of the word (Matt. viii:10; John iii:16; Rom. i:16, etc.; and all through John and the Pauline Epistles).

(4) Saving Faith. (1) In the breadth of its idea, faith is thus the going out of the heart from itself and its resting on God in confident trust for all good. But the scriptural revelation has to do with, and is directed to the needs of, not man in the abstract, but sinful man; and for sinful man this hearty reliance on God necessarily becomes humble trust in him for the fundamental need of the sinner—forgiveness of sins and reception into favor. In response to the revelations of his grace and the provisions of his mercy it commits itself without reserve and with abnegation of all self-dependence to him as its sole and sufficient Savior, and thus, in one act, empties itself of all claim on God and casts itself upon his grace alone for salvation.

(2) This appears to be the plain scriptural representation of this doctrine; and we may infer from it (a) that the faith by which we are justified is not a mere assent to the doctrines of the gospel, which leaves the heart unmoved and unaffected by a sense of the evil and danger of sin and the desire of salvation, although it supposes this assent; nor (b) is it that more lively and cordial assent to, and belief in, the doctrine of the gospel, touching our sinful and lost condition, which is wrought in the heart by the Spirit of God, and from which springeth repentance, although this must precede it; nor (c) is it only the assent of the mind to the method by which God justifies the ungodly by faith in the sacrifice of his Son, although this is an element of it; but it is (d) a hearty concurrence of the will and affections with this plan of salvation, which implies a renunciation of every other refuge, and an actual trust in the Savior, and personal appropriation of his merit; such a belief of the gospel by the power of the Spirit of God as leads us to come to Christ, to receive Christ, to trust in Christ, and to commit the keeping of our souls into his hands, in humble confidence of his ability and his willingness to save us.

Faith therefore apprehends Christ, and takes actual hold of him and all his benefits. Hence he who believes in Christ has already eternal life (John iii:36).

(3) By faith we "put on" Christ. It is by faith that we are justified, and not by works. The work of salvation was all accomplished when the Savior uttered the words, "It is finished."

The saving power of faith resides thus not in itself, but in the Almighty Savior on whom it rests. It is never on account of its formal nature as a psychic act that faith is conceived in Scripture to be saving—as if this frame of mind or attitude of heart were itself a virtue with claims on God for reward, or at least especially pleasing to him (either in its nature or as an act of obedience), and thus predisposing him to favor, or as if it brought the soul into an attitude of receptivity or of sympathy with God, or opened a channel of communication from him. It is not faith that saves, but faith in Jesus Christ; faith in any other savior, or in this or that philosophy or human conceit (Col. ii:16, 18; 1 Tim. iv:1), or in any other gospel than that of Jesus Christ and him as crucified (Gal. i:8, 9), brings not salvation, but a curse. It is not, strictly speaking, even faith in Christ that saves, but Christ that saves through faith. The saving power resides exclusively, not in the act of faith or the attitude of faith, or the nature of faith, but in the object of faith; and in this the whole biblical representation centers, so that we could not more radically misconceive it than by transferring to faith even the smallest fraction of that saving energy which is attributed in the Scriptures solely to Christ himself.

(4) But a living faith will be accompanied by works, as much as a rose must diffuse perfume, and a good tree bring forth good fruit. As our Lord said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole," so Paul says, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God" (Eph. ii:8).

But "faith without works is dead" (James ii:26). Faith is operative in love (Gal. v:6).

FAITHFULNESS (fā'h'fūl-nēs), (Heb. אֱמוּנָה em-oo-naw', faithfulness, stability).

(1) Faithfulness is a divine attribute, and denotes the certainty of the accomplishment of all that the Divine Being has declared, in the promises which he has made to his people. (1) In respect to temporal blessings (1 Tim. iv:8; Ps. lxxxiv:11; Is. xxxiii:16). (2) To spiritual blessings (1 Cor. i:9): In supporting them in temptation (1 Cor. x:13); encouraging them under persecution (1 Pet. iv:12, 13; Is. xli:10); sanctifying afflictions (Heb. xii:4-12); directing them in difficulties (1 Thess. v:24); enabling them to persevere (Jer. xxxi:40); bringing them to glory (1 John ii:25). (Buck, Theolog. Dict.)

(2) Faithfulness is also used regarding men: "He was a faithful man" (Hebrew, trustworthy, reliable (Neh. vii:2); "who then is that faithful (trusty) and wise steward?" (Luke xii:42, etc.) "The Faithful" was the general and favorite name in the early Church to denote baptized persons and specifically applied to them, as distinguished from the clergy, catechumens, penitents, and sinners.

FAITHLESS (fāth'lēs), (Gr. ἀπίστος, ap'is-tos, Matt. xvii:17; John xx:27), disbelieving, or without Christian faith, with special reference to the heathen.

FAITH, RULE OF (fāth, rŭl ōv). In the early Church the summary of doctrines taught to catechumens, and to which they were obliged to subscribe before baptism. It was afterward applied to the Apostles' Creed.

(1) Protestant Doctrine. One of the chief doctrinal elements of the Reformation was the sufficiency of the Scriptures for faith and salvation.

(2) Roman Catholic. The teaching of the Roman Catholic Church is contained in the Catechism of the Council of Trent, which, in the Preface, declares that "all the doctrines of Christianity in which the faithful are to be instructed are derived from the word of God, which includes Scriptures and tradition."

FAITH, THE CHRISTIAN. To those who receive the light, in the sense of not refusing it, revelation is one whole, and all its glorious system of truth is received and surely believed. To them it is both objectively and subjectively the faith; and, inasmuch as Christianity has brought it in all fullness into the world, it is to them the Christian faith. This phrase has therefore a larger meaning. It signifies that it is not their philosophy simply, the glory of their reason, the tradition they have derived from their fathers, but the rich inheritance which the Holy Spirit has given to that one supreme faculty of their souls, the faith which is the evidence of things not seen. It is a body of truth which, as reason did not give it, so reason cannot take it away. It is a region in which they walk by faith, which their faith habitually visits, in which their faith lives, and moves, and has its being" (Pope, Compend. Christian Theol., p. 45). (Quoted in Barnes' Bib. Cyc.)

FALCON (fā'k'n).

A diurnal bird of prey other than a vulture. The family includes among its genera falcons strictly so called, hawks, kites, eagles. The word is used in R. V. to render the Hebrew 'Ayyah (Job xxviii:7; in A. V. vulture), an unclean bird (Lev. xi:14; Deut. xiv:13; in A. V. kite). Several varieties are mentioned by Tristram as occurring in Palestine; the hobby hawk (Falco subbuteo), the red-legged hobby (F. vespertinus), the Eleanor falcon (F. eleanor). (See VULTURE.)

FALL OF MAN (fal ǒv mǎn). A theological term which denotes the loss of those perfections and that happiness which his Maker bestowed on him at his creation, through transgression of a positive command, given for the trial of man's obedience, and as a token of his holding everything of God, as lord paramount of the creation, with the use of everything in it, exclusive of the fruit of one tree.

(1) Account in Genesis. The account in Genesis is that a garden having been planted by the Creator, for the use of man, he was placed in it, "to dress it, and to keep it;" that in this garden two trees were specially distinguished, one as "the tree of life," the other as "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil;" that from eating of the latter Adam was restrained by positive interdict, and by the penalty, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die;" that the serpent, who was more subtle than any beast of the field, tempted the woman to eat, by denying that death would be the consequence, and by assuring her that her eyes and her husband's eyes "would be opened," and that they would "be as gods, knowing good and evil;" that the woman took of the fruit, gave of it to her husband, who also ate; that for this act of disobedience they were expelled from the garden, made subject to death, and laid under other maledictions.

(2) Varied Interpretations. The character of the primitive record in Genesis has been the subject of much discussion. Some have contended that the account is purely literal; others, that it is figurative, poetic, or allegorical; still others, rationalistic or semirationalistic, relegate the whole matter to the realm of the mythical. This last view, of course, cannot be consistently held by anyone who accepts the Scriptures as of divine authority.

It must be admitted that the account leaves room for many questions both as to its form and its meaning in relation to incidental details. But still the great, underlying, essential facts are sufficiently clear, especially when the account is taken in connection with other Scriptures. They are as follows (Barnes' Bib. Dict.):

Those holding the orthodox view maintain that the account of Moses is to be taken as a matter of real history, and according to its literal import.

It is claimed that this is established by two considerations, against which, as being facts, nothing can successfully be urged. (1) The first is that the account of the fall of the first pair is a part of a continuous history. Either, then, the account of the fall must be taken as history, or the historical character of the whole five books of Moses must be unsettled. (2) The second consideration, as establishing the literal sense of the history, is that, as such, it is referred to and reasoned upon in various parts of Scripture (Job xx:4, 5; xxxi:33; xv:14).

"Eden" and "the garden of the Lord" are also frequently referred to in the prophets. We have the "tree of life" mentioned several times in the Proverbs and in the Revelation. "God," says Solomon, "made man upright." The enemies of Christ and his church are spoken of, both in the Old and New Testaments, under the names of "the serpent," and "the dragon;" and the habit of the serpent to lick the dust is also referred to by Isaiah.

If the history of the fall, as recorded by Moses, were an allegory, or anything but a literal history, several of the above allusions would have no meaning; but the matter is put beyond all possible doubt in the New Testament, unless the same culpable liberties be taken with the interpretation of the words of our Lord and of St. Paul as with those of the Jewish lawgiver (Matt. xix:4; 5; 1 Cor. xv:22; 2 Cor. xi:3; 1 Tim. ii:13, 14; Rom. v:12-19). (3) When, therefore, it is considered that these passages are introduced, not for rhetorical illustration, or in the way of classical quotation, but are made the basis of grave and important reasonings, which embody some of the most important doctrines of the Christian revelation, and of important social duties and points of Christian order and decorum, it would be to charge the writers of the New Testament with the grossest absurdity, nay, with even culpable and unworthy trifling, to suppose them to argue from the history of the fall as a narrative, when they knew it to be an allegory. (4) By the act of disobedience of our first parents "sin entered into the world and death by sin." Shame and alienation from God were the first visible consequences. The image of God, which contained among its features "righteousness and true holiness," was marred and broken, though not completely lost. (See IMAGE OF GOD.) Expulsion from Eden followed. The ground was cursed on account of sin. Sorrow and toil and struggle with the evil in human nature became the lot of mankind. (For a full presentation of the subject see ADAM. For distinctively doctrinal, Calvinistic and Arminian views, see PREDESTINATION.)

FALLOW DEER (fál'lo dēr), a wrong rendering of Heb. יַחֲמוֹר, yakh-moor', Deut. xiv:5; 1 Kings iv:23, which is correctly rendered by R. V. "roe-buck." (See ROEBUCK.)

FALLOW GROUND (fál'lo ground), (Heb. נֶעֶר, neer), a field plowed up and left for seeding; as summer fallow, intelligently carried on, is a sure method of destroying weeds (Jer. iv:3; Hos. x:12).

FALLOW YEAR (yēr). See SABBATH.

FALSE CHRISTS (fals kristis), (Gr. ψευδοχριστοι, psyyoo-dokh'ris-toi), those who falsely claim to be Messiah: foretold by Jesus (Matt. xxiv:24; Mark xiii:22).

FALSE PROPHET (fals prōf'ēt), a pseudo-prophet pretending to be sent from God, a false teacher (Matt. vii:15; xxiv:11, 24, etc.) "The false prophet" (Rev. xvi:13) is used for the second "beast," the mythological system of paganism.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT (fá-mil'yēr spír'ít), (Heb. זָבַח, obe).

The spirit of a dead person which professed mediums claimed to summon to consultation (Deut. xviii:11), and which appeared to speak from the earth (Is. xxix:4), or to dwell in the controlling medium (Lev. xx:27, in Hebrew). The medium was called the possessor or lord of a spirit (1 Sam. xxviii:7, in Hebrew). (See DIVINATION.)

FAMILY (fám'y-lý).

(1) The idea of the family in Greece was that of the nucleus of society or of the state. The idea of the Christian family, on the contrary (Eph. iii:15), is a communion resting on an ethico-religious foundation, and forming the closest of all human relationships. It is a copy of the highest and most perfect union, that of the church with Christ, its head. (McC. and Str. Bib. Cyc.)

(2) The influence of the Christian religion upon the customs and habits of family life was very considerable, even from the first; although it did not aim at making any abrupt or sudden changes, except in those things which were necessarily sinful.

The great Christian doctrines which so powerfully affect the feelings, hopes, and whole inner life of those who heartily receive them, led at once to the renunciation of idolatry in all its forms, and of the excesses and licentiousnesses then so common and so little thought of; and inculcated new principles of thought and action, which operated more or less powerfully in every direction. But the ordinary usages of domestic life, which were not directly connected with the religious and moral obliquities of the old polytheism, were apparently left untouched by any positive interference or command. Christianity proved itself the salt of the earth by gradually interpenetrating the surrounding mass of pagan civilization, and not by shrinking from all contact with it.

The elevation of the female sex was one of the most conspicuous of the indirect results which rapidly followed the reception of the new religion. The position of women among the Jews, and the manner in which Jesus had received them as his disciples and friends, must have taught the apostles, if they needed any such teaching, what place women were entitled to hold in the social economy of the church. And accordingly, wherever Christ was proclaimed, women were invited and welcomed into the Christian communities, and were admitted equally with men to all Christian privileges. Hence in a Christian family the wife and mother held an honorable place; and the conjugal union, the source of all other family relationships, being thus honored, communicated a happy influence throughout the household.

(3) Before Christianity became the prevailing and established religion, families were in continual danger of being molested by popular violence, and of being utterly broken up in times of legalized persecution. But, besides these dangers and troubles, there were sometimes others hardly less painful within the family itself, when only a part of the household had become Christians. The antagonism and consequent discomfort, if not positive misery, must then have been almost perpetual; and the difficulty of maintaining religious faithfulness, without losing family affection or breaking family ties, must have been very great. Jesus himself had warned his disciples beforehand that "a man's foes might be those of his own household;" and that his religion, in such a case, might bring "not peace but a sword." St. Paul, while desirous that this difference of religion should not actually separate a husband and wife, admitted that it would and must sometimes have this effect. Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii:4) describes in detail the sort of hindrances, opposition and ridicule which a Christian woman must expect if she married a husband who was an unbeliever; and how impossible she would find it to fulfill in peace, if she could fulfill at all, her Christian duties—even if nothing worse occurred. But in times of persecution, or of any strong excitement of anti-Christian feeling, it was not merely difficulties and discomforts that had to be encountered. The strongest words of Christ were then often literally realized, when the most powerful natural affections were shattered, and Christians were betrayed and denounced by their nearest relatives and given up to the persecutor's sword. See an early instance of this in Justin Martyr, Apol. ii:2.

(4) Parental obligations include the maintenance of children (1 Tim. 5:8) and their education in its fullest sense (Exod. xii:26, 27; Deut. vi:6, 7; Eph. vi:4).

The filial obligations are obedience (Luke ii:51; Eph. vi:1; Col. iii:20), reverence (Exod. xx:12, comp. Eph. vi:1, 2), and grateful requital (1 Tim. v:4; comp. John xix:26).

(5) The entire life of the Christian family is a continuous act of worship in the more extended sense of the term. Hence the importance of family worship.

FAMINE (fām'īn), (Heb. רָעָב, raw-awb'). We have an account of at least eight famines in Palestine and the neighboring countries.

They were among the judgments of God for national sins, and were often prophetically announced. Two famines occurred in the lifetimes of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xii:10; xxvi:1); another in Jacob's time (Gen. xli:56).

The first mention of a famine which occurs in Scripture is in Gen. xii:10, where we read that so early as the days of the patriarch Abraham 'there was a famine in the land,' which is described as so grievous as to compel the father of the faithful to quit Canaan. The country to which he resorted was, as we might expect, the land of Egypt, the early and lasting fertility of which is a well-known historical fact. In Gen. xxvi:1 this famine is designated as 'the first,' that is, the first known, or of which there was any record. The same passage informs us of another famine, as stated above, which afflicted 'the land' in the days of Isaac, who seems to have contemplated a descent into Egypt; but who, being instructed of God, removed to a part of Arabia Petræa (Gen. xxvi:17), named Gerar, a city of the Philistines, whose monarch's name was Abimelech.

The famine in Egypt while Joseph was governor lasted seven years. The ordinary cause of dearth in Egypt is connected with the annual overflow of the Nile. If the rise of the waters is in any year below a certain standard, the country affords scanty supplies of food, and may for the greater part remain a desert. But more than local causes must have been in operation in the case before us; for we are told that 'the famine was sore in all lands,' that 'the famine was over all the face of the earth.' By the foresight and wisdom of Joseph, however, provision against the evil had been made in Egypt, while other countries were left to suffer the unmitigated consequences of their neglect. The provision made by Joseph must have been of a most abundant nature, since the period during which the dearth lasted was no less than seven years, and the people of other parts sought and received supplies in Egypt—'all countries came in to Egypt to buy corn.' Among other lands, Canaan suffered from the famine; which was the immediate occasion of Jacob sending his sons down into Egypt, of the discovery which they made of their lost brother, and of the settlement in that land of the descendants of Abraham, an event of the highest consequence in the sequel, and serving to illustrate the benignity and wisdom of Divine Providence in the evils with which, under its influence, the world is afflicted.

This famine was made by Joseph the occasion of one of the greatest social revolutions which history records. The details may be found in the book of Genesis; and it is enough to say here that, as the special administrator of the affairs of the country, Joseph got into his hands all the property of the kingdom, including the land, excepting that which belonged to the priests, and gave the same back to the people as tenants at will, on condition of their paying to the king 'the fifth,' probably of the annual produce. (See JOSEPH.)

judges (Ruth i:1), and in the time of King David (2 Sam. xxi:1), but it is not until the time of Elijah that any account is given of the failure of the pasturage and springs. 'There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word' (1 Kings xvii:1). 'And Ahab said unto Obadiah: Go through the land, unto all the fountains of water, and unto all the brooks; peradventure we may find grass and save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts' (xviii:5).

Several causes of famine are given: (1) God's blessing withheld (Hos. ii:8, 9; Hag. i:6); (2) want of seasonable rain (1 Kings xviii:1; Jer. xiv:1-4; Amos iv:7, sq.)

The most terrible results of famine related in the Bible are due to the hand of man, and this was well recognized by King David. 'And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great; and let me not fall into the hand of man' (2 Sam. xxiv:14). 'And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy ground, until thou be destroyed; which also shall not leave thee corn, wine or oil, the increase of thy kine, or the young of thy flock, until he have caused thee to perish' (Deut. xxviii:51). 'And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons, and of thy daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall straiten thee' (verse 53). 'And there was a great famine in Samaria, and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver' (2 Kings vi:25). 'And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow' (verse 28).

Figurative. The prophets and our Lord himself use highly figurative language regarding famine, in their righteous endeavors to turn wicked men and wicked nations from the evil of their ways (Ezek. vi:11; Matt. xxiv:7). In Amos viii:11 sq., a heavier woe than even the want of bread is appropriately spoken of under the appellation of a famine: 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land; not a famine of bread nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord; and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it; in that day shall the fair virgins and the young men faint for thirst.' In Zeph. ii:11 it is symbolical of the destruction of idols.

FAN (fän), (Heb. רָוַח, zaw-raw', to toss about; מִזְרֵה, miz-reh'; Gr. πύλον, pyo'on).

An instrument used in the East for winning corn. Fans are of two kinds—one a sort of fork, having teeth, with which they throw up the corn to the wind, that the chaff may be blown away; the other is formed to produce wind when the air is calm (Is. xxx:24; Luke iii:17).

Figurative. (1) God's judgments are compared to a fan; by these he turns up persons and nations to the winds of his retributive providences, and scatters and disperses them for their sins, and his thus scattering and overturning them is called his fanning of them (Jer. xv:7; comp. Is. xxx:24). (2) The Medes, Persians and others, by whose means he executed his scattering and overturning judgments, are called fanners (Jer. li:2). (3) Christ's fan is in his hand, with which he will thoroughly purge his floor; by the gospel dispensation and spiritual influence which he introduced, men were or shall be put to the trial, and the evil be separated from the good (Matt. iii:12).

FANNERS (fän'nërs), (Heb. זָרִים, zoor, strangers), rendering in the A. V. (Jer. li:2); but properly "strangers," and so translated in the R. V.

FARE (fâr), (Heb. שָׂלוֹם, shaw-lome', 1 Sam. xvii:18, welfare, prosperity; Gr. εὐφραίνω, yoo-frah-ee'no, Luke xvi:10, to make glad, to make merry).

FARM. See AGRICULTURE.

FARTHING (fär'thing). Two names of coins in the New Testament are thus translated: (1) Gr. κοδράντης, kod-ran'tace, Matt. v:26; Mark xii:42. It was equivalent to two lepta (A. V. "mites"). Its value was about 3.8 mills. (2) Gr. ἀσάριον, as-sar'ee-on, Matt. x:29; Luke xii:6. Its value is estimated at three-fourths of a penny English money, or one and a half cents of American. (See MONEY.)

FASHION, FASHIONING (Gr. εἶδος, i'dos, Luke ix:29). "The fashion of his countenance was changed."

(1) Appearance. The appearance of a thing, as Jas. i:24. Tyndale, 'For assone as he hath looked on him silfe, he goeth his waye, and forgetteth immediatlle what his fassion was.' So in A. V., Luke ix:29, as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered.' Especially denoting outward visible appearance in contrast with inner reality, as Shaks. Merch. of Venice, iv:1, 18—

'Shylock, the world thinks, and I think so too,
That thou but leadst this fashion of thy malice
To the last hour of act; and then 'tis thought
Thou'lt showthy mercy and remorse more strange
Than is thy strange apparent cruelty.'

(2) Form, etc. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, etc. (Phil. ii:8).

Fashion has here its original sense of make, shape, form—a wider meaning than that which it now bears.

FASTS, FASTING (fästs, fäst'ing), (Heb. צוּם, tsoom, to cover the mouth; Gr. νηστεύω, nace-tyoo'o, to abstain), has, in all ages and among all nations, been practiced in times of mourning, sorrow and affliction.

It is in some sort inspired by nature, which, under these circumstances, refuses nourishment, and suspends the cravings of hunger. We see no example of fasting, properly so called, before Moses; whether the patriarchs had not observed it, which yet is difficult to believe, since there were great mournings among them, which are particularly described, as that of Abraham for Sarah, and that of Jacob for Joseph, or whether he did not think it necessary to mention it expressly, is uncertain.

(1) Among the Israelites. It appears by the law that devotional fasts for expiation of sins were common among the Israelites. There seems, however, no reason to doubt that 'to afflict the soul' bore with it the meaning of fasting. To a mere English reader the phrase seems to comprise all kinds of voluntary mortifications, but 'soul' in Hebrew not seldom denotes the 'appetite' (Prov. xxvii:7). Accordingly the words regard immediately abstinence from food, and most probably (so far as they go) nothing more.

The sole fast required by Moses was on the great day of annual atonement. This observance seems always to have retained some prominence as 'the fast' (Acts xxvii:9), but what the observance of the enjoined duty involved we are nowhere expressly informed.

(2) Other General Fasts. Other general fasts, however, were in course of ages introduced, which were celebrated at fixed times every successive year. In the reign of Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar besieged and captured Jerusalem, which calamity led to the establishment of a fast on the seventeenth day of the fourth month (Thammuz, July) (Jer. lii:6, 7; Zech. viii:19). In the last passage other fasts are enumerated, namely, 'the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth.' That of the fifth month (Ab, August) was held on the ninth day, in mournful commemoration of the burning of the city by Nebuzar-adan, a servant of the king of Babylon, who 'burnt the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house' (2 Kings xxv:8, sq.; Jer. lii:12; Zech. vii:3-5; viii:19). The fast of the seventh month (Tishri, October) was established to bewail the murder of Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer. xli:1, sq.; 2 Kings xxv:25). That of the tenth month (Tebeth, January) was held on the tenth day to commemorate the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem on the part of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv:1; Zech. viii:19; see also Hieron. ad. Zech. c. viii., and Hieros. Taanith, 68; Re-land, p. 471).

(3) Particular Occasions. On particular and signal occasions extraordinary fasts were appointed. Thus when Naboth was condemned for blasphemy because he would not give up the inheritance of his fathers to Ahab, Jezebel, as a part of her plan for gratifying the evil desires of her royal husband, ordered a fast to be proclaimed (1 Kings xxi:9; comp. Jer. xxxvi:9; 2 Chron. xx:3). So in Judges xx:26, the children of Israel 'came unto the house of God and wept, and sat there before the Lord and fasted until even, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Lord,' when they had suffered a calamitous defeat at the hands of the Benjamites. Other instances of fasting on occasion of loss in battle may be found in 1 Sam. xxxi:11-13; Baruch i:5. In Joel i-ii a fast is enjoined with a view to turn away the wrath of God as displayed in the terrible consequences of the invasion of the land of Judæa by an army of devastating locusts (Credner's Joel). The idea also prevailed that a special fast might have the effect of averting the divine displeasure and securing the divine co-operation in any great undertaking (Jonah iii:5; 1 Sam. vii:5, 6, 8, 10, 12; 1 Macc. iii:47; 2 Macc. xiii:12; Judith iv:11; vi:19). Local fasts were at a later period sometimes held in order to avert calamity or procure a favor from heaven; and the Sanhedrim ordered general fasts when the nation was threatened with any great evil, such as drought or famine (Joseph. Vit. sec. 56; Taanith, i:5), as was usual with the Romans in their supplications (Liv. iii:7; x:23; Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq.)

(4) Private Fasts. There were also private fasts, though the Mosaic law did not require them. They were held in connection with individual or family incidents, and agreed in aim and tendency with fasts of a general and public nature. Examples may be found in 1 Sam. i:7; xx:34; 1 Kings xxi:9; Ezra x:6; Neh. i:4.

After the exile private fasts became very frequent (Lightfoot, p. 318), awaiting the call of no special occasion, but entering as a regular part of the current religious worship (Suet. Aug. 76; Tacit. Hist. v:4, 3).

The parable of the Pharisee and Publican (Luke xviii:9; comp. Matt ix:14) shows how much the Pharisees were given to voluntary and private fasts—'I fast twice a week.' The first was on the fifth day of the week, on which Moses ascended to the top of Mount Sinai; the second was on the second day, on which he came down (Taanith, ii:9; Hieros. Megillah, 75, 1). The Essenes and the Therapeutæ also were much given to such observances (Philo, Vit. Contempl. p. 613; Euseb. Præp. Evan. ix:3).

Fasts were considered as a useful exercise in preparing the mind for special religious impressions. Thus Dan. x:2, sq., 'In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks. I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth. Then I lifted up my eyes and looked, and behold a certain man,' etc. (see also Acts xiii:3; xiv:23). From Matt. xvii:21, 'Howbeit this kind (of demons) goeth not out but by prayer and fasting,' it would appear that the practice under consideration was considered in the days of Christ to act in certain special cases as an exorcism.

(5) Mourning. Fasting was accompanied by the ordinary signs of grief among the Israelites, as may be seen in 1 Macc. iii:47, 'Then they fasted that day and put on sackcloth, and cast ashes upon their heads and rent their clothes.' The fast ordinarily lasted from evening to evening, but was not observed on the sabbath or on festival days (Joseph. Antiq. iii:10, 3; Judith viii:6; Mischn. Taanith, ii:10). The abstinence was either partial or total. In the case of the latter food was entirely foregone, but this ordinarily took place only in fasts of short duration; and abstinence from food in eastern climes is more easy and less detrimental (if not in some cases positively useful) than keeping from food would be with us in these cold, damp, northern regions (Esther iv:16). In the case of partial abstinence the time was longer, the denial in degree less. When Daniel (x:2) was 'mourning three full weeks,' he ate no 'pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth.'

(6) Duration. There does not appear to have been any fixed and recognized periods during which these fasts endured. From one day to forty days fasts were observed. The latter period appears to have been regarded with feelings of peculiar sanctity, owing doubtless to certain events in Jewish history. Thus Moses 'was with the Lord on Mount Sinai forty days and forty nights, he did neither eat bread, nor drink water' (Exod. xxxiv:28). So, also, Elijah (1 Kings xix:8) 'arose and did eat and drink, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights unto Horeb the mount of God.' The same was the number of days that our Lord fasted in the desert in connection with his temptation (Matt. iv:1-11; Mark i:12, 13; Luke iv:1-13). In the latter case the abstinence appears to have been entire, for Luke expressly declares he ate nothing, καὶ οὐκ ἔφαγεν οὐδέν, and he did not eat anything. In Dan. i:10, 16, a passage is found which shows that abstaining from meat and wine did not imply total abstinence, for Daniel and his friends had 'pulse to eat and water to drink' (Wetstein, p. 270; De Wette, Kritik der Mos. Ges. p. 245).

(7) Abuses. We have already seen how qualified the sanction was which Moses gave to the observance of fasting as a religious duty. In the same spirit which actuated him, the prophets bore testimony against the lamentable abuses to which the practice was turned in the lapse of time and with the increase of social corruption (Is. lviii:4, sq.; Jer. xiv:12; Zech. vii:5). Continuing the same species of influence and perfecting that spirituality in religion which Moses began, our Lord rebuked the Pharisees sternly for their outward and hypocritical pretences in the fasts which they observed (Matt. vi:16, sq.), and actually abstained from appointing any fast whatever as a part of his own religion (Matt. ix:14).

From the passages referred to it is at least clear that Jesus ascribed to fasts no essential worth, nor required any such observance from his followers. Whether and how far he allowed fasting as a means of religious improvement is a question which our space does not permit us to discuss (Neander, Leben Jesu).

(8) Early Christians. That the early Christians observed the ordinary fasts which the public practice of their day sanctioned is clear from more than one passage in the New Testament Scriptures (Acts xiii:2; xiv:23; 2 Cor. vi:5); but in this they probably did nothing more than yield obedience, as in general they thought themselves bound to do, to the law of their fathers so long as the Mosaic institutions remained entire. And though the great body of the Christian Church held themselves free from all ritual and ceremonial observances when God in his providence had brought Judaism to a termination in the rasure of the Holy City and the closing of the Temple, yet the practice of fasting thus originated might have easily and unobservedly been transmitted from year to year and from age to age.

On fasting in the Christian Church consult Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xxi, chap. i-iii; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, p. 552 ff.).

FAT (fät), (1) (Heb. יֶהֱבֵב, yeh'keb, Joel ii:24; iii:13), elsewhere rendered wine press. A. S. foet, a vessel. In Coleridge, Gloss., it is found as "fet." Fat, meaning a large vessel for holding liquids, has been displaced by 'vat' in literary English. The difference between the spellings, says Skeat (Etymol. Dict. s. v.), is one of dialect only, 'fat' being northern and 'vat' southern. Fat occurs in A. V. (Joel ii:24), 'the fats shall overflow with wine and oil,' and Joel iii:13; in the compound 'winefat' in Is. lxiii:2; Mark xiii:1 (A. V. 1611 'wine fat' as two words); and 'pressfat' (1611 'presse-fat'), Hag. ii:16.

(2) (Heb. כֶּהֱלֵב, khay'leb). In Lev. iii there are minute details of the parts of victims which were to be specially appropriated to the altar. Among these all the internal fat is minutely specified, particularly the fat of the kidneys; and of external parts the tail of the sheep, which, in the common species of Western Asia, is a mass of fat (iii:4, 9, 10, 15); and the whole concludes with 'All the fat is the Lord's; ye shall eat neither fat nor blood' (iii:17). The reason assigned, namely, that the fat was consecrated to the altar, could only apply with respect to that of animals used in sacrifice, which were also usually employed for food. One point seems to have been very generally overlooked, which is, that not fat absolutely but particular fat parts only are interdicted. They might eat the fat involved in the muscular tissue—in short, fat meat; and we know that animals were actually fattened for food (1 Kings iv:23; Jer. xlvi:21; Luke xv:23). This was, however, not a usual practice; and even at this day in the East domestic cattle seldom undergo any preparatory feeding or fattening before being killed. Hence there is little fat in the carcass, except that belonging to the parts specified in the prohibition, which is all more or less of the nature of suet.

Various reasons have been assigned for this somewhat remarkable restriction. The secondary cause, that the fat was consecrated to the altar and therefore was to be abstained from, is not all, for it is usually considered that it was thus consecrated to give a religious sanction to a prohibition expedient on other grounds.

The truth probably is that this suet or suet-like fat is not particularly wholesome or digestible in warm climates, if anywhere, and is particularly unsuitable for persons subject to cutaneous diseases, as the Israelites appear to have been at the time of their leaving Egypt.

Figurative. (1) The Hebrews used the word which we render fat to signify the best of anything, and, next to blood, it was the sign of healthfulness and vigor; hence we read of the fat of wheat; the fat of the land; the fat of the flock (Ps. lxxxi:16 and cxlvii:8, 9; Gen. xlvii:6; iv:4). (2) Wicked men are represented as fat; as fatlings; as enclosed in their own fat, when they abound in honor, power and wealth (Deut. xxxii:14, 15; Ezek. xxxix:18; Ps. xvii:10). (3) Their heart is fat, or gross, when men are self-conceited, stupid, careless, and unteachable (Ps. cxix:70; Is. vi:10). (4) They perish as the fat of lambs when they are easily and quickly wasted and destroyed (Ps. xxxvii:20). (5) Great men are represented as fat ones, because of their large possessions, joy and pleasure (Is. v:17 and x:16; Ezek. xxxiv:16, 20; Ps. xxii:29). (6) Saints are fat when they abound much in spiritual graces and comfort (Ps. cxii:14; Prov. xi:25; xiii:4; xv:30 and xxviii:25). (7) The sword of the Lord is fat with fatness when his judgments cut off multitudes of men, great and wealthy (Is. xxxiv:6).

FATHER (fä'thēr), (Heb. אָב, awb, ancestor, source, inventor), this word, besides its obvious and primary sense, bears, in Scripture, a number of other applications, most of which have, through the use of the Bible, become more or less common in all Christian countries.

(1) The Divine Father. The term Father is very often applied to God himself (Gen. xlv:19, 20; Deut. xxxii:6; 2 Sam. vii:14; Ps. lxxxix:27, 28; Is. lxiii:16; lxiv:8). The New Testament leaves little room to question that it is the intention of the sacred record to set God before us as the Father of all men, in the general sense of creator and preserver of all men, but more especially of believers, whether Jews or Christians. To the same effect is also a passage in Josephus's paraphrase of the law (Deut. xxi:18-21), respecting rebellious sons, 'because he (God) is himself the father of the whole human race' (Antiq. iv:8, 24).

Without doubt, however, God is in a more especial and intimate manner, even as by covenant, the Father of the Jews (Jer. xxxi:9; Is. lxiii:16; lxiv:8; John viii:41; v:45; 2 Cor. vi:18); and also of Christians, or rather of all pious and believing persons, who are called 'sons of God' (John i:12; Rom. vii:16, etc.). Thus Jesus, in speaking to his disciples, calls God their Father (Matt. vi:4, 8, 15, 18; x:20, 29; xiii:43, etc.). The Apostles, also, for themselves and other Christians, call him 'Father' (Rom. i:7; 1 Cor. i:3; 2 Cor. i:2; Gal. i:4; and many other places).

(2) Ancestors. Father is applied to any ancestor near or remote, or, to ancestors ('fathers') in general. The progenitor, or founder, or patriarch of a tribe or nation, was also pre-eminently its father, as Abraham of the Jews. Examples of this abound. See, for instance, Deut. i:11; 1 Kings xi:12; Matt. iii:9; xxiii:30; Mark xi:10; Luke i:32, 73; vi:23, 26; John vii:22, etc.

(3) Chief or Ruler. Father is also applied as a title of respect to any head, chief, ruler, or elder, and especially to kings, prophets, and priests (Judg. xvii:10; xviii:19; 1 Sam. x:12; 2 Kings ii:12; v:13; vi:21; xiii:14; Prov. iv:1; Matt. xxiii:9; Acts vii:2; xxii:1; 1 Cor. iv:15, etc.).

(4) Author or Source. The author, source, or beginner of anything is also called the Father of the same, or of those who follow him. Thus Jabal is called 'the father of those who dwell in tents, and have cattle'; and Jubal, 'the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ' (Gen. iv:21, 22; comp. Job xxxviii:28; John viii:44; Rom. iv:12). This use of the word is exceedingly common in the East to this day, especially as applied in the formation of proper names, in which, also, the most curious Hebrew examples of this usage occur. (See Ab.)

(5) The Father's Authority. The authority of a father was very great in patriarchal times; and although the power of life and death was virtually taken from the parent by the law of Moses, which required him to bring his cause of complaint to the public tribunals (Deut. xxi:18-21), all the more real powers of the paternal character were not only left unimpaired, but were made in a great degree the basis of the judicial polity which that law established. The children and even the grandchildren continued under the roof of the father and grandfather; they labored on his account, and were the most submissive of his servants. The property of the soil, the power of judgment, the civil rights, belonged to him only, and his sons were merely his instruments and assistants.

(6) Filial Duty. Filial duty and obedience were, indeed, in the eyes of the Jewish legislator, of such high importance that great care was taken that the paternal authority should not be weakened by the withdrawal of a power so liable to fatal and barbarous abuse as that of capital punishment. Any outrage against a parent—a blow, a curse, or incorrigible profligacy—was made a capital crime (Exod. xxi:13, 17; Lev. xx:9). If the offense was public it was taken up by the witnesses as a crime against Jehovah, and the culprit was brought before the magistrates, whether the parent consented or not; and if the offense was hidden within the paternal walls, it devolved on the parents to denounce him and to require his punishment.

It is a beautiful circumstance in the law of Moses that this filial respect is exacted for the mother as well as for the father. The threats and promises of the legislator distinguish not the one from the other; and the fifth commandment associates the father and mother in a precisely equal claim to honor from their children. The development of this interesting feature of the Mosaic law belongs, however, to another head (see WOMAN). (Lane, Mod. Egypt, i:84; Atkinson, Travels in Siberia, p. 559.)

FATHER, GOD THE (fä'thēr, göd thē). See FATHER, I.

FATHER-IN-LAW (fä'thēr-in-lä'). 1. Khawm (Heb. כַּוֵּן, from כָּוַן, khaw-maw'), to join in affinity (Gen. xxxviii:13, 25).

2. Khaw-than' (Heb. כַּוְּן, to marry), one giving a daughter in marriage (Exod. iii:1; iv:18; xviii:1-7, Num. x:29, etc.).

3. Pen-ther-os' (Gr. πενθερός), strictly one related by affinity, a wife's father (John xviii:13).

FATHER'S BROTHER (fä'thēr's brüth'ēr), Heb. דוּד, dode), strictly one beloved (Is. v:1); an uncle (Num. xxxvi:11; 2 Kings xxiv:17); in Exod. vi:20 used in the feminine as a father's sister, or aunt.

FATHER'S HOUSE (fä'thēr's hous), the name denoting families among the Israelites (Josh. xxii:14; comp. vii:14; xvi:18). (See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.)

FATHOM (fäth'üm). See Table of Weights and Measures, p. 42, Appendix.

FATLING (fät'fling). 1. An animal fatted for slaughter (Heb. מֵרֵעֵ, mer-ee', 2 Sam. vi:13).

2. A marrowy sheep, particularly of the fattailed variety (Heb. מַי'אֲכָה, may'akh, Ps. lxxvi:15).

3. A wrong rendering of Mish-neh' (Heb. מִשְׁנֵה, repetition, 1 Sam. xv:9). These were "animals of the second birth, which were considered superior to the others" (K. and D. Com., in loco).

FATTED FOWL (Heb. בְּרָרִים אֲבִיבִים, bar-boo-reeem' ay-boo-seeem'), are referred to among the daily provisions for Solomon's table (1 Kings iv:23).

The meaning of bar-boo-reeem' is uncertain. The earlier translators render it birds or fowls, others "geese" (from the Heb. בָּרַר, barw-rar', "to be pure," because of their white feathers). A special variety of fowl may be meant.

FEAR (fer) {Old Engl. h fer, feer, ferē, Anglo-Saxon fær).

(1) In general a painful emotion or passion excited by an expectation of evil or the apprehension of impending danger. It embraces anxiety, solicitude, alarm and dread.

(2) Religiously it implies profound respect, due regard or reverence for men of authority or worth. (Rom. xiii:7) "Render . . . fear to whom fear." It includes further the object of fear (Gen. xxi:42). "Except . . . the fear of Isaac had been with me;" also the worship of God (Ps. xxxiv:11). "I will teach you the fear of the Lord;" and also the law and word of God; (Ps. xix:9). "The fear of the Lord is clean," etc. Filial fear (Ps. cxi:10) is the "fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom." It hates and avoids whatever is sinful. (Jer. xxxii:40; Gen. xxii:12; Ecc. xii:13; Neh. v:15; Heb. v:7.) This fear of the Lord is a common expression in the O. T. (See Job xxviii:28; compare Acts ix:31.) It thus refers to awe and piety rather than the dread of God, and is consistent with the full assurance of faith and with love for God as our Father. (1 John iv:18). "Perfect love casteth out fear." Slavish fear is a dread of danger and punishment. (Acts xxiv:25.) "Felix trembled." Selfish fear makes men cowards by causing them to lose spirit. (See 1 Kings x:5.) Compare Deut. xx:8; Judges vii:3.)

FEASTS (fēsīs), (Heb. מִשְׁתֵּה, mish'teh). The root idea of the word is to be found in what we should term the pleasures of the table, the exercise of hospitality.

(1) Early Hospitality. To what an early date the practices of hospitality are referable may be seen in Gen. xix:3, where we find Lot inviting the two angels; 'and they entered into his house; and he made them a feast;' which was obviously of a religious nature, since it is added, 'and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat' (Judg. vi:19). It was usual not only thus to receive persons with choice viands, but also to dismiss them in a similar manner; accordingly Laban, when he had overtaken the fleeing Jacob, complains (Gen. xxxi:27), 'Wherefore didst thou steal away from me and didst not tell me. that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, and with tabret, and with harp?' See also 2 Sam. iii:20; 2 Kings vi:23; 1 Macc. xvi:15. This practice explains the reason why the prodigal on his return was welcomed by a feast (Luke xv:23). Occasions of domestic joy were hailed with feasting; thus, in Gen. xxi:8, Abraham 'made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned.' Birthdays were thus celebrated (Gen. xl:20). 'Pharaoh, on his birthday, made a feast unto all his servants' (Job i:4; Matt. xiv:6; comp. Herod. i:133). Marriage feasts were also common. Samson (Judg. xiv:10) on such an occasion 'made a feast,' and it is added, 'for so used the young men to do.' So Laban, when he gave his daughter Leah to Jacob (Gen. xxix:22), 'gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast.' These festive occasions seem originally to have answered the important purpose of serving as evidence and attestation of the events which they celebrated, on which account relatives and neighbors were invited to be present (Ruth iv:10; John ii:1).

(2) Harvest Celebrations. Those processes in rural occupations by which the Divine bounties are gathered into the hands of man have in all ages been made seasons of festivity; accordingly, in 2 Sam. xiii:23, Absalom invites all the king's sons, and even David himself, to a sheep-shearing feast, on which occasion the guests became 'merry with wine' (1 Sam. xxv:2, sq.). The vintage was also celebrated with festive eating and drinking (Judg. ix:27).

(3) Funeral Feasts. Feasting at funerals existed among the Jews (2 Sam. iii:33). In Jer. xvi:7, among other funeral customs, mention is made of 'the cup of consolation, to drink for their father or their mother,' which brings to mind the indulgence in spirituous liquors to which our ancestors were given, at interments, and which has not yet entirely disappeared (Carleton's Irish Peasantry, England in the Nineteenth Century, vol. ii). To what an extent expense was sometimes carried on these occasions may be learned from Josephus (De Bell. Jud. iv, i:1), who, having remarked that Archelaus 'mourned for his father seven days, and had given a very expensive funeral feast to the multitude,' states, 'which custom is the occasion of poverty to many of the Jews,' adding, 'Because they are forced to feast the multitude, for if any one omits it he is not esteemed a holy person.'

(4) Sacrificial Feasts. As among heathen nations, so also among the Hebrews, feasting made a part of the observances which took place on occasion of animal sacrifices (Deut. xii:6, 7; 1 Sam. ix:19; xvi:3, 5; 2 Sam. vi:19). These sacrificial meals were enjoyed in connection with peace offerings, whether eucharistic or votive. The kidneys, and all the inward fat, and the tail of the lamb, were burnt in the daily sacrifice; the breast and right shoulder fell to the priest; and the rest was to be eaten by the offerer and his friends, on the same day if the offering were eucharistic, on that and the next day if it were votive (Lev. iii:1-17; vii:11-21; 29:36; xix:5-8; xxii:29, 30). To the feast at the second tithe of the produce of the land, which was to be made every year and eaten at the annual festivals before Jehovah, not only friends, but strangers, widows, orphans, and Levites, were to be invited as well as the slaves. If the tabernacles were so distant as to make it inconvenient to carry thither the tithe, it was to be turned into money, which was to be spent at the place at which the festivals were held in providing feasts (Deut. xiv:22-27; xii:14; Tobit i:6). Charitable entertainments were also provided, at the end of three years, from the tithe of the increase. The Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow were to be present (Deut. xii:17-19; xiv:28, 29; xxvi:12-15). At the feast of Pentecost the command is very express (Deut. xvi:11), 'Thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you.' The Israelites were forbidden to partake of food offered in sacrifice to idols (Exod. xxxiv:15), lest they should be thereby enticed into idolatry or appear to give a sanction to idolatrous observances (1 Cor. x:28). (See AGAPE; FESTIVALS; Riddle, Christian Antiquities, p. 648; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xx.) J. R. B.

FEEBLE KNEES (Gr. τὰ παραλελυμένα γόνατα), a term employed to express the results of over-exertion, as in an athletic contest, and, figuratively, of weariness of mind, depression, low spirits (Heb. xii:12).

Men are said to have weak hands, and feeble knees, when they have small courage and vigor (Is. xxxv:3).

FEEBLE-MINDED (mind'éd), (Gr. δολγόψυχος, ol-ig-op'soo-kos, little spirited), a term frequently used in the Bible, and signifies one who is laboring under such trouble that his heart sinks within him (1 Thess. v:14, R. V. "fainthearted").

FEELING (fē'ing). (1) In Eph. iv:19 we find this "who being past feeling have given themselves over to lasciviousness," etc. The Greek word ἀπαλγῶ, ap-alg-eh o, means "to become insensible to pain, callous, and so indifferent to truth, honor, or shame."

In the epistle to the Hebrews we are told "we have not a high-priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (Heb. iv:15). The Greek term συμπάθειν, sum-patē-eh o, to feel for, to have compassion on, is employed.

(2) Religious feelings are those sensations or emotions of the mind produced by the views we have of religion which consist of contrition, repentance and devotion. Contrition is a feeling of sorrow for sin. Repentance is a feeling of hatred for sin. Devotion is a feeling of love to God and to his commandments.

(3) Those who keep God's commandments feel no evil. The heathen feel after God when groping to know him. Those are past feeling whose consciences are seared as with a hot iron, (Eph. iv:19)

FEET (fēt). See FOOT.

FELIX (fē'līx), (Gr. φιλίε, fy'lix, happy), a Roman procurator of Judea, before whom Paul so 'reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come,' that the judge trembled, saying, 'Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee' (Acts xxiv:25).

The context states that Felix had expected a bribe from Paul; and, in order to procure this bribe, he appears to have had several interviews with the Apostle. The depravity which such an expectation implies is in agreement with the idea which the historical fragments preserved respecting Felix would lead the student to form of the man.

The year in which Felix entered on his office cannot be strictly determined. From the words of Josephus (Antiq. xx:7, 1), it appears that his appointment took place before the twelfth year of the Emperor Claudius. Eusebius fixes the time of his actually undertaking his duties in the eleventh year of that monarch.

(1) Elevation and Crimes. Felix was a remarkable instance of the elevation to distinguished station of persons born and bred in the lowest condition. Originally a slave, he rose to little less than kingly power. For some unknown, but probably not very creditable services, he was manumitted by Claudius Cæsar (Sucton. Claud. 28; Tacit. Hist. v:9); on which account he is said to have taken the prænomen of Claudius. In Tacitus, however (loc. cit.), he is surnamed Antonius, probably because he was also a freedman of Antonia, the emperor's mother. The character which the ancients have left of Felix is of a very dark complexion. The country was ready for rebellion, and the unsuitable remedies which Felix applied served only to inflame the passions and to incite to crime. Josephus (Antiq. xx:8, 5) reports that under Felix the affairs of the country grew worse and worse. The land was filled with robbers and impostors who deluded the multitude. Felix used his power to repress these disorders to little purpose, since his own example gave no sanction to justice. Thus, having got one Dineas, leader of a band of assassins, into his hands, by a promise of impunity, he sent him to Rome to receive his punishment. Having a grudge against Jonathan the high-priest, who had expostulated with him on his misrule, he made use of Doras, an intimate friend of Jonathan, in order to get him assassinated by a gang of villains, who joined the crowds that were going up to the temple-worship—a crime which led subsequently to countless evils, by the encouragement which it gave to the Sicarii, or leagued assassins of the day, to whose excesses Josephus ascribes, under Providence, the overthrow of the Jewish state.

(2) Marriage. While in his office, being inflamed by a passion for the beautiful Drusilla, a daughter of King Herod Agrippa, who was married to Azizus, king of Emesa, he employed one Simon, a magician, to use his arts in order to persuade her to forsake her husband and marry him, promising that if she would comply with his suit, he would make her a happy woman. Drusilla, partly impelled by a desire to avoid the envy of her sister, Berenice, was prevailed on to transgress the laws of her forefathers, and consented to a union with Felix. In this marriage a son was born, who was named Agrippa; both mother and son perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which took place in the days of Titus Cæsar. (See DRUSILLA.)

(3) Hears Paul. Paul, being apprehended in Jerusalem, was sent by a letter from Claudius Lysias to Felix at Cæsarea, where he was at first confined in Herod's judgment hall till his accusers came. They arrived. Tertullus appeared as their spokesman, and had the audacity, in order to conciliate the good will of Felix, to express gratitude on the part of the Jews, 'seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence' (Acts xxiii; xxiv). Paul pleaded his cause in a worthy speech; and Felix, consigning the Apostle to the custody of a centurion, ordered that he should have such liberty as the circumstances admitted, with permission that his acquaintance might see him and minister to his wants. This imprisonment the Apostle suffered for a period of two years (Acts xxiv:27).

(4) Summoned to Rome. Felix was recalled to Rome, A. D. 60, and Festus was sent in his room. To do the Jews a pleasure, he left Paul bound; this, however, did him no service; numbers of them followed him to Rome, and complained of his extortion and violence. He would have been punished with death, had not his brother Pallas, by his credit at court, preserved his life (Acts xxiii and xxiv).

FELLER (fêl'êr), (Heb. פֶּלֶר, kâ-rath', to cut off, to fell), a cutter of wood.

This is an old Anglo-Saxon word and is used in Is. xiv:8, where David represents the cedars of Lebanon as rejoicing over the fall of Sennacherib, who had been their great destroyer.

FELLOES (fêl'îôs), (Heb. פֶּלְוֵי, khish-shook', conjoined spokes of a wheel, 1 Kings vii:33), probably means 'spokes' that connect the hub and rim rather than the rim itself. It is kindred to the word translated "fillet," joinings (Ex. xxvii:10).

FELLOW (fêl'îô).

1. A term of contempt denoted by the Heb. עֵשׂ, esh, (1 Sam. xxix:4), and Gr. ἀνὴρ, an-ayr', words for man.

2. The translation of ray'ah (Heb. רֵעַ, friend, associate, etc., Exod. ii:13; Judg. vii:13, etc.), and of khaw-bar' (Heb. חָבֵר, Eccles. iv:10).

3. The translation of aw-meeth' (Heb. אָוִיטָה, neighbor) in that peculiar passage, "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow" (Zech. xiii:7).

FELLOWSHIP.

1. The translation of the Hebrew tes-oo-meth', תְּשׁוּמָה, deposit (Lev. vi:2); something handed over as a pledge.

2. Joint interest (Heb. חָבֵר, khaw-bar', to be joined, Ps. xciv:20; Gr. κοινωνία, koy-nohn-ee'ah, fellowship, communion, Acts ii:42 et al.; μετοχή, met-okh-ay', partnership, 2 Cor. vi:14).

(1) The saints have fellowship with God; they are interested in whatever he is and has, and are allowed intimate familiarity with him (1 John i:7; Eph. ii:18). (2) They have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings; he suffered in their room; these sufferings are imputed to them, and the virtue thereof experienced by their hearts (Phil. iii:10). (3) The fellowship of the gospel is the mutual interest and intercourse of saints and ministers, in the profession of the truths, experience of the blessings, and observance of the rules and ordinances of the gospel (Phil. i:5). (4) There is no communion or fellowship between Christ and Belial, sin and holiness; i. e., neither mutual interest nor friendly intercourse (2 Cor. vi:14, 15). The bread and wine in the Lord's supper are the communion of the body and blood of Christ; they signify, seal, and apply the same; and are means of our partaking of Christ's person, righteousness, and fullness, for the nourishment of our souls and for promoting the fellowship of believers (1 Cor. x:16).

FENCE (Heb. גָּדֵר, gaw-dar', an inclosure).

The Hebrew fences were of two kinds. One was the outer thorny fence of the vineyard; and the other, the inner wall of stones surrounding it (Prov. xv:19; xxiv:31). The Phœnicians called any enclosed place guddir, and particularly gave this name to their settlement in the southwestern coast of Spain, which the Greeks from them called Gadeira, the Romans Gades, and the moderns, Cadiz. In Ezek. xiii:5; xxii:30 gadîr appears to denote the fortifications of a city.

Figurative. The wicked are as a tottering fence, and bowing wall; their ruin comes on them very suddenly (Ps. lxi:3).

FENCED CITIES. See FORT, FORTIFICATIONS, ETC.

Walls of Antioch.

FERRET (fēr'rēt), (Heb. אַנְ-אָו־קָו, an-aw-kaw', lizard, R. V., Lev. xi:30, for A. V. "ferret").

This lizard is named from the sound which it emits. Its scientific name is Ptyodactylus Hasselquistii. It is frequently found in houses. It is not very probable that the Hebrew original of this word signifies the ferret, which is so called with us. (See LIZARD.)

FERRYBOAT (fēr'rÿ bōt), (Heb. אַב־אָו־רָאוֹ, ab-aw-raw', crossing), mentioned only in 2 Sam. xix:18, "A ferryboat for the king's house."

FESTIVALS (fēs'ti-vals), (Heb. כְּהַג, khag, from the verb signifying to dance, and מוֹאֵד, mo-ade', a set time or assembly, place of assembling), were occasions of public religious observances, recurring at certain set and somewhat distant intervals.

I. Divine Institutions. Those which owe their existence to the authority of God are, the seventh day of the week, or the Sabbath; the Passover; Pentecost; the Feast of Trumpets; the Day of Atonement; the Feast of Tabernacles; the New Moon. Festivals which arose under purely human influences are, the Feast of Lots, or Purim; the Death of Holofernes; the Dedication; the Sacred Fire; the Death of Nicanor.

At the daily service two lambs of the first year were to be offered at the door of the tabernacle; one in the morning, the other in the evening, a continual burnt-offering. With each lamb was to be offered one-tenth of an ephah of flour, mingled with one-fourth of a hin of fresh oil, for a meat-offering, and one-fourth of a hin of wine for a drink-offering. Frankincense was to be placed on the meat-offering, a handful of which, with the frankincense, was to be burnt, and the remainder was to be eaten by the priest in the holy place, without leaven. The priests were to offer daily the tenth of an ephah of fine flour, half in the morning and half in the evening, for themselves. The high-priest was to dress the lamps in the tabernacle every morning, and light them every evening; and at the same time burn incense on the altar of incense. The people provided oil for the lamps which were to burn from evening to morning; the ashes were removed by a priest, dressed in his linen garment and his linen drawers, and then carried by him out of the camp, in his common dress. Great stress was laid on the regular observance of these requirements (Num. xxviii:1-8; Exod. xxix:38-42; Lev. vi:8-23; Exod. xxx:7-9; xxvii:20; Lev. xxiv:1-4; Num. viii:2).

(1) The Sabbath. Labor was to last not longer than six days. The seventh was a Sabbath, a day of rest, of holy convocation, on which no one, not even strangers or cattle, was allowed to do any servile work. The offender was liable to stoning.

On the Sabbath two lambs of the first year, without blemish, were to be offered for a burnt-offering, morning and evening, with two-tenths of an ephah of flour, mingled with oil, for a meat-offering, and one-half of a hin of wine for a drink-offering, thus doubling the offering for ordinary days. Twelve cakes of fine flour were to be placed every Sabbath upon the table in the tabernacle, in two piles, and pure frankincense laid on the uppermost of each pile. These were to be furnished by the people; two were offered to Jehovah, the rest were eaten by the priests in the holy place (Exod. xvi:23; Lev. xxiii:3; xxvi:2; Num. xxviii:9, 10).

(2) New Moon (Heb. רוֹשֵׁת הַחֹדֶשׁ, roshe kho'desh, beginning of month, Num. x:10; xxviii:11).

At the New Moon festival, in the beginning of the month, in addition to the daily sacrifice, two heifers, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, were to be offered as burnt-offerings, with three-tenths of an ephah of flour, mingled with oil, for each heifer; two-tenths of an ephah of flour, mingled with oil, for the ram; and one-tenth of an ephah of flour, mingled with oil, for every lamb, and a drink offering of half of a hin of wine for a heifer, one-third of a hin for the ram, and one-fourth of a hin for every lamb. One kid of the goats was also to be offered as a sin-offering.

(3) The Seventh New Moon, or Feast of Trumpets (Heb. יוֹם הַתְּרוּעוֹת, yome ter-oo-aw', day of blowing).

The first day of the seventh month was to be a Sabbath, a holy convocation, accompanied by the blowing of trumpets. In addition to the daily and monthly sacrifices, one ram and seven lambs were to be offered as burnt-offerings, with their respective meat-offerings, as at the usual New Moon festival (Num. xxviii:11-15; xxix:1:6; Lev. xxiii:23-25).

Three times in the year—at the Feast of Unleavened Bread, in the month Abib; at the Feast of Harvest, or of Weeks; and at the Feast of Ingathering, or of Tabernacles—all the males were to appear before Jehovah, at the place which he should choose. None were to come empty-handed, but every one was to give according as Jehovah had blessed him; and there before Jehovah was every one to rejoice with his family, the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Exod. xxiii:14-17; xxxiv:22-24; Deut. xvi:16-17).

(4) The Passover. The Hebrew word פָּסַח, feh'sakh (from פָּסַח, paw-sakh', to leap over, figuratively, to spare, show mercy) denotes: (1) In overstepping; (2) The paschal sacrifice by virtue of which the passing over was effected (Exod. xii:21, 27, 48; 2 Chron. xxx:15). The first of these three great festivals, that of Unleavened Bread, called also the Passover, was kept in the month Abib, in commemoration of the rescue of the Israelites by Jehovah out of Egypt, which took place in that month. (See PASSOVER).

In order to make the season more remarkable, it was ordained that henceforward the month in which it took place should be reckoned the first of the national religious year (Exod. xii:2). From this time, accordingly, the year began in the month Abib, or Nisan (March—April), while the civil year continued to be reckoned from Tishri (September—October) (Exod. xii:3, 14, 27; 43-49; Lev. xxiii:5; Num. xxviii:16; Deut. xvi:1-7). The Passover lasted one week, including two Sabbaths (De Wette, Archæol., p. 214). The first day and the last were holy, that is, devoted to the observances in the public temple, and to rest from all labor (Exod. xii:16; Lev. xxiii:6; Num. xxviii:18; Deut. xvi:8).

On the day after the Sabbath, on the Feast of Passover, a sheaf of the first fruits of the barley harvest was to be brought to the priest to be waved before Jehovah, accompanied by a burnt-offering. Till this sheaf was presented, neither bread nor parched corn, nor full ripe ears of the harvest, could be eaten (Exod. xii:15-20; xiii:6-10; Lev. xxiii:6-8; Deut. xvi:2-8; Num. xxviii:17-25).

(5) Pentecost. (Gr. Πεντηκοστή, pen-tay-kostay', fiftieth, i. e., day). The Feast of Pentecost or of Weeks was kept to Jehovah at the end of seven weeks from the day of the Festival of Unleavened Bread, on which the sheaf was presented. On the morrow after the seventh complete week, or on the fiftieth day, two wave loaves were presented as first fruits of the wheat-harvest, together with a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, and a peace-offering, etc. The day was a holy convocation, in which no servile work was done. The festival lasted but one day. It is said to have been designed to commemorate the giving of the law on Mount Sinai (Brown's Antiquities of the Jews, vol. i, p. 494; Deut. xvi:9-16; Num. xxviii:20-31; xv:17-21).

(6) Tabernacles, Feast of, the third of the great annual feasts, the other two being the Passover and Pentecost. These were:

1. The Festival of Tents (Heb. מִשְׁכָּן הַתְּשֻׁבֹת, khag has-sook-kohth', A. V. "Feast of Tabernacles, 2 Chron. viii:13; Ezra iii:4; Zech. vii:19, 20, 21; Gr. σκηνωτήρια, skay-noph-ayg-ee'ah, John vii:2, because the Israelites were commanded to live in booths during its continuance (comp. Lev. xxiii:43).

2. The Feast of Ingathering (Heb. מַעֲשֵׂה הַתְּשֻׁבֹת, khag haw-aw-seef'; Exod. xxiii:16; xxxiv:22), because it was held after the ingathering of the harvest and fruits.

3. The Festival of Jehovah (Heb. יְהוָה הַתְּשֻׁבֹת, khag yeh-ho-vaw', Lev. xxiii:39), or simply the festival (1 Kings viii:2; 2 Chron. v:3), because it was the most important or well known. This Feast of Ingathering or of Tabernacles began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, and continued eight days, the first and last being Sabbaths. During the feast all native Israelites dwelt in booths made of the shoots of beautiful trees, palm-branches, boughs of thick-leaved trees, and of the willows of the brook, when they rejoiced with their families, with the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, before Jehovah. Various offerings were made. At the end of seven years, in the year of release, at the Feast of Tabernacles, the law was required to be read by the priests in the hearing of all the Israelites (Deut. xvi:13-15; xxxi:10-13; Lev. xxiii:39-43; 33-36; Num. xxix:12-38, 40).

The Feast of Tabernacles was appointed partly to be an occasion of annual thanksgiving after the ingathering of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv:22; Lev. xxiii:39; Deut. xvi:13), and partly to remind the Israelites that their fathers had lived in tents in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii:40-43). This feast took place in the end of the year, September or October.

(7) Day of Atonement. (Heb. יוֹם הַכִּפּוּרִים, yome hak-kip-poor-eeem'). The tenth day of the seventh month was the Day of Atonement—a day of abstinence, a day of holy convocation, in which all were to afflict themselves. Special offerings were made. (See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) (Lev. xxiii:26-32; xvi:1, 31; Num. xxix:7-11; Exod. xxx:10.)

On these solemn occasions food came partly from hospitality (a splendid instance of which may be found in 2 Chron. xxxv:7-9), partly from the feasts which accompanied the sacrifices in the temple, and partly also from provision expressly made by the travelers themselves. Lodging, too, was afforded by friends, or found in tents erected for the purpose in and around Jerusalem (Helen's Pilgrimage; Brown's Antiquities, p. 520 ff.).

The three great festivals have corresponding events (but of far greater importance) in the new dispensation. The Feast of Tabernacles was the time when our Savior was born, some suppose; he was crucified at the Passover; while at Pentecost the effusion of the Holy Spirit took place.

The rest and recreation would be the more pleasant, salutary, and beneficial, because of the joyous nature of the religious services in which they were, for the greater part, engaged. These solemn festivals were not only commemorations of great national events, but they were occasions for the reunion of friends, for the enjoyment of hospitality, and for the interchange of kindness. The feasts which accompanied the sacrifices opened the heart of the entire family to joy, and gave a welcome which bore a religious sanction, even to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Michaelis, Mos. Recht, art. 199).

How much, too, would these gatherings tend to foster and sustain a spirit of nationality! By intercourse the feelings of tribe and clan would be worn away; men from different parts became acquainted with and attached to each other; partial interests were found to be more imaginary than real; while the predominant idea of a common faith and a common rallying-place at Jerusalem, could not fail to fuse into one strong and overpowering emotion of national and brotherly love, all the higher, nay, even the lower feelings, of each Hebrew heart.

'If,' says Michaelis (Mos. Recht, art. 198, Smith's Transl.), 'any of the tribes happened to be jealous of each other or involved in civil war, their meeting together in one place for the purposes of religion and sociality, had a tendency to prevent their being totally alienated; and even though this had happened, it gave them an opportunity of reuniting.' He adds that 'the separation of the ten tribes from the tribes of Judah under Rehoboam and Jeroboam could never have been permanent, had not the latter abrogated one part of the law of Moses relative to festivals. In order to perpetuate the separation, he prohibited the annual pilgrimages to Jerusalem, and appointed two places for divine service within his own territories' (1 Kings xii:27-30). 'He also,' adds Michaelis, 'transferred the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, and probably the other two festivals likewise, to a different season from that appointed by Moses' (1 Kings xii:33).

Another effect of these festivals Michaelis has found in the furtherance of internal commerce. They would give rise to something resembling our modern fairs. Among the Mahometans similar festivals have had this effect.

These festivals, in their origin, had an obvious connection with agriculture. Passover saw the harvest upon the soil; at Pentecost it was ripe; and Tabernacles was the festival of gratitude for the fruitage and vintage (Michaelis, art. 197). The first was a natural pause after the labors of the field were completed; the second, after the first-fruits were gathered; and the third, a time of rejoicing in the feeling that the Divine bounty had crowned the year with its goodness.

2. Human Institutions. (De Fœriarum Hebræorum origine ac ratione, auctore H. Ewald; Gottingæ, 1841; and Creuzer. Symbol. ii:597.)

(1) Purim. (Heb. פורים, poo-reem', lots).

The Feast of Purim or of Lots originated in the gratitude of the Jews in escaping the plot of Haman, designed for their destruction. It took its name from the lots which were cast before Haman by the astrologers, who knew his hatred against Mordecai and his wish to destroy his family and nation (Esther iii:7; ix:2, 5). The feast was suggested by Esther and Mordecai, and was celebrated on the 13th, 14th and 15th days of the twelfth month (Adar). The 13th was a fast, being the day on which the Jews were to have been destroyed; and on the 14th and 15th were a feast held in commemoration of their deliverance. The fast is called the Fast of Esther, and the feast still holds the name of Purim. Prideaux (Connex.) styles it the Bacchanalia of the Jews. (Brown, Antiq. i:575.)

(2) Death of Holofernes. The killing of Holofernes by the hand of Judith, the consequent defeat of the Assyrians, and the liberation of the Jews, were commemorated by the institution of a festival (Judith xiv: xv).

(3) Feast of Dedication. The Feast of Dedication was appointed by Judas Maccabæus, on occasion of the purification of the temple, and reconstruction of the altar, after they had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i; 2 Macc. v; Prideaux, sub A. C. 167-8, 170).

The new dedication took place on the 25th day of the ninth month, called Chislew, in the year before Christ, 170. This would be in December. The day was chosen as being that on which Antiochus, three years before, had polluted the altar by heathen sacrifices.

In John x:22 this festival is alluded to when our Lord is said to have been present at the Feast of Dedication. The historian marks the time by stating 'it was winter.'

(4) Festival of Fire. The festival 'of the Fire' was instituted by Nehemiah, to commemorate the miraculous rekindling of the altar-fire. The circumstances are narrated in 2 Macc. i:18.

(5) Defeat of Nicanor. The defeat by Judas Maccabæus of the Greeks when the Jews 'smote off Nicanor's head and his right hand which he stretched out so proudly,' caused the people to 'rejoice greatly, and they kept that day a day of great gladness; moreover, they ordained to keep yearly this day, being the thirteenth day of Adar'—February or March (1 Macc. vii:47).

Some other minor fasts and festivals may be found noticed in Brown's Antiquities, i:586; and in Simon's Dictionnaire de la Bible, art. Fêtes; Bähr, Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus, bk. iv; Raphall, Festivals of the Lord).

FESTUS, PORCIUS (fēs'tus pōr'shī-us), (Gr. Πόρκιος Φίστος, por'kee-os face'tos).

Porcius Festus was the successor of Felix as the Roman governor of Judea, to the duties of which office he was appointed by the emperor Nero (Joseph. Antiq. xx:8, 9; De Bell. Jud. ii: 1, 1), in the first year of his reign. One of his first official acts was hearing the case of the apostle Paul, who had been left in prison by his predecessor. He was at least not a thoroughly corrupt judge; for when the Jewish hierarchy begged him to send for Paul to Jerusalem, and thus afford an opportunity for his being assassinated on the road, he gave a refusal, promising to investigate the facts at Cæsarea, where Paul was in custody, alleging to them, 'it is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have license to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him' (Acts xxv:16). On reaching Cæsarea he sent for Paul, heard what he had to say, and, finding that the matters which 'his accusers had against him' were 'questions of their own superstition, and of one Jesus which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive,' he asked the apostle whether he was willing to go to Jerusalem, and there be tried, since Festus did not feel himself skilled in such an affair. Paul, doubtless because he was unwilling to put himself into the hands of his implacable enemies, requested 'to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus,' and was in consequence kept in custody till Festus had an opportunity to send him to Cæsar. Agrippa, however, with his wife Bernice, having come to salute Festus on his new appointment, expressed a desire to see and 'hear the man.' Accordingly Paul was brought before Festus, Agrippa and Bernice, made a famous speech, and was declared innocent. But having appealed to Cæsar, he was sent to Rome.

Festus, on coming into Judea, found the country infested with robbers, who plundered the villages and set them on fire; the Sicarii also were numerous. Many of both classes were captured, and put to death by Festus.

King Agrippa had built himself a splendid dining-room, which was so placed that, as he reclined at his meals, he commanded a view of what was done in the Temple. The priests, being displeased, erected a wall so as to exclude the monarch's eye. On which Festus took part with Agrippa against the priests, and ordered the wall to be pulled down. The priests appealed to Nero, who suffered the wall to remain, being influenced by his wife Poppæa, 'who was a religious woman' (Joseph. Antiq. xx:8, 11). Festus died shortly afterwards. The manner in which Josephus speaks is favorable to his character as a governor (De Bell. Jud. iv:14, 1).

FETTERS (fēt'tērs). Three Hebrews words are thus translated:

1. Nekh-o'sheth, נֶחֱשֶׁת, expresses the material of which they are made, brass; and also from the dual number, that they were made in pairs (Judg. xvi:21; 2 Sam. iii:34; 2 Kings xxv:7; 2 Chron. xxxiii:11; xxxvi:6; Jer. xxxix:7; lii:11).

2. Kebel, כֶּבֶל, Ps. cv:18; cxlix:8) may apply to the link connecting the fetters.

3. Zikkim, צִקִּים, frequently translated chains (Ps. cxlix:8; Is. xlv:14; Nah. iii:10), but it refers to the "contraction" of the feet by a chain (Gesen.

Thes. p. 424). Iron fetters are doubtless meant in Mark v:4; Luke viii:29. (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, i:410.)

FEVER (fē'vēr), (Heb. קדדחא, kad-dach-ath', burning heat). Both the Hebrew, kaddachath, and the Greek, πυρετός, pu-rec-tos', burning fire, are derived from the association of burning heat, the ordinary symptom of a febrile attack (Deut. xxviii:22; Matt. viii:14; Mark i:30; Luke iv:38; John iv:52; Acts xxviii:8).

FIDELITY (fī-dēl'ī-tē), (Gr. πίστις, pis'tis, strict adherence to one's promise or trust).

Thus our Lord says, 'Who then is that faithful and wise steward,' etc (Luke xii:42). Paul gives the description of the faithful servant as 'showing all good fidelity' (Tit. ii:10).

FIELD (Heb. שדה, generally saw-deh', smoothness).

The English word does not fully represent the Hebrew term. They both mean cultivated land, but sawdeh is applied specifically to what is uninclosed, the opposite of the notion conveyed by the word field. The separate plots of land were divided by stones, which might be removed (Deut. xix:14; xxvii:17; cf. Job. xxiv:2; Prov. xxii:28; xxiii:10). Stray cattle could enter (Exod. xxii:5), and therefore the flocks and herds must be constantly watched (Wortabet. Syria, i:293). From the absence of enclosures the term "field" might be applied to a plot of ground of limited area, or a man's whole property (Gen. xxiii:13, 17; Is. v:8; Lev. xxvii:16 ff; Ruth iv:5; Jer. xxxii:9, 25; Prov. xxvii:26; xxxi:16). The practice of leaving the fields unfenced, and separated only by a foot-path explains how seeds, in sowing, could fall on the hard unplowed earth and be exposed to the birds (Matt. xiii:4); and how the Saviour, with his disciples, could pass through the cornfields along these dividing paths, plucking the ears of corn, which, according to the Jewish custom, was not a violation of the rights of property (Luke vi:1 ff). (See Rob. Bibl. Res. ii:192.) It also explains how Ruth gathered grain "in a part of the field belonging to Boaz" (Ruth ii:3).

FIG TREE (fig), (Heb. תאנה, teh-ane', or תאנה, teh-av-nan'; Gr. σίκον, soo'kon), the fruit of the well-known tree.

Figs and Fig Leaves.

(1) The first notice of the fig-tree occurs in Gen. iii:7, where Adam and Eve are described as sewing fig-leaves together, to make themselves aprons. The common fig-leaf is not so well suited, for its lobed nature, for this purpose; but the practice of sewing or pinning leaves together is very common in the East even in the present day, and baskets, dishes and umbrellas are made of leaves so pinned or sewn together. The fig-tree is enumerated (Deut. viii:8; comp. Is. xxxiv:4) as one of the valuable products of Palestine, 'a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates.'

(2) It has been cultivated in Palestine from remote times, and is also found in a wild state. It does not grow to a great height, but throws out a profusion of very spreading branches, and the trunk is often three feet in diameter. Five-lobed leaves luxuriantly clothe these limbs, and often convert this tree into a beautiful natural arbor (1 Kings iv:25; 2 Kings xviii:31; Is. xxxvi:16; Mic. iv:4; Zech. iii:10; John i:48).

The fruit is pear-shaped, and the small green figs appear before the leaves. When these figs have attained some size, their interior will be found filled with minute white flowers. This curious provision leads to the common impression that this tree never blossoms. When the leaves have appeared, if there be no fruit among them, the fig-tree will be barren for the present season (Matt. xxi:19).

(3) Figs are much used as food in all Eastern lands. Two kinds of this fruit are mentioned in the Bible. (a) The early fig, or boccôre, of which a few ripen and are gathered in June (Is. xxviii:4; Hos. ix:10; Mic. vii:1), while the most of this early fruit falls off before it is perfected (Rev. vi:13). (b) The main crop, or kermouse, ordinarily does not ripen till August. These are the "green figs" of Cant. ii:13. "Bethphage" means "house of green figs." A long dark-colored kermouse sometimes hangs upon the trees all winter.

These various kinds of figs are eaten as they come from the tree, and are also dried in masses or cakes (1 Sam. xxv:18). They seem to have been an ordinary article of food, and to have possessed medicinal properties (2 Kings xx:7; 1 Chron. xii:40).

The putting forth of the fig-tree was one of the earliest indications of summer (Cant. ii:13; Matt. xxiv:32; Luke xxi:29; and a failure of its fruit was a great calamity (Jer. v:17; viii:13; Joel i:7, 12; Hab. iii:17, 18).

Figurative. (1) The fig-tree is referred to as one of the signs of prosperity (1 Kings iv:25). 'And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree.' (2) And its failure is noted as a sign of affliction (Ps. cv:33). 'He smote their fig-trees and broke the trees of their coasts.' (3) The Jewish nation is likened to a barren fig-tree, spared another year at the request of the dresser. When our Savior came into the world, and for more than three years exercised his public ministry among them, how barren were they, and how ripe for destruction! But by His intercession and the prayers of His apostles, they were spared till it was seen that the preaching of the gospel had no good effect on the greater part of them; and were afterward cut off with terrible destruction (Luke xiii:6-9). (4) They were also shadowed forth by the fig-tree with fair leaves, but no fruit, which Jesus cursed into barrenness and withering; they had many showy pretenses to holiness and zeal, but were destitute of good works and refused to believe in and receive the promised Messiah (Matt. xxi:19). (5) The cursing of the fig-tree by our Savior (Mark xi:13, 21) has occasioned great perplexity. This incident occurred about the beginning of April, when, as the evangelist states, the time for figs had not come. Why, then, should Christ seek figs upon the tree and, as it were, blame its barrenness? The best reply seems to be: because the tree was in leaf; and when the tree was in this state, abnormal though it were, fruit might be expected. Dr. Thompson, as the result of his observation, considers it not at all impossible that the early variety of this tree might have ripe fruit in the warm, sheltered ravines of Olivet at Easter. If there was no fruit on this leafy tree it might justly be condemned as barren; and hence the propriety of the lesson it was made to teach—that those who put forth in profusion only the leaves of empty profession are nigh unto cursing.

FIGURE (fig'ūr), the translation of the following words: Seh'mel (Heb. שֵׁמֶל, shem-el), an idol, as otherwise; mik-lah'ath (Heb. מִקְלַח־אֶתֶּן, mik-lah-ath), a carving; tab-neeth' (Heb. תְּבִינָה, tab-neeth'), likeness or model; an-teel'oo-pon (Gr. ἀντίτυπον, 1 Peter iii:21), antitype; and the verb met-askh-ay-mal-id'zo (Gr. μετασχηματίζω).

(1) Deut. iv:16, 'Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure,' (Driver, 'statue'). The word is found also (2 Chron. xxxiii:7, 15) 'idol,' and (Ezek. viii:3, 5) 'image.' The meaning 'statue' is confirmed by the Phœnician inscriptions.

(2) 1 Kings vi:29, 'He carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubim' and the next: vi:18 'was carved,' i. e., 'was carving of;' vi:32 'carvings;' vii:21 'gravings.' These 'carved figures' were representations of the cherubim cut in relief on the wood of the doors.

(3) Is. xliv:13, 'The carpenter . . . maketh it [the image] after the figure of a man (tabhniith). The Hebrew is frequent for the outward appearance of a person or thing.

(4) In Acts vii:43 the meaning is 'representations' or 'images of gods;' in Rom. v:14 it is 'type.'

(5) Heb. ix:24, 'Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself.'

(6) 1 Cor. iv:6, 'And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos.' The Greek verb 'in a figure transferred' elsewhere means to change one's form or appearance into some other form (2 Cor. xi:13, 14, 15) (A. V. 'transform,' R. V. 'fashion into' or 'fashion as'), and Phil. iii:21 (A. V. 'change,' R. V. 'fashion anew'). Here it is the truth stated that is to change its application; applied by the apostle to himself and Apollos, it really applies to the Corinthians. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See TYPE.)

FILE (fil), is the improper translation in the A. V. of the Heb. פֶּה חֲרָטִים, peh-ee-raw' peh (1 Sam. xiii:21), literally signifying a bluntness of the mouth, i. e., edge of tools.

FILLET (fil'ēt), an incorrect translation in the A. V. of two words:

1. Khash-oo-keem' (Heb. קָשָׁתִים, kash-ee-tem), joinings, Exod. xxxviii:17, 28; xxvii:17), the rods which joined together the tops of the pillars round the court of the Tabernacle (q.v.) and from which the curtain was suspended (Exod. xxvii:10, 11, etc.).

2. K'hoot (Heb. חוּט, chut), thread, as elsewhere rendered), i. e., a measuring line (Jer. lii:21).

FILTH, FILTHY (filth, fil'thÿ), the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words and meaning "foul matter," "anything that soils or defiles." In 2 Chron. xxix:5 and Ezra. vi:21, it denotes the filth from which the Jews were to cleanse the Temple.

Figurative. (1) Filth represents moral impurity (Ezek. xxxvi:25; 2 Cor. vii:1; James i:21, etc.). (2) That the filthiness of it may be molten in it'

(Ezek. xxiv:11) seems to mean that the pot was to be placed empty upon the fire that the rust may be burned away by the heat. The filthiness of the pot was the rust upon it. (3) The apostles were made as the filth of the world; its offscourings, or outswEEPINGS. They were by wicked men accounted and used as if most base and contemptible (1 Cor. iv:13). (4) Sinful pollutions of the heart or practice are often called filth and filthiness; they render men corrupt and abominable to God and to good men (Is. iv:4; Ezek. vi:21). (5) Men are represented as filthy, and filthiness, on account of their being infected and defiled with sin (Rev. xxii:11; Ezek. xxii:15). (6) Filthy lucre is gain basely and sinfully gotten; as when ministers make their salaries their great aim in their work (Tit. i:7, 11; 1 Pet. v:2).

FIN (Heb. פֶּשֶׁת, sen-ap-peer), a distinctive mark of such fish as might be eaten under the Mosaic law (Deut. xiv:9, 10; Lev. xi:9, 10, 12).

FINE (fin). Under the Mosaic law the amount of indemnification was fixed by the one injured in certain cases; in others by the judge (Ex. xxi:19-36; xxii:6; Deut. xxii:19, 29).

FINER (fin'ēr), (Heb. יָצַף, tsaw-raph, to refine), a worker of gold and silver (Prov. xxv:4).

FINGER (fin'gēr), (Heb. אֶבְטָן, ets-bah'; Gr. δάκτυλος, duk'too-los). Besides referring to the member of the human body it has a specific meaning as Digit (Heb. אֶבְטָן, ets-bah'), the smallest measure among the Hebrews, and equal to the breadth of the human finger. We find the thickness of the solid parts of Solomon's pillars measured by fingers (Jer. lii:21).

Figurative. (1) The finger of God denotes his power, his operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses (Exod. viii:19). (2) That legislator gave the tables written with the finger of God to the Hebrews (Exod. xxxi:18). The heavens were the work of God's fingers (Ps. viii:3). (3) Our Lord says, he casts out devils with the finger of God; meaning, perhaps, by his authority (Luke xi:20). (4) To put forth one's finger, is a bantering gesture (Is. lviii:9). (5) To "teach with the fingers," imported a concealed and indirect method of exciting others to iniquity (Prov. vi:13). (6) To bind God's law on the fingers, is to have it constantly in our eye as the rule and reason of our whole practice (Prov. vii:3). (7) Rehoboam's little finger being thicker than his father's loins, meant, that the easiest exertion of his power and authority, should be more rigid and grievous than any servitude or hardship they had suffered under his father (1 Kings xii:10; 2 Chron. x:10).

FINGER NAIL signatures were common among the Chaldeans. "An indentation was made with the finger nail on one of the sides of the (soft clay) tablet, and this mark, followed or preceded by the mention of a name, 'Nail of Zabudamik,' 'Nail of Abzii,' took the place of more or less complicated sign-manuals" (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 731). (Barnes' Bib. Cyc.)

FINISHER (Gr. τελειωτής, tel-i-o-tace', completer), spoken of Jesus (Heb. xii:2) as one who in his own person raised faith to its perfection and so set before us the highest example of faith (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.).

FIR (Heb. בֵּרֹשֶׁת, ber-ōsh'), probably the cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, L. This tree fulfills all the conditions of the various passages in which fir occurs (1 Kings vi:15, 34; 2 Chron. iii:5; Ezek. xxvii:5). The tall trunk of this tree is well adapted for masts.

FIRE (fir), (Heb. ^{פֶּרֶז}, aysh; Gr. πῦρ, poor).

The uses of fire among the Hebrews were various:—

(1) Domestic. The domestic use, for cooking, roasting, and baking. (See BREAD; FOOD.)

(2) Warmth. In winter they warmed themselves and their apartments, by 'a fire of coals' (Jer. xxxvi:22, 23; Luke xxii:55). In the rooms it would seem that a brazier with charcoal was usually employed, as is still the case in western Asia, although the ovens and fire-places used in baking bread might have been, and doubtless were, as now, often employed to keep rooms properly warm. (See BREAD; COAL.)

(3) Religious. The religious use of fire was for consuming the victims on the altar of burnt-offerings, and in burning the incense on the golden altar; hence the remarkable phrase in Is. xxxi:9—'the Lord, whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.'

In the sacerdotal services no fire but that of the altar of burnt-offerings could lawfully be used. That fire was originally kindled supernaturally and was ever after kept up. From it the fire used in the censers for burning incense was always taken; and for neglecting this and using common fire, Nadab and Abihu were struck dead by 'fire from heaven' (Lev. x:2, sq.; Num. iii:4; xxvi:61).

(4) War. In time of war torches were often carried by the soldiers; which explains the use of torches in the attack of Gideon upon the camp of the Midianites (Judg. vii:16). This military use of torches was very general among ancient nations, and is alluded to by many of their writers (Statius, Theb. iv:5, 7; Stobæus, Serm. p. 194; Michaelis, in Symbol Liter. Bremens., iii:254).

Towns were often destroyed by fire. This, as a war usage, belongs to all times and nations; but among the Hebrews there were some particular notions connected with it, as an act of strong abhorrence, or of devotion to abiding desolation. The principal instances historically commemorated are the destruction by fire of Jericho (Josh. vi:24); Ai (Josh. viii:19); Hazor (Josh. xi:11); Laish (Judg. xviii:27); the towns of the Benjamites (Judg. xx:48); Ziklag, by the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx:1); Jazer, by Pharaoh (1 Kings ix:16); and the temple and palaces of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv:9). Even the war-chariots of the Canaanites were burnt by the Israelites, probably on the principle of precluding the possibility of recovery, by the enemy, of instruments of strength for which they had themselves no use. The frequency with which towns were fired in ancient warfare is shown by the very numerous threats by the prophets that the towns of Israel should be burned by their foreign enemies. Some great towns, not of Israel, are particularly named; and it would be an interesting task to trace, as far as the materials exist, the fulfillment of these prophecies in those more marked examples. Among the places thus threatened we find Damascus (Is. xliii:12, 13), Gaza, Tyre, Teman (Amos i:7, 10, 11). The temples and idols of a conquered town or people were very often burned by the victors, and this was enjoined as a duty to the Israelites (Deut. vii:5, 25; xii:3; xiii:16; Is. xxxiii:12).

(5) Special Regulations. (1) There were some special regulations respecting the use of fire among the Israelites. The most remarkable of these was the prohibition to light fire on the Sabbath (Exod. xxxv:3). As the primary design of this law appears to have been to prevent the proper privileges of the Sabbath day from being lost to anyone through the care and time required in cooking victuals (Exod. xvi:23) it is doubted whether the use of fire for warmth on the Sabbath day was included in this interdiction. In practice it would appear that the fire was never lighted or kept up for cooking on the Sabbath day, and that consequently there were no fires in the houses during the Sabbaths of the greater part of the year; but it may be collected that, in winter, fires for warming apartments were kept up from the previous day. Michaelis is very much mistaken with respect to the climate of Palestine in supposing that the inhabitants could, without much discomfort, dispense with fires for warmth during winter (Mosaisches Recht, iv:105). The modern Jews, although there is no cooking in their houses, have fires on the Sabbath day, which are attended to by a Christian servant, or a char-woman is hired to attend to the fires of several houses, which she visits repeatedly during the day. (2) Another law required the damage done by a conflagration in the fields to be made good by the party through whose incaution it had been kindled (Exod. xxii:6). This was a most useful and necessary law in a country where the warmth and drought of summer soon render the herbage and underwood highly combustible, so that a fire once kindled often spreads most extensively, and produces disastrous consequences (Judg. ix:15; xv:5). This law was calculated to teach caution in the use of fire to the herdsmen in the fields, who were the parties most concerned. And it is to be remembered that the herdsmen were generally substantial persons, and had their assistant shepherds, for whose imprudence they were made responsible. Still no inference is to be drawn from this law with regard to fires breaking out in towns, the circumstances being so very different.

(6) Punishment. Burning criminals alive does not appear to have been known to the Hebrews; but as an additional disgrace the bodies were in particular cases burnt after death had been inflicted (Josh. vii:25; compare verse 15); and it is in this sense that the allusions to burning as a punishment are to be understood, except when the reference is to a foreign usage, as in Dan. iii:22, 24, sq.

Figurative. (1) 'Fire from heaven,' 'fire of the Lord,' usually denotes lightning in the Old Testament; but, when connected with sacrifices, the 'fire of the Lord' is often to be understood as the fire of the altar, and sometimes the holocaust itself (Exod. xxix:18; Lev. i:9; ii:3; iii:5, 9; Num. xxviii:6; 1 Sam. ii:28; Is. xxx:30; Mal. i:10). (2) Fire was a symbol of the Lord's presence and the instrument of his power, either in the way of approval or of destruction (Exod. xiv:19, 24; Num. xi:1, 3, etc.). Thus Jehovah appeared in the burning bush and on Mount Sinai (Exod. iii:2; xix:18). In the midst of fire he showed himself to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John (Is. vi:4; Ezek. i:4; Rev. i:14), and will so appear at his second coming (2 Thess. i:8). (3) Fire is the comparison of intense love (Cant. viii:6); of the injuring tongue (Ps. cxx:4; Prov. xvi:27; Jas. iii:5), and of godlessness (Is. ix:18). (4) God is compared to fire because of his purity, majesty, terribleness (Deut. iv:24; Heb. xii:29; Is. x:17). (5) Christ is compared to fire; he tries the children of men, purifies and comforts his people, and destroys his enemies (Mal. iii:2; Ezek. viii:2, and i:27). (6) The Holy Ghost is likened to fire, to denote his enlightening, purifying, sin-destroying, and holy love-enkindling influences (Matt. iii:11; Acts ii:3; Is. iv:4). (7) Angels are compared to fire; they are pure in their nature, and their execution of God's command is irresistible, awful and speedy (Ps. civ:4). (8) The church of God is likened to fire; she is often full of troubles; but, eventually she shall prevail over her opposers (Obad. 18). (9) The wicked are like fire; they are very dangerous and destructive to others, and hateful to God (Prov. vi:27; Is. lxxv:5), and God makes them like a fiery oven, when he inflicts his judgments on them (Ps. xxi:9). (10) God's word is like fire; it tries the states and conditions of men; and it warms, melts and purifies the heart, and its threatenings are fulfilled (Jer. v:14, and xxiii:29).

FIRE BAPTISM. See BAPTISM OF FIRE; MOLECH.

FIREBRAND (fir-bränd).

1. Laf'peed (Heb. לַפְּעֵד, torch, Judg. xv:4). The firebrand used by Samson was probably a torch made of resinous wood or other material that would hold fire.

2. Zake (Heb. זָקֵה, Prov. xxvi:18), i. e., arrows fitted with combustibles (comp. Eph. vi:16).

3. Ood (Heb. זָקֵה, Is. vii:4; Amos iv:11), the burnt ends of wooden pokers (literally, fire stirrers), which would blaze no longer, but only continue smoking.

FIREPAN (fir-pän), (Heb. מַכְחֹתָוִי, makh-taw'), a vessel used in the temple service (Ex. xxvii:3, xxxviii:3; 2 Kings xxv:15; Jer. lii:19). In Ex. xxv:38; xxxvii:23; Num. iv:9, the word is translated "snuff-dish," and in Lev. x:1; xvi:12; Num. xvi:6 ff, "censer." The first mentioned must have been like a chafing dish, to carry coals for burning incense; the other like a snuffer-dish to trim the lamps.

FIRES (firz), (Heb. אֵשׁ, oor). In Is. xxiv:15 we read, "Glorify ye the Lord in the fires," but which is better rendered in the R. V. "East." The lands of the Asiatic East were called oo-reeem, "the lands of light," i. e., the sun-rising, as opposed to the West, i. e., the "from the sea" (verse 14). (Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

FIRE, STRANGE. See FIRE, 3.

FIRE WORSHIP or PYROLATRY. The custom which prevailed among the ancient Persians and Medes, and which also obtained among the Carthaginians, Scythians, the ancient Germans and the ancient inhabitants of Great Britain.

Reville, Religions of Mexico and Peru, pp. 162 and 163, says: Among the Peruvians "fire, considered as derived from the sun, was the object of profound veneration. Strange as it may seem at first sight, the symbol of fire was stones. But . . . stones were thought to be animated by the fire that was supposed to be shut up within them, since it could be made to issue forth by a sharp blow. A perpetual fire burned in the Temple of the Sun and in the abode of the Virgins of the Sun. It was supposed that fire became polluted and lost its divine nature by too long contact with men. The fire must be renewed from time to time, and this act was performed yearly by the chief priest of Peru, who kindled wood by means of a concave golden mirror.

FIRKIN (fēr'kín). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FIRMAMENT (fēr'má-ment), (Heb. רָקִיעַ, raw-kee'ah, expanse), the pure and transparent expanse of ether which envelops the globe. This is the word which is translated as "the firmament of the heavens." It is explained in Gen. i:14, 15, 17, as that which is distended, expanded—the expanse of heaven. (See marginal reading.)

With some old astronomers the firmament is considered the region of the fixed stars, or the highest of all the heavens. But in Scripture, and in common language, it is used for the middle regions, the space or expanse appearing like an arch immediately above us in the heavens. Many of the ancients, and of the moderns also, account the firmament a fluid substance; but science has yet to find a better name than the term which Moses used so long ago, viz., expanse.

The Hebrews seem to have considered the firmament as transparent, like a crystal or sapphire (Ezek. i:22; Dan. xii:3; Exod. xxiv:10; Rev. iv:6).

FIRSTBORN (fērst' bōrn'). The rendering of several words from Heb. בְּרִיָּא, baw-kar', to burst forth; Gr. πρωτοτόκος, pro-tot-ok'os, applied both to animals and human beings.

By the firstborn, in a religious point of view, we are to understand the first of a mother's offspring (Exod. xii:12). (See INHERITANCE.)

Figurative. The term firstborn denotes that which is most excellent. (1) Christ, the first-born of every creature, and the first-begotten from the dead, who, as he was begotten from eternity, is dignified above all creatures, has a double portion of power, authority and fullness; is the great high priest consecrated for evermore, and is the first, the only person, who ever did or will rise from the dead by his own power. He is the head of all his chosen, the preserver of his father's name, and the sanctifier of his people (Col. i:15, 18; Rev. i:5). (2) The firstborn of the poor are those who are exceedingly wretched, having a double share of poverty (Is. xiv:30). (3) The firstborn of death is an accursed and most wretched and tormenting death (Job xviii:13).

FIRSTBORN, DESTRUCTION OF. See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

FIRSTBORN IN ISRAEL.

(1) Consecrated. The first-born male of every Jewish family and of all beasts was consecrated to God in commemoration of the judgment which God brought upon the firstborn of Egypt (Ex. xiii:2). Several provisions of the Jewish law relate to the firstborn.

(2) Privileges. He received a double portion of the estate (Deut. xxi:17) and officiated as priest of the family in the father's absence or death. The privileges of the firstborn were obviously great in the cases of Esau and Reuben (Gen. xxvii:19, 32; 1 Chron. v:1, 2), but might be forfeited, as these two cases show. The religious pre-eminence of the firstborn ceased when the priesthood was committed exclusively to the tribe of Levi (Num. iii:12, 13). It was then required that a certain piece of money (5 shekels, about $2.50) should be paid for the redemption of all the firstborn of succeeding generations; and this redemption money became part of the sacred revenue (Num. viii:17; xviii:16).

(3) Beasts. The firstborn of all beasts used in sacrifice were devoted to the Lord (Ex. xiii:2), but the firstborn of unclean animals might be redeemed with the addition of one-fifth of the value (Lev. xxvii:13); otherwise they were sold, exchanged, or destroyed (Ex. xiii:13; Lev. xxvii:27). It is supposed that dogs were never redeemed (Deut. xxiii:18). (See BIRTHRIGHT.)

FIRST FRUIT (fĕrst frŭt), (Heb. ראשית, ray-sheeth').

No doubt the leading object, as far as regards the offering of the first fruits to God, was, that all the after fruits and after gatherings might be consecrated in and through them, and it was not less the dictate of a natural impulse that the first fruits should be offered to God in testimony of thankfulness for his bounties. Hence we find some analogous customs among most nations in which material offerings were used. There are, however, some particulars in the Mosaical regulations which these considerations do not adequately explain.

1. First Fruits of Fruit Trees. It was directed that the first fruits of every tree whose fruit was used for food should, for the first three years of bearing, be counted 'uncircumcised,' and regarded as unclean (Lev. xix:23, 24). It was unlawful to sell them, to eat them, or to make any benefit of them. It was only in the fourth year of bearing that they were accounted 'holy,' and the fruit of that year was made an offering of first fruits, and was either given to the priests (Num. xviii:12, 13), or, as the Jews themselves understand, was eaten by the owners of it 'before the Lord, at Jerusalem,' as was the case with second tithe. After the fourth year all fruits of trees were available for use by the owner. As the general principle of the law was, that only that which was perfect should be used in offerings, it is an obvious inference that the fruits of trees were considered imperfect until the fourth year, and if so, the law may have had the ulterior object of excluding from use crude, immature, and therefore unwholesome fruits. Michaelis (iii:267-8), indeed, finds a benefit to the trees themselves in this regulation.

2. First Fruits of Yearly Increase. Of these there were two kinds—(1) The first fruits in the sheaf (Lev. xxiii:10). (2) The first fruits in the two wave-loaves (Lev. xxiii:17). These two bounded the harvest, that in the sheaf being offered at the beginning of the harvest, upon the 15th of the month Nisan; the other at the end of the harvest, on the Feast of Pentecost. Both of these are called תְּנוּפֹת, ten-oo-faw' (undulation), wave offerings.

(1) Heave Offerings. (1) The first of the dough, being the twenty-fourth part thereof, which was given to the priests (Num. xv:20), and this kind of offering was not neglected even after the return from Babylon (Neh. x:37). (2) The first fruits of the threshing floor. These two are together called תְּרוּמָה, ter-oo-maw', (raised), 'heave offerings'; the one, the 'heave offering of the threshing floor,' the other, 'the heave offering of the dough.' The words tenuphoth and terumoth both signify 'shake offering,' 'heave offering,' or 'wave offering.'

(2) First Fruits of Corn, Wine, etc. The second sort consisted of corn, wine, oil and whatever other produce was fit for the support of human life. Under this class of first fruits was included the first of the fleece, by which the priests were provided with clothes, as by the other offerings with food. The hair of goats, which are shorn in the East, was included under this denomination.

(3) Ceremonies. The first fruits were brought up to Jerusalem with great pomp and ceremony. All the people of a given district assembled on an appointed day in one of the towns, and lodged in the streets. On the following morning the chief of the party gave the signal for departure.

When the party came to the mount of the Temple every one then, however high or noble, took his own basket upon his shoulder, and went forward till he came to the court of the Temple. The offerer, having the basket still upon his shoulder, then began to recite the passage, 'I profess this day,' etc. (Deut. xxvi:3-10). It was usual with those who were liberally disposed to hang turtle-doves or pigeons about their baskets, and these formed part of the offering. The first fruits became the property of the course of priests which was in actual service. The party who brought them was obliged to spend the night following his offering in Jerusalem, but was at liberty to return home the ensuing morning.

It is obvious that this and some other of the apparently onerous obligations of the law, cannot be properly appreciated or understood when regarded in the 'dry light' of abstract duties or exactions. They were surrounded by engaging and picturesque associations, calculated to make their observance a matter of privilege and pleasure to all the parties concerned.

Figurative. (1) The ancient patriarchs were the first fruits of the Jewish nation, by whose means their posterity were blessed, and set apart to God (Rom. xi:16). (2) The Hebrews were the first fruits of God's increase; were long his peculiar people, before the gentiles were gathered to Shiloh (Jer. ii:3). (3) The first fruits of the Spirit are such communications of his grace on earth, as fully ensure the full enjoyment of God hereafter (Rom. viii:23). (4) The first fruits were typical of Jesus, the principal first fruits, who was before all things, who has in all things the preëminence, and by his consecration, oblation, and resurrection on the second day of unleavened bread his people are sanctified to God, and their resurrection and eternal happiness secured (1 Cor. xv:20), and whose Spirit descending at Pentecost, began to gather the nations to Christ (Acts ii). (5) They represent the saints, who, as first fruits to God, were chosen to his service; in the day of power devote themselves to him; are by grace rendered more excellent than their neighbors, and are a means of preserving and converting the nations to Christ. (6) Those who are first converted to Christ in a country are represented as the first fruits of it (Rev. xiv:4; Jam. i:18; 1 Cor. xvi:15).

FISH (fish), (Gr. ἰχθύς, ich-thoos', Gen. ix:2; Num. xi:22; Jonah ii:1, 10; Matt. vii:10; xiv:17; xv:34; Luke v:6; John xxi:6, 8, 11).

(1) Fishes, strictly so called, that is, oviparous, vertebrated, cold-blooded animals, breathing water by means of gills or branchiæ, and generally, provided with fins, are not unfrequently mentioned in the Bible, but never specifically.

(2) In the Mosaic law (Lev. xi:9-12), distinction of them is made into clean and unclean, according as they have fins and scales or are without them. Of the numerous species of fish which inhabit the lakes and rivers of Palestine and the adjacent sea, Solomon possessed some knowledge (1 Kings iv:33), but not a single variety has its name recorded in the Bible. (The whale is not a fish!)

(3) An aggravation of the first plague of Egypt was the destruction of fish—an important part of the food of the people. In the wilderness the Israelites murmured for the fish of their old home (Num. xi:5). It was a sad prophecy for Egypt that by the falling of her waters the fishermen should mourn, and that they should be disappointed who make ponds and sluices for fish (Is. xix:5-10; comp. Ezek. xxix:4-10).

(4) Most of the still and running waters of Palestine swarm with fish. Josephus first called attention to the similarity of the fish of the Sea of Galilee and those of the Nile. Of those in the former water Tristram says: the density of the shoals can scarcely be conceived by those who have not witnessed them. Frequently these shoals cover an acre or more of the surface, and the fish, as they slowly move along in masses, are so crowded, with their back-fins just appearing on the level of the water, that the appearance at a little distance is that of a violent shower of rain pattering on the surface. We obtained fourteen species of fish in the lake, and probably the number inhabiting it is at least three times as great.

But not all of these fish of Galilee are savory eating (Matt. xiii:47, 48). On this lake four of the disciples toiled as fishermen (Matt. iv:18-21).

(5) But the Hebrews could draw only a small supply from the lake of Tiberias and the affluents of the Jordan. On the coast the great sea-fisheries were in the slack waters, within the dominion of the Phœnicians, who must have sent the supply into the interior in a cured or salted state; although the fact involves the question how far in that condition, coming out of Pagan hands, consumption by a Hebrew was strictly lawful; perhaps it may be presumed that national wants had sufficient influence to modify the law. The art of curing fish was well understood in Egypt, and unquestionably in Phœnicia, since that industrious nation had early establishments for the purpose at the Golden Horn or Byzantium, at Portus Symbolorum in Tauric Chersonesus, and even at Calpe, in the present Bay of Gibraltar.

(6) The usual method of catching fish was either by casting the net (Hab. i:15; Ezek. xxvi:5, 14; xlvii:10; Matt. iv:18, 20, 21; Mark i:16, 18, 19; Luke v:2 ff; John xxi:6 ff), or dragging it (Is. xix:8; Matt. xiii:47). See Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 245, 426, 485, 529, 544. The language of Matt. vii:10, and Luke xi:11, implies that one in need might ask a fish as a gratuity and expect to receive it.

(7) The Hebrews seem to have classified together all creatures living in the waters, whether 'whales' A.V. or 'sea-monsters' R.V. (Gen. i:21; Heb. tunninim), or 'great fish' (Jonah i.17: dāg gādhal), or the 'living creature that moveth' (Gen. i:21), or 'fish' (ver. 28). (See JONAH.)

(8) The fish was an object of idolatry in all the ancient world. The Philistines worshiped Dagon, the fish-god (1 Sam. v:4), who was represented with the body of a man and the tail of a fish (see DAGON). Hence it was forbidden to make an image of a fish (Deut. iv:18), which to the Hebrew included, as before said, all living creatures in the water (Ex. xx:4).

(9) The form of a fish (Notius Poseidon) was from remote ages, a type of protective dominion, as above indicated. As the symbolizing spirit of the ancients it passed into Christian observance, as appears from Eusebius (Life of Constantine), and St. Augustine (De Civitate Dei). On the walls of the oldest catacombs of Rome the representation of the fish is frequently discernible, and always interpreted as an emblem of the Savior.

Figurative. (1) Men are compared to fishes and fishes of the great sea; they are very numerous; their tempers and courses are very different; they often live in a very confused and disorderly manner; they prey on one another; they are frequently taken in the net of temptation and trouble, and sometimes in the net of the gospel. At last, by the providence of God, they are drawn to the shore of the eternal state; and the good fishes are separated from the sea (Ezek. xlvii:9, 10;

Eccl. ix:12; Matt. xiii:47-50). (2) Ministers are fishers of men; by casting the net of the gospel among them, with great labor and care they draw them to Christ and his church (Matt. iv:16; Ezek. xlvii:10). (3) The Chaldeans are called fishers; they ensnared, apprehended and carried out of their country multitudes of men (Jer. xvi:16; Hab. i:15).

FISHER (Heb. דָּוֶוּג', dav-vawg'; Gr. ἀλιεύς, hal-ee-yoos').

In addition to the usual meaning, the Lord called his disciples "fishers of men" (Matt. iv:19; Mark i:17). (See FISHHOOK.)

FISH GATE (fish gāt), (Heb. שַׁעַר הַדָּוּוּגִים, shah'ar had-dawg-yeem', gate of the fishes), the name (2 Chron. xxxiii:14; Neh. iii:3; xii:39) of one of the gates of Jerusalem. (See JERUSALEM.)

FISHHOOK (fish'hōök), (Heb., plural הַרְוֹת הַדָּוּוּגִים, see-roth' doo-gaw', horns of fishing, Amos iv:2; comp. Jer. xvi:16).

The method of taking fish with hooks was doubtless known in the early ages of the world (Job xli:1). The spear was also used (Job xli:7).

The usual way, however, was by a net—either a casting-net (Ezek. xxvi:5; xlvii:10; Hab. i:15; Matt. iv:20, 21; Mark i:18, 19; Luke, v:2; John xxi:6 ff.) or a drag net (Is. xix:8; Hab. i:15; Matt. xiii:47). In the latter case a boat was necessarily used. Such fishing was done, by preference, at night (Luke v:5). Angling was a favorite recreation in ancient Egypt. The reference in Job xli:2 is to the custom of putting a ring through the gill of a fish, and then by a line attaching it to a stake, the object being to keep it alive in the water until required for use. Besides amateur there were professional fishermen. Such were many of the apostles. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

FISHING (Heb. דָּוּוּג', deeg; Gr. ἀλιεύω, hal-ee-yoo'o). For modes of fishing see FISHHOOK.

FISH POOL (fish pōöl), (Heb. בְּרִיּוֹת, ber-ay-kaw', pool), in general a pond or reservoir (Cant. viii:4); a mistranslation for "pools" simply. There is no reference to fish. (See HESHBON.)

FITCHES (fich'ez), the rendering of two different words.

1. Keh'tsakh (Heb. קַחֲצִי, Is. xxviii:25, 27), which refers to the fruit of the nutmeg flower, Nigella sativa, L. It is a plant of the buttercup family.

Some species are cultivated in our flower gardens under such names as "love-in-a-mist." Fitches are grown for their small black, hot-tasting seeds, which are sprinkled over the flat cakes of the Syrians before they are baked. These tender seeds are still beaten out with a stout staff, as described in Is. xxviii:27.

2. Koos-seh'meth (Heb. מֵת מִקֹּס, Ezek. iv:9), which should be vetch or kirsenneh, or as in the margin, "spelt." (See RYE; KETZACH.)

FLAG (fläg), (Heb. אֲוֶלֶת, aw'khood).

Probably used, as by us, somewhat indefinitely (Ex. ii:3). If any special plant was intended it may have been the edible rush or the flowering rush, both of which abound in Egypt, and the latter in Palestine.

The Hebrew original, אֲוֶלֶת, is rendered (Gen. xli:2, 18) A. V. "meadow," R. V. "reed grass." It would be better to render it in all the passages fens. Another word, soof (Exod. ii:3, 5), is well translated "flags." (See ACHU.) For Flag, an Ensign, see STANDARDS.

FLAGON (fläg'ün), (Heb. אֶשְׁשָׁא, ash-ee-shaw', a thin cake).

1. The word thus rendered in the A. V. (2 Sam. vi:10; 1 Chron. xvi:3; Hos. iii:1; Cant. ii:5) means rather a cake, especially of dried figs or raisins, pressed into a particular form. (See FRUITS.)

2. In Is. xxii:24 occurs the word nebel, which was used for a bottle or vessel, at first of skin, later of pottery (Is. xxx:14). The same word means a musical instrument; the "psaltery" of the A. V., or "viol."

FLAKE (flāk), (Heb. פֶּאֵל, maf-pawl', pendulous), the dewlaps or flabby parts on the belly of the crocodile (Job xli:23), which are firmly attached to the body and do not hang loosely as on the ox.

FLAME (flām). See FIRE.

FLANK (flānk), (Heb. כֶּסֶל, keh'sel, loin), in the plural the internal muscles of the loins near the kidneys, to which the fat adheres (Lev. iii:4, 10, 15; vii:4); hence the viscera in general, figuratively for the inmost feelings (Ps. xxxviii:7, "loins"). (See REINS.)

FLAX (flāx), (Heb. פִּישָׁתוֹ, pish-taw'), a well-known plant, Linum sativum, L.

The fibers of the bark, when separated, twisted, bleached and woven, are linen. In the raw state they are "tow" (Judg. xvi:9; Is. i:31). Somewhat twisted, tow constitutes a "wick" (R. V. marg. Is. xlii:3; xliii:17). (See PISHTAH.)

Egyptian Flax.

It was produced of the best quality in Egypt (Is. xix:9), and was an article of extensive commerce.

At the present day, as in ancient times, flax is laid upon the housetop in the heat of the sun to dry (Josh. ii:6). It was anciently the labor of the most noble ladies (Prov. xxxi:13, 19, 24. (See LINEN.)

FLEA (flē), (Heb. פִּישָׁתוֹ, par-oshe, pulex irritans), occurs only 1 Sam. xxiv:14; xxvi:20, where David thus addresses his persecutor Saul at the cave of Adullam: 'After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue—after a flea?' 'The king of Israel is come out to seek a flea!'

In both these passages the Hebrew means 'to pursue after, to seek one or a single flea.' David's allusion to the flea displays great address. It is an appeal founded upon the immense disparity between Saul as the king of Israel and himself as the poor, contemptible object of the monarch's laborious pursuit. Hunting a flea is a comparison, in other ancient writings, for much labor expended to secure a worthless result. However, the reference (1 Sam. xxvi:20) is considered by some an error in the text. Owing to the habits of the lower orders, fleas abound so profusely in Syria, especially during the spring, in the streets and dusty bazaars, that persons of condition always change their long dresses upon returning home. There is a popular saying in Palestine that 'the king of the fleas keeps his court at Tiberias'; though many other places in that region might dispute the distinction with that town (Kitto's Physical History of Palestine, p. 421).

FLESH (flēsh), (Heb. בָּשָׂר, baw-sawr', fleshiness). This word bears a variety of significations in Scripture:

(1) Whole Animal Creation. It is applied, generally, to the whole animated creation, whether man or beast; or to all beings whose material substance is flesh (Gen. vi:13, 17, 19; vii:15, etc.).

(2) Humanity. But it is more particularly applied to 'mankind,' and is, in fact, the only Hebrew word which answers to that term (Gen. vi:12; Ps. xlv:3; cxlv:21; Is. xl:5, 6). In this sense it is used somewhat figuratively to denote that evil principle which is opposed to the spirit, and to God, and which it is necessary to correct and subdue (Gen. vi:5; Job x:4; Is. xxxi:3; Matt. xvi:17; Gal. i:16, etc.).

(3) Opposed to Soul. The word 'flesh' is opposed to nephesh, 'soul,' or 'spirit,' just as we oppose body and soul (Job xiv:22; Prov. xiv:30; Is. x:18).

(4) Ordinary Sense. The ordinary senses of the word, namely, the flesh of men or beasts (Gen. xli:2, 19; Job xxxiii:25), and flesh as used for food (Exod. xvi:12; Lev. vii:19), are both sufficiently obvious; and with respect to the latter see FOOD.

(5) General Term. The word 'flesh' is also used as a modest general term for the secret parts, in such passages as Gen. xvii:11; Lev. xii:3; Ezek. xxiii:20; 2 Peter ii:10; Jude 7. In Prov. v:11 the 'flesh of the intemperate' is described as being consumed by infamous diseases.

FLESH AND BLOOD (blūd), (Gr. σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα), an expression denoting man as fallible, liable to err (Matt. xvi:17; comp. Gal. i:16; Eph. vi:12).

Figurative. (1) "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" human nature, in its frail and corrupt condition, is not capable of the immediate enjoyment of God (1 Cor. xv:50). (2) We are not born again by the will of flesh or blood; that is, by natural descent from godly parents, or by any, however vigorous and careful, cultivation of our natural powers (John i:13).

(3) Flesh and blood, that is, merely human means, did not reveal Jesus' true character as the Christ, the Son of the living God, to Peter (Matt. xvi:17). (4) Paul, when converted, conferred not with flesh and blood; consulted not earthly friends, inclinations or views regarding his true interest and duty (Gal. i:16).

FLESH HOOK (flesh'hōök), (Heb. מַזְלָג, maz-layg', and מַזְלָגָה, maz-law-gaw'), an instrument with a number of prongs bent backward to catch and draw the flesh from the fire when it was being roasted in the sacrificial service (1 Sam. ii:13, 14; Exod. xxvii:3; xxxviii:3; Num. iv:14; 1 Chron. xxviii:17; 2 Chron. iv:16). The hook mentioned in Samuel is three tined, and was probably only an ordinary culinary fork.

FLESHPOT (flesh'pōt), (Heb. סִיר הַבָּשָׂר, seer hab-baw-saw'r, pot of the flesh), probably of bronze, standing on three legs, and suitable for cooking purposes (Exod. xvi:3).

FLIES (fliz), (Heb. זְבוּב, zeb-oo'b, fly). The immense number of flies in the East is one of its most striking characteristics. The Heb. zeb-oo'b', which is part of the name of the god of Ekron, Baal-zebub, is generic, but as the house fly is the most familiar representative it would be most frequently thought of in connection with this name. In speaking of the plague of flies the word used is עֲרוֹב, aw-robe'. (See FLY.)

FLINT (flint), (Heb. מַלְאֲכָיִם, khal-law-meesh', perhaps hardness). The Heb. word צֶרֶם, tsor, for צָר, tsor, is rendered "rock" (Job. xxviii:9).

Flint is a form of silica, a mineral which occurs in its purest condition as quartz. Flint is found in bands and nodules in certain calcareous rocks, notably in chalk, in various parts of the world. It is exceedingly hard, and breaks with a glassy fracture and sharp edges. When pieces of it are struck together, or against steel, sparks are emitted, and this method of obtaining fire has been used from the earliest times. It is probably alluded to in 2 Macc. x:3. Flints are often dark colored owing to impurities. Their origin is one of the problems of geology not yet completely solved, but it is supposed that the siliceous framework of certain marine organisms was dissolved, and afterward deposited in cavities, or actually substituted for the material of other organic remains. (Jas. Patrick, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

Flint proper was the material almost everywhere employed in early prehistoric time for edge tools and weapons, prior to the use of metals. Its hardness, and the peculiar sharpness of its edges when broken or "flaked," rendered it all important for such purposes to primitive man, and hence the science of prehistoric archæology has dealt very largely with the study of flint implements, in their wide distribution, their varied forms and their stages of evolution from ruder and more finished types. All this lies back of any Old Testament references. (Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

Figurative. In Is. 1:7 it signifies the firmness of the prophet against his persecutors. In Ezek. iii:9, the Hebrew tsor is translated "flint" in the same sense. The hoofs of horses are likened to flint (Is. v:28) in hardness.

FLOAT (flōt), of uncertain derivation. A raft for conveying bulky substances like timbers, etc., by water. Thus Solomon contracted with Hiram, king of Tyre, to have cedars cut on the western side of Mount Lebanon and floated to Joppa or Jaffa, and then carried overland to Jerusalem (1 Kings v:9). Sometimes spelled "flote" (2 Chron. ii:16).

Figurative. (1) Armies, nations and companies of men are likened to flocks; they are numerous, and are inspected, governed, and, as it were, fed and folded by their respective rulers

(Jer. xlix:20 and li:23). (2) The chief ones of the flock are men distinguished in honor, power and wealth (Jer. xxv:34, 35). (3) The Jews are represented as the Lord's flock; they were peculiarly chosen, redeemed and governed by him; and a beautiful flock that made a glorious appearance at their solemn feast (Jer. xiii:17, 20); a holy flock, as they were separated to the service of God, and not a few of them sanctified by his Holy Spirit (Ezek. xxxvi:38); and a flock of slaughter, as in Christ's time, they were condemned to, and ripened for, judgments of God (Zech. xi:4). The Lord himself, and, under him their magistrates, prophets, priests and teachers, were their shepherds (Ps. lxxx; Ezek. xxxiv). (4) The church is likened to a flock, because of the number, the order and agreeable society of her members (Is. xl:11; Acts xx:28).

FLOOD (flūd), (Heb. מַבּוּל, mab-bool; Gr. κατακλυσμὸς, kat-ak-looce-mos'). See DELUGE.

FLOOR (flōr), (Heb. גֹּרֵן, go'ren, to smooth), a level, or open area, as the "place" or square near the gates of oriental cities (1 Kings xxii:10; 2 Chron. xviii:9; A. V. "void place" in both passages). (See HOUSE; PAVEMENT; THRASHING FLOOR.)

FLOTES (flōtz). See FLOAT.

FLOUR (flour), rendered in the A. V. for the following: Keh'makh (Heb. מַחְמֵךְ, to grind, Judg. vi:19; 1 Sam. i:24; xxviii:24, etc.); So'leth (Heb. סֹלֶת, to strip), from a stripping off the hull; the finest and purest of the meal, usually rendered "fine flour." (See BREAD; MEAL, etc.)

FLOWERS (flou'erz). See PLANT.

FLUTE (flūt). See MUSIC.

FLUX, -BLOODY (Gr. δυσεντερία, doos-en-ter-ee'ah, dysentery, Acts xxviii:8). This was a complaint which is often epidemic in the East. This was probably the disease of Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi:15, 19).

FLY (flī), (Heb. זְבוּב, zeb-oo'b).

(1) The word occurs Exod. viii:21, 22, 24, 29, 31; Ps. lxxviii:45, and cv:31; all which passages relate to the plague of flies inflicted upon Pharaoh and his people. In the Septuagint it is uniformly rendered κνυβωβία, or the dog-fly.

(2) Philo, in his Life of Moses (i:23, p. 401, ed. Mangey), expressly describes it as a biting, insidious creature, which comes like a dart, with great noise, and rushing with great impetuosity on the skin, sticks to it most tenaciously. All the ancient translators understood by the original word, a mixture of noxious creatures. More modern writers, reasoning on other senses of the Hebrew word, and which are very numerous, have proposed several different insects. Thus, one of the meanings of the word is 'to darken,' and Mouffet observes that the name cynomyia agrees with no kind of flies, better than with those black, large, compressed flies, which boldly beset cattle, and suck out blood from beneath, and occasion great pain. He observes that they have no proboscis, but, instead of it, have double sets of teeth, like wasps, which they infix deeply in the skin, and adds that they greatly infest the cars of dogs (Theat. Insect. cxi). Others have proposed the blatta Orientalis or Ægyptia of Linnaeus, as answering considerably to the characteristics of voracity, intrusion into houses, etc., etc. (Forskal, Descrip. Animal., Præf., p. 22). The miracle involved in the plague of flies consisted, partly at least, in the creature being brought against the Egyptians in so great an abundance during winter. The particular species is, however, at present undetermined.

FOAL (fōl), (Heb. פֶּלֶא, ah'yeeer, Gen. xlix:11; לָבָן, bane, son, Zech. ix:9; Gr. ulos, son, Matt. xxi:5), an ass's colt. (See ASS.)

FOAM (fōm), (Heb. קֵפֶץ, keh'tsef, something broken, a splinter). The original word is rendered "foam" in Hos. x:7, "As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water." It means a broken branch, a dry twig, or splinter.

FODDER (fōd'dēr), (Heb. בֶּלֶעֶל, bel-eel', Job vi. 5). The word properly signifies a mixture, a medley, and is rendered "corn" in Job xxiv:6, and "provender" in Is. xxx:24.

FOLD (fōld). Several Hebrew and Greek words are thus translated.

1. Ghed-ay-raw' (Heb. חֲדָרָה, walled in, Num. xxxii:16, 24, 36). See HEDGE.

2. Mik-law' (Heb. מִקְלָה, a pen, Hab. iii:17; Ps. l:9; lxxviii:70).

3. Raw-bats' (Heb. רָבַח, to recline, Is. xiii:20). These three words, with the Gr. ἀνά, an-lay', signify a small inclosure for flocks to rest in.

4. The following terms, Do'ber (Heb. דֹּבַר, Is. v:17; Mic. ii:12), and Naw-veh' (Heb. נָוֵה, at home, 2 Sam. vii:8; 1 Chron. xvii:7; Jer. xxiii:3, etc.), signify pasture.

In the passage in John x:16 the Greek word ποίμνη, poym'nay, means the flock itself. (See FLOCK.) There shall be one flock and one shepherd. The folds of the Christian Church may be many; the flock is one.

FOLDEN (fōld'en), (Heb. שָׁבַח, saw-back').

This earlier participle of the verb to fold is found in Nah. i:10, 'while they be folded together as thorns' (R. V., 'like tangled thorns;'; American R. V., 'entangled'). The meaning is that the thorns are intertwined so as to form an impenetrable hedge.

FOLLOWER (fōl'lō-ēr), (Gr. μιμητής, mim-ay-tace', an imitator).

St. Paul says to the Corinthian Christians: "Be followers of me," etc., meaning that they were to imitate him in all good things (1 Cor. iv:16; xi:1, etc.); also to take God as an example (Eph. v:1). In Phil. iii:17 the "followers" were to be co-imitators of him.

FOLLY (fōl'l'y), (mostly Heb. נְבִילָה, iv-veh'leth and נְבִילָה, neb-aw'law).

The first word means silliness, as in Prov. v:23, etc.; the second word emptiness (Gen. xxxiv:7, and many others).

1. Folly denotes, in general, weakness of understanding (Ps. xiv:1; 1 Cor. i:27; iv:10), and sometimes sin or wickedness (Ps. xxxviii:5; Josh. vii:15). The transgression and disobedience of Adam were the height of folly, as is the sin of humanity generally. Foolish talking, jesting, foolish and unlearned questions, etc. (2 Tim. ii:23), are such as are vain, frivolous, or have no useful tendency.

2. The phrase "Thou fool" (Matt. v:22), implies not only an angry temper and foolishness, but probably also impiety and wickedness, in allusion to Ps. xiv:1, where the atheist is called a fool. (See FOOL.)

FOOD (fōod), (Heb. לֶחֶם, lekh-em, bread, food).

The productions of a country, at an early period of the world, necessarily determined its food. Palestine abounded with grain and various kinds of vegetables, as well as with animals of different species. Such, accordingly, in general, was the sustenance which its inhabitants took.

(1) In Early Times. Bread formed 'the staff of life' to the ancient Hebrews even more than to ourselves; but the modes of preparing it have been noticed under other heads. (See BREAD; MILL.)

On a remarkable occasion a calf, tender and good, is taken, slain, dressed (roasted, most probably, Judg. vi:19; Gen. xxvii:7; 1 Sam. ii:13; Exod. xii:8, 9; boiling was not known till long afterward), and set before the guests, while the entertainer (Abraham) respectfully stood at their side, doubtless to render any desirable service. The sauce or accompaniments on this occasion were butter and milk. From Gen. xix:3 it may be inferred that the bread was unleavened.

The cases, however, to which reference has been made were of a special nature; and from them, as well as from what is recorded touching Isaac and Esau and Jacob, it appears that flesh meat was reserved as food for guests, or as a dainty for the sick; lentils, pulse, onions, grain, honey and milk being the ordinary fare.

The agreeable, and perhaps in part the salubrious, qualities of salt were very early known and recognized. In Lev. ii:13 it is expressly enjoined: 'Every oblation of thy meat-offering shalt thou season with salt; with all thine offerings shalt thou offer salt.'

Locusts were a permitted (Lev. xi:22) and a very common food. At the present day they are gathered by the Bedouins in the beginning of April, and, being roasted on plates of iron, or dried in the sun, are kept in large bags, and, when needed, eaten strewed with salt by handfuls.

Of four-footed animals and birds the favorite food were sheep, goats, oxen and doves. There are few traces of the eating of fish, at least in Palestine (Num. xi:15; Lev. xi:9-22). In the last passage a distinction is made between certain fish which might be eaten and others which were forbidden. 'These shall ye eat of all that are in the waters; whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers, them shall ye eat; and all that have not fins and scales they shall be an abomination unto you.'

(2) Among the Egyptians. The distinction of clean and unclean animals, and of animals which might and those which might not be eaten, is found to have existed to a great extent in ancient Egypt. Among fish the oxyrhynchus, the phagrus, and the lepidotus were sacred, and might not even be touched. The inhabitants of Oxyrhynchus objected to eating any fish caught by a hook, lest it should have been defiled by the blood of one they held so sacred. The phagrus was the eel; and the reason of its sanctity, like that of the oxyrhynchus, was probably owing to its unwholesome qualities; the most effectual method of forbidding its use being to assign it a place among the sacred animals of the country.

Neither the hippopotamus nor the crocodile appears to have been eaten by the ancient Egyptians. Some of the Egyptians considered the crocodile sacred, while others made war upon it (Herod. ii:69). In some places it was treated with the most marked respect, fed, attended, adorned, and after death embalmed. But the people of Apollinopolis, Tentyris, Heracleopolis and other places held the animal in abhorrence; how far they carried their dislike may be seen in Juvenal (Sat. xv), though something, probably, must be deducted from the account, in consideration of poetic license.

Cats as well as dogs were held in high esteem by the ancient Egyptians. The former especially were objects of superstitious regard. When a cat died in a house a natural death, a general mourning throughout the family ensued, and to kill one of these revered animals was a capital offense.

Though it appears that swine frequently formed part of the stock of an Egyptian farmyard, yet the animal was unclean and an abomination in the estimation of the Egyptians. Herodotus tells us (ii:47) that if any one but touched a pig in passing he was compelled to bathe himself and wash his garments; and those of the natives who were swincherds were a degraded caste, with whom others would not intermarry.

(3) The Mosaic Law. The Mosaic laws which regulated the use of animal food may be found in Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv. The grounds of many of these regulations may be ascertained with a greater or less degree of probability, provided the student is well acquainted with the mind and spirit of Hebrew antiquity. Considerations drawn from idolatrous usages, regard to health, the furtherance of agriculture and established customs and tastes, had in each case an influence in the promulgation of these laws.

(4) Beverages. In the earliest times water was the common drink. That wine of an intoxicating tendency was drunk at a very early period appears from what happened to Noah (Gen. ix:20), who seems to have made as well as drunk wine. Bread and wine are spoken of in Gen. xiv:18, as offered for refreshment to Abraham by Melchizedek, king of Salem. Water was sometimes put to the wine; at others a strong drink was made by mixing with the wine aromatic herbs (Ps. lxxv:8; Is. v:22), or a decoction derived from them; myrrh was used for this purpose. Date-wine was in use, and probably the Egyptian or malt wine, ζῆθος, οἶνος κριθίνος (Herod. ii:77). Jerome (Opp. iv. 364, ed. Bened.) says that 'drink, called by the Hebrews Sikera, is every kind which can inebriate, or that which is made from grain, or of the juice of apples, or when the honeycomb is made (decoquantur) into a sweet and barbarous beverage, or the fruit of the palm expressed into a liquor, and when water receives a color and a consistency from prepared herbs.' 'The common people' (Mark xii:37) drank an acrid sort of wine, which is rendered vinegar in our English Version (Ruth ii:14; Matt. xxvii:48). The Orientals frequently used wine in excess, so as to occasion intoxication, whence are drawn many striking figures in Holy Writ (Is.

v:11; xxviii:1; xlix:26; Jer. viii:14; ix:15; Deut. xxxii:42; Ps. lxxviii:65). That indulgence in wine was practiced in very ancient days is manifest from there being in the court of Pharaoh, at the time of Joseph, state officers who had charge of the wine, and served the monarch with it when he drank (Gen. xl:1, 2, 11; comp. Neh. i:11; 1 Kings x:5; 2 Chron. ix:4.) (See PALM TREE.)

(5) Drinking Cups. For drinking vessels there were used the cup and the bowl (Jer. xxxv:5; Amos vi:6; Zech. ix:15; Num. vii:13, 84). The cup was generally of brass covered with tin, in form resembling a lily, sometimes circular. It is still used by travelers, and may be seen in both shapes in the ruins of Persepolis (1 Kings vii:26). The bowl (Exod. xxv:33) assumed a variety of shapes, and bears many names. Some of these 'chargers' appear, from the presents made by the princes of Israel (Num. vii.), to have been of large size and great splendor; some were silver, some gold (1 Kings x:21).

(6) Meal Hours. In Eastern climes the chief meal, or what we term dinner, is, in consequence of the heat of the middle period of the day, deferred till towards evening, a slight repast being taken before noon (Adam, Rom. Antiq. p. 377, ed.

Major; Potter, ii. 625; Chardin, iv.; Jahn, i:2). But from Gen. xliii:16, 25, it appears to have been the custom to dine at noon in the days of the patriarchs. The same seems to have been the case in Palestine at a later period (1 Kings xx:16; comp. Acts x:10; Luke xi:37). Convivialities, however, were postponed till evening, and sometimes protracted to the following morning (Is. v:11; Mark vi:21; Luke xiv:24).

(7) Giving of Thanks. The meal was preceded by washing of hands (Luke xi:38; Mark vii:2), which the mode of eating rendered necessary, and by an invocation of the divine blessing (1 Sam. ix:13; in Greek, εὐλογία εὐχαριστία, blessing, giving of thanks (Luke ix:16; John vi:11). Similar customs prevailed among the Greeks and Romans. Jahn (Bib. Antiq., p. 68) has given the short prayer, as preserved in the Talmud, which the Jews used, as follows: 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast produced this food (or this drink) from the earth (or the vine)' (Matt. xiv:19; xv:36; xxvi:27).

(8) Table Customs. The Hebrews, like the Greeks and Romans in their earlier history, ate sitting (Gen. xxvii:19; Judg. xix:6; 1 Sam. xx:25). A carpet was spread, on which the meal was partaken. At a later period, however, particularly when Palestine came under the influence of Roman manners, the Jews reclined on cushions or couches (Esth. i:6; Amos vi:4; Luke vii:37; ἀνεκλιθη, reclined, not 'sat,' as in the common translation). The custom of giving preference in point of seat or position to guests of high consideration appears from 1 Sam. ix:22, to have been of ancient date (Amos. iii:12). In the time of Christ (Luke xiv:8) the Pharisees, always eager for distinction, coveted the place of honor at meals and feasts. Women were not admitted to eat with the men, but had their meals supplied in their own private apartment (Esth. i:6-9). In Babylon and Persia, however, females mingled with males on festive occasions (Dan. v:2). In general the manner of eating was similar to what it is in the East at the present day. Special care was taken of favored persons (Gen. xliii:34;

(Sam. i:4; ix:22; John xiii:26). Knives, forks and spoons were not employed for eating. The food was conveyed from the dish to the mouth by the right hand. The parties sat with their legs bent under them round a dish placed in the center, and either took the flesh meat with their fingers from the dish, or dipped bits of their bread into the savory mess, and conveyed them to their mouths. In Ruth ii:14, Boaz says to Ruth, 'Dip thy morsel in the vinegar,' which explains the language of our Lord (John xiii:26), 'He it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it.' This presenting of food to a person is still customary, and was designed originally as a mark of distinction, the choice morsels being selected by the head of the family for the purpose. Drink was handed to each one of the guests in cups or goblets, and at a very ancient period, in a separate cup to each person. Hence the word cup is used as equivalent to what we term a man's lot or destiny (Ps. xi:6; lxxv:8; Is. i:22; Matt. xxvi:39).

J. R. B.

FOOL (fōol), (Heb. ^{לֵאמֹן}, evil, fool).

The fool of Scripture is not an idiot, but an absurd person; not one who does not reason at all, but one who reasons wrong; also any one whose conduct is not regulated by the dictates of reason and religion. Foolishness, therefore, is not a privative condition, but a condition of wrong action in the intellectual or sentient being, or in both (2 Sam. xiii:12, 13; Ps. xxxviii:5). In the Proverbs, however, 'foolishness' appears to be sometimes used for lack of understanding, although more generally for perverseness of will. (See FOLLY.)

FOOT (fōot), (Heb. ^{לֵבַי}, kane, a stand, with reference to the laver (which see); Heb. ^{רֵגֶל}, reh'gel; Gr. ^{πούς}, poose, the human foot).

Of the various senses in which the word 'foot' is used in Scripture, the following are the most remarkable. Such phrases as the 'slipping' of the foot, the 'stumbling' of the foot, 'from head to foot' (to express the entire body), and 'foot-steps' (to express tendencies, as when we say of one that he walks in another's footsteps), require no explanation, being common to most languages. The extreme modesty of the Hebrew language, which has perhaps seldom been sufficiently appreciated, dictated the use of the word 'feet,' to express the parts and the acts which it is not allowed to name. Hence such phrases as the 'hair of the feet,' the 'water of the feet,' 'between the feet,' 'to open the feet,' 'to cover the feet,' all of which are sufficiently intelligible, except perhaps the last, which certainly does not mean 'going to sleep,' as some interpreters suggest, but to 'dismiss the refuse of nature.'

Figurative. 1. 'To be under any one's feet' denotes the subjection of a subject to his sovereign, or of a servant to his master (Ps. viii:6; comp. Heb. ii:8; 1 Cor. xv:25), and was doubtless derived from the symbolical action of conquerors, who set their feet upon the neck or body of the chiefs whom they had vanquished, in token of their triumph. This custom is expressly mentioned in Scripture (Josh. x:24), and is figured on the monuments of Egypt, Persia and Rome.

2. In like manner, 'to be at any one's feet,' is used for being at the service of any one, following him, or willingly receiving his instructions (Judg. iv:10). The passage, in which Paul is described as being brought up 'at the feet of Gamaliel,' will appear still clearer, if we understand that, as the Jewish writers allege, pupils actually did sit on the floor before, and therefore at the feet of the doctors of the law, who themselves were raised on an elevated seat.

(3) 'Lameness of feet' generally denotes affliction or calamity, as in Matt. xviii:8; xxxviii:17; Jer. xx:10; Micah iv:6, 7; Zeph. iii:9.

(4) 'To set one's foot' in a place signifies to take possession of it, as in Deut. i:36; xi:25, and elsewhere.

5. 'To water with the feet' (Deut. xi:10) implies that the soil was watered with as much ease as a garden, in which the small channels for irrigation may be turned, etc., with the foot. (See GARDEN.)

6. An elegant phrase, borrowed from the feet occurs in Gal. ii:14, where St. Paul says: 'When I saw that they walked not uprightly'—literally, 'not with a straight foot,' or 'did not foot it straightly.'

7. Nakedness of feet expressed mourning (Ezek. xxiv:17). This must mean appearing abroad with naked feet; for there is reason to think that the Jews never used their sandals or shoes within doors. The modern Orientals consider it disrespectful to enter a room without taking off the outer covering of their feet. It is with them equivalent to uncovering the head among Europeans. The practice of feet washing implies a similar usage among the Hebrews. Uncovering the feet was also a mark of adoration. Moses put off his sandals to approach the burning bush where the presence of God was manifested (Exod. iii:5). Among the modern Orientals it would be regarded the height of profanation to enter a place of worship with covered feet. The Egyptian priests officiated barefoot; and most commentators are of opinion that the Aaronite priests served with bare feet in the tabernacle, as, according to all the Jewish writers, they did it afterward in the temple, and as the frequent washings of their feet enjoined by the law seem to imply. (See SANDALS.)

8. The passage, 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth glad tidings, that publisheth peace' (Is. lii:7), appears to signify that, although the feet of messengers and travelers are usually rendered disagreeable by the soil and dust of the way, yet the feet of these blessed messengers seemed, notwithstanding, even beautiful, on account of the glad tidings which they bore.

Respecting the 'washing of feet,' see ABLUTION and WASHING.

FOOTMAN (fōot-man), (Heb. ^{רֵגֶל}, ragli, from regel, a foot).

1. A word used to distinguish the men who fought on foot from cavalrymen and charioteers.

2. A term applied to swift runners attached to the king (1 Sam. xxii:17). The same word is rendered guard (margin, "runners" (1 Kings xiv:27, 28; 2 Chron. xii:10, 11; 2 Kings xi:4, 6, 11, 13, 19). There are many allusions in the Bible to the valuable accomplishment of swift running, though obscured by the translation of gibbor in the A. V. (Ps. xix:5; Job xvi:14; Joel ii:7), as "giant," "mighty man," "strong man."

FOOTSTEPS (fōot'stēps), (Heb. ^{אָבָק}, pah'am, Ps. xvii:5; ^{אָבָק}, aw-kabe', Ps. lxxxix:51; Cant. i:8). To watch one's footsteps is to seek a cause for accusation (Ps. xvii:5, 11).

FOOTSTOOL (fōot'stōol), (Heb. ^{כֵּהַל}, keh'bash, something trodden upon); a support for the feet when on an exalted seat or throne (2 Chron. ix:18).

Such the ark was represented to be (1 Chron. xxviii:2; Ps. xcix:5; cxxxii:7); and the earth is God's footstool (Ps. cx:1; Is. lxvi:1; Matt v:35).

FORBEAR (fôr'bâr), FORBEARANCE (fôr-bâr'ans), (Gr. ἀνοχή, an-okh-ay', a holding back, delaying, Rom. ii:4, iii:25).

The words mean: (1) To let alone (2 Chron. xxv:16). (2) To neglect (Num. ix:13). God's forbearance is the continued exercise of his patience, whereby he lets men alone, at least for a time, without punishing them (Rom. ii:4, and iii:25). Christian forbearance, required of us, is a patient letting of others alone, not resenting the injuries which they have done us, nor oppressing their conscience with a rigid imposition of our notions, or pattern, as their rule (Eph. iv:2; Col. iii:13). By long forbearing a prince is persuaded; by mild representations, repeated and submissive remonstrances and patient waiting, he is persuaded to do that which he would not had it been haughtily and rashly suggested to him (Prov. xxv:15).

FORCES (fôrs'ëz), (Heb. כֹּחַ, kah'yil, strength, especially in a military point of view). It is applied to army, fortifications, etc. (Is. lx:5, 11).

FORD (förd), (Heb. מַעְבַּר, mah-ab-awr', and מַעְבַּרָה, mah-ab-aw-raw', a pass), a shallow place where a stream might be crossed easily by wading (Gen. xxxii:23; Josh. ii:7; Is. xvi:2). The Hebrew word also refers to the mountain pass at Michmash (1 Sam. xiv:4; Is. x:29). The fords of the Jordan seem to have been few and well known (Josh. ii:7; Judg. iii:28; xii:5, 6, A. V. "passages").

FOREFRONT (fôr'frünt') is used in its present sense as the foremost part or place, e. g., the forefront of a building or of a battle (Ex. xxvi:9; 2 Sam. xi:15, etc.).

FOREHEAD (fôr'ëd), (Heb. מִצְחָה, may'tsakh, to shine).

The practice of veiling the face in public for women of the higher class—especially married women—in the East, sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled face of women of bad character (Gen. xxiv:65; Jer. iii:3). Reference is made to this when Israel is called "impudent;" that is, "hard of forehead" (Ezek. iii:7, 8, 9).

Marks upon the forehead, for the purpose of distinguishing the holy from the profane, are mentioned in Ezek. ix:4, and again in Rev. vii:3.

The classical idolaters used to consecrate themselves to particular deities on the same principle. The marks used on these occasions were various. Sometimes they contained the name of the god; sometimes his particular ensign, as the thunderbolt of Jupiter, the trident of Neptune, the ivy of Bacchus, etc.; or else they marked themselves with some mystical number whereby the god was described.

If this analogy be admitted the mark on the forehead may be taken to be derived from the analogous custom among the heathen of bearing on their forehead the mark of the gods whose votaries they were. Some, however, would rather understand the allusion to refer to the custom of marking cattle, and even slaves, with the sign of ownership.

Figurative. (1) The saints having a mark or seal in their foreheads denotes their having full direction and protection amid terrible calamities (Ezek. ix:4; Rev. vii:3). (2) The saints having God's name in their foreheads denotes their open and bold profession of his truth, obedience to his law and conformity to his image (Rev. xiv:1 and xxii:4). (3) The forehead of an abandoned woman and a stiff forehead imports their shameless obstinacy in idolatry and other wickedness (Jer. iii:3; Ezek. iii:8). (4) God's setting a jewel on their forehead signifies his giving them public and great honor and wealth, and openly placing his tabernacle, temple and ordinances among them (Ezek. xvi:12).

Men's having the mark of the beast in their forehead denotes their open profession of the heresies and their bold attachment to superstition and idolatry (Rev. xiii:16 and xx:4).

FOREIGNER (fôr'in-ër), (Heb. נָכְרִי, nok-ree', stranger, Deut. xv:3; Obad 11; תֹּשָׁבִיט, to-shawb', Exod. xii:45, dweller, as distinguished from a native; Gr. παροικος, par'oy-kos, dwelling near, Eph. ii:19), one living in a country of which he is not a native, i. e., in the Jewish sense, a Gentile.

Toleration and special privileges were granted the heathen or alien people who dwelt among the Jews. For these they were required to observe certain regulations. They were not to blaspheme the name of Jehovah (Lev. xxiv:16); not to indulge in idolatrous worship (Lev. xx:2); not to commit acts of indecency (Lev. xviii:26); not to do any work on the Sabbath (Exod. xx:10); not to eat leavened bread during the Passover (Exod. xii:19); not to eat any manner of blood or flesh of animals that had died a natural death or had been torn by wild beasts (Lev. xvii:10, 15). Under such circumstances the law accorded to foreigners not only protection and toleration, but equal civil rights with the Israelites.

Figurative. The saints are termed foreigners or strangers on earth; they are born from above; have their possession and "conversation," i. e., their citizenship in heaven (1 Pet. ii:11; see also Ps. xxxix:12; Heb. xi:13).

As an attribute of God, foreknowledge is simply a special case or aspect of omniscience. God knows all things, therefore not only the present and the past, but the future also, must lie open to His sight. This is implied in all His promises, whether they refer to the individual only, as where offspring is promised to Abraham (Gen. xviii:14), or are on a national scale, as when the glory of Abraham's descendants is foretold (Gen. xviii:18). It is implied also in the warnings which God gives, or causes to be given, as in the story of Lot and Sodom (Gen. xix), or in that of Moses before Pharaoh (Exod. viii-xi). To an earlier Pharaoh God shows in a dream 'what he is about to do' (Gen. xli:25), and similarly, at a later period, to Nebuchadnezzar 'what shall be in the latter days' (Dan. ii:28, 29).

It is, however, in its application, not to events generally, but to salvation, and that both of the individual and of the community, that the question of the divine foreknowledge has arrested the attention, engaged the thoughts, and sometimes tried the hearts of men. True piety refers all things to God, and rejoices to see in the individual life of faith and love the manifestation of divine activity. It seems to it that, were the case otherwise, there could be no assurance of salvation, and the peace which is the most priceless possession of God's children would be impossible to them. It is argued that, as God is both able and willing to bring about the salvation of the individual, He must know beforehand, not only His purpose to do so, but its fulfillment. We refer salvation, along with all other events, to the Divine Will; but, as God is not only Supreme Will, but Supreme Intelligence, before, or accompanying the forthputting of that will, there must be an act of knowledge. Thus foreknowledge comes to be associated with ELECTION and PREDESTINATION (which see) as a constitutive element in the ultimate ground of the salvation made known in Christ. (See the article GOD, 4.) (A. Stewart, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

FOREORDINATION (fôr-ôr'dî-nâ'shün). See ELECTION; PREDESTINATION.

FORERUNNER (fôr-rün'nēr), (Gr. πρόδρομος, prod'rom-os), one who is sent before to take observations or act as a spy, a scout, a light-armed soldier. In Heb vi:20 it is used in the sense of one who comes in advance to a place whither the rest are to follow, viz., Jesus Christ (John xiv:2), and also to make arrangements for them to follow.

FORESHIP (fôr'shîp), (Gr. πρόρα, pro'ra, Acts xvii:30, 41, "forepart"), the prow of a ship. (See SHIP.)

FORESKIN (fôr'skîn), (Heb. לֵבָיִט, or-lawv'; Gr. ἀκροβυστία, ak-rob-oos-tee'ah), the prepuce, which was taken off in circumcision. (See CIRCUMCISION.)

FOREST (fôr'äst), (Heb. עֵבֶר, yah'ar, a thicket).

Tracts of woodland are mentioned by travelers in Palestine, but rarely what we should call a forest. The word translated by 'forest' is עֵבֶר, ya'or, which does not necessarily mean more than 'woodland.' There are, however, abundant intimations in Scripture that the country was in ancient times much more wooded than at present, and in parts densely so. The localities more particularly mentioned as woods or forests are:

1. The forest of cedars on Mount Lebanon (1 Kings vii:2; 2 Kings xix:23; Hos. xiv:5, 6) which must have been much more extensive formerly than at present.

2. The name of 'House of the Forest of Lebanon' is given in Scripture (1 Kings vii:2; x:17, 21; 2 Chron. ix:16, 20) to a palace which was built by Solomon in, or not far from, Jerusalem, and which is supposed to have been so called on account of the quantity of cedar trees employed in its construction, or, perhaps, because the numerous pillars of cedar wood suggested the idea of a forest of cedar trees.

3. The forest of oaks, on the mountains of Bashan. The trees of this region have been already noticed under ALLON and BASHAN.

4. The forest or wood of Ephraim, already noticed under EPHRAIM 4.

5. The wood of Bethel (2 Kings ii:23, 24). This was situated in the ravine which descends to the plain of Jericho.

6. The wood through which the Israelites passed while pursuing the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv:25).

7. The wood in the wilderness of Zeph, where David hid himself (1 Sam. xxiii:15 ff.).

8. The forest of Hareth, in the south of Judah, to which David withdrew to avoid the fury of Saul (1 Sam. xxii:5). The precise situation is unknown.

Figurative. (1) Forest is used symbolically to denote a city, kingdom, polity, or the like (Ezek. xv:6). Devoted kingdoms are also represented under the image of a forest, which God threatens to burn or cut down. See Is. x:17, 18, 19, 34, where the briars and thorns denote the common people; 'the glory of the forest' are the nobles and those of highest rank and importance. See also Is. xxxii:19; xxxvii:24; Jer. xxi:14; xxii:7; xlvi:23; Zech. xi:2. (2) The forest is the image of unfruitfulness as contrasted with a cultivated field or vineyard (Is. xxix:17; xxxii:15; Jer. xxvi:18; Hos. ii:12). (3) The Assyrian army is called a forest, how numerous and how stately was their appearance! but how soon were they consumed by the wrath of God! (Is. x:18, 19, and xxxii:19). (4) Egypt and her numerous cities, of their large army, under Pharaoh-necho, is called a forest (Jer. xlvi:23). (5) Jerusalem is called the forest of the south field; it lay near the south of Canaan; the Chaldeans marched southward to it, and its houses and inhabitants were numerous.

FORGIVENESS (fôr-giv'nēs), (Heb. כָּסַף, kaw-sar', to cover, to hide, to purge, to do away, Deut. xxi:8, et al.; נָשָׂא, naw-sav', to lift up, to take away, Gen. 1:17, et al.; סָוּ, saw-lakh', and אָפֵי, af-ee'ay-mee, to send away, let off, Ps. ciii:3, et al., Matt. vi:12, and most of the New Testament places; χαρίσσομαι, khar-id'zom-ahēe, to give gladly or freely, Luke vii:42, et al.). (Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

Forgiveness is an act of God toward man, and of man toward his fellow. To forgive sin is the exclusive prerogative of God, of whose law sin is the transgression (Ps. cxxx:4). Our Lord, by virtue of his Divine nature, assumed the prerogative and exercised the power of forgiving sins, which the scribes and Pharisees, viewing him merely as a man, made the occasion of a charge of blasphemy (Mark ii:5). The gospel makes known not only that there is forgiveness with God, but also how such forgiveness is made compatible with the Divine justice.

Forgiveness, full, free and everlasting, is offered to all who will believe and obey the gospel (Acts xiii:38, 39; 1 John ii:12). The duty of mutual forgiveness is urged upon man with the most solemn sanctions.

While Christ forbids retaliation and revenge, he does not command us to forgive, in the strict sense of the word, only on condition of repentance; but when this takes place the forgiveness must be prompt and cordial (Luke xvii:3, 4). We are bound to this, under the penalty of not having our own sins forgiven by God; or the canceling of the act of forgiveness if we have been pardoned (Matt. vi:12-15; xviii:15-35). The forgiving spirit Christ enjoins.

FORK (fôrk), (Heb. שֵׁשׁ קִלְשֵׁי, shel-oshe' kil-lash-one', three of prongs), a three-pronged fork for pitching hay, or straw (1 Sam. xiii:21).

FORMER (fôr'mēr), (Heb. קִדְמוֹנִי, kad-mo-nee'); as to time it is anterior, and as to place it refers to the "East." R. V. has it "eastern" (Zech. xiv:8).

FORNICATION (fôr-nî-kâ'shun), (Heb. זְנוּת, laz-nooth'; Gr. πορνεία, por-ni'ah).

In Scripture this word occurs more frequently in its symbolical than in its ordinary sense.

Figurative. (1) In the Prophets woman is often made the symbol of the church or nation of the Jews, which is regarded as affianced to Jehovah by the covenant on Mount Sinai. In Ezek. xvi there is a long description of that people under the symbol of a female child, growing up to the stature of a woman, and then wedded to Jehovah by entering into covenant with him. Therefore when the Israelites acted contrary to that covenant, by forsaking God and following idols, they were very properly represented by the symbol of a harlot or adulteress, offering herself to all comers (Is. i:2; Jer. ii:20; Ezek. xvi; Hos. i:2; iii:1). And thus fornication, or adultery (which is fornication in a married state), became, and is used as the symbol of idolatry itself, (Jer. iii:8, 9; Ezek. xvi:26, 29; xxiii:37). (2) Anti-represented on Egyptian monuments, though dating back to a period of fifteen centuries before the Christian era, bear evidence of an advanced state of fortifications—of walls built of squared stones, or of squared timber judiciously placed on the summit of scarped rocks, or within the circumference of one or two wet ditches, and furnished on the summit with regular battlements to protect the defenders.

(2) More Ancient System. All these are of later invention than the accumulation of unhewn or rudely chipped, uncemented stones, piled on each other in the form of walls, in the so-called Cyclopean, Pelasgian, Etruscan and Celtic styles, where there are no ditches, or towers, or other gateways than mere openings occasionally left between the enormous blocks employed in the work. As the first three styles occur in Etruria, they show the progressive advance of military archichrist is called the great whore and mother of harlots and abominations, because of its noted apostasy and idolatry, and decoying others into it; and such apostasy is called fornication, whoredom, or adultery (Rev. xvii, and xix:2). (3) Tyre sang as a harlot when by fair speeches the Tyrians enticed the nations to renew their trade with them (Is. xxiii:15).

FORT, FORTIFICATIONS, 'FENCED CITIES' (fört, för'ti-fi-kä'shuns). Several Hebrew words are thus translated: Maw-tsood' (מִצֹּד, net), a fastness (2 Sam. v:9; xxii:2, and five times in the Psalms); maw-ooz' (מִצְעֹר, Dan. xi:19), a stronghold, fortified by nature and art; daw-yake' (דָּוַיָּקָה, 2 Kings xxv:1; Jer. lvi:4).

Inventions for the defense of men in social life are older than history.

(1) Egyptian. The walls, towers and gates and may be considered as more primitive, though perhaps posterior to the era when the progress of Israel, under the guidance of Joshua, expelled several Canaanitish tribes, whose system of civilization, in common with that of the rest of Western Asia, bore an Egyptian type, and whose towers and battlements were remarkably high, or rather were erected in very elevated situations. When, therefore, the Israelites entered Palestine, we may assume that the 'fenced cities' they had to attack were, according to their degree of antiquity, fortified with more or less of art, but all with huge stones in the lower walls, like the Etruscan. Indeed, Asia Minor, Armenia, Syria and even Jerusalem still bear marks of this most ancient system. Stones from six to fifty feet in length, with suitable proportions, can still be detected in many walls of the cities of those regions, wherever quarries existed, from Nineveh, where beneath the surface there still remain ruins and walls of huge stones, sculptured with bas-reliefs, originally painted, to Babylon, and Bassorah, where bricks, sun-dried or baked, and stamped with letters, are yet found, as well as in all the plains of the rivers where that material alone could be easily procured. The wall was sometimes double or triple (2 Chron. xxxii:5), successively girding a rocky elevation, and 'building a city' originally meant the construction of the wall.

In Biblical times the general distinction between a city and village was that the former was surrounded by one or more walls, while the latter was not. These walls were often crowned with battlements and parapets, with towers placed at frequent intervals (2 Chron. xxxii:5; Jer. xxxi:38). Engines of war were mounted on them, and, in times of war, a constant watch was kept (2 Chron. xxvi:9, 15; Judg. ix:45; 2 Kings ix:17). (Layard, Nineveh.) The walled towns of Palestine seldom served to check the invasion of an enemy, though they often prolonged the struggle (2 Kings xviii:10; xxv:3).

Figurative. (1) 'Sitting in the gate' of the fortress was, and still is, synonymous with the possession of power, and even now there is commonly in the fortified gate of a royal palace in the East, on the floor above the doorway, a council-room with a kind of balcony, whence the sovereign sometimes sees his people, and where he may sit in judgment. (2) The Lord is the fortress or stronghold of his people. To him they flee in times of danger; in him they trust and find preservation from hurt (Ps. xviii:2; Nah. i:7). (3) "The fortress also shall cease from Ephraim" (Is. xvii:3), is an expression signifying that she loses her fortified cities, which were once her defense. (4) To overthrow one's fortress is to rob it of defense, to humiliate (Is. xxv:12). (5) Of the righteous man it is said, "his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks" (Is. xxxiii:16), i. e., God's protection shall be to him as the impregnable walls of a fortress upon a rock. "I have set thee for a tower and a fortress among my people," etc. (Jer. vi:27).

FORTH (Gr. ἐκδιώμι, ek-did'o-mee), out, to let out, to deliver over (Luke xx:9).

In the following examples 'out' is distinctly the modern word, with put (Acts ix:40), 'Peter put them all forth' (Gen. viii:9; Judg. vi:21; Matt. ix:25); with break (2 Sam. v:20), 'The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies'; with give (Ezek. xviii:8, 13), 'He that hath not given forth upon usury'; with set (Ezek. xxvii:10), 'they set forth thy comeliness'; with spread (Ezek. xlvi:10), 'a place to spread forth nets' (R. V., 'for the spreading of nets'); with cast (Jonah i:5, 12, 15); let (Luke xx:9), 'A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen' (R. V., 'out'); look (Cant. ii:9), 'he looketh forth at the windows' (R. V., 'in'); or omitted altogether, as in John ii:11, 'Jesus . . . manifested forth his glory.' (Hastings' Bib. Diet.)

FORTUNATUS (fôr'tū-nā'tus), (Gr. Φορουνάτος for-too-na'tos, from Latin, fortunate), a disciple of Corinth, of Roman birth or origin, as his name indicates, who visited Paul at Ephesus, and returned, along with Stephanus and Achaicus, in charge of that apostle's first Epistle to the Corinthian church, B. C. 59 (1 Cor. xvi:17).

FORUM APPII (fôr'rum äp'pi-i). See APPII-FORUM.

FORWARDNESS (fôr'wêrd-nês).

1. Gr. Σπουδή, spon-day', literally haste, and generally of earnestness in accomplishing (2 Cor. viii:3; in ver. 7 "diligence").

2. Gr. Προθυμία, proth-oo-me'ah (2 Cor. ix:2; R. V. "readiness"), literally predisposition.

FOUNDATION (foun-da'shün).

1. The lower part of any structure, as of a house, wall, mountain, etc., which supports the rest (Ezra iv:12; 2 Sam. xxii:16; Deut. xxxii:22).

2. The beginning of a thing; thus, the foundation of the world denotes the beginning of it (Matt. xiii:35).

Figurative. (1) Christ is a foundation; on his person, office and work is his church, and the whole of our salvation erected and supported (Is. xxviii:16; 1 Cor. iii:11; Matt. xvi:18). (2) He is likened to twelve foundations of precious stones; he is infinitely precious, adapted to every case, and exhibited in the doctrine of his twelve apostles (Rev. xxi:14, 19, 20). (3) God's truths, published by the prophets and apostles, are a foundation; on them the saints found their faith and hope (Eph. ii:20). (4) The first principles of Divine truth are a foundation, as they ought to be first known, in order to understand the rest, which depend on them (Heb. vi:1, 2). (5) Teaching these Divine truths is called a foundation. (6) Paul studied so to preach Christ as not to build on another man's foundation; i. e., to preach Christ where nobody had before taught the first principles of Christianity (Rom. xv:20). (7) Magistrates, and the principal constitutions of their government, are the foundations of a state that support and establish the rest (Ps. lxxxii:5 and xi:3; Mic. vi:2). (8) The righteous are an everlasting foundation; being fixed in Christ, their persons, and holy and happy state and condition, are stable and fixed, and they are great means of supporting and establishing nations and churches (Eph. ii:20). They lay up a good foundation for the time to come; the good foundation they lay up is the heavenly glory itself, which is fixed and stable, and on that account is called a city having foundations (1 Tim. vi:19; Heb. xi:10). (9) The foundation of God that standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his, i. e., the fundamental truths of the gospel, that cannot be overthrown; or the saints themselves, divinely fixed in their new covenant state (2 Tim. ii:19). (10) The foundations or pillars of heaven are the mountains on which the skies seem to rest (2 Sam. xxii:8).

FOUNTAIN (foun'tin), the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word.

1. Ah'yin (Heb. אֵי, eye), a natural source of living water (Gen. xvi:7; Deut. viii:7, xxxiii:28; 1 Sam. xxix:1; Prov. viii:28, etc.).

2. Mah-yaww' (Heb. מַיִם חַיִּים), a spring of running water (Lev. xi:36; Josh. xv:9; Ps. lxxiv:15; Prov. xxv:26); a well-watered place (Ps. lxxxiv:6); A. V. "well"; R. V. "a place of springs."

Figurative. (1) God is called a fountain of living waters and with him is the fountain of living waters; he is the unsearchable and unfailing source of all our happiness and comfort (Jer. ii:13; Ps. xxxvi:9). (2) Jesus Christ is an open fountain, a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon (Zech. xiii). (3) The church is a spring shut up, and fountain sealed (Is. lviii:11). All the saints' springs are in her; in her dwells God, the fountain of living waters; Jesus, the smitten, the water-yielding Rock of Ages; the Holy Ghost, that river of life, issuing from under the throne of God, and the Scriptures and ordinances. (4) Spiritual knowledge and wisdom, and the fear of the Lord, are a fountain, or well-spring of life; a delightful means of promoting the temporal and spiritual happiness of ourselves and others (Prov. xvi:22; xviii:4; xiii:14) and (xiv:27). (5) Wives are called fountains and wells; they bring forth children, that, as streams, are dispersed in the streets, and are a great means of happiness and comfort to their husbands (Prov. v:15, 18). (6) Children are fountains, and the offspring of Jacob, his fountain; they are means of help and comfort to their parents, and, in due time, produce children of their own (Prov. v:16; Deut. xxxiii:28). (7) Fountains and springs also denote prosperity and the means thereof (Hos. xii:15). Thus, to turn dry land into springs of water is to afford great prosperity to a distressed nation, or to grant plenty of ordinances and powerful influences to a church or people that had been barren and withered (Ps. cvii:35; Is. xxxv:7; xli:11, and xlix:10). (8) To turn springs and rivers into a wilderness is not only to alter the soil of fields to the worse, as God has done in Idumea, Canaan, Egypt, etc., but to change great prosperity into sad adversity (Ps. cvii:33).

FOUNTAIN-GATE (foun'fün-gät). See JERUSALEM.

FOWL (fowl).

In the New Testament "fowls" is the frequent rendering of the Greek τὰ πτευνά, which comprehends all kinds of birds (Matt. xiii:4; Mark iv:4, etc.). (See BIRDS; COCK, etc.)

FOWLER (foul'ēr), (Heb. שׂוֹרֵר, yaw-koosh', to lay snares, Ps. xci:3; Prov. vi:5; Jer. v:26; Hos. ix:8), one who took birds by means of nets, snares, decoys, etc.

Among the Egyptians "fowling was one of the great amusements of all classes. Those who followed this sport for their livelihood used nets and traps, but the amateur sportsman pursued his game in the thickets and felled them with the throw-stick. . . . The throw-stick was made of heavy wood, and flat, so as to offer little resistance to the air in its flight, and the distance to which an expert could throw it was considerable. It was about one foot and a quarter to two feet in length and about one and a half inches in breadth, slightly curved at the upper end. They frequently took with them a decoy bird, and, in order to keep it to its post, a female was selected, whose nest, containing eggs, was deposited in the boat" (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i:234, sq). By a humane and just regulation Moses forbade anyone finding a bird's nest, to take the mother with the eggs or young (Deut. xxii:6, 7) lest the species be extinguished; or, perhaps, to impress upon men the sacredness of the relation between parent and young.

FOX. In several places it is uncertain whether Heb. שׁוֹרֵר, shoo-aw'; Gr. ἀλώπηξ, al-o'fakes, signifies fox or jackal (Lam. v:18; Ezek. xiii:4; Cant. ii:15). In others it probably means jackals (Judg. xv:4; Ps. lxxiii:10).

Under this term, as above indicated, the jackal is included—indeed, most of the references seem to be to that animal. The Orientals at the present time do not distinguish in common language between the two creatures. Both are common in Palestine. The fox (Vulpes vulgaris) is smaller than the jackal (Canis aureus), and is of a reddish hue, while the latter is yellowish; hence its scientific name, meaning "the golden dog." It is the latter also, and not the fox, which devours the dead and follows the armies that he may feed on human bodies left behind (Ps. lxxiii:10). Both animals are omnivorous, but the jackal, which goes in packs, is even more destructive to the vineyards than the other (Cant. ii:15). The crafty, artful nature of the fox is proverbial (Ezek. xiii:4; Luke xiii:32). He prowls singly for his prey of birds or small quadrupeds, which he takes by stratagem. Jackals are concealed by hundreds among the ruins, caves and gardens of Syria (Lam. v:18). At sunset they come forth, and both then and at intervals through the night the traveler hears their cry, resembling the confused wailing of many infants. (See SHUAL.)

Figurative. (1) False prophets and teachers are likened to foxes; how crafty! how obstinate in their evil way! how uneven and inconsistent their doctrine and practice! (Ezek. xiii:4; Cant. ii:5). (2) Tyrants and other wicked men are likened to foxes for their craft, obstinacy in sin, and ruinous designs against others (Luke xiii:32). (3) Inward sinful lusts resemble foxes; how crafty, stubborn, abominable and ruinous to the souls of men! and how hurtful to the graces of the saints! (Cant. ii:15). (4) To be the portion of foxes is for men to have their land or habitation rendered desolate and ruinous, and themselves left unburied (Ps. lxxiii:10). (5) The fox's fondness for grapes is alluded to in Cant. ii:15.

FRAME (Heb. יָצַר, yay'tser, form), as of the human body (Ps. ciii:14); "thing framed" (Is. xxix:16); and "the frame of a city" (Heb. מִבְּנֵי, mib-neh', Ezek. xl:2), a city building.

It denotes in general:

1. To contrive, to manage (Judg. xii:6), 'he could not frame to pronounce it right.'
2. To direct (Hos. v:4), 'They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God.'
3. To form (Is. xxix:16), 'Shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?'
4. To fit together, make (Eph. ii:21), 'all the building fitly framed together.'
5. To devise (Ps. l:19), 'thy tongue frameth deceit'; (xciv:20), 'which frameth mischief'; (Jer. xviii:11), 'Behold, I frame evil against you.'

FRANKINCENSE (fränk'In-sēns), (Heb. לְבוֹנָה, leb-o-naw', whiteness).

A dry, resinous, aromatic substance of a white or yellowish color, bitter and acrid to the taste, burning for a long time with a clear, steady and very odoriferous flame. Several trees (of the genus Boswellia) which grow in India, Arabia and Africa, yield this gum from incisions in the bark. Along the coast of Hadramaut, a district of Arabia, as Carter has shown, frankincense (the olibanum of commerce) is produced, as was affirmed by Herodotus, Celsius, other ancient writers and the Bible (Is. lx:6; Jer. vi:20). The Arabian species (B. Carterii) somewhat resembles, especially in its pinnate leaves when young, the mountain ash. This gum, in the above and other passages, is mentioned simply as "incense." It is called frank because of the freeness with which it burns and gives forth its odors; and the pure incense is that which is first obtained and is freest from foreign admixture.

"Sweet incense" (Exod. xxx:7) might as well be rendered "incense of spices," and is the composition mentioned in Exod. xxx:34.

The use of incense in the Jewish worship may be learned from Exod. xxx:7 and Lev. xvi:12, 13, and it is figuratively employed to represent lovely and agreeable qualities (Cant. iii:6; iv:6, 14), and devotional fervor (Ps. cxli:2; Mal. i:11; Rev. viii:3). (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) (See OFFERING; SACRIFICE.)

FRANKLY (frānk'ly), (Gr. χαρλζομα, khari-d'zom-ahē, Luke vii:42).

The English word 'frankly' is used, not in the modern sense of candidly, openly, but in the old and literal sense of freely, unrestrainedly, as in Elyot, The Governour, ii:234, 'puttynge out of their citie their women and all that were of yeres unhabill for the warres, that they mought more frankly sustayne famyne;' and in Shakes. Meas. for Meas., III, i:106:

'O, were it but my life,
I'd throw it down for your deliverance
As frankly as a pin.'

Wycliffe 1380, "he sat freely." R. V. omits the word altogether.

FRAY (Heb. פָּרַח, khaw-rad, to frighten, Deut. xxviii:26; Jer. vii:33; Zech. i:21), an old word, signifying to frighten, to scare away, as the driving of wild beasts from a dead body.

FRECKLED SPOT (frēk'ld spōt), (Heb. פִּגְמָה, bo'hak, Lev. xiii:39), an "efflorescence on the skin, not uncommon in the East, consisting of spots of a palish white, resembling the leprosy, but harmless, and neither contagious nor hereditary." It was a tetter or "a wen of white color," Tyndale. (Gesenius, Lex., s. v.)

FREEDOM (frē'dūm), (Heb. פְּדוּתָא, khoof-shaw', liberty; Gr. πολιτεία, pol-ee-ti'ah, citizenship, Acts xxii:28). See LIBERTY; SLAVE.

FREEDOM OF GOD AND FREEDOM OF MAN. See LIBERTY; WILL.

FREEDOM YEAR. See JUBILEE.

FREEMAN (frē'man), (Gr. ἀπελευθερος, ap-el-yoo'ther-os, one set free), a person who had been freed (1 Cor. vii:22). Especially 'the Lord's freeman' (R. V. 'freedman'), so as to bring out the spiritual emancipation and to distinguish from the natural 'freeman' following. In Gal. iv:22, 23, 30, a strong distinction is drawn between the free-woman and the bondmaid. (See SLAVE.)

FREEWILL OFFERING (frē'wil of'fēr-ing). See OFFERING.

FRET (Heb. פָּקַח, pek-h-eh'theth, Lev. xiii:55, to wear a hole by corrosion, to eat like moth or mildew; Heb. קָחָה, khaw-rav', Ps. xxxvii:1, primitive root, to grow warm, glow, vex, displease in the sense of vying with a rival).

FRIEND (Heb. רֵעַ, ray'ah, associate), a person with whom one has friendly intercourse (Gen. xxxviii:12, 20; 2 Sam. xiii:3; Job. ii:11; xix:21, etc.); also a lover, one beloved of a woman (Cant. v:16).

1. Het-ah'ee-ros (Gr. ἑταίρος, comrade, Matt. xi:19, A. V. "fellow"), used in kindly address (Matt. xx:13; xxii:12; xxvi:50).

2. Pi'tho (Gr. Πέθο, Acts xii:20), is used in the sense of to pacify, to win one's favor.

3. Fee'los (Gr. φίλος), one attached by affection; frequently used in the New Testament, as Jas. ii:23; iv:4. (Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

(a) Christ's friends and neighbors, whom he invites to rejoice with him at the conversion of his elect, are angels, ministers, and saints, who ardently love him and his Father, promote his honor and cause, and have much intimacy with him (Luke xv:6, 9; James ii:22; John xv:15). (b) In allusion to the friend at marriages, who performed the honors of the wedding, and led the bride to the nuptial bed, John Baptist, and other ministers, are friends of the Bridegroom; they, by their preaching and example, direct and conduct sinners to Christ (Judg. xiv:20; Johr iii:29). (c) Judas, and the man without the wedding garment were but pretended friends; or the word is used as a term of discreet address (Matt. xxvi:50, and xxii:12. (d) The friendship of this world, which is enmity with God, is a superlative love and desire of earthly and sinful things, and a study to obtain the favor of worldly men, by conformity to them in their evil courses (James iv:4; Matt. vi:24; Luke xvi:13).

FRINGE (frīnj), (Heb. לָבַד, ghed-eel', twisted thread, i. e., a tassel, Deut. xxii:12; תְּצַעֲתֵהּ, tsee-tseeth', flowery, bloomlike, and so tassel, Num. xv:38, 39).

Fringes were a part of the outer garment, and the same as the hem or border of the garment (Deut. xxii:12; Matt. ix:20; xiv:36).

The children of Israel were enjoined to wear them by Moses (Num. xv:38), and to place them on the four borders or edges of their outer garment, which was usually rectangular in shape. They were of a blue color.

The object of the fringes was to remind the children of Israel of the commandments of God (Num. xv:39). In the time of our Lord they had become objects of parade and show, so that he finds an evidence of the hypocrisy of the Pharisees in their practice of "enlarging the borders of their garments." The "hem of the garment" which the woman with the issue of blood touched (Matt. ix:20), was the ancient fringe enjoined by Moses. (See CLOTHING.)

FROG (frög) (Heb. צְבָרָה, tsef-ar-day'ah, frog, Exod. viii:2).

Although the common frog is so well known that no description is needed to satisfy the reader, it may be necessary to mention that the only species recorded as existing in Palestine is the green (Rana esculenta), and that of all the authorities we have been able to consult, Dr. Richardson alone refers the species of Egypt to the green-speckled grey frog (Rana punctata). But considering the immense extent of the Nile from south to north, and the amazing abundance of these animals which it contains in the state of spawn, tadpole, and complete frog, it is likely that the speckled is not the only species found in its waters, and that different species, if they do not occur in the same locality, are at least to be met with in different latitudes. The speckled species is found westward, even to the north of France. It is lively, but no strong swimmer, the webs on the hinder toes extending only half their length; hence, perhaps, it is more a terrestrial animal than the common green frog, and, like the brown species, is given to roam on land in moist weather.

Frog.

Although it is very hazardous in transactions of an absolutely miraculous nature to attempt to point out the instruments that may have served to work out the purposes of the Almighty, we may conjecture that, in the plague of frogs, a species, the one perhaps we have just mentioned, was selected for its agility on land, and that, although the fact is not expressly mentioned, the awful visitation was rendered still more ominous by the presence of dark and rainy weather—an atmospheric condition never of long duration on the coast of Egypt, and gradually more and more rare up the course of the river.

We have ourselves witnessed, during a storm of rain, frogs crowding into our cabin, in the low lands of Guiana, till they were packed up in the corners of the apartment, and continually falling back in their attempts to ascend above their fellows; and the door could not be opened without others entering more rapidly than those within could be expelled. Now, as the temples, palaces and cities of Egypt stood, in general, on the edge of the ever dry desert, and always above the level of the highest inundations, to be there visited by a continuation of immense number of frogs was assuredly a most distressing calamity; and as this phenomenon, in its ordinary occurrence within the tropics, is always accompanied by the storms of the monsoon or of the setting in of the rainy season, the dismay it must have caused may be judged of when we reflect that the plague occurred where rain seldom or never falls, where none of the houses are fitted to lead off the water, and that the animals appeared in localities where they had never before been found, and where, at all other times the scorching sun would have destroyed them in a few minutes. Nor was the selection of the frog as an instrument of God's displeasure without portentous meaning in the minds of the idolatrous Egyptians, who considered that animal a type of Pthah—their creative power—and also an indication of man in embryo. The magicians, indeed, appeared to make frogs come up out of the waters; but we must not understand that to them was given also the power of producing the animals. The effect which they claimed as their own was a simple result of the continuation of the prodigy effected by Moses and Aaron; for that they had no real power is evident, not only from their inability to stop the present plague, the control of which even Pharaoh discovered to be solely in the hands of Moses, but also the utter failure of their enchantments in that of lice, where their artifices were incompetent to impose upon the king and his people.

FRONTIER (frön'tēr), (Heb. קֵצֵה, karw-tseh', Ezek. xxv:9), the extremity or border of a country.

FRONTLET (frünt'lēt), (Heb. קֵצֵה, to-taw-faw', to bind, only in Exod. xiii:16; Deut. vi:8; xi:18).

FROST (fröst), (Heb. קֵפֶז, kef-ore', so called from covering the ground, "hoar frost," Exod. xvi:14). Light frosts are frequent in certain parts of Palestine and the pools become covered with thin ice (Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 50).

FROWARDNESS (frö'wërd-nës), (Heb. קֵפֶז, tah-poo-kaw'), perverseness (Deut. xxxii:20); falsehood, deceit (Prov. ii:12; vi:14, etc.).

FRUITS (frütz), (Heb. פְּרִי, peri, fruit), in general, vegetable or animal (Deut. vii:13, bis; xxviii:51, bis).

It originated the English word 'fruit,' by the Φ being sounded as ph, and subsequently converted into f. Under this head may perhaps be most appropriately noticed a classification of produce of great importance to a right understanding of the Bible, since the beauty and force of more than forty passages of the sacred record are impaired by inattention to it.

(1) Summer Fruits. The term kayits, 'summer-fruits,' appears to denote those less important species of fruit which were adapted only to immediate consumption, or could not be easily or conveniently conserved for winter use (Jer. xl:10, 12). Kayits may have been included as a species under the head of orchard-fruit; it would seem to indicate either the existence of some contrasted term, as 'winter-fruits,' or to imply that the products of the class under which it ranked as a species were generally distinguished by their capability of being preserved throughout the year. It is conceived that the products denoted by the third of the generic terms now to be considered were chiefly characterized by their capacity of being stored up and preserved. The three terms spoken of as being so frequently associated in the Scriptures, and expressive of a most comprehensive triad of blessings, are Dagan, Tirosh, and Yitzhar.

(2) Fruit of the Field. Dagan, 'fruit of the field,' or agricultural produce. Under this term the Hebrews classed almost every object of field culture. (See AGRICULTURE.) Dr. Jahn says, 'the word is of general signification, and comprehends in itself different kinds of grain and pulse, such as wheat, millet, spelt, wall-barley, barley, beans, lentils, meadow-cummin, pepper-wort, flax, cotton, various species of the cucumber, and perhaps rice' (Bib. Antiq., sec. 58). There is now no doubt among scholars that dagan comprehends the largest and most valuable species of vegetable produce; and therefore it will be allowed that the rendering of the word in the common version by 'corn,' and sometimes by 'wheat,' instead of 'every species of corn' or field produce, tends to limit our conceptions of the divine bounty, as well as to impair the beauty of the passages where it occurs.

(3) Fruit of the Vine. Tirosh, 'the fruit of the vine,' in its natural or its solid state, comprehending grapes, moist or dried, and the fruit in general, whether in the early cluster or the mature and ripened condition (Is. lxxv:8), which is rendered by βότρυς, grape, in the Septuagint, refers to the young grape; while (Judg. ix:13), where 'the vine said, Shall I leave my tirosh (fruit) which cheereth God and man?' as evidently refers to the ripened produce which was placed on the altar as a first-fruit offering in grateful acknowledgment of the divine goodness. 'Sometimes,' says Dr. Jahn, 'the grapes were dried in the sun and preserved in masses, which were called gubenabhim, eshishah, tzimmookim' (1 Sam. xxv:18; 2 Sam. xvi:1; 1 Chron. xii:40; Hos. iii:1); (Bib. Antiq. sec. 69). Tirosh is derived from the verbal noun yarash, 'to possess by inheritance' (whence Latin heres, English heir), and was very naturally applied to designate the vintage-fruit, which, next to dagan, constituted one of the most valuable 'possessions' of the Jews.

It is also distinctly referred to as the yielder of wine, and therefore was not wine itself, but the raw material from which it was expressed or prepared. Dr. Conquest's amended translation of (Micah vi:15), is, 'Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap, thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil (shemen, not yitzhar); and the grape (tirosh), but shalt not drink wine' (yayin). As the treading of the olive is represented as yielding oil, so is tirosh represented as that which, being trodden in the vat, should yield wine, which flowed out from an opening into the lacus or receptacle beneath. Archbishop Newcome, in his version of this text, has 'the grape of the choice wine;' while Julius Bate, M. A., observes on this passage—'Hence it is plain that tirosh is what is pressed, the grapes.'

Dr. Jahn's definition of tirosh as the juice which flows from the trodden grapes, is also negatived by the fact that another word exactly expressive of the same thing already exists, namely, ausis, from ausas, 'to tread down together.' Neither is it likely that it should be a generic name for wine, since such a term is found in יַיִן, yayin.

(4) Orchard Fruits. Yitzhar, 'orchard-fruits,' especially winter or keeping fruits, as dates, figs, olives, pomegranates, citrons, nuts, etc. The etymology of yitzhar (whence perhaps the Saxon ortgard, and the old English word hortsyard now orchard) quite accords with the claim advanced for it, as denoting a large and valuable class of fruits. Lexiconists properly refer it to the root tshar, expressive of a bright, glowing and shining appearance.

As we distinguish dagan from hittahh (wheat) and tirosh from ausis and yayin, so must we yitzhar from shemen, 'oil,' which are unfortunately confounded together in the common version. Shemen, beyond question, is the proper word for oil, not yitzhar.

Figurative. (1) Christ is the fruit of the earth; his human body sprung of it (Is. iv:2). (2) The twelve manner of fruits which he bears, and which are better than gold, are his various blessings of righteousness, peace, pardon, acceptance, adoption, sanctification, comfort, and eternal glory, sufficient for all the tribes of the chosen Israel (Rev. xxii:2; Prov. viii:19). (3) The fruits of the Spirit are the gracious qualities, tempers, comforts, and good works, which his inhabitation and influence produce in the saints (Gal. v:22-24; Eph. v:9). (4) The fruits of the Gospel, are turning from idols, and other wickedness, to God, believing on Christ, and the bringing forth of good works (Col. i:6; Rom. i:13). (5) Saints are represented as fruit gathered (Is. xxvii:6; John iv:36); their good fruit is the exercise of their graces and their good works; they are fruits of righteousness produced by the application of Jesus' righteousness to their souls (Matt. vii:18 and xii:33; Gal. v:22-24; Prov. xi:30; Phil. i:11; Jam. iii:18). (6) They are fruits meet for repentance; i. e., such as mark the truth and sincerity of, and answer to a profession of it (Matt. iii:8); and fruit unto holiness and life; they mark the truth of our inward sanctification, and promote our holiness in themselves; and they are a means of promoting life temporal, spiritual, and eternal, in ourselves and others (Rom. vi:22). (7) The fruit of the lips is either the comfortable doctrines of the gospel published by ministers; or the saints' praises and thanksgiving to God; or their pious conferences and counsels (Is. lvii:19; Heb. xiii:15; Prov. xii:14). (8) The fruit of the wicked is their evil works, in thought, word, or deed (Matt. vii:16); it is fruit unto death, as it tends to promote the spiritual and eternal death of themselves and others (Rom. vii:5, 13; Jam. i:15). Even their good-like fruit is fruit to themselves; springs from selfish principles, is performed in their own strength, and directed to selfish ends (Hos. x:1; Zech. viii:5); and it is withering fruit, which is not continued in, but they fall away, and grow worse and worse (Jude 12). (9) The fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, was his insolent blasphemies against God (Is. x:12). (10) Liberal donations to such as are in need are called a fruit; they proceed from a benevolent disposition, and are refreshing to such as receive them (Rom. xv:28; Phil. iv:17). (11) The fruit of men's ways or deeds, is the reward or punishment that follows on good or evil works (Prov. i:31; Is. iii:10).

Fruit is also employed symbolically in many other ways in the Scriptures, as of offspring, children (Exod. xxi:22; Ps. xxi:10; Hos. ix:16); also in such phrases as "fruit of the womb" (Gen. xxx:2; Deut. vii:13, etc.); "fruit of the loins" (Acts ii:30); "fruit of the body" (Ps. cxxxii:11; Mic. vi:7).

FRYING PAN (frī'ing păn), (Heb. פַּרְקָה, mar-kheh'sheth), properly a boiler. It was a deep vessel so that the oil could not become ignited upon the fire (Lev. ii:7; vii:9).

FUEL (fū'ēl), (Heb. מַחֲאֹלֶת, mah-ak-o'leth, and חֲלָוִת, ok-law', both meaning to be consumed).

In most Eastern countries there is a scarcity of wood and other materials used by us for fuel. Consequently almost every kind of combustible matter is eagerly sought for, such as the withered stalks of herbs and flowers (Matt. vi:28, 30), thorns (Ps. lviii:9; Eccles. vii:6), and animal excrements (Is. ix:5, 19; Ezek. iv:12-15; xxi:32). At present wood or charcoal is employed in the towns of Syria and Egypt, although the people of Palestine use anthracite coal to some extent. (Mc. & Str. Cyc.) (See COAL.)

FUGITIVE (fū'jī-tīv), the rendering of several Hebrew words, meaning to wander, a refugee, deserter, vagabond, etc. (Gen. iv:12, 14).

FULFILL (ful-fil), (Heb. from מָלַף, mar-law', to fill; Gr. πληρωω, play-ro'o), a term generally used with reference to the accomplishment of prophecy.

FULLER (ful'ēr), (Heb. כַּוֵּשׂ, kaw-bas', to wash; Gr. γναφεύς, gnaf-yuce', a clothes dresser).

At the transfigurations, our Saviour's robes are said to have been white, 'so as no fuller on earth could white them' (Mark ix:3). Elsewhere we read of 'fullers' soap' (Mal. iii:2), and of 'the fullers' field' (2 Kings xviii:17). Of the processes followed in the art of cleaning cloth and the various kinds of stuff among the Jews we have no direct knowledge. In an early part of the operation they seem to have trod the cloths with their feet, as the Hebrew Ain Rogel, or En-rogel, literally Foot-fountain, has been rendered, on Rabbinical authority, 'Fullers' fountain,' on the ground that the fullers trod the cloths there with their feet. A subsequent operation was probably that of rubbing the cloth on an inclined plane, in a mode which is figured in the Egyptian paintings, and still preserved in the East. Fullers were warned to be careful to avoid a mixture of clothes sent to be cleaned, such as was forbidden by the law (Lev. xix:19; Deut. xxii:11).

FULLER'S FIELD (ful'ērs fēld), (Heb. כַּוֵּשׂ שְׂדֵה, seh-day' kaw-bas').

A locality near Jerusalem (2 Kings xviii:17, 26; Is. xxxvi:2; vii:3). Some locate it on the northern side of the city, others on the west, near the modern pool Birket el Mamillah. It took its name doubtless from the fact that the fullers spread their garments here after cleaning them in the neighboring pool, as they do to this day (Williams' Holy City, i suppl. p. 122 Robinson Bibl. Sacra, iii: 646 ff.) (See EN-ROGEL.)

FUNERALS (fū'nēr-älz). See BURIAL; MOURNING.

FURLONG (fūr'long). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FURNACE (fūr'nās).

In Neh. iii:11; xii:38, the word applies to the baker's oven. In Gen. xv:17 and Is. xxxi:9 it is used in a broader sense. Smelting ovens and calcining furnaces were also known and used (Gen. xix:28; Exod. ix:8-10; xix:18). The Hebrews also evidently understood the use of the lime kiln (Is. xxxiii:12; Amos ii:1). Refining is frequently mentioned and the furnaces were doubtless like those used in Egypt (Prov. xvii:3; xxvii:21; Ezek. xxii:18 ff; Deut. iv:20; 1 Kings viii:51; Is. xlvi:10; Jer. xi:4). The furnace of Dan. iii:22, 23, was built like a brick-kiln, with an opening at the top to put in the materials and a floor at the bottom where the metal might be extracted (verse 26). These were used by the Persians as an instrument of capital punishment (Dan. iii; Jer. xxix:22; Hos. vii:7).

FURNACES, THE TOWER OF (fūr'nās-ēz, thē tow'ēr ōv), (Heb. מִגְדַל הַתַּנְּוּרִים, mig-dal' hat-tan-noo-reem', Neh. iii:11; xii:38).

This was one of the towers of the middle or second wall of Jerusalem, at its northwest angle, adjoining the "corner gate," and near the intersection of the present line of the Via Dolorosa with the street of Stephen. Possibly it may be the "Baker's Street" (Jer. xxxvii:21).

FURNITURE (fūr'nī-tūr).

1. The rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. כַּר, kar, pad, a camel's litter or canopied saddle, in which women usually travel in the East at the present day (Gen. xxxi:34).

2. Kel-ee' (Heb. כֵּלֵי, something prepared).

The name given to the sacred articles in the tabernacle and their utensils (Exod. xxxi:7, sg.; xxxv:14; xxxix:33). In Nah. ii:9 it is translated "ornamental vessels." (See TABERNACLE; HOUSE; etc.)

FURROW (fūr'rō), (Heb. גִּדְרֹה, ghed-ood', an incision, Ps. lxxv:10), a trench in the soil made by a plow in the process of tilling (Ps. lxxv:10; Hos. x:4).

Figurative. Grievous injuries done to the church and saints of God, are likened to long furrows made upon the back; how barbarous and painful (Ps. cxxix:3). The Israelites' two furrows, may either denote their principal transgressions, revolting from the family of David, by rebellion, and from God, by idolatry; or their two countries; or their hard service under the Assyrians (Hos. x:10). The marginal translation has it, "When I shall bind them for their two transgressions, or in their two habitations." The Chaldee compares Israel under bondage to their enemies, as a pair of yoked heifers drawing the plow. By some it is thought that reference is here made to the practice of saying that two persons at enmity, when reconciled, are plowing in two furrows; that is, acting in accordance. So Israel would fall in heartily with idolaters. The passage is confessedly obscure.

FURY (fūr'ry), (Heb. חַיִּמָּה, khay-marw', heat; or חַרֹּן, khaw-ronē', burning), intense anger, attributed to God metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men (Lev. xxvi:28; Job xx:23; Is. lxiii:3, etc.).

FUTURE LIFE (fū'tūr lif). See LIFE; IMMORTALITY.

G

GAAL (gā'al), (Heb. גַּאֵל, gah'al, miscarriage, loathing), son of Ebed.

He went to Shechem with his brothers when the inhabitants became discontented with Abimelech, and so engaged their confidence that they placed him at their head. At the festival at which the Shechemites offered the first-fruits of their vintage in the temple of Baal, Gaal, by apparently drunken bravadoes, roused the valor of the people, and strove yet more to kindle their wrath against the absent Abimelech. It would seem as if the natives had been in some way intimately connected with, or descended from, the original inhabitants; for Gaal endeavored to awaken their attachment to the ancient family of Hamor, the father of Shechem, which ruled the place in the time of Abraham (Gen. xxxiv:2, 6), and which seems to have been at this time represented by Gaal and his brothers. Although deprived of Shechem, the family appears to have maintained itself in some power in the neighborhood; which induced the Shechemites to look to Gaal when they became tired of Abimelech. Whether he succeeded in awakening among them a kind feeling towards the descendants of the ancient masters of the place, does not appear; but eventually they went out under his command, being assisted doubtless by his men, to intercept and give battle to Abimelech, when he appeared before the town. Gaal, however, fled before Abimelech, and his retreat into Shechem being cut off by Zebul, the commandant of that place, he went to his home, and we hear of him no more. The account of this attempt is interesting, chiefly from the slight glimpse it affords of the position, at this period, of what had been one of the reigning families of the land before its invasion by the Israelites (Judg. ix:26-48). (B. C. 1319.)

GAASH (gā'ash), (Heb. גַּאֵשׁ, ga'ash, quaking), a mountain of Ephraim, north of which stood Timnath-Serah, celebrated for Joshua's tomb (Josh. xxiv:30; Judg. ii:9), which, Eusebius says, was known in his time. A brook or valley (2 Sam. xxiii:30; 1 Chron. xi:32).

Dr. Eli Smith discovered Timnath-Serah in the modern Tibneh, six miles northeast of Jufua, and within its precincts a high hill on "the north side" of which are some remarkable ruins of tombs of great antiquity. There can be but little doubt that this spot is the site of the ancient tomb of Joshua.

GABA (gā'bā). The same as Geba. The broader vowel sound occurs in the pause (Josh. xviii:24; Ezra ii:26; Neh. vii:30). (See GEBa).

GABATHA (gāb'a-thā). See BIGTHAN.

GABBAI (gāb'ba-i), (Heb. גַּבַּי, gab-bah'ee, tax gatherer), head of a Benjamite family of note in Jerusalem (Neh. xi:8), B. C. 536.

GABBATHA (gāb'ba-thā), (Gr. γαββαθά, gab-bath-ah'; Chald. גַּבְּתָא, knoll), the place mentioned in John xix:13 where the Evangelist states that Pontius Pilate, alarmed at last in his attempts to save Jesus, by the artful insinuation of the Jews, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend,' went into the prætorium again, and brought Jesus out to them, and sat down once more upon the βῆμα, tribunal, in a place called Λιθόστρωτον, stone-paved, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha.

The Greek word, signifying literally stone-paved, is an adjective, and is generally used as such by the Greek writers; but they also sometimes use it to denote a pavement formed of ornamental stones of various colors, commonly called a tesselated or mosaic pavement. The partiality of the Romans for this kind of pavement is well known (Casaubon, ad Sucton. p. 38, etc., edit. 1605). From this fact it has been inferred by many eminent writers, that the stone-paved place where Pilate's tribunal was set on this occasion, was covered by a tessellated pavement, which, as a piece of Roman magnificence, was appended to the prætorium at Jerusalem. The emphatic manner in which St. John speaks of it agrees with this conjecture. It further appears from his narrative that it was outside the prætorium; for Pilate is said to have 'come out' to the Jews, who, for ceremonial reasons, did not go into it, on this as well as on other occasions (John xviii:28, 29, 38; xix:4, 13). Besides which, the Roman governors, although they tried causes, and conferred with their council (Acts xxv:12), within the prætorium, always pronounced sentence in the open air. Probably this tessellated pavement, on which the tribunal was now placed, was inlaid on some part of the terrace, etc., running along one side of the prætorium, and overlooking the area where the Jews were assembled, or upon a landing-place of the stairs, immediately before the grand entrance.

It has been conjectured that the pavement in question was no other than the one referred to in 2 Chron. vii:3, and by Josephus, De Bell. Jud. vi:1, 8, as in the outer court of the temple; but that he would adjourn the whole assembly, consisting of rulers of every grade, as well as the populace, to any other place, is very unlikely; and the supposition that such place was any part of the temple is encumbered with additional difficulties.

J. F. D.

GABRIEL (gā'bri-el), (Heb. גַּבְרִיֵּאל, gab-ree-ale', the mighty one or hero of God), the heavenly messenger who was sent to Daniel to explain the vision of the ram and the he-goat (Dan. vii), and to communicate the prediction of the Seventy Weeks (Dan. ix:21-27).

Under the new dispensation he was employed to announce the birth of John the Baptist to his father Zechariah (Luke i:11), and that of the Messiah to the Virgin Mary (Luke i:26). Both by Jewish and Christian writers, Gabriel has been denominated an archangel. The scriptures, however, affirm nothing positively respecting his rank, though the importance of the commissions on which he was employed, and his own words 'I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God' (Luke i:19), are rather in favor of the notion of his superior dignity. But the reserve of the Inspired Volume on such points strikingly distinguishes its angelology from that of the Jews and Mohammedans, and, we may add, of the Fathers and some later Christian writers. In all the solemn glimpses of the other world which it gives, a great moral purpose is kept in view. Whatever is divulged tends to elevate and refine; nothing is said to gratify a prurient curiosity.

GAD (gād), (Heb. גַּד, gawd, fortune).

(1) The Seventh Son of Jacob. By his concubine Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah; so called, to signify that a troop, or good fortune, was coming (Gen. xxx:9-11). He had seven sons—Ziphion, Haggai, Shuni, Ebzon, Eri, Arodi, Arel; all of whom were fathers of numerous families (Gen. xlvi:16; Num. xxvi:15-18). (B. C. 1915.)

(2) The Tribe of Gad. When this tribe came out of Egypt, under their prince Eliasaph, the son of Deuel, it amounted to 45,650; but it decreased 5,150 in the wilderness. Their spy to search the Promised Land was Geuel, the son of Machi (Num. xiii:15). They, along with the Reubenites, petitioned for, and obtained their inheritance from Moses, on the east of Jordan, between the Reubenites on the south and the Manasites on the north (Deut. xxxii; xxxiii:20, 21). Their warriors assisted in conquering Canaan westward of Jordan; and from Mount Ebal they gave their assent to the curses of the law (Deut. xxvii:13; Josh. i:12; iv:12). After seven years they returned to their homes (Josh. xxii). Elever captains of this tribe, swimming through Jordan when high swollen, came to David in the hold, and routed some Arabs, or Philistines, whom they found in the valley of Jordan; and great numbers of them attended at David's coronation to be king of Israel (1 Chron. xii:8-15, 37, 38).

The Gadites were a warlike people, and were compelled to be continually armed and on the alert against the inroads of the surrounding Arabian hordes (comp. Gen. xlix:19; Deut. xxxiii:20; 1 Chron. v:19, sq.). About the time of Jeroboam II, they cut off a prodigious number of the Arabian Hagarites, and seized on their cattle and country (Gen. xlix:19; Deut. xxxiii:20). When Tiglath-pileser transported the Gadites and Reubenites to Assyria, the Ammonites and Moabites seized on their country (1 Chron. v:18-26; Jer. xlviii:18-24; xlix:1).

(3) The Land of Gad. As a reward for their having formed the vanguard in war of the army of the tribes collectively, they were allowed to appropriate to their exclusive use some pastoral districts beyond the Jordan (Num. xxxii:17, sq.).

The inheritance of this tribe, called the land of Gad (1 Sam. xiii:7; Jer. xlix:1), was situated beyond the Jordan in Gilead, north of Reuben, and separated on the east from Ammon by the river Jabbok. According to 1 Chron. v:11, the Gadites had extended their possessions on the east as far as Salchah, though the latter had been allotted by Moses to Manasseh (Deut. iii:10, 13); a proof how difficult it is to draw a strong line of demarcation between the possessions of pastoral tribes. The territory of Gad forms a part of the present Belka (Burckhardt, Syria, ii:598).

In Josh. xiii:25, the land of Gad is called 'half the land of the children of Ammon;' not because the latter were then in possession of it, but probably because the part west of the Jabbok had formerly borne that name (comp. Judg. xi:13).

The principal cities of Gad are called by the general appellation, the Cities of Gilead (Josh. xiii:25).

(4) The Prophet. A prophet contemporary with David, and probably a pupil of Samuel, who early attached himself to the son of Jesse (1 Sam. xxii:5). Instances of his prophetic intercourse with David occur in 2 Sam. xxiv:11, sq.; 1 Chron. xxi:9, sq.; xxix:25. Gad wrote a history of the reign of David, to which the author of the 2nd book of Samuel seems to refer for further information respecting that reign (1 Chron. xxix:29). (B. C. 1062-1017.)

(5) An Idol. (Heb. גַּד, gad), the god (Is. lxxv:11, A. V. "troop") of good fortune. Properly "the Gad," with the article. In the A. V. of Is. lxxv:11 the clause "that prepare a table for that troop" has in the margin instead of the last word the proper name "Gad," which evidently denotes some idol worshiped by the Jews in Babylon, though it is impossible positively to identify it. Huetius would understand by it Fortune as symbolized by the Moon, but Vitringa, on the contrary, considers it to be the sun. Gesenius, Münter, and Ewald, consider Gad to be the form under which the planet Jupiter was worshiped as the greater star of good fortune (see especially Gesenius. Comment. über der Iesaia, ad loc.). J. W.

(6) A Plant. (Heb. גַּד, gad) occurs in two places in scripture, in both of which it is translated coriander, viz. (Exod. xvi:31). 'And it (manna) was like coriander (gad) seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made of honey' (Num. xi:7). 'And the manna was as coriander seed, and the color thereof as the color of bdellium.' The manna which fell in the desert, and on which the Israelites were fed during their sojourn there, is usually described, from a collation of the different passages in which it is mentioned, as white, round, and like gad, which last has almost universally been considered to mean 'coriander' seed, though some prefer other seeds. The coriander is an umbelliferous plant, the Coriandrum sativum of botanists. The fruit, commonly called seeds, is globular, greyish-colored, about the size of peppercorn, having its surface marked with fine striæ. Both its taste and smell are agreeable, depending on the presence of a volatile oil, which is separated by distillation. (See CORIANDER.) J. F. R.

GADARA (gād'a-râ), (Gr. Γαδάρᾱ, gad-a-rah').

(1) Gadara was the chief city or metropolis of Peræa, lying in the district termed Gadaritias, some small distance from the southern extremity of the sea of Galilee, sixty stadia from Tiberias, to the south of the river Hieromax, and also of the Scheriat-al-Mandhur (Joseph. Antiq. xiii:13, 3; Polyb. v:71, 3; Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iv:8, 3; Plin. Hist. Nat. v:15). It was fortified, and stood on a hill of limestone. Its inhabitants were mostly heathens. Josephus says of it, in conjunction with Gaza and Hippos, 'they were Grecian cities' (Antiq. xvii:11, 4). After the place had been destroyed in the domestic quarrels of the Jews, it was rebuilt by Pompey, in order to gratify Demetrius of Gadara, one of his freedmen (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i:7, 7). Augustus added Gadara, with other places, to the kingdom of Herod (Joseph. Antiq. xv:7, 2); from which, on the death of that prince, it was sundered, and joined to the province of Syria (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii:6, 3). At a later period it was the seat of an Episcopal See in Palæstina Secunda, whose bishops are named in the councils of Nice and Ephesus.

(2) Identification. There can be no doubt that we find Gadara in the present village of Om-keis, or Un-keis.

The city formed nearly a square. The upper part of it stood on a level spot, and appears to have been walled all round, the acclivities of the hill being on all sides exceedingly steep. The eastern gate of entrance has its portals still remaining. Among the ruins Buckingham found a theater, an Ionic temple, a second theater, besides traces and remnants of streets and houses. The prevalent orders of architecture are the Ionic and the Corinthian.

Burekhardt also found near Gadara warm sulphurous springs. They were termed Thermæ Helix, and were reckoned inferior only to those of Baia (Euseb. Onomast.) According to Epiphanius (Adv. Hæres. i:131) a yearly festival was held at these baths (Reland, p. 775).

(3) Scene of a Miracle. Gadara is the scene of the miracle recorded in Matt. viii:28; Mark v:1; Luke viii:26. The text of the original narratives which record the cure of the Gadarene demoniac, or demoniacs (see DEMONIAC), has more than its share of difficulty in regard to the name of the locality where the GADI (gā'di), (Heb. גָּדִי, gaw-dee', a Gadite), father of Menahem, who deprived Shallum of the throne of Israel (2 Kings xv:14, 17), B. C. bef. 741.

GADITES (gād'itiz), (Heb. גָּדִיטִים, gaw-dee'), descendants of Gad, the son of Jacob. See GAD.

GAHAM (gā'hām), (Heb. גַּחַם, gah'kham, to burn), son of Nahor (brother of Abraham), by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii:24), B. C. about 2200.

GAHAR (gā'hār), (Heb. גַּחַר, gah'khar, lurker), the sons of Gahar were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:47; Neh. vii:49), B. C. 536.

GAIUS (gā'yūs), (Gr. Γάϊος, gah'ee-os).

1. An inhabitant of Corinth, the host of Paul, event took place. Mark and Luke indeed agree in describing it as 'the country of the Gadarenes,' but Matthew calls it 'the country of the Gergesenes.' One various reading gives 'of the Gerasenes,' another 'of the Gadarenes.' But Gerasa (see GERASA) lay at a wide distance from the lake of Galilee, and possibly the difficulty which hence arose was that which led Origen to conjecture that the reading should be 'of the Gergesenes,' for with Origen this reading took its rise (Rosenmüller, ii:2, 22; Reland, pp. 774, 806). Indeed to him the place as well as the name owes its existence. Gergesa is found in some maps, but the best authorities omit it (Kiepert's Atlas); for it is not found either in the Bible or Josephus. (See GERGESA.) J. R. B.

GADARENE (gād'a-rēne'), (Gr. Γαδάρηνος, gā-dar-ay-nos'), an inhabitant of Gadara (Mark v:1; Luke viii:26, 37). (See GADARA.)

GADDI (gād'di), (Heb. גָּדִי, gad-dee', fortunate), son of Susi, of Manasseh, sent by Moses to explore the land (Num. xiii:11), B. C. 1209.

GADDIEL (gād'di-el), (Heb. גָּדִי־אֵל, gad-dee-ale', fortune of God), son of Sodi, of the tribe of Zebulun, one of the spies (Num. xiii:10), B. C. 1209.

and in whose house the Christians were accustomed to assemble (Rom. xvi:23). He was baptized by Paul (1 Cor. i:14).

2. A Macedonian missionary, associate of Paul. When the apostle went into Asia, Gaius and Aristarchus accompanied him to Ephesus, where they abode some time with him; so that in the sedition raised there about the great Diana, the Ephesians ran to the house of Gaius and Aristarchus, and dragged them to the theater (Acts xix:29). (A. D. 54.)

3. The person to whom the apostle John directed his third epistle. In the opinion of several commentators he is the same as 4. The apostle commended him for his goodness (3 Joh i:6). (A. D. about 92.)

4. One of those who accompanied Paul from Corinth, or Philippi, to Asia on his last trip to Palestine. He was a native of Derbe (Acts xx:4), and perhaps to be identified with 3. The name was such a common one that it is difficult to differentiate them. (A. D. 55.)

GALAL (gā'lāl), (Heb. גַּלָּל, gaw-lawl', perhaps weighty), three Levites by this name are mentioned.

1. Son of Asaph (1 Chron. ix:15). (B. C. before 536.)

2. Son of Jeduthun (Neh. xi:17).

3. One of the family of Elkanah (1 Chron. ix:16). (B. C. before 536.)

GALATIA (ga-lā'shī-à), (Gr. Γαλατία, gal-at-ee'-ah).

Galatia was a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia and Paphlagonia, on the south by Lycaonia, on the east by Pontus and Cappadocia, and on the west by Phrygia and Bithynia.

It derived its name from the Gallic or Celtic tribes who, about 280 years B. C., made an irruption into Macedonia and Thrace. At the invitation of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, they passed over the Hellespont to assist that prince against his brother Ziboeta or Zipætes. Having accomplished this object, they were unwilling to retrace their steps; and strengthened by the accession of fresh hordes from Europe, they overran Bithynia and the neighboring countries, and supported themselves by predatory excursions, or by imposts exacted from the native chiefs. After the lapse of forty years, Attalus I, king of Pergamus, succeeded in checking their nomadic habits, and confined them to a fixed territory. Of the three principal tribes, the Trocmi settled in the eastern part of Galatia near the banks of the Halys; the Tectosages in the country round Ancyra; and the Tolistobogii in the southwestern parts near Pessinus. They retained their independence till the year B. C. 189 when they were brought under the power of Rome by the consul Cn. Manlius (Livy, xxxviii; Polybius, xxii:24), though still governed by their own princes. In the year B. C. 25 Galatia became a Roman province. Under the successors of Augustus the boundaries of Galatia were so much enlarged that it reached from the shores of the Euxine to the Pisidian Taurus. In the time of Constantine a new division was made, which reduced it to its ancient limits, and by Theodosius I or Valens it was separated into Galatia Prima, the northern part, occupied by the Trocmi and Tectosages, and Galatia Secunda or Salutaris; Ancyra was the capital of the former, and Pessinus of the latter.

From the intermixture of Gauls and Greeks Galatia was also called Gallo-Græcia (Strabo. xii:5), and its inhabitants Gallo-Græci. But even in Jerome's time they had not lost their native language. The gospel was introduced into this province by the Apostle Paul. His first visit is recorded in Acts xvi:6, and his second in Acts xviii:23.

J. E. R.

"Few Jewish or Jewish-Christian inscriptions can be detected in South Galatian cities, because the names are usually unrecognizable and few emblems or Jewish formulæ are employed.

"Christian inscriptions are comparatively numerous in Galatic Phrygia and Lycaonia, especially in the country that lies north and northwest of Iconium; and, though none are dated, yet style indicates that some must be as early as the third century." (W. M. Ramsay, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GALATIANS (ga-lā'shanz), (Gr. Γαλάται, gal-ah'tai, Galatia), the people to whom St. Paul wrote his Galatian Epistle (Gal. iii:1).

They were a mixed people; Phrygians, Gauls, Greeks, Romans and Jews made up the population in a more or less amalgamated form. Quickness of apprehension, prompt action, impressibility and eager craving for knowledge marked their character; but, true to their racial disposition, they were fickle. This perhaps accounts for the readiness with which they discarded their own religious system and embraced the teachings of St.

Paul. But the pure spiritual teaching soon ceased to satisfy, and they sought a more ritualistic and external form which the Apostle rebukes, saying to them "having begun in the spirit are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii:3).

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

(1) Pauline Origin. The Pauline origin of this epistle is attested not only by the superscription which it bears (i:1), but also by frequent allusions in the course of it to the great Apostle of the Gentiles (comp. i:13-23; ii:1-14). and by the unanimous testimony of the ancient church (Lardner, Works, vol. ii:8vo.). It is corroborated also by the style, tone, and contents of the epistle, which are perfectly in keeping with those of the Apostle's other writings.

(2) To Whom Addressed. The parties to whom this epistle was addressed are described in the epistle itself as 'the churches of Galatia' (i:2; comp. iii:1). Into this district the gospel was first introduced by Paul himself (Acts xvi:6; Gal. i:8; iv:13, 19). Churches were then also probably formed; for on revisiting this district some time after his first visit it is mentioned that he 'strengthened the disciples' (Acts xviii:23). These churches seem to have been composed principally of converts directly from heathenism, but partly, also, of Jewish converts, both pure Jews and proselytes. Unhappily, the latter, not thoroughly emancipated from early opinions and prepossessions, or probably influenced by Judaizing teachers who had visited these churches, had been seized with a zealous desire to incorporate the rites and ceremonies of Judaism with the spiritual truths and simple ordinances of Christianity. So active had this party been in disseminating their views through the churches of Galatia that the majority at least of the members had been seduced to adopt them (i:6; iii:1, etc.). To this result it is probable that the previous religious conceptions of the Galatians contributed; for, accustomed to the worship of Cybele, which they had learned from their neighbors the Phrygians, and to the theosophic doctrines with which that worship was associated, they would be the more readily induced to believe that the fullness of Christianity could alone be developed through the symbolical adumbrations of a very elaborate ceremonial (Neander, Apostol. Zeitalter, S. 400, 2te, Aufl.). From some passages in this epistle (e. gr. i:11-24; ii:1-21) it would appear also that insinuations had been disseminated among the Galatian churches to the effect that Paul was not a divinely-commissioned Apostle, but only a messenger of the church at Jerusalem; that Peter and he were at variance upon the subject of the relation of the Jewish rites to Christianity; and that Paul himself was not at all times so strenuously opposed to those rites as he had chosen to be among the Galatians. Of this state of things intelligence having been conveyed to the Apostle, he wrote this epistle for the purpose of vindicating his own pretensions and conduct, of counteracting the influence of these false views, and of recalling the Galatians to the simplicity of the gospel which they had received. The importance of the case was probably the reason why the Apostle put himself to the great labor of writing this epistle with his own hand (vi:11).

(3) How Divided. The epistle consists of three parts. (1) In the first part (i.-ii.), after his usual salutations, Paul vindicates his own Apostolic authority and independence as a directly-commissioned ambassador of Christ to men, and especially to the Gentile portion of the race;

asserting that the gospel which he preached was the only gospel of Christ,—expressing his surprise that the Galatians had allowed themselves to be so soon turned from him who had called them to a different gospel,—denouncing all who had thus seduced them as troublers of the church, perverters of the doctrine of Christ, and deserving, even had they been angels from heaven, to be placed under an anathema instead of being followed,—maintaining the Divine origin of his Apostolic commission, which he illustrates by the history of his conversion and early conduct in the service of Christ,—and declaring that, so far from being inferior to the other Apostles, he had ever treated with them on equal terms, and been welcomed by them as an equal. (2) Having in the close of this part of the epistle been led to refer to his zeal for the great doctrine of salvation by the grace of God through faith in Christ, he enters at large, in the second part (iii.-iv.), upon the illustration and defense of this cardinal truth of Christianity. He appeals to the former experience of the Galatians as to the way in which they had received the Spirit, to the case of Abraham, and to the testimony of scripture in support of his position that it is by faith and not by the works of the law that men are accepted of God (iii:1-9). He proceeds to remind them that the law has brought a curse upon men because of sin, a curse which it has no power to remove, and from which the sinner can be redeemed only through the substitutionary work of Christ, by whose means the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles. And lest any should object that the law being of more recent origin than the covenant must supersede it, he shows that this cannot be the case, but that the covenant must be perpetual, while the law is to be regarded only in the light of a temporary and intercalary arrangement, the design of which was to forward the fulfillment of the promise in Christ (iii:10-29). The relation of the Jewish church to the Christian is then illustrated by the case of an heir under tutors and governors as contrasted with the case of the same person when he is of age and has become master of all; and the Galatians are exhorted not willingly to descend from the important and dignified position of sons to that of mere servants in God's house—an exhortation which is illustrated and enforced by an allegorical comparison of the Jewish church to Ishmael, the son of Hagar, and of the Christian to Isaac, the son of Sarah, and the Child of Promise (iv:1-31). (3) The third part of the Epistle (v.-vi.) is chiefly hortatory and admonitory; it sets forth the necessity of steadfast adherence to the liberty of the gospel in connection with obedience to the moral law as a rule of duty, the importance of mutual forbearance and love among Christians, and the desirableness of maintaining a firm adherence to the doctrine of Christ and him crucified. The apostle concludes with benedictions and prayers.

(4) Time and Place. Respecting the time when and the place where this epistle was written, great diversity of opinion prevails. Marcion held this to be the earliest of Paul's epistles (Epiphanius, Adv. Hæres. xlii:9); and Tertullian is generally supposed to favor the same opinion, from his speaking of Paul's zeal against Judaism displayed in this epistle as characteristic of his being yet a neophyte (Adv. Marc. i:20).

Michaelis also has given his suffrage in favor of a date earlier than that of the Apostle's second visit to Galatia, and very shortly after that of his first. Koppe's view (Nov. Test. vol. vi. p. 7) is the same, though he supposes the Apostle to have preached in Galatia before the visit mentioned by Luke in Acts xvi:6, and which is usually reckoned his first visit to that district. Others, again, such as Mill (Proleg. in Nov. Test. p. 4), Calovius (Biblia Illust. t. iv. p. 529), and, more recently, Schrader (Der Ap. Paulus, th. i. s. 226), place the date of this epistle at a late period of the Apostle's life.

The majority, however, concur in a medium view between these extremes, and fix the date of this epistle at some time shortly after the Apostle's second visit to Galatia. This opinion has decided support from the epistle itself. From the Apostle's abrupt exclamation in ch. i:6, 'I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you,' etc., it seems just to infer that he wrote this epistle not very long after he had been in Galatia for the second time, and perhaps while he was residing at Ephesus (Gal. i:6; iv:13; comp. Acts xviii:23; xix:1 ff.). W. L. A.

(5) Difficulties. Among the difficulties connected with the Epistle are the apparent discrepancies made by St. Paul in Galatians ii. and Acts ix:23. Comp. also Galatians i:23; Acts ix:27, 28. To these objections it has been answered by Pfeiderer (Hibbert Lect. p. 103, comp. p. 111), that 'the agreement as to the chief points is in any case greater than the discrepancies in the details, and these discrepancies can be for the most part explained simply by the difference of the standpoint of the relaters.'

"It is further objected that the conduct ascribed to St. Paul in the Acts is inconsistent with the attitude he assumes and the principles he maintains in Galatians. In Acts he is represented as circumcising Timothy (xvi:3), as shaving his head in fulfillment of a vow (xviii:18), as attending the Jewish feasts (xx:16), and as being at charges for four men who had a vow on them (xxi:23, 24). Such acts of conformity to the law are, it is thought, incompatible with the principle St. Paul lays down in the Epistle, 'If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.' The solution is obvious. When St. Paul makes this strong statement, what he means is, If you observe the ordinances of Moses because you believe them to be necessary to salvation, Christ shall profit you nothing. Together with this fundamental principle he held also as an ethical maxim, that it is right to become all things to all men, a Jew to the Jew if need be. And when he observes the Mosaic ordinances in the temple, it is not because he believes they have any virtue for salvation, but because he wishes to give no offense to his Jewish brethren. These Jewish observances have become to him matters of indifference, and only when they are lifted out of their proper position and considered essentials do they become dangerous. 'Neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision' (Gal. vi:15; comp. 1 Cor. vii:18). That he did not yield when it was demanded of him as a matter of principle that he should circumcise Titus, is perfectly consistent with his circumcising Timothy as a concession to expediency. (Marcus Dodds, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GALBANUM (gäl'bä-nüm). See CHELBENAH; FRANKINCENSE; ETC.

GALEED (gäl'e-ëd), (Heb. גַּלְעָד, gal-ade', heap of witnesses), a name given by Jacob and Laban to the heap they made on Mount Gilead in witness of the covenant they agreed upon (Gen. xxxi:47, 48; comp. verses 23, 25).

GALILÆAN or GALILEAN (gāl'i-læ'an or gāl'i-lē'an), (Gr. Γαλιλαῖος, gal-ee-lah'yos, Galilæan), an inhabitant of GALILEE (which see) (Mark xiv:70; Luke xiii:1, 2, xxii:59, xxiii:6; John iv:45; Acts ii:7, and in the Greek, Matt. xxvi:69; Acts i:11, v:37).

GALILEE (gāl'i-lē), (Heb. גַּלְיָלָה, gaw-lee-law', circle region district), the Greek form of the name given to one of the three principal divisions of Palestine, the other two being Judæa and Samaria.

(1) Name. This name of the region was very ancient. It occurs in the Hebrew forms of Galil and Galilah (Josh. xx:7; xxi:32; 1 Kings ix:11; 2 Kings xv:29), and in Is. ix:1, we have 'Galilee of the nations' (1 Macc. v:15; Matt. iv:15).

(2) Geography. Galilee was the northernmost of the three divisions, and was divided into Upper and Lower. The former district had Mount Lebanon and the countries of Tyre and Sidon on the north; the Mediterranean Sea on the west; Abilene, Ituræa, and the country of Decapolis on the east; and Lower Galilee on the south. This was the portion of Galilee which was distinctively called 'Galilee of the nations,' or of the 'Gentiles,' from its having a more mixed population, i. e. less purely Jewish, than the others. Cæsarea Philippi was its principal city. Lower Galilee had Upper Galilee on the north, the Mediterranean on the west, the Sea of Galilee or Lake of Genesareth on the east, and Samaria on the south. Its principal towns were Tiberias, Chorazin, Bethsaida, Nazareth, Cana, Capernaum, Nain, Cæsarea of Palestine, and Ptolemais.

(3) Home of Christ. This is the district which was of all others the most honored with the presence of our Savior. Here he lived entirely until he was thirty years of age; and although, after the commencement of his ministry, he frequently visited the other provinces, it was here that he chiefly resided (Matt. iv:13; ix:17). Here also he made his first appearance to the apostles after his resurrection; for they were all of them natives of this region, and had returned hither after the sad events at Jerusalem (Matt. xxviii:7).

(4) Disciples Called Galileans. Hence the disciples of Christ were called 'Galileans' (Acts i:11; ii:7; John i:46; vii:52). They were easily recognized as such; for the Galileans spoke a dialect of the vernacular Syriac different from that of Judæa, and which was of course accounted rude and impure, as all provincial dialects are considered to be, in comparison with that of the metropolis. It was this which occasioned the detection of St. Peter as one of Christ's disciples (Mark xiv:70; Matt. xxvi:73). The Galilean dialect (as we learn from Buxtorf, Lightfoot, and others), was of a broad and rustic tone, which affected the pronunciation not only of letters but of words.

(5) A Seditious People. The Galileans are mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. xvii:10, 2; De Bell. Jud. ii:10, 6; iii:3, 2) as a turbulent and rebellious people, ready on all occasions to rise against the Roman authority. This character of them explains what is said in Luke xiii:1, with regard to 'the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices.' Josephus, indeed, does not mention any Galileans slain in the Temple by Pilate; but the character which he gives that people sufficiently corroborates the statement. The tumults to which he alludes were, as we know, chiefly raised at the great festivals, when sacrifices were slain in great abundance; and on all such occasions the Galileans were much more active than the men of Judæa and Jerusalem, as is proved by the history of Archelaus (Joseph. Antiq. xvii:9, 10); which case, indeed, furnishes an answer to those who deny that the Galileans attended the feasts with the rest of the Jews.

The seditious character of the Galileans also explains why Pilate, when sitting in judgment upon Jesus, caught at the word Galilee when used by the chief priests, and asked if he were a Galilean (Luke xxiii:6). To be known to belong to that country was of itself sufficient to prejudice Pilate against him, and to give some countenance to the charges, unsupported by impartial evidence, which were preferred against him, and which Pilate himself had, just before, virtually declared to be false. (Porter, Hand-book.)

GALILEE (gāl'i-lē), MOUNTAIN IN, where Christ showed himself to certain of his disciples after his resurrection (Matt. xxviii:16; perhaps 1 Cor. xv:6). It is quite impossible to know to which mountain the Evangelist refers. It is, however, generally conjectured that it was Mt. Tabor.

GALILEE, SEA OF. See SEA.

GALL (gāl).

1. Mer-ay-raw' (Heb. מֵרַיִרָה, or mer-o-raw' (Heb. מֵרַיִרָה), denotes etymologically "that which is bitter;" occurs in its primary and proper meaning, as denoting the substance secreted in the gall-bladder of animals, commonly called bile, in the following passage: (Job xvi:13) 'He poureth out my gall,' mererah; Sept. τὴν χολήν μου, my gall; Vulg. viscera mea. The metaphors in this verse are taken from the practice of huntsmen, who first surround the beast, then shoot it, and next take out the entrails. The meaning as given by Bp. Heath, is, 'he entirely destroyeth me.' Job xx:14 as describing the remorse of a wicked man.

2. Roshe (Heb. רֹשֶׁה, or רוֹשֶׁה), generally translated "gall" by the A. V. is in Hos. x:4 rendered "Hemlock;" in Deut. xxxii:33 and Job xx:16 roshe denotes the "poison" or "venom" of serpents.

Gall (Quercus.)

It refers to 'the gall of adders,' which according to the ancients is the seat of their poison (Plin. Hist. Nat. ii:37). See, also, Job xx:25, where, to describe the certainty of a wicked man's destruction, it is said, 'the glittering sword cometh out of his gall.' Sept., out of his vitals. In the story of Tobit the gall of a fish is said to have been used to cure his father's blindness (Tobit vi:8; xi:10, 13). Pliny refers to the use of the same substance for diseases of the eye. Galen and other writers praise the use of the liver of the silurus in cases of dimness of sight. J. F. D.

3. Khol-ay' (Gr. χολή, perhaps greenish), the bitter secretion gall. It is related that the Roman soldiers offered our Lord, just before his crucifixion, "vinegar (R. V. 'wine') mingled with gall" (Matt. xxvii:34), and "wine mingled with myrrh" (Mark. xv:23). This was intended as a stupefying draught.

Figurative. (1) Injustice, oppression, and like wicked works, are likened to gall; how offensive and detestable to God! how hurtful and ruinous to men (Deut. xxxii:32; Amos vi:12). (2) A state of sin is called the gall of bitterness and "bond of iniquity" (Acts viii:23). Most grievous troubles are called "gall" (Jer. viii:14; ix:15; Lam. iii:5, 19). (3) The wicked man's meat, and other outward enjoyments, are turned into the "gall of asps" within him; they tend to ruin and destroy him; and often is his conscience terribly tormented for the unlawful manner of procuring them (Job xx:14).

GALLANT (gāl'lant), (Heb. גָּלְלָנִי, ad-deer', large, mighty). "But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby" (Is. xxxiii:21).

GALLERY (gāl'lēr-ÿ), the rendering of two Hebrew words:

Rekh-eel' (Heb. רֵכֶהֶל, probably panel work or fretted ceiling); the term denotes a portico or veranda. At-took' signifies projection of a story.

In Cant. i:17 the Hebrew means panelling, and in Ezek. xli:15; xlii:3, it seems to signify a pillar used in supporting a floor. In Cant. vii:5 the term is applied to the regularly arranged, flowing locks of the hair, in their likeness to the channels of running water. So it is doubtful if the Hebrew words mean "galleries" in our sense of the word.

GALLEY (gāl-lÿ), (Heb. גַּלְיָהוּ, on-ee-yaw', conveyance). A low, flat built vessel with one or more banks, i. e., rows of oars (Is. xxxiii:21; 2 Macc. iv:20). (See SHIP.)

The enemies of the Jews, and the Assyrian army are compared to *galley*s or gallant vessels; that is, large and magnificent ships (Is. xxxiii:21).

GALLIM (gāl'lim), (Heb. גַּלְלִים, gal-leem', fountains, or perhaps heaps).

1. The name of the place from which Phalti came to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife (1 Sam. xxv:44).

2. One of the places terrified by the approach of Sennacherib (Is. x:30). In both instances the place is mentioned in connection with towns in the tribe of Benjamin and not far from Jerusalem.

GALLIO (gāl'li-o), (Gr. Γαλλίον, gal-lee'own, Galliön). Junius Annæus Gallio, elder brother of Seneca the philosopher.

His name was originally M. Ann. Novatus, but changed to Jun. Ann. Gallio in consequence of his adoption by Jun. Gallio the rhetorician ('pater Gallio,' Quintil. Inst. Orat. iii:1; sec. 21; ix:2; sec. 91). Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Vita Beato, and in the preface to the fourth book of his Naturales Quaestiones describes him as a man universally beloved; and who, while exempt from all other vices, especially abhorred flattery. According to Eusebius, he committed suicide before the death of Seneca, but Tacitus speaks of him as alive after that event (Annal. xv:73), and Dion Cassius states that he was put to death by order of Nero. He was Proconsul (ἀρχιπατέριος), of Achaia (Acts xviii:12) under the Emperor Claudius, when Paul first visited Corinth, and nobly refused to abet the persecution raised by the Jews against the Apostle. Dr. Lardner has noticed the strict accuracy of Luke in giving him this designation, which is obscured in the Auth. Vers. by the use of the term deputy (Credibility, part i. book i. ch. i.; Works, i:34). (See PAUL.)

J. E. R.

GALLOWS (gāl'löz), (Heb. אֵשֶׁת, ayts, a tree of wood, Esth. vi:4). In Gen. xl:19; Deut. xxi:22, "a tree." Hanging seems to have been a punishment inflicted by the Egyptians.

GAMALIEL (ga-mā'li-el), (Heb. גַּמְלִיֵּאל, gam-lee-ale', reward of God).

1. Son of Pedahzur, and the captain of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. vii:54; x:23), who was appointed to assist Moses in numbering the people at Sinai (i:10; ii:20). He made an offering, as tribe prince, at the dedication of the altar (vii:54), and was chief of his tribe at starting on the march through the wilderness (x:23). (B. C. 1210.)

2. A doctor and member of the Sanhedrim in the early times of Christianity, who, by his favorable interference, saved the Apostles from an ignominious death (Acts v:34). He was the teacher of the Apostle Paul before the conversion of the latter (Acts xxii:3). He bears in the Talmud the surname of hazoken, 'the old man, and is represented as the son of Rabbi Simeon, and grandson of the famous Hillel; he is said to have occupied a seat, if not the presidency, in the Sanhedrim during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, and to have died eighteen years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

There are idle traditions about his having been converted to Christianity by Peter and John (Phot. Cod. clxxi. p. 199); but they are altogether irreconcilable with the esteem and respect in which he was held even in later times by the Jewish Rabbins, by whom his opinions are frequently quoted as an all-silencing authority on points of religious law. Neither does his interference in behalf of the Apostles at all prove—as some would have it—that he secretly approved their doctrines. He was a dispassionate judge, and reasoned in that affair with the tact of worldly wisdom and experience, urging that religious opinions usually gain strength by opposition and persecution (Acts v:36, 37), while, if not noticed at all, they are sure not to leave any lasting impression on the minds of the people, if devoid of truth (ver. 38); and that it is vain to contend against them, if true (ver. 39). That he was more enlightened and tolerant than his colleagues and contemporaries, is evident from the very fact that he allowed his zealous pupil Saul to turn his mind to Greek literature, which, in a great measure, qualified him afterwards to become the Apostle of the Gentiles; while by the Jewish Palestine laws, after the Maccabæan wars, even the Greek language was prohibited to be taught to the Hebrew youth (Mishna, Sotah, ix:14).

Another proof of the high respect in which Gamaliel stood with the Jews long after his death is afforded by an anecdote told in the Talmud respecting his tomb, to the effect that Onkelos (the celebrated Chaldean translator of the Old Testament) spent seventy pounds of incense at his grave in honor of his memory. (Yochasin, 59; Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, ed. 2, vol. i. p. 69, ff.)

If by the word are intended mere secular amusements, which are the natural expression of vigorous health and joyous feeling, fitted, if not designed, to promote health, hilarity, and friendly feeling, as well as to aid in the development of the corporeal frame, we must look to other quarters of the globe, rather than to Palestine, for their origin and encouragement.

1. Among the Hebrews. The Hebrew temperament was too deep, too earnest, too full of religious emotion, to give rise to games having a national and permanent character. Whatever of amusement, or rather of recreation, the descendants of Abraham possessed, partook of that religious complexion which was natural to them; or rather the predominant religiousness of their souls gave its own hue, as to all their engagements, so to their recreations.

(1) Amusements of Children. Zechariah (viii:5) alludes to the sportiveness of children in the streets as a sign and consequence of that peace and prosperity which are so free from alarm that the young take their usual games, and are allowed entire liberty by their parents:—'and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof' (comp. Jer. xxx:19). An interesting passage illustrative of these street-amusements is found in Matt. xi:16:—'This generation is like unto children sitting in the markets and calling unto their fellows, We have piped unto you and ye have not danced, we have mourned unto you and ye have not lamented.'

That the amusement of playing with tamed and trained birds was not unusual may be learned from Job xli:5:—'Wilt thou play with him (leviathan) as with a bird?' Commenting on Zech. xii:3, Jerome mentions an amusement of the young, which we have seen practiced in more than one part of the north of England. 'It is customary,' he says, 'in the cities of Palestine, and has been so from ancient times, to place up and down large stones to serve for exercise for the young, who, according in each case to their degree of strength, lift these stones, some as high as their knees, others to their middle, others above their heads, the hands being kept horizontal and joined under the stone.'

(2) Amusements of Young People. Music, song, and dancing were recreations reserved mostly for the young or for festive occasions. From (Lam. v:16), 'the crown is fallen from our head' (see the entire passage on the subject of Games), it might be inferred that, as among the Greeks and Latins, chaplets of flowers were sometimes worn during festivity. To the amusements just mentioned frequent allusions are found in holy writ, among which may be given Ps. xxx:11; Jer. xxxi:13; Luke xv:25. In Is. xxx:29, a passage is found which serves to show how much of festivity and mirth was mingled with religious observances; the journey on festival occasions up to Jerusalem was enlivened by music, if not by dancing: 'Ye shall have a song as in the night when a holy solemnity is kept; and gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe to come into the mountain of the Lord, to the Mighty One of Israel.' A passage occurs in 2 Sam. ii:14, which may indicate the practice among the ancient Israelites of games somewhat similar to the jousts and tournaments of the middle ages. On the subject of dancing see Michaelis, (Mos. Recht, art. 197). No trace is found in Hebrew antiquity of any of the ordinary games of skill or hazard which are so numerous in the western world.

2. Grecian Games. The Grecian influence which made itself felt after the Exile led to a great change in the manners and customs of the Hebrew nation. They were soon an almost different people from what we find them in the days of their national independence and primitive simplicity.

(1) Gymnasium. In Macc. i:14, we find evidence that the Grecian games were introduced; and that a gymnasium was built under Antiochus Epiphanes—'They built a place of exercise at Jerusalem, according to the custom of the heathen.' Compare 2 Macc. iv:12, 13, 14, where special mention is made of the prevalence of 'Greek fashions,' and 'the game of Discus;' though, as appears clearly from the last passage (v:17), these practices were considered contrary to the Mosaic institutions, and were hateful to pious Israelites.

(2) Theaters and Amphitheaters. The Herodian princes had theaters and amphitheaters built in Jerusalem and other cities of Palestine, in which were held splendid games, sometimes in honor of their Roman masters. The drama does not appear to have been introduced, but Jews were in foreign countries actors of plays (Joseph. Vita, sec. 3). The passage already cited (see the original) is full of evidence how distasteful these heathenish games were to the more sound-minded part of the nation.

These facts make it the less surprising that allusions should be found in the New Testament writings to the Grecian games.

The fact that, as we have seen, the games of the amphitheater were celebrated even in Jerusalem, serves to make it very likely that Paul, in 1 Cor. xv:32; iv:9, alludes to these detestable practices, though it is not probable that the apostle was himself actually exposed to the fury of the raging animals. Contrary to the opinion of some writers, the reference to these combats appears to us very clear, though it was only metaphorically that Paul 'fought with beasts at Ephesus.'

3. Barbarous Sports. The word which the Apostle (1 Cor. xv:32) uses is emphatic and descriptive, θηριουμάχησα, I fought with wild beasts. The θηριουμαχία or beast-fight (venatio in Latin) constituted among the Romans a part of the amusements of the circus or amphitheater. It consisted in the combat of human beings with animals. The persons destined to this barbarous kind of amusement were termed θηριουμάχοι, beast-fighters. They were generally of two classes.

(1) Volunteers. Voluntary, that is, persons who fought either for amusement or for pay; these were clothed and provided with offensive and defensive weapons.

Beast-fight.

(2) Martyrs. Condemned persons, who were mostly exposed to the fury of the animals unclothed, unarmed, and sometimes bound (Cic. Pro Sext. 64; Ep. ad Quint. Frat. ii. 6; Senec. De Benef. ii:19; Tertull. Apol. 9). As none but the vilest of men were in general devoted to these beast-fights, no punishment could be more condign and cruel than what was frequently inflicted on the primitive Christians, when they were hurried away 'to the lions' (as the phrase was), on account of their fidelity to conscience and to Christ, its Lord. Ephesus appears to have had some unenviable distinction in these brutal exhibitions (Schleusner, in voc.), so that there is a peculiar propriety in the language of the Apostle.

Olympic Games.

4. Sacred Games of Greece. Some of these games stood far above the rest, bearing the appellation of ιεροι, 'sacred,' and deriving their support from the great Hellenic family at large, though each one had special honor in its own locality.

(1) Olympic. The Olympic games were held in the highest honor. The victors at them were accounted the noblest and happiest of mortals, and every means was taken that could show the respect in which they were held. These games were celebrated every five years at Olympia, in Elis, on the west side of the Peloponnesus. Hence the epoch called the Olympiads.

Vaulting and Quoits.

course, so as to be seen of all. On the same table there were also exposed to view palm-branches, one of which was given into the hand of each conqueror at the same time with the chaplet. The victors, having been summoned by proclamation, were presented with the ensigns of victory, and conducted along the stadium, preceded by a herald, who proclaimed their honors, and announced their name, parentage, and country.

The real reward, however, was in the fame which ensued. A chaplet won in the chariot-races at Olympia was the highest of earthly honors. What congratulations from friends; how was the public eye directed to the fortunate conqueror; what honor had he conferred on his native city, and for what office was such an one unfit!

In order to perpetuate the memory of these great men, their names and achievements were entered into a public register, which was under the care of suitable officers. A no less privilege was that of having a statue of themselves placed either at the expense of their country or their friends, in the sacred grove of Jupiter. A perhaps still greater honor awaited the victor on his return home. The conquerors at the Isthmian games were wont to be received in their chariots, superbly attired, amid thronging and jubilant multitudes.

Wrestling.

(2) The Pentathlon. The Pentathlon was made up of the union of leaping, running, quoiting, wrestling, and hurling the spear.

Boxing.

(3) Boxing. The Pankration consisted of wrestling and boxing.

(4) Foot Races. Racing may be traced back to the earliest periods of Grecian antiquity, and may be regarded as the first friendly contest in which men engaged. Accordingly the Olympic and Pythian, probably also the other games, opened with foot races. Foot racing, perfected by systematic practice, was divided into different kinds. If you ran merely to the end of the course (στάδιον), it was called stadium; if you went thither and back, you ran the double course (διπλασιος). The longest course was the δολιχος,

At the Olympic games the prize was simply a chaplet made of wild olive. The crowns were laid on a tripod, and placed in the middle of the long course, which required extraordinary speed and power of endurance.

It may well be supposed that the competitors employed all their ability, and displayed the greatest eagerness to gain the prize. The nearer, too, they approached to the goal, the more did they increase their efforts. Sometimes the victory de-ended on a final spring; happy he that retained power enough to leap first to the goal. The spectators, also, used every encouragement in their power, these favoring one competitor, those another. All these remarks go to show how wisely Paul acted in selecting the figure, and how carefully he has preserved the imagery which belongs to it. A word employed in the Common Version, 1 Cor. ix:27, 'Lest when I have preached to others I myself should be a castaway'—namely, preached, mars the figure. The original is κηρύξας, keruchsas 'acted the part of herald' whose business it was to call the competitors to the contest and proclaim their victory, functions which Paul spent his life in performing.

(5) The Isthmian. In writing to the Christians at Corinth there was a special propriety, on the part of the Apostle, in making allusions to the public games. Corinth was the place where one of the four Greek national games was celebrated, namely, the Isthmian. These games were so called from being held on the isthmus which joins northern with southern Greece—a spot of land most celebrated in Grecian history, alike in martial and commercial matters.

At the Isthmian games the prize was parsley during the mythic periods. In later ages the victor was crowned with a chaplet of pine leaves. Parsley, however, appears to have been also employed. If the conqueror had come off victorious in the three great divisions—music, gymnastics, and racing—he was in the Pythian, as well as in the other sacred games, presented also with a palm-branch. The names of about seventy persons are preserved who gained honors at the Isthmian games, among which occurs that of the emperor Nero, who is recorded to have gained the victory in the character of harper and that of herald.

Section of the Chariot Race. Circus Maximus.

(6) Chariot Races. The Corinthians appear to have been inordinately fond of these amusements. They were held every three years. They comprised three leading divisions—musical, gymnastical, and equestrian contests. In the first the tyrant Nero carried off a crown, by destroying his too highly-gifted antagonist. The gymnastic contests were the same as those of which we have already spoken. A few words, however, may here be introduced as to the horse racing, which has not been hitherto described. Generally the same kinds prevailed as at the Olympic and Pythian games. Chariot races seem to have been practiced in the earliest heroic times, since chariots were as early as this used in battle, and the notices which have come down to us refer this kind of sport to the early period now indicated. It stood pre-eminently before other games. The skill and outlay which it required prevented any but persons of distinction—the wealthy, governors, princes, and kings—from engaging in its enjoyments. The number of chariots that might appear on the course at once cannot be accurately determined. Pindar (Pyth. v. 46) praises Arkesilas of Cyrene for having calmly brought off his chariot uninjured, in a contest where no fewer than forty took part. The course had to be gone over twelve times. The urgency of the drivers, the speed and exhaustion of the horses, may easily be imagined. The greatest skill was needed in turning the pillar which marked the extremity of the course, especially when the contending chariots were numerous.

5. New Testament Allusions. The New Testament, in several places, contains references to the celebrated Grecian Games, though it may be allowed that some commentators have imagined illusions where none were designed. As might, from his learning, be expected, it is Paul who chiefly supplies the passages in question. In Gal. ii:2, 'Lest by any means I should run in vain;' v:7, 'Ye did run well, who did hinder you?' Phil. ii:16, 'That I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain nor labored in vain;' Heb. xii:1, 'Run with patience the race set before us;' xii:4, 'Ye have not resisted unto blood, striving against sin' (ἀνταγωνίζομενοι); Phil. iii:14, 'I press toward the mark for the prize;' 2 Tim. ii:5, 'If a man strive he is not crowned except he strive lawfully.' The most signal passage, however, is found in 1 Cor. ix:24-25, 'Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.'

6. Literature. On the subject here treated, see West's Odes of Pindar, 2d edit.; Potter's Antiquities of Greece; Harper's Dict. of Classical Antiq.

GAMMADIM (gām'ma-dīm), (Heb. גַּמְדִּים, gam-maw-deem', brave, valiant warriors, Ezek. xxvii:11). The word occurs but once and is of uncertain meaning, some connecting it with the word cubit, in the sense of cubit-high men; others treat it as a geographical name. The best explanation is that of warriors, in a general sense (Gesenius, Thes. p. 292).

For other views see Spencer, de Leg. Heb. Rit. ii. Cap. 24; Fuller, Miscell. vi:3; Hitzig, Comm. in loco.

GAMUL (gām'mul), (Heb. גַּמּוּל, gam-mool', rewarded), a priest who had charge of the 22d cubit in the temple service (1 Chron. xxiv:17), B. C. after 1000.

GAOLER (jāl'ēr), (Gr. δεσμοφύλαξ, des-mof-oo'-lax, Acts xvi:23), a keeper of a prison. (See JAILER.)

GAP (gāp), (Heb. פְּרֵצִים, peh-rets, breach), an opening in a wall (Ezek. xiii:5); "breaches" (Amos iv:3).

The Jewish false prophets did not stand in the gap, or make up the hedge: they did nothing tending to stop the course of wickedness, which opened a door for the vengeance of God to break in upon their nation, nor did they, with effectual fervent prayer, intercede with God to turn away his providential judgments (Ezek. xiii:5, and xxii:30).

GARDEN (gār'd'n), (Heb. גַּן, gan; גַּנָּו, gan-naw'; גִּנְנָו, gin-naw'; Gr. κήπος, kay'pos). Gan and its derivatives have the same generic meaning in Hebrew as their English equivalent garden.

Several gardens are mentioned in the Scriptures, as the garden of Eden (Gen. ii:8, 9, 10, 15), Ahab's garden of herbs (1 Kings xxi:2), the royal garden near the fortress of Zion (2 Kings xxi:18; xxv:4), the royal garden of the Persian kings at Susa (Esther i:5; vii:7, 8), the garden of Joseph of Arimathea (John xix:41), and the garden of Gethsemane (John xviii:1). It is clear, from Lam. ii:6, that gardens were generally hedged or walled, as indeed Josephus expressly states respecting the gardens near Jerusalem (De Bell. Jud. v. 7). In Neh. ii:8, and John xx:15, gardeners and keepers of gardens by occupation are indicated.

Gardens were planted not only with fragrant and beautiful plants, but with various fruit-bearing and other trees (Gen. ii:9; Jer. xxix:5; Amos ix:14). Thus we find mention of nut-gardens (Cant. vi:11), pomegranate-gardens (Cant. iv:13), olive-gardens (Deut. viii:8; 1 Chron. xxvii:28), vine-gardens (Cant. vii:12). Here, however, we are not to suppose that the gardens were exclusively occupied by these fruits, but that they were severally predominant in the gardens to which they gave name. The distinction, for instance, between a vine-garden and a vineyard would be, that, in the latter, the vine was cultivated solely for use, whereas in the former it was planted for solace and ornament, to cover walls, and to be trained in arbors and on trellises.

Gardens were, when possible, planted near streams, which afforded the means of easy irrigation. This explains such passages as Gen. ii:9, sq. and Is. i:30.

Gardens were dedicated to various uses among the Hebrews, such as we still find prevailing in the East. One most essential difference between them and our own is that they are not attached to or in any way connected with the residence, but are situated in the suburbs. We have known gardens from half a mile to a mile distant from the houses of the persons to whom they belonged. It is manifest that all the gardens mentioned in scripture were outside the several towns. This is, however, to be understood of regular gardens, for shrubs and flowers were often planted in the open courts of the dwelling-houses.

People repair to their suburban gardens to take the air, to walk, and to refresh and solace themselves in various ways. For their use there is mostly in each garden a kind of summer-house or pavilion, fitted up with much neatness, gaily painted, and furnished with seats, where the visitants may sit and enjoy themselves. Here sometimes banquets were and are still given, attended by singing and music (Is. li:3; lxxv:3). The custom of burying the dead in gardens is indicated in Gen. xxiii:19, 20; 1 Sam. xxv:1; Mark xv:46; and still occurs sometimes in the East, but is not very prevalent. We find it also among the Greeks (Heliodorus, Æthiop. i. 2, p. 35), and the Romans (Suetonius, Galba, 20).

It is evident that the gardens of the Hebrews were in a very considerable degree devoted to the culture of medicinal herbs, the preparation of which in various ways was a matter of much solicitude with them (Jer. viii:22). This is still the case in the East, where vegetable simples are as much employed in medicine as they were in this country in the times of Gerarde and Culpepper.

It would seem that the Jews were much in the habit of performing their devotions in gardens (Gen. xxiv:63; Matt. xxvi:36; John xviii:1, 2). This interesting practice, however, was idolatrously abused; for the worship of idols in these shady seclusions was not of unfrequent occurrence, and is often mentioned in scripture (1 Kings xiv:23; 2 Kings xvi:4; xvii:10; Is. i:29; lxxv:3; lxxvi:17; Jer. ii:20; iii:6; Ezek. xx:28).

The Jews in their ceremonial treatises have frequent occasion to mention gardens, chiefly for the purpose of showing what plants or seeds might or might not be planted or sown together under the law against heterogeneous propagations (Lev. xix:9; Deut. xxi:9-11).

GARDENER (gār'd'n-ēr), a class of workmen alluded to in Job xxvii:18, and mentioned in John xx:15. (See GARDEN.)

GARDEN HOUSE (gār'd'n hous), the rendering (2 Kings ix:27) of Heb. בַּיְתַּת הַגַּנָּו, bayth hag-gawn', "Ahaziah fled by the way of the garden house."

"The 'garden house' cannot have formed a portion of the royal gardens, but must have been at some distance from the city of Jezreel, as Ahaziah went by the road thither, and was not wounded till he reached the height of Gur, near Jibleam" (Keil, Com.)

GAREB (gā'reb), (Heb. גַּרְבִּי, gaw-rab', scabby).

1. A hill near Jerusalem (Jer. xxxi:39), the situation of which is not known. Ewald would identify it with Golgotha (Geschichte Christus, p. 485); Gesenius with Bezetha (add. ad Thesaur., p. 80).

2. An Ithrite, descendant of Jethro or Jether, and one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. xliii:38; 1 Chron. xi:40). (B. C. about 1000.)

GARLAND (gär'land), (Gr. στέμμα, stem'mah, wreath). Garlands of flowers brought by the priest of Jupiter, at Lystra, together with oxen, when the people were about to offer worship to Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiv:13).

GARLIC (gär'lík), (Heb. שום, shoom, odor), a well-known vegetable, more agreeable to Oriental than to most European palates. It is mentioned in Num. xi:5.

GARMITE, THE (gär'míte, the), (Heb. גַּרְמִית, with the art. hag-gar-mee'; an appellation of Keilah, a descendant of Gerem, in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv:19).

GARNER (gär'nēr), (Heb. מִנְעוֹת, meh-zeev', to gather), a place for storing grain, a granary (Ps. cxliv:13; Joel i:17; Matt. iii:12).

GARNISH (gär'nish), (Heb. צַדִּיקוּת, tsaw-faw'). (1) To adorn, to decorate with ornamental additions (2 Chron. iii:6; Job xxvi:13; Matt. xii:44; xxiii:29; Luke xi:25; Rev. xxi:19). (2) (Heb. הִרְוֵהוּ, shif-raw', brightness), i. e., with which the heavens are clothed (Job xxvi:13).

GARRISON (gär'ri-s'n), (Heb. צָבָה, nets-eeb', 1 Sam. xiii:23; xiv:1, 4, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii:14; 1 Chron. xi:16).

In 2 Sam. viii:6, 14; 1 Chron. xviii:13; 2 Chron. xvii:2, the Hebrew means "officers" placed over a conquered people, by which "garrison" is implied. There was a garrison at Jerusalem in later times known as the acropolis, or castle, or barracks (Acts xxi:34, 37). This stood on the northwest corner of the temple area, and is memorable as being the refuge of the Apostle Paul (Acts xxiii:10). It had a tower seventy cubits high which overlooked the temple and its courts. This arrangement explains how the Chiliarch could so quickly interfere and rescue Paul from the fury of the mob (Acts xxii:3 ff.). At Damascus there was a garrison (2 Cor. xi:32) employed to prevent Paul's escape.

GASHMU (gäsh'mu), (Heb. גַּשְׁמוֹ, gash-moo'), given as a variation of GESHEM by the lexicons (Neh. vi:6).

GATAM (gä'tam), (Heb. גַּתָּם, gah-tawm', puny), grandson of Esau and fourth son of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi:11; 1 Chron. i:36), and a "duke" of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi:16), B. C. after 1740.

GATE (gät), (Heb. שַׁעַר, shah'ar), the entrance to enclosed grounds, buildings, dwelling houses, towns, etc.

I. Various Names. Thus we find mentioned:

(1) Cities. Gates of cities, as of Jerusalem, its sheep-gate, fish-gate, etc. (Jer. xxxvii:13; Neh. i:3; ii:3); of Sodom (Gen. xix:1); of Gaza (Judg. xvi:3).

(2) Palaces and Temples. Gates of royal palaces (Neh. ii:8). Gates of the Temple. The temple of Ezekiel had two gates, one towards the north, the other towards the east; the latter closed (Ezek. xliv:1, 2), the other must have been open.

(3) Tombs and Prisons. Gates of tombs (Matt. xxvii:60). Gates of prisons. In Acts xii:10, mention is made of the iron-gate of Peter's prison (xvi:27). Prudentius (Hymn. v. 346) speaks of gatekeepers of prisons.

(4) Caverns and Camps. Gates of caverns (1 Kings xix:13). Gates of camps (Exod. xxxii:26, 27; see Heb. xiii:12). The camps of the Romans had generally four gates. The camp of the Trojans is also described as having had gates (Virgil, Æn. ix.724).

2. Material. We do not know of what materials the enclosures and gates of the temporary camps of the Hebrews were formed. In Egyptian monuments such enclosures are indicated by lines of upright shields, with gates apparently of wicker, defended by a strong guard. As the gates of towns served the ancients as places of security (see FORTIFICATIONS, etc.), durable material was required for them, and accordingly we find mentioned:

(1) Iron and Brass. Gates of iron and brass (Ps. cvii:16; Is. xlv:2; Acts xii:10). It is probable that gates thus described were, in fact, only sheeted with plates of copper or iron (Faber, Archæol. p. 297); and it is probably in this sense we are to interpret the hundred brazen gates ascribed to the ancient Babylon. Thevenot (Voyage, p. 283) describes the six gates of Jerusalem as covered with iron: which is probably still the case with the four gates now open. Other iron-covered gates are mentioned by travelers, such as some of the town gates of Algiers (Pitt's Letter, viii. p. 10), and of the towers of the so-called iron bridge at Antioch (Pococke, vol. ii. pt. 1. p. 172). The principal gates of the great mosque at Damascus are covered with brass (Maundrell, p. 126). Gates of iron are also mentioned by Hesiod (Theog. 732), by Virgil (Æn. i. 482; vii:609), and by Ovid (Metam. vii:126).

(2) Stones and Pearls. Gates of stone, and of pearls, are mentioned in Is. liv:12, and Rev. xxi:12, which, it has justly been supposed, refer to such doors, cut out of a single slab, as are occasionally discovered in ancient countries. At Essouan (Syene), in Upper Egypt, there is a granite gateway bearing the name of Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great (Wilkinson, iii. 403). The doors leading to the several chambers of one so-called 'Tombs of the Kings' near Jerusalem, were each formed of a single stone seven inches thick, sculptured so as to resemble four panels: the styles, muntins, and other parts were cut with great art, and exactly resembled those of a door made by a carpenter at the present day—the whole being completely smooth and polished, and most accurate in their proportions. The doors turned on pivots, of the same stone of which the rest of them were composed, which were inserted in corresponding sockets above and below, the lower tenon being of course short. (See Giant Cities of Bashan.)

(3) Wood. Gates of wood. Of this kind were probably the gates of Gaza (Judg. xvi:3). They had generally two valves, which, according to Faber's description (Archæol. p. 300), had sometimes smaller doors, or wickets, to afford a passage when the principal gate was closed—a fact which he applies to the illustration of Matt. vii:13.

3. General Features and Purposes.

(1) Protection. Gates were generally protected by some works against the surprises of enemies (Jer. xxxix:4). Sometimes two gates were constructed one behind another, an outer and inner one; or there were turrets on both sides (2 Sam. xviii:24, 33; see Faber's Archæol. p. 301). The gates of the ancients were generally secured with strong heavy bolts and locks of brass or iron (Deut. iii:5; 1 Sam. xxiii:7; 1 Kings iv:13; 2 Chron. viii:5; Jer. xlix:31; Ps. cxlvii:13). This was probably done with a view to the safety of the town, and to prevent hostile inroads (Harmer's Observations, vol. i. p. 188). The keys of gates, as well as of doors, were generally of wood; and Thevenot observes that gates might be opened even with the finger put into the keyhole—from which Harmer elucidates the passage in Cant. v:4.

The gates of towns were kept open or shut according to circumstances: in time of war they were closed against the inroads of the enemy (Josh. ii:5), but they were opened when the enemy had been conquered. On festive occasions they were also thrown wide open; to which Ps. xxiv:7 alludes. This opening of the gates, as well as closing them, was done by means of keys. That near the gates towers were often constructed, serving for defense against attacks of the enemy, may be inferred from Deut. iii:5; 2 Sam. xviii:24; Judg. ix:35, comp. with verse 52. Enemies, therefore, in besieging towns were most anxious to obtain possession of the gates as quickly as possible (Deut. xxviii:52; Judg. ix:40; 2 Sam. x:8; 1 Kings xvii:10; Job v:4; Is. xxii:7; xxviii:6); and generally the town was conquered when its gates were occupied by the invading troops (Deut. xxviii:57; Judg. v:8). In or near the gates, therefore, they placed watchmen, and a sufficiently strong guard, to keep an eye on the movements of the enemy, and to defend the works in case of need (Judg. xviii:16; 2 Kings vii:3; Neh. xiii:22).

(2) Place of Judgment. Gates are often mentioned in Scripture as places at which were held courts of justice, to administer the law and determine points in dispute: hence judges in the gate are spoken of (Gen. xix:1; xxiii:10, 18; xxxiv:60; Deut. xvi:18; xvii:8; xxi:19; xxv:6, 7; Josh. xx:4; Ruth iv:1; 1 Sam. iv:18; 2 Sam. xviii:24; xix:8; 1 Kings xxii:10; Job. xxix:7; Prov. xxii:22; xxiv:7; Lam. v:14; Amos v:12; Zech. viii:16). The reason of this custom is apparent; for the gates being places of great concourse and resort, the courts held at them were of easy access to all the people; witnesses and auditors to all transactions were easily secured (a matter of much importance in the absence or scanty use of written documents); and confidence in the integrity of the magistrate was ensured by the publicity of the proceedings. There was within the gate a particular place, where the judges sat on chairs, and this custom must be understood as referred to when we read that courts were held under the gates, as may be proved from 1 Kings xxii:10; 2 Chron. xviii:9. Apart from the holding of courts of justice, the gate served for reading the law, and for proclaiming ordinances, etc. (2 Chron. xxxii:6; Neh. viii:1, 3). We see from Prov. xxxi:23; Lam. v:14, that the inferior magistrates held a court in the gates, as well as the superior judges (Jer. xxxvi:10); and even kings, at least occasionally, did the same (1 Kings xxii:10; comp. with Ps. xxvii:5). The gates at Jerusalem served the same purpose; but for the great number of its inhabitants, many places of justice were required. Thus we find that Nehemiah (iii:31) calls a particular gate of this city the counsel-gate, or justice-gate, the gate Miphkad, which seems to have had a preference, though not exclusive since courts must have been held in the other gates also.

(3) Place of Proclamations. In Palestine gates were, moreover, the places where, sometimes at least, the priests delivered their sacred addresses and discourses to the people; and we find that the prophets often proclaimed their warnings and prophecies in the gates (Prov. i:21; viii:3; Is. xxix:21; Jer. xvii:19, 20; xxvi:10; xxxvi:10). On an uproar having broken out at Jerusalem, the heads of the people met under the New-gate (Jer. xxix:26), where they were sure to find insurgents. The town-gates were to the ancient Orientals what the coffee-houses, exchanges, markets, and courts of law, are in our large towns: and such is still the case in a great degree, although the introduction of coffee-houses has in this, and other respects, caused some alteration of Eastern manners.

Figurative. (1) Gates are put figuratively for public places of towns and palaces. (2) The gates of a town are also put instead of the town itself (Gen. xxii:17; xxiv:60; Deut. xii:12; Ps. lxxxvii:2). (3) Gates of brass, and bars of iron, import strong help and full protection; or impediments apparently insurmountable (Ps. cxlvii:13, and cvii:16). (4) The gates of death and of hell occur in Job. xxxviii:17; Ps. ix:14; Micah. ii:13. Doors and gates of hell are chiefly introduced (Prov. v:5; Is. xxxviii:10; Matt. xvi:19); and the Jews go so far in their writings as to ascribe real gates to hell (Wagenseil, Sota, p. 220). Virgil (Æn. vi. 126) also speaks of infernal gates. The origin of this metaphorical expression is not difficult to explain; for it was very common to use the word gates as an image of large empires (Ps. xxiv:7; and in pagan authors the abode of departed souls is represented as the residence of Pluto (see Virgil, Æn. vi. 417, sq.). In the passage, then, Matt. xvi:19, by 'gates of hell' must be understood all aggressions by the infernal empire upon the Christian church. (5) The gates of the river may be the bridges on it (Nah. ii:6).

GATH (gâth), (Heb. גַּת, gath, a wine fat).

It was one of the five princely cities of the Philistines, of which mention is made in Josh. xiii:3. It was one of the cities upon which the ark is said to have brought calamity (1 Sam. v:8, 9), and which offered in connection therewith a trespass-offering, each one a golden emerod (1 Sam. vi:17). Goliath, of the family of giants which Joshua spared (Josh. xi:22), of which other members may be found mentioned in Scripture (1 Chron. xx:5-8; 2 Sam. xxi:19-22), has rendered Gath a word familiar from our childhood; but it is not certain whether Goliath was a native or merely a resident of Gath (1 Sam. xvii:4). To Achish, king of Gath, David fled for fear of Saul (1 Sam. xxi:10; xxvii:2-7; Ps. lvi). At his own entreaty David received from Achish the city of Ziklag. David dwelt in the country of the Philistines 'a full year and four months.' It was conquered by David, and fortified both by him and by Rehoboam (2 Sam. viii:1; Chron. xviii:1; 2 Chron. xi:8). From 2 Sam. xv:18, it appears that David had a band (600 men) of Gittites in his service at the time of the rebellion of Absalom. Their devotedness to him under Ittai their leader forms a beautiful episode in the history of David's varied fortune (2 Sam. xv:19, sq.). Shimei's visit to Gath and its fatal consequences to himself may be read in 1 Kings ii:39-46. In the reign of Solomon mention is made of a king of Gath (1 Kings iv:24), who was doubtless a tributary prince, but powerful enough to cause apprehension to Solomon, as appears from the punishment he inflicted on Shimei. Under Jehoash, Hazael, king of Syria, took Gath (2 Kings xii:17); from his successor, Benhadad, the place was recovered (2 Kings xiii:24). It must, however, have soon revolted; for Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi:6), finding it necessary to war against the Philistines, 'broke down the wall of Gath.' Probably the conquest was not of long duration. This constant withstanding of the power of Jerusalem shows that Gath was a place of great resources and high eminence—a conclusion which is confirmed by the language employed by the prophets (Amos vi:2; Micah i:10). 'Gath,' says Jerome (on Micah i), 'is one of the five Philistine cities lying near the confines of Judah, on the road from Eleutheropolis to Gaza; now it is a very large village.' On Jer. xxv the same authority declares that Gath was not far from Azotus. (Reland, Paläst. p. 785, sq.; Porter, Handbook, p. 252; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 360.)

GATH-HEPHER (gäth-hē'pher), (Heb. with the article גַּת־חֶפְרַיִם, gath-hah-khay'fer, wine press of the well).

There was a Gath-hepher belonging to the children of Zebulun (Josh. xix:10, sq.), the birth-place of the prophet Jonah (2 Kings xiv:25), lying not far from Sepphoris on the road to Tiberias. This location corresponds with the village of el-Meshhed or Meshhad, three miles north-

47). It is a very ancient place, as we find it mentioned in Gen. x:19, where it is given as one of the border-cities of the Canaanites. In Dent. ii:23, it is found as the place unto which the Avims dwelt. Joshua smote the Canaanites as far as Gaza (Josh. x:41), but spared the Anakims (giants) that dwelt there (Josh. xi:21, 22). In the division of the land, Gaza fell to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv:47), and was taken by him with the coast thereof (Judg. i:18), but its inhabitants were not exterminated (Judg. iii:3) Gaza was one of the five Philistine cities which gave each a golden emerald as a trespass-offering to the Lord (1 Sam. vi:17). Solomon's kingdom extended as far as Gaza (1 Kings iv:24). But the place appears always as a Philistine city in scripture (Judg. iii:3; xvi:1; 1 Sam. vi:17; 2 Kings xviii:8). Hezekiah smote the Philistines as far as Gaza (2 Kings xviii:8). Gaza fell into the hands of east of Nazareth. Here one of Jonah's tombs exists, its chief rival being at the site of ancient Nineveh. (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 122.)

GATH-RIMMON (gäth'rîm'mon), (Heb. גַּת־רִמּוֹן, gath-rim-mone', wine press of Rimmon).

1. This place lay in the territory of Dan, and was given to the Levites (Josh. xxi:24; 1 Chron. vi:69). It was apparently not far from Joppa (Josh. xix:45).

2. A town of the half tribe of Manasseh, west of the Jordan (Josh. xxi:25). Raumer (Palästina) supposes it to be another Levite city; but Winer (Handwörterbuch), with more likelihood, ascribes its origin to a mistake of the transcriber, who took the word from the preceding verse.

GAZA (gä'zà), (Heb. גַּזָּא, az-zaw, stronghold).

Gaza lies on the road leading from Akabah to Hebron, which passes along nearly the whole length of the great Wady-el-Arabah. It is on the seacoast, in lat. 31d. 20m. long. 34d. 29m. (Robinson), in the country of the Philistines (Josh. xv:

the Egyptians, probably Pharaoh-Necho (Jer. xlvii:1; comp. Herod. ii:159). The prophets speak in severe terms against it (Jer. xlvii:5; Amos i:6, 7; Zeph ii:4; Zech. ix:5). After the destruction of Tyre it sustained a siege of two months against Alexander the Great (Joseph. Antiq. xi:8, 4). Jonathan Maccabæus (1 Macc. xi:61) destroyed its suburbs; Simon Maccabæus (1 Macc. xiii:43) took the city itself, though not without extraordinary efforts. Alexander Jannæus spent a year in besieging it and punishing its inhabitants (Antiq. xiii:13, 3). The place was rebuilt by Gabinius (Antiq. xiv:5, 3). It was among the cities given by Augustus to Herod (Antiq. xv:7, 3), after whose death it was united to the province of Syria (Antiq. xvii:11, 4).

Gaza is celebrated for the exploit recorded of Samson (Judg. xvi:1-3), who 'took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them on his shoulders, and carried them up to the top of a hill that is before Hebron.' The Philistines afterwards took Samson, and put out his eyes, and brought him to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass, and he did grind in the prison-house: he, however, pulled down the temple of Dagon, god of the Philistines, and slew, together with himself, 'all the lords of the Philistines,' besides men and women (Judg. xvi:21-30). It was near Gaza—on the road from Jerusalem to that place—that Philip baptized the eunuch 'of great authority under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians' (Acts viii:26, sq.).

Gaza lay some distance from the sea (Arrian, ii:26), though it had a port on the sea, called 'Gaza on the sea,' called also Majuma (ὁ Μαϊόμας), which Constantine called Constantia, from the name of his son, giving it, at the same time, municipal rights. Julian took away this name and ordered it to be called the port of Gaza. Subsequent emperors restored the name and the privileges of the place. It was afterwards called the sea-coast of Gaza. (Literature, Porter, Handbk. of Syria and Palest. i. 262, ff.; Gage's Transl. of Ritter, Geog. of Palest.; Van de Velde, Syria and Palest. ii. 179-189; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 331 ff.)

GAZATHITES (gā'za'h-itez), (Heb. גַּזְאִיתִים, haw-az-zaw-thee'), a designation (Josh. xiii:3) of the inhabitants of the city of Gaza; rendered Gazites (Judg. xvi:2).

GAZELLE (gā-zél'). See ANTELOPE.

GAZER (gā'zer), (Heb. גַּזֵּר, gaw'zer, precipice). The same as GEZER. The emphatic Hebrew accent has been retained (2 Sam. v:25; 1 Chron. xiv:16) in the A. V., which accounts for difference of form.

GAZEZ (gā'zez), (Heb. גַּזֵּז, gaw-zaze', shearer), son of Caleb and his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. ii:46). In the same passage he is mentioned as the son of Haran and the Ephah. The second is in all probability only a repetition of the first (B. C. about 1856).

GAZITES (gā'zites), (Heb. גַּזִּיתִים, haw-az-zaw-theem', Judg. xvi:2), inhabitants of Gaza. Elsewhere the form is GAZATHITES (which see).

GAZZAM (gāz'zam), (Heb. גַּזְזָם, gaz-zawm', devouring). Founder of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:48), B. C. 536.

GEBA (gē'bā), (Heb. גֵּבָא, gheh'bah, in pause ga-ba, a hill).

It is often stated that Geba and Gibeah were names of the same place. The two names are indeed only masculine and feminine forms of the same word, signifying 'hill'; but that they were two different places is evident from Josh. xviii:24; comp. 28; 1 Sam. xiii:2; comp. 3; Is. x:29. Geba belonged to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:24), and was assigned to the priests (Josh. xxi:17; comp. chap. xvi:24). The Philistines were smitten from Geba unto Gazer by David (2 Sam. v:25); Asa rebuilt Geba and Mizpah with the stones of Ramah (1 Kings xv:22; 2 Chron. xvi:6). 'From Geba (in the north) to Beersheba' (in the south) (2 Kings xxiii:8), expressed the whole extent of the separate kingdom of Judah, just as 'from Dan to Beersheba' expressed the whole length of Palestine. It would seem, from the manner in which Geba (Gaba) and Ramah are coupled in Neh. vii:30, that they were very near each other, but the site of Geba is now unknown, although a village still bearing the old name, marks the site, six miles north-northeast of Jerusalem and two miles southwest of Michmash. The form Gaba (Josh. xviii:24 and elsewhere) is due to the Hebrew emphasis. (See GABA.)

GEBAL (gē'bal), (Heb. גֵּבַל, gheb-awl', a line).

1. A name occurring in connection with Ammon and Amelek, Moab and Edom. Gebal signifies a mountain, and apparently belongs not to the most ancient times, as it does not occur when the Israelites were actually in this quarter, but is first found in Ps. lxxxiii:7, which was probably written in the time of Jehoshaphat to encourage him and the people to resist the invasion of the Moabites, Ammonites, and others. This would connect the Gebal of Ezekiel xxvii:9, with (2).

2. A city of Phœnicia, between Sidon and Orthosia, on the Mediterranean, in the country north of the Dead Sea and on the west of El Ghor, which is called Gebalene by Josephus and Jerome (Ps. lxxxiii:7). Gebal was called Byblos by the Greeks, and so the Septuagint has it. It was an important place, and celebrated for the birth and worship of Adonis, the Syrian Thammuz. Pliny and other Roman authors call it Gabale (Hist. Nat. v. 20). The town is still standing under the name of Jebail. It is seated on a rising ground near the sea, at the foot of Lebanon, which here approaches close to the coast. It became a Christian See in the patriarchate of Antioch (Reland, Palæst. i. p. 214 ff.). (See Maundrell, Early Travels in Palest., by Wright, p. 494.)

GEBER (gē'ber), (Heb. גֵּבֵר, gheh'ber, warrior).

1. The son of Uri, governor of Gilead, in the reign of Solomon (1 Kings iv:19), B. C. 1013.

2. Son of Geber, who had charge of the Havoth-Jair, and the district of Argob (1 Kings iv:13). These are taken by some to be the same persons.

GEBIM (gē'bim), (Heb. גַּבִּים, gay-beem'), springs, cisterns; in Is. xxxiii:4, "locusts;" in Jer. xiv:3, "pits."

A village north of Jerusalem, apparently between Anathoth, the modern Anata, and Nob. It is one of the places from which the inhabitants fled on the approach of Sennacherib (Is. x:31). Exact site unknown.

GECKO (gēk'ō), the rendering of the Hebrew גֵּבְעָנִים, an-aw-kaw', a ceremonially unclean animal which the Hebrews classed with creeping things (Lev. xi:30, R. V.).

The gecko is a wall lizard. It has white spots on its back; and it emits a plaintive wail, whence the Hebrew name. The common gecko or fan-foot (Ptyodactylus gecko) is very common in Palestine. It frequents houses, running over the walls and ceiling. It is able to do this by reason of the peculiar construction of its toes, which are provided with plates under which a vacuum is created when the animal walks, thus causing it to adhere. (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

GEDALIAH (gēd'a-lī'ah), (Heb. גְּדַלְיָהוּ, ghed-alyaw', made great by Jehovah).

1. The son of Ahikam, and appointed by Nebuchadnezzar, governor of Judea, after the destruction of Jerusalem. He was probably of the number of those who quitted the city at the instance of the prophet, justly despairing of the successful defense of a place which God had abandoned. Gedaliah had inherited his father's respect for Jeremiah (Jer. xl:5, sq.), and was moreover enjoined by Nebuzaradan to look to his safety and welfare. He established the seat of his melancholy government at Mizpah in the tribe of Benjamin: and there the Jews, who had fled at the advance of the Chaldean armies, or when the troops of Zedekiah were dispersed in the plains of Jericho, quitting their retreats, began to gather around him. Gedaliah wisely counseled them to submission and quietness; and he promised on that condition to ensure them the undisturbed enjoyment of their possessions, and of the produce of the ground. In this hope the labors of the field were resumed, and the extraordinary returns of that season seemed as if specially given to repair the recent injuries of war. But this calm was of short duration. Among those who returned was a member of the royal family, named Ishmael, who had taken refuge with Baalis, king of the Ammonites. He appears to have been irritated at seeing one who was not of the house of David seated upon even the shadow of David's throne; and some of the friends of Gedaliah believed him to be in a plot with Baalis to take away his life. But the noble-minded governor refused to entertain such a suspicion, and rejected with horror the proposal of an overzealous friend, who offered to assassinate Ishmael. The suspicion which he thus generously repelled was, however, correct. He was murdered in the midst of a repast by this very Ishmael, whom he had received as a friend. This event happened about two months after the destruction of Jerusalem, and by it the present ruin of Judea seemed to be consummated (B. C. 588) (2 Kings xxv:22-26; Jer. xxxix:14; xl:5; xli:18).

2. Son of Amariah, and grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i:1). (B. C. before 635.)

3. One of the six sons of Jeduthun, the Levite, who played a harp in the temple service (1 Chron. xxv:3, 9). (B. C. 1013).

4. A priest of the time of Ezra (Ezra x:18). (B. C. 458.)

5. One of those who conspired to imprison Jeremiah (Jer. xxxviii:1). (B. C. 589.)

GEDEON (gĕd'e-on), (Gr. Γεδεών, ghed-eh-own'). This is the Greek form of GIDEON (Heb. xi:32). (See GIDEON.)

GEDER (gĕ'der), (Heb. גֶּדֶר, ghed-der).

This word signifies a wall, enclosure, or fortified place. Geder itself was the name of an ancient town of the Canaanites, in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xii:13), whose king was one of the thirty-one conquered by Joshua, west of the Jordan. It may be the same as Gedor (1 Chron. iv:39).

GEDERAH (ge-dĕ'rah or gĕd'e-rah), (Heb. גֶּדֶרָה, ghed-ay-raw', sheep-cote), a city of Judah with a Phœnician title. It is the feminine form of Geder (Josh. xii:13) and its plural is Gederoth (xv:41).

GEDERATHITE, THE (gĕd'e-rath-ite, thĕ), (Heb. גֶּדֶרָתִי, hag-ghed-ay-raw-thee'), the designation of Josabad (1 Chron. xii:4). He could not have been a native of the Gederah in the lowlands of Judah, for he was of Saul's own tribe (1 Chron. xii:2).

GEDERITE, THE (gĕ'de-rite or gĕd'e-rĭte), (Heb. גֶּדֶרִית, hag-ghed-ay-ree'). Baal-hanan, who had charge of the olive and sycamore groves of the low country of Judah for David, was thus called (1 Chron. xxvii:28). He perhaps belonged to Gederah mentioned (Josh. xv:36).

GEDEROTH (gĕ-dĕ'roth or gĕd'e-roth), (Heb. גֶּדֶרוֹת, ghed-ay-roth', fortresses), a city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv:41), and one of those which the Philistines took from King Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii:18). Its site, or that of Gederah, is commonly fixed at Katrah, called in 1 Macc. xv:39 Kidron, in the maritime plain about four miles southwest by south of Ekron.

GEDEROTHAIM (gĕd'e-ro-thā'im), (Heb. גֶּדֶרוֹתַיִם, ghed-ay-ro-thah'yim, double wall), a town in the low country of Judah named next to Gederah (Josh. xv:36).

GEDOR (gĕ'dōr), (Heb. גְּדוֹר, ghed-ore', a wall).

1. An ancient city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:58), a few miles north of Hebron. Robinson identifies it with Jedūr (iii:283).

2. Apparently a town of Benjamin, the native place of Joelah and Zebadiah, who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:7).

3. Son of Jehiel and an ancestor of Saul (1 Chron. viii:31; ix:37). (B. C. about 536.)

4. A name occurring twice in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv:4, 18).

5. A city apparently in the south of the mountains of Judah, surrounded by fat pastures, and formerly occupied by the Amalekites (1 Chron. iv:39).

GEHAZI (ge-hā'zī), (Heb. גֵּחָזִי, gay-khah-zee', valley of vision).

The servant of Elisha, whose entire confidence he enjoyed. His history is involved in that of his master (see ELISHA). He personally appears in reminding his master of the best mode of rewarding the kindness of the Shunamite (2 Kings iv:14). He was present at the interview in which the Shunamite made known to the prophet that her son was dead, and was sent forward to lay Elisha's staff on the child's face, which he did without effect (2 Kings iv:31). (B. C. about 887). The most remarkable incident in his career is that which caused his ruin. When Elisha, with a noble disinterestedness, declined the rich gifts pressed upon him by the illustrious leper whom he had healed, Gehazi felt distressed that so favorable an opportunity of profiting by the gratitude of Naaman had been so wilfully thrown away. He therefore ran after the retiring chariots, and requested, in his master's name, a portion of the gifts which had before been refused, on the ground that visitors had just arrived for whom he was unable to provide. He asked a talent of silver and two dresses; and the grateful Syrian made him take two talents instead of one. Having deposited this spoil in a place of safety, he again appeared before Elisha, whose honor he had so seriously compromised. His master asked him where he had been? and on his answering, 'Thy servant went no whither,' the prophet put on the severities of a judge, and having denounced his crime, passed upon him the terrible doom, that the leprosy of which Naaman had been cured, should cleave to him and his forever. 'And he went forth from his presence a leper as white as snow' (2 Kings v:20-27). (B. C. 894.)

We afterwards find Gehazi recounting to king Joram the great deeds of Elisha, and, in the providence of God, it so happened that when he was relating the restoration to life of the Shunamite's son, the very woman with her son appeared before the king to claim her house and lands, which had been usurped while she had been absent abroad during the recent famine. Struck by the coincidence, the king immediately granted her application (2 Kings viii:1-6).

GEHENNA (gĕ-hĕn'nà), (Gr. Γέεννα, ghēh'en-nah, for the Heb. חִינּוֹם, hin-nome', the Valley of Hinnom). See HINNOM.

GELIOTH (gél'i-loth), (Heb. גְּלִיּוֹת, ghel-eel-owth), circles), one of the marks of the south boundary of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii:17).

In the description of the north boundary of Judah at this point Gilgal is substituted for Geli-oth (Josh. xv:7). As Geli-oth does not appear again, it is likely that Gilgal is the right reading. The word, however, is used in a topographical sense (Josh. xiii:2; xxii:10, 11; Joel iii:4) for "borders," "coast," which may be the sense here (Stanley S. and P., 1st ed. Appendix, sec. 13).

GEMALLI (ge-mäl'li), (Heb. גַּמְלִי, ghem-al-lee, camel driver), father of Ammiel, the "ruler" of Dan, who was among the spies chosen to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:12), B. C. before 1209.

GEMARA (gê-mä'rä). See TALMUD.

GEMARIAH (gêm'a-rî'ah), (Heb. גַּמְרִיָּהוּ, ghem-ar-yaw'), God-perfected).

1. The son of Shaphan, and a scribe of the temple in the time of Jehoiakim. Baruch read aloud the prophecies of Jeremiah to the people at the official chamber of Gemariah, which was attached to the new gate of the temple built by King Jotham (Jer. xxxvi:10; comp. 2 Kings xv:35). Gemariah's son Michaiah having reported this to his father, Baruch was invited to repeat the reading at the scribes' chamber in the palace, before Gemariah and other scribes and councillors, who gave an account of the matter to the king (Jer. xxxvi: 10-26). (B. C. 607.)

2. The son of Hilkiah, who, with Elasa, son of Shaphan, was sent to Babylon by king Zedekiah with his tribute-money for Nebuehadnezzar. He also took charge of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives at Babylon, warning them against the false prophets who deluded them by promises of a speedy return to their own land (Jer. xxix:3, 4). (B. C. 599.)

GENEALOGY (jén'ê-äl'ô-jÿ), (from the Greek γενεαλογία, tracing a family, compounded of γένος, race, and λόγος, discourse), signifies a list of ancestors set down both in their direct and collateral order.

(1) Care of Records. We read of no nation which was more careful to frame and preserve its genealogical tables than Israel. Their sacred writings contain genealogies which extend through a period of more than 3,500 years, from the creation of Adam to the captivity of Judah. Indeed, we find from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah that the same care in this matter was observed after the captivity; for in Ezra ii:62 it is expressly stated that some who had come up from Babylon had sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but were not found; therefore were they, as polluted, removed from the priesthood. The division of the whole Hebrew nation into tribes, and the allotment to each tribe of a specified portion of the land of Canaan as an inalienable possession, rendered it indispensable that they should keep genealogical tables. God had, however, a still higher object than that of giving stability to property in Israel, in leading successive generations of His people thus to keep an accurate list of their ancestry. That they should do this was especially required from the moment that the voice of prophecy declared that the promised Messiah should be of the seed of Abraham, of the posterity of Isaac, of the sons of Jacob, of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David.

The Rabbins affirm that after the Captivity the Jews were most careful in keeping their pedigrees (Babyl. Gemar. Gloss. fol. xiv:2). Josephus (De Vita sua, p. 998, D) states that he traced his own descent from the tribe of Levi by public registers. And he informs us that, however dispersed and depressed his nation were, they never neglected to have exact genealogical tables prepared from the authentic documents which were kept at Jerusalem; and that in all their sufferings they were particularly careful to preserve those tables, and to have them renewed from time to time. Since, however, the period of their destruction as a nation by the Romans, all their tables of descent seem to be lost, and now they are utterly unable to trace the pedigree of any one Israelite who might lay claim to be their promised, and still expected, Messiah. Hence Christians assert, with a force that no reasonable and candid Jew can resist, that Shiloh must have come.

We find traces of the existence of the public tables of descent, to which Josephus refers, in the New Testament: the taxation spoken of by St. Luke ii:2 3, would clearly indicate this; for how could each one be able to go to his own city, unless he knew the specific tribe to which he belonged? Hence it was, we think, that St. Paul was able with confidence to appeal to the Hebrews concerning the lineage of Christ; 'for it is evident,' says he, 'that our Lord sprung out of Judah' (Heb. vii:14; 2 Tim. ii:8). To evince this beyond reasonable doubt, it pleased God to give us by his inspired servants, St. Matthew and St. Luke, the following genealogies:

(2) Genealogy of Christ.

We do not find that there was any objection made to these genealogies, either by Jew or Gentile, during the first century. Had any difficulty on this head existed, we may reasonably suppose that the Jews, of all others, would have been but too ready to detect and expose it. We may therefore fairly conclude that, whatever difficulty meets us now in harmonizing our Lord's pedigree as given by the two Evangelists, it could have had no place in the first age of the Christian church.

(3) Objections. In subsequent ages, however, objections were and still are made to the genealogies of Matthew and Luke. The chief ground of objection is the alleged inconsistency of the Evangelists with each other. The first solution of these apparent discrepancies is that of Africanus, which, he informs us (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. i. 7), he received from the relatives of our Lord, who, because of their consanguinity to him, were called des-pos'vo-noi, belonging to the Master. It is to the effect that Matthan, the third in the list from Joseph, in Matthew's genealogy, and Melchi, the third in Luke's list, married successively the same woman, by whom the former begat Jacob, and the latter Heli. Heli dying without issue, his maternal brother took his widow to wife, by whom he had Joseph, who, according to law (Deut. xxv: 6), was registered by Luke as the son of Heli, though naturally the son of Jacob as Matthew records him. This is the explanation which was generally admitted by Eusebius, Nazianzen, the writer of Ad orthodoxos, and others, for ages.

Grotius, however, availing himself of the tradition that Heli and Jacob were both sons of the same mother, but of different fathers (Matthan and Melchi), supposes that Luke traces the natural pedigree of Christ, and Matthew the legal. This he argues on two grounds. First, that Salathiel could not have been the natural son of Jechonias, who was childless—according to the declaration of God by Jeremiah (xxii:30)—and was, therefore, as Luke states, the son, properly so called, of Neri, of Nathan's line; and, secondly, that the Levirate law imposed no necessity on Jacob to marry Heli's widow they being only uterine brothers. But both the reasons assigned by Grotius for differing from the solution of Africanus would seem to be founded on a petitio principii. It does not appear an ascertained fact that Salathiel was not the natural son of Jechonias, nor yet that the law which obliged a man to marry the widow of his deceased brother might be departed from when they were only maternal brethren; for even in cases of distant relationship the law seemed obligatory, as we see in the case of Boaz marrying Ruth, the widow of his distant kinsman.

Dr. Barrett objects to the above theory as given by Africanus and altered by Grotius, on the ground principally, that it refers entirely to the descent of Joseph from David without attempting to prove that the son of Mary was the son of David. Dr. Barrett then states his own hypothesis, viz., that Matthew relates the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. He supposes a sufficient reason, that after Matthew had given his genealogical table another should be added by St. Luke, fully to prove that Christ, according to the flesh, derived his descent from David, not only by his supposed father Joseph, but also by his real mother Mary.

(4) Reckoned Only by Males. In constructing their genealogical tables, it is well known that the Jews reckoned wholly by males, rejecting, where the blood of the grandfather passed to the grandson through a daughter, the name of the daughter herself, and counting that daughter's husband for the son of the maternal grandfather (Num. xxvi:33; xxvii:4-7). On this principle Joseph, begotten by Jacob, marries Mary, the daughter of Heli; and in the genealogical register of his wife's family, is counted for Heli's son. Salathiel, begotten by Jechoniah, marries the daughter of Neri, and, in like manner, is accounted his son: in Zorobabel, the offspring of Salathiel and Neri's daughter, the lines of Solomon and Nathan coalesce; Joseph and Mary are of the same tribe and family; they are both descendants of David in the line of Solomon; they have in them both the blood of Nathan, David's son. Joseph deduces his descent from Abiud (Matt. i:13), Mary from Rhesa (Luke iii:27) sons of Zorobabel. The genealogies of Matthew and Luke are parts of one perfect whole, and each of them is essential to the explanation of the other. By Matthew's table we prove the descent of Mary, as well as Joseph, from Solomon; by Luke's we see the descent of Joseph, as well as Mary, from Nathan. (See CHRONOLOGY.)

GENERALLY (jĕn'ĕr-al-lŷ), (Heb. כֹּל, kole).

The adverb 'generally' means (1) universally in every place, Jer. xlviii:38 'There shall be lamentation generally upon all the housetops of Moab' (כֹּלֵי, lit. 'all of it' (see Driver on 2 Sam. ii:9; R. V. 'everywhere'). Cf. Art. XVII. (XXXXV. Articles). 'Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in suchwise, as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture' (ut nobis in sacris literis generaliter proposita sunt); Hooker, Eocl. Polity, v. lv. 1, 'God in Christ is generally the medicine, which doth cure the world;' Prayer Book, Catechism, 'How many Sacraments hath Christ ordained in his Church? Two only, as generally necessary to salvation;' and Chaucer Troilus and Criseyde, i:86—

'The noyse up roos, when it was first aspyed,
Through al the toun, and generally was spoken,
That Calkas traytor fled was, and allyed
With hem of Grece.'

GENERATION (jĕn'ĕr-ā'shūn), (Heb. יְהִיָּה, to-led-aw'; Gr. γενεα, ghen'es-is, birth, nativity; Gr. γέννημα, ghen'nay-mah, offspring; Heb. יָרֵךְ, dore; Gr. γενεά, ghen-eh-ah', period).

1. Considerable obscurity attends the use of this word in the English Version, which arises from the translators having merged the various meanings of the same original word, and even of several different words, in one common term, 'generation, instead of bringing out the abstract and concrete ideas of the word. The following instances seem to require the original words to be understood in some or other of their derivative senses—(Gen. ii:4), 'These are the generations,' wledaw (Vulg. generationes), rather 'origin,' 'history,' etc. The same Greek words (Matt. i:1), are rendered 'genealogy,' etc., by recent translators: Campbell has 'lineage' (Gen. v:1), 'The book of the generations' is properly a family register, a history of Adam.

The same words (Gen. xxxvii:2), mean a history of Jacob and his descendants: so also (Gen. vi:9; x:1), and elsewhere. (Gen. vii:1), 'In this generation' is evidently 'in this age.' (Gen. xv:6), 'In the fourth generation' is an instance of the word in its concrete sense. (Ps. xlix:19), 'The generation of his fathers' Gesenius renders 'the dwelling of his fathers,' i. e., the grave, and adduces (Is. xxxviii:12; Ps. lxxiii:15), 'The generation of thy children' is 'class,' 'order,' 'description;' as in Prov. xxx:11, 12, 13, 14. Is. liii:8, 'Who shall declare his generation?' is rendered, "Who can describe his length of life?" (Seiler), or "who of his contemporaries reflected?" (Gesenius and Rosenmüller).

In the New Testament, Matt. i:17, reveal, generations is a series of persons, that is a succession from the same stock. The passage in Matt. iii:7, is well rendered by Doddridge and others 'brood of vipers.' Matt. xxiv:34, ἡ γενεά αὐτῶν, means the generation or persons then living contemporary with Christ (see Macknight's Harmony for an illustration of this sense.) (Luke xvi:8), 'in their generations,' etc., wiser in regard to their dealings with the men of their generation. Rosenmüller gives, inter se. The passage found in 1 Pet. ii:9, is a 'chosen people,' quoted from the Sept. Version of Is. xliiii:20. The ancient Greeks, and, if we may credit Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, the Egyptians also, assigned a certain period to a generation. The Greeks reckoned three generations for every hundred years. This is nearly the present computation. The ancient Hebrews also reckoned by the generation, and assigned different spaces of time to it at different periods of their history. In the time of Abraham it was one hundred years (comp. Gen. xv:16, 'in the fourth generation they shall come hither'). This is explained in verse 13, and in Exod. xii:40, to be four hundred years. Caleb was fourth in descent from Judah, and Moses and Aaron were fourth from Levi. (Deut. i:35; ii:14). Moses uses the term for thirty-eight years. In later times (Baruch vi., in the Epistle of Jeremiah, verse 2) γενεά, generation, clearly means ten years. In Matt. i:17, it means a single descent from father to son. (See GENEALOGY.) J. F. 2. (Gr. γέννημα, ghen'nay-mah, Luke iii:7), progeny, offspring, brood. "O generation of vipers."

GENESIS (jĕn'ĕ-sis), (Sept. Γενεσις, ghen'es-is, beginning), the first book of the Pentateuch, is, in Hebrew, called בְּרֵאשִׁית, ber-ee-sheeth', from the word with which it begins.

This venerable monument, with which the sacred literature of the Hebrews commences, and which forms its real basis, is divided into two main parts; one universal, and one special. The most ancient history of the whole human race is contained in chapters i-xi., and the history of Israel's ancestors, the patriarchs, in chapters xii-l. These two parts are, however, so intimately connected with each other that it would be erroneous to ascribe to the first merely the aim of furnishing a universal history. The chief aim which pervades the whole is to show how the theocratic institution subsequently founded by Moses was rendered possible and necessary. The book, therefore, takes its starting-point from the original unity of the human race, and their original relation to God, and proceeds thence to the interruption of that relation by the appearance of sin, which gradually and progressively wrought an external and internal division in the human race for want of the principles of divine life which originally dwelt in man in general, but which had subsequently been preserved only among a small and separate race—a race which in progress of time became more and more isolated from all the other tribes of the earth, and enjoyed for a series of generations the special care, blessing, and guidance of the Lord. The Mosaical theocracy appears, therefore, by the general tenor of Genesis, partly as a restoration of the original relation to God, of the communion of man with God, and partly as an institution which had been preparing by God himself through a long series of manifestations of his power, justice, and love. Genesis thus furnishes us with the primary view and notion of the whole of the theocracy, and may therefore be considered as the historical foundation without which the subsequent history of the covenant people would be incomplete and unintelligible.

1. Unity and Authenticity. The unity and composition of the work, which is a point in dispute among the critics in regard to all the books of the Pentateuch, have been particularly questioned in the case of Genesis.

(1) Objections. Some suppose that Genesis is founded on two principal original documents, distinguished by the terms Elohim and Jehovah, the names which they respectively give to God. That of Elohim is closely connected in its parts, and forms a whole, while that of Jehovah is a mere complementary document, supplying details at those points where the former is abrupt and deficient, etc. These two documents are said to have been subsequently combined by the hand of an editor, so ably as often to render their separation difficult, if not altogether impossible.

But Ranke, Hengstenberg, Drechsler, Hävernick, and others, maintain that Genesis is a book closely connected in all its parts, and composed by only one author, while the use of the two different names of God is not owing to two different sources on which Genesis is founded, but solely to the different significations of these two names. The use of each of the two names, Jehovah and Elohim, is everywhere in Genesis adapted to the sense of the passages in which the writer has purposely inserted the one name or the other. This point of view is the more to be considered, as it is the peculiar object of the author to point out in Genesis the gradual and progressive development of the divine revelations.

The opponents have in vain attempted to discover in Genesis a few contradictions indicative of different documents in it; their very admission, that a fixed plan and able compilation visibly pervade the whole of the book, is in itself a refutation of such supposed contradictions, since it is hardly to be conceived, that an editor or compiler who has shown so much skill and anxiety to give unity to the book should have cared so little about the removal of those contradictions. The whole of Genesis is pervaded by such a freedom in the selection and treatment of the existing traditions, such an absence of all trace of any previous source or documents which might in some measure have confined the writer within certain limits of views and expressions, as to render it quite impracticable to separate and fix upon them specifically, even if there were portions in Genesis drawn from earlier written documents.

(2) Authorship and Date. That first question concerning the unity of the book is closely connected with another question, respecting its authenticity, or whether Moses was the author of Genesis. We confine ourselves here to only a few remarks on the authenticity of Genesis in particular, and refer the reader for further information to the article Pentateuch.

Some critics have attempted to ascertain the period when Genesis was composed, from a few passages in it, which they say must be anachronisms, if Moses was really the author of the book (see, for example, Tuch, Commentar über Genesis, p. lxxxv. sq.).

Among such passages are, in particular, Gen. xii:6; xiii:7; 'And the Canaanite was then in the land.' This remark, they say, could only have been made by a writer who lived in Palestine after the extirpation of the Canaanites.

But the sense of the passage is not that the Canaanites had not as yet been extirpated, but merely that Abraham, on his arrival in Canaan, had already found there the Canaanites. This notice was necessary, since the author subsequently describes the intercourse between Abraham and the Canaanites, the lords of the country. According to the explanation given to the passage by the opponents, such an observation would be quite a superfluous triviality.

Also the name Hebron (Gen. xiii:18; xxiii:2), they say, was not introduced till after the time of Moses (Josh. xiv:15; xv:13). This, however, does not prove anything, since Hebron was the original Hebrew name for the place, which was subsequently changed into Arba (by a man of that name), but was restored by the Israelites on their entrance into Canaan.

The opponents also maintain that the name of the place Dan (Gen. xiv:14) was given only in the post-Mosaical period (Josh. xix:47; Judg.

xviii:29). But the last two passages speak of quite a different place. There were two places called Dan; Dan-Jaan (2 Sam. xxiv:6), and Dan-Laish, or Leshem.

In Genesis, they further add, frequently occurs the name Bethel (xii:8; xxviii:19; xxxv:15); while even in the time of Joshua, the place was as yet called Luz (Josh. xviii:13). But the name Bethel was not first given to the place by the Israelites in the time of Joshua, there being no occasion for it, since Bethel was the old patriarchal name, which the Israelites restored in the place of Luz, a name given by the Canaanites.

Another passage in Genesis (xxxvi:31), 'Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' is likewise supposed to have been written at a period when the Jews had already a king over them. But the broachers of these objections forget that this passage refers to those promises contained in the Pentateuch in general, and in Genesis in particular (comp. Gen. xxxv:11), that there should hereafter be kings among the Israelites as an independent nation. In comparing Israel with Edom (Gen. xxxvi), the sacred writer cannot refrain from observing that Edom, though left without Divine promises of possessing kings, nevertheless possessed them, and obtained the glory of an independent kingdom, long before Israel could think of such an independence; and a little attention to the sense of the passage will show how admirably the observation suits a writer in the Mosaical period.

The passage (Gen. xv:18) where the land of Israel is described as extending from the river of Egypt (the Nile) to the great river (Euphrates), it is alleged, could only have been penned during the splendid period of the Jews, the times of David and Solomon. Literally taken, however, the remark is inapplicable to any period, since the kingdom of the Jews at no period of their history extended so far. That promise must, therefore, be taken in a rhetorical sense, describing the central point of the proper country as situated between the two rivers.

2. Historical Character. In its historical character Genesis is a book consisting of two contrasting parts.

(1) The Creation. The first part introduces us into the greatest problems of the human mind, such as the Creation and the fall of man; and the second, into the quiet solitude of a small defined circle of families. In the former, the most sublime and wonderful events are described with childlike simplicity; while, in the latter, on the contrary, the most simple and common occurrences are interwoven with the sublimest thoughts and reflections, rendering the small family circle a whole world in history, and the principal actors in it prototypes for a whole nation, and for all times. The contents in general are strictly religious. Not the least trace of mythology appears in it. It is true that the narrations are fraught with wonders. But primeval wonders, the marvelous deeds of God, are the very subject of Genesis. None of these wonders, however, bear a fantastical impress, and there is no useless prodigality of them. They are all penetrated and connected by one common leading idea, and are all related to the counsel of God for the salvation of man. This principle sheds its lustrous beams through the whole of Genesis; therefore the wonders therein related are as little to be ascribed to the invention and imagination of man as the whole plan of God for human salvation. The foundation of the Divine theocratical institution throws a strong light upon the early patriarchal times; the reality of the one proves the reality of the other, as described in Genesis.

(2) Biblical Cosmogony. The separate accounts in Genesis also manifest great internal evidence of truth if we closely examine them. They bear on their front the most beautiful impress of truth. The cosmogony in Genesis stands unequaled among all others known in the ancient world. (See COSMOGONY.) No mythology, no ancient philosophy, has ever come up to the idea of a creation out of nothing. All the ancient systems end in Pantheism, Materialism, emanation-theory, etc. But the Biblical cosmogony occupies a place of its own, and therefore must not be ranked among, or confounded with, any of the ancient systems of mythology or philosophy. The mythological and philosophical cosmogonies may have been derived from the Biblical, as being later depravations and misrepresentations of Biblical truth; but the contents of Genesis cannot, vice versa, have been derived from mythology or philosophy. (See Babylonian Creation Story, BABYLONIA, 16.)

(3) Fall of Man. The historical delineation also of the Creation and of the fall of man does not bear the least national interest or coloring, but is of a truly universal nature, while every mythus bears the stamp of the national features of the nation and country where it originated and found development. All myths are subject to continual development and variations, but among the Hebrews the accounts in Genesis stand firm and immutable for all times, without the least thing being added or altered in them for the purpose of further development, even by the New Testament. What a solid guarantee must there be in this foundation of all subsequent revelations, since it has been admitted and maintained by all generations with such immovable firmness!

The ancient heathen traditions coincide in many points with the Biblical accounts, and serve to illustrate and confirm them. This is especially the case in the ancient traditions concerning the Deluge (Gen. vi:9), and in the list of nations in the tenth chapter; for instance (Gen. x:4), Tarshish is called the son of Javan. This indicates that the ancient inhabitants of Tarshish or Tartessus in Spain were erroneously considered to be a Phœnician colony like those of other towns in its neighborhood, and that they sprang from Javan, that is, Greece. That they were of Greek origin is clear from the account of Herodotus (i. 163). Also (verse 8), Nimrod, the ruler of Babel, is called the son of Cush, which is in remarkable unison with the mythological tales concerning Bel and his Egyptian descent (comp. Diodor. Sic. i. 28, 81; Pausan. iv:23-5). Sidon alone is mentioned (verse 15), but not Tyrus (comp. xlix:13), which arose only in the time of Joshua (Josh. xix:29); and that Sidon was an older town than Tyrus, by which it was afterwards eclipsed, is certified by a number of ancient reports (comp. Hengstenberg, De Rebus Tyriorum, pp. 6, 7). (See FALL OF MAN.)

(4) Patriarchal History. With the patriarchal history (xii. sq.) begins an historical sketch of a peculiar character. The circumstantial details in it allow us to examine more closely the historical character of these accounts. The numerous descriptions of the mode of life in those days furnish us with a very vivid picture. We meet everywhere a sublime simplicity quite worthy of patriarchal life, and never to be found again in later history. One cannot suppose that it would have been possible in a later period, estranged from ancient simplicity, to invent such a picture.

(5) Fidelity of Author. The authenticity of the patriarchal history and the fidelity of the author everywhere exhibits itself. Neither the blemishes in the history of Abraham, nor the gross sins of the sons of Jacob, among whom even Levi, the progenitor of the sacerdotal race, forms no exception, are concealed.

The same author, whose moral principles are so much blamed by the opponents of Genesis, on account of the description given of the life of Jacob, produces, in the history of Abraham, a picture of moral greatness which could have originated only in facts.

The faithfulness of the author manifests itself also especially in the description of the expedition of the kings from Upper to Western Asia; in his statements concerning the person of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv); in the circumstantial details given of the incidents occurring at the purchase of the hereditary burial-place (ch. xxiii); in the genealogies of Arabian tribes (ch. xxv); in the genealogy of Edom (ch. xxxvi); and in many remarkable details which are interwoven with the general accounts. In the history of Joseph the patriarchal history comes into contact with Egypt; and here the accounts given by ancient classical writers, as well as the monuments of Egypt, frequently furnish some splendid confirmations. For instance, the account given (xlvii: 13-26) of the manner in which the Pharaohs became proprietors of all the lands, with the exception of those belonging to the priests, is confirmed by Herodotus (ii. 109), and by Diodorus Siculus (i. 73). The manner of embalming described in Gen. l. entirely agrees with the description of Herodotus, ii, 84, etc. For other data of a similar kind, compare Hengstenberg (Die Bücher Moses und Aegypten, p. 21, sq.) (See PENTATEUCH.)

GENTILES (jën'tils), (Heb. גוֹיִם, go-yeem'), a word which, both in the Hebrew Goyim, and in the Anglo-Latin 'Gentile,' by which we translate it means literally, 'the nations.'

It was applied by the Hebrews to all individuals or communities not under the law—that is, all the nations of the world excepting the Jews (Neh. v:

8; in Lev., Deut., Ps. it is applied to various heathen nations). But in later times some small states, and many individuals, embraced the law; and they were distinguished from the Gentiles, as well as from the Jews, by the name of Proselytes (προσῆλυτοι). In some places our authorized version has the word 'Gentiles' where the original has Ἕλληνες (Rom. ii:9, 10; iii:9; John vii:33; 1 Cor. x:32), which is usually and properly rendered 'Greeks' (Acts xiv:1; xvii:4; Rom. i:16; x:12), thus failing in consistency in the treatment of this word.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. A court in the Temple where strangers might assemble. (See TEMPLE HILL.)

GENTILES, ISLES OF THE (Gen. x:5) denotes, in a most general way, the people of the far western islands and Europe.

GENTLENESS (jĕn't'l-nĕs), (Heb. רַחֲמִים, an-aw-vaw', condescension, Ps. xviii:35; Gr. ἐπιεικεία, ep-ee-i'ki-ah, clemency, 2 Cor. x:1).

"All God's going back from the strictness of his rights as against men, all his allowing of their imperfect righteousness and giving a value to that which, rigidly estimated, would have none; all his refusal to exact extreme penalties; all his remembering whereof we are made and measuring his dealings with us thereby" (Trench, Syn. of New Testament).

In other words, God's gentleness is his grace, goodness, and mercy, and favors proceeding therefrom (Ps. xviii:35).

GENUBATH (ge-nū'bath), (Heb. בְּנֻבָּת, ghen-oo-bath', perhaps theft), an Edomite, son of Hadad. His mother was an Egyptian princess, the sister of Tahpenes, who was the wife of that Pharaoh ruling in the latter part of the reign of David (1 Kings xi:20), B. C. about 1036. Genubath was born in Pharaoh's palace, and became a member of the royal establishment.

GEOGRAPHY (jĕ-ōg'rá-fŷ). It is the Hebrews who present us with the earliest written information of a geographical kind.

In the account of creation mention is made of a spot called Eden, out of which a river, after watering Paradise, ran, and 'from thence it was parted, and became into four heads' (fountains) which sent forth as many rivers, Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, Phrat or Euphrates. Of these the last is the only stream that is identified. The highlands of Armenia would appear to have been the first known to the human family. Descending from these some may have gone eastward, others westward. The latter alone are spoken of in scripture. Coming south and west the progenitors of the world first became acquainted with the countries lying between the Euphrates and the Tigris, roughly termed Mesopotamia, whence they advanced still more south and west into Aram or Syria, Arabia, Canaan, and Egypt.

Professor Sayce says: "The geography of Genesis starts from the north. It was upon the mountains of Ararat or Armenia that the ark rested, and it was accordingly with this region of the world that our primitive chart begins." He claims that the tenth chapter of Genesis is ethnographical rather than ethnological. "It is descriptive merely of such races of men as fell within the horizon of the writer from a geographical point of view. We shall never understand the chapter rightly unless we bear in mind that its main purpose is geographical. In Hebrew as in other Semitic languages, the relation of a mother state to its colony, or of a town or country to its inhabitants, was expressed in genealogical form. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were regarded as 'the daughters of Jerusalem,' the people of the east were 'the children' of the district to which they belonged.

"When therefore we are told that 'Canaan begat Sidon his first born,' and 'Heth,' all that is meant is that the city of Sidon and the Hittites to whom reference is made were alike to be found in the country called Canaan. It does not follow that there was any ethnological kinship between the Phœnician builders of Sidon and the Hittites from the north. Indeed we know from modern research that there was none. But the Hittite and the Sidonian were both inhabitants of Canaan, or as we should say, Canaanites; they were both accordingly 'the children of Canaan.'" (Races of the Old Testament, pp. 39-40.)

We know that the Hebrews were widely acquainted with the then known world, since colonies and individuals of their nation were spread over nearly the entire surface covered by ancient civilization, and identified with the Roman empire. The occasional, if not periodical, return of the Jews thus scattered abroad, or at least the relations which they would sustain with their mother country, must have greatly widened, and made less inaccurate, the knowledge entertained in Palestine of other parts of the world. Accordingly we read (Acts ii:5, sq.), that, at the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, 'there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews out of every nation under heaven.'

GEPHEN (gĕ'fĕn), (Gr. ἀμπελος, am'pe-los). See VINE.

GERA (gĕ'rà), (Heb. גֵּרָא, gay-raw', grain), the name of at least three Benjamites.

1. Son of Bela, a descendant of Benjamin, who is mentioned as living at the time of Jacob's migration into Egypt. (B. C. 1706.) (Gen. xlvi:21; 1 Chron. viii:3). The passage in Chron. is very corrupt and the different Geras there seem to merge themselves into the Gera, son of Bela (comp. 1 Chron. viii:5, 7).

2. Father of Ehud, the Judge (Judg. iii:15). Possibly identical with 1. (B. C. 1170.) (See EHUD.)

3. Father or ancestor of Shimei, the man who abused David (2 Sam. xvi:5; xix:16, 18; 1 Kings ii:8). Perhaps identical with both 1 and 2. (B. C. 966.) (See SHIMEI.)

GERAH (gĕ'rah), (Heb. גֵּרָה, gay-raw', a kernel). The smallest piece of money among the Hebrews. Twenty made a shekel; one of them would therefore be worth three cents, according to the present value of silver (Exod. xxx:13).

GERAR (gĕ'rār), (Heb. גֵּרָר, gher-awr, a region, a lodging place).

A city and district on the southernmost borders of Palestine, in the country of the Philistines, and not far from Gaza. It was visited by Abraham after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. xx:1), and by Isaac when there was a dearth in the rest of Canaan (Gen. xxvi:1). The incidents of their sojourn show that the district was very fertile. It was the seat of the first Philistine kingdom we read of, and gave name to it. The intercourse, differences, and alliances of the Hebrew fathers with the king and people of Gerar form a very curious and interesting portion of patriarchal history. It was still an important place in later times, as we may gather from 1 Chron. xiv:13, 14. According to the ancient accounts Gerar lay in or near a valley, which appears to be no other than the great Wady Sheriah, called by some Wady Gaza (or one of the branches of it), that comes down from Beersheba; besides we know that it was in the land of the Philistines, and that it was not far from Beersheba when Isaac resided there (Gen. xxvi:1, 20, 23, 26-33; comp. xx:1). The name continued to exist (perhaps as a matter of tradition) for several centuries after the Christian era. Thomson in The Land and the Book, vol 2, p. 349, says "the Rev. J. Rowlands writes that near Joorf el Gerar are the traces of an ancient city called Khirbet el Gerar—the Ruins of Gerar." These ruins are between Gaza and Khalasa.

GERASENES (gēr'ā-sēnz').

The people of Gerasa (R. V. of Mark v:1 and Luke viii:26, 37; manuscripts vary between Gerasenes, Gadarenes, Gergesenes). See GERGESA OR GERASA.

GERGESA or GERASA (gēr'as-a), (Gr. Γερασά, gher'as-ah), now Jerash (not named in the Bible), was in the Decapolis, and formed the eastern boundary of Peræa. It lay on elevated ground, according to Ptolemy, in 68° 15' = 31° 45'. Its inhabitants were mostly heathen.

After the Roman conquests in the East, the country in which Gerasa lies became one of their favorite colonies, and ten principal cities were built on the east of the Jordan, giving the name of Decapolis to the land in which they stood. The place was taken by storm by Alexander Jannæus, who was actuated by a desire of gaining a large treasure (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i:4, 8; Antiq. viii:2, 3). Alexander died near it while besieging Regaba (Antiq. xv:5). Before the place had time to recover from this calamity, it was included among the number of those cities which were burnt by the enraged Jews in their vengeance on the Syrians, and on the Roman power generally, for the massacre of a number of their nation at Cæsarea (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii:18, 1). A terrible revenge was taken by other cities, but Gerasa is honorably excepted (De Bell. Jud. ii:18, 5). Annius, general under Vespasian, took the city; 'after which he set fire to their houses,' and what was remaining was all burnt down' (De Bell. Jud. iv:9, 1). Its ruins were first discovered by Seetzen, and have often been subsequently visited. They have been pronounced superior to those of Palmyra (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 252-64; Kelley, Syria, p. 448 ff.; Buckingham, Palestine, p. 405).

GERGESENES (gēr'ge-sēnez'), (Gr. Γεργεσηνός, gher-ghes-ay-nos'). The inhabitants of GERGESA (which see).

GERMAN EVANGELICAL SYNOD OF NORTH AMERICA.

This Synod is based on the union between the two great branches of Protestantism—the Lutheran and the Reformed Church, as the same was effected since 1817 in the different German states. The founders of the Evangelical Synod were missionaries, sent during the third decade of the nineteenth century to America by the Mission Houses of Basel and Barmen. These two institutions are supported alike by Lutherans and Reformed Congregations in Germany and Switzerland, and both denominations are also represented in the Board of Directors. It was therefore only natural for the pupils of these schools to organize a church here in America as similar as possible to their mother church in Germany. On October 15, 1840, seven of these missionaries assembled at Gravois Settlement, near St. Louis, Mo., and organized as an association, which has become known as The German Evangelical Synod of North America.

(1) Doctrine. The following declaration of faith was adopted by the founders and still serves as its confessional basis: "The German Evangelical Synod of North America means by the term Evangelical Church that church community which acknowledges the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the Word of God, and as the only true and infallible standard of Christian doctrines and precepts (1) and accepts as its confession that interpretation of the Holy Scriptures which is laid down in the symbolic books of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, among which the Augsburg Confession, Luther's Minor and Major Catechism, and the Heidelberg Catechism are the principal ones, so far as they agree; but in points of difference the German Evangelical Synod adheres solely to the passages of Holy Scriptures alluding to them, observing that liberty of conscience existing in the Evangelical Church."

According to these articles of faith the German Evangelical Synod accepts as its doctrine the consensus fidei of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. We confess, in entire harmony with the Church of the Reformation, God as the Almighty Creator of heaven and earth; his omnipresent providence in the guidance of men; the doctrine of the fall of man, of original sin, of redemption through the atoning blood of Christ; and the Christology, as the same was formed by the ecumenical councils of the first centuries. We confess that sanctification is not our work, but is initiated by the agency of the Holy Spirit, by means of the Divine word and the sacraments, and is a process that reaches its end only with the close of life. This declaration expresses the union of the Lutheran and Reformed branches of protestantism. As is well known, both have always agreed in all fundamental doctrines of Christian life and faith, and on all subjects and facts clearly expressed and stated in the Holy Scriptures, and on all articles of faith pertaining to our salvation. The controversy between the two German denominations centers around the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. (2) Our position on this question is the following: The German Evangelical Synod believes and confesses, that in the Holy Supper the faithful and penitent communicant receives in the bread and wine the body and the precious blood of Christ and therewith forgiveness of sins, life and salvation; but the unbeliever and unworthy receives damnation. The other question: How is this done? how is it possible? how is this miracle performed? the Synod leaves unanswered, since the Scripture gives us no explanation. But we believe in the fact, in the actuality of the miracle; we believe that bread and wine in the Holy Supper is the body and the blood of Christ, for Christ plainly said so.

(2) Polity. Every congregation binds itself voluntarily to the doctrine and precepts as laid down in the statutes of the German Evangelical Synod, when it joins that body.

Our relation toward other churches has ever been governed by the so-called Augustine motto: "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas." We show friendly interest in all undertakings for a confederation of different denominations such as the International Evangelical Alliance, and prior to that organization the "Evangelischer Kirchentag" in Germany. We support international Bible associations and like work in different directions.

Let us say a few words on the management of our Church. Every congregation is independent in its local affairs; the Synod acts more in the character of a counsellor or adviser. A number of congregations within certain geographical boundaries constitute a "district," whose ministers and lay delegates meet annually in a district conference. All the districts meet together in the "General Synod," which is composed of one out of every nine ministers, and one lay delegate out of every nine congregations, elected at district conferences. It convenes every three years.

(3) Institutions. The Synod owns a theological seminary founded 1850 at Marthasville, Mo., removed to St. Louis, Mo., 1883. The preparatory college for students purposing to enter the theological seminary is at Elmhurst, Ill. It was founded 1871. In connection with the college is the seminary for the education of teachers for our parochial schools.

The German Evangelical Synod has its own mission field in the Central Province of India. There are seven missionaries and fifty native preachers. The annual expense is about $10,000, while a much larger sum is expended for home missions. A harbor mission in Baltimore, Md., for the benefit of emigrants, has been during the last ten years a blessing to many. There are orphanages at Detroit, Mich.; at Chicago, Bensenville, and Hazleton, Ill.; at St. Louis, Mo.; and at Lincoln, Neb.; also deaconess homes in seven of the states. Eden Publishing House is at St. Louis, Mo., and publishes all kinds of church papers and books of worship. The official organ is the "Friedensbote," with a circulation of 25,000, besides which are seven other papers. F. M.

GERSHOM (gēr'shom), (Heb. גֶּרְשׁוֹן, gay-resh-one', expulsion).

1. The elder of the two sons (the other was Eliezer) who were born to Moses in the land of Midian by Zipporah (Exod. ii:22; xviii:3). These sons of the great lawgiver held no other rank than that of simple Levites, while the sons of their uncle Aaron enjoyed all the privileges of the priesthood (1 Chron. xliii:15). The glory of being the children of such a father doubtless availed them more than the highest dignities; but we must nevertheless admire the rare disinterestedness of Moses in making no public provision—as he might so easily have done—for his own children. (B. C. 1698.)

2. The form of Gershon, as it appears (1 Chron. vi:16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; xv:7).

3. One of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon, as a representative of the priestly family of Phinehas (Ezra viii:2). (B. C. 459.)

GERSHON (gēr'shon), (Heb. גֶּרְשׁוֹן, gay-resh-one', expulsion), eldest of the three sons of the patriarch Levi, born in Canaan before the going down into Egypt.

He is only known from his name having been given to one of the three great branches of the Levitical tribe. The office of the Gershonites, during the marches in the wilderness, was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle, and their place in the camp was west of the tabernacle (Gen. xli:11; Exod. vi:16; Num. iii:17). (B. C. about 1706.) Gershon's sons were Libni and Shimi (Exod. vi:17; Num. iii:18, 21; 1 Chron. vi:17).

GERSHONITES, THE (gēr'shon-ites).

1. Descendants of Gershon (Num. iii:21, 23, 24; iv:24, 27; xxvi:57; Josh. xxi:33; 1 Chron. xxiii:7; 2 Chron. xxix:12). (See GERSHON).

As to the office and duties of the Gershonites, see LEVITES.

2. "The Gershonite," a name applied to Laadan (1 Chron. xxvi:21), and Jehiel (1 Chron. xxix:8).

GERZITES, THE (gēr'zites), (Heb. with the art. גֵּרְזִי, hay-girzi), a tribe living between Egypt and the south of Palestine in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii:8, marg.). Our translators adopted the form Gizrites (or rather Gezrites) as corrected by the Masorets.

GESHAM (gē'sham), or rather GESHAN (Heb. גֶּשָׁם, gay-shawn', filthy, or else firm, strong), the third son of Jahdai, among the descendants of Caleb (1 Chron. ii:47), B. C. after 1210.

GESHAN (gē'shan), (Heb. גֶּשָׁם, gay-shawn', filthy, Ges), in A. V. Gesham, an error which crept into the later editions, the original of 1611 having Geshan.

GESHEM (gē'shem), (Heb. גֶּשֶׁם, gheh'shem, shower), an Arabian (Neh. ii:19; vi:1), and one of the enemies of the Jews on the return from the exile, especially in the plots against the life of Nehemiah (vi:2), B. C. 445.

He was probably a Samaritan, although on some account or other designated an Arabian (Neh. ii:19), and seems to have been a subaltern officer at Jerusalem. He opposed the designs of the Jewish governor, talking of them as seditious, and turning them into ridicule. Eventually he took part in the plots of Tobiah against the life of Nehemiah (Neh. ii:19; vi:2-9). (B. C. about 445.)

GESHUR (gē'shur), (Heb. גֶּשׁוּר, ghesh-oor', bridge), Syria (2 Sam. xv:8; 1 Chron. ii:23), which adjoined, on the east side of the Jordan, the northern border of the Hebrew territory, and lay between Mount Hermon, Maachah, and Bashan (Deut. iii:13, 14; Josh. xii:5).

According to the boundaries of the Holy Land, as defined by Moses, Geshur would have formed part of it; but in Josh. xiii:2, 13, it is stated that the Israelites had expelled neither the Geshurites nor the Maachathites, but dwelt together with them. That the Hebrews did not afterwards permanently subdue Geshur appears from the circumstance that, in David's time, this district had a king of its own, called Talmai, whose daughter, Maacah, was one of the wives of David (2 Sam. iii:3). She was the mother of Absalom, who took refuge with his grandfather after the murder of Amnon, and remained three years in Geshur (2 Sam. xiii:37; xv:8). The word Geshur signifies a bridge, and corresponds with the Arabic Jisr, and in the same region where, according to the above data, we must fix Geshur, between Mount Hermon and the lake of Tiberias, there still exists an ancient stone bridge over the upper Jordan, called Jisr-Beni-Jakub, or 'the bridge of the children of Jacob,' i. e., the Israelites.

GESHURI (gēsh'u-ri), (Heb. גֶּשׁוּרִי, ghe-shoo-ree', Deut. iii:14; Josh. xiii:2), or GESHURITES (Heb. גֶּשׁוּרִי, ghe-shoo-reem', Josh. xii:5; xiii:11, 13; 1 Sam. xxvii:8), the inhabitants of GESHUR, bordering on Aram, to the east of Jordan. (See GESHUR).

GETHER (gē'ther), (Heb. גֶּתֶר, gheh'ther, derivation uncertain). The third of the sons of Aram (Gen. x:23), no trustworthy identification of the people sprung from him has been made.

GETHESEMANE (geth-sēm'a-ne), (Gr. Γεθσημανῆ, gheh-say-man-ay', seemingly from oil press), the name of a small field, or garden, just out of Jerusalem, over the brook Kidron, and at the foot of the Mount of Olives.

That which is now pointed out as the garden in which our Lord underwent his agony, occupies part of a level space between the brook and the foot of the Mount, and corresponds well enough in situation and distance with all the conditions which the narrative requires. It is about fifty paces square, and is enclosed by a wall of no great height, formed of rough loose stones. Eight very ancient olive-trees now occupy this enclosure, some of which are of very large size, and all exhibit symptoms of decay clearly denoting their great age. The garden belongs to one of the monastic establishments, and much care has been taken to preserve the old trees from destruction. Dr. Robinson admits the probability that this is the site which Eusebius and Jerome had in view; and, as no other site is suggested as preferable, we may be content to receive the traditional indication. Thomson, however (The Land and the Book, vol. ii. pp. 483-4), says: "The position is too near the city, and so close to what must have always been the great thoroughfare eastward, that our Lord would scarcely have selected it for retirement on that dangerous and dismal night." He believes Gethsemane to have been in a secluded vale several hundred yards northeast of the traditional site. Barclay thinks it evident that the present enclosure, from its narrow dimensions, can occupy only in part the site of the ancient garden, and finds a better position higher up in the valley. Porter states that the Greeks, envious of the Latins, have recently enclosed a piece of ground a little north, beside the Virgin's tomb, and contend that this is the true garden.

GEUEL (ge-ū'el), (Heb. גֵּוֹל, gheh-oo-ale', majesty of Gad), son of Machi, and ruler of the tribe of Gad. He was among the spies sent to explore the promised land (Num. xiii:15), B. C. 1657.

GEZER (gē'zēr), (Heb. גֶּזֶר, gheh'zer, a precipice).

Formerly a royal city of the Canaanites, and situated in what became the western part of the tribe of Ephraim. The Canaanites were not expelled from it at the conquest (Josh. x:33; xvi:5, 10; Judg. i:29). It was, nevertheless, assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi:21; 1 Chron. vi:67). In after times, having been, on some occasion, destroyed by the Egyptians, it was rebuilt by Solomon (1 Kings ix:16). M. Clermont Ganneau identified the site by inscriptions; one of which, perhaps as old as the Herods, marked the limits of Gezer, and gave in Hebrew letters the actual name. It is now called Tell Jezar and is situated about eighteen miles west-northwest of Jerusalem, and nearly six east of Ekron.

GEZRITES (gēz'rites), (Heb. גִּזְרִי, hagh-ghezree', strictly "the Gizrite"), is the rendering of the geri of 1 Sam. xxvii:8, where the kethibh has גִּזְרִי, which may be Girzite, Gerizite, or Gerizzite. (See GERZITES, THE.)

GIAH (gī'ah), (Heb. גֵּי, ghe'akh, fountain), a place named (2 Sam. ii:24), which Ammah was said to face. No trace of this place has been found.

GIANTS (jī'ants), (Heb. גִּבּוֹרִים, ghib-bore', for mighty, strong one). The English word is derived immediately from the Latin gigas, which is only Greek in Roman letters; and γίγας, giant, itself is, in all likelihood, made up of γῆσθαι, to be born, and γῆ, the earth, thus signifying 'the earth-born,' in allusion to classical fable.

These beings of unusual height are found in the early history of all nations, sometimes of a purely human origin, but more frequently supposed to have partaken also, in some way, of the supernatural and the divine.

(1) Nephilim. In Gen. vi:4, we have the first mention of giants (Heb. נְפִילִים, nef-ee-loem', causing to fall), 'There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown.'

In our judgment the bearing of the passage obviously favors the common notion of giants, and that the rather because their origin is traced to some unexplained connection with 'the sons of God,' that is, with beings of high endowments, if not of a superior nature.

(2) Rephaim. In Gen. xiv:5, we meet with a race termed Rephaim (Heb. רִפְּאִים, ref-aw-eem', strong), as settled on the other side of the Jordan, in Ashteroth-Karnaim, whom Chedorlaomer defeated.

Of this race was Og, king of Bashan, who alone remained, in the days of Moses (Deut. iii:10), of the remnant of the Rephaim. This race gave their name to a valley near Jerusalem.

(3) Anakim. The Anakim (Heb. אֲנָכִים, an-aw-keem', sons of Anak). In Num. xiii the spies sent by Moses before his army to survey the promised land, report among other things—'The people be strong that dwell in the land; and, moreover, we saw the children of Anak' (verse 28).

This indirect mention of the children of Anak shows that they were a well-known gigantic race. In the 32d and 33d verses the statement is enhanced—'It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants; and all the people that we saw in it are men of great stature. And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak which came of the giants; and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.' However much of exaggeration fear may have given to the description, the passage seems beyond a doubt to show the writer's belief in a race of giants (Deut. ix:2). From Deut. ii:10, it appears that the size of the Anakim became proverbial, and was used as a standard with which to compare others. In the time of Moses they dwelt in the environs of Hebron (Josh. xi:22).

(5) Emim. Another race is mentioned in Deut. ii:10, the Emim (עִמִּים, ay-meem'), who dwelt in the country of the Moabites. They are described as a people 'great and many, and tall as the Anakims, which were also accounted giants' (Gen. xiv:5).

(6) Zamzumim. The Zamzumim also (זַמְזוּמִים, zam-zum-meem', Deut. ii:20) had their home in the land of Ammon—'that also was accounted a land of giants. Giants dwelt therein of old time, and the Ammonites called them Zamzumims, a people great and many, and Old Olive Trees in the Garden of Gethsemane.

They consisted of three branches or clans—'Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai—the children of Anak' (Num. xiii:22). They were destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xi:21; Judg. i:20).

(4) Goliath. From this remnant of the Anakim thus left in Gath of the Philistines, proceeded the famous Goliath (גִּלְיָת, gol-yath', exile, 1 Sam. xvii:4). This giant is said to have been in height six cubits and a span.

Other giants of the Philistines are mentioned in the passage before cited, 2 Sam. xxi:16, sq., namely:—(1) 'Ishbi-benob, which was of the sons of the giant, the weight of whose spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass, he being girded with a new sword, thought to have slain David; but Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, succored him, and smote the Philistine and killed him.' (2) Saph (2 Sam. xxi:18), which was of the sons of the giant who was slain by Sibbechai. (3) 'A man (2 Sam. xxi:20) of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers and on every foot six toes, four and twenty in number, and he also was born to the giant; and when he defied Israel, Jonathan, the son of Shimeah, the brother of David, slew him.' These four were sons of the giant in Gath, that is, probably of the Goliath of Gath whom David slew (1 Kings xx:8; 2 Sam. xxi:19; 1 Sam. xvii:4).

tall as the Anakims; but the Lord destroyed them before them, and they (the Israelites) succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead.'

From this enumeration it is clear that the scriptures tell of giants in the olden time, and of races of giants; that primitive races greatly excelled all others in size; and that, though giants are mentioned as something singular and consequently as comparatively rare, they appear to have been, relatively to the numbers of the population, of frequent occurrence. (See BASHAN; REPHAIM.)

The possibility of a race of giants cannot well be denied. There is a known tendency in the human frame to perpetuate peculiarities which have been once evolved. Why not extraordinary 'procrity' as well as any other? In fact, the propagation of stature, whether high or low, is a phenomenon which we all see presented daily before our own eyes. Tall parents give birth to tall children. The tallness is found to remain in families; and, doubtless, did not circumstances intervene to reduce the stature by intermarriage with short persons, the unusual height would be perpetuated in any given line. The inhabitants of Potsdam, descended to a great extent from the famous regiment of tall grenadiers which Frederick of Prussia took so much pains to bring together, are said to be still remarkable for exceeding the average height. The family of Scaligers appears to have been unusually tall. J. R. B.

GIBBAR (gib'bar), (Chal. גִּבְבָּר, ghib-bawr', a hero), ninety-five of "the sons of Gibbar" returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:20). In the parallel passage of Neh. viii:25, the name is Gibeon.

GIBBETHON (gib'be-thōn), (Heb. גִּבְתוֹן, ghib-beth-one', a height), a city of the Philistines, which was included in the territories of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix:44), and was assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi:23).

It was still in the hands of the Philistines in the time of Nadab, king of Israel, who besieged it, and was slain under its walls by Baasha, one of his own officers (1 Kings xv:27; xvi:15). Nothing is known of its site.

GIBEĀ (gib'e-ā), (Heb. גִּבְעָא, ghib-aw', hill), occurs among the names of places, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii:49). This would seem to identify Gibeā with GIBEAH of Judah (Burrington, i. 216).

GIBEAH (gib'e-ah), (Hebrew same as above). There were several places of this name, which, as before remarked (see GEBĀ), is the feminine form of the word Gibeah, and signifies a hill. Without doubt all the places so named were situated upon hills.

(1) Gibeah of Judah. Gibeah in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:57), which, under the name of Gabaatha, Eusebius and Jerome place twelve Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, and state that the grave of the prophet Habakkuk was there to be seen. Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii: 327) identifies it with the village of Jebah, which stands upon an isolated hill, in the midst of Wady-el-Musurr, about ten miles southwest of Jerusalem.

(2) Gibeah at Kirjath-jearim. The place where the ark rested after it was returned by the Philistines, until its removal by David (2 Sam. vi:3, 4; comp. 1 Sam. vii:1, 2).

(3) Gibeah of Benjamin is historically the most important of the places bearing this name. It is often mentioned in Scripture. It was the scene of that abominable transaction which involved in its consequences almost the entire extirpation of the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. xix:14, 57.). It is without doubt identical with the next.

(4) Gibeah of Saul, which was the birthplace of Saul, and continued to be his residence after he became king (1 Sam. x:26; xi:4; xv:33; xxiii:19; xxvi:1); and here was the scene of Jonathan's romantic exploit against the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv). It was doubtless on account of this intimate connection with Saul that the Gibeonites hanged up here his seven descendants (2 Sam. xxi:6). Jerome speaks of Gibeah as, in his time, level with the ground (Ep. 86, ad Eustoch.), and since then it does not appear to have been visited by travelers till recently. Dr. Robinson, who made many valuable observations in this neighborhood, detected Gibeah in the small and half-ruined village of Jeba, which lies upon a low, conical, or rather round eminence, on the broad ridge which shelves down towards the Jordan valley, and spreads out below the village in a fine sloping plain. The views of the Dead Sea and the Jordan and of the Eastern mountains, are here very extensive. Among the ruins some large hewn stones, indicating antiquity, are occasionally seen. This place is about five miles north by east from Jerusalem.

(5) Gibeah in Mount Ephraim, called Gibeah of Phineas, where the high-priest Eleazar, son of Aaron, was buried by his son Phineas (Josh. xxiv:33). The Onomasticon makes it five Roman miles from Gophna, on the road to Neapolis (Shechem); which was itself fifteen Roman miles north of Jerusalem. Dr. Robinson finds it in a narrow valley called Wady-el-Jib, the Geeb of Maundrell, lying just midway on the road between Jerusalem and Shechem.

(6) Gibeah in the Field, a place to which ran one of the highways out of Gibeah of Benjamin (Judg. xx:31). The place has not been identified.

(7) Other Gibeahs. The name of several places given in the A. V. in their translated form (1) "Hill of the foreskins" (Josh. v:3), between the Jordan and Jericho. It took its name from the circumcision which took place there. It seems to have been called Gilgal, afterwards. (2) The "hill of Moreh" (Judg. vii:1). (3) The "hill of God" on the route of Saul (1 Sam. x:5). (4) The "hill of Hachilah" (1 Sam. xxiii:19; xxvi:1). (5) The "hill of Ammah" (2 Sam. ii:24). (6) The "hill of Gareb" (Jer. xxxi:39).

GIBEATH (gib'e-ath), (Heb. same as Gibeah), enumerated among the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii:28). It is very probably not the same as Gibeah of Benjamin, as has been suggested, because the latter place was five or six miles north of Jerusalem, and near to Gibeon and Ramah, with which it would have been enumerated. (See GIBEA; GIBEAH.)

GIBEATHITE, THE (gib'e-ath-ite), (Heb. גִּבְעָתִי, ghib-aw-thee', a native of Gibeah; applied to Shemaah, the father of two Benjamites under Saul, who joined David), (1 Chron. xii:3).

GIBEON (gib'e-on), (Heb. גִּבְעוֹן, ghib-hon', hill city).

A town celebrated in the Old Testament, but not mentioned in the New. (1) It was 'a great city,' as one of the royal cities; and to its jurisdiction originally belonged Beeroth, Chephirah, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. ix:17; x:2). It is first mentioned in connection with the deception practiced by the inhabitants upon Joshua, by which, although Canaanites (Hivites), they induced the Jewish leader not only to make a league with them, and to spare their lives and cities, but also, in their defense, to make war upon the five kings by whom they were besieged. (2) It was in the great battle which followed that 'the sun stood still upon Gibeon' (Josh. x:12, 1-14). (3) The place afterwards fell to the lot of Benjamin and became a Levitical city (Josh. xviii:25; xxi:17), where the tabernacle was set up for many years under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xvi:39; xxi:29; 2 Chron. i:3), the ark being at the same time at Jerusalem (2 Chron. i:4). (4) It was here, as being the place of the altar, that the young Solomon offered a thousand burnt-offerings, and was rewarded by the vision which left him the wisest of men (1 Kings iii:4-15; 2 Chron. i:3-13). (5) This was the place where Abner's challenge to Joab brought defeat upon himself, and death upon his brother Ashael (2 Sam. ii:12-32), and where Amasa was afterwards slain by Joab (2 Sam. xx:8-12). (6) None of these passages mark the site of Gibeon; but there are indications of it in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. ii:19, 1), who places it fifty stadia northwest from Jerusalem; and in Jerome (Ep. 86, ad Eustoch.); which leave little doubt that Gibeon is to be identified with the place which still bears the name of El-Jib. (7) El-Jib is a moderately sized village, seated on the summit of a hill, five miles north by west from Jerusalem. The houses stand very irregularly and unevenly, sometimes almost above one another. They seem to be chiefly rooms in old massive ruins, which have fallen down in every direction. (8) One large building still remains, probably a former castle or tower of strength. Towards the east the ridge of the hill sinks a little, and here, a few rods from the village, just below the top of the ridge towards the north, is a fine fountain of water. It is in a cave, excavated in and under the high rock, so as to form a large subterranean reservoir. Not far below it, among olive-trees, are the remains of an open reservoir, about one hundred and twenty feet in length by one hundred in breadth. It was doubtless designed to receive the superfluous waters of the cavern, and there can be little question but that this was 'the Pool of Gibeon' mentioned such, and preferably employed upon the shipping which formed the glory and strength of Tyre. The term is Gebalites in the R. V.

GIDDALTI (gid-däl'tī), (Heb. גִּדְדָלְתִי, ghid-dal-tee', I have made great), a Kohathite Levite, son of Heman, "the king's seer" (1 Chron. xxv:4, 29), B. C. 1013. He with his thirteen brothers played the horn in the temple service (verses 5, 7). He also conducted the 22d course (verse 29).

GIDDEL (gid'del), (Heb. גִּדְדֵל, ghid-dale', large).

1. The children of Giddel returned with the Nethinim from captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:47; Neh. vii:49).

2. Sons of Bene-Giddel, servants of Solomon, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel in the same caravan (Ezra ii:56; Neh. vii:58).

Gibeon.

in 2 Sam. ii:13; and, in the whole, we find the 'Great (or many) waters of Gibeon' of Jer. xli:12.

GIBEONITES, THE (gīb'e-on-ites), (Heb. גִּבְעוֹנִים, ghib-o-neem', the people of Gibeon: Hivites). (See GIBEON.) Individual Gibeonites are ISMAIAH (1 Chron. xii:4); Melathia (Neh. iii:7); Hananiah, son of Azur (Jer. xxviii:1, 10, 13, 17).

GIBLITES (gīb'lites), (Heb. גִּבְלִיטִים, ghib-lee', the inhabitants of the city and district of Gebal in Phœnicia, 34° 7' N. lat., 35° 42' E. long., on the shore of the Mediterranean, under Mount Lebanon.

'The land of the Giblites,' with 'all Lebanon,' was assigned to the Israelites by the original appointment (Josh. xiii:5); but it does not seem that they ever possessed themselves of it. The Giblites are denoted by the word rendered 'stone-squarers' in 1 Kings v:18; from which it would seem that they were then subject to, or in close connection with, Tyre. It is doubtful whether this Gebal, or the one in Edom, is that mentioned Ps. lxxxiii:7. But in Ezek. xxvii:9, the Phœnician Giblites are distinctly mentioned as GIDEON (gīd'e-on), (Heb. גִּדְדֵן, ghid-ohn', tree feller, i. e., warrior or destroyer).

He was surnamed Jerubbaal or Jerubbesheth, fifth Judge in Israel, and the first of them whose history is circumstantially narrated. He was the son of Joash, of the tribe of Manasseh (Judg. vi:11), and resided at Ophrah in Gilead beyond the Jordan.

(1) Condition of Israel. The Midianites, in conjunction with the Amalekites and other nomade tribes, invaded the country every year, at the season of produce, in great numbers, with their flocks and herds. They plundered and trampled down the fields, the vineyards, and the gardens; they seized the cattle, and plundered man and house, rioting in the country, after the manner which the Bedouin Arabs practice at this day.

(2) Call of Gideon. After Israel had been humbled by seven years of this treatment, the Lord raised up a deliverer in the person of Gideon. He was threshing corn by stealth, for fear of its being taken away by the Midianites, when an angel of God appeared before him, and thus saluted him:—'The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor.' Gideon expressed some doubt whether God was still with a people subject to such affliction, and was answered by the most unexpected commission—'Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?' Gideon still urged, 'Wherewith shall I save Israel? Behold my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house.' The 'Wherewith' was answered by 'Surely I will be with thee.' He then demurred no more, but pressed his hospitality upon the heavenly stranger, who, however, ate not of what was set before him, but directing Gideon to lay it out upon the rock as upon an altar, it was consumed by a supernatural fire, and the angel disappeared.

(3) Destroys Baal's Altar. Assured by this of his commission, Gideon proceeded at once to cast down the local image and altar of Baal; and, when the people would have avenged this insult to their false god, their anger was averted through the address of his father, who, by dwelling on the inability of Baal to avenge himself, more than insinuated a doubt of his competency to protect his followers. This was a favorite argument among the Hebrews against idolatry. It occurs often in the prophets, and was seldom urged upon idolatrous Israelites without some effect upon their consciences.

(4) The Sign of the Fleece. Gideon soon found occasion to act upon his high commission. The allied invaders were encamped in the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon, when he blew the trumpet, and thus gathered round him a daily increasing host, the summons to arms which it implied having been transmitted through the northern tribes by special messengers. The inquietude connected with great enterprises is more sensibly felt some days before than at the moment of action; and hence the two miraculous signs which, on the two nights preceding the march, were required and given as tokens of victory. The first night a fleece was laid out in the middle of an open threshing-floor, and in the morning it was quite wet, while the soil was dry all around. The next night the wonder was reversed, the soil being wet and the fleece perfectly dry (Judg. vii).

(5) Midianites Defeated. Encouraged by these Divine testimonies, Gideon commenced his march, and advanced to the brook Harod, in the valley of Jezreel. He was here at the head of 32,000 men; but, lest so large a host should assume the glory of the coming deliverance, which of right belonged to God only, two operations, remarkable both in motive and procedure, reduced this large host to a mere handful of men. First, by Divine direction, proclamation was made that all the faint-hearted might withdraw; and no fewer than 22,000 availed themselves of the indulgence. The remaining 10,000 were still declared too numerous; they were therefore all taken down to the brook, when only those who lapped the water from their hands, like active men in haste, were reserved for the enterprise, while all those who lay down leisurely to drink were excluded. The former numbered no more than 300, and these were the appointed vanquishers of the huge host which covered the great plain (Judg. vii:1-8).

The overheard relation of a dream, by which Gideon was encouraged (Judg. vii:9-14), and the remarkable stratagem, with pitchers and torches, by which he overcame (verses 15-23), are well known.

The routed Midianites fled towards the Jordan, but were pursued with great slaughter, the country being now roused in pursuit of the flying oppressor.

(6) The Ephraimites. The Ephraimites rendered good service by seizing the lower fords of the Jordan, and cutting off all who attempted escape in that direction, while Gideon himself pursued beyond the river those who escaped by the upper fords. Gideon crossed the Jordan a little below where it leaves the lake of Gennesaret, in pursuit of the Midianitish princes Zeba and Zalmunna. On that side the river, however, his victory was not believed or understood, and the people still trembled at the very name of the Midianites.

(7) Destroys Succoth and Penuel. Hence he could obtain no succor from the places which he passed, and town after town refused to supply even victuals to his fatigued and hungry, but still stout-hearted troop. He pronounced vengeance upon them, but postponed its execution till his return; and when he did return with the two princes as his prisoners, he by no means spared those towns which, like Succoth and Penuel, had added insult to injury (Judg. viii:4-17).

(8) Avenges His Brethren. In those days captives of distinction taken in war were almost invariably slain. Zeba and Zalmunna had made up their minds to this fate; and yet it was Gideon's intention to have spared them, till he learned that they had put to death his own brothers under the same circumstances; upon which, as the avenger of their blood, he slew the captives with his own hand (Judg. viii:18-21). Among the fugitives taken by the Ephraimites were two distinguished emirs of Midian, named Oreb and Zeeb, whom they put to death. They took their heads over to Gideon, which amounted to an acknowledgment of his leadership; but still the always haughty and jealous Ephraimites were greatly annoyed that they had not in the first instance been summoned to the field; and serious consequences might have followed, but for the tact of Gideon in speaking in a lowly spirit of his own doings in comparison with theirs (Judg. vii:14; viii:4).

(9) Refuses the Crown. Gideon having thus delivered Israel from the most afflictive tyranny to which they had been subject since they quitted Egypt, the grateful people, and particularly the northern tribes, made him an offer of the crown for himself and his sons. But the hero was too well acquainted with his true position, and with the principles of theocratical government, to accept this unguarded offer: 'I will not rule over you,' he said, 'neither shall my son rule over you; Jehovah, he shall rule over you.' He would only accept the golden earrings which the victors had taken from the ears of their slaughtered foes (see EARRINGS); and a cloth being spread out to receive them, the admiring Israelites threw in, not only the earrings, but other ornaments of gold, including the chains of the royal camels, and added the purple robes which the slain monarchs had worn, being the first indication of purple as a royal color. The earrings alone weighed 1,700 shekels, equal to seventy-four pounds four ounces, and worth, at the present value of gold, about £3,300, or $16,500.

(10) Remaining Deeds and Death. With this 'Gideon made an ephod, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah; and all Israel went thither a whoring after it; which thing became a snare unto Gideon and to his house.' An ephod, at least that of the high-priest, was an outer garment like a sleeveless tunic, to which was attached the oracular breast-plate, composed of twelve precious stones set in gold, and graven with the names of the twelve tribes. Another plainer description of ephod was worn by the common priests. The object of Gideon in making an ephod with his treasure is not very clear. Some suppose that it was merely designed as a trophy of Israel's deliverance; if so, it was a very strange one. It is more probable that as Gideon had, on his being first called to his high mission, been instructed to build an altar and offer sacrifice at this very place, he conceived himself authorized, if not required, to have there a sacerdotal establishment—for at least the tribes beyond the river—where sacrifices might be regularly offered. In this case the worship rendered there was doubtless in honor of Jehovah, but was still, however well intended, highly schismatical and irregular. Even in his lifetime it must have had the effect of withdrawing the attention of the people east of the Jordan from the Tabernacle at Shiloh, and thus so far tended to facilitate the step into actual idolatry, which was taken soon after Gideon's death. The probability of this explanation is strengthened when we recollect the schismatical sacerdotal establishments which were formed by Micah on Mount Ephraim, and by the Danites at Laish (Judg. xvii:5-13; xviii:29-31).

The remainder of Gideon's life was peaceable. He had seventy sons by many wives, and died at an advanced age, after he had 'ruled Israel' (principally the northern tribes and those beyond the river) for forty years (B. C. about 1100 to 1080.) He is mentioned in the discourse of Samuel (1 Sam. xii:11), and his name occurs in Heb. xi:32, among those of the heroes of the faith.

GIDEONI (gid'e-ō'nī), (Heb. גִּדְוֹנִי, ghid-o-nee', warlike).

The father of Abidam, who was chief in the tribe of Benjamin at the time of the taking of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i:11; ii:22; vii:60, 65; x:24). (B. C. about 1220.)

GIDOM (gi'dōm), (Heb. גִּדּוֹם, ghid-ohm' a cutting down, desolating), a place to which Benjamin went in pursuit after the battle of Gibeah (Judg. xx:15). It is evidently situated between Gibeah (Tul-el-Ful) and the cliff Rimmon; but no trace of it has been found.

GIER-EAGLE (jēr'e'g'l), (The A. V. uses this term for Heb. גִּירָא, raw-khawm', Pharaoh's chicken, Neophron percnopterus. R. V. uses it for גִּירָא, peh'res, which may be translated ossifrage).

An unclean bird mentioned in Lev. xi:18; Deut. xiv:17. This is probably the racham of the Arabs or the Egyptian vulture (neophron percnopterus), a bird of disgusting appearance and habits; but a faithful scavenger. (Shaw, Travels, p. 388; Russell, Natural Hist. of Aleppo, ii:195, 2d ed.)

GIFT (gift), the translation of several Hebrew and Greek terms.

1. From the Hebrew root נָתַן (naw-than') we have words, meaning a gratuity (Prov. xix:6); to secure favor (Prov. xviii:16; xxi:14), in religious thankfulness (Num. xviii:11), or in dowry (Gen. xxxiv:12), in inheritance (Gen. xxv:6; 2 Chron. xxi:3; Ezek. xlvi:16, 17), or as a bribe (Prov. xv:27).

2. From the Heb. נָסַח (naw-saw', to raise) we have terms expressive of pecuniary assistance (Esth. ii:18) and of a present in token of respect (2 Sam. xix:42).

3. More distinctly in the sense of a votive offering is min-khaw' (Heb. מִינ־כַּחֵן), an oblation or propitiatory gift (2 Sam. viii:2, 6; 1 Chron. xviii:2, 6, etc.), and in several other passages where the word has the accessory idea of tribute elsewhere usually rendered offering.

4. Other words are mercenary in character. Thus show'khad (Heb. שְׂכָר) is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment presented either to a judge (Exod. xxiii:8; Deut. x:17) or to a conqueror (2 Kings xvi:8).

5. In Greek the usual terms are generally derived from δίδωμι (did'o-mee, to give), and have a very wide meaning as did the Hebrew. (Mc. & Str. Cyc.)

6. There are specific uses of the term as follows: (1) Christ is the unspeakable gift of God; his excellence, usefulness, and fullness of office, righteousness, and salvation, cannot be expressed or conceived by any creature; and God freely gave him for us as our ransom, and gives him to us as our husband and portion (2 Cor. ix:15). (2) His righteousness and the benefits purchased by it, are the free gift, and gift of righteousness (Rom. v:15-17). (3) The Holy Ghost, and his miraculous influences, are the gift of God (Acts viii:20). Eternal life, offices in the church, and qualifications for the discharge of them, and every saving blessing are represented as gifts. Such of them as are necessarily connected with union to Christ are gifts given to his children, never to be recalled; and such as are separable from real grace are gifts given to servants to be recalled (Rom. vi:23; Jam. i:17; Ps. lxxviii:18; Eph. ii:8; iv:8; Ezek. xlvi:16, 17; Rom. xi:29; 1 Cor. xii:1, 4, 9, 31, and xiv:1, 12; Heb. vi:4).

GIFT OF TONGUES. An ability given by the Holy Spirit to the apostles and others, of readily and intelligibly speaking a variety of languages which they had never learned. This was a glorious and decisive attestation to the gospel, as well as a suitable, and indeed, in their circumstances, a necessary qualification for the mission for which the apostles and their coadjutors were designed. Nor is there any reason to understand it as merely an occasional gift so that a person might speak a language most fluently one hour, and be entirely ignorant of it the next; which neither agrees with what is said of the abuse of it, nor would it have been sufficient to answer the end proposed (Acts ii). Some appear to have been gifted with one tongue, others with more. To St. Paul this endowment was vouchsafed in a more liberal degree, than to many others; for, as to the Corinthians, who had received the gift of tongues, he says, "that he spake with tongues more than they all."

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL (gifts, spir'it-ū-al), (Gr. χαρίσματα, khar-is'mah-tah, gifts of grace).

1. Charismata means those "graces" which are the effects of grace; that is of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, consequent on the ascension of our Lord into heaven,—all, properly speaking, subjective: yet St. Paul calls the pardon of sin in one place (Rom. v:15), and eternal life in another (ib. vi:23), a "charisma;" that is, a gracious or free gift on the part of God through Christ.

2. Again, subjective graces have been distinguished into two classes: (1) those conferring mere power (gratiae gratis datae); and (2) those which affect the character (gratiae gratum facientes). The locus classicus for both is 1 Cor. xii to the end of ch. xiv (on which see Bloomfield, Alford, Cornelius à Lapide, and others), where they are thrown together without much system or classification.

(a) Of the former class, some were neither permanent nor universal, as the gift of healing: others, as for instance, that which he affirms elsewhere to be in Timothy by the laying on of his hands (2 Tim. i:6; comp. 1 Pet. iv:10); in other words, the gift conferred upon all ministers of the gospel at their ordination, fitting them for their respective posts, were permanent, but not universal. Both were bestowed primarily for the edification of the whole body; not but that it would fare better or worse with each individual possessed of them according to the way in which they were used. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man, to profit withal."

(b) Of the latter class all were permanent and universal, being designed primarily for individual sanctification; all had them therefore without exception; and anybody might double or quadruple his share of them by his own exertions. Where they lay dormant in any, the fault was his own. Wherever they were cultivated, they would bring forth, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundredfold.

(c) "Follow after charity," says the Apostle. Then, in substance, he goes on to say: This is a gift of the same character with faith and hope, permanent and bestowed on all. Therefore the degree to which you may become possessed of it rests with yourselves. As you follow after it, so you will obtain it. For those gifts which are not given to all you can only pray; still I enjoin you to pray; and of these "pray rather that ye may prophesy;" in other words that ye may "understand the scriptures" (compare Luke xxiv:45), and be able to interpret them for the benefit of others, as well as your own;—a gift which is permanent, and for the good of all, like charity. Of ordinary gifts, I have devoted a whole chapter to show that charity should occupy the first place: of extraordinary gifts, I proceed to show in the ensuing chapter my reasons for considering prophecy, taken in its widest sense, to be first also; one is for practice, the other for information: to understand the scriptures, and to act upon them aright, for general as well as for private profit and edification, is to fulfill every purpose for which grace is vouchsafed.

(d) Prophecy, therefore, will mean here the gift of expounding, rather than of foretelling (Corn. à Lap. ad. l.), and to the nine extraordinary "charismata" set down here, correspond the nine ordinary, described as "the fruit of the Spirit," in the Epistle to the Galatians (v:22). To these last three more have been added, making twelve in all; while faith, hope, and charity have been contrariwise classified by themselves as the three theological virtues. E. S. F.

(e) Concerning spiritual gifts Cremer says: "Their number is as various as the needs of the Church, and neither the enumeration of 1 Cor. xii, nor of Eph. iv, nor Rom. xii can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the 'gift of proclaiming the gospel so as to produce faith' (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition." (See article in Schaff-Herzog.)

GIHON (gi'hôn), (Heb. גִּיחֹן, ghee-khone').

1. A fountain near Jerusalem. The place outside the city to which the young Solomon was taken to be anointed king was called Gihon, but its direction is not indicated (1 Kings i:33, 38). Subsequently King Hezekiah 'stopped the upper water-course (or upper out-flow of the waters) of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David (2 Chron. xxxii:30; xxxiii:14). This was, perhaps, on occasion of the approach of the Assyrian army under Sennacherib, when, to prevent the besiegers from finding water, great numbers of the people labored with much diligence in stopping the water of the fountains without the city, and in particular of 'the brook that ran through the midst of the land' (2 Chron. xxxii:3, 4). The author of the book of Sirach (xlviii:17) also states, that 'Hezekiah brought water into the midst of the city; he dug with iron into the rock, and built fountains for the waters.' The fountain of Gihon is also mentioned by Josephus. From a comparison of these passages the conclusion has been reached, since confirmed by Dr. Robinson (Researches, i. 313), that there existed anciently a fountain of Gihon, on the west side of the city, which was 'stopped' or covered over by Hezekiah, and its waters brought by subterranean channels into the city. Before that time it would naturally have flowed down through the valley of Gihon, and probably formed the brook which was stopped at the same time. Captain Sir Charles Warren claimed to have traced the diverted water course and secured the stone plug, twelve inches in length, with which the drain was stopped (see Harper, Bible and Mod. Disc.) The fountain may have been stopped, and its waters thus secured very easily by digging deep and erecting over it one or more vaulted subterranean chambers.

2. Upper Gihon is commonly identified with Birket Mamilla, and lower Gihon with Birket es-Sultan. The former of these pools is less than half a mile west, the latter not the third of a mile south, of the Jaffa gate. These pools, however, are not now fed by living springs. Largely on this account the question has been raised in recent years whether Gihon should not be identified with the fountain of the Virgin, on the eastern slope of Ophel, and distant some 400 yards from the pool of Siloam, with which it is connected by an ancient tunnel. (Comp. Robinson's Researches, i. 352, 512-514. Thomson, The Land and the Book, vol. ii. pp. 494-523, 526-7.)

3. The name of one of the rivers of Paradise. (See PARADISE.)

GILALAI (gil'al-lāi), (Heb. גִּילְלָי, ghil-al-lah'ee, duncy or weighty), one of a number of priests' sons, who played an instrument in the company under Ezra at the time the wall of Jerusalem was consecrated (Neh. xii:36), B. C. 446.

GILBOA (gil-bō'á), (Heb. גִּלְבֹּעַ, ghil-bo'ah, bubbling fountain), a mountain memorable for the defeat of Saul by the Philistines, where his three sons were slain, and where he himself died by his own hand (1 Sam. xxviii:4; xxxi:1-8; 2 Sam. i:6-21).

The circumstances of the narrative would alone suffice to direct our attention to the mountains which bound the great plain of Esdraelon on the southeast, and are interposed between it and the Jordan valley. Here there are a number of ridges, with a general direction from northwest to southeast, separated by valleys running in the same direction. The largest of these valleys is the southernmost: it is a broad deep plain about two miles and a half wide, and leading direct into the Jordan valley. This is supposed to be distinctively (for the plain of Esdraelon is sometimes so called) the Valley of Jezreel. The mountains which bound it on the north appear to be those of Little Hermon; and the higher mountains which bound it on the south undoubtedly form Mount Gilboa. There is still, indeed, an inhabited village, in whose name of Jelbon that of Gilboa may be recognized. (Van de Velde, Travels in S. and P. ii. 368 ff.; Porter, Handbook, ii. 355 ff.; Thomson, The Land and the Book.)

GILEAD (gīl'e-ad), (Heb. גִּלְעָד, ghil-aw'd, mound of witness).

1. Mountain Range. A group of mountains connected with Lebanon by means of Mount Hermon. It begins not far from the latter, and extends southward to the sources of the brooks Jabbok and Arnon, thus enclosing the whole eastern part of the land beyond the Jordan (Gen. xxxi:21; Cant. iv:1). According to Michaelis (Mos. Recht, i. 86), this mountain, which gave its name to the country so called, must be situated beyond the region sketched in our maps, and somewhere about the Euphrates.

2. Beyond the Jordan. (a) The name of a large district beyond the Jordan, continually mentioned in the Scriptures in contradistinction to, or apart from, Bashan (Deut. iii:13; Josh. xii:5; xiii:11; xvii:1; 2 Kings x:33; 1 Chron. v:16; Mic. vii:14); though, to judge from its geographical position (as given Num. xxxii:26; Deut. iii:12), it must have comprised the entire possessions of the two tribes of Gad and Reuben, and even the southern part of Manasseh (Deut. iii:13; Num. xxxii:40; Josh. xvii:1-6). The cities Ramoth, Jabesh, and Jazer, are usually designated as lying in Gilead.

This region was distinguished for its rich pastures (Num. xxxii:1) and aromatic simples; from which latter different sorts of balsam were prepared—facts confirmed by modern travelers, Seetzen, Burckhardt, etc., with the addition that the whole region is covered with groups of limestone mountains, intersected by fertile valleys.

(b) The name of the whole eastern part of the Jordan (Deut. xxxiv:1; comp. 2 Kings x:33; Judg. xx:1). The name Gilead continued to be used, in a general and geographical sense, even after the exile (1 Macc. v, etc.). Josephus (Antiq. xiii:13, 5) designates it as a part of Arabia, while its special and topographical name was Peræa.

3. A City. A city of this name is apparently mentioned Hos. vi:8; so, at least, it is given in most of the ancient and modern versions, though the meaning may only be that Gilead is (like) a city full of iniquity, i. e. a union of iniquitous people.

GILEAD (Heb. as above).

1. Son of Machir (Num. xxvi:29, 30). (B. C. between 1874 and 1668.)

2. Father of Jephthah (Judg. xi:1, 2). Perhaps the name is used as a personification of a community (verses 7, 8). (B. C. before 1256.)

3. A descendant of Gad, and ancestor of the Gadites of Bashan (1 Chron. v:14). (B. C. before 781.) E. M.

GILEAD and BASHAN (gīl'e-ad and bā'shan), as connected with the pre-Mosaic Manassite conquest.

(1) Legal Rights of Women. "Then came the daughters of Zelophehad . . . and they stood before Moses . . . saying, 'Our father died in the wilderness . . . and had no sons . . . Give us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father.' And Moses brought their case before the Lord. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 'The daughters of Zelophehad speak right. Thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them'" (Num. xxvii:1-8). This decision became the basis of a law in Israel in relation to the rights of daughters. The incident of these heiresses occurs in the tribe of Manasseh, after the later of the two "numberings," and this "numbering" had shown that the tribe of Manasseh had an increase of more than thirty-three per cent. over the highest increase which had been shown by any other tribe.

(2) Pre-Mosaic Share of Manasseh. The claim of the heirs and the great increase of this tribe seem both to have resulted from the same antecedent, and this antecedent was the conquest and annexation of the kingdoms of Sihon and Og.

In that conquest it seems evident that the tribe of Manasseh had a pre-Mosaic share. Immediately after that conquest, Moses received a request from the two preëminently pastoral tribes Gad and Reuben only, to be allowed to settle in the newly acquired territory. Their wish was granted on the ground of their possession of "much cattle," but in that concession is also included "the half tribe of Manasseh," although no petition seems to have come from the leaders of this tribe. The request comes from two tribes, and the concession is made to two and a half. The half of Mount Gilead and all of Bashan, the kingdom of Og being awarded to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii:13). In connection with this allotment it will be noted that "the inheritance of their fathers" which is awarded to the daughters is spoken of as if it were ready for them, not future, but waiting to be filled. It appears that there was some clearly established title which was so well known at the time as not to require any explanation; and what could the Manassite title to eastern territory be founded upon, if not upon pre-Mosaic conquests?

The name of Gilead which is borne by a portion of the country is another very significant point. Gilead was the third in descent from Joseph, Manasseh being his grandfather, and the "sons of Gilead" in Num. xxvi:30 appear as "male children of Manasseh." If on the older historical theory that the Manassite line shared the oppression in Egypt, went out at the Exodus, and merely took part in the Sihon-Og campaign with the rest of Israel, how can we account for the fact that this region bears the name of a Manassite prince who had been dead long ago and was buried in Egypt?

But suppose Machir, the grandson of Joseph and his heir by adoption, to have led a victorious settlement north eastward from the Egyptian frontier, with all of his grandfather's Egyptian influence to second him, and we can see at once why his eldest son should share the name of the region which he first won by conquest. This would be similar to the case of Cain who called "the name of the city" which "he builded" after "the name of his son Enoch" (Gen. iv:17).

We need not suppose that the whole of the region of Gilead and Bashan had been previously won and held by Machir and his sons, but merely that so far as those areas had been conquered, the achievement had been Manassite.

There is an old pæan of victory recorded in Num. xxi. Verse 27 is the beginning of the exultation of Sihon the Amorite over Moab, but later comes the triumph of Israel over Sihon. Sihon and his people were exterminated (Deut. ii:34). How then was this Amorite pæan preserved? The conquered Moabites would not have treasured up Sihon's song of victory over them and passed it on to the Israelites, of whom they had a fear and a jealousy (Num. xxii:4). But if there was a Manassite settlement there which had witnessed the crushing defeat of Moab, and heard the song on the lips of the victorious Amorites, the whole difficulty vanishes.

(3) Points in Deuteronomic Law. There are some points in Deuteronomic law which may be considered in connection with this matter: It has often been urged against the law of "the landmark" and the curse against who "removes" it, and especially in reference to the phrase "which they of old time have set in thine inheritance," that such a law implies the long settled habits of land in traditional possession, and therefore is inconsistent with legislation for lands which are yet to be won.

But suppose that the Manassites were resuming their heritage, from which they had been temporarily expelled by the Amorites, and with all the old landmarks still in place, and we have exactly the situation of all others to call for such a law. (See LANDMARK.)

The same or nearly so, may be said of the law forbidding usury (Deut. xxiii:19-20) between Israelites but permitting it towards aliens. The situation is that of nearly one third of the nation newly and suddenly settled by conquest, while the remainder has its heritage yet to win. All the available capital of this remainder might be employed by the newly settled portion; while the alien races with whom Israel had been brought into contact, Edom, Moab and Ammon offered a similar field for loans with interest. Eastern Manasseh having the advantage of earlier possession and domestication on the spot might readily avail themselves of this condition. Thus if ever a law in reference to usury was necessary it would be now.

(4) Property Regranted to Heirs of Early Owners. The conquests of Sihon and Og must have narrowed or absorbed the Machir-Jair territory, but the earlier settlement of this people is indicated in Num. xxxii:34. We are there told that the Gadites and Reubenites "build" (perhaps rebuild after the havoc of war) certain cities, but no such thing is said of the Manassites, only their conquests are recited. The Manassites probably did not rebuild, because their cities were not destroyed, they, the former owners being present on the spot to reclaim their lost ownership.

Thus what Moses did was to regrant, either the whole, or a large part of the earlier Manassite area to the posterity of Machir and Gilead. And thus the Mosaic and the Joshuan narratives harmonize with each other and all obscurities are cleared as soon as we comprehend the fact of this earlier conquest.

(5) Testimony of Jephthah. A little later we find Jephthah "the Gileadite" arguing with the children of Ammon, and claiming that for three hundred years "Israel dwelt in Heshbon and her towns, and in Aroer and her towns, and in all the cities that be along by the coasts of Arnon" (Judg. xi:26). And this was a portion of the very region which Moses had obtained by the Sihon-Og conquest. We read in Judges xi:1, that "Gilead begat Jephthah" and Jephthah would of course have kept the tradition of his fathers.

(6) The Song of Deborah. The designation of the great elder branch of Joseph's house by its sub-patriarch Machir is confirmed by that early document, the Song of Deborah (Judg. v:14-17). When "Gilead abode beyond Jordan," and Reuben hesitated, "out of Machir there came down chieftains" to aid the cause of western patriotism. Machir dominates the western, and Gilead the eastern branch of the tribe, and they each held their own policy. This suggests that Machir ben-Manasseh never lost the supremacy of his whole tribe. Having established his son in "the Gilead" and given him its name, he may have returned to Goshen.

(7) Havoth-Jair of Bashan. We now see why Moses in Deut. iii:14 speaks of the "Havoth-Jair of Bashan" being so called "unto this day," a phrase singularly frigid, if the whole series of events concerned had happened since the death of Aaron, and one which has furnished an opportunity for the "higher criticism" to impugn a Mosaic Deuteronomy, but the phrase recovers its suspended animation the moment the light of rectified history falls upon it.

(8) Reunion of a Severed Tribe. We also see now why the total of the Manassite tribe jumps up sixty-three and more per cent. at the second census (Num. xxvi:34, 35). It was evidently by the reunion of long severed members.

(9) Machir. We see also why Machir becomes an eponymous hero, and why he is singled out and erected into a patriarchal status in Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua and Judges. He was in fact the morning star of eastern conquest, precluding the brilliant campaign of Moses and in his posterity conducting to its completeness. In the case of Zelophehad's daughters, they claimed to represent and embody the title of descent from Machir, Gilead and Hephher to a heritage which had come down through some two centuries of user, and had only been interrupted through an intrusive hostile possession. That intrusion having ceased, their patrimony lies before them in concrete fact, and they claim to be invested with it. On its settlement in their favor follows the further one of limiting their right of matrimonial choice (Num. xxxvi:6).

(10) Conclusion. The case emerges exactly where we ought to find it, if the main lines of the Exodus history are true. The numbering of Numbers xxvi brought the main stock and the dissevered branch of "Joseph" together in conscious unity. The latter comes into touch with the hopes and fortunes of Israel as a whole; and therefore the question is settled, not by any court of mere tribal elders, but by the highest jurisdiction of the nation now realizing its corporate capacity. The broad side light thus shed on the narrative of the ensuing Joshuan occupation cannot be without important exegetical influence as we read, for indeed it is shed from a lost page of patriarchal history. (See Gilead and Bashan, or the Pre-Mosaic Manassite Conquest, by Henry Hayman, D. D., Bibliotheca Sacra, Jan., 1898.)

GILEADITES, THE (gīl'e-ad-ites), (Heb. גִּלְעָדִים gīl-aw-dee'), descendants of Gilead who formed a branch of the tribe of Manasseh (Judg. xii:4, 5; x:3; 2 Sam. xvii:27; xix:31; 1 Kings ii:7; Ezra ii:61; Neh. vii:63). They had a long standing feud apparently with the Ephraimites (Judg. xii:4).

GILGAL (gil'gäl), (Heb. גִּלְגָּל, ghil-gaw', circle, wheel).

1. The place where the Israelites formed their first encampment in Palestine, and which continued for some time to be their headquarters while engaged in the conquest of the land (Josh. iv:19, 20; ix:6; x:6, 7, etc.). It was here that they set up the twelve stones which they took out of the bed of the Jordan (iv:19). (See STONES.) It is uncertain whether this town or another place of the name was on Samuel's circuit (1 Sam. vii:16), and where, it may be judged, Saul, the opposition to him having ceased, was made king and the kingdom renewed (xi:15). At any rate, it was at Gilgal in the Jordan valley where a muster of the people took place to form an army which should encounter the Philistines then oppressing the land, when Saul, finding it difficult to hold the people together until Samuel should come and offer sacrifice, himself offered burnt offerings (xiii:4, 7, 8; comp. 12-15). For his disobedience the forfeiture of his kingdom was announced to him (13, 14). There, too, Saul incurred a second rebuke for his disobedience in sparing Agag (xv:12, 21, 33; comp. 34). It was to Gilgal also that the representatives of the tribe of Judah went to welcome David back after the death of Absalom (2 Sam. xix:15, 40). Like other holy places, it became a focus of idolatry under the kings who succeeded Jeroboam, and it was in consequence denounced by the prophets (Hos. iv:15; ix:15; xii:11; Amos iv:4; v:5). It is probably the house of Gilgal or Bethgilgal mentioned after the captivity (Neh. xii:29). Its site is Jiljülieh, a ruin two miles east of Jericho. (Davis, Dict. of the Bible.)

2. A place in the region of Dor, whose king was subdued by Joshua (Josh. xii:23). The Gilgal of Neh. xii:29, and 1 Macc. ix:2, is probably the same as this; as well as the ancient Galgala, which Eusebius and Jerome place six Roman miles north of Antipatris. In this neighborhood there is still a village called Jiljülieh, which probably represents the ancient site.

3. A place on the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv:7). In the parallel list of Josh. xviii:17, it is given as Geliloth, probably Jiljülieh, a little north of the brook Kánah, and five miles north-east by north of Antipatris.

4. The place where Elisha worked the miracle of healing on the poisonous pottage (2 Kings iv:38). It was also the last scene of the life of Elijah. There is a ruin fifteen miles from Diospolis, called Jiljülieh, which probably marks the location of the ancient Gilgal. (See Van de Velde's Map, and Rob. iii:139.)

GILOH (gi'loh), (Heb. גִּלּוֹה, ghee-lo', exile), a city of Judah (Josh. xv:51). It was the native place of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv:12), and to which he returned to take his life (2 Sam. xvii:23).

GILONITE, THE (gi'lo-nite), (Heb. גִּלּוֹנִי, ghee-lo-nee'), a native of Giloh, used only of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv:12; xxiii:34).

GIMEL (gi'mäl or gim-äl), (Heb. גִּמֵּל).

The third letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The Greek letter gamma, and consequently the English C have the same origin; but in the spelling of Hebrew and Greek names in the English versions, gimel and gamma (though not these letters only) are represented by G, their approximate equivalent in sound and a form fabricated out of C.

Gimel stands at the head of the third section of Ps. cxix in several versions, since each verse of the section begins with this letter in the original. (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

GIMZO (gim'zo), (Heb. גִּמְצוֹ, ghim-zo', a place fertile in sycamores), a city in the south of Judah, which the Philistines took from Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii:18). The name remains in the modern Jimzu, two and a half miles south of Lydda (Rob. ii:249).

GIN (jin), an old English word for trap, which is represented by two Hebrew words.

1. Mo-kashe' (Heb. מַכְשֵׁה, a noose or "snare," as elsewhere rendered (Ps. cxl:5; Amos iii:5).

2. Pakh (Heb. פַּחַי, a plate of metal, hence a trap (Job xviii:9; Is. viii:14); elsewhere "snare."

GINATH (gi'nath), (Heb. גִּנְתִּי, ghee-nath', derivation uncertain), father of Tibni, who disputed with Omri for the Kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xvi:21, 22), B. C. before 926.

GINNETHO (gin-ne-thō), (Heb. same as GINNETHON), one of the heads of the priests who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:4), B. C. 536-410.

GINNETHON (gin'ne-thōn), (Heb. גִּנְתָּוֹן, ghin-neth-one', a gardener), one of the priests who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:6). He was head of a family of which a member is mentioned at a late period (Neh. xii:16). Probably the same as Ginnetho.

GIRDLE (gēr'dl). See ARMS; ARMOR; DRESS; PRIEST, HEBREW PRIESTHOOD; ABNET.

Figurative. (1) God's girding himself imports his giving noted displays of his almighty power, and his readiness to act (Ps. xciii:1 and xlv:3). (2) His girding others with strength or gladness is his exciting and enabling them to do great exploits, and his filling their hearts with joy and pleasure (Ps. xviii:32, 39, and xxx:11). (3) He girded Cyrus; encouraged and enabled him to conquer the nations (Is. xlv:5); but he looses the bond of kings, and girds their loins with a girdle, when he strips them of their power and authority, and reduces them to the condition of servants (Job xii:18). (4) Christ's love, power, equity, and faithfulness are the girdle of his breast or loins, whereby he is qualified for the discharge of his priestly and kingly office; and whereby we hold him by faith (Is. xi:5; Dan. x:5; Rev. i:13). (5) The Jews are likened to a linen girdle hid in the bank of the river Euphrates, and marred: after God had caused them to cleave to him by covenant, by profession, and receipt of special favors, he, for their sins, marred them; and by the Chaldean troops, and in the Chaldean captivity, reduced them to a very low condition (Jer. xiii:1-14). (6) The saints have their loins girded when they are in constant readiness to receive God's gracious favors, and obey his laws (Luke xii:35; 1 Pet. i:13). (7) Their loins are girt about with truth, when they are thoroughly established in the faith and experience of Divine truth; are filled with inward candor and sincerity; and pay an exact regard to their promises and vows; how excellently this qualifies them to fight the Lord's battles (Eph. vi:14). (8) The seven angels that pour out destructive vials on Antichrist are girded with golden girdles; they are fully furnished with strength and courage, and are ready for and zealous in their work (Rev. xv:6).

GIRGASHITES (gir'ga-shites), (Heb. גִּרְגָּשִׁי, hag-ghir-gaw-shee', "the Girgashite"), one of the families of Canaan, who are supposed to have been settled in that part of the country which lay to the east of the Lake of Gennesaret.

The Girgashites are conjectured to have been a part of the large family of the Hivites, as they are omitted in nine out of ten places in which the nations or families of Canaan are mentioned, while in the tenth they are mentioned, and the Hivites omitted. Josephus states that nothing but the name of the Girgashites remained in his time (Antiq. i. 6, 2). In the Jewish Commentaries of R. Nachman, and elsewhere, the Girgashites are described as having retired into Africa, fearing the power of God. The notion that the Girgashites did migrate seems to have been founded on the circumstance that, although they are included in the list of the seven devoted nations either to be driven out or destroyed by the Israelites (Gen. xv:20, 21; Deut. vii:1; Josh. iii:10; xxiv:11), yet they are omitted in the list of those to be utterly destroyed (Deut. xx:17), and are mentioned among those with whom, contrary to the Divine decree, the Israelites lived and intermarried (Judg. iii:1-6). "The Girgashite" as an appellation of the fifth son of Canaan (Gen. x:16). Elsewhere the term is tribal.

GIRL (gērl), (Heb. יָלֵדָה, yal-daw', literally, one born), in the ordinary sense (Joel iii:3; Zech. viii:5), a marriageable girl was called "damsel" (Gen. xxxiv:14).

GISPA (gīs'pa), (Heb. גִּישְׁפָּא, ghish-paw'), an overseer of the Nethinims after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi:21), B. C. 446.

GITTAH-HEPHER (gīt'tah-hē'pher), (Heb. גִּתְיָהוּפְהֵר, ghit-taw-khay'fer, Josh. xix:13). See GATH-HEPHER.

GITTAIM (gīt'ta'im or gīt-tā'im), (Heb. גִּתְיָיִם, ghit-tah'yim, two vinepresses), a place to which the inhabitants of Beeroth fled for refuge apparently (2 Sam. iv:3). Beeroth was a town of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix:17), and the cause of the flight may have been the persecutions of Saul (2 Sam. xxi:2).

GITTITES (gīt'tites), (Heb. גִּתִּי, ghit-tec'), inhabitants or natives of Gath (Josh. xiii:3). Obededom, although a Levite, is called a Gittite (2 Sam. vi:10), possibly because he had been with David when at Gath, but much more probably from his being a native of Gath-rimmon, which was a city of the Levites.

There seems no reason for extending this interpretation to Ittai (2 Sam. xv:19), seeing that David expressly calls him 'a stranger' (foreigner), and, what is more, 'an exile.' He was at the head of 600 men, who were also Gittites, for they are called (verse 22) his 'brethren.' They appear to have formed a foreign troop of experienced warriors, chiefly from Gath, in the pay and service of David; which they had perhaps entered in the first instance for the sake of sharing in the booty obtainable in his wars. We can conceive that the presence of such a troop must have been useful to the king in giving to the Hebrew army that organization and discipline which it did not possess before his time.

GITTITH (gīt'tith), (Heb. גִּתִּית, hag-git-teeth'), a word which occurs in the title of Ps. viii., lxxxiv. (See PSALMS, BOOK OF.)

The conjectures of interpreters as to its import are various. Some think it signifies a sort of musical instrument, invented at Gath; others that the Psalms with this title were sung during the vintage. The word Gath, from which this is the feminine gentile form, signifies wine-press

GIZONITE, THE (g'zo-mite), (Heb. גִּזוֹנִי, ghee-zo-nee'), an appellation of Hashem, whose sons belonged to David's guard (1 Chron. xi:34). No place of this name is known. Kennicott suggests that this name should be Gouni (Dissert. pp. 199-203).

GIZRITES (gīz'rītes). See GERZITES, THE.

GLASS (glās), (Heb. יִלְוֵי, ghil-law-yone', Is. iii:23), mirrors, polished metal plates.

(1) How Discovered. Glass, according to Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvi:26), was discovered by what is termed accident. Some merchants kindled a fire on that part of the coast of Phœnicia which lies near Ptolemais, between the foot of Carmel and Tyre, at a spot where the river Belus casts the fine sand which it brings down; but, as they were without the usual means of suspending their cooking vessels, they employed for that purpose logs of niter, their vessel being laden with that substance; the fire fusing the niter and the sand produced glass. The Sidonians, in whose vicinity the discovery was made, took it up, and having in process of time carried the art to a high degree of excellence, gained thereby both wealth and fame. Other nations became their pupils; the Romans especially attained to very high skill in the art of fusing, blowing, and coloring glass.

(2) Known to the Egyptians. Wilkinson, in his Ancient Egyptians (iii:88, sq.), has adduced the fullest evidence that glass was known to and made by the Egyptian people at a very early period of their national existence. Upward of 3,500 years ago, in the reign of the first Osirtasen, they appear to have practiced the art of blowing glass. The process is represented in the paintings of Beni Hassan, executed in the reign of that monarch. In the same age images of glazed pottery were common. Ornaments of glass were made by them about 1,500 years B. C.; for a bead of that date has been found, being of the same specific gravity as that of our crown glass. Many glass bottles, etc., have been met with in the tombs, some of very remote antiquity. Glass vases were used for holding wine as early as the exodus. Such was the skill of the Egyptians in this manufacture, that they successfully counterfeited the amethyst, and other precious stones. It was sometimes used by the Egyptians even for coffins. They also employed it, not only for drinking utensils, and ornaments of the person, but for mosaic work, the figures of deities, and sacred emblems, attaining to exquisite workmanship, and a surprising brilliancy of color. The art too of cutting glass was known to them at the most remote periods; for which purpose, as we learn from Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii:4), the diamond was used. That the ancients had mirrors of glass is clear from the above cited words of Pliny; but the mirrors found in Egypt are made of mixed metal, chiefly copper. So admirably did the skill of the Egyptians succeed in the composition of metals, that their mirrors were susceptible of a polish which has been but partially revived at the present day. The mirror was nearly round, having a handle of wood, stone, or metal. The form varied with the taste of the owner. The same kind of metal mirror was used by the Israelites, who, doubtless, brought it from Egypt. In Exod. xxxviii:8, it is expressly said that Moses 'made the laver of brass of the looking-glasses (brazen mirrors) of the women.'

(3) Known to the Hebrews. It would be justifiable to suppose that the Hebrews brought glass, and a knowledge how to manufacture it, with them out of Egypt, were not the evidence of history so explicit that it was actually discovered and wrought at their own doors. Whether it was used by them for mirrors is another question. That glass, however, was known to the Hebrews appears beyond a doubt. In Job xxviii: 17, זְכֵּה, zek-oo-keeth, is believed to mean glass, though it is rendered 'crystal' in the English Version.

(4) New Testament References. In Rev. xxi:18, we read 'The city was pure gold, like unto clear glass;' ver. 21, 'as it were transparent glass' (compare c. iv:6). 'Molten glass' also occurs in Job xxxviii:18, but the original is Heb. רָוֹדֵד, raw-deed, 'spreading. Winer, referring to Beckman (Beitrag zur Gesch. der Erfindung, iii: 319), expressly denies that glass mirrors were known till the thirteenth century—adding that they are still seldom seen in the East. That in the New Testament a mirror is intended in Jam. i:23, 'beholding his natural face in a glass,' appears certain; but the signification of the other passage in which the word ἐσόπτρον, mirror, occurs, is by no means so clear. If by ἐσόπτρον a metal mirror is to be understood, the language employed is not without difficulties. The preposition διά, 'through,' is in such a case improper; 'face to face' presents an equally improper contrast, for in a mirror 'face answers to face' (Prov. xxvii:19). So the general import of the passage seems to require an imperfectly transparent medium, through which objects are beheld. It may have been the lapis specularis, or a kind of talc, of which the ancients made their windows. This opinion is confirmed by Schleusner, who says that the Jews used a similar mode of expression to describe a dim and imperfect view of mental objects. J. R. B.

There are instances, however, both in the classic Greek of Sophocles and Xenophon, and often in the Greek of the New Testament, wherein dia means by means of, and expresses mere instrumentality. See Acts xx:28; Eph. i:7; Col. i:22; Heb. ix:26; many more may be cited.

Figurative. The figurative use of glass already referred to may be further amplified as follows: (1) The word and ordinances of God are a glass; in them we see our own sins, wants, or graces; have imperfect views of Jesus and his Father, and of eternal things, and have our heart warmed by them (Jam. i:23, 25; 2 Cor. iii:18). (2) When the ceremonial and gospel ordinances are compared, the former are called a shadow, which gives a very imperfect view of the thing represented; but the latter are called a glass, in which we see spiritual things much more clearly (Col. ii:17; Heb. x:1; 2 Cor. iii:18). (3) The new Jerusalem is like unto transparent glass, for its beauty and glory, and the delightful views of Divine things enjoyed in it (Rev. xxi:18, 21). (4) The sea of glass mingled with fire before the throne of God, on which the saints stand, may denote the righteousness of Jesus mingled with flaming love and fiery sufferings, and which indeed is the support and encouragement of the saints before God; or the glorious gospel, attended with the influences of the Holy Ghost, to uphold and embolden them; or a pure and holy church actuated with burning zeal for the glory of God (Rev. iv:6, and xv:2).

GLEAN (glēn), (Heb. לָקַח, law-kat, 'to pick up; לָקַח, aw-lal).

The Hebrews were not permitted to go over their trees or fields a second time, to gather the fruit or the grain, but were to leave the gleanings for the poor, the fatherless, and the widow (Lev. xix:10; xxiii:22; Deut. xxiv:21; Ruth ii:7, 8, 15; Judg. viii:2).

GLEDE (glēd), (Deut. xiv:13), is an obsolete name for the common kite, adopted in our version for קָדָה, raw-aw', or, as Gesenius thinks, קָדָה, dā'ah.

It is a species that rises to a towering height, hangs apparently motionless in the sky, and darts down with immense velocity; but the legs and claws being weak, it is cowardly, and feeds upon carrion, fish, insects, mice, and small birds. The bill of this species is dark; head and throat whitish, with brown streaks; body above dark gray brown, pale ferruginous below; tail but slightly forked; legs yellow. It is found in hieroglyphic paintings, colored with sufficient accuracy not to be mistaken. The other species, which may be held as the Milvus ater, is the black kite, Falco melanopterus, Daudin; Elanus Casius, Savigny; Falco Sounincensis, Lath.; Le Blac, Le Vaill., and Kouhich of the Arabs. It has the head, neck, and back dark rusty gray; scapulars bordered with rusty; wing-coverts and primaries black, the last-mentioned tipped with white; tail rusty gray above, white beneath; bill dark; legs yellow. The manners of both species are much the same; it is likely that they are equally abundant at Cairo, and spread into Palestine. (See HAWK.)

C. H. S.

GLISTER, GLISTERING (glis'tēr-ing), (Gr. ἐξασπάρτω, ex-as-trap'to), to be radiant (Luke ix: 29; compare 1 Chron. xxix:2).

The three verbs 'glisten,' 'glisten,' and 'glitter' come from the same Teutonic base, gli, to shine, 'glisten' being traced to the Scandinavian, 'glisten' and 'glisten' being apparently English in their earliest form. 'Glisten' is simply a frequentative form of 'glisten.' It has been superseded by the modern "glitter." "All that glistens is not gold" —Shakespeare.

GLORIFY (glō'rī-fi), (Heb. same as GLORY).

1. To make glorious or honorable, or to cause to appear so (John xii:28; xiii:31, 32; xv:8; xvii: 4, 5; xxi:19; Acts iii:13). In this view it particularly refers to the resurrection of Christ, and his ascension to the right hand of God (John vii:39; xii:16).

2. The change which shall pass upon believers at the general resurrection, and their admission into heaven (Rom. viii:17).

3. To glorify (1 Cor. vi:20) is to "show forth his praise" by obedience to his law. Thus the "heavens declare the glory of God" in obedience to the law of creation, and much more do men glorify him by willing obedience to the moral law (1 Cor. x:31; John xvii:5).

4. To glorify one's self is to claim or boast of honor not due to one (Heb. v:5, and Rev. xviii: 7).

GLORY (glō'rī), in the A. V. represents the Heb. word כָּבוֹד, kaw-bode', weight, and the Gr. δόξα, dox'ah.

Full details as to the various Hebrew words must be sought in the Hebrew lexicon or in commentaries on the various passages. Generally speaking, the English term is sufficiently clear from the context in spite of the number of the Hebrew words which it renders.

The appearances of what is termed 'the glory of Jehovah,' Sept. δόξα Κυρίου, the Shechinah of the Rabbins, so often referred to in the Old Testament, seem to have originated certain uses of the word, in the sense of light, and visible splendor and numerous applications of these senses among the Hellenistic writers. It is first distinctly called by this term in Exod. xvi:7, 10. It is described as being like a bright fire (Exod. xxiv:17), and as attended with a cloud (Exod. xl:34, 35). It is probable that the tradition of these phenomena influenced the representations of heathen poets, who so often describe the appearances of the deities as attended by a cloud, with a brightness in it (see Taubmann's Notes on Virgil). It is believed that the classical Greek writers never use δόξα in the sense of light or splendor. The nearest instance yet adduced is from Plutarch (Nicias, tom. i. p. 538, E), who speaks of 'the glory of Plato shining forth.' It answers very frequently, in the Sept., to the Hebrew Kawbode (Exod. xxiv:17, 40; xxxiv:35; Deut. v:24, etc.), down to the Captivity.

The following instances are offered of the Hellenistic uses, allusions, or applications of the word, originated by the events above mentioned: (1) Matt. vi:29, 'Solomon in all his glory; i. e. visible magnificence, as opposed to the clothing, called 'array' of the lilies. (2) 1 Cor. xv:41, 'the glory, i. e., luster, of the sun, moon, and stars.' (3) Jesus is called (Heb. i:3), ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, 'the effulgence of his (the Father's) glory,' an evident allusion to Ezek. x:4. (4) Rom. i:23, 'the glory of God' is 'the glorious form of God.' (5) 2 Thess. i:9, 'the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power.' (6) 1 Tim. vi:16, 'dwelling in light.' (7) 1 Cor. xi:7, 'man is the image and glory of God,' metonym, that which exhibits or reflects this glory, i. e., symbol, demonstrations. (8) Other events would also conduce to such peculiar uses of the word as the shining of the face of Moses (comp. Exod. xxxiv:29; 2 Cor. iii:7, 8; iv:6). (9) The splendor attending the appearance of angels, especially in later ages (Matt. xxviii:3, etc.). (10) The transfiguration of Jesus, in which it is said that Peter, James and John saw his glory (Luke ix:32; comp. John i:14; 2 Pet. i:17, 19). (See Macknight on Phil. iii:21.) (11) And since the appearances, etc., alluded to, are connected with the Deity, the Savior, angels, etc., the same word is also consistently adopted to denote the participation in the glory and blessedness of these beings which is reserved for the faithful. Col. iii:4, 'appear with him in glory;' 2 Cor. iv:17, 18; 2 Thess. ii:14, 'the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

Figurative and Analogical. (1) The Hebrew kawbode is susceptible of the various analogical meanings which are derived from its root, viz., 'to be heavy,' 'honored,' 'rich,' etc. (1) In Gen. xxxi:1, 'all this glory;' Is. x:3, 'your glory;' lxvi:12, 'the glory of the Gentiles,' all meaning wealth, abundance. (2) Ps. lxxix:9, 'the glory of thy name,' i. e. honor, reputation. (3) Is. xxxv:2; lx:13, comp. x:18, 'the glory of Lebanon,' i. e., ornament. (4) Is. viii:7, 'the king of Assyria and all his glory,' is rendered by Lowth 'and all his force.'

(2) To be heavy is the primary meaning of the root; hence kaw-bed means 'the liver,' the heaviest of all the viscera; just as the lungs, the lightest of all, are in our language called the lights (Taylor's Heb. Concord). In some passages it conveys the ideas of the ancients respecting the bodily seat of certain passions. Among others, they thought the liver to be the seat of anger and love. Thus Horace (Carm. i:13, 4), describing jealous anger or resentment—'Fervens difficile tumet jecur,'—'My burning liver swells with angry bile' (see notes of the Delphin edition. Comp. Persius, Sat. v:129; Juvenal, Sat. vi:647). Thus Ps. xvi:9, 'My heart is glad and' literally, 'my liver rejoiceth.' Gen. xlix:6, 'mine honor' is rendered by Sept. τὰ ἡπατὸ μου, 'my liver.' Lam. ii:11, is literally rendered by our translators 'My liver is poured upon the earth,' indicating violent grief.

(3) In some instances the literal rendering of the Hebrew idiom in our version is attended with obscurity. (1) 1 Sam. ii:8, 'throne of glory' is 'a glorious throne.' (2) Ps. xxiv:7, 8, 'the king of glory' is 'the glorious or majestic king.' (3) Ps. xxix:3, 'the God of glory' is 'the glorious God,' and is so rendered in the Prayer Book Version. (4) In the New Testament (Luke ii:9), 'the glory of the Lord shone,' is an extreme splendor (see also Acts vii:2). (5) In 1 Cor. ii:8, 'Lord of glory' is 'glorious or illustrious Lord.' (6) Rom. viii:18, 'spirit of God' and 'spirit of Christ,' are 'a godly and Christian spirit, temper, or disposition.' J. F. D.

GLUTTON (glüt'n), (Hebrew from זָלַל, zaw-lal, to shake, hence to be loose, morally), a debauchee, a voluptuary (Deut. xxi:20; Prov. xxiii:21; "riotous" in Prov. xxiii:20, xxviii:7. "Gluttonous" (Matt. xi:19; Luke vii:34) is a free or fast liver.

GNASH (nāsh), (Heb. רָצַח, khaw-rak', to grate the teeth; Gr. βρῦχω, broo'kho, "to gnash with the teeth," and "gnashing of teeth," are expressions denoting rage or sorrow (Job xvi:9; Lam. ii:16; Matt. viii:12; Acts. vii:54).

GNAT (nät), (Gr. κύνωψ, koh'nohps, Vulg. culex; Order, diptera, Linn., culicidæ, Latr.; occurs in Matt. xxiii:24).

It is a small insect abounding in marshes and vexatious by reason of its bite, from which the Egyptians protected themselves at night by sleeping under nets (Herod. ii:95). It is evidently some species of Culex, a genus known by its hairy antennæ, plumed in the males, its proboscis, its slender body, its two gauzy wings, its long legs and its blood-sucking propensities.

Figurative. Our Savior's allusion to the gnat is a kind of proverb, either in use in his time, or invented by himself, 'Blind guides, who strain out a gnat, and swallow down (bolt, as we say) a camel.' He adopts the antithesis of the smallest insect to the largest animal, and applies it to those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greatest sins. The typographical error, 'strain at a gnat,' first found its way into King James' translation, 1611. It is 'strain out' in the previous translations. The custom of filtering wine, among the Jews, for this purpose, was founded on the prohibition of 'all flying, creeping things' being used for food, excepting the saltatorii (Lev. xi:23). The custom seems alluded to by the Sept., which, in Amos vi:6, reads in the Hebrew, 'filtered wine'—a passage having a similar scope. According to the Talmud, eating a gnat incurred scourging or excommunication. J. F. D.

GNOSTICISM (nös'ti-siz'm), (Gr. γνώσις, no'sis, knowing).

(1) The Decline and Fall of Philosophy. In the whole history of the human mind there is not a more instructive chapter, at once strange and sad, interesting to our curiosity and mortifying to our pride, than the history of Platonism sinking into Gnosticism, or, in other words, of Greek philosophy merging in Oriental mysticism; showing, on the one hand, the decline and fall of philosophy, and, on the other, the rise and progress of syncretism. According to Dr. Burton, formerly Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, Gnosticism is attributed principally to the writings of Plato, as studied at Alexandria.

(2) The Gnosis of Plato. Though the wisdom of Egypt may have influenced the Greeks and Romans through the mysticism of Pythagoras, though the Oriental doctrines of Babylon may have made their way amongst the Jews both of Jerusalem and Alexandria by means of their Cabala and Talmuds, and though some sects of declared Gnostics may have gone still more directly to the metaphysical, or rather mystical, genealogies of the Eastern Magi, still it is the opinion of Dr. Burton that it was the Greek writings of Plato which gave the extraordinary impulse of their genius, and, if we may use the word, of their fashion, to the lost writings of the Gnostics, as well as to those which remain to us of Philo and Plotinus; in a word, that Platonist, Philonist, and Gnostic, are but emanations at different distances from the Gnosis of Plato.

(3) The Gnostic Heresy. The greatest danger to which Christianity was exposed, in its very early years, arose from that great Gnostic Heresy, which was long the rival, and too often the corrupter of its purer doctrines. Gnosticism was not by any means a new and distinct philosophy, but made up of selections from almost every system. Thus we find in it the Platonic doctrine of ideas, and the notion that every thing in this lower world has a celestial and immaterial archetype. We find in it evident traces of that mystical and cabalistic jargon which, after their return from captivity, deformed the religion of the Jews; and many Gnostics adopted the Oriental notion of two independent co-eternal principles, the one the author of good, and the other of evil. Lastly, we find the Gnostic theology full of ideas and terms which must have been taken from the gospel; and Jesus Christ, under some form or other of Æon, emanation, or incorporeal phantom, enters into all their systems, and is the means of communicating to them that knowledge which raised them above all other mortals, and entitled them to their peculiar name.

(4) Varied Opinions. The genius and very soul of Gnosticism was mystery: its end and object was to purify its followers from the corruptions of matter, and to raise them to a higher scale of being, suited only to those who were to become perfect by knowledge. We have a key to many parts of their system, when we know that they held matter to be intrinsically evil, of which, consequently, God could not be the author. Hence arose their fundamental tenet, that the Creator of the world, or Demiurgus, was not the same with the supreme God, the Author of good, and the Father of Christ. Their system allowed some of them to call the Creator God, but the title most usually given was Demiurgus. Those who embraced the doctrine of two principles supposed the world to have been produced by the evil principle; and in most systems, the Creator of the world, and not the Father of Christ, was looked upon as the God of the Jews, and the author of the Mosaic law. Some, again, believed that angels were employed in creating the world: but all were agreed in maintaining that matter itself was not created; that it was eternal; and that it remained inactive till the world was formed out of it by the Creator. The supreme God, according to the Gnostics, had dwelt from all eternity in a pleroma of inaccessible light: and beside the name of first Father, or first Principle, they called him also Bythos, as if to denote the unfathomable nature of his perfections. This Being, by an operation purely mental, or by acting upon himself, produced two other beings of different sexes, from whom by a series of descents, more or less numerous according to different schemes, several pairs of beings were formed, who were called æons, from the periods of their existence before time was, or emanations, from the mode of their production. These successive æons or emanations appear to have been inferior each to the preceding; and their existence was indispensable to the Gnostic scheme, that they might account for the creation of the world without making God the author of evil. These æons lived through countless ages with their first Father. But the system of emanations seems to have resembled that of concentric circles, and they gradually deteriorated as they approached nearer and nearer to the extremity of the pleroma. Beyond this pleroma was matter, inert and powerless, though co-eternal with the supreme God, and, like him, without beginning. At length one of the æons passed the limits of the pleroma, and, meeting with matter, created the world after the form and model of an ideal world, which existed in the pleroma, or the mind of the supreme God.

(5) Inconsistencies. Here it is that inconsistency is added to absurdity in the Gnostic scheme. For let the intermediate æons be as many as the wildest imagination could devise, still God was the remote, if not the proximate cause of creation. Added to which, we are to suppose that the Demiurgus formed the world without the knowledge of God, and that, having formed it, he rebelled against him. Here again we find a strong resemblance to the Oriental doctrine of two principles, good and evil, or light and darkness. The two principles were always at enmity with each other. God must have been conceived to be more powerful than matter, or an emanation from God could not have shaped or molded it into form: yet God was not able to reduce matter to its primeval chaos, nor to destroy the evil which the Demiurgus had produced. What God could not prevent he was always endeavoring to cure; and here it is that the Gnostics borrowed so largely from the Christian scheme. The names, indeed, of several of their æons were evidently taken from terms which they found in the gospel. Thus we meet with Logos, Monogenes, Zoe, Ecclesia, all of them successive emanations from the supreme God, and all dwelling in the pleroma. At length we meet with Christ and the Holy Ghost, as two of the last æons which were put forth. Christ was sent into the world to remedy the evil which the creative æon, or Demiurgus, had caused. He was to emancipate men from the tyranny of matter, or the evil principle; and by revealing to them the true God, who was hitherto unknown, to fit them, by a perfection and sublimity of knowledge, to enter the Divine pleroma. To give this knowledge was the end and object of Christ's coming upon earth: and hence the inventors and believers of the doctrine assumed to themselves the name of Gnostics.

(6) Summary. Professor Burton gives a brief and clear summary of the Gnostic doctrines in the following passage, which well deserves to be retained in the memory:—"The system was stated to have begun with Simon Magus; by which I would understand that the system of uniting Christianity with Gnosticism began with that heretic; for the seeds of Gnosticism, as we shall see presently, had been sown long before. What Simon Magus began was brought to perfection by Valentinus, who came to Rome in the former part of the second century; and what we know of Gnosticism is taken principally from writers who opposed Valentinus. Contemporary with him there were many other Gnostic leaders, who held different opinions; but in the sketch which I have given, I have endeavored to explain those principles which, under certain modifications, were common to all the Gnostics. That the supreme God, or the Good Principle, was not the creator of the world, but that it was created by an evil, or at least an inferior being; that God produced from himself a succession of æons or emanations, who dwell with him in the pleroma; that one of these æons was Christ, who came upon earth to reveal the knowledge of the true God; that he was not incarnate, but either assumed an unsubstantial body, or descended upon Jesus at his baptism; that the God of the Old Testament was not the father of Jesus Christ; that there was no resurrection or final judgment. This is an outline of the Gnostic doctrines as acknowledged by nearly all of them.' J. P. P.

GO ABOUT (gō à-bout'), (Gr. ζητέω, dzay-teh'o, Rom. x:3, to seek; R. V., "seeking to establish.")

GOAD (gōd).

1. (Heb. מַלְמֹד, mal-mawd'), an instrument for guiding oxen, the long handle of which might be used also as a formidable weapon (Judg. iii:31).

"Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an oxgoad: and he also delivered Israel."

2. (Heb. דּוֹרְבָן, dor-bone'), anything pointed and the context of Eccles. xii:11 requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened, while in 1 Sam. xiii:21 the point of the plowshare is more probably intended.

Figurative. "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts ix:5, A. V.), is the metaphor of a recalcitrant animal injuring itself against the oxgoad. The words of the wise are as goads; they penetrate into men's minds, and stir them up to the practice of duty (Eccles. xii:11).

GOAT (gōt), (Chaldee, izza; Phœnician, aza; Arabic, jidda and hedzjaz).

I. A SPECIES OF ANIMALS common to mountainous regions. Of the several Hebrew denominations of this animal there is no doubt, for the simple manners of the ancient Semitic nations multiplied the names of the few objects they had constantly before their eyes; and their domestic animals, in particular, received abundant general and distinctive appellations, according to sex, age, race, and conditions of existence or purpose. Among these terms are the (Heb. אֶקִי, ak-ko', slender; יָעֵל, yaw-ale', climbing; אֶזֶז, aze, strong; עֵרֵר, at-tood', prepared, and so leader; שֶׁעִיר, saw-cer', shaggy; Gr. ἐπιφών, er-ifee-on; τράγος, trag'os).

1. Races of Goats. The races either known to or kept by the Hebrew people were probably:

(1) Syrian. The domestic Syrian long-eared breed, with horns rather small and variously bent; the ears longer than the head, and pendulous; hair long, often black.

(2) Angora. The Angora, or rather Anadolian breed of Asia Minor, with long hair, more or less fine.

(3) Egyptian. The Egyptian breed, with small spiral horns, long brown hair, very long ears.

(4) Hornless. A breed from Upper Egypt, without horns, having the nasal bones singularly elevated, the nose contracted, with the lower jaw protruding the incisors, and the female with udder very low and purse-shaped. This race, the most degraded by climate and treatment of all the domestic varieties, is clad in long coarse hair, commonly of a rufous brown color, and so early distinct, that the earlier monuments of Egypt represent it with obvious precision.

(5) Wild Goats. Beside the domestic goats, Western Asia is possessed of one or more wild species—all large and vigorous mountain animals, resembling the ibex or bouquetin of the Alps. Of these, Southern Syria, Arabia, Sinai, and the borders of the Red Sea, contain at least one species, known to the Arabs by the name of Beden or Beddan, and Taytal—the Capra Jaela of Ham. Smith, and Capra Sinaitica of Ehrenberg. We take this animal to be that noticed under the name of Yawal, Jaal or Jol, in the plural yoh-lim (1 Sam. xxiv:2; Job xxxix:1; Ps. civ:18; Prov. v:19). The male is considerably taller and more robust than the larger tame he-goats, the horns forming regular curves backwards, and with from fifteen to twenty-four transverse elevated cross ridges, being sometimes near three feet long, and exceedingly ponderous; there is a beard under the chin, and the fur is dark brown; but the limbs are white, with regular black marks down the front of the legs, with rings of the same color above the knees and on the pasterns. The females are smaller than the males, more slenderly made, brighter rufous, and with the white and black markings on the legs not so distinctly visible. This species live in troops of fifteen or twenty, and plunge down precipices with the same fearless impetuosity which distinguishes the ibex. Their horns are sold by the Arabs for knife handles, etc.; but the animals themselves are fast diminishing in number. In Deut. xiv:5 Akko is translated 'wild goat.' Schultens (Origines Hebraicae) conjectures that the name arose from its shyness, and consequent readiness to fly.

2. Uses. (1) Sacrifice. The goat was employed by the people of Israel in many respects as their representative. It was a pure animal for sacrifice (Exod. xii:5), and a kid might be substituted as equivalent to a lamb. Regarding sacrificial offerings we are told that Aaron took two he-goats for a sin-offering for the children of Israel (Lev. xvi:5). These he placed before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle (xvi:7). He cast lots upon them; one lot 'for the Lord' and one lot 'for Azazel' (xvi:8). The goat upon which the lot for the Lord fell (xvi:9) he offered for a sin-offering. After the expiation was completed, the second goat, on which fell the lot for Azazel, was brought forward (xvi:10). (See GOAT II., SCAPEGOAT.) He was first placed before the Lord to absolve him. Then Aaron laid his hands upon his head, and confessed over him the (forgiven) iniquities, transgressions, and sins of the children of Israel, put them upon his head, and gave him to a man to take away, in order that he might bear the sins of the people into a solitary land (xvi:22), into the desert, for Azazel (xvi:10). Then Aaron offered a burnt-offering for himself, and one for the people.

(2) Food. The goat formed a principal part of the Hebrew flocks; and both the milk and the young kids were daily articles of food. Among the poorer and more sober shepherd families, the slaughter of a kid was a token of hospitality to strangers, or of unusual festivity; and the prohibition, thrice repeated in the Mosaic law, 'not to seethe a kid in its mother's milk' (Exod. xxiii:19; xxxiv:26; and Deut. xiv:21), may have originated partly in a desire to recommend abstinence, which the legislators and moralists of the East have since invariably enforced with success, and partly with a view to discountenance a practice which was connected with idolatrous festivals, and the rites they involved.

(3) Bottles. It is from goatskins that the leathern bottles to contain wine and other liquids are made in the Levant. For this purpose, after the head and feet are cut away, the case or hide is drawn off the carcass over the neck, without opening the belly; and the extremities being secured, it is dried with the hair in or outside, according to the use it is intended for. The old worn-out skins are liable to burst: hence the obvious propriety of putting new wine into new bottles (Matt. ix:17).

Harmer appears to have rightly referred the allusion in Amos iii:12 to the long-eared race of goats: 'As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of ear, so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria and Damascus.'

C. H. S.

Figurative. (1) Princes and great men are likened to he-goats (Jer. 1:8; Zech. x:3), (2) The Greeks, who were also called Egeans—that is, goatish people—when banded under Alexander the Great, are likened to a he-goat with one horn, that, without touching the earth, ran against, and trode down a pushing ram. Under their sovereign, they, with incredible speed, marched into Asia, and overthrew the Persian empire (Dan. viii:5). (3) Devils and wicked men are likened to goats (2 Chron. xi:15). (4) In Matt. xxv:32, 33, sheep and goats are used to represent the righteous and the wicked respectively. "The wicked are here conceived of under the figure of goats, not on account of the wantonness and stench of the latter (Grotius), or in consequence of their stubbornness (Lange), but generally because these animals were considered to be comparatively worthless (Luke xv:29); and hence, in Matt. xxv:33, we have the diminutive τὰ ἐρφια for the purpose of expressing contempt" (Meyer, Com., Matt. xxv:32, 33).

11. SCAPEGOAT (scāp'gōt), (Heb. אֲזַזִּיל, az-az-el'; meaning is doubtful). The account of the remarkable ceremony, respecting the two goats, one of which was to be sacrificed and the other allowed to escape, is contained in Lev. xvi, in verses 1-10, and then follows, in verses 11-28, the explanation of separate points.

(1) General Meaning. As to the meaning of the word Azazel there has been much discussion. Some have regarded it as a designation of the goat itself, supposing it to mean 'the goat sent away,' or 'let loose.' Others, with Bochart, regard the word as referring to a place to which the goat was sent; translating it in the general sense of 'desert places.' Many take Azazel for the name of a person; either some false deity, who was to be appeased by the offering of a goat; or an evil spirit, such as the devil.

(2) Symbolic Signification. According to this view the doctrinal signification of the symbolical action, as far as it has reference to Azazel, is this, that Satan, the enemy of the people of God, cannot harm those forgiven by God, but that they, with sins forgiven of God, can go before him with a light heart, deride him, and triumph over him. There exists here a peculiar trait, which in Hengstenberg's opinion makes it certain that there is an Egyptian reference, namely, the circumstance that the goat was sent to Azazel into the desert. The special residence of Typhon was in the desert, according to the Egyptian doctrine, which is most intimately connected with the natural condition of the country. There, accordingly, is Azazel placed in our passage, not in the belief that this was literally true, but merely symbolically. Finally there is the explanation, less objectionable, if it is not completely satisfactory, which would render the word designating the lot, 'for complete sending away.' This view is held by Tholuck, Bähr and Winer.

Perhaps we shall get a truer meaning if we regard the slain goat as symbolizing the act of sacrifice; and the goat that carried off the load of sin, as symbolizing the cleansing influence of faith in that sacrifice. The two goats were parts of one and the same sin-offering, and they form together but one symbolic expression. One alone could not convey the whole of the spiritual truth: this may account for the presence of the two goats (see Maurice, On Sacrifice, p. 85; Lightfoot Temple Service; Spencer, De Leg. Heb. Ritualibus iii. Dissertatio viii; Hengstenberg, Egypt and the Books of Moses; Thomson, Bampton Lectures, iii. note).

GOATH (gō'āth), (Heb. גֹּאֵת, go-aw', lowing), a place evidently in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, (Jer. xxxi:39), accurately the name is Goah.

GOAT'S HAIR, GOAT'S SKIN. See DRESS; TABERNACLE.

GOB (gōb), (Heb. גֹּב, gobe', a pit), a plain where two battles were fought between the Hebrews and Philistines (2 Sam. xxi:18,19). In 1 Chron. xx:4, we read Gezer instead of Gob. The LXX in some copies, read Nob instead of Gob; and in others Gath. Site unknown.

GO BEYOND (Gr. ὑπερβαλω, hoop-er-bah'ee-no), R. V. "transgress," or "overreach" 1 Thess. iv:6.

GOBLET (gōb'lēt), (Heb. יָגֵן, ag-gaw'n'), a trough or receptacle for washing garments; thus any laver, basin, bowl (Cant. vii:2; comp. Exod. xxiv:6, "basin"; Is. xxii:24, "cup"). In form and material the goblet was probably like those found in the Egyptian ruins, of silver, gold, bronze, porcelain and sometimes of wood.

GOD (gōd).

1. Names of God. The two principal Hebrew names of the Supreme Being (St. Jerome and the Rabbins enumerate ten, but they belong rather to his attributes) used in the Scriptures are יְהוָה, yeh-ho-vaw', Jehovah, and אֱלֹהִים, el-o-heem', Elohim. Dr. Hävernack proposes the reading יְהוֹה, Jahveh, instead of יְהוָה, Jehovah, meaning 'the existing one,' while he derives Elohim from an ancient Hebrew root, אֵל, il, now unused and thinks that the plural is used merely to indicate the abundance and super-richness existing in the Divine Being.

(1) Use of Names in Pentateuch. Both names, he admirably proves, are used by Moses discriminately, in strict conformity with the theological idea he wished to express in the immediate context; and, pursuing the Pentateuch nearly line by line, it is astonishing to see that Moses never uses any of the names at mere random or arbitrarily, but is throughout consistent in the application of the respective terms. (See GENESIS.) Elohim is the abstract expression for absolute Deity apart from the special notions of unity, holiness, substance, etc. It is more a philosophical than devotional term, and corresponds with our term Deity, in the same way as state or government is abstractedly expressive of a king or monarch. Jehovah, however, he considers to be the revealed Elohim, the Manifest, Only, Personal, and Holy Elohim: Elohim is the Creator, Jehovah the Redeemer, etc.

(2) Later Writers. To Elohim, in the later writers, we usually find affixed the adjective אַיִם, cha-yim', 'the living' (Jer. x:10; Dan. vi:20, 26; Acts xiv:15; 2 Cor. vi:16), probably in contradistinction to idols, which might be confounded in some cases with the true God, the linguistic difference in the Hebrew existing only in the plural, the former being called Elohim instead of Elohim (Lev. xix:14; xxvi:1; Hab. iii:18). In the Anglo Saxon, God means good.

2. The Name Defined. "The true and genuine idea of God in general is this—a perfect conscious understanding being (or mind), existing of itself from eternity, and the cause of all other things.

"The true and proper idea of God, in its most contracted form, is this—a being absolutely perfect; for this is that alone to which necessary existence is essential, and of which it is demonstrable."

"I define God thus—an essence or being, fully and absolutely perfect. I say fully and absolutely perfect, in contradistinction to such perfection as is not full and absolute, but the perfection of this or that species or kind of finite beings, suppose a lion, horse, or tree. But to be fully and absolutely perfect, is to be at least, as perfect as the apprehension of a man can conceive without a contradiction." (Cudworth, Intell. Syst.)

3. The Knowledge of God. As to man's knowledge of God two questions have been the subjects of much controversy: the first relating to the possibility of true knowledge of the Divine Being, the second the source or method of such knowledge.

(1) Can God Be Known? The Scriptures declare that God is incomprehensible (see Job xi:7; xxi:14; xxxvi:26; Ps. lxxvii:14; Rom. xi:33). Perfect or complete knowledge of God is not attainable by man. But equally true it is that the scriptures represent God as revealing himself to man, and that a sufficient though limited measure of true knowledge of God is put within the reach of human beings. The important distinction to be maintained at this point is that between partial and perfect knowledge. We cannot comprehend God, and yet we can truly apprehend or know him. Our blessedness, our eternal life even, is in such knowledge (see Matt. xii:28; John xvii:3; Rom. i:19, 20; Eph. i:17; Col. i:10; 1 John v:20). (Barnes, Bib. Dict.)

(2) Regarding the Source of Knowledge of God, whether innate or acquired, Locke's arguments are of great value.

(a) Though God has given us no innate ideas of himself, yet, having furnished us with those faculties our minds are endowed with, he hath not left himself without a witness; since we have sense, perception, and reason, and cannot want a clear proof of him as long as we carry ourselves about us. To show, therefore, that we are capable of knowing, that is, of being certain that there is a God, and how we may come by this certainty, I think we need go no farther than ourselves, and that undoubted knowledge we have of our own existence.

(b) I think it is beyond question, that man has a clear perception of his own being; he knows certainly that he exists, and that he is something. In the next place, man knows, by an intuitive certainty, that bare nothing can no more produce any real being, than it can be equal to two right angles. If, therefore, we know there is some real Being, it is an evident demonstration, that from eternity there has been something; since what was not from eternity had a beginning; and what had a beginning must be produced by something else.

(c) Next it is evident, that what has its being from another must also have all that which is in and belongs to its being from another too; all the powers it has must be owing to, and derived from, the same source. This eternal source, then, of all being, must be also the source and original of all power; and so this eternal Being must be also the most powerful.

(d) Again: man finds in himself perception and knowledge: we are certain, then, that there is not only some Being, but some knowing, intelligent Being in the world. There was a time, then, when there was no knowing Being, or else there has been a knowing Being from eternity. If it be said there was a time when that eternal Being had no knowledge, I reply that then it is impossible there should have ever been any knowledge; it being as impossible that things wholly void of knowledge, and operating blindly, and without any perception, should produce a knowing Being, as it is impossible that a triangle should make its three angles larger than two right ones.

(c) Thus from the consideration of ourselves, and what we infallibly find in our own constitutions, our reason leads us to the knowledge of this certain and evident truth, that there is an eternal, most powerful, and knowing Being, which, whether any one will call God, it matters not. The thing is evident; and from this idea, duly considered, will easily be deduced all those other attributes we ought to ascribe to this eternal Being. From what has been said, it is plain to me, that we have a more certain knowledge of the existence of a God, than of anything our senses have not immediately discovered to us. Nay, I presume I may say that we more certainly know that there is a God, than that there is anything else without us. When I say we know, I mean there is such a knowledge within our reach, which we cannot miss, if we will but apply our minds to that as we do to several other inquiries.

The Old Testament as little thinks of arguing or proving that God may be known as it thinks of arguing that he exists. Its position is here again, so to speak, far in front of such an argument. How should men think of arguing that God could be known when they were persuaded they knew him, when they felt they were in fellowship with him, when their whole mind was filled and aglow with the thought of him, and when his spirit was within them? The expression 'to see God' (Job xix:26; xxxiii:26; Is. xxxviii:11) sometimes signifies merely to experience his help; but in the Old Testament scriptures it more usually denotes the approach of death (Gen. xxxii:30; Judg. vi:23; xiii:22; Is. vi:5).

4. Attributes of God. (1) Ascribed by Moses. The attributes ascribed to God by Moses are systematically enumerated in Exod. xxxiv:6-7, though we find in isolated passages in the Pentateuch and elsewhere, additional properties specified, which bear more directly upon the dogmas and principles of religion, such as e. g. that he is not the author of sin (Gen. i:31), although since the fall, man is born prone to sin (Gen. vi:5; viii:21, etc.) But as it was the avowed design of Moses to teach the Jews the Unity of God in opposition to the Polytheism of the other nations with whom they were to come in contact, he dwelt particularly and most prominently on that point, which he hardly ever omitted when he had an opportunity of bringing forward the attributes of God (Deut. vi:4; x:17; iv:39; ix:16, etc.; Num. xvi; xxii; xxxiii:27, 29; Exod. xv:11; xxxiv:6, 7, etc.)

(2) By the Prophets. In the Prophets and other sacred writers of the Old Testament, these attributes are still more fully developed and explained by the declarations that God is the first and the last (Is. xlv:6), that he changes not (Hab. iii:6), that the earth and heaven shall perish, but he shall endure (Ps. cii:26)—a distinct allusion to the last doomsday—and that he is Omnipresent (Prov. xv:3; Job xxxiv:22, etc.)

(3) In the New Testament. In the New Testament also we find the attributes of God systematically classified (Rev. v:12 and vii:12), while the peculiar tenets of Christianity embrace, if not a further, still a more developed idea, as presented by the Apostles and the primitive teachers of the church.

The New Testament doctrine of God is distinguished from that of the Old, first, in that it presents with peculiar distinctness and fullness the divine fatherhood. Second, it declares likewise the divine sonship of Jesus Christ, "God manifest in the flesh." The God-man is the fullest disclosure of the divine nature, and the Redeemer and Savior of mankind. Third, the distinct Divine personality and peculiar office of the Holy Ghost is brought most clearly into view. And thus comes what at most was but intimated in the Old Testament, the doctrine of the Trinity. (See TRINITY.)

The attributes of God as revealed in the scriptures may be summed up as follows: Spirituality, Infinity, Eternity, Immutability, Self-sufficiency, Perfection, Freedom, Omnipotence, Omnipresence, Omniscience, Justice, Truth, Love, Mercy, and Grace. For discussion of Attributes see separate heads.

(4) God, Children of or Sons of. The teaching of St. John on this subject combines the elements of the Pauline and Petrine and uses the term 'children' rather than sons of God. The keynote to it may be found in the Prologue to the gospel (John i:12, 13), 'to as many as received him (the Logos) he gave the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were begotten, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' Here we have the right to become children of God bestowed by Christ, which answers to St. Paul's statement, 'God sent forth his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons.' The word 'adoption' is not employed; but the right to become children expresses the same thing in less technical language. Further, this is said to be given to those who receive Christ by believing on his name. St. Paul had also written, 'Ye are all sons of God by faith in Jesus Christ; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ' (Gal. iii:26, f.). Thus for St. John, as well as for St. Paul, our sonship to God is through union to Christ the only-begotten Son, and that union is effected by faith.

But St. John adds to this the conception found in St. James and St. Peter of a birth or begetting of God, which he emphatically distinguishes from the natural birth in every aspect of it. Those who believe in Christ's name are they who were begotten of God; and that this is not done by the process of natural generation is shown by a three-fold contrast: not of blood, i. e. they did not become sons of God through or in virtue of their being of the one blood of which God has made all mankind. Neither was it by any movement or impulse of their own nature, whether the spontaneous tendencies of its animal faculties ('the will of the flesh'), or even the voluntary acts of personality ('the will of man'). The contrast is more briefly and pointedly expressed in our Lord's discourse with Nicodemus as between being begotten of the flesh and of the Spirit (John iii:6). St. John seems to conceive the Divine Spirit as a principle or power of life and holiness proceeding from God, given to Jesus Christ in all its fullness and by him communicated to his disciples. It is not unworthy of notice that Irenaeus and Tertullian apply John i:13 to Christ, apparently reading the verb in the singular ('who was born'); and though that reading is only found in some Lat. MSS. and cannot be received, yet in 1 John v:18 our Lord, according to the most natural interpretation, is called 'he that was begotten of God.' (J. S. Candlish, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See CHILD, CHILDREN, Figurative; SONS.)

GOD FORBID (Gr. μή, may, Rom. iii:4), a primitive particle of qualified negation distinguished from οὐ, oo, which expresses unqualified denial, and γίνωμαι, ghin'om-ahēe, to come to be.

A. V. and R. V. translate hālilāh by 'God forbid' ('The Lord forbid,' 1 Sam. xxiv:6; xxvi:11; 1 Kings xxi:3, and 'My God forbid it me,' 1 Chron. xi:19), everywhere except Gen. xviii:25; 1 Sam. ii:30; xx:9; xxii:15; 2 Sam. xx:20; xxiii:17, where the Wyclifite phrase 'Far be it from' or 'Be it far from' has been retained. This phrase Amer. R. V. prefers throughout the Old Testament.

The Greek μή γένοιτο is only one of the renderings of hālilāh in LXX. Of the others μηδάρως occurs twice in New Testament, Acts x:14; xi:8, ('Not so, Lord,') and ὕψος σου once, Matt. xvi:22 ('Be it far from thee, Lord'). But μή γένοιτο is found fifteen times, all but Luke xx:16 being in St. Paul's Epistles, and in twelve of St. Paul's fourteen instances it is used to express the apostle's abhorrence of an inference which he fears may be falsely drawn from his argument. (See Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, 2, p. 79).

GODHEAD (gōd'hēd), (Gr. θεός, thi'os, godlike, Acts xvii:29; θεότης, thi-of'ace, divinity, Rom. i:20; θεότης, theh-of'ace, divinity, Col. 2:9), the divine nature or essence, the nature or essential being of God (Acts xvii:29; Rom. i:20; Col. ii:9).

In Acts xvii:29 τὸ θεῖον, 'the Divine,' is chosen by St. Paul in his speech to the Athenians as a familiar philosophical expression which enables him to carry their thoughts easily with him. Even they, with scarcely a personal conception of God, ought not to debase their conception to the level of men's handiwork. Hence R. V. margin 'that which is divine' is better than text 'the Godhead,' though 'the Divine' would have been better. Wycliffe errs on the other side when he offers 'godly thing' (after Vulg. Divinum). Tyndale gave 'god-head,' and was followed by all the Versions except the Rhemish, which has 'the Divinitie,' though 'Godhead' is given as an alternative in the Annotation to the verse. The Greek expression occurs nowhere else in Biblical Greek, though the adjective θεῖος is common in LXX and occurs in 2 Pet. i:3, 4. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GODLINESS is in the New Testament the equivalent of the Gr. term εὐσέβεια, yoo-seh'by-ah (1 Tim. ii:2; iii:16; iv:7, 8; vi:3, 5, 6, 11; 2 Tim. iii:5; Tit. i:1; also Acts iii:12, R. V., 2 Pet. i:3, 6, 7; iii:11), except in one passage (1 Tim. ii:10), where θεοσέβεια is used. 'It properly denotes,' says Elliott, 'only "well-directed reverences" (Trench, Synon., sec. 48), but in the New Testament is practically the same as θεοσέβεια, "the spirit of piety in the life itself either external or internal."

It may therefore be considered as piety resulting from the knowledge and love of God, and leading to the cheerful and constant obedience of his commands (2 Pet. iii:11).

In 1 Tim. iii:16 it imports the substance of revealed religion.

GODS (Heb. עֲלֹהִים, el-o-heem').

(1) Angels are called gods, on account of their superior excellence, and their declaring God's mind, and executing his work as his deputies; and they were required to worship Christ, when the heathen idols were destroyed (Ps. xcvii:7; Heb. i:6). (2) In Exodus (xxii:28, A. V.) is the command, "Thou shalt not revile the gods." Some understand the term gods to be applied to rulers by way of respect. (3) The usual notion of the ancients, that the royal dignity was derived from God, may here be traced to its source; hence the Homeric διογένης βασιλευς, dee-og-en'ace bas-ee-looce. This notion, entertained by the Oriental nations with regard to kings, made the latter style themselves gods (Ps. lxxxii:6; comp. John x:34). (4) On the other hand with regard to this particular passage Exod. xxxi:28, it is claimed that the more correct rendering (and so given in the R. V.) is "Thou shalt not revile God." "Elohim does not mean either the gods of other nations, or the rulers, but simply God, . . . whose majesty was despised in every breach of the commandments of Jehovah, and who was honored in the persons of the rulers (see Prov. xxiv:21; 1 Pet. ii:17)" (K. and D., Com., in loco). (5) Moses is called a god, because God's deputy in delivering the Israelites (Exod. iv:16, and vii:1). (6) Satan is called the god of this world; he is believed, obeyed, and adored, under various forms, by most of the inhabitants of it (2 Cor. iv:4). (7) Idols are called gods, because adored, worshiped, and trusted by their votaries (1 Kings xi:33). They are strange, or other gods; the Hebrews were not originally in covenant with them (Deut. xxxii:16; Judg. ii:12); and the most devoted among them, out of detestation, declined pronouncing their names, and hence substitute Boseth or Besheth, i. e. shame, instead of Baal, in naming some persons; thus, for Eshbaal, Meribaal, and Jerubbaal, they said Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth, and Jerubbesheth; and sometimes called the idols Elijim, no-things, or not-gods; and often Gilulim, rolling excrements (Ezek. xxx:13), etc.

GODS, FALSE. These are the beings, whether real or imaginary, adopted as objects of worship among men instead of Jehovah. Fear, lust, malignity or pride, evidently predominate in the conception and choice of such objects of adoration. Nothing like pure and elevating devotional sentiment could, or did attach to them.

The principal of the ancient gods, whom the Romans called dii majorum gentium, and Cicero celestial gods, Varro select gods, Ovid nobiles deos, others consentes deos, were Jupiter, Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo. Jupiter is considered as the god of heaven; Neptune, as god of the sea; Mars, as the god of war; Apollo, of eloquence, poetry, and medicine; Mercury, of thieves; Bacchus, of wine; Cupid, of love, etc. A second sort of gods, called demi-gods, semi-dii, dii minorum gentium, indigetes, or gods adopted, were men canonized and deified. As the greater gods had possession of heaven by their own right, these secondary deities had it by merit and donation, being translated into heaven because they had lived as gods upon earth.

The heathen gods may be all reduced to the following classes: (1) Created spirits, angels, or demons, whence good and evil gods; Genii, Lares, Lemures, Typhones, guardian gods, infernal gods, etc. (2) Heavenly bodies; as the sun, moon, and other planets; also, the fixed stars, constellations, etc. (3) Elements; as air, earth, ocean, Ops, Vesta; the rivers, fountains, etc. (4) Meteors. Thus the Persians adored the wind; thunder and lightning were honored under the name of Geryon; and several nations of India and America have made themselves gods of the same. Castor, Pollux, Helena, and Iris, have also been preferred from meteors to be gods; and the like has been practiced in regard to comets; witness that which appeared at the murder of Cæsar. (5) They fashioned minerals or fossils into deities. Such was the bætylus. The Finlanders adored stones; the Scythians, iron; and many nations, silver and gold. (6) Plants have been made gods. Thus leeks and onions were deities in Egypt; the Sclavi, Lithuanians, Celtæ, Vandals, and Peruvians, adored trees and forests; the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Druids, paid a particular devotion to the oak; and it was no other than wheat, corn, seed, etc., that the ancients adored under the names of Ceres and Proserpina. (7) They took themselves gods from among the waters. The Syrians and Egyptians adored fishes; and what were the Tritons, the Nereids, Syrens, etc., but fishes? Several nations have adored serpents; particularly the Egyptians, Prussians, Lithuanians, Samogitians, etc. (8) Insects, as flies and ants, had their priests and votaries. (9) Among birds, the stork, raven, sparrowhawk, ibis, eagle, grison, and lapwing, have had Divine honors; the last in Mexico, the rest in Egypt and at Thebes. (10) Fourfooted beasts have had their altars; as the bull-dog, cat, wolf, baboon, lion, and crocodile, in Egypt and elsewhere; the hog in the island of Crete; rats and mice in the Troas, and at Tenedos; weasels at Thebes; and the porcupine throughout all Zoroaster's school. (11) Nothing was more common than to place men among the number of deities; and from Belus or Baal, to the Roman emperors before Constantine, the instances of this kind are innumerable; frequently they did not wait so long as their deaths for the apotheosis. Nebuchadnezzar procured his statue to be worshiped while living; and Virgil shows that Augustus had altars and sacrifices offered to him; as we learn from other hands that he had priests, called Augustales, and temples at Lyons, Narbona, and several other places; and he must be allowed the first of the Romans in whose behalf idolatry was carried to such a pitch. The Ethiopians deemed all their kings gods; the Velleda of the Germans, the Janos of the Hungarians, and the Thaut, Woden, and Assa, of the northern nations, were indisputably men. (12) Not men only, but every thing that relates to man, has also been deified; as labor, rest, sleep, youth, age, death, virtues, vices, occasion, time, place, numbers, among the Pythagoreans; the generative power, under the name of Priapus. Infancy alone had a cloud of deities; as Vagitanus, Levana, Rumina, Edula, Potina, Cuba, Cumina, Carna, Ossilago, Statulinus, Fabulinus, etc. They also adored the gods Health, Fever, Fear, Love, Pain, Indignation, Shame, Impudence, Opinion, Renown, Prudence, Science, Art, Fidelity, Felicity, Calumny, Liberty, Money, War, Peace, Victory, Triumph, etc. Lastly, Nature, the universe, or Pan, was reputed a great god.

Hesiod has a poem under the title of Theogonia, that is, "The Generation of the Gods," in which he explains their genealogy and descent, sets forth who was the first and principal, who next descended from him, and what issue each had; the whole making a sort of system of heathen theology. Beside this popular theology, each philosopher had his system, as may be seen from the "Timæus" of Plato, and Cicero "De Natura Deorum." Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Arnobius, Minutius Felix, Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, and Theodoret, show the vanity of the heathen gods. It is very difficult to discover the real sentiments of the heathens with respect to 'their gods; they are exceedingly intricate and confused, and even frequently contradictory. They admitted so many superior and inferior gods, who shared the empire, that every place was full of gods. Varro reckons up no less than thirty thousand adored within a small extent of ground, and yet their number was every day increasing. In modern Oriental paganism, as in India, China, etc., they amount to many millions, and are, in fact, innumerable.

GODSPEED is the translation of the Greek salutation χαίρω, khai'ee-ro, from a primary verb signifying to be cheerful, to hail (2 John ver. 10, 11), through the Ang. Sax. god-spēdig, "good speed."

GOD, THE UNKNOWN (Gr. Ἄγνωστος Θεός). Paul, in his address on Mars' Hill, said that he had seen in Athens "an altar with this inscription, 'To the unknown God'" (Acts xvii:22, 23).

Considerable difficulty has been found by many interpreters to reconcile this with the fact, that no mention is made by the classic authors of any altar in Athens bearing this inscription, whilst we are informed by Pausanias (Attic. i:4; Eliac. v:14) and Philostratus (Vit. Apolloniū Tyan., vi:3), that there were several altars inscribed ἄγνωστος Θεός, in the plural; and different suppositions have been made to account for the Apostle's language (Kuinoel, in Act. xvii. 23). But why should we not receive the apostle's own testimony on this subject, as reported by the inspired historian? It is certain that no one is in circumstances to affirm that no altar existed in Athens bearing such an inscription at the time Paul visited that city; and when, therefore, Paul, publicly addressing the Athenians, says he saw such an altar, why should we hesitate for a moment to take his words for what they literally mean? Besides, there is nothing in what Pausanias and Philostratus affirm that appears incompatible with Paul's assertion. It is to be observed that neither of them says there were altars, on each of which the inscription was in the plural number, but only there were 'altars of gods called unknown' (βωμοὶ Θεῶν ὀνομαζομένων ἄγνωστων); so that for aught that appears to the contrary, each altar might bear the inscription which Paul says he saw upon one.

GOEL (gō'ēl). See BLOOD-REVENGE.

GOG (gōg), (Heb. גֹּג, gohg; Gr. Γῶγ, gogue).

1. This name occurs in Ezek. xxxiii:3, 14, and xxxix:11, as a proper name; that of a prince of Magog (מַגּוּג), a people that were to come from the North to invade the land of Israel, and be there defeated. In a different sense, but corresponding with the assertions of other Oriental authors, in whose traditions this people occupy an important place, Gog occurs in Rev. xx:8, as the name of a country.

Interpreters have given very different explanations of the terms Gog and Magog; but they have generally understood them as symbolical expressions for the heathen nations of Asia, or more particularly for the Scythians, a vague knowledge of whom seems to have reached the Jews in Palestine about that period. Prof. Sayce says: "For an explanation of Magog we must go to the prophet Ezekiel. He tells us (xxxviii:2) that Magog was the land of Gog, 'the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal.' Gog is the Gygis of the Assyrian inscriptions, the Gyges of the Greeks; and in Magog therefore we must see a title of Lydia. The name is evidently a compound of that of Gog" (Races of the Old Testament, p. 45).

As a collective name, Magog seems also to indicate in the Hebrew the tribes about the Caucasian mountains. According to Reinegge (Descrip. of the Caucasus, ii. 79) some of the Caucasian people call their mountains Gog, and the highest northern points Magog.

2. A Reubenite, son of Shemaiah (1 Chron. v:4).

GO IT UP (Is. xv:5) is a transposition of the preposition and its case,—not unfrequent in old writers,—meaning ascend it.

GOLAN (gō'lan), (Heb. גֹּלָן, go-lawn', captive).

A Levitical town of Bashan, in the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iv:43; Josh. xx:8; xxi:27; 1 Chron. vi:71), from which the small province of Gaulonitis (Γαυλωνίτις) took its name. The word is recognized in the present Jolan or Djolan, mentioned by Burckhardt (Syria, p. 286), as giving name to a district lying east of the lake of Tiberias, and composed of the ancient Gaulonitis, with part of Bashan and Argob. Some difficulty has been suggested as arising from the fact, that the Judas whom Josephus (Antiq. xviii:1, 1) calls a Gaulonite, is called by St. Luke (Acts v:37) a Galilæan. This is the more remarkable, as Josephus elsewhere (ex. gr. De Bell. Jud. ii:20, 4) carefully distinguishes Galilee and Gaulonitis. Yet he himself elsewhere calls this very Judas a Galilæan (Antiq. xx:5, 2; De Bell. Jud. ii:9, 1). It is, from this, probable that Judas had a double cognomen, perhaps because he had been born in Gaulonitis, but had been brought up or dwelt in Galilee.

GOLD (göld). The Hebrew word זָהָב, zaw-hawb, yellow, golden).

1. Mineralogical Names. This is merely the mineralogical name of this metal. Several Hebrew words are used to denote the metal.

(1) Seg-ore' (Heb. זָהָב, treasured, i. e., fine gold, (Job xxviii:15; 1 Kings vi:20, vii:49). (2) Beh'tser (Heb. בַּהֲצֵר, clipping, dug out), properly metal in a crude state, "golden ore." (3) Pawz (Heb. פָּז, pure or native gold (Job xxviii:17; Cant. v:15; Ps. xix:10; xxi:3; Prov. viii:19; Is. xlii:12; Lam. iv:2).

2. Poetical Terms. (1) Keh'them (Heb. כְּהֵתֵם, also implying something concealed) (Job xxviii:16, 19; xxxi:24; Dan. x:5, etc.). (2) Khaw-roots' (Heb. חָוֵר, derivation not clear) is referred to the verb khaw-rats' (חָוַר, to cut off, make pointed), and is applied to gold as eagerly sought for. From a kindred root khaw-mas' (חָמַס, to wrong, oppress), comes the noun khaw-mawce' (חָמָס, violence), used by metaphor (Amos iii:10) for wealth gotten by wrong and oppression.

Gold was known and valued in very early times. Abraham was rich in gold (Gen. xiii:2; xxiv:35), and female ornaments were made of gold (Gen. xxiv:22).

To judge from 1 Chron. xxii:14; xxix:4, the Jews must have been, in their palmy days, in possession of enormous quantities of this metal, considering the many tons of gold that were spent in the building of the temple alone, though the expression, plenteous as stones (2 Chron. i:15), may be considered as hyperbolic. It is, however, confirmed by the history of the other Asiatic nations, and more especially of the Persians, that the period referred to really abounded in gold, which was imported in vast masses from Africa and the Indies (Heeren, Ideen. i. 1, 37, sq.). The queen of Sheba brought with her (from Arabia Felix), among other presents, 120 talents of gold (2 Chron. ix:9). E. M.

Figurative. Gold is often employed in Scripture as an emblem of what is divine, pure, precious, solid, useful, incorruptible, or lasting and glorious. (1) The gold of the temple and tabernacle might represent the divine excellencies of Christ, and the precious and incorruptible ordinances of his church, and graces of his people. His head is as most fine gold; his hands like gold rings, set with the beryl; he is gold tried in the fire; his girdle, censer, and crown are of fine gold. How divine, precious, solid, pure, and incorruptible, are his Godhead and government, power and work, person and fullness, and his preparation for, and readiness to execute his office! how valuable and glorious his everlasting reward (Dan. x:5; Rev. iii:18; viii:3; xiv:14).

(2) God is likened to gold; what a pure, precious, enriching, and everlasting portion is he to his people (Job xxii:25; A. V. silver, Marg. gold).

(3) God's word, and his ordinances, especially if more spiritual, are likened to gold; how precious, lasting, enriching, and capable of enduring a trial (Ps. xix:10; Is. lx:17; Zech. iv:12; 1 Cor. iii:12; Rev. xxi:15).

(4) Saints, and their graces of faith, hope, love, etc., or even their trials, are likened to gold (Job xxiii:10; Ps. xlv:13; 1 Pet. i:7).

(5) The vials of God's wrath are golden; divine, pure, and unmixed with partiality or passion (Rev. xv:7). (6) That which is wealthy, pompous, and enticing is called golden; so anti-christian Rome is said to have in her hand a golden cup (Rev. xvii:4).

GOLDEN CANDLESTICK. See CANDLESTICK.

GOLDEN CITY (Heb. מַדְּבָרָה, mad-hay-baw'), a term used in reference to Babylon (Is. xiv:4) and occurring nowhere else.

"Not one of the early translators ever thought of deriving this word from the Aramæan dchab (gold), but translated the word as if it were marhebah (haughty, violent treatment). We understand it, according to madmenah (dunghill) in Is. xxv:10, as denoting the place where they were reduced to pining away, i. e., as applied to Babylon as the house of servitude where Israel had been wearied to death" (Delitzsch, Com., in loco).

GOLDEN WEDGE. See WEDGE.

GOLDSMITH (göld'smith), (Heb. מְצַרֵּף, tsorafe', Neh. iii:8, 32; Is. xl:19; xli:7), a melter of gold. (See HANDICRAFT.)

GOLGOTHA (göl'go-thá), (Gr. Γολγοθά, gol-gothah', place of a skull).

The original word signifies 'a skull,' as does its Latin representative, Calvaria, Calvary. Different opinions have prevailed as to why the place was so termed. Many have held that Golgotha was the place of public execution; and that hence it was termed the 'place of a skull.' Another opinion is that the place took its name from its shape, being a hillock of a form like a human skull. The last is the opinion to which the writer of these remarks inclines. That the place was of some such shape seems to be generally agreed, and the traditional term mount, applied to Calvary, appears to confirm this idea. And such a shape, it must be allowed, is in entire agreement with the name—that is, 'skull.' To these considerations there are added certain difficulties which arise from the second explanation. So far as we know there is no historical evidence to show that there was a place of public execution where Golgotha is commonly fixed, nor that any such place, in or near Jerusalem, bore the name Golgotha. Matthew calls it 'a place called Golgotha; that is to say a place of a skull' (Matt. xxvii:33);

Mark, 'the place Golgotha; which is being interpreted, the place of a skull' (Mark xv:22); Luke, 'the place which is called Calvary' (Luke xxiii:33); John, 'a place called of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha' (John xix:17; Matt. xxvii:33). In truth, the context seems to show that the Roman guard hurried Jesus away, and put him to death at the first convenient spot; and that rather because there was no small fear of a popular insurrection, especially as he was attended by a crowd of people. But where was the place?

(1) Tradition. The traditional recollection of this remarkable spot was undoubtedly strengthened by the erection of the Temple of Venus on the place, after the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans. The temple thus takes up the tradition and transmits it in stone and marble to coming ages. This continuation of the tradition is the more important because it begins to operate at a time when the Christians were driven from Jerusalem. But the absence of the Christians from the holy city was not of long duration, and even early in the third century we find pilgrimages from distant places to the Holy Land had already begun, for the express purpose of viewing the spots which the presence and sufferings of the Savior had rendered sacred and memorable (Hist. Hierosol. p. 591; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi: 11). A century later, Eusebius (A. D. 315) informs us that Christians visited Jerusalem from all regions of the earth for the same object. So early and so decided a current towards the holy city presupposes a strong, wide-spread, and long pre-eminent feeling—an established tradition in the church touching the most remarkable spots; a tradition of that nature which readily links itself with the actual record in Hebrews.

Early in the fourth century Eusebius and Jerome write down the tradition and fix the locality of Calvary in their writings. Pilgrims now streamed to Jerusalem from all parts of the world, and that site was fixed for Golgotha which has remained to the present hour.

This was done not merely by the testimony of these two learned fathers, but by the acts of the Emperor Constantine and his mother Helena. This empress, when very far advanced in life, visited Jerusalem for the express purpose of erecting a church on the spot where the Lord Jesus had been crucified. On her arrival at Jerusalem she inquired diligently of the inhabitants. Yet the search was uncertain and difficult, in consequence of the obstructions by which the heathen had sought to render the spot unknown. These being all removed, the sacred sepulcher was discovered, and by its side three crosses, with the tablet bearing the inscription written by Pilate (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii. 14; Theodoret, i. 17). On the site thus ascertained, was erected, whether by Constantine or Helena, certainly by Roman influence and treasure, a splendid and extensive Christian temple. This church was completed and dedicated A. D. 335. It was a great occasion for the Christian world. In order to give it importance and add to its splendor, a council of bishops was convened, by order of the emperor, from all the provinces of the empire, which assembled first at Tyre and then at Jerusalem.

J. R. B.

The evidence of locality to be gathered from the gospel statements as to the place of the crucifixion and tomb of our Lord is as follows: If the judgment hall of Pilate was at the northwest angle of the Harem area, where the house of the Turkish pasha stands, then the soldiers would lead Jesus out in a northwest direction to be crucified.

The combination of statements shows that it lay just outside the city walls. The original place was where criminals were executed, and the modern argument is that the hill with the openings on the south very strikingly resembles a human skull. The Romans were accustomed to execute their criminals in a conspicuous place. "And when they were come to a place called Golgotha, that is to say, the place of a skull," there they crucified him. A skull-shaped hill outside the city walls, near the city, near a rock-hewn sepulcher which was in a garden, and near some frequented road, are the facts furnishing the data of the problem. If the traditional site where the Church of the Holy Sepulcher stands is rejected as not answering these conditions, another spot, a hill a little northeast of the Damascus gate, becomes most prominent. Skull Hill was originally a part of the Mount Moriah ridge, extending northward from it in a short and narrow spur. It contained white limestone. Here a quarry was opened, probably as early as the building of Solomon's temple. An excavation was made right through the hill, separating Skull Hill from the south ridge, leaving a rounded knoll on the north. The hill is now quite bare; not a tree or shrub exists on it. The hillock is rounded on all sides but the south, where the yellow cliff is pierced by two small caves high up on the sides, which look in the distance like the eye sockets of a human skull. The hill is certainly outside the most northern wall existing in the days of Herod, or what is known as the second wall. Again; it is near a frequented road which may have been the present Nablus road from the Damascus gate, or a military road from Castle Antonio to Cæsarea, which Dr. Merrill says ran north of the hill, and infers that the place of the execution would be near it. Edward L. Wilson made a thorough study of the place, and has left his record thus:

"A few rods northeast of the Damascus gate the wall rests partly upon the natural rock. Beneath is the old-time quarry known as the "Cotton Grotto." On the opposite side of the road is "the grotto of Jeremiah." Farther, on the left, is a hill, the face of which, with the horrid semblance of deep-sunken eyes and broken visage, looks like a human skull. Its locality and surrounding features have led modern explorers to accept it as Calvary. It is without the gates. It commands an extensive view of the city, and of the whole way to the summit of Olivet. The populace assembled on two sides of the city could see an execution on this hill."

A garden was near the scene of the crucifixion, and a new sepulcher in that garden. In the western face of Skull Hill is a large tomb, one also in the northwest, and one a little further off of large proportions. Again, the Jews now residing at Jerusalem affirm that this hill is the place where Christ was crucified, and their tradition may be as valuable as the claim for the long accepted site within the city.

(2) Opinion of Bishop S. M. Merrill. Bishop S. M. Merrill, after making a careful study of the locality on the ground, says: "From reading the Scriptures, and from reasonable conjecture as to what the authorities would or would not do in the matter of public executions, we incline to the belief that the three crosses were planted farther from the heart of the city than is the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, and that it must have been outside of the wall, and north from the Damascus gate. Of course, if the topography or physical conditions in that direction were out of harmony with the facts and the phenomena in the narratives, this would be baseless conjecture. But, instead of being out of harmony, they are exactly in harmony, and in some respects answer to the narratives better than any other locality. Here has ever been a public road; here are the requisite distance and space; and here the garden, the rock-cut tombs, and the skull-shaped hill. On the right hand side of the road, going north from the Damascus gate, there is a ridge or an uneven elevation of ground overlooking the Damascus road on one side, and the Kedron valley on the other side; and out on this ridge beyond the grotto of Jeremiah, which is in the west side of this ridge, is a hill, or elevation of ground, which is considerably higher than the ridge; and on the lower ground, between the road and this hill, is the site of an ancient garden (still used as a garden,) and extending to the base of the hill; and in the base of the hill itself, facing the garden, are rocks with ancient excavations of tombs, not well preserved. One could not better describe the shape of this hill than by comparing it to a human skull sitting on a level space. Whether it was ever designated as the "place of a skull" or not is now unknown; and the same is true of every other spot which has been supposed to be the Calvary. We have a "Mount Calvary" in our hymns and songs, but, of course, there has never been any such mountain, unless this little skull-shaped hill out near the Damascus road was such. The preponderance of testimony, it seems to me, favors this locality as the place of the crucifixion—not that the crosses stood on the top of this hill, but near by on the low ground, between the hill and the road, and outside of the garden. If this is correct, then the burial place was in some of the unknown excavations along the side of this hill or ridge."

But however strong the arguments for the site outside the north wall, there still remains the old claim that reaches back to the days of Constantine, when it was said: "Not the least doubt was entertained where the sepulcher was situated." And this historical argument in its favor has not as yet been set aside. Modern opinions are about equally divided. Strong efforts have been made of late to determine what the early fathers said about the site of Calvary, but they are generally silent. If the old theory is continued, then a new and undeveloped plan of the wall must be presented in a light that will harmonize with the facts of scripture, which the old site does not, and never has in view of any known location of the walls of Jerusalem. (The Story of Jesus, by Rev. John O. Foster, A. M. 1804.)

(3) Opinion of Lieut.-Gen. Sir Chas. Warren.

Gen. C. Warren in Hastings' Bib. Dict. sums up the case as follows: "There are many arguments in favor of the traditional site of Golgotha, but, until it can be ascertained whether it is within or without the city wall of the time of Christ, the whole question must still remain in doubt. The road from the tower of Antonia leading into the old road from the city to Jaffa would probably have passed close to the site, and on this road, outside the Jaffa gate, public executions have taken place in quite recent years, up to 1868. There are rock-cut tombs in the immediate neighborhood, including that of the Holy Sepulcher.

"During recent years several sites to the north of the city have been suggested as the site of Golgotha, in order, apparently, to comply with the view that the place of execution should be situated on the north side of the city (Lev. i:10, 11); but, though this may have been necessary for the Jewish place of stoning, there is nothing to indicate that the place of crucifixion during the Roman occupation was located according to Jewish ritual, or that it was identical with the place of stoning.

"A knoll above 'Jeremiah's grotto' has been suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849 (followed by General Gordon, Colonel Conder, and others) as the genuine Calvary, on the ground principally that it is the place of stoning according to modern Jewish tradition."

GOLIATH (go-li'ath), (Heb. גִּלְיָת, gol-yath', exile).

1. The giant whom David slew at Ephes-dammim (1 Sam. xvii). In the account of the fight he is spoken of as a Philistine from Gath. He was so politically, but it does not follow that he was of the ordinary Philistine blood. Presumably, he was of the rephaite or giant breed, elsewhere spoken of as living at Gath (2 Sam. xxi: 15-22; 1 Chron. xx:4-8), and was descended from the ancient Avim or Anakim. (See ANAKIM; AVIM; GIANTS; RAPHA; REPHAIM.)

The Hebrew text makes him six cubits and a span in height. Josephus and some MSS. of the Septuagint reduce this to four cubits and a span. On general principles the Hebrew reading is the more authoritative, and it fits best the figures given for the tremendous weight of his armor and weapons. Counting the cubit at twenty-one inches, this would make him over eleven feet high, and over nine feet high if we count the cubit a handbreadth shorter. If he was measured in his armor, from the ground to the top of his helmet-crest, this is not incredible, though he is probably the largest man of whom we have any authentic record. (W. J. Beecher, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

For forty days he went out from the camp of the Philistines, and haughtily defied the Hebrews to produce a man that durst engage him in a single combat. He offered to decide the subjection of the one nation to the other on the victory by this single combat. The Hebrews were terrified at the very sight of him; but David, coming to the camp, undertook to attack him with a staff, a sling, and a few small stones. With disdain Goliath cursed him by his idols, and bade him come on, and he would give his flesh to the fowls of the air; meanwhile David slung a stone, which, penetrating by the hole left in the helmet for the giant's eye, or while he was tossing up his forehead, and leaving it bare, in contempt of his puny antagonist, sank into his head, and brought him to the ground, flat on his face. David then ran up to him, and with his own sword cut off his head (1 Sam. xvii). Perhaps, on occasion of this victory, he composed the 9th and 14th Psalms. Four of his brethren were afterward slain by David's warriors (2 Sam. xxi; 1 Chron. xx). (See GIANTS.)

2. The Goliath of 2 Sam. xxi:19 is probably a different person.

GOME (gōm), (Heb. גֹּמֶה, go'meh), translated 'rush' and 'bulrush,' is mentioned in four places of Scripture, from which there is no doubt that it was a plant growing in moist situations in Egypt, and employed in the construction of vessels of different kinds, intended to float upon the water, such as the ark in which Moses was hid, and vessels for transit (Job viii:11; Is. xxxv:7; Exod. ii:3; Is. xviii:2). Though other plants are adduced by translators and commentators as the gome of Scripture, yet it is evident that only the papyrus can be meant, and that it is well suited to all the passages.

The papyrus is now well known: it belongs to the tribe of sedges or cyperaceæ, and is not a bush or bulrush, as in the Authorized Version. It may be seen growing to the height of six or eight feet, even in tubs, in the hothouses of this country, and is described by the ancients as growing in the shallow parts of the Nile. The root is fleshy, thick, and spreading; the stems triangular, eight or ten feet in height, of which two or so are usually under water, thick below but tapering towards the apex, and destitute of leaves; those of the base broad, straight, and sword-shaped, but much shorter than the stem. This last is terminated by an involucl of about eight leaves, sword-shaped and acute, much shorter than the many-rayed umbel which they support. The secondary umbels are composed only of three or four short rays, with an involucl of three awl-shaped leaflets. The flowers are in a short spike at the extremity of each ray.

The papyrus was well known to the ancients as a plant of the waters of Egypt. 'Papyrus nascitur in palustribus Ægypti aut quiescentibus Nili aquis, ubi evagata stagnant' (Pliny, xiii:11). Theophrastus, at a much earlier period, described it as growing, not in the deep parts, but where the water was of the depth of two cubits, or even less. It was found in almost every part of Egypt inundated by the Nile, in the Delta, especially in the Sebennyitic nome, and in the neighborhood of Memphis, etc.

The plant is sweet, and was used by the Egyptians for food and for making many sorts of vessels; the root was burned for fuel. The construction of papyrus boats is mentioned by Theophrastus. That the papyrus was employed for making paper is also well known, and Wilkinson mentions that from ancient paper being found at Thebes and elsewhere, it is evident that this application of it was much anterior to the time of Alexander the Great. (See PAPHYRUS; REED.)

GOMER (gō'mer), (Heb. גֹּמֶר, go'mer, perfection).

1. The eldest son of Japheth, son of Noah (B. C. after 2414), whose descendants Bochart (Phal. iii. 8) supposes to have settled in Phrygia (Gen. x:3; comp. 1 Chron. i:5). Most of the interpreters take him to be the ancestor of the Celtæ, and more especially of the Cimmerii, Κυμνέριοι, who were already known in the time of Homer (Odyss. xi:14). To judge from the ancient historians (Herodotus, Strabo, Plutarch, etc.), they had in early times settled to the north of the Black Sea, and gave their name to the Crimea, the ancient Chersonesus Taurica. But the greater part of them were driven from their territories by the Scythians, when they took refuge in Asia Minor in the seventh century before Christ (Herod. iv:12).

They attacked the northern frontier of the Assyrian empire in concert with the Minni, the Medes, the people of Sepharad (Sapardâ), and other populations whose territories they had already overrun; but in B. C. 677 their leader, Teuspa (Teispes), was defeated by Esarhaddon, and they were driven partly eastward, where they overthrew the old kingdom of Ellipi and built Ecbatana, partly westwards into Asia Minor. Here they sacked Sinôpe and Antandros, which they held for 100 years, and finally invaded Lydia. Gyges or Gugu, the Lydian king, sent an embassy to Nineveh for help; in the end, however, he was slain in battle, and his capital, Sardis, captured by the invading hordes. His successor, Ardys, succeeded in exterminating or driving them out of the country. (A. H. Sayce, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

In the Scriptures, however, the people named Gomer would seem to imply rather an obscure and but vaguely known nation of the barbarous north (Rosenmüller, Alterth. i. 1. 235, sq.).

Josephus (Antiq. i:6, 1) says expressly, that the ancestor of the Galatians, a Celtic colony, was called Gomer (Michael. Suppl. p. 335, sq.). The Gomeri are generally considered to have been identical with the Cimbrî of Roman times, and the Cymry of Wales. Cambria and even Cumberland still preserve the memory of their name.

2. The name of the daughter of Diblaim, a harlot who became the wife or concubine (according to some, in vision only) of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i:3), B. C. about 785.

GOMORRAH (go-mör'rah), (Heb. עִמֹרָה, am-oraw', a submersion; Gr. Γόμορρα, gom'or-rhah, Matt. x:15, etc.), one of 'the cities of the plain' destroyed along with Sodom.

Its position along with that of Sodom and the other three is now pretty generally admitted to have been in the Arabah, or plain, which lies to the north of the Dead Sea. Of the five original cities, all but Zoar (or Bela) were destroyed by fire from heaven (Gen. xix:3-29). The situation has been verified by Tristram, who, on placing himself in the required positions, was able to recognize the view described as it was regarded by Lot on selecting his future residence (Gen. xiii:10), and by Abraham during the destruction of the doomed cities (xix:27). (See SODOM.)

GOMORRHA (go-mör'rhâ), the form which appears (Matt. x:15; Mark vi:11; Rom. ix:29; 2 Pet. ii:6) for the foregoing place.

GOODLY, GOODLINESS (Heb. הָאֵר, to'ar; outline, i. e., figure or appearance, beautiful).

Though 'goodly' was at one time used adverbially also, it is employed in A. V. as an adjective only. There it is found with two different meanings (and the modern meaning, considerable, pretty large, 'a goodly number,' is not one of them).

Fair to look upon, fine, handsome. In this sense it is applied to persons, as Gen. xxxix:6 'Joseph was a goodly person, and well favored;' of garments, as Exod. xxxix:28 'goodly bonnets of fine linen;' of trees, as Ps. lxxx:10 'the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars' (לְעֵצֵי אֲרָזִים, lit. as A. V. marg. and R. V. 'cedars of God'); of cities (Deut. vi:10), mountains (Deut. iii:25), horses (Zech. x:3); and not only of majestic things, but of vessels (2 Chron. xxxvi:10, 19), precious stones (Matt. xiii:45; Luke xxi:5), and even 'heritages' (Ps. xvi:6; Jer. iii:19). It is also used of a price (Zech. xi:13) paid for a slave, 'a handsome price!' spoken ironically there. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GOODLY TREES (gōōd'ly trēs), (Heb. עֵצֵי יָפֵה, ates haw-daww', trees of ornament).

The Israelites were directed to take "boughs of goodly trees" (i. e., carry about in festive procession) on the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles (see FESTIVALS), in memory of their having dwelt in booths (Lev. xxiii:40). The expression, "goodly trees," probably included not only the orange and citron, which were placed in gardens for ornament rather than for use, but also myrtles, olive trees, palms, and others which had beauty or pleasant odor" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

GOODMAN (gōōd'mān), (Gr. οἰκοδεσπότης, oy-kod-es-pot'ace, Matt. xx:11; xxiv:43; Mark xiv:14; Luke xxii:11), rendered "master of the house" (Matt. x:25; Luke xiii:25; xiv:21); "householder" (Matt. xiii:27; xx:1, etc.). "Goodman" (Prov. vii:19) is the rendering of the Hebrew עֵשׂ, eesh, man. i. e., husband.

The word is a combination of 'good' and 'man' (not, says Skeat, a corruption of Anglo-Saxon gumman as suggested by Aldis Wright); and it is probable that the meaning 'master' arose from the meaning 'husband,' in which, it must be remembered, it is one of many similar combinations, as good-father, good-sister, etc.; in fact, all relatives by marriage were once so designated in England, and are still so designated in Scotland, especially when speaking of persons below the rank of what are called the gentry.

GOPHER WOOD (gō'fēr wōōd), (Heb. עֵצֵי גֹפֶר, go'fer), is mentioned only once in Scripture, as the material of which Noah was directed to build the ark (Gen. vi:14), 'Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch' (khemar, probably 'bitumen').

In endeavoring to ascertain the particular kind of wood which is mentioned in the above passage, we can get assistance only from the name, the country where the wood was supposed to have been procured, or the traditional opinions respecting it. That nothing very satisfactory has been ascertained is evident from the various interpretations that have been given of this word, so that some have preferred, as in our Authorized Version, to retain the original Hebrew. The greatest number of writers have been of opinion that by the gopher wood we are to understand the cypress; and this opinion is supported by such authorities as Fuller in his Sacred Miscellanies; Bochart (Geogr. Sacra); as well as by Celsius.

GORGIAS (gōr'ji-ās). A Syrian general under Antiochus IV.

In 166 B. C. he led a detachment of troops from Emmaus, in the Philistine plain, where the main army was encamped, to make a night attack on Judas Maccabæus; but Judas, having learned of the plan, withdrew his forces and led them to a successful attack on Gorgias' own camp. When Gorgias returned, his followers saw their camp in flames and fled (1 Macc. iii:38; iv:25). A little more than a year later Gorgias was commanding at Jamnia, and he met and defeated Joseph and Azarias, who in the absence of Judas had charge of the troops in Judæa, and were advancing to attack the town (v. 55-62). (Jos. Antiq. XII. viii:6.)

In 2 Macc. xii:32-37 this defeat is barely mentioned, but we are told how Judas defeated Gorgias and how the accursed (τὸν κατάρτοιον) Gorgias himself was nearly taken prisoner by a Jewish horseman named Dositheus. The description of Gorgias in 2 Macc. xii:32 as 'governor of Idumæa' is perhaps an error for 'governor of Jamnia' (So Grotius, and comp. Jos. Antiq. XII. vi:8).

GORTYNA (gor-tý'nà), (Gr. Γορτύνα, gor-tu'na, 1 Macc. xv:23). The most important city in Crete, after Gnossus, situated about midway between the two ends of the island.

GOSHEN (gō'shen), (Heb. גֹּשֶׁן, go'shen).

1. A province or district of Egypt in which Jacob and his family settled through the instrumentality of his son Joseph, and in which they and their descendants remained for a period of 430 years (Gen. xlv:10; xlv:28; xlvii:27; 1:8; Exod. viii:22; ix:26). The Bible does not present any definite information as to the precise locality of Goshen, and of course later authorities possess only an inferior value. There are, however, incidental expressions, allusions, and implications in the scriptures, which afford aid in determining the spot. That Goshen lay on the eastern side of the Nile may be justifiably inferred from the fact that Jacob is not reported to have crossed that river; nor does it appear that the Israelites did so in their flight out of Egypt. With this inference all the language employed (see the passages as given above), to say the least, agrees, if it does not afford an indirect evidence in its favor. It would appear from Exod. xiii:17, 18, that Goshen bordered on Arabia (see Gen. xlv:10, Sept. Γοσέη Ἀραβίας, Goshen of Arabia) as well as Palestine, and the passage of the Israelites out of Egypt shows that the land was not far removed from the Red Sea. It appears probable that we may fix the locality of Goshen in Lower Egypt, on the east side of the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile, in the district around Heroopolis. (Bellermann, Handb. d. Bibl. Lit. iv. 191-220; Jablonsky, Dissert. viii. de Terra Gosen.)

This district was suitable for a nomadic people, who would have been misplaced in the narrow limits of the valley of the Nile. We are not, however, to expect evidences of luxuriant fertility. The country was chosen for its pre-eminent fitness for shepherds. If a nomadic tribe had wide space and good pasture-grounds, they would have 'the best (for themselves) of the land,' and these advantages this district abundantly supplied in ancient times, when the waters of the Nile were more liberally dispensed than at present in the eastern side of the country. Nothing is needed but water to make the desert fertile. 'The water of the Nile soaks through the earth for some distance under the sandy tract (the neighborhood of Heliopolis), and is everywhere found on digging wells eighteen or twenty feet deep. Such wells are very frequent in parts which the inundation does not reach. The water is raised from them by wheels turned by oxen and applied to the irrigation of the fields. Whenever this takes place the desert is turned into a fruitful field. In passing to Heliopolis we saw several such fields in the different stages of being reclaimed from the desert: some just laid out, others already fertile. In returning by another way more eastward, we passed a succession of beautiful plantations wholly dependent on this mode of irrigation' (Robinson's Palestine, vol. i. p. 36).

2. A district in Southern Palestine (Josh. x:41; xi:16). According to the first passage it was between Gaza and Gibeon, and therefore in the low country; in the second passage the low country is mentioned in addition to Goshen. Exact situation is unknown.

3. A city and the territory around it in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:51). Exact site unknown.

GOSPEL (gōs'pěl), (Anglo-Sax. Godspell—'God story', not 'good story'), the translation from Anglo-Sax. times of εὐαγγέλιον in New Testament. In Homer, in the sing., and in Attic Gr., in the pl., it signified a reward or a thank-offering for good tidings. In later Greek (Plutarch, in the pl., Lucian, in the sing.) it signified also the good tidings itself. In LXX, 2 Sam iv:10, the Attic meaning and the plural occur. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

The central point of Christian preaching was the joyful intelligence that the Savior had come into the world (Matt. iv:23; Rom. x:15); and the first Christian preachers, who characterized their account of the person and mission of Christ by the term εὐαγγέλιον, gospel, were themselves called εὐαγγελιστάι, evangelists (Eph. iv:11; Acts xxi:8). The former name was also prefixed to the written accounts of Christ.

Four Gospels. We possess four such accounts; the first by Matthew, announcing the Redeemer as the promised King of the Kingdom of God; the second by Mark, declaring him 'a Prophet mighty in deed and work' (Luke xxiv:19); the third by Luke, of whom it might be said that he represented Christ in the special character of the Savior of sinners (Luke vii:36-50; xv:18-19, sq.); the fourth by John, who represents Christ as the Son of God, in whom deity and humanity became one. The ancient church gave to Matthew the symbol of the lion, to Mark that of man, to Luke that of the ox, and to John that of the eagle; these were the four faces of the cherubim. The cloud in which the Lord revealed himself was borne by the cherubim, and the four Evangelists were also the bearers of that glory of God which appeared in the form of man.

(1) Order and Chronology. Concerning the order which they occupy in the scriptures, the oldest Latin and Gothic Versions, as also the Codex Cantabrigiensis, place Matthew and John first, and after them Mark and Luke, while the other MSS. and old versions follow the order given to them in our Bible. As dogmatical reasons render a different order more natural, there is much in favor of the opinion that their usual position arose from regard to the chronological dates of the respective composition of the four gospels: this is the opinion of Origen, Irenæus, and Eusebius. All ancient testimonies agree that Matthew was the earliest, and John the latest evangelist. The relation of the gospel of John to the other three gospels, and the relation of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke to each other, is very remarkable. With the exception of the history of the Baptist, and that of Christ's passion and resurrection, we find in John not only narratives of quite different events, but also different statements even in the above sections, the strongest of which is that relating to the crucifixion of Christ, which—according to the first three gospels—took place on the first day of the Passover, while, to judge from John xiii:1, 29; xviii:28; xix:14, 31, it would appear that it had taken place on the eve of the day on which the passover was to be eaten, but which was either not eaten at all by our Lord, or was anticipated by him by a day. On the other hand, the first three evangelists not only tolerably harmonize in the substance and order of the events they relate, but correspond even sentence by sentence in their separate narratives (comp. ex. gr. Mark i: 21-28 with Luke iv:31-37; Matt. viii:31-34; Mark vi:34; v:17; Luke viii:32-37, etc.) The thought that first suggests itself on considering this surprising harmony is, that they all had mutually drawn their information from one another. Thus Grotius, ex. gr., is of opinion that Matthew was the oldest source, and that Mark drew his information both from Matthew and Luke; again, according to Büsching, Luke was the oldest, and Matthew made use of Luke and Mark; while most critics in Germany have adopted the view of Griesbach, that Matthew was the oldest, and was made use of by Luke, and that Mark derived his information both from Matthew and Luke. Following the suggestion of Rore, some of the most modern critics, such as Weisse, Wilke (in his work entitled Ur-evangelist, 1838), and Bauer, are, on the other hand, of opinion that Mark was the original evangelist, and that Matthew and Luke derived their information from him. The difference of these opinions leads to the suspicion that none of them are right, more especially when we consider that, notwithstanding the partial harmony of the three evangelists in the choice of their sentences, there is still a surprising difference in them as regards the words of those sentences; a fact which compelled the critics who suppose that the evangelists made use of each other's writings, to account everywhere for such deviations, and frequently to have recourse to the most trivial and pedantic arguments. To us these differences in word and phrase would appear inconceivable were we disposed to assume that the evangelists had copied from each other.

(2) Substantial Truth Under Circumstantial Variety. As the three evangelists mutually supply and explain each other, they were early joined to each other, by Tatian, about A. D. 170, and by Ammonius, about A. D. 230, and the apparent discrepancies among them early led to attempts to reconcile them. An essay of this kind was written by Augustine in his book De Consensu Evangelistarum. Starting from the principle of a verbal inspiration in the gospels, every difference in expressions and facts was considered as a proof that the speeches and facts had repeatedly occurred. This opinion is advanced for instance, in Andreas Ossiander's Harmonia Evangelistarum. The subject is, however, more freely handled by Calvin, Chemnitz, Kaiser, Gerhard, and others, in their respective works, De Harmonia Evangelistarum. Gerhard's book, in three folio volumes, is one of the most comprehensive exegetical works on the four gospels. (See also Examination of the Testimony of the Evangelists by Simon Greenleaf, LL. D., late Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University.) Strauss has drawn his principal argument against the historical character of the gospels from these discrepancies; but he is in the first instance wrong in supposing that the Evangelist had the intention of relating the particulars of events scrupulously in a chronological order; nor is he less wrong in seeing in every deviation a contradiction, and in the attempts at reconciliation, productions of mere dogmatic prejudice, while he is himself guilty of prejudice, by the very aversion he shows against every attempt at such reconciliation!

When we consider that one and the same writer, namely, Luke, relates the conversion of Paul (Acts ix:22, 26), with different incidental circumstances, after three various documents, though it would have been very easy for him to have annulled the discrepancies, we cannot help being convinced that the evangelists attached but little weight to minute preciseness in the incidents, since, indeed, the historical truth of a narration consists less in them, in the relation of minute details, than in the correct conception of the character and spirit of the event. An exposition and refutation of the most recent attacks against the truth of the Evangelical history on account of this discrepancy, may be seen in Tholuck's Glaubwürdigkeit der Evangelischen Geschichte; and in his Review of Strauss's Life of Christ in Literarischer Anzeiger, 1838; also in Ebrard's Wissenschaftliche Kritik der Evangelischen Geschichte, 2 vols. 1842. This last work is a compendium of all critical investigations into the history contained in the gospels. (Literature: Fisher's Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, N. Y., 1866; N. GOSPELS, SPURIOUS (gös'pëls, spū'rī-ūs). See APOCRYPHA.

The canon of the New Testament, as we have already seen, having been finally settled before the close of the fourth century, the rejected writings which bore the names of the Apostles and Evangelists soon sunk into oblivion, and few, if any, have descended to our times in their original shape. From the decree of Gelasius and a few other sources we have the names and a few detached notices of a good many of these productions. We shall first speak of those which are still extant.

(1) Joseph the Carpenter. The history of Joseph the carpenter, which has been preserved in the East in an Arabic translation, was first made known in Europe in the commencement of the sixteenth century by Isidore de Isolanis in his Summa de donis Sti. Josephi.

(2) The Gospel of the Infancy was first published by Henry Sike, at Utrecht, in 1697, from an Arabic MS. Sike's Latin version was republished by Fabricius, who divided it into chapters, The Arabic was divided into corresponding chapters by Thilo, in 1832.

There are several MSS. of this gospel extant, the oldest of which known is that in the Medicean Library, written in 1299. The narratives which it contains were current in the second century, and the account contained in this gospel respecting Christ's learning the alphabet is mentioned by Irenæus (Adv. Hæres. i:20) as a fabrication of the Marcosians. The Gospel of the Infancy is found in the catalogue of Gelasius, and it is especially remarkable from the fact that it was most probably this gospel which was known to Mohammed, who seems to have been unacquainted with any of the canonical scriptures, and who has inserted some of its narrations in the Koran. The original language was probably Syriac. It is sometimes called the Gospel of Peter, or of Thomas.

(3) Gospel of Thomas. The gospel of Thomas the Israelite (Greek), a work which has flowed from the same source with the former, was first published by Cotelerius.

This gospel relates the fable of Christ's learning the Greek alphabet, in which it agrees with the account in Irenæus. In other gospels of the Infancy (as in that published by Sike) he is represented as learning the Hebrew letters. It has been questioned whether this is the same work which is called the Gospel of Thomas, by Origen, Ambrose, Bede, and others. This gospel probably had its origin among the Gnostics, and found its way from them, through the Manichees, into the church.

(4) The Protevangelion of James has descended to us in the original Greek. Although this work is styled by Postell the Protevangelium, there is no MS. authority for this title, nor for the fact of its being ascribed to St. James the Apostle. It only appears that the author's name is James. The narrations of this gospel were known to Tertullian (Adv. Gnost., c. viii.), Origen (Com. in Matt. p. 223), Gregory Nyssen (Orat. in diem Nat. Christ. Opp. vol. iii. p. 346), Epiphanius (Hæc. 79. sec. 5), the author of the Imperfect Work on Matt., Chrysost. (Opp. tom. vi. p. 24), and many others among the ancients.

(5) The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, which most probably, in its present form, dates its origin from the sixth century, has been even recommended by the pretended authority of St. Jerome. It is from these Gospels of the Infancy that we have learned the names of the parents of the Blessed Virgin, Joachim (although Bede reads Eli) and Anna. The narratives contained in these gospels were incorporated in the Golden Legend, a work of the thirteenth century, which was translated into all the languages of Europe, and frequently printed. There are extant some metrical accounts of the same in German, which were popular in the era of romance. These legends were, however, severely censured by some eminent divines of the Latin church, of whom it will be sufficient to name Alcuin, in his Homilies, in the ninth, and Fulbert and Petrus Damianus (bishop of Ostia) in the eleventh century. 'Some,' says the latter, 'boast of being wiser than they should be, when, with superfluous curiosity, they inquire into the names of the parents of the Blessed Virgin, for the evangelist would surely not have failed to have named them if it were profitable to mankind' (Sermon on the Nativity). Eadmer, the monk, in his book on the Excellence of the Virgin, writes in a similar strain (cap. ii, Anselm. Opp. p. 435, Paris, 1721). Luther also inveighs against the readers of these books (Homil. ed. Walch. tom. xi; and Table-Talk, ch. vii, tom. xxii, p. 396).

There were several editions of Jerome's pretended translation published in the fifteenth century, one of them by Caxton. It is printed by Thilo from a Paris MS. of the fourteenth century, and divided by him into twenty-four chapters, after a MS. of the fifteenth century in the same library. One of the chief objects of the writer of these gospels seems to be to assert the Davidical origin of the Virgin, in opposition to the Manichees.

It has been supposed that the first author of these ancient legends was a Hellenistic Jew, who lived in the second century, but that they were added to and interpolated by Seleucus at the end of the third, who became their reputed author; and that still further additions were made by the Nestorians, or some late Christians in India. Lardner (Credibility, vol. viii) so far differs from Mr. Jones as to believe the author not to have been a Jew. The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary was received by many of the ancient heretics, and is mentioned by Epiphanius, St. Augustine, and Gelasius. The Gnostics and Manichees endeavored to found on its authority some of their peculiar opinions (such as that Christ was not the Son of God before his baptism, and that he was not of the tribe of Judah, but of that of Levi).

(6) Gospel of Marcion. Although the gospel of Marcion, or rather that of St. Luke as corrupted by that heretic in the second century, is no longer extant. Professor Hahn has endeavored to restore it from the extracts found in ancient writers, especially Tertullian and Epiphanius. This work has been published by Thilo.

(7) Greek Gospel of St. John. Thilo has also published a collation of a corrupted Greek gospel of St. John, found in the archives of the Knights Templars in Paris. This work was first noticed (in 1828) by the Danish Bishop Muentzer, as well as by Abbé Grégoire, ex-bishop of Blois. It is a vellum MS. in large 4to, said by persons skilled in palæography to have been executed in the thirteenth or fourteenth century, and to have been copied from a Mount Athos MS. of the twelfth. The writing is in gold letters. It is divided into nineteen sections, which are called gospels, and is on this account supposed to have been designed for liturgical use. These sections, corresponding in most instances with our chapters (of which, however, the twentieth and twenty-first are omitted, are subdivided into verses, the same as those now in use, and said to have been first invented by Robert Stephen (See VERSES). The omissions and interpolations (which latter are in barbarous Greek) represent the heresies and mysteries of the Knights Templars. Notwithstanding all this, Thilo considers it to be modern, and fabricated since the commencement of the eighteenth century.

(8) Gospel of Nicodemus. One of the most curious of the apocryphal gospels is the Gospel of Nicodemus, or Acts of Pilate. It is a kind of theological romance partly founded on the canonical gospels. The first part, to the end of ch. xv., is little more than a paraphrastic account of the trial and death of Christ, embellished with fabulous additions. From that to the end (ch. xxviii) is a detailed account of Christ's descent into hell to liberate the spirits in prison, the history of which is said to have been obtained from Lenthius and Charinus, sons of Simeon, who were two of those 'saints who slept,' but were raised from the dead, and came into the holy city after the resurrection. This part of the history is so far valuable, that it throws some light upon the ancient ideas current among Christians on this subject. It is therefore considered by Birch (Auctarium, Proleg. p. vi.) to be as valuable in this respect as the writings of the Fathers.

(9) Lost Gospels. Of the gospels no longer extant, we know little more than that they once existed. We read in Irenæus, Epiphanius, Origen, Eusebius, and other ecclesiastical writers, of the Gospels of Eve or of Perfection, of Barnabas (ancient and modern), of Bartholomew, of Basilides, of Hesychius, of Judas Iscariot, of the Valentinians, of Apollon, of Cerinthus, of the Twelve Apostles, and several others. Some of these were derived from the Gnostics and other heretics; others, as the Gospel of Matthias, are supposed by Mill, Grabe, and most learned men to have been genuine gospels now lost. Those of which we have the fullest details are the Gospel of the Egyptians and that of the Nazarenes. This latter is most probably the same with that of the Hebrews, which was used by the Ebionites. It was supposed by St. Jerome to have been a genuine Gospel of St. Matthew, who, he says, wrote it in the Hebrew language and letters. He copied it himself from the original in the library of Cæsarea, translated it into Greek and Latin, and has given many extracts from it. Grabe conceived this gospel to have been composed by Jewish converts soon after our Lord's ascension, before the composition of the canonical Gospel of St. Matthew. Baronius, Grotius, Father Simon, and Du Pin, look upon it as the Gospel of St. Matthew—interpolated, however, by the Nazarenes. Baronius and Grabe think that it was cited by Ignatius, or the author of the Epistles ascribed to him. Others look upon it as a translation altered from the Greek of St. Matthew. Mr. Jones thinks that this gospel was referred to by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians. It is referred to by Hegeſippus (Enseb. Eccl. Hist. iv: 22), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. ii, p. 280), Origen (Comm. on John; Hom. viii. in Matt.), and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii: 25, 27, 39). Epiphanius (Hæres. secs. 29, 30) acquaints us that it was held in great repute by the ancient Judaizing Christians, and that it began thus: 'It came to pass in the days of Herod king of Judæa that John came baptizing with the baptism of repentance in the river Jordan,' etc. It consequently wanted the genealogy and the first two chapters.

(10) The Gospel of the Egyptians is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iii, pp. 445, 452, 453, 465), Origen (Hom. in Luc. p. 1), Ambrose, Jerome (Præf. to his Comm. on Matt.), and Epiphanius (Hæres. lxii, sec. 2). Grabe, Mill, Du Pin, and Father Simon, who thought highly of this gospel, looked upon it as one of the works referred to by St. Luke in the commencement of his gospel. Mill ascribes its origin to the Essenes, and supposes this and the former gospel to have been composed in or a little before A. D. 58. It is cited by the Pseudo-Clement (Second Epistle to the Corinthians, or Chevallier's Translation, 1833), who is generally supposed to have written not before the third century. (See Car. Chr. GOSPELS—OLDEST SYRIAC, AND OTHER DOCUMENTS.

When in 1894 the oldest version of the gospels was uncovered amidst the debris of the Greek Convent of Mount Sinai, it was as much the result of faithful research as if it had been found amidst the ruins of buried cities. This discovery was due to the zeal and faithfulness of Mrs. Agnes Smith Lewis, who had conceived the idea that there might be literary treasures here which had not been noticed by Tischendorf and other scholars. She therefore took a long and very tiresome journey accompanied by her sister only, and took up her abode in this old retreat. She went well prepared for serious work, carrying with her a camera and a few necessary books. She could read Syriac and could converse in Greek, and she slowly won the confidence and respect of the monks by her ability to talk with them in their native tongue, and also by the evident sincerity of her character and mission. After a time they gave her access to the library and her long and patient searching was at last rewarded by the discovery of an invaluable palimpsest, which is a manuscript, or rather a parchment, that has been twice written upon, the first writing having been erased with more or less success to make room for the second. Under the later writing of this old parchment Mrs. Lewis found a very old Syrian text of the gospels. She took careful photographs of it and it was afterwards found that they represented a text of the gospels not like that of the Peshito Version, but quite similar to what is known as the "Curetonian Fragments."

Soon after this important discovery was made known a new expedition was planned for the study of the manuscripts, and the result is a valuable publication by the Cambridge Press bearing the endorsement of such men as F. Crawford Burkitt, Robert L. Bensly, and J. Rendel Harris.

This old manuscript proved to be the most ancient version of the four gospels, or the larger portion of them, representing a translation from Greek into Syriac which is considerably older than the Peshittâ Syriac, although this had hitherto been considered the oldest and most authoritative for textual purposes of all the versions of the New Testament.

The immense importance of this discovery will be manifest if we consider for a moment the relations of this Sinaitic Syriac text with other versions.

The Syriac Peshittâ had been considered the oldest until Mr. Cureton discovered the most puzzling fragments of another Syriac version in a Nitrian monastery. This Curetonian Syriac version was accepted as an earlier version than the Peshittâ, but no other very early manuscript was discovered which contained the larger part of the gospels until this longer one found by Mrs. Lewis, if we except the famous Sinaitic manuscript of the whole New Testament belonging to the fourth century.

In the meantime, however, the Diatessaron of Tatian, or Tatian's harmony of the Four Gospels in Syriac, was found in Armenian and Arabic versions, and it appeared that in many respects this Diatessaron agreed with the Curetonian rather than with the Peshittâ. In the opinion of the scholars who have devoted the most time to this manuscript the new discovery adds greatly to the value of the Curetonian by attesting its purity and fixing its very early age. The Peshittâ probably goes back to the third century, but Tatian's Diatessaron apparently came into use in the Syriac churches between 170 and 180 A. D. It became so popular that it was read in the Syriac capital and other churches in various portions of the country.

Whether or not the Curetonian was older than the Diatessaron has been a problem which is even yet by no means easy of solution, but the study of the newly discovered manuscript shows it to have a text which is purer than the Curetonian manuscript which is considered older than the Diatessaron; that is, it must go back to about 150 A. D., if not earlier.

Destructive criticism has assailed the age of the manuscripts and has attempted to show that the gospels belong to a much later period than the events which they record, but the weight of scholarship endorses their early production. (See Historic Origin of the Bible, by Bissell.) Even Renan admits the force of the arguments along this line. He says: "About the year 100 . . . all the books of the New Testament became fixed very nearly in the form in which we read them." (Life of Jesus, 1st page of Int.) Again he says: "It would appear that we are very near the truth in supposing that the Acts were written about the year 80 . . . Striking indeed is the contrast between this narrative and the Apocalypse written in the year 68, replete with memories of the infamies of Nero." (The Apostles, pp. 21-22.)

Each new discovery has tended to corroborate the fact of their early composition. The finding of the text contained in the Diatessaron was a discovery of great value, for it dated back to a period which probably considerably preceded 170 A. D., as its author, who was a Syrian Christian father, died before A. D. 172. But now we have another version going back to about A. D. 150, while back of this again we must place the period during which the sacred books gained their currency and were translated out of the original Greek into the Syriac for church use. This brings us very near to the lifetime of the Apostles, and quite into the generation of men who, like Polycarp, listened to their teachings.

Thus the possibility of error in ascribing these books to their reputed authors is reduced to a minimum.

Besides the discoveries which contain the actual texts of the early manuscripts of the gospels we are now in possession of other parchments which date back to an early period, and which contain quotations from Biblical books which of course must have been in existence for some time before they were quoted.

For instance, we have a complete Greek copy of the "Epistle of Barnabas," which was discovered in 1859 by Tischendorf, and this work goes back nearly, if not quite, to the beginning of the second century. It quotes Matthew under the formula: "It is written." We have also the "Philosophumena" of Hippolytus, who was martyred in the year 235. This important work gives an account of the heretical sects of the first and second centuries, and is very valuable for the quotations it makes from Valentinus and Basilides, who were heretics in A. D. 125, and from whose writings quotations are given from John's gospel. We have also a valuable work called the "Teaching of the Apostles" which has been recently discovered, and which probably goes back to the early years of the second century, and very likely to the last part of the first century. It gives us that which was probably the first manual which was written for the Christian churches. This work, which has been so remarkably preserved, and at last recovered, casts a clearer light than any other on the origin of the officers in the church, and the early character of its services and teachings. It also quotes considerable portions of the Sermon on the Mount.

But going back to a date earlier than these is "The Epistle of Clement," of Rome. This work, which was discovered only a short time ago, was probably written about A. D. 97, and it gives quotations from the Apostle Paul.

Such discoveries are of the utmost importance, and our own generation has been especially rich with them, even the famous Sinaitic manuscript of the whole New Testament, which belongs to the fourth century, having been recovered within the last thirty years.

The researches of our own times have thus thrown a flood of light upon the hitherto dark period which separated the days of the Apostles from the days of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria. They answer most satisfactorily questions of critical doubt which have been raised by skeptical scholars. They remove many difficulties and carry the gospel of John, as well as other portions of the New Testament, back to the very days of the Apostle John before he died in Ephesus. Every discovery has only confirmed the faith of the church in its accepted scriptures. To doubt that they are the product of the same period to which the events which they record belong, in these days indicates either willful skepticism, or profound ignorance of the subject. (See Historic Origin of the Bible by Edwin Cone Bissell; also Ward, in Hom. Review, Jan. 1895; Bagster's Bible of Every Land; Revision of Translations of the Holy Scriptures, by Henry Burgess; Scholastic History of Canon, by John Cosin.)

GO TO (יָבֹאוּ), (Heb. יָבֹאוּ, yaw-hab', come on, Gen. xi:3; Gr. ἄγε, ag'he, lead, or come on, James iv:13). An interjection of incitement or exhortation, as in Gen. xi:3, 4, 7; or challenging attention, as in Eccl. ii:1; Is. v:5; James iv:13; v:1.

GOURD (gōrd). 1. (Heb. קִיקָיוֹן, kee-kaw-yone', nauseous), occurs only in Jonah iv, where it is several times mentioned, as in verses 6, 7, 9, 10.

It is translated gourd in our Authorized Version, probably from the κολοκύνθη of the Septuagint, often rendered cucurbita. In the margin of the English Bible, Palm-Christ is given. In the Vulgate kikayan is translated hedera, 'ivy. Neither the gourd nor ivy is considered by modern writers to indicate the plant intended; which is remarkable for having given rise to some fierce controversies in the early ages of the Church. The difficulties here, however, do not appear to be so great as in many other instances. But before considering these, it is desirable to ascertain what are the characteristics of the plant as required by the text. We are told, 'The Lord God prepared a gourd (kikayan), and made it to come over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head,' etc. (ver. 6). 'But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered' (ver. 7). And in ver. 10 it is said of the gourd that it 'came up in a night, and perished in a night.' Hence it appears that the growth of the kikayan was miraculous, but that it was probably a plant of the country, being named specifically; also that it was capable of affording shade, and might be easily destroyed. There does not appear anything in this account to warrant us in considering it to be the ivy, which is a plant of slow growth, cannot support itself, and is, moreover, not likely to be found in the hot and arid country of ancient Nineveh, though we have ourselves found it in more southern latitudes, but only in the temperate climate of the Himalayan Mountains. The ivy was adduced probably only from the resemblance of its Greek name, κισσός, to kikayan. That the kikayan was thought to be a gourd seems to have arisen from the kiki of the Egyptians being the khcrwa of the Arabs, often incorrectly written kerwa, that is, without the aspirate, which makes it very similar to kura, when written in Roman characters; which last in the East is applied to the gourd or pumpkin (Avicenna, c. 622), and is probably the Lagenaria vulgaris. Many modern authors mistake the one for the other. To this plant, no doubt, the following passages refer, 'The Christians and Jews of Mosul (Nineveh) say it was not the kerwa whose shadow refreshed Jonah, but a sort of gourd, el-kerwa, which has very large leaves, very large fruit, and lasts but about four months' (Niebuhr, Arabia, as quoted by Dr. Harris). So Volney: 'Whoever has traveled to Cairo or Rosetta knows that the species of gourd called kerwa will, in twenty-four hours, send out shoots near four inches long' (Trav. i:71).

With regard to the miraculous growth of Jonah's gourd, Dr. Harris states that the passage may mean, 'Son of the night it was, and as a son of the night it died;' and that, therefore, we are not compelled to believe that it grew in a single night, but rather, by a strong Oriental figure, that it was of rapid growth. This, there is no doubt, it is highly susceptible of in warm countries where there is some moisture. It attains a considerable size in one season; and though in Europe it is only known as an herb, in India it frequently may be seen, especially at the margins of fields, the size of a tree. So at Busra, Niebuhr saw an el-kerwa which had the form and appearance of a tree. The stems are erect, round, and hollow; the leaves broad, palmate, 5 to 8 or 10 lobed, peltate, supported on long foot-stalks. The flowers in terminal panicles; the lower, male; the upper, female. Capsule tricoccus, covered with spines. The seeds are oblong, oval, externally of a grayish color, but mottled with darker-colored spots and stripes. From the erect habit, and the breadth of its foliage, this plant throws an ample shade, especially when young. From the softness and little substance of its stem, it may easily be destroyed by insects, which Rumphius describes as sometimes being the case. It would then necessarily dry up rapidly. As it is well suited to the country, and to the purpose indicated in the text, and as its name kiki is so similar to kikayan, it is doubtless the plant which the sacred penman had in view. J. F. R.

Celsius, on the other hand (Hierob. ii:273), states that it was the khcrwa', Ricinus communis, L., the castor-oil tree. The grounds for this opinion are philological. Dioscorides (iv, 164) describes the κρότων, i. e., the castor-oil tree, under the name of κικι, and the Talmud calls castor-oil קִיקִי קִיקִי, shemen kik. The former opinion, however, has the greater weight, that the plant which God provided to overshadow Jonah, was a vine, which seems from the context to have trailed over his arbor, and not a small tree like the castor-oil plant, which could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be regarded as a vine. (G. E. Post, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) Colocynthus, or Wild Gourd (Citrullus Colocynthus).

Castor-Oil Plant (Ricinus Communis).

2. (Heb. קִיקִי קִיקִי, pak-koo-aw', bursting or splitting open).

The wild gourds eaten by the sons of the prophets (2 Kings iv:38-41) were doubtless the handsome fruit of the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthus), from which the medicine of that name is obtained. The plant bears a fruit resembling an orange in size and shape, but very hard and having its yellow rind marbled with green and white. It resembles the watermelon, and belongs to the same family. For various reasons it is thought that the "knops" used in the ornamental work of Solomon's temple were imitations of the colocynth (1 Kings vi:18). "This plant is very common, and its pulp is a drastic cathartic, and in large quantities an irritant poison. But the castor-oil plant cannot, with any propriety, be called a vine. It is an erect herb, with a brittle, stiff stem and branches, and is quite destitute of tendrils." (G. E. Post, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GOVERNOR (gūv'ēr-n-ēr), the translation of several different Hebrew and Greek words.

1. Al-loof' (Heb. רִיבִי, gentle, familiar), the 'chief' of a tribe or family (Ex. xviii:21; Num. i:16; Gen. xxxiv, 'Dukes' of Edom).

2. K'ho-kake' (Heb. פֶּה־כֶּהֱ, Judg. v:9), and Mekh-o-kake' (Heb. פֶּה־כֶּהֱ, Judg. v:14), denotes a ruler in his capacity of lawgiver and dispenser of justice (Gen. xlix:10; Prov. viii:15; comp. Judg. v:14 with Is. x:1).

3. Mo'shel (Heb. מֹשֶׁל, having dominion), a ruler having power over property and person (Josh. xii:2; Ps. cv:20; Gen. xxiv:2; xlv:8, 26; 2 Chron. xxiii:20).

4. Naw-gheed' (Heb. נָדָד, a commander), signifies the King as a military and civil chief (2 Sam. v:2; vi:21; 1 Chron. xxix:22; 2 Chron. xxxii:21, xix:11; 1 Kings iv:6, xviii:3, etc.).

5. Naw-see' (Heb. נֹשֶׁבֶת, an exalted one), the head or chief of a tribe as (Gen. xvii:20; Num. ii:3, etc.).

6. Peh-khaw' (Heb. פֶּה־כֶּהֱ, a petty chieftain, 1 Kings x:15; 2 Chron. ix:14, etc.).

7. Paw-keed' (Heb. פֶּה־כֶּהֱ, one who held an office by appointment, Gen. xli:34; Judg. ix:28; 2 Chron. xxiv:11; Neh. xi:14, 22; 2 Kings xxv:19; Jer. lii:25).

8. Shal-leet' (Heb. שַׁלְלֵט, a man of authority, Gen. xlii:6; Dan. ii:15; v:29).

9. Sar (Heb. שָׂר, a chief in any capacity, Gen. xxi:22; 1 Kings xvi:9; xi:24, etc.).

10. Eth-nar'khace (Gr. ἐθνάρχης, 2 Cor. xi:32), an officer of high rank.

11. Hayg-em-ohn' (Gr. ἡγεμών, Matt. xxvii:2, etc.), a procurator.

12. Oy-kon-om'os (οἰκονόμος, Gal. iv:2, a steward.

13. Ar-khee-tree' klee-nos (Gr. ἀρχιτεράκλιος, John ii:9), a governor of the feast.

14. Yoo-thoo'none (Gr. εὐθύνων, one leading, a guide). "[The ships] are turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth" (Jas. iii:4). In this passage the word governor means a pilot, the man at the helm who governs the ship.

GOZAN (gō'zan), (Heb. גֹּזָן, go-zawn', quarry), a river of Media, to the country watered by which Tiglath-pileser first, and afterwards Shalmaneser, transported the captive Israelites (1 Chron. v:26; 2 Kings xvii:6).

It is now generally admitted that the Gozan is no other than the present Ozan, or, with the prefix, Kizzil-Ozan (Golden River), which is the principal river of that part of Persia that answers to the ancient Media. This river rises eight or nine miles southwest of Sennah, in Kurdistan. It runs along the northwest frontier of Irak, and passes under the Kafulan Koh, or Mountain of Tigris, where it is met by the Karanku. These two rivers combined, force a passage through the great range of Caucasian, and, during their course, form a junction with the Sharood. The collective waters, under the designation of Sifeed Rood or White River, so named from the foam occasioned by the rapidity of its current, flow in a meandering course through Ghilan to the Caspian Sea (Sir John Macdonald Kinner's Geograph. Memoir of the Persian Empire, pp. 121, 122; Morier's Second Journey, p. 208; Ker Porter's Travels, i. 267).

GRACE (grās), (Heb. חֵן, khane; once, in Ezra ix:8, חֵן נָחַם, tekh-in-naw'; Gr. χάρις, kar'ece; once, in Jas. i:11, εὐπρέπεια, yoo-pref'i-ah), a word of various meanings.

1. Physical beauty (i. e., grace of form and person) (Prov. i:9; iii:22).

2. Favor, goodness of God toward man, or of men toward each other (Gen. vi:8; 2 Sam. x:2; 2 Tim. i:9).

3. God's forgiving mercy, as gratuitous and opposed to merit (Rom. xi:6; Eph. ii:5; Col. i:6, etc.).

4. The gospel generally, as opposed to law (John i:17; Rom. vi:14; 1 Pet. v:12, etc.).

5. Certain gifts of God, freely bestowed; as miracles, prophecy, tongues, etc. (Rom. xv:15; 1 Cor. xv:10; Eph. iii:8, etc.).

6. Christian virtues; e. g., charity, liberality, holiness, etc. (2 Cor. viii:7; 2 Pet. iii:18).

7. The glory to be revealed, or eternal life (1 Pet. i:13).

8. Besides the meaning as given above there are others, among them the following: (1) Spiritual edification of others is called grace; it displays the favor of God, and conveys his gracious influences to men (Eph. iv:29). (2) Speech is, with grace, seasoned with salt, when it is concerning the favor or truths of God, and tends to promote the edification and holiness of such as hear it (Col. iv:6). (3) To be called the grace of Christ is to have his gospel published to us; and to be invited to the enjoyment of the fullness of God (Gal. i:6).

GRACIOUS (grā'shūs), (Heb. חֵן khane), kindness, favor (Prov. xi:16; Jer. xxii:23). Once used in a passive sense as comely and of fair proportions; attractive; winning.

1. How gracious shalt thou be, when pains come upon thee! How comely, how winning, when the Chaldeans come and murder, or carry thee away captive (Jer. xxii:23).

2. "A gracious woman retaineth honor" (Prov. xi:16), literally 'a woman of grace'; LXX γυνή εὐχάριστος; Vulg. 'mulier gratiosa'; 'a gracious woman' is Wycliffe's translation, and all the versions agree with him. The meaning is 'a woman of grace of appearance.'

3. 'The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious,' literally 'are grace' (Eccl. x:12), as in A. V. margin; comp. Luke iv:22 below).

4. 'And all bare him witness and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth' (ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος, R. V. 'words of grace'). The meaning here, says Plummer, is 'winning words.' He adds, 'The very first meaning of χάρις (χαλῶ) is "comeliness," "winsomeness,"' Hom. Od. viii:175. (Eccl. x:12; Ps. xlv:3; Sirach xxi:16; xxxvii:21; Col. iv:6); 'and in all these passages it is the winsomeness of language that is specially signified.'

Bacon uses the term in the sense of winning. "In beauty that of favor [countenance] is more than that of color, and that of decent [becoming] and gracious motion, more than that of favor." Bacon's Essays. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.; Swinton's Bib. Word Book.)

GRAFT, GRAFF (gráft, gráf), (Gr. ἐγκεντρίζω, eng-ken-trid'zo, to prick in).

Grafting is the process in horticulture by which a portion of a plant is made to unite with another plant, whether of the same kind or of another variety or species. The plant upon which the operation is performed is called the stock; the portion inserted or joined with it, the scion or graft. Hence the figure used by the Apostle Paul (Rom. xi:17, 24). It is peculiarly appropriate to the olive tree. God's word is ingrafted, as it is put into and planted in our hearts, that it may bring forth the fruit of good works in our life (James i:21).

GRAIN (grān), (Heb. תְּרֵמֶה, tser-ore', packed, i. e., kernel; Gr. κόκκος, kok'kos, kernel), used (Amos ix:9; Matt. xiii:31, etc.) in the singular and not in a collective sense. (See CORN.)

Figurative. The least grain shall not fall to the earth; the weakest believer in God shall not be hurt or ruined amidst sifting and trying providences (Amos ix:9).

GRANARY (grān'á-rý). See STOREHOUSE.

GRAPE (grāp). See VINE.

GRASS (grās), a term used in Scripture in an indefinite sense, referring to green herbage in general. All the four Hebrew words, yerek, házir, dēshe, and 'esebh, translated "grass," have this wide meaning.

Grasses are very numerous in Bible lands. In Palestine and Syria they are represented by 96 genera and 243 species. Few of them grow in masses. Turf is almost unknown. With the exception of the cereals, none of the grasses are cultivated in these lands. (See CHATZIR; HAY.)

GRASSHOPPER (grās'hóp'-pēr), (Heb. קַרְדִּי, khaw-gawb').

The creature denoted by this Hebrew word so evidently belongs to the class of 'flying creeping things' (Lev. xi:21, 22) that the grasshopper, according to the common acceptance of the word, can scarcely be the proper translation. Other reasons render it most probable that a species of locust is intended. (See LOCUST.) J. F. D.

GRATE (grāt), (Heb. מַבְרַעַת, mak-bare'), a network of brass at the bottom of the altar of sacrifice (Ex. xxvii:4; xxxv:16; xxxviii:4, 5, 30; xxxix:39), to allow a draft.

GRAVE (grāv), (properly Heb. קֶבֶר, keh-ber, a sepulcher; Gr. μνήμα, mnay'mah, or μνημεῖον, mnay-mi'on, literally remembrance, and so tomb). (See BURIAL AND SEPULCHERS.)

GRAVE CLOTHES (grāv klōz), (Gr. κειρα, ke-ree'ah, winding sheet). From early times the body was washed (Acts ix:37), then wrapped in a linen cloth (Matt. xxvii:59), or the limbs separately bound round with strips of linen (John xi:44).

GRAVEL (grāv'əl), (Heb. חַוֵּי, khaw-tsawts', Prov. xx:17; Lam. iii:16; חַוֵּי, may-aw', thought by some to mean interior, belly, Is. xlvi:19), small stones or pebbles; comminuted rock, coarser than sand.

Wycliffe used 'gravel' as a synonym for 'sand.' Thus Gen. xxii:17 'I shal multiply thi seed as sterris of hevenc, and as gravel that is in the brek of the see'; Matt. vii:26, 'And every man that herith these my wordis, and doth hem nat, is liche to a man fool, that hath bildid his hous on gravel, or soond' (Acts xxvii:41); 'And whanne we felden into a place of gravel gon al aboute with the see, thi hurltiden the schipp.' In A. V. also there is practically no distinction between 'gravel' and 'sand,' unless it is made by the addition of 'stones.' (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GRAVEN IMAGE (grā'v'n im'áj), (Heb. פֶּסֶל, peh'sel, or פֶּסֶל, pes-eel', a carving), a figure made of wood or stone (Exod. xx:4; Deut. xxvii:15), to represent Jehovah. (See IDOLATRY.)

GRAVING, ENGRAVING (grāv'ing, ɛn-grāv'-ing). 1. Khaw-tsab' (Heb. כָּצַב, to cut, to hew), although once translated "graven" (Job xix:24), is generally used to indicate the rougher work of hewing stone. (See HEWING.)

2. Khaw-rash' (Heb. קָרַשׁ, to scratch), used to describe "engraving" (Jer. xvii:1).

3. Khaw-kak' (Heb. חָקַק, to hack), a branch of art more nearly coinciding to our idea of engraving. The word is used of engraving a plan or map upon a clay brick (Ezek. iv:1, "portrayed"), of inscribing upon a tablet of stone or metal (Job xix:24), while in Ezek. xxiii:14 it seems to indicate painting.

4. Peh-sel' (Heb. פָּסַל, graven image) refers to the operation of the carver or sculptor. For

GREAT SEA (grāt sē), (Heb. גַּדְלוֹת, gaw-dole'; יָם, yawm, Num. xxxiv:6). The Mediterranean Sea; called also "utmost sea" and "the hinder sea" (Joel ii:20; Zech. xiv:8). (See SEA.)

The Mediterranean was essentially the 'Great Sea' and 'Hinder Sea' to the writers of the Bible; being the western boundary of the Holy Land, beyond which their geographical knowledge did not far extend. Maritime adventure and commerce was not the direction in which Israelitish ambition extended, except perhaps for a short period during the reign of Solomon; and although the lands allotted to the tribes of Judah, Dan, Ephraim, Manasseh, Zebulun, and Asher touched the coast of the Mediterranean at various points, the waters of the Great Sea were seldom traversed by their ships. This was due to several causes; first, the history of the Israelites previous to the curious details of the fabrication of idols, see Isaiah (xxx:22; xl:19; xlv:12-15).

5. Paw-thakh' (Heb. פָּתַח, to open) would appear to describe figures in relief, rather than statues, such as the cherub figures on the temple walls (2 Chron. iii:7).

6. Mik-lah'ath (Heb. מִקְלָחֹת, a sculpture) is rendered "carved figures" (1 Kings vi:29), (Mc. & Str. Bib. Cycl.)

Figurative. (1) The engraving of the names of the twelve tribes in the stones of the high-priest's shoulder and breastplate denoted Christ's perpetual remembrance, esteem, and support of his people, and the impossibility of their separation from him (Exod. xxviii:11, and xxxix:14). (2) God's engraving the graving of the choice stone may denote his conferring on Christ every saving office, his preparing for him a human nature adorned with all gracious excellences (Zech. iii:9). (3) So the saints are graven on the palms of God's hands; he perpetually thinks of, cares for, and does them good (Is. xlix:16).

GRAY (grā). See HAIR.

GREASE (grēs), (Ps. cxix:70), elsewhere rendered fat. See FAT.

GREAT OWL (grāt owl). See OWL.

Exodus was essentially of an inland character; secondly, during and after the invasion of Palestine their efforts were too much directed towards dispossessing the inhabitants and retaining their hold on the countries they had conquered, to give them time and opportunity for extending their sway beyond the coast; thirdly, the absence of natural commodious harbors on the Mediterranean seaboard; and lastly, the presence of the Phœnicians on the north, and of the Philistines on the south, along the coast-line. These nations, especially the former, had command of the sea, and rendered adventure in that direction either useless or impracticable to the children of Israel. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

GREAVES (grēvz), (Heb. מִטְּחָוֹת, mits-khaw', 1 Sam. xvii:6), a piece of defensive armor reaching from the knee to the foot.

GRECIA (grē'ci-ā), (Heb. יָוָן, yaw-vawn'), usually rendered JAVAN (which see); the Latin form (Dan. viii:21; x:20; xi:2) of GREECE (which see).

GREECE (grēēs), (Heb. יָוָן, yaw-vawn'; Gr. Ἑλλάς, hel-las'), properly that country in Europe inhabited by the Greeks (1 Macc. i:1), but in Acts xx:2 apparently designating only that part of it included in the Roman province of MACEDONIA (which see). The relations of the Hebrews with the Greeks were always of a distant kind until the Macedonian conquest of the East; hence in the Old Testament the mention of the Greeks is naturally rare.

(1) Occasional Mention. 'Tubal and Javan,' in connection, are named four times, Dan and Javan once (Ezek. xxvii:19), and Javan, translated by us Greece and Greeks, five times, of which three are in the book of Daniel. Of these passages, that which couples Dan and Javan is generally referred to a different tribe (see JAVAN); in the rest Javan is understood of Greece or its people. The Greek nation had a broad division into two races, Dorians and Ionians; of whom the former seem to have long lain hid in continental parts, or on the western side of the country, and had a temperament and institutions more approaching to the Italic. The Ionians, on the contrary, retained many Asiatic usages and tendencies, witnessing that they had never been so thoroughly cut off as the Dorians from Oriental connection.

(2) Dealings of Greeks with Hebrews. The few dealings of the Greeks with the Hebrews seem to have been rather unfriendly, to judge by the notice in Zech. ix:13. In Joel iii:6, the Tyrians are reproached for selling the children of Judah and Jerusalem to the Grecians; but at what time, and in what circumstances, must depend on the date assigned to the book of Joel (See JOEL). With the Greeks of Cyprus or Chitium, the Hebrews were naturally better acquainted; and this name, it would seem, might easily have extended itself in their tongue to denote the whole Greek nation. Such at least is the most plausible explanation of its use in 1 Macc. i:1, and viii:1.

(3) Religious Ceremonies. Whatever the other varieties of Greek religious ceremonies, no violent or frenzied exhibitions arose out of the national mind; but all such orgies (as they were called) were imported from the East, and had much difficulty in establishing themselves on Greek soil. Quite at a late period the managers of orgies were evidently regarded as mere jugglers of not a very reputable kind (see Demosth. De Coronâ, sec. 79, p. 313); nor do the Greek States, as such, appear to have patronized them. On the contrary, the solemn religious processions, the sacred games and dances, formed a serious item in the public expenditure; and to be permanently exiled from such spectacles would have been a moral death to the Greeks. Wherever they settled they introduced their native institutions, and reared temples, gymnasia, baths, porticoes, sepulchers, of characteristic simple elegance. The morality and the religion of such a people naturally were alike superficial; nor did the two stand in any close union. Bloody and cruel rites could find no place in their creed, because faith was not earnest enough to endure much self-abandonment. Religion was with them a sentiment and a taste rather than a deep-seated conviction. (See GREECE, RELIGION OF.)

(4) Arts of Peace and War. Among the Greeks the arts of war and peace were carried to greater perfection than among any earlier people. In navigation they were little behind the Tyrians and Carthaginians; in political foresight they equaled them; in military science, both by sea and land, they were decidedly their superiors; while in the power of reconciling subject-foreigners to the conquerors and to their institutions, they perhaps surpassed all nations of the world. Their copious, cultivated, and flexible tongue carried with it no small mental education to all who learned it thoroughly; and so sagacious were the arrangements of the great Alexander throughout his rapidly acquired Asiatic empire, that in the twenty years of dreadful war between his generals which followed his death, no rising of the natives against Greek influence appears to have been thought of. Without any change of population adequate under other circumstances to effect it, the Greek tongue and Greek feeling spread far and sank deep through the Macedonian dominions. Half of Asia Minor became a new Greece; and the cities of Syria, North Palestine, and Egypt, were deeply imbued with the same influence. Yet the purity of the Hellenic stream deteriorated in various places; and some account of the mixture it underwent will be given in the article HELLENISTS (which see).

(5) Missionary Field. When a beginning had been made of preaching Christianity to the Gentiles, Greece immediately became a principal sphere for missionary exertion. The vernacular tongue of the Hellenistic Christians was understood over so large an extent of country, as almost of itself to point out in what direction they should exert themselves. The Grecian cities, whether in Europe or Asia, were the peculiar field for the Apostle Paul; for whose labors a superintending Providence had long before been providing, in the large number of devout Greeks who attended the Jewish synagogues. Greece Proper was divided by the Romans into two provinces, of which the northern was called Macedonia, and the southern Achaia (as 2 Cor. ix:2, etc.); and we learn incidentally from Acts xviii. that the proconsul of the latter resided at Corinth.

(6) Cities of Note. Of the cities celebrated in Greek history, none are prominent in the early Christian times except Corinth. Laconia, and its chief town Sparta, had ceased to be of any importance: Athens was never eminent as a Christian Church. In Macedonia were the two great cities of Philippi and Thessalonica (formerly called Therme); yet of these the former was rather recent, being founded by Philip the Great; the latter was not distinguished above the other Grecian cities on the same coast. Nicopolis, on the gulf of Ambracia (or Arta), had been built by Augustus, in memory of his victory at Actium, and was, perhaps, the limit of Achaia on the western coast (Tacitus, Annal. ii. 53). It had risen into some importance in St. Paul's days, and as many suppose, it is to this Nicopolis that he alludes in his epistle to Titus. (See further under ACHAIÀ and NICOPOLIS.) F. W. N.

GREEK, an inhabitant of Greece.

GREECE, RELIGION OF.

1. Greek Worship: Local Institutions.

The earlier history of Greek worship discloses a point of view decidedly different from that of the Christian church, especially in its Protestant branches. We have not uncommonly suffered the idea of the religious community to fall into the background, in the emphasis that we have laid on the salvation of the individual. The earlier established worship of Greece was wholly a matter for the local community, or for such social groups as the family, the phratry, or the state. And when an individual sought help for his own needs, he naturally turned to the god of some local sanctuary—the sanctuary where he might be, if away from home; if at home, the sanctuary of the family or state to which he belonged. Thus all worship centered about particular localities at which particular gods were thought to be present. When one race displaced another, it brought the worship of its patron gods to the new locality, but at the same time it adopted from its fore-runners there the shrines where they had worshiped. Each local shrine had its own forms of worship, its own priesthood, its own traditions of the gods there honored. Such local cults were the starting-point of Greek religion; they continued through all its growth to be the ground in which it was rooted; and when Christianity was introduced, some of these local gods were transformed into Christian saints, still to be worshiped under a new title.

The different stages in the history of Greek religion may best be understood from this standpoint. It began in the worship by wandering had arisen thus, so that they were exposed to the criticism both of philosophy and of a developed religious sense. Greek religion could not rise out of itself. It brought to the religion which supplanted it a philosophy about God that reached far beyond any Greek god, and a sense of religious need that no Greek worship could satisfy.

The local shrine was very simple in its origin. In the Odyssey (IX., 197) we read of Maron, priest of Apollo, who frequented Ismaros, dwelling with his wife and child in the wooded grove of the god. Chryses (Iliad, i:36-42) served Apollo Smintheus, building temples to please him, and burning fat thighs of bulls and goats on his well-built altar at Chryse. The oldest localities of worship were sacred spots, marked by an altar and often by a grove where a god was wont to tribes of their patron gods; and as soon as a tribe became attached to any locality, the worship of its gods was also localized there. As intercourse developed between the different Greek tribes or races, these gods became more widely known. It was the province of civilization to unify the culture of all the elements which entered into it. Politically it was attended by the rise of larger political groups, the early kingdoms of Greece; it tended to bring the gods also, as well as men, into one world—e.g., to bring together heaven-gods into a Zeus, and herd-gods into an Apollo, the son of Zeus—so that the way was paved for the creation of the pantheon which appears in the Homeric poems. The life of historic Greece found expression in city-states, and the religious cults of a city shared all its progress and glory. Athena became, as we have seen, the exponent of the highest culture of Athens, and to her worship pilgrims gathered from all the Greek world. There remained, however, many heterogeneous elements in the nature of gods that be worshiped. The only priests mentioned in the Homeric poems conducted the worship at such local shrines.

In the historic period sacred precincts varied greatly in size and character. The whole Krissaean plain near Delphi was sacred to Artemis, Leto, and Athena Pronaia, and its cultivation was entirely forbidden. Or, again, the spot of sacred ground was scarcely more than large enough for a small chapel. Entrance into the sanctuary was forbidden to those who had not complied with the local requirements, and some places were entirely closed. The more sacred spots were carefully marked, and often enclosed by a wall of stone. Rarely the sacred land was kept from cultivation; commonly it was cultivated and the rent derived from its use was devoted to the maintenance of the temple and its worship. Such leases were very carefully drawn up, and describe in detail the manner of cultivating the sacred land, of caring for its forest ground, and of keeping the sacred herds of cattle. From these sources, from tithes and other taxes levied by the state, and from gifts consecrated to the gods, the income of a shrine might become very large.

All that was necessary for worship was an altar. Before the dwelling house and often in each room was a sort of obelisk, on which fruit and incense were offered to the family gods; in the public squares, in the places of assembly, and on the acropolis stood altars to the gods of the city; the altar was the most important feature of the sacred precinct, and in the temple itself there might be a small altar for offerings that were not burned. The altars for offerings of fruits, flowers, cakes, etc., were small pillars, sometimes round, sometimes with paneled sides, and capable of high ornamentation. The altars for burnt offerings were still more various in character. One sacred altar at Olympia was a heap of ashes from former sacrifices, on top of which the thighs of new victims were burned. A pile of stones or a brick structure served as an altar at some sanctuaries, but often the structure was elaborate, with carved marble sides and architectural ornaments at top. The great altar of Zeus at Pergamon was about forty feet high, and its sides were ornamented with a beautiful frieze representing the battle of the gods and giants.

The temple was situated on some spot already made sacred by worship, either on the acropolis of the city, or on some other site a little removed from the bustle of daily life. Only the more important cities had temples, and these varied in size from very small chapels to the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus. Approaching a temple from the east, and going up a flight of steps, the worshiper entered a hall enclosed only by pillars in front, from which opened the sanctuary proper, the naos (Latin cella). Larger temples had also a back room, opisthodomos, opening from the opposite end, and they were surrounded by one or two rows of columns. The front room, Pronaos, was used for votive offerings, while in the naos stood the image of the god. At first this was a rude object of wood or stone, but later the best art of Greece gave expression to the Greek thought of its gods in marble or in bronze. In few instances, as in the Parthenon at Athens, the statue was constructed of gold, with ivory to represent the flesh parts.

It has been said that the temples existed more for the god than for man. Originally, they were built to protect the holy image and the treasure of the divinity; and while this continued to be their main object, they were always centers of worship, for in them was felt the presence of the god. The temple differs from the church in that there is no assembly room for worship. The great altar stood outside, and here the victims were slain and the thigh pieces burned. Meantime, however, the worshiper would visit the god in his temple, and the feast which was so important a part of worship was held about temple and altar in the sacred precinct.

In regard to priests, but one general statement holds true, viz., that they were public officials rather than sacred persons. Each shrine had its own regulations as to age, sex, and other characteristics of its priests. The priesthood might belong to a particular family, or it might be acquired by lot, by election, or even by purchase. Selection did not depend on purity of life or religious devotion, though certain sins might render a man ineligible. The office of course conferred a certain degree of sacredness on those who held it, but the priests were primarily the officials of the city or of the local shrine, whose duty it was to direct the worship there.

(1) Forms of Worship. Religious worship in Greece was connected with certain specified days, as well with definite localities. The Athenians boasted that they were the most religious people of Greece because they observed more sacred days than any other people. Certain days of every month were sacred, the seventh to Apollo, the fifth to the Erinyes, if Hesiod's statement (Erg. 802) be true also of Athens, and the great festivals of the gods increased the number to approximately the number of holy days observed by the Christian church. In speaking of particular gods, we have mentioned some of the elements that entered into the worship of these days. Athletic games were a very ancient method of honoring the Greek gods, and the forms of the athlete were transferred to the types of the gods themselves. Music was a constant element in worship. Processions were accompanied by music, worship at the altar took the form of song and dance, the prayer that accompanied sacrifice was commonly a hymn of praise and supplication; even the contestants for prizes in music were often bound to sing or play in praise of the god. The drama was a development of Dionysos-worship, nor were its religious origin and meaning ever forgotten. Processions and splendid pageants were an important element in worship. They were an exhibition of the glory of the god, as well as an indication of man's desire to serve the god. The central point of worship, however, was the festal sacrifice.

It is a fair assumption that the pious Greeks recognized the gods whenever a domestic animal was slain for food. Certainly, when the farmer killed his own stock, he burned certain parts to the gods, just as at the great religious festivals animals were slain as a sacrifice, and parts of them were consumed by fire; and it is probable that the pious Athenian would have felt scruples about the use of flesh bought from a butcher had not similar rites been observed. (Such flesh was therefore "food offered to idols," (1 Cor. viii:4). Thus it is true that the sacrifices were feasts, and also that at every feast the flesh had been in a sense consecrated to the gods. The religious occasions for sacrifice included, first, the recurring feasts of the gods; secondly, the fulfillment of vows made in time of danger, and thirdly, times when the help of the gods was specially needed, as before a battle or a journey. The animals chosen for the sacrifice must be in every way sound. Farther than this, the choice of the animal and its age depended on the particular god to whom it was offered, Poseidon preferring bulls, Apollo young lambs, Athena heifers, and Dionysos goats.

In preparation for the sacrifice the offerers clothed themselves in fresh garments and put on wreaths as for a feast, and the animals were adorned with flowers and garlands. The procession brought the animals, together with the implements of sacrifice, to the altar, barleycorns were scattered on the altar and on the animal, and a lock of the animal's hair was thrown into the flame. Meantime all present observed silence, while music of flutes accompanied the prayer-hymns to the gods. The animal's throat was cut—in the case of oxen, after they had been stunned by an axe or club—and the blood was either allowed to flow on the altar, or collected in a vessel and poured on the altar. Parts of the entrails were burned on the altar, with fat to help the flame; and after it was entirely cut up, the thigh bones, and in particular localities other parts also, were burned to the gods. All present joined in pouring libations of wine on the altar to the music of hymns and of flutes. The remainder of the flesh was roasted and eaten by priests and offerers in sacrificial meal, with further libations to the gods. On great festal occasions large numbers of victims were slain, and thus the worship culminated in a general feast to the gods.

Other minor sacrifices may be briefly mentioned. Whenever men were eating or drinking, libations of wine mixed with water were poured out to the gods. In Homer we read many times of libation and prayer, especially before men set out on some important undertaking. Special libations also are offered to the dead and to the gods beneath the earth. In the simple worship of the household, flowers, fruits, and cakes are placed on altars for the gods. In spite of the general preference for animal victims, there were some shrines to which they would be a profanation, and at these men offered fruits or sacred cakes. Again, as the use of incense was introduced into Greece, and men enjoyed its fragrance in their own houses, it came to be used both at the feasts of the gods and in the regular temple ritual.

Sacrifice to Athena at a Wedding.

Votive offerings, anathemata, form a class by themselves, to which the name sacrifice is not strictly applicable. They were devoted to a god in memory of some distinct blessing that had been received. The sick man, on regaining health, would dedicate an image of the part that had been diseased—a foot or an ear, it might be—and many of these offerings have been recovered by excavation. After returning from a journey, offerings were brought to the gods. Thus upon the successful return of the ten thousand, a sum of money was dedicated, a part of which Xenophon later used to found a shrine in Elis for the Ephesian Artemis. Trophies won in the games were often devoted to the gods; c.g., the tripods received as prizes in the dramatic contests at Athens were set up as votive offerings. Slaves were dedicated to a Divinity, to be his servants; later, this became a regular method for the manumission of slaves, in which cases they received the protection of the god, though no regular service was required of them. It was always customary to dedicate to a god small copies of his temple image, or of the animal that was his symbol, however we may interpret this usage. Finally, the anathemata included religious taxes, or revenues which were dedicated by states to their patron divinities.

It is not always easy to determine the religious intent of this worship. Votive offerings are the simplest to explain, for clearly they express the worshiper's desire to honor the god by a gift, just as a subject would honor his king by bringing him a gift of value. Libations, cakes, fruits, etc., were also gifts, not valuable in themselves, but nevertheless the correct offering when ancient custom declared that they were what the god wanted then and there of his servant. The last statement applies equally to all sacrifices; viz., they were the right way to express one's desire to honor the god, because they were the way prescribed by tradition. Nevertheless we can analyze somewhat more closely the religious sentiment expressed in the sacrificial feast. The banquet still binds together those who share it, so that it is used by all sorts of associations to arouse a sentiment of union; and among many races this bond has in itself something sacred. Moreover, the banquet has a direct effect on the disposition, which we express by saying that it kindles "good feeling." The physical stimulus of meat and wine is very powerful on human nature. The sacrificial banquet bound Greek worshipers together, and awakened on each occasion a new feeling of union with one another and with the god they worshipped. It was the god who gave the banquet to entertain his worshipers; he was himself present at the sacrifice, so that those who shared it gained a sense of communion with him. The very physical stimulus of the banquet was utilized to produce religious feeling. It was combined, however, with other stimuli, which prevented the sentiment from becoming gross or material.

The splendid procession, solemnly bearing the image or some symbol of the god, the music on some theme consecrated by long use in worship, the artistic surroundings of the perfect temple and statue embodying religious ideals in form for the eye to see them—all these combined to stir the aesthetic nature of this people and to give fitting expression to the feelings which they aroused. The study of Greek worship indicates clearly that religion appealed to the artistic side of the Greek nature, and that it met any reaching toward God by the perfect forms of its manifold art.

(2) Worship in Time of Need. Nowhere is the objective character of Greek religion more apparent than in its attitude toward sin. The normal worship that has just been considered has been called mechanical because it proceeds on the supposition that, if man offers food and other objects to the gods, then the gods will grant him prosperity; it may more truly be called social, in that theoretically man honors the gods as he would honor a human ruler, and regards divine blessings and the divine rule as he would regard the rule of a righteous king. If, however, the student uses the word social, he should not forget that the social relations between man and the gods in Greece must be conceived as far broader and far more intimate than those between man and any human king.

In such a religion it is impossible that the sense of sin should occupy a fundamental place. It was not indeed difficult or unusual for men to incur the displeasure of the gods. But what impressed the Greek was the judicial side of the matter, the fact that disaster followed wrongdoing as its penalty. No stress was laid on repentance; the Greek gods found no satisfaction in extreme self-humiliation; the wrong was conceived as in the outward act, not so much in the disposition from which the act sprang, so that the only remedy lay in the practice of certain outward rites by which at length divine favor might be regained.

The origin and motives of wrong-doing were carefully analyzed in Greek poetry. It was the presumption of Agamemnon that incurred the wrath of Artemis, his ambition which led him to appease her wrath by the sacrifice of his daughter that he might lead the expedition against Troy. The ambition and lust of Aigisthos led him to marry Agamemnon's wife and to slay the king on his return. Pride, becoming presumption, brought severe penalty on such heroes of Greek legend as Marsyas and Niobe. The two great moral thoughts of Greek tragedy are: that sin breeds sin as its penalty and that laws sometimes conflict so that the observance of higher law makes one subject to the penalty of another law, as in the stories of Orestes and Antigone.

Thus the supplicant did not pray for forgiveness of inward guilt, but sought immunity from the penalty of sin in the same spirit that he asked the divine help in evils which he had done nothing to bring on himself. Of the rites by which individuals sought to soothe the anger of the gods and escape disaster we know but little. When in peril at sea or in battle, men sought protecting favor by vows of sacrifices to be paid if they survived. Before a journey they sacrificed to Hermes, the traveler's god, and to their own family gods, to prevent disaster. In sickness they vowed sacrifices to some patron deity or hero, or had sacrifices performed in their behalf to some god of healing, such as Paian or Asklepios.

Sophocles gives us a picture of the rites by which a city sought relief from the plague. An embassy is sent to Delphi to learn what should be done, and meantime processions kindle sacrifices on all the altars of the city. In time of extreme need even human sacrifices were practiced, though rarely, in the hope that the anger of the gods might be satisfied by one victim instead of many. It was the regular practice to offer sacrifices before battle and before an expedition set out from home, and the will of the god was ascertained from the appearance of the victim. The victims for sacrifice in time of calamity or of peril were not always domestic animals, as in the case of ordinary sacrifices, but dogs, asses, wild animals, and birds were also occasionally offered. Nor was the ritual of sacrifice the same; for apparently libations were omitted, the animal was slain in a slightly different manner, and its body was completely burned. At such times men could not seek communion with the gods, but by peculiar sacrifices sought to avert their wrath.

These sacrifices were offered not only to the great gods that ordinarily protected a city, but particularly to the special gods of each locality—the gods closely connected with the soil, and the so-called heroes. The gods of the soil were worshiped mainly by the peasantry, and often represented an older type of deity than the Olympian gods of the ruling classes. To the peculiar rites of such worship men turned in time of need, when the customary forms did not seem efficacious. The hero may be defined as a god worshiped only in a limited locality, and with no place among the Olympian gods of mythology. Often they, too, were old gods whose worship continued only in one place, so that they were reduced to the rank of local spirits. The myths about some of these gods were taken up in the Greek epic, where the term hero (heros) had something of its English meaning; the general use of the term, however, in literature as well as in religion, had to do simply with local divinities. The worship of heroes filled a large place in practical religion. Not that cities celebrated great feasts in their honor, though such was sometimes the case, but for a smaller group of worshipers the hero was more of a real divinity than were the gods themselves. Calamity was attributed to the anger of some hero who had been neglected; and on the other hand, special blessings were expected from their favor. Like the saints of Europe, they stood much nearer the worshiper than the great state gods; they sympathized better with his needs, and so he paid them a truer worship.

Closely related in form to the sacrifices in time of need (sphagia), which have just been considered, were the rites of purification for murder and for sacrilege. In the Homeric poems there is no trace of these sacrifices. In later times the murderer must flee out of the land, and, unless the murder were accidental, he could never return. If, however, the act were unintentional, he must first seek purification in a foreign land. The man who conducted the rites slew some animal, preferably a young pig, and applied its blood to the murderer, after which its body was burned and other sacrifices were offered to the gods. Before engaging in certain religious rites, e.g., in the mysteries celebrated at Eleusis, it was also necessary for the individual to purify himself with the blood of a young pig. In contrast with this, the impurity which came from contact with the dead required only ceremonial washings to set it aside.

If it were a city that demanded purification, the rites were far more complex. It was first necessary to remove the cause of impurity, as the graves were all removed from the island of Delos, or again as the Alkmaionidai were all driven from Athens before the city could be purified from their sacrilegious act. In the latter instance, we read, the next step was to bring black and white sheep to the altars where the sacrilegious murders had been committed; there they were released, and wherever one lay down it was sacrificed on the spot to the god in whose precinct it was. A human sacrifice is also mentioned by some writers. By these means the city was purified and the plague was stayed.

Thus by water and by blood, as in special cases by different herbs or by burning sulphur, the taint of evil was removed, and men might again expect favor from the gods.

2. General Character of Greek Religion—Its Place in the History of Religion.

It is the work of religion to explain the world in its spiritual meaning as science explains it from the purely intellectual side.

In the first place, Greek religion furnished a spiritual interpretation of nature. The nature side of most of the greater gods has been so obscured that we cannot be confident what it was; indeed, in many instances, we cannot be quite sure that they ever did represent powers of nature. We do know, however, that the Greek peopled all nature with spiritual beings; the hills and the woods, the rivers, the sea, the winds he regarded as the expression, in each instance, of a life like his own, only superior. Thus he felt a kinship between all that was useful, beautiful, wonderful, terrible, in nature and his own spirit. The world was made intelligible and human by religion; to use the happy phrase of a recent writer, religion made man at home in the world. In such a world not only could his mind work freely and use the objects of nature with confidence, but the spiritual side of his nature could also expand. For the Greek gods were not merely personified powers of nature, but full and complete persons, with the emotions and passions of man, so that a broad spiritual relation connected them with man. Man felt himself also to be a part of nature, and the deification of his own powers—his love in Aphrodite, his intellect in Athena, his warlike impetuosity in Ares—contributed farther to "make him at home in the world."

Secondly, Greek religion met man's needs directly by creating beings which watched over particular phases of his life and activity. Sosipolis, Orthopolis, Alalkomencis were "city-protecting divinities;" Auxesia, Phytos, Phorbas, gods of growth, as Erichthonios, "earth-breaker," was a god of plowing; Mylas, Ilimalis, Alphito were named from the grinding of the wheat, Iatros and peculiar sympathy between god and worshiper. Greek religion not only brought order into the world, but this order was along the lines of everyday Greek life, and it responded to every act of the individual, intellectual, æsthetic, or distinctly religious. As the natural world developed the body and the senses, so the divine world was a home for man's spirit.

With all its beauty and all its harmony with Greek culture, Greek religion had many weaknesses. In fact, its chief weakness lay along the very line of its strength. The gods were so truly Greek that they copied the frailties of the Greek nature all too well; these ideals of generous, beautiful life lacked the moral fibre of a sterner race; moreover, Greek religion was rooted in the past, so that popular worship, holding to traditional rites, could not rise to the idea of the gods which it had itself suggested. At length it could no longer satisfy religious thought and the needs of the religious life, so that the time was fully ripe for the introduction of Christianity.

Greek religion fulfilled its mission and in large measure disappeared. Estimated historically: (1) It prepared the way for the introduction of Christianity; (2) its sacred places and sacred rites exercised a direct influence on Christianity; and (3) it offered a permanent contribution to the development of religion.

(1) When Christian missionaries came preaching that the world was lost in wickedness, and that men needed salvation (soteria) both for this life and for the life to come, it was a familiar message to their Greek hearers. Earnest minds in Greece had been seeking just this soteria for centuries. A sense of spiritual need had been developed which neither Greek religion nor Greek art nor Greek philosophy could entirely satisfy; and what the Greeks had ignorantly sought, that Christianity declared unto them. A conception of God had been wrought out that was infinitely Ruins of the Temple of Victory, Athens.

Paias from their aid in healing; Taraxippos kept the charioteer's horses from fright, and Telesidromos brought them speedily to the goal of the race. Such gods find no distinct place in the Greek pantheon, although as Kourotrophos, "child-nurturer," became one phase of Demeter's being, so many of these special gods were in a manner taken up into the great gods of Greece. And these gods, like the divinities of nature, furnished an environment for the development of man's spiritual nature.

Thirdly, the social order was reflected in the world of the gods. All the elements of civilization and of culture were taken up into the Greek gods, so that they became the embodiment of all that was truly Greek, the concrete expression of the excellencies, and the faults also, of Greek life. The gods were so closely connected with the state that patriotism received the sanction of religion; art and literature became all but religious modes of expression; and at length philosophy made the daring attempt to re-create the gods—an attempt that was logical enough, for the gods were what man had made them, but yet it was necessarily all-destructive. The result of the intimate relation between Greek culture and the Greek gods was a itely beyond any Greek god; poets and philosophers entertained a firmly-rooted belief in the righteous government of the universe and in a moral law at its foundation; Greek worship taught men to look to the gods for communion and sympathy only to disappoint them, for their gods were not equal to what men sought in them. These needs and these ideals were met by Christianity, and the new religion found a rich soil in the remains of an earlier growth.

(2) Although Greek religion disappeared, many features of it remained and were taken up into Christianity. Many local shrines were consecrated to the use of Christianity. The very Parthenon became at length a Christian church. Heroes and gods of local worship in many instances continued to be, and still are, worshipped as Christian saints. Some of the old feasts and processions, especially the processions by which help was sought in time of need, became consecrated to Christian use. The old mystery rites were consistently fought by Christian leaders, but we can see that before they entirely disappeared the Christian sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper had come to be celebrated somewhat as the mysteries were celebrated, simply because the mysteries had done so much to define the ideas of solemn ritual for the Greek mind. Thus there were many threads of connection between the old worship and the new.

(3) Certain phases of religion were developed in Greece more perfectly than they had been developed before, and the modern world still has something to learn from Greece along this line: Greece developed the human side of religion to a high degree. Human experiences were reflected in the Divine world so that men might feel a peculiar sympathy with their gods. The gods were in closest touch with human life in all its phases. Their life was in the life of men; the work of the farmer and the smith, the experiences of the traveler by land or sea, the daily life of the market, the activity of the state—all this was the sphere of Greek religion. It made all of life brighter and better by lending to it a spiritual side. A. F.

GREEN (grēn). See COLORS.

GREETING (grēt'ing). See SALUTATION.

GREYHOUND (grā'hound'), a very doubtful rendering of Heb. זָרִיר קִנְיָנִים, zar-zeer' mawth-na'yem, slender in the loins (Prov. xxx:31).

That a "greyhound" does not answer to the meaning of the Hebrew is generally agreed. The most probable rendering yet suggested is that of a "wrestler" girded for the fight; others explain it of the war horse, which is so poetically described in the book of Job (xxxix:19-25).

GRIEF (grēf), (Heb. כְּחֹלֶה, khoh-ee'), disease, sickness, anxiety. Used in a bodily as well as a mental sense to indicate pain. The Hebrew word rendered grief in Is. liii:3, 4, 10, is elsewhere translated sickness (Deut. vii:15; xxviii:59, 61; 2 Kings i:2). (See MOURNING; SORROW, etc.)

GRIEVANCE, GRIEVOUSLY (grēv'ans, grēv'ūs-l'y), (Heb. אֲמַלְלָה, aw-maw'l'), wearing effort, worry, Hab. i:3), human misery either of mind or body.

GRINDERS (grind'ērs), in Eccl. xii:3, represent the double teeth used in mastication.

GRINDING (grind'ing). See MILL.

Figurative. (1) The millstones were hard, the nethermost especially, which was fixed; and so the heart of Leviathan is likened to a piece of it, to represent his undaunted courage and obstinacy (Job xli:24). (2) The ceasing of the sound of the millstones implied the turning of the place into a desolation (Jer. xxv:10; Rev. xviii:22). (3) Christ's falling on men, and grinding them to powder, denotes his rendering them utterly miserable for their contempt of him; thus he did grind the Jewish nation, when their city and temple were utterly ruined, and multitudes slain and enslaved in the most wretched manner (Matt. xxi:44). (4) To grind the face of the poor is cruelly to oppress and afflict them (Is. iii:15). (5) Let my wife grind to another; let her become a slave to work at the mill; or let her be defiled by another (Job xxxi:10).

GRISLED or GRIZZLED (grīz'ld or grīz'z'ld), (Heb. בָּהֹרֵק, baw-rode', spotted), partly colored or variegated, as goats (Gen. xxxi:10, 12), or horses (Zech. vi:3, 6).

GROVE (grōv), (Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה, ash-ay-raw'), fortunate.

1. It is generally admitted that this word cannot mean either a green tree or a grove, for the simple reason that the word to make (1 Kings xiv:15; 2 Kings xvii:16, etc.), to set up (2 Kings xvii:10), to stand up (2 Chron. xxxiii:19), and to build (1 Kings xiv:23), used to denote the erection of an Asherah, are not one of them suitable to a tree or grove. On the other hand the Asherah is spoken of as being set up under, or by the side of, the green tree. Asherah is, in all probability, a name for ASHTORETH (which see), and the idol (a wooden column) was by the side of the altars of Baal. This Asherah was often set up in a grove, because thus would be given that seclusion necessary to the cruel and indecent rites which marked, among Oriental nations, the worship of false divinities.

2. Ay'shel (Heb. אֵשֶׁל, rendered "grove," Gen. xxi:33), really means the tamarisk tree, which with its long life, hard wood, and evergreen leaves, was a type of the ever-enduring grace of the faithful covenant-keeping God. A celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. xxiv:26; Judg. ix:6).

GRUDGE (grūj), (Heb. לֵעַן, leen), primitive root, to stay permanently; hence, in a bad sense, to be obstinate; not as in our sense, to covet or begrudge (Ps. lix:15). The Revised Version translates it, "tarry all night."

The modern meaning of the word is found twice in A. V., in the phrase 'bear a grudge against,' and in the adverb 'grudgingly;' Lev. xix:18 'Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people;' 2 Cor. ix:7 'Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver' (ἐκ λύπης, literally 'out of sorrow,' as R. V. margin).

GUARD (gärd), (Heb. טַבַּחְכָּה, tab-bawkkh').

1. The words so translated commonly have reference to the duties of a king's body-guard. Tab-bawkkh' originally meant "cook;" but as this officer usually did the butchering it acquired the meaning of 'executioner' and is used of the body-guard of the kings of Egypt and Babylon (Gen. xxxvii:36; 2 Kings xxv:8; Jer. xxxix:9; xl:1; Dan. ii:14).

2. Rats (רָץ, a runner), also means body-guard (2 Sam. xv:1; 1 Kings i:5; 1 Sam. xxii:17; 2 Kings x:25; xi:6; 2 Chron. xii:10).

3. Mish-meh'reth, מִשְׁמַרְתָּ, meant to 'watch,' or a 'watcher' (Neh. iv:9, 22; vii:3; xii:9; Job vii:12).

GUARDIAN ANGELS (gärd'i-an ä'n'jēlz). See ANGEL.

GUDGODAH (güd'go-dah or gud-gō'dah), (Heb. גִּדְגֹדָה, gud-go'daw, cutting, cleft), the fortieth station of the Israelites, between Mt. Hor and Jotbath (Deut. x:7). The name appears to be preserved in the present wady Ghudhagidh. (See HOR-HAGIDGAD.)

GUEST (gēst). See HOSPITALITY.

GUEST CHAMBER (gēst chām'bēr), (Gr. κατὰλυμα, kat-al'oo-mah, to break up, i. e., a journey), any room for the entertainment of guests (Mark xiv:14; Luke xxii:11), rendered Inn in Luke ii:7. (See HOUSE.)

GUILT (gilt). See SIN.

GUILTY (gilt'y), GUILTY OF BLOOD (Num. xxxv:27, 31); GUILTY OF DEATH (Matt. xxvi:66; Mark xiv:64). This phrase in the last two passages means "deserving of death;" in the former it means simply "guilty of blood-shedding."

GULF (gūlf), (Gr. χάσμα, chas'mah, chasm), figuratively an impassable space, such as is represented to exist between the abode of Abraham and the lost rich man (Luke xvi:26).

The Rabbinical conception of the separation between the two parts of Hades was a thin wall, a mere hand or finger-breadth (Weber, Lehre des Talmud, 326 f.). (Hastings' Bib. Dict.) GUNI (gū'ni), (Heb. גֻּנִי, goo-nee', colored, dyed).

1. A descendant of Gad, and father of Abdiel (1 Chron. v:15). (B. C. between 109 and 782.)

2. Son of Naphtali, founder of the family of Gunites (Gen. xlvi:24; 1 Chron. vii:13). (B. C. before 1856.)

GUNITES (gū'nites), (Heb. גֻּנִיִּים, hag-goo-uee'), a general name of the descendants of GUNI (which see), of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. xxvi:48).

GUR (gūr), (Heb. גֹּר, goor, a whelp as abiding in the lair), an ascent at which Ahaziah was killed while flying from Jehu (2 Kings ix:27), B. C. 883. It was said to be at Ibleam, between Jezreel and Beth-haggan, but has not been identified.

GURBAAL (gūr'bā'al), (Heb. גֹּרְבָאֵל, goor-bah'al), a district inhabited by Arabians (2 Chron. xxvi:7). It seems to have been situated between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula.

GUTTER (gūt'tēr), (Heb. טִּין־נוֹר', tsin-noor').

1. A dam or trough for watering flocks or herds (Gen. xxx:38, 41), but the "gutter" through which one might enter the city of Jerusalem was perhaps some privy entrance, by which the filth of the city ran out (2 Sam. v:6-8), or probably a water course.

2. Rah'hat (Heb. רַחַח, drinking troughs, Exod. ii:16), into which Jacob placed peeled rods when the sheep came to drink (Gen. xxx:38, 40).

In 2 Sam. v:6-8 we have in the Authorized Version as follows: "And the king and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land: which spake unto David, saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither: thinking, David cannot come in hither. Nevertheless David took the stronghold of Zion; the same is the city of David. And David said on that day, Whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the lame, and the blind, that are hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain." This has been considered by all commentators for many years as very obscure, and while we will not attempt a full discussion of the subject, we may perhaps understand it better by observing the following points: (1) The two clauses "except thou take away the lame and the blind," and "thou shalt not come in hither" are improperly transposed, and the transposition renders the next clause meaningless. (2) Instead of "except thou take away the lame and the blind," read, "the lame and the blind shall turn thee away." (3) In verse 8 there is also a transposition of the two clauses, "whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites." (4) Instead of "the Jebusites," with definite article "the" it should be rendered "a Jebusite." (5)

The word translated gutter would be here very properly rendered watercourse. It comes from a verb expressing the sense of rushing water, and is found only in one other place in the Bible (Ps. xlii:8), and is there translated "waterspouts." The following we believe to be a fair and correct rendering of the same by De Wette:

"And the king and his men went to Jerusalem, to the Jebusite inhabiting the land. And he spoke to David, saying: Thou shalt not come in hither; but the blind and the lame will turn thee away, saying, David shall not come in hither. And David took the stronghold of Zion; that is, the city of David. And David said on that day, Any one that smites a Jebusite and gets to the water course, and the lame and the blind hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain." The Jebusites had long held this stronghold and were so confident that no one could come in thither that they contemptuously shouted, "The lame men and the blind men can easily keep the place." David, however, with a keen, strategic eye saw if his men only got to the "gutter" or waterway and shut off the water supply the Jebusite would soon be compelled to surrender. His men soon took the gutter, or waterway, and the impregnable fortress was surrendered and became the stronghold of Zion. And by being the first to climb up to the waterway, Joab became the commander in chief or captain of David's army, according to David's promise.

GYMNASIUM (jim-nā'zi-ūm), (Gr. γυμνάσιον, in A. V. place of exercise).

A public place in Jerusalem for athletic exercise and exhibitions, below the western cloister of the temple (Josephus, Bell. Jud. iv:9, 12; vi:3, 2; 6, 2), below the palace of the Asmonæans (Antiq. xx:8, 11; Bell. Jud. ii:16, 3), below the citadel or acropolis (2 Macc. iv:12, 27; not the Syrian fortress called the Acra, which was erected later, 1 Macc. i:33). It was situated near the council house, by the first or innermost wall, and at the end of the bridge which led from the temple across the Tyropæon valley (Bell. Jud. v:4, 2; cp. vi:6, 2). It was erected by Hellenizing Jews, under the leadership of Jason, by permission of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i:10, 14; 2 Macc. iv:7 sq.). The essential features of a gymnasium were:

(a) An open court for boxing, wrestling, pitching quoits and throwing the javelin (2 Macc. iv:14, palaestra, discus). (b) A stadium or course for the foot race. (c) A colonnade for a place of recreation and for athletic exercises in winter. (Antiq. and Bell. Jud., passim: its Greek name was xystos). (d) A bathroom.

The gymnasium at Jerusalem was condemned by strict Jews because it introduced heathen customs; led Jewish youth to wear the hat of Hermes, to exercise stark naked in public, and to be ashamed of the mark of their religion; and infected even the priests and caused them to neglect their official duties (1 Macc. i:14, 15; 2 Macc. iv:13-17). It existed until the overthrow of the city by Titus; and was not only resorted to for athletic sports, but was also occasionally used for popular assemblies (Josephus, Bell. Jud. ii:16, 3), (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

H

HA (hâ). The Heb. interjection חָא, ah-awkh', is once translated 'ha, ha,' Job xxxix:25 'He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha,' referring to the neighing of the war horse.

The revisers have changed this into 'Aha!' and have been taken to task for giving the horse a human cry. The older versions were still more 'human,' as Wycliffe (1382) 'Fy!' or (1388) 'Joie!' Coverdale 'tush,' Douay, 'Vah.' 'Ha, ha' comes from the Geneva Bible (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HAASHTARI (hâ'a-hâsh'ta-rî).

(Heb. חַוְּשָׁרִי, haw-akh-ash-taw-ree', perhaps courier, messenger or a mule driver), a man or family descended from Ashur, by his second wife Naarah (1 Chron. iv:6), B. C. after 1618.

HABAIAH (ha-bâ'yah), (Heb. חַבַּיָּהוּ, hab-ah-yaw', in Neh. חַבַּיָּהוּ, hab-aw-yaw', [but MSS. and editions vary in both places] whom Jehovah protects), the descendants of Habaiah returned among the sons of the priests from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but because their genealogy was imperfect they were not allowed to serve (Ezra ii:61; Neh. vii:63), B. C. about 536.

HABAKKUK (hab'ak-kûk or ha-bâk'kuk), (Heb. חַבְּכֻק, hab-ak-kook', embrace, or perhaps the name of a garden plant).

1. The Prophet. One of the most distinguished Jewish prophets, the eighth in order of the minor class, who flourished about 610 B. C., the name denoting, as observed by Jerome, as well a 'favorite' as a 'struggler.' Of this prophet's birthplace, parentage and life we have only apocryphal and conflicting accounts. The Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophet. Opp., tom. ii:18, p. 247) states that he was of the tribe of Simcon, and born in a place called Βηθζοκάρ, Baythzokâr; that he fled to Ostrarine when Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem, but afterwards returned home and died two years before the return of his countrymen. But rabbinical writers asserts that he was of the tribe of Levi, and name different birthplaces (Huetius, Dem. Evang. Prop. iv. p. 508). Eusebius notices that in his time the tomb of Habakkuk was shown in the town of Ceila, in Palestine; and this is repeated also by Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. xii:48), and Sozomen (vii:29); still there are other writers who name different places where, according to common opinion, he had been buried (Carpzov, Introd. ad libros canonicos V. T., p. 402).

2. Book of Habakkuk. A full and trustworthy account of the life of Habakkuk would explain his imagery, and many of the events to which he alludes; but since we have no information on which we can depend, nothing remains but to determine from the book itself its historical basis and its age.

(1) Contents. Now, we find that in chapter i the prophet sets forth a vision, in which he discerned the injustice, violence and oppression committed in his country by the rapacious and terrible Chaldæans, whose oppressions he announces as a Divine retribution for sins committed; consequently he wrote in the Chaldean period, shortly before the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar which rendered Jehoiakim tributary to the king of Babylon (2 Kings xxiv:1). (1) When he wrote the first chapter of his prophecies, the Chaldæans could not yet have invaded Palestine, otherwise he would not have introduced Jehovah, saying (i:5), 'I will work a work in your days, which ye will not believe, though it be told you' (verse 6); 'for I raise up the Chaldæans, that bitter and hasty nation, which shall march through the breadth of the land to possess the dwelling-places that are not theirs.' From verse 12 it is also evident that the ruin of the Jews had not then been effected; it says 'the Lord ordained them for judgment, established them for correction.' (2) Agreeably to the general style of the prophets, who to lamentations and announcements of Divine punishment add consolations and cheering hopes for the future, Habakkuk then proceeds in the second chapter to foretell the future humiliation of the conquerors, who plundered so many nations. He also there promulgates a vision of events shortly to be expected (verse 3); 'the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come; it will not tarry.' (3) This is succeeded in the third chapter by an ode, in which the prophet celebrates the deliverances wrought by the Almighty for his people in times past, and prays for a similar interference now to mitigate the coming distresses of the nation, which he goes on to describe, representing the land as already waste and desolate, and yet giving encouragement to hope for a return of better times. (4) Some interpreters are of opinion that chapter ii was written in the reign of Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv:6), after Jerusalem had been besieged and conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, the king made a prisoner, and, with many thousands of his subjects, carried away to Babylon, none remaining in Jerusalem, save the poorest class of the people (2 Kings xxiv:14). But of all this nothing is said in the book of Habakkuk, nor even so much as hinted at; and what is stated of the violence and injustice of the Chaldæans does not imply that the Jews had already experienced it. The prophet distinctly mentions that he sets forth what he had discerned in a vision, and he, therefore, speaks of events to be expected and coming. It is also a supposition equally gratuitous, according to which some interpreters refer chapter iii to the period of the last siege of Jerusalem, when Zedekiah was taken, his son slain, his eyes put out, the walls of the city broken down and the temple burned (2 Kings xxv:1-10). There is not the slightest allusion to any of these incidents in the third chapter of Habakkuk, and from the sixteenth verse it appears that the destroyer is only coming, and that the prophet expresses fears, not of the entire destruction of the city, much less of the downfall of the state, but only of the desolation of the country. (5) It thus appears beyond dispute that Habakkuk prophesied in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about the year stated above. Carpzov (Introducio ad libr. canon. V. T., pp. 79, 410) and Jahn (Introd. in libros sacros V. T., ii sec. 120) refer our prophet to the reign of Manasseh, thus placing him thirty odd years earlier; but at that time the Chaldæans had not as yet given just ground for apprehension, and it would have been injudicious in Habakkuk prematurely to fill the minds of the people with fear of them. Some additional support to our statement of the age of this book is derived from the tradition, reported in the apocryphal appendix to Daniel and by the Pseudo-Epiphanius, that Habakkuk lived to see the Babylonian exile; for if he prophesied under Manasseh he could not have reached the exile at an age under ninety years; but if he held forth early in the reign of Jehoiakim he would have been only fifty odd years old at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the exile. He was, then, a contemporary of Jeremiah, but much younger, as the latter made his first appearance in public as early as B. C. 629, in the thirteenth year of Josiah. Ranitz (Introductio in Hab. Vatic. pp. 24, 59), Stirkel (Prolog. ad interpr. tertii cap. Hab. pp. 22, 27), and De Wette (Lehrbuch der Historisch-kritischen Einleit. Berlin, 1840, p. 338) justly place the age of Habakkuk before the invasion of Judea by the Chaldeans.

(2) Literary Style. His representations are not inferior to those of the most flourishing age of prophecy, in independent strength, in perfect beauty of arrangement of the parts, and in skillfully rounded discourse, and they combine the greatest force and fullness with the loftiest flights of thought. The style is distinguished by carefully selected and unusual words and turns of expression, which are in some measure quite peculiar to himself. (Keil, Introd. to O. T., vol. 1, p. 412.)

Delitzsch Com. on Hab., p. xiii: "Nowhere else do we find the form of alternate discourse (between God and the prophet) carried out so far, or prophecy so intimately connected with lyric poetry (to the extent which we see in the structure of the strophes in chapter ii, and the musical arrangement in chapter iii). Like Isaiah, he is comparatively far less dependent than other prophets on his predecessors, in respect of both form and matter. Everything still mirrors the most flourishing age of the prophetic order—that age in which prophetic poetry took the place of the holy lyric poetry that had hitherto been the mode of utterance for the religious life of the church, and having been laid hold of mightily by God, came with her trumpet voice to awaken anew the consciousness of God in the church now spiritually dead."

(3) Teaching. The central and distinctive teaching of the book lies in the declaration of Hab. ii:4, and, as indicated above, the true sense of this is, that while the wild excesses of the tyrant carry in them the germ of certain ruin, the 'faithfulness' of the righteous (not his faith) will be to him a principle of life. It is evident that this declaration is no solution of the moral anomaly which the prophet discerns. The Chaldean might indeed, in virtue of his very nature, be doomed ultimately to perish, but his empire survived for seventy years; and meanwhile Habakkuk's compatriots, so far from abiding in peace and security, experienced the indescribable hardships of siege and exile. But 'live' is here used in the full and pregnant sense which it sometimes has in the Old Testament (e. g. Ezek. xviii), of living in the light and consciousness of the Divine favor, and what Habakkuk thus promises is not mere material prosperity, but the moral security—of course, often not unaccompanied by material benefits—which righteousness brings with it even in the midst of external calamities (cf. Is. xxxiii:14-16), and the sense of Divine approval which even then does not desert it. It is enough for the prophet if he can mitigate the difficulty which pressed upon him, as it pressed no doubt upon many of his contemporaries, by recalling to them these two truths of God's providence, the doom which, at least ultimately, overtakes the tyrant, and the moral security enjoyed by the righteous. (S. R. Driver, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HABAZINIAH (häb'a-zi-ni'ah), (Heb. ^{הַבַּזִּינְיָהוּ}), khab-ats-tsan-yaw', perhaps lamp of Jehovah; according to Fürst, collection of Jehovah), father of a certain Jeremiah, and grandfather of the chief Rechabite Jaazaniah, whom the prophet Jeremiah tested with the offer of wine (Jer. xxxv:3), B. C. before 609.

HABAZZELETH (ha-bäz'ze-leth). See CHAB-AZZELETH.

HABITATION (häb'i-tä'shün), the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, and used in the general sense of a place to dwell in (Ps. lxix:25; civ:12; Acts i:20, etc.)

Figurative. (1) God is the habitation of his people; in him they find the most delightful rest, safety and comfort (Ps. xci:9). (2) Justice and judgment are the habitation or establishment of God's throne; all his royal acts are founded on judgment and justice; he takes pleasure to execute them (Ps. lxxxix:14). (3) The land of Canaan, the city of Jerusalem, the tabernacle and temple, heaven and the heart of the saints are represented as the habitation of God; there he did or does signally show himself present, work by his power, or bestow his favor and influence (Jer. xxv:30; Ezra vii:15; Exod. xv:2; Ps. cxxxii:5, 13; Eph. ii:22). (4) Eternity is represented as his habitation; he is eternal in a manner no other is, nor does his duration increase as that of angels and men (Is. lvii:15). (5) He inhabited the praises of Israel; he dwelt in the temple where they praised; he owns, deserves, is the object of, and kindly accepts the praises of his people (Ps. xxii:3). (6) Their first habitation which sinning angels left was their original state of holiness and happiness, and their mansions in heaven (Jude verse 6). (7) A body, soul or family exercised in holiness is called a habitation of righteousness (Job viii:6). (8) The state of heavenly glory is everlasting habitations (Luke xvi:9). (9) The firmament is the habitation of the sun and the moon (Hab. iii:11).

HABOR (hä'bör), (Heb. ^{הַבֵּר}, khaw-bore', joining together).

1. A country of Media, to which portions of the ten tribes were transported, first by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v:26), and afterward by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii:6, xviii:11). It is thought by some to be the same mountainous region between Media and Assyria, which Ptolemy (Geog. vi:1) calls Chaboras (Χαβώρας.) This notion has the name, and nothing but the name, in its favor. Habor was by the river Gozan, and as we accept Major Rennell's conclusions that Gozan was the present Kizzil-Ozan (see GOZAN), we are bound to follow him in fixing the position of Habor at the town of Abhar, which is situated on a branch of that river and has the reputation of being very ancient. At this place Mr.

Morier found ruins composed of large sun-dried bricks compacted with straw, like some of those found at Babylon. As this kind of construction is an infallible sign of remote antiquity, it so far affords a most important corroboration of Major Rennell's conjecture.

2. A river. There seems to be good ground for making the river the modern Khabour, which empties into the Euphrates (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarch. i:247). The name of the Habor is found in the Assyrian inscriptions.

"Tiglath-pileser I (B. C. about 1120) boasts of having killed ten mighty elephants in the land of Haran and 'on the banks of the Habor.' Assurnazir-apli (B. C. 885-860) crossed the Tigris, conquered the district of the Harmis (or Har-rit or Harsit), then marched to the Euphrates after subjugating the district around the mouth of the Habor (piate sa nar Habur), 'the mouths of the river Habor,' from which it would seem that the river flowed into the Euphrates through several outlets" (I. A. Pinches, Hastings' Bib. Dict.).

HACHALIA (häk'a-lî'ah), (Heb. חַכְיָאֵל, khak-al-yaw', the darkness of Jehovah), father of Nehemiah (Neh. i:1; x:1), B. C. before 447.

HACHILAH (häk'i-lah), (Heb. חַכְיָאֵל, khak-ee-law', dark).

A mountain about ten miles south of Jericho, where David concealed himself from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii:19; xxvi:3). Jonathan Maccabæus built here the castle of Massada.

HACHMONI (häk'mo-nî), (Heb. חַכְמֹנִי, khak-mo-nee', skillful).

A man known only as the father (or ancestor, comp. 1 Chron. xxvii:2) of Jashobeam, the chief of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi:11), where son of Hachmoni is rendered "Hachmonite," for which the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii:8) has "Tachmonite," and also of Jehiel, the companion of the princes in the royal household (1 Chron. xxvii:32). (See EZNITE).

Hachmon, or Hachmoni, was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged. Zabdiel was the real father of Jashobeam (1 Chron. xxvii:2), and is said to have been a Korhite (1 Chron. xii:6). (See Kennicott, Diss., pp. 72, 82.)

HACHMONITE, THE (häk'mo-nite). See HACHMONI.

HADAD (hä'däd), (Heb. אֲדָד, had-ad' fierce).

The name of the chief deity of the Syrians, and borne, with or without additions, as a proper name, or more probably as a title, like 'Pharaoh' in Egypt, by several of the kings of Southern Syria.

(1) Kings of Edom. (1) Hadad, king of Edom, who defeated the Midianites in the intervening territory of Moab (Gen. xxxvi:35; 1 Chron. i:46). This is the only one of the ancient kings of Edom whose exploits are recorded by Moses. (2) Another king of Edom of the same name is mentioned in 1 Chron. i:51 (B. C. before 1618).

(2) King of Syria. Hadad, king of Syria, who reigned in Damascus at the time that David attacked and defeated Hadadezer, king of Zobah, whom he marched to assist, and shared in his defeat (B. C. about 1040). This fact is recorded in 2 Sam. viii:5, but the name of the king is not given. It is supplied, however, by Josephus (Antiq. vii:5, 2), who reports, after Nicolas of Damascus, that he carried succors to Hadadezer as far as the Euphrates, where David defeated them both.

(3) Prince of Edom. Hadad, a young prince of the royal race of Edom, who, when his country was conquered by David, contrived, in the heat of the massacre committed by Joab, to escape with some of his father's servants, or rather was carried off by them into the land of Midian, B. C. about 984 (1 Kings xi:14). Thence Hadad went into the desert of Paran, and eventually proceeded to Egypt. He was there most favorably received by the king, who assigned him an estate and establishment suited to his rank, and even gave him in marriage the sister of his own consort, by whom he had a son, who was brought up in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. Hadad remained in Egypt till after the death of David and Joab, when he returned to his own country in the hope of recovering his father's throne (1 Kings xi:14-22). The Scriptures do not record the result of this attempt further than by mentioning him as one of the troublers of Solomon's reign, which implies some measure of success. After relating these facts the text goes on to mention another enemy of Solomon, named Rezin, and then adds (verse 25), that this was 'besides the mischief that Hadad did; and he abhorred Israel and reigned over Syria.' The A. V. seems to make this apply to Rezin, but the Septuagint refers it to Hadad, reading Edam, instead of Araam or Syria, and the sense would certainly be improved by this reading, inasmuch, as it supplies an apparent omission; for without it we only know that Hadad left Egypt for Edom, and not how he succeeded there, or how he was able to trouble Solomon. The history of Hadad is certainly very obscure. Adopting the Septuagint reading, some conclude that Pharaoh used his interest with Solomon to allow Hadad to reign as a tributary prince, and that he ultimately asserted his independence.

(4) Son of Ishmael. A son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv:15; 1 Chron. i:30), whose descendants probably occupied the western coast of the Persian Gulf.

HADADEZER (häd'ad-ē'zer), (Heb. אֲדָד־עִזְרָא, had-ad-eh'zer, Adad his help), or Hadadrezer, king of Zobah.

He was a powerful monarch in the time of David and the only one who seems to have been in a condition seriously to dispute with him the predominancy in Southwestern Asia. He was defeated by the Israelites in the first campaign (B. C. about 984) in the neighborhood of the Euphrates, with a great loss of men, war chariots and horses, and was despoiled of many of his towns (2 Sam. viii:3; 1 Chron. xviii:3). This check not only impaired, but destroyed his power. A diversion highly serviceable to him was made by a king of Damascene-Syria (whom the Scripture does not name, but who is the same with Hadad, 3), who, coming to his succor, compelled David to turn his arms against him, and abstain from reaping all the fruits of his victory (2 Sam. x:6, sq.; 1 Chron. xix:6, sq.). The breathing-time thus afforded Hadadezer was turned by him to such good account that he was able to accept the subsidies of Hanun, king of the Ammonites, and to take a leading part in the confederacy formed by that monarch against David. The first army brought into the field was beaten and put to flight by Abishai and Joab, but Hadadezer, not yet discouraged, went into the countries east of the Euphrates, and got together the forces of all his allies and tributaries, which he placed under the command of Shophach, his general. To confront so formidable an adversary, David took the field in person, and in one great victory so completely broke the power of Hadadezer that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke, of abandoning the Ammonites to their fate, and of submitting quietly to David, whose power was thus extended to the Euphrates.

HADAD-RIMMON (hā'dad-rīm'mon), (Heb. הַדָּד רִמּוֹן, had-ad-rim-mone'), a place in the valley of Megiddo (Zech. xii:11) where a national lamentation was held for the death of King Josiah in the last of the battles which made the plain of Esdraelon famous (2 Kings xxiii:29; 2 Chron. xxxv:23). It is now called Rummānch, and is about a mile northwest by west of Taanach.

HADAR (hā'dar), (Heb. הַדָּר, khad-ar', perhaps chamber).

1. See HADAD, (3).

2. See HADAD, (4).

HADAREZER (hād'ar-ē'zer), (Heb. הַדָּרְעֵזֶר, had-ar-eh'zer, Adad his help, 2 Sam. x:16, 19).

He was a son of Rehob (2 Sam. viii:3). He was the king of Zobah whom David overtook and defeated (1 Chron. xviii:3, 4). The captured shields of gold were taken by David to Jerusalem (xviii:7) and dedicated to Jehovah (B. C. about 1035). Hadarezer made another campaign (1 Chron. xix:16; 2 Sam. x:15) and was again defeated by David. The name is written Hadadezer in 2 Sam. viii:3-12 and 1 Kings xi:23.

HADAS (hā-dās'), (Heb. הַדָּס, had-as'), always translated 'myrtle,' occurs in several passages of the Old Testament as in Isaiah xli:19; lv:13; Neh. viii:15; Zech. i:8, 10, 11.

The Hebrew word hadas is identical with the Arabic hadas, which in the dialect of Arabia Myrtle.

Felix signifies the myrtle tree (Richardson's Pers. and Arabic Dict.). The myrtle is, moreover, known throughout eastern countries.

The repute which the myrtle enjoyed in ancient times it still retains, notwithstanding the great accession of ornamental shrubs and flowers which has been made to the gardens and greenhouses of Europe. This is justly due to the rich coloring of its dark-green and shining leaves, contrasted with the white, star-like clusters of its flowers, affording in hot countries a pleasant shade under its branches and diffusing an agreeable odor from its flowers or bruised leaves.

HADASHAH (hād'a-shah), (Heb. הַדָּשָׁה, khad-aw-shaw', new), one of the towns of Judah in the low country placed between Zenan and Migdal-gad (Josh. xv:37). It has not been satisfactorily identified. (See Schwarz, Phys. Descript. of Pal. p. 103).

HADASSAH (ha-dās'sah), (Heb. הַדָּסָה, had-as-saw', myrtle), the earlier Jewish name of Esther (Esth. ii:7). (See ESTHER.)

HADATTAH (ha-dāt'tah), (Heb. הַדָּטָה, khad-at-taw', new).

One of the towns in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv:25); but the Masoret accents of the Hebrew connect the word with the one preceding it, making it "New Hazor." Both Eusebius and Jerome speak of a "New Hazor," and Mr. Tristram (Land of Israel) speaks of some ruins in the south of Judah which the Arabs said were Hadadah. This may be the Hadattah of Joshua (xv:25). The exact site is unknown.

HADES (hā'dēz), a Greek word ᾗδης, hah'dāce, not to be seen), by which the Septuagint translates the Hebrew שְׁאוֹל, sheol.

(1) Definition. It denotes the abode or world of the dead, in which sense it occurs frequently in the New Testament, where it is usually rendered 'hell' in the English version. The word hades means literally that which is in darkness. In the classical writers it is used to denote Orcus, or the infernal regions.

According to the notions of the Jews, sheol or hades was a vast receptacle where the souls of the dead existed in a separate state until the resurrection of their bodies. The region of the blessed during this interval, or the inferior paradise, they supposed to be in the upper part of this receptacle; while beneath was the abyss or gehenna (Tartarus), in which the souls of the wicked were subjected to punishment.

(2) Interpretation. The question whether this is or is not the doctrine of the Scriptures is one of great importance, and has, first and last, excited no small amount of discussion. It is a doctrine received by a large portion of the nominal Christian church, and it forms the foundation of the Roman Catholic doctrine of Purgatory, for which there would be no ground but for this interpretation of the word hades.

The question therefore rests entirely upon the interpretation of this word, and as the Septuagint gives this as the meaning of the Hebrew word sheol, the real question is, what is the meaning which sheol bears in the Old Testament, and hades in the New?

(3) The Grave. A careful examination of the passages in which these words occur will probably lead to the conclusion that they afford no real sanction to the notion of an intermediate place of the kind indicated, but are used by the inspired writers to denote the grave—the resting place of the bodies both of the righteous and the wicked; and that they are also used to signify hell, the abode of miserable spirits. But it would be difficult to produce any instance in which they can be shown to signify the abode of the spirits of just men made perfect, either before or after the resurrection.

In the great majority of instances sheol is in the Old Testament used to signify the grave, and in most of these cases is so translated in the Authorized Version. It can have no other meaning in such texts as Gen. xxxvii:35; xlii:38; 1 Sam. ii:6; 1 Kings ii:6; Job xiv:13; xvii:13, 16, and in numerous other passages in the writings of David, Solomon and the prophets. But as the grave is regarded by most persons, and was more especially so by the ancients, with awe and dread, as being the region of gloom and darkness, so the word denoting it soon came to be applied to that more dark and gloomy world which was to be the abiding place of the miserable. Where our translators supposed the word to have this sense, they rendered it by 'hell.' Some of the passages in which this has been done may be doubtful; but there are others of which a question can scarcely be entertained. Such are those (as Job xi:8; Ps. cxxxix:8; Amos ix:2) in which the word denotes the opposite of heaven, which cannot be the grave, nor the general state or region of the dead, but hell. Still more decisive are such passages as Ps. ix:17; Prov. xxiii:14; in which sheol cannot mean any place, in this world or the next, to which the righteous as well as the wicked are sent, but the penal abode of the wicked, as distinguished from and opposed to the righteous. The only case in which such passages could by any possibility be supposed to mean the grave, would be if the grave—that is, extinction—were the final doom of the unrighteous.

(4) Future Conditions. In the New Testament the word hades is used in much the same sense as sheol in the Old, except that in a less proportion of cases can it be construed to signify the grave. There are still, however, instances in which it is used in this sense, as in Acts ii:31; 1 Cor. xv:55, but in general the hades of the New Testament appears to be no other than the world of future punishments (e. g. Matt. xi:23; xvi:18; Luke xvi:23).

The principal arguments for the intermediate hades, as deduced from Scripture, are founded on those passages in which things 'under the earth' are described as rendering homage to God and the Savior (Philip. ii:10; Rev. v:13, etc.). If such passages, however, be compared with others (as with Rom. xiv:10, 11, etc.), it will appear that they must refer to the day of judgment, in which every creature will render some sort of homage to the Savior, but then the bodies of the saints will have been already raised, and the intermediate region, if there be any, will have been deserted.

(5) Spirits in Prison. One of the seemingly strongest arguments for the opinion under consideration is founded on 1 Pet. iii:19, in which Christ is said to have gone and 'preached to the spirits in prison.' These spirits in prison are supposed to be the holy dead—perhaps the virtuous heathen—imprisoned in the intermediate place, into which the soul of the Savior went at death, that he might preach to them the Gospel. This passage must be allowed to present great difficulties. The most intelligible meaning suggested by the context is, however, that Christ by his spirit preached to those who in the time of Noah, while the ark was preparing, were disobedient, and whose spirits are now in prison, abiding the general judgment. The prison is doubtless hades, but what hades is must be determined by other passages of Scripture; and whether it is the grave or hell, it is still a prison for those who yet await the judgment day. This interpretation is in unison with other passages of Scripture, whereas the other is conjecturally deduced from this single text.

(6) Destruction of Death and Hades. Another argument is deduced from Rev. xx:14, which describes 'death and hades' as 'cast into the lake of fire' at the close of the general judgment—meaning, according to the advocates of the doctrine in question, that hades should then cease as an intermediate place. But this is also true if understood of the grave, or of the general intermediate condition of the dead or even of hell, as once more and forever reclaiming what it had temporarily yielded up for judgment—just as we every day see criminals brought from prison to judgment, and after judgment returned to the prison from which they came.

(7) Incomplete Reward. It is further urged, in proof of Hades being an intermediate place other than the grave, that the Scriptures represent the happiness of the righteous as incomplete till after the resurrection. This must be admitted, but it does not thence follow that their souls are previously imprisoned in the earth, or in any other place or region corresponding to the Tartarus of the heathen. Although at the moment of death the disembodied spirits of the redeemed ascend to heaven, and continue there till the resurrection, it is very possible that their happiness shall be incomplete until they have received their glorified bodies from the tomb, and entered upon the full rewards of eternity.

(8) Immediate Transition. A view supported by so little force of Scripture seems unequal to resist the contrary evidence which may be produced from the same source, and which it remains briefly to indicate. The effect of this is to show that the souls of the redeemed are described as proceeding, after death, at once to heaven—the place of final happiness, and those of the unredeemed to the place of final wretchedness.

In Heb. vi:12 the righteous dead are described as being in actual inheritance of the promises made to the fathers. Our Savior represents the deceased saints as already, before the resurrection (for so the context requires), 'like unto the angels,' and 'equal to the angels' (Matt. xxii:30; Luke xx:36), which is not very compatible with their imprisonment even in the happier region of the supposed Hades. Our Lord's declaration to the dying thief, 'This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise' (Luke xxiii:43), has been urged on both sides of the argument; but the word is here not Hades, but Paradise, and no instance can be produced in which the paradise beyond the grave means anything else than that 'third heaven,' that 'paradise' into which the apostle was caught up, and where he heard 'unutterable things' (2 Cor. xii:2, 4). In the midst of that paradise grows the mystic 'tree of life' (Rev. ii:7), which the same writer represents as growing near the throne of God and the Lamb (xxii:2). In Eph. iii:15 the Apostle describes the whole church of God as being at present in heaven or on earth. But, according to the view under consideration, the great body of the church would be neither in heaven nor on earth, but in Hades—the intermediate place. In Heb. xii:21-24 we are told that in the city of the living God dwell not only God himself, the judge of all, and Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant, and the innumerable company of angels, but also 'the spirits of just men made perfect'—all dwelling together in the same holy and happy place. To the same effect, but, if possible, still more conclusive, are the various passages in which the souls of the saints are described as being, when absent from the body, present with Christ in heaven (comp. 2 Cor. v:1-8; Philip. i:23; 1 Thess. v:10). To this it is scarcely necessary to add the various passages in the Apocalyptic vision, in which St. John beheld, as inhabitants of the highest heaven, around the throne of God myriads of redeemed souls even before the resurrection (Rev. v:9, vi:9, vii:9, xiv:1, 3). Now the 'heaven' of these passages cannot be the place to which the term Hades is ever applied, for that word is never associated with any circumstances or images of enjoyment or happiness. (See HEAVEN.)

(9) Tartarus. As these arguments seem calculated to disprove the existence of the more favored region of the alleged intermediate place, a similar course of evidence militates with equal force against the existence of the more penal region of the same place. It is admitted by the staunchest advocates for the doctrine of an intermediate place that the souls of the wicked, when they leave the body, go immediately into punishment. Now the Scripture knows no place of punishment after death but that which was prepared for the devil and his angels. This place they now inhabit; and this is the place to which, after judgment, the souls of the condemned will be consigned (comp. 2 Pet. ii:4; Matt. xxv:41). This verse of Peter is the only one in Scripture in which any reference to the word Tartarus occurs. But from the other text we can be quite certain that the Tartarus of Peter is no other than the hell which is to be the final, as it is, in degree, the present doom of the wicked. That this hell is Hades is readily admitted, for the course of the argument has been to show that Hades is hell, whenever it is not the grave. 'Whether the righteous and the wicked, after the judgment, will go literally to the same places in which they were before situated, it is not material to inquire. But, both before and after the judgment, the righteous will be in the same place with their glorified Savior and his holy angels, and this will be heaven; and before and after the judgment the wicked will be in the same place with the devil and his angels; and this will be hell.' (Dr. Enoch Pond, On the Intermediate Place, in American Biblical Repository for April, 1841; comp. Knapp's Christian Theology, sec. 104; Meyer, De Notione Orci ap. Hebræos, Lub. 1793; Bahrens, Freimüthige Unterss. über d. Orkus d. Hebraer, Halle, 1786; Bickersteth, Hades and Heaven, 1865; Jour. Sac. Lit., 1852-1853.)

The notion repelled in this article was entertained by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian and many other of the early Christian fathers. This, however, proves nothing in its favor, as the same notion was common among the Jews themselves, in and before the time of Christ. It may even have been entertained by the Seventy when they translated the Hebrew sheol by the Greek hadēs. The question connected with Hades has indirectly brought under view two of the three notions respecting the state of the soul after death. The third notion is that of those who hold that the soul is in a perfectly quiescent condition until the resurrection. This requires notice under another head. (See SOUL; see also HEAVEN; HELL.)

HADID (hā'did), or CHADID (Heb. חָדִיד, khaw-deed', pointed), a city of Benjamin (Ezra ii:33; Neh. vii:37; xi:34).

Eusebius and Jerome speak of two cities called Aditha, or Adi, one near Gaza, the other near Diospolis, or Lydda, which latter was probably Hadid. Van de Velde has pretty positively identified it with the present El-Hadith, three miles east of Ludd, or Lydda.

HADLAI (hād'la-i), (Heb. חַדְלָי, khad-lah'ee, resting, or keeping holiday), a man of Ephraim, whose son, Amasa, was a chief of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Chron. xxviii:12), B. C. before 758.

HADORAM (ha-dō'ram), (Heb. חַדְרָם, had-orawm', Hadar is high), possibly fire worshippers.

1. A son of Joktan (Gen. x:27; 1 Chron. i:21), whose settlements have not been identified.

2. Son of Tou, or Toi, king of Hamath, who went as his father's messenger to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer (1 Chron. xviii:10), B. C. about 984. In 2 Sam. viii:10 the name is given as Joram, a contraction of Jehoram, which is an Israelitish appellation, and Hadoram is doubtless the correct form of the name (Jos. Ant. vii:5, sec. 4).

3. The intendant of taxes under David, Solomon and Rehoboam (2 Chron. x:18). In Kings the name is Adoniram (1 Kings iv:6), but in 2 Sam. xx:24, Adoram. Josephus writes it Adoram in both places.

HADRACH (hā'drak), or ADRA (Heb. חַדְרָח, khad-rawk'), a city mentioned by Zechariah (ix:1), who denounced dreadful threatenings against it. Ptolemy notices a city called Adra, in lat. 68 3/4, long. 32 1/4. It could not be far from Damascus, for Zechariah calls Damascus the bulwark, defense and confidence of Hadrach. Exact situation unknown. Hengstenberg, Christology of the O. T. iii, 371 ff.

HAFT (hāft), Heb. חַפֵּץ, nits-tsawb', fixed), an old form of handle, e. g., of a dagger (Judg. iii:22).

HAGAB (hā'gāb), (Heb. חַגָב, khaw-gawb', a locust).

The sons of Hagab were among the Nethinim, who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:46), B. C. before 536.

HAGABA (hā'g'a-bā), (Heb. חַגָבָה, khag-aw-baw', also חַגָב, a locust, Ez. ii:45).

The sons of Hagaba were among the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. vii:48). In Ezra ii:45 the name appears as Hazabah (B. C. before 536).

HAGABAH (hā'g'a-bah), (Heb. חַגָבָה, khag-aw-baw', locust). See HAGABA.

HAGAR (hā'gar), (Heb. חַגָר, haw-gawr', derivation uncertain, perhaps stranger).

(1) Name. A native of Egypt and servant of Abraham; but how or when she became an inmate of his family we are not informed. The name Hagar, which is pure Hebrew, signifying stranger, having been probably given her after her arrival, and being the one by which she continued to be designated in the patriarch's household, seems to imply that her connection with it did not take place till long after this family had emigrated to Canaan; and the presumption is that she was one of the female slaves presented to Abraham by Pharaoh during his visit to Egypt (Gen. xii:16). But some derive the name from a Hebrew word signifying to flee, and suppose it to have been applied to her from a remarkable incident in her life, to be afterwards mentioned.

(2) Abraham's Concubine. The long continued sterility of Sarah suggested to her the idea (not uncommon in the East) of becoming a mother by proxy through her handmaid, whom, with that view, she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife. (See ABRAHAM; ADOPTION; CONCUBINAGE).

The honor of such an alliance and elevation was too great and unexpected for the weak and ill-regulated mind of Hagar; and no sooner did she find herself in a delicate situation, which made her an object of increasing interest and importance to Abraham, than she openly indulged in triumph over her less favored mistress, and showed by her altered behavior a growing habit of disrespect and insolence. The feelings of Sarah were severely wounded, and she broke out to her husband in loud complaints of the servant's petulance; and Abraham, whose meek and prudent behavior is strikingly contrasted with the violence of his wife, leaves her with unfettered power, as mistress of his household, to take what steps she pleases to obtain the required redress. In all Oriental states where concubinage is legalized, the principal wife has authority over the rest; the secondary one, if a slave, retains the former condition unchanged, and society thus presents the strange anomaly of a woman being at once the menial of her master and the partner of his bed. In like manner Hagar, though taken into the relation of concubine to Abraham, continued still, being a dotal maidservant, under the absolute power of her mistress, who, after her husband had left her to take her own way in vindication of her dignity as the principal wife, was neither reluctant nor sparing in making the minion reap the fruits of her insolence.

(3) Flight of Hagar. After a time the maid fled from the face of her mistress, starting in the direction of her own country. This route led her to what was afterwards called Shur, through a long tract of sandy uninhabited country, lying on the west of Arabia Petræa, to the extent of 150 miles between Palestine and Egypt. In that lonely region she was sitting by a fountain to replenish her skin-bottle and recruit her wearied limbs, when the angel of the Lord appeared, and in the kindest manner remonstrated with her on the course she was pursuing, and encouraged her to return by the promise that she would ere long have a son, whom Providence destined to become a great man, and whose wild and irregular features of character would be indelibly impressed on the mighty nation that should spring from him.

(4) Birth of Ishmael. Obedient to the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi, 'the well of the visible God,' Hagar retraced her steps to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son; and having probably narrated this remarkable interview to Abraham, that patriarch, as directed by the angel, called the name of the child Ishmael, 'God hath heard' (Gen. xvi:11).

(5) Birth of Isaac. Fourteen years had elapsed after the birth of Ishmael when an event occurred in the family of Abraham by the appearance of the long-promised heir, which entirely changed the prospects of that young man, though nothing materially affecting him took place till the weaning of Isaac, which, as is generally thought, was at the end of his third year. Ishmael was then a lad of seventeen years of age, and being fully capable of understanding his altered relations to the inheritance, as well as having felt perhaps a sensible diminution of Sarah's affection towards him, it is not wonderful that a disappointed youth should inconsiderately give vent to his feelings on a festive occasion, when the newly weaned child, clad according to custom with the sacred symbolic robe, which was the badge of the birthright, was formally installed heir of the tribe (see Biblioth. Bibl. vol. i.; Vicasi, Annot. 32; Bush on Gen. xxvii:15). The harmony of the weaning feast was disturbed by Ishmael being discovered mocking. The Hebrew word לִצְחָק, tsaw-khak', though properly signifying 'to laugh,' is frequently used to express strong derision, as in Gen. xix:14; Neh. ii:19; iv:1; Ezek. xxiii:32; accompanied, as is probable on some of the occasions referred to in these passages, with violent gestures; and in accordance with this idea the Chaldee and Septuagint versions render it by 'I play,' which is used by the latter in 2 Sam. ii:14-17, as synonymous with boxing, whence it might very justly be characterized as persecution (Gal. iv:29).

(6) Expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael. This conduct gave mortal offense to Sarah, who from that moment would be satisfied with nothing short of his irrevocable expulsion from the family, and as his mother also was included in the same condemnation there is ground to believe that she had been repeating her former insolence, as well as instigating her son to his improprieties of behavior. So harsh a measure was extremely painful to the affectionate heart of Abraham; but his scruples were removed by the timely appearance of his divine counselor, who said: 'Let it not be grievous in thy sight, because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice;' 'for,' adds the Targum of Jonathan, 'she is a prophetess.'

Accordingly, what she said is called the Scripture (Gal. iv:30), and the incident affords a very remarkable instance of an overruling Providence in making this family feud in the tent of a pastoral chief 4,000 years ago the occasion of separating two mighty peoples, who, according to the prophecy, have ever since occupied an important chapter in the history of man. Hagar and Ishmael departed early on the day fixed for their removal, Abraham furnishing them with the necessary supply of traveling provisions. The Septuagint, which our translators have followed, most absurdly represents Ishmael as a child, placed along with the traveling-bags on the heavily-loaded shoulders of Hagar. But a little change in the punctuation, the observance of the parenthetical clause, and the construction of the word 'child' with the verb 'took' remove the whole difficulty, and the passage will then stand thus: 'And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water (and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder), and the child, and sent her away.'

In spite of their instructions for threading the desert, the two exiles missed their way. Overcome by fatigue and thirst, increasing at every step under the unmitigated rays of a vertical sun, the strength of the young Ishmael, as was natural, first gave way, and his mother laid him down in complete exhaustion under one of the stunted shrubs of this arid region in the hope of his obtaining some momentary relief from smelling the damp in the shade. The burning fever, however, continued unabated, and the poor woman, forgetting her own sorrow, destitute and alone in the midst of a wilderness, and absorbed in the fate of her son, withdrew to a little distance, unable to witness his lingering sufferings, and there 'she lifted up her voice and wept.' In this distressing situation the angel of the Lord appeared for the purpose of comforting her, and directed her to a fountain, which, concealed by the brushwood, had escaped her notice, and from which she drew a refreshing draught, that had the effect of reviving the almost lifeless Ishmael (Gen. xxi:19).

Of the subsequent history of Ishmael we have no account further than that he established himself in the wilderness of Paran, in the neighborhood of Sinai, was married by his mother to a countrywoman of her own, and maintained both himself and family by the produce of his bow.

HAGAR (hā'gar), (Gal. iv:25), a local name applied to Mount Sinai in Arabia.

HAGARENES, HAGARITES (hā'gar-ē-nēz, hā'gar-ites), (Ps. lxxxiii:6, Heb. הַגָּרִיטִים, Hagarenes, marg. Hagrites; 1 Chron. v:10, הַגָּרִיטִים, Hagrites.) (See ARABIA.)

HAGERITE, THE (hā'ger-ite), (Heb. הַגָּרִיטִי, ha-hag-ree', was an appellation of Jaziz, a descendant of Hagar, who tended David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii:31).

HAGGAI (häg'ga-i), (Heb. חֲגַי, khag-gah'ee, festive).

1. The Prophet. One of the twelve minor prophets, and the first of the three who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian exile, prophesied in Palestine.

Of the place and year of his birth, his descent, and the leading incidents of his life, nothing is definitely known. He began to prophesy in the second year of Darius Hystaspes (Hag. i:1). Together with Zechariah, he pressed vigorously the renewal of the building of the temple, which had been suspended after the reign of Cyrus, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezra v:1, vi:14). Animated by the high courage of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with energy and the temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius, B. C. 520.

2. Haggai, Book of. These prophecies of Haggai are comprised in a book of two chapters and consist of discourses, brief and summary (Eichhorn, Einleitung in das A. T., iii, sec. 598; Jahn, Introduction in libros sacros Vet. Fæd. edit. 2, Vienna, 1814, sec. 156). Their object generally is to urge the rebuilding of the Temple, which had indeed been commenced as early as B. C. 535 (Ezra iii:10), but was afterward discontinued, the Samaritans having obtained an edict from the Persian king, which forbade further procedure, and influential Jews pretending that the time for rebuilding the Temple had not arrived, since the seventy years predicted by Jeremiah applied to the Temple also, from the time of the destruction of which it was then only the sixty-eighth year. As on the death of Pseudo-Smerdis, and the consequent termination of his interdict, the Jews still continued to wait for the end of the seventy years, and were only engaged in building splendid houses for themselves, Haggai began to prophesy in the second year of Darius (B. C. 520).

His prophecy is divided as follows: (1) His first discourse (chap. i), delivered on the first day of the sixth month of the year mentioned, foretells that a brighter era would begin as soon as Jehovah's house was rebuilt; and a notice is subjoined, stating that the address of the prophet had been effective, the people having resolved on resuming the restoration of the Temple. (2) The second discourse (chap. ii:1-9), delivered on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, predicts that the glory of the new Temple would be greater than that of Solomon's, and shows that no fear need be entertained of the Second Temple not equalling the first in splendor, since, in a remarkable political revolution the gifts of the Gentiles would be brought thither. (3) The third discourse (chap. ii:10-19), delivered on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, refers to a period when building materials had been collected, and the workmen had begun to put them together, for which a commencement of the Divine blessing is promised. (4) The fourth and last discourse (chap. ii:20-23), delivered also on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, is exclusively addressed to Zerubbabel, the political chief of the new Jewish colony, who, it appears, had asked for an explanation regarding the great political revolutions which Haggai had predicted in his second discourse; it comforts the governor by assuring him they would not take place very soon and not in his lifetime.

(1) Style of Writer. The style of the discourses of Haggai is suitable to their contents; it is pathetic when he exhorts; it is vehement when he reproves; it is somewhat elevated when he treats of future events, and it is not altogether destitute of a poetical coloring, though a prophet of a higher order would have depicted the splendor of the second temple in brighter hues. The language labors under a poverty of terms, as may be observed in the constant repetition of the same expression.

(2) Scripture References. The prophetic discourses of Haggai are referred to in the Old and New Testament (Ezra v:1; vi:14; Heb. xii:26; comp. Hagg. ii:6, 7, 8, 22). In most of the ancient catalogues of the canonical books of the Old Testament, Haggai is not, indeed, mentioned by name, but as they specify the twelve minor prophets, he must have been included among them, as otherwise their number would not be full. Josephus, mentioning Haggai and Zechariah (Antiq. xi:4, sec. 5, p. 557), calls them δύο προφήται, two prophets. (See generally Rosenmüller, Scholia in Vet. Test. viii:4, p. 74; Jahn, Einleitung in die göttlichen Bücher des Alten Bundes, ii:2, p. 658; Bertholdt, Einleitung, iv, p. 169; Henry Cowles, Minor Prophets, N. T.; G. R. Noyes, New Trans. of the Heb. Prophets; J. Pye Smith, Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, i, 283 ff.; Keil, Introd. to O. T.)

G. H. A. v. E.

HAGGERI (häg'ge-ri), (Heb. חֲגַרִי, hag-ree', Hagarite), whose son Mibhar was one of David's "thirty" (1 Chron. xi:38). This is probably a corruption of the Hebrew for "Bani the Gadite," which appears in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii:36). (See Kennicott Dissert. p. 214.)

HAGGI (häg'gi), (Heb. חֲגַי, khag-ghee', festive), second son of Gad (Gen. xlvi:16; Num. xxvi:15), the founder of the family by the same name (B. C. probably before 1784).

HAGGIAH (hag-gi'ah), (Heb. חֲגַיָּה, khag-ghee-yaw', festival of Jehovah), a Levite, descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi:30), B. C. before 1043.

HAGGITES (häg'gites), Heb. חֲגַיִטִים, na-khag-gee', were descendants of Haggi, second son of Gad (Num. xxvi:15).

HAGGITH (häg'gith), (Heb. חֲגַיִת, khag-gheeth', festive), David's fifth wife, mother of Adonijah (1 Kings i:5, 11; ii:13; 1 Chron. iii:2; 2 Sam. iii:4), whose birth happened at Hebron (2 Sam. iii:2, 5). He was like Absalom, renowned for his handsome appearance (B. C. before 1053).

HAGIOGRAPHIA (hā'ji-ög-rä-fä), (Gr. ἁγιογραφία, hag-ee-og'ra-phah, holy writings, sacred writings). The word Hagiographa is first found in Epiphanius (Panarium, p. 58), who used it to denote the third division of the Scriptures, called by the Jews the Writings, consisting of five books (see VERSIONS OF SCRIPTURE, Targums), viz. the three poems, Job, Proverbs, and the Psalms, and the two books of Chronicles.

(1) Classifications. These divisions are found in the Talmud (Bava Bathra, fol. 1, ed. Amsterd.), where the sacred books are classified under the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings (Cetubim). The last are thus enumerated (l. c.): Ruth, the book (sepher) of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes (Kohleth), the Song of Songs, Lamentations, Daniel, and the books (megilloth) of Esther, Ezra, and Chronicles. The Jewish writers, however, do not uniformly follow this arrangement, as they sometimes place the Psalms, or the book of Job, as the first of the Hagiographa. Jerome gives the arrangement followed by the Jews in his time. He observes that they divided the Scriptures into five books of Moses, eight prophetic books (viz., 1. Joshua; 2. Judges and Ruth; 3. Samuel; 4. Kings; 5. Isaiah; 6. Jeremiah; 7. Ezekiel; 8. the twelve prophets), and nine Hagiographa (viz., 1. Job; 2. David, five parts; 3. Solomon, three parts; 4. Kohleth; 5. Canticles; 6. Daniel; 7. Chronicles; 8. Esdras, two books, viz., Ezra and Nehemiah; 9. Esther). 'Some, however,' he adds, 'place Ruth and Lamentations among the Hagiographa rather than among the prophetic books.'

(2) Early Notice. (1) The earliest notice which we find of these divisions is that contained in the prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus, written B. C. 130, the author of which refers to the Law, the Prophets, and the other books, by which last were most probably meant the Hagiographa. Philo also speaks of the Laws, the Prophets, the Hymns, and the other books, but without classifying them. (2) In the New Testament we find three corresponding divisions mentioned, viz., the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms, which last book has been supposed to have given its name to the third division from the circumstance of its then being the first in the catalogue (Luke xxiv: 44). Hävernich, however (Handbuch, p. 78), supposes that Luke calls the Hagiographa by the name of Psalms, rather on account of the poetical character of several of its parts. (3) The 'book of the Prophets' is referred to in the New Testament as a distinct volume (Acts vii:42), where the passage indicated is Amos v:25, 26. It is well known that the second class was divided by the Jews into the early Prophets, viz., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; and the later Prophets, viz., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (called the major prophets), and the book of the twelve (minor) prophets. When this division of books was first introduced it is now impossible to ascertain. Probably it commenced after the return from the exile, with the first formation of the canon. Still more difficult is it to ascertain the principle on which the classification was based. (4) It has been concluded from Matt. xxiii:35 and Luke xi:51; comp. with Luke xxiv:44, that as the Psalms were the first, so were Chronicles the last book in the Hagiographa (Carpzov, Introd. iv. p. 25). If, when Jesus spoke of the righteous blood shed from the blood of Abel (Gen. iv:8) to that of Zechariah, he referred, as most commentators suppose, to Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv:20, 21), there appears a peculiar appositeness in the appeal to the first and the last books in the canon. The book of Chronicles still holds the last place in the Hebrew Bibles, which are all arranged according to the threefold division. The late date of Chronicles may in some measure account for its separation from the book of Kings; and this ground holds good whether we fix the era of the Chronicler, with Zunz, at about B. C. 260, or with the eminent Roman Catholic, Professor Movers, the able defender of the antiquity and authenticity of the book, we conceive him to have been a younger contemporary of Nehemiah, and to have written about B. C. 400 (Kritische Untersuchung über de Biblische Chronik, Bonn, 1834). The circumstance of the existence of a few acknowledged later additions, such as 1 Chron. iii:19-24, does not militate against this hypothesis. De Wette conceives that the genealogy in this passage comes down only to the third generation after Nehemiah. (5) The Alexandrian translators have not been guided by the threefold division in their arrangement of the books of Scripture. Luther was the first who separated the canonical from the other books. Not only do the Alexandrian translators, the Fathers, and Luther differ from the Jews in the order of succession of the sacred books, but among the Jews themselves the Talmudists and Masorites and the German and Spanish manuscripts follow each a different arrangement.

W. W.

HAI (hā'i). See AI.

HAIL (hāl), 1. (Gr. χαίρη, khah'ee-reh, be cheerful, rejoice), a salutation, (Luke i:28); in mockery (Matt. xxvii:29).

2. Frozen rain (Heb. רָד, raw-rawd'). When a very cold current of air encounters a hot and humid one, the vapor of the latter is suddenly condensed into drops, and sometimes these are frozen into irregular spheroids of porous ice, which fall to the earth as hail.

This phenomenon is more frequent in temperate than in tropical regions, and usually occurs in summer and at the hottest hour of the day. Hail rarely falls except during thunderstorms, and hence the Bible commonly mentions it in connection with fire (lightning), as in Ps. cxlviii:8. Hail occasionally falls in Egypt (Exod. ix:22-25) between December and April. It is more frequent in Palestine (Josh. x:i1; Hag. ii:17). The area affected by a hailstorm is generally a long, narrow line, so that of two places near each other one may be in and the other out of the storm. Thus Goshen might escape it, whilst the adjacent district of Egypt to the westward might be in its track and suffer severely (Exod. ix:26); and a pursuing army might be untouched by the storm and yet see their fleeing foes beaten down by the falling stones (Josh. x:i1). (Davis, Bib. Dict.).

Figurative. Hail is the symbol of Divine vengeance upon kingdoms and nations, as the enemies of God and his people (Is. xxviii:2, 17, xxxii:19; Hag. ii:17).

HAILSTONE (hāl'stōn), (Heb. בֶּן־רָד, eh'ben-baw-rawd', a stone of hail (Josh. x:i1). See above.

HAIR (hâr), (properly Heb. שָׂרָף, say-awr'; Gr. θρίξ, threks), is frequently mentioned in Scripture and in scarcely anything has the caprice of fashion been more strikingly displayed than in the various forms which the taste of different countries and ages has prescribed for disposing of this natural covering of the head.

(1) The Greeks. The Greeks let their hair grow to a great length, and their natural fondness for this attribute of beauty has been perpetuated not only by the frequently recurring references of Homer, but by the circumstance of the other poets and the artists of that ancient people representing even the gods themselves with long hair.

(2) The Egyptians. The early Egyptians, again, who were proverbial for their habits of cleanliness, removed the hair as an incumbrance, and the almost unavoidable occasion of sordid and offensive negligence. All classes amongst that people, not excepting the slaves imported from foreign countries, were required to submit to the tonsure (Gen. xli:14).

(3) The Hebrews. Different from the custom both of the Greeks and the Egyptians, that of the Hebrews was to wear their hair generally short and to check its growth by the application of scissors only. The priests at their inauguration shaved off all their hair, and when on actual duty at the temple, were in the habit, it is said, of cutting it every fortnight. The only exceptions to this prevailing fashion are found in the case of the Nazarites, whose hair, from religious duty, was not to be cropped during the term of their vow; of young persons, who, during their minority, allowed their hair to hang down in luxuriant ringlets on their shoulders; of such effeminate persons as Absalom (2 Sam. xiv:26), and of Solomon's horse-guards, whose vanity affected a puerile extravagance and who strewed their heads every day with particles of gold-dust (Josephus, Antiq. viii:7). Although the Hebrews wore their hair short they were great admirers of strong and thickset locks, and so high a value did they set on the possession of a good head of hair that they deprecated nothing so much as baldness (2 Kings ii:23). To prevent or remedy this defect they seem, at an early period, to have availed themselves of the assistance of art, not only for beautifying the hair but increasing its thickness; while the heads of the priests were anointed with an unguent of a peculiar kind, the ingredients of which, with their various proportions, were prescribed by Divine authority, and the composition of which the people were prohibited, under severe penalties, from attempting to imitate (Exod. xxx:32). This custom spread till anointing the hair of the head became a general mark of gentility and an essential part of the daily toilet, the usual cosmetics employed consisting of the best oil of olives mingled with spices, a decoction of parsley-seed in wine, and more rarely of spikenard (Ps. xxiii:5, xlv:7; Ecces. ix:8; Mark xiv:3). The prevailing color of hair among the Hebrews was dark; 'locks bushy and black as a raven' being mentioned in the description of the bridegroom as the perfection of beauty in mature manhood (Cant. v:11). Hence the appearance of an old man with a snow-white head in a company of younger Jews, all whose heads, like those of other Eastern people, were jet black—a most conspicuous object—is beautifully compared to an almond tree, which in the early part of the year is in full bloom while all the others are dark and leafless (Ecces. xii:5).

(4) Dyeing the Hair. The Romans were in the habit of using artificial means to disguise the silver hue of age. From Rome the fashion spread into Greece and other provinces, and it appears that the members of the church at Corinth were, to a certain extent, captivated by the prevailing taste, some Christians being evidently in the eye of the Apostle, who had attracted attention by the cherished and womanly decoration of their hair (1 Cor. xi:14-16). To them the letter of Paul was intended to administer a timely reproof for allowing themselves to fall in with a style of manners which, by confounding the distinctions of the sexes, threatened a baneful influence on good morals; and that not only the Christian converts in that city, but the primitive church generally, were led by this admonition to adopt simpler habits, is evident from the remarkable fact that a criminal, who came to trial under the assumed character of a Christian, was proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be an impostor, by the luxuriant and frizzled appearance of his hair (Tertullian, Apol.; Fleury, Les Mœurs des Chrétiens).

(5) Eastern Women. With regard to women, the possession of long and luxuriant hair is allowed by Paul to be an essential attribute of the sex—a graceful and modest covering provided by nature, and yet the same Apostle elsewhere (1 Tim. ii:9) concurs with Peter (1 Pet. iii:3) in launching severe invectives against the women of his day for the pride and passionate fondness they displayed in the elaborate decorations of their head-dress. As the hair was preëminently the 'instrument of their pride' (Ezek. xvi:39, margin), all the resources of ingenuity and art were exhausted to set it off to advantage and load it with the most dazzling finery, and many, on the approach of death, caused their longest locks to be cut off and placed separately in an urn, to be deposited in their tomb as the most precious and valued relics.

Figurative. Various metaphorical allusions are made to hair by the sacred writers, especially the prophets. (1) Cutting off the hair is a figure used to denote the entire destruction of a people by the righteous retributions of Providence (Is. vii:20). (2) 'Gray hairs here and there on Ephraim' portended the decline and fall of the kingdom of Israel (Hos. vii:9). (3) 'Hair like women's' forms part of the description of the Apocalyptic locusts, and historically points to the prevailing head-dress of the Saracens, as well as the voluptuous effeminacy of the Antichristian clergy (Rev. ix:8). (4) And, finally, 'hair like fine wool' was a prominent feature in the appearance of the deified Redeemer, emblematic of the majesty and wisdom that belong to him (Rev. i:14). What was least valuable in man's person was represented by no hair (1 Sam. xiv:45; 2 Sam. xiv:11; 1 Kings i:52; Matt. x:30; Luke xii:7; xxi:18).

HAKKATAN (häk'ka-tän), or rather KATAN (Heb. כַּתָּן, kaw-tawn', little or junior). His son, Johanan, returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii:12). He was chief of the Bene-Azgad. The name is probably Katan with the definite article prefixed. (B. C. before 459.)

HAKKOZ (häk'köz), (Heb. חַקֹּז, hak-kotse', the nimble). 1. The chief of the seventh course of priests in the Temple service appointed by David (1 Chron. xxiv:10). In Neh. iii:4, 21; Ezra ii:61, the name appears as Koz, without the article, and no doubt correctly. (B. C. 1014.)

2. A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv:8), B. C. probably 1612.

HAKUPHA (ha-kü'phä), (Heb. חֲקוּפָה, khak-oo-faw', crooked, incitement). Sons of Hakupha were among those returning from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:51; Neh. vii:53), B. C. before 536.

HALAH (hä'lah), (Heb. חָלָה, khal-akh'), signification unknown.

A city or district of Media, upon the River Gozan, to which, among other places, the captives of Israel were transported by the Assyrian kings (2 Kings xvii:6; xviii:11; 1 Chron. v:26). Many, after Bochart (Geog. Sacra, iii:14, p. 220), have conceived this Halah or Chalach to be the Calachene which Ptolemy places in the north of Assyria. But if the River Gozan be the Kizzil-Ozan Halah must needs be sought elsewhere, and near that river. Accordingly, Major Rennell indicates as lying along its banks a district of some extent, and of great beauty and fertility, named Chalchal, having within it a remarkably strong position of the same name, situated on one of the hills adjoining to the mountains which separate it from the province of Ghilan (Geog. of Herod. p. 396; Rawlinson, Ancient Mon., i:246).

HALAK (hāl'āk), THE MOUNT (Heb. הַר הַלָּאק, khaw-lawk', bare). The Smooth or Bald Mountain named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests. (Josh. xi:17, xii:7).

HALHUL (hāl'hul). A city of Judah (Josh. xv:58), near Hebron. A hamlet called Alula still remains about three or four miles north of Hebron. (Wilson, Lands of Bib., i:384; Schwarz, Palestine, p. 107.)

HALI (hā'li), CALI or CHALI (Heb. הַלִּי, khal-ee', jewel, necklace.) A city of Phœnicia, in Asher (Josh. xix. 25), named between Helkath and Beten. Its situation is not known.

HALING (hāl'ing), (Gr. κατασῶρω, kat-as-oo'ro, Acts viii:3). It meant to arrest by force, as we use the word haul.

HALL (hal), (Αὐλή, ōw-lay', yard.) Open court used of the high priests' house (Luke xxii:55).

It is an inclosed or fortified space, often uncovered, into which the apartments of the house looked. It is incorrectly translated palace (Mark xiv:66; Matt. xxvi:69).

HALLEL (hāl'lēl), (Heb. הַלְּלוּ, hal-lale'; Gr., ὕμνος, hoom'nos, praise), the name of a particular part of the hymnal service chanted at certain festivals.

The name 'great Hallel' is sometimes given to this group as a whole, but it is usually applied to Ps. cxxxvi (or Ps. cxv-cxxxvi), with its twenty-six times repeated refrain of praise. Ps. cxlii-cxlviii or cxv-cxviii are called the 'Egyptian' or the 'common' Hallel. During the continuance of the temple the Hallel was recited on eighteen days in the year, but on one night alone, that of the Passover. On that occasion it was taken in parts, Ps. cxlii and cxiv being sung before the meal, just before the drinking of the second cup, and Ps. cxv-cxviii after the filling of the fourth cup. It is to this sacred song that reference is made to the phrase ὑμῆσαυτες, 'when they had sung an hymn,' used of our Saviour and his disciples in Matt. xxvi:30 and Mark xiv:26.

HALLELUJAH (hāl'lē-lū-yā), (Heb. הַלְּלוּ יְהוָה, hal-leh-loo'yah, praise ye Jah, i. e., Jehovah; Gr. ἀλληλοῦῖα, al-lay-loo'-ee-ah).

A word which stands at the beginning of many of the Psalms. From its frequent occurrence in this position it grew into a formula of praise and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing. This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church, and is still occasionally heard in devotional psalmody. In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon the large multitude in chorus, like the voice of mighty thunderings, burst forth: "Allelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," in response to the voice from the throne, saying: "Praise our God, all ye his servants" (Rev. xix:1-6).

HALLOHESH (hal-ló'hesh) or rather LOCHESH (lō'kësh), (Heb. לֹחֶשׁ, hal-lo-khashe', enchanter), one of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x:24). The name is Lochesh without the article. (B. C. about 410).

HALLOW, HALLOWED (hāl'ló, hāl'löd), (Heb. שָׁדַד, kaw-dash', to set apart, consecrate; Gr. ἁγιάζω, hag-ee-ad'zo, to make sacred).

'Who,' says Trench, 'would now affirm of the verb "to hallow" that it is even obsolescent? Yet Wallis 200 years ago observed: "It has almost gone out of use" (Jeré desuevit).' He is condemning (in English Past and Present, p. 139 f.) the American Bible Union for dismissing from their new version words that have a suspicion of age upon them. And it is still quite true that 'hallow' as a biblical word, is in active use, so that the revisers felt no necessity for excluding it from either the New Testament of 1881 or the Old Testament of 1885. (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

It is used in the A. V. of a person who consecrates himself to God (Num. vi:11); of Christ undergoing death to consecrate himself to God (John xvii:19; comp. x:36; Gal. i:15); of things, e. g., the altar, the temple (Exod. xxix:36; Lev. viii:15; Num. vii:1; 1 Kings viii:64); the Sabbath in keeping it holy (Exod. xx:8, etc.). In general Christians are the hallowed (Acts xx:32, xxvi:18, A. V. "sanctified"), as those who, freed from impurity, have been brought near to God through their faith and sanctity. (See SANCTIFICATION.)

HALOHESH (ha-ló'hesh), father of Shallum. The latter was ruler of half of Jerusalem at the time Nehemiah repaired the walls (Neh. iii:12). The Hebrew is identical with HALLOHESH in spelling.

HALT (halt), (Heb. תֵּשֵׁב, tseh'-lah, Gen. xxxii:31, to limp). (Gr. χωλός, kho-los', Matt. xviii:8, crippled).

Figurative. Halting denotes falling into snares and trouble (Ps. xxxviii:17; Jer. xx:10), or continuing in doubt which to choose (1 Kings xviii:21). Her that halteth; i. e., Jews weak and unresolved to return to their own land (Mic. iv:6; Zeph. iii:19).

HAM (hām), (Heb. חָמ, khawm, swarthy, hot).

1. The youngest son of Noah (Gen. v:32; comp. ix:24), B. C. after 2613. Having provoked the wrath of his father by an act of indecency towards him, the latter cursed him and his descendants to be slaves to his brothers and their descendants (ix:25). To judge, however, from the narrative, Noah directed his curse only against Canaan (the fourth son of Ham) and his race, thus excluding from it the descendants of Ham's three other sons, Cush, Mizram, and Phut (Gen. x:6). The general opinion is that all the Southern nations derive their origin from Ham (to which the Hebrew root Khawm, not unlike the Greek Αἰθίωες, burned faces, lends some force). Cush is supposed to have been the progenitor of the nations of East and South Asia, more especially of South Arabia, and also of Ethiopia; Mizram, of the African nations, including the Philistines and some other tribes which Greek fable and tradition connect with Egypt; Phut, likewise of some African nations, and Canaan, of the inhabitants of Palestine and Phœnicia (see Rawlinson, Five Grt. Mon. i. chap. iv; Max Müller, Sci. of Lang. p. 2690). On the Arabian traditions concerning Ham. vid. D'Herbelot (Bibl. Orient. art. 'Ham').

2. A poetical name for the land of Egypt (Ps. lxxviii:51; cv:23, 27; cvi:22).

3. In Gen. xiv:5 occurs a country or place called Ham, belonging to the Zuzim, but its geographical situation is unknown. E. M.

4. The original inhabitants of the valley of Gedor are said to be "of Ham" (1 Chron. iv:40).

This may indicate either a Hamite tribe or an Egyptian settlement.

HAMAN (hā'man), (Heb. חָמָן, haw-mawn, celebrated or magnificent, a name of the planet Mercury; Sept. Ἀμάν, aman), a favorite of the king of Persia, whose history is involved in that of Esther and Mordecai.

He is called an Agagite; and as Agag was a kind of title of the kings of the Amalekites (see AGAG), it is supposed that Haman was descended from the royal family of that nation. He or his parents probably found their way to Persia as captives or hostages; and that the foreign origin of Haman was no bar to his advancement at court is a circumstance quite in union with the most ancient and still existing usages of the East. Joseph, Daniel and Mordecai afford other examples of the same kind. His intrigues against Mordecai and the Jews, the discovery of his plot, and his own execution, are graphically delineated in the book of Esther. Prideaux (Connexion, anno 453) computes the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at more than two million pounds sterling (ten million dollars).

In later times, at the Feast of Purim, it seems to have been customary to hang an effigy of Haman; but as the gibbet was sometimes made in the form of a cross, riots between Jews and Christians were the result, and a warning against insults to the Christian faith was issued by the emperor Theodosius II (Cod. Theod. xvi. viii:18; comp. 21). (See ESTHER; MORDECAI.)

HAMATH (hā'math), (Heb. חַמַּת, kham-awth', fortress), one of the smaller kingdoms of Syria, having Zobah on the east and Rehob on the south. This last kingdom, lying within the greater Mount Hermon, is expressly said to have been taken possession of by the Israelites, and, like Dan, or Laish, which is represented to have been in the valley of Bethrehab (Judg. xviii:28), is used to denote the northern boundary of the Holy Land (Num. xiii:21). The approach to it from the south is by an opening or mountain pass, called 'the entrance of Hamath,' and 'the entering in of Hamath,' which, being the passage from the northern extremity of the land of Israel into Syria, is sometimes used to describe the boundary of the former in this direction, as 'from the entering in of Hamath to the river of Egypt' (1 Kings viii:65).

The kingdom of Hamath, or, at least, the southern or central portions of it, appear to have nearly corresponded with what was afterward denominated Cœle-Syria; but northward it stretched as far as the city Hamath on the Orontes, which seems to have been the capital of the whole country. This city was called Epiphania by the Greeks, under which name it was known to Josephus (Antiq. 1:6, 2; comp. Michaelis Spicil. ii:52) and Jerome (Quæst in Gen. x:18; Comment. in Ezek. xlvii:15, 16); but it has now resumed its more ancient denomination, which indeed was probably never lost among the native population. Toi was king of Hamath at the time when David conquered the Syrians of Zobah, and it appears that he had reason to rejoice in the humiliation of a dangerous neighbor, as he sent his own son Joram to congratulate the victor (2 Sam. viii:9, 10). In the time of Hezekiah the town, along with its territory, was conquered by the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii:24, xviii:34, xix:13; Is. x:9, xi:11), and afterward by the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxix:2, 5). Abulfeda, the Arabian geographer, who was prince of Hamath in the fourteenth century, correctly states (Tab. Syria, p. 108) that this city is mentioned in the books of the Israelites. Hamath is still a picturesque town, of considerable circumference and with wide and convenient streets. The western part of this district forms the granary of Northern Syria, though the harvest never yields more than a tenfold return, chiefly on account of the immense numbers of mice, which sometimes completely destroy the crops.

In 1812, when Burckhardt visited Hamath, he saw the 'Hamath stones' (so-called Hittite inscriptions in relief on black close-grained basalt), and the enormous water wheels, used for bringing the waters of the Orontes to the houses and gardens situated on the hill above the river. He does not, however, mention the catacombs, said to have existed high up on the right bank.

The Hamath stones were afterward rediscovered by Sir Richard Burton and Tyrwhitt Drake, and of which squeezes were shown in London in 1872. The town, which is divided into four quarters, Hadher, el-Sisy, el-Aleyat, and el-Medine (the quarter of the Christians), contained at Burckhardt's visit about 4,446 houses and nearly 11,000 male inhabitants.

HAMATHITE (hā'math-ite), (Heb. חַמַּתִּי, kham-aw-thee'), a descendant of Canaan who probably settled in Hamath (Gen x:18; 1 Chron. i:16).

HAMATH-ZOBAB (hā'math-zō'bah), (Heb. חַמַּת צוּבָה, kham-ath' tso-barw', fortress of Zobah, 2 Chron. viii:3), supposed to be the same as HAMATH (which see) a place said to have been captured by Solomon (2 Chron. viii:3).

HAMMATH (hām'math), (Heb. חַמַּת, kham-math', warm springs), a fortified city in the country allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix:35), no doubt near Tiberias.

This place seems to be called Hammoth-dor (Josh. xxi:32), and still further altered to Hammon (1 Chron. vi:76). (Thomson, Land and Book, ii:66.)

HAMMEDATHA (ham-mēd'a-thà), (Heb. חַמַּת אֲדָתָה, ham-med-aw-thaw'), father of Haman and commonly called the Agagite (Esth. iii:1, 10; viii:5; ix:24).

Gesenius takes the name to be Medatha without the definite article. (See also Fürst, Handwb., B. C. before 474).

HAMMELECH (hām'me-lēk), (Heb. חַמֶּלֶךְ, ham-meh'lek, the king).

The A. V. renders this as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi:26; xxxviii:6), but it undoubtedly refers to Jehoiakim and Zedekiah. This rendering would enable Jerahmeel and Malchiah to be connected with the royal house of Judah, who do not so appear in the A. V. (B. C. 589.)

HAMMER (hām'mēr).

A tool, called in Hebrew פַּת־טֶשֶׁת, pat-teesh', used for smoothing metals and for breaking rocks (Is. xli:7; Jer. xxiii:29). It serves as a figure for any crushing power. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth (Jer. 1:23). God's word is like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces (xxiii:29). Other names for an implement of the same class are מַקְכָּוֹ, mak-kaw-baw', and מַקְכֵּת, mak-keh'beth, which was used for driving the tent pin (Judg. iv:21) in building operations (1 Kings vi:7), and in the manufacture of idols (Is. xlv:12; Jer. x:14). The name Maccabees is generally derived from this latter word.

HAMMOLEKETH (ham möl'e-kéth), (Heb. מלכה, ham-mo-leh'keth, the queen), a woman given in the genealogies of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii:17, 18). The Targum translates the word who reigned.

The Jewish tradition is that she ruled all of Gilead, and on that account her lineage has been preserved. (B. C. bet. 1874 and 1658.)

HAMMON (häm'mon), (Heb. חמון, kham-mone', hot or sunny).

1. A Levitical city of Naphtali assigned to the Gershonites (1 Chron. vi:76), and answering to the similar names of Hammath and Hammoth-dor.

2. A town in Asher (Josh. xix:28). Its site is uncertain. Schultz suggested 'Ain Hamül, some 10 miles south of Tyre but Robinson lays no great stress upon this identification. Renan (Mission de Phénicie, 708 ff.) found at Khurbet Ummel-'Amud, near the coast immediately north of the Ladder of Tyre, two Phœnician inscriptions in honor of Baal Hammon.

HAMONAH (ha-mō'nab), (Heb. חמון, ham-onaw', multitude), a city where Ezekiel (xxxix:16) foretold the burial of Gog and his people would be.

We do not know any town of this name in Palestine. Hamonah signifies multitude; and the prophet intended to show that the slaughter of Gog's people would be so great that the place of their burial might be called Multitude.

"Cornill would read 'and it is all over with this multitude.' If the words are an interpolation, the allusion may be to the city of Bethshean, which may have derived its name Scythopolis from the Scythian invasion in the seventh century, B. C. (See Bertholet, Das Buch Hesekial, 193)." C. R. Conder, Hastings' Bib. Dict.

HAMMOTH-DOR (häm'moth-dôr), (Heb. חמון, kham-moth'dore, hot springs of Dor), a city of the Levites, in Naphtali, ceded to the fami'y of Gershon (Josh. xxi:32).

This is identical with HAMMATH unless there were two places in Naphtali by the same name. Hammurabi, Code of—Page 1753.

HAMON-GOG (hä'mon-gög), (Heb. חמון, haw-mone'gogh, multitude of Gog, or ravine of Gog's multitude), the name that was to be given to a valley where were to be buried "Gog and all his multitude" (Ez. xxxix:11, 15).

HAMOR (hä'mor), (Heb. חמור, kham-ore', a he-ass), prince of Shechem; father of young Shechem, who ravished Dinah, the daughter of Jacob (Gen. xxxiv:2). (See SHECHEM.)

Jacob, returning from Mesopotamia, set up his tents at Shechem, and bought of Hamor, for the price of a hundred kesitahs, or pieces of silver (about £40 or $200), that part of the field where he had pitched his tents (Gen. xxxiii:18, sq). The bones of Joseph were afterwards buried there (Josh. xxiv:32; Acts vii:16).

For the wrong which had been done Dinah, Shechem made an offer to take her as his wife; and was supported in his claim by his father, Hamor, who proposed also that there should be freedom of marriage between the families of Jacob and Hamor (Gen. xxxiv:14-17).

To this the sons of Jacob gave their consent on condition that the Shechemites accept the rite of circumcision. The Shechemites agreed to the terms, and were circumcised (Gen. xxxiv:24). On the third day, when the Shechemites were unable through illness to defend themselves, Simeon and Levi and their followers fell upon them, murdered Hamor and Shechem, and carried away Dinah to her own home.

HAMUEL (ha-mū'el), (Heb. חמול, kham-moo-ale', heat, angel of God), son of Mishma, a man of Simeon, of the family of Shaul (1 Chron. iv:26).

From him evidently sprang that part of the tribe of Simeon located in Palestine. (B. C. before 1046.)

HAMUL (hä'mul), (Heb. חמול, khaw-mool', pitied, spared), son of Pharez (Gen. xlvi:12; 1 Chron. ii:5), and head of the family by his name (Num. xxvi:21), B. C. Oct. 1370 and 1356.

HAMULITES (hä'mul-ites), (Heb. חמול, khaw-moo-lee'), the descendants (Num. xxvi:21) of Hamul. The family of HAMUL (which see).

HAMUTAL (ha-mū'tal), (Heb. חמול, kham-oo-tal', kinsman of the dew), daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of king Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, kings of Judah (2 Kings xxiii:31; xxiv:18; Jer. lli:1), B. C. 632-619.

HANAMEEL (ha-näm'e-el), (Heb. חנניאל, khan-am-ale', perhaps God has given), the son of Shalum and a kinsman of Jeremiah, to whom, before the siege of Jerusalem, he sold a field which he possessed in Anathoth, a town of the Levites (Jer. xxxii:6-12).

If this field belonged to Hanameel as a Levite, the sale of it would imply that an ancient law had fallen into disuse (Lev. xxv:34); but it is possible that it may have been the property of Hanameel in right of his mother. The transaction was conducted with all the forms of legal transfer, and was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the approaching exile, by showing that possessions which could be established by documents would yet be of future value to the possessor (B. C. 587).

HANAN (hä'nän), (Heb. חנן, khaw-nawn', merciful).

1. One of the chiefs of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:23), B. C. between 1612 and 1050.

2. Sixth son of Azel, descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii:38; ix:44), B. C. 588.

3. Son of Igdaliah (Jer. xxxv:4), B. C. before 606.

4. Son of Maachah and one of David's "thirty" (1 Chron. xi:43), B. C. 1000.

5. The sons of Hanan returned, among the Nethinim, with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii:46; Neh. vii:49), B. C. before 536.

6. A Levite who assisted Ezra in instructing the people in the law (Neh. viii:7). In Neh. x:10, the same person is doubtless mentioned again (B. C. about 410).

7. One of the chiefs of the people who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh. x:26), B. C. about 410.

8. Another chief of the laymen who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh. x:22), B. C. about 410.

9. The son of Zaccar who was keeper of the tithes under Nehemiah (Neh. xiii:13).

HANANEEL (ha-nän'e-el), (Heb. חנניאל, khan-an-ale', God has favored), an Israelite who gave name to one of the towers of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:1; xii:39; Jer. xxxi:38; Zech. xiv:10). (See HANANEEL, TOWER OF.)

HANANEEL, TOWER OF (ha-nān'e-el, tou'-ēr ōv), (Heb. חַנַּנְיָאֵל, khan-an-ale', God has favored), a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:1; xii:39).

From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananeel was but another name for the Tower of Meah; at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep gate and the fish gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi:38. The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. xiv:10) also connects this tower with the "corner gate," which lay on the other side of the sheep-gate (Smith, Bib. Dict.) (See HANANEEL.)

HANANI (ha-nā'ni), (Heb. חַנַּנְיָאֵל, khan-aw-nee', gracious).

1. Son of Heman, David's Seer, who was head of the 18th course in the Temple service (1 Chron. xxv:4, 25), B. C. 1014.

2. A prophet under the reign of Asa, king of Judah, by whom he was seized and imprisoned for announcing that he had lost, from want of due trust in God, an advantage which he might have gained over the king of Syria (2 Chron. xvi:7). The precise occasion of this declaration is not known. This Hanani is supposed to be the same who was father of another prophet, named Jehu (1 Kings xvi:7); but circumstances of time and place seem adverse to this conclusion. (B. C. 928.)

3. A priest in the time of Ezra who had 'strange' wives (Ezra x:20), B. C. 459.

4. A brother of Nehemiah, who went from Jerusalem to Shushan, being sent most probably by Ezra, and brought that information respecting the miserable condition of the returned Jews which led to the mission of Nehemiah. Hanani came back to Judæa, probably along with his brother, and, together with one Hananiah, was appointed to take charge of the gates of Jerusalem, and see that they were opened in the morning and closed in the evening at the appointed time. The circumstances of the time and place rendered this an important and responsible duty, not unattended with some danger (Neh. vii:2, 3), B. C. 455.

5. A priest, one of the musicians who officiated in the ceremonial of purifying the walls of Jerusalem when they had been rebuilt (Neh. xii:36), B. C. 445.

HANANIAH (hān'a-ni'ah), (Heb. חַנַּנְיָאֵל, khan-an-yaw', Jehovah's goodness).

1. A chief captain of the army of King Uziah (2 Chron xxvi:11), B. C. 803.

2. Son of Heman and chief of the 16th course of Levites (1 Chron. xxv:4, 5, 23), B. C. 1014.

3. A false prophet of Gibeon, who, by opposing his prophecies to those of Jeremiah, brought upon himself the terrible sentence, 'Thou shalt die this year, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord.' He died accordingly (Jer. xxviii:1, 57), B. C. 596.

4. Father of Zedekiah, and a prince in the reign of Jehoiakim, King of Judah (Jer. xxxvi:12), B. C. 605.

5. Grandfather of Irijah (Jer. xxxvii:13), B. C. before 580.

6. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Chron. viii:24), B. C. 605.

7. (See SHADRACH.)

8. Son of Zerubbabel from whom Christ was descended (1 Chron. iii:19), B. C. after 536.

9. Sons of Bebai who returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra x:28), B. C. 459.

10. A priest who had the charge of making the ointments (Exod. xxx:22-38; 1 Chron. ix:30). He built a part of the wall in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii:8). Perhaps the same as the one mentioned in verse 30. (B. C. 446.)

11. The person who was associated with Nehemiah's brother Hanani in the charge of the gates of Jerusalem. The high eulogy is bestowed upon him, that 'he was a faithful man, and feared God above many' (Neh. vii:2). (See HANANI 2.)

12. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah under Joiakim the high-priest (Neh. xii:12), B. C. 446.

13. An Israelite mentioned (Neh. x:23). (See ANANIAS.)

HAND (hānd), Heb. יָד, yawd, the open palm יָד, kaph, the hollow of the hand; Gr. χεῖρ, khîre).

The organ of feeling, and rightly denominated by Galen the instrument of instruments, since by its position at the end of the fore-arm, its structure and its connection with the mind, the hand admirably executes the behests of the human will, and acquires and imparts to man incomparable skill and power. By the peculiarities of its conformation—the inclination of the thumb to the palm, the comparative length of the thumb and of the fingers, 'the hollow of the hand,' and the fleshy protuberances by which that hollow is mainly formed—this member is wonderfully adapted to the purposes for which it was designed, and serves to illustrate the wisdom and providence of the great Creator (The Hand, its Mechanism, and vital Endowments, as evincing Design, by Sir Charles Bell).

The hand itself serves to distinguish man from all other terrestrial beings. No other animal has any member comparable with the human hand. The trunk of the elephant unites the attributes of skill and power to a surprising extent, but yields the palm to the hand.

Of the two hands the right has a preference, derived from natural endowment. Its universal use, as the chief instrument in acting, serves to show that its superiority is something more than an accident. But the preference which it holds is only a part of the general advantage which the right side has over the left, not only in muscular strength, but also in its vital or constitutional properties (Bell).

From the properties already described, the student of Scripture is prepared to see the hand employed in holy writ as a symbol of skill, strength, and efficacy.

As the hand is the great instrument of action, so is it eminently fitted for affording aid to the mind, by the signs and indications which it makes. Thus to lay the hand on any one was a means of pointing him out, and consequently an emblem of setting any one apart for a particular office or dignity. Imposition of hands accordingly formed, at an early period, a part of the ceremonial observed on the appointment and consecration of persons to high and holy undertakings. (See Num. xxvii:18-23; Acts viii:15-17; 1 Tim. iv:14; 2 Tim. i:6.) A corruption of this doctrine was, that the laying on of hands gave of itself divine powers, and on this account Simon, the magician (Acts viii:18), offered money, saying 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost,' intending probably to carry on a gainful trade by communicating the gift to others. (See HANDS, IMPOSITION OF.) J. R. B.

Customs. (1) Pouring water on one's hands denoted serving of him (2 Kings iii:11). (2) Washing of hands imported profession of innocence (Deut. xxi:6; Matt. xxvii:24); or a solemn purgation of one's self in Jesus' blood, and a resolution to maintain a holy practice (Ps. xxvi:6). (3) Kissing of the hand to a thing imported adoration of it (Job xxxi:27). (4) The consecration of the priests was called a filling of their hands, because part of the consecrated offerings was put into their hands (1 Kings xiii:33). (5) Leaning on one's hand imported the familiarity of a superior with his inferior (2 Kings v:18, and vii:17). (6) Striking of hands imports undertaking as surety for one's debt or good behavior (Prov. xvii:18, and xxii:26). (7) Putting the hand under the thigh was an ancient form of swearing and subjection to the person under whose thigh the hand was put (Gen. xxiv:2, and xlvii:29). (8) Giving of the hand imports making a covenant with one, or serving him (2 Kings x:15; Lam. v:6; 1 Chron. xxix:20). (9) Witnesses laid their hands on the head of the person accused; importing their solemn charging him with guilt, or their readiness to be the first in stoning him (Deut. xiii:9, and xvii:7). (10) The Hebrews laying their hands on their sacrifices before they were slain denoted the solemn confession of their sin, and of their deserving to die; their ceremonial translation of their guilt on the victim (Lev. i:4, and xvi:21). (11) Laying on of hands was used in setting apart men to an office; thus Moses publicly set apart Joshua to the office of governor (Num. xxvii:18). So the Levites under the Old Testament, and ministers under the New, were set apart to their offices by laying on of hands (Num. viii:10; Acts xiii:3; 1 Tim. iv:14). This form was also used in blessing of persons; so Jacob blessed Joseph's children (Gen. xlviii:14), and so Jesus blessed the little children brought to him (Mark x:16). (12) The miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were conferred by laying on of the apostles' hands (Acts viii:17, and xix:6). (13) Stretching out the hand to God imports earnest prayer for his favors, and solemn dedication of ourselves to him (Ps. lxxviii:31, and cxliii:6). (14) Lifting up the hand in affirmation was a form of solemn swearing much used anciently (Gen. xiv:22). (15) Lifting up the hands in prayer, or by the priests in blessing, denoted the solemn wishing of blessings to come from God (Lev. ix:22).

Figurative. (1) To lift up the hand against a superior is to rebel against him (2 Sam. xx:21). (2) To put forth the hand against one is to kill him (1 Sam. xxiv:10). (3) To put our hand to our neighbor's goods is to steal them (Exod. xxii:8, 11). (4) To lay the hand on the mouth imports silence and an acknowledgment of guilt (Job xl:4; Mic. vii:16). (5) To lay hands angrily on persons is to apprehend and smite them (Exod. xxiv:11); or seize on their country (Is. xi:14). (6) Hiding the hand in the bosom denotes great inactivity or sluggish aversion to do or receive anything (Prov. xix:24). (7) Clapping of hands denotes great joy and rejoicing (Ps. xvii:1; and the clapping of hands by trees and floods denotes universal joy and gladness (Is. lv:12; Ps. xcvi:8); but sometimes it denotes contempt and noisy derision (Ezek. xxv:6; Job xxxiv:37). (8) With respect to station, the seat on the right hand was honorable, that on the left not so much so (Matt. xx:21). (9) With respect to the points of the heavens, the left hand signifies the north, and the right hand the south; and yet sometimes it may only signify different quarters (Gen. xiii:9); and so our not turning from God's law to the left hand or to the right imports our following it most exactly in every point, neither indulging ourselves in neglect of what it requires, nor pretending to go beyond it (Josh. i:7, and xxiii:6; Prov. iv:27). (10) God's standing at men's right hand imports his regard to them, and readiness to plead their cause and assist and comfort them (Ps. xvi:8, and cix:31). (11) Satan's standing at men's right hand imports his accusing of them, hindering them from their proper work; and his readiness to torment them (Zech. iii:1; Ps. cix:6). (12) In giving alms we are not to let our left hand know what our right hand doth; i. e. we are to bestow them with all proper secrecy, and with no proud ostentation (Matt. vi:3). (13) Though hand join in hand, i. e. though all men should use their most vigorous and united efforts to protect a wicked man, he shall not go unpunished (Prov. xi:21). (14) To be in the hand of persons is to be in their possession, or under their management, or under their power and dominion (Job xii:6; Gen. xxxix:6; 2 Kings xxi:14; Ps. xxxi:15). (15) A darling and apparently pleasant and profitable lust to be mortified is likened to a right hand, or foot, or eye, to be cut off or plucked out (Matt. v:29, 30, and xviii:8, 9). (16) To have one's life or soul in his hand is to be in extreme hazard of death (1 Sam. xix:5; Job xiii:14; Ps. cxix:109). (17) As hands are the instruments of acting, doing, or receiving, they are often the emblems of power, and work. God's hand, or right hand, signifies his power and the exertion thereof, either in a way of mercy or wrath (Ps. lxxiii:8; Deut. xxxii:40). So his powerful influence to instruct or support a prophet is called his hand being on or with him (1 Kings xviii:46; Ezek. i:3, and iii:14). His judgments executed are called his heavy hand (1 Sam. v:11). His stretching out his hand imports the exertion of his power to protect and deliver his friends, or terribly to punish his foes (Exod. iii:20); or his continuing to threaten men with further strokes (Is. ix:12, and xiv:26, 27). He will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction. Let friends mourn ever so bitterly, God will not by his power bring me or any other dead man to life again; nor will he pursue me further than the grave with his judgments (Job xxx:24). (18) God plucks his hand out of his bosom when he exerts his power for the deliverance of his people, and withdraws it when he forbears to help, comfort, or deliver them (Ps. lxxiv:11). (19) Christ sits at God's right hand; he is enthroned in his highest favor, and in the highest honor and authority (Rom. viii:34). (20) Christ stretching out his hands to men, in the offer of the gospel, denotes his earnest calling of them, his readiness to receive them and supply them out of his fullness (Is. lxxv:2; Prov. i:24). (21) Length of days is in his or Wisdom's right hand, and in his left riches and honor. In receiving and walking in him in a wise and well-ordered conversation, there is to be had life and happiness both here and hereafter (Prov. iii:16). He has the stars or ministers in his right hand; he supports, protects, and governs them (Rev. i:16). (22) Angels and ministers have the hands of a man; they act with knowledge and affection (Ezek. i:8). (23) Hands weak or hanging down denote persons dispirited and unfit for action (Job iv:3; Heb. xii:12). (24) To lift up the hands to God's commandments is to be devoted to and earnest in obeying God's law in our practice (Ps. cxix:48). (25) Clean and holy hands denote a blameless and holy practice (Ps. xxiv:4; 1 Tim. ii:8). (26) Hands defiled and bloody denote a practice corrupt and murderous (Ezek. xxiii:37; Is. i:15). (27) Slack hands import a careless inactive practice (Prov. x:4). (28) To do a thing by the hand of others is to do it by their assistance (Exod. iv:13; Lev. viii:36; x:11, and xxvi:46, etc.): and so wicked men are called the hand of God; as by them he executes much of his providential work on earth, particularly in correcting his people (Ps. xvii:14). (29) In Col. ii:13, 14, 'the law of commandments contained in ordinances' (Ephes. ii:15), is designated 'the handwriting of ordinances that was against us,' which Jesus blotted out, and took away, nailing it to his cross; phraseology which indicates the abolition, on the part of the Savior, of the Mosaic law.

HANDBREADTH (häänd'brädth), (Heb. כַּחֲמֹשֶׁת, teh'fakh, 2 Chron. iv:5; Ps. xxxix:5; כַּחֲמֹשֶׁת, to'fakh, Exod. xxxvii:12).

The breadth of the hand, a palm (Exod. xxv:25). (See CUBIT.) It is used by the Psalmist figuratively of human life, especially when life closes prematurely (Ps. xxxix:5).

HANDBROAD (häänd'bräd).
Measuring a handbreadth (Ezek. xl:43; in R. V. handbreadth). (See HANDBREADTH.)

HANDICRAFT (häänd't-kräft).

In the early periods to which the Scriptural history refers we do not meet with those artificial feelings and unreasonable prejudices against hand-labor which prevail and are so banefully influential in modern society. The entire circle of achievement which man had effected in the natural world, was, in ancient times, too immediately and too obviously connected with the labor of the hands, which is, in truth, the great primary source of wealth, for any feeling regarding it to prevail but one of high estimation. Accordingly, even the creation of the world is spoken of as the work of God's hands, and the firmament is said to show his handiwork (Ps. viii:3; xix:1; Gen. ii:2; Job xxxiv:19). (See HAND, Figurative.) The primitive history, too, which the Bible presents is the history of hand-laborers. Adam dressed the garden in which God had placed him (Gen. ii:15), Abel was a keeper of sheep, Cain a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv:2), Tubai-Cain a smith (Gen. iv:22).

The life which the patriarchs previously led in their own pasture-grounds, was not favorable to the cultivation of the practical arts of life, much less those by which it is embellished. Egypt, in consequence, must have presented to Joseph and his father a land of wonders, of rich and attractive knowledge.

The maritime and commercial Phœnicians were to the Hebrews another source of knowledge of handicrafts. Commerce and navigation imply great skill in art and science; and the pursuits to which they lead largely increase the skill whence they emanate. It is not, therefore, surprising that the origin of so many arts has been referred to the northeastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea; nor is there any difficulty in understanding how arts and letters should be propagated from the coast to the interior, as well before as after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in the land of promise.

The skill of the Hebrews during their wanderings in the desert does not appear to have been inconsiderable; but the pursuits of war and the entire absorption of the energies of the nation in the one great work of gaining the land which had been given to them, may have led to their falling off in the arts of peace; and from a passage in 1 Sam. xiii:20 it would appear that not long after they had taken possession of the country they were in a low condition as to the instruments of handicraft. A comparatively settled state of society, however, soon led to the revival of skill by the encouragement of industry. A more minute division of labor ensued. Trades, strictly so called, arose, carried on by persons exclusively devoted to one pursuit. Thus in Judg. xvii:4 and Jer. x:14, 'the founder' is mentioned, a trade which implies a practical knowledge of metallurgy; the smelting and working of metals were well known to the Hebrews (Job. xxxvii:18); brass was in use before iron; arms and instruments of husbandry were made of iron. In Exodus, xxxv:30-35, a passage occurs which may serve to specify many arts that were practiced among the Israelites, though it seems also to intimate that at the time to which it refers artificers of the description referred to were not numerous.

'See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, and hath filled him with the spirit of God, in knowledge and all manner of workmanship, and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work; and he hath put in his heart that he may teach; both he and Aholiab; them hath he filled with wisdom of heart to work all manner of work of the engraver; and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen, and of the weaver.'

From the ensuing chapter (Exod. xxxiv:34) it appears that gilding was known before the settlement in Canaan. The ark (Exod. xxxvii:2) was overlaid with pure gold within and without. The cherubim were wrought, 'beaten' (Exod. xxxvii:7) in gold. The candlestick was of beaten gold (verses 17, 22). Wire-drawing was probably understood (Exod. xxxviii:4; xxxix:3). Covering with brass (Exod. xxxviii:2) and with silver (Prov. xxvi:23) was practiced. Architecture and the kindred arts do not appear to have made much progress till the days of Solomon, who employed an incredible number of persons to procure timber (1 Kings v:13, sq.); but the men of skill for building his temple he obtained from Hiram, king of Tyre (1 Kings v:3, sq.; 1 Chron. xiv:1; 2 Chron. ii:7). (Scholz, Handb. der Bib. Archäol. p. 390, sq.; De Wette, Lehrb. der Archäol. p. 115, sq.; Winer, Realwört. art. 'Handwerke').

The intercourse which the Babylonish captivity gave the Jews seems to have greatly improved their knowledge and skill in both the practical and the fine arts, and to have led them to hold them in very high estimation. The arts were even carried on by persons of learning, who took a title of honor from their trade (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi, 42). It was held a sign of a bad education if a father did not teach his son some handicraft. (Lightfoot, p. 616; Mish. Tr. Pirke Aboth, ii, 2; Wagen-seil's Sota, p. 597; Othon. Lex. Rabb. 491).

In the Apocrypha and New Testament there are mentioned tanners (Acts ix:43), tent-makers (Acts xviii:3); in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. v: 4. 1), cheese-makers; domestics (κουπέις, barbers Antiq. xvi:11, 5); in the Talmud, with others we find tailors, shoemakers, blood letters, glaziers, goldsmiths, plasterers. Certain handicraftsmen could never rise to the rank of high-priest (Mish. Tr. Kiddush, 82, 1), such as weavers, barbers, fullers, perfumers, cuppers, tanners; which pursuits, especially the last, were held in disesteem (Mishna, Tr. Megillah, iii:2; Othon. Lex. Rabb. 155; Wetstein, N. T. ii: 516). In large cities particular localities were set apart for particular trades, as is the case in the East to the present day. Thus in Jeremiah xxxvii:21 we read of 'the bakers' street.' So in the Talmud (Mishna, v. 169, 225) mention is made of a flesh market; in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1) of a cheese market; and in the New Testament (John v:2) we read of a sheep market. (See Iken, Antiq. Heb. iii-ix. p. 578, sq.; Bellermann Handb. i, 22, sq.) J. R. B.

HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN (hǎn'kēr-chif, nǎp'kīn), (Gr. σουδάριον, sou-dar'ee-on, sweat cloth; Vulg. sudarium), occurs in Luke xix:20; John xi:44; xx:7; Acts xix:12.

The Greek word is adopted from the Latin, and probably at first had the same meaning; and, being derived from sudo, to perspire, corresponds to our word handkerchief.

In the first instance of its use (Luke xix:20) it means a wrapper, in which the 'wicked servant' had laid up the pound entrusted to him by his master. For references to the custom of laying up money, etc., in the Soudaria, both in classical and rabbinical writers, see Wetstein's N. T., on Luke xix:20. In the second instance (John xi:44) it appears as a kerchief, or cloth attached to the head of a corpse. It was perhaps brought round the forehead and under the chin. In many Egyptian mummies it does not cover the face. In ancient times among the Greeks it did. Nicolaus (De Græcor. Luctu, c. iii: sec. 6, Thiel, 1697). Maimonides, in his comparatively recent times, describes the whole face as being covered, and gives a reason for the custom (Tract Efel, c. 4). The next instance is that of the σουδάριον, nāpkin, which had been 'about the head' of our Lord, but which, after his resurrection, was found rolled up, as if deliberately, and put in a place separately from the linen clothes, wrapped up apart in a place by itself. The last instance of the Biblical use of the word occurs in the account of 'the special miracles' wrought by the hands of Paul (Acts xix:11); 'so that soudaria (handkerchiefs, napkins, wrappers, shawls, etc.) were brought from his body to the sick; and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.' The Ephesians had not unnaturally inferred that the apostle's miraculous power could be communicated by such a mode of contact; and certainly cures thus received by parties at a distance, among a people famed for their addictedness to 'curious arts,' i. e., magical skill, etc., would serve to convince them of the truth of the minds. But it is not said that Paul sent these napkins.

HANDLE (hǎn'd'l), (Heb. plural יָדַי, kap-poth', literally hands), the thumb pieces or latch to a door. (See LOCK.)

HANDMAID (hǎnd'mād), (Heb. שִׁפְחָה, shif-khah', or שִׁפְחָה, aw-maw', Gen. xvi:1; Ruth iii:9, etc.; Gr. δούλη, doo'lay, Luke i:38, etc.), a maid-servant. (See SERVICE.)

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF.

(1) Old and New Testament. Laying on hands, or imposition of hands, is understood in different ways both in the Old and New Testament. It is often taken for ordination and consecration of priests and ministers, as well among the Jews as Christians (Num. viii:10; Acts vi:6; xiii:3; 1 Tim. iv:14). It is sometimes also made use of to signify the establishment of judges and magistrates, on whom it was usual to lay hands when they were intrusted with these employments. Thus when Moses constituted Joshua his successor, God appointed him to lay his hands upon him (Num. xxvii:18). Jacob laid his hands on Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his last blessing (Gen. xlviii:14). The high-priest stretched out his hands to the people as often as he recited the solemn form of blessing (Lev. ix:22). The Israelites, who presented sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins while they laid their hands upon them (Lev. i:4). This testified that the person acknowledged himself worthy of death, that he laid his sins upon the sacrifice, that he trusted in Christ for the expiation of his sins, and that he devoted himself to God. Witnesses laid their hands upon the head of the accused person, as it were to signify that they charged upon him the guilt of his blood, and freed themselves from it (Deut. xiii:9; xvii:7). Our Savior laid his hands upon the children that were presented to him, and blessed them (Mark x:16). And the Holy Ghost was conferred on those who were baptized by the laying on of the hands of the apostles (Acts viii:17; xix:6).

(2) Ecclesiastical Uses. In the rites of the early church the imposition of hands was used in confirmation, which generally was an accompaniment of baptism, and symbolized the reception of the Holy Ghost. It was also practiced in ORDINATION (which see). In the modern church the Roman Catholics use the imposition of hands in the ceremonies which precede extreme unction, in ordination and confirmation, in both of which services it has received a sacramental efficacy. In the mass, previous to the consecration of the elements, the priest extends his hands over the people in blessing. The Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal, and the Reformed Episcopal churches employ it as a symbolical act in baptism and confirmation. The Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches employ it only in ordination. (Barnes' Bib. Dict.) (See HAND.)

HANDSTAFF (hǎnd'stáf), (Heb. מַקְלֵה, mak-kale', a rod or staff), a javelin (Ezek. xxxix:9). (See ARMS, ARMOR.)

HANDWRITING (hǎnd'rīt'ing), (Gr. χειρόγραφον, khi-rōg'raf-on, what one has written with his own hand), specially a note of hand, or writing in which one acknowledges that money has either been deposited with him or lent to him by another, to be returned at an appointed time.

Figurative. The ceremonial law is called a handwriting against men, R. V. bond; its rites witnessed guilt and desert of punishment; and it was a means of shutting out the gentiles from the church of God (Col. ii:14).

HANES (hā'nēz), (Heb. חָנַיִם, khaw-nace'), a place in Egypt only mentioned in Is. xxx:4, which has not been definitely located, but probably in the neighborhood of Zoan. It must not be confounded with Taphanes.

HANGING (hǎng'ing). See PUNISHMENTS.

HANGING, HANGINGS. Three Hebrew words are translated thus. In relation to the temple we find:

1. Keh'lah (Heb. כַּהֵל, a screen). The "hangings" were used for covering the walls of the court of the tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Exod. xxviii:9; xxxv:17; xxxviii:9; Num. iii:26; iv:26).

2. Maw-sawk' (Heb. מַוְסָק, the "hanging" was a curtain or "covering" to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi:36, 37; xxxix:38, etc.). The term is also applied to the veil that concealed the holy of holies (Exod. xxxv:12; xxxix:34; xl:21; Num. iv:5).

3. In relation to heathenism hawt-teem' (Heb. ^{תב}_{תב}, marg. "houses"), "hangings" (2 Kings xxiii:7), probably means small tent temples woven by the women for Asherah (comp. 2 Kings xvii:29).

HANIEL (hān'i-el), the form of Haniel which is used in 1 Chron. viii:39. (See HANNIEL.)

HANNAH (hān'nah), (Heb. ^{חנה}_{חנה}, khan-naw', grace, favor), wife of Elkanah (a Levite of Ephrathah) and mother of Samuel.

(1) A Childless Wife. She was very dear to her husband, but being childless was much aggrieved by the insults of Elkanah's other wife, Peninnah, who was blessed with children. The family lived at Ramathaim-zophim, and, as the law required, there was a yearly journey to offer sacrifices at the sole altar of Jehovah, which was then at Shiloh. Women were not bound to attend; but pious females free from the cares of a family often did so, especially when the husband was a Levite. Every time that Hannah went there childless she declined to take part in the festivities which followed the sacrifices, being then, as it seems, peculiarly exposed to the taunts of her rival.

(2) An Earnest Prayer. At length, on one of these visits to Shiloh, while she prayed before returning home, she vowed to devote to the Almighty the son which she so earnestly desired (1 Sam. i:11). It seems to have been the custom to pronounce all vows at the holy place in a loud voice, under the immediate notice of the priest (Deut. xxiii:23; Ps. lxxv:1); but Hannah prayed in a low tone, so that her lips only were seen to move. This attracted the attention of the high-priest, Eli, who suspected that she had taken too much wine at the recent feast. From this suspicion Hannah easily vindicated herself, and returned home with a lightened heart.

(3) Birth of a Son. Before the end of that year Hannah became the rejoicing mother of a son, to whom the name of Samuel was given, and who was from his birth placed under the obligations of that condition of Nazariteship to which his mother had vowed him. (B. C. 1171.)

(4) Taken to Shiloh. Hannah went no more to Shiloh till her child was old enough to dispense with her maternal services, when she took him up with her to leave him there, as, it appears, was the custom when one already a Levite was placed under the additional obligations of Nazariteship. When he was presented in due form to the high-priest, the mother took occasion to remind him of the former transaction: 'For this child,' she said, 'I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him' (1 Sam. i:27). Hannah's gladness afterwards found vent in an exulting chant, which furnishes a remarkable specimen of the early lyric poetry of the Hebrews, and of which many of the ideas and images were in after times repeated by the Virgin Mary on a somewhat similar occasion (Luke i:46, sq.).

(5) Annual Visits. After this Hannah failed not to visit Shiloh every year, bringing a new dress for her son, who remained under the eye and near the person of the high-priest. (See SAMUEL.) That great personage took kind notice of Hannah on these occasions, and bestowed his blessing upon her and her husband. The Lord repaid her abundantly for that which she had, to use her own expression, 'lent to him;' for she had three sons and two daughters after Samuel.

HANNATHON (hān'na-thōn), (Heb. ^{חנתון}_{חנתון}, khan-naw-thone', probably favored), a place on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix:14), apparently about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the valley of Jiphthah-el.

HANNIEL (hān'ni-el), (Heb. ^{חנניאל}_{חנניאל}, khan-nee-ale', grace of God).

1. Son of Ephod and assistant in the division of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv:23). B. C. 1618.

2. An Asherite, son of Ulla (1 Chron. vii:39, where the name is less correctly HANIEL), before B. C. 720.

HANOCH (hā'nok), (Heb. ^{חנוך}_{חנוך}, khan-oke', initiated).

1. The third child of Midian, a descendant of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv:4). The name is Henoch in the parallel passage (1 Chron. i:33).

2. Eldest son of Reuben and founder of the family by his name (Gen. xlvii:9; Num. xxvi:5; 1 Chron. v:3). Hanoch and Enoch are the same in the Hebrew.

HANOCHITES (hā'nok-its), (Heb. ^{חנכיים}_{חנכיים}, hak-khan-o-kee'), a family founded by HANOCH, 2.

HANUN (hā'nun), (Heb. ^{חנן}_{חנן}, khaw-noon', favored).

1. A son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. David, who had in his troubles been befriended by Nahash, sent, with the kindest intentions, an embassy to condole with him on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession. The rash young king, however, was led to misapprehend the motives of this embassy, and to treat with gross and inexpiable indignity the honorable personages whom David had charged with this mission. Their beards were half shaven, and their robes cut short by the middle, and they were dismissed in this shameful trim, which can be appreciated only by those who consider how reverently the beard has always been regarded by the Orientals (see BEARD). (B. C. 1038). When the news of this affront was brought to David, he sent word to the ambassadors to remain at Jericho till the growth of their beards enabled them to appear with decency in the metropolis. He vowed vengeance upon Hanun for the insult; and the vehemence with which the matter was taken up forms an instance, interesting from its antiquity, of the respect expected to be paid to the person and character of ambassadors. Hanun himself looked for nothing less than war as the consequence of his conduct; and he subsidized Hadarezer and other Syrian princes to assist him with their armies. The power of the Syrians was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate, which was severe even beyond the usual severities of war in that remote age. (See AMMONITES; DAVID). (2 Sam. x; 1 Chron. xix), about B. C. 1034.

2. A man who assisted in repairing the ravine-gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:13), B. C. 446.

3. The sixth son of Zalaph, who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, apparently on the east side (Neh. iii:30), B. C. 446.

HAP (hăp), (Heb. ^{חפ}_{חפ}, mik-reh', Ruth ii:3), generally now used in composition with other words; as, mishap, perhaps, haply, hapless (2 Cor. ix:4). It is a Saxon word meaning luck, chance.

HAPHRAIM (baph-rā'im), (Heb. ^{חפראים}_{חפראים}, khaf-aw-rah'yim, double pit), a city of Issachar (Josh. xix:10). Eusebius says there was a place called Apharaïm six miles from Legio. At present there is a village, el-Afileh, about six miles northeast of Lejun, which may represent the Ancient Haphraim.

HAPLY (hăp'ly), (Gr. ἄρα, ar'ah).

Haply is 'by hap.' 'Happily' is the same word under a different spelling, and had formerly the same meaning, though it has now come to mean 'by good hap.' Happily meaning simply 'by hap,' 'perchance,' is common in Shakespeare, though modern editions usually spell it 'haply.' Thus Hamlet, II, ii, 402—

'Ham. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling-clouts.

Ros. Happily he's the second time come to them.'

Hence, it will be observed that the word means by chance.

In Acts v:39 the passage reads: "Lest haply ye be founde to stryve agaynst God."—Tyndale.

HAP-PIZZEZ (hăp-piz'zēz), in A. V. Aphses, (Heb. פִּזְזֵז, pits-tsates', the dispersion).

A descendant of Aaron. His family became the eighteenth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv: 15).

HARA (hā'rā), (Heb. הָרָא, har-row', a Chaldee form for mountain, Gesenius; Vulg. Ara).

One of the places to which the tribes beyond the Jordan were carried away by Tiglath-pileser. The word occurs only in a single passage (1 Chron. v:26); in the Septuagint and Syriac version it is altogether omitted. The Chaldee Paraphrast renders it mountains of darkness. Bochart and Gesenius conjecture that it is a name for the northern part of Media (Herod. vii:62; Bochart, Geog. Sacra, iii. 14. p. 194; Gesenius, The-saurus, s. v., Michaelis, Supplementa ad Lex. Heb., vol. i, p. 570). J. E. R.

W. Max Müller, in Hastings' Bib. Dict., questions the correctness of the conjecture.

HARADAH (hă'r'a-dah), (Heb. הָרָדָה, har-aw-daw', place of terror), the twenty-fifth camp or station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii:24). It has not been identified. (See WANDERING, THE.)

HARAM (hă'ram). See HOUSE.

HARAN (hā'ran), (Heb. הָרָן, har-rawn', moun-taineer).

1. One of the three sons of Terah, brother of Abraham and Nahor, and father of Lot, Milcah and Iscah. He died before his father Terah; which, from the manner in which it is mentioned, appears to have been a much rarer case in those days than at present (Gen. xi:27, sq.), B. C. 2223.

2. A Gershonite Levite of the family of Shimei, in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiii:9), B. C. 1014.

3. More properly Charan (Heb. כְּרָן, khaw-rawn', parched), called by the Greeks Charran, and by the Romans Charræ. It was situated in the northwestern part of Mesopotamia, on a river of the same name running into the Euphrates. It is supposed to have been so called from Haran, the father of Lot and brother of Abraham; but there appears no ground for this conclusion except the identity of names. Abraham, after he had been called from Ur of the Chaldees, tarried here till his father, Terah, died, when he proceeded to the land of Canaan (Gen. xi:31, 38; Acts vii:4). The elder branch of the family still remained at Haran; which led to the interesting journeys thither described in the patriarchal history—first, that of Abraham's servant to obtain a wife for Isaac (Gen. xxiv) and next, that of Jacob when he fled to evade the wrath of Esau (Gen. xxviii: 10). The plain bordering on this town is celebrated in history as the scene of a battle in which the Roman army was defeated by the Parthians, and the Triumvir Crassus killed.

This place is not at all connected with the modern Hârân-el-awamâd, east of Damascus, as maintained by Dr. Beke. Haran still retains its ancient name in the form of Harran, and is only peopled by a few families of wandering Arabs, who are led thither by a plentiful supply of water from several small streams. It is situated in a flat and sandy plain 36 deg. 40 min. N. lat., 39 deg. 2 min. 45 sec. E. long.

It is mentioned by Ezekiel (xxvii:23) among the places which traded with Tyre. This trade would be very natural, as Haran was the frontier town of Babylon, commanding both the roads and fords of the Euphrates. "It was the city of the moon god, the foundation of whose temple went back to prehistorical times, and was restored by Nabonidus" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon., p. 507, sq.)

4. Son of Caleb by his concubine, Ephah (1 Chron. ii:46), B. C. 1618.

HARARITE (hā'ra-rit), (Heb. הַרְרִי, ha-har-ree').

1. A designation of Agee (2 Sam. xxiii:11).

2. The name of his son Shammah (2 Sam. xxiii:33), which Kennicott suggests should be the reading in 1 Chron. xi:34.

3. The designation of Sharar (2 Sam. xxiii: 33), or Sacar, which Kennicott regards as more correct (1 Chron. xi:35).

HARBONA (har-bō'nà), (Heb. הַרְבוּנָא, har-bo-naw', ass driver; in Esth. vii:9 הַרְבוּנִי, one of the eunuchs of Ahasuerus or Xerxes (Esth. i:10). In vii:9 the name is Harbonah (B. C. 483-473).

HARBONAH (har-bō'nah). The same as above.

HARD (hârd). The various meanings of 'hard,' whether as adj. or adv., may be given as follows:

1. Literally, not soft, only Job xli:24; Ezek. iii:9; Wisdom of Sol. xi:4; Sirach xl:15, xlviii: 17.

2. Unfeeling, cruel (Ps. xciv:4), 'How long shall they utter and speak hard things?' (R. V. 'They prate, they speak arrogantly').

3. Trying, exacting (Exod. i:14) 'hard bondage' (R. V. 'hard service'); (2 Sam. iii:39), 'The sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me;' (Ps. lxxxviii:7) 'Thy wrath lieth hard upon me;' (Prov. xiii:15) 'The way of transgressors is hard' (R. V. 'The way of the treacherous is rugged'); (Matt. xxv:24) 'Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man;' (John vi:60) 'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?;' (Acts ix:5) 'It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks'.

4. Obdurate (Jer. v:3) 'They have made their faces harder than a rock;' (Ezek. iii:9) 'As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead.' Comp. Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. III, xi: 111—

'But when we in our viciousness grow hard,
(O misery on't) the wise gods seal our eyes.'

5. Strenuous only (Jonah i:13) 'The men rowed hard.'

6. Difficult as (Gen. xviii:14) 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?' (R. V. margin, 'wonderful'); (1 Kings x:1) 'She came to prove him with hard questions;' (Mark x:24) 'How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!' (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

Figurative. (1) Hardness of spirit expresses great inward sorrow and trouble (1 Sam. i:15). (2) Hardness of heart signifies stupidity and obstinacy in sinning (Ezek. iii:7). (3) The way of transgressors is hard; they are obstinate in their sin, and their course is disagreeable and dangerous (Prov. xiii:15). (4) Manifold troubles are called hardness, because difficult to be borne (2 Tim. ii:3). (5) God's hardening men denotes his justly withholding his gracious influences from them, but not in an arbitrary manner. He permits them in harmony with their own free wills to go on in the way of sinning (Exod. iv:21; vii:3; xiv:4, 17; xix:12, and x:10, 27). (6) Men harden their heart, face, or neck when they grow more and more obstinate and impudent in wickedness, and refuse to be reclaimed (1 Sam. vi:6; Jer. v:3; Prov. xxix:1). To harden oneself in sorrow is with bravery to endure violent pains from an eager desire of death (Job vi:10).

HARDNESS OF HEART (härd'nēs öv härt), (Gr. σκληροκαρδία, sklay-rok-ar-dee'ah, Matt. xix:8; Mark iii:5; Gr. πώρωσις, po'ro-sis, callousness), destitution of feeling. (See HARD, Figurative.)

HARE (hâr), (Heb. אַרְנֶת, ar-neh'beth), occurs in Lev. xi:6, and Deut. xiv:7, and in both instances it is prohibited from being used as food, because it chews the cud, although it has not the hoof divided.

The animal which is now called the hare does not actually chew the cud, but has incisor teeth above and below, set like chisels, and calculated for gnawing, cutting, and nibbling, and when in a state of repose the animals are engaged in working the incisor teeth upon each other. This practice is a necessary condition of existence, for the friction keeps them fit for the purpose of nibbling, and prevents their growing beyond a proper length. As hares do not subsist on hard substances, like most of the genera of the order, but on tender shoots and grasses, they have more cause, and therefore a more constant craving, to abrade their teeth; and this they do in a manner which, combined with the slight trituration of the occasional contents of the cheeks even modern writers, not zoölogists, have mistaken for real rumination.

It follows that both with regard to the Shaphan and the Hare we should understand the original in the above passages, rendered 'chewing the cud,' as merely implying a second mastication, more or less complete. The act of 'chewing the cud' and 're-chewing' being considered identical by the Hebrews, the sacred law-giver, not being occupied with the doctrines of science, no doubt used the expression in the sense in which it was then understood. C. H. S.

"The Arab of the present day regards the hare as a ruminant, and for that reason eats its flesh. As Tristram well says, 'Moses speaks of animals according to appearances, and not with the precision of a comparative anatomist, and his object was to show why the hare should be interdicted, though to all appearance it chewed the cud, viz.: because it did not divide the hoof. To have spoken otherwise would have been as unreasonable as to have spoken of the earth's motion, instead of sunset and sunrise.'" (G. E. Post, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

There are two distinct species of hare in Syria, one, Lepus Syriacus, or Syrian hare, nearly equal in size to the common European, having the fur ochery buff, and Lepus Sinaiticus, or hare of the desert, smaller and brownish. They reside in the localities indicated by their trivial names, and are distinguished from the common hare, by a greater length of ears, and a black tail with white fringe. There is found in Egypt, and higher up the Nile, a third species, represented in the outline paintings on ancient monuments, but not colored with that delicacy of tint required for distinguishing it from the others, excepting that it appears to be marked with the black speckles which characterize the existing species.

HAREPH (hä'reph), (Heb. אָרָפָה, khaw-rafe', reproachful), the "father" of Bethgader and "son" of Caleb in the genealogy of Judah by one of his legitimate wives (1 Chron. ii:51), B. C. about 1190.

HARETH (hä'reth), (Heb. אֲרֶת, kheh'reth, thicket). This is the place in the wooded mountain to which David fled from Saul (1 Sam. xxii:5).

HARHAIHAH (hä'r'ha-i'ah), (Heb. אֲרֵי חַיָּה, khar-hah-yaw'), a man whose son, Uzziel, assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii:8), B. C. before 446

HARHAS (hä'r'has), (Heb. אֲרָחָה, khār-khas', glitter, splendor), ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Huldah, a prophetess in the time of Josiah (2 Kings xxii:14), called Hasrah in 2 Chron. xxxiv:22. The two names differ in Hebrew in the second H, and not merely in transposition of letters.

HARHUR (hä'r'hur), (Heb. אֲרָחֹר, khār-khoor', burning fever), one of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:51; Neh. vii:53), B. C. before 536.

HARIM (hä'r'im), (Heb. אֲרָמִים, khaw-reem', flat-ness).

1. A priest who had charge of one of the divisions in the Temple worship under David (1 Chron. xxiv:8), B. C. 1014.

2. The "sons" of Harim to the number of 1,017, went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:39; Neh. vii:42). The name occurs among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:5), and among those who had taken foreign wives (Ezra x:21). The name also occurs as the descendants of those who went up with Zerubbabel in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua (Neh. xii:15).

3. Another family, to the number of 320, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:32; Neh. vii:35). They seem to have been among those who took foreign wives (Ezra x:31), and sealed the covenant (Neh. x:27), B. C. about 446.

HARIPH (hä'r'iph), (Heb. אֲרִיפָה, khaw-recf', autumnal), one early born, strong, autumnal rain.

1. An Israelite, whose descendants (or possibly a place whose inhabitants), to the number of one hundred and twelve, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii:24). Probably the same with Jorah (Ezra ii:18), B. C. before 536.

2. A chief of the people who gave his hand to the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. x:19), B. C. 445.

HARLOT (hä'r'löt), (Heb. זֹנָה, zo-naw'; קַדְוֹת, ked-ay-shaw', whore, strange woman, etc.; אֲרֵי יָזָו, nok-ree-yaw'; זָרָה, za-raw', etc.).

The first of these English words, to which various etymologies have been assigned, signifies a prostitute for lust or gain. The mercenary motive is more evident in the second.

The first Hebrew word (zo-naw') occurs frequently and is often rendered in our version by the first of these English words, as in Gen. xxxiv:31, etc., and sometimes, without apparent reason for the change, by the second, as in Prov. xxiii:27, and elsewhere. The first English word is also applied to different Hebrew words, whereby important distinctions are lost. Thus in Gen. xxxviii:15, the word is zonaw, 'harlot,' which, however, becomes changed to ked-ay-shaw, 'harlot,' in vers. 21, 22, which means, literally, a consecrated woman, a female (perhaps priestess) devoted to prostitution in honor of some heathen idol. The distinction shows that Judah supposed Tamar to be a heathen: the facts, therefore, do not prove that prostitution was then practiced between Hebrews. The following elucidation is offered of the most important instances in which the several words occur:

(1) The Veil. First zonaw. From the foregoing account of Judah it would appear that the 'veil' was at that time peculiar to harlots. Judah thought Tamar to be such, 'because she had covered her face.' Mr. Buckingham remarks, in reference to this passage, that 'the Turcoman women go unveiled to this day' (Travels in Mesopotamia, i:77). It is contended by Jahn and others that in ancient times all females wore the veil (Bibl. Archæol. p. 127). Possibly some peculiarity in the size of the veil, or the mode of wearing it, may have been (Prov. vii:10) the distinctive dress of the harlot at that period (see New Translation, by the Rev. A. De Sola, etc. pp. 116, 248-9). The priests and the high-priest were forbidden to take a wife that was (had been, Matt. xxi:31) a harlot. Josephus extends the law to all the Hebrews, and seems to ground it on the prohibition against oblations arising from prostitution (Deut. xxiii:18) (Antiq. iv:8, 23).

(2) Rahab. The celebrated case of Rahab has been much debated. She is, indeed, called by the word usually signifying harlot (Josh. ii:1; vi:17; Sept. πόρνη; Vulg. meretrix; and in Heb. xi:31; James ii:25); but the word may also mean an innkeeper. (See RAHAB.)

(3) A Foreigner. The next instance introduces the epithet of 'strange woman.' It is the case of Jephthah's mother (Judg. xi:2), who is also called a harlot (πόρνη; meretrix); but the epithet 'strange woman' merely denotes foreign extraction. The representation given by Solomon is no doubt founded upon facts, and therefore shows that in his time prostitutes plied their trade in the 'streets' (Prov. vii:12; ix:14, etc.; Jer. iii:2; Ezek. xvi:24, 25, 31).

(4) Consecrated Prostitute. Kedayshow, occurs Gen. xxxviii:15, 21, 22; Deut. xxiii:17; Hos. iv:14. It has been already observed that the proper meaning of the word is consecrated prostitute. The prohibition in Deut. xxiii:17, 'there shall be no זנה, "whore," of the daughters of Israel,' is intended to exclude such devotees from the worship of Jehovah (see other allusions, Job xxxvi:14; 1 Kings xiv:24; xv:12). The strange woman is further alluded to (1 Kings xi:1; Prov. v:20; vi:24; vii:5; xxiii:27; Sept. ἄλλοτρα; Vulg. aliena, extranea). It seems probable that some of the Hebrews in later times interpreted the prohibition against fornication (Deut. xxii:14) as limited to females of their own nation, and that the 'strange women' in question were Canaanites and other Gentiles (Josh. xxiii:13).

(5) New Testament. In the New Testament πόρνη, harlot, occurs in Matt. xxi:31, 32; Luke xv:30; 1 Cor. vi:15, 16; Heb. xi:31; James ii:25. In none of these passages does it necessarily imply prostitution for gain. The likeliest is Luke xv:30.

J. F. D.

(6) Old English Use. In the old English use of the term harlot meant originally a vagabond. R. C. Trench says it was used of both sexes alike, and for the most part a term of slight and contempt. (See MARRIAGE; PROSTITUTION, SACRED.)

Figurative. (1) It is used symbolically for a city in Rev. xvii:1, 5, 15, 16; xix:2, where the term and all the attendant imagery are derived from the Old Testament. It may be observed in regard to Tyre, which (Is. xxiii:15, 17) is represented as 'committing fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth,' that these words, as indeed seems likely from those which follow, may relate to the various arts which she had employed to induce merchants to trade with her' (Patrick, in loc.). So the Sept. understood it, she will be an emporium for all the kingdoms on the face of the earth. Schleusner observes that the same words in Rev. xviii:3 may also relate to commercial dealings. (2) Since the Hebrews regarded Jehovah as the husband of his people, by virtue of the covenant he had made with them (Jer. iii:1); therefore, to commit fornication is a very common metaphor in the Scriptures to denote defections on their part from that covenant, and especially by the practice of idolatry. (See FORNICATION.) Hence the degeneracy of Jerusalem is illustrated by the symbol of a harlot (Is. i:21), and even that of heathen cities, as of Nineveh (Nah. iii:4). Under this figure the prophet Ezekiel delivers the tremendous invectives contained in ch. xvi, xxiii. (3) In the prophecy of Hosea the illustration is carried to a startling extent. The prophet seems commanded by the Lord to take 'a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms' (ch. i:2), and to 'love an adulteress' (ch. iii:1). It has, indeed, been much disputed whether these transactions were real, or passed in vision only; but the idea itself, and the diversified applications of it throughout the prophecy, render it one of the most effective portions of Scripture. (See HOSEA.) (4) Tyre sang as a harlot when, by fair speeches, the Tyrians enticed the nations to renew their trade with them (Is. xxiii:15). (5) Antichristian Babylon is called the great whore, and mother of harlots, and abominations, because of its noted apostasy and idolatry, and decoying others into it: and such apostasy is called fornication, whoredom, or adultery (Rev. xvii and xix:2).

HARMAGEDON (här-mäg'e-don). See ARMAGEDDON.

HARMONIES (här'mö-níz). The object of Harmonies is to arrange the Scriptures in chronological order, so that the mutual agreement of the several parts may be rendered apparent, and the true succession of events clearly understood. With this view various scholars have compiled harmonies of the Old Testament, of the New, and of particular portions of both. Harmonies of the Old Testament exhibit the books disposed in chronological order, as is done by Lightfoot in his Chronicle of the Times, and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament, and by Townsend in his Old Testament Arranged in Historical and Chronological Order. Harmonies of the New Testament present the gospels and epistles distributed in like order, the latter being interspersed among the Acts of the Apostles. In this way Townsend has proceeded in his valuable work entitled, The New Testament arranged in Chronological and Historical Order. Books, however, of this kind are so few in number, that the term harmony is almost appropriated by usage to the gospels. It is this part of the New Testament which has chiefly occupied the attention of those inquirers whose object is to arrange the Scriptures in their true order. The memoirs of our Lord written by the four Evangelists have chiefly occupied the thoughts of those who wish to show that they all agree, and mutually authenticate one another. Accordingly, such compositions are exceedingly numerous. To adopt any one implicitly, is more than the enlightened inquirer can consent to do. We should therefore recommend a minute examination of the works prepared by Newcome, Greswell, Michaelis, De Wette and Lücke, Clausen, Robinson, Andrews, etc.

S. D.

HARNEPHER (här'ne-pher), (Heb. חַרְנֵפֶר, khar-neh'fer, derivation uncertain, perhaps snoring), an Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii:36).

HARNESS, HARNESSED (här'nēs, här'nēst), (Heb. אָוֶסַר, aw-sar', to fasten), the act of fastening animals to a cart or vehicle, e. g., yoking cattle (1 Sam. vi:7, 10; A. V. "tie"), or horses (Jer. xlvi:4).

In A. V. harness always means armor, and to harness means to put on armor, R. V. gives 'armor' in 1 Kings xx:11; 2 Chron. ix:24, and 'armed' in Exod. xiii:18; while R. V. prefers 'armor' also in 1 Kings xxii:34; 2 Chron. xviii:33; both have left Jer. xlvi:4 untouched: 'Harness the horses.' The meaning is not (as Cheyne and most others) 'yoke the horses to the chariots,' but put on their accouterments. (Hastings, Bib. Dict.) HAROD (hā'rod), (Heb. חַרְוֹד, khar-ode', trembling or terror).

A brook not far from Jezreel and Mount Gilboa. The name, as given above, means 'palpitation,' and it has been suggested that it originated in consequence of the alarm and terror of most of the men who were here tested by Gideon (Judg. vii:1-3); but this supposition seems very far-fetched, and the name more probably arose from some peculiarity in the outflow of the stream. (Porter Handbook for Sinai and Pal. ii:355.) It is identical with the present fountain Ain Julad, a mile east from Jezreel, and opposite Shunem.

HARODITE (hā'rod-it), (Heb. חַרְוִי, khar-odee'), a designation of Shammah and Elika in David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii:25), no doubt derived from the name of a place.

HAROEH (här'o-ēh), (Heb. רוֹאֵה, ro-ay': Haroeh, including the article; means prophet), a name given in the genealogical lists of Judah as son of Shobal (1 Chron. ii:52). (See REAIAH.)

HARORITE (hā'ro-rit), (Heb. חַרְוִי, har-oree'), a designation of Shammoth, one of David's guard (1 Chron. xi:27). In 2 Sam. xxiii:25 the name appears slightly changed. (See HARODITE.)

HAROSHETH (hă-rō'shēth) OF THE GENTILES (Heb. חַרְשֵׁת, khar-o'sheth), a city in the north of Palestine.

It was the dwelling place of Sisera (Judg. iv:2), from which he advanced against Barak (verse 13) and to which he fled after his defeat (verse 16). The descriptive epithet 'of the Gentiles' is obscure; it may have been given to distinguish this place from a neighboring Israelite Harosheth. Harosheth is generally identified (by Moore rather doubtfully) with el-Harathiyeh, on the right bank of the lower Kishon, at a point which commands the entrance to the Great Plain from the Plain of Acre and the commercial roads that led through it. (Thomson, Land and Book ii:143.)

HARP (härp), (Heb. כִּנּוֹר, kin-nore'). See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HARROW (här'rō), (Heb. רֵיָה, khaw-ree'ts', 2 Sam. xii:31; 1 Chron. xx:3).

The word so rendered in the above passages is probably a thrashing machine. In Is. xxviii:24; Job xxxix:10; Hos. x:11, the word correctly expresses the breaking of clods.

HARSHA (här'shā), (Heb. חַרְשָׁו, khar-shaw', enchanter), one of the Nethinim whose descendants were among the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii:52; Neh. vii:54), B. C. before 536.

HART (härt), the Hebrew יָחִמֹר, ah-yaww', and not yahmôr (Deut. xiv:5; 1 Kings iv:23), is the fallow deer. The female is called Hind.

Hind.

It was one of the clean animals (Deut. xii:15; xiv:5; xv:22). From 1 Kings iv:23, it seems to have been frequently killed for food. Its activity is referred to (Is. xxxv:6), though the hind is more often mentioned in such similes. In Lam. i:6, the true rendering is "rams." (See also FALLOW DEER.)

Hart.

Figurative. (1) The saints are likened to harts panting for water-brooks, to mark the earnestness of their desire after God, and the ordinances of his grace, when hunted by Satan, and persecuted by the world (Ps. xlii:1). (2) The Chaldeans were like chased roes, when with terror and dread they fled from the fury of the Medes and Persians, not knowing what to do (Is. xiii:14).

(3) Wives are likened to hinds and roes, to mark their comeliness and affection, and the delight their husbands should take in them (Prov. v:19).

HARUM (hā'rum), (Heb. חָרוֹם, harw-room', exalted).

A name given in a very obscure portion of the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv:8).

HARUMAPH (hā-ru-'maph), (Heb. חָרוֹמָפִּי, khar-oo-maf', slit-nosed).

He had a son, Jedaiiah, who assisted in the repairing of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:10), B. C. before 446.

HARUPHITE (hā-ru-'phit), (Heb. חָרוֹפִּי, khar-oo-fee'), a designation of Shephatiah, the Korhite, who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:5).

HARUZ (hā'ruz), (Heb. חָרוּץ, khaw-roots', earnest).

The father of Meshullemeth, who was mother of Amon, king of Judah (2 Kings xxi:19), B. C. before 664.

HARVEST (hār'vēst), (Heb. חָרֵץ, kaw-tseer', severed).

The period of harvest in ancient Palestine may be divided into two portions: that of barley and that of wheat harvest, the former preceding the latter by about a fortnight (Ruth ii:23). Its beginning was consecrated by the bringing of the sheaf of first fruits (Lev. xxiii:10). It began in the lowlands before the crops were ripe on the hills. In the hot Jordan valley barley harvest commenced in April, when the Jordan was full (Josh. iii:15; comp. v:10), at the close of the rainy season (1 Sam. xii:17, 18; Prov. xxvi:1). Wheat harvest lingered in the uplands to the month of June. It was a hot time of the year (Prov. xxv:13; Is. xviii:4). When the harvest was completed, and the produce gathered in, there were great rejoicings (Is. ix:3). The feasts of unleavened bread, of weeks or harvest, and of ingathering, had all a relation to the season of reaping. (See YEAR.) (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

HASADIAH (hās'a-di'ah), (Heb. חֲסַדְיָהוּ, has-ad-yaw', Jehovah loves), a descendant of the royal line of Judah, and apparently son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:20). Perhaps he was one of those born after the restoration (B. C. about 536).

HASENUAH (hās'e-nū'ah), (Heb. חֲסֵנוּיָהוּ, has-sen-oo-aw', pointed), a man belonging to one of the chief families of Benjamin (1 Chron. ix:7), B. C. before 536.

HASHABIAH (hāsh-a-br'ah), (Heb. חֲשַׁבְיָהוּ, hash-ab-yaw', Jehovah regards).

1. Three Merarite Levites (1 Chron. vi:45; ix:14; Ezra viii:19), B. C. before 440.

2. Son of Jeduthun, who had charge of the twelfth course and was one of David's harp players (1 Chron. xxv:3, 19), B. C. 1014.

3. A descendant of Hebron, who, with the 1700 men of his kindred looked after David's interests on the west of the Jordan (1 Chron. xxvi:30; xxvii:17), B. C. 1014.

4. Son of Kemuel, prince of the tribe of Levi in the time of David. Perhaps the same as 3 (1 Chron. xxvii:17), B. C. 1014.

5. A Levite, who assisted in the passover-feast of King Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv:9), B. C. 623.

6. One of the chiefs of the priests who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii:24), B. C. 536.

7. A ruler of half the environs of Keilah, who repaired a part of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii:17), B. C. 446-410.

8. Three Levites: one sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:11); another was son of Bunni (Neh. xi:15; the third was an attendant in the Temple (Neh. xi:22).

9. A priest of the family of Hilkiah' under Joiakim, son of Jeshua (Neh. xii:21), B. C. before 440.

HASHABNAH (ha-shāb'nah), (Heb. חֲשַׁבְנָה, hash-ab-naw', probably for Hashabiah), one of the chiefs of the people who sealed the covenant of reformation (Neh. x:25), B. C. about 410.

HASHABNIAH (hāsh'ab-ni'ah), (Heb. חֲשַׁבְנִיָּהוּ, hash-ab-neh-yaw', thought of Jah, Jehovah regards).

1. Father of Hattush, who assisted in repairing the wall (Neh. iii:10), B. C. before 446.

2. A Levite who assisted in the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. ix:5), B. C. before 410.

HASHBADANA (hash-bād'a-nā), (Heb. חֲשַׁבְדָּנָה, hash-bad-daw'naw', intelligence in judging), one of those who took part in the reading of the law to the people by Ezra (Neh. viii:4), B. C. 410.

HASHEM (hā'shem), (Heb. חֲשֵׁם, haw-shame', wealthy).

His sons were among David's guard (1 Chron. xi:34). In 2 Sam. xxiii:32, Kennicott suggests that "sons of Jashen" should read "sons of Hashem" (B. C. before 1014).

HASHMONAH (hash-mō'nah), (Heb. חֲשַׁמוֹנָה, hash-mo-naw', fatness), a station in the wandering before Moseroth (Num. xxxiii:29), which latter was near Mount Hor (Num. xx:28; Deut. x:6).

HASHUB (hā'shub), (Heb. חֲשֻׁב, hash-shoob', intelligent), properly Hasshub.

1. Son of Pahath-Moab, who rebuilt a part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:23), (B. C. 410.)

2. Another of the same name, who assisted at another part of the wall (Neh. iii:11), (B. C. 410.)

3. One who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah; perhaps either 1 or 2 (Neh. x:23), (B. C. 446.)

4. A Merarite Levite (Neh. xi:15). In 1 Chron. ix:14, the name appears as Hasshub. (B. C. 440.)

HASHUBAH (ha-shu'bah), (Heb. חֲשַׁבְיָהוּ, hash-oo-baw', esteemed or associated), one of the children of Zerubbabel, born probably after the restoration (1 Chron. iii:20), B. C. about 536.

HASHUM (hā'shum), (Heb. חֲשֻׁם, khaw-shoom', enriched, rich, distinguished).

1. The sons of Hashum to the number of 223 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:19; Neh. vii:22). Seven of them had married foreign wives (Ezra x:33). The chief of the family sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:8). B. C. before 536.

2. One of the priests of the Levites who was present while Ezra read the law to the people (Neh. viii:4), B. C. 410.

HASHUPHA (ha-shu'phā), (Neh. vii:46), see HASUPHA. One of the families of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon in the first caravan (Neh. vii:46). The name appears accurately, Hasupha, in Ezra ii:43.

HASRAH (hās'rah), (Heb. חֲסָרָה, has-raw', poverty). See HARHAS.

HASSENAAH (häs'se-nā'ah), (Heb. חַסְנָאוּהַ, khas-sen-aw-aw', thorny), the sons of Hassenaah rebuilt the fish-gate (Neh. iii:3). The name is probably the same as the place SENAAH with the definite article (Ezra ii:35; Neh. vii:38).

HASTE (häst), (Heb. חָסֵת, oots, Exod. v:13), to be close, narrow, to hurry; the verb being used transitively. (Comp. Is. xvi:5.)

HASUPHA (ha-sū'phā), (Heb. חַסּוּפָה, khas-oo-faw', uncovered, naked).

The sons of Hasupha were among the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:43), B. C. before 536.

HAT (hät), (Chald. חַתְבֵּלְאוּ, kar-bel-aw', Dan. iii:21).

Hats are mentioned once in A. V. (Dan. iii:21), but it is quite certain that this is a mistranslation. When Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego were about to be cast into the fiery furnace they were 'bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats' (R. V., their hosen, their tunics, and their mantles').

HATACH (hä'täck) (Heb. חַתְאֲכָה, hath-awk', perhaps verity, an eunuch in the palace of Xerxes, appointed to wait on Esther.

By his means Esther learnt from Mordecai the details of Haman's plot against the Jews (Esth. iv:5, 6, 9, 10), B. C. about 478.

HATE (hät), (Heb. חָטָה, saw-nay'; Gr. μισέω, mis-eh'o).

In the root of the Hebrew word is the idea of ugliness, deformity; hence to regard with feelings contrary to love; to loathe, to abhor, to cherish resentment or dislike to. In both the Hebrew and Greek words we find the above meaning in several places (e. g., 2 Chron. xviii:7; Ps. xlv:7; Matt. xxiv:10, etc.); while in others the meaning is "to regard with less love" (e. g., Deut. xxi:15, 16; Prov. xiii:24; Mal. i:3; Rom. ix:13).

The command to hate father and mother, wife and children, etc., and one's own life (Luke xiv:26), means that all earthly ties and love must be subordinate to love for Christ. Real hate to men is unchristian.

HATHATH (hä'thätth), (Heb. חַתְאֲתָה, khath-ath', terror, as in Job vi:21), son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv:13), consequently also grandnephew and grandson of Caleb (verse 15; comp. Judg. i:13), B. C. probably after 1170.

HATIPHA (hä't'i-phā or ha-ti'phā), (Heb. חַתִּיפָה, khat-ee-faw', robber), the sons of Hatipha were among the Nethinim who returned under Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:54; Neh. vii:56), B. C. before 536.

HATITA (hä't'i-tā or ha-ti'tā), (Heb. חַתִּיטָה, khat-ee-taw', exploration). The sons of Hatita were a division of the Levites who returned under Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:42; Neh. vii:45), B. C. before 536.

HATSI HAM MENCHOTH (hä't'si hämmën' ū-koth), (1 Chron. ii:52, margin). See MANAHETHES, THE.

HATTIL (hä't'il), (Heb. חַתִּיל, khat-teel', waving), one of the descendants of "Solomon's servants" whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:57; Neh. vii:59), B. C. before 536.

HATTUSH (hä't'tush), (Heb. חַתּוּשׁ, khat-toosh', derivation uncertain).

1. A descendant of the kings of Judah (1 Chron. iii:22), B. C. after 406. (See Lord Hervey, Genealogies, pp. 103, 307, 322.)

2. Son of Hashabniah. He assisted in the rebuilding of the wall (Neh. iii:10), B. C. 446.

3. A descendant of David who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra viii:2), B. C. 459.

HAUNT (hänt), (Heb. חָגַל, reh'gel).

To haunt is in older English simply to frequent, to make one's stay, be familiar with, and conveys no reproach. Thus (John iii:22, Tyndale): 'After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the Jewes londe, and ther he haunted with them and baptised' (A. V. 'tarried'). (Ps. xxvi:4) Geneva Version, "I have not haunted with vain persons." (Comp. 1 Sam. xxx:31.)

HAURAN (häu'ran), (Heb. חַוְרָאן, khav-ravn'), a province on the northeastern boundary of the Promised Land (Ezek. xlvii:16, 18).

In the passage in Ezekiel the Jordan is made the border line between Haurän, Damascus, and Gilead on the one hand, and the Land of Israel on the other. Haurän is there the whole district between Damascus and Gilead, from the lip of the Jordan Valley eastward. This practically corresponds with the province under the Turkish governor of Haurän to-day, whose seat is in el-Merkez, and whose jurisdiction includes Jedür, Jaulän, and part of the hill country south of the Jarmuk, as well as the region now specially called Haurän.

Little was known of Haurän previous to 1854. The works of Porter, 1855, Graham, 1858, Wetstein, 1860, Burton and Drake, 1872, and Selah Merrill of the American Palestine Exploration Society, 1877, have thrown much light on its extent, nature, and history, but a thorough exploration of the country yet remains to be made. When the Israelites conquered the land, the whole of this region appears to have been subject to Og, the king of Bashan (Num. xxi:33-35; Deut. iii:1-5) and a large portion of it was allotted to Manasseh. The district would then include the Argob, the slope of the Haurän Mountains, where the Israelites found sixty fortified cities with walls and gates and a fertile tract. (See BASHAN.) In the Roman period the country was divided into five provinces, Ituræa, Gaulanitis, Batanæa (applied also to the whole region), Trachonitis, and Auranitis.

The natives now say that Haurän consists of three parts, viz.: en-Nukrah, el-Lejâ, and el-Jebel. These are clearly defined districts.

The ruins scattered over the region are very extensive and remarkable; those built in the caverns are regarded by Wetstein as the most ancient, and possibly reaching back to the times of the Rephaim (Gen. xiv:5; xv:20, and Deut. iii:11). The villages are chiefly of stone houses, having gates and doors of large slabs of dolerite; the gateways of the larger buildings are ornamented with sculptured vines and inscriptions. The Arabs, according to Wetstein, from near Yemen settled in the Haurän at about the beginning of the Christian era; later, a second immigration from south Arabia took place, and these controlled the country for five centuries, and they probably erected most of the stone buildings now in so good a state of preservation. A large number of inscriptions in various characters are yet to be deciphered, which will throw much light, no doubt, upon the ancient history of this wild region. Wetstein states that the eastern section of the Lejah and the slopes of the Haurän Mountains contain at least 300 ruined cities and towns. Selah Merrill says that an important ruin is found in every half hour of travel, and that among these ruins, he has himself visited and examined sixty ruined churches, and eleven of thirteen theaters, including one vast naumachia where mock sea fights were held. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

"In the beginning of the first century before Christ, the western Haurân was under the Jew Alexander Janneus, while the Nabateans occupied everything else to the east, including Damascus, the rest of Haurân, and the Leja. When the Romans came, in B. C. 64, besides freeing the Greek cities of Gaulanitis and Gilead from the Jews, they drove the Nabateans to the southern edge of Haurân, but did not occupy Haurân itself." (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

Under the Romans, civilization advanced, and, as evinced by the remains of churches and inscriptions, Christianity made rapid progress. In A. D. 632 the Moslem hordes from Arabia burst over the province like a tornado, and the blight swiftly fell, which lies heavy on the land to-day. The latest notice of a Christian building is an inscription found by the Rev. William Ewing, D. D., at el-Kufr, which records the foundation of a church in A. D. 720.

HAVE (häv), (Heb. נָצַח, yaw-tsaw', 2 Kings xi:15), to take, conduct, guide, escort, bring, as in Shakespeare, "Your mistress sent to have me home to dinner." Used with various prepositions; as, to have away, to have forth, etc. (2 Kings xi:15; 2 Chron. xxiii:14; 2 Sam. xiii:9).

Such phrases may be considered as, 'Have in one's heart to,' (1 Chron. xxviii:2; comp. Phil. i:7) 'I have you in my heart'; 'I would have you with out carefulness' (1 Cor. vii:32); 'I would not have you ignorant,' (2 Cor. i:8) 'Who will have all men to be saved,' (1 Tim. ii:4), (δς θελει, R. V. 'Who willet that all men should be saved'). Comp. John xxi:22, Tyndale: 'Yf I will have him to tary tyll I come, what is that to the?'

HAVEN (hä'v'n), (Heb. חֹף, khofe), from an unused root, mean, to cover; a cove (as a sheltered bay), coast [of the sea], haven, shore, [sea-]side. This word is rendered 'haven' by A. V. and R. V. in Gen. xlix:13, and by R. V. in Judg. v:17 (A. V. 'shore').

Havens are seldom mentioned in the Bible, probably for the reason that Palestine proper scarcely possesses any harbors, and the Israelites were not a maritime nation. The harbors in Old Testament times on the Mediterranean coast were in possession of the Phœnicians and the Philistines. (See GREAT SEA; SEA.)

HAVILAH (häv'i-lah), (Heb. חַבְלָה, khav-ee-law', circular).

1. A district in Arabia Felix, deriving its name from the second son of Cush (Gen. x:7), or, according to others, from the second son of Joktan (Gen. x:29; comp. xxv:18). There can be no doubt, however, of the existence of a double Havilah; one founded by the descendant of Ham, and the other by that of Shem. Niebuhr (Beschr. von Arab., pp. 270, 280) actually found in Yemen two districts called Chaulân or Haulân, one between Saana and Mecca, and the other a few leagues southeast from Saana; which latter Büsching (Erdbeschr. v. i. 601) considers to be the Havilah founded by the son of Cush, as mentioned Gen. x:7 (Michaelis, Spicil. i, 189, sq.; ii, 202). From Gen. xxv:18, it would appear that the land of Havilah formed the eastern boundary of the Israelites, and so likewise from 1 Sam. xv:7, where it seems, moreover, to have been a possession belonging to the Amalekites.

2. A land rich in gold, bdellium, and shoham, mentioned in Gen. ii:11 in the geographical description of Paradise. Some identify this with the preceding; but others take it to be Chwala on the Caspian Sea, from whence that sea itself is said to have derived the Russian name of Chwalinskoy more (Sea of Chwala); and others suppose it a general name for India (T. Hieros.). E. M.

"A district of Khaulân (Haulân) is mentioned in the inscriptions of South Arabia; this is either Khaulân in Tihâmah, between Mecca and Saana, or another Khaulân southeast of Saana. Niebuhr further found a Huwailah on the Persian Gulf. The name, in fact, was widely spread in Arabia, and Yakut states that Hawil was the name of a dialect spoken by the people of Mehri in the east of Hadramaut. The Mehri is the modern representative of the language of the Sabaean inscriptions." (A. H. Sayce, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HAVOTH JAIR (hä'voth jä'ir), (Heb. יְעִיר, khav-vothe' yaw-eer', huts or hamlets of Jair), such as belonged to the Arabians, and a collection of which is regarded as forming a hamlet or village.

The district of Havoth-jair (Jair's hamlets), mentioned in Num. xxxii:41, and Deut. iii:14, was beyond the Jordan in the land of Gilead, and belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh. (See also Josh. xiii:30; 1 Chron. ii:22, 23; 1 Kings iv:13; Judg. x:4.) (See JAIR.)

HAWK (hak), (Heb. נָיִץ, nayts, Lev. xi:16; Deut. xiv:15; Job xxxix:26; תַּחֲמָצֵץ, takh-mawce', an unclean bird), night hawk, by some rendered ostrich, by others owl.

The English name is an altered form of the old word fawk or falk. Western Asia and Lower Egypt, and consequently the intermediate territory of Syria and Palestine, are the habitation or transitory residence of a considerable number of species of the order Raptores, which, even including the shortest winged, have great powers of flight, are remarkably enterprising, live to a great age, are migratory, or followers upon birds of passage, or remain in a region so abundantly stocked with pigeon and turtle-dove as Palestine, and affording such a variety of ground to hunt their particular prey—abounding as it does in mountain and forest, plain, desert, marsh, river and sea-coast.

Falcons, or the 'noble' birds of prey used for hawking, have for many ages been objects of great interest, and still continue to be bought at high prices. They are consequently imported from distant countries, as Central Asia, Iceland, Barbary, etc. Their love of liberty often renders them irreclaimable when once on the wing; and their powers and boldness, independent of circumstances, and the extent of range which the long-winged species in particular can take, are exemplified by their presence in every quarter of the globe. The Falco communis, or Peregrine falcon, is so generally diffused as to occur even in New Holland and South America.

Next we may place Falco Aroeris of Sir J. G. Wilkinson, the sacred hawk of Egypt. This, if it be not in reality the same as, or a mere variety of, the Peregrine, should have retained the ancient epithet of Hierax, and the hawkers' name of Sacre. Innumerable representations of it occur in Egyptian monuments.

The Hobby, Falco subbuteo, is no doubt a second or third species of sacred hawk, having similar germonia. Both this bird and the tractable Merlin, Falco aesalon, are used in the falconry of the inferior Moslem landowners of Asiatic Turkey.

Besides these, the Kestrel, Falco tinnunculus, occurs in Syria, and Falco tinnunculoides, or lesser Kestrel, in Egypt; and it is probable that both species visit these two territories according to the seasons.

To the 'noble' birds we may add the Gerfalcon, Falco gyrfalco, which is one-third larger than the Peregrine; it is imported from Tartary, and sold at Constantinople, Aleppo, and Damascus.

HAY (hā), (Heb. חֵיב, khaw-tseer').

This word in Prov. xxvii:25, and elsewhere, does not denote dried grass, as it does with us. The management of grass by the Hebrews as food for cattle was entirely different from ours. It was never dried and stored for winter use, but was cut green as it was wanted; and the phrase "mown grass" (Ps. lxxii:6) would be more properly rendered "grass that has just been fed off." So in Prov. xxvii:25 the word translated "hay" means the first shoots of the grass; and the whole passage might properly be rendered, "The grass appeareth, and the green herb showeth itself, and the plants of the mountains are gathered." And in Is. xv:6 "hay" is put for "grass," and "grass" is put for the "green herb." The tenderness of grass, the rapidity of its growth, and the early period at which it is cut down and consumed afford the sacred writers some striking and beautiful illustrations (Ps. ciii:15; Is. xl:6; I Cor. iii:12). (See CHATZIR.)

HAZAEI (hāz'a-el), (Heb. חַזְאֵל, khaz-aw-ale', vision of God).

(1) Consults Elisha. An officer of Benhadad, king of Syria, whose eventual accession to the throne of that kingdom was made known to Elijah (I Kings xix:15); and who, when Elisha was at Damascus, was sent by his master, who was then ill, to consult the prophet respecting his recovery. He was followed by forty camels bearing presents from the king. When Hazael appeared before the prophet, he said, 'Thy son Benhadad, king of Syria, hath sent me to thee, saying, 'Shall I recover of this disease?' The answer was, that he might certainly recover. 'Howbeit,' added the prophet, 'the Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die.' He then looked steadfastly at Hazael till he became confused:

on which the man of God then wept; and when Hazael respectfully inquired the cause of this outburst, Elisha replied by describing the vivid picture then present to his mind of all the evils which the man now before him would inflict upon Israel. Hazael exclaimed, 'But what! Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?' The prophet explained that it was as king of Syria he should do it. Hazael then returned, and delivered to his master that portion of the prophetic response which was intended for him.

(2) Kills Benhadad. But the very next day this man, cool and calculating in his cruel ambition, took a thick cloth, and, having dipped it in water, spread it over the face of the king, who, in his feebleness, and probably in his sleep, was smothered by its weight, and died what seemed to his people a natural death (2 Kings viii:8, etc.), B. C. about 885. We are not to imagine that such a project as this was conceived and executed in a day, or that it was suggested by the words of Elisha. His discomposure at the earnest gaze of the prophet, and other circumstances, show that Hazael at that moment regarded Elisha as one to whom his secret purposes were known. In that case, his cry, 'Is thy servant a dog,' etc., was not, as some suppose, a cry of joy at the first view of a throne, but of horror at the idea of the public atrocities which the prophet described.

(3) King and Wars. The further information respecting Hazael which the Scriptures afford is limited to brief notices of his wars with Ahaziah and Joash, kings of Judah, and with Jehoram, Jehu, and Jehoahaz, kings of Israel (2 Kings viii:28; ix:14; x:32; xii:17; xiii:3; 2 Chron. xxii:5). It is difficult to distinguish the several campaigns and victories involved in these allusions, and spread over a reign of forty years; but it is certain that Hazael always had the advantage over the Hebrew princes. He devastated their frontiers, rent from them all their territories beyond the Jordan, traversed the breadth of Palestine, and carried his arms into the states of the Philistines; he laid siege to Jerusalem, and only retired on receiving the treasures of the temple and the palace. The details of these conquests redeemed to the very letter the appalling predictions of Elisha. This able and successful, but unprincipled usurper left the throne at his death to his son Benhadad (B. C. about 815).

Hazael figures more than once in the cuneiform inscriptions. Shalmaneser II, who in the early part of his reign had defeated an alliance formed by Dadidri (Ben-hadad II), Ahab of Israel, and other kings, and again in the fourteenth year of his reign had a second time worsted Dadidri, states that in his eighteenth year (B. C. 842) he joined battle with Hazael of Damascus, who had assembled a large army and entrenched himself upon the mountain of Sanir in the Anti-Lebanon. Here he awaited the Assyrian onslaught. Six thousand of his soldiers were killed in battle, while 1,121 of his chariots and 470 horses, with his camp equipage, were taken. Hazael fled to Damascus, and was pursued and besieged by the Assyrians. But it appears that, powerful though he was, Shalmaneser was not able to take Damascus, and had to content himself with a thoroughly characteristic conclusion of the campaign. He cut down the trees about the city, and then marching southward, entered Hauran, where he wasted and burned the cities. (Obelisk, lines 97-00 and Fragmentary Text, III R. 5, No. 6, 40-65. See translations by Rogers, op. cit. pp. 220, 221; See Rogers, Hist. of Bab. and Assyr., p. 82.)

HAZAI AH (ha-zā'iah or ha-zā'yá), (Heb. חַזַּיָּאֵה, khaz-aw-yaw', Jehovah beholds), a man of Judah, descended from Shelah (Neh. xi:5), B. C. before 536.

HAZAR (hā'zar), (Heb. חָזַר, khaw-tsare', an inclosure).

It is a term employed to denote the dependence of certain towns or villages upon a noted spot. Gesenius (Heb. Lex. s. v.) states that Hazar is "spoken also of the movable villages or encampments of nomadic tribes, who usually pitch their tents in a circle, or so as to form an inclosure." The African Arabs, who originally emigrated from Arabia, have retained many of their ancestral customs. "When these Arabs are in a region where they are liable to attacks from enemies, they pitch their tents in a circle, with their cattle and goods in the center. The whole is then fenced in with a low wall of stones, in which are inserted thick bundles of thorny acacia, the tangled branches and long needle-like spikes forming a perfectly impenetrable hedge around the encampment," Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 281. (See HAZAR-ADDAR; HAZAR-ENAN; HAZAR-GADDAH; etc.)

HAZAR-ADDAR (hā'zar-ād'dar), (Heb. חָזַר אֲדָר, khats-ar' ad-dawr', a village of Addar), a place in the southern desert part of Palestine, between Kadesh-barnea and Amon (Num. xxxiv:4).

It appears to be the same as HEZRON (which see) of Josh. xv:3, which in the latter passage is connected with but separated from Addar.

HAZAR-ENAN (hā'zar-ē'nan), (Heb. חָזַר עֵינָן, khats-ar' ay-nawn', village of fountains).

One of the northern boundaries of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv:9; Ez. xlvii:17; xlviii:1). Mr. Porter (Damascus, i:252; ii:358) would identify this with the modern Kuryetein, sixty miles northeast of Damascus. Buhl and Bertholet suggest that it is identical with the well-known Banias, while Kasteren would locate it at el-Hadr farther to the east, on the way from Banias to Damascus, but C. R. Conder says these sites appear to be too far south.

HAZAR-GADDAH (hā'zar gād'dah), (Heb. חָזַר גַּדָּה, khats-ar' gad-daw', village of fortune; Josh. xv:27), a town in the extreme south of Judah. Perhaps identified with Wady Mubughik and its extensive ruins, but exact site is unknown.

HAZAR-HATTICON (hā'zar hāt'ti-kōn), (Heb. חָזַר חַטִּיכֹן, khats-ar' hat-tee-kone', middle village), named in the prophecy of Ezekiel (xlvii:16) as the ultimate boundaries of the land. Its site is not known.

HAZARMAVETH (hā'zar-mā'veth), (Heb. חָזַר מָוֶת, khats-ar-maw'veth, village of death), one of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x:26; 1 Chron. i:20), or a district of Arabia Felix settled by him. Its identity with the modern Hadramaut is certain, and Hazarmaveth is probably also the same as the land of the Χαρμαυριται, one of the four chief tribes of South Arabia as described by Strabo (XVI, iv:2). They were celebrated for their traffic in frankincense. The modern Hadramaut is not so extensive as the ancient. (J. A. Selbie, Hastings' Bib. Dict.) (See ARABIA.)

HAZAR-SHUAL (hā'zar shū'al), (Heb. חָזַר שׁוּאֵל, khats-ar' shoo-aw', village of jackals), a town in southern Judah lying between Hazar-gaddah and Beersheba (Josh. xv:28; xix:3; 1 Chron. iv:28).

It is also mentioned after the return from captivity (Neh. xi:27). Wilton suggested Beni-Shail, near Gaza, as its site, but Van de Velde and Conder, with greater probability, locate it at Saweh, between Beersheba and Moladah. The ruins are on a high bluff; a wall built of flint blocks surrounds the site, and justifies the name Hazar ("enclosure").

HAZAR-SUSAH (hā'zar-sū'sah), (Heb. חָזַר סוּסָה, khats-ar soo-saw', village of horses), a city in the south of Judah allotted to Simeon (1 Chron. iv:31; Josh. xix:5), also Hāzar-sū'im. Wilton believes it was in Wady es-Sunieh, near Gaza, but Conder proposes Beit Susin, south of Beit Jibrin.

HAZAZON-TAMAR (hāz'a-zōn-tā'mar). See HAZEON-TAMAR.

HAZEL (hā'z'l), (Heb. לֹז, looz), (Gen. xxx:37).

It is generally supposed that the almond tree is intended in this passage. The original word is thought to be susceptible of this rendering. The R. V. has almond. (See LUTZ.)

HAZELEPONI (hāz'e-lēl-pō'nī), or rather ZELELPONI (Heb. זֵלֶלְפֹנִי, hats-tsel-el-po-nee', shade-facing). The name has the definite article, "the Hazeleponi;" sisters of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv:3), B. C. about 1612.

HAZER (ha'zer), (Heb. חָזַר, khaw-tsare'), an enclosure, in composition has the form of HAZAR (which see).

HAZERIM (ha-zē'rim), (Heb. חָזַרִים, khats-ay-reem', villages).

In Deut. ii:28 we read that the Avim dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah or Gaza; and the notice of the Avites in Josh. xiii:3, 4 as the most southern of the tribes inhabiting the Canaanitish country clearly identifies their land with the mountains of Azazimeh. (See Palmer's Desert of the Exodus, Amer. ed., p. 360).

S. R. Driver, Hastings' Bib. Dict. says: "There is no doubt that the word is not really a proper name, but that it should be rendered (as it is in R. V.) by villages. The clause describes how the Avim dwelt, until they were expelled by the immigrant Caphtorim (or Philistines); they did not dwell in fortified cities, but in villages, or un-walled settlements (Lev. xxv:31), consisting, probably, of rudely-built huts of mud or stone, roofed with leaves or grass. (See HAZAR.)

HAZEROTH (ha-zē'roth), (Heb. חָזַרֹת, khats-ay-roth', villages), the third station of the Israelites after leaving Sinai, and either four or five days' march from that mountain.

It was there that Miriam and Aaron murmured against Moses (Num. xi:35; xii:16). 'Ayn el-Hudera, about 36 miles northeast of mount Sinai, was suggested by Burckhardt, and adopted by Robinson and others, as the site. The identification rests, however, solely on the similarity of the name, and is uncertain. Palmer found at the spot many stone circles, which evidently marked the site of an encampment formed by a pastoral people.

HAZEON-TAMAR (hāz'e-zōn-tā'mar), (Heb. חָזַר עֵינָן, khats-ets-one' taw-mawr', pruning of the palm trees), the ancient name of Engedi (Gen. xiv:7) in 2 Chron. xx:2, called Hazazon-tamar.

It is a city as old as the oldest in Syria, the contemporary of Sodom and Gomorrah, and already a city when Hebron was first founded (Tristram's Land of Israel, p. 285). (See ENGEDI.)

HAZIEL (hā'zi-el), (Heb. חַזְיֵל, khaz-ee-ale', vision of God), a "son" of the Gershonite Shimei, and chief of the family of Laadai (1 Chron. xxiii:9), B. C. about 960.

HAZO (hā'zo), (Heb. חָזוֹ, khaz-o', a scer), one of the sons of Nahor by Milcah (Gen. xxii:22), B. C. after 2250.

HAZOR (hā'zōr), (Heb. חָזוֹר, khazw-tsore', village, enclosure or castle).

1. A chief city of north Palestine (Josh. xi:10), near Lake Merom (Huleh), the seat of Jabin, a powerful Canaanitish king, as appears from the summons sent by him to all the neighboring kings to assist him against the Israelites. He and his confederates were, however, defeated and slain by Joshua, and the city burnt to the ground (Josh. xi:1, 10-13; Joseph. Antiq. v. 5, 1). But by the time of Deborah and Barak the Canaanites had recovered part of the territory then lost, had rebuilt Hazor, and were ruled by a king with the ancient royal name of Jabin, under whose power the Israelites were, in punishment for their sins, reduced. From this yoke they were delivered by Deborah and Barak, after which Hazor remained in quiet possession of the Israelites, and belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix:36; Judg. iv:2). Hazor was one of the towns rebuilt or much improved by Solomon (1 Kings ix:15), and was one of the fortified places of Galilee which the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser first took, on invading Palestine from the north (2 Kings xv:29). Several places have been suggested as the site: Tell Khureibeh, a rocky peak near Kedesh, by Robinson; and Conder points out the name Hadireh, the Arabic equivalent of Hazor, near this; modern Hazere, where are ruins, by Thomson; but doubtless it is to be found at Khürbet Harrah, two and a half miles southeast of Kedesh, as proposed by the Palestine Memoirs. Remains of ancient walls, towers, and a fortress are to be found, and also broken glass and pottery.

C. R. Conder, Hastings' Bib. Dict., says: From Hazor two letters of the Tel el-Amarna collection were written in the 15th century B. C. to the king of Egypt. They are much damaged, but they speak of an attack on the place, and ask for aid. In one of them the king's name is given; and though the first syllable is damaged, it may be read I-eba-enu, i. e., 'Jabin.' Hazor is also noticed, with places in Upper and Lower Galilee, by the Mohar (an Egyptian traveler of the 14th century B. C.) on his way from the seacoast to the Lake of Tiberias. (See Memoirs of Sur. of W. Pal. vol. i. ch. iv.)

2. A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv:23).

3. (Josh. xv:25) "Hezron which is Hazor" probably means that the name had been changed.

4. The residence of the Benjamites after the return from captivity (Neh. xi:33), probably north of Jerusalem.

5. Apparently a region of Arabia (Jer. xlix:28-33).

HAZOR HADATTAH (ha'zōr ha-dāt'tah), "New Hazor" (Josh. xv:25). (See HADATTAH.)

HE (hē). The form of this letter is ה.

The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The English letter E has the same origin, but is a vowel. Where "he" preserves its power as a consonant in Hebrew names, and properly at other times, it is represented by "h" in the English form; as in Abraham.

It stands at the head of the fifth section of Ps. cxix, since each verse in the section begins with this letter in the original.

Through some similarity of form combined with careless writing and slight effacement of the text, it was sometimes misread as alpha on the one hand and tau on the other. (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

HEAD (hēd), (Heb. רֹאשׁ, roshe'; Gr. κεφαλή, kefal-ay').

As the head is the topmost part of the human body, it came derivatively to signify that which is highest, chief, the highest in position locally being regarded as highest in office, rank, or dignity: whence, as the head is the center of the nervous system, holds the brain, and stands above all the other parts, Plato regarded it as the seat of the deathless soul; and it has generally been considered as the abode of the intellect or intelligence by which man is enlightened and his walk in life directed; while the heart, or the parts placed near it, have been accounted the place where the affections lie (Gen. iii:15; Ps. iii:3; Eccles. ii:14). The head and the heart are sometimes taken for the entire person (Is. i:5). Even the head alone, as being the chief member, frequently stands for the man (Prov. x:6). The head also denotes sovereignty (1 Cor xi:3). Covering the head, and cutting off the hair, were signs of mourning and tokens of distress, which were enhanced by throwing ashes on the head, together with sackcloth (Amos viii:10; Job i:20; Lev. xxi:5; Dent. xiv:1; 2 Sam. xiii:19; Esther iv:1); while anointing the head was practiced on festive occasions, and considered an emblem of felicity (Eccles. ix:8; Ps. xxiii:5; Luke vii:46). It was usual to swear by the head (Matt. v:36).

1. Ethiopian; 2. Mongolian; 3. Caucasian; 4. Malay; 5. American.

The general character of the human head is such as to establish the identity of the human race, and to distinguish man from every other animal. At the same time different families of mankind are marked by peculiarities of construction of the head, which, though they run one into the other to the entire loss of distinctive lines, in individual cases, and when extremes are compared together, yet are in the main broadly contrasted one with the other. These peculiarities in the structure of the skull give rise to and are connected with other peculiarities of feature and general contour of face. In the union of cranial peculiarities with those of the face, certain clear marks are presented, by which physiologists have been able to range the individuals of our race into a few great classes, and in so doing to afford an unintentional corroboration of the information which the Scriptures afford regarding the origin and dispersion of mankind.

Physiologists have established five classes of heads corresponding with five great families. (1) The Caucasian family, comprising the nations of Europe, some of the Western Asiatics, etc., have the head of the most symmetrical shape, almost round, the forehead of moderate extent, the cheek bones rather narrow, without any projection, but a direction downwards from the molar process of the frontal bone; the alveolar edge well rounded; the front teeth of each jaw placed perpendicularly; the face of oval shape, straight, features moderately prominent; forehead arched; nose narrow, slightly arched; mouth small; chin full and round. (2) The second is the Mongolian variety. (3) Ethiopian. (4) Malay and South Sea Islanders. (5) American.

Customs. Anointing the head was a common practice amongst the Jews (Ps. xxiii:5; Matt. vi:17; xxvi:7; Mark xiv:3; Luke vii:46). (See ANOINTING.)

To cover (כִּפְתָּוֹ) the head was a token of mourning (2 Sam. xv:30). David and his men when fleeing from Absalom (Jer. xiv:3; Esth. vi:12). The same was expressed by putting the hand upon the head (2 Sam. xiii:19 Tamar after Amnon's outrage), or putting ashes (אֲשָׁפָה) or earth (אֲרָצָה) upon it (Josh. vii:6; 1 Sam. iv:12; 2 Sam. i:2; xiii:19; Lam. ii:10).

The head of one under a vow was not shaven till its completion (Num. vi:18, ff.; Acts xviii:18; xxi:24). (See NAZARITE.)

The Israelites were forbidden to 'round the corners of their heads' (Lev. xix:27) in token of mourning (comp. Deut. xiv:1, where 'making baldness between the eyes' refers to the custom of shaving the front part of the head).

The head was bowed; in worshiping God (Gen. xxiv:26; Exod. iv:31), and as a token of respect (Gen. xliii:28).

Figurative. (1) Blessings come on the head, the whole person of the just (Prov. x:6); and men have their way recompensed on their head (Ezek. ix:10). (2) To endanger one's head, is to expose his life (Dan. i:10). (3) Covering of the head, imports protection, as with a helmet (Ps. cxi:7); or grief and mourning (2 Sam. xv:30); or modesty and subjection, in the case of women (1 Cor. xi:5, 6). (4) To lift up one's own head, is to rejoice (Luke xxi:28); or to grow proud, rebel against God, in a bold and daring manner (Ps. lxxxiii:2). (5) To lift up the head of another, is to exalt him to honor (Gen. xl:13; Jer. lii:31). (6) Shaking or wagging of the head at one implies contempt, mockery, insult (Ps. xxii:7). (7) Having her crown of twelve stars on her head, imports the bold and open profession of divine truth by the church, preached by the twelve apostles (Rev. xii:1). (8) The head of the serpent which Christ bruises, is his power, authority, and chief interests (Gen. iii:15). (9) The head of the leviathan, which God broke in the waters, is the king of Egypt, and his mighty host, drowned in the Red Sea (Ps. lxxiv:13, 14; Is. li:11). (10) A husband is the head of a wife, to protect, rule, and direct her (1 Cor. xi:3). Kings and great men are the heads of a nation, who excel the rest in power and dignity, and rule and protect them (Exod. xviii:25; Mic. iii:1; Is. i:5). (11) Capital cities are the head of a kingdom (Is. vii:8). (12) Iniquities going over our head, imports that our guilt is very great, and our apprehension of it, and our affliction for it, likely to sink us (Ps. xxxviii:4). (13) Men riding over our heads, imports great oppression and slavery (Ps. lxxvi:12). (14) Whatever is more excellent, or has power over, or gives influence and direction to others, is called the head. (15) God is the head of Christ; he set him up in his mediatorial office, and gave him his power and authority (1 Cor. xi:3). (16) Christ is the head of the corner, and head of his church, excelling in dignity, governing her, and communicating light, life, provision, and comfort to her; and he is the head of all things to her, as he rules and governs them for her advantage (Col. i:18; Eph. i:22). (17) The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint, there is nothing but wounds and bruises; men of power, of wisdom, of professed piety, and the more poor and indigent, are all corrupted, and every man is thoroughly tainted in all his powers, with sin (Is. i:5, 6).

HEADBAND (hëd'bänd), the rendering of the Hebrew כִּישְׁוֹר', kish-shoor', encircle, band (Is. iii:20, in R. V. a sash; Jer. ii:32, in A. V. attire). It is an article of female attire.

HEADDRESS (hëd'drës). See DRESS.

HEAD OF THE CHURCH (hëd, chûrch).

On account of the very intimate relation that exists between Christ and the Church he is called the head (Eph. iv:15; v:23), and the Church his body (iv:12), inseparably united.

HEADSTONE (hëd'stôn), (Zech. iv:7). See CORNER STONE.

HEADY (hëd'y), (Gr. προπετής, prop-et-ace', falling forward).

This is the translation in 2 Tim. iii:4 A. V., which in Acts xix:36, its only remaining occurrence in the New Testament is translated 'rashly' (R. V. 'rash'). Heady is from Tyndale; and has been adopted by all the revises thereafter, except Rheims V. 'stubburne,' and R. V. which uses its modern equivalent in this sense, 'headstrong.'

HEAL (hë), (Heb. נָשַׁף, raw-phaw').

1. To cure the ailments of one's body (Matt. iv:24).

2. To cure the maladies of men's souls, by forgiving their sins, turning them from sin to God, and filling them with spiritual comfort (Ps. vi:2; Rev. xxii:2).

Figurative. (1) God's saving health is his salvation, or his Son in his saving offices (Ps. lxxvii:2); and he is the health of his people's countenances, as by vouchsafing his salvation, he cheers and exhilarates them (Ps. xlii:11). (2) To heal nations and churches, is to redress their grievances, purify their corruptions, and reduce them to a fixed and regular state (Jer. xiv:19); and their health and cure, is their civil and religious prosperity (Jer. viii:22; xxx:17; li:8, 9). (3) False prophets heal by flattering men in their sins, and encouraging them in false hopes of deliverance and prosperity (Jer. vi:14; viii:11).

HEAP (hëp), the translation of several Hebrew words, with the general meaning of a collection of things so as to form a pile or elevation.

The term was applied to a mass of earth or stones covering over or marking the place of a grave (Josh. vii:26; viii:29; 2 Sam. xviii:17); to the ruins of walls and cities (Job viii:17; Is. xxv:2; Jer. ix:11); a pile (e. g., of rubbish, Neh. iv:2; of grain, Cant. vii:2; of sheaves, Ruth iii:7; Hag. ii:16, etc.).

HEART (härt), (Heb. mostly לֵב , labe; Gr. kardia, kar-dee'ah).

The heart, among the Hebrews was regarded figuratively and poetically not only as the seat of the passions and emotions, as of love, pleasure, and grief, but also of the intellectual faculties—the mind, the understanding. In the original Scriptures, as well as in the English and other translations, the word 'heart,' therefore, constantly occurs where 'mind' is to be understood, and would be used by a modern English writer. We say modern because the ancient usage of the English word 'heart' was more conformable than the present to that of the Hebrews.

Figurative. All the phrases, more or less metaphorical, in which this word occurs, are rendered intelligible by the following examples:

(1) "A perfect heart" follows after what is true and luke with candor and sincerity (Is. xxxviii:3; Luke viii:15; Heb. x:22), and it is "of flesh," when pliable and ready to receive the impressions of God's word and providence (Ezek. xxxvi:26). (2) It is "broken and contrite" when filled with sorrow and perplexity, on account of guilt, prevalence of corruption, divine hiding, and the like (Is. lxi:1; lxi:2). It is "tender" when easily affected, and afraid of sin (2 Chron. xiii:7; xxxiv:27). (3) It is "large" when one knows much, or is filled with spiritual liberty and joy (1 Kings iv:29; Ps. cxix:32). (4) It is "double, divided, deceitful" when men try to serve God and idols at once; pretend one thing, and desire and seek after another (Ps. xii:2; Hos. x:12). (5) It is "stony, hard, stout, froward, perverse," when it can scarce be impressed with God's word or providence, and is obstinate in sinning and rebelling against the Lord (Ezek. xi:19; Is. xlv:12). (6) It is "gross and fat as grease" when void of feeling, stupid, filled with sensual pleasure and unconcern about, and inattention to, eternal things (Ps. cxix:70; Acts xxviii:27). (7) To "say in the heart" is inwardly to think, reason (Rom. x:6), or earnestly desire (Ps. xiv:1). (8) To "speak to the heart" is kindly to encourage, comfort, and persuade (Hos. ii:14). (9) To do a thing "with the heart" is to do it with much affection and diligence (Matt. xxii:37). (10) Persons having their "heart" towards anything, or having persons in their "heart," denote a fixed remembrance of, desire after, and care for them (2 Cor. vii:3). (11) As "heart" denotes a fixed standing, courage, and activity, the Israelites were without it, when they had no sense of, no care and concern about, their real welfare (Hos. vii:11). (12) God's "heart" is his will, purpose, and love (Is. lxiii:4); but the "turning of his heart" within him, and "kindling of his repentings," denote only the greatness of his mercy and compassion (Jer. xxxi:20; Hos. xi:8). (13) God's law is in Christ and his people's "heart," they understand, remember, love, and are careful to fulfill it (Ps. xl:8; cxix:11). (14) What people think, love or purpose, is said to be in "their heart"; so, false prophets prophesy "out of their own heart," say what their vain imaginations and corrupt affections prompt them to (Ezek. xiii:2). (15) In allusion to the heart of animals being in the midst of the body, the midst of anything, or being within it, is called the "heart"; so Tyre was "in the heart" of the sea, being on an island (Ezek. xxvii:4); and Christ, in the grave, was "in the heart of the earth" (Matt. xii:40).

HEARTH (häth). Several Hebrew words are thus translated:

1. Lukh (Heb. לֶכֶח , a brazier, or portable furnace, in which fire was made in the king's winter apartment (Jer. xxxvi:22, 23).

2. Kee-yore (Heb. כַּיֹּרֶה), a fire pan or basin for holding fire (Zech. xii:6), for roasting (1 Sam. ii:14).

3. Mo-kade' (Heb. מֹכָדֵי), a burning, so rendered in Is. xxxiii:14, a lagot for fuel (Ps. cii:3).

HEAT, HOT (het, hót), the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words, having besides their ordinary meanings several peculiar uses in Scripture.

Figurative. (1) God's hot wrath, displeasure, or heat of his anger, is his holy and high displeasure against sin, displayed in the most fearful and tormenting judgments (Exod. xxii:24; Deut. ix:19; Judg. ii:19). Such as are lively, zealous, and active in religion are hot (Rev. iii:15). (2) One's heart is hot, when filled with tormenting trouble, impatience, and passion (Ps. xxxix:3); and so Ezekiel went to prophesy in the heat of his spirit, with great reluctance and fretting (Ezek. iii:14). (3) The hottest of the battle, is where it is most fierce, dangerous and destructive (2 Sam. xi:15). To pursue one hotly, is to do it in great wrath, and with much speed (Gen. xxxi:36). (4) The heat of the sun is symbolical of tribulation, temptation, or persecution (Matt. xiii:6, 21; Luke viii:6-13). (5) A gentle heat of the sun signifies the favor and bounty of the prince, while a fierce heat denotes punishment (see Ps. cxxi:6). (6) "Heat of the day" (Matt. xx:12) is united with burden to denote severe toil.

HEATH (hëth), (Heb. אַרְיֵר , ar-o-ayr', Jer. xvii:6; xlviii:6).

No true heath is found in Palestine. There is great probability that the dwarf juniper or savin (Juniperus sabina), which grows in the most sterile and desolate parts of the desert, is the plant intended. "Its gloomy, stunted appearance, with its scale-like leaves pressed close to its gnarled stems and cropped close by the wild goats, as it clings to the rocks about Petra, gives great force to the contrast suggested by the prophet between him that trusteth in man, naked and destitute, and the man that trusteth in the Lord, flourishing as a tree planted by the waters." (Tristram.) (See OROR.)

HEATHEN (hë'th'n). The Hebrew words gôy, גּוֹי , go-yeem', גּוֹיִם , together with their Greek equivalents ἔθνος, ἔθνη, have been somewhat arbitrarily rendered "nations," "gentiles" and "heathen" in the A. V.

It will be interesting to trace the manner in which a term, primarily and essentially general in its signification, acquired that more restricted sense which was afterwards attached to it. Its development is parallel with that of the Hebrew people, and its meaning at any period may be taken as significant of their relative position with regard to the surrounding nations.

(1) The Nations. While as yet the Jewish nation had no political existence, gôyim denoted generally the nations of the world, especially including the immediate descendants of Abraham (Gen. xviii:18; comp. Gal. iii:16). The latter, as they grew in numbers and importance, were distinguished in a most marked manner from the nations by whom they were surrounded, and were provided with a code of laws and a religious ritual, which made the distinction still more peculiar. They were essentially a separate people (Lev. xx:23); separate in habits, morals, and religion, and bound to maintain their separate character by denunciations of the most terrible judgments (Lev. xxvi:14-38; Deut. xxviii). On their march through the desert they encountered the most obstinate resistance from Amalek, "chief of the goyim" (Num. xxiv:20), in whose sight the deliverance from Egypt was achieved (Lev. xxvi:45).

(2) Idolaters. But, even in early Jewish times, the term goyim received by anticipation a significance of wider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi:33, 38; Deut. xxx:1), and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the goyim were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce, and whose idolatrous practices they readily adopted (Ezek. xxiii:30; Amos v:26). Later still, it is applied to the Babylonians who took Jerusalem (Neh. v:8; Ps. lxxix:1, 6, 10), to the destroyers of Moab (Is. xvi:8), and to the several nations among whom the Jews were scattered during the Captivity (Ps. cvi:47; Jer. xlvi:28; Lam. i:3, etc.), the practice of idolatry still being their characteristic distinction (Is. xxxvi:18; Jer. x:2, 3; xiv:22).

As the Greek influence became more extensively felt in Asia Minor, and the Greek language was generally used, Hellenism and heathenism became convertible terms, and a Greek was synonymous with a foreigner of any nation. This is singularly evident in the Syriac of 2 Macc. v:9, 10, 13; comp. John vii:35; 1 Cor. x:32; 2 Macc. xi:2 (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

(3) Dwellers in the Heath. As the word heathen may mean "dweller in the heath," the word suggests the fact that the gospel first rooted itself in towns, the inhabitants of which became Christians, while the dwellers on heaths remained worshippers of false divinities. The word Pagan, from Latin Paganus, belonging to a village, rustic, has a somewhat similar reference.

HEAVEN (hēv'n), (Heb. שָׁמַיִם, gal-gal, rolling cloud), the state and place of blessedness in the life to come.

As we can have no distinct conception of those joys which never have been and never will be experienced by us here in their full extent, we have of course no words in human language to express them, and cannot therefore expect any clear description of them even in the Holy Scriptures. Hence the Bible describes this happiness sometimes in general terms, designating its greatness (as in Rom. viii:18-22; 2 Cor. iv:17,18); and sometimes by various figurative images and modes of speech, borrowed from everything which we know to be attractive and desirable.

(1) Terms for. The following are the principal literal terms which are applied in Scripture to the condition of future happiness:

Among such appellations we find ζωή, life, ζωή αἰώνιος, eternal life, which, according to Hebrew usage, signify 'a happy life,' or 'eternal well-being,' (Matt. vii:14; xix:16, 29; xxv:46): δόξα, δόξα τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'glory,' 'the glory of God' (Rom. ii:7, 10; v:2); and εἰρήνη, 'peace' (Rom. ii:10). Also αἰώνιον βάρος δόξης, 'an eternal weight of glory' (2 Cor. iv:17); and σωτηρία, σωτηρία αἰώνιος, 'salvation,' 'eternal salvation' (Heb. v:9, etc.).

(2) Conditions in. Besides being exempt from all earthly trials, and having a continuance of that happiness which we had begun to enjoy even here, we have good reason to expect hereafter other rewards and joys, which stand in no natural or necessary connection with the present. In the doctrine of the New Testament, however, positive rewards are considered most obviously as belonging to our future felicity, and as constituting a principal part of it. For it always represents the joys of heaven as resulting strictly from the favor of God, and as being undeserved by those on whom they are bestowed. Hence there must be something more added to the natural good consequences of our actions, something which cannot be considered as the necessary and natural consequences of the good actions we may have here performed. But, on this subject, we know nothing more in general than this, that God will so appoint and order our circumstances, and make such arrangements, that the principal faculties of our souls—reason and affection, will be heightened and developed, so that we shall continually obtain more pure and distinct knowledge of the truth, and make continual advances in holiness. Some theologians have supposed that the saints in heaven may be taught by immediate divine revelations lumen gloriæ; especially those who may enter the abodes of the blessed without knowledge, or with only a small measure of it; e. g. children and others who have died in ignorance, for which they themselves were not to blame.

(3) With Christ. In the Scripture revelation respecting heaven, Christ is always represented as one who will be personally visible to us, and whose personal, familiar intercourse and guidance we shall enjoy. Herein Christ himself places a chief part of the joy of the saints (John xiv, xvii, etc.); and the apostles often describe the blessedness of the pious by the phrase being with Christ. To his guidance has God entrusted the human race, in heaven and on earth. And Paul says (2 Cor. iv:6), we see 'the brightness of the divine glory in the face of Christ,' he is 'the visible representative of the invisible God' (Col. i:15). According to the representation contained in the Holy Scriptures, the saints will dwell together in the future world, and form, as it were, a kingdom or state of God (Luke xvi:22; xx:38; Rom. viii:10; Rev. vii:9; Heb. xii:22). They will there partake of a common felicity. Their enjoyment will doubtless be very much heightened by friendship, and by their confiding intercourse with each other.

(4) Knowledge of. All that we can with certainty know or infer from Scripture or reason respecting the blessedness of the life to come, may be arranged under the following particulars:—We shall hereafter be entirely freed from the sufferings and adversities of this life. Our future blessedness will involve a continuance of the real happiness of this life.

(5) Deliverance from Evil. The entire exemption from suffering and all that causes suffering here, is expressed in the Scripture by words which denote rest, repose, refreshment, after performing labor and enduring affliction. But all the terms which are employed to express this condition, define (in the original) the promised 'rest,' as rest after labor, and exemption from toil and grief; and not the absence of employment, not inactivity or indolence (2 Thess. i:7; Heb. iv:9, 11; Rev. xiv:13; comp. vii:17).

This deliverance from the evils of our present life includes:

1. Deliverance from this earthly body, the seat of the lower principles of our nature and of our sinful corruption, and the source of so many evils and sufferings (2 Cor. vi:1, 2; 1 Cor. xviii:15).

2. Entire separation from the society of wicked and evil-disposed persons, who, in various ways, injure the righteous man and embitter his life on earth (2 Tim. iv:18). It is hence accounted a part of the felicity even of Christ himself in heaven to be 'separate from sinners' (Heb. vii:26).

3. Upon this earth everything is inconstant, and subject to perpetual change; and nothing is capable of completely satisfying our expectations and desires. But in the world to come it will be different. The bliss of the saints will continue without interruption or change, without fear of termination, and without satiety (Luke xx:36; 2 Cor. iv:16, 18; 1 Pet. i:4; v:10; 1 John iii:2, sq.)

Figurative. Among the figurative representations, we may place the word 'heaven' itself. The abode of departed spirits, to us who live upon the earth, and while we remain here, is invisible and inaccessible beyond the bounds of the visible world, and entirely separated from it. There they live in the highest well-being, and in a nearer connection with God and Christ than here below. This place and state cannot be designated by any more fit and brief expression than that which is found in almost every language, namely, 'heaven,'—a word in its primary and material signification denoting the region of the skies, or the visible heavens. It is there that the highest sanctuary or temple of God is situated, i. e. it is there that the omnipresent God most gloriously reveals himself. This, too, is the abode of God's highest spiritual creation. Thither Christ was transported: he calls it the house of his Father, and says that he has therein prepared an abode for his followers (John xiv:2).

This place, this 'heaven,' was never conceived of in ancient times, as it has been by some modern writers, as a particular planet or world, but as the wide expanse of heaven; high above the atmosphere or starry heavens; hence it is sometimes called the third heaven, as being neither the atmosphere nor the starry heavens.

Another figurative name is 'Paradise,' taken from the abode of our first parents in their state of innocence, and transferred to the abode of the blessed (Luke xxiii:43; 2 Cor. xii:4; Rev. ii:7; xxii:2).

Again, this place is called 'the heavenly Jerusalem' (Gal. iv:26; Heb. xii:22; Rev. iii:12), because the earthly Jerusalem was the capital city of the Jews, the royal residence, and the seat of divine worship; the 'kingdom of heaven' (Matt. xxv:1; Jam. ii:5); the 'heavenly kingdom' (2 Tim. iv:18; the 'eternal kingdom' (2 Pet. i:11). It is also called an 'eternal inheritance' (1 Pet. i:4; Heb. ix:15), meaning the possession and full enjoyment of happiness, typified by the residence of the ancient Hebrews in Palestine. The blessed are said 'to sit down at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,' that is, to be a sharer with the saints of old in the joys of salvation; 'to be in Abraham's bosom' (Luke xvi:22; Matt. viii:11), that is, to sit near or next to Abraham (see ABRAHAM'S BOSOM); 'to reign with Christ' (2 Tim. ii:11), i. e., to be distinguished, honored, and happy as he is—to enjoy regal felicities; to enjoy 'a Sabbath,' or 'rest' (Heb. iv:10, 11), indicating the happiness of pious Christians, both in this life and in the life to come.

HEAVY, HEAVINESS (hēv'ŷ, hēv'Y-nēs), (Heb. כָּבֵד, kaw-bade', weight).

Many other words are thus translated. Heaviness occurs often, but always with the meaning of grief. Thus (Prov. x:1) 'A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother;' (Prov. xii:25) 'Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop; but a good word maketh it glad;' (Is. lxi:3) 'To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.' 'Ye are in heaviness,' R. V. 'Ye have been put to grief' (1 Pet. i:6); 'For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness,' ἀδρημονῶν, R. V., 'Was sore troubled' (Phil. ii:26). In their preface the A. V. translators say of the Scriptures, 'If we be ignorant, they will instruct us; if out of the way, they will bring us home; if out of order, they will reform us; if in heaviness, comfort us; if dull, quicken us; if colde, inflame us.' The older versions have the word very often, as John xvi:6 Wycliffe's V., 'sorwe, or heuynesse, hath fulfillid youre herte;' Ps. xxx:5 Coverdale's V., 'Hevy-nesse maye well endure for a night, but joye commeth in the mornynge.'

Figurative. We learn from the preceding passages that whatever is burdensome or afflicting to body or mind, is called heavy. (1) As the hand or judgments of God (1 Sam. v:6). (2) An oppressive tax (Neh. v:18; 1 Kings xii:4). (3) Bad news (1 Kings xiv:6). (4) And the outrageous wrath of a foolish man (Prov. xxvii:3). (5) A heart is heavy, when it is sad and displeased (1 Kings xxi:4). (6) Eyes are heavy when they can scarce look up for drowsiness (Matt. xxvi:43). (7) Ears are heavy, when men are dull and inattentive (Is. vi:10). (8) Hands are heavy, when one is wearied with holding them up (Exod. xvii:12). (9) Christ was very heavy, when his spirit was oppressed and filled with sorrow under the unspeakable pressure of his Father's wrath (Matt. xxvi:37).

HEBER (hē'ber), (Heb. אֶבֶר, ay'ber, of the other side, i. e., of the river, immigrant).

1. The son of Salah, who became the father of Peleg at the age of 34 years, and died at the age of 464 (Gen. x:24; xi:14; 1 Chron. i:25). His name occurs in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii:35), B. C. 2448-1984. There is nothing to constitute Heber a historical personage; but there is a degree of interest connected with him from the notion, which the Jews themselves entertain, that the name of Hebrews, applied to them, was derived from this alleged ancestor of Abraham. No historical ground appears why this name should be derived from him rather than from any other personage that occurs in the catalogue of Shem's descendants; but there are so much stronger objections to every other hypothesis, that this perhaps is still the most probable of any which have yet been started.

2. Grandson of Asher (Gen. xlvi:17; 1 Chron. vii:31; Num. xxvi:45), B. C. before 1873.

3. One of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv:18). B. C. after 1612.

4. A Gadite (1 Chron. v:13), B. C. between 1612 and 1093.

5. A descendant of Hobab, son of Jethro, and brother of the wife of Moses. His wife was the Jael who slew Sisera (B. C. 1409), and he is called Heber the Kenite (Judg. iv:11, 17; v:24), which seems to have been a name for the whole family (Judg. i:16). Heber appears to have lived separate from the rest of the Kenites, leading a patriarchal life, amid his tents and flocks. He must have been a person of some consequence, from its being stated that there was peace between the house of Heber and the powerful king Jabin. At the time the history brings him under our notice his camp was in the plain of Zaanaim, near Kedesh in Naphtali. (See Jael; KENITES.)

7. Also a Benjamite (1 Chron. viii:22), B. C. before 598.

HEBREWESS (he'brü-ës), a Hebrew woman (Jer. xxxiv:9).

HEBREW LANGUAGE (he'brü län'gwäj).

The Hebrew language is that which was the notional idiom of those descendants of Eber which received the distinctive name of the People of Israel, and, as such, was that in which all the books of the Old Testament (with the exception of the few Chaldee passages occurring in those after the Babylonian captivity) were originally composed.

(1) Semitic. It belongs to the Semitic, or, as it is more appropriately called, the Syro-Arabian family of languages; and it occupies a central point amidst all the branches of this family, as well with reference to the geographical position of the country in which it prevailed, as with reference to the degree of development to which it attained.

(2) Jewish. If we except the terms 'lip or language of Canaan,' in Is. xix:18, the only name by which the Hebrew language is mentioned in the Old Testament is 'Jewish' יְהוּדִית, yeh-hoo-deeth' used adverbially, Judaic, in Jewish (2 Kings xviii:26, 28; Is. xxxvi:11, 13).

In a strict sense, however, 'Jewish' denotes the idiom of the kingdom of Judah, which became the predominant one after the deportation of the ten tribes. It is in the Greek writings of the later Jews that 'Hebrew' is first applied to the language, as in the ἑβραϊστί, in the Hebrew language, of the prologue to Ecclesiasticus, and in the γλώσσα τῶν ἑβραίων, language of the Hebrews, of Josephus.

The best evidences which we possess as to the form of the Hebrew language, prior to its first historical period, tend to show that Abraham, on his entrance into Canaan, found the language then prevailing among almost all the different tribes inhabiting that country to be at least dialectically in affinity with his own. This is gathered from the following facts: that nearly all the names of places and persons relating to those tribes admit of Hebrew etymologies; that, amidst all the accounts of the intercourse of the Hebrews with the nations of Canaan, we find no hint of a diversity of idiom; and that even the comparatively recent remains of the Phœnician and Punic languages bear a manifest affinity to the Hebrew.

(3) History Preceding the Exile. The history of the Hebrew language, as far as we can trace its course by the changes in the diction of the documents in which it is preserved, may be here conveniently divided into that of the period preceding, and that of the period succeeding, the Exile. If it be a matter of surprise that the thousand years which intervened between Moses and the Captivity should not have produced sufficient change in the language to warrant its history during that time being distributed into subordinate divisions, the following considerations may excuse this arrangement. It is one of the signal characteristics of the Hebrew language, as seen in all the books prior to the Exile, that notwithstanding the existence of some isolated, but important, archaisms, such as in the form of the pronoun, etc. (the best collection of which may be seen in Hävernicks, Einleit., p. 183, sq.), it preserves an unparalleled general uniformity of structure. The extent to which this uniformity prevails may be estimated, either by the fact that it has furnished many modern scholars, who reason from the analogies discovered in the changes in other languages in a given period, with an argument to show that the Pentateuch could not have been written at so remote a date as is generally believed (Gesenius, Gesch. der Hebr. Sprache, sec. 8); or, by the conclusion, a fortiori, which Hävernicks, whose express object it is to vindicate its received antiquity, candidly concedes that 'the books of Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah are the earliest in which the language differs sensibly from that in the historical portions of the Pentateuch' (Einleit. i. p. 180).

In the canonical books belonging to the first period, the Hebrew language appears in a state of mature development. Although it still preserves the charms of freshness and simplicity, yet it has attained great regularity of formation, and such a precision of syntactical arrangement as ensures both energy and distinctness.

(4) Second Period. The Babylonian captivity is assigned as the commencement of that decline and corruption which mark the second period in the history of the Hebrew language; but the Assyrian deportation of the ten tribes, in the year B. C. 720, was probably the first means of bringing the Aramaic idiom into injurious proximity to it. The Exile, however, forms the epoch at which the language shows evident signs of that encroachment of the Aramaic on its integrity, which afterwards ended in its complete extinction. The diction of the different books of this period discovers various grades of this Aramaic influence; and in some cases approaches so nearly to the type of the first period, that it has been ascribed to mere imitation.

HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS (he'brü öv the he'brüz), (Gr. Ἑβραῖος ἕξ Ἑβραίων, Hebraios eks Hebraion), emphatically a Hebrew, one who was so by both parents, and that by a long series of ancestors, without admixture of Gentile or even proselyte blood. So speaks Paul (Phil. iii:5) of himself.

Of this the Jews were as proud as were those Christians in Spain, who called themselves Old Christians, of having no mixture of Moorish blood.

HEBREWS (he'brüz), (Heb. יְהוּדִים, ib-rec'; plural יְהוּדִים, ib-reem'; Gr. Ἑβραῖος, heb-rah'yes), a designation of the people of Israel.

(1) Its Derivation. (1) Some ascribe the origin of the word to Ay-ber' (Heb. אֵיבֵר; Eber, the ancestor (Gen. x:21); see also the use of Eber as a national name (Num. xxiv:24). (2) Others trace the name to the Hebrew aw-bar' (עָבַר, to pass over), so that a Hebrew would mean the "man from the region beyond," and supposed to have been applied to Abraham, as having crossed the Euphrates to the westward. This last derivation is generally admitted. It seems to imply nothing more than that Abraham was an immigrant into Canaan—not a native.

(2) Scripture Application. This name is never applied in Scripture to the Israelites except when the speaker is a foreigner (Gen. xxxix:14, 17; xli:12; Exod. i:16; ii:6; 1 Sam. iv:6, 9, etc.), or when the Israelites speak of themselves to one of another nation (Gen. xl:15; Exod. i:19; Jonah i:9, etc.), or when they are contrasted with other peoples (Gen. xliii:32; Exod. i:3, 7, 15; Deut. xv:12; 1 Sam. xiii:3, 7).

(3) Tribes Embraced. The appellation Hebrews may, indeed, originally have embraced more tribes than the Israelites, as it appears from Genesis (x:21, 25) that the descendants of Joktan had some claim to it. Nevertheless, it was soon appropriated to the Israelites as their distinctive name as a nation in the earlier periods tained some hints as to the condition of mind or other occasion in the readers which called it forth. It would not be impossible, perhaps, to account for the lack of one or two of these essential features of a letter, but the absence of all of them is not easily conceivable, in case it was meant to be addressed to a single congregation or even a circle of congregations.

As a homily, its structure and content are easily explained. It characterizes itself as "a word of exhortation" (xiii:22). It begins with a clearly drawn contrast of the old revelation of God to the fathers through the prophets, with the new revelation of God to the times of the writer through his Son (i:1). This immediately leads to the pointing out of the highly exalted character and office of the Son. He existed in eternity and took part in the creation of the universe (i:2), and was the very image and effulgence of God, but (appearing as man) made purification for sin, and was once more exalted (i:3). He of their history, and (after giving place, in the intervening centuries, to that of Israel, and, subsequently to the deportation of the ten tribes, to that of Jews) was at length revived not long before the Christian era—when, however, it also served to distinguish the Jews of Palestine from the Hellenist Jews—and passed over, together with that of Jews, to the classical writers.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE.

(1) Form and Content. This writing has always been called an epistle. On closer examination, however, it is seen to be such only in form. It is not an epistle in the sense in which, in the New Testament, for instance, the letters to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians are epistles. It is rather a homily or practical religious treatise, aimed at a definite end. It is planned and written with the sole object of presenting and defending a clear idea of the New Covenant. As an epistle, it should have had, in accordance with literary customs of its environment, the name of the writer and the name of the party addressed. It should have been pervaded by the sense of personal relationships, and con-occupies a much higher place than the angels (i:5; ii:18). This last position is established by a series of citations from the Old Testament Scriptures. While still in the process of his argument, the author interrupts it in order to make a homiletical application of the idea in a practical exhortation to perseverance (ii:1-4).

But Christ was superior not alone to angels, but also to others believed to be mediators of the Old Covenant; i. e., to Moses and the Levitical priesthood (iii:1; viii:13). His superiority over Moses is that of the maker of a house to the house (iii:1-4), and that of the Son to the servant (iii:5, 6). At this point the author again interrupts his argument in order to introduce a practical exhortation, re-enforced by an appeal to the history of Israel as recorded in the Pentateuchal account of the Exodus (iii:7; iv:13). Returning to the argument, he then proves that Christ is superior to the Levitical priesthood, because his order is higher than that of Aaron, being the same as that of Melchizedek. In order to establish this position, he first shows that Christ is a true priest, being taken from among men (iv:1-3), and appointed by God (iv:4-10).

At this point, once more, the author stops to make some homiletical uses of what he had already proved, v:11; vi:20. After this he proceeds to show the implications of Christ's appointment under the order of Melchizedek. Melchizedek entered into the sacred narrative in a preternatural manner and is therefore above Levi vii:1-3. Melchizedek was recognized to be of a higher order than Levi historically; for the sons of Levi are allowed to receive tithes of their kindred only, whereas his authority was broader in that he tithed Abraham, a stranger. Furthermore, the sons of Levi, as represented in their ancestor Abraham, paid tithes to him, thus yielding him priority (vii:4-10). But was such a broader priesthood necessary? The author argues from the weakness of the old and the necessity of frequent changes caused by death that it was (vii:11-25). He then concludes this part of the argument by showing Christ's fitness for the new high-priesthood and recapitulates (vii:25; viii:13). In the second part of the writing, the author proves the superiority of the new Covenant itself to the old. The argument is here mainly a contrast between the weakness of the old as to its sanctuary, furniture, and rites, and the strength of the new in its purification, its sacrifice, its spiritual power, and its finality (ix:1; x:18). Having shown this superiority the author suspends argument in order to give opportunity to an exhortation (x:19-39). On resuming the argument he then enters upon an eloquent presentation of the emphatic and central principle of faith as it is fully developed under the new Covenant, showing by a long list of illustrations that whatever was good in the old was due to the operation of this principle (xi:1-40). At this point, the argument is closed. The rest of the writing is practical and hortatory. The lessons of the argument as developed are first enforced (xii:1-29) and some indirect or inferential lessons of conduct appended (xiii:1-17). The author then requests prayer from and invokes a blessing upon his readers (xiii:18-21) and closes with allusion to some personal items and a final benediction (xiii:22-25).

(2) Design. From this plan and outline, it appears that the Epistle to the Hebrews is a homily cast into the mold of a letter for the sake of convenience mainly. The question may now be asked, what the purpose of the epistle was. Bruce (Epistle to the Hebrews, 1899) takes the ground that it was put forth as a defense of the Christian faith and calls it the "First Apology for Christianity." This, however, it can only be in a very general sense, just as any other writing intended to show the excellencies of the Christian faith in order to secure perseverance in it may be called an apology. It is not an apology in the sense that it was intended as a vindication of the Christian faith at the bar of reason, or a defense of it against some definite attack made from the intellectual side. Milligan (Theology of the Ep. to the Heb., 1899), finds the design to be the further instruction of believers in the true character of their new faith. So also Reuss takes the view that it was intended as a theological treatise, expounding in general the nature of the new Covenant as contrasted with the old. With this view agrees also substantially that of Ménégoz (Théologie de l'Épître aux Hébreux), who adds to it the idea of a practical end in view. The author, according to this scholar, sets himself to prove the superiority of Christianity in order to retain the believers in the church. Such a view, of course, comes practically to the same thing as our characterization of the writing as a homily with its exposition of doctrine in order to a practical end. If this be accepted as the design and nature of the writing, it will be unnecessary to suppose with B. W. Bacon (Intro. to the N. T., 1900) that the first paragraph of the writing was lost, for being not strictly a letter, but a discourse, it needed no self-naming and thanksgiving, but begins properly with a reminder of God's former revelation of his will. Such a beginning is itself natural, and only the effort to make it conform to the procrustean ideal of a perfect letter can demand the supposition of the omission of a first section.

(3) Audience. The primary audience of the Epistle, for we may continue to give it that name at least out of deference to custom and convenience, may have been (1) the Christian community at large (So Biesenthal), or (2) that section of it which was of Jewish antecedents (Schwegler, Guericke, Baumgarten), or (3) a circle of congregations such as those in Palestine or in Alexandria and Egypt, or at Rome and in Italy, or (4) finally a particular congregation: i. e., the church at Jerusalem, or that at Rome, or that in Alexandria.

It will be needless to discuss the full merits of each of these views as to the first community for whose benefit the Epistle was written. Suffice it to say that each of them has its advocates and each is supported by plausible considerations. But the very possibility of their all being held and argued for is an evidence that the writer had in mind a catholic or comprehensive as distinguished from a local and particular audience. Those views, therefore, which make some local church, such as that at Rome or Jerusalem or Alexandria, the primary audience of the homily may be set aside as not fully satisfying the conditions.

Nevertheless, the author of Hebrews was not writing for the church universal in its broadest sense. The persons he addresses are a distinct class living "in the same general circumstances of age, position, and opinion" (Westcott). They hold the same views and are exposed to the same dangers. Such general similarity of circumstances is consistent only with a rather restricted audience, yet not necessarily so narrow as a single congregation.

When we pass to the question of the nationality of this audience, we are met at once with the traditional superscription—"To the Hebrews." But it is undeniable that this title formed no part of the original writing. And even if it did, it would not lead us beyond the conclusion that the persons addressed were of Jewish antecedents or Jews. The term Hebrew (Ἑβραῖος) is sometimes applied to the Jews of Palestine who used the Aramaic language as their vernacular in order to distinguish them from the Jews of the dispersion who spoke Greek, and sometimes to the Jews of all shades of variety to distinguish them from the Gentiles also called Greeks or Hellenes. The title would be consistent with an audience of either kind of "Hebrews." (See HEBREWS.) It enables us to begin with the understanding that this audience was of Jewish antecedents.

Against this inference some recent scholars (Weizsäcker, Das Apostolische Zeitalter p. 473; von Soden, Hand Komment. vi, p. 11; Jülicher, Einl. in das N. T. p. 110; and McGiffert, Hist. of Christ in the Apostolic Age, p. 465 ff.) have pitted the view that the author was addressing an audience either purely of Gentile Christians or of Christians irrespective of antecedents. The support for this view is found in passages like vi:1, 2; ix:14; xiii:4, 24. But on closer examination, these passages do not furnish the evidence necessary to establish the new view. On the contrary, every internal mark points to the corroboration of the title. The writer, who was evidently himself a Jew, speaks of "the fathers," of "the seed of Abraham," and of "the people of God" as the literal and lineal ancestors of himself and readers (i:1; ii:16; iv:9). And throughout the whole work, the nature of the argument is such as would appeal with fullest force only to those who were possessed by the feeling of the pride of Jewish ancestry.

Can we narrow the circle further and locate the Christian Jews addressed to a special locality or region of the known world? From the earliest times, many have pointed at Palestine as the place in which the Epistle was to be first used. In favor of this idea, one could, of course, cite the predominance of the temple-idea and the effort to build upon the ceremonial so manifest in the writing. In Palestine and Jerusalem Christians would be most exposed to the attacks against which the writer seeks to arm his readers and here alone, if anywhere, would there exist a general Christian community consisting mainly of converts from Judaism. These considerations are not absolutely conclusive, and on the contrary, certain indications, such as the Greek diction of the writing and the habit of quoting the Old Testament in the LXX version seem to exclude Palestine as the destination. Therefore, many have sought for the more particular location of the community in question in Egypt and Alexandria. The reasons which are cited against Palestine are naturally arguments for the location of the destination in Egypt. Here the temple built by Onias at Leontopolis and the ritual observed in it furnished the basis for the reasoning of the writer from the ritual. Moreover the style and diction and the use of the Alexandrian recension of the LXX are in favor of this theory. But these latter considerations point rather to the Alexandrian origin of the author than to the Egyptian destination of the writing. And as against the view it is to be borne in mind that in Alexandria the Epistle was always regarded as addressed to Palestinians. Hence, a third view has recently found favor among scholars to the effect that Rome and its Italian environment are the territory sought for in this inquiry. The facts upon which this view is based are the allusions to the persecutions of Christians, which were endured at Rome, the allusion to Timothy (xiii:23) in whom neither the Palestinian nor Egyptian Christians had, as far as we know, any special interest, and finally the allusion to them "of Italy" (xiii:24), this being understood as a message of some exiled members of the Roman community to their fellow citizens. To these considerations others of less weight could be and have been added inclining many to the view in question. Upon the whole, however, the arguments for this view are neither conclusive in themselves nor strong enough to overbalance those in favor of the Palestinian destination, and our conclusion must be that the Epistle was written with the Christian Jewish public of Palestine and its needs in immediate view.

(4) Date. The date of the writing of the Epistle is fixed by those who believe it to have been composed for the benefit of the churches in Italy and Rome at some time between 50 A. D.—the date of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome—and 64 A. D.—the date of the Neronian persecution. If that destination and object be accepted, the date is a very reasonable one. The sufferings of the Jews under Claudius may in such a case be referred to in x:32 as the "former days," whereas, the impending bloody persecution would naturally be the cause of the fear and probable falling away against which the audience is warned. But if the Palestinian destination of the writing be the correct one, the year 70 A. D., or at the latest one or two years earlier, would be the most probable date of the writing. It is not easy to believe that the author could have omitted all reference to the great catastrophe of the destruction of the temple had he written after that event. Neither could he have written much earlier, for in such a case, he could not have appealed to his readers as he does in ii:3 as men of the second generation of Christians. We shall not be far out of the way therefore, if we set aside as untenable those views which ascribe it to the reign of Domitian (about 90 A. D.), and of Trajan (about 116 A. D.), and assign the Epistle to 68 or 69 A. D.

(5) Place. As to the place whence the writing was issued no data are available. The subscription in the received text—"written to the Hebrews from Italy by Timothy"—is manifestly untrustworthy. Corinth, Ephesus, Caesarea, and Alexandria have all been advocated as seats of the origin of the writing, but altogether on conjectural grounds. If the author was living in his native environment when he wrote, Alexandria would have better right to the claim set up in its behalf, inasmuch as the style and quality of his thought prove the writer to have been an Alexandrian.

(6) Author. But who was the author? This question is one of the few bequeathed to the modern world by the earliest biblical students. Of other similar questions of authorship it may be said, they are creatures of modern criticism, but not of the authorship of Hebrews. The question was evidently discussed in the earliest days of the church and up to the time of Origen no general agreement had been reached. Origen himself was unable to come to a conclusion and sums up the condition of thought in his day in the words: "But who it was that wrote the Epistle God only knows certainly. The account that has reached us is (manifold) some saying that Clement, who became bishop of Rome, wrote it, while others assign it to Luke, the author of the Gospel and the Acts." (Eusebius, H. E. vi:25.)

The divergence of view reflected in this passage disappeared to some extent during the middle ages. But it was rather through lack of real interest in the question that men acquiesced in a view which they had not thoroughly tested, than through the power of a conviction based upon thorough investigations. Accordingly, as soon as this period of slothful thought in biblical questions passed away, the original diversity of view on the authorship of Hebrews revived. At present there may be said to be four general theories on this point: (a) That of Pauline authorship; (b) that of composite authorship in which Paul is assigned a share; (c) that of authorship by another than Paul; and (d) that of suspended judgment or inability to reach a conclusion.

(a) That Paul was the author of Hebrews is still held by many, though not prominent scholars. The grounds for holding this opinion are partly traditional and partly a priori. On the traditional side, it is said that the Alexandrian Church fathers ascribe the writing to Paul. On the a priori side it is argued that the importance and dignity of the thought are consistent only with the composition of the epistle by a "man of first magnitude;" and none other than Paul was such in the Apostolic age of Christianity. To these considerations is added the general resemblance of the doctrinal system of the Epistle to the doctrinal system of the genuinely Pauline epistles and also of some characteristics of style and diction to the style and diction of Paul. But neither do these resemblances strike scholars forcibly enough to convince them, nor are the considerations of a traditional and a priori nature conclusive.

On the contrary, a large array of facts are pointed out as decisively opposed to this view. These have been generally classified as pertaining to the style, form and content. First of all, then, the style of the Epistle is radically different from that of the Pauline Epistles in several particulars. (a) It is characterized by rhythm, euphony, and rhetoric. There is through the writing, a stately movement and parallelism or balance of clauses and sentences very different from Paul's abrupt and fragmentary expressions. Farrar has likened the difference between the two authors at this point to the difference between the stately, dignified, and measured steps of the priest at service in the temple and the agile and swift movements of the athlete in the arena. (b) It is less Hebraistic, more literary, more idiomatic in construction than Paul's. This feature of it was noticed as early as the days of Clement of Alexandria and Origen. (c) The diction is unique. Paul's favorite expressions are lacking. The phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, in Christ, which occurs seventy-eight times in the Epistles of Paul, does not occur in Hebrews. So also the phrase Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, the Lord Jesus Christ, which occurs in every one of Paul's letters (eighty times in all) is not found in Hebrews. The word εὐαγγέλιον, gospel, used by Paul sixty times, is not used in this epistle. The word πατήρ, father, applied to God thirty-six times by Paul (exclusive of the instances in which God is called the Father of Jesus Christ), and occurring in all of his epistles, is used in that sense only once in Hebrews (xii:9). (d) The choice of words is also non-Pauline. There is a frequent use of verbs compounded with παρά and ὑπέρ which is not found in Paul's writings. The same is true of verbs in ἔγω, of substantives in οὐκ, and of the relatives ὅθεν, ὅσος τοσούτος. Certain words and phrases finally, which are favorites of the author of Hebrews, are never found in the Pauline Epistles; such as μισθαποδοσία, διαπαντός, εἰς τὸ παντελές, εἰς τὸ δεηκέες, μέτοχον εἶναι. It is not a sufficient explanation to say of these phrases that Paul has no occasion to use them elsewhere, for he does use their equivalents, as μισθός, πάντοτε, κοινωνόν εἶναι, etc. Nor is it satisfactory to say that all of these peculiarities can be accounted for upon the supposition of the lapse of a considerable interval of time. So far as we are acquainted with the life of the Apostle, there is no room for such an interval. Nor again is there a tendency in Paul's style towards the change indicated by the difference. And, finally, the assumption that Paul, writing to the Jews, purposely adopted this style is not satisfactory, inasmuch as the Jews were not especially in a situation to appreciate finished Greek diction, certainly not as much so as the Corinthians or Ephesians. Of the theory which strives to account for these facts through the mediation of an amanuensis, it will not be necessary to speak at this point; for this view accounts for nothing if it is construed to mean that the amanuensis simply wrote down what Paul dictated; but if more freedom is given by the supposition to the amanuensis, he is thereby raised to a joint author and the theory falls under another class. Secondly, there are some considerations growing out of the form of the writing that indicate non-Pauline authorship. Such are: (a) The absence of a salutation, self-naming and thanksgiving. The reason why Paul should have resorted to this change of form is not apparent and the difference is remarkable in view of the uniform way in which all his acknowledged epistles follow the type of his literary production. (b) The arrangement of the writing. In his other writings, Paul masses the doctrinal, ethical, and practical parts of his message into sections. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, the practical or hortatory part is broken and its parts interspersed through the writing. (c) The confession of dependence upon others for information (ii:3 f.). Paul everywhere insists on the originality of his message. This he considers an essential feature of his apostleship. He has received the Gospel by revelation. The author of Hebrews has heard it from those that heard Jesus. (d) The use of the Old Testament. Both quote from the LXX. But Paul quotes with reference to the context, whereas this author quotes without such reference. Paul quotes from the Vatican recension; this author quotes from the Alexandrian. Paul quotes as if from memory; this author, as if copying the text from a MSS. before him. Paul introduces his quotations as "Scripture;" this author as the "word of God." Paul is satisfied simply to cite the words quoted; this author "improves" or makes use of the words (ii:6-9; iii:1-4, 10; vii:1-25) notes silence (vii:3) and supplements them (iv:6-9; xi:13-16). In general, the use of the Old Testament in Hebrews is half mystical, half spiritualistic in its method. Thirdly, the argument and type of thought of the Epistle to the Hebrews is unlike that of Paul. There are indeed resemblances to the Pauline type which have led many to characterize it as "deutero-Pauline," but in general, the differences are more striking. Paul's idea of faith as the sinner's trust in Christ gives place in Hebrews to faith as an assurance of the reality of invisible things and therefore trust in God's word. Paul's idea of justification as a forensic act declaring the sinner guiltless at the bar of God, yields to the doctrine of perfection (τελειώσις). Vice versa, Paul's conception of sanctification as a moral process equivalent to growth in inner holiness finds its parallel in the doctrine of external sanctification or consecration by a priestly act (ἀγασμός). Paul's general conception of Christianity is that it stands in sharp antithesis to Judaism, whereas in Hebrews it is the development and consummation of the Old Testament system. While these differences are not irreconcilable and might have been consistent with Pauline authorship if found alone, their occurrence together with the differences already pointed out in the other classes leads to the conclusion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not written by Paul, to say the least with as little mediation on the part of amanuenses as the other letters of the Apostle.

(b) Was Hebrews, then, written by Paul conjointly with some assistant? The affirmative answer to this question takes two forms. According to the first, the Apostle dictated the treatise to some one in Hebrew, and it was translated by this person to its present Greek form. This view was propounded by Clement of Alexandria in order to account for the difference of style between the Epistle to the Hebrews and Paul's other letters. But, though it has been and is held by some, yet it has against it the facts that it is not in style alone that Hebrews differs from Paul's writings, but in form and content also. Furthermore, Hebrews was evidently written in Greek and is no translation.

According to the second variety of the theory of composite authorship, Paul is supposed to have delivered the substance of the writing to some one of his followers, who then worked it over in his own way, supplying form and diction. To the further question who this follower was, some adherents of this general view answer Luke and some, Clement of Rome. That Luke took and re-stated Paul's message to the Hebrews is argued by Delitzsch, upon the ground of the alleged similarity of language between this treatise and the third Gospel and the book of Acts. But this similarity is very general, and extends no further than the use of certain words and expressions which were probably common to all Hellenistic writers. Differences between Luke and the author of Hebrews have also been pointed out, and, upon the whole, they overbalance the similarities referred to.

Clement of Rome was first suggested by Origen as the mediator between Paul and the audience to which Hebrews is addressed, and has been accepted as such by some on the ground of the numerous citations of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the first Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. But a careful study of the two writings leaves no room for doubt that Clement is using Hebrews as the work of some other man, and that, aside from this, there is no other relationship between the two productions. The author of Hebrews is undoubtedly a more forceful and original thinker than Clement. Moreover, the argument from style is fatally against the identification of the two.

By way of mere suggestion in more recent times, Mark and Aquila have been also named as possible partners with Paul in the writing of Hebrews. But as these suggestions cannot rise above the level of mere conjecture, they have not been seriously considered by scholars.

(c) If Pauline authorship cannot be ascribed to Hebrews, either directly or through the mediation of an assistant, the question next occurs whether some other well-known person of the Apostolic age can be identified as the author. Three such well-known characters have been singled out and assigned this role. (1) The first of these is Silas (so Goder). Silas was a prominent member of the Christian community of Jerusalem, a Jewish Christian prophet and a Roman citizen. He was a companion of Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts xv:40; xviii-xxii), and associated with the Apostle in his letters (1 Thess. i:1; 2 Thess. i:1; 2 Cor. ii:19) under the name of Silvanus. The fact that he was acquainted with Timothy, taken with the mention of Timothy in Heb. xiii:23, has led some to think that he wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews. But, on the other hand, no trace of an external tradition ascribing the epistle to him is to be found, and, as he left us no other writings, and we cannot thus reach a conclusion regarding his style and type of thought, and as we are not informed that he had an Alexandrian education, it is not possible to test the value of the hypothesis that ascribes one Epistle to him. (2) The second person to whom the epistle has been ascribed is Apollos. This was the opinion favored by Luther (Works, Ed. of Erlangen, Vol. XI, p. 130, ad Gen. XVIII. 20). Regarding Apollos, the book of Acts informs us that he was a Jew, an Alexandrian, an eloquent man, versed in the Old Testament Scriptures, converted to the faith and active as a preacher and defender of the Messiahship of Jesus among the Jews. He joined Paul and his companions at Ephesus (Acts xviii:24), and was very helpful to those who had believed. He had been selected by one of the factions of Corinth as their head and representative, undoubtedly without his consent or knowledge (1 Cor. i:12). Here are characteristics which appear also in the author of Hebrews: i. e., first of all, independence, talent in disputation, precision in thought, fervor, gift of graceful and persuasive use of language, knowledge of Scripture. On the ground of these, many have followed Luther (De Wette, Bleek, Tholuck, Lünemann, Kurtz, Farrar, Alford, Pressense, Davidson, Hilgenfeld, and, with hesitation, Pfeleiderer) in ascribing the writing to Apollos. On the other side, however, it is necessary to remember that Apollos was not a Christian of the second generation, as Heb. ii:3 demands that its author should have been, but of about the same age as Paul; neither is it likely that, after taking as important a part in the Judaistic-Pauline controversy, he should have made no allusion to that subject, especially in writing for Judæo-Christians. (3) The only other prominent leader of the Apostolic age named in this connection is Barnabas. The view which makes Barnabas the author of Hebrews is perhaps the most widely accepted at the present day (Ullman, Wieseler, Volkmar, B. Weiss, Keil, Salmon, Renan, Zahn, and Harnack). The reasons that lead to this conclusion are, first of all, the ancient tradition attested by Tertullian that Barnabas wrote Hebrews (de Pudicitia, 20); then Barnabas was from Cyprus, and thus in close touch with Alexandria. He was also a companion of Paul, a fact that may explain the Pauline elements of the thought, in Hebrews, and a Levite possessing an intimate acquaintance with the ceremonial law. All of these characteristics undoubtedly belong to the author of Hebrews also. But it may be asked, Could Barnabas have classified himself with the second generation of Christian believers? And, further, as a Levite, was he not better acquainted with the Hebrew than appears to be the author of Hebrews? Finally, an epistle bearing the name of Barnabas is extant. Antiquity admitted this, whether correctly or not, it is of no consequence. But having admitted one letter, why should it have scrupled about conceding him also the Epistle to the Hebrews? These questions make the claim in behalf of Barnabas a difficult one to establish.

(d) Accordingly, many scholars, (Eichhorn, Ewald, Köstlin, Lipsius, von Soden, Holtzmann, Ménégot, Jülicher, Rendall, Dods, Westcott, A. B. Davidson, Bruce, and Milligan) feel compelled to ascribe the writing to an unknown author of Alexandrian training, if not birth. Bishop Westcott finds in the anonymity of the writing an evidence of the spiritual wealth of the Apostolic age. In any case, the divine authority and canonicity of the epistle are "self-attested and ratified by the illuminated consciousness of the Christian Society, and that apart from any certitude as to the name and identity of the writer."

Helps to the Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Of the older commentaries on Hebrews, Calvin's (In Novum Testamentum Commentarii, Berl. 1838) and Owen's An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, may still be mentioned as full of value. The Epistle has been more recently commented on, and foremost in the list of later works must stand Westcott's Ep. to the Heb. 2nd Ed., London, 1892. Other works of importance are T. C. Edwards, Ep. to the Heb. (in the Expositor's Bible). Lünemann, Handbook to the Ep. to the Heb. (in Meyer's Commentary, Eng. Tr. Edinb. 1882). Rendall, The Ep. to the Heb. in Greek, London, 1883, and The Ep. to the Heb. in Eng. 1888. Delitzsch, Com. on the Ep. to the Heb. (Eng. tr. 1868). A. B. Davidson (in Hand-

Of commentaries in the German language, Bleek, Der Brief an die Hebr. Berl. 1828-1840, still holds a prominent place. In addition we may name Ewald's (Götting, 1870), Holtzheuer (Berl. 1883), Keil's (Leip. 1885), Kurtz (Mitau, 1869), Schaefer's (Catholic; Münster, 1893). Weiss, (Götting, 1888). On the theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Riehm's Der Lehrbegriff des Hebraerbriefes, in German. brary treatment were ready to their hand in such lyric fragments as the matchless Song of Deborah, or the poetic utterances of King David (2 Sam. i:19-27), in the popular stories about the heroes and leaders of the nation, and in the abundant records of one kind and another, traditional, legal and annalistic, which they seem to have preserved.

There is good reason for thinking that attempts had been made in David's time, and even earlier, to gather up these materials and to unify them into literary wholes. The book of Jasher "the Excellent" (Josh. x:13; 2 Sam. i:18) and the book of the Wars of Jehovah (Num. xxi:14) were collections of popular poetry. The works referred to in 1 Chron. xxix:29 indicate that minor histories were attempted. The structure of such books as Leviticus or Exodus indicates that the Mosaic enactments existed in subordinate

HEBREWS, LITERATURE OF THE.

1. Its Beginning. The Hebrews have held a place in the history of nations since about 1000 B. C. Prior to David's time the conditions of life with which the people struggled were such as to preclude any real unity of action or thinking and any self-developed activity outside of the arts of war, agriculture or government. The most important steps toward a real literature were taken when the tribes were welded into a united nation under David, and the prophetic and priestly orders became definite and important factors in its development. These organized bodies became in Palestine, as they were in Babylonia and elsewhere, a class with the motive impulses and ideals and with the leisure essential to the development of a national literature. Materials for lit-groupings. Nevertheless it seems clear that these productions were only preparatory. The distinctive literary development of the Hebrew nation was in the interest of ideas which did not get hold of the national mind much earlier than the eighth and ninth century B. C., the age of the great historians and of the notable quartet of prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Micah. Under the stimulus of these brilliant thinkers, the accumulated records and memories of the past were utilized to illustrate to the nation the significance of its history.

2. External Influences. The Hebrews were so situated as to make a literary development natural. They belonged to the Semitic family of nations, each one of which under the proper conditions has developed a literature. They spoke a language closely related to that of the Babylonians and Assyrians. Right across the center of their territory passed the stream of international traffic between the two great centers of culture and commerce in that day, the Tigris-Eu-pirates basin and the valley of the Nile. Thus the more active minds among the Hebrews were kept in close touch with the problems and achievements of the western Asiatic world. The Tel-el-Amarna Tablets give evidence that the culture of Babylonia was paramount in Syria—Palestine in the fifteenth century B. C. and earlier. During the centuries that followed this influence was less direct, but still appreciable. About 600 B. C., during the Great Captivity, when the Hebrews were compelled to make their homes in Babylonia for half a century, a second great impulse to literary productiveness was received.

3. Classification. To separate Hebrew literature into periods of development is unsatisfactory. A less usual but more practical classification will be by three artificial groupings, the literature preserved in the Hebrew or English Old Testament, the extra-canonical literature and the Rabbinic literature.

The Old Testament fairly represents the choicest productions of the Hebrew mind down to about the second century B. C. The Great Captivity (B. C. 586-538) made an alteration in the circumstances of the nation for the next four hundred years, which marked the literature. In Hebrew literature, however, form is so fully subordinated to idea that the unity of Biblical literature is far more marked than its diversity. We can only treat the Old Testament as a literary whole.

The activity of the Hebrew mind did not cease with the completion of the Canon. Numberless writings were put forth between the second century B. C. and the corresponding date of our era. Many of these are worthy of mention.

A peculiar development of Judaism is represented by the Targums, the Mishna and the Talmud, which will require brief attention.

4. Biblical Literature. The literature preserved in the Old Testament constitutes the most representative section of Hebrew literature. It is the choicest portion of a literary output of considerable extent through many centuries. Its collections of psalms and proverbs are anthologies which include specimens, centuries apart in time of origin. Its histories have grown out of earlier histories. Its wisdom writings are masterpieces in their class. Owing to this gradual selection of the fittest, the literature of the Bible is remarkable for its permanent and satisfying character. It rewards examination from the purely literary point of view.

(1) The Historical Writings of the Old Testament are thirteen in number. The Biblical histories are exactly like modern histories, in that they are compilations, made from earlier historical sources long after the date represented by those sources and intended to instruct the people of the compiler's day. They differ from modern histories in that instead of sketching the rise and progress of a people they illustrate an idea. They are reviews of religious progress, histories of Divine Providence. To effect this there is large use of the historic story, which Moulton calls the "epical style" of narrative. The story of Joseph is such a prose epic; the narrative of Elijah is another; the story of Balaam mingles prose, epic and verse. They do more than store the mind; they touch the imagination and the emotions. One of the finest examples of Hebrew history is the book of First Samuel. One who follows closely its treatment of the period of Saul's reign will notice that the historical facts as such are rapidly passed over, the personal descriptions are mere sketches, stress is laid on crises and the way in which Jehovah met them by raising up the right man at the proper time and on his care of these agents. Thus the whole book becomes a sermon on God's providential care for Israel. At the same time it is a model of terse, instructive narrative.

Closely allied to this type of history is the partly imaginative narrative represented by the books of Ruth or Esther or Jonah. In these the historical or prophetic purpose is attained more strikingly by the skillful use of the novelist's art. The prologue of the Book of Job illustrates this. The story is so skillfully told that we are as certain of Job's innocence as of his unexampled calamities.

(2) Old Testament Poetry is peculiar. We may feel its charm without understanding the secret of it. Only the Hebrew student can catch some of its minor devices, such as assonance, alliteration and the alphabetical acrostic. The English reader may, however, catch the most distinctive element of form, that symmetrical arrangement of clauses in a verse called parallelism. Compare Job xxxix: 19-25 or Job xxviii, passages which owe their rhythmic effect to this cause. The various poetical forms were well understood by the Hebrews. The Song of Deborah (Judges v) or the Song of Moses (Exod. xv) are notable examples of the ode. The book of Lamentations, when properly rendered, illustrates the elegiac rhythm, a long line followed by a short one. This and other peculiarities are obscured by the method of printing followed in the English Bible. The Psalter is a great storehouse of lyrics, elegies, odes and corresponding literary forms.

(3) The Wisdom or Philosophical writings of the Hebrews are represented by Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs. Their variety is such as to indicate that the Hebrews loved to dwell on the problems of life and developed a rich literature of reflection, which made free use of literary devices. The simple proverb, the proverb cluster (Prov. xxv:2-7), the connected composition or essay on some theme (Eccles. iii: 1; iv:8); the dramatic dialogue as in the Book of Job; the dramatic monologue (Proverbs viii)—all are used with great skill and to good effect.

The most distinctive class of writings in the Old Testament are those which we call Prophetic. No other national literature contains their equivalent. They owe their preservation primarily to their contents rather than their form. They are sermons. The prophetic writings embody a variety of literary forms, for the prophets were men of extraordinary versatility, who pressed their messages home with consummate skill. Notice the graphic manner in which Joel describes the devastation of his land and the onset of the locust army on the Day of Jehovah, the magnificent oration or rhapsody of Isaiah on Jehovah's Rod and Reign (xi:4), the stirring ode of judgment in Habakkuk iii. These writings owe not a little of their impressiveness to the fact that, while they preserve the vigor and directness of an address, they are actually carefully edited abstracts of the utterances of a prophet during a considerable period of time. Comp. Jer. xxv:3-13, where the "book" represents about ten chapters.

5. The Special Value of Biblical Literature. Its superiority over contemporary ancient literature can hardly be disputed. This is not because it is rich in literary forms, not because it is distinctively religious in its tone, but because of its lack of trivialness, the high plane of the motives which inspired it, the unselfish spirit which breathes throughout it, and the noble ideals to which it gives expression. It therefore becomes by human as well as divine right the literature of culture, of inspiration and of life.

6. The Extra-Canonical and Rabbinic Literature. The extra-canonical literature was copious. Most of the works available for us are those which were admitted into the Greek Old Testament and have come down to us as "Apocrypha." They include such histories as First and Second Maccabees, such stories as Judith, Tobit and First Esdras, such wisdom writings as Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon, such varied productions as the Psalter of the Pharisees or the book of Enoch or of Baruch. Some of these were written in Greek, but they are truly Hebraistic and belong to an account of Hebrew literature. With one or two exceptions they are distinctly below the literary level of the biblical books.

By the second century A.D. the lines had been closely drawn between Judaism and Christianity. Each followed a distinct development. Judaism dropped out of touch with the world and gave itself, through its great scholars, to a gathering up in exact form of the established paraphrasings of the Hebrew of the Old Testament into the spoken Aramaic, thus producing the Targums, and of the decisions of the older Rabbis on subjects of religious importance, thus developing the chapters of the Mishna. The Talmud is not easily described. One might call it a vast storehouse of tradition, interpretation, stories, discussions, meditations—a collection containing much rubbish along with considerable material of value. It is a cyclopedia in all but arrangement; it is a literature only in measurement. It marks the close of the literary activity of the ancient Hebrews.

HEBREWS, RELIGION OF THE (hē'brūs ré-lj'ín).

(1) The Pre-Mosaic Period. (1) The ancient Hebrews belonged to the Semitic group of nations, having its original home in northern Arabia, from which region migrations into the Mesopotamian valley formed the eastern branch, including the Babylonians and Assyrians. From Mesopotamia came the northern Semites or Arameans, and the western Semites, including the Phœnicians, Canaanites and Hebrews. Of these westward migrations, that of the Hebrews, was among the latest, including, as it did, clans that later broke off into separate nations, such as Moab, Ammon and Edom. The memorials of Hebrew history and religion that have been preserved are found in the Old Testament. The books composing that collection are of varying dates, from the eighth to the second centuries B. C. But several of them contain documents much older. Traditions and legends of the past are incorporated, and the effort is made by later writers to reconstruct the origins of the nation, as well as the early history of the world. But the purpose of these narratives is rather religious than historical. The materials are chosen seemingly with the object of illustrating the growth of the religion, and not of giving a connected recital of the national experiences. It therefore becomes a matter of difficulty to discover the religious character of the earliest period, colored as it is by the ideas of the later days when the narratives received their present form. But this material deals with the earliest traditions of the race in a spirit marked by an earnestness and sobriety in striking contrast with similar accounts produced by other nations. (2) The Hebrew people brought with them from their earlier home in the east the religious conceptions common to the Semitic races, and these appear to some extent in the narratives of the early period, though modified and given other meanings by later writers. Yet from the first a new force was operating in this national history. That peculiar factor which distinguished Israel from other nations appeared early, even before the days of Moses. Those Semitic elements which this people had in common with its neighbors were used, modified, or eliminated in the development of that particular type of religion which the Old Testament alone discloses. Two processes were at work: the natural growth of religious ideas, as among other nations, and the providential evolution of those unique elements whose fuller disclosure appears in Christianity. (3) Studied in the light of their heredity and environment, the Hebrews exhibit religious characteristics in striking contrast to those of their ancestors or the kindred tribes about them. But those peculiar forces make their appearance but slowly, and under the leadership of rare men. These men gave to the national life its chief significance. There is always a temptation, however, to observe only the unique features of Israel's religious life and to forget the thorough Semitism of this people and the features of its earliest cult, which is possessed in common with the other races of the Semitic family. These nations were polytheists, offered sacrifices, even human sacrifices, practiced circumcision, to some extent at least, erected sanctuaries for their gods, believed that certain places were sacred to the gods, had religious festivals like the Sabbath and other sacred seasons, used images in worship or as family teraphim, and believed in a din underworld into which the dead descended. Many, perhaps it may be said all, of these features are exhibited by the earliest Hebrew religion, and some continue and are developed, while others fall quite out of sight. But even from the earliest beginnings of the national life there is a difference between Israel and the rest. This is most strikingly illustrated in the conceptions of deity held by this people. From this the higher ethical character of the nation arose. The earliest ideas may have been polytheistic, as the plural form of the word Elohim (God) hints, and there may appear rare indications of such an idea (Gen. iii:22), but they are slight. There are no traces of a Hebrew pantheon. This is the more surprising when it is observed that the neighboring and kindred tribes of Edom, Ammon, and Moab, descended indeed from the traditional ancestors of the Hebrews, were polytheists. In the case of Moab the evidence is found in the mention of at least two gods on the celebrated "Moabite Stone" of King Mesha. But while the worship of more than one god is not traceable in the religion of Israel, that religion is not, in its earlier stages, a pure monotheism, but rather monolatry, i. e., the worship of a national God for Israel, while admitting the existence of other gods for other nations (Judg. xi:24; 1 Sam. xxvi:19). There are certain interesting characteristics of the Hebrew idea of God which mark the being they worshiped as quite different from the gods of the nations about them. He had no goddess or consort, nor was his worship attended by any of those degrading rites connected so largely with the worship of goddesses. Fire was his symbol (Ex. iii:4; Judg. xiii:20; 2 Kings i:10). He could be seen only with peril to the beholder (Judg. xiii:22), and sacred places and objects could be approached only with danger (1 Sam. vi:19; 2 Sam. vi:6 sq.; Ex. xix:21 sq.). He led his people in war (Ex. xv:3), and their achievements in battle were his own (Num. xxi:14), while cities taken in his name and devoted to him were destroyed. In these and other elements of the faith are discerned the harsher and fiercer characteristics of the age. Righteousness was, however, the dominant feature of his nature, and to this belief much of the high ethical tone of the Hebrew religion is to be traced. (4) Abraham is the traditional ancestor of this people, and the one to whom the earliest disclosures of the divine character are made. Whatever the legendary nature of the traditions regarding this man, there can be little doubt of his reality and impress upon the national life. Faith in God is his motive. He comes westward to a new land in obedience to a divine impulse (Gen. xii:1 sq.). He erects altars wherever he stops (Gen. xii:8; xiii:4), and constantly lives in communion with God. He is even willing to offer his son in sacrifice (Gen. xxii), according to the custom of his day, but is forbidden to carry out his purpose, and thus the ban is placed on the practice, though it does not disappear. The patriarchs whom the early traditions introduce to us are not demigods, but men—men of very imperfect character, like Abraham and Jacob, and typical sheiks of the Orient, whose counterparts might be found there to this day, but, withal, men with a moral purpose, if we may trust the outlines of their lives, a purpose never obscured in Abraham's case, gradually attained in that of Jacob, and preparing for a fuller disclosure of the divine purpose in later days.

In this period many of the elements of Semitic religion are discovered. Altars were built on hills and under trees, sacrificial meals and sacred festivals were celebrated, circumcision was introduced, and probably abstinence from blood and the taboo of certain kinds of food were practiced. With these went the customs of blood revenge, polygamy, concubinage, and slavery. Images for worship, called teraphim, were not unknown, even in the families of the patriarchs (Gen. xxxi:19), and sacred stones were set up and anointed with oil (Gen. xxxv:14, 15; Josh. iv:20), while certain places were deemed especially sacred, as Hebron, Shechem, the Oak of Moreh, and Beersheba.

(2) The Religion of Moses. (1) After an indefinite period of residence in Canaan, the Hebrew clans moved southward into Egypt, following the leadership of the tribe of Joseph. The monuments mention many migrations of this character into a country that was the granary of the world at the time, but no certain identification of the Hebrews in any inscriptions can be made. A period of prosperity in which the Joseph clan came to prominence was followed by a reversal of policy toward foreigners, and the hardships of servitude were experienced. After a stay of about four centuries, the emancipation of the Hebrews was wrought by a leader named Moses. His first attempt to rouse the nation to action was unsuccessful, and he was compelled to quit the country (Ex. ii:11-15; Acts vii:23-25). He betook himself to the territory of Midian, and entered into alliance with that tribe. After a time the divine impulse came upon him to renew his effort in behalf of his oppressed countrymen. Mount Sinai was the mountain of God, the reputed home of deity (Ex. iii:1-5; xix:2; Judg. v:5), and here Moses was commissioned to undertake the difficult task. He returned to Egypt, and at last succeeded in the plan of deliverance, which was greatly aided by a series of disasters that fell upon Egypt at that time, and which were ever believed by the Hebrews to mark the wrath of God against their oppressors. The departing host made its way toward the friendly land of Midian, and, crossing an arm of the Gulf of Suez at low water, the Egyptian army sent in pursuit was overthrown and destroyed. This deliverance was celebrated in perhaps the oldest fragment of Hebrew literature (Ex. xv), and was forever regarded as the decisive sign of the divine care of the nation.

Moving on to the sacred mountain Sinai, Moses, whose place as a leader had been firmly established by the remarkable experiences of the past, seized the opportunity to lay the foundations of national life by the promulgation of certain institutes of political and religious character suited to the people he was leading. No attempt was made to break with the past (Ex. iii:6; iv:5; vi:2, 3; vii:16). The Hebrews already possessed a religion which differed in no small degree from that of other nations, but in the centuries of serfdom in Egypt much of the patriarchal practice, simple as it was, may have been forgotten. But the people were passing from clan life to nationality. The purpose of Moses was to prepare for a future such as had been foreseen by none of his ancestors. Looking at the work which Moses accomplished for this people, taking them at a time of such utter lack of organization and of such elementary religious ideas; witnessing the lofty character of the ideals which he lifted before them, however little they were realized for centuries, the question naturally rises, What is the explanation of his unique personality and his conceptions of God and righteousness, so greatly in contrast with the philosophy of the Egyptian priesthood and the barbarism and immorality of the common life in his day? The response is to be found alone in that divine choice of this nation, not for its own sake, but for the disclosure it might make through its history of the divine purposes regarding men. This disclosure could only be made through chosen men intrusted with leadership, and among these one of the most conspicuous is Moses. (2) Our sources tell us that a new name for God sprung up in this period. The indefinite Elohim no longer sufficed to represent the covenant God of the Hebrew people, who had made himself known to their fathers. The new name is Jehovah, or more correctly Jahveh (also written Yahva or Yahway, and pronounced in accordance with the latter form), the living, self-existent (Ex. vi:1-4). Whether this name originated with Moses, or was used in Midian and brought back by him, or was used in his family, as the name of his mother might suggest (Ex. vi:20), or in the tribe of Joseph, as Joshua (Je-Hoshua) might argue, in any case the name first appears at the time of Moses' return from Midian, and was connected in Hebrew traditions with an epiphany at Sinai. The name continued to be employed to the close of the Old Testament literature. It is not claimed as yet that Jahveh is the only God, but that he alone must be worshiped by Israel. Other nations may have their deities, but the Hebrews must have no god beside Jahveh. It will be seen that it is a far cry from this idea of monotheism to the pure monotheism of the post-exilic period; but the religious education of Israel was a long and painful process, and one thing had to be learned at a time. (3) The code of laws promulgated by Moses (Ex. xx:23, 34) dealt with the situation in which Israel found itself in the period of its unsettled life, and served as the basis of all the legislation that grew up in later times. So largely was the Mosaic spirit preserved and continued in all the legislative material ever produced by Israel that the phrase, "The Law of Moses" was never felt to be a misnomer in describing the body of statutes, the most of which, as a matter of fact, came into existence centuries subsequent to the time of Moses. The first code, called the Book of the Covenant (Ex. xx:23, 34), and including the Decalogue in its primitive form, is a striking interpretation of the character of Jahveh, the national God. There is little in common with either the nature-worship of the times or the speculative character of the Egyptian religion, from which it might be supposed leading elements would be drawn. Jahveh is righteous and holy, and he demands these characteristics in his people. There is an utter lack of the sensuous elements of other religions. No images are to be employed. Altars of earth at places selected furnish a sufficient means of worship. But Jahveh alone must be the object of this service. The element of sternness, not to say fierceness, which the Hebrews associated with the character of God, appears. Jahveh is capable of fierce wrath when his will is not honored (Ex. xxii:23, 24; xxxiv:7), and he will not lightly overlook transgression (xxiii:21). His jealousy of other gods who may receive the affection of his people is carried to the extent of forbidding any covenant with other nations, and of commanding the total destruction of all symbols of worship not connected with the national cult (Ex. xxxiv:12-16). The nations are to be driven out before Israel (Ex. xxiii:22-24). This stern spirit appears in certain of the laws regulating social life. The lex talionis is to be enforced (Ex. xxi:24). The man who kills another, or smites or curses his father or mother, is to be put to death. Yet there is a note of great tenderness in the laws of this primitive code. Care for the life and honor of servants, mitigation of the severities of the blood feud, care for the property and welfare of all the community, kind treatment of strangers, even help to an enemy in distress, are enforced. The seventh day and year are made sacred, and three annual religious feasts are instituted. The standard of morality and worship is high for the age. Indeed, it was the first serious attempt to unite morality with religion. Justice and purity, as elements in the divine character, were demanded of the people; and if there was a sternness and harshness in the character of Jahveh which seems incompatible with a moralized idea of deity, they might easily be found to co-exist in the mind of a teacher like Moses, with the profound conviction that God is sternly just and demands justice and holiness in his followers. (4) In providing for the future of the nation Moses made use of those ancestral religious elements which commended themselves to his divinely illumined judgment. Circumcision, altar sacrifice, the sabbatic periods, the fundamental laws of morality were all accepted as sanctioned by Jahveh. With them certain features in the Egyptian and Midianitish religions were incorporated, such as the idea of the sanctuary and sacred palladium or ark, the priesthood, and the Urim and Thummim. Moses established a tent of meeting at Kadesh, and the function of priestly service he assigned to his own tribe of Levi. This office of priest and that of judge he probably derived from the practice he had observed in Midian (Ex. xviii:1, 17-25). The priesthood was much more than a mere order of sacrificers. The latter function was not confined to them till a much later period. Kings, prophets, and common citizens had the right of sacrifice (Judg. vi:24-26; xiii:19; 1 Sam. xiv:34, 35; 2 Sam. vi:17, 18; 1 Kings xviii). The priests were the spiritual teachers and leaders of the nation, and the interpreters of the will of God. They had a Torah, or law, which grew up around the Decalogue and the Book of the Covenant given by Moses. This Torah grew as experience widened the application of the primitive code. Moses' actual contribution to the literature of Israel was probably small. Jesus, the founder of Christianity, wrote nothing. Nevertheless, Moses stands as the most striking figure of the early history, a figure so important and lofty that his influence is plainly traced throughout all the subsequent history as the great prophet and spiritual leader, the organizer of Israel's national life.

(3) The Conquest and the Judges. (1) About the year 1250 B. C. the Hebrew nation, having spent some time in the less desirable regions to the south and east of the Dead Sea, began their entrance and conquest of Canaan. The experiences of the desert had developed the qualities of national life and prepared a generation of warriors. After the conquest of the east-Jordan districts the river was crossed and the serious business of occupying the rich lands to the west was undertaken. Canaan was ever the coveted goal of the desert tribes, and Israel was neither the first nor last of the nations that attempted its possession. The inhabitants already represented a variety of elements, the result of successive inroads, and against these older and higher civilizations Israel prepared to do battle. The success with which this purpose was attained was the result, in no small degree, of the hardships of the desert, which had toughened the national fiber, and of the personality and work of Moses, who had given something of form and national spirit to the band of refugees who had so recently escaped Egyptian serfdom. In a series of rapid and aggressive campaigns, under the leadership of Joshua, some of the most important cities were taken, and the united opposition of the Canaanites was broken (Josh. vi:12-27; viii:10-29; x:11), while a portion of the population succeeded in making terms with the invaders (Josh. ix:11-19). It is evident, however, that scarcely more than a foothold was secured at the time, and that the only thing needed to inspire the native population to renewed hostilities was the removal of Joshua and the decay of the strong military force organized under his hand. Much of the land was not really conquered (Josh. xiii:1-6). The best that could be done was to secure a possession in the land and wait for greater strength. But this period was yet far ahead. The strong cities were in Canaanite hands, and for the most part the Israelites were obliged to content themselves with the smaller towns and open country. War was carried on for many years, but with varying success (Judg. i), and not infrequently the people were reduced to desperate straits (Judg. iv:3; vi:3 sq.). The tribes were not united. Each was seeking to hold its own ground. Moreover, between the northern tribes, at whose head, in the days when any united action was attempted, stood the strong tribe of Ephraim, and the southern tribes, the most powerful of which was Judah, there was little common interest, and neither section gave much heed to the welfare of the other. These sectional jealousies often appeared, and culminated in the rupture of the nation at the close of Solomon's reign.

(2) In all this series of national experiences the belief in Jahveh as the god of the people is never obscured. It was he who brought them into the land, after the wanderings in the desert (Josh. iii:5-7; he gave directions for the campaigns (Josh. i:1-9), and under his leadership cities were taken and battles won. Even the laws of nature were believed to have been set aside in answer to appeals to him on one memorable occasion (Josh. x:12-14), and the inhabitants of conquered places were devoted to destruction in his honor by the imposition of the herem or ban (Josh. vi:18-21; viii:21-29), the breaking of which, even by one individual, might cause disaster to the army and bring upon the offender and his family the ban itself (Josh. vii). Soon after the arrival in Canaan, Gilgal was selected as a sacred camp, and there circumcision and the keeping of the Passover feast were enjoined (Josh. iv:19; v:12).

(3) The period that followed the first tide of warfare was one of retrogression and decline, both in organization and religion. The excitement of the events connected with the last years of Moses and the leadership of Joshua was followed by a reaction. The age of these two leaders was full of stirring experiences that kept the people measurably united and keyed up to high enthusiasm for their national honor and their God. The loosing of ties incident to the removal of competent leadership permitted much disorder that would have been impossible before. The people, unable to conquer the inhabitants of the country, settled down on friendly terms with them, and soon, as a matter of course, adopted from them many of their religious and social customs, and a fairly close intimacy was preserved for generations. The worship of Baal and his consort Astarte, Phœnician deities, was more or less prevalent in Canaan, and soon the Israelites were tainted with this practice. Baal was the god of fire, and his worship was attended with fire offerings, in which the sacrifice of children had a frequent part. Each town where the worship prevailed had its sanctuary and image of Baal, and these local Baals or Baalim were a constant temptation to Israel. In connection with the Baal sanctuary there was usually a grove, tree, pillar, or obelisk sacred to Astarte or Ashera (plural Ashtaroth), whose seductive and licentious cult proved the most debasing influence of the age.

(4) That the Israelites were often led away into this worship and that of other gods there is abundant evidence, as well as that later writers saw in this fact ample explanation of the frequent calamities which overtook the nation (Judg. ii:11-19; iii:7, 8; vi:1-28; viii:33; x:6, 7, etc.). Moreover, even where the worship of Jahveh was retained, the elements of the Baal worship were mixed with it. High places like Bethel, Beer-sheba, Shechem, Hebron, Gilgal, Penuel, Ramah, and Mizpeh were resorted to as sacred. Children were named for Baal even in families where Jahveh was worshiped (see JERUBBAAL), and it is not unlikely that the word Baal, i. e., "lord," may have been applied to Jahveh through custom. Micah, the Danite, a worshiper of Jahveh, uses an ephod and a teraph which the writer of the narrative explains as images, the one graven and the other molten, representing probably Jahveh and the dead ancestor of the family, as was usually the case with teraphim (Judg. xvii:1-6). Gideon is reproached for making an image (ephod) with the golden spoil of battle, which was used as an object of worship (Judg. viii:24-27). The Danites carried off these same images and set up one in their new sanctuary at upper Dan (Judg. xviii:14-31). At the same time it must be noted that the pure imageless worship of Jahveh was carried on at Shiloh, where the tent of meeting, with its ancient ark and its Levitical priesthood, was established after their removal from Gilgal (Josh. xviii:1, sq.; 1 Sam. i:3). The leadership of Jahveh was recognized, and this was especially the case in times of war. In peace there might be relapses into the seductive cult of their neighbors, but when a war was to be waged Jahveh alone was the God of Israel (Judg. i:19, 22; iv:6, 15). The Song of Deborah, one of the oldest fragments of the national literature (Judg. v), bears witness to the lofty religious enthusiasm of the people on occasion. Indeed such enthusiasm reveals the power of the true religion manifesting itself in the midst of such unfavorable conditions; and in its power to inspire high ideals, not alone of heroism, but of moral conduct, lay the supremacy of this faith.

The principle of monolatry is recognized. Jahveh is the God of Israel, and should alone be worshiped by his people; but outside of this nation other gods have sway, and bring their people into possession of their territories, as in the case of Chemash and the Ammonites (Judg. xi:24).

(5) It was an age of contradictions. Cruelty, violence, feuds, license in conduct, polygamy and deceit were permitted. Yet along with these go hospitality, even at the risk of life, and vengeance taken on an inhospitable city; gentleness toward neighbors and friends, a forgiving spirit toward a runaway wife, love for the customs and ideas of Israel. It is, in a word, an age in which the normal characteristics of simple and joyous life appear. However late the Book of Ruth may be, the picture which it gives of these times seems truthful and lifelike, and it is like a charming glimpse into the inner life of the people, whose career at first glance seems to be marked at this time only by the elements of storm and struggle.

(6) It has been said that it was a period of retrogression; yet it was also a period of progress. While the enthusiastic spirit of the days of Moses and Joshua had passed away, there were influences at work preparing for better things. The work of the Judges, disconnected and transient as it seemed, prepared the people for the closer organization of the monarchy. The character and ideals of Jahveh as the true God were more firmly fixed in the heart of the people. It was one of those periods of silence when energies are maturing for a larger activity ahead. Such times are ever the birth-hours of great forces. With much that was barbarous and debased there was also much that was noble and inspiring. Taken all in all, it may be said that real progress was made under the Judges, and this progress came to its full disclosure under the ministry of Samuel, the last of the Judges.

(4) Samuel, David, and Solomon. (1) Under the leadership of Samuel the nation passed from the anarchy and confusion of the period of the Judges to the organization and order of the days of David. Samuel was as prophet a worthy successor to Moses; and in him it seems that the promise of a line of prophets, which may be as early as the time of Moses, was beginning to be fulfilled (Deut. xviii:15). The picture of worship at the time he first appears is simple and natural, yet corrupted by the vicious practices of the priests in office. The tent in which the ark was kept at Shiloh was lighted at night by a lamp, and in it slept the priest and his attendants (1 Sam. iii:1-3). Samuel, though not of the tribe of Levi, but of Ephraim (1 Sam. i:1), was taken into the tabernacle service and ministered often throughout his life in priestly offices, as did others of non-Levitical families (Judg. xvii:1, 5; 2 Sam. viii:18, R. V.). After the death of Eli, the priest in office, and the temporary loss of the ark, Samuel undertook the leadership of Israel, and for a score of years worked silently toward the realization of national ideas. Little appreciated at first, and regarded as a mere clairvoyant whose advice might be sought by those in trouble (1 Sam. ix:6-9), he came at length to be regarded as the real leader of the people. Perhaps the sincerest compliment ever paid him was the popular demand for a king, which indicated the sense of unity, solidarity and national pride fostered by him, so foreign to the days of the Judges. Whatever may have been the reluctance felt by Samuel, as set down in one of our sources

(1 Sam. viii:6), the step was a wise one, and Saul, whatever his limitations, served to set the type of royalty, tried unsuccessfully and for but a brief period in the days of Gideon and his son Abimelech (Judg. viii:22, 23; ix:6).

(2) It was a period of transition. The old and the new were meeting, and Saul was not equal to the emergency. Probably few men would have been. But above the tall figure of the king towers evermore Samuel, the prophet of the Lord. His work is no mere political revolution. It was far more a religious reformation. From his home in Ramah he went on visits, almost pastoral in their character, to places of ancestral sacredness, like Gilgal, Mizpeh, Bethlehem and Bethel, where sacrificial feasts were held and the sanctions of the true faith laid upon the hearts of the people (1 Sam. vii:5, 9; x:8; xvi:4, 5). No use was made of the ark in this time. It remained quietly at Kirjath Jearim. The members of the tribe of Levi found livings wherever they might, some as private or tribal priests, as in the case of the grandson of Moses (Judg. xviii:30, R. V.). In connection with the work of Samuel we first learn of the Schools of the Prophets. These companies of men present little that is attractive at first. They seem to have been dervish-like groups of men devoted to the national God, but closely resembling the similar order of men in the service of Baal, of whom we catch a glimpse at a later time (1 Kings xvii:22-29). In Israel the bands of prophets in the early days of Samuel were of this character, made up of enthusiasts who went about the country rousing themselves to a high pitch of ecstasy by means of the wild music of the time, and no doubt preaching the religion of Jahveh in the fierce spirit of the age. In the circle of such "prophesying" the bystander might be seized with the same enthusiasm, utter similar words, and fall unconscious on the ground; and these manifestations were believed to be divinely induced (1 Sam. x:5-13; xix:18-24). Nothing speaks more eloquently for the wisdom of Samuel than the fact that with all his loftiness of purpose he did not despise the good these bands of men might accomplish, repulsive as might be their practices. He even identified himself with them in a measure, and by assuming their leadership (1 Sam. xix:20) he gradually made of them organizations effective in the propagation of the saner and loftier conceptions of Jahveh and his religion, which appeared in his own work and that of his successors. Such prophets as Elijah and Elisha in later days made large use of the Schools of the Prophets. There was, to be sure, an element of fanaticism and fierce zeal in Samuel's character, as is shown by his command to Saul to exterminate the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv:1-3), and his killing of Agag, their king, with his own hands (1 Sam. xv:32, 33), in both of which acts he believed himself fulfilling the divine will. But these are rare blemishes in a splendid career of many years, in one of the most critical periods of the history. No loftier prophetic note was ever struck than that uttered in his famous words, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. xv:22).

Under divine direction he raised up Saul, and then rejected him from the kingship, and the dark close of the gigantic king's career only makes the character of the great prophet more impressive by contrast. His reforms underlay the throne of David. New disclosures of divine truth had come through him, and the vision of God and righteousness was enlarged.

(3) David's contribution to the religious thought of his times is somewhat problematical, and the solution of the problem depends upon the amount of Psalm material we may assign him. Depending alone on the records of his life, however embellished by later writers, we discover him to have been a man marked by strikingly variant qualities. His unfavorable traits are in ample evidence. Among them are found duplicity (1 Sam. xxi:2), a spirit of revenge and cruelty in war (1 Sam. xxx:17; 2 Sam. viii:2; xii:29-31), and his sin with Bathsheba (2 Sam. xi), which wrought such havoc in his family. These were the faults of his age, and he must be judged by its standards, not those of our own day. Yet he was brave, generous (1 Sam. xxiv:1-16; xxvi:5-9), and intent upon the establishment of religion in his capital. He brought up the ark, which had lain in obscurity through the reign of Saul, and established it in Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi). Moreover, he honored Nathan the prophet, and made instant confession of his sin upon that prophet's rebuke (2 Sam. xii:1-10). If the fifty-first Psalm may be considered Davidic, we have in that beautiful utterance, which has become the world's confessional, another proof of his repentance.

(4) There is abundant proof of superstition and imperfect religious ideas in this time. Saul gave to his children names compounded with Baal. A teraph was owned by Michal, his daughter, David's wife (1 Sam. xix:13). Saul, though he had rigorously enforced the law against witchcraft, consulted a necromancer in his last distress (1 Sam. xxviii). An accident on the journey of the ark to Jerusalem was interpreted as a sign of divine wrath (2 Sam. vi:6, 7). In a time of continued drought David was informed that the reason lay in an injustice done the city of Gibeon by Saul, and the king, in response to a demand made by the citizens of that place, hung seven of Saul's descendants (2 Sam. xxi:1-14). The belief that the divine sanction could be given to such an atrocity marks a degree of superstition above which even David did not rise.

(5) David was a devoted follower of Jahveh. There could be no suspicion of idolatry in his nature. The reverence paid to the prophet Nathan shows that his office was held in higher honor than even the kingship. Levitical priests were established by the king at the sanctuary in Jerusalem, though he performed their functions at times and made his sons priests (2 Sam. vi:12-14; 2 Sam. viii:18, R. V.) David's sincere love for God and desire to promote religious ideals cannot be questioned. If he as a prophet misjudged in some degree the divine character, it is only an added proof of the gradual disclosure of God's nature through the centuries. The fiercer and darker elements inherited from the past were slow to disappear. But little by little the larger vision came. David's ambition to build a costly temple to Jahveh was not gratified. Approved at first by Nathan, it was later discouraged with reasons that must have satisfied the king, but back of which there could hardly fail to lie the fear in the prophet's mind that the inauguration of the more costly ritual of such a building as David had in mind would work disaster to the simpler faith of which Samuel had been the exponent.

(6) Solomon had no such scruples. The work committed to him by his father was pushed with vigor, and soon the temple was complete in all its beauty, and its ritual inaugurated upon a most elaborate scale. One need not question the sincerity of the king. A most favorable view is given us of his early years and the happy choice he made (1 Kings iii:4, 14). Yet it is easy to see that the result of the temple cult was the secularization of religion. The building and its surroundings became one of the sights of the kingdom. The enormous sacrifices (1 Kings viii:5) emphasized the external elements of the religion, but the essentials were too largely disregarded. Very soon the same spirit of ostentation led him to erect shrines to other gods in his capital, under the influence of his foreign wives, and the prophets who saw deepest into the situation perceived that drastic measures alone could remedy the evil case. The prophets were neglected and the priests were elevated in Solomon's reign. There must be a change or the true faith would suffer beyond remedy. The older sanctuaries were being forgotten. The tendency was to substitute an expensive ritual in one place for righteousness everywhere. Samuel's words were being forgotten: "To obey is better than sacrifice." If nothing else could avail, the pride of king and people must be humbled, and the secularization of the nation by commerce and conquest must cease. The only question was when the decisive blow should be struck. The death of Solomon and the elevation of his son Rehoboam furnished the occasion.

(5) Religion In the Kingdom of Israel.

(1) Ahijah of Shiloh was at the moment of Rehoboam's coronation the leader of the prophetic party. He had already set himself to the work of fomenting rebellion, and had opened his plans to a young officer of Solomon's building force—Jeroboam, the son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim. Promising him success in his efforts, Ahijah had induced him to take up arms against the king (1 Kings xi:26-40); but the first attempt was not successful, and Jeroboam was obliged to take refuge in Egypt. Returning, however, in answer to the summons of his friends at the death of Solomon, he placed himself at the head of the malcontents from the northern tribes, who demanded lighter taxation (1 Kings xii:1-20). The request was refused, and the breach between the two sections, which had always been apparent, was now widened into a chasm that was never closed, by the election of Jeroboam to the kingship of the northern tribes. Much was naturally expected of the new king by the prophets who had been his advisers in the important steps already taken. But statecraft was stronger than religion in Jeroboam's character, and the prophets were bitterly disappointed. Fearing that the old sanctuaries would not be attractive enough to keep his people away from the new temple at the capital of his rival, he organized two sanctuaries at the extremes of his kingdom, Bethel and Dan, and, instead of the imageless worship which had been the only officially recognized order of things hitherto, he set up two images of Jahveh in the form of bulls (1 Kings xii:26-33). The representation of deity in this manner was not new. As the symbol of strength and creative power the bull was regarded as sacred in Egypt and among other nations; and perhaps in remembrance of Egyptian customs, the Israelites once before fell into the practice (Exod. xxxii:1-6). It is to be noticed that in neither case was Jahveh set aside as the national God. It was simply an effort to gratify the craving for a visible symbol of deity, a craving which had manifested itself in the use of images in previous periods, but against which the purer idealism of prophets like Moses and Samuel had set itself like a flint. With this reversion to a lower type of religion came other departures from the form of worship recognized in the period, such as the appointment of non-Levit-ical priests and the designation of other feasts than those already celebrated.

(2) The prophets were always the advocates of the policy of national seclusion. All that tended to bring Israel into contact with other nations, whether war or commerce, met with their disapproval. The secret of this feeling was their fear of foreign religious ideas gaining a foothold by such means. To kings like Solomon, intent upon the enrichment of his realm, this seemed a narrow policy. National prosperity was to be attained only through friendly relations with other peoples, and to this end alliances by marriage were secured with foreign courts. But the purity of the religion of Jahveh was dependent upon insulation until it should have time to take firmer hold on the people. The two principles are admirably represented by Ahab and Elijah. The former reigned over Israel from 875 to 853 B. C. He entered into alliance with Ethbaal of Sidon, and married his daughter Jezebel, giving her religion, the worship of Baal and Astarte, official sanction beside the religion of Jahveh, in his capital, Samaria (1 Kings xvi:29-34), the prophets of Astarte being supported by the queen (1 Kings xviii:19). While it is improbable that Ahab went so far as to renounce the faith of his nation, yet the worshipers, and especially the prophets, of Jahveh were subjected to ill-treatment and, perhaps, actual persecution (1 Kings xviii:3, 4). Under the favor of the court the foreign cult made rapid progress, till it might have seemed that the whole nation had been swept away by the seductive Phœnician worship (1 Kings xix:14).

(3) But the counter-movement came. Its center was in the prophetic circle, and its leader was Elijah. His first effort at reformation was only partially successful (1 Kings xviii:19), and he learned that abrupt and bloody methods were not always wisest (1 Kings xix:11, 12). The prophets of Baal had been slaughtered, but the queen remained. His next plan was a change of rulers (1 Kings xix:15, 16), and this was accomplished shortly after (2 Kings ix:1), though not till after the close of Elijah's career. This prophet represents the rugged, inflexible character of the prophets of Samuel's type, with the fierce zeal for their faith that would sanction any deed of blood in its behalf (1 Kings xviii:40). His relation and that of his friend Elisha to the prophetic bands is marked (1 Kings xx:35-43; 2 Kings ii:3, 5; vi:1-7; ix:1), and probably these groups of men were capable of great service in behalf of the religion of Israel, which was, as a matter of fact, never so near extirpation as the despondent Elijah at one time thought (1 Kings ix:18). Its vitality was greater than he knew. But doubtless in a very true sense he stood for that reaction which weakened the worship of Baal in the land, and left its final overthrow as an officially recognized worship to the violent and bloody measures of Jehu, who soon came to the throne (2 Kings ix:10). In a true sense, therefore, Elijah, as the champion of justice (1 Kings xxi) and the defender of the faith, was the guardian of Israel, its "chariots and horsemen" (2 Kings ii:12). It is noticeable, however, that he is not reported as protesting against the bull worship of Bethel and Dan; and Jehu, who might be supposed to stand as the royal patron of the prophetic party, is upbraided by the later prophets for following to that extent in the path of Jeroboam (2 Kings x:29-31). Perhaps it was considered a sufficient step to preserve the worship of Jahveh as against that of Baal without so much regard to its character.

(4) It was in the reign of Jeroboam II (781-840 B. C.) that the period of greatest importance for religion in the northern kingdom began. This reign witnessed the work of Amos, and the first part of that of Hosea, the earliest prophets who have left writings. This new phase of prophecy may almost be called a new beginning, for here we are able for the first time to study the materials that reveal the true condition of the kingdom, and exhibit the new tone of the prophetic work. Amos and Hosea are not a new order of men. They recognize the fact that they are continuing the work of others before them (Amos ii:11; iii:7), but the tone of the prophetic ministry is higher and the vision of the divine nature and purpose wider. The Schools of the Prophets remain, but the fierce enthusiasm of the past has given way to a professionalism, which makes preaching a mere source of revenue, and causes a true prophet to shrink from being classed with such men (Amos vii:14). Social and religious conditions are reflected in their writings. There is a growing separation between rich and poor, and the sins that grow out of such conditions are set down (Amos ii:78; iii:12, 15; v:7, 10, 11; vi:4-6). The popular religion is of a low and formal character, and it is hard to tell at times whether the description is that of degraded Jahveh worship, or the heathen customs that have crept in (Amos ii:12; iv:4, sq.; v:21; viii:5). Amos was a native of the Southern Kingdom, and came to Bethel for only a short time (Amos i:1; vii:14). (See AMOS.) Hosea was a resident of the north. (See HOSEA.) The one speaks a message of warning and denunciation of coming judgment; the other, of the love and mercy of God. This lesson has come to him through a tragic experience in his own life which he has come to feel was providential (Hos. i:3). To Amos, Israel is a chosen nation, selected by Jahveh, the universal ruler of the world. But this cannot be ground of pride, but rather strict accountability (ii:11; iii:2, 7). Monotheism is distinctly recognized. Heathen nations are under the government of Jahveh (Amos ii), and are condemned for cruelties that were freely committed by David, while Israel is held even to a higher law than they (i:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; ii:1, 4, 6, 12). Nothing could more plainly mark the growth of prophetic ideals. In a similar manner Hosea denounces the slaughter wrought by Jehu the reformer at Jezreel (i:4). The worthlessness of religious ritual without righteousness is emphasized (Amos v:21-24). The doctrine of divine love preached by Hosea is an immeasurable advance over any previous prophetic message and shows the clearer vision of God now enjoyed. Such ideals were found nowhere else in this period save in this chosen nation. Natural development will not produce an Amos or a Hosea, much less an Isaiah. The divine purpose is the only explanation. Slowly disclosing itself in the lives of men as they were prepared to understand and embody it, the centuries witnessed among the Hebrew people the most remarkable manifestation of moral and spiritual development which history records, a development whose end was not the elevation of one nation alone, but of all the world. After the days of Amos and Hosea, the Northern Kingdom hastened to its fall, and the work of the prophets centered wholly in Jerusalem.

(6) Judah Before the Exile. (1) The religion of Jahveh had always the advantage in Judah after the disruption, for the temple without an image was there, and the regular order of services under the Levitical priesthood went on without interruption, though probably on a much diminished scale, owing to the narrower resources of the state. But the temple never displaced the high places in popular affection till late in this period, and sacrifices were offered to Jahveh both at Jerusalem and at these ancestral sanctuaries. But along with this legitimate worship of the high places, which fell under the ban of disapproval only at a later time, there were darker features of a heathenish character mingled with the provincial worship, such as the use of obelisks, and even sacred prostitution. (See PROSTITUTION, SACRED.) This was the condition in the reign of Rehoboam (B. C. 937-920) (1 Kings xiv:21-24). Asa (B. C. 917-876) abolished the more objectionable features, and destroyed an image of Astarte, which the queen-mother had set up (1 Kings xv:9-14). (See ASA.) With the accession of Jehoram (B. C. 851-843) there came the introduction of the Baal worship from Samaria, through the influence of the queen, Athaliah, a daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. A temple was built to Baal, and his images and shrines were set up in many places. A check was given to this cult by the zeal of Jehoiada the priest, who organized a movement centering at the temple of Jahveh, and by the overthrow and death of Athaliah swept away for a time the danger that threatened the true faith (2 Kings xi:). The temple was repaired by Joash (B. C. 856-796), directed by Jehoiada (2 Kings xii). In this instance it was the priests, not the prophets, who organized resistance to the foreign cult.

(2) With Ahaz, however, other foreign elements appear (B. C. 735-715). The horrible rite of human sacrifice is enforced by royal example, and an altar of foreign fashion is introduced into the temple (2 Kings xvi:1-4, 10-18). The custom of human sacrifice seems not to have been unknown in earlier periods (Gen. xxii: Judg. xi:30, 31; R. V., margin), and was practiced among neighboring nations, the Israelites sharing in the opinion that it was effective (2 Kings iii:27). It also made its appearance in the northern kingdom, probably under the influence of the worship of Baal (2 Kings xvii:17). But at Jerusalem and in the royal family the practice is suggestive of the inroad of heathen ideas. With Hezekiah (B. C. 715-686) a new era of reform was ushered in, suggested, no doubt, by the preaching of the prophets Isaiah and Micah. The obelisks and images were overthrown and the brazen serpent, now become an object of veneration, was destroyed (2 Kings xviii:1-5). Hezekiah is reported to have abolished the high places as well, though these had remained undisturbed and seemingly approved through all the past, including the most strenuous periods of reform (1 Kings xv:14; xxii:43; 2 Kings xii:3; xv:4, 35; xvi:4). It was only later writers occupying the standpoint of the law of Josiah's time, who disapproved of the country sanctuaries. Perhaps their evil effects had begun already to manifest themselves to the prophets.

(3) The work of Isaiah and Micah brings a new influence to bear on the life of Judah. The former belonged to the higher circles in Jerusalem, and for forty years (B. C. 737-701) was prominent in the religious and political life of the people. Micah, as a countryman, was not so closely identified with the life of the court. With these preachers prophecy reaches its highest level, as an effort to save the nation from the consequences of its misdeeds. The picture of the times is graphic. Foreign relations have caused the bringing in of manners and customs unsuitable for the people of God. Jerusalem is full of luxury and idols (Is. ii:5-11). Monopolists, skeptics, perverters, and corrupt judges abound (v:8-24). The images to which the prophet refers, not so much in wrath as in contempt, seem not to have been the representations of other deities, but the means by which the worship of Jahveh was reduced to a mere superstition. The service of the temple was kept up carefully, but it could not be accepted as a substitute for righteousness (Is. i:10-17). The vision by which Isaiah had been called to his prophetic work (Is. vi) gave him the keynote of his message—the holiness of God. Jahveh is for him henceforth the "Holy One of Israel," not in the later sense of mere ceremonial separation, but of moral purity and spiritual grandeur. The rising power of Assyria, he predicted, would be permitted to come against Judah as a chastisement of her offenses. The Assyrian king, as an instrument of God, would be used to humble the pride of the nation and bring it to repentance (x:5 sq.; v:26-30). Throughout the period of Assyrian activity in the western lands, the prophet made his sermons revolve about the one theme of judgment, emphasizing the four points—the people have sinned, they shall be punished, a good remnant shall remain, and the future will be prosperous and glorious under Messianic rule (viii:19-22; xi:1; xii:6). The character of God was disclosed by the preaching of Isaiah as never before. What he felt and saw of the divine life he gave to the nation, and it became an inestimably precious spiritual inheritance for the future. The long reign of Manasseh (B. C. 686-641) was a time of disheartening reaction. The king was the patron of every foreign religious fad. Altars were erected for Baal and Astarte, the Babylonian planet worship was brought in and even given a place in the temple, bronze horses and chariots in honor of the sun were set up, and every form of divination was encouraged; the king himself offered his son in sacrifice, and a bitter persecution of the faithful began (2 Kings xxi:1-16). In such a period little could be done, and prophecy was silent. The inroad of the Scythians through the coast-lands (B. C. 627) gave occasion for the denunciation by Zephaniah of more terrible judgments to come.

(4) Presently Josiah (B. C. 639-609) came to the throne, and gave promise of better things. (See JOSIAH.) The work of repairing the temple was undertaken, and during the process discovery was made of a book of law. This code is now recognized to have been the Deuteronomic law, which, based upon the Book of the Covenant, had gradually grown up in the period of the kingship, and being put into final form by some priest or priests, and perhaps also prophets, was laid away until the dark days, which the reigns of Manasseh and Amon brought, should pass away. The most radical element in the new code was the centralization of worship at Jerusalem. Idolatry in its worst forms was creeping in. Isaiah had only alluded to idols with the contempt of one who saw in them a minor source of evil as compared with the prevailing immorality and corruption of his day. But the days of Manasseh had revealed the full horror of the worship of false gods, and the reformers set themselves to meet the evil. The temple could easily be controlled with a pious king on the throne. (See MANASSEH.) Even the desecrations introduced by Manasseh could be removed and forgotten. But the local sanctuaries throughout the land, which had hitherto been viewed as quite legitimate, were less easily supervised, and had shown themselves to be the elements of danger. The remedy was drastic. The local sanctuaries, with all their ancestral memories, were abolished at a stroke, and the temple alone made the center of all religious service (Deut. xii:1-28). Other portions of the code that appear to hint especially at existing conditions were those referring to pillars and obelisks (xvi:21 sq.), the "host of heaven" (xvii:2-7), Moloch worship (xviii:10), and religious prostitution (xxiii:17 sq.). (See PROSTITUTION, SACRED.) Laws already uttered in the legislation of the Mosaic age, others growing out of traditions concerning the great lawgiver and his work, and still others recent and dealing with the present situation, were included in the collection, and were set into a framework of Mosaic exhortation. The effect of this discovery could be nothing less than startling to a man of Josiah's nature (2 Kings xxii:11). The work of reformation into conformity with the new law was begun at once, and in this thorough-going process (2 Kings xxiii) he was ably assisted by the priests, to whose order Jeremiah, the great prophet of Judah's decline and fall, belonged (Jer. i:1). (See JEREMIAH.) If Josiah could have lived till his reforms were thoroughly understood and established, the sequel might have been different. But his untimely death in a needless battle left the reforming party without assistance, filled the questioning with doubt, and gave the advocates of the old regime a strength that the better leaders of the nation could not overcome. The end came on apace. Jeremiah, the saddest of the prophets, faced the coming darkness, and gave the people the only divine message that could come in such an hour: "Too late! The nation must die that it may be reborn. Captivity in Babylon is inevitable."

(7) The Exile. (1) In B. C. 597 Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, came westward and laid siege to Jerusalem. Jehoiachin, the king, a grandson of Josiah, gave himself into the hand of the Babylonian, who took him, together with some ten thousand captives from the better classes of Jerusalem, and, plundering the treasures of the palace and the temple, returned with the spoil, leaving Zedekiah (B. C. 597-586), a son of Josiah, on the throne. In the ninth year of his reign, Nebuchadrezzar returned and besieged the city, reducing it at last and destroying the temple, and ended the existence of the city for half a century, taking another company of the people to Babylon. A wretched remnant was left in the land, and a company of refugees made their way into Egypt, taking with them the unwilling Jeremiah. During these eventful years, he had stood constantly as the champion of God and righteousness in the midst of a vicious court and a worldly people, and more than once his life had been in danger. There is a deep pathos in the life and writings of this prophet, whose unhappy lot it was to be placed at a time when the tide of disaster could not be turned, and only the experiences of the exile could avail. His life came to its close among the refugees in Egypt. Among the exiles who went out to Babylonia in the first deportation was a young man named Ezekiel, a priest. (See EZEKIEL.) He was taken to Tel-Abib, on the river Chebar, where presently the divine call came to him to be the mouthpiece of Jahveh among his brethren (Ezek. i:3). Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel express the conviction that no other prophets of the true faith are to be found, though both in Jerusalem and Babylon the professional prophets were numerous (Jer. xxiii). It is noticeable that both these prophets are from the priestly order.

(2) The problems which the destruction of the city and the transportation of the people brought were perplexing. Few could appreciate the high spiritual plane occupied by Jeremiah, or his doctrine that purification was to be wrought by suffering. To those who had sunk into idolatry it was a seeming proof that Jahveh was not as powerful as the gods of Babylon, or he would have saved his city. To the faithful it was a paralyzing shock, for did it not mean that God had abandoned his people? And then the monolatristic idea, so largely prevalent, prevented hope that now the people were removed from the land, they could be longer under the protection or within the hearing of Jahveh, for was he not localized at Jerusalem, above the ruins of the dismantled city? To such troubled questions the vision by which Ezekiel was called addressed itself. The chariot of God, moving about on the wings of the storm, with the dreadful wheels full of eyes, was a symbol to show prophet and people that their God was no mere local deity, but the Lord of the world, and that in Babylon they were as near him as in Jerusalem. During all the years between the first deportation and the final fall of the city, the two prophets, Jeremiah in Jerusalem, and Ezekiel upon the Chebar, labored to convince the misguided people that the city must fall and the exile be prolonged. Jeremiah wrote a letter to the exiles, assuring them that their hopes of early return were delusive, and advising preparations for a permanent stay (Jer. xxix:1 sq.). Ezekiel had labored with his fellow exiles to the same end, assuring them that as long as Jerusalem was the scene of such practices as defiled the true faith she could not avert the coming doom (Ezek. viii). It was not till a refugee from Palestine brought him the tidings of the actual fall of the city (Ezek. xxxiii:21) that the tone of the prophet changed. From that time on, he devoted himself to the kindling of hope for a final return and future for the nation, in which the reconstructed temple, to which he devoted the closing chapters of his book, plays an important part.

(3) Another voice, even more clear than Ezekiel's, was raised during the latter portion of the exile, speaking of the coming redemption. The Evangelical Prophet, whose message is contained in the last chapters of the book of Isaiah (Is. xl-lxvi), brought a much needed encouragement to the people. (See ISALAH.) When the days were growing very long, and the voices of Jeremiah and Ezekiel had both been long hushed, the promise comes that the nation shall soon go back to Jerusalem, for Jahveh, who is the only God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, is concerned for his own sake as well as for his people's sake, to bring them back to national life in Jerusalem (Is. xl). This prophet was not a preacher, as his predecessors had been, but only a writer, who, probably from the necessities of the case, sent out his exhortations and promises in the form of fly leaves or tractates. It would hardly be possible to boldly preach such treasonable doctrines as these chapters contain, and perhaps the anonymity of the material is thus to be accounted for. But a new philosophy of history is set forth. Cyrus is already on the frontier. Through him, as an instrument in God's hands, deliverance is to come to the nation (Is. xli:25; xlv:27, 28; xlv:1 sq.; xlv:11). But deliverance is not enough. The nation is a chosen order of people for a particular purpose. It is the Servant of Jahveh (Is. xli:8; xlii:1 sq.; xlii:18 sq.; xliii:1-10; xlv:21; xlv:4). But the nation as a whole is unable to accomplish the work of bringing redemption to the world. They cannot even save themselves, and gradually a select portion is seen to represent the idea rather than the full nation. This remnant, or nucleus, is not only to save the remainder, but the world as well (Is. xlix:1-6). Then, just as gradually, there emerges from this remnant the figure of a Messianic Servant, the representative of the nation and the remnant, who, personified as the nation, despised, rejected, misunderstood, is still successful in the redemptive work to which God had called him (Is. lii:13; liii:12). In this section, and one or two later which describe the breadth and character of the Servant's work (Is. lv and lxi), prophecy reaches its very highest levels. Israel's sufferings are not for its own sins so much as for the world. All redemption is through suffering, and thus a philosophy of history was fashioned which included not one nation alone, but all, and the Servant of Jahveh, Israel, remnant and Messiah successively, as the messenger of a world-wide ministry of divine love. The possibility, nay, the certainty, of return to Jerusalem; the national programme which makes such a return necessary; and the purification of the people, by which preparation for the return may be accomplished—these are the great themes of this prophet.

(4) The exile was a period of great importance to the people. Deprived of the temple and law, the literary spirit in the nation turned back upon the past and produced history, such as Samuel-Kings, and recast other narratives of former days; revised the law on the basis of the existing codes and the praxis that had grown up since Deuteronomy, and codified the so-called Priest Code contained in the latter portion of Exodus and in Leviticus and Numbers; turned in upon its own spirit and tried to answer doubts, as in Job, or give expression to praise and longing, as in the Psalms. There must have been a strong grasp upon the fundamentals of the faith by large classes of the people to explain the firmness with which they clung to it in the midst of the taunts of their masters and the ridicule of apostate countrymen. Though many lost faith and hope, and others were led away into forbidden practices (Ezek. xx:30), yet the core of the nation remained sound, and there may even be said to have been decided progress in some directions. Monolatry gave way finally to monotheism, and idolatry was eradicated. Sabbath observances and circumcision became more binding, prayer and fasting were recognized as never before as aids in the religious life, and the doctrine of individual accountability was emphasized. At the same time, a growing tendency towards particularism and legalism manifested itself, the fruit of which appeared later.

(8) The Restoration. (1) The predictions of the prophets regarding the termination of the exile came to fulfillment B. C. 538. In that year Cyrus, having conquered Media and Lydia, entered Babylon, and the map of the world was again transformed. It is not necessary to suppose that Cyrus was influenced by a special admiration for the religion of that small fragment of people held captive in his capital province. His motive in permitting the exiles to return to Jerusalem is amply explained by the desire to provide a strong and friendly base of operations in any future trouble with Egypt, and such an opportunity was offered by the situation of Jerusalem. (See CYRUS.) The royal permission was accordingly given, a company of Jews numbering nearly fifty thousand was gathered for the journey, and the remaining vessels, brought from the temple at Jerusalem, were placed in their hands (Ezra i:2). By no means all the exiles came back. Many had grown up in their eastern home and preferred to remain, and among these not a few even of the priestly class. The company was placed in charge of a Persian officer named Sheshbazzar, but with him was associated a council of leading men, chief among whom were Zerubbabel, the grandson of Jehoiachin, and Joshua, the grandson of the last priest in Jerusalem, who lost his life at the sack of the city. As soon as the caravan reached Jerusalem, an altar was set up on the site of the temple, and the feasts resumed (Ezra iii:2-4). As soon as preparations could be made the foundations of the new temple were laid (B. C. 534) amid the mingled shouts of the more hopeful and lamentations of those who contrasted the meager present with the glorious past of the city (Ezra iii:7-12). The work of building was, however, soon interrupted. The descendants of the old Israelites on the north desired a share in the work. But the exclusive spirit prevailed, and the waiting help was rejected, which fostered a bitterness that hindered the building of the temple for many years. Two tendencies must have manifested themselves among the people. There was the broader, more tolerant attitude, which looked on other nations with friendliness and would welcome relations with foreigners, for the sake of the ministry of redemption for the world with which Israel was charged. Then there was the more narrow and exclusive spirit, that made Jewish particularism the fundamental article in its creed, and was unconscious of any duty to others. The latter attitude could claim the sanction of Ezekiel; the former, of the Evangelical Prophecy. In the end the narrow party won. Perhaps this was a necessary phase of the movement. The narrowing of the channel compelled the deepening of the stream, but the ungracious features of the more conservative and exclusive Judaism were the outcome of this tendency.

(2) After nearly twenty years, the work was resumed under the exhortation of two prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, and after royal aid had been given, brought to completion B. C. 515 (Ezra v:6). But it is evident that conditions were far from satisfactory. The hopes raised by the prophets were not being fulfilled. The city was small and poor, and the prospects were disheartening. It could not be that this meager situation was all that God intended for his people. The belief seems to have gained ground that a political crisis was imminent, a breaking up of the empire, by which Judah would profit. The horizon was anxiously scanned for signs of the coming upheaval (Zech. i:10-12). But no crisis came, and in the sinking of heart that hope deferred produced many grew indifferent to all religious obligations. The worship at the temple, while still carried on, was not made the first concern, and poor offerings were presented. It is this situation which is set before us in the anonymous prophecy named from its most suggestive word, "My Messenger" (Mal. iii:1). There was danger of a still deeper pessimism and despair. The chief comfort lay in the company of the faithful who continued in the service of God amid all discouragements (Mal. iii:16-18). (See MALACHI.) The appeal of this prophet, like that of Haggai and Zechariah, is to a renewed devotion to the law and the ritual. No longer are the great sanctions of righteousness and morality made the first concern, but the Torah and the temple are the chief consideration. Thus the tone of prophecy has changed since the days of Isaiah and the great prophet of the exile, and who could say for the better?

(3) It is evident that a new factor had been introduced into the national life just previous to the date of "Malachi," from which assistance was hoped by the religious leaders in Jerusalem. And this is found to have been the case. There had been from the time of the first return a bond of sympathy between the Jews in Jerusalem and those who remained in Babylonia. Meantime a company of the latter had been carrying forward the work of expanding the Divine law in the spirit of Ezekiel, and now, when tidings reached them that affairs had approached a serious crisis in the little community in Judea, another company was organized to swell the population of Jerusalem, and under the leadership of Ezra, a scribe, the first named of that important order which had so much to do with the enlargement, teaching, and enforcement of the law in the later days, they left Babylon, B. C. 459, to the number of 1,700. Their leader brought with him the new law (Ezra vii:14, 25, 26), prepared to put it into operation. (See EZRA.) On arrival in Judea Ezra found the work of reform difficult, for the people did not take readily to the legal regulations insisted upon, so much more exacting in some directions than any known before. Ezra was compelled, indeed, to give up the effort for a time, and it was not till the arrival of Nehemiah, a Babylonian Jew, who, having obtained a position in the Persian court, requested the vacant governorship of Judea, that the work of reform could be prosecuted with a zeal that was backed up with the royal authority, and that overcame all opposition. The city was repaired, the walls built, and then at a great gathering of the people, the law was promulgated by Ezra (Ezra viii) to an audience that requested the reading, and that was profoundly impressed by the regulations set forth in the code. The religious education implied in the popular feeling of sin, as compared with the strict demands of the law now proclaimed, is profoundly interesting (Ezra ix:8-12). The law that was brought by Ezra from Babylon, and read to the people, was the Priest Code, of which mention has already been made as the work of priests in Babylon during and after the exile. The particulars in which it most vitally differed from the earlier codes, the Book of the Covenant and Deuteronomy, were its separation of priests from other Levites and its emphasis upon the rules of "holiness," i. e., ceremonial, not moral, purity. The business of this law is to make a holy community in which God may dwell. God is honored by such institutions as secure a regulation of the external religious life of man. The community has a purely religious end. The nation, disappointed in its political hopes, turns now to a purely religious ideal within itself, and seeks there its satisfaction. The temple became, in a new and deeper sense, the center of Jewish thought and life. Its services and its offices were the most important concerns of the people. Under the direction of Ezra and Nehemiah the exclusive particularism of the more conservative party became triumphant, and the community was started on the narrow path toward the later Judaism.

(9) The Rise of Judaism. (1) The history of the Old Testament closes with the return from Babylon, but fortunately the literature which it comprises gives us some light on the period from the exile to the advent. The movement which Ezra had started went on with increased force. Gradually the literature of the nation was gathered into a collection, to which, however, additions were made up to within a century and a half of the Christian era. The love of the Scriptures, and especially the law which had now been put into one collection, the Pentateuch, grew in the hearts of the people, as salvation was more and more believed to be found in its possession. One finds expression of this feeling in the psalms of the period (e. g., cxix).

(2) Closely related to the pride in the Scriptures was that inspired by the temple and its services. No other nation had such possessions as these, and all the world might well envy the Jew these Divine gifts. Thus Judaism came to be more and more the religion of a book and a building. The Torah and the Temple were the visible symbols of the faith. Nor must it be forgotten that a high order both of religious conduct and of happiness resulted from this two-fold culture.

(3) Absolute monotheism had now been attained. There could be no remnant of a belief in other gods. But if Jahveh was the god of Israel and also of all the world, what was the relation of Israel to that world, and how was God himself disposed toward these other nations? From the time of the exile there had been two tempers of mind regarding other nations, as has been already stated. Both find expression in post-exilic days. The date of the books of Joel and Jonah is still an open question, but both may be confidently placed within the limits of this period. (See JOEL.) The former voices the conservative view. The nations exist only for the sake of Zion. When trouble visits the land, Jahveh is called into activity by a solemn fast, and at once promises to take vengeance on the nations for their treatment of the chosen people. What are all these nations compared with Judah and Jerusalem? War is declared against them; Egypt and Edom shall be desolated, and all Zion's foes shall perish. Even the beautiful promise of the outpouring of the Divine spirit refers to Israel alone as its recipient. In striking contrast with this attitude is that of the author of Jonah, a book much misunderstood and ridiculed, but one of the most precious in the Old Testament. Jonah represents the narrow and ungracious spirit of those Jews who have no desire to give a message of salvation to other nations. In contrast with the noble-minded mariners and the repentant Ninevites, he plays but a sorry part. (See JONAH.) The book is a forceful protest against the narrower phases of post-exilic Judaism.

(4) But this very conception of God compelled the Jew to adjust the heathen to the Divine and all-ruling law in some manner. Two methods were open. The one was that of proselyting, i. e., admitting the heathen to covenant privileges under the law, through compliance with certain prescribed forms, viz., circumcision, baptism, and the offering of sacrifices. The opening of this door gave rise to an earnest missionary propaganda, especially in the century before Christ. But there were those who looked with disfavor on any efforts to widen the embrace of the national faith, and, while proselytism did not absolutely cease, it lost its force after a time. The second view as to the heathen, or gentiles, was that they should be conquered and brought into subjugation at the period of Messianic supremacy yet ahead. Probably this was the more prevalent view, growing naturally out of the lofty ideas regarding the law and the temple, and the privileges they conferred on the chosen people.

(5) At what period the synagogue came into being, or when Pharisees and Sadducees first arose, remains uncertain; at some time before the Maccabean movement, at any rate. Perhaps as important was the influence of Hellenism upon Jewish thought. Alexander's conquests produced a wide diffusion of Greek ideas, and perhaps no people were more profoundly affected by them than the Jews. This was especially true outside of Palestine. The Dispersion, i. e., those Jews who lived in other parts of the world, Persia, Asia Minor, and Europe, were less under the influence of the conservative party than the Jews of the Holy Land. But even in Jerusalem the liberalizing tendency manifested itself in a decided manner, and it is impossible to say to what lengths it might have gone had not another force interposed. Antiochus IV, called Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS), the overlord of Palestine, whose capital was at Antioch, impatient of Jewish customs and religious services in Jerusalem, attempted to force the process of Hellenizing upon the people, and by his profanation of the temple drove the people to a frantic uprising under the leadership of the Maccabees. (See MACCABEES.) In this struggle the older conservatism asserted itself, and a decisive break with Hellenism occurred. That reaction persisted as perhaps the most effective force which the Judaism of the period presents, viz., the Pharisees. The most interesting souvenir of that struggle is the book of Daniel, written about B. C. 165, and intended as an encouragement to the warriors in the struggle, by its portrayals of heroism and deliverance gathered around the character of Daniel in the captivity, and the prophecies of eventual victory put into his mouth. (See DANIEL.)

This period is also marked by the appearance of Chronicles, a work which reconstructs the history from the priestly point of view, reading back into remote times conditions and ideals which, as a matter of fact, were post-exilic. Other books of the time were Ecclesiastes, Sirach, Judith, Tobit, Enoch, 1 Maccabees, etc. (See APOCRYPHA.)

In this period the belief in a future life took form, with the doctrine of rewards and punishments, the belief in a being called the adversary, or Satan, and the more definite forms of the Messianic hope.

(10) The Messianic Hope. (1) Israel was a nation of hope and promise. Unlike other peoples, its Golden Age was in the future, not in the past. From the earliest beginning of national consciousness it was a gradually developing belief that Israel had a special mission, separate from the rest of the world, yet in some important degree connected with the spiritual life of the world. The Divine purpose for humanity was believed to lie implicit in the unfolding history of this people. The Hebrew records preserved the first promise made to the race (Gen. iii:15), a promise that though the struggle between good and evil should be long and bitter, yet in the end the good should triumph. This Divine purpose manifested itself in the selection of certain individuals or tribes through whose life the disclosure of the plans of God was to be made. Such men were Noah (Gen. vi:8; ix:8-17); Shem. (Gen. ix:26, 27), and through him the Semites as a race; Abraham (Gen. xii: sq.) and his descendants, the Hebrews; Jacob (Gen. xxviii:10-16) and his descendants, called after him Israel; and Judah, as the royal tribe, and the one which should stand as the representative of the nation (Gen. xlix:8-10). This process of selecting men for the special purpose of leadership in this nation continued throughout its history. It was the application of the universal principle of selection. But it was not a selection for favor, but rather for service. Israel was the chosen people of God, but not for its own sake. It had a ministry for the world. Its leaders were prophets, priests, and kings, and these men, especially the prophets, were unique in their character and work. Their counterpart is not to be found in any other history. But in the last analysis the nation as a whole was regarded as royal, as priestly, as prophetic (Exod. xix:6). What these special men did as leaders for the nation, Israel as a unit was to do for the world. Herein lay its unique office.

(2) But from the time of Amos and Hosea it was seen that the nation as a whole was unprepared for such a ministry. (See AMOS and HOSEA.) The religion of Jahveh was set aside too often for that of other gods, or was mixed with unworthy elements that robbed it of its effectiveness. A purgation was seen to be necessary. A cleansing process alone could purify the people and make them worthy of their high ministry; and the power through which this regeneration was to be wrought was recognized by all the prophets of that period as being Assyria, and later Babylonia. Only such a purification as should come through national disaster and suffering could avail to prepare Israel for its true mission. But after this period of suffering had passed, the remnant would be worthy, and a glorious future would be expected. That future would be the Messianic age, holy and marked by the presence of God. The consecration of kings and priests was signified by their anointing with the holy oil. From this word "Anointed," or "Messiah," grew up the idea of the future glorious time as "Anointed," or "Messianic." The conception of a person, who stands as the common denominator of the new period of national salvation and purification, is first presented by Isai' h. In his rebuke of King Ahaz for presumptuous disregard of God and an attempted defense of his capital by resort to arms and alliance with Assyria, the prophet announces the birth of a child, in whose day, soon to dawn (Is. vii:14), and under whose leadership as a conqueror, and yet a Prince of Peace (Is. ix:6, 7), the national deliverance was to be achieved; after which there would come the period of happiness and peace (Is. xi:1 sq.). That Isaiah expected this child-king of the house of David in his own day seems certain, otherwise the predictions of deliverance from Assyrian oppression would have been meaningless, and herein is disclosed one of the interesting factors of prophecy. The outlines of the coming order of things were apparent to the eyes of the prophet, but the hour of arrival was not so clear. The drama of redemption was contracted into a single scene, but its larger meaning lay implicit in the slowly unfolding movements upon which they looked. Deliverance from Assyria came, but not through the rise at that time of the Messianic King. Yet the vision was true, for the larger outlines of the Messianic time yet ahead fitted in no small degree the local distress and the certainly foreseen deliverance.

(3) It remained for a later prophet to see with yet clearer vision the true character of the Messianic work and outlines of the Messianic figure. The Evangelical Prophet sets forth the Messianic hope in its fullest light, and he does this under the figure of the Suffering Servant of God. To him at first Israel as a whole is the Servant (Is. xli:8; xlv:1 sq.). Though fallen upon unhappy days, yet this very time is one of purification; and now that the process of purgation is reaching its completion, it is time to prepare for larger things to come. Redemption is not to be wrought by war and strife, as was the earlier view, but by peaceful methods (Is. xlii:1-4), and therefore the figure of the King no longer appears, but the Servant in a humble and yet successful work. Presently, however, the idea that the nation as a whole can do the great work appears to be abandoned. Too many are indifferent. The remnant, the best part of the nation, is all that can be counted upon in such an enterprise. This remnant will save not only the apostate part of the nation, but the world at large (Is. xlix:5-7). But even the remnant was weak and unable to accomplish the Divine work; and at last One rises from the remnant, a representative of both it and the whole nation, able to do that which both had failed to accomplish, the Divine Servant, the Messiah. From Is. lii:13 to liii:12 the success of the Servant's mission is set forth in terms that show the blending of the personal and national ideas about the Messianic figure. That this conception of the Messiah finds its fulfillment in the historic work of Jesus Christ is the teaching of the New Testament.

HEBRON (hē'bron). 1. (Heb. חֶבְרוֹן, kheb-rone', a community; alliance).

(1) Location. It was situated in the south of Palestine and in the tribe of Judah, 18 miles south from Jerusalem, in 31 deg. 32 min. 30 sec. N. lat., 35 deg. 8 min. 20 sec. E. long., at the height of 2664 Paris feet above the level of the sea (Schubert). It is one of the most ancient cities existing, having, as the sacred writer informs us, been built 'seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' and being mentioned even prior to Damascus (Num. xiii:22; Gen. xiii:18; comp. xv:2).

(2) Ancient Names. Its most ancient name was Kirjath-arba, that is, 'the city of Arba,' from Arba, the father of Anak and of the Anakim who dwelt in and around Hebron (Gen. xxiii:2; Josh. xiv:15; xv:3; xxi:11; Judg. i:10). It was peculiarly a Hittite city, although the Hittites and the Amorites were mingled together within its confines. It appears to have been also called Mamre, probably from the name of Abraham's Amoritish ally (Gen. xxiii:9; xxxv:27; comp. xiv:13, 28).

The name of Hebron has the same origin as that of the Khabiri who appear in Ebed-Tob's letters by the side of Labai, Babylonia, and Naharaim as the assailants of Jerusalem and its territory. (See TELL AMARNA, TABLES OF.) Consult Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, pp. 146-7.

(3) Early History. The ancient city lay in a valley; and the two remaining pools, one of which at least existed in the time of David, serve, with other circumstances, to identify the modern with the ancient site (Gen. xxxvii:14; 2 Sam. iv:12). Much of the lifetime of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was spent in this neighborhood, where they were all entombed; and it was from hence that the patriarchal family departed for Egypt by the way of Beersheba (Gen. xxxvii:14; xlv:1). After the return of the Israelites, the city was taken by Joshua and given over to Caleb, who expelled the Anakim from its territories (Josh. x:36, 37; xiv:6-15; xv:13-14; Judg. i:20). It was afterwards made one of the cities of refuge, and assigned to the priests and Levites (Josh. xx:7; xxi:11, 13). David, on becoming king of Judah, made Hebron his royal residence. Here he reigned seven years and a half; here most of his sons were born; and here he was anointed king over all Israel (1 Sam. ii:1-4, 11; 1 Kings ii:11; 2 Sam. v:1, 3). On this extension of his kingdom Hebron ceased to be sufficiently central, and Jerusalem then became the metropolis. It is possible that this step excited a degree of discontent in Hebron which afterwards encouraged Absalom to raise in that city the standard of rebellion against his father (2 Kings xv:9, 10). Hebron was one of the places fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi:10); and after the exile the Jews who returned to Palestine occupied Hebron and the surrounding villages (Neh. xi:25).

Hebron is not named by the prophets, nor in the New Testament. Hebron is now called el-Khulifer-Rahman. We learn from the first book of Maccabees, and from Josephus, that it came into the power of the Edomites, who had taken possession of the south of Judah, and was recovered from them by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v:65; Joseph. Antiq. xii:8, 6). During the great war, Hebron was seized by the rebel Simon Giorides, but was recaptured and burnt by Cerealis, an officer of Vespasian (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iv:9; vii:9). Josephus describes the tombs of the patriarchs as existing in his day; and both Eusebius and Jerome and all subsequent writers who mention Hebron down to the time of the Crusades, speak of the place chiefly as containing these sepulchers.

Among the Moslems it is still called by the appellation of el Khulil, 'the Friend' (of God), the name which they gave to Abraham. The full name given above, el-Khulil-er-Rahman, means 'the Friend of the Merciful (God).'

(4) Under Moslem Rule. Since the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1187, Hebron also reverted to the Moslems, and has ever since remained in their possession. In the modern history of Hebron the most remarkable circumstance is the part which the inhabitants of the town and district took in the rebellion of 1834, and the heavy retribution which it brought down upon them. They held out to the last, and gave battle to Ibrahim Pasha near Solomon's Pools. They were defeated; but retired and entrenched themselves in Hebron, which Ibrahim carried by storm, and gave over to sack and pillage. The town has not yet recovered from the blow it then sustained.

In the fourteenth century pilgrims passed from Sinai to Jerusalem direct through the desert by Beersheba and Hebron, and it continued to be occasionally visited by European travelers down to the latter part of the seventeenth century; but from that time till the present century it appears to have been little frequented by them.

(5) Present Condition. (1) The town of Hebron lies low down on the sloping sides of a narrow valley (of Mamre), chiefly on the eastern side, but in the southern part stretches across also to the western side. The houses are all of stone, high and well built, with windows and flat roofs, and on these roofs are small domes, sometimes two or three to each house.

(2) The shops are well furnished, better indeed than those of towns of the same class in Egypt, and the commodities are of a very similar description. The only display of local manufactures is the produce of the glass-works, for which the place has long been celebrated in these parts. The articles manufactured consist almost exclusively of glass lamps, many of which are exported to Egypt, and rings of colored glass worn by females on the arms. Gates are placed not only at the entrance of the city, but in different parts of the interior, and are closed at night for the better preservation of order, as well as to prevent communication between the different quarters.

(3) There are nine mosques in Hebron, none of which possess any architectural or other interest, with the exception of the massive structure which is built over the tombs of the patriarchs. This is esteemed by the Moslems one of their holiest places, and Christians are rigorously excluded from it. At an earlier period, however, when the Holy Land was in the power of the Christians, access was not denied; and Benjamin of Tudela says that the sarcophagi above ground were shown to the generality of pilgrims as what they desired to see; but if a rich Jew offered an additional fee, 'an iron door is opened, which dates from the time of our forefathers who rest in peace, and with a burning taper in his hands the visitor descends into a first cave, which is empty, traverses a second in the same state, and at last reaches a third, which contains six sepulchers, those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah, one opposite the other. All these sepulchers bear inscriptions, the letters being engraved; thus upon that of Abraham: "This is the sepulcher of our father Abraham, upon whom be peace;" even so upon that of Isaac and all the other sepulchers' (Itinerary, i:77; ed. Asher, Berlin, 1840). The identity of this place with the cave of Machpelah is one of the few local traditions in Palestine which even Dr. Robinson suffers to pass without dispute, and may therefore be taken for granted.

The court in which the mosque stands is surrounded by an extensive and lofty wall, formed of large stones, and strengthened by square buttresses. This wall is the greatest antiquity in Hebron, and even Dr. Robinson supposes that it may be substantially the same which is mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. i:14; De Bell. Jud. iv:9, 7), and by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Arboch) as the sepulcher of Abraham. A common Moslem tomb in the neighborhood of Hebron passes as the tomb of Abner. He was certainly interred in this city (2 Sam. iii:32); and the head of Ishbosheth, after his assassination, was deposited in the same sepulcher (2 Sam. iv:12); but there is slight evidence in favor of the tradition which professes to point out this locality to the modern traveler.

Besides this venerable wall, there is nothing at Hebron bearing the stamp of antiquity, save two reservoirs for rain water outside the town. As these pools are doubtless of high antiquity, one of them is in all likelihood the 'pool of Hebron' over which David nung the assassins of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iv:12).

(4) The present population of Hebron is about 5000. Most of the inhabitants are Moslems, of fierce and intolerant character. There are no resident-Christians. The Jews amount to about one hundred families, mostly natives of different countries of Europe, who have emigrated to this place for the purpose of having their bones laid near the sepulchers of their illustrious ancestors. They have two synagogues and several schools.

(5) The environs of Hebron are very fertile. Vineyards and plantations of fruit trees, chiefly olive trees, cover the valleys and arable grounds; while the tops and sides of the hills, although stony, are covered with rich pastures, which support a great number of cattle, sheep, and goats, constituting an important branch of the industry and wealth of Hebron. The hill country of Judah, of which it is the capital, is indeed highly productive, and under a paternal government would be capable of sustaining a large population. That it did so once, is manifest from the great number and extent of ruined terraces and dilapidated towns. It is at present abandoned, and cultivation ceases at the distance of two miles north of the town. The hills then become covered with prickly and other stunted trees, which furnish Bethlehem and other villages with wood. (See Dr. Robinson, Dr. Olin, Rev. V. Monro, and Schubert; Sayce Patriarchal Palestine; Thomson, The Land and the Book, vol. ii: pp. 408 sq.).

2. A town in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix:28) on the boundary of the tribe, named next to Hebron, as above. In the original the names are quite different. Kirjath Arba seems to have been the name of this place prior to the Israelitish occupancy (Josh. xv:13, 14). In the time of Abraham it was honored with another name (Gen. xxiii:19; xxxv:27); but its earliest as well as later name was undoubtedly Hebron.

3. The third son of Kohath, and a grandson of Levi; a younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Exod. vi:18; Num. iii:19; 1 Chron. vi:2, 18; xxiii:12), B. C. before 1290. His descendants are called Hebronites (Num. iii:27, etc.). (See HEBRONITES.)

4. The son of Mareshah, and apparently, grandson of Caleb, of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. ii:42, 43), B. C. after 1170.

HEBRONITES (hē'bron-its), (Heb. כְּהֵבְרוֹנִיתִים, kheb-ro-ne'), descendants of Hebron, son of Kohath (Num. iii:27; xxvi:58; 1 Chron. xxvi:23).

HEDGE (hēj), (Heb. גָּדֵר, gaw-darē, and Heb. גְּדֵרָה, ghed-ay-raw', are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Ps. lxxxix:40; 1 Chron. iv:23).

The word mes-oo-kaw' (Heb. מִסְוֵה, mis-ve') means a thorn hedge (Mic. vii:4). The Gr. φραγμός, tr. 'hedge' in Matt. xxi:33; Mark xii:1; Luke xiv:23, denotes a fence of any kind, whether hedge, or wall, or palings. The purpose of the hedge, as the term is used in the Bible, is either to protect that which is enclosed in it (e. g., Job i:10), or to restrain and hinder (e. g., Job iii:23; Hos. ii:6). (See FENCE.) From the word godare came the Phœnician name of one of their colonies, Gadir, which has become Cadiz, in Spain.

Figurative. (1) God's protecting providence, government, or whatever defends from hurt and danger, is called a hedge (Job i:10; Is. v:2; Ezek. xiii:6). (2) Troubles and hindrances are called hedges, as they stop our way and prevent our doing and obtaining what we please (Lam. iii:7; Job xix:8; Hos. ii:6). (3) The way of the slothful is a hedge of thorns; he always apprehends great difficulties in the way of doing any good, and often he entangles himself in inextricable difficulties (Prov. xv:19).

Mint.

HEDUOSMON (he-dū'os-mon), (Gr. Ἠδύσμων, hay-doo'os-mon, i. e., having a sweet smell), translated mint, is mentioned in Matt. xxiii:23.

'Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise (properly dill) and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law,' and, again, in Luke xi:42: 'But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue, and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone' All the plants mentioned in the above passages belong to the smaller ones cultivated in gardens in Europe, and which usually come under the denomination of sweet herbs. It is difficult to determine the exact species or variety of mint employed by the ancients. There are numerous species very nearly allied to one another. They usually grow in moist situations, and are herbaceous, perennial, of powerful odor, especially when bruised, and have small reddish-colored flowers, arranged in spikes or whorls. The taste of these plants is bitter, warm, and pungent, but leaving a sensation of coolness on the tongue; in their properties they are so similar to each other, that either in medicine, or as a condiment, one species may safely be substituted for another. But the species Mentha sylvestris and Mentha arvensis probably yielded the varieties cultivated in Palestine. It is still used there as a food-flavoring. J. F. R.

HEGAI (hē'gāi), (Heb. חַיִּי, hay-gah'ee, eunuch), or HEGE (hē'gē), (Esth. ii:3, Heb. חַיִּי, hay-gay', same), one of the chamberlains of Ahasuerus (or Xerxes), who had charge of the women of the harem (Esth. ii:8, 15), B. C. 479.

HEIFER, RED (hēf'ēr, rēd), (Heb. אֵילָנִים, eg-law', אֵילָנִים, haw-raw'). See SACRIFICE.

Figurative. (1) Young wives were called heifers, to mark their gaiety, and expected fruitfulness (Judg. xiv:18). (2) Nations are likened to heifers: Egypt to a fair one; to mark their glory and prosperity (Jer. xvi:20). (3) The Chaldeans are compared to a fat one, to mark their wealth, wantonness, and unconcern (Jer. 1:11). (4) The ten tribes of Israel are likened to a backsliding one, to signify their stupid and perverse revolting from God (Hos. iv:16). Also to a taught one, loving to tread the corn, over whose fair neck God passed; they were instructed by God's oracles and prophets; they were expert and skillful in idolatry; they loved to riot in such plenty as they possessed under Jeroboam the Second; but were quickly after reduced to slavery and distress by the Assyrians (Hos. x:11). (5) If our version rightly renders Hagla Shalishiah, a heifer of three years old, Zoar and Horonaim, cities of Moab, are thus likened to mark their untameable obstinacy; or, rather, their terrible outeries, when the inhabitants fled from the Assyrians and Chaldeans. But perhaps these words may be the names of cities that should share in the ruin (Is. xv:5; Jer. xlviii:34).

HEIR (ār), (Heb. יָרֵשׁ, yaw-resh', a primitive root, meaning to occupy), one that succeeds to the inheritance of anything after its present possessor.

In this sense, even enemies succeeding a people driven out of their own land are called their "heirs" (Jer. xlix:2; Mic. i:15).

Figurative. (1) Christ is "heir of all things;" as God's Son, he hath an equal right to all things with his Father; as Mediator, he has, by God's sovereign decree, been raised to this dignity; so that his elect, and all things, are given into his hand, to dispose of for their good (Matt. xxi:38; Heb. i:2). (2) Saints are "heirs" of the promise; "heirs" of righteousness; "heirs" of salvation; "heirs" of the grace of life; "heirs" of the kingdom; "heirs" of the world; "heirs of God" and "joint-heirs" with Christ as united to Christ, and by virtue of his death, they have the most free and honorable title to all the promises, blessings, creatures, and fullness of God (Rom. iv:13; viii:17; Heb. i:14; vi:17; xi:7; James ii:5; 1

Pet. iii:7). (3) But perhaps Abraham's being "heir of the world," signifies his having Canaan divinely bequeathed to his seed (Rom. iv:13). Perhaps Gal. iii:29 explains this. (4) Christ, the seed of Abraham, is "heir of all things; and his people are heirs with him. (5) A handmaid "heir to her mistress," cannot be borne with, because of her intolerable pride (Prov. xxx:23). (See BIRTH-RIGHT; INHERITANCE.)

HELAH (hē'lah), (Heb. חֶלֶה, khel-aw', rust), one of the wives of Ashur, the ancestor of the men of Tekoah (1 Chron. iv:5), B. C. about 1612.

HELAM (hē'lam), (Heb. חֵלָם, khay-lawm', place of abundance), a place celebrated for a defeat of the Syrians by David, in which he took their horses and chariots (2 Sam. x:16, 17), it would seem to have been not far from the Euphrates. Perhaps it can best be identified with Alamatha.

HELBAH (hēl'bah), or CHELBA (Heb. חֶלְבָּה, khel-baw', fatness, a fertile region), a city of Asher (Judg. i:31); perhaps Helbon in Syria. "It still exists in the village of Helbôn, a place with many ruins three and a half miles north of Damascus in the midst of a valley of the same name" (Keil, Com., in loc.)

HELBON (hēl'bôn), (Heb. חֶלְבֹן, khel-bone', fat), a name which occurs only in Ezek. xxvii:18, where 'the wine of Helbon' is named among the commodities brought to the great market of Tyre.

Helbon is thought to be identical with Chalybon, an old city of Syria, famous for wine.

Now it is generally agreed that the site is at Helbun, thirteen miles north of Damascus. The village is situated in a narrow valley shut in by steep, bare cliffs and long, shelving banks 2,000 to 3,000 feet high. The bottom of the glen is occupied by orchards, and far up the mountain slopes are terraced vineyards. Along the terraces and in the valley below are extensive ruins. The wine was celebrated in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia (Strabo xv:735; Nebuchadnezzar I R. 65, 32).

HELDAI (hēl'dāi or hēl'da-i), (Heb. חֵלְדָי, khel-dah'ee, worldliness).

1. A Netophathite, descendant of Othniel, who had charge of one of the courses in the temple service (1 Chron. xxvii:15), B. C. 1014.

2. One of those returning from captivity. Zechariah was instructed to make certain crowns for him and others as memorials (Zech. vi:10), B. C. 520.

HELEB (hē'leb), (Heb. חֵלֶב, khay-leb', fat, fatness), a Netophathite, son of Baanah, and one of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii:29).

HELED (hē-led') (Heb. חֵלֶד, khay'led, portion of time), the name (1 Chron. xi:30) which appears as Heleb in 2 Sam. xxiii:29.

HELEK (hē'lek), (Heb. חֵלֶק, khay'lek, a portion), a descendant of Gilead and founder of a family by his own name (Num. xxvi:30). His descendants were influential in the tribe (Josh. xvii:2), B. C. about 1612.

HELEKITES (hēlek-ites), (Heb. חֵלְקִי, khel-kee'), a family descended from HELEK (which see).

HELEM (hē'lem), (Heb. חֵלֶם, khay'lem, dream).

1. Apparently a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii:35), B. C. about 1658. See Burrington, i:265.

2. A name given in Zech. vi:14; probably the same as Heldai in ver. 10. (Ewald, Propheten, i:536).

HELEPH (hē'leph), (Heb. חֵלֶף, kkeh'lef), one of the boundary marks of the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix:33). Perhaps it corresponds to the modern Beilif: Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 320: Syria, i:233.

HELEZ (hē'lez), (Heb. חֵלֶץ, khay'lets, or חֵלְץ, kkeh'lets, strength).

1. One of David's "thirty" (2 Sam. xxiii:26; 1 Chron. xi:27). In the last passage he is called an Ephraimite, and captain of the seventh course in the temple worship (1 Chron. xxvii:10), B. C. 1014.

2. Son of Azariah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii:39), a descendant of Jerahmeel (B. C. before 1017).

HELI (hē'li), (Gr. Ἡλί, hay-lee', for Heb. אֵלִי, ay-lee', ascent), the father-in-law of Joseph, and maternal grandfather of Christ, (Luke iii:23). Harvey, Genealogies, pp. 130, 138.

HELIOPOLIS (hē'li-ōp'o-lis). See ON.

HELKAI (hēl'ka-i), (Heb. חֵלְקַי, khel-kak'ee, apportioned), a priest in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. xii:15), B. C. after 536.

HELKATH (hēl'kath), (Heb. חֵלְקָת, khel-kath', smoothness), a town on the boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix:25), which was allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi:31).

HELKATH-HAZZURIM (hēl'kath-hāz'zu rīm), (Heb. חֵלְקַת הַצְּזִרִים, khel-khath' hats-tsoo-reem', smoothness of the rocks; others, field of the sharp edges), a plot of ground near the pool of Gibeon (2 Sam. ii:16). The name was given from the bloody duel fought there (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 320).

HELL (hēl), (Heb. שְׁעֵל, sheh-ole', the unseen state.)

The term used in Old English to designate the world of the dead generally, with all the sad and painful associations of the dark region into which the living disappear. In modern English it has the specific sense of the place and condition of penalty destined for the finally impenitent among the dead. With this it expresses also the abode of evil spirits.

1. Scripture Terms. Much that belongs to this subject has already been considered under the head Hades. It is there shown that hell is represented by the word Sheol in the Old and by hades (Hades) in the New Testament. But as both these words mean also the grave or the condition of the dead, hell, as the place of final punishment for sinners, is more distinctively indicated by the term Gehenna (γέεννα), which is the word translated 'hell' in Matt. v:22, 29, 30; x:28; xviii:9; xxiii:15, 33; Mark ix:43, 45, 47; Luke xii:5; James iii:6. It is also distinctively indicated by such phrases as 'the place of torment' (Luke xvi:28; 'everlasting fire' (Matt. xxv:41); 'the hell of fire, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched' (Mark ix:44). The dreadful nature of the abode of the wicked is implied in various figurative expressions, such as 'outer darkness, 'I am tormented in this flame,' 'furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'where the worm dieth not,' 'the blackness of darkness,' 'torment in fire and brimstone,' 'the ascending smoke of their torment,' 'the lake of fire that burneth with brimstone' (Matt. viii:12; xiii:42; xxii:13; xxv:30; Luke xvi:24; comp. Matt. xxv:41; Mark ix:43-48; Jude 13; comp. Rev. xiv:10, 11; xix:20; xx:14; xxi:8). The figure by which hell is represented as burning with fire and brimstone is probably derived from the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, as well as that which describes the smoke as ascending from it (comp. Rev. xiv:10, 11, with Gen. xix:24, 28). To this coincidence of description Peter also most probably alludes in 2 Pet. ii:6.

2. Figurative Allusions. The names which in many of the other instances are given to the punishments of hell, are doubtless in part figurative, and many of the terms which were commonly applied to the subject by the Jews are retained in the New Testament. The images, it will be seen, are generally taken from death, capital punishments, tortures, prisons, etc. And it is the obvious design of the sacred writers in using such figures, to awaken the idea of something terrible and fearful. They mean to teach that the punishments beyond the grave will excite the same feelings of distress as are produced on earth by the objects employed to represent them. We are so little acquainted with the state in which we shall be hereafter, and with the nature of our future body, that no strictly literal representation of such punishments could be made intelligible to us. Many of the Jews, indeed, and many of the Christian fathers, took the terms employed in Scripture in an entirely literal sense, and supposed there would be actual fire, etc., in hell. But from the words of Christ and his apostles nothing more can with certainty be inferred than that they meant to denote great and unending miseries.

3. Punishments of Sin. The punishments of sin may be divided into two classes: (1) Natural punishments, or such as necessarily follow a life of servitude to sin. (2) Positive punishments, or such as God shall see fit, by his sovereign will, to inflict.

(1) Natural. Among the natural punishments we may rank the privation of eternal happiness (Matt. vii:21, 23; xxii:13; xxv:41; comp. 2 Thess. i:9); the painful sensations which are the natural consequence of committing sin, and of an impenitent heart; the propensities to sin, the evil passions and desires which in this world fill the human heart, and which are doubtless carried into the world to come. The company of fellow-sinners and of evil spirits, as inevitably resulting from the other conditions, may be accounted among the natural punishments, and must prove not the least grievous of them.

(2) Positive. The positive punishments have been already indicated. It is to these chiefly that the Scripture directs our attention. 'There are but few men in such a state that the merely natural punishments of sin will appear to them terrible enough to deter them from the commission of it. Experience also shows that to threaten positive punishment has far more effect, as well upon the cultivated as the uncultivated, in deterring them from crime, than to announce, and lead men to expect, the merely natural consequences of sin, be they ever so terrible. Hence we may see why it is that the New Testament says so little of natural punishments (although these beyond question await the wicked), and makes mention of them in particular far less frequently than of positive punishments; and why, in those passages which treat of the punishments of hell, such ideas and images are constantly employed as suggest and confirm the idea of positive punishments' (Knapp's Christian Theology, sec. 156).

(3) Varying. As the sins which shut out from heaven vary so greatly in quality and degree, we should expect from the justice of God a corresponding variety both in the natural and the positive punishments. This is accordingly the uniform doctrine of Christ and his apostles. The more knowledge of the divine law a man possesses, the more his opportunities and inducements to avoid sin, the stronger the incentives to faith and holiness set before him, the greater will be his punishment if he fails to make a faithful use of these advantages. 'The servant who knows his lord's will and does it not, deserves to be beaten with many stripes;' 'To whom much is given, of him much will be required' (Matt. x:15; xi:22, 24; xxiii:15; Luke xii:48). Hence St. Paul says that the heathen who acted against the law of nature would indeed be punished; but that the Jews would be punished more than they, because they had more knowledge (Rom. ii:9-29). In this conviction, that God will, even in hell, justly proportion punishment to sin, we must rest satisfied. We cannot now know more; the precise degrees as well as the precise nature of such punishments are things belonging to another state of being, which in the present we are unable to understand (Knapp's Christian Theology, translated by Leonard Woods, Jun., D. D., secs. 156-158; Storr and Platt's Biblical Theology, with Schmucker's Additions, sec. iii. 58; Alger's Critical Hist. of the Doctrine of a Future Life, N. Y.)

HELLENIST (hél'lén-íst), (Gr. Ἑλληστίς, hel-lay-nis-tacé, one who talks Greek).

This word is derived from the Greek verb ἑλληρίζω, hel-lay-nid'zo, which in Aristotle means 'to talk (good) Greek' (Rhetoric, iii:5,1; 12:1); but, according to the analogy of other verbs in -ίζω, it might mean 'to favor the Greeks,' or 'to imitate Greek manners.' In the New Testament it seems to be appropriated as the name of those persons who, being of Jewish extraction, nevertheless talked Greek as their mother-tongue; which was the case generally with the Jews in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece; and in fact, through the influence of the Greek cities in northern Palestine (Decapolis), it would appear that the Galileans from their childhood learned nearly as much Greek as Hebrew. The appellation Hellenist is opposed to that of Hebrew in Acts vi:1; in Acts ix:29 the reading is not so certain, yet probably it should there also be 'Hellenists,' meaning unconverted Jews.

The fact that so large a portion of the Jewish nation was Hellenistic was destined to work great results on the Christian cause. Indeed, in some sense, Christianity itself may be said to have had its human birth among Hellenists, since Jesus himself and the majority of his disciples were reared in Galilee, and were probably nearly as familiar with the Greek as with the Hebrew tongue. Nevertheless, during the early times which followed the day of Pentecost, no striking result appears from this, except that it must have facilitated communication with the Jews of the dispersion. The important part which the Hellenists were to sustain, was first indicated by the preaching of Stephen; who discerned the lower place which must be assigned to the national law of Moses in the kingdom of Messiah. Stephen, indeed, was abruptly cut off by the odium which his principles caused; but the same were soon after adopted, and yet more efficiently inculcated, by his persecutor Saul, to whom the high office was allotted of establishing the peculiar system of doctrine which thenceforward distinguished the Gentile from the Jewish church.

The Epistle of James (whether written, as Neander thinks, before the development of the Pauline views or not) exhibits to us undoubtedly the state of Christian doctrine in the mother-church of Jerusalem. We see in it the higher spirit of Christ struggling to put down the law into its right place, but having by no means as yet brought out into their full clearness the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel. All of these were preached and established by Paul in his own churches, founded among Gentile proselytes to Hellenistic Judaism, and from them in no long time were imbibed by all Gentile Christendom. But, simultaneously, the struggle began within the church itself between the Hebraic and the Hellenistic spirit.

The (so-called) first council at Jerusalem (Acts xv) decided, for the time at least, that the Mosaic law was not to be enforced upon the Gentiles, but it did not lessen the importance of it to Jewish Christians; and it would appear that the Hebrew spirit became afterwards even stronger still within the Jerusalem church, if we may interpret literally the words of James (Acts xxi:20): 'Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe, and they are all zealous of the law.' At any rate it appears certain that the resistance to the Pauline doctrine continued intense in the great body of the Hebrew Christians; for they show themselves in ecclesiastical history only under the names of Nazarenes and Ebionites, and are always regarded as (more or less) heretical by the Gentile churches, since they held only the bare rudimental creed on which the original Pentecostal church was founded; and pertinaciously rejected the distinguishing tenets of Paul, which were confirmed by Peter, and perhaps extended by John. This first and greatest of controversies ended in the extinction of the Hebrew churches, which had refused to grow with the growth of the Christian spirit in its highest and most favored leaders. But long before that event the Hellenistic Jews had been swallowed up in the mass of Gentile believers; and to follow the further development of the Grecian mind within the bosom of Christianity, belongs, not to this article, but to a history of Gentile Christendom. HELMET (hĕl'mĕt), (Heb. כֶּלֶחַי, ko'bah), a cap made of brass, iron, or other metal, for protecting the head of a warrior, 1 Sam. xvii:5.

Figurative. (1) The salvation of his people is God's "helmet;" the deliverance he intends and works for them, will appear conspicuous as if on his head, and he will have the glory of it (Is. lix:17). (2) Eternal salvation, and the hope of it, are the saints' "helmet;" they defend and render them bold and courageous in their spiritual warfare (Eph. vi:17; 1 Thess. v:8). (See ARMS, ARMOR.)

HELON (hĕ'lŏn), (Heb. הֶלֶן, khay-lone', strong), the father of Eliab, who was a man of influence in the tribe of Zebulun (Num. i:9; ii:7; vii:24, 29; x:16), B. C. before 1658.

HELP (hĕlp). Besides its usual meaning of assistance, a technical application is given the term in the instances below cited:

"Helps" (Gr. βοηθία, bo-ay'thi-ah), an apparatus for securing a leaking vessel, by means of ropes, chains, etc., forming a process of undergirding (Acts xxvii:17). The helm is now the handle which moves the rudder, but it was formerly used loosely for the whole steering apparatus. Hence in James iii:4 it is translated a rudder. It was Tyndale who introduced 'helm' here, and he was followed by all the versions except Geneva, which has 'rudder,' and Rheims which has 'sterne.' The R. V. follows Geneva.

HELPMEEET (hĕlp'mĕt'), (Heb. עֵזֶר כְּנֶגְדּוֹ, keh'zer keh-neg-dow', a help as his counterpart), i. e., an aid suitable and supplementary to him.

A beautiful and delicate designation of a wife (Gen. ii:18-20). (See MARRIAGE.)

HELPS (hĕlps), (Gr. ἀντιλήψεις, an-ti'ape sis, aids; supports); Vulg. opitulationes; 1 Cor. xii:28).

The Greek word, signifying aids or assistances, has also this meaning, among others, in the classical writers (e. g. Diod. Sic. i:87). In the Sept. it answers to the Heb. עֵזֶר, (Ez-raw'), (Ps. xxii:19). It is found in the same sense Ecclus. xi:12; 2 Macc. xi:26; and in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. iv:5, 1). In the New Testament it occurs once, viz. in the enumeration of the several orders, or classes of persons possessing miraculous gifts among the primitive Christians (ut supra), where it seems to be used by metonymy, the abstract for the concrete, and to mean helpers; like the words δυνάμεις, 'miracles,' i. e. workers of miracles; κυβερνήσεις, 'governments,' that is, governors, etc., in the same enumeration. Great difficulty attends the attempt to ascertain the nature of the office so designated among the first Christians (Barrington's Miscellanea Sacra, i:166; Macknight on 1 Cor. xii:10-28). After all it must be confessed, with Doddridge, that 'we can only guess at the meaning of the words in question, having no principles on which to proceed in fixing it absolutely.' J. F. D.

HELVE (hĕlv), (Heb. עֵצ, ates, wood), the handle or wooden part (Deut. xlx:5) of an ax (which see).

HEM (Gr. κρᾶσπεδον, kras'ped-on, Matt. ix:20.) R. V., "border." "Entomb'd upon the very hem o' the sea."—Shakespeare.

HEMAM (hĕ'mam), son of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi:22), in 1 Chron. i:39, the name is Homan which is doubtless correct. (B. C. after 1964.)

HEMAN (hĕ'man), (Heb. חַיִּמָּן, hay-mawn, faithful).

1. A member of the tribe of Judah named with others celebrated for their wisdom, to which that of Solomon is compared (1 Kings iv:31; 1 Chron. ii:6). The considerations stated under Ethan will distinguish this Heman from the following, with whom he is sometimes confounded. (B. C. after 1856.)

2. A Kohathite of the tribe of Levi, and one of the leaders of the temple music as organized by David (1 Chron. vi:33; xvi:41, 42), B. C. 1014. This, doubtless, is the Heman to whom the 88th Psalm is ascribed.

HEMATH (hĕ'math), (Heb. חַמַּת, kham-awth', fortress).

A name found in 1 Chron. ii:55, in the genealogical lists of Judah, but whether of a place or person cannot be determined.

HEMDAN (hĕm'dan), (Heb. חַמְדָּן, khem-dawn', pleasant), son of Dishon, son of Anah the Horite (Gen. xxxvi:26). The name is changed to Hauram (Heb. Chamram', 1 Chron. i:41), B. C. about 1964.

HEMLOCK (hĕm'lŏk), a wrong rendering of the Heb. רוֹשֶׁה, roshe (A. V. Hos. x:4) (see GALL), and of עֵצֵי הַחֵמְלֵק, lah-an-aw' (Amos vi:12), which should be rendered as in the R. V. Wormwood.

Figurative. The figurative use of it is explained by comparing the above passage with Deut. xxix:18; Amos v:7; Heb. xii:15. The evils of perverted judgment resemble the springing up of useless and poisonous plants where we look for and expect valuable and nutritious vegetation.

HEM OF A GARMENT (hēm ōv a gār'ment), (Heb. שול, shool, to hang down; Gr. κρᾶσπεδον, kras'ped-on), the extremity; border of the outer garment; fringe (Exod. xxviii:33; xxxix:24-26; Matt. ix:20; xiv:36).

The importance attached to this by the later Jews, especially Pharisees (Matt. xxiii:5) was founded on Num. xv:38, 39. The fringe owed its origin to the ends of the woof being left in order to prevent raveling.

HEN (hēn), (Heb. חַנָּה, khane, grace), son of Zephaniah (Zech. vi:14). Apparently the same as Josiah of verse 10. Perhaps we should read "for the favor of the son of Zephaniah."

HENA (he'nā), (Heb. חַנָּה, hay-nah'), a city of Mesopotamia, the same, probably, which was afterwards called Ana, situated on a ford of the Euphrates (2 Kings xviii:34; xix:13; Is. xxxvii:13).

HENADAD (hēn'a-dād), (Heb. חַנָּה, khay-naw-dawd', favor of Hadad), Hadad, a Levite, who with his family, helped to rebuild the Temple under Jeshua (Ezra iii:9), B. C. before 535.

HENOCH (hē'nok), (Heb. חֲנֹכַח, chan-oke', initiated).

1. The form in which Enoch appears (1 Chron. i:3). The Hebrew is Chanoch, both here and in Genesis.

2. The form in which Hanoch appears in 1 Chron. i:33. (See ENOCH.)

HEPHER (hē'pher), (Heb. חַפְצֵר, khay'fer, a pit, well).

1. A Canaanitish city with a king, subdued by Joshua (Josh. xii:17). Situation unknown.

2. Youngest son of Gilead (Num. xxvi:32), and head of the family by his name. (B. C. before 1618.)

3. Son of Naarah, one of the two of Ashur's wives (1 Chron. iv:6), B. C. 1612.

4. One of David's guard, called the Mecherathite (1 Chron. xi:36).

HEPHERITE (hē'pher-ite), (Heb. חַפְצֵרִי, khay-fer-ree', a descendant of Hopher 2 (Num. xxvi:32).

HEPHZIBAH (hēph'zī-bāh), (Heb. חַפְצֵיבָה, khay'tsee'bah, my delight is in her).

1. The queen of Hezekiah and mother of King Manasseh (2 Kings xxi:1). B. C. before 690.

2. A name to be borne by the restored Jerusalem (Is. lxii:4).

HERAKLES (hēr'a-klez), (Ἡρακλῆς, her-ak-lace') is mentioned in 2 Macc. iv:19, as the Tyrian god to whom the Jewish high-priest Jason sent a religious embassy (theopol), with the offering of 300 drachmæ of silver.

That this Tyrian Hercules (Herod. ii:44) is the same as the Tyrian Baal, whose worship prevailed in the time of the Judges, and was put down by Samuel (1 Sam. vii:4). The effects of that suppression appear to have lasted through the next few centuries, as Baal is not enumerated among the idols of Solomon (1 Kings xi:5-8; 2 Kings xxiii:13). The power of nature, which was worshipped under the form of the Tyrian Hercules, Melkarth, Baal (see BAAL) Adonis, Moloch, and whatever his other names are, was that which originates, sustains, and destroys life. These functions of the deity, according to the Phœnicians, were represented, although not exclusively, by the sun, the influence of which both animates vegetation by its genial warmth, and scorches it up by its fervor. Pliny expressly testifies that human sacrifices were offered up every year to the Carthaginian Hercules (Hist. Nat.

xxxvi v:12), which coincides with what is stated of Baal in Jer. xix:5 and with the acknowledged worship of Moloch. J. N.

HERALD (hēr'ald), (Heb. רוֹזֵף, kar-roze').

The only occurrence of the mention of this officer in the Old Testament is (Dan. iii:4). In the New Testament "Herald" might be substituted in 1 Tim. ii:7; 2 Tim. i:11; 2 Pet. ii:5 for "preacher."

HERBS, BITTER (ērbz, bit'īēr), (Heb. מֵרֹזֵף, mer-o-reem').

The Israelites were commanded to eat "bitter herbs" with the Passover bread (Exod. xii:8; Num. ix:11) to remind them of the bitterness of their bondage in Egypt (Exod. i:14). "The Mishnah mentions these five as falling within the designation of 'bitter herbs,' viz., lettuce, endive, scucory, what is called 'Charchavina (urtica, beets?), and horehound'" (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 204).

HERD (hērd), (Heb. בָּאֵר, ba-w-kawr'; Gr. ἀγέλη, ag-el'ay).

"The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. This word is generic for oxen. It is not like zōu, applicable to two or more species. Wherever it is used, therefore, it might without loss, and with sensible advantage, be translated oxen. Other Hebrew words are translated herds of cattle, and flocks of sheep.

The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule. The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii:3; Ps. lxix:31; Is. lxvi:3); also fresh meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxii:14; 2 Sam. xvii:29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle. The full-grown ox was hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Exod. xxix:1). The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in plowing, thrashing, and as a beast of burden (1 Chron. xii:40; Is. xlvi:1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Is. xv:5; Jer. xlviii:34). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the 'south' region, herds grazed there. Especially was the eastern table-land (Ezek. xxxix:18; Num. xxxii:4) 'a place for cattle.' Herdsmen, etc., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest caste; but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xlvii:6, 17; Exod. ix:4, 20). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. lxxviii:18), the first-born of which also were smitten (Exod. xii:29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Exod. x:26) and took 'much cattle with them' (xii:38). Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (Job vi:5) was used, as also 'chopped straw' (Gen. xxiv:25; Is. xi:7; lxxv:25), which was torn in pieces by the thrashing machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Exod. ix:6, 19)." (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

HERDMAN (hērd-man), (Heb. בָּקָר, bo-kare', a tender of oxen; in distinction from רֹעֵה, a feeder of sheep).

Nothing more strikingly brings out the contrast between the Egyptians and the Hebrews than their different estimation of the pursuit of cattle-raising.

While the latter had large herds and flocks, and considered their possession and keep honorable, the former, quite as dependent upon them for food and labor, despised the herdsman as "an abomination" (Gen. xlvi:34). By the influence of Joseph his brethren were made Pharaoh's chief herdsmen (Gen. xlvii:6). The patriarchs were great herdsmen. The occupation was not inconsistent with state honors; thus, Doeg, "the chiefest of the herdsmen," was high in Saul's favor (1 Sam. xxi:7). David's herdsmasters were among his chief officers of state. In Solomon's time, although commerce decreased its relative importance, the pursuit was still extensive (Eccl. ii:7; 1 Kings iv:23). "It must have suffered greatly from the inroads of the enemies to which the country, under the later kings of Judah and Israel, was exposed. Uzziah, however (2 Chron. xxvi:10), and Hezekiah (xxxii:28, 29), resuming the raising of cattle, had great herds; their principal feeding grounds were Sharon (1 Chron. xxvii:29), the Carmel (1 Sam. xxv:2), and Dothan, (Gen. xxxvii:17), but doubtless all the uncultivated lands were used for this purpose. But for food they did not use, as we do, full-grown beeves, but killed the calves. Fattening for beef is indeed not practiced in the East. The oxen were broken for service in the third year (Is. xv:5). When the heat had dried up all the pasture, the oxen were stalled (Hab. iii:17); hence the figure "a stalled ox" for stately magnificence, which is used in Prov. xv:17. "Calves of the stall" were watchfully cared for (Mal. iv:2). Cattle feed upon foliage as well as upon grass (Ps. l:10). A mixture of various grains, as also chopped straw, is fed when the pasture gives out. See Job vi:5, "fodder;" Is. xxx:24, "provender;" Gen. xxiv:25; Is. xi:7; lxxv:25. (See AGRICULTURE; FLOCK; PASTURAGE; IX.) (Schaff, Bib. Dict.)

HERES (hēr'ērēz), (Heb. הַרְרֵז, har-kheh' res, mountain of the sun), Mount Heres near Aijalon on the borders of Judah and Dan, inhabited by Amorites (Judg. i:35). (See IR-HAHERES.)

HERESH (hēr'resh), (Heb. חֶרֶשׁ, kheh' resh, work, silence, or artificer), a Levite who, with others, was assigned to look after the tabernacle (1 Chron. ix:15), B C 536

HERESY (hēr'è-sÿ). This word is derived from the Greek word αἵρεσις, hai-ee' res-is, which originally meant simply choice, for example of a set of opinions, but is generally used to signify some fundamental error adhered to with obstinacy.

In 1 Cor. xi:19, on margin of R. V., the word is rendered "sects, factions." On margin of Gal. v:20, R. V., it is rendered "parties." It is also used to denote a doctrine or a sect consequent upon departure from sound doctrine (2 Pet. ii:1, margin of R. V. "sects of perdition").

The heresies chiefly alluded to in the apostolic epistles are: (1) Those of the Judaizers, or rigid adherents to the Mosaic rites, especially that of circumcision. (2) Those of converted Hellenists, or Grecian Jews, who held the Greek eloquence and philosophy in too high an estimation, and corrupted, by the speculations of the latter, the simplicity of the gospel. (3) Those who endeavored to blend Christianity with a mixed philosophy of magic, demonology, and Platonism, which was then highly popular in the world.

With respect to the latter, the remarks of Hug will tend to illustrate some passages in the writings of St. Paul: Without being acquainted with the notions of those teachers who caused the apostle so much anxiety and so much vexation, a considerable part of these treatises must necessarily remain dark and unintelligible. From the criteria by which the apostle points them out, at one time some deemed that they recognized the Gnostics; others perceived none but the Essenes; and every one found arguments for his assertions from the similarity of the doctrines, opinions and morals. It would, however, be as difficult to prove that the Gnostic school had at that time indeed perfectly developed itself, as it is unjust to charge the Essenes with that extreme of immorality of which St. Paul accused these seducers, since the contemporaries and acquaintances of this Jewish sect mention them with honor and respect, and extol its members as the most virtuous men of their age.

The similarity of the principles and opinions, which will have been observed in both parties, compared with St. Paul's declarations, flows from a common source, from the philosophy of that age, whence both the one and the other have derived their share. We shall therefore go less astray if we recede a step, and consider the philosophy itself as the general modeler of these derivative theories. It found its followers among Judaism as well as among the heathens; it both introduced its speculative propositions into Christianity, and endeavored to unite them, or to adjust them to it, as well as they were able, by which means Christianity would have become deformed and unlike to itself, and would have been merged in the ocean of philosophical reveries, unless the apostles had on this occasion defended it against the follies of men. An oriental, or, as it is commonly called, a Babylonian or Chaldean, doctrinal system had already long become known to the Greeks, and even to the Romans, before Augustus, and still more so in the Augustan age, and was in the full progress of its extension over Asia and Europe. It set up different deities and intermediate spirits in explanation of certain phenomena of nature, for the office of governing the world, and for the solution of other metaphysical questions, which from time immemorial were reckoned among the difficult propositions of philosophy. The practical part of this system was occupied with the precepts by means of which a person might enter into communication with these spirits or demons. But the result which they promised to themselves from this union with the divine natures, was that of acquiring, by their assistance, superhuman knowledge, that of predicting future events, and of performing supernatural works. These philosophers were celebrated under the name of magi and Chaldeans; who, for the sake of better accommodating themselves to the western nations, modified their system after the Greek forms, and then, as it appears, knew how to unite it with the doctrine of Plato, from whence afterward arose the Neoplatonic and in Christendom the Gnostic school.

HERETIC (hēr'è-tik). See HERESY.

HERITAGE (hēr'it-áj). See INHERITANCE.

HERMAS (hēr'mas), (Gr. Ἑρμᾶς, her-mas', Mercury, interpreter), one of the Christians at Rome, to whom Paul addressed special salutations in his Epistle (Rom. xvi:14).

Of his history and station in life nothing is known. By several writers, ancient and modern, he has been reputed to be the author of a work entitled The Shepherd of Hermas, which from its high antiquity and the supposed connection of the writer with St. Paul, has been usually classed with the epistles of the so-called Apostolic Fathers. It was originally written in Greek, but we possess it only in a Latin version (as old as the time of Tertullian), a few fragments excepted, which are found as quotations in other ancient authors. It has been divided by modern editors (for in the manuscript copies there is no such division) into three books; the first consisting of four visions, the second of twelve commands, and the third of ten similitudes. It is called the 'Shepherd' (ὁ Ποιμήν, Pastor), because the Angel of Repentance (Nuntius Penitentiae), at whose dictation Hermas professes that he wrote the second and third books, appeared in the garb of a shepherd. Impartial judges will probably agree with Mosheim, that 'The Shepherd' contains such a mixture of folly and superstition with piety, of egregious nonsense with momentous truth, as to render it a matter of astonishment that men of learning should ever have thought of giving it a place among the inspired writings.

The Shepherd of Hermas was first published at Paris in 1513, and is included in the editions of the Apostolic Fathers by Cotelerius, Galland, and Hefele. Fabricius also published it in his Codex Apocryphus, Hamburg, 1719. Archbishop Wake's translation is well known. J. E. R.

HERMES (hēr'mēz), (Gr. Ἑρμῆς, her-mace', i. e., the Greek Mercury), the Mercurius of the Romans, was the messenger of the gods, and was equally characterized by adroitness of action and readiness of speech.

He was also the customary attendant of Jupiter when he appeared on earth (Ovid, Fast. v:495). These circumstances explain why the inhabitants of Lystra (Acts xiv:12), as soon as ever they were disposed to believe that the gods had visited them in the likeness of men, discovered Hermes in Paul, as the chief speaker, and as the attendant of Jupiter.

HERMOGENES and PHYGELLUS, (her'mōj' e-nēz ānd fi-gēl-lus), (Gr. Ἑρμογένης, her-mog-en'ace, Mercury-born, Φύγελλος, foog-el-los, a fugitive), disciples of Asia Minor, and probably companions in labor of St. Paul.

They abandoned him during his second imprisonment at Rome, doubtless from alarm at the perils of the connection (2 Tim. i:15), A. D. 64.

HERMON (hēr'mon), (Heb. הַרְמוֹן, her-mone', the peak).

A mountain which formed the northernmost boundary of the country beyond the Jordan which the Hebrews conquered from the Amorites (Deut. iii:8), and which, therefore, must have belonged to Anti-Libanus.

Since modern travelers have made us acquainted with the country beyond the Jordan, no doubt has been entertained that the Mount Hermon of those texts is no other than the present Jebel Es-sheikh, or the Sheikh's mountain, or, which is equivalent, Old Man's Mountain, a name it is said to have obtained from its fancied resemblance (being topped with snow, which sometimes lies in lengthened streaks upon its sloping ridges) to the hoary head and beard of a venerable sheikh (Elliot, i:317). This Jebel Es-sheikh is a south-eastern, and in that direction culminating, branch of Anti-Libanus. It is probably the highest of all the Lebanon mountains, and is thought to rival Mont Blanc, though, as Elliot observes, the high ground on which it stands detracts considerably from its apparent altitude, and makes it a less imposing object than that king of European mountains as viewed from the Italian valley of Aosta.

The mention of Hermon along with Tabor in Ps. lxxxix:12, led to its being sought near the latter mountain, where, accordingly, travelers and maps give us a 'Little Hermon.' But that passage, as well as Ps. cxxxiii:3, applies better to the great mountain already described; and in the former it seems perfectly natural for the Psalmist to call upon these mountains, respectively the most conspicuous in the western and eastern divisions of the Hebrew territory, to rejoice in the name of the Lord. Besides, we are to consider that Jebel Es-sheikh is seen from Mount Tabor, and that both together are visible from the plain of Esdraelon. There is no reason to suppose that the so-called Little Hermon is at all mentioned in Scripture. Its actual name is Jebel ed-Duhy; it is a shapeless, barren, and uninteresting mass of hills, in the north of the valley of Jezreel and opposite Mount Gilboa. (Thomson, The Land and the Book, vol. i, p. 458).

Hermon was perhaps the 'high mountain' of Matt. xvii:1; Mark ix:2 ('the mountain' of Luke ix:28) near Casarea Philippi, which was the scene of the Transfiguration and of the cloud which covered the disciples. In the Roman period it was a sacred center, and small temples were built on the slopes on every side, while the highest point was encircled with a masonry wall, and seems to have supported an altar. Close by is a rock-cut chamber on the plateau. In the fourth century A. D. (see Onomast. s. v. 'Aerion') there was still a temple at which the people of Paneas and Lebanon worshiped, on the summit of Hermon. In the tenth century it became the center of the Druze religion, and to it Sheikh ed-Derâzi, the founder of the latter creed, retired from Egypt. At Hasbeyâ, on its western slopes, the sacred books of the sect were found by the French in 1860. Hermon is called Jebel esh-Sheikh, or 'mountain of the chief,' for this reason, being the residence of the religious Sheikh of the Druzes. The translation sometimes suggested, 'chief of mountains,' is grammatically impossible. Hermon was visited by the present writer in 1873 (when the height and geographical position were determined) and in 1882. (R. C. Conder, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

Kitto says: "There can be no doubt that one of the southern peaks of Hermon was the scene of the Transfiguration. Our Lord traveled from Bethsaida, on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, to the coasts of Casarea Philippi; thence he led his disciples 'into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them.' Afterward he returned, going toward Jerusalem through Galilee (comp. Mark viii:22-28; Matt. xvi:13; Mark ix:2-13, 30-33). For many centuries a monkish tradition assigned this honor to Tabor, but it is now restored to its proper locality."

HERMONITES (hēr'mon-ites), (Heb. הַרְמוֹנִי, her-mo-neem'), properly "the Hermons," with reference to the three summits of Mount Hermon (Ps. xlii:6).

HEROD (hēr'od); this was not a personal name, but the family or surname.

It belonged alike to all the generations of the Herodian house as known to the Scriptures. Much confusion has arisen from not having cognized this simple fact. Hence some have even questioned the inerrancy of Luke in that he called Herod Antipas "Herod," when Josephus uniformly calls him "Antipas." But the point assumed is itself a mistake. For Luke mentions him as "Herod," and "Herod the tetrarch," and as "Herod the tetrarch of Galilee" in the same chapter (iii:1, 19); and Josephus repeatedly calls him "Herod the tetrarch," and "Herod the tetrarch of Galilee," and "that Herod who was called Antipas" (Ant. xviii, ch. 2, sec. 3; ch. 7, sec. 1). (See HERODIAN FAMILY.)

HERODIAN FAMILY (he-rō'di-an fām'ī-lŷ), (Gr. Ἡρωδιᾶνοι, hay-ro-dee-an-oy').

Josephus introduces us to the knowledge of the Herodian family in the fourteenth book of his Antiquities. He there tells us (ch. i, sec. 3) that among the chief friends of Hyrcanus the high-priest was an Idumæan, named Antipater, distinguished for his riches, and no less for his turbulent and seditious temper. He also quotes an author who represented him as descended from one of the best of the Jewish families which returned from Babylon after the captivity, but adds that this statement was founded on no better grounds than a desire to flatter the pride and support the pretensions of Herod.

(1) Herod the Great was the son of Antipater and Cypros and bore the titles of "Herod the King," "King of Judea," and "Herod the Great." In 47 B. C. Julius Cæsar gave the procuratorship of Judea to Antipater, who divided the territory among his four sons, giving Herod Galilee. He was then only about twenty-five years of age.

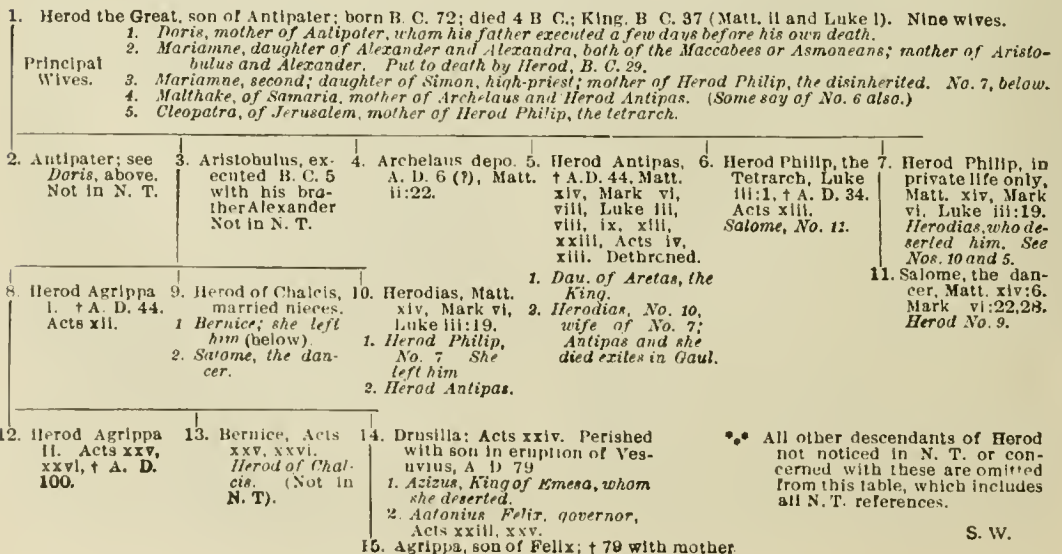

His first act was to repress the brigands who were infesting his province, many of whom he executed. Sextus Cæsar appointed him governor of Cœle-Syria, which he also held under Cassius, and for some time was very efficient in raising money for military purposes. In 41 B. C., when Antony came to Syria, Herod made him valuable presents and gained his favor. He and Phasaël were appointed tetrarchs of Judea; but war breaking out, Herod fled to Rome, where, by the aid of Antony, he was made king of Judea. He was not acceptable, however, and the Asmonean family contested his right to their kingdom. Herod made preparations to take Jerusalem, and after six months' siege, the Romans entered the city, and the Asmonean dynasty passed away. Herod executed all the members of the Sanhedrim except two, confiscated their property, and put a new priest in power.

After the defeat of Antony at Actium, Herod obtained an audience with Octavius, and obtained assurances of security in his realm; and nearly all of Palestine was added to his territory.

In his domestic life Herod had endless trouble. His father died by poison. The poisoner was assassinated. His brothers Phasaël and Joseph fell in wars. His satanic sister Salome urged him to crime. His brother Pheroras, while plotting with Antipater against Herod, was poisoned by his own wife. When Herod went to meet Mark Antony, and again to meet Octavian, he gave orders to put his wife Mariamne, the Asmonean, to death if he should not return. His uncle Joseph in one case, and his minister Sohemus in the other, let the woman worm the secret from them. Both were executed for that. He murdered but one of his wives; others he cast aside. Doris was cast off, recalled, again stripped of honors and wealth, and banished. The first Mariamne learned of his murderous orders concerning her, and of his crafty murder of her brother Aristobulus, a pretended accident. She hated him and flouted him. In a frenzy he charged her with adultery, for he dared not dispose of her secretly. She marched to death with the proud dignity of a Maccabean. Her two sons, Aristobulus and Alexander, were educated at Rome in the imperial family of Augustus. Herod brought them home. He admired them, but found them too popular. A charge of treason put the strangler's cord upon their necks. Antipater, eldest son, had much reason to hate his father, for his mother's sake and his own. He laid plots for assassination. The Roman judge condemned him. Augustus left final sentence to Herod. The son was put to death five days before the father died. The emperor is said to have made the remark, "I had rather be Herod's sow than Herod's son." His diseased body, no doubt, helped to make him the monster of crime that he was.

At the visit of the Magi, and the announcement of the birth of some great personage in his kingdom, he was greatly stirred, and all Jerusalem with him. The massacre of the children in Bethlehem was no strange act for a man who had murdered so many of his own household. When nearing death he gave orders that the principal Jews, whom he had shut up in the hippodrome at Jericho, should be killed immediately after his death; but they were released, and the day was celebrated as a deliverance rather than as a funeral. He died, aged sixty-nine, a few days before the Passover, B. C. 4, and the death scene, as reported, was awful, both as regards his mind and body. "And so, choking as it were with blood, desiring massacres, as in its very delirium, the soul of Herod passed forth into the night."—Farrar.

Though he had married ten wives, had nine sons and five daughters, yet within one hundred years not a relative of the great Herodian family was left to curse the earth. He left three sons as heirs of his immense estates—Archelaus, Antipas, Philip II; and two grandsons, Agrippa I and Agrippa II. Despite all his inhuman villainy, he did much for Judea and his kingdom. His greatest work was the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem, the main part of which was completed in less than two years; but additions continued for "forty and six years." It stood complete but a short time, when Herod's great work fell before the legions of Titus; and the beautiful house where the Divine Master walked and talked was no more.

(2) Archelaus (Ἀρχελαός) was the elder of the two sons of Herod by Malthace, a Samaritan woman (Ant. xvii, 1, 3). He was brought up at Rome with his own brother Antipas, at a private house. He had been accused by Antipater of disloyalty, and so had been at first kept out of any inheritance. His visit to Rome has been narrated above. After he had acquired the kingdom, there is little related of him. He outraged Jewish sentiment by marrying Glaphyra, widow of his brother Alexander, although she had had children by him, and had another husband (Juba of Mauritania) living, and his own wife was alive. He built a palace at Jericho, and a village in his own honor, of the name of Archelais. He was the worst of all Herod's sons that survived, and, after nine years of his rule, the people of Judea and Samaria could no longer endure his cruelty and tyranny. They complained to Augustus, who summoned Archelaus to Rome, and, after hearing the case, banished him to Vienne. From this time to the year A. D. 41 Palestine was under Roman procurators.

Archelaus is mentioned once in the New Testament, in Matt. ii:22.

(3) Herod Antipas, of Galilee and Peræa. This Herod was first married to a daughter of King Aretas of Arabia; but forming an unholy attachment for Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, he soon became involved in a course of guilt which ended in his utter ruin. Aretas, to avenge his daughter, sent a considerable army against Herod, whose generals in vain attempted to oppose its progress. The forces which they led were totally destroyed, and instant ruin seemed to threaten both Herod and his dominions. An appeal to the Romans afforded the only hope of safety. Aretas was haughtily ordered by the emperor to desist from the prosecution of the war, and Herod accordingly escaped the expected overthrow. But he was not allowed to enjoy his prosperity long. His nephew Agrippa having obtained the title of king, Herodias urged him to make a journey to Italy and demand the same honor. He weakly assented to his wife's ambitious representations; but the project proved fatal to them both. Agrippa anticipated their designs; and when they appeared before Caligula they were met by accusations of hostility to Rome, the truth of which they in vain attempted to disprove. Sentence of deposition was accordingly passed upon Herod, and both he and his wife were sent into banishment and died at Lyons in Gaul.

(4) Philip (Φίλιππος) was the son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem (Ant. xvii:1, 3). He had been educated at Rome, like the remainder of Herod's sons. The territory to which he succeeded on the death of his father and by the decision of Augustus (see above), consisted, according to Josephus, of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and Panceas (Ant. xvii, viii, 1, xi, 4, xviii, iv, 6; BJ II, vi:3), according to St. Luke (iii:1) the country of Ituræa and Trachonitis.

Unlike the rest of his family, he was distinguished for justice and moderation. He married his niece Salome, the daughter of Herodias and his brother Herod (Philip), who was the young woman that danced before Herod Antipas. Philip is referred to twice in the New Testament (Luke iii:1; Acts xiii:1).

He ruled for 38 years from his accession in B. C. 4. His character is summed up by Josephus (Ant. xviii, iv, 6): 'He was moderate and peaceful in his rule, and spent his whole life in his country. He went out with only a small retinue, always taking with him the throne on which he might sit and judge. Whenever he met any one who had need of him, he made no delay, but set down the throne wherever he might be and heard the case.'

(5) Herod Agrippa, or Agrippa I, alluded to above, was the son of Aristobulus, so cruelly put to death by his father Herod the Great. The earlier part of his life was spent at Rome, where the magnificence and luxury in which he indulged reduced him to poverty. After a variety of adventures and sufferings he was thrown into bonds by Tiberius, but on the succession of Caligula was not only restored to liberty, but invested with royal dignity, and made tetrarch of Abilene, and of the districts formerly pertaining to the tetrarchy of Philip. His influence at the Roman court increasing, he subsequently obtained Galilee and Peræa, and at length Judæa and Samaria, his dominion being thus extended over the whole country of Palestine.

To secure the good-will of his subjects, he yielded to their worst passions and caprices. Memorable instances are afforded of this in the apostolic history, where we are told that 'He stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church, and he killed James, the brother of John, with the sword; and because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also' (Acts xii:1-3). His awful death, described in the same chapter, and by Josephus almost in the same words (Antiq. xix, 8), occurred in the fifty-fourth year of his age.

(6) Herod Agrippa, or Agrippa II, the son of the above named, was in his seventeenth year when his father died. The emperor Claudius, at whose court the young Agrippa was then residing, purposed conferring upon him the dominions enjoyed by his father. From this he was deterred, says Josephus, by the advice of his ministers, who represented the danger of trusting an important province of the empire to so youthful a ruler. Herod was, therefore, for the time, obliged to content himself with the small principality of Chalcis, but was not long after created sovereign of the tetrarchies formerly belonging to Philip and Lysanias; a dominion increased at a subsequent period by the grant of a considerable portion of Peræa. The habits which he had formed at Rome, and his strong attachment to the people to whose rulers he was indebted for his prosperity, brought him into frequent disputes with his own nation. In Acts xxv and xxvi we have an account of the speech of St. Paul before Agrippa, Bernice, and Festus. St. Paul's compliment, that Agrippa was 'expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews,' was well deserved, and the somewhat enigmatic 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian' may be interpreted according to our conception of Agrippa's character. He died, at the age of seventy, in the early part of the reign of Trajan.

HERODIANS (he-rō'di-anz), (Gr. Ἡρωδιανοί, hay-ro-dee-an-oy'), a class of Jews that existed in the time of Jesus Christ, whether of a political or religious description it is not easy, for want of materials, to determine.

The passages of the New Testament which refer to them are the following (Mark iii:6; xii:13; Matt. xxii:16; Luke xx:20). The particulars are these: The ecclesiastical authorities of Judæa having failed to entrap Jesus by demanding the authority by which he did his wonderful works, especially as seen in his expurgation of the temple; and being incensed in consequence of the parable spoken against them, namely, 'A certain man planted a vineyard,' etc., held a council against him, and associating with themselves the Herodians, sent an embassy to our Lord with the express but covert design of ensnaring him in his speech, that thus they might compass his destruction. The question they put to him was one of the most difficult—'Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar?' The way in which Jesus extricated himself from the difficulty and discomfited his enemies is well known.

Do these circumstances afford any light as to what was the precise character of the Herodians? Whatever decision on this point may be arrived at, the general import of the transaction is very clear, and of a character highly honorable to Jesus. That his enemies were actuated by bad faith, and came with false pretenses, might also be safely inferred. Luke, however, makes an express statement to this effect, saying (xx:18-20), 'they sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people; and they watched him, and sent forth spies which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor.' The aim, then, was to embroil our Lord with the Romans. For this purpose the question put had been cunningly chosen. These appear to have been the several feelings whose toils were around Jesus—the hatred of the priests, the favor of the people towards himself, and their aversion to the dominion of the Romans, their half faith in him as the Messiah, which would probably be converted into the vexation and rage of disappointment, should he approve the payment of tribute to Rome; another element of difficulty had in the actual case been deliberately provided—the presence of the Herodians. Altogether the scene was most perplexing, the trial most perilous. But what additional difficulty did the Herodians bring? Herod Antipas was now tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, which was the only inheritance he received from his father Herod the Great. As tetrarch of Galilee he was specially the ruler of Jesus, whose home was in that province. The Herodians then may have been subjects of Herod, Galilæans, whose evidence the priests were wishful to procure, because theirs would be the evidence of fellow-countrymen, and of special force with Antipas as being that of his own immediate subjects (Luke xxiii:7).

Herod's relations with Rome were in an unsafe condition. He was a weak prince, given to ease and luxury, and his wife's ambition conspired with his own desires to make him strive to obtain from the Emperor Caligula the title of king. For this purpose he took a journey to Rome, and was banished to Lyons in Gaul.

The Herodians may have been favorers of his pretensions: if so, they would be partial hearers, and eager witnesses against Jesus before the Roman tribunal. It would be a great service to the Romans to be the means of enabling them to get rid of one who aspired to be king of the Jews. It would equally gratify their own lord, should the Herodians give effectual aid in putting a period to the mysterious yet formidable claims of a rival claimant of the crown.

We do not see that the two characters here ascribed to the Herodians are incompatible; and if they were a Galilæan political party who were eager to procure from Rome the honor of royalty for Herod (Mark vi:14, the name of king is merely as of courtesy), they were chosen as associates by the Sanhedrim with especial propriety.

The deputation were to 'feign themselves just men,' that is, men whose sympathies were entirely Jewish, and, as such, anti-heathen: they were to intimate their dislike of paying tribute, as being an acknowledgment of a foreign yoke; and by flattering Jesus, as one who loved truth, feared no man, and would say what he thought, they meant to inveigle him into a condemnation of the practice. In order to carry these base and hypocritical designs into effect, the Herodians were appropriately associated with the Pharisees; for as the latter were the recognized conservators of Judaism, so the former were friends of the aggrandizement of a native as against a foreign prince.

HERODIAS (he-rō'di-as), (Gr. Ἡρωδίας, hay-ro-dee'as, feminine of Herod), the daughter of Aristobulus—one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great—and sister of Herod Agrippa I. (See HERODIAN FAMILY, and Table, page 804.)

HERODION (he-rō'di-ōn), (Gr. Ἡρωδίων, hay-ro-dee'ohn, derived from Herod), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation as his kinsman (Rom. xvi:11). A. D. 55. According to Hippolytus he became Bishop of Tarsus, but according to others, of Patra.

HERON (hēr'ūn), (Heb. הֶרֶן, an-aw-faw', Lev xi:19; Deut. xiv:18).

The original is a disputed name of an unclean bird, which has also been translated kite, woodcock, parrot, and crane. For the first of these see GLEDE; the second is rare and only a momentary visitor in Palestine; the third surely required no prohibition where it was not a resident species, and probably not imported till the reign of Solomon; and, as to the crane, we have already shown it to have been likewise exotic, making only a momentary appearance, and that rarely, in Syria. If the Hebrew name be derived from anaph, 'to breathe short,' or 'to sniff through the nostrils with an irritated expression,' the most obvious application would be to the goose, a bird not, perhaps, otherwise noticed in the Hebrew Scriptures: though it was constantly eaten in Egypt it was not held unclean by the Jews, and, at some seasons, must have frequented the lakes of Palestine. The heron, though not so constantly hissing, can utter a similar sound of displeasure with much more meaning, and the common species Ardea cinerea is found in Egypt, and is also abundant in the Hauran of Palestine, where it frequents the margins of lakes and pools, and the reedy water-courses in the deep ravines, striking and devouring an immense quantity of fish. C. H. S.

HESED (he'sed), (Heb. חֶסֶד, kheh'sed, kindness), a man whose son was Solomon's commissary officer in Aruboth, Sochoh and Hopher (1 Kings iv:10), B. C. 955.

HESHBON (hësh'bôn), (Heb. חֶשְׁבֹן, khehsh-bone', intelligence), a town in the southern district of the Hebrew territory beyond the Jordan, parallel with, and twenty-one miles east of, the point where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea, and nearly midway between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon.

It originally belonged to the Moabites; but when the Israelites arrived from Egypt, it was found to be in the possession of the Amorites, whose king, Sihon, is styled both king of the Amorites and king of Heshbon, and is expressly said to have 'reigned in Heshbon' (Josh. ix:10; comp. Num. xxi:26; Deut. ii:24). It was taken by Moses (Num. xxi:23-26), and eventually became a Levitical city (Josh. xxi:39; 1 Chron. vi:81) in the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii:37; Josh. xiii:17); but being on the confines of Gad, is sometimes assigned to the latter tribe (Josh. xxi:39; 1 Chron. vi:81). After the ten tribes were sent into exile, Heshbon was taken possession of by the Moabites, and hence is mentioned by the prophets in their declarations against Moab (Is. xv:4; Jer. xlviii:2, 34, 45). Under King Alexander Jannæus we find it again reckoned as a Jewish city (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 15, 4).

At the present day it is known by its ancient name of Heshbon, in the slightly modified form of Hesbân. The ruins of a considerable town still exist, covering the sides of an insulated hill, but not a single edifice is left entire. The view from the summit is very extensive, embracing the ruins of a vast number of cities, the names of some of which bear a strong resemblance to those mentioned in Scripture. (Burckhardt, George Robinson, Lord Lindsay, Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 374.)

Figurative. In Cant. vii:4 the eyes of the Shulamite are compared to the "fishpools of Heshbon," by the gate of Bath-rabbim. The bright pools in the stream which runs beneath Hesbân on the west are perhaps intended (Harper).

HESHMON (hësh'môn), (Heb. חֶשְׁמוֹן, khehsh-mone', fatness), a city of Judah (Josh. xv:27), in the extreme southern part.

HESRON (hës'rôn). See HEZRON.

HESRONITES, THE (hës'rôn-ites, thü). See HEZRONITES.

HETH (hëth), (Heb. חֵת, khayth, terror, dread), father of the Hittites, was eldest son of Canaan, and dwelt south of the promised land, at or near Hebron (Gen. x:15; xxiii:3, 7; xxv:10).

Ephron, of Hebron, was of the race of Heth; and that city, in Abraham's time, was peopled by the children of Heth. Some think there was a city called Heth; but we find no traces of it in Scripture (Gen. x; 1 Chron. i). (See HITTITES.)

HETHLON (hëth'lôn), (Heb. חֶתְלוֹן, khehth-lone', wrapped up), a city mentioned in Ezek. xlvii:15; xlviii:1; comp. Num. xxxiv:8), as limiting the land of promise, north.

It is not fully identified, though it may be mentioned that Kasteren proposes to identify Hethlon with the modern Adlun N. of the mouth of the Kasimiyeh, which he takes to have been the ideal northern boundary of Israel. Bertholet (Hesekiel, ad loc.) and Buhl are inclined to favor Kasteren's identification.

HEWING (hä'ü'ng), (Heb. חָרַט, kharw-tsab').

The Gibeonites, having deceived Joshua, were sentenced to serve as "hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation" (Josh. ix:21), a service which was performed by the menial portion of the people (Deut. xxix:11). In 1 Kings v:15 it is recorded that Solomon "had fourscore thousand hewers in the mountains."

HEXATEUCH (hëks'a-tük), (Gr. ἕξ, six, and Τεῦχος, a book), the first six books of the Old Testament.

Many questions have arisen concerning the six books which are included in the above term, and great liberties have been taken in the direction of speculations upon this subject. Results are one thing and scientific results are quite another. There is a form of Higher Criticism which claims to seek "the solution of all questions relating to origin, form and value of literature" chiefly by the examinations of internal phenomena, and especially claims to be able to reconstruct and rearrange compositions, to re-determine authorship, revise statements and rearrange dates of the several portions of the Hexateuch.

(1) Principles of Scientific Criticism. Science, however, consists in the exact observation of certain facts, and a careful interpretation of them without prejudice under the following principles or laws of thought:

1. Facts must be observed, not assumed.
2. They must be observed without pre-judgment.
3. All relevant principles must be considered.
4. There must be no forcing of facts by either rejection or assertion.
5. There must be logical inductions from the whole body of facts, and these deductions must be unhampered by theories, and unconfuted by grave exceptions.
6. There must be a substantial agreement in conclusions which exclude conflicting explanations.

How far the criticism in question has conformed to these principles of science will appear from even the casual notice of certain points which brevity requires.

(2) Unwarranted Assumptions. In order to harmonize the facts with certain theories, it is necessary to make unwarranted assumptions, and subordinate methods are often employed, which it is difficult to justify in the light of science:

1. Some critics assume the privilege of reconstructing narratives at their own discretion, and they make peremptory challenge of words and phrases which they claim belong to redactors. This process is too common to require an example.
2. They deny the plain statements of the narrative, as when Wellhausen pronounces Abraham to be "a free creation of unconscious art."
3. They transplant words, phrases, sentences and long paragraphs hither and thither, absolutely without restriction, and assign them to certain writers, which they denominate either J. E. or P.
4. With the same freedom, and for the same purpose, they assert the former existence and loss of considerable portions of the work of these hypothetical writers.

5. They claim the right to identify two transactions which the narratives make entirely distinct, and they also disintegrate a single transaction into two, and in each case they claim to find contradictions or proofs of diverse authorship.

When these results are obtained by speculation, by the forcing of facts, and by unwarranted assumptions without proof, we must inquire wherein such methods differ from that of the miner who introduces ore into his claim by artificial methods, or those of the chemist who adulterates a product before analysis?

(3) Varied Results. But even under these principles and processes, there is very little agreement in results, and there is scarcely one important theory which has been advanced by the so-called Higher Critics which has not been more or less discredited by some other member of the same school. This system allows the greatest diversity of opinion on the one hand, and a general copying from each other at the same time.

Dr. Briggs epitomizes "a general agreement of the ablest biblical scholars" as to the following writers: viz., P., J., E., D. and three redactors, making seven, but in the same treatise he finds it "necessary to distinguish" five more, making twelve.

Cornill specifies no less than eighteen writers and editors of the Hexateuch. Wellhausen wants twenty more, while Dillmann, the strongest scholar of them all, sturdily rejects seven or eight of these imaginary personages; for who could surely distinguish the various parts of the work which might have been done by twenty, twelve, or even six, writers in one composition which was fairly well combined?

The whole literary public has been unable to identify the portions of a collaborated novel which was prepared by even two writers, and that, too, in a vernacular whose every shade of meaning was familiar to the critics. What, then, can we think of the success of an effort of this kind after centuries have intervened, and the tongue in which the work was written has become practically a dead language?

(4) The Polychrome Bible. The only way in which the Polychrome Bible can furnish its variegated texts is by assigning each book to a single editor. It may be doubted whether Professor Cheyne could find seven scholars of high repute in England, America or Germany who would fully accept his dismemberment of Isaiah into more than one hundred and sixty fragments, with scores of transpositions, numerous lacunæ and rejections, together with the assignment of some twenty dates, ranging over a period of four hundred and sixty-five years. A very striking peculiarity meets us also in the fact that, after this elaborate specification of sources, the fabric which has been so laboriously constructed is demolished at a stroke by some of the leaders of the enterprise, when they declare the alleged writers to be, not individuals, but processes extending through long periods. Some notice should be taken of the liberty which is used in alleging glosses, later text changes, and erroneous statements, in order to maintain the recent theories as to the tribe of Levi and the priesthood, the history of the law and the sanctuary, but for such particulars there must be a resort to more extended discussions. (See "The Veracity of the Pentateuch," by Dr. Samuel Colcord Bartlett, p. 328.)

(5) Assigned Dates. In regard to the assigned dates of the alleged constituents of the Hexateuch, it may be said that although there are considerable differences, still there is more or less agreement in the tendency to bring them down to a period some five hundred years later than Moses to the Exile, and even later, with allowances for fragments of earlier origin.

(6) Contemporaneous History. But a conclusion, however elaborately argued, is not scientifically established unless it excludes other valid explanations. This complicated and unrestrained, and yet unstable analysis of the Hexateuch has not, in the judgment of many sound and scholarly thinkers, excluded the more simple and formerly accepted view, which is a history substantially contemporaneous with the authorship though in part drawn from previous authentic sources, and inevitably somewhat modified, and perhaps modernized in the transmission through a period of a thousand years. Those earlier sources may also have undergone some changes in the transfer from the tongue which was native to Abraham in Babylonia, into the Hebrew which became the language of Israel.

(7) Older Documents. The fact that some older documents were used in the Hexateuch is not a discovery of modern investigators; that it embodies contents hundreds of years older than Moses is not a matter of speculation, but of record. The history itself refers to "The Book of the Wars of the Lord" and also to "The Book of Jasher," although the latter was merely a collection of poems rather than history.

(8) Opinions of Recent Scientists. The possibility of the Deluge by the method described, is sustained by such recent scientists as Miller, Howarth, Dawson and Prestwich, De Girard and others, and is still further confirmed, though unintentionally, by the testimony of Le Conte and other specialists to the effect that "a great inland sea" once submerged the whole region that includes the Caspian Sea, Lake Aral and other lakes. (See also "Deluge, Illustrative Facts Concerning," by Sir J. W. Dawson.)

(9) Archæological Facts. Increasing attention is also directed to the indications corresponding to the still earlier portions of the biblical narrative. That the fourteenth chapter of Genesis deals with actual persons and conditions at least two thousand years before Christ is now well sustained, in spite of the strenuous opposition of the critics. (See CHEDORLAOMER; ARIOCH; AMRAPHEL, etc.)

(10) Separate Histories. The eleven sets of generations in Genesis were well described a century ago by Lord Arthur Hervey as "marking the existence of separate histories from which the Book of Genesis was compiled," not only in accordance with the obvious facts of the case, and the unquestionable fact of Jewish genealogies extending back into very remote times, but with the definite statement in the narrative itself, concerning the genealogical list from Adam to Noah and his sons, "This is the book of the generations of Adam" (Gen. v:1.)

(11) Founder of the Nation. That Moses was the great founder and molder of the nation of Israel, of its character and institutions, is necessarily admitted by the critics (with a few sporadic exceptions), and emphatically so by Wellhausen and Driver. This admission is made because of the undeniable historic testimony, and especially the incorporation of his mighty personality into the whole life and composition of the Jewish people. In a word, nothing in the theories of modern criticism has been so proved as to disprove the authenticity of the Hexateuch, or to exclude the essential features of the view so long held by the Hebrew nation and the Christian world.

(12) Historical Character of the Hexateuch. Every decade is making it more unsafe to impugn the historical character of the Hexateuch.

It is a question of interest whether that which has been announced as "the greatest Biblical work of the age," the Polychrome Bible, so far as it conforms to Professor Cheyne's standard, may not prove to be a heavy ordnance, more effective in the recoil than the aim.

Andrew Lang, in Longman's Magazine, comments upon it as follows: "The method is simple and Teutonic. You have a theory, you accept the evidence of the sacred writers as far as it suits your theory, and when it does not suit, you say that the inconvenient passage is an interpolation. It must be, for if not, what becomes of your theory? So you print the inconvenient passage in green, or what not, and then the people know all about it. (See "The Veracity of the Hexateuch," by Samuel Colcord Bartlett, D.D., LL.D.; The Documents of the Hexateuch, by W. E. Addis, M. A., 1898.)

HEZEKI (hēz'e-kī), (Heb. חִזְקִיָּה, khiz-kee', strong), one of the "sons" of Elpaël, a chief resident of Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:17, 18); a Benjamite. In R. V., Hizki.

HEZEKIAH (hēz'e-kī'ah), (Heb. חִזְקִיָּהוּ, khiz-kee-yaw', strengthened of Jehovah, 2 Kings xviii:1, 10, 14, 15).

1. Son of Ahaz and Abi (Abijah), born B. C. about 744 (2 Kings xviii:1, 2; 2 Chron. xxix:1).

(1) Inauguration of Reform. From the commencement of his reign the efforts of Hezekiah were directed to the reparation of the effects of the grievous errors of his predecessors; and during his time the true religion and the theocratical policy flourished as they had not done since the days of David. The Temple was cleared and purified; the utensils and forms of service were restored to their ancient order; all the changes introduced by Ahaz were abolished; all the monuments of idolatry were destroyed, and their remains cast into the brook Kedron. Among the latter was the brazen serpent of Moses, which had been deposited first in the tabernacle, and then in the Temple, as a memorial of the event in which it originated: and it is highly to the credit of Hezekiah, and shows more clearly than any other single circumstance the spirit of his operations, that even this interesting relic was not spared when it seemed in danger of being turned to idolatrous uses. Having succeeded by his acts and words in rekindling the zeal of the priests and of the people, the king appointed a high festival, when, attended by his court and people, he proceeded in high state to the Temple, to present sacrifices of expiation for the past irregularities, and to commence the reorganized services. A vast number of sacrifices evinced to the people the zeal of their superiors, and Judah, long sunk in idolatry, was at length reconciled to God (2 Kings xviii:1-8; 2 Chron. xxix).

The revival of the great annual festivals was included in this reformation. The Passover, which was the most important of them all, had not for a long time been celebrated according to the rites of the law; and the day on which it regularly fell, in the first year of Hezekiah, being already past, the king, nevertheless, justly conceiving the late observance a less evil than the entire omission of the feast, directed that it should be kept on the 14th day of the second month, being one month after its proper time. Couriers were sent from town to town, inviting the people to attend the solemnity; and even the ten tribes which formed the neighboring kingdom were invited to share with their brethren of Judah in a duty equally incumbent on all the children of Abraham. Of these some received the message gladly, and others with disdain; but a considerable number of persons belonging to the northernmost tribes (which had more seldom than the others been brought into hostile contact with Judah) came to Jerusalem, and by their presence imparted a new interest to the solemnity. A profound and salutary impression appears to have been made on this occasion; and so strong was the fervor and so great the number of the assembled people, that the festival was prolonged to twice its usual duration; and during this time the multitude was fed abundantly from the countless offerings presented by the king and his nobles. Never since the time of Solomon, when the whole of the twelve tribes were wont to assemble at the Holy City, had the Passover been observed with such magnificence (2 Chron. xxx).

The good effect of this procedure was seen when the people carried back to their homes the zeal for the Lord which had thus been kindled, and proceeded to destroy and cast forth all the abominations by which their several towns had been defiled, thus performing again on a smaller scale, the doings of the king in Jerusalem. Even the 'high places,' which the pious kings of former days had spared, were on this occasion abolished and overthrown; and even the men of Israel, who had attended the feast, were carried away by the same holy enthusiasm, and, on returning to their homes, broke all their idols in pieces (2 Chron. xxxi:1).

The attention of this pious king was extended to whatever concerned the interests of religion in his dominions. He caused a new collection of Solomon's proverbs to be made, being the same which occupy chaps. xxv-xxix of the book which bears that name. The sectional divisions of the priests and Levites were re-established; the perpetual sacrifices were recommenced and maintained from the royal treasure; the stores of the temple were once more filled by the offerings of the people, and the times of Solomon and Jehoshaphat seemed to have returned (2 Chron. xxxi).

(2) Military Ventures. This great work having been accomplished and consolidated (2 Kings xvii:7, etc.) Hezekiah applied himself to repair the calamities, as he had repaired the crimes, of his father's government. He took arms and recovered the cities of Judah which the Philistines had seized. Encouraged by this success, he ventured to withhold the tribute which his father had paid to the Assyrian king; and this act, which the result shows to have been imprudent, drew upon the country the greatest calamities of his reign. Only a few years before, namely, in the fourth of his reign, the Assyrians had put an end to the kingdom of Israel and sent the ten tribes into exile, but had abstained from molesting Hezekiah, as he was already their tributary.

(3) Assyrian Invasion. Seeing his country invaded on all sides by the Assyrian forces under Sennacherib, and Lachish, a strong place which covered Jerusalem, on the point of falling into their hands, Hezekiah, not daring to meet them in the field, occupied himself in all necessary preparations for a protracted defense of Jerusalem, in hope of assistance from Egypt, with which country he had contracted an alliance (Is. xxx:1-7). (See LACHISH.) Such alliances were not favored by the divine sovereign of Israel and his prophets, and no good ever came of them. But this alliance did not render the good king unmindful of his true source of strength, for in quieting the alarms of the people he directed their attention to the consideration that they in fact had more of power and strength in the divine protection than the Assyrian king possessed in all his host. 'There is more with us than with him; with him is an arm of flesh, but with us is the Lord our God to help us and fight our battles.' Nevertheless, Hezekiah was himself distrustful of the course he had taken, and at length, to avert the calamities of war, sent to the Assyrian king offers of submission. Sennacherib, who was anxious to proceed against Egypt, consented to withdraw his forces on the payment of three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (see SENNACHERIB), which the king was not able to raise without exhausting both his own treasury and that of the Temple, and stripping off the gold with which the doors and pillars of the Lord's house were overlaid (2 Kings xviii:7-16).

But after he had received the silver and gold the Assyrian king broke faith with Hezekiah and continued to prosecute his warlike operations. While he employed himself in taking the fortresses of Judæa, which it was important to secure before he marched against Egypt, he sent three of his generals—Rabshakeh and Rabсарis, besides the Tartan, or commander-in-chief—with part of his forces to threaten Jerusalem with a siege unless it were surrendered, and the inhabitants submitted to be sent into Assyria; and this summons was delivered in language highly insulting not only to the king and people, but to the God they worshipped.

(4) Assyrian Defeat. When the terms of the summons were made known to Hezekiah he gathered courage from the conviction that God would not fail to vindicate the honor of his insulted name. In this conviction he was confirmed by the prophet Isaiah, who, in the Lord's name, promised the utter discomfiture and overthrow of the blasphemous Assyrian: 'Lo, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumor and shall return to his own land, and I will cause him to die by the sword in his own land' (2 Kings xix:7). The rumor which Sennacherib heard was of the advance of Tirhakah the Ethiopian to the aid of the Egyptians, with a force which the Assyrians did not deem it prudent to meet; but, before withdrawing to his own country, Sennacherib sent a threatening letter to Hezekiah, designed to check the gladness which his retirement was likely to produce. But that very night the predicted blast—probably the hot pestilential south wind—smote 180,000 men in the camp of the Assyrians, and released the men of Judah from all their fears (2 Kings xviii:17-37; xix:1-34; 2 Chron. xxxii:1-23; Is. xxxvi:37).

(5) Illness of Hezekiah. It was in the same year, and while Jerusalem was still threatened by the Assyrians, that Hezekiah fell sick of the plague, and the aspect which the plague-boil assumed assured him that he must die. In this he was confirmed by Isaiah, who warned him that his end approached. The love of life, the condition of the country—the Assyrians being present in it, and the throne of David without an heir—caused him to grieve at his doom, and to pray earnestly that he might be spared.

(6) Prayer Answered. And his prayer was heard in heaven. The prophet returned with the assurance that in three days he should recover, and that fifteen additional years of life should be given to him. This communication was altogether so extraordinary that the king required some token by which his belief might be justified; and accordingly the 'sign' which he required was granted to him. The shadow of the sun went back upon the dial of Ahaz, the ten degrees it had gone down. (See DIAL.) This was a marvel greater than that of the cure which the king distrusted, for there is no known principle of astronomy or natural philosophy by which such a result could be produced. A cataplasim of figs was then applied to the plague-boil, under the direction of the prophet, and on the third day, as foretold, the king recovered (2 Kings xx:1-11; 2 Chron. xxxii:24-26; Is. xxxviii). (See PLAGUE.)

The destruction of the Assyrians drew the attention of foreign courts for a time towards Judæa, and caused the facts connected with Hezekiah's recovery, and the retrogression of the shadow on the dial, to be widely known.

(7) King of Babylon. Among others Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, sent ambassadors with presents to make inquiries into those matters and to congratulate the king on his recovery. Since the time of Solomon the appearance of such embassies from distant parts had been rare at Jerusalem; and the king, in the pride of his heart, made a somewhat ostentatious display to Baladan's ambassadors of all his treasures, which he had probably recovered from the Assyrians, and much increased with their spoil. Josephus (Antiq. x, 2, 2) says that one of the objects of the embassy was to form an alliance with Hezekiah against the Assyrian empire; and, if so, his readiness to enter into an alliance adverse to the theoretical policy, and his desire to magnify his own importance in the eyes of the king of Babylon, probably furnished the ground of the divine disapprobation with which his conduct in this matter was regarded. He was reprimanded by the prophet Isaiah, who revealed to him the mysteries of the future, so far as to apprise him that all these treasures should hereafter be in the possession of the Babylonians, and his family and people exiles in the land from which these ambassadors came (see ISAIAH). The intimation was received by the king with his usual submission to the will of God, and he was content to know that these evils were not to be inflicted in his own days. He has sometimes been blamed for this seeming indifference to the fate of his successors; but it is to be borne in mind that at this time he had no children. This was in the fourteenth year of his reign, and Manasseh, his successor, was not born till three years afterwards (2 Kings xx:12, 19; 2 Chron. xxxii:31; Is. xxxix).

(8) Death. The rest of Hezekiah's life appears to have been peaceable and prosperous. No man before or since ever lived under the certain knowledge of the precise length of the span of life before him. When the fifteen years had expired Hezekiah was gathered to his fathers, after a reign of twenty-nine years. He died sincerely lamented by all his people, and the public respect for his character and memory was testified by his corpse being placed in the highest niche of the royal sepulcher (2 Kings xx:20, 21; 2 Chron. xxxii:32, 33). Dean Stanley, Hist. of the Jewish Ch. ii. 505-540.

2. Son of Neariah, of the royal family of Judah (1 Chron. iii:23). B. C. after 536.

3. A person mentioned in connection with Ater (Neh. vi:21). B. C. before 536.

4. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i:1; in A. V. Hizkiah), B. C. before 630.

HEZION (hē'zi-ōn), (Heb. חֶזְיוֹן, khez-yone', vision), a king of Aram and father of Tabrimon (1 Kings xv:18). It is probable that he is identical with Rezon (1 Kings xi:23), as the names in the original are very similar. (B. C. before 928.)

HEZIR (hē'zir), (Heb. חֶזִיר, khay-zeer', swine).

1. A priest who had charge of the seventeenth course in the Temple service, in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiv:15), B. C. 1014.

2. One of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:20), B. C. 410.

HEZRAI (hēz'ra-i), (Heb. חֶזְרַי, khets-rah'ee, walled in, 2 Sam. xxiii:35), the same as HEZRO (which see).

A native of Carmel and one of David's guard of "thirty" (2 Sam. xxiii:35), B. C. 1046.

HEZRO (hēz'ro), (Heb. חֶזְרוֹ, khets-ro', enclosure), the form in which Hezrai appears (1 Chron. xi:37). Kennicott gives Hetzrai as the original form of the name. (B. C. 1046.)

HEZRON (hēz'ron), (Heb. חֶזְרוֹן, khets-rone', enclosed; walled, Gesenius).

1. Son of Reuben (Gen. xlv:9; Exod. vi:14; 1 Chron. iv:1; v:3). He was the founder of a family by his name (Num. xxvi:6), B. C. 1874.

2. Son of Pharez, and ancestor of David (Gen. xlv:12; Ruth iv:18), B. C. 1856.

3. A place on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv:3).

HEZRONITES (hēz'ron-ites), the descendants of HEZRON, 1 (which see).

HIDDAI (hīd'da-i), (Heb. חִידַי, hid-dah'ee, derivation uncertain), one of the "thirty" heroes of David, "of the brooks of Gaash" (2 Sam. xxiii:30). Kennicott (Dissert., p. 194) thinks this a corruption of Hurai found in the parallel lists (1 Chron. xi:32).

HIDDEKEL (hīd'de-kēl), (Heb. חִדְדֵקֶל, khid-deh'kel), one of the rivers of Eden (Gen. ii:14). It seems to be identical with the "Great River" (Dan. x:4). It is identified with the TIGRIS.

HIEL (hī'el), (Heb. חֵיל, khee-ale', life from God).

A native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho, above 500 years after its destruction by the Israelites, and who, in so doing, incurred the effects of the imprecation pronounced by Joshua (1 Kings xvi:34), B. C. 915.

Accursed the man in the sight of Jehovah.
Who shall arise and build this city, even Jericho,
With the loss of his firstborn shall he find it,
And with the loss of his youngest shall he fix its gates (Josh. vi:26). J. E. R.

HIERAPOLIS (hī'e-rāp'o-līs), (Gr. Ἱεράπολις, hee-er-āp'ol-is, sacred city).

A city of Phrygia, not far from Colossæ and Laodicea, where there was a Christian church under the charge of Epaphros, as early as the time of St. Paul, who commends him for his fidelity and zeal (Coloss. iv:12, 13). The place is visible from the theater at Laodicea, from which it is five miles distant northward.

Smith, in his journey to the Seven Churches (1671), was the first to describe the ancient sites in this neighborhood. He was followed by Pococke and Chandler; and more recently by Richter, Cockerell, Hartley, and Arundell.

The place now bears the name of Pamluck-kale (Cotton-castle), or Pambouk-Kalessi, from the white appearance of the cliffs of the mountain on the lower summit, or rather an extended terrace, on which the ruins are situated. It owed its celebrity, and probably the sanctity indicated by its ancient name (Holy City), to its very remarkable springs of mineral water, the singular effects of which, in the formation of stalactites and incrustations by its deposits, are shown in the accounts of Pococke (ii, pt. 2, ch. 13) and Chandler (Asia Minor, ch. 68), to have been accurately described by Strabo (xiii, p. 629). A great number and variety of sepulchers are found in the different approaches to the site, which on one side is sufficiently defended by the precipices overlooking the valleys of the Lycus and Mæander, while on the other sides the town walls are still observable. The magnificent ruins clearly attest the ancient importance of the place.

HIEROGLYPHICS (hī'ēr-ō-glif'iks), (from Gr. ἱερογλυφία, hee-er-os', sacred, and γλύφειν, gloo'fen, to carve).

Pictures of objects, as of an animal, tree, bird, etc., representing a word, syllable, or single sound, and intended to convey a meaning.

HIGGAION (hīg-gā'yōn), (Heb. חִגְיֹון, hig-gaw-yone'; Ps. ix:16; xix:15; xcii:4; Lam. iii:62). Perhaps the best view is that of Gesenius, who takes it from חַוְוָה, haw-gaw', to murmur; meditate.

HIGH DAY (hī dā), (Heb. גָּדוֹל, gaw-dole', Gen. xxix:7), great, i. e., broad daylight.

Shakespeare uses the word great in the same way, thus, "It is great morning" ("Troilus and Cressida").

HIGHEST (hī'ēst) (Heb. עֲלִיָּוֶת, el-yone', elevated), a title ascribed to Jehovah (Ps. xviii:13; lxxxvii:5), and in the New Testament (Gr. ὕψιστος, hoop'sis-tos) of the highest region, i. e., heaven (Matt. xxi:9); it denotes rank, as the Most High God (Mark v:7; Luke viii:28).

HIGH MINDED (hī'min'déd) (Gr. ὑψηλοφρονέω, hoop-say-lo-fron-eh'-o Rom. xi:20; 1 Tim. vi:17), lofty in mind; arrogant.

HIGH PLACE (hī plās), (Heb. בָּמוֹת, bau-maw', elevation).

As high places and groves are almost constantly associated in Scripture, it seems undesirable to separate them in our consideration.

Idolatrous High Place, with Grove and Worshipers.

By 'high places' (bau-maw') we are content to understand natural or artificial eminences, where worship by sacrifice or offering was made, usually upon an altar erected thereon.

By a 'grove' we understand a plantation of trees around a spot in the open air set apart for worship and other sacred services.

(1) After the Deluge. We find traces of these customs so soon after the deluge, that it is probable they existed prior to that event. It appears that the first altar after the deluge was built by Noah upon the mountain on which the ark rested (Gen. viii:20). Abraham, on entering the Promised Land, built an altar upon a mountain between Beth-el and Hai (xii:7, 8). At Beersheba he planted a grove, and called there upon the name of the everlasting God (Gen. xxi:33). The same patriarch was required to travel to the mount Moriah, and there to offer up his son Isaac (xxii:2, 4). It was upon a mountain in Gilead that Jacob and Laban offered sacrifices before they parted in peace (xxxi:54). In fact, such seem to have been the general places of worship in those times; nor does any notice of a temple or other covered or enclosed building for that purpose, occur. Thus far all seems clear and intelligible. There is no reason in the mere nature of things why a hill or a grove should be an objectionable, or, indeed, why it should not be a very suitable, place for worship. Yet by the time the Israelites returned from Egypt, some corrupting change had taken place, which caused them to be repeatedly and strictly enjoined to overthrow and destroy the high places and groves of the Canaanites wherever they found them (Exod. xxxiv:13; Deut. vii:5; xii:2, 3). That they were not themselves to worship the Lord on high places or in groves is implied in the fact that they were to have but one altar for regular and constant sacrifice; and it was expressly enjoined that near this sole altar no trees should be planted (Deut. xvi:21).

(2) Iniquity of the Canaanites. It is possible that the Canaanites had not yet fallen into rank idolatry in the time of Abraham, at least, not into such idolatries as defiled the very places in which they worshiped. We know, at all events, that their iniquity was not full in those earlier times, but that when the Israelites invaded the land their iniquity was full to overflowing. As included in this, we may with tolerable certainty infer that their religion had become so grossly erroneous and impure, that it was needful to place under ban even their places of worship, which might otherwise bring the Israelites into danger by the associations which had become connected with them.

(3) Abominable Rites. The groves which ancient usage had established around the places of sacrifice for the sake of shade and seclusion, idolatry preserved not only for the same reasons, but because they were found convenient for the celebration of the rites and mysteries, often obscene and abominable, which were gradually superadded.

(4) Injunctions Imperfectly Obeyed. The injunctions, however, respecting the high places and groves were very imperfectly obeyed by the Israelites; and their inveterate attachment to this mode of worship was such that even pious kings, who opposed idolatry by all the means in their power, dared not abolish the high places at which the Lord was worshiped. And it appears to us likely, that this toleration of an acknowledged irregularity arose from the indisposition of the people living at a distance from the temple to be confined to the altar which existed there; to their determination to have places nearer home for the chief acts of their religion—sacrifice and offering; and to the apprehension of the kings that if they were prevented from having places for offerings to the Lord in their own neighborhood, they would make the offerings to idols.

This view of the case seems to be strongly confirmed by the fact that we hear no more of this proneness to worship in high places and in groves after synagogues and regular religious services had been established in the towns and gave sufficient operation to the disposition among men to create a local interest in religious observances.

It is more difficult to explain how it happens that, in the face of the prohibition against sacrificing at more than one altar, many persons of piety, and even prophets, not only did so, but, in some instances, did so in high places; Gideon, for instance, at Ophrah (Judg. vi:25); Manoah in Dan (Judg. xiii:16-29), Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii:10), and at Bethlehem (xvi:5); David in the threshing-floor of Ornan (1 Chron. xxi:22), and Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xviii:30, sq.).

HIGH-PRIEST (hi'prĕst), (Heb. הַכֹּהֵן, hak-kohane', the priest). (See PRIEST.)

HIGHWAY (hi'wā), (usually Heb. מִסְלָל, mes-il-law'). (See ROAD.)

HILEN (hi'len), (Heb. לַיֵּן, khi-layn', perhaps fortress), a city of Judah allotted to the priests (1 Chron. vi:58). (See HOLON.)

HILKIAH (hil-ki'ah), (Heb. חִלְקִיָּהוּ, khiil-keeyaw', portion of Jehovah), several persons of this name occur in Scripture, of whom the following are the chief:

1. The father of Jeremiah (Jer. i:1), B. C. 628.
2. A high-priest in the reign of Josias (2 Kings xxii:4, 8, 10).
3. The father of Eliakim (2 Kings xviii:18, 26; Is. xxii:20; xxxvi:22), B. C. 713.
4. A Merarite Levite, son of Amzi and ancestor of Ethan (1 Chron. vi:45), before B. C. 1014.
5. A Merarite Levite, son of Hosah, and a door-keeper in the tabernacle under David (1 Chron. xxvi:11), about B. C. 1014.
6. One of those who assisted Ezra in instructing the people in the law (Neh. viii:4), about B. C. 410.
7. Father of Gemariah (Jer. xxix:3), before B. C. 587.

HILL (hĭl), (Heb. גִּבְעָה, ghib-aw', high), a conspicuous natural elevation of land.

The name is generally applied to a natural eminence smaller than a mountain and larger than a mound; but the terms are relative, the same height being sometimes known by both names (Is. xxxi:4), or called a mountain in one locality and a hill in another (Rev. xvii:9). Hill is chiefly the rendering of the Hebrew Gib'ah and the Greek Bounus. Not infrequently it is also employed in the A. V., and much less frequently in the R. V. (Ps. ii:6; iii:4; xv:1; xxiv:3; xlii:6; Matt. v:14; Luke iv:29), to translate Hebrew הָרָר, harar', and Greek 'Oros, which are usually rendered mountain. (Davis, Bib. Dict.)

HILL COUNTRY (hĭl kŭn'trĭ), the rendering in the Old Testament (Josh. xxi:11) of Har (see HILL); and in the New Testament of the Gr. or-i-nos (ὄρεως, mountainous: Luke i:39, 65); and meaning Mount Ephraim.

The rendering "hill country" is misleading. "With their usual exactness the Hebrews saw that these regions (i. e., the mountains of Judah, Ephraim and Naphtali) formed part of one range, the whole of which they called not by a collective name, but singularly—the mountain" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 53).

HILLEL (hī'lēl), (Heb. הִלְלֵי, hil-layl', praising), a Pirathonite, and father of the judge Abdon (Judg. xii:13, 15), B. C. before 1070.

HIN (hīn). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HIND (hind), (Heb. הַיָּנִיּוֹת, ah-yaw-law', Gen. xlix:21; 2 Sam. xxii:34; Job xxxix:1; Ps. xviii:33, etc.), the female of the hart or stag, doe being the female of the fallow-deer, and roe being sometimes used for that of the roebuck.

All the females of the Cervidae, with the exception of the reindeer, are hornless. It may be remarked that the emendation of Bochart on the version of Gen. xlix:21, where for 'Naphthali is a hind let loose, he giveth goodly words,' he, by a small change in the punctuation of the original, proposes to read 'Naphthali is a spreading tree, shooting forth beautiful branches,' restores the text to a consistent meaning, agreeing with the Sept., the Chaldee paraphrase, and the Arabic version. (See HART.)

HINGE (hīnj), (Heb. הַפְּתִיחַ, pohth, an interstice, the female pudenda).

In ancient times in the East heavy doors turned on pivots, which were constructed on the upper and lower corners of one side and inserted in sockets. The socket is probably more especially referred to in 1 Kings vii:50. (See also Prov. xxvi:14.)

HINNOM (hīn'nom), (Heb. הַיְיָנוֹם, hin-nome', perhaps abundant.)

1. An unknown person whose name is given to the "Valley of Hinnom" (Josh. xviii:16; Neh. xi:30); elsewhere (Josh. xv:8; 2 Kings xxiii:10; 2 Chron. xxxiii:6, etc.) called "the valley of the son," or "children of Hinnom."

2. The valley which bounds Jerusalem on the south, below Mount Zion, and which in Scripture is often mentioned in connection with the horrid rites of Moloch, which under idolatrous kings were there celebrated (Josh. xv:8; xviii:16; Neh. xi:30; Jer. vii:31; xix:2). When Josiah overthrew this idolatry he defiled the valley by casting into it the bones of the dead, the greatest of all pollutions among the Hebrews; and from that time it became the common jakes of Jerusalem, into which all refuse of the city was cast, and where the combustible portions of that refuse were consumed by fire. Hence it came to be regarded as a sort of type of hell, the Gehenna of the New Testament being no other than the name of this valley of Hinnom (Ge-Hinnom); see Mat. v:22, sq.; Mark ix:43; Luke vii:5; John iii:6.

The name by which it is now known is Wady Jehennam, or Wady er Rubeb (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). (See HADES; JERUSALEM.)

HIP AND THIGH (hīp and thī), (Heb. הֵקֵץ, shoke), a proverbial expression for a great slaughter (Judg. xv:8), like the Arabic "war in thigh fashion," or the German "cutting arm and leg in two."

HIPPOTAMUS (hīp'pō-pōt'ā-mūs). (See BEHEMOTH.)

HIRAH (hī'rah), (Heb. הִרְיָה, khee-raw', splendor), an Adullamite, and friend of Judah (Gen. xxxviii:1, 12; comp. verse 20).

HIRAM (hī'ram), (Heb. הִרְמָיִם, khee-rawm', high-born); generally in the Chronicles khoo-rawm', 'Hiram.'

1. King of Tyre, who sent an embassy to David after the latter had captured the stronghold of Zion and taken up his residence in Jerusalem. It seems that the sway of this ruler extended over the western slopes of Lebanon; and, when David built himself a palace, Hiram materially assisted the work by sending cedar-wood from Lebanon and able workmen to Jerusalem (2 Sam. v:11; 1 Chron. xiv:1), B. C. about 1055-1044.

2. King of Tyre, son of Abibaal, and grandson of the Hiram who was contemporary with David, in the last years of whose reign he ascended the throne of Tyre. Following his grandfather's example, he sent to Jerusalem an embassy of condolence and congratulation when David died and Solomon succeeded, and contracted with the new king a more intimate alliance than ever before or after existed between a Hebrew king and a foreign prince (1 Kings v:1).

The alliance seems to have been very substantially beneficial to both parties, and without it Solomon would scarcely have been able to realize all the great designs he had in view. In consideration of large quantities of corn, wine, and oil, furnished by Solomon, the king of Tyre agreed to supply from Lebanon the timber required for the temple, to float it along the coast, and deliver it at Joppa, which was the port of Jerusalem (1 Kings v:1, sq.; ix:10, sq.; 1 Chron. ii:3, sq.). The vast commerce of Tyre made gold very plentiful there; and Hiram supplied no less than 500 talents to Solomon for the ornamental works of the temple, and received in return twenty towns in Galilee; which, when he came to inspect them, pleased him so little that he applied to them a name of contempt, and restored them to the Jewish king (2 Chron. viii:2). (See CABUL.) It does not, however, appear that the good understanding between the two kings was broken by this unpleasant circumstance; for it was after this that Hiram suggested, or at least took part in, Solomon's traffic to the Eastern seas—which certainly could not have been undertaken by the Hebrew king without his assistance in providing ships and experienced mariners (1 Kings ix:27; x:11, etc.; 2 Chron. viii:18; ix:10, etc.). B. C. 1007. (See OPHIR; SOLOMON; PHENICIANS.)

3. Hiram, or Hiram, son of a widow of the tribe of Dan, and of a Tyrian father. He was sent by the king of the same name to execute the principal works of the interior of the temple, and the various utensils required for the sacred services (1 Kings vii:13, 14, 40). It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king from among others equally gifted, in the notion that his half Hebrew blood would render him more acceptable at Jerusalem. He is called "Hiram" in 2 Chron. ii:13; iv:11, 16; and "Hirom" in the margin of 1 Kings vii:40. (B. C. 1010.)

HIRE (hir), (Heb. שָׂכָר, saw-kar', wages; hire-reward).

Hire in A. V. is equivalent always to modern wages. Thus Gen. xxxi:8, 'The ring-straked shall be thy hire;' Is. xxiii:18, 'And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord' (Deltzsch, 'her gain and her wages become holy unto Jehovah'); Mic. iii:11, 'The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire;' Luke, x:7, 'the laborer is worthy of his hire.' Tyndale has the word very much as in the modern use in Mark ii:1, 'And let thy out to hire unto husbandmen.' The plural 'hires,' now obsolete, occurs once in A. V. (Mic. i:7), 'All the hires thereof shall be burned with fire.'

HIRELING (hir'ling), (Heb. רֵצֵף , saw-keer'; Gr. $\mu\sigma\theta\omega\rho\acute{o}s$, mis-tho-tos'), a laborer employed on hire for a limited time (Job. vii:1; xiv:6; Mark i:20), as distinguished from one belonging to his master.

"A hireling is a hired servant, and properly carries no suggestion of unfaithfulness. Thus Tyndale, Works, i, 146, 'Hereby mayest thou not understand that we obtain the favor of God, and the inheritance of life, through the merits of good works, as hirelings do their wages.' So Rhems has 'hireling' in Luke xv:17, 19, where all the other versions have 'hired servant.'" Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HISS (his), (Heb. פִּזְזָה , shaw-rak', to whistle).

This term usually expresses insult and contempt (Job xxvii:23), and mingled wonder and contempt, as by beholders of the ruined temple (1 Kings ix:8; 2 Chron. vii:21).

It is also used in the sense of to allure, to entice; as a beekeeper, who, by hissing (whistling) to the sound of a flute, induces the bees to come to a hive or settle on a bush or some other object (Is. v:26; vii:18).

HISTORY (his'tō-ry).

The subject matter contained in the Biblical history is of a wide and most extensive nature. In its greatest length and fullest meaning it comes down from the Creation till near the close of the first century of the Christian era.

The Jewish history contained in the Bible embraces more and less than the history of the Israelites; more, since it begins with the beginning of the earth and narrates with extraordinary brevity events which marked the period terminated by the flood, going on till it introduces us to Abraham, the primogenitor of the Hebrew race; less, since, even with the assistance of the poetical books, its narratives do not come down to a later date than some 400 years before the birth of Christ. The historical materials furnished relating to the Hebrew nation may be divided into three great divisions: 1. The books which are consecrated to the antiquity of the Hebrew nation—the period that elapsed before the era of the judges. These works are the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua, which, according to Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i, 72), properly constitute only one work, and which may be termed the great book of original documents. 2. The books which describe the times of the judges and the kings up to the first destruction of Jerusalem; that is, Judges, Kings, and Samuel, to which belongs the book of Ruth; 'all these,' says Ewald, 'constitute also, according to their last formation, but one work, which may be called the Great Book of Kings.' 3. The third class comprises the books included under the head of Hagiographa, which are of a much later origin, Chronicles, with Ezra and Nehemiah, forming the great book of general history reaching to the Grecian period. After these books come those which are classed together under the name of Apocrypha, whose use in this country we think unduly neglected. Then the circle of evangelical record begins, which closed within the century that saw it open. Other books found in the Old and New Testaments, which are not properly of a historical character, connect themselves with one or other of these periods, and give important aid to students of sacred history.

(1) Sources of Biblical History. The sources of Biblical history are chiefly the Biblical books themselves. Any attempt to fix the precise value of these sources in a critical point of view would require a volume instead of an article. Whatever hypothesis, however, may eventually be held touching the exact time when these books, or any of them, were put into their actual shape, as also touching the materials out of which they were formed, one thing appears very certain, that (to take an instance) Genesis, the earliest book (probably), contains most indubitable as well as most interesting historical facts; for though the age, the mode of life and the state of culture differ so widely from our own, we cannot do otherwise than feel that it is among men and women, parents and children—beings of like passions with ourselves—and not with mere creations of fancy or fraud, that we converse when we peruse the narratives which this composition has so long preserved. The conviction is much strengthened in the minds of those who, by personal acquaintance with the early profane writers, are able to compare their productions with those of the Hebrews, which were long anterior, and must, had they been of an equally earthly origin, have been at least equally deformed by fable. The sole comparison of the account given in Genesis of the creation of the world with the Cosmogonies of heathen writers, whether Hindoo, Greek or Latin, is enough to assure the impartial reader that a purer, if not a higher, influence presided over the composition of Genesis than that whence proceeded the legends or the philosophies of heathenism; nor is the conclusion in the slightest degree weakened in the writer's mind by any discrepancy which modern science may seem to show as between its own discoveries and the statements in Genesis. The Biblical history, as found in its Biblical sources, has a decided peculiarity and a great recommendation in the fact that we can trace in the Bible more clearly and fully than in connection with any other history, the first crude elements and the early materials out of which all history must be constructed. How far the literature supplied in the Bible may be only a relic of a literary cyclus called into being by the felicitous circumstances and favorable constitution of the great Shemitic family, but which has perished in the lapse of ages, it is now impossible to determine; but had the other portions of this imagined literature been of equal religious value with what the Bible offers, there is little risk in affirming that mankind would scarcely have allowed it to be lost.

(2) Other Books Than the Bible. The Bible, however, bears traces that its were not the only books current in the time and country to which it relates; for writing, writers, and books are mentioned without the emphasis and distinction which always accompany new discoveries or peculiar local possessions and as ordinary, well-known and matter-of-course things. And it is certain that we do not possess all the works which were known in the early periods of Israelite history, since in Num. xxi:14 we read of 'the book of the wars of the Lord,' and in Josh. x:13 of 'the book of Jasher.' Without writing, history, properly so called, can have no existence. Under the head WRITING may be traced the early rudiments and progress of that important art; here we merely remark that an acquaintance with it was possessed by the Hebrews at least as early as their Exodus from Egypt—a fact which shows at least the possibility that the age of the Biblical record stands some thousand years or more (see CHRONOLOGY) prior to the earliest Greek historian, Herodotus.

(3) The Bible a Commemorative Book. There is another fact which has an important bearing on the worth and credibility of the Biblical narratives, namely, that the people of which they speak were a commemorative race, were, in other words, given to create and preserve memorials of important events. Even in the patriarchal times we find monuments set up in order to commemorate events. Jacob (Gen. xxviii:18) 'set up a pillar' to perpetuate the memory of the divine promise; and that these monuments had a religious import and sanction appears from the statement that 'he poured oil upon the top of the pillar' (see Gen. xxxi:45; Josh. iv:9; 1 Sam. vii:12; Judg. ix:6). Long-lived trees, such as oak and terebinth, were made use of as remembrancers (Gen. xxxv:4; Josh. xxiv:26). Commemorative names also were given to persons, places, and things; and from the earliest periods it was usual to substitute a new and descriptive for an old name, which may in its origin have been descriptive too (Exod. ii:10; Gen. ii:23; iv:1). Genealogical tables appear, moreover, to have had a very early existence among the people of whom the Bible speaks, being carefully preserved first memoriter, afterward by writing, among family treasures, and thus transmitted from age to age. These, indeed, as might be expected, appear to have been the first beginnings of history—a fact which is illustrated and confirmed by the way in which what we should term a narrative or historical sketch is spoken of in the Bible, that is, as 'the book of the generation' ('of Adam,' Gen. v:1): a mode of speaking which is applied even to the account of the Creation (Gen. ii:4), 'these are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created.' The genealogical tables in the Bible (speaking generally) are not only of a very early date, but are free from the mixtures of a theogonical and cosmogonical kind which are found in the early literature of other primitive nations, wearing the appearance of being, so far at least as they go, true and complete lists of individual and family descent (Gen. v:1).

(4) The Use of Poetry. But perhaps the most remarkable fact connected with this subject is the employment of poetry at a very early period to perpetuate a knowledge of historical events. Even in Gen. iv:23, in the case of Lamech, we find poetry thus employed, that is, by the great-grandson of the primitive father. Other instances may be found in Exod. xv; Judge. v; Josh. x:13; 2 Sam. i:18. This early use of poetry, which must be regarded as a considerable step in civilization, implies a still earlier pre-existent culture; confutes the notion that human society began with a period of barbarism; looks favorably on the hypothesis that language had an immediately divine origin; explodes the position that the Hebrews were at first an ignorant, untutored, and unlettered race, and creates a presumption on behalf of their historical literature. Poetry is a good vehicle for the transmission of great leading facts; for, though it may throw over fact a coloring borrowed from the imagination, yet the form in which it appears gives warning that such hues are upon its details, which hues, besides being themselves a species of history, are then easily removed, while the form shuts up and holds in the facts intrusted to the custody of verse, and so transmits them to posterity without additions and without loss. By means of these several forms of commemoration much knowledge would be preserved from generation to generation, and to their existence from the first may be ascribed the brief, but still valuable, notices which the Bible presents of the primitive ages and condition of the world.

(5) Other Sources, Josephus, Etc. Other sources for at least the early Biblical history are comparatively of small value. Josephus has gone over the same periods as the Bible treats of, but obviously had no sources of consequence relating to primitive times which are not open to us, and in regard to those times does little more than add here and there a patch of a legendary or traditional hue which could have been well spared. His Greek and Roman predilections and his apologetical aims detract from his value, while in relation to the early history of his country he can be regarded in no other light than a sort of philosophical interpreter; nor is it till he comes to his own age that he has the value of an independent (not even then an impartial) eyewitness or well-informed reporter. In historical criticism and linguistic knowledge he was very insufficiently furnished. The use of both Josephus and Philo is far more safe for the student of the New Testament than for the expounder of the old.

(6) The Talmud and the Rabbins. The Talmud and the Rabbins afford very little assistance for the early periods, but might probably be made to render more service in behalf of the times of the Savior than has been generally allowed. The illustrations which Lightfoot and Wetstein have drawn from these sources are of great value; and Gfrörer, in his Jahrhundert des Heils (Stuttgart, 1838), has made an ample use of the materials they supply in order to draw a picture of the first century, a use which the learned author is at no small pains to justify. The compilations of the Jewish doctors, however, require to be employed with the greatest caution, since the Rabbins were the depositaries, the expounders and the apologists of that corrupt form of the primitive faith and the Mosaic institutions which has been called by the distinctive name of Judaism, which comprised an heterogeneous mass of false and true things, the flood wood of the East as well as truth from the Bible, and which, to a great extent, lies under the express condemnation of Christ himself. How easy it is to propagate fables on their authority, and to do a disservice to the Gospel records, may be learnt from the fact that older writers, in their undue trust of Rabbinical authority, went so far as to maintain that no cock was allowed to be kept in Jerusalem because fowls scratched unclean things out of the earth, though the authority of Scripture (which in the case they refused to admit) is most express and decided (Matt. xxvi:34; Mark xiv:30, 60, 72). On the credibility of the Rabbins see Ravii Diss. Phil. Theol. de eo quod Fidei merentur, etc., in Oelrich's Collect. Opusc. Hist. Phil. Theol.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. ii. 1095; Fabricius, Bibliog. Antiq. i:3, 4; Brunsmann, Diss. de Judaica levitate, Hafniæ, 1705.

The classic authors betray the grossest ignorance in almost all cases where they treat of the origin and history of the Hebrew people; and even the most serious and generally philosophic writers fall into vulgar errors and unaccountable mistakes as soon as they speak on the subject. What, for instance, can be worse than the blunder or prejudice of Tacitus, under the influence of which he declared that the Jews derived their origin from Mount Ida in Crete; that by the advice of an oracle they had been driven out of Egypt, and that they set up in their temple at Jerusalem as an object of worship the figure of an ass, since an animal of that species had directed them in the wilderness and discovered to them a fountain (Tacit. Hist. v:1, 2). Dion Cassius (xxxvii:17) relates similar fables. Plutarch (Quæst. Sympos. iv:5) makes the Hebrews pay divine honors to swine, as being their instructors in agriculture, and affirms that they kept the Sabbath and the Feast of Tabernacles in honor of Bacchus. For a collection of these gross misrepresentations, together with a profound and successful inquiry into their origin, and a full exposure of their falsehoods, see articles by Dr. J. G. Müller, Theologische Studien und Kritiken, 1843, viertes Heft. p. 893.

HITTITES (hit'tites), (Heb. חִיטִּי, khil'tee).

The fact that the Hittites were unknown to classic history encouraged a certain class of critics in the assertion that there was no truth in the Biblical statements concerning them.

(1) Early Inscriptions. But as soon as the key was found to the hieroglyphs of Egypt and the cuneiforms of Assyria another great people began to emerge from the darkness of secular history. They appeared chiefly as a nation of warriors in constant conflict with the kings around them, and the picture thus presented was century before Christ, the Hittites are regarded as a formidable power." (Trans. of Soc. Bib. Arch., vol. vii., part 2, p. 261.)

And Mr. Pinches, of the British Museum, has deciphered an inscription which would seem to place the reign of Sargon of Agade or Agane I. about 3800 B. C.

(2) Extent of the Empire. We may estimate the extent of the Hittite Empire from the number of local Hittite names mentioned in the Scriptures and the inscriptions, and also from the vast extent of country over which Hittite inscriptions and sculptures are scattered. In the Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions there have already been discovered over 300 geographical Hittite names, only a few of which have as yet been identified. We can better realize how much this means when we consider that in the Royal History of England there are only about 133 names of places mentioned in all of England, Scotland and Ireland.

The inscriptions of Egypt and Assyria are comparatively few and fragmentary, and of these few in perfect harmony with that found in the Pentateuch. The inscriptions show the Hittite kings to have been rivals of the Pharaohs from the twelfth to the twentieth dynasty. The shock of Egyptian invasion exhausted itself on the frontier cities of Kadesh and Carchemish, and there were still fresh armies and abundance of wealth to enable the Hittite empire to withstand the might of Egypt for a thousand years.

In the British Museum there are many inscribed objects belonging to the library of Assurbanipal, and some of them are known as the Assyrian Astronomical Tablets. These are the later editions of the clay books which had been prepared for the ancient kings of Babylon. In one of these comparatively modern editions of a much earlier work we find the following statement: "The king of the Hittites lives and on the throne seizes" (Records of the Past, i:159). And again we read: "The king of the Hittites plunders and the throne seizes" (Ibid. p. 160).

It is difficult to assign a date to these and other similar documents, but Professor Sayce conjectures that: "Already in the astrological tables of Sargon of Agade or Agane, in the nineteenth which have come to light many are still unread. They are chiefly concerned with their own national achievements and the glory of conquerors, and yet these stone and clay records preserve for us twice as many names of places in the Hittite empire as are to be found of English geographical names in a thousand pages of our standard geography and history combined.

In the Bible we first meet the Hittites at Hebron, where they are recognized as the rightful owners of the place. Four hundred years later the spies found the sons of Anak in Hebron and the Hittites dwelling in the mountains (Num. xiii:29), whither they had doubtless been driven; and in a parenthetical clause it is stated: "Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. xiii:22). This isolated and independent clause, which always seemed out of the way, now comes into prominence and helps us to knit together the scattered fragments of long lost history. Zoan or Tanis was the capital of the Hyksos, invaders and conquerors of Egypt.

According to Mariette one of the Hyksos dynasties was Hittite; and it is proved by an inscription now in the Louvre, which records the destruction of their palaces on the borders of Egypt, that they had once been a settled people in this region.

It would thus appear that, as the Hittites bore down upon Egypt from the north, they occupied the fertile plain of Mamre, and built Hebron seven years before they had secured sufficient foothold in Egypt to found their capital city of Zoan.

When David sent "Joab and the captains of the host" to number the people (2 Sam. xxiv), it is recorded that they came to Gilead, and to the land of Tahtim-hodshi, and this is the Hittite Kadesh on the Orentes, the southern capital of their empire.

The description given in the Book of Joshua (Josh. i:4), which was long thought to be exaggerated, may now be taken as strictly accurate.

In the war with Rameses II., Kheta-sira, the king of the Hittites, had under his command the Dardanians and the Trojans, and ten or more other peoples, either as subjects or allies. It is clear that a mighty host was brought into the field by a voice of command that must be obeyed.

(3) Geographical Position of Hittite Inscriptions. The existence of their inscriptions and sculptures over a very large extent of country bears witness to the wide extent of their empire.

All the inscribed stones in Hamath must have been carved near where they were found, for all but one (the fragment No. H. I.) were very large and could not have been carried from a distance unless at great cost. Even the fragment was large enough to require a camel to carry it, and the Hamathites had not regarded it as of any importance until the attention of scholars gave them an idea that it had a marketable value.

At Jerabis, the ancient Carchemish, on the Euphrates, a number of these inscriptions have been discovered, and the inscribed stones have been obtained for the British Museum.

On the old road from Carchemish and Marash Colonel C. W. Wilson discovered two Hittite inscriptions at Gurum, within the frontiers of Cappadocia. They have been found also far to the north of this point, and in the northwest of Asia Minor.

"That their empire extended," says Dr. Isaac Taylor, "as far as the Euxine and the Ægean, is shown by hieroglyphics and sculptures in the unmistakable style of Hittite art which are scattered over Asia Minor, more especially in Lydia, Lycania, Cappadocia, and Cilicia. Scholars are only just beginning to realize the vast extent of their dominion and their important place in primitive history. Until the rise of Assyria they were the most powerful nation of northwestern Asia." (The Alphabet, Dr. Isaac Taylor, vol. ii., p. 121.)

(4) Art and Literature. In the Egyptian inscription concerning the great battle the enemy is called "the miserable king of the Hittites," before the battle contest, while afterward he is called "the great king of the Hittites," showing that he won a partial, if not a decided, victory over the Egyptian forces. When the ambassadors of Kheta-sira, "the great king of the Hittites," went down to Egypt to make a treaty with Rameses II they carried with them a silver plate on which the Hittite text of the treaty was engraved in their own language and character. This text has been lost, but a copy of it in hieroglyphics appears on the walls of the temples of Rameses.

This people was well acquainted with silver, and attention has frequently been called to their presence in the vicinity of silver mines. Their bargain with the patriarch Abraham at Hebron involved the earliest money transaction on record, and the "shekel" referred to in the phrase "current money with the merchant," was doubtless the forerunner of the coin with which we are acquainted. We find among them considerable progress in commerce, law, and civil institutions.

They use silver as the standard of value, balances for weighing it, and a regular recognized form of sale and conveyance.

Professor Sayce says their art was a modification of that of Babylon before the rise of the Assyrian empire. This, somewhat modified by Egypt, was borne by the Hittites throughout Asia Minor. "The art and culture, the deities and rites, which Lydia owed to Babylon, were brought by the hands of the Hittites, and bore upon them a Hittite stamp. This artistic culture and writings were carried by them into Asia Minor, which they overran and subdued." (Sayce, "Herodotus," pp. 426-432).

Their art was characterized by solidity and roundness and work in relief. "The mural crown was a Hittite invention; the animal forms in which their artists especially excelled were frequently combined to form composite creatures, among which may be mentioned the double-headed eagle, afterwards adopted by the Seljukian Sultans. This Hittite art is the source of the peculiar art of Asia Minor, which forms a well-marked element in that of primitive Greece" (Idem. pp. 426-432).

In relation to the science of letters, scholars have long been perplexed by a number of alphabets which existed in different districts of Asia Minor. They were neither Greek nor Phœnician, but they seemed to come from the same source as did the Greek.

Dr. Isaac Taylor recognizes five distinct alphabets—the Lycian, the Carian, the Cappadocian, the Phrygian and the Pamphylian. To these he thinks may be added three more—the Lydian, the Mysian and the Cilician. Inscriptions found by Mr. Hamilton Lang, in Cyprus, supplied the key to the mysterious alphabets of Asia Minor, and they proved to be distantly related even to the whorls discovered by Dr. Schliemann in the lower stratum of Hissarlik.

This and other important discoveries carried the question farther back towards the parent stem, which seems to be recognized by the existence throughout Asia Minor of numerous inscriptions similar to those Hittite records which were found in Hamah.

"These monuments," says Dr. Isaac Taylor, "are those of a people who have been identified with the Hittites of the Old Testament, the Kheta of the Egyptian monuments, the Khattai of the Assyrian records, and the Keteioi of Homer. They were one of the most powerful peoples of the primeval world, their empire extending from the frontier of Egypt to the shores of the Ægean, and, like the Babylonians and the Egyptians, they possessed a culture, an art and a script peculiar to themselves" (The Alphabet, ii, pp. 115-120).

We learn from the Egyptian records that the Hittites were far in advance of their neighbors in the arts of war as well as of peace. Indeed, they were formidable in making war because they excelled in peaceful pursuits.

(5) Religion. This people, like the Canaanites, imported their gods and goddesses from Babylonia. Wherever the Phœnicians steered their ships and carried their arts and merchandise the rites and worship of Baal and Astarte (see BAAL) accompanied them. In like manner wherever the Hittites extended their empire, there we find under some form the goddess who was called Atargatis (Ashtoreth or Ishtar) at Carchemish.

The Hittite goddess appears in connection with Atys or Sutekh, accompanied by the horrible rites with which Ishtar (see ASHTORETH) and Tammuz (see TAMMUZ) had been honored in Babylon. In the capital of the Hittites we see one of the numerous shrines where Hittite girls were devoted to wickedness in the name of religion. The worship of these deities took many repulsive forms. Devotees surrendered their children to Baal in the flames while the screams of the victims were drowned by trumpet and drum.

(6) Nationality. Who were the Hittites? To what race or people did they belong?

Outside the Bible our two sources of information on this subject are the Hittite names and sculptures.

It is now pretty generally conceded that the language of the Hittites was not Semitic; that is, it was not of the same family as the language spoken in varying dialects by the Jews and other Semitic people.

There are several eminent linguists who believe that the Hittite language was Semitic, and there should be no dogmatism where our certain knowledge is so limited, but with the most careful balancing of the facts the weight of evidence seems to be on the side of the non-Semitic character of this peculiar tongue. This conclusion is supported by the Hittite and also by the Egyptian sculptures.

Captain Conder draws attention to the distinct characteristics of the Hittites and their allies as pictured on the temple at Ibsamboul: "In this picture the Hittites and their allies are represented as distinct races with different kinds of weapons. The one race is bearded, the other beardless, and the Chinese-like appearance of the Hittites is very remarkable" (Heth and Moab, p. 22). This would seem to point to a Tartar or Mongolian people. Colonel Sir Charles Wilson, who has recently returned from Asia Minor, says: "The sculptures show that the Hittites did not belong to a Semitic race. The features are rather those of a northern people, and on the temple of Ibsamboul the Hittites have a Scythic character, with shaven head and a single lock of hair on the crown. Hence it would appear from the testimony of the sculptures, as well as of the proper names, that the Hittites were non-Semitic."

(7) Hittites from a Biblical Standpoint. Thus it has been seen that the Biblical statements are fully confirmed by the cumulative evidence of modern discovery.

We find this people among the settled inhabitants of Canaan while as yet Abraham was only a wandering sheikh. They lived in and about Hebron, and Abraham, when he abode in that neighborhood, was treated by them with respect and consideration (Gen. xxiii:3-7, 11, 12).

He obtains his first possession in Canaan by purchasing a grave for Sarah of the sons of Heth (Gen. xxiii). The story as told in Genesis is true in all the formal details which embellish the framework of a shrewd Oriental bargain. "In fact," says Dr. Thomson, "up to the present day, in this very city of Hebron, a purchase thus witnessed is legal, while the best drawn deeds of a modern lawyer, though signed, sealed and attested, would be of no avail without such living witnesses" (The Land and the Book, p. 249).

In the Book of Exodus the Hittites had grown in importance. The promised land is described by an enumeration of the peoples who inhabit it, and the Hittites, who are never absent from that enumeration, occupy the place of distinction (Exod. iii:8, 17; xiii:5; xxiii:23).

In the Egyptian hieroglyphics they occupy exactly the same position which is assigned them in the Book of Exodus. They are first in order and first in importance among the peoples in the promised land. (See Rawlinson, History of Ancient Egypt, vol. i., p. 111.)

During the weary years spent in Egypt the Israelites were often encouraged by the promise that they should return to the land of the Hittites. Later Jehovah not only promised to send his angel to lead them there, but also declared he would send before them hornets to drive out the Hittites (Exod. xxiii:28). This promise seems to have been largely fulfilled by the devastating border wars between the Pharaohs and the people of Southern Palestine, who were always the first to feel the shock of Egyptian arms. We can trace the march of Seti I on his first campaign, from Khetam (the Etham of the Bible) past Rehoboth to the fortress of Kanaan, which he stormed, and became the subduer of the whole Edomitish Negeb. On the northern side of the great temple of Karnak this conquest is recorded thus: "In the first year of King Seti there took place, by the strong arm of Pharaoh, the annihilation of the hostile Shasu, from the fortress of Khetam of the land of Zalu as far as Kanaan; the king was against them like a fierce lion. They were turned into a heap of corpses. They lay there in blood." (Brugsch's Egypt Under the Pharaohs, vol. ii., p. 14.)

In such fierce border encounters the hand of Pharaoh would press heavily upon any Hittite colonies which occupied advance positions. Hence Joshua found the Anakim at Hebron, and the spies found the Amalekites dwelling in the south and the Hittites driven back to the mountains (Num. xiii:29).

(8) Cities Identified. The remains of the Hittite cities have been long buried; but the efforts of Mr. Skene and Mr. George Smith have identified the two chief capitals of the south, Carchemish (to which reference has already been made) and Kadesh; the former on the Euphrates, known as Jerablus, the latter on the Orontes (see CARCHEMISH; KADESH). These two places were 'Holy Cities,' that is, under the protection of a goddess and wholly devoted to her worship. These 'Holy Cities' were a characteristic peculiar to the Hittite people. Besides being devoted to the goddess, they were places of 'refuge.' The homicide could escape to them, and once within the protection of its deity he was safe from his pursuers and could not be injured or slain. The debtor and political outcast were equally safe.

(9) Hebrew Cities of Refuge. Palestine also contained 'cities of refuge.' These Hebrew cities of refuge were six in number. One of them was Hebron, once occupied by the Hittites and Amorites. Another was Kadesh, of Galilee, the name of which shows it to have been a 'holy city' like Kadesh. Shechem, too, had been taken from the Amorites by Jacob (Gen. xlviii:22), and the other three cities were in the region long held by the Amorites. These facts might raise the question, as suggested by Mr. Sayce, in The Story of a Forgotten Empire, whether these cities had not already been places of refuge long before God enjoined Moses to make them such for the Israelites. (See Sayce, The Hittites, The Story of a Forgotten Empire, 1888; The Mon. and the O. T., Ira M. Price.)

(10) Later Biblical Mention. During the history of Israel from the time of Abraham to the captivity, the Hittites are frequently referred to by the sacred writers. Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xi:3, 6; 1 Kings ix:20), was the mother of Solomon and a distant ancestress of Christ. In connection with the siege of Samaria, as recorded in 2 Kings vii, we have an important reference to this people. The Israelites, under Jehoram, were hard pressed in their capital by Benhadad of Damascus. Then, according to Elisha's prophecy, deliverance came. "For the Lord made the host of the Syrians to hear the noise of chariots, and a noise of horses, even the noise of a great host; and they said one to another, Lo the king of Israel hath hired against us the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Egyptians to come upon us. Wherefore they arose and fled in the twilight, and left their tents, and their horses, even their camp as it was, and fled for their life" (2 Kings vii:6, 7).

Usher places the siege of Samaria at about B. C. 892, and Assyriologists agree in fixing the reign of Assur-natsir-pal about B. C. 883-858.

(11) Other Records. Of this king, who added new vigor to the wars against the people of Northern Syria, there are ample records. He levied tribute upon the conquered Hittites. "To Carchemish, in Syria, I directed my steps. The tribute due from the son of Bahiani, swift chariots, horses, silver, tin, * * * I received." (Records of the Past, iii:70).

He passed from Carchemish "to Hazazi, the town of Lubarna of the Khatti," and levied tribute.

From these inscriptions and several others it is clear that at the time of the siege of Samaria the Hittites were still a mighty people spread over the north from Carchemish to Lebanon, and so in the time of the siege of Samaria the Hittite chiefs were distinguished among the nations for "their swift chariots, their horses and their engines of war."

The Hittites who appear for the first time in the inscriptions of Sargon I, to whom Mr. Pinches of the British Museum assigns the possible date 3800 B. C., do not disappear from history in the inscriptions until the time of Sargon II, B. C. 717.

Lieutenant Conder says: "The veracity of the Old Testament account of the Hittite princes contemporary with Solomon had been deemed as presenting insuperable difficulties, but the indisputable testimony of the granite records of Thothmes and Rameses has left no doubt of the contemporary rule of this powerful race in Northern Syria in the times of the Hebrew Judges and kings" (see Empire of the Hittites, by William Wright, D.D., F. R. G. S., 1886, pp. 36-123; The Hittites, A. H. Sayce, LL.D., 1888).

(12) A Summary of the names of the individual Hittites mentioned in the Bible as follows is:

Adah (woman), Gen. xxxvi:2.
Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xxvi:6.
Bashemath, accurately Bas'math (woman); possibly a second name of Adah, Gen. xxvi:34.
Beeri (father of Judith, below), Gen. xxvi:34.
Elon (father of Basmath), Gen. xxvi:34.
Ephron, Gen. xxiii:10, 13, 14, etc.
Judith (woman), Gen. xxvi:34.
Uriah, 2 Sam. xi:3, etc.; xxiii:39, etc.
Zohar (father of Ephron), Gen. xxiii:8.

They are all susceptible of interpretation as Hebrew words, which would lead to the belief either that the Hittites spoke a dialect of the Aramaic or Hebrew language, or that the words were Hebrew in their transference to the Bible records.

In addition to the above, Sibbechai, who in the Hebrew text is always denominated a Hushathite, is by Josephus (Ant. vii:12, sec. 2) styled a Hittite (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

HIVITES (hi'vites), (Hebrew always in the form חִיטִּי , hakh-iv-vee', "the Hivite").

One of the nations of Canaan, which occupied Palestine before the Israelites (Gen. x:17; 1 Chron. i:15; Exod. iii:8, 17; xxiii:23; Josh. iii:10). They occupied the northern and northeastern part of the country. In Judg. iii:3, it is stated that 'the Hivites dwelt in mount Lebanon, from mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath;' and in Josh. xi:3, the Hivites are described as living 'under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh.' The 'cities of the Hivites' are mentioned in 2 Sam. xxiv:7, and, from being associated with Sidon and Tyre, must have been in the northwest. A remnant of the nation still existed in the time of Solomon, who subjected them to a tribute of personal labor, with the remnants of other Canaanitish nations which the Israelites had been unable to expel (1 Kings ix:20). A colony of this tribe was also found in Northern Palestine, occupying the towns of Gideon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim; and these obtained from Joshua a treaty of peace by stratagem (Josh. ix:3-17; xi:19).

The Hivite form of government is not described, but the mention of "our elders and all the inhabitants of our country" (Josh. ix:11) certainly indicates one in which the people had considerable voice, since the sending of an embassy of unconditional peace is one of the highest acts of sovereignty. So Hamor and Shechem "communized with the men of their city" (Gen. xxxiv:20-24), and reasoned, but did not attempt to command.

The scarcity of Hivite names prevents our judging of their language; but it was in all probability like that of the other Canaanite tribes, quite near the Hebrew. It is not probable that they were the same with the KADMONITES (which see), since these, as their name implies, are more likely to have been "children of the East," Bene-kedem; nor with the Avim, since these had been destroyed by the Capthorim (Rev. W. Haskell, Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

HIZKIAH (hiz-ki'ah), (Heb. חִזְקִיָּהוּ , khiz-kee-yaw', strengthened of Jah), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i:1), B. C. before 630.

HIZKIJAH (hiz-ki'jah), (Heb. same as above).

According to the punctuation of the A. V. a man who sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. x:17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Smith, Bib. Dict.). (See HEZEKIAH.)

HOAR (Heb. הוֹר , say-baw', 1 Kings ii:6; "hoary," Job xli:32; Prov. xvi:31), said of hair, gray. "As hoor as an hawethorn." Piers Ploughman.

HOARFROST (hōr'frōst), (Heb. הֶפְרֵסֶת , kef-ore', Exod. xvi:14; Ps. cxlvii:16; Job xxxviii:29, "hoary.") (See FROST.)

HOARY (Heb. הֶפְרֵסֶת , kef-ore', Job xxxviii:29), white frost, as covering the ground.

HOBAB (hō'bāb), (Heb. חֹבָב , kho-baub', beloved).

A kinsman of Moses and priest or prince of Midian, a tract of country in Arabia Petrea, on the eastern border of the Red Sea, at no great distance from Mount Sinai. The family of this individual seems to have observed the worship of the true God in common with the Hebrews (Exod. xviii:11, 12).

Considerable difficulty has been felt in determining who this person was, as well as his exact relation to Moses; for the word which, in Exod. iii:1; Num. x:29; Judg. iv:11, is translated father-in-law, and in Gen. xix:14, son-in-law, is a term of indeterminate signification, denoting simply relationship by marriage; and besides, the transaction which in one place (Exod. xviii:27) is related of Jethro, is in another related of Hobab. (B. C. 1657.) The probability is, that as forty years had elapsed since Moses' connection with this family was formed, his father-in-law (Exod. ii:18) Reuel or Raguel (the same word in the original is used in both places) was dead, or confined to his tent by the infirmities of age, and that the person who visited Moses at the foot of Sinai was his brother-in-law, called Hobab in Num. x:29, Judg. iv:11; Jethro in Exod. iii:1; and יִתְרוֹ in Judg. i:16, which, in chap. iv:11, is rendered improperly 'the Kenite.'

About a year after the Exodus he paid a visit to Moses, while the Hebrew camp was lying in the environs of Sinai, bringing with him Zipporah, Moses' wife, who, together with her two sons, had been left with her family while her husband was absent on his embassy to Pharaoh. The interview was on both sides affectionate, and was celebrated first by the solemn rites of religion, and afterwards by festivities, of which Aaron and the elders of Israel were invited to partake. On the following day, observing Moses incessantly occupied in deciding causes that were submitted to him for judgment, his experienced kinsman remonstrated with him on the speedy exhaustion which a perseverance in such arduous labors would superinduce; and in order to relieve himself, as well as secure a due attention to every case, he urged Moses to appoint a number of subordinate officers to divide with him the duty of the judicial tribunals, with power to decide in all common affairs, while the weightier and more serious matters were reserved to himself. This wise suggestion the Hebrew legislator adopted (Exod. xviii).

When the Hebrews were preparing to decamp from Sinai, the kinsman of Moses announced his intention to return to his own territory; but if he did carry that purpose into execution, it was in opposition to the urgent solicitations of the Jewish leader, who entreated him, for his own advantage, to cast in his lot with the people of God; at all events to continue with them, and afford them the benefit of his thorough acquaintance with the wilderness. 'Leave us not, I pray thee,' said Moses, 'forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes;' which the Septuagint has rendered καὶ ἔσθη ἐν ἡμῖν πρεσβύτης, — 'and thou shalt be an elder amongst us.' But there can be little doubt that the true meaning is that Hobab might perform the office of a hybeer or guide. (See CARAVAN.)

That Jethro and Reuel (Raguel) were names of the same person seems evident from Exod. ii:18, 21; iii:1. Hobab would, therefore, be the brother-in-law of Moses. When Jethro returned to his home (Exod. xviii:27) Moses prevailed upon Hobab to remain (as seems implied by the absence of any refusal to his second importunity in Num. x:32) and act as guide through the desert; his influence as an Arab chief, his knowledge of the routes, the situation of the wells, the places for fuel, the prognostics of the weather, and the most eligible stations for encamping, rendering him peculiarly qualified to act in that important capacity.

It is true that God was their leader, by the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, the advancement or the halting of which regulated their journeys and fixed their encampments. But beyond these general directions the tokens of their heavenly guide did not extend. And as smaller parties were frequently sallying forth from the main body in quest of forage and other necessaries, which human observation or enterprise were sufficient to provide, so Moses discovered his wisdom and good sense in enlisting the aid of a native sheik, who, from his family connection with himself, his powerful influence, and his long experience, promised to render the Israelites most important services.

HOBAB (hō'bah), (Heb. חֹבַב, kho-baw', hiding place), (Gen. xiv:15), is probably some hollow, between mountains, which effectually secludes those who occupy it.

It lay north of Damascus, and was the place to which Abraham pursued the kings who had plundered Sodom. Perhaps it was the modern Jōbar.

HOD (hōd), (Heb. הוֹד, hode, majesty; splendor; ornament), son of Zophar, descendant of Asher, (1 Chron. vii:37), B. C. before 1017.

HODAIAH (hōd'a-i'ah), (Heb. הוֹדִיָּאִי, ho-āah-veh-yaw' hoo, majesty of Jah), son of Elioënai in the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. iii:24), B. C. about 406.

HODAVIAH (hōd'a-vi'ah), (Heb. הוֹדָוִיָּאִי, ho-dav-yaw', praise of Jehovah).

1. A head of the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v:24), B. C. about 720.

2. A Levite who gave his name to a large family (Ezra ii:40), B. C. 536. (See Lord Hervey, Genealogies, p. 119.)

3. Son of Hath-sennah, a Benjamite (1 Chron. ix:7), B. C. before 588.

HODESH (hō'desh), (Heb. חֹדֶשׁ, kho'desh, a month, new moon or time of the new moon), one of the wives of Shalaraim, in the genealogies of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:9). Hodesh may have been a second name of one of the wives (ver. 8).

HODEVAH (ho-dē'vah), (Heb. הוֹדְוָה, ho-dev-aw', brightness; ornament of Jehovah), a Levite family which returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Neh. vii:43). In parallel lists the name is HODAVIAH, 3; and JUDAH (Ezra iii:9).

HODIAH (ho-di'ah), (Heb. הוֹדִיָּה, ho-dee-yaw', splendor of Jehovah), wife of Ezra, of Judah, and mother of the founders of Keilah and Eshtemoa, (1 Chron. iv:19).

The name is the same as Jehudijah of verse 18 except for the article which the A. V. disregards.

HODIJAH (ho-di'jah), (Heb. הוֹדִיָּה, ho-dee-yaw', majesty of Jehovah).

1. The name of two Levites in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. The first is mentioned in Neh. viii:7, and probably ix:5; x:10; the other in Neh. x:13 (B. C. about 410).

2. One of the heads of the people in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. x:18). B. C. about 410.

HOG (hög), See BOAR; SWINE.

HONGLAH (hög'lah), (Heb. חֹגְלָה, khog-law', perhaps partridge), third of the four daughters of Zelophehad, for whom the law of inheritance was so altered that a daughter could inherit her father's property if he had no son (Num. xxvi:33; xxvii:1).

xxxvi:11; Joshua xvii:3). (See GILEAD AND BASHAN).

HOHAM (hō'hām), (Heb. חֹהַם, ho-hawm', whom Jehovah incites), king of Hebron, one of the five who besieged Gibeon, with Adoni-zedek, and were hanged by Joshua's orders (Josh. x:3). about B. C. 1612.

HOISE (hoiz), (Gr. ἠραίρω, ep-ahēe'ro, Acts xxvii:40), to hoist up.

HOLD (hōld), (Heb. חָזַק, metz-oo-daw', fortress, as often rendered), the term especially applied to the lurking places of David (1 Sam. xxii: 4, 5; xxiv:22, etc.).

HOLINESS (hō-lī-nēs), (Heb. קֹדֶשׁ, ko'desh'; Gr. ἁγίασμός, hag-ee-o-soo'nay; in both cases "separation," or "setting apart," holy, from Saxon "halig," "whole," "sound").

(1) Holiness of God. By this is meant the purity and rectitude of his nature. It is an essential attribute of God, and what is the glory, luster, and harmony of all his other perfections (Ps. xxvii:4; Exod. xv:11). He could not be God without it (Deut. xxxii:4). It is infinite and unbounded; it cannot be increased or diminished. Immutability and invariability (Mal. iii:6). God is originally holy; he is so of and in himself, and the author and promoter of all holiness among his creatures. The holiness of God is visible by his works; he made all things holy (Gen. i:31). By his providences, all which are to promote holiness in the end (Heb. xii:10). By his grace, which influences the subjects of it to be holy (Tit. ii:10, 12). By his word, which commands it (1 Pet. i:15). By his ordinances, which he has appointed for that end (Jer. xlv:4, 5).

"In the absolute sense God alone is holy, and His holiness is the ground of the requirement of holiness in His creatures (1 Pet. i:16). Holiness is the attribute of God, according to which He wills and does only that which is morally good. In other words, it is the perfect harmony of His will with His perfect ethical nature. But the divine holiness is not to be thought of as a mere passive quiescent state. It is an active impulse, a forthgoing energy. In God's holiness, that is, in the expression of His perfect ethical nature, His self-revelation is grounded. Nay, creation itself, as well as redemption, would be inconceivable apart from the divine holiness, the energizing of God's absolutely good will.

"By some theologians holiness and love are identified, more commonly they are sharply distinguished—holiness being regarded as the self-preservative or retributive attribute of God and love as His beneficent self-imparting attribute." (See article on God.) (G. B. Stevens, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

(2) Holiness in Man is freedom from sin, or the conformity of the heart to God. It does not consist in knowledge, talents, nor outward ceremonies of religion, but hath its seat in the heart, and is the effect of a principle of grace implanted by the Holy Spirit (Eph. ii:8, 10; John iii:1; Rom. vi:22). It is the essence of happiness and the basis of true dignity (Prov. iii:17; iv:8). It will manifest itself by the propriety of our conversation, regularity of our temper, and uniformity of our lives. It is a principle which may be instantaneous in its reception, although progressive in its operation (Prov. iv:18), and absolutely essential to the enjoyment of God here and hereafter (Heb. xii:14). (See SANCTIFICATION.)

(3) Holy Place, Things, etc. The Scriptures also ascribe holiness to places (e. g., the Temple, and the "most holy place therein"). Also to things, as the altars and other accessories of worship. By holiness in such instances is meant "separation" or dedication to holy uses, and of course there is implied no moral quality or inherent sanctity in the objects themselves. They were to be treated with reverence, as should churches and accessories of worship in these days, because of the holiness of God, to whose service they are dedicated. (Dr. E. McChesney, Barnes' Bib. Dict.)

HOLON (hō'lon), (Heb. חֹלֹן or חֹלֶן, kho-lone', sandy).

1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv:51) given to the priests (xxi:15). Location is unknown.

2. A city in the plain of Moab upon which judgment was pronounced by Jeremiah (xlviii: 21). Not identified, although named in connection with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places.

HOLPEN (hōl'p'n), (Heb. זָרַע, zer-o-aw', Ps. lxxxiii:8), helped; Anglo-Saxon helpan.

HOLYDAY (hō'ly dā).

1. The rendering of the Heb. חַג, khaw-gag', to dance, a festival celebrated by sacred dances (Exod. xxxv:2, and so a public solemnity (Ps. xlii:4).

2. In Col. ii:16 "holyday" is the rendering of the Gr. heh-or-tay' (ἑορτή), a feast, and often so translated.

HOLY GHOST (hōly gōst), the third person in the trinity.

1. Scriptural Designations (Heb. רוּחַ אֱלֹהִים, roo'akh el-o-heem', spirit of God; or רוּחַ יְהוָה, roo'akh yeh-ho-vaw', spirit of Jehovah; Gr. τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, tō pneūma tō hag'ee-on, "the Holy Ghost," or the "Holy Spirit").

(1) Frequently the term is simply "the Spirit," or "the Spirit of the Lord," or "the Spirit of God," or "the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (Matt iii: 16; Luke iii:22; iv:18; Acts v:9; Phil. i:19). (2) He is called "seven Spirits," because of His perfect and diversified fullness of gifts, graces, and operations (Rev. i:4). (3) He is called the "Spirit of God;" His nature is Divine, and He is sent by God to perform His economic operations (2 Chron. xv:1). (4) He is the "Spirit of Christ," as He proceeds from Him as the Son of God, qualifies Him, and rests on Him as Mediator, and is sent by Him to execute the application of our redemption (Rom. viii:9).

2. Theological Statements.

(1) Procession from the Father and Son.

(a) The orthodox doctrine is, that as Christ is God by an eternal filiation, so the Spirit is God by procession from the Father and the Son. "And I believe in the Holy Ghost," says the Nicene Creed, "the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, who, with the Father and the Son together, is worshipped and glorified." And with this agrees the Athanasian Creed, "The Holy Ghost is of the Father and of the Son, neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." In the articles of the English Church it is thus expressed: "The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty and glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God." The Latin Church introduced the term spiration, from spiro, "to breathe," to denote the manner of this procession; on which Dr. Owen remarks: "As the vital breath of a man has a continual emanation from him, and yet is never separated utterly from his person, or forsaketh him, so doth the Spirit of the Father and the Son proceed from them by a continual divine emanation, still abiding one with them." On this refined view little can be said which has clear scriptural authority; and yet the very term by which the third Person in the Trinity is designated, Wind or Breath, may, as to the third Person, be designed, like the term Son applied to the second, to convey, though imperfectly, some intimation of that manner of being by which both are distinguished from each other, and from the Father; and it was a remarkable action of our Lord, and one certainly which does not discountenance this idea, that when he imparted the Holy Ghost to his disciples, "He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John xx:22). (b) The direct scriptural doctrine rests on such passages as John xv:26; Matt. x:20; 1 Cor. ii:11, 12; John xiv:26, etc.

(2) Personality and Deity. (a) In establishing the proper personality and deity of the Holy Ghost, the first argument may be drawn from the frequent association, in Scripture, of a Person under that appellation with two other Persons, one of whom, the Father, is by all acknowledged to be Divine; and the ascription to each of them, or to the three in union, of the same acts, titles, and authority, with worship, of the same kind, and, for any distinction that is made, of an equal degree. (b) The manifestation of the existence and divinity of the Holy Spirit may be expected in the law and the prophets, and is, in fact, to be traced there with certainty. The Spirit is represented as an agent in creation, "moving upon the face of the waters," and it forms no objection to the argument, that creation is ascribed to the Father, and also to the Son, but is a great confirmation of it. That creation should be effected by all the three Persons of the Godhead, though acting in different respects, yet so that each should be a Creator, and, therefore, both a Person and a Divine Person, can be explained only by their unity in one essence. On every other hypothesis this scriptural fact is disallowed, and therefore no other hypothesis can be true. (c) If the Spirit of God be a mere influence, then he is not a Creator, distinct from the Father and the Son, because he is not a Person; but this is refuted both by the passage just quoted, and by Ps. xxxiii:6: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath (Heb. Spirit) of his mouth." This is further confirmed by Job xxxiii:4: "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life:" where the second clause is obviously exegetic of the former; and the whole text proves that, in the patriarchal age, the followers of the true religion ascribed creation to the Spirit, as well as to the Father; and that one of his appellations was, "the Breath of the Almighty." Did such passages stand alone, there might, indeed, be some plausibility in the criticism which resolves them into a personification; but, connected as they are with the whole body of evidence, as to the concurring doctrine of both Testaments, they are inexpugnable. (d) Again: If the personality of the Son and the Spirit be allowed, and yet it is contended that they were but instruments in creation, through whom the creative power of another operated, but which creative power was not possessed by them—on this hypothesis, too, neither the Spirit nor the Son can be said to create, any more than Moses created the serpent into which his rod was turned, and the Scriptures are again contradicted.

(e) To this association of the three Persons in creative acts, may be added a like association in acts of preservation, which has been well called a continued creation, and by that term is expressed in the following passage: "These wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to dust: thou sendest forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth" (Ps. civ:27-30). It is not surely here meant that the Spirit by which the generations of animals are perpetuated is wind; and if he be called an attribute, wisdom, power, or both united, where do we read of such attributes being "sent," "sent forth from God?"

(3) Office and Work. (1) He is the "Spirit of promise," because promised to men, and he applies the promises of the new covenant to our heart (Eph. i:13). (2) He is the "Spirit of truth;" he is the "true God," and teacheth nothing but truth (John xiv:17). (3) He is a "holy, good, and free Spirit;" being holy and good in himself, he works holiness and goodness in us, of his own sovereign will, and renders us of a noble and benevolent temper (Ps. li:10, 11; cxliii:10). (4) He is a "Spirit of judgment," counsel, wisdom, and understanding; being infinite in knowledge and wisdom himself, he qualified Christ's manhood, and qualifies his people with wisdom and understanding (Is. xxviii:16; xi:2; Eph. i:17). (5) He is a "Spirit of bondage and fear," when, by the application of the broken law to men's conscience, he fills their mind with great pressure and fear (Rom. viii:15). (6) He is the "Spirit of adoption," that brings us into the family of God, dwells in every one of God's children, and renders them conform to his image (Rom. viii:15). (7) He is the "Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus," as, by uniting men to Christ, he bestows life on them, and by maintaining their fellowship with Christ, he restores, increases, and perfects their spiritual life (Rom. viii:2). (8) He is the "Spirit of Power," and "of faith," and "of love," and "of a sound mind," and "of supplication;" by his almighty power he works faith, love, and sound wisdom in the heart, and he directs and enables to pray and to wait for the answer thereof (Zech. xii:10; Rom. viii:27; 2 Cor. iv:13; 2 Tim. i:7). And the "love of the Spirit," is love of him, or gracious love produced by him (Rom. xv:30). (9) He is the "Spirit of grace" and "of glory;" as, from the fullness of Christ he conveys to the saints their gracious endowments and glorious happiness (Heb. x:29; 1 Pet. iv:14). (10) He is the "Spirit of the living creatures," which is in the wheels, as he actuates angels and ministers, and the church, and the world managed by them (Ezek. i:20). HOMAM (hō'mam), (Heb. חֹמָם, ho-marwm', destruction), the name of an Edomite (1 Chron. i:30). In Gen. xxxvi:22 it is given HEMAM, incorrectly, Gesenius thinks (Theo. p. 385, a).

HOME. See FAMILY; HOUSEHOLD.

HOMEBORN. See SERVICE.

HOMER (hō'mēr), (Heb. הֹמֶר, ho'mer, a heap).

A measure for dry substances and liquids. It contained ten baths or ephahs (Ezek. xlv:11, 14), and one hundred omers (Exod. xvi:36). It held about thirty-six pecks, U. S. measure. (See EPHAH; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

HONEST, HONESTY (ōn'ēs-ī), (Gr. καλός, kal-os', excellent), "Honest" is generally rendered in the R. V. "honorable" and "seemly." Sem-not-ace (Gr. σεμνότης) has the meaning of gravity; probity; purity (1 Pet. ii:12; 1 Tim. ii:2).

These words have greatly deteriorated in the three centuries that lie between us and the issue of A. V. What they mean now we know; then they meant something nearly approaching the meaning of the Latin words from which they come. Honestus from honor, 'honor,' had two meanings in Latin: (1) 'Regarded with honor,' 'honorable.' (2) 'Bringing honor,' 'becoming,' and those are just the meanings of 'honest' as it is used in A. V. The word had at the time a special, one might almost say technical, meaning when used of women; it meant 'chaste.' Thus in his chapter in The Profane State (v. 1, p. 359) on 'The Harlot,' T. Fuller speaks of her curling and curling the like, and then adds, 'I must confesse some honest women may go thus, but no whit the honester for going thus.' (Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HONEY (hūn'y). In the Scripture there are three words denoting different sweet substances, all of which are rendered by 'honey' in the Authorized Version. These it is necessary to distinguish.

1. יַחַר, yah'ar, which only occurs in 1 Sam. xiv:25, 27, 29; Cant. v:1; and denotes the honey of bees and that only.

2. נֹפֶת, no'feth, honey that drops, usually associated with the comb, and therefore bee-honey. This occurs in Ps. xix:10; Prov. v:3; xxiv:13; xxvii:7; Cant. iv:11.

3. דְּבַשׁ, deb-esh'. This is the most frequent word. It sometimes denotes bee-honey, as in Judg. xiv:8, but more commonly a vegetable honey distilled from trees, and called manna by chemists; also the syrup of dates, and even dates themselves. It appears also sometimes to stand as a general term for all kinds of honey.

It is very evident that the land of Canaan abounded in honey. It is indeed described as 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Exod. iii:8, etc.); which we apprehend to refer to all the sweet substances which the different Hebrew words indicate, as the phrase seems too large to be confined to the honey of bees alone. Yet the great number of bees in Palestine has been noticed by many travelers; and they were doubtless still more common in ancient times when the soil was under more general cultivation.

The wild honey, which, with locusts, formed the diet of John the Baptist, was probably the vegetable honey. (See MANNA.)

Honey was not permitted to be offered on the altar (Lev. ii:11). As it is coupled with leaven in this prohibition, it would seem to amount to an interdiction of things sour and sweet. Ahen Ezra and others allege that it was because honey partook of the fermenting nature of leaven, and when burnt yielded an unpleasant smell—qualities incompatible with offerings made by fire of a sweet savor unto the Lord. But Maimonides and others think it was for the purpose of making a difference between the religious customs of the Jews and the heathen, in whose offerings honey was much employed. The first-fruits of honey were, however, to be presented, as these were destined for the support of the priests, and not to be offered upon the altar.

The remarkable incident related in 1 Sam. xiv:24-32, requires to be here noticed. Jonathan and his party coming to the wood, find honey dropping from the trees to the ground, and the prince extends his rod to the honeycomb to taste the honey. On this the present writer is unable to add anything to what is said by Kitto (Pictorial Bible, in loc.), which is to the following effect: First, we are told that the honey was on the ground, then that it dropped, and lastly, that Jonathan put his rod into the honeycomb. From all this it is clear that the honey was bee-honey, and that honeycombs were above in the trees; from which honey dropped upon the ground; but it was not clear whether Jonathan put his rod into a honeycomb that was in the trees or shrubs, or into one that had fallen to the ground, or that had been formed there.

Where wild bees are abundant they form their combs in any convenient place that offers, particularly in cavities or even on the branches of trees; nor are they so nice as is commonly supposed in the choice of situations. In India particularly, and in the Indian islands, the forests often swarm with bees.

We have good reason to conclude, from many allusions in Scripture, that this was also, to a considerable extent, the case formerly in Palestine.

The woods on the western coast of Africa, between Cape Blanco and Sierra Leone, and particularly near the Gambia, are full of bees, to which the negroes formerly, if they do not now, paid considerable attention for the sake of the wax. They had bee-hives, like baskets, made of reeds and sedge, and hung on the out-boughs of the trees, which the bees easily appropriated for the purpose of forming their combs in them. In some parts these hives were so thickly placed that at a distance they looked like fruit. As to the other supposition, that the honeycomb had been formed on the ground, we think the context rather bears against it; but the circumstance is not in itself unlikely, or incompatible with the habits of wild bees. For want of a better resource they sometimes form their honey in any tolerably convenient spot they can find in the ground, such as small hollows or even holes formed by animals.*

Figurative. (1) Whatever is sweet, delightful, and healing is likened to "honey;" as the word of God (Ps. xix:10; cxix:103); the prayers, praises, and edifying talk of the saints—Christ's gospel truths, and his people's graces, and the knowledge of wisdom (Prov. xxiv:13). (2)

*EDITOR'S NOTE.—A distinction should be made, however, between different sorts of bees called wild. The true Apis mellifica, the kind whose culture in Italy is described by Vergil in the third book of the Georgics, and which has been appropriated by mankind from time immemorial, generally sends forth a swarm from each hive at least once a year. The bee-keeper, if on his guard, captures this swarm and gives it a hive. But swarms escape from man, and following their nature make their homes in hollow trees, in clefts in rocks, in under-roof spaces in houses, in short, in any place that is hive-like to which they may first come. These, although called wild, are identical in habit with their kindred under human care. They never occupy holes in the ground.

On the other hand, the various species of Bombus, familiarly known as the humble-bee or bumble-bee, make their nests on the ground, in clumps of weeds, in wood-piles, or under the surface of the ground. They never make very large communities, nor accumulate great stores of honey. Their cells are large, as is the bee, but few in number, since they lay up nothing for winter. Only the mother-bees of the Bombus hibernate, the males and workers all perishing; but of the Apis, the mother-bee or queen (Vergil called her the king) and many workers survive; hence their habit of storing honey in numerous combs for winter use. S. W.

The lips of harlots drop as a "honeycomb," and their mouth is smoother than oil; their speech is soft, flattering, and enticing (Prov. v:3). (3) The full soul loatheth the "honeycomb;" but to the hungry even bitter things are pleasant; persons full of goodness in their own conceit, or full of worldly cares, loathe the sweetest promises and blessings of God; but such as are sensible of their wants and unworthiness are glad to obtain the very least of God's mercies (Prov. xxvii:7).

HONORABLE (hōn'ā-b'l), (Gr. ἔτιμος, en'tee-mos, Luke xiv:8), having rank in society.

HOOD (hōōd), (Heb. תָּוֹף, tsaw-nee', Is. iii:23). See HEADRESS.

HOOF (hōōf), (Heb. פָּרָסָה, par-saw', to split; divide), the cleft foot of neat cattle (Exod. x:26; Lev. xi:3, etc.), and also of the horse, though not cloven (Is. v:28; Jer. xlvii:3). The parting of the hoof is one of the main distinctions between clean and unclean animals.

HOOK, HOOKS (hōōks).

1. K'hawkh (Heb. קָוֶה, literally, thorn), a ring, such as we place in the nose of a bull to lead him about (2 Kings xix:28; Is. xxxvii:29).

2. A peg, or pin, upon which the curtains were hung in the tabernacle (See TABERNACLE).

3. A vine dresser's pruning hook (Is. ii:4; xviii:5; Mic. iv:3; Joel iii:10).

The passages in Exod. xxvi:32, 37; xxxviii:19, 'hooks,' the Sept. and Jerome seem to have understood to mean the capitals of the pillars; and it has been urged that this is more likely to be the meaning than hooks, especially as 1775 shekels of silver were used in making these capitals, for the pillars, overlaying the chapiters, and filleting them (ch. xxxviii:28); and that the hooks are really the taches of Exod. xxvi:6, 11, 33, 35; xxxix:33; (comp. Exod. xxvii:10, 11; xxxviii:17, 19); from a comparison of these two latter passages it would seem that these hooks, or rather tenters, rose out of the chapiters or heads of the pillars.

In the allusions in Exod. xxvii:3; 1 Sam. ii:13, 14, and elsewhere, we have evidently in the first passage, a trident 'of three teeth,' a kind of fork, etc., for turning the sacrifices on the fire, and for collecting fragments, etc.

In Ezek. xl:43, we have 'hooks,' which Gesenius explains as meaning broad hooks or large pegs in the courts of the Temple, where the sacrificial victims were fastened to be flayed; our translators give in the margin 'end-irons, or the two hearthstones.'

Dr. Lightfoot, in his chapter on 'The Altar, the Rings, and the Laver,' observes: 'On the north side of the altar were six orders of rings, each of which contained six, at which they killed the sacrifices. Near by were low pillars set up, upon which were laid overthwart beams of cedar; on these were fastened rows of hooks, on which the sacrifices were hung; and they were flayed on marble tables, which were between these pillars' (See verses 41, 42; Works, vol. II, ch. xxxiv, Lond. 1684-5-6). J. F. D.

Figurative. The passage in 2 Kings xix:28 reads: 'I will put my hook in thy nose.' Sept. ἠθῶ τὰ ἀγκιστρά μου ἐν τοῖς μυκτήροσ σου; Vulg. circulum in naribus tuis. In the parallel passage (Is. xxxvii:29) the Sept. reads, 'I will put my muzzle, halter, or noose,' etc. Jehovah here intimates his absolute control over Sennacherib, by an allusion to the practice of leading buffaloes, camels, dromedaries, etc., by means of a cord, or of a cord attached to a ring, passed through the nostrils (Shaw's Travels, pp. 167, 168, 2d ed.); Job xli:1, 2, 'Canst thou draw out Leviathan with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down. Canst thou place a reed-cord (ag-mon) in his nose, or bore through his cheek with a thorn? (clasp, or possibly bracelet, etc.) In Ezek. xxix:4, the statement is made, 'I will put my hooks on thy jaws,' etc., and 'I will cause thee to come up out of the midst of thy rivers.' Here the prophet foretells the destruction of Pharaoh king of Egypt, by allusions to the destruction, possibly, of a crocodile, the symbol of Egypt. (See LEVIATHAN.)

HOPE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words—among these are:

1. Beh'takh (Heb. בְּחַתָּה, safety) means both the fact, security, and the feeling, trust (Ps. xvi:9; xxii:9, etc.).

2. Keh'sel (Heb. כֶּהֶסֶל, fatness), confidence sometimes unwisely entertained (Job viii:14; xxxi:24, etc.), but not always (Ps. lxxviii:7).

3. Mib-tawkh' (Heb. מִבְּתוֹכִי, refuge), firm and certain hope (Prov. xxii:19, A. V. "trust"); sometimes figuratively of a person or thing in which confidence is placed (Job viii:14, A. V. "trust;" Ps. xlii:5; lxxi:5, etc.).

4. El-pecc' (Gr. ἐλπίς) denotes favorable expectation in the New Testament.

5. In general hope may be defined as the desire of some good, attended with the possibility, at least, of obtaining it; and is enlivened with joy, greater or less, according to the probability there is of possessing the object of our hope. Scarce any passion seems to be more natural to man than hope, and, considering the many troubles he is encompassed with, none is more necessary; for life, void of all hope, would be a heavy and spiritless thing, very little desirable, perhaps hardly to be borne; whereas hope infuses strength into the mind, and, by so doing, lessens the burdens of life. If our condition be not the best in the world, yet we hope it will be better, and this helps us to support it with patience. The hope of the Christian is an expectation of all necessary good both in time and eternity, founded on the promises, relations, and perfections of God, and on the offices, righteousness, and intercession of Christ. It is a compound of desire, expectation, patience, and joy, (Rom. viii:24, 25). It may be considered, 1. As pure (1 John iii:2, 3), as it is resident in that heart which is cleansed from sin. 2. As good (2 Thess. ii:16, in distinction from the hope of the hypocrite) as deriving its origin from God, and centering in him. 3. It is called lively (1 Pet. i:3) as it proceeds from spiritual life, and renders one active and lively in good works. 4. It is courageous (Rom. v:5; 1 Thess. v:8) because it excites fortitude in all the troubles of life, and yields support in the hour of death (Prov. xiv:32). 5. Sure (Heb. vi:19) because it will not disappoint us, and is fixed on a sure foundation. 6. Joyful (Rom. v:2) as it produces the greatest felicity in the anticipation of complete deliverance from all evil.

HOPHNI (hōph'nī) and PHINEHAS (Heb. פִּינְחָס, chof-nee', a fighter; one strong), the sons of Eli, whose misconduct in the priesthood (as described in 1 Sam. ii:12-17) brought down that doom of ruin and degradation upon the house of Eli which formed the first divine communication through the young Samuel (1 Sam. iii). Hophni and Phinehas were slain in the battle in which the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, B. C. 1141 (1 Sam. iv:11). (See ELI.)

HOPHRA (höph'ra), (Heb. חֹפְרָא khoph-ra', Pharaoh-hophra), king of Egypt in the time of Zedekiah, king of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon.

He formed alliance with the former against the latter, and his advance with an Egyptian army constrained the Chaldæans to raise the siege of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvii:5); but they soon returned and took and destroyed the city. This momentary aid, and the danger of placing reliance on the protection of Hophra, led Ezekiel to compare the Egyptians to a broken reed, which was to pierce the hand of him that leaned upon it (Ezek. xxix:6, 7). This alliance was, however, disapproved by God; and Jeremiah was authorized to deliver the prophecy contained in his 44th chapter, which con-

1. A mountain in Arabia Petræa, on the confines of Idumæa, and forming part of the mountain of Seir or Edom. It is mentioned in Scripture in connection with the circumstances recorded in Num. xx:22-29; xxxiii:37, 41. The Israelites were encamped before it, when Aaron was summoned to its top to die there, in the presence of his brother and son, who alone witnessed his final departure. (See AARON.)

(1) Location. The mountain now identified with Mount Hor is the most conspicuous in the whole range of Mount Seir, and at this day bears the name of Mount Aaron (Jebel Haroun). It is in N. lat. 30 deg. 18 min., E. long. 35 deg. 33 min. about mid-way between the Dead Sea and the Ælanitic Gulf. It may be open to question if this is really the Mount Hor on which Aaron died, see-cludes with a prediction of Hophra's death and the subjugation of his country by the Chaldæans (B. C. 588).

This Pharaoh-hophra is identified with the Apries or Vaphres of ancient authors, and he may be the Psamatik III. of the monuments. Under this identification we may conclude that his wars with the Syrians and Cyrenæans prevented him from affording any great assistance to Zedekiah. Ezekiel xxix:3 speaks of this king as 'the great dragon that lieth in the midst of the rivers, which hath said, my river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.' His overthrow and subsequent captivity and death are foretold with remarkable precision by Jeremiah (xlv:30). This was brought about by a revolt of the troops, who placed Amasis at their head, and after various conflicts took Apries prisoner. He was for a time kept in easy captivity by Amasis, who wished to spare his life; but he was at length constrained to give him up to the vengeance of his enemies, by whom he was strangled (Herod. ii:169; Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, i:168, 182).

HOR, MOUNT (hôr), (Heb. הָרֵי הֹרַי hore haw-haw', "mountain, the mountain," i. e. the mountain of mountains), the name of two mountains.

ing that the whole range of Seir was anciently called by that name; yet from its height and the conspicuous manner in which it rises among the surrounding rocks, it seems not unlikely to have been the chosen scene of the high-priest's death (Kinnear, p. 127). To this may be added that Josephus affirms Mount Hor to have been near Petra; and near that place there is certainly no mountain which can contest the distinction with the one now in view. The base of the highest pinnacle of this mountain is in fact but a little removed from the skirts of the city to the westward. Much juniper grows on the mountain, almost to the very summit, and many flowering plants. On the top there is an overhanging shelf in the rock which forms a sort of cavern. The tomb itself is enclosed in a small building, differing not at all in external form and appearance from those of Mahomedan saints common throughout every province of Turkey. It has probably been rebuilt at no remote period; some small columns are bedded in the walls, and some fragments of granite and slabs of white marble are scattered about. The door is near the southwest angle, within which a constructed tomb, with a pall thrown over it, presents itself immediately upon entering: it is patched together out of fragments of stone and marble that have made part of other fabrics.

Not far from the northwest angle is a passage, descending by steps to a vault or grotto beneath. The roof is covered, but the whole is rude, ill-fashioned, and quite dark. Towards the further end of this dark vault are the two corresponding leaves of an iron grating, which formerly prevented all nearer approach to the tomb; they have, however, been thrown down.

(2) The View. The view from the summit of the edifice is extremely extensive in every direction, and the eye rests on few objects which it can clearly distinguish to give a name to, although an excellent idea is obtained of the general face and features of the country. The chain of Idumean mountains which forms the western shore of the Dead Sea seems to run on to the southward, though losing considerably in height. They appear in this point of view barren and desolate. Below them is spread out a white sandy plain, seamed with the beds of occasional torrents, and presenting much the same features as the most desert parts of the Ghor.

(3) Geology. "Mount Hor is formed of reddish sandstone and conglomerate ('Nubian sandstone' of Russegger) of Cretaceous age; the beds rising in a precipitous wall of natural masonry tier above tier, and presenting a bold front towards the west. These huge beds of sandstone compose the upper part of the ridge to a depth of about a thousand feet from the summit, where they rest on a solid foundation of granite and porphyry of great geological antiquity, associated with which, in some way not very clear, are masses of agglomerate, beds of ash and dykes of igneous rock, all of volcanic origin, but of an age anterior to the Cretaceous sandstone. This latter formation dips towards the east, and gradually descends in the direction of the Wady Musa, where it forms the cliffs which surround the city of Petra. Along the flanks of the escarpment of the Arabian Desert to the eastward the sandstone formation passes below the white marls and limestones of Upper Cretaceous age, which form the surface of the plain at a level of over 5,000 feet above the sea." (E. Hall, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

2. A mountain named only in Num. xxxiv:7, 8, as one of the marks in the northern boundary of the land of Promise. Its identification is difficult. The Mediterranean was the western boundary; the first point was Mount Hor, and the second "the entrance of Hamath." If Dr. Porter's identification of the latter with the pass at Kalat el-Husn, close to Hums, is correct, then Mount Hor can be nothing else than the great chain of Lebanon itself. (Barnes, Bib. Dict.) "It is so clearly the natural northern boundary of the country, that there seems no reason to doubt that the whole range is intended by the term Hor." (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.)

HORAM (hō'ram), (Heb. הֹרָם, ho-rawm', lofty), a king of Gezer, who, assisting the king of Lachish, was defeated and his country ravaged (Josh x:33), B. C. 1618.

HOREB (hō'reb), (Heb. הַרְבֵּי, kho-rabe', desert).

1. A mountain or range frequently mentioned in Scripture. The special application of Horeb and Sinai in the Old Testament has been much discussed. Robinson and Hengstenberg think that Horeb is the name for the whole range, Sinai for a particular peak; Gesenius and others hold precisely the opposite view. Stanley suggests that there is more a distinction of usage than of place.

(1) In Leviticus and Numbers, Sinai is exclusively used of the scene of the giving of the Law.

(2) In Deuteronomy, Horeb is substituted for Sinai. (3) In the Psalms the two are used indifferently. See Sinai and Palestine, p. 31. The Arabs now apply the name Jebel et-Tur to the whole central granite region, while the peaks of which it is composed are called by various names. The mountain of Sinai and its wilderness are distinguished as the theater of events that took place in the district of Horeb, and the whole of Horeb is called "the mountain of God" (Exod. iii:1, 12; iv:27; xvii:6; xviii:5; xxxiii:6. Hence, sometimes "Sinai" alone is spoken of (Exod. xix:11, 19, 23; xxiv:16; xxxi:18; xxxiv:29, 32; Lev. vii:38; xxv:1; xxvi:46; xxvii:34; Num. i:1; iii:1, 14; xxxiii:15. But frequently "Horeb" alone is named, and the same events are spoken of as occurring on Horeb which are described as taking place on Sinai (Deut. i:2, 6, 19; iv:10, 15; v:2; ix:8; xviii:16; xxix:1). Later sacred writers employ both names; e. g., "Horeb" (1 Kings viii:9; xix:8; 2 Chron. v:10; Ps. cvi:19; Mal. iv:4; "Sinai," Judg. v:5; Ps. lxxviii:8, 17).

2. In the New Testament, "Sinai" became a general name, as at the present day (Acts vii:30, 38; Gal. iv:24, 25). In more modern times, and ever since the Crusades, the application of the names Sinai and Horeb to the particular mountains or peaks has varied greatly among travelers. The range of Horeb spreads over an extensive field, and may be divided into two groups, exhibiting rugged and venerable mountains of dark granite, stern, naked, splintered peaks and ridges, some of them of indescribable grandeur, rising in frowning majesty high above the general level of the range. The following heights of several peaks are given by the British Ordnance Survey: Jebel Musa, 7,375 feet; Jebel Serhal, 6,735 feet; Jebel Katherin, 8,537 feet; Um Shamer, 8,450 feet. (Schaff, Bib. Dict.) (See SINAI).

HOREM (hō'rem), (Heb. הֹרֵם, khor-ame', devoted), one of the fortified towns of Naphtali (Josh. xix:38). Van de Velde identifies it with Hurah. Other authorities fail to concur with him.

HOR-HAGIDGAD (hōr'ha-gīd'gād), (Hebrew, הַרְבֵּי הַחֹרֶה, khore hag-ghid-gawd', hole of the cleft), the thirty-third encampment of the Israelites during their wandering (Num. xxxiii:32, 33). (See WANDERING, THE.)

HORI (hō'rī), (Heb. הֹרִי, or הֹרִי, kho-ree', cave dweller).

1. Son of Lotan, the son of Seir, and brother of Hemam (Gen. xxxvi:22; 1 Chron. i:39), B. C. about 1964.

2. Gen. xxxvi:30. In the original "the Horite."

3. Father of Shaphat, who represented the tribe of Simeon among the spies sent up to Canaan by Moses (Num. xiii:5), B. C. before 1657.

HORIMS (hō'rimz), (Deut. ii:12, 22). See HORITE.

HORITE (hō'rīte), (Heb. הֹרִי, kho-ree', cave dweller), A. V. sometimes Hori, Horims.

The predecessors of the Edomites in the country of Seir. They were there as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv:6). Jehovah destroyed them before the sons of Esau, and gave the latter their country (Deut. ii:12, 22). There was, however, such a mingling of the family of Esau and his Horite (in Gen. xxxvi:2 read Horite for Hivite) connections, that the Horite name and descent was preserved (Gen. xxxvi, especially verses 20, 21, 29-30).

The name Horite is supposed to mean 'cave-dweller' (see Driver, Deut., p. 38). On the theory that the Horites were rephaim, this fact is of interest in its bearing on the character of the rephaites civilization; but they did not always remain cave dwellers. (W. J. Beecher, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

Sayce (High. Crit., p. 203) thinks it better to connect the name with a root signifying "white," and considers the Horites as the representatives of a white race whom their neighbors contrasted with the "red"-skinned Edomites. In such a case they would have been members of the Amorite stock. They were the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir (Gen. xiv:6) from which they were driven by the descendants of Esau (Gen. xiv:6; xxxvi:20, 21, 29; Deut. ii:12, 22).

HORMAH (hôr'mah), (Heb. חֹרְמָה, khawr-maw', devoted to destruction), a city taken from the Canaanites by Judah and Simeon, (Judg. i:17; Num. xxi:3; Josh. xix:4, i Chron. iv:30), and originally called Zephath. It was reduced by Joshua (Josh. xii:14; xv:30; i Sam. xxx:30).

HORN (hörn), (Heb. קֶרֶן, keh'ren; Gr. κέρας, horn).

Its primary use indicates defense in the case of horned animals (whence Anacreon's Φύσις κέρατα ταύρους, nature gives horns to bulls), came to acquire several derivative meanings, some of which are connected with the illustration and right understanding of holy writ. As horns are hollow and easily polished, they have in ancient and modern times been used for drinking vessels and for military purposes; and as they are the chief source of strength for attack and defense with the animals to which God has given them, they serve in Scripture as emblems of power, dominion, glory, and fierceness (Dan. viii:5, 9; i Sam. xvi:1, 13; i Kings i:39; Josh. vi:4, 5; i Sam. ii:1; Ps. lxxv:5, 10; Jer. xlviii:25; Ezek. xxix:21; Amos vi:13). Hence to defile the horn in the dust (Job xvi:15), is to lower and degrade oneself, and, on the contrary, to lift up, to exalt the horn (Ps. lxxv:4; lxxxix:17; cxlviii:14), is poetically to raise oneself to eminent honor or prosperity, to bear oneself proudly.

In the East, at present, horns are used as an ornament for the head, and as a token of eminent

By an easy transition, horn came to denote an elevation or hill (Is. v:1); in Switzerland mountains still bear this name, thus, Schreckhorn, Buchhorn.

The altar of burnt-offerings (Exod. xxvii:2) and the altar of incense (Exod. xxx:2), had each at the four corners four horns of shittim-wood, the first being overlaid with brass, the second with gold (Exod. xxxvii:25; xxxviii:2; Jer. xvii:1; Amos iii:14). Upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings was to be smeared with the finger the blood of the slain bullock (Exod. xxix:12; Lev. iv:7-18; viii:15; ix:9; xvi:18; Ezek. xlvi:20). By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt-offering the criminal found an asylum and safety (i Kings i:50; ii:28). These horns are said to have served as a means for binding the animal destined for sacrifice (Ps. cxviii:27); but this use Winer (Handwörterb.) denies, asserting that they did not and could not answer for such a purpose. The custom of the Druse women of wearing horns seems not to have been referred to in the Scripture. So remarkable an article of dress, had it been in existence, would in all probability have been noticed by many authors who have entered so minutely into such matters. These horns consisted at first of an apparatus designed to finish off the headdress so as to raise the veil a little from the face, and from small beginnings have developed to their present enormous size. Sometimes they are made of pasteboard, of tin, silver, and among the wealthy of gold. The day for these preposterous appendages is about over. After the wars between the Maronites and the Druses (A. D. 1841 and 1845), the Maronite clergy thundered their excommunications against them, and very few Christians now wear them (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 101, 102).

rank. (Rosenmüller, Morg. iv. 85). The women among the Druses on Mount Lebanon wear on their heads silver horns of native make, 'which are the distinguishing badge of wifehood' (Bowring's Report on Syria, p. 8).

Figurative. 1. As cattle with their horns push their enemies, and defend themselves, horns are the symbol of power and authority. Joseph's horn resembled the horn of the unicorn; the power and dominion of his posterity, in the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim, were vastly great (Deut. xxxiii:17).

2. Wicked men lift up the horn, when they arrogantly boast of their power and authority, and threaten to destroy others; and their horns are cut off when their power and authority are taken from them (Ps. lxxv:4, 10; Jer. xlviii:25).

3. Hannah's horn was exalted when God highly honored her and gave her a child to be ruler over Israel (i Sam. ii:1).

4. David's horn was exalted as the horn of the unicorn, when his kingdom was exalted to great honor and his authority was established; and when his soul was eminently advanced in grace and comfort (Ps. xcii:10).

5. David's being anointed with a horn full of oil, when Saul was anointed with a vial of oil, might mark the abundance of gifts, and the stability of government in the one above the other (i Sam. x:1; xvi:1).

6. God is the horn of his people's salvation; by his power and authority he protects and saves them, and thrusts and destroys their enemies.

7. The horns of the altar represented Christ's authority, and ability to save sinners from every end of the earth; and, in allusion hereto, he is called a horn of salvation (1 Kings ii:28; Luke i:69); and his having seven horns, denotes the perfection of his power and authority (Rev. v:6).

8. The horns coming out of God's hand, in which was the hiding of his power, are the rays of the glorious brightness that attended him at Sinai, and the mighty displays of his power, in which his might was nevertheless but very partially displayed (Hab. iii:4).

9. Horns also signify kings and kingdoms (Dan. viii).

10. Antichrist's two horns as a lamb may denote his civil and ecclesiastic power (Rev. xiii:11).

11. The four horns that scattered Judah were their enemies from every place, particularly the Ammonites, Arabs, Samaritans, Philistines, and Syro-Grecians (Zech. i:21).

HORNET, WASP (hôr'nêt, wôsp), (Heb. חֲרָתָיִם, tsir-aw', stinging, Exod. xxiii:28; Deut. vii:20, Sept. τὰς σφήκας, hornets; Vulg. crabrones; Josh. xxiv:12, τῆν σφήκων, hornet, crabronem; Wisd. Sol. xii:8, σφήκας, vespas, 'wasps').

It being upon the whole most probable that 'the hornet' is the true rendering in these passages of Scripture, the only further question which remains is, whether the word is to be taken as literally meaning this well-known and terrific insect, or whether it is to be understood in a metaphorical and figurative sense for diseases, supernatural terror, etc., by which Jehovah 'drove out the Hivites, Canaanites, and Hittites from before Israel.' Among the moderns, Michaelis has defended the figurative sense. In addition to other reasons for it, he doubts whether the expulsion of the Canaanites could be effected by swarms of σφήκων, and derives the Hebrew from a root signifying 'scourges,' 'plagues,' scutica, plagæ, etc. (Suppl. ad Lexic. Hebr. vi, 2154). In favor of the possibility of such an event it is observed, that Ælian relates that the Phaselitæ were actually driven from their locality by such means (Hist. Anim. ix:28), and Bochart has shown that these Phaselitæ were a Phœnician people (ut supra, p. 412). Even Rosenmüller himself adopts the figurative sense in his Scholia on Exod. xxiii:28; but on Josh. xxiv:12 he retracts that opinion, and amply refutes it. His reasonings and refutations have been adopted by numerous writers (among others see Paxton's Illustrations of Scripture, i. 303, etc.; Edin. 1819).

Figurative. However, the word "hornet," in Exod. xxiii:28, is parallel with "fear" in verse 27, and similar expressions, such as "to chase as the bees do," are undoubtedly used metaphorically (Deut. i:44; Ps. cxviii:12). It is therefore reasonable to regard this word as expressing by a vivid image the fear which Jehovah would inspire in the enemy of Israel, as declared in Deut. ii:25; Josh. ii:11.

HORONAIM (hôr'o-nā'im), (Heb. חֲרֹנַיִם, horo-nah'yim, double cave town), a town of Moab (Is. xv:5; Jer. xlvi:3, 5, 34; Josephus Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. 23; xiv, cap. 2); doubtless the same called HOLON.

HORONITE, THE (hôr'o-nîte), (Heb. חֲרֹנַיִת, hakh-ô-ro-nee'), the appellation of Sanballat, who opposed Nehemiah in his work of restoration (Neh ii:10, 19; xiii:28).

HORSE (hòrs), (Heb. סוּס, sus; Gr. ἵππος, hippos), Gen. xlvii:17; xlix:17; Exod. xiv:9, 23, and in many other places; James iii:3; Rev. vi:2, etc.

The horse is one of the noblest animals of the brute kind, celebrated for comeliness, swiftness, pride, wantonness, natural fierceness, tameableness, strength and fitness for burden, draught, or war (Job xxxix:19-25).

It appears to be substantiated that the horse was derived from High Asia, and was not indigenous in Arabia, Syria, or Egypt. They are not mentioned among the presents which Pharaoh bestowed upon Abraham, and occur in Scripture for the first time when the patriarch Joseph receives them from the Egyptians in exchange for bread (Gen. xlvii:17)—evidently as valuable animals, disposed of singly, and not in droves or flocks, like cattle and asses. They were still sufficiently important to be expressly mentioned in the funeral procession which accompanied the body of Jacob to his sepulcher in Canaan (Gen. l:9); and, for centuries after, it does not appear that, under the domestic management of the Egyptians, unless the murrain had greatly reduced them, horses had multiplied as they would have done in a land more congenial to their habits, since only six hundred chariots appear to have pursued Israel (Exod. xiv:7)—even admitting that there were other chariots and horsemen not included in that number. In the sculptured battle scenes, which are believed to represent victories of Sesostris, or of Thothmes II and III, over nations of Central Asia, it is evident that the enemy's armies, as well as the foreign allies of Egypt, are abundantly supplied with horses, both for chariots and for riders; and in triumphal processions they are shown as presents or tribute—proving that they were portions of the national wealth of conquered states sufficiently valuable to be prized in Egypt.

Bay or red horses occur most frequently on Egyptian painted monuments, this being the primitive color of the Arabian stock; but white horses are also common, and, in a few instances, black—the last probably only to relieve the paler color of the one beside it in the picture.

C. H. S.

The horses of Egypt were reckoned stronger and finer than those of Syria (Is. xxxi:3).

Mountainous Palestine was not well adapted for the use of the horse, and in early times it was principally employed in the maritime plain and in the valley of Jezreel. There were many horses in Egypt (Gen. xlvii:17; Exod. ix:3). When the exodus took place Pharaoh's pursuing army was equipped with chariots and horses (xiv:9; xv:19). They existed also in the force of the northern Canaanites led by Sisera, Jabin's commander-in-chief (Judg. iv:15; v:22).

God prohibited the Hebrews from multiplying horses (Deut. xvii:16; Josh. xi:6). However, Solomon having married the daughter of Pharaoh, procured a fine breed of horses from Egypt, some of them at the rate of 600 shekels of silver, which, according to Prideaux, is £90 sterling, $450.00, and according to Arbuthnot, £68 9s, $340.00 (1 Kings x:26). He, first of the Hebrews, began to multiply horses, and had 4,000 stables, 40,000 stalls, and 12,000 horsemen (1 Kings iv:26; 2 Chron. ix:25). As the eastern heathens, who worshiped the sun, imagined that he rode along the sky in a chariot drawn with fleet horses, to communicate his light and warmth to mankind, they consecrated to him the finest steeds or chariots; with these they either rode to the eastern gates of their cities as the sun rose, or they held them so sacred that none might ride on them. Josiah removed from the Jewish temple the horses, or images of horses, which his father or grandfather had consecrated to the sun (2 Kings xxiii:11). Among the ancient orientals, horses were reckoned a grand present, and riding on them an honor (Eccles. x:7).

Figurative. (1) Horses are sometimes put for warriors on horseback (Ezek. xxxix:20). (2) God's instruments of accomplishing his purpose, and displaying his greatness and might, are represented as his horses or chariots (Zech. x:5; xii:4; Jer. li:21). (3) White horses, anciently symbols of victory, denote the gospel, whereby Christ shows his glory, conquers, and comes to his people, and whereby they are supported, borne forward in their heavenly journey, and enabled to conquer their foes; or they may be an emblem of warriors' victory, and of great joy and gladness. (4) Red horses represent persecution and bloody wars. (5) Pale horses denote famines in the church or state, which are followed with death, spiritual or temporal, and with hell. (6) Black horses may represent fearful judgments, that fill men with horror and perplexity. (7) And "grisled, speckled and bay horses" may denote mingled scenes of mercy and judgment (Rev. vi:2-8; xix:11, 14; Zech. i:8; vi:2, 3). (8) Angels appeared under the form of "horses and chariots" of fire, to hint, that God by them powerfully executes his purposes, subdues his enemies, protects his people, and conveys them to heaven (2 Kings ii:11; vi:17). (9) Saints are likened to a "company of horses" in Pharaoh's chariots. How precious and costly to Christ! How carefully nourished, cleansed, stationed, and cared for by him! How delightfully yoked under His law! and what a glorious means of displaying His power! (Cant. i:9) Brown.

HORSELEECH (hōrs'lēch), (Heb. עֲלִיָּהָה, al-oo-kaw', sucking, Prov. xxx:15), either one of the leeches, Hirudo medicinalis, Sav., or Hamopsis sanguisorba, Sav., found in the stagnant waters throughout the land; or a specter like the "night monster."

HORSEMAN (hōrs'man), (Heb. בַּעַל בָּרֶשֶׁת bah'al pau-raush', master of a horse). From Exod. xiv:9, etc., it would appear that cavalry accompanied Pharaoh in his pursuit of Israel—"his horsemen."

HOSAH (hō'sah), (Heb. הוֹסָה, ho-saw', hopeful).

1. A city of Asher, at a point on the boundary line where it turned from the direction of Tyre toward Achzib (Josh. xix:29); possibly the modern village of el Ghazieh or el Ezziyah, a little south of Zidon.

2. A Levitical door-keeper of the temple, whose station was by the 'gate of Shallecheth,' 1 Chron. xvi:38; xxvi:10, 11, 16. (B. C. about 988).

HOSANNA (hō-zān'nā), (Gr. ὡσαννά, ho-san-nah', from Heb. הוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ הוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ, ho-she-ah'naw, save now).

A form of acclamatory blessing or wishing well, which signifies, Save now! Succor now! Be now propitious! It occurs in Matt. xxi:9 (also Mark xi:9, 10; John xii:13)—'Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest.' This was on the occasion of our Savior's public entry into Jerusalem, and fairly construed would mean, 'Lord, preserve this Son of David; heap favors and blessings on him!' It is further to be observed that Hosanna was a customary form of acclamation at the Feast of the Tabernacles. This feast was celebrated in September, just before the commencement of the civil year; on which occasion the people carried in their hands bundles of boughs of palms, myrtles, etc. (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 13, 6; iii, 10, 4). They then repeated the 25th and 26th verses of Ps. cxviii, which commence with the word Hosanna, and from this circumstance they gave the boughs, and the prayers, and the feast itself, the name of Hosanna. They observed the same forms also at the Encenia, that is, the Feast of the reconsecration of the Temple, as instituted by Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. x:6, 7; 2 Macc. xiii:51; Rev. vii:9) and the Passover. And as they celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles with great joy and gladness, in like manner, on this occasion, did they hail the coming of the Messiah, whose advent they believed to be represented in all the feasts.

HOSEA (ho-zē'a), (Heb. הוֹשִׁעַ, ho-shay'ah, deliverer).

(1) Place of Hosea in the Versions. Hosea is the first in order of the minor prophets in the common editions of the Hebrew Scriptures, as well as of the Alexandrian and Vulgate translations. The arrangement of the other writers in the Greek versions differs considerably from that of the Hebrew copies. Both, however, place Hosea first in the catalogue; yet the reasons often assigned for the priority of place which this prophet enjoys are by no means satisfactory.

By the best computation he seems to have been preceded by Joel, Amos and Jonah. The prophets are thus arranged by De Wette (Einleitung, sec. 225):

Hebrew Text.	Greek Text.
1. Hosea.	1. Hosea.
2. Joel.	2. Amos.
3. Amos.	3. Micah.
4. Obadiah.	4. Joel.

Chronological Order.

1. Joel, about 810 B. C.
2. Jonah, about 810 B. C.
3. Amos, about 790 B. C.
4. Hosea, about 785 B. C.

The table given by Rosenmüller (Scholia in Min. Proph., p. 7) differs from this only in placing Jonah before Joel in chronological order. Compare Newcome (Preface to Minor Prophets, p. 45). The probable causes of this location of Hosea may be the thoroughly national character of his oracles, their length, their earnest tone and vivid representations; because he discharged the duties of his office for a longer period than any of his prophetic associates, is the less natural conjecture which has been hazarded by Rosenmüller. The contour of Hosea's book has a closer resemblance to the greater prophets than any of the eleven productions by which it is succeeded.

(2) Name and Family. The name of this prophet has been variously interpreted. Jerome erroneously renders it 'Salvator.' It may be either the infinitive absolute, 'Salvando,' or the imperative, 'Salva' (O Deus). It is ordinarily written in Greek, Ὠσῆ, and once with the initial aspirate, Ὠσῆ (Rom. ix:25). The fragments of Jewish writers regarding Hosea's parentage need scarcely be mentioned. His father has been confounded with a prince of the Reubenites (1 Chron. v:6). So, too, Beerl has been reckoned a prophet himself, according to the rabbinical notion that the mention of a prophet's father in the introduction to his prophecies is a proof that sire as well as son was endowed with the oracular spirit.

(3) Nationality. Whether Hosea was a citizen of Israel or Judah has been disputed. The pseudo-Epiphanius and Dorotheus of Tyre speak of him as being born at Belemoth, in the tribe of Issachar (Epiphanius, De Vitis Prophet. cap. xi; Dorotheus, De Proph. cap. i), Drusius (Critici Sacri, in loc. tom. v) prefers the reading 'Beth-semes,' and quotes Jerome, who says, 'Osee de tribu Issachar fuit ortus in Beth-semes.' But Maurer contends strenuously that he belonged to the kingdom of Judah (Comment. Theol., ed. Rosenmüller, vol. ii. p. 391); while Jahn supposes that he exercised his office, not, as Amos did, in Israel, but in the principality of Judah. Maurer appeals to the superscription in Amos as a proof that prophets of Jewish origin were sometimes commissioned to labor in the kingdom of Israel (against the appeal to Amos, vide Credner, Joel, p. 66, and Hitzig, Handb. Kurze. exeget zum A. T., p. 72). But with the exception of the case recorded in 1 Kings xiii:1 (a case altogether too singular and mysterious to serve as an argument), the instance of Amos is a solitary one, and seems to have been regarded as anomalous by his contemporaries (Amos vii:12). Neither can we assent to the other hypothesis of Maurer that the mention of the Jewish kings Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, by Hosea, in his superscription, is a proof that the seer regarded them as his rightful sovereigns, as monarchs of that territory which gave him birth. Hengstenberg has well replied that Maurer forgets 'the relation in which the pious in Israel generally, and the prophets in particular, stood to the kingdom of Judah. They considered the whole separation, not only the religious, but also the civil, as an apostasy from God. The dominion of the theocracy was promised to be the throne of David.' The lofty Elijah, on a memorable occasion, when a direct and solemn appeal was made to the head of the theocracy, took twelve stones, one for each tribe—a proof that he regarded the nation as one in religious confederation. It was also necessary for correct chronology that the kings of both nations should be noted. Jeroboam of Israel is mentioned as a means of ascertaining at what period in the long reign of Uzziah Hosea began to prophesy, and Uzziah's successors are named in particular, because the confusion and anarchy of the several interregna in the kingdom of Israel rendered computation by the names of Jeroboam's successors very awkward, difficult and uncertain. The other argument of Maurer for Hosea's being a Jew, viz., because his own people are so severely threatened in his reproofs and denunciations, implies a predominance of national prepossession or antipathy in the inspired breast which is inconsistent with our notions of the piety and patriotism of the prophetic commission (Knobel, Der Prophetismus der Hebräer, vol. i, p. 203). So that we can accede to the opinion of De Wette, Rosenmüller, Hengstenberg, Eichhorn, Manger, Uhland and Kuinoel, that Hosea was an Israelite, a native of that kingdom with whose sins and fates his book is specially and primarily occupied.

(4) Personal and National Relations. The years of Hosea's life were melancholy and tragic. The vials of the wrath of heaven were poured out on his apostate people. The nation suffered under the evils of that schism, which was effected by the craft of him who has been branded with the indelible stigma—'Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin.' The obligations of law had been relaxed, and the claims of religion disregarded; Baal became the rival of Jehovah, and in the dark recesses of the groves were practiced the impure and murderous rites of heathen deities; peace and prosperity fled the land, which was harassed by foreign invasion and domestic broils; might and murder became the twin sentinels of the throne; alliances were formed with other nations, which brought with them seductions to paganism; captivity and insult were heaped upon Israel by the uncircumcised; the nation was thoroughly debased, and but a fraction of its population maintained its spiritual allegiance (2 Kings xix:18). The death of Jeroboam II was followed by an interregnum of ten years. At the expiration of this period his son Zechariah assumed the sovereignty, and was slain by Shallum after the short space of six months (2 Kings xv:10). In four weeks Shallum was assassinated by Menahem. The assassin, during a disturbed reign of ten years, became tributary to the Assyrian Pul. His successor, Pekahiah, wore the crown but two years, when he was murdered by Pekah. Pekah, after swaying his bloody scepter for twenty years, met a similar fate in the conspiracy of Hoshea; Hoshea, the last of the usurpers, after another interregnum of eight years, ascended the throne, and his administration of nine years ended in the overthrow of his kingdom and the expatriation of his people. 'The Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight. So was Israel carried out of their own land to Assyria unto this day' (2 Kings xvii:18, 23).

HOSEA, BOOK OF.

(1) Against Whom Directed. The prophecies of Hosea were directed especially against the country whose sin had brought upon it such disasters—prolonged anarchy and final captivity. Israel, or Ephraim, is the people especially addressed. Their homicides and fornications, their perjury and theft, their idolatry and impiety are censured and satirized with a faithful severity. Judah is sometimes, indeed, introduced, warned and admonished. Bishop Horsley (Works, iii, 236), reckons it a mistake to suppose 'that Hosea's prophecies are almost wholly directed against the kingdom of Israel.' The bishop describes what he thinks the correct extent of Hosea's commission, but has adduced no proof of his assertion. Any one reading Hosea will at once discover that the oracles having relation to Israel are primary, while the references to Judah are only incidental. In chap. i:7, Judah is mentioned in contrast with Israel, to whose condition the symbolic name of the prophet's son is specially applicable. In verse 11 the future union of the two nations is predicted. The long oracle in chap. ii has no relation to Judah, nor the symbolic representation in chap. iii. Chap. iv is severe upon Ephraim and ends with a very brief exhortation to Judah not to follow his example. In the succeeding chapters allusions to Judah do indeed occasionally occur, when similar sins can be predicated of both branches of the nation. The prophet's mind was intensely interested in the destinies of his own people. The nations around him are unheeded; his prophetic eye beholds the crisis approaching his country, and sees its cantons ravaged, its tribes murdered or enslaved. No wonder that his rebukes were so terrible, his menaces so alarming, that his soul poured forth its strength in an ecstasy of grief and affection. Invitations, replete with tenderness and pathos, are interspersed with his warnings and expostulations. Now we are startled with a vision of the throne, at first shrouded in darkness, and sending forth lightnings, thunders and voices; but while we gaze, it becomes encircled with a rainbow, which gradually expands till it is lost in that universal brilliancy which itself had originated (chap. xi and xiv).

(2) Peculiar Mode of Instruction. The peculiar mode of instruction which the prophet details in the first and third chapters of his oracles has given rise to many disputed theories. We refer to the command expressed in chap. i:2: 'And the Lord said unto Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms,' etc.; chap. iii:1, 'Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress,' etc. What was the precise nature of the transactions here recorded? Were they real events, the result of divine injunctions literally understood, and as literally fulfilled? or were these intimations to the prophet only intended to be pictorial illustrations of the apostasy and spiritual folly and unfaithfulness of Israel? The former view, viz., that the prophet actually and literally entered into this impure connubial alliance, was advocated in ancient times by Cyril, Theodoret, Basil and Augustine; and more recently has been maintained by Mercer, Grotius, Houbigant, Manger, Horsley and Stuck. Fanciful theories are also rife on this subject. Luther supposed the prophet to perform a kind of drama in view of the people, giving his lawful wife and children these mystical appellations. Newcome (Min. Prophets) thinks that a wife of fornication means merely an Israelite, a woman of apostate and adulterous Israel. So Jac. Capellus (In Hoscam; Opera, p. 683). Hengstenberg supposes the prophet to relate actions which happened, indeed, actually, but not outwardly. Some, with Maimonides (Moreh Nevochim, part ii), imagine it to be a nocturnal vision; while others make it wholly an allegory, as the Chaldee Paraphrast, Jerome, Drusius, Bauer, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel and Löwth. The view of Hengstenberg, and such as have held his theory (Markii Diatribæ de uxore fornicationum accipiendæ, etc., Lugd. Batav., 1696), is not materially different from the last to which we have referred. Both agree in condemning the first opinion, which the fast and forward mind of Horsley so strenuously maintained. Hengstenberg, at great length and with much force, has refuted this strange hypothesis (Christology, ii, 11-12). Besides other arguments resting on the impurity and loathsomeness of the supposed nuptial contract, it may be argued against the external reality of the event, that it must have required several years for its completion, and that the impressiveness of the symbol would therefore be weakened and obliterated. Other prophetic transactions of a similar nature might be referred to. Jerome (Comment. in loc.) has referred to Ezek. iv:4. It is not to be supposed, as has sometimes been argued, that the prophet was commanded to commit fornication. The divine injunction was to marry—'Scortum aliquis ducere potest sine peccato, scortari non item.' Drusius (Comm. in loc. in Critici Sacri, tom. v). Whichever way this question may be solved, whether these occurrences be regarded as a real and external transaction, or as a piece of spiritual scenery, or only, as is most probable (Witsii Miscell. Sac., p. 90), an allegorical description, it is agreed on all hands that the actions are, that they are, as Jerome calls them, sacramenta futurorum.

(3) Differences of Views. Expositors are not at all agreed as to the meaning of the phrase 'wife of whoredoms,' whether the phrase refers to harlotry before marriage, or unfaithfulness after it. It may afford an easy solution of the difficulty if we look at the antitype in its history and character. Adultery is the appellation of idolatrous apostasy. The Jewish nation was espoused to God. The contract was formed on Sinai; but the Jewish people had prior to this period gone a-whoring. Josh. xxiv:2-14, 'Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, and they served other gods.' Comp. Lev. xvii:7, in which it is implied that idolatrous propensities had also developed themselves during the abode in Egypt; so that the phrase employed may signify one devoted to lasciviousness prior to her marriage. The marriage must be supposed a real contract, or its significance would be lost. Jer. ii:2, 'I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown.' Children of whoredoms refer most naturally to the two sons and daughter afterwards to be born. They were not the prophet's own, as is intimated in the allegory, and they followed the pernicious example of the mother. Spiritual adultery was the debasing sin of Israel.

The Israelites who had been taken into covenant very soon fell from their first love, and were characterized by insatiable spiritual wantonness; yet their Maker, their husband, did not at once divorce them, but exhibited a marvelous long-suffering.

The names of the children being symbolical, the name of the mother has probably a similar signification. It may have the symbolic sense of 'one thoroughly abandoned to sensual delights.'

The names of the children are Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi. The prophet explains the meaning of the appellations. It is generally supposed that the names refer to three successive generations of the Israelitish people. Hengstenberg, on the other hand, argues that 'wife and children both are the people of Israel; the three names must not be considered separately, but taken together.' But as the marriage is first mentioned, and the births of the children are detailed in order, some time elapsing between the events, we rather adhere to the ordinary exposition. Nor is it without reason that the second child is described as a female.

The first child, Jezreel, may refer to the first dynasty of Jeroboam I and his successors, which was terminated in the blood of Ahab's house which Jehu shed at Jezreel. The name suggests also the cruel and fraudulent possession of the vineyard of Naboth, 'which was in Jezreel,' where, too, the woman Jezebel was slain so ignominiously (1 Kings xvi:1; 2 Kings ix:21). But as Jehu and his family had become as corrupt as their predecessors, the scenes of Jezreel were again to be enacted, and Jehu's race must perish. Jezreel, the spot referred to by the prophet, is also, according to Jerome, the place where the Assyrian army routed the Israelites. The name of this child associates the past and future, symbolizes past sins, intermediate punishments and final overthrow. The name of the second child, Lo-ruhamah, 'not-pitied,' the appellation of a degraded daughter, may refer to the feeble, effeminate period which followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel became weak and helpless as well as sunk and abandoned. The favor of God was not exhibited to the nation; they were as abject as impious. But the reign of Jeroboam II was prosperous; new energy was infused into the kingdom; gleams of its former prosperity shone upon it. This revival of strength in that generation may be typified by the birth of a third child, a son, Lo-ammi, 'not my people' (2 Kings xiv:25). Yet prosperity did not bring with it a revival of piety; still, although their vigor was recruited, they were not God's people (Lectures on the Jewish Antiquities and Scriptures, by J. G. Palfrey, vol. ii, 422, Boston, N. A., 1841).

The space we have already occupied precludes more minute criticism; but the general principles we have indicated may be applied to the second and third chapters.

(4) Divisions. Recent writers, such as Bertholdt, Eichhorn, De Wette, Stuck, Maurer and Hitzig, have labored much, but in vain, to divide the book of Hosea into separate portions, assigning to each the period at which it was written; but from the want of sufficient data the attempt must rest principally on taste and fancy. A sufficient proof of the correctness of this opinion may be found in the contradictory sections and allotments of the various writers who have engaged in the task. Chapters i, ii and iii evidently form one division; it is next to impossible to separate and distinguish the other chapters. The form and style are very similar throughout all the second portion.

(5) Style. The peculiarities of Hosea's style have been often remarked. Jerome says of him, 'Commaticus est et quasi per sententias loquens' (Præf. ad XII Proph.). His style, says De Wette, 'is abrupt, unrounded and ebullient; his rhythm hard, leaping and violent. The language is peculiar and difficult' (Einleitung, sec. 228). Lowth (Praelect., 21) speaks of him as the most difficult and perplexed of the prophets. Bishop Horsley has remarked his peculiar idioms—his change of person, anomalies of gender and number, and use of the nominative absolute (Works, vol. iii). Eichhorn's description of his style was probably at the same time meant as an imitation of it (Einleitung, sec. 555): 'His discourse is like a garland woven of a multiplicity of flowers; images are woven upon images, comparison wound upon comparison, metaphor strung upon metaphor. He plucks one flower, and throws it down that he may directly break off another. Like a bee, he flies from one flower-bed to another, that he may suck his honey from the most varied pieces. It is a natural consequence that his figures sometimes form strings of pearls. Often is he prone to approach to allegory—often he sinks down in obscurity' (comp. chap. v:9; vi:3; vii:8; xiii:3, 7, 8, 16). Unusual words and forms of connection sometimes occur (De Wette, sec. 228). Many examples might be given of the peculiar abruptness of the style; the particles of connection, causal, adversative, transitive, etc., being frequently omitted.

(6) Quoted in New Testament. Hosea, as a prophet is expressly quoted by Matthew (ii:15). The citation is from the first verse of chap. xi. Hosea (vi:6) is quoted twice by the same evangelist (ix:13; xii:7). Quotations from his prophecies are also to be found in Rom. ix:25, 26. References to them occur in 1 Cor. xv:55 and in 1 Pet. ii:10. Messianic references are not clearly and prominently developed (Gramberg, Religionssid, ii:298). This book, however, is not without them; but they lie more in the spirit of its allusions than in the letter. Hosea's Christology appears written not with ink, but with the spirit of the living God, on the fleshly tables of his heart. The future conversion of his people to the Lord their God, and David their king, their glorious privilege, in becoming sons of the living God, the faithfulness of the original promise to Abraham, that the number of his spiritual seed should be as the sand of the sea, are among the oracles whose fulfillment will take place only under the new dispensation.

(7) Literature. Besides works on the Minor Prophets as a whole, such as Ewald, Hitzig-Steiner, Keil, Pusey, von Orelli, etc., particular commentaries on Hosea are: Pococke, Oxf. 1685; Simson, 1851; Wünsche, 1868; Nowack, 1880; and Kleine Propheten (Handkom.), 1897; Scholz, 1882; Cheyne (Camb. Bible), 1884. Comp. Valeton, Amos en Hosea, 1894; G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Proph. (Expositor's Bible), 1896; Wellhausen, Die Kleinen Proph. (Skizzen v.), 1893; also W. R. Smith, Prophets, Lect. iv.; Billeb, *Die wichtigsten Sätze d. HOSE, HOSEN (hōz, hōz'n), (Chald. ܫܘܨܐ, pat-teesh'), A. V. (Dan. iii:21) of a Chaldee word meaning tunics. Hosen is plural of hose, and originally meant any covering for the legs.

HOSHAI AH (hōsh'a-i'ah), (Heb. ܫׁוֹשַׁיִךְ יְהוָה, hoshah-yaw', Jehovah has saved).

1. A man who led the princes of Judah in the procession in celebration of the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii:32), B. C. 446.

2. The father of Jeconiah or Azariah, who was a man of note after Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem (Jer. xlii:1; xliii:2), B. C. 587.

HOSHAMA (hōsh'a-mā), (Heb. ܫׁוֹשַׁמָּה, ho-shaw-maw', whom Jehovah hears), according to 1 Chron. iii:18 a son of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachim, next to the last King of Judah.

But the sons of Jeconiah are not mentioned with others of the family (2 Kings xxiv:12, 15), and Jer. xxii:30 denounces him as 'a childless man.' For these reasons there is good ground for sustaining the suspicion that there is some corruption of the genealogy of the royal family in 1 Chron. iii (B. C. after 598).

HOSHEA (ho-shē'á), (Heb. ܫׁוֹשַׁע, ho-shay-ah', help, or God is help).

1. Son of Elah, and last king of Israel. He conspired against and slew his predecessor Pekah, and seized his dominions. 'He did evil in the sight of the Lord,' but not in the same degree as his predecessors: and this, by the Jewish commentators, is understood to mean that he did not, like former kings of Israel (2 Kings xv:30), restrain his subjects from going up to Jerusalem to worship. The intelligence that Hoshea had entered into a confederacy with So, king of Egypt, with the view of shaking off the Assyrian yoke, caused Shalmaneser, the king of Assyria, to march an army into the land of Israel; and after a three years' siege Samaria was taken and destroyed, and the ten tribes were sent into the countries beyond the Euphrates (B. C. 720) (2 Kings xv:30; xvii:1-6; xviii:9-12). The chronology of this reign is much perplexed. (See CHRONOLOGY; ISRAEL.)

2. Son of Nun, i. e. Joshua (Deut. xxxii:44). In Num. xiii:8, the A. V. has Oshca. It was probably his original name, to which Jah was added later.

3. A ruler of the tribe of Ephraim in the time of King David (1 Chron. xxvii:20).

4. One of the heads of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:23), B. C. about 410.

HOSPITALITY (hōs'pī-tal'ī-tĭy).

The practice of receiving strangers into one's house and giving them suitable entertainment may be traced back to the early origin of human society. It is not, however, confined to any age or to any country, but has been observed in all parts of the globe wherever circumstances have been such as to render it desirable—thus affording one among many instances of the readiness with which human nature, in its moral as well as in its physical properties, adapts itself to every varying condition. Hospitality is therefore not a peculiarly Oriental virtue. It was practiced, as it still is, among the least cultivated nations (Diod. Sic. v: 28, 34; Cæs. Bell. Gall. vi:23; Tac. German. 21).

(1) Among Greeks and Romans. It was not less observed, in the early periods of their history, among the Greeks and Romans. With the Greeks, hospitality (ξένια) was under the immediate protection of religion. Jupiter bore a name (ξένιος, protector of guests) signifying that its rights were under his guardianship. In the Odyssey (vi, 206) we are told expressly that all guests and poor people are special objects of care to the gods. There were both in Greece and Italy two kinds of hospitality, the one private, the other public. The first existed between individuals, the second was cultivated by one state towards another. Hence arose a new kind of social relation: between those who had exercised and partaken of the rites of hospitality an intimate friendship ensued,—a species of freemasonry, which was called into play wherever the individuals might afterwards chance to meet, and the right, duties, and advantages of which passed from father to son, and were deservedly held in the highest estimation.

(2) In the East. But though not peculiarly Oriental, hospitality has nowhere been more early or more fully practiced than in the East. It is still honorably observed among the Arabs, especially at the present day. An Arab, on arriving at a village, dismounts at the house of some one who is known to him, saying to the master, 'I am your guest.' On this the host receives the traveler, and performs his duties, that is, he sets before his guest his supper, consisting of bread, milk, and borgul, and, if he is rich and generous, he also takes the necessary care of his horse or beast of burden. Should the traveler be unacquainted with any person, he alights at any house, as it may happen, fastens his horse to the same, and proceeds to smoke his pipe until the master bids him welcome, and offers him his evening meal. In the morning the traveler pursues his journey, making no other return than 'God be with you' (good-by).

(3) Early Mention. We find hospitality practiced and held in the highest estimation at the earliest periods in which the Bible speaks of human society (Gen. xviii:3; xix:2; xxiv:25; Exod. ii:20; Judg. xix:16). Express provision for its exercise is made in the Mosaic law (Lev. xix:33; Deut. xiv:29). In the New Testament also its observance is enjoined, though in the period to which its books refer the nature and extent of hospitality would be changed with the change that society had undergone (1 Pet. iv:9; 1 Tim. iii:2; Tit. i:8; 1 Tim. v:10; Rom. xii:13; Heb. xiii:2). The disposition which generally prevailed in favor of the practice was enhanced by the fear lest those who neglected its rites should, after the example of impious men, be subjected by the divine wrath to frightful punishments (Ælian, Anim. xi, 19). Even the Jews, in 'the latter days,' laid very great stress on the obligation: the rewards of Paradise, their doctors declared, were his who spontaneously exercised hospitality.

(4) The Guest. The guest, whoever he might be, was on his appearing invited into the house or tent (Gen. xix:2; Exod. ii:20; Judg. xiii:15; xix: 21). Courtesy dictated that no improper questions should be put to him, and some days elapsed before the name of the stranger was asked, or what object he had in view in his journey (Gen. xxiv:33; Odyss. i, 123; iii, 69; Iliad vi, 175; ix, 222; Diod. Sic. v, 28). As soon as he arrived he was furnished with water to wash his feet (Gen. xviii:4; xix:2; 1 Tim. v:10; Odyss. iv, 49; xvii, 88; vi, 215); received a supply of needful food for himself and beast (Gen. xviii:5; xix:3; xxiv:25; Exod. ii:20; Judg. xix:20; Odyss. iii, 464); and enjoyed courtesy and protection from his host (Gen. xix:5; Josh. ii:2; Judg. xix:23). The case of Sisera, decoyed and slain by Jael (Judg. iv:18, sq.), was a gross infraction of the rights and duties of hospitality. On his departure the traveler was not allowed to go alone or empty-handed (Judg. xix:5; Iliad, vi, 217). As the free practice of hospitality was held right and honorable, so the neglect of it was considered discreditably (Job xxxi:32; Odyss. xiv, 56); and any interference with the comfort and protection which the host afforded was treated as a wicked outrage (Gen. xix:4, sq.).

(5) Enmities. Though the practice of hospitality was general, and its rites rarely violated, yet national or local enmities did not fail sometimes to interfere; and accordingly travelers avoided those places in which they had reason to expect an unfriendly reception. So in Judg. xix:12, the 'certain Levite' spoken of said, 'We will not turn aside hither into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children of Israel.' The quarrel which arose between the Jews and Samaritans after the Babylonish captivity destroyed the relations of hospitality between them. Regarding each other as heretics, they sacrificed every better feeling. It was only in the greatest extremity that the Jews would partake of Samaritan food (Lightfoot, p. 993), and they were accustomed, in consequence of their religious and political hatred, to avoid passing through Samaria in journeying from one extremity of the land to the other. The animosity of the Samaritans towards the Jews appears to have been somewhat less bitter; but they showed an adverse feeling towards those persons who, in going up to the annual feast at Jerusalem, had to pass through their country (Luke ix:53).

(6) National Festivals. At the great national festivals hospitality was liberally practiced so long as the state retained its identity. On these festive occasions no inhabitant of Jerusalem considered his house his own; every home swarmed with strangers; yet this unbounded hospitality could not find accommodation in the houses for all who stood in need of it, and a large proportion of visitors had to be content with such shelter as tents could afford (Helon, Pilgrim. i, 228, sq.).

J. R. B.

HOST (hōst). 1. In a social sense, Xen'os (Gr. ξένος), literally a stranger, i. e. one who receives and entertains hospitably (Rom. xvi:23), where "and of the whole Church" is added. (See HOSPITALITY).

2. In a military sense it means an army.

HOSTAGE (hōs'tāj), (Heb. תַּח-אֲרֻבָּה, tah-ar-oo-baw', suretyship), one delivered into the hand of another as security for the performance of a pledge or engagement. (2 Kings xiv:14.)

HOST OF HEAVEN (hōst ōv hēv'n), (Heb. צְבָאֵי שָׁמַיִם, tseb-aw' hash-shaw-mah'yim, army of the skies, Gen. ii:1).

The sun, moon, and stars, under the figure of an army; in which the sun is considered as king, the moon as his vicegerent, the stars and planets as their attendants (comp. Judg. v:20). The worship of the host of heaven, though there are traces of it previously, first became prominent in Israel in the seventh century, B. C.: it was patronized by Manasseh, who 'built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts' of the Temple (2 Kings xxi:5); it is mentioned in Deuteronomy as a form of idolatry which might prove specially seductive to the Israelite; according to Jer. xix:13; Zeph. i:5, it was carried on upon the roofs of houses. Josiah, in his reformation, destroyed the altars built by Manasseh in the Temple, burned the vessels used in the rites, and put down the priests who took part in them (2 Kings xxiii:3, 5, 12). From the terms of 2 Kings xxiii:12 'the altars which were on the roof of the upper chamber of Ahaz,' taken in conjunction with what is stated in Jer. xix:13; Zeph. i:5, it is difficult to avoid the inference that, though the 'host of heaven' itself is not expressly mentioned, the worship had in fact been introduced into Judah before Manasseh by Ahaz. This systematic worship of the heavenly bodies was in all probability imported from Assyria and Babylonia, where there was a deeply rooted popular belief in the power of the stars to rule the destinies of individuals and nations, and where from a remote antiquity the events which had been observed to follow from given celestial phenomena had been tabulated for future reference (above, vol. i, p. 194; Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 396-403.) (See Article by S. R. Driver, Hastings' Bib. Dict.)

HOTHAM (hō'tham), (Heb. הוֹתָם, ho-thawm', a signet ring), one of the sons of Heber, the grandson of Asher (1 Chron. vii:32). He is probably the same with Helem, whose sons are enumerated in v:35.

HOTHAN (hō'than), (Hebrew same as HOTHAM), an Aroerite, father of Shama and Jehiel, two of David's "valiant men" (1 Chron. xi:44), B. C. about 1000.

HOTHIR (hō'thîr), (Heb. הוֹתִיר, ho-theer', pre-erver), the thirteenth son of Heman, who, with eleven of his kinsmen, had charge of the twenty-first division of Levitical singers (1 Chron. xxv:4, 28), B. C. after 1000. (See HEMAN.)

For the full significance of the personal names occurring here see Fürst (Hebr. u. Chald. Wörterb. i, 244); Ewald (Lehrbuch der Hebr. Sprache, p. 502).

HOUGH (hök), (Heb. הוֹקֵר, aw-kar', to extirpate, Josh. xi:6, 9; 2 Sam. viii:4), is an obsolete word from the Anglo-Saxon hoh, and means to hamstring, i. e., to cut the back sinews, and thus disable animals.

HOURS (ourz), (Chald. הַרְעָרָא, shaw-aw', properly a look; Gr. ὥρα, ho'rah).

The ancient Hebrews, like the Greeks (Homer, Il. xxi, 3), were unacquainted with any other means of distinguishing the time of day than the natural divisions of morning, midday, or noon, twilight, and night (Gen. xv:12; xviii:1; xix:1, 15, 23).

(1) Early Mention. The earlier mention of hours occurs in Daniel (iii:15; iv:19; v:5); and even in the Septuagint ὥρα invariably signifies a season of the year, as in Homer and Hesiod. As the Chaldeans claimed the honor of inventing this system of notation (Herod. ii, 119), it is most probable that it was during their residence in Babylon that the Jews became familiar with their artificial distribution of the day. At all events no trace of it occurs before the captivity of that people; while, subsequently to their return to their own land, we find the practice adopted, and, in the time of Christ, universally established, of dividing the day and night respectively into twelve equal portions (Matt. xx:3-5; John xi:9; Acts v:7; xix:34).

(2) Jewish Horology. The Jewish horology, however, in common with that of other eastern nations, had this inherent defect, that the hours, though always equal to one another, were unequal in regard to the seasons, and that as their day was reckoned from sunrise to sunset, and not from the fixed period of noon, as with us, the twelve hours into which it was divided varied, of course, in duration according to the fluctuations of summer and winter. The midday, which with us is the twelfth hour, the Jews counted their sixth, while their twelfth hour did not arrive till sunset. At the equinoxes, their hours were exactly of the same length with ours, and the time from which they began to reckon their day at those seasons corresponded precisely with our six o'clock A. M.; their first hour being our seven o'clock, their third (Acts ii:15), our nine, their ninth (Acts iii:1), our three o'clock P. M., and their eleventh (Matt. xx:6), our five. This equality, however, in the duration of their hours, as well as in their correspondence to ours, was disturbed as the season approached toward the summer or winter solstice. In midsummer, when sunrise in Judæa takes place at five o'clock A. M., and sunset at seven P. M., the Jewish hours were a little longer than ours; and the only one of their hours which answered exactly to ours was the sixth, or twelve o'clock, while in all the rest there was a considerable difference. Their third hour was shortly before our nine, and their ninth a little after our three. In like manner, in winter, when the sun rises at seven and sets at five, the Jewish hour was proportionately shorter than ours, their third hour not occurring till a little after our nine, and their ninth a little before our three. Hence, it is evident that in order to determine exactly the duration of Daniel's silence (for instance 'he was astonished one hour,' Dan. iv:19), or the exact time when the darkness at Christ's crucifixion ended, it is necessary to ascertain the particular seasons when these incidents occurred.

Besides these smaller hours, there was another division of the day into larger hours, with reference to the stated periods of prayer, viz., the third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day (Ps. lv:17; Joseph. Antiq. iv, 4, 3).

(3) Divisions of the Night. The night was divided into twelve equal portions or hours, in precisely the same manner as the day. The most ancient division, however, was into three watches (Antiq. lxiii:6; xc:4); the first, or beginning of the watches, as it is called (Lam. ii:19); the middle watch (Judg. vii:19), and the morning watch (Exod. xiv:24). When Judæa became a province of Rome, the Roman distribution of the night into four watches was introduced (see COCKCROWING; DAY); to which division frequent allusions occur in the New Testament (Luke xii:38; Matt. xiv:25; xiii:35), as well as to that of hours (Matt. xxv:13; xxvi:40; Mark xiv:37; Luke xvii:59; Acts xxiii:23; Rev. iii:3).

The word hour is sometimes used in Scripture to denote some determinate season, as 'mine hour is not yet come,' 'this is your hour, and the power of darkness,' 'the hour is coming,' etc. R. J.

HOUSE (hous), (Heb. בַּיִת, bah'yith; Gr. οἶκος, oy-kee'ah).

Houses are often mentioned in Scripture, several important passages of which cannot be well understood without a clearer notion of the houses in which the Hebrews dwelt than can be realized by such comparisons as we naturally make with those in which we ourselves live. But things so different afford no grounds for instructive comparison without a knowledge of such facts as can be collected from Scripture, ancient writers, and travelers.

Our information respecting the abodes of men in the ages before the Deluge is, however, too scanty to afford much ground for notice. (See ANTEDILUVIANS.)

We may, therefore, leave this early period, and proceed at once to the later times in which the Hebrews flourished.

1. Primary Dwellings. The observations offered under ARCHITECTURE will preclude the expectation of finding among this Eastern people that accomplished style of building which Vitruvius requires, or that refined taste by which the Greeks and Romans excited the admiration of foreign nations. The reason of this is plain. Their ancestors had roved through the country as nomade shepherds, dwelling in tents; and if ever they built huts they were of so light a fabric as easily to be taken down when a change of station became necessary. In this mode of life solidity in the structure of any dwelling was by no means required; much less were regular arrangement and the other requisites of a well-ordered dwelling matters of consideration. Under such circumstances as these, no improvement in the habitation takes place. The tents in which the Arabs now dwell are in all probability the same as those in which the Hebrew patriarchs spent their lives.

2. Buildings. On entering Palestine the Israelites occupied the dwellings of the dispossessed inhabitants; and for a long time no new buildings would be needed. The generation which began to build new houses must have been born and bred in the country, and would naturally erect buildings like those which already existed in the land. Their mode of building was therefore that of the Canaanites whom they had dispossessed. Of their style of building we are not required to form any exalted notions. In all the history of the conquest of the country by the Israelites, there is no account of any large or conspicuous building being taken or destroyed by them. It would seem also as if there had been no temples; for we read not that any were destroyed by the conquerors; and the command that the monuments of idolatry should be overthrown specifies only altars, groves, and high places—which seems to lead to the same conclusion; since, if there had been temples existing in the land of Canaan, they would doubtless have been included. It is also manifest from the history that the towns which the Hebrews found in Palestine were mostly small, and that the largest were distinguished rather by the number than by the size or magnificence of their buildings.

It is impossible to say to what extent Solomon's improvements in state architecture operated to the advancement of domestic architecture. He built different palaces, and it is reasonable to conclude that his nobles and great officers followed more or less the models which these palaces presented. In the East, however, the domestic architecture of the bulk of the people is little affected by the improvements in state buildings. Men go on building from age to age as their forefathers built; and in all probability the houses which we now see in Palestine are such as those in which the Jews, and the Canaanites before them, dwelt—the mosques, the Christian churches, and the monasteries being the only new features in the scene.

There is no reason to suppose that many houses in Palestine were constructed with wood. A great part of that country was always very poor in timber, and the middle part of it had scarcely any wood at all. But of stone there was no want; and it was consequently much used in the building of houses. The law of Moses respecting leprosy in houses (Lev. xiv:33-40) seems to prove this, as the characteristics there enumerated could only occur in the case of stone walls.

3. Building Materials. The principal building materials mentioned in Scripture may be enumerated with reference to their place in the three kingdoms of nature:

(1) Vegetable Substances. (a) Shittim, or the timber of the acacia tree, which grows abundantly in the valleys of Arabia Petræa, and was therefore employed in the construction of the tabernacle. Not being, however, a tree of Palestine, the wood was not subsequently used in building.

(b) Shakmim; that is, the wood of the sycamore fig-tree, mentioned in Is. ix:10, as a building timber in more common use than cedar, or perhaps than any other wood known in Palestine.

(c) Eres, or cedar. As this was a wood imported from Lebanon, it would only be used in the higher class of buildings. For its quality as a building timber, and respecting the question of its being really what we call the cedar, see ERES.

(d) Algum-wood, which, being imported from the Eastern seas, must have been valued at a high price. It was used by Solomon for pillars for his own palace, and for the Temple (1 Kings x:11, 12).

(e) Berosh, or cypress-wood. Boards of this were used for the floor of the Temple, which may suggest the use to which it was ordinarily applied (1 Kings vi:15; 2 Chron. iii:5).

(2) Mineral Substances. (a) Marble. We find the court of the king of Persia's palace covered with marble of various colors (Esth. i:6). David is recorded to have possessed abundance of marble (1 Chron. xxix:2; comp. Cant. v:15), and it was used by Solomon for his palace, as well as for the Temple.

(b) Porphyry and Granite are supposed to be 'the glistening stones, and stones of divers colors' named in 1 Chron. xxix:2. If so, the mountains of Arabia Petræa furnished the nearest source of supply, as these stones do not exist in Palestine or Lebanon.

(c) Bricks. Bricks hardened by fire were employed in the construction of the tower of Babel (Gen. xi:3), and the hard bondage of the Israelites in Egypt consisted in the manufacture of sun-dried bricks (Exod. v:7, 10-13). This important building material has been noticed under another head. (See BRICK.)

No subsequent notice of bricks as being used by the Hebrews occurs after they had entered Palestine. Yet, judging from existing analogies, it is more than probable that bricks were to a considerable extent employed in their buildings.

(d) Chalk and Gypsum, which the Hebrews appear to have comprehended under the general name of sid. That the Hebrews were acquainted with these materials appears from Deut. xxvii:2; and from Dan. v:5, and Acts xxiii:3, it further appears that walls were covered with them. A highly instructive and curious account of the plasters used in the East may be seen in tome iv of Langles's edition of Chardin's Voyages.

(e) Mortar, a cement made of lime, ashes, and chopped straw, or of gypsum and chopped straw. This is probably meant in Jer. xliii:9; Ezek. xiii:10, 11, 14, 15.

(f) Asphaltum, or Bitumen, which is mentioned as being used for a cement by the builders of Babel. This must have been in the want of lime-mortar, the country being a stoneless plain. But the Israelites, who had no lack of the usual cements, did not employ asphaltum. (See BIRUMEN.)

(g) The metals also must be, to a certain extent, regarded as building materials; lead, iron and copper are mentioned; and even silver and gold were used in combination with wood, for various kinds of solid, plated, and inlaid work (Exod. xxxvi:34, 38).

(3) Animal Substances. Such substances can be but in a small degree applicable to building. Ivory houses are mentioned in 1 Kings xxii:39; Amos iii:14; most likely from certain parts of the woodwork, probably about the doors and windows, being inlaid with this valuable substance. Solomon obtained ivory in great quantities from Tyre (1 Kings x:22; 2 Chron. ix:21). (See IVORY.)

4. Present Conditions. In describing the houses of ancient Palestine, there is no way of arriving at distinct notions but by taking the texts of Scripture and illustrating them by the existing houses of those parts of Western Asia which have been the least exposed to the changes of time, and in which the manners of ancient days have been the best preserved.

The present writer, having resided for a considerable time in Turkish Arabia, where the type of Scriptural usages has been better preserved than in Egypt, or even in Palestine itself, is enabled to speak on this matter with somewhat more precision. Of four houses in which he there resided, two were first rate and two second rate. One of the latter has always seemed to him to suggest a more satisfactory idea of a Scriptural house than any of the others, or than any he ever saw in other Eastern countries. That one has therefore formed the basis of all his ideas on this subject, and where it seemed to fail, the others have usually supplied the illustration required.

(1) Exterior. We may premise that the houses present little more than a dead wall to the street. The privacy of Oriental domestic habits would render our plan of throwing the front of the houses towards the street most repulsive. On coming to a house, one finds a lofty wall, which would be blank but for the low door of entrance (see GATE); over which is usually the kiosk, or latticed window (sometimes projecting like the huge bay windows of Elizabethan houses), or screened balcony of the 'summer parlor.' Besides this, there may be a small latticed window or two high up the wall, giving light and air to upper chambers. This seems to have been the character of the fronts of ancient Egyptian houses.

(2) The Court. The buildings which form the house front towards an inner square or court. Small houses have one of these courts, but superior houses have two, and first-rate houses three, communicating with each other, for the Orientals dislike ascending stairs or steps, and prefer to gain room rather by the extent than height of their habitations. It is only when the building-ground is confined by nature or by fortifications, that they build high houses. None of our four houses had more than one story; but, from the loftiness of the rooms, they were as high as houses of three stories among ourselves. If there are three or more courts, all except the outer one are much alike in size and appearance; but the outer one, being devoted to the more public life of the occupant, and to his intercourse with society, is materially different from all the others. If there are more than two, the second is devoted chiefly to the use of the master, who is there attended only by his eunuchs, children, and females, and sees only such persons as he calls from the third or interior court in which they reside. In the history of Esther, she incurs danger by going from her interior court to that of the king, to invite him to visit her part of the palace; but she would not on any account have gone to the outermost court, in which the king held his public audiences. When there are only two courts, the innermost is the harem, in which the women and children live, and which is the true domicile of the master, to which he withdraws when the claims of business, of society, and of friends have been satisfied, and where no man but himself ever enters, or could be induced to enter, even by strong persuasions.

Entering at the street-door a passage, usually sloping downward, conducts to the outer court; the opening from the passage to this is not opposite the gate of entrance, but by a side turn, to preclude any view from the street into the court when the gate is opened.

(3) The Guest Chamber. On entering the outer court through this passage, we find opposite to us the public room, in which the master receives and gives audience to his friends and clients. This is entirely open in front, and, being richly fitted up, has a splendid appearance when the first view of it is obtained. A refreshing coolness is sometimes given to this apartment by a fountain throwing up a jet of water in front of it.

Guest Chamber of an Eastern House.

This is the 'guest-chamber' of Luke xxii:11. A large portion of the other side of the court is occupied with a frontage of lattice-work filled with colored glass, belonging to a room as large as the guest-chamber, and which in winter is used for the same purpose, or serves as the apartment of any visitor of distinction, who cannot of course be admitted into the interior parts of the house.

(4) Other Apartments. The other apartments in this outer court are comparatively small, and are used for the accommodation of visitors, retainers, and servants. These various apartments are usually upon what we should call the first floor, or at least upon an elevated terrace. The ground floor is in that case occupied by various store-rooms and servants' offices. In all cases the upper floor, containing the principal rooms, is fronted by a gallery or terrace, protected from the sun by a sort of penthouse roof supported by pillars of wood.

In houses having but one court, the reception-room is on the ground floor, and the domestic establishment in the upper part of the house. This arrangement is interesting from its showing the use of the 'pillars' so often mentioned in Scripture, particularly 'the pillars on which the house stood, and by which it was borne up' (Judg. xvi:29).

(5) The Kiosk. The kiosk, which has been mentioned above as fronting the street, over the gateway, is connected with one of the larger rooms already described, or forms a separate apartment, which is the summer parlor of Scripture. Here, in the heat of the afternoon, the master lounges or dozes listlessly, refreshed by the air which circulates between the openings of the lattice work; and here he can, if he pleases, notice unobserved what passes in the street. In this we are to seek the summer parlor in which Ehud smote the king of Moab (Judg. iii:20), and the 'chamber on the wall,' which the Shunamite prepared for the prophet (2 Kings iv:10). The projecting construction over the reception chamber is, like the kiosk, towards the street as a summer parlor; but there it belongs to the women's apartments, and looks into the court, and not the street.

(6) The Inner Court. The inner court is entered by a passage and door similar to those by which we entered from the street. This passage and door are usually at one of the innermost corners of the outer court. Here a much more extended prospect opens to us, the inner court being generally much larger than the former. It is lower, the principal apartments standing upon a terrace or bank of earth, and not upon a basement story of offices; and it also wants the veranda or covered gallery in front, which we find in Syro-Arabian houses. The court is for the most part paved, excepting a portion in the middle, which is planted with trees (usually two) and shrubs, with a basin of water in the midst. In our Arabian house the two trees were palm trees, in which a number of wild doves built their nests.

That the Jews had an arrangement of trees in the courts of their houses as did the ancient Egyptians, and that the birds nested in them, appears from Ps. lxxxiv:2, 3. They had also the basin of water in the inner court, or harem; and among them it was used for bathing, as is shown by David's discovering Bathsheba bathing as he walked on the roof of his palace. This use of the reservoir has now been superseded by the establishment of public warm baths in every town, and in private mansions. Cold bathing has all but ceased in Western Asia.

Arabian House.

The arrangement of the inner court is very similar to that of the outer; but the whole is more open and airy. The buildings usually occupy two sides of the square, of which the one opposite the entrance contains the principal apartments. They are upon what we should call the first floor, and open into a wide gallery or veranda, which in good houses is nine or ten feet deep, and covered by a wooden penthouse supported by a row of wooden columns. This terrace, or gallery, is furnished with a strong wooden balustrade, and is usually paved with squared stones, or else floored with boards. In the center of the principal front is the usual open drawing-room, on which the best art of the Eastern decorator is expended. Much of one of the sides of the court front is usually occupied by the large sitting-room, with the latticed front covered with colored glass, similar to that in the outer court. The other rooms, of smaller size, are the more private apartments of the mansion.

(7) Curtains. There are usually no doors to the sitting or drawing rooms of Eastern houses. They are closed by curtains, at least in summer, the opening and shutting of doors being odious to most Orientals. The same seems to have been the case among the Hebrews, as far as we may judge from the curtains which served instead of doors to the tabernacle, and which separated the inner and outer chambers of the temple. The curtained entrances to our Westminster courts of law supply a familiar example of the same practice.

(8) The Basement. These observations apply to the principal story. The basement is occupied by various offices, stores of corn and fuel, places for the water jars to stand in, places for grinding corn, baths, kitchens, etc.

(9) The Kitchen. The kitchens are always in this inner court, as the cooking is performed by women, and the ladies of the family superintend or actually assist in the process. The kitchen, open in front, is on the same side as the entrance from the outer court; and the top of it forms a terrace, which affords a communication between the first floor of both courts by a private door seldom used but by the master of the house and attendant eunuchs.

The kitchen is surrounded by a brick terrace, on the top of which are the fireplaces formed in compartments, and separated by little walls of fire-brick or tile. In these different compartments the various dishes of an Eastern feast may be at once prepared at charcoal fires. This place being wholly open in front, the half-tame doves, which have their nests in the trees of the court, often visit it in the absence of the servants in search of crumbs, etc. As they sometimes blacken themselves, this perhaps explains the obscure passage in Ps. lxxviii:13, 'Though ye have lain among the pots, ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver,' etc. In Turkish Arabia most of the houses have underground cellars or vaults, to which the inhabitants retreat during the mid-day heat of summer, and there enjoy a refreshing coolness. In the rest of the year these cellars, or serdaubs, as they are called, are abandoned to the bats, which swarm in them in scarcely credible numbers (Is. ii:20).

(10) The Gallery. From the court a flight of stone steps, usually at the corner, conducts to the gallery, from which a plainer stair leads to the house top. If the house be large there are two or three sets of steps to the different sides of the quadrangle, but seldom more than one flight from the terrace to the house top of any one court. There is, however, a separate stair from the outer court to the roof, and it is usually near the entrance. This will bring to mind the case of the paralytic, whose friends, finding they could not get access to Jesus through the people who crowded the court of the house in which he was preaching, took him up to the roof and let him down in his bed through the tiling to the place where Jesus stood (Luke v:17-26).

If the house in which our Lord then was had more than one court he and the auditors were certainly in the outer one; and it is reasonable to conclude that he stood in the veranda addressing the crowd below. The men bearing the paralytic, therefore, perhaps went up the steps near the door, and, finding they could not even then get near the person of Jesus, the gallery being also crowded, continued their course to the roof of the house, and, removing the boards over the covering of the gallery, at the place where Jesus stood, lowered the sick man to his feet. But if they could not get access to the steps near the door, as is likely, from the door being much crowded, their alternative was to take him to the roof of the next house and there hoist him over the parapet to the roof of the house which they desired to enter.

(11) The Roof. The roof of the house is, of course, flat. It is formed by layers of branches, twigs, matting, and earth, laid over the rafters and trodden down, after which it is covered with a compost which acquires considerable hardness when dry; but in those parts of Asia where the climate is more than usually moist, a stone roller is usually kept on every roof, and after a shower a great part of the population is engaged in drawing these rollers over the roof.

It is now very common, in countries where timber is scarce, to have domed roofs; but in that case the flat roof, which is indispensable to Eastern habits, is obtained by filling up the hollow intervals between the several domes, so as to form a flat surface at the top.

These flat roofs are often alluded to in Scripture, and the allusions show that they were made to serve the same uses as at present. In fine weather the inhabitants resorted much to them to breathe the fresh air, to enjoy a fine prospect, or to witness any event that occurred in the neighborhood (2 Sam. xi:2; Is. xxii:1; Matt. xxiv:17; Mark xiii:15).

The dryness of the summer atmosphere enabled them without injury to health, to enjoy the bracing coolness of the night air by sleeping on the house tops, and in order to have the benefit of the air and prospect in the daytime, without inconvenience from the sun, sheds, booths, and tents were sometimes erected on the house tops (2 Sam. xvi:22).

The roofs of the houses are well protected by walls and parapets. Towards the street and neighboring houses is a high wall, and towards the interior courtyard usually a parapet or wooden rail. 'Battlements' of this kind, for the prevention of accidents, are strictly enjoined in the Law (Deut. xxii:8).

(12) The Ceiling. The ceiling, if of wood and flat, is of curious and complicated joinery, or, if vaulted, is wrought into numerous coives, and enriched with fretwork in stucco; and the walls are adorned with arabesques, mosaics, mirrors, painting, and gold, which, as set off by the marble-like whiteness of the stucco, has a truly brilliant and rich effect. There is much in this to remind one of such descriptions of splendid interiors as that in Is. liv:11, 12.

(13) Inferior Dwellings. In the inferior kinds of Oriental dwellings, such as are met with in villages and very small towns, there is no central court, but there is generally a yard attached, either on one side or at the rear. The shaded platform in front is such as is usually seen attached to coffee-houses.

Here the customers sit and smoke their pipes, and sip their coffee. The village cabins and abodes of the peasantry are, of course, of a still inferior description; and, being the abodes of people who live much in the open air, will not bear comparison with the houses of the same class in Northern Europe, where the cottage is the home of the owner.

No ancient houses had chimneys. The word so translated in Hos. xiii:3 means a hole through which the smoke escaped; and this existed only in the lower class of dwellings, where raw wood was employed for fuel or cooking, and where there was an opening immediately over the hearth to let out the smoke. In the better sort of houses the rooms were warmed in winter by charcoal in braziers, as is still the practice (Jer. xxxvi:22; Mark xiv:54; John xviii:18).

The windows had no glass. They were only latticed, and thus gave free passage to the air and admitted light, while birds and bats were excluded. In winter the cold air was kept out by veils over the windows, or by shutters with holes in them sufficient to admit light (1 Kings vii:17; Cant. ii:9).

In the East, where the climate allows the people to spend so much of their time out of doors, the articles of furniture and the domestic utensils have always been few and simple. They are in this work noticed under separate heads. (See BED; LAMP; POTTER; TABLE.)

5. Literature. Porter, Damascus; Shaw, Travels; Lane, Mod. Egypt; Burckhardt, Syria; Layard, Monuments of Nineveh.

Figurative. (1) Heaven, the church, the tabernacle, temple, and ordinances, are represented as God's house, or a spiritual house; as God planned, formed, furnished, or owned them, so he did or does dwell in them, and display his glory, power, and grace in a peculiar manner (John xiv:1; Heb. iii:2; Judg. xviii:31; 2 Chron. v:14; Ps. lxxxiv:10). (2) The saints are a spiritual house, and household of faith, being formed by the Holy Ghost, and furnished with spiritual graces and enabled to believe the truth as in Jesus; God dwells in them, and among them, as their master, parent, and householder; and ministers attend them as their servants (1 Pet. ii:5; Gal. vi:10; Matt. xiii:27 and xxi:33). (3) The house of God, at which dangerous judgments begin, is either the ruined Jewish temple or the persecuted Christian church (1 Pet. iv:17). (4) The house of David and inhabitants of Jerusalem are all ranks, both great and small (Zech. xiii:1). (5) To join house to house, and field to field, till there be no place, is to join several farms or occupations together, in order to grow hastily rich, and by which a great many, especially of the poor, are deprived of livings and subsistence (Is. v:8). (6) God made houses to the Hebrews, or to the midwives; he prospered and increased their families (Exod. i:22). (7) Such as build their hopes on Christ in his word are houses founded on a rock; their hopes cannot be overturned by any temptation, affliction, death, or judgment to come; but such as found their hopes on anything else are like houses built on the sand, which, amid temptation and trouble, are easily overthrown or ruined (Matt. vii:24, 25).

HOUSEHOLD (hous'höld'), the rendering generally of the same Hebrew and Greek words as are rendered "house," and meaning the members of a family, living in the same dwelling, including domestics and dependents.

In Job i:3 the word ab-ood-dow' (literally "service"), appears to mean a retinue of servants. The expression "they of Cæsar's household" (Phil. iv:22) seems to refer to some of the servants of the emperor, and not those of the imperial family.

HOUSE OF GOD (hous ðv göd), a translation in the A. V. of the place Bethel. It is the place where the ark was, and not the ark, which is called "the house of God." (See BETHEL.) (Judg. xx:18, 26; xxi:2; comp. Judg. xx:27).

HOUSE OF ROLLS, THE (hous ðv rōls), "House of the rolls," Ezra vii:1, and "treasure-house," Ezra v:17, both refer to the same depository of public documents.

HOUSE TOP (hous tōp), the flat roof of an Eastern house. (See HOUSE.)

Figurative. Some of these roofs were covered with earth rolled hard, which, softened by rain, would cause grass seeds to spring up. When the returning drought and heat came the grass speedily withered, an apt illustration of temporary prosperity followed by ruin (2 Kings xix:26; Ps. cxxix:6; Is. xxxvii:27).

On account of the flat roofs, the house tops were used to speak from to neighbors, or to gaze on an approaching enemy (Matt. x:27; Is. xxii:1).

HUKKOK (hük'kok), (Heb. חֻקֹּק, khoo-koke', appointed), one of the boundary marks of Naphtali (Josh. xix:34). It has been identified with the modern Yâkûk, west of the upper end of the Sea of Galilee, seven miles southwest of Safed.

HUKOK (hü'kok), (Heb. same as above), a city of Asher; the same probably as that of Naphtali, (Josh. xix:34) yielded to the Levites, and assigned for a city of refuge, (1 Chron. vi:75). It is represented by Helkath, (Josh. xix:25; xxi:31). (See HELKATH.)

HUL (hül), (Heb. חוּל, khool, circle), second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x:23), B.C. 2414. Huleh, the region occupied by this family, is not definitely known, Josephus and Jerome fix it in Armenia; Schulthess (Parad. p. 262), in southern Mesopotamia; von Bohlen (Introd. to Gen., ii, 249), in the neighborhood of Chaldæa. Others have argued in favor of the region of Lebanon.

Quite probable seems the identification proposed by Rosenmüller (Alterthum, i, 2, p. 253) with the district now called Huleh, around Lake Merom (Mc. and S., Cyc.).

The various attempts that have been made to establish its identity will be found in Dillmann, who does not consider that any of them has been successful.

HULDAH (hül'dah), (Heb. חוּלְדָּה, khool-daw', weasel; (Gr. Ὀλδα, ol'da).

The wife of Shallum, a prophetess, who, in the reign of Josiah, abode in that part of Jerusalem called the Mishneh, where the book of the Law was discovered by the high-priest Hilkiah. (B. C. 623.) This prophetess was consulted respecting the denunciations which it contained. She then delivered an oracular response of mingled judgment and mercy; declaring the not remote destruction of Jerusalem, but promising Josiah that he should be taken from the world before these evil days came (2 Kings xxii:14-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv:22-28). Huldah is known only by this circumstance. She was probably at this time the widow of Shallum, a name too common to suggest any information; but he is said to have been grandson of one Harhas, 'keeper of the wardrobe,' but whether the priestly or the royal wardrobe is uncertain. If the former, he must have been a Levite, if not a priest. As to her residence in the Mishneh חִישְׁנֵה, which the Auth. Vers. renders 'in the college,' there is no ground to conclude that any school or college of the prophets is to be understood. The name means 'second' or 'double;' and many of the Jews themselves (as Jarchi states) understood it as the name of the suburb lying between the inner and outer wall of Jerusalem. It is safest to regard it as a proper name, denoting some quarter of Jerusalem about which we are not certain, and, accordingly, to translate 'in the Mishneh.'

HUMAN SACRIFICE (hü'män sak'ri-fiz). See SACRIFICE.

HUMAN SOUL. See SOUL.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST (hü-män'i-tý). See INCARNATION.

HUMBLENESS (hüm'b'l-nës), (Col. iii:12). See HUMILITY.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST (hü-mil'i-ä-shün), an expression which refers to the earthly life of the Lord Jesus Christ.

His humiliation was shown in his earthly life from beginning to end. He humbled himself to be born of a virgin; and the lowly circumstances of his birth have ever been the theme of Christian artists and poets. The humility of the thirty years' subjection to his parents, and of the three years of unceasing toil, privation, and opposition, was crowned when he endured the cross, despising the shame (Heb. xii:2). We may notice specially his praying (Luke ix:18, etc.), his admitting weariness, distress, and pain (John iv:6, Mark xiv:34; John xix:28), and the solemn words and acts by which he inculcated humility (Matt. xi:29; John xiii:12-16). At the same time, he asserted his authority (e. g., to forgive sins, to judge men, to found an undying Church); he proclaimed himself as the only way to God, etc. (John xiv:6). He claimed that he alone knew the Father aright (Matt. xi:27).

HUMILITY (hü-mil'i-tý), (Heb. אָנְוָנוּת, an-aw-waw', gentleness, affliction; Gr. ταπεινοφροσύνη, tap-i-nof-ros-oo'nay, lowliness of mind; Prov. xv:33, et al.; Acts xx:19 in R. V. is "lowliness of mind").

Humility is the effect of divine grace operating on the soul, and always characterizes the true Christian. The heathen philosophers were so little acquainted with this virtue that they had no name for it; what they meant by the word we use was meanness and baseness of mind.

To consider this grace a little more particularly, it may be observed: (1) That humility does not oblige a man to wrong the truth, or himself, by entertaining a meaner or worse opinion of himself than he deserves. (2) Nor does it oblige a man, right or wrong, to give everybody else the preference to himself. A wise man cannot believe himself inferior to the ignorant multitude; nor the virtuous man that he is not so good as those whose lives are vicious. (3) Nor does it oblige a man to treat himself with contempt in his words or actions; it looks more like affectation than humility when a man says such things in his own dispraise as others know, or he himself believes, to be false; and it is plain, also, that this is often done merely as a bait to catch the praises of others.

Humility consists: (1) In not attributing to ourselves any excellence or good which we have not. (2) In not overrating anything we do. (3) In not taking an immoderate delight in ourselves. (4) In not assuming more of the praise of a quality or action than belongs to us. (5) In an inward sense of our many imperfections and sins. (6) In ascribing all we have and are to the grace of God.

True humility will express itself: (1) By the modesty of our appearance. The humble man will consider his age, abilities, character, function, etc., and act accordingly. (2) By the modesty of our pursuits. We shall not aim at anything above our strength, but prefer a good to a great name. (3) By the modesty of our conversation and behavior. We shall not be loquacious, obstinate, forward, envious, discontented or ambitious.

The advantages of humility are numerous: (1) It is well pleasing to God (1 Pet. iii:4). (2) It has great influence on us in the performance of all other duties, praying, hearing, conversing, etc. (3) It indicates that more grace shall be given (James iv:6; Ps. xxv:9). (4) It preserves the soul in great tranquility and contentment (Ps. lxxix:32, 33). (5) It makes us patient and resigned under afflictions (Job i:22). (6) It enables us to exercise moderation in everything.

To obtain this excellent spirit we should remember: (1) The example of Christ (Phil. ii:6, 7, 8). (2) That heaven is a place of humility (Rev. v:8). (3) That our sins are numerous, and deserve the greatest punishment (Lam. iii:39). (4) That humility is the way to honor (Prov. xvi:18). (5) That the greatest promises of good are made to the humble (Is. lviii:15; lxxvi:2; 1 Pet. v:5; Ps. cxlvii:6; Matt. v:5).

Brown.

HUMTAH (hüm'tah), (Heb. חֻמְתָּא, khoom-taw', fortress), a city in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. xv:54). It has not been identified with any modern place.

HUNDREDS (hün'drēds). One of the groups (Exod. xviii:21) into which Moses divided the people of Israel. (See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.)

HUNGER (hün'gēr), (Heb. רָעָב, raw-abe'), the rendering of the same Hebrew and Greek words that are sometimes rendered FAMINE (which see).

Figurative. (1) To be burnt with hunger is to be tormented or afflicted (Deut. xxxii:24). (2) To fast is often called to afflict one's soul (Lev. xvi:29-31; Is. lviii:5). (3) Spiritual desire after Jesus and his righteousness is called hunger; how it pains men, till the blessings desired are obtained (Matt. v:6; Luke i:53). (4) Such as feed on Christ never hunger nor thirst; finding enough in him, they never desire anything else as the chief portion of their soul (John v:35). (5) A man's strength is hunger-bitten when it decays for want of food (Job xviii:12).

HUNGER-BITTEN (hün'gēr bīt'ēv), (Heb. רָעָב, raw-abe', Job xviii:12), famished.

The words hunger-starved and winter-starved are used by the old writers. (See HUNGER, Figurative 5.)

HUNT, HUNTER, HUNTING (hünt'ing), (Heb. יָצַד, tsah'-yid, to lie in wait; רָדַף raw-daf': to run after).

The pursuit and capture of beasts of the field was the first means of sustenance which the human race had recourse to, this mode of gaining a livelihood having naturally preceded the engagements of agriculture, as it presented food already provided, requiring only to be taken and slaughtered; whereas tillage must have been an afterthought, and a later resource, since it implies accumulated knowledge, skill, and such provision beforehand of subsistence as would enable a clan or a family to wait till the fruits of the earth were matured. Hunting was, therefore, a business long ere it was a sport. And originally, before man had established his empire on the earth, it must have been not only a serious, but a dangerous pursuit. In process of time, however, when civilization had made some progress, when cities were built and lands cultivated, hunting was carried on not so much for the food which it brought as for the recreation it gave and its conduciveness to health.

The East—the cradle of civilization—presents us with hunting in both the characters now spoken of, originally as a means of support, then as a manly amusement. In the early records of history we find hunting held in high repute, partly, no doubt, from its costliness, its dangers, its similitude to war, its capability of combining the energies of many, and also from the relief which it afforded to the stagnant monotony of a court, in the high and bounding spirits that it called forth. Hunting has always borne somewhat of a regal character, and down to the present hour has worn an aristocratic air. In Babylon and Persia this attribute is presented in bold relief. Immense parcs (παράδεισος) were enclosed for nurturing and preserving beasts of the chase. The monarch himself led the way to the sport, not only in these preserves, but also over the wide surface of the country, being attended by his nobles, especially by the younger aspirants to fame and warlike renown (Xen. Cyr. viii, 1, 38).

In the Bible—our chief storehouse of primitive history and customs—we find hunting connected with royalty so early as in Gen. x. The great founder of Babel was in general repute as 'a mighty hunter before the Lord.' The patriarchs, however, are to be regarded rather as herdsmen than hunters, if respect is had to their habitual mode of life. The condition of the herdsman ensues next to that of the hunter in the early stages of civilization; and so we find that even Cain was a keeper of sheep. This and the fact that Abel is designated 'a tiller of the ground,' would seem to indicate a very rapid progress in the arts and pursuits of social life. The same contrast and similar hostility we find somewhat later, in the case of Jacob and Esau; the first, 'a plain man dwelling in tents,' the second, 'a cunning hunter, a man of the field' (Gen. xxv:27). The account given of Esau in connection with his father seems to show that hunting was, conjointly with tillage, pursued at that time as a means of subsistence, and that hunting had not then passed into its secondary state, and become an amusement.

In Egypt the children of Israel would be spectators of hunting carried on extensively and pursued by different methods, but chiefly, as appears probable, with a view rather to recreation than subsistence (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, vol. iii). That the land of promise into which the Hebrews were conducted on leaving Egypt was plentifully supplied with beasts of the chase appears clear from Exod. xxiii:29, 'I will not drive them out in one year, lest the land become desolate and the beasts of the field multiply against thee' (comp. Deut. iii:22). And from the regulation given in Lev. xvii:15, it is manifest that hunting was practiced after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food. Prov. xii:27 proves that hunting animals for their flesh was an established custom among the Hebrews, though the turn of the passage may serve to show that at the time it was penned sport was the chief aim. If hunting was not forbidden in the 'year of rest,' special provision was made that not only the cattle, but 'the beast of the field' should be allowed to enjoy and flourish on the uncropped spontaneous produce of the land (Exod. xxiii:11; Lev. xxv:7).

That the lion and other ravenous beasts of prey were not wanting in Palestine, many passages of the Bible make obvious (1 Sam. xvii:34; 2 Sam. xxiii:20; 1 Kings xiii:24; Harris, Natural History of the Bible; Kitto's Pictorial Palestine). The lion was even made use of to catch other animals (Ezek. xix:3), and Harmer long ago remarked that, as in the vicinity of Gaza, so also in Judæa, leopards were trained and used for the same purpose (Harmer, iv:358; Hab. i:8). That lions were taken by pitfalls, as well as by nets, appears from Ezek. xix:4, 8 (Shaw, p. 172). In the latter verse the words of the prophet, 'and spread their net over him,' allude to the custom of enclosing a wide extent of country with nets, into which the animals were driven by hunters (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, iii:4).

The spots thus enclosed were usually in a hilly country and in the vicinity of water brooks; whence the propriety and force of the language of Ps. xlii:1, 'As the (hunted) hart panteth after the water brooks.' These places were selected because they were those to which the animals were in the habit of repairing in the morning and evening. Scenes like the one now supposed are found portrayed in the Egyptian paintings (Wilkinson).

Hounds were used for hunting in Egypt, and, if the passage in Josephus (Antiq. iv:8, 9) may be considered decisive, in Palestine as well. From Gen. xxvii:3, 'Now take thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow,' we learn what arms were employed, at least in capturing game. Bulls, after being taken, were kept at least for a time in a net (Is. li:20). Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (Ps. xci:3; Amos iii:5; 2 Sam. xxiii:20). That hunting continued to be followed till towards the end of the Jewish state appears from Josephus (De Bell. Jud. i:20, 13), where the historian speaks of Herod as 'ever a most excellent hunter, for in one day he caught forty wild beasts.' The same passage makes it clear that horses were employed in the pursuits of the chase (comp. Joseph. Antiq. xv:7, 7; xvi:10, 3). J. R. B.

HUPHAM (hū'pham), (Heb. חֻפָּאם, khoo-fawm', coat man, Gesenius), son of Benjamin, and the founder of the family of Huphamites (Num. xxvi:39). In Gen. xlv:21 and 1 Chron. vii:12 the name is given as Huppim, B. C. 1856.

HUPHAMITES (hū'pham-ites), (Heb. חֻפָּאִים, hah-khoo-faw-mee'), descendants of Hupham, (Num. xxvi:39).

HUPPAH (hūp'pah), (Heb. חֻפָּה, khoo-pah' covering; protection), a priest under David who had charge of the thirteenth course of the temple service (1 Chron xxiv:13), B. C. 1014.

HUPPIM (hūp'pim). See HUPHAM.

HUR (hūr), (Heb. חֹר, khoo-r, a hole; a prison).

1. A man of Judah mentioned with Moses and Aaron. We know but few particulars concerning his life; but by the little which Scripture relates, we see that Moses had a great affection for him. When he had sent Joshua against the Amalekites, he went up the mountain with Hur and Aaron (Exod. xvii:10), and while he lifted up his hands in prayer, Aaron and Hur supported his arms, to prevent their growing weary. When he ascended Mount Sinai to receive the law, he referred the elders, if any difficulty should arise, to Aaron and Hur (Exod. xxiv:14). (B. C. 1210.) Jewish tradition makes him identical with No. 2.

2. Son of Caleb, of Esron, and, according to Josephus, husband of Miriam, sister of Moses. Hur was the father of Uri, and Uri was the father of Bezaleel, who was chief artificer of the tabernacle (Exod. xxxi:2; xxxv:30; xxxviii:22; 2 Chron. i:5). Besides Uri he had three sons, who founded Kirjath-jearim, Bethlehem and Bath-gader. (B. C. 1210.)

3. A prince of Midian, killed in an encounter between Phinehas and the Midianites (Num. xxxi:8), B. C. 1170.

4. Father of Rephaiah, who was ruler over half the environs of Jerusalem, and repaired a part of the wall under Nehemiah (Neh. iii:9), B. C. 446.

5. A man called the son of Hur was Solomon's commissariat officer in Mount Ephraim (1 Kings iv:8). B. C. before 995.

HURAI (hū'rāi, or hū'ra-i), (Heb. חֹרַי, khoo-rah'ee, linen worker), a man belonging to David's guard (1 Chron. xi:32). Kennicott thinks the name has been corrupted to Hiddai (2 Sam. xxxiii:30), B. C. 953.

HURAM (hū'ram), (Heb. חֹרָם, khoo-rawm', highborn).

1. Eldest son of Bela, a Benjamite (1 Chron. viii:5).

2. The form of the name of the king of Tyre, in the time of David and Solomon, as given in 2 Chron. ii:3, 11; viii:2; ix:10. Elsewhere it is given as Hiram. (See HIRAM.)

3. The name Hiram, the artificer, as it appears in 2 Chron. ii:13; iv:11, 16.

HURI (hū'rī), (Heb. חֹרִי, khoo-ree', linen worker), father of Abihail, chief of the Gadite tribe (1 Chron. v:14), B. C. before 781.

HUSBAND (hūz'band). See MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDMAN (hūz'band-man), (properly Heb. אִישׁ אֲדָמָה, eesh ad-aw-maw', man of the ground; Gr. γεωργός, gheh-ore-gos', land worker), a farmer or other tiller of the soil. Husbandry is among the most ancient and honorable occupations (Gen. ix:20; xxvi:12, 14; xxxvii:7; Job i:3; Is. xxviii:24-28; John xv:1). (See AGRICULTURE.)

Figurative. (1) God is likened to a husbandman; he sows, plants, cultivates, and expects fruit from his church, head, and members (John xv:1); and the church is his husbandry, the great object of his care and work (1 Cor. iii:9). (2) The Jewish priests, rulers, and others were the husbandmen to whom God let out his vineyard, church, or ordinances; and who abused his prophets and son, and in the end were involved in ruin (Matt. xxi:33-41).

HUSBANDRY (hūz'band-ry), (Gr. γεωργον, gheh-ore-ghee-on). In 1 Cor. iii:9 'husbandry' is used figuratively in the sense of 'that which is cultivated': 'ye are God's husbandry', lit., as R. V. margin, 'God's field.'

HUSHAH (hū'shah), (Heb. חֹשֶׁה, khoo-shaw', haste). A name given (1 Chron. iv:4; xxvii:11) in the genealogies of Judah; but whether of a place or person it is impossible to say.

HUSHAI (hū'shāi, or hū'sha-i), (Heb. חֹשַׁי, khoo-shah'ee, hasty), the Archite, David's friend.

Being informed of Absalom's rebellion, and that David was obliged to fly from Jerusalem, he met him on an eminence without the city, with his clothes rent, and his head covered with earth. David suggested that, if he went with him, he would be a burden to him; but that he might do him important service if he remained, and pretended to be in Absalom's interest, in order to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv:32, etc.) Hushai, therefore, returned to Jerusalem, and, by defeating the counsel of Ahithophel, and gaining time for David, to whom he sent advices, was the cause of Ahithophel's suicide and of Absalom's miscarriage (2 Sam. xvi:16-19; xviii:5, etc.), about B. C. 1023.

HUSHAM (hū'sham), (Heb. חֹשָׁם, khoo'shawm, hastily), king of Edom, successor to Jobab, (Gen. xxxvi:34, 35; 1 Chron. i:45, 46). The LXX identify him with the Husham of the book of Job (B. C. bet. 1618 and 1093).

HUSHATHITE, THE (hū'shath-ite), (Heb. חֹשָׁתִי, khusha-thee').

1. The designation of Sibbechai, one of David's guard (2 Sam. xxi:18; 1 Chron. xi:29; xx:4; xxvii:11). From the last passage he must have been a descendant of Zerach of the tribe of Judah.

2. The appellation of Mebunāi, one of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii:27). This is doubtless a corruption of No. 1.

HUSHIM (hū'shim), (Heb. הושים, khoo-sheem', hasters).

1. The designation of the sons of Dan (Gen. xlv:23). In Num. xxvi the name appears as Shuham.

2. A name appearing in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii:12). The name probably represents the sons of Asher. (See Berthean in Exc. Handb.)

3. A name of one of the two wives of Sharaïm in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:8, 11), B. C. about 1618.

HUSKS (hūsks), (Gr. κεράτιον, ker-at' ee-on, horned, Luke xv:16), the pods of Ceratonia Siliqua, L., the carob tree.

The carob tree is common in Palestine, and is used for food by the poor, and for the fattening of cattle or swine. When ripe it is like a crooked bean-pod, six to ten inches in length, brown, glossy, and filled with seeds. Miss M. E. Rogers says: "I found it when new rather too sweet to suit my taste. Children seem to enjoy it, and they thrive on it, eating the shell as well as the seeds." The carob tree belongs to the same family as the American "locusts," and is often called by that name by English authors. Some suppose that it was upon these "locusts" that John the Baptist subsisted. Hence this fruit is often called "St. John's bread." But the better critics reject this opinion (Schaff, Bib. Dict.). An inspissated decoction of them is known as dibs kharrūb, i. e., carob honey. (See CERATIA for a full treatment of the subject.)

HUZ (hüz), (trees), eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii:21). Elsewhere written Uz. (See Uz.)

HUZZAB (hüz' zab), (Heb. הוצב, naw-tsab', to establish), queen of Nineveh in the time of Nahum (Nah. ii:7).

Many modern critics, however, take the word to be the Hophal of a verb (see Buxtorf, Lex.; Gesenius, Lex., p. 903). But there is no reason why the word should not be a geographical term—the equivalent of Assyria, i. e., the Zab country.

HYACINTH (hī'á-sínth), jacinth. (See LESHEN.)

HYENA (hī-ē'nā), (Heb. הַיְנָא, tsaw-boo'ah, speckled, Ecclus. xiii:18).

Excepting in Ecclesiasticus, just noted, the word does not occur in the English Bible, although there are several passages in the Hebrew canonical books, where tsawbooah, 'streaked' or 'variegated,' is assumed to designate the hyena. The most noted of these is Jer. xii:9, where the words, σπηλαιον ὑάλνης, 'the cave of the hyena,' modern commentators preferred to translate 'a speckled bird,' as it stands in our version. But Bochart and the continuator of Calmet vindicate what we take to be the true reading, oith tsawbooah, 'the striped rusher,' i. e., the hyena, turning round upon his lair—introduced after an allusion in the previous verse to the lion calling to the beasts of the field (other hyenas and jackals) to come and devour. This allusion, followed up, as it is, by a natural association of ideas, with a description of the pastor, feeder, or rather consumer or devourer of the vineyard, treading down and destroying the vines, renders the natural and poetical picture complete, for the hyena seeks burrows and caverns for a lair; like the dog it turns round to lie down; howls, and occasionally acts in concert; is loathsome, savage, insatiable in appetite, offensive in smell; and will, in the season, like canines, devour grapes, as the writer has himself ascertained by actual experiment.

Tsavbooah, therefore, we consider proved to be, generically, the hyena. The striped species is one of three or four—all, it seems, originally African, and, by following armies and caravans, gradually spread over Southern Asia to beyond the Ganges, though not as yet to the east of the Bramapootra. It is now not uncommon in Asia Minor.

HYMN (hīm), (Gr. ὕμνος, hum'nos, a hymn). In the only places of the New Testament where this word occurs, it is connected with two others of very similar import. 'Speaking to yourselves in psalms (ψαλμοῖς), and hymns (ὕμνοις), and spiritual songs (ὠδαίς), singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord' (Eph. v:19; Col. iii:16).

It has been conjectured that, by 'psalms and hymns,' the poetical compositions of the Old Testament are chiefly to be understood, and that the epithet 'spiritual,' here applied to 'songs,' is intended to mark those devout effusions which resulted from the spiritual gifts granted to the primitive church; yet in 1 Cor. xiv:26 a production of the latter class is called 'a psalm.' Josephus, it may be remarked, uses the terms ὕμνοι, hymns, and ᾠδαί, songs, in reference to the Psalms of David (Antiq. vii:12, 3). Our information respecting the hymnology of the first Christians is extremely scanty; the most distinct notice we possess of it is that contained in Pliny's celebrated Epistle (Ep. x:97). (See POETRY, HEBREW.)

The hymn which our Lord sang with his disciples at the Last Supper is generally supposed to have been the latter part of the Hallel, or series of psalms which were sung by the Jews on the night of the Passover, comprehending Ps. cxiii-cxviii; Ps. cxiii and cxiv being sung before, and the rest after, the Passover.

HYKSOS (hīk'sōs), (compounded according to Josephus, of the Egyptian hyk, "king," and sos, "shepherd," or "Arab"), a race who invaded Egypt and constituted the 15th and one or both of the two following dynasties. (See EGYPT.)

HYMENÆUS (hī'me-næ'us), (Gr. Ὑμεναῖος, hoomen-ah'vos, wedding song), a professor of Christianity at Ephesus, who, with Alexander (1 Tim. i:20) and Philetus (2 Tim. ii:17), had departed from the truth both in principle and practice, and led others into apostasy.

The chief doctrinal error of these persons consisted in maintaining that 'the resurrection was past already.' The precise meaning of this expression is by no means clearly ascertained; the most general and perhaps best founded opinion is that they understood the resurrection in a figurative sense of the great change produced by the Gospel dispensation. Most critics suppose that the same person is referred to in both the epistles to Timothy by the name of Hymenæus. Dr. Mosheim, however, contends that there were two, but his reasoning is not convincing. J. E. R.

HYPERBOLE (hî-pêr'bô-lê), a figure of speech in which the expression is an evident exaggeration of the meaning intended to be conveyed, or by which things are represented as much greater or less, better or worse, than they really are.

Any one who carefully examines the Bible must be surprised at the very few hyperbolic expressions which it contains, considering that it is an Oriental book. Some of these few have occasioned so much difficulty to sincere men that we have reason to bless God that the scene of those great events which comprise the history of man's salvation was laid in Western, and not in Eastern Asia, where the genius of hyperbole reigns without limit or control. In Eastern Asia the tone of composition is pitched so high as to be scarcely intelligible to the sober intellect of Europe; while in Western Asia a medium seems to have been struck between the ultra-extravagance of the far East and the frigid exactness of the far West.

But even regarded as a book of Western Asia, the Bible is, as compared with almost any other Western Asiatic book, so singularly free from hyperbolic expressions as might well excite our surprise, did not our knowledge of its divine origin permit us to suppose that even the style and mode of expression of the writers were so far controlled as to exclude from their writings what in other ages and countries might excite pain and offense, and prove an obstacle to the reception of divine truth. Nor is it to be said that the usage of hyperbole is of modern growth. We find it in the oldest Eastern writings which now exist; and the earlier rabbinical writings attest that, in times approaching near to those in which the writers of the New Testament flourished, the Jewish imagination had run riot in this direction, and has left hyperboles as frequent and outrageous as any which Persia or India can produce.

These things being considered, we shall certainly have more cause to admire the rarity of hyperbolic expressions in the Bible than to marvel at those which do occur.

The strongest hyperbole in all Scripture is that with which the Gospel of St. John concludes: 'There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that the world itself could not contain all the books that should be written' (John xxi:25). This has so much pained many commentators that they have been disposed to regard it as an unauthorized addition to the sacred text, and to reject it accordingly. Now this is always a dangerous process, and not to be adopted but on such overwhelming authority of collated manuscripts as does not exist in the present case. How much more natural and becoming is it to regard the verse simply as a hyperbole, so perfectly conformable to Oriental modes of expression, and to some other hyperboles which may be found interspersed in the sacred books, that the sole wonder really is that this one should be rare enough to afford ground for objection and remark. Some claim that the text means that the world could not receive, or accept, the books. The same Greek word is translated "receive" in Matt. xix: 11, 12. We often find sacred and profane authors using hyperboles of the like kind and signification. In Num. xiii:33, the spies who had returned from searching the land of Canaan, say that they saw 'giants there, of such a prodigious size that they were in their own sight as grasshoppers.' In Deut. i:28, cities with high walls about them are said to be 'walled up to heaven.' In Dan. iv:7 mention is made of a tree whereof 'the height reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof unto the end of all the earth;' and the author of Ecclesiasticus (xlvii:15), speaking of Solomon's wisdom, says, 'Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou fillest it with parables.' As the world is here said to be filled with Solomon's parables; so in John xxi:25, by one degree more of hyperbole, it is said that the world could not contain all the books that should be written concerning Jesus' miracles, if a particular account of every one of them were given. In Josephus (Antiq. xiv:22) God is mentioned as promising to Jacob that he would give the land of Canaan to him and his seed; and then it is added, 'they shall fill the whole sea and land which the sun shines upon.' Wetstein, in his note on the text in John, and Basnage, in his Histoire des Juifs (iii:1-9; v:7), have cited from the ancient rabbinical writers such passages as the following: 'If all the seas were ink, and every reed was a pen, and the whole heaven and earth were parchment, and all the sons of men were writers, they would not be sufficient to write all the lessons which Jochanan composed;' and, concerning one Eliezer, it is said that, 'if the heavens were parchment, and all the sons of men writers, and all the trees of the forest pens, they would not be sufficient for writing all the wisdom which he was possessed of.'

Hyperboles not less strong than that under review find their way into our own poetry, without shocking our judgment or offending our taste, thus:

'And I as rich in having such a jewel
As fifty seas, if all their sands were pearl,
Their rivers nectar, and their rocks pure gold.'

(See Bishop Pearce's Commentary on the Four Evangelists.)

HYPOCRISY (hî-pök'ri-sÿ), (Hebrew from חָזָן, khaw-nafe', a seeming or professing to be what in truth and reality we are not).

It consists in assuming a character which we are conscious does not belong to us, and by which we intentionally impose upon the judgment and opinion of mankind. The name is borrowed from the Greek ὑποκρισις, hoop-ok'ree-sis, an answer, to play a part, in which it primarily signifies the profession of a stage player, which is to express in speech, habit and action, not his own person and manners, but his whom he undertakes to represent. And so it is, for the very essence of hypocrisy lies in apt imitation and deceit; in acting the part of a member of Christ without any saving grace.

HYPOCRITE (hîp'ô-krit). The hypocrite is a double person; he has one person, which is natural; another, which is artificial; the first he keeps to himself; the other he puts on as he does his clothes, to make his appearance in before men. It was ingeniously said by Basil, "that the hypocrite has not put off the old man, but put on the new upon it." Hypocrites have been divided into four sorts: (1) The worldly hypocrite, who makes a profession of religion, and pretends to be religious, merely from worldly considerations (Matt. xxiii:5). (2) The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices, in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time he has no real love to God (Rom. x:3). (3) The evangelical hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a bare conviction of sin; who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life (Matt. xiii:20; 2 Pet. ii:20). (4) The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sin, and of Christ; who talks of remarkable impulses and high feelings; and thinks himself very wise and good while he indulges in the most evil practices (Matt. xiii:39; 2 Cor. xi:14).

HYSSOP (his'süp), (Heb. חִסְסוֹפ, ay-zobe'; Gr. ὑσσωπος, hoos'so-pos).

A great variety of opinions have been entertained respecting the plant called esobh, translated 'hyssop' in the Authorized Version both of the Old and the New Testaments; but as yet no satisfactory investigation has been made, so as to enable us to fix with certainty on the plant intended.

The first notice of it occurs in Exod. xii:22, where a bunch of hyssop is directed to be dipped in blood and struck on the lintels and the two side-posts of the doors of the houses in which the Israelites resided. It is next mentioned in Lev. xiv:4, 6, 52, in the ceremony for declaring lepers to be cleansed; and again, in Num. xix:6, 18, in preparing the water of separation. To these passages the apostle alludes in Heb. ix:19: 'For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people, according to the law, he took the blood of calves, and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people.' From hoosopos we find that the Greek name hoosopos was considered synonymous with the Hebrew esobh; and from the preceding that the plant must have been leafy, and large enough to serve for the purpose of sprinkling, and that it must have been found in Lower Egypt, as well as in the country toward Mount Sinai, and onward to Palestine. From the following passages we get the supposed properties of the plant. Thus, in 1 Kings iv:33, it is said, 'Solomon spoke of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop, that sprungeth out of the wall;' and in the penitential psalm of David (li:7), 'Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.' In this passage it is no doubt considered by some commentators that hyssop is used in a figurative sense; but still it is possible that the plant may have possessed some general cleansing properties, and thus came to be employed in preference to other plants in the ceremonies of purification. It ought, at all events, to be found growing upon walls, and in Palestine.

In the account of the crucifixion of our Savior, the Apostle John says (John xix:29), 'Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar, and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.' In the parallel passages of Matthew (xxvii:48) and Mark (xv:36), it is stated that the sponge filled with vinegar was put upon a reed or stick. To reconcile these statements some commentators have supposed that both the sponge and the hyssop were tied to a stick, and that one apostle mentions only the hyssop, because he considered it as the most important; while, for the same reason, the other two mention only the stick; but the simplest mode of explaining the apparent discrepancy is to consider the hyssop and the stick to be the same thing—in other words, that the sponge was affixed to a stick of hyssop.

A great variety of plants have been adduced by different authors as that alluded to in the above passages. It has been thought by some to belong to the class of ferns. Some again contend for species of wormwood, as being, from their bitterness, most likely to have been added to the vinegar in the sponge, that it might be more distasteful to our Savior. The majority, however, have selected different kinds of fragrant plants belonging to the natural family of Labiatae, several of which are found in dry and barren situations in Palestine, and also in some parts of the Desert. Of these may be mentioned the rosemary, species of lavender, of mint, of marjoram, of thyme, of savory, of thymbra, and others of the same tribe resembling each other much in characters as well as in properties; but it does not appear that any of them grow on walls, or are possessed of cleansing properties; and with the exception of the rosemary, they are not capable of yielding a stick, nor are they found in all the required situations.

The Origanum maru, however, corresponds with the Arabic definition. It has a slender, square stem, and grows on the walls of the terraces throughout Palestine and Syria. The stem is free from thorns and spreading branches, but ends in a cluster of heads. The odor is highly aromatic, which fits it to be made into a branch for the purpose of sprinkling; in fact, no plant in the East is so well suited for such a purpose. (See Ysop.)

I

I, when it relates to God, is expressive of his dignity (Ps. lxxxi:10); his power (Gen. xvii:1); his self-existence and unchangeableness (Exod. iii:14); where his name is given "I AM" (Heb. אֲנִי הָאֵלֹהִים, ehyeh asher ehyeh, God is he who is).

It relates also to the certainty of his promises and threatenings (Exod. vi:2; Num. xiv:35). Referring to men, it expresses their pride (Is. xlvi:8); the certainty of what they say (Gal. v:2; Phil. iv:11), and their readiness to perform their duty (Micah iii:8; Matt. xxi:30).

IBHAR (ib'har), (Heb. יִבְחָר, yib-khar', choice).

A son of David mentioned in the lists (2 Sam. v:15; 1 Chron. iii:6; xiv:5), between Solomon and Elishua. He was born in Jerusalem, and his mother was apparently a wife and not a concubine (B. C. post 1044).

IBIS (i'bīs), a bird (Lev. xi:19, R. V. margin), related to the herons and storks. It was formerly held in veneration by the Egyptians. (See HERON.)

IBLEAM (ib'le-ām), (Heb. יִבְלְעָמ, yib-leh-awm', devouring people), a city of Issachar, which with its suburbs was allotted to Manasseh (Josh. xvii:11), but from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Canaanites (Judg. i:27).

Its position is given as between Dor and Megiddo, near the pass of Gur (2 Kings ix:27). The name appears as Bileam (1 Chron. vi:70), where it is stated that the city was assigned to the family of Kohath as a Levitical city. The site is probably that of the modern Jelameh, two and a half miles north of Jenin (Robinson, Re-searches, iii:161).

IBNEIAH (ib-nē'ya), (Heb. יִבְנֵיָאֵה, yib-neh-yaw', built by Jah), son of Jeroham, who was a chief of the Benjamites and returned with them to Jerusalem from Babylon (1 Chron ix:8), B. C. 536.

IBNIJAH (ib-ni'jah), (Heb. יִבְנֵיָיָה, yib-nee-yaw', building of Jah), a Benjamite, father of Reuel and ancestor of Meshullam, who settled in Jerusalem after the return from captivity (1 Chron. ix:8), B. C. much before 536.

IBRI (ib'ri), (Heb. יִבְרִי, ib-ree', an Eberite, or "Hebrew"), a Levite in the time of David, and son of Merari by Jaaziah (1 Chron. xxiv:27), B. C. 1014. The name is the same as the word rendered Hebrew in the A. V.

IBZAN (ib'zān), (Heb. יִבְזָן, ib-tsawn', shining), the tenth 'judge of Israel.'

He was of Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem of Zebulun and not of Judah. He governed seven years. The prosperity of Ibzán is marked by the great number of his children (thirty sons and thirty daughters), and his wealth, by their marriages—for they were all married. Some have held, with little probability, that Ibzán was the same with Boaz, (Judg. xii:8), B. C. 1249-1243.

ICE (is), (Heb. כֶּהַרְאֵךְ, keh'rahk, smooth, Job vi:16; xxxviii:20; Ps. cxlvii:17), elsewhere cold, "frost," but crystal in Ezek. i:22.

Snow has fallen at times nearly to a depth of two feet on the Central Range in Palestine, and ice has sometimes been formed on the pools at Jerusalem, but very rarely.

ICHABOD (ik'a-böd), (Heb. אִי־כָבוֹד, ee-kaw-bode', where is the glory? inglorious), son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli.

He is only known from the unhappy circumstances of his birth, which occasioned this name to be given to him. The pains of labor came upon his mother when she heard that the ark of God was taken, that her husband was slain in battle, and that these tidings had proved fatal to his father Eli. They were death-pains to her; and when those around sought to cheer her, saying, 'Fear not, for thou hast borne a son,' she only answered by giving him the name of Ichabod, adding, 'The glory is departed from Israel' (1 Sam. iv:19-22), B. C. 1141. The name again occurs in 1 Sam. xiv:3. (See ELI.)

ICONIUM (i-kō'ni-üm), (Gr. Ἰκόνιον, ee-kon'ee-on, of unknown derivation), a town, formerly the capital of Lycaonia, as it is now, by the name of Konieh, of Karamania, in Asia Minor.

It is situated in N. lat 37° 51', E. long. 32° 40', about 120 miles inland from the Mediterranean. It was visited by St. Paul in A. D. 45, when many Gentiles were converted; but some unbelieving Jews excited against him and Barnabas a persecution, which they escaped with difficulty (Acts xiii:51; xiv:1, 19, 21; xvi:2; 2 Tim. iii:11). He undertook a second journey to Iconium in A. D. 51. The church planted at this place by the apostle continued to flourish until, by the persecutions of the Saracens, and afterward of the Seljukians, who made it one of their sultanies, it was nearly extinguished. But some Christians of the Greek and Armenian churches, with a Greek metropolitan bishop, are still found in the suburbs of the city, not being permitted to reside within the walls.

Konieh is situated at the foot of Mount Taurus, upon the border of the lake Trogitis, in a fertile plain, rich in valuable productions, particularly apricots, wine, cotton, flax, and grain. The circumference of the town is between two and three miles, beyond which are suburbs not much less populous than the town itself. The town, suburbs, and gardens are plentifully supplied with water from streams which flow from some hills to the westward, and which, to the northeast, join the lake, which varies in size with the season of the year. In the town carpets are manufactured, and blue and yellow leathers are tanned and dried. Cotton, wool, hides and a few of the other raw productions which enrich the superior industry and skill of the manufacturers of Europe, are sent to Smyrna by caravans.

The city, like all those renowned for superior sanctity, abounds with dervishes, who meet the passenger at every turning of the streets and demand paras with the greatest clamor and insolence. The bazaars and houses have little to recommend them to notice (Kinneir's Travels in Asia Minor; Leake's Geography of Asia Minor; Arundell's Tour in Asia Minor; Hamilton, Re-searches in Asia Minor, ii:205 sq.; Harper's Classical Dictionary).

IDALAH (î-dâ'lah), (Heb. יְדֹלָה, yid-al-aw', probably exalted), one of the cities of Zebulun, near the western border (Josh. xix:15). Schwarz identified it with Kellah al-Chirib, which is probably the Kulat el-Kireh of Robinson, six miles southwest of Semunieh in the Kishon valley, exact site unknown.

IDBASH (îd'bâsh), (Heb. יְדְבָשׁ, yid-bawsh', perhaps honeyed, sweet), a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv:3). By the phrase "of the father of Etam" we are probably to understand that he was a descendant of the founder of Etam, as the list here is largely a topographical one (B. C. about 1612).

IDDO (îd'do), (Heb. יִדְדוֹ, id-do', seasonable).

1. A prophet of Judah, who wrote the history of Rehoboam and Abijah; or rather perhaps, who, in conjunction with Seraiah, kept the public rolls during their reigns (2 Chron. xii:15). It seems from 2 Chron. xiii:22 that he named his book Midrash, or 'Exposition.' Josephus (Antiq. viii: 9, 1) states that this Iddo was the prophet who was sent to Jeroboam at Bethel, and consequently the same that was slain by a lion for disobedience to his instructions (1 Kings xiii); and many commentators have followed this statement (B. C. after 953).

2. Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i:1; Ezra v:1; vi:14). He was one of the chief priests who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii:4), B. C. 536.

3. Id-do', (Heb. יִדְדוֹ), chief of the Jews of the captivity established at Casiphia, a place of which it is difficult to determine the position.

It was to him that Ezra sent a requisition for Levites and Nethinim, none of whom had yet joined his caravan. Thirty-eight Levites and 250 Nethinim responded to his call (Ezra viii:17-20), B. C. 457. It would seem from this that Iddo was a chief person of the Nethinim, descended from those Gibeonites who were charged with the servile labors of the tabernacle and temple. This is one of several circumstances which indicate that the Jews in their several colonies under the Exile were still ruled by the heads of their nation, and allowed the free exercise of their worship.

4. Yid-do' (Heb. יְדִדוֹ, lovely), a chief of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan (1 Chron. xxvii:21), B. C. 1014.

5. A Levite, descendant of Gershom through his father Joah (1 Chron. vi:21). In verse 41 the name is Adaiah, who is given as an ancestor of Asaph.

6. Father of Abinadab, which latter was a purveyor under Solomon over Mahanaim (1 Kings iv:14), B. C. about 995.

IDLE (î'd'l), (Heb. רַו־פָּוֹ, raw-faw').

The ordinary uses of this word require no illustration. But the very serious passage in Matt. xii:36 may suitably be noticed in this place. In the Authorized Version it is translated, 'I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment.' The whole question depends upon the meaning or rather force of the term ῥῆμα ἄργον, rho'ma ar-gon, 'idle word,' concerning which there has been no little difference of opinion. Many understand it to mean 'wicked and injurious words,' as if argon, vain, empty were the same as πονηρόν, pon-ay-ron, wicked.

The meaning of the expression seems to be void of effect, without result, followed by no corresponding event. Therefore rho-ma ar-gon is empty or vain words or discourse, i. e., void of truth, and to which the event does not correspond. In short, it is the empty, inconsiderate, insincere language of one who says one thing and means another; and in this sense argos is very frequently employed by the Greeks. This Tittmann confirms by a number of citations, and then deduces from the whole that the sense of the passage under review is: 'Believe me, he who uses false and insincere language shall suffer grievous punishment; your words, if uttered with sincerity and ingenuousness, shall be approved; but if they are dissembled although they bear the strongest appearance of sincerity, they shall be condemned.' (See Tittmann, On the Principal Causes of Forced Interpretations of the New Testament, in Am. Bib. Repository for 1831, pp. 481-484.)

IDOL (î'dôl).

A large number of Hebrew and Greek words have been rendered in the Bible either by idol or image. These embrace: (1) A class of abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with it, and stand out as a protest of the language against the enormities of idolatry; (2) those words which more directly apply to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshiped through them; (3) the terms which have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.

1. Abstract Terms. 1. Ay-maw' (Heb. אֵימָה, horror, or terror, or terrifying shapes, and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. 1:38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with number 2.

2. Mif-leh'tseth (Heb. מִפְלֵחַתְּסֵת, a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 Kings xv:13; 2 Chron. xv:16), and which was unquestionably the Phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature and the nature-goddess Ashera. Allusion is supposed to be made to this in Jer. x:5 and Epist. of Jer. 70 (in the Apocrypha). In 2 Chron. xv:16 the Vulg. render "simulacrum Priapi" the image of Priapus. (Smith).

3. El-eel (Heb. אֵילֵאֵל, the inane, good for nothing (Lev. xix:4).

It is supposed by some to have a sense akin to that of שֶׁחֶרֶר, sheh-ker', "falsehood," with which it stands in parallelism in Job xiii:4, and would therefore much resemble aw'-ven, as applied to an idol. It is used to denote the idols of Noph or Memphis (Ezek. xxx:13). In marked contrast with Jehovah it is seen in Ps. xvi:5; xcvi:7).

4. Aw'ven (Heb. אַו־וֵעַן, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," etc., and once only "idol," Is. lxvi:3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence aw'ven denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship, akin to חֵבֶל, heh'bel, the foolish things, vanities, of Acts xiv:15 (comp. Jer. ii:5).

5. Ghil-loo-lem' (Heb. גִּילְלוּלֵם, is used as a term of contempt, but of uncertain origin (Ezek. xxx:13). In Ezek. iv:12, 7eph. i:17, some have favored the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. to Deut. xxix:17, "dungy gods." (See 1 Kings xv:12.)

6. Bo'sheth (Heb. בֹּשֶׁת, "shame," or "shameful thing" (A. V. Jer. xi:13; Hos. ix:10), applied to Baal or Baal-Peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship. It is found in close connection with el-eel'.

7. Shik-koots' (Heb. שִׁקְכוּטִים, "filth," "impurity," especially applied, like shekets, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ezek. xxxvii:23; Nah. iii:6), such as food offered in sacrifice to idols (Zech. ix:7; comp. Acts xv:20, 29).

As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship, and also to their worshipers, who partook of the impurity, and thus "became loathsome like their love," the foul Baal-Peor (Hos. ix:10).

2. Names of Idols. These may be considered as indicating that the images were made in imitation of external objects, and to represent some idea, or attribute; or as they denote the workmanship by which they were fashioned.

1. (Heb. צֶלֶם, tseh-lem', and צֶלֶמַת, tzel-em, shadow).

It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. i:27; comp. Wisd. ii:23), distinguished from דְמוּת, dem-ooth, or "likeness," as the "image," from the "idea" which it represents (Schmidt, de Imag. Dei in Hom. p. 84), though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of tselem, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi:5; Num. xxxiii:52; Dan. iii:1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon the walls. (Ezek. xxiii:14). "Image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii:19) it signifies the "expression," and corresponds to the idea of Matt. xviii:3, though dem-ooth' agrees rather with the Platonic usage of the latter word. (See IMAGE.)

2. (Heb. שִׁמְלָה, seh'mel, or שִׁמְלָה, say'mel, semblance, likeness). In 2 Chron. xxxiii:7 it appears as "carved images," following the LXX ἡ γλυπτὸν, to glupton. On the whole the Greek εἰκὼν, aikone, of Deut. iv:16, 2 Chron. xxxiii:7, and the "simulacrum" of the Vulgate (2 Chron. xxxiii:15) most nearly resemble the Hebrew say'mel.

3. (Heb. תְּמוּנָה, tem-oo-naw'), rendered "image" in Job iv:16; elsewhere "similitude" (Deut. iv:12); "likeness," (Deut. iv:16); "form" or "shape" would be better (comp. 2 Kings xvii:16; Exod. xx:4; Num. xii:8).

4. (Heb. מַצֵּבָה, mats-tsav-baw', anything set up, a "statue", applied to a memorial stone like those erected by Jacob on four several occasions (Gen. xxviii:18; xxxi:45; xxxv:14, 20) to commemorate a crisis in his life, or to mark the grave of Rachel, (comp. Jer. xliii:13).

Such were the stones set up by Joshua (Josh. iv:9) after the passage of the Jordan, and at Shechem (xxiv:26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii:12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. xliii:13), two of which were a hundred cubits high and eight broad, each of a single stone (Her. ii:111). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 Kings iii:2), whether of stone

(2 Kings x:27) or wood, which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone at Ephesus, "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix:35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods sent down their images upon earth.

5. (Heb. אֲצַבָּה, aw-tsavb').

6. (Heb. אֲצַבָּה, eh'tseb, Jer. xxii:28).

7. (Heb. אֲצַבָּה, oh'tseb, Is. xlvi:5), a "figure." (The three immediately foregoing are derived from a root aw-tsab', signifying "to work," "to fashion.")

8. (Heb. צִיר, tseer, once only applied to an idol, Is. xlv:16).

9. (Heb. מַסְכֵּת, mas-keeth', Lev. xxvi:1; Num. xxxiii:52; Ezek. viii:12).

The opinion is held by some that Eben mas-keeth' was originally a smooth elevated stone, employed for the purpose of obtaining from it a freer prospect, and of offering prayer in prostration upon it to the deities of heaven. Hence, generally, they conclude it signifies a stone of prayer or devotion, and the "chambers of imagery" of Ezek. viii:12 are "chambers of devotion."

10. (Heb. תְּרַפִּים, ter'aw-feme, teraphim). See TERAPHIM.

11. (Heb. כְּהַמְנֵמִים, kham-maw-neem'), in the margin of most passages "sun images." It is used in conjunction with the symbols of the nature goddess Asherah (2 Chron. xiv:3, 5; xxxiv:4, 7; Is. xvii:9; xxvii:8), as was otherwise usual with Baal and Asherah.

They are mentioned with the Asherim, and the latter are coupled with the statues of Baal (1 Kings xiv:23; 2 Kings xxiii:14). The chammânim and statues are used promiscuously (comp. 2 Kings xxiii:14 and 2 Chron. xxxiv:4; 2 Chron. xiv:3, 5), but are never spoken of together. They were probably images of the fire god Baal, and seem to have represented a rising flame of fire, being made of either wood or stone.

3. Material, Etc. Terms denoting the material, tools, workmanship, etc.

1. Heb. נֶהֱסֵק, neh'sek, or נַיִסֵּק, nay'sek, and מַס־סַי־כַּו', mas-say-kaw', are evidently synonymous (Is. xli:29; xlviii:5; Jer. x:14) in later Hebrew, and denote a "molten" image. Mas-say-kaw' is frequently used in distinction from peh'sel (Deut. xxvii:15; Judg. xvii:3, etc).

2. Heb. פֶּה־סֵל, peh'sel, and פֶּס־עֵל־עֵמ', usually translated in the A. V. "graven" or "carved" images. In two passages the latter is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii:19, 26).

The verb is used to indicate the finished result of the workmanship of the masons (Ex. xxxiv:4; 1 Kings v:18). Peh-sel was later employed of a figure cast in metal (Is. xl:19; xlv:10). These "sculptured" images were probably wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii:25; Is. xxx:22; Hab. ii:19), the more costly being of solid metal (Is. xl:19) brass and clay were employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii:33; v:23).

4. Forms of Idols. Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were the meteoric stones which the ancients believed to have been the images of the gods sent down from heaven; then rough unhewn blocks;

then stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the Divinity worshiped was supposed to dwell, and which were consecrated, like the sacred stone at Delphi, by being anointed with oil and crowned with wool on solemn days.

We have not many traces of the forms of idolatrous images in the Bible. Dagon, the fish-god of the Philistines, was a human figure terminating in a fish (see DAGON). A few bore some symbolical reference to the worship of the true God, and partook of the nature of idolatry; such, for example, as the golden calf of Aaron comp. Neh. ix:18; those of Jeroboam; the singular ephods of Gideon and Micah (Judg. viii:27; xvii:5). (Mc. & Str. Cyc.; Smith's Bib. Dict.)

IDOLATRY (t-döl'a-trÿ), (Heb. עֲבוֹדַת, ter-aw-feme', teraphim, once only, 1 Sam. xv:23).

1. Definition and Classification. Idolatry, strictly speaking, denotes the worship of deity in a visible form, whether the images to which homage is paid are symbolical representations of the true God, or of the false divinities which have been worshiped in his stead. Idolatry may be classified under the following heads: (1) Fetichism, or low nature worship of trees, rivers, hills and stones; (2) of animals; (3) of high nature worship, as the sun, moon and stars, and the powers or forces of nature, as fire, air, etc.; (4) hero worship, as of the leaders of a nation, or of deceased ancestors; (5) idealism or the worship of mental qualities or abstractions, as justice, etc. There may also be added to these: (a) the worship of the true God by images; (b) of false gods by images; (c) of the worship of the images or symbols themselves.

2. Idolatry Through Heathen Nations. The heathen nations who influenced the Israelites are as follows:

(1) Chaldea. The early existence of idolatry is evinced by Josh. xxiv:2, where it is stated that Abram and his immediate ancestors dwelling in Mesopotamia 'served other gods.' The terms in Gen. xxxi:53, and particularly the plural form of the verb, seem to show that some members of Terah's family had each different gods.

(2) Egypt. From Josh. xxiv:14, and Ezek. xx:8, we learn that the Israelites, during their sojourn in Egypt, were seduced to worship the idols of that country; although we possess no particular account of their transgression. In Amos v:25, and Acts vii:42, it is stated that they committed idolatry in their journey through the wilderness; and in Num. xxv:1, sq., that they worshiped the Moabite idol Baal-peor at Shittim.

(3) Canaan. After the Israelites had obtained possession of the promised land, we find that they were continually tempted to adopt the idolatries of the Canaanite nations with which they came in contact. The book of Judges enumerates several successive relapses into this sin. The gods which they served during this period were Baal and Ashtoreth, and their modifications; and Syria, Sidon, Moab, Ammon, and Philistia, are named in Judg. x:6 as the sources from which they derived their idolatries. Then Samuel appears to have exercised a beneficial influence in weaning the people from this folly (1 Sam. vii); and the worship of the Lord acquired a gradually increasing hold on the nation until the time of Solomon, who was induced in his old age to permit the establishment of idolatry at Jerusalem. On the division of the nation, the kingdom of Israel (besides adhering to the sin of Jeroboam to the last) was specially devoted to the worship of Baal, which Ahab had renewed and carried to an unprecedented height; and although the energetic measures adopted by Jehu, and afterward by the priest Jehoiada, to suppress this idolatry, may have been the cause why there has been no later express mention of Baal, yet it is evident from 2 Kings xiii:6, and xvii:10, that the worship of Asherah continued until the deportation of the ten tribes.

(4) Assyria. The deportation of the ten tribes also introduced the peculiar idolatries of the Assyrian colonists into Samaria. In the kingdom of Judah, on the other hand, idolatry continued during the two succeeding reigns; was suppressed for a time by Asa (1 Kings xv:12); was revived in consequence of Joram marrying into the family of Ahab; was continued by Ahaz; received a check from Hezekiah; broke out again more violently under Manasseh; until Josiah made the most vigorous attempt to suppress it. But even Josiah's efforts to restore the worship of the Lord were ineffectual; for the later prophets, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, still continue to utter reproofs against idolatry. Nor did the capture of Jerusalem under Jehoiachin awaken this peculiarly sensual people; for Ezekiel (viii) shows that those who were left in Jerusalem under the government of Zedekiah had given themselves up to many kinds of idolatry; and Jeremiah (xlv:8) charges those inhabitants of Judah who had found an asylum in Egypt, with having turned to serve the gods of that country. On the restoration of the Jews after the Babylonian captivity, they appear, for the first time in their history, to have been permanently impressed with a sense of the degree to which their former idolatries had been an insult to God, and a degradation of their own understanding—an advance in the culture of the nation which may in part be ascribed to the influence of the Persian abhorrence of images, as well as to the effects of the exile as a chastisement. In this state they continued until Antiochus Epiphanes made the last and fruitless attempt to establish the Greek idolatry in Palestine (1 Macc. i).

3. Forms of Idolatry. The particular forms of idolatry into which the Israelites fell are described under the names of the different gods which they worshiped (see ASHTORETH; BAAL; etc.); the general features of their idolatry require a brief notice here. According to Movers (Die Phönizier, i. 148), the religion of all the idolatrous Syro-Arabian nations was a deification of the powers and laws of nature, an adoration of those objects in which these powers are considered to abide, and by which they act. The deity is thus the invisible power in nature itself, that power which manifests itself as the generator, sustainer, and destroyer of its works. This view admits of two modifications: either the separate powers of nature are regarded as so many different gods, and the objects by which these powers are manifested—as the sun, moon, etc.—are regarded as their images and supporters; or the power of nature is considered to be one and indivisible, and only to differ as to the forms under which it manifests itself. Both views co-exist in almost all religions. The most simple and ancient notion, however, is that which conceives the deity to be in human form, as male and female, and which considers the male sex to be the type of its active, generative, and destructive power; while that passive power of nature whose function is to conceive and bring forth, is embodied under the female form. The human form and the diversity of sex lead naturally to the different ages of life—to the old man and the youth, the matron and the virgin—according to the modifications of the conception; and the myths which represent the influences, the changes, the laws, and the relations of these natural powers under the sacred histories of such gods, constitute a harmonious development of such a religious system.

Those who saw the deity manifested by, or conceived him as resident in, any natural objects, could not fail to regard the sun and moon as the potent rulers of day and night, and the sources of those influences on which all animated nature depends. Hence star-worship forms a prominent feature in all the false religions mentioned in the Bible. Of this character chiefly were the Egyptian, the Canaanite, the Chaldean, and the Persian religions. The Persian form of idolatry, however, deserves to be distinguished from the others; for it allowed no images nor temples of the god, but worshiped him in his purest symbol, fire. It is understood that this form is alluded to in most of those passages which mention the worship of the sun, moon and heavenly host, by incense, on heights (2 Kings xxiii:5, 12; Jer. xix:13). The other form of astrology, in which the idea of the sun, moon and planets is blended with the worship of the god in the form of an idol, and with the addition of a mythology (as may be seen in the relations of Baal and his cognates to the sun), easily degenerates into lasciviousness and cruel rites.

4. Sin of Idolatry. Idolatry was the most heinous offense against the Mosaic law, which is most particular in defining the acts which constitute the crime, and severe in apportioning the punishment. Thus, it is forbidden to make any image of a strange God; to prostrate oneself before such an image, or before those natural objects which were also worshiped without images, as the sun and moon (Deut. iv:19); to suffer the altars, images, or groves of idols to stand (Exod. xxxiv:13); or to keep the gold and silver of which their images were made, and to suffer it to enter the house (Deut. vii:25, 26); to sacrifice to idols, most especially to offer human sacrifices; to eat of the victims offered to idols by others; to prophesy in the name of a strange god; and to adopt any of the rites used in idolatrous worship, and to transfer them to the worship of the Lord (Deut. xii:30, 31). As for punishment, the law orders that if an individual committed idolatry he should be stoned to death (Deut. xvii:2-5); that if a town was guilty of this sin, its inhabitants and cattle should be slain, and its spoils burnt together with the town itself (Deut. xiii:12-18). To what degree also the whole spirit of the Old Testament is abhorrent from idolatry, is evident (besides legal prohibitions, prophetic denunciations, and energetic appeals like that in Is. xliv:9-20) from the literal sense of the terms which are used as synonyms for idols and their worship which have been considered under IDOL (which see).

5. General Rites of Idolatry. The general rites of idolatrous worship consist in burning incense; in offering bloodless sacrifices, as the dough-cakes and libations in Jer. vii:18, and the raisin-cake in Hos. iii:1; in sacrificing victims (1 Kings xviii:26); and especially in human sacrifices (see MOLECH). These offerings were made on high places, hills, and roofs of houses, or in shady groves and valleys. Some forms of idolatrous worship had libidinous orgies (see ASHTORETH). Divinations, oracles (2 Kings i:2), and rabdomancy (Hos. iv:12) form a part of many of these false religions. The priesthood was generally a numerous body; and where persons of both sexes were attached to the service of any god (like that of Ashtoreth), that service was infamously immoral. It is remarkable that the Pentateuch makes no mention of any temple of idols; afterward we read often of such. J. N.

Figurative. Covetousness, in which is implied a setting of our heart on worldly things instead of God, and all inordinate care for the appetite, as gluttony, or sinful love to, or trust in any creature, is idolatry in God's account, and constitutes the person guilty an idolater, or worshiper of idols (Eph. v:5; Col. iii:5; Phil. iii:19; comp. Rom. xvi:18; 2 Tim. iii:4).

IDUMÆA (id-ū-mē'ā), (Gr. Ἰδουμαία, id-oo-mah-yah). We often meet with the phrase Eretz-Edom, 'the Land of Edom,' and once with the poetic form Sedeh-Edom, 'the Field of Edom' (Judg. v:4). The inhabitants are sometimes styled Beni-Edom, 'the Children of Edom,' and poetically Bath-Edom, 'the Daughter of Edom' (Lam. iv:21, 22). A single person was called אֶדְוִי, Ed-o-mee', 'an Edomite' (Deut. xxiii:8), of which the feminine plural, אֶדְוִיָּוִת, Ed-o-meeth', occurs in 1 Kings xi:1.

1. Name. (1) Edom. The name was derived from Isaac's son Edom, otherwise called Esau, the elder twin-brother of Jacob (see ESAU). It signifies red, and seems first to have been suggested by his appearance at his birth, when 'he came out all red,' i. e., covered with red hair (Gen. xxv:25), and was afterward more formally and permanently imposed upon him on account of his unworthy disposal of his birthright for a mess of red lentils (Gen. xxv:30). The region which came to bear his name is the mountainous tract on the east side of the great valleys El Ghor and El Araba, extending between the Dead Sea and the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea. Into this district Esau removed during his father's lifetime, and his posterity gradually obtained possession of it as the country which God had assigned for their inheritance in the prophetic blessing pronounced by his father Isaac (Gen. xxvii:39, 40; xxxii:3; Deut. ii:5-12, 22).

(2) Mount Seir. Previously to their occupation of the country, it was called Mount Seir, a designation indeed which it never entirely lost (see SEIR; MOUNT SEIR, 2). The word seir means hairy (being thus synonymous with Esau), and, when applied to a country, may signify rugged, mountainous, and so says Josephus (Antiq. i:20, 3): 'Esau named the country "Roughness" from his own hairy roughness.' But in Gen. xxxvi:20 we read of an individual of the name of Seir, who had before this inhabited the land, and from whom it may have received its first appellation.

The first mention made of Mount Seir in Scripture is in Gen. xiv:6, where Chedorlaomer and his confederates are said to have smitten 'the Horim in their Mount Seir.' (See CHEDORLAOMER.) Among the earliest human habitations were caves, either formed by nature or easily excavated, and for the construction of these the mountains of Edom afforded peculiar facilities. Hence the designation given to the aboriginal inhabitants—Horim, i. e., cave-dwellers, an epithet of similar import with the Greek Troglodytes. Even in the days of Jerome 'the whole of the southern part of Idumæa, from Eleutheropolis to Petra and Aila, was full of caverns used as dwellings, on account of the sun's excessive heat' (Jerome on Obadiah. verse 1); and there is reason to believe that the possessors of the country in every age occupied similar habitations, many traces of which are yet seen in or near Petra, the renowned metropolis.

2. History. We are informed in Deut. ii: 12 that 'the children of Esau succeeded (marg. inherited) the Horim when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead, as Israel did unto the land of his possession, which Jehovah gave unto them.' From this it may be inferred that the extirpation of the Horim by the Esauites was, like that of the Canaanites by Israel, very gradual and slow. Some think this supposition is confirmed by the genealogical tables preserved in the thirty-sixth chapter of Genesis (comp. 1 Chron. i), where we have, along with a list of the chiefs of Edom, a similar catalogue of Horite chieftains, who are presumed to have been their contemporaries. But for the chronology of these ancient documents we possess no data whatsoever, and very precarious therefore, must be any deductions that are drawn from them. This much, however, we there learn of the political constitution of the Seirite aborigines, that, like the Esauites and Israelites, they were divided into tribes, and these tribes were subdivided into families—the very polity which still obtains among the Arabs by whom Idumæa is now peopled.

(1) Dukes or Chiefs. Each tribe had its own Alluf, a term which is unhappily rendered in the English Version by 'Duke,' for though that has, no doubt, the radical meaning of the Latin dux, a 'leader,' it now only suggests the idea of a feudal title of nobility. Of these chiefs of the Horites seven are enumerated, viz., Lotan, Shobal, Zibeon, Anah, Dishon, Ezer, and Dishan. The only one of these who is spoken of as related to the other is Anah, the son of Zibeon. The primitive and pastoral character of the people is incidentally brought out by the circumstance that this Anah, though a chieftain's son, was in the habit of tending to his father's asses. It was when thus employed that he found in the wilderness eth-ha-yemim, rendered in the English Version by 'the mules,' but meaning more probably 'the hot springs;' and thus interpreted, the passage seems to be an intimation that he was the first to discover the faculty with which asses and other animals are endowed, of snuffing the moisture of the air, and thus sometimes leading to the opportune discovery of hidden waters in the desert. There is in the country to the southeast of the Dead Sea (which formed part of the Seirite possessions), a place, Kallirhoë, celebrated among the Greeks and Romans for its warm baths, and which has been visited by modern travelers (Josephus, De Bell. Jud. i:33, 5; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v:5, 17; Legh's Travels).

(2) Marriage of Esau. Esau first married into two Canaanitish families of the Hittite and Hivite tribes (Gen. xxvi:34; xxxvi:2; in one or other of which places, however, the text seems corrupt); but anxious to propitiate his offended parents, he next formed a matrimonial alliance with one of the race of Abraham, viz., Mahalath, otherwise called Bashemath, daughter of Ishmael, and sister of Nebaioth, whose descendants, the Nabathæans, by a singular coincidence, obtained in after times possession of the land of Edom (Gen. xxviii:9). (See ESAU.) Esau's firstborn (by Adah or Bashemath, of the daughters of Heth) was Eliphaz, whose son Teman gave name to a district of the country (Gen. xxxvi:11, 34; 1 Chron. i:45; Ezek. xxv:13; Obad. verse 9).

(3) The Temanites. The Temanites were renowned for their wisdom (Jer. xlix:7, 20; Baruch iii:22, 23). The chief speaker in the book of Job is another Eliphaz, a Temanite—which is one of the circumstances that has led many to place the scene of that story in the land of Edom (see Job). The name of Teman was preserved to the days of Eusebius in that of Thaiman, a small town five Roman miles from Petra. Another son of the first-mentioned Eliphaz was Amalek, who is not to be confounded, however, with the father of the Amalekites, one of the doomed nations of Canaan, of whom we hear so early as the age of Abraham (Gen. xiv:7).

(4) Edomite Emirs. As a modern Arab sheikh is often found to exercise influence far beyond the sphere of his hereditary domain, so in the list of Edomite emirs preserved by Moses we have perhaps only the names of the more distinguished individuals who acquired more or less authority over all the tribes.

(5) Kings of Edom. This oligarchy appears gradually to have changed into a monarchy, as happened, too, among the Israelites; for in addition to the above-mentioned lists, both of Horite and Esauite leaders, we have in Gen. xxxvi:31, a catalogue of eight kings (Bela, Jobab, Husham, Hadad, Samlah, Saul, Baal-hanan, Hadar or Hadad) who reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.' It is not necessary to suppose that this was said by Moses prophetically; it is one of those passages which may have been inserted by Ezra when finally arranging the canon, inasmuch as it occurs also in the first book of Chronicles, of which he is the reputed compiler. The period when this change to regal government took place in Idumæa can only be matter of conjecture. In the Song of Moses (Exod. xv:15) it is said that at the tidings of Israel's triumphal passage of the Red Sea the rulers or princes (Alluf) of Edom trembled with affright, but when, some forty years afterwards, application had to be made by the Israelites for leave to traverse the land of Edom, it was to the king (Mclek) that the request was addressed (Num. xx:14). The road by which it was sought to penetrate the country was termed 'the king's highway' (verse 17), supposed by Robinson to be the Wady el-Ghuweir, for it is almost the only valley that affords a direct and easy passage through those mountains. From a comparison of these incidents it may be inferred that the change in the form of government took place during the wanderings of the Israelites in the desert, unless we suppose, with Rosenmüller, that it was only this northeastern part of Edom which was now subject to a monarch, the rest of the country remaining under the sway of its former chieftains. But whether the regal power at this period embraced the whole territory or not, perhaps it did not supplant the ancient constitution, but was rather grafted on it, like the authority of the Judges in Israel, and of Saul, the first king, which did not materially interfere with the government that previously existed.

(6) Monarchy Not Hereditary. It further appears, from the list of Idumæan kings, that the monarchy was not hereditary, but elective (for no one is spoken of as the son or relative of his predecessor); or probably that chieftain was acknowledged as sovereign who was best able to vindicate his claim by force of arms. Every successive king appears to have selected his own seat of government; the places mentioned as having enjoyed that distinction are Dinhabah, Avith, Pagu or Pai. Even foreigners were not excluded from the throne, for the successor of Samlah of Masrekah was Saul, or Shaul, 'of Rechoboth, on the river.' The word 'Rechoboth' means, literally, streets, and was a not uncommon name given to towns; but the emphatic addition of 'the river,' points evidently to the Euphrates, and between Rakkah and Anah, on that river, there are still the remains of a place called by the Arabs Rakhath-Malik-Ibn Tawk. In the age of Solomon we read of one Hadad, who 'was of the king's seed in Edom' (1 Kings xi:14); from which some have conjectured that by that period there was a royal dynasty of one particular family; but all that the expression may imply is, that he was a blood relation of the last king of the country. Hadad was the name of one of the early sovereigns 'who smote Midian in the field of Moab' (Gen. xxxvi:35).

(7) Feud of Esau and Jacob. The unbrotherly feud which arose between Esau and Jacob was prolonged for ages between their posterity. The Israelites, indeed, were commanded 'not to abhor an Edomite, for he was their brother' (Deut. xxiii:7); but a variety of circumstances occurred to provoke and perpetuate the hostility. The first time they were brought into direct collision was when the Edomites, though entreated by their 'brother Israel,' refused the latter a passage through their territories, and they had consequently to make a retrograde and toilsome march to the Gulf of Elath, whence they had to 'compass the land of Edom' by the mountain desert on the east. We do not again hear of the Edomites till the days of Saul, who warred against them with partial success (1 Sam. xiv:47); but their entire subjugation was reserved for David, who first signally vanquished them in the Valley of Salt (supposed to be in the Ghôr, beside Usdum, the Mountain of Salt); and, finally, placed garrisons in all their country (2 Sam. viii:14; 1 Chron. xviii:11-13; 1 Kings xi:15; comp. the inscription of Ps. lx and v:8, 9; cviii:9, 10, where 'the strong city' may denote Selah or Petra). Then were fulfilled the prophecies in Gen. xxv:23 and xxvii:40, that the 'elder should serve the younger,' and also the prediction of Balaam (Num. xxiv:18), that Edom and Seir should be for possessions to Israel. Solomon created a naval station at Ezion-geber, at the head of the Gulf of Elath, the modern Akaba (1 Kings ix:26; 2 Chron. viii:18).

(8) Attempts at Independency. Towards the close of his reign an attempt was made to restore the independency of the country by one Hadad, an Idumæan prince, who, when a child, had been carried into Egypt at the time of David's invasion, and had there married the sister of Tahpanhes the queen (1 Kings xi:14-23). (See HADAD.) If Edom then succeeded in shaking off the yoke, it was only for a season, since in the days of Jehoshaphat, the fourth Jewish monarch from Solomon, it is said, 'there was no king in Edom; a deputy was king;' i. e., he acted as viceroy for the king of Judah. For that the latter was still master of the country is evident from the fact of his having fitted out, like Solomon, a fleet at Ezion-geber (1 Kings xxii:47, 48; 2 Chron. xx:36, 37). It was, no doubt, his deputy (called king) who joined the confederates of Judah and Israel in their attack upon Moab (2 Kings iii:9, 12, 26). Yet there seems to have been a partial revolt of the Edomites, or at least of the mountaineers of Seir, even in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx:22); and under his successor, Jehoram, they wholly rebelled, and 'made a king over themselves' (2 Kings viii:20, 22; 2 Chron. xxi:8, 10). From its being added that, notwithstanding the temporary suppression of the rebellion, 'Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah unto this day,' it is probable that the Jewish dominion was never completely restored. Amaziah, indeed, invaded the country, and having taken the chief city, Selah or Petra, he, in memorial of the conquest, changed its name to Joktheel (i. e., subdued of God); and his successor, Uzziah, retained possession of Elath (2 Kings xiv:7; 2 Chron. xxv:11-14; xxvi:3). But in the reign of Ahaz, hordes of Edomites made incursions into Judah, and carried away captives (2 Chron. xxviii:17). About the same period Rezin, king of Syria, expelled the Jews from Elath, which (according to the correct reading of 2 Kings xvi:6) was thenceforth occupied by the Edomites.

(9) Fulfillment of Prophecy. Now was fulfilled the other part of Isaac's prediction, viz.: that, in course of time, Esau 'should take his brother's yoke from off his neck' (Gen. xxvii:40). It appears from various incidental expressions in the later prophets, that the Edomites employed their recovered power in the enlargement of their territory in all directions. They spread as far south as Dedan in Arabia, and northward to Bozrah in the Hauran; though it is doubtful if the Bozrah of Scripture may not have been a place in Idumæa Proper (Is. xxxiv:6; lxiii:1; Jer. xlix:7, 8-20; Ezek. xxv:13; Amos i:12). When the Chaldæans invaded Judah, under Nebuchadnezzar, the Edomites became their willing auxiliaries, and triumphed with fiendish malignity over the ruin of their kinsmen the Jews, of whose desolated land they hoped to obtain a large portion to themselves (Obad. verses 10-16; Ezek. xxv:12-14; xxxv:3-10; xxxvi:5; Lam. iv:21). By this circumstance the hereditary hatred of the Jews was rekindled in greater fury than ever, and hence the many dire denunciations of the 'daughter of Edom,' to be met with in the Hebrew prophets (Ps. cxxxvii:7-9; Obad. passim; Jer. xlix:7; Ezek. xxxv, and xxxv.). From the language of Malachi (i:2, 3), and also from the accounts preserved by Josephus (Antiq. x:9, 7), it would seem that the Edomites did not wholly escape the Chaldæan scourge; but instead of being carried captive, like the Jews, they not only retained possession of their own territory, but became masters of the south of Judah, as far as Hebron (1 Macc. v:65; comp. with Ezek. xxxv:10; xxxvi:5).

(10) Attack by the Maccabees. Here, however, they were, in course of time, successfully attacked by the Maccabees, and about B. C. 125 were finally subdued by John Hyrcanus, who compelled them to submit to circumcision and other Jewish rites, with a view to incorporate them with the nation (1 Macc. v:3, 65; 2 Macc. x:16; xii:32; Joseph. Antiq. xiii:9, 1; xv:4). The amalgamation, however, of the two races seems never to have been effected, for we afterwards hear of Antipater, an Idumæan by birth, being made by Cæsar procurator of all Judea; and his son, commonly called Herod the Great, was, at the time of Christ's birth, king of Judea, including Idumæa; and hence Roman writers often speak of all Palestine under that name (Joseph. Antiq. xiv:1:3; 8:5; xv:7, 9; xvii:11, 4). Not long before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, 20,000 Idumæans were called in to the defense of the city by the Zealots; but both parties gave themselves up to rapine and murder (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iv:4, 5; vi:1; vii:8, 1).

(11) Last Mention of the Edomites. This is the last mention made of the Edomites in history. The author of a work on Job, once ascribed to Origen, says that their name and language had perished, and that, like the Ammonites and Moabites, they had all become Arabs. In the second century Ptolemy limits the name Idumæa to the country west of the Jordan.

But while, during the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, the Edomites had thus been extending their territory to the northwest, they were themselves supplanted in the southern part of their native region by the Nabathæans, the descendants of Ishmael's eldest son, and to the article NEBAIOTH, we must refer the reader for the subsequent history of the land of Edom.

(12) Scene of the Book of Job. Could the scene of the book of Job be with certainty fixed in Idumæa, we should then possess much curious and valuable information respecting both the country and people soon after it had been colonized by the descendants of Esau (see Mason Good, Wemyss, and others upon Job). But all that we learn directly of the ancient Edomites from the historical books of Scripture represents them as not, indeed, neglecting agriculture or trade (Num. xx:17), yet, on the whole, as a warlike and predatory race, who, according to the prediction of their progenitor Isaac, 'lived by their sword.' The situation of the country afforded peculiar facilities for commerce, which seems to have been prosecuted from a very early period. 'Bordering,' says Volney, 'upon Arabia on the east and south, and Egypt on the southwest and forming, from north to south, the most commodious channel of communication between Jerusalem and her dependencies on the Red Sea, through the continuous valleys of El-Ghor and El-Araba, Idumæa may be said to have long formed the emporium of the commerce of the East.' The era of its greatest prosperity was after the Nabathæans had become masters of the country and founded the kingdom of Arabia Petræa, of which the renowned metropolis was Petra.

(13) Religion and Prophecy. The religion of the early Edomites was, perhaps, comparatively pure; but in process of time they embraced idolatry; in 2 Chron. xxv:20, we read of the 'gods of Edom,' one of whom, according to Josephus (Antiq. xv:7, 9) was called Kotzé. With respect to the striking fulfillment of the prophetic denunciations upon Edom, we need only refer the reader to the well-known work of Keith, who frequently errs, however, in straining the sense of prophecy beyond its legitimate import, as well as in seeking out too literally minute an accomplishment.

(14) Modern Knowledge of the Land of Esau. From the era of the Crusades down to the present century the land of Esau was, to Europeans, a terra incognita. Its situation was laid down in the best maps more than a hundred miles from the true position, and as if lying in a direction where it is now known there is nothing but a vast expanse of desert. Volney had his attention drawn toward it when at Gaza, by the vague reports of the Arabs, and in 1807 the unfortunate Seetzen penetrated a certain way into the country, and heard of the wonders of the Wady Mûsa; but the first modern traveler who 'passed through the land of Edom' was Burekhardt, in the year 1812. And it has been well remarked by Dr. Robinson (Amer. Bib. Reposit. vol. iii. p. 250), that 'had he accomplished nothing but his researches in these regions, his journey would have been worth all the labor and cost expended on it, although his discoveries thus shed their strongest light upon subjects which were not comprehended in the plan or purpose either of himself or his employers.' Burekhardt entered Idumæa from the north, and in the year 1818 he was followed in the same direction by Messrs. Legh, Bankes, Irby and Mangles. In 1828 Laborde and Linant found access from the south; and since then it has been visited and described by so many that the names of its localities have become familiar as household words.

(15) Present Condition. It is at present occupied by various tribes of Bedouin Arabs. The chief tribe in the Jebal is the Hejaya, with a branch of the Kaabineh, while in esh-Sherah they are all of the numerous and powerful tribe of the Hawaitat, with a few independent allies. The Bedouins in Idumæa have of late years been partially subject to the Pasha of Egypt, paying an annual tribute which in the case of the Beni Sukhr, is one camel for two tents. The fellahin, or peasants, are half Bedouin, inhabiting the few villages, but dwelling also in tents; they, too, pay tribute to the Egyptian government, and furnish supplies of grain.

Among the localities connected with Edom which are mentioned in the Scripture may be noticed Dinhabah, Bozrah, Theman, Maon (now Maan), Kadesh-barnea (which Robinson identifies with el-Weibeh in the Wady el-Jeib), Zephath (which he supposes to be the pass of Es-Sufah), Elath, and Ezion-geber, etc.; but the most celebrated place in all the region was the chief city, Selah or Petra, for a description of which the reader is referred to the latter head. (See PETRA.)

3. Physical Geography. The limit of the wanderings of the Israelites in the desert was the brook Zered, after crossing which they found themselves in the territory of Moab (Deut. ii:13-18). This brook is supposed to be identical with the Wady-el-Ahsy, which, rising near the Castle el-Ahsy, on the route to Mecca of the Syrian caravan upon the high eastern desert, penetrates through the whole chain of mountains to near the southeast corner of the Dead Sea. It was thus the southern border of Moab and the northern of Edom, whence the latter region extended southwards as far as to Elath on the Red Sea. The valley which runs between the two seas consists first of El-Ghor, which is comparatively low, but gradually rises into the more elevated plain of El-Arabah to the south. The country lying east of this great valley is the land of Idumæa. It is a mountain tract, consisting at the base of low hills of limestone or argillaceous rock, then lofty mountains of porphyry forming the body of the mountain; above these, sandstone broken up into irregular ridges and grotesque groups of cliffs; and again farther back, and higher than all, long elevated ridges of limestone without precipices. East of all these stretches off indefinitely the high plateau of the great eastern desert. The whole breadth of the mountainous tract between the Arabah and the eastern desert does not exceed fifteen or twenty geographical miles. Of these mountains the most remarkable is Mount Hor, near the Wady Mûsa. (See HOR, MOUNT.) While the mountains on the west of the Arabah, though less elevated, are wholly barren, those of Idumæa seem to enjoy a sufficiency of rain, and are covered with tufts of herbs and occasional trees. The wadies, too, are full of trees and shrubs and flowers, while the eastern and higher parts are extensively cultivated, and yield good crops.

This mountainous region is at present divided into two districts. The northern bears the name of Jebâl, i. e., 'The Mountain,' the Gebal of the Hebrews (Ps. lxxxiii:8), and the Gebalene of the Greeks and Romans. Commencing at Wady el-Ahsy, it terminates, according to Burekhardt, at Wady el Ghuweir, the largest place in it being Tufleli, perhaps the Tophel of Deut. i:1. The southern district is esh-Sherah, extending as far as Akabah, and including Shôbak, Wady Mûsa, Maan, etc. Burckhardt mentions a third district, Jebal Hema; but Robinson says that, though there is a sandy tract, el-Hismah, with mountains around it, on the east of Akabah, it does not constitute a separate division. IDUMEA (îd'u-mē'â), another form of IDUMÆA (which see).

IEZER (î-ē'zēr). See ABIEZER.

IEZERITE. See ABIEZERITE.

IGAL (î'gal), (Heb. יגל, yig-aw'el, avenger).

1. Son of Joseph, and the representative of the tribe of Issachar among the spies sent to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii:7; xiv:37), B. C. 1657.

2. Son of Nathan of Zobah and one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii:36), B. C. 1046. The name appears as Joel (1 Chron. xi:38), which Kennicott regards as more likely to be correct.

3. Son of Shemaiah, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:22), B. C. before 406.

IGDALIAH (îg'da-lî'ah), (Heb. יגדליהו, yig-dal-yaw'ho, magnified of Jah, great is Jehovah), the father of Hanan, in whose chamber Jeremiah proposed the test of the temperance of the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv:4), B. C. before 606.

IGEAL (îg'e-äl), (Heb. יגאל, yig'awl, avenger, 1 Chron. iii:22). See IGAL, 3.

IGNORANCE (îg'nô-rans), (Heb. שווא, shaw-gaw', Lev. iv:2, 6), the want of knowledge or instruction.

It is often used to denote illiteracy. The causes of ignorance are chiefly three: (1) Want of ideas; (2) want of a discoverable connection between the ideas we have; (3) want of tracing and examining our ideas. As it respects religion, ignorance has been distinguished into three sorts:—1. An invincible ignorance, in which the will has no part (Acts xvii:30). It is an insult upon justice to suppose it will punish men because they were ignorant of things which they were physically incapable of knowing. 2. There is a willful and obstinate ignorance; such an ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates a man's crimes (Acts iii:17). 3. A sort of voluntary ignorance, which is neither entirely willful, nor entirely invincible; as when a man has the means of knowledge, and does not use them (Eph. iv:18). (See SIN.)

Specific Scripture Allusions. Heathen are "ignorant;" destitute of the true knowledge of God (Acts xvii:23). Wicked teachers are "ignorant;" they know not what they ought to teach others (Is. lvi:10). Paul sinned "ignorantly" against Christ before his conversion, not knowing the truth of the Christian religion (1 Tim. i:13). Peter and John were "ignorant;" that is, not trained up in the schools of polite learning (Acts iv:13).

I. H. S. There are three interpretations of this mystic title. One is that the letters are initials of the words "In Hoc Signo" 'in this sign,' which appeared on the luminous cross supposed to have been miraculously displayed before the army of Constantine.

Another is that they are the initials of the words Jesus Hominum Salvator, 'Jesus Savior of Men.'

The third is that they are the first three letters of the Greek word ΙΗΣΟΥΣ, I-ay-sous, Jesus. This last explanation is upheld by the Cambridge Camden Society, in a work called, Argument for the Greek Origin of the Monogram I. H. S. (Lond. 1841).

IIM (î'im), (Heb. יימ, ee-yeem', ruins), a short form of IJE-ABARIM.

IJE-ABARIM (î'je-âb'a-rîm), (Heb. יימ אבארם, ee-yay'haw-ab-aw-recem', ruins of Abarim).

1. The forty-seventh station of the Israelites in the wilderness, "in the borders of Moab" (Num. xxxiii:44, 45).

2. A city in the south of Judah, probably within the territory of Simeon (Josh. xv:29; Num. xxi:11). Site unknown.

IJON (î'jon), (Heb. יון, ee-yone', ruin), a city of northern Palestine, captured in Naphtali by Benhadad of Syria (1 Kings xv:20; 2 Chron. xvi:4), and later by Tiglath-pileser of Assyria (2 Kings xv:29).

Robinson identifies it with Tell Dibbin (Bibl. Res. iii:375), a hill 110 feet high, on the eastern border of Merj Ayûn, meadow of springs, which seems to preserve a trace of the old name. The site is about eight miles north-northwest of Banias.

IKKESH (îk'kesh), (Heb. יקש, ik-kashe', perverse), father of Ira the Tekoite, of one of David's famous guard, and captain of the sixth regiment of his army (2 Sam. xxiii:26; 1 Chron. xi:28; xxvii:9), before B. C. 1046.

ILAI (î'lâi), (Heb. ילי, ee-lah'ee, supreme), an Ahohite, and one of David's guard (1 Chron. xi:29).

He is called Zalmon in the parallel lists (2 Sam. xxiii:28), B. C. 1046.

ILL-FAVORED (îl'fâ'vêrd), (Heb. רח, rah, bad, injured).

"And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill favored and leanfleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river" (Gen. xli:3).

ILLUMINATED (îl-lû'mî-nâ'têd), (Gr. φωτισω, fo-tid'zo, to give light), endowed with the saving knowledge of Christ and divine things (Heb. x:32).

It was used in the early Christian church to denote baptized persons.

ILLYRICUM (îl-lÿr'i-kûm), (Gr. Ἰλλυρικόν, il-loo-ree-kon', lit. Illyrian; derivation unknown), a country lying to the northwest of Macedonia, and answering nearly to that which is at present called Dalmatia; by which name indeed the southern part of Illyricum itself was known.

It lies on the east of the gulf of Venice, and is about 480 miles in length and 120 in breadth. It has Austria and part of Hungary on the north, Mœsia or Servia on the east, and part of Macedonia on the south. Counting from northwest to southeast, it was divided into Sclavonia, Bosnia, Dalmatia, and Albania; but sometimes it was taken in a more extended sense. It is traversed from northwest to southeast by the Noric, Carnic, and Julian Alps, constituting the most easterly portion of the great Alpine chain. Along the coast are excellent harbors and numerous islands. The Illyrian race inhabiting the region were wild mountaineers, who were a thorn in the side of their neighbors, the Macedonians; and, when they descended to the seacoast, they so practiced piracy as to bring them into collision with the Romans, who, in B. C. 229, began to conquer them, and finally made Illyricum, or Illyria, a province of the empire. It was to Illyricum that St. Paul informs Timothy that Titus had gone (2 Tim. iv:10). Paul himself preached the Gospel in Illyricum, which was at that time a province of the Roman Empire (Rom. xv:19). (Cramer, Ancient Greece; Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog.)

IMAGE (im'áj), (Heb. plural תְּרַפְּלִים, ter-aw-feme', teraphim). Image is often taken for a statue, figure, or idol.

The Book of Wisdom, speaking of the causes of idolatry, says that a father, afflicted for the death of his son, made an image of him, to which he paid divine honors. We read (Rev. xiii:14, 15) that God permitted the beast to seduce men, whom it commanded to make an image of the beast, which became living and animated; and that all who refused to adore it were put to death. The images mentioned in Lev. xxvi:30; Is. xxvii:9, were, according to rabbi Solomon, idols exposed to the sun, on the tops of houses. Abenezra says they were portable chapels or temples, in the form of chariots, in honor of the sun. (See IDOL.)

IMAGE OF GOD (im'áj), (Heb. תְּשֵׁבֶלֶם, tseh'lem, resemblance; accompanied in Gen. i:26; v:1 by דְמוּתוֹ, dem-ooth', "likeness").

(1) Man. Man was made in the "image" of God; he resembled God in the spiritual and immortal nature of his soul, and in his true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, and in his dominion over the creature (Gen. i:26, 27).

(2) Christ. Christ is the "image of the invisible God;" as God's son, he has the same nature as his Father, and resembles him in power; and in his person, God-man, and mediatorial office, he is a bright representation of all the perfections of God (Heb. i:3; Col. i:13). (See JESUS CHRIST.)

We are born in the "image" of Adam; like him in our natural form, and in our rebellion against God (Gen. v:3); and we bear the "image" of Christ, and are renewed after it, when our nature is changed, and we are therein made like God in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, holiness, and every other grace (1 Cor. xv:49; Col. iii:10).

IMAGERY (im'áj-rÿ), (Heb. מַסְכֵּת, mas-keeth', an image, Lev. xxvi:1; picture, Num. xxxiii:52).

"The chambers of his imagery" is an expression found in Ezek. viii:12, in the description given by the prophet of the vision shown him of the Temple. It probably refers to the idol worship introduced from Egypt and the East. The whole passage (verses 7-12) represents a scene of idolatrous worship which was disclosed to the prophet as through a secret door of entrance (verses 7, 8). On the walls of the apartment were portrayed "every form of creeping thing and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel" (verse 10, etc.). A similar chamber of imagery is referred to in Ezek. xxiii:14: "Where she saw men portrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermilion," etc. Remains found in the ruins of Nineveh and in cities in Egypt illustrate the practices mentioned by the prophet.

IMAGE WORSHIP (im'áj wûr'shÿp). See IDOL; IDOLATRY.

IMAGINATION (Im-áj'ÿ-nā'shün), (Heb. שְׂרָרִית, sher-ee-rooth', firmness, generally in a bad sense, i. e., hardness of heart, Deut. xxix:19; often in Jeremiah as in iii:17; יָצַר, yay'tser, form, conception, Gen. vi:5; viii:21; Deut. xxxi:21, etc.; Gr. διαλογισμός, dee-al-og-is-mos', deliberating with one's self (Rom. i:21); διάνοια, dee-an'oy-ah, way of thinking (Luke i:51)).

Imagination is that faculty or power of the mind by which it conceives and forms ideal pictures of things communicated to it by the organs of sense; the power to create or reproduce an object of sense previously perceived; invention as in painting, sculpture, architecture, new machinery, landscape gardening, decorating, etc.

It is used of corrupt reasonings in 2 Cor. x:5.

IMLA (im'lá), (Heb. מְלֵא, yeem-law', filled, full, or fulfiller), father, or forefather, of Micaiah, the prophet, who ironically foretold Ahab and Jehoshaphat of the defeat of Israel and Judah before their fatal expedition to Ramoth-gilead (2 Chron. xviii:7, 8), B. C. before 896.

IMLAH (im'lah), (Heb. מְלֵאָה, yeem-lah', God doth fill, 1 Kings xxii:8, 9). See IMLA.

IMMANUEL (im-mán'ū-el), (Heb. אֱמַנּוּאֵל, im-maw-noo-ale'; Sept. Ἐμμανουήλ, em-man-oo-ale'), or EMMANUEL.

This word, meaning 'God with us,' occurs in the celebrated verse of Isaiah (vii:14), 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel.' In forty-three MSS. and thirty-nine printed editions the word is given in the separate form אֱמַנּוּ im-maw-noo ale immanu el, but, as Dr. Henderson remarks, 'in the orthography of all compound names, the MSS. and editions widely differ.' In the name itself there is no difficulty; but the verse, as a whole, has been variously interpreted. From the manner in which the word God, and even Jehovah, is used in the composition of Hebrew names, there is no such peculiarity in that of Immanuel as in itself requires us to understand that he who bore it must be in fact God. Indeed, it is used as a proper name among the Jews at this day. This high sense has, however, been assigned to it in consequence of the application of the whole verse, by the Evangelist Matthew (i:23), to our Divine Savior. Even if this reference did not exist, the history of the Nativity would irresistibly lead us to the conclusion that the verse—whatever may have been its intermediate signification—had an ultimate reference to Christ.

The state of opinion on this subject has been thus fairly summed up by Dr. Henderson, in his note on the text: 'This verse has long been a subject of dispute between Jews and professedly Christian writers, and among the latter mutually. While the former reject its application to the Messiah altogether—the earlier rabbins explaining it of the queen of Ahaz and the birth of his son Hezekiah, and the later, as Kimchi and Abarbanel, of the prophet's own wife—the great body of Christian interpreters have held it to be directly and exclusively in prophecy of our Savior, and have considered themselves fully borne out by the inspired testimony of the Evangelist Matthew. Others, however, have departed from this construction of the passage, and have invented or adopted various hypotheses in support of such dissent. Grotius, Faber, Isenbiehl, Hezel, Bolten, Fritsche, Pluschke, Gesenius, and Hitzig, suppose either the then present or a future wife of Isaiah to be the עַלְמָה, al-maw' (rendered "virgin"), referred to. Eichhorn, Paulus, Hensler and Ammon are of opinion that the prophet had nothing more in view than an ideal virgin, and that both she and her son are merely imaginary personages, introduced for the purpose of prophetic illustration. Bauer, Cube, Steudel, and some others, think that the prophet pointed to a young woman in the presence of the king and his courtiers. A fourth class, among whom are Richard Simon, Lowth, Koppe, Dathe, Williams, Von Meyer, Ols-hausen, and Dr. J. Pye Smith, admit the hypoth-esis of a double sense; one, in which the words apply primarily to some female living in the time of the prophet, and her giving birth to a son ac-cording to the ordinary laws of nature, or, as Dathe holds, to some virgin, who at that time should miraculously conceive; and the other, in which they received a secondary and plenary ful-fillment in the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ.'

IMMATERIALITY (im'mâ-tē'rī-āl'ī-tÿ), is predicated of mind, to denote that as a substance it is different from matter.

Spirituality is the positive expression of the same idea. Simplicity is also used in the same sense. Matter is made up of parts into which it can be resolved. Mind is simple and has no parts, and so cannot be dissolved. The materiality of the soul was maintained by Tertullian, Arnobius, and others, during the first three centuries. At the end of the fourth, the immateriality of the soul was professed by Augustine, Nemesius, and Mamertus Claudianus. This quality of immateriality is predicated of God. The Absolute Being is one with itself and cannot be divided. He is free from the limitations to which matter is subject, i. e. from the limits of time and space. (See article on God.)

IMMER (im'mer), (Heb. יָמַר, im-mare', talka-tive).

1. Head of the sixteenth monthly course in sacerdotal division of David (1 Chron. xxiv:14). B. C. 1014.

2. Father of that Pashur who basely misused the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xx:1). B. C. before 607.

3. The founder of a family which returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem to the number of 1052 (Neh. vii:40; Ezr. ii:37). Perhaps identical with the father of Meshillemoth (Neh. xi:13), and Meshillemith (1 Chron. ix:12), whose descendants were conspicuous in the affairs of Jerusalem after the captivity. He is doubtless the same with the one whose descendants put away their foreign wives (Ezra x:20), B. C. before 536. By some he is identified with the two preceding.

4. One of those returning with Zerubbabel from Babylon, but who could not prove his Israelitish descent (Ezra ii:59; Neh. vii:61), B. C. 536. The name may be that of a place in Babylon from which some of those afterwards named came.

5. The father of Zadok, who rebuilt a part of the wall of Jerusalem. Perhaps the same as 3 (Neh. iii:29). B. C. before 446.

IMMORTALITY (im-mör-täl'ī-tÿ). The quality of never ceasing to live or exist; exemption from death and annihilation; life destined to endure without end.

Immortality is one of the doctrines of natu-ral religion. At death the body dies, and is dis-solved into its elements. The soul being dis-tinct from the body, is not affected by the dis-solution of the body. How long, or in what state it may survive after the death of the body, is not intimated by the term immortality. But the argu-ments to prove that the soul survives the body, all go to favor the belief that it will live forever.

See Plato, Phædon; Porteus, Sermons; Sher-lock, On the Immortality of the Soul; Watson, Inti-mations of a Future State; Bakewell, Evidence of a Future State; Autenrieth, On Man, and His Hope of Immortality, Tübingen, 1815; Flenning, Vocab. of Phil.

God is "immortal," and only hath "immortal-ity;" he hath life in and of himself, and is in-finitely secure against death, hurt, or ruin of any kind (1 Tim. i:17; vi:16). The eternal blessed-ness of the saints is called "immortality;" it can never cease, and is free from such pain, corruption, or unsightliness, as attends death (Rom. ii:7); and it is brought to light, that is, more clearly discovered by the gospel dispensation (2 Tim. i:10).

Compare our Savior's teachings regarding a future deathless life, both by express declara-tion and as illustrated by parables (Matt. v:12; viii:11, 12; xii:32; xiii:36, 43; xviii:8, 9; xxii:11-13; xxv:1-13, 31-46; Mark viii:35-37; Luke xii:4, 5; xiii:24-29; xvi:19-31; xviii:29, 30; John iii:16; v:39, 40; vi:47-58; x:28; xi:25; xiv:1-6, etc.).

Our mortal body shall put on "immortality," when it shall gloriously rise from the dead, and be no more subject to any tendency towards dissolu-tion or wasting (1 Cor. xv:53).

In the Old Testament the doctrine is taught but not so clearly as in the New. The sixteenth psalm, especially as connected with the apostolic comments (Acts ii:27; xiii:35) is a case in point. (See also Ps. xvii:15; Is. xxvi:19; Dan. xii:2, 3.)

IMMUTABILITY (im-mū'tā-bil'ī-tÿ), is the ab-sence or impossibility of change.

It is applied to the Supreme Being to denote that there can be no inconstancy in his character or government. It was argued for by the heathen. (See Bishop Wilkins, Natural Religion.) The full conception, however, of God's unchangeable-ness is to be derived only from the Scriptures, and the sublimity of the thought contained in them is one of the indications of Divine revelation (see Van Oosterzee's Christ. Dogmatics, vol. i, p. 257, sq.; Watson's Institutes, vol. i, 398; Knapp's Theology; Dorner, and other writers on System-atic Theology). (See article on God.)

IMNA (im'nâ), (Heb. יִמְנָא, yim-naw', probably God doth restrain), son of Helem, a descendant of Asher, and one of the chiefs of the tribe (1 Chron. vii:35), B. C. about 1618.

IMNAH (im'nah), (Heb. יִמְנָה, yim-naw', prob-ably God doth restrain).

1. Eldest son of Asher, and founder of a family by his own name (1 Chron. vii:39), B. C. 1874.

2. The father of Kore, the Levite, who had charge of the east gate of the Temple, and the freewill offerings under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:14), B. C. 726.

IMPART (im-pärt'), (Gr. μεταδίδωμι, met-ad-id'-o-mee, Luke iii:11; Rom. i:11), to supply or com-municate.

To bestow of one's fullness on others (Luke iii: 11). The apostles were willing to "impart their souls," spending their strength, exerting their skill, and exposing their life, to edify their hearers (2 Thess. ii:8).

IMPEDIMENT (im-pëd'ī-ment), (Gr. μογιάλος, mog-il-a'os), in speech, something which hinders one from speaking plainly, or which causes him to stutter or stammer (Mark vii:32).

IMPLEAD (im-plëd'), (Gr. ἐγκαλέω, eng-kal-eh'o, Acts xix:38), a law term, meaning to accuse or in-dict.

It is the city-councilor who speaks in that pas-sage and points out to the Ephesians the lawful remedy for their grievances as opposed to one un-lawful.

IMPORTUNITY (im'pör-tü'nĭ-tÿ), (Gr. ἀνάλθεια, an-ah-ee'thĕ-ah, impudence, shamelessness), spoken of an importunate man, persisting in his entreaties (Luke xi:8; comp. Luke xviii:1; 1 Thess. v:17).

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (im'pō-zis'b'ūn), an ecclesiastical action, by which a bishop lays his hand on the head of a person in ordination, in confirmation, or in uttering a blessing.

This practice is also usually observed by the different churches at the ordination of their ministers; when the clergymen present place their hands on the head of him whom they are ordaining, while one of them prays for a blessing on him, and on his future labors. There is not full agreement, however, as to the propriety of this ceremony. Some suppose it to be confined to those who received extraordinary gifts in the primitive times; others think it ought to be retained, as it was an ancient practice used where no extraordinary gifts were conveyed (Gen. xlviii:14; Matt. xix:15). They do not suppose it to be of such an important and essential nature, that the validity and usefulness of a man's future ministry depend upon it in any degree.

Imposition of hands was a Jewish ceremony, introduced not by any Divine authority, but by custom; it being the practice among those people, whenever they pray to God for any person, to lay their hands on his head. Our Savior observed the same custom both when he conferred his blessing on children and when he healed the sick, adding prayer to the ceremony. The apostles, likewise, laid hands on those upon whom they bestowed the Holy Ghost. The priests observed the same custom when any one was received into their body. And the apostles themselves underwent the imposition of hands afresh every time they entered upon any new design. In the ancient church, imposition of hands was even practiced on persons when they married, which custom the Abyssinians still observe.

IMPOSSIBLE (im-pōs'si'b'l), what cannot be done.

In respect of God's nature, it is "impossible" for him to lie, or deny himself (Heb. vi:19; Tit. i:2). In respect of his power, nothing good is "impossible" to him (Luke i:37; xvii:29).

IMPOTENT (im'pō-tent), (Lat. impotens), signifies "strengthless," "sick," "infirm." It is the rendering of ἀσθενῶν, as-then-one', in John v:3, and in Acts iv:9; but of ἀδύνατος, ad-oo'nat-os, in Acts xiv:8.

IMPRECATION (im-prē'kā-shūn). See CURSE.

IMPRECATORY PSALMS. See PSALMS.

IMPUDENCY (im'pū-den-sy'), a word found in the caption of Is., ch. iii. The old form of impudent, Lat. impudentia.

IMPURITY (im-pū'rī-ty'). See UNCLEANNESS.

IMPUTATION (im-pū-tā'shūn), (Heb. נָשַׁב, soom; or נָשַׁב, seem; Gr. λογίζομαι, log-id'zom-ahce).

The verb impute occurs fifteen times in the Authorized Version; the noun imputation not at all. The Calvinistic doctrine is that Adam's sin of disobedience in Paradise is imputed to all his natural descendants, making each person who comes into the world chargeable with the guilt of Original Sin. On the other hand, God justifies those effectually called, not by counting faith itself, or any other act of obedience, as merit, but by imputing to them as righteousness the obedience and satisfaction rendered by Christ (Ency. Dict.) As Brown states it, we have "righteousness without works imputed" to us, when the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ in our stead are legally reckoned to the account of us guilty sinners, to render us righteous in law before God as a judge (Rom. iv:6-11). Sin is "imputed," when one is charged with it, with a view to his suffering punishment for it (2 Sam.

xix:19; Lev. xvii:5); and the "not imputing" it, imports the free and full forgiveness of it (Rom. v:13). In order to warrant such "imputation," the actor and the one to whom it is imputed must be one, either really or legally. The Chaldean king "imputed" his power to his god, accounted his idol to have assisted him in conquering the nations (Hab. i:11).

The Arminian view denies the Calvinistic idea of imputation, but fully recognizes the benefits which accrue to the believer from Christ's righteousness. It holds firmly to the imputation of faith for righteousness (Rom. iii:21; iv:22). Hodge Systematic Theol., vol. ii, 192, sq.; Miner Raymond, Systematic Theol., vol. ii, 106, 336, sq.)

IMRAH (im'rah), (Heb. יִמְרָה, yim-raw', stubborn, refractory).

Son of Zophab, a descendant of Asher, and one of the chiefs of the tribe (1 Chron. vii:36), B. C. after 1612.

IMRI (im'ri), (Heb. יִמְרִי, im-ree', eloquently).

1. A man of Judah, son of Bani, of the family of Pharez (1 Chron. ix:4), B. C. ante 536.

2. Father or forefather of Zaccur, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii:2), B. C. before 446.

INABILITY (in-à-bil'ty'), want of power sufficient for the performance of any particular action or design.

It has been divided into natural and moral. We are said to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we wish, because of some impeding defect or obstacle that is extrinsic to the will, either in the understanding, constitution of the body, or external objects. Moral inability consists not in any of these things, but either in the want of inclination, or the strength of a contrary inclination; or the want of sufficient motives in view to induce and excite the act of the will, or the strength of apparent motives to the contrary. It must not, however, be forgotten, that moral inability or disinclination is no excuse for our omission of duty, though want of natural faculties or necessary means would. That God may command though man has not a present moral ability to perform, is evident, if we consider (1) That man once had a power to do whatsoever God would command him, he had a power to cleave to God. (2) That God did not deprive man of his ability. (3) Therefore God's right of commanding, and man's obligation of returning and cleaving to God, remains firm. And, again, man's inability is not an excuse for wrongdoing or the failure to do right, for God's grace has been promised for ability (Phil. iv:13: "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me.")

INCANTATION (in-kān-tā'shūn). See MAGIC.

INCARNATION (in'kār-nā'shūn), (Lat. in caro, "flesh").

The earth life of the Christ must begin with the incarnation as the all-important point which succeeded the Kenosis or voluntary renunciation of the divine functions and prerogatives.

"What think ye of Christ?" demanded the Master, and the question has lost none of its importance during the ages that are gone. This is the keynote of the Christian faith, and the view which we entertain of him must form the basis of our attitude towards all Biblical truth.

The prophecies of the Old Testament point to his work as well as his birth, to his mission as well as his coming; but our theme covers only the beginning of this great historical life.

(1) Conception. Matthew and Luke give in concise and simple language the announcement which the angel made to Mary, to the effect that she should, while yet a virgin, conceive and bring forth a son. "And thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. i:21).

These evangelists also record the fulfillment of the angel's prophecy, and give an account of the leading facts connected with this wonderful birth. Paul endorses the statements of both Matthew and Luke, to the effect that the Son of God was "made of a woman" (γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικός).

"When the fullness of time was come God sent forth his son made of a woman, made under the law, that ye might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv:4-5).

Just how this virginal conception and birth were accomplished we do not know. All that we can say is that from a human standpoint it is miraculous. From the Divine point of view there are no miracles.

If we thus were all the mystery which is beyond our ken, we might have some excuse for doubting it, but the constantly recurring phenomenon of conception, which is the ultimate fact of biology, is in some ways still unexplained.

It is evident, however, that some power brought man into existence from the great unknown, for man is here, and whatever may have been the process employed, or the time occupied, there must have been some point where there was no parent. It is only fair to presume that the Power which produced humanity without the aid of either parent, could, if he chose, produce another man through the agency of the mother alone.

If we cannot fully explain processes which are constantly taking place around us, we may well shrink from the elucidation of a matter which pertains to the higher order of things. The sum of our knowledge on this subject is contained in the words: "He was conceived of the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary."

(2) The Son of God. The Son of God became the son of man by coming into the world as a helpless babe, the heir of human poverty and human pain: "He took not on himself the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham" (Heb. ii:16). Nevertheless, he came of royal stock, both Mary and his reputed father being descendants of King David, for the prophets had foretold that he should belong to the royal line and be born in the city of Bethlehem. "Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor" (2 Cor. viii:9) and lay in the manger over which stood "the star in the East" (Luke ii:7, 12, 16).

The next phase of the subject pertains to the mission of the Son who came from the Father: "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (John vi:38).

But there is no contradiction here, no conflict between the will of the Father and of the Son, for he saith: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me and to finish his work" (John iv:34). The Father sends, the Son comes and bears the power of the Father's name: "I am come in my Father's name" (John v:43).

He is "the bread of heaven," who giveth life unto the world. "I proceeded and came forth from God" (John viii:42). And, again, "I came forth from the Father and am come into the world" (John xvii:28).

(3) The Logos. In the prologue to his Gospel, John affirms both the pre-existence and the divinity of the "Word" or "Logos." "In the beginning was the Logos, and the Logos was Divine."

It was this Divine Logos who came out of the pre-existent state of glory with the Father into the state of dwelling with man (John xvii:5).

Here again we are at a loss to understand the method of transition, but the text teaches that the Son had glory with the Father "before the world was." "The Logos was made flesh and dwelt among us" (John i:14).

It is here distinctly asserted that the Divine Logos who was "with God" assumed the nature of man and took up his abode with humanity.

The statement of John that the Logos was made flesh is his endorsement of the human birth of Jesus the Messiah. Matthew and Luke record only the historical fact, but John goes back of this and represents the conception and birth as being the incarnation of the pre-existent Logos.

(4) Fleshly Nature. Paul teaches that this form which the Logos assumed was sinful flesh—flesh which, like our own, is subject to the rule of sin: "For what the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin (or by a sacrifice for sin) condemned sin in the flesh" (Rom. viii:3).

We have seen, therefore, that the Apostle teaches that he who knew no sin was made sin for our sakes; that he redeemed us from the curse by becoming the curse in our stead; that he was "made of woman"; that, though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; that God spared not his only Son, but delivered him up for us all; that he who was crucified on Calvary, yet lives to make intercession for us: "For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God" (2 Cor. xiii:4). (See also 2 Cor. v:21; viii:4, 9; Gal. iii:13; iv:4; Phil. ii:8.)

The general teaching of these texts is in harmony with all the others, and we find that St. Paul conceives of the incarnation as implying a self-emptying of the equality with God, and the assumption of the human nature.

(5) New Testament Teaching. We have, then, the New Testament doctrine of the incarnation under five heads: (1) The Son of God took upon himself the nature of man. "And was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii:7, 8). (2) He was sent by the Father. "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin" (2 Cor. v:21). (3) The coming out of a pre-existent state of glory into a condition in which "The Son of man hath not where to lay his head" (Matt. viii:20). (4) The manifestation in the flesh: "God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" (1 Tim. ii:16). (5) The Kenosis or self-emptying of the Logos in becoming incarnate. "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii:6, 7).

The history of the Nazarene has shown us that the Son of God who was also the Son of man, shared with us both the physical and mental life.

The Gospels everywhere bear witness to his physical likeness, and show that he felt the bodily weakness of humanity. He was "an hungered," and he asked the woman of Samaria for a drink of water. He was weary, sleeping in the boat even in the midst of the storm. His heart was human in its affections. He loved the young ruler who came to him to inquire the way of life. He loved Lazarus and wept over his grave. His great heart went out in pity for the hungry crowds that waited on his teaching. He felt the throb of righteous indignation, and severely denounced the Scribes and Pharisees. He never concealed his contempt for hypocrisy, and he even drove the money changers out of the temple with a scourge of small cords.

He is represented as "sighing" or "groaning" and "troubled in spirit" (Mark viii:12).

He suffered deeply in the garden and agonized with more than physical pain on Calvary, and even now while we glory in the cross of Christ, and glory in our risen Lord, we still have a great High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need" (Heb. iv:14-16). (See JESUS CHRIST; KENOSIS.)

INCENSE (in'sens), (Hebrew usually קטורת, ket-o'reth).

A perfume which gives forth its fragrance by burning, and, in particular, that perfume which was burnt upon the altar of incense. (See ALTAR; CENSER). Indeed the burning of incense seems to have been considered among the Hebrews so much of an act of worship or sacred offering, that we read not of any other use of incense than this among them. Nor among the Egyptians do we discover any trace of burnt perfume but in sacerdotal use; but in the Persian sculptures we see incense burnt before the king. The prohibition of the Hebrews to make any perfume for private use—"to smell to"—like that prepared for the altar, merely implies, we apprehend, that the sacred incense had a peculiarly rich fragrance before being burnt, which was forbidden to be imitated in common perfumes.

Incense is denoted by the words קטורת, ket-tare' (Exod. xxx:1; Jer. xlv:21); and קטורת, ket-o'reth (Exod. xxx:1; xxxi:11; Ezek. xvi:18); all of which are equally from the root קטרת, kaw-tor', which in Pihel signifies generally to raise an odor by burning, and in the verbal form it is applied not only to the offering of incense, but also of sacrifices, the smoke or effluvium of which is regarded as an acceptable or sweet odor to God. Indeed, the word which denotes an incense of spices in Exod. xxx:1 describes an incense of fat in Ps. lxxvi:15.

The ingredients of the sacred incense are enumerated with great precision in Exod. xxx: 34, 35. 'Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte (שֶׁחַח, shekh-ay' leth, netaph), and onycha and galbanum, (חֶלְבֵן-אֲוִי, khel-ben-aw') these sweet spices with pure frankincense (לֵב־נָוִי, leb-o-naw'); of each shall there be a like weight. And thou shalt make of it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy.' The further directions are, that this precious compound should be made or broken up into minute particles, and that it should be deposited, as a very holy thing, in the tabernacle 'before the testimony' (or ark). As the ingredients are so minutely specified, there was nothing to prevent wealthy persons from having a similar perfume for private use; this, therefore, was forbidden under pain of excommunication: 'Ye shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof; it shall be unto thee holy for the Lord. Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people' (Exod. xxx:37, 38).

According to Maimonides the use of incense was to prevent the stench which would otherwise have been occasioned by the number of beasts every day slaughtered in the sanctuary. God ordained that incense should be burned in it every morning and evening, and thereby rendered the odor of the sanctuary, and of the vestments of those that ministered exceedingly grateful.

Figurative. Incense was a symbol of prayer. It was offered at the time when the people were in the posture and act of prayer; and their orisons were supposed to be presented to God by the priest, and to ascend to Him in the smoke of odor of that fragrant offering. This beautiful idea of the incense frequently occurs in Scripture (comp. Ps. cxli:2; Mal. i:11; Acts x:4; Rev. v:8; viii:4).

By it was signified Christ's precious, powerful, and constant intercession within the veil, on the ground of his own righteousness, which renders us and our spiritual services acceptable to God (comp. Exod. xxx:34-38; Lev. xvi:12-14).

INCEST (in'sest), an unlawful conjunction of persons related within the degrees of kindred prohibited by God and the church.

In the beginning of the world, and even long after the deluge, marriages between near relations were allowed. God prohibits such alliances in Lev. xviii, and the degrees of consanguinity within which the prohibition applied are detailed in verses 6-18. The prohibition of incest and similar sensual abominations is introduced with a general warning as to the licentious customs of the Egyptians and Canaanites, and an exhortation to walk in the judgments and ordinances of Jehovah. Intercourse is forbidden (1) with a mother; (2) with a stepmother; (3) with a sister or half-sister; (4) with a grand-daughter, the daughter of either son or daughter; (5) with the daughter of a stepmother; (6) with an aunt, sister of either father or mother; (7) with the wife of an uncle on the father's side; (8) with a daughter-in-law; (9) with a sister-in-law, or brother's wife; (10) with a woman and her daughter, or a woman and her grand-daughter; (11) with the sister of a living wife.

Most civilized people have held incest as an abominable crime (see 1 Cor. v:1). Lot's incest with his two daughters can be palliated only by his ignorance, and the simplicity of his daughters (Gen. xix:31).

INCHANTMENTS (in-chant'ments). See WITCHCRAFT.

INCONTINENT (in-kön'ti-nent), (Gr. ἀκρασία, akras-ee'a, want of self-control), given to unchastity and intemperance (2 Tim. iii:3). Unable to refrain from desire of the lawful pleasures of marriage or from concupiscence (2 Cor. vii:5).

INCORPOREALITY OF GOD (in'kôr-pô'rê-äl'ti-tý), is his being without a body.

That God is incorporeal is evident; for (1) Materiality is incompatible with self-existence, and God, being self-existent, must be incorporeal. (2) If God were corporeal, he could not be present in any part of the world where body is; yet his presence is necessary for the support and motion of body. (3) A body cannot be in two places at the same time; yet he is everywhere, and fills heaven and earth. (4) A body is to be seen and felt, but God is invisible and impalpable (John i:18). (See IMMATERIALITY.)

INCORRUPTION (in-kör-rüp'shün), (Gr. ἀφθαρσία, af-thar-see'ah); in general, unchanging, ever enduring.

The body is to know no decay after the resurrection (1 Cor. xv:42, 50, 53, 54). In Rom. ii:7 and 2 Tim. i:10 the Greek word is rendered immortality, and in Eph. vi:24, sincerity, R. V. incorruptness. The crown of the saints is incorruptible (1 Cor. ix:25), also their "inheritance" (1 Pet. i:4).

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD (in'dē-pēnd'ens), is his existence in and of himself, without depending on any other.

His being and perfections are underived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creature. This attribute of independence belongs to all his perfections. (1) He is independent as to his knowledge. He does not receive ideas from any object out of himself, as intelligent creatures do (Is. lx:13, 14). (2) He is independent in power. As he receives strength from no one, so he does not act dependently on the will of the creature (Job xxxvi:23). (3) He is independent as to his holiness, hating sin necessarily, and not barely depending on some reasons out of himself inducing him thereto; for it is essential to the divine nature to be infinitely opposite to sin, and, therefore, to be independently holy. (4) He is independent as to his bounty and goodness. He communicates blessings not by constraint, but according to his sovereign will (Rom. ix:18). (See article on God.)

INDIA (in'dī-ā), (Heb. יִנְדִּיאַ, ho'doo).

This name occurs only in Esther i:1; viii:9, where the Persian king is described as reigning 'from India unto Ethiopia, over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces.' It is found again, however, in the Apocrypha, where India is mentioned among the countries which the Romans took from Antiochus and gave to Eumenes (1 Macc. viii:8). The occurrence of the name in this passage is suspicious. Luther substituted Ionia. At any rate Judas Maccabeus was misinformed if he was told that the Romans had taken India from Antiochus.

It is evident on the face of the above intimations, and indeed from all ancient history, that the country known as India in ancient times extended more to the west, and did not reach so far to the east—that is, was not known so far to the east—as the India of the moderns. When we read of ancient India, we must clearly not understand the whole of Hindostan, but chiefly the northern parts of it, or the countries between the Indus and the Ganges; although it is not necessary to assert that the rest of that peninsula, particularly its western coast, was then altogether unknown. It was from this quarter that the Persians and Greeks (to whom we are indebted for the earliest accounts of India) invaded the country; and this was consequently the region which first became generally known. The countries bordering on the Ganges continued to be involved in obscurity, the great kingdom of the Persians excepted, which, situated nearly above the modern Bengal, was dimly discernible. The nearer we approach the Indus, the more clear becomes our knowledge of the ancient geography of the country; and it follows that the districts of which at the present day we know the least, were anciently best known. Besides, the western and northern boundaries were not the same as at present. To the west, India was not then bounded by the river Indus, but by a chain of mountains which, under the name of Koh (whence the Grecian appellation of the Indian Caucasus), extended from Bactria to Makran, or Gedrosia, enclosing the kingdoms of Candahar and Cabul, the modern kingdom of Eastern Persia, or Afghanistan. These districts anciently formed part of India, as well as, further to the south, the less perfectly known countries of the Arabi and Haurs (the Arabitæ and Oritæ of Arrian, vi:21), bordering on Gedrosia. This western boundary continued at all times the same, and was removed to the Indus only in consequence of the victories of Nadir Shah.

Toward the north, ancient India overpassed not less its present limit. It comprehended the whole of the mountainous region above Cashmir, Baldakshan, Belur Land, the western boundary mountains of Little Bucharìa, or Little Thibet, and even the desert of Cobi, so far as it was known. The discovery of a passage by sea to the coasts of India has contributed to withdraw from these regions the attention of Europeans and left them in an obscurity which hitherto has been little disturbed, although the current of events seems likely ere long to lead to our better knowledge.

From this it appears that the India of Scripture included no part of the present India, seeing that it was confined to the territories possessed by the Persians and the Syrian Greeks, that never extended beyond the Indus, which, since the time of Nadir Shah, has been regarded as the western boundary of India. Something of India beyond the Indus became known through the conquering march of Alexander, and still more through that of Seleucus Nicator, who penetrated to the banks of the Ganges; but the notions thus obtained are not embraced in the Scriptural notices, which, both in the canonical and the Apocryphal text, are confined to Persian India.

INFINITY (in-fin'it-ty), (Heb. לֵּילֵּי, mis-paur').

Infinity is taken in two senses entirely different, i. e., in a positive and a negative one. Positive infinity is a quality being perfect in itself, or capable of receiving no addition. Negative is the quality of being boundless, unlimited, or endless. That God is infinite is evident.

If he be limited, it must either be by himself or by another; but no wise being would abridge himself, and there could be no other being to limit God.

Infinity follows from self-existence; for a necessity that is not universal must depend on some external cause, which a self-existent being does not.

Creation is so great an act of power that we can imagine nothing impossible to that Being who has performed it, but must therefore ascribe to him infinite power.

It is more honorable to the Divine Being to conceive of him as infinite than finite.

The Scriptures represent all his attributes as infinite. His understanding is infinite (Ps. cxlvii:5). His knowledge and wisdom (Rom. xi:33). His power (Rom. i:20; Heb. xi:3). His goodness (Ps. xvi:2). His purity, holiness, and justice (Job iv:17, 18; Is. vi:2, 3).

His omnipotence and eternity prove his infinity; for were he not infinite, he would be bounded by space and by time, which he is not.

We must be careful not to conceive of the infinity of God in a material sense, nor hold that it excludes other and finite existences. The infinity of God is that of Spirit. Extension and impenetrability do not apply to spirit as to matter.

INFIRMITY (in-fĕrm'y-tĭ), (Heb. מַחְלָה, makh-al-aw', sickness, Prov. xviii:14; Gr. ἀσθένεια, asthen'i-ah, weakness or frailty of body).

(1) Disease or weakness of the body (Lev. xii:2; 1 Tim. v:23).

(2) Outward afflictions, reproaches, persecutions, and temptations (Heb. v:2; 2 Cor. xii:5, 10).

(3) Spiritual weakness, and defects in grace (Rom. vi:19). Failings and mistakes committed through surprise and want of spiritual courage and strength (Rom. xv:1).

The weakness of God is stronger than men; the contemned method of salvation through the death of Christ, is more effectual to render men holy and happy, than all the supposedly wise schemes of men (1 Cor. i:25). The weakness and infirmity of Christ, were his frail human nature, and the various reproaches, temptations, and troubles, he was compassed with (2 Cor. xiii:4; Heb. v:2). The weakness of the ceremonial law, which occasioned its abolition, was its insufficiency to justify, sanctify, or save men (Heb. vii:18). Christ took our infirmities upon him, and bore our sickness; he bore the punishment of our iniquity; he tenderly sympathizes with his people, and testified his affection, by curing the distressed (Matt. viii:17; Heb. iv:15). The Holy Ghost helps our infirmities; he gradually heals our spiritual diseases; and notwithstanding them, enables us to worship and serve God (Rom. viii:26). We ought to bear with the infirmities of the weak, exercising patience and love towards the weak, notwithstanding their infirmities, and by kindly endeavoring to strengthen them (Rom. xv:1). The saints glory and take pleasure in infirmities and troubles, not in themselves, but as they are the means of glorifying God, and the occasions of his communicating strength to them (1 Cor. xii:5, 10).

INFLAMMATION (in'flām-mā'shŭn). See DISEASES OF THE JEWS.

INFLUENCE (in'flū-ens), (Heb. מַשְׂפָּט, ke-maw', Job xxxviii:31).

In this passage allusion is apparently made to the controlling influence which the planets exert over each other.

INGATHERING, FEAST OF (in'gāth'ēr-ing, fĕst ōv). See FESTIVALS.

INHABITER, INHABITRESS (in-hāb'īt-ēr, in-hāb'īt-rĕs), (Gr. κατοικῆς, kat-oy-keh'o).

Inhabiter is used for 'inhabitant' in Rev. viii:13; xii:12. It occurs in Coverdale, as Is. xxvi:9, 'For . . . the inhabitours of the earth lerne rightuousnesse'; and xl:22, 'all the inhabitours of the worlde are in comparison of him but as gres-hoppers'; comp. Prayer Book, Ps. lxxv:4, 'The earth is weak and all the inhabiters thereof.' The fem. form inhabitress occurs in Jer. x:17, marg., an attempt to show the gender of the Hebrew word used in the passage. Comp. Chapman, Hymne to Venus—

'An inhabitresse
On this thy wood-crowned hill.'

INHERITANCE (in-hĕr'īt-ans), (Heb. נַחֲלָה, nakh-al-aw').

The laws and observances which determine the acquisition and regulate the devolution of property are among the influences which affect the vital interests of states; and it is therefore of high consequence to ascertain the nature and bearing of the laws and observances relating to this subject, which come to us with the sanction of the Bible. We may also premise that, in a condition of society such as that in which we now live, wherein the two diverging tendencies which favor immense accumulations on the one hand, and lead to poverty and pauperism on the other, are daily becoming more and more decided, disturbing, and baneful, there seems to be required on the part of those who take Scripture as their guide, a careful study of the foundations of human society, and of the laws of property, as they are developed in the Divine records which contain the revealed will of God.

That will, in truth, as it is the source of all created things, and specially of the earth and its intelligent denizen, man, so is it the original foundation of property, and of the laws by which its inheritance should be regulated. God, as the Creator of the earth, gave it to man, to be held, cultivated and enjoyed (Gen. i:28, sq.; Ps. cxv:16; Eccles. v:9). The primitive records are too brief and fragmentary to supply us with any details respecting the earliest distribution or transmission of landed property; but from the passages to which reference has been made, the important fact appears to be established beyond a question, that the origin of property is to be found, not in the achievements of violence, the success of the sword, or any imaginary implied contract, but in the will and the gift of the common Creator and bountiful Father of the human race. It is equally clear that the gift was made not to any favored portion of our race, but to the race itself—to man as represented by our great primogenitor, to whom the use of the Divine gift was first graciously vouchsafed.

(1) Patriarchal Inheritance. The impression which the original gift of the earth was calculated to make on men, the Great Donor was pleased, in the case of Palestine, to render, for his own wise purposes, more decided and emphatic by an express re-donation to the patriarch Abraham (Gen. xiii:14, sq.). Many years, however, elapsed before the promise was fulfilled. Meanwhile the notices which we have regarding the state of property in the patriarchal ages, are few, and not very definite. The products of the earth, however, were at an early period accumulated and held as property. Violence invaded the possession; opposing violence recovered the goods. War soon sprang out of the passions of the human heart. The necessity of civil government was felt. Consuetudinary laws accordingly developed themselves. The head of the family was supreme. His will was law. The physical superiority which he possessed gave him the dominion. The same influence would secure its transmission in the male rather than the female line. Hence, too, the rise of the rights of primogeniture. In the early condition of society which is called patriarchal, landed property had its origin, indeed, but could not be held of first importance by those who led a wandering life, shifting continually, as convenience suggested, from one spot to another. Cattle were then the chief property (Gen. xxiv:35). But land, if held, was held on a freehold tenure; nor could any other tenure have come into existence till more complex and artificial relations arose, resulting, in all probability, from the increase of population and the relative insufficiency of food.

When Joseph went down into Egypt, he appears to have found the freehold tenure prevailing, which, however, he converted into a tenancy at will, or, at any rate, into a conditional tenancy. Other intimations are found in Genesis which confirm the general statements which have just been made. Daughters do not appear to have had an inheritance. If there are any exceptions to this rule they only serve to prove it. Thus Job (the book so called is undoubtedly very old, so that there is no impropriety in citing it in this connection) is recorded (xlii:15) to have given his daughters an inheritance conjointly with their brothers—a record which of itself proves the singularity of the proceeding, and establishes our position that inheritance generally followed the male line.

(2) Privileges of Inheritance. How highly the privileges conferred by primogeniture were valued, may be learned from the history of Jacob and Esau. In the patriarchal age doubtless these rights were very great. The eldest son, as being by nature the first fitted for command, assumed influence and control, under his father, over the family and its dependents; and when the father was removed by death, he readily, and as if by an act of Providence, took his father's place. Thus he succeeded to the property in succeeding to the headship of the family, the clan, or the tribe. At first the eldest son most probably took exclusive possession of his father's property and power; and when, subsequently, a division became customary, he would still retain the largest share—a double portion, if not more (Gen. xxvii:25, 29, 40). That in the days of Abraham other sons partook with the eldest, and that, too, though they were sons of concubines, is clear from the story of Hagar's expulsion. (See HAGAR.) 'Cast out (said Sarah) this bond-woman and her son; for the son of this bond-woman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac' (Gen. xxi:10).

(3) Transfer of Property. The few notices left us in Genesis of the transfer of property from hand to hand are interesting, and bear a remarkable similarity to what takes place in Eastern countries even at this day (Gen. xxi:22, sq.; xxiii:9, sq.). The purchase of the Cave of Machpelah as a family burying place for Abraham, detailed in the last passage, serves to show the safety of property at that early period, and the facility with which an inheritance was transmitted even to sons' sons (comp. Gen. xlix:20). That it was customary during the father's lifetime to make a disposition of property, is evident from Gen. xxiv:35, where it is said that Abraham had given all he had to Isaac. This statement is further confirmed by Gen. xxv:5, 6, where it is added that Abraham gave to the sons of his concubines 'gifts, sending them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward unto the east country.' Sometimes, however, so far were the children of unmarried females from being dismissed with a gift, that they shared, with what we should term the legitimate children, in the father's property and rights. Thus Dan and Naphtali were sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, whom she gave to her husband, failing to bear children herself. So Gad and Asher were, under similar circumstances, sons of Zilpah, Leah's maid (Gen. xxx:2-14). In the event of the eldest son's dying in father's lifetime, the next son took his place; and if the eldest son left a widow, the next son made her his wife (Gen. xxxviii:7, sq.), the offspring of which union was reckoned to the firstborn and deceased son. Should the second likewise die, the third son took his place (Gen. xxxviii:11).

(4) Rights of Younger Children. While the rights of the firstborn were generally established and recognized, yet were they sometimes set aside in favor of a younger child. The blessing of the father or the grandsire seems to have been an act essential in the devolution of power and property—in its effects not unlike wills and testaments with us; and instances are not wanting in which this (so to term it) testamentary bequest set aside consuetudinary laws, and gave precedence to a younger son (Gen. xlviii:15, sq.). Special claims on the parental regards were acknowledged and rewarded by special gifts, as in the case of Jacob's donation to Joseph (Gen. xlviii:22). In a similar manner, bad conduct on the part of the eldest son (as well as of others) subjected him, if not to the loss of his rights of property, yet to the evil influence of his father's dying malediction (Gen. xlix:3); while the good and favored, though younger, son was led by the paternal blessing to participate, and probably also to reap, the richest inheritance of individual and social happiness (Gen. xlix:8-22).

(5) Inheritance of the Promised Land. The original promise made to Abraham of the land of Palestine was solemnly repeated to Isaac (Gen. xxvi:3), the reason assigned being, because 'Abraham obeyed my voice and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws; while it is expressly declared that the earlier inhabitants of the country were dispossessed and destined to extermination for the greatness of their iniquity. The possession of the promised land was embraced by Isaac in his dying benediction to Jacob (Gen. xxviii:3, 4), to whom God vouchsafed (Gen. xxviii:15; see also xxxv:10, 11), to give a renewed assurance of the destined inheritance. That this donation, however, was held to be dependent for the time and manner of its fulfilment on the Divine will, appears from Gen. xxxiii:18, where Jacob, on coming into the land of Canaan, bought for an hundred pieces of money 'a parcel of a field, at the hand of the children of Hamor.' Delayed though the execution of the promise was, confidence never deserted the family of Abraham, so that Joseph, dying in the land of Egypt, assured his brothers that they would be visited of God and placed in possession of Canaan, enjoining on them, in this conviction, that, when conducted to their possession, they should carry his bones with them out of Egypt (Gen. 1:25).

A promise thus given, thus repeated, and thus believed, easily, and indeed unavoidably, became the fundamental principle of that settlement of property which Moses made when at length he had effected the Divine will in the redemption of the children of Israel. The observances and practices, too, which we have noticed as prevailing among the patriarchs, would, no doubt, have great influence on the laws which the Jewish legislator originated or sanctioned.

(6) Division of the Promised Land. The land of Canaan was divided among the twelve tribes descended through Isaac and Jacob from Abraham. The division was made by lot for an inheritance among the families of the sons of Israel, according to the tribes, and to the number and size of families in each tribe. The tribe of Levi, however, had no inheritance; but forty-eight cities with their suburbs were assigned to the Levites, each tribe giving according to the number of cities that fell to its share (Num. xxxiii:50; xxxiv:1; xxx:1). The inheritance thus acquired was never to leave the tribe to which it belonged; every tribe was to keep strictly to its own inheritance. An heiress, in consequence, was not allowed to marry out of her own tribe, lest property should pass by her marriage into another tribe (Num. xxxvi:6-9). This restriction led to the marriage of heiresses with their near relations; thus the daughters of Zelophedah 'were married unto their father's brother's sons,' 'and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father' (ver. 11, 12; comp. Joseph. Antiq. iv:7, 5). In general cases the inheritance went to sons, the firstborn receiving a double portion, 'for he is the beginning of his father's strength.' If a man had two wives, one beloved, the other hated, and if the firstborn were the son of her who was hated, he nevertheless was to enjoy 'the right of the firstborn' (Deut. xxi:15). If a man left no sons, the inheritance passed to his daughters; if there was no daughter, it went to his brothers; in case there were no brothers, it was given to his father's brothers; if his father had no brothers, it came into possession of the nearest kinsman (Num. xxvii:8).

TABLE SHOWING ORDER OF SUCCESSION AS HEIRS.

(7) The Year of Jubilee. The land was Jehovah's and could not, therefore, be permanently alienated. Every fiftieth year, whatever land had been sold returned to its former owner. The value and price of land naturally rose or fell in proportion to the number of years there were to elapse prior to the ensuing fiftieth or jubilee-year. If he who sold the land, or a kinsman, could redeem the land before the year of jubilee, it was to be restored to him on his paying to the purchaser the value of the produce of the years remaining till the jubilee. Houses in villages or unwallied towns might not be sold forever; they were restored at the jubilee, and might at any time be redeemed. If a man sold a dwelling house situated in a walled city, he had the option of redeeming it within the space of a full year after it had been sold; but if it remained unredeemed, it belonged to the purchaser, and did not return to him who sold it even at the jubilee (Lev. xxv:8, 23). The Levites were not allowed to sell the land in the suburbs of their cities, though they might dispose of the cities themselves, which, however, were redeemable at any time, and must return at the jubilee to their original possessors (Lev. xxvii:16). (See JUBILEE.)

(8) Wills. The regulations which the laws of Moses established rendered wills or a testamentary disposition of (at least) landed property, almost, if not quite, unnecessary; we accordingly find no provision for anything of the kind. Some difficulty may have been now and then occasioned when near relations failed; but this was met by the traditional law, which furnished minute directions on the point (Misch. Baba Bathra, iv:3, c. 8, 9) Personal property would naturally follow the land or might be bequeathed by word of mouth. At a later period of the Jewish polity the mention of wills is found, but the idea seems to have been taken from foreign nations. In princely families they appear to have been used, as we learn from Josephus (Antiq. xiii:16, 1; xvii:3, 2; De Bell. Jud. ii:2, 3); but such a practice can hardly suffice to establish the general use of wills among the people. In the New Testament, however, wills are expressly mentioned (Gal iii:15; Heb. ix:17). Michaelis (Commentaries, i:431) asserts that the phrase (2 Sam. xvii:23; 2 Kings xx:i), 'set thine house in order,' has reference to a will or testament. But his grounds are by no means sufficient.

J R. B.

Figurative. (1) God himself, and his everlasting salvation, are the inheritance of his people, to which, through Jesus their Savior, they have a free and honorable claim on which they live, and in which they delight and glory (Ps. xvi:5; Jer. iii:19; 1 Pet. i:4). (2) Christ's glorious character of Mediator, and the heathen, or Gentiles, are his inheritance; he has an honorable claim to his renown and happiness as God-man, and the Gentiles are given into his hand to be called and converted by him (Heb. i:4; Ps. ii:8). (3) The Jews took their inheritance in themselves, when they were forsaken by God, deprived of their civil and ecclesiastic enjoyments, and left to look out for themselves, under the load of their deserved punishment (Ezek. xxii:16). (4) The inheritance of the congregation of Jacob is either the Israelites, who were God's inheritance, or the law, which God gave them as a valuable possession (Deut. xxxiii:4). (5) God was the Levites' inheritance; they lived on his offerings (Deut. x:9). (6) God's testimonies are his people's inheritance; are of great value, and they delight in and live on them (Ps. cxix:111). (7) Children are God's heritage and reward; he freely gives them to parents, and cheerfully ought they to devote them to God (Ps. cxxvii:3).

INIQUITY (in-ik'wĭ-tĭ), (Heb. אִשָּׁוּן, aw-vone').

This word means not only sin, but the punishment of sin, and the expiation of it: "Aaron will bear the iniquities of the people;" he will atone for them (Exod. xxviii:38). The Lord "visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children" (Exod. xx:5). The priests bear the iniquity of the people; that is, they are charged with the expiation of it (Exod. xxviii:38; Lev. x:17).

INJURIOUS (in-jū'rĭ-ūs), (Gr. ὑβριστής, hōbris-tace', 1 Tim. i:13), insolent, abusive.

INK (ink), (Heb. אֵינָה, deh-yo', Jer. xxxvi:18; Gr. μέλαν, mel'an, black, 2 Cor. iii:3; 2 John 12; 3 John 13).

The ink of the ancients was composed of powdered charcoal, lampblack or soot, mixed with gum and water. It was intensely black and would retain its color for ages, but was easily removed from the parchments with sponge and water (see Num. v:23). It was not so fluid as ours. Demosthenes reproaches Æschines with laboring in the grinding of ink, as painters do in the grinding of their colors. The substance also found in an inkstand at Herculaneum, looks like a thick oil or paint, with which the manuscripts there have been written in a relief visible in the letters, when a leaf is held to the light in a horizontal direction. Such vitriolic ink as has been used on the old parchment manuscripts would have corroded the delicate leaves of the papyrus, as it has done the skins of the most ancient manuscripts of Vergil and Terence, in the Vatican library; the letters are sunk into the parchment, and some have eaten quite through it, in consequence of the corrosive acid of the vitriolic ink, with which they were written.

Different colors were used by the Egyptians and Hebrews for writing. They were of red, blue, purple, gold and silver tints.

INKHORN (ink'hōrn), (Heb. כַּהֲסֵת, keh'seth, a round vessel).

The Oriental inkhorn was a long tube for holding pens, and was carried in the girdle. It was made of brass, copper, silver or hard wood. It was about nine or ten inches long, one and a half or two inches wide, and half an inch deep. To the upper end of this case the inkstand is attached. This is square or cylindrical, with a lid moving on hinges and fastening with a clasp. (See WRITING.)

INN (in), (Heb. ^{יָנַן}, maw-lone', Gen. xlii:27; xliii:21; Exod. iv:24, a "resting-place for the night"; while the Gr. κατάλυμα, kat-al'oo-mah, is used for an "inn," Luke ii:7; an "eating-room," A. V. guest chamber, Mark xiv:14; Luke xxii:11). (See CARAVANSARY.)

INNOCENT, INNOCENCY (in'nō-sent, in'nō-sen-sy), (Heb. ^{יָרֵא}, or ^{יָרֵא}, nik-kaw-yone', literally clearness, Gen. xx:5; Ps. xxvi:6).

The signification of these words is well known. The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external fault committed contrary to the law; hence they often join innocent with hands (Gen. xxxvii:22; Ps. xxiv:4; xxvi:6). "I will wash my hands in innocency," and (Ps. lxxiii:13 "Then have I cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." Josephus admits of no other sins than those which are put in execution. Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God. To be innocent, is used sometimes for being exempt from punishment. "I will not treat you as one innocent" (Jer. xlvi:28), literally, "I will not make thee innocent." Calmet.

INNOCENTS, SLAUGHTER OF THE (in'nō-sents, sla'tēr), (Matt. ii:16), the slaying of the young children of Bethlehem, by order of Herod, in the hope of killing Jesus. (See HERODIAN FAMILY, 1.)

INORDINATE (in-ōr'dī-nāt), disorderly; excessive, as passions or desires, (Ezek. xxiii:11; Col. iii:5).

INQUISITION (in'kwī-zīsh'ūn), (Heb. ^{דָּרַשׁ}, daw-rash', search; examination, Deut. xix:18). God makes inquisition for blood when in his providence he discovers and punishes violent men and oppressors (Ps. ix:12).

INSCRIPTION OR SUPERScription (in-skrīp'shūn, sū'pēr-skrīp'shūn), a writing on pillars, altars, marble or coins (Acts xvii:23; Matt. xxii:20).

Anciently the history of nations and the principles of science were thus inscribed. The Grecian history of about 1318 years was inscribed on the Arundelian marbles. Grævius has filled three volumes in folio with inscriptions of the ancient Greeks and Romans. At least an abridgment of the law of Moses, or a copy of the blessings and curses, was inscribed on the altar at Ebal (Deut. xxvii:8). (See WRITING.)

INSPIRATION (in-spi-rā-shūn), (Heb. ^{נְשָׁא מַאֵו}, nesh'aw-maw; Lat. inspiratio, a breathing into).

This word is sometimes used to denote the excitement and action of a fervent imagination in the poet or orator. But even in this case there is generally a reference to some supposed divine influence, to which the excited action is owing. It is once used in Scripture to denote that divine agency by which man is endued with the faculties of an intelligent being, when it is said, 'the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding.' But the inspiration now to be considered is that which belonged to those who wrote the Scriptures, and which is particularly spoken of in 2 Tim. iii:16, and in 2 Pet. i:21: 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God;' 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' These passages relate specially to the Old Testament; but there is at least equal reason to predicate divine inspiration of the New Testament.

Inspiration may be best defined, according to the representations of the Scriptures themselves, as an extraordinary divine agency upon teachers while giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught what and how they should write or speak. Or we may say more briefly, that the sacred penmen were completely under the direction of the Holy Spirit, or that they wrote under a plenary inspiration.

1. The Fact of Inspiration. To prove that the Scriptures are divinely inspired we might with propriety refer to the excellence of the doctrines, precepts, and promises, and other instructions, which they contain; to the simplicity and majesty of their style; to the agreement of the different parts, and the scope of the whole; especially to the full discovery they make of man's fallen and ruined state, and the way of salvation through a Redeemer; together with their power to enlighten and sanctify the heart, and the accompanying witness of the Spirit in believers. These are circumstances of real importance, and the discerning advocates of inspiration have not overlooked them. But the more direct and conclusive evidence that the Scriptures were divinely inspired, is found in the testimony of the writers themselves. And as the writers did, by working miracles, and in other ways, sufficiently authenticate their divine commission, and establish their authority and infallibility as teachers of divine truth, their testimony, in regard to their own inspiration, is entitled to our full confidence. For who can doubt that they were as competent to judge of, and as much disposed to speak the truth on this subject as on any other? If then we admit their divine commission and authority, why should we not rely upon the plain testimony which they give concerning the divine assistance afforded them in their work? To reject their testimony in this case would be to impeach their veracity, and thus to take away the foundation of the Christian religion. And it is well known that those who deny the justice of the claim which they set up to divine inspiration, do, in fact, give up the infallible truth and authority of the Scriptures, and adopt the principles of deism.

It is, then, of the first importance to inquire what representations are made by the prophets, and by Christ and his apostles, respecting the inspiration, and the consequent authority, of the sacred Scriptures.

(1) Testimony of the Prophets. The prophets generally professed to speak the word of God. What they taught was introduced and confirmed by a 'Thus saith the Lord'; or 'The Lord spake to me, saying.' And, in one way or another, they gave clear proof that they were divinely commissioned, and spoke in the name of God, or as it is expressed in the New Testament, that God spake by them.

(2) Testimony of Jesus Christ and the Apostles. But the strongest and most satisfactory proof of the inspiration and divine authority of the Old Testament writings, is found in the testimony of Christ and the apostles.

The Lord Jesus Christ possessed the spirit of wisdom without measure, and came to bear witness to the truth. His works proved that he was what he declared himself to be—the Messiah, the great Prophet, the infallible Teacher. The faith which rests on him rests on a rock. As soon then as we learn how he regarded the Scriptures, we have reached the end of our inquiries. His word is truth. Now every one who carefully attends to the four Gospels will find, that Christ everywhere spoke of that collection of writings called the Scripture, as the word of God; that he regarded the whole in this light; that he treated the Scripture, and every part of it, as infallibly true, and as clothed with divine authority—thus distinguishing it from every mere human production. Nothing written by man can be entitled to the respect which Christ showed to the Scriptures. This, to all Christians, is direct and incontrovertible evidence of the divine origin of the Scriptures, and is, by itself, perfectly conclusive.

But there is clear concurrent evidence, and evidence still more specific, in the writings of the Apostles. In two texts in particular, divine inspiration is positively asserted. In the first (2 Tim. iii:16) Paul lays it down as the characteristic of 'all Scripture,' that it 'is given by inspiration of God' (θεοπνευστος, theopneustos, divinely inspired); and from this results its profitableness.

The other text (2 Pet. i:21) teaches that 'Prophecy came not by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' This passage, which the Apostle Peter applied particularly to the subject of which he was speaking, may be considered as explanatory of what is intended by inspiration. For to say that all Scripture is divinely inspired, and that men of God wrote it as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, is one and the same thing.

The various texts in which Christ and the Apostles speak of Scripture as the word of God, and as invested with authority to decide all questions of truth and duty, fully correspond with the texts above considered.

From this view of the subject it follows that the attempt which has been made by a certain class of writers, to account for the production of the whole or any part of the Scriptures by the will or agency, the ingenuity, diligence or fidelity of men, in the use of the means within their reach, without the supernatural influence of the Spirit, is utterly at variance with the teachings of Christ and the Apostles as to the origin of the sacred writings.

(3) Inspiration of the New Testament. As the Christian dispensation surpasses the former in all spiritual privileges and gifts, it is reasonable to presume that the New Testament was written under at least an equal degree of divine influence with the Old, and that it comes recommended to us by equal characteristics of infallible truth. But of this there is clear positive evidence from the New Testament itself.

In the first place, Jesus Christ, whose works proved him to be the great unerring Teacher, and to be possessed of all power in Heaven and earth, gave commission to his Apostles to act in his stead, and to carry out the work of instruction which he had begun, confirming their authority by investing them with power to perform miracles. But how could such a commission have answered the end proposed, had not the Divine Spirit so guided the Apostles as to render them infallible and perfect teachers of divine truth?

But, secondly, in addition to this, Jesus expressly promised to give them the Holy Spirit to abide with them continually, and to guide them into all the truth. He said to them, 'When they shall deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in the same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you.' Storr and Flatt think this is the idea intended: 'The instructions which ye in general give are derived not so much from yourselves as from the Holy Spirit. Hence, when ye are called on to defend your doctrines, ye need feel no anxiety, but may confidently rely on the Holy Spirit to vindicate his own doctrines, by suggesting to you the very words of your defense.' If these promises were not fulfilled, then Jesus was not a true prophet. If they were fulfilled, as they certainly were, then the Apostles had the constant assistance of the Holy Spirit, and whether engaged in speaking or writing, were under divine guidance, and, of course, were liable to no mistakes either as to the matter or manner of their instructions.

In the third place, the writers of the New Testament manifestly considered themselves to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions, whether oral or written, to be clothed with divine authority, as the word of God.

'We speak,' they say, 'as of God.' Again, 'Which things we speak not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth.' They declare what they taught to be the word of God, and the things they wrote to be the commandments of God. Now the Apostles, being honest, unassuming, humble men, would never have spoken of themselves and their writings in such a manner, had they not known themselves to be under the unerring guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions perfectly in accordance with the mind of God.

(4) Manner of Inspiration. It is perfectly consistent with the plenary inspiration here mentioned, that God operated on the minds of inspired men in a variety of ways, sometimes by audible words, sometimes by direct inward suggestions, sometimes by outward visible signs, sometimes by the Urim and Thummim, and sometimes by dreams and visions. This variety in the mode of Divine influence detracted nothing from its certainty. God made known his will equally in different ways; and, whatever the mode of his operation, he made it manifest to his servants that the things revealed were from him.

But inspiration was concerned not only in making known the will of God to prophets and apostles, but also in giving them directions in writing the sacred books. They wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. And in this, also, there was a diversity in the mode of divine influence. Sometimes the Spirit of God moved and guided his servants to write things which they could not know by natural means, such as new doctrines or precepts, or predictions of future events. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write the history of events which were wholly or partly known to them by tradition, or by the testimony of their contemporaries, or by their own observation or experience. In all these cases the Divine Spirit effectually preserved them from all error, and influenced them to write just so much and in such a manner as God saw to be best. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write a summary record of larger histories, containing what his infinite wisdom saw to be adapted to the end in view, that is, the benefit of his people in all ages. Sometimes he influenced them to make a record of important maxims in common use, or to write new ones, derived either from their own reason and experience, or from special divine teaching. Sometimes he influenced them to write parables or allegories, particularly suited to make a salutary impression of Divine things on the minds of men; and sometimes to record supernatural visions. In these and all other kinds of writing the sacred penmen manifestly needed special divine guidance, as no man could of himself attain infallibility, and no wisdom, except that of God, was sufficient to determine what things ought to be written for permanent use in the church, and what manner of writing would be best fitted to promote the great ends of revelation.

Some writers speak of different modes and different kinds, and even different degrees, of inspiration. And if their meaning is that God influenced the minds of inspired men in different ways; that he adopted a variety of modes in revealing divine things to their minds; that he guided them to give instruction in prose and in poetry, and in all the different forms of composition; that he moved and guided them to write history, prophecy, doctrines, commands, promises, reproofs, and exhortations, and that he adapted his mode of operation to each of these cases—against this no objection can be made. It is a fact, that the Scriptures exhibit specimens of all these different kinds of writing and these different modes of divine instruction. Still each and every part of what was written was divinely inspired, and equally so. It is all the word of God, and clothed with divine authority, as much as if it had all been made known and written in one way.

Dr. Henderson, who labors perhaps with too much zeal against carrying inspiration to extreme lengths, still says that if those who hold to different modifications of inspiration intend that there are different modifications and degrees of authority given to Scripture, their opinion must meet with unqualified reprobation from every sincere believer. He insists that a diversity in the modes and degrees of divine operation did exist in the work of inspiration, and that this diversity was the result of infinite wisdom adapting itself to different circumstances. He thinks that, unless we admit such a diversity, we cannot form correct ideas of the subject. But he is confident that the distinction which he endeavors to establish is not in the slightest degree hostile to the divine authority of Scripture. He affirms that no part of that holy book was written without miraculous influence; that all parts were equally inspired; that in regard to the whole volume the great end was infallibly attained, namely, the commitment to writing of precisely such matters as God designed for the religious instruction of mankind; that the sacred penmen wrote what had for its object not merely the immediate benefit of individual persons or churches, but what would be useful to Christians in all future times; and that in regard to the most minute and inconsiderable things which the Scripture contains we are compelled to say, this also cometh from the Lord.

(5) Verbal Inspiration. The controversy among orthodox divines respecting what is called verbal inspiration, appears to arise, in a great measure, from the different senses affixed to the phrase.

The real question, and the whole question at issue, may be stated thus: did the work of the Divine Spirit in the sacred penmen relate to the language they used, or their manner of expressing their ideas; and if so, how far, and in what way?

All those with whom we are concerned in the discussion of this question, hold that Divine inspiration had some respect to the language employed by the inspired writers, at least in the way of general supervision. In recording what was immediately spoken with an audible voice by Jehovah, or by an angel interpreter; in giving expression to points of revelation which entirely surpassed the comprehension of the writers; in recording prophecies, the minute bearings of which they did not perceive; in short, in committing to writing any of the dictates of the Spirit, which they could not have otherwise accurately expressed, the sacred writers were supplied with the words as well as the matter.

Even when Biblical writers made use of their own faculties, and wrote each one in his own manner, without having their mental constitution at all disturbed, they were yet always secured by celestial influence against the adoption of any forms of speech, or collocation of words, that would have injured the exhibition of Divine truth, or that did not adequately give it expression. The characteristic differences of style, so apparent among the sacred writers, were employed by the Holy Spirit for the purposes of inspiration, and were called forth in a rational way. The writers, being acted upon by the Divine Spirit, expressed themselves naturally, and while the Divine influence adapted itself to whatever was peculiar in the minds of inspired men, it constantly guided them in writing the sacred volume. The Holy Scriptures were written, not under a partial or imperfect, but under a plenary and infallible, inspiration, and were entirely the result of Divine intervention, and are to be regarded as the oracles of Jehovah.

(6) Plenary Inspiration. (a) The doctrine of a plenary inspiration of all Scripture in regard to the language employed, as well as the thoughts communicated, ought not to be rejected without valid reasons. The doctrine is so obviously important, and so consonant with the feelings of sincere piety, that those evangelical Christians who are pressed with speculative objections against it frequently, in the honesty of their hearts, advance opinions which fairly imply it. This is the case, as we have seen, with Dr. Henderson, who says, that the Divine Spirit guided the sacred penmen in writing the Scriptures; that their mode of expression was such as they were instructed by the Spirit to employ; that Paul ascribes not only the doctrines which the Apostles taught, but the entire character of their style, to the influence of the Spirit. He indeed says, that this does not always imply the immediate communication of the words of Scripture; and he says it with good reason. For immediate properly signifies, acting without a medium, or without the intervention of another cause or means, not acting by second causes.

(b) Now those who hold the highest views of inspiration do not suppose that the Divine Spirit, except in a few instances, so influenced the writers of Scripture as to interfere with the use of their rational faculties or their peculiar mental habits and tastes, or in any way to supersede secondary causes as the medium through which his agency produced the desired effect.

In regard to this point, therefore, there appears to be little or no ground for controversy. For, if God so influenced the sacred writers that, either with or without the use of secondary causes, they wrote just what he intended, and in the manner he intended, the end is secured; and what they wrote is as truly his word, as though he had written it with his own hand on tables of stone, without any human instrumentality. The very words of the Decalogue were all such as God chose. And they would have been equally so if Moses had been moved by the Divine Spirit to write them with his hand. The expression, that God immediately imparted or communicated to the writers the very words which they wrote, is evidently not well chosen. The exact truth, is that the writers themselves were the subjects of the Divine influence. The Spirit employed them as active instruments, and directed them in writing, both as to matter and manner. They wrote 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' The matter, in many cases, was what they before knew, and the manner was entirely conformed to their habits; it was their own. But what was written was none the less inspired on that account. God may have influenced and guided an apostle as infallibly in writing what he had before known, and that guidance may have been as really necessary, as in writing a new revelation. And God may have influenced Paul or John to write a book in his own peculiar style, and that influence may have been as real and as necessary as if the style had been what some would call a divine style. It was a divine style, if the writer used it under Divine direction. It was a divine style, and it was, at the same time, a human style, and the writer's own style, all in one. Just as the believer's exercises, faith and love, are his own acts, and at the same time are the effects of Divine influence.

'In efficacious grace,' says Edwards, 'we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, namely, our own acts. God is the only proper author and foundation; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active. In the Scriptures, the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert men, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart and we are commanded to make us a new heart—not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, "God worketh in you both to will and to do."'

(c) The mental exercises of Paul and of John had their own characteristic peculiarities, as much as their style. God was the author of John's mind and all that was peculiar to his mental faculties and habits, as really as of Paul's mind and what was peculiar to him. And in the work of inspiration he used and directed, for his own purposes, what was peculiar to each. When God inspired different men he did not make their minds and tastes all alike, nor did he make their language alike. Nor had he any occasion for this; for while they had different mental faculties and habits, they were as capable of being infallibly directed by the Divine Spirit, and infallibly speaking and writing Divine truth, as though their mental faculties, and habits had been all exactly alike. And it is manifest that the Scriptures, written by such a variety of inspired men, and each part agreeably to the peculiar talents and style of the writer, are not only equally from God, but, taken together, are far better adapted to the purposes of general instruction, and all the objects to be accomplished by revelation, than if they had been written by one man, and in one and the same manner.

(d) This view of plenary inspiration is fitted to relieve the difficulties and objections which have arisen in the minds of men from the variety of talent and taste which the writers exhibited, and the variety of style which they used. See, it is said, how each writer expresses himself naturally, in his own way, just as he was accustomed to do when not inspired. And see, too, we might say in reply, how each Apostle, Peter, Paul or John, when speaking before rulers, with the promised aid of the Holy Spirit, spoke naturally, with his own voice, and in his own way, as he had been accustomed to do on other occasions were not inspired. There is no more objection to plenary inspiration in the one case than in the other. The mental faculties and habits of the Apostles, their style, their voice, their mode of speech, all remained as they were. What, then, had the Divine Spirit to do? What was the work which appertained to him? We reply, his work was so to direct the Apostles in the use of their own talents and habits, their style, their voice, and all their peculiar endowments, that they should speak or write, each in his own way, just what God would have them speak or write, for the good of the Church in all ages.

2. Objections from Peculiarities of the Writers.

(1) Language. The fact that the individual peculiarities of the sacred penmen are everywhere so plainly impressed on their writings, is often mentioned as an objection to the doctrine, that inspiration extended to their language as well as their thoughts. This is, indeed, one of the most common objections, and one which has obtained a very deep lodgment in the minds of some intelligent Christians. It may, therefore, be necessary to take some further pains completely to remove it. And in our additional remarks relative to this and other objections, it will come in our way to show that such a writer as Gausson, who contends with great earnestness and ability for the highest views of inspiration, does still, on all important points, agree with those who advocate lower views of the subject.

Gausson says, 'Even if the title of each book should not indicate to us that we are passing from one author to another; yet we could quickly discover, by the change of their characters, that a new hand has taken the pen. It is perfectly easy to recognize each one of them, although they speak of the same master, teach the same doctrines, and relate the same incidents.' But how does this prove that Scripture is not, in all respects, inspired? 'So far are we,' says this author, 'from overlooking human individuality everywhere impressed on our sacred books, that, on the contrary, it is with profound gratitude, and with an ever-increasing admiration, that we regard this living, real, human character infused so charmingly into every part of the Word of God. We admit the fact, and we see in it clear proof of the Divine wisdom which dictated the Scriptures.'

Those who urge the objection above mentioned are plainly inconsistent with themselves. For while they deny the plenary inspiration of some parts of Scripture, because they have these marks of individuality, they acknowledge inspiration in the fullest sense in other parts, particularly in the prophecies, where this individuality of the writers is equally apparent.

In truth, what can be more consonant with our best views of the wisdom of God, or with the general analogy of his works, than that he should make use of the thoughts, the memories, the peculiar talents, tastes, and feelings of his servants in recording his Word for the instruction of men? Why should he not associate the peculiarities of their personal character with what they write under his personal guidance? But, independently of our reasoning, this matter is decided by the Bible itself. 'All Scripture is divinely inspired,' and it is all the Word of God. And it is none the less the Word of God, and none the less inspired, because it comes to us in the language of Moses, and David, and Paul, and the other sacred writers. 'It is God who speaks to us, but it is also man; it is man, but it is also God.' The Word of God, in order to be intelligible and profitable to us, 'must be uttered by mortal tongues, and be written by mortal hands, and must put on the features of human thoughts.

This blending of humanity and divinity in the Scriptures reminds us of the majesty and the condescension of God. Viewed in this light, the Word of God has unequaled beauties, and exerts an unequaled power over our hearts.'

(2) Inaccuracy of Translations. (a) The objection to the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, from the inaccuracy of the translations and the various readings of the ancient manuscript copies, is totally irrelevant. For what we assert is, the inspiration of the original Scriptures, not of the translations of the ancient copies. The fact that the Scriptures were divinely inspired, cannot be expunged or altered by any subsequent event. The very words of the Decalogue were written by the finger of God, and none the less so because the manuscripts which transmit it to us contain some variations. The integrity of the copies has nothing to do with the inspiration of the original. It is, however, well known that the variations are hardly worthy to be mentioned.

(b) But if the copies of the Scriptures which we have are not inspired, then how can the inspiration of the original writings avail to our benefit? The answer is that, according to the best evidence, the original writings have been transmitted to us with remarkable fidelity, and that our present copies, so far as anything of consequence is concerned, agree with the writings as they came from inspired men; so that, through the gracious care of Divine Providence, the Scriptures now in use are, in all important respects, the Scriptures which were given by inspiration of God, and are stamped with Divine authority. In this matter, we stand on the same footing with the Apostles. For when they spoke of the Scriptures, they doubtless referred to the copies which had been made and preserved among the Jews, not to the original manuscripts written by Moses and the prophets.

(c) There are some who maintain that all that was necessary to secure the desired results was an infallible guidance of the thoughts of the sacred writers; that with such a guidance they might be safely left to express their thoughts in their own way, without any special influence from above.

Now, if those who take this view of the subject mean that God not only gives the sacred penmen the very ideas which they are to write, but, in some way, secures an infallible connection between those ideas and a just expression of them in words, then, indeed, we have the desired result—an infallible revelation from God, made in the proper language of the writers. But if any one supposes that there is naturally such an infallible connection between right thoughts and a just expression of them in language, without an effective divine superintendence, he contradicts the lessons of daily experience. But those to whom we refer evidently do not themselves believe in such an infallible connection. For when they assign their reason for denying that inspiration related to the language of the Scriptures, they speak of the different, and, as they regard them, the contradictory statements of facts by different writers.

(d) But it is easy to see that the difficulty presses with all its force upon those who assert the inspiration of the thoughts. For surely they will not say that the sacred writers had true thoughts in their minds, and yet uttered them in the language of falsehood. This would contradict their own idea of a sure connection between the conceptions of the mind and the utterance of them in suitable words, and would clearly show that they themselves feel it to be necessary that the Divine guidance should extend to the words of inspired men as well as their thoughts. But if an inspired writer, through inadvertence, committed a real mistake as to a statement of fact, it must have been a mistake in his thoughts as well as in his words. If, then, there was a mistake, it lay in his thoughts. But if there was no mistake, then there is nothing to prove that inspiration did not extend to the language. If, however, there was a real mistake, then the question is not, what becomes of verbal inspiration, but what becomes of inspiration in any sense.

(e) It is sometimes said that the sacred writers were of themselves generally competent to express their ideas in proper language, and in this respect had no need of supernatural assistance. But there is just as much reason for saying that they were of themselves generally competent to form their own conceptions, and so had no need of supernatural aid in this respect. It is just as reasonable to say that Moses could recollect what took place at the Red Sea, and that Paul could recollect that he was once a persecutor, and Peter what took place on the mount of transfiguration, without supernatural aid, as to say that they could, without such aid, make a proper record of these recollections. We believe a real and infallible guidance of the Spirit in both respects, because this is taught in the Scriptures, and it is obvious that the Bible could not be what Christ and the Apostles considered it to be unless they were divinely inspired.

(3) Diversity in the Narratives. The diversity in the narratives of the Evangelists is sometimes urged as an objection against the position we maintain in regard to inspiration, but evidently without reason, and contrary to reason. For what is more reasonable than to expect that a work of divine origin will have marks of consummate wisdom, and will be suited to accomplish the end in view. Now it will not be denied that God determined that there should be four narratives of the life and death of Jesus from four historians.* If the narratives were all alike, three of them would be useless. Indeed, such a circumstance would create suspicion, and would bring discredit upon the whole concern. The narratives must then be different. And if, besides this useful diversity, it is found that the seeming contradictions can be satisfactorily reconciled, and if each of the narratives is given in the peculiar style and manner of the writers, then all is natural and unexceptionable, and we have the highest evidence of the credibility and truth of the narratives.

(4) An Additional Objection. It is by some alleged that writers who were constantly under a plenary divine inspiration would not descend to the unimportant details, the trifling incidents, which are found in the Scriptures. To this it may be replied that the details alluded to must be admitted to be according to truth, and that those things which, at first view, seem to be trifles, may, when taken in their connections, prove to be of serious moment. And it is moreover manifest that, considering what human beings and human affairs really are, if all those things which are called trifling and unimportant were excluded, the Scriptures would fail of being conformed to fact; they would not be faithful histories of human life; so that the very circumstance which is demanded as proof of inspiration would become an argument against it. And herein we cannot but admire the perfect wisdom which guided the sacred writers, while we mark the weakness and shallowness of the objections which are urged against their inspiration.

3. Summary. On the whole, after carefully investigating the subject of inspiration, we are conducted to the important conclusion that 'all Scripture is divinely inspired;' that the sacred penmen wrote 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' and that these representations are to be understood as implying that the writers had, in all respects, the effectual guidance of the Divine Spirit. And we are still more confirmed in this conclusion because we find that it begets in those who seriously adopt it an acknowledgment of the divine origin of Scripture, a reverence for its teachings, and a practical regard for its requirements, like what appeared in Christ and his Apostles. Being convinced that the Bible has, in all parts and in all respects, the seal of the Almighty, and that it is truly and entirely from God, we are led by reason, conscience, and piety to bow submissively to its high authority, implicitly to believe its doctrines, however incomprehensible, and cordially to obey its precepts, however contrary to our natural inclinations. We come to it from day to day, not as judges, but as learners, never questioning the propriety or utility of any of its contents. This precious Word of God is the perfect standard of our faith, and the rule of our life, our comfort in affliction, and our sure guide to heaven. L. W.

INSTANT (in-stant). 1. Very eager and earnest; persevering (Rom. xii:12).

2. An instant is a moment or short period of time (Jer. xviii:7; Luke ii:38). (See also Rom. xii:12; 2 Tim. iv:2.)

INSTRUCTION (in-strük'shün). See EDUCATION; SCHOOLS.

INSTRUMENT (in'stru-ment), (Heb. ^{כֵּל}, kel-ee', something prepared), a general term for any apparatus, as implement, weapon, furniture, utensil, vessel, etc. (Exod. xxv:9).

Figurative. The second causes, whereby God executes his works of mercy or judgment, are his instruments (Is. xli:15). Sword, famine, pestilence, and disease are his instruments of death (Ps. vii:13). Men's bodies, or members, are instruments of righteousness or unrighteousness; are, as it were, tools by which they work the one or the other in outward acts (Rom. vi:13).

INTELLIGENCE (in-tel'li-jens), (Heb. ^{בִּינָה}, bene, Dan. xi:30), to have an understanding or agreement rather than a quality of mind, with the idea of treachery or double dealing.

INTENT (in-tent'), (Gr. βουλή, hin'ak, John xiii:28), intention or purpose.

INTERCESSION (in'tēr-sēsh'ün), (Heb. ^{פָּדוּת}, paw-gah', to come upon; Gr. ἐντροχάωω, en-toong-ghan'o, to meet with, to come between).

(1) Intercession of Christ. His interposing for sinners by virtue of his being a Mediator.

(1) As to the fact itself, it is evident, from many places of Scripture, that Christ pleads with God in favor of his people (Rom. viii:34; Heb. vii:25; 1 John ii:1).

(2) As to the manner of it: the appearance of the high-priest among the Jews, in the presence of God, on the day of atonement, when he offered before him the blood of the sin-offering, is at large referred to by St. Paul as illustrating the intercession of Christ (Heb. ix:11, 14, 22, 26; x:13, 21).

(3) Christ's intercession is not to remind the Divine Being of anything which he would otherwise forget, nor to persuade him to anything which he is not disposed to do; but it may serve to illustrate the holiness and majesty of the Father, and the wisdom and grace of the Son; not to say that it may have other unknown uses with respect to the inhabitants of the invisible world. He is represented, also, as offering up the prayers and praises of his people, which become acceptable to God through him (Rev. viii:3, 4; Heb. xiii:15; 1 Pet. ii:5). He there pleads for the conversion of unconverted ones; and for the consolation, preservation, and glorification of his people (John xvii; 1 John ii:1, 2).

(4) Of the properties of Christ's intercession, it may be also observed: (a) That it is authoritative. He intercedes not without right (John xvii:24; Ps. ii:8). (b) Wise; he understands the nature of his work, and the wants of his people (John ii:25). (c) Righteous; for it is founded upon justice and truth (1 John iii:5; Heb. vii:26). (d) Compassionate (Heb. ii:17; v:8; Is. lxiii:9). (e) He is the sole advocate (1 Tim. ii:5). (f) It is perpetual (Heb. vii:25). (g) Efficacious (1 John ii:1, 2; John xi:42).

(2) Intercession of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost makes intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered; he excites to prayer, directs what to ask, and enables us to offer our requests to God in a duly earnest manner (Rom. viii:26).

(3) Intercession of Believers. We make intercession for men, when we plead with God on their behalf, and for his gifts and graces to them (1 Tim. ii:1). In a time of universal apostasy, God wondered that there was no intercessor, none to stand up in behalf of religion, and wrestle with him for the turning away of his wrath (Is. lix:16).

INTEREST (in'tēr-ēst). See USURY.

INTERMARRIAGE (in-tēr mār'rīj). See MARRIAGE.

INTERMEDDLE (in'tēr-mēd'd'l), (Heb. ^{אָוֶרַב}, aw-rab', Prov. 14:10), to take interest in, engage, mingle in, not of necessity in an offensive way, as is generally implied in the use of the word now.

INTERMEDIATE STATE (in'tēr-mē'dī-āte stāt), a term made use of to denote the state of the soul between death and the resurrection.

From the Scriptures speaking frequently of the dead as sleeping in their graves, many have supposed that the soul sleeps till the resurrection, i. e., is in a state of entire insensibility. But against this opinion, and that the soul, after death, enters immediately into a state of reward or punishment, the following passages seem to be conclusive: Matt. xvii:3; Luke xxiii:42; 2 Cor. v:6; Phil. i:21; Luke xvi:22, 23; Rev. vi:9. INTERPRETATION (in-tēr'prē-tā'shūn) OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. Introduction. The science of the interpretation of Scripture has passed through as long and tortuous a course as chemistry or astronomy. As alchemy and astrology led up to these sciences, so the efforts of Jews and Christians to explain the Scriptures have prepared the way for the modern system of interpretation now current in the study of any ancient literature. This consists in giving the plain and obvious meaning of the text, as understood by the men for whom it was first written.

The belief that the Bible was a divine book almost completely closed the eyes of ancient interpreters to its human elements. If they sometimes theoretically admitted them, they practically ignored them. Its literary character, its poetry, its history, were overlooked. It was regarded as an arsenal of divine sayings. Hence, both Jews and Christians sought to find their theories and speculations confirmed by it. They did not ask what the writers intended, but rather what meaning the language would bear. The result of this abuse of Scripture was that the Bible, which we regard as a book for the common people, was sealed; so that among the Jews none but a rabbi was capable of setting forth the sense of the Old Testament, and among the Christians only the Church could determine the significance of the Bible.

2. Ancient Jewish Interpretation. Among the Jews there were two schools of interpreters: the Palestinian, which used the Hebrew consonantal text, and the Alexandrian, which used the Septuagint translation.

(1) The Palestinian School. The character of Palestinian exegesis may be best observed in the Talmud, including the Mishna, or development of the Law; the Gemara, or expansion of the Mishna, and its further modification in the Baraitha. The Jerusalem Talmud was edited A. D. 390; the Babylonian, A. D. 365-427. The Talmudic commentary is called Midrash, investigation, embracing the Halacha, legal enactment, and the Haggada, or illustrations by tales, parables, or allegories. While the rabbis have reduced their mode of interpretation to rules, nothing could seem more lawless, more casuistical, more fantastic, than some of the interpretations in the writings named. In the same connection should be mentioned the KABALA (see article), which regards each letter of Scripture as the source of the greatest mysteries.

(2) The Alexandrian School. The most prominent figure in this school is that of Philo, born about B. C. 20 at Alexandria. Though he found the allegorical method employed in the exegesis of Homer and other Greek writers, as well as in that of the Old Testament, he is worthy of special prominence, because of his pre-eminent ability, his effort to reduce the allegorical interpretation to a system of rules, and on account of his influence, more or less immediately, on the interpretation of the Church Fathers. While retaining the literal sense for the instruction of those who were capable, as he thought, of a higher conception of the Scriptures, and turned the plainest narratives into metaphysical abstractions, since it was his belief that the Greek philosophy, of which he was an ardent admirer, could be found in the Old Testament.

(3) The New Testament Writers. As might be expected, Palestinian, and traces of Alexandrian, exegesis are found in the New Testament, both in the Gospels and the Epistles. Paul was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel (Acts xxii:3). He was saturated with Jewish learning and schooled in Jewish modes of thought. When he became a new creature in Christ, he did not cease to think and reason like a Jew; hence, his mode of interpretation is essentially Jewish, but the guiding power of the Divine Spirit has at all times kept him from such extravagances as we find in the Talmud. Now, while we must admit that the human method of interpretation employed was incorrect in form, it was used by Divine wisdom as the only suitable means of conveying truth in New Testament times. An age accustomed to the Jewish mode of interpretation could not make any more use of the modern method than a boy, who has studied only primary arithmetic, could make of a treatise on comic sections. Hence, a New Testament interpretation of the Old is abundantly justified as a necessity of Divine Providence.

3. Medieval Jewish Interpretation. The Middle Ages, which brought no light from the Bible to the Christian church, were marked by distinct progress among the Jews in the interpretation of the Old Testament. Under the inspiration and example of the Arabs, whose language the Spanish Jews spoke, the study of Hebrew grammar at first flourished several hundred years in Spain, beginning with Jehudah Ibn Daud, or Chayuj, and closing with David Kimchi (died 1235), who wrote in Hebrew. Elias Levita (died 1549), a celebrated grammarian, belongs to the period of the Renaissance. Even Rashi (died 1105) shows the influence of the new learning, although abiding by traditional interpretations; and Ibn Ezra (died 1167), who was in some respects a forerunner of the modern critics, is perhaps the most grammatical and historical of the medieval Jewish interpreters. David Kimchi, while subject to philosophical presuppositions, also marks a distinct advance in the history of interpretation.

4. Interpretation by the Church Fathers. The process begun among the Jewish interpreters of putting their own ideas and speculations into the Old Testament, instead of drawing out the meaning of the original writers, was continued by the Church down to the Reformation.

The effort made was to transform the Old Testament into a treasury of New Testament teaching; the instrument used was allegory. In this respect the Church Fathers were following in the footsteps of New Testament writers, especially of Paul and of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Clement of Rome (96 A. D.) sees in the scarlet cord, which Rahab was instructed to bind in her window, a symbol of the atoning blood of Jesus Christ. Barnabas (Epistle between 119, and 126 A. D.) finds in the three hundred and eighteen servants of Abraham a symbol of the name of Jesus and the cross. Indeed, there is scarcely an allusion to wood, or anything which can be tortured into a reminder of the cross, which is not seized upon by Barnabas and other Fathers as a symbol. Justin Martyr's dialogue with Trypho, the Jew (142-148), rests mostly on a use of the Old Testament, which we must consider invalid and superficial, and of which the Jew rightly complained. Such was the uncertainty and subjective character of interpretation in the ancient Church that Tertullian (born about 150) maintained that argument with heretics was useless, because the issue was uncertain. He claims that Apostolic tradition is to be the test of the meaning of Scripture, thus foreshadowing the action of the Council of Trent. Nor did the labors of Origen (born 185, died 254), wonderful as they may be considered, produce sounder methods of interpretation. He sought, as the result of immense labor, through the preparation of his hexaplar text of the Old Testament, by placing the Hebrew text with the various Greek translations in parallel columns, to advance the knowledge of the true text of the Old Testament. Through the errors of subsequent transcribers in disregarding the critical signs, the ancient text of the Septuagint fell into great confusion. Besides, Origen, who may be considered the leading representative of the Alexandrian school, and a great admirer of Philo, sought to systematize the allegorical mode of interpretation. He considered that Scripture had a threefold sense, consisting of body, or literal; soul, or moral; spirit, or mystical. The literal sense was useful for the most simple Christians. Through the allegorical interpretation he found an easy refuge from all difficulties in the Old Testament. The influence of Origen was permanent in the Church, although the Fathers who succeeded him did not go to as great lengths.

There were glimmerings of right principles of interpretation, as appears from the writings of Augustine (born 354, died 430), the great theologian, and Jerome (born 346, died 420), the great Biblical scholar of the ancient Church; but these principles, while recognized, had no controlling effect. Augustine adopted the seven exegetical rules of Tichonius, which were mostly harmful to right interpretation. While his exegetical works contain good comments on Old Testament passages, they are largely composed of fanciful interpretations of Scripture. Among the Church Fathers, Jerome was the only Hebrew scholar worthy of the name. Besides him, with the exception of Origen, none could go back of translations of the Old Testament. Jerome enjoyed the best advantages for the study of the Old Testament that the time afforded. He spared neither pains nor expense to master the Hebrew language. His Latin translation of the Bible was a work of great merit, which, after a test of centuries, displaced its older rivals, and became the Vulgate of the Romish Church. While Jerome had much of the freedom and insight of the modern critic, he was not an original interpreter, and could not break loose from the faults of his time.

Only one of the Fathers earned the title of "the exegete," Theodore of Mopsuestia (born about 350, died 429), the intimate friend and companion, from boyhood, of Chrysostom, to whom in early manhood he owed his conversion. He was the most conspicuous representative of the School of Antioch, which stood for the historical and natural interpretation of Scripture. While he had no knowledge of Hebrew, he had a remarkable intuition of the historical and grammatical mode of exegesis. He was a strong opponent of the methods of Origen. But he was really a thousand years in advance of his time. His works were brought under the suspicion of Nestorianism, and were condemned one hundred and twenty-five years after his death.

The allegorical method, against which Theodore had stoutly contended, continued dominant, and was current among the schoolmen. Nicholas De Lyra (born 1270, died 1340), who was a Hebrew scholar, and who had enjoyed the benefit of the studies of the Spanish Jews of the Middle Ages, does indeed "make the first beginnings of a school of natural exegesis . . . by ascertaining the literal meaning," and, through his influence on Luther, paves the way for the following period; but, on the whole, the period from the Apostolic Fathers to the Reformation, in the history of exegesis, might be characterized as that of "the misinterpretation of the Old Testament."

5. Interpretation from the Reformation to the Eighteenth Century. Two things are characteristic of the period introduced by the Reformation in the interpretation of the Old Testament; the freeing of Scripture from the bondage of the Church tradition, and the study of it in the original languages. Both were of the greatest importance. Until the Reformation, the Bible for the few who used it could mean to the loyal Romanist only what the Church decreed it should mean; hence the motive was wanting to go behind the official text of the Romish Church as found in the Vulgate. This attitude was entirely changed by the Reformation. The Bible became the source of authority; hence the Reformers did not care for the interpretations of the Fathers. Their sole question was what the Scriptures themselves taught. This rendered necessary a careful study of the Bible in the original languages, for which the way had been prepared by Reuchlin's translation of Kimchi's grammar. Hence we may trace the Bible of Luther and the other reformers back to the studies of Spanish Jews in the Middle Ages, under the tuition of the Arabs. Neither Luther (born 1483, died 1546) nor Calvin (born 1509, died 1564) were profound Hebrew scholars, but they marked an infinite advance over the barren waste of scholastic exegesis. They manifested a free attitude in their judgment of the binding authority of certain parts of the Old Testament, while yielding loyal and unquestioning obedience to Scripture as a whole. Their position in this respect was in sharp contrast to that of the theologians of the Post-Reformation period, who sought, after the manner of an orthodox Jewish scholar of the second century, to make a hedge about the Scriptures. The effort was made by these theologians to find the same infallibility in the Bible which the Fathers had found in the Church as the custodian of Apostolic tradition. This effort extended to defining the limits of the Scripture to claiming, with reference to the vowel points, that they had been supernaturally communicated; that the Old Testament was of equal authority with the New; that the rule of faith was to be found in the clear passages of Scripture, and that the obscure passages were to be interpreted by them. Thus the theologians of the Post-Reformation period brought the Scriptures once more under a yoke of bondage, the rule of faith which was really a barrier to free interpretation. But there were critical tendencies at work, both among Protestants and Catholics. Even Carlstadt (born about 1483, died 1541) had maintained that the Pentateuch could not have been written by Moses, and Luther had asked what difference it would make if he were not the author of it. Yet the main current among Jews, Catholics, and Protestants, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, was to suppress free inquiry about the origin and composition of the Scriptures. But such investigations on the part of individuals could not be kept back.

(1) Spinoza (born 1632, died 1667) may be regarded the father of modern criticism. He was a learned Jew of acute mind who lived in Amsterdam, and who was excommunicated by the Jews because of his critical theories. The principles of interpretation enunciated by him are essentially in accord with those held by the modern critical school.

(2) A little later two French Catholics made important contributions to Old Testament criticism. One, a priest, Richard Simon (born 1638, died 1712), who is sometimes called the father of Biblical introduction, was the author of a Critical History of the Old Testament.

(3) Astruc (born 1684, died 1766), a Catholic layman, was the founder of the literary analysis of the Pentateuch in his "Conjectures Upon the Original Memoirs which Moses Seems to Have Used in Composing the Book of Genesis."

(4) The condition of the text, which has an important bearing on interpretation, also received great attention in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. After a hard fought battle between the Buxtorfs, father (born 1564, died 1629) and son (born 1599, died 1664), on the one hand, and Capellus on the other, it was proved conclusively that the vowel points used in reading Hebrew, far from being original with Moses, were an invention of the Massorettes (after 600 A. D.), the guardians of Jewish text criticism. Kennicott, an English, and De Rossi, an Italian, scholar, devoted great attention to the comparison of Old Testament Hebrew MSS., leading to the negative result, that none of those in existence originated before the Middle Ages, and that the variations in their readings were so slight as to be of no account.

(5) Lowth and Herder were eminent as exegetes, but no scholar arose who effected a general change in the principles of interpretation as introduced by the theologians succeeding the Reformation. They went to the Bible for proof texts to establish the doctrines of the church; and since they sought these by sound, rather than through a historical, interpretation, they found them in the Old Testament as well as the New. Human agency in the production of Scripture was lost sight of, and God was considered the author of Scripture in such a sense that the writers were hardly more than amanuenses of the Divine Spirit.

6. Interpretation During the Nineteenth Century. The last hundred years has marked an epoch in the history of Old Testament interpretation. Ecclesiastical and theological fetters are being struck off from the Old Testament, so that the ancient writers can deliver their message to us in some such way as they sought to deliver it to their contemporaries. Up to the present century, with a few exceptions, the Church was inclined to regard the Old Testament purely as a divine book. Now the critics are teaching the church that the Old Testament is best understood when we give the human element in Scripture its due place; that, as we draw nearer the Master by dwelling on his humanity, so we see God's infinite wisdom in his dealings with Israel more clearly when we recognize the human and dispensational limitations of the Old Testament messengers and those to whom they were sent. Higher criticism cannot disprove the fact of a Divine revelation; indeed, it does not seek to do so; it simply deals with the temporal and natural peculiarities of those who bore it, and to whom it was given through many centuries. While such critics as Kuenen may claim that prophecy in ancient Israel was the product of mere naturalism, the history of ancient religions does not furnish a parallel to any such naturalistic development as is sometimes claimed for the Old Testament. The results of the prophecies demand a supernatural cause. The origin of the Old Testament, in its relation to the New, cannot be explained merely as a human production. No higher critic, so far as he is a careful and conscientious investigator, is to be regarded an enemy of revealed religion on account of his investigations. Whatever his personal attitude may be to the religion of Israel, his investigations, so far as they are conducted in a scientific spirit, with an honest effort to know the truth, are to be hailed with satisfaction. This may serve to explain a seeming inconsistency in the attitude of evangelical higher critics to results which are sometimes called "destructive." They are not destructive of the authority of the Old Testament, as tested by the New, but of traditional views with respect to its origin and composition. Hence, they claim they do not affect the fact of a Divine revelation, but rather the manner of it.

The Old Testament interpreter, in the closing years of the nineteenth century, has entered into possession of the following most important helps for interpretation, which are mainly the fruit of studies during the last hundred years:

(1) With reference to the text. At least some progress has been made in seeking to determine the original text of the Old Testament. Many of the suggestions in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament edited by Haupt, from which the translation of the Polychrome Bible is being prepared, are doubtless arbitrary and subjective, but it is a step in the right direction which must be followed by others until scholars shall settle with reasonable unanimity on a critical text of the Old Testament.

(2) The discovery of the meaning of words found in the Old Testament is of the utmost importance. Most of these are clear, because they often occur; many are very obscure, because they are found only once. To determine their signification it is not only necessary to compare the different ancient versions, but also to trace them in cognate languages like Arabic, Aramaic, and Assyrian. In some of these respects, Gesenius introduced a new era through his lexicon, which has passed through many editions since his death, and is now being reproduced in this country with all the appliances of modern scholarship.

(3) Not less important is a study of the structure and connection of sentences. In this regard, Gesenius did a conspicuous service, but it was Ewald who unlocked the treasuries of Hebrew syntax, and who has been the inspiration of all subsequent Hebrew grammarians and interpreters through his insight and commanding genius.

(4) It is also of the utmost importance to know the manners and customs and the geography of the country where the Old Testament was produced. The present century has been characterized by the most interesting antiquarian and geographical researches, not only in Palestine itself, but in the seat of the great world powers with which Israel had to do, and in whose domain at different times they found a home, Egypt and Assyria. The value of these researches as aids to interpretation cannot be overestimated. (See EGYPT; ASSYRIA.)

ious, as therein detailed, resting on foundations laid by Moses, and all ultimately gathered in a law book known by his name, were of slow growth, and did not attain their final form until the reorganization of the Jewish state under Nehemiah and Ezra (B. C. 445-444). Reading the Old Testament in the light of this reconstruction of the Pentateuch, there is not a religious or legal institution which does not show traces of development. The critics discovered long ago that the Hexateuch was composed of three main documents. With reference to this there is now almost unanimous agreement among German Old Testament scholars, and the number of those who give their assent to this view in Great Britain and America is constantly increasing. These documents, known as the Jehovistic, B. C. 640, made up of the Yahvistic, written in Judah B. C. 850, and the Elohist, written in Ephraim, B. C. 750; the Deuteronomic, B. C. 621, including Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic portions of Joshua; and the Priests' Code were all welded together by some unknown editors, and were published by Ezra, B. C. 444. Even these documents contain others of still greater antiquity. The mode of composition employed is sometimes called "patch-work." It preserves the component parts. It is characteristic of Orientals, and can be easily traced in many places in Chronicles by means of an English reference Bible. Let any one examine the component part of 1 Chron. xvi, cutting out the original passages from an English Bible, and pasting them on cardboard by the side of the corresponding passages of the Chronicles. There is much divergence among critics in details as to the age of the documents named and the editions through which they have passed, but very little as to their literary, legal, and theological characteristics.

The present dominant school of criticism, which considers the Priests' Code the youngest part of the Pentateuch, was founded by Graf, who published in 1866 his Historical Books of the Old Testament. But it was the further analysis of Wellhausen (born 1844) and his lucid statement of critical results which won the day in Germany. In Holland the most conspicuous critic of the same school was Kuenen (born 1828, died 1891); in Great Britain, the lamented W. Robertson Smith (born 1846, died 1894), a brilliant scholar and devout Christian, who made a gallant fight for liberty; and in America, C. A. Briggs (born 1841), who has sought a like result. The best summary of the modern critical views of the Old Testament is found in Driver's Literature of the Old Testament.

While the Old Testament, in its general teaching, is level with the comprehension of plain, unlettered people, a large proportion of its literature, especially that which is legal and prophetic, gains immeasurably in interest and instructiveness when interpreted in historic light, and with the instruments afforded by modern criticism. The Old Testament, which was primarily designed to be a light to the feet and a lamp to the path of the Jewish congregation, loses nothing in real power or authority through the most searching investigation. S. I. C.

INTREAT (in-'ēt'), (Gr. παρακαλέω, par-akalēō, I Tim. v:1), to exhort in a kindly spirit without rebuking. In the A. V. of 1611 entreat and intreat are used indifferently in both senses of the word. It signifies to deal with.

INWARD (in'wērd), (Heb. סודי, sode, Job xix:19), intimate, familiar, confidential.

IOTA (t-ō'tā), (Auth. Vers. 'jot'), the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (ι); derived from the Hebrew jod (י) and the Syriac jadh, and employed metaphorically to express the minutest trifle.

It is, in fact, one of several metaphors derived from the alphabet—as when alpha, the first letter, and omega, the last, are employed to express the beginning and the end. We are not to suppose, however, that this proverb was exclusively apposite in the Greek language. The same practical allusion equally existed in Hebrew, some curious examples of which may be seen in Wetstein and Lightfoot. One of these may here suffice:—In the Talmud (Sanhed. xx:2) it is fabled that the book of Deuteronomy came and prostrated itself before God, and said, 'O Lord of the universe, thou hast written in me thy law, but now a testament defective in some parts is defective in all. Behold, Solomon endeavors to root the letter jod out of me,' i. e., in the text, לֹא יִרְבֶּה נָשִׁים, 'he shall not multiply wives' (Deut. xvii:17). 'The holy, blessed God answered,—Solomon, and a thousand such as he, shall perish, but the least word shall not perish out of thee.' This is, in fact, a parallel not only to the usage but the sentiment, as conveyed in Matt. v:18, 'One jot, or one tittle, shall in no wise pass from the law.'

IPHEDEIAH (īph'e-dē'yā), (Heb. יִפְדֵיָהוּ, yif-deh-yaw', Jah will liberate), one of the "sons" of Shashak, a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:25); mentioned as chief of the tribe and resident at Jerusalem (B. C. between 1612 and 1588).

IR (ir), (Heb. עִיר, eer, a city, town), a Benjaminite, father of Shuppim and Huppim (1 Chron. vii:12). He is probably to be identified with a son of Benjamin (Gen. xlvi:21), and not with Iri of 1 Chron. vii:7.

IRA (i'rā), (Heb. עִירָא, ee-raw', citizen, or watchful).

1. A Tekoite, son of Ikkesh, one of David's "thirty" guards (1 Chron. xi:28; 2 Sam. xxiii:26) and commander of the sixth regiment of troops (1 Chron. xxvii:9), B. C. 1046-1014.

2. An "Ithrite," or Jethrite, another of David's famous heroes (2 Sam. xxiii:38; 1 Chron. xi:40), B. C. 1046.

3. A Zairite, David's chaplain (2 Sam. xx:26), B. C. about 1022. Perhaps identical with 2.

IRAD (i'rād), (Heb. עִירָד, ee-rawd', fugitive), son of Enoch, and an antediluvian patriarch of the Cainite line (Gen. iv:18), B. C. after 4045.

IRAM (i'ram), (Heb. עִירָמ, ee-rawm', city-wise), an Edomite leader in Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi:43; 1 Chron. i:54), probably contemporaneous with the Horite kings (perhaps B. C. 1618).

IR-HAHERES (ir-ha-he'res), (Heb. עִיר הַחֵרֶס, eer ha-heh'res, A. V. "the city of destruction"), is the name or epithet of a city of Egypt (Is. xix:18).

If the prophecy is to be taken properly, Ir-haheres must refer to one of the cities partly, at least, inhabited by Jews. Such a one was Onion, which was destroyed by Titus, while Alexandria and perhaps the other three alluded to in the prophecy remained. If the prophecy is to be taken tropically the best meaning can only be determined by verbal criticism.

IRI (i'ri), (Heb. עִירִי, ee-ree', citizen), a Benjaminite, the last enumerated of the five sons of Bela (1 Chron. vii:7), B. C. between 1856 and 1658.

IRIJAH (i-ri'jah), (Heb. יריח, yir-ee-yaw', fearful of Jah), son of Shelemiah, "a captain of the word" at the gate of Benjamin in Jerusalem where he arrested the prophet Jeremiah, alleging that he was about to desert to the Chaldeans, and conducted him back to the princes (Jer. xxxvii:13, 14), B. C. about 597.

IR-NAHASH (ir-na'hāsh), (Heb. ירנחש, eer-naw-khawsh', city of the serpent), a city of Judah which some supposed to have been named from the abundance of serpents in its neighborhood, but more probably from a person named Nahash, or from an image of the animal worshipped here (1 Chron. iv:12). It has been identified by Schwarz and Van de Velde with Deir-Nakhas, east of Beit-Jibrin.

IRON (i'ron). 1. (Heb. יֶרֶן, yir-ohn', place of alarm), a city of Naphtali (Josh. xix:38), probably identical with Zarin (Saulcy, Narrat. ii. 382; Robinson, Research., iii:61, 62, notes).

2. (Heb. בַּרזֶלֶת, bar-zel'e'), a well-known and serviceable metal.

Much stress has been laid upon the absence of iron among the most ancient remains of Egypt; but the speedy decomposition of this metal, especially when buried in the nitrous soil of Egypt, may account for the absence of it among the remains of the early monarchs of a Pharaonic age (Wilkinson's Ancient Egypt, iii:246).

(1) Early Mention. Tubal-Cain is the first mentioned smith, 'a forger of every instrument of iron' (Gen. iv:22). From that time we meet with manufactures in iron of the utmost variety (some articles of which seem to be anticipations of what are commonly supposed to be modern inventions); as iron weapons or instruments (Num. xxxv:16; Job xx:24); barbed iron, used in hunting (Job xli:7); an iron bedstead (Deut. iii:11); chariots of iron (Josh. xvii:16, and elsewhere); iron weights (shekels) (1 Sam. xvii:7); harrows of iron (2 Sam. xii:31); iron armor (2 Sam. xxiii:7); tools (1 Kings vi:7; 2 Kings vi:6); horns (1 Kings xxii:11); nails, hinges (1 Chron. xxii:3); fetters (Ps. cv:18); bars (Ps. cvii:16); iron bars used in fortifying the gates of towns (Ps. cvii:16; Is. xlv:2); a pen of iron (Job xix:24; Jer. xvii:1), a pillar (Jer. i:18); yokes (Jer. xxviii:13; pan (Ezek. iv:3); trees bound with iron (Dan. iv:15); gods of iron (Dan. v:4); threshing instruments (Amos i:3); and in later times, an iron gate (Acts xii:10); the actual cautery (1 Tim. iv:2); breastplates (Rev. ix:9).

(2) Plentiful in Palestine. The mineral origin of iron seems clearly alluded to in Job xxviii:2. It would seem that in ancient times it was a plentiful production of Palestine (Deut. viii:9). There appear to have been furnaces for smelting at an early period in Egypt (Deut. iv:20). The requirement that the altar should be made of 'whole stones over which no man had lift up any iron,' recorded in Josh. viii:31, does not imply any objection to iron as such, but seems to be merely a mode of directing that, in order to prevent idolatry, the stones must not undergo any preparation by art. Iron was prepared in abundance by David for the building of the temple (1 Chron. xxii:3), to the amount of one hundred thousand talents (1 Chron. xxix:7), or rather 'without weight' (1 Chron. xxii:14). Working in iron was considered a calling (2 Chron. ii:7). (See SMITH.) Iron seems to have been better from some countries, or to have undergone some hardening preparation by the inhabitants of them, such as were the people called Chalybes, living near the Euxine Sea (Jer. xv:12); to have been imported from Tarshish to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii:12), and 'bright iron' from Dan and Javan (ver. 19). The superior hardness of iron above all other substances is alluded to in Dan. ii:40. It was found among the Midianites (Num. xxxi:22), and was part of the wealth distributed among the tribes at their location in the land (Josh. xxii:8).

Figurative. Iron is metaphorically alluded to in the following instances: Affliction is signified by the furnace for smelting it (Deut. iv:20). Under the same figure, chastisement (Ezek. xxii:18, 20, 22). Reducing the earth to total barrenness by turning it into iron (Deut. xxviii:23). Slavery, by a yoke of iron (Deut. xxviii:48). Strength, by a bar of it (Job xl:18); the extreme of hardness (Job xli:27); severity of government, by a rod of iron (Ps. ii:9); affliction, by iron fetters (Ps. cvii:10); prosperity, by giving silver for iron (Is. lx:17); political strength (Dan. ii:33); obstinacy, by an iron sinew in the neck (Is. xlvi:4); giving supernatural fortitude to a prophet, making him an iron pillar (Jer. i:18); destructive power of empires, by iron teeth (Dan. vii:7); deterioration of character, by becoming iron (Jer. vi:28; Ezek. xxii:18), which resembles the idea of the iron age; a tiresome burden, by a mass of iron (Ecclus. xxii:15); the greatest obstacles, by walls of iron (2 Macc. xi:9); the certainty with which a real enemy will ever show his hatred, by the rust returning upon iron (Ecclus. xii:10). Iron seems used, as by the Greek poets, metonymically for the sword (Is. x:34), and so the Sept. understands it, μάχαρα. The following is selected as a beautiful comparison made to iron (Prov. xxvii:17). 'Iron (literally) uniteth iron; so a man uniteth the countenance of his friend,' gives stability to his appearance by his presence. A most graphic description of a smith at work is found in Ecclus. xxxviii:28. J. F. D.

IRPEEL (ir'pe-el), (Heb. ירפאל, yir-peh-ale', God will heal), a city of Benjamin mentioned between Rekem and Taralah (Josh. xviii:27). It has been conjecturally identified with el-Kustul, situated on a conical hill in the district west of Jerusalem.

IRRIGATION (ir-ri-gā-shūn). See WATER.

IR-SHEMESH (ir'she'mesh), (Heb. ירשמש, eer sheh'mesh, city of the sun), a city in Dan (Josh. xix:41) supposed to be the same with Beth-Shemesh, the temple of the sun (1 Kings iv:9).

IRU (i'ru), (Heb. ירי, ee-roo', citizen), the first named of the sons of the great Caleb, son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv:15), B. C. 1618. By some it is claimed that the name should be IR.

ISAAC (i'zak), (Heb. יִצְחָק, yits-khawk', laughter, i. e. mockery; יִסְחָק, vis-khawk', he will laugh, in Ps. cv:9; Jer. xxxiii:26; Amos vii:9, 16; Gr. Ἰσαακ, ee-sah-ak').

The only son of Abraham and Sarah, born in his parents' old age.

The promise of a son had been made to them when Abraham was visited by the Lord in the plains of Mamre, and appeared so unlikely to be fulfilled, seeing that both Abraham and Sarah were 'well stricken in years,' that its utterance caused the latter to laugh incredulously. Being reproved for her unbelief she denied that she had laughed. The reason assigned for the special visitation thus promised was, in effect, that Abraham was pious, and would train his offspring in piety, so that he would become the founder of a great nation, and all the nations of the earth should be blessed in him.

In due time Sarah gave birth to a son, who received the name of Isaac. The reason assigned in Gen. xxi:6 for the adoption of this name, has reference to the laughter occasioned by the announcement of the divine intention—and Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, all that hear will laugh with me—the laugh of incredulity being changed into the laugh of joy (comp. Gen. xxi:6; xvii:17; xviii:12).

The first fact that we read of in the history of Isaac, is the command given to his father to offer the youth—thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest—for a burnt-offering on a mountain in the land of Moriah. Abraham proceeded to obey the divine direction, and was on the point of slaying Isaac, when his hand was withheld by the interposition of God, a ram for sacrifice being provided instead.

(1) Views Regarding the Offering Up of Isaac. This event has found no few detractors. Eichhorn (Bibl. f. Bibl. Lit. i. 45, sq.) regarded the whole as a vision; Otmars (Henkes' Mag. ii. 517), as the explanation of an hieroglyph; Bruns (Paulus Memorab. vi:1, sq.) finds the source of it in the Phœnician custom of sacrificing children. Some compare (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. i. 95) with this narrative the Grecian story of Iphigenia, and other fables of a similar kind. The general aim of certain writers has been, as they consider it, to relieve the Bible from the odium which the narrated circumstances are in their opinion fitted to occasion. That the passage is free from every possible objection, it may be too much to assert; it is, however, equally clear that many of the objections taken to it arise from viewing the facts from a wrong position, or under the discoloring medium of a foregone and adverse conclusion. The only proper way is to consider it as it is represented in the sacred page. The command, then, was especially designed to try Abraham's faith. The trial was made, the fact was ascertained, the victim was not slain. What is there in this to which either religion or morality can take exception? This view is both confirmed and justified by the words of God (Gen. xxii:16, sq.), 'because thou hast not withheld thy only son, in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.'

(2) Marriage. Isaac passed his youthful days under the eye of his father, engaged in the care of flocks and herds up and down the plains of Canaan. At length his father wished to see him married. Abraham therefore gave a commission to his oldest and most trustworthy servant to the effect that, in order to prevent Isaac from taking a wife from among the daughters of the Canaanites, he should proceed into Mesopotamia, and, under the divine direction, choose a partner among his own relatives for his beloved son. Rebekah, in consequence, becomes Isaac's wife, when he was now forty years of age.

In connection with this marriage an event is recorded which displays the peculiar character of Isaac, while it is in keeping with the general tenor of the sacred record regarding him. Probably in expectation of the early return of his father's messenger, and somewhat solicitous as to the result of the embassy, he went out to meditate in the field at the eventide. While there engaged in tranquil thought, he chanced to raise his eyes, when lo! he beheld the retinue near at hand, and soon conducted his bride into his mother's tent. In unison with all this is the simple declaration of the history, that Isaac 'loved her.' Isaac was evidently a man of kind and gentle disposition, of a calm and reflective turn of mind, simple in his habits, having few wants, good rather than great, fitted to receive impressions and follow a guide, not to originate important influences, or perform deeds of renown.

(3) Children. Isaac having, in conjunction with his half-brother Ishmael, buried Abraham his father, 'in a good old age, in the cave of Machpelah,' took up a somewhat permanent residence 'by the well Lahai-roi,' where, being blessed of God, he lived in prosperity and at ease. One source of regret, however, he deeply felt. Rebekah was barren. In time, two sons, Jacob and Esau, are granted to his prayers. As the boys grew, Isaac gave a preference to Esau, who seems to have possessed those more robust qualities of character in which his father was defective, and therefore gratified him by such dainties as the pursuits of the chase enabled the youth to offer; while Jacob, 'a plain man dwelling in tents,' was an object of special regard to Rebekah—a division of feeling and a kind of partiality which became the source of much domestic unhappiness, as well as of jealousy and hatred between the two sons.

(4) Denies His Wife. A famine compels Isaac to seek food in some foreign land. Divinely warned not to go down to Egypt, the patriarch applies to a petty prince of Philistia, by name Abimelech, who permits him to dwell at Gerar. Here an event took place which has a parallel in the life of his father Abraham. Rebekah was his cousin; afraid lest she should be violently taken from him, and his own life sacrificed to the lust of Abimelech, he represented her as his sister, employing a latitude of meaning which the word 'sister' admits in Oriental usage. The subterfuge was discovered, and is justified by Isaac on the grounds which prompted him to resort to it.

Another parallel event in the lives of Abraham and Isaac may be found by comparing together Gen. xxvi:26, sq., and xxi:22, sq. If these parallels should excite a doubt in the mind of any one as to the credibility of the narratives, let him carefully peruse them, and we think that the simplicity and naturalness which pervade and characterize them will effectually substantiate the reality of the recorded events, and explode the notion that fiction has had anything to do in bringing the narrative into its present shape.

(5) Pronounces a Blessing Upon Jacob. Isaac, in his old age, was, by the practices of Rebekah and the art of Jacob, so imposed upon as to give his blessing to the younger son Jacob, instead of to the firstborn, Esau, and with that blessing to convey, as was usual, the right of headship in the family, together with his chief possessions. In the blessing which the aged patriarch pronounced on Jacob it deserves notice how entirely the wished-for good is of an earthly and temporal nature, while the imagery which is employed serves to show the extent to which the poetical element prevailed as a constituent part of the Hebrew character (Gen. xxvii:27, sq.). Most natural, too, is the extreme agitation of the poor blind old man, on discovering the cheat which had been put upon him: 'And Isaac trembled very exceedingly, and said (to Esau), Who? where is he that hath taken venison and brought it me, and I have eaten, and have blessed him? Yea, and he shall be blessed.' Equally natural is the reply of Esau. The entire passage is of itself enough to vindicate the historical character and entire credibility of those sketches of the lives of the patriarchs which Genesis presents.

The stealing, on the part of Jacob, of his father's blessing having angered Esau, who seems to have looked forward to Isaac's death as affording an opportunity for taking vengeance on his unjust brother, the aged patriarch is induced, at his wife's entreaty, to send Jacob into Mesopotamia that, after his own example, his son might take a wife from amongst his kindred and people, 'of the daughters of Laban, thy mother's brother.'

This is the last important act recorded of Isaac. Jacob having, agreeably to his father's command, married into Laban's family, returned, after some time, and found the old man at Mamre, in the city of Arbah, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned.

(6) Death. Here, 'being old and full of days' (180), Isaac 'gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people, and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him' (Gen. xxxv:27, sq.).

(7) Character. Isaac, the gentle and dutiful son, the faithful and constant husband, became the father of a house in which order did not reign. If there were any very prominent points in his character they were not brought out by the circumstances in which he was placed. He appears less as a man of action than as a man of suffering, from which he is generally delivered without any direct effort of his own. Thus he suffers as the object of Ishmael's mocking, of the intended sacrifice on Moriah, of the rapacity of the Philistines, and of Jacob's stratagem. But the thought of his sufferings is effaced by the ever present tokens of God's favor; and he suffers with the calmness and dignity of a conscious heir of heavenly promises, without uttering any complaint, and generally without committing any action by which he would forfeit respect. Free from violent passions, he was a man of constant, deep, and tender affections. Thus he mourned for his mother till her place was filled by his wife. His sons were nurtured at home till a late period of their lives; and neither his grief for Esau's marriage, nor the anxiety in which he was involved in consequence of Jacob's deceit, estranged either of them from his affectionate care. His life of solitary blamelessness must have been sustained by strong habitual piety such as showed itself at the time of Rebekah's barrenness (xxv:21), in his special intercourse with God at Gerar and Beer-sheba (xxvi:2, 23), in the solemnity with which he bestows his blessing and refuses to change it. His life, judged by a worldly standard, might seem inactive, ignoble, and unfruitful; but the "guileless years, prayers, gracious acts and daily thank-offerings of pastoral life" are not to be so esteemed, although they make no show in history. Isaac's character may not have exercised any commanding influence upon either his own or succeeding generations; but it was sufficiently marked and consistent to win respect and envy from his contemporaries. By his posterity his name is always joined in equal honor with those of Abraham and Jacob; and so it was even used as part of the formula which Egyptian magicians in the time of Origen (Contra Celsum, i:22) employed as efficacious 'to bind the demons whom they adjured (comp. Gen. xxxi:42, 53). (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

ISAIAH (i-zā'yā or i-zā'yā), (Heb. יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, yeshah-yaw' hoo; LXX, Isaias).

1. Life and Times of the Prophet Isaiah. The heading of this book places the prophet under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and an examination of the prophecies themselves, independently of the heading, leads us to the same chronological results. Chapter vi, in which is related the call of Isaiah, is thus headed: 'In the year in which King Uzziah died [i. e., B. C. 735] I saw the Lord,' etc. Isaiah was accordingly born about 765. His father's name is given as Amoz (not Amos, with which it was confounded by some ancient Fathers).^{*} According to a Jewish rabbinical tradition, Isaiah was either the brother or nephew of King Amaziah, a tradition which has been supported in modern times by pointing to the occurrence of the name of Jehovah as a part of Isaiah's name. This, it has been said, was customary in the earlier periods of Israel's history only in royal circles. But no safe conclusion can be drawn from these data, and, as a matter of fact we must confess that of his earlier personal life nothing is known.

The age in which he lived, however, was critical, and is one of the best understood of all Biblical periods. It is the age in which the great Assyrian monarchs, Tiglath-pileser III, Shalmaneser IV, Sargon, and Sennacherib undertook and carried on extensive campaigns of conquest in Northern Palestine, as well as against Israel and Judah. It was an age in which the true mission of Israel was in need of being specially emphasized. And to this work Isaiah was divinely called. If we assume that he began his prophetic work in B. C. 735, and take into account the data in chapters 36-39 of the book, which indicate that he was active in public life in the fifteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah; i. e., B. C. 713, we shall have a life of public service extending over at least twenty-two years. How much longer he lived and prophesied it is not easy to determine precisely. Some modern scholars, led by Standlein, Jahn, Bertholdt, and Gesenius, have advanced the opinion that Isaiah lived to a much later period, and that his life extended to the reign of Manasseh, the successor of Hezekiah. For this opinion the following reasons are adduced:

(1) According to 2 Chron. xxxii:32, Isaiah wrote the life of King Hezekiah. It would hence appear that he survived that king.

(2) We find a tradition current in the Talmud, in the Fathers, and in Oriental literature, that Isaiah suffered martyrdom in the reign of Manasseh, by being sawn asunder. It is thought that an allusion to this tradition is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi:37), in the expression, they were sawn asunder (ἐπισθηνσαν), which seems to harmonize, though somewhat vaguely, with 2 Kings xxi:16, 'Moreover Manasseh shed innocent blood very much.'

(3) The authenticity of the second portion of the prophecies of Isaiah being assumed, the nature of this portion would seem to confirm the idea that its author had lived under Manasseh.

These arguments, however, cannot be regarded as conclusive. The first can only prove that Isaiah survived Hezekiah; but even this does not follow with certainty, because in 2 Chron. xxxii:32, where Isaiah's biography of Hezekiah is mentioned, the important words, 'first and last,' are omitted; while in chapter xxvi:22, we read, 'Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah, the son of Amoz, write.' If we take into consideration this important omission, we can easily believe that Isaiah died before Hezekiah, although he wrote his biography up to a certain point; more especially if we bear in mind that, according to the books of Kings and Chronicles, the latter years of the reign of Hezekiah were devoid of important events. We certainly find, in all ages of literature, biographies of persons written during their lifetime.

^{*}This confusion was due to ignorance of the Hebrew language. The Fathers were accustomed to the use of the Greek Version of the Scriptures, in which Amoz and Amos are precisely the same in spelling.

We may well suppose that the history of Hezekiah terminated with the glorious aid granted to him in his war with the Assyrians, and with the events immediately consequent upon that war.

In reply to the second argument, we observe that it is not certain that the word ἐπλάθονσαν, "they were sown asunder," is used in Hebrews with reference to Isaiah. The statement in the Fathers, and in Oriental writers is entirely deduced from the Jewish tradition, which is throughout of so doubtful a character that no conclusive argument can be based upon it.

With regard to the third argument, we remark, that the differences discernible, if we compare the latter with former portions of Isaiah, can, and ought to be, differently accounted for. Such merely external attempts at explanation always prove unsatisfactory when closely examined.

On the other hand, the superscription of the book indicates that the prophet's public ministry, if not his life, closed either during the life of Hezekiah or very soon after that king's death. According to this superscription, all the prophecies of Isaiah were uttered within the period from Uzziah to Hezekiah. Not one of the prophecies which is headed by a separate superscription of its own is placed after the fifteenth year of Hezekiah; and the internal evidence leads us in none beyond this period. Hence, we infer that the prophetic ministry of Isaiah terminated soon after its fullest development, to which it attained during the period of the Assyrian invasion, in the reign of Hezekiah.

According to these statements Isaiah belongs to the cycle of the most ancient prophets whose predictions have been preserved in writing. He was a contemporary of Hosea and Amos, although younger than those prophets, who belonged to the kingdom of Israel. He was likewise a contemporary and co-worker of the prophet Micah in the kingdom of Judah.

Isaiah was a resident, and perhaps a native, of Jerusalem. He was married, his wife being called "the prophetess" (viii:3). Two of his sons are mentioned, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz. These significant names, which he gave to his sons, prove how much the prophet lived in his vocation. He did not consider his children to belong merely to himself, but rendered them living admonitions to the people. In their names were contained the two chief points of his prophetic utterances: one (Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "Spoil-speeds-booty-hastes") recalled to mind the severe and inevitable judgment wherewith the Lord was about to visit the world, and especially his people; the other, Shear-jashub, which signifies "The-remnant-shall-return," pointed out the mercy with which the Lord would receive the elect, and with which, in the midst of apparent destruction, he would take care to preserve his people and his kingdom.

His wife's name, "the prophetess," cannot mean the wife of a prophet, but indicates that the prophetess of Isaiah had a prophetic gift, like Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah. The appellation here given denotes the genuineness of their conjugal relation.

Even the dress of the prophet was subservient to his vocation. According to chapter xx:2, he wore a garment of haircloth or sackcloth. This seems also to have been the costume of Elijah, according to 2 Kings i:8; and it was the dress of John the Baptist. Hairy sackcloth is in the Bible the symbol of repentance (compare Is. xxii:12; xxxvii:1, 2, and 1 Kings xxi:27). This costume of the prophets was a sermo propheticus realis, a prophetic preaching by fact. The prophetic preacher comes forward in the form of personified repentance. What he does, exhibits to the people what they should do. Before he has opened his lips his external appearance proclaims μετανοείτε, repent.

2. Lost Writings Ascribed to Isaiah. Besides the prophecies which have been preserved to us, Isaiah also is said to have written two historical works. It was part of the vocation of the prophets to write the history of the kingdom of God, to exhibit in this history the workings of the law of retribution, and to exhort to the true worship of the Lord. History, as written by the prophets, is itself retroverted prediction, and, as such, offers rich materials for prophecy, strictly so-called. Since all the acts of God proceed from his essence, a complete understanding of the past implies also the future; and, vice versa, a complete understanding of the future implies a knowledge of the past. Most of the historical books in the Old Testament have been written by prophets. The collectors of the Canon placed most of these books under the head נְבִיאִים, prophets;

hence, it appears that, even when these historical works were remodeled by later editors, these editors were themselves prophets. The Chronicles are not placed among the נְבִיאִים, prophets; this is no sign that they were not written by a prophet. Their author constantly indicates that he composed his work from abstracts taken verbatim from historical monographs written by the prophets; consequently the books of Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther are the only historical books of the Old Testament which did not originate from prophets.

The first historical work of Isaiah was a biography of King Uzziah (comp. 2 Chron. xxvi:22, 'Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, write'). The second historical work of Isaiah was a biography of King Hezekiah, which was subsequently inserted in the annals of Judah and Israel. These annals consisted of a series of prophetic monographs, which were received partly entire, and partly in abstracts, and are the chief source from which the information contained in the Chronicles is derived. In this work of Isaiah, although its contents are chiefly historical, numerous prophecies were inserted. Hence it is called in 2 Chron. xxxii:32, The Vision of Isaiah. In a similar manner the biography of Solomon by Ahijah is called in 2 Chron. ix:29, The Prophecy of Ahijah. The two historical works of Isaiah were lost, together with the annals of Judah and Israel, into which they were embodied. Whatever these annals contained that was of importance for all ages, has been preserved to us by being received into the historical books of the Old Testament, and the predictions of the most distinguished prophets have been formed into separate collections. After this was effected, less care was taken to preserve the more diffuse annals, which also comprehended many statements, of value only for particular times and places.

3. The Book of Isaiah. (1) Structure and Content. At the very first glance the Book of Isaiah is seen to consist of three very distinct parts. It is divided into 66 chapters. Of these, chapters i-xxxv constitute a more or less homogeneous collection and are distinctly prophetic. Chapters xxxvi-xxxix contain a historical sketch of some events during Hezekiah's reign, and chapters xl-lxvi constitute another homogeneous collection, and are as distinctly prophetic as chapters i-xxxv.

The first of these sections may be further subdivided into five groups of prophetic discourses as follows: (a) Chapters i-xii, dealing generally with the political, social and moral conditions in Judah during the time of the threatened Assyrian and Syrian invasions. Chapter i has been quite properly entitled The Great Arrangement. It contains a severe denunciation of the lukewarmness and formalism of the people as well as of the princes and rulers. Chapters ii-iv constitute a connected discourse, opening with a glowing picture of the future exaltation of Zion, then showing by way of contrast its present need and low moral condition, and closing with another picture of its future glory. Chapter v presents in a parable—that of the vine—the care of Jehovah for Judah. Chapter vi gives an account of the vision in the last year of Uzziah's life with which the prophet's ministry began. Chapters vii, x:4, consist of a series of oracles delivered during the reign of Ahaz. The remainder of chapter x (verses 5-34) is a discourse against Assyria. Chapter xi predicts the advent of the Messiah, and chapter xii is a short psalm of thanksgiving to Jehovah. (b) Chapters xiii-xxiii contain a series of so-called "Burden," i. e., denunciatory oracles on the nations dwelling in Palestine and adjacent countries. The first of these oracles is entitled the Burden of Babylon, and occupies chapters xiii and xiv; the second is the Burden of Moab, in chapters xv and xvi; the third, the Burden of Damascus, in chapter xvii; the fourth, the Burden of Ethiopia, in chapter xviii; the fifth, the Burden of Egypt, in chapter xix. This section is interrupted here by the insertion of a historical fragment, chapter xx, after which come the sixth Burden, i. e., that of the "Wilderness of the Sea," chapter xxi:1, 10; the seventh, i. e., the Burden of Dumah, xxi:11-12; the eighth, i. e., the Burden of Arabia, xxi:13-17; the ninth, i. e., the Burden of the Valley of the Vision (Judah), chapter xxii; and the tenth, i. e., the Burden of Tyre, chapter xxiii. (c) Chapters xxiv-xxvii are of the nature of an eschatological vision. They depict the final judgment and consummation of all things brought about by the confusion, desolation, and collapse of the world, out of which, however, Israel is saved and its dead are raised to life again. (d) Chapters xxviii-xxxiii have been entitled the "Book of Zion." They contain discourses addressed directly to Zion, admonishing and warning it by the example of Samaria (chapters xxviii and xxix), pointing out the folly of an Egyptian alliance (chapters xxx and xxxi), promising a restoration to ideal conditions (chapter xxxii), and denouncing the conquering Assyrian (chapter xxxiii). (e) Chapters xxxiv and xxxv give a picture of the redemption of Israel, the judgment of Edom, and the return of the captives home.

The second main division of the book narrates Sennacherib's invasion and demand for the submission of Hezekiah, and the disastrous ending of the invasion (comp. 2 Kings xvii:30; xx:19), the sickness of Hezekiah (chapter xxxviii), and the mission of Merodach Baladan to Hezekiah (chapter xxxix).

The third division of the book, comprising xl-lxvi, has been called the Book of Consolations. Its standpoint is the end of the Babylonian exile, B. C. 550-540, and it is designed evidently to comfort and encourage the captives and assure them of speedy restoration to their native land. The prophecy is continuous and, although capable of minute and detailed analysis, it cannot be subdivided into oracles and discourses as readily as the first section. The best analysis made is that into three parts, i. e. (1) chapters xl-xlvi, (2) chapters xlix-lix, and (3) chapters lx-lxvi.

In the first of these divisions the prophet aims to assure the Jews in exile of the certainty of restoration. Chapter xl opens with an exhortation to the people to be of good cheer, for the Great and Divine Deliverer is about to come. The way should be prepared for him. Nothing can hinder him, because no creature can compare with him, nor can any human conception express him (xl:1-26); hence Jacob is to take courage (27-31). Jacob is Jehovah's favored servant; therefore for his benefit Jehovah stirred up the "righteous man from the east" (Cyrus) (xli:1-9); the servant of Jehovah should fear no ill; Jehovah who protects him knows the end from the beginning (10-29). Jehovah's servant, the Israel of xli:8 is a complex and ideal personality whose head (the Messiah) is at times so prominently before the mind of the prophet that he is spoken of exclusively as "The Servant," whereas at other times, what is said of the servant can only refer to the Israel of God, the people of whom the Messiah is the Head and representative. In chapter xlii:1-12, the Messiah as the Servant of Jehovah is looked to as about to accomplish a double work; i. e. (1) that of enlightening the world and leading it to the true knowledge of God, and (2) that of redeeming Israel, his people, and restoring it to its glory. The mention of Israel leads the prophet to fall back on the more general meaning of the term servant, and, speaking of Israel as the servant, to account for the woes of the Babylonian captivity as caused by the spiritual blindness and deafness of this servant (xlii:13-25). From these woes, however, Jehovah was determined to redeem the people and to enlarge it by the adoption into its fold of the nations of the earth (xliii-xliv:5). In xlv:6; xlv:25, the greatness and power of Jehovah once more come into the foreground of the prophet's thought. Chapters xlvi and xlvii are occupied with the impending fall of Babylon, the former chapter containing a derisive picture of the downfall of its idols and the latter of the city itself. Chapter xlviii is a recapitulation of the thoughts of chapters xl-xlvii, closing with a triumphant call by the prophet in the name of Jehovah unto his servant Israel to come out of Babylon.

The second section of this great prophecy (xlix-lx) may be entitled the Servant of Jehovah. The preceding section had been designed to produce the conviction of the certainty of the restoration. In this one the conviction is assumed to have been formed in the hearts of the people and they are urged to fit themselves for their privileges and enjoy them when they came. The section opens with a dramatic introduction of the Servant of Jehovah and his double work. In chapter l the servant himself declares the character of his work and the difficulties in his way. In chapters li and lii to lv, verse 12, the prophet reverts to the thought of the return, and is filled with the joy of triumph as he realizes the certainty of the event. Chapters lii:13; liii:12, once more present the Servant of Jehovah, but now as the ideal leader, who through humiliation, suffering, and death, not for his own sins but for those of others, is lifted to a higher pedestal of honor and joy. This prophecy has rightly been viewed as fulfilled exhaustively only in the career of Jesus Christ, the true and ideal Servant of Jehovah. In liv-lvi:8 further promises of restoration are addressed to the people. In lvi:9-lviii the prophet reproves Israel and calls for reformation. This is followed by repentance and the people are represented as confessing their sins in chapter lix.

The third and last section of the prophecy (lx-lxvi) depicts in glowing colors the Future Glory of the Restored Israel. The darkness of the past is in chapter lx represented as dispelled and the "light" of Zion has dawned upon her. This is followed by an enumeration of Jehovah's favors to the redeemed Zion (lxi, lxii). In chapter lxiii Israel's triumph over her enemies is foreshadowed first in a dramatic dialogue between the prophet and Jehovah as a victor returning from the conquest of Edom, and afterwards in songs of thanksgiving and praise for the conquest of Israel's enemies. In chapter lxv the new relation of God to his people is assured and a new era of prosperity is foreshadowed; and in lxvi the view of the restoration of the temple-service leads to the appreciation of the greatness and majesty of Jehovah, who transcends all earthly temples, and is above visible service. The whole prophecy then closes with a contrasted portraiture of the glory of Zion and the judgment to be visited upon her enemies.

(2) Integrity of the Book of Isaiah. The question of the integrity of Isaiah was first raised by Koppe in his German translation of Lowth's Isaiah (pub. 1778). Until this time the title given to the whole collection in chapter i:1 was tacitly accepted as a certificate of the fact that Isaiah, the Son of Amoz, had written the whole book. Koppe denied the validity of this position, and was quickly answered by Kocher (1786). From this beginning the controversy has been carried on involving more and more of the book in its successive stages. At the present day three general views may be distinguished. First, that of those who believe in the unity of the book. Second, that of those who divide it into three parts, ascribing each to one general author; i. e., (1) chapters i-xxxv by Isaiah, the son of Amoz; (2) chapters xxxvi-xxxix reproduced from 2 Kings; (3) chapters xl-lxvi by Deutero-Isaiah, called also the "Great Unknown prophet of the Exile." Third, that of those who find in parts i and iii a multiplicity of authors. The majority of scholars for the present occupies the second of these positions. The reasons for the unity of the book may be given as follows:

First View for Unity of Isaiah.

(a) Isaiah's name is attached to the whole collection (i:1), "The vision of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah kings of Judah." It is here clearly stated that Isaiah was the author of the following prophecies, uttered during the reign of four successive kings. This inscription is of great importance, even if it originated not from Isaiah, but from a later compiler. If we adopt the latest date at which this compilation could have been made, we must fix it at the time of its reception into the canon in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah. Consequently the compiler could not be separated by many years from the Deutero-Isaiah who is said to have prophesied just before Babylon was conquered, or who, according to most critics, wrote even after the fall of Babylon. It is not credible that a compiler living so near the times of the author, should have erroneously ascribed these prophecies to Isaiah, who lived so much earlier, especially if we bear in mind that this so-called Deutero-Isaiah must have been a very remarkable person in an age so devoid of the prophetic spirit as that in which he is said to have lived.

It is still less credible that a Deutero-Isaiah should himself have fraudulently ascribed his prophecies to Isaiah. None of the adversaries of the authenticity of chapters xl-lxvi make such an assertion.

If the compiler lived before the exile, the inscription appears to be of still greater importance. That the collection was made so early is very likely, from the circumstance that Jeremiah and other prophets apparently made use of the prophecies of Isaiah. This fact indicates that the prophecies of Isaiah early excited a lively interest, and that the compiler must have lived at a period earlier than that which is ascribed to the Deutero-Isaiah himself. From all this we infer that the compiler lived before the exile. The opponents of the authenticity of chapters xl-lxvi have felt the weight of this argument. They have therefore attempted to remove it by various hypotheses, which have received a semblance of probability from the circumstance that even the considerate Vitringa has in question the authenticity of the heading. Vitringa has conjectured that this heading originally belonged to the first chapter alone. He has further conjectured that it originally contained only words, prophecy of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem. The following words, he says, were added by the compiler, who enlarged the particular inscription of the first chapter to a general one of the whole collection. According to Vitringa the inscription does not suit the whole book, the contents of which are not confined to Judah and Jerusalem alone. This had been felt even by Kimchi, who, anticipating the objection, observes, quaecunque contra gentes profert, ea omnia propter Judam dicit. "Whatever Isaiah utters against the nations, he says on account of Judah." Judah and Jerusalem are the chief subject, and, in a certain sense, the only subject of prophecy. There is no prophecy concerning other nations without a bearing upon the covenant-people. If this bearing should be wanting in any portion of the prophecy, that portion would be a piece of divination and soothsaying. No prophet against foreign nations prophesied concerning them with the view of spreading his predictions among them, because the mission of all prophets is to Israel. The predictions against foreign nations are intended to preserve the covenant-people from despair, and to strengthen their faith in the omnipotence and justice of their God. These predictions are intended to annihilate the reliance upon political combinations and human confederacies. They are intended to lead Israel to the question, "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If this is the punishment of those who are less intimately allied with God, what shall then become of us to whom He has more clearly revealed Himself? But they are also intended to indicate the future conversion of the heathen, 'and to open to the view of the faithful the future glory of the kingdom of God, and its final victory over the kingdoms of this world; and thus to extirpate all narrow-minded and national particularism. God shall be revealed not only as Jehovah, but also as Elohim. His relation to Israel is misunderstood, if that relation is exclusively kept in view without any regard to the universe. Therefore the whole collection is justly entitled "Prophecies concerning Judah and Jerusalem." No matter whether this inscription originated from Isaiah himself or from an ancient compiler. That the Hebrew word for "vision" means not merely a vision, but also a collection of visions and prophecies, may be learned from 2 Chron. xxxii:32, and Nah. i:1. It means a collection of prophecies and visions united like a picture in an historical frame (comp. Jer. xiv:14), although it may also denote the separate prophecy, as in Obadiah, verse 1. The Hebrew for "vision" has no plural (comp. Hitzig's Commentary on chapter i:1; Ewald, Propheten, i, p. 59).

(b) It cannot be proved that there ever existed any so-called prophetic anthology as has been supposed to exist in the book of Isaiah. We find nothing analogous in the whole range of prophetic literature. It is generally granted that the collections bearing the names of Jeremiah and Ezekiel contain only productions of those authors whose name they bear. In the book of the Minor Prophets, the property of each is strictly distinguished from the rest by headings. The authenticity of only the second portion of Zechariah has been attacked; and this with very feeble arguments, which have been refuted. De Wette himself has, in the latest editions of the Introduction, confessed that on this point he is vanquished.

But even if it could be proved that the prophecies of Zechariah belonged to two different authors, namely (as Bertholdt and Gesenius suppose), to the two Zechariahs, each of whom happened to be the son of a Barachiah, this identity of names might be considered an inducement for uniting the productions of the two authors in one connection; still this case would not be analogous to what is asserted to be the fact in Isaiah. In Isaiah, it is alleged not only that a series of chapters belonging to a different author was subjoined, commencing about chapter xxxiv, but it is affirmed that, even in the first thirty-three chapters, the genuine and spurious portions are intermixed. Before we admit that the compilers proceeded here in a manner so unreasonable, and so contrary to their usual custom, we must expect some cogent proof to be adduced.

(c) According to the opinion of several critics, all spurious portions of Isaiah belong to one and the same author. But it so happens that the portion which is most emphatically declared to be spurious, namely, chapters xiii and xiv, bear an inscription which expressly ascribes them to Isaiah. Now, as the internal arguments against the authenticity of all the portions which are said to be spurious are nearly identical, if the opposition to chapters xiii and xiv is given up, it cannot with consistency be maintained against the other portions. This argument serves also as an answer to those who ascribe the portions which they consider spurious to several authors. The contents of these portions are similar. They contain predictions of the fall of Babylon, and of the redemption of Israel from captivity. Whatever proves the genuineness of one of these portions indirectly proves the others also to be genuine.

(d) According to Josephus (Antiq. xi, c, 1, 2), Cyrus was induced by the prophecies of Isaiah respecting him, to allow the return of the Jews, and to aid them in rebuilding the temple. The credibility of Josephus, who in regard to facts of ancient history is not always to be relied upon, is here supported by two circumstances. First, the favor shown by Cyrus to the Jews, which remains inexplicable except by the fact mentioned, in combination with the influence of Daniel. In modern times, the favor of Cyrus to the Jews has been called a prudential measure; but it does not appear what he could either hope or fear from a people so enfeebled as the Jews were at that period. It has been added that Cyrus was favorable to the Jews on account of the similarity between the Persian and the Jewish religions; but there is no historical proof that the Persians, on any other occasion, favored the Jews on account of their religion. The favors shown to Nehemiah on behalf of Israel were only personal favors, owing to his position at the Persian court. We allow that all this would be insufficient to prove the correctness of the above statement in Josephus, but it must render us inclined to admit its truth.

The second argument is much stronger; it is that the statement of Josephus is supported by the edict of Cyrus (Ezra i). This edict presupposes the fact related by Josephus, so that Jahn calls the passage in Josephus a commentary on the first chapter of Ezra, in which we read that Cyrus announces in his edict that he was commanded by Jehovah to build him a temple in Jerusalem, and that he received all the conquered kingdoms of the earth as a gift from Jehovah. This cannot refer to any other predictions of the prophet, but only to what are called the spurious portions of Isaiah, in which the Lord grants to Cyrus all his future conquests, and appoints him to be the restorer of his temple (comp. xli:2-4; xlv:24-28; xlv:1-13; xlvi:11; xlviii:13-15). The edict adopts almost the words of these passages (comp. the synopsis in the above-mentioned work of Kleinert, p. 142). In reply to this it is alleged that Cyrus was deceived by pseudo-prophecies forged in the name of Isaiah; but if Cyrus could be deceived in so clumsy a manner, he was not the man that history represents him; and to have committed forgery is so contrary to what was to be expected from the author of chapters xl-lxvi, that even the feelings of our opponents revolt at the supposition that the Deutero-Isaiah should have forged vaticinia post eventum in the name of the prophets. Had these prophecies been written, as it is alleged, only in sight of the conquest of Babylon, Cyrus would have been deceived before the eyes of the author, and this could not have been effected without collusion on the part of the author. This collusion would be undeniable, since the author again and again repeats that he was proclaiming unheard-of facts, which were beyond all human calculation.

(a) In the books of the prophets who lived after Isaiah, and before the period of the so-called Deutero-Isaiah, we find imitations of those prophecies which have been ascribed to the latter. Since Gesenius has demonstrated that all the portions which have been considered spurious are to be ascribed to only one author, it can be shown that they were all in existence before the time assigned to the Deutero-Isaiah, although we can produce the imitations of only some of these portions. But even those who ascribe these portions to different authors must grant that their objections are invalidated, if it can be shown that later prophets have referred to these portions, because the arguments employed against them closely resemble each other; consequently these prophecies stand and fall together. This verbal coincidence between Jeremiah and the so-called Deutero-Isaiah is in this respect most important. Jeremiah frequently makes use of the earlier prophets, and he refers equally, and in the same manner, to the portions of Isaiah whose genuineness has been questioned, as to those which are deemed authentic. The most striking is the coincidence of Jeremiah 1:51 with the predictions against Babylon in Isaiah. Jeremiah here gives to God the appellation, The Holy One of Israel, which frequently occurs in Isaiah, especially in the portions whose authenticity is questioned, but is found only three times in the other books of the Old Testament. Isaiah uses this appellation with peculiar predilection, because it points out the omnipotent covenant-fidelity of the Lord; which was to be considered, especially as it guarantees the truth of the contents of the prophecies attacked.

(b) Again, the most ancient production of Jewish literature after the completion of the canon furnishes proof of the integral authenticity of Isaiah. The book of Jesus Ben Sirach, commonly called Ecclesiasticus, was written as early as the third century before Christ, as Hug has clearly demonstrated in opposition to those who place it in the second century before Christ. In Ecclesiasticus xlvi:22-25, Isaiah is thus praised: 'For Hezekiah had done the thing that pleased the Lord, and was strong in the ways of David his father, as Isaiah the prophet, who was great and faithful in his vision, had commanded him. In his time the sun went backward, and he lengthened the king's life. He saw by an excellent spirit what should come to pass at the last, and he comforted them that mourned in Zion. He showed what should come to pass forever, and secret things or ever they came.'

This commendation especially refers, as even Gesenius grants, to the disputed portions of the prophet, in which we find predictions of the most distant futurity. The comfort for Zion is found more particularly in the second part of Isaiah, which begins with the words, 'Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people.' The author of this second part himself says (xlviii:3), 'I have declared the former things from the beginning; and they went forth out of my mouth, and I showed them.' Thus we perceive that Jesus Ben Sirach, the learned scribe, confidently attributes the debated passages to Isaiah in such a manner as plainly indicates that there was no doubt in his days respecting the integral authenticity of that book, which has the testimony of historical tradition in its favor. Jesus Ben Sirach declares his intention (Ecclus. xlv:1) to praise the most celebrated men of his nation. The whole tenor of these chapters shows that he does not confine himself to celebrated authors. We therefore say that the praise which he bestows upon Isaiah is not intended for the book personified, but for the person of the prophet. If Ben Sirach had entertained doubts respecting the genuineness of those prophecies on which, in particular, he bases his praise, he could not have so lauded the prophet.

In the Jewish synagogue the integral authenticity of Isaiah has always been recognized. This general recognition cannot be accounted for except by the power of tradition based upon truth; and it is supported as well by the New Testament, in which Isaiah is quoted as the author of the whole collection which bears his name, as also by the express testimony of Josephus, especially in his Antiquities (x. 2, 2 and xi. 1. 1).

(c) After such confirmation it would be superfluous to mention the Talmudists.

It is very remarkable that in the far from scanty historical accounts of this period, considering all circumstances, no mention is made of any prophet to whom we could well ascribe these prophecies. This is the more remarkable, because at that period prophetism was on the wane, and the few prophets who still existed excited on that account the greater attention. What Ewald (p. 57) writes concerning the time about the conclusion of the Babylonian exile, is quite unhistorical. He says, 'In this highly excited period of liberty regained, and of a national church re-established, there were rapidly produced a great number of prophecies, circulated in a thousand pamphlets, many of which were of great poetical beauty.' What Ewald states about a new flood of prophetic writings which then poured forth, is likewise unhistorical. History shows that during the exile prophetism was on the wane. What we read in the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel proves that these prophets were isolated; and from the book of Ezra we learn what was the spiritual condition of the new colony. If we compare with their predecessors the prophets who then prophesied, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, we cannot say much about a revival of the prophetic spirit towards the conclusion of the exile. Everything concurs to show that the efficiency of prophetism was drawing towards its end. The later prophets are, the more do they lean upon the earlier prophets; so that we are enabled to trace the gradual transition of prophetism into the learning of scribes. Prophetism dug, as it were, its own grave. The authority which it demands for its earlier productions necessarily caused that the later were dependent upon the earlier, and the more this became the case during the progress of time, the more limited became the field for new productions. It is not only unhistorical, but, according to the condition of the later productions of prophecy, quite impossible, that about the conclusion of the exile there should have sprung up a fresh prophetic literature of great extent. In this period we hear only the echo of prophecy. That one of the later prophets of whom we possess most, namely, Zechariah, leans entirely upon Jeremiah and Ezekiel, as upon his latest predecessors. There is not a vestige of an intervening prophetic literature. The weakness of our opponents' position is manifested by their being obliged to have recourse to such unhistorical fictions in order to defend their opinions.

(d) For those who accept the authority of the New Testament a final argument for the unity of Isaiah is based on the uniform usage of the second part by the Christian canon. Throughout the New Testament Isaiah is quoted by name as the author not only of those parts of the book bearing his name which are conceded by all to be his, but also of those parts which are said to be by another prophet or other prophets (comp. Matt. iii:3; viii:17; xii:17; Mark i:2; Luke iii:4; iv:17; John i:23; xii:38, 41; Acts viii:30; Rom. x:16, 20). It is evident that the New Testament writers either knew or did not know the truth as to the composition of the passages cited. If they did not know, their authority is proved to be defective; if they knew, they told what they knew to be contrary to fact, in case the critical theory is correct. No such difficulty arises, however, if the traditional theory is true.

As against these considerations, the argument of the advocates of the decisive theory must be examined. It is necessary, however, to single out in this class those who accept the authority of Jesus and the New Testament, and state their views on the attitude of the New Testament towards the question of the authorship of Isaiah.

In general, the apparent citation of a passage under the name of an Old Testament author does not commit the New Testament writer to any view of the authorship of the writing quoted from. If the name of the author be given, it is given simply as a mark of identification, and not necessarily as a definite ascription of the writing to him. In this sense the whole Psalter is credited to David, including anonymous Psalms (such as the second, cited in Acts iv:25 as David's). In accordance with this usage also Matthew quotes from Zechariah ascribing the prophecy to Jeremiah (Matt. xxvii:9). As an identification of an old prophecy the citation was adequately introduced, but as a writing it was not assigned to its own author.

Such usage does not diminish the authority of the New Testament on those matters on which it was designed to give light, but leaves such matters to be distinguished from others by a careful examination of each in its setting and separate intent. The New Testament writers were not omniscient, nor was it necessary that they should be. Their lack of special information on such an unessential matter in no way weakens their trustworthiness on matters which came not only within their province as historians of the life of Jesus and the Apostolic age, but also within their own personal observation.

But if difficulty be found with this standpoint, it may be still further reasoned that even the verbal inerrancy of the New Testament writers need not be affected by the discovery, if it shall prove to be such, of the separate authorship of a portion of Isaiah. The name Isaiah is not such as to show that only the son of Amoz contemporary of Hezekiah, bore it. In its cognates Joshua, Hoshea, etc., it was a favorite one. If therefore another prophet bearing the same name Isaiah lived in the latter part of the period of the exile and uttered the discourses of Is. xl-lxvi it would be very easy for his personality and work to be blended with those of the earlier Isaiah and thus have the books of the two pass under one title and in one volume. In such a case, the evangelists and apostles could speak with strictest accuracy of these utterances as writings or words of Isaiah's. This hypothesis which practically reduces the question into one of the lower or textual criticism, leaves the field clear for an unbiased examination of the grounds on which the divisive theory is based. These grounds are the following:

(e) The distinguishing features of the literary style of chapters xl-lxvi are so different from that of chapters i-xxxix that if Isaiah the son of Amoz was the author of these chapters he could not have been also the author of the others. These differences touch first of all the choice of words. The author of chapters xl-lxvi uses many characteristic and important words never found in the discourses of the son of Amoz. Such are the terms to choose, to praise, to spring forth, pleasure, to break forth, good will, acceptance, to rejoice. Besides single words there are characteristic phrases peculiar to Is. xl-lxvi. Such are the expressions "thy sons" with a feminine pronoun referring to Zion (xliv:17, 22, 25; li:20; liv:13; lx:4, 9; lxii:5). When Isaiah speaks of the sonship of Israelites it is as God's sons that he thinks of them (i:2, 4; xxx:1, 9). "I am Jehovah and there is none else" (xlv:5, 6, 18, 21, 22). "I am the first and I am the last" (xliv:6); "I am he" (xli:4; xliii:10, 13; xlvi:4; xlvi:12); "I am thy God," "thy Savior" (xli:10, 13; xliii:3; xlvi:17). These phrases never occur in chapters i-xxxix. Besides these words and phrases a series of others occur in chaps. xl-lxvi which, though used in the first part of the collection, are so used very rarely and in other senses than those here attached to them. (See Driver, Introd. to the Lit. of the Old Test., p. 239). More broadly the second Isaiah has some stylistic characteristics, such as the repetition of words (xl:1; xliii:11; xlvi:11, 15; li:9, 12, 17, lii:1, 11; lvii:1, 14, 19; lxii:10; lxv:1), the repetition of the same word in successive clauses or verses (xi:12, 13; 1:7, 9, etc.), the omission of the relative particle. The converse of this is true also, i. e., words, phrases, and stylistic peculiarities found in Isaiah the son of Amoz are never found in the second Isaiah. Such are the words, "the Lord" (not Jehovah, but the Hebrew יְהוָה, aw-done') "of Hosts" (i:24; iii:1; x:16, 33; xix:4); not-gods (ii:8, 18, 20; x:11; xix:1, 3; xxxi:7); the escaped (iv:2; x:20; xv:9; xxxvii:31, 32); a trampling down (v:5; vi:25; x:6; xxviii:18); and the phrases "In that day," found frequently as shown by examples from two or three chapters (iii:18; iv:1, 2; vii:18, 20, 21, 23—in Is. lxi-lxvi only once, lii:6); "And it shall come to pass" (iv:3; vii:18, 21, 23; x:12; xi:11); "head and tail, palm branch and rush" (ix:14; xix:15); "a consummation and that determined" (x:23; xxviii:22); "flying fiery serpent" (xiv:29; xxx:6); and of habits of thought or style the first Isaiah shows the tendency to draw figures from the harvest (ix:3; xvii:5, 11; xviii:4); the figure of the fat reduced to leanness (x:16; xvii:4); the figure of the scourge (x:26; xxviii:15, 18); the smearing of the eyes of the blind (vi:10; xxix:18). These lists are by no means exhaustive. They simply represent in a few examples the relation of the style of the two authors. In addition it should be remarked that there are rhetorical and poetical characteristics in these writings—such as the construction of sentences, the movement and rhythm of periods—which cannot be presented in lists of examples, but must be observed in the reading of the writings as units.

These differences cannot be accounted for upon the basis of difference of age in the prophet. Isaiah uses the same style in his earliest and his latest writings (comp. ch. vi with xxix-xxxiii and xxxvii). Nor are they to be accounted for on the basis of difference of subject. In i-xxxix the enemies of Judah are the Assyrians, in xl-lxvi, the Babylonians. In the first part the fact of preservation from these enemies and the mode of it are the general subjects, in the second part the subject is the liberation from their power and restoration to their own land. Between these two topics no such difference exists as calls for a different phraseology and style. The only reasonable explanation of these facts is difference of authorship.

(f) The historical setting of chapters xl-lxvi is that of the latter part of the exile period (545-535). The prophecy opens with a general call to be of good cheer (xl:1), and seems to be addressed throughout to a people under oppression and away from home. Jerusalem is ruined and deserted (xliv:26; lxiii:18; lxiv:10). This condition of things is not new, but of long standing (lviii:12; lxi:4). The prospect of return is, however, very vivid. In fact restoration is alluded to as if imminent (xl:2; xlvi:13; xlvi:20, etc.). There is no reference of the remotest kind to the times of Ahaz and Hezekiah or even of Manasseh. So clear is the situation and so manifest the adaptation of the prophecy to the conditions of the later period, that those who ascribe it to Isaiah the son of Amoz suppose that the prophet's consciousness was projected into the future, so that while living in the days of Hezekiah he realized the world of the days of Cyrus. This is a hypothesis so much out of analogy with the Biblical idea of prophecy that it must not be resorted to except for the strongest possible reasons. But the chief reason for pressing it seems to be the fact that the predictive element would be eliminated if the view were not accepted. It is alleged that the prophet appeals to the fulfilment of predictive prophecy (xli:26; xlii:9; xliii:8-10; xlviii:3-8) and such an appeal would have no value if the prophecy dates from the period of the exile. But a close examination of these passages shows that this way of reasoning has no force. The predictions alluded to are such as would be realized very soon. It was not necessary that an interval of more than 150 years should have elapsed in order to give validity to the fulfilment of predictive prophecies. On the other hand, the manner in which these coming events are spoken of indicates that they are in the near future. Cyrus is already "stirred up" (xli:25; xlv:13). He is on the horizon not only of the prophetic vision, but also of the historical situation. Upon the whole the prophet speaks as a man in contact with those whom he addresses and if he lived at the time of Hezekiah, his discourses must have remained a sealed and meaningless book for a century and a half.

(g) The content of thought or theology of chapters xl-lxvi is of a different type from that of chapters i-xxxix. The two parts do not contradict each other; neither is it impossible to conceive of the same man's entertaining and expressing the ideas respectively characteristic of each. And yet as a matter of experience differences as marked as are here shown at once produce the impression of difference in personality. The basal thoughts of the two Isaiahs are of course those of the religion of Israel in general. All the writers of the Old Testament hold and teach these thoughts. But the characteristic features of the first Isaiah are absent from the second and vice versa those of the second do not appear in the first. Isaiah the son of Amoz is distinctively a statesman and a reformer. He appears before the kings of his day with a message from Jehovah as to what they should do in view of the political and social situations in which they are implicated. The second Isaiah is an evangelical preacher. His idea of God is that he is the Creator of the Universe, the Life-giver and sustainer of all, the Author of history, the First and the Last, the Incomparable one. The central idea in the conception is his infinitude. Isaiah the son of Amoz dwells rather on the majesty of God and his special care over Israel. The first Isaiah presents the doctrine of the remnant or preservation of a nucleus of Israel through all catastrophes that may be visited on the nation as a result of judgment for their sins. In the second Isaiah this doctrine appears only by implication (lix:20; lxxv:8); but in place of it there emerges the doctrine of the call of Israel to a high function and a glorious ultimate destiny. Finally, as regards the Messiah, the two parts of the book differ radically. In the first the Messiah is a glorious King of the line of David, whose reign is marked by peace and prosperity. In the second, the Messiah is the Servant of Jehovah, the head of the people of God (never alluded to by the title of King) whose mission and function are blended with those of the people. He redeems the people by suffering.

(h) As a separate reason for looking on the two sections outlined as the works of two different men is given the cumulative force of the occurrence of the above lines of difference. Either the literary, the historical, or the theological differences alone would have pointed to the conclusion claimed by the advocates of the divisive theory. But the concurrence of all the considerations above enumerated, it is said, adds to the force of each, separately taken, and gives the highest degree of probability to the conclusion.

There remains to be considered the third general view of the integrity of Isaiah. This view has been elaborated since 1890 by Duhm (in Nowack's Handkommentar, 1892). Hackmann (Die Zukunftserwartung des Jes., 1893), and Cheyne (Introd. to the Book of Isaiah, 1895), also in Haupt's Sacred Books of the Old Testament, vol. Isaiah, 1898. In the judgment of these scholars, the book of Isaiah is neither the work of one man, nor that of two or three, but a compilation of fragments some of which are genuine and some date from as late a period as the second or even first century B. C. The reasons alleged for this view are mainly slight differences of style and grammatical peculiarities, and apocalyptic contact. These reasons have not, however, found favor among expert scholars. They are too subjective and conjectural. Those who hold them seem often to imagine or create the difficulties which they are ostensibly determined to remove. In any case the theory of a multiplicity of authors for Isaiah may be left to be discussed by experts at whose hands it is certain to receive the careful attention it may deserve.

4. Helps to the Study of Isaiah. (1) Commentaries. Of the commentaries on the book of Isaiah, that by J. Addison Alexander (New York and London, 1846) is an almost exhaustive summary of the views propounded to the date of its publication, containing in a compact form the interpretations of all his predecessors, as well as those of the author himself. Of the commentaries that have appeared since the publication of this work, the most important are those of: Delitzsch (1866, 4th ed. 1889; Eng. tr. 1892). Nägelsbach (in Lange's Bible Work, 1877; Eng. tr. 1878). T. R. Birks (Book of Isaiah, 1878). T. K. Cheyne (Prophecies of Is. with Com. and App. 1880). Oreli (1887; Eng. tr. 1889). G. A. Smith (in the Expositor's Bible, vol. 1, cc. xxxix, 1888; vol. 2, cc. xl-lxvi, 1890). A. Dillmann (in Kurzgefasstes Ex. Handbuch zu dem Alt. Testam., 1890). Bernhard Duhm (in Nowack's Handkommentar zu Alt. Testam., 1892). J. Skinner (in the Cambr. Bible, 1896-98).

ISCAH (is'kah), (Heb. יִשְׁכָּח, yis kaw', watchful), daughter of Abram's brother, Haran, and sister of Lot and Milcah (Gen. xi:29; comp. v:31). According to Jewish tradition and Jerome (Quaest. in Genesim) she is identical with Sarah.

ISCARIOT (is-kär'i-ot), (Gr. Ἰσκαριώτης, is-kar-ee-o'tace, perh. from Heb. יִשְׁכָּח עֵשֶׁת, eesh ker-ee-yöth', man of Kerioth), a surname of Judas the traitor, to distinguish him from others of the same name (Matt. x:4, etc.). (See JUDAS ISCARIOT.)

ISHBAH (ish'bah), (Heb. יִשְׁבָּח, yish-bakk', he will praise), a descendant of Judah, and "father," or founder of Eshtemoa (1 Chron. iv:17). He was probably a son of Mered by Hodiah. He is perhaps the same as Ishi, ver. 20; and perhaps identical with the Naham of ver. 19 (B. C. after 1612).

ISHBAK (ish'bák), (Heb. יִשְׁבַּח, yish-bawk', leaving), a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv:2; 1 Chron. i:32), whose descendants comprised a tribe in northern Arabia. Pool thinks that the location of the settlements of this people may be recovered in the name of the valley called Sabák, or Sibák in the Dahná, in the highland country of North-eastern Arabia.

ISHBI-BENOB (ish'bi-bē'nob), (Heb. יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב, yish-bee' beh-nobe', my seat is at Nob), one of the giants, or Rephaim, who carried a spear which weighed 300 shekels, twelve pounds and a half. This giant, being on the point of killing David, who was fatigued in the battle, was himself killed by Abishai, son of Zeruiah (2 Sam. xxi:16, 17), B. C. about 1018. (See GIANTS.)

ISH-BOSHETH (ish'bō'sheth), (Heb. אִישׁ-בֹּשֶׁת, esh-bō'sheth, man of shame, "bashful"), a son of King Saul, and the only one who survived him.

In 1 Chron. viii:33, and ix:39, this name is given as אִישׁ-בַּעַל, esh-bah'al; Baal was the name of an idol, accounted abominable by the Hebrews, and which scrupulous persons avoided pronouncing, using the word bosheth, 'shame' or 'vanity,' instead. This explains why the name Eshbaal is substituted for Ish-bosheth, Jerubbaal for Jerubbesheth (comp. Judg. viii:35 with 2 Sam. xi:21), and Merib-baal for Mephibosheth (comp. 2 Sam. iv:4 with 1 Chron. viii:34 and ix:40).

(1) Succeeds Saul. Ishbosheth was not present in the disastrous battle at Gilboa, in which his father and brothers perished; and, too feeble of himself to seize the scepter which had fallen from the hands of Saul, he owed the crown entirely to his uncle Abner, who conducted him to Mahanaim, beyond the Jordan, where he was recognized as king by ten of the twelve tribes. He reigned seven, or, as some will have it, two years—if a power so uncertain as his can be called a reign. Even the semblance of authority which he possessed he owed to the will and influence of Abner, who himself kept the real substance in his own hands.

(2) Quarrels with Abner. A sharp quarrel between them led at last to the ruin of Ish-bosheth. Although accustomed to tremble before Abner, even his meek temper was roused to resentment by the discovery that Abner had invaded the harem of his late father Saul, which was in a peculiar manner sacred under his care as a son and a king. By this act Abner exposed the king to public contempt, if it did not indeed leave himself open to the suspicion of intending to advance a claim to the crown on his own behalf. Abner highly resented the rebuke of Ish-bosheth, and from that time contemplated uniting all the tribes under the scepter of David. Ish-bosheth, however, reverted to his ordinary timidity of character. At the first demand of David, he restored to him his sister Michal, who had been given in marriage to the son of Jesse by Saul, and had afterwards been taken from him and bestowed upon another. It is, perhaps, right to attribute this act to his weakness; although, as David allows that he was a righteous man, it may have been owing to his sense of justice.

(3) Death. On the death of Abner, Ish-bosheth lost all heart and hope, and perished miserably, being murdered in his own palace, while he took his mid-day sleep, by two of his officers, Baanah and Rechab. They sped with his head to David, expecting a great reward for their deed; but the monarch—as both right feeling and good policy required—testified the utmost horror and concern. He slew the murderers, and placed the head of Ish-bosheth with due respect in the sepulcher of Abner (2 Sam. ii:8-11; iii:6-39; iv), B. C. 1048.

(4) Difficulty in Chronology. There is a serious difficulty in the chronology of this reign. In 2 Sam. ii:10 Ish-bosheth is said to have reigned two years; which some understand as the whole amount of his reign. And as David reigned seven and a half years over Judah before he became king of all Israel upon the death of Ish-bosheth, it is conceived by the Jewish chronologer (Seder Olam Rabba, p. 37), as well as by Kimchi and others, that there was a vacancy of five years in the throne of Israel. But it is the more usual, and perhaps the better course, to settle this question by supposing that the reigns of David over Judah, and Ish-bosheth over Israel, were nearly contemporaneous, and that the two years are mentioned as those from which to date the commencement of the ensuing events—namely, the wars between the house of Saul and that of David.

ISHI (i'shī), (Heb. יִשִּׁי, yish-ee', salutary).

1. The son of Appaim, a descendant of Judah, and father of Sheshan (1 Chron. ii:31), of the house of Hezron. (B. C. probably after 1612.)

2. Forefather (father) of several Simeonites who headed an expedition of five hundred men, in which they took Mount Seir from the Amalekites, and possessed it (1 Chron. iv:42), B. C. ante 726.

3. Father of Zoheth and Ben-zoheth (1 Chron. iv:20), B. C. perhaps about 1017.

4. A chief of Manasseh, famous for valor, living east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v:24), B. C. about 720.

5. (Heb. יִשִּׁי, ish'ee, my husband), a word occurring in Hos. ii:16, and means "my man" or "husband."

ISHIAH (i-shī'ah), (Heb. יִשִּׁי יָחַב, yish-shee-yaw', Jehovah will lend), the fifth son of Izrahiah, a descendant of Issachar; a chief of his tribe in the time of David (1 Chron. vii:3), B. C. 1618.

ISHIJAH (i-shī'jah), (Heb. as above), a layman of the Israelites among the "sons" of Harim, who gave up his foreign wife (Ezra x:31), B. C. 459.

ISHMA (ish'mà), (Heb. יִשְׁמָא, yish-maw', desolate), a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv:3), apparently son of the founder of Etam, and closely connected with Bethlehem (ver. 4), B. C. probably 1612.

ISHMAEL (ish'ma-el), (Heb. יִשְׁמָאֵל, yish-maw-ale', God hears).

1. Abraham's eldest son, borne to him by Hagar (Gen. xvi:11) fourteen years before the birth of Isaac (B. C. about 2248), the circumstances of whose birth, early history, and final expulsion from his father's tents are related in the articles ABRAHAM and HAGAR (See also ISAAC; INHERITANCE). He afterwards made the desert into which he had been cast his abode, and by attaching himself to, and acquiring influence over, the native tribes, rose to great authority and influence. It would seem to have been the original intention of his mother to have returned to Egypt, to which country she belonged; but this being prevented, she was contented to obtain for her son wives from thence.

(1) Friendship of Ishmael and Isaac. Although their lots were cast apart, it does not appear that any serious alienation existed between Ishmael and Isaac; for we read that they both joined in the sepulchral rites of their father Abraham (Gen. xxv:9). This fact has not been noticed as it deserves. It is full of suggestive matter. As funerals in the East take place almost immediately after death, it is evident that Ishmael must have been called from the desert to the death-bed of his father; which implies that relations of kindness and respect had been kept up, although the brevity of the sacred narrative prevents any special notice of this circumstance. Ishmael had, probably, long before received an endowment from his father's property, similar to that which had been bestowed upon the sons of Keturah (Gen. xxv:6).

(2) Death and Children. Nothing more is recorded of him than that he died at the age of 137 years, and was the father of twelve sons, who gave their names to as many tribes (Gen. xvii:20; xxv:12-16). He had also two daughters, one of whom became the wife of Esau.

(3) Not the Founder of the Arabian Nation. It has been shown, in the article ARABIA, that Ishmael has no claim to the honor, which is usually assigned to him, of being the founder of the Arabian nation. That nation existed before he was born. He merely joined it, and adopted its habits of life and character; and the tribes which sprang from him formed eventually an important section of the tribes of which it was composed. The celebrated prophecy which describes the habits of life which he, and in him his descendants, would follow as recorded in Gen. xvi:11, 12, "A wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him," is, therefore, to be regarded not as describing habits which he would first establish, but such as he would adopt. This passage means that he and his descendants would lead the life of the Bedouins of the Arabian deserts; and how graphically this description portrays their habits, may be seen in the article ARABIA. The last clause, 'He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren,' is pointedly alluded to in the brief notice of his death, which states that 'he died in the presence of all his brethren' (Gen. xxv:18). Of this expression various explanations have been given, but the plainest is the most probable; which is, that Ishmael and the tribes springing from him should always be located near the kindred tribes descended from Abraham. And this was a promise of benefit in that age of migration, when Abraham himself had come from beyond the Euphrates, and was a stranger and sojourner in the land of Canaan. There was thus, in fact, a relation of some importance between this promise and the promise of the heritage of Canaan to another branch of Abraham's offspring. It had seemingly some such force as this—The heritage of Canaan is, indeed, destined for another son of Abraham; but still the lot of Ishmael, and of those that spring from him, shall never be cast far apart from that of his brethren. This view is confirmed by the circumstance, that the Israelites did, in fact, occupy the country bordering on that in which the various tribes descended from Abraham or Terah had settled—the Israelites, Edomites, Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, etc. Most interpreters find in this passage, a promise that the descendants of Ishmael should never be subdued. But we are unable to discover this in the text; and, moreover, such has not been the fact, whether we regard the Ishmaelites apart from the other Arabians, or consider the promise made to Ishmael as applicable to the whole Arabian family.

(4) Character. Ishmael appears to have been a wild and wayward child. His training and disposition unfitted him for the tame and unexciting life of a mere shepherd. In his boyhood and early youth he had been the darling of the great Abraham, and had grown impatient of restraint, and overbearing, from the flattery shown him as the heir-apparent of a desert prince. He could never have dreamed of any other than an easy, dignified life, in which he might enjoy himself without a care as the head of a tribe. High-spirited, and fond of listening, at the watch-fires of his father's herdsmen, to their stories of encounters and feuds with hostile neighbors at the wells, or with the freebooters of the desert, he had early given his whole heart to the excitement of border life on the wild wastes. The chase of the gazelle or the wild goat, and the more dangerous pursuit of the bear or the leopard, had inured him to exertion and wild adventure, and the tastes of his youth clung to him through life. If he could not gratify them as the son of a great emir, he would do so as the head of a tribe of his own, and would out rival the bands who had of old so often harried the folds of Abraham. His emblem would be the wild ass of the desert, which no man can tame, with its home in the pathless wilderness. He would live in wild freedom, afar from the hated communities of those who had banished him from their midst.

2. A prince of the royal line of Judah, who found refuge among the Ammonites from the ruin which involved his family and nation. After the Chaldeans had departed he returned, and treacherously slew the too-confiding Gedaliah, who had been made governor of the miserable remnant left in the land. (See GEDALIAH.) Much more slaughter followed this, and Ishmael, with many people of consideration as captives, hastened to return to the Ammonites. But he was overtaken near the pool of Gibeon by Johanan, a friend of Gedaliah, and was compelled to abandon his prey and escape for his life, with only eight attendants, to Baalis, king of the Ammonites, with whom he appears to have had a secret understanding in these transactions (B. C. 588), (Jer. xl:7; xli:15; 2 Kings xxv:23-25).

3. A son of Pashur (Ezr. x:22), who put away his Gentile wife. (B. C. 459.)

4. Father or forefather of Zedabiah (2 Chron. xix:11), B. C. 900.

5. A man of Judah, son of Jehohanan, and captain in the force that assisted Jehoiada in replacing Joash on the throne (2 Chron. xxiii:1), B. C. 877.

6. A Benjamite, son of Azel, and descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii:38; ix:44), B. C. before 588.

ISHMAELITE (ish'ma-ël-ite), (Heb. יִשְׁמָאֵלִי, hah-yish-maw-ay-lee', 1 Chron. ii:17; יִשְׁמָאֵלִי, hah-yish-meh-ay-lee', xxvii:30; יִשְׁמָאֵלִי, yish-meh-ay-leem', Gen. xxxvii:25; יִשְׁמָאֵלִי, hah-yish-meh-ay-leem', Gen. xxxvii:27, 28), a descendant of Ishmael.

The term appears to have been a general name for the Abrahamic peoples of the east country, the Bene-Kedem. The name is applied in its strict sense to the Ishmaelites. It is also applied to Jether, the father of Amasa, by David's sister Abigail (1 Chron. ii:17). (See ITHRA; JETHER.)

The Arabs claim Ishmael to be the firstborn of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors (but the point is in dispute) assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice. The scene of this sacrifice is Mount Arafat, near Mecca, the last holy place visited by pilgrims, it being necessary to the completion of pilgrimage to be present at a sermon delivered there on the 9th of the Mohammedan month Zu-l-Hejeh, in commemoration of the offering, and to sacrifice a victim on the following evening after sunset, in the valley of Minā. The sacrifice last mentioned is observed throughout the Moslem world, and the day on which it is made is called "The Great Festival" (Mr. Lane's Mod. Egypt, ch. iii.).

Mohammed's descent from Ishmael is totally lost, for an unknown number of generations to Adnān, of the twenty-first generation before the prophet; from him downwards the latter's descent is, if we may believe the genealogists, fairly proved. But we have evidence far more trustworthy than that of the genealogists; for while most of the natives of Arabia are unable to trace up their pedigrees, it is scarcely possible to find one who is ignorant of his race, seeing that his very life often depends upon it. The law of blood-revenge necessitates his knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, but no more; and this law extending from time immemorial has made any confusion of race almost impossible. (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

The Ishmaelites carried on traffic with Egypt (Gen. xxxvii:25, 27; xxxix:1). (See ISHMAEL.)

ISHMAIAH (ish-mā'yā), (Heb. יִשְׁמָאֵל, yish-mah-yaw', Jah will hear).

1. A Gibeonite, and chief of those who left Saul and came over to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4), B. C. 1046.

2. Son of Obadiah, and viceroy of the tribe of Zebulun in the time of David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii:19), B. C. 1014.

ISHMEELITE (ish'me-el-ite), the form by which the descendants of Ishmael are denominated (1 Chron. ii:17), and in the plural (Gen. xxxvii:25, 27, 28; xxxix:1).

ISHMERAI (ish'me-rāi), (Heb. יִשְׁמֵרַי, yish-mer-ah'ee, preservative), a chief of the Benjamites, and one of the family of Elpaal residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:18), B. C. before 588.

ISHOD (i'shōd), (Heb. יִשְׁחֹד, eesh-hode', man of renown), one of the tribe of Manasseh, and son of Hammoleketh, sister of Machir of Gilead (1 Chron. vii:18), B. C. 1658.

ISHPAN (ish'pān), (Heb. יִשְׁפָּן, yish-pawn', he will hide), one of the "sons" of Shashak, resident at Jerusalem, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:22), B. C. before 588.

ISHTOB (ish'tōb), (Heb. יִשְׁתּוֹב, eesh-tobe', man of Tob), apparently a petty kingdom of the country of Aram, mentioned with Zobah, Rehob and Maacah (2 Sam. x:6, 8). Probably the real signification is "the men of Tob," a district mentioned in the history of the Maccabees.

ISHUAH (ish'u-ah), (Heb. יִשְׁוֹה, yish-vaw', he will level), the second named of the sons of Asher (Gen. xlv:17); the A. V. renders the same word ISUAH (1 Chron. vii:30), B. C. bet. 1856 and 1640.

ISHUAI (ish'u-ai), (Heb. יִשְׁוֵי, yish-vee', level), the third son of Asher (1 Chron. vii:30), and founder of the family bearing his name (Num. xxvi:44), "Jesuites" (B. C. 1856). Elsewhere the name is ISUI and JESUI (Gen. xlv:17; Num. xxvi:44).

ISHUI (ish'u-i), (Heb. יִשְׁוֵי, yish-vee', level), the second named of the sons of Saul by Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv:49). In 1 Sam. xxxi:2 his place is taken by Abinadab, which allows the inference that he died young, or that he is identical with Abinadab.

ISLE, ISLAND (il, i'land), (Heb. יָם, ee, habitable places).

The Hebrew word is invariably translated, either by the former or by the latter of these English words, which, having the same meaning, will be considered as one. It occurs in the three following senses: First, that of dry land in opposition to water; as 'I will make the rivers islands' (Is. xlii:15). In Is. xx:6, the Isle of Ashdod means the country, and is so rendered in the margin. In Is. xxiii:2, 6, 'the isle' means the country of Tyre, and in Ezek. xxvii: 6, 7, that of Chittim and Elishah. (See also Job xxii:30.) Second, it is used in Hebrew and English according to its geographical meaning, for a country surrounded by water, as in Jer. xlvii:4, 'the isle (margin) of Caphtor,' which is probably that of Cyprus. 'The isles of the sea' (Esth. x:1) are evidently put in opposition to 'the land,' or continent. In Ps. xcvi:1, 'the multitude of the isles' seem distinguished from the earth or continents, and are evidently added to complete the description of the whole world. Third, the word is used by the Hebrews to designate all those countries divided from them by the sea. In Is. xi:11, after an enumeration of countries lying on their own continent, the words, 'and the islands of the sea,' are added in order to comprehend those situated beyond the ocean. The following are additional instances of this usage of the word, which is of very frequent occurrence (Is. xlii: 10; lix:18; lxvi:19; Jer. xxv:22; Ezek. xxvii: 3, 15; Zeph. ii:11). It is observed by Sir I. Newton (on Daniel, p. 276), 'By the earth the Jews understood the great continent of all Asia and Africa, to which they had access by land, and by the isles of the sea they understood the places to which they sailed by sea, particularly all Europe.'

J. F. D.

ISMACHIAH (is'ma-ki'ah), (Heb. יִשְׁמַחְיָהוּ, yish-mak-yaw-hoo', Jah will sustain), a Levite, charged by Hezekiah with the oversight of the sacred offerings (2 Chron. xxxi:13), B. C. 726.

ISMAIAH (is'ma-i'ah), (Heb. יִשְׁמָאֵל, yish-mah-yaw', Jehovah hears), one of the chiefs of those warriors who joined themselves to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4). He is described as "a hero (Gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty"—i. e. David's bodyguard; but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. xxiii, and 1 Chron. xi. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne (B. C. 1000). (Smith, Dict. of the Bib.) (See ISHMAIAH, 1.)

ISPAH (is'pah), (Heb. יִשְׁפָּה, yish-paw', he will scratch), one of the "sons" of Beriah, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin resident at Jerusalem, originally from the vicinity of Aijalon (1 Chron. viii:16), B. C. before 588.

ISRAEL (iz'ra-el), (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵל, yis-raw-ale').

1. The sacred name, divinely bestowed upon the patriarch Jacob (Gen. xxxii:28) after his wrestling with the angel (Hos. xii:4) at Peniel. It is explained to mean, a prince with God, a contender with God, or a soldier of God. Winer (Heb. Lexicon) interprets it pugnator Dei. Although, as applied to Jacob personally, it is an honorable or poetical appellation, it is the common prose name of his descendants; while, on the contrary, the title Jacob is given to them only in poetry.

2. Israelites. (1) The name became the national name of the twelve tribes collectively. They are so called in Exod. iii:16 and afterwards.

(2) It is used in a narrower sense, excluding Judah, in 1 Sam. xi:8. It is so used in the famous cry of the rebels against David (2 Sam. xx:1), and against his grandson (1 Kings xii:16). Thenceforth it was assumed and accepted as the name of the Northern Kingdom, in which the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Levi, Dan, and Simeon had no share.

(3) After the Babylonian Captivity, the returned exiles, although they were mainly of the kingdom of Judah, resumed the name Israel as the designation of their nation; but as individuals they are almost always described as Jews in the Apocrypha and New Testament. Instances occur in the Books of Chronicles of the application of the name Israel to Judah (e. g., 2 Chron. xi:3; xii:6); and in Esther of the name Jews to the whole people. The name Israel is also used to denote laymen, as distinguished from priests, Levites and other ministers (Ezra vi:16; ix:1; x:25; Neh. xi:3, etc.). (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.

1. Patriarchal Government. The government of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was a patriarchal government. So long as they resided in the land of Canaan, they were subject to no foreign power, but tended their flocks and herds wherever they chose to go (Gen. xiii:6-12), and vindicated their wrongs by arms whenever they had sustained any injury (Gen. xiv). They treated with the petty kings who reigned in different parts of Palestine as their equals in dignity, and concluded treaties with them in their own right (Gen. xiv:13, 18-24; xxi:22-32; xxvi:16, 27-33; xxxi:44-54).

The patriarchal power was a sovereign dominion; so that parents may be considered as the first kings, and children the first subjects. They had the power of disinheriting their children (Gen. xlix:3, 4; 1 Chron. v:1), and also of punishing them with death (Gen. xxxviii:24), or of dismissing them from home without assigning any reason (Gen. xxi:14). Further, the patriarchs could pronounce a solemn blessing or curse upon their children, which at that time was regarded as a high privilege and of great consequence. Thus Noah cursed his son Canaan (Gen. ix:25); Isaac blessed Jacob (Gen. xxvii:28, 29, 33); and Jacob blessed his sons (Gen. xlix). On the decease of the father, the eldest son by a natural right of succession inherited the paternal power and dominion, which in those days was one of the rights of primogeniture. To this right the sacerdotal dignity, in the first ages, seems to have been annexed; so that the heads of families not only possessed a secular power, but also officiated as priests in the families to which they belonged (Gen. viii:20; xii:7, 8; xxxv:1-3).

Although the sons of Jacob exercised, each, the supreme power in his own family, during their father's life (Gen. xxxviii:24), yet the latter appears to have retained some authority over them (Gen. xlii:1-4, 37, 38; xliii:1-13; l:15-17). Afterwards, however, as the posterity of Jacob increased in Egypt, it became necessary to have magistrates or governors invested with more extensive authority; these are termed Elders (Exod.

iii:16), being probably chosen on account of their age and wisdom. The Shoterim or "officers of the children of Israel" (Exod. v:14, 15, 19), have been conjectured to be a kind of magistrates elected by them; but, from the context of the sacred historian, they rather appear to have been appointed by the Egyptians, and placed over the Israelites in order to oversee their labor.

2. Theocratic. On the departure of the Israelites from the land of their oppressors, under the guidance of Moses, Jehovah was pleased to institute a new form of government, which has been rightly termed a Theocracy; the supreme legislative power being exclusively vested in God or in his oracle, who alone could enact or repeal laws. The Hebrew government appears not only designed to subserve the common and general ends of all good governments—viz., the protection of the property, liberty, safety, and peace of the several members of the community (in which the true happiness and prosperity of states will always consist); but also to set apart the Hebrews or Israelites a holy people to Jehovah and a kingdom of priests.

In the Theocracy of the Hebrews, the laws were given to them by God, through the mediation of Moses, and they were to be of perpetual force and obligation so long as their polity subsisted.

The judges by whom these laws were administered were represented as holy persons, and as sitting in the place of God (Deut. i:17; xix:17). These judges were usually taken from the tribe of Levi; and the chief expounder of the law was the high priest. In this there was a singular propriety; for the Levites, being devoted to the study of the law, were (as will be shown in a subsequent page) the literati among the Israelites. In difficult cases of law, however, relating both to government and war, God was to be consulted by Urim and Thummim and in matters which concerned the welfare of the state. God frequently made known his will by prophets whose mission was duly attested, and the people were bound to hearken to their voice. In all these cases, Jehovah appears as sovereign king, ruling his people by his appointed ministers.

3. The Civil Constitution. This had respect to the classification of the people, succession and right of inheritance of land and property. (See INHERITANCE.)

The nation, from the twelve sons of Israel, formed a great family called "the house of Israel" (Heb. בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל, bayth yis-raw-ale'). Genealogically it was divided (Josh. vii:14, 16-18) into:

(1) Heads or Princes of Tribes and Families. (Heb. מַטֵּה, mat-teh', or שֵׁבֶט, shay'bet).

All the various branches of Abraham's descendants, like the ancient Germans or the Scottish clans kept together in a body according to their tribes and families; each tribe forming a lesser commonwealth, with its own peculiar interests, and all of them at last uniting into one great republic. The same arrangement, it is well known, obtained among the Israelites, who appear to have been divided into twelve great tribes, previously to their departure from Egypt.

(2) Families or Clans. By Moses, however, they were subdivided into certain greater families, which are called mish-paw-khoth (Heb. מִשְׁפָּחָהוֹת, mish-paw-khoth), or families.

(3) Households. (Heb. בַּיִת, bah'yith, house; אָב, ayb, house of father, Num. i:2; Josh. vii:14). A technical term expressing the larger divisions or family groups each of which again had heads sometimes called heads of houses of fathers, and sometimes simply heads. These are likewise the same persons, who in Josh. xxiii:2, and xxiv:1, are called Elders (Heb. זָנָבִים, zaw-kane'). (Compare also Deut. xix:12 and xxi:1-9). It does not appear in what manner these heads or elders of families were chosen, when any of them died. The princes of tribes do not seem to have ceased with the commencement, at least, of the monarchy; from 1 Chron. xxvii:16-22, it is evident that they subsisted in the time of David; and they must have proved a powerful restraint upon the power of the king. (See HEBREWS, RELIGION OF THE.)

ISRAELITE (iz'ra-el-ite), (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵלִי, yis-reh-ay-lee', having power with God, or God's fighter), a descendant of Jacob, and consequently a citizen of the chosen nation of Israel.

The name is applied to the twelve tribes descended from the sons of Jacob while still in Egypt (Exod. iii:16); to the ten northern tribes, after the time of Saul (2 Sam. ii:9, 10, 17, 28), and under David (2 Sam. xix:40); to the tribes, with the exception of Judah, which set up a separate kingdom at Samaria after the reign of Solomon (1 Kings xii:19). The term "Jews" gradually supplanted this term, because, after the return from the captivity of Babylon, the tribe of Judah was the most numerous, and foreigners had scarcely any knowledge of the other tribes. In the New Testament "Israelite" is used to designate those belonging to the true spiritual theocracy (2 Cor. xi:22). (See ISRAEL.)

ISRAELITISH (iz'ra-el-i'tish), (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵלִי, yis-reh-ay-lee'th'), the designation of a woman whose son was stoned (Lev. xxiv:10 ff).

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

(1) Rivalry of Ephraim and Judah. The separation of the Hebrew nation into two parts, of which one was to embrace ten of the tribes, and be distinctively named Israel, had its origin in the early power and ambition of the tribe of Ephraim. The rivalry of Ephraim and Judah began almost from the first conquest of the land; nor is it without significance that, as Caleb belonged to the tribe of Judah, so did Joshua to that of Ephraim. From the very beginning Judah learned to act by itself; but the central position of Ephraim, with its fruitful and ample soil, and the long-continued authority of Joshua, must have taught most of the tribes west of the Jordan to look up to Ephraim as their head; and a still more important superiority was conferred on the same tribe by the fixed dwelling of the ark at Shiloh for so many generations (Josh. xviii, etc.). Judah could boast of Hebron, Machpelah, Bethlehem, names of traditional sanctity; yet so could Ephraim point to Shechem, the ancient abode of Jacob; and while Judah, being on the frontier, was more exposed to the attack of the powerful Philistines, Ephraim had to fear only those Canaanites from within who were not subdued or conciliated. The haughty behavior of the Ephraimites towards Gideon, a man of Manasseh (Judg. viii:1), sufficiently indicates the pretensions they made. Still fiercer language toward Jephthah the Gileadite (Judg. xii:1) was answered by less gentleness than Gideon had shown; and a bloody civil war was the result, in which their pride met with a severe punishment. This may in part explain their quiet submission, not only to the priestly rule of Eli and his sons, who had their center of authority at Shiloh, but to Samuel, whose administration issued from three towns of Benjamin. Of course his prophetic character and personal excellence eminently contributed to the result; and it may seem that Ephraim, as well as all Israel besides, became habituated to the predominance of Benjamin, so that no serious resistance was made to the supremacy of Saul.

(2) A National Union. At his death a new schism took place through their jealousy of Judah; yet, in a few years' time, by the splendor of David's victories, and afterwards by Solomon's peaceful power, a permanent national union might seem to have been effected. But the laws of inheritance in Israel, excellent as they were for preventing permanent alienation of landed property, and the degradation of the Hebrew poor into predial slaves, necessarily impeded the perfect fusion of the tribes, by discouraging intermarriage, and hindering the union of distant estates in the same hands. Hence, when the sway of Solomon began to be felt as a tyranny, the old jealousies of the tribes revived, and Jeroboam, an Ephraimite (1 Kings xi:26), being suspected of treason, fled to Shishak, king of Egypt.

(3) Defection of the Ten Tribes. The death of Solomon was followed by a defection of ten of the tribes, which established the separation of Israel from Judah (B. C. 975). This was the most important event which had befallen the Hebrew nation since their conquest of Canaan. The chief territory and population were now with Jeroboam, but the religious sanction, the legitimate descent, lay with the rival monarch. From the political danger of allowing the ten tribes to go up to the sanctuary of Jerusalem, the princes of Israel, as it were in self-defense, set up a sanctuary of their own; and the intimacy of Jeroboam with the king of Egypt may have determined his preference for the form of idolatry (the calves) which he established at Dan and Bethel. In whatever else his successors differed, they one and all agreed in upholding this worship, which, once established, appeared essential to their national unity. Nevertheless it is generally understood to have been a worship of Jehovah, though under unlawful and degrading forms.

(4) Worship of Baal. Worse by far was the worship of Baal, which came in under one monarch only, Ahab, and was destroyed after his son was slain, by Jehu. A secondary result of the revolution was the ejection of the tribe of Levi from their lands and cities in Israel; at least, such as remained were spiritually degraded by the compliances required, and could no longer offer any resistance to the kingly power by aid of their sacred character. When the priestly tribe had thus lost independence, it lost the power to assist the crown. The succession of Jeroboam's family was hallowed by no religious blessing; and when his son was murdered, no Jehoiada was found to rally his supporters and ultimately avenge his cause. The example of successful usurpation was so often followed by the captains of the armies, that the kings in Israel present to us an irregular series of dynasties, with several short and tumultuous reigns. This was one cause of disorder and weakness to Israel, and hindered it from swallowing up Judah; another was found in the relations of Israel towards foreign powers.

(5) The Center of the Monarchy. Jeroboam originally fixed on Shechem as the center of his monarchy, and fortified it; moved perhaps not only by its natural suitability, but by the remembrances of Jacob which clung to it, and by the auspicious fact that here first Israel had decided for him against Rehobam. But the natural delightfulness of Tirzah (Cant. vi:4) led him, perhaps late in his reign, to erect a palace there (1 Kings xiv:17). After the murder of Jeroboam's son, Baasha seems to have intended to fix his capital at Ramah, as a convenient place for annoying the king of Judah, whom he looked on as his only dangerous enemy; but when forced to renounce this plan (xv:17, 21), he acquiesced in Tirzah, which continued to be the chief city of Israel, until Omri who, since the palace at Tirzah had been burned during the civil war (1 Kings xvi:18), built Samaria, with the ambition not uncommon in the founder of a new dynasty (xvi:24). Samaria continued to the end of the monarchy to be the center of administration; and its strength appears to have justified Omri's choice. (For details, see SAMARIA; also TIRZAH, 2.)

There is reason to believe that Jeroboam carried back with him into Israel the good will, if not the substantial assistance, of Snishak; and this will account for his escaping the storm from Egypt which swept over Rehoboam in his fifth year. During that first period Israel was far from quiet within. Although the ten tribes collectively had decided in favor of Jeroboam, great numbers of individuals remained attached to the family of David and to the worship at Jerusalem, and in the first three years of Rehoboam migrated into Judah (2 Chron. xi:16, 17).

(6) Rival Sanctuaries. Perhaps it was not until this process commenced that Jeroboam was worked up to the desperate measure of erecting rival sanctuaries with visible idols (1 Kings xii:27); a measure which met the usual ill success of profane statecraft, and aggravated the evil which he feared. It set him at war with the whole order of priests and Levites, whose expulsion or subjugation, we may be certain, was not effected without convulsing his whole kingdom, and so occupying him as to free Rehoboam from any real danger, although no peace was made. The king of Judah improved the time by immense efforts in fortifying his territory (2 Chron. xi:5-11); and, although Shishak soon after carried off the most valuable spoil, no great or definite impression could be made by Jeroboam. Israel having so far taken the place of heathen nations, and being already perhaps even in alliance with Egypt, at an early period—we know not how soon—sought and obtained the friendship of the kings of Damascus.

(7) Union with King of Damascus. A sense of the great advantage derivable from such a union seems to have led Ahab afterwards to behave with mildness and conciliation towards Benhadad, at a time when it could have been least expected (1 Kings xx:31-34). From that transaction we learn that Benhadad I had made in Damascus 'streets for Omri,' and Omri for Benhadad in Samaria. This, no doubt, implied that 'a quarter' was assigned for Syrian merchants in Samaria, which was probably fortified like the 'camp of the Tyrians' in Memphis, or the English factory at Calcutta; and in it, of course, Syrian worship would be tolerated. Against such intercourse the prophets, as might be expected, entered their protest (vers. 35-43); but it was in many ways too profitable to be renounced. In the reign of Baasha, Asa, king of Judah, sensible of the dangerous advantage gained by his rival through the friendship of the Syrians, determined to buy them off at any price (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF); and by sacrificing 'the treasures of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the king's house' (xv:18), induced Benhadad I to break his league with Baasha and to ravage all the northern district of Israel. This drew off the Israelitish monarch, and enabled Asa to destroy the fortifications of Ramah, which would have stopped the course of his trade (xv:17), perhaps that with the sea-coast and with Tyre. Such was the beginning of the war between Israel and Syria, on which the safety of Judah at that time depended. Cordial union was not again restored between the two northern states until the days of Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, the son of Remaliah, when Damascus must have already felt the rising power of Nineveh. The renewed alliance instantly proved so disastrous to Judah, which was reduced to extremest straits (Is. vii:2; 2 Kings xv:37; 2 Chron. xxviii:5, 6), as may seem to justify at least the policy of Asa's proceeding. Although it was impossible for a prophet to approve of it (2 Chron. xvi:7), we may only so much the more infer that Judah was already brought into most pressing difficulties, and that the general course of the war, in spite of occasional reverses, was decidedly and increasingly favorable to Israel.

(8) Wars of Syria and Israel. The wars of Syria and Israel were carried on chiefly under three reigns, those of Benhadad II, Hazael, and Benhadad III, the first two monarchs being generally prosperous, especially Hazael, the last being as decidedly unsuccessful. Although these results may have depended in part on personal qualities, there is high probability that the feebleness displayed by the Syrians against Jehoash and his son Jeroboam was occasioned by the pressure of the advancing empire of Nineveh.

Asa adhered, through the whole of his long reign, to the policy of encouraging hostility between the two northern kingdoms; and the first Benhadad had such a career of success that his son found himself in a condition to hope for an entire conquest of Israel. His formidable invasions wrought an entire change in the mind of Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii:44), who saw that if Israel were swallowed up by Syria there would be no safety for Judah. We may conjecture that this consideration determined him to unite the two royal families; for no common cause would have induced so religious a king to select for his son's wife Athaliah the daughter of Jezebel. The age of Ahaziah, who was sprung from this marriage, forces us to place it as early as B. C. 912, which is the third year of Jehoshaphat and sixth of Ahab. Late in his reign Jehoshaphat threw himself most cordially (1 Kings xxii:4) into the defense of Ahab, and by so doing probably saved Israel from a foreign yoke. Another mark of the low state into which both kingdoms were falling, is, that after Ahab's death the Moabites refused their usual tribute to Israel, and (as far as can be made out from the ambiguous words of 2 Kings iii:27), the united force of the two kingdoms failed of doing more than irritate them. Soon after, in the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, the Edomites followed the example, and established their independence. This event possibly engaged the whole force of Judah, and hindered it from succoring Samaria during the cruel siege which it sustained from Benhadad II, in the reign of Jehoram, son of Ahab. The declining years and health of the king of Syria gave a short respite to Israel; but, in B. C. 885, Hazael, by defeating the united Hebrew armies, commenced the career of conquest and harassing invasion by which he 'made Israel like the dust by threshing.' Even under Jehu he subdued the trans-Jordanic tribes (2 Kings x:32). Afterwards, since he took the town of Gath (2 Kings xii:17) and prepared to attack Jerusalem—an attack which Jehoash, king of Judah, averted only by strictly following Asa's precedent—it is manifest that all the passes and chief forts of the country west of the Jordan must have been in his hand. Indeed, as he is said, 'to have left Jehoahaz only fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen,' it would seem that Israel was strictly a conquered province, in which Hazael dictated (as the English to the native rajahs of India) what military force should be kept up.

(9) Delivery of Israel. From this thralldom Israel was delivered by some unexplained agency. We are told merely that 'Jehovah gave to Israel a savior, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians; and the children of Israel dwelt in their tents as beforetime' (2 Kings xiii: 5). It is allowable to conjecture that the (apparently unknown) deliverer was the Assyrian monarchy, which, assailing Hazael towards the end of the reign of Jehoahaz, entirely drew away the Syrian armies. That it was some urgent, powerful, and continued pressure, considering the great strength which the empire of Damascus had attained, seems clear from the sudden weakness of Syria through the reigns of Jehoash and Jeroboam II, the former of whom thrice defeated Benhadad III and 'recovered the cities of Israel,' the latter not only regained the full territory of the ten tribes, but made himself master (for a time at least) of Damascus and Hamath. How entirely the friendship of Israel and Judah had been caused and cemented by their common fear of Syria is proved by the fact that no sooner was the power of Damascus broken than new war broke out between the two kingdoms, which ended in the plunder of Jerusalem by Jehoash, who also broke down its walls and carried off hostages; after which there is no more alliance between Judah and Israel. The empire of Damascus seems to have been entirely dissolved under the son of Hazael, and no mention is made of its kings for eighty years or more. When Pekah, son of Remaliah, reigned in Samaria, Rezin, as king of Damascus, made a last but ineffectual effort for its independence.

(10) The Assyrian Power. The same Assyrian power which had doubtless so seriously shaken, and perhaps temporarily overturned, the kingdom of Damascus, was soon to be felt by Israel. Menahem was invaded by Pul (the first sovereign of Nineveh whose name we know), and was made tributary. His successor, Tiglath-pileser, in the reign of Pekah, son of Remaliah, carried captive the eastern and northern tribes of Israel (i. e., perhaps all their chief men as hostages?), and soon after slew Rezin, the ally of Pekah, and subdued Damascus. The following emperor, Shalmaneser, besieged and captured Samaria, and terminated the kingdom of Israel, B. C. 721.

This branch of the Hebrew monarchy suffered far greater and more rapid reverses than the other. From the accession of Jeroboam to the middle of Baasha's reign, it probably increased in power; it then waned with the growth of the Damascene empire; it struggled hard against it under Ahab and Jehoram, but sank lower and lower; it was dismembered under Jehu, and made subject under Jehoahaz. From B. C. 940 to B. C. 850 is, as nearly as can be ascertained, the period of depression; and from B. C. 914 to B. C. 830 that of friendship or alliance with Judah. But after (about) B. C. 850 Syria began to decline, and Israel soon shot out rapidly; so that Joash and his son Jeroboam appear, of all Hebrew monarchs, to come next to David and Solomon. How long this burst of prosperity lasted does not distinctly appear; but it would seem that entire dominion over the ten tribes was held until Pekah received the first blow from the Assyrian conqueror.

(11) Causes of Weakness. Besides that which was a source of weakness to Israel from the beginning, viz., the schism of the crown with the whole ecclesiastical body, other causes may be discerned which made the ten tribes less powerful, in comparison with the two, than might have been expected. The marriage of Ahab to Jezebel brought with it no political advantages at all commensurate with the direct moral mischief, to say nothing of the spiritual evil; and the reaction against the worship of Baal was a most ruinous atonement for the sin. To suppress the monstrous iniquity, the prophets let loose the remorseless Jehu, who, not satisfied with the blood of Ahab's wife, grandson, and seventy sons, murdered first the king of Judah himself, and next forty-two youthful and innocent princes of his house; while, strange to tell, the daughter of Jezebel gained by his deed the throne of Judah, and perpetrated a new massacre. The horror of such crimes must have fallen heavily on Jehu, and have caused a widespread disaffection among his own subjects. Add to this that the Phœnicians must have deeply resented his proceedings; so that we get a very sufficient clue to the prostration of Israel under the foot of Hazael during the reign of Jehu and his son.

Another and more abiding cause of political debility in the ten tribes was found in the imperfect consolidation of the inhabitants into a single nation. Since those who lived east of the Jordan retained, to a great extent at least, their pastoral habits; their union with the rest could never have been very firm; and when a king was neither strong independently of them, nor had good hereditary pretensions, they were not likely to contribute much to his power. After their conquest of the Hagarenes and the depression of the Moabites and Ammonites by David, they had free room to spread eastward; and many of their chief men may have become wealthy in flocks and herds (like Machir, the son of Ammiel, of Lodebar, and Barzillai the Gileadite (2 Sam. xvii:27), over whom the authority of the Israelitish crown would naturally be precarious; while west of the Jordan the agrarian law of Moses made it difficult or impossible for a landed nobility to form itself, which could be formidable to the royal authority. That the Arab spirit of freedom was rooted in the eastern tribes may perhaps be inferred from the case of the Rechabites, who would neither live in houses nor plant vines; undoubtedly, like some of the Nabathæans, lest by becoming settled and agricultural they should be enslaved. Yet the need of imposing this law on his descendants would not have been felt by Jonadab had not an opposite tendency been rising—that of agricultural settlement.

(12) Influence of the Prophets. Although the priests and Levites nearly disappeared out of Israel, prophets were perhaps even more numerous and active there than in Judah, and Abijah, whose prediction first endangered Jeroboam (1 Kings xi:29-40), lived in honor at Shiloh to his dying day (xiv:2). Obadiah alone saved one hundred prophets of Jehovah from the rage of Jezebel (xviii:13). Possibly their extra-social character freed them from the restraint imposed on priests and Levites; and while they felt less bound to the formal rites of the Law, the kings of Israel were also less jealous of them. (See HEBREWS, RELIGION OF THE; see also CHRONOLOGY.)

F. W. N.

ISSACHAR (is'sa-kar), (Heb. יִשָּׂכָר, yis-saww-kawr', he will bring reward).

1. The Ninth Son of Jacob. Son of Jacob and Leah, born B. C. about 2000, who gave name to one of the tribes of Israel (Gen. xxx:18; Num. xxvi:25).

2. The Tribe of Issachar. (1) Characteristics. Jacob, on his deathbed, speaking metaphorically of the character and destinies of his sons, or rather of the tribes which should spring from them, said, 'Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens' (Gen. xlix:14, 15). Remembering the character of the ass in eastern countries, we may be sure that this comparison was not intended in disparagement. The ass is anything but stupid; and the proverbial obstinacy which it sometimes exhibits in our own country is rather the result of ill-treatment than a natural characteristic of the animal. Its true attributes are patience, gentleness, great capability of endurance, laborious exertion, and a meek submission to authority. Issachar, therefore, the progenitor of a race singularly docile, and distinguished for their patient industry, is exhibited under the similitude of the meekest and most laborious of quadrupeds. The descriptive character goes on: 'And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute;' which probably does not imply that reproach upon Issachar, as addicted to ignominious ease, which some commentators find in it. It seems simply to mean that finding itself in possession of a most fertile portion of Palestine, the tribe devoted itself to the labors of agriculture, taking little interest in the public affairs of the nation. Accordingly Josephus says that the heritage of the tribe 'was fruitful to admiration, abounding in pastures and nurseries of all kinds, so that it would make any man in love with husbandry' (Antiq. v. 1. 22). But although a decided preference of agricultural over commercial or military pursuits is here indicated, there seems no reason to conclude, as some gather from the last clause, that the tribe would be willing to purchase exemption from war by the payment of a heavy tribute. The words do not necessarily imply this; and there is no evidence that the tribe ever declined any military service to which it was called. On the contrary, it is specially commended by Deborah for the promptitude with which it presented itself in the war with Jabin (Judg. v:15); and in the days of David honorable testimony is borne to its character (1 Chron. xii:32). In this passage the 'children of Issachar' are described as 'men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do;' which, compared with Esther i:13, has been supposed to mean that they were skilled in the various practical applications of astronomy. But what need there was of astronomy on the occasion of calling David to the throne of Israel after the death of Abner and Ishbosheth, is not very easy to discover. It more probably means that they were men held in esteem for their prudence and wisdom, and who knew that the time was come when it was no longer safe to delay calling David to the throne of all Israel.

(2) Numbers. Quitting Egypt the tribe of Issachar numbered 54,000 adult males, which gave it the fifth numerical rank among the twelve tribes, Judah, Simeon, Zebulun, and Dan being alone above it. In the wilderness it increased nearly 10,000, and then ranked as the third of the tribes, Judah and Dan only being more numerous (Num. i:xxvi).

(3) Territory. The territory of the tribe comprehended the whole of the plain of Esdraelon and the neighboring districts—the granary of Palestine. It was bounded on the east by the Jordan, on the west and south by Manassch, and on the north by Asher and Zebulun. It contained the towns of Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Jezreel, and Bethshan, with the villages of Endor, Aphek, and Ibleam, all historical names; the mountains of Tabor and Gilboa, and the valley of Jezreel, were in the territory of this tribe, and the course of the river Kishon lay through it.

3. The seventh son of Obed-Edom; a Korhite Levite, who was doorkeeper in the Temple (1 Chron. xxvi:5), B. C. 1014.

ISSHIAH (is-shi'ah), (Heb. יִשִּׂיָּהוּ, yish-shee-yaw', Jehovah will lend).

1. A Levite; the second son of Uzziel of the house of Kohath (1 Chron. xxiv:25). The context seems to locate him in the time of David.

2. Son of Rehabiah the grandson of Moses through Eliezer. He lived in the time of David and was the head of the large family named after his father (1 Chron. xxiv:21; comp. xxiii:17; xxvi:25). The name is elsewhere given Jeshiah.

ISSUE (ish'ü), (Heb. מוֹלֶתֶת, mo-leh' deth, children, posterity, Gen. xlviii:6; Matt. xxii:25). It is applied also to anything worthless or ignoble (Is. xxii:24).

The issues from death, mean, all the means of escape from sin or misery, and all the persons redeemed, belong to the Lord (Ps. lxxviii:20). Out of the heart are the issues of life; the holy thoughts and good works of men demonstrate spiritual life to be in their heart, and prepare them for eternal life (Prov. iv:23).

ISSUE, RUNNING (Heb. מוֹרֶקֶת, maw-kore').

A running of blood, seed, etc. (Lev. xii:7; Ezek. xxiii:20). An issue of this kind was very polluting; but a mother's did not pollute her sucking child. The references in Lev. xv:2, 3; xxii:4; Num. v:2; 2 Sam. iii:29 are probably to gonorrhoea of the milder form. The virulent forms did not appear until the fifteenth century. (See Chardin, Voyages en Perse, ii:200; Michaelis, Laws of Moses, iv:282.)

ISUAH (ish'u-ah), (1 Chron. vii:30). See ISHUAH.

ISUI (is'u-i), (Heb. יִשִּׂוּיָּהוּ, yish-vee', level, Gen. xlvii:17). See ISHUAL.

ITALIAN BAND or COHORT (i-täl'yan), (Acts x:1), was probably a Roman cohort from Italy, stationed at Cæsarea; so called to distinguish it from the other troops, which were drawn from Syria and the adjacent regions. (Compare Josephus De Bell. Jud. iii:42.)

This is the only mention of the word Italian in the Scriptures. (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Letters of St. Paul, i, 143, Am. Ed.)

ITALY (it'a-lÿ), (Gr. Ἰταλία, ee-tal-ee'ah), occurs five times in Scripture (Acts xviii:2; xxvii:1, 6; Heb. xiii:24, and subscription).

We do not know the ancient name of Italy in the Hebrew language. Jerome has sometimes rendered Chittim, Italy (Num. xxiv:24; Ezek. xxvii:6) and in Is. lxvi:19, he translates Tubal, Italy, though according to others, the Tibarenians are here meant. In the New Testament, written in Greek, there is no ambiguity in the word Italy; it signifies that country including the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina, of which Rome is the capital.

ITCH (itch). See PLAGUE.

ITHAI (i'thāi), (1 Chron. xi:31). See ITTAI.

ITHAMAR (i'th'a-mār), (Heb. יִתְמָר, eth-aw-maw', palm-island), fourth son of Aaron.

He was consecrated to the priesthood along with his brothers (Exod. vi:23; Num. iii:2, 3). Nothing is individually recorded of him, except that the property of the tabernacle was placed under his charge (Exod. xxxviii:21), and that he superintended all matters connected with its removal by the Levitical sections of Gershon and Merari (Num. iv:28). The sacred utensils and their removal were entrusted to his elder brother Eleazar. Ithamar, with his descendants, occupied the position of common priest until the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli, under circumstances of which we are ignorant. Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high-priest of that line; and the pontificate then reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings ii:34).

ITHIEL (i'th'i-el), (Heb. יִתְיֵאל, eth-ee-ale', God with me).

1. Father of Maaseiah and son of Jesaiah of the tribe of Benjamin. One of his descendants is mentioned as returning from Babylon with a party (Neh. xi:7), B. C. long before 536.

2. A person to whom, with Ueal, Agur Ben-Jakeh addressed his prophecy (Prov. xxx:1), B. C. perhaps about 990.

ITHMAH (i'th'mah), (Heb. יִתְמָה, yith-maw', orphanage), a Moabite belonging to David's body-guard, according to the supplementary list of 1 Chron. xi:46 (B. C. 1046).

ITHNAN (i'th'nan), (Heb. יִתְנָן, yith-nawn', extensive), a city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv:23), given between Hazor and Ziph. As it is mentioned with Kedesh and Telem it doubtless lay on the borders of the desert. No trace of it has been found as yet.

ITHRA (i'th'rā), (Heb. יִתְרָא, yith-raw', excellence), an Ishmaelite (1 Chron. ii:17), but owing to a probable error in transcription he is called an "Israelite" in 2 Sam. xvii:25. He was the father, by Abigail, David's sister, of Amasa, a general under David (1 Kings ii:5), B. C. ante 1023, elsewhere (2 Sam. xvii:25), called JETHER. On the term "Israelite" see: Keil and Delitzsch, Books of Sam. p. 433, Eng. transl.; Wordsworth, Books of Sam. p. 111.

ITHRAN (i'th'ran), (Heb. יִתְרָן, yith-rawn', excellent).

1. A Horite, son of Dishon and grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi:26; 1 Chron. i:41). He was probably, like his father, a commander, "duke," of a tribe of the Horim (Gen. xxxvi:30), B. C. about 1964.

2. Apparently a son of Zophah, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii:37); probably the same as JETHER (ver. 38), B. C. long after 1856.

ITHREAM (i'th're-ām), (Heb. יִתְרֵאִם, yith-reh-awm', residue of the people), sixth son of David, born to him in Hebron of Ezlah, his "wife" (2 Sam. iii:5; 1 Chron. iii:3), B. C. 1045.

ITHRITE (or, better, Jetherite), (i'th'rite), (Heb. יִתְרִי, yith-ree'), the descendant of some man named Jethier resident in Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii:53).

It was the appellation of Ira and Gareb, two of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii:38; 1 Chron. xi:40). According to some, the term "Ithrite" denotes the posterity of Jethro, father-in-law of Moses. Others consider Jether but another form of Ithra (2 Sam. xvii:25), David's brother-in-law, from whom sprang the family of Ithrites. Still others derive the term from Jattir, a mountain district of Judah, from which the two Ithrite heroes of David may have come.

ITTAH-KAZIN (i'tah-kā'zin), (Heb. יִתְיָהוּ קָזִין, ayth kaw-tsen', time of a judge), a city of Issachar on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix:13), between Gath-hepher and Remmon-methoar. It has not been identified.

ITTAI (i'ta'i), (Heb. יִתְיָאֵ, it-tah'ee, timely).

1. Son of Ribai of Gibrath, a Benjamite hero of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii:29). In the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi:31) the name is Ithai, Heb. ith-ay'. (B. C. 1046.)

2. A Philistine of Gath in the army of David, commanding the 600 heroes who had made up David's band during his wanderings in Judah (2 Sam. xv:18, 19; comp. 1 Sam. xxiii:13; xxvii:2; xxx:9, 10). After the organization of the army by David at Mahanaim, Ittai is placed in command of a third part, holding equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii:2, 5, 12). No further mention of him occurs, nor of the conduct in battle of the faithful stranger. From the expression, "thy brethren" (2 Sam. xv:20), it is likely that he was not the only Philistine numbered in David's force.

ITURÆA (i'tu-ræ'ā or rē'ā), (Gr. Ἰτρούρα, ee-too-rah'yah), a district in the northeast of Palestine, forming the tetrarchy of Philip.

The name is supposed to have originated with yet-oor', or Jetur, enclosure, nomadic camp, one of Ishmael's sons (1 Chron. i:31). In 1 Chron. v:19, this name is given as that of a tribe or nation with which Reuben (beyond the Jordan) warred; and from its being joined with the names of other of Ishmael's sons it is evident that a tribe descended from his son Jetur is intimated.

During the exile this and other border countries were taken possession of by various tribes, whom, although they are called after the original names, as occupants of the countries which had received those names, we are not bound to regard as descendants of the original possessors. These new Ituræans were eventually subdued by King Aristobulus (B. C. 100); by whom they were constrained to embrace the Jewish religion, and were at the same time incorporated with the state (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 11. 3). Nevertheless the Ituræans were still recognizable as a distinct people in the time of Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 23). As already intimated, Herod the Great, in dividing his dominions among his sons, bequeathed Ituræa to Philip, as part of a tetrarchy composed, according to Luke, of Trachonitis and Ituræa; and as Josephus (Antiq. xvii: 8. 8) mentions his territory as composed of Auranitis, Trachonitis, and Bata-næa, it would appear as if the Evangelist regard Auranitis and Paneas as comprehended under Ituræa. The name is indeed so loosely applied by ancient writers that it is difficult to fix its boundaries with precision. Perhaps it may suffice for general purposes to describe it as a district of indeterminate extent, traversed by a line drawn from the Lake of Tiberias to Damascus; and by different writers, and under different circumstances, mentioned with extensions in various directions, beyond the proper limits of the name. The present Jedur probably comprehends the whole or greater part of the proper Ituræa. This is described by Burekhardt (Syria, p. 286) as 'lying south of Jebelkessoue, east of Jebel es-Sheik (Mount Hermon), and west of the Hadj road.' He adds that it now contains only twenty inhabited villages. By the help of these lights we may discover that Iturea was a plain country, about thirty miles long from north to south, and twenty-four from east to west, having on the north Abilene and the Damascene district; on the south Auranitis and part of Bashan; on the east the stony region of Trachonitis; and on the west the hill country of Bashan.

IVAH (i'vah), (Heb. יְוָא, iv-yaw', or אֲוָא, av-yaw'), a city belonging to Assyria whence colonists were deported to Samaria (2 Kings xviii:34; xix:13; Is. xxxvii:13).

In 2 Kings xvii:24, the cognate form "Ava" occurs. Rawlinson identifies it with Hit of Babylonia, the "Is of Herodotus (i:179), which was renowned for its bituminous springs that are still plentiful enough to mark the identity of the place. It is probably the Ahava of Ezra (viii:15). Hit or "Is lay on the east side of the Euphrates between Sepharvaim and Hena, with which it seems to have had a political alliance before the reign of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix:13). Rich. First Memoir on Babylon, p. 64; Chesney, Euphrates Expedition, i. 55.

IVORY (i'vörÿ), (Heb. שֵׁן הַבְּעִימ', shen-hab-beem', ivory tusk, 1 Kings x:22; 2 Chron. ix:21; Rev. xviii:12).

'Elephant's tooth,' or simply 'elephant,' is a common name for ivory, not only in the Oriental languages and in Greek, but also in the Western tongues; although in all of them teeth of other species may be included. The tusks are called horns (Ezek. xxvii:15). Elephants' teeth were largely imported as merchandise, and also brought as tribute into Egypt. The processions of human figures bearing presents, etc., still extant on the walls of palaces and tombs, attest by the black crisp-haired bearers of huge teeth, that some of these came from Ethiopia or Central Africa; and by white men similarly laden, who also bring an Asiatic elephant and a white bear, that others came from the East. Phœnician traders had ivory in such abundance that the chief seats of their galleys were inlaid with it. In the Scriptures, according to the Chaldee Paraphrase, Jacob's bed was made of this substance (Gen. xlix:33); we find King Solomon importing it from Tarshish (1 Kings x:22); and if Ps. xlv:8 was written before his reign, ivory was extensively used in the furniture of royal residences at a still earlier period.

The tusks of African elephants are generally much longer than those of the Asiatic; and it may be observed in this place, that the ancients, as well as the moderns, are mistaken when they assert elephants' tusks to be a kind of horns. They are genuine teeth, combining in themselves, and occupying, in the upper jaw, the whole mass of secretions which in other animals form the upper incisor and lanian teeth. They are used for defense and offense, and for holding down green branches, or rooting up water-plants; but still they are not absolutely necessary, since there is a variety of elephant in the Indian forests entirely destitute of tusks, and the females in most of the races are either without them, or have them very small; not turned downwards, as Bochart states, but rather straight, as correctly described by Pliny. (See ELEPHANT.) C. H. S.

IVY (i-vÿ) (Gr. κισσός, kis-sos'), is mentioned only once, and that in the Apocrypha (2 Macc. vi:7), where the Temple is described as being desecrated by the Gentiles, and the Jews forced to depart from the laws of their fathers: 'And when the feast of Bacchus was kept, the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy.' The term κισσός or κισσός seems to have been applied by the Greeks in a general sense, and to have included many plants, and among them some climbers, as the convolvulus, besides the common ivy, which was especially dedicated to Bacchus.

It is well known that in the Dionysia, or festivals in honor of Dionysus, and in the processions called θιασσοί, thee'-as-oy, with which they were celebrated, women also took part, in the disguise of Bacchæ, Naiades, Nymphæ, etc., adorned with garlands of ivy, etc.

IYAR (e'yâr), (Heb. יָאָר, ee-yaw'), the late name of that month which was the second of the sacred, and the seventh of the civil, year of the Jews, and which began with the new moon of May.

The few memorable days in it are the 10th, as a fast for the death of Eli; the 14th, as the second or lesser Passover, for those whom uncleanness or absence prevented from celebrating the feast in Nisan (Num. ix:11); and the 23d, as a feast, instituted by Simon the Maccabee in memory of his taking the citadel Acrai in Jerusalem (1 Macc. xiii:51, 52); the 28th, as a fast for the death of Samuel.

The name Iyar does not occur in the Old Testament, this month being always described as the second month, except in four places in which it is called Ziv (1 Kings v:1, 37; Dan. ii:31; iv:33). Ziv is not considered to be a proper name, but an appellative. It radically means bright, an appropriate epithet of the month of flowers. J. N.

IZEHAR (iz'e-här), (Num. iii:19). See IZHAR.

IZEHARITES (iz'e-har-ites), (Heb. יְזַהָרִיתִי, haw-yits-haw-ree'), a family of Levites descended from Izhar, son of Kohath (Num. iii:27), called elsewhere IZHARITES (which see).

IZHAR (iz'här), (Heb. יְזַהָר, yits-haw', anointing), grandson of Levi, and second son of Kohath (Ex. vi:18, 21; Num. iii:19, xvi:1; 1 Chron. vi:2, 18).

In 1 Chron. vi:22, Amminadab appears in the place of Izhar as the son of Kohath and father of Korah, which must be an error of transcription; for in verse 38 Izhar appears again in the proper place.

IZHARITES (iz'här-ites), (Heb. יְזַהָרִיתִי, haw-yits-haw-ree'), same as IZHAR.

Shelomoth was chief of the family in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiv:22), and with his brethren had charge of the Temple treasure (1 Chron. xxiv:22; xxvi:23, 29). The name is Izelharites in Num. iii:27. (See IZEHARITES.)

IZRAHIAH (iz'ra-hi'ah), (Heb. יִזְרָאֵל, yiz-rakh-yaw', Jah will bring forth).

1. A "son" of Uzzi, a descendant of Issachar through Tola (1 Chron. vii:3). B. C. about 1014.

2. A leader of the singers, who joined in the celebration over the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:42). B. C. 446.

IZRAHITE (iz'ra-hite), (Heb. יִזְרָאֵלִי, yiz-rakhk'), the patronymic appellation of Shamluth, David's general (1 Chron. xxvii:8). He was probably a descendant of Zerah, son of Judah.

IZRI (iz'ri), (Heb. יִזְרֵי, yits-ree', the Jezerite), a Levite, leader of the fourth division of singers under David (1 Chron. xxv:11); probably the same as Zeri, son of Geduthun (1 Chron. xxv:3), B. C. 1014.

J

JAAKAN (jā'a-kān), (Heb. יַאֲכָן, yah-ak-awn', wrestler), father of the Bene-jaakan of Num. xxxiii:30-32; Deut. x:6, and son of Ezer, son of Seir, the Horite (1 Chron. i:42), where his name is given as Jakan, B. C. 1780. He is called Akan in Gen. xxxvi:27.

JAAKOBAB (jā-a-kō'bab), (Heb. יַעֲקֹבָב, yah-ak-o'bau, another form of Jacob), one of the prosperous descendants (princes) of Simeon that emigrated to the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv:36), B. C. about 710.

JAAAL or JAALAH (ja-ā'lā or ja-ā'lah), (Heb. יַעֲלָל, yah-al-aw', wild goat), one of the Nethinim ("servants of Solomon"), whose descendants returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii:56; Neh. vii:58), B. C. 536.

JAALAM (ja-ā'lam), (Heb. יַעֲלָם, yah-lawm', whom God hides), a son of Esau by Aholibamah, daughter of Anah (Gen. xxxvi:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i:35), B. C. 1740.

JAANAI (jā'a-nāi or ja-ā'nāi), (Heb. יַעֲנַי, yah-an-ah'ee, responsive), a chief Gadite who dwelt in Bashan (1 Chron. v:12), B. C. 1070.

JAARE-OREGIM (jā'a-re-ōr'e-gim), (Heb. יַעֲרֵי אֲרֵגִים, yah-ar-ay' o-reg-eem', woods of weavers), the father of Elhanan, belonging to Bethlehem, who slew the brother of Goliath (2 Sam. xxi:19), B. C. 1080. (See JAIR, 4).

JAASAU (jā'a-sau), (Heb. יַעֲסָו, yah-as-oo' they will do), one of the family of Bani who married a strange wife (Ezra x:37), B. C. 457.

JAASIEL (ja-ā'si-el), (Heb. יַעֲשִׂיאל, yah-as-ee-ale', whom God created), son of Abner, in David's time, cousin of Saul (1 Chron. xxvii:21), B. C. 1015, called Jasiel (1 Chron. xi:47), and named among those on the increased list of David's heroes.

JAAZANIAH (jā-ā'za-ni'ah), (Heb. יַעֲזַנְיָהוּ, yah-az-an-yaw', Jehovah hears).

1. The son of a Maachathite (2 Kings xxv:23; Jer. xl:8). (B. C. 588.)

2. A chief man of the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv:3). (B. C. 600.)

3. A wicked prince of Judah against whom Ezekiel was told to prophesy (Ezek. xi:1). (B. C. 594.)

4. Son of Shaphan; seen by Ezekiel in a vision worshipping in the "chambers of imagery" (Ezek. viii:11). (B. C. 593.)

JAAZER (ja-ā'zer or jā'zer), (Heb. יַעֲזֵר, yah-az-ayr', helpful. See JAZER.

JAAZIAH (jā'a-zī'ah), (Heb. יַעֲזִיָּהוּ, yah-az-ee-yaw' hoo, whom Jehovah consoles), a third son of Merari in the days of Solomon (1 Chron. xxiv:26, 27), B. C. 1010.

JAAZIEL (ja-ā'zi-el), (Heb. יַעֲזִיאל, yah-az-ee-ale', comforted by God), one of the Levites of the second order in the time of David (1 Chron. xv:18), B. C. 1015.

JABAL (jā'bal), (Heb. יַבֵּל, yaw-bawl', a stream).

A descendant of Cain, son of Lamech and Adah, who is described in Gen. iv:20, as 'the father of such as dwell in tents, and have cattle.' This obviously means that Jabal was the first who adopted that nomade life which is still followed by numerous Arabian and Tartar tribes in Asia.

JABBOK (jāb'bok), (Heb. יַבֹּק, yaw-boke', pouring forth).

One of the streams which traverse the country east of the Jordan, and which, after a course nearly from east to west, falls into that river about thirty miles below the lake of Tiberias. It seems to rise in the Hauran mountains, and its whole course may be computed at sixty-five miles. It is mentioned in Scripture as the boundary which separated the kingdom of Sihon, king of the Amorites, from that of Og, king of Bashan (Josh. xii:2); and it appears afterwards to have been the boundary between the tribe of Reuben and the half tribe of Manasseh. The earliest notice of it occurs in Gen. xxxii:22.

The Jabbok now bears the name of Zerka, the blue river. In its passage westward across the plains, it more than once passes underground; and in summer the upper portion of its channel becomes dry. But on entering the more hilly country immediately east of the Jordan, it receives tribute from several springs, which maintain it as a perennial stream, although very low in summer. The water is pleasant, and the bed being rocky the stream runs clear (Burckhardt's Syria, p. 347; Irby and Mangles, Travels, p. 319; Buckingham, Palestine, ii. 109; Lindsay, ii. 123).

JABESH (jā'bash), (Heb. יַבֵּשׁ, yaw-bashe', dry, parched).

1. Father of Shallum, the fifteenth king of Israel (2 Kings xv:10). (B. C. before 770.)

2. A short form of Jabesh-Gilead (1 Sam. xi: 3, 9, 10; xxxi:12, 13; 1 Chron. x:12).

JABESH-GILEAD (jā'besh-gīl'e-ad), (Heb. יַבֶּשׁ גִּלְעָד, yaw-bashe' ghil-aw'd, Jabesh of Gilead), a town beyond the Jordan, in the land of Gilead.

Jabesh belonged to the half tribe of Manasseh, and was sacked by the Israelites for refusing to join in the war against Benjamin (Judg. xxi: 8). It is chiefly memorable for the siege it sustained from Nahash, king of the Ammonites, the raising of which formed the first exploit of the newly-elected King Saul, and procured his confirmation in the sovereignty. The inhabitants had agreed to surrender, and to have their right eyes put out (to incapacitate them from military service), but were allowed seven days to ratify the treaty. In the meantime Saul collected a large army, and came to their relief (1 Sam. xi). This service was gratefully remembered by the Jabeshites; and, about forty years after, when the dead bodies of Saul and his sons were gibbeted on the walls of Bethshan, on the other side of the river, they made a forced march by night, took away the bodies, and gave them honorable burial (1 Sam. xxxi).

Jabesh still existed as a town in the time of Eusebius, who places it six miles from Pella towards Gerasa; but the knowledge of the site is now lost, unless we accept the conclusion of Mr. Buckingham, who thinks it may be found in a place called Jehaz or Jezaz, marked by ruins upon a hill, in a spot not far from which, according to the above indications, Jabesh must have been situated (Travels, ii. 130-134). Robinson (Bib. Res. p. 320) supposes it to be the ruins of ed-Deir in the Wady Yabes.

JABEZ (jā'bez), (Heb. יַבֵּז, yah-bayts', who causes sorrow, possibly a high place).

1. A town of Judah where the families of the scribes dwelt (1 Chron. ii:55).

2. The head of a family of Judah (1 Chron. iv:9, 10). (B. C. 1444.)

JABIN (jā'bin), (Heb. יַבִּין, yaw-been', discerner, intelligent).

1. A king of Hazor, and one of the most powerful of all the princes who reigned in Canaan when it was invaded by the Israelites. His dominion seems to have extended over all the north part of the country; and after the ruin of the league formed against the Hebrews in the south by Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, he assembled his tributaries near the waters of Merom (the lake Huleh), and called all the people to arms. This coalition was destroyed, as the one in the south had been, and Jabin himself perished in the sack of Hazor, his capital. (B. C. about 1169.) This prince was the last powerful enemy with whom Joshua combated, and his overthrow seems to have been regarded as the crowning act in the conquest of the Promised Land (Josh. xi: 1-14).

2. King of Hazor, and probably descended from the preceding. It appears that during one of the servitudes of the Israelites, probably when they lay under the yoke of Cushan or Eglon, the kingdom of Hazor was reconstructed. The narrative gives to this second Jabin even the title of 'king of Canaan;' and this, with the possession of 900 iron-armed war-chariots, implies unusual power and extent of dominion. The iniquities of the Israelites having lost them the Divine protection, Jabin gained the mastery over them; and, stimulated by the remembrance of ancient wrongs, oppressed them heavily for twenty years. From this thralldom they were relieved by the great victory won by Barak in the plain of Esdraelon, over the hosts of Jabin, commanded by Sisera, one of the most renowned generals of those times, B. C. 1285. The well-compacted power of the king of Hazor was not yet, however, entirely broken. The war was still prolonged for a time, but ended in the entire ruin of Jabin, and the subjugation of his territories by the Israelites (Judg. iv.)

This is the Jabin whose name occurs in Ps. lxxxiii:9.

JABNEEL (jāb'ne-el), (Heb. יַבְנֵאל, yab-neh-ale', built of God).

1. A town on the boundary of Judah near the sea (Josh. xv:11); probably the same as JARNEH which see.

2. A city on the border of Naphtali, called "the village by the sea" Josh. xix:33. Site not identified.

JABNEH (jāb'neh), (Heb. יַבְנֵה, yab-neh', a building).

A Philistine town between Joppa and Ashdod (2 Chron. xxvi:6), taken by Uzziah. Its site is probably marked by the modern Yebna, a village about twelve miles distant from Jaffa; in a fine open plain, surrounded by hills and covered with herbage. Northeast of Yebna is a lofty hill, from which is an extensive and pleasing view of Ramla, distant about five miles. On sloping hills of easy ascent, by which the plains are bordered, Yebna, Ekron, Ashdod, and Ashkalon were in sight.

JACHAN (jā'kan), (Heb. יַכָּחָן, yah-kawn', troublesome), the chief of a family of Gad (1 Chron. v:13), B. C. 1100.

JACHIN (jā'kin), (Heb. יַכִּין, yaw-keen', he shall establish).

1. A son of Simeon (Gen. xlvi:10; Exod. vi: 15) and founder of the Jachinites (Num. xxvi: 12). (B. C. 1700.)

2. The name of one of the brazen pillars in Solomon's temple (1 Kings vii:21; 2 Chron. iii:17).

3. A priest of Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. ix:10; Neh. xi:10). (B. C. 445.)

4. The head of the family of one of the sons of Aaron (1 Chron. xxiv:17). (B. C. 1015.)

JACHINITES (jā'kin-ites), (Heb. יַכִּינִיתִים, yaw-kee-nee', see above), a family founded by Jachin, Simeon's son (Num. xxvi:12). (See JACHIN, 1.)

JACINTH (jā'sinth), (Gr. ἰάκινθος, hoo-ak'en-thos, hyacinth), a precious stone (Rev. xxi:20); but properly a jacinth (Rev. ix:17) of deep purple color. (See LESIEM.)

JACOB (jā'kob), (Heb. יַעֲקֹב, yah-ak-obe', heel-catcher, i. e., supplanter).

1. The second son of Isaac by his wife Rebekah. Her conceiving is stated to have been supernatural. Led by peculiar feelings she went to inquire of the Lord, and was informed that she was indeed with child, that her offspring should be the founders of two nations, and that the elder should serve the younger: circumstances which ought to be borne in mind when a judgment is pronounced on her conduct in aiding Jacob to secure the privileges of birth to the exclusion of his elder brother Esau—conduct which these facts, connected with the birth of the boys, may well have influenced.

1. Personal History. As the boys grew, Jacob appeared to partake of the gentle, quiet and retiring character of his father, and was accordingly led to prefer the tranquil safety and pleasing occupations of a shepherd's life to the bold and daring enterprises of the hunter, for which Esau had an irresistible predilection. Jacob, therefore, passed his days in or near the paternal tent, simple and unpretending in his manner of life, and finding in the flocks and herds which he kept, images and emotions which both filled and satisfied his heart. His domestic habits and affections seem to have coöperated with the remarkable events that attended his birth, in winning for him the peculiar regard and undisguised preference of his mother, who probably in this merely yielded to impressions which she could scarcely account for, much less define, and who had not even a faint conception of the magnitude of influence to which her predilection was likely to rise, and the sad consequences to which it could hardly fail to lead.

(1) Buys Esau's Birthright. That selfishness, and a prudence which approached to cunning, had a seat in the heart of the youth Jacob, appears but too plain in his dealing with Esau, when he exacted from a famishing brother so large a price for a mess of pottage as the surrender of his birthright. Nor does the simple narrative of the Bible afford grounds by which this act can be well extenuated. Esau asks for food, alleging as his reason, 'for I am faint.' Jacob, unlike both a youth and a brother, answers, 'Sell me this day thy birthright.' What could Esau do? 'Behold,' he replies, 'I am at the point to die, and what profit (if by retaining my birthright I lose my life) shall this birthright do me?' Determined to have a safe bargain, the prudent Jacob, before he gave the needed refreshment, adds, 'Swear to me this day.' The oath was given, the food eaten, and Esau 'went his way,' leaving a home where he had received so sorry a welcome.

The leaning which his mother had in favor of Jacob would naturally be augmented by the conduct of Esau in marrying, doubtless contrary to his parents' wishes, two Hittite women, who are recorded to have been a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah.

(2) Secures Isaac's Blessing. Circumstances thus prepared the way for procuring the transfer of the birthright, when Isaac, being now old, proceeded to take steps to pronounce the irrevocable blessing which acted with all the force of a modern testamentary bequest. This blessing, then, it was essential that Jacob should receive in preference to Esau. Here Rebekah appears the chief agent; Jacob is a mere instrument in her hands. Isaac directs Esau to procure him some venison. This Rebekah hears, and urges her reluctant favorite to personate his elder brother. Jacob suggests difficulties; they are met by Rebekah, who is ready to incur any personal danger so that her object be gained. Her voice is obeyed, the venison is brought, Jacob is equipped for the deceit; he helps out his fraud by direct falsehood, and the old man, whose senses are now failing, is at last with difficulty deceived. It cannot be denied that this is a most reprehensible transaction, and presents a truly painful picture; in which a mother conspires with one son in order to cheat her aged husband, with a view to deprive another son of his rightful inheritance. Justification is here impossible; but it should not be forgotten in the estimate we form that there was a promise in favor of Jacob; that Jacob's qualities had endeared him to his mother; and that the prospect which arose was dark to her and threatening when she saw the neglected

Esau at the head of the house, and his hateful wives assuming command over herself.

(3) Jacob's Departure. Punishment in this world often follows close upon the heels of transgression. Fear seized the guilty Jacob, who is sent by his father, at the suggestion of Rebekah, to the original seat of the family, in order that he might find a wife among his cousins, the daughters of his mother's brother, Laban the Syrian. Before he is dismissed Jacob again receives his father's blessing, the object obviously being to keep alive in the young man's mind the great promise given to Abraham, and thus to transmit that influence which, under the aid of Divine providence, was to end in placing the family in possession of the land of Palestine, and in so doing to make it 'a multitude of people.'

(4) Dream at Bethel. It appears, from the language which Jacob employs (Gen. xxviii:16) in relation to the dream that he had when he tarried all night upon a certain plain on his journey eastward, that his idea of the Deity was little more than that of a local god—'Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not!'

(5) Meets Rachel. Jacob, on coming into the land of the people of the East, accidentally met with Rachel, Laban's daughter, to whom, with true eastern simplicity and politeness, he showed such courtesy as the duties of pastoral life suggest and admit. And here his gentle and affectionate nature displays itself under the influence of the bonds of kindred and the fair form of youth: 'Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept.'

(6) Serves Laban. After he had been with his uncle the space of a month, Laban inquires of him what reward he expects for his services. He asks for the 'beautiful and well-favored Rachel.' His request is granted on condition of a seven years' service—a long period truly, but to Jacob 'they seemed but a few days for the love he had to her.' When the time was expired, the crafty Laban availed himself of the customs of the country, in order to substitute his elder and 'tender-eyed' daughter Leah. In the morning Jacob found how he had been beguiled; but Laban excused himself, saying, 'It must not be done in our country, to give the younger before the firstborn.' Another seven years' service gains for Jacob the beloved Rachel. Leah, however, has the compensatory privilege of being the mother of the firstborn—Reuben. Three other sons successively follow, namely, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, sons of Leah. This fruitfulness was a painful subject of reflection to the barren Rachel, who employed language on this occasion that called forth a reply from her husband which shows that, mild as was the character of Jacob, it was by no means wanting in force and energy (Gen. xxx:2). An arrangement, however, took place, by which Rachel had children by means of her maid, Bilhah, of whom Dan and Naphtali were born. Two other sons—Gad and Asher—were born to Jacob of Leah's maid, Zilpah. Leah herself bare two more sons, namely, Issachar and Zebulun; she also bare a daughter, Dinah. At length Rachel herself bare a son, and she called his name Joseph.

Most faithfully, and with great success, had Jacob served his uncle for fourteen years, when he became desirous of returning to his parents. At the urgent request of Laban, however, he is induced to remain. The language employed upon this occasion (Gen. xxx:25, sq.) shows that Jacob's character had gained considerably during his service both in strength and comprehensiveness; but the means which he employed in order to make his bargain with his uncle work so as to enrich himself prove too clearly that his moral feelings had not undergone an equal improvement, and that the original taint of prudence, and the sad lessons of his mother in deceit, had produced some of their natural fruit in his bosom.

(7) Departs from Laban. The prosperity of Jacob displeased and grieved Laban, so that a separation seemed desirable. His wives are ready to accompany him. Accordingly he set out, with his family and his property, 'to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan.' It was not till the third day that Laban learned that Jacob had fled, when he immediately set out in pursuit of his nephew, and after seven days' journey overtook him in Mount Gilead. Laban, however, is divinely warned not to hinder Jacob's return. Reproach and recrimination ensued. Even a charge of theft is put forward by Laban, 'Wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?' In truth, Rachel had carried off certain images which were the objects of worship. Ignorant of this misdeed, Jacob boldly called for a search, adding, 'With whomsoever thou findest thy gods let him not live.' A crafty woman's cleverness eluded the keen eye of Laban. Rachel, by an appeal which one of her sex alone could make, deceived her father. Thus one sin begets another; superstition prompts to theft, and theft necessitates deceit.

Laban's conduct on this occasion called forth a reply from Jacob, from which it appears that his service had been most severe, and which also proves that however this severe service might have encouraged a certain servility, it had not prevented the development in Jacob's soul of a high and energetic spirit, which when roused could assert its rights and give utterance to sentiments just, striking, and forcible, and in the most poetical phraseology.

Peace, however, being restored, Laban, on the ensuing morning, took a friendly, if not an affectionate farewell of his daughters and their sons, and returned home. Meanwhile Jacob, going on his way, had to pass near the land of Seir, in which Esau dwelt. Remembering his own conduct and his brother's threat, he was seized with fear, and sent messengers before in order to propitiate Esau.

(8) News from Esau. Jacob, informed by his messengers that Esau came to meet him with four hundred men, justly suspected his intentions were murderous, and sent off before him a large present of two hundred and twenty goats, two hundred and twenty sheep, thirty milk-camels with their colts, forty kine, and ten bulls, twenty she-asses and ten foals. These he divided into five droves, and ordered the drivers of each to tell Esau, as they met him, that it was a present to him. By this means he hoped to appease his brother's anger.

(9) Wrestling All Night. Immediately preceding his interview with Esau, Jacob passed the night in wrestling with 'a man,' who is afterwards recognized as the angel of God, and who at length overcame Jacob by touching the hollow of his thigh. His name also was on this event changed by the mysterious antagonist into Israel, 'for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed' (Gen. xxxii:28). It is added that on this account his descendants abstained from eating the thigh of slaughtered animals.

(10) Reconciled to Esau. Having crossed the Jabbok, he divided his family into three divisions, that, if Esau murdered the foremost, the others might flee. The two handmaids, and their children, went foremost; Leah and hers next; and Rachel and Joseph last, that she might have most opportunity to get off, if there was danger. According to Jacob's direction, they all, in the humblest manner, did obeisance to Esau. Partly moved by this deportment, but chiefly by the hand of God, Esau met Jacob with the most tender affection, generously refused his present, because he had much wealth already; but Jacob urged him, because, said he, 'I have everything, and have had the great happiness to meet thee in kindness and love.' So Esau accepted of the present, and they became friends once more.

(11) Departs for Bethel. Having, by the misconduct of Hamor the Hivite and the hardy valor of his sons, been involved in danger from the natives of Shechem in Canaan, Jacob is divinely directed, and under the Divine protection proceeds to Bethel, where he is to 'make an altar unto God that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of Esau thy brother.' Obedient to the Divine command, he first purifies his family from 'strange gods,' which he hid under 'the oak which is by Shechem,' after which God appeared to him again with the important declaration, 'I am God Almighty,' and renewed the Abrahamic covenant.

(12) Death of Rachel. While journeying from Beth-el to Ephrath, his beloved Rachel lost her life in giving birth to her second son, Benjamin. At length Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, the family residence, in time to pay the last attentions to the aged patriarch.

(13) Loss of Joseph. Not long after this bereavement Jacob was robbed of his beloved son Joseph through the jealousy and bad faith of his brothers. This loss is the occasion of showing us how strong were Jacob's paternal feelings; for on seeing what appeared to be proofs that 'some evil beast had devoured Joseph,' the old man 'rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days, and refused to be comforted.'—'I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning' (Gen. xxxvii:35).

(14) Egypt. A widely extended famine induced Jacob to send his sons down into Egypt, where he had heard there was corn, without knowing by whose instrumentality. The patriarch, however, retained his youngest son Benjamin, 'lest mischief should befall him,' as it had befallen Joseph. The young men returned with the needed supplies of corn. They related, however, that they had been taken for spies, and that there was but one way in which they could disprove the charge, namely, by carrying down Benjamin to 'the lord of the land.' This Jacob vehemently refused: 'Me have ye bereaved; Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin; my son shall not go down with you; if mischief befall him, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave' (Gen. xlii:38). The pressure of the famine, however, at length forced Jacob to allow Benjamin to accompany his brothers on a second visit to Egypt; whence in due time they brought back to their father the pleasing intelligence, 'Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt.' How naturally is the effect of this on Jacob told, 'and Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.' When, however, they had gone into particulars, he added, 'Enough, Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die.'

Encouraged 'in the visions of the night,' Jacob goes down to Egypt. (B. C. about 2050.) 'And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while (Gen. xlii:46). And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive (Gen. xlvi:29). Joseph proceeded to conduct his father into the presence of the Egyptian monarch, when the man of God, with that self-consciousness and dignity which religion gives, instead of offering slavish adulation, 'blessed Pharaoh.' Struck with the patriarch's venerable air, the king asked, 'How old art thou?' What composure and elevation is there in the reply, 'The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years; few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage;' and Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii:8-10).

Jacob, with his sons, now entered into possession of some of the best land of Egypt, where they carried on their pastoral occupations, and enjoyed a very large share of earthly prosperity. The aged patriarch, after being strangely tossed about on a very rough ocean, found at last a tranquil harbor, where all the best affections of his nature were gently exercised and largely unfolded. After a lapse of time Joseph, being informed that his father was sick, went to him, when 'Israel strengthened himself, and sat up in his bed.' He acquainted Joseph with the Divine promise of the land of Canaan which yet remained to be fulfilled, and took Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, in place of Reuben and Simeon, whom he had lost.

(15) Death. Then having convened his sons, the venerable patriarch pronounced on them also a blessing, which is full of the loftiest thought, expressed in the most poetical diction, and adorned by the most vividly descriptive and engaging imagery, showing how deeply religious his character had become, how freshly it retained its fervor to the last, and how greatly it had increased in strength, elevation and dignity:—'And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people' (Gen. xlix:33). (B. C. 1846.)

2. Character. In Jacob may be traced a combination of the quiet patience of his father with the acquisitiveness which seems to have marked his mother's family; and in Esau, as in Ishmael, the migratory and independent character of Abraham was developed into the enterprising habits of a warlike hunter-chief. Jacob, whose history occupies a larger space, leaves on the reader's mind a less favorable impression than either of the other patriarchs with whom he is joined in equal honor in the New Testament (Matt. viii:11). But in considering his character we must bear in mind that we know not what limits were set in those days to the knowledge of God and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. A timid, thoughtful boy would acquire no self-reliance in a secluded home. There was little scope for the exercise of intelligence, wide sympathy, generosity, frankness. Growing up a stranger to the great joys and great sorrows of natural life—deaths, and wedlock, and births; inured to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother; secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, Jacob was perhaps in a fair way to become a narrow, selfish, deceitful, disappointed man. But, after dwelling for more than half a lifetime in solitude, he is driven from home by the provoked hostility of his more powerful brother. Then in deep and bitter sorrow the out-cast begins life afresh long after youth has passed, and finds himself brought first of all unexpectedly into that close personal communion with God which elevates the soul, and then into that enlarged intercourse with men which is capable of drawing out all the better feelings of human nature. An unseen world was opened. God revived and renewed to him that slumbering promise over which he had brooded for threescore years, since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid "supplanter," the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah, dies the "soldier of God" uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity. (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

3. Deception of Isaac Palliated. Bishop Horne gives the following considerations on this subject:

The proposition of deceiving Isaac originated not with Jacob, but with Rebekah. Jacob remonstrated against it, as likely to bring a curse upon him, rather than a blessing; nor would consent to perform his part, till she engaged to take all the blame on herself: "On me be thy curse, my son; only obey my voice."

From this speech, and from the earnestness and solicitude discovered by Rebekah, it may not unfairly be presumed that she had some special reason for what she did; that Isaac was about to take a wrong step in a concern of great moment, which ought to be prevented, and could be prevented by no other means.

The rectitude of Rebekah's judgment seems evidently to have been recognized and allowed by Isaac, at the conclusion of the matter. For though he had blessed Jacob, intending to bless Esau, yet, as if recollecting himself, he confirmed and ratified that blessing in the strongest terms: "Yea, and he shall be blessed." Still further—at sending him away, he again repeated the benediction, in the most solemn and affecting manner: "God give thee the blessing of Abraham!" It is difficult to assign any other reason why, if so disposed, upon discovering the fraud, he might not have reversed the proceeding. Nay, by the kind meeting of the brothers afterwards, one should be inclined to suppose that Esau himself acquiesced at length in the propriety of what had been done.

If such were the case, Isaac was only deceived into what was right, and what he himself acknowledged to be so in the conclusion. The deception was like those often practiced by physicians for the benefit of their patients; and casuists must decide upon it in the same manner. The offense of Jacob is certainly alleviated, if not entirely taken off, by the circumstance of Rebekah pledging herself to bear the blame; as the conduct of Rebekah seems justified by that of Isaac ratifying and confirming to Jacob the blessing originally intended for Esau. Upon the whole, if there were any offense, it was one that might be forgiven; and if God, notwithstanding, continued to bless Jacob, he did forgive it, and had reasons for so doing. (Bp. Horne's Works, vol. vi, pp. 477, 478.) (See REBEKAH; ESAU; MARRIAGE.)

II. Jacob, the father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Matt. i:15, 16). (B. C. before 40.)

JACOB'S WELL (jā-kob's wēl). Jacob's Well is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but was made famous by the meeting of Jesus with the woman of Samaria at that place, as recorded in John 4:5-30. It is located near Shechem, otherwise known as Sychar, the modern Nablus. This is one of the very few spots in Palestine which have been closely identified with our Savior's presence. It is about half a mile north from Joseph's Tomb at the base of Mt. Gerizim. Maundrell, in 1697, found the depth of the well to be 105 feet, with 15 feet of water. Capt. Anderson, who visited it in 1866, found it to be only 75 feet. It may have been twice that depth originally. When visited by Farrar in 1870, it was only about 20 feet deep, and was in a state of hopeless ruin.

JADA (jā'dā), (Heb. יָדָא, yaw-daw', knowing), a brother of Shammai, son of Onam and grandson of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii:28, 32), B. C. 1450.

JADAU (jā'dāu or ja-dā'u), (Heb. יָדָא, yad-daw', knowing), one of the Bene-Nebo who had taken a strange wife (Ezra x:43), B. C. 457.

JADDUA (jad-dū'ā), (Heb. יָדָא, yad-doo'ah), knowing.

1. A Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x:21). (B. C. 445.)

2. Son of Jonathan, the high priest. The last of the high priests spoken of in the Old Testament (Neh. xii:11, 22). (B. C. 520.)

JADON (jā'dōn), (Heb. יָדָן, yaw-done', judge), called the Meronothite; he assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:7), B. C. 445.

JAEL (jā'el), (Heb. יָאֵל, yaw-ale', wild goat).

Wife of Heber, the Kenite. When Sisera, the general of Jabin, had been defeated, he alighted from his chariot, hoping to escape best on foot from the hot pursuit of the victorious Israelites. On reaching the tents of the nomadic chief, he remembered that there was peace between his sovereign and the house of Heber, and therefore applied for the hospitality and protection to which he was thus entitled. This request was very cordially granted by the wife of the absent chief, who received the vanquished warrior into the inner part of the tent, where he could not be discovered by strangers without such an intrusion as eastern customs would not warrant. She also brought him milk to drink, when he asked only water; and then covered him from view, that he might enjoy repose the more securely. As he slept, a horrid thought occurred to Jael, which she hastened too promptly to execute. She took one of the tent nails, and with a mallet, at one fell blow, drove it through the temples of the sleeping Sisera. (B. C. about 1406.) Soon after, Barak and his people arrived in pursuit, and were shown the lifeless body of the man they sought (Judg. iv:17-22). This deed drew much attention to Jael, and preserved the camp from molestation by the victors; and there is no disputing that her act is mentioned with great praise in the triumphal song wherein Deborah and Barak celebrated the deliverance of Israel (Judg. v:24).

It does not seem difficult to understand the object of Jael in this painful transaction. Her motives seem to have been entirely prudential, and, on prudential grounds, the very circumstance which renders her act the more odious—the peace subsisting between the nomadic chief and the king of Hazor—must, to her, have seemed to make it the more expedient. She saw that the Israelites had now the upper hand, and was aware that, as being in alliance with the oppressors of Israel, the camp might expect very rough treatment from the pursuing force; which would be greatly aggravated if Sisera were found sheltered within it. This calamity she sought to avert, and to place the house of Heber in a favorable position with the victorious party. She probably justified the act to herself by the consideration that as Sisera would certainly be taken and slain, she might as well make a benefit out of his inevitable doom as incur utter ruin in the attempt to protect him. Attempts have been made to vindicate her, because of the usages of ancient warfare, of rude times and ferocious manners. There was not, however, warfare, but peace between the house of Heber and the prince of Hazor. The existence of a set of usages in any civilized society under which the act of Jael would be deemed right is hardly conceivable.

JAGUR (jā'gur), (Heb. יָגוּר, yaw-goor', lodging-place), a town of Southern Judah (Josh. xv:21), which remains unidentified.

JAH (jāh), (Heb. יָה, yawh; Gr. Κύριος, Lat. dominus, Lord), an abbreviated form of Jehovah (Ps. lxxviii:4). Jah is also used in the construction of many Hebrew words, and is indicative of some real or supposed excellency of the object of application.

JAHATH (jā'hāth), (Heb. יָאֶת, yakh'ath, oneness, union).

1. A grandson of Gershon, son of Judah (1 Chron. iv:2). (B. C. 1600.)

2. A descendant of Gershon, son of Levi (1 Chron. vi:20). (B. C. 1450.)

3. A son of Shelomoth, one of the Levite representatives of the Kohathite family of Izhab (1 Chron. xxiv:22). (B. C. 1014.)

4. A Levite who helped oversee the repairing of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv:12). (B. C. 623.)

5. Head of the most numerous house of his tribe, the son of Shimei, son of Laadan (1 Chron. xxiii:10, 11). Possibly the same as 2, the errors having crept in through transcription.

JAHAZ (jā'hāz), (Heb. יָאֶז, yah'hats, trodden down, a thrashing floor), a town beyond Jordan where the decisive battle was fought between the Israelites and Sihon, king of the Ammonites (Num. xxi:23; Deut. ii:32; Judg. xi:20). The city was assigned to the Merarite Levites from the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii:18; xxi:36; 1 Chron. vi:78). The Babylonian conquerors overran Jahaz, which is involved in the denunciations uttered in Jer. xlvi:21, 34; Is. xv:4. The city was at this time in the hands of the Moabites.

JAHAZA (jā'ha-zā), JAHAZAH (jā'ha-zah) and JAHZAH (jāh'zah), (Josh. xxi:36; Jer. xlvi:21), other forms of JAHAZ (which see).

JAHAZIAH (jä'ha-zi'ah). (Heb. יָחִזְיָאֵל, yakh-zeh-yaw', whom Jehovah beholds), one of the sons of Tikvah, who with others was appointed by Ezra to determine what Jews had taken foreign wives (Ezra x:15), B. C. 459.

JAHAZIEL (ja-hä'zi-el), (Heb. יָחִזְיָאֵל, yakh-az-ee-ale', beheld by God).

1. One of the heroes who deserted the cause of Saul and joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4). (B. C. 1055.)

2. A priest and trumpet blower with Benaiah whose duty it was to appear in the ministrations before the ark after David had brought it to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi:6). (B. C. 1043.)

3. A Kohathite Levite whose house is enumerated in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiii:19; xxiv:23). (B. C. between 1618 and 1014.)

4. The son of Zechariah, a Levite, who was inspired by the Holy Spirit to uplift Jehoshaphat by his predictions of decided triumph, when he was anticipating the coming of a great army of Moabites, Ammonites, and Mehunims (2 Chron. xx:14-17). (B. C. about 896.)

5. One of the sons of Jahziel, chief of the "sons of Shechaniah" who returned from the captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii:5), (B. C. before 459.) The text here is probably corrupt and should read "Sons of Zathoe," or "Zathi."

JAHDAI (jä'h'da-i), (Heb. יָחֵדַי, yeh-daw'ee, Judaistic), a father of six sons spoken of in the genealogy of Caleb (1 Chron. ii:47), B. C. before 612.

JAHDIEL (jä'h'di-el), (Heb. יָחֵדַי, yakh-dee-ale', unity of God), one of the heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. v:24), B. C. 720.

JAHDO (jä'h'do), (Heb. יָחֵדוֹ, yakh-doe', his union), a Gadite, son of Buz and father of Jeshishai (1 Chron. v:14), B. C. between 1093 and 782.

JAHLEEL (jä'h'le-el), (Heb. יָחֵלֵל, yakh-leh-ale', hoping in God), the third of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xlv:14; Num. xxvi:26), and the founder of the family of Jahleelites (B. C. 1700). The name occurs as Jahziel (1 Chron. vii:13).

JAHLEELITES, THE (jä'h'le-el-ites), (Heb. יָחֵלְלִים, hah-yakh-leh-ay-lee'), the descendants of JAHLEEL (Num. xxvi:26).

JAHMAI (jä'h'ma-i), (Heb. יָחֵמַי, yakh-mah'ee, hot), one of the heads of the house of Tola, grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. vii:2), B. C. about 1658.

JAHZAH (jä'h'zah), (Heb. יָחֵצֵה, yah-tsav', a place stamped, threshing floor, 1 Chron. vi:78). See JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL (jä'h'ze-el), (Heb. יָחֵצֵהֶל, yakh-tseh-ale', God apportion), the first-named of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xlv:24), founder of the family of the Jahzeelites. The name is mentioned in 1 Chron. vii:13 and spelled Jahziel; Heb. Yach-tsiel' (B. C. 1856).

JAHZEELITES (jä'h'ze-el-ites), (Heb. יָחֵצֵהֶלִים, yakh-tseh-a-lee', Num. xxvi:48). See JAHZEEL.

JAHZERAH (jä'h'ze-rah), (Heb. יָחֵצֵרָה, yakh-zay-raw', led back by God), a priest of Immer (1 Chron. ix:12), and son of Meshullam, probably the same as AHASAI (Neh. xi:13), B. C. ante 536.

JAILER (jä'l'er), (Gr. δεσμοφύλαξ, des-mof-oo'lox, guard of a prisoner), the keeper of Paul and Silas when imprisoned at Philippi (Acts xvi:23, 27, 36).

JAIR (jä'ir), (Heb. יָאֵר, yaw-ere', enlightener).

1. A son of Segub, of the tribe of Manasseh by his mother, and of Judah by his father. He appears to have distinguished himself in an expedition against the kingdom of Bashan, the time of which is disputed, but may probably be referred to the last year of the life of Moses (B. C. 1451). It seems to have formed part of the operations connected with the conquest of the country east of the Jordan. He settled in the part of Argob bordering on Gilead, where we find twenty-three villages named collectively Havoth-jair, or 'Jair's villages' (Num. xxxii:41; Deut. iii:14; Josh. xiii:30; 1 Chron. ii:22; 1 Kings iv:13).

2. Eighth judge of Israel, of Gilead, in Manasseh, beyond the Jordan; and therefore, probably descended from the preceding, with whom, indeed, he is sometimes confounded. He ruled twenty-two years, and his opulence is indicated in a manner characteristic of the age in which he lived. 'He had thirty sons, that rode on thirty ass-colts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair, in the land of Gilead.'

The twenty-three villages of the more ancient Jair were probably among the thirty which this Jair possessed (Judg. x:3). (B. C. 1210.)

3. A Benjamite, father of Mordecai, the uncle of Esther (Esth. ii:5). (B. C. before 518.)

4. (Heb. יָאוֹר, yaw-oor, wooded; marg. text 'yaw'r'). Father of Elhanan, a hero of David's army who slew Lahmi, Goliath's brother (1 Chron. xx:5). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxi:19) the name is Jaare-oregim, through a probable error of transcription. (B. C. before 1018.)

JAIRITE (jäir-ite), (Heb. יָאוֹרִי, hah-yaw-e-ree'), an appellation of Ira, chief ruler or priest of David (2 Sam. xx:26), supposed to have been the descendant of the great Jair of Manasseh. (See JAIR, 2.)

JAIROS (jä'i-rüs), (Gr. Ἰάειρος, ee-ah'i-ros), a ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose daughter Jesus restored to life (Mark v:22; Luke viii:41), A. D. 27.

JAKAN (jä'kan), (Heb. יָאֵקָן, yah-ak-awn', wrestler, 1 Chron. i:42). The name is identical with JAAKAN (which see)

JAKEH (jä'keh), (Heb. יָאֵכֶה, yaw-keh', obedient, pious), is taken by some to be the name of the father of Agur, author of the Apothegms (Prov. xxx:1 sq.). According to the traditional view it is supposed to be a name of mystical import applied to David. Others identify Agur with Solomon, making Jakeh a name of David.

JAKIM (jä'kim), (Heb. יָאֵכִים, yaw-keem', whom God lifts up).

1. At the head of the twelfth course of priests of David (1 Chron. xxiv:12). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Shimhi resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:19). (B. C. about 588.)

JALON (jä'l'on), (Heb. יָלוֹן, yaw-lone', lodging, abiding), a son of Ezra mentioned in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. iv:17), B. C. about 1618.

JAMBRES and JANNES (jä'm'bréz and jä'n'néz), (Gr. Ἰαμβρῆς καὶ Ἰαννῆς, ee-am-brace' and ee-an-nace'), probably of Egyptian etymology), two of the Egyptian magicians who attempted by their enchantments to counteract the influence on Pharaoh's mind of the miracles wrought by Moses.

Their names occur nowhere in the Hebrew scriptures, and only once in the New Testament (2 Tim. iii:8). The Apostle Paul became acquainted with them, most probably, from an ancient Jewish tradition, or, as Theodoret expresses it, 'from the unwritten teaching of the Jews.' They are found frequently in the Talmudical and Rabbinical writings, but with some variations. The Pythagorean philosopher, Numenius, mentions these persons in a passage preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix:8), and by Origen (c. Cels. iv. p. 198, Ed. Spencer); also Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxx:1). There was an ancient apocryphal writing entitled Jannes and Jambres, which is referred to by Origen (in Matt. Comment. sec. 117; Opera. v. 29), and by Ambrosiaster, or Hilary the Deacon; it was condemned by Pope Gelasius. (Lightfoot's Sermon on Jannes and Jambres, Works, vii. 89; Lardner's Credibility, pt. ii. ch. xxxv. in Works. vii. 381.) J. E. R.

JAMES (jämz), (Gr. Ἰάκωβος, ee-ak'o-bos). Three persons of this name are mentioned in the New Testament.

1. James, the Son of Zebedee (Matt. iv:21) and brother of the evangelist John (Mark v:37). Their occupation was that of fishermen, probably at Bethsaida, in partnership with Simon Peter (Luke v:10). On comparing the account given in Matt. iv:21, Mark i:19, with that in John i, it would appear that James and John had been acquainted with our Lord, and had received him as the Messiah some time before he called them to attend upon him steadily—a call with which they immediately complied. Their mother's name was Salome. We find James, John, and Peter associated on several interesting occasions in the Savior's life. They alone were present at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii:1; Mark ix:2; Luke ix:28); at the restoration to life of Jairus's daughter (Mark v:37; Luke viii:51); and in the garden of Gethsemane during the agony (Mark xiv:33; Matt. xxvi:37; Luke xxii:39). With Andrew they listened in private to our Lord's discourse on the fall of Jerusalem (Mark xiii:3). James and his brother appear to have indulged in false notions of the kingdom of the Messiah, and were led by ambitious views to join in the request made to Jesus by their mother (Matt. xx:20-23; Mark x:35).

Character. From Luke ix:54, we may infer that their temperament was warm and impetuous. On account, probably, of their boldness and energy in discharging their Apostleship, they received from their Lord the appellation of Boanerges, or Sons of Thunder (For the various explanations of this title given by the fathers see Suiceri, Thes. Eccles. s. v. Βρονθή, and Lücke's Commentar, Bonn, 1840; Einleitung, c. i. sec. 2, p. 17). James was the first martyr among the Apostles. Clement of Alexandria, in a fragment preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 9), reports that the officer who conducted James to the tribunal was so influenced by the bold declaration of his faith as to embrace the gospel and avow himself also a Christian; in consequence of which he was beheaded at the same time.

2. James the Less, the Son of Alphæus, one of the twelve Apostles (Mark iii:18; Matt. x:3; Luke vi:15; Acts i:13). His mother's name was Mary (Matt. xxvii:56; Mark xv:40; in the latter passage he is called James the Less (ὁ μικρός, the Little), either as being younger than James the son of Zebedee, or on account of his low stature (Mark xvi:1; Luke xxiv:10).

3. James, the Brother of the Lord (ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ Κυρίου, Gal. i:19). Whether this James is identical with the son of Alphæus is a question which Dr. Neander pronounces to be the most difficult in the Apostolic history, and which cannot yet be considered as decided. We read in Matt. xiii:55, 'Is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?' and in Mark vi:3, 'Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, and brother of James and Joses, and of Juda and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us?' Those critics who suppose the terms of affinity in these and parallel passages to be used in the more lax sense of near relations have remarked that in Mark xv:40, mention is made of 'Mary, the mother of James the less and of Joses;' and that in John xix:25, it is said, 'there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene;' they therefore infer that the wife of Cleophas is the same as the sister of the mother of Jesus, and, consequently, that James (supposing Cleophas and Alphæus to be the same name, the former according to the Hebrew, the latter according to the Greek orthography) was a first cousin of our Lord, and, on that account, termed his brother, and that the other individuals called the brethren of Jesus stood in the same relation.

Objection. Against this view it has been alleged that in several early Christian writers James, the brother of the Lord, is distinguished from the son of Alphæus; that the identity of the names Alphæus and Cleophas is somewhat uncertain; and that it is doubtful whether the words 'his mother's sister,' in John xix:25, are to be considered in apposition with those immediately following. (Lardner's Supplement, ch. xvi., Works, vi. p. 174; Neander, History of the Planting, etc. vol. ii. pp. 9, 22. Eng. transl.) Dr. Niemeyer enumerates not less than five persons of this name, by distinguishing the son of Alphæus from James the Less, and assuming that the James last mentioned in Acts i:13 was not the brother, but the father of Judas (Charakteristik der Bibel, Halle, 1830, i. 399.) J. E. R.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. This is called by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 23) the first of the Catholic Epistles. As the writer simply styles himself James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, doubts have existed, both in ancient and modern times, respecting its authorship.

1. Author. It has been ascribed to no less than four different persons, viz., James, the son of Zebedee; James, the son of Alphæus (who were both of the number of the twelve apostles); James, our Lord's brother (Gal. i:19); and to an anonymous author, who assumed the name of James in order to procure authority to a supposititious writing.

The chief authority for ascribing this epistle to James the son of Zebedee, is the inscription to the Syriac manuscript, published by Widmandstadt, wherein it is termed 'the earliest writing in the New Testament,' and to an Arabic MS. cited by Cornelius a Lapide. Isidore of Seville, and other Spanish writers interested in maintaining that James traveled into Spain (Calmet's Commentary); assert that James the son of Zebedee visited in person the 'twelve tribes scattered' through that as well as other countries, and afterwards addressed to them this epistle. The Mozarabic liturgy also supports the same view, and the old Italic, published by Martianay, contains the inscription Explicit Epistola Jacobi filii Zebedæi. But this opinion has obtained very few suffrages; for, as Calmet has observed (Pref. to his Commentary), it is not credible that so great progress had been made among the dispersed Jews before the martyrdom of James, which took place at Jerusalem about A. D. 42; and if the author, as has been commonly supposed, alludes to St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans (A. D. 58) and Galatians (A. D. 55), it would be a manifest anachronism to ascribe this epistle to the son of Zebedee.

The claim to the authorship of the epistle, therefore, rests between James 'the Lord's brother,' and James the son of Alphæus. In the preceding article the difficult question, whether these names do not, in fact, refer to the same person, has been examined: it suffices, in this place, to state that no writer who regards James 'the Lord's brother' as distinct from James the son of Alphæus, has held the latter to be the author of the epistle; and therefore, if no claim be advanced for the son of Zebedee, James 'the brother of the Lord' remains the only person whom the name at the head of this epistle could be intended to designate.

Hegesippus, cited by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii: 23), acquaints us that James, the brother of Jesus, who obtained the surname of the Just, governed the church of Jerusalem along with, or after the apostles. Eusebius (l. c.) relates that he was the first who held the episcopate of Jerusalem (Jerome says for thirty years); and both he and Josephus (Antiq. xx:9, 1) give an account of his martyrdom. To him, therefore, is the authorship of an epistle addressed to the Jewish Christians with good reason ascribed. The other opinion, which considers the epistle as pseudepigraphical, is treated below.

2. Authenticity and Canonicity. Eusebius, as above, observes that 'James, the brother of Jesus, who is called Christ, is said to have written the first of the Catholic epistles; but it is to be observed that it is considered spurious. Not many of the ancients have mentioned it, nor that called the Epistle of Jude. . . . Nevertheless, we know that these, with the rest, are publicly read in most of the churches.' To the same effect St. Jerome:—'St. James, surnamed the Just, who is called the Lord's brother, is the author of only one epistle, one of the seven called Catholic, which, however, is said to have been published by some other who assumed his name, although in the progress of time it gradually acquired authority.' Dr. Lardner is of the opinion that this statement of St. Jerome is a mere repetition of that of Eusebius. It was also rejected in the fourth century by Theodore of Mopsuestia, and in the sixth by Cosmas Indicopleustes. (See ANTILOGOMENA.) It is, however, cited by Clemens Romanus in his first or genuine Epistle to the Corinthians (ch. x., comp. with James ii:21, 23; and ch. xi, comp. with James ii:25, and Heb. xi:31). It seems to be alluded to in the Shepherd of Hermas, 'Resist the devil, and he will be confounded and flee from you.' It is also generally believed to be referred to by Irenæus (Hæc. iv:16, 2), 'Abraham believed God, and it was,' etc. Origen cites it in his Comment. on John i:xix, iv, 306, calling it, however, the reputed epistle of James. (See ANTILOGOMENA.) We have the authority of Cassiodorus for the fact that Clemens Alexandrinus commented on this epistle; and it is not only expressly cited by Ephrem Syrus (Opp. Græc. iii:51, 'James the brother of our Lord says "weep and howl,"' together with other references), but it forms part of the ancient Syriac version, a work of the second century, and which contains no other of the Antilogomena, except the Epistle to the Hebrews. But though 'not quoted expressly by any of the Latin fathers before the fourth century' (Hug's Introduction), it was, soon after the time of the Council of Nice, received both in the eastern and western churches without any marks of doubt, and was admitted into the canon along with the other scriptures by the councils of Hippo and Carthage. Nor (with the above exceptions) does there appear to have been a voice raised against it since that period until the era of the Reformation, when the ancient doubts were revived by Erasmus (who maintains that the author was not an apostle, Annot. in New Testament), Cardinal Cajetan (Comment. in 7 Canonic. Epist., 1532), and Luther. Cajetan observes that 'the salutation is unlike that of any other of the apostolical salutations, containing nothing of God, of grace, or peace, but sending greetings after the profane manner, from which, and his not naming himself an apostle, the author is rendered uncertain.'

(1) Luther's Opinion. We have already referred to Luther's opinion (See ANTILOGOMENA), who is generally accused of calling this an epistle of straw. The following are his words:—'This epistle in comparison with the writings of John, Paul, and Peter, is a right strawy epistle (eine rechte stroherne epistel), being destitute of an evangelic character' (Pref. to New Testament). And again (Pref. to James and John): 'This epistle, although rejected by the ancients, I notwithstanding praise and esteem, as it teaches no doctrines of men, and strenuously urges the law of God. But, to give my opinion frankly, though without prejudice to any other person, I do not hold it to be the writing of an apostle—and these are my reasons; first, it directly opposes St. Paul and other scriptures in ascribing justification to works, saying that Abraham was justified by works, whereas St. Paul teaches that Abraham was justified by faith without works; . . . but this James does nothing but urge on to the law and its works, and writes so confusedly and unconnectedly that it appears to me like as if some good pious man got hold of a number of sayings from the apostle's followers, and thus flung them on paper; or it is probably written by some one after the apostle's preaching.' The centuriators of Magdeburg follow the same train of thought. 'In addition to the argument derived from the testimony of antiquity, there are other and by no means obscure indications from which it may be collected that the authors of these epistles (James and Jude) were not apostles. The Epistle of James differs not slightly from the analogy of doctrine, in ascribing justification not to faith alone, but to works, and calls the law "a law of liberty," whereas the law "generates to bondage." . . . Nor is it unlikely that it was written by some disciple of the apostles at the close of this (the first) century, or even later' (Cent. i. l. 2, c. 4 col. 54). The same sentiments are followed by Cheunits, Brentius, and others among the Lutherans, and among the Greeks by Cyril Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople in the seventeenth century (Lettres Anecdotes de Cyrille Lucar, Amst. 1718, Letter vii. p. 85).

(2) Arrangement by Luther. As Luther was the first who separated the canonical from the deuterocanonical or apocryphal books in the Old Testament (see DEUTERO-CANONICAL BOOKS), he also desired to make a similar distinction in the New (see ANTILOGOMENA; HAGIOGRAPHIA); but the only variation which he actually adopted consisted in his placing the Epistle to the Hebrews between the Epistles of John and James. (See JUDAS OR JUDE.)

(3) Arrangement by Calvinists. The Cal-

vinists, who never questioned the authority of this epistle, followed the arrangement of the Council of Laodicea, in which the Epistle of James ranks as the first of the Catholic epistles; while the Council of Trent followed the order of the Council of Carthage and of the apostolical canons, viz., four Gospels, Acts, fourteen epistles of Paul (viz., Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews), 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, James, Jude, Apocalypse. The Lutherans themselves soon acquiesced in the decisions of the universal church in regard to the canon of the New Testament, until the controversy, which had long slept, was again revived in Germany in modern times (De Wette, Einleitung).

(4) Opinion of De Wette. De Wette maintains that although this epistle was anterior to the Clementine, it could not have been written so early as the time of James, principally because the degree of tranquility and comfort which appears to have been enjoyed by those to whom the epistle was addressed, seems to him to be inconsistent with the state of persecution which the Christians were subject to during the lifetime of St. James. He conceives it to have been written by some one who assumed the name of James in order to give authority to his arguments against Paul's doctrine of justification.

(5) Opinion of Neander. But no one in modern times has combated this opinion with greater success than Neander (History of the First Planting of the Christian Church, vol. ii). Neander (whose reasonings will not admit of abridgment) maintains that there is no discrepancy whatever between St. Paul and St. James; that it was not even the design of the latter to oppose any misapprehension respecting St. Paul's doctrine, but that they each addressed different classes of people from different standpoints, using the same familiar examples. 'Paul,' he says, 'was obliged to point out to those who placed their dependence on the justifying power of the works of the law the futility of such works in reference to justification, and to demonstrate that justification and sanctification could proceed only from the faith of the gospel: James, on the other hand, found it necessary to declare to those who imagined that they could be justified in God's sight by faith in the Jewish sense . . . that this was completely valueless if their course of life were not conformed to it.' And in another place he observes that James 'received the new spirit under the old forms, similarly to many Catholics who have attained to free evangelical convictions, and yet have not been able to disengage themselves from the old ecclesiastical forms; or, like Luther, when he had already attained a knowledge of justification by faith, but before he was aware of the consequences flowing from it as opposed to the prevalent doctrines of the church.'

3. Age of the Epistle. By those who consider James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem, to have been the author of this epistle, it is generally believed to have been written shortly before his martyrdom, which took place A. D. 62, six years before the destruction of Jerusalem, whose impending fate is alluded to in chap. v. Neander fixes its date at a time preceding the separate formation of Gentile Christian churches, before the relation of Gentiles and Jews to one another in the Christian Church had been brought under discussion, in the period of the first spread of Christianity in Syria, Cilicia, and the adjacent regions. It is addressed to Jewish Christians, the descendants of the twelve tribes; but the fact of its being written in Greek exhibits the author's desire to make it generally available to Christians.

4. Contents and Character. This epistle commences with consolations addressed to the faithful converts, with exhortations to patience, humility, and practical piety (ch. i:1-27). Undue respect to persons is then condemned, and love enjoined (ch. ii). Erroneous ideas on justification are corrected (ii. 13-26), the temerity of new teachers is repressed (iii:12); an unbridled tongue is inveighed against, and heavenly wisdom contrasted with a spirit of covetousness (13-18). Swearing is prohibited (v:12). The efficacy of prayer is proved by examples, and the unction of the sick by the presbyters, together with prayer and mutual confession, are enjoined as instruments of recovery and of forgiveness of sins (v:14-18). The approaching advent of the Lord is foretold (v:7).

The style of this epistle is close and sententious, and is characterized by Calmet as consisting of 'expressions thrown together without connection, and adorned by poetical similitudes.' It has, however, been illustrated by no one with greater felicity than by the learned and pious Bishop of Limerick, who has adduced many examples from James of poetical parallelism—which was the principal characteristic of Hebrew poetry. In reference to one of these passages (iii. 1-12) the bishop observes that 'its topics are so various, and, at first sight, so unconnected, not to say incongruous, that it may be thought a rash undertaking to explore the writer's train of thought, and to investigate the probable source and the orderly progress of his ideas—an evidence at once most brilliant and satisfactory that the easy flow of a great mind, when concentrated on a great object, will be found at least as logically just as it may be poetically beautiful.' 'His general manner,' he observes, 'combines the plainest and most practical good sense with the most vivid and poetical conception; the imagery various and luxuriant; the sentiments chastened and sober; his images, in truth, are so many analogical arguments, and if, at the first view, we are disposed to recreate ourselves with the poet, we soon feel that we must exert our hardier powers to keep pace with the logician' (Jebb's Sacred Literature). Seiler designates the style of this epistle as 'sometimes sublime and prophetic, nervous, and full of imagery' (Biblical Hermeneutics, sec. 315; Wright's translation, p. 548). Wetstein (note to ch. iv:5) conceives the author to have been familiar with the book of Wisdom. The eloquence and persuasiveness of St. James' Epistle, as an ethical composition, are such as must command universal admiration. W. W.

JAMIN (jā'min), (Heb. יָמִין, yaw-meen', right side or hand).

1. Second mentioned of the sons of Simeon (Gen. xlv:10; Exod. vi:15; 1 Chron. iv:24). (B. C. 1856.)

2. A son of Ram and a great man in the house of Hezron (1 Chron. ii:27). (B. C. 1650.)

3. A priest who assisted Ezra and Nehemiah in expounding the law (Neh. viii:7). (B. C. 410.)

JAMINITES, THE (jā'min-ites, the), (Heb. יְמִינִי, hay-yaw-mee-nee'), the descendants of JAMIN, 1 (Num. xxvi:12). (See JAMIN.)

JAMLECH (jäm'lek), (Heb. יַמ־לֶכֶח, yam-lake', He—i. e. God—makes king), a Simeonite chieftain (1 Chron. iv:34), probably in the time of Hezekiah (see ver. 41), whose family invaded the valley of Gedor (B. C. 711).

JANGLING (jän'glīng), (Gr. ματαιολογία, mat-ah-yol-og-ee'yah, 1 Tim. i:6), babbling, vain talking, and in Tit. i:10 the noun, "vain talkers," are those who utter senseless, empty things.

JANNA (jän'nä), (Gr. Ἰαννά, ee-an-nah'), father of Melchi and son of Joseph (Luke iii:24), B. C. 200.

JANNES and JAMBRES (jän'nēz and jām-brēz). See JAMBRES AND JANNES.

JANOAH (ja-nō'ah), (Heb. יָנוֹחַ, yaw-no'akh, or יָנוֹחַ, yaw-no'khaw, quiet).

1. A north Galilee place in the land of Napthali, taken in the first invasion of Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xv:29). Hunin now stands on the spot that would answer to the location of the ancient Jonoah (Porter, Handbook, Syr. and Pal. p. 444).

2. A place on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. xvi:6, 7). It is doubtless the modern Yanūn, about ten miles southeast of Nablis (Neapolis). (Van de Velde ii. 303; Robinson, iii. 297.)

JANOHAH (ja-nō'hah). See JANOAH, 2.

JANUM (jä'num), (Heb. יָנוּם, yaw-neem', asleep), a town of Judah (Josh. xv:53), probably not far from Hebron. It has not been positively identified, though it may be Jenheh.

JAPHETH (jä'pheth), (Heb. יָפֶֿתֿ, yeh'feth, wide-spread).

A son of Noah. In Gen. v:32 he is mentioned third in order, but some think, from Gen. x:21 (comp. ix:23) that he was the eldest of Noah's sons, begotten one hundred years before the flood. In Gen. x:2, sq., he is called the progenitor of the extensive tribes in the west (of Europe) and north (of Asia), of the Armenians, Medes, Greeks, Thracians, etc. The Arabian traditions (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.) rank Japheth among the prophets, and enumerate eleven of his sons, the progenitors of as many Asiatic nations, viz. Gin or Dshin (Chinese), Seklab (Slavonians), Manshuge, Gomari, Turk (Turks), Khalage, Khozar, Ros (Russians), Sussan Gaz, and Torage. In these traditions he is therefore simply called progenitor of the Turks and Barbarians.

JAPHIA (ja-phī'ä), (Heb. יָפִיָּא, yaw-fee'ah, bright, splendid).

1. King of Lachish at the time the Israelites conquered Canaan (Josh. x:3). He was one of the five kings who instigated a confederacy against Joshua and lost his life at Makedah. (B. C. 1618.)

2. One of fourteen sons born unto David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v:15; 1 Chron. iii:7; xiv:6). (B. C. after 1000.)

3. A town spoken of as the boundary of Zebulon as it ascended from Daberath to Japhia (Josh. xix:12). Robinson identifies the place with Yafa, a mile and a half southwest of Nazareth. (Researches iii. 194; Porter, Handbook. p. 385.)

JAPHLET (jäph'let), (Heb. יָפֶֿלֶֿתֿ, yaf-late', whom God delivers).

A son of Heber, the son of Asher, and called the father of three sons and a daughter (1 Chron. vii:32, 33). (B. C. between 1856 and 1658.)

JAPHLETI (jäph'le-ti), (Heb. יָפֶֿלֶֿתֿי, yaf-late').

A branch of the descendants of Japhlet seem to have settled along the boundary between Ephraim and Dan (Josh. xvi:3). Others regard the name as a trace of one of the original Canaanitish settlements.

JAPHO (jä'pho), (Heb. יָפוֹ, yaw-fo', beauty, Josh. xix:46), otherwise called JOPPA, now known as Yäfu (2 Chron. ii:16; Ezra iii:7).

"It is 150 stadia from Antipatris, six miles west of Rama, and ten hours from Jerusalem at the west end of the mountain road." (Robt. Young, LL.D. Concordance.)

JARAH (jä'rah), (Heb. יָרַח, yah-raw', honey 1 Chron. ix:42), a short form of JEHOADAH (which see).

JAREB (jä'reb), (Heb. יָרֵב, yaw-rabe', adversary), occurs as a proper name in Hos. v:13; x:6, where a "King Jareb" is spoken of as the false refuge and the final subjugator of the kingdom of Israel.

It is probably a figurative title of the king of Assyria (Hos. v:13; x:6), and from its parallelism with Asshur it is applicable to the country rather than the ruler himself.

JARED (jä'red), (Heb. יָרֵד, yeh'red, descent, low ground).

1. An antediluvian patriarch, father of Enoch (Gen. v:15-20; 1 Chron. i:2; Luke iii:37). (B. C. 3712.) He died at the age of 962. The name appears also as JERED.

2. A man of Judah, apparently the son of Ezra by Jehudijah. He is signalized as the founder of Gedor (1 Chron. iv:18). The A. V. has JERED.

JARESI AH (järe-si'ah), (Heb. יָרֵשִׁיָּא, yah-resh-yaw', origin uncertain), one of the Benegeraham, a chief of the Benjamites resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii:27), B. C. before 588.

JARHA (jä'rhä), (Heb. יָרְחָא, yar-khaw').

The Egyptian slave of a Hebrew named Sheshan, who married the daughter of his master, and was, of course, made free. As Sheshan had no sons, his posterity is traced through this connection (1 Chron. ii:34-41), which is the only one of the kind mentioned in Scripture. Jarha was doubtless a proselyte, and the anecdote seems to belong to the period of the sojourn in Egypt, although it is not easy to see how an Egyptian could there be slave to an Israelite. (B. C. ante 1658.) (See Hervey, Genealogy, p. 34.)

Some have supposed that the name of Jarha's wife was Ahlai (ver. 31; comp. 34), but the masculine form of the word, and the use of Ahlai (xi:41) for a man, is opposed to this conclusion.

It has been thought by others that Ahlai was an error in transcription for Attai (ver. 35); still others that Ahlai was a name given to Jarha on his incorporation into the family of Sheshan, while others again suppose that Ahlai was a son of Sheshan, born after the marriage of his daughter.

JARIB (jä'rib), (Heb. יָרִיב, yaw-rebe', adversary).

1. Son of Simeon (1 Chron. iv:24); called Jachin (Gen. xlv:10). (See JACHIN.)

2. One of the "chief heads sent by Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon to procure a company of priests" (Ezra viii:16). (B. C. 459.)

3. One of the priests of the house of Jeshua who married a foreign wife, whom Ezra forced him to put away (Ezr. x:18). (B. C. 459.)

JARMUTH (jä'r'muth), (Heb. יָרְמוּתַי, yar-moothi', height, hill).

1. A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv:35); inhabited after the Babylonian captivity (Neh. xi:29). Its king, Piram, was one of the five who were put to death at Makedah, for having planned to slay Gibeon who had formed an alliance with Israel (Josh. x:3, 5, 23; xii:11). It has been identified with Yarmuk, seven miles northeast of Beit-Jibrin (Porter. Handbook, p. 281).

2. A city of Issachar, given to the Levites of Gershom; it was a city of refuge (Josh. xxi:29), called Remeth (Josh. xix:21) and Romoth (1 Chron. vi:73).

JAROAH (ja-rō'ah), (Heb. יָרוֹחַ, yaw-ro'akh, new moon), a chief man of the tribe of Gad resident in Bashan (1 Chron. v:14), B. C. before 740.

JASHEN (jā'shen), (Heb. יָשֵׁן, yaw-shane', sleeping), named in 2 Sam. xxiii:32 as the father of several of David's bodyguard. He is called HASHEM in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi:34), B. C. 1000.

JASHER, BOOK OF (jā'sher, bōōk ōv), (Heb. סֵפֶר יָשָׁר, say'fer hay-yaw-shaw', the book of the righteous).

This work is no longer extant, but cited in Josh. x:13, and 2 Sam. i:18. In the former it is thus introduced: 'And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day,' etc. And in the passage referred to in 2 Sam. i, it stands thus (ver. 17): 'And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul and over Jonathan his son;' (ver. 18): 'Also he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow; behold, it is written in the book of Jasher.' After which follows the lamentation of David. As the word Jasher signifies just or upright, by which word it is rendered in the margin of our Bibles, this book has been generally considered to have been so entitled as containing a history of just men.

(1) A Poetical Work. Bishop Lowth, however (Praelect. pp. 306, 307), conceives, from the poetical character of the two passages cited from it, that it was most probably a collection of national songs written at various times, and that it derived its name from jashar, 'he sang.'

(2) Various Conjectures. It is, at the same time, by no means an improbable conjecture that the book was so called from the name of its author. Josephus (Antiq. v. 1. 17) speaks of the book of Jasher as one of the 'books laid up in the temple.' Jerome is of the opinion that the book of Jasher is no other than the book of Genesis, which is also the opinion of some Jewish authors. Others suppose it to include the Pentateuch (see Calmet's Comment in loc.). Mr. Horne (Introd. vol. i.) asserts that 'some understand by the book of Jasher the book of Judges, as mention is therein made of the standing still of the sun.' (?) From the passage above referred to, 2 Sam. i:18—'Also he bade them teach the children of Israel the use of the bow'—it has been supposed by some (see Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. in loc., and Horne's Introd. vol. i.) that the book of Jasher contained a treatise on archery; but it has been observed (see Parker's translation of De Wette's Introd. vol. i. p. 301) that, according to the ancient mode of citation, which consisted in referring to some particular word in the document, 'the bow' which the children of Israel were to be taught indicated the poetical passage from the book of Jasher in which the 'bow of Jonathan' is mentioned (2 Sam. i:22). De Wette's translator supposes that our English translators of the Bible were perhaps ignorant of this manner of reference, and he instances this as a 'ludicrous instance.'

(3) Rabbinical Works. The Book of Jasher is also the title of two Rabbinical works, one of which was written by Rabbi Tham in the thirteenth century, and printed at Cracow in 1617. It is a treatise on Jewish laws. The other was printed in 1625, and contains (see Batolocci's Bibliotheca Rabbinica, and Horne's Introd. vol. ii., Bibliogr. App.) some curious but many fabulous narrations; among other things, that it was discovered at the destruction of the temple in possession of an old man, who was found shut up in some place of concealment, and who had a great number of Hebrew books. It was brought to Spain, preserved at Seville, and published at Naples.

In the year 1751 there was published in London, by a type-founder of Bristol named Jacob Ilive, a book entitled 'The Book of Jasher, with Testimonies and Notes explanatory of the Text: to which is prefixed Various Readings: translated into English from the Hebrews by Alcuin of Britain, who went a pilgrimage into the Holy Land.' This book was noticed in the Monthly Review for December, 1751, which describes it as a palpable piece of contrivance, intended to impose upon the credulous and ignorant, to sap the credit of the books of Moses, and to blacken the character of Moses himself. The reviewer adds that 'the Book of Jasher appears to have been constructed in part from the apocryphal writings of the Rabbins; in part from a cento of various scraps stolen from the Pentateuch; and in the remainder from the crazy imaginings of the author' (Ilive). Prefixed to this work is a narrative professing to be from the pen of Alcuin himself, giving a detailed account of his discovery of the Hebrew book of Jasher, 'in the city of Gazna in Persia, during a pilgrimage which he made from Bristol to the Holy Land, and of his translation of the same into English. This clumsy forgery in modern English, which appeared with the chapters of the thirteenth century, and the numerical versicular divisions of the sixteenth, having been exposed at the time of its appearance, and sunk into well-merited oblivion, was again revived in 1827, when it was reprinted at Bristol, and published in London, as a new discovery of the Book of Jasher. A prospectus of a second edition of this reprint was issued in 1833 by the editor, who herein styles himself the Rev. C. R. Bond. Both Ilive's and Bond's editions contain the following pretended testimony to the value of the work from the celebrated Wycliffe: 'I have read the book of Jasher twice over, and I much approve of it, as a piece of great antiquity and curiosity, but I cannot assent that it should be made a part of the canon of Scripture.'

(4) Sun and Moon Standing Still. The chief interest connected with the Scriptural book of Jasher arises from the circumstance that it is referred to as the authority for the standing still of the sun and moon. There are few passages in Biblical literature the explanation of which has more exercised the skill of commentators than this celebrated one. We shall here give a brief account of the most generally received interpretations.

The first is that which maintains that the passage is to be literally understood. According to this interpretation, which is the most ancient, the sun itself, which was then believed to revolve round the earth, stayed its course for a day. Those who take this view argue that the theory of the diurnal motion of the earth, which has been the generally received one since the time of Galileo and Copernicus, is inconsistent with the Scripture narrative. Notwithstanding the general reception of the Copernican system of the universe, this view continued to be held by many divines, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, and was strenuously maintained by Buddeus (Hist. Eccles. V. T., Halle, 1715, 1744, p. 828, sq.) and others in the last century.

But in more recent times the matter has been explained so as to make it accord with the now received opinion respecting the earth's motion, and the Scripture narrative supposed to contain rather an optical and popular, than a literal account of what took place on this occasion. So that it was in reality the earth, and not the sun, which stood still at the command of Joshua.

Another opinion is that first suggested by Spinoza (Tract. Theolog.-Politic. c. ii. p. 22, and c. vi.), and afterwards maintained by Le Clerc (Comment. in loc.), that the miracle was produced by refraction only, causing the sun to appear above the horizon after its setting, or by some other atmospherical phenomena, which produced sufficient light to enable Joshua to pursue and discomfit his enemies.

(5) Quotation from Poetical Work. Others believe with Wakefield that the book of Jasher was a poetical work written to celebrate the wonderful military achievements of Israel, and that the author of the book of Joshua merely quoted this passage without expecting any one to understand it as history.

It will be seen that the sense of the narrative in Joshua is complete without this quotation which is duly credited to the book of Jasher. Neither historians nor poets expect such descriptions to be cramped within the bonds of literal interpretation. We find often similar expressions in modern verse, and it is frequently noted in the early poets among the Romans and also the Greeks; for instance in the Iliad we find:

"They fought like fire conglob'd; nor hadst thou deemed

The sun exempt from danger, nor the moon."

Yet no one would suppose that Homer intended to convey the idea that the sun or moon was in actual danger of destruction in consequence of the furious fighting before the walls of Troy.

An illustration very similar to that used in the book of Jasher is found in the Odyssey, where it is said that:

"Pallas backward held the rising day,
The wheels of night retarding, to detain
The gay Aurora in the wavy main."

When a historian makes a quotation from a poetical work and duly credits it as in the case of Joshua, it is not supposed that his readers will interpret a rhetorical hyperbole as literal history.

(6) Opinion of Maimonides. The last opinion we shall mention is that of the learned Jew Maimonides (Morc Ncvo. ii. c. 53), viz. that Joshua only asked of the Almighty to grant that he might defeat his enemies before the going down of the sun, and that God heard his prayer, inasmuch as before the close of day the five kings with their armies were cut in pieces. Grotius, while he admitted that there was no difficulty in the Almighty's arresting the course of the sun, or making it reappear by refraction, approved of the explanation of Maimonides, which has been since that period adopted by many divines, including Jahn, among the Roman Catholics (who explains the whole as a sublime poetical trope, Introd. p. ii. sec. 30), and among orthodox Protestants, by a writer in the Berlin Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, Nov. 1832, supposed to be the editor, Professor Hengstenberg (Robinson's Biblical Repository, 1833, vol. iii, p. 791, sq. See Hopkins' Plumblin Papers, Auburn, 1862, ch. vii.).

JASHOBEAM (ja-shō'be-ām), (Heb. יָשׁוּבְעָם, yaw-shob-awm', returning people).

1. The chief of David's captains, who came to him at Ziklag and distinguished himself and his band by slaying 300 men at one time (1 Chron. xi:11). He is the same with Adino the Eznite (2 Sam. xxiii:8), the difference in the Hebrew being slight. (See EZNITE.)

The exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem is ascribed to the three chief heroes, and therefore to Jashobeam, who was the first of the three (2 Sam. xxiii:13-17; 1 Chron. xi:15-19).

2. A man named among the Korhites who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:6). (B. C. 1053.)

3. There is mention of a Jashobeam who commanded 24,000, and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan (1 Chron. xxvii:2). He was the son of Zabdiel; if, therefore, he was the same as the first Jashobeam, his patronymic of 'the Hachmonite' must be referred to his race rather than to his immediate father.

JASHUB (jāsh'ub), (Heb. יָשׁוּב, yaw-shoob', he who returns).

1. The son of Issachar, who founded the family of the Jashubites (Num. xxvi:24; 1 Chron. vii:11); called JOB (Gen. xlv:13). (B. C. 1856.)

2. One of the "sons" or former inhabitants of Bani whom Ezra forced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x:29). (B. C. 459.)

JASHUBI-LEHEM (jāsh'u-bi-lē'hēm), (Heb. יָשׁוּבֵי לֶחֶם, yaw-shoo'be-leh'khem, returner of bread), apparently a descendant of Shelah (1 Chron. iv:22), B. C. about 995. By others it is supposed to mean Naomi and Ruth, who returned (from jashubi "to return") to Bethlehem after the famine. Perhaps, however, it is a place, and, from its connection with Maresha, situated on the western side of the tribe.

JASHUBITES, THE (jāsh'ub-ites), (Heb. יָשׁוּבִים, yaw-shoo-bce'), the descendants of JASHUB, son of Issachar (Num xxvi:24).

JASIEL (jā'si-el), (Heb. יַעֲשֵׂאֵל, yah-as-ee-ale', God creates). See JAASIEL.

JASON (jā'son), (Gr. Ἰάσων, ee-as'oan, a common Greek name frequently used by the Hellenizing Jews for Jesus or Joshua), a kinsman of St. Paul and his host at Thessalonica, where the Jews forced his house in order to seize the Apostle.

Not finding the Apostle, they dragged Jason himself and some other converts before the magistrates, who released them with an admonition (A. D. 53). Jason appears to have accompanied the Apostle to Corinth (Acts xvii:5-9; Rom. xvi:21).

JASPER (jās'pēr).

1. The last stone in the breastplate of the high-priest, and the first in the foundations of the new Jerusalem (Exod. xxviii:20; Rev. xxi:19).

2. Jasper is an opaque species of quartz, of different colors, often banded or spotted, and susceptible of a high polish. The dark green kind is supposed to be the variety of the Bible. From the apparent inconsistency of Rev. iv:3; xxi:11 with the opaque character of this stone, it has been suggested that some transparent gem was denoted by jasper in the New Testament—perhaps the diamond or the translucent chalcedony.

JATHNIEL (jăth'ni-el), (Heb. יַתְנִיֵּל, yath-nee-ale', whom God bestows), fourth son of Meshemiah, a doorkeeper in the tabernacle (1 Chron. xxvi:2), B. C. 1014.

JATTIR (jăt'tir), (Heb. יַתִּיר, yat-teer', redundant), one of the nine cities which were given out of Judah to the Levites of Kohath's family (Josh. xv:48; xxi:14; 1 Chron. vi:57).

It was here David used to meet his friends in his early wandering days (1 Sam. xxx:27). It was the possible home of his two Ithrite heroes (2 Sam. xxiii:38; 1 Chron. xi:40). It may be identical with the modern Attir, fifteen miles south of Hebron (Robinson, Researches, ii. 194, 625).

JAVAN (jă'van), (Heb. יָוָן, yaw-vaon', effer-vescing).

1. The fourth son of Japheth (Gen. x:2, 4; 1 Chron. i:5, 7). (B. C. post 2514.) The interest connected with his name arises from his being the supposed progenitor of the original settlers in Greece and its isles. (See NATIONS, DISPERSION OF.)

2. A country or city of Arabia Felix from which the Syrians imported stores of iron, cassia, and calamus. The name appears in Is. lxvi:19, where it is coupled with Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, and more particularly with Tubal and the "isles afar off," as representatives of the Gentile world; again in Ezek. xxvii:13, where it is coupled with Tubal and Meshech, as carrying on considerable commerce with the Tyrians, who imported from these countries slaves and brazen vessels; in Dan. viii:21; x:20; xi:2, in reference to the Macedonian empire; and lastly in Zech. ix:13, in reference to the Græco-Syrian empire, where Alexander is called the king of Javan. Javan was evidently the name given by the Hebrews to Greece. Sayce, in his Higher Criticism states that a Yivâna or "Ionian," is referred to in one of the cuneiform tablets found at Tel-el-Amarna, which corresponds letter for letter with the Hebrew Javan. (See TELL AMARNA, TABLETS OF.)

JAVELIN (jäv'lîn). See ARMS, ARMOR.

JAW (jə), (Heb., usually יָכֶה, lekh-ee', rendered jawbone), jaws, Ps. xxii:15; jaw teeth, Prov. xxx:14.

JAZER (Heb. יַזְעַר, yah-zare', 1 Chron. vi:81; xxvi:31), a city of Gilead on the east of Jordan, taken from the Amorites (Num. xxi:32), and afterwards given to the Levites. It is now in ruins (Josh. xiii:25; xxi:39; 1 Chron. vi:81; Num. xxxii:1, 3, 35; 2 Sam. xxiv:5). In the time of David it was occupied by the Hebronites (1 Chron. xxvi:31).

JAZIZ (jă'ziz), (Heb. יָזִיז, yaw-zeez', prominent), a Hagarite who had charge of David's flocks, probably east of the Jordan (1 Chron. xxvii:31), B. C. 1014.

JEALOUSY (jěl'üs-ÿ), (Heb. קִנְיָה, kin-aw'; Gr. ζήλος, dzay'los), properly, suspicion of a wife's fidelity (Num. v:14).

(1) In general it is that particular uneasiness which arises from the fear that some rival may rob us of the affection of one whom we greatly love, or suspicion that he has already done it. The first sort of jealousy is inseparable from love, before it is in possession of its object; the latter is unjust, generally mischievous, and always troublesome. (2) It is often used of Jehovah's sensitive regard for the true faith of his people (Exod. xx:5, etc.; 2 Cor. xi:2); used for anger or indignation, or intense interest for the welfare of another (Ps. lxxix:5; 1 Cor. x:22; Zech. i:14; viii:2). (3) Paul says to the Corinthians that he is jealous over them with a godly jealousy, that he might present them as a chaste virgin to Christ (2 Cor. xi:2). The word, however, is frequently used to express the vindictive acts of dishonored love. Thus the Psalmist (lxxix:5), representing the church as smarting under Divine judgments, occasioned by her infidelity to God, says, "How long, Lord, shall thy jealousy burn like fire?" (See also 1 Cor. x:22).

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF (jěl'üs-ÿ ĩm-ăj), (Heb. תַּבְרִית מִלְכָּה, say'mel hak-kin-aw'), the image seen by Ezekiel in the vision of the abominations of Jewish idolatry (Ezek. viii:3, 5).

This was probably the obscene image of Baal or Asherah, which had been placed in the temple by Manasseh (2 Kings xxi:7).

JEALOUSY OFFERING (jěl'üs-ÿ ôf'fēr-ĭng), (Heb. מִנְחַת קִנְיָה, min-khath' ken-aw-oth', literally, offering of jealousies, an intensive plural).

This was the name of a "meat offering" which a man, who suspected the fidelity of his wife without being able to prove her supposed guilt, had to bring to the priest, when she was to be subjected to the ordeal of the bitter waters (Num. v:11-31). After certain solemn and impressive preparations and actions the woman was given the water to drink upon which the dust of the pavement had been cast and with which a bitter substance had been mingled. (See Comm. Dr. Adam Clarke.)

Regarding the Waters of Jealousy Calmet says: "There is something extremely curious, if not inexplicable, in the solemn process prescribed in Num. v:11-31 for the detection and punishment of a woman who had excited her husband's jealousy, without affording him the ordinary means of proving her infidelity."

JEARIM (jē'a-rĭm), (Heb. יְעָרִים, yeh-aw-ree'm', forests), a mountain named in specifying the northern boundary of the inheritance of Judah. It was a woody mountain, on which the city of Balah, or Kirjath-jearim, was situated (Josh. xv:10). Robinson (New Researches p. 154) identifies this with a ridge seven miles west of Jerusalem.

JEATERAI (je-ăt'e-răi), (Heb. יְעָתָרַי, yeh-aw-ther-ah'ee, whom Jehovah leads), a Levite, son of Zerah, of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi:21); probably the same as ETHNI (ver. 41).

JEBERECHIAH (je-bēr-e-ki'ah), (Heb. יְבֵרֵכִיָּהוּ, yeh-eh-rek-yaw'hoo, whom Jehovah blesses), the father of a Zechariah whom Isaiah made a witness of his marriage to the "prophetess" (Is. viii:2), B. C. about 739.

JEBUS (jē'bus), (Heb. יְבוּס, yeb-oo's' trodden), one of the names of Jerusalem derived from the ancient Canaanitish city which stood on one of its southwest hills, afterward called Zion (Josh. xv:8; xviii:16, 28; Judg. xix:10; 1 Chron. xi:4, 5). (See JERUSALEM.)

JEBUSI (je-bū'sī), (Heb. יְבוּסִי, yeb-oo-see', the Jebusite), the name of the city Jebus (Josh. xv:8; xviii:16, 28). In the first passage the A. V. renders it "Jebusite."

JEBUSITE, JEBUSITES (jēb'u-sīte, jēb'u-sītes), (Hebrew always singular יְבוּסִי, hah-yeb-oo-see', except that it is יְבוּסִים in 2 Sam. v:6; xxiv:16, 18; 1 Chron. xxi:18, and יְבוּסִי in 2 Sam. v:8; 1 Chron. xi:6; Zech. ix:7). The A. V. has "Jebusi" (Josh. xviii:16, 28).

This was one of the most powerful of the nations of Canaan, who settled about Mount Moriah, where they built Jerusalem, and called it Jebus, after the name of their founder (1 Chron. xi:4). They are recounted among the seven Canaanitish cities doomed to destruction (Gen. x:16; xv:21; Exod. iii:8, 17; xiii:5; Deut. vii:1; xx:17; Josh. iii:10; ix:1; xi:3; xii:8; xxiv:11; Judg. iii:5; 1 Kings ix:20; 1 Chron. i:14).

Although they were defeated with much slaughter, and Adonizedek, their king, slain by Joshua (Josh. x.), they were not wholly subdued, but were able to retain their city till after his death (Judg. i:8), and were not entirely dispossessed of it till the time of David (2 Sam. v). By that time the inveteracy of the enmity between the Hebrews and such of the original inhabitants as remained in the land had much abated, and the rights of private property were respected by the conquerors. This we discover from the fact that the site on which the temple afterwards stood belonged to a Jebusite named Araunah, from whom it was purchased by King David, who declined to accept it as a free gift from the owner (2 Sam. xxiv:18-25). This is the last we hear of the Jebusites.

In the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles there is an allusion to a cave in Cyprus "where the race of the Jebusites formerly dwelt." Also to "a pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Nero."

JECAMIAH (jēk-a-mī'ah), (Heb. יְעָמִיָּהוּ, yek-am-yaw', he who assembles the people), the fifth named son of King Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii:18) born during the captivity in Babylon (B. C. after 598). In 1 Chron. ii:41 the same name is rendered JEKAMIAH.

JECHOLIAH (jēk-o-lī'ah), (Heb. יְחֹלִיָּהוּ, yek-ol-yaw', able through Jehovah), wife of King Amaziah of Judah and mother of his successor, Uzziah (2 Kings xv:2), B. C. 824-807.

JECHONIAS (jēk-o-nī'as), (Gr. Ἰεχονίας, ee-ek-o-ni'as, the Greek form of the name of King JECONIAH, which see (Matt. i:11, 12).

JECOLIAH (jēk-o-lī'ah), (Heb. יְחֹלִיָּהוּ, yek-ol-yaw', able through Jehovah, 2 Chron. xxvi:3). See JECHOLIAH.

JECONIAH (jēk'o-nī'ah), (Heb. יְחֹנִיָּהוּ, yek-on-yaw', Jehovah establishes), a short form of Jehoiachin, last but one of the kings of Judah (1 Chron. iii:16, 17; Jer. xxiv:1, xxvii:20, xxviii:4, xxix:2; Esth. ii:6). (See JEHOACHIN.)

JEDAIAH (je-dā'yá), (Heb. יְדֵיָּהוּ, yed-aw-yaw', praised of Jah).

1. Chief of the second course of priests after they were divided in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxiv:7). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A priest during the time of the high-priest Jeshua (1 Chron. ix:10; Neh. xi:10), and seemed to belong to Jeshua's family (Ezra ii:36; Neh. vii:39); probably identical with the Jedaiah in

Neh. xii:6. and the Jedaiah whom the prophet was directed to honor with a wreath (Zech. vi:10, 14). (B. C. 536-520.)

3. A man spoken of in the history of Simeon as settling in the valley of Gedor; father of Shimri and ancestor of Ziza (1 Chron. iv:37). (B. C. before 711.)

4. Son of Harumaph and one of the builders of the wall of Jerusalem after the return from captivity (Neh. iii:10). (B. C. 446.)

JEDIAEL (je-dī'a-el), (Heb. יְדֵיָּאֵל, yed-ee-ah-ale', known of God).

1. A patriarch of the tribe of Benjamin, 17,200 of whose descendants are enumerated as warriors in David's census (1 Chron. vii:6, 11); perhaps the same as Ashbel (1 Chron. viii:1).

2. A Korhite Levite, son of Meshelemiah, and doorkeeper of the temple in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvi:1, 2). (B. C. 1014.)

3. The son of Shimri, a brave chief of Manasseh, who marched with David as he went to Ziklag (1 Chron. xi:45; xii:20). (B. C. before 1000.)

JEDIDAH (jēd'i-dāh), (Heb. יְדֵידָהּ, yed-ee-daw', darling or only one), mother of King Josiah, and daughter of Adaiah; she was the wife of King Amon (2 Kings xxii:1), B. C. 648-639.

JEDIDIAH (jēd'i-dī'ah), (Heb. יְדֵידִיָּהוּ, yed-ee-deh-yaw', darling of Jehovah), a name bestowed on David's son Solomon by the Lord, through the prophet Nathan, in token of divine favor (2 Sam. xii:25).

JEDUTHUN (jēd'u-thūn), (Heb. יְדֻתָּן, yed-oo-thoon', he who praises), a Levite of Merari's family, and one of the four great masters of the temple music (1 Chron. xvi:41, 42; xxv:1).

This name is also put for his descendants, who occur later as singers and players on instruments (2 Chron. xxxv:15; Neh. xi:17). In the latter signification it occurs in the superscriptions to Ps. xxxix; lxii; lxxvii; but Aben Ezra supposes it to denote here the requiring of a song, and Jarehi, of a musical instrument. (B. C. about 960.)

JEEZER (je-ē'zer), (Heb. יְעֵזֶר, ee-eh'zer, helpless), son of Gilead (Num. xxvi:30); a short form of Abiezer (Josh. xvii:2, etc.). (See ABIEZER).

JEEZERITES (je-ē'zer-ites), the descendants of JEEZER (which see) (Num. xxvi:30).

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (jē'gar-sā-ha-dū'thā), (Chald. יְגַר־שָׂהֲדוּתָא, yeg-ar' sah-had-oo-thaw', heap of testimony), the Aramæan name given by Laban the Syrian to the heap of stones which he erected as a memorial of the covenant between Jacob and himself, while Jacob commemorated the same by setting up a pillar (Gen. xxxi:47). Gal-eed, a "witness heap," is given as the Hebrew equivalent.

JEHALELEEL (jē-ha-lē'le-el), (Heb. יְהִלְלֵל, yeh-hal-lel-ale', praiser of God), a descendant of Judah, whose own immediate parentage is not known. Four of his sons are mentioned (1 Chron. iv:16), B. C. about 1618.

JEHALELEL (je-hāl'e-lēl), (Hebrew same as above), a Merarite Levite, whose son, Azariah, took part in the restoration of the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix:12), B. C. 719.

JEHDEIAH (jeh-dē'iah or -yá), (Heb. יְחֵדֵיָּהוּ, yekh-deh-yaw' hoo, unity of Jah).

1. A representative of the "sons" of Shubael who seems to have had charge of one of the divisions in the temple service (1 Chron. xxiv:20. (B. C. 1014.)

2. A Meronothite who had charge of breeding stock for David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii:30). (B. C. 1014.)

JEHEZEKEL (je-hěz'e-kěl), (Heb. יְהֵזְקֵאל, yekh-ee-kale', God will strengthen).

A priest in David's time who commanded the twentieth course in the service of the house of Jehovah (1 Chron. xxiv:16).

JEHIAH (je-hi'ah), (Heb. יְהִיָּה, yekh-ee-yaw', Jah liveth), one of the porters for the ark when brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv:24); elsewhere (ver. 18) JEHIEL (which see).

JEHIEL (je-hi'el), (Heb. יְהִיֵּאל, yekh-ee-ale', God lives).

1. One of the rulers of the house of God who contributed to the renewal of the temple service in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv:8). (B. C. 623.)

2. A Levite "of the second degree," appointed by David to play upon a psaltery on the occasion of the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv:18, 20; xvi:5), in which former passage he and those named with him are called "porters." He is apparently the Jehiah of ver. 24. By some he is identified with the Gershonite head of the Bene-Laadan in the time of David (xxiii:8), who had charge of the treasures (xxix:8). If so, his descendants were called Jehieli, Jehielites (xxvi. 21). (B. C. 982.)

3. "Son of Hachmoni," who seems to have been royal tutor in the later part of David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii:32). (B. C. about 1030.)

4. In the original text, Jehuel, a Levite during the reign of Hezekiah who assisted him in his religious reforms (2 Chron. xxix:14), and had charge later of the sacred offerings (xxxv:13). (B. C. 726.)

5. Father of Obadiah; he with 218 males returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii:9). (B. C. before 459.)

6. The second named of the six brothers of Jehoram, and son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi:2). These brothers were all murdered by Jehoram upon his accession (ver. 4). (B. C. 850.)

7. Shechaniah's father, of the "sons" of Elam (Ezra x:2); probably the same as the one who put away a foreign wife (Ezra x:26). (B. C. 459.)

8. A priest who also had to put away his wife (Ezra x:21). (B. C. 459.)

9. A forefather of Saul the king (1 Chron. ix:35). (B. C. about 1618.)

10. One of the sons of Hotham the Aroerite, of the guard of David, included in the supplementary list (1 Chron. xi:44). (B. C. 1046.)

JEHIELI (je-hi'e-li), (Heb. יְהִיֵּאל, yekh-ee-ay-lee'), Jehielite (1 Chron. xxvi:21).

JEHIZKIAH (jē'hiz-ki'ah), (Heb. יְהִיזְקִיָּהוּ, yekh-iz-kee-yaw' hoo, same as Hezekiah, whom Jehovah strengthens), son of Shallum, one of the heads of the tribe of Ephraim, who, at the suggestion of the prophet Oded, insisted on clemency towards prisoners from Judah (2 Chron. xxviii:12), B. C. about 738.

JEHOADAH (je-hō'a-dab), (Heb. יְהוֹאָדָב, yeh-ho-ad-daw', whom Jehovah adorns), son of Ahaz and great grandson to Meribbaal, a descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii:36), called JARAH in the parallel passage (1 Chron. ix:42), B. C. after 1037.

JEHOADDAN (jē-ho-ād'dan), (Heb. יְהוֹאָדָן, yeh-ho-ad-dawn', Jehovah pleased, same as Jehoadah), Queen to King Joash, (2 Kings xiv:2; 2 Chron. xxv:1), B. C. 862-837.

JEHOAHAZ (je-hō'a-ház), (Heb. יְהוֹאָחָז, yeh-ho-aw-khawz', Jehovah sees).

1. Son of Jehu, king of Israel, who succeeded his father (B. C. 850), and reigned seventeen years (2 Kings x:35). As he followed the evil courses of the house of Jeroboam, the Syrians under Hazael and Benhadad were suffered to prevail over him. Overwhelmed by his calamities, Jehoahaz at length acknowledged the authority of Jehovah over Israel, and humbled himself before him; in consideration of which a deliverer was raised up for Israel in the person of Joash, this king's son, who was enabled to expel the Syrians and re-establish the affairs of the kingdom (2 Kings xiii:1-9, 25).

2. Called Shallum, seventeenth king of Judah, son of Josiah, whose reign began and ended in the year B. C. 608. After his father had been slain in resisting the progress of Pharaoh-necho, Jehoahaz, who was then twenty-three years of age, was raised to the throne by the people (2 Kings xxiii:31, 36). He found the land full of trouble, but free from idolatry. Instead, however, of following the excellent example of his father, Jehoahaz fell into the accustomed crimes of his predecessors; and under the encouragements which his example or indifference offered, the idols soon reappeared. It seems strange that in a time so short, and which must have been much occupied in arranging plans for resisting or pacifying the Egyptian king, he should have been able to deserve the stigma which the sacred record has left upon his name. But there is no limit, except in the greatness of the Divine power, to the activity of evil dispositions. The sway of Jehoahaz was terminated in three months, when Pharaoh-necho, on his victorious return from the Euphrates, thinking it politic to reject a king not nominated by himself, removed him from the throne, and set thereon his brother Jehoiakim. This reign was the shortest in the kingdom of Judah, although in that of Israel there were several shorter. The deposed king was at first taken as a prisoner to Riblah in Syria, but was eventually carried to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings xxiii:30-35; 2 Chron. xxxvi:1-4; 1 Chron. iii:15; Jer. xxii:10-12).

The anointing of this king has drawn attention to the defect of his title as the reason for the addition of that solemn ceremony. It appears from 1 Chron. iii:15 that Josiah had four sons, of whom Johanan is expressly said to have been 'the firstborn.' But he seems to have died before his father, as he nowhere find his name historically mentioned, while those of the other brothers are familiar to us. If, therefore, he died childless, and Jehoahaz were the next son, his claim would have been good. But he was not the next son. His name, as Shallum, occurs last of the four in 1 Chron. iii:15; and from the historical notices in 2 Kings xxiii and 2 Chron. xxxvi we ascertain that when Josiah died the ages of the three surviving sons were, Eliakim (Jehoiakim) twenty-five years, Jehoahaz (Shallum) twenty-three years, Mattaniah (Zedekiah) ten years; consequently Jehoahaz was preferred by the popular favor above his elder brother Jehoiakim, and the anointing, therefore, was doubtless intended to give to his imperfect claim the weight of that solemn ceremony. It was also probably suspected that, as actually took place, the Egyptian king would seek to annul a popular election unsanctioned by himself; but as the Egyptians anointed their own kings, and attached much importance to the ceremony, the possibility that he would hesitate more to remove an anointed than an unanointed king might afford a further reason for the anointing of Jehoahaz. (See ANOINTING.)

Jehoahaz is supposed to be the person who is designated under the emblem of a young lion carried in chains to Egypt (Ezek. xix :3, 4).

3. A name of the youngest son of Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi:17); Josiah's father (2 Chron. xxv:23); usually called AHAZIAH (which see).

JEHOASH (je-hō'ash), (Heb. יְהוֹאָשׁ, yeh-ho-awsh', Jehovah given). See JOASH.

JEHOHANAN (jē-ho-hā'nān), (Heb. יְהוֹחָנָן, yeh-ho-khaw-nān', Jehovah favored).

This is at times rendered Johanan and comes to us as John.

1. A Korhite doorkeeper to the house of Jehovah during the reign of David (1 Chron. xxv:3). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A man of Judah who commanded 280,000 men under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii:15). In all probability the same as the father of Ishmael, the latter of whom assisted Jehoiada in the restoration of Jehoash (2 Chron. xxiii:1). (B. C. about 910.)

3. One of the Bene-Bebai, whom Ezra forced to put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra x:28). (B. C. 459.)

4. A priest (Neh. xii:13), who represented the house of Amariah in the time of Joiakim. (B. C. about 406.)

5. One of those who took part in the musical thanksgiving worship at the dedication, by Nehemiah, of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii:42). (B. C. 446.)

JEHOIACHIN (je-hoi'a-kīn), (Heb. יְהוֹיָכִן, yeh-ho-yaw-keen', Jehovah will establish), by contraction JECONIAH and CONIAH, nineteenth king of Judah, and son of Jehoiakim.

(1) Reign. When his father was slain, B. C. 599, the king of Babylon allowed him, as the rightful heir, to succeed. He was then eighteen years of age according to 2 Kings xxiv:8; but only eight according to 2 Chron. xxxvi:9. Many attempts have been made to reconcile these dates, the most usual solution being that he had reigned ten years in conjunction with his father, so that he was eight when he began his joint reign, but eighteen when he began to reign alone. There are, however, difficulties in this view, which, perhaps, leave it the safest course to conclude that 'eight' in 2 Chron. xxxvi:9 is a corruption of the text, such as might easily occur from the relation of the numbers eight and eighteen.

Jehoiachin followed the evil courses which had already brought so much disaster upon the royal house of David, and upon the people under its sway. He seems to have very speedily indicated a political bias adverse to the interests of the Chaldean empire; for in three months after his accession we find the generals of Nebuchadnezzar again laying siege to Jerusalem, according to the predictions of Jeremiah (xxii:18). Convinced of the futility of resistance Jehoiachin went out and surrendered as soon as Nebuchadnezzar arrived in person before the city.

(2) Captivity. He was sent away as a captive to Babylon, with his mother, his generals, and his troops, together with the artificers and other inhabitants of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand. Thus ended an unhappy reign of three months and ten days. If the Chaldean king had then put an end to the show of a monarchy and annexed the country to his own dominions, the event would probably have been less unhappy for the nation. But still adhering to his former policy, he placed on the throne Mattaniah, the only surviving son of Josiah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiv:1-16; 2 Chron. xxxvi:9, 10; Jer. xxix:3; xxxvii:1).

(3) Release. Jehoiachin remained in prison at Babylon during the lifetime of Nebuchadnezzar; but when that prince died, his son, Evil-merodach, not only released him, but gave him an honorable seat at his own table, with precedence over all the other dethroned kings who were kept at Babylon, and an allowance for the support of his rank (2 Kings xxv:27-30; Jer. lii:31-34). To what he owed this favor we are not told; but the Jewish commentators allege that Evil-merodach had himself been put into prison by his father during the last year of his reign, and had there contracted an intimate friendship with the deposed king of Judah.

The name of Jeconiah reappears to fix the epoch of several of the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer. xxiv:1), and of the deportation which terminated his reign (Esth. ii:6). In the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i:11) he is named as the 'son of Josias,' his uncle.

JEHOIADA (je-hoi'a-dā), (Heb. יְהוֹיָדָא, yeh-ho-yaw-daw', God-known).

1. A high-priest in the times of Athaliah and Athaliah. He is known only from the part which he took in recovering the throne of Judah for the young Joash, who had been saved by his wife Jehoshebah from the massacre by which Athaliah sought to exterminate the royal line of David. The particulars of this transaction are related under other heads. (See ATHALIAH; JOASH.) Jehoiada manifested much decision and forecast on this occasion; and he used for good the great power which devolved upon him during the minority of the young king, and the influence which he continued to enjoy as long as he lived. The value of this influence is shown by the misconduct and the disorders of the kingdom after his death. He died B. C. 834, at the age of 130, and his remains were honored with a place in the sepulcher of the kings at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv:16).

2. Father of David's warrior, Benaiah (2 Sam. viii:18; xx:23; xxiii:20, 22; 1 Kings i:8, 26, 32, 36, 38, 44; ii:25, 29, 34, 35, 46; iv:4; 1 Chron. xi:22, 24; xviii:17; xxvii:5). (B. C. before 1046).

3. (Neh. iii:6.) See JOIADA.

4. Son of Benaiah, and a chief adviser of David according to 1 Chron. xxvii:34; but doubtless the son of Jehoiada is meant (2.).

5. A second priest, under Seraiah, the high-priest. He was deposed at the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, and Zephaniah was appointed priest in his stead (Jer. xxix:25-29).

JEHOIAKIM (je-hoi'a-kīm), (Heb. יְהוֹיָכִים, yeh-ho-yaw-keen', Jehovah established).

1. Name and Family. Jehoiakim was the second son of Josiah and eighteenth king of Judah. His name was originally Eliakim but its equivalent, Jehoiakim, was bestowed upon him by Pharaoh-necho, the Egyptian king. He was the second son of Josiah by Zebudah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah (2 Kings xxiii:36), born B. C. 633.

2. Personal History.

(1) Made King. On the death of his father the people raised to the throne his younger brother Jehoahaz or Shallum (Jer. xxii:11) but three months after, when the Egyptian king returned from the Euphrates, he removed Jehoahaz, and gave the crown to the rightful heir, Eliakim, whose name he changed to Jehoiakim. This change of name often took place in similar circumstances; and the altered name was in fact the badge of a tributary prince. Jehoiakim began to reign in B. C. 608, and reigned eleven years. He of course occupied the position of a subordinate ruler of the Egyptian empire. However heavy may have been the Egyptian yoke, Jehoiakim was destined to pass under one heavier still.

(2) Vassal to Nebuchadnezzar. In the third year of his reign Jehoiakim, being besieged in Jerusalem, was forced to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, and was by his order laden with chains, with the intention of sending him captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi:6); but eventually the conqueror changed his mind and restored the crown to him. Many persons, however, of high family, and some even of the royal blood, were sent away to Babylon. Among these was Daniel, then a mere youth. A large proportion of the treasures and sacred vessels of the temple were also taken away and deposited in the idol-temple at Babylon (Dan. i:1, 2). The year following the Egyptians were defeated upon the Euphrates (Jer. xlv:2), and Jehoiakim, when he saw the remains of the defeated army pass by his territory, could not but perceive how vain had been that reliance upon Egypt against which he had been constantly cautioned by Jeremiah (Jer. xlv:24-30). In the same year the prophet caused a collection of his prophecies to be written out by his faithful Baruch, and to be read publicly by him in the court of the temple.

(3) Destroys the Roll. This coming to the knowledge of the king, he sent for it and had it read before him. But he heard not much of the bitter denunciations with which it was charged, before he took the roll from the reader, and after cutting it in pieces threw it into the brasier which, it being winter, was burning before him in the hall. The counsel of God against him, however, stood sure; a fresh roll was written, with the addition of a further and most awful denunciation against the king, occasioned by this foolish and sacrilegious act. 'He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David; and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat and in the night to the frost' (Jer. xxxvi:30). All this, however, appears to have made little impression upon Jehoiakim, who still walked in his old paths.

(4) Rebellion and Death. After three years of subjection, Jehoiakim, finding the king of Babylon fully engaged elsewhere, and deluded by the Egyptian party in his court, ventured to withhold his tribute, and thereby to throw off the Chaldean yoke (2 Kings xxiv:1). This step, taken contrary to the earnest remonstrances of Jeremiah, was the ruin of Jehoiakim. It might seem successful for a little, from the Chaldeans not then having leisure to attend to the affairs of this quarter. In due time, however, the land was invaded by their armies, accompanied by a vast number of auxiliaries from the neighboring countries, the Edomites, Moabites, and others, who were for the most part actuated by a fierce hatred against the Jewish name and nation. The events of the war are not related. Jerusalem was taken, or rather surrendered on terms, which Josephus alleges were little heeded by Nebuchadnezzar. It is certain that Jehoiakim was slain, but whether in one of the actions, or, as Josephus says, after the surrender, we cannot determine. His body remained exposed and unlamented without the city, under the circumstances foretold by the prophet—'They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, my brother! or, Ah, sister! They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, lord! or, Ah, his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem' (Jer. xxii:18, 19; 1 Chron. iii:15; 2 Kings xxiii:34-37; xxiv:17; 2 Chron. xxxvi:4-8).

It was not the object of Nebuchadnezzar to destroy altogether a power which, as tributary to him, formed a serviceable outpost towards Egypt, which seems to have been the great final object of all his designs in this quarter. He therefore still maintained the throne of Judah, and placed on it Jehoachin, the son of the late king. He, however, sent away another body, a second corps of the nobles and chief persons of the nation, three thousand in number, among whom was Ezekiel, afterwards called to prophesy in the land of his exile.

5. Character. Jehoiakim was from all accounts a vicious and irreligious person (see 2 Kings xxiii:37; xxiv:9; 2 Chron. xxxvi:5, 8). The vindictive pursuit and murder of URIAH (which see) indicate his cruelty and irreligion (Jer. xxvi:20-23). His daring impiety is evidenced by his treatment of the roll which contained Jeremiah's prophecy. His selfishness is shown by the large sums he squandered in building luxurious palaces for himself when his country was impoverished by the heavy tributes laid upon it both by Egypt and Babylon (Jer. xxii:17-19). So bitter was the hatred against him that, according to the Rabbins, men whispered that on the dried skin of the corpse, as it lay naked before all, the name of the demon, Codonazer, to whom he had sold himself, appeared stamped in clear Hebrew letters. (See Mc. & Strong's Cyc.; Stanley's His. of the Jewish Church; Geike's Hours with the Bible.)

JEHOIARIB (je-hoi'a-rib), (Heb. יהויָרִיב, yeh-ho-yaw-reeb', Jehovah a defender, or Jehovah impels, or doth contend, 1 Chron. ix:10, xxiv:7, only; elsewhere, both in Hebrew and A. V., the name is abbreviated to JOIARIB), head of the first twenty-four courses of priests during King David's time. (B. C. 1014.) Some of his descendants returned from Babylon (Neh. xi:10), and his course is mentioned as returning (Neh. xii:6).

JEHONADAB (je-hön'a-däb), (Heb. יהונָדָב, yeh-ho-naw-dawb', Jehovah impels), 2 Kings x:15. See JONADAB.

JEHONATHAN (je-hön'a-than), (Heb. יהונָתָן, yeh-ho-naw-thawn', Jehovah-given).

1. Son of Uzziah, who was superintendent of the treasures and cellars of King David's storehouses (1 Chron. xxvii:25). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii:8). (B. C. 910.)

3. A priest (Neh. xii:18), representing the family of Shemaiah during the generation after the return from Babylon (ver. 6). (B. C. after 536.)

JEHORAM (je-hō'ram), (Heb. יְהוֹרָם, yeh-ho-ramm', exalted by Jehovah), contracted form JORAM (יֹרָם, yo-ramm').

The eldest son and successor of Jehoshaphat, and fifth king of Judah, who began to reign (separately) B. C. 853, at the age of thirty-five years, and reigned twelve years (2 Kings i:17; iii:1). He was associated with his father in the later years of his life, but he profited little by this association.

(1) Marriage and Idolatry. He had unhappily been married to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel; and her influence seems to have neutralized all the good he might have derived from the example of his father. One of the first acts of his reign was to put his brothers to death and seize the valuable appanages which their father had in his lifetime bestowed upon them. After this we are not surprised to find him giving way to the gross idolatries of that new and strange kind—the Phœnician—which had been brought into Israel by Jezebel, and into Judah by her daughter Athaliah (2 Kings viii:18, 19). A prophetic writing from the aged prophet Elijah produced no good effect upon him (2 Chron. xxi:12-15). For these atrocities the Lord let forth his anger against Jehoram and his kingdom.

(2) Wars. The Edomites revolted, and, according to old prophecies (Gen. xxvii:40), shook off the yoke of Judah. The Philistines on one side, and the Arabians and Cushites on the other, also grew bold against a king forsaken of God, and in repeated invasions spoiled the land of all its substance; they even ravaged the royal palaces; and took away the wives and children of the king, leaving him only one son, Ahaziah (2 Chron. xxii:1).

(3) Sickness and Death. Jehoram was in his last days afflicted with a frightful disease in his bowels, which, from the terms employed in describing it, appears to have been malignant dysentery in its most shocking and tormenting form. After a disgraceful reign, and a most painful death, public opinion inflicted the posthumous dishonor of refusing him a place in the sepulcher of the kings.

(4) Character. Jehoram was by far the most impious and cruel tyrant that had as yet occupied the throne of Judah, though he was rivaled or surpassed by some of his successors (2 Kings viii:16-24; 2 Chron. xxi:4). (See JORAM.)

JEHOSHABEATH (jē'ho-shāb'e-āth), (Heb. יְהוֹשָׁבֵעַת, yeh-ho-shab-e-ath', Jehovah sworn), the form in which the name of JEHOSHEBA (which see) is given in 2 Chron. xxii:11. It is stated there, but not in Kings, that she was the wife of Jehoiada, the high-priest (2 Chron. xxii:11). (See JEHOSHEBA.)

JEHOSHAPHAT (je-hōsh'a-phāt), (Heb. יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yeh-ho-shaw-fawt', Jehovah judged).

1. The fourth king of Judah, and son of Asa, whom he succeeded at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years.

(1) Fortifies Kingdom and Resists Idolatry. He commenced his reign by fortifying his kingdom against Israel; and having thus secured himself against surprise from the quarter which gave most disturbance to him, he proceeded to purge the land from the idolatries and idolatrous monuments by which it was still tainted. Even the high places and groves, which former well-disposed kings had suffered to remain, were by the zeal of Jehoshaphat in a great measure destroyed. The chiefs, with priests and Levites, proceeded from town to town, with the book of the Law in their hands, instructing the people, and calling back their wandering affections to the religion of their fathers. This was a beautiful and interesting circumstance in the operations of the young king.

(2) Enjoys Divine Protection. Jehoshaphat was too well instructed in the great principles of the theocracy not to know that his faithful conduct had entitled him to expect the Divine protection. Of that protection he soon had manifest proofs. At home he enjoyed peace and abundance, and abroad security and honor. His treasuries were filled with the 'presents' which the blessing of God upon the people, 'in their basket and their store,' enabled them to bring. His renown extended into the neighboring nations, and the Philistines, as well as the adjoining Arabian tribes, paid him rich tributes in silver and in cattle. He was thus enabled to put all his towns in good condition, to erect fortresses, to organize a powerful army, and to raise his kingdom to a degree of importance and splendor which it had not enjoyed since the revolt of the ten tribes.

(3) Alliance with Ahab. The weak and impious Ahab at that time occupied the throne of Israel; and Jehoshaphat, having nothing to fear from his power, sought, or at least did not repel, an alliance with him. This is alleged to have been the grand mistake of his reign; and that it was such is proved by the consequences.

After a few years we find Jehoshaphat on a visit to Ahab, in Samaria, being the first time any of the kings of Israel and Judah had met in peace. He here experienced a reception worthy of his greatness; but Ahab failed not to take advantage of the occasion, and so worked upon the weak points of his character as to prevail upon him to take arms with him against the Syrians, with whom, hitherto, the kingdom of Judah never had had any war or occasion of quarrel. However, Jehoshaphat was not so far infatuated as to proceed to the war without consulting God, who, according to the principles of the theocratic government, was the final arbiter of war and peace. The false prophets of Ahab poured forth ample promises of success, and one of them, named Zedekiah, resorting to material symbols, made him horns of iron, saying, 'Thus saith the Lord, with these shalt thou smite the Syrians till they be consumed.' Still Jehoshaphat was not satisfied; and the answer to his further inquiries extorted from him a rebuke of the reluctance which Ahab manifested to call Micah, 'the prophet of the Lord.' The fearless words of this prophet did not make the impression upon the king of Judah which might have been expected; or, probably, he then felt himself too deeply bound in honor to recede. He went to the fatal battle of Ramoth-Gilead, and there nearly became the victim of a plan which Ahab had laid for his own safety at the expense of his too-confiding ally. He persuaded Jehoshaphat to appear as king, while he himself went disguised to the battle. This brought the heat of the contest around him, as the Syrians took him for Ahab; and if they had not in time discovered their mistake, he would certainly have been slain. Ahab was killed, and the battle lost. (See AHAB); but Jehoshaphat escaped, and returned to Jerusalem.

(4) Extended His Reforms. On his return from this imprudent expedition he was met by the just reproaches of the prophet Jehu. The best atonement he could make for this error was by the course he actually took. He resumed his labors in the further extirpation of idolatry, in the instruction of the people, and the improvement of his realm. He now made a tour of his kingdom in person, that he might see the ordinances of God duly established, and witness the due execution of his intentions respecting the instruction of the people in the divine law. This tour enabled him to discern many defects in the local administration of justice, which he then applied himself to remedy. He appointed magistrates in every city, for the determination of causes civil and ecclesiastical. Then he established a supreme council of justice at Jerusalem, composed of priests, Levites, and 'the chiefs of the fathers'; to which difficult cases were referred and appeals brought from the provincial tribunals. This tribunal also was inducted by a weighty but short charge from the king, whose conduct in this and other matters places him at the very head of the monarchs who reigned over Judah as a separate kingdom.

(5) Revival of Commerce. The activity of Jehoshaphat's mind was then turned towards the revival of that maritime commerce which had been established by Solomon. The land of Edom and the ports of the Elanitic Gulf were still under the power of Judah; and in them the king prepared a fleet for the voyage to Ophir. Unhappily, however, he yielded to the wish of the king of Israel, and allowed him to take part in the enterprise. For this the expedition was doomed of God, and the vessels were wrecked almost as soon as they quitted port. Instructed by Eliezer, the prophet, as to the cause of this disaster, Jehoshaphat equipped a new fleet, and having this time declined the co-operation of the king of Israel, the voyage prospered. The trade was not, however, prosecuted with any zeal, and was soon abandoned. (See COMMERCE.)

In accounting for the disposition of Jehoshaphat to contract alliances with the king of Israel, we are to remember that there existed a powerful tie between the two courts in the marriage of Jehoshaphat's eldest son with Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab; and, when we advert to the part in public affairs which that princess afterwards took, it may well be conceived that even thus early she possessed an influence for evil in the court of Judah.

(6) Alliance with Joram. After the death of Ahaziah, king of Israel, Joram, his successor, persuaded Jehoshaphat to join him in an expedition against Moab. This alliance was, however, on political grounds, more excusable than the two former, as the Moabites, who were under tribute to Israel, might draw into their cause the Edomites, who were tributary to Judah. Besides, Moab could be invaded with most advantage from the south, round by the end of the Dead Sea; and the king of Israel could not gain access to them in that quarter but by marching through the territories of Jehoshaphat. The latter not only joined Joram with his own army, but required his tributary, the king of Edom, to bring his forces into the field. During seven days' march through the wilderness of Edom, the army suffered much from want of water; and by the time the allies came in sight of the army of Moab, they were ready to perish from thirst. In this emergency the pious Jehoshaphat thought, as usual, of consulting the Lord; and hearing that the prophet Elisha was in the camp, the three kings proceeded to his tent. For the sake of Jehoshaphat, and for his sake only, deliverance was promised; and it came during the ensuing night, in the shape of an abundant supply of water, which rolled down the exhausted wadies, and filled the pools and hollow ground. Afterwards Jehoshaphat took his full part in the operations of the campaign, till the armies were induced to withdraw in horror, by witnessing the dreadful act of Mesha, king of Moab, in offering up his eldest son in sacrifice upon the wall of the town in which he was shut up.

(7) Renewed Wars. This war kindled another much more dangerous to Jehoshaphat. The Moabites, being highly exasperated at the part he had taken against them, turned all their wrath upon him. They induced their kindred, the Ammonites, to join them, obtained auxiliaries from the Syrians, and even drew over the Edomites; so that the strength of all the neighboring nations may be said to have been united for this great enterprise. The allied forces entered the land of Judah and encamped at Engedi, near the western border of the Dead Sea. In this extremity Jehoshaphat felt that all his defense lay with God. A solemn fast was held, and the people repaired from the towns to Jerusalem to seek help of the Lord. In the presence of the assembled multitude the king, in the court of the temple, offered up a fervent prayer to God, concluding with—'O our God, wilt thou not judge them, for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon thee.' He ceased; and in the midst of the silence which ensued, a voice was raised pronouncing deliverance in the name of the Lord, and telling them to go out on the morrow to the cliffs overlooking the camp of the enemy, and see them all overthrown without a blow from them. The voice was that of Jalaziel, one of the Levites. His words came to pass. The allies quarreled among themselves and destroyed each other; so that when the Judahites came the next day they found their dreaded enemies all dead, and nothing was left for them but to take the rich spoils of the slain. This done, they returned with triumphal songs to Jerusalem. This great event was recognized even by the neighboring nations as the act of God; and so strong was the impression which it made upon them, that the remainder of the good king's reign was altogether undisturbed.

(8) Death. His death, however, took place not very long after this at the age of sixty, after having reigned twenty-five years. (B. C. 896.) He left the kingdom in a prosperous condition to his eldest son Jehoram, whom he had in the last years of his life associated with him in the government.

(9) Character. 'Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart,' was the character given to this king by Jehu, when, on that account, he gave to his grandson an honorable grave (2 Chron. xxii:9). And this, in fact, was the sum and substance of his character. The Hebrew annals offer the example of no king who more carefully squared all his conduct by the principles of the theocracy. He kept the Lord always before his eyes, and was in all things obedient to his will when made known to him by the prophets. Few of the kings of Judah manifested so much zeal for the real welfare of his people, or took measures so judicious to promote it. His good talents, the benevolence of his disposition, and his generally sound judgment are shown not only in the great measures of domestic policy which distinguished his reign, but by the manner in which they were executed. No trace can be found in him of that pride which dishonored some and ruined others of the kings who preceded and followed him. Most of his errors arose from that dangerous facility of temper which sometimes led him to act against the dictates of his naturally sound judgment, or prevented that judgment from being fairly exercised.

2. A priest in the time of David who was appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark when brought up to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv:24). (B. C. about 1043.)

3. Son of Ahilud, who was recorder or chronicler in the court of David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii:16; xx:24; 1 Kings iv:3; 1 Chron. xviii:15). (B. C. 1014.)

4. Son of Paruah; purveyor of the district of Issachar under Solomon (1 Kings iv:17). (B. C. about 995.)

5. Father of King Jehu (2 Kings ix:2, 14). (B. C. 842.)

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (je-hōsh'ā-p'hāt, vāl'li uv), (Heb. יְהוֹשָׁפָטַל, yeh-ho-shaw-faw'l, valley where Jehovah judges), the name now given to the valley which bounds Jerusalem on the east, and separates it from the Mount of Olives. (See JERUSALEM).

In Joel iii:2, 12, we read, 'the Lord will gather all nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and plead with them there.' Many interpreters, Jewish and Christian, conclude from this that the last judgment is to take place in the above-mentioned valley. But there is no reason to suppose that the valley then bore any such name; and more discreet interpreters understand the text to denote a valley in which some great victory was to be won, most probably by Nebuchadnezzar, which should utterly discomfit the ancient enemies of Israel, and resemble the victory which Jehoshaphat obtained over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites (2 Chron. xx:22-26). Others translate the name Jehoshaphat into God's judgment, and thus read, 'the valley of God's judgment,' which is doubtless symbolical, like 'the valley of decision,' i. e. of punishment, in the same chapter.

JEHOSHEBA (je-hōsh'e-bā), (Heb. יְהוֹשֵׁבָבֵת, yeh-ho-sheh'bah, Jehovah her oath, that is, worshiper of Jehovah), daughter of Jehoram, sister of Ahaziah, and aunt of Joash, kings of Judah. The last of these owed his life to her, and his crown to her husband, the high-priest Jehoiada (2 Kings xi:1, 3; 2 Chron. xxii:11). B. C. 842. (See JEHOIADA.)

JEHOSHUA (je-hōsh'u-ā), (Num. xiii:16). See JOSHUA.

JEHOSHUAH (je-hōsh'u-ah), (1 Chron. vii:27). See JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH (je-hō'vab), (Heb. יְהוָה, yeh-ho-vaw'), or rather perhaps JAHVEH (Heb. יְהוֹוֶה, yah-veh', the existing one), according to the reading suggested by Ewald, Hävernick, and others—the name by which God was pleased to make himself known under the covenant, to the ancient Hebrews (Exod. vi:2, 3). Th: LXX generally render it by ὁ Κύριος, ho koo'ree-os, the Vulgate by Dominus; and in this respect they have been followed by the A. V., where it is translated "The Lord."

(1) Pronunciation. The true pronunciation of this name, by which God was known to the Hebrews, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupulously avoiding every mention of it, and substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel points it may happen to be written. This custom, which had its origin in reverence, and has almost degenerated into a superstition, was founded upon an erroneous rendering of Lev. xxiv:16, from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the name constituted a capital offense. In the rabbinical writings it is distinguished by various euphemistic expressions; as simply "the name," or "the name of four letters" (the Greek tetragrammaton); "the great and terrible name;" "the peculiar name," i. e. appropriated to God alone; "the separate name," i. e. either the name which is separated or removed from human knowledge, or, as some render, "the name which has been interpreted or revealed" (Heb. shem ham'-mee-pho-rawsh). The Samaritans followed the same custom, and in reading the Pentateuch substituted for Jehovah (יהוה, shey-maw) "the name," at the same time perpetuating the practice in their alphabetical poems and later writings.

(2) Meaning. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM (אֲנִי אֲנִי, eh-yeh' ash-er'eh-yeh'), and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." That this passage is intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah, as understood by the Hebrews, no one has ventured to doubt; it is in fact the key to the whole mystery.

(3) When Revealed. It is distinctly stated in Exod. vi:3, that to the patriarchs God was not known by the name Jehovah. If, therefore, this passage has reference to the first revelation of Jehovah simply as a name and title of God, there is clearly a discrepancy which requires to be explained. In renewing his promise of deliverance from Egypt, "God spake unto Moses and said unto him, I am Jehovah; and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by (the name of) God Almighty (El Shaddai, אֱלֹהִים שַׁדַּי), but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them." It follows then that, if the reference were merely to the name as a name, the passage in question would prove equally that before this time Elohim was unknown as an appellation of the Deity, and God would appear uniformly as El Shaddai in the patriarchal history. But although it was held by Theodoret (Quæst. xv. on Ex.) and many of the Fathers, who have been followed by a long list of moderns, that the name was first made known by God to Moses, and then introduced by him among the Israelites, the contrary was maintained by Cajetan, Lyranus, Calvin, Rosenmüller Hengstenberg, and others, who deny that the passage in Exod. vi alludes to the introduction of the name. That Jehovah was not a new name Hävernick concludes from Exod. iii:14, where "the name of God Jehovah is evidently presupposed as already in use, and is only explained, interpreted, and applied. . . . It is certainly not a new name that is introduced; on the contrary, the 'I am that I am' would be unintelligible, if the name itself were not presupposed as already known. The old name of antiquity, whose precious significance had been forgotten and neglected by the children of Israel, here as it were rises again to life, and is again brought home to the consciousness of the people." (Smith, Bib. Dict.) (See ELOHIM; and article on God.)

JEHOVAH-JIREH (je-hō'vah-jī'reh), (Heb. יהוה ירה, yeh-ho-va'w' yir-eh', Jehovah will see, i. e., provide). Abraham thus named the altar on which he had been commanded to offer Isaac, and which offering he was so miraculously preserved from making (Gen. xxii:14).

JEHOVAH-NISSI (je-hō'vah-nīs'si), (Heb. יהוה ניס, yeh-ho-va'w' nees-see', Jehovah my banner), the name given by Moses to the altar erected upon the hill where he sat with uplifted hands during the successful battle against the Amalekites (Exod. xvii:15).

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (je - hō'vah - shā'lom), (Heb. יהוה שלום, yeh-ho-va'w' shaw-lome', Jehovah is peace), the name Gideon gave to the altar erected in Ophrah. It was called by this name in memory of the words addressed to him by the Angel of Jehovah, "Peace be unto thee" (Judges vi:24).

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (je-hō'vah-shām'mah), (Heb. יהוה שם, yeh-ho-va'w' shawm'maw', Jehovah there, or lit. thither), the name of the city Ezekiel described in his vision (Ezek. xlviii:35).

JEHOZABAD (je-hōz'a-bād), (Heb. יהוה צב, yeh-ho-za'w-bawd', Jehovah endowed).

1. A Levite, son of Obed-edom, a porter of the temple during the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvi:4, 15; comp. Neh. xii:25). (B. C. 1014.)

2. A captain of the tribe of Benjamin, commanding 180,000 armed men during Jehoshaphat's time (2 Chron. xvii:18). (B. C. about 910.)

3. Son of Shomer, the Moabitish woman who conspired against and slew King Joash in his bed (2 Kings xii:21; 2 Chron. xxiv:26). (B. C. 837.)

JEHOZADAK (je-hōz'a-dāk), (Heb. יהוה צדק, yeh-ho-tsa'w-dawk', Jehovah makes just), son of Seraiah, a high-priest during the reign of Zedekiah (1 Chron. vi:14, 15).

He succeeded his father in the office of high-priest (1 Chron. vi:14, 15); but suffered captivity under Nebuchadnezzar. Elsewhere the name is JOZADAK. (B. C. 588.) He probably died in exile, as his son Joshua (Jeshua) was the first high-priest who officiated after the return from captivity (Hag. i:1, 12, 14; ii:2, 4; Zech. vi:11).

JEHU (jē'hu), (Heb. יהוה, yay-hoo', God is).

1. The eleventh king of Israel, and founder of its fourth dynasty, who began to reign B. C. 884, and reigned twenty-eight years.

(1) Commander in the Army. Jehu held a command in the Israelite army posted at Ramoth-Gilead to hold in check the Syrians, who of late years had made strenuous efforts to extend their frontier to the Jordan, and had possessed themselves of much of the territory of the Israelites east of that river (2 Kings ix:5). The contest was in fact still carried on which had begun many years before in the reign of Ahab, the present king's father, who had lost his life in battle before this very Ramoth-Gilead. Ahaziah, king of Judah, had taken part with Joram, king of Israel, in this war (2 Kings viii:28), and as the latter had been severely wounded in a recent action, and had gone to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds, Ahaziah had also gone thither on a visit of sympathy to him (ver. 29).

In this state of affairs a council of war was held among the military commanders in camp, when very unexpectedly one of the disciples of the prophets, known for such by his garb, appeared at the door of the tent, and called forth Jehu, declaring that he had a message to deliver to him (2 Kings ix:1-5). He had been sent by Elisha the prophet, in discharge of a duty which long before had been confided by the Lord to Elijah (1 Kings xix:16), and from him had devolved on his successor.

(2) Anointed King. When they were alone the young man drew forth a horn of oil and poured it upon Jehu's head, with the words, 'Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord, even over Israel. And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master, that I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel' (2 Kings ix:1-13). Jehu returned to the council, probably with an altered air, for he was asked what had been the communication of the young prophet to him. He told them plainly; and they were obviously ripe for defection from the house of Ahab, for they were all delighted at the news, and taking him in triumph to 'the top of the stairs,' they spread their mantles beneath his feet, and proclaimed him king by sound of trumpet in the presence of all the troops (2 Kings ix:11, 12).

Jehu was not a man to lose any advantage through remissness. He immediately entered his chariot, in order that his presence at Jezreel should be the first announcement which Joram could receive of this revolution.

(3) Stays the Two Kings. As soon as the advance of Jehu and his party was seen in the distance by the watchmen upon the palace-tower in Jezreel, two messengers were successively sent forth to meet him, and were commanded by Jehu to follow in his rear. But when the watchman reported that he could now recognize the furious driving of Jehu, Joram went forth himself to meet him, and was accompanied by the king of Judah. They met in the field of Naboth, so fatal to the house of Ahab. The king saluted him with 'Is it peace, Jehu?' and received the answer, 'What peace, so long as the whoredoms (idolatries) of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?' This completely opened the eyes of Joram, who exclaimed to the king of Judah, 'There is treachery, O Ahaziah!' and turned to flee. But Jehu felt no infirmity of purpose, and knew that the slightest wavering might be fatal to him. He therefore drew a bow with his full strength and sent forth an arrow which passed through the king's heart. Jehu caused the body to be thrown back into the field of Naboth, out of which he had passed in his attempt at flight (2 Kings ix:16-25).

(4) Death of Jezebel. The king of Judah contrived to escape, but not without a wound, of which he afterwards died at Megiddo. (See AHAZIAH.) Jehu then entered the city, whither the news of this transaction had already preceded him. As he passed under the walls of the palace Jezebel herself, studiously arrayed for effect, appeared at one of the windows, and saluted him with a question such as might have shaken a man of weaker nerves, 'Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?' But Jehu was unmoved, and instead of answering her, called out, 'Who is on my side, who?' when several eunuchs made their appearance at the window, to whom he cried, 'Throw her down!' and immediately this proud and guilty woman lay a blood-stained corpse in the road, and was trodden under foot by the horses. (See JEZEBEL.) Jehu then went in and took possession of the palace (2 Kings ix:30-37).

(5) Destroys House of Ahab. He was now master of Jezreel, which was, next to Samaria, the chief town of the kingdom; but he could not feel secure while the capital itself was in the hands of the royal family, and of those who might be supposed to feel strong attachment to the house of Ahab. The force of the blow which he had struck was, however, felt even in Samaria. When therefore he wrote to the persons in authority there the somewhat ironical but designedly intimidating counsel, to set up one of the young princes in Samaria as king and fight out the matter which lay between them, they sent a very submissive answer, giving in their adhesion, and professing their readiness to obey in all things his commands. A second letter from Jehu tested this profession in a truly horrid and exceedingly Oriental manner, requiring them to appear before him on the morrow, bringing with them the heads of all the royal princes in Samaria (2 Kings x:1-8). A fallen house meets with little pity in the East; and when the new king left his palace the next morning, he found seventy human heads piled up in two heaps at his gate. There, in the sight of these heaps, Jehu took occasion to explain his conduct, declaring that he must be regarded as the appointed minister of the divine decrees, pronounced long since against the house of Ahab by the prophets, not one of whose words should fall to the ground. He then continued his proscriptions by exterminating in Jezreel not only all in whose veins the blood of the condemned race flowed, but also—by a considerable stretch of his commission—those officers, ministers, and creatures of the late government, who, if suffered to live, would most likely be disturbers of his own reign. He then proceeded to Samaria. So rapid had been these proceedings that he met some of the nephews of the king of Judah, who were going to join their uncle at Jezreel, and had as yet heard nothing of the revolution which had taken place. These also perished under Jehu's now fully-awakened thirst for blood, to the number of forty-two persons (verse 14).

(6) Destroys Baalites. On the way he took up into his chariot the pious Jehonadab the Rechabite, whose austere virtue and respected character would, as he felt, go far to hallow his proceedings in the eyes of the multitude. At Samaria he continued the extirpation of the persons more intimately connected with the late government. This, far from being in any way singular, is a common circumstance in eastern revolutions. But the great object of Jehu was to exterminate the ministers and more devoted adherents of Baal, who had been much encouraged by Jezebel. There was even a temple to this idol in Samaria; and Jehu, never scrupulous about the means of reaching objects which he believed to be good, laid a snare by which he hoped to cut off the main body of Baal's ministers at one blow. He professed to be a more zealous servant of Baal than Ahab had been, and proclaimed a great festival in his honor, at which none but his true servants were to be present. The prophets, priests, and officers of Baal assembled from all parts for this great sacrifice, and sacerdotal vestments were given to them, that none of Jehovah's worshipers might be taken for them. When the temple was full, soldiers were posted so that none might escape; and so soon as the sacrifice had been offered, the word was given by the king, the soldiers entered the temple, and put all the worshipers to the sword. The temple itself was then demolished, the images overthrown, and the site turned into a common jakes.

(7) Shortcomings and Death. Notwithstanding this zeal of Jehu in exterminating the grosser idolatries which had grown up under his immediate predecessors, he was not prepared to subvert the policy which had led Jeroboam and his successors to maintain the schismatic establishment of the golden calves in Dan and Bethel. Here Jehu fell short: and this very policy, apparently so prudent and farsighted, by which he hoped to secure the stability and independence of his kingdom, was that on account of which the term of rule granted to his dynasty was shortened. For this, it was foretold that his dynasty should extend only to four generations; and for this the Divine aid was withheld from him in his wars with the Syrians under Hazael on the eastern frontier. Hence the war was disastrous to him, and the Syrians were able to maintain themselves in the possession of a great part of his territories beyond the Jordan. He died in B. C. 856, and was buried in Samaria, leaving the throne to his son Jehoahaz.

(8) Testimony of the Monuments. "Shalmaneser II's own record bears testimony to the existence of Ahab, of Benhadad, and Hazael of Damascus, and of Jehu the son of Omri." (Price, The Monuments and the Old Testament, pp. 63, 155, 292.)

(9) Character. He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself. With all his remorseless zeal there was no honest enthusiasm for the true God (2 Kings x:31). In the long period during which his destiny though known to others and perhaps to himself lay dormant; in the suddenness of his rise to power; in the ruthlessness with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and dissimulation with a stern, fanatic, wayward zeal,—he has not been without his likenesses in modern times. The Scripture narrative, although it fixes our attention on the services which he rendered to the cause of religion by the extermination of a worthless dynasty and a degrading worship, yet on the whole leaves the sense that it was a reign barren in great results. His dynasty, indeed, was firmly seated on the throne longer than any other royal house of Israel (2 Kings x), and under Jeroboam II it acquired a high name amongst the oriental nations. But Elisha, who had raised him to power, as far as we know, never saw him. In other respects it was a failure; the original sin of Jeroboam's worship continued; and in the Prophet Hosea there seems to be a retribution exacted for the bloodshed by which he had mounted the throne: "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu" (Hos. i:4), as in the similar condemnation of Baasha (1 Kings xvi:3). (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

2. Son of Hanani, a prophet, who was sent to pronounce upon Baasha, king of Israel, and his house, the same awful doom which had been already executed upon the house of Jeroboam (1 Kings xvi:1-7). The same prophet was, many years after, commissioned to reprove Jehoshaphat for his dangerous connection with the house of Ahab (2 Chron. xix:2). He seems to have been in the office of chronicler during all of Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chron. xx:34). (B. C. 928-886.)

3. A man of Judah, son of Obed, and father of Azariah (1 Chron. ii:38). (B. C. after 1612.)

4. One of the Benjamite slingers who came over to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:3). (B. C. 1055.)

5. Son of Josibiah, a Simeonite, who migrated to the valley of Gedor, and was one of the chief men of the tribe (1 Chron. iv:35). (B. C. about 711.)

JEHUBBAH (je-hüb'bah), (Heb. ^{יְהוּבָא}, yekh-oob-baw', he will be hidden).

Son of Shomer, or Shamer, of the tribe of Asher in time of Beriah (1 Chron. vii:34). (B. C. about 1618.)

JEHUCAL (jē'hu-kal), (Heb. ^{יְהוּכָל}, yeh-hoo-kal', spelled "Jucal" Jer. xxxviii:1), one of the "princes of King Zedekiah" who was sent to Jeremiah to ask advice and prayers on behalf of the kingdom (Jer. xxxvii:3), but on his return he joined those demanding the prophet's death (B. C. 589).

JEHUD (jē'hud), (Heb. ^{יְהוּדָא}, yeh-hood', Judah).

A town between Baalath and Bene-berak, of the tribe of Dan (Josh xix:45); perhaps the modern El-Jehudieh, seven and a half miles southeast of Jaffa. (Robinson, Researches, iii:45.)

JEUUDI (jē-hū'di), (Heb. ^{יְהוּדִי}, yeh-hoo-dee', Jew).

Son of Nethaniah, who invited Baruch to read Jeremiah's roll to the princes, and who later read it to the king himself (Jer. xxxvi:14, 21, 23). (B. C. 605.)

JEHUDIJAH (jē'hu-dī'jah), (Heb. ^{יְהוּדִיָּה}, yeh-hoo-dee-yaw', Jewess), according to the A. V. a woman given as the second wife of Mered (1 Chron. iv:18), B. C. about 1612. The marginal reading, "the Jewess," is undoubtedly correct. She is probably the same as Hodiah (verse 19). She was called the Jewess to distinguish her from the Egyptian.

JEHUSH (jē'hush), (Heb. ^{יְהוּשׁ}, yeh-oosh', collecting, bringing together), son of Eshek, and descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii:39), B. C. about 588.

JEIEL (je-i'el), (Heb. ^{יְהִיֵּל}, yeh-ee-ale', treasure of God).

1. A Reubenite of the house of Joel, probably at the time of the census of the trans-Jordanic tribes, taken by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v:7). (B. C. 782.)

2. A Levite doorkeeper at the first establishing of the ark in Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi:5); probably the same as the one mentioned later (1 Chron. xv:18, 21) as a musician. (B. C. 1043.)

3. A Levite, forefather of Jahaziel, who foretold Jehoshaphat of his victory over the Ammonites and Moabites (2 Chron. xx:14). (B. C. before 890.)

4. One of the scribes who kept the accounts of Uzziah's warriors (2 Chron. xxvi:11). (B. C. 803.)

5. One of those who assisted in restoring the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix:13).

6. One of those who assisted in the restoration of the Passover by Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv:9). (B. C. 623.)

7. One who came in the Caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii:13). (B. C. 459.)

8. One of the Bene-Nebo, a layman who, after the exile put aside a foreign wife (Ezra x:43). (B. C. 459.)

JEKABZEEL (je-käb'ze-el), (Heb. ^{יְכָבְזֵאל}, yek-ab-tseh-ale', God will gather), a city in the remote southern part of Judah (Josh. xv:21; Neh. xi:25), called KABZEEL.

JEKAMEAM (jök'a-mē'am), (Heb. ^{יְכָמֵאָם}, yek-am-awm', the people will rise), a Levite, the fourth in rank of the "sons" of Hebron in the Levitical arrangement established by David (1 Chron. xxiii:19; xxiv:23), B. C. about 960.

JEKAMIAH (jök'a-mi'ah), (Heb. ^{יְכָמִיָּא}, yek-am-yaw', Jehovah will rise).

1. Son of Shallum, a descendant of Judah in the time of King Ahaz (1 Chron. ii:41). (B. C. about 588.)

2. Fifth named son of King Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii:18), born during the Babylonian exile. (B. C. after 598.)

JEKUTHIEL (jē-kū'thi-el), (Heb. ^{יְכֻתִּיֵּל}, yek-ooth-ee'ale, reverence for God, piety), a son of Ezra by a Jewish wife, Jehudijah or Hodiah, and in his turn founder of the town of Zanoah (1 Chron. iv:18), B. C. about 1618.

JEMIMA (je-mi'mā or jēm'i-mā), (Heb. ^{יְמִימָה}, yem-ee-maw', dove), the eldest of the three daughters of Job, born after he was restored to prosperity (Job xlii:14), B. C. about 2200. The name may be contained in the Arabic Jemama (Foster, Histor. Geog. of Arabia ii:67).

JEMUEL (je-mū'el), (Heb. ^{יְמֻעַל}, yem-oo-ale', day of God), the first-named son of Simeon (Gen. xlv:10; Ex. vi:15). Elsewhere NEMUEL (Num. xxvi:12), apparently by error.

JEPHTHAË (jēfh'tha-ē), (Heb. xi:32). See JEPHTHAH.

JEPHTHAH (jēfh'thah), (Heb. ^{יִפְתָּח}, yif-tawkh', opener).

The ninth judge of Israel, of the tribe of Manasseh. He was the son of a person named Gilead by a concubine. After the death of his father he was expelled from his home by the envy of his brothers, who refused him any share of the heritage, and he withdrew to the land of Tob (Judg. xi:1-3) beyond the frontier of the Hebrew territories.

(1) A Free Lance. It is clear that he had before this distinguished himself by his daring character and skill in arms; for no sooner was his withdrawal known than a great number of men of desperate fortunes repaired to him, and he became their chief. His position was now very similar to that of David when he withdrew from the court of Saul. To maintain the people who had thus linked their fortunes with his, there was no other resource than that sort of brigandage which is accounted honorable in the East, so long as it is exercised against public or private enemies, and is not marked by needless cruelty or outrage.

Jephthah led this kind of life for some years, during which his dashing exploits and successful enterprises procured him a higher military reputation than any other man of his time enjoyed.

After the death of Jair the Israelites gradually fell into their favorite idolatries, and were punished by subjection to the Philistines on the west of the Jordan, and to the Ammonites on the east of that river. The oppression which they sustained for eighteen years became at length so heavy that they recovered their senses and returned to the God of their fathers with humiliation and tears; and he was appeased, and promised them deliverance from their affliction (B. C. 1143.)

(2) Leader of Israelites. The tribes beyond the Jordan having resolved to oppose the Ammonites, Jephthah seems to occur to every one as the most fitting leader. A deputation was accordingly sent to invite him to take the command. After some demur, on account of the treatment he had formerly received, he consented. The rude hero commenced his operations with a degree of diplomatic consideration and dignity for which we are not prepared. The Ammonites being assembled in force for one of those ravaging incursions by which they had repeatedly desolated the land, he sent to their camp a formal complaint of the invasion, and a demand of the ground of their proceeding. Their answer was, that the land of the Israelites beyond the Jordan was theirs. It had originally belonged to them, from whom it had been taken by the Amorites, who had been dispossessed by the Israelites: and on this ground they claimed the restitution of these lands. Jephthah's reply laid down the just principle which has been followed out in the practice of civilized nations, and is maintained by all the great writers on the law of nations. The land belonged to the Israelites by right of conquest from the actual possessors; and they could not be expected to recognize any antecedent claim of former possessors, for whom they had not acted, who had rendered them no assistance, and who had themselves displayed hostility against the Israelites. But the Ammonites reasserted their former views, and on this issue they took the field.

(3) Victorious Over Ammonites. When Jephthah set forth against the Ammonites he solemnly vowed to the Lord, 'If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering' (Judg. xi:30, 31). He was victorious. The Ammonites sustained a terrible overthrow (Judg. xi:3-33). He did return in peace to his house in Mizpeh. As he drew nigh his house, the one that came forth to meet him was his own daughter, his only child, in whom his heart was bound up. She, with her fair companions, came to greet the triumphant hero 'with timbrels and with dances.' But he no sooner saw her than he rent his robes, and cried, 'Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low; . . . for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and cannot go back.' Nor did she ask it. She replied, 'My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which has proceeded out of thy mouth: forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, the children of Ammon.' But after a pause she added, 'Let this thing be done for me: let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows.' Her father of course assented; and when the time expired she returned, and, we are told, 'he did with her according to his vow.' It is then added that it became 'a custom in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in the year. (See below.)

(4) Quarrel with Ephraimites. The victory over the Ammonites was followed by a quarrel with the proud and powerful Ephraimites on the west of the Jordan. This tribe was displeased at having had no share in the glory of the recent victory, and a large body of men belonging to it, who had crossed the river to share in the action, used very high and threatening language when they found their services were not required. Jephthah, finding his remonstrances had no effect, re-assembled some of his disbanded troops and gave the Ephraimites battle, when they were defeated with much loss. The victors seized the fords of the Jordan, and when any one came to pass over, they made him pronounce the word Shibboleth (an ear of corn), but if he could not give the aspiration, and pronounced the word as Sibboleth, they knew him for an Ephraimite, and slew him on the spot (Judg. xii:1-6).

(5) Rule and Death. Jephthah judged Israel six years (Judg. x:6; xii:7), during which we have reason to conclude that the exercise of his authority was almost if not altogether confined to the country east of the Jordan (B. C. 1080-1074).

(6) Character. Jephthah seems to have had blended opposite characteristics in his nature. He appears to have been ordinarily calm and deliberate notwithstanding his rash vow, as the history of his life clearly shows.

JEPHTHAH'S VOW. Volumes have been written on the subject of 'Jephthah's rash vow,' the question being whether, in doing to his daughter 'according to his vow,' he really did offer her in sacrifice or not. The negative has been stoutly maintained by many able pens, from a natural anxiety to clear the character of one of the heroes in Israel from so dark a stain. But the more the plain rules of common sense have been exercised in our view of biblical transactions, and the better we have succeeded in realizing a distinct idea of the times in which Jephthah lived and of the position which he occupied, the less reluctance there has been to admit the interpretation which the first view of the passage suggests to every reader, which is that he really did offer her in sacrifice. The explanation which denies this maintains that she was rather doomed to perpetual celibacy.

(1) Reasons for Actual Sacrifice. (1) The whole story is consistent and intelligible, while the sacrifice is understood to have actually taken place; but becomes perverted and difficult as soon as we begin to turn aside from this obvious meaning in search of recondite explanations. (2) Again Jephthah vows that whatsoever came forth from the door of his house to meet him 'shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering,' which, in fact, was the regular way of making a thing wholly the Lord's. Afterwards we are told that 'he did with her according to his vow,' that is, according to the plain meaning of plain words, offered her for a burnt-offering. (3) Jephthah was a good deal of a heathen, and human sacrifices were customary among the heathen people. (4) The great grief of Jephthah is only accounted for by her devotedness to death. (5) People lament the dead not the living; hence the lamentation of the daughters of Israel four days every year. (6) To live unmarried was required by no law, custom, or devotedness among the Jews; no one had a right to impose so odious a condition on another, nor is any such condition implied or expressed in the vow which Jephthah uttered. (7) There is not the least evidence to show that his conduct was sanctioned by God. (8) The Jewish commentators themselves generally admit that Jephthah really sacrificed his daughter; and even go so far as to allege that the change in the pontifical dynasty from the house of Eleazar to that of Ithamar was caused by the high-priest of the time having suffered this transaction to take place.

(2) Reasons Against Actual Sacrifice. (1) Human sacrifices were most emphatically forbidden by the law (Deut. xviii:10; xii:30, 31; Lev. xviii:21; xx:2; Ps. cvi:37, 38; Jer. vii:

31; xxxii:35; Ezek. xvi:20, 21, etc.). (2) By translating the conjunction "and" by the word "or" in Judg. xi:30, 31, which is justified by the Hebrew idiom and thus given in the margin, all difficulty will disappear. His words would then read, "shall surely be the Lord's, or I will offer a burnt offering;" and not infrequently the sense requires that the Hebrew should be thus rendered (Lev. xxvii:28) where there is a similar meaning of the conjunctive VAU. The vow would then consist of two parts.

(a) That what person soever met him should be the Lord's or dedicated to his service.

(b) That what beast soever met him, if clean, should be offered up for a burnt-offering unto the Lord. This rendering, and this interpretation, is warranted by the Levitical law about vows. The neder, or vow, in general, included either persons, beasts, or things, dedicated to the Lord for pious uses; which, if it were a simple vow, was redeemable at certain prices, if the person repented of his vow, and wished to commute it for money, according to the age and sex of the person (Lev. xxvii:1-8). This was a wise regulation to remedy rash vows. But if the vow was accompanied with cherem, devotement, it was irredeemable, as in the following cases:—"Notwithstanding, no devotement which a man shall devote unto the Lord, (either) of man, or of beast, or of land of his own property, shall be sold or redeemed. Every thing devoted is most holy unto the Lord" (Lev. xxvii:28). Here the three vows in the original should necessarily be rendered disjunctively, or; as the last actually is in our public translation, because there are three distinct subjects of devotement, to be applied to distinct uses; the man, to be dedicated to the service of the Lord, as Samuel by his mother, Hannah (1 Sam. i:11); the cattle, if clean, such as oxen, sheep, goats, turtledoves, or pigeons, to be sacrificed; and if unclean, as camels, horses, asses, to be employed for carrying burdens in the service of the tabernacle or temple; and the lands, to be sacred property.

(c) This law, therefore, expressly applied, in its first branch, to Jephthah's case, who had devoted his daughter to the Lord, or opened his mouth unto the Lord, and therefore could not go back; as he declared in his grief at seeing his daughter, and his only child, coming to meet him with timbrels and dances.

(d) She was, therefore, necessarily devoted, but with her own consent, to perpetual virginity, in the service of the tabernacle (Judg. xi:36, 37). And such service was customary; for in the division of the spoils taken in the first Midianite war, of the whole number of captive virgins, 'the Lord's tribute was thirty-two persons' (Num. xxxi:35-40). This instance appears to be decisive of the nature of her devotement.

(e) Her father's extreme grief on this occasion, and her requisition of a respite of two months to bewail her virginity, are both perfectly natural; having no other issue, he could look forward only to the extinction of his name or family; and a state of celibacy, which is reproachful among women everywhere, was peculiarly so among the Israelites; and was therefore no ordinary sacrifice on her part, who, though she generously gave up, could not but regret the loss of becoming "a mother in Israel." 'And he did with her according to his vow which he had vowed, and she knew no man,' or remained a virgin all her life (Judg. xi:34-49).

(f) There is no precedent of any such sacrifice under the law, in the Old Testament. The case of Isaac, before the law, is irrelevant; for Isaac was not sacrificed; and it was only proposed for a trial of Abraham's faith. No father, merely by his own authority, could put an offending, much less an innocent, child to death, upon any account, without the sentence of the magistrates (Deut. xxi:18-21), and the consent of the people, as in Jonathan's case.

(g) The Mishna, or traditional law of the Jews, is pointedly against it:—"If a Jew should devote his son or daughter, his man or maid servant, who are Hebrews, the devotement would be void; because no man can devote what is not his own, or of whose life he has not the absolute disposal."

(h) That Jephthah could not even have devoted his daughter to celibacy against her will, is evident from the history, and from the high estimation in which she was always held by the daughters of Israel, for her filial duty and her hapless fate, which they celebrated by a regular anniversary commemoration four days in the year (Judg. xi:40).

JEPHUNNEH (je-phún'neh), (Heb. יֵפֻנֵה, yef-oon-neh', nimble).

1. The companion of Joshua in his exploration of Canaan; father of Caleb the spy (Num. xiii:6; xiv:6, 30, 38; xxvi:65; xxxii:12; xxxiv:19; Deut. i:36; Josh. xiv:6, 13, 14; 1 Chron. iv:15; vi:56). (B. C. 1698.)

2. Eldest son of Jether, or Ithran, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii:38). (B. C. before 1017.)

JERAH (jē'rah), (Heb. יָרַח, yeh'rakh, month), fourth son of Joktan (1 Chron. i:20; Gen. x:26), the founder of an Arabian tribe who probably settled near Hazamaveth and Hadoram. (See JOKTAN.)

JERAHMEEL (je-rāh'me-el), (Heb. יְרַחְמֵאל, yer-akh-meh-ale', God will compassionate).

1. Grandson of Pharez, and great grandson of Judah. His descendants were called Jerahmeelites (1 Chron. ii:9, 26, 27, 33, 42). (B. C. before 1658.)

2. A Merarite Levite of the family of Kish, and representative of his tribe in the organization of the service by David (1 Chron. xxiv:29). (B. C. 1014.)

3. Son of Hammelech, one of the two appointed by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi:26). (B. C. 605.)

JERAHMEELITES (je-rāh'me-el-ites), (Heb. יְרַחְמֵאֵלִים, yer-akh-meh-ay-lee', patronym, from the above), a tribe descended from JERAHMEEL, 1 (1 Sam. xxvii:10; xxx:29).

JERED (jē'red), (Heb. יָרַד, yeh'red, descent, going down), (1 Chron. i:2). See JARED, 1; (1 Chron. iv:18). (See JARED, 2.)

JEREMAI (jēr'e-māi), (Heb. יֵרֵמַי, yer-ay-mah'ee, dweller on heights), a son of Hashum, who divorced his foreign wife after the exile in Babylon (Ezra x:33), B. C. 459.

JEREMIAH (jēr'e-mi'ah), (Heb. יֵרֵמְיָהוּ, yer-meh-yaw', Jah will rise).

1. A native of Libnah, the father of Hamutal, Josiah's wife, who was mother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii:31) and Zedekiah (xxiv:18; Jer. lii:1). (B. C. before 632.)

2. A Gadite warrior who joined David in the wilderness (1 Chron. xii:10). (B. C. 1061.)

3. Another man of Gad in David's army (1 Chron. xii:13). (B. C. before 1000.)

4. A Benjaminite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:4). (B. C. 1053.)

5. A chief of the trans-Jordanic half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. v:24). (B. C. 782.)

6. Son of Habaziah, and father of Jaazaniah, the Rechabite, whom the prophet tested with the proffer of wine (Jer. xxxv:3). (B. C. before 606.)

7. A priest, head of one of the courses of temple worship (Neh. xii:1, 34).

8. One of the trumpet players at the celebration of the newly repaired walls of Jerusalem. Apparently the same as the one who signed the covenant with Jeremiah (Neh. x:2), and perhaps identical with (7). (B. C. 446-410.)

9. Jeremiah the Prophet. Son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin (Jer. i:1). (See ANATHOTH.) Many have supposed that his father was the high-priest of the same name (2 Kings xxii:8), who found the book of the law in the eighteenth year of Josiah. This, however, seems improbable on several grounds—first, there is nothing in the writings of Jeremiah to lead us to think that his father was more than an ordinary priest ('Hilkiah [one] of the priests,' Jer. i:1); again, the name Hilkiah was common amongst the Jews (see 2 Kings xviii:18; 1 Chron. vi:45; xxvi:11; Neh. viii:4; Jer. xxix:3); and, lastly, his residence at Anathoth is evidence that he belonged to the line of Abiathar (1 Kings ii:26-35), who was deposed from the high-priest's office by Solomon; after which time the office appears to have remained in the line of Zadok.

(1) Early Life. Jeremiah was very young when the word of the Lord first came to him (ch. i:6). This event took place in the thirteenth year of Josiah (B. C. 629), whilst the youthful prophet still lived at Anathoth. It would seem that he remained in his native city several years, but at length, in order to escape the persecution of his fellow townsmen (ch. xi:21), and even of his own family (ch. xii:6), as well as to have a wider field for his exertions, he left Anathoth and took up his residence at Jerusalem.

(2) Ally of Josiah. The finding of the book of the law, five years after the commencement of his predictions, must have produced a powerful influence on the mind of Jeremiah, and king Josiah no doubt found him a powerful ally in carrying into effect the reformation of religious worship (2 Kings xxiii:1-25). During the reign of this monarch, we may readily believe that Jeremiah would be in no way molested in his work; and that from the time of his quitting Anathoth to the eighteenth year of his ministry, he probably uttered his warnings without interruption, though with little success (see ch. xi). Indeed, the reformation itself was nothing more than the forcible repression of idolatrous and heathen rites, and the re-establishment of the external service of God, by the command of the king. No sooner, therefore, was the influence of the court on behalf of the true religion withdrawn, than it was evident that no real improvement had taken place in the minds of the people. Jeremiah, who hitherto was at least protected by the influence of the pious king Josiah, soon became the object of attack, as he must doubtless have long been the object of dislike, to those whose interests were identified with the corruptions of religion.

(3) Relations to Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim. We hear nothing of the prophet during the three months which constituted the short reign of Jehoahaz; but 'in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim' the prophet was interrupted in his ministry by 'the priests and the prophets,' who with the populace brought him before the civil authorities, urging that capital punishment should be inflicted on him for his threatenings of evil on the city unless the people amended their ways (ch. xxvi). The princes seem to have been in some degree aware of the results which the general corruption was bringing on the state, and if they did not themselves yield to the exhortations of the prophet, they acknowledged that he spoke in the name of the Lord, and were quite averse from so openly renouncing His authority as to put His messenger to death. It appears, however, that it was rather owing to the personal influence of one or two, especially Ahikam, than to any general feeling favorable to Jeremiah, that his life was preserved; and it would seem that he was then either placed under restraint, or else was in so much danger from the animosity of his adversaries as to make it prudent for him not to appear in public. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B. C. 606) he was commanded to write the predictions which had been given through him, and to read them to the people. Because he was 'shut up,' and could not himself go into the house of the Lord (ch. xxxvi:5) he therefore deputed Baruch to write the predictions after him, and to read them publicly on the fast-day. These threatenings being thus anew made public, Baruch was summoned before the princes to give an account of the manner in which the roll containing them had come into his possession. The princes, who, without strength of principle to oppose the wickedness of the king, had sufficient respect for religion, as well as sagacity enough to discern the importance of listening to the voice of God's prophet, advised both Baruch and Jeremiah to conceal themselves, whilst they endeavored to influence the mind of the king by reading the roll to him. The result showed that their precautions were not needless. The bold self-will and reckless daring of the monarch refused to listen to any advice, even though coming with the professed sanction of the Most High. Having read three or four leaves 'he cut the roll with the penknife and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed,' and gave immediate orders for the apprehension of Jeremiah and Baruch, who, however, were both preserved from the vindictive monarch. Of the history of Jeremiah during the eight or nine remaining years of the reign of Jehoiakim we have no certain account. At the command of God he procured another roll, in which he wrote all that was in the roll destroyed by the king, 'and added besides unto them many like words' (ch. xxxvi:32).

(4) Relations to Jehoiachin. (B. C. 597.) In the short reign of his successor Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, we find him still uttering his voice of warning (see ch. xlii:18; comp. 2 Kings xxiv:12, and ch. xxii:24-30), though without effect.

(5) Relations to Zedekiah. It was probably either during this reign, or at the commencement of the reign of Zedekiah, that he was put in confinement by Pashur, the 'chief governor of the house of the Lord.' He seems, however, soon to have been liberated, as we find that 'they had not put him into prison' when the army of Nebuchadnezzar commenced the siege of Jerusalem. The Chaldeans drew off their army for a time, on the report of help coming from Egypt to the besieged city; and now feeling the danger to be imminent, and yet a ray of hope brightening their prospects, the king entreated Jeremiah to pray to the Lord for them. The hopes of the king were not responded to in the message which Jeremiah received from God. He was assured that the Egypttian army should return to their own land, that the Chaldeans should come again, and that they should take the city and burn it with fire (ch. xxxvii:7, 8). The princes, apparently irritated by a message so contrary to their wishes, made the departure of Jeremiah from the city, during the short respite, the pretext for accusing him of deserting to the Chaldeans, and he was forthwith cast into prison. The king seems to have been throughout inclined to favor the prophet, and sought to know from him the word of the Lord; but he was wholly under the influence of the princes, and dared not communicate with him except in secret (ch. xxxviii:14, 28); much less could he follow advice so obnoxious to their views as that which the prophet gave. Jeremiah, therefore, more from the hostility of the princes than the inclination of the king, was still in confinement when the city was taken.

(6) Relations to Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar formed a more just estimate of his character and of the value of his counsels, and gave a special charge to his captain Nebuzardan, not only to provide for him but to follow his advice (ch. xxxix:12). He was accordingly taken from the prison and allowed free choice either to go to Babylon, where doubtless he would have been held in honor in the royal court, or to remain with his own people. We need scarcely be told that he who had devoted more than forty years of unrequited service to the welfare of his fallen country, should choose to remain with the remnant of his people rather than seek the precarious fame which might await him at the court of the king of Babylon. Accordingly he went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, whom the Babylonian monarch had appointed governor of Judea; and after his murder, sought to persuade Johanan, who was then the recognized leader of the people, to remain in the land, assuring him and the people, by a message from God in answer to their inquiries, that if they did so the Lord would build them up, but if they went to Egypt the evils which they sought to escape should come upon them there (ch. xlii). The people refused to attend to the Divine message, and under the command of Johanan went into Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch along with them (ch. xliii:6). In Egypt the prophet still sought to turn the people to the Lord, from whom they had so long and so deeply revolted (ch. xlv); but his writings give us no subsequent information respecting his personal history.

(7) Traditions. Ancient traditions assert that he spent the remainder of his life in Egypt. According to the pseudo-Epiphanius he was stoned by the people at Taphnæ (the same as Tahpanhes), where the Jews were settled (De Vitis Prophet. t. ii. p. 239, quoted by Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus V. T. t. i. p. 1110). It is said that his bones were removed by Alexander the Great to Alexandria (Carpov, Introd. part iii, p. 138, where other traditions respecting him will be found).

(8) Character. Jeremiah was contemporary with Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Ezekiel, and Daniel. None of these, however, are in any remarkable way connected with him, except Ezekiel. The writings and character of these two eminent prophets furnish many very interesting points both of comparison and contrast. Both, during a long series of years, were laboring at the same time and for the same object. The representations of both, far separated as they were from each other, are in substance singularly accordant; yet there is at the same time a marked difference in their modes of statement, and a still more striking diversity in the character and natural disposition of the two. No one who compares them can fail to perceive that the mind of Jeremiah was of a softer and more delicate texture than that of his illustrious contemporary. His whole history convinces us that he was by nature mild and retiring (Ewald, Propheten des Alt. Bund. p. 2), highly susceptible and sensitive, especially to sorrowful emotions, and rather inclined, as we should imagine, to shrink from danger than to brave it. Yet, with this acute perception of injury, and natural repugnance from being 'a man of strife,' he never in the least degree shrinks from publicity; nor is he at all intimidated by reproach or insult, or even by actual punishment and threatened death, when he has the message of God to deliver. He is, in truth, as remarkable an instance, though in a different way, of the overpowering influence of the Divine energy, as Ezekiel. The one presents the spectacle of the power of Divine inspiration acting on a mind naturally of the firmest texture, and at once subduing to itself every element of the soul; whilst the other furnishes an example, not less memorable, of moral courage sustained by the same Divine inspiration against the constantly opposing influence of a love of retirement and strong susceptibility to impressions of outward evil. Poets*, Boston, 1866; and others). (See JEREMIAH, BOOK OF: LAMENTATIONS.) F. W. G.

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF

1. Difficulties and Diversities. Much difficulty has arisen in reference to the writings of Jeremiah from the apparent disorder in which they stand in our present copies, and from the many disagreements between the Hebrew text and that found in the Septuagint version; and many conjectures have been hazarded respecting the occasion of this disorder. The following are the principal diversities between the two texts:

(1) The prophecies against foreign nations, which in the Hebrew occupy chapters xlvii-li at the close of the book, are in the Greek placed after ch. xxv:14, forming chapters xxvi-xxxi; the remainder of ch. xxv of the Hebrew is ch. xxxii of the Septuagint. The following chapters proceed in the same order in both, chapters xlv and xlv of the Hebrew forming ch. li of the Septuagint; and the historical appendix, ch. lii, is placed at the close in both.

(2) The prophecies against the heathen nations stand in a different order in the two editions, as is shown in the following table:

Hebrew.	Sept.
Egypt.	Elam.
Philistines.	Egypt.
Moab.	Babylon.
Ammon.	Philistines.
Edom.	Edom.
Damascus.	Ammon.
Kedar.	Kedar.
Elam.	Damascus.
Babylon.	Moab.

(3) Various passages which exist in the Hebrew are not found in the Greek copies (e. g. ch. xxvii: 19-22; xxxiii:14-26; xxxix:4-14; xlviii:45-47). Besides these discrepancies, there are numerous omissions and frequent variations of single words and phrases. To explain these diversities recourse has been had to the hypothesis of a double recension, an hypothesis which, with various modifications, is held by most modern critics.

2. Genuineness of Writings. The genuineness and canonicity of the writings of Jeremiah in general are established both by the testimony of ancient writers and by quotations and references which occur in the New Testament (2 Macc. ii:1-8; Philo. vol. i. p. 95; Josephus Antiq. lib. x:5,1; Matt. ii:17; Matt. xvi:14; Heb. viii:8, 12).

(1) The text in Matt. xxvii:9 has occasioned considerable difficulty, because the passage there quoted is not found in the extant writings of the prophet. Jerome affirms that he found the exact passage in a Hebrew apocryphal book (Fabricius, Cod. Pseudep. i. 1103); but there is no proof that that book was in existence before the time of Christ. It is probable that the passage intended by Matthew is Zech. xi:12, 13, which in part corresponds with the quotation he gives, and that the name is a gloss which has found its way into the text (see Olshausen, Comment upon New Testament.)

(2) The genuineness of some portions of the book has been of late disputed by the critics of the so-called advance school. Movers, whose views have been adopted by De Wette and Hitzig, attributes ch. x:1-16, and cc. xxx, xxxi, and xxxiii to the author of the concluding portion of the book of Isaiah. His fundamental argument against the last-named portion is, that the prophet Zechariah (ch. viii:7, 8) quotes from Jer. xxxi:7, 8, 33, and in ver. 9 speaks of the author as one who lived 'in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord of hosts was laid.' He must, therefore, have been contemporary with Zechariah himself. This view obliges him, of course, to consider ch. xxx:1, with which he joins the three following verses, as a later addition. By an elaborate comparison of the peculiarities of style he endeavors to show that the author of these chapters was the so-called pseudo-Isaiah. He acknowledges, however, that there are many expressions peculiar to Jeremiah, and supposes that it was in consequence of these that the prediction was placed among his writings. These similarities he accounts for by assuming that the later unknown prophet accommodated the writings of the earlier to his own use.

(3) Every one will see how slight is the external ground on which Movers' argument rests; for there is nothing in verses 7, 8, of Zechariah to prove that it is intended to be a quotation from any written prophecy, much less from this portion of Jeremiah. The quotation, if it be such, is made up by joining together phrases of frequent recurrence in the prophets picked out from amongst many others. Then, again, the mention of prophets is evidence that Zechariah was not referring to the writings of one individual; and, lastly, the necessity of rejecting the exordium, without any positive ground for suspecting its integrity, is a strong argument against the position of Movers. Hitzig (Jeremia, p. 230) is induced, by the force of these considerations, to give up the external evidence on which Movers had relied. The internal evidence arising from the examination of particular words and phrases—a species of proof which, when standing alone, is always to be received with great caution—is rendered of still less weight by the evidence of an opposite kind.

Ewald, who is by no means accustomed to acquiesce in received opinions as such, agrees that the chapters in question, as well as the other passage mentioned ch. x:1-16, are the work of Jeremiah. The authenticity of this latter portion is denied solely on internal grounds, and the remarks we have already made will, in substance, apply also to these verses. It seems, however, not improbable that the Chaldee of ver. 11 is a gloss which has crept into the text—both because it is (apparently without reason) in another language, and because it seems to interrupt the progress of thought. The predictions against Babylon in chaps. l and li are objected to by Movers, De Wette, and others, on the ground that they contain many interpolations. Ewald attributes them to some unknown prophet who imitated the style of Jeremiah. Their authenticity is maintained by many critics of acknowledged weight of opinion. The last chapter is generally regarded as an appendix added by some later author. It is almost verbally the same as the account in 2 Kings xxiv:18; xxv:30, and it carries the history down to a later period probably than that of the death of Jeremiah; that it is not his work seems to be indicated in the last verse of ch. li.

3. Disorder of Prophecies. (1) Blayney and Eichhorn. It is impossible, within the limits assigned to this article, even to notice all the attempts which have been made to account for the apparent disorder of Jeremiah's prophecies. Blayney speaks of their present disposition as a 'preposterous jumbling together of the prophecies of the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah,' and concludes that 'the original order has, most probably, by some accident or other been disturbed' (Notes p. 3). Eichhorn says that no other explanation can be given than that the prophet wrote his oracles on single rolls, larger or smaller as they came to his hand, and that, as he was desirous to give his countrymen a copy of them when they went into captivity, he dictated them to an amanuensis from the separate rolls, without attending to the order of time, and then preserved the rolls in the same order (Einl. iii, 134). Later critics have attempted in different ways to trace some plan in the present arrangement. Thus Movers supposes the whole collection to have consisted of six books—the longest being that written by Baruch (Jer. xxxvi:2, 32), which was taken by the collector as his foundation, into which he inserted the other books in such places as seemed, on a very slight glance at their contents, to be suitable. All such theories, however, proceed on the presumption that the present arrangement is the work of a compiler, which, therefore, we are at liberty to alter at pleasure; and though they offer boundless scope for ingenuity in suggesting a better arrangement, they serve us very little in respect to the explanation of the book itself.

(2) Ewald. Ewald adopts another principle, which, if it be found valid, cannot fail to throw much light on the connection and meaning of the predictions. He maintains that the book, in its present form, is, from ch. i to ch. xlix, substantially the same as it came from the hand of the prophet, or his amanuensis, and seeks to discover in the present arrangement some plan according to which it is disposed. He finds that various portions are prefaced by the same formula, 'The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord' (vii:1; xi:1; xviii:1; xxi:1; xxv:1; xxx:1; xxxii:1; xxxiv:1, 8; xxxv:1; xl:1; xlv:1); or by the very similar expression, 'The word of the Lord which came to Jeremiah' (xiv:1; xlv:1; xlvii:1; xlix:34). The notices of time distinctly mark some other divisions which are more or less historical (xxvi:1; xxvii:1; xxxvi:1; xxxvii:2). Two other portions are in themselves sufficiently distinct without such indication (xxix:1; xlv:1), while the general introduction to the book serves for the section contained in ch. i. There are left two sections (chaps. ii, iii), the former of which has only the shorter introduction, which generally designates the commencement of a strophe; while the latter, as it now stands, seems to be imperfect, having as an introduction merely the word 'saying.' Thus the book is divided into twenty-three separate and independent sections, which, in the poetical parts, are again divided into strophes of from seven to nine verses, frequently distinguished by such a phrase as 'The Lord said also unto me.'

4. Divisions of the Book. These separate sections are arranged by Ewald so as to form five distinct books: I. The introduction, ch. i. II. Reproofs of the sins of the Jews, cc. ii-xxiv, consisting of seven sections, viz.: (1) ch. ii; (2) cc. iii-vi; (3) cc. vii-x; (4) cc. xi-xiii; (5) cc. xiv-xvii:18; (6) cc. xvii:19-xx; (7) cc. xxi-xxiv. III. A general review of all nations, the heathen as well as the people of Israel, consisting of two sections: (1) cc. xli-xlix (which he thinks have been transposed); (2) ch. xxv. And an historical appendix of three sections: (a) ch. xxvi; (b) ch. xxvii; and (c) cc. xxviii, xxix. IV. Two sections picturing the hopes of brighter times: (1) cc. xxx, xxxi; and (2) cc. xxxii, xxxiii, to which, as in the last book, is added an historical appendix in three sections: (a) ch. xxxiv:1-7; (b) ch. xxxiv:8-22; (c) ch. xxxv. V. The conclusion, in two sections: (1) ch. xxxvi; (2) ch. xlv. All this, he supposes, was arranged in Palestine, during the short interval of rest between the taking of the city and the departure of Jeremiah with the remnant of the Jews, to Egypt. In Egypt, after some interval, Jeremiah added three sections, viz.: cc. xxxvii, xxxix, xl-xliii and xlv. At the same time, probably, he added ch. xlvi:13-26 to the previous prophecy respecting Egypt, and, perhaps, made some additions to other parts previously written. VI. The principal predictions relating to the Messiah are found in ch. xxiii:1-8; xxx:1-40; xxxiii:14-26. This arrangement is probably preferable, all things considered.

5. Style. The style of Jeremiah corresponds with the view of the character of his mind; though not deficient in power it is peculiarly marked by pathos. He delights in the expression of the tender emotions, and employs all the resources of his imagination to excite corresponding feelings in his readers. He has an irresistible sympathy with the miserable, which finds utterance in the most touching descriptions of their condition. He seizes with wonderful tact those circumstances which point out the objects of his pity as the objects of sympathy, and finds his expostulations on the miseries which are thus exhibited. His book of Lamentations is an astonishing exhibition of his power to accumulate images of sorrow. The whole series of elegies has but one object—the expression of sorrow for the forlorn condition of his country; and yet he presents this to us in so many lights, alludes to it by so many figures, that not only are his mournful strains not felt to be tedious reiterations, but the reader is captivated by the plaintive melancholy which pervades the whole. JEREMIAS (jëre-mi'as), (Gr. Ἱερεμίας, hee-er-eh-wee'as), the Greek form of the name of Jeremiah the prophet, used in the A. V. of Eccles. xlix:6; 2 Macc. xvi:14; Matt. xvi:14. (See JEREMIAH; JEREMY.)

JEREMOTH (jër'e-möth), (Heb. יְרֵמוֹתַי, yer-ay-moth'tai, heights).

1. The last mentioned of the sons of Mushi (1 Chron. xxiii:23). The name is JERIMOTH (see JERIMOTH, 4). (1 Chron. xxiv:30.) B. C. after 1856.

2. A Levite who had charge of the fifteenth division of the temple musicians as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxv:22); probably the same as JERIMOTH, 5. (B. C. 1014.)

3. A Benjamite, "son" of Beriah (1 Chron. viii:14). (B. C. about 588.) Probably the same as JEROSHAM, 2 (ver. 27).

4. One of the "sons" of Elam who divorced his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra x:26). (B. C. 459.)

5. A "son" of Zattu who also put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra x:27). (B. C. 459.)

6. (Ezra x:29). (See RAMOTH.)

JERIAH (je-ri'ah), (Heb. יְרִיָּהוּ, yer-ee-yaw', Jah will throw), a Kohathite Levite, the first in rank of the sons of Hebron in the priestly arrangement made by David (1 Chron. xxiii:19; xxiv:23); elsewhere JERIJAH (1 Chron. xxvi:31), B. C. 1014.

JERIBAI (jër'i-bāi), (Heb. יְרִבְיָהוּ, yer-eeb-ah'ee, contentious), the second named of the sons of Elnaam, and one of David's body-guard (1 Chron. xi:46), B. C. after 1000.

JERICO (jër'i-kō), (Heb. יְרִיְכֹ, yer-ee-kho', fragrant).

A town in the plain of the same name, not far from the river Jordan, at the point where it enters the Dead Sea. It lay before the Israelites when they crossed the river, on first entering the Promised Land; and the account which the spies who were sent by them into the city received from their hostess Rahab, tended much to encourage their subsequent operations, as it showed that the inhabitants of the country were greatly alarmed at their advance, and the signal miracles which had marked their course from the Nile to the Jordan. The strange manner in which Jericho itself was taken must have strengthened this impression in the country, and appears, indeed, to have been designed for that effect.

(1) Destroyed. The town was utterly destroyed by the Israelites, who pronounced an awful curse upon whoever should rebuild it; and all the inhabitants were put to the sword, except Rahab and her family (Josh. vi:25).

In these accounts Jericho is repeatedly called 'the city of palm-trees'; which shows that the hot and dry plain, so similar to the land of Egypt, was noted beyond other parts of Palestine for the tree which abounds in that country, but which was and is less common in the land of Canaan than general readers and painters suppose. It has now almost disappeared even from the plain of Jericho, although specimens remain in the plain of the Mediterranean coast.

(2) Rebuilt. Notwithstanding the curse, Jericho was soon rebuilt (see HIEL), and became a school of the prophets (1 Kings xvi:34; 2 Kings ii:4, 5). Its inhabitants returned after the exile, and it was eventually fortified by the Syrian general Bacchides (Ezra ii:34; Neh. iii:2; 1 Macc. ix:50). Pompey marched from Scythopolis, along the valley of the Jordan, to Jericho, and thence to Jerusalem; and Strabo speaks of the castles Thrax and Taurus, in or near Jericho, as having been destroyed by him (Joseph. Antiq. xiv: 4, 1; Strabo, xvi:2, 40).

(3) Varied History. Herod the Great, in the beginning of his career, captured and sacked Jericho, but afterwards strengthened and adorned it, when he had redeemed its revenues from Cleopatra, on whom the plain had been bestowed by Antony (Joseph. Antiq. xv:4, 1, 2).

He appears to have often resided here, probably in winter; he built over the city a fortress called Cypros, between which and the former palace he erected other palaces, and called them by the the word of the Lord which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun" (1 Kings xvi:34).

Previous to this, however, and almost immediately after the death of Joshua, reference is made to the city of palm-trees, which was captured by Eglon, king of Moab (Judg. iii:13), and it was nearly 100 years before the rebuilding by Hiel that David's ambassadors, who had been so grievously insulted by the king of Ammon, were directed "to tarry at Jericho until their beards were grown" (2 Sam. x:5).

We are to infer, from these several statements, that Jericho was rebuilt soon after its destruction by Joshua, but not upon its ancient foundations—a change by which the penalty was avoided.

Jericho.

names of his friends (Joseph. Antiq. xvi:5, 2; De Bell. Jud. i. 21, 4, 9). Here also was a hippodrome or circus, in which the same tyrant, when lying at Jericho on his death-bed, caused the nobles of the land to be shut up, for massacre after his death. He died here; but his bloody intention was not executed (Joseph. Antiq. xvii: 6, 5; De Bell. Jud. i. 33, 6-8). The palace at this place was afterwards rebuilt more magnificently by Archelaus (Antiq. xvii:31).

(4) Site Changed. In order to render the several notices of Jericho contained in the Bible consistent with each other, and with the description in Josephus, it seems necessary to suppose more than one change of situation. Joshua "burned the city with fire, and all that was therein," and said, "Cursed be the man before the Lord that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho; he shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates thereof" (Josh. vi:26). It was about 520 years after this, in the impious reign of Ahab, that Hiel rebuilt the city, and suffered the fearful penalty that had been denounced against such an act of daring impiety. "He laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to

The malediction had probably fallen into oblivion, or, if remembered, was likely to be treated with contempt in the infidel and idolatrous age when Hiel restored the original city. It was, according to the common chronology, about thirty years subsequent to this restoration that Elisha healed the fountain from which the city derived its supply of water. It is probable that the accursed site had been again abandoned, upon the catastrophe that followed the impious attempt of Hiel, for the existing city seems to have been at some distance from "the spring of the waters," which produced sterility and disease (2 Kings ii:21). It may have occupied, at the era of Elisha's miracle, the same site as it did when visited by our Savior, and described by Josephus.

(5) In the Time of Christ. By this it will be seen that the Jericho which existed in the time of our Savior was a great and important city—probably more so than it had ever been since its foundation. It was once visited by him, when he lodged with Zaccheus, and healed the blind man (Luke xviii:35-43; xix:1, 7; Matt xx:29-34; Mark x:46-52).

(6) Subsequent History. Jericho was afterwards made the head of one of the toparchies, and was visited by Vespasian before he left the country, who stationed there the tenth legion in garrison (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iii. 3, 5; iv:8, 1; v:2, 3). Eusebius and Jerome describe Jericho as having been destroyed during the siege of Jerusalem, on account of the perfidy of the inhabitants, but add that it was afterwards rebuilt. The town, however, appears to have been overthrown during the Mohammedan conquest; for Adamnanus, at the close of the seventh century, describes the site as without human habitations, and covered with corn and vines. The celebrated palm-groves still existed. In the next century a church is mentioned; and in the ninth century several monasteries appear. About the same time the plain of Jericho is again noticed for its fertility and peculiar products; and it appears to have been brought under cultivation by the Saracens, for the sake of the sugar and other products for which the soil and climate were more suitable than any other in Palestine. Ruins of extensive aqueducts, with pointed Saracenic arches, remain in evidence of the elaborate irrigation and culture of this fine plain—which is nothing without water, and everything with it—at a period long subsequent to the occupation of the country by the Jews. It is to this age that we may probably refer the origin of the castle and village, which have since been regarded as representing Jericho. The place has been mentioned by travelers and pilgrims down to the present time as a poor hamlet consisting of a few houses. In the fifteenth century the square castle or tower began to pass among pilgrims as the house of Zaccheus, a title which it bears to the present day.

(7) Modern Jericho. The village that now represents the ancient Jericho bears the name of Rihah, and is supposed to date from the ninth century. It is situated about the middle of the plain, six miles west from the Jordan, in N. lat. 31° 57', and E. long. 35° 33'. Dr. Olin describes the present village as 'the meanest and foulest of Palestine.' It may perhaps contain forty dwellings, formed of small loose stones. The most important object is the castle or tower already mentioned, which Dr. Robinson supposes to have been constructed to protect the cultivation of the plain under the Saracens. It is thirty or forty feet square, and about the same height, and is now in a dilapidated condition.

Rihah may contain about two hundred inhabitants, who have a sickly aspect, and are reckoned vicious and indolent. They keep a few cattle and sheep, and till a little land for grain as well as for gardens. A small degree of industry and skill bestowed on this prolific soil, favored as it is with abundant water for irrigation, would amply reward the labor. But this is wanting; and everything bears the mark of abject, and, which is unusual in the East, of squalid poverty. There are some fine fig-trees near the village, and some vines in the gardens. But the most distinguishing feature of the whole plain is a noble grove of trees which borders the village on the west, and stretches away northward to the distance of two miles or more.

This grove owes its existence to the waters of one of the fountains, the careful distribution of which over the plain by canals and aqueducts did once, and might still, cover it with abundance. One of these fountains is called by the natives Ain es-Sultan, but by pilgrims the Fountain of Elias, being supposed to be the same whose bitter waters were cured by that prophet. Dr. Robinson thinks there is reason for this conclusion. It lies almost two miles N.W. from the village, and bursts forth at the foot of a high double mound, situated a mile or more in front of the mountain Quarantana. It is a large and beautiful fountain of sweet and pleasant water. Beyond the fountain rises up the bold perpendicular face of the mountain Quarantana (Kuruntul), from the foot of which a line of low hills runs out N.N.E. in front of the mountains, and forms the ascent to a narrow tract of table-land along their base. On this tract, at the foot of the mountains, about two and a half miles N. N.W. from the Ain es-Sultan, is the still larger fountain of Duk, the waters of which are brought along the base of Quarantana in a canal to the top of the declivity at the back of Ain es-Sultan, whence they were formerly distributed to several mills, and scattered over the upper part of the plain (Robinson's Bib. Researches, ii. 284, 285).

Bishop S. M. Merrill writes of a ride from the ford of the Jordan westward thus: "The fruitful plain that so long ago flourished as the garden of the Lord was a desert. Dry, sandy, and scorched, it is worn out and blighted; and yet it looks as if, with irrigation, it might be easily redeemed to productiveness. The village of Jericho is a cluster of mud houses, with every appearance of poverty and discomfort. The remains of old aqueducts and ruins of buildings indicate that a city of some proportions was once here. It stood close to the mountain range, in fact touched the foot of the mountain. High above the other summits, some three miles away, is the place where Jesus was tempted, and is called the Mount of Temptation, where he fasted forty days and forty nights, tempted of the devil. We left Jericho early in the morning to go up to Jerusalem, probably by the way that was traveled two thousand years ago. We passed the brook Cherith, where Elijah was fed by the ravens when hiding from the wrath of Ahab. On the high ground, above the plain, we struck the old Roman road, with the broad, flat paving stones still covering its bed for quite a distance. Further up, we came to the ruins of an old khan, or caravansary, which is said to be the only spot where an 'inn' ever stood between Jerusalem and Jericho, and therefore, it is the reputed site of the inn to which the good Samaritan took the wounded man who had fallen among thieves in this neighborhood, as related in the Lord's parable. This region has always been famous for robbers.

"After passing the place where Shimei cursed and threw stones at David, when the king was fleeing from the rebellion of Absalom, we arrived at one of the most inviting spots for a rest in all the journey. It is called the Fountain of the Disciples, or Apostles' Fountain. Tradition says it was a favorite stopping place with Christ and his disciples, and it is not difficult to accept the statement; for one can scarcely imagine that a company of weary travelers could come to such a fountain as is here and not be delighted and refreshed. We tarried at this fountain for an hour or two, and after lunch took up our march to Bethany. The hill to ascend after leaving the fountain was a very high one. It was fatiguing to our horses, and we could but feel that to footmen making this journey it would be exhausting indeed. Along these side hills were numerous flocks of sheep and goats, with persons following or watching them quite after the style of the ancients. Almost everything in sight appeared to illustrate some Scriptural allusion or incident." The feet of Jesus must have often been weary as he trod these rugged paths on his missions of mercy to mankind.

JERIEL (jē'ri-el), (Heb. יֵרִיֵאל, yer-ee-ale', founded by God), son of Tola; one of the six heads of the tribe of Issachar during David's time (1 Chron. vii:2), B. C. after 1856.

JERIJAH (je-ri'jah), (Heb. יֵרִיָּהוּ, yer-ee-yaw', founded by Jehovah), (1 Chron. xxvi:31). See JERIAH.

JERIMOTH (jēr'i-mōth), (Heb. יֵרִימוֹת, yer-ee-mohth', heights).

1. A son of Bela, and a valiant chief of the Benjamites (1 Chron. vii:7). (B. C. after 1856.)

2. One of the Benjamite archers and slingers with David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:5). (B. C. 1055.)

3. Son of Becher, head of a Benjamite house (1 Chron. vii:8). (B. C. 1017.)

4. Head of Merarites during census taken by David (1 Chron. xxiv:30). (See JEREMOTH, 1.)

5. One of the sons of Heman and head of the fifteenth course among the musicians in David's reign (1 Chron. xxv:4, 22). (See JEREMOTH, 2.)

6. Son of Azriel, and captain of the tribe of Naphtali under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii:19). (B. C. 1014.)

7. Son of King David, whose daughter Mahalath was the first wife of Rehoboam, her cousin Abihail being the other (2 Chron. xi:18). (B. C. before 974.) He is not named in the list of David's children (1 Chron. ch. iii, or xiv:4-7), and it is probable that he was the son of a concubine, and such is the Jewish tradition. The passage, 2 Chron. xi:18, is not quite clear, since the word "daughter" is a correction of the Keri; the original text had bāne, בָּנֵי, i. e., "son." (Smith, Bib. Dict.)

8. A Levite, one of the overseers of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:13).

JERIOTH (jē'ri-ōth), (Heb. יֵרִיעוֹת, yer-ee-ohth', curtains or timidity), according to the A. V. the second wife of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii:18). B. C. after 1856. This seems to be contrary to the Hebrew text, and Jerioth was probably Caleb's daughter.

JEROBOAM (jēr'o-bō'am), (Heb. יָרוּבָאִם, yaw-rob-awm', people will contend).

1. The first king of Israel. He was of the tribe of Ephraim, the son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, by a woman named Zeruiah (1 Kings xi:26).

(1) Noticed by Solomon. He was noticed by Solomon as a very highly gifted and active young man, and was appointed one of the superintendents of the works which that magnificent king was carrying on at Jerusalem (1 Kings xi:28). (B. C. 960.) This appointment, the reward of his merits, might have satisfied his ambition had not the declaration of the prophet Ahijah given him higher hopes.

(2) Future Kingship Foretold. When informed that, by the divine appointment, he was to become king over the ten tribes about to be rent from the house of David, he was not content to wait patiently for the death of Solomon.

(3) Flight Into Egypt. He began to form plots and conspiracies, the discovery of which constrained him to flee to Egypt to escape condign punishment. King Shishak was but too ready to encourage one whose success must necessarily weaken the kingdom which had become great and formidable under David and Solomon, and which had already pushed its frontier to the Red Sea (1 Kings xi:40).

(4) Revolt of the Ten Tribes. When Solomon died (ver. 40) B. C. 934, the ten tribes sent to call Jeroboam from Egypt; and he appears to have headed the deputation which came before the son of Solomon with a demand of new securities for the rights which the measures of the late king had compromised. It may somewhat excuse the harsh answer of Rehoboam, that the demand was urged by a body of men headed by one whose pretensions were so well known and so odious to the house of David.

(5) King of Israel. The imprudent answer of Rehoboam rendered a revolution inevitable, and Jeroboam was then called to reign over the ten tribes, by the style of 'King of Israel' (1 Kings xii:1-20). The general course of his conduct on the throne has already been indicated in the article ISRAEL, and need not be repeated in this place. The leading object of his policy was to widen the breach between the two kingdoms, and to rend asunder those common interests among all the descendants of Jacob which it was one great object of the Law to combine and interlace.

(6) Golden Calves. To this end he scrupled not to sacrifice the most sacred and inviolable interests and obligations of the covenant people, by forbidding his subjects to resort to the one temple and altar of Jehovah at Jerusalem, and by establishing shrines at Dan and Bethel—the extremities of his kingdom—where 'golden calves' were set up as the symbols of Jehovah (1 Kings xii:26, 28), to which the people were enjoined to resort and bring their offerings.

(7) Acting as Priest. The pontificate of the new establishment he united to his crown, in imitation of the Egyptian kings. He was officiating in that capacity at Bethel, offering incense, when a prophet appeared, and in the name of the Lord announced a coming time, as yet far off, in which a king of the house of David, Josiah by name, should burn upon that unholy altar the bones of its ministers.

(8) Smitten with Palsy. He was then preparing to verify, by a commissioned prodigy, the truth of the oracle he had delivered, when the king attempted to arrest him, but was smitten with palsy in the arm he stretched forth. Later, in answer to prayer, it was healed (1 Kings xiii:1-10). At the same moment the threatened prodigy took place, the altar was rent asunder, and the ashes strewed far around. This measure had, however, no abiding effect. The policy on which he acted lay too deep in what he deemed the vital interests of his separate kingdom, to be even thus abandoned; and the force of the considerations which determined his conduct may in part be appreciated from the fact that no subsequent king of Israel, however well disposed in other respects, ever ventured to lay a finger on this schismatical establishment. Hence 'the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he sinned and made Israel to sin,' became a standing phrase in describing that iniquity from which no king of Israel departed (1 Kings xii:25-33; xiii).

(9) Extinction of the Dynasty. The contumacy of Jeroboam eventually brought upon him the doom which he probably dreaded beyond all others—the speedy extinction of the dynasty which he had taken so much pains and incurred so much guilt to establish on firm foundations.

(10) His Wife Disguised. His son Abijah being sick, he sent his wife disguised to consult the prophet Ahijah, who had predicted that he should be king of Israel. The prophet, although he had become blind with age, knew the queen, and saluted her with—"Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam, for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings." These were not merely that the son should die—for that was intended in mercy to one who alone, of all the house of Jeroboam, had remained faithful to his God, and was the only one who should obtain an honored grave—but that his race should be violently and utterly extinguished: "I will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone" (1 Kings xiv:1-18).

(11) Death of the Son and Father. The son died so soon as the mother crossed the threshold on her return; and as the death of Jeroboam himself is the next event recorded, it would seem that he did not long survive his son. He died about 913 B. C. (1 Kings xiv:20).

(12) Character. Jeroboam was perhaps a less remarkable man in character and ability than the circumstance of his being the founder of a new kingdom might lead us to expect. The tribes would have revolted without him; and he was chosen king merely because he had been pointed out by previous circumstances. His government exhibits but one idea—that of raising a barrier against the reunion of the tribes. Of this idea he was the slave and victim; and although the barrier which he raised was effectual for its purpose, it only served to show the weakness of the man who could deem needful the protection for his separate interests which such a barrier offered.

2. Fourteenth king of Israel, son of Joash, whom (B. C. 783) he succeeded on the throne, and reigned forty-one years. He followed the example of the first Jeroboam in keeping up the idolatry of the golden calves. Nevertheless the Lord had pity upon Israel; the time of its ruin was not yet come, and this reign was long and flourishing. Jeroboam brought to a successful result the wars which his father had undertaken, and was always victorious over the powerful Syrians. He even took their chief cities of Damascus (2 Kings xiv:28; Amos i:3-5) and Hamath, which had formerly been subject to the scepter of David, and restored to the realm of Israel the ancient eastern limits from Lebanon to the Dead Sea. He died B. C. 742 (2 Kings xiv:16, 23-29).

The Scriptural account of this reign is too short to enable us to judge of the character of a prince under whom the kingdom of Israel seems to have reached a degree of prosperity which it had never before enjoyed, and was not able long to preserve. Jonah (2 Kings xiv:25) and Amos prophesied in the reign of Jeroboam II (Amos i:1). Amos draws a melancholy picture of the moral and religious state of Israel at the time (ii:6; v:27; viii:4-6, etc.), for which he predicts judgment from God (vii:1-9; viii:7-10). For these prophecies a complaint was made against him to Jeroboam by Amaziah the priest at Bethel, but it does not seem to have brought any penalty on the prophet (vii:10-17). Hosea also began his prophetic work in the northern kingdom during the lifetime of Jeroboam. The first three chapters pertain to that period. On the death of Jeroboam, his son Zechariah ascended the throne (2 Kings xiv:29).

JEROHAM (jēr'o'hām), (Heb. יֵרוֹחַם, yer-ohawm', compassionate).

1. Son of Elihu (Eliab, Eliel), and grandfather of Samuel (1 Sam. i:1; 1 Chron. vi:27, 34). (B. C. before 1142.)

2. One of the leaders of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii:27). (B. C. probably before 588.) Apparently the same as 3.

3. Father of Ibneiah, which latter was a Benjamite chief in Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix:8). (B. C. apparently before 536.)

4. Son of Pashur, a descendant of Aaron, of the house of Immer (1 Chron. ix:12). (B. C. before 536.)

5. Son of Pelaliah, and father of the priest Adaiah, who resided in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi:12). (B. C. before 440.) Perhaps he is identical with 4.

6. A resident of Gedor, father of two Benjamite archers who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii:7). (B. C. before 1055.)

7. The father of Azareel who was head of the tribe of Dan in the time of David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii:22). (B. C. before 1017.)

8. Azariah's father; the latter was one of the two of that name who planned with Jehoiada to restore Joash to the throne (2 Chron. xxiii:1). (B. C. before 76.)

JERUBBAAL (je-rüb'ba-äl), (Heb. יֵרֻבְבָאֵל, yer-ooob-bah'al, Baal will contend), Gideon's surname, after he had destroyed Baal's grove, and his father had said it was Baal's business to avenge it (Judg. vi:31, 32; vii:1; viii:29, 35; ix:1, 2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57; 1 Sam. xii:11). (See GIDEON.)

JERUBBESHETH (je-rüb'be-shëth), (Heb. יֵרֻבְבֶשֶׁת, yer-ooob-beh'sheth, contender with shame, i. e., idol).

A name of Gideon (2 Sam. xi:21), given, doubtless, in later times to avoid the necessity of pronouncing the name of a false god (Exod. xxiii:13). Gideon had acquired the name Jerubbaal, "Baal will contend," through his abomination of the worship of Baal.

JERUEL (je-ru'el), (Heb. יְרוּאֵל, yer-oo-ale', founded of God).

A wilderness west of the Dead Sea, and south of Judah, where Jehoshaphat obtained a great victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, etc. It was called the valley of Berachah, or blessing; and lay between Engedi and Tekoah (2 Chron. xx:16; compare ver. 26). It corresponds in situation to el Hasasah, a tract sloping from Tekoa to Ain-Jidy (Robinson, Researches, ii. 212).

JERUSALEM (je-ru'sa-lëm), (Heb. יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, yer-oo-shaw-lame', founded peaceful).

Jerusalem has been the theme for song and story from the earliest ages. "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great king" (Ps. cxlviii:2). "Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together" (Ps. cxxii:3).

1. Names. In the time of Abraham it was called Salem (Gen. xiv:18), but when it fell into the hands of the Jebusites, they called it Jebus; then the two words were united into one, Jerusalem, or "habitation of peace." It is first mentioned as such in Joshua x:1. The Psalmist says (lxxvi:2): "In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion." After the death of Joshua the tribes of Judah and of Simeon fought against the Canaanites, and captured and burned the city of Jerusalem (Judg. i:1-8). Again, we learn that the "children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem" (Judg.

i:21). This statement has reference, doubtless, to the lower city, and not to what was afterwards called Mount Zion. The latter was conquered by David when he led his forces from Hebron to the conquest, and after this brilliant assault it was called the "City of David." This latter name, during the reign of the Maccabees, was sometimes applied to the whole city, but gradually shifted back to the spot still known as Mount Zion, and mentioned so many times in Scripture. In Ezekiel xvi:3; it is written: "Thus saith the Lord God unto Jerusalem; thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite"—and, indeed, we find a remnant of the Hittite population in the city so late as the time of David. The Latins called it Hierosolyma, and once Ariel; the Greeks had a similar name. In 2 Chron. xxv:28, it is called "the City of Judah." Pharaoh-necho took the "City of Cadytis," which historians believe to be Jerusalem. The "City of God," the "Holy City," "Solima," "Colonia Ælia Capitolina," "Curumobarech," "Leucost," "the Perfection of Beauty," "Princess among the Provinces," are some of the names, while the Arabs speak of it as "El-Khuds"—"the Holy."

2. Situation and Topography. Jerusalem lies near the summit of a broad mountain-ridge, about thirty-five miles east from Joppa on the Mediterranean Sea, eighteen miles west of the north end of the Dead Sea, twenty-two from the Jordan, and with a general elevation of two thousand five hundred feet above the level of the ocean, and three thousand eight hundred and fifty-two higher than the surface of the Dead Sea, the latter being one thousand three hundred and twelve feet below the Mediterranean Sea, and the lowest point on the surface of the globe. "In several respects," says Stanley, "its situation is singular among the cities of Palestine. Its elevation is remarkable; occasioned not from its being on the summit of one of the numerous hills of Judæa, like most of the towns and villages, but because it is on the edge of one of the highest table-lands of the country. Hebron indeed is higher still by some hundred feet, and from the south, accordingly (even from Bethlehem), the approach to Jerusalem is by a slight descent. But from any other side the ascent is perpetual; and to the traveler approaching the city from the east or west it must always have presented the appearance beyond any other capital of the then known world—we may say beyond any important city that has ever existed on the earth—of a mountain city; breathing, as compared with the sultry plains of Jordan, a mountain air; enthroned, as compared with Jericho, or Damascus, Gaza or Tyre, on a mountain fastness" (S. & P. p. 170, 171).

The ridge, or mountainous tract, on which Jerusalem stands, extends, without interruption, from the plain of Esdraelon to a line drawn between the south end of the Dead Sea and the southeast corner of the Mediterranean; or, more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far south as to Jebel Arâif in the Desert, where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau. This tract, which is everywhere not less than from twenty to twenty-five geographical miles in breadth, is, in fact, high, uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, and is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is, moreover, cut up by deep valleys which run east or west on either side towards the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or watershed, between the waters of these valleys—a term which here applies almost exclusively to the waters of the rainy season—follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge; yet not so but that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, for example, a valley which descends to the Jordan often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea.

From the great plain of Esdraelon onwards towards the south, the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract anciently known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah; until, in the vicinity of Hebron, it attains an elevation of nearly three thousand Paris feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further north, on a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea towards the true west, the ridge has an elevation of only about two thousand five hundred Paris feet; and here, close upon the water-shed, lies the city of Jerusalem. Its mean geographical position is in latitude $31^{\circ} 46' 43''$ north, and longitude $35^{\circ} 13'$ east from Greenwich.

The surface of the elevated promontory itself, on which the city stands, slopes somewhat steeply towards the east, terminating on the brink of the valley of Jehoshaphat. From the northern part, near the present Damascus gate, a depression or shallow wady runs in a southern direction, having on the west the ancient hills of Akra and Zion, and on the east the lower ones of Bezetha and Moriah. Between the hills of Akra and Zion another depression or shallow wady (still easy to be traced) comes down from near the Jaffa gate, and joins the former. It then continues obliquely down the slope, but with a deeper bed, in a southern direction, quite to the pool of Siloam and the valley of Jehoshaphat. This is the ancient Tyropæon. West of its lower part Zion rises loftily, lying mostly without the modern city; while on the east of the Tyropæon and the valley first mentioned lie Bezetha, Moriah, and Ophel, the last a long and comparatively narrow ridge, also outside of the modern city, and terminating in a rocky point over the pool of Siloam. These last three hills may strictly be taken as only parts of one and the same ridge. The breadth of the whole site of Jerusalem, from the brow of the valley of Hinnom, near the Jaffa gate, to the brink of the valley of Jehoshaphat, is about one thousand and twenty yards, or nearly half a geographical mile.

The country around Jerusalem is all of limestone formation, and not particularly fertile. The rocks everywhere come out above the surface, which in many parts is also thickly strewed with loose stones; and the aspect of the whole region is barren and dreary; yet the olive thrives here abundantly, and fields of grain are seen in the valleys and level places, but they are less productive than in the region of Hebron and Nabulus. Neither vineyards nor fig-trees flourish on the high ground around the city, though the latter are found in the gardens below Siloam, and very frequently in the vicinity of Bethlehem.

3. History. No city on the globe has suffered more from war and sieges than Jerusalem. No wonder historians claim that not a stone or wall remains of the city of David. And yet, as will be seen from the review of the recent discoveries on the Temple Hill, which accompanies this article, the visitor to Jerusalem can now, if so disposed, see the very stones placed in position by the masons of Solomon. From walls hanging over shelving cliffs, and valleys filled with more than a hundred feet of debris, the present city stands above the foundations of former cities long since buried in ruin. Storming legions, battering-rams, and catapults have razed it again and again. And yet, the general outline of the city has always been preserved. Zion and Mount Moriah remain in full view from Olivet, and there, on those hills, stretching away toward the west, city after city has come and gone in the passing ages.

(1) Joshua. Joshua took a part of the city about 1,444 years before Christ. After the death of Joshua, when there remained for the children of Israel much to conquer in Canaan, the Lord directed Judah to fight against the Canaanites; and they took Jerusalem, smote it with the edge of the sword, and set it on fire (Judg. i:1-8). After that, the Judahites and the Benjamites dwelt with the Jebusites at Jerusalem; for it is recorded (Josh. xv:63) that the children of Judah could not drive out the Jebusites inhabiting Jerusalem; and we are further informed (Judg. i:21) that the children of Benjamin did not expel them from Jerusalem. Probably the Jebusites were removed by Judah only from the lower city, but kept possession of the mountain of Zion, which David conquered at a later period.

(2) David. Jerusalem is not again mentioned till the time of Saul, when it is stated (1 Sam. xvii:54) that David took the head of Goliath and brought it to Jerusalem. After David, who had previously reigned over Judah alone in Hebron, was called to rule over all Israel, he led his forces against the Jebusites, and conquered the castle of Zion, which Joab first scaled (2 Sam. v:5-9; 1 Chron. xi:4-8). (B. C. 1046.)

(3) City of David. He then fixed his abode on this mountain, and called it 'the city of David.' Thither he carried the ark of the covenant; and there he built unto the Lord an altar in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, on the place where the angel stood who threatened Jerusalem with pestilence (2 Sam. xxiv:15-25). The reasons which led David to fix upon Jerusalem as the metropolis of his kingdom have been alluded to elsewhere (see ISRAEL; JUDAH); being, chiefly, that it was in his own tribe of Judah, in which his influence was the strongest, while it was the nearest to the other tribes of any site he could have chosen in Judah. The peculiar strength also of the situation, enclosed on three sides by a natural trench of valleys, could not be without weight. Its great strength, according to the military notions of that age, is shown by the length of time the Jebusites were able to keep possession of it against the force of all Israel. (See DAVID.)

(4) Solomon. After the death of David (B. C. 1010) Solomon built his temple upon Mount Moriah. By him and his father Jerusalem had been made the imperial residence of the king of all Israel; and the temple, often called 'the house of Jehovah,' constituted it at the same time the residence of the King of Kings, the supreme head of the theocratical state, whose viceregents the human kings were taught to regard themselves. It now belonged, even less than a town of the Levites, to a particular tribe; it was the center of all civil and religious affairs, the very place of which Moses spoke (Deut. xii:5): 'The place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come' (comp. ix:6; xiv:23; xvi:11-16; Ps. cxxii). (See SOLOMON.)

(5) Rehoboam. The importance and splendor of Jerusalem were considerably lessened after the death of Solomon; under whose son, Rehoboam, ten of the tribes rebelled, Judah and Benjamin only remaining in their allegiance. Jerusalem was then only the capital of the very small state of Judah. And when Jeroboam instituted the worship of golden calves in Bethel and Dan, the ten tribes went no longer up to Jerusalem to worship and sacrifice in the house of the Lord (1 Kings xii:26-30).

After this time the history of Jerusalem is continued in the history of Judah, for which the second books of the Kings and of the Chronicles are the principal sources of information.

(6) The Rule of Different Kings. After the time of Solomon, the kingdom of Judah was almost alternately ruled by good kings, 'who did that which was right in the sight of the Lord,' and by such as were idolatrous and evil-disposed; and the reign of the same king often varied, and was by turns good or evil. The condition of the kingdom, and of Jerusalem in particular as its metropolis, was very much affected by these mutations. Under good kings the city flourished, and under bad kings it suffered greatly.

(7) Destroyed by Shishak, and Restored. Under Rehoboam (B. C. 970) it was conquered by Shishak, king of Egypt, who pillaged the treasures of the temple (2 Chron. xii:9). Under Amaziah it was taken by Joash, king of Israel, who broke down four hundred cubits of the wall of the city, and took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the temple (2 Kings xiv:13, 14). Uzziah, son of Amaziah, who at first reigned well, built towers in Jerusalem at the corner-gate, at the valley-gate, and at the turning of the wall, and fortified them (2 Chron. xxvi:9). His son, Jotham, built the high gate of the temple, and reared up many other structures (2 Chron. xxvii:3, 4). (B. C. about 755.)

(8) Hezekiah. Hezekiah (B. C. 728) added to the other honors of his reign that of an improver of Jerusalem. His most eminent work in that character was the stopping of the upper course of Gihon, and bringing its waters by a subterraneous aqueduct to the west side of the city (2 Chron. xxxii:30). This work is inferred, from 2 Kings xx, to have been of great importance to Jerusalem, as it cut off a supply of water from any besieging enemy and bestowed it upon the inhabitants of the city. (See King, Recent Discoveries on the Temple Hill.) Hezekiah's son, Manasseh, in his later and best years, built a strong and very high wall on the west side of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii:14). The works in the city connected with the names of the succeeding kings of Judah were, so far as recorded, confined to the defilement of the house of the Lord by bad kings, and its purgation by good kings, till about one hundred years after Manasseh, when, for the abounding iniquities of the nation, the city and temple were abandoned to destruction.

(9) Nebuchadnezzar. After a siege of three years, Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, who razed its walls, and destroyed its temple and palaces with fire (2 Kings xxv; 2 Chron. xxxvi; Jer. xxxix). (B. C. 588.) Thus was Jerusalem smitten with the calamity which Moses had prophesied would befall it if the people would not keep the commandments of the Lord, but broke his covenant (Lev. xxvi:14; Deut. xxviii).

(10) Exile of Israel. The ten tribes forming the kingdom of Israel had been already upwards of one hundred and thirty years before transported to Assyria, when Judah also was exiled to Babylon. The castle of David, the temple of Solomon, and the entire city, lay in ruins, and to all appearance there was an end of the people as well as of the holy city, which the Lord had chosen to himself. But God, before whom a thousand years are as one day, gave to the afflicted people a glimpse beyond the present calamity and retributive judgment, into a distant futurity. The same prophets who foretold the destruction of Jerusalem also announced the consolidations of a coming time.

Moses had long before predicted that if in the land of their captivity they repented of their evil, they should be brought back again to the land out of which they had been cast (Dent. xxx:1-5; comp. 1 Kings viii:46-53; Neh. i:8, 9). The Lord also, through Isaiah, condescended to point out the agency through which the restoration of the holy city was to be accomplished, and even named long before his birth the very person, Cyrus, under whose orders this was to be effected (Is. xlv:28; comp. Jer. iii:2, 7, 8; xxiii:3; xxxi:10; xxxii:36, 37). Among the remarkably precise indications should be mentioned that in which Jeremiah (xxv:9-12) limits the duration of Judah's captivity to seventy years. (See CAPTIVITY.)

(11) Daniel and Cyrus. These encouragements were continued through the prophets, who themselves shared the captivity. Of this number was Daniel (Dan. ix:16, 19), who lived to see the reign of Cyrus, king of Persia (Dan. x:1), and the fulfilment of his prayer. It was in the year B. C. 536, 'in the first year of Cyrus,' that in accomplishment of the prophecy of Jeremiah, the Lord stirred up the spirit of this prince, who made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, expressed in these remarkable words: 'The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and he has charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel' (Ezra i:2, 3). This important call was answered by a considerable number of persons, particularly priests and Levites; and the many who declined to quit their houses and possessions in Babylonia, committed valuable gifts to the hands of their more zealous brethren. Cyrus also caused the sacred vessels of gold and silver which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from the temple to be restored to Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah, who took them to Jerusalem followed by 42,360 people, beside their servants, of whom there were 7,337, (Ezra i:5-11).

(12) Rebuilding of the Temple. On their arrival at Jerusalem they contributed according to their ability to rebuild the temple; Jeshua, the priest, and Zerubbabel, reared up an altar to offer burnt-offerings thereon; and when in the following year the foundation was laid of the new house of God, 'the people shouted for joy, but many of the Levites who had seen the first temple, wept with a loud voice' (Ezra iii:2, 12). When the Samaritans expressed a wish to share in the pious labor, Zerubbabel declined the offer; and in revenge the Samaritans sent a deputation to king Artaxerxes of Persia, carrying a presentment in which Jerusalem was described as a rebellious city of old time, which, if rebuilt, and its walls set up again, would not pay toll, tribute, and custom, and would thus endanger the public revenue. The deputation succeeded, and Artaxerxes ordered that the building of the temple should cease. The interruption thus caused lasted to the second year of the reign of Darius (Ezra iv:24), when Zerubbabel and Jeshua, supported by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, again resumed the work, and would not cease though cautioned by the Persian governor of Judaea. (B. C. 520.) On the matter coming before Darius Hystaspis, and the Jews reminding him of the permission given by Cyrus, he decided in their favor, and also ordered that the expenses of the work should be defrayed out of the public revenue (Ezra vi:8). In the sixth year of the reign of Darius the temple was finished, when they kept the Feast of Dedication with great joy, and next celebrated the Passover (Ezra vi:15, 16, 19). (B. C. 516.)

(13) Artaxerxes II. Afterwards, in the seventh year of the second Artaxerxes, Ezra, a descendant of Aaron, came up to Jerusalem, accompanied by a large number of Jews who had remained in Babylon. He was highly patronized by the king, who not only made him a large present in gold and silver, but published a decree enjoining all treasurers of Judaea speedily to do whatever Ezra should require of them; allowing him to collect money throughout the whole province of Babylon for the wants of the temple at Jerusalem; and also giving him full power to appoint magistrates in his country to judge the people (Ezra vii-viii). At a later period, in the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes, Nehemiah, who was his cupbearer, obtained permission to proceed to Jerusalem, and to complete the rebuilding of the city and its wall, which he happily accomplished, despite all the opposition which he received from the enemies of Israel (Neh. i, ii, iv, vi). (B. C. 446.) The city was then capacious and large, but the people in it were few, and many houses lay still in ruins (Neh. vii:4). At Jerusalem dwelt the rulers of the people and 'certain of the children of Judah and of the children of Benjamin'; but it was now determined that the rest of the people should cast lots to bring one of ten to the capital (Neh. xi:1-4). (B. C. about 440.) All strangers, Samaritans, Ammonites, Moabites, etc., were removed, to keep the chosen people from pollution; ministers were appointed to the temple, and the service was performed according to the law of Moses (Ezra x; Neh. viii, x, xii, xiii). Of the Jerusalem thus by such great and long-continued exertions restored, very splendid prophecies were uttered by those prophets who flourished after the exile: the general purport of which was to describe the temple and city as destined to be glorified far beyond the former, by the advent of the long and eagerly expected Messiah, 'the desire of all nations' (Zech. ix:9; xii:10; Hag. ii:6, 7). (See EZRA; NEHEMIAH.)

(14) Josephus and Alexander the Great. It is said by Josephus (Antiq. xi:8) that when the dominion of this part of the world passed from the Persians to the Greeks, Alexander the Great advanced against Jerusalem to punish it for the fidelity to the Persians which it had manifested while he was engaged in the siege of Tyre. His hostile purposes, however, were averted by the appearance of the high-priest Jaddua at the head of a train of priests in their sacred vestments. Alexander recognized in him the figure which in a dream had encouraged him to undertake the conquest of Asia. He therefore treated him with respect and reverence, spared the city against which his wrath had been kindled, and granted to the Jews high and important privileges. The historian adds that the high-priest failed not to apprise the conqueror of those prophecies in Daniel by which his successes had been predicted.

The whole of this story is, however, liable to suspicion, from the absence of any notice of the circumstance in the histories of this campaign which we possess.

(15) Ptolemy. After the death of Alexander at Babylon (B. C. 324), Ptolemy surprised Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, when the Jews would not fight, plundered the city, and carried away a great number of the inhabitants to Egypt, where, however, from the estimation in which the Jews of this period were held as citizens, important privileges were bestowed upon them (Joseph. Antiq. xii:1). In the contests which afterwards followed for the possession of Syria (including Palestine), Jerusalem does not appear to have been directly injured, and was even spared when Ptolemy gave up Samaria, Acco, Joppa, and Gaza to pillage. The contest was ended by the treaty in B. C. 302, which annexed the whole of Palestine, together with Arabia Petræa and Cœle-Syria, to Egypt.

(16) Ptolemy Euergetes and Ptolemy Philopator. Under easy subjection to the Ptolemies the Jews remained in much tranquillity for more than a hundred years, in which the principal incident, as regards Jerusalem itself, was the visit which was paid to it, in B. C. 245, by Ptolemy Euergetes, on his return from his victories in the East. He offered many sacrifices, and made magnificent presents to the temple. In the wars between Antiochus the Great and the kings of Egypt, from B. C. 221 to 197, Judæa could not fail to suffer severely; but we are not acquainted with any incident in which Jerusalem was principally concerned, till the alleged visit of Ptolemy Philopator in B. C. 211. He offered sacrifices, and gave rich gifts to the temple, but venturing to enter the sanctuary, in spite of the remonstrances of the high-priest, he was seized with a supernatural dread, and fled in terror from the place. It is said that on his return to Egypt he vented his rage on the Jews of Alexandria in a very barbarous manner. (See ALEXANDRIA.) But the whole story of his visit and its results rests upon the sole authority of the third book of Maccabees (chapters i and ii), and is therefore not entitled to implicit credit.

(17) Antiochus. Towards the end of this war the Jews seemed to favor the cause of Antiochus; and after he had subdued the neighboring country, they voluntarily tendered their submission, and rendered their assistance in expelling the Egyptian garrison from Mount Zion. For this conduct they were rewarded with many important privileges by Antiochus.

(18) Seleucus Philopator. Under their new masters the Jews enjoyed for a time nearly as much tranquillity as under the generally benignant and liberal government of the Ptolemies. But in B. C. 176, Seleucus Philopator, hearing that great treasures were hoarded up in the temple, and being distressed for money to carry on his wars, sent his treasurer, Heliodorus, to bring away these treasures. But this personage is reported to have been so frightened and stricken by an apparition that he relinquished the attempt; and Seleucus left the Jews in the undisturbed enjoyment of their rights (2 Macc. iii:4-40; Joseph. Antiq. xii:3, 3).

(19) Antiochus Epiphanes. His brother and successor, Antiochus Epiphanes, however, was of another mind. He took up the design of reducing them to a conformity of manners and religion with other nations; or, in other words, of abolishing those distinctive features which made the Jews a peculiar people, socially separated from all others. This design was odious to the great body of the people, although there were many among the higher classes who regarded it with favor. Of this way of thinking was Menelaus, whom Antiochus had made high-priest, and who was expelled by the orthodox Jews with ignominy, in B. C. 169, when they heard the joyful news that Antiochus had been slain in Egypt. The rumor proved untrue and Antiochus on his return punished them by plundering and profaning the temple. Worse evils befell them two years after: for Antiochus, out of humor at being compelled by the Romans to abandon his designs upon Egypt, sent his chief collector of tribute, Apollonius, with a detachment of 22,000 men, to vent his rage on Jerusalem. This person plundered the city, and razed its walls, with the stones of which he built a citadel that commanded the temple mount. A statue of Jupiter was set up in the temple; the peculiar observances of the Jewish law were abolished; and a persecution was commenced against all who adhered to these observances, and refused to sacrifice to idols. Jerusalem was deserted by priests and people, and the daily sacrifice at the altar was entirely discontinued (1 Macc. i:29-40; 2 Macc. v:24-26; Joseph. Antiq. xii:5, 4). (See ANTI-CHUCHUS, 4.)

(20) Maccabees. This led to the celebrated revolt of the Maccabees, who, after an arduous and sanguinary struggle, obtained possession of Jerusalem (B. C. 163), and repaired and purified the temple, which was then dilapidated and deserted. The sacrifices were then recommenced, exactly three years after the temple had been dedicated to Jupiter Olympius. The castle, however, remained in the hands of the Syrians, and long proved a sore annoyance to the Jews, but at length, in B. C. 142, the garrison was forced to surrender by Simon, who demolished it altogether, that it might not again be used against the Jews by their enemies. Simon then strengthened the fortifications of the mountain on which the temple stood and built there a palace for himself (1 Macc. xiii:43, 52; Joseph. Antiq. xiii:6, 6), which was strengthened and enlarged by Herod the Great, who called it the castle of Antonia, under which name it makes a conspicuous figure in the Jewish wars with the Romans.

(21) Pompey. Of Jerusalem itself we find nothing of consequence, till it was taken by Pompey in the summer of B. C. 63, and on the very day observed by the Jews as one of lamentation and fasting, in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Twelve thousand Jews were massacred in the temple courts, including many priests, who died at the very altar rather than suspend the sacred rites (Joseph. Antiq. xiv:1-4). On this occasion Pompey, attended by his generals, went into the temple and viewed the sanctuary; but he left untouched all its treasures and sacred things, while the walls of the city itself were demolished. From this time the Jews are to be considered as under the dominion of the Romans (Joseph. Antiq. xiv:4, 5).

(22) Crassus. The treasures which Pompey had spared were seized a few years after (B. C. 51) by Crassus. In the year B. C. 43, the walls of the city, which Pompey had demolished, were rebuilt by Antipater, the father of that Herod the Great under whom Jerusalem was destined to assume the new and more magnificent aspect which it bore in the time of Christ, and which constituted the Jerusalem which Josephus describes.

(23) Herod the Great. The temple itself was taken down and rebuilt by Herod the Great, with a magnificence exceeding that of Solomon's (Mark xiii:1; John ii:20). (See TEMPLE.) It was in the courts of the temple as thus rebuilt, and in the streets of the city as thus improved, that the Savior of men walked up and down. Here he taught, here he wrought miracles, here he suffered; and this was the temple whose 'goodly stones' the Apostle admired (Mark xiii:1), and of which Jesus foretold that ere the existing generation had passed away not one stone should be left upon another.

(24) Destruction of the City by Titus. Jerusalem seems to have been raised to this greatness as if to enhance the misery of its overthrow. So soon as the Jews had set the seal to their formal rejection of Christ, by putting him to death, and invoking the responsibility of his blood upon the heads of themselves and of their children (Matt. xxvii:25), the city's doom went forth. Titus, a young, brave and competent Roman general, with an army of sixty thousand trained, victorious warriors, appeared before the city in April, 70 A. D., and the most disastrous siege of all history began. It was Passover week, crowds from the whole land had come to the great annual gathering, and were hopelessly surrounded by the immense army, and driven into the city, swelling the total population to at least a million and a quarter of souls. The assault was commenced on the north and west walls, where, after fifteen days of battering and fighting, a breach was made in the wall of the new city. The Roman army entered and laid siege to the second wall, which was far heavier and stronger than the outer one already passed. Here a most stubborn resistance was made, and the assaulting forces were for a time defeated.

Titus called to his aid the most dreadful of all enemies, that of famine. He encompassed the entire city with a wall five miles in length, which was built within three days. This, with the strictest watch-care, utterly prohibited any food from reaching the doomed city. The distress was so severe that many were crazed by the gnawings of hunger. Mary, daughter of Eleazar, from Perea, a lady of rank, killed her infant child and cooked it for food. The prophecy of Moses, uttered more than fifteen hundred years before, was fulfilled to the letter. "Her children which she shall bear, . . . she shall eat them for want of all things, . . . in the siege and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in thy gates" (Deut. xxviii:57, etc.). Bezetha, Akra, Zion, the castle of Antonia, and finally the temple, one by one, all fell before the strong legions of Titus. For three years and a half this most memorable siege continued. Around the great altar of sacrifice lay dead bodies heaped one upon another, and blood flowed into the conduits where before that of the sacrifices ran. Man was the victim now, and the temple, sanctified by the blood of innocence, was defiled by the blood of the guilty. Titus entered the "Holy of Holies," but the Shekinah was gone. He carried away the golden candlestick, and some of the rich furniture; the temple was burned, and thus ended the greatest of sanctuaries.

On the same day of the month, August 15, six hundred and sixty-one years before, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the holy house, but now the very foundations were razed, after standing eleven hundred and thirty-seven years. The search for gold and silver which had melted in the fire caused the soldiers to dig away the very foundations, until "not one stone was left upon another that was not thrown down." The stronghold of Zion, the city of David, was the last to fall. Then came the order to utterly demolish the walls, leaving three towers, Phasaelus, Hippicus, and Mariamme, as monuments to show the strength with which Titus contended. Micah (iii:12) said: "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps."

Thirty-eight years after the Jews had led Christ away to crucify him an avenging army led away as captives all who had cried against the Son of God. Their house was a desolate, a charred ruin, the scepter had departed, the daily sacrifices ceased, the day of vengeance came, and not one tittle of the prophecy of the Divine Master had failed. Over a million persons had perished; ninety-seven thousand were led away as captives, multitudes were sent to the Egyptian mines, thousands were reserved for the triumph of Titus at Rome, and the records on the triumphal arch show us the golden table, the seven-branch golden candlestick, silver trumpets, and other spoils from the temple. Since then the Holy City has lain at the mercy of the Gentiles, and will so remain 'until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled.'

4. Ancient Jerusalem. Every reader of Scripture feels a natural anxiety to form some notion of the appearance and condition of Jerusalem, as it existed in the time of Jesus, or rather as it stood before its destruction by the Romans. There are unusual difficulties in the way of satisfying this desire, although it need not be left altogether ungratified. The principal sources of these difficulties have been indicated by different travelers. It is a tantalizing circumstance, however, for the traveler who wishes to recognize in his walks the site of particular buildings, or the scenes of memorable events, that the greater part of the objects mentioned in the description, both of the inspired and of the Jewish historian, are entirely razed from their foundation, without leaving a single trace or name behind to point out where they stood.

To the obscurity originating in these causes may be added that which arises from the many ambiguities in the description left by Josephus, the only one which we possess, and which must form the groundwork of most of our notices respecting the ancient city. There are indeed some manifest errors in his account, which the critical reader is able to detect without having the means to rectify.

In describing Jerusalem as it stood just before its destruction by the Romans, Josephus states that the city was built upon two hills, between which lay the valley Tyropæon (Cheesemonger's Valley), to which the buildings on both hills came down. This valley extended to the fountain of Siloam. The hill on which the upper town stood was much higher than the other, and straighter in its extent. On account of its fortifications, David called it the Fortress or Castle; but in the time of Josephus it was known by the name of the Upper Market. The other hill, on which was situated the lower town, was called Akra. It was in the form of a horseshoe or crescent. Opposite to Akra was a third, and naturally lower hill (Moriah), on which the temple was built; and between this and Akra was originally a broad valley, which the inhabitants of Jerusalem filled up in the time of Simon Maccabæus for the purpose of connecting the town with the temple. At the same time they lowered the hill Akra, so as to make the temple rise above it. Both the hills on which the upper and lower towns stood were externally surrounded by deep valleys, and here there was no approach because of the precipices on every side.

(1) The Walls. The first, or most ancient wall, appears to have enclosed the whole of Mount Zion. The greater part of it, therefore, must have formed the exterior and sole wall on the south, overlooking the deep valleys below Mount Zion; and the northern part evidently passed from the tower of Hippicus on the west side, along the northern brow of Zion, and across the valley, to the western side of the temple area. It probably nearly coincided with the ancient wall which existed before the time of David, and which enabled the Jebusites to maintain themselves in possession of the upper city, long after the lower city had been in the hands of the Israelites. Mount Zion is now unwall'd, and is excluded from the modern city. The account given by Josephus, of the second wall, is very short and unsatisfactory. But it would seem that it enclosed the whole of the lower city, or Akra, excepting that part of the eastern side of it which fronted the temple area on Mount Moriah, and the southern side, towards the valley which separated the lower from the upper city. In short, it was a continuation of the external wall, so far as necessary, on the west and north, and on so much of the east as was not already protected by the strong wall of the temple area.

Although these were the only walls that existed in the time of our Savior, we are not to infer that the habitable city was confined within their limits. On the contrary, it was because the city had extended northward far beyond the second wall that a third was built to cover the defenseless suburb: and there is no reason to doubt that this unprotected suburb, called Bezetha, existed in the time of Christ. This wall is described as having also begun at the tower of Hippicus: it ran northward as far as to the tower Psephinos, then passed down opposite the sepulcher of Helena (queen of Adiabene), and being carried along through the royal sepulchers, turned at the corner tower by the Fuller's monument, and ended by making a junction with the ancient wall at the valley of the Kidron. It was begun ten or twelve years after our Lord's crucifixion by the elder Herod Agrippa, who desisted from completing it for fear of offending the Emperor Claudius. But the design was afterwards taken up and completed by the Jews themselves, although on a scale of less strength and magnificence. Dr. Robinson thinks that he discovered some traces of this wall, which are described in his great work (Bibl. Researches, i. 466).

The same writer thinks that the wall of the new city, the Ælia of Adrian, nearly coincided with that of the present Jerusalem.

We know from Josephus that the circumference of the ancient city was thirty-three stadia, equivalent to nearly three and a half geographical miles. The circumference of the present walls does not exceed two and a half geographical miles; but the extent of Mount Zion, now without the walls, and the tract on the north formerly enclosed, or partly so, by the third wall, sufficiently account for the difference.

The history of the modern walls has already been given in the sketch of the modern history of the city. The present walls have a solid and formidable appearance, especially when cursorily observed from without; and they are strengthened or rather ornamented, with towers and battlements after the Saracenic style. They are built of limestone, the stones being not commonly more than a foot or fifteen inches square. The height varies with the various elevations of the ground. The lower parts are probably about twenty-five feet high, while in more exposed localities, where the ravines contribute less to the security of the city, they have an elevation of sixty or seventy feet.

(2) Gates. Much uncertainty exists respecting the ancient gates of Jerusalem. Many gates are named in Scripture; and it has been objected that they are more in number than a town of the size of Jerusalem could require—especially as they all occur within the extent embraced by the first and second walls, the third not then existing. It has, therefore, been suggested as more than probable that some of these gates were within the city, in the walls which separated the town from the temple, and the upper town from the lower, in which gates certainly existed. On the other hand, considering the circumstances under which the wall was rebuilt in the time of Nehemiah, it is difficult to suppose that more than the outer wall was then constructed, and certainly it was in the wall then built that the ten or twelve gates mentioned by Nehemiah occur. But these may be considerably reduced by supposing that two or more of the names mentioned were applied to the same gate. If this view of the matter be taken, no better distribution of these gates can be given than that suggested by Raumer.

(a) On the north side.

(1) The Old Gate, probably at the northeast corner (Neh. iii:6; xii:39).

(2) The Gate of Ephraim or Benjamin (Jer. xxxviii:7; xxxvii:13; Neh. viii:16; 2 Chron. xxv:23). This gate doubtless derived its names from its leading to the territory of Ephraim and Benjamin; and Dr. Robinson supposes it may possibly be represented by some traces of ruins which he found on the site of the present gate of Damascus.

(3) The Corner-gate, 300 cubits from the former, and apparently at the northwest corner (2 Chron. xxv:23; 2 Kings xiv:13; Zech. xiv:10). Probably the Gate of the Furnaces is the same (Neh. iii:11; xii:38).

(b) On the west side.

(4) The Valley-gate, over against the dragon-fountain of Gihon (Neh. ii:13; iii:13; 2 Chron. xxvi:9). It was probably about the northwest corner of Zion, where there appears to have been always a gate, and Dr. Robinson supposes it to be the same with the Gennath of Josephus.

(c) On the south side.

(5) The Dung-gate, perhaps the same as Josephus' Gate of the Essenes (Neh. iii:13; xii:31). It was 1,000 cubits from the valley-gate (Neh. iii:13), and the dragon-well was between them (Neh. ii:13). This gate is probably also identical with 'the gate between two walls' (2 Kings xxv:4; Jer. xxxix:4).

(6) The Gate of the Fountain nearest to the southeastern corner; the gate of the fountain near the king's pool (Neh. ii:14); the gate of the fountain near 'the pool of Siloah by the king's garden' (Neh. iii:15). The same gate is probably denoted in all these instances, and the pools seem to have been also the same. It is also possible that this fountain-gate was the same otherwise distinguished as the brick-gate (or potter's gate), leading to the valley of Hinnom (Jer. xix:2, where the Auth. Ver. has 'east-gate').

(d) On the east side.

(7) The Water-gate (Neh. iii:26).

(8) The Prison-gate, otherwise the Horse-gate, near the temple (Neh. iii:28; xii:39, 40).

(9) The Sheep-gate, probably near the sheep-pool (Neh. iii:1, 32; xii:39).

(10) The Fish-gate was quite at the northeast (Neh. iii:3; xii:39; Zeph. i:10; 2 Chron. xxxiii:14).

In the middle ages there appear to have been two gates on each side of the city, making eight in all; and this number, being only two short of those assigned in the above estimate to the ancient Jerusalem, seems to vindicate that estimate from the objections which have been urged against it.

On the west side were two gates, of which the principal was the Porta David, gate of David, often mentioned by the writers on the Crusades. It was called by the Arabs Bab el-Mihrab, and corresponds to the present Jaffa gate, or Bab el-Khulil. The other was the gate of the Fuller's Field, Porta Villa Fullonis, so called from Is. vii:3. This seems to be the same which others call Porta Judiciaria, and which is described as being in the wall over against the church of the holy sepulcher, leading to Silo (Neby Samwil) and Gibeon. This seems to be that which the Arabian writers call Serb.

On the north there were also two gates; and all the middle age writers speak of the principal of them as the gate of St. Stephen, from the notion that the death of the protomartyr took place near it. This was also called the gate of Ephraim, in reference to its probable ancient name. Arabic writers called it Bab 'Amud el-Ghurab, of which the present name, Bab el-'Amud, is only a contraction. The present gate of St. Stephen is on the east of the city, and the scene of the martyrdom is now placed near it; but there is no account of the change. Further east was the gate of Benjamin (Porta Benjaminis), corresponding apparently to what is now called the gate of Herod.

On the east there seem to have been at least two gates. The northernmost is described by Adamnanus as a small portal leading down to the valley of Jehoshaphat. It was called the gate of Jehoshaphat, from the valley to which it led. It seems to be represented by the present gate of St. Stephen. The present gate of St. Stephen has four lions sculptured over it on the outside, which, as well as the architecture, show that it existed before the present walls.

On the south side were also two gates. The easternmost is now called by the Franks the Dung-gate, and by the natives Bab el-Mugharibeh. The earliest mention of this gate is by Brocard, about A. D. 1283, who regards it as the ancient Water-gate. Further west, between the eastern brow of Zion and the gate of David, the Crusaders found a gate which they call the gate of Zion, corresponding to one which now bears the same name.

Of the seven gates mentioned as still existing, three, the Dung-gate, the Golden Gate, and Herod's Gate, are closed. Thus there are only four gates now in use, one on each side of the town, all of which have been enumerated. St. Stephen's, on the east, leads to the Mount of Olives, Bethany, and Jericho. Zion Gate, on the south side of the city, connects the populous quarter around the Armenian convent with that part of Mount Zion which is outside the walls, and which is much resorted to as being the great field of Christian burial, as well as for its traditional sanctity as the site of David's tomb, the house of Caiaphas, house of Mary, etc. The Jaffa Gate, on the west, is the termination of the important routes from Jaffa, Bethlehem, and Hebron. The Damascus Gate, on the north, is also planted in a vale, which in every age of Jerusalem must have been a great public way, and the easiest approach from Samaria and Galilee.

(3) Towers. The towers of Jerusalem are often mentioned in Scripture and in Josephus. Most of the towers mentioned by Josephus were erected by Herod the Great, and were, consequently, standing in the time of Christ. It was on these, therefore, that his eyes often rested when he approached Jerusalem, or viewed its walls and towers from the Mount of Olives. Of all these towers, the most important is that of Hippicus, which Josephus, as we have already seen, assumed as the starting-point in his description of all the walls of the city. Herod gave to it the name of a friend who was slain in battle. It was a quadrangular structure, twenty-five cubits on each side, and built up entirely solid to the height of thirty cubits. Above this solid part was a cistern twenty cubits; and then, for twenty-five cubits more, were chambers of various kinds, with a breastwork of two cubits, and battlements of three cubits upon the top. The altitude of the whole tower was consequently eighty cubits.

The above is the only tower which the historian particularly mentions. But in describing the outer or third wall of Agrippa, he states that it had battlements of two cubits, and turrets of three cubits more; and as the wall was twenty cubits high, this would make the turrets of the height of twenty-five cubits or nearly thirty-eight feet. Many loftier and more substantial towers than these were erected on each of the walls at regulated distances, and furnished with every requisite for convenience or defense. Of those on the third or outer wall are enumerated ninety; on the middle or second wall, forty; and on the inner or ancient wall, sixty.

(4) Public Buildings. The temple was in all ages the great glory and principal public building of Jerusalem, as the heathen temple, church, or mosque, successively occupying the same site, has been ever since the Jewish temple was destroyed. That temple is reserved for a separate article (see TEMPLE), and there are few other public edifices which require a particular description. Those most connected with Scripture history are the palace of Herod and the tower of Antonia. The former has already been noticed. In the time of Christ it was the residence of the Roman procurators while in Jerusalem; and as such provincial residences were called by the Romans Pratoria, this was the prætorium or judgment-hall of Pilate (Matt. xxvii:27; Mark xv:16; John xviii:28). In front of the palace was the tribunal or 'judgment-seat,' where the procurator sat to hear and determine the causes; and where Pilate was seated when our Lord was brought before him. It was a raised pavement of mosaic work (λιθόστρωτον), called in the Hebrew gabbatha, or 'an elevated place.' (See JUDGMENT HALL.)

The tower or castle of Antonia stood on a steep rock adjoining the northwest corner of the temple. It has already been mentioned that it originated under the Maccabees, who resided in it. The name of Baris which it obtained was originally the Persian name of a royal palace; but which, according to Jerome (Epist. ad Princip. ii. 639), was afterwards adopted in Palestine, and applied to all the large quadrangular dwellings built with turrets and walls. As improved by Herod, who gave it the name of Antonia, after his patron Mark Antony, this fortress had all the extent and appearance of a palace, being divided into apartments of every kind, with galleries and baths, and also broad halls or barracks for soldiers; so that, as having everything necessary within itself, it seemed a city, while in its magnificence it was a palace. At each of the four corners was a tower, one of which was seventy cubits high, and overlooked the whole temple with its courts. The fortress communicated with the cloisters of the temple by secret passages, through which the soldiers could enter and quell any tumults, which were always apprehended at the time of the great festivals. It was to a guard of these soldiers that Pilate referred the Jews, as a 'watch' for the sepulcher of Christ. This tower was also 'the castle' into which St. Paul was carried when the Jews rose against him in the temple, and were about to kill him; and where he gave his able and manly account of his conversion and conduct (Acts xxi: 27-40; xxii). This tower was, in fact, the citadel of Jerusalem.

5. Modern History. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans did not cause the site to be utterly forsaken, although for a long period little is heard of it.

(1) Adrian. For fifty years the city lay in utter ruin; then it was rebuilt in part by Adrian and again filled with Jews, who were permitted to return from many lands. The idolatrous monarch placed a marble statue of a hog over the gate facing Bethlehem, and erected also a temple to Jupiter. Later the Jews regained command of the city, and unable to endure the idea of their holy city being occupied by foreigners, and that strange gods should be set up within it, broke out into open rebellion under the notorious Barchochebas, who claimed to be the Messiah. His success was at first very great; but he was crushed before the tremendous power of the Romans, so soon as it could be brought to bear upon him; and a war scarcely inferior in horror to that under Vespasian and Titus was, like it, brought to a close by the capture of Jerusalem, of which the Jews had obtained possession. This was in A. D. 135, from which period the final dispersion of the Jews has been often dated.

(2) A Roman Colony. The Romans then finished the city according to their first intention. It was made a Roman colony, inhabited wholly by foreigners, the Jews being forbidden to approach it on pain of death; a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus was erected on Mount Moriah, and the old name of Jerusalem was sought to be supplanted by that of Ælia Capitolina, conferred upon it in honor of the emperor, Ælius Adrianus, and Jupiter Capitolinus. This name was applied till the time of Constantine, and passed to the Mohammedans, by whom it was long retained; and it was not till after they recovered the city from the Crusaders that it became generally known among them by the name of El-Khuds—the holy—which it still bears.

(3) Constantine. From the rebuilding by Adrian the history of Jerusalem is almost a blank till the time of Constantine, when its history, as a place of extreme solicitude and interest to the Christian church, properly begins. Pilgrimages to the Holy City now became common and popular. Such a pilgrimage was undertaken in A. D. 326 by the emperor's mother Helena, then in the eightieth year of her age, who built churches on the alleged site of the nativity at Bethlehem, and of the resurrection on the Mount of Olives. This example may probably have excited her son to the discovery of the site of the holy sepulcher, and to the erection of a church thereon. He removed the temple of Venus, with which, in studied insult, the site had been encumbered. The holy sepulcher was then purified, and a magnificent church was, by his order, built over and around the sacred spot. This temple was completed and dedicated with great solemnity in A. D. 335. There is no doubt that the spot thus singled out is the same which has ever since been regarded as the place in which Christ was entombed; but the correctness of the identification then made has been of late years much disputed. By Constantine the edict excluding the Jews from the city of their fathers' sepulchers was so far repealed that they were allowed to enter it once a year to wail over the desolation of 'the holy and beautiful house,' in which their fathers worshiped God.

(4) Julian the Apostate. When the nephew of Constantine, the Emperor Julian, abandoned Christianity for the old Paganism, he endeavored, as a matter of policy, to conciliate the Jews. He allowed them free access to the city, and permitted them to rebuild their temple. They accordingly began to lay the foundations in A. D. 362; but the speedy death of the emperor probably occasioned that abandonment of the attempt, which contemporary writers ascribe to supernatural hindrances. The edicts seem then to have been renewed which excluded the Jews from the city, except on the day of annual wailing.

(5) Pilgrimages. In the following centuries the roads to Zion were thronged with pilgrims from all parts of Christendom. After much struggle of conflicting dignities Jerusalem was, in A. D. 451, declared a patriarchate by the council of Chalcedon. In the next century it found a second Constantine in Justinian, who ascended the throne A. D. 527. He repaired and enriched the former structures, and built upon Mount Moriah a magnificent church to the Virgin, as a memorial of the persecution of Jesus in the temple.

(6) Persians. But these prosperous days were soon to end. The Persians, who had long harassed the empire of the East, penetrated into Syria in A. D. 614, and after defeating the forces of the Emperor Heraclius, took Jerusalem by storm. Many thousands of the inhabitants were slain, and much of the city destroyed. The damage occasioned by the Persians was speedily repaired.

(7) Caliph Omar. But Arabia soon furnished a more formidable enemy in the Caliph Omar, whose troops appeared before the city in A. D. 636. By his orders the magnificent mosque which still bears his name was built upon Mount Moriah, upon the site of the Jewish temple. Jerusalem remained in possession of the Arabians, and was occasionally visited by Christian pilgrims from Europe till towards the year 1000, when a general belief that the second coming of the Savior was near at hand drew pilgrims in unwonted crowds to the Holy Land.

(8) The Crusades. The sight, by such large numbers, of the holy place in the hands of infidels, the exaction of tribute, and the insults to which the pilgrims, often of the highest rank, were exposed from the Moslem rabble, excited an extraordinary ferment in Europe, and led to those remarkable expeditions for recovering the Holy Sepulcher from the Mohammedans which, under the name of the Crusades, will always fill a most important and curious chapter in the history of the world. But by the time the Crusaders, under Godfrey of Bouillon, appeared before Jerusalem, on the 17th of June, 1099, the Egyptian rulers had recovered possession of Palestine and driven the Saracens beyond the Euphrates. After a siege of forty days, the holy city was taken by storm on the 15th day of July; and a dreadful massacre of the Moslem inhabitants followed, without distinction of age or sex. As soon as order was restored, and the city cleared of the dead, a regular government was established by the election of Godfrey as king of Jerusalem. The Christians kept possession of Jerusalem eighty-eight years. During this long period they appear to have erected several churches and many convents. Of the latter few, if any, traces remain; and of the former, save one or two ruins, the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, which they rebuilt, is the only memorial which attests the existence of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem.

(9) Saladin. In A. D. 1187 the holy city was wrested from the hands of the Christians by the Sultan Saladin. From that time to the present day the holy city has remained, with slight interruption, in the hands of the Moslems. On the threatened siege by Richard of England in 1192, Saladin took great pains in strengthening its defenses. But in A. D. 1219, the Sultan Melek el Moaddin of Damascus, who then had possession of Jerusalem, ordered all the walls and towers to be demolished, except the citadel and the enclosure of the mosque, lest the Franks should again become masters of the city and find it a place of strength. In this defenseless state Jerusalem continued till it was delivered over to the Christians in consequence of a treaty with the Emperor Frederick II, in A. D. 1229, with the understanding that the walls should not be rebuilt. Yet ten years later (A. D. 1239) the barons and knights of Jerusalem began to build the walls anew, and to erect a strong fortress on the west of the city.

(10) David of Kerek. But the works were interrupted by the emir, David of Kerek, who seized the city, strangled the Christian inhabitants, and cast down the newly erected walls and fortress. Four years after, however, (A. D. 1243), Jerusalem was again made over to the Christians without any restriction, and the works appear to have been restored and completed; for they are mentioned as existing when the city was stormed by the wild Kharismatic hordes in the following year; shortly after which the city reverted for the last time into the hands of its Mohammedan masters, who have kept it to the present day.

6. The Early Church. Jerusalem witnessed many scenes connected with the early church. Among them were the day of Pentecost (Acts ii); the first proclamation of the gospel (Acts i:4); the rapid increase of Christian believers (Acts v); and the stoning of Stephen (Acts vii). The first ecclesiastical council was held in the city (Acts xv) under James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem (A. D. 47). Here James was beheaded by Herod (Acts xii). Eleven councils were held in the city at different periods from the year A. D. 47-1632.

7. Modern Jerusalem. (1) Streets and Apartments. The streets are narrow, crooked, and generally paved with cobble stones. David street is the Broadway of Jerusalem, and leads from the Joppa Gate, descending eastward, through the center of the city, across the Tyropeon Valley to the west wall of the temple area, having on either side extensive bazaars where all kinds of traffic is carried on. As one enters the city the Tower of David appears on the right, the foundation of which was doubtless that of Phasaelus. It presents the best specimens of masonry. For twenty feet the foundations slope inwardly at an angle of forty-five degrees, and it was quite unassailable by the battering-rams of the early ages. It was the last place to yield when Jerusalem was captured by the Crusaders, and when the walls of the city were destroyed in the thirteenth century by the Moslems, it withstood the fury of a wasting desolation. Within it are several spacious rooms, and a cistern for water. In one of the apartments, the Mohammedans say, David wrote the Psalms. Near by this tower is the American consulate, while on the left stands the Grand Hotel and the Turkish postoffice. About a block eastward is Christian sreet, running northward to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. A little further east is Damascus street, the eastern boundary of the Christian quarter of the city. The Mohammedans' quarters are in the northeast section of the city, the Jewish in the southeast, and the Armenian on the site of Mount Zion, south and west, while the Harem inclosure is on Mount Moriah, further east.

(2) Absalom's Pillar. Near by is Absalom's pillar. The memory of Absalom is so hateful to the Jew that he throws a stone at the monument whenever he passes by it. Near by Absalom's pillar is the burying place of the Jews, and north of this is the garden of Gethsemane, the tomb of the Virgin, and the valley of Jehoshaphat.

(3) Mount Moriah. Directly beyond the valley is Mount Moriah, including the temple area, which the Moslems call Hara es-Sherif. The Mosque of Omar, or "the noble sanctuary," occupies the site of the famous temple of Solomon. Near it, on the north, is the enclosure of Antonia. The quadrangle measures one thousand and forty-two feet on the north, one thousand five hundred and thirty on the east (the front view), nine hundred and twenty-two on the south, and one thousand six hundred and one on the west, embracing about thirty-five acres. Bezetha is on the right, reaching to the extremity of the wall. The Mohammedan cemetery, in the foreground, is near the wall, extending its entire length north and south. Beyond the wall, on the right, is Jeremiah's grotto, where tradition says he wrote the book of Lamentations. It is doubtless one of the openings of the vast system of quarries under this hill, and from which much of the stone used in the construction of the city has been taken. Olive groves and private residences are seen on the northern suburbs of the city. Many fine buildings have lately been erected in this quarter, among which are the Arab Protestant church, the large Russian buildings, the Coptic church, and other modern structures. On the west side of the city is the citadel, and on the southwest the tomb of David.

(4) Church of the Holy Sepulcher. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher, having two domes, is a little to the right of the citadel. It was built, as before stated, by the Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, in 326 A. D., and stands over the traditional place of the Savior's tomb. It was dedicated with great pomp in 335 A. D., Encelins taking part in the gorgeous ceremonies. This building was burnt by the Persians in 614 A. D., but was shortly after rebuilt by Modestus, Muezzin of the race of the Fatimites, removed the seat of power from Jerusalem to Cairo, and this church was again destroyed. A third time it fell at the command of a caliph, who razed it to the ground.

A successor of his rebuilt it, completing the building, 1048 A. D.

During the period of the Crusaders the present walls were erected. Fire demolished a part of the structure in 1808 A. D., but the Greek Christians so completely restored it that no traces of the fire remain. The true site of Calvary is now believed to be on the skull-like mound outside the Damascus Gate on the north. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher has two large domes covering several chapels. The sepulcher proper is of marble in the great rotunda under the western dome. The space occupied by the immense pile is three hundred and fifty by two hundred and eighty feet.

(5) Mosque of Omar. Just beyond the Golden Gate, near the western wall, stands the famous Mosque of Omar, Kubbet es Sakhra, or "dome of the rock," a great octagonal building, each side being sixty-seven feet long, with a diameter of one hundred and forty-eight feet, surmounted by a great dome with a total height of one hundred and seventy feet. It covers the sacred rock on which the old temple stood where Abraham offered Isaac to God; where Araunah, the Jebusite, had his threshing floor, and the spot which David purchased of him on which to build an altar of sacrifice. The building is a poor representative of the temples erected either by Solomon, Nehemiah, or Herod, and yet it has a pleasing effect. Once its dome was plated with gold, and in the morning, reflecting the sunlight from its marble walls and gilded dome, must have been a beautiful picture of oriental magnificence. In the year 680 Caliph Omar found this spot covered with ruins and rubbish, all traces of the former grandeur having been obliterated for ages, and, with naked hands, helped clear the historic site, and proceeded to erect a temporary structure. The work begun was completed by Abdalmelik the tenth caliph, 691 A. D., by immense revenues collected as taxes upon Egypt for seven years. During the rule of the Crusaders it was used as a Christian church, and some marks of violence are shown within. Around the whole interior is a corridor thirteen feet wide, while sixteen marble columns of the Corinthian order lend grace and beauty to the scene. On another inner circle stand twelve larger columns of the same order, with four great intervening piers. The dome is sixty feet in diameter. Within the last circle, and protected by a high iron railing, is the sacred "rock," four feet nine inches higher than the pavement, and forty by sixty feet in dimension. It is certainly a veritable relic. The surface of the rock is rough, bearing marks of the chisel, steps cut, and holes drilled here and there. From this rock, tradition says, Mohammed ascended to heaven, leaving his footprints upon the stone. Underneath this is a small cave, which, undoubtedly, Araunah used as a grain bin. The mosque platform is five hundred and fifty by four hundred and fifty feet, and about ten feet higher than the general area, with beautiful stone ascents made through eight elegant Saracenic gates.

(6) Mosque el Aksa. South of the dome of the rock stands a large and beautiful old Basilica, called mosque el Aksa. It was built 798 A. D., is two hundred and seventy-two feet long and one hundred and eighty-four wide, having a ground area of fifty thousand square feet; has seven aisles and forty-five columns. It is declared to be in the exact center of the earth.

(7) Other Features of Interest. Close by are Solomon's stables and the Tower of David.

On the northwest of the city may be seen the extensive Russian buildings. Here is a large Greek church, a hospice for males, and another for females, where pilgrims are entertained who come to visit the sacred places. There is also a good school building here, and a number of dwelling houses are being built in this quarter outside the city walls. "Talitha Cumi" is a large mission school for girls, on the Joppa road, a little west of the city. Jeremiah's grotto is under the beautiful little hill, covered with Mohammedan graves, outside the northern wall. It is claimed that the prophet lived here for many years, and wrote the book of Lamentations in the small cavern. This hill is now believed to be the true Calvary, and the facts seem to prove the same, both from Biblical and historic authority. Other principal features of the city are elsewhere mentioned.

(8) The Zionist Movement. The so-called Zionist movement which is the colonization of Jews in Jerusalem and Palestine is meeting with considerable success. A steady, although at present not a very large, stream of Jewish immigration is setting in that direction. There is now a railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem, and other roads are under construction.

The visit of the emperor of Germany to Jerusalem in 1898 created great interest in religious circles, and gave an added impetus to the resettlement by the Hebrew people in the land of their fathers.

(9) Present Population, etc. The present population of Jerusalem is variously estimated at from 40,000 to 60,000, of whom about five tenths are Jews, three tenths Mohammedans and two tenths Christians. "There is no warm nor bright color here; all is grim and gray except the blue tiles in the Mosque of Omar. The shadow of the Crucifixion rests on the place forever; a strange stillness reigns, and laughter would seem like laughter beside an open grave. Women, veiled in white, glide through the dark, crooked alleys like tenants of a city of specters, and even the children, subdued by the overwhelming gloom, are silent beyond the wont of Orientals. Ruins, ruins at every hand! Well has the prophecy been fulfilled: 'Jerusalem shall become heaps.' The very stones of the streets are dismal, worn away with burdens borne since they rang with the tramp of legions and glittered with the brassy armor of the masters of the earth. Outside the walls—saddest sight where all is sadness—are ancient Jews come merely to die in the land of their love. A few in whom there is much guile offer for sale talismans, gems of magic, rings of occult power. The greater number sit in the sun, motionless as statues, without the dignity that should accompany age, in poverty past telling, dreaming away the day and night—apparently without hope, except to have a little holy dust laid on their eyelids when they shall have closed them to sleep with patriarchs and seers in the Valley of Jehoshaphat."

8. Recent Discoveries. Within the last twenty-nine years excavations have been made on Temple Hill by the engineers of the Palestine Exploration Fund, who have overcome almost insuperable obstacles by their skill, daring, and energy. A brief outline of the great work which they have accomplished is hereby presented.

(1) Temple Hill. The massive walls and towers that formed the defense of the Temple Hill have been found intact in many places, the stones resting just as they were placed by the workmen of Solomon and Hiram. Throughout its course the wall rests on a solid foundation of living rock and rises sometimes to a height of more than one hundred and fifty feet. These "sure foundations" of the massive walls of the Holy City often form the theme of Hebrew poetry and ethics. The Psalmist's words, 'her foundations are upon the holy hills,' are literally true, and Isaiah speaks of the 'sure foundations' of Zion.

At the southeast angle of the wall, the height of the masonry has been found to be one hundred and fifty-six feet and nine inches. In ancient days the wall of the Royal Cloister surmounted this, adding not less than fifty feet to the height, so that at this point in the days of Christ the wall of the temple, from foundation to summit, would be considerably over two hundred feet in height. The valley at this point is now filled with rubbish, covering the wall to a considerable height and raising the bed of the Kedron about forty feet above its true level.

From these interesting discoveries, made by the Rev. James King, of England, it appears that a person in ancient times standing on the Cloister wall would look down into the bed of the Kedron three hundred feet below. Thus recent excavations have proved that the account by Josephus of the astounding height of the southeast wall is not so much exaggerated as it was once thought to be. Doubtless on the top of this wall, at the southeast corner, stood the pinnacle of the temple mentioned in Christ's temptation (Matt. iv: 5, 6).

(2) The East Wall. At the northeast angle of the Harem area stands the so-called Tower of Antonia, which, though having nothing to do with the Tower of Antonia, still retains that name. The part now seen above ground is only a small portion of a once colossal structure, which shows what immense deposits of rubbish must have been made to cover this ancient fortification.

The main east wall crosses a ravine, on the slope of which the Tower of Antonia stands. A hundred and twenty yards from the tower is the famous Golden Gate (Porta aurea) in the eastern wall of the temple area.

(3) The Golden Gate. This occupies a conspicuous place in the east wall. The present structure is no older than the time of Constantine, but the site is doubtless the same as that of the 'Beautiful Gate of the temple' mentioned in Acts, for in the spacious porch may yet be seen two huge monolithic jambs, now used as pillars, which are vestiges of an ancient gateway. Tradition, too, fixes this as the location of the 'Beautiful Gate,' and, strange to say, the Greek word ὡπala, beautiful, was incorrectly translated by the Latin aurea, golden, perhaps from the resemblance of the two classical words; and usage has perpetuated the error. The Arabs now call the whole gateway Báb ed Daheriyei, the Eternal Gate, the northern arch being called Gate of Repentance, the southern, Gate of Mercy.

From the Golden Gate to the southeast corner the length of the wall is a little more than a thousand feet. Here is that part of the Kedron called the Valley of Jehoshaphat, in which both Moslems and Jews believe the Last Judgment will be held. On this account it has been from ancient times a Jewish burial-ground (Joel iii: 2, 12-14).

(4) The Red Heifer Bridge. A hundred feet north of the southeast corner is a break in the continuity of the wall, at a place where a bridge spanned the Kedron Valley. As the Red Heifer Bridge connected the temple precincts with the Mount of Olives in ancient times, and along this the heifer destined for sacrifice was led by the high-priest, to the summit of Olivet, it is justifiable to conjecture that this was the site of the ancient bridge.

(5) Corner Stone. At the southeast corner of the wall is the interesting corner stone of the temple. To the ancient Jews this stone was the emblem of many moral and spiritual truths (Ps. cxviii:22, 23; Is. xxviii:16; Matt. xxi:42; Acts iv:11; Ephes. ii:20, 21; 1 Pet. ii:6). It stands in the same place in which it was set three thousand years ago in the presence of Solomon and his court. It is squared and polished, and measures three feet eight inches high by fourteen feet in length. Three feet east of the angle of the corner stone the excavators found a hole cut out of the native rock, and in this an earthen jar. From its form and evident age it has been conjectured that it was deposited at the laying of the corner stone and contained the holy oil for the consecration of the foundations. The discoveries about this southeast corner have been confirmatory of the account of the building of the temple in 1 Kings v:17, 18. The engineers found "great stones, costly and hewed," and Phœnician fragments of pottery. Phœnician marks painted on the massive blocks proclaim that the stones were prepared in the quarry by the cunning workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre.

(6) The Wall of Ophel. While excavating near the southeast angle of the wall the engineers of the Palestine Exploration Fund found a wall of ancient date, which has been identified with the wall of Ophel, so frequently mentioned in connection with the Roman siege. The stones are small compared with the mighty masses of the wall before mentioned; the foundations rest on clay, and the work bears the marks of haste. Ophel is the name of the ridge south of the Temple Hill. Jotham built much on this wall of Ophel and Manasseh compassed about Ophel (2 Chron. xxxiii:14). This wall seems to have been rebuilt under Nehemiah after the return from captivity. There can be little doubt that this discovery is the wall hastily built up by Nehemiah.

(7) The South Wall of the Harem. The south wall of the Harem must at one time have presented a magnificent mass of masonry. It is over nine hundred feet long and had two entrances, known as the Triple Gate, and Double, or Huldah Gate, both now built up. The Double Gate is a very prominent feature in the south wall. It is a hundred yards from the southwest angle and consists of two entrances, each eighteen feet wide. This Double, or Huldah, Gate was the chief entrance to the temple area from the south, and doubtless the Savior passed through it many times during the celebration of the great festival. Modern discoveries show that this wall does not belong to one period of construction, but the portion east of the Double Gate possesses a high antiquity, extending back to the Jewish monarchy, and is, probably, the work of King Solomon; while that to the west, which is a hundred yards in length, belongs to the time of Herod.

A hundred feet west of the southeast angle is a gateway with pointed arch, which, though now closed, seems to have been an entrance in former days to "Solomon's stables." This is called the Single Gate.

(8) Solomon's Stables. The vast subterranean vaults, probably known as "Solomon's Stables," extend over an acre of ground. They are forty feet below the Harem area, and more than a hundred feet above the foundation stone of the wall. One hundred square piers arranged in fifteen rows support the ceiling. The Moslems call the place 'The Old Mosque,' but the Frank Kings used it as a stable. It was doubtless originally designed as a support for the temple area, and it is very probable that there are other systems of vaults below these.

(9) West Wall of the Temple Area. The west wall of the temple area is over one thousand five hundred feet long. Here are the remains of the Jews' Wailing Place, and Robinson's and Wilson's arches.

(10) The Jews' Wailing Place. This is where the Israelites assemble every Friday afternoon. The temple wall visible above ground at this spot is about sixty feet high. The lower courses of stone are magnificent blocks, venerable for their antiquity and for the fact that they are veritable remains of the old Jewish temple. For many generations the Jews have been permitted, at least once a week, to approach the precincts of their temple and kiss the venerable stones of the wall and bathe them with their tears, fulfilling the words in Psalm cii:14. The congregation that gathers here is one of the most solemn gatherings left to the Jewish church. How long this ceremony has been kept up cannot be determined with certainty, although there is historical evidence to prove that they have assembled to mourn over their lost glory and desolate temple since the time of the apostles.

(11) Robinson's Arch. A little north of the southwest corner three courses of stone project which have received the name of Robinson's Arch. In ancient times Mount Moriah was separated from Zion by a rugged ravine. On one side of this ravine rose the massive walls of the temple, on the other the palace of the kings of Judah. This valley is now so filled with rubbish from the city that it presents the appearance of a level plain. In the olden times, however, it was spanned by bridges, the most noted being Zion Bridge, which seemed to form a communication between the palace and the temple. Excavating at a point where the next pier of the arch should be, not only the pier itself was found, but arch stones of the fallen arch. How old this viaduct is cannot be stated, but certainly it antedates the Christian era and the Temple of Herod.

(12) Wilson's Arch, six hundred feet north of the southwest angle, is also the remains of an ancient bridge, which extended across the valley to the opposite height. Adjoining the arch were discovered a series of arched vaults running westward and evidently connected with the viaduct or bridge which anciently crossed the valley at this place. Probably by this secret way troops were hurried down into the temple area from the barracks on Mount Zion.

(13) Gate of the Chain. North of Wilson's Arch is the Gate of the Chain, the principal entrance to the Harem area. It received its name from the tradition that Solomon once stretched a chain across this entrance. A little farther north is the Gate of the Bath, and the Gate of the Cotton Merchants, which a very old tradition identifies with the "Beautiful Gate of the Temple." From this gate to the southwest angle the distance is two hundred yards. The masonry is very ancient and probably dates from the Jewish kings.

(14) The North Wall of the Harem Area. Within the northwest angle of the wall stands a pile of buildings used as a barrack. It is situated on a rock twenty feet above the temple area. Here is generally supposed to have been located the ancient Jewish fort of Baris. East of the barracks is a small entrance, called the Gate of the Secretary, and a little farther on the gate called Bab el-Hitta. Just east of this entrance there begins a fosse, which runs along the wall for three hundred and sixty feet, with an average breadth of a hundred and thirty feet. It is called the Pool of Israel, and according to Roman Catholic tradition is the Pool of Bethesda. Near the eastern end of the north wall is the Gate of the Tribes, whose portals adjoin the Castle of Antonia, at the northeast angle.

(15) The Royal Quarries. Under Bezetha, the northern hill on which Jerusalem is built, extend vast caverns, reaching far into the bowels of the earth. These are the "Royal Quarries," and their vastness not only throws light upon the stonework of the temple, but impresses the mind with the gigantic character of the sacred edifices that once crowned the summit of Moriah. From its mouth the cave increases rapidly in size; the rock rises perpendicularly from the floor to the ceiling; large fragments of quarried stones lie about, and massive blocks, half cut, still adhere to the wall. All this indicates that the cavern is largely the work of man's hand. The stone was removed by cutting a nick from three to six inches wide on both sides the desired block, also at the bottom and behind. This slow, but simple, process must have been performed by a pick or other instrument with a long handle. By the side of each cutting may be seen a little cup-shaped hollow, evidently designed to hold oil and wick to give the workmen light. The stone is a hard limestone, which when polished is almost as pure and white as marble. No doubt the Psalmist had this in mind when he expressed the wish that 'our daughters may be as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace' (Ps. cxlv: 12). From the fact that all the stonework of Jerusalem, generally speaking, is of a formation corresponding to the hard limestone rock of these Royal Quarries, and from their immense size, we are led to the belief that all the stonework of the Holy City, the Temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod, the massive walls of Harem, and the encompassing walls of the city, has been excavated from these caverns underneath the northern part of the ancient city. The prevailing, but mistaken notion, that Hiram sent the stone for Solomon's temple from Lebanon or Tyre arose from Solomon's request for cedar and fir trees which Hiram promised to provide (1 Kings v:8).

(16) Waters of Jerusalem. Beneath the Temple Hill are vast cisterns for holding the water that flowed from the hill country of Judæa. Six miles from Jerusalem are the Pools of Solomon, at the head of the Wady Urtâs valley. These pools cover about seven acres, and are capable of holding three million gallons of water. These wonderful architectural remains of the old Jewish monarchy were partly excavated out of the bed of limestone rock, and partly constructed of massive blocks of masonry, by building dams across the valley. They are three in number, connected by conduits, the lower one being the largest and finest of the three. The pools are fed by four natural springs, of which the Sealed Fountain is the largest. According to tradition Solomon shut up this spring and kept the door of it sealed with his signet, so that he might preserve the water for his own drinking in its natural freshness and purity. The Sealed Fountain formed a part of the water system of Solomon and is probably referred to in Canticles (iv:12). These pools and their fountains have an altitude of about two hundred feet above the area of the temple, so that they could have carried water to the highest part of the Sacred City.

From the Sealed Fountain there runs a passage to a vault situated at the northwest corner of the upper pool. At this vault the stream from the Sealed Fountain has recently been found to have been joined by another stream flowing from the south and collecting its supply from the valley of the Arrûb, six miles from Solomon's Pools. It was conducted through a rock-bored tunnel four miles long, passing in its course under another valley called Wady Byar, and thence on to its junction with the Sealed Fountain. With the increased volume from the Sealed Fountain the aqueduct known as the High Level passes along the slope of Wady Urtâs, descending into the valley, west of Bethlehem; it ascends the northern side of the valley again, through an inverted stone syphon, constructed of perforated stone blocks firmly united by cement. This syphon is not only a work of skill in masonry, but shows a knowledge of hydrostatics not possessed by the Romans when they built the great arched structures in the neighborhood of Rome, for conducting water across valleys. The High Level aqueduct has been traced far enough to make it reasonably sure that in olden time it supplied the pool of Upper Gihon, now Birket Mamilla; thence flowing through the channel, still existing at this part, it entered Jerusalem at the Jaffa Gate. It would then supply the Citadel, the Pool of Hezekiah, and all points along the Tyropœon valley until it joined the Pool of Siloam. This aqueduct is of high antiquity, and according to the opinion of the engineers of the Palestine Exploration Fund, dates from the earliest ages of the Jewish occupation. It is without doubt a part of the water system of King Solomon. While it never received any supply from Solomon's Pools, they were a part of the great water system. The skill with which they were constructed would do credit to the nineteenth century, and their massiveness suggests the reign of some energetic king. Expert opinion favors the theory that they were built by Solomon himself and are referred to in Eccl. ii:6. The water of these pools found its way to Jerusalem through the Low Level aqueduct, furnishing Bethlehem on the way. The aqueduct crosses the valley of Gihon on a causeway and enters the city near Burj Al Kibryt. Following along the western slope of the Tyropœon valley it turns eastward and communicates with the great cisterns under the Temple Hill. A few years ago this aqueduct was repaired and for a time the water flowed direct from Solomon's Pools to the cisterns of the Harem as in days of old, but the flow was shortly impeded and at present the water does not get much beyond Bethlehem. This was the main supply of Jerusalem in olden times, and while the aqueduct was repaired by Pontius Pilate its construction was of the period of Solomon and ranks among the most interesting of Biblical antiquities.

The vast cisterns under the Temple Hill are among the most important of modern discoveries. Some are of modern construction, and others, from their form, are very ancient. No less than thirty-five of these cisterns have been explored and examined. Many are of great depth, and their combined capacity is about ten million gallons. They are connected by passages, tunnels and ducts, so that the Temple Hill beneath the surface is honeycombed by a network of vaults and cisterns. The largest and best known is the Great Sea, capable of holding three million gallons. It is mentioned in the book of Ecclesiasticus (i:3). While it is difficult to fix the exact age of these cisterns of the Temple Hill there is abundant evidence to prove that Solomon constructed the reservoirs south of Bethlehem known as Solomon's Pool, the original aqueducts that conveyed their water to the Sacred City, and we may confidently believe that the reservoirs under the Temple area were contemporaneous with these other remains of the water system built by Solomon. (See cut, page 1419.)

(17) The Virgin's Fountain. A spring, called the Virgin's Fountain, in the valley of the Kedron, opposite the village Siloam, flows by a channel cut out of the rock through the Hill of Ophel and issues at the pool of Siloam, the most celebrated of those mentioned in the Scriptures (Neh. iii:15; Luke xiii:4; John ix:7, etc.). This pool is a little lower than the Virgin's Fountain and the excavations about the pool and the tunnel leading to the fountain are likely the work of King Hezekiah. During the reign of that monarch Shalmaneser, of Assyria, threatened Jerusalem. Hezekiah rebuilt the broken-down walls of the city, raised towers, and 'took counsel to stop the waters of the fountains without the city' (2 Chron. xxxii:4). This language applies completely to the diverting of the water from the Virgin's Fountain by the tunnel to Siloam; for before this was done this spring would empty into the valley of the Kedron and could be used by soldiers outside the walls. So that there exists good reason for referring this work to the reign of

Hezekiah. (King, Recent Discoveries on Temple Hill.)

JERUSALEM, NEW. The gospel church is called New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi:2). In her are found the peculiar presence and ordinances of God; in her the tribes of redeemed men meet, and serve him. How beautiful and compact her form! How firm her foundation! How strongly fortified and protected, by the laws, perfections, and providences of God! How rich, wealthy, and free her true members! How readily they welcome others to reside with them! (Gal. iv:26; comp. Ezek. xl). Perhaps the heavenly state of glory is called Jerusalem, or the New Jerusalem, for similar reason (Rev. iii:12). Brown.

JERUSHA (je-ru'shà), (Heb. יְרוּשָׁה, yer-oo-shaw', possessed), the daughter of Zadok, and queen of Uzziah. She was the mother of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings xv:33), B. C. 738. Called also Jerushah.

JESAJAH (je-sā'yá), (Heb. יֵשַׁעְיָהוּ, yesh-ah-yaw', Jehovah saves or is opulent).

1. Son of Hananiah, the son of Jerubbabel (1 Chron. iii:21), B. C. after 536.

2. Father of Ithiel, a Benjamite, some of whose descendants were among those chosen by lot to reside in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi:7), B. C. 445.

JESHAIAH (je-shā'iah, or yà), (Heb. יֵשַׁעְיָהוּ, yesh-ah-yaw', Jehovah saves).

1. Chief of the eighth division of singers under the tutorship of his father Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv:3, 15), B. C. 1014.

2. A Levite during David's time; the son of Rehabiah, a descendant of Amram through Moses (1 Chron. xxvi:25), B. C. before 1014.

3. Son of Athaliah, a chief of the house of Bene Elam, who returned with a company of seventy from Babylon (Ezra viii:7), B. C. 459.

4. A Levite of the family of Merari, who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii:19), B. C. 459.

JESHANAH (jěsh'a-nah), (Heb. יֵשַׁעְנָה, yesh-aw-naw', old).

A town with its suburbs which was taken from Jeroboam by Abijah; it is mentioned as near Bethel and Ephraim (2 Chron. xiii:19). Schwarz locates it at al-Sanin, two miles west of Bethel. (Palestine, p. 158.)

JESHARELAH (je-shār'e-lah), (Heb. יֵשַׁרְעֵלָה, yesh-ar-al'aw, upright toward God).

Head of the seventh of the twenty-four wards into which the musicians of the Levites were divided (1 Chron. xxv:14); elsewhere (verse 2) called ASARELAH. (B. C. 1014.)

JESHEBEAB (je-shěb'e-ăb), (Heb. יֵשֶׁבֶבַע, yesh-sheb-awb', father's seat), head of the fourteenth course of priests (1 Chron. xxiv:13), B. C. 1014.

JESHER (jě'sher), (Heb. יֵשַׁר, yay'sher, uprightness), the first named of the sons of Caleb, by his wife Azubah (1 Chron. ii:18), B. C. before 1658.

JESHIMON (jěsh'i-mōn), (Heb. יֵשֶׁמוֹן, yesh-ee-mone', a desolation).

A name used in describing the position geographically of Pisgah and Peor. It refers to that portion which lies north of the Dead Sea (Num. xxi:20; xxiii:28; 1 Sam. xxiii:19, etc.). "In the Old Testament the wilderness of Judea is called the Jeshimon, a word meaning devastation, and no term can better suit its haggard and crumbling appearance. It covers some thirty-five miles by fifteen. . . . Short bushes, thorns, and succulent creepers were all that relieved the brown and yellow bareness of the sand, the crumbling limestone, and scattered shingle. Such is Jeshimon, the wilderness of Judea. It carries the violence and desolation of the Dead Sea Valley right up to the heart of the country, to the roots of the Mount of Olives, to within two hours of the gates of Hebron, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem" (Smith, Hist. Geog.). (See Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 540, 2d ed.).

JESHISHAI (je-shīsh'a-i), (Heb. יֵשִׁישַׁי, yesh-ee-shah'ee, aged), the son of Jahdo and father of Michael, and ancestor of certain of the tribe who lived in Gilead and whose genealogies were made out in the time of Jotham (1 Chron. v:14), B. C. before 782.

JESHOHAIAH (jěsh'o-hā'iah), (Heb. יֵשֶׁהוּאִיָּהוּ, yesh-o-khaw-yaw', Jehovah doth trouble), a chief Simeonite, descendant of Shemei (1 Chron. iv:36), who was engaged in the raid, during Hezekiah's time, upon the Hamites (B. C. about 711).

JESHUA (jěsh'u-à), (Heb. יֵשׁוּעַ, yay-shoo'ah. Jehovah helps).

1. One of the towns in which the people of Judah lived after their return from captivity (Neh. xi:26). According to Schwarz it is Yesusè, five miles east of Ekron (Palest. p. 116); probably the Yeshua of Robinson (Research. iii, 145, sq.).

2. A priest during David's reign and head of the ninth sacerdotal order (1 Chron. xxiv: 11); the A. V. has Jeshuah. (B. C. 1014.)

3. Son of Jozedech, and high-priest of the Jews when they returned, under Zerubbabel, from the Babylonian exile (B. C. 536). He was, doubtless, born during the exile. His presence and exhortations greatly promoted the rebuilding of the city and temple. The altar of the latter being first erected, enabled him to sanctify their labor by the religious ceremonies and offerings which the law required. Jeshua joined with Zerubbabel in opposing the machinations of the Samaritans (Ezra iv:3); and he was not found wanting in zeal when the works, after having been interrupted, were resumed in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (Ezra v:2; Hag. i:12). Several of the prophet Haggai's utterances are addressed to Jeshua (Hag. i:1; ii:2), and his name occurs in two of the symbolical prophecies of Zechariah (iii:1-10; vi:11-15). In the first of these passages Jeshua, as pontiff, represents the Jewish people covered at first with the garb of slaves, and afterwards with the new and glorious vestures of deliverance. In the second he wears for a moment crowns of silver and gold, as symbols of the sacerdotal and regal crowns of Israel, which were to be united on the head of the Messiah. He was also called Joshua.

4. (Neh. viii:17). (See JOSHUA.)

5. A Levite who had charge of distributing the sacred offerings in the sacerdotal cities under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi:15), B. C. 726.

6. A descendant of the place or person called Pahath-moab, whose people to the number of 2,812 returned from captivity (Ezra ii:6; Neh. vii:11), B. C. before 536.

7. A Levite whose posterity to the number of 74 returned from Babylon (Ezra ii:40; Neh. vii:43), B. C. before 536.

8. Father of the Levite Jozabad, whom Ezra appointed to look after the offerings for the sacred services (Ezra viii:33), B. C. before 459.

9. Father of Ezer; the latter repaired a part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii:19), B. C. before 446.

10. A Levite, head of a house, and an active co-operator with Nehemiah in the reformations he instituted (Neh. viii:7; ix:4, 5; x:9; xii:8). In Neh. (xii:24) "son of Kadmiel" should manifestly read "Jeshua and Kadmiel."

JESHUAH (jěsh'u-ah), (Heb. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yay-shoo'ah, Jah is help). (See JESHUA, 2.)

JESHURUN (jěsh'u-rūn or jesh-ū'rūn), (Heb. יְשׁוּרֻן, yesh-oo-roon', upright), a name practically applied to Israel in Dent. xxxii:15; xxxiii:5, 26; Is. xliv:2. It has been variously understood, but it is generally agreed to be a poetical diminutive expressive of affection.

JESIAH (je-si'ah), (Heb. יֵשַׁע, yish-shee-yaw', lent by Jehovah).

1. One of the Korites who was a mighty helper in battle at Ziklag during David's battle with Saul (1 Chron. xii:6), B. C. 1050.

2. Son of Uzziel, and father of Zechariah (1 Chron. xxiii:20; xxiv:25), B. C. about 1618. °

JESIMIEL (je-sim'i-el), (Heb. יְסִימְיֵאל, yesh-eem-aw-ale', God will place), one of the thirteen Simeonite princes who, in the time of Hezekiah, migrated to the valley of Gedor for purposes of conquest (1 Chron. iv:36), B. C. about 711.

JESSE (jěs'se), (Heb. יֵשׁוּעַ, yee-shah'ee, firm), a descendant of Obed, the son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth iv:17, 22; Matt. i:5, 6; Luke iii:32; 1 Chron. ii:12).

He was the father of eight sons (1 Sam. xvii:12); from the youngest of whom, David, is reflected all the distinction which belongs to the name. He seems to have been a person of some note and substance at Bethlehem, his property being chiefly in sheep. It would seem from 1 Sam. xvi:10, that he must have been aware of the high destinies which awaited his son; but it is doubtful if he ever lived to see them realized. The last historical mention of Jesse is in relation to the asylum which David procured for him with the king of Moab (1 Sam. xxii:3), B. C. before 1000.

JESTING (jěst-ing), (Gr. εὐτραπέλεια, yoo-traf-el-ee'ah, pleasantry, humor, facetiousness), is used in a bad sense in Eph. v:4, as ribaldry, low jesting, scurrility.

JESU (je'su), a modern poetical name for JESUS.

JESUI (jěs'u-i), (Heb. יֵשׁוּעַ, yish-vee', level), (Num. xxvi:44). Same as ISHUI (which see).

JESUITES (jěs'u-ites), the family of JESUI or ISHUI.

JESURUN (jěs'u-rūn), (Heb. יְשׁוּרֻן, yesh-oo-roon'), an erroneous form of JESHURUN.

JESUS (jě'zus), (Gr. Ἰησοῦς, ee-ay-soos', Jesu, Jesus, Josue), the Greek form of Joshua or Jeshua, a contraction of Jehoshua (Heb. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yeh-ho-shoo'ah), that is, "help of Jehovah" or "Savior" (Num. xiii:16).

1. Joshua, son of Nun, the military leader in the wars of Canaan (Acts vii:55; Heb. iv:8). (See JOSHUA.)

2. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about four hundred years after David (Luke iii:29). The A. V. follows a different Greek text and calls him Jose.

3. In the Septuagint the name occurs several times in the Apocrypha. The author of Ecclesiasticus was called by this name and twelve persons with the same name are mentioned by Josephus outside of his references to Joshua and to Christ.

It was a common name among the Jews of the Greek-speaking period.

4. A Jewish Christian, also termed Justus, associated with Paul (Col. iv:11). (See JUSTUS.)

5. The name of our Lord. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

JESUS CHRIST (jě-zus krist), (Gr. Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός), the ordinary designation of the incarnate Son of God, and Savior of mankind.

This double designation is not, like Simon Peter, John Mark, Joses Barnabas, composed of a name and a surname, but, like John the Baptist, Simon Magus, Bar-jesus Elymas, of a proper name, and an official title. Jesus was our Lord's proper name, just as Peter, James, and John were the proper names of three of his disciples. The name seems not to have been an uncommon one among the Jews. The apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus is attributed to Jesus the son of Sirach; and, in the New Testament, we read of Jesus, the father of Elymas the sorcerer (Acts xiii:6), and of 'Jesus, which is called Justus of the circumcision' (Col. iv:11), one of Paul's 'fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God which had been a comfort to him.' To distinguish our Lord from others bearing the name, he was termed Jesus of Nazareth (John xviii:7, etc.), Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος, and Jesus the son of Joseph (John vi:42, etc.).

(1) Personal Name. There can be no doubt that Jesus is the Greek form of a Hebrew name, which had been borne by two illustrious individuals in former periods of the Jewish history—the successor of Moses and introducer of Israel into the Promised Land (Exod. xxiv:13), and the high-priest who, along with Zerubbabel (Zech. iii:1), took so active a part in the re-establishment of the civil and religious polity of the Jews on their return from the Babylonish captivity. Its original and full form is Jehoshua (Num. xiii:16). By contraction it became Joshua, or Jeshua; and when transferred into Greek, by taking the termination characteristic of that language, it assumed the form Jesus. It is thus the names of the illustrious individuals referred to are uniformly written in the Sept.; and the first of them is twice mentioned in the New Testament by this name (Acts vii:45; Heb. iv:8).

The conferring of this name on our Lord was not the result of accident, nor of the ordinary course of things, there being 'none of his kindred,' as the 'neighbors and cousins' of his mother said, 'called by that name' (Luke i:61). It was the consequence of a twofold miraculous interposition. The angel who announced to his virgin mother that she was to be 'the most honored of women,' in giving birth to the Son of God and the Savior of men, intimated also to her the name by which the holy child was to be called: 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus' (Luke i:31). And it was probably the same heavenly messenger who appeared to Joseph, and, to remove his suspicions and quiet his fears, said to him: 'That which is conceived in thy wife Mary is of the Holy Ghost, and she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus' (Matt. i:20, 21). The pious pair were 'not disobedient to the heavenly vision.' 'When eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb' (Luke ii:21).

The name Jesus, like most of Jewish proper names, was significant; and, as might well be expected, when we consider who imposed it, its meaning is at once important and appropriate. The precise import of the word has been a subject of doubt and debate among interpreters. As to its general meaning there is all but an unanimous concurrence. It was intended to denote that he who bore it was to be a Deliverer or Savior. This, whatever more, is indicated in the original word; and the reason given by the angel for the imposition of this name on the Virgin's son was 'because he shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. i:21). But while some interpreters hold that it is just a part of the verb signifying to save in the form Hiphil, slightly modified, and that it signifies 'he shall save,' others hold that it is a compound word formed by the addition of two letters of the incommunicable name of the Divinity, יהוה, to that verb, and that it is equivalent to 'The Salvation of the Lord,' or 'The Lord the Savior.' It is not a matter of vital importance. The following circumstances seem to give probability to the latter opinion. It does not appear likely that Moses would have changed the name of his destined successor from Oshea, which signifies 'savior,' into Jehoshua (Num. xiii:16), if the latter signified merely he shall save; whereas, if the word be a compound term, embodying in it the name Jehovah, we see an adequate reason for the change. In the first chapter of the Gospel by Matthew (Matt. i:22, 23), the most natural interpretation of the words (though they admit of another exegesis) seems to imply that the prediction of Isaiah, that the Virgin's son should be called Immanuel, was fulfilled in the imposition of the name Jesus on the Son of Mary. This would be the case only on the supposition that Immanuel and Jesus are equivalent terms, a supposition which cannot be sustained unless Jesus can be fairly rendered 'Jehovah will save,' or 'Jehovah the Savior.' In that case, Jesus and Immanuel—God with us, i. e., on our side—express the same ideas.

It is right, however, to remark that the merely bearing such a name as either Immanuel or Jesus, even by Divine appointment, is not of itself evidence of the divinity of him who bears it. The Hebrews were in the habit of giving names, both to persons and places, which were intended not to describe their distinctive properties, but to express some important general truth. Jacob called an altar built by him El-Elohe-Israel (Gen. xxxiii:20), 'God the God of Israel,' i. e., God is the God of Israel. Moses called an altar he built Jehovah-nissi (Exod. xvii:15), 'Jehovah my banner,' i. e., Jehovah is my banner. The name Jehoshua, as borne by him who brought the people of the Lord into the heritage of the Gentiles, means no more than that by him Jehovah would deliver his people. In many of the proper names in the Old Testament, the name El, or Jehovah, forms a part. Yet when, as in the case before us, he who bears such a name, by express divine appointment, is shown 'by many infallible proofs' to be indeed an incarnation of Divinity, we cannot but perceive a peculiar propriety in this divine appointment, and find in it, if not a new argument, a corroboration of the host of arguments which lead us to the conclusion that He who 'according to the flesh' was the Son of David, 'according to the Spirit of Holiness' was 'the Son of God,' 'God over all, blessed forever' (Rom. i:3, 4; ix:5).

The name of Jesus' (Phil. ii:10) is not the name Jesus, but 'the name above every name,' ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πάντων ὀνόματα, ver. 9; i. e., the supreme dignity and authority with which the Father has invested Jesus Christ, as the reward of his disinterested exertions in the cause of the divine glory and human happiness; and the bowing ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ in or at the name of Jesus, is obviously not an external mark of homage when the name Jesus is pronounced, but the inward sense of awe and submission to him who is raised to a station so exalted.

(2) Official Name. CHRIST (Gr. Χριστός, the Anointed One; Heb. מָשִׁיחַ, Messiah, the Anointed). Christ is not, strictly speaking, a proper name, but an official title. Jesus Christ, or rather, as it generally ought to be rendered, Jesus the Christ, is a mode of expression of the same kind as John the Baptist, or Baptizer. In consequence of not adverting to this, the force, and even the meaning, of many passages of Scripture are misapprehended. When it is stated that Paul asserted, 'This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ' (Acts xvii:3), ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός Ἰησοῦς, etc., that he 'testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ' (Acts xviii:5), the meaning is that he proclaimed and proved that Jesus was the Christ, τὸν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, or Messiah—the rightful owner of a title descriptive of a high official station which had been the subject of ancient prediction. When Jesus himself says that 'it is life eternal to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent' (John xvii:3), he represents the knowledge of himself as the Christ, the Messiah, as at once necessary and sufficient to make men truly and permanently happy. When he says, 'What think ye of Christ?' περὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ: 'whose son is he?' (Matt. xxii:42), he does not mean, What think ye of ME, or of my descent? but, What think ye of the Christ—the Messiah—and especially of his paternity. There can be no doubt that the word, though originally an appellative and intended to bring before the mind a particular official character possessed by him to whom it is applied, came at last, like many other terms of the same kind, to be often used very much as a proper name, to distinguish our Lord from other persons bearing the name Jesus. This is a sense, however, of comparatively rare occurrence in the New Testament.

Proceeding, then, on the principle that Christ is an appellative, let us inquire into its origin and signification as applied to our Lord. CHRIST is the English form of a Greek word, Χριστός, corresponding in meaning to the Hebrew word Messiah and the English word Anointed. The Christ is just equivalent to the Anointed One. The important question, however, remains behind, What is meant when the Savior is represented as the Anointed One? To reply to this question satisfactorily it will be necessary to go somewhat into detail.

Unction, from a very early age, seems to have been the emblem of consecration, or setting apart to a particular, and especially to a religious, purpose. Thus, Jacob is said to have anointed the pillar of stone, which he erected and set apart as a monument of his supernatural dream at Bethel (Gen. xxviii:18; xxxi:13; xxxv:14). Under the Old Testament economy high-priests and kings were regularly set apart to their offices, both of which were, strictly speaking, sacred ones, by the ceremony of anointing, and the prophets were occasionally designated by the same rite. This rite seems to have been intended as a public intimation of a Divine appointment to office. Thus Saul is termed 'the Lord's anointed' (1 Sam. xxiv:6); David, 'the anointed of the God of Israel' (2 Sam. xxiii:1); and Zedekiah, 'the anointed of the Lord' (Lam. iv:20). The high-priest is called 'the anointed priest' (Lev. iv:3).

From the origin and design of the rite, it is not wonderful that the term should have, in a secondary and analogical sense, been applied to persons set apart by God for important purposes, though not actually anointed. Thus Cyrus, the King of Persia, is termed 'the Lord's anointed' (Is. xlv: 1); the Hebrew patriarchs, when sojourning in Canaan, are termed 'God's anointed ones' Ps. cv: 15); and the Israelitish people receive the same appellation from the prophet Habbakuk (Hab. iii:13). It is probably with reference to this use of the expression that Moses is said by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, to have 'counted the reproach of Christ' (Heb. xi:26), τοῦ Χριστοῦ (λαοῦ), the same class who in the parallel clause are termed the 'people of God,' 'greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.'

In the prophetic Scriptures we find this appellation given to an illustrious personage, who, under various designations, is so often spoken of as destined to appear in a distant age as a great deliverer. The royal prophet David seems to have been the first who spoke of the great deliverer under this appellation. He represents the heathen (the Gentile nations) raging, and the people (the Jewish people) imagining a vain thing, 'against Jehovah, and against his anointed' (Ps. ii:2). He says, 'Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed' (Ps. xx:6). 'Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity,' says he, addressing himself to 'Him who was to come,' 'therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows' (Ps. xlv:7). In all the passages in which the great deliverer is spoken of as 'the anointed one,' by David, he is plainly viewed as sustaining the character of a king.

The prophet Isaiah also uses the appellation, 'the anointed one,' with reference to the promised deliverer, but, when he does so, he speaks of him as a prophet or great teacher. He introduces him as saying, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord God hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn,' etc. (Is. lxi:1, etc.).

Daniel is the only other of the prophets who uses the appellation, 'the anointed one,' in reference to the Great Deliverer, and he plainly represents him as not only a prince, but also a high-priest, an expiator of guilt. 'Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring an everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and the prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy. Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks; the city shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times; and after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself' (Dan. ix:24-26).

During the period which elapsed from the close of the prophetic canon until the birth of Jesus, no appellation of the expected deliverer seems to have been so common as the Messiah or Anointed One, and this is still the name which the unbelieving Jews ordinarily employ when speaking of him whom they still look for to avenge their wrongs and restore them to more than their former honors.

Messiah, Christ, Anointed, is, then, a term equivalent to consecrated, sacred, set apart; and as the record of divine revelation is called, by way of eminence, The Bible, or book, so is the Great Deliverer called The Messiah, or Anointed One, much in the same way as he is termed, The Man, The Son of Man.

The import of this designation as given to Jesus of Nazareth may now readily be apprehended: When he is termed the Christ it is plainly indicated that HE is the great deliverer promised under that appellation, and many others in the Old Testament Scriptures, and that all that is said of this deliverer under this or any other appellation is true of HIM. No attentive reader of the Old Testament can help noticing that in every part of the prophecies there is ever and anon presented to our view an illustrious personage destined to appear at some future distant period, and, however varied may be the figurative representations given of him, no reasonable doubt can be entertained as to the identity of the individual. It is quite obvious that the Messiah is the same person as 'the seed of the woman' who was to 'bruise the head of the serpent' (Gen. iii:15); 'the seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed' (Gen. xxii: 18); the great 'prophet to be raised up like unto Moses,' whom all were to be required to hear and obey (Deut. xviii:15); the 'priest after the order of Melchizedek;' 'the rod out of the stem of Jesse, which should stand for an ensign of the people to which the Gentiles should seek' (Is. xi:1, 10); the virgin's son whose name was to be Immanuel (Is. vii:14); 'the branch of Jehovah' (Is. iv:2); 'the Angel of the Covenant' (Mal. iii:1); 'the Lord of the Temple,' etc., in the same place. When we say, then, that Jesus is the Christ, we in effect say, 'This is HE of whom Moses in the law, and the Prophets did write' (John i:45); and all that they say of HIM is true of Jesus.

Now what is the sum of the prophetic testimony respecting him? It is this—that he should belong to the very highest order of being, the incommunicable name Jehovah being represented as rightfully belonging to him; that 'his goings forth have been from old, from everlasting' (Mic. v:2); that his appropriate appellations should be 'Wonderful,' 'Counsellor,' 'the Mighty God' (Is. ix:6); that he should assume human nature, and become 'a child born' of the Israelitish nation of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix:10), of the family of David (Is. xi:1); that the object of his appearance should be the salvation of mankind, both Jews and Gentiles (Is. xlix:6); that he should be 'despised and rejected' of his countrymen; that he should be 'cut off, but not for himself'; that he should be 'wounded for men's transgressions, bruised for their iniquities, and undergo the chastisement of their peace;' that 'by his stripes men should be healed;' that 'the Lord should lay on him the iniquity' of men; that 'exaction should be made and he should answer it'; that he should 'make his soul an offering for sin'; that after these sufferings he should be 'exalted and extolled and made very high;' that he should 'see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, and by his knowledge justify many' (Is. liii, throughout); that Jehovah should say to him, 'Sit at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool' (Ps. cx:1); that he should be brought near to the Ancient of Days, and that to him should be given 'dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, and nations, and languages should serve him—an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away—a kingdom that shall not be destroyed' (Dan. vii:13, 14). All this is implied in saying Jesus is the Christ. In the plainer language of the New Testament 'Jesus is the Christ' is equivalent to Jesus is 'God manifest in flesh' (1 Tim. iii:16)—the Son of God, who, in human nature, by his obedience, and sufferings, and death in the room of the guilty, has obtained salvation for them, and all power in heaven and earth for himself, that he may give eternal life to all coming to the Father through him.

While the statement, 'Jesus is the Christ,' is thus materially equivalent to the statement, 'all that is said of the Great Deliverer in the Old Testament Scriptures is true of HIM,' it brings more directly before our mind those truths respecting him which the appellation, 'the Anointed One' naturally suggests. He is a prophet, a priest, and a king. He is the great revealer of Divine truth, the only expiator of human guilt, sole legitimate ruler over the understandings, consciences and affections of men. In his person, and work, and word, by his spirit and providence, he unfolds the truth with respect to the Divine character and will, and so conveys it into the mind as to make it the effectual means of conforming man's will to God's will, man's character to God's character. He has, by his spotless, all-perfect obedience, amid the severest sufferings, 'obedience unto death, even the death of the cross,' so illustrated the excellence of the Divine law and the wickedness and danger of violating it, as to make it a righteous thing in 'the just God' to 'justify the ungodly,' thus propitiating the offended majesty of heaven; while the manifestation of the Divine love in appointing and accepting this atonement, when apprehended by the mind under the influence of the Holy Spirit, becomes the effectual means of reconciling man to God and to his law, 'transforming him by the renewing of his mind.' And now, possessed of 'all power in heaven and earth,' 'all power over all flesh,' 'He is Lord of All.' All external events and all spiritual influences are equally under his control, and as a king he exerts his authority in carrying into full effect the great purposes which his revelations as a prophet, and his great atoning sacrifice as a high-priest, were intended to accomplish.

But the full import of the appellation the CHRIST is not yet brought out. It indicates that He to whom it belongs is the anointed prophet; priest, and king—not that he was anointed by material oil, but that he was divinely appointed, qualified, commissioned, and accredited to be the Savior of men. These are the ideas which the term anointed seems specially intended to convey. Jesus was divinely appointed to the offices he filled. He assumed them involuntarily, 'he was called of God as was Aaron' (Heb. v:4). 'Behold mine ELECT, in whom my soul delighteth.' He was divinely qualified: 'God gave to him the Spirit not by measure.' 'The Spirit of the Lord was upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, and they made him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, so that he does not judge after the sight of his eyes, nor reprove after the hearing of his ears, but he smites the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips he slays the wicked; and righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins' (Is. xi:2, 4). He was divinely commissioned; 'The Father sent him.' Jehovah said to him, 'Thou art my servant, in thee will I be glorified.' 'It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayst be my salvation to the ends of the earth' (Is. xlix:6). 'Behold,' says Jehovah, 'I have given Him for a witness to the people—a leader and commander to the people.' He is divinely accredited; 'Jesus of Nazareth,' says the Apostle Peter, was 'a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders, and signs which God did by him in the midst of you' (Acts ii:22). 'The Father who hath sent me,' says Jesus himself, 'hath borne witness of me' (John v:37). This he did again and again by a voice from heaven, as well as by the miracles which he performed by that divine power which was equally his as his Father's. Such is the import of the appellation Christ.

If these observations are clearly apprehended there will be little difficulty in giving a satisfactory answer to the question which has sometimes been proposed—when did Jesus become Christ? when was he anointed of God? We have seen that the expression is a figurative or analogical one, and therefore we need not wonder that its references are various. The appointment of the Savior, like all the other Divine purposes, was of course from eternity. 'He was set up from everlasting' (Prov. viii:23); he 'was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world' (1 Pet. i:20). His qualifications, such of them as were conferred, were bestowed in or during his incarnation, when 'God anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power' (Acts x:38). His commission may be considered as given him when called to enter on the functions of his office. He himself, after quoting, in the synagogue of Nazareth, in the commencement of his ministry, the passage from the prophecies of Isaiah in which his unction to the prophetic office is predicted, declared, 'This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.' And in his resurrection and ascension, God, as the reward of his loving righteousness, and hating iniquity, 'anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows' (Ps. xlv:7), i. e., conferred on him a regal power, fruitful in blessings to himself and others, far superior to that which any king had ever possessed, making him, as the Apostle Peter expresses it, 'both Lord and Christ' (Acts ii:36). As to his being accredited, every miraculous event performed in reference to him or by him may be viewed as included in this species of anointing—especially the visible descent of the Spirit on him in his baptism.

These statements, with regard to the import of the appellation, 'the Christ,' show us how we are to understand the statement of the Apostle John, 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God' (1 John v:1), i. e., is 'a child of God,' 'born again,' 'a new creature;' and the similar declaration of the Apostle Paul, 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord,' i. e., the Christ, the Messiah, 'but by the Holy Ghost' (1 Cor. xii:3). It is plain that the proposition, 'Jesus is the Christ,' when understood in the latitude of meaning which we have shown belongs to it, contains a complete summary of the truth respecting the divine method of salvation. To believe that principle rightly understood is to believe the Gospel—the saving truth, by the faith of which a man is, and by the faith of which only a man can be, brought into the relation or formed to the character of a child of God; and though a man may, without divine influence, be brought to acknowledge that 'Jesus is the Lord,' 'Messiah the Prince,' and even firmly to believe that these words embody a truth yet no man can be brought really to believe and cordially to acknowledge the truth contained in these words, as we have attempted to unfold it, without a peculiar divine influence. That Jesus is $\delta \epsilon \lambda \theta \omega \nu, \delta \chi \rho \iota \sigma \tau \acute{o} \varsigma$, is the testimony of God, the faith of which constitutes a Christian, $\tau \acute{o} \epsilon \nu$, the one thing to which the Spirit, the water and the blood, unite in bearing witness (1 John v:6, 8, 9).

(3) Offices of Jesus Christ. The offices are generally considered as threefold: (a) A prophet to enlighten, warn, and instruct (John vi:14; iii:2). (b) A priest to sympathize, intercede, and make atonement for his people (1s. liii; Heb. vii). (c) A king to reign in, rule over, protect, deliver, and bless them (Zech. xiv:9; Ps. ii:6). JESUS THE CHRIST, LIFE OF.

(1) Records and Chronology. Palestine was a small country on the far eastern edge of the great Roman Empire. The Jewish people were despised and ignored because they were a small Oriental nation, bigoted and exclusive in spirit, austere in morals, and fanatical in religion. The career of Jesus, brief, uneventful and obscure to the general observer of his day, attracted almost no attention outside of his own land. It was nearly thirty-five years after Jesus' death before the Empire came to regard his followers as anything more than a particular Jewish sect. We need not, therefore, expect, nor do we in fact find, much reference to Jesus in the Roman history of this period. The only clear statement about him is contained in Tacitus' "Annals," xv:44: "They called them Christians. Christ, from whom the name was given, had been put to death in the reign of Tiberius, by the procurator Pontius Pilate." There are also some corroborating allusions to Jesus and his followers in other Roman writings. The great Jewish writers of the century, Philo and Josephus, give us practically nothing. Philo nowhere mentions Jesus, perhaps from ignorance of him, although Philo lived until after 40 A. D. Josephus barely mentions "the Christ" in Antiquities xx, ix, 1 (unless some portion of the famous passage xviii, iii, 3 can be called genuine). His silence is intentional, due to Jewish hatred of Jesus. Small, therefore, but very valuable, is the extra-biblical record of Jesus' life.

Within the New Testament, the earliest record is contained in certain epistles of Paul, written not later than the years A. D. 53-63, and whose authorship and historicity is unquestioned. From these letters we learn of his Davidic descent, his unique personality, his exalted character, his preaching of the Kingdom of God, his appointment of apostles, his Messiahship, his betrayal, crucifixion and resurrection. From James, Peter and Hebrews also can be gathered facts about Jesus' life.

But the Gospels have explicitly recorded for us Jesus' life. They contain memorabilia of Jesus. Fragmentary accounts of what Jesus did and said have been brought together for use and preservation. From a time even before his death, the important events, the significant acts, and the weighty teachings of Jesus, were reported among his followers, taught to the new converts (Acts ii:42), and circulated wherever the Gospel was carried. The words and acts of Jesus were the substance of Christianity throughout the apostolic age. For many years this historical material was transmitted orally, according to the Jewish custom of the time. Gradually the records passed from Aramaic, their original language, into Greek, that they might be given also to the Gentiles and to the Jews of the Dispersion. After a time some of the material was committed to writing, and oral and written tradition went along hand in hand. The first attempt to gather up these fragmentary records was probably made by the apostle Matthew, who collected many of Jesus' sayings in their Aramaic dress, perhaps as early as A. D. 50. This collection is known as the "Logia." Some years later, Mark supplemented Matthew's work by making a collection of the records of the events and deeds of Jesus' public ministry.

And as the generation of eye and ear witnesses of what Jesus had done and said was now passing away, many attempts were made (Luke i:1-4) to collect the floating material into a more complete and durable form. Our four canonical gospels are such final collections. They came into existence at four different centers of Christian teaching and activity in the apostolic age, and grew out of the cycle of tradition which each center had in its possession. The Gospel of Mark (about 66 A. D.) is the earliest of the four. The Gospel of Matthew is not the "Logia" of the apostle, but an original work in Greek (about A. D. 70-80) by an unnamed author, who used a Greek form of the earlier "Logia" as a source of his material, and drew also from the Gospel of Mark, and from various other sources of oral and written tradition. The Gospel of Luke was also compiled (about A. D. 70-80) from a Greek edition of the "Logia," from Mark's Gospel, and from other sources of oral and written tradition. The fourth Gospel comes from the Apostle John, and contains a cycle of tradition not often parallel to that of the synoptic gospels, but of a peculiar type which John seems to have cherished. This gospel is either directly from the apostle (about A. D. 80-96), or indirectly, through some disciple of his who, after his master's death, collected certain characteristic material from the apostle's teaching and put it forth under John's name (about A. D. 100-130).

Our gospels are therefore compilations. The events, the deeds and the sayings of Jesus which they contain are those which circulated among the Christians from the first. They survived, a few out of a great number, because they most clearly revealed and perpetuated the life, work and teaching of Jesus. The material has passed through a process of wise selection by the disciples, and of practical sifting by time, until we have the choicest and most useful portion, the essence of the history. It must, however, be remembered that the incidents and sayings have, by this process of transmission, lost for the most part their historical setting and their chronological position. This material, when brought together in our gospels, is often grouped topically or illustratively. The arrangement cannot be depended upon in detail. For example, in Matthew the Sermon on the Mount, the Charge to the Twelve, the Parables by the Sea, the Denunciation of the Pharisees, the Eschatological Discourse, and in Luke the long section (chapters x-xix) are all collections of material spoken on various occasions, whose detailed historical setting has been lost, and which are brought together in a topical or literary unity. The same thing can often be seen in the grouping of the incidents as transmitted to us. This feature of the gospels is becoming increasingly clear to all thoughtful scholars, and the recognition of it is essential to a true use of the Gospel histories.

The chronology of Jesus' life is in general certain, but in detail very uncertain. We know that Jesus' death fell in the reign of Tiberius; and the procuratorship of Pilate, i. e., somewhere between A. D. 26 and 36. This can probably be narrowed down to A. D. 28-33, but within this range we cannot tell what year. The year A. D. 30 is the date to which it is now commonly assigned, but of this we cannot be at all sure. The beginning of Jesus' public ministry was, presumably, not until after the fifteenth year of Tiberius (Luke iii:1-3), i. e., late in A. D. 28 or 29. Jesus being then "about thirty years of age" (Luke iii:23), his birth goes back a few years into the B. C. period. About the year B. C. 6 is the date toward which we seem now to be trending. Even supposing these data given by Luke to be accurate, there remains an uncertainty of years. We would seem to have a public ministry of Jesus but one full year in length, if he began early in 29 and was crucified in the spring of A. D. 30. Current chronological schemes of the public ministry give it something over three years, on the basis of John ii:13; v:1; vi:4; xiii:1. But v:1 is not a passover, and vi:4 as a passover is somewhat doubtful (see Westcott and Hort, "New Testament in Greek," vol. ii:Appx. 77-81; and Turner, art. Chronology of the New Testament in "New Bible Dictionary," vol. i, pp. 403-415, the best single article on the whole problem); while the passover in connection with the cleansing of the temple may be the last one, as the synoptic gospels indicate. John's supposed chronological framework is therefore quite questionable. The synoptists mention but one passover, that in connection with Jesus' death. It is sometimes held that they indicate, though they do not name, two others (Mark ii:23 suggests a time of year soon after a passover, and Mark vi:39 is supposed from its reference to "green grass" to indicate a time not long before a passover). But from what we know of the way in which the material of the gospels is put together, we cannot build chronology on such suggestions. Professor Sanday ("Expositor," iv, v:16) says: "The simple fact is that the synoptic gospels are only a series of incidents loosely strung together, with no chronology at all worthy of the name." The exact dates of Jesus' life cannot at present be known, neither can we know the duration of his public ministry; it was probably either one or two full years, with some portion of a second or third. After all, this matters little; exact chronology is a modern passion, but it is comparatively unimportant. The ethical and religious teaching of Jesus' life is quite independent of precise years, months and days.

(2) Preparation of Jesus for His Work. The Hebrew nation had a genius for morals and religion, as Greece had a genius for science and literature, and Rome a genius for law and administration. Each nation made its essential contribution to the progress of mankind. Naturally, therefore, the greatest religious teacher of the world arose from the Hebrew race, and perfected his people's contribution to human history. Jesus was born of Jewish parents in Palestine. But not at Jerusalem nor in Judea did the Jewish Messiah arise—that honor fell to Galilee. For in Judea, Pharisaism was at its worst. Emphasis upon the letter had crushed out the spirit of religion, righteousness had become a superficial and punctilious observance of formal rules of conduct and empty ceremonies instead of the outworking of a pure heart and a right purpose. The rabbinical schools at Jerusalem were dreary storerooms of Jewish legal lore and factories of casuistical disquisitions upon the minutiae of legal obligation. Out of this no good thing could come, least of all the Messiah.

So, in God's providence, Jesus' home was at Nazareth. Galilee breathed a freer, purer religious atmosphere. In fact, was there so favorable a place as Galilee elsewhere in all the earth for the development of the world's greatest teacher? For there he escaped the hollow and hypocritical Pharisaism, and at the same time the gross immorality and barren speculations of the Gentile nations. Jesus' parents were devoted adherents of Judaism in the best prophetic type, genuinely religious. They were simple, quiet, hard-working people of one of the larger Galilean villages. The education which Jesus received was an excellent one for the times. It began in the home, where the greatest care was taken by the best Jewish families to train their children religiously. Then came the assistance also of the synagogue school, where the fundamentals of education were taught. The Old Testament history was thoroughly taught, and then the Old Testament law with its later elaborations, until the child became familiar with the whole canon of Jewish Scriptures. How completely Jesus entered into the spirit of all this appears on his first visit to Jerusalem, at the age of his legal majority, when he eagerly seized the opportunity to ask the rabbis the many great questions of religion and life to which he had found no answers. Jesus probably learned to read the Old Testament Scriptures in Hebrew, and the Aramaic he was of course familiar with, for it was the Jewish vernacular of his day. In addition he knew more or less Greek, for this was the language of commerce with the Gentile world, which had entered largely into Galilee.

Syria seems never to have gone beyond Syria out into the great Roman Empire, nor to have become familiar with the Gentile type of life, nor to have read the history or literature of any nation besides his own. In morals and religion Judaism was to be the teacher, not the taught. Out of Hebrew history and teaching Jesus drew the truth of God, and it was upon the Old Testament foundation as laid by the greatest of the prophets that he built the everlasting Gospel. That which was good in the religious thought and practice of his day he recognized and cherished, that which was false and harmful he rejected with true spiritual vision. Discrimination of essentials from non-essentials, the fixing of a scale of real values, was characteristic of Jesus. And in addition to all, he loved the world of nature about him, finding everywhere God's workmanship and God's love. No one has seen so much in nature that is beautiful and helpful as Jesus saw. God's own spirit of wisdom, truth and love grew in him to perfect him for his mission. Jesus must have come early to a consciousness of special nearness to God. It was this constraining power which led him safely through the maze of human experience to a complete control over his acts and choices, and to the ultimate approval of God for the Messianic work. He was the normal man; others were abnormal. And yet so unostentatious was Jesus' life during the thirty years at Nazareth, that his townsmen would not believe him extraordinary (Mark iii:20, 21; vi:1-6; Luke iv:16-30).

But however close Jesus felt himself to God, he probably was not yet conscious that he was to be the Messiah. The thirty years was a period of probation for him. When John the Baptist appeared in the district of the Jordan heralding the approach of the Kingdom of God, and calling upon men to prepare therefor, Jesus eagerly responded to the summons. Now was to appear he who should restore pure religion to Israel, and lead men to the glorious realization of their ideal hopes. Jesus would, with the others, receive the symbol of conformity to God's will and of preparation for the kingdom at hand. But with the administering of water baptism to Jesus came God's approval of his Son, and a unique impartation of God's spirit, which was to him at once the announcement of his Messiahship and the endowment for his Messianic work.

The experience which followed upon this, the so-called temptation, was Jesus' self-adjustment to his new office and life. The gospel accounts of this experience came from Jesus himself. In this parabolic language he endeavored to show to his disciples what was the true conception of the Kingdom of God and of the Messiah, as he had determined these at the outset of his ministry. The problem as to what sort of a Messiah he should be, and what methods he should use in the performance of his Messianic mission, was a vital one to Jesus, and the mental anguish of decision was real. God was with him in the choice. He determined to sacrifice himself wholly to the cause, to forego the comforts of life and subject himself to the privations and labors of a traveling ministry. He determined that he would not employ spectacular methods, but quietly and simply would do the work of a preacher of righteousness. And that, however great might be the pressure upon him to become the temporal Messiah of current Jewish expectation, he would insist only and always upon a spiritual kingdom, founded on spiritual truth, composed of spiritual members, and seeking spiritual ends. Then Jesus was ready to begin his public work as Messiah.

(3) Plan and Method of Jesus' Ministry.

The decision as to what needed to be done, and how it was to be accomplished, was reached by Jesus before he entered upon his public work. The Kingdom of God, a spiritual and moral kingdom, was to be established upon the earth. It was the nature of this kingdom, first, to transform the individual, second, to dominate and purify the world. Such a kingdom could not be founded from without. All true and effective means must be of an invisible and spiritual kind. There could be no alliance with the political parties and forces already established in Judea, for the Kingdom of God was to take no external, temporal, or local form. It was not to be set up or maintained by any of those instrumentalities upon which human kingdoms depended. "My kingdom is not of this world," said Jesus (John xviii:36). It was to have no officers, no headquarters, no political features, no worldly associations. It was not to be established nor defended by physical force, neither was it to exist in the interest of selfish ends. Nor was it possible for Jesus to carry out the current Messianic programme. The Messiah of the popular hope must establish a temporal kingdom, visible to men, which should give the Jewish nation political supremacy of the world, and so glorify and avenge the down-trodden Israel. This was not the character of the Kingdom of God, as God gave Jesus to see it. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," said he, "the kingdom of God is within you" (I. Luke xvii:20, 21). It was impossible, therefore, for Jesus to coöperate with any of the religious parties which governed the lives and thoughts of his nation. The only means of establishing such a kingdom as he had been commissioned to found was to win to its support individuals who felt its truth and power, waiting patiently until those adherents should attain such numbers and strength as would leaven humanity entire, and transform the whole into the ideal society of perfected individuals.

This plan of Jesus is the most remarkable ever conceived. Rome had united the Mediterranean world by an all-conquering idea of universal political dominion, and men had marveled at the accomplishment of the impossible. Yet how much greater was Jesus' idea of uniting the whole world by the ties of religion into a universal spiritual brotherhood, a union not external, political and selfish, but internal, religious, humanitarian. An invisible kingdom which, planted in a small and obscure country, should expand till it embraced all countries, all men, all time. Such was Jesus' idea of the Kingdom of God. So original was this plan, so independent of all existing thought, that it could have come only from God himself. No other than Jesus could have conceived it, no other than Jesus would have attempted it. Yet Jesus determined upon this plan with full confidence that it was God's will, and with full assurance of its ultimate success. The accomplishment of it he set about with a resolution which carried him through hardships, isolation, reproach, opposition, martyrdom.

The evidence does not seem to justify the view that the plan of Jesus underwent modification during his ministry. His methods, of course, changed with the changing circumstances, his presentation of his message progressed with the developing capacity of his hearers, and his attitude toward the various classes adjusted itself to the attitude which they assumed toward him. It is true that Jesus did not publicly proclaim his Messiahship until the very close of his ministry, and that even to his most intimate disciples he did not make that claim until the latter portion of his work. But this was not because he was not himself certain of his Messiahship. It was due to the fact that if he had at the outset asserted himself as the Messiah, the perverse popular expectation would have demanded its perverse realization, and Jesus would have received no hearing at all for his purely spiritual conception of the kingdom. In every possible way Jesus avoided raising false hopes. He preached the kingdom so that it might appeal to the hearts of men and transform their expectations to accord with the reality. Even this method of superlative wisdom did not succeed with the Jews as a whole, for when they found Jesus would not fulfill their demands, all but a handful of followers deserted him (John vi: 14, 15, 66). But Jesus' failure to win the nation to an acceptance of the real kingdom could not have been a surprise to himself. It did not need a superhuman knowledge to foresee, at the outset of Jesus' public ministry, that a kingdom and a Messiah such as he contemplated would ultimately fail of acceptance by the Jews. It must have seemed quite clear to Jesus at the start that the preaching of such a message would end in its rejection and his own death. The Jewish people had conspicuously stained their history with the blood of their great prophets (Matt. xxiii:29-37), and could their greatest prophet fail to meet a like fate? But even with this probability before him, Jesus went calmly and earnestly about his work of delivering the message and founding the kingdom which God had given into his hands.

His method of procedure was to go about in Galilee, proclaiming the presence of the Kingdom of God, and teaching what were its characteristics, its demands, and its future. In the synagogues he taught upon the Sabbath, but still more every day in the homes, upon the streets, in the fields, by the seaside, wherever and whenever receptive listeners might be found. He gathered about himself disciples whom he trained to carry his message. By his own efforts, which they supplemented, Palestine was made to ring with the Gospel.

And Jesus' teaching was commended to the attention of men, and impressed upon their minds, by the mighty works which God gave him to do. Extraordinary operations in the physical world were made to illustrate the powers and blessings of the spiritual world. The divine power manifest in Jesus could heal physical disease, much more could it remove moral disease; it could restore physical sight and hearing, how much more could it open the spirit of man to the eternal truths and beauties of God and his universe; it could supply the physical necessities to man, how much more could it give that spiritual sustenance, that righteousness, which the hungering soul craves; it could remove the physical effects of sin, how much more could it purify the soul; it could quiet the raging waves of the sea, how much more could it soothe the troubled heart; it could restore the dead to life, how much more could it renew the moral and spiritual being. These great works were signs to the people that God was with Jesus, that he was the accredited messenger of the Most High. They were the token of God's presence among them, and the outflowing of his beneficence to humanity.

Then, too, Jesus' own life was the embodiment of his conception of the kingdom, an ideal realization of God's perfect will for men, and so a concrete and living illustration of his teaching. Here, as in all Jesus' teaching, it is the internal, not the external, which has permanent significance. Jesus became for us an example in the spirit of his life. His perfect trust in God, his absolute performance of duty, his unswerving adherence to truth, his serious view of life, his indifference to petty things, his vision into the depths of existence, his complete devotion to a great cause, his willing sacrifice of himself to serve his fellowmen, his patience in privation, adversity and suffering, his purity of character and motive—in all these and many other respects, Jesus was the personification of his own teaching, the pattern of the ideal man, the living example for every sincere soul.

(4) Jesus the Great Religious Teacher. The whole life of a real teacher teaches. The teaching of Jesus is not alone the words which he spoke; it is also the deeds which he did, and the example of his own life. Indeed, one attestation of the truth of his utterances is the beauty of the life which shows that truth in concrete realization. Jesus was recognized by the most receptive minds of his own day to be the great religious teacher (Matt. vii:29; Mark i:27; Luke xxiv:19) whose coming was to fulfill the ideal hopes of centuries (Luke xxiv:21; John vi:14, 15). It was not his words only that gave them this belief; it was their embodiment in his acts and their illustration in his character. Jesus was sent by God to deliver a divine message to man, a message of life. He revealed religious truth which was to be not only accepted, but lived. The living of truth means the expression of it in one's words, in one's deeds, in one's personality. Jesus not only told men what this divine truth was, but he showed in his own life what it was to live divine truth. Jesus therefore became and continues to be the source of religious belief and practice. He has made known to men that which they practically need to know about God, man, duty, existence; and has shown them how to realize these things in themselves.

Teaching is not an end in itself; it is a means to an end. Jesus' teaching was a means for getting God's will done in men individually and collectively. God has a great purpose for the world; we exist as a part of that purpose; we
